Comanche (kō-man'chē), or Camanche (ka-man'chē). [Pl., also Comanches.] A tribe of North American Indians, well known for their martial character. According to tradition and linguistic evidence they were formerly neighbors of the Shoshoni in Wyoming. In 1724 they were on upper Kansas River, and later were south of Red River, Texas, this southward extension doubtless being due to pressure by Siouan tribes. Their later territory was the extensive plains from the Rocky Mountains eastward into Indian Territory and Texas as far as long. 97°, although they raided the country from Kansas southward as far as Durango, Mexico (a distance of 800 miles). They agreed to give upon a reservation in 1868, at which date they numbered about 2,500. The Comanche now on the Kiowa, Comanche, and Wichita reservation, Oklahoma, number 153. Their own name is Nam, 'people.' Comanche, a name of unknown signification, was first applied by the Spanish Mexicans, while the French form, Padouca, is adapted from their Siouan name. They also have been known as Choutman, Comande, Kannatins, Neum, Padouen, and Pouca. See Shoshonean.

Comande. See Comanche.

Comayagua (kō-mā-yā'gwā). The capital of the department of Comayagua, Honduras, situated on the river Humaya in lat. 14° 28' N., long. 87° 39' W. It was the capital of Honduras until 1880. Population, about 5,000. In colonial times it had 18,000 inhabitants, but it was burned in 1827, and has never fully recovered.

Combe (kōm). Andrew. Born at Edinburgh, Oct. 27, 1797; died at Edinburgh, Aug. 9, 1847. A Scottish physician and writer on physiology and phrenology. He founded, with his brother George Combe and others, the "Phrenological Magazine" (1823), of which he remained proprietor until 1837.

Combe, George. Born at Edinburgh, Oct. 21, 1788; died at Moor Park, Farnham, England, Aug. 14, 1858. A Scottish phrenologist; chief work "An Essay on the Constitution of Man" (1828).

Combe, William. Born at Bristol, England, 1741; died at Lambeth, June 19, 1823. An English writer, author of "Dr. Syntax." He was the godson (or natural son) of a London alderman; was educated at Eton and Oxford (where, however, he did not take a degree); entered the law; led for some time the life of an adventurer, being successively a soldier, a waiter, a lieutenant, and a cook; and for the last 43 years of his life resided within the rules of the King's Bench debtors' prison. He published a large number of works, including "The Diaboliad, a poem dedicated to the worst man (Simon, Lord Inham) in His Majesty's Dominions" (1776), "The Devil upon Two Sticks in England" (1790), "The Tour of Dr. Syntax in search of the Picturesque" (a poem first published in the "Poetical Magazine," and republished 1812), etc.

Comberback, Silas Tomkyns. The name under which Coleridge enlisted in the 15th Dragoons.

Combermere, Viscount. See Cotton.

Comecrudo (kō-mā-krō'dō). A tribe of North American Indians which live on the lower Rio Grande at Las Prietas, Tamaulipas, Mexico.

Of the 25 survivors in 1886 but seven spoke their native tongue. The name is said to signify 'raw eaters' (Sp. come-crudo), in allusion to their practice of cannibalism. Also called Carrizos. See Cochuitlan.

Comédie Française (kō-mā-dē' frōñ-sāz'). La. The official name of the Théâtre Français. The Comédie Française practically had its beginning in the Théâtre de l'Hôtel Bourgogne, established in 1552 and made théâtre royal under Henry III, in 1588; it was followed by the Théâtre du Marais in 1600. A few years afterward the company of Molière was established in the great hall of the Hôtel Bourbon. In 1660 the Hôtel Bourbon was torn down, and in 1661 Molière was transferred to the theater of the Palais Royal. In 1673 Molière died; his company was disbanded and went to the Théâtre Guénégaud. In 1680 there were three companies in Paris—that of the Hôtel Bourgogne, that of the Marais, and the company of Molière in the Théâtre Guénégaud; the two latter were amalgamated Oct. 21, 1680, and the Comédie Française organized by lettre de cachet of Louis XIV, as "L'Hôtel des Comédiens du Roi entretenus par Sa Majesté." The Comédie Française migrated frequently. In 1689 it had its home in the Rue des Fossés St. Germain des Prés (Rue de l'ancienne Comédie); it was here and in this year that it first took the title of Comédie Française. In 1770 it removed to the Tuileries, and in 1782 the company played in what is now the Odéon. It was suppressed in the Revolution in 1793, and reconstituted by Napoleon, then first consul, and established in the Théâtre Français. See Théâtre Français.

Comédie Humaine (kō-mā-dē' i-mān'). La. A collection of Balzac's novels, arranged and connected with laborious classification by himself to form what he called a "complete society," the same persons and their relatives appearing and reappearing. "Each novel is in fact a page of the great work, which would be incomplete without it." It is a picture of the manners and morals of his own time.

Comedy of Errors, The. A play by Shakespeare, acted at Gray's Inn, Dec. 28, 1594. Its real title is "Errors." It is thought that another version not entirely by Shakespeare was acted about 1590. The original plot was probably suggested by Plautus's "Menæchmi" and "Amphitryon," and more directly by the "History of Error" acted by the chapel children in 1576. (Fleay.) The plot consists in the extraordinary series of mistakes arising from the likeness between twin brothers, both named Antipholus, and the likeness between their two servants, named Dromio.

Comely Bank (kum'li bank). See the extract.

The Carlyles, at the period of Thomas's famous visit to Jeffrey in George Street, were living at Comely Bank, in one of a row of two-storied, uninteresting houses, calling themselves "villa residences," at the northwest of Edinburgh, quite out of town even now, and facing a green called Stockbridge Public Park. Carlyle's cottage is numbered 21.

Comenius (kō-mō'ni-us) (originally Komen-sky), Johann Amos. Born at Nivnitz or, more probably, at Ungarisch-Brod, Moravia, March 28, 1592; died in Holland, Nov. 15, 1670. A noted Czech theologian and educational reformer. He studied theology at Herborn and Heidelberg, and in 1618 became pastor of a congregation of Moravian Brethren at Fulnek. Expelled by an imperial mandate of 1621, which banished all Protestant pastors from Bohemia, he eventually settled at Lissa, Poland, where he supported himself by teaching. In 1642 he went to Sweden, where, at the invitation of the chancellor Axel Oxenstierna, he prepared a plan for the improvement of the educational system of the country. He was in 1648 elected bishop of the Moravian Church at Lissa, where, with an interruption of four years spent at Sárospatak, Hungary, he remained until 1657, when Lissa was pillaged and burned by the Poles. He subsequently settled at Amsterdam. Among his works are "Janua linguarum reserata," "Orbis pictus," and "Didactica magna seu omnes omnia docendi artificium."

Comical Gallant, The, or the Amours of Sir John Falstaff. An alteration of "The Merry Wives of Windsor" by John Dennis, played in 1702.

Comical Lovers, The, or Marriage à la Mode. A comedy by Cibber, produced and printed in 1707. It is made from the comic scenes of Dryden's "Secret Love" and "Marriage à la Mode."

Comical Revenge, The, or Love in a Tub. A comedy by Sir George Etherege, produced in 1664. It was published in the same year.

Comines, or Commines (kō-mēn'). A town on the Lys 10 miles north of Lille, situated partly in the department of Nord, France, and partly in West Flanders, Belgium. Population (1891), 7,422.

Comines, or Commines, or Comynes, Philippe de. Born at Comines, near Lille, France (or at Renescourt, near Hazebrouck), about 1445; died at Argenton, Deux-Sèvres, France, Oct. 18, 1510. A noted French statesman and historian. He entered the service of Charles the Bold, and then went over to Louis XI., in whose household he rose to the dignity of confidant and counselor. In 1486 he was arrested for political reasons and imprisoned for over two years. At the command of Charles VIII, he was arrested again later on, and exiled for ten years. After serving his time, he returned to court only to fall into disgrace. Finally he retired into private life and wrote his "Mémoires." The "Cronique et hystoire faicte et composée par messire Philippe de Comines" (Paris, 1524) was written from 1488 to 1493. It deals with the history of France between 1464, when Comines came to the court of Charles the Bold, and 1483, the date of the death of Louis XI. The sequel, "Chroniques du roy Charles huitiesme" (Paris, 1528), was written later than 1497, and contains notes on the wars waged by Charles VIII. between 1494 and 1498. Complete editions have been made by Denis Sauvage (1552), Godefroy (1649), Lenglet-Dufresnoy (1747), Mademoiselle Dupont (1840-47), and R. Chantelauze (1881).

Comitan (kō-mē-tān'), or Comitlan (kō-mēt-lān'). A town in the state of Chiapas, southern Mexico, in lat. 16° 5' N., long. 92° 25' W. Population (1889), 7,000.

Commode (ko-mōd'). A play by Thomas Corneille, played for Louis XIV. at the Louvre in 1659.

Commodian. See Commodianus.

Commodianus (ko-mō-di-ā'nus). A Christian poet of the first half of the 3d century. Two poems by him are extant, "Instructiones LXXX adversus gentium deos," and "Carmin Apologeticum," a defense of Christianity.

Commodus (kom'ō-dus). Lucius Ælius Aurelius (also Marcus Antoninus). Born at Lanuvium, Italy, Aug. 31, 161 A. D.: killed at Rome, Dec. 31, 192. Emperor of Rome 180-192, son of Marcus Aurelius whom he succeeded. He bought peace of the Germans at the price of a tribute, and, intrusting the direction of the government to favorites (Perennis, Cleander, Letus, and Eclectus), abandoned himself to dissipation and cruelty. He put to death his wife Crispina and nearly all the public men who had risen to eminence under his father, is said to have appeared as a gladiator in the amphitheater over seven hundred times against defenseless opponents, and to have claimed divine honors, appearing in public as Hercules and demanding to be worshiped as such. He was strangled by the athlete Narcissus, who was introduced into his sleeping-apartment by conspirators, chief of whom was the emperor's mistress, Marcia.

Common (kom'on), Dol. In Ben Jonson's comedy "The Alchemist," the mistress of Subtle.

Common Sense. A pamphlet by Thomas Paine, published in Philadelphia Jan. 1, 1776. It advocated entire separation from England, and its arguments fell in with the prevailing current of feeling, and swept waverers along with it. It is described by Washington as "working a powerful change in the minds of many men" (Works, III, 276).

Commonwealth of England, The. The designation applied officially to the form of government existing in England from the abolition of the monarchy in Feb., 1649, after the execution of Charles I., till the establishment of the protectorate under Cromwell in Dec., 1653, but often loosely used of the whole interval from the death of Charles I. to the restoration of Charles II. in May, 1660. During the former period, or that of the real commonwealth, the government was vested in a Council of State, composed of members of the House of Commons, and the House of Lords was abolished.

Como (kō'mō). [F. Côme, It. Como, L. Comum.] 1. The capital of the province of Como, Italy, situated at the southern extremity of the Lake of Como, 25 miles north-northwest of Milan. It is picturesquely situated, has a noted cathedral, and manufactures silk. The cathedral, one of the finest in northern Italy, was begun in 1396 in an excellent Pointed style, continued in that of the early Renaissance, and completed in the more ornate Renaissance of the 16th century. The front has round-arched doors, a fine rose, delicate sculpture, and rich pinnacles. The Renaissance north doorway is notable. The nave is Pointed, with good vaulting; the circular choir is classical. There are many beautiful frescos, by Quini and Ferrari. It was the birthplace of the elder Pliny, the younger Pliny, and Volta. Population (1891), commune, 35,000.

2. A province in Lombardy, Italy, bordering on Switzerland. Area, 1,091 square miles. Population (1891), 555,682.

Como, Lake of, It. Lago di Como (lä'gō dē kō'mō), F. Lac de Côme (läk dē kōm), G. Comersee (kō'mer-za'). A lake of northern Italy, near the Swiss border; the Roman Lacus Larius. It is traversed by the river Adda, and is famous for its beauty. It is surrounded by mountains, and its shores are bordered with villas. At Bellagio it is divided into the Lake of Como (proper) and the Lake of Lecco. Length, 39 miles. Greatest width, 2½ miles. Depth, 1,330 feet.

Comonfort (kō-mon-fört'), Ignacio. Born at Puebla, March 12, 1812; died near Guanajuato, Nov. 13, 1863. A Mexican soldier and statesman. He joined the revolt against Santa Anna, April, 1854; was secretary of war under Alvarez, Oct., 1855, and on the retirement of that leader became acting president; under the constitution of Feb., 1857, was elected constitutional president, assuming office Dec. 1, 1857. As acting president he crushed a series of revolts led by the church and conservative parties. Soon after his regular election he tacitly encouraged the project of a dictatorship; was deposed after hard fighting, and fled the country in Feb., 1858. He returned in 1862, took a prominent part against the French invasion, and was killed by irregular troops or bandits.

Compass (kum'pas). A soldier and scholar in Ben Jonson's comedy "The Magnetic Lady," "one well read in Men and Manners."

Compiègne (kōn-pyān'). A town in the department of Oise, France, situated on the Oise 45 miles northeast of Paris: the ancient Compendium. It was noted as a favorite royal residence, and its chief building is the royal palace, a large structure founded in Merovingian times and rebuilt in the reign of Louis XV. and later. The interior is especially noteworthy for the furniture and decoration of the apartments fitted out under Napoleon I., and contains a collection of modern paintings. At Compiègne, in 1430, Joan of Arc was taken prisoner. The town has been the seat of several councils. Population (1891), commune, 14,498.

Complaint of Mars. A poem by Chaucer, written probably after 1380. It is full of astronomical allusions, and contains the story of "the broche" which Vulcan wrought at Thebes. It is supposed to be sung on St. Valentine's day by a bird. A "Complaint of Venus" has been appended to it. The latter is of a totally different character, and is a translation from the French of Sir Otes de Graunson (Sbirley). It is probable that the Venus in both poems refers to the princess Isabel of Spain.

Complaint of Philomene, The. A poem by George Gascoigne, begun in 1562, but not completed until 1576.

Complaint of Venus, The. A poem by Chaucer, translated by him late in life from the French of Graunson. It is made up of three independent ballades: the title was given by the copyists as a counterpart to the "Complaint of Mars," to which it is appended.

Complaint to his Purse. A poem by Chaucer, attributed to Oeeleve. It was printed before the 1532 edition.

Complaint to Pity. A poem by Chaucer, printed before 1532, and probably written about 1367. Skeat.

Compton (koum'pton), Henry. Born at Compton Wynyates, Warwickshire, 1632; died at Fulham, near London, July 7, 1713. An English prelate, bishop of London, and youngest son of Spencer Compton, second earl of Northampton. He studied at Oxford (Queen's College) and at Cambridge; was installed canon of Christ Church in 1669; became bishop of Oxford in 1671, and bishop of London in 1675; and was charged with the education of Mary and Anne (later queens), daughters of James, duke of York (James II.). After the accession of James he was tried before Lord Chancellor Jeffreys, as head of the high court of ecclesiastical commission, for disobeying the king (in refusing to suspend John Sharp, dean of Norwich), and suspended from the exercise of his episcopal functions; but was reinstated in 1688. He was a vigorous opponent of Catholicism and an influential supporter of William III.

Compton, Spencer. Born May, 1601; killed in the battle of Hopton Heath, March 19, 1643. The second Earl of Northampton, a partisan of Charles I. in his struggle with Parliament. He served actively in the king's army, commanding the royalist forces at Hopton Heath, where he was slain.

Compton, Spencer. Born about 1673; died July 2, 1743. An English politician, third son of the third Earl of Northampton, created Viscount Penvensey and earl of Wilmington in 1730. He was chosen speaker of the House of Commons March 17, 1715, and reelected Oct. 9, 1722. In Feb., 1742, he was appointed first lord of the treasury.

Comtat d'Avignon (kōn-tä' dä-vēn-yōn') and Comtat-Venaissin (ve-nä-sän'). Two ancient territories of southern France, lying between Dauphiné on the north, Provence on the east, the Durance on the south, and the Rhône on the west. They were ceded to the popes in the 13th century, and were united to France in 1791. They correspond nearly to the department of Vaucluse.

Comte (kōnt), Isidore Auguste Marie Francois Xavier. Born at Montpellier, France, Jan. 19, 1798; died at Paris, Sept. 5, 1857. A celebrated French philosopher, founder of positivism. He studied two years at the Ecole Polytechnique in Paris (having been admitted in 1814), and about 1818 became the friend and disciple of Saint-simon, whose doctrines he undertook to expound in a work entitled "Système de politique positive" in 1822. This friendship terminated in a complete estrangement in 1824. He was tutor at the Ecole Polytechnique 1822-51. His chief works are "Cours de philosophie positive" (1830-42), and "Catechisme positiviste" (1852).

Comte de Boursoufle (kōnt dē bōr-sō'fl). Le. A comedy by Voltaire, first produced as "Quand est-ce qu'on me marie?" It was privately played for the first time under that title at the Chateau de Cirey in 1731, and again in 1747 at the Chateau d'Anet. It was produced at the Odéon as "Le Comte de Boursoufle" in 1862 as a posthumous play of Voltaire. It was really made from the broader parts of Vanbrugh's "Relapse." The Comte de Boursoufle is a Gallicized Lord Foppington.

Comte de Monte-Cristo (kōnt dē mōn'te-krēs'tō), Le. A novel by Alexandre Dumas, published in 1844; so named from its hero.

Comte Ory (kōnt ō-ré'), Le. An opera by Rossini (words by Scribe and Deslèze-Poirson), produced in French at Paris Aug. 20, 1828, and in Italian at London Feb. 28, 1829, and in French June 20, 1849. Both words and music were adaptations of works by the same authors written some years before.

Comtesse d'Escarbagnas (kōn-tes' des-kär-bän-yäs'). La. A comedy by Molière, first played for the king at Saint-Germain in 1691. The next year it was played in Paris on Feb. 2. It is a study of provincial manners.

Comtesse de Rudolstadt (kōn-tes' dē rü-dol-stät'). La. A novel by George Sand, a sequel to "Consuelo," published in 1844.

Comus (kō'mus). [Gr. Κῶμος.] In later classical mythology, the god of mirth, represented as a winged youth.

Comus. A mask by Milton, presented at Ludlow Castle Sept. 29, 1634, before the Earl of Bridgewater. It was printed in 1637, and in his works in 1645. Milton is said to be indebted to Fletcher's "Faithful Shepherdess" for the lyrical portions, and for its central situation to Peck's "Old Wives' Tale." George Colman the elder produced an alteration of it at Covent Garden in 1773.

Comyn (kum'in), Alexander. Died in 1289. The second Earl of Buchan, constable of Scotland.

Comyn, John, the elder. Died about 1300. A Scottish noble, lord of Badenoch, and claimant to the Scottish throne.

Conachar (kon'a-ehär). The son of the chief of Clan Quhele in Sir Walter Scott's "Fair Maid of Perth." After becoming the chief himself he realized that he was a coward, and killed himself in despair.

Conaire (ko-när'). See the extract.

A description of Cormac's person, on the occasion of his entering a great assembly in state, tells us that the equal of his form had never been seen, except that of Conaire the Great, of Conchobar son of Nessa, or of Aengus son of the Dagda. It is remarkable that the ancient writer should mention these three, as they are adumbrations of the same god as Cormac. Thus I may here say, without anticipating the remarks to be presently made on the Aengus to whom I have alluded, that he was the constant aider and protector of the sun-hero Diarmait, while Conaire was the subject of one of the most famous epic stories in Irish literature. The plot centers in Conaire's tragic death, which is brought about by the fairies of Erin, through the instrumentality of outlaws coming from the sea and following the lead of a sort of cyclops called Ingeál, said to have been a big, rough, horrid monster with only one eye, which was, however, wider than an ox-hide, blacker than the back of a beetle, and provided with no less than three pupils. The death of Conaire at his hands is one of the Celtic renderings of the story which in its Greek form describes the treatment of Zeus by Typho.

Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 135.

Conant (kō'nant), Mrs. (Hannah Chaplin). Born at Danvers, Mass., in 1809; died at Brooklyn, N. Y., Feb. 18, 1865. An American writer, wife of T. J. Conant. Her chief work is a "History of the English Bible" (1856).

Conant, Thomas Jefferson. Born at Brandon, Vt., Dec. 13, 1802; died at Brooklyn, N. Y., April 30, 1891. An American Baptist clergyman and biblical critic. He translated Gesenius's Hebrew grammar (1839), and published annotated versions of "Job" (1857), "Matthew" (1869), "Genesis" (1868, 1873), "New Testament, Common Version revised" (1871), "Historical Books of the Old Testament" (1884), etc.

Concepcion del Uruguay (del ö-rö-gwí'). A town in the province of Entre Ríos, Argentine Republic, situated on the Uruguay north of Buenos Ayres. Population, 10,000.

Conceptistas (kôn-thep-tēs'täs). See the extract.

At that time, and very much under the leading influence of Ledesma, there was a well-known party in Spanish literature called the "Conceptistas";—a sect composed, in a considerable degree, of mystics, who expressed themselves in metaphors and puns, alike in the pulpit and in poetry, and whose influence was so extensive that traces of it may be found in many of the principal writers of the time, including Quevedo and Lope de Vega. Of this school of the Conceptistas, though Quevedo was the more brilliant master, Ledesma was the original head.

Conchobar (kon-chō'bär). See the extract.

In another cycle of stories, which may be called Utonian, the Celtic Zeus finds his representative in Conchobar mac Nessa, or Conor son of Nessa, king of Ulster. As in Cormac's case, a highly coloured picture is drawn of his reign, which the Euhemerists synchronize with the time of Christ, boldly fixing the Utonian king's death on the day of the crucifixion.

Conchos (kon'ehōs). [Sp., 'Shell river' (?); from concha, shell (?).] A river which rises in southern Chihuahua and empties into the Río Grande from the south, opposite Presidio del Norte in Texas. The name was given to the river on account of the many shells found on its shores. The tribe of Conchos afterward derived its name from the stream.

Conchos (kon'ehōs). [So called from the Río Conchos.] A roving Indian tribe of southern Chihuahua and in part of Coahuila, Mexico, of a low degree of culture. As a tribe it has disappeared, as has also the language, almost totally. The Conchos were converted, in the beginning of the 17th century, by Fray Alonso de la Oliva. They were first met with about 1564 by Francisco de Ibarra. They were always of a mild and tractable disposition.

Conciergerie (kôn-syerzh-rē'), La. The old prison of the Palais de Justice in Paris. When the palace, which was originally fortified, was inhabited by the kings of France, the part of the building containing the home of the concierge of the palace received this name. Distinguished personages occupied this office, which, in 1348, was called the "concierge-bailli." It existed till the Revolution, and was one of great responsibility. Among other things, the concierge had charge of all royal prisoners. The Conciergerie became widely known during the Reign of Terror. Three hundred and twenty-eight prisoners were butchered there in one week. The cell occupied by Marie Antoinette was destroyed by the Communists in 1871, but the prison still exists.

Concini, Concino. See Azure, Marquis d'.

Concord (kong'kord). 1. The capital of New Hampshire, situated on the Merrimac in lat. 43° 13' N., long. 71° 30' W. It has manufactures of wagons, harnesses, cotton and woolen goods, granite, leather, etc. From 1733 to 1765 it was called Rumford. It became a city in 1853. Population (1890), 17,001.

2. A town in Middlesex County, Massachusetts, situated on the Concord River 17 miles northwest of Boston. It was the residence of Emerson, Hawthorne, Thoreau, and other men of letters. The bridge over Concord River was the scene, April 19, 1775, of an engagement between British and Provincial troops in the War of Independence. (See Concord, Battle of, and Lexington.) Concord was the center of the "Transcendental" movement about 1835-40, and later the seat of the "Concord School of Philosophy." Population (1890), 4,427.

Concord (Mass.), Battle of. One of the opening skirmishes of the American War of Independence. A body of 800 British soldiers under Lieutenant-Colonel Smith and Major Pitcairn, detailed to destroy military stores at Concord, met here, on April 19, 1775, after a slight engagement at Lexington (which see), an armed force of 306 Provincial troops under Colonel Barrett and Major Buttrick. After a brisk fusillade, in which several on both sides were killed and wounded, the British retreated toward Boston by way of Lexington, being harassed by the Provincials on the road till the retreat became a rout.

Concord, Temple of. See Girgenti.

Concordat of 1801, The. An agreement concluded July 15, 1801, between Napoleon Bonaparte (then first consul) and Pius VII. It reestablished the Roman Catholic Church in France, and granted to the government the right of appointing archbishops and bishops, who were to be confirmed by the Pope. It went into operation on April 8, 1802.

Concordat of 1855, The. An agreement concluded at Vienna, Aug. 18, 1855, between Francis Joseph of Austria and Pius IX. It gave the clergy control of public instruction, and placed cases of the canon law, especially marriage affairs, under the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical courts. It was abrogated in July, 1870.

Concordat of Francis I, The. A convention concluded in 1516 between Francis I. of France and Leo X. It replaced the pragmatic sanction of Bourges, a modification of the reformatory decrees of the Council of Basel, which had been adopted at the Assembly of Bourges in 1438, but which had never been recognized by the Pope. It reestablished the annats, referred the causæ majores to Rome, and gave to the king the right of nominating bishops.

Concordat of Worms, The. A convention concluded in 1122 between the emperor Henry V. and Calixtus II. The main point at issue between the emperors and the popes, the matter of the election of bishops and abbots, was settled in favor of the spiritual power, the concordat providing that the investiture should be conferred, not with the ring and staff, but with the scepter. It was provided that the election should take place in the presence of the emperor or his representatives; that investiture by the emperor should precede consecration; and that ecclesiastics holding secular benefices should perform feudal services. This instrument put an end to the contest regarding investiture between the emperor and the Pope, and became a fundamental ordinance of the Holy Roman Empire.

Concordia (kon-kōr'di-ij). In Roman mythology, the goddess of concord. There were several temples to her in Rome.

Concordia, Marquis de la. See Albasal.

Condé, or Condé-sur-l'Escaut (kôn-dä'sür-les-kō'). A town in the department of Nord, France, situated at the junction of the Hayne and Schelde 8 miles north of Valenciennes. It gave name to the princes of Condé, and was noted for its many sieges. Population (1891), commune, 4,772.

Condé, Prince de (Henri I. de Bourbon). Born at Ferlé-sous-Jourar, Dec. 7, 1552; poisoned at St.-Jean-d'Angély, France, March 5, 1588. A French Protestant leader, son of the first Prince de Condé.

Condé, Prince de (Henri II. de Bourbon). Born at St.-Jean-d'Angély, France, Sept. 1, 1588; died at Paris, Dec., 1646. Son of Henri I., prince de Condé, and father of "The Great Condé." He headed a revolt against the regency during the minority of Louis XIII., in consequence of which he was imprisoned three years at Vincennes. He subsequently became a partizan of Richelieu.

Condé, Prince de (Henri Jules de Bourbon). Born at Paris, July 29, 1643; died at Paris, April 1, 1709. Only son of "The Great Condé." He served with distinction at the siege of Tonnay in 1667, and in 1674 participated in the battle of Senefé, on which occasion he is said to have saved his father's life.

Condé (kon'dä), José Antonio. Born at Paraleja, Cuenca, about 1765; died at Madrid, Oct. 20, 1820. A Spanish Orientalist and historian. He studied at the University of Alcalá, and obtained a subordinate position in the Royal Library. Having in 1808 identified himself with the French party, he was soon after promoted to librarian in chief by Joseph Bonaparte. He was exiled on the departure of the French, but returned in 1818 or 1819. His chief work is "Historia de la dominación de los Arabes en España" (1820-21).

Condé (kôn-dä'), first Prince de Louis I. de Bourbon. Born at Vendôme, May 7, 1530; died March 13, 1569. A French general, younger brother of Antoine de Bourbon, king of Navarre. He was one of the leaders in the conspiracy of Anboise, the object of which was to remove Francis II from the influence of the Guisea. At the accession of Charles IX. he was appointed governor of Picardy by Catherine de' Medici. On the massacre of the Huguenots at Vassy by the Duke of Guise in 1562, he placed himself at the head of a Huguenot army, with the result that he was, after some preliminary successes, captured at the battle of Dreux, being, however, liberated in 1563 by the treaty of Anboise. He was captured at the battle of Jarnac, when, after having surrendered his sword, he was treacherously shot by a Catholic officer.

Condé, Prince de (Louis II. de Bourbon), called "The Great Condé." Born at Paris, Sept. 8, 1621; died at Fontainebleau, France, Dec. 11, 1686. A celebrated French general, called during the lifetime of his father (Henri II.) the Duc d'Enghien. He defeated the Spaniards at Rocroi May 19, 1643, the Imperialists at Nordlingen Aug. 3, 1645, and the Spaniards at Lens Aug. 20, 1648. In the war of the Fronde he was at first loyal to the regency, but subsequently joined the Fronde. He defeated the army of the court at Blénac April 7, 1652, obtained in the same year the chief command of the Spanish army in the war against France, was condemned as a traitor by the Parliament of Paris, but was pardoned and restored to his dignities by the treaty of the Pyrenées in 1659. He conquered Franche-Comté in 1668, fought a drawn battle with the Prince of Orange at Senefé in 1674, and succeeded Turenne as commander of the army of the Rhine in 1675.

Condé, Prince de (Louis Joseph de Bourbon). Born at Paris, Aug. 9, 1736; died at Paris, May 13, 1818. A French general, son of Louis Henri, duke of Bourbon. He entered the army at the beginning of the Seven Years' War, became lieutenant-general in 1758, and won a victory at Johannisberg in 1762. During the popular agitation which preceded the French Revolution he strenuously opposed all measures designed to limit the privileges of the nobility and the clergy. He emigrated in 1789, and organized a corps of emigrants, with which he joined the Austrian army in 1792. After the peace of Campo-Formio in 1797 he served with his corps in the Russian army until the withdrawal of Paul I. from the coalition against France in 1800, when he reentered the Austrian service. Compelled by the peace of Lunéville to disband his corps, he retired to England, whence he returned to France on the restoration in 1814. Author of "Essai sur la vie du grand Condé" (1806).

Condé, Princesse de (Louise Adélaïde de Bourbon). Born at Chantilly, France, Oct. 5, 1757; died at Paris, March 10, 1824. Daughter of Louis Joseph de Bourbon (1736-1818).

She became abbess of Remiremont in 1736, emigrated at the beginning of the French Revolution, and in 1816 returned to Paris, where she subsequently founded the religious order of "l'adoration perpétuelle."

Condé Alarcos (kōn' dā ÿ-lār' kōs). An old Spanish ballad of unknown authorship. Bowring and Lockhart translated it, and Disraeli wrote a tragedy with this subject and title in 1839.

Condell (kun'del), Henry. Died at Fulham, England, Dec., 1627. An English actor, and one of the two editors of the first folio edition of Shakspeare's plays. He was a member of the lord chamberlain's company of players, to which Shakspeare and Burbage also belonged, and became a partner with the Burbages in the Globe Theatre in 1599. He is mentioned in Shakspeare's will.

Condell, Henry. Born in 1757; died at Battersea, June 24, 1824. An English violinist and composer. He wrote overtures, glees, incidental music for plays, and set various musical farces. His glee "Loud Blow the Wynds" took the prize at the Catch Club in 1811.

Conder (kon'der), Josiah. Born at London, Sept. 17, 1789; died at London, Dec. 27, 1855. An English bookseller and writer. He edited "The Modern Traveler" (1825-29), etc.

Condillac (kōn-dē-yāk'). Étienne Bonnot de. Born at Grenoble, France, Sept. 30, 1715; died near Beaugency, France, Aug. 3, 1780. A noted French philosopher, a leading advocate of sensualism. His works include "Essai sur l'origine des connaissances humaines" (1746), "Traité des systèmes" (1749), "Traité des sensations" (1754), "Cours d'études" (1769), "Le commerce et le gouvernement" (1776), "La logique" (1781), "Langue des calculs" (1798).

Condorcet (kōn-dor-sā'), Joséph Marie de. Born at Ribemont, near St. Quentin, France, Sept. 17, 1743; died at Bourg-la-Reine, near Paris, March 28, 1794. A celebrated French philosopher and mathematician. He was a deputy to the Legislative Assembly in 1791, and its president 1792, and a deputy to the Convention in 1792, where he sided with the Girondists. After the fall of the latter he was accused (Oct. 3, 1793) with Brissot, and went into hiding in Paris for eight months to save his life. He found shelter with a Madame Vernet. He then left the city, but was arrested at Clamart, near Bourg-la-Reine, and imprisoned. The next morning he was found dead, probably from poison. He contributed to the "Encyclopédie," and wrote "Esquisse d'un tableau historique des progrès de l'esprit humain" (1794), and various mathematical works.

Conduitt (kun'dit), John. Born at London, 1688; died there, May 23, 1737. An English financier and economist, the successor of Sir Isaac Newton as master of the mint (1727), and his nephew by marriage.

Conecte, or Connecte (ko-nekt'), Thomas. Burned at Rome, 1434. A French Carmelite monk, famous as a preacher of moral reforms among the clergy and laity. He was put to death on a charge of heresy.

Conestoga (kon-es-tō'gā). [Pl., also Conestogas; 'people of the forked root-poles.'] A tribe of North American Indians formerly living in Pennsylvania and Maryland, on the lower Susquehanna River and at the head of Chesapeake Bay. In 1675 they held land on the eastern bank of the Potomac River in Maryland. They were close allies of the Dutch and Swedes, but less constant to the English of Maryland. The Iroquois, warring continuously with them, pressed them about 1675 against the tribes to the south and west, and involved them in war with Maryland and Virginia, when they abandoned their country and fled to the Ranoke, but were forced to submit to the Iroquois and return to the Susquehanna. See Iroquoian.

Conewango Creek (kon-e-wong'gō krēk). A stream in western New York and Pennsylvania. It is the outlet of Chautauque Lake, and joins the Allegheny River at Warren, Pennsylvania.

Coney Island (kō'ni i'land). A seaside resort at the southwestern extremity of Long Island, 10 miles south of New York. It comprises the Manhattan, Brighton, and West End beaches, and has been developed since 1874.

Confederação do Equador (kōn-fe-de-rā-siā' dō ã-kwā-dōr'). [Pg., 'League of the Equator.'] The name given to a political league formed at Pernambuco, Brazil, in 1824, with the object of throwing off allegiance to the emperor, and establishing a republic. The revolt was proclaimed by Manuel de Carvalho Paes de Andrade and his associates on July 2, 1824. Rio Grande do Norte, Ceará, and Paraíba adhered to it, and Carvalho was made acting president. The revolutionists were conquered after some fighting in Oct., 1824.

Confédération Centro-Américana (kōn-fā-fē-rā-thē-ōn' then' trō-ñi-mā-rō-ki'niā). [Sp., 'Central-American Confederation.'] A political league formed at Chinandega, Nicaragua, July 27, 1842, by the delegates of Nicaragua, Honduras, and Salvador. It was the result of an attempt to reunite the states of the Central American Republic, which had lately been dissolved. The scheme was to form a confederation of the states, with an executive officer called a supreme delegate, assisted by a delegate from each state. The plan was rejected by Guatemala; and though the confederacy installed a government, it was so little regarded by the states that it never had any political effect. After a year or two it was discontinued. This abortive attempt is often called the "Pacto de Chinandega."

Confederacy, The. A comedy by Sir John Vanbrugh, produced Oct. 30, 1705. It is a play of contrivance and intrigue, and is said to be adapted from Dancourt's "Modish Citizens" ("Bourgeois à la mode").

Confederate States of America. A confederacy of eleven States which seceded from the United States in 1860 and 1861 and formed a government. The legislative power was vested in a senate of 26 members, 2 from each State (Kentucky and Missouri being represented), and a representative house of 106 members. Among the leading events in its history were the passage of ordinances of secession by South Carolina, Dec. 20, 1860; Mississippi, Jan. 9, 1861; Florida, Jan. 10; Alabama, Jan. 11; Georgia, Jan. 19; Louisiana, Jan. 26; Texas, Feb. 1; meeting of provisional congress, Montgomery, Alabama, Feb. 4; adoption of provisional constitution, Feb. 8; inauguration of provisional President Jefferson Davis and Vice-President Alexander H. Stephens, Feb. 18, 1861; adoption of a permanent constitution, March 11; bombardment and occupation of Fort Sumter, April 12-14; passage of secession ordinances by Virginia, April 17; Arkansas, May 7; Tennessee, May 6; passage of secession ordinances by North Carolina, May 20; removal of the capital to Richmond, July 20; election of Davis and Stephens as president and vice-president for six years, Nov. 6, 1861, and their inauguration Feb. 22, 1862; final adjournment of congress, March 18, 1865; occupation of Richmond by the Federals, April 3; surrender of Lee's army, April 9, 1865; surrender of Johnston's army, April 26, 1865. The eleven seceding States were readmitted to the Union from 1866 to 1870. Compare Civil War.

Confederation, Articles of. In United States history, the compact or constitution adopted by the Continental Congress in 1777, and ratified by the separate colonies within the next four years. The government formed under this compact, which went into effect on March 1, 1781, was without an executive and judiciary, consisting simply of a congress of one house, in which each State had one vote. It was empowered to declare war and peace, make treaties with foreign powers, direct the land and naval forces in time of war, make requisitions upon the separate States for their quota of the money necessary for national expenses, regulate the value of coin, control the postal service, etc. As it had no power to enforce its laws upon the States, it soon fell into contempt, and on March 4, 1789, expired by limitation under the provisions of the present Constitution.

Confession d'un Enfant du Siècle, La. [F., 'The Confession of a Child of the Century.'] A prose work by Alfred de Musset, published in 1836. In it he says he endeavors to show how he suffered for three years from the malady of the age—doubt, disillusion, skepticism, and debauchery—and to point out to others a way of escape.

Confessions of an English Opium-Eater. A partly autobiographical work by De Quincey, published in 1821.

Confessions of Saint Augustine, The. The memoirs of Saint Augustine, written by himself. They are divided into 13 books; the first 10 treat of the bad actions of his life, of his conversion, of the love of pleasure, of glory, and of science. The last 3 are an interpretation of the beginning of the book of Genesis.

Confessions, Les. An autobiographical work by Jean Jacques Rousseau. It is in 12 volumes, 6 of which were written at Wootton, England, 1766-67, and 6 at Dauphiné and at Triè, France, 1768-70. It was his intention that they should not be published till 1800, as the persons alluded to in them were living; but those in charge of the MS. published the first 6 volumes in 1781-1782. In 1788 a new edition appeared, containing the whole.

Confines, Audience of the. [Sp. Audiencia de los Confines.] The supreme Spanish court of Central America. It was established in 1542, and held its first sitting at Gracias à Dios in 1545; the seat was changed to Guatemala in 1549, transferred to Panama in 1564, and returned in 1570 to Guatemala, where it remained until the revolution. Its jurisdiction at first embraced Chiapas, Yucatan, all of Central America, and the isthmus; at the end of the 16th century the isthmian portion was transferred to the new audience of Panama. The Audience of the Confines frequently appointed temporary governors. It is often spoken of as the "Audience of Guatemala."

Confians-l'Archevêque (kōn-flōn'lārsh-vāk'). A village situated 3 miles southeast of Paris. Here, in 1465, Louis XI. signed a treaty making certain concessions to the leaders of the "League of the Public Good."

Confians (kōn-flōn'). Treaty of. A treaty concluded in Oct., 1465, between Louis XI. of France and the dukes of Bourbon, Brittany, and Burgundy, according to which Normandy was ceded to the Duke of Berry, and the "War of the Public Good" ended. It was confirmed by the treaty of Péronne, 1468.

Confucius (kon-fū'shius). [Latinized form of Chin. K'ung-fu-tzu (last syllable is also written -tse, -tze, etc.). 'Kung the philosopher.'] Born in the principality of Lu (the modern province of Shantung), China, 550 or 551 B. C.; died 478 B. C. A celebrated Chinese philosopher. He was descended from an illustrious but impoverished family, and in his youth was successively keeper of stores and superintendent of parks and herds to the chief of the district in which he lived. In his twenty-second year he became a teacher, and in his fifty-second was made chief magistrate of the city of Chung-tu. He was subsequently appointed minister of crime by the Marquis of Lu, but in his fifty-sixth year retired from office in consequence of the intrigues of a neighboring prince. After thirteen years of travel he returned in 483 to Lu, where he spent the rest of his life in completing his literary undertakings and in teaching. Among the numerous works attributed to him, the most notable are the "Chun-Tsew" and the "Four Books."

Congare (kong-gā-ré'). A river in South Carolina, formed by the junction of the Broad and Saluda rivers at Columbia. It unites with the Wateree to form the Santee. Length, about 50 miles.

Congleton (kong-gl-ton). A municipal borough in Cheshire, England, situated on the river Dane 21 miles south of Manchester. Its leading industry is the manufacture of silk. Population (1891), 10,744.

Congreve (kong-grēv), Richard. Born at Leamington, England, Sept. 4, 1818. An English essayist and philosophical writer.

