Massorah (mä-sö'rá). [Heb., 'tradition.'] The name given to the work of the Jewish scholars in establishing the traditional pronunciation and accents of the Hebrew Old Testament. The men who were engaged in this work were called Massoretes. The work of the Massorah went on for centuries, beginning soon after the return from the Babylonian captivity, when the study of the law became the center of the life of the Jews. Of later Massoretes the most prominent were the family of Asher, called ben Asher, who flourished in the 8th to the 10th centuries A. D. The last of the family, Aaron ben Moses ben Asher (see Aaron ben Asher), in the 10th century brought the Massorah to a close. Their rivals and opponents with regard to the vocalization of the text, originally merely consonantal, were the family of Ben Naftali in Babylonia. The system of the ben Asher has prevailed. The Massoretes worked with the minutest care and conscientiousness. Their observations they either noted on the margin of the text (Masora marginalis, which is distinguished as magna and parva) or in separate works. Where the traditional reading of a passage seemed to them untenable, they added their emendation on the margin, as "that which is to be read" (qere), opposed to "that which is written" (ketib).

Hence OF. Mahald (whence late AS. Mahald, ME. Mold), Mahald, whence E. Maud.) Died in Normandy, Nov. 3, 1083. Queen of William the Conqueror and daughter of Baldwin V., count of Flanders. She married William about 1053, and was crowned at Westminster May 11, 1067.

Matilda, or Maud (mā'l). Born 1080; died at Westminster, May 1, 1118. The first wife of Henry I. of England, and daughter of Malcolm III., king of Scotland, and St. Margaret. She was baptized Edgyth (Edith), but was always known as Matilda or Maud. Malcolm III. and Margaret died in 1093, and Matilda was sheltered in England by her uncle Edgar Ætheling. On Nov. 11, 1100, she was married to Henry I. at Westminster Abbey by Anselm. She founded the first Austin priory in England in 1108. She was pious and learned, and had great influence on the life of the time. She was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Matilda. Born 1103 (?); died at Hedingham Castle, May 3, 1152. Queen of Stephen, king of England. She was the only child of Eustace III., count of Boulogne, and Mary, daughter of Malcolm III. of Scotland and St. Margaret. Before 1125 she married Stephen de Blois, nephew of Henry I. of England, who seized the English crown in 1135. In the civil war which followed the empress Matilda's invasion, she took the field in person, and, after Stephen's imprisonment, with her general William of Ypres and the aid of the citizens drove the empress from London. In 1148 she founded the hospital of St. Katharine by the Tower.

Matilda, or Maud, or Mold (Æthelic or Aaliz). Born at London, 1102; died at Notre Dame des Prés, near Rouen, Sept. 10, 1167. Empress, the daughter of Henry I. of England and his first wife Matilda. She married the German king Henry V. at Mainz Jan. 7, 1114, and may have been with him when he was crowned at Rome in 1111. When Henry V. died (1125) she returned to Normandy, and in 1126 to England. On June 17, 1128, she married Geoffrey Plantagenet, son of the Count of Anjou. Their first child (Henry II.) was born March 5, 1133. On the death of Henry I. (Dec. 1, 1135) her cousin Stephen assumed the crown. On Sept. 30, 1139, she invaded England, captured Stephen (Feb., 1141), was acknowledged lady of England and Normandy (April 8, 1141), and established herself at Westminster. She misused her power, was driven from the city, and fled to Oxford. She returned to Normandy in 1148. After the accession of her son Henry Plantagenet, she settled at Notre Dame des Prés, near Rouen, where she died. Her most noted exploit was her escape from Oxford with three of her knights at Christmas time. They clothed themselves in white, and fled over the frozen river and through Stephen's camp.

Matilda. Born about 1046; died about 1115. Countess of Tuscany, and ruler also of a large part of northern Italy. She was a supporter of Gregory VII. and other popes against the empire.

Matsya Avatara (mat'sya a-va-tā'ra). [Skt., 'fish incarnation.'] The first incarnation of Vishnu. He is believed to have infused a portion of his essence into a fish, or to have taken the form of a fish, to save Manu, the primeval man, from the universal deluge. Conciliating the Deity by his piety, Manu was warned of the deluge and commanded to build a ship and go on board with the seven Rishis, or patriarchs, and the seeds of all existing things. When the flood came, Vishnu appeared as a vast fish with a horn on its head, to which the ship's cable was fastened. The ship was thus drawn along and secured to a high crag till the flood passed.

Maui (mou'é). A hero in New Zealand legend. See the extract.

Though all these mythical beings are in a sense departmental gods, they yield in renown to a later child of their race, Maui, the great culture-hero, who is an advanced form of the culture-heroes, mainly theriomorphic, of the lower races. Maui, like many heroes of myth, was a youngest son. He was prematurely born (a similar story comes in the Brahmanic legend of the Adityas); his mother wrapped him up in her long hair, and threw him out to sea. A kinsman rescued him, and he grew up to be much the most important member of his family; like Qat in his larger circle of brethren. Maui it was who snared the sun, beat him, and taught him to run his appointed course, instead of careering at will and at any pace he chose about the heavens. He was the culture-hero who invented harps for spears and hooks; he turned his brother into the first dog, whence dogs are sacred; he fished New Zealand out of the sea; he stole fire for men. How Maui performed this feat, and how he "brought death into the world and all our woe," are topics that belong to the myths of Death and of the Fire-Stealer. Maui could not only change men into animals, but could himself assume animal shapes at will. Lang, Myth, etc., II, 30.

He graduated at Oxford (Exeter College) in 1685, and was curate of Bromley in Kent 1689-95. He was made chaplain of the Aleppo factory of the Company of Levant Merchants in 1695. "A Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem at Easter A. D. 1697" was printed at Oxford in 1703.

Maupassant (mō-pā-sōn'), Henri René Albert Guy de. Born at the Château de Mirmeuil, Seine-Inférieure, Aug. 5, 1850; died at Passy, Paris, July 6, 1893. A French novelist. He went to school at Yvetot, and graduated from the college of Rouen, while Gustave Flaubert, his godfather, looked after his literary training. He spent about ten years in civil service in the navy department. In Feb., 1879, his one-act play "Histoire du vieux temps" was performed in Paris, without, however, attracting any special attention. The next year, however, the success of his short story "Boule de suif" stamped him at once as a writer of marked ability. Then he published in rapid succession "La maison Tellier" (1881), "Mademoiselle Fifi" (1882), "Contes de la belle-croix" (1883), "Une vie" (1883), "Miss Harriet" (1884), "Les sœurs Rondoli" (1884), "An soleil" (1884), "Clair de lune" (1884), "Yvette" (1884), "Bel-Ami" (1885), "Contes du jour et de la nuit" (1885), "Contes et nouvelles" (1885), "M. Maurice. Born at Dillenburg, Prussia, Nov. 14, 1567; died at The Hague, April 23, 1625. Prince of Orange and Count of Nassau, a younger son of William the Silent. He was elected stadholder of the provinces of Holland and Zealand on the assassination of his father in 1584, and became stadholder of the Seven United Provinces in 1587. He expelled the Spaniards from the Seven United Provinces in a series of brilliant campaigns which entitle him to a place among the foremost generals of modern times. Groningen, the last stronghold of the Spaniards, fell in 1594. In 1609 a truce of 12 years was concluded with Spain at the instance of Olden-Barneveldt, the head of the aristocratic republican party, who feared that a continuance of the war might enable Maurice to usurp the sovereignty. A political contest ensued, which was further embittered by religious strife, inasmuch as Maurice, who was supported by the populace, favored the Gomarists, while Olden-Barneveldt favored the Arminians or Remonstrants. This contest resulted in the execution of Olden-Barneveldt in 1619, and in the victory of Maurice, who renewed the war with Spain at the expiration of the truce in 1621.

Maurice, Frederick Denison. Born at Normanton, near Lowestoft, England, Aug. 29, 1805; died at London, April 1, 1872. A noted English divine. He was appointed assistant librarian of the Institute in 1844; imperial librarian of the Tuileries in 1860; professor of history at the Collège de France in 1862; and general director of the national archives in 1868. His works include "Essai sur les légendes pieuses du moyen âge" (1843), "Histoire des grandes forêts de la Gaule" (1850), "Histoire des religions de la Grèce antique" (1857-60), etc.

Maury (mä'ri), Matthew Fontaine. Born in Spottsylvania County, Va., Jan. 14, 1806; died at Lexington, Va., Feb. 1, 1873. An American hydrographer, and naval officer. He was superintendent of the hydrographical office and national observatory in Washington 1844-61, when he entered the Confederate navy. He established the Confederate submarine battery service at Richmond in 1862. At the close of the Civil War he retired to Mexico, where he accepted a position under the government of Maximilian. He was afterward professor of physics in the Virginia Military Institute. He was the first to give a complete description of the Gulf Stream, and to mark out specific routes to be followed in crossing the Atlantic. His chief work is "Physical Geography of the Sea" (1855).

Mausoleum (mä-sô-lé'um). [From Mausolus.] See Halicarnassus.

Mausolus (mä-sô-lüs). [Gr. Μαυσόλος or Μαίσαλος.] Died about 353 B. C. A king or dynast of Caria, who first appears in history in the revolt of the satraps against Artaxerxes Mnemon 362 B. C. He married his sister Artemisia, who after his death erected at Halicarnassus in his honor the celebrated monument named from him the Mausoleum. A Greek statue of Mausolus from the Mausoleum (352 B. C.) is in the British Museum. It is admirable in its characterization of the somewhat rude type of the king. It was believed that this figure and the companion statue of Artemisia stood in the chariot on the summit of the monument, but this view is now considered erroneous.

Mauvaises Terres. See Bad Lands.

Mavia (mä-vé'ä). See Konde.

Maviti (mä-vé'té). See Zulu.

Mavrocordatos. See Maurocordatos.

Mawe (mä), John. Born in Derbyshire, 1764; died at London, Oct. 26, 1829. An English mineralogist. He traveled in South America 1805-11, sharing in Whitelock's campaign at Bucnos Ayres and subsequently visiting the gold and diamond regions of Brazil. He published "Mineralogy of Derbyshire" (1802), "Travels" (1812), "Diamonds and Precious Stones" (1813), etc.

Mawworm (mä'wërm). 1. A character in Middleton's play "A Mad World, my Masters." — 2. A noted character in Bickerstaffe's play "The Hypocrite," an attendant on Dr. Cantwell.

Max (mäks), Cornelius Gabriel. Born at Prague, Aug. 23, 1840. A German historical and genre painter. He is the son of Joseph Max, a sculptor, and was a pupil of Piloty at Munich. He was professor at the Academy of Munich 1879-83. Among his works are "The Anatomist" (1869), "The Last Token" (1874; now in the Metropolitan Museum, New York), "Nydia" (1874), "The Lion's Bride" (1879), etc.

Maxen (mäks'en). A village in Saxony, 10 miles south of Dresden. Here, Nov. 21, 1759, the Prussians (12,000-13,000) under Finck surrendered to the Austrians under Daun.

Maxentius, Circus of. See Circus of Romulus.

Maxentius (mak-sen'shius), Marcus Aurelius Valerius. Drowned in the Tiber, Oct., 312 A. D. Roman emperor 306-312, son of Maximianus Herculius. On the abdication of his father and Diocletian as Augusti and the promotion of the Caesars Constantius and Galerius in 305, he was passed over in the appointment of the new Caesars, the choice falling on Severus and Maximinus. In the following year, however, he had himself proclaimed Caesar by the pretorians at Rome, and with the assistance of his father, who resumed his former rank, he overthrew Severus, who had ruled in Italy and Africa. He next banished his father, and eventually declared war against Constantine (the Great), son of Constantius, who had assumed the administration of his father's provinces (Gaul, Spain, and Britain) on the latter's death in 303. He was totally defeated by Constantine at Saxa Rubra, Oct. 27, 312, and perished in the flight.

Maximes (mäk-sém'). [F. 'Maxims.'] A collection of moral maxims by La Rochefoucauld (1665).

Maximian. See Maximianus.

Maximianus (mak'sim-i-ä'nus), Marcus Aurelius Valerius, surnamed Herculius. Died in Feb., 310. Roman emperor 286-305 and 306-308. He was a Pannonian peasant by birth, rose to the highest offices in the army, and was made Caesar by Diocletian in 285 and Augustus in 286. (See Diocletian.) He resigned the imperial dignity simultaneously with Diocletian in 305, but reassumed it in 306 at the instance of his son Maxentius, who had caused himself to be proclaimed Caesar by the pretorians at Rome. He captured Severus (who commanded in Italy and Africa) in 307, but was himself expelled from Rome by Maxentius in 308, and eventually found refuge with his son-in-law Constantine at Arles. Having been twice discovered in conspiracy against his son-in-law, he was ordered to choose the manner of his death, and strangled himself.

Maximilian (mak-si-mil'i-an; G. pron. mäks-ém-lé-än) I. [ML. Maximilianus (= Mar[us] E[milianus]), F. Maximilien.] Born March 22, 1459; died at Wels, Upper Austria, Jan. 12, 1519. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1493-1519, son of Frederick III. He married Mary, daughter and heiress of Charles the Bold of Burgundy, in 1477, and was elected king of the Romans in 1486. He became emperor in 1493. In order to suppress the system of private war and restore the imperial authority, he proclaimed a perpetual public peace in 1495; established the imperial chamber (Reichskammergericht) in 1495, and the imperial public council (Reichshofrat) in 1501; and divided Germany into six, and afterward (1512) into ten, circles (Landfriedenskreise), over each of which was placed a captain with a force of standing troops for the punishment of disturbers of the peace. In 1499 he carried on an unsuccessful war against the Swiss Confederacy, which resulted in the practical independence of the latter. Through the influence of his second wife, Bianca Sforza, daughter of the Duke of Milan, whom he married in 1494, he became involved in a contest with France for the sovereignty of Milan and Naples. In 1508 he joined the League of Cambray against Venice. In 1513 he joined the Holy League against France; and in the same year assisted Henry VIII. of England in gaining the brilliant victory over the French at Ginegatte ("the battle of the spurs").

Maximilian II. Born at Vienna, Aug. 1, 1527; died Oct. 12, 1576. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1564-76, son of Ferdinand I. He succeeded his father in 1564 as emperor, archduke of Austria, and king of Hungary and Bohemia. At his accession to the imperial throne he found the empire at war with the Turks. He concluded a truce with Selim II. in 1563, each party retaining its possessions. He was of a mild and tolerant disposition, and left the Protestants undisturbed in the exercise of their religion.

Maximilian I. Born at Landsbut, Bavaria, April 17, 1573; died at Ingolstadt, Bavaria, Sept. 27, 1651. Duke of Bavaria. He was the chief instrument in organizing the Catholic League in opposition to the Protestant Union in 1609. As the head of the Catholic League, he assisted the emperor Ferdinand II. against the elector palatine Frederick V. in the Thirty Years' War (see Ferdinand II., Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire). In return for which he received in 1623 the electoral vote forfeited by Frederick, and in 1625 was invested with the Upper Palatinate.

Maximilian II. Maria Emanuel. Born July 11, 1662; died Feb. 26, 1726. Elector of Bavaria 1679-1726. He was allied with the French in the War of the Spanish Succession.

Maximilian I. Joseph. Born at Schwetzingen, Baden, May 27, 1756; died at the castle of Nymphenburg, near Munich, Oct. 13, 1825. King of Bavaria 1806-25. He became elector of Bavaria in 1799. In 1805 he sided with France against the allied powers, with the result that he acquired considerable territory at the peace of Presburg, Dec. 26, 1805. In accordance with the same treaty, he assumed the title of king in 1806.

Maximilian II. Joseph. Born Nov. 28, 1811; died at Munich, March 10, 1864. King of Bavaria 1848-64, son of Louis I. He was a liberal patron of art and literature.

Maximilian (Ferdinand Maximilian Joseph), Sp. Maximiliano (mäk-sé-mé-lé-ä'nó). Born at Vienna, July 6, 1832; shot at Querétaro, Mexico, June 19, 1867. Archduke of Austria, and emperor of Mexico from 1864. He was the second son of the Archduke Francis Charles, and brother of Francis Joseph who became emperor of Austria in 1848. Trained for the navy, he was placed at its head in 1854. On July 27, 1857, he married Princess Charlotte of Belgium (see Charlotte), and during the succeeding two years was viceroy of the Lombard-Venetian kingdom. After the French had conquered Mexico in part, an assembly of notables, called under French influence, and formed almost entirely of opponents of Juarez, adopted an imperial form of government for that country (July, 1863), and offered the throne to Maximilian. He formally accepted on April 10, 1864; reached Vera Cruz May 28, and Mexico June 12; and was received with great apparent enthusiasm. Aided by the French, his forces drove Juarez over the northern frontier, and on Oct. 3, 1865, he decreed that those taken in arms against the empire should be treated as bandits. This decree was loudly condemned, and did much to weaken the emperor's personal popularity. The United States government had refused to recognize his empire, and on its urgent demand (note of Feb. 12, 1866) the French troops were withdrawn, contrary to the express stipulation which Napoleon III. had made with Maximilian. The latter at first resolved to resign, but was induced to remain; took personal command of his army at Querétaro, Feb., 1867; was besieged by a republican army in March; and was forced to surrender May 15. Condemned to death by a court martial, he was refused mercy on the ground of his severe edict against the Juarists, and was shot with his generals Miramon and Mejia.

Maximilian Alexander Philipp, Prince of Neuwied. See Neuwied.

Maximilian Joseph. Born at Bamberg, Bavaria, Dec. 4, 1808; died at Munich, Nov. 15, 1888. Duke in Bavaria. He wrote "Wanderung nach dem Orient, etc." (1839), and a number of novels and dramas. He used the pseudonym Phantasus.

Maximin. See Maximinus.

Maximinus (mak-si-mi'nus), or Maximin (mak'si-min), Caius Julius Verus, surnamed Thrax ('the Thracian'). Killed near Aquileia, Italy, May, 238. Roman emperor 235-238. He was a Thracian of extraordinary size and strength, who was elevated by the soldiers on the Rhine on the murder of Alexander Severus. His cruelty and exactions caused a revolt under Gordianus in Africa. He was killed by his own soldiers.

Maximinus, or Maximin, Galerius Valerius. Born in Illyria; died at Tarsus, Asia Minor, 313. Roman emperor 308-313, nephew of Galerius. He became Caesar in 305, and Augustus in 308; was defeated by Licinius in 313; and perished in the flight.

Maximus (mak'si-mus), Saint. Born about 580; died in Lazica, Aug. 13, 662. An eastern theologian, noted as an opponent of the Monothelites.

Maximus. See Petronius Maximus and Papianus Maximus.

Maximus, Magnus. Born in Spain; executed at Aquileia, Italy, 388 A. D. Roman emperor 383-388. He headed an insurrection of the legions stationed in Britain in 383, and, crossing over into Gaul, defeated Gratian, who was killed in the flight. He was afterward recognized by Theodosius and Valentinian II. as Augustus in Gaul, Spain, and Britain. He conquered Italy from Valentinian in 387, but was defeated and put to death by Theodosius in 388.

Maximus, Valerius. See Valerius Maximus.

Maximus Tyrannus (ti-rän'us). Killed at Ravenna, Italy, 422. Roman emperor 409-411. He was elevated by the rebel Gerontius about 409, but was defeated and deposed by Constantine, emperor in Britain, Gaul, and Spain, in 411. He afterward raised an unsuccessful insurrection in Spain.

Max O'Rell. The pseudonym of Paul Blouet.

Maxwell (maks'wel), James. Born 1581; died about 1640. A Scottish literary man. He lived much on the Continent. Among his curious and bombastic works are "Carolanna, that is to say a poem in honour of our King Charles, etc.," "The Laudable Life and Deplorable Death of our late peerless Prince Henry," "The Golden Legend, or the Mirror of Religious Men and Godly Matrones," "Queen Elizabeth's Looking Glass of Grace and Glory," etc.

Maxwell, James Clerk. See Clerk-Maxwell.

Maxwell, William Hamilton. Born at Newry, County Down, Ireland, 1792; died at Musselburgh, near Edinburgh, Dec. 29, 1850. An Irish novelist. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1807, and in 1812 was made captain in an infantry regiment, and served in the Peninsular war and at Waterloo. He took holy orders and was made rector of Ballagh in Comemara. His best-known works are "O'Hara, or 1798," a novel (1825), "Sports of the West, etc." (1832), "Stories of Waterloo" (1834), and a "Life of the Duke of Wellington" (1839-41). He edited the military and naval almanac for 1840.

Maxwell, Sir William Stirling. See Stirling-Maxwell.

Maxyes (maks'i-ēz). [Gr. Mázveg.] In ancient geography, a Libyan tribe.

About the Mashush [of the Egyptian inscriptions] there is no dispute. They are the Maxyes of Herodotus (iv, 191), in the modern Tunisia, of whom we are told that they left a long lock of hair on the right side of the head and painted their bodies red. We learn from the Egyptian texts that while the Lebu were circumcised, the Mashush were not. The lock of hair which characterises them on the Egyptian monuments is also wanting in the case of the Lebu. But, like the Lebu, they have a good deal of hair on the face, the eyebrows are well defined, and the nose is straight and leptorhine. The forehead is high, the lips thin, and the jaws orthognathous.

May (mā). [From L. Maius, Majus (sc. mensis), the third month of the Roman year, usually associated with Maius or Maja (see Maius.)] The fifth month of the year, consisting of thirty-one days, reckoned on the continent of Europe and in America as the last month of spring, but in Great Britain commonly as the first of summer.

May, Thomas. Born 1595; died Nov. 13, 1650. An English poet and prose-writer. He graduated at Cambridge (Sidney Sussex College) in 1612, and entered Gray's Inn in 1615. He turned to the stage, and in 1620 produced "The Heir," a comedy. May published several plays, translations from the classics, a "Continuation of Lucan" (1630) in English and Latin, etc. He sided with the Parliament against the king in the civil war, and in 1647 published a "History of the Long Parliament" (his most important work).

May, Sir Thomas Erskine, Lord Farnborough. Born at London, Feb. 8, 1815; died at Westminster Palace, May 17, 1886. An English jurist. He was educated at Bedford Grammar School; was appointed in 1831 assistant librarian of the House of Commons; and was called to the bar in 1838. He published "A Practical Treatise on the Law, Privileges, Proceedings, and Usage of Parliament" (1844). After 1871 he was clerk of the House of Commons. In 1854 his "Rules, Orders, and Forms of Procedure of the House of Commons" was printed by order of Parliament. His other works are "The Constitutional History of England since the Accession of George III." (1861), "Democracy in Europe" (1877), etc. He was made Baron Farnborough in 1886.

Mayaguez (mi-ä-gwäth'). A seaport in Porto Rico, West Indies, situated in lat. 18° 14' N., long. 67° 12' W. Population, about 22,000.

Mayapan (mi-yä-pän'). A ruined city of Yucatan, situated in a plain 20 miles south of Merida. According to tradition it was founded by Maya Indians about 1150; was long their principal city and capital; and was destroyed or abandoned during civil wars about 1420. The remains include great quantities of sculptured stones, and several pyramids, one well preserved. Mayapan gave its name to a district.

Mayas (mi'äz or mi'yäz). A race of Indians inhabiting the peninsula of Yucatan, Mexico. At the time of the conquest they were divided into a number of tribes (Acalans, Tipuans, Cocames, Itzaecs, etc.), which were often at war with one another. Their principal cities were well built, in part of stone; they had written (hieroglyphic) records, and preserved legends of former greatness during a period when all Yucatan or Maya was governed by a single ruler, who lived at Mayapan. The Mayas were idolaters, but appear to have believed in a supreme deity whom they called Ilnab-ku. Crimes were severely punished. Several of the tribes resisted the Spaniards bravely, and some of those in the interior and south have never been entirely subdued. Descendants of the conquered Indians form the great bulk of the population of Yucatan, and the Maya language is still commonly used in country districts. Under some of their chiefs they rebelled (1847-53), and for a short time held possession of a great part of the peninsula. See Maya stock.

Maya (mi'ä or mi'yä) stock. A well-marked linguistic group of American Indians, in southeastern Mexico and Central America. It includes among others the Mayas of Yucatan, the Tzendals and Chinantecs of Chiapas, the Cakchiquels, Ixil, Mames, and Quiché of Guatemala, and the outlying Huastecs to the north of Vera Cruz. Traces of the stock are found in Honduras. Among American races the Mayas ranked with the Aztecs in advancement, and in many respects were their superiors. They excelled in sculptured building, in weaving (cotton), feather-work, etc.; they dwelt in populous cities (Chichen Itza, Peten, Uxmal, etc.), and had almost certainly built the older towns of Copan, Palenque, and others, which were in ruins when the Spaniards arrived. Many of their strongholds, especially in Guatemala, were chosen and fortified with great skill, and the Spaniards took them only after long sieges. Chiefdomship was generally hereditary; the laws were often complex and severe. The Maya calendar resembled that of the Nahuatl tribes, and there was also some resemblance in their complicated mythology. The Mayas, Quichés, Cakchiquels, and others had pictographic records painted on prepared bark or sculptured; a few of these have survived in translations, but the original pictographs have baffled modern research. The records and traditions appear to show that the Maya races were formerly united and very powerful; back of that they go vaguely to a remote period, possibly to the beginning of the Christian era, and speak of a migration from the north. Many writers believe that this connects them with the ancient Toltecs, said to have occupied the highlands of Mexico. Brasseur de Bourbourg and others have formed ingenious theories on Maya history, which have not been generally accepted.

Maybole (mä'böl). A town in Ayrshire, Scotland, 39 miles south-southwest of Glasgow. Population (1891), 5,467.

May-day (mä'dä). The first day of May: a day on which the opening of the season of flowers and fruit was formerly celebrated throughout Europe; it is still marked in some places by various festive observances. The chief features of the celebration in Great Britain (where, however, it has nearly disappeared) are the gathering of hawthorn-blossoms and other flowers, the crowning of the May-queen, dancing round the May-pole, etc.

May Day. A comedy by Chapman, acted in 1601, printed in 1611. It is thought to be founded on a play of the same name acted in 1595. A play also with the same name was produced in 1775, and attributed to Garrick.

Mayen (mi'en). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, situated on the Nette 17 miles west of Coblenz. Population (1890), 9,449.

Mayence. See Mainz.

Mayenne (mi-en' or mi-yen'). A river in northwestern France which unites near Angers with the Sarthe to form the Maine. Length, 127 miles; navigable from Laval.

Mayenne. 1. A department of northwestern France, capital Laval, formed from parts of the ancient Maine and Anjou. It is bounded by Manche and Orne on the north, Sarthe on the east, Maine-et-Loire on the south, and Ille-et-Vilaine on the west. It has important agricultural and mineral resources. Area, 1,996 square miles. Population (1891), 332,387.

2. A town in the department of Mayenne, France, on the Mayenne 17 miles north by east of Laval. It has flourishing cloth manufactures, and contains a castle and a church of Notre Dame. Formerly it was the seat of a marquise and duchy. Population (1891), 10,428.

Mayer (mä'er), Brantz. Born at Baltimore, Sept. 27, 1809; died there, Feb. 23, 1879. An American author. He was a lawyer; was editor of the "Baltimore American"; and in 1841-42 was secretary of the United States legation in Mexico. During the Civil War he was commissioned colonel in the Federal army. He published "Mexico: Aztec, Spanish, and Republican" (2 vols., 1853); several other works on Mexico; "Captain Canot," a novel (1854); etc.

Mayer (mi'er), Johann Tobias. Born at Marbach, Württemberg, Feb. 17, 1723; died at Göttingen, Feb. 20, 1762. A German astronomer, professor of mathematics at Göttingen. He wrote "Theoria Inne, etc." (1767), "Tabula motuum solis et lune" (revised edition, 1770).

Mayer, Julius Robert von. Born at Heilbronn, Württemberg, Nov. 25, 1814; died at Heilbronn, March 20, 1878. A German physician. He studied medicine at Tübingen, Munich, and Paris; and, after a journey to Java as ship's surgeon in 1840-41, settled as a surgeon at Heilbronn. He is by many regarded as the originator of the mechanical theory of heat. A collective edition of his works appeared in 1867 under the title of "Die Mechanik der Wärme."

Mayer, Karl. Born at Königsberg, Prussia, March 21, 1799; died at Dresden, July 2, 1862. A German pianist and composer.

Mayer, Karl Friedrich Hartmann. Born at Neekarbischhofheim, Baden, March 22, 1786; died at Tübingen, Württemberg, Feb. 25, 1870.

A German poet. His "Poems" were published in 1833 (later editions 1839, 1864). He also wrote "Ludwig Uhland, seine Freunde und Zeitgenossen" (1867), etc.

Mayes (mä'yēs). ['Dizziness.'] A tribe of North American Indians, formerly in northern Texas, near the coast. See Toukawan.

Mayeux (mä-yē'). One of the types of modern French caricature, very popular between 1830 and 1848. He is a compound of Panurge, Falstaff, and Polichinelle, deformed, sensual, patriotic, and witty. The creator of Mayeux was Charles Travies.

Mayfair (mä'fär). A fashionable locality in London, east of Hyde Park. All streets north of Piccadilly now lead into the district of Mayfair, which takes its name from a fair which used to be held in Shepherd's Market and its surrounding streets. (Hare.) The fair became an excuse for license and profligacy in the time of George II., and was abolished in 1708.

Mayflower (mä'flou'er). 1. A ship of about 180 tons burden, in which the English Pilgrims sailed from Southampton to Plymouth, Massachusetts, in 1620. Some of them had left Leyden for Delfshaven and embarked there in the Speedwell some weeks before, joining the others at Southampton.

2. An American wooden center-board sloop yacht, designed by Edward Burgess, launched May 6, 1886. The dimensions are: length over all, 100 feet; length, load water-line, 85.7; beam, 23.6; beam, load water-line, 22.3; draught, 10 feet; displacement, 128 tons.

She was selected to defend America's cup against the Galatea in 1886, on Sept. 7 and 9, and won both races.

Mayhew (mä'hü), Experience. Born in Martha's Vineyard, Mass., Jan. 27, 1673; died there, Nov. 29, 1758. An American missionary to the Indians in Martha's Vineyard.

Mayhew, Henry. Born at London, Nov. 25, 1812; died July 25, 1887. An English journalist and writer of juveniles and miscellaneous works. With his brothers Augustus and Horace ("The Brothers Mayhew") he wrote a number of popular works of fiction. He was one of the originators and first editor of "Punch." His chief work is "London Labour and the London Poor" (1851).

Mayhew, Jonathan. Born in Martha's Vineyard, Mass., Oct. 8, 1720; died at Boston, July 9, 1766. An American clergyman, controversialist, and advocate of liberalism, son of Experience Mayhew. His writings were edited by A. Bradford (1838).

Maykop. See Maikop.

May Laws. A series of Prussian laws passed 1873-74, and modified in 1887, regulating ecclesiastical matters. They restricted the power of the church over individuals and property. So named because first promulgated in May, 1873; also called Falk Laws, from the name of the minister who furthered them.

Maynard (mä'närd), Horace. Born at Westboro, Mass., Aug. 30, 1814; died at Knoxville, Tenn., May 3, 1882. An American politician. He was congressman from Tennessee; United States minister to Turkey 1875-80; and postmaster-general 1880-81.

Maynas (mi'näs). Various Indian hordes of northern Peru and Ecuador, in the forests of the upper Marañon and on the Pastaza and Morona affluents. They are very savage, lead a wandering life, and subsist by hunting and fishing. A few have, from time to time, been gathered into the mission villages. The different bands have distinct names (Chapos, Coronados, Ilumuranos, etc.). All speak harsh and difficult languages. Brinton and others have united them in a single linguistic stock, the Mayna. Hervas believed that they constituted two stocks, which he called the Mayna and Chayavita. Also written Mainas.

Maynas y Quijos (mi'näs ē kē'hōs). A colonial intendencia of Peru, subsequently a department. It corresponded to the present departments of Amazonas and Loreto, together with a region north of the Amazon which is now (1894) claimed both by Ecuador and by Peru.

Maynooth (mä-nöth'). A town in the county of Kildare, Ireland, 14 miles west by north of Dublin. It is the seat of a Roman Catholic college for the training of priests, founded 1795. A parliamentary grant to this college was the subject of keen discussion in 1845. The increase and perpetuation of it were eventually carried.

Mayo (mi'ō). [Pl. also Mayos. Probably from the Otomi mayo, shepherd, or the Opata mayot, deer.] A division of the Cahita branch of the Piman stock of North American Indians, inhabiting the valleys of the lower Mayo and the Fuerte in southern Sonora and northwestern Sinaloa, Mexico. They are peaceable and have been almost completely Mexicanized. Their dialect closely resembles that of the Yaqui. The Mayos were easily brought to submission in the later years of the 16th century, and adopted the Catholic faith without resistance. Their original number is said to have been about 30,000. Their present number is about 6,500. See Cahita.

Mayo (mä'ō). A county in Connaught, Ireland, bounded by the Atlantic on the west and north, Sligo and Rosecommon on the east, and Galway on the south. It is mountainous in the west. Area, 2,126 square miles. Population (1891), 219,034.

Mayobanex (mi-ō-bä-näks'). Died 1498 or 1499. An Indian cacique of the eastern part of the island of Haiti. In 1498 he joined with Guarionex in war on the Spaniards, and was captured and executed. Also written Maobanex.

Mayorga (mi-ör'gä), Martin de. Born in Catalonia about 1715; died at sea, 1783. A Spanish general and administrator. He was captain-general of Guatemala June, 1773-April, 1779, during which period old Guatemala was destroyed by an earthquake (July 29, 1773) and the new city was founded. From Aug. 23, 1779, to April 29, 1783, he was viceroy of Mexico. He died while returning to Spain, and it was suspected that he was poisoned.

Mayor of Garratt, The. A play by Foote, produced in 1763. See Garratt.

Mayor of Quinborough, The. A comedy by Middleton, printed in 1661. It was probably written or sketched before 1602, and owed its publication after the Restoration to the caricature of a Puritan.

Mayorunas (mä-yō-rō'näs). [Quichua, 'rivermen.'] An Indian horde of northeastern Peru and the adjacent parts of Brazil, south of the Amazon, and in the forests about the rivers Javary, Ucayale, and Tapiéhi. They are very savage, subsist mainly by hunting, use poisoned arrows, and have frequently attacked explorers. They have been accused of cannibalism, but this is unproved. The men are said to have beards, and perhaps for this reason there are traditions that they are descended from early Spanish explorers. Their language has been referred to the Pano stock, and they appear to be closely related to the semi-civilized Maranas.

Mayotte (mä-yot'), or Mayotta (mä-yot'tä). A small island of the Comores group, in the Mozambique Channel, east of Africa, situated in lat. 12° 47' S., long. 45° 20' E. It has been a French possession since 1843.

Maypu. See Maipo.

Maypures (mä-pö-räs'). An Indian tribe of Venezuelan Guiana, on the upper Orinoco and its affluent, the Ventuario. They belong to the Arawak stock, are gentle in disposition, agriculturists, and live in fixed villages. The tribe was formerly very large. It was among the first on the upper Orinoco to be gathered into mission villages. Some of the Maypures have been amalgamated with the country population; others live in a semi-independent state in the interior. Also written Mapures and Mapures.

Maypure (mä-pö-rä') stock, or Arawak (är'ä-wäk) stock. An extensive linguistic group of South American Indians, consisting of many tribes which are scattered from southwestern Brazil and Bolivia to Guiana; formerly members of the same stock appear to have occupied nearly all the West Indian Islands. They were found by Columbus on the Bahamas and in the Greater Antilles, and possibly extended into Florida; but they had recently been driven from the Windward Islands by incursions of Caribs. All the Indians of this stock are well formed, with small hands and feet, light-colored and olive rather than reddish in complexion, and generally intelligent and industrious. They live in fixed villages of large size, cultivate manioc, maize, etc., and are of a pacific disposition. They readily received the whites as friends, and have never rebelled against them unless driven to do so by great oppression. The stock includes at present, among others, the Arawaks, Tarumas, and Guianas of Guiana; the Guanas, Bares, Manaos, Passes, and Juris of Brazil; the Banres and Mojos of Bolivia; and the Campas and Piros of Peru.

May Queen, The. 1. A cantata by W. Sterndale Bennett, produced in 1858. The words are by Chorley. — 2. A poem by Tennyson, published in 1832.

Mayr (mür), or Mayer (mä'er), Johann Simon. Born at Mendorf, Bavaria, June 14, 1763; died at Bergamo, Italy, Dec. 2, 1845. A German operatic composer. Donizetti was one of his pupils at the musical institute at Bergamo, and he is said to have been the first to introduce the crescendo of the orchestra to which Rossini owes much of his fame. (Grove.) Among his operas are "Saffo," "Lodoiska," "Ginevra di Scozia," "Lauso e Lidia," "Medea," "Rosa bianca e Rosa rossa," etc.

Maysville (mäz'vil). A city, capital of Mason County, Kentucky, situated on the Ohio 52 miles southeast of Cincinnati. It has an important trade in hemp. Population (1890), 5,358.

Mayta Ccapac (mä'tä kä'päc). Died about 1300 (according to Acosta in 1255, and by other accounts about 1211). The fourth Inca ruler of Peru. He was the son and successor of Lloque Yupanqui, and made few conquests.

Mazaca (maz'ä-kä). The ancient name of Caesarea (in Cappadocia).

Mazade (mä-zäd'), Louis Charles Jean Robert de. Born at Castel-Sarrasin, Tarn-et-Garonne, in 1820; died at Paris, April 27, 1893. A French author, editor, and critic, member of the Academy 1882. Among his works are "La guerre de France 1870-71," "M. Thiers: cinquante années d'histoire contemporaine," "L'Espagne moderne," "L'Italie moderne," "Lamartine, sa vie littéraire et politique," etc. He edited the "Correspondance du Maréchal Davout."

Mazandaran (mä-zen-de-rän'). A province of Persia, south of the Caspian Sea, mostly low coast-land, about 200 miles long and 50 broad. Capital, Sari. Population, 300,000.

Mazariegos (mä-thä-ré-ä-gös'), Diego. Born at Ciudad de la Mancha about 1495; died after 1565. A Spanish soldier, conqueror of Chiapas (1524-1529). He was governor of Cuba 1556-65.

Mazarin (maz'ä-rin; F. pron. mä-zä-rän') (properly Mazarini), Jules. Born at Piscina, Italy, July 14, 1602; died at Vincennes, France, March 9, 1661. A French statesman. He was descended from a noble Sicilian family, studied at a Jesuit college at Rome and at the University of Alcalá, and in 1622 entered the papal military service. He was afterward employed in various diplomatic missions, and attracted the attention of Richelieu, at whose instance he entered the French service. He became a naturalized Frenchman in 1633, and in 1641 was made a cardinal by the Pope on the presentation of Louis XIII., although he had never taken anything but minor orders. He was appointed prime minister on the death of Richelieu in 1642, and was retained in office by the queen regent, Anne of Austria, after the death of Louis XIII. in 1643. He continued the foreign policy of Richelieu, which looked to the abatement of the power of the house of Austria by interfering in favor of the Protestants in the Thirty Years' War, and which resulted in complete success at the peace of Westphalia in 1648. At home his policy of centralizing all administrative authority in the crown — also a legacy from Richelieu — was opposed by the nobles and the Parliament of Paris, and gave rise to the wars of the Fronde (which see), during which he was twice expelled by his opponents from the court (1651-52 and 1652-53). In 1659 he concluded the peace of the Pyrenees, putting an end to the hostilities with Spain which had sprung up during the Thirty Years' War, and securing an increase of French territory.

Mazarin Bible. An edition of the Bible printed by Gutenberg at Mainz in 1450-55, being the first book ever printed with movable types. It is so named because the first known copy of it was discovered in the Mazarin library at Paris in 1760.

Mazarron (mä-thär-rön'). A town in the province of Murcia, Spain, situated near the Mediterranean 30 miles south of Murcia. Population (1887), 16,445.

Mazaruni (mä-zä-rö'nē), or Massaruni (mä-sä-rö'nē). A river in British Guiana which joins the Essequibo about 45 miles southwest of Georgetown. Length, about 400 miles.

Mazas (mä-zä'). A prison in Paris, situated on the Boulevard Mazas, opened in 1850. It is officially called Maison d'Arrêt Cellulaire, having renounced in 1858, at the request of the family of Mazas, the name it had hitherto borne. It is still, however, popularly called the Prison Mazas.

Mazatenango (mä-thä-tän-nän'gö). A town of southwestern Guatemala, the capital of the modern department of Suchitepequez, about lat. 14° 45' N., long. 91° 30' W. It was a stronghold of the Mames Indians, and was taken by the Spaniards in 1525. Population, about 5,000.

Mazatlan (mä-sät-län'). [Nahuatl, 'place of the deer'; from mazatl, a deer.] A town of about 12,000 inhabitants, on the southern coast of the Mexican state of Sinaloa, in lat. 23° 10' 37" N. The town has been besieged a number of times in the course of the numerous revolutions of Mexico. In 1847 it was taken by the American forces. On March 31, 1864, the French corvette Cordelière attacked the port and was repulsed, but on Nov. 13 of the same year a French fleet captured it after a short bombardment. On Nov. 13, 1866, the Mexican general Corona took the place again. It is the capital of the district of the same name, and the principal port of entry for the state of Sinaloa.

Maze (mäz), Hippolyte. Born at Arras, Nov. 5, 1829; died at Paris, Oct. 25, 1891. A French statesman and historian. He was elected deputy for Versailles in 1879, and took his seat with the republican left, and was reelected in 1881. He was noted for his speeches on public education and mutual benefit associations. He was elected senator in 1886, and again in 1891 at the head of the list of four. Among his works are "Les gouvernements de la France du XVII^e au XIX^e siècle" (1864), "La république des Etats Unis, etc." (1869), "La fin de la révolution, etc." (1872), "La lutte contre la misère" (1883), "Les généraux de la république" (1889), etc.

Mazeppa (mä-zep'ä), Ivan. Born 1644; died at Bender, 1709. A Cossack chief. He was descended from a poor but noble family at Mazepintzui in the palatinate of Podolia, and was educated as a page at the court of John Casimir, king of Poland. Having been detected in an intrigue with a Polish lady of high rank, he was by order of the injured husband bound naked on the back of an untamed horse from the Ukraine. The horse on being let loose galloped off to its native haunts, where it was caught by some Cossack peasants. Mazeppa remained among the Cossacks, whose hetman or chief he became in 1687. He enjoyed the favor of Peter the Great, who gave him the title of Prince of the Ukraine. With a view to making himself independent of Russia, he conspired first with Stanislaus Leszczyński of Poland, and afterward with Charles XII. of Sweden. Besieged by the Russians in his capital Buturin, he escaped to the camp of Charles XII., whom he accompanied to Bender after the battle of Poltava. He committed suicide by taking poison. Lord Byron made him the subject of a poem in 1819.

Mazères. See Mazères.

Mazillier. Born at Marseilles in 1797; died at Paris in 1868. A noted French dancer and composer of ballets. He began his career at Bordeaux in 1820. His pantomime was noted as particularly good. Among his ballets (in which he performed at the Opéra in Paris) are "Le diable amoureux" (1815), "Le diable à quatre" (1816), "Le corsaire" (1850), "Marco Spada" (1857), etc. In these he had the collaboration of Paul Foucher, St.-Georges, Théophile Gautier, and others.

Mazuranić (mä-zhö-rä'nich'), Ivan. Born 1813. A Croatian poet and politician, ban of Croatia 1873-80. His chief work is an epic national poem, Mazzara, or Mazzara del Vallo (mä-t-sä'ra del väl'lä). A seaport in the province of Trapani, Sicily, 53 miles southwest of Palermo. It has a cathedral and ruined castle. Population (1881), 13,074.

Mazzarino (mä-t-sä-rē'nō). A town in the province of Caltanissetta, Sicily, 47 miles west-southwest of Catania. Population (1881), 12,964.

Mazzini (mä-t-sä'nē), Giuseppe. Born at Genoa, June 28 (22 ?), 1805 (1808 ?); died at Pisa, Italy, March 10, 1872. An Italian patriot and revolutionist. He graduated at the University of Genoa in 1826, became a member of the bar of that city, and joined the Carbonari. In 1830 he was arrested by the authorities of Piedmont on the charge of conspiring against the government, but after an imprisonment of six months was released for want of sufficient evidence to procure a conviction. He thereupon left Italy and resided successively at Marseilles, Paris, and London, whence he conducted agitations for the liberation of Italy. He founded about 1832 the secret revolutionary society of "Young Italy," whose object was the unification of Italy under a republican government. He returned to Italy at the outbreak of the revolutionary movements of 1848, and in 1849 became a member of the triumvirate in the short-lived republic at Rome, being again driven into exile on the restoration of the papal government (1849). He afterward organized insurrections in Mantua (1852), Milan (1853), and Genoa (1857), but played a subordinate part in the movement which resulted in the unification of Italy (except Venice and the Patrimonium Petri) under Victor Emmanuel in 1861. Unwilling to take the oath of allegiance to a monarchy, he remained abroad. In 1870 he took part in an insurrection at Palermo, during which he was captured. He was, however, released by the general amnesty published by the Italian government after the occupation of Rome.

Mazzola. See Parmigiano.

Mazzolini (mä-t-sö-lē'nē), Lodovico. Born about 1481; died about 1530. An Italian painter, the most noted member of the school of Ferrara.

Mecklenburg (mek'len-bōrg) Declaration of Independence. A declaration of independence of England, said to have been made at Charlotte, North Carolina, by the citizens of Mecklenburg County, North Carolina, May 20 or 31, 1775.

Mecklenburg-Schwerin (mek'len-bōrg-sivā-rēn'). A grand duchy, a state of the German Empire. Capital, Schwerin. It is bounded by the Baltic on the north, Pomerania and Mecklenburg-Strelitz on the east, Brandenburg and Hannover on the south, and Lubeck, Ratzburg, and Schleswig-Holstein on the west. It comprises also a few enclaves. The surface is generally level. The chief occupation is agriculture. The government is constitutional hereditary monarchy (peasantry unrepresented), with 2 members in the Bundesrat and 6 members in the Reichstag. The prevailing religion is Protestant. Mecklenburg was early peopled by Slavs; was conquered by the Germans in 1169; and was made a duchy in 1348. The region was variously divided, finally into Mecklenburg-Schwerin and Mecklenburg-Strelitz in 1701. Mecklenburg-Schwerin joined the Confederation of the Rhine in 1807; became a grand duchy in 1815; joined the German Confederation in 1815; abolished serfdom in 1820; was the scene of an unsuccessful agitation to change the feudal conditions in 1848; sided with Prussia in 1866; and joined the North German Confederation in 1867, and the new German Empire in 1871. Area, 5,135 square miles. Population (1890), 578,342.

Mecklenburg-Strelitz (mek'len-bōrg-strā'lits). A grand duchy, one of the states of the German Empire. Capital, Neustrelitz. It comprises two divisions; Stargard, lying east of Mecklenburg-Schwerin and northwest of Braunsberg; and Ratzburg, lying northwest of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. The surface is nearly level. The chief occupation is agriculture. The government is a constitutional hereditary monarchy (general conditions as in Mecklenburg-Schwerin), with 1 member in the Bundesrat and 1 in the Reichstag. The prevailing religion is Protestant. It became a separate duchy in 1701, and adopted the constitution of Mecklenburg-Schwerin in 1755. Its later history is generally the same as that of Mecklenburg-Schwerin. Area, 1,131 square miles. Population (1890), 97,973.

Medal, The. A satire by Dryden, which appeared in 1682.

Medamothi (mē-dā-mō-tō'). An island in Rabelais's "Life of Gargantua and Pantagruel." "Thus, the first place touched at (chsp. iv.) is the island of Medamothi (μεδάμοθι, Nowhere); and in the account of the rarities with which this country abounds, the improbable fictions of travellers are ridiculed." Dunlop, Hist. Prose Fiction, II. 305.

Meddle (med'dl). In Dion Boucicault's comedy "London Assurance," a pettifogging lawyer.

Medea (mē-dē'ā). [Gr. Mēdeia.] In Greek legend, a sorceress, daughter of Æetes, king of the Colchians, and wife of Jason. When Jason came with the Argonauts (see Jason) to obtain the Golden Fleece, Medea aided him by her magic arts, and escaped with him to Corinth, where, ten years later, she murdered Creusa or Glauce, daughter of King Creon, for whom Jason had determined to abandon her. From Corinth she fled to Athens, and married Ægeus (father of Theseus), by whom she had a son, Medus, regarded by the Greeks as the ancestor of the Medes. Having plotted against the life of Theseus, she was obliged to flee, and finally returned to Colchis.

Medea. 1. A play by Euripides. See the extract.

The "Medea" came out in 431 B. C. along with the poet's "Philoctetes," "Dietyes," and the satyric "Reapers" (the last was early lost). It was based upon a play of Neoplonon, and only obtained the third prize, Euphorion being first and Sophocles second. It may accordingly be regarded as a failure in its day—an opinion apparently confirmed by the faults (viz., Ægeus and the winged chariot) selected from it as specimens in Aristotle's "Poetic." There is considerable evidence of there being a second edition of the play, and many of the variants, or so-called interpolations, seem to arise from both versions being preserved and confused. Nevertheless, there was no play of Euripides more praised and imitated by both Romans and moderns.

Mahafly, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 329.

2. A tragedy by Seneca, written in the 1st century. It was inspired by Euripides, but is not a slavish translation. John Studley translated this for the English stage (1566).

3. A tragedy by Richard Glover, published in 1761.—4. An opera by Mayr, produced in 1812.—5. See Médée.

Médecin malgré lui (mād-saŋ' māl-grā' lüü), Le. [F., 'The Doctor in Spite of Himself.'] A farce-comedy by Molière, produced in 1666. The story is taken from a fabliau of the middle ages, "Le vilain mire." (See Sganarelle.) Gounod wrote music for an adaptation of this comedy, and it was produced in 1858 in Paris. It was brought out as "The Mock Doctor" in England in 1865. Mrs. Centlivre's "Love's Contrivance" (1703) is made from "Le médecin malgré lui" and "Le mariage forcé."

Médecin Volant (mād-saŋ' vō-lou'), Le. [F., 'The Flying Doctor.'] An early comedy of Molière, in the Italian style, acted in 1659. Parts of it were afterward incorporated in "Le médecin malgré lui" and "L'Amour médecin."

Médée (mā-dā'). 1. A tragedy by La Pèruse, played in 1553. It was the second tragedy played in France.—2. A tragedy by Pierre Corneille, played in 1635: "incomparably the best French tragedy up to its date" (Saintsby).—3. A lyric tragedy by Thomas Corneille, with music by Charpentier, produced in 1693.—4. An opera by Cherubini, produced in 1797. The words are by Hoffman.—5. A tragedy by Legouvé, played in 1855.

Medellin (mā-del-yēn'). A small town in the province of Badajoz, Spain, situated on the Guadiana 53 miles east of Badajoz. It was the birthplace of Cortés. Here, March 28, 1809, the French under Victor defeated the Spaniards.

Medellin. The capital of the department of Antioquia, Colombia, about 40 miles southeast of Antioquia. Population, about 40,000.

Medelpad (mā'del-pād). A territory in the laen (province) of Westernorland, Sweden.

Medes (mēdz). [Gr. Mēdoi.] The inhabitants of Media. See the extract, and Media.

Madai are the Medes, the Madā of the Assyrians. We first hear of them in the cuneiform records under the name of Amadā, about B. C. 840, when their country was invaded by the Assyrian monarch. They were at that time settled in the Kurdish Mountains, considerably to the east of Lake Urmieh. Some fifty years later, however, we find them in Media Rhagiana, where they are called no longer Amadā but Madā. It was from the latter form of the name that the Greeks took the familiar "Mede." The Medes proper were an Aryan people who claimed relationship to the Aryans of northern India and the Aryan populations of Europe, and one of the tribes belonging to them was that of the Persians, who had established themselves further south, on the eastern shores of the Persian Gulf. But in classical times the older inhabitants of the regions into which the Medes migrated were classed along with them under the general title of "Medes," so that the name ceased to be distinctive of race. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 45.

Medford (med'fōrd). A town in Middlesex County, Massachusetts, situated on Mystic River 5 miles northwest of Boston: the seat of Tufts College (Universalist). Population (1890), 11,079.

Medhurst (med'hērst), Walter Henry. Born at London, 1796; died at London, Jan. 24, 1857. An English missionary in China and the East Indies, and Sinologist. He translated the Bible into Chinese; edited the "Chinese Repository" (1838-51); and published "A Chinese-English Dictionary" (1842-43), "An English-Chinese Dictionary" (1847-48), "China: its State and Prospects" (1833), etc.

Media (mē'di-ā). [Gr. Mēdiā.] An ancient country comprising the northwest of the Iranian highland, extending from the Caspian Sea to the Araxes. It was bounded on the northeast by Hyrcania, on the east by Parthia, on the south by Susiana, Persia, and nearby corresponded to the modern Persian provinces Azerbaijan, Ardilan, and Irak-Ajemi. Later the southeastern part of the country was called Great Media, and the northwestern, or Atropatene, Little Media. The Medes (Hebrew and Assyrian Madai, Old Persian Mada) are enumerated in Genesis x. 2 as among the descendants of Japhet; and they, together with the Persians, constituted the most important and powerful Aryan population in western Asia. It is assumed that the country was originally settled by another (perhaps Turanian) tribe, and that the Medes gradually advanced from the northeast to the west and southwest. Media came into contact with Assyria at least as early as Ramanniriri III. (811-782 B. C.), who mentions Media as a conquered and tributary land. Tiglath-Pileser III. was the first Assyrian king who annexed Median territory; and Sargon transplanted Israelitish war captives to Median cities, and claims in his annals of 713 B. C. to have received tribute from 45 Median chiefs. Sennacherib also received tribute from the Medes. Under Esarhaddon the Medes entered into alliance with the Mineans (see Armenia) and the Cimmerians against Assyria, apparently without success. But from that time the Medes grew more united and more powerful against tyrannical Assyria. The Median kings of this period are, according to Herodotus, Deioees (about 700-647), Phraortes (647-625), and Cyaxares (625-585). The first Median expedition against Assyria was undertaken by Phraortes, and, according to Herodotus, ended with the complete defeat of the Medes and the death of Phraortes. Cyaxares repeated the undertaking, and defeated the Assyrian army. The attack on the Assyrian capital, Nineveh, was delayed for a while in consequence of the invasion of the Scythians. After these were driven out, the Medes, in alliance with the Babylonians under Nabopolassar, advanced once more against Nineveh, and brought about its downfall (608 or 606 B. C.). In the division of the Assyrian empire, Assyria proper and Mesopotamia as far as Haran fell to Media, which, however, could not develop into a world's empire on account of the rise of the new Babylonian empire under Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar. Even the independence of Media was of but short duration, for Astyages (585-549) lost in 549 his crown to Cyrus. After that the fate of Media was bound up in that of Persia. Still it seems to have preserved a kind of independence or particularism while united to Persia. Thus, the Old Testament writings speak of an empire of "the Persians and Medes." Only the Book of Daniel seems to assume the existence of a Median empire between the last Babylonian king, Nabonidus (Belshazzar), and Cyrus. After the destruction of the Persian empire, Media fell, in the division of Alexander's empire, to Seleucus, the founder of the Syrian monarchy, and later to the Parthian empire. Since the Mohammedan conquest, the name of Media has given place to that of Irak (Arjaka), also Irak-Ajemi (Persian) to distinguish it from the Arabic or Babylonian Irak. The old Medes were, according to the classical writers, a warlike people: in Isa. xiii. they are described as hard and cruel. The religion of the Medes was, according to Strabo (XV. 7, 32), the same as that of the Persians, i. e. dualism. They worshiped, besides the sun-god Mithoras, the moon, Venus, fire, the earth, winds, and water. The oldest capital of Media was Rhage, on the site of modern Teheran. Deioees moved the capital to Ecbatana, founded by himself, in the western part of the country, which remained the summer residence of the Persian and Parthian kings. To Media belonged also Behistun (Baghastana, 'place of the gods'), which became famous through the great trilingual cuneiform inscription discovered there.

Median Wall (mē'di-an wāl). [L. Mediæ murus.] In ancient history, a wall north of Babylon, extending from the Tigris to the Euphrates, built as a defense of Babylonia.

Mediasch (mā'dē-āsh). A town in the county of Nagy-Küküllő, Transylvania, situated on the river Nagy-Küküllő 26 miles north-northeast of Hermannstadt. It has a trade in wine. Population (1890), 6,766.

Medicean Stars (med-i-sē'an stārz). The name given by Galilee, in honor of the Medici, to the satellites of Jupiter discovered by him.

Medici (med'ē-chē or mā'dē-chē). [It., 'physicians'.] An Italian family which formerly ruled in Florence and Tuscany, celebrated for the number of statesmen which it produced, and for its patronage of art and letters. Its origin is uncertain. The first member of the family to play a part in history was Silvestro de' Medici, who took part in the revolt of the Ciampi in 1378. Giovanni de' Medici (died 1429) amassed a large fortune as a banker, and became the founder of the political greatness of the family. He ruled the city by means of his wealth, without holding office. He left two sons Cosmo (1389-1464) and Lorenzo (1395-1440), each of whom became the founder of a branch line of the family. The elder branch, descended from Cosmo, ruled in Florence until its extinction in 1537, except during two periods when it was in exile (1494-1512 and 1527-1530). Its rule was exercised under the forms of republican institutions down to about 1531, when Alessandro de' Medici was made hereditary duke of Florence by the emperor. Among the notable members of this branch were Cosmo the Elder, Lorenzo the Magnificent, and the popes Leo X. and Clement VII. The elder branch became extinct at the death of Alessandro in 1537. He was succeeded as duke of Florence by Cosmo I., who represented the younger branch of the family, descended from Lorenzo. Cosmo I. obtained possession of Siena and its territories, and in 1569 received the title of grand duke of Tuscany from the Pope, although the imperial confirmation was first received by his successor Francesco I. in 1575. The younger branch ruled as grand dukes of Tuscany until its extinction at the death of Giovan Gastone de' Medici in 1737.

Medici, Alessandro de'. Assassinated Jan. 5, 1537. First duke of Florence, illegitimate son of Lorenzo (1492-1519). In 1523 the head of the Medici at Florence, Cardinal Giulio, became pope under the title of Clement VII. He appointed his nephews Alessandro and Ippolito joint rulers of Florence in his place under the regency of Cardinal Silvio Passerini. In 1527 the populace expelled both Alessandro and Ippolito; but in 1531 the former, who had married Margaret of Austria, natural daughter of the emperor Charles V., was restored by his father-in-law and made hereditary duke of Florence, the Medici having till that time exercised power under the forms of republican institutions.

Medici, Catharine de'. See Catharine de' Medici.

Medici, Cosmo or Cosimo de', surnamed "The Elder." Born 1389; died Aug. 1, 1464. A Florentine banker, statesman, and patron of literature, son of Giovanni de' Medici (died 1429). He inherited his father's vast fortune, and, like him, practically ruled the republic through his skill in securing the elevation of his own creatures to the chief offices in the commonwealth. He was expelled with his whole family by the rival family of the Albizzi in 1433, but returned in 1434. He was a magnificent patron of art and literature, and his palace became an asylum for Greek scholars exiled by the fall of Constantinople in 1453.

Medici, Cosmo or Cosimo de', called "The Great." Born 1519; died 1574. Grand Duke of Tuscany, son of Giovanni de' Medici (1498-1526). He represented the younger branch of the Medici, descended from Lorenzo de' Medici (1395-1440), and became duke of Florence on the extinction of the elder branch in 1537. He conquered Siena in 1555, and had the title of grand duke of Tuscany conferred on him by the Pope in 1569. See Medici.

Medici, Ferdinand I. de'. Born about 1549; died 1609. Grand Duke of Tuscany 1587-1609, younger son of Cosmo the Great. He succeeded his brother Francesco I.

Medici, Francesco I. de'. Born 1541; died 1587. Grand Duke of Tuscany 1574-87, son of Cosmo the Great whom he succeeded.

Medici, Giovanni de'. Died 1429. A Florentine merchant. He amassed an immense fortune, and by his adroitness in procuring the elevation of his creatures to the chief offices became virtual ruler of the republic. He left two sons Cosmo (1389-1464) and Lorenzo (1395-1440), who became the founders of the elder and younger branches of the Medici respectively.

Medici, Giovanni de'. See Leo X.

Medici, Giovanni de', called "Giovanni delle Bande Nere." Born 1498; killed in battle, 1526.

An Italian general. He was a descendant of Lorenzo de' Medici (1395-1440), founder of the younger branch of the Medici.

Medici, Giulio de'. See Clement VII.

Medici, Ippolito de'. Born 1511; died 1535. An Italian cardinal, grandson (illegitimate) of Lorenzo the Magnificent.

Medici, Lorenzo de', surnamed "Il Magnifico" ('the Magnificent'). Born about 1449; died April 8, 1492. A celebrated Florentine statesman and patron of letters, grandson of Cosmo the Elder. On the death of his father Piero in 1469, he succeeded to the immense wealth and political power of his family jointly with a younger brother Giuliano. The latter was assassinated by a rival family, the Pazzi, in 1478, leaving Lorenzo sole ruler of Florence. Like his predecessors, he governed the republic without any title, merely by a free use of his wealth and by his adroitness in procuring the elevation of his own creatures to the chief offices in the state.

Medici, Lorenzo de'. Born 1492; died 1519. Duke of Urbino, grandson of Lorenzo de' Medici (the Magnificent). He became the head of the republic of Florence on the elevation of his uncle to the papal chair under the title of Leo X. in 1513, and in 1516 was appointed by the latter duke of Urbino.

Medici, Maria de'. See Maria de' Medici.

Medicine Bow Mountains. A chain of the Rocky Mountains, in northern Colorado and southern Wyoming.

Medill (me-dil'), Joseph. Born at St. John, New Brunswick, April 6, 1823. An American journalist. He was admitted to the bar in 1846, but abandoned law and took up journalism about 1849. In 1855 he became connected with the Chicago "Tribune," of which he obtained control in 1874.

Medina (me-dē'nā), Ar. Medinat-Rasul-Allah (me-dē'nāt-ris-sūl-'al'lā), or Medinat-el-Rabi (me-dē'nāt-el-rā'bē). A city in Hedjaz, Arabia, the second holy city of the Mohammedans, situated about lat. 24° 30' N., long. 40° E.; the ancient Yathrib, called by Ptolemy Lathrippa. It is celebrated as the place where Mohammed took refuge at the flight (622 A. D.) (see Hedjaz), and where he died and was buried. From this it is sometimes designated "the city of the prophet." The Great Mosque contains Mohammed's tomb. The inclosure measures about 500 by 300 feet, and as usual is surrounded by arcaded galleries. The tomb is in an inclosure in the southeastern corner, beneath a conspicuous pointed dome; the pavement of this part of the mosque is formed of beautiful mosaics. The tomb consists of a structure of black stones, with two pillars: it is wholly concealed from the eyes of the profane by precious draperies. The actual buildings of the mosque are at least in large part very modern, the arches, though of pointed horseshoe-form, not being extradosed, while the columns are pseudo-classical. Medina was the capital of the Mohammedan empire down to the accession of the Omniads (661). Population, estimated, 16,000.

Medina (mē-di'nā). In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," the second of the three sisters Elissa, Medina, and Perissa. She far excelled the other two, representing the golden mean, while Elissa was froward and always discontented, and Perissa was loose and extravagant, and indulgent in all pleasures.

Medina (mā-dē'nā), Sir John Baptist. Born at Brussels in 1659; died at Edinburgh, Oct. 5, 1710. A Belgian-English portrait-painter, pupil of François Du Châtel of Brussels. He went to London in 1686, and to Edinburgh in 1688. He was knighted in 1707.

Medina (mā-thē'nā), José Maria. Born about 1815; died at Santa Rosa, Feb. 8, 1878. A Central American politician, president of Honduras Aug. 15, 1864, to Aug. 1872. During this period the country was brought to bankruptcy by reckless financiering in connection with an interoceanic railway scheme. Salvador and Guatemala having made war on Honduras, Medina was defeated and deposed by his own troops. He revolted against Leiva (Dec., 1875, to May, 1876), but was defeated, and for a second attempted revolt was shot.

Medina-Celi (-thā'lē). A small town in the province of Soria, Spain, situated 12 miles north-east of Sigüenza; noted for an ancient castle.

Medina del Campo (mā-thē'nā dōl kān'pō). A town in the province of Valladolid, Spain, situated on the Zabadriel 25 miles south-south-west of Valladolid. The Castillo de la Mota is a very interesting castle, built of brick in 1440, now ruinous within but comparatively perfect without, with its broad moat, strongly fortified gate, square keep, round angle-towers, and numerous projecting bartizans. Here Queen Isabella died in 1504. Population (1887), 5,581.

Medina de Rio Seco (dā rē'ō sā'kō). A town in the province of Valladolid, Spain, 24 miles northwest of Valladolid. Here, July 14, 1808, the French under Bessières defeated the Spaniards under Cuesta. Population (1887), 4,776.

Medina Sidonia (mā-thē'nā sē-dō'nē-ā). A town in the province of Cadiz, Spain, 24 miles east by south of Cadiz; noted in Spanish history. Population (1887), 11,705.

Medinat-ēz-Zahra (me-dē'nāt-ēz-zā'rū). See the extract.

One of his (the calif's) wives, whose name was Ez-Zahra, 'the fairest,' to whom he was devotedly attached, once begged him to build her a city which should be called after her name. The Great Khalif, like most Mohammedan sovereigns, delighted in building, and he adopted the suggestion. He at once began to found a city at the foot of the mountain called the "Hill of the Bride," over against Cordova, and a few miles distant. Every year he spent a third of his revenues upon this building; and it went on all the twenty-five remaining years of his reign, and fifteen years of the reign of his son, who made many additions to it. Ten thousand workmen laboured daily at the task, and six thousand blocks of stone were cut and polished every day for the construction of the houses of the new city. Some three thousand beasts of burden were daily used to carry the materials to the spot, and four thousand columns were set up, many of which were presents from the Emperor of Constantinople, or came from Rome, Carthage, Sax, and other places, besides the home marbles quarried at Tarragona and Almeria. There were fifteen thousand doors, coated with iron or polished brass. The Hall of the Khalifs at the new city had a roof and walls of marble and gold, and in it was a wonderful sculptured fountain, a present from the Greek Emperor, who also sent the Khalif a unique pearl. In the midst of the hall was a basin of quicksilver; at either side were eight doors set in ivory and ebony and adorned with precious stones. When the sun shone through these doors and the quicksilver lake was set quivering, the whole room was filled with flashes like lightning, and the courtiers would cover their dazzled eyes. The Arabian authors delight in telling of the wonders of this "City of the Fairest," Medinat-ēz-Zahra, as it was called, after the Khalif's mistress.

Pool, Story of the Moors, p. 140.

Medinet-Abu (me-dē'net-ā'bū') or -Habu (-hā'bū'). One of the villages on the site of Thebes, Egypt, noted for its ruins. The temple and palace of Rameses III. here are notable. The front buildings, facing the south, constitute the royal palace. Many of the very interesting mural sculptures reproduce the private life of the king. From the palace a dromos 265 feet long leads to the massive outer pylon of the temple, which opens on a court over 100 feet square with Osirid figures on the north side and columns with bell-capitals on the south. A second pylon with portal between pyramidal towers leads to an imposing court 123 by 133 feet, surrounded by a peristyle having Osirid figures in front and rear and columns on the sides. Behind the rear figures is a range of 8 splendid columns with colored calanaglyphic sculptures. The portal of this court gives access to the hypostyle hall, bordered with chambers, behind which two columned vestibules precede the sanctuary and a labyrinth of corridors and small chambers. The sculptures of this temple are of great importance. They include in the interior ceremonial scenes of the cult, the king's coronation, and battle-scenes, many of them very richly colored. The exterior of the temple is covered with sculptures which are even more remarkable, illustrating Rameses's campaigns against the Libyans and an Asiatic people. Among the scenes a naval battle is of especial interest.

Medinet-el-Fayum (me-dē'net-el-fī-ōm'). The capital of the province of Fayum, Egypt, 54 miles southwest of Cairo. It is situated on the ruins of the ancient Arsinoe or Crocodiopolis. Population, estimated, 12,000.

Meding (mā'ding), Johann Ferdinand Martin Oskar; pseudonym Gregor Samarow. Born at Königsberg, Prussia, April 11, 1829. A German statesman and historical novelist.

Mediolanum (mē'di-ō-lā'num). The Latin name of Milan.

Mediomatrici (mē'di-ō-mat'ri-si). In ancient geography, a tribe of eastern Gaul, whose capital was Metz (Divodurum or Mediomatria).

Meditations. The name generally given to the philosophical work by the emperor Marcus Aurelius (English translation by George Long, 1862).

Mediterranean Sea (med'i-te-rā'nē-an sē). [F. Méditerranée, G. Mittelländisches Meer, L. Mare Internum, etc., the midland sea.] A sea, the most important extension of the Atlantic, separating Europe on the north from Africa on the south, and communicating with the Atlantic Ocean by the Strait of Gibraltar, and with the Black Sea by the Dardanelles, Sea of Marmora, and Bosphorus. It is divided into two basins, the western reaching from Gibraltar to Sicily and Tunis, and the eastern from there to Syria. Its chief branches are the Golfe du Lion, Gulf of Genoa, Tyrrhenian Sea, Ionian Sea, Adriatic Sea, Aegean Sea, Levant, Gulf of Sidra, and Gulf of Cabes. The chief islands are the Balearic Islands, Corsica, Sardinia, the Lipari Islands, Sicily, the Maltese Islands, the Ionian Islands, Crete, Cyprus, and the Grecian Archipelago. The chief tributary rivers are the Ebro, Rhone, Po, and Nile. Its coasts are famous in the history of civilization. Length, about 2,200 miles. Greatest width of sea proper, about 700 miles. Greatest depth, about 14,000 feet. Area, about 900,000 square miles.

Medjerda, or Mejerda (me-je'r'dä). A river in eastern Algeria and Tunis, which flows into the Gulf of Tunis 24 miles north of Tunis; the ancient Bagradas. Length, about 200 miles.

Medjidi (me-jêd'jî). [Turk., 'glorious.'] A Turkish order of knighthood, instituted in 1852 by the sultan Abdul-Medjid, and conferred on many foreign officers who took part with Turkey in the Crimean war.

Medjidieh (me-jêd'jye). A Tatar town in the Dobruja, Rumania, 20 miles west-northwest of Kustendji. Population (1889), 1,942.

Medley (med'li). In Etherege's comedy "The Man of Mode," the friend of Young Bellair; supposed by some to be a portrait of Sir Charles Sedley, by others a portrait of the author himself.

Medmenham Abbey. A ruined house near Great Marlow in Buckinghamshire, England, formerly a Cistercian monastery. It acquired notoriety as the scene of the scandalous orgies of a convivial association known as the Monks of St. Francis in the latter part of the 18th century.

Médoc (mâ-dok'). A district in the department of Gironde, France, extending along the Gironde; noted for its production of wines. Length, about 48 miles.

Medusa (me-dô'sjî). [Gr. Méduſa.] In Greek mythology, one of the Gorgons, according to some legends originally a beautiful maiden whose hair was transformed into serpents by Athene because with Poseidon by whom she was the mother of Chrysaor and Pegasus she had violated one of the temples of that goddess. Her head was so fearful to look upon that whoever saw it was changed into stone. Accordingly when Perseus sought her to cut off her head, he attacked her with averted face, seeing only her reflection in the shield of Athene, who also guided his hand. See Perseus.

Medusa Rondanini. An antique mask in the Glyptothek at Munich. It is the well-known late type of the Gorgon, in which the distorted grimacing face gives place to calm regular features, and only two serpents arranged as ornaments appear amid the locks of the hair. Over each temple a small wing is set.

Medway (med'wâ). A river in southeastern England which joins the Thames at Sheerness. Length, about 70 miles; navigable to Maidstone.

Medyn (mâ-din'), or Medysy (mâ-dis'i). A town in the government of Kaluga, 86 miles southwest of Moscow. Population (1893), 8,218.

Meeanee. See Miani.

Meek (mêk), Fielding Bradford. Born in Iowa, Dec. 10, 1817; died at Washington, D. C., Dec. 28, 1876. An American geologist and paleontologist.

Meer (mâr), Jan van der, the elder. Born at Haarlem about 1632; died there, Aug., 1691. A Dutch painter.

Meer, Jan van der. Born at Delft, Netherlands, 1632; died there, 1675. A Dutch painter.

Meer, Jan van der, the younger. Born at Haarlem, 1656; died May 28, 1705. A Dutch painter, son of Jan van der Meer (1632-91).

Meerane (mâ-râ'ne). A town in the kingdom of Saxony, 35 miles south of Leipzig. It has manufactures of woolen and half-woolen cloth. Population (1890), 22,446.

Meeraugspitze (mâr'oug-spit-se). A peak of the Tatra, Carpathians, noted for its view. Height, 8,230 feet.

Meercraft (mêr'krâft). In Ben Jonson's comedy "The Devil is an Ass," a clever rogue, a projector or speculator who carries about with him prospectuses to suit all tastes.

Meerut (mê'rut), or Mirat (mê'rat), or Mirath (mê'rath). 1. A division in the Northwest Provinces, British India. Area, 11,319 square miles. Population (1881), 5,141,204.—2. A district in the division of Meerut, intersected by lat. 29° N., long. 77° 45' E. Area, 2,379 square miles. Population (1881), 1,313,137.—3. Megara (me-jê'râ). [Gr. Méγαρα.] In Greek mythology, one of the Eumenides (which see).

Megalesian Games (meg-a-lê'shi-angâmz). [Gr. Μεγαλήσια.] In Roman antiquity, a magnificent festival, with a stately procession, feasting, and scenic performances in the theaters, celebrated at Rome in the month of April, and lasting for 6 days, in honor of "the great mother," Cybele. The image of this goddess was brought to Rome from Pessinus in Galatia, about 203 B. C., and the games were instituted then or shortly afterward, in consequence of a sibylline oracle promising continual victory to the Romans if due honors were paid to her.

Megalokastron (meg-â-lô-kâs'tron). A seaport on the northern coast of Crete.

Megalopolis (meg-a-lôp'ô-lis). [Gr. Μεγαλόπολις, the great city.] In ancient geography, a city in Arcadia, Greece, situated on the Helisson in lat. 37° 25' N., long. 22° 9' E. It was built in 370 B. C. as an Arcadian outpost against Sparta. There are extensive ruins near the modern Sinapi. An ancient theater has been lately excavated. The cave, 475 feet in diameter, is entirely supported by an artificial embankment with massive retaining-walls. The monastery, the most famous in Greece proper, was founded by Constantine Palæologus. The great building, five stories high, is erected in a cave, 100 feet deep and high and 200 wide, in the face of a cliff; the distant view is highly picturesque. The church possesses one of the miracle-working icons of the Madonna, attributed to St. Luke.

Megara (meg'a-râ). [Gr. Μέγαρα; Semitic Me'arâh, cave.] A city in Greece, with its territory, Megaris, situated between the Hælyon Sea, the Corinthian Bay, and the Saronic Gulf. The city of Megara, with its port Nisæa, was situated on the pass leading from central Greece to the Peloponnesus. Its primitive inhabitants were Carians. From it went out the colonies Byzantium, Chalcedon, Heracleia on the Pontus, and Megara Hyblæa in Sicily. It had two citadels: on the Acropolis Caria stood a celebrated temple of Demeter (the Megaron). It fell later into the hands of the Macedonians, and afterward of the Romans. The modern Megara, situated on the site of the ancient city, has about 6,000 inhabitants.

Megara Hyblæa (meg'a-râ hi-blê'â). In ancient geography, a Megarian colony in Sicily, north of Syracuse. See Hybla Minor.

Meghazil (me-gâ-zêl'). See the extract.

The "tomb of Iliram" has been already described. Four monuments of a more or less similar character exist on the Syrian mainland opposite Aradus, in the near vicinity of Amrit. Two are known as "the Méghazils." They stand near together on a low hill, at some little distance from the coast, between the Nahr Amrit and the Nahr Kublé. The more striking of the two has been described as a "real masterpiece in respect of proportion, elegance, and majesty." It consists of a basement story, which is circular and flanked by four stone lions, whereof the effect is admirable, with a second story of a cylindrical shape, and a third similar one, of smaller dimensions, crowned by a dome or half-sphere. The whole, except the basement-story or plinth, which consists of four blocks, is cut out of a single stone. The double cylinder is decorated round the summit of each of its parts with a row of carved crenellations standing out about four inches from the general surface. The lions, whose heads and fore-quarters alone project from the mass of the base, are roughly carved and seem to have been left unfinished, but the mouldings, and the general dressing of the stone, have been executed with much care. The entire height of the monument is thirty-two feet. Rauvlinson, Phœnicia, p. 260.

Megi (mâ'gê), or Wamegi (wâ-mâ'gê). See Sagara.

Megiddo (me-gid'dô). [Heb., 'host,' 'garrison.'] An ancient town in the plain of Jezreel, Palestine, at the southeastern foot of Mount Carmel, now represented by the ruins of Lejjun: the Legio of Eusebius. It was one of the Canaanish capitals, and became one of the strongholds of the tribe of Manasseh, and the valley dominated by it became a celebrated battlefield in the history of Israel. Near it Deborah and Barak defeated the Canaanites under Sisera. Solomon made it a fortress. In 609 B. C. Josiah succumbed here to Pharaoh-Necho of Egypt.

Melchizedek, or Melchisedec (mel-kiz'e-dek). [Heb., 'king of righteousness.'] In Old Testament history, a king of Salem and priest of the most high God, who entertained and blessed Abraham and received tithes from him. His relation to Christ as a type is discussed in Heb. v.-vii.

Melchites (mel'kits). [From Ar. melék, king.] The orthodox Eastern Christians, as distinguished from the Monophysites or Nestorians. The name was originally given to the orthodox as belonging to the imperial church, the title of king being that which was commonly given in Greek and Oriental languages to the Roman and to the Byzantine emperor. Although the term Melchites is older than the Council of Chalcedon (451), its wider use dates from its adoption after that council by the Monophysites, who rejected the decrees of the council, and employed this name to represent the orthodox as receiving them merely in submission to the edict of the emperor Marcian. The name Melchites is sometimes given also to members of communities of Christians in Syria and Egypt, formerly in communion with the Orthodox Greek Church, who have submitted to the Roman see.

Melchizedek, or Melchisedec (mel-kiz'e-dek). [Heb., 'king of righteousness.'] In Old Testament history, a king of Salem and priest of the most high God, who entertained and blessed Abraham and received tithes from him. His relation to Christ as a type is discussed in Heb. v.-vii.

Melitopol (me-lē-tō'pōly). A town in the government of Taurida, southern Russia, situated on the Molotchna 135 miles east of Kherson. Population, 8,707.

Melkarth (mel'kärt). ['City king.]. The tutelary god of Tyre; the Greek Melicertes. He was merely another aspect of the Canaanitish supreme god Baal. His temple at Tyre was celebrated for its magnificence. By the Greeks he was identified with Hercules, an idea which was caught by the Phœnicians, and on their later coins Baal-Melkarth is frequently represented as Hercules. Therefore the Straits of Gibraltar were also called "The Pillars of Hercules," properly of Melkarth, the Phœnicians believing that they were the boundary of him in his aspect as the sun-god, and therefore also of navigation.

Mellefont (mel'e-font). One of the principal characters in Congreve's comedy "The Double Dealer." He is in love with Cynthia.

Many of Gregory's epistles to Mellitius are extant. He was consecrated bishop about 604, and in 619 became archbishop of Canterbury.

Mello (mä'lō), Custodio José de. Born about 1845. A Brazilian naval officer and revolutionist. As captain in 1889 he was prominent in the overthrow of the empire; was promoted to admiral; and for a time was minister of marine. On Sept. 6, 1895, he secretly seized the Brazilian war-ships in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro (comprising practically all the navy), and at the head of this force declared against President Peixoto. Some of the harbor forts yielded to him; an intermittent bombardment of the loyal forts, of Niteroy, and, to some extent, of Rio de Janeiro, was kept up for 6 months, and there were several sharp land engagements. Foreign powers refused to recognize the rebels as belligerents, and they were hence unable to establish a blockade. During much of this time Mello operated on the southern coasts, leaving the command of the ships at Rio to Saldanha da Gama. Santa Catharina was taken late in Sept., 1893, and a provisional government established there, and communications were opened with the insurgents in Rio Grande do Sul. During Mello's absence a government fleet, which had been hastily ordered from Europe and the United States, arrived before Rio de Janeiro, and Saldanha da Gama gave up the ships there (March 13, 1894), taking refuge on a Portuguese man-of-war. Mello still retained several of the strongest vessels, including the Republica and the Aquidaban, as well as portions of the southern states. He attacked Rio Grande do Sul early in April, 1894, but was repulsed, and on April 16 gave himself up to the Argentine authorities at Buenos Ayres. On April 17 the Brazilian forces recovered Santa Catharina, the Aquidaban being sunk by torpedoes.

Melloni (mel-lō'nē), Macedonio. Born at Parma, Italy, April 11, 1798; died near Naples, Aug. 11, 1854. An Italian physicist, noted especially for his discoveries in radiant heat.

C.; was ravaged by the Northmen; was an early Capetian residence; and was held by the English from 1420 to 1430. It was the birthplace of Amyot. Population (1891), 12,792.

Melun. A minor character in Shakspeare's "King John," a French lord.

Melusina (mel-ō-sī'nj), F. Mélusine (mä-lü-zēn'). In French legend, a water-fay of great power and wealth. She married Raymond, son of a Comte de la Forêt, who found her near a fountain or spring in the forest of Colombiers, in Poitou. The marriage took place in a castle which she built around the fountain. This she called Lusinia, after herself—a name corrupted into Lusignan, which the place still bears. They lived happily till, breaking a promise he had made before marriage that he would never intrude on her seclusion on Saturdays, he discovered her, half fish or serpent half woman, swimming in a bath. His breach of faith compelled her to leave him. Until the destruction of Lusignan (1574) she was said to appear on its towers, and to shriek shrilly thrice whenever the head of that family or the King of France lay dying. The story of Jean d'Arras, compiled by the order of his master, the Duke of Berry, in 1387, differs somewhat from the legend. Stephan, a Dominican of the house of Lusignan, developed the work of Jean d'Arras, and made the story so famous that the families of Luxembourg, Rohan, and Sassenay altered their pedigrees so as to be able to claim descent from the illustrious Mélusine. She is connected with the legends of both the Banshee and the Mermaid. Boring-Gould.

Melusine, Märchen von der schönen. [G., 'Story of the Beautiful Melusine.]. An overture by Mendelssohn, produced in 1833.

Melville, Sir James. See Melville, Sir James.

Melville, or Melville (mel'vil), Andrew. Born at Baldovie, Forfarshire, Scotland, Aug. 1, 1545; died at Sedan, France, 1622. A Scottish reformer, scholar, and Presbyterian leader. In 1559 he entered St. Mary's College, St. Andrews; in 1564 went to Paris and in 1566 to Poitiers, where he became regent of the College of St. Marceon; and in 1569 went to Geneva. He was principal of Glasgow University 1574-80, of St. Mary's College, St. Andrews, 1580-1606. He was an active leader in the organization of the Scottish Presbyterian Church, and assisted in drafting the second "book of discipline" in 1581. He reorganized the Scottish universities, particularly St. Andrews, of which he became rector in 1590. In the long struggle against the spiritual authority of the king and hierarchy, he was repeatedly imprisoned. He was sent to the Tower of London April, 1607. At his release he was installed in the chair of biblical theology at Sedan, 1611, and died there.

Melville, George John Whyte-. See Whyte-Melville.

Melville, Herman. Born at New York, Aug. 1, 1819; died there, Sept. 28, 1891. An American novelist. He had a roving spirit, and went to sea as a cabin-boy, returning but once till 1844. From 1857 to 1860 he lectured in the United States, and traveled in England and on the Continent. He was a district officer in the New York custom-house 1866-85. His adventures in the Marquesas Islands are described in "Typee" (1846) and "Omoo" (1847), and his other adventures in "Mardi," etc. (1849), "Redburn, his First Voyage" (1849), "White Jacket, or the World in a Man-of-War" (1850), "Moby Dick, or the White Whale" (1851), and "Pierre, or the Ambiguities" (1852). After this his popularity declined. He published several volumes of poems, "Battle Pieces, etc." (1860), "Clarel, a Poem" (1876), "Timoleon" (1891).

Melville, Sir James. Born 1535; died at his estate of Hallhill, Fife, Nov. 13, 1617. A Scottish soldier, diplomat, and historical writer. He was privy councillor and gentleman of the bedchamber to Mary Queen of Scots, and later held the same position in the court of Anne, queen of James VI. His autobiography ("Memoirs") is important historically.

Melville, or Melvill, James. Born July 26, 1836; died at Berwick-on-Tweed, Jan. 13, 1874. A Scottish reformer, nephew of Andrew Melville. He shared his uncle's fortunes in the struggle for Presbyterianism, and when Andrew was confined in the Tower, James was forbidden to enter Scotland. He was allowed to return in 1813, but died on his way at Berwick. Among his works are "A Spiritual Prophecy of a Pastor to his People" (1859); "The Black Bastill," a poem; and the "Diary," an invaluable historical record.

Memnon (mem'nōn). [Gr. Μέμνων.] An Oriental or Ethiopian hero in the Trojan war, slain by Achilles. He was a solar hero, son of the Dawn (Eos), or of Day (Hemera), symbolized as a youth of marvellous beauty and strength. The Greeks gave his name to one of the colossi of Amenophis III. at Thebes in Egypt. "The vocal Memnon," so called because the stone, when reached by the rays of the rising sun, gave forth, it was believed, a sound resembling that of a breaking chord.

The fable of Memnon is one of those in which it is difficult to discover any germs of truth. Memnon, the son of Tithonus and Eos (Dawn) or Héméra (Day), is, according to most accounts, an Ethiopian king. His father Tithonus, however, reigns at Susa, and he himself leads a combined army of Sussians and Ethiopians to the assistance of his father's brother, Priam, king of Troy. We seem here to have nothing but the wildest imaginations of pure romancers. Homer makes very slight and passing allusions to Memnon. Hesiod calls him king of the Ethiopians. So Pindar (Nem. iii. 62, 63, Dissen.). This seems to have been the first form of the legend, from which all mention of Susa was omitted. The earliest author who is known to have connected Memnon with Susa is Eschylus, who made his mother a Cissian woman. It is clear, however, that by the time of Herodotus the story that he built Susa, or its great palace, was generally accepted in Greece. Perhaps the adoption of this account may be regarded as indicating some knowledge of the ethnic connection which really existed between Ethiopia and Susiana.

Ravinskin, Herod. iii. 254, note.

Memnon. The "mad lover" in Fletcher's play of that name.

Memnonium. See Thebes (Egypt).

Memphis (mem'fis). [Egyptian Mennufer, Mennufer, city of the good; Gr. Μέμφοις.] In ancient geography, the early capital of Egypt. It was on the western bank of the Nile, south of Cairo. It is said to have been built by Menes. In the 4th dynasty it was the capital. It suffered from the Hyksos, and in the new empire was second to Thebes. It was captured by the Assyrians and stormed by Cambyses. It continued to exist under the Roman Empire, but was gradually abandoned and ruined after the Mohammedan conquest. The ruins of Sakkara are near it.

The new city received a name which reflects the satisfaction of the ancient founder: he called it Mennufre, 'the Good' or 'Perfect Mansion.' This was the civil name. . . . The civil name is the parent of the Greek Memphis and the Hebrew Moph, also found in the form Noph. Lately, scholars have thought that the famous capital of Ethiopia, the royal seat of Tirhakah, the classical Napata and Egyptian Nap, is intended by Noph.

Poolle, Cities of Egypt, p. 22.

Memphis. A city, capital of Shelby County, Tennessee, situated on the Mississippi in lat. 35° 8' N., long. 90° 5' W.; the chief place on the Mississippi between St. Louis and New Orleans. It has manufactures of lumber, etc.; is one of the chief cotton markets in the United States; and has important river commerce. It was founded in 1820. The Mississippi is crossed here by the only bridge that spans it below St. Louis: it is built of steel, on the cantilever system, with 5 spans; is 2,597 feet long; and was opened for traffic May 12, 1893. Near Memphis the Federal fleet defeated the Confederates June 6, 1862, and the city was taken by the Federals. The Confederates under Forrest raided it in 1864. It was disastrously ravaged by yellow fever in 1873, 1878, and 1879. Population (1890), 64,495.

Memphremagog (mem-fre-mā'gog), Lake. A lake on the border of Vermont and the province of Quebec, Canada. It discharges by the rivers Magog and St. Francis into the St. Lawrence. Length, about 35 miles.

Menaggio (mā-nād'jō). A small town in northern Italy, on the western bank of Lake Como, 16 miles northeast of Como.

Menahem (men'a-hem). [Heb., 'comforter.'] King of Israel 748-738 B. C. He was general under Zechariah, son of Jeroboam II., and obtained the throne by a revolution after having killed Shallum, the murderer of Zechariah. To secure his throne he applied for support to the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III. (in the Old Testament called Phul), for which he paid a thousand talents. From that time on the northern kingdom remained tributary to Assyria. In the Assyrian inscriptions he is mentioned by the name of Mithimani of Samirina, 'Menahem of Samaria.'

Menai Strait (men'i strāt). A strait separating Anglesea from Carnarvonshire, North Wales, and connecting Carnarvon Bay with Beaumaris Bay. Length, about 13 miles. It is crossed by the Britannia tubular bridge (which see) and the Alcanai bridge. The latter, built by Telford between 1819 and 1826, is 580 feet long between the piers, and the roadway, supported by 16 chains, is 100 feet above the high-tide level.

Menam (mā-nām'). A river in Siam which flows into the Gulf of Siam a few miles below Bangkok. Length, estimated, about 600 miles.

Menander (me-nan'dēr). [Gr. Μένανδρος.] Born at Athens, 342 B. C.; said to have been drowned about 291 B. C. A celebrated Athenian comic poet, the chief of the writers of the "new comedy," son of the general Deiopeithes and Hegesistrate. Many fragments of his plays have been preserved.

He has published "Les brèves de Babylone" (1859), "Les inscriptions cunéiformes" (1860), "Inscriptions de Hammourabi" (1864), "Exposé de la grammaire de la langue assyrienne" (1868), "Annales des rois d'Assyrie" (1872), with Oppert "La grande inscription de Khorsabad" (1863), etc.

Menaphon (men'a-fon): Camilla's Alarom to Slumbering Euphues. A love-story by Robert Greene. It was published in 1589, and as "Greene's Arcadia, or Menaphon" in 1599. It contains his best lyrical verses. Sidney's "Arcadia" was published in 1594, a year after the first appearance of "Menaphon."

Menapia (me-nā'pi-ā). See the extract.

The forms "Menapia" and "Menavia" are applied, with tritling variations, to the city of St. David's, the Isle of Man, the Menai Straits, and the coast between Dublin and Wicklow; and we can hardly attribute their occurrence to any contact with the "Menapii" of the coast of Flanders.

Mende (mōnd). The capital of the department of Lozère, France, situated on the Lot in lat. 44° 31' N., long. 3° 29' E. Population (1891), commune, 7,878.

Mende (men'de), or Mindi (mén'dē). A Negritie tribe of West Africa, between Sierra Leone and Liberia. Chief town, Shandiga. There is an American mission at Sherbro.

Mendelssohn (men'dels-sōn). Moses. Born in Dessau, Germany, Sept. 6, 1729; died Jan. 4, 1786.

A noted Jewish philosopher. Premature and severe intellectual labor weakened his health and injured the growth of his spine. In 1743 he went to Berlin, where he at first lived in great poverty, devoting himself to the acquisition of knowledge, until he obtained a position, first as tutor and then as accountant, with a rich silk manufacturer, and at last became a partner in the house. He became acquainted with and was befriended by Lessing, Nicolai, Herder, Wieland, Jacobi, Lavater, and others. Lessing, in his great drama "Nathan the Wise," has erected a lasting memorial to his Jewish friend. Mendelssohn soon became known as a writer upon esthetic subjects. His writings were distinguished by beauty and elegance of style, as much as by largeness of intellect and wisdom. He obtained from the Berlin Academy the prize for an essay "On Evidence in the Metaphysical Sciences," among his competitors being Immanuel Kant. His best-known works are "Jerusalem," a sort of comprehensive survey of Judaism in its religious and national aspects, published in 1783; and especially his "Phædo," published in 1767, a summary of all that religion, reason, and experience urge in support of the belief in the immortality of the soul. For the Jews his translation of the Pentateuch and the Psalms into pure German was epoch-making, inasmuch as it opened the way for them to German literature and culture. He also wrote commentaries on several books of the Old Testament. The Berlin Academy of Sciences elected him a member, but King Frederick II. refused to ratify the election of a Jew. In 1786 Mendelssohn died, mourned by all as "the German Socrates."

Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (men'dels-sōn-bār-tōl'dē), Jakob Ludwig Felix. Born at Hamburg, Feb. 3, 1809; died at Leipsic, Nov. 4, 1847.

A celebrated German composer and musician, grandson of Moses Mendelssohn. He and his sister Fanny (Madame Hensel) were first taught music by their mother; but in 1816, when they were 7 and 11 years old respectively, they were taken to Paris and placed under the instruction of Madame Bigot. On the return of Felix to Berlin, he studied with Berger, Zelter, and Henning, and afterward with Rietz. He made his first appearance in public Oct. 24, 1818, and was much applauded in the piano-forte part of a trio for piano-forte and two horns by Woelfl. He began to compose regularly in his twelfth year, and the symphonies, quartets, concertos, etc., which he produced after this time were performed at the musical parties which took place at his father's house on alternate Sunday mornings, his brother and two sisters assisting—he, however, always conducting and generally playing the piano-forte parts. Many great artists visited the house on these occasions. He visited Paris in 1825, and in 1829 triumphantly conducted Bach's "Passion Music" at Berlin, after much opposition, for the first time after the death of the composer. The same year he went to England, where he was enthusiastically received; and he traveled there and on the Continent till July, 1832. In 1833 he was made musical director at Dusseldorf; in 1834 member of the Berlin Academy of Fine Arts; and in 1835 conductor of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipsic, where he became the idol of the town. He became engaged to Cécile Charlotte Sophie Jeannerand in 1836; was married in 1837; went to Berlin in 1841 to assist in founding an academy of arts; and paid his ninth visit to England in 1846, for the purpose of producing "Elijah" (went again in 1847). On his return he heard of the death of his sister Fanny. This, with the severe work which was beginning to tell on him, produced illness and depression from which he did not recover. He left between one and two hundred works, among which are the opera "The Wedding of Camacho" (1825), songs, chamber and orchestral music, the oratorios "Elijah" (1846) and "St. Paul" (1836), overture (1826) and music (1843) of "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Marchen von der schönen Melusine" ("Story of the Beautiful Melusine," 1833), "Die Hebriden" ("The Hebrides"), "Lieder ohne Worte" ("Songs without Words"), music to Goethe's "Walpurgisnacht," "Antigone" (1841), "Oedipus Coloneus," and "Athalie," sonatas, and fragments of the opera "Die Lorelei" of the oratorio "Christus," etc. His letters from 1830 to 1832 were published in 1861; and from 1833 to 1847, in 1863. Other letters are in his biographies by Hiller, Devrient, Benedict, Schubring, etc., and in Hensel's "Die Familie Mendelssohn."

Mendoza, Juan Gonzalez de. Born at Toledo about 1540; died at Popayan, New Granada, 1617. A Spanish prelate and author, a member of the Augustine order. He was in China from 1580 to 1583, and on his return spent two years in Mexico; subsequently he was bishop of the Lipari Islands, of Chiapas, and of Popayan. His account of China, published in 1586, contains also much of interest concerning America. An English translation has been published by the Hakluyt Society (1853-54).

Mendoza, Lorenzo Suarez de, Count of La Coruña. Born about 1510; died at Mexico, June 19, 1582. A Spanish nobleman, viceroy of New Spain, or Mexico, from Oct. 4, 1580.

Mendoza, Pedro de. Born at Gaudix, Granada, about 1487; died at sea, 1537. A Spanish captain. In 1534 he undertook, at his own expense, the colonization of the region about the Rio de la Plata; sailed from San Lucar, Sept. 1, with 14 ships and 2,650 men; and founded the city of Buenos Ayres Feb. 2, 1535. The Spaniards suffered greatly from Indian attacks and from famine. Mendoza finally left for Spain with a few companions, and died a martyr on the voyage. The colony, removed to Asuncion, subsequently prospered and led to the settlement of that part of South America.

Mendoza Caamaño (kā-ā-mān'yō), José Antonio de, Marquis of Villa Garcia. Born about 1680; died 1746. A Spanish diplomatist and statesman. He was ambassador to Venice, viceroy of Catalonia, and from Jan. 4, 1736, to July 12, 1745, viceroy of Peru. During his rule New Granada was separated from Peru. He died at sea while returning to Spain.

Mendoza Codex. A famous Aztec manuscript, or, rather, a copy on European paper with a Spanish translation. It was sent from Mexico by the viceroy Antonio de Mendoza as a present to Charles V.; fell into the hands of a French cruiser; and after various vicissitudes was taken to England, and was published by Purchas in 1625. Subsequently it became a part of the Bodleian Library, and was published in the Kingsborough collection. Other copies (one perhaps the original) are known. The manuscript relates to the history of the Aztecs and their domestic and civil economy.

Mendoza y Luna, Juan Manuel Hurtado de. See Hurtado de Mendoza y Luna.

Mendrisio (men-dre'zē-ō). A small town in the canton of Ticino, Switzerland, near the southern end of the Lake of Lugano.

Menelaus (men-e-lā'us). [Gr. Μενέλαος or Μενέλας.] In Greek legend, the son of Atreus, brother of Agamemnon, and husband of Helen. See Trojan War.

Menelaus. The brother of Agamemnon, a character in Shakspeare's "Troilus and Cressida."

Menelaus with the Corpse of Patroclus. An antique group in marble, in the Loggia dei Lanzi, Florence. Menelaus, lightly draped and wearing a heavy helmet, lifts from the ground the sinking, nude body of the dead youth. This is a good Roman copy of a Greek original.

Menendez (mā-nen'deth), Manuel. Born about 1790; died after 1845. A Peruvian politician. He was president of the council of state under Gamarra in 1840, and on Gamarra's death (Nov. 20, 1841) became, by the constitution, acting president of Peru. He was deposed by Torrico in Aug., 1842, but was restored by Castilla in 1844, and held the post until Castilla's election, April 20, 1845.

Menendez de Avilés (mā-nān'dāth dā ā-vē-lās'), Pedro. Born at Avilés, Asturias, 1519; died at Santander, Sept. 17, 1574. A Spanish captain. He was captain-general in the navy under Philip II., and served that monarch in many important enterprises; was disgraced and imprisoned in 1560; but regained favor, and in 1565 was appointed governor of Cuba and Florida, with orders to colonize the latter country. He sailed from Cadiz, June 20, 1565, with 19 vessels and 1,500 men. The fleet was scattered by a storm, and he reached Florida with only 7 ships. He founded St. Augustine Sept. 8, 1565, captured a colony of French Protestants on the St. John's River and massacred nearly all of them, and after the privations of the first winter had passed, succeeded in establishing Spanish rule firmly in Florida. In subsequent voyages Menendez founded a post on Port Royal Bay, now in South Carolina, and left a mission on Chesapeake Bay. The latter was destroyed by the Indians, and in 1572 he ascended the Chesapeake and Potomac and killed many of them. In 1574 he was put in command of a large Spanish fleet destined to make a descent on the Netherlands, but he died soon after.

Menenius Agrippa (me-nē'ni-us ā-grip'ū). In Roman legend, the patrician ambassador to the plebeians during their secession to the Saered Mount (about 494 B. C.). He is represented as having persuaded the plebeians to accept a compromise by relating the fable of the belly and the members.

Menkalinan (men-kā-lē-nān' or men-kal'i-nān). [Ar. menkib-ā-lī-nān, the shoulder of the driver.] The bright second-magnitude star β Aurigæ. The star is one of the first discovered and most remarkable "spectroscopic binaries," the two components moving in an orbit about 9,000,000 miles in diameter, with a relative velocity of about 150 miles a second, and thus causing the alternate doubling and undoubling of the lines in the spectrum of the star once in two days.

Menkar (men'kār). [Ar. al-minkhār, the snout.] The 2½-magnitude star α Ceti, in the nose or jaw of the sea-monster. Sometimes written Menkab.

Menkaura (men-kā-rā'), or Mencheres (men-chē'rēz). An Egyptian king of the 4th dynasty, builder of the third of the great pyramids at Gizeh. His date is given by Brugsch as 3633 B. C.

Menkib (men-kib'). [Ar. menkib-ā-l-faras, shoulder of the horse.] A rarely used Arabic name for the second-magnitude star β Pegasi, more usually called Scheat.

Menno (men'nō) Simons, or Symons, or Simonis. Born at Witnaarsum, Friesland, 1492; died at Oldesloe, Holstein, Jan. 13, 1559. A Friesian preacher and reformer, chief founder of the Mennonites. His works were published in 1681.

Mennonites (men'on-its). A Christian denomination which originated in Friesland in the early part of the 16th century, and holds doctrines of which Menno Simons (1492-1559) was the chief exponent. The leading features of the Mennonite bodies have been baptism on profession of faith, refusal of oaths, of civic offices, and of the support of the state in war, and a tendency to asceticism. Many of these beliefs and practices have been modified. The sect became divided in the 17th century into the Upland (Obere) Mennonites, or Ammanites, and the Lowland (Untere) Mennonites, the former being the more conservative and rigorous. Members of the sect are found in the Netherlands, Germany, Russia, etc., and especially in the United States. In the last-named country they are divided into Untere (or Old) Mennonites, Obere Mennonites (or Ammanites), New Mennonites, Evangelical Mennonites, and Reformed Mennonites (or Herrians).

Meno (mē'nō), or Menon (mē'nōn). [Gr. Mēnov.] A dialogue of Plato: a conversation between Socrates, Meno (Menon), a slave of Meno, and Anytus upon the teachableness of virtue. Menominee (me-nom'ī-nē). [Pl., also Menominees.] A tribe of North American Indians which since it first became known has occupied lands in Wisconsin and upper Michigan, chiefly living upon Menominee River and the west side of Green Bay, but ranging south to Fox River and west to the Mississippi River. The name means "wild rice men," from their staple food, translated by the French to "Folles Avoines," by which the tribe is known in early literature. They number about 1,300 at Green Bay agency, Wisconsin. See Algonquian.

Menon (mē'nōn). [Gr. Μένων.] Killed about 399 B. C. A Thessalian mercenary, one of the leading generals in the expedition of Cyrus the younger. See Minorca.

Menouca (me-nō'), Baron Jacques François de. Born at Boussay, Touraine, 1750: died at Venice, Aug. 13, 1810. A French general. He became commander of the army in Egypt in 1800, and was defeated at Alexandria March 21, 1801, by the English under Abercromby.

Menshikoff (men'shē-kof), Prince Alexander Danilovitch. Born at Moscow, Nov. 16, 1672: died at Berezoff, Siberia, 1729 or 1730. A Russian general and minister of state. He was of obscure origin, became a page at the court of Peter the Great, served with distinction against the Swedes, and in 1704 was promoted general. At the instance of Peter the Great he was also appointed a prince of the Holy Roman Empire. On the death of Peter in 1725 he caused the empress dowager to be proclaimed empress under the title of Catherine I. She died in 1727, leaving him regent for her grandson Peter II. He was about to marry his daughter Mary to the emperor when the latter revolted against his domination, and exiled him to Siberia in 1727.

Menshikoff, Prince Alexander Sergevitch. Born Sept. 11, 1787: died May 2, 1869. A Russian general, diplomatist, and politician, great-grandson of Alexander Danilovitch Menshikoff. He served in the Napoleonic, Persian, and Turkish wars, and was commander of the Russian naval and military forces in the Crimea 1854-55. He was defeated at the Alma and at Inkerman in 1854.

Mentana (men-tā'nā). A small town in the province of Rome, Italy, 13 miles northeast of Rome. Here, Nov. 3, 1867, the Italian insurgents under Garibaldi, after gaining an advantage over the papal forces, were defeated by the French troops sent to the relief of Pius IX. The former lost about 1,000 killed and wounded, the latter only 171.

Menteith (men-tēth'). A district in the south of Perthshire, Scotland, lying between the Teith and the Forth.

Menteith. A thane of Scotland, a minor character, in Shakspeare's "Macbeth."

Mentel (men'tel), Johann. A German printer of Strasburg in the 15th century. He was connected in business with Gutenberg after the latter's quarrel with Fust. After his death the claim that he was the inventor of printing was, without ground, made for him by his grandson.

The claim that Mentel was the inventor of typography was first made in 1520 by John Schott, son of Martin Schott, who had married Mentel's daughter and inherited his business. In the year 1521 Jerome Gebweiler, misled by the assertions of Schott, undertook to controvert the pretensions of Fust and Schoeffer as the first printers. He writes that printing was practised in Strasburg by John Mentel, who had obtained the new art of chalcography, or of making books with tin pens (types), about the year 1447; that Mentel, and Eggestein, his partner, made an agreement that they should keep secret the new art; that John Schott, whom he praises, showed him a manuscript book, without date, written by Mentel, in which were drawings of typographic instruments, and observations on the manufacture of printing-ink. It was by similar methods that John Schott induced James Spiegel to declare, in a book printed in 1531, that John Mentel invented printing in Strasburg in the year 1444.

De Vinno, Invention of Printing, p. 488.

Menteur (moñ-tēr'), Le. [F., 'The Liar.'] A comedy by Corneille, produced in 1642. It was the foundation of good comedy in France, and paved the way for Molière. "La suite du menteur" ("The Sequel to the Liar") came out in 1645. The characters are in part the same, but the piece is not so interesting.

Mentone (men-tō'ne), or Menton (moñ-tōn'). A seaport in the department of Alpes-Maritimes, France, situated on the Mediterranean 15 miles northeast of Nice. It is a leading winter health-resort of the Riviera, and has a trade in fruit and essence. The noted bone-caves of Mentone, with prehistoric remains, are in the vicinity. It belonged to Monaco prior to 1818, was then occupied by Sardinia, and ceded to France in 1861. Population (1891), commune, 9,050.

Mentor (men'tor). [Gr. Μέντορ.] In Greek legend, an Ithæan to whom Odysseus, when about to depart for the Trojan war, intrusted the care of his house and the education of his son Telemachus. His name has become a synonym for a faithful monitor.

Mentu (men'tō). In Egyptian mythology, the rising sun, a double of Ra, worshipped at southern An (Hermonthis). He was represented as Ra with the addition of the tall plumes of Amun.

He was educated at Oxford; was elected archbishop against the opposition of Queen Isabella and Mortimer; and was consecrated in 1328 at Avignon. He was involved in constant quarrels with his clergy, which finally resulted in his excommunication in 1333.

Mephiboseth (me-fib'ō-sheth; Heb. pron. mēf-i-bō'sheth). In Old Testament history, the son of Jonathan, and grandson of Saul.

Mephistopheles (mef-is-tof'ō-lēs). [Written Mephistophilus in Shakspeare, Fletcher, etc., Mephistophilis in Marlowe, but now generally Mephistopheles, as in Goethe: a made-up name, like most of the names of the mediæval devils, but supposed by some to be formed (irregularly) from Gr. μῆ, not, φῶς (phōs-), light, and φίλος, loving.] A familiar spirit mentioned in the old legend of Sir John Faustus, and a principal agent in Marlowe's play "Dr. Faustus" and in Goethe's "Faust." "He is frequently referred to as 'the Devil,' but it was well understood that he was only a devil. Goethe took only the name and a few circumstances connected with the first appearance of Mephistopheles from the legend: the character, from first to last, is his own creation; and, in his own words, 'on account of the irony and knowledge of the world it displays, is not easily comprehended.' Although he sometimes slyly used it (though less frequently than Faust) as a mask through which to speak with his own voice, he evidently drew the germ of some characteristics from his early associate, Merck. . . . The original form of this name was Mephistophilus. There has been much discussion in regard to its meaning, but Duntzen's conjecture is probably correct,—that it was imperfectly formed by some one who knew little Greek, and was intended to signify 'not loving the light.'" E. Taylor, Notes to Faust.

Meppel (mep'pel). A town in the province of Drenthe, Netherlands, 59 miles east-northeast of Amsterdam. It has considerable manufactures and trade. Population, 9,011.

Merbal (mēr'bal). King of Tyre about 556-552 B. C. Before his accession to the throne he was a hostage in Babylon.

Mercadante (mēr-kā-dān'te), Saverio. Born at Altamura, Italy, about 1797: died at Naples, Dec. 13, 1870. An Italian operatic composer. Being suddenly dismissed from his position as leader of the orchestra of the Collegio di San Sebastiano near Naples, where he was educated, he began composing for the stage: his first work, a cantata, was written in 1815. He became maestro di capella at the cathedral of Novara in 1833, and director of the Conservatorio at Naples in 1840. In 1862 he became totally blind. Among his operas are "Elisa e Claudio" (1822), "I Briganti" (1836), "H Ginramento" (1837).

Mercadet (mēr-kā-lā'). A play by Balzac, produced at the Gymnase, Paris, in 1851. The original play was called "Le faiseur" ("The Speculator"), and was not played in the author's lifetime. After his death it was shortened and brought out under its present title.

Mercator (mēr-kā'tor; D. pron. mēr-kā'tor) (properly Gerhard Kremer). [L. Mercator, equiv. to D. Kramer, I.G. Kremer, G. Krämer, merchant, peddler.] Born at Rupelmonde, Belgium, March 5, 1512: died at Duisburg, Prussia, Dec. 2, 1594. A Flemish geographer. He studied philosophy and mathematics at the University of Louvain, and afterward devoted himself to geography. Through the influence of Cardinal Granvelle, he received a commission from the emperor Charles V. to manufacture a terrestrial globe and a celestial globe, which are said to have been superior to any that had then appeared. He took up his residence at Duisburg in 1559, and eventually became cosmographer to the Duke of Jülich and Cleve. He invented the Mercator system of projection. His chief works are "Tabulae geographicæ" (1578-84) and "Atlas" (1595).

Mercedes (mēr-thā'tiēs), or Soriano (sō-rē-ā'nō). A town in Uruguay, situated on the Rio Negro 20 miles above its junction with the Uruguay. Population, about 9,000.

Mercedes of Castile. A novel by Cooper, published in 1840.

Mercedonius (mēr-se-dō'ni-us), or Mercedinus (mēr-sē-dī'nus). In the Roman calendar commonly ascribed to Numa Pompilius, second king of Rome, an intercalary month inserted every second year between the 23d and the 24th of February, and having 22 or 23 days.

Mercedonius, Charles Fenton. Born at Fredericksburg, Va., June 6, 1778: died near Alexandria, Va., May 4, 1858. An American politician, Federalist and Whig member of Congress from Virginia 1817-39.

Mercedonius, Hugh. Born in Scotland about 1721: died near Princeton, N. J., Jan. 12, 1777. An American general. He served in the French and Indian war; was distinguished at Trenton 1776; and was mortally wounded at Princeton 1777.

Merchant of Bruges, The. An alteration, by Kinnaird, of "The Beggar's Bush" by Fletcher and others, produced in 1815, Kean taking the part of Flores.

Merchant of Venice, The. A comedy by Shakspeare, entered on the "Stationers' Register" in 1598, published in quarto in 1600, 1637, 1652. See Jew of Malta, and Barlaam and Josaphat.

There can be no doubt that the play was new in 1598. The two stories interwoven by it are mediæval myths; the germ of each is in Latin in the collection of the "Gesta Romanorum," and the story of the Jew was developed in the direction of Shakspeare's play as the "Adventures of Giannetto" in a collection of Italian tales called the "Pecorone," produced in 1375 by one of the imitators of Boccaccio's "Decameron," Ser Giovanni Fiorentino. This is an Italian collection of which there is no known translation into English that could have been seen by Shakspeare. In 1579, in his pamphlet against the stage as "The School of Abuse," Stephen Gosson referred to a play known as "The Jew," which set forth "the greediness of worldly choosers, and the bloody minds of usurers." So it may be that a previous play, now lost, had interwoven the tales of the caskets and the pound of flesh, and that the transmitting power of Shakspeare's genius was exercised upon this.

Mortley, English Writers, X. 238.

[Poor versions and adaptations of "The Merchant of Venice" were made by Dryden, Otway, Shadwell, Lansdowne, and others, which held the stage until 1741, when Macklin restored Shakspeare. See Shylock.]

Merchant's Tale, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." It is the story of the deception of an old husband by a young wife with the friendly assistance of an enchanted tree. The original is Eastern; an account of the Indo-Persian, Turkish, Arabian, Singhaese, and other versions of it is given in the Chaucer Society's "Originals and Analogues." The Latin versions are Boccaccio's and Caxton's; the immediate source of Chaucer's version, however, is thought to be the Latin fable of Adolphe (about 1315). Pope modernized it as "January and May."

Mercia (mēr'shiā). [ML., from AS. Mierce, Myrc, Mercc, pl., the people, Mierca land or rice, the land of the Mercians, from meare, mark, border.] An ancient Anglian kingdom in the interior of England, which lay south of Northumbria and north of Wessex, and reached westward to the Welsh "Mark." It was founded probably in the second half of the 6th century; was flourishing under Penda and his successors in the 7th century; attained the overlordship under Ethelbald and Offa in the 8th century; passed under the supremacy of Wessex about 827; and later was one of the great kingdoms until the Norman conquest.

Mercié (mer-syá'), Marius Jean Antoine. Born at Toulouse, Oct. 30, 1845. A French sculptor, a pupil of Falguière and Joffroy. He gained the prix de Rome in 1868. Among his works are the statue of "David" (1872), "Dalila" (1872; a bust in bronze), "Gloria victis" (1874; bought by the state and placed in the Square Montholon), "Le loup, la mère et l'enfant" (1875; a bas-relief), "David avant le combat" and "Fleur de Mai" (1876), "Le génie des arts" (1877; for the Guichet des Tuileries), tomb of Michelet at Père-la-Chaise (1879), and "Judith" (1881; a portrait).

Mercier (mer-syá'), Louis Sébastien. Born at Paris, June 6, 1740; died at Paris, April 25, 1814. A French littérateur and politician.

Mercier, Philip. Born at Berlin, 1689; died at London, July 18, 1760. An English portrait-painter. He was a pupil of Antoine Pesne at Berlin; went to London 1716; and was appointed court painter and librarian in 1727. He was a clever painter in the style of Watteau. His portrait of Peg Woffington is in the Garrick Club.

Merciless Parliament, The. An English parliament of 1388; so named on account of the cruelty exercised by it toward the adherents of Richard II.

Merck (merk), Johann Heinrich. Born at Darmstadt, Germany, April 11, 1741; committed suicide, June 27, 1791. A German literary critic and author, a friend of Herder and Goethe. He exercised great influence upon the life of the latter.

Mercurius Aulicus (mêr-kû'ri-us â-lîsh'i-us). A journal in the Royalist interest which was written and published by Sir John Birkenhead at Oxford while the king and court were there. The first number was issued in Jan., 1642, and it appeared continuously till 1645, after which it was issued occasionally as a weekly. It has never been reprinted or edited. Birkenhead received very little help from others. In literary quality it is far superior to the "Mercurius Britannicus." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Mercury (mêr'kû-ri). [L. Mercurius, Mercury (the deity and the planet); so called (apparently) as the god of trade, from merx, merchandise.] 1. In Roman mythology, the name of a Roman divinity who became identified with the Greek Hermes. He was the son of Jupiter and Maia, and was the herald and ambassador of Jupiter. As a god of darkness, Mercury is the tutelary deity of thieves and tricksters; he became also the protector of herdsmen, the god of science, commerce, and the arts and graces of life, and the patron of travelers and athletes. It was he who guided the shades of the dead to their final abiding-place. He is represented in art as a young man, usually wearing a winged hat and the talia or winged sandals, and bearing the caduceus or pastoral staff, and often a purse.

2. The innermost planet of the solar system. Its mean distance from the sun is 0.387 that of the earth. The inclination (7 degrees) and the eccentricity (0.2056) of its orbit are exceeded only by some of the minor planets. Its diameter is only 3,000 miles, or about 1/4 that of the earth; its volume is to that of the earth as 1 to 13.5. It performs its sidereal revolution in 88 days, its synodical in 116. Its proximity to the sun prevents its being often seen with the naked eye. The mass of Mercury, though as yet not very precisely determined, is less than that of any other planet (asteroids excepted). According to Schiaparelli it rotates on its axis in the same way as the moon does, once in each orbital revolution.

Mercury, Belvedere. A Greek statue of the period of full development of Hellenic sculpture, in the Vatican, Rome. The statue is undraped except for a himation wound about the left arm and shoulder.

Mercury Fastening his Sandal. An antique marble statue, undraped, in the Glyptothek at Munich.

Mercutio (mêr-kû'shiô). In Shakspere's "Romeo and Juliet," the friend of Romeo. He is endowed with courage, an easy mind, wit, fancy, and a light heart.

Mercurio is, I think, one of the best instances of such a comic person as may reasonably and with propriety be admitted into tragedy.

Scott, Life of Dryden (Vol. I. of Works), p. 193.

Mercy (mêr'si). In Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," the friend and companion of Christiana.

Mercy (mêr-sê'), Claudius Florimond, Count. Born in Lorraine, 1666; killed near Parma, Italy, June 29, 1733. An Austrian field-marshal. He served in Italy in 1706, at Peterwarden in 1716, and at Temesvár in 1717. In 1720 he became governor of Temesvár, and in 1733 was appointed commander in Italy.

Mercy, Baron Franz von. Killed at the battle of Nördlingen, Aug. 3, 1645. A Bavarian field-marshal in the imperial service. He defeated Turenne at Mergentheim May 5, 1645.

Mer de Glace (mâr dê glâs). [F., 'sea of ice.] A glacier on the northern slope of Mont Blanc, above the valley of Chamonix. The Arveyron conveys its waters to the Arve.

Mère coupable, La, ou L'Autre Tartufe. A comedy by Beaumarchais, played in 1792; a sequel to the "Barbier de Séville" and "Mariage de Figaro."

Meredith (mêr'e-dith), George. Born in Hampshire, England, about 1828. An English novelist and poet. He was educated in Germany, and studied law, but gave it up for literature. Among his works are "Poema" (1851), "The Shaving of Shagpat," a burlesque tale (1856), "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," a novel (1859), "Modern Love, etc.," poems (1862), "Rhoda Fleming," a story (1865), "Victoria," a novel (1866), "Ileachanup's Career" (1875), "The Iagoist, a Comedy in Narrative" (1879), "The Tragic Comedians, etc." (1880), "Poems" (1883), "Dianna of the Crossways" (1885), "Ballads, etc." (1887), "A Reading of Earth," a poem (1888), "One of our Conquerors," published in the "Fortnightly Review" (1890).

Meredith, Owen. The pseudonym of the first Earl of Lytton.

Meres (mêrz), Francis. Born in Lincolnshire, 1565; died at Wing, Rutland, Jan. 29, 1647. An English divine and author. He was a graduate of Cambridge (Pembroke College), became rector of Wing in 1602, and kept a school there. Among his works is "Paladis Tania, Wits Treasury"; being the second part of Wits Commonwealth" (1598), one of a series of volumes of collected apothegms, etc.

Meres passes in review all literary effort from the time of Chaucer to his own day, briefly contrasting each English author with a writer of like character in Latin, Greek, or Italian. In other sections, on "Books," "Reading of Books," "Philosophic," "Poets and Poetrie," he makes casual references to contemporary English authors, and in his section on "Painting" and "Music" he supplies a few comments on contemporary English painters and musicians. He thus commemorates in all 125 Englishmen; and his list of Shakespeare's works, with his commendation of the great dramatist's "loose filed phrase," and his account of Marlowe's death are loci classici in English literary history. The work was reissued in 1634 as "Wits Commonwealth, the second part: A Treasure of Divine, Moral, and Philosophical Similes, generally useful, but more particularly for the use of schools." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Mergentheim (mêr'gent-hîm), formerly Marienthal (mâ-rê-en-tâl). A town in the Jagst circle, Württemberg, situated on the Tauber 56 miles northeast of Stuttgart. It was the seat of the grand master of the Teutonic Order from 1527 to 1839. Here, May 5, 1645, the Imperialists under Mercy defeated the French under Turenne. Population (1890), 4,397.

Mergui (mêr-gé'). 1. A maritime district in the division of Tenasserim, British Burma, intersected by lat. 12° N. Area, 7,810 square miles. Population (1881), 56,559.—2. The capital of Mergui district and a seaport, situated on an island at the mouth of the Tenasserim, in lat. 12° 27' N., long. 98° 35' E. Population, about 10,000.

Mergui Archipelago. A group of islands west of the southern part of British Burma, to which they belong.

Merian (mâ'rê-ân), Maria Sibylla (Frau Graf). Born at Frankfurt, Germany, April 2, 1647; died at Amsterdam, Jan. 13, 1717. A German naturalist and artist. In 1665 she married a Nuremberg artist named Graf, but she is generally known as Madame Merian. Her best-known work is on the metamorphoses of insects of Surinam, the result of a visit to that country 1699-1701. It was first published in Latin, 1705, and republished in French after her death, together with a similar work on the insects of Europe. The large plates illustrating these books are among the best of early zoological drawings, and the accompanying observations are generally very accurate.

Merian, Matthäus, surnamed "The Elder." Born at Basel, Switzerland, 1593; died at Schwabach, June 19, 1650. A Swiss engraver.

Merian, Matthäus, surnamed "The Younger." Born at Basel, Switzerland, 1621; died at Frankfurt, 1687. A Swiss portrait-painter, son of M. Merian (1593-1650).

Meribah (mêr'i-bâ). [Heb., 'strife,'] In Old Testament geography, the name of two places in the wilderness south of Palestine, noted in the history of Moses.

There are a few palm-trees and a little water, but the name of these pools is characteristic, for they were called the waters of Meriba, that is 'of strife,' on account of the incessant fights which took place there between the Bedouins when they came to let their flocks drink of them.

Kenan, Hist. of the People of Israel, I. 154.

Mérida (mêr'ê-thâ). A town in the province of Badajoz, Spain, situated on the Guadiana 30 miles east of Badajoz; the Roman Emerita Augusta. It is noted for many relics of antiquity, including a Roman bridge (built by Trajan, consisting of 81 arches, and 2,675 feet in length), a ruined castle, the Roman arch of Santiago, an aqueduct, the Circus Maximus, an amphitheater, and a theater. There are Roman reservoirs in the vicinity. A very old church and museum of antiquities are also noteworthy. Mérida was founded about 25 B. C., and was the ancient capital of Lusitania. It was taken by the Arabs about 712, and retaken by the Spaniards about 1230. Population (1887), 10,063.

Mérida. A colonial intendencia of New Spain, or Mexico, founded in 1786, and continued until the independence. It corresponded to the older province of Yucatan, and to the modern states of Yucatan, Campeche, and Tabasco.

Mérida. A city in Venezuela, capital of the state of Los Andes, situated about lat. 8° 16'

N., long. 71° 10' W. It was founded in 1558. Population (estimated, 1888), 12,018.

Mérida. The capital of the state of Yucatan, Mexico, situated about lat. 20° 58' N., long. 89° 40' W. It was founded in 1542 on the site of a Maya town; has flourishing manufactures and trade; and has a cathedral and many educational institutions. Population (1889), 53,000.

Meriden (mêr'i-den). A city in New Haven County, Connecticut, 18 miles north-northeast of New Haven. It is the seat of flourishing manufactures, and is especially noted for Britannia-metal wares. Population (1890), 21,652.

Meridian (mê-rid'i-an). A city, capital of Lauderdale County, eastern Mississippi, 86 miles east of Jackson. Population (1890), 10,624.

Mérimée (mâ-rê-mâ'), Prosper. Born at Paris, Sept. 28, 1803; died at Cannes, Sept. 23, 1870. A French author, archaeologist, historian, and literary critic. After spending some time in the study of law, he entered public life, and rose finally to the dignity of senator under the empire (1853). His achievements, however, in this line of life were surpassed by his success in literature. He first published two apocryphal works, "Théâtre de Clara Gazul" (1825) and "La Guzla" (1827). He gave further evidence of his talent in "La Jacquerie" (1828) and "La famille Carvajal." He wrote a novel, "Chronique du temps de Charles IX." (1829), which testified to careful historical preparation; and in 1830 he published "Colomba," his masterpiece, which deals with the Corsican vendettas. From 1835 to 1843 Mérimée published a number of works describing his travels in France. As a historian he wrote an "Essai sur la guerre sociale" (1841), "Histoire de Don Pédre" (1843), "La conjuration de Catilina" (1844), and "Les faux Démetrius" (1852). He appears as a translator from the Russian of stories by Pushkin, Turgenieff, and Gogol. In 1855 he edited the works of Brantôme and Agrippa d'Aubigné. He wrote frequently for "La Revue de Paris," "La Revue des Deux Mondes," and "Le Moniteur." These articles and other papers by Mérimée have appeared in book form, as, for instance, "Mélanges historiques et littéraires" (1855), "Nouvelles," "Dernières Nouvelles" (1873), "Portraits historiques et littéraires" (1874), "Etudes sur les arts au moyen âge" (1874). Another posthumous publication is "Lettres à une inconnue" (1873); who this "Inconnue" was has not yet been determined. Mérimée was elected a member of the French Academy in 1844.

Merino (mâ-rê-nô), Ignacio. Born at Piura, 1819. A Peruvian painter. He was principal of the Academy of Design at Lima 1841-50, and in 1851 took up his residence at Paris. Among his best-known works are "Columbus and the Council of the Indies," purchased by the Peruvian government, and "Hamlet," exhibited at the exposition of 1872.

Merioneth (mêr-i-on'eth). A county of North Wales. Capital, Dolgelly. It is bounded by Carnarvon and Denbigh on the north, Denbigh and Montgomery on the east, Montgomery on the south, and Cardigan Bay on the west. The surface is mountainous. Area, 669 square miles. Population (1891), 49,212.

Merivale (mêr'i-vâl), Charles. Born at Barton Place in Devonshire, 1808; died Dec. 27, 1893. An English historian and divine, brother of Herman Merivale. He graduated at Cambridge (St. John's College); was rector of Lawford, Essex, 1848-69; and became dean of Ely in 1869. His chief work is the "History of the Romans under the Empire" (1850-62). He also wrote "A General History of Rome" (1875), "Lectures on Early Church History" (1879), "Contrast between Christian and Pagan Society" (1880), a translation of the Iliad in rhimed verse, etc.

Merivale, Herman. Born at Dawlish, Devonshire, Nov. 8, 1806; died at London, Feb. 9, 1874. An English lawyer, author, and politician, brother of Charles Merivale. He was professor of political economy at Oxford 1837-42; assistant under-secretary of state for the colonies in 1847, and under-secretary 1848-59; and under-secretary for India 1859-74. He wrote "Historical Studies" (1865), etc.

Merivale, John Herman. Born at Exeter, Aug. 5, 1779; died April 25, 1844. An English scholar and poet. He studied at St. John's College, Cambridge; entered Lincoln's Inn in 1798; and was called to the bar in 1804. In 1831 he was appointed commissioner in bankruptcy. In 1814 he published "Orlando in Roncesvalles"; a collection of his "Poems" appeared in 1833. Byron was his friend and admirer.

Merle d'Aubigné (mêr dô-bên-yâ'), Jean Henri. Born at Eaux-Vives, near Geneva, Aug. 16, 1794; died at Geneva, Oct. 20, 1872. A celebrated Swiss Protestant church historian, after 1830 professor of historical theology at the École de Théologie Évangélique at Geneva. He wrote "Histoire de la réformation" ("History of the Reformation," 1835-53), continued in "Histoire de la réformation au temps de Calvin" ("History of the Reformation in the Time of Calvin," 1863-76), etc.

Merlin (mêr'lin), or Myrddhin. A half-legendary bard of the 6th century, to whom a number of poems (none genuine) are attributed. In the course of time popular imagination and confusion with another of the same name made him the enchanter Merlin, but "more associated with fable than even Taliesin." The true history of Merlin seems to be that he was born between the years 470 and 480, during the invasion of the Saxons, and took the name of Ambrose, which preceded his surname of Merlin, from the successful leader of the Britons, Ambrosius Aurelianus, who was his first chief, and from whose service he passed, as bard, into that of King Arthur, the southern leader of the Britons. After he had been present in many battles, on one disastrous day between the years 560 and 574, in a field of horrible slaughter on the Solway Firth, he lost his reason, broke his sword, and forsook human society, finding peace and consolation only in his ministry. He was at last found dead on the bank of a river" (Merley, English Writers, I, 218). The enchanter Merlin of Arthurian romance also held the position of companion and counselor to Arthur, but his adventures and the manner of his death differ from the above. The romances state that he was of miraculous birth, was an adept in magic, and was beguiled by the enchantress Ninive or Ninive, who buried him under a rock from which he could not escape; also that his mistress, Vivien, the Lady of the Lake, left him spellbound in the tangled branches of a thorn-bush, where he still sleeps, though sometimes his voice is heard. Tennyson, in his "Idylls of the King," adopts nearly the latter version. Among other famous deeds Merlin instituted the Round Table at Camelot. He first appears in Nennius as Ambrosius. Geoffrey of Monmouth's "Vita Merlini" (1139-49) was translated by Wace into French verse (1155), and was probably adapted by Robert de Borron about 1160-70. About 1200 Hélic de Borron wrote the French prose romance of Merlin, which contained what are called Merlin's prophecies in the appendix. Robert de Borron's poem was translated into Italian in 1379, Spanish in 1408, and German in 1478. The English prose romance of Merlin (c. 1450-60) was taken from the French original attributed to Robert de Borron. It was printed by the Early English Text Society for the first time.

Merlin de Douai (mer-lañ' dè dô-â'), Comte Philippe Antoine. Born at Arleux, near Douai, France, Oct. 30, 1754; died at Paris, Dec. 26, 1838. A French jurist and revolutionary politician. He was a member of the National Assembly; went over to the radical party in 1792; was president of the Convention after the Reign of Terror; was later minister of justice; and on the revolution of the 18th Fructidor became a member of the Directory.

Merlin de Thionville (tyôn-vêl'), Antoine Christophe. Born at Thionville, Lorraine, Sept. 13, 1762; died at Paris, Sept. 14, 1833. A French revolutionist, a member of the Legislative Assembly 1791-92, and of the Convention 1792-95.

Mermaid Club, The. A celebrated club said to have been established by Sir Walter Raleigh in 1603. It met at the Mermaid Tavern. Jonson, Beaumont, Fletcher, Selden, and probably Shakspeare were among its members.

This famous Club was held at the Mermaid Tavern, which was long said to have stood in Friday-street, Cheap-side; but Ben Jonson has, in his own verse, settled it in Bread-street:

"At Bread-street Mermaid having dined and merry, Proposed to go to Holborn in a wherry." Gifford.

Mr. Burn in the Beaufoy Catalogue also explains: "The Mermaid in Bread-street, the Mermaid in Friday-street, and the Mermaid in Cheap were all one and the same. The tavern, situated behind, had a way to it from these thoroughfares, but was nearer to Bread-street than Friday-street." . . . Fuller has described the wit-combats between Shakspeare and Ben Jonson "which he beheld," meaning with his mind's eye, for he was only eight years of age when Shakspeare died. . . . But we have a noble record left of the wit-combats in the celebrated epistle of Beaumont to Jonson. Timbs, Clubs, pp. 7-8.

Mermaid Tavern, The. See Mermaid Club.
Mermnadæ (mèrm'na-dè). The last dynasty of the Lydian kings, beginning with Gyges (about 700 B. C.) and ending with Croesus (560-546). Besides these kings it included Ardyss, Sadyattes, and Alyattes.

Merodach (mer'ô-dak). [In the inscriptions Marduk.] One of the 12 great gods of the Assyro-Babylonian pantheon, son of Ea. His wife was Zarpatit. He was especially the tutelary divinity of the city of Babylon, and during the supremacy of Babylonia his temple, Esagila (the exalted house), restored with great splendor by Nebuchadnezzar, became the national sanctuary of the whole empire. He also had an old and famous sanctuary at Sippar. He was especially considered the compassionate god of mankind, relieving their ills with the knowledge and power his father, the god of profound wisdom, gave him. He was also the patron of the magi. His son is Nebo (Nabu), the god of learning. Of the planets, Jupiter was sacred to him. He is mentioned in Jer. I, 2, but is referred to as Bel in Isa. xlvi. 1 and Jer. li. 44.

Merodach-baladan (mer'ô-dak-bal'a-dan). [In the cuneiform inscriptions Marduk-bal-iddina. Merodach has given the son.] The name of several kings of Babylon. The most important of these appears first as the ruler of Bit Yakin. He submitted and paid tribute to the Assyrian king Tiglath-Pileser III. (745-727 B. C.). From 722 to 709 he appears in the inscriptions as king of entire Babylonia. Afterward he entered into alliance with the Elamites against Sargon. The allies were defeated by the Assyrian king, and Merodach-baladan saved himself only by flight. He reappears in the first year of Sennacherib (705), and is, in all probability, identical with the Merodach-baladan mentioned in Isa. xxxix. 2 Ki. xx. 12 ff. (under the form Berodach-baladan) as having sent ambassadors to Hezekiah to congratulate him upon his recovery from sickness. This embassy was also, no doubt, intended to draw Hezekiah into an alliance against Assyria. He was defeated by Sennacherib, who placed a certain Belshazzar on the Babylonian throne (702-699). In 699 Merodach-baladan is again found in rebellion against Assyria, and, again defeated, he escapes to Elam. He must have died shortly afterward, but his descendants continued to stir up rebellions in Babylonia against Assyria. The last scion of this house, when about to be delivered to a Sarranipal, caused his armor-bearer to slay him.

Meroré (mer'ô-è). [Gr. Μερόνη.] In ancient geography, the capital of the later kingdom of Ethiopia, situated between the Nile and the Atbara, about lat. 17° N.

Merom (mè'rom), Waters of. A lake in Palestine, 10½ miles north of the Sea of Galilee, traversed by the Jordan; the modern Bahr-el-Huleh, and the Semechonitis Lake of Josephus. Length, 4 miles. It was the scene of a great victory of Joshua over Jabin, king of Hazor.

Meropé (mer'ô-pè). [Gr. Μερόπη.] 1. In Greek mythology, one of the Pleiades (which see).—2. The 4½-magnitude star 23 Pleiadum. It is enveloped in a nebulosity which was discovered before the application of photography, but is difficult to observe visually.

Méropé (mâ-rôp'). A play by Voltaire (1743).
Merovingians (mer-ô-vin'ji-anz). A dynasty of Frankish kings, whose eponymic ancestor, Merwig or Merovæus, lived in the 5th century. It rose to power under Clovis, king of the Salian Franks, who defeated the Roman governor Syagrius in 486, accepted the Roman faith in 496, and died in 511, after having made himself sole ruler of all the Franks. His kingdom was divided between his four sons, one of whom, Clotaire I., reunited the several parts in 558. A second division of the Frankish kingdom took place among the Merovingians on his death in 561. This was also a quadruple division. In 567 the parts were reduced to three in number, whence arose the kingdoms of Austrasia (capital Metz), Neustria (capital Soissons), and Burgundy (capital Orléans), of which the first contained a German, the last two a Romance population. Burgundy was eventually united with Neustria, leaving two principal divisions, Neustria and Austrasia. Violent family feuds, as, for instance, that between Brunehilde of Austrasia and Fredegunde of Neustria in the 6th century, caused the power of the Merovingians to wane, both in Neustria and in Austrasia, before that of the mayors of the palace, until in 687 Pepin of Herstal, mayor of the palace in Austrasia, made himself practically ruler of both kingdoms. His grandson, Pepin the Short, finally deposed the Merovingians and caused himself to be crowned king of the Franks in 751.

Merowig (mer'ô-wig), or Merwig (mèr'wig). [L. Merovæus.] An alleged chief or king of a part of the Salian Franks, and grandfather of Clovis. Some suppose Merowig or Meroveus to have been the patronymic of the family or clan of Clovis, derived from a more remote ancestor.

Merrick (mer'ik), James. Born at Reading, England, 1720; died there, 1769. An English poet. He wrote sacred poems, and the "Chameleleon."

Merrifield (mer'i-fêld), Charles Watkins. Born at London or Brighton, Oct. 20, 1827; died at Brighton, Jan. 1, 1884. An English mathematician. About 1867 he became principal of the Royal School of Naval Architecture and Marine Engineering at South Kensington. Among his works are "Miscellaneous Memoirs on Pure Mathematics" (1861), and "Technical Arithmetic" (1872). He contributed numerous papers to the "Transactions of the Institution of Naval Architects."
Merrilies (mer'i-lêz), Meg. In Sir Walter Scott's novel "Gny Mannering," a weird and masculine gipsy who is devoted to Bertram's family. She remonstrates in vain against the theft of Harry Bertram, and on his return helps him to his own at the cost of her life. Charlotte Cushman was noted in this part in the dramatization of the novel.

Merrimac, or Merrimack (mer'i-mak). A river in New Hampshire and northeastern Massachusetts. It is formed by the junction of the Pemigewasset and Winnepisogee at Franklin, New Hampshire, and flows into the Atlantic 4 miles east of Newburyport. It furnishes water-power to Manchester, Nashua, Lowell, Lawrence, etc. Length, about 120 miles (including the Pemigewasset, about 90 miles).

Merrimac. A 40-gun screw frigate built for the United States government in 1855. On April 19, 1861, the Norfolk navy-yard was abandoned by the Federal government, and the ships there, including the Merrimac, were sunk. The hull was raised by the Confederates and cut down to the berth-deck. On the midship section a casemate of timber 170 feet long was built, protected by a double iron plating 4 inches thick. The prow was of cast-iron. She was named the Virginia, and was commanded by Commodore Franklin Buchanan. On March 8, 1862, she destroyed the Congress (a sailing ship of 50 guns) and the Cumberland (a sailing ship of 30 guns) at Newport News. On March 9 she attacked the Minnesota, and was met by the Monitor, which had arrived the night before. The battle lasted from 5 A. M. until noon, and resulted in favor of the Monitor. See Monitor.

Merry (mer'i), Felix. A pseudonym of Evert Augustus Duyckinck.

Merry, Robert. Born at London, April, 1755; died at Baltimore, Md., Dec. 14, 1798. An English dilettante. He became a member of the English Della Cruscan Academy at Florence, and his pseudonym "Della Cruscan" gave its name to the school. His affected and tasteless style is exhibited in the correspondence with "Anna Matilda," which continued in the "World" till 1789, when the writers met and were disenchanted. (See Anna Matilda.) The best and worst poems were collected in the "British Album" in 1789. Gifford's "Baviard," a satire on it, sold a fourth edition of this in 1791.

Merry Dancers. A name given to the aurora.

The meteoric rays which have given the name of the "Merry Dancers" to the flickering Northern Lights.

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 71.

Merry Devil of Edmonton, The. A comedy acted by the King's Men at the Globe before Oct. 22, 1607. Fleay believes from internal evidence that this play was originally called "Sir John Oldcastle," and was written by Drayton for the Chamberlain's Men before Dec., 1597. A prose tract, "The Life and Death of the Merry Devil of Edmonton, etc.," was entered on the "Stationers' Register" in 1608 by "T. B." (Thomas Brewer). The popularity of the comedy probably suggested this tract, which does not cover quite the same ground. The latter has, however, been ascribed to Tony (Anthony) Brewer on the strength of the initials in the above entry, the tract having been confounded with the play. (Eulens.) The play has also been ascribed without reason to Shakspeare, on the authority of Kirkman the bookseller.

Merrygreek, or Merigreek (mer'i-grèk), Matthew. In Udall's play "Ralph Roister Doister," a parasite and mischievous boon companion of Ralph. He adroitly gets his own way by flattery and abuse.

Merry Monarch, The. Charles II. of England.
Merrymount (mer'i-mount). A settlement within the present city of Quincy, Massachusetts, made by Thomas Morton and others in 1625. The Pilgrims of Plymouth dispersed it in 1628, and it was again dispersed a few years later.

Merry Wives of Windsor, The. A comedy by Shakspeare, produced about 1600. It was first printed as we know it in the first folio, 1623. In 1692 an imperfect and probably unauthorized version in quarto was printed (reprinted in 1619). It seems to have been based on a mangled repetition stolen from the theater, or else was hurriedly written by command. Rowe in 1709 says, probably without foundation, that Queen Elizabeth was so pleased with the Falstaff of "Henry IV.," that she commanded Shakspeare to show how he conducted himself when in love. For the plot he was probably but little indebted to other writers. "The Two Lovers of Pisa" from Straparola, in Tarleton's "News Out of Purgatory" (1590), and a story from "Il Pecorone" of Ser Giovanni Fiorentino which suggests the hiding of Falstaff in the soiled linen, may possibly have suggested some of the incidents. John Dennis wrote a play, "The Comical Gallant, or the Amours of Sir John Falstaff," in 1702, in which "The Merry Wives" may be recognized; and an opera, "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor," by Otto Nicolai, words from Shakspeare by Mosenthal, was produced at Berlin in 1849, at London in 1864, and at Paris, as "Les joyeuses comères de Windsor," in 1866.

Mers (mèrs). A sea-bathing resort, a suburb of Le Tréport, France, northeast of Dieppe.

Merscheid (mer'shit). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, 17 miles north by east of Cologne. Population (1890), 8,542; commune, 15,600. Since 1891 called Ohlig.

Merse (mèrs), The. The lower valley of the Tweed, Scotland.

Merseburg (mer'ze-bôrg). A town in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated on the Saale 16 miles west of Leipsic. Its chief buildings are the cathedral and the castle. It was formerly noted for its beer. It was one of the leading medieval German cities, the seat of a bishopric from the 10th to the 16th century, and of the dukes of Saxe-Merseburg from 1656 to 1738. Near it Henry the Fowler won an important victory over the Hungarians in 933. Population (1890), 17,669.

Mersenne (mer-sen'), Marin. Born at La Saulière, Maine, France, Sept. 8, 1588; died at Paris, Sept. 1, 1648. A noted French theologian, mathematician, and philosopher, a friend of Descartes. He discovered the laws which show the dependence of the time of vibration of a string upon its length, tension, and density—namely, that the time varies directly as the length and as the square root of the density, and inversely as the square root of the tension.

Mersey (mer'zi). A river in England. It is formed by the union of the Tame and Goyt near Stockport, and flows by an estuary into the Irish Sea below Liverpool. Length, 70 miles; navigable to the mouth of the Irwell.

Mertetefts (mer-te-tâfs'). See the extract.

The oldest historical portrait-stone yet discovered is that of Queen Mertetefts, wife of Seneferu, the last king of the Third Dynasty, and wife, by her second marriage, to Khufu, the first king of the Fourth Dynasty, who was no less famous a personage than the builder of the Great Pyramid. The statue is one of a limestone group of three figures, representing Queen Mertetefts, her Ks, and a priest named Kennu, who was her private secretary.

Eduards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 135.

Merthyr Tydfil, or Merthyr Tydfil (mèr'thèr tid'vil; W. pron. mèr'thèr tud'vil). [Said to have received its name from a martyred British saint Tydfil (merthylr = E. martyr.)] A town in Glamorganshire, South Wales, situated on the Taff in lat. 51° 45' N., long. 3° 23' W. Its importance is of modern growth. It is the center of an extensive coal region, and is noted for iron and steel manufactures. It returns 2 members to Parliament. Population (1891), 58,081.

Merton (mèr'ton), Ambrose. A pseudonym of W. J. Thoms, the editor of "Notes and Queries."

Merton, Lower. A village in Surrey, 10 miles southwest of London.

Merton (mèr'ton), Walter de. Died Oct. 27, 1277. Bishop of Rochester, and founder of Merton College, Oxford. He was educated at Oxford; in 1261 was appointed chancellor; and was elected bishop of Rochester in 1274. He originated the collegiate system of the English universities by the establishment in 1264 of Merton College, the "final statutes" of which date from Aug., 1274. The chapel of the college is marked by its large square pinnacled Perpendicular tower: its choir was built by the founder, and the remainder is of the early 15th century. The library, as well as the college, has the distinction of being the oldest in England. The picturesque inner quadrangle is Jacobean. The Meadow front of the buildings, with their long range of gables, is characteristic.

This system (which has been beneficial in its effects down to our own time, for many of our most distinguished scholars entered the university as sizars) was part of the deliberate purpose that animated the design of Walter de Merton, who may be called the founder of the whole collegiate system. He sought to attract the most capable men of all classes, and so to raise up secular schools which should check the influence of the monasteries, and through them of the pope. Clark, Cambridge, p. 36.

Meru (mer'ö). In Hindu mythology, the central mountain of the earth, of prodigious size and precious material, having on its summit the abode of the gods.

Merv (merv), or Merve. An oasis in Russian central Asia, lying along the river Murgab about lat. 37° 30' N., long. 62° E. Its inhabitants are Tekke-Turkomans. From its strategic and commercial position between Persia, Bokhara, and Herat it has been important from remote times. It formerly contained Merv and other cities. It was conquered by Alexander, and belonged successively to the Parthians, Sarmatians, and Seljuks. It was ravaged by the Mongols in 1221. Later it belonged in turn to Uzbeks, Persians, and Bokharans. The Russians overran and annexed it in 1853-54. It is now traversed by the Transcaspian Railway. Population, about 250,000. The locality now called Merv is merely a large village.

Merveilleuse (mer-vä-yèz'). [F., 'marvelous.'] The sword of Doolin of Mayence.

Merville (mer-vèl'). A town in the department of Nord, France, situated on the Lys 18 miles west of Lille. Population (1891), 65,000. Méru, 7,573.

Méry (mā-ré'), Joseph. Born near Marseilles, Jan. 21, 1798; died at Paris, June 17, 1866. A French littérateur. Among his numerous works are novels, books of travel, plays, and poems. Conjointly with Barthélemy he wrote satirical verses.

Méryon (mā-ryôn'), Charles. Born at Paris in 1821; died at Charenton, near Paris, in 1868. A French etcher and engraver. Among his works are "Le pont du change," "La vieille morgue," "Le petit pont," "La rue de la Fironette," etc.

Merzig (mert'sig). A small town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, situated on the Saar 20 miles south by east of Treves.

Mesa. See Mesha.

Mesartim (mē-sär'tim). [Deriv. uncertain.] A commonly used name for the 4½-magnitude double star γ Arietis.

Mescal (mes-kä'lä), or Mexcala (mäs-kä'lä), or Mercala (mer-kä'lä), or Riodelas Balsas (ré'ö dä läs bäl'säs). A river in Mexico which flows into the Pacific between the states of Michoacan and Guerrero. Length, 500 miles.

Mescalero (mez'ka-lä-rö). ['Eaters of the mes-cal.'] A tribe of the Apache group of North American Indians, north of San Carlos agency in 1883. See Apaches.

Meschede (mesh'ä-de). A small town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, 10 miles east-southeast of Arnsberg.

Mescua (mes'kü-ä), Antonio Mirade. See the extract.

Contemporary with these events and discussions lived Antonio Mira de Mescua, well known from 1602 to 1635 as a writer for the stage, and much praised by Cervantes and Lope de Vega. He was a native of Guadix in the kingdom of Granada, and in his youth became archdeacon of its cathedral; but in 1610 he was at Naples, attached to the poetical court of the Count de Lemos, and in 1620 he gained a prize in Madrid, where he died in 1635 while in the office of chaplain to Philip the Fourth. He wrote secular plays, autos, and lyrical poetry. Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 329.

Mesembria. See Misivri.

Meseritz (mä'ze-rits). A town in the province of Posen, Prussia, situated on the Obra 55 miles west of Posen. Population (1885), 5,783.

Mesha (mē'shä) or Mesa (mē'zä). [Heb., 'help,' 'deliverance.'] A king of Moab about 850 B. C. He is mentioned in 2 Ki. iii. as having been subject to the kings of Israel, but after Ahab's death he fell away. Hecubaon Joram, king of Israel, in alliance with Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, undertook an expedition against him, and shut him up in Kir-Hareseth, situated a little to the east of the southern end of the Dead Sea. In this emergency Mesha sacrificed his first-born son to Chemosh. The Israelites thereupon departed to their land. In 1868 a stele was discovered near Dibon, the ancient capital of Moab, on which Mesha had recorded this event. It is written in the Moabite dialect, which only slightly differs from Hebrew, with the ancient Hebrew character, the so-called Samaritan or Phœnician, and is the oldest Semitic monument known. The stone, badly damaged, is now in the Louvre at Paris. See Moabite Stone.

Mesha. See Mash.

Meshech. See Muski.

Meshhed (mesh'hed), or Meshed (mesh'ed), or Mashhad (mäh'häd). The capital of the province of Khorasan, Persia, situated about lat. 36° 18' N., long. 59° 35' E. It is a commercial center, and a noted place of pilgrimage. The mosque contains the Shiite shrine of the Imam Riza. Population, estimated, 60,000.

Meshhed-Ali (mesh'hed ä'lä). A town in the vilayet of Bagdad, Asiatic Turkey, 97 miles south of Bagdad. It is a Shiite place of pilgrimage, on account of the mosque containing the shrine of Ali. Population, estimated, about 12,000.

Meshhed-Hussein. See Kerbela.

Meshtseraks (mesh-tse-räks'). A people of Finnish origin, living in eastern Russia. They are in part Russianized, in part (about 125,000) allied to the Bashkirs in language and religion.

Meshtshovsk (mesh-chofsk'). A town in the government of Kaluga, Russia, 42 miles west-southwest of Kaluga. Population (1885-89), 5,129.

Mesilla (mā-sel'yä). [Sp., 'little mesa.'] A town in southern New Mexico, on the Rio Grande, founded about 1830.

Mesmer (mes'mer), Friedrich Anton. Born near Constance, Baden, May 23, 1733; died at Meersburg, Baden, March 5, 1815. A German physician, originator of the theory of mesmerism or animal magnetism. He studied divinity at Dillingen and Ingolstadt, but afterward studied medicine at Vienna, where he took his degree in 1766. He began about 1771 an investigation into the supposed curative powers of the magnet, which led him to adopt the theory of animal magnetism. This he made public in 1775 in a pamphlet entitled "Sendschreiben an einen auswärtigen Arzt über die Magnetkur." In 1778 he settled at Paris, where he created a sensation as a practitioner of mesmerism. In 1785 the French government appointed a commission of eminent physicians and scientists to investigate his system. An adverse report followed, and he fell into disrepute and spent his last years at Meersburg.

Mesocco. See Misocco.

Mesolonghi. See Missolonghi.

Mesopotamia (mes'ö-pö-tä'mi-ä). [Gr. Μεσοποταμία, the land between the rivers.] The great plain between the Euphrates and Tigris; in the Old Testament called Aram Naharain. It is usually divided into Upper Mesopotamia, covering ancient Assyria, and Lower Mesopotamia, comprising ancient Chaldea and Babylonia. It was conquered by Thothmes III, Seti I., Rameses II., and other Egyptian monarchs, and has belonged at different times to the Median, Persian, Macedonian, Syrian, Parthian, Roman, New Persian, Sarmatic, and Turkish empires, and is now a Turkish province with Bagdad as capital. See also Aram and Babylon.

Mesopotamia, The Argentine. [Sp. Mesopotamia Argentina.] A name frequently given to that portion of the Argentine Republic which lies between the rivers Paraná and Uruguay. It includes the provinces of Entre Rios and Corrientes and the territory of Misiones.

Mesrob (mes-rob'), or Miesrob (myes-rob'). Lived in the 5th century A. D. A patriarch of Armenia, a reputed founder of Armenian literature, who devised the Armenian alphabet of 36 letters, to which after his time two more were added, and the Georgian alphabet of 39 or 40 letters, still in use.

Messala (me-sä'lä), or Messalla (me-sal'lä), Corvinus Marcus Valerius. Lived in the second half of the 1st century B. C. A Roman general, official, orator, historian, and patron of literature.

Messalina, or Messallina (mes-a-lä'nä), Valeria. Executed 48 A. D. Wife of the emperor Claudius. She was the daughter of Marcus Valerius Messala Barbatas, and became the third wife of Claudius, who afterward ascended the imperial throne. She was a woman of infamous vices, and during a temporary absence of her husband publicly married her favorite, C. Silius. She was put to death by order of Claudius.

Messana (me-sä'nä). An ancient name of Messina.

Messapia (me-sä'pi-ä). [Gr. Μεσσηπία.] In ancient geography, the peninsula at the southeastern extremity of Italy; often used as synonymous with Calabria or Lapygia.

Messene (me-sē'nē). [Gr. Μεσσηνία.] 1. In ancient geography, a city in Messenia, Greece, on the slope of Mt. Ithome in lat. 37° 11' N., long. 21° 56' E. It was founded as a fortress against Sparta, under the influence of Epaminondas, in 369 B. C., and is noted now for its extensive ruins at the modern village of Navromati. 2. An ancient name of Messina.

Messenger (mes'en-jēr). A gray thoroughbred horse, by Mambrino, which was imported into the United States from England about 1788. All the main lines of trotting-horses except the Morgans and Clays are derived from him. The Hambletonians trace directly to him by way of Hambletonian (10), Abdallah, and Mambrino.

Messenia (me-sē'ni-ä). [Gr. Μεσσηνία.] 1. In ancient geography, a division of the Peloponnesus. It was bounded by Elis and Arcadia on the north, Laconia (separated by Mount Taygetus) on the east, and the sea on the south and west. It contained the fertile valley of the Pamisus; was early settled by Dorians; was at war with Sparta from about 743 to 724 B. C., and was subjugated; attempted unsuccessfully to shake off the Spartan yoke about 648-631; had its independence restored 369 B. C.; and was annexed to Rome about 146 B. C.

2. A nomarchy of modern Greece, corresponding generally to the ancient Messenia. Area, 1,221 square miles. Population (1889), 183,232.

Messenia, or Koron (kō'ron), Gulf of. An inlet of the Mediterranean, south and east of Messenia, Greece.

Messer (mes'ér), Asa. Born at Methuen, Mass., 1769; died at Providence, R. I., Oct. 11, 1836. An American educator, president of Brown University 1802-27.

Messiah (me-si'ä). [Heb., 'anointed'; Gr. Μεσσίας.] A designation of Jesus as the Saviour of the world; the Hebrew equivalent of Christ, the Anointed; from prophetic passages in the Hebrew Scriptures (where, except in two instances in Daniel, it is translated Anointed, often as a noun) interpreted by Jesus and by Christians as referring to him and universal in scope, but regarded by the Jews as promising a divinely sent deliverer for their own race. This belief in a coming Messiah is still held as a doctrine by many Jews; and at various periods of the Christian era impostors have assumed the name and character, and have had many adherents. The title is also applied figuratively to historical characters who have been great deliverers. Sometimes written, after the Greek of the New Testament, Messias.

The connection of ideas in this prophecy is so clear, and it sets forth with so much completeness Isaiah's whole view of Jehovah's purpose towards Judah, that we may regard it as a typical example of what is usually called Messianic prediction. The name Messiah is never used in the Old Testament in that special sense which we are accustomed to associate with it. The Messiah (with the article and no other word in apposition) is not an Old Testament phrase at all, and the word Messiah (Mashiah), or "anointed one," in the connection "Jehovah's anointed one" is no theological term, but an ordinary title of the human king whom Jehovah has set over Israel. Thus the usual way in which the time of Israel's redemption and final glory is called the Messianic time is incorrect and misleading. So long as the Hebrew kingdom lasted, every king was "Jehovah's anointed," and it was only after the Jews lost their independence that the future restoration could be spoken of in contrast to the present as the days of the Messiah. To Isaiah the restoration of Israel is not the commencement but the continuation of that personal sovereignty of Jehovah over His people of which the Davidic king was the recognised representative. As the holy seed which re-peoples the land after the work of judgment is done is a fresh growth from the ancient stock of the nation (vi. 13), so too the new Davidic kingship is a fresh outgrowth of the old stem of Jesse. We are apt to think of the Messiah as an altogether new and miraculous dispensation. That was not Isaiah's view. The restoration of Jerusalem is a return to an old state of things, interrupted by national sin. W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, p. 302.

Messiah, The. 1. A sacred pastoral by Pope, published in the "Spectator" May 14, 1712.

Technically this is one of the most faultless of Pope's writings. . . . This poem is marked by the broken pause and by the use of alexandrines—features which he had hitherto eschewed. The Messiah is a dexterous cento of passages from Isaiah foretelling the advent of Christ. Wordsworth has attacked it with great severity, and it no longer holds its former popularity. Gosse, Eighteenth-Century Literature, p. 115.

2. An oratorio by Handel, composed in 1741 (first produced at Dublin in 1742). The words are by Charles Jennens from the Scriptures. Mozart composed additional accompaniments to it in 1789. Probably no musical composition has created such lasting and deep enthusiasm.

Messias (The Messiah). An epic poem by Klopstock, in 20 cantos. The first 3 cantos were published in 1748 in the "Bremer Beiträge," but he did not finish it till 1773. The model before him was Milton's "Paradise Lost," but he did not profit sufficiently by his example. The poem suffers from excess of sentiment, and the lyric quality is more nearly related to the religious oratorios than to a genuine epic.

Messidor (mes-si-dör'). [F., from L. messis, harvest, and Gr. δῶρον, a gift.] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the tenth month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1 to 7 with June 19, and in 8 to 13 with June 20.

Messin, Pays (pä-è' me-sän'). An ancient district of eastern France, whose chief town was Metz. With Verdunois it formed one of the small governments of France prior to 1790.

Messina (mes-sē'nä). 1. A province in Sicily, Italy. Area, 1,246 square miles. Population (1891), 505,159.—2. The capital of the province of Messina, a seaport, situated on the Strait of Messina in lat. 38° 12' N., long. 15° 34' E.; the ancient Messana, and earlier Zanele. It has an excellent harbor and a fine situation; is the second commercial place in Sicily; and exports fruit, olive-oil, wine, silk, etc. It has a cathedral and a university. It was founded by Chalcidians and others, and received a colony of Messenians; was destroyed by the Carthaginians and rebuilt by Dionysius; came under the rule of the Mamertines in 282 B. C.; gave rise to the first Punic war and was annexed by Rome; passed successively to the Saracens, Normans, Hohenstaufen, and Spaniards; suffered from the strife between the French and Spaniards in 1672-78, from the plague in 1743, and from an earthquake in 1783; was bombarded in 1848; and was the last Sicilian stronghold of the Neapolitans against Garibaldi in 1860-61. Population (1881), 78,438.

Messina, Strait of. A strait in the Mediterranean, separating Sicily from the mainland of Italy; the ancient Fretum Siculum. Width in narrowest part, 2½ miles.

Messkirch (mes'kirch), or Mösskirch (mès'kirch). A small town in Baden, 24 miles north of Constance. Near it, May 5, 1800, the French under Moreau defeated the Austrians under Kray.

Meston (mes'ton), William. Born in Aberdeenshire about 1688; died at Aberdeen, 1745. A Scottish burlesque poet. He was educated at Marischal College, Aberdeen, of which he became a regent in 1715. His poems are mostly imitations of Butler's "Hudibras." Among them are "The Knight of the Kirk" (1723), "Mob contra Mob" (1731), "Old Mother Grim's Tales" (1737), etc.

Mestre (mes'tre). A town in the province of Venice, Italy, 6 miles northwest of Venice.

Mesurado (mes-ó-rá'dó), Cape. A headland on the coast of Liberia, Africa, situated in lat. 6° 19' N., long. 10° 50' W.

Mészáros (má'sá-rosh), Lázár. Born at Baja, Hungary, Feb. 20, 1796; died at Eywood, Herefordshire, England, Nov. 16, 1858. A Hungarian revolutionary general and politician. He was minister of war 1848-49, and succeeded Görgey as commander-in-chief in 1849.

Meta (má'tá). A small town in the province of Naples, Italy, east of Sorrento.

Meta. A river in Colombia and Venezuela, which joins the Orinoco about lat. 6° 15' N., long. 67° 45' W. Length, about 750 miles; navigable for about 400 miles.

Metamneh (me-tám'ná), or Metemneh (me-tem'ná). A place in Nubia, on the Nile, opposite Shendi, about lat. 16° 41' N. It was the objective point of Stewart's division of Wolsey's relief expedition in 1885.

Metamorphoses (met-a-mór'fó-séz). A poetical work by Ovid, based on the principal classical legends.

Metaphysical School of Poets, The. A name wrongly given by Dr. Johnson to Donne, Cowley, and other poets of the 17th century, who were noted for fantastic language and strained style.

Metaphysics (met-a-fíz'iks) of Aristotle. [From the Greek title τῶν μετὰ τὰ φυσικά A-N, 'The (Books) after the Physics, I-50,' probably given by Andronius of Rhodes, in the 1st century B. C., to a group of Aristotelian books not designed as a connected treatise.] A celebrated work by Aristotle. It consists of 13 books, more or less disconnected and imperfect, dealing with the doctrines of his predecessors and with various metaphysical topics.

Metapontum (met-a-pon'tum), or Metapontium (met-a-pon'shi-um). [Gr. Μεταπόντιον.] In ancient geography, a city in southern Italy, situated on the Gulf of Tarentum 25 miles southwest of Tarentum. It was one of the flourishing cities of Magna Græcia. Pythagoras died here. Near the modern Torrenare are the ruins of a temple of Apollo, Greek Doric of the 5th century B. C., hexastyle, peripteral, with sculptured metopes; and of a temple called the Tavola dei Paladini, Greek Doric of about 600 B. C., hexastyle, with 12 columns on the flanks.

Metastasio (má-tás-tá'zè-ó) the assumed name of Pietro Antonio Domenico Bonaventura Trapassi. Born at Rome, Jan. 13, 1698; died at Vienna, April 12, 1782. A noted Italian poet, court poet at Vienna 1730-82. He was the author of numerous lyric dramas (various composers supplying the music for each); "Didone abbandonata" (1724), "Caton in Utica," "Ezio," "Semiramide," "Alessandro nell'Indie," "Artaserse," "Demetrio," "Adriano in Siria," "Olimpiade," "Demofonte," "La clemenza di Tito" (1734), "Achille in Sciro," "Antigone," "Il trionfo di Clelia," "Partenope," etc. He also wrote poems for cantatas, oratorios, etc. Burney wrote his memoirs (1796).

Metauro (má-tou'ró). A small river in Italy, which flows into the Adriatic 28 miles northwest of Ancona; the ancient Metaurus. The battle of the Metaurus was a victory gained at the river, south of Rimini, in 207 B. C., by the Romans under the consuls Livius and Nero over the Carthaginians under Hasdrubal. Nero had eluded Hannibal in southern Italy, and made a forced march of 250 miles with 7,000 men. Hasdrubal was slain, and his army nearly annihilated. This victory is ranked as one of the decisive battles of the world.

Meton (mē'ton). [Gr. Μέτων.] A Greek of the 5th century B. C., the discoverer of the Metonic cycle. See the extract.

Meton's cycle was corrected a hundred years later (330 B. C.) by Calippus, who discovered the error of it by observing an eclipse of the moon six years before the death of Alexander. In this corrected period, four cycles of 19 years were taken, and a day left out at the end of the 76 years, in order to make allowance for the hours by which, as already observed, 6,940 days are greater than 19 years and than 235 lunations; and this 'calippic period is used in Ptolemy's Almagest in stating observations of eclipses.

War was declared in May, 1846, and General Taylor won the battles of Palo Alto May 8 and Resaca de la Palma May 9, and forced Monterey to surrender Sept. 24, 1846. On Feb. 23, 1847, he gained the victory of Buena Vista. The next month General Scott took Vera Cruz, and thence marched on Mexico. He won the battle of Cerro Gordo April 18; the battles of Contreras and Churubusco Aug. 20, Molino del Rey Sept. 8, and Chapultepec Sept. 13; and entered the city of Mexico Sept. 14, 1847. Other events were the reduction of California by Fremont and Stockton, and the long marches of Kearny and Doniphan. The war was ended Feb. 2, 1848, by the treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo (which see).

Mexico (mek'si-kō; Sp. pron. mä'hē-kō), F. Mexique (mek'sëk'), officially Estados Unidos Mexicanos. A republic of North America, extending from about lat. 15° to 32° 42' N., long. 86° 40' to 117° 10' W. Capital, Mexico. It is bounded by the United States on the north, the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea on the east, British Honduras, Guatemala, and the Pacific Ocean on the south, and the Pacific Ocean on the west. It comprises, besides the main portion, the peninsulas of Lower California and Yucatan. The surface is generally a table-land traversed by high mountain-ranges. The leading mineral products are silver, gold, copper, and lead. The chief occupations are agriculture and the raising of live stock (in the north), the chief agricultural products being sugar, maize, coffee, tobacco, hemp, etc. It is divided into 27 states, 1 federal district, and 2 territories. The government is republican (largely modeled on that of the United States), with a president as executive, and a congress (senate of 2 members from each state, and lower house of 227 members). The inhabitants are chiefly creoles (of Spanish descent), Indians, and mixed races (including Mestizos, Zambos, etc.). The prevailing language is Spanish; the prevailing religion, Roman Catholic. The early inhabitants were Aztecs and other native races. The following are the leading historical events: invasion of Cortés 1519; conquest of the capital 1521; the country made a Spanish colony under the name of New Spain (a viceroyalty after 1535); revolution under Hidalgo begun 1810, partially suppressed 1815; guerrilla warfare until the revolution under Iturbide in 1821; last Spanish viceroy deposed 1821; empire under Iturbide 1822-1823; secession of Texas 1836; war with the United States 1846-48 (see Guadalupe-Hidalgo); frequent changes of government for some time; foreign intervention 1861; war with France commenced in 1862; empire under Maximilian upheld by French troops 1864-67; French troops withdrawn 1867; and restoration of the republic 1867. Area, 757,760 square miles. Population (1894), 12,080,725.

Mexico. A state in the interior of the republic of Mexico. Capital, Toluca. The Federal District of 473 square miles, containing the City of Mexico, has been separated from it. Area, 9,247 square miles. Population (1892), 828,650.

Mexico. The capital of the republic of Mexico, situated in the Federal District (473 square miles in extent) in the valley of Mexico, in lat. 19° 25' 45" N., long. 99° 7' 18" W., about 7,400 feet above sea-level. It is the largest city of Mexico, and the finest in Spanish America. It is built in the form of a square, and contains a cathedral (a large Renaissance building founded in 1573), a national library, museum, and picture-gallery, and various educational institutions and learned societies. It was founded by the Aztecs about 1325; was besieged, taken, and destroyed by the Spaniards in 1521; has been several times inundated; and has been the scene of various revolutions. Battles were fought near it between the Mexicans and Americans in 1847, and it was occupied by the Americans in 1847-48. The city was formerly situated, on islands, within the confines of Lake Texcoco. Its ancient name was Tenochtitlan. Population (1890), 329,535.

Mexico, Gulf of. A large gulf of the Atlantic, lying south of the United States and east of Mexico. It communicates with the Atlantic on the east by Florida Strait, and with the Caribbean Sea southeast by the Channel of Yucatan, and receives the Mississippi, Rio Grande, and other large rivers. Length (east to west), about 1,000 miles; width (north to south), about 800 miles.

Mexico, Valley of. An inclosed basin of the Mexican plateau, in which the city of Mexico is situated. It is about 60 miles long by 40 miles wide, and 7,400 feet in average elevation above the sea, and shows many evidences of volcanic action. It contains 5 principal lakes; Xochimilco, Chalco, Texcoco, Xaltocan, and Zumpango. At the time of the conquest these appear to have been much more extensive than at present and nearly continent, entirely surrounding the city of Mexico or Tenochtitlan, which was reached by causeways.

In Feb. 1831, he took charge of the congregation at Ware in Hertfordshire. In 1840 he established the "Nonconformist," and devoted his life to the advocacy of the freedom of religion from state control. In 1852 he was elected member of Parliament for Rochdale, and in 1858 served on the royal commission on education.

Miami (mī-äm'ē). A tribe of North American Indians, first known in 1675 in southern Wisconsin. After several changes they settled, about 1690, on the St. Joseph River in southern Michigan, and afterward in treaty negotiations were considered as owners of the entire Wabash country and western Ohio. There is much confusion in literature between the Miami and the Illinois. The Pottawottomi translated the name 'crippled,' and the northern tribes called them "walkers"—the two epithets probably referring to their not using canoes. The English called them Twightwees, derived from their own name for themselves, which was an imitation of the crane's cry. Their present (1893) number is 374. See Algonquian.

Miami (mī-äm'i). A river in Ohio which joins the Ohio at the southwestern corner of the State. Length, over 150 miles.

Miantonomoh (mi-an-tō-nō'mō). Died 1643. A sachem of the Narraganset Indians, nephew of Canonius. He maintained friendly relations with the English, and in 1637 aided Connecticut and Massachusetts in defeating the Pequots. Having become involved in a war with Uncas, sachem of the Mohegans, he was defeated and captured by the latter in 1643, and was put to death in the same year, with the approval of the English, who claimed a protectorate over both tribes.

Miao-tse (myou-tzā'), or Miautse. A general name of numerous Chinese tribes dwelling in the provinces of Yunnan, Kweichow, Kwangsi, and Kwangtung.

Miaulis (mē-ou'lis), Andreas Vokos. Born in Negropont, 1772 (1768 ?); died at Athens, June 24, 1835. A Greek admiral, commander-in-chief in the war of independence.

Miautse. See Miao-tse.

Miava (mē'ō-vo). A town in the county of Neutra, Hungary, situated on the river Miava 46 miles northeast of Presburg. Population (1890, 9,997.

Micah (mī'kū). [Heb., 'who is like Jehovah?'] In Old Testament history: (a) An Ephraimite who stole 1,100 pieces of silver from his mother, but, alarmed by her imprecations on the thief, confessed the deed and returned the money: she thereupon dedicated it to the Lord, and made with it a graven and a molten image (teraphim), which Micah set up in his house and then hired a Levite as a priest. (b) A prophet, a native of Moresheth of Gath, near Eleutheropolis, and a contemporary of Isaiah. He is reckoned as the sixth of the minor prophets (the third in the Septuagint). He prophesied about the beginning of the reign of Hezekiah.

Micali (mē-kā'lē), Giuseppe. Born at Leghorn, Italy, about 1776; died at Florence, March 27, 1844. An Italian archaeologist, author of "Storia degli antichi popoli d'Italia" (1832), etc.

Micawber (mī-kā'bēr), Wilkins. One of the principal characters in Dickens's "David Copperfield." He is remarkable for his rapid alternations of depression and elevation of spirits, his "temporary embarrassments of a pecuniary nature," and his constant persuasion that "something will turn up." His wife, as far as the elasticity of her spirits goes, is quite his equal. Her devotion to "the parent of her children and the father of her twins" induces her frequent well-known exclamation, "I never will desert Mr. Micawber!" The couple appear to have been suggested more or less by Dickens's father and mother.

Michabo. The Great Hare, in Algonquian legends.

What Ioskeha was to the Iroquois, Michabo or Manibozho was to the Algonkin tribes. There has been a good deal of mystification about Michabo, or Manibozho, or Messou, who was probably from the first a hare sans phrase, but who has been converted by philological processes into a personification of light or dawn. It has already been seen that the wild North Pacific peoples recognize in their hero and demigod animals of various species: dogs, ravens, muskrats, and coyotes have been found in this lofty estimation, and the Utes believe in "Cin-au-ay, the ancient of wolves." It would require some labour to derive all the ancient heroes and gods from misconceptions about the names of vast natural phenomena like light and dawn, and it is probable that Michabo or Manibozho, the Great Hare of the Algonkins, is only a successful apotheosised totem like the rest. His legend and his dominion are very widely spread. Dr. Brinton himself (p. 153) allows that the great hare is a totem. Perhaps our earliest authority about the mythical great hare in America is William Strachey's "Travaille" into Virginia. Lang, Myth, etc., II, 54.

Michael (mī'kel or mī'kā-el). [Heb., 'who is like God?'] F. Michel, It. Michele, Sp. Pg. Miguel, G. Michael. An archangel mentioned in the Bible. He is regarded as the leader of the whole host of angels, and, owing to miraculous appearances recorded in Roman Catholic legends, is considered by that church to be the representative of the church triumphant. His feast occurs on Sept. 29 in that church and in the Anglican Church also. He is spoken of five times in the Bible, always as fighting: John mentions him as fighting at the head of the angels against the dragon and his host.

Probably, on the hint thus given by St. John, the Romish church taught at an early period that Michael was employed, in command of the loyal angels of God, to overthrow and consign to the pit of perdition Lucifer and his rebellious associates—a legend which was at length embalmed in the sublimest poetry by Milton. Sometimes Michael is represented as the sole archangel, sometimes as only the head of a fraternity of archangels, which includes likewise Gabriel, Raphael, and some others. He is usually represented in coat-armour, with a glory round his head, and a dart in his hand, trampling on the fallen Lucifer. He has often been furnished, like the human warriors of the middle ages, with a heraldic ensign—namely, a banner hanging from a cross. We obtain a curious idea of the religious notions of those ages when we learn that the red-velvet-covered buckler worn by Michael in his war with Lucifer used to be shewn in a church in Normandy down to 1607, when the bishop of Avranches at length forbade its being any longer exhibited.

Chambers's Book of Days, II, 388.

Michael I. Rhangabe or Rhangabe. Died about 845. Byzantine emperor 811–813. He was the son of one of the high functionaries at court, and was made master of the palace by Nicephorus I., whose daughter Procopia he married. He succeeded his wife's brother Stauracius. He was deposed by Leo V., and retired to a convent.

Michael II. Balbus ('the Stammerer'). Byzantine emperor 820–829. He was of obscure origin, but rose to the highest dignities under Leo V., whom he had assisted in deposing Michael I., and whom he deposed in turn.

Michael III. Byzantine emperor 842–867, son of Theophilus. He undertook, with his uncle Bardas, an expedition against the Bulgarians in 861, which resulted in the conversion of the Bulgarian king. In 863 his uncle Petronas gained a splendid victory over the Saracens in Asia Minor. He was assassinated in 867 by Basilus the Macedonian, whom he had associated with himself in the government in 866.

Michael IV., surnamed "The Paphlagonian." Byzantine emperor 1034–41. He was a younger brother of John the Eunuch, prime minister under Constantine IX. and Romanus III. He became chamberlain to Zoe, wife of Romanus III., who in 1034 poisoned her husband in order to marry Michael. He was a man of weak character, and was a mere instrument in the hands of his brother.

Michael V. Calaphates ('the Calker'). Byzantine emperor 1041–42, nephew of Michael IV. He banished his uncle John the Eunuch, which led to an insurrection at Constantinople. He was dethroned, and spent the rest of his life in a convent.

Michael VI., surnamed "The Warrior." Byzantine emperor 1056–57. He was appointed by the empress Theodora as her successor on account of his military virtues. He was, however, old and feeble, and was deposed by Isaac Comnenus. He was allowed to retire to a convent.

Michael VII. Ducas or Parapinaces. Byzantine emperor 1071–78, son of Constantine XI.

Michael VIII. Palæologus. Born 1234; died in Dec., 1282. Byzantine emperor 1261–82, grandson (through his mother Irene Angela) of the Byzantine emperor Alexius Angelus. He became commander of the French mercenaries in the service of the Emperor of Nicea, and in 1259 became, with the patriarch Arsenius, guardian of the emperor John Lascaris. He caused himself to be proclaimed joint emperor of Nicea in 1260. In 1261 he conquered Constantinople from the Latins, thus restoring the Byzantine empire, of which he was crowned emperor in the same year. He deposed and blinded John Lascaris in 1261.

Michael IX. Palæologus. Died 1320. Byzantine emperor 1295–1320, son and associate of Andronicus II. who outlived him.

Michael. Czar of Russia 1613–45. He was the founder of the Romanoff dynasty.

Michael. Born Oct. 25, 1832. Grand Duke of Russia, fourth son of the czar Nicholas.

Michael. A bark of 25 tons, one of the ships of Frobisher's first expedition. It early abandoned the other ship, the Gabriel, and returned to England.

Michael, Archangel. A celebrated painting by Guido Reni, in Santa Maria dei Cappuccini, Rome. The saint, because of his beauty of face and form often called "the Catholic Apollo," is in the act of enchaining Lucifer. The color is vigorous and good.

Michael, Order of Saint. An order instituted in France by Louis XI., Aug. 1, 1469.

Michael Angelo. See Michelangelo.

Michael Obrenovitch (ō-bren'ō-ritch), Prince of Servia. Born at Kragujevatz, Servia, Sept. 4, 1825; murdered near Belgrad, June 10, 1868. A younger son of Milosh. He reigned 1839–42 and 1860–68.

Michaelis (mē-ehā-ā'lis), Johann David. Born at Halle, Prussia, Feb. 27, 1717; died at Göttingen, Aug. 22, 1791. A German biblical scholar, professor at Göttingen 1745–91. His works include an introduction to the New Testament (4th edition, 1788), "Supplementa" to Hebrew lexicons (1784–92), "Mosaisches Recht" (1770–71), etc.

Michaelmas Day. See the extract.

Michaelmas Day, the 29th of September, properly named the day of St. Michael and All Angels, is a great festival in the Church of Rome, and also observed as a feast by the Church of England. In England it is one of the four quarterly terms, or quarter-days, on which rents are paid, and in that and other divisions of the United Kingdom, as well as perhaps in other countries, it is the day on which burgal magistracies and councils are re-elected. The only other remarkable thing connected with the day is a widely prevalent custom of marking it with a goose at dinner.

Chambers's Book of Days, II, 387.

Michaelmas Terme. A play by Thomas Middleton, licensed and printed in 1607; a lively and effective comedy of city intrigue.

Michaud (mē-shō'), Joseph François. Born at Albens, Savoy, June 19, 1767; died at Passy, near Paris, Sept. 30, 1839. A French poet, historian, and Bourbon publicist. His principal historical works are "Histoire des progrès et de la chute de l'empire de Mysore," etc. (1801), "Histoire des croisades" (1812–17). With his brother L. G. Michaud he edited the "Biographie universelle."

Michaud, Louis Gabriel. Born at Bourg, 1772; died at Ternès, March 13, 1858. A French littérateur, brother of J. F. Michaud, and his collaborator in editing the "Biographie universelle."

Michaux (mē-shō'), André. Born near Versailles, March 7, 1746; died in Madagascar, Nov. 13, 1802. A French botanist and traveler in Asia and America. He wrote a "Histoire des chênes de l'Amérique Septentrionale" (1801), "Flora Boreali-Americana" (1803), etc.

Michaux, François André. Born at Versailles, France, 1770; died near Pontoise, France, 1855. A French botanist, son of André Michaux. He wrote "Histoire des arbres forestiers de l'Amérique Septentrionale" (1810–13), etc.

Michegamea. See Illinois.

Michel (mich'el), or Cousin Michel. A humorous personification of the German nation, as John Bull is of the English.

Michel (mich'el) of Northgate, Dan. A brother of the cloister of St. Austin at Canterbury. He is noted as having completed in 1340 a translation of "La somme des vies et des vertus," known as "The Aynbite of Inwyt" (which see).

Michel (mē-shel'), Francisque Xavier. Born at Lyons, Feb. 18, 1809. A French archaeologist, philologist, and historian, professor at Bordeaux; editor of Old French works.

Michel (mē-shel'), Louise. Born 1839. A French anarchist. She opened a school in the Quartier Montmartre, Paris, in 1860. In 1871 she took part in the uprising of the Commune, and for this was sentenced in the same year to deportation for life to New Caledonia. She was released by the amnesty of 1880, and returned to Paris, where she became prominent as an agitator of anarchism. In 1883 she was sentenced to six years' imprisonment for inciting the poor to plunder the bakers' shops. She refused to accept a pardon in 1885. She is at present (1894) living in London.

Michelangelo (mī-kel-an'je-lō; It. pron. mē-kel-ān'je-lō) (Michelagnolo Buonarroti). Born at Caprese, March 6, 1475; died at Rome, Feb. 18, 1564. A famous Italian sculptor, painter, architect, and poet. He came of an ancient but poor Florentine family. He was apprenticed to the painter Ghirlandajo April 1, 1488, and with other boys from the atelier began soon after to study the antique marbles collected by Lorenzo de' Medici in the garden of San Marco. Lorenzo discovered him there, and in 1489 took him into his palace, where he had every opportunity for improvement and study. The Centaur relief in the Casa Buonarroti was made at this time, at the suggestion of Angelo Poliziano. In 1491 he came under the influence of Savonarola, whom he always held in great reverence. In 1492 Lorenzo died, and Michelangelo's intimate relations with the Medici family terminated. In 1493 he made a large wooden crucifix for the prior of St. Spirito, and with the assistance of the prior began the profound study of anatomy in which he delighted. Before the expulsion of the Medici he fled to Bologna, where he was soon engaged upon the Arca di San Domenico begun by Niccolò Pisano in 1265, to which he added the well-known kneeling angel of Bologna. He was probably much influenced by the reliefs of Della Quercia about the door of San Petronio: two of these he afterward imitated in the Sistine Chapel. In 1495 he returned to Florence, when he is supposed to have made the San Giovannino in the Berlin Museum. From 1496 to 1501 he lived in Rome. To this period are attributed the Lausus of the Bargello and the Cupid of the South Kensington Museum. The most important work of this time is the Pietà di San Pietro (1498). In 1501 he returned to Florence, and Sept. 13 began the great David of the Signoria, made from a block of marble abandoned by Agostino di Duccio, which was placed in position May 18, 1504. The two roundels of the Madonna and Child in Burlington House and the Bargello were probably made then, and also the picture of the Holy Family in the Uffizi. In 1503 Piero Soderini, gonfaloniere, projected two frescoes for the Sala Grande of the Palazzo Vecchio. The commission for one was given to Leonardo da Vinci, that for the other to Michelangelo in 1504. For it he prepared the great cartoon of the Battle of Cascina, an incident in the war with Pisa when, July 28, 1364, a band of 400 Florentines were attacked while bathing by Sir John Hawkwood's English troops. This cartoon contained 288 square feet of surface, and was crowded with nude figures in every position. It had, probably, more influence upon the art of the Renaissance than any other single work. To about this time may be attributed the beginning of his poetic creations, of the multitude of which undoubtedly written a few only have come down to us. In Nov., 1505, he was called to Rome by Pope Julius II. to design his mausoleum, the history of which runs through the entire life of the master. Repeated designs and repeated attempts to carry them out were made, only to be frustrated by the successors of the great Pope. The matter finally ended in the reign of Paul III. by the placing in San Pietro in Vincoli of the statue of Moses surrounded by mediocre works finished by Raffaello da Montelupo and others. The Two Captives of the Louvre are part of the work as originally designed. In the spring of 1506 he assisted in the discovery of the Laocoon in the palace of Titus. His favorite antique was the Belvedere Torso, supposed to be a copy of the Hercules Epitrapezus of Lysippus. In April, 1506, probably as a result of the intrigues of Bramante, he was forced to abandon Rome for Florence. In the autumn he joined the Pope at Bologna, and made (1506–07) the bronze statue of Julius which stood over the door of San Petronio and was destroyed in 1511. The ceiling of the Sistine Chapel was begun early in 1508, and finished in Oct., 1512. Julius II. died Feb. 21, 1513, and was succeeded by Cardinal Giovanni de' Medici, son of the great Lorenzo, as Leo X. Michelangelo was diverted from the tomb of Julius by Leo, and employed from 1517 to 1520 in an abortive attempt to build the facade of San Lorenzo in Florence, and in developing the quarries of Carrara and Seravezza. In 1522 he began, by order of Cardinal Giulio de' Medici, the sacristy of San Lorenzo and the tombs of Giuliano and Lorenzo de' Medici with the famous reclining figures on the sarcophagi, perhaps the most thoroughly characteristic of all his works. Leo X. was succeeded by Adrian VI. in 1521, and he in turn by Giulio de' Medici as Clement VII. in 1523. On April 6, 1529, Michelangelo was appointed "governor and procurator-general over the construction and fortification of the city walls" in Florence. On Sept. 21, 1529, occurred his unexplained flight to Venice. He returned Nov. 20 of the same year, and was engaged in the defense of the city until its capitulation, Aug. 12, 1530. Before the end of the year 1534 he left Florence, never to return. The statues of the sacrists, including the Madonna and Child, were arranged after his departure. Alessandro Farnese succeeded Clement VII. as Paul III., Oct., 1534. The Last Judgment was begun about Sept. 1, 1535, and finished before Christmas, 1541. Michelangelo's friendship for Vittoria Colonna began about 1538. (See Colonna, Vittoria.) The frescos of the Pauline Chapel were painted between 1542 and 1549. They represent the conversion of St. Paul and the martyrdom of St. Peter. He succeeded Antonio da Sangallo in 1546 in the offices which he held, and became architect of St. Peter's Jan. 1, 1547. From this time until his death he worked on the church without compensation. The dome alone was completed with any regard to his plans.

Michelet (mêsh-lâ'), Jules. Born at Paris, Aug. 21, 1798; died at Hyères, southern France, Feb. 9, 1874. An eminent French historian. He began his literary studies under the guidance of an old bookseller, and in his spare moments helped his father, a printer by trade, in setting type. He went through the Collège Charlemagne, and entered then on a higher course of study. In 1821 he graduated with the highest university honors, and was called at once to the chair of history in the Collège Rollin (1821-26). His first works were a "Tableau chronologique de l'histoire moderne" (1825), "Tableaux synchroniques de l'histoire moderne" (1826), and "Précis de l'histoire moderne" (1827). He was appointed lecturer at the Ecole Normale in 1827, and published his "Introduction à l'histoire universelle" (1831), "Œuvres choisies de Vico" (1835), "Origines du droit français" (1837), and "Histoire romaine: république" (1839), etc. Michelet began his famous courses of lectures at the Collège de France in 1838, and wrote in that connection "Des Jésuites" (1843), "Du prêtre, de la femme et de la famille" (1844), and "Du peuple" (1845). The clergy succeeded at last in silencing him, and he retired to a life of study. The publication of his "Histoire de France" in sixteen volumes (1833-67) was interrupted by his "Histoire de la révolution française" (1847-53), "Le procès des templiers" (1851), and "Légendes démocratiques du Nord" (1854). Michelet was married twice. He wrote, further, "Les femmes de la révolution" (1854), "L'Oiseau" (1856), "L'Insecte" (1858), "L'Amour" (1859), "La femme" (1860), "La mer" (1861), "La bible de l'humanité" (1864). Michelet made a last return to history in attempting to bring his great work down to date. Death stopped him after he had published but few volumes of his "Histoire du XIX^e siècle" (1872-1873).

Michelet (mê-she-lâ'), Karl Ludwig. Born at Berlin, Dec. 1, 1801; died at Berlin, Dec. 16, 1893. A German philosophical (Hegelian) writer, appointed professor of philosophy at Berlin in 1829. He wrote works on Aristotle, "Geschichte der letzten Systeme der Philosophie in Deutschland" (1837-1838), "Entwicklungsgeschichte der neuesten deutschen Philosophie" (1843), "Die Persönlichkeit Gottes" (1841), "Die Epiphanie der ewigen Persönlichkeit des Geistes" (1844-52), "Geschichte der Menschheit" (1859-60), "System der Philosophie" (1876-81), etc.

Michelis (mê-châ'lis), Friedrich. Born at Münster, Prussia, July 27, 1815; died at Freiburg, Baden, May 28, 1886. A noted German theologian and philosopher, one of the leaders of the Old Catholic movement.

Michelozzo Michelozzi (mê-ke-lot'sô mê-ke-lot'sê), Bartolommeo di Gherardo di. Born at Florence, 1396; died 1472. An eminent sculptor, engraver of gems, and architect. While associated with Donatello in making the monuments of Pope John XXIII., Cardinal Brancaccio, and Bartolommeo Aragazzi, he was employed by Cosmo de' Medici to design and build the Medici Palace—now called the Riccardi Palace, as it was enlarged by the Marchese Riccardi in the 17th century. He created a distinctly Florentine architectural style, which was subsequently followed in the Strozzi and other Florentine palaces. During his exile (1433-34) with Cosmo de' Medici in Venice, he built the library of San Giorgio Maggiore, adjoining the Convent of San Marco, which Cosmo endowed with many precious manuscripts and books. In Milan he designed the chapel of St. Peter Martyr in Santo Eustorgio, and other buildings. After his return to Florence, Michelozzo displayed great skill in restoring the lower part of the Palazzo Vecchio, which had been dangerously weakened by the weight of the upper stories. He also built the Villas Careggi, Caffagiolo, and Mozzi, and enlarged and rebuilt the Convent of San Marco. Among the few remaining examples of his skill as a sculptor are a silver statuette of St. John Baptist on the altar of the Opera del Duomo in Florence, and a small St. John over the door of the Canonica opposite the Baptistery.

Michelstadt (mê'chel-stât). A town in the province of Starkenburg, Hesse, 21 miles southeast of Darmstadt: the chief town of the Odenwald. Population (1890), 3,068.

Michigan (mish'i-gan). One of the western States of the United States of America, extending (exclusive of islands) from about lat. 41° 45' to 47° 30' N., and from long. 82° 25' to 90° 30' W. Capital, Lansing; chief city, Detroit. It consists of two peninsulas (separated by the Strait of Mackinaw). The southern is bounded by Lakes Huron, St. Clair, and Erie and St. Clair and Detroit rivers on the east, Lake Michigan on the west, and Ohio and Indiana on the south; and the northern lies between Lake Superior on the north and Lakes Huron and Michigan and the State of Wisconsin on the south. The surface in the south is generally level; in the north it is rugged. There is rich mineral wealth in the north. Michigan is the first State in the production of copper, salt, and lumber, the fourth in wool, and one of the first in iron and wheat. It produces also apples, Indian corn, etc., and has important fisheries of lake-trout, whitefish, etc. It has 85 counties, sends 2 senators and 12 representatives to Congress, and has 14 electoral votes. It was explored by the French in the 17th century, and first permanently settled by them at Sault Ste. Marie in 1668; was ceded to Great Britain in 1763; was the scene of Pontiac's war; was formally surrendered to the United States in 1796; formed part of the Northwest Territory, and later of Indiana Territory; and was constituted Michigan Territory in 1805. Detroit was taken by the British in 1812. Michigan was recovered by the United States in 1813, and was admitted to the Union in 1837. Its name is from that of the lake. Area, 58,915 square miles. Population (1890), 2,093,889.

Michigan, Lake. [Algonkin, 'great lake.'] One of the five great lakes of the United States, inclosed by Michigan on the north and east, Indiana on the south, and Illinois and Wisconsin on the west. Its chief bays are Green Bay and Grand Traverse Bay; its chief tributaries the Fox, Menominee, Manistee, Muskegon, Grand, Kalamazoo, and St. Joseph. Chicago and Milwaukee are the chief cities on its banks. It discharges by the Strait of Mackinaw into Lake Huron. Length, about 340 miles. Greatest width, about 85 miles. Greatest depth, 870 feet. Mean height above sea-level, 582 feet. Area, over 22,000 square miles.

Michigan, University of. An institution of learning, for both sexes, situated at Ann Arbor, Michigan. It is under State control; was opened in 1817; contains collegiate, medical, and law departments, with an observatory, dental college, school of pharmacy, scientific museums, and library of 80,000 volumes; and was attended in 1893 by about 2,800 students.

Micon (mi'kon) of Athens. [Gr. Mikôn.] A Greek painter, a contemporary of Polygnotus, known principally from the works executed in conjunction with the latter in the Stoa Poikile, Theseum, and temple of the Dioscuri at Athens. He made the statue of the Athenian Callias, victor in Olympiad 77 (or 468 B. C.). His methods were probably the same as those of Polygnotus.

Micromégas. A philosophical romance by Voltaire, published in 1752: imitated from Swift's "Gulliver's Travels."

Micronesia (mi-krô-nê'siä). [NL., 'little islands.'] A collection of island groups in the Pacific Ocean, comprising principally the Caroline, Ladrones, Gilbert, and Marshall groups. The islands (except the Ladrones) are generally small, low, and mainly of coral formation. The inhabitants are related in race and language.

Microscopium (mi-krô-skô'pi-um). [LL., 'the microscope.'] A constellation south of Capricorn, introduced by Lacaille in 1752.

Mictlan. See Mictla.

Midas (mi'das). [Gr. Midas.] In Greek legend, a king of Phrygia, son of Gordius and Cybele. According to the common form of the myth, the god Dionysus, from gratitude for kindness which had been shown to his teacher Silenus by Midas, promised to grant whatever the latter might ask. Midas, accordingly, requested that whatever he touched might turn to gold; but when he found that even his food was not excepted, and that he was likely to starve, he prayed that the gift might be taken away, and on bathing in the Pactolus was restored to his natural condition. The sands of the river, however, were ever after full of gold. On his refusing to award the prize of a musical contest between Pan and Apollo to the latter, the god changed his ears into those of an ass. These, which he concealed under his cap, were discovered by his barber, who, afraid to mention the secret to any one, relieved himself by digging a hole in the ground, whispering into it "King Midas has ass's ears," and then covering it up.

Middelburg (mid'del-bôro). The capital of the province of Zealand, Netherlands, situated on the island of Walcheren in lat. 51° 30' N., long. 3° 37' E. It has a noted town hall, an abbey, and some collections; was formerly a flourishing Hanseatic town; was taken by the Dutch from the Spaniards in 1574; and was taken by the English in 1809. Population (1889), 15,130.

Middle Ages. A period of about a thousand years, between the close of what is technically considered ancient history and the first definite movements in Europe of the distinctively modern spirit of freedom and enterprise. Its beginning is synchronous with that of the dark ages, and it is variously reckoned as extending to the fall of Constantinople (1453), the invention of printing, the Renaissance, or the discovery of America, in the 15th century, or to the Reformation, in the early part of the 16th.

For, in truth, through all that period which we call the Dark and Middle Ages, men's minds were possessed by the belief that all things continued as they were from the beginning, that no chaos never to be recrossed lay between them and that ancient world to which they had not ceased to look back. We who are centuries removed can see that there had passed a great and wonderful change upon thought, and art, and literature, and politics, and society itself: a change whose best illustration is to be found in the process whereby there arose out of the primitive basilica the Romanesque cathedral, and from it, in turn, the endless varieties of Gothic. But so gradual was the change that each generation felt it passing over them no more than a man feels that perpetual transformation by which his body is renewed from year to year; while the few who had learning enough to study antiquity through its contemporary records were prevented by the utter want of criticism, and of that which we call historical feeling, from seeing how prodigious was the contrast between themselves and those whom they admired. There is nothing more modern than the critical spirit which dwells upon the difference between the minds of men in one age and in another; which endeavors to make each age its own interpreter, and judge what it did or produced by a relative standard.

Middleton, Conyers. Born in Yorkshire, Dec. 27, 1683; died at Hildersham, July 28, 1730. An English divine. In 1724 he went to Rome, and in 1729 published the "Letter from Rome" upon pagan beliefs and ceremonies in the Roman Catholic Church. In his "Letter to Waterland" he ridiculed some parts of the Book of Genesis, and showed a skeptical tendency in an "Introductory Discourse" (1747). Of his numerous works the best-known is his "Life of Cicero."

Middleton, Henry. Born 1771; died at Charleston, S. C., June 14, 1846. An American politician and diplomatist, son of Arthur Middleton. He was governor of South Carolina 1810-12; was a representative in Congress 1815-19; and was minister to Russia 1820-31.

Middleton, Thomas. Born at London (?) about 1570; died at Newington Butts, 1627. An English dramatist. He entered Gray's Inn about 1593, became a playwright about 1599, and wrote in conjunction with William Rowley, Munday, Drayton, Webster, and others. He arranged lord mayor's shows and court masks, and in 1620 was appointed city chronologer. Among his plays are "The Old Law" with Massinger and Rowley (printed 1656), "The Mayor of Quinborough" (1661), "Blurt, Master Constable" (1662), "The Phoenix" (1667), "Michaelmas Terme" (1667), "The Family of Love" (licensed 1667), "A Trick to Catch the Old One" (licensed 1667), "Our Five Gallants" (1668), "A Mad World, my Masters" (1668), "The Roaring Girl" with Dekker (printed 1611), "A Fair Quarrel" with Rowley (1617), "The Changeling" and "The Spanish Gipsy" with Rowley (1653), "More Dissemblers besides Women" with "Women beware Women" (licensed before 1622, printed 1657), "A Game at Chess" (1624). The date of the following plays is conjectural: "A Chaste Maid in Cheapside" (1630), "No Wit, no Help like a Woman's" (1657), "The Witch" (which see) (first printed in 1778), "Anything for a Quiet Life" (1682), "The Widow" with Ben Jonson and Fletcher (1652). He wrote also about 20 masks, entertainments, and pageants; some miscellaneous verse, including "Mierocyonic: Six Snarling Satires" (1599); and various prose pamphlets, including "The Black Book" (1604), "Father Hubbard's Tales, etc." (1604), etc. Middleton's works were not collected till 1840, when Dyce's edition appeared, which is now out of print. In 1886 Mr. Bullen's edition, in 8 vols., appeared. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Middleton, Thomas Fanshaw. Born at Kettleston, Derbyshire, England, Jan. 26, 1769; died at Calcutta, July 8, 1822. An English scholar and divine, appointed first bishop of Calcutta in 1814. Midrash (mid'rash). [Heb., 'exposition,' 'explanation.'] The name for the old rabbinical commentaries on biblical books, which grew out of the popular discourses and lectures delivered during the services in the synagogue. Among the older Midrashim are Mechilta on a part of Exodus, Siphra on Leviticus, and Siphre on Numbers and Deuteronomy, all of which belong to the period of the Mishnah (which see). The most popular of the Midrashim was that of Rabbah or Rabbath (magnum) or the Pentateuch and the so-called "Five Rolls"—i. e., the books of Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Esther—which was composed between the 6th and 12th centuries.

Midshipman Easy, Mr. See Mr. Midshipman Easy.

Midsommer Night's Dream, A. A comedy by Shakspeare, acted in 1595. It is mentioned by Meres in his "Palladis Tamia," which was issued in 1595, and was entered on the "Stationers' Register" Oct. 8, 1600. Two editions were printed in that year—one by James Roberts, the other by Thomas Fisher. Roberts's copy was used for the folio reprint.

Chancer's legend of "Thisbe of Babylon," and Golding's translation of the same story from Ovid, probably furnished the matter for the Interlude. So much as relates to Bottom and his fellows evidently came fresh from nature as she had passed under the poet's eye. The linking of these clowis in with the ancient tragic tale of Pyramus and Thisbe, so as to draw the latter within the region of modern farce, thus travestying the classic into the grotesque, is not less original than droll.

Hudson, Int. to Midsommer Night's Dream.

Midsommer Night's Dream. An overture by Mendelssohn, written in 1826. [The music for the drama was written in 1843.]

He served for a time as curate at Puisseux in the diocese of Orléans; but in 1833 a quarrel with his bishop drove him to Paris, where he founded "L'Univers Religieux," and, having soon sold this paper, established a large publishing house. The works issued by him include "Scriptura sacra cursus completus" (28 vols.), "Theologie cursus" (25 vols.), "Collection des orateurs sacrés" (100 vols.), "Patrologia cursus completus" (333 vols.), "Encyclopédie théologique" (171 vols.).

Mignet (mên-yân'), François Auguste Marie. Born at Aix, southern France, May 8, 1796; died at Paris, March 24, 1884. One of the foremost French historians of the 19th century. In 1815 he studied law in his native town, and enjoyed there the companionship of a young fellow-student, M. Thiers, for whom he kept up a lifelong friendship. In 1830 Mignet and Thiers founded a newspaper, "Le National." Mignet was at heart a liberal, and was always ready to take up his pen in defense of his ideas. He appeared for the first time before the public, in successful competition for a prize offered by the Académie des Inscriptions, with an essay entitled "De la féodalité, des institutions de Saint-Louis, et de la législation de ce prince" (1821). Thereupon he came to Paris, where he published his "Histoire de la révolution française de 1789 à 1814" (1824), "Négociations relatives à la succession d'Espagne sous Louis XIV." (1830-42), "Notices et mémoires historiques" (1843), and again 1853 and 1854, "Vie de Franklin" (1848), "Histoire de Marie Stuart" (1851), "Charles-Quint" (1854), "Eloges historiques" (1863 and 1877), various "Notices historiques" (1872-75), "Rivalité de François I. et de Charles-Quint" (1875), etc. As dramatist Mignet wrote "Antonio Perez et Philippe II." (1845 and 1846). He was received into the French Academy in 1836.

Mignon (mên-yôn'). In Goethe's "Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre," a mysterious Italian maiden, the daughter of an old harper. She loves Wilhelm, and dies in despair when she finds that her love is not returned.

Two tragic figures are added to these, wandering in a twilight of mystery over the earth—Mignon and the harper; they are daughter and father, unknown to each other, exiles from their native country, and united to Wilhelm Meister by ties of love and gratitude. None of Goethe's creations appeal more strongly to the depths of the human soul than these two characters, with their touching songs. Solemn echoes of old mysticism seem revived in these songs full of earthly misery and longing for heaven; the laments of the loving but unloved maiden, the homeless, friendless child, who may not reveal her inmost soul because her lips are sealed by a vow, alternate with the tears of the guilty, God-forsaken, lonely, and remorseful old man.

Scherer, History of German Lit. (trans.), II. 183.

Mignon. An opera by Ambrose Thomas, first produced at Paris in 1866, and at London in 1870. The words, founded on "Wilhelm Meister," are by Carré and Barbier.

Milan (mi-lan' or mil'an). A province of Lombardy, Italy. Area, 1,223 square miles. Population (1891), 1,235,150.

Milan. A former duchy in Lombardy, northern Italy. Gian Galeazzo Visconti was the first duke (1395); and the end of the Visconti line came in 1447. The duchy was ruled by the Sforza family 1450-1535 (possession being disputed with France 1490-1526); passed to Spain in 1556, and to Austria in 1713-14; was conquered by France in 1796; formed part of the Cisalpine Republic from 1797, of the Italian Republic from 1802, and of the kingdom of Italy from 1805; was ceded to Austria in 1814; and was annexed to Sardinia in 1859.

Milan, It. Milano (mĕ-lĭā'nō), G. Mailand (mĭ-lĕnd). The capital of the province of Milan, Italy, situated on the river Olona, in the Lombard plain, in lat. 45° 28' N., long. 9° 11' E.: the Roman Mediolanum. It is the third city in size in Italy, the chief city in Lombardy, and the chief commercial and financial center of the country. As the center of a rich agricultural district it exports dairy and other farm products. It has important manufactures of furniture, woolens, silk, machinery, gloves, etc.; and is noted also as an educational, musical, and theatrical center. The cathedral, begun in its present form in 1387, is popularly celebrated for the profusion of its sculptured decoration and pinnacles, and the beauty of its material (white marble); but as an architectural whole it does not justify its reputation, despite the beauty of such details as the Flamboyant tracery of the great windows of the apse, and the majestic effect of the interior. The central lantern and spire are graceful, but the other parts are not well proportioned, and the west front, with its semi-modern jumble of pointed and classical forms, is barbarous, while the decoration is cold and without the vigorous life of good medieval art. There are 5 aisles. The chief dimensions are: length, 486 feet; breadth, 252; transepts, 283; height of vaulting, 153; height of spire, 255. It is surpassed in size in Italy by St. Peter's only. The cathedral contains many beautiful tombs. The Ospedale Maggiore, founded by Francesco Sforza in 1456, is one of the most beautiful creations of Lombard brick architecture, with two tiers of rich pointed arches inclosing double pointed windows, the lower tier inclosed in a Corinthian arcade. Other objects of interest are the gallery Vittorio Emanuele, Brera's (with picture-gallery and library), Museum Poldi-Pezzoli, archaeological and some other museums, Ambrosian library, Piazza de Mercanti, the churches of the Monastero Maggiore, of Santa Maria delle Grazie (with the "Last Supper" of Leonardo da Vinci), of San Ambrogio, and of San Lorenzo, the Arco della Pace, and the Scala theater. The tradition is that Milan was founded by the Celtic prince Bellovesus about 600 B. C. It was the capital of the Insubrian Gauls; was taken by the Romans 222 B. C.; and was one of the chief cities of the later Roman Empire, and an imperial residence. Ambrose was bishop of Milan 374-397. It was sacked by Attila in 452; was destroyed by the Goths in 539; belonged to Lombardy and later to the empire; was taken and nearly destroyed by Frederick Barbarossa in 1162; was rebuilt by the Lombard League in 1167; was ruled by the Torre, Visconti, and Sforza families; and has been the capital of the Milanese, or duchy of Milan (which see), the Cisalpine Republic, the kingdom of Italy (1805), and the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom. It was the scene of an insurrection against Austrian rule in 1848, and of outbreaks in 1849 and 1853. In 1859 it was united to the kingdom of Sardinia. It has been noted in art as the residence of Bramante, Leonardo da Vinci, etc. Population (1894), commune, 432,400.

Milan (mil'an) I. Born Aug. 22, 1854. King of Servia 1882-89. He became prince of Servia on the assassination of his cousin Michael in 1858, the government being conducted by a regency until he became of age in 1872. He married Natalie, princess of Stourdzia, in 1875. He allied himself with Russia in the Turco-Russian war (1877-1878), with the result that Servia was made independent of Turkey in 1878. He was proclaimed king in 1882 (Servia having been erected into a kingdom), and abdicated in favor of his son Alexander in 1889, in consequence of troubles arising out of a quarrel with Queen Natalie.

Milan, Edict of. An edict proclaiming toleration of the Christians, promulgated by Constantine and Licinius 313.

Milan Decree. A decree issued by Napoleon at Milan, Dec. 17, 1807. It declared the forfeiture of all vessels bound to or from British ports, and of all which paid licenses or duties to Great Britain or had submitted to search by British cruisers.

Milanese (mil-an-ĕs' or -ĕz'), The. A name often given to the duchy of Milan, or to Milan and the surrounding district.

Milanés y Fuentes (mĕ-lĕn-ĕs' ĕ fwen'tes), José Jacinto. Born at Matanzas, Aug. 16, 1814; died there, Nov. 14, 1863. A Cuban poet. He was poor and self-educated. After 1842 he suffered from mental disease, and at length fell into hopeless melancholia. His verses are mostly lyrics of a moral tone. He published several plays, the best being "El Conde Alarcón," a tragedy (1838). Next to Heredia he is the most popular of the Cuban poets.

Milazzo (mĕ-lĕt'sō), or Melazzo (mĕ-lĕt'sō). A seaport in the province of Messina, Sicily, 18 miles west of Messina: the ancient Myla. Near this place the Roman fleet under Duilius gained its first naval victory over the Carthaginians in 260 B. C., and Agrippa defeated Sextus Pompey's fleet in 36 B. C.; and here, July 20, 1860, Garibaldi defeated the Neapolitans. Population (1881), 8,427.

Milcom. See Milkom.

Mildmay (mild'mā), Sir Walter. Born 1520 (?); died at Hackney, May 31, 1589. Chancellor of the exchequer, and founder of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. He was educated at Christ's College, Cambridge, and entered Gray's Inn in 1546. He was a good financier, and was appointed examiner of the king's mints in 1550. He was elected member of Parliament for Maldon in 1553. Although a Calvinist, he was employed by Queen Mary. On the accession of Elizabeth he was made treasurer of her household, and on April 21, 1566, succeeded Sir Richard Lockville as chancellor of the exchequer. In 1586 he was one of the judges of Mary Queen of Scots at Fotheringay. On Nov. 23, 1583, he bought the site of the Black Friars' Monastery at Cambridge, and on Jan. 11, 1584, was licensed to establish Emmanuel College, the statutes of which date from Oct. 1, 1585.

Miles (milz). A character in Greene's play "Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay."

A very diverting comic character is Bacon's servant Miles, who is of the type of the Vice in the old moralities. He plays the fool unabashed by either living monarchs or supernatural phenomena, and in the end cheerfully consents to be carried off by a devil, on being given to understand that in the quarters for which he is bound he will find a lusty fire, a pot of good ale, a "pair" of cards, and other requisites for a comfortable life. Miles, Nelson Appleton. Born at Westminster, Mass., Aug. 8, 1839. An American general. He served as a volunteer in the Army of the Potomac throughout the Civil War, attaining the rank of major-general of volunteers. He accepted a commission as colonel in the regular army at the close of the war, and was promoted major-general in 1890. He has conducted several campaigns against hostile Indians on the western frontiers, notably that against the Apaches under Gerojimo and Natchez, both of whom surrendered Sept. 4, 1886. He was in command of the United States troops stationed at Chicago during the riots in July, 1894.

Milesians (mĭ-lĕ'shĭanz or -zhanz). 1. The inhabitants of Miletus.—2. The natives of Ireland; members of the Irish race. They have been so called from the tradition of an ancient conquest and reorganization of the country by two sons of Milesius, a fabulous king of Spain.

Milesian Tales or Fables. Short stories of a witty and obscene nature, greatly in vogue among the Greeks and Romans. The name has arisen from a collection of tales by Antoinis Diogenes, compiled by Aristides of Miletus; they were translated into Latin by Cornelius Siseana (119-87 B. C.). These tales are now lost, but the name is still given to stories of a like nature. Bulwer published in 1866 a volume of poems entitled "The Lost Tales of Miletus."

Miles Wallingford. A novel by Cooper, published in 1844.

Mileto (mĕ-lĕ'tō). A town in Calabria, Italy, 43 miles northeast of Reggio.

Miletus (mĭ-lĕ'tus). [Gr. Μίλητος.] In ancient geography, a city situated in Caria, Asia Minor, on the Latmic Gulf, opposite the mouth of the Mæander, about lat. 37° 30' N., long. 27° 10' E. The temple of Apollo Didymæus here was restored in its final form about the time of Alexander. The ancients considered it one of the most splendid four existing. It was an Ionic dipteros of 10 by 21 columns, on a stylobate of 3 steps, measuring 160 by 350 feet. The columns were over 6 feet in base diameter, and 64 high. The cella, in plan 97 by 290 feet, had a deep pronaos with 4 columns in antis, and 2 subordinate interior chambers. The main chamber was divided into 3 aisles by ranges of columns. Remains exist of an ancient theater, entirely built of masonry, and enormous in mass: there is much sculptured ornament, including rich Composite capitals with Victories amid the foliage. It was early colonized by Ionian Greeks; was one of the leading Greek cities, a colonizer, and a center of philosophy and literature; headed the Ionian revolt against Persia in 500 B. C.; and was stormed and sacked by the Persians 494 B. C. It is now a village (Palatia).

Milford (mil'fōrd). A seaport in Pembrokeshire, South Wales, situated on Milford Haven in lat. 51° 44' N., long. 5° 3' W. It was formerly an important seaport, and was the landing-place of Henry VII. in 1485. Population (1891), 4,070.

Milford (mil'fōrd). A town in Worcester County, Massachusetts, 28 miles southwest of Boston. It has manufactures of boots, etc. Population (1890), 8,780.

Milford Haven. A landlocked estuary in South Wales, an arm of St. George's Channel. It is one of the best harbors in Great Britain. Length, about 17 miles.

This northern peninsula, itself made up to a considerable extent of smaller peninsulas, is cut off from its southern fellow by the haven of Milford. Here again we seem to see a Scandinavian trace. The ford here is surely neither an English ford nor a Welsh ford, but a Scandinavian ford, like Waterford and Wexford.

Freeman, English Towns, p. 41.

Milford Sound. An inlet on the southwestern coast of the South Island, New Zealand.

Milfort (mil'fōrt; F. pron. mĕl-for'), Le Clerc. Born near Mézières, France, about 1750; died at Mézières, 1817. A French adventurer. He was a chief among the Creek Indians, and later became a general under Napoleon.

Milhou. See Millau.

Milicz (mĕ'lich) of Kremsier. Born at Kremsier, Moravia; died at Avignon, France, June 29, 1374. A Bohemian preacher, one of the precursors of the Reformation.

Milindapanha (mĭ-lin-da-pang'ha). [Skt., 'the questions of Melinda.'] A Pali work, containing a conversation between the Buddhist monk Nagasena, supposed to have lived about 140 B. C., and King Milinda or Menander, the powerful Greco-Bactrian sovereign. It has been edited in Pali and in part translated into English by Trenkner.

Military Frontier, The. [G. Militärgrenze.] Formerly a part of the Austrian-Hungarian monarchy, bordering on the Turkish empire, and under special military regulations. It was formed in the 16th century for defense against the Turks; made a crownland in 1849; abolished and united in part to Transylvania in 1851, in part to Hungary in 1872, and the remainder to Croatia-Slavonia in 1881.

Milkom (mil'kom). The god of the Ammonites. See Molech.

Milk (milk) River. A river in Montana and British America, which joins the Missouri in Dawson County, northeastern Montana. Length, over 400 miles.

Milky Way, The. In astronomy, the Galaxy, a luminous band extending around the heavens. It is produced by myriads of stars, into which it is resolved by the telescope. It divides into two great branches, which remain apart for a distance of 150° and then reunite; there are also many smaller branches. At one point it spreads out very widely, exhibiting a fan-like expanse of interlacing branches nearly 20° broad; this terminates abruptly and leaves a kind of gap. At several points are seen dark spots in the midst of some of the brightest portions.

Mill (mil), James. Born at Northwater Bridge, Forfarshire, April 6, 1773; died at Kensington, June 23, 1836. An English utilitarian philosopher. He was the son of a shoemaker. He entered Edinburgh University in 1790, and from 1794 to 1798 studied divinity. He was licensed to preach in 1798. He sought literary employment in London in 1802, and in 1806 began the "History of India," which was finished 10 years later. He also formed a close intimacy with Bentham, whose disciple he became, revising his writings and advancing his principles. The "History of India" appeared in 1817, and became a standard work immediately. In 1819 he entered the India House. His intimacy with Ricardo began in 1811. Other disciples were George Grote, Henry Bickersteth, John Black, and Albany Bonpland. He assisted in establishing the "Westminster Review" in 1824. His "Analysis of the Human Mind" was published in 1829, his "Elements of Political Economy" in 1821.

Mill, John. Born at Shap, Westmoreland, England, about 1645; died June 23, 1707. An English biblical scholar. He published a critical edition of the New Testament (1707), etc.

Mill, John Stuart. Born at London, May 20, 1806; died at Avignon, France, May 8, 1873. A celebrated English philosophical writer, logician, and economist; eldest son of James Mill. He was a precocious child, and was put through an extraordinary system of forcing by his father, who took entire charge of his education. He was brought up an agnostic from his infancy, and never acquired any religious beliefs. In 1820 he visited France, and in 1823 entered the India House as his father's assistant. He became chief examiner in 1856. His first important literary work was the editing of Buchanan's "Treatise upon Evidence" (1825). His "Essays on Unsettled Questions of Political Economy" were written about 1830 (published 1844). In 1836 the "London Review," established in 1835, was amalgamated with the "Westminster Review," and Mill became practically its superintendent; he was its proprietor 1837-40. In 1836 he passed through a severe mental crisis, probably as a result of his extraordinary training, and was led to modify the strict utilitarianism of his father's school. His intimacy with Mrs. Taylor (whom he married in 1851) began in 1830. Mill's "Logic," his first successful work, was published in 1843. His "Political Economy" was published in 1848. His most carefully written work, the "Essay on Liberty," was published in 1859. He was elected member of Parliament for Westminster in 1865. His book "On the Subjection of Women" was published in 1869; his "Autobiography" appeared in 1873. Among his other publications are "Thoughts on Parliamentary Reform" (1839), "Dissertations and Discussions" (1859-67), "Considerations on Representative Government" (1861), "Utilitarianism" (1863), "Examination of Sir William Hamilton's Philosophy, etc." (1865), "Auguste Comte and Positivism"

(1865), "England and Ireland" (1868), "On the Irish Land Question" (1870), "Nature, the Utility of Religion, and Theism" (1874).

Millais (mil-lā'), Sir John Everett. Born at Southampton, June 8, 1829. A noted English genre-, landscape-, and portrait-painter. He won the silver medal at the Royal Academy in 1843, and the gold medal in 1847. In 1848, with Holman Hunt, D. G. Rossetti, and others, he founded the association which was afterward known as the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood (which see), and began to paint with the precision and attention to detail which characterize that school. He became associate royal academician in 1854, and royal academician in 1863, and was created baronet in 1885. In 1883 he was elected to the French Institute. Among his works are "Isabella" (1849), "Christ in the House of his Parents" (1850), "The Huguenot" (1852), "Ophelia" (1852), "The Proscribed Royalist" (1853), "The Order of Release" (1853), "Autumn Leaves" (1856), "Sir Isambard at the Ford" (1857), "The Black Brunswicker" (1860), "Charlie is my Darling" (1864), "The Minuet" (1866), "Rosaliid and Celia" (1868), "The Gambler's Wife" (1869), "The Boyhood of Raleigh" (1870), "Chill October" (1871), "The Northwest Passage" (1874), "Yes or No?" (1875), "Yeoman of the Guard" (1876), "Jersey Lily" (1878), "Bride of Lammermoor" (1878), "Olivia" (1882), "Idyl of 1745" (1884), "Lady Peggy Primrose" (1885), "Dew-drenched Furze" (1890), "Dorothy" (1891), etc. He has also designed illustrations for a number of books, including Tennyson's poems and some of Trollope's novels.

Millamant (mil'ā-mant). The principal female character in Congreve's comedy "The Way of the World." She is an incarnation of elegance, indifference, impertinence, and affectation; and, though a brilliant coquette and fine lady, is not without heart.

The chase and surrender of Millamant, superior to anything that is to be found in the whole range of English comedy from the civil war downwards.

Macaulay, Essays, II, 403.

Millau, or Milhau (mē-yō'). A town in the department of Aveyron, southern France, situated on the Tarn 54 miles northwest of Montpellier. It has manufactures of kid gloves. Population (1891), commune, 17,429.

Millbank Prison. A London penitentiary, situated on the Thames, near Vauxhall Bridge, between Chelsea and Westminster. It was built from designs by Jeremy Bentham, and is now disused.

Mill-Boy of the Slashes. A name sometimes given to Henry Clay, on account of the circumstances of his boyhood.

Millbury (mil'bu-ri). A town in Worcester County, Massachusetts, 38 miles west-southwest of Boston. Population (1890), 4,428.

Milledgeville (mil'ej-vil). A city, capital of Baldwin County, Georgia, situated on the Oconee 85 miles southeast of Atlanta. It was the State capital before 1868. Population (1890), 3,322.

Millenary Petition. A petition presented by about a thousand Puritan ministers to James I. on his progress to London in April, 1603, asking for certain changes in ceremonial, etc.

Miller (mē-yā'). Bénigne Emmanuel Clément. Born at Paris, 1812; died at Nice, France, 1886. A French Hellenist, noted as a paleographer.

Miller, Cincinnatus Heine. See Miller, Joaquin.

Miller (mil'ér). Hugh. Born at Cromarty, Oct. 10, 1802; committed suicide near Edinburgh, Dec. 2, 1856. A Scottish geologist, editor from 1840 of "The Witness," an Edinburgh newspaper. In his youth he worked as a stone-mason. In 1829 he published "Poems, Written in the Leisure Hours of a Journeyman Mason." In 1834 he became an accountant in the Commercial Bank of Cromarty. His "Scenes and Legends of the North of Scotland," with a chapter on geology, appeared in 1835. He corresponded with Murchison and Agassiz, and published "The Old Red Sandstone" (1841), "The Footprints of the Creator, or the Asterolpis of Stromness" (1847), "My Schools and Schoolmasters" (1852), etc. "The Testimony of the Rocks," explaining the six days of creation as six periods, was published in 1857. His death occurred in a fit of insanity caused by excessive brain-work.

Miller, James. Born at Peterborough, N. H., April 25, 1776; died at Temple, N. H., July 7, 1851. An American general and politician, distinguished at Lundy's Lane in 1814.