Congreve, William. Born at Bardsey, near Leeds, England, 1670 (baptized Feb. 10); died at London, Jan. 19, 1729. An English dramatist, one of the greatest writers of comedy.

Soon after his birth his parents removed to Ireland, where his father became commander of the garrison at Yonghal and also agent of the Earl of Cork. He was educated at a school in Kilkenny (where Swift was one of his school-fellows) and at Trinity College, Dublin. After a brief period devoted to the study of law, he applied himself chiefly to literature until about 1700, but after this year wrote little or nothing. He filled several unimportant offices—that of commissioner for licensing hackney-coaches, from July, 1695, to Oct., 1707; that of commissioner of wine licenses from Dec., 1705, to Dec., 1714; and that of secretary for Jamaica from 1714. His plays include "The Old Bachelor" (acted Jan., 1693), "The Double Dealer" (Nov., 1693), "Love for Love" (April, 1695), "The Mourning Bride" (1697), and "The Way of the World" (1700). Besides his plays he wrote a novel (his first literary work) entitled "Incognita, or Love and Duty reconciled"; a reply to Jeremy Collier's attack upon him in his work on the immorality of the stage, called "Amendments of Mr. Collier's False and Imperfect Citations"; and a few prologues and unimportant operas. The first collected edition of his works was published by him in 1710. He is celebrated especially for the brilliancy of his style and the wit and vigor of his dialogues. His work is marred by the almost total absence of fine moral feeling, as well as by the coarseness common in his day.

Congreve, Sir William. Born at Woolwich, England, May 20, 1772; died at Toulon, France, May 16, 1828. An English engineer, best known as the inventor of the Congreve rocket. He was appointed, April, 1814, comptroller of the royal laboratory at Woolwich, in which office he succeeded his father, Lieutenant-General Sir William Congreve. He published a number of works on economical and technological topics.

Coni. See Cunco.

Conibos (kō-nē'bōs). A tribe of Indians in eastern Peru, inhabiting a region on the middle course of the river Ucayale. They are allied to the Panos, Sipibos, and other tribes of the Ucayale. Formerly the Conibos occupied a large portion of the Pampas del Sacramento. They were agriculturists, and had fixed villages. The Spanish missionaries visited them as early as 1683, but their influence was long resisted. In 1695 Indians of this tribe killed Father Richter, and later the missionaries were driven out altogether. The Conibos are now partially civilized, and are often employed as canoe-men and rubber-gatherers. They are the most numerous of the Ucayale tribes. Also formerly called Manaos. See Panos.

Coningsburgh, Thane of. See Athelstane.

Coningsby (kōn'ingz-bi). A political novel by Benjamin Disraeli, published in 1844.

Conington (kō'ning-ton), John. Born at Boston, England, Aug. 10, 1825; died there, Oct. 23, 1869. An English classical scholar, a graduate of Oxford, where he became, in 1854, professor of the Latin language and literature. He published an edition and translation of the "Agamemnon" of Æschylus (1848), an edition of the "Choephori" of Æschylus (1857), a translation, in verse, of the "Odes of Horace" (1863), a translation in ballad meter of Vergil's "Æneid" (1866), an edition of Vergil, etc.

Conistone (kōn'is-ton) Lake. A lake in Lancashire, England, one of the system of the English lake district, 6 miles southwest of Ambleside. Length, 5½ miles.

Coniston Old Man. A mountain near the head of Coniston Lake. Height, 2,575 feet.

Conkling (kongk'ling), Roscoe. Born at Albany, N. Y., Oct. 30, 1829; died at New York, April 18, 1888. An American politician. He was member of Congress (Republican) from New York 1859-63 and 1865-67, and was United States senator from New York 1867-81, when he resigned in consequence of a dispute with President Garfield concerning the Federal patronage in the State of New York, which he and his colleague, Thomas C. Platt, claimed the right to control. The President having appointed William H. Robertson, an opponent of Conkling, to the collectorship of the port of New York, the latter opposed the confirmation of the appointment by the Senate, on the ground that he and his colleague had not been consulted by the President as to the disposition of the collectorship. On the confirmation of the appointment, both he and his colleague resigned their seats with a view to administering a rebuke to the President by securing a prompt reelection, but were defeated by Warner Miller and Elbridge G. Lapham.

Conn. The Shaughraun in Dion Boucicault's play of that name: a gay, careless good-for-nothing.

Conn (kon), Lough. A lake in County Mayo, Ireland.

Connacht (kon'át). [Fr. Connacht.] The westernmost province of Ireland, lying between the Atlantic Ocean on the north and west, Ulster and Leinster on the east, and Munster on the south. It comprises the counties Galway, Mayo, Sligo, Roscommon, and Leitrim. It ceased to be a kingdom and was divided into counties in 1500. Population (1891), 724,774.

Connecticut (kon-net'i-kut). A State in New England, and one of the 13 original States of the American Union, lying between Massachusetts on the north, Rhode Island on the east, Long Island Sound on the south, and New York on the west. It is divided into 8 counties, and has 4 representatives, 2 senators, and 6 electoral votes. Its surface is hilly. Its chief rivers are the Thames, Connecticut, and Housatonic, the valley of the Connecticut being its most fertile region. Its chief agricultural products are cereals and tobacco, and its leading manufactures are hardware, firearms, silks, cotton and woolen goods, and clocks. The capital is Hartford. It was settled by the Dutch at Hartford in 1633, and by Massachusetts colonists in the Connecticut valley in 1635-36. Separate English colonies were formed at Saybrook between 1636 and 1644, and at New Haven in 1635. Charles II. granted a charter to the Connecticut and New Haven colonies in 1662, and their union was soon after completed. The present constitution was adopted in 1818. The Pequot war occurred in 1637. The State is often nicknamed the "Nutmeg State," from an alleged custom of its merchants of manufacturing nutmegs out of wood; also called the "Land of Steady Habits," from the stringency of the so-called "Blue Laws," which enjoined a rigid code of morals on its inhabitants. Area, 4,990 square miles. Population (1890), 746,255.

Connecticut River. [Ind. Quonkucuat, long river.] A river of New England, which rises in northern New Hampshire, separates Vermont from New Hampshire, flows through Massachusetts and Connecticut, and empties into Long Island Sound at Saybrook, in lat. 41° 16' N., long. 72° 21' W. On it are situated Northampton, Holyoke, Springfield, Hartford, and Middletown. Length, about 500 miles; navigable for small vessels to Hartford.

Conrad (kon'rad) I. [ML. Conradus, from OHG. Kuonrat, Chunrat, It. Conrado, Corrado, Sp. Conrado, G. Konrad, AS. Cenréd: 'bold in counsel.'] Died Dec. 23, 918. King of Germany 911-918. On the extinction of the Carolingian house in Germany with the death of Louis the Child in 911, the election fell upon Conrad, duke of Franconia. During his reign the country was invaded by the Danes, Slavs, and Magyars, and he was constantly at war with his own subjects in a vain endeavor to enforce the recognition of his sovereignty, especially from Henry, duke of Saxony, son of Otto the Illustrious.

Conrad II. Died at Utrecht, June 4, 1039. King of Germany 1024-39, and Roman emperor, called "The Sallian": founder of the Franco-German or Sallian dynasty. He marched into Italy 1024, brought the rebellious cities of Pavia and Ravenna to submission, and was crowned emperor at Rome 1027. He put down a rebellion of his stepson Ernst, duke of Swabia, 1025-30, made an incursion into Hungary 1030, regained Lusatia from the Poles 1031, and made himself master of Burgundy (i. e., the kingdom of Arles) 1033-34. He marched into Italy a second time 1036, but was compelled by the successful opposition of Milan to acknowledge by the constitution of May 28, 1037, the hereditary character of all Italian fiefs, whether held immediately of the crown or not.

Conrad III. Born 1093; died at Bamberg, Germany, Feb. 15, 1152. King of Germany 1138-52, founder of the Hohenstaufen dynasty. He was elected in an irregular manner by the party opposed to the house of Saxony, which gave rise to a war with the rival candidate Henry the Proud, duke of Saxony and Bavaria. The war was continued after Henry's death (1139) by his brother Welf VI., whence arose the party names of the Ghibellines (Italian corruption of the name of the Hohenstaufen castle Waiblingen) and the Welfs or Guelphs. Conrad defeated Welf at Weinsberg in 1140, and took part (1147-49) in the second Crusade.

Conrad IV. Born at Andria, Italy, April 25 (or 27), 1228; died at Lavello, Italy, May 21, 1254. King of Germany, second son of Frederick II., whom he succeeded in 1250. The imperial crown was contested by William, count of Holland, who maintained himself by the aid of the Guelphs. In 1251 Conrad undertook an expedition into Italy to enforce his right of succession to the crown of the Two Sicilies. He is said to have died of poison, leaving his infant son Conradin as the last heir of his race. The throne was occupied as regent by his illegitimate brother Manfred. See Manfred.

Conrad (kon'räd), Karl Emanuel. Born at Berlin, March 30, 1810; died at Cologne, July 12, 1873. A German architectural painter and aquarrellist. His chief work is the "Cathedral of Cologne" (in the Vatican).

Conrad, Marquis of (Tyre and ?) Montferrat. Died at Tyre, April 28, 1192. A famous Crusader. He successfully defended Tyre against Saladin in 1187; married Isabella, a younger daughter of Amalric I. of Jerusalem, in 1190; and at the time of his death by the hand of an assassin had just been elected king of Jerusalem.

Conrad (kon'rad), Robert Taylor. Born at Philadelphia, June 10, 1810; died at Philadelphia, June 27, 1858. An American jurist and dramatist. He published the tragedy of "Aylmer" in 1852.

Conrad, Timothy Abbott. Born in New Jersey, 1803; died at Trenton, N. J., Aug. 8, 1877. An American paleontologist. He was paleontologist of the New York Geological Survey 1838-41. His works include "Fossil Shells of the Tertiary Formations of North America" (1832), "Paleontology of the State of New York" (1838-40).

Conrade (kon'rad). A follower of Don John in Shakspeare's "Much Ado about Nothing": the bastard brother of Don Pedro.

Conradin (kon'rä-dén) (Conrad V.). Born near Landshut, Germany, March 25, 1252; beheaded at Naples, Oct. 29, 1268. Duke of Swabia, son of Conrad IV., and last of the Hohenstaufen. In 1268 he failed in an attempt to recover the Two Sicilies from the usurper Charles of Anjou; was captured at Tagliacozzo; and was executed.

Conrart (kōn-rär'), Valentin. Born at Paris, 1603; died Sept. 23, 1675. A French littérateur, one of the founders of the French Academy, of which he was secretary 1634-75.

A German physician, scholar, writer on jurisprudence, and miscellaneous author. He became professor of natural philosophy at Helmstedt 1632, of medicine 1636, and later of politics. In 1660 he became privy councillor of the Duke of Brunswick. He was (1658) private physician of Charles X. Gustavus of Sweden. He wrote "De origine juris Germanici" (1643), "Exercitationes de republica Germanica" (1675), etc.

Consalvi (kon-säl'vō), Ercole. Born at Rome, June 8, 1757; died at Rome, Jan. 24, 1824. A Roman cardinal and statesman. He was secretary of state to Pius VII. 1800-06 and 1814-23, and concluded a concordat with Napoleon in 1801.

Conscience (kōn-syōns'), Hendrik. Born at Antwerp, Dec. 3, 1812; died at Brussels, Sept. 10, 1883. A Flemish novelist. He was first a teacher, then entered the army as a volunteer. In 1845 he became professor at the University of Ghent, and in 1868 custodian of the Wiertz Museum in Brussels. In 1837 appeared his first novel (the first, also, in modern Flemish), "In't Wonderjaar 1566" ("In the Year of Marvels 1566"). It was followed, the same year, by "Phantazy," a volume of short stories, and in 1838 by the novel "De leeuw van Vlaanderen" ("The Lion of Flanders"). In 1841 he was made secretary of the Academy of Arts at Antwerp, which position he held until 1854. In 1857 he became a civil official in Courmayeur. His most celebrated works are stories of Flemish life. Among them are "Hoe men schilder wordt" ("How one becomes a Painter," 1843), "De arme edelman" ("The Poor Nobleman," 1851), "Het geluk van ryk te zyn" ("The good Fortune to be Rich," 1855). More recent are, among others, "De burgemeester van Luik" ("The Burgomaster of Liège"), "De jonge Dokter" ("The Young Doctor"), "Benjamin van Vlaanderen," the last from 1880.

Conscience Whigs. A faction of the Whig party in Massachusetts who were opposed to the Cotton Whigs on the slavery question, about 1850.

Conscious Lovers, The. A comedy by Steele, produced in 1722. It was taken from Terence's "Andria." In this play Steele attempted to free the stage from its indecencies.

Consensus Genevensis (kon-sen'sus jen-ē-ven'sis). A confession of faith, drawn up by Calvin, which was dedicated by the pastors of Geneva to the syndics and council of the city, Jan. 1, 1552. It was occasioned by Calvin's dispute with Bolsee, who denied the doctrine of reprobation, and was designed to unite the Swiss churches on the subject of predestination, but failed to acquire symbolical authority outside Geneva.

Consensus Tigurinus (kon-sen'sus tig-ū-rī-nus). A confession of faith drawn up in 1549 at Zurich (L. Tigurium) by Calvin, in concert with Bullinger and the pastors of Zurich, for the purpose of uniting the Swiss churches on the doctrine of the Lord's Supper. It was published in 1551, and was adopted by all the Reformed cantons except Bern.

Conservative Club, The. A London political club established in 1840. The number of members is 1,200.

Conservative Party, The. See Tories.

Considérant (kōn-sē-dā-roñ'), Victor. Born Oct. 12, 1808; died Dec. 27, 1893. A French socialist, a disciple of Fourier. He was accused of high treason in 1849, and fled to Belgium; from there he went to Texas, where (after returning once to Brussels) he sought to establish a socialistic society near San Antonio. He returned to France in 1860. His works include "La destinée sociale" (1834-38), etc.

Consolato del Mare (kon-sō-lä'tō del mä're). [It., lit. 'consulate of the sea.'] A code of maritime law, supposed to be a compilation of the law and trading customs of various Italian cities, as Venice, Genoa, Pisa, and Amalfi, together with those of the cities with which they traded, as Barcelona, Marseilles, etc. Its precise date is unknown, but a Spanish edition of it was published at Barcelona at the end of the 13th or the beginning of the 14th century. It has formed the basis of most of the subsequent compilations of maritime law.

Constable (kun'stā-bl), Archibald. Born at Carnbee, Fifeshire, Scotland, Feb. 24, 1774; died at Edinburgh, July 21, 1827. A noted Scottish publisher, founder of the "Edinburgh Review" (1802), and publisher of most of the works of Sir Walter Scott from 1805 until he became bankrupt in 1826. The failure of Constable and Co., with that of James Ballantyne and Co., printers, involved Scott in a loss of £120,000. He edited the "Chronicle of Fife, being the Diary of John Lamont of Newton from 1649 to 1672" (1810), and wrote a "Memoir of George Heriot."

Constable, Henry. Born at Newark, England, 1562; died at Liège, Belgium, Oct. 9, 1613. An English poet, son of Sir Robert Constable of Newark. He was graduated at Cambridge (St. John's College) in 1580; became a Roman Catholic; and for the greater part of his later life resided in Paris occupied with political affairs, and especially with schemes for promoting the interests of Catholicism. In 1603 he came to London, and was for a short time confined in the Tower. He published in 1592 a collection of 23 sonnets entitled "Diana: the Praises of his Mistress in certaine sweete Sonnets by H. C."

Constable, John. Born at East Bergholt, in Suffolk, England, June 11, 1776; died at London, March 30, 1837. A noted English landscape-painter. His father was a miller. In 1799 he became a student at the Royal Academy; in 1802 exhibited his first picture; in 1819 became an associate of the Royal Academy; and in 1829 became a royal academician. He was thoroughly English; no foreign master influenced him, and rustic life furnished his inspiration and material. He obtained little recognition in his own country during his lifetime, but was highly appreciated in France, where his work produced a notable effect.

Constance (kon'stans). [ME. Custance, OF. Custance, F. Constance, Sp. Costanza, Costanza, Pg. Constancia, It. Costanza, G. Constantia, L. Constantia, lit. 'constancy.'] 1. In Chaucer's "Man of Law's Tale," the unjustly accused daughter of the Roman emperor. She is cleared and married to King Alla.—2. In Shakspere's "King John," the mother of Arthur, duke of Bretagne.—3. The Northern Lass, in Broome's play of that name.—4. The daughter of None-such, in love with Loveby, in Dryden's play "The Wild Gallant."—5. The daughter of Fondlove in Sheridan Knowles's comedy "The Love Chase." Her love-affair with Wildrake is not unlike that of Benedick and Beatrice.—6. The daughter of the Provost of Bruges, in G. W. Lovell's play of that name. She goes mad and dies when legally proved to be a serf.

Constance, or Custance, Dame Christian. A rich and beautiful widow in Udall's play "Ralph Roister Doister."

Constance de Beverley. See Beverley.

Constance. The southeastermost district of Baden. Area, 1,609 square miles. Population (1890), 281,770.

Constance, G. Konstanz (kon'stants), sometimes Kostnitz (kost'nits). A city of Baden, situated on Lake Constance, at its outlet into the Unterseer arm, in lat. 47° 38' N., long. 9° 11' E. It is noted for its cathedral and its merchants' hall (Kaufhaus). The cathedral was founded in the 11th, but rebuilt early in the 16th century. The conspicuous tower and spire are modern. The doors of the chief entrance bear remarkable carvings of the life of Christ in 20 oaken panels dating from 1470. The richly sculptured stalls are of the same date. There are other interesting sculptures, and a handsome fragment of the cloister. In the 6th century Constance became the seat of a bishopric, which was suppressed in 1802. It was an imperial city in the middle ages, but was annexed to Austria about 1543, and was ceded to Baden in 1805. Here Huss (1415) and Jerome of Prague (1416) died at the stake. Population (1890), commune, 16,235.

Constance, Council of. An important council of the Roman Catholic Church, held 1414-18. Its objects were the healing of the papal schism, the suppression of the Bohemian heresy, and the reformation of the church. It condemned to death Huss in 1415, and Jerome of Prague in 1416, and elected Martin V. as pope in 1417.

Constance, Treaty of. A treaty of peace concluded between Frederick Barbarossa and the Lombard League in 1183, at the expiration of the truce established after the defeat of the emperor at Legnano in 1176. Frederick renounced all the regal rights which he claimed in the cities of the League, including those of levying war, erecting fortifications, and administering civil and criminal justice. The cities acknowledged the overlordship of the emperor, which carried with it the obligation to furnish the customary tributes of provision during his residence in Italy, to suffer the chief magistrates in every city to receive the investiture of office from an imperial legate, and to accept in every city an imperial judge of appeal in civil causes.

Constance, Lake of, G. Bodensee (bō'den-zā). A lake lying between Switzerland, Baden, Württemberg, Bavaria, and Vorarlberg; the Latin Brigantinus Lacus. The northwestern narrow arm is frequently known as the Überlingersee; the western arm is called the Unterseer or Zellersee. It is traversed by the Rhine. Length, 40 miles; greatest breadth, 6-8 miles. Area, 208 square miles. Elevation above sea-level, 1,305 feet. Depth, 960 feet.

Constancio (kôn-stôn'sē-ō), Francisco Solano. Born at Lisbon, 1777; died at Paris, Dec. 21, 1846. A Portuguese physician and author. He traveled extensively in Europe and North America; was diplomatic agent of Portugal in Paris 1820; and was minister to Washington 1822-29. Subsequently he resided in Paris. Constancio's works are now little esteemed. The best-known are his "Novo dicionario critico e etymologico da lingua Portuguesa" (1836 and 1844) and "Historia do Brasil" (2 vols. 1839).

Constans (kon'stanz) I., Flavius Julius. Born about 320; died near Illiberis (Huelva), Gaul, 350. Roman emperor, youngest of the three sons of Constantine the Great and Fausta. He received, in the division of the empire in 337, Italy, Africa, and western Illyricum. In 340, having successfully resisted the invasion of his brother Constantine, who fell in battle, he made himself master of the whole West. In 350 Magnentius usurped the throne, and Constans was slain by his emissaries.

Constans II., Flavius Heraclius (originally Heraclius). Born Nov. 7, 630; killed at Syracuse, July 15, 668. Emperor of the East 641-668, son of Constantine III. In his reign the Saracens conquered Rhodes, and the Lombards most of the Byzantine dominions in northern Italy. He favored the Monothelites, and, in order to put an end to the controversy between them and the orthodox, issued an edict which forbade all religious discussion.

Constans. The grandfather of King Arthur, celebrated in the Arthurian romances.

Constant (kon'stant). The lover of Lady Brute in Vanbrugh's comedy "The Provoked Wife."

Constant (kôn-ston'), Jean Joseph Benjamin. Born at Paris, June 10, 1845. A French painter. He studied under Cabanel at the École des Beaux Arts, and in 1869 exhibited his first picture, "Hamlet et le Roi," at the Salon. He has since exhibited "Trop tard" (1870), "Samson et Delilah" (1872), "Bouchers maures à Tanger" (1873), "Carrefour à Tanger" (1874), "Mohamed II., le 29 Mai, 1453" (1878), "Favorite de l'émir" (1879), "La vengeance du chérif" (1885), "Victrix" (1890), etc.

Constant de Rebecque, Henri Benjamin. Born at Lausanne, Switzerland, Oct. 25, 1767; died at Paris, Dec. 8, 1830. A French political writer, orator, and politician. He settled in 1795 at Paris as the protégé of Madame de Staël, and was a member of the Tribunal 1799-1802, when he was banished by Napoleon Bonaparte. He returned in 1814, but accepted office under Napoleon during the Hundred Days, with the result that on the return of the Bourbons he was again compelled to go into exile, whence he returned in 1816. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies 1819-30. His chief works are "Cours de politique constitutionnelle" (1818-20) and "De la religion considérée dans sa source, sa forme et son développement" (1823-25).

Constantina (kon-stân-tē'nā). A town in the province of Seville, Spain. Population (1887), 11,953.

Constantine (kon'stan-tin) I. (Flavius Valerius Aurelius Constantinus), surnamed "The Great." Born probably at Naissus (Nissa), Upper Moesia, in Feb., 272 A. D.; died at Nicomedia, Bithynia, May 22, 337. Roman emperor. He was the eldest son of the Augustus Constantius Chlorus by his first wife Helena, and was appointed cesar at the death of his father in 306. About 308 he was recognized as Augustus by the Augustus Maximian, whose daughter Fausta he married (his first wife having died). In 310 (309?) he put to death Maximian, who was implicated in a plot to excite a rebellion among his subjects. He defeated in 312, near Rome, the Augustus Maxentius, who was killed in the pursuit. Before this battle, according to tradition, the sign of a cross appeared in the heavens, with the inscription, "In hoc signo vinces," which induced him to adopt the labarum as his standard. In 323 he became sole Augustus by a decisive victory at Chrysopolis (Scutari) over his colleague Licinius, who subsequently surrendered and was treacherously murdered. He caused Christianity to be recognized by the state, convened the Council of Nice in 325, and in 330 inaugurated Constantinople as the capital of the Roman Empire. In 324 he put to death his eldest son Crispus for high treason. According to tradition, which appears to be without historical foundation, Crispus was the victim of an intrigue on the part of his stepmother Fausta, who was suffocated in a bath as soon as Constantine discovered the innocence of Crispus.

Constantine II. (Flavius Claudius Constantinus). Born at Arles, Gaul, Aug. 7, 312; killed near Aquileia, Italy, 340. Emperor of Rome, second son of Constantine the Great. He received, in the division of the empire in 337 between the three sons of Constantine, Gaul, Britain, Spain, and part of Africa. Being dissatisfied with his share, he invaded the dominions of his brother Constans, but was defeated and killed at Aquileia in 340.

Constantine IV. (Flavius Constantinus), surnamed Pogonatus ('the Bearded'). Died 685. Emperor of the East 668-685, son of Constans II. He repulsed (by means of the recently invented Greek fire) the Saracens before Constantinople 672-673, and assembled in 680 the sixth general council at Constantinople, by which the Monothelites were condemned and peace restored to the church.

Constantine V., surnamed Copronymus (kō-pron'i-mus). Born at Constantinople, 719; died off Selymbria, Thrace, Sept. 14, 775. Emperor of the East 741-775, son of Leo III. He defeated in 743 Artavasdes, who had usurped the government, and assembled a council in 754 which condemned the worship of images.

Constantine VI. (Flavius Constantinus). Born 771; killed at Constantinople about 797. Byzantine emperor 780-797, the last of the Isaurian emperors. He was the son of Leo IV., whom he succeeded under the regency of his mother Irene. During his reign a council held at Nicaea in 787 restored the worship of images. He was put to death by order of his mother, who usurped the government.

Constantine VII., surnamed Porphyrogenitus (pōr'f-i-ro-jen'i-tus) ('born in the purple'). Born 905; poisoned Nov. 15, 959. Byzantine emperor, son of Leo VI. whom he succeeded 911. The government was usurped in 919 by Romanus Lecapenus, who administered it—Constantine being nominally his colleague—till 944, when he was deposed by his own son, and Constantine became sole ruler. He was noted for humanity and for his success in arms, chiefly against the Arabs in Syria. He was poisoned by his son and successor, Romanus II. He was a liberal patron of learning, and himself holds a high rank in literature as the author of a treatise on the government and one on the themes or provinces of the empire ("De administrando imperio" and "De thematibus"), and other works.

Constantine XIII. Palæologus. [Gr. ὁ Παλαιολόγος.] Born 1394; died May 29, 1453. Byzantine emperor 1448-53, the last emperor of Constantinople. He was killed at the taking of the city by Mohammed II.

Constantine I. Died 879. A king of Scotland (north of the Forth and Clyde), reigning at Seone after 863.

Constantine II. Died 952. A king of Scotland (north of the Forth and Clyde) from 900 to 943, when he resigned the throne to Malcolm, grandson of Constantine I.

Constantine Nikolayevitch (son of Nicholas). Born at St. Petersburg, Sept. 21, 1827; died Jan. 24, 1892. Grand Duke of Russia, younger brother of the czar Alexander II. He commanded the fleet in the Baltic 1854-55, and was governor of Poland 1862-63.

Constantine Pavlovitch (son of Paul). Born at St. Petersburg, May 8, 1779; died at Vitebsk, Russia, June 27, 1831. A grand duke of Russia, younger brother of the czar Alexander I. He served with distinction under Suvaroff in Italy in 1799, was present at the battle of Austerlitz 1805, accompanied Alexander I. in the campaigns of 1812-14, and was appointed commander-in-chief in Poland in 1815. He married in 1829 a Polish lady, the Countess Johanna Grudzińska, having obtained a divorce from his first wife, the Princess Juliana of Saxe-Coburg; and renounced his right of succession to the Russian throne Jan. 26, 1822. His strict military rule provoked an insurrection in Poland (Nov. 29, 1830). In the war which followed he played a subordinate part, and retired to Vitebsk, where he died of cholera.

Constantine (kôn-stôn-tē'n'). The easternmost department of Algeria, lying between the Mediterranean on the north, Tunis on the east, and Algiers on the west. Area, 73,929 square miles. Population (1891), 1,714,539.

Constantine. The capital of the department of Constantine, Algeria, situated in lat. 36° 21' N., long. 6° 35' E.; the ancient Cirta. The seaport for its foreign trade is Philippeville. Constantine is a great trading center, especially for grain. It was rebuilt by Constantine, and was captured by the French 1837. Population (1891), commune, 40,581.

Constantinople (kon-stan-ti-nō'pl), Turk. Stambul (stām-bōl'), or Istanbul (is-tām-bōl'). [Gr. Κωνσταντινούπολις, city of Constantine; Turk. Constantinich; the ordinary Turkish name is Stambul or Istanbul, a corruption of the Greek εἰς τὴν πόλιν, 'into the city.'] The capital of the Ottoman empire, situated in European Turkey in lat. 41° N., long. 28° 59' E., on the Bosphorus, the Golden Horn, and the Sea of Marmora. It is the chief commercial center of the Levant, and since 1855 has had railroad connection with the rest of Europe. It contains the sultan's palace (seraglio), and is noted for its mosques (see below). Its chief sections are Pera, Galata, Stambul (or Constantinople proper), and Scutari (the latter celebrated in history for its military hospitals during the Crimean war). In 330 A. D. Constantine the Great made Byzantium (see Byzantium) the capital of the Roman Empire, and the city was henceforth called Constantinople. From 395 Constantinople was the capital of the Byzantine (Eastern) Empire. It was repeatedly besieged by the Saracens; and was taken by the Latins in 1203 and 1204, by Michael Palæologus in 1261, and by the Turks May 29, 1453. Teheragan Serai, the chief of the imperial palaces, finished in 1867 by Abdul-Aziz in the style of the new Turkish Renaissance. It is a building of great size, of marble, of a luxury and magnificence in its interior decoration and arrangement which are unexcelled in Europe, and almost surpass belief. Its chief façade, about 2,400 feet long, is mirrored in the Bosphorus. See also Bajazet Mosque of Irene, Church of St.; Reservoir of the 1,001 Columns; Sophia, Church of Santa; Suleiman, Mosque of. Population (1885), 573,565 with suburbs, upward of 1,000,000.

The dominion of the Old Rome had come of itself; its dominion was the effect, not of any settled plan, but of the silent working of historical causes. The first chief who fenced in the Palatine with a wall did not dream that his hill-fortress would become the head of the world. He did not dream that it would become the head of Italy, or even the head of Latium. But the prince who fenced in the New Rome, the prince who bade Byzantium grow into Constantinople, did design that his younger Rome should fulfil the mission that had passed away from the elder Rome. He designed that it should fulfil it more thoroughly than Milan, or Trier, or Nikomedeia could fulfil it. And his will has been carried out. He called into being a city which, while other cities have risen and fallen, has for fifteen hundred years, in whatever hands, remained the seat of Imperial rule; a city which, as long as Europe and Asia, as long as land and sea, keep their places, must remain the seat of Imperial rule. The other capitals of Europe seem by her side things of yesterday, creations of accident. Some chance a few centuries back made them seats of government till some other chance may cease to make them seats of government. But the city of Constantine abides, and must abide. Over and over again has the possession of that city prolonged the duration of powers which must otherwise have crumbled away. In the hands of Roman,

Frank, Greek, and Turk, her Imperial mission has never left her. The eternity of the elder Rome is the eternity of a moral influence; the eternity of the younger Rome is the eternity of a city and fortress fixed on a spot which nature itself had destined to be the seat of the empire of two worlds. Freeman, Hist. Essays, III. 251.

Constantinople, Conference of. A conference of the six great powers and Turkey for the purpose of preventing war between Turkey and Russia, which was championing the cause of the Christian insurgents in the Balkan Peninsula. The conference was formally opened Dec. 23, 1876, after a preliminary conference between the great powers (Dec. 11-21). The powers demanded of the Porte administrative autonomy under Christian governors for Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Bulgaria; and proposed the erection of an international commission with power to enforce by arms the decisions of the conference. These demands were rejected by the Turks Jan. 18, 1877, whereupon the conference dissolved, Jan. 20.

Constantinople, Councils of. These councils include: (a) The second ecumenical council, convened here by the emperor Theodosius 381 A. D. Its chief object was the settlement of the Arian difficulties. (b) The fifth ecumenical council, convened by Justinian 553. Its object was the condemnation of the "three chapters." (c) The sixth ecumenical council, held 680-681. Its object was the condemnation of the Monothelites. (d) The eighth ecumenical council, held 869. Its object was the condemnation of Photius.

Constantius (kon-stan'shius) I., Flavius Valerius, surnamed Chlorus ('the Pale'). Born probably 250 A. D.; died at York, England, July 25, 306. Emperor of Rome, father of Constantine the Great. March 1, 292, the joint emperors, or Augusti, Diocletian and Maximian associated with themselves Constantius Chlorus and Galerius as junior partners under the title of Cæsars. Gaul, Spain, and Britain were allotted to the former, who was required to repudiate his wife Helena and marry Theodora, the daughter of Maximian. After the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian in 305, he ruled as Augustus, or joint emperor, with Galerius until his death in Britain while on an expedition against the Picts.

Constantius II., Flavius Julius. Born at Sirmium, Pannonia, Aug. 6, 317; died at Mopsocrene, Cilicia, Nov. 3, 361. Roman emperor, third son of Constantine the Great (second son by his second wife Fausta). The will of Constantine the Great divided the empire among his three sons Constantine, Constantius, and Constans under the title of Augusti, and his nephews Dalmatius and Hannibalianus under the titles of Cæsars and Nobilissimus, respectively. On the death of Constantine in 337 Constantius ordered, or permitted, the murder of Dalmatius and Hannibalianus, and the empire was redivided between himself and his brothers. Constantine received Gaul, Spain, Britain, and part of Africa; Constantius Thrace, Macedonia, Greece, the Asiatic provinces, and Egypt; and Constans Italy, western Illyricum, and the rest of Africa. In 340 Constans repelled an invasion of Constantine, who fell in battle, and made himself master of the West; but was himself deposed and slain in 350 by the usurper Magnentius. Constantius made war in 351 on the latter, whom he defeated at Mursa, on the Drave, in 351, and in Gaul in 353, after which he was master of the whole empire. He appointed his cousin Julian Cæsar and commander in Gaul 355, and visited Rome 357. He favored the Arians, and banished the orthodox bishops. He died while marching to attack Julian, who had been proclaimed emperor by his soldiers.

Constitution (kon-sti-tü'shon) (Old Ironsides). An American frigate of 1,576 tons and 44 guns rating (actual armament 32 long 24-pounders and 20 32-pounder carronades), built at Boston in 1797. The United States and President were sister ships of the same rating. Her first commander was Captain Isaac Hull. At the declaration of war, June 18, 1812, the Constitution was at Annapolis. July 17 she fell in with a squadron composed of Shannon (33 guns), Africa (61), Eolus (32), Belvidera (36), and Guerrière (38), commanded by Commodore Philip Vere Broke. Her escape from this fleet, in a chase which lasted three days in an almost dead calm, is considered one of the greatest feats of seamanship of the war. Aug. 19, 1812, in lat. 41° 41' N., long. 55° 48' W., she fought the Guerrière. The battle lasted from 5 to 7 P. M., when the Guerrière surrendered and was burned. The Constitution returned to Boston; Captain Hull resigned, and was succeeded by Captain Babbidge of the Constellation. She sailed from Boston Oct. 26, 1812, and Dec. 29 fell in with the frigate Java (38 guns), Captain Lambert, off the coast of Brazil in lat. 13° 6' S., long. 31° W. The battle lasted from 2 to 5 P. M., when the Java surrendered. Feb. 20, 1814, she fought and captured the Cyane and Levant (20 and 18 guns). Sept., 1830, it was proposed by the secretary of the navy to dismantle the ship and sell her. This excited much public indignation, which found expression in the poem "Old Ironsides," by Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Sept. 15, 1830. She was afterward used as a school-ship, and is now a receiving-ship at Portsmouth, N. H.

Contreras, Hernando de. Born in Spain about 1520; died on the Isthmus of Panama, May, 1550. Son of Rodrigo de Contreras, governor of Nicaragua. After his father's downfall, he and his brother, Pedro, conspired with a party of adventurers to seize Panama and Peru, which they claimed to have inherited from their grandfather, Pedrarias; Hernando was to be proclaimed king. They began by murdering the Bishop of Nicaragua, Valdivero; seized Panama April 20, 1550, and obtained a part of the royal treasure; but were defeated by an uprising of the citizens of Panama.

Contreras, Pedro Moya de. See Moya y Contreras.

Contreras, Rodrigo de. Born at Segovia about 1495; died, probably in Peru, after 1557. A Spanish cavalier who married the daughter of Pedrarias, and in 1531 was appointed governor of Nicaragua. He sent an expedition which explored Lake Nicaragua and its outlet, and reached Nombre de Dios by that route. There the men were seized by the governor, Robles, who tried to appropriate the region discovered, but was driven out. Subsequently Contreras got into disputes with the bishop and with the Audience of the Confines. Charges were made against him, and his encomiendas were confiscated (1549). After vainly seeking redress in Spain, he went to Peru.

Cook, James. Born at Marton, York-shire, Oct. 27, 1728; killed in Hawaii, Feb. 14, 1779. A celebrated English navigator, the son of a Yorkshire farm-laborer. He entered the navy as able seaman in 1755; was appointed master of the Mercury in 1759, and sailed for America, where he was occupied in surveying the channel of the St. Lawrence; and became marine surveyor of the coast of Newfoundland and Labrador in 1763. In May, 1768, he was appointed lieutenant and placed in command of the Endeavour which carried a party of scientists to Tahiti to observe the transit of Venus. During this voyage, which lasted from Aug. 25, 1768, to June 12, 1771, New Zealand was explored, and the east coast of Australia. Cook was raised to the rank of commander Aug., 1771, and on July 13, 1772, started with two ships, the Resolution (which he commanded) and the Adventure, on another voyage of exploration in the Pacific, which lasted (for the Resolution) until July 29, 1775, and during which an attempt was made to discover the reported great southern continent, and New Caledonia was discovered. On Aug. 9, 1775, he became captain, and on July 12, 1776, began his last voyage with the Resolution (which he again commanded), and the Discovery under Captain Charles Clerke. The object of the expedition was to discover a passage from the Pacific round the north of America. During his northward voyage the Sandwich Islands were rediscovered (1778), and shortly after his return to them (Jan., 1779) he was murdered by the natives in revenge for a flogging administered to one of them for thieving.

Cooper (kö'për or küp'ër), Anthony Ashley. Born at Wimborne St. Giles, Dorsetshire, July 22, 1621; died at Amsterdam, Jan. 21, 1683. A noted English statesman, son of Sir John Cooper of Roekborne, Hampshire, created Baron Ashley in 1661, and first earl of Shaftesbury and Baron Cooper of Pawlet in 1672. At first he supported the cause of Charles I., but in 1644 went over to the Parliamentary side, was appointed field-marshal with the command of a brigade of horse and foot Aug. 3, 1644, and took an active part in the struggle, capturing Corfe Castle, April, 1646. He was an adherent of Cromwell in the parliaments of 1653 and 1654, but soon broke with him and remained an active supporter of the Parliamentary cause, opposing Lambert and Fleetwood and aiding Monk. After the Restoration he continued to take a prominent part in political affairs. He was a member of the "Cabal," and became lord chancellor Nov. 17, 1672, but was dismissed from office Nov. 9, 1673. From that time he was the leader of the Parliamentary opposition to the court party, and a prominent supporter of the anti-Catholic agitation. He was arrested on a charge of high treason, and acquitted. Later he joined the Monmouth conspiracy, and fled the country. He was active in colonial affairs, and was one of the nine to whom Carolina was granted, March 24, 1663. It was at his suggestion that Locke drew up a constitution for that colony (1689).

Cordes (kord). A small town in the department of Tarn, France, 15 miles northwest of Albi. It has interesting medieval ramparts and buildings.

Cordière (kôr-dyâr'), La Belle. [F., 'The Beautiful Rope-maker.'] A surname of Louise Labé (see Labé), wife of one Perrin, a rope-maker.

Cordilleras (kôr-dil-yâ'râz). [Sp. Cordillera, a chain or ridge of mountains, formerly also a long, straight, elevated tract of land.] A name applied to various portions of the central mountain systems of America, as the Cordilleras of Mexico, of Central America, of the United States (Rocky Mountains), and of South America (Andes). It was first given to the ranges of the Andes ("las Cordilleras de los Andes," the chains of the Andes) then to the continuation of these ranges into Mexico and farther north. For convenience, it is now agreed among physical geographers to call the complex of ranges embraced between and including the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra Nevada, and their extension north into British Columbia, the Cordilleras; those ranges occupying a similar continental position in South America are called simply the Andes. The entire western mountain side of the continent of North America is called the Cordilleran region. In its broadest part it has a development of a thousand miles east and west, and embraces, besides the Rocky Mountains and the Sierra, a large number of subordinate mountain-chains, some of which are little, if at all, inferior to such chains as the Pyrenees in length and elevation.

In course of time it became apparent that the two "parallel Cordilleras," which according to geographers are the great feature of the country, do not exist. The axis of the Andes of Ecuador, part of the backbone of South America, runs nearly north and south; and towards the western edge of the main chain there is a sequence of peaks more or less in a line with each other. On the east of these summits there is a succession of basins, of different dimensions and at various elevations, and the nearest mountains on the eastern side occur at irregular distances. There is no such thing as one great valley in the interior of Ecuador. The mountains Pascocha and Ruminahui are the only two which parallel to the others on the western side. The main chain of the Andes was created by upheaval at some remote date, but no one can say when this movement occurred, or whether it was an affair of a year or was spread over thousands of years. All of the Great Andes of the Equator rise out of, or upon and above, the main chain.