Miller, Joaquin (originally Cincinnatus Heine Miller). Born in Wabash district, Indiana, Nov. 10, 1841. An American poet. He removed to Oregon in 1854; was afterward a miner in California; studied law; edited the "Democratic Register" in Eugene, Oregon; and was judge of Grant County, Oregon, 1866-70. He was led to adopt his pseudonym from having written in defense of Joaquin Murietta, a Mexican brigand, and in 1887 returned to California. He is the author of "Songs of the Sierras" (1871), "Songs of the Sun Land" (1872), "The Ships in the Desert" (1875), "The First Families of the Sierras" (1875), "Songs of Italy" (1878), "Shadows of Shasta" (1881), "The Destruction of Gotham" (1880), "Songs of the Mexican Seas" (1887), "Building of the City Beautiful" (1893), and other works.

Miller, Johann Martin. Born at Ulm, Württemberg, Dec. 3, 1750; died there, June 21, 1814. A German novelist and lyric poet, author of the novel "Siegwart" (1776), etc.

Miller, Joseph. Born 1684; died at London, 1738. An English comedian. The collection of jests known as "Joe Miller's Jest" appeared originally in 1739 as "Joe Miller's Jest Book, or the Wit's Vade Mecum, etc." It was made by John Motley and received its name unwarrantably from Joseph Miller, who is popularly said never to have made a joke in his life, and could neither read nor write. It has been many times enlarged and reprinted. Any stale jest is now known as a "Joe Miller" from the fact that it is supposed to have at some time emanated from this source.

Miller, Samuel Freeman. Born at Richmond, Ky., April 5, 1816; died at Washington, D. C., Oct. 13, 1890. An American jurist. He practised medicine for a time, but afterward became a lawyer, and in 1850 removed from Kentucky to Keokuk, Iowa. He was appointed associate justice of the United States Supreme Court by President Lincoln in 1862, and was a member of the United States Electoral Commission of 1877. He was a Republican in politics.

Miller, Thomas. Born at Gainsborough, England, 1807; died at London, Oct. 24, 1874. An English poet, novelist, and writer on rural life, known as "the Basket-maker." Among his works are "Royston Gower," a novel (1833), "Rural Sketches," in verse (1839), "Gideon Giles the Roper" (1840), "Godfrey Malvern" (1843), "History of the Anglo-Saxons," etc. (1848; this went through five editions). He also wrote the fifth volume of G. W. Reynolds's "Mysteries of London" (1849), etc.

Miller, William. Born at Pittsfield, Mass., 1782; died in Washington County, N. Y., Dec. 20, 1849. An American religious enthusiast, the founder of the Millerites or Adventists. He commenced lecturing on the millennium in 1831.

Miller, William. Born at Wingham, Kent, Dec. 2, 1795; died at Callao, Peru, Oct. 31, 1861. An English general in the service of Peru. He fought with the British in the Peninsula 1811-14, and in the United States in 1815; took service with the patriots at Buenos Ayres in 1816; and distinguished himself in the invasion of Chile 1817-19, and in Peru, where he held independent commands and led the cavalry at Junin (Aug. 6, 1824) and Ayacucho (Dec. 9, 1824). He remained in the service of Peru, became grand marshal under Santa Cruz, and on his defeat (1839) was banished. He returned and was reinstated in rank in 1859. His "Memoirs" were published in 1829 by his brother, John Miller: they give one of the best accounts of the Spanish-American revolution.

Miller, William. Born at Edinburgh, May 28, 1796; died at Sheffield, England, Jan. 20, 1882. A Scottish line-engraver. He was apprenticed in 1811 to William Archibald, engraver, and in 1819 studied with George Cook in London. He returned to Edinburgh, and his first plates were for Williams's "Views in Greece" (1822). In 1824 he began to engrave after Turner, of whom he was the chief interpreter.

Miller, William Allen. Born at Ipswich, Dec. 17, 1817; died at Liverpool, Sept. 30, 1870. An English chemist. He was educated at Merchant Taylors' School and at a Quaker seminary at Ackworth in Yorkshire. About 1837 he entered the medical department of King's College, London, and in 1840 studied with Liebig at Gießen. In 1842 he received the degree of M. D. from the University of London, and in 1845 he was made an F. R. S. His first experiments in spectrum analysis were published in a paper before the British Association in 1845, in which diagrams of flame spectra were first shown. In 1862 this was followed by a paper on the "Photographic Transparency of Various Bodies," illustrated by photographs of the spectra of twenty-five metals. With the assistance of Dr. Huggins he began in 1862 experiments on the spectra of the heavenly bodies, procuring the first trustworthy results in solar chemistry. They were awarded the gold medal of the Royal Astronomical Society for their results. In 1851 he published a "Report on the Metropolitan Water Supply." He invented a self-registering thermometer for deep-sea soundings.

Miller's Tale of the Carpenter, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." Its source is unknown, but it is probably from some rough jest of the day.

Millesimo (mil-lā'sē-mō). A village in the province of Genoa, Italy, situated on the Bormida 36 miles west of Genoa. Here, April 13 and 14, 1796, the French under Bonaparte defeated the Austrian and Sardinian forces.

Millet (mil-lā'), Aimé. Born at Paris, Sept. 27, 1819; died there, Jan. 13, 1891. A French sculptor. He studied both painting and sculpture, and was for a time in the studio of David d'Angers. He first exhibited drawings at the Salon of 1842, and until 1852 his exhibits were both paintings and statues. After that he confined himself entirely to sculpture. Among his works are "Une Bacchante" (1845); "Ariane" (1857), now at the Luxembourg; "Vierge-torix," a colossal statue in copper set up at Aïse-Sainte-Étienne, Côte-d'Or (1865); a number of portrait busts, including George Sand and Edmond Adam; "Tombeau de la Princesse Christine de Montpensier," for the city of Seville (1881); "La Physique," for the Nice Observatory (1881); various colossal figures for public buildings in Paris (1882); a bronze statue of Edgar Quinet (1885); "Phidias," for the Luxembourg Gardens (1887), etc.

Millet (mil'let), Francis Davis. Born at Mat-tapoisett, Mass., Nov. 3, 1846. An American figure- and portrait-painter. He studied at Antwerp at the Royal Academy with Van Lerius and De Keyser. He was correspondent for the London "Daily News" in the war between Russia and Turkey. Among his works are "Bay of Naples" (1875), "Bashi Bazonk" (1880), "A Window Seat" (1885), "The Handmaid" and "A Cosy Corner" (1886), "How the Gossip Grew" (1890).

Millet (mē-lā'), François (Frans Mille), often called Francisque. Born at Antwerp, 1642; died at Paris, 1679. A Flemish landscape-painter, a pupil of Laurens Francken, and afterward a follower of Poussin.

Millet, Jean François. Born at Gruchy, near Gréville, Manche, France, Oct. 4, 1814; died at Barbizon, near Fontainebleau, France, Jan. 20, 1875. A celebrated French painter, noted for his simple and pathetic representations of peasant life in France. He worked with his father, a farmer, as a farm-laborer in his youth; but in 1832, having shown ability in drawing, he was placed at Cherbourg with Mouchel, who secured for him an annuity to enable him to proceed with his studies. He went to Paris in 1837, and studied with Paul Delaroché; and in 1840 his first work, a portrait, was accepted at the Salon. He struggled to maintain himself for some years, and in 1845 fought at the barricades in Paris. The next year he settled at Barbizon, where he remained for the rest of his life. Among his works are "The Sower" (1849), "Peasants Grafting" (1855), "The Cleaners" (1857), "The Angelus" (1859; which see), "Death and the Wood-cutter" (1859), "Waiting" and "The Sheep-shearers" (1860), "The Man with the Hoe" and "Wool-carding" (1863), "Shepherdess and Sheep" (1864), "Goose Girl" (1867), "Evening Prayer" (1868), "Potato Planters" (1898), etc.

Millevoye (mēl-vvō'), Charles Hubert. Born at Abbeville, 1782; died at Paris, 1816. A French poet. He published a volume of poems in 1801. His article on "Le danger des romans" (1804) and a series of his poems (1806-12) were crowned by the Academy.

At the head of the poets of this minor band has to be mentioned Millevoye, who might, perhaps with equal or greater appropriateness, have found a place in the preceding book. He is chiefly remarkable as the author of one charming piece of sentimental verse, "La Chute des Feuilles"; and as the occasion of an immortal criticism of Sainte-Beuve's, "Il se trouve dans les trois quarts des hommes un poète qui meurt jeune tandis que l'homme survit." Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 541.

Milliken's Bend (mil'ikenz bend). A village in Madison parish, Louisiana, situated on the Mississippi 17 miles northwest of Vicksburg. A body of 3,000 Confederates was repulsed here by the Federals June 7, 1863.

Mill on the Floss, The. A novel by George Eliot, published in 1860.

Millot (mē-yō'), Claude François Xavier. Born at Orans, France, March 5, 1726; died at Paris, March 21, 1785. A French historical writer, a member of the Jesuit order.

Mills (milz), Charles. Born near Greenwich, England, July 29, 1788; died at Southampton, Oct. 9, 1826. An English historian, author of a "History of Mohammedanism" (1817), etc.

Mills, Clark. Born in Onondaga County, N. Y., Dec. 1, 1815; died at Washington, D. C., Jan. 12, 1883. An American sculptor. Among his works are equestrian statues of Jackson and Washington (at Washington), a statue of "Liberty" (Capitol, Washington), etc.

Mills, Roger Quarles. Born in Todd County, Ky., March 30, 1832. An American Democratic politician. He settled in Texas in 1849, served as a Confederate officer in the Civil War, and was a member of Congress from Texas 1873-92. He was chairman of the Ways and Means Committee 1887-89, and as such introduced the Mills Bill (which see) in 1888. He has represented Texas in the United States Senate since 1892.

Mills Bill. A tariff bill, named from the chairman (R. Q. Mills) of the Ways and Means Committee, passed by the Democratic House in 1888, and rejected by the Republican Senate. It placed wool, lumber, hemp, and flax on the free list, and reduced duties on pig-iron, woolen goods, etc.

Mill Springs (milspringz). A village in Wayne County, southern Kentucky, situated on the Cumberland 89 miles south of Frankfort. Near it, Jan. 19, 1862, the Federals under Thomas defeated the Confederates under Crittenden and Zollicoffer. The Federal and Confederate losses were respectively about 250 and 350.

Millville (mil'vil). A city in Cumberland County, New Jersey, situated on Maurice River 40 miles south of Philadelphia. It manufactures glass, cotton, etc. Population (1900), 10,002.

Milman (mil'man), Henry Hart. Born at London, Feb. 10, 1791; died near Ascot, Sept. 24, 1868. An English clergyman, the third son of Sir Francis Milman, physician of George III. He was educated at Eton and Brasenose College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1814. In 1812 he won the Newdigate prize with an English poem on the "Apollo Belvedere," and in 1821 was elected professor of poetry at Oxford. "Fazio," a drama, composed at Oxford, was published in 1815, and performed at Covent Garden Feb. 5, 1818, with Miss O'Neill in the cast. It was also used by Madame Ristori in 1856. "Samor," an epic, appeared in 1818; "The Fall of Jerusalem" in 1820; and the "Martyr of Antioch" in 1822. In 1835 he published translations from Sanskrit poems. In 1827 he delivered the Bampton Lectures. His "History of the Jews," which appeared in 1830 treated them as an Oriental tribe, with little attention to the miraculous element. In 1835 Sir Robert Peel made him canon of Westminster and rector of St. Margaret's. In 1840 he published the "History of Christianity under the Empire." Although shunned by the clergy for his unconventional views, he was advanced to the deanery of St. Paul's in 1849. In 1838 he edited Gibbon, and in 1855 published the "History of Latin Christianity down to the death of Pope Nicholas V." The remainder of his life was devoted to the administration of his office.

Milne Edwards (mĕl-nā-dwār'), Alphonse. Born 1835. A French naturalist, son of Henri Milne Edwards: director of the Museum of Natural History of Paris.

Milne Edwards, Henri. Born at Bruges, Belgium, Oct. 23, 1800; died at Paris, July 28, 1885. A noted French naturalist. His works include "Éléments de zoologie" (1835), "Histoire naturelle des crustacés" (1834-41), "Recherches pour servir à l'histoire naturelle des mammifères" (1864-74), "Leçons sur la physiologie et l'anatomie comparée de l'homme et des animaux" (1857-83), etc.

Milner (mil'nēr), Isaac. [The surname Milner is an older form of Miller, from miller.] Born at Leeds, Jan. 11, 1751; died at Kensington, April 1, 1820. An English mathematician and divine. He entered Queens' College, Cambridge, in 1770; became rector of St. Botolph's, Cambridge, in 1778; and first Jackson professor of natural philosophy in 1782. He was made dean of Queens' College in 1788, vice-chancellor of the university in 1792, and Lucasian professor of mathematics in 1798. He was intimate with William Wilberforce, and died at his home in Kensington Gore.

Milner, John. Born at London, Oct. 14, 1752; died at Wolverhampton, April 19, 1826. An English bishop and vicar-apostolic of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1766 he entered the English college at Douai; was ordained priest in 1777; and was appointed pastor of the Catholic congregation at Winchester. In 1803 he was appointed by Pope Pius VII. bishop of Castabala in partibus, and vicar-apostolic of the Midland district. In politics he opposed any plan for Catholic emancipation which should recognize a right of veto in the English crown. As an archaeologist he published "The History, Civil and Ecclesiastical, and Survey of the Antiquities of Winchester" (1798-1801). A "Treatise on the Ecclesiastical Architecture of England during the Middle Ages" was published in 1835.

Milner, Joseph. Born at Leeds, England, Jan. 2, 1744; died at Hull, England, Nov. 15, 1797. An English church historian. He wrote a "History of the Church of Christ" (1794), etc.

Milner, Miss. The principal character in Mrs. Inchbald's "Simple Story."

The tale of a young lady, Miss Milner, left to the care of a Roman Catholic priest, Dorriforth, with whom she falls in love; and, as he becomes the Earl of Elmwood, and is released from his ordination vows, she marries him; and afterward becomes unfaithful, and dies in great misery. Forsyth, Novels and Novelists of the 18th Cent., p. 172.

Milnes (milz), Richard Monckton, first Lord Houghton. Born at London, June 19, 1809; died at Vichy, Aug. 11, 1885. He graduated at Cambridge (Trinity College) in 1831, and was intimate there with Tennyson, Hallam, and Thackeray. He visited Germany, Italy, and Greece, and settled in London in 1835. He became member of Parliament for Pontefract in 1837, joined the Liberal party, and assisted in passing the Copyright Act. In 1863 he was created Baron Houghton. He visited America in 1875. He published several volumes of poems, "The Life and Letters of Keats" (1848), etc.

Milo. See Melos.

Milo (mī'lō), or Milon (mī'lōn). [Gr. Μίλων.] Born at Crotona, Magna Græcia, Italy; lived in the last part of the 6th century B. C. A Greek athlete, famous for his strength. He was six times victor in wrestling at the Olympic games and six times at the Pythian, and many stories were told of his extraordinary feats of strength, of which the best-known is his carrying a heifer, four years old, on his shoulders through the stadium at Olympia, then slaying it and eating the whole of it in a day. He is said to have been eaten by wolves which attacked him while his hands were caught in a cleft tree which he had endeavored to rend.

Milo, Titus Annius Papianus. Killed in Lucania, Italy, 48 B. C. A Roman partizan leader, tribune 57 B. C.: a rival of Clodius whom he killed at Bovillæ 52. He was exiled to Massilia. The oration of Cicero in his behalf which we possess is not the speech actually delivered (which was unsuccessful), but a subsequent revision of it.

Miloradovitch (mĕ-lō-rā'dō-vich), Count Mikhaïl. Born at St. Petersburg, 1770; killed at St. Petersburg, Dec. 26, 1825. A Russian general, distinguished in the Napoleonic wars.

He became ruler of Servia in 1817; was proclaimed hereditary prince in 1827; was compelled to abdicate in 1839; and was again prince 1858-60.

Miltiades (mil-tī'ā-dēz). [Gr. Μιλτιάδης.] Died about 489 B. C. A celebrated Athenian general. He defeated the Persians under Datis and Artaphernes at Marathon Sept. 12, 490. Having failed in an expedition against Paros, he was flung fifty talents, which he was unable to pay, and died in prison.

Milton (mil'ton), John. Born about 1563; died in March, 1647. The father of John Milton the poet, and son of Richard Milton of Stanton St. John, near Oxford. He was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where he became a Protestant. He was admitted to the Company of Stationers in London Feb. 27, 1600. He married Sarah, daughter of Paul Jeffrey, a merchant tailor. He was a man of high character, a good scholar, and devoted to music.

Milton, John. Born at London, Dec. 9, 1608; died there, Nov. 8, 1674. A celebrated English poet. He was the son of John Milton, a scrivener. His tutor was Thomas Young, graduate of St. Andrews University, afterward well known as a Presbyterian clergyman and master of Jesus College, Cambridge. He also attended St. Paul's School until 1624. At 16 he entered Christ's College, Cambridge, in the grade of pensioner, and graduated in 1629. To this period belong most of his Latin poems, the "Ode on the Nativity" (1629), the sonnet to Shakspeare (1630), and the sonnet to the nightingale, etc. For the next six years he devoted himself to literature at Horton, near Windsor, where he wrote "Ad Patrem," "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," "Comus" (1634), and "Lycidas" (Nov., 1637). In 1638 he went to Italy, meeting Grotius in Paris and Galileo in Florence. The Scottish war called him back in 1639. The first suggestion of "Paradise Lost," in the form of a tragedy, dates from 1640. After the meeting of the Long Parliament (Nov., 1640), Milton joined in the attacks on the Episcopacy, and began his political writings with "Of Reformation touching Church Discipline in England" (1641), "The Reason of Church Government urged against Prelacy" (1642), and others. In 1643 he married as his first wife Mary Powell, of Forest Hill, Oxfordshire. She was the daughter of a Royalist, and was only 17 years old; she found life dull with him, and abandoned him a month later. This desertion was the occasion of his pamphlets on divorce, and the persecution which followed suggested the "Areopagitica," a plea for a free press (the most popular of his prose works). She returned to him after a few years, and he forgave her. She died in 1652. Of this marriage three children, daughters, lived to maturity. After the execution of Charles I., Milton was made Latin secretary to the new Commonwealth (March, 1649). Of his political writings during this period the most important are the "Eikonoklastes" (1649), in answer to the "Eikon Basilike" of John Gauden, and the famous "Defensio prima" or "Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio" (1650), an answer to the "Defensio Regia pro Carolo I." by Claude de Saumaise of Leyden. The "Defensio secunda" appeared in May, 1654. By May, 1652, he had become totally blind. In 1656 he married Catharine Woodcock, who died in 1658; and in 1663 he married Elizabeth Minshull, who survived him. Up to the period of his third marriage his domestic life had been rendered unhappy by the indutifulness of his daughters, who were impatient of the restraints and employments his blindness imposed upon them. At the Restoration he was freed from all legal consequences of his actions by the Indemnity Act (Oct., 1660). "Paradise Lost" was actually begun in the epic form in 1658, finished before July, 1665, and published in 1667. He sold his rights in the poem to Samuel Simmons, printer, for £5 down, and the promise of three subsequent payments of £5 each. It was entered on the "Stationers' Register" Aug. 20, 1667. Suggestions for "Paradise Lost" may have come from the Anglo-Saxon poem attributed to Caedmon (published in 1655), the "Adamo" of Andreini, and the "Lucifer" of Joost van Vondel (1654). In 1669 appeared his history of Britain to the Norman Conquest, and in 1671 "Paradise Regained" and "Samson Agonistes." His numerous other works in Latin and English were mostly polemical. His last political pamphlet, "Of True Religion, Heresy, Schism, Toleration, etc.," was published in 1673.

Minerva (mi-nér'vā). In Roman mythology, one of the three chief divinities, the other two being Jupiter and Juno. The chief seat of the cult of all three was the great temple on the Capitoline Hill. Minerva was a virgin, the daughter of Jupiter, the supreme god, and hence was identified, as the Romans came more and more under the influence of Hellenic culture, with the Greek Athene (or Athena) or Pallas, the goddess of wisdom, of war, and of the liberal arts. Like Athene, Minerva was represented in art with a grave and majestic countenance, armed with helmet, shield, and spear, and wearing long full drapery, and on her breast the aegis.

Minerva. An antique statue in marble, in the Glyptothek at Munich. The goddess wears the scaled aegis, with tunic and himation. The helmeted head, though antique, does not belong to this statue, and the right arm is incorrectly restored as raised to hold a spear; it was probably extended, supporting a Victory. See Farnese.

Minerva Medica. [So called from the contorted serpent at the goddess's feet.] An impressive antique statue in Parian marble, in the Vatican, Rome. It is a copy from a fine Greek original, and is believed to have been the cult-statue of the temple replaced by Santa Maria sopra Minerva. The goddess stands erect as guardian, holding her spear. She is clad in a long diploidion-tunic, with the aegis and himation, and wears a Corinthian helmet.

Minerva Pacifera. ['The peace-bringer.'] A fine statue found at Velletri, now in the Capitoline Museum, Rome. The goddess holds her spear, and wears diploidion and himation and Corinthian helmet, but no aegis, and is attended by no serpent. The type is closely similar to that of the Minerva Medica.

Minnesingers (min'e-sing-ērz). [G., 'love-singers.'] A class of German lyric poets and singers of the 12th and 13th centuries, so called because love was their chief theme. They were chiefly or exclusively men of noble descent—knights, nobles, princes, and even emperors. They sang their pieces to their own accompaniment on the viol, and often engaged in poetical contests for the gratification of princes and ladies of the court. Among the chief seats of the minnesingers were Swabia and Austria, and the leading dialect used was the Swabian. The minnesingers were succeeded by the mastersingers.

Minnesota (min-e-sō'tä). A river in Minnesota, rising in lakes on the South Dakota border, and joining the Mississippi about 7 miles southwest of St. Paul. Length, about 450 miles.

Minnesota. One of the North Central States of the United States, extending from lat. 43° 30' to 49° 25' N., and from long. 89° 29' to 97° 5' W. Capital, St. Paul. It is bounded by British America on the north, Lake Superior and Wisconsin on the east, Iowa on the south, and the Dakotas on the west. The surface is generally an undulating plain. The "Height of Land" in the north forms the watershed between the Mississippi, St. Lawrence, and Hudson Bay systems. The chief rivers are the Mississippi and the Red River of the North. The leading industry is agriculture, this being one of the leading States in the production of wheat. The chief exports are wheat, flour, and lumber. It has 80 counties, sends 2 senators and 7 representatives to Congress, and has 9 electoral votes. The region was first explored by the French in the end of the 17th century. The Territory of Minnesota, formed from part of the Northwest Territory (acquired 1783), and from part of the Louisiana Purchase of 1803, was organized in 1849. The State was admitted to the Union in 1858. It was the scene of the Sioux massacre and war in 1862-63. The name is from that of the river. Area, 83,365 square miles. Population (1890), 1,301,826.

For his life before his accession to the throne of his great-grandfather Faridun, see Faridun. Before his death Faridun intrusted the care of Minuchihr to his trusty warrior Sam, the son of Nariman. The story of Minuchihr's reign is essentially that of the birth and adventures of Zal, the son of Sam, including the birth of Zal's son Rustam, and his first two adventures, the slaying of the white elephant and the taking of Sipand.

Minucius Felix (mi-nū'shi-us fē'liks), Marcus. A Roman advocate and Christian apologist, probably a contemporary of Marcus Aurelius. His dialogue "Octavius" is the earliest extant work of Latin Christian literature. The scene of the conversation is laid at Ostia, and the speakers are Cæcilius Natalis, Octavianus Januarius, and the author. Cæcilius attacks Christianity on various grounds, and Octavius defends it; at the conclusion Cæcilius admits that he is beaten in the argument, and the author, who acts as umpire, declares that a decision is unnecessary.

Minuit (min'ū-it), or Minnewit (min'e-wit).

Peter. Born at Wesel, Rhenish Prussia, about 1580; died at Fort Christina, New Sweden (Delaware), 1641. A colonial official in the Dutch and afterward in the Swedish service in America. He was appointed governor of New Netherlands by the Dutch West India Company Dec. 19, 1625, and landed on Manhattan Island May 4, 1626. He purchased the island from the Indians for trinkets valued at about twenty-four dollars, and erected Fort Amsterdam. He was recalled in Aug., 1631. Having been commissioned by the Swedish West India Company to found a colony on the west side of Delaware Bay, he left Gothenburg with a band of fifty colonists late in 1637, and after having touched at Jamestown, reached Delaware Bay in April, 1638. He purchased from the Indians the region between Cape Henlopen and the falls of the Delaware at Trenton (to which was given the name of New Sweden), and erected Fort Christina. He remained governor of New Sweden until his death.

Mira (mī'rä or mö'rä). [NL. Mira, the wonderful.] The remarkable variable star α Ceti, which is sometimes brighter than the second magnitude, and sometimes fainter than the tenth, though its brightness at maximum now seldom exceeds the fourth magnitude: its period is about eleven months.

Mirabeau (më-rä-bō'), Vicomte de (André Boniface Louis Riquetti). Born at Bignon, near Nemours, France, 1754; died at Freiburg, Baden, 1792. A French royalist deputy to the National Assembly, brother of Gabriel Honoré de Mirabeau.

Mirabeau, Comte de (Gabriel Honoré Riquetti). Born at Bignon, near Nemours, France, March 9, 1749; died at Paris, April 2, 1791. The greatest orator of the French Revolution. As a child he was so unwell that his father treated him with great severity, and ended by putting him through a course of military training. He entered the army, served in Corsica, and rose to the rank of captain of dragoons. He married in 1772, and had soon spent the better part of his wife's fortune. Various intrigues, especially his elopement with Sophie de Ruffey, the young wife of the Marquis de Monnier, led to his imprisonment at different times; he obtained final release in Dec., 1780. Up to that time he had written essays and pamphlets, translated English and German books, and kept up a correspondence with Sophie de Ruffey, to whom he had dedicated his "Erotica biblion" and other works. After traveling in Switzerland, he went to London (1784-85), and then to Berlin (1785-86). From here he wrote home a series of official reports, "Histoire secrète de la cour de Berlin" (1789), and he also gathered materials for his "Monarchie prussienne" (1788). Mirabeau was elected a delegate of the third estate from Aix to the convention of the States-General in Paris (1789), and his ability as an orator at once made him a political power. In 1790 he became president of the Jacobin Club, also (1791) of the National Assembly. His course of life undermined his robust constitution, and he died in his forty-third year.

Mirabeau, Marquis de (Victor Riquetti). Born in Provence, France, Oct. 5, 1715; died at Argenteuil, France, July 13, 1789. A French political economist, father of Gabriel Honoré de Mirabeau: called "The Friend of Man" ("L'ami des hommes"), from the title of one of his works.

Mirabeau-Tonneau (-to-nō'). [F., 'Mirabeau the barrel.']. André Boniface Louis Riquetti, Vicomte de Mirabeau: so nicknamed on account of his size.

Mirabel, or Mirabell (mir'a-bel). 1. The principal character in Fletcher's play "The Wild Goose Chase." He is a libertine and fashionable rake, gaining his title of "wild goose" from his successful evasion of the marriage noose.

2. In Congreve's comedy "The Way of the World," a brilliant and witty fine gentleman, said to be like Congreve himself.

Mirabel, Old. In Farquhar's comedy "The Inconstant," a peevish old man with a fondness for his son.

Mirabel, Tommy. The son of Old Mirabel: "the inconstant," in Farquhar's play of that name. He is a gay and generous fine gentleman, but unstable in his affections. The first four acts of this play are taken from "The Wild Goose Chase"; and, though somewhat modified, the characters are the same. All these parts have been general favorites both with actors and with audiences.

Mirabella (mir-a-bel'lä). A fair maiden, in Spenser's "Faerie Queene," who had scorned many lovers. She was sentenced in Cupid's court to ride on a wretched jade, "accompanied by a fool, till she had saved as many lovers as she had slain."

Mirach, or Mirak (mir'ak or më'rak). [Ar. mirâq, the loins: but the derivation is doubtful.] The ordinary name of the second-magnitude star β Andromedæ. The name is also applied to the third-magnitude star ϵ Bootis, which is more usually known as Izar (which see).

Miramar (më-rä-mär'). The palace of the archduke (Mexican emperor) Maximilian, near Trieste.

Mirambo (më-räm'bō). Died 1885. A chief of the Wanyamwezi, East Africa, who from the rank of a common porter rose to that of a powerful chief and conqueror.

Miramichi (mir'a-mi-shë'). 1. A bay forming an arm of the Gulf of St. Lawrence, situated east of New Brunswick.—2. A river in New Brunswick which falls into Miramichi Bay. Length, about 175 miles.

Miramon (më-rä-myōn'), Madame de (Marie Bonneau). Born at Paris, 1629; died there, 1696. A Frenchwoman noted for her good works. After an unhappy youth she founded the House of Refuge, the establishment of Ste.-Pélagie, and the original community of 12 girls which became later the Congrégation des Miramiones. Of this she became the superior, and left her great fortune to this and other benevolent institutions.

Miramón (më-rä-mōn'), Miguel. Born at Mexico City, Sept. 29, 1832; died at Querétaro, June 19, 1867. A Mexican general. He was prominent on the side of the reactionists 1856-58; succeeded Zuloaga as president of that faction Feb. 2, 1859; and during the succeeding two years of the "reform" war spent much of the time in the field against Juárez and his adherents. He was eventually defeated at the battle of Calpulalpan, near Mexico, Dec. 22, 1860, and fled from the country. Maximilian, to whom he adhered, made him grand marshal and minister to Berlin. He returned to Mexico in 1866, became one of Maximilian's most trusted generals, and was captured and shot with him at Querétaro.

Miranda (mi-ran'dä). [L., 'admirable.']. 1. In Shakspeare's play "The Tempest," the daughter of Prospero: she is loved by Ferdinand.

The character of Miranda resolves itself into the very elements of womanhood. She is beautiful, modest, and tender, and she is these only; they comprise her whole being, external and internal. She is so perfectly unspiced, so delicately refined, that she is all but ethereal.

Mrs. Janson, Characteristics of Women.

2. In Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "The Busybody," an heiress. Mrs. Abingdon made her début in this character in 1755.

Miranda (më-rän'dä). A northern state of Venezuela, between Bermudez and Carabobo, and extending from the Caribbean Sea to the Orinoco. Capital, Ciudad de Cura. It incloses the Federal District and Caracas. The southern part lies in the llanos and is a grazing country; the northern section is mountainous and agricultural. Miranda corresponds nearly to the extinct state of Guzman Blanco. Area, 33,963 square miles. Population (1889), 526,633.

Miranda, Countess of. See Nilsson, Christine. Miranda (më-rän'dä), Francisco Antonio Gabriel. Born at Caracas, Venezuela, June 9, 1756; died at Cadiz, Spain, July 14, 1816. A Spanish-American revolutionist. He was an officer in the Spanish army 1773-82, and subsequently served with the French allies of the North Americans; was in St. Petersburg, where he received a pension from Catharine II.; fought in the French republican army as general of division 1792-93; and in the latter year was accused before the Revolutionary tribunal, but escaped. He spent many years in scheming for the emancipation of Spanish South America, and made an unsuccessful descent on the coast of Venezuela in 1806, with the design of leading a revolt. After the revolution of 1810 he returned to Venezuela, was made commander of the patriot army, and in April, 1812, was made dictator. The great earthquake of March 26, 1812, left the country impoverished, and was regarded by many as a sign of divine wrath: as a consequence the royalists gained ground, and on July 25 Miranda signed a treaty which gave up the country to them. He was arrested soon after, sent to Spain, and died in captivity. Miranda's influence on the Spanish-American revolution was very great, but mainly indirect, through the secret societies which he established, and through his influence with European statesmen. See Gran Reunion Americana.

Miranda, Sá de. See Sá de Miranda.

Mirandola (më-rän'dō-lä). A small town in the province of Modena, Italy, 18 miles north-north-east of Modena. It was once the capital of a duchy belonging to the Pico family. Francesco Maria, the last duke, sold it to Modena in 1710.

Mirandola, Count of. See Pico.

Miranhas, Sp. Mirañas (më-rän'yäz). A horde of Indians in Brazil and Colombia, principally between the rivers Igá and Japurá. They number at least several thousands, are very savage, and are said to be cannibals. Their linguistic affinities are doubtful.

Mirbel (mër-bel'), Charles François, called Brissau de Mirbel. Born at Paris, March 27, 1776; died near Paris, Sept. 12, 1854. A noted French botanist, professor at the Musée d'Histoire Naturelle in Paris from 1829. Among his works are "Traité d'anatomie et de physiologie végétale" (1802), "Éléments de physiologie végétale et de botanique" (1815).

Miriam. In Hawthorne's "Marble Faun," a woman of warm and passionate nature and mysterious origin and powers. She sanctions the crime which Donatello commits, and in so doing binds herself to him. See Donatello.

Mirim (më-rën'). Lake. A lake on the boundary of Uruguay and the province of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil. Length, about 115 miles. Also Miri.

Miropolie (më-rō-pōl'ye). A town in the government of Kursk, Russia, situated on the Pstol 82 miles north-northwest of Kharkoff. Population, 3,289.

Mirror for Magistrates, The. A compilation of poems undertaken by William Baldwin with aid from George Ferrers and others. It was begun and partly printed in 1555, but was stopped by the lord chancellor, Stephen Gardiner. In 1559 it was licensed and first issued. It then contained 19 metrical tragedies, or biographies, of men in high place who had come to violent ends, and was an English sequel to Lydgate's "Falls of Princes" from Boccaccio. It has been justly said to connect the work of Lydgate with that of Spenser. It was republished in 1563, 1574, 1578, and 1587, each time with additions. The "Induction" and "Complaint of Buckingham," which were contributed by Thomas Sackville, Lord Buckhurst, to the edition of 1559, not published till 1563, outweigh all the rest in value.

Aldee published in October, 1579, what [Anthony] Munday may well be regarded as his first piece of substantial work, a religious companion to "The Mirror for Magistrates," called "The Mirrour of Mutabilitie"; or, principal part of the Mirrour of Magistrates, selected out of the sacred scriptures." Mirrors were in fashion. There was a "Theatre or Mirrour of the World," in 1569; a "Mirror of Madnesse," in 1576; a "Mirror of Modestie" [by Thomas Colter] had been licensed to Edward White in April, 1579; there was afterwards a "Mirror of Mirth," in 1583 [a "Mirror of Modestie" was published by Robert Greene, 1584]; a "Mirror of Man's Miseries," in 1584; a "Mirror of Magnanimity," in 1599; a "Mirror of Martyrs," in 1601; with more of the kind. Mathematics, Politics, and the Latin Tongue were shown also in "Mirrors." "The Mirrour of Mutabilitie" was a series of metrical tragedies in two parts.

Morley, English Writers, IX, 155.

Mirror of Knighthood, The. A translation of the Spanish romance "Cavallero del Febo or Phebo" ("the Knight of the Sun"), containing the adventures of the Donzel del Phebo, the fair Lindabrides, etc. It belongs to the Amadis cycle of romances.

The whole romance ["Knight of the Sun"] has been translated into English, under the title of the Mirror of Knighthood, and into French literally from the Spanish, in eight volumes.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I, 377.

Mirror of Modesty, The. A pamphlet by Robert Greene, published in 1584. It tells the story of Susanna and the elders.

Mirror of the World, The. See the extract.

There was also, upon a hundred leaves of folio, "The Mirrour of the World," translated and printed in the year 1481, with wood-engravings. It was a book translated from a Latin "Speculum vel Inago Mundi" in 1245, for the Duke of Berry, into French verse, which was afterwards turned by a Maistre Gossouin—unless that be only the name of a copyist—into French prose. From that prose Caxton made his translation in 1481 at the request of Hugh Brice, of the Mercers' Company, citizen and alderman of London, and, like Caxton, a Keatish man, who wished for the book as a present to Lord Hastings.

Morley, English Writers, VI, 314.

Mirza. See Vision of Mirza.

Mirzam (mēr-zām'). [Ar. al-mirzam, the roarer.] The third-magnitude star β Canis Majoris, in the paw of the animal. The Arabs gave the same name to three other stars: β Canis Minoris and α and γ Orionis.

Mirzapur (mēr-zā-pūr'). 1. A district in the Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 25° N., long. 82° 40' E. Area, 5,224 square miles. Population (1881), 1,136,796.—2. The capital of the district of Mirzapur, situated on the Ganges 31 miles west-southwest of Benares. It was long noted for its cotton trade. Population (1891), 84,130.

Mirza-Schafy (mēr-zā-shāf-tē'). An Oriental poet who was the teacher and friend of Friedrich Bodenstedt during his residence in Tiflis. The "Songs of Mirza-Schafy," published by Bodenstedt in 1851, are (with one or two exceptions) his own, but are Oriental in spirit and imagery. They became, and still are, extraordinarily popular. See Bodenstedt.

Misanthrope, Le (lê mē-zān-trōp'). A comedy by Molière, produced in 1666. This play is an almost inexhaustible source of allusions, quotations, proverbial sayings, etc. Its principal interest lies in the development of various pairs of opposing characters in even their lightest shades. It is the ideal of classic comedy.

Here Molière's special vein of satire was worked most deeply and to most profit, though the reproach that the handling is somewhat too serious for comedy is not undeserved. Alceste the impatient but not cynical hero, Célimène the coquette, Oronte the fop, Éliante the reasonable woman, Arsinoé the mischief-maker, are all immortal types.

Sautsbury, French Lit., p. 310.

Mischabelhörner (mē-shā-bel-hēr'ner). Spurs of Monte Rosa, in the Swiss Alps. They are the Dom (14,940 feet) and the Täsehörn (14,757 feet).

Miseno (mē-sā'nō). Cape. A promontory at the northwestern entrance to the Bay of Naples. It was the ancient Misenum, or Promontorium Misenum; and near it there was a city Misenum.

Misenus (mī-sē'nus). In Roman legend, a companion of Æneas.

Miser, The. 1. A comedy by Thomas Shadwell (1671), founded on Molière's "L'Avare."—2. A comedy by Fielding (1733), from the same source.

Misérables, Les (lâ mē-zā-râbl'). [F., 'The Unfortunates.'] A novel by Victor Hugo, in five parts: "Fantine," "Cosette," "Marius," "L'Idylle rue Plumet," and "Jean Valjean." It was published in 1862.

Misfortunes of Arthur, The. A tragedy written principally by Thomas Hughes, produced in 1587 before Queen Elizabeth. Eight members of the Society of Gray's Inn cooperated with him, and the "triumphs" and dumb-show were devised principally by Bacon.

Mishnah (mish'nâ). A collection of rabbinical discussions on the law of Moses, the object of which was to apply and adapt it to the varying circumstances of life and of the times, and to extend it by logical conclusions and analogies. The word Mishnah properly means 'repetition,' then 'instruction,' 'learning.' It was not at first allowable that these discourses should be reduced to writing; they had to be learned by heart, and are called the oral law as opposed to the written law, or the Pentateuch. The beginning of the Mishnah goes back to the time of the Macabees. It was delivered in the schools orally from generation to generation. At the end of the 3d century A. D. the patriarch Judah I. collected, arranged, and codified the accumulated material in its present shape. The numerous rules and decisions are arranged according to subject in 6 orders (sedarim): (1) seeds (zeraim), on agriculture; (2) festivals (moed); (3) women (nashim), on conjugal affairs; (4) damages (nezikin), civil and criminal laws; (5) sacrifices (kodushim); (6) purifications (tohorot). The 6 orders are divided into 63 tracts, and these again into chapters. The explanations of or comments on the Mishnah are called Gemara, and both together constitute the Talmud (which see).

Misiones, Pg. Missiones (mō-sē-ō'nēs). A territory forming the extreme northeastern part of the Argentine Republic, between the Paraná and Uruguay rivers. An easterly extension, called Upper or Brazilian Misiones, held by Brazil, was claimed by the Argentine government. In 1891 the claim was submitted to the arbitration of the President of the United States, and was decided in favor of Brazil. Misiones was included in the region called Guayra (which see); was occupied by flourishing Jesuit missions from 1653 to 1767; and is said to have had a population of 130,000. Area, 22,000 square miles. Population, about 25,000 (?); of Upper Misiones, 5,000.

Misigaga (mis-ē-si'gā). A tribe of North American Indians, once a part of the Ojibwa, first known in the middle of the 17th century north of Lake Huron and on Manoulin Island. After the flight of the Huron and Ottawa they spread over southern Ontario. In 1746 they were admitted as the seventh tribe of the Iroquois Confederacy. The name is translated 'great mouth,' referring to the mouth of Missisaga River emptying into Lake Huron. Their present (1893) number in Ontario is 774. See Algonquian.

Misivri (mē-sēv'rē). A small town in Eastern Rumelia, Bulgaria, situated on the Black Sea 18 miles northeast of Burgas; the ancient Mesembria. It was a Greek colony.

Misogonus (mi-sog'ō-nus). A rimed play, presumably by Thomas Richards in 1560. It contains songs, and has some changes of meter, but is mainly four-lined stanzas. See "Gammer Gurton's Needle" and "Ralph Roister Doister."

Misol, or Mysol (mī-sol'). A small island north-west of Papna, situated in lat. 2° 4' S., long. 130° 12' E.

Mispah. See Mizpah.

Miss Betsy Thoughtless. A novel by Mrs. Haywood, published in 1751.

"Miss Betsy Thoughtless" is rather a clever work and interesting as the first really domestic novel, according to modern ideas, that exists in the language. It has been supposed that Miss Burney took it as the model of her "Evelina," and it is the only novel I know which could have served for the purpose.

Forsyth, Novels and Novelists of the 18th Century, p. 204.

Miss in her Teens, or the Medley of Lovers. A comedy by David Garrick, produced in 1747 with Garrick as Fribble.

Mississippi (mis-i-sip'i). A name given in part of its course to the Churchill River.

Missionary Ridge (mish'ōn-ā-rij). A mountain on the border of Georgia and Tennessee, southeast of Chattanooga. It was the scene of the final struggle in the battle of Chattanooga, Nov. 25, 1863. The ridge was occupied by the Confederates in a strongly entrenched position. The Federals attacked them in three divisions under Hooker, Thomas, and Sherman, and after a long hand-to-hand fight succeeded in putting them to flight.

Missiones. See Misiones.

Mississippi (mis-i-sip'i). [Ind., 'the great river' or 'the father of waters.'] The largest river of North America. It rises in or near Lake Itasca, northern Minnesota, about lat. 47° 13' N., 1,457 feet above sea-level; traverses part of Minnesota; forms the boundary between Minnesota, Iowa, Missouri, Arkansas, and Louisiana on the west and Wisconsin, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Mississippi on the east; flows generally south; and empties in Louisiana into the Gulf of Mexico by 5 mouths about lat. 29°-29' 10' N. It is navigable for steamboats to the Falls of St. Anthony, Minnesota (about 2,000 miles). The banks below the river-level in Mississippi and Louisiana have to be protected by levees. The chief tributaries are the Minnesota, Des Moines, Missouri, St. Francis, White River, Arkansas, and Red River from the west, and the Wisconsin, Rock, Illinois, Ohio, and Yazoo from the east. It was discovered by De Soto in 1541; Marquette and Joliet descended it in 1673, and La Salle in 1681; it formed the western boundary of the United States 1783-1803; and its source was discovered by Schoolcraft in 1832. St. Paul, Minneapolis, Dubuque, St. Louis, Memphis, Vicksburg, Baton Rouge, and New Orleans are on its banks. Length of the Mississippi to Lake Itasca, 2,547 miles. Length of the lower Mississippi with the Missouri, about 3,900 miles. Basin, 1,257,545 square miles. The combined river is the longest stream in the world.

Mississippi. One of the Southern States of the United States of America, extending from about lat. 30° 10' to 35° N., and from long. 88° 5' to 91° 40' W. Capital, Jackson. It is bounded by Tennessee on the north, Alabama on the east, the Gulf of Mexico and Louisiana on the south, and is separated by the Mississippi on the west from Arkansas and in part from Louisiana. It is one of the Gulf States. The surface is hilly in part, but generally level. The chief industry is agriculture; the state is one of the first in the production of cotton. It has 76 counties, sends 2 senators and 7 representatives to Congress, and has 9 electoral votes. The region was visited by De Soto in 1540; the Mississippi River was explored by Marquette and La Salle; an attempt at settlement was made by the French under Iberville at Biloxi in 1699; and a settlement was made on the site of Natchez in 1716. The territory was ceded by France to Great Britain in 1763, part was ceded to the United States in 1783, and the remainder was acquired in 1811. Mississippi Territory was organized in 1795, and the State was admitted to the Union in 1817. It seceded Jan. 9, 1861; was the scene of various conflicts in the Civil War, including the siege of Vicksburg in 1863; and was readmitted Feb., 1870. Area, 46,810 square miles. Population (1890), 1,289,600.

Mississippi Scheme, or Mississippi Bubble. A speculative scheme formed under the lead of John Law for paying off the national debt of France. It resulted in a financial panic in 1720. See Law, John.

Mississippi Sound. A part of the Gulf of Mexico lying south of Mississippi, and partly inclosed by a chain of islands.

Mississippi Valley. The region drained by the Mississippi and its affluents, lying in general between the Alleghenians on the east and the Rocky Mountains on the west. The basin includes the whole of Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Missouri, Oklahoma, South Dakota, Arkansas, Indian Territory, Kentucky, and Tennessee; portions of Pennsylvania, West Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, Texas, Louisiana, and Mississippi; and small parts of New York, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, New Mexico, and British America.

Miss Kilmansegg and her Precious Leg. A poem by Thomas Hood, which, "as a sustained piece of metrical humor, is absolutely unique."

The poem is full of rollicking, unhampered fancy; long as it is, the movement is so rapid that it almost seems to have been written at a heat,—at least, can easily be read at a sitting. Though not without those absurd lapses which constantly irritate us in the perusal of Hood's lighter pieces, it is the most lusty and characteristic of them all. Standing at the feet of its author's facetious verse, it renders him the leading poet-humorist of his generation.

Stedman, Victorian Poets, p. 80.

Missolonghi (mis-sō-long'gē), or Mesolonghi (mā-sō-long'gē), mod. Gr. Mesolongion (mā-zō-long'gē-on). A town in the nomarchy of Aetolia and Acetolia, Greece, situated on the Gulf of Patras in lat. 38° 22' N., long. 21° 25' E. It was successfully defended by the Greeks against the Turks in 1822 and 1823, and was besieged and taken by the Turks and Egyptians in 1825-26. Byron died there in 1824. Population (1889), 9,476.

Missoula (mī-zō'li). A river in western Montana which unites with the Flathead to form Clarke's Fork. Its chief head streams are the Bitter Root, Deer Lodge, and Blackfoot rivers.

Missouri (mī-zō'ri). A tribe of the Teiwere division of the Siouan stock of North American Indians. Their name for themselves is Niwtatci, 'those who reached the mouth' (of the river); called Niwutje by the Kansa, which appellation may have been corrupted into Missouri. For many years they have been consolidated with the Oto. The population of the two tribes is given as 358. See Teiwere.

Missouri. [See above.] A river in the United States, the largest tributary of the Mississippi. It is formed by the junction near Gallatin, Montana, of the Madison (which rises in the National Park) with the Jefferson; flows through Montana and the Dakotas; forms in part the boundary between Nebraska and Kansas on the right and South Dakota, Iowa, and Missouri on the left; traverses Missouri; and unites with the Mississippi 17 miles north of St. Louis. It passes in Montana through the gorge "Gates of the Rocky Mountains," below which are the Great Falls. Bismarck, Yankton, Sioux City, Omaha, Council Bluffs, St. Joseph, Atchison, Leavenworth, and Kansas City are on its banks. Length (including the Madison), 3,047 miles; navigable to Fort Benton (over 2,400 miles). For the total length of the stream to the sea, see Mississippi.

Missouri. A central State of the United States of America, extending from about lat. 36° to 40° 30' N., and from long. 89° 2' to 95° 44' W. Capital, Jefferson City; chief city, St. Louis. It is bounded by Iowa on the north, Illinois, Kentucky, and Tennessee on the east (separated from all three by the Mississippi), Arkansas on the south, and Indian Territory, Kansas, and Nebraska on the west (separated in part from Kansas and Nebraska by the Missouri). The surface is hilly, undulating, and partly prairie; the Ozark Mountains (low) are in the southwest. The state is rich in mineral wealth, especially iron (at Iron Mountain, Pilot Knob, Shepherd Mountain, all in the southeast), coal, and lead. The leading agricultural products are corn, wheat, tobacco, outs. The State is one of the first in the raising of live stock and in the production of wine and corn, and has important meat-packing industries, manufactures of flour, iron, etc., and flourishing domestic and foreign commerce. It has 114 counties, sends 2 senators and 15 representatives to Congress, and has 17 electoral votes. The Territory was claimed by France in virtue of exploration; was first settled at St. Genevieve by the French about 1755; was ceded to Spain in 1763; was ceded back to France in 1800; formed part of the Louisiana Purchase of 1803; and was included in Louisiana Territory in 1805. Missouri Territory was formed in 1812, and Missouri was admitted to the Union as a slave State in 1821. Martial law was proclaimed there in 1861. It was the scene of several battles in the Civil War. Area, 69,415 square miles. Population (1899), 2,673,189.

Missouri, Great Falls of the. A cataract in the Missouri River, in Montana, above Fort Benton. Width, $\frac{1}{2}$ mile. Height, 92 feet.

Missouri Compromise. An agreement relative to the extension of slavery, embodied in a bill passed by Congress March 2, 1820, and in the act of Congress admitting Missouri into the Union, passed in 1821. It was enacted that in all the territory ceded by France, known as Louisiana, north of 36° 30' north lat., excepting Missouri, slavery should be forever prohibited; and on this concession by the pro-slavery party in Congress, Missouri was admitted as a slave State. It was abrogated by the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska Bill in 1854.

Miss Sara Sampson. A play by Lessing, produced in 1755.

Missunde (mis-sün'de). A small village 6 miles east of Schleswig, Prussia, situated on the Schlei. It was the scene of engagements between the Danes and troops of Schleswig-Holstein Sept. 12, 1850, and between the Danes and Prussians Feb. 2, 1864.

Mistake, The. A comedy by John Vanbrugh (1705). It was taken in part from Molière's "Le dépit amoureux." It was acted in 1790 as "Lovers' Quarrels," an alteration by King.

Mistassin (mis-täs-sē'nē), Lake. A lake in Canada, an expansion of the river Rupert, which empties into Hudson Bay. Length, about 100 miles (?).

Misterbianco (mēs-ter-bē-äng'kō). A small town in Sicily, west of Catania.

Mr. F's Aunt. A noted character in Dickens's "Little Dorrit." She is characterized by "extreme severity and grim taciturnity; sometimes by a propensity to offer remarks . . . totally uncalculated by anything said by anybody, and traceable to no association of ideas."

Mr. H. A play by Charles Lamb. This farce (in two acts) was performed at Drury Lane Theatre, London, in Dec., 1806, but did not survive the first night of its appearance. In America, however, it was performed with some success. The point of the play is the anxiety of the hero to conceal his name (Hogshead) and the way in which all his devices to this end are frustrated by his unhappy destiny.

Mr. Midshipman Easy (ē'zi). A sea story by Frederick Marryat, published in 1836.

Mistra (mēs'trā), or Misitra (mēs'ē-trā). A fortress and town near Sparta, Greece, built in 1248. The fortress, founded in the 13th century by the prince of Achaia, is one of the most curious and complete memorials of medieval life now existing. On the slopes remain churches, escutcheoned palaces, and fortified streets, and the hill is crowned by a great castle with imposing groups of battlemented and machicolated towers and every defensive device of the middle ages.

Mistral (mēs-trail'), Frédéric. Born at Mail-lane, Bouches-du-Rhône, France, Sept. 8, 1830. A Provençal poet, belonging to the brotherhood of modern Provençal poets known as "Les Félibriges." Among his works (in Provençal, with French translations) are "Mireio" ("Mireille," 1859), "Calendau" (1867), "Lis iscle d'or" ("Les Iles d'Or," 1875), "Lou Tresor dou félibrige" (1879-86; a Provençal-French dictionary), "Nerto" (1884), "La reine Jeanne" (1890).

Missress, The. A "love-cycle" by Abraham Cowley, published in 1647.

Mistretta (mēs-tret'tā). A town in the province of Messina, Sicily, 50 miles northwest of Catania. Population (1881), 12,535.

Mita. See Weitspekan.

Mitau (mē'ton), Lett. Jelgava (yel'gä-vä), Russ. Mitava (mē-tä'vä). The capital of the government of Courland, Russia, on the Aa 25 miles southwest of Riga. It was the residence of the dukes of Courland from the middle of the 16th century. Population (1892), 30,528.

Mitchel (mieh'el), John. Born at Dungiven, County Derry, Ireland, Nov. 3, 1815; died March 20, 1875. An Irish revolutionist, a leader in the "Young Ireland" movement. He was convicted as editor of the "United Irishman" and sentenced to 14 years' banishment in 1848; escaped from Van Diemen's Land and came to New York in 1854; and lived in the United States until 1874 when he returned to Ireland and in 1875 was elected to Parliament for Tipperary, but was declared ineligible. He wrote "Jail Journal" (1854), "The Last Conquest of Ireland—Perhaps" (1861), etc.

Mitchel, Ormsby McKnight. Born in Union County, Ky., Aug. 28, 1810; died at Beaufort, S. C., Oct. 30, 1862. An American astronomer and general. He became director of the Cincinnati Observatory in 1845, and of the Dudley Observatory (Alabama) in 1859, and served in the Civil War 1861-62. He wrote "Planetary and Stellar Worlds" (1848), "Orbs of Heaven" (1851), etc.

Mitchell, Donald Grant; pseudonym Ik Marvel. Born at Norwich, Conn., April, 1822. An American essayist and novelist. He graduated at Yale in 1841; studied law in New York; was counsel at Venice 1853-55; and has since lived on his estate Edgewood, near New Haven, Connecticut. He has written "Reveries of a Bachelor" (1850), "Dream Life" (1851), "My Farm of Edgewood" (1863), "Seven Stories with Basement and Attic" (1864), "Wet Days at Edgewood, etc." (1864), "Rural Studies, etc." (1867), a novel "Doctor Johns, etc." (1866), "Bound Together, etc." (1884), "Out-of-Town Places," a reprint of "Rural Studies" (1884), "English Lands, etc." (1889-90), etc.

Mitchell, Mrs. (Lucy Myers Wright). Born at Urumiah, Persia, 1845; died at Berlin, Germany, March 10, 1888. An American archaeologist. She married Samuel S. Mitchell, an artist, in 1867, and passed most of her life abroad. She wrote "A History of Ancient Sculpture" (1883).

Mitchell, Maria. Born at Nantucket, Mass., Aug. 1, 1818; died at Lynn, Mass., June 28, 1889. An American astronomer, daughter of William Mitchell (1791-1868); professor of astronomy at Vassar College, Poughkeepsie, New York, from 1865. She received the degree of LL.D. from Dartmouth in 1852 and Columbia in 1887; was the first woman elected to the American Academy of Arts and Sciences; and was a member of various scientific associations.

Mitchell, Mount. The highest mountain in the United States east of the Rocky Mountains, situated in the Black Mountains, Yancey County, North Carolina. Height, 6,710 feet. It is also called the Black Dome. It is named from Professor Elisha Mitchell, who perished while exploring the mountain in 1837.

Mitchell, Silas Weir. Born at Philadelphia, Feb. 15, 1829. An American physician and author, noted for researches in toxicology, the nervous system, etc. He has edited "Five Essays: On the Cryptogamous Origin of Malarious Fevers, etc." (1858), and has written "Researches upon the Venom of the Rattlesnake" (1860), "Researches upon the Venoms of Poisonous Serpents" with E. T. Reichert (1886), "Wear and Tear, or Hints for the Overworked" (1871), "Injuries of the Nerves, etc." (1873), "Fat and Blood" (1877), "Hephaizah Guinness, and Other Stories" (1880), "Lectures on Diseases of the Nervous System, etc." (1881), "In War Time," a novel (1885), Poems (1882 and 1887), "Doctor and Patient" (1887), "Characteristics" (serially, 1891), etc.

Mitchell, Sir Thomas Livingstone. Born in Stirlingshire, Scotland, June 16, 1792; died at Carthage, Darling Point, Australia, Oct. 5, 1855. A British explorer in Australia. At sixteen years of age he entered the Peninsular army, and was promoted lieutenant Sept. 16, 1813, and major Aug. 29, 1826. In 1828 he was appointed surveyor-general to the colony of New South Wales. He is best known from his four expeditions into the interior of Australia, 1831-35 and 1836-45. He was appointed lieutenant-colonel in 1841. He published "Three Expeditions" (1838), "Journal" of his fourth expedition (1848), "The Lusid of Camoens closely translated" (1854), etc.

Mitchelstown (mieh'elz-toun). A town in County Cork, Ireland. It was the scene of a riot between the Home Rulers and police, Sept. 9, 1887.

Mitchill (mieh'il), Samuel Latham. Born at North Hempstead, N. Y., Aug. 20, 1764; died at New York, Sept. 7, 1831. An American physician, naturalist, politician, and miscellaneous writer. He founded, with Dr. Edward Miller and Dr. Elisha I. Smith, the "New York Medical Repository," and was its chief editor.

Mite, Sir Matthew. The "nabob" in Foote's play of that name. He returns from a profitable residence in India with ill-gotten gains, which he uses to annoy and ruin his neighbors.

Foote brought on the stage an Anglo-Indian chief, dissolute, ungenerous, and tyrannical, ashamed of the humble friends of his youth, hating the aristocracy, yet childishly eager to be numbered among them, squandering his wealth on pandars and flatterers, tricking out his chairman with the most costly hot-house flowers, and astounding the ignorant with jargon about rupees, lacs, and jaghires. Macaulay, Essays, I, 282.

Mitford (mit'förd), John. Born at Richmond, Surrey, Aug. 13, 1781; died at Benhall vicarage, April 27, 1859. An English writer and clergyman. He was the eldest son of John Mitford, commander of a China merchantman. He entered Oriel College, Oxford, in 1801, graduating in 1804. He was licensed curate of Kelsale, Suffolk, in 1809. From 1834 until 1850 he edited the "Gentleman's Magazine." He assisted in editing the Aldine edition of British poets, and wrote "Agnes, the Indian Captive," a poem (1811).

Mitford, Mary Russell. Born at Alresford, Hampshire, Dec. 16, 1787; died at Swallowfield, Jan. 10, 1855. An English author. Her father, George Mitford, was a physician who squandered a fortune and finally became dependent upon his daughter's earnings. At ten years of age she drew a lottery prize of £20,000. In 1810 her "Miscellaneous Poems" appeared.

and in 1812 "Blanche of Castile." In 1820 her father's irregularities obliged her to support herself by literature. "Julian," a tragedy, was accepted by Macready and performed at Covent Garden, March 15, 1823. "The Foscari" was produced by Charles Kemble, Nov. 4, 1826, and "Rienzi," her best tragedy, was produced at Drury Lane, Oct. 9, 1828. The sketches entitled "Our Village" began in the "Lady's Magazine" in 1819, and gained great popularity. "Belford Regis, etc.," a novel, was published in 1835, and "Recollections of a Literary Life, etc.," in 1852. She also published a number of poems, sonnets, stories of American life, stories for children, etc.

Mitford, William. Born at London, Feb. 10, 1744; died at Exbury, Feb. 10, 1827. An English historian. He matriculated at Queen's College, Oxford, in 1761, but left without a degree. He entered the Middle Temple in 1763, but never practised. The first volume of his "History of Greece," suggested by Gibbon, appeared in 1784; the work was completed in 1810. He was a member of Parliament 1785-90, 1796-1806, and 1812-1818.

Mithra (mith'rä), or Mithras (mith'ras). In ancient Persian mythology, the god of light, later of the sun. His worship was introduced into Rome.

After Pontus in Asia Minor, previously held by Persia, had been conquered by Pompey, the worship of Mithras superseded the Dionysia, and extended over the Roman Empire. The Emperor Commodus was initiated into these Mysteries; and they have been maintained by a constant tradition, with their penances and tests of the courage of the candidate for admission, through the Secret Societies of the Middle Ages and the Rosicrucians, down to the modern faint reflex of the latter, the Freemasons. The Mithraic rites supplied the model of the initiatory ceremonies observed in those societies, and are described by Justin Martyr and Tertullian as resembling the Christian Sacraments. The believers were admitted by the rite of baptism; they had a species of Eucharist; while the courage and endurance of the neophyte were tested by twelve consecutive trials denominated Tortures, undergone within a cave constructed for the purpose, and lasted forty days before he was admitted to a participation in the Mysteries. The peculiar symbol of these rites have been found all over Europe; and the burial-place of the Three Kings of Cologne, Caspar, Balthasar, and Melchior, was shown as the tombs of the Magians that visited Bethlehem. Knight, Symbolical Language, p. xxiv.

Mithridate (mēt-rē-dāt'). A tragedy by Racine, produced Jan. 13, 1673.

Mithridates (mieh-ri-dä'tēz) (more correctly Mithradates (mieh-rä-dä'tēz)) VI. Eupator, surnamed "The Great." Born about 132 B. C.; died 63 B. C. King of Pontus 120-63. He subjugated the peoples on the eastern shore of the Black Sea, and conquered the Crimea and southern Russia. He next attacked Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, client states of Rome, which caused the interference of that power. War broke out in consequence in 88. He rapidly made himself master of all the Roman possessions in Asia Minor, except Magnesia on the Meander, and caused a general massacre of the Italian inhabitants, said to have numbered 80,000, or, according to others, 150,000. He also instigated a rising of the European Greeks, to whose aid he sent a formidable land and naval force under his general Archelaus. Archelaus was defeated by Sulla at Cheronia in 86 and at Orchomenus in 85. Sulla crossed the Hellespont to Asia, and dictated a peace at Dardanus in 84. Mithridates surrendered his fleet, paid a heavy war indemnity, and restored all his conquests, retaining Pontus only. In 83 a second war broke out, owing to his failure completely to evacuate Cappadocia. The propretor Murena invaded Pontus, but was defeated and forced to withdraw. Peace was restored in 81 on the basis of the treaty of Dardanus. In 74 a third war broke out, occasioned by an attempt on the part of Mithridates to take possession of Bithynia, which had been bequeathed to the Romans by his son-in-law Nicomedes III, late king of Bithynia. Mithridates defeated M. Aurelius Cotta at Chalcedon in 74, but was expelled from his own kingdom by Lucullus, and took refuge with his son-in-law Tigranes, king of Armenia. Lucullus defeated the latter at Tigranocerta in 69, but was unable to prevent Mithridates from reconquering Pontus and ravaging Bithynia and Cappadocia. He was superseded by Cn. Pompeius, who defeated Mithridates on the Lycos in 68, and compelled the surrender of Tigranes at Artaxata. Mithridates fled to Panticapæum, and was planning a new campaign when his troops revolted. He was at his own bidding put to death by a Celtic soldier in 63, after having vainly sought to kill himself by poison.

Mithridates, King of Pontus. A tragedy by Nathaniel Lee, produced in 1678.

Mithridatic Wars (mieh-ri-dä'tik wärz). Three wars between Rome and Mithridates, king of Pontus. The Romans were commanded in the first (83-84 B. C.) by Sulla and his lieutenant Fimbria; in the second (83-81) by Murena; and in the third (74-69) by Lucullus, later by Pompey. In the last Mithridates and his ally Tigranes were defeated, and Pontus was annexed to Rome in 63.

Mitla (mēt'lä), or Mictlan (mēk-tlän'). [Nahuatl, "place of the dead": called by the Zapotecs Lyo-Baa, entrance to the grave.] A group of large ruined buildings in the state of Oajaca, Mexico, about 20 miles southeast of Oajaca City. They are built of adobe and stone, and some of them are elaborately ornamented with a kind of mosaic work produced by stones set in cement. There are also mural paintings. The origin and purpose of the Mitla buildings are unknown. At the time of the conquest they appear to have been occupied by Zapotec Indians. There is a modern village on the site.

Mitre (mē'trä), Bartolomé. Born at Buenos Ayres, June 26, 1821. A celebrated Argentine general, statesman, journalist, and author. Banished by Rosas, he lived successively in Uruguay, Bolivia, Peru, and Chile, and was a noted journalist in all those countries. He served in the Uruguayan army 1838-1846, and in the Bolivian army 1847; as colonel of artillery, took part in the overthrow of Rosas, 1852; opposed Urquiza; led the movement by which Buenos Ayres declared itself independent, Sept. 17, 1852; was made minister of the interior and later minister of war of the Buenos Ayres government; and in the latter capacity commanded the army which was defeated by Urquiza at Cepeda Oct. 23, 1859, the result being the reunion of Buenos Ayres with the Argentine Confederation. Mitre was then elected governor of Buenos Ayres, May, 1860; and, new difficulties having arisen with the federal government, he defeated Urquiza's army at Pavon, Sept. 11, 1861. Soon after Mitre was made president ad interim, and in Oct., 1862, was elected president of the new Argentine Republic for six years. With his term opened an era of great prosperity. During two years he commanded the allied army against Paraguay. (See Triple Alliance.) At the end of his term Mitre was made minister to Brazil. He was a presidential candidate in 1874, and, being defeated, headed an abortive rebellion. In 1891 he was again a candidate, but subsequently withdrew his name. In 1852 General Mitre founded "La Nacion," which became the most important journal of the Platine region, and remained under his direction. Besides poems, essays, speeches, etc., he published two historical works, the "Historia de Belgrano" (1857 et seq.) and the "Historia de San Martin" (1884; English abridged translation 1893).

Mitre (mī'tēr), The. A noted London tavern, formerly standing in Mitre Court, off Fleet street. It was Dr. Samuel Johnson's favorite resort. There were other taverns of the name in London.

Mitrovitz (mit'ró-vits). A town in Croatia-Slavonia, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Save in lat. 44° 58' N., long. 19° 37' E. It occupies the site of the ancient Sirmium. Population (1890), 9,541.

Mitscherlich (mits'her-liéh), Eilhard. Born at Neuende, near Jever, Germany, Jan. 7, 1794; died at Berlin, Aug. 28, 1863. A noted German chemist, professor at Berlin from 1821. He discovered isomorphism in 1818. He wrote "Lehrbuch der Chemie" (1829-40), etc.

Mittelmark (mit'tel-märk). A region in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, extending from the Havel eastward to the Oder. It comprised the districts around Brandenburg, Berlin, and Potsdam, forming part of the old possessions of Brandenburg, and of the original holding of the house of Hohenzollern in 1415.

Mittermaier (mit'ter-mī-er), Karl Joseph Anton. Born at Munich, Aug. 5, 1787; died at Heidelberg, Aug. 28, 1867. A German jurist and politician, professor at Heidelberg from 1821. He wrote works on criminal law, etc.

Mittu (mēt'tō). An independent Nigritic tribe of the eastern Sudan, between the Dinka and the Nyam-Nyam. The Madi, Ahaka, and Luba are subtribes. The northern dialects differ from the southern. In customs the Mittu are much like the Sofi and the Bongo, but are not so hardy. They are agriculturists in a fertile country; are good bowmen and musicians; live in poor huts; and keep no cattle.

Mittweida (mit'vī-dä). A manufacturing town in the kingdom of Saxony, situated on the Zschopau 34 miles west by south of Dresden. Population (1890), 11,298.

Mituas (mē'tō'üz). A horde of Indians of the upper Orinoco valley, on the llanos bordering the Guaviare affluent (Colombia). They are described as very degraded savages. The Mituas have been doubtfully referred to the Arawak or Maypure stock.

Mitylene. See Mytilene.

Mivart (miv'ärt), St. George. Born at London, Nov. 30, 1827. An English naturalist. He was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1851, became a lecturer in St. Mary's Hospital Medical School in 1862, and was appointed professor of biology in University College, Kensington, in 1874. He has published "On the Genesis of Species" (1871), "Lessons in Elementary Anatomy" (1873), "The Cat" (1880), "Nature and Thought" (1882), etc.

Miwok, or Meewoc (mē'wök). The southern division of the Moqueluman stock of North American Indians, comprising 23 small tribes whose pristine habitat extended from the Coconinos to the Fresno, and from the snow-line of the Sierra Nevada to San Joaquin River, except a strip along the latter occupied by the Cholonoc. The name signifies 'men' or 'people' in the dialect formerly spoken north of the Stanislaus. See Moqueluman.

Mixco (mēs'kō). A city and stronghold of the ancient Cakchiquel Indians of Guatemala, about 25 miles north of the modern Guatemala City. It was on a nearly inaccessible hill, and was fortified with great skill. In 1525 the Spaniards, under Gonzalo Alvarado, besieged it for a month, and finally took it by assault after a terrible fight. The town was burned, and only its ruins remain; the surviving inhabitants were removed to the modern village of Mixco, 5 miles east of Guatemala.

Mixes (mē'ház). An Indian race of southeastern Mexico, in the mountains of the isthmus of Tehuantepec (states of Oajaca and Chiapas). By language they are related to the Zoques. Historians describe them as very savage, and cannibals; but they early submitted to the whites, and are now a degraded but peaceful part of the country population.

Mixtecs (mēs-täks'), or Mixtecas (mēs-tä'käz). An Indian race of southern Mexico, in the mountains of western Oajaca and the adjacent parts of (Guerrero and Puebla). At the period of the Spanish conquest they also occupied the corresponding parts of the Pacific coast, and at one time had extended eastward to the isthmus of Tehuantepec, from which they were driven by the Zapotecs. They were frequently at war with the Aztecs of Mexico. They were considerably advanced in civilization, built adobe or stone houses, were agriculturists but brave warriors, and had a form of picture-writing. The Mixtecs readily submitted to the Spaniards, and are now useful citizens. They number not less than 200,000. By their language they are allied to the Zapoteca (which see).

Mizar (mī'zär or mē'zär). [Ar. mizār, a waist-cloth or apron.] The familiar name of the bright second-magnitude double star ζ Ursæ Majoris. Smyth says the name was unknown to the Arabs, but was introduced in consequence of a conjecture of Scaliger's. The appropriateness is not evident. The same name is also, rarely, applied to ε Bootis.

Mizen (miz'eu). A character in Charles Shadwell's play "The Fair Quaker of Deal."

In this character-piece Flip, the sea-brute, is contrasted with Beau Mizen, the sea-fop; but the latter is, in some degree, a copy of Baker's Maiden, the progenitor of the family of Dundreary. Doran, English Stage, I, 213.

Mizpah (miz'pä), or Mizpeh (miz'pe). [Heb., 'watch-tower.'] The name of several places mentioned in Old Testament history. (a) A place in Gilead; sometimes identified with Tel es-Safiyeh (about lat. 32° 5' N.). (b) A place in Benjamin, Palestine; probably on the site of Nebi-Samwil, 5 miles northwest of Jerusalem.

Mispeh, the culminating point of the tribe of Benjamin, became the meeting-place of the tribes, the Washington of the Israelite federation. This mountain, which rises nearly 4,000 feet above the level of the sea, on the horizon of Jerusalem, was not made to serve as the site of a great city. On the contrary, it was an excellent spot for those federal diets which were soon to assume a sacred character. The ark was never established there; but the mispeh was induced to make it his habitual residence, and no doubt the political importance of Mispeh had some weight in the providential selection of Jerusalem for such brilliant destinies. Jerusalem is only a league from Mispeh, and from the top of the mountain the little acropolis (mitto) of the Jebusites on the hill of Sion must have been visible. Renan, Hist. of the People of Israel, I, 302.

Mizraim (miz-rä'im). The Hebrew name of Egypt.

Mizraim, the brother of Cush, is the Hebrew name of Egypt. It signifies 'the two Mazors,' or walls of fortification. On the Asiatic side Egypt was defended from attack by a chain of fortresses, sometimes called Shur, or 'the wall,' by the Canaanites, and it was from this line of defence that the name of Mazar was derived. The name, however, did not apply to the whole of Egypt. It denoted only Lower or Northern Egypt, which extended from the sea to the neighbourhood of the modern Cairo. The rest of the country was Upper Egypt, called Pe-to-Res, 'the land of the South,' in ancient Egyptian, the Pathros of the Old Testament (Isaiah xi, 11). The division of Egypt into two provinces dated from prehistoric times, and has been remembered through all the vicissitudes of Egyptian history down to the present day. It was essentially 'the double land,' and its rulers wore a double crown. Hence the use of the dual form, 'the two Mazors,' in Hebrew. Here and there, where Lower Egypt is alone alluded to, the singular Mazar is employed, but otherwise the dual "Mizraim" only is found throughout the Old Testament. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 52.

Mjölnir (myél'nir). [ON.] In Old Norse mythology, Thor's hammer, "the crusher," made by the dwarfs. It was the trusty weapon of Thor in his constant warfare against the giants.

Mjösen (myé'sen), Lake. The largest lake in Norway, about 35 miles northeast of Christiania at the nearest point. Length, 62 miles. Greatest depth, 1,500 feet.

Mlava (mlä'vä). A town in the government of Plock, Russian Poland, 67 miles north-northwest of Warsaw. Population (1893), 10,387.

Mnemosyne (nē-mos'i-nē). [Gr. Μνημοσύνη, the mother of the Muses.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of memory, daughter of Uranus (Heaven) and Ge (Earth), and mother, by Zeus, of the Muses.

Mnesicles (nē'sik-lēz). [Gr. Μνησκλέης.] Architect of the Propylæum (begun 437 B. C.). It was 5 years in building, and cost about $2,000,000. An inscription with his name, but later in time, has been found among the ruins of the Propylæum.

Mnevis (nē'vis). The ancient Egyptian sacred bull of Heliopolis.

Apis of Memphis, Mnevis of Heliopolis, and Pakis of Hermonthis, are all links that bind together the Egypt of the Pharaohs and the Egypt of the stone age. They were the sacred animals of the clans which first settled in these localities, and their identification with the deities of the official religion must have been a slow process, never fully carried out, in fact, in the minds of the lower classes. Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 66.

Moab (mō'ab). A Semitic tribe settled at the southeastern end of the Dead Sea (the modern district of Kerak). In Gen. xix. Moab and Ammon are represented as descendants of Lot, and their names are explained from their incestuous origin. The Moabites appear to have been a warlike tribe, and the Israelites during their wanderings through the desert tried to avoid an encounter with them. During the period of the Judges they opposed the Israelites until they were routed by Ehud (Judges iii.). Saul and David, whose ancestress Ruth was a Moabitess, subjugated them. After Solomon's death Moab fell to the northern kingdom. After Ahab's death Mesha refused to pay tribute. They were afterward, according to the cuneiform inscriptions, subjected to Assyria, Shalman, Camoshnadab, and Mussari being mentioned as kings of Moab paying tribute. They participated in the fall of Jerusalem through the Babylonians, and Nebuchadnezzar subjected them on his expedition against Egypt. They appear after the exile as seeking to maintain friendly relations with the Judeans. Later they were subjected to the Nabataeans, the Maccabees, and the Romans. Chemosh was their principal divinity; another was Eaal Peor. The only authentic monument of the Moabite civilization thus far known is the so-called Moabite Stone. See below.

Moabite Stone. A slab of black basalt bearing an inscription of 34 lines in Hebrew-Phœnician characters; the oldest monument of the Semitic alphabet. It was found in 1868 at the ancient Dibon of Moab. Before it could be removed it was broken in many pieces, through the jealousies of Arab tribes, but a squeeze of the inscription had been previously taken, and the chief fragments are now in the Louvre Museum. The stone is the most important surviving relic of Moabite civilization, and is believed to date from about 850 B. C. The inscription records the victories of King Mesha over the Israelites. See Mesha.

Moacod. See Modoc.

Moallakât (mō-äl-lä-kät'). A collection of seven Arabic poems, composed by different authors in the 6th and 7th centuries.

Moaria (mō-ä'ri-ä). [NL.] A hypothetical South Pacific continent of which only New Zealand and other Oceanian or Polynesian islands remain; so named from the supposed former range of the moa. Its assumed existence accounts for many features of the present geographical distribution of animals and plants. The name was proposed by Dr. Mantell.

Moataht (mō'äh-ät), or Mowachaht. The people to whom the name Nootka was first applied, a tribe of North American Indians living near Nootka Sound, Vancouver Island, British Columbia. They numbered 254 in 1884. See Aht.

Moawiyah (mō-ä-wē'yä). Governor of Syria, and, after his victory over Ali, calif 661-680 A. D. He founded the dynasty of the Omniads, which held the califate for 89 years (661-750) with Damascus as capital.

Mobangi. Same as Ubangi.

Moberly (mō'bēr-li). The capital of Randolph County, central Missouri. Population (1890), 8,213.

Mobile (mō-bél'). A river in Alabama which is formed by the union of the Alabama and Tombigbee, and falls into Mobile Bay. Length, about 45 miles.

Mobile. A city, capital of Mobile County, Alabama, situated on Mobile River in lat. 30° 41' N., long. 88° 2' W. It is the only seaport and the largest city of the State. It has a large trade in timber, naval stores, coal, etc., and is one of the leading ports in the country for the export of cotton. It was founded by De Bienville in 1702; was the capital of Louisiana until 1723; passed to Great Britain in 1763, and to Spain in 1763; was taken by the Americans under Wilkinson in 1813; and became a city in 1814. It was occupied by the Federals April 12, 1865. It has now steamer lines to Liverpool and New York. Population (1890), 31,076.

Mobile Bay. An inlet of the Gulf of Mexico, in the southwestern part of Alabama. Length, about 36 miles.

Mobile Bay, Battle of. A naval victory gained Aug. 5, 1864, by the Federals (with 7 sloops of war and 4 iron-clad monitors), under Farragut, over the Confederates (with the ram Tennessee, which had to surrender, and 3 gunboats), under Buchanan.

Mobile Point. A sandy point at the eastern entrance of Mobile Bay; the site of Fort Morgan (previously Fort Bowyer).

Möbius (mō'bē-üs), August Ferdinand. Born at Schulpforta, Prussia, Nov. 17, 1790; died at Leipzig, Sept. 26, 1868. A German mathematician and astronomer, professor at Leipzig from 1816. His chief work is "Der barycentrische Kalkül" (1827).

Möbius, Paul Heinrich August. Born at Leipzig, May 31, 1825; died at Friedriehroda, June 8, 1889. A German miscellaneous writer, son of A. F. Möbius. He wrote tales, "Bar-Cocheba" (a tragedy), a catechism of German literature, etc.

Möbius, Theodor. Born at Leipzig, June 22, 1821; died there April 25, 1890. A German philologist, son of A. F. Möbius, appointed professor at Leipzig in 1859, and at Kiel in 1865. He has published numerous works on Scandinavian philology and literature.

Mocarabians (mō-kä-rä'bi-anz). See the extract and Mozarabs.

A complete toleration had been granted by the first conquerors to the Christian Goths, who, under the name of Mocarabians (mixed Arabians), lived in the midst of the Mussulmans. Sismondi, Lit. of South of Europe, I. 81.

Mocetenas. See Mosetenas.

Mocha (mō'kū; Arab. pron. mō'ēhā). A seaport in Yemen, Arabia, situated on the Red Sea in lat. 13° 20' N., long. 43° 13' E.; long famous for its export of coffee. Population, about 5,000.

Mochica. See Chimu.

Mock Astrologer, The. See Evening's Love, An.

Mock Doctor, The. 1. A farce by Henry Fielding, slightly altered from Molière's comedy "Le médecin malgré lui," and produced with Garrick in the east about 1736.—2. An English libretto of Gounod's "Le médecin malgré lui," by Charles Kenny. The opera was produced under this name at London in 1865.

Möckern (mēk'ern). A small town in Prussian Saxony, situated on the Elbe 14 miles east of Magdeburg. Here, April 5, 1813, the Prussians under York defeated the French under Eugène de Beauharnais.

Möckern. A village 2 miles northwest of Leipzig. Here, Oct. 16, 1813, Blücher defeated the French under Marmont (part of the battle of Leipzig).

Mocoas (mō-kō'áz). A tribe of Indians in southern Colombia, about the upper Caqueta or Japurá and its branches. They are an agricultural and peaceable race, and are noted for their skill in weaving and dyeing cotton fabrics, and in other small industries. At present they are partially civilized, and speak a corrupt dialect of the Quichua. Their own language, with that of the Mesayas and other neighboring tribes, appears to constitute a distinct stock. The Engaños or Ingaños, on the Engaño River, a branch of the Caqueta, are either identical with the Mocoas or closely allied to them.

Mocobis (mō-kō-béz'), or Mbocobis. An Indian tribe or group of tribes in the northern part of the Argentine Republic (Gran Chaco region), about the river Vermejo. They are still numerous, subsist mainly by hunting and rapine, but have cattle and horses derived from Spanish stock. Their villages are composed of slight huts, and are frequently moved in search of fresh pasture. The Mocobis belong to the Guaycuru linguistic stock, and are closely allied to the extinct Abipones and to the modern Tobas, with whom, however, they are almost constantly at war.

Modena (mō'de-nā). A province in the compartimento of Emilia, Italy. Area, 987 square miles. Population (1891), 286,716.

Modena. The capital of the province of Modena, Italy, situated between the Secchia and the Panaro, in lat. 44° 39' N., long. 10° 56' E.; the ancient Mutina. The cathedral, consecrated in 1184, is a well-designed Romanesque structure. The west façade is one of the best of its date in Italy: it has three round-arched portals, a gallery of graceful triple arcades which is continued around the church, a large wheel-window, and much interesting sculpture. There are two sculptured porches on the south side. The three-aisled interior contains interesting sculpture and tombs. The Ghirlandina Tower, the campanile of the cathedral, finished to the spire in 1315, is one of the best of its kind. The height is 315 feet. The massive square lower stage, about 200 feet high, bears the slender spire, which springs from an octagon of two arcaded tiers and is pierced with flower-like openings (whence the name of the tower). Other objects of interest are the art academy, university, picture-gallery, library, and ducal palace. Modena became a Roman colony about 183 B. C. It was situated on the Emilia Way, and was a flourishing Roman city. It became the capital of the duchy of Modena, ruled by the Este family, and was famous in the 16th century for the sculpture of terra-cottas. (See Matinesian War, and Modena, Duchy of.) Population (1892), commune, 64,500.

Modena, Duchy of. A former duchy of northern Italy, comprising the modern provinces of Modena, Massa-e-Carrara, and Reggio (in Emilia). The family of Este became rulers of Modena about 1293; it was made a duchy in 1452; was annexed to the Cispadane Republic in 1796; and passed to an Austrian line in 1814. There was an unsuccessful insurrection in 1848-49; the duke was deposed in 1859; and the duchy was united to the dominions of Victor Emmanuel in 1860.

Modern Athens, The. Boston or Edinburgh.

Modern Babylon, The. London.

Modern Messalina, The. Catharine II. of Russia.

Modern Painters. A work on art, by John Ruskin (published 1843, 1846, 1856, and 1860).

Modica (mod'ē-kā). A town in the province of Syracuse, Sicily, 30 miles southwest of Syracuse; the ancient Motycæ. There are remarkable prehistoric caves in the vicinity. Population (1881), 38,390.

Modigliana (mō-dēl-yā'nā). A small town in the province of Florence, Italy, 37 miles north-east of Florence.

Modish (mō'dish), Lady Betty. In Cibber's

comedy "The Careless Husband," a brilliant coquetish woman of quality, wayward and selfish, but not heartless: one of the principal characters in the play. Mrs. Oldfield was celebrated in the part.

Modjeska (mod-jes'kā), Helena. Born at Cracow, Poland, Oct. 12, 1844. A noted Polish actress. Her maiden name was Opido. She married her guardian Modjeska when about 17 years of age, and with him joined a company of strolling players. In 1868 she married the Count Bozenta Chlapowski, and about that time became very successful in her profession. She made her first appearance in America in 1877 as Adrienne Lecouvreur, in an English version of the play, at San Francisco, after a very short study of the language. She has been well received in America, and has made a number of tours throughout the country. Her rôles are numerous, including Beatrice, Ophelia, Imogen, Juliet, Rosalind, etc.

Modlin. See Norwogorgiesk.

Mödling (mōd'ling). A town in Lower Austria, 9 miles south-southwest of Vienna. Population (1891), commune, 11,120.

Modoc, or Modock (mō'dok). [Pl. also Modocs.] A tribe of North American Indians which formerly occupied the shores of Little Klamath, Modoc, and Clear lakes, Oregon, and the valleys of Lost River and its tributaries. It also had transitory settlements eastward to Goose and Warner lakes, on the California border. After their conflict with the United States government in 1872-73, through which they became well known, about 80 of the Modoc were removed to Indian Territory. The remainder, about 140, have resided since 1869 near Yaneks, on Sprague River, Klamath reservation, Oregon. The name is adapted from Móatokni, signifying 'southerners.' (See Lutwamian.) Written by some authorities Modoc and Modook.

Modoc War. A war between the United States government and the Modoc Indians led by Captain Jack. The Modocs refused in 1872 to go to the Lava Beds. At a conference between General Canby and the Indians, April, 1873, the former was treacherously killed. War followed; the band had to surrender; and Captain Jack was executed.

Modred (mō'dred), or Mordred (mōr'dred). The treacherous nephew of King Arthur: a knight of the Round Table.

Modugno (mō-dōn'yō). A town in the province of Bari, Apulia, Italy, 6 miles west-southwest of Bari. Population (1881), 8,525; commune, 9,880.

Moe (mō'e), Jörgen Ingebretsen. Born on the estate Moe, Ringerike, Norway, 1813; died at Christiansand, 1880. A Norwegian poet and theologian. His father was a peasant. He studied theology in Christiania after 1830. His first literary venture was the little "Samling af Sange, Folkeviser og Stevi norske Almue-dialecter" ("Collection of Songs, Ballads, and Staves in the Norwegian Popular Dialects"), published in 1840. With public assistance he now set about the collecting, in various parts of Norway, of popular literature of the same character; and in 1841, in collaboration with Peter Christian Asbjørnsen (born 1812), published "Norske Folke Eventyr" ("Norwegian Folk-Tales"). A collection of his later poems appeared in 1845 under the title "At henge paa Juletraet" ("To Hang on the Christmas Tree"). His earlier poems were collected and published as "Digte" ("Poems") in 1849. In 1853 he became a clergyman, and ultimately was made bishop of Christiansand. His collected works, "Samlede Skrifter," were published at Christiania in 1877 in 2 vols.

Möen (mē'en). An island in the Baltic, belonging to Denmark, situated southeast of Zealand. Chief town, Stege. Area, 81 square miles. Population, about 13,000.

Mœnus (mē'nus). The Latin name of the Main.

Mœræ (mē'ræ). [Gr. Μοῖρα.] The Greek goddesses of fate; the Fates. Homer uses the name in the singular, as of a single divinity, and also in the plural. He also calls them the "spinnors of the thread of life." By Hesiod they are spoken of both as daughters of Night and as daughters of Zeus and Themis. They were represented as three in number: Clotho (the spinner), Lachesis (disposer of lots), and Atropos (the inevitable). The first spins the thread of life, the second fixes its length, and the third severs it. Also Moira.

Mœris (mē'ris), Lake. [Gr. ἡ Μοῖρος λίμνη.] According to Herodotus, an artificial lake in Middle Egypt, west of the Nile, 50 miles south-west of Cairo, near the modern Lake Birket el-Kurun. Its existence has been doubted. See the extract.

A king, named Meris, desired to create a reservoir in the Fayoom which should neutralise the evil effects of insufficient or superabundant inundations. This reservoir was named, after him, Lake Meris. If the supply fell below the average, then the stored waters were let loose, and Lower Egypt and the Western Delta were flooded to the useful height. If next year the inundation came down in too great force, Lake Meris received and stored the surplus till such time as the waters began to subside. Two pyramids, each surmounted by a sitting colossus, one representing the king and the other his queen, were erected in the midst of the lake. Such is the tale told by Herodotus, and it is a tale which has considerably embarrassed our modern engineers and topographers. How, in fact, was it possible to find in the Fayoom a site which could have contained a basin measuring at least ninety miles in circumference? The most reasonable theory is that of Linant, who supposes Lake Meris to have extended over the whole of the lowlying land which skirts the Libyan cliffs between Illahoum and Medinet el-Fayoom; but recent explorations have proved that the dikes by which this pretended reservoir was bounded are modern works, erected probably within the last two hundred years. I no longer believe that Lake Meris ever existed. If Herodotus did actually visit the Fayoom, it was probably in summer, at the time of the Ifgh Nile, when the whole district presents the appearance of an inland sea. What he took for the shores of this lake were the embankments which divided it into basins and acted as highways between the various towns. Maspero, Egypt. Archaeol. (trans.), p. 35.

Moero (mōw'rō) or Meru (mā'rō), Lake. A lake in central Africa, about lat. 9° 30' S. It is traversed by the upper Congo.

Mœsia (mē'shiā). [Gr. Μοισία.] In ancient geography, a province of the Roman Empire, lying north of the Balkans, south of the Danube, and west of the Black Sea, corresponding nearly to modern Bulgaria and Servia. It was made a Roman province about 16 B. C.; was divided later into Mœsia Superior (in the west) and Mœsia Inferior (in the east); and was overrun by Goths in the 3d and 4th centuries.

Mœsogoths (mē'sō-goths). Those Goths who, after their conversion to Christianity by Ulfilas about the middle of the 4th century, settled in Mœsia, and there, under the protection of the Roman emperors, devoted themselves to agricultural pursuits. See Goths and Ulfilas.

Mofadhdhal (mō-fād'däl), Abul Abbas Al. Died 784 A. D. An Arabian poet, philologist, and genealogist. His principal work was a collection of the most celebrated longer poems of the Arabs, 128 in number, called after him the "Mofadhdhalat," which is the oldest anthology of Arabian poets. His other works were a book of proverbs, a treatise on prosody, and a vocabulary.

Moffat (mof'at). A watering-place in Dumfriesshire, Scotland, 43 miles south by west of Edinburgh. It has mineral springs. Population (1891), 2,290.

Moffat, Robert. Born at Ormiston, East Lothian, Dec. 21, 1795; died at Leigh, Aug. 8, 1883. A celebrated Scottish missionary. For a while he was occupied as under-gardener, but after a course of study he was accepted by the London Missionary Society in 1816, arrived at Cape Town Jan. 13, 1817, and labored among the Bechuana until 1870. By 1826 he had prepared a spelling-book of the Bechuana language. Parts of the Scriptures were translated into Bechuana. The New Testament was completed and carried by him to London in 1839. In London he met David Livingstone, who married his daughter in 1844. The translation of the Old Testament into Bechuana was finished in 1857. He returned to England finally in June, 1870. He published "Missionary Labours in South Africa" (1842).

Mogador (mog-ā-dōr'), or Suera (swā'rā). A seaport in Morocco, situated on the Atlantic in lat. 31° 30' N., long. 9° 43' W. It has important commerce. The French bombarded it in 1844. Population, about 19,000.

Moghileff. See Mohileff.

Mogilas (mog-gē'lās), or Mogila (mog-gē'lā), Peter. Born about 1596; died 1647. A Russian prelate and theologian. He drew up the "Orthodox Confession," the leading symbol of the Eastern Church.

Mogollon (mō-gō-lyōn', corrupted into mō-gō-yōn'). A subtribe of the Gileño tribe of North American Indians, living in the Mogollon Mountains, Arizona. See Gileño.

Mogollons (mō-gō-yōnz'). [Sp. Mogollones; probably from mogote, lump.] The name of several ranges of mountains in Arizona and New Mexico.

Mogontiacum (mō-gon-ti'ā-kum). A Roman name of Mainz.

Mogridge (mog'rij), George. Born at Ashsted, near Birmingham, Feb. 17, 1787; died at Hastings, Nov. 2, 1854. An English writer, chiefly of juveniles. He entered into partnership with his brother in the Japan trade in Birmingham, and, falling in business, took to literature. He published the "Juvenile Culprits" (1829), "Juvenile Moralists" (1829), the "Churchyard Lyrist" (1832), "A Ramble in the Woods" (1840), "Soldiers and Sailors" (1842), etc. He used various pseudonyms, including "Old Humphrey," "Peter Parley" (first used by S. G. Goodrich), etc.

Mogrovejo (mō-grō-vā'jō), Toribio de. Born in 1538; died at Saña, Peru, March 23, 1606. A Spanish prelate, archbishop of Lima from 1581. He was canonized in 1680 as St. Toribio.

Mogul (mō-gul'), Great. An Indian diamond, said to have been seen at the court of Aurung-Zeb in 1665, and to have weighed 280 carats.

Moguls (mō-gulz'). The Mongols or Mongolians; specifically, in history, the subjects of the Mogul empire (see below).

Moguls (mō-gulz'), or Mughals (mō'galz), Empire of the. A Mohammedan Tatar empire in India. It began with Baber, conqueror of Hindustan, 1526; and was at its height under Akbar, Jahangir, Shah Jehan, and Aurung-Zeb. After the death of the last-named (1707), the empire split up and the power passed to the Marhattas and British. The last (nominal) emperor was deposed in 1857 (died 1862).

Mohács (mō'hāch). A town in the county of Baránya, Hungary, situated on the Danube in lat. 45° 58' N., long. 18° 37' E. Here, Aug. 29, 1526, the Turks under Soliman II. defeated the Hungarians under Louis II.; and Aug. 12, 1687, the Imperialists under Charles of Lorraine inflicted a crushing defeat on the Turks. Population (1890), 14,403.

Mohammed (mō-ham'ed), or Mahomet (mahom'et). [The praised one: the name is also written Mahomed, Muhammad (the Arabic form), Mahmoud, Mehemet, etc.] Born at Mecca, Arabia, about 570; died at Medina, Arabia, June 8, 632. The founder of Mohammedanism, or Islam ('surrender,' namely, to God). He was the posthumous son of Abdullah by his wife Amina, of the family of Hashim, the noblest among the Koreish, and was brought up in the desert among the Bann Saad by a Bedouin woman named Halima. At the age of six he lost his mother, and at eight his grandfather, when he was cared for by his uncle Abu-Talib. When about twelve years old (582) he accompanied a caravan to Syria, and may on this occasion have come for the first time in contact with Jews and Christians. A few years later he took part in the "sacrilegious war" (so called because carried on during the sacred months, when fighting was forbidden) which raged between the Koreish and the Bann Hawazin 580-590. He attended sundry preachings and recitations at Okat, which may have awakened his poetical and rhetorical powers and his religious feelings; and for some time was occupied as a shepherd, to which he later refers as being in accordance with his career as a prophet, even as it was with that of Moses and David. When twenty-five years old he entered the service of the widow Khadijah, and made a second journey to Syria, on which he again had an opportunity to come in frequent contact with Jews and Christians, and to acquire some knowledge of their religious teachings. He soon married Khadijah, who was fifteen years his senior. Of the six children which she bore him, Fatima became the most famous. In 605 he attained some influence in Mecca by settling a dispute about the rebuilding of the Kaaba. The impressions which he had gathered from his contact with Judaism and Christianity, and from Arabic lore, began now strongly to engage his mind. He frequently retired to solitary places, especially to the cave of Mount Hira, north of Mecca. He passed at that time (he was then about forty years old) through great mental struggles, and repeatedly meditated suicide. It must have been during these lonely contemplations that the yearnings for a messenger from God for his people, and the thought that he himself might be destined for this mission, were born in his ardent mind. During one of his reveries, in the month of Ramadhan, 610, he beheld in sleep the angel Gabriel, who ordered him to read from a scroll which he held before him the words which begin the 96th sura (chapter) of the Koran. After the lapse of some time, a second vision came, and then the revelations began to follow one another frequently. His own belief in his mission as apostle and prophet of God was now firmly established. The first convert was his wife Khadijah, then followed his cousin and adopted son Ali, his other adopted son Zeid, and Abu-Bekr, afterward his father-in-law and first successor (calif). Gradually about 50 adherents rallied about him. But after three years' preaching the mass of the Meccans rose against him, so that part of his followers had to resort to Abyssinia for safety in 614. This is termed the first hejira. Mohammed in the meanwhile continued his meetings in the house of one of his disciples, Arqaan, in front of the Kaaba, which later became known as the "House of Islam." At one time he offered the Koreish a compromise, admitting their gods into his system as intercessors with the Supreme Being, but, becoming conscience-stricken, took back his words. The conversion of Haunza and Omar and 39 others in 615-616 strengthened his cause. The Koreish excommunicated Mohammed and his followers, who were forced to live in retirement. In 620, at the pilgrimage, he won over to his teachings a small party from Medina. In Medina, whither a teacher was deputed, the new religion spread rapidly. To this period belongs the vision or dream of the miraculous ride, on the winged horse Borak, to Jerusalem, where he was received by the prophets, and thence ascended to heaven. In 622 more than 70 persons from Medina bound themselves to stand by Mohammed. The Meccans proposed to kill him, and he fled on the 20th of June, 622, to Medina. This is known as the hejira ('the flight'), and marks the beginning of the Mohammedan era. This event formed a turning-point in the activity of Mohammed. He was thus far a religious preacher and persuader; he became in his Medianian period a legislator and warrior. He built there in 623 the first mosque, and married Ayesha. In 624 the first battle for the faith took place between Mohammed and the Meccans in the plain of Bedr, in which the latter were defeated. At this time, also, Mohammed began bitterly to inveigh against the Jews, who did not recognize his claims to be the "greater prophet" promised by Moses. He changed the attitude of prayer (kibla) from the direction of Jerusalem to that of the Kaaba in Mecca, appointed Friday as the day for public worship, and instituted the fast of Ramadhan and the tithe or poor-rate. The Jewish tribe of the Banu Kainuka, settled at Medina, was driven out; while of another Jewish tribe, the Bann Kuraidza, all the men, 700 in number, were massacred. In 625 Mohammed and his followers were defeated by the Meccans in the battle of Uhud. The following years were filled out with expeditions. One tribe after another submitted to Mohammed, until in 631 something like a definite Mohammedan empire was established. In 632 the prophet made his last pilgrimage to Mecca, known as the "farewell pilgrimage," or the pilgrimage of the "announcement" or of "Islam." In the same year he died while planning an expedition against the frontier of the Byzantine empire. Mohammed was a little above the middle height, of a commanding figure, and is described as being of a modest, tender, and generous disposition. His manner of life was very simple and frugal. He mended his own clothes, and his common diet was barley-bread and water. But he enjoyed perfumes and the charms of women. His character appears composed of the strongest inconsistencies. He could be tender, kind, and liberal, but on occasions indulged in cruel and perfidious assassinations. With regard to his prophetic claims, it is as difficult to assume that he was sincere throughout, or self-deceived, as that he was throughout an impostor. In his doctrines there is practically nothing original. The legends of the Koran are chiefly drawn from the Old Testament and the rabbinical literature, which Mohammed must have learned from a Jew near Mecca, though he presents them as original revelations by the angel Gabriel. See Koran.

Mohammed I., or Mahomet. Sultan of the Turks 1413-21, a younger brother of Bajazet I.
Mohammed II., surnamed "The Conqueror" and "The Great." Born about 1430; died 1481. Sultan of Turkey 1451-81, son of Amurath II. whom he succeeded. He besieged and captured Constantinople in 1453; and conquered the Morea, Servia, Bosnia, and Albania, and made the Crimea a dependency of Turkey (1475). He was defeated by Hunyadi at Belgrad in 1456, and unsuccessfully besieged Rhodes in 1480.
Mohammed III. Died 1603. Sultan of Turkey 1595-1603, son of Amurath III. whom he succeeded. His army defeated the Imperialists at Keresztes in 1596.

Mohammed IV. Born about 1641; died 1691. Sultan of Turkey 1648-87, son of Ibrahim whom he succeeded. He was deposed as a result of the reverses sustained by his arms at Vienna (1683) and Mohács (1687).

Mohave (mō-hā'vā). [Pl., also Mohaves. The name means 'three mountains.'] A tribe of North American Indians. They number about 2,000 (1893), living upon the lower Colorado River in Arizona, about one third being on the Colorado River reservation, Arizona. See Yuman.

Mohave (mō-hā'vā) Desert. A low-lying basin in San Bernardino County, southeastern California.

Mohawk (mō'hāk). [Pl., also Mohawks. The word is derived from the Algonquin maqua, bears.] A tribe of North American Indians. The Hurons called them Agniekronon, abbreviated by the French to Agné. Their villages were along the valley of the Mohawk River, New York, but they claimed the territory north to the St. Lawrence and south to the Delaware River watershed and the Catskill Mountains. They were the first tribe of the region to obtain firearms, and their frontier position made them so conspicuous that their name was often used by the English and the New England tribes for the whole Iroquois Confederacy. Their present (1893) number is over 2,000. See Iroquois.

Mohawk (mō'hāk). A river in New York which joins the Hudson 9 miles north of Albany. It forms the Cohoes Falls (70 feet high) near its mouth. Length, about 175 miles.

Mohegan (mō-hē'gan), or Monhegan (mon-hē'gan). A tribe of North American Indians. They once lived chiefly on Thames River, Connecticut, and claimed a large territory extending eastward into Massachusetts and Rhode Island and west along the coast to Guilford. After the destruction of the Pequots in 1637 they claimed their country. They had once formed one tribe with those Indians under Sassacus against whom Uncas rebelled and led the Thames River band. On the fall of Sassacus in 1637, most of the survivors of the Pequots came under the Mohegan chief. After the death of King Philip in 1676, the Mohegan were the only important body in the region. They became scattered, some joining the Brotherton Indians in New York. See Mahican and Algonquian.

Mohican. See Mahican.

Mohileff, or Moghileff (mō-gē-lef'). A government of western Russia, surrounded by the governments of Vitebsk, Smolensk, Tchernigoff, and Minsk. The surface is level and undulating. The chief occupation is agriculture. It belonged formerly to Lithuania, and was annexed by Russia in 1772. Area, 18,551 square miles. Population (1890), 1,387,000.

Mohoce. See Tusayan.

Mohocks (mō'hōks). Ruffians who infested the streets of London about the beginning of the 18th century; so called from the Indian tribe Mohawks or Mohecks.

In 1712 a tribe of young men of the higher classes, who assumed the name of Mohocks, were accustomed nightly to sally out drunk into the streets to hunt the passers-by and to subject them in mere wantonness to the most atrocious outrages. . . . Matrons inclosed in barrels were rolled down the steep and stony incline of Snow Hill. Watchmen were unmercifully beaten and their noses slit. Country gentlemen went to the theatre, as if in time of war, accompanied by their armed retainers. A bishop's son was said to be one of the gang, and a baronet was among those who were arrested.

Mohun (mō'hūn), Charles, fifth Baron Mohun. Born about 1675; killed in a duel in Hyde Park, London, Nov. 15, 1712. An English desperado, the eldest son of Charles, fourth Baron Mohun. On Dec. 9, 1692, he was associated with Captain Richard Hill in the murder of William Mountfort the actor. From 1691 to 1697 he served in Flanders. After 1699 he sat in the House of Lords as a staunch Whig. He was repeatedly engaged in duels, and twice tried for murder and acquitted. In 1701 he was involved in a protracted lawsuit with James Douglas, fourth duke of Hamilton, over the estate of the Earl of Maclesfield, which resulted in a duel and the death of both parties. This duel (Mohun being represented by a fictitious "Harry" Mohun) figures in Thackeray's "Henry Esmond."

Mohun, Michael. Born about 1625; died at London, Oct., 1684. An English actor. Before the civil war he performed under Beeston at the Cockpit, Drury Lane. He fought as captain in the army of Charles I. and in Flanders. He returned with Charles II., and was with Killigrew's company 1660-63. Pepys calls him the "best actor in the world," and he was said to "speak as Shakspeare wrote." He played at the Theatre Royal after April 8, 1663, and in the theatre of Lincoln's Inn Fields after 1672. He was very versatile, and played with equal ease a succession of classical heroes, modern rakes, simpletons, etc.

Moigno (mwān-yō'). François Napoléon Marie. Born at Guéméné, Morbihan, France, April 20, 1804; died at St. Denis, July 13, 1884. A French mathematician and scientist. He wrote "Leçons de calcul" (1840-44), etc.

Mojave. See Mohave.

Mojos (mō'höz). An Indian tribe of northern Bolivia, now (1894) living about the great head streams of the Madeira River, especially on the Mamoré. Before the conquest they probably numbered at least 250,000. They were a mild, agricultural race, readily received the Jesuit missionaries in the 17th century, and have ever since remained devout Catholics. Fifteen large missions were established in their territory, and still exist as villages: the largest, Trinidad (founded 1687), is now the capital of Beni. The Mojos are much sought after as canoe-men and rubber-gatherers. They are industrious, and excel in artistic work. The tribe has been greatly reduced, principally by epidemics, but is still said to number 30,000 (perhaps too high an estimate, as all the mission Indians are classed with them). They belong to the great Arawak or Maypure stock. Also written Moxos. Their language is sometimes called Moja or Moza.

Mokanna (mō-kän'nä) (surname of Atha ben Hakem). [Ar., 'veiled.'] Killed about 780. A Mohammedan impostor in Khorasan. He is the hero of the "Veiled Prophet of Khorassan" in the first part of Moore's "Lalla Rookh."

Molbech, Christian Knud Frederik. Born at Copenhagen, July 20, 1821; died at Kiel, May 20, 1888. A Danish poet and dramatist. He studied at the Copenhagen University after 1839. In 1840 appeared a first volume of poems, "Billeder af Jesu Liv" ("Pictures from the Life of Jesus"). The romantic drama "Klutekongens Brud" ("The Bride of the Mountain King") appeared in 1845, in which year also was produced the drama "Venusbjerget" ("The Venusberg"). A collection of poems with the title "Dæmriog" ("Twilight") appeared in 1851. "Dante," a tragedy, is from 1852. In 1853 he was made professor of the Danish language and literature at Kiel, which position he held until 1864, when he returned to Copenhagen and began work as a journalist. In 1863 had appeared "Digte lyriske og dramatiske" ("Poems Lyric and Dramatic"). Afterward, as censor at the royal theater, he again turned his attention to the drama, and has written the comedy "Rentekræver" ("The Financier"), and the dramas "Ambrosius" and "Faraos King" ("Pharaoh's King"). He is also the translator of Dante's "Divine Comedy" ("Guddommelig Komædie," the first part of which appeared in 1851).

Mold (möld). A town in Flintshire, North Wales, situated on the Alyn 18 miles south-southwest of Liverpool. Population (1891), 4,457. See Hallebjah Victory.

Moldau (mō'dou). The principal river in Bohemia. It rises in the Bohmerwald, flows past Prague, and joins the Elbe 18 miles north of Prague. Length, 260 miles.

Moldavia (mō-dä'vi-ä), G. Moldau (mō'dou), F. Moldavie (mō-dä've'). A former principality, now a part of Rumania. Chief city, Jassy. It is bounded by Bukovina on the north, Russia (separated by the Pruth) on the east, Wallachia on the south, and Transylvania (separated by the Carpathians) on the west. It is mountainous in the west, and is traversed by the Sereth. It was founded early in the 14th century (see the extract); became tributary to Turkey early in the 16th century; was ruled for more than a century (until 1821) by Fanariot families; and was frequently under Russian influence. Alexander John Cusa was elected prince in 1859. It was formally united with Wallachia in 1861. See Rumania.

Another Rouman migration, passing from the land of Marmaros north of Transylvania, founded the principality of Moldavia between the Carpathians and the Dniester. This too stood to the Hungarian crown in the same shifting relation as Great Wallachia, and sometimes transferred its vassalage to Lithuania and Poland.

Molé (mō-lä'), Comte Louis Matthieu. Born at Paris, Jan. 24, 1781; died at his Château Champlâtreux, Nov. 25, 1855. A French politician, minister of foreign affairs 1830, and premier 1836-39.

Molé, Matthieu. Born 1584; died 1656. A French politician. He was appointed president of the Parliament of Paris by Richelieu in 1641, a post which he retained until 1653. He became keeper of the great seal in 1651.

Molech (mō'lek), or Moloch (mō'lok). ['King,'] In i Ki, xi, 7, he is mentioned as an idol of the Ammonites, but the worship of Molech was spread among all the Canaanitish and Semitic tribes.] A form of Baal, the sun-god, or the personification of the male generative principle in nature. Molech represents the sun in his fierce destructive aspect. The worship of Molech consisted in offering human sacrifices. The god was represented with a bull's head and long arms to receive the victims, which were lifted up to an opening in the breast of the brass statue and rolled into the furnace blazing inside. Whether the victims were first killed, or were burned alive, is a disputed question. The worship of Molech was at different periods introduced into Israel, with its principal place in the valley of Hinnom; so under Ahaz (king of Judah 734-725 B. C.), Manasse (697-642), and Amon (642-640). In the cuneiform inscriptions malik ('ruler,' properly 'decider') can be the epithet of any god, but it is especially applied to Adar, who is among others the god of the destructive south or midday sun, and in the Old Testament is called Adrammelech (Adar-malik): to him children were sacrificed (2 Ki. xvii, 31), although in the Assyrian-Babylonian literature no reference to human sacrifices in honor of a divinity has been found. At Carthage the bloody rites of Molech were officially suppressed by the emperor Tiberius (14-37 A. D.).

Molele. See Molate.

Molenbeek-Saint-Jean (mō-loñ-bäk'sän-zhōñ'). A northwestern suburb of Brussels. Population (1890), 48,723.

Moleschott (mō'le-shot), Jacob. Born at Boisle-Due, Netherlands, Aug. 9, 1822; died at Rome, May 20, 1893. A noted Dutch-Italian physiologist, professor of physiology successively at Zurich (1856), Turin (1861), and Rome (1879). He was made a senator of the kingdom of Italy in 1876. Among his works are "Physiologie der Nahrungsmittel" ("Physiology of Food," 1850), "Lehrer der Nahrungsmittel" (1850; Eng. trans. as "Chemistry of Food and Diet," 1856), "Der Kreislauf des Lebens" (1852), etc.

Molesworth (mōlz'wérth), Richard, third Viscount Molesworth. Born in 1680; died Oct. 12, 1758. An English field-marshal, second son of Robert, first Viscount Molesworth. He was entered at the Temple, but abandoned the law and joined the army in Holland. He was present at Blenheim, and was one of Marlborough's aides-de-camp at Ramillies on May 23, 1706, when he saved the duke's life. In 1735 he was made major-general; in 1739 lieutenant-general in Ireland; in 1751 commander-in-chief in Ireland; and in 1757 field-marshal.