Córdoba (kôr'dô-bâ). 1. A province in the Argentine Republic, situated about lat. 29° 30'-35° S., long. 62°-66° W. Area, 60,000 square miles. Population, 350,000.—2. The capital of the above province, situated on the Primero in lat. 31° 24' S., long. 64° 13' 26' W. (observatory). It is an important commercial center, and the seat of a university and national observatory. Population (1887), 35,771.

3. A town in the state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, 55 miles west of Vera Cruz. Population, 6,000.

Córdoba, or Cordova, Francisco Hernandez (or Fernandez) de. Date of birth unknown; died at Santo Espíritu, Cuba, May or June, 1517. A Spanish soldier and explorer. He went to Cuba with Velasquez in 1511, acquired wealth there, and in Feb., 1517, commanded an expedition of 3 vessels with 110 men, fitted out as a private speculation. Sailing westward, he discovered Yucatan, followed the coast around to beyond Campeche, and noticed many signs of a higher civilization than had before been found in America. At Champotan Córdoba was severely wounded in a fight with the Indians. He crossed over to Florida, thence returned to Cuba, and died of his wounds shortly after.

Cordova (kôr'dô-vâ), officially Córdoba (kôr'dô-bâ). [F. Cordoue.] 1. The capital of the province of Cordova, Spain, situated on the Guadalquivir in lat. 37° 52' N., long. 4° 50' W.; the Punic Karta-tuba, and the Roman Corduba or Patricia. It is famous for its manufactures of leather and of silverware. It contains many Moorish antiquities, and is celebrated for its cathedral. (See below.) It was rebuilt after its partial destruction by Caesar, and colonized. It was the birthplace of Seneca, Lucan, and Averroes, and from 756 to 1031 was the capital of the western califate. It was the most famous center of learning and literature in western Europe in the middle ages, and had about 1,000,000 inhabitants. It was taken by Ferdinand III. of Castile in 1236, and was stormed by the French under Dupont in 1808. The cathedral, the old mosque of Abd-er-Rahman I., was begun in the 8th century, and finished in 1001. In plan it is nearly square, with 13 ranges of columns, many of them antique, supporting low horseshoe-arcades, above which a second tier of arches carries the modernized vaulting. The original Moorish mihrab and its successor remain, and present wonderful examples of decoration in sculpture and mosaic. In the middle of the mosque a rich Renaissance choir was built in 1526, but the interpolation is lost in the vastness of the structure. There are many admirable Moorish doors, and other features, all together making this remarkable building one of the finest existing specimens of Mohammedan architecture. The beautiful Court of Oranges, on the north, forms the cloister of the cathedral. Population (1887), 55,614.

2. A province in Andalusia, Spain. Area, 5,190 square miles. Population (1887), 420,714.—3. See Córdoba.

Cordova, Diego Fernandez de. See Fernandez de Cordova.

Cordova, Francisco Hernandez de. Born about 1475; died at Leon, Nicaragua, March, 1526. A Spanish soldier and explorer. In 1514 he went to the Isthmus of Panama with Pedrarias, and in 1524 was sent by him to take possession of Nicaragua in defiance of the rights of the discoverer, Gil Gonzalez de Avila. Cordova founded Granada, Leon, and other towns, explored the lake, and found its outlet. He sent his lieutenant, Hernando de Soto, against Gil Gonzalez in Honduras; but on the arrival of Cortés in Honduras sought to transfer his allegiance to him, and subsequently tried to set up an independent government. Pedrarias, hearing of the defection, came to Nicaragua, seized Cordova, and had him beheaded.

Cordova, Gonsalvo Hernandez de. Born at Montilla, near Cordova, Spain, March 16, 1453; died at Granada, Spain, Dec. 2, 1515. A celebrated Spanish general, surnamed "The Great Captain." He served with distinction in the wars against Portugal and the Moors, and conducted the negotiations which finally resulted in the union of Granada with Castile. In 1495 he expelled the French from Naples, for which service he was created duke of Sant' Angelo by Ferdinand II. He conquered Ostia for the Pope in 1497, and 1502-03 defended Barletta against the French, whom he defeated at Cerignola and on the Garigliano in 1503.

Cordova, Jorge. Born at La Paz, 1822; died there, Oct. 23, 1861. A Bolivian revolutionist. He was an ignorant soldier who acquired some importance by his marriage with the daughter of President Belzu. The revolutionists who drove out Belzu in 1855 proclaimed Cordova in his place, and he held the position until 1858, when he was deposed by another outbreak. His rule was humane, but he showed little energy. He was shot during the disorders of 1861.

Cordova, Pedro de. Born in 1483; died at Santo Domingo, June 28, 1525. A Spanish Dominican, viceroy of the first colony of his order in Hispaniola in 1510. He and his companions preached against Indian slavery in 1511, and in 1512 Cordova went to Spain to meet the junta which was employed in framing new laws with relation to the services of the Indians. In 1513 he sent a missionary colony to the coast of Venezuela, and when the missionaries were killed in 1515, Cordova went himself to establish another colony. He was a friend of Las Casas.

Cordova y Figueroa (kôr'dô-vâ ê fê-gâ-rô'â), Pedro de. Born at Concepcion, 1692; died there, probably after 1770. A Chilean historian. He was a soldier, served in Aricañia, and was alcalde of Concepcion about 1740. His "Historia de Chile" includes the conquest and settlement to 1717, and was the most complete history of the country up to its date. The manuscript was preserved at Madrid, and it was first published from a copy in the "Coleccion de Historiadores de Chile."

Corea. See Korea.

Coreal (kô-râ-âl'), Francisco. The name appended to the "Voyage aux Indes Occidentales," published in Paris 1727. The author claimed to have been born in Cartagena in 1648, and to have traveled over nearly all of Spanish and Portuguese America. The work is generally believed to be fictitious.

Coree (kô'rê). A tribe of North American Indians formerly occupying the peninsula south of the Neuse River, North Carolina. The name probably means 'they are separate.' They joined in the outbreak of 1711, and the survivors were settled in Hyde County, North Carolina, until they became extinct. Also called Coranine. See Iroquoian.

Corentyn (kō-ren-tin'). [Corantijn of the Dutch colonists.] A river of South America which separates British and Dutch Guiana. It flows into the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 6° N., long. 57° W. Length, 40 miles; navigable 150 miles.

Corfe Castle (kōrf kās'tl). A castle in Dorset, England, 18 miles east of Dorchester. It was the scene of the murder of Edward the Martyr in 979.

Corfinium (kōr-fin'i-um). In ancient geography, a town in central Italy, near the modern Solmona. It was the capital of the Peligni, and of the confederates in the Social War (90-88 B. C.).

Corflambo (kōr-flam'bō). A giant, a type of unregulated love, in Spenser's "Faerie Queene," iv. 8.

Corfu (kor-fū'). 1. A nomarchy of Greece, comprising Corfu, Santa Maura, Paxos, etc. Area, 431 square miles. Population (1889), 114,535.—2. The northernmost and largest of the Ionian Islands, situated west of Albania; the ancient Coreyra or Kerkyra. Its surface is mountainous, and its principal exports are olives and wine. Length, 40 miles. Greatest breadth, 20 miles.

3. A seaport, capital of Corfu, on the eastern coast in lat. 39° 37' N., long. 19° 56' E.: the ancient Coreyra or Kerkyra. It has steam communication with Mediterranean ports. Corfu was colonized by Corinth in 734 B. C. It defeated Corinth, in the first recorded naval battle, in 665 B. C.; was an ally of Athens in the Peloponnesian war; was conquered by Rome in 229 B. C., and came under Venetian rule in 1386. The island formed part of the Ionian Republic from 1815 to 1864. The town was defended by the Venetians against the Turks in 1716. Population (1889), commune, 28,372.

Cori (kō'rē). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, situated 30 miles southeast of Rome: the ancient Cora. It contains many Roman antiquities, including Corinthian columns, fragments of walls, and a temple of Hercules, so called, a Roman-Doric structure of the time of Sulla, of unusual grace and artistic feeling. The entire prostyle portico (prostasis) of 4 by 3 columns remains, with its entablature and low pediment. The shafts, with 20 flutes, have a height of 7 diameters without base or capital; triglyphs occupy the angles of the frieze, in Greek fashion. The doorway of the cella is richly framed and ornamented.

Corin (kō'rin). A shepherd in Shakspeare's comedy "As you Like it."

Corineus. See Gogmagog.

Corinium (kō-rin'i-um). An important town in ancient Britain: the modern Cirencester.

Corinna (kō-rin'ä). [Gr. Kόριννα.] Born at Tanagra, Bœotia, Greece: lived in the first part of the 5th century B. C. A Greek lyric poet, sometimes called a Theban from her long residence in Thebes. She was a contemporary and instructor of Pindar, from whom she is said to have won the prize five times at the public games. A few fragments of her poems have been preserved. "There were three of the name of Corinna, all skilled in letters. One was of Thebes, one of Thespis, and the third of Corinth. The last lived at the time, and is supposed to have been the favourite, of Ovid; but the most famous was she who, in a trial of poetry, conquered the great poet Pindar. Her glory seems to have been fully established by the public memorial of her picture exhibited in her native city, and adorned with a symbol of her victory. Pausanias, who saw it, supposes her to have been one of the handsomest women of her age. Time has left us only a few scraps of Corinna's poetry." Orlando Furioso, bk. xx., note.

Corinna. In Vanbrugh's comedy "The Confederacy," the darest daughter of Gripe.

Corinna. A name given by Dryden to Mrs. Thomas with whom he had a correspondence. She fell into distress and became one of Curll's authors, furnishing him with a fictitious account of Dryden's funeral.

Corinne ou l'Italie (kō-rēn'ō lē-tā-lē'). [F., 'Corinne or Italy.'] A novel by Madame de Staël, published in 1807: named from its heroine.

Corinth (kor'inth). [Gr. Κόρινθος, L. Corinthus.] A city of Greece, situated near the Isthmus and Gulf of Corinth in lat. 37° 54' N., long. 22° 52' E.: the modern Gorthio. It was originally called Ephyre (Ἐφύρα), and was noted in ancient times as a center of commerce, literature, and art. It was founded about 1350 B. C.; was conquered by the Dorians in the 11th century; colonized Coreyra and Syracuse in 734; prospered under the tyrant Periander about 600; sided with Sparta in the Peloponnesian war against Athens, and later (395-387) engaged in the "Corinthian war" against Sparta; was defeated by Sparta in 394; was held by the Macedonians until 243, when it joined the Achaean League, of which it was the capital; was captured, sacked, and burned by the Romans, under Mummius, in 146; and was rebuilt by Julius Caesar in 46 B. C. In modern times it has been taken and retaken by Turks and Venetians, was destroyed by an earthquake in 1858, and was rebuilt on a site 3 miles distant (New Corinth). Population (1889), commune, 11,150.

Corinth. A village in northeastern Mississippi, 90 miles east by south of Memphis. It was an important strategic point in the Civil War, and was besieged by the Federals under Halleck May, 1862, and evacuated by the Confederates under Beauregard May 29. Here, Oct. 3, 4, the Federals (over 20,000) under Rosecrans defeated the Confederates (28,000) under Van Dorn and Price. Reported loss of the Federals, 2,520; of the Confederates, 4,838.

Corinth, Gulf of. See Lepanto, Gulf of.

Corinth, Isthmus of. An isthmus which connects the Morea with central Greece. It is now pierced by a canal. Width, 4-8 miles.

Corinthia (kō-rin'thi-ä). In ancient geography, a division of Greece, lying between the Gulf of Corinth on the north, Megaris on the northeast, the Saronic Gulf on the east, Argolis on the south, and Argolis and Sicynia on the west.

Corinthians (kō-rin'thi-anz), First and Second Epistles to the. Epistles of Paul, of which the first was composed at Ephesus in the spring of 57, and the second at some place in Macedonia in the summer or autumn of the same year.

Coriolanus (kō'ri-ō-lā'nus), the surname of Cnæus (less correctly Caius) Marcus. Lived in the first half of the 5th century B. C. A Roman legendary hero, represented as the champion of the patricians, and afterward as leader of the Volscians against Rome. He was the conqueror of the Volscian Corioli (whence his surname).

1. A tragedy by Shakspeare, produced probably in 1608, and founded on North's "Plutarch." In the play the mother of Caius (Cnæus) Marcus Coriolanus is Volturnia, not Veturia, and his wife is Virgilia, not Volumnia as in the original. John Dennis produced a play in 1705 founded on "Coriolanus," which he called "The Invader of his Country, or the Fatal Retribution."

2. A tragedy by James Thomson, left in manuscript by him, brought upon the stage by Sir George Littleton. It was published in 1748 or 1749.

Corioli (kō-rī-ō-lī). In ancient geography, a city of Latium, Italy. It gave name to Coriolanus, by whom it was conquered 493 (?) B. C. Its exact site is unknown, but is probably at Monte-Giove, near Aricia.

Corisca. In Guarini's "Pastor Fido," a woman ruined by town life, contrasted with the Arcadian maidens.

Coritavi (kō-ri-tā'vī), or Coritani (kō-ri-tā'nī). An ancient British tribe which occupied territory that included the modern Lincoln and Leicesters.

Strabo also, speaking of the Coritavi, a British tribe in Lincolnshire, after mentioning their yellow hair, says, "to show how tall they are, I saw myself some of their young men at Rome, and they were taller by six inches than any one else in the city." L. Taylor, Aryans, p. 76.

Cork (kōrk). 1. The southernmost county of Munster, Ireland. It lies between Limerick on the north, Tipperary on the northeast, Waterford on the east, the Atlantic Ocean on the south, and Kerry on the west. It is the largest county of Ireland, having an area of 2,890 square miles. Population (1891), 438,432.

2. A city, capital of the above county, situated on the Lee, near its mouth, in lat. 51° 54' N., long. 8° 28' W. Its lower part is Queenstown. It is the third city in Ireland, exports butter, live stock, provisions, leather, etc., and is the seat of Queen's College. It was founded about 600; was fortified by the Danes; was surrendered by its king to Henry II. in 1172; and was besieged and taken by Cromwell in 1649, and by Marlborough in 1690. Population (1891), 75,345.

Cork, Barls of. See Boyle.

Corleone (kor-lā-ō'ne). A town in the province of Palermo, Sicily, 21 miles south of Palermo. Population, 15,000.

Corliss (kōr'lis), George Henry. Born at Easton, N. Y., July 2, 1817; died at Providence, R. I., Feb. 21, 1888. An American inventor and manufacturer, noted as a designer of steam-engines. He first patented improvements in engines in 1849.

Cormac (kōr'mak). Born 836; died 908. A king of Cashel, Ireland, who reigned 900-908. He perished in a battle on the site of the present Ballymore, in the latter year. A glossary of Irish words called "Sanas Chormaic," "the most venerable monument of the literature of Munster and the earliest Irish dictionary," is attributed to him.

The oldest extant fragment of the glossary is in the "Book of Leinster," a manuscript of about A. D. 1200, and the oldest complete manuscript (Royal Irish Academy, H. and S. No. 224, s. 3167) is of the 15th century. Some Irish writers state that the glossary was part of a large work known as "Saltair Chaisil." This has been generally attributed to Cormac, but there are no safe grounds for believing it to be his, or indeed for regarding it as anything but an ancient collection of transcripts such as the existing "Lebor na hUidri." The "Sanas Chormaic" was first printed by Whitley Stokes in 1862.

Dic. Nat. Biog., XII, 221.

Cormac Mac Art. Died 260. A king of Ireland 218-254, grandson of Conn of the Hundred Battles.

Cormenin (kor-mē-nan'), Vicomte de (Louis Marie de la Haye). Born at Paris, Jan. 6, 1788; died at Paris, May 6, 1868. A noted French jurist and political writer. He was the author of numerous books and pamphlets, including "Questions de droit administratif" (1822), "Études sur les orateurs parlementaires" (1838), etc.

Cormontaigne (kor-mōn-tāny), Louis de. Born 1695; died in Lorraine, Oct. 20, 1752. A French military engineer. His works were published 1806-09.

Cornaro (kor-nā'rō), Caterina. Born at Venice, 1454; died at Venice, July 5, 1510. Queen of Cyprus. She married in 1472 James of Lusignan, king of Cyprus, on whose death in 1473 she succeeded to the throne. She abdicated in favor of the Republic of Venice in 1489.

Cornaro, Caterina, at Venice. A sumptuous painting by Hans Makart, in the National Gallery at Berlin. The Queen of Cyprus, enthroned, receives the homage of Venetian patricians. There is evident aim to reproduce Titian's grouping and splendor of color.

Cornbury, Viscount. See Hyde.

Cornelle (kor-nā'y'), Pierre. Born at Rouen, June 6, 1606; died at Paris, Oct. 1, 1684. A celebrated French dramatist. He was graduated with high honors from the Jesuit College of his native city, studied law, and was admitted to the bar June 18, 1624. His first comedy, "Mélite," was intrusted to a comedian who put it on the stage between 1628 and 1630, and scored a marked success. Cornelle immediately wrote a second play, "Clitandre," this time a tragicomedy of most extravagant and absurd nature, produced about 1631 or 1632. Thereupon he made a return to pure comedy with "La veuve" (1633), "La galerie du palais" (1633), "La suivante" (1634), "La place royale" (1634), and "L'illusion comique" (1636). This series was interrupted by the tragedy "Médée" (1635), barring which Cornelle passes at once from simple comedy to sublime tragedy. "Le Cid," appearing toward the close of 1636 or the beginning of 1637, marks a new era in the history of the French stage. This masterpiece failed, nevertheless, to secure universal recognition, and was the cause of the famous "querelle du Cid" raised by the French Academy. The year 1640 witnessed the production of two new tragedies, "Ilorace" and "Cinna." "Polyeucte," frequently looked upon as Cornelle's greatest work, was produced in 1642. "La mort de Pompée" and Cornelle's finest comedy, "Le menteur," appeared in 1643, "Théodore" and "La suite du menteur" in 1645, and "Rodogune" in 1646. Cornelle issued "Héraclius" in 1647, "Andromède" and "Don Sanche d'Aragon" in 1650, "Nicomède" in 1651, and "Percinthe" in 1653. This last play was not a success, and Cornelle ceased to write for the stage for six or seven years, concentrating his energies on rendering "L'Initiation de Jésus-Christ" into verse (1651-56). In 1659 he was induced to return to the old work, and brought out "Édipe," "La toison d'or," and "Sertorius" (1662), "Sophonisbe" (1663), and "Othon" (1664). His works during the latter part of his life deserve mention simply for the name of their author: they are "Agésilas" (1666), "Attalia" (1667), "Tite et Bérénice" (1670), "Pulchérie" (1672), and "Suréna" (1674). Cornelle ranks with Descartes as the first to free the French language and thought from the restrictions due to Greek and Latin influences.

Cornelle, Thomas. Born at Rouen, Aug. 20, 1625; died at Les Andelys, Dec. 8, 1709. A French dramatist and miscellaneous writer, younger brother of Pierre Cornelle. His plays (which number over 40) include "Ariane" (1672), "Le festin de Pierre" (1673), "Le comte d'Essex" (1678), etc.

Cornelia (kōr-nē'li-ä). [L., fem. of Cornelius; It. Cornelia, F. Cornélie, G. Cornelia.] Lived in the 2d century B. C. A Roman matron, daughter of the elder Scipio Africanus, wife of Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, and mother of the tribunes Tiberius and Caius Gracchus; celebrated for her accomplishments and virtues.

Cornelia gens (kōr-nē'li-ä jenz). A celebrated patrician and plebeian clan or house in ancient Rome. The patrician family names previous to the empire were Arvina, Blasio, Cetheus, Cinna, Cossus, Dolabella, Lentulus, Maluginensis, Mannula, Merenda, Merula, Rufinus, Scapula, Scipio, Sisenna, and Sulla. The plebeian family names were Balbus and Gallus.

Cornelian Laws, L. Leges Corneliæ (lē'jēz kōr-nē'li-ä). The body of laws introduced at Rome by the dictator L. Cornelius Sulla about 80 B. C., with a view to restoring the aristocratic form of government, whose integrity had been destroyed by the democratic legislation of the Gracchi and of Marius.

Cornelius (kōr-nē'lius). [L.; It. Sp. Pg. Cornelio, F. Cornelius, G. Cornelius.] A Roman centurion, stationed at Casarea, whom Peter, in consequence of a special revelation, received into the communion of the Christian church directly by baptism, without circumcision (Acts x.).

Cornelius. Born at Rome; died at Civitá Vecchia, 253. Elected bishop in March, 251, to succeed Fabianus. The Novatians having refused to recognize his election, and having chosen their leader Novatianus in his stead, Cornelius convened a council at Rome in 251, which confirmed his election. He was banished by the emperor Gallus to Civitá Vecchia, where, according to some (late) accounts, he suffered martyrdom.

Cornelius. 1. A courtier in Shakspeare's tragedy "Hamlet."—2. A physician in Shakspeare's play "Cymbeline."—3. The friend of Faustus in Marlowe's play "Dr. Faustus."

Cornelius (kor-nā'le-ūs), Karl Adolf. Born at Würzburg, Bavaria, March 12, 1819. A German historian. He became professor of history in the University of Bonn in 1854, and in the University of Munich in 1856. His works include "Geschichte des münsterischen Aufsturus" (1855-60), "Kurfürst Moritz von Sachsen gegenüber der Fürstenverschworung im Jahre 1550-51" (1867), etc.

Cornelius Nepos. See Nepos.

Cornelius, Peter von. Born at Düsseldorf, Prussia, Sept. 23, 1783; died at Berlin, March 6, 1867. A German painter, leader of the new school of German art. He worked in Rome 1811-19, and in the latter year took charge of the academy at Düsseldorf. From 1825-41 he labored chiefly at Munich, and after 1841 at Berlin. His chief works are frescos in the Glyptothek and Ludwigskirche in Munich, and cartoons for the Campo Santo in Berlin.

Cornell (kōr-nel'), Ezra. Born at Westchester Landing, N. Y., Jan. 11, 1807; died at Ithaca, N. Y., Dec. 9, 1874. An American philanthropist. He followed the occupation of mechanic and miller at Ithaca, N. Y., 1823-41, and subsequently amassed a fortune, chiefly as a contractor for the erection of telegraph lines. He was a member of the State Assembly in 1862 and 1863, and was a member of the State Senate 1864-1867. He is chiefly known as the founder of Cornell University (which see).

Cornell University. An institution of learning situated at Ithaca, N. Y. Its curriculum comprises courses in arts, literature, philosophy, science, agriculture, civil and mechanical engineering, history, political science, etc., and extended graduate courses. It was founded by Ezra Cornell (see above), and was opened in 1868. Its library contains about 150,000 volumes.

Cornelys (kor-nā'lis), Theresa. Born at Venice in 1723; died in the Fleet Prison, Aug. 19, 1797. A noted manager of public assemblies in Carlisle House, London. At one time she had the direction of all the theaters in the Austrian Netherlands. Besides the management of balls, concerts, and masquerades, she also sang. She fell into obscurity after a notorious life, and under the name of Mrs. Smith sold ass's milk at Knightsbridge for some time before her death. Diet. Nat. Biog.

Corneto (kor-nā'tō), or Corneto-Tarquini. A town in the province of Rome, Italy, 44 miles northwest of Rome. It contains a castle, palace, and many Etruscan and Roman antiquities. Remarkable Etruscan tombs and the site of the old city of Tarquini are in the vicinity. It is the seat of a bishop. Population, 4,000.

Cornhart, Dirk. See Coornhart.

Cornhill (kōrn'hil). One of the principal London streets, once a corn-market. "The two great ornaments of mediæval Cornhill were the Tun, a round-house or temporary prison, and the Standard, a water conduit, and point of measurement" (the latter was in use in the second year of Henry V.).

Corniani (kor-nē-ā'nē), Count Giovanni Battista. Born at Orzi-Nuovi, near Breseia, Italy, Feb. 28, 1742; died at Orzi-Nuovi, Nov. 7, 1813. An Italian literary historian and poet. His chief work is "I secoli della letteratura italiana" (1804-13).

Corniche (kor-nēsh'), La, It. Cornice (kor-nē'che). ['The cornice.'] A celebrated coast-road along the Riviera of France and Italy from Nice to Genoa.

Cornimont (kor-nē-mōn'). A town in the department of Vosges, France, 22 miles southeast of Épinal. Population (1891), commune, 4,821.

Corning (kōr'ning). A post-village in Stenben County, New York, situated on the Chemung River 13 miles west of Elmira. Population (1890), 8,530.

Corn-Law Rhymer. Ebenezer Elliott, author of "Corn-Law Rhymes."

Corn-Laws, The. In English history, a series of laws, extending from 1436 to 1842, regulating the home and foreign grain-trade of England. Until the repeal of the corn-laws, the grain-trade, both export and import, was the subject of elaborate and varying legislation, which consisted in levying protective or prohibitory duties, or in imposing restrictive conditions, or in granting government bounties for the encouragement of exportation. After a prolonged agitation for the repeal of the corn-laws by the Anti-Corn-Law League (organized in 1839), Parliament in 1846, under the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, passed an act for a large immediate reduction of the duty on imported grain, and providing for a merely nominal duty after 1849, which was subsequently entirely removed.

Corno, Monte. See Gran Sasso d'Italia.

Cornouaille (kor-nō-ā'y'). A part of Brittany, France, in the vicinity of Quimper.

Cornwallis (kōrn-wō'lis), Caroline Frances. Born in 1786; died at Lidwells, in Kent, Jan. 8, 1858. An English writer, daughter of William Cornwallis, rector of Wittersham and Elham in Kent. She wrote "Philosophical Theories and Philosophical Experience, by a Pariah" (1842), and other works in the series entitled "Small Books on Great Subjects." Her "Letters" were published in 1864.

Cornwallis, Charles. Born at London, Dec. 31, 1738; died at Ghazipur, British India, Oct. 5, 1805. An English soldier and statesman, the second Earl Cornwallis, created Marquis Cornwallis Aug. 15, 1792. He entered the army in 1759; took part in the battles of Minden, Vellinghausen, Wilhelmstadt, and others (1758-62); was elected member of Parliament in Jan., 1769, and entered the House of Lords in June, 1768, where he acted with the Whigs; and was chief justice in eyre south of the Trent 1766-69. In 1775 he was promoted major-general, and in Feb., 1776, was sent with seven regiments to reinforce the English army in America. He joined Sir William Howe at Halifax, and served under him in the campaign on Long Island and about New York. In Sept., 1777, he gained the battle of Brandywine and occupied Philadelphia, and in April, 1778, was promoted lieutenant-general and appointed second in command to Sir Henry Clinton, then commander-in-chief in America. At Camden, Aug. 16, 1780, he defeated General Gates; won the battle of Guilford Court House March 15, 1781; and surrendered to Washington at Yorktown Oct. 19, 1781. He was appointed governor-general of India and commander-in-chief in Feb., 1786; waged successful war with Tippu Saib 1791-92; and resigned his office in 1793 and returned to England. In 1795 he was appointed master-general of the ordnance, with a seat in the cabinet; and was viceroy and commander-in-chief in Ireland from May, 1798, till his resignation, Feb., 1801, suppressing the rebellion of the former year. The treaty of Amiens was negotiated by him in 1802, and in 1805 he again went to India as governor-general and commander-in-chief.

Coro, or Santa Aña de Coro (sän'tä än'yü dä kō'rō). The capital of the state of Falcon, Venezuela, situated near the Bay of Coro in lat. 11° 27' N., long. 69° 48' W. It was founded in 1527, and until 1576 was the capital of the province of Venezuela. Population (1892), about 9,000.

Coroados (kō-rō-ä'dōs). The name given to several different Indian hordes in Brazil. (a) A wandering tribe in western São Paulo, Paraná, and Rio Grande do Sul. They were formerly numerous and powerful, but are now reduced to a few thousands. Until very recently they have kept up a predatory war with the whites. The name in this case is Portuguese, meaning 'tousured,' and refers to their custom of removing the hair from the top of the head, leaving a ring around the crown. (b) A tribe of Matto Grosso, living mainly on the Upper São Lourenço River. They are probably the remains of the powerful tribe known in the 18th century as Coroads or Aeroads, the name having been corrupted to its present form. These Indians, now reduced to a few hundreds, have tilled villages and practise agriculture. They have frequently raided the settlements of Matto Grosso, but in 1887 made peace with the whites. (c) A horde on the Parahyba River, allied to the Paris.

Coromandel Coast (kor-ō-man'del kōst). A name applied to that part of the eastern seaboard of the Indian peninsula which lies between Calimere Point (lat. 10° 17' N.) and the mouth of the Krishna (15° 45' N.).

Corombona (kō-rom-bō'nä), Victoria. The "white devil" in Webster's tragedy of that name. Having fascinated the Duke of Brachiano, she renounces everything for pleasure. At her instigation he procures the deaths of her husband and the duchess. She is brought before the Tribunal and arraigned for these murders, but her guilt is not proved, and she retires to a house of Convertites from which Brachiano secretly takes her and marries her. He is shortly poisoned by the emissaries of the Great Duke, and she is stabbed by her brother Flamineo in revenge for Brachiano's failure to advance him, he having instigated his sister to her course of conduct to that end. The trial scene is one of great power. "Step by step, like a soldier brought to bay with his back against a wall, she defends herself, refuting and defying advocates and judges, incapable of blenching or quailing, clear in mind, ready in word, amid insults and proofs, even menaced with death on the scaffold." Taine, English Literature, I, 286.

Corona (kō-rō'nä), De. [L., 'on the crown'; Gr. περι Στεφάνου.] An oration by Demosthenes, delivered 330 B. C. See Demosthenes.

Corona Australis (kō-rō'nä äs-trä'lis). [L., 'the southern crown.'] An ancient southern constellation, about the knee of Sagittarius, represented by a garland.

Corona Borealis (kō-rō'nä bō-rē-ä'lis). [L., 'the northern crown.'] An ancient northern constellation, between Hercules and Boötes, represented by a garland and two streamers.

Coronado (kō-rō-nä'thō), Carolina. Born at Almedralejo, Badajoz, Spain, 1823. A Spanish poet and novelist. She married Horatio J. Perry, an American, about 1840.

Coronado, Francisco Vasquez de. Born at Salamanca about 1500; died in Mexico after 1542. A Spanish soldier. Probably he went to Mexico in 1535 with the viceroy Mendoza, who in 1539 appointed him governor of Nueva Galicia. In 1540 he headed an expedition to the north in search of Cibola and the Seven Cities, penetrating to what is now New Mexico, and perhaps to Kansas. He returned with only a remnant of his force.

Coronado, Juan Vasquez de. Born at Salamanca about 1525; drowned at sea, Oct., 1565. A Spanish administrator. He went to Guatemala in 1550; was made alcalde mayor of San Salvador and Honduras and, later, of Nicaragua, and in 1562 was appointed to the same office in Costa Rica. He explored the whole country, and founded Cartago in 1563. In 1564 he went to Spain, where, in recognition of his work, he was named hereditary captain-general of Costa Rica. He was shipwrecked and drowned while returning.

Coronation (kor-ō-nä'shon), The. A play, licensed 1635 as by Shirley, and claimed by him as his own in a list of his plays published by him in 1652. On the title-page of its first edition, printed 1640, it was attributed to Fletcher, and is included in the earlier editions of Beaumont and Fletcher's works. (Ward.) There is no reason for supposing that Fletcher had any hand in it. Bullen.

Coronation Gulf. An inlet of the Arctic Ocean, in British America, south of Wollaston Land and west of Kent Peninsula.

Coronea (kor-ō-nē'ä). [Gr. Κορώνεια.] In ancient geography, a small town in Bœotia, Greece, situated west of Lake Copais. It was famous for two battles, in one of which (447 B. C.) the Bœotians defeated the Athenians, and in the other (394 B. C.) the Spartans under Agesilaus defeated the Thebans and other allied Greeks.

Cornelli (kō-rō-nel'lē), Marco Vincenzo. Born at Ravenna, Aug. 10, 1650; died at Venice, Dec., 1718. An Italian ecclesiastic and geographer, cosmographer of the Venetian Republic, professor of geography at Venice, and general of the Minorite order. He published a large number of maps and geographical works, and founded the Accademia degli Argonauti.

Corot (kō-rō'), Jean Baptiste Camille. Born at Paris, July 28, 1796; died there, Feb. 22, 1875. A celebrated French landscape-painter. He was a pupil of Michallon and Bertin. He first exhibited at the Salon of 1827 ("Vue prise à Narni," "La Campagne de Rome"). Among his most remarkable pictures are "Vue d'Italie" (1834), "Souvenir des environs de Florence" (1839), "La danse des nymphes" (1851), "Le Christ au Jardin des Oliviers" (1849), "Soleil couchant dans le Tyrol" (1850), "Matin," "Soirée" (1855), "Soleil couchant" (1857), "Dante et Virgile" (1850), "Orphée," "Le repos" (1861), "La solitude" (1866), "Pastorale" (1873), "Bildis" and "Plaisirs du soir" (1875), etc.

Corpus Christi (kōr'pus kris'tē). [L., 'body of Christ.'] A seaport and the capital of Nueces County, Texas, situated on Corpus Christi Bay in lat. 27° 49' N., long. 97° 21' W. Population (1890), 4,387.

Corpus Christi College. 1. A college of Cambridge University, founded in 1352 by a combination of the gilds of Corpus Christi and the Blessed Virgin Mary. A part of the original buildings remains. Also called Benet College.—2. A college of Oxford University, founded in 1516 by Richard Fox, bishop of Winchester. Its statutes were issued in 1517.

Corpus Christi Day. A festival of the Roman Church in honor of the Consecrated Host, founded by Pope Urban IV. in 1264. It is held on the Thursday after Trinity Sunday. It is still in the English calendar. Religious plays were formerly performed in the streets by crafts or trade companies on Corpus Christi Day in England and also on the Continent. Lope de Vega raised them to a high level in Spain. A Corpus Christi guild was formed in 1408 in York to celebrate the day with a procession, but this had nothing to do with the performance of the plays. See Coventry Plays and York Plays.

Corpus Juris (kōr'pus jō'ris). [L., 'the body of the law.'] See the extract.

In the East Justinian created the so-called Corpus juris. This consists of two principal parts, the law of the Jurists (ius vetus) and the Imperial law (ius principale), the latter of which was first executed (a. 528 sq.; revised and remodelled version a. 534). A commission was appointed for this purpose, the chief member being Tribonianus (546). The constitutions of the Emperors were again sifted from the extant collections and from the additions thereto, abridged and united in the twelve books of the Codex Justinianus. The extracts from the ius vetus were arranged in 50 books called Digesta, a. 530-533. On the basis of the new legislation a new manual was likewise elaborated by Tribonian, Theophilus and Dorotheos, the four books of Institutiones, chiefly after Gaius. To these collections of Justinian were added subsequent ordinances, Novellae, in several private collections, from a. 533 to about the end of the century, mostly in Greek. Though Justinian, in causing these collections to be made, besides the craving to immortalise his name, was governed by the autocratic idea of establishing mechanical uniformity, foreclosing controversies among the lawyers and debarring the judge from the exercise of his individual opinion, still it was he who rescued the treasures of ancient jurisprudence, otherwise doomed to destruction, rendered possible an historical treatment of Roman law by his Digest, and laid the foundation of all further development of that law.

ania, situated 26 miles southeast of Erie. It has been developed since 1861 by the discovery of petroleum. Population (1890), 5,677.

Corsair (kōr'sär), The. A poem by Byron, published in 1814.

Corsairs. [From Pg. corsa, a course or cruise.] Sea-robbers, chiefly from the Barbary coast, who infested the Mediterranean for many centuries.

From the days when Barbarossa defied the whole strength of the Emperor Charles V., to the early part of the present century, when prizes were taken by Algerine rovers under the guns, so to say, of all the fleets of Europe, the corsairs were masters of the narrow seas, and dictated their own terms to all comers. Nothing but the creation of the large standing navies of the present age crippled them; nothing less than the conquest of their too convenient coasts could have thoroughly suppressed them. During these three centuries they levied blackmail upon all who had any trading interest in the Mediterranean. The Venetians, Genese, Pisans in older days, the English, French, Dutch, Danish, Swedish, and American Governments in modern times, purchased security by the payment of a regular tribute, or by the periodical presentation of costly gifts. The penalty of resistance was too well known to need exemplification. Thousands of Christian slaves in the bagnios at Algiers bore witness to the consequences of an independent policy. So long as the nations of Europe continued to quarrel among themselves, instead of presenting a united line of battle to the enemy, such humiliations had to be endured; so long as a Corsair raid upon Spain suited the policy of France; so long as the Dutch, in their jealousy of other states, could declare that Algiers was necessary to them, there was no chance of the plague subsiding; and it was not till the close of the great Napoleonic wars that the Powers agreed, at the Congress of Aix la Chapelle in 1813, to act together, and do away with the scourge of Christendom. And even then little was accomplished till France combined territorial aggrandizement with the rôle of a civilizing influence.

Poole, Story of the Barbary Corsairs, p. 3.

Corse (kōrs), John Murray. Born at Pittsburg, Pa., April 25, 1835; died at Winchester, April 27, 1893. An American general. He entered West Point in 1853, but left before graduating, and studied law. At the outbreak of the Civil War he entered the Union army as a major of volunteers. He commanded a division at Memphis; was commissioned brigadier-general in 1863; served in the Chattanooga campaign; participated in the battles of Chickamauga and Missionary Ridge; "held the fort" at Allatoona, against a largely superior force of the enemy, Oct. 5, 1864; was made brevet major-general in 1864; and commanded a division in Sherman's march to the sea. He was collector of internal revenue at Chicago 1867-69, and was subsequently postmaster of Boston.

Cor Serpentis (kōr sēr-pen'tis). [L. (NL.), 'the heart of the serpent': cor = E. heart.] The second-magnitude star α Serpentis, more often called Unukalhai.

Corsica (kōr'si-kä). [F. Corse.] An island in the Mediterranean, forming a department of France; the Greek Cyros (Κίρως). It is separated from Sardinia to the south by the Strait of Bonifacio, and lies about 50 miles S.W. of Tuscany. Its surface is mountainous, its highest summit being Monte Rotondo. It exports wine, olive-oil, timber, etc. The capital is Ajaccio, and the chief town Bastia. The language is Italian. It was acquired by the Romans at the end of the first Punic war, and was held successively by the Vandals, Goths, Franks, Saracens, and Pisans, and from the 14th century by the Genoese. It was acquired by France in 1768. The revolt of the Corsican Paoli in 1795 placed Corsica under British rule; but it was regained by France in 1797. It is noted for its vendettas. It was the birthplace of Napoleon I. Length, 114 miles. Width, 52 miles. Area, 3,377 square miles. Population (1891), 288,596.

The Senate is composed of not over 300 members, one half princes of the blood, grandees, and certain ex officio and nominated members, and one half elected. The Chamber of Deputies is composed of members in the proportion of one for every 50,000 inhabitants, elected for five years.

2. The parliament or legislature of Portugal, consisting of an upper house of hereditary, life, and elective peers, and a lower house of 173 deputies, elected by the people for four years.

Cortés (kor-täs'), or Cortez (kōr'tez), Hernando, or Hernan, or Fernando. Born at Medellín, Estremadura, Spain, 1485; died at Castillejo de la Cuesta, near Seville, Dec. 2, 1547. A famous Spanish soldier, the conqueror of Mexico. In 1504 he went to Española, and in 1511 to Cuba where he married. In 1518 Velasquez gave him command of 12 vessels and 508 soldiers, destined to follow up Grijalva's Mexican discoveries. Suspecting disloyalty, Velasquez wished to recall him at the last moment, but Cortés evaded him and finally left Cuba Feb. 18, 1519. Rounding Yucatan, he had conflicts with the Indians of Tabasco; landed and founded Vera Cruz in April; and in Aug. began his march to Mexico City, notwithstanding the remonstrances of the messengers of Montezuma, the chief or "emperor" of that city. Montezuma did not directly resist him, but he had to fight several severe battles (Sept.) with the independent Tlascalans, who eventually joined him with a large force. At Cholula (Oct.) he massacred a great number of natives as a punishment for a real or supposed conspiracy, and on Nov. 8 marched over the lake causeways into Mexico, Montezuma coming out to meet him. The Spaniards were hospitably lodged, and received rich presents; but on the rumor of an uprising Cortés seized and held Montezuma as a hostage. Velasquez having sent Panfilo de Narvaez in pursuit of Cortés, the latter left 150 men under Alvarado, made a rapid march, defeated and captured Narvaez at Cempoala May 28, 1520, and enlisted most of his men. On his return he found the Spaniards closely besieged by the Mexicans, who had at last risen in arms. Cortés and his men were allowed to march in, but the fight was at once resumed. The captive Montezuma was killed by a shower of stones while attempting to parley; and on the night of June 30 the Spaniards tried to leave the city secretly. They were discovered, and lost half their force, and most of the treasure they had collected, in a fierce battle on one of the causeways; still hotly pursued, they fought another great battle at Otumba July 7, finally escaping into Tlascala. Here Cortés reorganized his army, receiving many Indian allies; and, aided by ships which he built on the lakes, began the siege of Mexico in May, 1521. Under Guatemotzin the city was desperately defended, and most of it was leveled with the ground before it was taken; Guatemotzin was captured Aug. 13, 1521. After this success, Cortés was empowered by the emperor to conquer all of New Spain, and in 1523 he was made governor. Mexico was rebuilt. Expeditions were sent in various directions, and navigation of the Pacific commenced. To settle disorders in Honduras, Cortés marched overland to that region (Oct., 1524, to April, 1526), enduring terrible sufferings. During this long absence his enemies gained power; he was deposed from the governorship July, 1526, and in 1528 went to Spain to seek redress. Charles V. received him with high honor; he was made marquis of the Valley of Oaxaca (Mexico) and military captain-general of New Spain, but was not restored to the governorship. His first wife having died, he married a lady of noble birth, and in 1530 returned to Mexico, where he lived in great splendor on the vast estates granted to him. But the machinations of his enemies continued; his explorations of the west coast (1533-39) were greatly hampered; and in 1540 he again went to Spain to seek redress. In 1541 he was with the emperor in the Algerine campaign. Charles refused or put off his demands, and, despairing of redress, Cortés was about going back to Mexico, when he died. His honors, by failure of the direct line with his great-grandson, have passed to the dukes of Terranova and Monteleone, in Sicily; his Mexican estates have several times been sequestered, but portions are now held by the heirs.