Molesworth, Sir William. Born at London, May 23, 1810; died there, Oct. 22, 1855. An English baronet and politician, son of Sir Arscott-Orury Molesworth. He entered Cambridge, but finished his education at Edinburgh University. He lived in southern Europe until 1831, when he took part in the reform movement, and was returned member of Parliament for East Cornwall in 1832. He associated himself with Grote and J. S. Mill, and was disliked for his infidel opinions. In April, 1835, he started the "London Review." His special work was in colonial policy. His edition of Hobbes's works was published in 16 volumes from 1839 to 1845. In July, 1855, he was appointed colonial secretary.

Molesworth, William Nassau. Born at Millbrook, near Southampton, Nov. 8, 1816; died at Rochdale, Dec. 19, 1890. An English historian. He graduated at Cambridge in 1839, and in 1844 was appointed vicar of Spotland, near Rochdale. He was a friend of John Bright. His chief works are a "History of England from 1830" (1871-73), a "History of the Reform Bill of 1832" (1864), a "History of the Church of England from 1660" (1882).

Molfetta (mō'l-fät'). A seaport in the province of Bari, Apulia, Italy, situated on the Adriatic 16 miles northwest of Bari. Population (1881), 30,056.

Molière (mō-lyär'): the stage name of Jean Baptiste Poquelin (pōk-län'). Born at Paris, Jan. 15, 1622; died there, Feb. 17, 1673. A celebbrated French dramatist and actor, the greatest French writer of comedies. He graduated from the Jesuits' College in Paris, after spending five years in the companionship of Chapelle, Regnier, and Cyrano de Bergerac (1636-41). Even before graduation Molière was promised the office of tapissier valet de chambre to the king, a distinction already held by his family for two generations. He was not yet twenty when he followed the court to Narbonne on the memorable trip that witnessed the execution of Cinqu-Mars and the last victory of Richelieu. At twenty-three he began to devote his entire time to acting and play-writing. At the head of a troop of actors he performed in Paris and the provinces (1643-58). He settled down finally at Paris, where he was very successful until 1666. From that time on, the enmities contracted in his public career and the troubles in his own house embittered his life, told on his work, and probably hastened his death. He was seized with illness while acting the "Malade imaginaire" for the first time, and died a few hours later, at his own house, from hemorrhage. His comedies include "Les précieuses ridicules" (1659), "Ecole des maris" (1661), "Ecole des femmes" (1662), "Le mariage forcé" (1664), "Le misanthrope" (1666), "Le médecin malgré lui" (1666), "Tartuffe" (1667), "Amphitryon" (1668), "L'Avare" (1668), "Le bourgeois gentilhomme" (1670), "Les fourberies de Scapin" (1671), "Les femmes savantes" (1672), "Le malade imaginaire" (1673), etc. His works were published for the first time as "Œuvres de M. Molière" (1674). The first complete set, edited by Vinot and La Grange, was entitled "Œuvres de M. Molière, revues, corrigées et augmentées" (1682). The best modern edition of Molière's complete plays was made by Despois (finished by Paul Mesnard) in the "Collection des grands écrivains" (1873-89).

Independently of the characters which Molière shares with all the great names of literature, his fertility and justness of thought, the felicity of the expression in which he clothes it, and his accurate observation of human life, there are two points in his drama which belong, in the highest degree, to him alone. One is the extraordinary manner in which he manages to imbue farce and burlesque with the true spirit of refined comedy. This manner has been spoken of by unfriendly critics as "exaggerated," but the reproach argues a deficiency of perception. Even the most roaring farces of Molière, even such pieces as "M. de Pourceaugnac" and the "Bourgeois Gentilhomme," demand rank as legitimate comedy, owing to his unmatched faculty of intimating a general purpose under the cloak of the merely ludicrous incidents which are made to surround the fortunes of a particular person. This general purpose (and here we come to the second point) is invariably a moral one. Of all dramatists, ancient and modern, Molière is perhaps that one who has borne most constantly in mind the theory that the stage is a lay pulpit, and that its end is not merely amusement, but the reformation of manners by means of amusing spectacles. . . . In brilliancy of wit he is, among dramatists, inferior only to Aristophanes and Congreve. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 311.

Molina (mō-lē'nä). Afonso de, Francis, born in Escalona about 1510; died at Mexico, 1585 (?). A Spanish Franciscan missionary. He went to Mexico when a child, early learned the Nahuatl tongue, and acted as interpreter to the first Franciscan missionaries, subsequently joining the order. His books on the Nahuatl language were among the earliest printed in America, and are greatly prized by bibliophiles.

Molina, Juan Ignacio. Born in Talea, Chile, June 23, 1737; died at Bologna, Italy, Sept. 12, 1829. A Jesuit historian. After the expulsion of his order (1767) he lived in Italy, and in 1774 settled at Bologna. His principal works are "Saggio sulla storia naturale di Chile" (1782) and "Saggio della storia civile di Chile" (1757). They were widely read, and there are many editions in various languages.

Molina, Luis. Born at Cuenca, New Castile, 1535; died at Madrid, Oct. 12, 1600. A Spanish Jesuit theologian. He propounded in 1588 the doctrine that the efficacy of divine grace depends simply on the will which accepts it—that grace is a free gift to all, but that the consent of the will is requisite in order that grace may be efficacious. His chief work is "Liberi arbitrii, etc., concordia" (1588).

Molinara (mō-lä'nä'rä), La. [It., 'The Milleress or Mill Girl.'] A comedy by Paisiello, produced at Naples in 1788, in London in 1803.

Moline (mō-lēn'). A city in Rock Island County, Illinois, situated on the Mississippi near Rock Island. Population (1890), 12,000.

Molinella (mō-lē-nel'lä). A town in the province of Bologna, Italy, 19 miles northeast of Bologna. Population (1881), commune, 11,336.

Molinists (mō'li-nists). 1. Those who hold the opinions of Luis Molina in respect to grace, free will, and predestination.—2. The Quietists, or followers of Mignel Molinos, who taught the direct relation between the soul and God.

Molino del Rey (mō-lē'nō del rä'). [Sp., 'king's mill.'] A place about 4 miles west of the city of Mexico, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from Chapultepec Castle, which commands it. Here, in 1847, were several massive stone buildings used as mills and foundries. These buildings, defended by 4,000 Mexicans under Leon and Perez, were stormed by about the same number of United States troops under Worth, Sept. 8. The battle was one of the hardest fought of the war, and the loss on both sides was heavy.

Molinos (mō-lē'nōs), Miguel. Born at or near Saragossa, Spain, Dec. 21, 1640; died at Rome, Dec. 29, 1696. A Spanish mystic, founder of the Quietists. He was condemned by the Inquisition in 1687. His most noted work is "Guia spirital" ("Spiritual Guide," 1675).

Molique (mō-lēk'), Wilhelm Bernhard. Born at Nuremberg, Bavaria, Oct. 7, 1802; died at Cannstatt, Württemberg, May 10, 1869. A German violinist, and composer especially for the violin. Spohr gave him a few lessons, and he studied at Munich with Rovelli. He was leader of the royal band at Stuttgart 1836-40. In the latter year he went to England, where he taught and passed the rest of his professional life. In 1866 he retired to Cannstatt.

The period of his administration is known as the "era of good feeling." Among its chief events were the acquisition of Florida (1819); the Missouri Compromise (1820); and the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine (1823).

Monroe Doctrine. In American politics, the doctrine of the non-intervention of European powers in matters relating to the American continents. It received its name from statements contained in President Monroe's annual message to Congress in Dec., 1823, at the period of a suspected concert of the powers in the Holy Alliance to interfere in Spanish America in behalf of Spain. The following are the most significant passages in the message: "We could not view an interposition for oppressing them [the Spanish-American republics] or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as a manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. . . . The American continents should no longer be subjects for any new European colonial settlement."

Monrovia (mun-rō'vi-ā). The capital of Liberia, Africa, situated on the coast, at the mouth of the Mesurado, in lat. 6° 19' N., long. 10° 49' W. Population (1891), estimated, 5,000.

Mons (mōns). Flem. Bergen (ber'gen). The capital of the province of Hainaut, Belgium, situated on the Trouille in lat. 50° 27' N., long. 3° 56' E. It is the center of a large and rich coal region. The cathedral, in the late-pointed style, was founded in the middle of the 15th century. The exterior is rich, the interior bold and graceful, and there is superb 16th-century glass. The hôtel de ville is a picturesque late-pointed building, begun in 1458. There are several battle-fields in the neighborhood. A fortress was founded on the site of the city by Cesar. Mons was taken by Louis of Nassau in May, and by the Spaniards in Sept., 1572; was taken by the French 1691, and restored 1697; was held by the French in the War of the Spanish Succession; was ceded to Austria in 1714; and was taken by the French in 1746 and in 1792. In 1354 he was appointed constable of the king's army in France, and served until the peace of 1397. In 1369 he served under John of Gaunt in the north of France. He assisted at the coronation of Richard II. in 1377, and in 1381 went with the king to meet Wat Tyler's rebels at Smithfield.

Montagnais (mōn-tān-yā'). [F., 'mountain-eers.']. 1. A collective name given by the French (and adopted by the English) to the group of North American Indian tribes in Quebec province, extending along the north shore of the St. Lawrence from near the city of Quebec to the Strait of Belle Isle, and inland northwest and northeast. They are divided into several tribes, among which are the Berseamite, Chiseedee, and Tadousse. The name Montagnais is from the elevated land on which they dwell, and they are sometimes confounded with the tribe of the same name of an Athapasean stock in the Rocky Mountains. They number about 2,000. See Algonquian. 2. A collective name given to four tribes of the northern division of the Athapasean stock of North American Indians, occupying the interior of British North America. These tribes are the Thilan otline or Chippewayan proper, the Athapasean proper, the Ethen eddel or Caribou-eaters, and the T'atsan otline or Yellow Knives. They should not be confounded with the other Montagnais, who belong to the Algonquian stock. See Athapasean.

Montagu (mon'ta-gū), Basil. Born at London, April 24, 1770; died at Boulogne-sur-Mer, Nov. 27, 1851. An English legal and miscellaneous writer, son of John Montagu, fourth earl of Sandwich, by his mistress Martha Ray. Acknowledged by his father, he was educated at the Charterhouse and at Christ's College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1790. He was admitted to Gray's Inn, and came to London in 1795. He was intimate with Coleridge and Wordsworth. He was called to the bar in 1798, and published in 1801 "A Summary of the Law of set off," and from 1805 to 1807 prepared a "Digest of the Bankruptcy Laws." In 1807 he was appointed a commissioner in bankruptcy. He also printed much matter on the death-penalty and copyright laws. In 1825 he exposed the delay and expense of the existing bankruptcy procedure, and in 1835 was made accountant-general in bankruptcy. Between 1825 and 1834 he edited the "Works of Lord Bacon." His "Essays" were published in 1824.

Montagu, Charles, first Earl of Halifax. Born probably at Horton, Northamptonshire, April 16, 1661; died May 19, 1715. An English statesman, financier, and poet, grandson of the first Earl of Manchester. He studied at Westminster and at Cambridge (Trinity College). In 1689 he was returned to the Convention Parliament for Maldon. In March, 1692, he was appointed a lord of the treasury, and induced Parliament to raise a loan of a million in annuities based on new excise duties. This loan was the beginning of the English national debt. Adopting Patterson's scheme for a national bank, he carried through a bill to raise a loan of £1,200,000 based on a tonnage bill, the subscribers to form a corporation known as the Governor and Company of the Bank of England. On April 30, 1694, he was made chancellor of the exchequer. With the aid of Somers, Locke, Newton, and Halley he reformed the currency in 1695, and for the first time issued the exchequer bills by which the British government sets its first credit from the House of Commons. In 1696 he carried his "general mortgage" scheme, by which a consolidated fund was formed. In 1698 he established the society to which a monopoly of the Indian trade was given. On Dec. 13, 1703, he was created Baron Halifax. He was impeached in 1701 and acquitted, but was not in office during Anne's reign. On Oct. 19, 1714, he was created earl of Halifax. He served as president of the Royal Society from 1695 to 1698. He was the collaborator of Prior in the "City Mouse and Country Mouse" (1687).

Montagu, Edward, second Earl of Manchester. Born 1602; died May 5, 1671. An English statesman, eldest son of Henry Montagu, first earl of Manchester. He entered Cambridge (Sidney Sussex College) in 1618, and was elected member of Parliament for Huntingdon in 1623. In 1626 he was created Baron Montagu, while holding the courtesy title of Viscount Mandeville. In 1640 he was one of twelve peers to petition the king to call the Long Parliament, and was in accord with Pym, Hampden, Fiennes, and St. John. In Jan., 1642, he was impeached by the king for high treason; in Sept. commanded a regiment of foot in Essex's army; and in Nov. became earl of Manchester. In Aug., 1643, he was made major-general in the eastern counties. At Marston Moor (July 2, 1644) he was general field-officer with Cromwell as commander of his horse. On Nov. 25, 1644, Cromwell charged Manchester before the Commons with neglect and incompetency, and on April 2, 1645, he resigned his commission in the army. On Jan. 2, 1649, he opposed the ordinance for the king's trial in the House of Lords, and retired from public life before the formation of the Commonwealth. On March 15, 1649, he was made chancellor of the University of Cambridge. He assisted in the restoration of Charles II., and in 1660 regained many of his offices.

Montagu, or Mountagu, Edward, first Earl of Sandwich. Born July 27, 1625; killed in a naval action, May 28, 1672. An English admiral. He followed Parliament, and in 1643 raised a regiment of foot in Cambridgeshire; fought at Naseby June 14, and at Bristol Sept. 10, 1645; but had no share in the king's trial and execution. In 1656 he was appointed Blake's colleague in command of the fleet. He supported Richard Cromwell, and was actively engaged in the restoration of Charles II. In 1660 he was appointed general of the fleet with Monk, and with Pepys (author of the "Diary") as his secretary. On May 23, 1660, the king embarked on his flagship, and on May 25 landed at Dover. He was created earl of Sandwich July 12. In 1661-62 he was engaged in Morocco and Portugal. He was blown up in his ship, the Royal James, May 28, in a battle with the Dutch.

Montagu, Edward Wortley. Born in 1713; died in Italy, 1776. An English author, son of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu; reputed author of "Reflections on the Rise and Fall of Ancient Republics" (1759).

Montagu, Mrs. (Elizabeth Robinson). Born at York, Oct. 2, 1720; died at Montagu House, London, Aug. 25, 1800. An English author and social leader. On Aug. 5, 1742, she married Edward Montagu, grandson of the first Earl of Sandwich. After 1750 she held her salon in Hill street, Mayfair. The epithet "blue-stocking" was first applied to her assemblies. Among her visitors were Lord Lyttelton, Burke, Garrick, and Sir Joshua Reynolds. Her younger associates included Hannah More and Fanny Burney. In 1760 she contributed three dialogues to Lyttelton's "Dialogues of the Dead." She visited Paris after the peace of 1763. In 1769 she wrote an essay on the "Genius of Shakspeare" in answer to Voltaire. In 1776 she built Montagu House, now No. 22 Portman Square, where she died. (This was not the Montagu House upon the site of which the British Museum was built.)

Montagu, George. Born at Lackham, Wiltshire, 1731; died at Knowle House, Kingsbridge, Devonshire, Aug. 28, 1815. An English naturalist. He served as captain in the American Revolution. He was an early member of the Linnean Society (established 1788). Among his works are "The Sportsman's Directory" (1792), the "Ornithological Dictionary, etc." (1802), "Testacea Britannica" (1803), etc.

Montagu, John, fourth Earl of Sandwich. Born Nov. 3, 1718; died at London, April 30, 1792. An English diplomatist, eldest son of Edward Richard Montagu, Viscount Hinchinbroke. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge, but left the university in 1738 without a degree, and traveled in Europe and the East. In Dec. 1744, he was appointed a lord commissioner of the admiralty by the Duke of Bedford. In 1748 he was plenipotentiary at the conclusion of the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle. In Feb. 1748, he was made first lord of the admiralty, and was dismissed from office June 12, 1751. He disgraced himself at the notorious prosecution of John Wilkes. In Dec. 1770, he was appointed a secretary of state under Lord North, and was first lord of the admiralty during the American war, when the lowest depths of corruption were reached by the British navy. He retired from public life on the fall of the North administration, March, 1782. Basil Montagu was his son by his mistress, Miss Ray, who was murdered April 7, 1773.

Montagu, Lady Mary Wortley. Baptized at Covent Garden, May 26, 1689; died in England, Aug. 21, 1762. An English writer, eldest daughter of Evelyn Pierrepont, fifth earl (later duke) of Kingston. She privately married Edward Wortley Montagu, grandson of Edward Montagu, first earl of Sandwich, on Aug. 12, 1712. Her son Edward Wortley Montagu was born in 1713. She was a favorite of the Princess of Wales (afterward Queen Caroline). In 1716 Montagu was appointed ambassador to the Porte. He was recalled in Oct., 1717, but resided in Constantinople until June, 1718. An interesting account of the visit appears in her "Letters." While at Adrianople she observed the practice of inoculation, and assisted in introducing it into England. She was very intimate with Pope, but quarreled with him finally, and became an object of his malignity. In 1739 she again went abroad, and in 1758 settled at Venice, returning to England in 1762. Her daughter Mary (born in 1718) became Lady Bute. She wrote "Town Eclogues," published as "Our Poems" (1716). Her "Letters" appeared in 1763 and 1767.

Montagu House. A mansion erected by Hooker for Ralph Montagu, first duke of Montagu, "after the French manner," in the suburb of Bloomsbury, London. It was burned down in 1686. It was rebuilt, but only partially inhabited, and was sold to the nation for £10,000 in 1753, for the reception of the Sloane collection. The last remnants of the old house were removed in 1845 and replaced by the present British Museum.

Montague (mon'tā-gū). 1. In Shakspeare's tragedy "Romeo and Juliet," the father of Romeo. — 2. The "honest man" in Fletcher and Massinger's play "The Honest Man's Fortune."

Montague, Henry James (the stage name of Henry J. Mann). Born in Staffordshire, England, 1843; died at San Francisco, Aug. 11, 1878. An English-American actor. He played in London till 1874, when he made his first appearance in New York. He went to San Francisco in 1875. He was a graceful and refined comedian.

Montague, Lady. In Shakspeare's "Romeo and Juliet," the mother of Romeo.

Montaigne (mon-tān'; F. pron. mōn-tāny'), Michel Eyquem de. Born at the Château Montaigne, Dordogne, France, Feb. 28, 1533; died Sept. 13 (?), 1592. A celebrated French essayist. His early education was carried on at home under his father's guidance. After graduating from college at Bordeaux, he studied law. In 1569 he was at the court of Francis II., and in 1571 became attached to the person of Henry III. In this year Montaigne published his friend La Boétie's translations from the Greek, and in 1572 edited the latter's French verses. In 1580 he traveled in Germany, Switzerland, and Italy. He left Rome in 1581 to become mayor of Bordeaux. Montaigne is chiefly known from his "Essais" (Bordeaux, 1595; the edition of 1588 was the last to be published during the author's lifetime. Mademoiselle de Gournay, a warm admirer of Montaigne, did not have access to a copy of this last edition with the author's own corrections when she edited the "Essais" in 1595, together with some posthumous writings and notes). An English translation was made in 1601 by the Italian Giovanni Florio, based on Mademoiselle de Gournay's work. The best classical edition of Montaigne's "Essais" is due to J. V. Leclerc; a reprint of it was made in 1865-66. In his essays Montaigne studies the men of the society of his day. He examines everything in a skeptical spirit, is inclined to doubt, and his motto is Que sais-je? Montaigne's ideas and influence are to be traced in many of the best French authors of the 17th and 18th centuries, while outside of France his essays were diligently read by Bacon and Shakspeare.

Montalba (mont-al'ba), Clara. Born at London. A contemporary English landscape and marine painter. She is the eldest of the four daughters of Antony and Emilie Montalba; was a pupil of Isabey in Paris; and was made associate of the London Society of Painters in Water Colors in 1874, and of the Belgian Society in 1876. Among her works are several Venetian scenes, one of the port of Amsterdam, etc. Her sisters Ellen and Hilda are portrait and figure painters.

Montalba, Henrietta Skerrett. Born at London, 1856; died at Venice, Sept. 14, 1893. An English sculptor, sister of Clara Montalba. Montchrestien (môn-krā-tyañ'), Antoine de. See the extract.

We have seen that the early tragedy, which was more or less directly reproductive of Seneca, attained its highest pitch in the work of Garnier. This pitch was on the whole well maintained by Antoine de Montchrestien, a man of a singular history and of a singular genius. The date of his birth is not exactly known, but he was the son of an apothecary at Falaise, and belonged to the Huguenot party. Duels and lawsuits succeeded each other in his story, and by some means or other he was able to assume the title of Seigneur de Vasteville. In one of his duels he killed his man, and had to fly to England. Being pardoned, he returned to France and took to commerce. But after the death of Henry IV. he joined a Huguenot rising, and was killed in October, 1621. Montchrestien wrote a treatise on political economy (he is even said to have been the first to introduce the term into French), some poems, and six tragedies, "Sophonisbe" or "La Cartagoise," "Les Lacènes," "David," "Aman," "I Hector," and "L'Ecossaïse." Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 239.

She was a daughter of the Duc de Mortemart, and married the Marquis de Montespan in 1663. She succeeded Made-moiselle de la Vallière as mistress of Louis XIV., about 1667, and was in turn supplanted by Madame de Maintenon three years later, although she was not wholly discarded before 1686. She eventually entered a convent. She had eight children by the king, including the Duc de Maine, Louis César, the Comte de Vexin, and the Comte de Toulouse. The Marquis d'Antin was her son by her husband.

Montesquieu (môn-tes-kyô', Anglicized mon-tes-kü'), Baron de la Brède et de (Charles de Secondat). Born at the Château de la Brède, near Bordeaux, Jan. 18, 1689; died at Paris, Feb. 10, 1755. A celebrated French writer. He was brought up at the College of Juilly, near Meaux, and returned to his native province to study law. In 1714 he was made councillor, and in 1716 president, of the Bordeaux parliament. He was not in sympathy, however, with the duties of his position, and he gradually withdrew from them and devoted his attention to the study of literature and jurisprudence. In 1712 he won fame in the world of letters with his "Lettres persanes," in which he criticizes cleverly the French society of his time. For this work he was elected to the French Academy in 1728. The following years were spent in travel, and he visited successively Austria, Italy, Germany, Switzerland, Holland, and England. On his return to France he gave up the remainder of his life to literary work. Among his many productions, the two which have contributed most to his renown are the "Considerations sur les causes de la grandeur et de la décadence des Romains" (1734), and "L'Esprit des lois" (1748) (which see).

Monte Testaccio (mon'te tes-tä'ehô). [It., 'potsherd hill.'] A hill in the extreme southern part of Rome, southwest of the Aventine, on the left bank of the Tiber. It is about 115 feet in height above the surrounding area, and 2,500 in circumference, and is formed entirely of the fragments of pottery vases, chiefly amphora, from the extensive warehouses which lined the neighboring quay. The potters' stamps on the fragments show that this rubbish-heap was still used in the 4th century, and it is believed to have been begun about the inception of the empire. The view from the summit is celebrated.

Montevarchi (mon-te-vär'kê). A small town in the province of Arezzo, Italy, 24 miles southeast of Florence.

Monte Velino (mon'te ve-lê'nô). One of the principal summits of the Apennines, about 50 miles east-northeast of Rome. It was the scene of the defeat of Conradin by Charles of Anjou in 1268. Height, 8,160 feet.

Monteverde (mon-te-ver'de), Claudio. Born at Cremona, Italy, 1568 (?); died 1643 (?). An Italian composer. Among his works are the operas "Arianna" (1607) and "Orfeo" (1608).

Monteverde (môn-tä-ver'dä), Juan Domingo. Born in Teneriffe, Canary Islands, about 1772; died in Spain, 1823. A Spanish general. From 1811 to the end of 1813 he was the most prominent royalist commander in Venezuela, though without legitimate authority. He received the submission of Miranda in July, 1812, and in violation of his treaty sent him a prisoner to Spain. His cruelty to the subjugated provinces led to fresh rebellions. He was repeatedly defeated by Bolívar, and at length besieged in Puerto Cabello, where he was deposed by his own followers in Dec., 1813. He returned to Spain in 1816.

Monteverde, Jules. Born at Bastagno, Italy, Oct. 8, 1837. An Italian sculptor.

Montevideo (mon-te-vid'ê-ô; Sp. pron. môn-tä-ve-thä'ô). The capital of Uruguay, situated on the estuary of the Rio de la Plata in lat. 34° 54' 33" S., long. 56° 12' 18" W. It has important foreign commerce; exports hides, wool, tallow, horns, etc.; is the terminus of various steamship lines; and has a university and a cathedral. It was colonized by Spanish settlers in 1724; taken by the British in 1807, but recovered the same year; and since 1828 has been the capital of Uruguay. Until 1834, when the walls were removed, it was little more than a fortress. Population (1892), with suburbs, 238,080.

Monte Viso (mon'te vé'sô). A peak of the Cottian Alps, in Italy, near the French border, 42 miles southwest of Turin. It contains the source of the Po, and is one of the most conspicuous peaks of the western Alps. Height, 12,615 feet.

Montezuma (mon-tê-zô'mä), or Moteczuma (mô-täk-zô'mä); called Montezuma I., and sur-named Ilhuicamina (ël-wê-kä-mê'nä) ('archer of the heavens'). [Nahuatl, 'angry chief.'] Born about 1300; died 1464. A war-chief or "emperor" of ancient Mexico. He was the son of Huiztilahuitl, and succeeded his brother Izcohuatl in 1436 (formally inaugurated 1440). He had wars with the Mixtecs and Tlascalans, and is said to have carried his arms to the Gulf of Mexico. Also written Moteczuma (Cortés), Montezuma (Bernal Diaz and Oviedo), Moteczuma (Acosta), Moteczuma, Moteczuma, etc.

Montezuma, or Moteczuma: called Montezuma II., or Xocoyotzin (hô-kô-yôt-zên'). Born in 1477 (according to Bernal Diaz in 1479); died at Tenochtitlan, June 30, 1520. An Aztec war-chief or "emperor" of Mexico at the time of the Spanish conquest. He was the son of Axayacatl, and succeeded his uncle Ahuizotl in 1503. Besides his almost continuous wars with the Tlascalans and Tarascans, he carried his arms far southward, and is said to have invaded Honduras: thousands of captives were brought back for sacrifice in the temples. The tidings of ships and white men on the coast excited his superstitious fears. When Cortés landed he sent him presents, but tried to dissuade him from coming to Tenochtitlan. Cortés insisted, and reached the city with his army in Nov., 1519. He was well received and given rich presents, but, fearing violence from the natives, seized Montezuma in his own house and confined him in the Spanish quarters as a hostage. The Aztecs at length rose in arms and attacked the quarters; Montezuma, at the request of Cortés, appeared on the wall and attempted to expostulate with them, but was received with a shower of stones, and died of his wounds four days later. Descendants of one of his daughters are still living in Mexico. After the Spanish conquest Montezuma became a mythical personage among the Indians: this hero or hero-god they mention to strangers as their principal deity, although they do not pay him the slightest worship. In New Mexico modern travelers and tourists have thought that they have discovered a Montezuma worship, which, however, does not exist.

Montfaucon (môn-fô-kôn'), Bernard de. Born at the Château Soulaige, in Languedoc, France, Jan. 18, 1655; died at Paris, Dec. 21, 1741. A French critic and classical scholar. Among his works are "Palaographia Graeca" (1708), "L'Antiquité expliquée et représentée en figures" (1719-24), "Les monuments de la monarchie française" (1729-33), an edition of Athanasius, etc.

Monferrato (môn-fer-rä'), It. Monferrato (mon-fer-rä'tô). [It., 'iron mountain.'] A former marquisate, later a duchy, in north-western Italy, lying south of the Po and north of the Ligurian Apennines and Alps. Capital, Casale. Its marquises from the 16th century ruled not only in Italy but for some time in Greece. A branch of the Palaeologi ruled from 1306. The marquisate was made a duchy and united to Mantua in 1536. Its possession was later a matter of dispute between Mantua and Savoy. It passed to Savoy in 1703.

Montfleury (môn-flê-rê'), Antoine Jacob, called. Born at Paris, 1640; died at Aix, 1685. A French dramatist, son of Zacharie Jacob, also called Montfleury, an actor. His comedy "La femme juge et partie" (1669) is still played, though reduced to three acts. It was almost as successful as "Tartuffe."

He wrote sixteen comedies, partly on contemporary subjects and partly adaptations of Spanish originals. The two best are "La Femme Juge et Partie" and "La Fille Capitaine." They belong to an older style of comedy than Molière's, being both extravagant and coarse, but there is considerable vis comica in them.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 313.

Montfort (môn-fôr'), Comte Simon de. Killed near Toulouse, France, June 25, 1213. A French commander and crusader, leader of the crusade against the Albigenes in 1208. He was the father of the following.

Montfort (môn'tôrt; F. pron. môn-fôr'), Simon of, Earl of Leicester. Born about 1208; killed at Evesham, Aug. 4, 1265. A celebrated English general and statesman. He was the son of Simon de Montfort (see preceding name). The earldom of Leicester came into the family through his grandmother, Amicia, daughter of Robert of Beaumont, third earl of Leicester. In 1238 Montfort married Eleanor, widow of William Marshal, earl of Pembroke, and sister of Henry III. In 1240 he went on a crusade. In 1248 he was appointed governor of Gascony. His vigorous administration resulted in an open quarrel with the king, and he resigned his office Sept. 20, 1252. The ill feeling between the earl and king forced Simon more and more into the popular party, and he was openly recognized as leader of the "barons' war" in 1263. On May 14, 1264, he captured the king, and became virtually governor of the kingdom. By writs in the king's name (Dec. 14 and 24, 1264) he summoned to a parliament, which met in London Jan. 30, 1265, 120 churchmen, 23 lay barons, and 2 knights from every shire, and also 2 citizens from every borough in England—the first appearance of the Commons. At this parliament the quarrel between Simon and Gilbert, earl of Gloucester, began, which ended in the death of Simon at Evesham.

Montfort, Simon of. Born near Brindisi, 1240; died near Siena, Italy, 1271. The second child of Simon of Montfort, earl of Leicester. In the "barons' war" of 1264 he defended Northampton against the king, and was captured April. After his father's victory at Lewes, May 14, 1264, he was made constable of Rochester. He reached Evesham after the death of his father, Aug. 4, 1265, and was obliged to surrender to Edward at Christmas. He was banished, and was still in France March 26, 1268. On March 13, 1271, he assisted in the murder of Henry of Cornwall.

Montgolfier (mont-gol'fi-ër; F. pron. môn-gol-fyã'), Jacques Étienne. Born at Vidalon-lez-Annonay, Ardèche, France, Jan. 7, 1745; died at Servières, Aug. 2, 1799. A French mechanician and inventor. Like his elder brother, Joseph Michel, he studied mathematics, mechanics, and physics. He was for a time an architect, but gave up that profession in order to take charge with his brother of his father's paper-manufactory at Annonay. Together with his brother he invented the form of air-balloon known as the montgolfier, a public experiment with which was made at Annonay in 1782. The experiment was repeated by Joseph Montgolfier before the court at Versailles, Sept. 19, 1783, and both brothers were subsequently elected corresponding members of the Academy.

Montgolfier, Joseph Michel. Born at Vidalon-lez-Annonay, Ardèche, France, 1740; died at Balaruc, France, June 26, 1810. A French mechanician, brother of Jacques Étienne Montgolfier, with whom he was associated in the invention of the air-balloon.

Montgomery (môn-gom-rô'), Gabriel, Comte de. Born about 1530; executed at Paris, May 25, 1574. A French commander who, by accident, mortally wounded Henry II. in a tournament June 30, 1559. He retired to Normandy and thence escaped to England, where he became a Protestant. Returning to France on the death of his father, he took part in the religious wars of the period; established himself about 1574 in the islands of Jersey and Guernsey, whence he directed an expedition against France; and was finally captured and put to death.

Montgomery (mont-gum'e-ri), James. Born at Irvine, Ayrshire, Nov. 4, 1776; died April 30, 1854. A Scottish poet, son of John Montgomery, a Moravian clergyman. In 1792 he entered the office of the "Sheffield Register," and in 1795 the paper became his property; the name had been changed to the "Sheffield Iris." In 1806 his poems "The Wanderer of Switzerland" and "The Grave" won him recognition. The numerous hymns on which his reputation chiefly rests were collected in 1853. His lectures on poetry before the Royal Institution were published in 1833. His other works are "The West Indies" (1810), "The World before the Flood" (1812), "Greenland" (1819), "Pelican Island" (1826).

Montgomery, Richard. Born at Swords, County Dublin, Ireland, Dec. 2, 1736; killed before Quebec, Dec. 31, 1775. An American Revolutionary general. Montpensier (môn-poñ-svâ'), Duchesse de (Anne Marie Louise d'Orléans). Born at Paris, May 29, 1627; died there, March 5, 1693. The only daughter of Gaston of Orléans and the Duchesse de Montpensier; commonly called La Grande Mademoiselle. She was a cousin of Louis XIV. Her "Mémoires" were published in 1729.

Personal and literary interest both appear in a very high degree in the Mémoires of Anne Marie Louise de Montpensier, commonly called La Grande Mademoiselle. The only daughter of Gaston of Orléans and of the Duchesse de Montpensier, she inherited enormous wealth and a position which made it difficult for her to marry any one but a crowned head. In her youth she was self-willed and by no means inclined to marriage, and prince after prince was proposed to her in vain. During the Fronde she took an extraordinary part—heading armies, mounting the walls of Orléans by a scaling-ladder, and saving the routed troops of Condé, after the battle of the Faubourg Saint Antoine, by opening the gates of Paris to them, and causing the cannon of the Bastille to cover their flight.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 339.

Montpensier, Duc de (Antoine Marie Philippe Louis d'Orléans). Born at Paris, July 31, 1824; died at San Lucar, near Séville, Feb. 4, 1890. The fifth son of Louis Philippe. Mooltan. See Multan.

Moon (mōn). A heavenly body which revolves around the earth monthly, accompanying the earth as a satellite in its annual revolution, and shining by the sun's reflected light. Next to the sun, the moon is the most conspicuous and interesting of celestial objects. The rapidity of its motion, the variety of its phases, and especially the striking phenomena of its eclipses, compelled the attention of the earliest observers; and the fact that the longitude can be determined from lunar observations has given the theory of the moon's motion economic importance. Of all the heavenly bodies (meteors excepted), the moon is nearest to us. Its mean distance is a little more than sixty times the radius of the earth, or 238,800 miles. Its diameter is 2,162 miles (about 0.273 of the earth's equatorial diameter), and its volume is about 1/50 of that of the earth. It revolves around the earth in 27d. 7h. 43m. 11.5s.; the time from new moon to new moon is 29d. 12h. 44m. 2.7s. The moon always presents nearly the same face to the earth. It has no clouds, and shows no indications of an atmosphere or of the presence of water.

Moon, Mountains of the. A range of mountains placed by Ptolemy in the interior of Africa, containing the sources of the Nile. They were conceived afterward as traversing Africa from east to west. They have disappeared from modern maps.

Moonlight Sonata. A name given to Beethoven's "Sonata quasi una fantasia" in C sharp minor, one of the two which form his Opus 27, published in 1802. The romantic stories about the name and dedication appear to be without foundation.

He entered the Madras establishment of the East India Company as cadet in April, 1783, served in the war of 1790-91, and was wounded Dec. 29, 1791, at Gadj-moor. He went to Bombay April, 1796, as brevet captain, and in 1800 made a "Digest of the Military Orders and Regulations of the Bombay Army." He published "Hindoo Pantheon" (1810), "Hindoo Infanticide" (1811), "The Gentle Sponge," a proposal for reducing the interest on the national debt (1829), and "Suffolk Words and Phrases" (1823).

Moor (mōr), Karl. The principal character in Schiller's play "Die Räuber" ("The Robbers").

The hero of his first drama, the enthusiastic young robber, Moor, like Goethe's Gotz, has recourse to force on his own responsibility. He has all the feelings of a Werther, and, like Werther, he falls foul of society. Werther turns the destroying weapon upon himself, but Moor directs it against society. He is a rebel, like the Satan of Milton and of Klopstock, and a vagabond, like Goethe's Cugantino; but, while love and reconciliation lead Cugantino back to the bosom of his family, the shameful intrigues of an unnatural brother Franz turn Moor into a robber and a murderer. Hostile brothers had already been depicted by Fielding in romance, and by Leisewitz and Klingner in tragedy: the two latter had introduced fratricide upon the stage itself, and Gessner had written a patriarchal romance based on the story of Cain and Abel; but Schiller far surpasses these writers in power in the grand scene where the criminal, in fear of the avengers of his crime, pronounces and carries out his own sentence.

Scherer, History of German Literature, II. 116.

Moorcroft (mōr'krōft), William. Born in Lancashire about 1765; died in Afghanistan, Aug. 27, 1825. An English veterinary surgeon and traveler in central Asia 1819-25. His "Travels" were published in 1841.

Moore (mōr or mōr), Albert Joseph. Born at York, Sept. 4, 1841; died at Westminster, Sept. 25, 1893. An English painter, brother of Henry

Moore the marine-painter. In 1861 he exhibited "The Mother of Siserá" and "Elijah running before Ahab's Chariot." He showed great skill in decorative painting. In 1864 he exhibited at the Royal Academy a fresco of "The Seasons," and in 1865 "The Marble Seat."

Moore, Alfred. Born in Brunswick County, N. C., May 21, 1755; died at Belfont, N. C., Oct. 15, 1810. An American jurist, associate justice of the United States Supreme Court 1799-1805.

Moore, Clement Clarke. Born at New York, July 15, 1779; died at Newport, R. I., July 10, 1863. An American scholar and poet. He gave in 1813 a large gift to the General Theological Seminary in New York, on condition that its buildings should be erected on a part of his property in Chelsea Village (Ninth and Tenth avenues and 20th and 21st streets), where they now stand. He was professor of biblical learning there, and afterward of Oriental and Greek literature, 1821-50. He published a "Hebrew and Greek Lexicon" (1809), "Poems" (1844), "George Castriot, etc." (1852), etc., and was the author of the verses "Twas the night before Christmas."

Moore, Edward. Born at Abingdon, England, March 22, 1712; died at South Lambeth, London, March 1, 1757. An English dramatist and fabulist, third son of Thomas Moore, a dissenting clergyman. He failed in business as a linen-draper in London, and began as a writer with his "Fables for the Female Sex" in 1744. "The Foundling," a comedy, was produced at Drury Lane on Feb. 13, 1748; "Gil Blas," a comedy, in 1751; and "The Gamester," in which Garrick appeared (and which he partly wrote), at Drury Lane on Feb. 7, 1753. In 1753 he was made editor of "The World," a popular paper, which had Lord Lyttelton, Lord Bath, Lord Chesterfield, Soame Jenyns, Horace Walpole, and Edward Lovibond as contributors. His only son, Edward, was educated and pensioned by Lord Chesterfield.

Moore, George Henry. Born at Concord, N. H., April 20, 1823; died at New York, May 5, 1892. An American historical writer, son of J. B. Moore. He became superintendent of the Lenox Library in New York in 1872. Among his works are "Notes on the History of Slavery in Massachusetts" (1856), "History of the Jurisprudence of New York" (1872), etc.

Moore, John. Born at Stirling, Scotland, 1729; died at Richmond, Surrey, Jan. 21, 1802. A Scottish physician, novelist, and writer of travels. His best-known work is the novel "Zeluco" (1786).

Moore, Sir John. Born at Glasgow, Nov. 13, 1761; died at Corunna, Spain, Jan. 16, 1809. A British general. He was the eldest surviving son of Dr. John Moore, author of "Zeluco." In 1776 he became ensign of the 51st foot, and served as captain-lieutenant in Nova Scotia during the American Revolutionary War. He became member of Parliament for Linnithgow in 1784; and served in Corsica 1793-94, but displeased Nelson and Elliot and was ordered home. In Nov., 1797, he joined Abercromby in Ireland. He was made major-general in 1798. In July, 1803, he sailed for Portugal as second in command to Sir Henry Burrard, and by Sept. the entire command was left to him. He entered Spain Nov. 11, 1808; but, abandoned by the Spaniards and threatened by the actual presence of Napoleon, was obliged to retreat 250 miles to Corunna. While the troops were embarking the French attacked them, and Moore was killed and buried in the citadel during the night of Jan. 16-17. He received a monument in St. Paul's Cathedral. The "Burial of Sir John Moore," by Rev. Charles Wolfe, is one of the most popular English poems.

Moore, Thomas. Born at Dublin, May 28, 1779; died at Bromham, near Devizes, Feb. 25, 1852.

An Irish poet, son of John Moore, a grocer of Kerry. He entered Trinity College, Dublin, in 1794, where he was intimate with Robert Emmet. In 1799 he entered the Middle Temple, London, and in 1800 published his translation of "Anacreon." In 1803 and 1804 he traveled in America. In 1806 he published his "Odes and Epistles," and his "Irish Melodies" from 1807 to 1834, receiving from them about £500 a year. His lampoons on the regent and his favorites were extremely successful, and were collected in 1813 in "The Twopenny Post Bag." On March 25, 1811, he married Bessie Dyke, an actress, and in the same year his friendship for Byron began. "Lalla Rookh," for which Longmans agreed to pay £3,000 without having seen it, was published in 1817; "National Airs" in 1815; and "Sacred Songs" in 1816. His prose works, besides the political squibs, are "Life of Sheridan" (1825), "The Epicurean" (1827), "Life of Byron" (1830), "History of Ireland," etc., besides a number of collections of humorous short papers like "The Fudge Family in Paris," all under the pseudonym Thomas Brown the Younger. "Moore's Memoirs, Journals, and Correspondence" were published 1853-56 by Earl Russell.

Moorfields (mōr'fēldz). A district of old London, outside the wall, once used as a place of recreation. It received its name from the moor which lay on the north side of the city. Finsbury Square and adjacent streets now cover it.

Morava (mō-rā'vā). 1. The principal river of Servia. It is formed by the union of the Western and Southern Morava, and joins the Danube by two mouths about 30 miles east-southeast of Belgrad. Total length, about 240 miles.

2. The Slavie name of the river March.

Moravia (mō-rā'vi-ā). [F. Moravie, Sp. Pg. It. Moravia, NL. Moravia (G. Mähren, etc.), named from the river Morava.] A crownland of the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary. Capital, Brunn. It is bounded by Bohemia (partly separated by the Mährische Gebirge) on the west and northwest, Prussian Silesia and Austrian Silesia (separated by the Sudetic Mountains) on the north and northeast, Hungary separated by the Little Carpathians) on the southeast, and Hungary and Lower Austria on the south. The surface is largely mountainous and table-land; it is drained in great part by the March. Moravia is to a great degree an agricultural country. It produces rye, oats, barley, fruit, vegetables, etc.; has manufactures of cotton, woolen, sugar, and linen; and has mines of coal and iron. It has 36 representatives in the Austrian Reichsrath, and has a Landtag of 100 members. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. The majority of the inhabitants are Slavs in race and language, closely allied to the Czechs; but about 30 per cent. are Germans. The early inhabitants were Germanic tribes. The region was recolonized by Slavs. Christianity was introduced from Constantinople in the 9th century, but the Moravians were subsequently brought within the influence of Rome. Under Svatopluk in the end of the 9th century Moravia was the center of a short-lived great Slavie power, Great Moravia, which was overthrown by the Magyars in 966. Moravia was permanently united with Bohemia in 1029, and after that generally shared the fortunes of that kingdom. It became a margraviate in 1197; passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1526; and became a crownland separate from Bohemia in 1849. Area, 8,783 square miles. Population (1890), 2,576,870.

Moravians (mō-rā'vi-anz). 1. The natives or inhabitants of Moravia (which see).—2. The members of the Christian denomination entitled the Unitas Fratrum, or United Brethren, which traces its origin to John Huss. Its members were expelled from Bohemia and Moravia in 1627, but in 1722 a remnant settled in Herrnhut, Saxony (hence the brethren are sometimes, in Germany, called Herrnhuter). The organization at present has three home provinces (German, British, and American)—each of which has its own government by synod and several mission provinces. All these are represented by a general synod which meets every 10 years in Herrnhut. The ministers are bishops (not diocesan), presbyters, and deacons. The worship is liturgical. The members of the denomination believe in the Scriptures as the only rule of faith and practice, and maintain the doctrine of the total depravity of human nature, the love of God the Father, the actual humanity and godhead of Jesus Christ, the atonement, the work of the Holy Spirit, good works as the fruit of the Spirit, the second coming of Christ, and the resurrection of the dead. The Moravians are especially noted for their energy and success in missionary work.

Moray, or Morayshire. See Elgin.

Moray, Earl of. See Stuart.

Moray Firth (mur'ā fērth). A large indentation of the North Sea, inclosed by the coast of Scotland from Kinnaird's Head in the north-east of Aberdeenshire to Duncansby Head in the northeast of Caithness; sometimes, in a more restricted sense, the branch of this between Elgin and Ross.

Morazan (mō-rā-thān'). Francisco. Born at Tegucigalpa, Honduras, Oct., 1792; died at San José, Costa Rica, Sept. 15, 1842. A Central American statesman and politician. He was leader of the liberal-federalists in the revolt against the conservatives; defeated them in 1827, and became jefe of Honduras; by successive victories routed the conservatives in Salvador, 1828, and Guatemala, April, 1829; and in Sept., 1830, was elected president of the Central American Confederation. He governed with wisdom and liberality, and was reelected in 1834; but opposition to the union led to numerous revolts, and when his second term expired (Feb. 1, 1839) there had been no reelection. Morazan made a vain attempt to keep the union together by force, and was supported by Salvador; but he was finally defeated by Carrera at Guatemala, March 19, 1840, and fled to Peru. In April, 1842, he invaded Costa Rica with a view to making it the basis of federal reorganization; he was at first successful, and assumed the executive of Costa Rica in July, but was deposed by a counter-revolution (Sept. 11), captured, and shot.

Morbegno (mōr-bē'yo). A town in northern Italy, on the Adda 15 miles west of Sondrio.

Morbihan (mor-bē-on'). A department of western France, capital Vannes, formed from part of the ancient Brittany. It is bounded by Côtes-du-Nord on the north, Ille-et-Vilaine on the east, Loire-Inférieure and the Bay of Biscay on the south, and Finistère on the west. The surface is hilly and marshy. Area, 2,625 square miles. Population (1891), 544,470.

Morcillo Rubio de Auñon (mōr-sēl'yō rō-bē'ō dā ñ-on-yōn'). Diego. Died at Lima, March 12, 1730. A Spanish prelate, bishop of Caracas, and archbishop of Lima from 1723. In 1716, and again Jan. 26, 1720, to May 14, 1724, he was acting viceroy of Peru.

Mordaunt (mōr'dant), Charles, third Earl of Peterborough. Born 1658; died at Lisbon, Oct. 23, 1735. An English general and admiral, son of John, Viscount Mordaunt. He matriculated at Oxford (Christ Church), April 11, 1674, and in 1675 went to the Mediterranean in the Cambriège. In 1675 he succeeded his father as Viscount Mordaunt. He intrigued actively in Holland and England against James II., and in the former country was intimately associated with John Locke. In 1689 he was appointed councillor to William III., and first lord of the treasury, and was created earl of Monmouth. Later he incurred the displeasure of the court, eventually losing all his places, and in 1697 was imprisoned 3 months in the Tower. On June 12, 1697, he succeeded his uncle as earl of Peterborough, and on the accession of Anne was again in favor at court. In 1705 he was appointed admiral and commander-in-chief of the fleet jointly with Sir Cloudeley Shovel, and was largely responsible for the capture of Barcelona Sept. 28, In Jan., 1708, his conduct in Spain was investigated by the House of Lords, and he was acquitted. In 1710 he was ambassador extraordinary to Vienna and in 1711 to Frankfurt. He was very eccentric, and was devoted to the society of literary men, especially Swift, Pope, Arbuthnot, and Gay.

Mordecai (mōr'dē-kī). [From the name of the Babylonian god Marduk or Morodach (which see).] According to the book of Esther, a Jew of the tribe of Benjamin, who lived in captivity in the time of Xerxes. He accepted a post at the court in order to be near his adopted daughter, Esther, who had been elevated to the rank of queen, and with her help frustrated the machinations of Haman which tended to the extermination of the Jews in the Persian empire. In remembrance of this deliverance the feast of Purim is still celebrated by the Jews in the month of Adar (March-April).

Mordecai. In George Eliot's novel "Daniel Deronda," a Jew who believes himself inspired with a mission to elevate and reunite the Jewish people.

It might be said, in answer to some of these questions, that as a fact Mordecai is an ideal study from a veritable Jew, Cohn or Kohn, one of the club of students who met some forty years since at Red Lion Square, Holborn; and that recently a scheme for the redemption of Palestine for Israel was actually in contemplation among members of the Jewish race. But to criticise "Daniel Deronda" from the literal, prosaic point of view, would be as much a critical stupidity as to undertake the defence of Shakespeare's "King Lear" from the charge of historical improbability.

Dodd's, Studies in Literature, p. 29.

Mordred. See Modred.

Mordure (mor-dūr'). Prince Arthur's enchanted sword; also called Excalibur or Caliburn.

Mordvinians (mórd'-vin'i-anz), or Mordvins (mórd'vinz). A people of Finnic origin, living in Russia, chiefly in the governments of Nijni-Novgorod, Penza, Samara, Saratof, Simbirsk, and Tamboff. They are largely Russianized, and comprise two main divisions, the Voksta and the Erzya. Their number is estimated at about 800,000.

More (môr), Hannah. Born at Stapleton, Gloucestershire, Feb. 2, 1745; died at Clifton, Sept. 7, 1833. An English religious writer. She was educated by her father, and in 1757 joined her other sisters in establishing a school in Bristol. In 1762 she published "The Search for Happiness," a pastoral drama. In 1773 and 1774 she visited London, and became intimate with Garrick and his wife; she also met Reynolds, Burke, Dr. Johnson, and Mrs. Montagu. In 1782 she published "Sacred Dramas." After the death of Garrick, Jan. 20, 1779, her religious tendencies became stronger. In 1787 she was attracted by Wilberforce's agitation against the slave-trade, and was much interested in establishing schools among the poor as an antidote to the prevailing atheism. She wrote in 1792 "Village Politics, by Will Chip," followed by "Cheap Repository Tracts" (1795-98), some of which was "The Shepherd of Salisbury Plain." Some of them were illustrated by John Bewick. The organization which circulated them developed into the Religious Tract Depository in 1799. Her other works are "Thoughts on the Importance of the Manners of the Great to General Society" (1788), "Strictures on the Modern System of Female Education" (1799), "Celebs in Search of a Wife" (1809), "Practical Piety, etc." (1811), "Christian Morals" (1813), etc.

More, Henry. Born at Grantham, England, Oct. 12, 1614; died at Cambridge, England, Sept. 1, 1687. An English philosophical writer. His philosophical works (largely mystical and Platonic) were published in 1678. His chief work in verse is "The Song of the Soul."

More, Sir Thomas. Born at London, Feb. 7, 1478; executed on Tower Hill, July 6, 1535. An English statesman and author. He was the son of Sir John More, a London barrister. At thirteen years of age he entered the service of Thomas Morton, archbishop of Canterbury. In 1492 he entered Canterbury Hall (later merged in Christ Church), Oxford. He entered the New Inn, London, in 1494, and Lincoln's Inn in 1496. In 1497 he met Erasmus in England, and corresponded with him through life. For several years he was absorbed in religious studies and exercises, and thought of becoming a monk; but after 1503 he devoted himself mainly to politics. He entered Parliament in 1504. In 1508 he went to France. After his second marriage in 1511 he moved to Crosby Place, Bishopsgate Street Without. In May, 1515, he was sent as ambassador to Flanders to settle disputes with the merchants of the Steelyard. "Utopia" was published in 1516. In 1518 he was made master of requests by Henry VIII, and privy councillor. In June, 1520, he was with Henry at the Field of the Cloth of Gold, and met Budæus. In 1521 he was knighted and made treasurer to the king; in April, 1523, speaker of the House of Commons; and in 1525 high steward of Cambridge University. He defended the papacy against Luther, suggested the "Defensio Septem Sacramentorum" of Henry VIII, 1521, and opposed Tyndale. On Oct. 25, 1529, he succeeded Wolsey as chancellor. He opposed the reforms passed by Parliament on Nov. 3, 1529, and the projected divorce of the king from Catharine, and resigned May 16, 1532. By act of Parliament in March, 1534, an oath of adherence to the act which vested the succession in the issue of Anne Boleyn, and of renunciation of the Pope, was imposed. This oath More refused to take, and he was committed to the Tower April 17, 1535. On July 1, 1535, he was indicted for high treason, and was executed July 6, 1535. More was worked by Pope Leo XIII, Dec. 9, 1886. Among his English works are "Life of John Beus, Earl of Miranda, etc.," printed in 1510 by Wynkyn de Worde (it was a translation from the Latin of Giovanni Francesco Pico, 1498), "History of Richard III." (1513), a number of controversial works, meditations, etc. Rastell, the nephew of Sir Thomas More, collected most of his English works and printed them in 1557. Among his Latin works are "Utopia" (1516; which see), "Luciani Dialogi, etc." (1506), "Epigrammata, etc." (1515), a number of volumes of letters to Erasmus and others, dissertations, etc. His Latin works were first collected at Basel in 1563. The most complete edition was that published at Frankfurt-on-the-Main and Leipsic, 1639.

More of More Hall. An English legendary hero who slew the Dragon of Wantley.

Morea (mô-rê'ä). The name given in modern geography to the Peloponnesus.

Called Morea by the modern post-Hellenic or Romanic Greeks, from more, the name for the sea in the Slavonic vernacular of its inhabitants during the heart of the middle ages. M. Arnold, Study of Celtic Lit., p. 79, note.

Moreau (mô-rô'), Hégésippe. Born at Paris, April 9, 1810; died at Paris, Dec. 10, 1838. A French poet. His poems were published under the name "Myosotis" in 1838.

Moreau, Jean Victor. Born at Morlaix, France, Aug. 11, 1761; died at Laun, Bohemia, Sept. 2, 1813. A French general. He commanded the right wing of Pichegru's army in Holland in 1795, and superseded Pichegru as commander of the army of the Rhine and the Moselle in 1798. He crossed the Rhine at Kehl June 24, defeated the archduke Charles at Ettlingen July 9, and drove the Austrians back to the Danube, when the defeat of the army of the Meuse and the Sambre under Jourdan compelled him to retreat. He commanded in Italy in 1799, being defeated by the Russians under Suvaroff at Cassano, April 7. In 1800 he was appointed to the command of the army of the Rhine by the first consul, Bonaparte; and in the same year gained a decisive victory over the Austrians at Hohenlinden (Dec. 3). Having placed himself at the head of a party of republicans and royalists opposed to Napoleon, he was in 1804 sentenced to two years' imprisonment on the charge of complicity in Coudoual and Pichegru's conspiracy against the first consul. The sentence was commuted to exile. He lived in the United States (near Trenton, New Jersey) from 1805 to 1813, when he entered the Russian service. He was mortally wounded at the battle of Dresden, Aug. 27, and died Sept. 2, 1813.

Moreau de Saint-Méry (mô-rô' dè san'fâ-mê-rê'), Médéric Louis Élie. Born at Fort Royal, Martinique, Jan. 13, 1750; died at Paris, Jan. 28, 1819. A French jurist and author, a distant relative of the empress Josephine. He was judge of the Supreme Court of French Santo Domingo, 1789; deputy for Martinique at Paris, 1790; was imprisoned by the Revolutionary tribunal, but escaped and lived in the United States until 1800. From 1800 to 1806 he was councillor of state. He published "Lois et constitutions des colonies françaises de l'Amérique sous le vent" (Paris, 5 vols., 1784-85), and important works on Santo Domingo, etc.

Morelia (mô-râ'lê-ä), formerly Valladolid (väl-yä'-tuô-lêh'n'). The capital of the state of Michoacan, Mexico, situated about 125 miles west by north of Mexico; so named in 1828 in honor of the patriot Morelos. It was founded in 1541. Population, about 30,000.

Morell (mô-rel'), Sir Charles. The pseudonym of the Rev. James Ridley, under which he wrote "The Tales of the Genii" (1764).

Morella (mô-râ'l-yä). A town in the province of Castellon, eastern Spain, 78 miles southwest of Tarragona; the Roman Castra Ælia. It has an old castle. Population (1887), 6,812.

Morellet (mô-rel-lä'), André. Born at Lyons, March 7, 1727; died at Paris, Jan. 12, 1819. A French littérateur and philosophical writer. He wrote "Mélanges de littérature et de philosophie au XVIII^e siècle" (1818), etc.

Morelos (mô-râ'lôs). A state of Mexico, situated south of the state of Mexico. Capital, Cuernavaca. The largest town is Cuauilla (14,000 inhabitants). Area, about 2,000 square miles. Population (1894), 151,540.

Morelos, or Montemorelos (môn-tâ-mô-râ'lôs). A town in the state of Nuevo Leon, Mexico, situated about 55 miles southeast of Monterey. Population, about 9,000.

Morelos y Pavon (mô-râ'lôs ò pâ-vôn'), José Maria. Born near Apaztzingan, Michoacan, Sept. 30, 1765; died near Mexico, Dec. 22, 1815. A Mexican patriot. He was a priest; joined the revolt of Hidalgo in 1810; held separate commands; and at first was very successful, but after Nov., 1813, was repeatedly defeated. He was finally captured, Nov. 5, 1815, taken to Mexico, and shot.

The last notable auto de fé (November 26, 1815) was that at which the accused was the patriot Morelos. The finding against him was a foregone conclusion. "The Presbítero José Maria Morelos," declared the inquisitors, "is an unconfessed heretic (hereje formal negativo), an abettor of heretics, and a disturber of the ecclesiastical hierarchy; a profaner of the holy sacraments; a traitor to God, to the King, and to the Pope." For which sins he was "condemned to do penance in a penitent's dress" (after the usual form), and was surrendered to the tender mercies of the secular arm. Jancier, Mexican Guide, p. 29.

Morelove (môr'luy). Lord. The lover of Lady Betty Modish in Cibber's "Careless Husband."

In Lord Morelove we have the first lover in English comedy, since licentiousness possessed it, who is at once a gentleman and an honest man. Doran, Eng. Stage, p. 200.

Moreno (mô-râ'nô). Francisco. Born at Buenos Ayres, Oct. 7, 1827. An Argentine explorer and ethnologist. Since 1872 he has made numerous expeditions to the wilder parts of the country, with the special object of studying the Indian tribes. In 1880 he was captured by the Fehuelches and condemned to death, but escaped.

Moreno, Gabriel Garcia. See Garcia Moreno. Moresnet (mô-râ-nâ'). or Kelmis (kel'mis). A small neutral strip of land southwest of Aix-la-Chapelle, between Prussia and Belgium. It is ruled conjointly by officials of these two countries. Population, about 3,000.

Moret (mô-râ'). A town in the department of Seine-et-Marne, France, situated on the Loing 40 miles southeast of Paris. Population (1891), commune, 2,068.

Moreto (mô-râ'tô). Agustín. Born at Madrid about 1618; died 1669. A noted Spanish dramatist. He wrote "El valiente justiciero" ("The Brave Justiciary"), "El lindo Don Diego" ("The Handsome Don Diego"), "El desden con el desden" ("Disdain with Disdain"), etc.

Of those that divided the favor of the public with their great master (Calderon), none stood so near to him as Augustin Moreto, of whom we know much less than would be important to the history of the Spanish drama. He was born at Madrid, and was baptized on the 9th of April, 1618. His best studies were no doubt those he made at Alcalá between 1634 and 1639. Later he removed to Toledo, and entered the household of the Cardinal Archbishop, taking holy orders, and joining a brotherhood as early as 1659. Ten years later, in 1669, he died, only fifty-one years old, leaving whatever of property he possessed to the poor. Ticknor, Span. Lit., II, 413.

Moreton Bay (môr'ton bâ). An inlet of the Pacific, on the coast of Queensland, Australia, about lat. 27° 15' S. It is 40 miles long and 17 miles wide.

Morey (mô-rî) Letter, The. A letter forged in the name of J. A. Garfield, favoring Chinese cheap labor. It was published at New York in Oct., 1880 (shortly before the presidential election), addressed to a fictitious H. L. Morey.

Morez (mô-râ'). A town in the department of Jura, France, 23 miles north by west of Geneva. Population (1891), commune, 15,124.

Morgagni (mor-gân'yê), Giovanni Battista. Born at Forlì, Italy, Feb. 25, 1682; died at Padua, Italy, Nov. 5, 1771. An Italian anatomist, the founder of pathological anatomy. He was professor of anatomy in Padua from 1711. His chief work is "De sedibus et causis morborum per anatomem indagatis" ("On the Seat and Causes of Diseases Investigated by Anatomy," 1761). He also wrote "Adversaria anatomica" (1706-19), etc.

Morgaine. See Morgana.

Morgan (môr'gan). [Originally Morgant or Morcant; Cymric, 'sea-brink,' or 'one born on the sea-shore.'] The earliest British ecclesiastical writer. See Pelagius.

Morgan, 1. See Belarius.—2. A Welsh surgeon in Smollett's "Roderick Random" and "Peregrine Pickle."

Morgan (môr'gan), Daniel. Born in New Jersey, 1736; died at Winchester, Va., July 6, 1802. An American general. He served with distinction in the expedition under Arnold against Quebec 1775-76; commanded the riflemen at Saratoga in 1777; and defeated Tarleton at Cowpens in 1781. He attained the rank of major-general.

Morgan, Edwin Dennison. Born at Washington, Mass., Feb. 8, 1811; died at New York, Feb. 14, 1883. An American merchant and politician. He was governor of New York 1859-62, and United States senator from New York 1863-69.

Morgan, Sir Henry. Born in Wales, 1635 (?); died in Jamaica, 1688. The most celebrated commander of the bucaniers. He ran away to sea, went to Barbados, and thence to Jamaica, where he joined the bucaniers, and soon became a leader. His ravages extended over the Spanish coasts of the Caribbean Sea. He pillaged parts of Cuba, and took and ransomed Puerto Bello 1668, and Maracaibo 1669. In 1670 he collected 37 vessels and 2,200 men, captured a fort at the mouth of the Chagres River, crossed the isthmus, and took Panama, after a battle with about 3,000 Spanish soldiers, Jan., 1671. The city was sacked and burned, and immense plunder was secured. Here, as elsewhere, the Spaniards were treated with great inhumanity. Morgan was prevented by royal orders from organizing another expedition. He returned to England, where he was knighted by Charles II, and made a commissioner of the admiralty. Later he resided in Jamaica, where he was lieutenant-governor and commander-in-chief, and for a time was acting governor.

Morgan, John Hunt. Born at Huntsville, Ala., June 1, 1826; died Sept. 4, 1864. An American general in the Confederate service. He entered the Confederate army as a captain at the beginning of the Civil War; was promoted major-general in 1862; and in 1863 commanded a cavalry raid into Kentucky, Ohio, and Indiana, which resulted in his capture and imprisonment in the Ohio penitentiary. He made his escape later in the same year, and undertook a raid into Tennessee. He was surrounded and killed by Union troops under General Alvan C. Gillem, near Greenville, Tennessee.

Morgan, Lewis Henry. Born near Aurora, N. Y., Nov. 21, 1818; died at Rochester, N. Y., Dec. 17, 1881. An American ethnologist and archaeologist. He published "League of the Iroquois" (1851), "Systems of Consanguinity and Affinity of the Human Family," "Ancient Society," etc.

Morgan, Lady (Sydney Owenson). Born at Dublin about 1783; died at London, April 14, 1859. An Irish novelist, daughter of an Irish actor. She published a volume of poems, and a novel, "St. Clair," in 1804. "The Wild Irish Girl," a political novel, made her reputation in 1806. In 1812 she married Sir T. C. Morgan, M. D., who was knighted in her interest. Among her other works are "O'Donnel" (1814), "Florence MacCarthy" (1816), "France under the Bourbons, etc." (1817), and its companion "Italy, etc." (1821) (these excited furious opposition both in England and on the Continent), "Life and Times of Salvador Rosa" (1823), "Woman and her Master" (1840), "The Book Without a Name" (with Sir T. C. Morgan, 1841), "Luxima, the Prophetess" (1859), "Passages from my Autobiography: an Odd Volume" (1859) (this contains her letters for the years 1818-29, etc.), etc.

Morgan, Sir Thomas Charles. Born at London about 1783; died there, Aug. 28, 1843. An English author, the husband of Lady Morgan. He was educated at Eton and at St. Peter's, Cambridge. His works include "Sketches of the Philosophy of Life" (1818) and "Sketches of the Philosophy of Morals" (1822).

Morgan, William. Died 1826. A mechanic of Batavia, New York, alleged to have been abducted and killed by Freemasons for revealing secrets of the order.

Morgana (môr-gā'nā), or Morgaine (môr-gā'n'). [Morgana is the Breton equivalent of 'sea-woman,' from mor, sea, and gwen, splendens fœmina.] In Celtic legend and Arthurian romance, a fairy, sister of King Arthur. In the romance of "Ogier the Dane" she receives Ogier in the Isle of Avalon when he is over one hundred years of age, and restores him to eternal youth. She is also known as Morgau or Morgue le Fay, and in the Italian romances as Fata ("fairy") Morgaça.

The fairy Morgana (Morgaine, sister of Arthur), who is a principal character in this romance ("Morte d'Arthur") and discovered to Arthur the intrigue of Genevieve with Lancelot, is a leading personage not only in other tales of chivalry, but also in the Italian poems. In the Orlando Furioso she convinces her brother of the infidelity of his queen by means of a magical horn. About a fifth part of the Orlando Innamorato, beginning at canto thirty-six, is occupied with the Fata Morgana. She is there represented as dispensing all the treasures of the earth, and as inhabiting a splendid residence at the bottom of a lake. Thither Orlando penetrates, and forces her to deliver up the knights she detained in captivity, by seizing her by a lock of hair and conjuring her in the name of her master Demogorion. She thus became a well-known character in Italy, where the appellation of Fata Morgana is given to that strange and almost incredible vision which, in certain states of the tide and weather, appears on the sea that washes the coast of Calabria. Every object at Reggio is then a thousand times reflected on a marine mirror, or, when vapors are thick, on a species of aerial screen, elevated above the surface of the water, on which the groves and hills and towers are represented as in a moving picture.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 186.

Morgante Maggiore (môr-gân'te mäd-jō're). [It.] A serio-burlesque romantic poem by Luigi Pulci (1485): so called from its hero, the giant Morgante. There is also a French romance, of the Carolingian cycle, entitled "Morgant le Géant," which is probably taken from Pulci's poem.

Luigi Pulci (1481-1487), in his Morgante Maggiore, which first appeared in 1485, is alternately vulgar and burlesque, serious and insipid, or religious. The principal characters of his romance are the same which first appeared in the fabulous chronicle of Turpin, and in the romances of Adenez, in the thirteenth century. His real hero is Orlando rather than Morgante. He takes up the Paladin of Charlemagne at the moment when the intrigues of Gaeulou de Mayence compel him to fly from the court. One of the first adventures of Orlando is a combat with three giants who lay siege to an abbey. Two of these he kills, and makes the third, Morgante, prisoner: converts and baptizes him; and thenceforth selects him as his brother in arms, and the partner in all his adventures.

Sismondi, Lit. of South of Europe, I. 323.

Morgarten (môr-gär'ten). A mountain on the border of the cantons of Schwyz and Zug, Switzerland, 17 miles east by north of Lucerne. Here, Nov. 15, 1315, the Swiss confederates of the Forest Cantons Uri, Schwyz, and Unterwalden (1,400) defeated the Austrians (15,000), creating a panic by rushing down on them from the heights.

Morghen (môr'gen). Raffaello Sanzio. Born June 19, 1758; died at Florence, April 8, 1833. An Italian engraver. He was a pupil of his father Filippo and his uncle Giovanni Elia Morghen. His first important plate, "Masks of the Carnival," was made in 1778. He continued his education under Volpato in Rome. In 1781 he engraved Raphael's "Poetry" and "Theology"; in 1787 Gnido Reni's "Aurora"; and, later, Leonardo's "Last Supper" and Raphael's "Transfiguration." He became professor of engraving in the Academy of Arts in Florence in 1793.

Morgiana (môr-gi-ā'nā). A character in the story of "Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves," in "The Arabian Nights Entertainments": a slave of Cassim and Ali Baba. She aids in the concealment of Cassim's murder, and discovers the robbers, who are brought by their captain, concealed in oil-jars, to Ali Baba's house. She kills them by pouring boiling oil into the jars. She recognizes their captain when, as Cogia Houssain, he dines with Ali Baba, and stabs him as she dances the "dagger dance." Ali Baba shows his gratitude by marrying her to his son.

Morglay (môr'glā). [Same as claymore.] The sword of Sir Bevis of Hampton.

Mormon (môr'mon), Book of. One of the authoritative writings of the Mormon Church. According to the Mormons, it is the record of certain ancient peoples in America, abridged by the prophet Mormon, written on golden plates, and discovered by Joseph Smith at Cumorah (western New York), and translated by him. By anti-Mormons it is generally regarded as taken from a romance written about 1811 by Solomon Spaulding, whose manuscript was used by Smith and Rigdon.

Mormons (môr'monz). The adherents of a religious body in the United States, which calls itself "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." This denomination was founded in 1830 by Joseph Smith, a native of Sharon, Vermont. The government of the church is a hierarchy consisting of two orders of priesthood, an order of Melchizedek (the higher), and an Aaronic or lesser order. The former is presided over by a president and two counselors whose authority extends over the entire church, and it includes the twelve apostles, the seventies, the patriarch, the high priests, and the elders. The twelve apostles constitute a traveling high council, which ordains other officers and is intrusted with general ecclesiastical authority; the seventies are the missionaries and the propagandists of the body; the patriarch pronounces the blessing of the church; the high priests officiate in the offices of the church in the absence of any higher authorities; and the elders conduct meetings and superintend the priests. The Aaronic priesthood includes the bishops, the priests, the teachers, and the deacons; the two last named are the subordinate orders in the church. The duties of the bishops are largely secular. The entire territory governed by the church is divided and subdivided into districts, for the more efficient collection of tithes and the administration of the government. The Mormons accept the Bible, the Book of Mormon, and the Book of Doctrine and Covenants as authoritative, and regard the head of their church as invested with divine authority, receiving his revelations as the word of God, the Lord. They maintain the doctrines of repentance and faith, a literal resurrection of the dead, the second coming of Christ and his reign upon the earth (having the seat of his power in their territory), baptism by immersion, baptism for the dead, and polygamy as a sacred duty for those who are capable of entering into such marriage. The Mormons settled first at Kirtland, Ohio, then in Missouri, and, after their expulsion from these places, in Nauvoo, Illinois. In 1847-48 they removed to Utah, and have since spread into Idaho, Arizona, Wyoming, etc. They have frequently defied the United States government. There is also a comparatively small branch of the Mormon Church, entitled "The Reorganized Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints," which is opposed to polygamy and is ecclesiastically independent of the original organization. Also Mormonists, Mormonites.

Morte Arthure (mōrt ār'thēr). A compilation of prose romances on the life and death of King Arthur and the knights of the Round Table, translated from the French prose romances which had grown from the early poems, by Sir Thomas Malory and printed by Caxton in 1485. It was originally called the "History" or "Book of Arthur." There is a metrical English romance with the title "Morte Arthure," said to have been written at the end of the 14th century by Huchowne (Hutchin), a Scotch ballad-writer; his authorship has been denied by Richard Morris.

Mr. Ritson imagines that the English metrical romance of Morte Arthure was versified from the prose one of the same title; but, as it differs essentially from Malory's prose work, and agrees exactly with the last part of the French romance of Lancelot, it is more probable that it has been versified from this composition.

Durolot, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 185.

Morte d'Arthur (mōrt dār'thēr). An idyl by Alfred Tennyson, included later in the "Idylls of the King" under the title "The Passing of Arthur."

Mortier (mōr-ti'ā'), Édouard Adolphe Casimir Joseph. Duc de Trévise. Born at Cateau-Cambrésis, France, Feb. 13, 1768; killed at Paris, July 28, 1835. A French marshal, distinguished throughout the Napoleonic wars, especially at Friedland in 1807, in Spain, and in the campaigns of 1813-14. He was premier 1834-35, and was mortally wounded by Fieschi's infernal machine.

Mortimer, Sir Edward. A character in Colman the younger's "Iron Chest." He labors under a secret sorrow, finally confesses himself a murderer, and dies. He differs from Falkland in "Caleb Williams," on which the play is founded, in that his remorse proceeds from the assassination of his victim, while Falkland's is from letting others suffer for him.

Mortimer (mōr'ti-mēr), Roger, Earl of March. Born about 1287; hanged at London, Nov. 29, 1330. An English politician. Having been thrown into prison for complicity in the conspiracy of the Earl of Lancaster, he escaped to Paris, where in 1325 he intrigued with Isabella of France for the deposition of her husband Edward II. of England. He commanded the queen's forces in the descent on England in 1326, and after the deposition and death of the king in 1327 became with his patron, the queen, virtual ruler of the kingdom during the minority of Edward III. He was overthrown by the young king, who caused him to be condemned as a traitor by Parliament.

Mortimer his Fall. A tragedy by Ben Jonson (1640). "The argument and part of it were alone finished. It was 'completed' by W. Mountfort 1731, with satirical intentions, it was supposed, towards Walpole and Queen Caroline. A new dedication was subsequently written by Wilkes in derision of Bute." Dict. Nat. Biog.

In 1553 he succeeded to the earldom of Morton through marriage with Elizabeth, daughter of the third earl. On the return of Queen Mary in 1561 he was made privy councillor, and in 1563 lord high chancellor. He was a prime mover in the assassination of Rizzio, and in securing the abdication of Mary at Lochleven. In Oct., 1573, he became regent on the death of the Earl of Mar. He resigned when James VI. assumed the government, and was condemned on the accusation of James Stuart (afterward earl of Arran) for complicity in the death of Darnley, the king's father.

Morton, John. Born at Milborne St. Andrew, Dorset, about 1420; died Oct. 12, 1500. An English cardinal. He was educated at Balliol College, Oxford, and practised in the Court of Arches. He was master of the rolls and bishop of Ely in the reign of Edward IV.; was imprisoned by Richard III.; and was made archbishop of Canterbury and chancellor by Henry VII. Sir Thomas More began his career as a page in Morton's house.

Morton, John Madison. Born at Pangbourne, Jan. 3, 1811; died Dec. 19, 1891. An English playwright, son of Thomas Morton (1764-1838). He was educated in Paris and Germany, and by Dr. Richardson at Clapham. He wrote "Box and Cox" (1847), and about 100 other farces.

Morton, Levi Parsons. Born at Shoreham, Vt., May 16, 1824. A banker and Republican politician, minister to France 1881-85, Vice-President of the United States 1889-93, governor of the State of New York in 1895.

Morton, Nathaniel. Born about 1613; died at Plymouth, Mass., June 29, 1685. An American historian, compiler of "New England's Memorial" (1669).

Morton, Oliver Perry. Born in Wayne County, Ind., Aug. 4, 1823; died at Indianapolis, Ind., Nov. 1, 1877. An American statesman. He was governor of Indiana 1861-67; United States senator (Republican) from Indiana 1867-77; and a member of the Electoral Commission (1877).

Morton, Thomas. Born at York, England, March 20, 1564; died at Easton, Northamptonshire, Sept. 22, 1659. An English clergyman, bishop of Chester (1615), of Lichfield (1618), and of Durham (1632). He was a graduate of Cambridge University and professor of logic there. He was imprisoned in the Tower in 1641. He was a friend of Isaac Casaubon.

Morton, Thomas. Born in England about 1590; died at Agamenticus, Maine, about 1645. An English colonist at Mount Wollaston (Braintree, Massachusetts). He was a lawyer of Clifford's Inn, and a leader of Weston's Massachusetts colony in 1622. For unparliamentary conduct he was sent back to England, but returned in 1629, and was again sent back in 1630. He published "The New English Canna" (1632). He returned to Massachusetts in 1643, and was imprisoned for his "scandalous book."

Morton, Thomas. Born in the county of Durham, 1764; died at London, March 28, 1838. An English dramatist. He entered Lincoln's Inn, but abandoned law for play-writing. He wrote "Speed the Plough" (1798) (introducing the invisible Mrs. Grundy), "The Blind Girl" (1801), "Town and Country" (1807), "School for Grown Children" (1827), etc.

Morton, William Thomas Green. Born at Charlton, Mass., Aug. 9, 1819; died at New York, July 15, 1868. An American dentist. He first administered sulphuric ether as an anesthetic to a patient of his own in 1846; obtained a patent for its use under the name of "Itheon" in the same year; and on Oct. 16, 1846, administered ether to a patient in the Massachusetts General Hospital at Boston, and Dr. John C. Warren painlessly removed a vascular tumor from the man's neck. Several claimants opposed his right of discovery, notably Dr. Charles Thomas Jackson and Dr. Horace Wells. The French Academy of Sciences investigated the matter in 1852, and decreed one of the Montyon prizes of 2,500 francs to Dr. Jackson for the discovery of etherization, and a similar award to Dr. Morton for the application of the discovery to surgical operations.

Morus. See Morc, Sir Thomas.

Morvan (mor-voñ'), Le. A region in the departments of Yonne and Nièvre, France. It is traversed by a chain of mountains from Avallon to Luz (about 55 miles). Highest point, 2,976 feet.

Morven (mòr'ven). A mythical Scottish kingdom referred to in the poems of Ossian.

Morvern (mòr'vern). A peninsula in the north-western part of Argyllshire, Scotland.

Mosa (mò'sä). The Latin name of the Meuse.

Mosbach (mòs'bäeh). A town in Baden, 21 miles east by south of Heidelberg. Population (1890), 3,459.

Mosca (mòs'kä). [L., 'a fly,'] In Ben Jonson's play "Volpone, or the Fox," a parasite, in the sense of the classic drama. His pliancy and presence of mind render him invaluable to his master, Volpone, upon whom he finally turns.

His inimitable parasite, or (as the Greek and Roman authors expressed it) his Fly, his Mosca; and in this finished portrait, Jonson may throw the gauntlet to the greatest masters of antiquity: the character is of classic origin; it is found with the contemporaries of Aristophanes, though not in any comedy of his now existing; the Middle Dramatists seem to have handled it very frequently, and in the New Comedy it rarely failed to find a place; Plautus has it again and again, but the aggregate merit of all his parasites will not weigh in the scale against this single Fly of our poet. Gifford, Notes to Jonson's "Fox," p. 309.

Moscheles (mòsh'e-les), Ignaz. Born at Prague, May 30, 1794; died at Leipsic, March 10, 1870. A noted German pianist, composer for the piano, and teacher. Among his pupils was Mendelssohn. His works include 24 études, "Hommage à Handel," "Concerto in G Minor," "Concerto pathétique," "Sonate mélancolique," "Characteristische Studien," etc.

Moscherosch (mòsh'e-rosh), Johann Michael (properly Mosenrosch). Born at Wilstadt, Baden, March 5, 1601; died at Worms, April 4, 1669. A German author. He wrote an allegorical-satirical work, "Philander von Sittewald" (1643), etc.

Moschi (mòs'ki). [Gr. Μόσχοι.] In ancient geography, a people in Asia, living southeast of the Euxine, near Armenia; probably the same as Meshech in the Old Testament. They are mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions as Muski (which see).

Moschus (mòs'kus). [Gr. Μόσχος.] Lived about 200 B. C. A Greek bucolic poet of Syracuse.

Moscoco (mòs-kò'sò), Luis de, or Moscoco de Alvarado (mòs-kò'sò dà ä'l-vä-rä'thò), Luis. Born at Badajoz about 1505; died about 1560.

A Spanish soldier. He followed his kinsman, Pedro de Alvarado, to Guatemala (1530) and Peru (1534). Subsequently he united with Hernando de Soto in his expedition to Florida (1539), and, after the death of that leader near the Mississippi River (May 21, 1542), succeeded him in command. In July, 1543, he descended the Mississippi, arriving safely at Mexico. He was well received by the viceroy Mendoza, and in 1551 accompanied him to Peru. Also written Moscopo or Muscopo.

Moscow (mòs'kon). [F. Moscou, G. Moskau, Moskwa, Russ. Moskva, named from the river Moskva.] 1. A government of central Russia, surrounded by the governments of Tver, Vladimir, Ryazan, Tula, Kaluga, and Smolensk. The surface is level and undulating. It is the leading manufacturing province of Russia. Area, 12,859 square miles. Population (1890), 2,240,903.

2. The capital of Moscow government, on the Moskva in lat. 55° 45' N., long. 37° 34' E. It is the second capital of the empire, the place of coronation, and the seat of the metropolitan; the chief commercial and railway center of Russia, with important domestic, European, and Asiatic trade; and the chief manufacturing city, having important woolen, cotton, silk, leather, etc., factories. The chief quarters are the Kremlin (in the center), Kitai-Gorod (trading quarter), Byeloi-Gorod, and Zemlyanoi-Gorod. Among the buildings (besides those of the Kremlin, which see) are many churches. The Cathedral of the Annunciation, within the Kremlin, has been several times rebuilt, the last time after a fire in 1547. The plan is rectangular, with 3 shallow apses, projecting angle-pavilions, and a Byzantine arched porch. The interior is frescoed, and is paved with jasper and agate; the iconostasis and treasury are rich with imperial and princely gifts. This church is the usual place of baptism and marriage of the czars. The Cathedral of the Assumption, within the Kremlin, the church in which the czar is crowned, was founded in 1326, and rebuilt in the next century. The size is small, but as an example of the old Russian style, and for the gorgeous magnificence of the interior, there is no more interesting building in Russia. The plan is rectangular, with a deep triple apse containing the bema and parabemata, and flanked by chapels. The domes are supported by 4 great cylindrical pillars which are covered with bands of frescos on a gold ground; the walls also are resplendent with gold. The ornaments on the iconostasis, together with the church plate, amount to 106 pounds of gold. The icons of the iconostasis and many of the shrines and offerings in the treasury are not only old, but inherently of high artistic value. The Cathedral of the Archangel Michael, within the Kremlin, was founded 1333, but rebuilt in 1509. It is rectangular, with 5 gilded domes, the central one, which is much the largest, of bulbous form. In this church are the tombs of the Ruriks and Romanoffs from the date of its founding to Peter the Great, including that of Ivan the Terrible. The iconostasis and the treasury are remarkably rich. The Cathedral of St. Basil the Beatiified, begun in 1555, is one of the most fantastic architectural creations in existence, though it was built by an Italian architect, who applied in it, in new combinations, the principles of the old Russo-Byzantine builders. The general outline is pyramidal; there are 11 bulbous domes raised on high drums, all different in surface-ornament and in color. The brilliant group of domes and spires is completed by several projecting porches, differing in form and with high pyramidal roofs. One of these is elaborately arched, and forms a belfry. The Temple of the Saviour, a national monument in commemoration of the evacuation of Moscow by Napoleon, was built between 1830 and 1851. The church has the form of a Greek cross, with a domed turret at every angle. The monument is crowned by a pointed gilded dome 98 feet in diameter, raised on a high arched drum: the cross is 340 feet above the ground. The tower of Ivan Veliki (the Great), within the Kremlin, finished 1600, and architecturally a unique structure, consists of 6 stages, 5 of them octagonal and 2 of them recessed, and the highest cylindrical and crowned by a bulbous, metal-sheathed dome. The third and fourth stages are arched, and in every arch a bell is suspended. One of the bells weighs 64 tons. The height is 325 feet to the top of the cross. Other buildings of interest are the theater, riding-hall, Hall of the Nobility, and founding hospital. The university, founded in 1755, has a library of 170,000 volumes, and the museum has a library of 300,000 volumes. The city was founded in the middle of the 14th century. The principality of Moscow was united with that of Vladimir, and Moscow became the capital of the grand principality of Moscow (see below) and seat of the metropolitan in the first part of the 14th century. It was taken and burned by Lithuanians and Tatars in the 14th century, nearly destroyed by fire in 1547, and burned by the khan in 1571. The capital was removed to St. Petersburg by Peter the Great. Moscow was burned by its inhabitants during its occupation by the French in Sept., 1812. Population (1893), 861,890.

Moscow, Grand Principality of, or Muscovy (mòs'kò-vi). A grand principality which grew up around Moscow, and developed into the Russian empire. It was founded by Daniel, son of Alexander Nevski, about 1205, and was united with the grand principality of Vladimir (or Suzdal) in 1319. Ivan I., ruler of Vladimir and Moscow, made the city of Moscow the seat of government. His successor Simon took the title of "grand prince of all the Russias." The work of consolidation was greatly advanced under Ivan III., who annexed Perm (1472), Novgorod (1478), Tver (1482), Vyatka (1470), etc. He freed Moscow from tribute to the Mongols, and by conquests from Lithuania carried the western border to the Dvina and then to the Soya. For further history, see Russia.

Mosè in Egitto (mò-zä' in ä-jit'tò). [It., 'Moses in Egypt,'] An opera by Rossini, produced at Naples in 1818, and at Paris in 1822. It was again produced at Paris in 1827, somewhat modified, as "Moïse," and called an "oratorio" on the bills. In 1822 it was produced at London as "Pietro l'Eremita"; and in 1833 as an oratorio, entitled "The Israelites in Egypt, etc.," with additions from "Israel in Egypt."

Moseley (mòz'li), Henry. Born at Neweastle-under-Lyme, July 9, 1801; died at Olveston, Gloucestershire, Jan. 20, 1872. An English scientific writer. He studied at Cambridge, and was professor of natural philosophy and astronomy at King's College, London, 1831-44. He wrote "Lectures on Astronomy" (1830), "Mechanical Principles of Engineering and Architecture" (1833), etc.

Moseley, Henry Nottidge. Born at Wandswoth, 1844; died at Clevedon, Somerset, Nov. 10, 1891. An English naturalist; son of Henry Moseley. He was one of the naturalists on the Challenger expedition (1872-76), and became Linacre professor of anatomy at Oxford in 1881.

Moselle (mò-zel'), G. Mosel (mò'zel). A river in France, Alsace-Lorraine, and Prussia; the Roman Mosella. It rises in the Vosges, and joins the Rhine at Coblenz. Among its tributaries are the Meurthe and the Saar. The valley is noted for its wines. Length, 315 miles; navigable to Frouard (214 miles).

Moselle. A former department of France. It was ceded in large part to Germany (as part of Alsace-Lorraine) in 1871. The remainder forms part of the French department of Meurthe-et-Moselle.

Mosen (mò'zen), Julius. Born at Marieney, Saxony, July 8, 1803; died in Oldenburg, Oct. 10, 1867. A German poet, dramatist, and novelist. His works include the poems "Lied vom Ritter Wahn" (1831), "Ahasver" (1838), "Poems" (including "Andreas Hofer," 1836), the dramas "Cola Rienzi," "Die Braute von Florenze," "Bernhard von Weimar" (1855), etc.

Mosenthal (mò'zen-täl), Salomon Hermann von. Born at Cassel, Prussia, Jan. 14, 1821; died at Vienna, Feb. 17, 1877. A German dramatist. Among his plays are "Deborah" (1850; the original of "Leah, the Forsaken"), "Der Sonnenwendhof" (1850), "Daweke" (1860), "Pieta" (1865), etc.

Moser (mò'zer), Johann Jakob. Born at Stuttgart, Württemberg, Jan. 18, 1701; died at Stuttgart, Sept. 30, 1785. A noted German jurist and publicist, author of "Deutsches Staatsrecht" (1737-54), etc.

Möser (mò'zer), Justus. Born at Osnabrück, Prussia, Dec. 14, 1720; died there, Jan. 8, 1794. A German historian, critic, and miscellaneous author. He wrote "Patriotische Phantasien" (1775-86), a history of Osnabrück (1788), etc.

Moses (mò'ze-z). [ME. Moses, LL. Moyyses, Moses, Gr. Μωϋσής, Μωϋσε, explained as 'drawn from the water,'] In Old Testament history, the law-giver of the Israelites and organizer of the Israelitish nation. After his birth his mother kept him concealed three months to evade the command of the king of Egypt that all male Hebrew children be drowned in the Nile. He was then exposed in a box among the rushes on the banks of the Nile, and was found by an Egyptian princess who adopted and reared him. After he had grown up, he one day struck an Egyptian whom he saw cruelly beating a Hebrew slave. Fearing punishment, he fled from Egypt into the desert, and halted at an oasis inhabited by the Kenites. Here he married Zipporah, the daughter of Reuel, the priest of Midian, and tended the flocks of his father-in-law. It was here that the prophetic spirit came upon him, and he decided to return to Egypt for the purpose of delivering his brethren from slavery. On his return his brother Aaron joined in his plans. His first efforts in their behalf only resulted in the infliction of more severe burdens and greater cruelty. Presently, however, a series of most disastrous and terrifying afflictions visited Egypt, and the king finally concluded that these had been brought upon the land by the unknown God whose name Moses had invoked. He accordingly ordered the Israelites to leave at once, and they began their departure on the 15th of Nisan (March-April), an event which is known as the Exodus. Moses was the leader of the Israelites during their 40 years' journeyings in the wilderness, which period he utilized for perfecting a civil organization and for the preparation of a code of laws of a high ethical, religious, sanitary, and political character. Jewish tradition ascribes to him the authorship of the Pentateuch with the exception of the verses describing his death. This tradition has been generally accepted by the Christian and Mohammedan world. Of late biblical critics have denied the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch. With few exceptions, however, they consider Moses as a historical character and as the organizer of the Hebrew nation.

Amongst all lawgivers, founders of states, and teachers of mankind, none has equalled Moses. Not only did he, under the most inauspicious circumstances, transform a horde of slaves into a nation, but he imprinted on it the seal of everlasting existence; he breathed into the national body an immortal soul. He held before his people ideals the acceptance of which was indispensable, since all their weal and woe depended upon the realization or non-realization of those ideals. Moses could well declare that he had carried the people as a father carries his child. His patience and his courage had rarely deserted him; his unselfishness and his meekness of disposition were two prominent qualities which, together with his clear, prophetic vision, eminently fitted him to be the instrument of the Deity. Free from jealousy, he wished that all Israelites might be prophets like himself, and that God would endue them with his spirit. Moses became at a subsequent epoch the unattainable ideal of a prophet.

Graetz, History of the Jews (Amer. ed.), I, 30.

Moses. 1. A Jew money-lender in Sheridan's "School for Scandal."—2. See Primrose.

Moses. An oratorio by A. B. Marx (both words and music), performed at Breslau in 1841. The book was originally compiled by Meißelsohn at Marx's request, though afterward rejected. Grove.

Moses. A famous statue by Michelangelo, in San Pietro in Vincoli, Rome. The figure is gigantic and imposing. The right hand upholds the Tables of the Law and clenches the long beard; the left arm, pressed close to the body, marks the effort with which the righteous outbreak against the idolatrous is restrained.

Moses ben Nachman (mō'zez ben nāch'mān): called, after the initials of his name, Ramban. Born 1200; died 1272. A Jewish scholar and writer of Gerona, northern Spain. He wrote a commentary on the Pentateuch, and many Talmudical treatises, and also several poems. His writings exhibit the clear and erudite thinker, but also his inclination to mysticism. In 1263 King James I. of Aragon, at the instigation of the Dominican superior Raimundo de Peñafort, ordered Moses to engage in a religious disputation with the Dominican Fra Pablo. Soon afterward Moses emigrated to Palestine, where he remained until the end of his life.

Moses of Khorni. Lived in the 5th century. An Armenian scholar, the reputed author of a "History of Armenia" (probably written in the 7th century).

Moses Striking the Rock. A painting by Nicolas Poussin (1649), in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. Moses, toward one side, smites the rock, from which an abundant stream gushes. Aaron and his priests, giving thanks, complete the group. From the other side suffering men and women rush toward the welcome water.

Mosetenas (mō-sā-tā'nās). An Indian tribe of Bolivia, on the upper Beni, and between that river and the Mamoré. They are light-colored, and are remarkable for the prevalence among them of a disease (found also in other tribes) which causes the skin to turn white in patches, but is otherwise harmless. The Mosetenas are a mild race, and have been partly Christianized; they are reduced to a few thousands. Their language, with that of some small allied tribes, appears to indicate a distinct stock. This is one of the tribes improperly called Chunchos by the Bolivians. Also written Mocetas.

Moshaisk. See Mozhaisk.

Mosheim (mōs'him), Johann Lorenz von. Born at Lübeck, Oct. 9, 1694; died at Göttingen, Sept. 9, 1755. A distinguished German Protestant ecclesiastical historian, theologian, and pulpit orator. He became professor of theology at Helmstadt in 1723, abbot at Marienthal and Michaelstein in 1726, and professor at Göttingen in 1747. His chief work is "Institutiones historie ecclesiasticæ" ("Institutes of Ecclesiastical History," 1726; new ed. 1755). He also wrote "De rebus Christianorum ante Constantinum commentarii" (1753), etc.

Moskva (mosk-vā'). A river in the government of Moscow, Russia. It joins the Oka near Kolonna. Length, about 275 miles; navigable to Moscow. For the battle on it, Sept. 7, 1812, see Borodino.

Moslems (mos'lemz). [Turk. and Ar. mushlimin, professors of submission (islam) to the faith.] The followers of Mohammed; the orthodox Mohammedans.

Mosque of Omar. See Omar, Mosque of.

Mosquera (mōs-kā'rā), Tomas Cipriano. Born at Popayan, Sept. 20, 1798; died at Coconuco, Oct. 7, 1878. A Colombian general and politician. He held high civil and military offices under Bolívar and his successors, and was president of New Granada during a prosperous term (1845-49). He headed the federalist-democratic revolt of 1859-61; assumed the supreme power July, 1861; and called a constituent assembly, which created the United States of Colombia and made him dictator. Continued civil wars forced him to resign his power into the hands of a new assembly, which limited the presidential term to 2 years and forbade reelection. Under this constitution he was president 1863-64, and was again elected in 1866. Assuming dictatorial powers, he was deposed by a revolution, May, 1867, and banished for 3 years. Subsequently he was governor of Cauca and a member of Congress. He published in 1853 a biography of Bolívar and a work on the geography of New Granada.

Mosquitia (mōs-kē-tē'ā), or Mosquito (mos-kē'tō) Coast. The region occupied by the Mosquitos. At present the name is restricted to a strip on the east coast of Nicaragua, from lat. 11° 30' N. northward, comprising probably less than 7,000 square miles. The English settled here about 1660, and their rights were recognized by Spain in 1670. Great Britain recognized the Mosquito king and established a protectorate over the country; but endless quarrels with Spain resulted in the cession of the British rights in exchange for Balize, to which the colonists were transferred (1786). The Spaniards were driven out by the natives; later Great Britain resumed a nominal protectorate, which led to quarrels with Nicaragua (1840-48). By the Bulwer-Clayton treaty, signed at Washington April 19, 1850, and by a subsequent treaty with Honduras, Great Britain resigned all claim to Mosquitia. The country is now (1895) a department of Nicaragua, but the Mosquitos obey their own king. They are essentially in a savage condition.

Mosquito Coast. See Mosquitia.

Mosquito Reservation. The major part of the Mosquito Coast, reserved for the Mosquitos, and belonging to Nicaragua.

Mosquitos (mōs-kē'tōs). The name given by the Spaniards to a race of mixed African and Indian blood, on the eastern coast of Nicaragua and Honduras. They call themselves Misskitos, and are probably descended from Cimarrones, or fugitive slaves, and native women: their language is said to be partly made up of African words. The Mosquitos first became prominent in the latter part of the 17th century, when their coast was visited by bucaniers. At that time they were a savage and warlike race, using bows, lances, and clubs in battle, and capable, it is said, of mustering 40,000 warriors. They were governed by hereditary chiefs or kings. At present (1895) the Mosquitos probably number less than 10,000. See Mosquitia.

Moss (mos). A town in the province of Smaaleene, Norway, situated on Christiania Fjord 35 miles south of Christiania. The Convention of Moss, Aug. 14, 1814, ended the war between Sweden and Denmark. Population (1891), 8,030.

Mosses from an Old Manse. A collection of stories by Nathaniel Hawthorne, published in 1846, after having appeared separately elsewhere.

Mösskirch. See Messkirch.

Mossley (mōs'li). A manufacturing town in Lancashire, England, 9 miles east-northeast of Manchester. Population (1891), 14,162.

Mossop (mos'op), Henry. Born in 1729; died at Chelsea, Dec. 27, 1774. An Irish actor, son of the rector of Tuam. He made his first appearance on the stage Nov. 28, 1749, as Zanger in Dr. Young's tragedy "Revenge" at Dublin. He first appeared in England, Sept. 26, 1751, as Richard III., in which he was received with great enthusiasm. In 1759 he appeared in England for the last time, and returned to Dublin as a star. He played under the management of Barry for the season, but the next year he undertook the management of a rival theater, which ended in the financial ruin of both. Mossop died in great poverty.

Mostaganem (mos-tā-gā-nem'). A seaport in the province of Oran, Algeria, situated near the Mediterranean 43 miles east-northeast of Oran. Population (1891), 13,895.

Mostar (mos-tār'). The capital of Herzegovina, situated on the Narenta about lat. 43° 22' N., long. 17° 52' E. It is the seat of a Greek and a Roman Catholic bishopric. A Roman bridge across the Narenta, ascribed to Trajan, is a single splendid arch, 89 feet in span and 56 above the water. Population (1885), 12,665.

Most Christian Doctor. A surname given to Gerson, and also to Cusanus.

Most Christian King. A title conferred on various French kings, particularly Louis XI.

Most Learned of the Romans, The. Varro.

Mosul (mō'sūl). 1. A vilayet of Asiatic Turkey, in the Tigris valley. Area, 29,220 square miles. Population, 300,280.—2. A city in Mesopotamia, the chief town of the vilayet of Mosul, situated on the right bank of the Tigris, opposite the site of ancient Nineveh. It is the seat of a pasha, and is famous for the manufacture of the delicate cotton tissue called muslin or mousseline, to which it gave its name.

Motagua (mō-tā'gwā), or Rio Grande. A river of Guatemala. It flows into the Bay of Honduras. Length, about 250 miles.

Motala (mō-tā'lā). A small town in southern Sweden, on the eastern shore of Lake Vettern.

Motanebbi (mō-tā-neb'bē), or Motenebbi (mō-te-neb'bē). Born at Cufa about 915; killed near Shiraz by robbers, 965. An Arabian poet.

Mota Padilla (mō'tā-pā-dēl'yā), Matias de la. Born at Guadalajara, Oct. 6, 1688; died in July, 1766. A Mexican historian. He was a lawyer, and during his last years a priest. His "Historia de la conquista de la Nueva Galicia," printed at Mexico 1870-71, is a work of great value.

Moteczuma. See Montezuma.

Moth (mōth). 1. A fairy in Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream." This character was very early excised from the text of the play, though retained in the dramatis personæ. Fleay.

2. A page in Shakspeare's "Love's Labour's Lost."—3. In Cartwright's play "The Ordinary," a shallow-brained antiquary, whose conversation is mostly disjointed scraps from Chaucer.

Mothé Cadillac. See Cadillac.

Mother Ann, or Mother Lee. See Lee, Ann.

Mother Bunch. See Bunch, Mother.

Mother Goose. A name famous in nursery literature through the familiar jingles called "Mother Goose's Melodies." It is said that there was a Mrs. Goose, mother-in-law of Thomas Fleet, an early Boston (Mass.) publisher, and that he issued the collection under this title to avenge himself for her persistent and unmelodious chanting of these ditties to his infant son. The earliest known edition bears the title "Songs for the Nursery, or Mother Goose's Melodies for Children: printed by T. Fleet at his printing house, Pudding Lane, 1719. Price, two coppers." This, however, has been discredited by Mr. W. Wells Newell, who says Perrault published "Contes de ma mère l'oye" in 1697; but the name was quoted by the satirist Régnier more than a century before. Queen Goose-foot (Reine Pédance), or Bertha with the great foot or goose-foot, appears as synonymous with Mother Goose in French tales. The second day of the year is her festival, and is kept as a children's holiday. (See Bertha or Bertrada.) The "Contes de ma mère l'oye," by Charles Perrault, were published under the name of his infant son, Perrault d'Armancourt. They consist of ten stories, seven of which are evidently derived from the "Pentamerone," an earlier Italian collection. Charles Dibdin wrote a pantomime called "Mother Goose."

Mother Hubbard's Tale. A poem by Spenser, published in 1591 in a volume known as "Complaints," but written much earlier. It is an intentional imitation of Chaucer's manner. It was also entitled "Protopopia."

Mother of Cities. The ancient city of Balth, central Asia.

Mother of Diets. An epithet of the city of Worms in Germany.

Mother of Presidents. A name sometimes given to Virginia, the native State of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, W. H. Harrison, Tyler, and Taylor.

Motilones, Province of. A region in northern Peru, on the Huallaga River: so called by the Spaniards who entered it, in 1540, under Alonso de Alvarado. The first Spanish settlements were formed in 1541. It corresponds nearly to the present province of Huallaga.

Motley (mot'li), John Lothrop. Born at Dorchester (now part of Boston), Mass., April 15, 1814; died in Dorset, England, May 29, 1877.

An American historian and diplomatist. He graduated at Harvard in 1831, and, after completing his general education at Göttingen and Berlin and spending some time in travel, returned to America in 1834, took up the study of law, and was admitted to the bar. He eventually devoted himself to the study of history, and lived mostly abroad, residing in England after 1868. He was United States minister to Austria 1861-67, and to Great Britain 1869-70. His chief works are "Rise of the Dutch Republic" (3 vols. 1856), "History of the United Netherlands" (4 vols. 1860-68), and "Life and Death of John of Barneveld" (1874).

Motolinia (mō-tō-lē-nē'ā), Toribio de. Born at Benavente, Zamora, about 1500; died at Mexico, Aug. 9, 1568. A Spanish Franciscan missionary and author. His real name appears to have been Paredes, and he was known as Toribio de Benavente; he adopted the name Motolinia from an Indian word meaning 'poor.' He went with the first Franciscans to Mexico (1524), and was one of the most successful missionaries. Most of his numerous writings are lost; the most important remaining is the "Historia de los Indios de la Nueva España," published in the Kingsborough collection, and later (1858) by Icazabalca. It is reported that the provincial library at Toledo has a copy of his "Doctrina Cristiana en lingua Mexicana" (Mexico, 1539), but this is probably a mistake; it would be the oldest known book published in America. See Logroño, Pedro.

Motril (mō-trē'l'). A town in the province of Granada, Spain, situated near the Mediterranean 34 miles south by east of Granada. It has an increasing commerce. Its seaport is Calahonda. Population (1887), 17,122.

In 1571 he established the Inquisition in New Spain, and in Dec., 1574, was consecrated archbishop of Mexico. He was acting viceroy Sept. 25, 1584, to Oct. 17, 1585. Later he returned to Spain, and was president of the Council of the Indies. Often called Moya de Contreras.

Moyen de Parvenir (mwā-yau' dē pārv-nēr'). [F., 'how to succeed.'] See the extract.

Much later (1610) the last—it may almost be said the first—echo of the genuine spirit of Rabelais was sounded in the "Moyen de Parvenir" of Béronide de Verville. This eccentric work is perhaps the most perfect example of a fatrasie in existence. In the guise of guests at a banquet the author brings in many celebrated persons of the day and of antiquity, and makes them talk from pillar to post in the strangest possible fashion. The licence of language and anecdote which Rabelais had permitted himself in equalled and exceeded; but many of the tales are told with consummate art, and in the midst of the ribaldry and buffoonery remarks of no small shrewdness are constantly dropped as if by accident. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 193.

Moys (mō'is). A village near Görlitz, Silesia, Prussia. Here, Sept. 7, 1757, the Austrians under Nádasdy defeated the Prussians under Winterfeld.

Moytura. See the extract.

Many battles took place between these Danaans and the earlier Firlbolgic settlers—the native owners, as no doubt they felt themselves, of the country. One of the best substantiated of these, not, indeed, by history or even tradition, but by a more solid testimony, that of the stone remains left on the spot, prove, at any rate, that some long-sustained battle was at some remote period fought on the spot [sic]. This is the famous pre-historic battle of Moytura, rather the Southern Moytura, for there were two; the other, situated not far from the present town of Sligo, retaining "the largest collection of pre-historic remains," says Dr. Petrie, "in any region of the world with the exception of Carnac." This second battle of Moytura was fought upon the plain of Cong, which is washed by the waters of Lough Mask and Lough Corrib, close to where the long monotonous midland plain of Ireland becomes broken, changes into that region of high mountains and low-lying valleys now called Connemara, but which in earlier days was always known as Iar Connaught.

Laws, Story of Ireland, p. 7.

Moza (mō'thā), Pedro de. Born in Granada, 1610; died there, 1666. An artist of the Spanish school, pupil of Juan de Castillo. He was a soldier in the army of Flanders, where he was so charmed with the works of Vandyck that he went to London in 1641 to study under him. Vandyck died soon after, and Moza returned home, and executed numerous works, the best of which are in Granada.

Mozambique (mō-zām-bēk'). [F. Mozambique, Sp. Pg. Mosambique, so called from a small coral island of this name near the coast.] 1. The former name for the Portuguese possessions along the eastern coast of Africa. See East Africa, Portuguese.—2. A town in Portuguese East Africa, situated on an island near the coast, about lat. 15° S. Population, about 7,000.

Mozart (mō'zärt; G. pron. mō'tsärt), Leopold. Born at Augsburg, Bavaria, Nov. 14, 1719; died at Salzburg, May 28, 1787. A German violinist and musical writer.

Mozart, Wolfgang Amadeus. Born at Salzburg, Austria, Jan. 27, 1756; died at Vienna, Dec. 5, 1791. A celebrated Austrian composer, son of Leopold Mozart. He showed a precocious knowledge of music when only three years old, and first appeared in public in a performance at the University of Salzburg, in 1761, when between five and six years of age. In 1762 his father took him with his sister Marianne on a concert tour to Munich, Vienna, and other places, and in the next year to Paris, where they, especially Wolfgang, excited great enthusiasm. At London in the next year they were equally successful, and remained in England till Aug., 1765. Mozart during this time composed a number of symphonies, sonatas, and the overtures for two of his concerts: they also played at their lodgings for such as chose to test their genius in private. They finally arrived at Salzburg again in Nov., 1766, and in 1768 were received at court in Vienna, where Mozart was urged by the emperor to compose an opera and conduct it. He took the story of "La Finta Semplice," and his opera (though opposed by the envy of other musicians) was finally performed at Salzburg. He succeeded in producing his "Bastien und Bastienne" in a private theater at Vienna, and he also composed and conducted the music at the ceremonies of the consecration of the new church at Waisenhaus. From 1769 to 1771 they traveled in Italy, Mozart winning fresh laurels. In 1777 he went to Paris with his mother, where he found that the admiration accorded to a precocious child was not so easily obtained by a mature musician. After the death of his mother he returned to Salzburg, and in 1781 to Vienna, where he lived with the archbishop. He reaped but little pecuniary benefit from his compositions, and his health began to fail. In 1791 he wrote his three greatest symphonies and the "Magic Flute," and in this year received the famous commission from a mysterious stranger (afterward known to be the steward of Count Walsegg) to write a requiem mass to be finished within a month. His enfeebled health and various circumstances connected with the commission produced a serious effect on his already troubled brain, and he imagined it to be a summons from the other world. He began the mass, however, and said that it was for his own funeral. As he was already dying, he was not able to supervise the rehearsal of the finished part. He died of malignant typhus fever. There were no ceremonies at his grave, and even his friends followed him no farther than the city gates, owing to a violent storm. He was buried in the common ground of St. Marx, and the exact position of his grave is not known. Many years after a monument was erected to him by the city of Vienna. He left over six hundred compositions, which include more than forty symphonies, a number of masses (mostly composed in his youth), sonatas, quartets, "The Requiem," etc. Among his operas are "Idomeneo" (1781), "Mitridate," "La Finta Giardiniera," "Zaide," "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" (1782), "Le Nozze di Figaro"

Mozcas. Same as Muzscas. See Chibchas.

Mozdok (moz-dok'). A town in the territory of Terek, Ciscaucasia, Russia, situated on the Terek about lat. 43° 43' N., long. 44° 42' E. Population (1889), 13,286.

He was a graduate of Oxford (Magdalen College), and became vicar of Old Shoreham (1856), canon of Worcester, and (1871) regius professor of divinity at Oxford. He wrote "On the Augustinian Doctrine of Predestination" (1855), "The Primitive Doctrine of Baptismal Regeneration" (1856), "On Miracles" (1865), etc.

Mpongwe (mpōng'gwe). A Bantu tribe of the French Kongo, settled around the Gabun estuary, famous as traders and middlemen between the whites and the interior natives. Semi-civilized and corrupted by prolonged contact with the whites, they are dying out, but their language will remain, since it is adopted by the inland natives who press to the coast. The Mpongwe are divided into four social classes: (a) the Mpongwe of pure blood; (b) those descended from an alien mother; (c) those born of slave women; and (d) slaves.

Mrichhakatika (mreh-eh-ha-ka'ti-kā). [Skt. mrid, clay, and shakatikā, a small cart.] "The Little Clay Cart," a Sanskrit drama. It is a work of remarkable power, comparable to the best modern comedies in plot, incident, character definition, and felicity of diction, and extraordinary in its minute directions to the actors and its various scenic artifices. It has been supposed to have been written in the 1st or 2d century, but Von Schröder puts it in the 5th or 6th. Its authorship is ascribed in flattery to a king Shudraka, who is praised in the prologue. Pischel, after assigning it earlier to Bhasa, believes its real author to have been Dandin. The hero is Charudatta, a virtuous Brahman, reduced to poverty by his generosity; the heroine, Vasantasena, a beautiful and wealthy hetaira, who loves him and repulses the king's brother-in-law, Samstanaka. Vasantasena is purified and enabled by her affection, and at last weds Charudatta. "The little clay cart" or "toy cart," from which the name comes, is a plaything of the little son of Charudatta. Visiting Charudatta at his house, Vasantasena finds his child crying because his toy cart is of clay while the cart of a neighbor's child is of gold. Vasantasena fills the boy's cart with her jewels, and tells him to have a gold cart made from these. The Mrichhakatika has been translated into English by Wilson, into German by both Böhtlingk and Fritze, into French by Regnaud, into Danish by Brandes, and into Russian by Kossovitch. A full account of the play is given in Von Schröder's "Indien's Literatur und Cultur: Vorlesung 43."