Cortés, José Domingo. Born about 1830; died 1884. A Chilean author. He was long a journalist, subsequently attaché at Brussels, and finally government director of libraries in Bolivia. Among his numerous biographical and historical works are the "Diccionario biográfico Americano," "Poetas Americanos," "Historia de Bolivia," and "Estadística bibliográfica de Bolivia."

Cortés, Martin. Born in Mexico, 1532; died in Spain, Aug. 13, 1589. The legitimate son of Hernando Cortés. He went to Spain in 1540, was liberally educated, followed the court of Philip II. to Flanders and England, and served with distinction in the army. He inherited the title of Marqués del Valle, and most of the Mexican estates were restored to him. In 1562 he went to Mexico, where he lived in great splendor until July, 1566, when he was accused of conspiring with the brothers Avila to make himself king. (See Avila, Alonso de.) He was sent to Spain, but was exonerated after several years. His illegitimate brother, of the same name, was involved in the accusation and horribly tortured.

Cortés, Sea of. A name given, in maps and books of the 16th century, to the Gulf of California, in honor of Hernando Cortés, one of its first explorers.

Cos, or Kos (kos). [Gr. Kōs, Kōōs, mod. Gr. Kōs; It. Stanko, Stanchio.] An island in the Aegean Sea, belonging to Turkey, situated west of Asia Minor in lat. 36° 50' N., long. 27° 5' E. It is celebrated as the birthplace of Apelles, Ptolemy Philadelphus, and Hippocrates, and also for its vineyards. Area, about 95 square miles. Population, about 20,000.

Cosa (kō'sā), Juan de la. Date of birth unknown; died near the Bay of Cartagena, Nov., 1509. A Spanish navigator, one of the most skillful of his time. He was with Columbus in the voyage of 1493 and during the exploration of Cuba, and he made at least five voyages to the northern coast of South America: viz., with Ojeda, May, 1499, to June, 1500; with Bastidas, Oct., 1500, to Sept., 1502; in command of successful expeditions in search of gold, etc., 1504 to 1506, and 1507 to 1508; and finally with Ojeda in 1509, when he was killed by the Indians. Of La Cosa's charts two or three have come down to us. His map of the New World, made in 1500, is the oldest known. It is now the property of the Spanish government.

Cosigiüina (kō-sē-gwē'nā). A volcano at the extreme western end of Nicaragua, situated on a peninsula between the Gulf of Fonseca and the Pacific. It is less than 4,000 feet high, but is remarkable for one of the most violent eruptions ever recorded. This began on Jan. 20, 1835, and lasted three days; the cloud of ashes darkened the country for a distance of from 50 to 100 miles from the crater; near the base they lay several feet thick, and were carried by the wind to Jamaica, Oajaca in Mexico, and Bogotā in Colombia. The explosions are said to have been heard in Mexico City.

Cosenza (kō-sen'dzū). 1. A province in Calabria, Italy. Also called Calabria Citeriore. Area, 2,568 square miles. Population (1891), 464,510.—2. The capital of the province of Cosenza, Italy, situated in lat. 39° 19' N., long. 16° 18' E.; the ancient Consentia. It contains a cathedral. The city suffers severely from earthquakes. Cosin (kuz'in), John. Born at Norwich, England, Nov. 30, 1594; died at London, Jan. 15, 1672. A noted English divine and writer. He was appointed master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, in 1635, vice-chancellor of Cambridge University in 1639, dean of Peterborough in 1640, and bishop of Durham in 1660. He was a churchman of the school of Laud, and an active Royalist during the civil war; and in 1644 was obliged to retire to Paris, where he became chaplain to the household of Queen Henrietta Maria. After the Restoration he returned to England, and rose to a position of great influence in the church.

Cosmas (kos'mas) and Damian (dā'mi-an), Saints. Two martyrs famous in the Eastern Church. They worked as physicians and missionaries. They were martyred in Cilicia under Diocletian. A basilica was built in their honor at Constantinople by Justinian, and one at Rome by Felix II.

Cosmas, surnamed Indicolpeustes. [Gr. Κοσμάς Ἰνδικολπιεστής ('the Indian voyager').] Lived in the 6th century A. D. An Egyptian monk and traveler, author of a work on geography and theology, "Topographia Christiana."

Cosmati (kos-mā'tē). A family or school of sculptors in Rome who originated the scheme of decorated architecture called "Cosmatesque" about the middle of the 12th century. It flourished for more than 150 years. The beauty of the work depends mainly upon the skillful combination of mosaics, disks of porphyry, and many-colored marbles found among the ruins of Rome. The principal members of the family were Piero, Odericus, Giovanni, Adeodatus, and Pasquale. Examples of their work are the Duomo of Civita Castellana, the cloisters of San Paolo, and the portico and pulpit of San Lorenzo.

Cossacks (kos'aks). [Said to be of Tatar origin.] A military people inhabiting the steppes of Russia along the lower Don and about the Dnieper, and in lesser numbers in eastern Russia, Caucasus, Siberia, and elsewhere. Their origin is uncertain, but their nucleus is supposed to have consisted of refugees from the ancient limits of Russia, forced by hostile invasion to the adoption of a military organization or order, which grew into a more or less free tribal existence. Their independent spirit has led to numerous unsuccessful revolts, ending in their subjection, although they retain various privileges. As light cavalry they form an element in the Russian army very valuable in skirmishing operations and in the protection of the frontiers of the empire.

Cossacks, The. A novel by L. Tolstoi, published 1852. It was translated into English in 1878.

Cossacks, Province of the Don. See Don Cossacks, Province of the.

Cossé (kō-sā'), Charles de (Comte de Brissac). Born in Anjou, France, about 1505; died at Paris, Dec. 31, 1563. A marshal of France. He was present at the siege of Naples in 1528, served against the English and Imperialists in Champagne and Flanders 1544-46, and became grand master of the artillery in 1547, and marshal of France in 1550.

Cosseans (kō-sē'anz). A wild and warlike people formerly inhabiting the Zagros Mountains northeast of Babylon. They are mentioned by Polybius, Diodorus Siculus, Strabo, and others, and are probably identical with the Kasru or Kasbi of the cuneiform inscriptions. About the year 1500 B. C. they invaded Babylonia, ruling the country for several centuries; and as late as the time of Sennacherib (705-681) an expedition against them is recorded. Possibly they, and not the Ethiopians, are meant by Cush (to be read Cash) in many passages of the Old Testament: e. g., Gen. x. 7, 8, where, among the descendants of "ush," Nimrod and the founders of other Semitic tribes appear.

Cossimbazar (kos'sim-ba-zār'). A former important city of India, near Murshidabad.

Cossovo. See Kosovo.

Cossutius (kō-sū'shius). A Roman architect who, under Antiochus Epiphanes (175 to 164), built a large part of the temple of Zeus at Athens, begun in the time of Pisistratus and finished in that of Hadrian.

Costa (kos'tā), Claudio Manuel da. Born at Carmo, Minas Geraes, June 6, 1729; died at Villa Rica (now Ouro Preto), 1789. A Brazilian poet. He was a lawyer in Villa Rica. In 1789 he was arrested for taking part in the conspiracy of Tiradentes, and a few days after he committed suicide in prison. His name was declared infamous and his goods were confiscated, but his sonnets and songs, published long after his death, have placed him in the first rank among Portuguese poets.

Costa, Sir Michael. Born at Naples, Feb. 4, 1810; died at West Brighton, England, April 29, 1884. A noted musician, composer of operas, oratorios, ballets, etc., and musical director. He wrote the oratorios "Eli" (1855), "Naamao" (1864), etc. The greater part of his life was spent in England.

Costa Cabral (kos'tā kā-brāl'), Antonio Bernardo da, Duke of Thomar. Born at Fomes de Algodres, Beira, Portugal, May 9, 1803; died at San Juan de Flor, Sept. 1, 1889. A Portuguese statesman. He was minister of justice and ecclesiastical affairs 1839-42, and of the interior 1842-46. In the latter year he was overthrown by a popular uprising against his tyranny and misgovernment. He was prime minister again 1849-51.

Costa Carvalho (kos'tā kār-vāl'yō), José da. Born at Penha, Bahia, Feb. 7, 1796; died at Rio de Janeiro, Sept. 18, 1860. A Brazilian statesman. He was a member of the constituent assembly of 1822, and deputy in several successive parliaments. At first an ardent liberal, he went over to the conservatives in 1838. He was senator from 1839, and organized the conservative cabinet of 1848. This ministry is remarkable in South American history as having directed the war which ended in the downfall of Rosas. Costa Carvalho was successively named baron, viscount, and marquis of Monte Alegre.

Costanoan (kōs-tā'nō-an). [From Sp. costano, coastman.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians, whose territory extended from the Golden Gate, California, to a point below Monterey Bay, and thence to the mountains in the vicinity of Soledad Mission. Its eastern boundary followed an irregular line from the southern end of Salinas Valley to Gilroy Hot Springs and the upper waters of Conestima Creek; thence along the San Joaquin to its mouth. The northern boundary was formed by Suisun Bay, Carquinez Straits, San Pablo and San Francisco bays, and the Golden Gate. Prior to the Spanish mission period the stock was numerous, consisting of the Ahwaste, Altahmo, Anlatac, Carquin, Mutsun, Ohone, Romonan, Rumsen, Thamien, and Tulomo tribes. There were about 30 survivors at Santa Cruz and Monterey in 1888.

Costard (kos'tārd). A character in Shakspeare's "Love's Labour's Lost," a clownish peasant.

Costa Rica (kos'tā rē'kā). [Sp., 'the rich coast.'] The southernmost of the republics of Central America, bounded by Nicaragua on the north, the Caribbean Sea on the east, Colombia on the south, and the Pacific on the west and southwest. Capital, San José. The surface is generally mountainous, and the chief export is coffee. The language is Spanish; the religion is Roman Catholic; and the government is republican, the executive being a president and congress consisting of a single house. Costa Rica was discovered by Columbus in 1502. Diego de Nicuesa failed in an attempt to colonize it in 1509. The first settlement was made by Francisco Hernandez in 1523, and the country was conquered 1526-65. Independence was declared in 1821, and the territory formed part of the federal republic of Central America from 1823 to 1839. Area (official), 22,996 or, by planimetric calculation, 26,573 square miles. Population (1892), 243,205.

Costello (kos-tel'ō), Dudley. Born in Sussex, England, 1803; died at London, Sept. 30, 1865. A British soldier, novelist, journalist, and miscellaneous writer. He wrote "A Tour through the Valley of the Meuse, with the Legend of the Walloon Country and the Arlennes" (1845), "Piedmont and Italy, from the Alps to the Tiber" (1859-61), etc. He served as ensign in the West Indies, retiring on half pay in 1828; later he was foreign correspondent of the "Morning Herald" and the "Daily News."

Costello, Louise Stuart. Born in Ireland, 1799; died at Boulogne, April 24, 1870. A British writer and miniature-painter, sister of Dudley Costello. She wrote "Songs of a Stranger" (1825), "A Summer among the Bocages and Vines" (1840), "Gabrielle, or Pictures of a Reign" (1843), "The Rose Garden of Persia" (1845), etc.

Coster, or Koster (kos'ter), Laurens Janszoon. [Laurens son of Jan, surnamed (D.) Koster, the sexton.] A citizen of Haarlem who, according to Hadrianus Junius in his "Batavia" (1588), invented the art of printing with movable types about 1440 (?). The claims of Coster (whose identity is uncertain) to the discovery have been maintained with great confidence by the Dutch and in other quarters, but are probably invalid. See Gutenberg.

There is no mention of Coster as a printer earlier than the year 1550, when it was placed on a pedigree then made for Gerrit Thomazsoon, one of Coster's descendants, who had kept an inn in the house declared to be the birthplace of the art of printing. Here it is said of an ancestor who was Coster's son-in-law, Thomas Pieterzoon, that "his second wife was Lourens Janszoon Coster's daughter, who brought the first print into the world in the year 1446." The figure 6 in that entry has been partially rubbed out and transformed into 0. Observation of this fact caused Dr. Van der Linde to make particular search in the archives of the town and church of Haarlem, and he found, extending over the years from 1441, entries of payments to Lourens Janszoon Coster (son of a Jan Coster who died in 1436), for oil and soap, and for the tallow candles burnt during each year in the Town Hall. After 1447, Lourens Janszoon Coster, having given up his business as a tallow chandler to his sister, Ghertruit, Jan Coster's daughter, turned tavern-keeper. He was paid in 1451 for wine sent to the burgomaster; in 1454 he was credited with seventeen guilders for "a dinner offered to the Count of Oostervant, on the 8th day of October, 1453, at Lou Coster's"; in 1475 Lourens Janszoon Coster paid a fine for buyten drinken (drink off the premises); and the last entry is that in 1483 he paid ferry-toll for his goods when he left the town. The books of an old Haarlem dining association, the Holy Christmas Corporation, represent Lourens, the son of Jan Coster, inheriting a chair in the Corporation from his father in 1436, and having given up the chair in 1454, with due appearance in 1497 of Gerrit Thomazsoon, who retained also the inn, as a successor to this festive inheritance. Lourens Janszoon Coster, the man first credited in Gerrit Thomazsoon's pedigree with the invention of printing, was, therefore, first a chandler, then a prosperous tavern-keeper; the wine vessels cast out of his types were the old pewter flagons proper to the tavern; and this man has been wrongly confounded with Lourens Janszoon, whose name was not Coster, but who was a rich wine merchant and innkeeper, town councillor, sheriff, treasurer and governor of the Hospital, who died in 1439.

Morley, English Writers, VI. 279.

Costigan (kos'ti-gan), Captain. In Thackeray's "Pendennis," a rakish, shabby-genteel old ex-army officer.

Costigan, Emily or Milly. In Thackeray's novel "Pendennis," a commonplace but beautiful and industrious actress in the provincial theater, with whom Arthur Pendennis falls in love. She is twenty-six, he eighteen. Her stage name is Fotheringay.

His poetry ("Malvern Hills" (1798), "John the Baptist" (1801), "Alfred" (1801), "The Fall of Cambria" (1809), "Messiah" (1815)), which was of inferior quality, is now known chiefly as an object of Byron's sarcasm. He also wrote "Early Recollections, chiefly relating to Samuel Taylor Coleridge" (1837).

Cotton (kot'n), Bartholomew de. An English historian, a monk of Norwich. He was the author of the "Historia Anglicana" in three books, of which the first is taken literally from Geoffrey of Monmouth, the second (taken in part from Henry of Huntingdon) comprises the history of England from 449 to 1298, while the third is an abstract and continuation of the "De gestis pontificum" of William of Malmesbury. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Cotton, Charles. Born at Beresford, Staffordshire, England, April 28, 1630; died at Westminster, Feb., 1687. An English poet, best known as the translator of Montaigne's "Essays" (1685). He published anonymously "Scarronides, or the First Book of Virgil Travestie" (1664; reprinted with the fourth book in 1670), a translation of Corneille's "Horace" (1671), "A Voyage to Ireland in Burlesque," a poem (1670), a translation of Gerard's "Life of the Duke of Espernon" (1670) and of the "Commentaries of De Montluc, Marshal of France" (1674), a "second part" (on fly-fishing to the fifth edition of Walton's "Complete Angler" (1676), etc. A collection of his poems was published in 1689.

Cotton, George Edward Lynch. Born at Chester, England, Oct. 29, 1813; drowned at Koosh-tea, India, Oct. 6, 1866. An English educator and prelate, bishop of Calcutta 1858-66. He was appointed in 1837 assistant master at Rugby, and as such figures in "Tom Brown's School-days."

Cotton, John. Born at Derby, England, Dec. 4, 1585; died at Boston, Mass., Dec. 23, 1652. A Puritan clergyman who emigrated from England and settled in Boston in 1633, sometimes called "the Patriarch of New England." He drew up, at the request of the General Court, an abstract of the laws of Moses, entitled "Moses, his Judicials," which he handed to the court in October, 1636; and is said to have introduced in New England the practice of keeping the Sabbath from Saturday evening to that of Sunday.

Cotton, Sir Robert Bruce. Born at Denton, Huntingdon, England, Jan. 22, 1571; died May 6, 1631. A noted English antiquary, a graduate of Cambridge (Jesus College) in 1585, famous as the founder of the Cottonian Library, now in the British Museum. He was an ardent collector of manuscripts in many languages, coins, and antiquities of all kinds, and his library was consulted and his aid obtained by Bacon, Jonson, Speed, Camden, and many other men of learning of that day. His collection of original documents became so great as to be regarded as a source of danger to the government, and after he had fallen into disfavor at court, on political grounds, an opportunity was found of placing his library under seal (1629), and he never regained possession of it. His son, Sir Thomas Cotton, succeeded in obtaining it, and it remained in the family (though open to the use of scholars and, in 1700, of the public) until 1707, when it was purchased by the nation. It was kept at various places, suffering considerable damage by fire Oct. 23, 1731, until the founding of the British Museum (1753), when it was transferred to that institution. Cotton was knighted in 1603, and created a baronet in 1611.

Cotton, Sir Stapleton, first Viscount Combermere. Born in Denbighshire, Wales, Nov., 1773; died at Clifton, England, Feb. 21, 1865. A British general, distinguished in India, and in the Peninsular war, especially at Salamanca 1812. He was governor of Barbados, and commander-in-chief of the Leeward Islands 1817-20, commander-in-chief in Ireland 1822-25, and commander-in-chief in India 1825-30. He captured Bhatpur in 1826.

Cottonian Library. See Cotton, Sir Robert Bruce.

Cotys (kō'tis), or Cotyttō (kō-tit'ō). [Gr. Κότυς, Κοτυττώ.] In Greek mythology, a Thracian goddess. Her festival, the Cotytia, was riotous and, later, licentious. It was celebrated on hills.

Cotys. [Gr. Κότυς.] King of Thrace 382-358 B. C. He was an enemy of the Athenians.

Couch (kouch), Richard Quillar. Born at Polperro, Cornwall, England, March 14, 1816; died at Penzance, England, May 8, 1863. An English naturalist.

Coucy (kō-sē'), Raoul or Renaud de, known as the Châtelain de Coucy (see Coucy-le-Château). A chevalier and French poet who is said to have perished about 1200 in a combat with the Saracens. He is the hero of a popular legend to the effect that when dying he ordered his heart to be sent to his mistress, the Lady of Fayel, whose husband intercepted it and forced her to eat it. She made a vow never to eat again, and died of starvation. See Châtelain de Coucy.

Coucy-le-Château (kō-sē'lē-shā-tō'). A village in the department of Aisne, France, 15 miles southwest of Laon. It is noted for the ruins of its feudal castle.

Coues (kouz), Elliott. Born at Portsmouth, N. H., Sept. 9, 1842. A noted American ornithologist and biologist. His works include "Key to North American Birds" (1st ed. 1872; "Field Ornithology" (1874), "Check-List of North American Birds" (1882), etc. He contributed the definitions of biological and zoological terms to "The Century Dictionary" (1880-1891), and edited Lewis and Clark's travels, with extended notes (1893).

Coulanges (kō-loñzh'). Numa Denis Fustel de. Born at Paris, March 18, 1830. A French historical writer. His works include "La cité antique" (1864), "Histoire des institutions politiques de l'ancienne France" (1875).

Coulin (kō'lin). A giant in Spenser's "Fairy Queen."

Coulmiers (kōl-myā'). A village in the department of Loiret, France, 13 miles northwest of Orléans. Here, Nov. 9, 1870, the French (80,000) under Anrelle de Paladine defeated the first Bavarian army corps (16,000) under General Von der Tann. The loss of the French was 1,500; that of the Bavarians about 1,300.

Coulomb (kō-loñ'). Charles Augustin de. Born at Angoulême, France, June 11, 1736; died at Paris, Aug. 23, 1806. A French physicist, noted for experiments on friction and researches in electricity and magnetism. He invented the torsion balance.

Coulommiers (kō-lom-myā'). A town in the department of Seine-et-Marne, France, situated on the Grand Morin 33 miles east of Paris. Population (1891), commune, 6,158.

Council Bluffs (konn'sil blufs). The capital of Pottawattamie County, Iowa, situated on the Missouri River opposite Omaha. It is an important railway and trading center. Population (1890), 21,474.

Council of Ancients. In French history, the upper chamber of the French legislature (Corps Législatif) under the constitution of 1795, consisting of 250 members, each at least forty years old.

Council of Basel. See Basel, Council of.

Council of Blood, The. In the history of the Netherlands, a court established by the Duke of Alva to suppress the popular agitation against the religious and political tyranny of Philip II. It held its first session Sept. 20, 1567, and put to death 1,800 persons in less than three months, the counts of Egmont and of Horn being among its victims (1568).

Yet, strange to say, this tremendous court . . . had not been provided with even a nominal authority from any source whatever. The King had granted it no letters patent or charter, nor had even the Duke of Alva thought it worth while to grant any commissions, either in his own name or as Captain-General, to any of the members composing the board. The Blood-Council was merely an informal club, of which the Duke was perpetual president, while the other members were all appointed by himself. Molloy, Dutch Republic.

Council of Carthage, Chalcedon, etc. See Carthage, Chalcedon, etc.

Council of Five Hundred. In French history, during the government of the Directory (1795-99), an assembly of 500 members, forming the second branch of the legislative body, the first branch being the Council of Ancients.

Council of Seville. See Casa de Contratación.

Council of State. [F. Conseil d'État.] In France, an advisory body existing from early times, but developed especially under Philip IV. (1285-1314) and his sons. It was often modified, particularly in 1497, and in 1630 under Richelieu, and played an important part during the first empire. Under the present republican government it comprises the ministers and about 90 other members, part of whom are nominated by the president, and the remainder are elected by the Legislative Assembly. Its chief duties are to give advice upon various administrative matters and legislative measures.

Council of Ten. In the ancient republic of Venice, a secret tribunal instituted in 1310 and continuing down to the overthrow of the republic in 1797. It was composed at first of 10 and later of 17 members, and exercised unlimited power in the supervision of internal and external affairs, often with great rigor and oppressiveness.

Council of the Indies. A body created in 1511, by King Ferdinand, for the regulation of Spanish colonial affairs. Its powers were confirmed and enlarged by Charles V. and his successors until they covered every branch of administration. It nominated and removed viceroys and governors, bishops and archbishops; made or approved all laws relating to the colonies, appointed the audiences, which were the supreme courts in all criminal affairs, and was itself the last court of appeal in civil cases; regulated the condition of the Indians; and, in fact, represented the crown in all matters relating to America and the East Indies. Its seat, after the first few years, was in Madrid.

Counter, The. The name anciently given to two prisons under the rule of the sheriffs of London, one in the Poultry and one in Wood street. There was another in Southwark which had the same name. This name was formerly a frequent subject of jokes and puns. Baret, in the "Alvarie" (1573), speaks of one who had been imprisoned as singing "his counter-tenor," and there are various similar allusions in the 17th-century dramatists.

Count Fathom. See Ferdinand.

Count Julian. A tragedy by Walter Savage Landor, published in 1812.

His [Landor's] first dramatic effort, made after a stormy and ill-regulated experience of fifteen years, was the gloomy but magnificent tragedy of "Count Julian" (1812). Like Shelley's "Cenci," Byron's "Manfred," and Coleridge's adaptation of "Wallenstein," it is a dramatic poem rather than a stage drama of the available kind. Compared with kindred productions of the time, however, it stands like the "Prometheus" among classic plays; and as an exposition of dramatic force, a conception of the highest manhood in the most heroic and mournful attitude,—as a presentment of impassioned language, pathetic sentiment, and stern resolve,—it is an impressive and undying poem. Stedman, Vict., Poets, p. 41.

Count Robert of Paris. A novel by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1831. The scene is laid in the 11th century, when Godfrey of Bouillon was before Constantinople at the head of the Crusaders. Count Robert was a French Crusader, one of the most famous and reckless of the period.

Country Girl, The. 1. A comedy attributed to Antony Brewer, produced in 1647. John Leaner reprinted it in 1677, under the title of "Country Innocence," as his own.—2. An alteration of Wycherley's comedy "The Country Wife" by Garrick, who produced it in 1766.

Country House, The. A comedy by Vanbrugh, produced in 1705. It was translated from the French of Dancourt.

Country Lasses, or The Custom of the Manor. A play by Charles Johnson, produced in 1715. It was partly taken from Fletcher and Massinger's "Custom of the Country," and Middleton's "A Mad World, my Masters." John Philip Kemble used it in his "Farm House" (1789), and Kendrick in "The Lady of the Manor."

Country Party. In English history, a political party, in the reign of Charles II., which opposed the court and sympathized with the nonconformists. It developed into the Petitioners, and later into the Whig party.

Country Wife, The. A comedy by Wycherley, produced in 1673. It was taken from Molière's "L'École des maris" and "L'École des femmes" ("School for Husbands," "School for Wives").

Country Wit, The. A comedy by Crowne, produced in 1675. The plot was partly from Molière's "Le Sicilien."

Coupar-Angus (kō'pär-ang'gus). A town in Perthshire and Forfarshire, Scotland, situated northeast of Perth.

Coupler (kup'lër), Mrs. A match-maker or go-between in Vanbrugh's play "The Relapse," and in Sheridan's "Trip to Scarborough."

Courbet (kör-bä'). Gustave. Born at Ormans, Doubs, France, June 10, 1819; died at La Tour de Peilz, Vaud, Switzerland, Dec. 31, 1877. A celebrated French painter, chief of the realists. He studied theology at Besançon, but abandoned it for the study of art, which he pursued at Paris under Steuben and Hesse. He was especially influenced by the Flemish and Venetian masters. He became a member of the Commune in 1871, and directed the destruction of the column in the Place Vendôme. In the fall of the Commune he was imprisoned for six months, and in 1875 was condemned to pay the cost of erecting the column.

Courbevoie (kör-be-vvä'). A town in the department of Seine, France, situated on the Seine 1½ miles northwest of the fortifications of Paris. Population (1891), 17,597.

Courcelles (kör-sel'). A village of Lorraine, situated near Metz. For battle of Courcelles, see Colombey.

Courier de Méré (kō-ryä' dè mē-rä'). Paul Louis. Born at Paris, Jan. 4, 1772; assassinated near Vézetz, Indre-et-Loire, France, Aug. 18, 1825. A French Hellenist and political writer. He studied at the Artillery School in Châlons, and served in the army 1792-1806. In the latter year he went to Italy, and in 1812 returned to France and lived upon his estate at Vézetz. He edited Longus in 1810, and published "Pamphlets des Pamphlets" (1824), etc. His collected works were published in 1834.

Courland (kör'land), G. Kurland (kör'länd), [F. Courlande.] A government of Russia, the southernmost of the Baltic provinces. It is bounded by the Gulf of Riga and Livonia (separated by the Duna) on the north, Vitebsk (separated by the Duna) on the east, Kovno on the south, and the Baltic on the west. Its surface is mostly level, and abounds in lakes, but in parts is hilly. Three-fourths of the inhabitants are Letts, but the land proprietors are mainly German. The prevailing religion is Protestant. Courland came under the control of the Teutonic order in the middle of the 13th century; became a hereditary duchy and fief of Poland in 1561 or 1562; and passed to Russia in 1705. It is being Russified like the other Baltic provinces. Capital, Mitau. Area, 10,535 square miles. Population (1890), 693,300.

On the western shore of the Gulf of Riga and on the Baltic, the Korsos, who give their name to Courland, are to be found. Rambaud, Russia, I. 2s.

Courmayeur (kör-mä-yër'), or Cormajeur. [It. Cormaggiore.] A village in northwestern Italy, near the foot of Mont Blanc.

Court de Gébelin (kör dè zhäb-län'). Antoine. Born at Nîmes, France, 1725; died at Paris, May 10, 1784. A noted French scholar, son of Antoine Court. His works include "Le monde primitif analysé et comparé avec le monde moderne" (1775-84), "Affaires de l'Angleterre et de l'Amérique" (1776), "Lettre sur le magnétisme animal" (1783), "Histoire naturelle de la parole, ou grammaire universelle," etc.

Courtenay (kért'nä), Edward. Born about 1526; died at Padua, Sept., 1556. An English noble, the Earl of Devonshire, son of Henry Courtenay, marquis of Exeter and earl of Devonshire. He was committed to the Tower with his father (see Henry Courtenay) in 1533, attainted in 1539, and released and restored in blood in 1553. Later he became an aspirant for the hand of Queen Mary, and on her choosing Philip II. turned his attention to the Princess Elizabeth. He was suspected of complicity in Wyatt's rebellion, and was again sent to the Tower (1554) but was released on parole and exiled.

Courtenay, Henry. Born about 1496; beheaded on Tower Hill, Dec. 9, 1538. An English noble, earl of Devonshire and marquis of Exeter. He was arrested on a charge of treason in Nov., 1538, tried, condemned, and executed.

Courtenay, William. Born at Exeter, England, about 1342; died at Maidstone, Kent, July 31, 1396. An English prelate, archbishop of Canterbury 1381-96, fourth son of Hugh Courtenay, earl of Devon, and Margaret Bohun, daughter of the Earl of Hereford. He studied at Oxford, became chancellor of the university in 1367, was consecrated bishop of Hereford in 1370, and was translated to the see of London in 1375. He was an opponent of Lollardism and the prosector of Wyclif. See Wyclif.

Courtes Oreilles. [F., 'short ears.'] See Ottawa.

Courtly (kört'li), Charles. In Dion Boucicault's comedy "London Assurance," a fashionable young man about town. He is the son of Sir Harcourt Courtly, who persists in believing him a studious, retiring boy. Charles succeeds in securing the heart and hand of the heiress who has been promised to his father.

Courtly, Sir Harcourt. In Dion Boucicault's comedy "London Assurance," an elderly fop devoted to fashion, and betrothed to a young heiress, Grace Harkaway, who finally rejects him and marries his son Charles.

Courtly Nice, Sir. See Sir Courtly Nice.

Court Mantel. See Boy and the Mantle.

Courtney Melmoth. See Melmoth, Courtney.
Court of Lions. A celebrated court in the Alhambra. See the extract.

Perhaps the most celebrated portion of the entire palace [Alhambra] is the Court of the Lions, which occupies a space somewhat smaller than that of the Court of the Myrtles. One hundred and twenty-eight white marble columns, arranged by threes and fours in symmetrical fashion, support galleries which rise to no very lofty height; but the extreme gracefulness and elegance of their varied capitals, the delicate traceries, the remnants of gold and colour, the raised orange-shaped cupolas, the graceful minarets, the innumerable arches, beautiful in their labyrinthine design, the empty basin into which the twelve stiff and unnatural "lions" once poured their constant streams of cooling waters, the alabaster reservoir, constitute a whole that poetry and romance have lauded even to extravagance. Poole, Story of the Moors, p. 227.

Court of Love, The. A poem attributed to Chaucer by Stowe, and inserted in the 1561 edition, but believed to be of later origin.

Courtois (kôr-twä'), Jacques, It. Jacopo Cortese; called le Bourguignon, It. Il Borgognone. Born at St. Hippolyte, Doubs, France, 1621; died at Rome, Nov. 14, 1676. A French battle-painter. In 1655 he became a lay brother of the Jesuit order, and thereafter painted sacred subjects.

Courtois, Gustave Claude Étienne. Born at Pucey, Haute-Saône, France, March 18, 1852. A French painter, especially of portraits: a pupil of Gérôme. He obtained the second grand prix de Rome in 1877, and a gold medal and the decoration of the Legion of Honor at the exposition of 1889.

Court Party. In English history, a political party, in the reign of Charles II., which supported the policy of the court. Its successor was the party of the Abhorers, and later the Tories.

Courtrai, or Courtray (kôr-trä'), Flem. Kortryk (kort'rik). A city in the province of West Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Lys in lat. 50° 49' N., long. 3° 15' E.: the ancient Cortoriacum. It manufactures linen, lace, etc., and contains a noted town hall (finished in 1528) and the Church of Notre Dame. Here, July 11, 1302, 20,000 Flemings defeated 47,000 French under Robert of Artois in the "Battle of the Spurs." It has several times been taken by the French. Population (1893), 31,319.

Court Secret, The. A play by Shirley, printed in 1653, not acted till after the Restoration.

Courtship of Miles Standish. A poem by Longfellow, published in 1858. See Standish, Miles.

Court Theatre, The. A theater in Sloane Square, London. It was opened in Jan., 1871, for the lighter order of dramas. The building, which was originally erected in 1818 as a chapel, replaced an older theater.

Cousin (kô-zän'), Jean. Born at Soucy, near Sens, 1501; died at Sens about 1590. A French painter, engraver, and sculptor, noted especially for his paintings on glass and miniatures.

Cousin, Victor. Born at Paris, Nov. 28, 1792; died at Cannes, France, Jan. 13, 1867. A noted French philosopher and statesman. He began lecturing at the Sorbonne in 1815; traveled in Germany in 1817; was deprived of his position at the Sorbonne for political reasons in 1820; traveled again in Germany in 1824, and was arrested at Dresden and imprisoned for a short time at Berlin; regained his position in 1828; and became a member of the Council of Public Instruction in 1830, and minister of public instruction in 1840. As a philosopher he was at first a follower of the Scottish psychological school, but later under German influences developed a kind of eclecticism. His works include "Fragments philosophiques" (1826-28), "Cours d'histoire de la philosophie" (1827-40), "Cours d'histoire de la philosophie moderne" (1841), "Cours d'histoire de la philosophie morale au XVIII^e siècle" (1840-41), "Du vrai, du beau, et du bien" (1854), "Des pensées de Pascal" (1842), "Madame de Longueville" (1853), "Histoire générale de la philosophie" (1864), etc.

Cousin-Montauban (kô-zän'mônt-ô-boñ'). See Palikao, Comte de.

Cousin Pons (kô-zän' pôns), Le. A novel by Balzac. See Balzac.

Cousins (kuz'nz), Samuel. Born at Exeter, England, May 9, 1801; died at London, May 7, 1887. An English mezzotint engraver.

Coussemaker (kôs-mî-kâr'), Charles Edmond Henri de. Born at Bailleul, Nord, France, April 19, 1805; died at Lille, France, Jan. 11, 1876. A French magistrate, and writer on the history of music. His works include "Histoire de l'harmonie au moyen âge" (1852), "Chants populaires des Flamands de France" (1856), "L'Art harmonique au XII^e et XIII^e siècles" (1865), etc.

Coustou (kôs-tô'), Guillaume. Born at Lyons, April 25, 1677; died at Paris, Feb. 20, 1746. A French sculptor, younger brother of Nicholas

Coustou. He won the grand prix de sculpture in 1697, and was sent to Rome. He became celebrated for his bold and independent style. Among his works are the allegorical figures of the Ocean and the Mediterranean at Marly, the colossal statue of the Rhône at Lyons, those of Bacchus, Minerva, Hercules, and Pallas, and a great number of bas-reliefs. His son Guillaume Coustou (born 1716; died July 13, 1777) was also a sculptor of note.

Coustou, Nicholas. Born at Lyons, Jan. 9, 1658; died at Paris, May 1, 1733. A French sculptor. He learned the rudiments of his art from his father, a wood-carver, and at eighteen entered the atelier of Coyzevox, then president of the Academy of Painting and Sculpture in Paris. He won the grand prix de sculpture in 1682, and went to Rome. Among his works are a Descent from the Cross, at Notre Dame; the colossal Seine and Marne, in the Tuileries Gardens; and many statues in the Tuileries and Versailles. He became a member of the Academy in 1693.

Coutances (kô-toñs'). A town in the department of Manche, France, 40 miles south of Cherbourg; the Roman Constantia (whence the name). It has a noted cathedral, one of the chief churches of Normandy. The front is fine, with large recessed portal, great traceried window opening on the nave, graceful arcades and rosettes, and the tall spires characteristic of Normandy. There is a high central tower and lantern. The interior is beautifully proportioned, and the vistas formed by the openings of the choir-chapels are highly picturesque. The vaulting and decorative arcading are notably good. Coutances was the ancient capital of Cotentin, and suffered in the Norman, English, and religious wars. Population (1891), commune, 8,115.

Couthon (kô-tôn'), Georges. Born at Oreet, near Clermont, France, 1756; guillotined at Paris, July 28, 1794. A French revolutionist. He was deputy to the Legislative Assembly in 1791, and to the Convention in 1792, and was one of the Trimmirate with Robespierre and Saint-Just. The three were executed at the same time.

Coutras (kô-trä'). A town in the department of Gironde, France, on the Dronne 25 miles east of Bordeaux. Here, Oct. 20, 1587, a victory was gained by Henry of Navarre over the Leaguers. It contained a noted castle, now destroyed. Population (1891), commune, 4,231.

Coutts (kôts), Thomas. Born at Edinburgh, Sept. 7, 1753; died at London, Feb. 24, 1822. An English banker, the founder, with his brother James, of the London banking-house of Coutts and Co. He was the son of Lord Provost John Coutts of Edinburgh. His third daughter, Sophia, married Sir Francis Burdett.

Couture (kô-tür'), Thomas. Born at Senlis, France, Dec. 21, 1815; died near Paris, March 30, 1879. A noted French painter, a pupil of Gros and Delaroche. He won the second grand prix de Rome in 1837. He first exhibited in the Salon in 1840 ("Jeune Vénus après une orgie"). Among his works are "L'Enfant prodigue," "Une veuve," "Le retour des champs" (1843), "Le trouvère" (1844), "Joeconde" (1847), etc. His chief work is "Les Romains de la décadence" (1847).

Covent Garden (kuv'ent gâr'den). [For Covent Garden.] A space in London, between the Strand and Longacre, which as early as 1222 was the convent garden belonging to the monks of St. Peter, Westminster. It was originally called Frère Pye Garden. (Hare.) At the Dissolution it was granted with neighboring properties, by Edward VI., to Edward, duke of Somerset. After his attainder in 1552 it went to John, earl of Bedford. The square was laid out for Francis, earl of Bedford, and partly built by Inigo Jones, whose church, St. Paul's, Covent Garden, still remains. The holdings of the Bedfords in this neighborhood were enormous. At one time its coffee-houses and taverns became the fashionable lounging-places for the authors, wits, and noted men of the kingdom. Dryden, Otway, Steele, Fielding, Peg Woffington, Kitty Clive, Samuel Foote, Booth, Garrick, and others were among its frequenters. See Covent Garden Market.

Covent Garden Journal. A biweekly periodical issued in Jan., 1752, by Henry Fielding, under the name of "Sir Alexander Drawansir, Knight, Censor of Great Britain." It was discontinued before the end of the year.

Covent Garden Market. A vegetable, fruit, and flower market held in Covent Garden. The space began to be used for this purpose early in the 17th century by the vendors from the villages near by. The market finally grew into a recognized institution, but till 1828 it was an unsightly assemblage of sheds and stalls. About that time the Duke of Bedford erected the present buildings. In 1859 a flower-market covered with glass was built on the south side of the opera-house.