Msiidi (msē'dē), or Mushidi (mō-shē'dē). See Garenganze.

Mstislavl (mstē-slāv'l'). A town in the government of Mohileff, Russia, 57 miles east of Mohileff. Population (1893), 8,799.

Mtesa (mtā'sū). Died 1885. A king of the Ganda tribe, East Africa, died famous by the visits at his court of Speke, Grant, Emin, and Stanley. He treated with the khedive and the Sultan of Zanzibar as an equal. He had many good qualities, but kept wavering between paganism, Islam, and Christianity until his death.

Mtsensk (mtsensk). A town in the government of Orel, Russia, situated on the Zusha 34 miles northeast of Orel. Population (1893), 16,318.

Muata-Yamvo (mwā'tā-yām'vō). The title of the king of the Lunda nation in central Africa: once the greatest potentate of Africa, now greatly reduced by civil wars and the raids of the Makioko.

Mucedorus (mū-sē-dō'rus). A play, probably by T. Lodge, acted in 1653, printed in 1598. It has been assigned to Shakspeare without reasonable ground.

Much (mueh). A miller's son, one of Robin Hood's band, said to have been a real person.

Much Ado about Nothing. A comedy by Shakspeare, produced in 1597-98. It was first printed in 1600. The play was known as "Benedict and Petris" in 1613, and is probably the same as "Love's Labour's Won" (which see). The story of Hero is taken with some variations from one of Banello's tales, which probably was borrowed from the story of Geneura and Ariodantes in the "Orlando Furioso" of Ariosto. This part of the play, however, is subordinated by Shakspeare to the loves of Benedict and Beatrice.

Mucius Scaevola. See Scaevola.

Mücke (mük'ko), Heinrich Karl Anton. Born at Breslau, Prussia, April 9, 1806; died at Düsseldorf, Jan. 17, 1891. A German historical painter, a pupil of the Berlin and Düsseldorf academies, and professor at the latter from 1844.

Murillo (mū-ril'ō; Sp. pron. mō-rēl'yō), Bartolomé Estéban. Born at Seville, Spain (baptized Jan. 1, 1618); died there, April 3, 1682. A celebrated Spanish painter, chiefly of religious subjects. His first master was Juan del Castillo. In 1643 he moved to Madrid, where he came under the influence of Velasquez, then in the zenith of his fame. He returned to Seville in 1645, where he spent several years (1661-74) in painting a series of 11 pictures which at once brought him into notice. Among these are "Moses Striking the Rock," "Abraham and the Angels," "The Miracle of the Loaves and Fishes," "St. Peter Released from Prison," and "St. Elizabeth." In 1648 he married. A favorite subject with Murillo was the Virgin of the Conception; the most famous example of this is in the Louvre. In 1660 he established the public academy at Seville. On the death of Philip IV., his successor, Charles II., made Murillo court painter, though he was not willing to live in Madrid. He continued to work at Seville until his death, which occurred in consequence of a fall from a scaffold while painting in the Church of the Capuchins. There is a list of 481 of his pictures, nearly 200 of which are in England, 61 in Madrid, about 60 in Seville, 21 in Paris, 24 in Russia, and a limited number in the United States.

Muses (mü'zez). [Gr. Moisai.] In Greek mythology, the daughters of Zeus and Mnemosyne, who according to the earliest writers were goddesses of memory, then inspiring goddesses of song, and according to later ideas divinities presiding over the different kinds of poetry, and over the sciences and arts, while at the same time having as their especial province springs and limpid streams. Their number appears in the Iomeric poems not to be fixed; later it seems to have been put at three, but afterward they were spoken of as nine: Clio, the Muse of heroic exploits, or of history; Euterpe, of Dionysiac music and the double flute; Thalia, of gaiety, pastoral life, and comedy; Melpomene, of song and harmony, and of tragedy; Terpsichore, of choral dance and song; Erato, of erotic poetry and the lyre; Polymnia or Polyhymnia, of the inspired and stately hymn; Urania, of astronomical and other celestial phenomena; and Calliope, the chief of the Muses, of poetic inspiration, of eloquence, and of heroic or epic poetry. The Muses were intimately associated in legend and in art with Apollo, who, as the chief guardian and leader of their company, was called Musagetes.

Muses' Looking-Glass, The. A play by T. Randolph, originally acted under the title of "The Entertainment." It was printed in 1633. Of the date of the present play there can be no doubt, for the device of draining the Fens by Dutch windmills, in 1632, is alluded to as contemporary. Fleay.

Museum (mü-zō'um). [Gr. Mouzeion, from Moisa, Muse.] 1. A hill almost directly south of the Acropolis at Athens, the furthest east of the group of hills on the southwestern side of the city: named from the existence on it of an old shrine of the Muses. On its summit stands a conspicuous monument, ornamented with niches, Corinthian columns, statues, and a relief-frieze, to Philopappus, the last king of Commagene, who became an Athenian citizen after his dethronement by Vespasian. The slopes of the hill, particularly on its southern extension, abound with curious rock-cuttings, for the most part vestiges of prehistoric Athens. These include house foundations, stairs, meeting-places with seats, and the so-called prison of Socrates and tomb of Cimon. Between this hill and the Pnyx passed the road to the Piræus between the Long Walls. The rock is deeply cut with the ruts of chariot-wheels and an artificial water-channel.

2. An institution of learning in ancient Alexandria. See the extract.

King Ptolemy I., surnamed Soter, 'the Preserver' (303-285 B. C.), founded the Museum, or Temple of the Muses, which was somewhat like a modern university. The building included galleries of art, lecture-rooms, and dining-halls. Distinguished men of learning were maintained at the Museum; and the beautiful gardens, with their shady walks, their statues and fountains, became famous as the haunt of Alexandrian poets and scholars.

Musgu (mös'gō). See Masa.

Musidora (mü-si-dō'rä). The coy sweetheart of Damon in Thomson's "Seasons." His delicacy on the occasion of seeing her bathing won her affections. She is the subject of a painting by Gainsborough, in the National Gallery, London. The maid, lightly draped, sits on the bank of a woodland stream: one foot is already in the water, and she is removing the sandal from the other.

Muskegon (mus-kē'gon). A city, capital of Muskegon County, Michigan, situated on Muskegon Lake, near Lake Michigan, in lat. 43° 15' N., long. 86° 13' W. The leading industry is the lumber manufacture and trade. Population (1890), 22,702.

Mushogean (musk-hō'gē-gū). An important linguistic stock of North American Indians, named from the chief tribe of the Creek Confederacy. Its divisions occupied nearly the whole State of Mississippi, the western half of Tennessee, a small area in eastern Kentucky, all of Alabama, most of Georgia, and, in later times, nearly all of Florida. The following is a linguistic classification of the tribes: (a) The western group (the main people, the Choctaw, branched out into the Chickasaw, the Choctaw Gulf tribes (e. g. Pascagoula) in the State of Mississippi, and a few in lower Louisiana and Alabama). (b) The Alibamu group (Alibamu villages, Muklas, Odshiapofa, Koassati, Okthochoy; all near the junction of Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers, Alabama). (c) The central or Creek group (Upper Creeks, on the Coosa and Tallapoosa rivers and in the central district between the two; the Creek portion of the Seminoles, Yamasi, and Yamacraw; Lower Creeks, on middle Chattahoochee River and east of it). (d) The Hitchiti group (the tribes speaking Hitchiti dialects on lower Chattahoochee River and east of it, as Hitchiti, Sawkili, Odshisi, Tutalosi, and the Hitchiti portion of the Seminoles and of the Yamasi and Yamacraw). (e) The Apalachi group (formerly near St. Mark's River, Florida). The principal tribes are the Alibamu, Apalachi, Chickasaw, Choctaw, Creek or Maskoki proper, Hitchiti, Koassati, Pensacola, Seminole, Yamacraw, Yamasi, and Yazoo. Of these tribes the Choctaw on the west were short and heavy, the Creeks taller and more active. The Chickasaw were the most warlike and the best hunters, the Choctaw the most agricultural and, together with the Creeks, the most advanced in culture. All the tribes had fixed villages, the larger fortified by palisades and embankments. Several confederacies were established within the stock, of which the Creek was the most widely known. The present number of the stock is over 30,000.

Muski (mös'kē). A people often mentioned in the cuneiform inscriptions, settled somewhere north of Cappadocia. They are identified with the Moschi of the Greek writers, and the Meshech of the Old Testament. In the Bible Meshech is usually combined with Tubal, and similarly in the inscriptions the Muski with Tabal. The Muski came in hostile contact with the Assyrians under Tiglath-Pileser I. (1220-1190), Assurnazirpal (884-860), and Sargon (722-705).

Musos (mō'zōs). An extinct tribe of South American Indians who, at the time of the conquest, were found on the eastern side of the Magdalena River, about 100 miles north and northwest of the present city of Bogotá. They were much less civilized than the Chibchas, with whom they were at war, and they made a long and valorous resistance to the Spaniards, finally committing suicide in great numbers rather than submit to them. The Muso emeralldines were in their district.

Muspellheim (mös'pels-him). [ON. Muspellsheimr.] In the Old Norse cosmogony, the realm of fire and warmth in the south. At Ragnarök, Surt (Old Norse Surtur), the ruler of Muspellheim, comes with his flaming sword at the head of the Muspell-sons and destroys the world with fire. Also Muspel or Muspelheim.

Muspilli. [OHG. Muspilli, OS. Mudspelli, Muspelli, the end of the world, Icel. Muspell, an abode of fire (see Muspellheim); of uncertain origin, but usually explained as from OHG. molta, AS. molde, etc., earth (E. mould), and spiltian*, OS. spildian, AS. spiltan, destrō (E. spill).] A fragmentary Old High German poem on the end of the world, of unknown authorship, written in alliterative verse. It exists in a single manuscript, from about the year 900, in the Bavarian dialect.

"Muspilli" belongs to a time when myths of the old heathen mythology blended with the faith of the new converts to Christianity. Muspel, in Scandinavian mythology, was a great world of fire that at the end would break out and devour the earth and all that was upon it. "Muspilli" therefore served to express the final conflagration of the world; and that is the subject of this fragment, which shows also an adaptation of pre-Christian to Christian ideas in the fight of Elias with Antichrist, which may answer to the contest between Thor and Surtur.

Morley, English Writers, II, 97.

Muspratt (mus'prat), James Sheridan. Born at Dublin, March 8, 1821: died at West Derby, April 3, 1871. A British chemist. He was educated at Liverpool, and studied with Liebig 1843-45. Musset (mü-sä'), Louis Charles Alfred de. Born at Paris, Nov. 11, 1810: died there, May 1, 1857. A celebrated French poet. His father, Musset-Pathay, was a man of letters, and encouraged in his children the love of letters. Alfred de Musset graduated with high honors from the Collège Henri IV. in Paris, and had just completed his twentieth year when he published his first volume of poetry, "Contes d'Espagne et d'Italie" (1829). Two more collections of poems established his fame—"Poésies diverses" (1831) and "Le spectacle dans un fauteuil" (1832). In 1833 he went to Italy with George Sand; but, after an extended trip, fell out with her at Venice, and returned to France alone. His morbid state of mind finds expression in the "Confession d'un enfant du siècle" (1836). During these years (1833-37) de Musset contributed a number of short plays to the "Revue des Deux Mondes"; they have appeared since then as "Comédies et proverbes" (1840). Short stories from the same magazine (1837-39) were also reprinted in book form (1840). In the same year (1840) appeared the first edition of the "Poésies nouvelles." One of his last publications is a volume of "Contes" (1854). He was received in the French Academy in 1852. Irregular and dissolute living sapped his intellectual and physical strength, and he died at the age of forty-seven. His complete works were published in 1860.

Muzaffarnagar (muz-af-ar-nag'är), or Mozuffernagar (moz-uf-är-nug'gär). 1. A district in the Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 29° 30' N., long. 77° 30' E. Area, 1,656 square miles. Population (1881), 758,444.—2. The capital of the district of Muzaffarnagar, 65 miles north-northeast of Delhi. Population (1890), 18,166.

Muzaffarpur (muz-af-ar-pör'), or Mozufferpore (moz-uf-är-pör'). 1. A district of Bengal, British India, intersected by lat. 26° N., long. 85° 30' E. Area, 3,003 square miles. Population (1881), 2,582,060.—2. The capital of the district of Muzaffarpur, situated on the Little Gandak 37 miles north-northeast of Patna. Population (1881), 42,460.

Muziano (möt-sē-ä'nō), Girolamo. Born near Brescia, Italy, 1528; died about 1590. An Italian painter of historical pieces and landscapes, and worker in mosaics.

Muzo. See Muso.

Mwanga (mwäng'gä). The successor of Mtesa as king of Uganda. He persecuted the Christians and ordered the murder of Bishop Hamington. Driven from his kingdom, he became a Catholic, and regained his throne by the aid of Catholics and Protestants; was conquered by British arms, and became a Protestant; and is now (1895) a vassal of the British crown.

Mycale (mik'a-lē). [Gr. Μυκάλη.] In ancient geography, a mountain in Lydia, Asia Minor, north of Miletus. Near it, in Sept., 470 B. C., on the same day as the battle of Platea, the Greeks under Leotychides and Xantippus defeated the Persian naval forces.

Mycenæ (mī-sē'nē). [Gr. Μυκίνα.] In ancient geography, a city of Argolis, Greece, 14 miles south-southwest of Corinth. It is a very ancient settlement, conspicuous in Greek mythology, and supplying some of the oldest materials for the study of Greek architecture and art. It consisted of the acropolis, occupying the apex of a hill, and the lower town, whose confused ruins are spread over its slopes. The acropolis is triangular, and is surrounded by a massive wall of huge stones, partly shaped. It is entered by the Gate of the Lions. This gate is at the end of a walled passage. The opening is about 10 feet wide and high, tapering toward the top, with monolithic jambs and a huge lintel. Above the lintel a large triangular opening is formed by corbeling, and the great slab, 2 feet thick, which fills this bears the remarkable relief of two affronted rampant lions separated by a column. Close inside of this gate, in a double circle of upright stones 80 feet in diameter, were found the tombs containing golden ornaments and masks, inlaid sword blades, and other objects whose discovery astonished the scientific world. More recent excavations have disclosed on the acropolis a prehistoric palace resembling that at Tiryns. The most important monuments of the lower town are the great "beehive" tombs commonly called treasuries. Of these the so-called treasury of Atreus is a typical example. The interior is a circle about 50 feet in diameter and the same in height, covered with a pseudo-dome formed by corbeling in the horizontal courses of the wall. A door opens into a square side chamber. The entrance to the tomb is by an inclined passage or dromos, over 30 feet long, leading to a door 19½ feet high, which is spanned by an enormous lintel. Over the lintel there is a large triangular opening, which was originally filled with a sculptured slab. The original fruitful excavations were made by Schliemann in 1876-77, and much work has since been done on the site by the Archaeological Society of Athens. The discoveries at Mycenæ threw a flood of light upon the earliest Greek art, particularly in the department of pottery. They were the first important finds of their class, which has since been recognized in a large proportion of Greek settlements of sufficient age, and is everywhere distinguished as Mycenaean. Mycenaean ornament includes geometric decoration, foliage, marine and animal forms, and the human figure. It may be dated back to the 12th century B. C., and follows in time the art of the "Homeric city" at Hissarlik, which is without painted decoration, and that of Thera. Mycenaean art was practised and developed through several centuries, and existed contemporaneously with the succeeding dipylon style of decoration, which began about 1000 B. C. The chief objects found at Mycenæ are in a museum at Athens.

Mycerinus (mis-ē-rī'nus), or Mecherinus (mē-ke-rī'nus). King of Egypt. According to Herodotus and Diodorus he was the son of Cheops who reigned about 3700 B. C. He succeeded his uncle Chephren. Having been warned by an oracle that he had but six years to live, because, being a gentle ruler, he had not wreaked the vengeance of the gods on Egypt, he gave himself up to pleasure and sought to double his allotted time by turning night into day.

Mydas. See Midas.

Myddleton (mid'l-ton), Sir Hugh. Born about 1555; died Dec. 10, 1631. A goldsmith, capitalist, and projector of the "New River" water-supply of London. In 1605 an act was passed permitting him to bring water into London from New River at Ware, Hants.

Myer (mī'ēr), Albert James. Born at Newburg, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1827; died at Buffalo, N. Y., Aug. 24, 1880. An American meteorologist. He became chief signal-officer in the United States army in 1850, and was in charge of the Weather Bureau in 1870. He published "Manual of Signals" (1868).

Mylæ (mī'lē). [Gr. Μυλάι.] The ancient name of Milazzo (which see).

Mylasa (mī-lā'sä), or Mylassa (mī-las'sä). [Gr. Μύλασα or Μυλάσσα.] In ancient geography, an inland town of Caria; the modern Melasso. It was the capital of the later Carian kingdom.

Mylau (mē'lou). A town in the kingdom of Saxony, situated on the Göltzsch 12 miles southwest of Zwickau. Population (1890), 6,353.

Mylitta (mī-li'ttä). ['Generatrix.'] A by-name of Belit.

Mymensing, or Mymensingh. See Maimansinh. My Novel, or Varieties of English Life. A novel by Bulwer Lytton, published in 1853.

Mynpuri, or Mynpooree. See Mainpuri.

Myonnesus (mī-ō-nē'sus). [Gr. Μυόννησος.] In ancient geography, a promontory on the coast of Ionia, Asia Minor, 27 miles northwest of Ephesus. Near it, 190 B. C., the Romans under L. Emilius gained a naval victory over the Syrians under Antiochus the Great.

Myra (mī'rä). [Gr. Μύρα or Μύρων.] In ancient geography, a city in Lyeia, Asia Minor, situated near the coast in lat. 36° 17' N., long. 30° 3' E. An ancient theater here is among the finest in Asia Minor. The masonry is admirable; the back wall of the stage is ornamented with composite columns, having shafts of polished granite and capitals of white marble.

Myrina (mī-rī'nä). A very extensive Greek necropolis, near Smyrna, Asia Minor, discovered about 1870, and systematically excavated by the French School at Athens between 1880 and 1882. It is of importance for the very abundant and beautiful terra-cotta figurines found, which make it the richest site for art objects of this nature after Tanagra. The Myrina figurines are for the most part of the Hellenistic epoch, and in treatment and composition are akin to those of Tanagra, though in general less severe in style. Many examples show remarkable grace, and the average size is larger than that of the Tanagra figurines. Groups and combinations of figures are frequent. The most important collections are in the Louvre and in the museum at Constantinople.

Myrmidon (mēr'mi-don). [Gr. Μυρμιδών.] In Greek mythology, a son of Zeus, reputed ancestor of the Myrmidons.

Myrmidons (mēr'mi-donz). In Greek legendary history, a race in Phthiotis, Thessaly. They were led by Achilles in the Trojan war. According to one legend, they came originally from Egeia.

Myron (mī'ron). [Gr. Μύρων.] Lived about 500-440 B. C. A celebrated Greek sculptor, a native of Eleuthera in Bœotia; a pupil of Ageladas of Argos. Polyctetus and Phidias were his fellow-pupils. Like the sculptors of the Doric or Argive school, his main interest was centered in the athlete. He considered the subject, however, more from the standpoint of action than of proportion. He represents the attitudes of the active rather than the beauty of the passive athlete. In this he was considered supreme throughout antiquity. His most representative work was probably the Discobolus described by Quintilian and Lucian. Of this statue the most perfect replica is in the possession of Prince Lancelotti in Rome; another is in the Vatican, and another in the British Museum. His group of Athene and Marsyas is represented by the Marsyas of the Lateran. Myron's bronze cow on the Pnyx at Athens was one of the favorites of the Greek and Roman world.

Myrrha (mī'rä). [Gr. Μύρρα.] In Greek legend, the mother of Adonis.

In the Kyprian myth the name of Theias is transformed into Kinyras; but, like Theias, he is the father of Adonis by his daughter Myrrha. Myrrha is the invention of a popular etymology; the true form of the name was Smyrna or Myrina, a name famous in the legendary annals of Asia Minor. Myrina or Smyrna, it was said, was an Amazonian queen, and her name is connected with the four cities of the western coast—Smyrna, Kymē, Myrina, and Ephesus—whose foundation was ascribed to Amazonian heroines. Sayce, Anc. Babylonians, p. 285.

Myrtilus (mēr'ti-lus). [Gr. Μυρτίλος.] In Greek legend, the charioteer of Eñomans, king of Elis, thrown by Pelops into the Ægean Sea (whence the name Myrtoan for that part of the Ægean). While drowning he cursed the home of Pelops, a curse which brought many woes upon the descendants of his enemy. He was placed among the constellations as Anriga (the Charioteer).

Myrtoan Sea (mēr-tō'an sē). [L. Mare Myrtoanum; see Myrtilus.] In ancient geography, that part of the Ægean Sea which lies south of Argolis, Attica, and Eubœa.

Mysia (mish'iä). [Gr. Μυσία.] In ancient geography, a district in the northwestern part of Asia Minor. It was bounded by the Propontis on the north, Bithynia and Phrygia on the east, Lydia on the south, the Ægean on the west, and the Hellespont on the northwest, the Troad being sometimes excluded. It is traversed by mountain-ranges. There were many Greek cities on the coasts. It belonged successively to Lydia, Persia, Macedonia, Syria, Pergamum, and Rome. The Mysians were probably allied to the Lydians. They assisted the Khita against Rameses II.

Myslowitz (mis'lō-vits). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated on the Przemsza 34 miles west-northwest of Cracow. Population (1890), 9,392.

Mysore (mī-sör'), or Maisur (mī-sör'). 1. A native state in the Deccan, India, surrounded by British territory. It is mountainous and hilly in the west. It became an important state in the 17th century; under Hyder Ali and Tippu Saib was a formidable opponent of the British in the last part of the 18th century; was ceded in part to the British in 1792 and 1799; was taken under British management in 1831; was restored to native rule in 1881; and is governed by a maharaja tributary to Great Britain. Area, 27,936 square miles. Population (1891), 4,943,604.

2. The capital of the state of Mysore, situated about lat. 12° 18' N., long. 76° 40' E. It is the residence of the maharaja. Population (1891), 74,048.

Mysteries of Udolpho, The. A romance by Mrs. Radcliffe, published in 1794.

Mystery of Edwin Drood, The. An unfinished novel by Dickens, the first number of which was issued in April, 1870. It was to have been completed in twelve monthly parts, but only about six were written when he died.

Mythen (mē'ten), The. Two peaks in the canton of Schwyz, Switzerland, 20 miles east of Lucerne. Height of the Great Mythen, 6,245 feet.

Mytilene, or Mitylene (mit-i-lō'nē). [Gr. Μυτιλήνη or Μιτυλήνη.] 1. A name sometimes given to the island of Lesbos (which see).—2. In ancient geography, the chief city of Lesbos, situated on the coast. It was an important maritime power of the Æolian Greeks. It revolted from Athens in 428 B. C., and was subjected in 427. Present population, about 20,000.

Myus (mī'ns). [Gr. Μυός.] In ancient geography, an Ionian city in Caria, Asia Minor, situated on the Mæander 11 miles northeast of Miletus.

Mzab (mzäb). A district in Algeria, about lat. 33° N., long. 4° E. There is a river of the same name. The chief place is Gardaia.

Mzensk. See Mtsensk.

Naab, or Nab (nāb). A river in Bavaria which joins the Danube 4 miles west of Ratisbon. Length, 94 miles.

Naaman (nā'a-man). In Old Testament history, a Syrian general who was miraculously cured of leprosy on bathing in the Jordan at the command of the prophet Elisha.

Naarden (nār'den). A town in the province of North Holland, Netherlands, 13 miles southeast of Amsterdam. It was destroyed by the Spaniards in 1572.

Naas (nās or nā'as). A town in County Kildare, Ireland, southwest of Dublin. It was the former capital of Leinster.

Naas. See Nasqa.

Nabateans, or Nabateans (nab-a-tē'anz). An Arab people dwelling in ancient times on the east and southeast of Palestine: often identified with the people mentioned in the Old Testament under the name of Nebaioth (Isa. lx. 7), and (1 Mac. v. 25) as Nabathites. Their ancestor Nebajoth is spoken of as the first-born of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13). They are referred to in Assyrian inscriptions of the 7th century B. C., but the period of their greatest historical importance was the two centuries immediately preceding and succeeding the Christian era. They seem to have been for a long time the chief traders between Egypt and the valley of the Euphrates. Important Nabatean inscriptions have been recovered, and the rock-inscriptions in the valleys around Mount Sinai have been attributed to them.

Nabha. See Narba.
Nabi (nā-bē'). A Turkish poet of the 17th century. See the extract.

The next notable poet is Nabi, in the time of Sultans Ibrahim (1640-1648) and Mohammed IV. (1648-1687). About this time the Persian Sāib was introducing in his own country a new style of Ghazel-writing, marked by a philosophizing, or rather a moralizing, tendency. Nabi copied him, and consequently brought this new style into Turkish literature. Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 318.

Nabis (nā'bis). Killed 192 B. C. Tyrant of Sparta 207-192 B. C. He was conquered by the Romans under Flaminius 195 B. C.

Nablus (nāb-lōs'), or Nabulus (nā-bō-lōs'). A city in Palestine, 32 miles north of Jerusalem. It is noted for manufactures, particularly of soap. It occupies the site of Shechem (which see), later called Neapolis (of which Nablus is a corruption). Population, 20,000.

Nabob (nā'bob). The. A play by Foote, produced in 1772.

Nabonassar (nab-ō-nas'ār). King of Babylonia 747-733 B. C.

Nabonassar, Era of. An era sometimes used in ancient chronology, reckoned from the accession of Nabonassar (747 B. C.).

Nabonidus (nab-ō-nī'dus). [Babylonian Nabū-na'id, Nebo elevated.] The last king of Babylonia (556-538 B. C.). He seems to have belonged to the priestly class, and was zealous in the repairing of sanctuaries, but neglected Merodach and Nabu, on account of which he estranged from himself the priesthood: this to some extent facilitated the conquest of the empire by Cyrus in 538. According to Eusebius, Nabonidus after the fall of Babylon fortified himself in Borsippa, and when this was taken by Cyrus, the conqueror generously gave him a region in Carmania as his residence. But from a cylinder of Cyrus it seems that Nabonidus was treacherously delivered into the hands of Gobryas, the general of Cyrus, and died in a mysterious manner. It appears, from inscriptions of his which have been recovered, that he had a strong historical interest; and several historical statements of great importance for the chronology of the Babylonian empire are recorded by him. For the relation of the cuneiform accounts of the last Babylonian king and that of the Book of Daniel, see Belshazzar and Cyrus.

Nabopolassar (na-bō-pō-lās'sār). [Babylonian Nabū-bal-āsar, Nebo protects the son.] The founder of the new Babylonian empire (625-604 B. C.). He ruled, it seems, first over Babylonia as viceroy of Assyria. He then entered into an alliance with the Median king Cyaxares, who gave his daughter in marriage to his son Nebuchadnezzar; and by their united efforts the destruction of the Assyrian empire was brought about in 608 B. C. Besides this little is known about Nabopolassar's person or reign.

Naboth (nā'both). In Old Testament history, a Jezreelite put to death by Ahab, who coveted his property.

Nabu. See Nebo.

Nabulus. See Nablus.

Nachen, The. A ship of 200 tons burden, commanded by Edward Brawnde, which sailed from Dartmouth, England, March 8, 1615, to make "further tryall" of the New England coast. Brawnde also went to Cape Cod to search for pearls.

Nachi (nā'chē), or Nadchés, or Nahy, or Naguatéz. A tribe or confederacy of North American Indians, which dwelt on St. Catharine's Creek, east and south of the present city of Natchez, Mississippi. The name belonged to a single town, but was used to include a confederacy of towns some of which were those of alien peoples who had been subjugated by the Nachi or had taken refuge among them. D'Herberville visited them in 1699, and gave a list of 8 of these towns. They had conflicts with the French, the last of which in 1729 broke up the confederacy, but did not exterminate the people, as has been generally stated. They scattered, however, and the larger part were received by the Chicasa. A few still live among the Creek and Cherokee in the Indian Territory. See Natchesan.

Nachiketas (na-chi-kā'tas), or Nachiketa. In the Taittiriya Brahmana and the Katha Upanishad, the son of Vajashravana. Desires of attaining blessedness, the latter performed great sacrifices. The son told him that he had not given all, for he, his son, was left, and said, "To whom shall I be given?" When he repeated the question the father angrily replied, "To death," and so the son went to the abode of Yama, who was constrained to offer him three boons. Nachiketas prayed to see his father again and be reconciled. This boon granted, he sought a knowledge of the sacrificial fire that takes one surely to immortality, and then asked that Yama should solve the doubt that there is in regard to the existence of a man that is departed, whereupon Yama instructed him as to the duties, nature, and destiny of the soul.

Nachmani. See Abayi.

Nachod (nā'chōd). A town in northeastern Bohemia, situated on the Mettan 78 miles east-northeast of Prague. Here, June 27, 1864, the Prussians under Von Steinmetz defeated the Austrians. Population (1890), commune, 6,364.

Nachtigal (nāch'tē-gäl), Gustav. Born at Eichstedt, Germany, Feb. 23, 1834; died off Cape Palmas, Liberia, April 20, 1885. An African explorer. Seeking a warm climate for his diseased lungs, he visited Algeria and Tunis in 1863, where he became physician to the bey. In 1868 he was intrusted with the delivery of presents from the Prussian king to the Sultan of Bornu. Successively he explored Fezzan and Tibesti (1870), Kuka, Kanem, Borku, and again Kuka (1872), Baghirmi and Wadai (1873), and Darfur (1874), and in 1875 returned over Egypt to Germany. "Sahara and Sudan" appeared in 1879-81. Until 1882 he was president of the Gesellschaft für Erdkunde and of the Afrikanische Gesellschaft: then he went as consul to Tunis, and in 1884 as German imperial commissioner to West Africa. Here he annexed Tozoland, Angra Pequena, and Kamerun. He succumbed to fever on board ship, and was buried at Cape Palmas, Liberia.

Nacidoc (nā-shē'dōsh), or Natchitoches. A tribe of the Caddo Confederacy of North American Indians. See Caddo.

Nacionales (nā-thē-ō-nā'lās). A political party of Chile, formed by a union of conservatives and liberals, under the leadership of Francisco Ignacio, Ossa about 1857. At times it has been very prominent, but it has never carried a national election.

Nacoleia (nak-ō-lē'yā), or Nacolia (na-kō'li-ā). In ancient geography, a place in the northern part of Phrygia, Asia Minor. Here, 366 A. D., the emperor Valens defeated Procopius.

Nacosari (nā-kō-sā'rē). A town in eastern Sonora, in the neighborhood of which are very extensive copper-mines. The high peak in its neighborhood bears the name of Cerro de Nacosari.

Naçu. See Nasumi.

Nadaaku (nā-dā'ā-kō), or Anadarco, or Anadarko. A tribe of the Caddo Confederacy of North American Indians. See Caddo.

Nadab (nā'dab). King of Israel 927-925 B. C. (Duncker), son of Jeroboam I.

Nadaillac (nā-dā'yāk'). Jean François Albert du Pouget, Marquis de. Born at Paris, July 16, 1818. A French archæologist. He was prefect of the department of Basses-Pyrénées 1871-76, and of Indre-et-Loire 1876-77. He has published "L'Ancienneté de l'homme" (1868), "Le premier homme et les temps préhistoriques" (1889), "L'Amérique préhistorique" (1882), "L'Homme tertiaire" (1883), "Nouvelles découvertes préhistoriques aux Etats-Unis" (1883), "De la période glaciaire" (1884), "Les anciennes populations de la Colombie" (1885), "Découvertes dans la grotte de Spy" (1886), "Mœurs et monuments des peuples préhistoriques" (1888), "La science et la politique" (1889), "Le mouvement démocratique en Angleterre" (1881), and "L'Affaiblissement de la natalité en France" (1886).

Nadaud (nā-dō'), Gustave. Born Feb. 20, 1820; died April 28, 1893. A popular French songwriter, musician, and singer. His songs (ironical, equivocal, and political, etc.) have been collected and published a number of times. He has also written operettas "Le docteur Vieux-temps," "Porte de fenêtre," etc., and "Une idylle," "Solfege poétique et musical" (1886), "Nouvelles chansons à dire ou à chanter" (1889), etc.

Nadchés. See Nachi.

Nadintu-Bel (nā-dēn'tū-bel). See the extract.

The death of Kambyes inspired the Babylonians with the hope of recovering their independence. In B. C. 521 they revolted under Nadintu-Bel, the son of Aniru, who called himself Nebuchadrezzar, the son of Nabonidus. A portrait of him, in the Greek style and with a Greek helmet, is carved on a cameo in the Berlin Museum. But Darius overthrew the pretender in two battles at Zazan, and pursued him into Babylon, which he closely besieged (November, B. C. 521). Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 145.

Nadir Shah (nā'dēr shāh), or Kuli Khan (kō'lē khān). Born about 1688; assassinated June 19-20, 1747. Shah of Persia 1736-47. He was a robber chieftain, and later Persian commander against the Afghans and Turks; was crowned shah in 1736; captured Kandahar and Kabul in 1738; invaded India and sacked Delhi in 1739; and subjugated Bokhara, etc. He was at war with the Turks 1743-46.

Nadiya (nād'ē-yā), or Nuddea (nud'ē-ā). A district in Bengal, British India, intersected by lat. 23° 30' N., long. 89° E. Area, 3,404 square miles. Population (1881), 2,017,847.

Nævius (nē'vi-us), Cnævus. Died at Utica, Africa, 204 B. C. A Roman dramatic and epic poet. He wrote comedies, tragedies, and an epic on the first Punic war. (Fragments edited by Klussmann, Vahlen, and Ribbeck.)

Cn. Nævius (260? 2-204 B. C.), a Campanian of Latin extraction, and probably not a Roman citizen, had in his early manhood fought in the first Punic war. At its conclusion he came to Rome, and applied himself to literary work. He seems to have brought out his first play as early as 235 B. C. His work mainly consisted of translations from the Greek; he essayed both tragedy and comedy, but his genius inclined him to prefer the latter.

Cruttwell, Hist. of Roman Lit., p. 38.

Näfels (nā'fels). A village in the canton of Glarus, Switzerland, situated on the Linth 31 miles southeast of Zurich. Near it, April 9, 1388, the forces of Glarus defeated a superior force of Austrians.

Nahr-el-Kelb (nä-el-keľb'). [Ar., 'river of the dog.'] A river near Beirut. On a rock near the mouth of this river there are engraved the portrait and an inscription of Esarhaddon, king of Assyria (680-668 B. C.), commemorating his victory over Egypt in 671. On the same rock the Egyptian king Rameses II. carved a similar monument commemorating his triumph over the Hittites in the battle at Kadesh.

Nahuas (nä'wäs), or Nahuatlacas (nä-wät-lä'käs). A collective name for the Indian tribes which formed the dominant race of the Mexican plateau at the time of the Spanish conquest. According to the most generally credited traditions, they had come from the north or northwest some centuries before. They were divided into many petty tribes, each with its pueblo or town, and these were often at war with each other. Clustered in and about the lakes of the valley of Mexico were the pueblos of Tenochtitlan or Mexico, Tezcuco, Chalco, Tlacoan (whose inhabitants were called Tecpanecs) and Xochimilco. The Tlascalans occupied a mountainous region, and Cholula, Cuernavaca, and other pueblos were scattered over the plateau. The Nahuatl language was commonly spoken over a large area, and tended to drive out other tongues. During the 14th and 15th centuries Tenochtitlan, Tezcuco, and Tlacoan became allies: the dominant member of the league was at first Tezcuco, later Tenochtitlan. The confederate arms spread over the valley of Mexico, and were carried to the Gulf, the Pacific, and Guatemala: but within this region many tribes were unconquered, and some conquests were only temporary. Opinions differ as to the true status of the conquered regions, but the tendency is to reject the idea of an Aztec "empire." It appears that most of the pueblos and tribes acknowledged in some sort the power of Mexico, and paid tribute to it, but without being in absolute subjection. All the Nahuas built large towns, cultivated the ground, were skilful in gold- and feather-work, etc., and used hieroglyphic writing in books and accounts; they were also enterprising traders; but they were no more advanced in civilization than the Maya races to the southeast, and their civil polity was far inferior to that of the Peruvians. Their religion was degraded by revolting human sacrifices, and it appears that most of their numerous wars were waged to obtain victims for their gods. After the fall of Tenochtitlan or Mexico (1521), they made little resistance to the Spaniards, and soon sank into a condition of semi-slavery. About 2,000,000 Indians of the Mexican plateau are now classed as Nahuas. The name Aztecs is sometimes used for all the Nahuas tribes; more commonly it is restricted to those which formed the above-mentioned league, or to that of Tenochtitlan alone. See Aztecas, Mexico, and Nahuatlacan stock.

Nahuatl (nä'wätl), or Nahua (nä'wä). The language of the Nahuas, commonly called Aztec. It was divided into various dialects differing but slightly from each other. The Nahuatl tongue is still spoken by several hundred thousand Mexican Indians, but is gradually dying out. See Nahuatlacan stock.

Nahuatlacan stock (nä-wät-lä'kan stok). A linguistic stock or substock of Mexican and Central American Indians. It includes the Nahuas tribes (see Nahuas) and a few small scattered tribes (the Seguas, Nicaraos, etc.) as far south as Nicaragua and Costa Rica. Many modern ethnologists regard this as a branch of a much larger stock extending as far north as Idaho and Oregon, and called by Brinton the Uto-Aztecan stock.

Nahuatlacas. See Nahuas.

Nakhon Wat (nä-khön'wät). A temple situated about 5 miles south of Nakhon or Ankor, the ancient capital of Cambodia. It is the finest architectural creation of Cambodia, dating from the 13th century. The plan presents three concentric rectangular inclosures, the exterior one measuring 570 by 650 feet, and each rising above that without it, so that the general form is pyramidal, an effect which is enhanced by the flanking of the great pointed tooth-battlemented central tower by similar smaller side towers. The exterior is colonnaded with coupled square pillars on a raised base, all the masonry being admirable. Above the pillars there is an elaborate entablature with a frieze of projecting serpent-heads and very rich moldings. In the middle of each face there is a large triple portal. The back walls of the porticos which extend from these bear remarkable friezes in low relief, most of the subjects being battlescenes from the Ramayana or Mahabharata, about 6 feet high and 2,000 in aggregate length. The entrance-hall contains over 100 square columns. The temple proper, 200 by 213 feet, stands in the central court: it surrounds 4 large water-tanks so disposed that the middle portion of the structure is cruciform. The plan is closely similar to Indian types, but the constructive and decorative details are purely local. The capitals are almost classical in form, and there are no bracket-capitals.

Nakkar (nak'kär), or Nekkar (nek'kär). [Ar.: apparently from ul-nakkar, the digger; but probably an error of transcription for al-bukkar, the herdsman, as given by Ibn Junis.] The usual name of the third-magnitude star β Boötis, in the head of the figure.

Nakskov (näks'kov), or Naskov (näsk'kov). A seaport on the island of Laaland, Denmark, 81 miles southwest of Copenhagen. Population (1890), 6,722.

Nala (nä'lä). 1. King of Nishadha, and husband of Damayanti. The episode of Nala and Damayanti is one of the most celebrated of the Mahabharata. It has been translated into English by Milman, and later by Sir Edwin Arnold in his "Indian Idylls." There are at least five translations into German (by Bopp, Holtzmann, Koscgarten, Meier, and Rückert), and it has been translated into Latin by Bopp, and Swedish by Edgren. A swan spared by Nala tells "the pearl of girls," Damayanti, daughter of the king of Vidarbha, of his graces, and she loves him. King Bhima holds for his daughter a svayamvara (literally 'self-choice'), a festival and tournament at which a girl of the warrior (kshatriya) caste was allowed freely to choose her husband. The chief gods hear of it, and go. On their way they meet Nala, also going, and bid him go to Damayanti and sue for them. They enable the reluctant but obedient Nala to enter Damayanti's chamber, where he tells her that the gods desire her hand. She informs Nala that she will choose him even though the gods be present. At the svayamvara the four chief gods assume the appearance of Nala. Unable to distinguish the real Nala, the princess prays to the gods and they resume their divine attributes, whereupon she chooses Nala to the grief of the kings and the delight of the gods. These give Nala magic gifts; the wedding-feast is celebrated; and Nala returns to Nishadha with his bride, where they live happily and have a son and daughter, Indrasena and Indrasena. Later, however, Nala loses everything, even his kingdom, by gambling, and wanders in the forest. Transformed into a dwarf, he becomes the charioteer of Rituparna, king of Oudh. Damayanti, at her father's court in Kundina, suspects that Nala is at Oudh. She offers her hand to Rituparna if he will drive from Oudh to Kundina, some 500 miles, in a single day, knowing that only Nala is equal to the task. Nala drives Rituparna there through the air, and is rewarded by perfect skill in throwing the dice. His wife recognizes him by his magic command of fire and water and his cooking. He resumes his true form, wins back all he had lost, and lives happily with Damayanti ever after. The story is told by the sage Brihadashva to Yudhishtira when Arjuna had gone to Indra's heaven to get divine weapons, leaving the other Pandavas in the forest with Draupadi lamenting the absence of Arjuna and the loss of their kingdom.

2. A monkey chief who, in the Ramayana, has the power of making stones float, and builds the bridge from the continent to Ceylon, over which Rama passes with his army.

He was elected member of Parliament for Marlebone in 1842, and made rear-admiral in 1846, vice-admiral in 1853, admiral in 1858. He commanded the Baltic fleet during the Crimean war, and has been much censured for refusing to storm Cronstadt. He wrote the "War in Syria" (1842).

Napier, Sir Charles James. Born at Whitehall, London, Aug. 10, 1782; died at Portsmouth, Aug. 29, 1853. A distinguished British general. In 1803 he was aide-de-camp to General Fox in Ireland; served under Lord Cathcart in Denmark in 1807; and on his return was ordered to Portugal, where he served under Sir John Moore in the retreat to Corunna, where he was captured. He fought in Wellington's Peninsula campaigns, and was present at Cambray but not at Waterloo. In 1814, being on half pay, he entered the military college at Farnham. From 1822 to 1830 he was military resident and governor of Cephalonia. He was made major-general in 1837 and K. C. B. in 1838. In 1842 he undertook the conquest of Sind, which was completed by the victory of Hyderabad, March 24, 1843. He was governor of Sind until 1847. He superseded Lord Gough as commander-in-chief after the battle of Gujrat, and in 1850 returned finally to England. He wrote various works on military and colonial affairs.

Napier, Sir Francis, ninth Baron Napier. Born Sept. 15, 1819. An English statesman. He was British minister at Washington 1857-58, and governor of Madras 1866-72.

Napier, Henry Edward. Born March 5, 1789; died Oct. 13, 1853. A British author, brother of Sir Charles James Napier. He wrote a "Florentine History" (1846-47), etc.

Napier, John. Born at Merchiston, near Edinburgh, 1550; died there, April 4, 1617. A Scottish mathematician, famous as the inventor of logarithms. He was the eldest son of Archibald, the seventh Napier of Merchiston, hereditary justice-general of Scotland. He matriculated at St. Salvador's College, St. Andrews, in 1563, and probably completed his education at the University of Paris. His "Mirifici logarithmorum canonis descriptio," in which his discovery was announced, appeared in 1614. Napier's bones or rods, constructed to simplify multiplication and division, were introduced in the "Rabdologia" (1617). The "Constructio," or method by which the canon was constructed, was published in 1619 by his son Robert, edited by Henry Briggs.

Napier, Macvey. Born at Kirkintilloch, Dumbartonshire, April 11, 1776; died at Edinburgh, Feb. 11, 1847. A Scottish author and editor. In 1829 he succeeded Jeffrey as editor of the "Edinburgh Review," and was editor of the 7th edition of the "Encyclopaedia Britannica" (1830-42).

Napier, Robert Cornelis, Lord Napier of Magdala. Born at Ceylon, Dec. 6, 1810; died at London, Jan. 14, 1890. A British general. He was educated at the military college at Addiscombe, and entered the Bengal Engineers in 1830. In the mutiny (1857) he was chief engineer of Sir Colin Campbell's army, and for bravery at Lucknow was made K. C. B. He served in the Chinese war in 1860. He commanded the expedition to Abyssinia and stormed the heights at Magdala (April 13, 1868). He was commander-in-chief in India 1870-76, governor of Gibraltar 1876-83, and field-marshal 1883.

Napier, Sir William Francis Patrick. Born near Dublin, Dec. 17, 1785; died at Clapham Park, London, Feb. 10, 1860. A British military historian and general, son of Colonel George Napier, and brother of Sir Charles James Napier. He was with Sir John Moore in the retreat to Corunna, and served in the Peninsular campaigns. He entered the military college at Farnham with his brother Charles, and commanded a regiment in the occupation of France until 1819. Retiring on half-pay, he began his literary career in 1821. In 1823 his "History of the War in the Peninsula" was begun; it was published 1828-40. In 1834-46 he published "A History of the Conquest of Sicily," in 1851 "A History of the Administration of Sicily," and in 1857 the "Life and Opinions" of his brother, Sir C. J. Napier.

Naples (nā'plz). A province of Italy. Area, 350 square miles. Population (1891), 1,104,665.

Naples, It. Napoli (nā'pō-lō). [L. Neapolis, Gr. Neapolis, the new city; F. Naples, G. Neapel.] The capital of the province of Naples, Italy, situated on the north side of the Bay of Naples, in lat. 40° 52' N., long. 14° 15' E. It has one of the most beautiful situations in Europe, and is the largest city and one of the principal seaports in Italy. The Castel del Ovo, a landmark of Naples, so named from its oval plan, founded in 1134 on a small island connected with the shore by a causeway, was considered a marvel of strength in the 13th century. It now serves as a military prison. The cathedral was begun by Charles of Anjou in 1272, and retains many 13th-century features despite repeated restorations made necessary by earthquakes. It contains many granite columns and marbles from the Roman temples of Neptune and Apollo, besides fine paintings and historic tombs. The chapels are of great richness, particularly that of St. Januario (1608), where the miraculous blood is preserved. The pointed canopy of the episcopal throne, with spiral columns, has high artistic value. The votive church of San Francesco di Paola, begun in 1317 by Ferdinand I., is a partial imitation of the Pantheon at Rome. Its interior is incrustated with precious marbles, and the dome is 175 feet high. San Martino, the Certosa, or Carthusian Monastery, is remarkable as possessing one of the most lavishly ornamented interiors in existence: the piers and walls are incrustated with precious marbles forming panels and patterns, and the vault is frescoed by Lanfranco, Spagnoletto, and others. The floor is a mosaic of polished wood, and was made by one of the monks. Other objects of interest are the university, royal palace, San Carlo theater, Castel Nuovo, triumphal arch, Palazzo di Capodimonte, observatory, national museum (picture-gallery and collection of antiquities), Villa Nazionale, aquarium, Castel Sant'Elmo, library, conservatory of music, and the churches (besides those noticed above) of Santa Maria del Carmine, San Gennaro (catacombs), Inconcrata, Monte Oliveto, Santa Chiara, San Domenico, San Giovanni, San Paolo, and San Lorenzo. Near the city are many noted points, including Posilipo, Cumæ, Lake Avernus, Pozzuoli, Baiæ, Misenum, Mount Vesuvius, Pompeii, Herculaneum, Capri, and Ischia. Naples was a Greek colony from Cumæ; became subject to Rome about 300 B. C.; flourished under Roman rule; suffered in the barbarian invasions; was taken by Belisarius in 530, and by Totila in 543; became the capital of a duchy; was taken by the Normans in 1150; was the capital of the kingdom of Naples and of the Two Sicilies; was the scene of a revolt under Masaniello in 1647; and has been the scene of various revolutionary outbreaks, as in 1848. Population (1893), 532,500.

Naples, Bay of. An arm of the Mediterranean, on the coast of Campania, Italy, celebrated for the beauty of its shores.

Naples, Duchy of. A duchy founded in the 6th century, dependent on the Byzantine empire. It became independent in the beginning of the 8th century, and was conquered by the Normans in the 11th and 12th centuries.

Naples, Kingdom of. A former kingdom in southern Italy. It was separated from the kingdom of Sicily under Charles of Anjou in 1282; was united with Aragon 1442-58; was conquered temporarily by Charles VIII. of France in 1495; and was under the rule of Spain 1503-1707, and of Austria 1707-35. See Two Sicilies.

Napo (nā'pō). A river in Ecuador, a northern tributary of the Amazon. Length, estimated, about 700 miles.

Napoleon (nā-pō'lē-on; F. pron. nā-pō-lā-ōn') I. (Napoleon Bonaparte or Buonaparte). Born at Ajaccio, Corsica, Aug. 15, 1769, or, according to some, at Corte, Jan. 7, 17682; died at Longwood, St. Helena, May 5, 1821. Emperor of the French 1804-14. He was the son of Charles Marie Bonaparte and Letitia Ramolino; studied at the military school of Brienne 1779-84, and at that of Paris 1784-85; and received a lieutenant's commission in the French army in 1785. He opposed the patriot movement under Paoli in Corsica in 1793; commanded the artillery in the attack on Toulon in the same year; served in the army in Italy in 1794; and, as second in command to Barras, subdued the revolt of the sections at Paris in Oct., 1795. He married Josephine de Beauharnais March 9, 1796. Toward the close of this month (March 27) he assumed command at Nice of the army in Italy, which he found opposed by the Austrians and the Sardinians. He began his campaign April 10, and, after defeating the Austrians at Montenotte (April 12), Millesimo (April 14), and Dego (April 15), turned (April 15) against the Sardinians, whom he defeated at Ceva (April 20) and Mondovi (April 22), forcing them to sign the separate convention of Cherasco (April 29). In the following month he began an invasion of Lombardy, and by a brilliant series of victories, including those of Lodi (May 10) and Arcole (Nov. 15-17), expelled the Austrians from their possessions in the north of Italy, receiving the capitulation of Mantua, their last stronghold, Feb. 2, 1797. Crossing the Alps, he penetrated Styria as far as Loeben, where he dictated preliminaries of peace April 18. The definitive peace of Campo-Formio followed (Oct. 17). By the treaty of Campo-Formio northern Italy was reconstructed in the interest of France, which furthermore acquired the Austrian Netherlands, and received a guarantee of the left bank of the Rhine. Campo-Formio destroyed the coalition against France, and put an end to the Revolutionary war on the Continent. The only enemy that remained to France was England. At the instance of Bonaparte the Directory adopted the plan of attacking the English in India, which involved the conquest of Egypt. Placed at the head of an expedition of about 35,000 men, he set sail from Toulon May 19, 1798; occupied Malta June 12; disembarked at Alexandria July 2; and defeated the Mamelukes in the decisive battle of the Pyramids July 21. He was master of Egypt, but the destruction of his fleet by Nelson in the battle of the Nile (Aug. 1) cut him off from France and doomed his expedition to failure. Nevertheless he undertook the subjugation of Syria, and stormed Jaffa March 7, 1799. Repulsed at Acre, the defense of which was supported by the English, he commenced a retreat to Egypt May 21. He inflicted a final defeat on the Turks at Abukir July 25; transferred the command in Egypt to Kléber Aug. 22; and, setting sail with two frigates, arrived in the harbor of Préjús Oct. 9. During his absence a new coalition had been formed against France, and the Directory saw its armada defeated both on the Rhine and in Italy. With the assistance of his brother Lucien and of Sieyès and Roger Ducos, he executed the coup d'état of Brumaire, whereby he abolished the Directory and virtually made himself monarch under the title of first consul, holding office for a term of 10 years. He crossed the Great St. Bernard in May, 1800, and restored the French ascendancy in Italy by the victory of Marengo (June 14), which, with that won by Moreau at Hohenlinden (Dec. 3), brought about the peace of Lunéville (Feb. 9, 1801). The treaty of Lunéville, which was based on that of Campo-Formio, destroyed the coalition, and restored peace on the Continent. He concluded the peace of Amiens with England March 27, 1802. After the peace of Lunéville he commenced the legislative reconstruction of France, the public institutions of which had been either destroyed or thrown into confusion during the Revolution. To this period belong the restoration of the Roman Catholic Church by the Concordat (concluded July 15, 1801), the restoration of higher education by the erection of the new university (May 1, 1802), and the establishment of the Legion of Honor (May 19, 1802); preparation had been previously made for the codification of the laws. He was made consul for life Aug. 2, 1802; executed the Duc d'Enghien March 21, 1804; was proclaimed hereditary emperor of the French May 18, 1804 (the coronation ceremony took place Dec. 2, 1804); and was crowned king of Italy May 26, 1805. In the meantime England had been provoked into declaring war (May 18, 1803), and a coalition consisting of England, Russia, Austria, and Sweden was formed against France in 1805: Spain was allied with France. The destruction of his fleet by Nelson at the battle of Trafalgar (Oct. 21, 1805) put an end to a projected invasion of England. Breaking up his camp at Toulon, he invaded Austria, occupied Vienna, and (Dec. 2, 1805) defeated the allied Russians and Austrians at Austerlitz. The Russians retired from the contest under a military convention; the Austrians signed the peace of Presburg (Dec. 26, 1805); and the coalition was destroyed. His intervention in Germany brought about the erection of the Confederation of the Rhine July 12, 1806. This confederation, which was placed under his protection, ultimately embraced nearly all the states of Germany except Austria and Prussia. Its erection, together with other provocation, caused Prussia to mobilize its army in Aug., and Napoleon presently found himself opposed by a coalition with Prussia, Russia, and England as its principal members. He crushed the Prussian army at Jena and Auerstadt Oct. 14; entered Berlin Oct. 27; fought the Russians and Prussians in the drawn battle of Eylau Feb. 7-8, 1807; defeated the Russians at the battle of Friedland June 14; and compelled both Russia and Prussia to conclude peace at Tilsit July 7 and 9, 1807, respectively. Russia became the ally of France; Prussia was deprived of nearly half her territory. Napoleon was now, perhaps, at the height of his power. The imperial title was no empty form. He was the head of a great confederacy of states. He had surrounded the imperial throne with subordinate thrones occupied by members of his own family. His stepson Eugène de Beauharnais was viceroy of the kingdom of Italy in northern and central Italy; his brother Joseph was king of Naples in southern Italy; his brother Louis was king of Holland; his brother Jerome was king of Westphalia; his brother-in-law Murat was grand duke of Berg. The Confederation of the Rhine existed by virtue of his protection, and his troops occupied dismembered Prussia. He directed the policy of Europe. England alone, mistress of the seas, appeared to stand between him and universal dominion. England was safe from invasion, but she was vulnerable through her commerce. Napoleon undertook to starve her by closing the ports of the Continent against her commerce. This policy, known as "the Continental system," was inaugurated by the Berlin decree in 1806, and was extended by the Milan decree in 1807. To further this policy he resolved to seize the maritime states of Portugal and Spain. His armies expelled the house of Braganza from Portugal, and Nov. 30, 1807, the French entered Lisbon. Under pretense of guarding the coast against the English, he quartered 80,000 troops in Spain, then in 1808 enticed Ferdinand VII. and his father Charles IV. (who had recently abdicated) to Bayonne, extorted from both a renunciation of their claims, and placed his brother Joseph on the Spanish throne. An uprising of the Spaniards took place, followed by a popular insurrection in Portugal, movements which found response in Germany. The seizure of Spain and Portugal proved in the end a fatal error. The war which it kindled, known as the Peninsular war, drained him of his resources and placed an enemy in his rear when northern Europe rose against him in 1813. The English in 1808 landed an army in Portugal, whence they expelled the French, and penetrated into Spain. Napoleon, securing himself against Austria by a closer alliance with the czar Alexander at Erfurt (concluded Oct. 12, 1808), hastened in person to Spain with 250,000 men, drove out the English, and entered Madrid (Dec. 4, 1808). He was recalled by the threatening attitude of Austria, against which he precipitated war in April, 1809. He occupied Vienna (May 13), was defeated by the archduke Charles at Aspern and Essling (May 21-22), defeated the archduke at Wagram (July 5-6), and concluded the peace of Schönbrunn Oct. 14, 1809. He divorced Josephine Dec. 16, 1809, and married Maria Louisa of Austria March 11 (April 2), 1810. He annexed the Papal States in 1809 (the Pope being carried prisoner to France), and Holland in 1810. The refusal of Alexander to carry out strictly the Continental system, which Napoleon himself evaded by the sale of licenses, brought on war with Russia. He crossed the Niemen June 24, 1812; gained the victory of Borodino Sept. 7; and occupied Moscow Sept. 14. His proffer of truce was rejected by the Russians, and he was forced by the approach of winter to begin a retreat (Oct. 19). He was overtaken by the winter, and his army dwindled before the cold, hunger, and the enemy. He left the army in command of Murat Dec. 4, and hastened to Paris. Murat recrossed the Niemen Dec. 13, with 100,000 men, the remnant of the Grand Army of 600,000 veterans. The loss sustained by Napoleon in this campaign encouraged the defection of Prussia, which formed an alliance with Russia at Kalisch Feb. 28, 1813. Napoleon defeated the Russians and Prussians at Lützen May 2, and at Bautzen May 20-21. Austria declared war Aug. 12, and Napoleon presently found himself opposed by a coalition of Russia, England, Sweden, Prussia, and Austria, of which the first three had been united since the previous year. He won his last great victory at Dresden Aug. 26-27, and lost the decisive battles of Leipzig (Oct. 16, 18, and 19), Laon (March 9-10, 1814), and Arcis-sur-Aube (March 20-21). On March 31 the Allies entered Paris. He was compelled to abdicate at Fontainebleau April 11, but was allowed to retain the title of emperor, and received the island of Elba as a sovereign principality, and an annual income of 2,000,000 francs. He arrived in Elba May 4. The Congress of Vienna convened in Sept., 1814, for the purpose of restoring and regulating the relations between the powers disturbed by Napoleon. Encouraged by the quarrels which arose at the Congress between the Allies, Napoleon left Elba Feb. 26, 1815; landed at Caen March 1; and entered Paris March 20, the troops sent against him, including Ney with his corps, having joined his standard. At the return of Napoleon, the Allies again took the field. He was finally overthrown at Waterloo June 18, 1815, and the Allies entered Paris a second time July 7. After futile attempts to escape to America, he surrendered himself to the British admiral Hotham at Rochefort July 15. By a unanimous resolve of the Allies he was transported as prisoner of war to St. Helena, where he arrived on Oct. 16, 1815, and where he was detained the rest of his life.

Napoleon II. (François Charles Joseph Napoleon Bonaparte, Duc de Reichstadt). Born at Paris, March 20, 1811; died at Schönbrunn, near Vienna, July 22, 1832. Titular emperor of the French, son of Napoleon I. and Maria Louisa. He was created duke of Reichstadt in 1813 by his grandfather, Francis I. of Austria, at whose court he resided after his father's overthrow.

Napoleon III. (Charles Louis Napoléon Bonaparte). Born at Paris, April 20, 1808; died at Chiselhurst, near London, Jan. 9, 1873. Emperor of the French 1852-70. He was the son of Louis Bonaparte, king of Holland, and Hortense de Beauharnais, and the nephew of Napoleon I. He lived in exile at Arenenberg and Augsburg 1815-30; joined in an unsuccessful revolt against the Pope in the Romagna 1830-31; made an unsuccessful attempt to organize a revolution among the French soldiers stationed at Strasburg in 1836; made a descent on France near Boulogne in 1840; was captured and imprisoned at Ham until 1846, when he escaped; was made a member of the National Assembly after the fall of Louis Philippe in 1848; was elected president of the republic Dec., 1848; executed the coup d'état of Dec. 2, 1851; was chosen president for 10 years in Dec., 1851; and after a plebiscite in Nov., 1852, was proclaimed emperor Dec. 2, 1852. He married Eugénie de Montijo Jan. 30, 1853; took part in the Crimean war 1854-56; fought with Sardinia against Austria in 1859, and was present at the battles of Magenta and Solferino; waged war in Mexico 1862-67; declared war against Germany in July, 1870; was taken prisoner at Sedan Sept. 2; was imprisoned at Wilhelmshöhe, near Cassel, 1870-71; and lived at Chiselhurst 1871-73. He was the author of various political and military works, including "Histoire de Jules César" (1865-66).

Napoleonic Wars. A general name for the wars

² Aug. 15, 1769, is the commonly accepted date of Napoleon's birth, and Jan. 7, 1768, that of the birth of his brother Joseph. It has been said, but without good reason, that these dates were interchanged at the time of Napoleon's admission to the military school of Brienne in 1779, no candidate being eligible after 10 years of age.

in which Napoleon Bonaparte was the leading figure, 1796-1815. France was opposed to Great Britain, and at different times to Austria, Prussia, Russia, Spain, etc. The principal seats of the wars were Italy, Spain, Portugal, Switzerland, Germany, Austria, Russia, Egypt, Syria, and the ocean. The wars at the beginning of the period form part of those growing out of the French Revolution (which see). The following are the leading events after 1795: Napoleon took command of the army of Italy, spring of 1796; battle of Lodi, May 10; campaign of Moreau on the Upper Rhine (retreat through the Black Forest), 1796; campaign of Jourdan on the Main, 1796; battle of Castiglione, Aug. 5; battle of Arcole, Nov. 15-17; siege of Mantua, 1796-97; battle of Rivoli, Jan., 1797; preliminary treaty of Leoben, April 18; treaty of Campo-Formio, Oct. 17; French expedition to Egypt, 1798; battle of the Pyramids, July 21; battle of the Nile, Aug. 1; battle of Mount Tabor, April, 1799; French defeats in Italy (Trebbia, June, and Novi, Aug.); battle of Aukir, July 25; Suvaroff's retreat in the Alps, 1799; battles of Zurich, 1799; passage of Great St. Bernard by Napoleon, May, 1800; battle of Marengo, June 14; battle of Hohenlinden, Dec. 3; treaty of Lunéville, Feb. 9, 1801; battle of the Baltic, April 2; treaty of Amiens, March 27, 1802; renewal of the war with Great Britain, 1803; new coalition against France, 1805; surrender of Ulm, Oct. 17; battle of Trafalgar, Oct. 21; battle of Austerlitz, Dec. 2; treaty of Presburg, Dec. 26; battles of Jena and Auerstadt, Oct. 14, 1806; battle of Eylau, Feb. 7, 8, 1807; battle of Friedland, June 14; treaties of Tilsit, July; Peninsular war (which see), 1808-14; battle of Aspern, May 21, 22, 1809; battle of Wagram, July 5, 6; treaty of Vienna, Oct. 14; invasion of Russia, 1812; battle of Borodino, Sept. 7; burning of Moscow, Sept.; retreat from Russia, Oct.-Dec.; battle of Lützen, May 2, 1813; battle of Bautzen, May 20, 21; battle of the Katzbach, Aug. 26; battle of Dresden, Aug. 26, 27; battle of Dennewitz, Sept. 6; battle of Leipzig, Oct. 16, 18, 19; Napoleon's victories at Montmirail, etc., Feb., 1814; battle of Bar-sur-Aube, Feb. 27; battle of Laon, March 9, 10; battle of Arcis-sur-Aube, March 20, 21; treaty of Paris, May 30; Napoleon landed at Cannes, March 1, 1815; battles of Ligny and Quatre-Bras, June 16; battle of Waterloo, June 18; treaty of Paris, Nov. 20.

Napoléon le Petit (nä-pō-lā-ōn lê pê-tē'). [F., 'Napoleon the Little.' A satire by Victor Hugo, directed against Napoleon III., published in 1852.

Napoléon-Vendée. See La-Roche-sur-Yon.

Napoli di Romania. See Nauplia.
Napos (nä-pōs), or Napeanos (nä-pā-ä-nōs). A name given to various semi-civilized Indians of eastern Ecuador and Peru, on the river Napo. They are apparently derived from various stocks which have become amalgamated in the mission villages. At present most of them speak dialects of the Quichua.

Naquet (nä-kä'), Alfred Joseph. Born at Carpentras, France, Oct. 6, 1834. A French chemist and radical politician. He was professor of chemistry at the technical institute of Palermo 1863-65, and was a member of the French Senate 1882-89. His chief work is "Principes de chimie" (1865).

Nara (nä-rä). A city in the main island of Japan, about 25 miles south of Kioto. It was the capital in the 8th century. A colossal statue of Buddha, seated in the Daibouts temple here, is an exceedingly remarkable work, and the largest existing bronze casting. It dates from 730, and is formed of several pieces skillfully soldered together. The god sits on the symbolic lotus-flower, with the right hand open and raised, and the extended left resting on his knee. The drapery has almost Greek breadth and lightness, and the anatomy and expression are admirable, as is the technical finish. The height, without the pedestal, is 85 feet.

Naram-Sin (nä-räm'sin). ['Beloved of the moon-god Sin.'] King of Babylon, son of Sargon I. of Agade. Following a notice of the annals of Nabonidus, in which this Babylonian king states, in the year 550 B. C., that while repairing the sun-temple at Sippar he discovered the foundation cylinders of that edifice laid by Naram-Sin, the son of Sargon, 3,200 years before, Assyriologists assume 3750 B. C. as the date of Naram-Sin.

Narasinha (na-ra-sin'hä). [Skt., 'the man-lion.'] The fourth avatar or incarnation of Vishnu. He assumed the shape of a creature half man half lion, to deliver the world from the tyrant Hiranyakashipu, who had obtained it as a boon from Brahma that he should be slain neither by god, nor man, nor animal, and so was able to usurp the dominion of the three worlds, even appropriating the sacrifices of the gods. When his pious son Prahlada praised Vishnu, the father tried to destroy the boy, whereupon Vishnu appeared suddenly out of a pillar in a shape neither god, nor man, nor animal, and tore Hiranyakashipu to pieces.

Narba (nä-r'bü), or Nabha (nä'bü). A native state in the Panjab, India, under British protection, intersected by lat. 30° 30' N., long. 76° E. Area, 936 square miles. Population (1891), 282,756.

Narbada. See Nerbudda.

Narbonensis, or Gallia Narbonensis (gal'i-ä nä-rbō-nen'sis). A province of the Roman empire, occupying the southern and southeastern parts of Gaul. It extended from the Alps southwestward along the Mediterranean to the Pyrenees. The northern border was near the line of the Cevennes, the Rhone, and the Lake of Geneva. Its leading cities were Tolosa, Narbo, Nemausus, Arelate, Massilia, and Vienna. Early settlements were made by the Romans in the Provincia in the end of the 2d century B. C.—at Narbo 118 B. C., and at Tolosa about the same time.

Narbonne (nä-rbōn'). An ancient district near the city of Narbonne, in southern France. It was governed by viscounts in the middle ages, and was united with the crown of France in 1507-08. It formed part of Languedoc. The name Narbonne has sometimes been given to the ancient Septimania or Gothia.

Narbonne. A city in the department of Aude, France, on the Canal de la Robine, situated 5 miles from the Mediterranean, in lat. 43° 11' N., long. 3° E.; the Latin Narbo. It has some trade and manufactures; is celebrated for its honey; and has a museum, a former cathedral (now a church of St. Just), and remains of an archiepiscopal palace. It was an early Gaulish center; was colonized by Rome 116 or 118 B. C.; and became the capital of Narbonensis. It was an important city of the West Goths; was taken by the Saracens in 719, and taken from them by the Franks in 759; and was the seat of the viscounts of Narbonne. Population (1891), commune, 23,566.

Narbonne-Lara (nä-rbōn'lä-rä'), Comte Louis de. Born at Colomero, near Parma, Italy, 1755; died at Torgau, Prussia, 1813. A French general and diplomatist.

Narborough (nä-r'bur-ō), Sir John. Died 1688. An English naval officer. He fought against the Dutch off the Downs in June, 1666, and in 1690 sailed on a voyage of discovery to the Strait of Magellan. In 1672 he fought in the battle of Southwold Bay, and in 1675 suppressed the pirates of Tripoli.

Narcissa (nä-ris'sä). 1. A beautiful woman whose early death is commemorated in the third night of Young's "Night Thoughts." She is identified with Miss Lee who married Henry Temple, son of Lord Palmerston, and was the daughter of Young's wife by her first husband. According to the "Night Thoughts," on dying in France, she was denied sepulture as a Protestant; but this was not the fact. The book was translated into French, and the belief grew up that she was buried at midnight in the Botanic Garden at Montpellier. Her supposed grave was discovered, was visited by strangers, and became one of the sights of the town. There was no truth in the story, as Mrs. Temple died at Lyons, and was buried in the Protestant cemetery there.

2. The name given to Mrs. Oldfield, the actress, by Pope in his "Moral Essays."

Narcissus (nä-ris's'us). [Gr. Νάρκισσος.] In Greek mythology, a beautiful youth, a son of Cepheus and the nymph Liriopé, metamorphosed into a flower. For his insensibility to love he was caused by Nemesis to fall in love with his own image reflected in water. Unable to grasp this shadow, he pined away and became the flower which bears his name. The nymph Echo, who vainly loved him, died from grief.

Nebaioth. See Nabatæans.
Nebi Yunus (nä-bē'yö'nus). 1. A mound on the site of ancient Nineveh, particularly of the palace of Asurbanipal (668-626 B. C.). It derives its name from the belief of the Mohammedans that the prophet Jonah is buried there, the supposed site of his tomb being now occupied by a mosque.

2. A place in Palestine, near the village of Hahul, which is also supposed to be the site of the tomb of Jonah.

Nebo (nä'bō). [Assyro-Babylonian Nabû.] One of the principal gods of the Babylonians and Assyrians, son of Merodach (Marduk) and husband of Tashmet, the goddess who answers prayer. He was particularly the god of learning, and therefore the patron of the priests and scribes, as he is called the "creator of tablet-writing," the "wise god," the "god of open ears and wide mind." His principal sanctuary was Ezila, "the eternal house," at Borsippa (the temple described by Herodotus as that of Bel); but he had also in the temple of Merodach at Babylon (Esagila) a magnificently adorned chamber. Like Merodach, he was carried in procession through Babylon at the beginning of the year. He is mentioned with Bel (ä. e. Bel-Merodach) in Isa. xlv. 1.

Nebo, Mount, modern Jebel Neba (jeb'el nä'bü). In Bible geography, a summit of Abarim, Moab (2,643 feet), 7 miles northeast of the Dead Sea. It was the place of the death of Moses.

Nebraska (river). See Platte.

Nebraska (nä-bras'kä). One of the Western States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 40° to 43° N., and from long. 95° 25' to 104° W. Capital, Lincoln; chief city, Omaha. It is bounded by South Dakota (partly separated by the Missouri) on the north, Iowa and Missouri (separated from both by the Missouri) on the east, Kansas and Colorado on the south, and Colorado and Wyoming on the west. It is traversed by the Platte. The surface is rolling. The State is especially fertile in the east. The chief industries are agriculture and grazing. It is one of the leading States in the production of corn. It has 99 counties, sends 2 senators and 6 representatives to Congress, and has 8 electoral votes. It formed part of the Louisiana Purchase and of Missouri Territory; was settled at Bellevue in 1847; was made a Territory in 1854 (including portions of the present North and South Dakotas, Montana, Wyoming, and Colorado); and was admitted to the Union in 1867. The name is from that of the river. Area, 77,510 square miles. Population (1890), 1,053,010.

Nebraska City. The capital of Otoe County, Nebraska, situated on the Missouri 40 miles south of Omaha. Population (1890), 11,494.

Nebuchadnezzar (neb'ü-kad-nez'är), or Nebuchadrezzar (-rez'är). [Babylonian Nabû-kudri-ugur, Nebo protect the boundary.] King of Babylonia 605-562 B. C., the chief ruler of the Neo-Babylonian empire, and one of the greatest monarchs of the ancient world. He distinguished himself as a general, while still crown prince, in the battle of Carchemish (which see) against the Egyptian king Necho in 605. On his return from this campaign his father, Nabopolassar, died, and he was proclaimed king. His conquest of Jerusalem and Judea is described under Babylonian Captivity. Tyre he took after a siege of 13 years (585-572). He invaded Egypt in 572, defeated Hophra (Apries), and set Amasis on the throne in his place; an inscription of Nebuchadnezzar informs us that four years afterward he had to subdue a rebellion of Amasis. Unlike most of the Assyrian conquerors, Nebuchadnezzar devoted his energies to the consolidation of his empire. The mighty canals and walls with which he surrounded Babylon, his magnificent palace (now represented by the ruins of al-Kasr, "the castle"), the so-called "hanging gardens of Semiramis" which he had constructed for his Median wife Amytis (Amittu), his restoration of many temples, especially Esagila in Babylon and Ezida in Borsippa, are described in the article Babylon. A full description of the buildings he carried out is given by himself in a long inscription comprising 620 lines. There is no mention in the cuneiform inscriptions of Nebuchadnezzar's insanity as related in the Book of Daniel (iv. 26ff.), but it has a certain parallel in the narrative of Abydenus (preserved by Eusebius), according to which the king once ascended the citadel of his palace and, inspired by a god, announced the fall of his empire.

Nebushazban (neb-ü-shaz'ban). [Babylonian Nabû-šezib-anni, Nebo preserve me.] The name of the captain of the eunuchs of Nebuchadnezzar, mentioned in Jer. xxxix. 13.

Nebuzaradan (neb-ü-zar'a-dan). [Babylonian Nabû-zér-iddina, Nebo has given offspring.] The captain of the body-guard of Nebuchadnezzar who in 586 B. C. was left by him in Judea to finish the work of destruction, and, according to Jer. lii. 30, came in 582 again to Judea and carried away 745 more Judean captives.

Neches (nech'ez) River. A river in eastern Texas which flows into Sabine Lake. Length, about 350 miles.

Necho II. (nä'kö), or Neku (nä'kö). An Egyptian king of the 26th dynasty (about 610-595 or 599 B. C.), son of Psammetichus I. He defeated Josiah at Megiddo about 609, and was defeated by Nebuchadnezzar at Carchemish about 605. He sent a Phœnician expedition to circumnavigate Africa.

In B. C. 609 or 608 Neco, the son of Psammetichus I., having recently ascended the Egyptian throne, made an expedition into Syria with the object of re-attaching to Egypt the entire tract between the "Torrens Egypti" and the Euphrates. At first success crowned his efforts; Josiah, king of Judah, who had ventured to oppose him, was defeated and slain at Megiddo; Palestine was conquered and placed under a tributary king (Jehoiakim); Syria was overrun, and the Egyptian dominion established over the entire region extending northward from Egypt to Amanus, and eastward to the Euphrates and Carchemish. This tract remained under the government of Neco for three years (B. C. 603-605). Phœnicia must have submitted herself.

Rawlinsin, Phœnicia, p. 165.

Nechtansmere (nēch'tanz-mēr). A place near Dunnichen, Forfarshire, Scotland. Here, in 685, the Picts totally defeated the Northumbrians under Egfrith.

Neckar (nek'kär). A river in Württemberg and Baden: the Roman Nieer. It is one of the chief tributaries of the Rhine, which it joins at Mannheim, and is noted for its romantic scenery and for the production of wines in its valley. Heidelberg and Tübingen are on it. Length, 222 miles; navigable for large craft to Heilbronn.

Neckar. One of the four circles of Württemberg, situated in the northwestern part. Area, 1,284 square miles. Population (1890), 665,049.

Necker (nek'ër; F. pron. nä-kär'), Jacques. Born at Geneva, Sept. 30, 1732; died at Coppet, Switzerland, April 9, 1804. A French statesman and financier. He was for a time a banker at Paris; became director of the treasury in 1776, and director-general of the finances in 1777; was dismissed from office in 1781; was recalled to office in 1788; convened the States-General in 1789; was dismissed July 11, 1789; was recalled in 1789; and finally resigned in Sept., 1790. He published "Compte rendu" (1781), "L'Administration de Necker" (1791), "Du pouvoir exécutif" (1792), "De la révolution française" (1796), etc.

Necker, Madame (Susanne Curchod). Born at Crassier, Switzerland, 1739; died at Coppet, Switzerland, May, 1794. The wife of J. Necker, and a leader in literary circles. She was at one time engaged to the historian Gibbon.

Neckham (nek'am), Alexander. Born at St. Albans, Herts, Sept., 1157; died at Kempsey, Worcestershire, 1217. An English scholar, foster-brother of Richard I. He was educated at St. Albans. In 1189 he was distinguished as a professor at Paris; in 1188 he became an Augustinian canon at Cirencester; and in 1213 he was elected abbot. He wrote scientific and grammatical treatises, Latin poems, theological works, commentaries on Aristotle, etc. His name was punned upon as Nequam.

Necklace, Diamond. See Diamond Necklace Affair.

Neco. See Necho.

Nedenäs, or Nedenes (nä'de-näs). A province in southern Norway. Area, 3,608 square miles. Population (1891), 81,043.

Nedim (ne-dēm'). See the extract.

During the reign of Ahmed III. (1703-1730) flourished Nedim, the greatest of all the poets of the old Ottoman school. Nedim has a style that is entirely his own: it is altogether unlike that of any of his predecessors, whether Persian or Turkish, and no one has ever attempted to copy it. Through his ghazels, which are written with the most finished elegance in words of the truest harmony, rings a tone of sprightly gaiety and joyous lightheartedness, such as is not to be found in any other poet of his nation. His numerous kasidas, while they are more graceful, are hardly less brilliant than those of Nefti, and are at the same time in truer taste and less burdened with obscure and far-fetched conceits. Little is known regarding his life, save that he resided at Constantinople, where the Grand Vezir, Ibrahim Pasha, appointed him custodian of the library which he had founded, and that he was still alive in 1727. Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 318.

Nedjed (ned'jed), or Nejd (nejd). A large region in central Arabia, lying between Shomer on the north and Dahna on the south. The surface is generally a plateau. It is inhabited chiefly by Wahhabees. See Arabia.

Ned Myers. A novel by Cooper, published in 1843.

Needham (nēd'an). A town in Norfolk County, Massachusetts, 11 miles west-southwest of Boston. Population (1890), 3,035.

Needles (nē'dlz). The. A group of three pointed rocks in the English Channel, west of the Isle of Wight.

Neefe (nē'fe), Christian Gottlieb. Born at Chemnitz, Feb. 5, 1748; died Jan. 26, 1798. A German musician. His principal claim to notice is that he was the instructor of Beethoven at Bonn.

Neenah (nē'nä). A city in Winnebago County, Wisconsin, situated on Fox River 12 miles north of Oshkosh. Population (1890), 5,083.

Neer (när), Aart van der. Born about 1619; died after 1692. A Dutch landscape-painter.

Neer, Egion Hendrik van der. Born at Amsterdam, 1643; died at Düsseldorf, Prussia, May 3, 1703. A Dutch painter, son of Aart van der Neer.

Neerwinden (när'vin-dēn). A village in the province of Liège, Belgium, 31 miles east by south of Brussels. It is noted for two battles: here, July 29, 1693, the French under Luxembourg defeated the Allies under William III. of England (this is also called the battle of Landen); and here, March 18, 1793, the Austrians under the Prince of Coburg defeated the French under Dumouriez.

Nees von Esenbeck (näs fon ä'zen-bek), Christian Gottfried. Born in the Odenwald, Hesse, Feb. 14, 1776; died at Breslau, Prussia, March 16, 1858. A German botanist and zoölogist. He became professor of botany at Erlangen in 1818, at Bonn in 1819, and at Breslau in 1831. For political reasons he was deprived of his office in 1852. Among his works are "Handbuch der Botanik" (1820-21), and works on entomology, philosophy, etc.

Nefert (nē'fört). [Egypt., 'good' or 'beautiful.'] An Egyptian queen, wife of Amenemhat II. A life-size statue of her, in black granite, was found in the ruins of Tanis, Lower Egypt.

Nefert and Ra-Hotep (rä-hō'tēp). Two remarkable statues of early Egyptian art, in the museum at Gizeh, Egypt. The figures are seated, carved in limestone, painted, and with inlaid eyes of glass and enamel, the effect being strangely lifelike. The prince wears a simple loin-cloth, the princess a close-fitting white garment with an elaborate necklace and a diadem. The statues came from the vestibule of a tomb at Meidum.

Nefertari (nē-fēr-tä'ri) Aahmes. [Egypt., 'beautiful wife of Aahmes.'] An Egyptian queen, wife of Aahmes I. Her mummy-case, "one of the largest and most magnificent ever discovered," is in the museum at Gizeh.

Not only in the rock-caves of Türah and Massarah, opposite to Memphis, but also on a number of public monuments in the interior of the apulchral chambers of the Theban Necropolis, has the name of this queen been preserved, surrounded by laudatory inscriptions. Long after her decease, this great ancestress of the New Empire was venerated as a divine being, and her image was placed beside those of the other inhabitants of the Egyptian heaven. Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, p. 131.

Nefi (nē'fē). See the extract.

During the reign of Ahmed I. (1603-1607), arose the second great light of old Turkish poetry. This was Nefti of Erzerum, who is as much esteemed for the brilliancy of his kasidas, or elegies, as Fuzuli is for the tenderness of his ghazels. Like him, he elaborated a style for himself, which found many imitators, the most successful of whom was Sabri. Unfortunately for himself, Nefti was an able satirist: his scathing pen drew down upon him the enmity of certain great men, who prevailed upon Sultan Murad IV. to sanction his execution (1635).

Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 315.

Negapatam (neg-a-pa-täm'). A seaport in the district of Tanjore, Madras, British India, situated in lat. 10° 45' N., long. 79° 51' E. Population (1891), 59,221.

Negaunee (ne-gä'nē). A city in Marquette County, Upper Michigan, 11 miles west-southwest of Marquette. It is the center of an iron-mining district. Population (1890), 6,078.

Negley (neg'li), James Scott. Born in Pennsylvania, Dec., 1826. An American general in the Civil War. He defeated the Confederates at Lavergne, Tennessee, Oct. 7, 1862, and took part in the battle of Chickamauga.

Négrier (nä-grē-ä'), François Oscar de. Born at Belfort, 1839. A French general, distinguished in the operations in Tongking and Annam 1885.

Negritos (ne-grē'tōz). A diminutive dark-skinned negro-like race found in the Philippine Islands (of which they seem to have been the original inhabitants), and in New Caledonia, etc., according to some authorities. The average height of the Negritos of the Philippine Islands is about 4 feet 8 inches. Also Negrillos.

Negro, Rio. See Rio Negro.

Negro race. A race of which the physical characteristics are a large and strong skeleton, long and thick skull, prognathic jaws, skin from dark brown to black, woolly hair, thick lips, and a broad and flattened nose. It occupies in a compact mass the African continent south of the Sahara. The brown races of South Africa, the pygmies of central Africa, and the red-brown races of Sudan, who live in the same area, are comparatively few in number, or are intimately mixed with the negro race. There is no racial difference between the Bantu, speaking languages derived from one mother tongue, and the negroes of Upper Guinea and the Sudan, who speak unconnected languages; nor is there much difference in customs. The non-Bantu languages of the Upper Guinea and Sudan negroes are called, in this work, the Nigritic branch, and this word is also applied to the tribes. The negroes of North, Central, and South America have been deported from Africa. The Papuans and Nigrillos of Australasia, having all or most of the characteristics of the African negroes, are classed by some with these, by some apart. See African ethnology and languages (under Africa), Bantu, and Hottentot-Bushmen.

Negropont. The modern name of Eubœa.

Negros (nä-grōs). One of the Philippine Islands, situated north of Mindanao. Length, about 130 miles. Population, over 200,000.

Nehavend (nä-hä-vend'). A place in Persia, 50 miles south of Hamadan, noted for the battle of 641 (642?), in which the Saracens totally defeated the Persians and overthrew the Persian kingdom.

Nehemiah (nē-he-mī'ä). [Heb., 'comforted by Yahveh.'] A Hebrew cup-bearer of Artaxerxes Longimanus of Persia, appointed governor of Judea 444 B. C. He rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem, and restored the national worship. The authorship of a part of the Book of Nehemiah is ascribed to him.

Nehemiah, Book of. A book of the Old Testament, written probably in part by Nehemiah. See the extract.

The book of Nehemiah, or, as we have now learned to call it, in accordance with the Hebrew usage, the joint book of Ezra and Nehemiah, which in all probability was also one book with Chronicles, carries down the list of high priests as far as Jaddua, who was in office at the time of Alexander (Neh. xii. 11). The book, therefore, was written, at the earliest, at the very end of the Persian period, though it incorporates earlier documents, such as the autobiography of Ezra and the memoir of Nehemiah. W. R. Smith, O. T. in the Jewish Ch., p. 140.

Neher (nä'her), Bernhard von. Born at Biberach, Württemberg, Jan. 16, 1806; died at Stuttgart, Jan. 17, 1886. A German historical painter.

Neidhart von Reuenthal (nit'härt fon roi'en-täl). Place and date of birth unknown; died at Vienna, date unknown. A Middle High German lyric poet of the 13th century. He was a Bavarian knight, took part in the crusade of Leopold II. of Austria 1217-19, and subsequently lived at Vienna at the court of Duke Frederick. His principal poems are dance-songs. He is the founder of the popular lyric poetry of the courts—poetry, namely, that found its material in the rude life and manners of the peasants, who were held up to the ridicule of the nobles. His poems were published at Leipsic in 1853.

Neigherry Hills. See Nilgiri Hills.

Neill (nēl), Edward Duffield. Born at Philadelphia, Aug. 9, 1823; died at St. Paul, Minn., Sept. 26, 1893. An American historian. His works include "English Colonization of America" (1871) and other works on American colonial history, "Concise History of Minnesota" (1887), etc.

Neilson (nēl'son), Adelaide. Born at Leeds, Yorkshire, March 3, 1848; died at Paris, France, Aug. 15, 1880. A noted English actress. Her real name was Elizabeth Ann Brown, and her mother having subsequently married a Mr. Bland, she was known as Lizzie Bland. At the age of 17 she made her debut as Juliet. In 1870 she made a conspicuous success as Amy Robsart in London, and by 1878 she was the acknowledged queen of the English stage. In 1872 she was equally successful at Booth's Theater in New York. She made four visits to America, her last appearance there being on May 24, 1880.

Neilson (nēl'son), James Brammont. Born near Glasgow, June 22, 1792; died at Queen's Hill, Kirkcudbrightshire, Jan. 18, 1865. A British engineer and inventor. He invented the use of the hot blast in smelting-furnaces.

Neipperg (nēp'pērg), Count Adam Adalbert von. Born April 8, 1775; died Feb. 22, 1829. An Austrian general and diplomatist. He married Maria Louisa after the death of Napoleon (1821).

Neisse (nis'se). The name of three rivers of Germany, principally in Silesia. (a) Glatzer Neisse, joining the Oder 35 miles southeast of Breslau. Length, 120 miles. (b) Wüthende ('Furious') Neisse, joining the Katzbach below Liegnitz. (c) Lausitzer or Grolitzer Neisse, joining the Oder 26 miles south of Frankfort-on-the-Oder. Length, 140 miles.

Neisse. A fortified city in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated at the junction of the Biela and Glatzer Neisse, 46 miles south by east of Breslau. It was formerly the capital of an ancient principality of Neisse; repulsed the Hussites in 1428; was taken by Frederick the Great in 1741, and made a strong fortress; was unsuccessfully besieged by the Austrians in 1758; and was taken by the French June 16, 1807. Population (1890), 22,444.

Neith (nē'ith), or Net (net). [Gr. Nēth, Egypt. Net.] In Egyptian mythology, a lofty personification of the female principle, the mother of the sun, unbegotten. She was the chief divinity of Sais, single, supreme, and self-producing. She was identified by the Greeks with Athena. She was represented as a woman wearing the crown of Lower Egypt.

Neiva, or Neyva (nä'ē-vi). A town in the Republic of Colombia, situated on the Magdalena 125 miles southwest of Bogotá. Population, about 8,000.

Nejd. See Nedjed.

Nekayah, Princess. The sister of Rasselas, in Johnson's work of that name.

Nekrassoff, or Nekrasoff (nek-ra'sof), Nikolai Alexeivitch. Born in the government of Yaroslaff, Russia, Nov. 22 (O. S.), 1821; died at St. Petersburg, Dec. 27 (O. S.), 1877. A distinguished Russian poet. He was educated at the cadet school at St. Petersburg. He was editor of "The Contemporary" and "The Annals of the Country." In 1840 he published "Dreams and Elves," a small volume of poems, most of which had already appeared in "The Annals of the Country" and other journals. His poems are published in 6 volumes. Among them are "Red-nosed Frost" (1863), "To Whom is Life in Russia Worth Living?" (the last canto of which, owing to the censor, was not published till 1881), and "Russian Women." He was essentially a poet of the people.

Nélaton (nä-lä-tōn'). Auguste. Born at Paris, June 17, 1807; died at Paris, Sept. 21, 1873. A noted French surgeon, professor in the medical faculty of the University of Paris 1851-67. His chief work is "Éléments de pathologie chirurgicale" ("Elements of Surgical Pathology," 1844-60).

Neleus (nē'lūs). [Gr. Nēleüs.] In Greek mythology, a son of Poseidon and Tyro, founder and king of Pylus in Messenia. He was the father of Nestor.

Nellore (ne-lōr'), or Nellur (ne-lōr'). 1. A district in Madras, British India, intersected by lat. 14° 30' N., long. 80° E. Area, 8,739 square miles. Population (1881), 1,220,236.—2. The capital of the district of Nellore, situated on the Pennair 95 miles north by west of Madras. Population (1881), 27,505.

Nelson (nel'son). A name given to the river Saskatchewan in the lower part of its course.

Nelson. A seaport at the northern end of South Island, New Zealand, situated in lat. 41° 15' S., long. 173° 17' E. (lighthouse). Population (1889), 7,733.

Nelson, Horatio, first Viscount Nelson. Born at Burnham-Thorpe, Norfolk, England, Sept. 29, 1758; died on board the Victory at Trafalgar, Oct. 21, 1805. A celebrated English admiral. He entered the navy in 1770, and was made post-captain at the age of twenty-one, serving in the American war. At the declaration of war with France in 1793, he was made captain of the Agamemnon in the Mediterranean, serving first under Lord Hood and afterward under Admiral Hotham. On Feb. 14, 1797, under Admiral Jervis (later Lord St. Vincent), he fought in the battle off Cape St. Vincent. In May, 1798, he was sent by Lord St. Vincent to intercept Napoleon's expedition to Egypt. In this he failed, but destroyed the French fleet at anchor in the harbor of Abukir, Aug. 1-2. This engagement is called "the battle of the Nile." He retired to Naples, where he became involved in political complications and in an intrigue with the wife of Sir William Hamilton, British envoy to Naples. In 1800 he returned to England and was made vice-admiral and a peer. The battle of Copenhagen was fought April 2, 1801, in order to destroy the coalition of the northern powers known as the (second) Armed Neutrality. Nelson was made a viscount after Copenhagen. The French fleet under Admiral Villeneuve left Toulon in March, 1805, and sailed to the West Indies with the intention of drawing off the English fleet and returning to support Napoleon's projected invasion of England. Nelson followed, and, after Napoleon's plan had been thwarted by the hesitancy of Villeneuve, fought the French-Spanish fleet off Cape Trafalgar, Oct. 21, 1805. He hoisted the signal "England expects that every man will do his duty" at the beginning of this fight.

Nelson, Samuel. Born at Hebron, N. Y., Nov. 10, 1792; died at Cooperstown, N. Y., Dec. 13, 1873. An American jurist. He was associate justice of the Supreme Court of the State of New York 1851-57, and chief justice 1857-65; associate justice of the United States Supreme Court 1845-72; and a member of the joint high commission to settle the Alabama claims in 1871.

Nelson, Thomas. Born at Yorktown, Va., Dec. 26, 1738; died in Hanover County, Jan. 4, 1789. An American patriot, signer of the Declaration of Independence in 1776 as delegate to Congress from Virginia. He served in the Revolutionary War, and became governor of Virginia in 1781.

Nelson, William. Born at Maysville, Ky., 1825; killed at Louisville, Ky., Sept. 29, 1862. An American general in the Civil War. He entered the navy in 1840, and was promoted lieutenant-commander in 1861. At the beginning of the Civil War he organized camps in Kentucky for mustering Union soldiers. He was made brigadier-general in 1861; commanded the second division of Buell's army at the battle of Shiloh; and afterward took command of Louisville. He was made major-general of volunteers in July, 1862. He was shot and killed in an altercation with General Jefferson C. Davis.

Nelson Monument. A Corinthian column of granite, 145 feet high, on a square pedestal, standing in Trafalgar Square, London. It bears a statue of the admiral, 17 feet high, and on the sides of the pedestal are bronze reliefs portraying his chief exploits. Around the column are placed four colossal reposing lions in bronze, by Landseer.

Nemausus (ne-mā'sus). The Roman name of Nîmes.

Nemea (nē'mē-ä). [Gr. Νεμέα.] In ancient geography, a valley in Argolis, Greece, 11 miles southwest of Corinth. It is noted as the scene of the Nemean games, and in legend as the haunt of the Nemean lion.

Nemean games (nē'mē-an or nē'mē-an gāmz). One of the four great national festivals of the ancient Greeks (the others being the Olympian, Pythian, and Isthmian games). These games were celebrated at Nemea in the second and fourth years of each Olympiad, near the temple of the Nemean Zeus, some (Doric) columns of which are still standing. According to the mythological story, the games were instituted in memory of the death of the young hero Archemorus or Opheltes by the bite of a serpent, as the expedition of "the Seven against Thebes" was passing through the place. The victor's garland at the Nemean games was made of parsley.

Nemesianus (nē'mē-si-ā'nus), Marcus Aurelius Olympius. Born probably at Carthage; lived at the close of the 3d century. A Roman poet. Fragments of his "Cynegética" have been edited by Haupt (1838).

In the time of Carus and his sons, M. Aurelius Olympius Nemesianus of Carthage wrote his didactic poem on the chase (Cynegética), the first 325 lines of which have come down to us. They exhibit fluency, ease, and command of language in the traditional style, the technique being in the main the same as in the four worthy eclogues by this author, in which he has taken as his pattern Calpurnius's bucolic essay, but proves considerably inferior even to this very mediocre model.

Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Roman Lit. (tr. by Warr), [II, 289.]

Nemesis (nem'e-sis). [Gr. Νέμεσις.] In Greek mythology, a goddess personifying allotment, or the divine distribution to every man of his precise share of fortune, good and bad. It was her especial function to see that the proper proportion of individual prosperity was preserved, and that any one who became too prosperous, or was too much uplifted by his prosperity, should be reduced or punished; she thus came to be regarded as the goddess of divine retribution. Sometimes Nemesis was represented as winged and with the wheel of fortune, or borne in a chariot drawn by griffins, and conformed with Astræa, the goddess of the inevitable.

Nemesius (nē-mē'si-us). [Gr. Νεμεσιος.] Lived in the last part of the 4th century. A theologian, bishop of Emesa; author of a Greek treatise "On the Nature of Man."

Nemetes (nē-mē'tēz). [L. (Cæsar) Nemetes, Gr. (Ptolemy) Νεμητοί: of Gallie origin.] A German tribe, first mentioned by Cæsar as in the army of Ariovistus. They were situated at the left side of the middle Rhine, east of the Vosges, in the region about Spire, where they still remained after the defeat of Ariovistus (B. C. 58). They were probably merged ultimately in the Alamanni.

Nemi (nā'mē), Lake of. A small lake 17 miles southeast of Rome, noted for its beauty; the ancient Lacus Nemorensis. It is an extinct crater in the Alban Mountains.

Nemo (nē'mō). [L., 'no one.'] The signature of Hablot Knight Browne to the first two plates illustrating the "Pickwick Papers," which he afterward changed to "Phiz."

Nemours (nē-mōr'). A town in the department of Seine-et-Marne, France, situated on the Loing 45 miles south-southeast of Paris. Population (1891), 4,507.

Nemours, Duc de (Gaston de Foix). Born in 1489; died April 11, 1512. A celebrated French general. He was the son of Jean de Foix, vicomte de Narbonne, and Marie d'Orléans, sister of Louis XII. He was created duc de Nemours in 1505. In 1512 he conducted a brilliant campaign against the Spaniards in Italy, and was killed in the pursuit after a great victory won by him at Ravenna, April 11, 1512.

Nemours, Duc de (Prince Louis Charles Philippe Raphael d'Orléans). Born at Paris, Oct. 25, 1814. The second son of Louis Philippe. He served as general in the French army, and took part in the expeditions against Constantine (Algeria) 1836-37. From 1848 to 1870 he lived in England, and from 1870 to 1886 in France. He was expelled from the army in 1886. He lived subsequently in Belgium.

Nemours, Edict of. A treaty concluded in 1585 at Nemours, between Henry III. and the chiefs of the League.

Nen (nen), or Nene (nēn). A river in the eastern counties of England. It flows into the Wash 9 miles west-northwest of King's Lynn. Length, 90-100 miles.

Nena Sahib. See Nana Sahib.

Nenagh (nē'nā; local pron. nē'nāch). A town in County Tipperary, Ireland, situated 22 miles northeast of Limerick. Population (1891), 4,722.

Nennius (nen'i-us). The reputed author of the "Historia Britonum," written probably in the 9th century.

Neoplatonists (nē-ō-plā'tō-nists). ['New Platonists.'] The believers in a system of philosophical and religious doctrines and principles which originated in Alexandria with Ammonius Saccas in the 3d century, and was developed by Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus, Hypatia, Proclus, and others in the 3d, 4th, and 5th centuries. The system was composed of elements of Platonism and Oriental beliefs, and in its later development was influenced by the philosophy of Philo, by Gnosticism, and by Christianity. Its leading representative was Plotinus. His views were popularized by Porphyry and modified in the direction of mysticism by Iamblichus. Considerable sympathy with Neoplatonism in its earlier stages was shown by several eminent Christian writers, especially in Alexandria, such as St. Clement, Origen, etc. The last Neoplatonic schools were suppressed in the 6th century.

Neoptolemus (nē-ōp-tō'lē-mus), or Pyrhus (pir'us). [Gr. Νεοπτόλεμος.] In Greek legend, a son of Achilles and Deidameia (or, according to some, Iphigenia): one of the heroes of the Trojan war. He was one of the band which was concealed in the wooden horse by means of which the city was captured, slew Priam, and married Andromache, the wife of Hector. He was later in Epirus, where he carried off Lanassa, a granddaughter of Hercules, and plundered the temple of Apollo at Delphi. He married Hermione. At Delphi he was worshiped as a hero, and was said to have protected that shrine from the Goths.

Neoptolemus. Killed about 321 B. C. A Macedonian general in the service of Alexander the Great.

Neosho (nē-ō-shō). A river in southeastern Kansas and Indian Territory, which joins the Arkansas near Fort Gibson. Length, 300-400 miles.

Neot (nē'ot or nēt), Saint. A hermit of the 9th century, whose life, written by a monk of the abbey of St. Neot, is thought to have furnished material for the history of Alfred.

The St. Neot mentioned in this argument was a kinsman of King Alfred's who, first bred to arms, renounced the world, taught at Glastonbury, visited Rome, and desiring pious solitude became a hermit in the woods of Cornwall. After seven years he visited the Pope again, returned to his hermitage, converted it into a small monastic house of which he was the first abbot, where also he is said to have been sometimes visited by Alfred, and died in 877. In 974 his bones were carried to the newly-founded monastery of St. Neot's, Huntingdonshire, and after that date his life was written. Morley, English Writers, II, 225.

Nepal (ne-pāl'), or Nipal (nē-pāl'), or Nepaul (ne-pāl'). A country in Asia, situated mainly on the southern slope of the Himalaya system. Capital, Khatmandu. It is bounded by Tibet on the north, Sikkim on the east, and British India on the south and west. It is governed by a maharaja and prime minister. The ruling people are the Gurkhas. The religion is Buddhism (blended with Hinduism) and Hinduism. Nepal was conquered by the Hindus in the 14th century, and by the Gurkhas in the 15th century, and was at war with the British in 1814-15. Area, about 54,000 square miles. Population, estimated, 2,000,000-3,000,000.

Nephele (nē'fē-lē). [Gr. Νεφέλη, a cloud.] In Greek legend, the wife of Athamas and mother of Phrixus and Helle.

Nephelococcygia (nē'fē-lō-kok-sij'i-ä). [Gr. Νεφέλοκοκκυγία, Cuckoo-town-in-the-clouds.] A fictitious city, referred to in the "Birds" by Aristophanes.

Nepomuk (nā'pō-mōk), Saint John of. Born at Pomuk, Bohemia; thrown into the Moldau in 1393 (in legend 1383). A Bohemian ecclesiastic, patron saint of Bohemia.

Nepos (nē'pos), Cornelius. Born probably at Verona, Italy; lived in the 1st century B. C. A Roman historian, a friend of Cicero. See the extract.

His life may be said to fall between 655/99 and 730/24. Besides erotic poems, three books of Chronica were his earliest work, but he seems also to have written a geographical treatise. His other writings show that he was influenced by Varro, for they were directed to the history of manners and customs and had a biographical and moral tendency. In this way he wrote five books of Exempla, and the elaborate biographies of Cato the Elder and Cicero, and especially his last and most comprehensive work, "De viris illustribus," in at least sixteen books, in which the lives of Romans and foreigners were placed in parallel juxtaposition. The parts of it which we possess, the work "De excellentibus duobus exterarum gentium," and the biographies of Cato and of Attius (being an extract from his work "De historicis latinis"), are often more valuable for their lucidity of arrangement, unpretentious tone, and fair and sympathetic judgments; but they hardly attain even a moderate level of accuracy and trustworthiness as historical essays, and are equally inferior in style, owing to the frequency of popular and colloquial idioms.

Teuffel and Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), [I, 341.]

Nepos, Julius. Killed at Salona, Dalmatia, 480. Emperor of the West 474-475. He was appointed emperor by Leo I., emperor of the East. He was defeated and deposed by Orestes, who raised his own son Romulus Augustulus to the throne.

Neptune (nep'tūn). [From L. Neptunus, a sea-god.] 1. In Roman mythology, the god of the sea, who came to be identified by the Romans themselves with the Greek Poseidon, whose attributes were transferred by the poets to the ancient Latin deity. In art Neptune is usually represented as a bearded man of stately presence, with the trident as his chief attribute, and the horse and the dolphin as symbols.

2. The outermost known planet of the solar system, and the third in volume and mass, but invisible to the naked eye. It was discovered in the autumn of 1846. Uranus, the planet next to Neptune, revolving about the sun in 84 years, was discovered in 1781, but observations of it as a fixed star were scattered through the 18th century. In 1821 Bouvard found that the observations could not be satisfied by any theory based on the gravitation of known bodies, and hinted at an undiscovered planet. During the following 20 years further observations satisfied astronomers that such a planet must exist. To find its position was the problem which two mathematicians, J. C. Adams in England and U. J. J. Le Verrier in France, set themselves to solve by mathematics. The calculations of Le Verrier assigned to it a position within the boundaries of a not very large region. In consequence of the indications of Adams, the astronomer Challis observed the star Ang. 4 and 12, 1846, but, neglecting to work up his observations, failed to recognize it as a planet; while, in consequence of the indications of Le Verrier, Galle of Berlin discovered Neptune Sept. 23, 1846. A satellite to Neptune was detected in Oct., 1846, by Lassell; its period of revolution is 5d, 21h. 5m., and its maximum elongation 13". The name Neptune was conferred by Encke. The diameter of the planet is 37,000 miles; its distance from the sun is about 2,800,000,000 miles; and its period of revolution is about 164 years.

Nequam. See Neckham.

Nera (nā'ri). A small river in Italy, a tributary of the Tiber. Terui is situated on it.

Nérac (nā-rāk'). A town in the department of Lot-et-Garonne, France, situated on the Baïse 65 miles southeast of Bordeaux. Before its capture by Louis XIII. it was important as a Huguenot center. Population (1891), commune, 6,909.

Nerbudda (nēr-bud'dä), better Narbada (nār-bä'dä), or Narmada (nār-mä'dä). A river of India which flows into the Gulf of Cambay about lat. 21° 35' N. It is one of the most sacred rivers of India. Length, about 800 miles; navigable about 90 miles.

Nerbudda. A division of the Central Provinces, British India. Area, 17,513 square miles. Population (1881), 1,763,105.

Nereids (nēr-rē-idz). In Greek mythology, sea-nymphs, the daughters of Nereus (whence the name) and Doris, generally spoken of as fifty in number. The most famous among them were Amphitrite, Thetis, and Galatea. The Nereids were beautiful maidens helpful to voyagers, and constituted the main body of the female, as the Tritons did of the male, followers of Poseidon or Neptune. They were imagined as dancing, singing, playing musical instruments, wooed by the Tritons, and passing in long processions over the sea seated on hippocamps and other sea-monsters. Monuments of ancient art represent them lightly draped or nude, in poses characterized by undulating lines harmonizing with those of the ocean, and often riding on sea-monsters of fantastic forms.

Nereid Friezes. Four friezes from the Nereid monument at Xanthus in Lycia, now in the British Museum. The widest frieze represents a battle between Greeks and Asiatics; the others represent episodes of war, the chase, banquet, and sacrifice.

Nereus (nēr-rūs). [Gr. Νηρέως.] In Greek mythology, a sea-god, son of Pontus and Gaia, husband of Doris, and father of the fifty Nereids.

Nergal (nēr-gäl). One of the twelve great gods of the Babylonians and Assyrians, mentioned in 2 Ki. xvii. 30 as the deity of Cuthah, a statement fully confirmed by the cuneiform inscriptions. See Cuthah. He is primitively, like Adar, the sun-god in his destructive aspect. This is supposed to be expressed in his name, Nergal (Akkadian Ner-ru-gal), 'lord of the great city,' i. e. the grave. Both were, however, chiefly considered as the divinities of war and the chase. Nergal was represented under the symbol of colossal lions, which guarded the entrance of the Assyro-Babylonian temples and palaces.

Nergalsharezer (nēr-gäl-sha-rē-zēr). [Babylonian Nergal-shar-uqur, Nergal protect the king.] 1. The name of a Babylonian general (Jer. xxxix. 3) and of a chief of the Magi (Jer. xxxix. 3, 13). — 2. A Babylonian king who ruled 560-556 B. C., between Evil Merodach and Nabonidus. He was son-in-law of Nebuchadnezzar.

Neri (nā-rē), Filippo de' (Saint Philip Neri). Born at Florence, July 22, 1515; died at Rome, May 25, 1595. An Italian ecclesiastic, noted as the founder of the Congregation of the Oratory. He was canonized in 1622.

Neri (nā-rē), The. [It., 'the Blacks.'] See Bianchi.

Nerissa (nēr-ris'sä). A character in Shakspeare's play "The Merchant of Venice"; the clever companion and attendant of Portia, who mimics her mistress with a good deal of adroitness.

Nero (nēr) (originally Lucius Domitius Ahenobarbus, later Nero Claudius Cæsar Drusus Germanicus). Born at Antium, Italy, Dec. 15, 37 A. D.; committed suicide near Rome, June 9, 68. Roman emperor 54-68, son of Domitius Ahenobarbus and Agrippina (daughter of Germanicus). He was adopted by his stepfather, the emperor Claudius, in 50, and in 53 married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius by Messalina. In 54 Claudius was poisoned by Agrippina, who caused her son to be proclaimed to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius. His former tutors, the philosopher Seneca and Burrus, commander of the pretorian guards, were placed at the head of the government, and the early years of his reign were marked, on the whole, by clemency and justice. He caused his rival Britannicus to be removed by poison in 55. In 59 he procured the assassination of his mother, of whose control he had become impatient. Burrus died in 62, whereupon Seneca retired from public life. Freed from the restraint of his former advisers, he gave free rein to a naturally tyrannical and cruel disposition. He divorced Octavia in order to marry Poppæa, and shortly afterward put Octavia to death (62). Poppæa ultimately died from the effects of a kick administered by her brutal husband. Having been accused of kindling the fire which in 64 destroyed a large part of Rome, he sought to divert attention from himself by ordering a persecution of the Christians, whom he accused of having caused the conflagration. He put Seneca to death in 65, and 66-68 visited Greece, where he competed for the prizes as a musician and charioteer in the religious festivals. He was overthrown by a revolt under Galba, and stabbed himself to death with the assistance of his secretary.

But the imperial Reign of Terror was limited to a comparatively small number of families in Rome. The provinces were undoubtedly better governed than in the later days of the Republic, and even in Rome itself the common people strewed flowers on the grave of Nero.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 6.

Nero, Caius Claudius. A Roman consul 207 B. C. He marched against Hasdrubal, and (with Livius) defeated him in the battle of the Metaurus in 207.

Nero, Emperor of Rome. A tragedy by Nathaniel Lee, produced in 1675.

Nero of the North. A name given, on account of his cruelty, to Christian II., king of Denmark and Norway (and in his early years of Sweden).

Néron (nā-rôn'). An opera by Rubinstein, produced at Hamburg in 1879.

Nero's Persecution of Christians. A painting by W. von Kaulbach. The emperor stands with a company of kindred spirits on a terrace in his gardens, receiving homage as a god, while a group of elderly men and another of German soldiers look on with sorrow. In the foreground a body of Christians is undergoing martyrdom, among them St. Peter, crucified head down, and St. Paul, who breaks from his executioner and makes a passionate protest against the outrages being enacted.

Nertchinsk (ner-chinsk'). A town in Transbaikalia, Russia, situated on the Nercha about lat. 52° N. The treaty of Nertchinsk, regulating the boundary between China and Russia, was signed here in 1689. Population, 4,535.

Nertchinskii-Zavod (ner-chin'skiy-zä-vod'). A town in Transbaikalia, Siberia, situated near the Argun about 140 miles east-southeast of Nertchinsk. It is the center of a silver- and gold-mining region.

Nerthus (nēr'thus). According to Tacitus, a German goddess of fertility and growth; also called Hertha. The seat of her worship was an island which has not been identified.

Nerva (nēr-vä), Marcus Cocceius. Born 32 A. D.; died Jan. 27, 98. Roman emperor 96-98. He was consul with Vespasian in 71 and with Domitian in 90, and was raised to the throne by the murderers of the latter. He was a mild and just ruler. He adopted Trajan as his successor.

Nerval, Gérard de. See Gérard de Nerval.

Nervi (nēr-vē). A town in the province of Genoa, Italy, situated on the Gulf of Genoa 6 miles east of Genoa. It is a sea-bathing and winter health-resort.

Nervi (nēr-vi-i). An ancient people of the Belgic Gauls, dwelling in the neighborhood of the Sambre. They were defeated by Julius Cæsar 57 B. C.

Nesle (näl). A town in the department of Somme, France, 28 miles east-southeast of Amiens. It was important in former times under the sieurs of Nesle. Population (1891), commune, 2,393.

Nesselrode (nes'sel-rō-de), Count Karl Robert. Born at Lisbon, Dec. 14, 1780; died at St. Petersburg, March 23, 1862. A Russian statesman and diplomatist. He directed the foreign policy of Russia (nearly all the time as minister of foreign affairs) 1813-56. He conducted the negotiations of 1813-15; signed the peace of Paris in 1814; was at the congresses of Vienna 1814-15, Aix-la-Chapelle 1818, Laibach, 1821, etc.; was made chancellor in 1844; and concluded the peace of Paris in 1856.

Nessler (nes'ler), Victor. Born at Baldenheim, Alsace, Jan. 28, 1841. A German composer and conductor. Among his operas are "Dornröschen Brautfahrt" (1868), "Irmgard" (1876), "Der Rattenfänger von Hameln" (1879), "Der wilde Jäger" (1881), "Der Trompeter von Säckingen" (1884), "Otto der Schutz" (1886), etc.

Nessus (nes'us). [Gr. Νέσσορ.] In Greek legend, a centaur slain by Hercules. He carried Dejanira, Hercules's wife, across the Euenus; but when he attempted to run away with her, Hercules shot him with a poisoned arrow. He declared to Dejanira that his blood would preserve her husband's love, and she took some of it with her. Later she steeped in it a garment in which Hercules offered sacrifice, and by which he was poisoned from the virus of his own arrow; the garment clung to his flesh, which was torn off with it. Lichas, who brought the shirt, was cast by the raging hero into the sea, and Dejanira hung herself. Hercules erected and ascended a pile of wood, had it set on fire, and was carried off from it to Olympus.

Nest of Nobles, A. A novel by Turgenieff, published in England under the name of "Liza."

Nestor (nes'tor). [Gr. Νέστωρ.] In Greek legend, a king of Pylus, and son of Neleus, famous as the oldest counselor of the Greeks before Troy.

Nestorians (nes-tō'ri-anz). 1. The followers of Nestorius. They denied the hypostatic union of two natures in one person in Christ, holding that he possesses two distinct personalities, the union between which is merely moral. After the Council of Ephesus the Nestorians obtained possession of the theological schools of Edessa, Nisibis, and Seleucia, and were driven by imperial edicts into Persia, where they firmly established themselves. Later they spread to India, Bactria, and as far as China. About 1400 the greater part of their churches perished under the persecutions of Timur, and in the 16th century a large part of the remainder joined the Roman Catholics. These are called Chaldeans. See def. 2.

2. A modern Christian body in Persia and Turkey, the remnant of the once powerful Nestorian denomination. They number about 140,000, are subject to a patriarch (the patriarch of Urumish) and 18 bishops, recognize 7 sacraments, administer communion in both kinds, and have many fasts. Another community of Nestorian origin still exists on the Malabar coast of India, but since the middle of the 17th century these are said to have become Monophysites.

Nestorius (nes-tō'ri-us). Died after 439. Patriarch of Constantinople 428-431. He was deposed by the Council of Ephesus on account of heresy. See Nestorians.

Nestucca (nez-tuk'ä). A tribe of North American Indians, formerly on Nestucca River, western Oregon; now on the Grand Ronde reservation, Oregon. See Salishan.

Netherlands (nETH'er-landz). The Low Countries; Holland and Belgium. The former now retains the name Netherlands. See below.

Netherlands, D. Nederlanden (nä'der-län-den), G. Niederlande (nē'der-län-de), F. Pays-Bas (pä-ē'hä'): often called Holland (hol'and). A kingdom of western Europe. Capitals, Amsterdam and The Hague. It is bounded by the North Sea on the west and north, Prussia on the east, and Belgium on the south. The surface is generally flat, the land having in many parts been reclaimed from the sea. The chief rivers are the Rhine, Meuse, and Schelde. The leading occupations are commerce, raising of live stock, agriculture, and manufactures. The kingdom has 11 provinces: North Holland, South Holland, Zealand, North Brabant, Utrecht, Limburg, Gelderland, Overijssel, Drenthe, Groningen, and Friesland. The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, administered by a king and States-General composed of an upper chamber of 60 and a lower chamber of 100 members. The inhabitants, generally called Dutch, are chiefly of Low German race (three branches — Frisian, Saxon, and Friesian). The prevailing language is Dutch, and the prevailing religions Dutch Reformed and Roman Catholic. The chief colonial possessions are the Dutch East Indies (including Java, the Moluccas, parts of Borneo, New Guinea, Sumatra, and Celebes, and smaller islands) and the Dutch West Indies (including Dutch Guiana and Curaçoa with its dependencies). The country was inhabited by various German peoples in Roman times. In the middle ages the region at present included in the Netherlands and Belgium was divided among Brabant, Flanders, Gelderland, Holland, Zealand, and other duchies, countships, etc. It was united with Burgundy in the 14th and 15th centuries, passed to the Hapsburg family in 1477, and thence later to Spain. The following are the leading later incidents and events: Reformation introduced under Charles V.; outbreak of the revolution (under William of Orange; Spanish leader, the Duke of Alva), 1567; pacification of Ghent, 1576; northern provinces united in the union of Utrecht, 1579; war concluded, 1609; war renewed, 1621; independence of the Dutch republic acknowledged, 1648; country at its greatest prosperity, middle of 17th century; united with England under William III., 1689-1702; conquered by France, 1794-95; erected into the Batavian Republic, 1795; made a kingdom under Louis Bonaparte, 1806; annexed by France, 1810; union with Belgium in the kingdom of the Netherlands, 1815; revolution in Belgium, 1830; end of the war, 1833; settlement with Belgium, 1839. The constitution was revised in 1848. Area, 12,618 square miles. Population (1893), estimated, 4,732,911. Area of colonial possessions, 833,000 square miles; approximate population, 33,600,000.

Netherlands, Austrian. The name given to the Spanish Netherlands after their cession to Austria in 1713-14. There was an unsuccessful revolt in 1789-90. The provinces were conquered by France in 1794, and ceded to France in 1797. See Belgium.

In his youth the chieftainship was overthrown and his father killed by the Tecpanecs. After many remarkable adventures Netzahualcoyotl, aided by the Mexicans and others, recovered his place in 1430, killing Maxtla, the usurping chief. Thereafter he ruled with great wisdom. He is said to have established a body of wise men, or learned society, and to have built a temple to the invisible supreme deity, forbidding human sacrifices in it. He was known as a sage and poet, and writings, said to be his, are preserved in Spanish translations. The accounts of Netzahualcoyotl rest mainly on the authority of the Tezcuacan historian Ixtlilxochitl, and should be received with caution. Also written Netzahualcoyotl, etc.

Neveu de Rameau (nè-vè' dè rà-mô'), Le. [F., 'The Nephew of Rameau.'] A work by Diderot, written about 1760, but not published till much later. It was translated into German by Goethe in 1805; and in 1860 Jules Janin wrote a sequel in which he explains the somewhat enigmatical hero, a brilliant Bohemian hanger-on.

The strangest of all Diderot's attempts in prose fiction—if it is to be called a fiction and not a dramatic study—is the so-called "Neveu de Rameau," in which, in the guise of a dialogue between himself and a hanger-on of society (or rather a monologue of the latter), the follies and vices, not merely of the time, but of human nature itself, are exposed with a masterly hand, and in a manner wonderfully original and piquant.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 422.

Newcomes (nū'kōmz), The. A novel by Thackeray, published in 1855. The character of Colonel Newcome is one of touching simplicity.

The old colonel is ruined by speculation, and in his ruin is brought to accept the alms of the brotherhood of the Grey Friars. . . . He dons the gown, . . . and occupies the single room, and eats the doled bread, and among his poor brothers sits in the chapel of his order. The description is perhaps as fine as anything that Thackeray ever did. The gentleman is still the gentleman, with all the pride of gentry; but not the less is he the humble bedesman, aware that he is living upon charity, not made to grovel by any sense of shame, but knowing that, though his normal pride may be left to him, an outward demeanour of humility is befitting. And then he dies. "At the usual evening hour the chapel bell began to toll, and Thomas Newcome's hands outside the bed feebly beat time—and just as the last bell struck, a peculiar sweet smile shone over his face, and he lifted up his head a little, and quickly said, "Adsum"—and fell back. It was the word we used at school when names were called; and, lo, he whose heart was as that of a little child had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of his Maker!"

Trollope, Thackeray.

Newdigate (nū'di-gāt), Sir Roger. Born at Arbury, Warwickshire, England, May 30, 1719; died there, Nov. 23, 1806. An English scholar, the founder of the annual Newdigate prize (for English verse) at Oxford. He was member of Parliament for Middlesex (1751-80).

Newfoundland (oftenest nū-found'land; on the island itself generally nū-fund-land'; also nū'fund-land), [Orig. Newfoundland; NL. Terra Nova, F. Terre Neuve, new land.] An island forming a British colonial possession, situated east of British North America. Capital, St. John's. It is bounded on the north by the Strait of Belle Isle (separating it from Labrador), on the east and south by the Atlantic, and on the west by the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It contains the peninsulas of Avalon in the southeast and Petit Nord in the north. The coast is greatly indented, the surface is generally hilly, and there are many lakes. The chief occupation is the fisheries; the island has the largest cod-fisheries in the world, and has also seal-, herring-, salmon-, and lobster-fisheries. It contains productive copper-mines. It forms with eastern Labrador (Department of Labrador) a crown colony, the government being vested in a governor, executive council, legislative council, and house of assembly. It was discovered by John Cabot in 1497; the cod-fishery commenced in the beginning of the 16th century; and the first important settlement was made by the English under Calvert in 1621. There were feuds between English and French fishermen, and by the treaty of 1713 Newfoundland was confirmed to England. Representative government was granted in 1832, and the present form of government was established in 1855. The French rights on the coast, granted in 1713 and 1783, have been a frequent subject of dispute. Area, 42,734 square miles. Population (1892), 203,500.

New France (frāns). The region in North America claimed and in part settled by France. By 1650 it included the basins of the St. Lawrence and of the Great Lakes, with Labrador and the present Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and part of Maine. Conflicts with England arose, and four wars ensued—King William's, Queen Anne's, King George's, and the French and Indian. Quebec and Montreal were the chief settlements. By 1750 New France, with Louisiana added, comprised the St. Lawrence and Great Lakes basins, with the Mississippi basin, though settlements were confined to a few points on the lakes and rivers. Acadia (which see) had been ceded to England in 1713. The result of the treaty of 1763 was the cession of all the region east of the Mississippi to England, and that west of the Mississippi to Spain.

New Galicia. See Nueva Galicia.

Newgate (nū'gāt). The western gate of London wall by which the Watling street left the city. It was at first called Westgate, but later Chancellor's gate. In the reign of Henry I. Chancellor's gate was rebuilt and called Newgate. At about the same time the county of Middlesex was given to the citizens of London, and Newgate was used for prisoners from that county. The use of this locality for a prison continues until the present day, although now only a house of detention is located here. Newgate always had an unsavory reputation, and resisted all efforts at reform. These began as early as the time of Richard Whittington, who left a large sum for its improvement. The prison was burned during the Gordon riots in 1780, and was rebuilt in 1792. Archer; Loftie.

Since executions have ceased to be carried out at Tyburn, they have taken place here. The late amelioration in the condition of prisoners in Newgate is in a great measure due to the exertions of Mrs. Fry, who has left a terrible account of their state even in 1838. Hare, London, l. 166.

Newgate Calendar. A biographical record of the most notorious criminals confined in Newgate.

New Georgia (jōr'jūi). The former name for Vancouver Island and the Pacific coast opposite it.

New Granada (gra-nā'djū), Sp. Nueva Granada (nō-ā'vā grā-nā'frā). An earlier name of the South American country now called Colombia (which see). It was given by the conqueror Quesada (1538), in remembrance of his native province of Granada; at that time the term included only the highlands about Bogotá. Under the colonial presidents (1564-1718) and viceroys (1719-1810) it embraced nearly the present territory of Colombia, except from 1710 to 1722, when Quito (the present Ecuador) was annexed to it. The official title under the viceroys was Nuevo Reino de Granada (New Kingdom of Granada). After the revolution New Granada was retained as a collective name for the provinces composing the old viceroyalty, though they were merged in the republic of Colombia (including also Venezuela and Quito) from 1819 to 1830. In the latter year Venezuela and Quito separated, and the Republic of New Granada was formed in 1831. In 1861, on the adoption of a federal constitution, the name was changed to United States of Colombia (now Republic of Colombia).

New Guinea (gin'i), or Papua (pap'ō-i or pā'pō-i). The largest island in the world, belonging to Melanesia, and situated north of Australia (from which it is separated by Torres Strait). It is bounded on the north, east, and south by the Pacific, and on the southwest by Arafura Sea. The interior has been little explored. There are peninsulas in the northwest and southeast. The mountains (Arfak Hills, Finisterre, Kraitke, etc.) reach in the Charles Louis range the height of about 16,000 feet. The largest river is the Fly. The island is divided between the Dutch in the west (as far east as long. 141°), the Germans in the northeast, and the British in the south. It was first visited by the Portuguese Menezes about 1526, and was chiefly surveyed by the Dutch. The Dutch claim was made in 1848. In 1884 and 1886 the English and German possessions were defined. British New Guinea, under a governor (the cost of administration being borne by the three chief Australian colonies), has an area of about 90,000 square miles, and a population of about 490,000. Kaiser Wilhelm's Land, governed by the German New Guinea Company, has an area of 72,000 square miles, and a population of about 110,000. Dutch New Guinea, attached to the residency of Ternate in the Moluccas, with an area of 150,755 square miles, has a population of about 200,000. Total area, about 313,000 square miles. Total population, about 800,000.

New Hampshire (hamp'shir'). One of the New England States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 42° 40' to 45° 18' N., and from long. 70° 43' to 72° 33' W. Capital, Concord; largest city, Manchester. It is bounded by the province of Quebec, Canada, on the north, Maine and the Atlantic on the east, Massachusetts on the south, and Vermont (separated by the Connecticut) and Quebec on the west. Its surface is mountainous in the north and west, and elsewhere hilly. It contains the White Mountains in the north. It is often called "the Granite State" and "the Switzerland of America." It is largely a manufacturing State, ranking among the leading States in its chief manufactures—cotton, woolen, and worsted. It has 10 counties, sends 2 senators and 2 representatives to Congress, and has 4 electoral votes. It was visited by Fring in 1603, and by Captain John Smith in 1614; formed part of the territory granted to Mason and Gorges in 1622; was settled by the English at Portsmouth and Dover in 1623; was united to Massachusetts in 1641; was separated and made a royal province in 1679; was at times again united, and finally separated in 1741; was often disturbed by Indian wars; and claimed Vermont until 1764. It was one of the 13 original States, being the ninth to ratify the Constitution (1788). Area, 9,305 square miles. Population (1890), 376,530.

New Hampshire Grants. A name given to Vermont in its earlier history.

New Ireland (ir'land), native Tombara (tōm-bā'rā). An island of the Bismarck Archipelago, Pacific Ocean, 20 miles northeast of New Britain, which it generally resembles: called by the Germans since 1885 Neu-Mecklenburg. It was made a German possession in 1884. Length, about 300 miles.

New Jersey (jēr'zi). [Named (1664) after the Isle of Jersey, in honor of Sir George Carteret, lieutenant-governor of that isle (1643-51). He had previously (1650) received a grant of "a certain island and adjacent islets in America in perpetual inheritance, to be called New Jersey" (Dict. Nat. Biog., IX, 209).] One of the North Atlantic States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 38° 56' to 41° 21' N., and from long. 73° 54' to 75° 33' W. Capital, Trenton; largest cities, Newark and Jersey City. It is bounded by New York on the north, New York (separated by the Hudson, New York Bay, and Staten Island Sound) and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, Delaware Bay on the south, and Pennsylvania and Delaware (both separated by the Delaware River) on the west. It is traversed by the Kittatinny and Highland ranges of the Appalachian system in the northwest: the southern half is a plain. It is the first State in the production of zinc, one of the leading iron-producing States, and one of the chief manufacturing States, ranking first in the manufacture of glass and silk, and among the first in the manufacture of leather, iron, hats, rubber, sugar, and steel. It has 21 counties, sends 2 senators and 8 representatives to Congress, and has 10 electoral votes. It was settled by the Dutch at Bergen probably about 1617; granted by the Duke of York to Carteret and Berkeley in 1664; reconquered by the Dutch in 1673; and restored to England in 1674. West Jersey was purchased by Quakers in 1674, East Jersey in 1682. Proprietary government ceased in 1702, New Jersey being made a royal province. It was under the same governor with New York until 1738. It was one of the thirteen original States, and was the scene of the battles of Trenton, Princeton, Monmouth, and other events in the Revolutionary War. Area, 7,815 square miles. Population (1890), 1,444,933.

New Jersey, College of, called popularly Princeton College, and sometimes Nassau Hall. An institution of learning at Princeton, New Jersey. It was chartered in 1746 and 1748, opened at Elizabethtown in 1747, and removed to Newark in 1747 and to Princeton 1757. The buildings were occupied by British and American troops in the Revolutionary War. It contains an academic department and a school of science. The theological seminary in the same town (under Presbyterian control) is not connected with it. The college is attended by about 1,000 students, and the library contains over 90,000 volumes.

New Laws, Sp. Nuevas Ordenanzas (nō-ā'-vās ör-dā-nān'thās). A code of Spanish laws promulgated in Madrid in 1543, and having for their special object the protection of American Indians. They were the outcome of the efforts of Las Casas, and were originally written by him, but were published with some changes. These laws provided that all Indian slaves should be freed unless a legal title to them could be produced by their masters. "Repatriamentos," or grants of Indian labor, were greatly restricted and could not be inherited: civil and ecclesiastical officers were forbidden to hold them. The treatment of slaves was regulated, inspectors were appointed to watch over them, and provision was made for their religious instruction. At the same time some of the old ordinances were suppressed and others were created. The new laws were vehemently opposed by the colonists, who declared that they would be impoverished. The viceroy of Mexico was forced to suspend them, but later (1551) they were enforced by Velasco, and 150,000 male slaves alone were freed. In Peru an attempt to enforce the laws resulted in the rebellion of Gonzalo Pizarro (see Pizarro). They were suspended as to that country in 1547, and by 1560 had become practically non-effective.

New Lebanon (leb'ā-nōn). A town in Colum-

New Orleans (nō'rle-anz). A city in the parish of Orleans, Louisiana, situated on the Mississippi in lat. 29° 53' N., long. 90° 3' W. It is the largest city of Louisiana, the largest and chief commercial city of the Gulf States, and the chief seaport of the Mississippi valley. It borders on Lake Pontchartrain on the north, and is protected by levees. From its shape it is called "the Crescent City." It has the largest cotton-market in the United States, and, besides cotton, exports sugar, molasses, corn, flour, tobacco, rice, wheat, pork, etc. The most prominent buildings are the custom-house, city hall, and St. Charles and St. Louis hotels. The inhabitants are largely creoles and negroes. New Orleans was founded by the French under Bienville in 1718; passed to Spain in 1763, to France in 1800, and to the United States in 1803; has often been ravaged by yellow fever; was seized by the Confederates in 1861, and was reoccupied by the Federals under Butler from May 1, 1862. From 1868 to 1880 it was the State capital. It was the scene of political riots in 1877, and of the lynching of 11 Italians in 1891 suspected of complicity in the murder of the chief of police. Population (1890), 242,639.

New Orleans, Battle of. A victory near New Orleans, Jan. 8, 1815, gained by the Americans (about 6,000) under Andrew Jackson over the British (about 12,000) under Pakenham (killed in the battle). The loss of the British was over 2,000; that of the Americans, who were sheltered by breastworks, 8 killed and 13 wounded.

New South Wales (wälz). [Named by Cook in 1770 from a fancied resemblance to the northern shores of the Bristol Channel.] A British colony in Australia. Capital, Sydney. It is bounded by Queensland on the north, the Pacific Ocean on the east, Victoria on the south, and South Australia on the west. It is traversed from north to south near the coast by a range of mountains, beyond which are vast plains in the interior. The great river-system is that of the Murray. The chief industry is stock-raising, and especially sheep-farming. There are mines of gold, silver, coal, copper, and tin. The exports include wool, tallow, leather, tin, copper, and silver. The executive is vested in a governor, appointed by the crown, with a cabinet of 10 ministers. The legislative power is vested in a legislative council (appointed by the crown for life) and a legislative assembly (elected). A penal settlement was established at Botany Bay in 1788. The development of the wool industry commenced under Governor Macquarie about 1810-21. Gold, though known in 1823, was not worked till 1851. The transportation of convicts ceased in 1853. Area, 368,560 square miles. Population (1893), estimated, 1,223,370.

New Spain (spän), Sp. Nueva España (nö-ä'-vü es-pän'yü). The colonial name of the country now called Mexico. It was first applied by Grijalva (1518) to Yucatan and Tabasco, and was extended by Cortés to all his conquests. Under the viceroys the name was also used for a much larger territory (see New Spain, Viceroyalty of), but New Spain proper, or the kingdom of New Spain, corresponded to the district under the jurisdiction of the audience of Mexico, the present southern Mexico, embracing (nearly) the modern states of Yucatan, Campeche, Tabasco, Vera Cruz, Hidalgo, Oaxaca, Michoacan, Colima, Mexico, Morelos, Tlaxcala, Puebla, Guerrero, and Oajaca.

New Spain, Viceroyalty of. The region governed by the viceroys of Mexico. The first viceroy, Mendoza, took possession in 1535. Under him, and for some time after, the viceroyalty, in its broadest sense, embraced all the Spanish possessions in Central and North America, from the southern boundary of Costa Rica, besides the West Indies and the Spanish East Indies—that is, the five audiences of Mexico, Guadalajara, Condesa, Santo Domingo, and Manila, and the captaincy-general of Florida. But, except in the first two, the viceroy's powers were very limited, and were soon practically restricted to military defense and a few other matters of general importance. During the 18th century the East Indies and Guatemala or Central America were completely separated. The region generally called New Spain, in which the viceroy had complete authority, consisted for a long time of the three kingdoms of New Spain, New Galicia, and New Leon, corresponding to modern Mexico and the undefined territories of New Mexico, Texas, and California, now included in the United States. In 1793 the northern provinces were separated (see Provincias Internas), and thereafter the viceroyalty corresponded nearly to the Mexico of to-day, excluding southern Coahuila, Durango, Sinaloa, Chihuahua, and Sonora, but including Upper and Lower California. The name Mexico finally supplanted that of New Spain in 1822.

Newstead Abbey (nū'sted ab'i). A building in Nottinghamshire, England, 9 miles north of Nottingham; anciently an abbey. It was founded by Henry II, as an atonement for Becket's murder in 1170, and was the home of the family of Lord Byron, obtained by Sir John Byron, his ancestor, at the dissolution of the monasteries in 1540. Numerous relics of Lord Byron are preserved in the house. He undertook to keep it up in 1809, with what remained of his fortune, but was obliged to sell it in 1818.

Newton, Alfred. Born at Geneva, June 11, 1829. A noted English zoologist, professor of zoölogy and comparative anatomy in the University of Cambridge. He has published "The Zoölogy of Ancient Europe" (1862), an edition of "Yarrell's British Birds," etc.; has written many papers on zoölogical, and especially on ornithological, subjects; and his "Dictionary of Birds," an expansion of his articles in the ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," is now (1894) in course of publication. He was president of the British Association in 1883.

Newton, Sir Charles Thomas. Born 1816; died Nov. 28, 1894. An English archaeologist. He graduated at Oxford (Christ Church) in 1837; was appointed assistant curator of antiquities in the British Museum in 1840, and vice-consul at Mytilene in Asia Minor in 1852; discovered the site of the Mausoleum at Halicarnassus in 1856; and later excavated at Cnidus and Branchida. In 1860 he was appointed British consul at Rome, and from 1861 to 1885 was keeper of Greek and Roman antiquities at the British Museum. In 1880 he was appointed professor of archaeology at University College, London. He wrote "A History of Discoveries at Halicarnassus, Cnidus, and Branchida" (1862), "Travels and Discoveries in the Levant" (1865), essays on art and archaeology (1880), etc., and translated Panofka's "Manners and Customs of the Greeks" from the German in 1849.

Newton, Sir Isaac. Born at Woolsthorpe, near Grantham, Lincolnshire, Dec. 25, 1642 (O. S.); died at Kensington, March 20, 1727. A famous English mathematician and natural philosopher. His father, Isaac Newton, was a small freehold farmer. He matriculated at Cambridge (Trinity College) July 8, 1661; was elected to a scholarship April 28, 1664; and graduated in Jan., 1665. At the university he was especially attracted by the study of Descartes's geometry. The method of fluxions is supposed to have first occurred to him in 1665. He was made a fellow of Trinity in 1667, and Lucasian professor at Cambridge in Oct., 1669. He became a fellow of the Royal Society in Jan., 1672. Newton's attention was probably drawn to the subject of gravitation as early as 1665. The story of the fall of the apple was first told by Voltaire, who had it from Mrs. Conduitt, Newton's niece. Kepler had established the laws of the planetary orbits, and from these laws Newton proved that the attraction of the sun upon the planets varies inversely as the squares of their distances. Measuring the actual deflection of the moon's orbit from its tangent, he found it to be identical with the deflection which would be created by the attraction of the earth, diminishing in the ratio of the inverse square of the distance. The hypothesis that the same force acted in each case was thus confirmed. The success of Newton's work really depended on the determination of the length of a degree on the earth's surface by Picard in 1671. The universal law of gravitation was completely elaborated by 1685. The first book of the "Principia" or "Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica" was presented to the Royal Society, April 28, 1686, and the entire work was published in 1687. In 1689 he sat in Parliament for the University of Cambridge, and at this time was associated with John Locke; in 1701 he was re-elected. When his friend Charles Montagu (afterward earl of Halifax) was appointed chancellor of the exchequer, Newton was made warden of the mint, and in 1699 master of the mint. The reformation of English coinage was largely his work. The method of fluxions, which he had discovered, was employed in the calculations for the "Principia," but did not appear until 1693, when it was published by Wallis. It also appeared in 1704 in the first edition of the "Optics." On Feb. 21, 1693, he was elected foreign associate of the French Academy of Sciences. In 1703 he was elected president of the Royal Society, and held the office till his death.

Newton, John. Born at London, July 24, 1725; died there, Dec. 21, 1807. An English clergyman and religious poet. His father was governor of York Fort in Hudson Bay. Newton served in his father's ship before 1742, and was afterward in the navy and in the slave-trade until 1755, when he was made tide-surveyor at Liverpool. Taking up the study of Greek and Hebrew, he was ordained priest June, 1764, and became curate of Olney, where Cowper settled about 1767. They published the "Olney Hymns" together in 1779. In 1780 he was made rector of St. Mary Woolnoth, London. Besides many well-known hymns, he wrote "Cardiphonia" (1781), etc., and an "Authentic Narrative" of his early life (1764).

Newton, John. Born Aug. 24, 1823; died May 1, 1895. An American engineer and general. He graduated at West Point in 1842; served throughout the Civil War, attaining the rank of major-general of volunteers in 1863; was made brigadier-general and chief of engineers in the regular army in 1884; was placed on the retired list in 1886; and was appointed commissioner of public works at New York in 1887, a position which he resigned in 1888 to accept the presidency of the Panama Railroad Company. His chief engineering feat was the improvement of Hell Gate channel by the blasting of Hallett's Reef Sept. 24, 1876, and Flood Rock, Oct. 10, 1885.

Newton, R. The pseudonym under which Edward Cave began printing "The Gentleman's Magazine" in 1731.

Newton, Thomas. Born at Butley, Cheshire, about 1542; died at Little Ilford, Essex, May, 1607. An English divine and poet. He translated Seneca's "Thebais," and in 1581 collected the ten English translations of Seneca's tragedies. In 1575 he published a history and chronicle of the Saracens and Turks, etc. He was regarded as one of the best writers of Latin verse.

Newton, Thomas. Born at Lichfield, England, Jan. 1, 1704; died at London, Feb. 14, 1782. An English bishop and author. He wrote "Dissertations on the Prophecies" (1754-58) and annotations on Milton's "Paradise Lost" and "Paradise Regained."

Newton-Abbot (nū'ton-ab'ot). A small town in Devonshire, England, situated on the Teign 14 miles south by west of Exeter. William of Orange was here proclaimed king of England in 1688.

Newton-in-Makerfield (-mak'er-fēld), or Newton-le-Willows (-le-wil'öz). A town in Lancashire, England, 15 miles east of Liverpool. Population (1891), 12,861.

Newton- (or Newtown-) Stewart (-stū'ärt). A town in Wigtonshire, Scotland, on the Cree 7 miles north of Wigtown. Pop. (1891), 2,738.

Newtown (nū'toun). A town in Montgomeryshire, Wales, situated on the Severn 8 miles southwest of Montgomery. It is the center of the Welsh flannel manufacture. Population (1891), 6,610.

Newtown. The name given, during its earliest history, to what is now Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Newtown. A suburb of Sydney, New South Wales.

Newtownards (nū-tñ-ärdz'). A town in County Down, Ireland, situated near Strangford Lough 9½ miles east of Belfast. Population (1891), 9,197.

Newtown-Barry (nū'toun-bar'i). A village in County Wexford, Ireland, where, June 1, 1798, a force of about 350 repulsed an attack made by upward of 10,000 rebels.

Newtown-Butler (-but'lër). A place in County Fermanagh, Ireland, 73 miles northwest of Dublin. Here, in 1689, the Irish Protestants defeated the Irish Catholics.

New Ulster (ul'stër). A name formerly given to what is now the North Island of New Zealand.

New Way to Pay Old Debts, A. A play by Philip Massinger, printed in 1632, but acted before that date, and since repeatedly revived up to the present time.

I have no doubt in calling his [Massinger's] real masterpiece by far the fine tragic-comedy of "A New Way to Pay Old Debts." The revengeful trick by which a satellite of the great extortioner, Sir Giles Overreach, brings about his employer's discomfiture, regardless of his own ruin, is very like the dénouement of the Brass and Quip part of the "Old Curiosity Shop," may have suggested it (for "A New Way to Pay Old Debts" lasted as an acting play well into Dickens's time), and, like it, is a little improbable. But the play is an admirable one, and Overreach (who, as is well known, was supposed to be a kind of study of his half-namesake, Mompesson, the notorious monopolist) is by far the best single character that Massinger ever drew. Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 399.

New Westminster (west'miu-stër). A town in British Columbia, situated on Fraser River in lat. 49° 13' N., long. 122° 54' W. It was formerly the capital. Population, about 3,000.

New Wonder, A: A Woman Never Vext. A comedy by Chapman, printed in 1632.

New World, The. North and South America; the western hemisphere.

New York (york). One of the Middle States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 40° 30' to 45° 1' N., and from long. 71° 51' to 79° 46' W. Capital, Albany; chief city, New York. It is bounded by the province of Ontario, Canada (mostly separated by Lake Ontario and the St. Lawrence) on the north, Vermont (partly separated by Lake Champlain), Massachusetts, and Connecticut on the east, the Atlantic Ocean, New York Bay, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania (partly separated by the Delaware) on the south, and the Niagara River on the west. Long Island and Staten Island are included in it. The surface is greatly diversified. The Adirondack Mountains are in the northeast, and the Catskill Mountains, Shawangunk Mountains, Highlands, and Taconic Mountains in the east. The State belongs chiefly to the Hudson and St. Lawrence river-systems, but in part also to those of the Mississippi, Susquehanna, and Delaware. It contains many lakes, including Lakes George, Oneida, Cayuga, Seneca, Chautauqua, Oswego, Otsego, and Canandaigua, and is noted for picturesque scenery. It is called "the Empire State." It is the first State in the Union in commerce, manufactures, population, and estimated value of property; and the second State in value of farms. The agricultural products include buckwheat, barley, oats, rye, Indian corn, wheat, hay, potatoes, milk, butter, and cheese. The chief mineral products are salt, iron, and building-stone. It has 60 counties, sends 2 senators and 34 representatives to Congress, and has 36 electoral votes. The principal early Indian inhabitants were Iroquois (Five Nations). The bay of New York was entered by Verrazano in 1524. Explorations were made in the north by Champlain in 1609, and in the south by Hudson in 1609. The first settlements were made by the Dutch on Manhattan Island in 1614 (or 1613). The region (called New Netherlands) was ruled by the Dutch governors Minuit, Wouter van Twiller, Kieft, and Stuyvesant; devastated by an Indian war about 1614; and conquered by the English under Nicolls in 1664. New York, New Jersey, and New England were consolidated under Androia in 1686-89. New York was the scene of many events in the French and Indian war. It was one of the thirteen original States, and was the scene of Burgoyne's surrender (1777) and other events in the Revolutionary War and in the War of 1812. The western part of the State was rapidly developed in the beginning of the 19th century. A new constitution was adopted in 1846. Area, 49,170 square miles. Population (1890), 5,997,853.

New York. [Named after York in England, with reference to the Duke of York, afterward James II.] A seaport and city in the State of New York, coextensive with the county of New York, situated chiefly on Manhattan Island, bordering on New York Bay and the Hudson (or North) and East rivers, in lat. 40° 43' N., long. 74° 0' W. Besides Manhattan Island, it comprises the annexed district north of the Harlem River, and islands in the East River and New York Bay (including Randall's, Ward's, Blackwell's, Governor's, Bedloe's, and Ellis islands). It is the largest city of the western hemisphere; after London and Paris, the largest in the world; and, after London, the chief commercial city in the world. It is the chief place of arrival for immigrants, and has more than half of the foreign trade of the country. It is the terminus of numerous steamship lines to all parts of the world, and also of many coasting lines and of railroads. Its varied manufactures include clothing, boots and shoes, bread, furniture, cigars, beer, machinery, books, etc. It is connected by ferries with Jersey City and Hoboken on the west, and by ferries and Brooklyn Bridge (which see) with Brooklyn on the east, and is traversed by four lines of elevated railroads. Central Park is the chief park; Broadway the main business artery; Fifth Avenue the principal fashionable street; and Wall street the financial center. The city is the seat of Columbia College, the University of the City of New York, Union Theological Seminary, and the Protestant Episcopal Seminary, and of the Astor, Mercantile, and Lenox Libraries, Metropolitan Art Museum, Cooper Institute, and Museum of Natural History. The old city hall, founded in 1803, while of moderate size, is not surpassed by any other example of architecture in the city. The style is the English Renaissance, and the plan presents a central pavilion flanked by wings which at their extremities project toward the front. The building has 2 stories above the basement, the central pavilion having in addition an attic and a projecting porch of 8 Ionic columns above a broad flight of steps. The central pavilion and the projecting portions of the wings are ornamented with orders of pilasters, Ionic below and Corinthian above, and with engaged arcades framing the windows. There is a small unadorned and domed central tower, surmounted by a figure of Liberty. The governor's room is adorned with an interesting collection of historical portraits. Other prominent buildings are the post-office, Produce exchange, cotton exchange, custom-house, Roman Catholic cathedral, Trinity Church, and Madison Square Garden (which see). The city was settled by the Dutch in 1623, and called at first New Amsterdam—Manhattan Island being purchased from Indians for $24 in 1626. It was surrendered to the English in 1664, retaken in 1673, and restored in 1674; was the scene of Leisler's unsuccessful insurrection in 1689-1691, and of the supposed negro plot in 1714; was occupied by the British in Sept., 1776; and was evacuated by them Nov. 25, 1783. It was the State capital from 1784 to 1797, and the capital of the United States from 1790 to 1800. A great fire occurred in 1815; the As or Place riot in 1849; the Crystal Palace Industrial Exhibition in 1853; the draft riots in July, 1863; and the Orange riot July 12, 1871. (See New York, Greater, below.) Population (1890), 1,513,301, according to the national census; according to a municipal census, 1,710,715; police census, April, 1895, 1,849,866.

New York, Greater. A projected municipality, to include New York, Brooklyn (Kings County), Long Island City, Staten Island, Westchester, Flushing, Newtown, Jamaica, and parts of East Chester and Pelham. In 1894 the question was submitted to the vote of these places, and they declared in favor of consolidation. A bill for that purpose was accordingly introduced in the legislature in 1895, but it failed to become a law.

New York, University of the City of. An institution of learning at New York, founded in 1831. It contains faculties of art, science, law, and medicine, and has (1894) 98 instructors and 903 students.

New York Bay. The bay at the mouth of the Hudson on which New York city is situated. It includes New York Upper Bay, the harbor formed by the union of the North and East rivers, partly inclosed by New York city, New Jersey, Staten Island, and Long Island (length about 6 miles), and New York Lower Bay, an arm of the Atlantic east of Staten Island and southwest of Long Island, communicating with the Upper Bay by the Narrows.

New Zealand (zē'land). A group of islands, a British colonial possession, in the Pacific Ocean, situated southeast of Australia, and included mostly between lat. 34° 20' and 47° 30' S., and long. 166° 30' and 178° 30' E. Capital, Wellington. It includes North Island, South Island, and Stewart Island. The North Island is somewhat mountainous, the South Island largely so (the southern Alps culminate in Mount Cook, 12,349 feet). The chief industry is agriculture; the leading exports are gold, wool, sheep, agricultural products, etc. Government is vested in a governor, appointed by the crown, and a general assembly consisting of a legislative council (appointed by the crown, now for 7 years) and a house of representatives (elected). The group was discovered by Tasman in 1642, and was visited by Cook. A missionary settlement was made in 1814. The settlers have been often at war with the natives (Maoris), especially in 1809-61 and 1863-66. Area, 104,471 square miles. Population (estimated, 1893), 672,265.

Ney (nā), Michel, Duc d'Elchingen, Prince de la Moskowa. Born at Saarlouis (now in Prussia), Jan. 10, 1769; shot at Paris, Dec. 7, 1815. A celebrated French marshal. He entered the army in 1787; became a general of brigade in 1796; obtained command on the Rhine in 1799; gained the victory of Elchingen Oct. 14, 1805 (for which he was created duke of Elchingen); took part in the battles of Jena Oct. 14, 1806, Eylau Feb. 7-8, 1807, and Friedland June 14, 1807; served in Spain 1808-11; rendered important service at Borodino Sept. 7, 1812 (for which he was created prince of the Moskwa); commanded the rear-guard in the retreat from Russia in 1812; served at Lützen May 2, Bautzen May 20-21, and Leipzig Oct. 16-19, 1813; was defeated by Von Bulow at Dennewitz Sept. 6, 1813; served in the campaign of 1814; was made a peer after the restoration in 1814 by Louis XVIII.; deserted to Napoleon in 1815; was defeated by Wellington at Quatre-Bras June 16, 1815; and commanded the Old Guard at Waterloo June 18. He was condemned by the House of Peers as a traitor, and shot.

Nez d'un Notaire (nā dnū nō-tār'), Le. [F., 'The Nose of a Notary.'] A romance by Edmond About, published in 1862.

Nezhin, or Nejin, or Niezhin (nye'zhēn). A town in the government of Tchernigoff, Russia, situated on the Oster 41 miles south-east of Tchernigoff. It was formerly of commercial importance. Population (1890), 44,794.

Nez Percé. See Chopunnish.

Ngala (ngā'lä), or Bangala (bāng-gā'lä). A Bantu tribe of the Kougo State, settled on the Kongo River where it bends to the southwest, between the Balolo, Baloi, and Babangi. Strong and brave, though notorious as cannibals, they furnish good soldiers for the Kongo State army. See Mbangala.

Ngalanganja (ngā-lāng-gā'jä). See Garen-ganze and Nyamwezi.

Ngambue (ngām'bwē), or Bangambue (bāng-gām'bwē). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa, settled on the Kakulovaro River in the highland back of Mossamedes. They are kinsmen of the Nyanka tribe, and, like these, peaceful agriculturists owning cattle.

Ngami (ngā'mē), Lake. A lake in southern Africa, situated about lat. 20° 30' S., long. 22° 40' E. It was discovered by Livingstone in 1849, and falls within the sphere of British South Africa.

Nganga (ngāng'gā), or Manganga (māng-gāng'gā). A Bantu tribe in British Nyassaland, at the south end of Lake Nyassa. The mountaineers are called Kintundu, the dwellers of the plain Chipeta: their dialects are slightly different. The Nganga language has a rising literature, most of which is printed in the Scotch mission stations. It is also spoken by the Makololo, who, left on the Shire by Livingstone, have become powerful by accessions from neighboring tribes. Also called Wanyassa.

Ngangela (ngāng-gā'lä), or Ovangangela (ō-vāng-gāng-gā'lä). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa, east of the Upper Kunene and Kuanza rivers. They are clever iron-workers and wax-hunters, belonging to the same cluster as the Ovimbundu. Also Bangangela.

Nganhwei. See Auhwei.

Ngindo (ngēn'dō), or Wangindo (wāng-gēn'dō). A Bantu tribe of German East Africa, spread over a vast area between the Rufiji and Umbekuru rivers, and between their kinsmen the Wakihi and the Machonde. Their chests and arms are tattooed, and two incisors are sharpened. They have always opposed the slave-trade. The language is called Kingindo, the country Ungindo.

Ngola (ngō'lä). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa, whose adapted name (Angola) is also applied to the native Angola nation and to the Portuguese province of Angola. The king of Ngola, whose residence used to be at Loanda, was driven by the Portuguese first to Pungo Andongo, and then to the Kamubu and Hamba valleys, where his people still dwell in complete independence. The Ngola people are slender, dark-colored, oval-faced, with fine features and extremities, shrewd and warlike, agricultural and pastoral. Their hair is plaited and shaped into various patterns. Their dialect in its purity is the base of Kimbundu. Ndongo, Matamba, and Ndanji are the three provinces of the Ngola kingdom. Jinga is the name generally used by the Portuguese for Ngola or Ndongo.

Ngornu. See Angornu.

Nguru (ngō'rō). A mountainous and fertile district west of Zanzibar, drained by the Lusuru and Luiza rivers. The population is dense, and consists of the Wanguru, Wahuima, and Wachambala tribes, whose villages are fortified by stockades. See also Kanari.

Niagara (nī-ag'a-rā). A river in North America which flows from Lake Erie northward into Lake Ontario. It separates New York on the east from the province of Ontario, Canada, on the west. Length, 32 miles. It descends about 326 feet in rapids and cataract. See Niagara Falls.

Niagara. A town in Niagara County, New York, situated on the river Niagara, and containing the villages of Niagara Falls and Suspension Bridge. Population (1890), 10,979.

Niagara, Battle of. See Lundy's Lane.

Niagara Falls. The largest cataract in the world, situated in the Niagara River 17 miles north-northwest of Buffalo. It is divided by Goat Island into the American Fall (64 feet high) and the Canadian (or Horseshoe) Fall (150 feet high). The width of the river at the brink of the fall is 4,750 feet. The water-power of the falls (the total amount of which is believed to be several millions of horse-power—much more than all the steam-power and water-power utilized in the United States) is now, in small part, utilized by means of turbine water-wheels set at the bottom of shafts 140 feet deep and connected with a tunnel for the escape of the water, which empties below the town of Niagara.

Niagara Falls, from the Canadian side. A painting by F. E. Chureh (1857), in the Coreoran gallery, Washington. The same artist's painting of Niagara from the American side is in the Stewart collection, New York.

Niagara Falls. A village in Niagara County, New York, situated opposite Niagara Falls. Population (1890), 5,502.

Niagara of Brazil. The cataract of Paulo Afonso on the river São Francisco.

Niagusta (nē-ä-gös'tä), or Nausa (nou'sä). A town in Macedonia, European Turkey, 52 miles west of Saloniki. It is noted for its wine. Population, estimated, 5,000.

Niam-Niam. See Nyam-Nyam.

Niantic. See Narraganset.

Nias (nē-äs'). An island west of Sumatra, situated in lat. 1° N. Length, 95 miles.

Niassa. See Nyassa.

Nibelungenlied (nō'be-lōng-en-lēd). [G., 'Song of the Nibelungs.'] A Middle High German epic poem, written in its present form by an unknown author in South Germany in the first half of the 13th century. The legends, however, are much earlier, having been handed down orally. Its hero, Siegfried, is a mythical prince and later king of Niderland (the region about Xanten on the lower Rhine), who possessed the so-called "hoard of the Nibelungs," won by him in Norway. He wooed Brunhild, a princess of Island, for the Burgundian king Gunther, whose sister, Kriemhild, became his wife. He was afterward treacherously slain, and the hoard was ultimately sunk in the Rhine. The Nibelungenlied is the greatest monument of early German literature. Historical and mythical elements are mingled in it. Wagner's "Ring of the Nibelungs" has taken little except names from the German epic. The source of his material is the Old Norse version of the legend contained in the Volunga Saga and the Edda. See Ring des Nibelungen.

Nibelungs (nē'be-lōngz), The, G. Nibelungen (nē'be-lōng-en). In German legend, originally a race of Northern dwarfs, so called from their king Nibelung; then applied to the followers of Siegfried (the conquerors of the hoard of the Nibelungs); later identified with the Burgundians.

Niblo's Garden. A theater on Broadway, near Prince street, New York city. It is one of the oldest in the city, having been opened in 1828 as the Sans Souci: in 1829 it was a concert saloon. Niblo's garden and theater, owned by William Niblo, were opened in 1839, burned in 1846 and in 1872, and reopened the latter year. It was taken down in 1895.

Nicæa (nī-sē'ä), Anglicized as Nice (nēs). [Gr. Nikaia.] In ancient geography, a town in Bithynia, Asia Minor, situated on Lake Aseania 58 miles southeast of Constantinople: the modern Isnik. It was built in the 4th century B. C., and was one of the chief cities of Bithynia; was the seat of the first general church council in 325 A. D., and of the seventh in 787; and was taken by the Crusaders in 1097, and by the Turks in 1330.

Nicæa (in France). [Gr. Nikaia.] See Nice.

Nicæa, Empire of. A Greek empire (1206-61), founded by Theodore Lascaris, which had its center at Nicæa, Asia Minor, during the period of the Latin Empire at Constantinople. It was merged in the restored Byzantine empire in 1261.

Nicander (nī-kan'dēr). [Gr. Nikandros.] Lived probably in the 2d century B. C. A Greek poet, grammarian, and physician, author of two extant poems on venomous animals and poisons.

Nicander (nē-kän'dēr), Karl August. Born at Strengnäs, Sweden, March 20, 1799; died Feb. 7, 1839. A Swedish poet. The death of his father while he was a child left him without means, and in early life he was a tutor. His first important work was the dramatic poem "Runevaldet" (1821), whose motive is the conflict between heathenism and Christianity. Two poems, "Tassos dod" ("The Death of Tasso") and "Konung Enzo" ("King Enzo"), the former of which won the prize of the Swedish Academy, were on Italian subjects. He was now (1827) enabled to undertake a journey to Rome, which, however, ended disastrously in that he was left, without means, to make his way home as best he could. Subsequently he was given a subordinate position in the public service, and made some translations for the royal theater. "Minnen från Söder" ("Reminiscences of the South"), a description of his travels, appeared in 1831. This was followed by "Hesperiden" ("The Hesperides"), a volume of poems and tales. His last work was the poem "Lejonet i Oknen" ("The Lion in the Wilderness"), a eulogy of Napoleon. His life to within a few years of his death, when his literary work at last yielded him an income sufficient for his needs, was almost a constant struggle with want. His collected works appeared at Stockholm in 1877, in 2 vols.

Nicaragua (nik-a-rā'gwā or nē-kā-rā'gwā). One of the five republics of Central America. Capital, Managua; chief city, Leon. It is bounded by Honduras on the northwest and north, the Caribbean Sea on the east, Costa Rica on the south, and the Pacific on the west, and is traversed from southeast to northwest by a depression including the river San Juan and Lakes Nicaragua and Managua (the route of the proposed ship canal). Much of the eastern coast included in the Mosquito Reservation is low (see Mosquitia). There are numerous volcanoes; earthquakes are frequent and sometimes violent. The most important exports are coffee, hides, cabinet-woods, rubber, fruits, and gold; silver mining, formerly a very important industry, has been abandoned. The inhabitants are Spanish creoles, Indians, a few negroes, and mixed races. Spanish is the common language, and the state religion is Roman Catholic. The chief executive is a president, chosen for 4 years; and congress consists of a senate and chamber of deputies. Columbus coasted the eastern side of Nicaragua in 1502, but it was first explored from the Pacific side by Gil Gonzalez Davila in 1521-22. It was settled 1524-25 by Francisco Hernandez de Cordoba, acting for Pedrarias. During the colonial period it was a province of Guatemala. Independence was proclaimed in 1821, and from 1823 to 1839 Nicaragua was a state in the Central American Federation. Since 1840 it has been an independent republic. Civil wars and struggles with the other Central American republics have been frequent. The filibuster Walker held a part of the country 1855-56. Area, about 49,000 square miles. Population (estimated, 1894), 360,000.

Nicaragua, Lake. [See Nicarao.] A lake in the southern part of Nicaragua. It receives the waters of Lake Managua by the Tipitapa, and has its outlet in the San Juan. The surface is 110 feet above sea-level, the depth varying from 12 to 83 feet. There are several islands, the largest, Ometepe, containing two volcanic peaks. Length, 92 miles; greatest width, 40 miles.

Nicaragua Canal. A proposed ship-canal between the Pacific Ocean and the Caribbean Sea, crossing the republic of Nicaragua and utilizing the natural waterway furnished by Lake Nicaragua and the San Juan River. Partial surveys of this route were made by Americans in 1826 and 1837-1838, and more complete ones for the United States government in 1872-73 by Commander E. P. Lull, and in 1885 by A. G. Menocal. The Nicaraguan government made concessions for constructing the canal to Americans in 1849 and 1880 and to a Frenchman in 1858, but they all lapsed without results. In 1884 a treaty was signed for the construction of the canal by the United States government, but the Senate refused to ratify it. In 1887 the Nicaraguan government granted a new concession for 100 years (confirmed by Costa Rica) to the Nicaraguan Canal Company, by which it was transferred to the Maritime Canal Company; the latter was organized May 4, 1889, under a charter from the United States government, and it agreed to complete the work within five years. The route decided upon is from San Juan del Norte on the Caribbean Sea to Brito on the Pacific coast, a distance of 169 miles. Of this about 117 miles is through the lake and the San Juan River, and in the remainder advantage can be taken of river-basins, so that the actual excavations will not exceed 27 miles. There are to be two canals proper, each with three locks: one from Ochoa on the San Juan River to the port of San Juan del Norte (about 35 miles, including the river-basins), and the other from Lake Nicaragua, at the mouth of the river Lajas, to Brito (17 miles). The locks are to bring the canals to the necessary summit level, which in the lake is 110 feet. The deepest excavation will be on the eastern section where it crosses the eastern divide: here, for 3 miles, the average depth to be excavated is 141 feet. Subsidiary works are a dam at Ochoa, improvement of the river and lake channels, improvement of the harbor of San Juan del Norte, and the construction of a harbor at Brito, with the building of a short railroad for the transportation of machinery. The work was undertaken by the Nicaragua Construction Company, organized under the laws of Colorado June 10, 1887. This company purchased a part of the plant which had been used on the Panama Canal, and actual work was commenced at San Juan June 3, 1889. A great part of the necessary railroad was built and improvements of the harbor of San Juan (said to have been unsuccessful) were made. Work practically ceased from lack of funds in Dec., 1892, and on Aug. 30, 1893, the Nicaragua Construction Company went into the hands of a receiver. Measures for forming a new construction company commenced soon after. American engineers have generally favored the Nicaragua route as compared with other proposed canal-routes across the Isthmus. The chief objection raised to it, principally by French engineers, is the supposed liability of the canal to injury from earthquakes or volcanic eruptions.

Nicarao (nē-kā-rā'ō), or Nicaragua. A Central American Indian chief, whose tribe occupied territory near a large lake, subsequently called Lake Nicaragua (Nicarao-agua, 'water of Nicarao') by the Spaniards, from his name. The tribe was powerful and rich. Gil Gonzalez Davila first visited them in 1522, and obtained much gold by trading. See Nicarao.

Nicarao (nē-kā-rā'ōs), or Nicaraguas (nē-kā-rā'gwāz), or Niquirans (nē-kē-rānz'). [From the name of their chief.] A tribe of Indians which, at the time of the conquest, inhabited western Nicaragua, between Lake Nicaragua and the Pacific. The Nicaraos appear to have been a distant offshoot of the Nahuatlcan stock. They were early subdued by the Spaniards, and their descendants form part of the peasant population of the same district.

Nicaria (nē-kā-rē'ā). An island in the Ægean Sea, belonging to the Sperades, 13 miles west of Samos: the ancient Icaria. It is a Turkish possession. Length, 25 miles.

Nicastro (nē-kās'trō). A town in the province of Catanzaro, Calabria, Italy, situated in lat. 39° N., long. 16° 22' E. Population (1881), 10,239; commune, 14,076.

Nicola Pisano. See Pisano.

Niccolini (nēk-kō-lē'nē), Giovanni Battista. Born at San Giuliano, near Pisa, Italy, Oct. 29, 1782; died at Florence, Sept. 20, 1861. An Italian poet, an imitator of Alfieri. Among his dramas are "Polyxena" (1811), "Nabucco" (1819), "Antonio Foscarini" (1827), "Arnaldo da Brescia" (1835).

Nice (nēs). A former countship, later a province, of Sardinia. The western part was ceded to France in 1860, and comprised in the department of Alpes-Maritimes.

Nice, It. Nizza (nēt'sü). A seaport and the capital of the department of Alpes-Maritimes, France, situated on the Mediterranean in lat. 43° 42' N., long. 7° 17' E.: the ancient Nicæa. It is one of the largest winter health-resorts of the Riviera, picturesquely situated at the foot of the Alps. It exports fruit, and has manufactures of oil and perfumes. The principal places of resort are the Promenade des Anglais and the Jardin Public. Nice was founded by Massilians in the 5th century B. C. In the middle ages it belonged to the county of Provence. It was sacked by the Saracens; passed to Savoy in 1388; was captured by Barbarossa; passed to France in 1792, and again to Sardinia in 1814; and was ceded to France in 1860. It was severely damaged by earthquake in 1887. It was the birthplace of Masséna and Garibaldi. Population (1891), 83,273.

Nice (in Bithynia). See Nicæa.

Nice, Councils of. See Nicene Councils.

Nice, Truce of. A truce concluded at Nice, in 1538, between Francis I. of France and the emperor Charles V.

Nicene Councils. Two general councils which met at Nicæa in Asia Minor. The first Nicene Council, which was also the first general council, met in 325, condemned Arianism, and promulgated the Nicene Creed in its earlier form. The second Nicene Council, accounted also the seventh general council, was held in 787, and condemned the Iconoclasts. The recognition of the first Nicene Council as ecumenical has been almost universal among Christians of all confessions. It is acknowledged to the present day not only by the Roman Catholic and Greek churches, and by many Protestant churches, but by Nestorians, Jacobites, and Copts. The Anglican Church does not accept the second Nicene Council as ecumenical.

Nicene Creed or Symbol. A summary of the chief tenets of the Christian faith, first set forth as of ecumenical authority by the first Nicene Council (325), but closely similar in wording to ancient creeds of Oriental churches, and specially founded upon the baptismal creed of the Church of Cæsarea in Palestine.

Nicephorus (nī-sef'ō-rus) I. [Gr. Νικηφόρος.] Born at Seleucia, Pisidia; killed 811, Byzantine emperor 802-811. He was at war with Harun-al-Rashid and with the Bulgarians.

Nicephorus II. Phocas. Born about 912; assassinated 969. Byzantine emperor 963-969. He was distinguished, both before and after his accession, as a general in wars with the Saracens.

Nicephorus III. Byzantine emperor 1078-81. Nicephorus Bryennius (bri-en'i-us). Born at Orestias, Macedonia; died after 1137. A Byzantine historian, husband of Anna Comnena. He wrote a Byzantine history which was completed by his wife.

Nicephorus Callistus (ka-lis'tus). Died in the middle of the 14th century. A Byzantine ecclesiastical historian.

Nicephorus Gregoras (greg'ō-ras). Born in Asia Minor, 1295; died about 1359. A Byzantine historian. He wrote a Byzantine history.

Nicephorus Patriarcha (pā-tri-ār'kē). Born 758; died 828. A Byzantine historian, patriarch of Constantinople 806-815. He wrote a Byzantine history, "Breviarium" (ed. by J. Bekker), and a chronology.

Nicetas Acominatus (nī-sē'tas-a-kom-i-nā'tus) or Choniatas (kō-nī-ā-tēz). Born in Phrygia, Asia Minor; died at Nicæa, Bithynia, about 1216. A Byzantine historian. He wrote a Byzantine history (ed. by J. Bekker).

Nice Valour, The, or the Passionate Madman. A comedy by Fletcher and another (Middleton, according to Fleay), printed in 1647, but produced much earlier (before 1624). In this play is "Hence, all you vain delights," a song which formed the basis of Milton's "Il Penseroso."

Nichol (nik'ol), John. Born Sept. 8, 1833; died Oct. 11, 1894. A Scottish writer and lecturer, son of J. P. Nichol; professor of English literature in Glasgow University from 1861 to 1880. He has published "Fragments of Criticism" (1860), "English Composition" (1870), "The Death of Themistocles, and Other Poems" (1881), "American Literature: an Historical Review" (1882), etc.

Nichol (nik'ol), John Pringle. Born at Brechin, Scotland, Jan. 13, 1804; died near Rothesay, Scotland, Sept. 19, 1859. A Scottish astronomer. He wrote "Views of the Architecture of the Heavens" (1838), "The Stellar Universe" (1847), "The Planetary System" (1848-50), etc.

Nicholas (nik'ō-las), Saint. [Prop. spelled Nicolas; F. Nicolas (also Nicote, whence E. Nicol, Nicoll, Nichol, Nichols, etc.), Sp. Nicolás, Pg. Nicoláo, It. Nicola, Nicolo, D. Niklaas, Klass, G. Nikolaus, Niklas, Klaus, Russ. Nikolai, Nikola, L. Nicolaus, also Nicolas, from Gr. Νικόλαος, later forms of which are Νικόλας and Νικόλεως, victor of the people.] Lived about 300 A. D. A noted bishop of Myra, Lycia, Asia Minor. He has been adopted as the patron saint of Russia, and is also regarded as the patron saint of seafaring men, thieves, virgins, and children. He is a prominent saint of the Greek Church, and his festival is celebrated Dec. 6. He owes his position as Santa Claus (corruption of Sant Nicolaus) to the legend that he wished to preserve the three daughters of a poor nobleman from dishonor when the father, having no money for marriage portions, was about to force them to support themselves by a degrading life. St. Nicholas, passing the house at night, threw a purse of gold in an open window for three nights in succession, thus furnishing a dowry for each daughter. On the third night the nobleman watched for and discovered him, but the saint made him promise not to reveal his munificence. From this incident is said to be derived the custom of placing gifts in the shoes or stockings of children on the eve of St. Nicholas's day, and attributing the gifts to Santa Claus. The custom has in some countries been transferred to Christmas. The election of a boy bishop on St. Nicholas's day (Dec. 6) is an ancient ceremony. The custom prevailed in English cathedrals, grammar-schools, etc., but especially at Salisbury. The actors were the choristers, and the boy bishop was chosen from among them. He held a burlesque jurisdiction until Innocent's day (Dec. 29). The ritual was an exact burlesque of the episcopal function. The custom died out with the establishment of Protestantism, but lingered in the Eton Montem, a celebration now abolished.

Nicholas I., surnamed "The Great." Pope 858-867. He maintained the papal authority in dealing with Lothair, king of Lorraine. He recognized the Pseudo-Isidorian Decretals.

Nicias, Peace of. A truce between Athens and Sparta in the Peloponnesian War, concluded 421 B. C. It was negotiated mainly by Nicias.

Nicias (nish'i-as) of Athens. A Greek painter, a contemporary of Praxiteles. When Praxiteles was asked which of his works in marble he valued most, he is said to have answered, "Those on which Nicias has set his mark"; and Pliny explains this expression by the comment, "So much importance did Praxiteles attach to the circumlination (covering of color) applied by Nicias." This passage was for a long time the principal foundation for the theory that the Greeks painted their statues, which is now confirmed by the works themselves: the hair of the Hermes of Praxiteles had a red color when discovered.

Nick, Old. See Old Nick.

Nicobars (nik-ō-bärz'), or Nicobar (nik-ō-bärz') Islands. A group of small islands situated in the Bay of Bengal, south of the Andaman Islands, about lat. 7° to 9° N. It is a British possession, a dependency of the Andaman Islands, annexed in 1869. The largest island is Great Nicobar. Area, 434 square miles. Population, about 7,000.

Nicodemus (nik-ō-dē'mus). [Gr. Νικόδημος.] In New Testament history, a member of the Sanhedrim, a disciple who visited Jesus by night as an inquirer. After the death of Jesus he contributed a mixture of aloes and myrrh for anointing the dead body.

Nicol (nik'ol), William. Born about 1768; died at Edinburgh, 1851 (?). A British inventor and experimenter in natural philosophy. In 1828 he invented the prism for polarizing light, named from him the Nicol prism, or nicol. His life was almost entirely spent in his laboratory at Edinburgh.

Nicolai (nik'ō-li). Christoph Friedrich. Born at Berlin, March 18, 1733; died Jan. 6, 1811. A German author and bookseller. He edited the periodical "Allgemeine deutsche Bibliothek," and wrote "Anekdoten von Friedrich II." (1788-92), the novel "Leben und Meinungen des Herrn Magisters Sebaldus Nothacker" (1773-76), etc.

He was the literary associate of Lessing and Moses Mendelssohn in the "Letters concerning Recent German Literature" and the "Universal German Library," published between 1759 and 1792. . . . Soon after the appearance of Goethe's "Sorrows of Werther," Nicolai published a malicious and rather stupid parody entitled "The Joys of Werther." . . . He has been called the Erz-Philister—the arch-representative of the commonplace, conventional element in German literature. . . . Goethe was provoked into using the only weapon which he considered fitting—ridicule; and he was assisted by Nicolai's own indiscretion. The latter, whose literary materialism was his prominent quality,—who fought the spiritual element as Luther fought the devil,—was visited in 1791 with an avenging malady. He was troubled by apparitions of persons living and dead, who filled his room, and for several weeks continued to haunt and torment him although he knew them to be phantasms. He was finally relieved by the application of leeches about the end of the spine, whence Goethe's term Proktophantasmist [in "Faust," which may be delicately translated as "Rump-visionary." . . . He died in 1811, after having seen himself pilloried in the "Walpurgis-Night." B. Taylor, Notes to Faust.

Nicolai, Otto. Born at Königsberg, Prussia, June 9, 1810; died at Berlin, May 11, 1849. A German composer and conductor. He founded the Philharmonic concerts at Vienna (1842) during the period (1811-47) when he was kapellmeister of the court opera there. His chief work, a comic opera, "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor" ("The Merry Wives of Windsor"), was produced in 1849.

Nicuesa (nē-kō-ä'si), Diego de. Born at Baüza, about 1465; died March (?), 1511. A Spanish commander. He went to Española in 1502, was subsequently agent of the colonists in Spain, and in 1508 was empowered to conquer and govern Castilla del Oro, corresponding to the coast of the Isthmus of Panama and Central America from the Gulf of Darien to Cape Gracias a Dios; at the same time Ojeda received the adjoining province of Nueva Andalucía in South America. Nicuesa left Santo Domingo about Jan., 1510, with 5 vessels and 650 (or 785?) men. He lost his larger ships, was wrecked, and endured terrible sufferings at Nombre de Dios: only 100 men survived. Colmenares, on his way with reinforcements for Nicuesa, touched at Antigua, where Ojeda's colony had been left without a commander. The colonists sent messengers to Nicuesa, offering to accept him as governor; but he acted in such an overbearing manner that on his arrival at Antigua the colonists rebelled. He was forced to sail away in a rotten ship, and was never heard of again.

Nidd (nid). A small river in Yorkshire, England, a tributary of the Ouse. Its picturesque valley is called Niddedale.

Nidhug (nid'hög). In Scandinavian mythology, a serpent in the lower world.

Nidwalden (nēd'väl-den), or Nidwald (nēd'völd). A half-canton of the canton of Unterwalden, Switzerland. It forms the northern part of the canton. It sends one member to the National Council. A national monument has been erected on it in commemoration of the German triumph over France in 1870-71, and of the foundation of the new German Empire. It was designed by Schilling, and inaugurated in 1883, when an unsuccessful attempt was made on the life of the emperor William. It consists of a statue, 33 feet high, of Germania as a robust woman holding aloft the imperial crown, and standing on a monumental pedestal 78 feet high. The die bears inscriptions, and in front of its base, which is carved with the emblems of the German states, is placed the Prussian eagle. At the front angles of the large basement from which the die rises stand the angels of War and Peace. The large relief of the front includes portraits of the emperor William I. with the German princes and generals and soldiers of the different arms; and the reliefs of the sides represent the departure and return of the soldiers. Below, in front, is a group of sculpture representing the Rhine and the Moselle.

It is bounded by Yonne on the north, Côte-d'Or and Saône-et-Loire on the east, Saône-et-Loire and Allier on the south, and Cher on the west. It is traversed from southeast to northwest by the chain of the Morvan. The chief productions are coal and timber, and there are noted iron-works. Area, 2,712 square miles. Population (1891), 343,581.

Niezhin. See Nezhin.

Niffer. See Nippur.

Nifheim (nif'hīm). [ON. Nifheimr.] In the Old Norse cosmogony, the cold world of fog in the north. In the midst was the spring Ivergelmir, out of which flowed ten rivers, the Elivagar (ON. Elivagar).

Nifhel (nif'hel). [ON.] In Old Norse mythology, the realm of the goddess Hel; the abode of the dead. It was situated below the earth. The swift river Síd (ON. Síðhr, also called Gjöll and Geirhvinnu), which ran over a bed of swords, surrounded it. It was approached by a bridge at whose end watched the maiden Modgud (ON. Modgudhr). A wall inclosed the whole realm, to which the gate Helgrind (ON. Helgrindr) alone gave admittance. Nifhel was originally the abode of all the dead. In later mythology only it is made a place of misery.

Niger (nī'jēr), called also Joliba (jol'i-bā), Kworra or Qurra (kvor'ā), Mayo (mä'yō), etc. [Prob. same as L. Nigris (Pliny) and Gr. Nýep (Ptolemy), applied vaguely to a large river in Africa. Joliba and Kworra are modern African names.] One of the three chief rivers of Africa. The source of the main head stream, the Tembi, is about lat. 8° 30' N., long. 10° 30' W. It flows generally northeast to near Timbuktu, east to long. 0°, then south-southeast and south, and empties by a delta into the Gulf of Guinea about lat. 4°-5° N., long. 6°-7° E. Its chief tributary is the Binue. It was first visited by Munzo Park in 1796. There is still an unexplored portion in its middle course. In its lower course it is navigable for steamers. Length, about 2,600 miles.

Niger Coast Protectorate. A British protectorate in western Africa, established in 1891, on the coast from Lagos to the Kamerun.

Niger Territories. A British sphere of influence in western Africa, between the French and German spheres and the independent Sudan states. It includes Sokoto (Gando, etc.), part of Bornu, and Bornu. It was delimited by treaties in 1886 and 1893, and is governed by the Royal Niger Company. Area and population are undetermined.

Nighantu (ni-g-han'tū). [Skt., corrupted from nigranthu, strung together, ranked.] In Sanskrit, any glossary, but especially the Vedic glossary explained by Yaska in his Nirukti; in this sense usually plural (Nighantavas) as embracing five books. The first three contain synonyms, the fourth a list of specially difficult words, and the fifth a classification of the divine personages who figure in the Veda.

Night and Morning. Two circular reliefs in marble by Thorwaldsen, in the Thorwaldsen Museum at Copenhagen, Denmark; familiar in popular reproductions. Night and Morning are two winged, richly draped female figures sweeping through the air. The former clasps sleeping children to her breast, and is accompanied by an owl; the latter scatters flowers.

Night and Morning. A novel by Bulwer-Lytton, published in 1841.

Nightingale (nit'ing-gäl), Florence. Born at Florence, May, 1820. An English philanthropist. She inspected schools and hospitals in England and afterward in all parts of Europe, and finally decided to become a hospital nurse. She is especially celebrated for her noble services at Scutari during the Crimean war, 1854-56. Her health suffered severely from the continued strain and her unselfish devotion. At the close of the war she was enabled by a testimonial fund to found an institution for the training of nurses, the Nightingale Home at St. Thomas's Hospital. She was also the means of calling attention to the insanitary conditions of camp hospitals, etc. She published "The Institution at Kaiserswerth on the Rhine" (1850), "Notes on Hospitals" (1859), "Notes on Nursing" (1860), "Observations on the Sanitary State of the Army in India" (1863), etc.

Nightmare Abbey. A novel by Thomas Love Peacock, published in 1818.

Night Thoughts. A meditative poem on religion and morality, by Edward Young (1742-46). Its whole title is "The Complaint, or Night Thoughts."

The extraordinary vogue of "Night Thoughts," which lasted for a century, has succumbed to a series of vigorous attacks in our own age, and Young is now in danger of being underrated.

Gosse, Eighteenth-Century Literature, p. 213.

Night Walker, The, or the Little Thief. A comedy by Fletcher and Shirley, licensed in 1633, printed in 1640 as by Fletcher only. This play has been incorrectly conjectured to be the same as "The Devil of Dowgate, or Usury put to Use," which was licensed in 1623.

Night-Watch, The, or Sortie of the Banning Cock Company. A masterpiece by Rembrandt (1642), in the Rijks Museum at Amsterdam. It represents an assembly of the civic guard (by daylight), with their officers, banner, and drummer. All the figures are portraits, full of life and spirit; and the picture is admirable in light and color.

Nigra (né'grā), Count Costantino. Born at Castellamonte, near Ivrea, Italy, June 12, 1827. An Italian diplomatist. He served in 1848 as a volunteer in the Sardinian army against the Austrians, but afterward entered the diplomatic service, and acted as secretary to Count Cavour at the Congress of Paris in 1856. He was for many years Italian ambassador at Paris, and held the same position at St. Petersburg 1876-82, and at London 1882-85.

Nigritia (ni-grish'i-ā). [NL., 'land of the blacks,' from L. niger, black.] A name formerly given to the Sudan.

Nigritic (tribes and languages). See Negro race, and African ethnography (under Africa).

Nihaloith. See Echcloot.

Nihilists (nī'hil-ists). The adherents of nihilism. Nihilism was originally a social (not a political) movement in Russia, in opposition to the customary forms of matrimony, the parental authority, and the tyranny of custom; later, a more or less organized secret effort on the part of a large body of malcontents to overturn the established order of things, both social and political. In the former sense the word was introduced by Turgeneff in 1862. Nihilism comprises several Russian parties, differing in the means of action employed and in the immediate results aimed at, some leaning more toward political radicalism and violence, and others toward economic reorganization and socialism. The movement originated about 1840, and is due largely to the influence of the universities. About 1855-62 it became increasingly democratic, socialistic, and revolutionary under the leadership of Herzen and the magazine "Contemporary." About 1870 revolutionary ideas became the subject of a propaganda among workmen, peasants, and students. The adherents of this movement formed a "people's party" ("Land and Freedom") purposing the complete overthrow of the existing order of things and the establishment of a socialistic and democratic order in its stead. Under the influence of Bakunin (died 1876), and the persecution of peaceful propagandists by the government, the people's party divided into two factions—the "democratization of land" and the "will of the people," the latter being the stronger. This party was by government persecutions driven to a political contest, and the idea of demoralizing the forces of the government by terror originated and became popular: the adherents of this system called themselves "terrorists." After several unsuccessful attempts, they effected the death of the czar Alexander II. in 1881.

Niigata (nē-ē-gā'tā). A seaport in the province of Echigo, main island of Japan, situated on the western coast in lat. 37° 57' N., long. 139° 3' E. It is open to foreign commerce. Population (1891), 47,019.

Nijar (nē-hār'). A town in the province of Almeria, southern Spain, 16 miles east-northeast of Almeria. Population (1887), 14,221.

Nijkerk (nī'kerk). A town in the province of Gelderland, Netherlands, 27 miles east-southeast of Amsterdam. Population (1889), 7,724.

Nijmegen. See Nimwegen.

Nijne-Tagilsk (nēzh'ne-tā-gilsk'). A town in the government of Perm, eastern Russia, situated on the Tagil 135 miles east of Perm. It is the chief town in the Ural Mountains, the center of a rich mining district for iron, gold, copper, and platinum, and is noted for its iron-works (founded by Deundoff). Population of the mining district, about 30,000.

Nijni-Lomoff (nēzh'ni-lom'of). A town in the government of Penza, Russia, situated on the Lomoff 64 miles northwest of Penza. Population, 9,482.

Nijni-Novgorod, or Nijni-Novgorod, or Nizhni-Novgorod (nēzh'ni-nov'go-rod). 1. A government of central Russia. It is surrounded by Kostroma, Vynka, Kazan, Simbirsk, Penza, Tambot, and Vladimir. The surface is generally flat. The government has considerable commerce and manufactures. Area, 19,797 square miles. Population (1893), 1,586,764.

2. The capital of the government of Nijni-Novgorod, situated at the junction of the Oka with the Volga in lat. 56° 19' N., long. 44° E. Its famous fair, the largest in the world, held annually in Aug. and Sept., is frequented by from 200,000 to 300,000 merchants from Russia and western and central Asia. The chief articles of trade are cotton, woolen, iron, corn, salt, tea, furs, silk, and manufactured goods of all kinds. The fair was transferred hither from Makarieff in 1817. The town has also an annual fair for wooden wares, and one for the sale of horses. It is the center of steam navigation of the Volga. It was plundered by the Mongols in 1378; was united to Moscow in 1390; and took the lead under Miazin in 1612 in freeing Moscow from the Poles. Population (1894), 70,412.

Nika (nē'kā), or Manika (māi-nē'kā). The Bantu tribe inhabiting Mashonaland.

Nike (nī'kē). [Gr. Nikē, the personification of victory.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of victory: called by the Romans Victoria. She was regularly represented in ancient art as a winged maiden, usually as just alighting from flight, her most frequent attributes being a palm-branch in one hand and a garland in the other, or a fillet outstretched in both hands: sometimes she holds a herald's staff.

Nike. An original statue by Pæonius, in the museum at Olympia, dedicated in the Altis by the Messenians about 420 B. C. The goddess is represented as sweeping through the air, with drapery pressed to her form and streaming behind in the wind.

Nike Apteros, or Wingless Victory, Temple of. A beautiful little Ionic amphiprostyle tetra-style temple at Athens, measuring 18 by 27 feet, standing on a high stone platform projecting beyond the Propylæa. The columns are 134 feet high. The frieze is sculptured in high relief with gods on the east and with Athenian martial exploits on the other sides. The platform of this temple was surrounded with a marble balustrade on which were carved Victories, among them the famous relief of "Victory loosing her Sandal." The temple was pulled down by the Turks, and its materials buried under the works of a battery: they were found in 1835, almost complete, by German scholars, and restored to their original positions.

Nikisch (nē'kish), Arthur. Born at Szent-Miklós, Hungary, Oct. 12, 1855. A Hungarian composer and conductor. He came to the United States in 1880, and conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra from that time till 1893, when he went to Budapest as kapellmeister and conductor of the opera.

Nikita I. See Nikola I.

Nikitin (nē-kē'tin), Ivan. Born at Voronezh, 1824; died 1861. A Russian poet. He wrote lyric folk-songs. His life was passed in poverty, and he was obliged to keep an inn to support himself. Afterward he changed this for the more congenial occupation of book-seller.

Nikko (nēk'kō). A small town in the main island of Japan, 80 miles north of Tokio. It is a Shintoist and Buddhist religious center, noted for its shrines. The temple of Icyasu is one of the most splendid sanctuaries of the Shinto cult erected in the 17th century. The sanctuary consists of a succession of courts with gates of wood and metal adorned with the most elaborate carving and with brilliant color. Upon the courts face a great number of buildings of different sizes and forms and various purpose: they are built of wood, but every beam and joint is a work of art. The ornament in metal is of the delicacy of jewelry, and that in terra-cotta of equally perfect workmanship. In spite of this richness, vulgarity is avoided and the ornament is kept severely subordinate to constructive propriety.

Nikola (nē'kō-lā) I, or Nikita (nē-kē'tā). Born Oct. 7, 1841. Prince of Montenegro. He was proclaimed prince in 1860, and carried on war against Turkey 1876-78.

Nikopol (nē'kō-poly). A town in the government of Yekaterinoslaff, southern Russia, situated on the Dnieper 64 miles south-southwest of Yekaterinoslaff. It is a trading center. Population (1892), 10,100.

Nikopoli, or Nicopoli (nē-kop'ō-lē). Trk. Nighebolü (nē-ge-bō'li) or Nebul (ne-böl'). [See Nicopolis.] A town in Bulgaria, situated on the Danube, near the confluence of the Osma, in lat. 43° 42' N., long. 24° 53' E. It has been erroneously identified with the ancient Nicopolis ad Istrum. It was long noted as a fortress, and was conquered by Sigismund of Hungary 1392 and 1395. Sultan Bajazet I. defeated here the Franco-Hungarian army under Sigismund Sept. 28, 1396. It was unsuccessfully attacked by Ladislaus of Hungary in 1444. The Turks were defeated here by Báthori Sept. 6, 1595, and by the Wallachians in 1598. It was conquered by the Russians in 1810. The Turkish fleet was destroyed near it and their camp stormed by the Russians in 1829. It was taken by the Russians in 1877. Population, 4,652.

Nikosia. See Nicosia.

Niksar (nik-sär'), or Niksara (nik-sä'ra). A town in the vilayet of Trebizond, Asiatic Turkey, situated near the Kelkit-Tehai 145 miles west by south of Trebizond; the ancient Neoesarea, and probably the ancient Cabira. Population, 9,000.

Nikšić (nek'sieh). A fortified town in Montenegro, 26 miles north of Cetinje. It was besieged and taken from the Turks by the Montenegrins in 1877. Population, about 3,000.

Nile (nil). [F. Nil, Sp. Pg. It. Nilo, G. Nil, L. Nilus, from Gr. Νεῖλος.] The longest river of Africa, and one of the longest rivers in the world: the ancient Nilus. It is formed by several head streams which flow into Lake Victoria Nyanza. Of these the Kagera, Shimiya, and Isanga are the chief. From Victoria Nyanza the Nile flows northwest, forming the Ripon and Murchison falls, into the Albert Nyanza. Thence it flows generally north (as the Babr-el-Jebel, later as the Bahr-el-Abiad or White Nile) to the junction with the Blue Nile at Khartum; traverses the Nubian desert; passes by five cataracts into the valley of Egypt; and empties by a wide delta into the Mediterranean Sea. Its principal mouths are the Rosetta and Damietta branches. It fertilizes the valley of Egypt by its annual overflow (caused by the melting of the snows in the elevated regions drained by its head waters), which is at its height in September and October. It has been famous in ancient and modern times for the kingdoms on its banks, and for the attempts to discover its sources. Its chief tributaries are the Bahr-el-Ghazal, Sobat, Blue Nile, and Atbara. It receives no tributaries below Berber. The chief places on its banks are Lado, Gondokoro, Khartum, Berber, New Dongola, Derr, Assuan, Siut, and Cairo. The course of the upper Nile was a mystery until recent times. Bruce in 1770 found the source of the Blue Nile. In 1858 the Victoria Nyanza was discovered by Speke, in 1864 the Albert Nyanza by Baker, and in 1877 the Albert Edward Nyanza by Stanley. The upper basin falls mainly within the British sphere of influence, partly within the German, and perhaps the Italian. The middle valley is held (1894) by the dervishes. Length about 3,400 miles.

On the rocks of Semneh and Kümeh the highest point of the inundation was always noted for comparison, and the mark was accompanied by a corresponding inscription. Thus we read at one place on the rock: "Height of the Nile in the year 14, under the reign of his Majesty King Amen-em-hat III., the ever-living." From observations made by Lepsius on the spot, we gather that in the times of the Twelfth Dynasty—that is, forty-three centuries before our days—the highest rise was nearly twenty-seven feet above the greatest height of the inundation in these days; and that the average height of the Nile when Amen-em-hat III. was king surpasses that of our times by about twelve feet. Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, p. 75.

Nile, Battle of the. A name often given to the British naval victory of Aug. 1-2, 1798. See Abukir, Bay of.

Niles (nilz). A city in Berrien County, south-western Michigan, situated on the St. Joseph River 75 miles east of Chicago. Population (1890), 4,179.

Niles, Hezekiah. Born in Chester County, Pa., Oct. 10, 1777; died at Wilmington, Del., April 2, 1839. An American journalist. He founded at Baltimore the weekly journal "Niles's Register" in 1811, and edited it until 1836.

Nilgiri (nil-gē'rē). A state in Orissa, Bengal, India, intersected by lat. 21° 30' N., long. 86° 40' E.

Nilgiri Hills, or Neigherry (nēl-ger'ē) Hills, 1. A range of mountains in Madras, British India, about lat. 11° 30' N., long. 76° 45' E. Highest peak, Dodabetta (8,760 feet).—2. A district in Madras, British India, chiefly comprised in the mountain region of Nilgiri Hills.

Nilsson (nil'son), Christine. Born near Waxjö, Sweden, Aug. 3, 1843. A noted Swedish soprano singer. She first sang in public at Stockholm in 1860, and appeared in opera at Paris in 1864 as Violetta. She appeared with great success at different times from 1867 to 1870 in England, and in 1870-72 in America. In the latter year she returned to England, and married M. Auguste Rouzard, who died in 1882. From 1872-77 she sang in England, coming to America in 1873-74. In 1876 she made a successful tour through Scandinavia. In 1880-81 she again sang in opera in England, from which time she sang only in concerts till 1887, when she married Count Casa di Miranda, and retired altogether to private life in 1888. (Grove.) She was eminently successful in such parts as Mignon, Marguerite, Ophelia, Elsa, etc.

Nilsson, Sven. Born near Landskrona, Sweden, March 8, 1787; died at Lund, Sweden, Nov. 30, 1883. A Swedish naturalist and antiquary, professor at Lund 1831-56. He published works on the fauna and antiquities of Scandinavia.

Nimar (nē-mär'). A district in the Central Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 21° 45' N., long. 76° 30' E. Area, 3,340 square miles. Population (1881), 231,341.

Nimburg (nim'börg). A town in Bohemia, on the Elbe 27 miles east by north of Prague. Population (1890), commune, 6,659.

Nimeguen. See Nimeegen.

Nîmes, or Nismes (nēm). The capital of the department of Gard, France, situated in lat. 43° 51' N., long. 4° 21' E.: the Roman Nemausus. It has important manufactures of silk goods, and an extensive trade, especially in wine and spirits. It is noted for its Roman antiquities, among which are the amphitheater (in excellent preservation), the Maison Carrée (which see), the so-called temple of Diana, the Tour Magne (Turris Magna), and gates. It contains a cathedral, library, picture-gallery, fountain garden, etc. In the vicinity is the Pont du Gard. Nîmes was conquered by the Romans in 121 B. C., and became one of the chief provincial cities; was plundered by the Vandals in 407, and suffered from the West Goths and Saracens; was united to France in 1258; suffered in the Huguenot wars; and was the scene of reactionary atrocities against the Protestants in 1815. It was the birthplace of Guizot. Population (1891), 71,623.

Nimrod (nim'röd). According to Gen. x., son of Cush, grandson of Ham, famous for his exploits as a hunter, at first ruler of Shinar (Shumir, i. e. South Babylonia), then founder of the Assyrian Tetrapolis (Asshur, Nineveh, Rehobothir, and Calah). Some Assyriologists identify Nimrod with Izubar or Gilgamesh, the principal hero of the Babylonian Izubar legends, or "Nimrod Epic." See Izubar.

Outside the pages of the Old Testament nothing is known of Nimrod. The monuments of Assyria and Babylonia have hitherto refused to divulge the name. Certain scholars indeed imagined that it might be the pronunciation of the name of the hero of the great Chaldean Epic, but we now know that such is not the case. Nimrod still remains to be discovered in the cuneiform texts. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 66.

Nimrod. A pseudonym of C. J. Apperley, a writer on hunting, etc., in the "Quarterly Review."

Nimrud (nim'röd). An important archaeological site in Assyria, on the left bank of the Tigris about 19 miles below Nineveh: the ancient Calah (which see). It was excavated by Layard between 1845 and 1851, and yielded the remarkable series of reliefs constituting the Nimrud Gallery in the British Museum. The site was occupied by several palaces in succession, according to the Oriental custom which required every monarch to build his own. The long series of changes and reconstructions makes the architectural history of the site difficult to unravel; however, except Khorsabad, this has been the most carefully explored and the most instructive site in Assyria. It is particularly interesting for its abundant remains of vaults built of crude brick in courses inclined diagonally against each other, so as to obviate the use of centering.

Nimwegen (nim'wā-gen), or Nymegen, or Nimeguen (nim'ā-gen), D. also Nimegen (ni'mā-chen), F. Nimègue (nē-māg'). A city in the province of Gelderland, Netherlands, situated on the Waal in lat. 51° 51' N., long. 5° 52' E.: the Roman Noviomagus. It has a fine situation, and contains the Church of St. Stephen, Stadhuis, and ruins of the Carolingian palace. It was the residence of Charles the Great and other monarchs. Later it was a free imperial city and Hanseatic town. It joined the Union of Utrecht in 1579; was taken by the Spaniards in 1585; retaken by the Dutch in 1591; and taken by the French in 1672 and in 1794. Population (1891), 32,990.

Nimwegen, Peace of. A series of treaties concluded at Nimwegen in 1678 and 1679. With those of Westminster between Holland and England (Feb. 9, 1674), of Fontainebleau between France and Denmark (Sept. 2, 1679), of Lund between Denmark and Sweden (Sept. 26, 1679), and of St. Germain-en-Laye between Sweden and Brandenburg (1679), they put an end to the hostilities between France and Holland and their allies originating with the attack on Holland by Louis XIV. in 1672. The treaty between France and Holland was concluded Aug. 10, 1678; that between France and Spain Sept. 17, 1678; that between the emperor on the one hand and France and Sweden on the other Feb. 5, 1679; and that between Holland and Sweden Oct. 12, 1679. Holland received all its territory back on condition of preserving neutrality; Spain ceded Franche Comté, Valenciennes, Cambray, St. Omer, Ypres, Condé, Bouchain, Malenbourg, and other places to France; France restored Charleroi, Oudenarde, Courtray, Linburg, Ghent, Puyccerdia, etc., to Spain; the emperor ceded Freiburg-in-Breisgau to France; and Duke Charles IV. of Lorraine was restored to his duchy, but on conditions which he refused to accept.

Niña (nēn'yā), La. [Sp. 'little girl.'] One of the smaller caravels of Columbus in his voyage of 1492. It was an undecked vessel, probably not over 45 feet long, and was commanded at first by Vicente Yañez Pinzon. After the wreck of the Santa Maria (Dec. 24, 1492) Columbus returned in the Niña to Europe.

Nina Gordon. See Dred.

Ninetta. See Gazza Ladra, La.

Ninety-Six (nin'ti-siks'). A village in Abbeville County, South Carolina. 75 miles west by north of Columbia. It was unsuccessfully besieged by the Americans under Greene in 1781.

Ninety-Three (nin'ti-thrē'). [F. Quatre-vingt-trois.] A historical novel by Victor Hugo, published in 1874. The scene is laid in the north-west of France in 1793.

Nineveh (nin'e-ve). [Heb. Ninewé, Assyri. Ninua, Gr. Νινωῖ ἢ Νινωῖ.] In ancient geography, an important city and for a long time the capital of the Assyrian empire, situated on the eastern bank of the upper Tigris opposite the modern Mosul, and surrounded in ancient times by a shallow river (Khosr). The site, now marked by the two mounds of Kuyunjik and Nebi Yunus, was first identified in 1820 by J. C. Rich, political resident of the East India Company at Bagdad. The first attempts at excavation were made in 1842 by Paul Emile Botta, who, however, met with slight success; these were followed on a more extended scale by Sir Austen Henry Layard (1845-47, 1849-51), by Hormuzd Rassam (1854), and by George Smith (1872-76), the work being again taken up by Rassam on the death of Smith. As a result of these excavations, the general outline of the city, the remains of four palaces and numerous sculptures, and thousands of tablets (principally from the so-called library of Assurbanipal) were discovered. The greater part of these is now in the British Museum. The city had a circumference of from 7 to 8 miles, the ruins of the walls showing a height in some parts of 50 feet. It was in existence as early as the time of Samsi-ramman (1816 B. C.), who rebuilt a temple there. Shalmaneser I. (1830 B. C.) built a palace at Nineveh and made it the city of his residence. Samsi-ramman III. (824-811) decorated and restored the temple of Ishtar, famous for a special phase of the cult of the goddess. (See Ishtar.) Ramman-nirari III. (811-782) built a new palace on the site of the mound Nebi Yunus. For a time Nineveh was neglected, Sargon (722-705 B. C.), the founder of the new dynasty, abandoning it as the capital for a new town, Dur-Sarrukin (Khorsabad), which he built and made his residence. His son, Sennacherib (705-681 B. C.), was, however, a special patron of Nineveh. He surrounded it with a wall, replaced (695) the small palace at the northeast wall by a large one, built another palace which he filled with cedar wood and adorned with colossal bulls and lions, and beautified the city with a park. The Old Testament (2 Ki. ix. 36, Isa. xxxv. 37) mentions Nineveh as the residence of Sennacherib. Esarhaddon (680-668 B. C.) finished a temple, widened the streets, and beautified the city, forcing the kings whom he conquered to furnish materials for adorning the city and palaces. Nineveh succumbed to the combined attack of the Medes under Cyaxares and the Babylonians under Nabopolassar in 608 (607) B. C. See also Assyria, Cyaxares, Kuyunjik, and Nebi Yunus.

Nine Worthies, The. Nine heroes of romance and chivalry whose story is told in Arthurian legends. In one of these, the "Triumphes des neufs Preux," the author feigns that there appeared to him in a vision nine heroes, and in a second vision a tenth hero, viz., Joshua, David, Judas Maccabeus, Hector, Alexander the Great, Julius Cæsar, and then Arthur, Charlemagne, Godfrey of Bouillon, and finally Bertrand du Guesclin; they charge him to undertake the description of their lives and feats, in order that Lady Triumphe, who appears with them, may be enabled to decide which of them has deserved her crown. . . . The nine heroes of this romance are not infrequently mentioned in the earlier English literature. Shakespeare alludes in "Love's Labour's Lost" (act v. sc. 2) to the Nine Worthies. Further, they appear in the verses which precede the Low-German history of Alexander the Great (Brun's "Altplattdeutsche Gedichte," p. 336, etc. See also Warton, vol. iv. p. 151, note a, Lond. 1824). They figure also in tapestry and paintings (Warton, ii. p. 44, note 9). This selection of three heroes may very likely have originated in the "Welsh Triads," where the three Pagan, Jewish, and Christian trinities are enumerated as follows: Hector, Alexander, and Julius Cæsar; Joshua, David, and Judas Maccabeus; Arthur, Charlemagne, and Godfrey de Bouillon. For Godfrey is sometimes substituted Guy of Warwick." Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 269, 270.

The "Pageant of the Nine Worthies," out of which so much fun is made in Shakspeare's "Love's Labour's Lost," was represented in Queen Mary's time. "Each of the Worthies," says Strype, "made his speech," no doubt commencing, as in the comedy, with "I Pompey am," "I Judas am," etc. Ward.

Nine Years' Siege (of Montevideo). See Oribe, Manuel.

Ningpo (ning'pō'), or Ningpo-fu (ning'pō'fō'). A seaport in the province of Chekiang, China, situated on the river Ningpo in lat. 29° 51' N., long. 121° 32' E. It is one of the treaty ports; has flourishing commerce; is an educational and religious center; and is noted for its tall tower and temple. It was taken by the British in 1841. Population, 250,000.

Ninian (nin'i-an), Saint. Lived about 400 A. D. A British missionary among the southern Picts. He built a church at Withern, or Whithorn, Galloway, in 397, and in 420, when driven to Ireland, is said to have founded a monastery at Clonconnor.

Niño (nēn'yō), Pedro Alonso. Born in Meguer about 1455; died about 1505. A Spanish navigator. He was connected with several Portuguese expeditions to the West African coast; commanded a supply fleet which sailed for Santo Domingo in 1496; and was with Columbus on his third voyage in 1498. Later he was associated with Cristobal Guerra in a trading expedition to the pearl coast (Venezuela). They left Spain about June, 1499, with a single small vessel, and returned richly laden with pearls and gold in April, 1500. This was the first financially profitable voyage to the American coast.

Ninon de Lenclos or L'Enclos. See Lenclos.
Ninove (nē-nōv'). A town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Dender 15 miles west of Brussels. Population (1890), 6,870.

Ninus (nī'nus). In Greek narratives, the founder of Nineveh (which he named after himself) and of the Assyrian empire, husband of Semiramis and father of Ninyas.

Ninus. An ancient name of Nineveh; also, a Roman town (of short duration) on the site of Nineveh.

Nio (nē'ō). An island in the nemarchy of the Cyclades, Greece, 12 miles south-southwest of Naxos; the ancient Ios. Length, 11 miles.

Niobe (nī'ō-bē). [Gr. Νιόβη.] In Greek mythology, the daughter of Tantalus and wife of Amphion, king of Thebes. Proud of her numerous progeny, she provoked the anger of Apollo and Artemis by boasting over their mother Leto, who had but those two children. She was punished by seeing all her children die by the arrows of the two light-deities. She herself was metamorphosed by Zeus into a stone which it is still sought to identify on the slope of Mount Sipylus, near Smyrna. This legend has afforded a fruitful subject for art, and was notably represented in a group attributed to Scopas, now best known from copies in the Uffizi at Florence. See Niobe group.

Niobe group. A celebrated collection of 18 antique statues, 12 of which were found in Rome in 1583, now in the Uffizi, Florence. They are good Roman copies of Greek originals ascribed with probability to Scopas, though by some to Praxiteles, representing Niobe horror-stricken in the midst of her children, who are being struck to death by the unseen shafts of Apollo and Artemis. The central figure, Niobe, seeks to shelter with her arm and her mantle, her youngest daughter, who kneels terrified at her feet. The other children, youths and maidens, are dead, dying, or fleeing, seeking to ward off the inevitable blow, or awaiting it with resignation. The existing group is incomplete; the original was probably arranged pyramidally for the decoration of a pediment.

Niobites (nī'ō-bits). A branch of the Monophysites, founded by Stephanus Niobes in the 6th century, who opposed the views of the Severians. See Severians. Niobes taught that, according to strict Monophysite doctrine, the qualities of Christ's human nature were lost by its absorption into his divine nature. The Niobites gradually modified their views and returned to the orthodox church.

Niobrara (nī'ō-brā'rā). A river in northern Nebraska which joins the Missouri 34 miles west of Yankton. Length, about 450 miles.

Niort (nyōr). The capital of the department of Deux-Sèvres, France, situated on the Sèvre-Niortaise in lat. 46° 19' N., long. 0° 23' W. It has large manufactures of gloves, and is noted for its onions. It has a museum of paintings, town hall, ruined castle, and Church of Notre Dame. It was often taken and retaken in the English and religious wars. Population (1891), 23,225.

Nippon. See Nippon.

Nipigon (nip'i-gon), or Nepigon (nep'i-gon), or Neepigon (nē'pi-gon), Lake. A lake in British North America, 25 miles north of Lake Superior, into which it discharges by Nipigon River. Length, about 70 miles.

Nipissing (nip'i-sing), Lake. A lake in the province of Ontario, Canada, northeast of Georgian Bay (in Lake Huron), into which it discharges through French River. Length, about 50 miles.

Nipmuc (nip'muk). [Pl., also Nipmucks. The name means 'fresh-water fishing-place.'] A general name for the North American Indian tribes of central Massachusetts, extending into Connecticut and Rhode Island. In 1675 their survivors of the King Philip war fled to Canada and to the Hudson River. Eliot's translation of the Bible was in the Natic dialect of the languages spoken by the Nipmuc tribes. See Algonquian.

Nipmucks. See Nipmuc.

Nipper (nip'er), Susan. In Dickens's "Dombey and Son," a young maid in charge of Florence Dombey, noted for her sharp tongue. She marries Toots.

Nipple Top (nip'l top). An isolated peak of the Adirondacks, south of Mount Marcy. Height, 4,684 feet.

Nippon (nip-en'), or Niphon (nif-en'), or Nipon (nip-on'). ['Origin of the sun.'] A name wrongly used by foreigners for the main island of Japan. The Japanese call the entire empire Dai-Nippon or Nippon.

Nippur (nip-pör'). In ancient geography, a city of Babylonia, south of Babylon, midway between that place and Erech; the modern Niffer, situated on the Shatt en-Nil. The city existed in the earliest Babylonian period, an inscription of Naram-Sin (3750 B. C.) having been found there. Bel and Belis were its special divinities. Nippur was visited by Sir Austen Henry Layard, who made some slight excavations and found several enameled coffins and other objects. It was excavated by an American expedition sent out by the University of Pennsylvania 1889-91 under the leadership of Dr. John P. Peters, and many inscriptions and other objects were found there. A portion of these are now in the Imperial Museum at Constantinople, and the remainder in the museum of the University of Pennsylvania. Excavations were resumed in 1893, and are now (1894) being carried on.

Nipur. See Nippur.

Niquirans. See Nicaraoa.

Niris (nē'ris), Lake. A large salt lake in Farsistan, southern Persia, east of Shiraz.

Nirukta (nī-rök'ta). [Skt.: nir, out, and ukta, spoken, spoken out, loud, clear: and, as noun, explanation, etymological interpretation of a word.] In Sanskrit, the name of the fourth of six Vedangas (which see), or works or classes of works auxiliary to the Veda. It consists of the explanation of difficult Vedic words. As Yaska's Nirukti or 'explanation' of the Nighantu or Nighantavas is almost the only survivor of the class, the name is also used of that work. See Nighantu and Nirukti.

Nirukti (nī-rök'ti). [Skt., 'interpretation.'] In Sanskrit literature, an exposition in 12 books, by Yaska, of the Nighantu or Nighantavas. See Nighantu. "It is in Yaska's work, the Nirukti, that we find the first general notions of grammar. Starting from the phonetic rules, advance was made first to a general view of phonetics, and thence to the remaining portions of the domain of language. Inflection, derivation, and composition were recognized and distinguished, and manifold reflections were made upon the modifications thereby occasioned in the meaning of a root." (Weber.) As to Yaska's date, it can only be said that he belonged to the last stages of the Vedic period. His Nirukti has been edited by Roth.

Nirvana (nir-vā'nā). [Skt., 'blowing out' (as of a light), 'extinction.'] In Buddhism, the condition of a Buddha; the state to which the Buddhist saint aspires as the highest aim and highest good. Originally, doubtless, this was the extinction of existence, Buddha's attempt being to show the way of escape from the miseries inseparably attached to life, and especially to life everlasting renewed by transmigration, as held in India. But in later times this negation has naturally taken on other forms, and is explained as extinction of desire, passion, unrest, etc.

Nisæa (nī-sē'ā). In ancient geography, a region in Media (perhaps near the Caspian Gates), famous for its breed of horses.

The Nisæan breed of horses continued in repute down to the times of Ammianus Marcellinus (xviii, 6). They excelled all others in size and speed, and were generally the property of the Persian kings or nobles of the highest rank. The situation of the Nisæan plain from which they were said to derive their name is uncertain. According to Strabo, some placed it in Armenia; others, according to Suidas, in Persia. The general consent, however, of the best writers assigns it to Media, where we know from the Behistun Inscription that there was a district Nisæa or Nisaya. Rauvlinson, Herod., IV. 39, note.

Nisami. See Nizami.

Nisan (nī'san). [Heb. nisan, Babylonian nisanu.] The name of the first month of the Hebrew year, corresponding to March-April; after the exile (Esther iii. 7, Neh. ii. 1) corresponding to the preëxilic Abib. Like the other names of the Hebrew months, it was derived from the Babylonians. The fact that it was the month in which the vernal equinox fell is attested by the cuneiform tablets and by Josephus.

Nisard (nē-zär'), Jean Marie Napoleon Désiré. Born March 20, 1806; died at Paris, March 26, 1888. A French historian of literature. He became a member of the French Academy in 1850. His chief work is "Histoire de la littérature française" (1844-61). He also wrote "Études d'histoire et de littérature" (1859), "Nouvelles Études" (1864), etc.

Niscemi (nish-ā'mē). A town in the province of Caltanissetta, Sicily, 43 miles southwest of Catania. Population (1881), 12,110.

Nish, or Nisch (nēsh), or Nissa (nēs'sä). The second largest city of Servia, situated on the Nishava in lat. 43° 18' N., long. 21° 55' E.: the ancient Naissus (Gr. Ναισός). It was the birthplace of Constantine the Great. It was held by the Servians from the 12th to the 14th century, and then by the Turks until 1878. Here, in 269, the emperor Claudius II. defeated the Goths, 60,000 of whom are said to have perished; and here, in 1689, the Austrians under Louis of Baden defeated the Turks. The place was unsuccessfully besieged by the Servians in 1809. Population (1891), 19,877.

Nishadha (nī'sha-d-ha). In the Mahabharata, the country of Nala, inferred to be in the valley of the Sind, which traverses Gwalior state, Central India. On the Sind is Narwar, and local tradition connects this place with King Nala in a story hearing a striking resemblance to the poem of Nala.

Nishapur (nish-i-pör'). A city in Khorasan, Persia, 48 miles west of Meshhed; an important medieval city. Population, about 11,000.

Nishinam (nish'i-nam). The southern division of the Pujunan stock of North American Indians, comprising a number of tribes which formerly occupied the part of northern California between Yuba and Cosumne rivers. The name signifies 'people' or 'our people.' See Pujunan.

Nisib. See Nizib.

Nisibis (nis'i-bis). [Gr. Νισβίς.] In ancient geography, a town in Mesopotamia, situated in lat. 37° N., long. 41° 15' E.: the modern Nisibin or Nesibin. It was an Armenian, Parthian, Roman, and Persian stronghold; and was taken by Lucullus in 68 B. C., and afterward by Trajan.

Nismes. See Nimes.

Nisqualli (niz'kwā-lē). A tribe of North American Indians which formerly lived on and about Nisqualli River, Washington: now numbering 94 persons, on the Puyallup reservation, Washington. See Salishan.

Nisroch (nis'rok). In Bible history, an Assyrian deity in whose temple at Nineveh Sennacherib was murdered (2 Ki. xix. 37, Isa. xxxvii. 38). The name was formerly derived from Heb. nesher ('eagle'), and the deity was supposed to have been one of the eagle-headed genii frequently represented on Assyrian sculptures. The name has, however, not been found in cuneiform literature, and the conjecture of Joseph Halévy that it is an error for Nusku (which see) has been generally accepted.

Nissa. See Nish.

Nisus (nī'sus). [Gr. Νίσος.] In Greek legend, a king of Megara, father of Seylla: changed to an eagle.

Nisyro (nē'sē-rō). A small volcanic island off the southwestern coast of Asia Minor, south of Cos and northwest of Rhodes: the ancient Nisyros (Gr. Νίσυρος).

Nith (nith). A river in southwestern Scotland which falls into Solway Firth 8 miles south of Dumfries. Length, 71 miles.

Nithard (nē-tār'). Lived in the first half of the 9th century. A Frankish historian, son of Bertha and grandson of Charles the Great.

Nitherohi. See Nietheroy.

Nithsdale (niths'dāl). The valley of the Nith, principally in Dumfriesshire, Scotland.

Niti-Ghaut (nē'tē-gāt'). One of the chief passes over the Himalaya from India to Tibet, situated about lat. 30° 50' N., long. 79° 45' E. Height, nearly 17,000 feet.

Nitinaht (nē'tin-āt). A tribe of North American Indians, on Nitinaht Lake or Sound, Vancouver Island, British Columbia. Number, 269. See Aht.

Nitishastra (nē-ti-shās'trā). [Skt., 'conduct-treatise': niti, conduct, and shāstra, instruction, treatise.] In Sanskrit, doctrine of political and social ethics, and then the name of a class of ethico-didactic treatises. These consist either of maxims in verse, or of fables and stories in prose with intermingled verse. See Bhartrihari, Hitopadesha, Panchatantra.

Nitocris (nī-tō'kris), or Nit-aker (nēt-ā'ker). ['The perfect.'] An Egyptian queen of the 6th dynasty (about 3000 B. C.). According to Manetho she was the noblest and most beautiful woman of her time, and the builder of the third pyramid at Gizeh. This pyramid, which was built by Menkaura of the 4th dynasty, she doubtless renovated and enlarged. Herodotus also relates certain fables about her.

Nitocris. A queen of Babylon.

Babylon was made impregnable: the river was paved with brick, and hoed with huge walls; and those wonderful works of defence were constructed which Herodotus ascribes to Queen Nitocris. This queen may have been the mother of Nabonides, who died on the 6th of Nisan or March, B. C. 546, in the camp near Sippara. Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 144.

Nitria (nit'ri-ā). The region of the Natron Lakes in Egypt, situated southwest of the delta of the Nile.

The district Nitria is frequently mentioned by ancient authors: as by Strabo (xvii.) and by Pliny (xxii. 46), and again by the Church writers of the fourth and following centuries, especially by those of them who speak of the monastic institutions of their own times. Around these dreary waters the monks of that time established themselves in great numbers—so many, indeed, that the emperor Valens, thinking that he could find a more useful employment for them than that of reciting the Psalter, enlisted as many as five thousand of them in his legions. Taylor, Hist. Anc. Books, p. 217.

Nitzsch (nitsh), Gregor Wilhelm. Born at Wittenberg, Prussia, Nov. 22, 1790; died at Leipzig, July 22, 1861. A German philologist, son of K. L. Nitzsch; professor at Kiel 1827-52, and at Leipzig 1852-61. He wrote works on the Homeric poems, and defended the Homeric authorship of the Iliad and Odyssey.

Nitzsch, Karl Immanuel. Born at Borna, Saxony, Sept. 21, 1787; died at Berlin, Aug. 21, 1868. A German Protestant theologian, son of K. L. Nitzsch; professor at Berlin 1847-68. He was one of the founders of the "mediation theology." His chief works are "System der christlichen Lehre" ("System of Christian Doctrine," 1829), "Praktische Theologie" (1847-48).

Nitzsch, Karl Ludwig. Born at Wittenberg, Prussia, Aug. 6, 1751; died there, Dec. 5, 1831. A German Protestant theologian, professor at Wittenberg.

Nitzsch, Karl Wilhelm. Born at Zerbst, Anhalt, Dec. 22, 1818; died at Berlin, June 20, 1880. A German historian, son of G. W. Nitzsch; professor at Berlin 1872-80. He published works on Roman and medieval German history, etc.

Niut'atci. See Missouri.

Nivardus (ni-vár'dus) of Ghent. Lived in the 12th century. A Flemish priest, the author of the Latin poem "Ysengrimus," originally called "Reinardus Vulpes" (1148). See Reynard the Fox.

Here we have the names that afterwards entered so completely into the speech of Europe that the old French word for a fox, Goupil, was replaced by Renard. Reinaert, Reynard, or Reginhard, means 'absolutely hard,' a hardened evil-doer whom there is no turning from his way. It is altogether out of this old story that the Fox has come by that name. Isegrim, the Wolf's name, is also Flemish—Isegrin meaning 'the iron helm.' The bear they named Bruno, Brin, for the colour of his coat.

Mortley, English Writers, VI. 316.

Nivelles (né-vel'), Flem. Nyvel (ní'vel). A manufacturing town in the province of Brabant, Belgium, on the Thines, 17 miles south of Brussels. It contains the church of an ancient convent. Population (1890), 10,642.

Nivernais (né-ver-ná'). An ancient government of France, corresponding nearly to the department of Nièvre. It was bounded by Burgundy on the northeast, east, and southeast, Bourbonnais on the south and southwest, Berry on the west, and Orléanais on the northwest. The most important portion of it was the duchy of Nevers.

Nivôse (né-vôz'). [F., 'the snowy.'] The name adopted in 1793 by the National Convention of the first French republic for the fourth month of the year. It consisted of 30 days, beginning in the years 1, 2, 3, 5, 6, 7 with Dec. 21; in 4, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14 with Dec. 22; and in 12 with Dec. 23. The Gregorian calendar came again into use after 10th Nivose, year 14 (Dec. 31, 1806).

Niza (nēt'sā), Marcos de. Born at Nice, Italy, about 1495; died in Mexico, 1542 (?). A Franciscan missionary, discoverer of Arizona. He is said to have labored successively in Peru, Nicaragua, and Mexico, and in the last-named country was provincial of his order. By order of the viceroy he penetrated northward from Culiacan in 1539, and in May of that year reached the region called Cibola (perhaps the Zuñi pueblos); but, some of his company being attacked by the Indians, he turned back, reaching Compostella about July. His exaggerated accounts (derived only from reports) of the riches of Cibola and its seven cities led to the expedition of Coronado (1540), which he accompanied as guide; the supposed wealthy cities were then shown to be ordinary pueblos, and the friar was sent back in disgust. Niza's report, which has been frequently published, is full of improbabilities; but there can be no doubt that he crossed Sonora and part of Arizona into New Mexico.

Nizami (ni-zā-mē') (Abu Mohammed ben Yusuf Sheikh Nizam eddin). Born in 1141 at Tavrish, near Kum; lived the greater part of his life at Genje (Yelisavetpol), and died in 1202. One of the seven chief poets of Persia. He wrote a divan of 28,000 distichs, and five other great poems: "The Storehouse of Mysteries," "The Book of Alexander," "Khosrau and Shirin," "Majnun and Laila" (see Laila and Majnun), and "The Seven Fair Faces," the last consisting of seven stories told by the seven wives of Bahram Gor to amuse him. These five works are known as the "Five Treasures of Nizami." The third has been translated into German by Hammer-Purgstall (1812), the fourth into English by Atkinson (1836), the fifth into German by Erdmann (1835). See Baehér, "Nizam's Leben und Werke" (Göttingen, 1871).