Covent Garden Theatre. A theater in Bow street, Covent Garden, built by John Rich, the famous harlequin of Lincoln's Inn Theatre, in 1731. It was opened, under the dormant patent granted by Charles II. to Sir William Davenant, with Congreve's comedy "The Way of the World," Dec. 7, 1732. There was no first appearance at this house of any importance until that of Peg Woffington in "The Recruiting Officer," Nov. 8, 1740. In 1746 Garrick played here. During Rich's management pantomime reigned supreme. Rich died in 1761, leaving the theater to his son-in-law John Beard the vocalist. In 1767 it was sold to George Colman the elder, Harris, Rutherford, and Powell for £60,000. On March 15, 1773, Goldsmith's play "She Stoops to Conquer" was brought out here. In 1774 Harris undertook the management alone. In 1803 John Kemble bought a one-sixth share in the patent-right from Harris for £22,000, and became manager. In Sept., 1808, the house was burned. Eight months later it was rebuilt, according to the design of Smirke the architect, in imitation of the Parthenon (the pediment by Flaxman), at a cost of £300,000. John Philip Kemble was still manager. On account of the great expense of the undertaking Kemble raised the price of admission and built an extra row of boxes which he leased for £12,000 (?). This brought about the famous O. P. (old price) riots, which lasted sixty-one days and resulted in a general reduction. On June 29, 1817, John Kemble was followed by Charles Kemble. In 1822 the theater was thrown into chancery. In 1847 it commenced a new career as "The Royal Italian Opera House," but on March 4, 1856, it was burned down. It was rebuilt and the present house opened May 15, 1858.

Coventry (kuv'en-tri). A city in Warwickshire, England, 17 miles southeast of Birmingham. It has manufactures of bicycles, tricycles, watches, and ribbons, and was formerly celebrated for its woolens ("Coventry true blues"). Its chief buildings are the churches of St. Michael, the Trinity, and St. John, Christchurch, and St. Mary's Guildhall. According to legend it obtained its municipal rights from Leofric about 1044 by the ride of Godiva. (See Godiva.) It was formerly celebrated for the Coventry mystery plays. Population (1891), 52,720.

Coventry, John. Pseudonym of John William-son Palmer.

Coventry Plays. A series of forty-two religious plays acted at Coventry from an early date till about 1591. The first mention of them is in 1416. These plays were some of them written in 1468, but the title is thought to be of later date. This title terms the plays "Ludus Coventrie s. Ludus Corpus Christi," and Corpus Christi plays were performed at Coventry in the 15th and 16th centuries. Clerical authorship is suspected in many of them, from the style of writing employed. (Hard.) They are far more regular in form than the Chester plays (doubtless written for tradesmen by tradesmen), and their versification and diction much better. They are to be classed among the mysteries, although they contain one element of the moralities.

Sir William Dugdale, in his "History of Warwickshire," printed in 1656, speaks of the Coventry plays as "being acted with mighty state and reverence by the friars of this house, who had theatres for the several scenes, very large and high, placed upon wheels and drawn to all the eminent parts of the city," and he referred to the Cotton MS. for authority as to the nature of their plays. The series known as the "Coventry Mysteries" may possibly have belonged to the Coventry Grey Friars, and the Grey Friars may have acted in the streets one set of Mysteries, the Guilds another, though the practical difficulties in the way of believing that they did so are considerable. Certain it is that the plays now called "Coventry Mysteries" are not those which were acted by the Guilds of Coventry.

Morley, English Writers, IV. 114.

Coverdale (kuv'er-däl), Miles. Born in the North Riding of Yorkshire in 1488; died in Feb., 1568. The first translator of the whole Bible into English. He studied at Cambridge, was ordained priest in 1514 at Norwich, and joined the Austin friars at Cambridge. About 1526 he assumed the habit of a secular priest, and, leaving the convent, devoted himself to evangelical preaching. In 1531 he took his degree as bachelor of canon law at Cambridge. He was probably on the Continent the greater part of the time until 1535. In this year his translation of the Bible from Dutch and Latin appeared with a dedication to Henry VIII. In 1538 he was sent by Cromwell to Paris to superintend a new English edition of the Bible. This was known as "The Great Bible." A second "Great Bible," known as "Cranmer's Bible" (1540), was also edited by him. He returned from Paris in 1539, but in 1540, on the execution of Cromwell, he was obliged to leave England, and shortly after married Elizabeth Macheson. This repudiation of the celibacy of the priesthood identified him with the Reformers. He lived at Tubingen for a short time, and was made doctor of divinity. From 1543 to 1547 he lived at Bergzabern (Deux-Ponts) as Lutheran minister and schoolmaster. In 1548 he returned to England, and was appointed chaplain to the king through Cranmer's influence. In 1551 he was appointed bishop of Exeter, of which office he was deprived in 1553 and went again to Bergzabern. It has been said that he assisted in preparing the Geneva Bible. In 1559 we find him again in England. In 1563 he received from Cambridge the degree of doctor of divinity, and obtained the living of St. Magnus, near London Bridge. In 1566 he resigned this office on account of his objection to the enforced strict observance of the liturgy. He continued preaching, however, and was followed by crowds.

Coverdale, Miles. The relater of events in Hawthorne's "Blithedale Romance": a character which has many points of intellectual affinity with Hawthorne himself.

Coverley (kuv'er-li), Sir Roger de. The chief character in the club professing to write the "Spectator": an English country gentleman. He was sketched by Steele and developed by Addison.

Sir Roger de Coverley is not to be described by any pen but that of Addison. He exhibits, joined to a perfect simplicity, the qualities of a just, honest, useful man, and delightful companion. . . . Addison dwelt with tenderness on every detail regarding him, and finally described Sir Roger's death to prevent any less reverential pen from trifling with his hero.

Tuckerman, Hist. of Prose Fiction, p. 182.

Coviello (kô-vê-el'). The valet of Cléonte in Molière's comedy "Le bourgeois gentilhomme." His subtle inventions win the hand of Lueille for his master.

Coviello (kô-vê-el'lô). The conventional clown in old Italian comedy.

Covilham, or Covilhão (kō-vēl-yān'), Pedro de. Born at Covilhão, Portugal, about 1450; died in Abyssinia about 1540 (?). A Portuguese navigator. He was sent by John II. of Portugal to Asia, in 1487, in search of the legendary Prester John. Having visited the principal towns of Abyssinia and Malabar, and sent home a report of his journey, he presented himself in 1490 at the court of Alexander, prince of Abyssinia, who treated him with great kindness, but constrained him to remain in the country. His report is said to have been of use to Vasco da Gama in the discovery of the route to India round the Cape of Good Hope.

Covilhão (kō-vēl-yān'). A town in the province of Beira, Portugal, in lat. 40° 19' N., long. 7° 31' W. It is noted for its cloth manufactures. Population (1878), 10,809.

Covington (kuv'ing-tŏn). A city in Kenton County, Kentucky, situated on the Ohio River, at the mouth of the Licking, opposite Cincinnati. It has manufactures of iron, tobacco, etc., and is connected by a suspension-bridge with Cincinnati. Population (1890), 37,371.

Cowell, John. Born at Ernsborough, Devonshire, England, 1554; died at Cambridge, England, Oct. 11, 1611. An English jurist. He was regius professor of civil law at Cambridge 1594-1611, master of Trinity Hall in 1598, and vice-chancellor of the university in 1603 and 1604. He was the author of a legal dictionary entitled "The Interpreter, a booke containing the signification of words . . . mentioned in the Law-writers or statutes, etc." (1607). Certain passages in the book offended both the Commons and the king; the author was summoned before the council in 1610, and his dictionary was burned by the common hangman.

Under the heading "King" Cowell wrote: "He" is above the law by his absolute power, and though for the better and equal course in making laws, he do admit the Three Estates unto Council, yet this in divers learned men's opinions is not of constraint, but of his own benignity, or by reason of the promise made upon oath at the time of his coronation."

Act and Ransome, Eng. Polit. Hist., p. 84.

Cowell, Joseph Leathley. Born near Torquay, Aug. 7, 1792; died near London, Nov. 13, 1863. An English actor. His real name was Wittchett. He painted portraits, and was a clever and popular actor. He published an amusing autobiography in 1844. His daughter Sidney Frances (Mrs. H. L. Bateman) was the mother of Kate Bateman.

An English inventor of various important improvements in printing processes, including the system of inking-rollers and (with Applegath) the four-cylinder printing-machine. He became professor of mechanics at King's College, London.

Cowper, William. Died Oct. 10, 1723. An English statesman and jurist, created Baron Cowper of Wingham, Kent, Nov. 9, 1706, and Viscount Fordwich and Earl Cowper March 18, 1718. He entered Parliament in 1695; became lord keeper and privy councillor in 1705; served on the commission which drew up the Act of Union in 1706; became the first lord high chancellor of Great Britain May 4, 1707; presided at the trial of Dr. Sacheverell in 1710; resigned his office in Sept., 1710; was reappointed in Sept., 1714; and again resigned in 1718. He was a member of the Royal Society.

Cowper, William. Born at Great Berkhamstead, Hertfordshire, Nov. 15, 1731; died at East Dereham, Norfolk, April 23, 1800. A celebrated English poet, son of John Cowper, D. D., rector of Great Berkhamstead. He was educated at Westminster School, where he remained from his tenth to his eighteenth year, was entered at the Middle Temple in April, 1748, and was called to the bar in June, 1754. In 1759 he was appointed a commissioner of bankrupts. He early showed symptoms of melancholia, and in 1763 anxiety with regard to his fitness to fill an office which had been offered him brought on an attack of suicidal mania which necessitated a temporary confinement in a private asylum at St. Albans. In June, 1765, he removed to Huntingdon, remaining there, in the family of the Rev. Morley Unwin, until 1767, when Unwin having died, he removed with Mrs. Unwin to Olney in Buckinghamshire, where he lived until Nov., 1786, removing then to Weston, a neighboring village. He was subject to repeated attacks of mental disease, which showed itself, as at first, in a tendency to suicide and religious melancholy, and in his later years became a permanent condition of insanity. He published "Anti-Thelyphthora," a reply to a defense of polygamy so named (1781), "Poems" (1782), "The Task," with "Tirocinium," "John Gilpin," and an "Epistle to Joseph Hill" (1785), "Homer's Iliad and Odyssey" (1791), "The Power of Grace Illustrated," a translation of six letters from Van Lier to John Newton (1792), "Poems" (1798), and sixty-seven of the "Olney Hymns" (1799). After his death appeared "Poems," chiefly from the French of Madame Guyon (1811), a translation of the Latin and Italian poems of Milton (1808), an edition of Milton (1810), and some early poems (1825).

Coxcox. See the extract.

The Noah of the Mexican tribes was Coxcox, who, with his wife Xochiquetzal, alone escaped the deluge. They took refuge in the hollow trunk of a cypress (ahüchuetec), which floated upon the water, and stopped at last on top of a mountain of Culhuacan. They had many children, but all of them were dumb. The Great Spirit took pity on them, and sent a dove, who hastened to teach them to speak. Fifteen of the children succeeded in grasping the power of speech, and from these the Toltecs and Aztecs are descended. Hale, Story of Mexico, p. 22.

Coxe (koks), Arthur Cleveland. Born at Mendham, N. J., May 10, 1818. An American clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church. Crampel (krön-pel'), Paul. Born in France, 1863; died April, 1891. An African explorer. He began his African career in 1886, under S. de Brazza.

In 1888-89 he made a successful journey from Madiville, on the Ogowe River, through the Fan country to Corisco Bay. In 1890 the Comité de l'Afrique Française sent him to Lake Chad in order to connect the French Sahara with the French Congo. At the head of 30 Senegalese soldiers and 250 carriers, and assisted by 3 Europeans, he left Stanley Pool on Aug. 15, 1890. From Bangi, the last European post on the Mobaigi River, he marched northward as far as El Kuti, between lat. 9° and 10° N. Here he was abandoned by most of his carriers, and while attempting to force his way to the north fell a victim to the fanaticism of the Senoussi Moslems. Of his white companions, one died, one was killed, and only one, Nébout, escaped to the coast.

Crane (krän), Ichabod. A country schoolmaster in Irving's "Legend of Sleepy Hollow." He is the lover of Caterina Van Tassel, and is frightened out of the country-side and the way of his rival by his adventure with the latter disguised as the Headless Horseman. "The cognomen of Crane was not inapplicable to his person. He was tall, but exceedingly lank, with narrow shoulders, long arms and legs, hands that dangled a mile out of his sleeves, feet that might have served for shovels, and his whole frame most loosely hung together. His head was small, and flat at top, with huge ears, large green glassy eyes, and a large snipe nose, so that it looked like a weathercock, perched upon his spindle neck, to tell which way the wind blew. To see him striding along the profile of a hill on a windy day, with his clothes bagging and fluttering about him, one might have mistaken him for the genius of famine descending upon the earth, or some scarecrow eloped from a corn-field." Washington Irving, The Sketch-Book (Sleepy Hollow).

Crane, Walter. Born at Liverpool, 1845. An English genre-painter, best known by his illustrations for children's books, fairy tales, etc.

Cranganore (kran-ga-nör'). A port on the Malabar coast, British India, in lat. 10° 14' N., long. 76° 10' E. It was early held by the Portuguese, and later by the Dutch (16th-18th centuries). It is the traditional scene of the labors of St. Thomas.

Cramer (krau'mër), Thomas. Born at Aslacton, Nottinghamshire, July 2, 1489; died at Oxford, March 21, 1556. Archbishop of Canterbury. He was educated at Cambridge, where he took the degree of B. A. in 1512 and that of M. A. in 1515. In 1529 he obtained the favor of Henry VIII. by proposing that, in order to avoid the necessity of an appeal to Rome, the question of the king's marriage with Catharine of Aragon should be referred to the universities. He was appointed chaplain to the king, and in 1530 accompanied the Earl of Wiltshire on a mission to the Pope in reference to the divorce. In 1532 he was sent on a mission to the emperor in Germany, and in the same year infringed the rule of the Roman Catholic Church by marrying a niece of Osiander. He was appointed archbishop of Canterbury in 1533, and in the same year pronounced the marriage of Henry with Catharine of Aragon invalid. He abjured his allegiance to Rome in 1535, became a member of the regency for Edward VI. in 1547, and in 1548 was head of the commission which composed the first English prayer-book. He invited a number of distinguished foreign Protestants to settle in England, including Peter Martyr, Ochino, Bucser, and Alasco the Pole. He was induced by Edward VI. in 1553 to sign the patent which settled the crown on Lady Jane Grey to the exclusion of Mary and Elizabeth, and was in consequence committed to the Tower for treason on the accession of Mary. He was subsequently tried for heresy, and in spite of numerous recantations (which he repudiated at his execution) was sentenced to the stake.

Crannon, or Cranon (kran'on). [Gr. Κρανών, Κρανών.] In ancient geography, a city in Thessaly, Greece, about 10 miles southwest of Larissa (exact site not known). Here, 322 B. C., Antipater defeated the confederated Greeks.

Cranon (called also Ephyra) was a city in the part of Thessaly known as Pelagiotis (Heacat. Fr. 112; Steph. Byz. ad voc.). It stood in a fertile plain, remarkable alike for its cereal crops (Liv. xiii. 64, 65) and for its pasture (Theoc. xvi. 38). Its exact site cannot well be fixed; but the plain in which it stood is undoubtedly that which lies south of the low ridge between Larissa and Fersala (Pharsalia), watered by the Enipeus, or Apidanus (Fersaliti). Rauflinson, Herod., III. 504, note.

Crans. See Gés.

Crawley (krä'li). The name of a well-known family in Thackeray's novel "Vanity Fair." Sir Pitt Crawley, the head of the family, is a rich but sordid old man, fond of low society; to his house Becky Sharp goes as governess. She makes herself so attractive that he offers to marry her, when she is obliged to acknowledge her secret marriage with Rawdon Crawley, his youngest son. The latter is a blackleg and a gambler, but is fond of his wife and has a certain honor of his own. Mr. Pitt Crawley is a prig with "hay colored whiskers and straw-colored hair." "He was called Miss Crawley at Eton, where his younger brother Rawdon used to lick him violently." The second Lady Crawley, a pale and apathetic woman, is a contrast to her sister-in-law, the little, eager, active, black-eyed Miss Bute Crawley. The Rev. Bute Crawley is a "tall, stately, jolly, shovel-hatted man," a horse-racing parson whose wife writes his sermons for him. Miss Crawley, the sister of Sir Pitt and the Rev. Bute, is a kind and selfish, worldly and generous old woman, "who had a balance at her banker's which would have made her beloved anywhere."

Crayer (krä'yér), Gaspar de. Born at Antwerp, Nov. 18, 1584; died at Ghent, Jan. 27, 1669. A Flemish painter. His best-known works are "St. Catharine" in Ghent, and Maddonnas in Munich, Vienna, etc.

Crédit Mobilier (kred'it mō-bē'liér; F. pron. krä-lé' mō-bē-lyä'). [F. lit. 'personal eredit': crédit, credit; mobilier, personal (of property), from mobile, movable.] 1. In French history, a banking corporation formed in 1852, under the name of the "Société Générale du Crédit Mobilier," with a capital of 60,000,000 francs, for the placing of loans, handling the stocks of all other companies, and the transaction of a general banking business. It engaged in very extensive transactions, buying, selling, and loaning in such a manner as to bring into one organized whole all the stocks and credit of France, and was apparently in a most prosperous condition until it proposed to issue bonds to the amount of 240,000,000 francs. This amount of paper currency frightened financiers, and the government forbade its issue. From this time the company rapidly declined, and closed its affairs in 1867, with great loss to all but its proprietors.

2. In United States history, a similar corporation chartered in Pennsylvania in 1863 with a capital of $2,500,000. In 1867, after passing into new hands, and increasing its stock to $3,750,000, it became a new company for the building of the Union Pacific Railroad.

For a few years it paid large dividends, and its stock rose in value. In a trial in Pennsylvania in 1872 as to the ownership of some stock, it was shown that certain congressmen secretly possessed stock, and both houses of the Congress that met in December of that year appointed committees of investigation. The Senate committee recommended the expulsion of one member, but the Senate did nothing. The House committee recommended the expulsion of two of its members, but the House, instead, passed resolutions of censure.

Credner (kräd'ner), Hermann. Born at Gotha, Oct. 1, 1841. A noted German geologist, professor at Leipzig from 1870. He traveled in North America 1864-68. Among his scientific publications the most notable are those relating to glacial problems.

Credulous (kred'ū-lus), Justice, and Mrs. Bridget (brij'et). An ignorant, good-natured pair in Sheridan's farce "St. Patrick's Day." They are fooled by the scheming lieutenant who marries their daughter Lauretta. Mrs. Bridget is a kind of Mrs. Malaprop. She speaks of a soldier "like a colossus, with one leg at New York and the other at Chelsea Hospital" (St. Patrick's Day, 1. 2).

Cree (krē), or Cristineaux, or Knistineaux. An important tribe of North American Indians, who live principally in Manitoba and Assiniboia, between Red River and Lake Winnipeg and the Saskatchewan River. See Algonquian.

Creek, or Kreek (krēk). [Pl., also Creeks.] A powerful confederacy of North American Indians which in historic times occupied the greater part of Alabama and Georgia. The confederacy seems to have existed in 1540, and to have then embraced at least the following named tribes: Abika (or Coosa), Okfuski, Kasi'hta, and Kawita; afterward the Alabama, Hitchiti, Koasiti, Taskigi, Yuchi, and Yamasi. During the 18th century the only important conflict between the settlers and these tribes was with the Yamasi, which was instigated by the Spaniards; but the Creek war in 1813-14 was serious, and resulted in the cession to the United States of the greater part of the Creek land. Between 1835 and 1843 occurred the Seminole war, which was very costly in life and money to the United States government. The Creek "Nation" now holds lands in Indian Territory, and is well organized. The population, which contains many of mixed blood, is 14,000. Also called Maskoki, Muskoki, Mascojee, Mobilian. See Muskogean.

Crefeld, or Krefeld (krä'feld). A city in the Rhine Province, Prussia, 12 miles northwest of Düsseldorf. It has a royal textile academy, is the chief seat of the velvet and silk manufacture of Germany, and exports its fabrics largely to Great Britain, the United States, etc. It was acquired by Prussia from the house of Nassau in 1702. Here, on June 23, 1758, Ferdinand of Brunswick defeated the French under the Count of Clermont. Population (1890), commune, 105,376.

Creil (kräy). A town in the department of Oise, France, situated on the Oise 30 miles north of Paris. Population (1891), commune, 8,183.

Crelle (krel'le), August Leopold. Born at Eichwerder, near Wriezen, Prussia, March 11, 1780; died at Berlin, Oct. 6, 1855. A German mathematician and engineer.

Cremitz. See Kremnitz.

Cremona (krē-mō'nä; It. pron. krä-mō'nä). 1. A province of Lombardy, Italy, bordering on the Po. It has manufactures of silk. Area, 686 square miles. Population (1881), 302,138. — 2. The capital of the above province, situated on the Po in lat. 45° 8' N., long. 10° 1' E. It contains a cathedral (see below), the Palazzo Pubblico, and the Torrazzo, the highest tower in northern Italy (396 feet). It has important silk manufactures, and has long been celebrated for the manufacture of violins and viols, in which the Amati family, Stradivarius, and others, from the 16th to the 18th century, achieved reputation. In the 16th century it had a school of art. It is an ancient Gallic town; was colonized by the Romans about 219 B. C.; was destroyed by Vespasian's troops

69 A. D.; and flourished in the middle ages. The cathedral was begun in 1107. The front, in alternate courses of red and white marble, has a fine doorway, with columns resting on lions; the north transept has a similar porch. The interior is rich in good frescos. The Lombard baptistry is octagonal, with arched interior and an octagonal font of red marble. Population (1891), commune, 88,000.

Cremonne Gardens. A former place of amusement in London, situated near Battersea Bridge north of the Thames. They were closed in 1877.

Crens (kränz), or Guerens (gwä-ränz'). [Botocudo, 'old ones,' 'ancients.'] The name given by Von Martius to the extensive group of Brazilian Indians to which the Botocudos belong.

See Botocudos. Some ethnologists call them Tapuyos, a name given to them by the Tupis. All the tribes of the Crens stock are savages of a low grade. Among the more important ones, besides the Botocudos, are the Carahós, Cayapós, Chavantes, Cherentes, and Gés. The stock is believed to be the most ancient in Brazil, and it has been connected with the human remains found in caverns with the bones of extinct animals.

Creole State. The State of Louisiana.

Creon (krē'on). [Gr. Κρέων.] 1. In Greek legend, a king of Corinth, father of Glauce or Creusa, the wife of Jason. — 2. A king of Thebes, contemporary with Edipus.

Crépy-en-Laonnais (krä-pé'on-lä-o-nä'), or Crespy. A village in the department of Aisne, France, 6 miles northwest of Laon. Here was signed, Sept. 18, 1544, a treaty of peace between Francis I. of France and the emperor Charles V. The former renounced claims to Lombardy, Naples, and the suzerainty of Flanders and Artois; the latter renounced claims to Burgundy.

Crescent City. New Orleans: so named from its position on a bend of the Mississippi River.

Crescentini (kre-shen-tē'nē), Girolamo. Born at Urbina, near Urbino, Italy, 1769; died at Naples, April 24, 1846. A celebrated Italian singer (mezzo-soprano) and composer, professor at the Royal College of Music at Naples from 1816.

Crescentius (kres-sen'shius), or Cencius (sen'shius). Died 998. A leader of the popular faction at Rome. Having obtained the dignity of consul 980, he usurped the government, and announced his intention of restoring the ancient republic. He opposed Pope Gregory V., who was elected through the influence of the emperor Otto III., and, supported by the Byzantine court, put forward John XVI. as antipope. He was defeated by Otto at St. Angelo, April 29, 988, and put to death. According to the legend Crescentius was revenged by his widow Stephanía or Theodora, who, having succeeded in gaining the confidence and the love of the emperor, put him to death by poison.

There he (the emperor) put the rebel Crescentius, in whom modern enthusiasm has seen a patriotic republican who, reviving the institutions of Alberic, had ruled as consul or senator, sometimes entitling himself Emperor. Bryce, Holy Roman Empire.

Crescenzi (kre-shen'dzē), Pietro. Born at Bologna, Italy, 1230; died at Bologna, 1307 (?). An Italian writer on agriculture, author of "Opus ruralium commodorum" (1471), one of the first of printed books, etc.

Crespo (kres'pō), Joaquin. Born in Miranda about 1845. A Venezuelan politician. He succeeded Guzman Blanco as president (being elected as his candidate) Feb. 20, 1882, to Feb. 20, 1886. In 1892 he headed a revolt against Palacio, occupied Caracas Oct. 7, 1892, and soon after was elected president. A new constitution was adopted June, 1893, and under it Crespo was inaugurated president for four years, March 14, 1894.

Crespy (krä-pē'). See Crépy-en-Laonnais.

Cressid (kres'id), or Cressida (kres'i-djā). The mythical daughter of a Trojan priest (Alchas, whose infidelities make her name a byword for faithlessness. See Troilus and Cressida).

As far as can be made out, the invention of Cressid (called by him, and for some time afterwards, Briseida, and so identified with Homer's Briseis) belongs to Benoit de Ste. More, a trouvère of the twelfth century, who wrote a Roman de Troie of great length, as well as a verse chronicle of Normandy. The story is told by Benoit in no small detail, and the character of Briseida (which Dryden has entirely spoilt by making her faithful) is well indicated. After Benoit, Guido delle Colonne reproduced the story in a very popular Latin work, the Historia Trojana. Cressid is here still Briseida, or rather Briseia. From Guido the story passed to Boccaccio, who seems himself to be responsible for the character of Pandarus, and from Boccaccio to Chaucer. "Lollius," alluded to by Chaucer, is believed to be a misnomer. Saintsbury, note in Dryden's Troilus and Cressida (Scott's [ed., revised 1884]).

Cressid, or Creseide, Testament of, and its continuation The Complaint of Creseide. Poems by Robert Henryson, attributed by Stowe (1561) to Chaucer.

Cressingham (kres'ing-am), Lady. In Middleton's play "Anything for a Quiet Life," a whimsical and attractive woman whose caprices are accounted for by her desire to reconcile her husband and stepson and to benefit them both.

Cresswell (kres'wel), Sir Cresswell. Born at Newcastle, England, 1794; died at London, July 29, 1863. An English jurist, first judge of the English Divorce Court (1858).

Creswick (kres'wik), Thomas. Born at Sheffield, England, Feb. 5, 1811; died at Bayswater, London, Dec. 28, 1863. An English landscape-painter. His subjects were chiefly English rural scenery.

Crete (krēt), It. Candia (kan'di-ä; It. pron. kändē-ä). [Gr. Κρήνη, L. Creta, F. Candia; mod. Gr. Kriti, Turk. Kiriti.] An island in the Mediterranean, situated southeast of Greece and southwest of Asia Minor. It forms a vilayet of the Turkish empire. Its surface is mostly mountainous, and it produces wheat, fruit, wool, and wine. The chief towns are Khania and Megalo Kastrol. Its inhabitants are mainly of Greek descent. Crete was connected with legends of Zeus and Minos, and was celebrated in antiquity for its laws. It was subdued by the Romans under Metellus in 67 B. C.; conquered by Saracens 823; and later was a part of the Byzantine empire. It was ceded to Venice in 1204. Its conquest by the Turks was completed in 1669. Its people took part in the Greek war of independence. The government was administered by Egypt from 1830 to 1840. The island has been the scene of many revolts. Length, 155 miles. Greatest width, 35 miles. Area, about 3,300 square miles. Population, 294,192.

Crétin (krä-tän'), Guillaume. A French poet who lived in the reigns of Charles VIII., Louis XII., and Francis I.

But the leader of the whole was Guillaume Crétin (birth and death dates uncertain), whom his contemporaries extolled in the most extravagant fashion, and whom a single satirical stroke of Rabelais has made a laughing-stock for some three hundred and fifty years. The rondeau ascribed to Raminagrobis, the "vieux poète français" of Pantagruel, is Crétin's, and the name and character have stuck. Crétin was not worse than his fellows; but when even such a man as Marot could call him a poète souverain, Rabelais no doubt felt it time to protest in his own way. Marot himself, it is to be observed, confuses himself chiefly by citing Crétin's vers équivoques, which of their kind, and if we could do otherwise than pronounce that kind hopelessly bad, are without doubt ingenious. His poems are chiefly occasional verse, letters, debats, etc., besides ballades and rondeaux of all kinds. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 165.

Creusa (krē-ū'sjā). In classical legend, the daughter of Priam, and wife of Æneas.

Creuse (kréz). 1. A department of central France, lying between Indre and Cher on the north, Allier and Puy-de-Dôme on the east, Corrèze on the south, and Haute-Vienne on the west. It was formed from the ancient Haute-Marche and small portions of Limousin, Bourbonnais, Poitou, and Berri. Capital, Guéret. Area, 2,150 square miles. Population (1891), 284,660.

2. A river in central France which joins the Vienne.

Creusot, or Creuzot (kré-zō'), Le. A town in the department of Saône-et-Loire, France, 13 miles southeast of Autun. It is the seat of Schneider and Co.'s iron-works, and has other extensive manufactures of cast-iron, steel, manufactured iron, locomotives, etc. Population (1891), commune, 28,635.

Creutz, Count Gustaf Philip. Born in Finland, 1731; died Oct. 30, 1785. A Swedish politician and poet. He was appointed ambassador to Madrid in 1763, and three years later was transferred to Paris, where he became intimate with Franklin, with whom he concluded a treaty of commerce between Sweden and the United States April 3, 1783.

Creuzer (kroitz'zēr), Georg Friedrich. Born at Marburg, Prussia, March 10, 1771; died at Heidelberg, Baden, Feb. 16, 1858. A German philologist and archaeologist, appointed professor of philology at Marburg in 1802, and at Heidelberg in 1807. He founded the Philological Seminary at Heidelberg in 1807. His chief work is "Symbolik und Mythologie der alten Völker, besonders der Griechen" (1810-12).

Crévant-sur-Yonne (krä-von'sür-yon'), Battle of. See Cravant.

Crevaux (kré-vô'), Jules Nicolas. Born at Lorquin, Lorraine, April 1, 1847; died in the Gran Chaco, Bolivia, April 24, 1882. A French surgeon and traveler. In 1876, being stationed in French Guiana, he began explorations in the interior, twice crossing to the Amazon; later he explored the Japurá branch of the Amazon, and traveled on the Orinoco. In 1881 he left Buenos Ayres with a number of companions, having planned an extended trip through the center of South America; but while ascending the river Pilcomayo all the company but two were killed by the Indians. The results of his explorations have been published in the "Tour du monde," and in the "proceedings" of various scientific societies.

Crèvecoeur (kräv-kër'). A former fort near Herzogenbush, Netherlands, situated at the junction of the Dieze and Meuse.

Crèvecoeur, Hector Saint-John de. Born at Caen, France, 1731; died near Paris, 1813. A French agriculturist. He emigrated to America in 1764, and settled on a farm near New York. In 1780, while about to sail for Europe, he was arrested at New York by the British on the suspicion of being a spy, and was detained several months. Returning from Europe in 1783, he was for many years French consul at New York, and enjoyed the friendship of Washington and Franklin. He wrote "Lettres d'un cultivateur américain" (1784), and "Voyage dans la haute Pensylvanie et dans l'état de New York" (1801).

Crèvecoeur, Philippe de. Died at La Bresle, near Lyons, France, 1494. A French general. He commanded the French at the battle of Guinegate (1479), in which he was defeated by Maximilian of Austria with a large force of Flemings; and became marshal of France in 1492.

Crévier (krä-vyā'), Jean Baptiste Louis. Born at Paris, 1693; died at Paris, Dec. 1, 1765. A French historian and man of letters. He continued Rollin's "Histoire romaine," and wrote "Histoire des empereurs jusqu'à Constantin" (1750-56), "Rhétorique française" (1765), etc.

Crewe (krö). A town in Cheshire, England, 31 miles southeast of Liverpool. It is an important railway center, and the seat of manufactures of railway rolling-stock, etc. Population (1891), 28,761.

Crewler (krö'ler). The name of a family in Dickens's "David Copperfield." The Rev. Horace Crewler is a poor clergyman with a large family, and a wife who has lost the use of her legs—when anything annoys or excites her it goes to her legs directly. Sophy, the fourth daughter, is an unselfish girl who finally marries Tommy Traddles.

Creyton (krä'ton), Paul. A pseudonym of J. T. Trowbridge.

Cribb (krib), Tom. Born at Hanham, Gloucestershire, England, July 8, 1781; died at Woolwich, May 11, 1848. An English champion pugilist, known as "the Black Diamond" (from his occupation as a coal-porter).

Cricca (krék'kä). In Tomkiss's comedy "Albunazar," the honest servant of Pandolfo.

Crichanás (kré-shá-nás'). An Indian tribe of the state of Amazonas, Brazil, north of the Amazon, near the Rio Branco. They are of Carib stock. As a result of their recent struggles with the Brazilian frontier settlements, they have been almost exterminated.

Crichton (kri'ton), James (styled "The Admirable Crichton"). Born in Scotland, Aug. 19, 1560; killed at Mantua, Italy, July 3, 1583 (?). A Scottish scholar and adventurer, celebrated for his extraordinary accomplishments, and attainments in the languages, sciences, and arts. At the age of seventeen he started upon his travels on the Continent. He was then the reputed master of twelve languages. He enlisted in the French army about 1577. In 1579 he resigned and went to Italy. Here many debates both public and private were arranged for him, in all of which he was victorious except with Mazzoni. He wrote Latin odes and verses with ease, and his skill as a swordsman was highly lauded. In 1581 he disputed with the professors of the university at Padua on their interpretation of Aristotle. A misadventure led to his being denounced as a charlatan, whereupon he challenged the university, offering to confute their Aristotelian interpretations and to expose their errors in mathematics. The disputation lasted four days, and Crichton was completely successful. He won his first laurels in Mantua by killing in a duel a far-famed swordsman. His death took place there in a midnight street attack. Crichton is said to have recognized the leader of the brawlers as his pupil, the son of the Duke of Mantua, and having drawn his sword upon him to have offered it to him by the handle; whereupon the prince seized it and stabbed him to the heart. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Crichton, The. A London artistic, scientific, and literary club, established in 1872.

Crichton, The Admirable. See Crichton, James.

Cricket on the Hearth. The. A tale by Charles Dickens, published in 1845. The singing-match between a tea-kettle and a cricket on a carrier's hearthstone, in which the latter comes out ahead, gives its name to the book. "To have a cricket on the hearth is the luckiest thing in the world."

Crieff (kréf). A town in Perthshire, Scotland, 16 miles west of Perth. Population (1891), 4,901.

Crillon (kré-yón'). Louis des Balbes de Berton de. Born at Murs, Provence, France, 1541; died at Avignon, France, Dec. 2, 1615. A celebrated French general, called "L'Homme sans peur" ("the fearless"). He fought against the Huguenots in the civil wars, taking part in the battles of Rouce, Drenx, St. Denis, Jarnac, Moncontour, and St. Jean d'Angely; served as a Knight of Malta under Don John of Austria at Lepanto in 1571; and held a high command in the army of Henry III. during the war of the League 1580-89. After the death of Henry III. he entered the service of Henry IV., under whom he fought at the battle of Ivry in 1590, and from whom he received the title "le brave des braves."

Crillon-Mahon (kré-yón'mä-ón'), Louis des Balbes de Berton, Due de. Born 1718; died at Madrid, 1796. A French general. He served with distinction at Fontenoy 1745, and in the Seven Years' War. Later he passed into the Spanish service, conquered Minorca 1782, and was made captain of the Spanish armies and duke of Mahon. His "Memoires" were published in 1791.

Crimea (kri-mé'ä). [Russ. Krym or Krim, F. Crimée.] A peninsula in the government of Taurida, southern Russia, nearly surrounded by the Black Sea and Sea of Azoff; the ancient Taurica Chersonesus. In the northern portion its surface is a plain, but south of the river Salghir it is mountainous. Its inhabitants are principally Russians and Tatars. Capital, Simferopol. Its ancient inhabitants were the Cimmericians, afterward called Taurians. It was the seat of the kingdom of Bosphorus (which see), and was frequently overrun in the middle ages. It became a dependency of Turkey in 1475, was annexed to Russia in 1783, and in 1854-55 was the scene of the Crimean war (which see). Area, 9,928 square miles.

Crime and Punishment. A novel by Dostoyevsky, published in 1866.

Crimean War. A war waged 1853-56 between Russia and the allied forces of Turkey, France, Great Britain, and Sardinia. It arose through the demand on the part of Russia for a protectorate over the Greek subjects of the sultan. Among its leading events are: battle of Sinope 1853; Russian occupation of the Danubian principalities 1854; battle of the Alma Sept. 20, 1854; beginning of the siege of Sebastopol Oct., 1854; battle of Balaklava Oct. 25; battle of Inkerman Nov. 5; attacks on Sebastopol June, 1855; battle of Tchernaya Aug. 16; storming the Malakoff Sept. 8; fall of Sebastopol Sept. 11; and the capture of Kars by the Russians Nov. 28, 1855. The war was closed, and its issues decided, by the treaty of Paris (which see), March 30, 1856.

Crimisus (kri-mi'sus), or Crimissus (kri-mis'us). In ancient geography, a river in western Sicily, probably near Segesta. Here, 339 B. C., Timoleon with 11,000 men defeated 70,000 Carthaginians.

Crimmitschau, or Crimmitschau (krim'mit-shou). A manufacturing town in Saxony, situated on the Pleisse 36 miles south of Leipzig. Its leading industries are spinning and weaving. Population (1890), 19,972.

Crinan (krö'nan) Canal. A canal through the peninsula of Argyllshire, Scotland, connecting Loch Fyne with the ocean. Length, 9 miles.

Cringle, Tom. See Scott, Michael.

Cringle (kring'gl), Tom. The pseudonym of William Walker, in his works on Australia.

Cripple Creek (krip'l krék). A mining town in El Paso County, Colorado, about 30 miles southwest of Colorado Springs, at the base of Pike's Peak. Population (1894), about 10,000.

Cripple of Fenchurch. See Fair Maid of the Exchange.

Cripplegate (krip'l-gät), or Crepel-gate. An old London gate. It was the fourth from the western end of the wall. The original gate was probably built by King Alfred when he restored the walls, 886 A. D. Stow says that in 1010, when the body of Edmund the Martyr, king of the East Angles, was borne through this gate, many lame persons who were congregated there to beg rose upright and were cured by its miraculous influence. The postern was afterward a prison for debtors and common trespassers. It was rebuilt in 1244 and in 1491, and in the fifteenth year of Charles II. it was repaired and a foot-postern made. The rooms over the gate were used by the city water-bailiff. Cripplegate was pulled down in 1760.

Crish Kingle. See Criss Kingle.

Crisp (krisp), Charles Frederick. Born at Sheffield, England, Jan. 29, 1845. An American politician. He served as a lieutenant in the Confederate army in the Civil War; was admitted to the bar in 1866; was appointed solicitor-general of the southwestern judicial district in 1872; was reappointed for a term of four years in 1873; was appointed judge of the Superior Court of the same district in 1877; was elected by the general assembly to the same office in 1878; was re-elected judge for a term of four years in 1880; resigned in 1882; was a Democratic representative from Georgia from the Forty-eighth through the Fifty-third Congress; and was speaker of the House in the Fifty-second and Fifty-third Congresses.

Crispi (kris'pé), Francesco. Born at Ribera, Sicily, Oct. 4, 1819. An Italian statesman. He studied law at the University of Palermo, and in 1846 settled at Naples. He served as a major under Garibaldi at Calatafimi in 1860; was returned by Palermo to the first Italian Parliament in 1861; became president of the Chamber of Deputies in 1876; was minister of the interior 1877-78; and was prime minister 1887-91, and again 1893-.

Crispin (kris'pin), Saint. [L. Crispinus, Crispianus, having curly hair; F. Crispin, Cripin, It. Crispino, Crispo, Sp. Crispo.] A Christian martyr, a member of a noble Roman family, who with his brother Crispinianus fled to Soissons and took up the trade of a shoemaker. He is said to have been so desirous of helping the poor that he stole leather to make shoes for them. He was put to death about 287 by being thrown into a caldron of melted lead. He is the patron saint of shoemakers. His day in the Roman and Anglican churches is Oct. 25.

Crispin (kris'pin; F. pron. krës-pañ'). An impudent, boasting, and witty valet, a ready assistant in the love-affairs of his master; a conventional character in French comedy, introduced apparently from the Italian comedy by Poirson about 1654. If Poirson was not creator of the character, he played it remarkably, and his costume has come down to this time. Crispin was for a long time to French comedy what Harlequin was to Italian comedy.

Crispin, Gilbert. Died about 1117. An English scholar and prelate, abbot of Westminster. Two of his works have survived, "Vita Iheronimi," the chief authority for the early history of Bee, and "Disputatio Judaei cum Christiano," a dialogue between a Jew and the author.

Crispin, Rival de son Maître. A comedy by Le Sage, produced in 1707.

Crispinella (kris-pi-nel'ä). In Marston's play "The Dutch Courtesan," a sparkling, lively girl, the opposite of her sister Beatrice.

Little Crispinella (though even less choice in her language than Shakspeare's Beatrice) is one of the most sparkling figures of Elisabethan comedy, and in adequate hands would prove a source of genuine delight to any audience. Ward.

Crispino e la Comare (krës-pë'nö ä lä kö-mä're). [It., "The Shoemaker and the Fairy Godmother."] A comic opera by Luigi Ricci, first produced at Venice in 1850. Federico Ricci assisted his brother in its composition. The words are by Piave.

Crispinus (kris-pi'nus). In Ben Jonson's "Poetaster," a bad poet who gives its title to the play. He is intended for Marston, with whom Jonson had a quarrel at the time. "It is represented as a coarse-minded, ill-conditioned fellow, albeit of gentle parentage, who, like the bore encountered by Horace in the Via Sacra, is prepared to adopt the meanest stratagems in order to gain admittance to the society of courtiers and wits." Bullen.

Crispus (kris'pus), Flavius Julius. Died 326 A. D. Eldest son of Constantine the Great and Minervina. He was made Caesar in 317, and consul in 318. He distinguished himself in a campaign against the Franks and in the war against Licinius, over whom he gained a great naval victory in the Hellespont in 323. He was put to death by his father on a charge of high treason.

Crissa (kris'sä), or Crisa (kri'sä), or Cirra (sir'ä). [Gr. Kpissa, Kpisa, Kippa.] In ancient geography, a city of Phœcis, Greece, situated southwest of Delphi. It was styled by Homer "the divine." It is often confounded with its port, Cirra.

Criss Kingle (kris' king'gl). [Also Kriss Kingle, Kriss Kringle; corrupt forms of "Christ-kindel" (cf. criss-cross for Christ-cross), from the G. "Christ-kindel" or "Christ-kindlein" or Christ-kindchen, the little Christ-child, dim. of Christ-kind, the Christ-child.] The Christ-child.

Cristineaux (krës-ti-nö'). See Cric.

Cristinos (krës-lë'nös). In Spanish history, the partizans of Donna Maria Christina (Sp. Cristina), regent for her daughter Isabella Maria II, 1833-40. Ferdinand VII, who married Christina in 1829, repealed the Salic law of succession, introduced by Philip V, 1713, in accordance with which females could inherit the throne only in case of the total extinction of the male line; and by a decree of March, 1830, called the pragmatic sanction, established the old Castilian law in accordance with which the daughters and grand-daughters of the king take precedence of his brothers and nephews. The pragmatic sanction was not recognized by the king's brother, Don Carlos, who, supported by the clericals or absolutists, began a civil war on the death of Ferdinand, 1833. See Carlota.

Crites (kri'téz). [Gr. κριτης, a judge.] A man of "straight judgment and a strong mind," in Jonson's play "Cynthia's Revels."

Throughout the quarto he is called Critiens. By Crites here (1616, folio), as well as by Asper in "Every Man out of his Humour," and Horace in the "Poetaster," Jonson undoubtedly meant to shadow forth himself. This sacrifice to vanity, as it involved him in personalities, naturally increased the number of his enemies, and exaggerated the hostility with which he was long pursued.

Gifford, Note to Jonson's Cynthia's Revels.

Critias (kri'ti-as). [Gr. Κριτίας.] An Athenian orator and politician, a pupil of Socrates, and and one of the thirty tyrants (404 B. C.): noted for his dissolute life, rapacity, and cruelty. He perished in the battle of Mynychia. Plato introduces him in a dialogue (a fragment) which bears his name.

Critic (krit'ik). The. A farce by Richard Brinsley Sheridan, produced Oct. 30, 1779. It is an imitation of Buckingham's "Rehearsal."

Criticon (krit'i-kon). See the extract.

The most remarkable work of Gracian, however, is his "Criticon," published in three parts, between 1650 and 1653. It is an allegory on human life, and gives us the adventures of Critilus, a noble Spaniard, wrecked on the desert island of Saint Helena, where he finds a solitary savage, who knows nothing about himself, except that he has been nursed by a wild beast. After much communication in dumb show, they are able to understand each other in Spanish, and, being taken from the island, travel together through the world, talking often of the leading men of their time in Spain, but holding intercourse more with allegorical personages than with one another. The story of their adventures is long, and its three portions represent the three periods of human life; the first being called the Spring of Childhood, the second the Autumn of Manhood, and the third the Winter of Old Age. In some parts it shows much talent; and eloquent discussions on moral subjects, and glowing descriptions of events and natural scenery, can occasionally be taken from it, which are little infected with the extravagances of the "Cultivated Style." Sometimes we are reminded of the "Pilgrim's Progress," as, for instance, in the scenes of the World's Fair, and might almost say that the "Criticon" is to the Catholic religion and the notions of life in Spain during the reign of Philip the Fourth what Bunyan's fiction is to Puritanism and the English character in the age of Cromwell. Ticknor, Span. Lit., 111, 222.

Criticus. See Critica.

Critique de L'École des femmes (krè-tèk' de là-kòl' dà fan). A brilliant short play by Molière, acted in 1663. It introduces contemporary society criticizing his "École des femmes."

Critique of Pure Reason. [G. Kritik der reinen Vernunft.] A famous philosophical work by Kant, published in 1781. A second and revised edition appeared in 1787; the later editions are reprints of this. The changes introduced in the second edition have been the occasion of much discussion among German philosophers, many maintaining that they show an essential alteration of Kant's doctrines. Kant himself, however, declared that they were made solely to secure greater clearness.

Crito (kri'tō). [Gr. Κρίτων.] Lived about 400 B. C. An Athenian, a friend and follower of Socrates. He is a prominent character in the dialogue by Plato named for him.

Critolaus (krit-ō-lā'us). [Gr. Κριτόλαος.] 1. Died 146 B. C. An Achaean demagogue, last strategus of the Achaean League, defeated by Metellus at Scarphea in 146.—2. A Greek Peripatetic philosopher of the 2d century B. C.

Croaker (krō'kēr), Mr. and Mrs. A strongly contrasted pair in Goldsmith's "The Good-Natured Man." He is gifted in saying sadly the most cutting things; she is both merry and spiteful.

Croaker and Co. The pseudonym under which Joseph Rodman Drake and Fitz-Greene Halleck wrote the "Croaker Pieces" in the New York "Evening Post," 1819.

Croatia (krō-ā'shiā). [P. Croatic, G. Kroatic, Russ. Kroatsiya, etc.; from Croat, F. Croate, G. Kroate.] A titular kingdom in Austria-Hungary, which with Slavonia forms a separate division in the Hungarian part of the monarchy. It is bounded by Carinthia, Styria, and Hungary (separated by the Drave) on the north, by Slavonia and Bosnia on the east, by Bosnia and Dalmatia on the south, and by the Adriatic, Fiume, and Carinthia on the west. It is traversed by the Save and by prolongations of the Alps. Its soil is productive. Capital, Agram. The inhabitants are principally Croats. Croatia belonged in great part to the Roman province of Pannonia. It was overrun by the East Goths; was conquered by Justinian; was overrun by the Avars; and was settled by the Croats in the 7th century. The region was at first called Chroathia. The dukes rose to considerable power in the 10th century, and about the middle of the 11th century the ruler figures as king of Croatia and Dalmatia. The country was annexed by Hungary in 1091. The Hapsburgs, as kings of Hungary, began to rule in 1527, but their dominion was long contested by the Turks. The ban of Croatia, Count Jellachich, was in rebellion against Hungary 1848-49. (See Croatia and Slavonia, below, and Jellachich.)

Croatia, Turkish. The northwestern division of Bosnia (which see).

Croatia and Slavonia (sla-vō'ni-ā). A land of the Hungarian division of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy. It comprises Croatia and Slavonia, and in it is incorporated the chief part of the former military frontier. Capital, Agram. Its inhabitants are chiefly Slavs of the Serbo-Croatian race. Their religion is mainly Roman Catholic and Greek. It sends 3 delegates to the upper house and 40 delegates to the lower house of the Hungarian Reichstag, and has a Diet (Landtag) of 90 members. It was separated from Hungary and made a crownland in 1849, but was reunited to Hungary in 1868. Area, 16,773 square miles. Population (1890), 2,200,977.

Croats (krō'atz). [See Croatia.] The Slavonic race which inhabits Croatia, and from which it takes its name.

Crockett (krok'et), David. Born at Limestone, Tenn., Aug. 17, 1786; killed at Fort Alamo, San Antonio de Bexar, Texas, March 6, 1836. An American pioneer, hunter, and politician. He was member of Congress from Tennessee 1827-31, 1833-35, and served in the Texan war. He published his autobiography in 1834. He was a fine shot and an eccentric humorist, and the story is told of his having treed a coon which, when he recognized Crockett, called out to him: "Don't shoot, colonel; I'll come down, as I know I'm a gone coon." This story was originally told of a Captain Scott who was a famous shot (Schèle de Vere). Hotten in his Slang Dictionary says that the phrase originated in the fact that "in the American war" a spy dressed in racoon-skins took refuge in a tree and addressed an English rifleman in the same words.

Crockford's (krok'fōrdz). A famous gaming club-house at No. 50 on the west side of St. James street, London, opposite White's. It was built by William Crockford, originally a fishmonger, in 1827. He is said to have made a large fortune by gambling. He died May 24, 1844, but the house was reopened in 1849 for the Military, Naval, and Country Service Club. It was closed again in 1851. It was for several years a dining-house, "The Wellington," and is now the Devonshire Club.

Crocodile (krok'ō-dil), Lady Kitty. In Foote's "Trip to Calais," a hypocritical, intriguing woman of quality, intended to satirize the notorious Duchess of Kingston, whose trial for bigamy was just coming on. The influence of the duchess was sufficient to stop the production of the play. See Trip to Calais.

Crocodilopolis (krok'ō-di-lōp'ō-lis). [Gr. Κροκόδειλον πόλις, city of crocodiles.] 1. Arsinoë.—2. Atribris, in ancient Egypt.

Croesus (krē'sus). [Gr. Κροισός.] A king of Lydia, son of Alyattes whom he succeeded in 560 B. C. He subjugated the Ionian, Eolian, and other neighboring peoples, and at the close of his reign ruled over the region extending from the northern and western coasts of Asia Minor to the Halys on the east and the Taurus on the south. According to Herodotus, he was visited at the height of his power by Solon, to whom he exhibited his innumerable treasures, and who, when pressed to acknowledge him as the happiest of mortals, answered, "Account no man happy before his death." Deceived by a response of the oracle at Delphi to the effect that, if he marched against the Persians, he would overthrow a great empire, he made war in 546 upon Cyrus, by whom he was defeated in the same year near Sardis and taken prisoner. He was, according to Herodotus, doomed to be burned alive, but as he stood upon the pyre he recalled the words of Solon, and exclaimed "Solon! Solon! Solon!" Deceived by Cyrus to state upon whom he was calling, he related the story of Solon, which moved Cyrus to countermand the order for his execution, and to bestow upon him distinguished marks of favor.

Croft (krōft), Herbert. Born at Great Thame, Oxfordshire, Oct. 18, 1663; died at Hereford, May 18, 1691. Bishop of Hereford. He was originally intended for the Roman Catholic priesthood, but eventually took holy orders in the Church of England, having obtained the degree of B. D. at Oxford in 1686. He became chaplain to Charles I. about 1640, canon of Windsor in 1641, and dean of Hereford in 1644; was deprived of his preferments during the Rebellion (which were restored to him on the accession of Charles II.), became bishop of Hereford in 1662, and was dean of the Chapel Royal 1668-70. His chief work is "The Naked Truth, or the True State of the Primitive Church" (1675).

Cromwell, Oliver. Born at Huntingdon, England, April 25, 1599; died at Whitehall, London, Sept. 3, 1658. Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. He studied at Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, 1616-17, was elected member of Parliament for Huntingdon in 1628, and in 1640 was returned by Cambridge to the Short and Long Parliaments. He was appointed captain of Parliamentary horse in 1642, and colonel in 1643. In 1643, by enlisting only men of religion, chiefly Independents, he organized a model regiment which, on account of its invincible courage, came to be known as the Ironsides. He fought with distinction at Marston Moor July 2, 1644, and at the second battle of Newbury Oct. 27, 1644; was promoted to lieutenant-general, on the reorganization (after plans furnished by him) of the army, in June, 1645; commanded the right wing of the Parliamentary army at Naseby June 14, 1645, and took Basing House Oct. 4, 1645. On the rupture in 1647 between the army, which was controlled by the Independents, and Parliament, which was controlled by the Presbyterians, he sided with the Independents and supported the measures by which the Independents obtained control of Parliament. He suppressed an insurrection in Wales in 1648, defeated the Scotch royalists at Preston Aug. 17-19, 1648, and, as a member of the High Court, signed the death-warrant of Charles I. in Jan., 1649. On the establishment of the Commonwealth in 1649 he obtained, by virtue of his position as leader of the Independents and ruling spirit in the army, the actual control of the government. He undertook an expedition against Ireland Aug. 15, 1649; stormed Drogheda Sept. 10, 1649; was appointed captain-general and commander-in-chief of all the forces of the Commonwealth June 26, 1650; defeated the Scotch royalists at Dunbar Sept. 3, 1650, and at Worcester Sept. 3, 1651; expelled the Rump Parliament April 20, 1653; and was appointed by the council of officers Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. His protectorate was marked by religious toleration, by advantageous commercial treaties with foreign nations, and by successful wars with the Dutch, with Algiers, Tunis, and Tripoli, and the Spaniards. See Carlyle's "Letters and Speeches of Oliver Cromwell," Foster's "Life of Cromwell," and Guizot's "History of the Revolution" and "History of England under Cromwell."

Cromwell, Richard. Born at Huntingdon, England, Oct. 4, 1626; died at Cheshunt, near London, July 12, 1712. Son of Oliver Cromwell, whom he succeeded as Lord Protector Sept., 1658. He resigned May, 1659.

Cromwell, Thomas, Earl of Essex. Born probably about 1485; died at London, July 28, 1540. An English statesman, the son of a blacksmith. He served in his youth in the French army in Italy, and after his return to England became a lawyer. He was appointed collector of the revenues of the see of York by Wolsey in 1514; became a member of Parliament in 1523; was appointed privy councillor by Henry VIII. in 1531; and was made chancellor of the exchequer in 1533. In 1535 he was appointed vicar-general of the king to carry into effect the Act of Supremacy, in which capacity he began in 1536 the suppression of the monasteries and the confiscation of their property. He became lord privy seal in 1536, and lord high chamberlain of England in 1539, and was created earl of Essex in 1540. In 1539 he negotiated the marriage of Henry VIII. with Anne of Cleves, which took place in Jan., 1540. Having fallen under the king's displeasure, partly on account of his advocacy of this marriage, he was attainted by Parliament and beheaded on the charge of treason.

Cromwell, The Life and Death of Thomas, Lord. An anonymous play, printed in 1613, at one time attributed to Shakspeare. It was entered on the Stationers' Register in 1602.

Crosby Hall or Place. An ancient house in Bishopsgate street, London. The site was leased from Alice Ashfield, prioress of St. Helen's, in 1466 by Sir John Crosby, a grocer and lord mayor. He built the beautiful Gothic palace of which the banqueting-hall, the throne-room and council-room still remain in Bishopsgate within. The hall is now used as an eating-house, and is famous for its beautiful wooden roof. The mansion covered a large part of what is now Crosby Place or Square. Richard of Gloucester lived here at the death of Edward IV., and here held his levees before his usurpation of the crown. It was afterward bought by Sir Thomas More, who wrote here the "Utopia" and the "Life of Richard III." Crosby Hall is the central feature of Shakspeare's London. Shakspeare himself had a residence in the neighborhood. It is one of the very few medieval dwelling-houses still existing in London. It was restored in 1836, after having been used for various purposes.

She was educated at Nuncaton and Coventry. In 1841 she moved with her father (Robert Evans, agent for Mr. Francis Newdigate of Arbury Hall) to Coventry. In 1851 she became assistant editor of "The Westminster Review," and retained that position till 1853. She lived with George Henry Lewes from 1854 until his death in 1878, a connection which they regarded as a marriage. On May 6, 1880, she married John Walter Cross under the name of Mary Ann Evans Lewes. She died within the year, and was buried by the side of George Henry Lewes in Highgate Cemetery. She published (anonymously at first, afterward under her real name) a translation of Strauss's "Life of Jesus" (1846), "The Essence of Christianity" (translated from Feuerbach "by Marian Evans" in 1854), and, under the pseudonym of George Eliot, "Scenes of Clerical Life" (1858), "Adam Bede" (1859), "The Mill on the Floss" (1860), "Silas Marner, the Weaver of Raveloe" (1861), "Romola" (1862-63), "Felix Holt the Radical" (1866), "The Spanish Gypsy" (a poem, 1868), "Agatha" (a poem, 1869), "Middlemarch, a study of Provincial Life" (1871-72), "The Legend of Jubal, and Other Poems" (1874), "Daniel Deronda" (1876), "Impressions of Theophrastus Such" (1879). After her death in 1883, a poem, "How Lisa loved the King," was published, and "Essays and Leaves from a Note-book" in 1884. Her life was written by her husband, John Walter Cross, and published in 1884.

Cross, Sir Richard Assheton. Born at Red Sear, Lancashire, England, May 30, 1823. An English politician, home secretary 1874-80 and 1885-1886, and secretary of state for India 1886. He was raised to the peerage as viscount in 1886.

Crotchet Castle (kroch'et kás'tl). A novel by Thomas Love Peacock, published in 1831.

Croton (krō'ton), or Crotona (krō-tō'nā). [Gr. Κρότων.] The ancient name of Crotona (which see). There is a Greek temple of Hera Lakinia (Juno of the Lakinian promontory) at the extremity of Capo della Colonna. This famous shrine has been greatly damaged by vandalism and earthquakes, but its platform of masonry and the results of excavations supply data for a partial restoration. It was of the 5th century B. C., Doric, hexastyle, with 14 columns on the flanks, and an interior range of 4 columns before the pronaos. Some of the marble pediment-sculptures have been found.

Croton. A river of southeastern New York which joins the Hudson 32 miles north of New York city, which it supplies with water through the Croton aqueduct (the old one was opened for use in 1842; the new (and chief) one was completed in 1890).

Crousaz (krō-zä'), Jean Pierre de. Born at Lausanne, Switzerland, April 13, 1663; died March 22, 1748. A Swiss philosopher and mathematician. His chief work is a treatise on logic (1712; several later editions). He was a voluminous but not an important writer.

Crow, or Raven, The. See Corvus.

Crow, Jim. See Jim Crow.

Crowder (krou-dē'rō). [A humorous name, from crowed, a fiddle.] A character in Butler's "Hudibras": a fiddler, and the leader of the mob.

Crowe (krō), Captain. A whimsical, impatient merchant captain in Smollett's "Sir Launcelot Greaves." He insists upon being a knight-errant with the latter.

Crowe, Mrs. (Catharine Ann Stevens). Born at Borough Green, Kent, England, about 1800; died in 1876. An English writer, principally known by her writings on the supernatural; author of "Night Side of Nature" (1848), "Spiritualism and the Age we Live in" (1859), and several novels.

Crowe, Mrs. See Bateman, Kate Josephine.

Crowe, William. Born at Midgeham, Berkshire, England, in 1745; died at Bath, Feb. 9, 1829. An English clergyman and poet. He was eccentric, but a popular preacher. He wrote "Lewesdon Hill" (1788), "A Treatise on English Veneration" (1827), and published several volumes of sermons and orations, etc.

Crowfield (krō'fēld), Christopher. An occasional pseudonym of Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe.

Crowley (krō'li), or Crole, or Croleus, Robert. Born in Gloucestershire, 1518 (?); died at London, June 18, 1588. An English author, printer, and divine. He was educated at Oxford, embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and about 1549 set up a printing-press at Ely Rents, Holforn, which he conducted three years. He was archdeacon of Hereford 1559-67, and vicar of St. Lawrence Jewry, London, 1576-78. His typographical fame rests chiefly on three impressions which he made in 1550 of the "Vision of Piers Plowman." His most notable works are "An Informacion and Peticion agaynst the Oppressors of the Pore Commons of this Realm" (1548), "The Voyle of the Laste Trumpet, etc." (1549), "The Way to Wealth, etc." (1550), "Pleasure and Payne, Heaven and Hell; Remember theae Foure, and all shall be Well" (1551), and "One and Thyrtie Epigrammes" (1550).

Crown, Oration on the. [Gr. περὶ στεφάνου; L. de corona.] The most celebrated oration of Demosthenes, delivered in 330 B. C. Ctesiphon had proposed that Demosthenes should be publicly crowned with a golden crown, as a reward for public services rendered after the battle of Chaeronea, and for this was indicted by Eschines as the proposer of an illegal act. In the oration Demosthenes defended his own acts and character, and attacked Eschines, who was defeated.

Crown Diamonds. The English version of Auber's "Les Diamants de la Couronne" (1844).

Crown Point (kronn point). A town in Essex County, New York, situated on Lake Champlain 90 miles north of Albany. It was strongly fortified in the last century, was abandoned by the French in 1759, and was taken from the British by the Americans under Warner, May, 1775.

Crowne (kronn), John. Died in 1703 (?). An English dramatist. Among other plays he wrote "The Country Wit" (1675), "City Politiques" (played about 1683), "Sir Courtly Nice, or It Cannot be" (1685), "The Married Beau, etc." (1694), etc. Some of his plays held the stage for a century.

Crowquill (krō'kwil), Alfred. The pseudonym of Alfred Henry Forester, an English humorist and artist. Charles Robert Forrester, his brother, also used it 1826-44. See Forrester.

Crows. See Absaroka.

Crowther (krō'thēr), Samuel Adjai. Born in Yoruba; died in 1891. The first negro bishop of the Church of England. He was carried off and sold into slavery in 1821. With many others he was freed by a British man-of-war in 1823, and landed at Sierra Leone, where he attended school and soon distinguished himself. His higher education he received in England. He accompanied the first and second Niger expeditions, and published an account of the latter. In 1864 he was ordained "Bishop of the Niger," and proved himself worthy of the office. His books in and on the Niger languages give him a prominent place among African linguists.

Croydon (kroi'don). [In Doomsday Croindene, chalk hill.] A suburb of London, in Surrey, England, 10 miles south of London. It has a ruined palace of the archbishops of Canterbury, used by them from the Conquest until 1757. Population (1891), 102,607.

Croyland (kroi'land), or Crowland (krō'land). A town in the southern part of Lincolnshire, England, situated on the Welland 8 miles northeast of Peterborough. It contains the ruins of a famous abbey founded by Æthelbald of Mercia in the 8th century.

Croysado (kroi-sā'dō), The Great. In Butler's "Hudibras," a character intended for Lord Fairfax.

Crucifixion, The. Of the paintings of this subject the following are among the most notable: (a) A large painting by Lucas Cranach in the Stadtkirche at Weimar, Germany. It contains portraits of the artist and of Luther and Melancthon on the right, and on the left Christ overcomes Satan in the form of a Protean monster. (b) A small painting by Albert Durer (1506), in the museum at Dresden. (c) An impressive painting by Mantegna, in the Louvre, Paris. Christ is between the two thieves; St. John and the holy women wait in grief on the left, and a body of soldiers cast lots for the garment on the right. This picture is part of the predella of the altarpiece of San Zenone, Verona; two other parts are in the Musée at Tours. (d) A noted painting by Van Dyck, in St. Michael's, at Ghent, Belgium. A mounted soldier holds out the sponge to Christ with his spear; St. John and the Marys are grouped below, and angels appear above. (e) A painting called "Le coup de lance," by Rubens, in the museum at Antwerp, Belgium. The time is evening; the three crosses stand side by side on Mount Calvary. Christ is already dead, and a mounted soldier is piercing his side with a spear. The three Marys and St. John are grouped at the foot of the cross. This is said to be the most carefully finished painting executed by Rubens. (f) A fresco of Perugino, in the chapter-house of Santa Maria Maddalena dei Pazzi, Florence. It is divided into three parts by architectural framework. In the central part, beneath the crucified Christ, are the two Marys; on the right are Sts. John and Bernard; on the left is an impressive figure of the Virgin, with St. Benedict. (g) A painting by Tintoret, in the Scuola di San Rocco, at Venice. It is this painter's masterpiece.

Cruciger (krōt'sig-er), or Creuziger (kroit'sig-er), or Creutzinger (kroit'sing-er), Kaspar. Born at Leipsic, Jan. 1, 1504; died at Wittenberg, Germany, Nov. 16, 1548. A German Protestant theologian, a co-worker with Luther in the translation of the Bible. He became a preacher at Wittenberg in 1528, and professor of philosophy (later of theology) in the university.

Cruden (krō'den), Alexander. Born at Aberdeen, Scotland, May 31, 1701; died at London, Nov. 1, 1770. A London bookseller, author of a famous "Concordance of the Holy Scriptures" (1737). He was eccentric to the verge of insanity. He believed himself to have been specially appointed by God to correct the morals of the British nation, and accordingly assumed the title of "Alexander the Corrector" (probably suggested to him by his work as corrector of the press).

Crudor (krō'dōr), Sir. In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," a knight who insists that Briana shall supply him with enough hair, consisting of ladies' curls and knights' beards, to purple his cloak before he will marry her. Sir Calidore overthrows him, and her raid on the passers-by is stopped.

Cruel Brother, The. A tragedy by Sir William Davenant, printed in 1630.

Cruel Gift, The. A tragedy by Mrs. Centlivre, produced in 1716.

Cruikshank (krūk'shank), George. Born at London, Sept. 27, 1792; died Feb. 1, 1878. A noted English artist and caricaturist. He was the son of Isaac Cruikshank, who was also a caricaturist. He began his career as an illustrator of children's books, and his satirical genius first found expression in "The Scourge," a periodical published between 1811-16. At this time his caricatures were in the style of Gillray, but about 1819 he began to illustrate books and developed a style of his own. Among his caricatures those of Napoleon, the impostures of Joanna Southcott, the corn-laws, the domestic infidelities of the regent and his wife, etc., are noted. In 1827 William Hone issued a collection of Cruikshank's caricatures in connection with the latter scandal, which he called "Facetiae and Miscellanies." Some of his best illustrations were for Scott and for a translation of Chamisso's "Peter Schlemihl." His arrangement with Dickens began with "Sketches by Boz" in 1836. He designed also for Richard Bentley (1837-43) and Harrison Ainsworth (1836-44), "The Bottle" (eight plates, 1847) and "The Drunkard's Children" (eight plates, 1848) were the first products of his satirical crusade against drunkenness. He continued to produce etchings, etc., in rapid and brilliant succession till his eighty-third year; three years after this he died. He wrote various pamphlets and squibs and started several magazines of his own, and in his later years undertook to paint in oils. His most celebrated effort in this line is a large picture called "The Worship of Bacchus, or the Drinking Customs of Society" (1862). The painting is in the National Gallery.

Cruikshank, (Isaac) Robert. Born at London, Sept. 27, 1789; died March 13, 1856. An English caricaturist and miniature-painter, elder brother of George Cruikshank.

Cruikshank, William Cumberland. Born at Edinburgh in 1745; died at London, June 27, 1800. A Scottish anatomist. He wrote "Anatomy of the Absorbent Vessels" (1786), etc.

Cruillas, Marquis of. See Monserat, Joaquin. Crummles (krum'lz), Vincent. In Charles Dickens's "Nicholas Nickleby," an eccentric actor and manager in a cheap theatrical company. He is the father of two boys and a girl, also in the profession: the last is the "infant phenomenon."

Cruncher (krum'chēr), Jerry. Man of all work at Tellson's banking-house, who spent his nights as a "resurrection man": a character in Charles Dickens's "Tale of Two Cities."

Crupp (krup), Mrs. In Charles Dickens's "David Copperfield," David's landlady. She is afflicted with "spazzums."

Crusades, The. In medieval history, a number of expeditions undertaken by the Christians of Europe for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Mohammedans. The crusading spirit was aroused throughout Europe in 1095 by the preaching of the monk Peter the Hermit, who with Walter the Peuniless set out in 1096 with an immense rabble, which was for the most part destroyed on the way. The first Crusade, properly so called, under Godfrey of Bonillon, 1096-99, resulted in the capture of Jerusalem and the establishment of a Christian kingdom in Palestine; the second, 1147-49, preached by St. Bernard, was unsuccessful; the third, 1189-92, led by the prince Frederick Barbarossa of Germany, Richard the Lion-hearted of England, and Philip Augustus of France, failed to recover Jerusalem, which the Mussulmans had taken in 1187; the fourth, 1202-04, ended in the establishment of a Latin empire at Constantinople, under Count Baldwin of Flanders; the fifth, 1228-1229, under the emperor Frederick II, the sixth, 1248-50, under St. Louis (Louis IX. of France), and the seventh and last, 1270-72, also under St. Louis, were all unsuccessful. There were other expeditions called crusades, including, in 1212, "the children's crusade," in which many thousands perished by shipwreck or were enslaved.

Crusé (krū-sā'), Christian Frederic. Born at Philadelphia, 1794; died at New York, Oct. 5, 1865. An American Episcopalian clergyman and scholar. He translated Eusebius's "Ecclesiastical History" (1833).

Crusenstolpe (krō'zen-stol-pe), Magnus Jakob. Born at Jönköping, Sweden, March 11, 1795; died at Stockholm, Jan. 18, 1865. A Swedish publicist, historical writer, and novelist. His works include the historical novel "Morianen" (1840-44), etc.

Crusius (krō'sē-ōs), Christian August. Born at Leuna, near Merseburg, Prussia, Jan. 10, 1715; died at Leipsic, Oct. 18, 1775. A German philosopher and theologian, professor of theology at Leipsic. He was noted as an opponent of the Wolfian school.

Crusoe, Robinson. See Robinson Crusoe. Crustumium (krus-tū-mē'ri-um). In ancient geography, a city of Latium, Italy, situated a few miles northeast of Rome.

Cruveilhier (krū-vā-yā'), Jean. Born at Limoges, France, Feb. 9, 1791; died at Jus-sac, Haute-Vienne, France, March 6, 1874. A French physician and anatomist. His chief work is "Anatomie pathologique du corps humain" (1828-42).

Cruvelli (krō-vel'lō) (Crüwell), Sophie. Born at Bielefeld, Prussia, March 12, 1826. A German singer. Her family was originally Italian. She was successful in Vienna, and later in Paris and London. In 1854 she appeared at the Grand Opera in Paris, and won much applause in Verdi's "Sicilian Vespers," which was written for her. In 1856 she married Baron Vigier, and left the stage.

Cruz (kruks). [L., 'a cross.'] The Southern Cross, the most celebrated constellation of the southern heavens. It was erected into a constellation by Royer in 1679, but was often spoken of as a cross before; there even seems to be an obscure allusion to it in Dante. It is situated south of the western part of Centaurus, east of the keel of Argo. It is a small constellation of four chief stars arranged in the form of a cross. Its brightest star, the southernmost, is of about the first magnitude; the eastern, half a magnitude fainter; the northern, of about the second magnitude; and the western, of the third magnitude and faint. The constellation owes its striking effect to its compression: for it subtends only about 6° from north to south, and still less from east to west. It looks more like a kite than a cross. All four stars are white except the northernmost, which is of a clear orange-color. It contains a fifth star of the fourth magnitude, which is very red.

Cruz (krōth), José Maria de la. Born at Concepcion, April 21, 1801; died near the same place, Nov. 23, 1875. A Chilean general. As a boy he was a cadet in the revolutionary army, serving in most of the campaigns. He rapidly rose in rank; became general of division in 1839; was twice minister of war and marine; was chief of staff in the Peruvian campaign of 1838, and held various other important positions. In 1851 he was the liberal candidate for president, but his opponent, General Montt, was elected. General Cruz then headed a revolt in the southern provinces, but was finally defeated at the battle of Loncomilla, Dec. 8, 1851. He was pardoned, and thereafter lived in retirement on his estate.

Cruz, Juana Inés de la. Born at Mexico, Nov. 12, 1651; died at Mexico, April 17, 1695. A Mexican poet, a nun of the Convent of San Gerónimo; sometimes called "The Tenth Muse."

Cruz, Ramon de la. Born at Madrid, 1731; died after 1791. A Spanish dramatist. His chief works are farces.

Cruz, San Juan de la. Born at Fontiveros, Old Castile, Spain, 1542; died at Ubeda, Spain, Dec. 14, 1591. A Spanish mystical poet and prose-writer. He belonged to the Carmelite order. He became prior at Granada, and later vicar-provincial for Andalusia.

Cruz y Goyeneche (krōth ē gō-yā-nā'che), Luis de la. Born at Concepcion, Aug. 25, 1768; died Oct. 14, 1828. A Chilean general. During the colonial period he held important civil offices, and in 1806 made, at his own expense, an exploration of the Aodes. His report of this journey was published in the Angelis collection at Buenos Ayres in 1835. He was one of the leaders of the revolution of 1810, and commanded a division of the patriot army, but was captured and imprisoned until released by the victories of 1817. Subsequently he was commandant at Talca, and, during the absence of O'Higgins, acting president of Chile; took part in the Peruvian campaign, and received the title of grand marshal from Peru: was a member of the constituent congress of Chile in 1826, and was minister of marine at the time of his death.

Cry of the Children, The. A poem by Mrs. Browning.

Crystal Palace. A building of iron and glass, erected in Hyde Park, London, for the great exhibition of 1851, and reerected at Sydenham, near London, 1852-53, opened 1854. It was designed by Sir Joseph Paxton, and is used for popular concerts and other entertainments, as well as a permanent exhibition of the art and culture of various nations. The nave is 1,608 feet long, the central transept 390 by 120 feet, and 175 high, and the south transept 312 feet long. A corresponding north transept was burned in 1866. The great nave, adorned with plants and statues, presents a unique vista. On either side are ranged courts, in which are reproduced the architecture and sculpture of different civilizations. In 1853 a similar but much smaller building called the Crystal Palace was erected for the World's Fair in New York, on Sixth Avenue between 40th and 42d streets. The ground is now a public park.

Csaba (chob'ó), Hung. Békés-Csaba (bá'kash-chob'ó). A town in the county of Békés, Hungary, in lat. 46° 41' N., long. 21° 8' E. Population (1890), 34,243.

Csokonai (chó'kó-noi), Vitéz Mihály. Born at Debreezin, Hungary, Nov. 17, 1773; died there, Jan. 28, 1805. A Hungarian poet. His works include "Magyar-Musa" (1797), "Dorottya," a mock-heroic poem (1804), "Anacreontic Poems" (1803), etc.

Csoma (chó'mo), Alexander, Hung. Csoma, Sándor. Born at Körös, Transylvania, April 4, 1784; died at Darjiling, in the Himalayas, April 11, 1842. A Hungarian traveler and philologist. He began his travels in central Asia in 1820, and resided in Kanam, Tibet, 1827-30. In 1831 he went to Calcutta. He published a "Tibetan-English Dictionary" (1834), a "Grammar of the Tibetan Language" (1834), etc.

Ctesias (tēs'shias). [Gr. Κτησίας.] Born at Cnidus, Caria, Asia Minor; died after 398 B. C. A Greek historian, physician at the court of Artaxerxes Mnemon. He wrote a history of Persia (Ἱστορίαι) in 24 books, fragments of which are extant, and a treatise on India (Ἰνδικά), parts of which also survive. There are meager abridgments of both works by Photius.

Ctesias, an abstract of whose works is preserved by Photius, is very frequently quoted by ancient authors. He was a Greek physician who accompanied the expedition led against Artaxerxes by his brother, the younger Cyrus. Through a few years younger, he was contemporary with Herodotus; his testimony therefore brings the series of evidences up to the very time of our author. Ctesias, having fallen into the hands of the Persians at the battle of Cunaxa, was detained at the court of Artaxerxes, as physician, during seventeen years; and it seems that, with the hope of recommending himself to the favour of "the great king," and of obtaining his own freedom, he undertook to compose a history of Persia, with the express and avowed design of impeaching the authority of Herodotus, whom, in no very courteous terms, he accuses of many falsifications. The jealousy and malice of a little mind are apparent in these accusations. Nothing can be much more inane than the fragments that are preserved of this author's two works—his History of Persia and his Indian History; yet, though possessing little intrinsic value, they serve an important purpose in furnishing very explicit evidence of the genuineness and general authenticity of the work which Ctesias laboured to depreciate. If the account given by Herodotus of Persian affairs had been altogether untrue, his rival wanted neither the will nor the means to expose the imposition. But while, like Plutarch, he cavils at minor points, he leaves the substance of the narrative uncontradicted.

Taylor, Hist. Anc. Books, p. 287.

Ctesibius (tēs-sib'i-us). [Gr. Κτησίβιος.] Born at Alexandria: lived probably about 250 B. C. An Alexandrian physicist noted for his mechanical inventions. He is said to have invented a clepsydra, a hydraulic organ, and other mechanical contrivances, and to have first applied the expansive force of air as a motive power.

Ctesiphon (tēs'i-fon). [Gr. Κτησιφών.] In ancient geography, a city of Mesopotamia, situated on the Tigris, opposite Seleucia, 20 miles southeast of Bagdad. It was one of the chief cities of the Parthian and later Persian kingdoms. Its site is now occupied by ruins.

What encouragement the arts found from his (Chosroes I.) patronage we may learn from the remains of the great palace he erected at Ctesiphon. . . . The central arch of this wonderful structure is 85 feet high, 72 feet wide, and 115 feet deep. Although nothing now exists of this palace but the façade, we may judge from this what must have been the size and beauty of the structure before it had been destroyed by time and war.

Benjamin, Story of Persia, p. 231.

Ctesiphon. [Gr. Κτησιφών.] Lived in the 4th century B. C. An Athenian who proposed that Demosthenes should be honored with a crown, and for this was prosecuted by Aeschines and defended by Demosthenes. See Crown, Oration on the.

Cuaray (kwá-rí'). [Tigua name of central New Mexico.] A village (pueblo) of Tigua Indians, situated in Valencia County, New Mexico, on the southern edge of the salt-basin of the Manzano. It was abandoned in 1672 on account of the hostility of the Apaches. The ruins of a large church of stone stand by the side of those of the village. The Mission of Cuaray was founded about 1640.

Cuahtemoc. See Guatemotzin.

Cuba (kú'bá; Sp. pron. kó'bá). [Of native origin. See Cubanacan.] An island (the largest in the West Indies) belonging to Spain, situated in lat. 19° 50'-23° 10' N., long. 74° 7'-84° 58' W., north of the Caribbean Sea and southeast of the Gulf of Mexico. It is separated from Florida on the north by the Strait of Florida, from Haiti on the east by the Windward Passage, and from Yucatan on the west by the Channel of Yucatan. It is traversed from east to west by mountains. Its leading industries are the raising of sugar and tobacco. The inhabitants are chiefly of Spanish and African descent; the established religion is Roman Catholic, and the prevailing language is Spanish. It forms, with its dependencies, a captain-generalcy, and since 1878 sends deputies to the Spanish Cortes. Capital, Havana. It was discovered by Columbus in October, 1492 (and named by him Juana); was conquered by the Spaniards in 1511; was held by the English 1762-63; has been the object of various filibustering expeditions since 1849; and was the scene of rebellions 1868-78, and 1895. Slavery was abolished in 1880. Length, 760 miles. Average width, 60 miles. Area, 41,655 square miles. Population (1890), 1,431,687.

Cubaes (kó-bis'). The Portuguese spelling of Kubales.

Cubanacan (kó-bá-ná-kán'). A region, or possibly a village, in the interior of Cuba: so called by the Lueayan Indians who were with Columbus when he discovered the island. From the similarity of sounds, Columbus, supposing himself to be on the coast of Asia, imagined that this must be the city of Kublai Khan, the Tatar sovereign spoken of by Marco Polo.

Cubango (kó-bang'gō), or Tonke (ton'ke). A river in southern Africa which flows into Lake Ngami.

Cubas, Antonio Garcia. See Garcia Cubas.

Cubillo (kó-bél'yō), Alvaro de Aragon. A Spanish dramatic poet, born in Grenada toward the end of the 16th century. He was a voluminous writer and successful dramatist.

Cuchan (kó-chán'). A tribe of North American Indians, living in California near and above the junction of the Gila River with the Colorado. The number attached to the Mission agency in California is 997, and at the San Carlos agency in Arizona 291. Also called Yuma or Umah. See Yuman.

Cuckoo and the Nightingale, The. A poem which appeared in the printed editions of Chaucer of the 16th century. When first printed it had following it a ballade with an envoy. There is nothing to indicate that they are by the same person. Tyrwhitt, who considered the poem Chaucer's, could not accept the ballade. The weight of evidence is against Chaucer's authorship of the poem. In the Bodleian MS. it is called "The Boke of Cupide God of Love"; another MS. is headed "Liber Cupidinis." It is based on a popular superstition that he will be happy in love during the year who hears the nightingale before he hears the cuckoo.