Nizam's Dominions. See Hyderabad.

Nizhni-Novgorod. See Nijni-Novgorod.

Nizib, or Nisib (né-zēb'). A place in the vilayet of Aleppo, Asiatic Turkey, situated near the Euphrates 64 miles northeast of Aleppo. Here, June 24, 1839, the Egyptians under Ibrahim Pasha defeated the Turks.

Nizza. See Nice (in France).

Njenji (njen'jē). A name given to the land of the Barotse by the Ovimbundu, and adopted by the Portuguese.

Njörd (nyörd). [ON. Njördhr.] In Old Norse mythology, the father of Frey and Freyja; most often mentioned in connection with the former as the dispenser of riches. He was by race a Vana, but came as a hostage to Asgard. His wife was Skadi, the daughter of the giant Thjazi. He ruled the wind and calmed the sea, and hence was the god of sailors and fishermen. His dwelling was Noatun (ON. Noatun). Njörd is in name the same as the goddess Nerthus of Tacitus, who is called by him terra mater. Her cult and characteristics were almost identical with those of Frey.

No (nō). In the Old Testament, Thebes in Egypt. Noah (nō'ā). [Heb., 'rest.'] In the Bible, a patriarch, the son of Lamech. He found favor with God because of his righteousness, and when God determined to destroy the world on account of its wickedness, he ordered Noah to build an ark, and take in it with him his family and some of all living animals. God then brought a flood, and upon its cessation Noah went forth from the ark, and from his family the world was repopulated. A similar account is found in eneiform literature and in the early legends of various other peoples. See Hosis-Adra.

Noailles (nō-ā'), Duc Adrien Maurice de. Born Sept. 29, 1678; died June 24, 1766. A French army marshal. He was defeated by the Pragmatic army at Dettingen June 27, 1743, during the War of the Austrian Succession.

He has published with Stoullig (1875-91) an annual, "Les annales du théâtre et de la musique." Sarcey, Zola, Sardou, and others have written the prefaces. He has also written several comedies, romances, etc.

Noetians (nō-ē'shianz). The followers of Noetus (see below).

Noetus (nō-ēt'us). Born at Smyrna or Ephesus; died probably about 200 A. D. A heretic of Asia Minor who is said to have taught that "Christ was the Father, and that the Father was born, and suffered, and died."

The Trinitarian question, indeed, had already been agitated within a less extensive sphere. Noetians, an Asiatic, either of Smyrna or Ephesus, had dwelt with such exclusive zeal on the unity of the Godhead as to absorb, as it were, the whole Trinity into one undivided and undistinguished Being. The one supreme and impassible Father united to himself the man Jesus, whom He had created, by so intimate a conjunction that the divine unity was not destroyed. His adversaries drew the conclusion that, according to this blaspheming theory, the Father must have suffered on the cross; and the ignominious name of Patripassians adhered to the few followers of this unprosperous sect. Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II. 360.

Nogaians (nō-gā'anz), or Nogais (nō-gā'z'). A Tureo-Tatar race living in southern Russia and Caucasia.

It was begun by and is usually dated from his victory at Senlac (Hastings) in 1066. The leading results were the downfall of the native English dynasty, the union of England, Normandy, etc., for a time under one sovereign, and the introduction into England of Norman-French customs, language, etc.

Norman Conquest in Italy. See the extract.

In 1016 a band of adventurous Normans settled at Aversa, near Naples. About twenty years later the elder sons of the Norman Tancred de Hauteville came and joined their countrymen. The Norman knights fought as adventurers in quarrels of the land, and, being angered at denial of their proper share of spoil after they had helped the Greeks to take Messina and Syracuse from the Saracens, they turned on the Greeks themselves, and beat them out of nearly all Apulia, which they then divided into twelve parts for twelve of their own counts. They made Melfi their capital, and chose William Iron-Arm, the eldest son of Tancred, for their chief. Pope Leo brought the Suabians against these Norman conquerors. They beat the Suabians and seized the Pope, who yielded them then his investment with all lands they might acquire: an investment which they religiously interpreted as Heaven's own encouragement to future conquests. Robert Guiscard, fourth son of Tancred, when it was his turn to rule, conquered his way as far south as Reggio, and became Duke of Apulia and Calabria. In 1059 he had that title ratified, when he acknowledged himself the Pope's vassal, and was made the standard-bearer of the Church. The standard-bearer then took Capua; besieged and took Salerno and Amalfi; held his own against all menace; and, in aid of the Pope Hildebrand, sacked Rome. The Norman Robert Guiscard, who thus played a master's part in Italy at the time of the Norman conquest of England, died in the same year as our William the Conqueror. His brother Roger, youngest son of Tancred de Hauteville, who had set out in 1060 to take Sicily from the Saracens and had taken it, succeeded Robert by right of the strong, and died, at the age of seventy, Great Count of Calabria and Sicily. His son, another Roger, when he had reached man's estate, became, by failure of Guiscard's line, undisputed master of Apulia. This Roger, having taken, after a few years, Capua and Naples, thought himself entitled to rank as a king. He was invested, therefore, by the Pope as "King by the Grace of God of Sicily, Apulia, and Calabria, the helper and shield of Christians, son and heir of Roger, the Great Count." Palermo was this Roger's capital. The new kingdom kept its boundaries for more than seven centuries, and it was the birthplace of that earlier Italian poetry which afterwards exercised so manifest an influence upon our literature. King Roger of Sicily died in 1154. His son and successor William the Bad had, in 1166, for son and successor William the Good, who married a daughter of our king Henry the Second, and died in 1189, leaving no children. Here ended the legitimate male line of descent from Tancred de Hauteville.

Morley, English Writers, III, 157-158.

Norman Conquest of England, History of the. The chief historical work of Edward A. Freeman (6 vols. 1867-79).

Normandy (nôr'man-di). [F. Normandie, ML. Normannia, Northmannia, land of the Normans or Northmen.] A former government of France, corresponding to Seine-Inférieure, Eure, Orne, Calvados, and Manche. Chief city, Rouen. It was bounded by the English Channel on the north and west, Picardy and the Isle of France on the east, Maine on the south, and Brittany on the southwest. The surface is generally level or hilly, and it is traversed from southeast to northwest by the Seine. It contains the old districts Caux, Vexin, Evreux, Bessin, Cotentin, etc. Under the Romans it was part of Lugdunensis. Later it was part of Neustria, and was then granted to the counts of Paris. It was the scene of early raids by the Northmen. Rollo, leader of the Northmen, received from the king the grant of the district between the Seine and Epte 911 (912?) and became first duke. This under Rollo and his successors was expanded by addition of Bessin, Cotentin, etc. It was Christianized in the 10th century, and became one of the chief fiefs of France. Its duke William conquered England 1066-69, and Maine in 1063. Anjou, Aquitaine, and Normandy were united 1152-54. Philip Augustus conquered Normandy (except the Channel Islands) in 1203-04. Normandy was occupied temporarily by Edward III. of England, and was conquered by Henry V. 1415-19, but was retaken finally by the French in 1450.

Norman Isles (nôr'man ilz), F. îles Normandes (êl nôr-mônd'). The Channel Islands.

North America (a-mer'i-kä). A grand division of the earth which comprises the northern half of the western continent. It extends from Bering Strait to the Isthmus of Panama. Its political divisions are British North America, the United States, Mexico, and the five states of Central America. In addition, Greenland and the north polar islands, north of the mainland, together with the West Indies, are reckoned in North America. The main physical features are the Cordilleran mountain system on the west, the Appalachian on the east, the great plain extending from the arctic regions to the Gulf of Mexico, the St. Lawrence and Great Lake system, and the Mississippi system. The eastern coast-line is much more indented than the western. The origin of the prehistoric races (mound-builders, etc.) is variously given. It is almost certain that North America was reached by Northmen about 1000 A. D.; and it may have been visited by isolated bands at various times before the rediscovery by Columbus in 1492. See America, United States, Mexico, etc.

Northampton (nôth-amp'ton). A south midland county of England. It is bounded by Leicester, Rutland, and Lincoln on the north, Cambridge, Huntingdon, and Bedford on the east, Buckingham and Oxford on the south, and Warwick on the west. The surface is undulating. North Carolina (kar-ŏ-li'nā). One of the South Atlantic States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 33° 50' to 36° 33' N., and from long. 75° 27' to 84° 20' W. Capital, Raleigh; chief city, Wilmington. It is bounded by Virginia on the north, the Atlantic on the east and southeast, South Carolina and Georgia on the south, and Tennessee (separated by the Smoky and other ranges of mountains) on the west. The surface is mountainous and tableland in the west (traversed by the Blue Ridge and other ranges of the Appalachian system); hilly and undulating in the center (the Piedmont region); and generally level in the east, where it is bordered by Albemarle, Pamlico, and other sounds. The leading occupation is agriculture; the chief products, Indian corn, cotton, tobacco, rice, timber, etc. There are mines of gold, mica, iron, and copper. It has 96 counties, sends 2 senators and 9 representatives to Congress, and has 11 electoral votes. Unsuccessful attempts were made to colonize the Carolina region under the auspices of Sir Walter Raleigh in 1584-87; it was settled probably before 1663, and was granted to proprietors in 1663 and 1665. A futile attempt was made to introduce a constitution framed by Shaftesbury and Locke in 1669. A royal province was formed in 1729, when North and South Carolina were separated. The "Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence" was passed in 1775. North Carolina was one of the thirteen original States (1770); was the scene of several battles in the Revolution (1780-81); rejected the United States Constitution in 1788, but adopted it in 1789; seceded May 20, 1861; was the scene of various engagements and military operations in the Civil War, particularly in connection with Burnside's expedition in 1862, the capture of Wilmington and other ports, and Sherman's march in 1865; and was readmitted to the Union in July, 1868. Area, 52,250 square miles. Population (1890), 1,617,947.

Northumberland, Duke of. See Dudley.

Northumberland, Earls of. See Percy.

Northumberland, Kingdom of, or Northumbria (nŏr-thum'bri-ā). A former kingdom of Great Britain, at its greatest extent reaching from the Humber to the Firth of Forth, and from the North Sea westward to the Celtic Strathclyde. The Anglian kingdoms of Bernicia in the north (founded by Ida in 547) and Deira (founded a few years later) were united under Ethelfrith about 600. Christianity was introduced under Edwin (died 633). Northumbria reached its highest point in the 7th century, as the most powerful kingdom in the island. It was the center of literature in the 7th and 8th centuries. It was largely resettled by the Danes in the 9th century; was nominally conquered by the Anglo-Saxons in the middle of the 10th century; and was governed by practically independent Danish earls till the period of the Norman conquest. The northern portion was ceded to Scotland about 1600.

Northumberland House. One of the chief historical houses of London, situated on the Strand, on the southeast side of Trafalgar Square. Northwest Territories. The territories of British North America which lay to the northwest of the older part of Canada. In 1882 four districts were organized out of them: Alberta, Athabasca, Assiniboia, and Saskatchewan. The Northwest Territory of to-day lies north of British Columbia, Athabasca, and Saskatchewan, and is comprised between long. 100° (the western boundary of Keewatin) and 141° W.

Northwest Territory. A territory formed by ordinance of Congress in 1787, comprising the present Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota east of the Mississippi. Slavery was prohibited in it.

Northwich (nôth'wich). A town in Cheshire, England, situated at the junction of the Weaver and Dane, 21 miles southeast of Liverpool. It is noted for salt-mines. Population (1891), 14,914.

Norton (nôr'ton), Andrews. Born at Hingham, Mass., Dec. 31, 1786; died at Newport, R. I., Sept. 18, 1853. An American Unitarian theologian, professor at Harvard 1819-30. His works include "A Statement of the Reasons for not believing the Doctrines of the Trinitarians" (1833), etc.

Norton, Mrs. (Caroline Elizabeth Sarah Sheridan), afterward Lady Stirling-Maxwell. Born 1808; died June 15, 1877. An English poet and novelist. She was one of "the three graces," daughters of Thomas Sheridan. She published "The Dandies' Rout" (illustrated by herself at the age of 18), and the poems "The Sorrows of Rosalie, etc." (1829) and "The Undying One" (1830). She also wrote "A Voice from the Factories" (1836), "The Dream, and Other Poems" (1840), "The Child of the Islands" (1845), "Stuart of Dunleath" (1851; a novel), "The Lady of La Garaye" (1862; a poem), "Lust and Saved" (1863), "Old Sir Douglas" (1867), etc. She married in 1827 the Hon. George Chapple Norton (who died in 1875), and in 1877 Sir W. Stirling-Maxwell.

Norton, Charles Eliot. Born at Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 16, 1827. An American author, son of Andrews Norton. He graduated at Harvard in 1846, and was editor, with James Russell Lowell, of the "North American Review" 1864-68. He is professor of the history of art at Harvard University. Among his works are "The New Life of Dante: an Essay, with translations" (1858), "Notes of Travel and Study in Italy" (1859), "List of the Principal Books relating to Michael Angelo" (1879), "Historical Studies of Church-Building in the Middle Ages" (1880). He translated Dante's "Divina Commedia" (1892), with revised translation of the "Vita Nuova," and edited James Russell Lowell's letters in 1893, etc.

Norton, Thomas. Born at London, 1532; died at Sharpenhoe, Bedfordshire, 1584. An English lawyer, translator, and author. He wrote (with Sackville) the first English tragedy, "Gorboduc, or Ferrex and Porrex" (which see). He published a "Translation of Calvin's Institutes" (1561), and translated many of the psalms in the Psalter of Sternhold and Hopkins (1561), etc.

Norton Sound. An inlet of Bering Sea, on the western coast of Alaska.

Norumbega (nô-rum-bê'gä). A region on the Atlantic coast of North America, frequently mentioned in maps and writings of the 16th and 17th centuries. It was placed between Cape Breton and Florida, or narrowed to the northern part of that region, or more definitely placed within the present State of Maine. Various English and French explorers made journeys to Norumbega. It is disputed whether the name is of Indian, Norse, or Spanish origin. The river of Norumbega has been often identified with the Penobscot. Professor Horsford identified the lost city of Norumbega with Watertown, Massachusetts.

Norval (nôr'val), Young. In Home's play "Douglas," the son of Lady Randolph by a previous marriage with Douglas. His birth was concealed, and he was brought up as a shepherd by Old Norval, "the frugal swain," who found him. He is killed by Lord Randolph, who discovers too late that he is the son of Lady Randolph. The latter kills herself in despair. The part was a favorite one with John Kemble and others, and Macready played it to Mrs. Siddons's Lady Randolph.

Norwalk (nôr'wäk). A township in Fairfield County, Connecticut, situated on Long Island Sound 30 miles southwest of New Haven. It has manufactures of hats, etc. It was settled about 1640, and was burned by the Hessians under Tryon in 1779. Population (including South Norwalk) (1890), 17,747.

Norwalk. The capital of Huron County, northern Ohio, 51 miles west-southwest of Cleveland. Population (1890), 7,195.

Norway (nôr'wä). [ME. Norwey, Norwey, AS. Norweg, earlier Norweg, Icel. Noregr, very rarely Norvegr, Norw. Dan. and Sw. Norge, G. Norwegen, F. Norvège, ML. Norregia, Northwagia, etc., lit. 'north way.' The first element has been erroneously referred to a mythical king Nôr, and to the Icel. nôr, a sea loch.] The northernmost country of Europe. Capital, Christiania. It is bounded by the Arctic Ocean on the north, Russia and Sweden on the east, the Skager Rack on the south, and the North Sea and the Atlantic and Arctic oceans on the west. It forms the western part of the Scandinavian peninsula, comprising also many islands. The coast-line is deeply indented by fjords. The country is traversed by mountains (Scandinavian Mountains, Dovre Fjeld, Jotun Fjelde, etc.), and the surface is generally elevated and mountainous. Among the leading industries are fisheries and lumber manufacture and trade. There are mines of silver, copper, iron, and nickel. The kingdom is divided into 20 amt (or provinces). The government is a limited hereditary monarchy. It is under the same sovereign with Sweden, with which it is united in foreign and diplomatic relations, but otherwise it is independent. The king and a ministry form the executive, and the legislative power is vested in the Storting (or parliament), consisting of an upper and a lower house. The language is Norwegian. The established religion is Lutheran. Norway furnished a large part of the Northmen. The kingdom was consolidated under Harold the Fair-haired in the last part of the 9th century. Christianity was introduced at the end of the 10th century. The three Scandinavian kingdoms were united from the union of Kalmar in 1397 until 1523. Norway was separated from Denmark and united to Sweden in 1814. Recent events are the constitutional struggles against the veto power of the king, and the agitation for independent consular representation abroad. Area, 124,495 square miles. Population (1891), 2,901,000.

Norwegian (nôr-wé'jian). The Scandinavian language of Norway. Old Norwegian is preserved in runic inscriptions from the end of the Viking age in the 11th century, and in literature from the end of the 12th century. At the time of the Reformation, Danish became the language of literature, a condition which prevails at the present time. Dano-Norwegian is, however, characteristically differentiated in pronunciation and vocabulary, and the old popular dialects have never died out.

Norwegian Sea (nôr-wé'jian sé). A name given in recent geography to that part of the North Atlantic Ocean which lies between Norway and Greenland.

Norwich (nôr'ij). [ME. Norwich, AS. Northwic, north town.] The capital of Norfolk, England, and itself a county, situated on the Wensum in lat. 52° 38' N., long. 1° 17' E.: the British Caer-Gwent, and the Gwenta of the Iceni. It has manufactures of mustard, starch, beer, iron, textiles, etc. The cathedral begun in 1096, is said to preserve its Norman plan with less alteration than any other English cathedral. The nave was completed in 1146, the choir of the choir was rebuilt in the 14th century, and the vaulting dates from the 15th, at which time the west front was modified and the tall slender spire rebuilt. The exterior is surrounded by a picturesque arcade of small arches and columns, above the lowest range of windows. In the interior the simple nave is Norman, except the perpendicular windows and the vaulting. The choir is shut off from the nave by a solid screen surmounted by a tall organ, more disastrous as an obstruction to the view than the inclosure of the "choir" of a Spanish cathedral. The choir terminates in a polygonal chevet, the only example of this form in an English church of the first rank. The triforium-gallery is notably wide and high. The dimensions of the cathedral are 407 by 78 feet; length of transepts, 178; height of vaulting— nave 70, choir 83; height of spire, 315 feet. The Decorated cloister is large and beautiful, and the episcopal palace is in large part of the 14th century. The Church of St. Peter, Mancroft, the castle, and St. Andrew's Hall are also noteworthy. Norwich was a British and a Roman town; was burned by Sweyn; became the seat of the bishopric of East Anglia in 1064; received a colony of Flemish weavers in the 14th century; and became an important center for cloth manufactures. It was one of the leading towns in England in the 17th century. It returns 2 members to Parliament. Population (1891), 100,964.

Norwich (nôr'wich). A city, one of the capitals of New London County, Connecticut, situated at the head of the Thames, 13 miles north of New London. It has an important trade, and manufactures of paper, cotton and woolen goods, metal-work, etc., and is the terminus of a line of steamers to New York. It was settled in 1659, and incorporated as a city in 1784. Population (1890), 16,156.

Norwich. A village, the capital of Chenango County, New York, situated on Chenango River 49 miles southeast of Syracuse. Population (1890), 5,212.

Norwich Festival. A musical festival held triennially at Norwich, England: established in 1824.

Norwood (nôr'wuid). A suburb of London, situated in Surrey 6 miles south of St. Paul's.

Norwood. A northeastern suburb of Adelaide, South Australia.

Norwood, or Village Life in New England. A novel by Henry Ward Beecher, published in 1867.

Noskowski (nos-kof'skê), Sigismund. Born at Warsaw, May 2, 1846. A Polish composer. He invented a system of notation for the use of the blind.

Nossi-Bé (nôs-sê-bâ'). An island north of Madagascar, belonging to France, situated in lat. 13° 23' S., long. 48° 16' E. Capital, Hellville. The inhabitants are mostly Sakalavas. It was ceded to France in 1840. Length, 14 miles. Population, 7,803.

Nostoi (nos'toi). [Gr. νόστοι.] "The Homeward Voyages," a Greek epic poem of the Trojan cycle, by Agias of Træzen (about 740 B. C.), which related the return of the Achaean heroes from the Trojan war.

Nostradamus (nôs-tra-dä'mus) (Michel de Nostredame or Nostredame). Born at St.-Remy, France, Dec. 14, 1503; died at Salon, near Aix, France, July 2, 1566. A French astrologer and physician, noted as the author of a book of prophecies entitled "Centuries" (1555), which has been the subject of much controversy. It was condemned by the papal court in 1781.

Notables, Assembly of. In French history, a council of prominent persons from the three classes of the state, convoked by the king on extraordinary occasions. The institution can be traced to the reign of Charles V. (14th century), but the two most famous assemblies were those of 1787 and 1788, summoned by Louis XVI. in view of the impending crisis.

Notæ Tironianæ (nô'tê tî-rô-nî-ä'nê). [L., 'Tiro's marks.'] Ancient shorthand abbreviations; so named on the supposition that Tiro, Cicero's freedman and pupil, invented the art. An extensive collection under the title "Notæ Tironis et Senecæ" has been published.

Notch, The, or Crawford Notch (krä'förd noch). A deep, narrow valley in the White Mountains, New Hampshire, southwest of Mount Washington, between Mount Webster and Mount Willey.

Notitia Dignitatum (nô-tish'î-ä dig-nî-tä'tum). [L., 'list of dignities.'] See the extract.

Its full title is, "Notitia dignitatum omnium, tam civilium quam militarium, in partibus Orientis et Occidentis." There can be little doubt that it was compiled in the first years of the fifth century, probably about the time of Alaric's first invasion of Italy. It is a complete Official Directory and Army List of the whole Roman Empire, and is of incalculable value for the decision of all sorts of questions, antiquarian and historical. For instance, the whole theory of the identification of the existing ruins with the former stations along the line of Hadrian's British Wall depends entirely on the mention in the Notitia of the names of the cohorts posted at those stations.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, L 200.

Notium (nô'shi-um). [Gr. Νότιον.] In ancient geography, the port of Colophon, near Ephesus. Near it, in 407 B. C., the Spartan fleet under Lysander defeated the Athenians.

Notker (nôt'kêr), surnamed Balbulus ('the Stammerer'). Born in Switzerland about 840; died 912. A monk of St.-Gall, noted for his reforms in church music, and as a composer of sequences.

Notker, surnamed Labeo ('with large lips'). Died 1022. A monk of St.-Gall, translator of various Latin and Greek works into Old High German.

Noto (nô'tô). A city in the province of Syracuse, Sicily, 15 miles southwest of Syracuse. It was built near the ancient Notum (Gr. Νότος), which was destroyed by an earthquake in 1603. Population (1881), 7,418.

Noto, Val di. A former division of Sicily, in the southeastern part.

Notre Dame (nô'tr däm). [F., 'our Lady.'] A church at Paris, one of the most imposing and famous of cathedrals. The present structure was begun in 1163, but is chiefly of the early 13th century. The façade, with its 3 large portals, its great roses, its gallery and arcades, and its twin square towers, is one of the two or three finest produced by pointed architecture. The transept-fronts are unsurpassed in their way, and the long range of windows and flying buttresses of nave and choir is highly effective. The figure- and foliage-sculpture of the exterior is abundant and artistically remarkable. The graceful rood-spire was built by Viollet-le-Duc in place of the original one. The interior, with nave and double aisles continued around the choir, measures 156 by 420 feet, and 110 high. The three roses retain their original glass, but the remainder of the glass is modern. The choir-screen is carved with interesting New Testament reliefs of the 14th century.

Notre Dame de Brou. A church at Bourg, France, in the latest florid-Pointed style, built by Margaret of Austria between 1505 and 1536. The west front has three pediments and a richly carved porch; the nave is simple, but the choir is splendidly decorated as the mausoleum of Margaret of Austria, her husband Philibert le Beau of Savoy, and her mother-in-law. The tombs, especially that of the prince, are adorned with a profusion of statues and minor sculptures. The carved rood-screen and choir-stalls are of rare excellence.

Notre Dame de la Salette (nô'tr däm dê lä sä-let'). A locality in France, in the Alps near Grenoble. It is noted as the scene of an alleged appearance of the Virgin in 1846. It is a place of pilgrimage.

Notre Dame de Paris. A prose romance by Victor Hugo, published in 1831. The scene is laid at Paris in the end of the reign of Louis XI. It is a vigorous but somber picture of medieval manners.

Nott (not). Eliphalet. Born at Ashford, Conn., June 25, 1773; died at Schenectady, N. Y., Jan. 29, 1866. An American educator, president of Union College, Schenectady, 1804-66. He published "Counsels to Young Men" (1810), "Lectures on Temperance" (1847), etc.

Nott, Josiah Clark. Born at Columbia, S. C., March 24, 1804; died at Mobile, Ala., March 31, 1873. An American ethnologist. He wrote "Connection between the Biblical and Physical History of Man" (1849), "Physical History of the Jewish Race" (1850), and, conjointly with Gliddon, "Types of Mankind" (1854), "Indigenous Races of the Earth" (1857), etc.

Nottingham (not'ing-am), or Nottinghamshire. [ME. Notinghamshire, AS. Snotinghamseir.] A north midland county of England. It is bounded by Yorkshire on the northwest, Lincoln on the east, Leicestershire on the south, and Derby on the west. Its surface is level and undulating. It has coal-mines, and important manufactures of hosiery and lace, and contains remains of Sherwood Forest (the haunt of Robin Hood). Area, 843 square miles. Population (1891), 445,823.

Nottingham. [ME. Notingham, AS. Snotingham, dwelling of the Snotings.] The capital of the county of Nottingham, England, situated near the Trent, in lat. 52° 58' N., long. 1° 6' W. It is the center of the English lace and hosiery manufacture, and has also manufactures of silk, etc. It contains a castle, University College, and a very large market-place. It was one of the Five Boroughs of the Danes, and was reconquered by Edward the Elder. Its castle was built by William the Conqueror. Here Mortimer and Queen Isabella were captured in 1330. Charles I. raised his standard here, in 1642, at the beginning of the civil war. The castle was destroyed in the civil war, and again by a Reform Bill mob in 1831. The town was the scene of the Ludite riots. It returns 3 members to Parliament. Population (1891), 211,984.

Nottingham, Earls of. See Finch and Mowbray.

Nottoway (not'ō-wā). [Pl., also Nottoways. The name means "snake," figuratively "enemy."] A tribe of North American Indians, formerly living on the river of the same name in southern Virginia. They are now extinct. See Iroquoian.

Notts. An abbreviation of Nottinghamshire.

Nouméa (nō-mā-ā'). The capital of the French colony of New Caledonia. Population, about 4,000.

Noureddin, or Nureddin (nōr-ed-dēn') (Malek-al-Adel Nureddin Mahmoud). Born at Damascus about 1116; died about 1173. Sultan of Syria from about 1145. He conquered Egypt and became its sultan.

Nourmahal (nōr-mā-hāl'). [Light of the Harem.] One of the ladies of the harem of the calif Harun-al-Rashid. The story of his quarrel and reconciliation with her is told in Moore's poem "The Light of the Harem." She was afterward called Nourjehan, or 'Light of the World.'

Nouronihar (nō-ron-i-hār'). In Beckford's "Vathek," the daughter of Fakreddin, a mischievous girl with whom Vathek falls in love, and who accompanies him to the hall of Eblis.

Nourrit (nō-rē'). Adolphe. Born at Paris, March 3, 1802; died at Naples, March 8, 1839. A French tenor singer, son of Louis Nourrit (1780-1831), also a tenor. He made his first appearance at Paris in 1821, and from 1826-36 created all the first tenor parts at the Académie. He retired in 1837 on the engagement of Duprez, and went to Italy, and his mind being weakened by his disappointment and by jealousy of Duprez, he killed himself in a fit of delirium. Grove.

Nouvelle Héloïse, Julie ou la (zhū-lō' ō lā nō-vel' ā-lō-ēz'). A sentimental novel by J. J. Rousseau, published in 1761.

This is a story told chiefly in the form of letters, and recounting the love of a noble young lady, Julie, for Saint-Prenx, a man of low rank, with a kind of after-piece depicting Julie's married life with a respectable but prosaic free-thinker, M. de Wolmar. This famous book set the example, first, of the novel of sentiment; secondly, of the novel of landscape-painting. Many efforts have been made to dethrone Rousseau from his position of teacher of Europe in point of sentiment and the picturesque, but they have had no real success. It is to "La Nouvelle Héloïse" that both sentimental and picturesque fictions fairly owe their original popularity; yet "Julie" cannot be called a good novel. Its direct narrative interest is but small, its characters too intensely drawn, or else too merely conventional, its plot far too meagre. It is in isolated passages of description, and in the fervent passion which pervades parts of it, that its value, and at the same time its importance in the history of novel-writing, consist.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 423.

Nouvion (nō-vyōn'). A town in the department of Aisne, France, 33 miles north of Laon. Population (1891), commune, 3,110.

Nouzou (nō-zōn'). A manufacturing town in the department of Ardennes, France, situated on the Meuse 5 miles north-northeast of Mézières. Population (1891), commune, 6,741.

Novalis (nō-vā'lis): pseudonym of Friedrich von Hardenberg. Born on the paternal estate Wiederstedt, Mansfeld, Germany, May 2, 1772; died at Weissenfels, March 25, 1801. A German lyric poet. He studied jurisprudence at Jena, Leipzig, and Wittenberg. In 1794 he received a subordinate judicial position at Tennstedt in Thuringia, which, however, he soon abandoned to take up mining engineering as offering more rapid advancement. He died at the age of 29. His lyric poems are both secular and religious. "Hymnen an die Nacht" ("Hymns to Night") are lyrics in prose evoked by the death of Sophie von Kuhn, to whom he was engaged. A novel, "Heinrich von Ofterdingen," is fragmentary. As a writer he belongs to the so-called older Romantic school, of which he was the best lyric poet. His collected writings were published at Berlin, 1802, in 2 vols., to which were added a third (Berlin, 1846) and "Elne Nachlese" ("Gleanings": Gotha, 1873). His correspondence with the Schlegels was published at Mainz in 1850.

Novara (nō-vā'ra). 1. A province in Piedmont, Italy, bordering on Switzerland. Area, 2,553 square miles. Population (1891), 732,104.—2. The capital of the province of Novara, 29 miles west of Milan: the ancient Novaria. It is a commercial, manufacturing, and railway center. The cathedral, founded in 390, but essentially of the 11th century, though injured by modern alteration and decoration, is one of the rare Italian examples of the union of church and towers. The Baptistery, essentially of the 11th century, though of much older foundation, is octagonal, 36 feet in diameter, with a domical vault. The ancient font of white marble is carved with pilasters, diaper-work, and oak-leafage. Battles were fought by the French here in 1495 and 1500; and in 1513 the Swiss defeated the French. In 1821 the Austrians defeated the Piedmontese insurgents. The most famous battle of Novara is that of March 23, 1849, when the Austrians under Radetzky defeated the Sardinians under Charles Albert. The latter immediately abdicated in favor of his son Victor Emmanuel. Population (1892), 85,000.

Novara Expedition. An Austrian scientific expedition around the world in the frigate Novara, 1857-59.

Nova Scotia (nō'vā skō'shi-ā). [L., 'New Scotland.'] A maritime province of the Dominion of Canada. Capital, Halifax. It consists mainly of a peninsula bounded by New Brunswick (separated by the Bay of Fundy) on the northwest, Northumberland Strait (separating it from Prince Edward Island) and the Gulf of St. Lawrence on the north, the Gut of Canso (separating it from Cape Breton) on the northeast, and the Atlantic on the south and southwest; but also includes the island of Cape Breton, northeast of the peninsula. Its surface is undulating, and is traversed by several ranges of hills. It has a long coast-line. There are mines of coal, gold, gypsum, and iron. The leading industries are fisheries, agriculture, and ship-building. It has 18 counties. Government is administered by a lieutenant-governor (with an executive council), a legislative council (21 members), and a legislative assembly (38 members). The province is represented in the Dominion Parliament by 10 senators and 20 members of the House of Commons. Nova Scotia was discovered by the Cabots in 1497. Unsuccessful attempts at settlement were made by the French under De Monts in 1604 and succeeding years. It was granted to Sir William Alexander in 1621, but was settled by the French later, forming part of Acadia. Nova Scotia baronets were created by Charles I. It was taken by England in 1654, given to France in 1667, and finally ceded to England in 1713. The French settlers (Acadians) were expelled in 1755. A constitution was granted in 1758. New Brunswick was separated from it in 1784; Cape Breton was separated in 1784, but reunited in 1819. It joined the Dominion in 1867. Area, 20,550 square miles. Population (1891), 450,396.

Novatian (nō-vā'shian), L. Novatianus (nō-vā-shi-ā'nus). Lived in the middle of the 3d century. A Roman presbyter, founder of the sect of the Novatians. He had himself consecrated bishop of Rome in opposition to Cornelius in 251. He is also called Novatus.

Novatians (nō-vā'shianz). In church history, a sect founded in the 3d century by Novatianus, or Novatus (see above), and by Novatus of Carthage. Novatianus denied that the church had power to absolve or restore to communion those who after Christian baptism had lapsed or fallen into idolatry in time of persecution; and his followers appear to have refused the grant of forgiveness to all grave post-baptismal sin, and denied the validity of Catholic baptism, considering themselves the true church. They assumed the name of Cathari, 'the Pure,' on the strength of their severity of discipline. In other respects they differed very little from the Catholics; and they were generally received back into communion on comparatively favorable terms. The sect continued to the 6th century.

Nova Zeelandia (nō'vā zē-lan'di-ā). [L., 'New Zealand.'] The name given by the Dutch to their settlements on the Essequibo River, Guiana, in 1596.

Nova Zembla (nō'vā zem'blā), Russ. Novaya Zemlya (nō'vā-yā zem-lyā'). ['New Land.'] An uninhabited double island in the Arctic Ocean, situated north of Russia and northwest of Siberia, belonging to the government of Archangel, Russia. It is separated into two parts by the narrow Matochkin Shar, and is separated from the mainland by Kara Sea (and indirectly by Kara Strait). The surface is elevated and mountainous. It is visited by hunters and fishermen. It was discovered by the English in the middle of the 16th century. Length, about 600 miles. Area, 35,000 square miles.

Novel (nov'el). A character in Wycherley's comedy "The Plain Dealer." He is a pert coxcomb "who, rather than not rail, will rail at the dead, whom none speak ill of; rather than not flatter, will flatter the poets of the age, whom none will flatter" (ii. 1). He is a great lover of novelties, and makes love to Olivia.

Novello (nō-vel'lo). Clara Anastasia. Born June 10, 1818. An English soprano singer, daughter of Vincent Novello. She studied at the Conservatoire in Paris in 1829, and made her first appearance at a concert in 1833. She was successful in concert-singing, but went to Italy in 1839, studied for the stage, and made her first appearance in "Semiramide" at Padua in 1841. She appeared in oratorio in England in 1851, and was even more acceptable in this than in the other two branches of her art. She ceased singing in public in 1860. She married Count Gigliucci in 1843.

Novello, Joseph Alfred. Born 1810. A music-publisher, son of Vincent Novello. He opened an establishment as a regular publisher of music in 1829, now known as "Novello, Ewer and Co.," continuing the publications begun by his father, among them "Purcell's Sacred Music." He introduced Mendelssohn's works to the English public, and was prominent in furthering the interests of art and science, and also introduced a system of printing cheap music. He retired from business in 1856, and went to Italy, where he interested himself in studying the properties of water and the construction of ships.

Novello, Vincent. Born at London, Sept. 6, 1781; died at Nice, France, Aug. 9, 1861. An English composer and musical editor. In 1811 he began to publish music from his private house. This was the origin of the firm known later as Novello, Ewer and Co. See Novello, Joseph Alfred.

Novempopulana (nō-ven-pop-ū-lā'nā), or Novempopulania (nō-ven-pop-ū-lā'nī-ā). A Roman province of southwestern Gaul, in the later empire.

Noverre (nō-vār'). Jean Georges. Born at Paris, March 29, 1727; died at Saint-Germain-en-Laye, France, Nov. 19, 1810. A French dancing-master, writer on dancing, and composer of ballets, noted for his improvements in the development of the ballet.

Novgorod (nov'go-rod). ['New town.'] 1. A government of Russia, surrounded by the governments of St. Petersburg, Olonetz, Vologda, Yaroslaff, Tver, and Pskoff. It contains the Valdai Hills in the south. Area, 47,236 square miles. Population (1890), 1,254,900.—2. The capital of Novgorod, situated on the Volkhoff, near Lake Ilmen, 100 miles south-southeast of St. Petersburg. The Cathedral of St. Sophia, within the walls of the highly picturesque Kremlin, or citadel, was built in the middle of the 11th century by workmen from Constantinople; and, despite several restorations, it retains in great measure its Byzantine character. The dimensions are 105 by 119 feet, and 161 feet high to the apex of the central dome, which rests on 8 quadrangular piers. There are 4 flanking domes, and a sixth dome over the sacristy. The cathedral abounds in tombs of artistic and historical interest, and in rich church furniture, the carved stalls of the czar and the metropolitan and the old bronze doors with reliefs being especially noteworthy. The iconostasis bears several fine old icons. Novgorod is one of the oldest cities of Russia. It invited the Varangians for Russian defense about 862. In medieval times it was one of the largest cities of Russia and one of the leading commercial centers of Europe, and was the capital of an independent state. It was brought under the dominion of Moscow about 1478, and was sacked by Ivan the Terrible in 1570. Its commercial importance has been entirely destroyed by the foundation of St. Petersburg and the introduction of railways. Population (1893), 25,058.

Novgorod, Principality of. The principality which lay around the city of Novgorod, Russia, and was founded by Rurik the Varangian about 862. It was thus the nucleus of the Russian monarchy. Under Rurik's successor the capital was transferred to Kieff. Novgorod continued as a "republican principality" with many privileges. Its territories included at its height Ingria, Karelia, part of Estonia and Livonia, Permian, Petchora, and large tracts in northern Russia. It was subdued by Ivan III., grand prince of Moscow, and its existence as a separate commonwealth ended in 1478.

Nowell (nō'el), Alexander. Born in Lancashire, England, about 1507; died Feb., 1602. An English ecclesiastic. He was educated at Brasenose College, Oxford. He was dean of St. Paul's, and prolocutor of the convocation that met in Jan., 1563, with the object of church reform, when the articles were revised and reduced from 42 to 39. They became law in 1571. He compiled the Larger, Middle, and Small church catechisms, which were published separately in 1570 and 1572.

Nowell, Robert. Born in Lancashire about 1520; died at Gray's Inn, London, Feb. 6, 1569. An English lawyer, a brother of Alexander Nowell. He obtained many good appointments, and became rich. He is principally remembered for a fund which he established by his will for benefactions to the poor. His brothers and John Towneley were his executors, and left a list of the persons to whom money was paid. This list came into the possession of the family of John Towneley, and was discovered by H. B. Knowles at Towneley Hall, and published in his report to the Historical Manuscripts Commission in 1837. It contains important facts regarding Edmund Spenser, who was one of the poor scholars benefited from time to time. The list was printed by Grosart in 1871, entitled "The Spending of the Money of Robert Nowell of Reade Hall, Lancashire, etc."

No Wit, No Help like a Woman's. A comedy of intrigue by Middleton, acted in 1613-14. Shirley revived it, somewhat altered, in 1638 as "No Wit to a Woman's." It was not printed till 1657.

He established a society of perfectionists at Putney, Vermont, about 1835, and founded the Oneida Community in Madison County, New York, 1847-48. He wrote a "History of American Socialism," etc.

Noyon (nō-wā-yōn'). A town in the department of Oise, France, situated on the Verse 58 miles north-northeast of Paris; the Roman Noviodunum Veromanduorum. The cathedral is a monument chiefly of the time of transition from Romanesque to Pointed. Both transepts have semicircular ends, and the west front possesses a triple porch and twin towers. The round and pointed types occur indiscriminately among the arches. The 13th-century chapter-house is of great beauty. Noyon was formerly the seat of a bishopric. It is the place where Charles the Great was crowned, where Hugh Capet was chosen king in 987, and where a treaty was made between Francis I. and Charles V. in 1516. It was the birthplace of Calvin. Population (1891), commune, 6,144.

Nozi. See Yanan.

Nozze Aldobrandini (not'se il-dō-brān-dē'nē).

[It., 'the Aldobrandini wedding': referring to the owner of the painting.] A celebrated ancient wall-painting discovered 1606 in an excavation at Rome, and now in the Vatican. The subject is the preparation for a wedding. The bride, crowned with myrtle, is attended by her bridesmaid; the bridegroom is wreathed with ivy; and at one side three women are offering sacrifice for the couple.

Nozze di Figaro (not'se dē fē'gā-rō). [It., 'Marriage of Figaro.'] An opera by Mozart, produced at Vienna in 1786. The libretto was adapted by Da Ponte from the "Mariage de Figaro" by Beaumarchais. It was played at Paris with Beaumarchais's words as "Le mariage de Figaro" in 1793, and as "Les noces de Figaro," words by Barbier and Carré, in 1858. Grove.

Nuba (nō'bā). A nation of the Nile valley which occupies the stretch between the first and second cataracts, to which place it was brought from Meoec by Diocletian 16 centuries ago. After adopting Christianity, these Nubas or Nubians founded, under Silko, the Christian state of Dongola, which lasted until 651. They adopted Islam only in 1320, and became subjects of the Khedive in 1815. Lepsius says they are descendants of the ancient nation of Fava. In race they are mixed Nigritic and Hamitic. Their language has preserved a Nigritic structure. The Nubas of Djebel Deyer, south of Kordofan, from whom the Dongolan Nubas descend, are still pure negroes. The dialects of Nuba are Mahaa or Sukkod, Kenus, Dongola, and Fadisha. See Nuba-Fulah.

Nuba-Fulah (nō'bā-fō'lā). A group of African tribes and languages originated by Friedrich Müller and adopted by R. N. Cust, and misunderstood by many Africanists. It is not a race or a family of languages, but a grouping of tribes and languages of mixed type which the present state of knowledge and their mixed nature will not permit to be assigned with certainty to the Hamitic or Negro families. It is made to include the Nuba, Koldaji, Tumale, Konjara, Kwafi, Masai, Berta, Kanamil, Funji, Krej, Nyam-Nyam, Mombuttu, and the Fulahs of western Sudan. As knowledge progresses, these disconnected tribes and languages will be subordinated to the Hamitic and Negro families. Some tribes belong by race rather to one, and by language rather to the other, family. The Fulahs, the Masai, and the Kwafi are rather Hamitic in race and customs, the Nyam-Nyam and Mombuttu more Nigritic.

Nubar Pasha (nō'bār pash'ā). Born in 1825. An Egyptian statesman and diplomatist. He was ambassador at Vienna in 1854; minister of foreign affairs under Ismail Pasha 1867-70; and premier 1878-79 and 1884-88. He was again appointed premier, April 14, 1894.

Nubia (nū'bi-ā). A region in Africa, bounded by Egypt (from about the neighborhood of Wady Halfa, in lat. 21° 51' N.) on the north, the Red Sea on the east, Abyssinia, Sennaar, and Kordofan on the south, and the desert on the west. It is not a political division. The chief portions are the valley of the Nile and Taka. It is nominally an Egyptian possession. The chief city is Khartum, at the junction of the White Nile and the Blue Nile. The inhabitants are Nubas (see Nuba), Arabs, and Ababeh (Hamitic). It was subject to Thothmes III.; was part of the ancient Ethiopia; and was conquered by the forces of Mehemet Ali in 1820-1822. It fell into the power of the Mahdi in 1883; and it was the scene of English-Egyptian expeditions in 1883-85.

The Nubians, in spite of their black skins, are usually classed among the handsomest of mankind, just as the negroes are among the ugliest. They are tall, spare, and well-proportioned. The hair is black and fairly straight, and there is very little of it on the body. The nostrils and lips are thin, the eyes dark, the nose somewhat aquiline. The flat feet with which they are credited are not a racial characteristic, but are due to their walking without shoes.

As among the Egyptians, the second toe is longer than the first. Constitutionally the Nubians are delicate, and are peculiarly sensitive to pneumonia. They suffer also from early decay of the teeth, and are not a long-lived race.

Sayer, Races of the O. T., p. 51.

Nuble (nyō'blā). A province of Chile, intersected by lat. 37° S., bordering on the Argentine Republic. Capital, Chillan. Area, 3,556 square miles. Population (1891), 161,689.

Nueva Andalucía (nūwā'vā ān-dā-lō-thē'ā). ['New Andalucía.'] 1. The district in north-western South America ceded to Ojeda in 1508, and later to Heredia. It corresponded to the coast of Colombia from Cape Vela to the Gulf of Darien. Ancient and modern authors frequently confuse this name with Castilla del Oro (which see).

2. A name given to the Amazon region ceded to Orellana in 1544. See Orellana, Francisco de.

Nueva España. See New Spain.

Nueva Galicia (gū-lē'thē'ā). ['New Galicia.'] A primary division of colonial New Spain, or Mexico, long known officially as Reino de Nueva Galicia. Its limits varied at different times, but during the greater part of the 17th and 18th centuries it corresponded nearly to the modern states of Jalisco, Acagua Calientes, and Zacatecas, with a small part of San Luis Potosí; at an earlier period it also embraced, for a time, Durango and Sinaloa. It was partly conquered in 1530 by Nuño de Guzman. The audience of Guadalajara, created in 1543, had jurisdiction over Nueva Galicia, subject to appeal to the audience of Mexico. The governor, who was also president of the audience, was appointed by the king, but in military and treasury matters was subordinate to the viceroy of New Spain. In 1786 Nueva Galicia became the intendency of Guadalajara. After 1793 the Provincias Internas (Sonora, Sinaloa, Durango, Chihuahua, New Mexico, Coahuila, and Texas) were judicially subordinate to the audience of Guadalajara.

Nueva Granada. See New Granada.

Nuevas Ordenanzas. See New Laws.

Nueva Toledo (tō-lā'thō). ['New Toledo.']

The official name of the territory in western South America granted to Diego Almagro in 1534. It corresponded nearly to northern Chile, western Bolivia, and a small part of Peru. Disputes as to its boundary with the territory granted to Pizarro resulted in a civil war and the death of Almagro.

Nueva Valladolid (vū-yā'thō-lē'th). The colonial name of Comayagua, Honduras.

Nueva Vizcaya (vēth-kī'ā). ['New Biscay.']

A colonial division of New Spain, or Mexico, corresponding (nearly) to the modern states of Durango, Chihuahua, Sinaloa, Sonora, and the southern part of Coahuila. It was originally called Copala. Francisco de Ibarra, who conquered a part of it between 1560 and 1570, named it Reino de la Nueva Vizcaya, an appellation which it retained until after the independence. During the 17th and most of the 18th century the governor of Nueva Vizcaya was subordinate to the viceroy of Mexico only in military and treasury affairs. In 1777 this region was included in the Provincias Internas.

Nuevo Leon (lā-ōn'). ['New Leon.'] 1. A division of colonial New Spain, or Mexico, corresponding to the present state of that name together with portions of San Luis Potosí and Tamaulipas. It was long known as the Nuevo Reino de Leon. In 1786 it was attached to the intendency of San Luis Potosí.

2. A state in northeastern Mexico, surrounded by the states of Coahuila, Tamaulipas, and San Luis Potosí. Capital, Monterrey. Area, 25,980 square miles. Population (1894), 293,793.

Nuevo Santander (sūn-tān-dār'). A division of colonial New Spain, or Mexico, corresponding (nearly) to the modern state of Tamaulipas. Officially, until 1786, it was known as a colony.

Nullification, Ordinance of. An ordinance passed by a State convention of South Carolina, Nov. 19, 1832, declaring void certain acts of the United States Congress levying duties and imposts on imports, and threatening that any attempt to enforce those acts, except through the courts in that State, would be followed by the secession of South Carolina from the Union. It was repealed by the State convention which met on March 16, 1833. See Jackson, Andrew.

Numantia (nū-man'shi-i). In ancient geography, the capital of the Celtiberian people Arcvaci, situated on the Doure near the modern Seria. It was famous on account of its siege by the Romans under Scipio Africanus Minor, beginning in 134 B. C. It was taken and destroyed in 133.

Numantine War (nū-man'tin wär). A war between the Romans and the Celtiberians of northern central Spain, 143-133 B. C., ending in the destruction of Numantia in 133 B. C.

Numa Pompilius (nū-mä pom-pil'i-us). According to the legends, the second king of Rome (715-672 B. C.). He was the reputed author of many Roman institutions, including the pontifex, salii, flamens, fetiales, vestal virgins, worship of Terminus, temple of Janus, etc.

Numbers (num'bérz). The fourth book of the Old Testament: so called because it begins with an account of the numbering of the Israelites in the beginning of the second year after they left Egypt. It includes part of the history of the Israelites during their wanderings.

Numenius (nū-mē-ni-us). [Gr. Numenius.] Born at Apamea, Syria: lived in the second half of the 2d century. A Neo-Pythagorean philosopher, forerunner of Neoplatonism.

His leading principle was the belief that Plato, who formed, as he thought, a sort of connecting bond between Pythagoras and Socrates, really preached in a Greek form the revealed doctrines of the Jewish legislator. And he went so far as to say, "What is Plato but Moses talking Attic Greek?" But he applied his Pythagorean principles also to the identification of Egyptian, Persian, and even Brahminical dogmas. And, without mentioning our Saviour by name, he made the Gospels the subjects of philosophical allegories not unlike those which Philo spun from the Pentateuch. Muller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, III. 182. (Donaldson.)

Numerianus (nū-mē-ri-ä'nus), Marcus Aurelius. Roman emperor (conjointly with his brother Carinus) in 283 A. D. He accompanied his father, the emperor Carus, on an expedition against the Persians in 283, while Carinus remained behind as governor of the western provinces. The death of his father during the expedition elevated him and his brother to the throne. He, however, died in camp while returning from the East. Arrius Aper, prefect of the pretorians, his father-in-law, was suspected of encompassing his death, with the intention of making himself emperor. Arrius Aper was stabbed by Diocletian who assumed the purple.

Numidia (nū-mid'i-i). [L. Numidia, Gr. Numidia, from Numida, Gr. reflex Numidai, the inhabitants, prop. Nouádec, wanderers, nomads.] In ancient geography, a country of northern Africa, corresponding nearly to the modern Algeria. It was bounded by the Mediterranean on the north, the territory of Carthage on the east, the desert on the south, and Mauretania on the west. The Massyli in the east and the Massesyli in the west were united in a kingdom under Masinissa. This was dismembered after the defeat of Jugurtha in 106 B. C.; and the eastern part became a Roman province shortly after the death of its king Juba in 46 B. C.

Numitor (nū'mi-tór). In Roman legend, the grandfather of Romulus and Remus.

Nun (nōn). The chief mouth of the Niger.

Nun, or Wad-Nun (wäd-nōn'). A town in Morocco, near Cape Nun. Population, about 5,000.

Nun, Cape. A cape in Morocco, projecting into the Atlantic in lat. 28° 45' N., long. 11° 2' W.

Nunc Dimittis (nunk di-mit'is). [So named from the first two words in the Latin version, "Nunc dimittis servum tuum, Domine, . . . in pace." "Now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace."] The canticle of Simeon (Luke ii. 29-32). The Nunc Dimittis forms part of the private thanksgiving of the priest after the liturgy in the Greek Church, and is frequently sung by the choir after celebration of the eucharist in Anglican churches. It forms part of the office of complin as used in the Roman Catholic Church. It is contained in the vesper office of the Greek Church, and is one of the canticles at evening prayer in the Anglican Church.

Nuñez de Arce (nōn'yāth dā ār'thā), Gaspar. Born at Valladolid, Aug. 6, 1834. A noted Spanish poet, known as "the Spanish Tennyson." He is a graduate of the University of Toledo; lectured before the Spanish Academy in 1876; has been a deputy to the Cortes and minister of the colonies in the Sagasta cabinet of 1883-84; and has also been president of the council of state of commerce and agriculture. In 1894 a national oration was accorded him at Toledo. Among his poems are "Gritos del Combate" ("Battle-cries," 1875), "Ultima lamentacion de Lord Byron" (1879), "El Vértigo" (1879), "La vision de Fray Martin" (1880), etc.; and among his plays are "Como se empena un Marido" (1860), "Ni tanto ni tan poco" (1865), "El Hiaz de Leña," etc.

Nuñez de Haro y Peralta (nōn'yāth dā ār'ō ē pā-ril'tā), Alonso. Born at Villagareia, diocese of Cuena, Oct. 31, 1729; died at Mexico, May 26, 1800. A Spanish prelate, archbishop of Mexico from 1772, and viceroy May 8 to Aug. 16, 1787.

Nuñez Vela (nōn'yāth vā'lā), Blasco. Born at Avila about 1490; died near Quito, Jan. 18, 1546. First viceroy of Peru. After holding various civil and military offices in Spain, he was appointed viceroy in 1543 with the special mission of pronouncing the "New Laws" (which see). He reached Lima in March, 1544. Strong opposition to the New Laws was at once manifested, and a revolt broke out, headed by Gonzalo Pizarro. In Sept. the viceroy killed the factor Suarez de Carbajal in an altercation, was arrested by the audience, and was put in charge of one of the auditors, Alvarez, to be taken to Spain for trial. While still near the coast Alvarez released him: he landed at Tumbes and began to collect forces against Pizarro, but the latter forced him to retreat through Quito to Popayan. Reinforced there by Benalcázar and others, he returned as far as Quito, but was defeated by Pizarro and killed in the battle of Anaquito.

Nun's Priest's Tale, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." It is taken from the "Roman du Renart," and is the story of Chanticleer who escaped from the jaws of the fox by his cunning in making the latter open his mouth to speak. It is modernized by Dryden as "The Cock and the Fox." See Second Nun's Tale.

Nupe (nō'pē). An African kingdom of the Niger valley, commanding the confluence of the Niger and the Binue. It is subject to aking of Fulah origin, and nominally vassal of Gando. The Nupe people are negroes in a comparatively high state of culture. They have large cities (Bida, Rabba, Egga, Iorin). The Nupe language has a wide extraterritorial use down the Niger River. It has musical tones, and is related to both Yoruba and Ibo. Gbedeghi, Bini, and Basa-Komi are the principal dialects.

Nu-pieds (nū'piā'). [F., 'bare feet.'] A name given to Norman peasants who in 1630 revolted at Avranches against heavy and unjust taxation. The rising was put down by Richelieu with relentless cruelty.

Nuremberg (nū'rem-bérg), G. Nürnberg (nürn'berg). A city in Middle Franconia, Bavaria, situated on the Pegnitz in lat. 49° 27' N., long. 11° 5' E. It is the leading manufacturing and commercial city of Bavaria; is noted for its manufactures of Nuremberg wares (including toys and fancy articles), pencils, machinery, ultramarine, beer, etc.; and is the chief market on the Continent for hops. It is remarkable for its medieval appearance. The Burg, or castle, founded in the 11th century by Conrad II., and restored as a royal residence in the present century, is a picturesque structure with towers of different heights and forms and high roofs. In the Heidenthurm there are two Romanesque chapels, one over the other. The Germanic National Museum is a historical collection founded in 1852, and, besides illustrating costumes, arms and armor, and the industrial and minor arts, includes an unexcelled gallery of German 15th- and 16th-century painting. The museum occupies a 14th-century Carthusian monastery, with a handsome church and traiered cloister, and also an Augustinian monastery, rebuilt adjoining. Among the other features of Nuremberg are the walls and towers, churches of St. Lawrence, St. Sebaldus, and St. Jacob, Frauenkirche, fountain (Schöne Brunnen), and Rathaus. The city existed as early as 1050; was developed under the Hohenstaufens; was made a free imperial city in 1219; and became in the 15th and 16th centuries a great center of trade, art, science, and literature. The Reformation was introduced in 1525. It suffered severely in the Thirty Years' War. In 1806 it was annexed to Bavaria. Population (1890), 142,500.

Nut (nōt). In Egyptian mythology, the mother of Osiris, goddess of heaven and consort of Set, god of the earth. She is represented in human form.

Nutabes (nō-tā-bās'). An extinct tribe of South American Indians who occupied part of the region included in the present department of Antioquia, Colombia, on the right side of the Cauca, between that river and the Porcé. They were hardly less advanced in civilization than the Chibchas, but were less warlike and had no hereditary chiefs. Their clothing was of cotton, and they were skilled in making small figures of gold. Many of these figures were deposited in their tombs (huacas), and are still found: in 1833 gold to the amount of $18,000 was taken from a single huaca. Nothing is known of their linguistic affinities.

Nut-brown Maid, The. A ballad belonging to the end of the 15th century. Prior took it for the foundation of his "Henry and Emma." The "nut-brown maid" proclaims her faithfulness to her lover, who tells her at the end of every second stanza that he is banished man. By saying at the end of the intervening stanza "I love but you alone," her love and meekness prevail; and he consoles her in the end by saying

"Thus have ye won an erles son,
And not a banysshed man."

We owe the preservation of this beautiful old ballad to "Arnold's Chronicle," of which the earliest edition is thought to have been printed in 1502. In Laneham's account of Elizabeth's visit to Kenilworth, the "Nut-brown Maid" is mentioned as a book by itself, and there is said to be at Oxford a list of books offered for sale at that place in 1520, among which is the "Nut-brown Maid," price one penny; still, the ballad is not known to exist at present in any other ancient form than that of the Chronicle. We have no means of determining the date of the composition, but Percy has justly remarked that it is not probable that an antiquary would have inserted a piece in his historical collections which he knew to be modern. The language is that of the time at which it was printed.

Child's Ballads, IV. 143.

Nutmeg State. A name given to Connecticut, from its alleged manufacture of wooden nutmegs.

Nuttall (nut'al), Thomas. Born at Settle, Yorkshire, England, 1786; died at St. Helen's, Lancashire, England, Sept. 10, 1859. An Anglo-American botanist and ornithologist. Nyam-Nyam (nyām-nyām'), or Sandeh (sān'de). A great African nation, consisting of numerous petty tribes, dwelling in the basins of the Welle and Shari rivers. They number about 2,000,000. They are called Nyam-Nyam ('enters,' 'cannibals') by the Dinkas, and other neighbors give them other names; their own name is Saudeh. They are negroes in color and hair, and have short legs and round heads and faces. They tattoo their faces as a tribal mark, and their chests and arms for ornamentation. They wear skins and bark cloth, and are clever workmen, hunters, and musicians. The women do the tilling. Many, but not all, are or were cannibals. Their weapons are the lance, shield, bow and arrows, and throwing-knife.

Nyamwezi (nyä-mwä'zē), or Wanyamwezi (wä-nyä-mwä'zē). A Bantu nation of German East Africa. It inhabits a long stretch of the undulating and fertile plateau between Lake Victoria, Ukonongo, and Uyanzi, including Usukuma in the north, Unyanembe and Uganda in the south, and also the Arab settlement Tabora. In a more limited sense, Unyamwezi, their country, is placed between Usukuma and Unyanembe. The people are medium-sized, and have generally Bantu features; but long noses and occasionally curly instead of woolly hair seem to indicate mixture. They use lances, shields, and bows and arrows as weapons. Ungalanganja is said to have been the first name of the country, and Mwezi the founder of the kingdom, which became famous as the semi-fabulous Monemnji of old Portuguese authors. See Mirambo and Garenzanze.

Nyaneka (nyä-nä'kä), or Banyaneka (bü-nyä-nä'kä). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa, in the district of Mossamedes, on a high and salubrious plateau. They have agricultural and pastoral habits, with primitive customs, and belong to the same cluster as the Ndonga tribes.

Nyaya (nyä'ya). [Skt.: nī, into, and āya, a derivative of i, go; and hence 'entering,' 'analytical investigation.'] One of the six systems of Hindu philosophy. It is ascribed to a Gotama or Gautama. It was intended to furnish a correct method of philosophical inquiry into all the objects and subjects of human knowledge, including the process of reasoning and laws of thought. It begins by propounding 16 topics, of which the first is the means by which the right measure of any subject is to be obtained. The processes by which true knowledge is attained are declared to be (1) sense perception; (2) inference; (3) comparison; (4) verbal authority or trustworthy testimony, including Vedic revelation. Inference is divided into 5 members: (1) the proposition stated hypothetically; (2) the reason; (3) the example or major premise; (4) the application of the reason or minor premise; (5) the conclusion, or the restatement of the proposition as proved. The terms "invariable pervasion" or "concomitance," "pervader" or "invariably pervading attribute," and "invariably pervaded" are used in making a universal affirmation or in affirming universal distribution. The second topic is those points about which correct knowledge is to be obtained, viz.: (1) soul; (2) body; (3) senses; (4) objects of sense; (5) understanding; (6) mind; (7) activity; (8) faults; (9) transmigration; (10) consequences or fruits of action; (11) pain; (12) emancipation. The other 14 topics are an enumeration of the regular stages of a controversy, including (1) doubt about the point to be discussed; (2) a motive for discussing it; (3) a familiar example in order that a conclusion may be arrived at; (4) the argument of the objector with its 5 members; (5) the refutation, and ascertainment of the true state of the case; (6) further controversy; (7) mere wrangling; (8) caviling; (9) fallacious reasoning; (10) quibbling artifices; (11) futile replies; after which follows (12) the putting an end to all discussion. After discussing his 16 topics Gotama states how deliverance from repeated births is to be attained. See Williams's "Indian Wisdom," IV., and the translations by Ballantyne and Colebrooke.

Nyborg (nü'borg). A seaport in the province of Svendborg, Denmark, in the island of Fünen, situated on the Great Belt in lat. 55° 19' N., long. 10° 48' E. Obermann (ō-ber-män'). A psychological romance by Senancour, published in 1804. It is so called from the name of the hero, who is a dreamer striving to escape from the actual. He lives in a solitary valley, and writes melancholy speculative letters on all kinds of problems. Sainte-Beuve revived the book by bringing out a new edition in 1833, when it appealed to the public taste more perhaps than on its original production.

Oberon (ō'ber-ōn). 1. In mediæval mythology, the king of the fairies. He first appears in the old French romance "Huon de Bordeaux" as the son of Julius Cesar and Morgan the Fay, and is thus connected with the Arthurian genealogy. Shakspeare introduces him in the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

He resembles in many respects the Elberich in the story of Otnit. Grimm connects the name with Alp, Alb, = elf, and he may be regarded as an importation from the Teutonic Pantheon, invested, however, with many Celtic and Christian as well as Asiatic attributes. M. Longnon, in the Romania, vol. iii, has carefully worked out the probable connection of Huon with the reign of Charles the Bald. Whatever the historical element in the romance, Oberon became an essential part in it as early as the thirteenth century. Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 290, note.

2. The fourth satellite of Uranus, discovered by Lassell in 1847.—3. A romantic poem, one of the chief works of Wieland, published in 1780.—4. A romantic opera by K. Observations of Bel. See the extract.

The standard work on astronomy, as has already been noted, was that called "The Observations of Bel," compiled originally for the library of Sargon I. at Acadad. Additions were made to it from time to time, the chief object of the work being to notice the events which happened after each celestial phenomenon. Thus the occurrences which at different periods followed a solar eclipse on a particular day were all duly introduced into the text and piled, as it were, one upon the other. The table of contents prefixed to the work showed that it treated of various matters—eclipses of the sun and moon, the conjunction of the sun and moon, the phases of Venus and Mars, the position of the pole-star, the changes of the weather, the appearance of comets, or, as they are called, "stars with a tail behind and a corona in front," and the like.

O'Carolan (ô-kar'ô-lan), Turloch. Born in 1670 in County Meath; died at Alderford, March 25, 1738. A famous Irish minstrel. He was one of the last of the improvising wandering bards, and traveled with a harp from door to door.

Occam, or Ockham (ok'âm), William of. Born at Ockham, Surrey, England, about 1270; died at Munich, April 7, 1347. An English scholastic philosopher, the reviver of nominalism. He was called the "Invincible Doctor," the "Singular Doctor," "Princeps Nominalium," and in the ages following his own "Venerabilis Inceptor," as if he had not actually taken his degree. He was a great advocate of the rule of poverty of the Franciscan order, to which he belonged, and a strong defender of the state against the pretensions of the papacy. He was lecturer in the University of Paris; aided Louis of Bavaria in his contest with Pope John XXII.; and opposed the latter in the Franciscan assembly at Perugia in 1322. All his teachings depend upon the logical doctrine that generality belongs only to the significations of signs (such as words). The conceptions of the mind are, according to him, objects in themselves individual, but naturally significative of classes. These principles are carried into every department of logic, metaphysics, and theology, where their general result is that nothing can be discovered by reason, but all must rest upon faith. Occamism thus prepared the way for the overthrow of scholasticism, by arguing that little of importance to man could be learned by scholastic methods; yet the Occamistic writings exhibit the scholastic faults of triviality, prolixity, and formality in a higher degree than those of any other school. His chief works are "Tractatus logices," "Tractatus de sacramento altaris," "Super quatuor libros sententiarum expositio aurea."

Occeleve (ok'klév'), Thomas. [ME. Occelece, sometimes with unorig. aspirate Hocceleve: prob. of local origin; AS. as if ar-clif*, pl. æcelcufu*, oak-cliff.] Born about 1370; died about 1454. An English poet and lawyer. He lived at Chester's Inn in the Strand in his youth, and knew Chaucer. His chief poem is "De regimine principum," a new version of "The Governail of Princes." Some of his poems were printed for the first time in 1796 by George Mason, but a number were printed 1487-1598 at Paris, Lyons, Venice, and Strasburg.

The old confusion with the aspirate has caused the name to be written both "Hocceleve" and "Occeleve." But in a copy of "The Governail of Princes," which the poet wrote with his own hand, the name occurs in the text, and is written "Occeleve." Another day he might have written "Hocceleve," and he may have done so in his own draft of the first line of his that will presently be quoted. But the name is Occeleve in the only place where we are sure, or nearly sure, that he himself has written it.

Morley, English Writers, VI. 122.

Oceana (ô-sê-â'nâ). A philosophical treatise on the theory of civil government, by James Harrington, published in 1656. The full title is "The Commonwealth of Oceana." It presents the model of a perfect republic.

Oceanus (ô-sê-â'nus). [Gr. Ὠκεανός.] 1. According to ancient geographical ideas, a swift and unbounded stream encircling all the known lands and seas; later, the outer sea, or Atlantic Ocean. The progress of geographical discovery produced corresponding modifications of this early conception.

The key to the confused geography of the "Germania," as regards northern Germany, will be found in a comparison of the passages in which he [Tacitus] mentions the "Oceanus" or ocean-current, as distinguished from the seas which were crossed or divided by its stream. The Islands of the Suiones, or the Danish Isles and Southern Scandinavia, are described as being actually encircled by "Oceanus." Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 42, note.

2. In classical mythology, the ocean stream personified. He was the husband of Tethys.

Ochiali (ô-kê-â'îlê). A celebrated corsair. See the extract.

Though Dragut was no more, Ochiali—as the Christians called 'Alî El-Uluji, 'the Renegade' (the Turks dubbed him Fartas, 'Scurvier,' from his complaint)—was following successfully in his old master's steps. Born at Castellî (Lecastoli) in Calabria about 1508, Ochiali was to have been a priest, but his capture by the Turks turned him to the more exciting career of a Corsair. Soon after the siege of Malta he succeeded Barbarossa's son Hasan as pasha or Beglerbeg of Algiers (1568), and one of his first acts was to retake Tunis (all but the Goletta) in the name of Sultan Selim II., who, to the unspeakable loss of the Mohammedan world, had in 1566 succeeded his great father Süleyman. In July, 1570, off Alicata, on the southern coast of Sicily, Ochiali surrounded four galleys of "the Religion"—they then possessed but five—and took three of them, including the flag-ship, which Saint Clément, the general of the galleys, abandoned in order to throw himself and his treasure on shore at Monticliaro.

Odo. Died about 1097. A Norman prelate and nobleman, half-brother of William the Conqueror. He became bishop of Bayeux in 1049, and was created earl of Kent and Hereford after the Conquest. He was regent of the kingdom during the absence of William in 1067 and 1073. He was afterward imprisoned, but was released on the death of William.

Odoacer (ô-dô-ä'sër), or Odovakar (ô-dô-vä'kär), or Ottokar (ot'tô-kär). Born about 434; killed March 5, 493. A leader of the Heruli, Rugii, and other tribes. He was (according to the best authorities) the son of a Scyrrian chieftain, Edecon, who served under Attila. He entered the Roman army about the age of thirty. In 475 the Western emperor Nepos was dethroned by Orestes, who elevated his own son Romulus Augustulus to the purple. Orestes caused a mutiny among his mercenaries by refusing to accede to a demand for a division among them of one third of the soil of Italy. Odoacer placed himself at the head of the disaffected troops, and in 476 overthrew Orestes and compelled Romulus Augustulus to abdicate. He extinguished the title and office of emperor of the West, and, assuming the title of patrician, ruled in the West, nominally as vicar of the Eastern emperor. He was overthrown and treacherously murdered by Theodoric.

O'Donnell (ô-don'el), Henry Joseph, Count of Abisbal. Born 1769; died May 6, 1834. A Spanish general, of Irish extraction. He distinguished himself during the French invasion of 1809-10, and in 1811 captured Abisbal (whence his title). In 1819, while commander at Cadix, he suppressed a conspiracy against the government of Ferdinand VII. He was compelled to flee to France by the events of 1823, and died on his return to Spain at the accession of Maria Christina.

O'Donnell, Leopoldo. Born at Santa Cruz, Island of Tenerife, Jan. 12, 1809; died at Biarritz, Nov. 5, 1867. A Spanish general, son of H. J. O'Donnell. He fought against the Carlists 1833-39, and in July of the latter year forced Cabrera to raise the siege of Lucena, for which he was made count of Lucena and lieutenant-general. Subsequently he protected the queen regent in her retreat to France. In Oct., 1841, he headed an unsuccessful revolt against the regency. After the fall of the regency he was captain-general of Cuba, Nov., 1843, to March, 1848. He was minister of war 1854-1856; president of the cabinet July 14 to Oct. 12, 1856; and again premier and minister of war June, 1858. In the latter capacity he commanded in the campaign in Morocco 1859-1860, and was made grandee of Spain and duke of Tetuan. He resigned office in 1863, but once more held the premiership 1865-66.

O'Donoghue (ô-don'ô-hû) of Ross. A legendary Irish hero.

He was lord of the lake [Killarney], its islands and the surrounding land. His sway was just and generous, and his reign propitious; he was the sworn foe of the oppressor; he was brave, hospitable, and wise. Annually since his death, or rather disappearance, he is said to revisit the pleasant places among which he lived. . . . Every May morning he may be seen gliding over the lake mounted on a white steed, richly caparisoned, preceded and followed by youths and maidens who strew spring flowers in his way. Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fict., I, 230, note.

O'Donju (ô-dôn-ô-nô'), Juan. Born in Spain about 1755; died at Mexico, Oct. 8, 1821. The last Spanish ruler of New Spain, or Mexico. He was a lieutenant-general in the army, and had held high official positions in Spain. In 1821 he was appointed captain-general and acting viceroy of New Spain, arriving at Vera Cruz July 30; but the revolution had acquired such strength that he could only treat with the leaders. On Aug. 24 he signed with Iturbide, at Cordoba, a treaty in which he agreed to surrender Mexico, and virtually adhered to the plan of Iguala. He was elected one of the five regents, and died in office.

O'Donovan (ô-don'ô-van), John. Born in County Kilkenny, Ireland, July 9, 1809; died at Dublin, Dec. 9, 1861. An Irish archaeologist. He published a translation of "Annals of Ireland by the Four Masters, etc." (1848-51), etc. This book was written 1632-36. He also published a grammar of the Irish language (1845), and translated and edited "The Battle of Magh Rath" for the Irish Archaeological Society (1842), etc.

O'Donovan, William Rudolf. Born in Virginia, March 28, 1844. An American sculptor. He has produced many portrait-busts and reliefs. Among his statues are those of Paulding, at Tarrytown; Washington, for the Republic of Venezuela, at Caracas; Washington, for the monument at Newburg, with four other statues; Washington, with two other statues, for the Trenton battle monument; and, in conjunction with Thomas Eakins, equestrian statues of General U. S. Grant and Abraham Lincoln for the memorial arch at Prospect Park, Brooklyn, New York.

Odrysian Bard, The. Orpheus.

Odysseus (ô-dis'ûs), L. Ulysses (û-lis'êz) or Ulixes (û-lik'sêz). [Gr. Ὀδυσσεύς.] In Greek legend, a king of Ithaca, one of the heroes of the Trojan war, especially famous for his wanderings and exploits on the homeward voyage. See Odyssey. He was the son of Laertes, the husband of Penelope, and the father of Telemachus. His intelligent courage, practical wisdom, and resourcefulness in all emergencies make him the ideal representative of the Ionic Greek race.

Odyssey (od'î-si). An epic poem, attributed to Homer, in which are celebrated the adventures of Odysseus (Ulysses) during ten years of wandering, spent in repeated endeavors to return to Ithaca, his native island, after the close of the Trojan war. Some critics, both ancient and modern, who have acknowledged the Homeric origin of the Iliad, attribute the Odyssey to a different author. (See Homer.) The Odyssey is the only complete surviving example of a whole class of epics, called Nostoi, describing the return voyages of various Greek heroes from Troy. (See Iliad.) It represents Odysseus as being thrown by a storm at the outset of his voyage on the coast of Thrace, north of the island of Lemnos. He plundered the town of Ismarus, belonging to the Cicones, where he lost a number of his followers. Next he was driven to the country of the Lotophagi on the coast of Libya; then to the goat-island, which lay a day's voyage to the north of the Lotophagi. Leaving all his ships behind, except one, he sailed to the neighboring island of the Cyclopes (the western coast of Sicily), where with twelve companions he entered the cave of the Cyclops Polyphemus, a son of Poseidon and Thoosa. Polyphemus devoured six of the intruders, and kept Odysseus and the others prisoners. Odysseus made Polyphemus drunk with wine, put out his eye with a burning pole, and escaped with his companions by concealing himself and them under the bellies of the sheep which the Cyclops let out of his cave. Thenceforth, however, he was pursued by the anger of Poseidon, who sought to revenge the injury inflicted on his son. After further adventures, in which he lost all his ships except one, he arrived at the island of Æta, inhabited by the sorceress Circe. At her instance he made a journey to Hades; then sailed by the island of the Sirens near the west coast of Italy, passed between Scylla and Charybdis, and arrived at Thrinacia, the island of Helios. Here his companions killed some of the sacred oxen belonging to Helios, with the result that they were all drowned in a shipwreck after leaving the island. Odysseus escaped with his life to the island of Ogygia, inhabited by the nymph Calypso, with whom he lived 8 years. Leaving Ogygia on a raft built with the assistance of the nymph, he was again shipwrecked, and reached Scheria, the island of the Phæacians, where he was discovered by Nausicaa, the daughter of Alcinous and Arete. He was carried to Ithaca by the hospitable Phæacians, and after slaying the suitors of his wife Penelope, who had been wasting his property during his absence, was welcomed by his wife and subjects.

Though there was controversy in old days about the priority of the Iliad, it seems quite settled now that we must look upon the Odyssey as a later poem — how much later it is impossible to say. The limits assigned have varied from those who believe it the work of the same author in old age, to those who place it two centuries later (as M. E. Burnouf does), owing to the difference of its plan and style. But, as Bonitz says, if not composed in the old age of Homer, it was composed in the old age of Greek epic poetry, when the creative power was diminishing, but that of ordering and arranging had become more developed. The plot of the Odyssey is skilfully conceived, and on the whole artistically carried out, even though modern acuteness has found flaws in its sutures. But critics seem agreed that the elements of the Odyssey were not short and disconnected lays, but themselves epics of considerable length, one on the return of Odysseus, another on the adventures of Telemachus, and these are chief. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 78.

Œneus (ê'nūs). [Gr. Οἰνείης.] In Greek legend, king of Calydon, husband of Althæa, and father of Meleager and Tydeus.

Enomaus (en-ô-mâ'us). [Gr. Ἐννόμαος.] In Greek legend, a king in Elis, son of Ares, and father of Hippodameia by the Pleiad Sterope. He was also said to be the son of Ares and Sterope.

An oracle had declared that he should die if his daughter should marry, and he therefore made it a condition that those who came forward as suitors for Hippodameia's hand should contend with himself in the chariot-race, and he who conquered should receive her, whereas those that were conquered should suffer death. The race-course extended from Pisa to the altar of Poseidon on the Corinthian isthmus. At the moment when a suitor started with Hippodameia, Enomaus sacrificed a ram to Zeus at Pisa, and then armed himself and hastened with his swift chariot and four horses, guided by Myrtilus, after the suitor. He thus overtook many a lover, whom he put to death, until Pelops, the son of Tantalus, came to Pisa. Pelops bribed Myrtilus, and, using the horses which he had received from Poseidon, he succeeded in reaching the goal before Enomaus, who in despair made away with himself. Smith, Dict.

Enophyta (ê-nof'i-tä). [Gr. Ἐνοπέυτα.] In ancient geography, a place in Bœotia, Greece, about 23 miles north of Athens. Here, in 456 B. C., the Athenians under Myronides defeated the Bœotians.

Enus (ê'nus). The ancient name of the Inn.

Oeynhausen (ê'in-hou-zen), Bad. A watering-place in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, on the Werre near Minden. Population (1890), 2,482.

Ofanto (ô-fân'tô). A river in southeastern Italy, which falls into the Adriatic 39 miles northwest of Bari: the ancient Aufidus. Length, about 75 miles.

Ofen (ô'fen). The German name of Buda.

Offa (of'i). King of Mercia from about 757 to 796. He conquered Oxfordshire from Wessex, and subjugated the Welsh kingdom of Powys, west of the Severn. He drew up a code of laws which have perished.

Offa's Dyke. An intrenchment which extends from near the mouth of the Wye northward near the border of England and Wales to the mouth of the Dee. It was built for defense against the Welsh by Offa, king of Mercia, in the 8th century.

Offenbach (of'fen-bäch). A city in the province of Starkenburg, Hesse, situated on the Main 4 miles east of Frankfurt. It is the first manufacturing city of Hesse, and has various manufactures, the most important being portfolios and fancy-leather goods, engines, etc. It was founded by French refugees. Population (1890), 35,085.

Offenbach (of-en-bäk'), Jacques. Born at Cologne, June 21, 1819; died at Paris, Oct. 5, 1880.

A French composer of opera bouffe. He was conductor of the orchestra of the Théâtre Français in 1848, and began to attract attention by the production of operettas at small theaters. In 1855 he took the Théâtre Comte, changed its name to Les Bouffes Parisiens, and became at once popular. Among his opera bouffes are "Orphée aux enfers" (1858), "La grande-duchesse de Gerolstein" (1867), "La belle Héloïse" (1864), "Barbe-bleue" (1866), "Madame Favart" (1878), "Le Papillon" (1860: a ballet pantomime), "La Périchole" (1865), "Vert-Vert" (1869), and "Les contes d'Hoffmann" (opéra comique, produced after his death, in 1881).

Offenburg (of'fen-börg). A town in Baden, situated on the Kinzig 12 miles southeast of Strassburg. It was formerly an imperial town. Here, Sept. 24, 1707, the Imperialists under Mercy defeated the French. Population (1890), 8,481.

Offerdingen (of'ter-ding-en), Heinrich von. A semi-mythical German minstrel of the 13th century.

Og (og). An Amorite king of Bashan, defeated by the Hebrews at the epoch of their entrance into Canaan. He was a giant (Deut. iii. 11).

Ogden (og'den). A city, capital of Weber County, Utah, situated on the Weber River 32 miles north of Salt Lake City. It is an important junction of the Central Pacific, Union Pacific, Utah Central, and Utah and Northern railroads. Population (1890), 14,889.

Ogden, Aaron. Born at Elizabethtown, N. J., Dec. 3, 1756; died at Jersey City, N. J., April 19, 1839. An American soldier in the Revolutionary War, and governor of New Jersey 1812-1813.

Ogden, William Butler. Born at Walton, N. Y., June 15, 1805; died at New York, Aug. 3, 1877. An American merchant and railroad president, prominent in developing the Northwest. He became first mayor of Chicago in 1837.

Ogdensburg (og'denz-bêrg). A city in St. Lawrence County, New York, situated at the entrance of the Oswegatchie into the St. Lawrence, in lat. 44° 41' N., long. 75° 30' W. It has important foreign and domestic commerce in grain and manufactures. It became a city in 1868, and is sometimes called "the Maple City." Population (1890), 11,662.

Ogé, or Ojé (ô-zhâ'), Jacques Vincent. Born in London about 1755; died at Port-au-Prince, Feb. 26, 1791. A Haitian insurgent. He was a light mulatto. He was educated in Paris, and represented the colony in the French Constituent Assembly. In 1790 he organized in the United States a secret expedition for the emancipation of the colored race in Haiti. He landed at Cape François Oct. 23, but after some slight successes was defeated, captured, and broken on the wheel. He was regarded as a martyr by the colored population, and his cruel death led to the practical extermination of the whites soon after.

Ogeechee (ô-gê'ehê). A river in southeastern Georgia which flows into the Atlantic 17 miles south of Savannah. Length, over 200 miles.

Ogéron de la Bouère (ô-zhâ-rôn' dè lä bö-âr'), Bertrand Denis d'. Born near Angers, 1615; died at Paris, Dec., 1675. A French adventurer, founder of the colony of Haiti. After an unsuccessful attempt to colonize Guiana (1650), he joined the bucaniers, and in 1665 was appointed governor of Tortuga by the French West India Company. The bucaniers probably had transient establishments on the western end of Española as early as 1632, but they first obtained an official standing and were greatly extended under Ogéron, who even attempted to conquer the whole island in 1674.

Oggersheim (og'gers-him). A town in the Palatinate, Bavaria, 5 miles west of Mannheim. Population (1890), 4,537.

Oggione (od-jô'ne), or Oggione (ôd-jô'ne), Marcoda. Born at Oggione about 1460; died 1530. An Italian painter, chiefly known from his copies of Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper" (in London and Milan).

Ogham. In Celtic mythology. See the extracts.

The word "ogham," in modern Irish, stands for the occult sciences; and, according to Lucian, Oghum was painted in the second century as a Heculean Mercury, old, in a lion's skin, with a club in his right hand and a bent bow in his left, the ears of his worshippers bound by a chain of gold and amber to his tongue.

Morley, English Writers, I. 168.

He is signalized in Irish mythology as the inventor of writing, that is to say of the Ogam alphabet; for Ogam being much skilled in dialects and in poetry, it was he, we are told, who invented the Ogam to provide signs for secret speech only known to the learned, and designed to be kept from the vulgar and poor of the nation. The motive attributed to Ogam is an invention of a comparatively late age, for there was nothing cryptic about the Ogam alphabet; but the allusion to Ogam's skill in poetry and dialects is important, especially as there was not only a mode of writing called Ogam, but also a kind of pedantic jargon which bore that name. Now Irish legend will have it that the Ogam was so called from the name of Ogam, which is etymologically impossible.

Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 18.

Ogier (ô-zhÿ'), Le Prieur. The name under which Jean Louis Guez, Seigneur de Balzac, published his "Apology."

Ogier, the Dane, F. Ogier le Danois or Ogier de Danemarcke, Dan. Holger Danske or Olger Dansk. In medieval legend, one of the paladins of Charlemagne: the subject of French chansons de geste of the 12th and 13th centuries. These are based on older forms. His name is also given as Oger, Ager, and Autcair. M. Barrois, who has edited the 12th-century chanson, which is written in the Walloon dialect by Raimbert, a trouvère, thinks he should be called Ozier l'Ardennois or d'Ardenmarche. The trouvère Adenès also wrote a chanson de geste of the same cycle. Ogier, the son of Geoffrey the king of Denmark, is brought up at the court of Charlemagne, and at one period of the romance assumes the crown of Denmark; but he tires of it and returns to Charlemagne, becoming one of his chief paladins. After a successful and warlike career, at the age of 100 years he is carried away to the Isle of Avalon by Morgan le Fay, who restores him to youth, with entire forgetfulness of the world, but sends him back, after 200 years have passed, to defend France. After repelling its invaders and restoring the old spirit of knighthood, he returns to Avalon, where he sleeps, and whence he may again awake and return to defend the right. As Holger Danske, he has been raised to the position of Danish national hero.

Ogilby (ô'gl-bi), John. Born at Edinburgh, 1600; died at London, Sept. 4, 1676. A Scottish poet, translator, and compiler of atlases. He published "America, being the most accurate Description of the New World" (London, 1671).

Ogilvie (ô'gl-vi), John. Born in Marnoch, Banffshire, April 17, 1797; died at Aberdeen, Nov. 21, 1867. A Scottish lexicographer. He was appointed teacher of mathematics at Gordon's Hospital, Aberdeen, in 1831, remaining till 1859. He compiled "The Imperial Dictionary" (1847-50), "The Comprehensive English Dictionary" (1863), "The Student's English Dictionary" (1865), "An English Dictionary, etc., for the Use of Schools" (1867).

Oglala (ô-glâ'lä). ['She scattered her own.'] The name of Red Cloud, part of the Titonwan. The name has been corrupted into Ogalala and Ogallalla.

Ogle (ô'gl). A character, in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "The Beau's Duel," who fancies everybody is in love with him.

Ogleby (ô'gl-bi), Lord. In Garrick and Colman's "Clandestine Marriage," a faded and delicate but witty old beau. When this play was first produced in 1766, Garrick refused to take the part, and in consequence a coldness arose between him and Colman, which lasted for years.

Oglesby (ô'glz-bi), Richard James. Born in Oldham County, Ky., July 25, 1824. An American politician and soldier. He was a general in the Civil War; governor of Illinois 1865-69, 1873, and 1885-89; and United States senator 1873-79.

Oglethorpe (ô'gl-thôrp), James Edward. Born at London, Dec. 21, 1696; died at Cranham Hall, Essex, England, 1785. An English general and philanthropist. He projected the colony of Georgia for insolvent debtors and persecuted Protestants, conducted the expedition for its settlement 1733, and returned to England 1743.

Oglio (òl'yò). A river in northern Italy, joining the Po 10 miles southwest of Mantua; the ancient Ollius. It traverses the Lake of Isco. Length, about 135 miles.

Ogma. See Ogham.

Ogoway, or Ogowé (ò-gò-wá'). A river in western Africa which flows by a delta into the Atlantic about lat. 1° S. Its basin is under French protection. Length, about 500 (?) miles; navigable to the Ngum Falls.

Ogulnián (ò-gul'ni-an) Law. In Roman history, a law carried by two tribunes named Ogulnius, in 300 B. C., by which the offices of pontiff and augur were thrown open to the plebeians.

Ogyges (oj'i-jéz). [Gr. Ὀγύγης.] In Attic and Boeotian legend, a king whose reign was associated with a destructive deluge.

Ogygia (ò-jij'i-ä). [Gr. Ὀγυγία.] The island of Calypso, referred to in the Odyssey. Plutarch says it lies due west, beneath the setting sun.

When we are told that in the remote Ogygia sleeps Kronos gently, watched by Briareus, till the time comes for his awaking, we have a Grecized form of the myth of Arthur in Avalon being cured of his grievous wound.

O'Higgins (ò-hig'inz; Sp. pron. ò-é'gēns), Ambrosio. Born in County Meath, Ireland, about 1730; died at Lima, Peru, March 18, 1801. A Spanish administrator, marquis of Osorno from 1796. His real name was Ambrose Higgins. He was educated in Spain, and when a young man went to Chile as a trader. Obtaining a commission in the army, he rose rapidly; was captain-general of Chile 1788-96; and was viceroy of Peru from June 6, 1796, until his death. He was an excellent ruler.

O'Higgins, Bernardo. Born at Chillan, Aug. 20, 1778; died at Lima, Peru, Oct. 24, 1842. A Chilean general and statesman, natural son of Ambrosio O'Higgins. He was educated in England, where he derived republican ideas from Miranda; was a prominent military leader of the Chilean patriots from 1810; and on the deposition of Carrera, 1813, was made commander of the army. Carrera opposed him, and a civil war was prevented only by the common danger from the Spaniards. The combined forces of Carrera and O'Higgins were defeated at Rancagua Oct. 1 and 2, 1814, and they fled across the Andes. O'Higgins joined San Martín in the invasion of Chile, and his charge decided the victory of Chacabuco (Feb. 12, 1817); three days after (San Martín having refused the office) O'Higgins was named supreme director of Chile with dictatorial powers. The independence of the country was formally proclaimed Feb. 12, 1818, and was decided by the victory of Maipo, April 5, 1818. O'Higgins's rule was very progressive. He was forced to resign by a revolution, Jan. 28, 1823, and retired to Peru.

Ohio (ò-hí'ò). The principal left-hand tributary of the Mississippi. It is formed by the junction of the Allegheny and Monongahela at Pittsburg; flows through western Pennsylvania; forms the boundary between Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois on the north and northwest, and West Virginia and Kentucky on the south and southeast; and joins the Mississippi at Cairo. Its chief tributaries are the Muskingum, Scioto, Miami, and Wabash on the north, and the Great Kanawha, Big Sandy, Licking, Kentucky, Green, Cumberland, and Tennessee on the south. The chief places on its banks are Pittsburg, Wheeling, Portsmouth, Cincinnati, Covington, Newport, Madison, Louisville, New Albany, and Evansville. Its rapids at Louisville are avoided by a canal. Length, about 975 miles, all navigable. Total length (with the Allegheny), about 1,300 miles.

Ohio. One of the North Central States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 38° 24' to 41° 57' N., and from long. 80° 34' to 84° 49' W. Capital, Columbus; chief cities, Cincinnati and Cleveland. It is bounded by Michigan and Lake Erie on the north, Pennsylvania and West Virginia (separated by the Ohio) on the east, Kentucky (separated by the Ohio) on the south, and Indiana on the west. The surface is undulating. It is the fourth State in population; the first in value of farms, production of wool, and manufacture of agricultural machinery; and one of the chief manufacturing States. Among the chief products are wheat, Indian corn, wool, live stock, dairy produce, flour, pork, coal, iron, salt, and petroleum. It has 88 counties, sends 2 senators and 21 representatives to Congress, and has 23 electoral votes. It was discovered by the French under La Salle at the end of the 17th century; was claimed by both the French and the English; was ceded to Great Britain in 1763, and passed to the United States in 1783. Virginia and Connecticut relinquished their claims to the territory, retaining, however, extensive reserves until 1800. Ohio formed part of the Northwest Territory in 1787; was settled at Marietta in 1788; was the scene of Indian warfare 1790-95; was admitted to the Union in 1803; and was the scene of engagements in the War of 1812, and of raids in the Civil War. Area, 41,060 square miles. Population (1890), 3,672,316.

Ohio, Army of the. A Federal army in the American Civil War. It was organized in 1861-62 by General Buell. In Oct., 1862, Buell was succeeded by Rosecrans, and the army was called the Army of the Cumberland. Another department of the Ohio was formed, and this army was in 1865 incorporated with the Army of the Cumberland.

Ohio Company, The. A company of Virginia and Maryland colonists to whom the British crown granted, in 1749, 500,000 acres in the Ohio valley for the purpose of settlement.

Ohio Idea. In American politics, the advocacy of greenbacks in payment for United States bonds, and of greenbacks in place of national-bank notes. This project was pushed especially in Ohio by the Democratic leaders Allen, Pendleton, and Ewing about 1868-76.

Ohio Wesleyan University. A coeducational institution of learning at Delaware, Ohio, founded in 1843. It is controlled by the Methodist Episcopal Church, and has (1893) 41 instructors and 1,271 students.

Ohlau (ò'lou). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated on the Ohlan and Oder 17 miles southeast of Breslau. Population (1890), 8,632.

Ohlenschläger (ò-len-shlä-ger), Adam Gottlob. Born at Vesterbro, near Copenhagen, Nov. 14, 1779; died there, Jan. 20, 1850. A Danish poet and dramatist. His first important production was the poem "Guldhornene" ("The Golden Horns," 1803), the work from which it is customary to date the beginning of recent Danish poetry. In this year also he wrote and published a volume of poems ("Digte") which contains the lyrical drama "Sanct-Hansaften-Spil" ("The Play of St. John's Eve"). In 1805 appeared two new volumes of "Poetiske Skrifter" ("Poetical Writings"), which include, among other poems, "Thors Reise til Jotunheim" ("Thor's Journey to Jotunheim") and "Alladin eller den forunderlige Lampe" ("Aladdin, or the Wonderful Lamp"), considered one of the masterpieces of Danish literature. With public assistance he was now enabled to undertake a journey abroad, and left Denmark this same year. In Halle he wrote his first tragedy, "Hakon Jarl" ("Earl Hakon"). He remained the winter in Berlin. In the spring of 1806 he went to Weimar, and lived there two or three months in intimate association with Goethe. He was subsequently in Dresden, and that winter went on to Paris, where during the next eighteen months he wrote the tragedies "Palnatoke" and "Axel og Valborg," and the poem "Baldur bin Gode" ("Baldur the Good"). In 1809, in Rome, he wrote the tragedy "Corregio" in the German language. He returned to Denmark that same autumn, and in 1810 was made professor of esthetics at the Copenhagen University. After this period he wrote numerous works, epic, lyric, dramatic, and prose, among them the dramatic idyll "Den lille Hyrdedreng" ("The Little Shepherd Boy," 1818); the epic cycle (parts of which had already been published) "Nordens Guder" ("The Gods of the North"), which appeared complete in 1819; the tragedy "Erik og Abel" (1820); the epic "Hroff Krake" (1828); and his last great work, the epic "Regnar Lodbrok" (1848). His poetical works ("Poetiske Skrifter") were published at Copenhagen, 1857-62, in 32 vols. His autobiography, "Erindringer" ("Recollections"), was published at Copenhagen, 1850-51, in 4 vols.

Ohler (ò'ler), Gustav Friedrich von. Born at Ebingen, Württemberg, June 10, 1812; died at Tübingen, Württemberg, Feb. 19, 1872. A German Protestant theologian. He published "Theology of the Old Testament" (1873), etc.

Ohm (òm), Georg Simon. Born at Erlangen, Bavaria, March 16, 1787; died at Munich, July 7, 1854. A German physicist, especially noted for his investigations in galvanism. He propounded an important law, known as "Ohm's law," which may be expressed as follows: the strength of an electric current, or the quantity of electricity passing a section of the conductor in a unit of time, is directly proportional to the whole electromotive force in operation, and inversely proportional to the sum of all the resistances in the circuit. He published "Die galvanische Kette mathematisch bearbeitet" (1827), etc.

Ohm, Martin. Born at Erlangen, Bavaria, May 6, 1792; died at Berlin, April 1, 1872. A German mathematician, brother of G. S. Ohm; professor at Berlin from 1824. His chief work is "Versuch eines vollkommen consequenten Systems der Mathematik" (1822-52).

Ohnet (ò-nä'). Georges. Born at Paris, April 3, 1848. A French novelist and dramatist. After the Franco-German war he gave up the study of law for journalism. At first he was on the staff of the "Pays," and thereafter on that of the "Constitutionnel." His fondness for dramatic composition led him to write "Regina Sarpi" (1875) and "Marthe" (1877). Some of his novels have also been adapted to the stage, among others "Le maître de forges" and "La grande marinière" (1888). Ohnet's novels appeared as serials in the "Figaro," the "Illustration," and the "Revue des Deux Mondes" before being published in book form. The series, known collectively as "Batailles de la vie," includes "Serge Pariné" (1881), "Le maître de forges" (1882), "La comtesse Sarah" (1883), "Lise Fleuron" (1884), "La grande marinière" (1885), "Les dames de Croix-Mort" (1886), "Noir et rose" (1887), "Volonté" (1888), "Le docteur Rameau" (1888), "Le dernier amour" (1890), "L'âme de Pierre" (1890), "Dette de haine" (1891), "X mrod et Cie" (1892), and "Le lendemain des amours" (1893). Georges Ohnet is an idealist rather than a naturalist writer.

Ojeda (ò-nä'thá), Alonso de. Born in Cuenea about 1468; died at Santo Domingo, 1514 or 1515. A Spanish cavalier, prominent in early American history. He went to Española with Columbus, 1493, and was engaged in many audacious enterprises there. Returning to Spain, he was associated with Cosa and Vesputci in the first exploration of the coasts of Guiana and Venezuela (May, 1499, June, 1500). In 1502 and 1505 he made other voyages to the northern coast of South America. Being empowered (1508) to settle and govern Nueva Andalucía (now northwestern Colombia), he fitted out an expedition at Santo Domingo, sailing Nov. 10, 1509. After various adventures and escapes he settled on the Gulf of Urabi or Darien. The colony was soon reduced to great misery, and Ojeda sailed away to seek aid. He was shipwrecked on Cuba, and finally reached Santo Domingo penniless and bankrupt. He died in complete poverty; but the Darien colony was eventually successful, and led to the discovery of the Pacific Ocean and Peru.

Ojibwa (ò-jib'wä), or Chippewa (chip'e-wä). [Pl., also Ojibways.] A large tribe of North American Indians. Their former range was along the north and south shores of Lakes Huron and Superior, and extended west across northern Minnesota to the Turtle Mountains of North Dakota. The Ojibwa, Ottawa, and Pottawotomi were connected in a loose confederacy designated as the Three Fires. When supplied with firearms in the early part of the 18th century, they greatly extended their territory by occupying that of the Fox, Sioux, and Iroquois. They number now above 30,000, about equally divided between the United States and Canada. Their name seems to refer to "puckering" or "drawing up," whether, as variously contended, of the lips in speaking or drinking, of a peculiar seam in the moose skin, or of the skin of a roasted prisoner (whose is uncertain. The French called them Sauteurs (people of the falls), from the band first met at Sault Ste.-Marie. See Algonquian).

Old Dominion (ō-dō-min'yōn), The. A name popularly given to the State of Virginia. Its origin is variously explained. Perhaps the best account is that Captain John Smith called Virginia "Old Virginia" to distinguish it from "New Virginia," as the New England colony was called. The colony of Virginia was alluded to in documents as "the colony and dominion of Virginia"; hence the phrase "the Old Dominion."

Oldenbarneveldt. See Barneveld.

Oldenburg (ōl'den-bērg; G. pron. ōl'den-bērg). 1. A grand duchy of northern Germany, and state of the German Empire. Capital, Oldenburg. It comprises the duchy proper of Oldenburg and the principalities of Birkenfeld and Lubeck. The duchy of Oldenburg is bounded by the North Sea on the north, Hannover and Bremen on the east, and Hannover on the south and west. The surface is generally flat. The chief occupation is agriculture; it is noted for its live stock. The government of Oldenburg is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, under a grand duke and a Landtag of one chamber; it sends 1 member to the Bundesrat, and 3 members to the Reichstag. The prevailing religion is Protestant. Oldenburg was ruled by counts as early as the 11th century; passed under the rule of Denmark in 1667; was ceded to the Holstein-Gottorp line in 1773; was raised to a duchy in 1777; gained and lost territory by the changes of 1803; joined the Confederation of the Rhine in 1806; was annexed to France in 1810; was restored to self-government in 1813; entered the German Confederation in 1815; gained additions of territory in 1817 and 1818; assumed the rank of a grand duchy in 1829; sided with Prussia in 1866; and joined the North German Confederation in 1866. Oldfield (ōld'fēld), Anne. Born at London, 1683; died there, Oct. 23, 1730. A noted English actress. Rich took her into his company at fifteen shillings a week in 1700. In 1704 Cibber assigned to her the part of Lady Betty Modish in his "Careless Husband," and she won immediate success. By 1706 she was held to be the rival of Mrs. Bracegirdle. She was the original representative of 65 characters, the greater part of which belong to genteel comedy. She played tragic parts with great dignity and feeling, but in Lady Betty Modish, Lady Townley, Sylvia, and Mrs. Sullen she was probably never equaled. Mrs. Oldfield in private life was not without reproach. She lived for some years with Arthur Maynwaring, a wealthy bachelor, handsome and accomplished, by whom she had a son who bore his father's name and surname. Later, and after the death of Mr. Maynwaring, she was "under the protection" of General Churchill, the son of an elder brother of the Duke of Marlborough, by whom she had also one son, who married Lady Mary Walpole, a natural daughter of Sir Robert, for whom he obtained the rank of an earl's daughter. When Mrs. Oldfield died her remains lay in state in the Jerusalem Chamber of Westminster Abbey, and there she was buried at the west end of the south aisle.

Old Hundredth, or Old Hundred. A popular psalm-tune, first published in the "Genevan Psalter" about 1551-52, edited by Louis Bourgeois. It was originally adapted to Beza's version of the 134th Psalm, but when adopted in England was set to Kethe's version of the 100th Psalm. It was at first known as the "Hundredth," but in 1698, when Tate and Brady published their "New Version," the word "Old" was used to show that the tune was the one which had been in use in the previous Psalter (sternhold and Hopkins's). It is now generally sung to the doxology, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

Old Ironsides. The popular name of the United States frigate Constitution.

Old Lady of Threadneedle Street. A name given to the Bank of England, from its location in Threadneedle street, London.

Old Law, The, or a New Way to Please You. A play published in 1656 as by Massinger, Middleton, and Rowley. The original play was certainly written by Middleton in 1599, and acted in 1600. Massinger possibly revised it much later.

Old Man of the Sea, The. In the "Arabian Nights' Entertainments," a monster who leaped on the back of Sindbad the sailor, clinging to him and refusing to dismount. Hence the name is applied to any person of whom one cannot get rid.

Oldmixon (ôld'mik-sôn), John. Born in Somerset, 1673; died at London, 1742. An English historical writer. He was dull and insipid. He abused Pope in his "Essay on Criticism in Prose" (1728), and was promptly sacrificed in the "Dunclad" (ii, 283). Among his other works are "The British Empire in America" (1705), "Critical History of England, etc." (1726), "History of England" (1730-39), "Memoirs of the Press, etc." (1742), etc.

Old Morality. A nickname of William Henry Smith (1825-91), a prominent English Conservative politician: given apparently with a punning allusion to Scott's "Old Mortality."

Old Mortality. A historical novel by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1816. The scene is laid in Scotland during the rising of the Covenanters in 1679. It is so called from the epithet given to Robert Paterson, who passed his life in restoring the gravestones of the Covenanters.

Old Nick. A name of the devil.

Our popular name for the evil one, Old Nick, is a word of this class. The nickers held a conspicuous place in German romance and story—they are frequently spoken of in the Anglo-Saxon poem of Beowulf. They were water-fairies, and dwelt in the lakes and rivers as well as in the sea. So late as the fifteenth century, a MS. dictionary in English and Latin explains nicker by "sirena." At present, in our island, the word is only preserved in the name of the devil, Old Nick. T. Wright, Essays, I, 255.

Old North State, The. A name sometimes given to North Carolina.

Old Orchard Beach. A seaside resort in York County, Maine, situated on Saco Bay 11 miles south-southwest of Portland.

Ollanta (ôl-yãn'tã). The hero of a celebrated Quechua (Peruvian) drama, the "Apu-Ollanta." He is represented as living early in the 15th century. He loves Cusi Coyllur, daughter of the Inca Pachacutec Yupanqui; but after she has borne him a child the Inca immures her in a dungeon, and Ollanta leads a rebellion for 10 years. He is finally captured, but is pardoned by the new Inca who has come into power, and his wife and child are restored to him. The drama is of great beauty. It was first reduced to writing in the 17th century, but there is little doubt of its antiquity, and the hero is perhaps historical. Several Spanish plays and a recent opera have been founded on it. Also written Ollantai or Ollantay.

Ollantay-tambo (ôl-yãn'ti-tãm'bô). [Quechua, 'house of Ollanta.'] A ruined Inca fort and town of the department of Cuzco, Peru, in the valley of the Urubamba, 41 miles northeast of Cuzco. The place was a frontier post of the Incas, and is connected with many events in their history, as well as with the legend of Ollanta (which see). The buildings are in a remarkably perfect condition, and some of them rest on older foundations, supposed to be pre-Incarial. There is a small modern village on the site. Also written Ollantay-tampu.

Ollapod (ol'ā-pod), Doctor. A character in Colman the younger's comedy "The Poor Gentleman." He is a warlike apothecary, and also a cornet in a militia troop, noted for his "jumble of physic and shooting" and his harmless prescriptions.

Olmeccs (ōl-meks'), or Olmecas (ōl-mā'kās'). A traditional and perhaps mythical tribe or race of Indians, said to have inhabited portions of the Mexican plateau before the advent of the Aztecs. Accounts of them are very vague, and agree only in describing them as savages. It has been suggested that the Chinantecs were descended from them. Also written Ulmecs, Hulmecas, etc.

Olmedo (ōl-mā'fō), José Joaquin. Born at Guayaquil, 1782; died there, Feb. 17, 1847. An Ecuadorian politician and poet. He was a leader of the revolt against the Spaniards in Oct., 1820, and a member of the first patriot junta 1820-22, but opposed the union with Colombia. Subsequently he held various civil positions, and in 1845 was a member of the provisional government. His poems, principally lyrics, are very popular.

Olmsted (om'sted or um'sted), Denison. Born at East Hartford, Conn., June 18, 1791; died at New Haven, Conn., May 13, 1859. An American physicist, astronomer, meteorologist, and geologist. He published text-books on astronomy and natural philosophy, etc.

Olmsted, Frederick Law. Born at Hartford, Conn., April 26, 1822. An American landscape-gardener. In 1850 he made a pedestrian tour through England and a short continental trip, recorded in "Walks and Talks of an American Farmer in England" (1852). On his return he traveled in the United States, and published "A Journey in the Seaboard Slave States" (1856), "A Journey through Texas" (1857), "A Journey in the Back Country" (1860), "The Cotton Kingdom" (1861), etc. When the work on Central Park, New York, was begun he was made superintendent, and collaborated with Mr. Vaux in preparing a plan which was successful in competition. During the war he acted as secretary of the Sanitary Commission. After severing his connection with it, he spent two years in California, spending much time in the Yosemite Valley in an official capacity. In 1879 he made a trip to Europe, and on returning took charge of the Back Bay Park in Boston. His most successful undertaking was the laying out of Jackson Park, Chicago, for the Columbian Exposition.

Olmütz (ol'müts), Slavic Olomouc (ō-lō-mōts'). The third city of Moravia, situated on an island in the March, in lat. 49° 36' N., long. 17° 14' E. It is one of the chief fortresses of the Austrian empire. Among the old buildings are the cathedral, Rathaus, and Mauritiuskirche. It is the seat of an archbishop, and formerly contained a university (now limited to a theological faculty). It was the capital of Moravia until 1640; was taken by the Swedes in 1642, and by the Prussians in 1741; and was unsuccessfully besieged by the Prussians in 1758. Population (1890), 19,761.

Olybrius (ō-lib'ri-us). Roman emperor, 472.

Olympia (ō-lim'pi-ā). [Gr. Ὀλυμπία.] In ancient geography, a valley in Elis, Peloponnesus, Greece, situated on the Alpheus in lat. 37° 38' N., long. 21° 38' E. It is famous as the seat of a celebrated sanctuary of Zeus and of the Olympic games, the most important of the great public games of classical antiquity. (See Olympic games.) The origins of the sanctuary and of the games are anterior to history; according to tradition the latter were reorganized, in obedience to the Delphic oracle, in the 9th century B. C. The list of Olympian victors goes back to 776 B. C., which is the first year of the first Olympiad; but the Olympiads did not come into accepted use in chronology until much later. The sanctuary was situated in the valley between the rivers Cladeus and Alpheus, at the foot of the hill of Cronus. A trapeziform inclosure called the Altis, about 500 by 600 feet, surrounded the temple of Zeus, the Heræum, the Metroon, the treasuries of the various Greek cities and states, and other buildings, besides numberless statues and other works of art, and steles with commemorative inscriptions. Outside of the Altis lay the Boulenterion or senate-house, the stadium, which was the chief scene of the athletic contests, and a number of large gymnasia, and thernæ, the last chiefly of Roman date. The Olympic games were abolished by Theodosius in 394 A. D. The monuments were much shattered by earthquakes in the 6th century, and as time went on were progressively buried by landslips from Cronus and inundations of the Cladeus and Alpheus, in one of which the hippodrome was entirely washed away. Sand and earth were deposited to a depth of from 10 to 20 feet over the ruins. In 1829 the French Expedition de Morée made some superficial excavations, and recovered some sculptures (now in the Louvre) from the Zeus temple. In six seasons of work after 1874, the German government laid bare down to the ancient level the greater part of what survives of the sanctuary. The sculptural finds were less than had been hoped for, though they include two capital pieces—the Hermes of Praxiteles and the Nike of Peopius. In the departments of architecture and epigraphy, however, the German excavations take rank as the most important that have been made. The antiquities discovered are preserved on the site, the more precious in a museum built for the purpose. The temple of Zeus, dating from the early part of the 5th century B. C., is a Doric peripteros of 6 by 13 columns, measuring 907 by 2107 feet; the columns were over 7 feet in base-diameter and 34 high. The cella had pronaos and opisthodomos with 2 columns in antis and 2 interior ranges of 7 columns. In the cella stood the famous chryselephantine statue of Zeus, seated, about 40 feet high, by Phidias. The pediments were filled with important groups of sculpture, much of which has been recovered. That of the eastern pediment represents the chariot-race of Pelops and Enopeus, under the presidency of Zeus; that of the western the fight between Lapiths and Centaurs in presence of Apollo. The end walls of the cella bore a Doric frieze with very fine sculptured metopes representing the exploits of Hercules. The Heræum, or temple of Hera, a temple of very ancient foundation, showing evidences of original construction in wood and unburned brick partly replaced piecemeal in stone with the advance of time, is a large Doric peripteros of 6 by 16 columns; the cella had pronaos and opisthodomos in antis, and was divided in the interior into 3 aisles by 2 ranges of columns. The famous Hermes of Praxiteles was found in this temple. The Philippeum is a circular building built by Philip of Macedonia about 336 B. C. The cella was surrounded by a prystyle of 18 Ionic columns, and had in the interior a range of Corinthian columns, and chryselephantine statues of Philip and his family.