Cucuta (kó'kó-tá), San José de. A town in Santander, Colombia, situated about lat. 7° 30' N., near the frontier of Venezuela. Population (1892), about 9,000.

Cumæ (kü'mē). [Gr. Κίμνη, Κομμα.] In ancient geography, a city on the coast of Campania, Italy, 10 miles west of Naples. It was founded by a Greek colony from Cyne, in Eubœa, about 1000 B. C., was one of the chief Greek cities of Italy until the 5th century B. C., and became a Roman municipium in 338 B. C. It contained the cavern of the "Cumæan Sibyl," and has some remnants of antiquity, including a Roman amphitheater, imperfectly excavated, but displaying 21 tiers of seats. The axes of the greater ellipse are 315 and 255 feet, of the arena 240 and 180 feet. Its inhabitants founded Naples and Pozzuoli.

The very precise statement of Eusebius, who assigns the foundation of Cumæ to the year 1050 B. C., cannot perhaps be accepted as historical, but there is no reason for distrusting the tradition recorded by Strabo that Cumæ was the earliest Greek settlement in either Sicily or Italy.

I. Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 133.

Cumaná (kō-mā-nä'), or Santa Ines de Cumaná (sän'tä ē-nes' dä kō-mā-nä'). A seaport in Bermudez, Venezuela, situated at the mouth of the river Manzanares, in lat. 10° 27' N., long. 64° 11' W. Cupid (kū'pid). [L. Cupido, a personification of cupido (cupidin-), desire, passion, from cupere, desire.] In Roman mythology, the god of love, identified with the Greek Eros, the son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphrodite (Venus). He is generally represented as a beautiful boy with wings, carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows, and is often spoken of as blind or blindfolded. The name is often given in art to figures of children, with or without wings, introduced, sometimes in considerable number, as a motive of decoration, and with little or no mythological allusion.

Cupid, The Letter of. A poem by Hoecheve (Oecheve) dated 1402, two years after Chaucer's death; attributed in the 1532 edition to Chaucer.

Cupid and Psyche (sī'kē). An episode in the "Golden Ass" of Apuleius. The beauty of Psyche, the youngest of three daughters of a certain king, and the homage paid to it, arouse the wrath of Venus, who commands Cupid to avenge her. In the attempt he falls in love with Psyche; she is borne to a lovely valley where every night Cupid, always invisible, visits her and commands her not to attempt to see him. Urged by her sisters and by her own curiosity, she violates this command, and is abandoned by the god. After toilsome wanderings in search of her lover, and many sufferings, she is endowed with immortality by Jupiter and united to Cupid forever.

Whatever may be the concealed meaning of the allegory, the story of Cupid and Psyche is certainly a beautiful fiction. Of this, the number of translations and imitations may be considered as a proof. Mr. Rose, in the notes to his version of Partenopex de Blois, has pointed out its striking resemblance to that romance, as also to the Three Calendars, and to one of the Persian Tales. The prohibition of Cupid, and the transgression of Psyche, has suggested the Serpentin Vert of Mad. d'Aulnoy; indeed the labours to which Psyche is subjected seem to be the origin of all fairy tales, particularly Gracieuse et Percinet. The whole story has also been beautifully versified by Marino in his poem l'Adone. Cupid is introduced in the fourth book relating it for the amusement of Adonis, and he tells it in such a manner as to form the most pleasing episode of that delightful poem. I need not mention the well-known imitation by Fontaine, nor the drama of Psyche, which was performed with the utmost magnificence at Paris in 1670, and is usually published in the works of Molière, but was in fact the effort of the united genius of that author, Corneille, Quinault, and Lulli. Nor have the fine arts less contributed to the embellishment of this fable; the marriage of Cupid and Psyche has furnished Raphael with a series of paintings which are among the finest of his works, and which adorn the walls of the Farnese Palace in the vicinity of Rome.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 110.

Cupid and Psyche. An antique copy in marble, in the Capitol, Rome, of a Greek original of Hellenistic date, representing a boy and a girl embracing. Cupid is nude, Psyche draped from the hips down.

Curci (kōr'ehē), Carlo Maria. Born at Naples, Sept. 4, 1809; died at Villa Careggi, near Florence, June 8, 1891. A Roman Catholic theologian and writer on church politics. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1826, and was editor of the "Civiltà cattolica" 1850-53. He was in 1877 expelled from his order on account of his opposition to the policy of the Pope toward the Italian government. He subsequently recanted, however, and was restored to membership in the order. He published "Lezioni esegetiche e morali sopra i quattro evangelii" (1874-76), "Il moderno dissidio tra la Chiesa e l'Italia" (1877), "La nuova Italia ed i vecchi zelanti" (1881), etc.

Curé de Meudon (kū-rā' dē mē-dōn'), Le. A name often given to Rabelais. He had a charge at Meudon in his later years.

Cure for a Cuckold. A play by Webster, assisted by Rowley, published in 1661. (Ward.) Fleay thinks it was probably by Middleton and Rowley.

Cures (kū'rēz). In ancient geography, a city of the Sabines, 24 miles northeast of Rome, in the vicinity of the modern Correse; a legendary city of Numa and Tullus.

Curetes (kū-rē'tēz). In Greek mythology, attendants of Zeus, properly in Crete; often wrongly identified with the Corybantes, the Cabiri, etc.

Curton (kūr'ton), William. Born at Westbury, Shropshire, England, 1808; died June 17, 1864. An English Orientalist. He was appointed to a position in the Bodleian Library in 1834; undertook the cataloguing of Arabic books and MSS. in the British Museum in 1837 (the first part of the catalogue appeared in 1846); and became chaplain to the queen in 1847, and canon of Westminster and pastor of St. Margaret's in 1849. He is best known from his work in classifying and, in part, editing the important collection of Syriac MSS. obtained by the British Museum from the monasteries of Nitria 1841-43. His most important discovery was a MS. of the "Epistles of Ignatius to Polycarp," which he edited in 1845. He also discovered parts of a Syriac version of the gospels, differing from the Peshito version, and now known as the "Curetonian Gospels."

Curatii (kū-ri-ā'shi-i). In Roman legend, three brothers from Alba Longa, who fought against the three Horatii. See Horatii.

Curicancha (kō-rē-kān'ehā), or Coricancha (kō-rē-kān'ehā). [Quechua, 'court of gold.'] The great temple called the Temple of the Sun, at Cuzco, Peru. According to tradition it was founded by Manco Capac. It was probably used as a palace by the earlier Incas, and was later turned into a temple. The great monarch Inca Yupanqui adorned the interior with gold. The temple opened on a large square; it was 299 feet long by 52 feet broad, and included the principal temple, various minor rooms, and the garden of golden flowers. The interior was partly lined with thin gold. An elliptical gold plate on the wall was an emblem of the deity, and it was flanked by gold and silver plates representing the sun and moon. The roof was an elaborate thatch. The temple was partly despoiled by order of Atahualpa to satisfy the Spanish demand for gold; the Spaniards completed its destruction, and the church and convent of Santo Domingo were built on the site. Portions of the original walls are still visible, forming part of the convent structure.

Curicó (kō-rē-kō'). 1. A province of Chile, south of Colchagua. Area, 2,913 square miles. Population (1891), 104,909.—2. The capital of the above province. Population (1891), about 13,000.

Curious Impertinent, The. An episode in Cervantes's "Don Quixote." Crowne wrote a play, "The Married Beau, or The Curious Impertinent," the plot of which is taken from this.

Curium (kū'ri-um). [Gr. Κοίριον.] An ancient city of Cyprus, west of the river Lyens, said to have been founded by the Argives. Its ruins contain a Phœnician temple, remarkable especially for its crypt of four rock-hewn chambers, about 23 feet in diameter, connected by doors and a gallery. The objects in gold and silver constituting the "Treasure of Curium," in the Metropolitan Museum, New York, were found in these chambers.

Curius Dentatus, Manius. See Dentatus.

Curil (kēr'l), Edmund. Born in 1675; died at London, Dec. 11, 1747. A notorious London bookseller. He lived by piratical publishing, and he achieved a reputation for issuing obscene literature which was the origin of the word Curlicious. In 1716 he had a quarrel with Pope, who pilloried him in the "Dunciad." He published a number of standard works, however; but of his biographies Arbuthnot said they had added a new terror to death.

Curragh (kur'rāch or kur'rā), or The Curragh of Kildare (kīl-dār'). A plain in County Kildare, Ireland, 27 miles southwest of Dublin. It is the property of the crown, and is the seat of a military camp and of a celebrated race-course.

Curran (kur'an), John Philpot. Born at Newmarket, County Cork, Ireland, July 24, 1750; died at Brompton, near London, Oct. 14, 1817. A noted Irish orator. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, and at the Middle Temple, London, and in 1775 was admitted to the Irish bar. In 1783 he entered the Irish Parliament, where he joined the opposition, of which Grattan was the leader. When the government instituted its bloody series of prosecutions against the leaders of the Irish insurrection of 1798, he appeared for the prisoners in nearly every case, and conducted the defense with extraordinary boldness and ability. He was master of the rolls in Ireland 1806-14, when he retired to private life. See "Life of Curran," by his son, W. H. Curran (1819); "Curran and his Contemporaries," by Charles Phillips (1818); and "Curran's Speeches" (1806).

Curse of Kehama, The. A poem by Southey, first published in 1810.

Curse of Scotland, The. The name given to the nine of diamonds in playing-cards. There are various explanations of the name; a probable one traces it to the groups of nine lozenges in the coat of arms of the Dalrymple family, one of the members of which, the Master (afterward Earl) of Stair, played an important part in the massacre of Glencoe.

Cursor, Papius. See Papius Cursor.

Cursor Mundi (kēr'sor mund' dī). [L., 'the runner or courier of the world'; translated in one M. E. MS. 'the Cursor of the world,' in another 'the Cours of the world.' The last expresses the real intention of the title.] A poem written about 1320, and founded on Cædmon's paraphrase of Genesis. It ran through the course of the world from the creation to doomsday. The whole poem has been printed by the Early English Text Society (ed. by Dr. Richard Morris).

Curtain (kēr'tān), The. A London playhouse established in Shoreditch in 1576. It is thought that Shakspeare acted here in his own plays. It remained open until the accession of Charles I., after which the drama gave way to exhibitions of athletic feats. It is said that it was called The Curtain because here the green curtain was first used; in 1678 Aubrey calls it "The Green Curtain." The name is still maintained in "Curtain Road." The church of St. James stands near the site, and a stained-glass window was placed at its west end in 1886 to commemorate the association with Shakspeare.

Curtain Lectures. See Caudle.

Curtana (kēr-tā'nā), Courtain (kōr-tān'), or Curtean (kēr-tān'). [L. curtus, broken, shortened.] The name originally given to the sword of Roland, of which, according to the tradition, the point was broken off in testing it. The name is also given to the pointless sword carried before the kings of England at their coronation, and emblematically considered as the sword of mercy. It is also called the sword of Edward the Confessor.

Curtatone (kôr-tî-tô'ne). A village in the province of Mantua, Italy, 4 miles west of Mantua. Here, May 29, 1848, about 19,000 Austrians under Radetzky defeated 5,000-5,000 Italians.

Curtis, George William. Born at Providence, R. I., Feb. 24, 1824; died on Staten Island, N. Y., Aug. 31, 1892. A noted American journalist, orator, publicist, and author. He lived in the community at Brook Farm, remaining there 18 months; traveled abroad 1846-50; on his return in the latter year became connected with the New York "Tribune"; was connected with "Putnam's Monthly" 1852-57; and became editor of the "Easy Chair" ("Harper's Magazine") in 1854, and in 1863 of "Harper's Weekly" (founded 1857). He was an influential advocate of civil-service reform. In 1871 he was appointed by Grant one of the commissioners to draw up rules for the regulation of the civil service, but resigned on account of differences with the President. He was president of the New York State Civil Service League in 1880, and of the National Civil Service Reform League from its foundation until his death. He wrote "Nile Notes of a Howadji" (1851), "Howadji in Syria" (1852), "Lotus-Eating" (1852), "Potiphar Papers" (1853), "Prue and I" (1856), "Trumps" (1862), "From the Easy Chair" (1891), "Washington Irving" (1891).

Curtise (kôr-tês'). The little hound in the tale of "Reinecke Fuchs."

Curtius (kôr'tsê-ôs), Ernst. Born at Lübeck, Germany, Sept. 2, 1814. A noted German archaeologist and historian, professor in the University of Berlin since 1863. His works include "Peloponnesos" (1851-52), "Griechische Geschichte" (1857-67, English translation by Ward 1868-73), "Die Ionen vor der ionischen Wanderung" (1855), "Attische Studien" (1863-64), etc.

He wrote "Griechische Schulgrammatik" (1852), "Grundzüge der griechischen Etymologie" (1858-62), etc.

Curtius (kêr'shi-us), Marcus. A Roman legendary hero. In 362 B. C., a ebasm having been formed in the Forum by an earthquake, the soothsayers announced that it could be closed only by the sacrifice of Rome's greatest treasure. The people were at a loss to interpret the oracle when Marcus Curtius, a noble youth, stepped forward and declaring that the state possessed no greater treasure than a brave citizen in arms, leaped, mounted on his steed and in full armor, into the chasm, which closed after him.

Curtius Rufus, Quintus. A Roman historian, of the time of Claudius, author of a history of Alexander the Great.

Curupira (kô-rô-pê'râ). The name given by Brazilian Indians of the Tupi race to a mythical being, generally described as a dwarfish man having his feet turned backward. He is said to wander in the woods, where he kills and devours persons who are lost. The hunter who finds his tracks and tries to run away from him is deceived by the direction of the footprints, and hastens to his own destruction. The Curupira myth is found in all parts of Brazil, is very ancient, and is connected with many goblin tales, some of which have been published.

Curvetto (kêr-ve'tô). An old libertine, affecting youth, in Middleton's play "Blurt, Master Constable." He is the butt of many practical jokes.

Cusa. See Alexander John, Prince of Rumania. Cusa (kû'zâ), or Cusanus (kû-zâ'nus), Nikolaus (originally Nikolas Krypffs or Krebs). Born at Kues, near Trier, Germany, 1401; died at Todi, Umbria, Italy, Aug. 11, 1464. A noted ecclesiastic and philosophical writer, appointed cardinal in 1448. His chief philosophical work is "De docta ignorantia."

Cush (kush). [Gr. Χοῦς.] In the Old Testament: (a) The eldest son of Ham. (b) A geographical and ethnographic term usually rendered Ethiopia in the Vulgate and Septuagint. Cush corresponded probably to Upper Egypt and northern Nubia, including, perhaps, part of Abyssinia and southern Arabia. Also Kush.

The southern zone is described before the middle. "The sons of Ham," it is said, "were Cush, and Mizraim, and Phut, and Canaan." Cush embraces not only the Ethiopia of the classical geographers, but also the south-western coast of Arabia and the opposite coast of Africa as well. It thus corresponds to the land of Punt of the Egyptian monuments, as well as to Kesh or Ethiopia. It was inhabited for the most part by a white race whose physical characteristics connect them with the Egyptians [p. 51].

The name Cush was of Egyptian origin. Kash vaguely denoted the country which lay between the First Cataract and the mountains of Abyssinia, and from the reign of Thothmes I. to the fall of the Twentieth Egyptian dynasty the eldest son of the Egyptian monarch bore the title of "Royal Son" or Prince of Kash. In the reign of Menephtah, the Pharaoh of the Exodus, one of these Princes of Kash had the name of Mes, and may thus have originated the Jewish legend reported by Josephus, according to which Moses, the adopted son of an Egyptian princess, conquered the land of Cush [p. 143].

Kas or Cush was thus, properly speaking, the region known as Ethiopia to the geographers of Greece and Rome. But it was only by degrees that the name came to cover so wide an extent of country. At the outset it denoted only a small district on the southern side of the Second Cataract. Near Wady Hafa an inscription has been found enumerating the tribes conquered by the Twelfth Dynasty, as he marched from the boundaries of Egypt up the Nile. Almost at the head of them stands the tribe or district of Kash.

Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 144.

Cushing (kûsh'ing), Caleb. Born at Salisbury, Mass., Jan. 17, 1800; died at Newburyport, Mass., Jan. 2, 1879. An American jurist, politician, and diplomatist. He was member of Congress from Massachusetts 1835-43, United States commissioner to China 1843-44, colonel and brigadier-general in the Mexican war 1847, attorney-general 1853-57, counsel before the tribunal of arbitration in Geneva 1871-72, and minister to Spain 1874-77.

Cushing, Luther Stearns. Born at Lunenburg, Mass., June 22, 1803; died at Boston, June 22, 1856. An American lawyer. His best-known works are "Rules of Proceeding and Debate in Deliberative Assemblies" (1844; known as "Cushing's Manual"), and "Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies" (1855).

Cushing, Thomas. Born at Boston, Mass., March 24, 1725; died Feb. 28, 1788. An American politician, speaker of the Massachusetts House of Representatives 1763, and lieutenant-governor of Massachusetts 1779-88.

Cushing, William. Born at Scituate, Mass., March 1, 1732; died at Scituate, Sept. 13, 1810. An American jurist, appointed associate justice of the United States Supreme Court in 1789.

Cushing, William Barker. Born in Wisconsin, Nov., 1842; died at Washington, D. C., Dec. 17, 1874. An American naval officer, noted on account of his exploit in blowing up the Confederate iron-clad ram Albatross at Plymouth, North Carolina, on the night of Oct. 27, 1864. See Albatross.

Cushites (kush'its). The descendants of Cush; the inhabitants of Cush. In Gen. x. 6, Cush appears as the first son of Ham, while in verse 7 Dedan and Seba, Arabic tribes, are enumerated among the descendants of Cush, and in verse 8 Nimrod, who is represented as the founder of the Babylonian kingdom, appears as the son of Cush. There are evidently two kinds of Cushites in the Old Testament, either two different races, or at least different settlements. The first are identical with the Kash, Kish, or Kesh of the Egyptian monuments, a name designating a reddish or reddish-brown people living between Egypt and Abyssinia, and between the Nile and the sea; in the Assyrian inscriptions called Kusu or Mûschu. The Greek name Ethiopia comprised originally the dark-colored peoples of the southern countries of Africa and Asia at large; later it was confined to the Nile territory south of Egypt. The other division of the Cushites is to be looked for in the East, and is perhaps identical with the Kashu or Kashu of the inscriptions. See Cosseans.

Cushman (kûsh'man), Charlotte Saunders. Born in Boston, July 23, 1816; died in Boston, Feb. 8, 1876. An American actress. She first appeared at New Orleans, at the age of nineteen, as Lady Macbeth. She acted with Macready in New York 1842-43, and in Boston in 1844. She played at the Princess's Theatre in London in the autumn of 1844, and in 1845 was very successful as Bianca. In December, 1845, she appeared as Romeo at the Haymarket, her sister Susan playing Juliet. She reappeared in America, Oct. 8, 1849, at the old Broadway Theater, New York, as Mrs. Haller. Her principal characters were Romeo, Wolsey, Hamlet, and Claude Melnotte. In 1852 she announced her intention of retiring from the stage, but occasionally acted until her last illness. Meg Merrilies and Nancy Sykes were her strongest melodramatic parts.

Cushman, Robert. Born in England about 1580; died in England, 1625. An English merchant, one of the founders of the Plymouth colony.

Cusis (kû'sis). A fabulous country in Sir John Mandeville's "Voiage and Travaile." The people of this country have but one foot, so large that it casts a shadow over the whole body when used as a protection from the sun, and with this one foot they make wonderful speed.

Cust (kust), Robert Needham. Born at Cockayne-Hatley, Bedfordshire, England, 1821. A noted Orientalist and Africanist. He entered the civil service of India in 1843, and retired in 1863. Since that date he has resided in London. His principal works are "Sketch of the Modern Languages of the East Indies" (1878), "Linguistic and Oriental Essays" (1880-91), "Sketch of the Modern Languages of Africa" (1883), "Notes on Missionary Subjects" (1887), "Africa Rediviva" (1891).

Custer (kus'têr), George Armstrong. Born at New Rumley, Ohio, Dec. 5, 1839; died in Montana, June 25, 1876. An American soldier. He was graduated at West Point in 1861, and was assigned to duty as lieutenant in the United States cavalry. He led a brigade of volunteers in the battle of Gettysburg July 1-3, 1863; was appointed to the command of a division of cavalry in the volunteer service Sept. 30, 1864, and took part in the Richmond campaign in 1864, in the Shenandoah campaign from 1864-65, and in the pursuit of Lee's army after the evacuation of Richmond in 1865. He was mustered out of the volunteer service, with the rank of major-general, in 1866, and in the same year was appointed lieutenant-colonel, with the brevet rank of major-general, in the regular army. He commanded an exploring expedition to the Black Hills in 1874. He led with his regiment General Terry's column in the expedition against the Sioux Indians in 1876. Coming upon a large Indian encampment on the Little Big Horn River, Montana, he divided his regiment into several detachments, one of which under Major Reno was ordered to attack the enemy in the rear, while he himself advanced with five companies in front. Major Reno was driven back, and the Indians concentrated upon Custer, who was killed together with his whole force.

Custine (kûs-tên'), Adam Philippe de, Count. Born at Metz, Feb. 4, 1740; guillotined at Paris, Aug. 28, 1793. A noted French soldier. He fought under Souville in the Seven Years' War, and was quartermaster-general of the French forces in America 1778-83, being present at the surrender of Yorktown, Virginia, 1781. He was deputed to the States-General in 1789, and in 1792 was appointed to the command of an army. He took Spire Sept. 29, and Mainz Oct. 21, 1792; but failing in the campaign of 1793 to relieve Mainz, which had been recaptured by the Allies, he was executed on the charge of conspiring to effect a counter-revolution.

Custine, Marquis Astolphe de. Born at Niederwiller (Meurthe), France, March 18, 1790; died near Pau, France, Sept. 29, 1857. A French writer and traveler, grandson of Adam P. de Custine. He wrote "Mémoires et voyages," etc. (1830), "La Russie en 1839" (1843), etc.

Custis (kus'tis), George Washington Parke. Born at Mount Airy, Md., April 30, 1781; died at Arlington House, Fairfax County, Virginia, Oct. 10, 1857. An American writer, adopted son of George Washington.

Custom of the Country, The. A play by Fleteher and Massinger, produced before 1628 and printed in 1647. It is partly from a story of Cervantes and partly from a story in Cinthio's "Hecatommithi." "Love makes a Man," by Cibber, and "Country Lasses," by Charles Johnson, were partly taken from it.

Custom of the Country, The. A play by Mrs. Centlivre, produced in 1715. It was originally a farce called "A Bickerstaff's Burial," said, doubtfully, to be founded on one of Sinbad's voyages.

Custoza (kôs-tôd'zâ), or Custoza (kôs-tôt'sâ). A village in the province of Verona, Italy, 11 miles southwest of Verona. It was the scene of two battles: (1) On July 25, 1848, the Austrians (about 33,000) under Radetzky defeated the Sardinians (about 25,000) under King Charles Albert. (2) On June 24, 1866, the Austrians (75,000) under the archduke Albert defeated the Italians (130,000) under Victor Emmanuel.

Cuthah (kû'thä). A city in Babylonia whence Shalmaneser IV. (727-722 B. C.) brought colonists into Samaria (2 Ki. xvii. 24). These Cuthans, mingling with other peoples, became the progenitors of the Samaritans. In the cuneiform inscriptions the city is often mentioned under the name of Kutu. It was situated a little to the east of Babylon, and is now represented by the ruins of Tel Ibrahim. The statement (2 Ki. xvii. 30) that the principal god of the Cuthans was Nergal (the god of war) is confirmed by the inscriptions. Nebuchadnezzar (604-561) records that he restored the temple of Nergal in the city of Cuthah.

Cuthbert (kuth'bert), Saint. Died at Farne, Northumbria, March 20, 687. A noted English monk. He was prior of Melrose about 664, and later of Lindisfarne, and bishop of Lindisfarne 685-687.

Cutler, Timothy. Born at Charlestown, Mass., about 1684; died at Boston, Aug. 17, 1765. An American clergyman, president of Yale College 1719-22.

Cutpurse (kut'pers), Moll. The nickname of a notorious woman (real name Mary Frith) who was born in London in 1589 according to her life published anonymously in London 1662, but according to Malone in 1584. She was a riotous "thief, pickpocket, bully, prostitute, procuress, fortune-teller, receiver of stolen goods, and forger of writings," and nearly always wore a man's dress. She is said to have been the first woman who used tobacco. She was introduced by Middleton and Dekker as the chief personage (but in reformed character) in their play "The Roaring Girl." Field also introduces her in his play "Amends for Ladies."

Cuttack (kut-tak'), or Cattack, or Katak. 1. A district in the Orissa division, Bengal, British India, bounded on the east and southeast by the Bay of Bengal. Area, 3,517 square miles. Population (1881), 1,738,165.—2. The capital of the above district, situated on the river Mahanadi in lat. 20° 26' N., long. 85° 55' E. It was taken from the Mahrattas by the British in 1803.

Cutter of Coleman Street, The. A play by Abraham Cowley, performed in 1661 and printed in 1663. This comedy was originally called "The Guardian," and was written for the entertainment of Prince Charles as he passed through Cambridge in 1641.

Cuttle (kut'l), Captain Edward. In Dickens's "Dombey and Son," "a kind-hearted, salt-looking" old retired sailor with a hook in place of his right hand. He is a friend of Sol Gills, the ships' instrument-maker. One of his favorite expressions is "When found, make a note on."

Cuvier (kü-vyā'), Frédéric. Born at Montbéliard, Doubs, France, June 27, 1773; died at Strasburg, July 25, 1838. A French naturalist, brother of Georges. He became director of the menagerie of the Jardin des Plantes in 1804, and in 1827 was appointed professor of comparative anatomy at the Jardin des Plantes. He wrote "Des dents des mammifères, considérées comme caractères zoologiques" (1825), and (in cooperation with Geoffroy St. Hilaire) "Histoire naturelle des mammifères" (1819-30).

Cuvier, Baron Georges Léopold Chrétien Frédéric Dagobert. Born at Montbéliard, Doubs, France, Aug. 23, 1769; died at Paris, May 13, 1832. A celebrated French naturalist, the founder of the science of comparative anatomy. He was educated at the gymnasium at Montbéliard and the Academia Carolina at Stuttgart; was tutor in the family of the Comte d'Hericy 1788-94; became assistant professor of comparative anatomy at the Musée d'Histoire Naturelle in 1795, member of the National Institute in 1795, professor of natural history in the Collège de France in 1800, perpetual secretary of the Academy of Sciences in 1803, and councillor of the Imperial University in 1808; was appointed councillor of state by Napoleon in 1814; was admitted to the French Academy in 1813; was president of the Committee of the Interior 1819-32; received the title of baron in 1820; was appointed superintendent of the Faculty of Protestant Theology in 1822; was made grand officer of the Legion of Honor in 1823; and was created a peer of France in 1831. His chief works are "Le règne animal" ("The Animal Kingdom," 1817), "Anatomie comparée" (1800-05), "Recherches sur les ossements fossiles" (1812), "Histoire naturelle des poissons," conjointly with Valenciennes (1823-49). Cuvier was a persistent opponent of the evolutionary doctrines advanced by Lamarck and Geoffroy Saint-Hilaire.

Cuxhaven, or Kuxhaven (kuks-hā'vn; G. pron. köks'hā-fen). A seaport in the state of Hamburg, Germany, situated at the mouth of the Elbe 57 miles northwest of Hamburg. It is now united with Ritzbüttel. It is a sea-bathing resort, and contains a castle.

Cuyabá (kwē-yū-bā'), or Cuiabá. 1. A river in western Brazil which joins the Paraguay, through the São Lourenço, about lat. 18° S. It is navigable to the town of Cuyabá.—2. The capital of the province of Mato Grosso, Brazil, situated on the river Cuyabá. Population (1892), about 20,000.

Cuyahoga (kū-ā-hō'gā). A river in northern Ohio which flows into Lake Erie at Cleveland. Length, 80-90 miles.

Cuyamungge (kwē-yū-mung'ge). [Tehuua of northern New Mexico, signifying 'the village of the rolling stone.'] An Indian pueblo of the Tehuua, 15 miles north of Santa Fé, on the banks of the stream of Tezuque. It was abandoned in 1693, and is now a ruin. A severe engagement was fought near the place, in 1694, between the Spaniards and the Tehua Indians who had risen against Diego de Vargas.

Cuyo (kō'yō). A region of Spanish South America, situated east of the Andes, and extending from about lat. 23° to 35° 3' S., and eastward, in parts, to long. 63° W. It was originally settled from Chile, and remained a province of that captain-general until 1776, when it was united to the new viceroyalty of Buenos Ayres. The limits were never definitely fixed, and the name is now obsolete.

Cuyp, or Kuyp (koip). Albert. Born at Dort, Netherlands, 1605; died at Dort, 1691. A Dutch landscape-painter.

Cuyp, Jakob Gerrits. Born 1575; died 1651. A Dutch painter, father of Albert Cuyp.

Cuza. See Alexander John, Prince of Rumania.
Cuzco (kōz'kō). [Quechua, 'navel' or 'center,' a name first given to the city.] 1. A department of Peru. Area, 13,500 square miles. Population, 238,445.—2. The capital of the above department, situated in lat. 13° 31' S., long. 72° 5' W., about 11,350 feet above sea-level. It contains a cathedral, several convents, etc. It was founded, according to tradition, by Manco Capac in the 11th century; was the capital of the empire of the Incas; and was noted for its Temple of the Sun (see Curican-cha) and the so-called fortress of the Incas (see Sacsahuana). It was entered by Pizarro Nov. 15, 1533, and was besieged and partly burned by Manco Inca in 1536. Population (estimated, 1889), 22,000.

Cyaxares (sī-aks'ā-rēz). King of the Medes 625-584 B. C. In the cuneiform inscriptions his name is Urašshatar. He may be considered as the founder of Media's power and greatness. After repelling the hordes of the Scythian invasion, he captured (606 B. C.) in alliance with Nabopolassar, viceroy of Babylonia, Nineveh, and destroyed the Assyrian empire. Toward the west Cyaxares conquered Armenia, and thus extended his dominion as far as the river Halys in Asia Minor. He even attempted the conquest of Lydia on the other side of the Halys, but had to desist on account of an eclipse which took place during the battle (585).

Cybele (sib'e-lē), or Rhea (rē'ā). In Greek mythology, the wife of Cronos (Saturnus), and mother of the Olympian gods; hence called the "Great Mother of the Gods." The original home of her worship was Phrygia (Asia Minor). Her priests were called Corybantes, and her festivals were celebrated with wild dances and orgiastic excesses amid the resounding music of drums and cymbals. She was conceived as traversing the mountains in a chariot drawn by lions. From Asia her worship came to Greece, and during the second Punic war in 204 B. C. it was introduced into Rome, where the Megalesia, later also the Taurobolia and Criobolia, were celebrated in her honor. The oak, pine, and lion were sacred to her. She is usually represented enthroned between lions, with a diadem on her head and a small drum or cymbal, the instrument used in her rites, in her hand. See also Atys.

Cyclades (sik'la-dēz). [Gr. Κυκλάδες, from κύκλος, a circle.] A group of islands belonging to Greece, situated in the Ægean Sea; so called from the belief that they formed a ring about Delos. Among the better known islands are Andros, Tenos, Ceos, Syros, Naxos, Paros, etc. They now form, with neighboring islands, the nomarchy of Cyclades. Capital, Hermopolis. Area, 923 square miles. Population (1889), 131,508.

Cyclic poets, The. The authors of Greek epic poems, composed between 800 B. C. and 550 B. C., relating to the Trojan war and the war against Thebes. See Epic cycle. Among these poems are "Cyprus" ("The Cyprian Lays"), "Ethiopia" ("The Lay of Ethiopia"), "The Sack of Troy," "The Little Iliad," "Nostos" ("The Homeward Voyages"), "Telogonia" ("The Lay of Telogonus") (all belonging to the Trojan cycle), and the "Thebais" and the "Epigoni" (belonging to the Theban cycle). A few fragments of these poems are extant.

Cyclops (sī'klops), or Cyclopes (sī-klō'pēz). [Gr. pl. Κύκλωπες, the round-eyed.] In Greek mythology, a race of one-eyed giants, represented in the Homeric cycle of legends as Sicilian shepherds. See Polyphemus.

Cydicpe. See Acontius.

Cydnus (sid'nus). In ancient geography, a river of Cilicia, Asia Minor, which flows into the Mediterranean Sea about 12 miles south of Tarsus; now called Tersus.

Cydonia (sī-dō'ni-ā). [Gr. Κύδωνία or Κυθωνία.] In ancient geography, a city on the northwestern coast of Crete, near the site of the modern Canea (which see).

Cygnus (sig'nus). [L., 'the Swan.'] An ancient northern constellation representing a bird called a swan by Ovid and others, and now always so considered.

Cymbeline (sim'be-lin). A drama by Shakspeare, produced probably about 1609 or 1610; so called from one of the chief characters, a semi-mythical king (Cunobeline) in Britain. Part of the play was no doubt derived from Holinshed; the part relating to Iachimo is in Boecaccio's "Decameron." It was first published in the folio of 1623. Garrick produced his alteration in 1762.

Cymocles. See Pyrocles.

Cymry, or Kymry (kim'ri). [W. Cymry, pl. of Cymro, a Welshman; cf. Cymru, ML. Cambria, Wales. The origin of the name is unknown; some connect it with W. cymmer, a confluence of waters; cf. aber, uver.] The name given to themselves by the Welsh. In its wider application the term is often applied to that division of the Celtic race which is more nearly akin with the Welsh, including also the Cornishmen and the Bretons or Armoricans, as distinguished from the Gaelic division. Also written Cymri, Cymry.

Cynægirus (sin-ē-jī'rus). [Gr. Κυναιγεῖρος.] An Athenian soldier, brother of Æschylus. He distinguished himself at the battle of Marathon 490 B. C., in which, according to Homer, he pursued the Persians to the sea, and, having seized one of their triremes to prevent its putting off, fell with his right hand severed. Later writers add that, having lost both his hands, he seized the vessel with his teeth.

Cynewulf (kin'e-wulf). Lived probably in the 8th century A. D. A Northumbrian (?) poet. He was a scōp or bard, but there is no evidence that he was a priest. He was the author of "Elene," "Juliana," "Crist," "Riddles," perhaps of "Phoenix," "Guthlac"; and the reputed author of the "Wanderer," etc. Even "Beowulf" has been credited to him.

Cynewulf the poet was unknown until the runes were read by which he had worked his name into his poem of "Elene." Those runes were first read in the year 1840 by two independent workers — by Jacob Grimm in his edition of "Andreas" and "Elene," and by John Mitchell Kemble in his essay upon Anglo-Saxon Runes, published that year in the "Archæologia." Each discoverer of the name endeavored to find who Cynewulf was, and when he lived. Grimm placed him in the 8th century. Kemble placed him in the end of the 10th century and the beginning of the 11th, by suggesting that he was the Cynewulf who was Abbot of Peterborough between the years 992 and 1006, who succeeded Aelfeage as Bishop of Winchester in the year 1006. Morley, English Writers, II, 206.

Cynics (sin'iks). [See Cynosarges.] A sect of Greek philosophers founded by Antisthenes of Athens (born about 444 B. C.), who sought to develop the ethical teachings of Socrates, whose pupil he was. The chief doctrines of the Cynics were that virtue is the only good, that the essence of virtue is self-control, and that pleasure is an evil if sought for its own sake. They were accordingly characterized by an ostentatious contempt of riches, art, science, and amusements. The most famous Cynic was Diogenes of Sinope, a pupil of Antisthenes, who carried the doctrines of the school to an extreme and ridiculous asceticism, and is improbably said to have slept in a tub which he carried about with him.

Cynosarges (sī-nō-sūr'jēz). A gymnasium of very early foundation in ancient Athens, combined with a sanctuary of Heracles, and possessing a grove. The philosopher Antisthenes taught here, and his school was hence called the Cynic. The Cynosarges lay somewhat high up on the southern slope of Lycabettus; its site is now occupied by the Monastery of the Asomatōn and the British and American schools of archaeology.

Cynoscephalæ (sin-os-sef'ā-lē). [Gr. Κυνός κεφαλαί, dog's heads.] Heights in Thessaly, Greece, 10-20 miles southeast of Larissa. Here, 364 B. C., the Thebans under Pelopidas defeated Alexander of Phere; and in 197 B. C. the Romans under Flamininus defeated Philip V. of Macedon.

Cynosura (sī-nō-sū'rā). [Gr. Κυνόσουρα, dog's tail.] 1. In Greek mythology, a nymph of Ida, and nurse of Zeus, metamorphosed into the constellation Ursa Minor.—2. The constellation of the Little Bear, containing the star which is now, but was not then, the polestar (which forms the tip of the tail), and thus often the object to which the eyes of mariners were directed.

Cynthia (sin'thi-ā). 1. One of the names of Artemis or Diana, the moon-goddess, derived from Mount Cynthus in Delos, her birthplace. The name is given in Spenser's "Colin Clout's Come Home Again" and in Fletcher's "Purple Island" to a sort of personification of Queen Elizabeth. Raleigh also sang her praises as Cynthia in his poem of that name, of which we have only a few books. Ben Jonson, under the same name, flatters her in "Cynthia's Revels."
2. In Congreve's "Double Dealer," a flirtant fine lady, the daughter of Lord and Lady Pliant, in love with Mellefont.

Cynthiana (sin'thi-ā'nā). The county-seat of Harrison County, Kentucky, situated on the South Licking River 48 miles south of Cincinnati. It was the scene of engagements in Morgan's raids in 1862 and 1864. Population (1890), 3,016.

Cynthia's Revels, or The Fountain of Self-Love. A "comical satyre" by Ben Jonson, acted by the Children of the Queen's Chapel in 1600. It was printed in quarto in 1601 (Bullen), in folio in 1616, the latter with large additions.

Cynthus (sin'thi-us). An epithet of Apollo, the sun-god, as the moon-goddess is called Cynthia.

Cynthus (sin'thus). In ancient geography, a mountain in Delos, from which are derived Cynthia and Cynthius, the surnames, respectively, of Artemis and Apollo.

Cynuria (si-nū'ri-ā). [Gr. Κυνουρία.] In ancient geography, a district in the eastern part of the Peloponnesus, situated on the Gulf of Argolis. It probably corresponded to the region near the modern Astros.

Cynuria, or Cynosuria, as it is called by Thucydides (iv. 56 and v. 41), was the border territory between Sparta and Argos upon the coast. It was a small tract consisting of a single valley (that of Luku) and of the adjoining hills; but it was of great importance, as commanding the passes which formed the natural communication between the two countries. Hence it was for so long a time an object of contention between them. Rome finally adjudged it to Argolis. Rawlinson, Herod., IV. 313, note.

Cyparissus (sip-a-ris'us). [Gr. Κυπαρίσσος.] In Greek mythology, a youth, a son of Telephus. He accidentally killed his favorite stag, and was so overcome with grief that Apollo metamorphosed him into a cypress.

Cyria (sip'ri-ā), or Cyprian Lays (sip'ri-an lāz). One of the poems of the Trojan cycle, anciently attributed to Homer, and later to Stasimus, or Hegesias, or Hegesinus; so named either from the home of the author (Cyprus), or because it celebrated the Cyprian Aphrodite. It served as an introduction to the Iliad, relating the first nine years of the siege of Troy.

Cyprian (sip'ri-an), Saint (Thascius Caelius Cyprianus). [L. Cyprianus, of Cyprus.] Beheaded at Carthage, Sept. 14, 258. An ecclesiastic and martyr of the African Church, elected bishop of Carthage in 248. He was converted to Christianity at an advanced age. His festival was originally kept on Holy Cross Day, and was transferred to Sept. 16. The present English calendar gives him Sept. 26, which was at one time also given to another Saint Cyprian of Antioch, the magician.