Olympia. The capital of the State of Washington and of Thurston County, situated at the southern extremity of Puget Sound, about lat. 47° 4' N., long. 122° 55' W. Population (1890), 4,698.

Olympian (ō-lim'pi-an), The. A surname of Pericles.

Pericles, called half in derision by the comic poets the Zeus of Athens; called afterwards, with reverence, by Plutarch, the Olympian.

Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 37.

Olympian Zeus. See Zeus.

Olympian Zeus, Temple of. See Olympicum.

Olympias (ō-lim'pi-as). [Gr. Ὀλυπιάς.] Put to death 316 B. C. The wife of Philip II. of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great. She was involved in the wars of Alexander's successors; and was allied with Polysperchon against Cassander about 317 B. C.

Olympic games, The. The greatest of the four Panhellenic festivals of the ancient Greeks. They were celebrated at intervals of four years, in honor of Zeus, in a sacred inclosure called the Altis, in the plain of Olympia (which see), containing many temples and religious, civic, and gymnastic structures, besides countless votive works of art. The festival began with sacrifices followed by contests and racing, wrestling, etc., and closed on the fifth day with processions, sacrifices, and banquets to the victors. The victors were crowned with garlands of wild olive; and on their return home they were received with extraordinary distinction, and enjoyed numerous honors and privileges. The period of four years intervening between one celebration and the next, called an Olympiad, is notable as the measure by which the Greeks computed time—776 B. C. being the reputed first year of the first Olympiad.

Olympicum (ō-lim-pi-ē'um), or Temple of Olympian Zeus. A temple founded at Athens by Pisistratus, but not completed in the form represented by the existing ruins until the reign of Hadrian. The temple was Corinthian, dipteral, with 8 columns on each front and 20 on each flank, and measured 134 by 353½ feet. Fifteen huge columns, 56½ feet high, are still standing, and one lies prostrate. The temple stood in a large peribolos which was adorned with statues.

Olympiodorus (ō-lim'pi-ō-dō'rus). A Platonic philosopher. He was a native of Alexandria, lived in the second half of the 6th century, and wrote scholia or commentaries on the dialogues of Plato, abstracts of which have come down to us.

Olympiodorus. A Greek historian. He was a native of Thebes in Egypt, lived in the first half of the 5th century, and wrote 22 books of general history dealing with the period from 407 to 425, abstracts of which have been preserved in the "Library" of Photius.

Olympus (ō-lim'pus). [Gr. Ὀλύμπτος.] In ancient geography, the name of various mountains, especially of one on the borders of Macedonia and Thessaly, regarded as the especial home of the gods (hence often used for heaven). Height, about 9,750 feet. The Mysian Olympus was on the borders of Mysia, Bithynia, and Phrygia in Asia Minor. Others were in Lydia, Lycia, Cyprus, Laconia, and Elis. Tozer enumerating 14 in all.

Olynthiac (ō-lin'thi-ak) Orations. A series of three orations delivered at Athens by Demosthenes 349-348 B. C., for the purpose of inducing the Athenians to assist Olynthus against Philip II. of Macedonia.

Olynthus (ō-lin'thus). [Gr. Ὀλύνθος.] In ancient geography, a city in Chalcidice, Macedonia, situated near the head of the Toronaic Gulf, in lat. 40° 16' N., long. 23° 21' E. It was the capital of an important confederacy until its suppression by Sparta in the war of 333-379 B. C. It was attacked by Philip II. of Macedonia and was captured and destroyed by him 347 B. C. The Olynthiac orations of Demosthenes were appeals to Athens to support Olynthus against Philip.

Om (ōm, but originally and more correctly ōn). [According to Böhtlingk and Koth, an obscuration of Skt. am, the result of prolonging and nasalizing ā, an asseverative particle; according to Bloomfield (A. O. S. xiv. el.), identical with Gr. ai, L. ai, au, tem, Goth. au, k, and meaning 'now then,' 'well now.'] A particle that plays a great rôle in Hindu religious literature. Its original sense is that of solemn affirmation. Popular etymology perhaps associating it with a root implying 'favor, further,' and its sanctity being inferred from its occurrence in the Vedic literature, it became the auspicious word with which the teacher began and the pupil ended each lesson of the Veda. Much of the Upanishad-treats of the mystic meaning of Om, as summing up in itself all truth. In later Hinduism it is regarded as consisting of the three elements a, u, and m, symbolizing respectively Vishnu, Shiva, and Brahma, so that the pranava ('murmur') Om signifies the Hindu triad. (See Bloomfield as quoted above.) Om is also the first syllable of the "formula of six syllables" Om mani padme hum, so conspicuous in Buddhism and especially in Lamaism. Its reputed author is the deified saint Avalokitesvara (which see), or Padmapani, 'the lotus-handed,' as he is called by Tibetans. It is variously translated. Bloomfield gives "Om, O jewel on the lotus, hum"; Goldstücker, "Salvation (Om) [is] in the jewel-lotus (mani-padme), amen (hum)," where the compound "jewel-lotus" refers to the saint and the flower from which he arose, according to which the formula was originally an invocation to Avalokitesvara.

Om (ōm). A river in western Siberia which joins the Irtysh at Omsk.

Omagh (ō'mā or ō-māch'). The capital of the county of Tyrone, Ireland, 27 miles south of Londonderry.

Omaguas (ō-mā'gwās): called Cambevas (kām-bā'vās) by Brazilians. An Indian tribe of northern Peru, on the north side of the upper Marañon, between long. 72° and 75° W. (territory claimed but not held by Ecuador). They were formerly very numerous, having many large villages connected by good roads. They were agriculturists, dressed in cotton garments, used gold ornaments, and are said to have been sun-worshippers; probably they had derived the germs of civilization from the Incas. Their heads were artificially flattened. The Omaguas were gathered into mission villages in the 17th century; their numbers rapidly decreased, mainly by disease, and the remnants are mixed by intermarriage with other tribes. They belong to the Tupi linguistic stock.

Omaguas, Kingdom or Province of. A name given in the 16th century to the region occupied by the Omaguas. About 1545 reports were brought to New Granada and Peru of a vast and rich city in this district. It was connected with the tales of El Dorado, and became the object of several expeditions. See Urusa, Pedro de.

Omaha (ō'mā-hā). [Pl., also Omahas. From Umāhan, those who went up stream or against the current.] A tribe of the Dhegiha division of North American Indians, numbering 1,197. They are in eastern Nebraska. See Dhegiha.

Omaha (ō'mā-hā). The capital of Douglas County, Nebraska, situated on the Missouri in lat. 41° 16' N., long. 95° 56' W. It is the largest city in the State, an important railway center, and the eastern terminus of the Union Pacific Railroad; has flourishing commerce and manufactures; and contains important silver-smelting works. It has very large stock-yards, and pork-packing and beef-packing are important industries. It was founded in 1854, and was formerly the capital of the State. Population (1890), 140,452.

Oman (ō-mān'). A sultanate in eastern Arabia, bordering on the Persian Gulf and Gulf of Oman. Capital, Muscat. The surface is largely mountainous. It is one of the most flourishing independent states of Arabia. In the beginning of the 19th century it was much more extended, but the name is now limited to the region near Muscat. It is under British supervision. Area, 82,000 square miles. Population, 1,500,000.

Oman, Gulf of. An arm of the Arabian Sea, south of Persia and east of Arabia. It is connected with the Persian Gulf by the Strait of Ormuz.

Omar (ō'mār), ibn al-Khattab. The second calif. He succeeded Abu-Bekr in 634, and was assassinated by Firoz, a Persian slave, in 644. His daughter Hafsa was the third wife of Mohammed. During his reign Syria, Phœnicia, Persia, Egypt, and Jerusalem were brought under the sway of Islam. He took an important part in the first collection of the Koran. He was the first to assume the title "Commander of the Faithful" (Emīr al-mūminīn), and he "organized a complete military-religious commonwealth" (Noldeke).

Omar II. Calif 717-720, successor of Solymān. Omar, Mosque of, or Kubbet es-Sakhra ('Dome of the Rock'). A celebrated mosque on the platform of the temple in Jerusalem. It is an octagon of 66 feet to a side, with 4 porches and a range of pointed windows, incrustated with beautifully colored Persian tiles. The interior has two concentric ranges of columns and piers, the central range supporting the drum of the dome, which is 97 feet high and 65 in diameter. Beneath the dome is the sacred rock upon which it is held that Abraham was about to sacrifice Isaac. The walls and the drum are covered with beautiful Byzantine mosaics of different dates, and the windows are filled with splendid 16th-century colored glass. The mosque was originally a very early Byzantine church, but it has been much modified by the Mohammedans.

Omar Khayyam (ō'mār khī-yām'). A Persian poet and astronomer who was born at Nishapur in Khorasan in the latter half of the 11th and died within the first quarter of the 12th century A. D. He studied under the imam Mowaffak of Nishapur, having as his companions Hasan ben Sabbah, afterward the head of the military order of the Assassins, and Nizam-ul-Mulk, later vizir of Alp Arslan and Malik Shah, respectively son and grandson of Toghrol Beg, the founder of the Seljukian dynasty. Having attained power, Nizam-ul-Mulk granted Omar Khayyam a yearly pension. Omar was one of the eight learned men appointed by Malik Shah to reform the calendar, the result being the Jalali era, so called from Jalaluddin, one of the king's names; "a computation of time which," says Gibbon, "surpasses the Julian and approaches the accuracy of the Gregorian style." He was the author of astronomical tables entitled "Zijī Maḥshāhī," and of an Arabic treatise on algebra, but is especially known as a poet from his Rubaiyat, or Quatrains (in 2 verses or 4 hemistichs of which the first, second, and fourth rime), which have been translated by Fitzgerald and by Whinfield.

O'Meara (ō-mā'rī), Barry Edward. Born in Ireland, 1786; died at London, June 3, 1836. An Irish surgeon, physician to Napoleon I. at St.

Helena 1815-18. He published "Napoleon in Exile" (1822), etc.

Omer Pasha (ō'mēr pash'ā) (originally Lat-tas). Born Nov. 24, 1806; died at Constantinople, April 18, 1871. A Turkish general. He commanded an army in the Crimean war, and commanded against the insurgents in Crete in 1867.

Ommiads (ō-mī'adz), or Omayyads (ō-mī'yadz). A dynasty of califs which reigned in the East 661-750 A. D., the first of whom was Moawiyah, the descendant of Omayya (the founder of a noted Arab family), and successor to Ali. The Ommiads were followed by the Abbassides. The last of these Eastern Ommiads escaped to Spain and founded the califate of Cordova in 756. This Western califate, and with it the Ommiad dynasty, became extinct in 1031.

After the first four (or "orthodox") Khalifs, Abu-Bekr, Omar, Othman, and Aly, who were elected more or less by popular vote, the Syrian party set up Moawia as Khalif at Damascus, and from him sprang the family of Omayyad Khalifs, so called from their ancestor Omayya. There were fourteen Omayyad Khalifs, who reigned from 661 to 750, when they were deposed by Es-Scaffah, the butcher, who was the first of the second dynasty of Khalifs, called Abbasside, after their ancestor Abbas, an uncle of the Prophet Mohammed. The Abbasside Khalifs transferred the seat of government from Damascus to Baghdad, and held the Khalifate until its destruction by the Mongols in 1258. Among the members of the deposed family of the Omayyads was Abd-er-Rahman, a name which means 'Servant of the Merciful God.' Pooler, Story of the Moors, p. 59.

Omnibus Bill, The. A series of compromise measures passed through Congress 1850, largely through the influence of Clay. The chief provisions were the admission of California as a free State to the union, organization of the Territories of Utah and New Mexico (without restrictions on slavery), abolition of the slave-trade in the District of Columbia, and a fugitive-slave law.

Omphale (om'fā-lē). [Gr. Ὀμφάλη.] In Greek legend, a Lydian princess, mistress of Hercules.

Omri (om'rī). King of Israel. The length and date of his reign are much disputed (890-875 B. C.—Duncker). He was a usurper, and the founder of a dynasty of considerable eminence which included Ahab and Jehu. He made an alliance with Tyre and subdued the Moabites. He is mentioned on the Moabite stone, and in the cuneiform inscriptions the kingdom of Israel is called Bit-Humri ('the house of Omri'). He built the city of Samaria, and made it the capital of the Israelitish kingdom.

Oms de Santa Pau (ōms dā sän'tā pou), Manuel, Marquis of Castell-dos-Rios. Died at Lima, April 22, 1710. A Spanish nobleman, a grandee of Spain. He was viceroy of Peru from July 7, 1707. During his term the Spanish commercial monopoly of Peruvian trade was somewhat relaxed.

Oña (ōn'yā), Pedro de. Born at Los Confines, on the Biobio River, Chile, about 1565; died at Lima, Peru, after 1639. A Spanish-American poet. Most of his life was passed in Lima, where he was fiscal of the audience. His principal work is the epic "Arauco domado" (1st ed. Lima, 1596), which is in some respects an imitation of Ercilla's "Araucana." It has some poetical merit, and is of much historical value.

Onas. See Fugians.

Onatas (ō-nā'tās). [Gr. Ὀνάτας.] Flourished about 500-460 B. C. An Æginetan sculptor and painter, a contemporary of Ageladas the teacher of Phidias. See Ageladas. He was especially famous for his statues of athletes, and was much admired and highly praised by Pansanias, who describes many of his works. As the Ægina marbles were probably made in his day, it may well be that they are either his work or represent his characteristics.

Oñate (ōn-yā'tā). A town in the province of Guipuzcoa, northern Spain, 38 miles west of PAMPLONA. Population (1887), 6,152.

Oñate (ōn-yā'tā), Juan de. Born at Guadalajara, Mexico, about 1555; died after 1611. A settler and first governor of New Mexico. He was a son of the founder of Guadalajara, and was married to a granddaughter of Hernando Cortés. In 1595 his proposition to settle New Mexico was accepted by the viceroy Velasco, and after much delay the grant was confirmed by the Count of Monterey. Oñate left Zacatecas in Jan., 1598, with 130 men besides Indians, a large wagon- and cattle-train, etc.; reached the Rio Grande, probably at El Paso, April 20; took formal possession April 30; crossed the river; and in Aug. founded the first capital, San Juan (Santa Fé was founded later). After the first year he had little trouble with the Indians. Early in 1599 he explored a part of Arizona, and in 1604 followed the Gila River down to the Gulf of California. He probably ceased to rule as governor in 1603.

Onca (on'kā). A Phœnician goddess, the deity of wisdom, compared by the Greeks to Athene.

Ondegardo (ōn-dā-gār'ōdo), Polo de. Born at Salamanca about 1500; died, probably at Potosí, Upper Peru, about 1575. A Spanish lawyer and antiquarian. He went to Peru in 1545; was a trusted councillor of several rulers; and was corregidor of Potosí and Lima. He made a special study of Inca laws and customs, with the object of ingrafting the best of them on the Spanish legislation. His two "Relaciones" or reports (1561 and 1571) are still in manuscript, but have been freely used by historians; a smaller report was edited by Markham for the Hakluyt Society 1873. In 1559 Ondegardo discovered at Cuzco several mummies of the Inca sovereigns.

Onega (on'e-gü). A small seaport of Russia, situated at the entrance of the river Onega into the White Sea.

Onega, Lake. The second largest lake in Europe, situated in the government of Olonetz, north-western Russia, northeast of Lake Ladoga. It is connected by canals with the Volga and Dwina systems. Its waters pass by the Svir into Lake Ladoga, and finally into the Neva. Length, 152 miles. Greatest width, about 50 miles. Area, 3,763 square miles.

Oneida (ō-nī'dā). [Pl., also Oneidas. The name is translated 'standing stone' or 'people of the stone'.] A tribe of North American Indians. The early French writers called them Oneiout. They formerly occupied the lands east of Oneida Lake, New York, and the upper waters of the Susquehanna River to the southward. They were not prominent in the Iroquois Confederacy, and sometimes acted adversely to its other members, as they were not friendly to the French and took part with the colonies in the Revolution. In 1833 most of them removed to and still remain at Green Bay, Wisconsin, but others are in Ontario. Altogether they number (1894) over 3,000. See Iroquois.

Oneida Community. A religious society or brotherhood, the Bible Communists or Perfectionists, established in 1847 on Oneida Creek, in Lenox township, Madison County, New York, by John H. Noyes, after unsuccessful attempts to establish it at New Haven, Connecticut, in 1834, and at Putney, Vermont, in 1837. A branch of the Oneida Community also existed at Wallingford, Connecticut, but has now been withdrawn. Originally the Oneida Community was strictly communistic, all property and all children belonging primarily to the society, and the restrictions of marriage being entirely abolished; but in 1879, owing to the increasing demand of public opinion that the social practices of the society should be abandoned, marriage and family life were introduced, and in 1880 communism of property gave place to a joint-stock system, and the community was legally incorporated as "The Oneida Community, Limited."

Oneida Lake. A lake in central New York, 11 miles northeast of Syracuse. Its outlet is by the Oneida and Oswego rivers into Lake Ontario. Length, 20 miles.

O'Neil (ō-nēl'), Hugh, Earl of Tyrone. Died 1616. An Irish chieftain. He assumed the title of the O'Neil, and in 1597 headed an insurrection against the English, whom he defeated at Blackwater in 1598. He negotiated a truce with the Earl of Essex in 1599, and was defeated by Mountjoy 1601. He submitted about 1603.

O'Neill, Eliza. Born in Ireland, 1791; died there, Oct. 29, 1872. A noted Irish tragic actress, the successor of Mrs. Siddons. Onosander (on-ō-san'dēr). [Gr. Ὀνόσανδρος.] A Greek writer on military tactics.

Of the tacticians subsequent to Polybius, the most noted was Onosander, who flourished in the middle of the 1st century of our era, and dedicated to Q. Veranius Nepos, consul in A. D. 49, a brief but comprehensive treatise on the military art, which has come down to us, with the title Στρατηγικός Λόγος. It is divided into 42 chapters, and gives instructions with regard to all the details of a campaign. It is written in Attic Greek, and in a sufficiently pure style. The author, who was also known as a commentator on Plato, was the source of the military writings of the Emperors Mauricius and Leo, and in a French translation was used as a manual of the military art by Maurice of Saxony. Muller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, [III. 230. (Donaldson.)]

Onotes (ō-nō'tās). An extinct tribe of Indians who inhabited the eastern shore of Lake Maracaibo. They were fishermen, and built their houses on piles in the water. Ojeda, who found them in 1499, was reminded by their dwellings of Venice (whence he named the country Venezuela). Probably the Onotes were soon carried off into slavery; but huts similar to theirs are still made in the same region.

Ophelia, Miss. A strong-minded, clear-headed New England woman in Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Ophir (ō'fir). In Old Testament geography, a country whence gold, silver, precious stones, ivory, sandalwood, apes, and peacocks were brought. It was especially noted for its gold. The fleet of Solomon occupied 3 years in making the journey. It has been variously identified with India, Sumatra, the coast of Malabar, the east coast of Africa, and the southern or southeastern portion of Arabia on the Persian Gulf. The latest identification has in its favor the statement in Gen. x. 29, where Ophir is mentioned as the son of Joktan.

Ophir (ō'fir), Mount. 1. A volcano in Sumatra, near the western coast, about lat. 0°, long. 100° E. Height, about 10,000 feet.—2. A mountain east of Malacca, Malay Peninsula. Height, about 3,500 feet.

Ophites (of'its). A Gnostic body, of very early origin, especially prominent in the 2d century, and existing as late as the 6th century. Its members were so called because they held that the serpent (Gr. ὄφις) by which Eve was tempted was the impersonation of divine wisdom, the great teacher and civilizer of the human race. Also called Nasænes.

Ophiuchus (of-i-ū'kus). [Gr. Ὠφιοῦχος, from ὄφις, a serpent, and ἔχειν, to hold.] An ancient northern constellation, representing a man holding a serpent; the Serpent-bearer. Also called Serpentarius. The Serpent is now treated as a separate constellation.

Opie (ō'pi), Mrs. (Amelia Alderson). Born at Norwich, England, Nov. 12, 1769; died there, Dec. 2, 1853. An English novelist, daughter of Dr. Alderson of Norwich, and wife of John Opie the painter. She published various novels, the first, "Father and Daughter," appearing in 1801. In 1825 she became a Quaker. After this appeared her "Illustrations of Lying," "Detraction Displayed," etc.

Opie, John. Born at St. Agnes, near Truro, May, 1761; died April 9, 1807. An English painter. In 1780 he went to London under the patronage of Dr. Wolcott (Peter Pindar), who announced him as "the Cornish wonder." In 1786 he exhibited his first historical picture, the "Assassination of James I.," and in 1787 the "Murder of Rizzio." His lectures at the Royal Academy were published in 1809.

Opimius (ō-pim'i-us), Lucius. Roman consul 121 B. C. He was put forward by the senate to oppose the reforms of Caius Gracchus, and was the leader of the optimates who killed Gracchus with 3,000 of his followers in 121. He was afterward exiled for accepting bribes from Jugurtha.

Opitz (ō'pits), Martin. Born at Bunzlau, Silesia, Dec. 23, 1597; died at Dantzic, Aug. 20, 1639. A German poet and writer. He attended the gymnasium of Bunzlau, Breslau, and Benthen where he wrote in Latin his first work, "Aristarchus," in praise of the German language as a poetical medium. In 1618 he went to the university at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder to study jurisprudence, whence the outbreak of the Thirty Years' War, he went to Holland. At Leyden he became acquainted with the philologist H. insius, whom he followed to Jutland, where he wrote the poems, published 13 years later, "Trostdelichte in Widerwertigkeiten des Krieges" ("Poems of Consolation in the Adversities of War"). In 1622 he was called to a position in the gymnasium at Weisenburg. He returned, however, in the following year to Silesia, where he went into the service of the Protestant duke of Liegnitz. In 1624 appeared his "Buch von der deutschen Poesetry" ("Book of the German Art of Poetry"), which became the principal authority on versification and style. In 1626 he went into the service of the Catholic Count Dohna at Breslau. In 1628 he was enabled by the emperor Ferdinand II. After the death of Count Dohna, in 1633, he went back to the Duke of Liegnitz, was subsequently with the Swedes, and ultimately was made secretary and historiographer to King Ladislaus IV. of Poland, at Dantzic, where he died of the plague. He was the founder of the first Silesian school of poets, so called. He wrote secular, religious, and didactic descriptive poems; to the last class belong "Zlatna" and "Esvivius." Some of his hymns are to be found in the church hymn-books. His "Hercynia" is a prose idyl in which verses are occasionally introduced. Among other translations he made a version of the text of the Italian opera "Daphne," which was produced at Torzon in 1627, and was, accordingly, the first German opera. By his advocacy of the Alexandrine verse and the precepts of his "Art of Poetry" he brought about a reform of German versification, in that the poets of the preceding centuries had simply counted the number of syllables, without reference to the quality of those upon which the metrical accent fell.

Opium War. A war between Great Britain and China, due to the attempt of the Chinese government to prevent the importation of opium. It began in 1840, and was ended by the treaty of Nanking (which see) in 1842.

O. P. Riots. The "old-price riots," which took place at Covent Garden Theatre, London, in 1809. The cost of the new theater then just built was so great that the proprietors raised the price of admission, and the public resolved to resist.

The house opened on the 18th of September, 1809, with "Macbeth" and the "Quaker." The audience was dense and furious. They sat with their backs to the stage, or stood on the seats, their hats on, to hiss and hoot the Kemble family especially; not a word of the performance was heard, for when the audience were not denouncing the Kembles, they were singing and shouting at the very tops of their then fresh voices. The upper gallery was so noisy that soldiers, of whom 500 were in the house, rushed in to capture the rioters, who let themselves down to the lower gallery, where they were hospitably received. The sight of the soldiers increased the general exasperation. [The excitement continued for weeks, and many of the rioters were arrested.] The acquittal of leading rioters gave a little spirit to some after displays; but it led to a settlement. Audiences continued the affray, dunn peas on the stage to bring down the dancers, and celebrated their own O. P. dance before leaving; but, at a banquet to celebrate the triumph of the cause in the acquittal of the leaders, Mr. Kemble himself appeared. Terms were there agreed upon; and on the sixty-seventh night a banner in the house, with "We are satisfied" inscribed on it, proclaimed that all was over. After such a fray the satisfaction was dearly bought. The 4s. rate of admission to the pit was diminished by 6d., but the half-price remained at 2s. The private boxes were decreased in number, but the new price of admission to the boxes was maintained. Thus, the managers, after all, had more of the victory than the people; but it was bought dearly.

Doran, English Stage, II. 362-366.

The capital of the department of Oran, a seaport situated on the Mediterranean in lat. 35° 44' N., long. 0° 42' W. It has important trade. The old Spanish town exists along with the modern town. It was a flourishing medieval town; was held by the Spaniards from 1509 to 1703, and from 1732 until after the earthquake of 1790; and was taken by the French in 1831. Population (1891), 73,839.

Orange (or'anj; F. pron. ō-roñzh'). A town in the department of Vaucluse, France, 13 miles north of Avignon; the ancient Arausio, noted for its Roman antiquities. The Roman triumphal arch here, well preserved and of fine masonry, is attributed to the reign of Marcus Aurelius. It has a large central arch between two smaller ones flanked by Corinthian columns, the two middle ones of which support a pediment. It is ornamented with reliefs among which naval trophies are conspicuous; and the deep vault of the central opening is beautifully coffered. The height is 72 feet, width 67, and thickness 26. The Roman theater is much ruined in its cavea, but possesses probably the finest surviving example of an ancient stage structure. The splendid unencemented wall at the back is 340 feet long, 118 high, and 13 thick, and still shows the pierced corbels which received the awning-poles. The stage has 3 doors, and was roofed. The theater could seat about 7,000. The Cimbric defeated the Romans here in 105 B. C. It was a flourishing Roman town. Later it was the capital of a principality which fell to the house of Nassau in 1530; was under the Nassau-Orange family until 1702; and was annexed to France in 1713. The title of Prince of Orange was retained in the house of Nassau. Population (1891), 9,859.

Orange (or'anj). A city in Essex County, New Jersey, 13 miles west of New York. It contains many residences of New-Yorkers. Population (1890), 18,844.

Orange. See Clove and Orange.

Orange, Prince of. See William "the Silent," Prince of Orange, and William III., King of England.

Orange, Principality of. A small principality now in the department of Vaucluse, France, containing Orange and neighboring places. It fell to the house of Nassau in 1530. See Orange.

Orange Free State, or Orange River Free State. A republic in southern Africa. Capital, Bloemfontein. It is bounded by the South African Republic (separated by the Vaal) on the north, Natal on the east, Basutoland on the southeast, Cape Colony (separated by the Orange River) on the south, and Griqualand West on the west. The surface is undulating and hilly. The chief occupation is the raising of live stock; the leading products are wool, diamonds, ostrich-feathers, and hides. The government is vested in a president and a legislative assembly called the Volksraad. The inhabitants are natives (129,787 in 1890), and whites of European (especially Dutch) descent. The territory was settled in the first half of the 19th century by emigrants from Cape Colony; was snatched by Great Britain in 1848; and became independent in 1854. Area, 52,000 square miles. Population (1890), 207,503.

Orangemen (or'anj-men). 1. Irish Protestants. The name was given about the end of the 17th century by Roman Catholics to the Protestants of Ireland, on account of their support of the cause of William III. of England, prince of Orange.

2. A secret politico-religious society, instituted in Ireland in 1795. It was organized for the purpose of upholding the Protestant religion and ascendancy, and of opposing Romanism and the Roman Catholic influence in the government of the country. Orangemen are especially prominent in Ulster, Ireland, but local branches called lodges are found all over the British empire, as well as in many parts of the United States.

Orange River, or Kai Gariep (kī gā-rēp'). The chief river in southern Africa. It rises in Basutoland near the border of Natal, and flows generally westward, separating Cape Colony from the Orange Free State, British Bechuanaland, and German Southwest Africa. Its chief tributary is the Vaal. Length, about 1,200 miles. It is "not much better than a huge torrent."

Oranienbaum (ō-rā'nē-en-boum'). [G., 'orange-tree.'] A town in the province of St. Petersburg, Russia, situated on the Gulf of Finland 25 miles west of St. Petersburg. It is noted for its imperial palace. Population, 3,350.

Orarian (ō-rā'rī-an). See Eskimavian.

Orators, The. A play by Samuel Foote, performed in 1762. It satirizes a Dublin printer named George Faulkner.

It is a whimsical truth that George Faulkner actually printed, published, and sold "The Orators."

W. Conke, Memoirs of Foote, I, 197.

Oratory of St. Philip Neri. A Roman Catholic religious order, founded at Florence by Filippo Neri in 1575; so named from a chapel he built for it and called an oratory. It is composed of simple priests under no vows. Its chief seat is Italy, but congregations were founded in England in 1847 and 1849 under the leadership of former members of the Anglican Church.

Orbe (orb or or'be). A town in the canton of Vaud, Switzerland, situated on the Orbe 15 miles northwest of Lausanne. It was the ancient capital of Little Burgundy. Population (1888), 3,855.

Orbe. A small river in the department of Jura, France, and canton of Vaud, Switzerland, flowing into the Lake of Neuchâtel. It is the upper course of the Thièble (or Zihl).

Orbegoso (ōr-bā-gō'sō), Luis José. Born near Huamachuco, Aug. 25, 1795; died at Truxillo, 1847. A Peruvian general and politician. He was elected president by the constitutional assembly, Dec. 20, 1833; but Gamarra, Salaverry, and others declared against him; and in June, 1835, he accepted the intervention of Santa Cruz, president of Bolivia. Santa Cruz established the Peru-Bolivian Confederation in 1836, and Orbegoso was nominated president of North Peru, with the rank of grand marshal. In Aug., 1838, he was defeated by Gamarra and the Chileans, and went into exile for some years. Also written Orbegozo.

Orbetello (or-bā-tel'lo). A small town in the province of Grosseto, Italy, situated near the Mediterranean. 75 miles northwest of Rome.

Orbigny (or-bēn-yē'), Alcide Dessalines d'. Born at Couéron, Loire-Inférieure, Sept. 6, 1802; died near St. Denis, June 30, 1857. A French naturalist. From 1826 to 1833 he traveled in southern Brazil, the Platine States, Bolivia, and Peru. The results of his journey were published at government expense as "Voyage dans l'Amérique Méridionale" (9 vols. 1834-47; including narrative, 3 vols.; "L'Homme Américain," ethnological, 2 vols.; and the remainder on zoology, etc.). Among his other writings are "Paléontologie française" (14 vols. 1840-54; unfinished) and several works on Foraminifera. He contributed to Ramon de la Sagra's "History of Cuba" the volumes on birds, Mollusca, and Foraminifera.

Orbigny, Charles Dessalines d'. Born at Couéron, Loire-Inférieure, France, Dec. 2, 1806; died Feb. 15, 1876. A French geologist, brother of A. D. d'Orbigny.

Orc (ōrk), The. 1. A deformed giant who eats men but not women, in Boiardo's and Ariosto's "Orlando." He has two projecting bones for eyes. Mandricardo delivers Lucia from him. 2. A sea-monster in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," killed by Orlando when about to devour Olympia.

Orcades (ōr'ka-dēz). The ancient name of the Orkney Islands.

Orcagna (or-kān'yā) (properly di Cione, Andrea, called Arcagnolo (of which name Orcagna is a corruption). Born at Florence about 1329; died about 1368. A Florentine painter, sculptor, and architect. He studied the goldsmith's craft under his father, and painted with his brother Bernardo. In the practice of this art he appears to have been chiefly occupied during the early part of his life. After painting with his brother the life of the Madonna, and the two great frescos of Heaven and Hell in Santa Maria Novella, the frescos of the Cresci chapel, and the façade of San Apollinare, he painted the picture of the Coronation of the Virgin (now in the National Gallery). By these works he gained a great reputation. The frescos of the Triumph of Death and the Last Judgment in the Campo Santo at Pisa, by painters of the Tuscan school, have been attributed to him. (See Campo Santo.) About 1348 he transformed the old granary of Arnolfo del Cambio (Florence) into the Church of Or San Michele.

Orchard of Ireland. A name given to County Armagh, Ireland.

Orchardson (ōr'chārd-son), William Quiller. Born at Edinburgh, 1835. A British figure-painter. He removed to London in 1863. He has painted "The Challenge" (1865), "Casus Belli" (1870), "The Bill of Sale" (1876), "On Board H. M. S. Bellerophon" (July 23, 1875) (1880; bought by the Chantry bequest), "The Salon of Madame Récamier" (1885), etc.

Orchha. See Tehri.

Orchies (or-shē'). A town in the department of Nord, France, 14 miles southeast of Lille. Population (1891), commune, 3,918.

Orchomenus (ōr-kom'e-nus). [Gr. Ὀρχομενός.] In ancient geography, the name of several cities in Greece. (a) A city in Bœotia, situated on the Cephissus and on Lake Copais, 55 miles northwest of Athens. It was the capital of the ancient Minyæ. Here, in 85 B. C., Sulla defeated Archelaus, the general of Mithridates, king of Pontus. The site contains important remains of antiquity. The treasury of Minyas, so called, is a very ancient tomb of the Mycenaean beehive type. The plan is circular, 45 feet in diameter, covered in by a pseudo-dome formed by corbeling in the stones of the wall. A side chamber, rock-hewn, had its sides and ceiling incrustated with slabs carved with beautiful arabesques. The "treasury" is approached by a dromos or passage 16 feet wide. (b) A city in Arcadia, 33 miles west-southwest of Corinth. It was one of the leading Arcadian cities.

Orcus (ōr'kus). A Latin name for Hades.

Ord (ōrd), Edward Otho Cresap. Born in Maryland, Oct., 1818; died at Havana, July 22, 1883. An American general. He graduated at West Point in 1839, served against the Seminole Indians 1839-42, and was appointed brigadier-general of United States volunteers at the beginning of the Civil War. He gained the victory of Dranesville in Dec., 1861, and served before Richmond and Petersburg in 1864-65. He retired with the brevet rank of major-general in 1880.

Ordaz (ōr-dāth'), or Ordás (ōr-dās'), Diego de. Born about 1480; died at sea, 1533. A Spanish captain. It appears that he was with Ojeda at Darien, 1509-10; subsequently he served with Velasquez in Cuba, and with Cortés in the conquest of Mexico, 1519-21. Having obtained a grant of the country now embraced in Guiana and eastern Venezuela, he explored the Orinoco to the mouth of the Meta, 1531-32. Martínez, one of his officers, afterward asserted that he had seen on this expedition the golden city of Manoa, thus probably starting the myth of El Dorado. Ordaz, on his return to the coast, was arrested on false charges, and sent to Santo Domingo; he was freed by the audience, and died while on his way to Spain.

Ordericus Vitalis (ōr-dē-rī'kus vi-tā'lis), or Orderic (ōr'dē-rik). Born at Ateham, near Shrewsbury, England, 1075; died about 1143. An English historian and Benedictine monk. He wrote an "Ecclesiastical History," especially relating to Normandy and England in the 11th and 12th centuries (ed. by Le Prévost 1838-55).

Orders. Institutions, partly imitated from the medieval and crusading orders of military monks, but generally founded by a sovereign, a national legislature, or a prince of high rank, for the purpose of rewarding meritorious service by the conferring of a dignity: a number of the more prominent of these orders are described below. Most honorary orders consist of several classes, known as knights companions, officers, commanders, grand officers, and grand commanders, otherwise called grand cross or grand cordon. Many orders have fewer classes, a few having only one. It is customary to divide honorary orders into three ranks: (a) Those which admit only nobles of the highest rank, and among foreigners only sovereign princes or members of reigning families. Of this character are the Golden Fleece (Austria and Spain), the Elephant (Denmark), and the Garter (Great Britain); it is usual to regard these three as the existing orders of highest dignity. (b) Those orders which are conferred upon members of noble families only, and sometimes because of the mere fact of noble birth, without special services. (c) The orders of merit, which are supposed to be conferred for services only; of these the Legion of Honor is the best-known type. The various orders have their appropriate insignia, consisting usually of a collar of design peculiar to the order, a star, cross, jewel, badge, ribbon, or the like. It is common to speak of an order by its name alone, as the Garter, the Bath.—Guelfic Order, a Hanoverian order of knighthood, founded in 1815 by George IV. (then prince regent), and entitled the Royal Hanoverian Guelfic Order. It includes grand crosses, commanders, and knights, both civil and military.—Military Order of Savoy, an order founded by King Victor Emmanuel I. of Sardinia in 1815, adopted by the kingdom of Italy, and still in existence. The badge is a cross of gold in red enamel, voided, and surmounted by a royal crown. The ribbon is blue.—Order for Merit, a Prussian order composed of two classes, military and civil. The first class was founded by Frederick the Great in 1740 (compare Order of Generosity). The badge is a blue enameled cross adorned with the letter F, the words "pour le mérite," and golden eagles. Since 1810 it has been given exclusively for distinction on the field. The second class (or second order) was founded by Frederick William IV. in 1842 for distinction in science and art.—Order of Alcantara, a Spanish military order said to be a revival of a very ancient order of St. Julian, and to have received its name from the city of Alcantara, given by Alfonso IX. of Castile in 1213 to the Knights of Calatrava, and transferred by the latter.—Order of Alexander Nevski, a Russian order founded in 1722 by Peter the Great, but first conferred by the empress Catharine I. in 1725. The ordinary badge is a cross patté, the center being a circle of white enamel showing St. Alexander on horseback, the arms of red enamel with a double-headed eagle between every two arms, and the whole surmounted by an imperial crown. This is worn hanging to a broad red ribbon en sautoire.—Order of Calatrava, a Spanish military order founded in the middle of the 12th century, and taking its name from the fortress of Calatrava, which had been captured from the Moors in 1147, and was confided to the new order. It is still in existence. The badge is a cross fleury enameled red, attached to a red ribbon.—Order of Charles III., a Spanish order founded by Charles III. in 1771.—Order of Charles XIII., a Swedish order founded by the sovereign of that name in 1811, for Freemasons of the higher degrees.—Order of Christ, a Portuguese order founded by King Dionysius and confirmed about 1318. It contains three degrees, of which the highest is limited to six persons. The present badge is a cross of eight points encircled by an oak wreath, and having between the arms four ovals in black enamel, each bearing five golden billets, symbolical of the five wounds of Christ. The ribbon is dark red.—Order of Civil Merit, the name of several orders, the most prominent of which is that of Prussia. See Order for Merit.—Order of Fidelity. (a) An order of the duchy of Baden, founded by the margrave Charles William in 1715. It is still in existence, and consists of two classes only, that of grand cross and that of commander. The badge is a cross of eight points in red enamel, having between each two arms the cipher CC; the same cipher occupies the middle of the cross, with the motto "Fidelitas." The ribbon is orange-colored and edged with blue. (b) An order of Portugal, founded by John VI. in 1823 for the supporters of the monarchy during the insurrectionary movements in that country.—Order of Generosity, a Prussian order of distinction founded in 1665, but not organized till 1685, and superseded in 1740 by the Order for Merit.—Order of Glory (Nishan Iftikar), an order of the Ottoman empire, instituted by Mahmoud II. in 1831.—Order of Isabella the Catholic, known as the Royal American Order, and instituted in 1815 to reward loyalty among the American colonists and dependents of Spain. The order still exists. The badge is a cross patté indented, the center filled with a medallion, the arms enameled red, and with gold rays between the arms.—Order of Jesus, or Jesus Christ, etc., the name of several orders of more or less religious character. In Spain, Sweden, etc.—Order of Leopold, an Austrian order founded by Francis I., emperor of Austria, in memory of the emperor Leopold II. It dates from 1808, and is still in existence.—Order of Louisa, a Prussian order founded by Frederick William III. in 1814, for women only.—Order of Maria Louisa, a Spanish order for women, founded in 1792, and still in existence.—Order of Maria Theresa, an Austrian order founded by the empress of that name in 1757, but modified by the emperor Joseph II.—Order of Maximilian, an order for the encouragement of art and science, founded in 1853 by Maximilian II. of Bavaria.—Order of Medjidi. See Medjidi.—Order of Military Merit. (a) An order instituted in 1759 by Louis XV. of France for Protestant officers, as the Order of St. Louis was limited to Catholics. Its organization was similar to that of the latter order. In 1814 it was reorganized for officers of the army and navy. It has not been conferred since 1830. The badge is somewhat similar to that of St. Louis, and the ribbon is of the same color. (b) An order founded by Duke Charles Eugene of Wurtemberg in 1759.—Order of Odd-Fellows, The Independent. See Odd-Fellows.—Order of Our Lady of Montesa, a Spanish order founded in the 14th century by the King of Aragon, afterward attached to the crown of Spain.—Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel, an order founded by Henry IV. of France on the occasion of his embracing Catholicism, and in a measure replacing the Order of St. Lazarus.—Order of St. Andrew, a Russian order founded by Peter the Great in 1698. The badge is the double eagle of Russia in black enamel, upon the breast of which is the crucifix of St. Andrew, with saltier-shaped cross, the whole surmounted by an imperial crown. The ribbon is blue; but on state occasions this badge is worn pendent to a collar composed of similar crowned eagles, of ovals bearing saltiers, and of shields with flags and crowns.—Order of St. Andrew in Scotland. Same as Order of the Thistle.—Order of St. Benedict of Aviz, a Portuguese order said to date from the 12th century. The badge is a cross fleury of green enamel, having a gold fleur-de-lis in the angle between every two arms of the cross, and hangs from a green ribbon worn around the neck.—Order of St. Gall. Same as Order of the Bear.—Order of St. George. (a) A Bavarian order founded, or as is asserted, restored by the elector Charles Albert in 1729. It is still in existence, and is divided into three classes. (b) A Russian order founded in 1769 by the empress Catharine II. This is conferred only upon a commanding general who has defeated an army of fifty thousand men, or captured the enemy's capital, or brought about an honorable peace. There is now no person living who has gained this distinction regularly, though it has been given to a foreign sovereign.—Order of St. James of the Sword (also called St. James of Compostela), a Spanish order of great antiquity, asserted to have been approved by the Pope in 1175, and still existing. In the middle ages this order had great military power, and administered a large income. The badge is a cross in red enamel, affecting the form of a sword, and bearing a scallop-shell at the junction of the arms. The ribbon is red.—Order of St. Lazarus, an order which had its origin in the Holy Land, and was afterward transplanted into France, where it retained independent existence until, under Henry IV., it was in a measure replaced by the Order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel. It disappeared during the Revolution.—Order of St. Louis, a French order founded by Louis XIV. in 1693 for military service, and confirmed by Louis XV. in 1719. After the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814 this order was reinstated. No knights have been created since 1830. The badge is a cross of eight points, having in the central medallion a figure of Louis XIV., robed and crowned, and holding in his hands wreaths of honor; there is a gold fleur-de-lis between every two arms. The ribbon is flame-colored.—Order of St. Michael, a French order instituted by Louis XI. in 1469, and modified by Henry III. and Louis XIV. Since 1830 it has not been conferred. The badge is a cross of eight points with fleurs-de-lis between the arms, and in the central medallion a figure of the archangel Michael trampling on the dragon. The ribbon is black.—Order of St. Michael and St. George, a British order instituted in 1818, originally for natives of the Ionian and Maltese islands and for other British subjects in the Mediterranean. It has since been greatly extended.—Order of St. Patrick, an order of knighthood instituted by George III. of England in 1783. It consists of the sovereign, the lord lieutenant of Ireland, and twenty-two knights.—Order of SS. Cosmo and Damian, a religious order in Palestine in the middle ages, especially charged with the care of pilgrims.—Order of St. Stanislaus, a Polish order dating from 1765, and adopted by the czars of Russia.—Order of the Annunciation. (a) The highest order of knighthood (Ordine supremo dell' Annunziata) of the ducal house of Savoy, now the royal house of Italy, dating under its present name from 1518, when it superseded the Order of the Collar, said to have been founded by Count Amadeus VI. of Savoy in 1362, but probably older. The medal of the order bears a representation of the annunciation; its collar is decorated with alternate golden knots and enameled roses, the latter bearing the letters F E R T, making the Latin word fert ("he bears"), an ancient motto of the house of Savoy, but variously otherwise interpreted. The king is the grand master of the order. (b) An order of nuns, founded about 1560 at Bourges, France, by Queen Jeanne of Valois after her divorce from Louis XII. (c) An order of nuns, founded about 1604 at Genoa, Italy, by Maria Vittoria Fornari.—Order of the Bath, an order supposed to have been instituted at the coronation of Henry IV. of England in 1399. It received this name from the fact that the candidates for the honor were put into a bath the preceding evening to denote a purification or absolution from all former stain, and that they were now to begin a new life. The present Order of the Bath, however, was instituted by George I. in 1725, as a military order, consisting, exclusive of the sovereign, of a grand master and thirty-six companions. In 1815 the order was greatly extended, and in 1847 it was opened to civilians. It is now composed of three classes, viz.: military and civil knights grand crosses, G. C. B.; knights commanders, K. C. B.; and knights companions, C. B. The badge is a golden Maltese cross of eight points, with the lion of England in the four principal angles, and having in a circle in the center the rose, thistle, and shamrock (representing respectively England, Scotland, and Ireland) between three imperial crowns; motto, "Tria juncta in uno."

Stars are also worn by the first two classes. That of the knights grand crosses is of silver, with eight points of rays wavy, on which is a gold cross bearing three crowns, encircled by a ribbon displaying the motto of the order, while beneath the scroll is inscribed Ich dien ("I serve"), the motto of the Prince of Wales. The star of the knights commanders differs chiefly in lacking the wavy rays.—Order of the Bear, an order of knights instituted by the emperor Frederick II. and having its center at the abbey of St. Gall, in Switzerland. It ceased to exist when St. Gall became independent of the house of Austria.—Order of the Black Eagle, a Prussian order founded by Frederick I. in 1701. The number of knights is limited to 30, exclusive of the princes of the blood royal, and all must be of unquestioned nobility. The badge is a cross of eight points, having in the center a circle with the monogram F R (for Frederick Rex); the four arms are enameled red, with the eagle of Prussia in black enamel between each two arms. The ribbon is orange, but on occasions of ceremony the badge is worn pendent to a collar consisting alternately of black eagles holding thunderbolts and medallions bearing the same monogram as the badge and also the motto "Suum cuique."—Order of the Burgundian Cross, an order founded by the emperor Charles V., which did not survive.—Order of the Chrysanthemum, an order founded by the Mikado of Japan in 1876.—Order of the Conception, an order founded in the 17th century by some of the nobles of the Holy Roman Empire, and common to Germany and Italy.—Order of the Cordon Jaune, a French order for Protestant and Roman Catholic knights, founded in the 16th century by the Duke of Nevers for the protection of widows and orphans. It is now extinct.—Order of the Crescent, a Turkish order instituted in 1709, and awarded only for distinguished bravery in the naval or military service. It was abolished in 1851. An order of the crescent was founded by Charles of Anjou in Sicily in 1268, but had a short existence. René the Good, of Anjou, count of Provence and titular king of Naples, founded another short-lived order of the crescent in the 15th century.—Order of the Crown, the title of several honorary orders founded by sovereigns in the 19th century, each including as part of its name that of the country to which it belongs. (a) The Order of the Crown of Bavaria, founded by King Maximilian I. Joseph in 1808. It is granted to persons who have attained distinction in the civil service of the state. (b) The Imperial Order of the Crown of India, founded in 1878 for women, at the time of the assumption by Queen Victoria of the title Empress of India. It includes a number of Indian women of the highest rank. (c) The Order of the Crown of Italy, founded by King Victor Emmanuel in 1868. (d) The Order of the Crown of Prussia, founded by King William I. on his coronation in 1861. (e) The Order of the Crown of Rumania, founded in 1878 by King Charles on assuming the royal title in 1881. (f) The Order of the Crown of Saxony, founded by King Frederick Augustus in 1807, soon after his assumption of the kingly title. It is of but one class, and limited to persons of high rank. (g) The Order of the Crown of Siam, founded in 1869. (h) The Order of the Crown of Wurttemberg, founded by King William I. in 1818.—Order of the Danebrog, the second in importance of the Danish orders of knighthood, originally instituted in 1219, revived in 1671, regulated by royal statutes in 1693 and 1808, and several times modified since. It now consists of four classes, besides a fifth class wearing the silver cross of the order without being regular members of it, the silver cross being awarded for some meritorious act or distinguished service. The order may be bestowed on foreigners.—Order of the Fan, a Swedish order founded in 1744, and now extinct.—Order of the Fish, a decoration founded by the Mogul emperors in India, and conferred upon certain English statesmen in the early part of the 19th century. The insignia are of the nature of standards borne before the person upon whom the order is conferred.—Order of the Garter, the highest order of knighthood in Great Britain, consisting of the sovereign, the Prince of Wales, and 25 knights companions, and open, in addition, to such English princes and foreign sovereigns as may be chosen, and sometimes to extra companions chosen for special reasons, so that the whole order usually numbers about 50. Formerly the knights companions were elected by the body itself, but since the reign of George III. appointments have been made by the sovereign. The order, at first (and still sometimes) called the Order of St. George, was instituted by Edward III. some time between 1344 and 1350, the uncertainty arising from the early loss of all its original records. Its purpose has been supposed to have been at first only temporary. According to the common legend, probably fictitious, King Edward III. picked up a garter dropped by the Countess of Salisbury at a ball, and placed it on his own knee with the words to his courtiers, in response to the notice taken of the incident, "Honi soit qui mal y pense" ("Shamed be he who thinks evil of it"). To this incident the foundation, the name, and the motto of the order are usually ascribed. The insignia of the order are the garter, a blue ribbon of velvet edged with gold and having a gold buckle, worn on the left leg; the badge, called the George or great George, a figure of St. George killing the dragon, pendent from the collar of gold, which has 26 pieces, each representing a coiled garter; the lesser George, worn on a broad blue ribbon over the left shoulder; and the star of 8 points, of silver, having in the middle the cross of St. George encircled by the garter. The vesture consists of a mantle of blue velvet lined with white taffeta, a hood and surcoat of crimson velvet, and a hat of black velvet with a plume of white ostrich-feathers having in the center a tuft of black heron-feathers. The sovereign, when a woman, wears the ribbon on the left arm.—Order of the Golden Fleece, an order founded by Philip the Good, duke of Burgundy, in 1430, on the occasion of his marriage with the infanta Isabella of Portugal. The office of grand master passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1477 with the acquisition of the Burgundian dominions, which included the Netherlands. After the time of the emperor Charles V. (died 1558) this office was exercised by the Spanish kings; but after the cession of the Spanish Netherlands to Austria, the latter power in 1713-14 claimed the office. The dispute remains undecided, and the order therefore exists independently in Austria and in Spain. The badge of the order is a golden ram pendent by a ring which passes round its middle. This hangs from a jewel of elaborate design, with enameling of several colors, various suggestive devices, and the motto "Pretium laborum non vile."—Order of the Griffin, an order of the grand duchy of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, founded in 1884.—Order of the Holy Ghost. (a) (Often called by the French name Saint Esprit.) The leading order of the later French monarchy, founded by King Henry III. of France in 1578, replacing the Order of St. Michael. The king was the grand master, and there were 109 members, not including foreigners. The members were required to adhere to the Roman Catholic Church and to be of a high grade of nobility. The decoration was a gold cross attached to a blue ribbon, and the emblems were a dove and an image of St. Michael. The order has been in abeyance since the revolution of 1830. (b) An order founded at Montpellier, France, about the end of the 12th century, and united to the Order of St. Lazarus by Pope Clement XIII. (c) A Neapolitan order: same as Order of the Knot.—Order of the Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem. See Hospitalers.—Order of the Illuminati, a celebrated secret society founded by Professor Adam Weishaupt at Ingolstadt in Bavaria in 1776; originally called the Society of the Perfectibilists. It was deistic and republican in principle; aimed at general enlightenment and emancipation from superstition and tyranny; had an elaborate organization; was to some extent associated with freemasonry; and spread widely through Europe, though the Illuminati were never very numerous. The order excited much antagonism, and was suppressed in Bavaria in 1785, but lingered for some time elsewhere.—Order of the Indian Empire, an order instituted in 1878 for British subjects in India, to commemorate the assumption by Queen Victoria of the title of Empress of India, and open to natives as well as to persons of European extraction.—Order of the Iron Cross, a Prussian order founded in 1813 for military services in the war against Napoleon. In 1870 the order was reorganized. It consists of the great cross (conferred only on a few princes and generals), and two classes comprising several thousand Germans. The original badge was a cross pattée of black iron with a silver rim, upon which were the initials F. W. (Frederick William) and the date 1813 or 1815. The modern badge is a modification of this. The ribbon is black with a white border.—Order of the Iron Crown, an order founded by Napoleon I. as King of Italy, and adopted by Francis I. of Austria after the fall of Napoleon. It consists of three classes. The badge is the double eagle of Austria resting upon a ring (which represents the iron crown of Monza), and surmounted by an imperial crown; this is attached to an orange ribbon edged with blue.—Order of the Knights of Malta. Same as Order of the Hospitalers of St. John of Jerusalem.—Order of the Knot, a military order of short duration, founded at Naples in the 14th century.—Order of the Legion of Honor, in France, an order of distinction and reward for civil and military services, instituted in May, 1802, during the consulate, by Napoleon Bonaparte, but since modified from time to time in important particulars. Under the first empire the distinction conferred invested the person decorated with the rank of legionary, officer, commander, grand officer, or grand cross. The order holds considerable property, the proceeds of which are paid out in pensions, principally to wounded and disabled members.—Order of the Lion, the name of several orders in Germany, etc.; especially, an order founded in 1515 by William I., first king of the Netherlands, and continued by the later kings. It is an order for civil merit. The badge is a star of eight points, having in the central medallion a rampant lion and crown, and a golden W between each two arms.—Order of the Martyrs. Same as Order of SS. Cosmo and Damian.—Order of the Palm, a German society founded at Weimar in 1617 for the preservation and culture of the German language. It disappeared after 1680. Also called Fruit-Bringing Society.—Order of the Red Eagle (formerly Order of the Red Eagle of Bayreuth; also called Order of Sincerity), an order founded by the Margrave of Bayreuth in 1705, and in 1792 adopted by Frederick William II. of Prussia on succeeding to the principality. The present insignia of the order are quite different from those of the original order. The badge is an eight-pointed cross having in the center a medallion with a red eagle bearing the arms of the Hohenzollern family. The arms of the cross are of white enamel, with an eagle of red enamel between each two arms. The ribbon is striped orange-color and white.—Order of the Saint Esprit. See Order of the Holy Ghost.—Order of the Star of India (in the full style, The Most Exalted Order of the Star of India), an order for the British possessions in India, founded in 1861. The motto is, "Heaven's light our guide." The ribbon is light-blue with white stripes near the edge.—Order of the Thistle (in full, The Most Ancient and Most Noble Order of the Thistle), a very old Scottish order which has been renewed and remodeled, and is still in existence. The devices of the order are St. Andrew's cross, or saltier, and a thistle-flower with leaves; these enter into the different badges, the collar, star, etc. The motto is "Nemo me impune lacessit." The ribbon is green.—Order of the White Eagle, an order founded at the beginning of the 18th century by Augustus II. of Poland and Saxony, or, as is alleged, revived by him. It has been adopted by the Czar of Russia, and is composed of one class only. The badge is a cross of eight points, bearing a white eagle in relief, and surmounted by an imperial crown. The ribbon is sky-blue, but on state occasions the badge is worn pendent to a collar of white eagles connected by plain gold links.—Order of the White Elephant. A Danish order alleged to be of great antiquity. Its foundation, however, is specifically ascribed to Christian I. (1462), and its reorganization to Christian V. (1693). It is limited to 30 knights besides the members of the royal family, and no person can be a knight who is not previously a member of the Order of the Danebrog. The collar of the order is composed alternately of elephants and embattled towers. The badge is an elephant bearing on his back a tower, and on his head a driver dressed like a Hindu. The ribbon to which the badge is attached on ordinary occasions is sky-blue.—Order of the White Falcon, an order founded by the Duke of Saxe-Weimar in 1732, and renewed in 1815. It is still in existence, and consists of three classes, numbering, exclusive of the family of the reigning grand duke, 12 grand crosses, 25 commanders, and 50 knights. The badge is an eight-pointed cross in red enamel, and borne upon the whole, in relief, a falcon in white enamel. On the reverse are the words "L'Ordre de la vigilance," and a trophy or other emblem, which differs for the civil and the military knight; also the motto "Vigilando ascendimus." The ribbon is dark red or ponceau. Also called Order of Vigilance.—Order of the Yel- low String. See Order of the Cordon Jaune.—Order of Vigilance. Same as Order of the White Falcon.—Teutonic Order, a military order founded at Acre in Palestine in 1199, and confirmed by the emperor and the Pope. Its chief objects were at first the care of the sick and wounded pilgrims and the defense of the Holy Land. See Prussia, Duchy of.

Orders in Council. Orders promulgated by the British sovereign with the advice of the privy council. Specifically, the orders of 1807, which prohibited neutral trade directly with France or the allies of France. All goods had to be landed in England, pay duties there, and be reexported under English regulations. These orders bore with especial severity on American commerce.

Ordinance of Nullification. See Nullification.
Ordinance of 1784. An act of the United States under the Confederation, passed April 23, 1784, for the temporary government of the Northwest Territory, which comprised tracts ceded to the United States by the several States.

Ordinance of 1787. An act of Congress, passed in 1787, which secured to the Northwest Territory freedom from slavery, religious freedom, education, etc., and provided for its future subdivision.

Ordinances, F. Ordonnances (or-do-nois'). Various legislative acts in French history. The most celebrated were the Ordinances of July, proclaimed by Charles X. in July, 1830. They took away the freedom of the press and made other arbitrary changes, and were the cause of the revolution of July and the overthrow of the Bourbon monarchy.

Ordinary (ór-di-ná-ri), The. A comedy by Cartwright, produced about 1643, printed in 1651: an imitation of the "Alchemist."

The worst of the crew, after the exposure of their villainies, resolve to take refuge in the congenial soil of New England, where no good works are allowed and faith alone is demanded. Lonsbury, Chaucer, III. 117.

Ore (ó-rá), Luis Geronimo de. Born at Guamanga, Peru, about 1545; died at Concepcion, Chile, 1628. A Franciscan prelate and author. He was professor of theology at Cuzco, commissary of his order in Florida, and bishop of Concepcion from 1620. His works include "Descripcion del Nuevo Orbe" (Lima, 1573), "Relacion de los mártires de Florida" (Madrid, 1635), a life of St. Francisco Solano, and devotional books in the Indian languages of Peru.

Orebro (é're-bró). 1. A laen of southern Sweden. Area, 3,521 square miles. Population (1893), 184,708.—2. The capital of the laen of Orebro, situated on the Svartå, near Lake Hjelm-mar, 98 miles west of Stockholm. It has been the seat of various diets: that of 1540 declared the throne hereditary, and that of 1810 elected Bernadotte crown prince. Two treaties were negotiated here in 1812—one between England and Sweden, and the other between England and Russia. Population (1891), 14,674.

Oregon (or'e-gon). [Named from the Oregon River, now the Columbia. The name Oregon, supposed to be of Indian origin, occurs in Carver's "Travels" (1763) as the name of a "river of the West which falls into the Pacific Ocean at the Straits of Anian."] One of the Western States of the United States of America, extending from lat. 42° to 46° 15' N., and from long. 116° 40' to 124° 32' W. Capital, Salem; chief city, Portland. It is bounded by Washington (partly separated by the Columbia) on the north, Idaho (partly separated by the Snake River) on the east, Nevada and California on the south, and the Pacific Ocean on the west. It is traversed by the Coast Range, Cascade Mountains, and Blue Mountains; chief peaks in the State are Mount Hood and Jefferson. It belongs largely to the valley of the Columbia and its chief tributary the Willamette: there is an inland basin in the southeast. The chief agricultural products are wheat and other cereals. The leading exports are wheat, flour, salmon, wool, and fruit. It has 32 counties, sends 2 senators and 2 representatives to Congress, and has 4 electoral votes. The mouth of the Columbia was discovered by the American captain Gray in 1792. It was partly explored by Lewis and Clark 1804-05. A trading-post was founded at Astoria in 1811. The territory between lat. 42° and 54° 40' N. was long in dispute between Great Britain and the United States; the claims were settled by treaty in 1846. Oregon Territory was organized in 1848, and it was admitted to the Union in 1859. Area, 96,030 square miles. Population (1890), 313,767.

Oregon River. See Columbia.

Oregon Snakes. See Saidyuka.

O'Reilly (ó-rí-í), Alexander. Born at Dublin, 1722; died near Chinchilla, Murcia, Spain, March 23, 1794. An Irish soldier. He served successively in the Spanish, Austrian, and French armies; reentered the Spanish army 1761; commanded the forces which put down a revolt of the French in Louisiana (then lately ceded to Spain) 1769; and in 1774-75 commanded an unsuccessful expedition against the Algerians. He was created Count O'Reilly, but in 1786 was disgraced and deprived of all commands.

O'Reilly, Andrew. Born in Ireland in 1742; died at Vienna in 1832. An Irish soldier. He served in the Austrian army under Maria Theresa and Joseph II.; fought at Austerlitz; and surrendered Vienna May 12, 1809.

O'Reilly, John Boyle. Born at Dowth Castle, County Meath, Ireland, June 28, 1844; died at Hull, Mass., Aug. 10, 1890. An Irish-American journalist and poet. He was the son of William David O'Reilly, master of the Nettleville Institute at Dowth Castle. In 1863 he enlisted in the Tenth Hussars in Ireland for the purpose of spreading revolutionary sentiments among the soldiers. He was sentenced to death on the charge of high treason in 1866. The sentence was commuted to 20 years' penal servitude, and he was sent out to the penal colony in Australia, where he arrived in 1868. He escaped to the United States in 1869, and in 1870 secured employment on the Boston "Pilot," of which he became editor in chief in 1874. He published "Songs from the Southern Seas" (1874), "Songs, Legends, and Ballads" (1878), "The Statues in the Block" (1881), etc.

Orejones (ó-ré-nó-nás). [Sp., 'cared' or 'large-eared,'] A name given by the Spanish in America to various Indians who distended the lobes of the ears by means of metal or wooden disks. It included: (a) The Incas of the blood royal in Peru, who were distinguished from the common people by the use of large gold or silver ear-disks. (b) A tribe of Upper Paraguay, described by early authors, but about whom little that is definite is known. (c) Indians on the northern branches of the Upper Amazon, in Brazil, Colombia, and Ecuador: called Oreihudos by the Brazilians. There are apparently several hordes, perhaps of different stocks. Those on the river Içá are described as degraded but inoffensive savages who distend the ear-lobes with wooden disks until they touch the shoulders. (d) An extinct tribe of northern Coahuila, Mexico.

Orel (ó-rel'). 1. A government of central Russia. It is surrounded by the governments of Smolensk, Kaluga, Tula, Tamboff, Voronezh, Kursk, and Tchernigoff. The surface is undulating. It is an important agricultural government. Area, 18,042 square miles. Population (1893), 2,140,130.

2. The capital of the government of Orel, situated at the junction of the Orlik with the Oka, about lat. 52° 57' N., long. 36° 7' E. It is an important commercial and manufacturing center, and a leading market for grain. Population (1890), 79,135.

Orelhudos. See Orejones.

Orélie Antoine (ó-rá-lé' ón-twán') I. (de Tou-nens). A French adventurer who was proclaimed king of Araucania in 1861. He was arrested on Araucanian territory by the Chilean government in 1862. The arrest being pronounced illegal, he was detained as a lunatic, but was shortly permitted to go to France, where he published "Orélie-Antoine, roi d'Araucanie et Patagonie, et sa captivité en Chili" (1863). Having in the meantime returned to Araucania, he was deposed during a second absence in France by a certain Planchut, whom he had left in Araucania as his deputy.

O'Rell, Max. See Blouet, Paul.

Orellana (ó-rá-yá-ná), Francisco de. Born at Truxillo about 1490; died, probably in Venezuela, about 1546. A Spanish soldier, first explorer of the Amazon. He was intimate with the Pizarros in his youth; went to Peru about 1535; and settled Guayaquil in 1537. In 1540-41 he served with Gonzalo Pizarro's expedition to the Napo. (See Cinnamon, Land of.) Having been sent ahead with a brigantine and 50 soldiers to seek for provisions (probably in April, 1541), he arrived at the junction of the Napo and Marañon, and, unable or unwilling to return, continued on down the latter river. In the course of this voyage the Indians told him of a tribe of female warriors, or Amazons, and he claimed to have encountered them near the mouth of the Trombetas: from this story the river derived its present name. Orellana reached the mouth of the Amazon late in 1541, went on to Trinidad, and thence to Spain. He received a grant to conquer the country discovered by him, and made an unsuccessful expedition to it in 1544.

Orellana, River of. [From its discoverer, Francisco de Orellana.] A name frequently given, in early books and maps, to the Amazon River. It is still occasionally used.

Orelli (ó-rel'le), Johann Kaspar. Born at Zurich, Switzerland, Feb. 13, 1787; died Jan. 6, 1849. A Swiss classical philologist, noted for his editions of Horace, Cicero, and Tacitus.

Ore (ór) Mountains. See Erzgebirge.

Orenburg (ó-ren-börg). 1. A government in southeastern Russia, bordering on Asia. It is bounded by Siberia, the governments of Perm, Ufa, and Samara, Uralsk, and Turgai. The surface is partly mountainous (a continuation of the Urals) and partly steppe. Area, 73,816 square miles. Population (1890), 1,372,500.

2. The capital of the government of Orenburg, situated on the Ural about lat. 51° 46' N., long. 55° 10' E. It is an important trading center. Population (1891), 62,534.

Orense (ó-ren'sá). 1. A province in Galicia, Spain. It is bounded by Portugal on the south, and on the other sides by the provinces Pontevedra, Lugo, Leon, and Zamora. The surface is mountainous. Area, 2,739 square miles. Population (1887), 405,074.

2. The capital of the province of Orense, situated on the Minho in lat. 42° 18' N., long. 7° 50' W. The cathedral is of the 13th century, but retains many Romanesque features, as the very long transepts. The bridge over the Minho, built in 1230, has seven arches, four of them pointed, and rises in a steep grade from both ends to the middle. The grand central arch has a span of about 150 feet, and its crown is 135 feet above the river-bed. Population (1887), 14,168.

Oresteia (ó-res-té'yü). A trilogy by Æschylus, founded on the history of the family of Agamemnon. It comprises the "Agamemnon," "Choephoræ," and "Emmenides."

Orestes (ó-res'téz). [Gr. Ὀρέστης.] In Greek legend, the son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and brother of Electra. He slew Clytemnestra and Ægisthus, and was pursued by the Erinyes. He was a favorite subject of the Greek tragic poets. See Electra.

Orestes. A play of Euripides, exhibited in 409 B. C.

In the looseness and carelessness of the metre, in the crowding of incidents at the end of the play, in the low tone of its morality—they are all base, says the scholiast, except tylades, and yet even he advises a cold-blooded murder for revenge's sake—there is no play of Euripides so disagreeable. On the other hand, for dramatic effect, as the same scholiast observes, there is none more striking; but this applies only to the opening scenes.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 361.

Orestes. Killed 476 A. D. Regent of the Western Empire in the reign of his son Romulus Augustulus (475-476).

The army had revolted, and the commander-in-chief, an Illyrian named Orestes, had seized the reins of government. This Orestes had a strange history. About thirty years before the date of the events just mentioned, his native country—the northern part of what is now called Croatia—had been given up by the Romans to the Huns. Orestes, who was then quite a young man, finding himself one of Attila's subjects, offered his services to the Hunnish king, and seems to have acted as his secretary. In this capacity he was in the year 448 sent on a mission from Attila to the eastern emperor, Theodosius II., and we read of his being terribly indignant because he was not regarded as a person of equal consequence with his fellow-envoy, Edica the Scirian. By what curious chances it came about that the former secretary of Attila now found himself at the head of the Roman army, and master of the Roman state, history does not tell. Orestes did not choose to call himself emperor, thinking, perhaps, that it was safer for the wearer of the diadem and the real holder of power to be different persons. He contented himself with the title of Patrician, the same which had been borne by Rikimer and by Aëtius, and bestowed the imperial crown on his son, a boy of fourteen, who was named Romulus after his maternal grandfather. Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 126.

Orestes and Electra. 1. A group in marble, probably a late Greek original, in the Villa Ludovisi, Rome. A woman, already full-grown, rests her arm kindly on the shoulder of a handsome boy, who is speaking to her.

2. An interesting group of antique sculpture in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. Electra clad in the long tunic, stands with her arm about her brother's neck. This work belongs to the school of Pasiteles, of the early empire.

Oretani (or-e-tā'nī). In ancient geography, a people in southern Spain, living in the Sierra Morena and neighboring regions.

Oreus (ó-ré-us), or Histiaea (his-ti-é-ä). [Gr. Ὀρέβη, Ἱστιαία.] In ancient geography, a city on the northwestern coast of Eubœa, Greece, situated opposite Thessaly.

Histiaea, afterwards called Oreus, was the most important town of northern Eubœa, and gave name to a considerable tract which has been already mentioned as Histiaëotis. It lay about midway in the northern coast of the island, at the western extremity of a broad plain, and by the side of a small river called the Callas. Its remains are found in this position, and still bear the name of Oreos. We learn from Theopompus that when Pericles conquered Eubœa and expelled the Histiaians, while they sought a refuge in Macedonia, 2,000 Athenian citizens took their place, and colonized Oreus, which had before been a township of Histiaea. Rauhinson, Herod., IV. 277, note.

Orfeo (or-fá'ó). A dramatic pastoral by Poliziano, produced in 1483. It was the first pastoral written in the language of the country to which dramatic action was given.

Orfeo ed Euridice (or-fá'ó ed á-ó-ré'dé-che) Orpheus and Eurydice. An opera by Gluck, words by Calzabigi, produced at Vienna in 1762. In 1774 it was produced at Paris as "Orphée et Euridice," where it was very successful. The libretto was translated from the Italian by Moline. See Orpheus.

Orfila (or-fé-lá'). Matthien Joseph Bonaventura. Born at Mahon, Balearic Islands, April 24, 1787; died at Paris, March 12, 1833. A French physician and chemist, noted as a writer on toxicology and medical jurisprudence. Among his writings are "Toxicologie générale" (1815), "Traité de médecine légale" (1847), etc.

Orford (ór'fórd). A town in the county of Suffolk, England, situated near the North Sea 17 miles east-northeast of Ipswich. Population (1891), 7,345.

Orford, Earls of. See Russell and Walpole.

Organic Statute. A Russian edict of 1832, by which Poland lost its constitution.

Organ (ór'gán) Mountains, Pá. Serra dos Orgãos. A group of mountains of the Brazilian coast range, at the head of the Bay of Rio de Janeiro. They attain the height of 7,325 feet, and are remarkable for their strange forms. One peak, called the Dedo de Deus ('Finger of God'), appears from the bay like a finger pointing upward.

Organon (ór'gá-non). [Gr. ὄργανον, an instrument, organ.] The logical treatises of Aristotle. The name was originally applied to the logical theory of demonstration, and then by the Peripatetics to the whole of logic, especially to the topics of Aristotle or the rules for probable reasoning, as being only an instrument or aid to philosophy, and not meriting the higher place of a part of philosophy claimed for it by the Stoics and most of the Academics.

Orgetorix (ôr-jet'ô-riks). A Helvetian conspirator shortly before the time of Cæsar's war with the Helvetians in 58 B. C.

Orgon (or-gôn'). A credulous dupe in Molière's "Tartuffe." He has an imbecile infatuation for the hypocritical Tartuffe.

Oria (ô-rê-â). A town in the province of Lecce, Apulia, Italy, 20 miles southwest of Brindisi. Population (1881), 8,220.

Oriana (ô-ri-an'â). 1. The legendary mistress of Amadis de Gaul, daughter of Lisuarte, king of England. Queen Elizabeth is frequently called "the peerless Oriana" in the adulatory poems of her time.

2. The principal character in Fletcher's comedy "The Wild Goose Chase," and in Farquhar's comedy "The Inconstant," which is practically the same. She is betrothed to the evasive Mirabel (the "wild goose"), and finally brings him to reason and marries him.

3. A character in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "The Woman-hater": a teasing, tormenting, brilliant woman.—4. A ballad by Tennyson, published in 1830.

Oriana, The Triumphs of. A collection of madrigals in honor of Queen Elizabeth, compiled and published by Thomas Morley in 1601.

Oribe (ô-rê-bâ), Manuel. Born about 1802; died at Montevideo, Nov., 1857. An Uruguayan general and politician. He was minister of war under Rivera 1833-35, and succeeded him as president for four years, March 1, 1835. In 1836 Rivera, at the head of the Colorado party, revolted, and eventually (Oct., 1838) took Montevideo. Oribe then joined with Buenos Ayres, a scheme for uniting Uruguay with Montevideo at intervals; this period is known as the Nine Years' Siege ("Sitio de Nueve Años"). Eventually Brazil and Entre Rios interfered, and Oribe capitulated to Urquiza in Oct., 1851. He led a revolt in Sept., 1855.

Oriel (ô-ri-el) College. A college of Oxford University, founded by Adam de Brome and Edward II. in 1326 (see the extract). The existing buildings date in greater part from the early 17th century. Though the parts are incongruous, the whole is picturesque. On one side of the quadrangle there is a fine range of windows with medieval tracery.

Oriel College, the fifth in antiquity of the colleges that now remain at Oxford, dates its legal existence from the year 1326, although it actually took its origin two years earlier. It was in 1324 that Edward II. gave formal permission to his almoner, Adam de Brome, to acquire land for the purpose of founding a college which should be styled "the House of the Scholars of St. Mary at Oxford." In accordance with the terms of the royal licence, Adam de Brome bought of Roger Marshall, rector of Tackley, a building known as Tackley's Inn, situated on the south side of the High Street of Oxford, and there he seems to have established his scholars, one of them, set over the rest, being designated the Rector. He also bought for their benefit a house called La Perillos Hall, which stood on the eastern side of Durham College, in the northern suburb. Before long, however, he resolved to place his college under more powerful protection than his own, and with that object surrendered it into the hands of his royal master. Edward II. was, by a transparent fiction, made to appear the founder of an institution of which in point of fact he was merely the foster-father. On the 21st of January, 1326, he issued a formal charter of foundation and a code of statutes, both, no doubt, drawn up by his almoner, who caused himself to be appointed the official head of the College, with the title of Præpositus, or Provost.

Lyte, Oxford, p. 141.

Orient (ô-ri-ent). The. [From L. oriens, rising (se. of the sun).] The East; eastern countries; specifically, the regions to the east and southeast of the leading states of Europe: a vague term, including Asiatic Turkey, Persia, India, Egypt, etc.

Orién (or'i-jen), L. Origenes (ô-rij'e-nêz) (surnamed Adamantius). [Gr. Ὠριγένης Ἀδανάντιος.] Born probably at Alexandria, 185 or 186 A. D.; died at Tyre, probably 253. One of the Greek fathers of the church. He was educated at Alexandria, and was head of the celebrated catechetical school in that city from about 211 until 231 or 232, when for obscure reasons he was degraded by the synod from the condition of a presbyter to that of a layman. He afterward founded a school at Cæsarea. He was imprisoned in the Decian persecution in 250. He was an extremely prolific author, and wrote on a great variety of subjects pertaining to theology. Among his works are a valuable recension of the Old Testament, entitled "Hexapla," fragments of which have been preserved; and a defense of Christianity against the Epicurean philosopher Celsus.

Origenists (or'i-jen-ists). 1. The followers of Origen of Alexandria; those who held or professed to hold the doctrines held by or attributed to Origen.—2. The members of a sect mentioned by Epiphanius as followers of some unknown person named Origen. He attributes shameful vices to them, but supplies no further information concerning them.

Original Chronicle of Scotland, The. A rimed chronicle by Andrew of Wyntoun, finished between 1420 and 1424. It begins with the angels, follows with Adam and Eve, and continues down to the author's time.

Wyntoun says that he called his chronicle "original" because he designed to trace things from their origin; and he wrote it in nine books in honour of the nine orders of angels.

Morley, English Writers, VI. 50.

Origines (ô-rij'i-nêz). [L., 'origins.'] See the extract.

Cato composed also the first Roman historical work in Latin prose, his seven books of Origines, commenced in the later years of his life and continued nearly until his death. The work comprised also the other tribes of Italy, including Upper Italy, at the same time dealing with ethnography and all sides of social life to an extent which remained without imitation. In all the rest, the work was in the manner of the Annals, now brief, now extensive and even allowing space for the insertion of complete speeches by the author. Teuffel and Schoebe, Hist. of Roman Lit. (tr. by G. C. W. Warr), I. 174.

Origin of Species, The. A work by Darwin, developing his theory of evolution, published in 1859.

Orihuela (ô-rê-wâ'lâ). A town in the province of Alicante, Spain, situated on the Segura 13 miles northeast of Murcia. Population (1887), 24,364.

Orinda (ô-rin'dâ), The Matchless. See Philips, Katherine.

Orinoco (ô-ri-nô'kô). The northernmost of the three great rivers of South America. It rises in the Parima Mountains, flows northwest, then north and finally east through Venezuela, and empties by a delta opposite the island of Trinidad, about lat. 9°-10° N. The upper portion is in a forest region; the lower course is bordered by open llanos. Its branch the Cassiquiare connects it with the Rio Negro, and hence with the Amazon. The chief tributaries are the Guaviare, Meta, Apurê, Ventuari, Cauro, and Caroni. Its mouth was discovered by Columbus in 1498, and it was first navigated by Diego de Ordaz in 1531. Length, about 1,350 miles (including the Guaviare, about 1,600 miles); navigable about 900 miles, to the Orinoco "falls," or rapids of Atures, and above them for a long distance.

Orion (ô-ri'on). [Gr. Ὠρίων.] 1. In Greek mythology, a giant and hunter. There were various legends about him. He was blinded, with the aid of Dionysus, by Ceopion whose daughter he had ravished; but regained his sight by opening his eyes to the rays of the rising sun. He was slain by Artemis. After his death he was changed to a constellation.

2. A constellation situated in the southern hemisphere with respect to the ecliptic, but having the equinoctial crossing it nearly in the middle. This constellation is represented by the figure of a giant with a sword by his side. It contains seven stars which are very conspicuous to the naked eye; four of these form a quadrangle, and the other three are situated in the middle of it in a straight line, forming what is called the Belt or Girdle of Orion. They are also popularly called Jacob's Staff, Our Lady's Wand, the Yard-stand, etc. Orion also contains a remarkable nebula.

Oriskany (ô-ris'kâ-ni). A village in Oneida County, New York, 7 miles northwest of Utica. Here, Aug. 6, 1777, the Americans under Herkimer defeated the British and Indians. See Herkimer.

Orissa (ô-ris'sâ). A province in the southwestern part of the lieutenant-governorship of Bengal, British India, bordering on the Bay of Bengal. It was formerly a Hindu kingdom; later was under Mogul and Mahratta rule; and was acquired by the British in 1803. Area, 9,053 square miles. Population (1891), 3,162,490.

Orkney and Shetland (shet'land). A former county of Scotland, divided in 1889. See Orkney Islands and Shetland Islands.

Orkney (ôr'kni) Islands. [Cecl. Orkneyjar, Orcaes Islands (cy, pl. egjar, island), the first element being prob. confused with orku, ôrku, a seal.] A group of islands north of Scotland, from which they are separated by Pentland Firth: the ancient Orcaes. Chief town, Kirkwall. They form a distinct county, and are about 67 in number, 29 being inhabited. The principal island is Mainland; surface generally low (hilly in Hoy and parts of Mainland); chief occupations, agriculture and fisheries. The ancient inhabitants were Picts: they were Christianized by Irish missionaries. The islands were acquired by the Northerns in the 8th and 9th centuries, and ruled by jarls. In 1231 they passed to the Earls of Angus, etc., and in 1468 to the Scottish crown. Denmark renounced its claims of sovereignty in 1590. Area, 376 square miles. Population (1891), 30,453.

Orlando (ôr-lan'dô). 1. The Italian form of Roland (which see).—2. In Shakspeare's comedy "As you Like it," the younger brother of Oliver, and lover of Rosalind.

Orlando Furioso (or-lân'dô fô-rê-ô'sô). [It., 'Orlando Mad.'] A metrical romance by Ariosto, 40 cantos of which were published in 1515, to which he added 5 more before his death in 1533. Sir John Harrington's translation was published in 1591. It is a continuation of Boiardo's "Orlando Innamorato," but it begins at a point before the end of Boiardo's work. Orlando's madness is occasioned by the falseness of Angelica.

Orlando Furioso, The History of. A play by Robert Greene, produced probably about 1588-1589. It was revived in 1592, printed in 1594. Greene makes Orlando marry Angelica.

Orlando Innamorato (ên-nâ-mô-râ'tô). [Orlando Enamoured.] A metrical romance by Boiardo, on the love of Orlando or Roland for Angelica. The hero, however, is really Rogero. Boiardo left it unfinished in 1494, and Ariosto wrote his "Orlando Furioso" as its sequel. Boiardo's poem was remodeled in a lively style by Berni.

Orléanais (or-lâ-â-nâ'). An ancient government of France. Capital, Orléans. It was bounded by Ile-de-France on the north, Champagne and Burgundy on the east, Nivernais on the southeast, Berry on the south, and Touraine on the west. It comprised, besides Orléanais proper, Gâtinais, Beauce, and Sologne. It corresponded mainly to the departments of Loiret, Loir-et-Cher, Eure-et-Loir, and parts of Seine-et-Oise, Indre-et-Loire, Nièvre, Cher, and Sarthe.

Orleanists (ôr'lê-an-ists). In French politics, the adherents of the princes of the Orléans family. The family is descended from a younger brother of Louis XIV., and has furnished one sovereign, Louis Philippe (who reigned 1830-48).

Orléans (or-lâ-on'), Eng. Orleans (ôr'lê-anz).

[Formerly also Orleancee, ME. Orleans, Orleaus, Orlians, OF. Orleans, Orlians, LL. Aureliani, or Aurelianusis, Aurelian's (city).] The capital of the department of Loiret, France, situated on the Loire in lat. 47° 54' N., long. 1° 54' E.; the medieval Aureliani, and probably the ancient Genabum. It has important commerce in wool, wines, grain, timber, oil, etc., and manufactures of blankets, hosiery, worsted, vinegar, etc. The cathedral is a building of great size, rebuilt by Henry IV. (begun in 1601) in as close an approximation as possible to the architecture of the original Pointed cathedral destroyed by the Huguenots. The façade, with its 5 portals and 2 lofty towers, is of gingerbread work; but much of the chvet and apsidal chapels belongs to the earlier church, and is very fine. The five-aisled interior is 435 feet long, and the nave 100 high. Orléans was a town of the Carnutes. It was destroyed by Cæsar, but was rebuilt by Aurelian, occupying an important military position. It was unsuccessfully besieged by Attila in 451; was a leading town from the Merovingian times; and was the chief place of Orléanais. The famous siege of it commenced by the English Oct. 12, 1428, was raised in May, 1429, in consequence of the assaults of the relieving forces under Joan of Arc (see the extract). It was a Huguenot center about 1563. A victory of the Germans over the French, Oct. 11, 1870, was accompanied by the capture of the city. The French retook it in Nov.; but in the severe fighting of Dec. 2-4 they were worsted, and the Germans again occupied it. Population (1891), 63,705.

The Loire, flowing first northwards, then westwards, protects, by its broad sickle of waters, this portion of Gaul, and the Loire itself is commanded at its most northerly point by that city which, known in Cæsar's day as Genabum, had taken the name Aureliani from the great Emperor, the conqueror of Zenobia, and is now called Orléans. Three times has Aureliani played an eminent part in the history of Gaul. There broke out the great insurrection of A. D. 52 against the victorious Cæsar; there Attila's host, in A. D. 451, received their first repulse; and there in 1429, the maid of Domremy, by forcing the Duke of Bedford to raise the siege, wrested from the English Plantagenets their last chance of ruling in France.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, II. 132.

Orléans, Charles, Duc d'. Born May 26, 1391; died Jan. 4, 1465. A French poet, son of Louis, duc d'Orléans. He was taken prisoner by the English at Agincourt in 1415, and released in 1440. His poems were edited by d'Hericault in 1874.

The life of this poet . . . falls into three divisions. In the first, when after his father's death he held the position of a great feudal prince almost independent of royal control, it is not recorded that he produced any literary work. His long captivity in England was more fruitful, and during it he wrote both in French and in English. But the last five-and-twenty years of his life, when he lived quietly and kept court at Blois (bringing about him the literary men of the time from Foucquier to Villon, and engaging with them in poetical tournaments), were the most productive. His undoubted work is not large, but the pieces which compose it are among the best of their kind.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 105.

Orléans, Ferdinand Philippe Louis Charles Henri, Duc d'. Born at Palermo, Sept. 3, 1810; died near Paris, July 13, 1842. Eldest son of Louis Philippe, king of the French. He served in the campaigns in Algeria.

Ormskirk (ôrmz'kêrk). A town in Lancashire, England, 12 miles north-northeast of Liverpool. Population (1891), 6,298.

Ormulum (ôr'mû-lum). A series of metrical homilies on the New Testament, with paraphrases, composed by Orm or Ormin in the first part of the 13th century. He was an Augustinian canon, and it is assumed that he lived in Lincolnshire or Nottinghamshire, but there are arguments in favor of Ormskirk in Lancashire. Orm had a phonetic system of his own, distinguishing the short vowels by doubling the following consonant. The Ormulum was first edited from the MS. by Robert Meadova White in 1852.

The intention of his work corresponded to that of the Scripture Paraphrase of Caedmon, although it differed much in plan and execution. His work is called, from his own name, the Ormulum.

"This boc iss nemmed Ormulum Forthi that Orm itt wrohhte." But though the author there, for a purpose, calls himself Orm, he says elsewhere that he was named Ormin. There remains only a portion of the work, and it is in a single MS. which forms a folio volume in the Junian collection, now preserved in the Bodleian.

Morley, English Writers, III, 232.

Ormus (ôr'mus), or Hormuz (hôr'muz). An ancient and mediæval city situated on the southern coast of Persia at the entrance of the Persian Gulf. It was removed to a neighboring island in the Strait of Ormus about 1300, became an emporium of commerce and noted for its wealth; became dependent on Portugal in 1514; and in 1622 was taken by the Shah of Persia, assisted by the English. It is now in ruins. Milton celebrates "the wealth of Ormus and of Ind" ("Paradise Lost," ii, 2).

Orosius (ô-rô'si-us), Paulus. Born in Spain (probably at Tarragona); lived in the first part of the 5th century A. D. A Latin historian and theologian. He wrote an epitome of history directed against the pagans: "Historiarum libri vii adversus paganos" (translated into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great).

Paulus Orosius, a native of Tarragona in Spain, and a friend of Augustine, wrote his Seven Books of "Histories" about the year 417, while he was still a young man ('religiosus juvenis'), at the request of the Bishop of Hippo. They were to form a history of the world from the Deluge down to his own time (the last entry relates to the year 417), and the object of the book was to show that bloodshed, oppression, and misery had ever been the staple of human history, and that "Christian times" were unjustly blamed for the woes which the barbarians were then inflicting on the empire. . . . Vague, passionate, and declamatory, Orosius represents only the narrow prejudices of an orthodox provincial of the empire in his judgments concerning the men and the events of that mighty crisis.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I, 245.

Orotava (ô-rô-tâ'vâ). A town near the northern coast of Tenerife, Canary Islands. Population (1887), 8,876.

It is noted for its picturesque site, Etruscan necropolis, cathedral, well, private residences, and wine. The cathedral, founded 1290, is in plan a Latin cross with square chevet, 293 feet long, 107 wide, and 111½ high to the open-framed wooden roof. The interior is of basilican character, except for its narrow pointed clear-story windows. The building is extremely rich in works of art of all kinds. The splendid octagonal sculptured font and the frescoes by Fra Angelico and Luca Signorelli are especially noteworthy. The west front (1310) is the most beautiful and the purest design of its type in existence. It has three vertical divisions, separated by piers and pinnacles, and terminating in lofty gables filled with mosaics. Below there are three great canopied doors, and between the doors and the gables mosaics, an arcade, and a central rose-window inscribed in a richly decorated square. The piers between and at the sides of the portals are covered with admirable reliefs by Giovanni Pisano and Arnolfo, representing the Creation, the Patriarchs and Prophets, the Life of Christ, and the Last Judgment. The facade is 174 feet high and 131 wide. Population (1891), 7,304; commune, 15,931.

Osiris (ō-sī'ris). [L. Osiris, Gr. Ὀσίρις, also Ἦσις, from Egyptian Hesiri.] In Egyptian mythology, one of the chief gods, the principle of good, the creator, the foe of evil, the god of the Nile, in constant conflict with his brother or son Set (the Greek Typhon), the god of evil, of darkness, of the desert. Osiris is vanquished and slain, but revives, and is avenged by Horus and Thoth—evidently a personification of the phenomena of the rising and setting sun. He was the guardian of mankind in the state after death, and as such the nocturnal sun, and a type of the sufferings and triumphs of humanity. In one form (the Osiris of Mendes) he personified the male principle. In art he was portrayed as a mummy wearing the crown of Upper Egypt, usually flanked by ostrich-plumes.

People do not yet agree as to the original character of Osiris. Maspero tried to discover the development of this god, and maintains that Osiris was originally and essentially a god of the dead, the first man, son of the heaven and earth, and as such the god of the dead. He also says that the original home of Osiris was not at Abydos, but in the Delta; at Busiris and Mendes. However this may be, Osiris was to the Egyptians above all things a god of the dead, more especially in a beneficial way as Osnois. But he was identified, at an early date, with the sun; chapter seventeen of the Book of the Dead calls "Ra the soul of Osiris, and Osiris the soul of Ra."

La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 408.

Ostrogoths (os'trô-goths). The eastern branch of the Gothic race. While dwelling in southern Russia near the valley of the Don, they were attacked about A. D. 375 by the Huns, were subjugated, and with the Huns pushed the Visigoths to the borders of the Roman Empire. After the Visigothic victory at Adrianople in 378, many Ostrogoths settled in Pannonia. Many of them joined later the army of Attila, and after his death were employed by the Eastern emperors to defend the lower Danube. Theodoric became their king in 474, and in 489 led the nation over the Julian Alps, conquered Odoacer in 493 at Ravenna, and became king of Italy. Under his rule (see Theodoric) the country prospered. Belisarius tried to expel the Goths, and in 552 they were decisively defeated by the Byzantine general Narses. Italy was temporarily regained for the empire, and the Goths were absorbed in other peoples.

The real history of the Goths begins about the year 245, when they were living near the mouths of the Danube under the rule of Ostrogotha [Anstraguta], the first king of the Amaling stock. Ostrogotha was celebrated in tradition for his "patience"; but in what way he displayed that virtue we are not informed, for history tells only of his victories. Whether on account of his patience or his deeds in war, his fame was widely spread; for one of the oldest Anglo-Saxon poems mentions him as "Eastgota, the father of Unwcn." The name of this son is given by Jordanes as Hunnil, but probably the Anglo-Saxon form is the right one. Bradley, Story of the Goths, p. 24.

Othello (ô-thel'ô), the Moor of Venice, The Tragedy of. A tragedy by Shakspeare, acted in 1604, and printed in 1622 in a quarto and in 1623 in a folio edition. It was founded on one of Giraldi's novels in the "Hecatomithi" (iii. 3). Othello is a high-minded Moor in the military service of Venice. He is aroused to fury against his wife Desdemona by the insinuations and lies of Iago, and smothered her.

I have often told you that I do not think there is any jealousy, properly so called, in the character of Othello. There is no predisposition to suspicion, which I take to be an essential term in the definition of the word. Desdemona very truly told Emilia that he was not jealous, that is, of a jealous habit, and he says so as truly of himself. Iago's suggestions, you see, are quite new to him; they do not correspond with anything of a like nature previously in his mind. If Desdemona had, in fact, been guilty, no one would have thought of calling Othello's conduct that of a jealous man. He could not act otherwise than he did with the lights he had; whereas jealousy can never be strictly right. See how utterly unlike Othello is to Leonates in the "Winter's Tale," or even to Leonatus in "Cymbeline"! The jealousy of the first proceeds from an evident trifle, and something like hatred is mingled with it; and the conduct of Leonatus in accepting the wager, and exposing his wife to the trial, denotes a jealous temper already formed. Coleridge, Table-Talk, June 24, 1827.

Othman (oth-män'). Born about 575; killed at Medina, Arabia, 656. Calif of the Moslems 644-656, successor of Omar. He extended the califate by conquests in Persia, Africa, and the island of Cyprus. A conspiracy was formed against him by Ayesha, widow of the prophet, and he fell by the hand of Mohammed, son of the calif Abu-Bekr. He was succeeded by Ali.

For many years the Oto and Missourian tribes have been consolidated. They are now in Oklahoma. See Teiwere.

Otoe. See Oto.

Otomacs (ô-tô-mäks'), or Otomacos (ô-tô-mä'-kôs). A tribe of Indians who, in the 18th and early in the 19th century, lived along the middle Orinoco, from the junction of the Meta to that of the Arauca. They were very degraded savages, and were remarkable for their custom of eating enormous quantities of clay during seasons of scarcity. The Jesuits endeavored, with little success, to gather the Otomacs into their mission villages. Later they disappeared from the river shores, and the tribe is now either extinct or lives in a distant part of the llanos. The Otomac language, from the little that is known of it, appears to constitute a distinct stock.

Otomis (ô-tô-més'). [Nahuatl otomiltl, wanderer.] A tribe of Indians of the Mexican plateau. At the time of the conquest they dwelt principally in the mountainous district west of the Mexican lakes, and had long been, in some sense, subdued by the Aztecs. According to traditions they were one of the oldest nations of the plateau, having existed here even before the Toltec invasion. They were agriculturists and used cotton clothes and gold and copper ornaments, but were much less advanced than the Nahuas. During the siege of Mexico they joined Cortés (June, 1521). They have ever since been nominally subject to the whites, and are Catholics, but have acquired little civilization. Their descendants of pure blood probably number more than 200,000, and are scattered through Central Mexico. Also written Othomis, Othomies. See Otoni stock, below.

Otomistock (ô-tô-mé'stök). Linguistic stock of Mexican Indians, embracing a number of tribes, with closely allied dialects, which occupy portions of the states of Mexico, Morelos, Hidalgo, Querétaro, Guanajuato, and San Luis Potosi. Among the more important branches are the Otomis proper, the Mecos or Jonaz in Querétaro, and the Pames. All, or nearly all, are nominally Christians, but have retained many of their aboriginal customs and their language. This is very harsh and difficult, and consists largely of monosyllables. In stature these Indians are rather short, and their color is dark. They are said to number nearly 800,000.

Otrante, Duc d'. See Fouché.

Otranto (ô-trän'tô). A small seaport in the province of Lecce, Apulia, Italy, 46 miles southeast of Brindisi; the ancient Hydrus or Hydruntum. It was a flourishing ancient and medieval city until it was sacked by the Turks in 1480. The cathedral is a 3-aisled basilica with 3 apses and a remarkable pavement in mosaic (1163) of biblical scenes, animals, etc.

(1858-59), "Moniteur des dates" (1864-82), etc.

Otto. See Oto.

Otto (ot'tô) I. [OHG. Ūto, Odo, Otto, MHG. G. Otto, from ōt, AS. cād, wealth, property.] Born at Munich, April 27, 1848. King of Bavaria, brother of Louis II, whom he succeeded in 1886. He became insane in 1873, and succeeded under the regency of his uncle Prince Luitpold.

Otto (or Otho) I., "The Great." Born 912; died at Memleben, Prussian Saxony, May 7, 973. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. He was the son of Henry I., whom he succeeded as king of Germany in 936. The early part of his reign was occupied in subduing his turbulent nobles. He put an end to the incursions of the Bohemians, the Wends, and the Danes, and in 951 went to the support of Adelaide, queen of Lombardy, against Berengar II. He defeated Berengar and married Adelaide. In 955 he inflicted a decisive defeat on the Magyars on the Lechfeld. In 962 he was crowned emperor at Rome, reviving the office founded by Charlemagne.

Otto II. Born 955; died at Rome, Dec. 7, 983. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 973-983, son of Otto I. and Adelaide. He subdued a revolt of his cousin Henry, duke of Bavaria, about 977. In 978 the French invaded Lorraine, but were expelled by the emperor, who unsuccessfully besieged Paris. He married the Greek princess Theophano, through whom he claimed Apulia and Calabria in southern Italy. His claim was resisted by the Greeks with the assistance of the Saracens. After some successes he was totally defeated in 982.

Otto III., called "The Wonder of the World" (from his intellectual endowments). Born 980; died at Paterno, near Viterbo, Italy, Jan., 1002. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 983-1002, son of Otto II. During his minority the regency was conducted by his mother Theophano in Germany (after her death by the Archbishop of Mainz), and his grandmother Adelaide in Italy. He assumed the reins of government in 998. He aimed to make Rome the imperial residence and center of a new universal empire, but died at the early age of twenty-two.

Otto IV. Born about 1174; died at the Harzburg, Germany, May 19, 1218. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, second son of Henry the Lion, duke of Saxony and Bavaria. He was elected king of Germany in opposition to Philip of Swabia in 1198, and was crowned emperor in 1209. He afterward became involved in a quarrel with the Pope, who in 1212 put forward Frederick II. as anti-emperor. Having allied himself with England, he concerted an invasion of France with John Lackland, with whom he was defeated at Bouvines in 1214. Discredited by this defeat, he presently withdrew to his hereditary domain of Brunswick.

Otto of Freising. Died Sept. 22, 1158. A German historian, bishop of Freising (in Bavaria). His histories were edited in 1867.

Otto von Wittelsbach (ot'tō fon vit'tels-bäch). Killed 1209. The murderer of Philip of Swabia, king of Germany, 1208.

Ottoboni, or Otthoboni (ot-tō-bō'nē), Pietro. Born in 1668; died Feb. 17, 1740. A cardinal, nephew of Pope Alexander VIII. He received the cardinalate in 1699, but is principally noted as a patron of art. He collected a fine library, containing manuscript masses by Palestrina and other great masters, etc., which after his death were purchased by Pope Benedict XIV. and presented to the Vatican.

Ottocar (ot'tō-kär) II. Killed 1278. King of Bohemia 1253-78. He acquired Austria, Styria, Carinthia, and Carniola. For these German titles he refused to do homage to Rudolf of Hapsburg, king of Germany, who in consequence declared war against him. He was defeated and killed on the Marchfeld in 1278.

Ottoman Empire. See Turkey.

Ottomans (ot'tō-manz). [From F. Ottoman = Sp. Otomano = Pg. It. Ottomano, from Turk. Othman, 'Osman, the founder of the Turkish empire in Asia: see Osmanli. Cf. Othman.] That branch of the Turks which founded and rule the Turkish empire. The Ottoman Turks lived originally in central Asia. Under their first sultan, Othman (reigned 1288-1326), they founded a realm in Asia Minor, which was soon extended into Europe. With the capture of Constantinople in 1453 they succeeded to the Byzantine empire, and their rule, at its height in the 16th century, extended over the greater part of southeastern Europe and much of western Asia and northern Africa. They have since lost Hungary, Rumania, Servia, Greece, etc., and practically Bulgaria, Egypt, etc. The Ottoman Turks are Sunnite Mohammedans, and regard the sultans as representatives of the former califs.

It was an ancient Indian pueblo, and its name (originally Otoman, "place of the Otomis") appears to indicate that it was once inhabited by Otomi Indians. Near it, during the retreat from Mexico, Cortés defeated the Aztec forces, July 7, 1520. Population, about 5,900.

Otway (ot'wä), Thomas. Born at Trotton, Sussex, England, March 3, 1652; died at Tower Hill, London, April 14, 1685. The principal tragic poet of the English classical school, the son of Rev. Humphrey Otway. He entered Christ Church, Oxford, in 1669. He fell in love with Mrs. Barry, who appeared in his "Alcibiades" and she became his evil genius: to escape her he enlisted and served in Flanders, but returned to her. She made her greatest reputation in his plays, but owing to her greed and immorality her influence over him was entirely bad. He died in a baker's shop near the sponging-house in which his last days were spent. Among his plays are "Alcibiades" (1675), "Don Carlos" (1676), translations of Racine's "Tis and Berenice" and Molière's "Fonrberies de Scapin" ("Cheats of Scapin," 1677), "Friendship in Fashion" (1678), "The Soldier's Fortune" (1681), "The Orphan" (1680), "Caius Marius" (1681), "Venice Preserved" (1682), "The Atheist" (1684: a second part of "The Soldier's Fortune").

Ovando (ō-vän'dō), Nicolás de. Born at Valladolid about 1460; died at Madrid, 1518 (?). A Spanish administrator. He was a knight of Alcántara, and held a high position in the royal court. In 1501 he was appointed governor of Española, his jurisdiction embracing all the Spanish possessions in the New World except those ceded to Ojeda and Pinzon. He arrived at Santo Domingo, April 15, 1502, with 30 vessels and 2,500 colonists, and retained the place until July, 1509, when he was superseded by Diego Columbus. During this time the colony was prosperous, but the Indians were treated with great cruelty and a large portion of them died. African slaves were first extensively introduced under Ovando.

Ovar (ō-vär'). A seaport in the province of Beira, Portugal, situated on the Aveiro lagoon 19 miles south of Oporto. Population (1878), 10,022.

Overbeck (ō-ver-berk), Friedrich Johann. Born at Lübeck, Germany, July 3, 1789; died at Rome, Nov. 12, 1869. A noted German painter. He studied at the Vienna academy; but, objecting to the sensuousness of the prevailing pseudo-classical style, he was expelled and went to Rome, where he formed the brotherhood of the Præraphæites in 1810 with Cornelius, Schadow, and others (see Præraphæite Brotherhood), seeking to revive German art on a religious basis. He became a convert to the Roman Catholic Church in 1813, and devoted himself entirely to painting sacred subjects. His style was full of devout feeling, but hard in outline. Among his works (some of them frescos) are the "Vision of St. Francis," "Jerusalem Delivered" (Rome), "Christ's Entry into Jerusalem" (Lübeck), "Triumph of Religion in the Arts" (Frankfort), "Christ Blessing Little Children" (Lübeck), "Pieta" (Lübeck), "Christ in the Garden" (Hamburg), etc.

Owen, Sir Richard. Born at Laneaster, Eng., July 20, 1804; died at London, Dec. 18, 1892. An English comparative anatomist and paleontologist. He studied at the University of Edinburgh and at the medical school of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, and became a member of the Royal College of Surgeons in 1826. He afterward became assistant curator of the Hunterian Museum, and in 1834 professor of comparative anatomy at St. Bartholomew's Hospital. He was appointed Hunterian professor of anatomy and physiology in the College of Surgeons in 1836, and in 1856 superintendent of the natural history department in the British Museum. He was created knight commander of the Bath on his retirement in 1833. Among his works are "Odontology" (1810-45), "Archetype and Homologies of the Vertebrate System" (1848), "On Parthenogenesis" (1849), "Anatomy of the Vertebrates" (1866-68).

Owen, Robert. Born at Newtown, Montgomeryshire, Wales, May 14, 1771; died there, Nov. 17, 1858. The founder of English socialism. He became at nineteen manager of a cotton-mill at Manchester, and in 1800 became manager and part owner of the cotton mills at New Lanark. Here he introduced extensive reforms looking to an improvement in the condition of his operatives. In 1825 he founded a socialistic community at New Harmony, Indiana, which failed in 1827. He severed his connection with the mills at New Lanark in 1823, and devoted himself to the propagation of socialism. The history of English socialism is commonly dated from 1817, in which year he communicated a report on the poor law to a committee of the House of Commons.

He recommended that communities of about twelve hundred persons each should be settled on quantities of land of from 1,000 to 1,500 acres, all living in one large building in the form of a square, with public kitchen and mess-rooms. Each family should have its own private apartments, and the entire care of the children till the age of three, after which they should be brought up by the community, their parents having access to them at meals and all other proper times. These communities might be established by individuals, by parishes, by counties, or by the state; in every case there should be effective supervision by duly qualified persons. Work, and the enjoyment of its results, should be in common. The size of his community was no doubt partly suggested by his village of New Lanark; and he soon proceeded to advocate such a scheme as the best form for the reorganization of society in general. Thomas Kirkup, in Encyc. Brit., xviii, 87.

Owen, Robert Dale. Born at Glasgow, Nov. 9, 1801; died near Lake George, N. Y., June 17, 1877. An American social reformer, politician, spiritualist, and author: son of Robert Owen. He was member of Congress from Indiana 1843-47, and was noted as an advocate of negro emancipation. Among his works are "Footfalls on the Boundary of Another World" (1850), "The Debatable Land between this World and the Next" (1872), "Threading My Way" (1874), etc.

He became chancellor in 1611; in the Thirty Years' War held supreme control in the Rhine region; directed the foreign policy of Sweden after 1632; was made director of the Evangelical League 1633; was one of the guardians of Queen Christina; and negotiated the peace of Brömsebro in 1645.

Oxford (ok'sfôrd), or Oxfordshire (ok'sfôrd-shîr), or Oxon (ok'zon). [ME. Oxford, Oxenford, Oxeneford, AS. Oxnaford, Oxenafor, Ozonafor, oxen's ford. The ML. Oxonia (E. Oxon) is formed from the first element of the AS. name.] A south midland county of England. It is bounded by Warwick and Northampton on the north, Buckingham on the east, Berkshire on the south, and Berkshire and Gloucester on the west, and is separated from Berkshire by the Thames. The surface is varied, but in the north flat. The county was long noted for its forests. The chief occupation is agriculture. Area, 756 square miles. Population (1891), 185,663.

Oxford. The capital of Oxfordshire, England, situated at the junction of the Cherwell with the Thames, in lat. 51° 45' N., long. 1° 16' W.; the medieval Oxenaford and Oxenford, and Latin Oxonia. It is chiefly noted as the seat of Oxford University. The Cathedral of Christ Church is in the main a late-Norman building with round-arched nave and choir. The nave has a wooden roof; the choir is vaulted with pendants. There are a number of interesting tombs, and some fine glass, both medieval and modern. The upper stage of the central tower is Early English, finely arcaded; there is a chapter-house of the same date, and a perpendicular cloister. The authentic annals of Oxford begin in 912, when it was annexed by Edward the Elder, king of the West Saxons. It was a place of strategic importance and one of the political centers in the middle ages: it was a meeting-place of the witenagemot. Harold Har-foot was proclaimed king there in 1036, and died there in 1040. The population in the time of Edward the Confessor is estimated at 3,000; in 1086 it was only 1,700. The castle was besieged by Stephen in 1141-42, Matilda escaping then over the frozen river. The city was the Royalist headquarters in the civil war. It was taken by Parliamentarians under Fairfax in 1646. Population (1891) 45,741.

Oxford, Earl of. See Harley, Robert.

Oxford, Provisions of. In English history, a set of articles passed by the "Mad Parliament" at Oxford in 1258. They provided for a committee of twenty-four to redress grievances in church and state; for a standing body of fifteen, as a council to the king, who should hold three annual parliaments and communicate with a body of twelve representing the barons; and for a body of twenty-four members to negotiate financial aids.

Oxford, University of. The oldest of the two great universities of England. It grew up in the 12th century, Robert Pullen and the Lombard Vacarius being early teachers of note. It contains the following colleges: University (founded in 1249), Merton (1264), Balliol (between 1263 and 1268), Exeter (1314 and 1565), Oriel (1324 and 1326), Queen's (1340), New (1379), Lincoln (1427 and 1478), All Souls (1437), Magdalen (1458), Brasenose (1509), Corpus Christi (1516), Christ Church (1546), Trinity (1554), St. John's (1555), Jesus (1571), Wadham (1612), Pembroke (1624), Worcester (1714), Keble (1870), Hertford (1874). There are also two public halls (St. Mary Hall and St. Edmund Hall) and two private halls (Chancellor's Hall and Turrell's Hall). Among the institutions connected with the university are the Bodleian Library (which see), Radcliffe Library, Ashmolean Museum, Clarendon Press, Taylor Institution, University Observatory, University Museum, Botanic Garden, and Indian Institute. University sermons are mostly preached at St. Mary's Church, a fine old building (of the 15th and 16th centuries) in High street, which has always been closely connected with the university. The three governing bodies are the Convocation, which includes all who continue members of the university; the Congregation of the University, consisting of the resident members; and the Heldonadal Council, consisting of the chancellor, vice-chancellor, proctors, and 18 elected members. The undergraduates numbered 3,197 in 1893.

Oyama (ō-yä'mä), Marshal Count. A contemporary Japanese statesman, minister of war in 1894. He won recognition by his valor in the civil war of southern Japan in 1877. He led the second invasion of Chinese soil in the Chino-Japanese war. Being in command of the second corps after the Chinese defeat in Korea, he sailed for the Liau-tung peninsula in Oct., 1894, and struck the final blows of the conflict, capturing the great Chinese strongholds of Port Arthur and Weihai-wei, in conjunction with a naval force under Admiral Ito.

Oybin (ō-ē-bēn'). A remarkable isolated rock, situated near Zittau, in the kingdom of Saxony. Height above sea-level, 1,600 feet.

Oyique (ō-yō'ke). [Tehua, from oyi, frost.] The winter people in the Tehua pueblos of New Mexico. That tribe is divided (each village or pueblo) into two sections—the winter people, or Oyique, and the summer people. The dignity of chief penitent or cacique belongs alternately to each of these two groups. Thus the summer cacique (called Pajoque) serves from the vernal equinox to the autumnal, and the winter cacique (also termed Oyique) from the autumnal to the vernal equinox. On very important occasions, however, the Oyique is inferior to his colleague.

Oyonnaz (ō-yo-nä'). A town in the department of Ain, France, 25 miles west of Geneva. Population (1891), commune, 4,461.

Ozaka, or Osaka (ō-sä'kä). A city in the main island of Japan, situated on the Aji in lat. 34° 41' N. It is one of the three imperial cities or "fu," and the manufacturing and commercial center of Japan. It contains many Buddhist and Shinto temples, a castle, an arsenal, and a mint. It was founded in the end of the 15th century, and opened to foreign trade in 1868. Population (1891), 473,541.