Cyprus (si'prus). [Gr. Κύπρος, F. Chypre, G. Cypern, It. Cipro, Turk. Kibris.] One of the largest islands of the Mediterranean, situated in its eastern corner, south of Cilicia, with the range of the Lebanon on the east and that of Taurus on the north. Its name is supposed to be derived from its rich mines of copper (Gr. κυπρος). It was celebrated in antiquity as the birthplace and favorite abode of Aphrodite, and was famous for its beauty and wealth, but also for its licentiousness. It was early settled by Phenicians, who were followed by Greeks. Its principal cities were Paphos on the western coast (a center of the cult of Aphrodite), Salamis on the eastern, Citium on the southeastern, and Amathus on the southern. In the center of the island were the Phenician mining cities Tamassus and Idalion, with the celebrated grove of Aphrodite. For a time Cyprus was tributary to Assyria. Its name in the cuneiform inscriptions is Yatanan, and Sargon (722-705 B. C.) relates that seven kings from this island (probably the chiefs of the Phenician colonies) brought him costly gifts and "kissed his feet," i. e. acknowledged his sovereignty. He in turn presented them with a marble stele containing a full-length sculptured portrait of himself, and an inscription commemorating his principal deeds. This monument was found in 1846, well preserved, near Larnaka (the ancient Citium), and is at present in the Royal Museum of Berlin. Cyprus was in succession subject to Persia, Macedonia, and Egypt, and in 57 B. C. became a Roman province. In the middle ages it belonged alternately to the Byzantine empire and the Saracens, and from 1192 formed a kingdom ruled by the house of Lusignan. In 1489 Caterina Cornaro transferred the sovereignty to Venice. In 1571 it was taken by the Turks. Cyprus administered by England, according to a convention between Turkey and England in 1878. Its chief officer is a high commissioner, and there is partial self government. Capital, Nicosia. Area, 8,584 square miles. Population (1891), 209,236. In 1869 Lang discovered a bilingual inscription, in Cypriote and Phenician writing, which supplied the key to the ancient Cypriote alphabet. Opinions on the source and origin of this ancient alphabet, which is syllabic, are divided. Dr. Decke, for instance, derives it from the Assyro-Babylonian cuneiform alphabet, which is also syllabic; while Professor Sayce, followed by W. Wright, would see its ultimate source in the supposed Hittite hieroglyphic inscriptions found throughout Asia Minor. (See Hittites.) Cyprus is frequently mentioned in the New Testament (Acts iv. 36, xiii. 4), and is often referred to in the Old Testament by the name of Chittim (which see). A large number of antiquities were unearthed there by General di Cesnola, which are now in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. His explorations have been the subject of much discussion and skepticism.

Cypselus (sip'se-lus). [Gr. Κύψελος.] A tyrant of Corinth about 655-625 B. C.

Cyrenaica (si-rē-nā'i-kā), or Pentapolis (pentap'ō-lis). In ancient geography, a country in northern Africa, lying between the Mediterranean on the north, Marmarica on the east, the desert on the south, and Syrtis Major on the west. It corresponded nearly to the modern Barca, and was noted for its fertility. It was settled by Therians about 631 B. C.; was subject to Egypt from 321 B. C.; formed with Crete a Roman province in 67 B. C.; and was ruined by invasions of Persians and Saracens in the 7th century A. D.

Cyrenaics (si-rē-nā'iks). [From Κυρήνη, Cyrene.] A school of Greek hedonistic philosophers, founded by Aristippus of Cyrene, a disciple of Socrates.

Cyrene (si-rē'nē). [Gr. Κυρήνη.] In Greek mythology, a nymph, mother of Aristæus.

Cyrene. [Gr. Κυρήνη.] In ancient geography, the principal city of Cyrenaica, situated about 10 miles from the Mediterranean, in lat. 32° 45'

N., long. 21° 50' E. It was founded by Therians, under Battus, about 631 B. C. (see Cyrenaica), and was a seat of Greek learning and culture. The modern Ghrennah, on its site, contains many antiquities. It was the birthplace of Aristippus, Eratosthenes, and other celebrated men.

Cyrl (sir'īl), Saint, of Alexandria. [L. Cyryllus, Gr. Κυρίλλος, lordly.] Born at Alexandria; died at Alexandria, June, 444. An ecclesiastic and theologian. He succeeded his uncle Theophilus as archbishop of Alexandria in 412. Animated by an intemperate zeal for the cause of orthodoxy, he deposed the Novatians of their church property, and expelled the Jews from the city. He is said to have instigated his monks to murder the pagan philosopher Hypatia (415 ?). He began in 428 to oppose the doctrines of Nestorius, and in 431 presided over the Council of Ephesus, at which Nestorius was condemned as a heretic. His works, chiefly controversial, were edited by Aubert in 1638. He is commemorated as a saint in the Greek, Roman, and Anglican churches on Jan. 28.

Cyrl, Saint, of Jerusalem. Born at or near Jerusalem about 315; died about 386. An ecclesiastic and orthodox controversialist. He succeeded Maximus as bishop of Jerusalem in 350. He carried on a controversy with Acacius, an Arian bishop of Caesarea, who procured his deposition in 357. After various changes of fortune, he was finally restored in 381. His works, which consist chiefly of catechetical lectures, were edited by Touttée in 1720.

Cyrl, Saint (or Constantine). Born at Thesalonica about 820; died Feb. 14, 869 (?). A scholar and prelate, surnamed "the Apostle of the Slavs." He engaged with his brother Methodius in missionary labors among the Moravians, Bulgarians, and other Slavic nations. He introduced the "Cyrillic" alphabet into the Old Slavic language.

Cyrl Lucar (Cyrillus Lucaris). Born in Crete, 1572; strangled at Constantinople, 1638. A reforming prelate of the Greek Church. He became patriarch of Constantinople in 1621, and sent the "Codex Alexandrinus" to England in 1628.

Cyropædia (si'rō-pē-dī'ā), The. [Gr. Κύρου παιδεία, the education of Cyrus.] A work of Xenophon, in eight books, describing the education of Cyrus, the founder of the Persian empire, his great deeds, and his dying advice to his sons and ministers.

Education of Cyrus (Cyropædia), a very diffuse political novel, in which he sets forth his ideal picture as a biography of the older and greater Cyrus, in opposition to the dreams of Plato and other theoretical politicians of the day. This work, which is the longest and most ambitious of Xenophon's writings, but consequently the most tedious and the least real, seems to be our earliest specimen of a romance in Greek prose literature.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., II. 250.

Cyrrhæstia (si-res'ti-kā). In ancient geography, a region in northern Syria, west of the Euphrates and south of Commagene.

Cyrus (si'rus). [Gr. Κύρος; in the Old Testament Kores; in the cuneiform inscriptions Karash, Karshu; OPers. Kuros.] Died 529 B. C. The founder of the Persian empire, called "The Great." His birth and early youth are surrounded by myths and legends (see Mandane). The information obtained from the inscriptions, among them a cylinder of Cyrus himself discovered in the ruins of Babylon and Sepharvaim (Sippara), combined with the accounts of the Greek historians (Herodotus, Xenophon, and Ctesiphon), may be summarized as follows: He calls himself on his cylinder son of Cambyses, grandson of Cyrus and great-grandson of Shishpish (Theispes), "Kings of Anshan." Anshan is evidently identical with Anzan, the plain of Susa, and stands for Elam, which was conquered by Theispes, the son of Achæmenes, founder of the dynasty. In 549 Cyrus, after conquering Ecbatana, dethroned Astyages, king of Media, and united Media with Persia. He then directed his arms against the Lydian kingdom of Croesus (who made an offensive and defensive alliance with Nabonidus, king of Babylonia, and Amasis, king of Egypt), defeated him, and captured the capital Sardis. The ensuing years Cyrus used for consolidating his power in the conquered countries. In 538 he marched with a great army into Babylonia. Sepharvaim (Sippara) was captured without fighting; Nabonidus, who defended it, fled; and two days afterward Babylon itself, which was held by Nabonidus's son Belshazzar, fell into the hands of the conqueror, likewise "without battle and fight," as he records. According to Eusebius, Nabonidus after the fall of Babylon fortified himself in Borsippa; the city was besieged by Cyrus; and after it had capitulated he treated it and Nabonidus himself with mercy, allowing the latter to make his residence in Carmania. It is certain that he showed great generosity and consideration to the conquered capital (Babylon), sparing its inhabitants and their religious feelings: he even represented himself as having been called by Merodach (Marduk), the god of the city, to avenge his neglect at the hands of the preceding kings. Cyrus's attitude to the Jewish exiles in Babylonia is known from the Old Testament (Ezra I.). He permitted them to return to their own country, rebuild Jerusalem, and restore the temple, and even returned to them the vessels of the temple which were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar. His death, like his birth, is somewhat shrouded in legend. The most common view is that he fell in battle with the Messagres on the river Jaxartes.

There is much reason to believe that the tomb of Cyrus still exists at Murg-Aub, the ancient Pasargadae. On a square base, composed of immense blocks of beautiful white marble, rising in steps, stands a structure so closely resembling the description of Arrian, that it seems scarcely possible to doubt its being the tomb which in Alexander's time contained the body of Cyrus. It is a quadrangular house, or rather chamber, built of huge blocks of marble, 5 feet thick, which are shaped at the top into a sloping roof. Internally the chamber is 10 feet long, 7 wide, and 8 high. There are holes in the marble floor, which seem to have admitted the fastenings of a sarcophagus. The tomb stands in an area marked out by pillars, whereon occurs repeatedly the inscription (written both in Persian and in the so-called Median), "I am Cyrus the king, the Achæmenian." Rawlinson, Herod., I. 333, note.

Cyrus, surnamed "The Younger." Died 401 B. C. Son of Darius Nothus, king of Persia, and Parysatis. He sought to overthrow his brother Artaxerxes, attacked him with the aid of the ten thousand Greeks (see Anabasis), and perished on the battle-field of Cunaxa.

Cytherea (si-thē-rē'ā), or Cythera (si-thō'rā). [Gr. Κυθήρεια, Κυθίρα, from Κίθηρα, Cythra.] In classical mythology, surnames of Aphrodite, from the island of Cythera, or from Cythera in Crete.

Cythna (si-th'nā). A character in Shelley's poem "The Revolt of Islam."

Cyzicus (siz'i-kus), or Cyzicum (-kum). [Gr. Κυζίκος.] In ancient geography, the peninsula projecting from Mysia, Asia Minor, into the Sea of Marmora; also, the Greek town on its isthmus. Among its ruins are: (a) A Roman amphitheater of the 2d century A. D. The ruins still rise to a height of 65 feet, built of rubble faced with rusticated masonry in granite. There are 32 arched entrances in the lower story. The longer axis of the ellipse is 925 feet. (b) A temple of Hadrian, dedicated A. D. 167, and greatly admired in antiquity. It was a Corinthian peripteros of 6 by 15 columns, of white marble. The cella was small, without pronaos or opisthodomos; there were 4 interior rows of columns in front, and 2 behind. The temple measured 112 by 801 feet; the cella 70 by 140. The columns were 7 feet in base-diameter and 70 high (the highest of any classical temple). The pediments and the cella were richly adorned. (c) An ancient theater, apparently contemporaneous with the amphitheater, in part built up of rough masonry and faced with marble. The diameter is 328 feet.

Czacki (chāts'kē), Tadeusz. Born at Poryck, Volhynia, Poland, Aug. 28, 1765; died at Dubno, Volhynia, Feb. 8, 1813. A Polish writer, and promoter of education in Poland. His chief work is one on the laws of Lithuania and Poland (1800).

Czajkowski (chī-kov'skē), Michal. Born at Helczyniec, Ukraine, Russia, 1808. A Polish novelist, and general in the Turkish service. His works include "Wernyhora" (1838), and other novels of Ukrainian and Cossack life.

Czarnecki (chārn-yets'kē), or Czarnecki, Stefan. Born in Poland, 1599; died at Sokolofka, Volhynia, Poland, 1665. A Polish general, distinguished in the war against the Swedes 1655-58, and in that against the Russians and Cossacks 1660-65.

Czars of Russia, The. The first independent Russian prince to assume the title of czar was Ivan IV., "the Terrible," who was crowned czar of Moscow in 1547. Dabaiba (dä-bi'vä), or Dabay-be (dä-bi'bä), or Davaive (dä-vi'vä), or Abibe (ä-bé'-be). A name given in the early part of the 16th century to a region south of the Isthmus of Panama, somewhere in the vicinity of the Atrato River. It was probably the appellation of a chief, or his title, transferred by the Spaniards to the territory over which he ruled. According to reports Dabaiba contained a temple hued with gold, where human sacrifices were made. Balboa vainly searched for this temple in 1512 and 1515, and it was long an object of the Spanish expeditions.

Dabbat (dab'bat). [Ar. dabbatu'l-ard, the reptile of the earth.] In Mohammedan belief, "a monster who shall arise in the last day, and shall cry unto the people of the earth that mankind have not believed in the revelations of God." Dacia (dä'shi-ä). [L. Dacia, Gr. Δακία; from Daci, Gr. Δακίοί, Δάκιοι, Δάοι, the inhabitants.] 1. A province of the Roman Empire, lying between the Carpathian Mountains on the north, the Theiss on the west, the Danube on the south, and the Dniester on the east. It corresponded to modern Rumania, Transylvania, part of Hungary, and perhaps also Bukovina. The inhabitants were the Getae or Daci. It was invaded by Alexander the Great in 335 B. C., by Lysimachus about 292 B. C., and its people defeated the generals of Domitian 81-96 A. D. It was conquered by Trajan in 101 and succeeding years, and made a Roman province. It was abandoned by the Romans in the reign of Aurelian, 270-275.

Trajan now formed the lands between the Theiss and the Danube, the Dniester and the Carpathian Mountains, into the Roman province of Dacia. The last province to be won was the first to be given up; for Aurelian withdrew from it, and transferred its name to the Moesian land immediately south of the Danube.

Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 70.

Cut off, as it has been for so many ages, from all Roman influences, forming, as it has done, one of the great highways of barbarian migration, a large part of Dacia, namely the modern Rumanian principality, still keeps its Roman language no less than Spain and Gaul. In one way the land is to this day more Roman than Spain or Gaul, as its people still call themselves by the Roman name.

Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 71.

2. A diocese in the northern part of the later Roman prefecture of Illyricum (Serbia and western Bulgaria).

Dactyls (dak'tilz), or Dactyli (dak'ti-li), or Daktyloi (-loi). [Gr. Δάκτυλοι.] In classical mythology, supernatural and magical beings living on Mount Ida in Phrygia, the discoverers of iron and copper and of the art of working them. They were transferred, in the legends, to Mount Ida in Crete, and were there identified with the Curetes, Corybantes, etc. Their number, originally three, was increased, in various accounts of them, to ten, and even to one hundred.

Dadu. See Ramman.

Dædalus (dä'dä-lus or ded'ä-lus). [Gr. Δαίδαλος.] In Greek legend, an Athenian, son of Metion and grandson of Erechtheus. He was regarded as the personification of all handicrafts and of art, and as such was worshipped by artists' guilds in various places, especially in Attica, and was a central figure in various myths. He was said to have made various improvements in the fine arts, including architecture, and to have invented many mechanical appliances, as the ax, the awl, and the bevel. For the murder of his nephew Talos, of whose inventive skill he was jealous, he was driven to Crete, where he constructed the famous labyrinth, in which he, with his son Icarus, was confined for furnishing the clue of it to Ariadne. (In another legend a different account of his imprisonment is given.) Escaping, he and Icarus fled over sea on wings of wax which he had made. Icarus soared too near the sun, his wings melted, and he fell into the sea, which was called for him the Icarian. Many archaic wooden images were, in historic times, believed to be the work of Dædalus.

Dægsastan, Battle of. A victory gained in 603 by the Northumbrian king Æthelfrith over the Scots under Aidan, near the river Tees (?).

Dagobert (dag'ō-bert; F. pron. dä-gō-bär') I. Born about 602; died 638. King of the Franks, son of Clotaire II., by whom he was appointed king of Austrasia in 622, and whom he succeeded as king of the Franks in 628. He founded the abbey of St. Denis, and reduced to writing the customary laws of the barbarian tribes in his kingdom. During his reign the empire of the Franks attained a wide extent, namely, from the Weser to the Pyrenees, and from the Western Ocean to the frontiers of Bohemia.

Dagobert, Chanson du roi. [F., 'Song of King Dagobert.'] A popular French song concerning King Dagobert I. and his favorite counselor, Saint Eloi. It was in existence before the revolution of 1789. It is a satirical series of couplets sung to a hunting chorus, and has been modified to suit various political epochs. In 1814 it became immensely popular on account of the verses against Napoleon and the Russian campaign. It was forbidden by the police, but was revived on the return of the Bourbons. Every other stanza begins "Le bon roi Dagobert."

Dagon (dä'gon). A deity mentioned in the Old Testament as the national god of the Philistines, and as worshipped especially in Gaza and Ashdod (Judges xvi. 23, and 1 Sam. v.). The name is usually derived from Hebrew dag (fish), and it is assumed that Dagon was depicted as half man and half fish, and had his female counterpart in Derketo, who was worshipped in Ashkelon (Ascalon). 1 Sam. v. 4 would seem to favor this view. On the other hand, Assyro-Babylonian mythology also knows a divinity Dagan; but there he is, etymologically at least, not connected with the fish, as the Assyrian word for fish is not dag but nun; the meaning of the name Dagan has not as yet been determined. At the same time the Babylonian historian Berosus gives an account of such a being, half man and half fish, under the name Oannes, who in the beginning of history emerged at intervals from the sea and taught the Babylonians civilization. This Oannes of Berosus is identified by some scholars with Ea of the Assyro-Babylonian pantheon, the god of the ocean; and is conceived as a human figure with the skin of a fish on his shoulders as a garment, a representation of which is often met on the early monuments. In Phœnicia the name of the god was connected with dagan, corn, and is accordingly rendered into Greek in the fragments of Philo Byblus by σιτος. Dagon was then considered as the god of agriculture, a function which is also emphasized in the Oannes of Berosus.

Dagonet (dag'ō-net), or Daguenet (dag'e-net), Sir. In Arthurian romances, the fool of King Arthur, who "loved him passing well and made him knight with his own hands." He was buffeted and knocked about a good deal, and is frequently alluded to by the dramatists of Shakspeare's time and later.

Daguerre (dä-gär'), Louis Jacques Mandé. Born at Cormeilles, Seine-et-Oise, Nov. 18, 1789; died at Petit-Brie-sur-Marne, July 12, 1851. A French painter, and inventor (with Niépce) of the daguerreotype process. He was at first in the internal revenue service, then devoted himself to scene-painting, in which he attained celebrity, and in 1822, with Bouton, opened the Diorama in Paris (burned 1839). In the successful study of the problem of obtaining permanent pictures by the action of sunlight he was anticipated by Nicéphore Niépce, who began his investigations in 1814, and communicated some of his results to Daguerre, who was then occupied with the subject, in 1826; the two worked together from 1829 until Niépce's death in 1833. Daguerre's perfected process was communicated to the Academy of Sciences by Arago, Jan. 9, 1839.

Daimbert (dän-bär'), or Dagobert (dä-gö-bär'). Died in Sicily, 1107. First Latin patriarch of Jerusalem. He became archbishop of Pisa in 1092, and commanded the Pisan and Genoese army in the first Crusade. He was elected patriarch of Jerusalem in 1099.

Daimiel (di-mé-el'). A town in the province of Ciudad Real, Spain, situated 20 miles northeast of Ciudad Real. Population (1887), 11,508.

Daimio (di'myö'). [Chino-Jap., 'great name.'] The title of the chief feudal barons or territorial nobles of Japan, vassals of the mikado; distinguished from shonin ('little name'), the title given to the hatamoto, or vassals of the shogun. Though exercising independent authority in their own domains, the daimios acknowledged the mikado as the legitimate ruler of the whole country. During the Tokugawa shogunate (1603-1858) the daimios gradually became subject to the shoguns, who compelled them to live in Yedo, with their families, and a certain number of their retainers, for six months of every year, and on their departure for their own provinces to leave their families as hostages. The number of daimios differed at different times, according to the fortunes of war and the caprice of the shoguns. Just before the abolition of the shogunate there were 255, arranged in five classes, with incomes ranging from 10,000 to 1,027,000 koku of rice per annum. In 1871 the daimios surrendered their lands and privileges to the mikado, who granted pensions proportioned to their respective revenues, and relieved them of the support of the samurai, their military retainers. These pensions have since been commuted into active bonds, redeemable by government within thirty years from date of issue. The title has been abolished, and that of kuzenzoku bestowed upon court and territorial nobles alike.

Dainty (dän'ti), Lady. A fashionable, frivolous fine lady in Cibber's comedy "The Double Gallant." "Dogs, doctors, and monkeys are her favorites." She is courted by Careless.

Daircell, or Taircell, or Molling. Died 696. An Irish saint. According to an Irish account of his life, he was the illegitimate son of Faelan, a farmer at Luachair (now Slieve Lougher), near Castle Island, Kerry. His mother, when she found herself about to give birth to a child, fled to the wilderness, where she was prevented from strangling her new-born babe only by a dove sent from heaven, which flapped its wings in her face. He was educated by St. Brendan of Cloufret, who gave him the name of Daircell ('gathering'), in allusion to the manner in which the dove "gathered" him to her with her wings. Once, when collecting alms for St. Brendan's Church, he was attacked by a band of robbers, who threatened to kill him. He made his escape by making three leaps, in which he passed over the whole of Lougher and landed in the third inclosure of the church, whereupon he received the name of Molling (from linge, leaps) of Lougher. He founded the church of Teoh Molling, or St. Mullens, at Ross Broc (?), and is the reputed author of a Latin manuscript of the four gospels, preserved in Trinity College, Dublin.

Daisy (dä'zi), Solomon. The bell-ringer of Chigwell, in Charles Dickens's "Barnaby Rudge": a rusty little fellow who seems all eyes.

Dakiki, Abu Mansur Muhammad. Lived about 1000 A. D. A Persian poet, from Tus or Bokhara, author of many odes and sonnets. Dakiki had completed a thousand distichs of the Book of Kings when he was murdered. Firdusi represents him as appearing to him in a dream, and asking him to incorporate in his work the fragment. To Dakiki Firdusi ascribed the portion of the Shahnamah relating to Gushtasp and Zartusht (Zoroaster).

Dakota (da-kö'tä). [From the Dakota Indians.] A former territory of the United States. See North Dakota and South Dakota.

Dakota (dä-kö'tä). [Pl., also Dakotas: 'confederated.'] A division of the Siouan stock of North American Indians, composed of the Dakota proper and the Assiniboin. Their former habitat was in Montana and the adjacent part of the Northwest Territory of British North America, as well as in North and South Dakota and Minnesota. The Dakota proper, or Sioux, were originally in seven gentes, whence the name by which they sometimes call themselves, Oteci 'akowin ('The Seven Council fires'). These seven gentes have become the primary divisions of the Dakota, and are as follows: Mdewakantonwan, Waqpekute, Sissetonwan, Waqpetonwan, Itanktonwan, Itanktonwanna, and Tetonwan. The Mdewakantonwan were the original Isanyati or Sante, but at present the Waqpekute also are called by that name. These original divisions have developed into at least 126, excluding those of the Waqpekute, which have not been acquired. The present number of the Dakota is 28,449, and the Assiniboin number 3,008. (See Siouan.) Also Dakotah.

Dalmatia (dal-mä'shi-ä). [G. Dalmatien, F. Dalmatie.] A crownland and titular kingdom in the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary. It is bounded by Croatia on the north, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Montenegro on the east, and by the Adriatic on the south and west. Its surface is mountainous, and many islands lie along the coast. The leading occupations of its inhabitants are fishing, seafaring, ship-building, raising livestock, and the production of wine and olives. Capital, Zara. It sends 9 members to the Austrian Reichsrath, and has a Diet of 43 members. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic. A large majority of the inhabitants are Serbo-Croatians, and there are many Italians on the coast. Dalmatia formed part of the Roman diocese of Illyricum. It was overrun by the Goths and Avars, and in the 7th century by the Slavs. A Croatian kingdom of Dalmatia existed in the 11th century. From the 11th century Dalmatia fluctuated between Hungary and Venice until finally the greater part became Venetian. By the treaty of Campo-Formio in 1797 it was given to Austria; in 1805 it was ceded to France, and was retroceded to Austria in 1814. It was the scene of insurrections 1869-70, and in 1882. Area, 4,940 square miles. Population (1890), 527,426.

The earlier Illyrian war is recorded in the second book of Polybius. Appian has a special book on the Illyrian wars. In him (chap. xi.) we get our first notice of Dalmatia as such: the name is not to be found in Polybius. There is also a shorter notice in Strabo.

Damascus (dä-mas'kns). [Heb. Damešek. Assyri. Dimasqu, Ar. Dimishq or Esh Shâm. F. Damas.] Formerly the capital and most important city of Syria, situated in the fertile valley of Cæle-Syria, east of the Anti-Lebanon, on the edge of the desert. On account of its beautiful fertile surroundings, its lofty position, and its richness in fresh water, Damascus has been praised in antiquity and in modern times as the "paradise of the earth," "the eye of the desert," and "the pearl of the Orient." Originally a Hittite city, it became the capital of Syria, and a great part of the country was called by its name. (For its history, see Aram.) In modern times it became prominent by the massacre of Christians in 1860. It retained a certain importance through all the periods of history, and is even now the seat of the Turkish wali (governor), and has a population of between 100,000 and 150,000. In the Old Testament the name of Damascus occurs as early as the history of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 15, xv. 2). After the time of David, Damascus often came into sharp collision with Israel. In the New Testament Damascus is known especially from the history of Paul (Acts ix.).

Damer (dä'mër), Anne Seymour. Born in 1749; died May 28, 1828. An English sculptor, daughter of Henry Seymour Conway. She married John Damer in 1767. She executed in 1785 two heads, one of the river Thames and the other of the river Isis, for a bridge at Henley, near her father's house at Park Place, which have been much admired. She also produced a statue of George III. and a bust of Nelson.

Dametas. See Dametas.

Damian. See Cosmas.

Damian (dä'mi-an). 1. A youth in Chaucer's "Merchant's Tale" in the "Canterbury Tales." He languishes for and obtains the love of May, the young wife of old January.—2. A young squire in Scott's "Ivanhoe," an aspirant for the holy Order of Templars.

Damianus (dä-mi-ä'nus), Peter (Pietro Damiani or Damiano). Born at Ravenna, Italy, 1007; died at Faenza, Italy, Feb. 23, 1072. A Roman Catholic ecclesiastic. In 1035 he became a hermit at Fonte Avellano, near Gubbio, in Umbria, and was soon head of all the surrounding hermits and monks. He was noted for his asceticism, and established a system of self-flagellation which was later extended among the monastic orders and the Flagellants. He was also influential as a reformer, condemning simony and marriage of the clergy. He was made bishop of Ostia and cardinal in 1058, and was the adviser and censor of a number of popes. His works include epistles, sermons, lives of saints, ascetic tracts, and poems.

Damien (dä-myän') de Veuster, Joseph. Born in Belgium, Jan. 3, 1840. A Roman Catholic missionary who devoted his life to the welfare of the lepers in the government hospital on the island of Molokai, Hawaii. He fell a victim to the disease April 15, 1889.

Damiens (dä-myän'), Robert François. Born near Arras, France, 1715; executed at Paris, March 28, 1757. A man of low character, who had been both a soldier and a domestic servant, who made an unsuccessful attempt upon the life of Louis XV., Jan. 5, 1757. Damiena approached the king at Versailles, as he was entering his carriage, and succeeded in stabbing him. The punishment inflicted upon him was most brutal. His right hand was burned in a slow fire; his flesh was torn with pincers and burned with melted lead; resin, wax, and oil were poured upon the wounds; and he was torn to pieces by four horses.

Damietta (dam-i-et'tä). [Ar. Damiät.] A city of Lower Egypt, situated between the Damietta branch of the Nile and Lake Menzaleh, 7 miles from its mouth, near the ancient Tamiathis. It was besieged and taken by the Crusaders in 1218-19, and in 1249. Population (1882), 34,044.

Damietta branch. The chief eastern mouth of the Nile.

Damiotti (It. pron. dä-më-ot'të). Dr. An Italian charlatan who exhibits the magic mirror in Scott's "Aunt Margaret's Mirror."

Damiri (dä-më'rë), or Demiri (de-më'rë), Kemal al-din Mohammed ibn Isa. Born at Cairo, 1341; died at Cairo, 1405. An Arabian jurist and naturalist, author of a "Life of Animals."

Damiron (dä-më-rön'). Jean Philibert. Born at Belleville, Rhône, France, May 10, 1794; died at Paris, Jan. 11, 1862. A French writer on philosophy, professor of the history of philosophy in the Faculté des Lettres, Paris. He was the author of "Essai sur l'histoire de la philosophie en France au XIX^e siècle" (1828), "Cours de philosophie" (1831), "Essai sur l'histoire de la philosophie en France au XVII^e siècle" (1840), etc.

Damis (dä-mës'). An impetuous youth in Molière's play "Tartuffe," the son of Orgon.

Damkina (dam-ki'nä). [Akkad., 'lady of the earth.'] In Assyro-Babylonian mythology, wife of Ea, the god of the ocean, whose center of worship was in Eridu (modern Abu Shah-rein), in Damascius Danke.

Damnation de Faust (däm-nä-syön' dé foust), La. An opera or dramatic story in four parts by Berlioz, first produced at Paris in 1846.

Damocles (dam'ö-kléz). [Gr. Δαμωνκλής.] 1. Lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C. A Syracusan, a courtier of Dionysius the elder. Cicero relates that Damocles, having extolled the good fortune of Dionysius, was invited by the tyrant to taste this royal felicity, and that, in the midst of a splendid banquet and all the luxury of the court, on looking up he beheld above his head a sword suspended by a single horse-hair.

2. The king of Arcadia in Greene's "Arcadia." See Sephestia.

Damoda (dä-mö'dä), or Damuda (dä-mö'dä). A river of Bengal, India, which joins the Hugli below Calcutta. Length, about 350 miles.

Dametas (da-më'tas). [Gr. Δαμοστος.] A herdsman in Theocritus and Vergil; hence, in pastoral poetry, a rustic. Sir Philip Sidney introduces in his "Arcadia" a foolish country clown by that name, which afterward seems to have become proverbial for folly.

Damon (dä'mon). [Gr. Δαμων.] 1. Lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C. A Pythagorean of Syracuse, celebrated for his friendship with Pythias (or Phintias), a member of the same sect. Pythias plotted against the life of Dionysius I. of Syracuse, and was condemned to die. As Pythias wished to arrange his affairs, Damon offered to place himself in the tyrant's hands as his substitute, and to die in his stead should he not return on the appointed day. At the last moment Pythias came back, and Dionysius was so struck by the fidelity of the friends that he pardoned the offender, and begged to be admitted into their fellowship.

2. A goatherd in Vergil's Eclogues; hence, in pastoral poetry, a rustic.

Damon and Phillida (fil'i-dä). A pastoral farce by Cibber, produced in 1729, and published anonymously the same year.

Damon and Pithias (pith'i-as). A play by Richard Edwards, printed in 1571. Its main subject is tragic, but it calls itself a comedy.

Ward.

Damon and Pythias (pith'i-as). A tragedy by John Banim and Richard Lalor Sheil, produced in 1821.

Damoreau (dä-mö-rö'), Madame (Laure Cinti Montalant; also known as Mademoiselle Cinti, and Cinti-Damoreau). Born at Paris, Feb. 6, 1801; died at Chantilly, France, in 1863. A noted French singer. In 1819 she made her first appearance as Cherubino in "Le Nozze di Figaro" in Paris. In 1822 she appeared in London, and in 1826 at the Grand Opéra, Paris. From this time she sang both in Europe and the United States with assured success until 1858, when she retired from the stage. In 1834 she was made professor of singing at the Conservatoire, Paris.

Damour. See Tamyras.

Dampier (dam'për), William. Born at East Coker, Somerset, England, June, 1652; died at London, March, 1715. An English freebooter, explorer, and author. His seafaring life began in 1668, and until 1691 he led a life of the wildest adventure, generally as a sailor on various piratical cruises on the western coast of America and elsewhere. During this time he circumnavigated the globe. In 1697 he published his "Voyage round the World," and this was supplemented by a second volume of travels in 1699. In 1699 he was given command of a ship in which he again went round the world, exploring the coasts of Australia and New Guinea. He started again on a privateering cruise with two ships in 1703, but accomplished little, and his company was broken up; he reached England, after a third circumnavigation, 1707. Subsequently he was pilot of the privateer Duke, and again went round the world. Besides his travels he published a well-known "Discourse on the Winds." The following were named for him:

Dampier Archipelago. A group of small islands situated northwest of Australia, about lat. 20° 30' S., long. 116°-117° E.

Dampier Land. A maritime district in west Australia, in lat. 17°-18° S.

Dampier Strait. 1. A strait on the northwest of Papua, separating that island from Waigiü.—2. A strait on the northeast of Papua, separating Papua from New Britain.

Dampierre (don'pyär'). Auguste Henri Marie Picot, Marquis de. Born at Paris, Aug. 19, 1756; died near Vicogne, Nord, France, May 9, 1793. A French revolutionary general, distinguished in the campaigns of 1792-93.

Dampy (dam'pli). Widow. A character in Garrick's play "The Male Coquette."

Damrosch (däm'rosch), Leopold. Born at Posen, Prussia, Oct. 22, 1832; died at New York, Feb. 15, 1885. A noted conductor, solo violinist, and composer. He settled in New York in 1851, and was instrumental in the establishment of German opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York. He was its director, as well as of the Oratorio and Symphony societies and the Arion, until his death.

Damrosch, Walter. Born at Breslau, Prussia, Jan. 30, 1862. Musician, son of the above. He succeeded his father as director of the Oratorio and Symphony societies.

Damsel of Brittany. A surname of Eleanor of Brittany, niece of King John of England, and sister of Arthur, count of Brittany. She was imprisoned by John, and died 1241.

D'Amville (dam'vil). The Atheist in Cyril Tourneur's play "The Atheist's Tragedy."

Dan (dan). [Heb., 'judge.'] 1. A son of Jacob by Bilhah. Gen. xxx. 6.—2. A Hebrew tribe. The portion allotted to the Danites, as described in Josh. xix., was the small but fertile hilly tract west of Benjamin and northwest of Judah to the sea, including the cities of Japho, Ekron, Gathrimmon, etc. But though the tribe of Dan was originally one of the strongest numerically, counting 62,000 to 64,000, it was not equal to the task of expelling the Ammonites, and later the Philistines, from that territory, and only for a time prevailed with the help of Ephraim and Judah. In consequence of this, part of the tribe migrated to the extreme north of the country, and conquered the city of Laish, henceforth called Dan (see below). That part which remained in the south, from which the hero Samson descended, disappeared from history, and seems to have been absorbed by the tribe of Judah.

3. The city formerly called Laish, and named Dan after its capture by the Danites. It is situated on the slopes of Hermon, not far from the modern Banias (still called Tel-el-Kadi, 'hill of the Judge'), and is often mentioned in the Old Testament as the most northern landmark of Palestine, in the formula "from Dan to Beersheba." It contained a sanctuary with an image the exact nature of which is not known. At the division of the kingdom Jeroboam put up there one of the "calves." It is first mentioned in Gen. xiv. 14 as the place at which Chedorlaomer, king of Elam, and his four allies were overthrown and defeated by Abraham. The occurrence in this account of the name which was given to the place many centuries later is variously explained. If the Dan of Gen. xiv. is identical with that of Judges xviii., and if the account of Gen. xiv. is authentic, the name Dan may have been later inserted in the MS. for Lash, when the latter was superseded by the former.

Dan. A river of Virginia and North Carolina which unites with the Staunton at Clarksville, Virginia, to form the Roanoke. Length, about 200 miles.

Dana (dā'nā). Charles Anderson. Born at Hinsdale, N. H., Aug. 8, 1819. An American journalist and man of letters. He was one of the leaders in the Brook Farm Association in 1842; was connected with the New York "Tribune" 1847-62; was assistant secretary of war 1863-64; and became editor of the New York "Sun" in 1868. He has published "Household Book of Poetry" (1857), etc., and edited, with Ripley, the "American Cyclopaedia."

Dana, Edward Salisbury. Born at New Haven, Conn., Nov. 16, 1849. An American mineralogist and physicist, son of J. D. Dana. He was assistant professor of natural philosophy at Yale University until 1890, when he became professor of physics.

Dana, Francis. Born at Charlestown, Mass., June 13, 1743; died at Cambridge, Mass., April 25, 1811. An American jurist, diplomatist, and politician, son of Richard Dana. He was minister to Russia 1781-83, and chief justice of Massachusetts 1791-1806.

Dana, James Dwight. Born at Utica, N. Y., Feb. 12, 1813; died at New Haven, Conn., April 14, 1895. A noted geologist and mineralogist, professor at Yale from 1845. He was graduated at Yale in 1833; traveled in the Mediterranean as mathematical instructor of midshipmen in the United States navy 1833-35; was assistant to Professor Silliman at Yale 1836-38; and took part in the Wilkes exploring expedition 1838-42. His important "Reports" of the expedition (on geology, corals, and crustaceans) were published 1846-54. His works include "System of Mineralogy" (1837), "Manual of Geology" (1863), "Text Book of Geology for Schools and Academies" (1864), "Corals and Coral Islands" (1872), "Characteristics of Volcanoes" (1890), etc.

Dana, Richard. Born at Cambridge, Mass., July 7, 1700; died May 17, 1772. An American lawyer and patriot. He was a prominent member of the Boston bar, and, as a supporter of the popular cause, frequently presided over the Boston town meetings between 1763 and 1772, and otherwise took a prominent part in the movements which preceded the Revolution.

Dana, Richard Henry. Born at Cambridge, Mass., Nov. 15, 1787; died at Boston, Feb. 2, 1879. An American poet and essayist, son of Francis Dana. He studied at Harvard 1804-07 (expelled in the latter year); was admitted to the bar in 1811; was associate editor of the "North American Review" 1818-20; and conducted the serial "The Idle Man" 1821-22. He published "Buccaners, and Other Poems" (1827), etc., and wrote ten lectures on the characters of Shakspeare and delivered them in 1839-40. He published his collected works in prose and verse in 1850.

Dana, Richard Henry. Born at Cambridge, Mass., Aug. 1, 1815; died at Rome, Italy, Jan. 6, 1882. An American jurist, politician, and author, son of R. H. Dana (1787-1879). In 1834 he shipped before the mast for a voyage on the Pacific to restore his health. From this voyage came "Two Years Before the Mast" (1840). He was one of the founders of the Free-Soil party 1848. Among his other works are "The Seaman's Friend" (1841), and an edition of Wheaton's "Elements of International Law" (1866).

Dana, Samuel Luther. Born at Amherst, N. H., July 11, 1795; died at Lowell, Mass., March 11, 1868. An American chemist and agricultural writer. He was employed as chemist to the Merrimack Print Works at Lowell upward of thirty years, and invented a new method of bleaching cotton, which was generally adopted.

Danaë (dan'ā-ē). [Gr. Δανάη.] In Greek mythology, the daughter of Acrisius of Argos, and mother of Perseus by Zeus, who visited her, while she was shut up in a brazen tower by her father, in the form of a shower of gold. She was shut up with her child in a chest, thrown into the sea, and carried by the waves to the island of Seriphos. From various difficulties she was in the end rescued by Perseus and brought back to Greece. Many of the representations of her in art are famous. Among them are: (a) A painting by Rembrandt, in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. Danaë lies, undraped, on a bed covered with green silk; her unloosed girdle has fallen to the floor. An old woman is in attendance behind the curtains. (b) A painting by Correggio, in the Palazzo Borghese, Rome. She reclines smiling on her couch, while Cupid before her holds out a fold of the drapery over her knees to catch the golden shower. (c) A masterpiece of Titian in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. Danaë reclines on a couch while the golden shower falls upon her. (d) A painting by Titian, in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. Danaë lies, nude, on a cushioned couch; the golden rain falls from a cloud over her, in which the face and hand of Jupiter appear. An old woman seeks to catch some of the shower in a dish.

Danaï (dan'ā-i), or Danaoi (-oi). [Gr. Δαναοί.] In ancient Greek history, the Argives; used by Homer to denote the Greeks generally. See Danaus.

Danaïdes (da-nā'i-dēz). [Gr. Δαναίδες.] In Greek legend, the fifty daughters of Danaus, by whose command they slew their husbands. According to later writers, they were condemned in Hades to pour water into sieves. See Danaus.

Danakil (dā-nā-kēl'). A Hamitic tribe of the Ethiopian branch, settled in the arid region between Abyssinia, Massowa, and Obock. They claim to be Arabs and Mohammedians, but are really pagan. Their native name is Afar. Also called Dankali.

Danakil, Country of the. A region in eastern Africa, lying between the Red Sea on the east and Abyssinia on the west; also called Afar country.

Danaus (dan'ā-us). [Gr. Δαναός.] In Greek legend, a son of Belus and grandson of Poseidon, the founder of Argos, and ancestor of the Danai. He was the brother of Ægyptus.

Danbury (dan'bu-ri). A city in Fairfield County, Connecticut, 52 miles northeast of New York. It is noted for its hat manufactures. It was burned by the British in 1777. Population (1890), 16,552.

Dance (dāns), George. 1700-68. An English architect, designer of the Mansion House, London, in 1739.

Dance, George. Born about 1740; died at London, Jan. 14, 1825. An English architect and artist, son of George Dance. He designed Newgate Prison, London, in 1770.

Dance, Nathaniel. Born 1734; died at Carnborough House, near Winchester, England, Oct. 15, 1811. An English painter, son of George Dance (died 1768).

Dance of Death, Dance of Macabre (ma-kā'ber). [F. Danse Macabre, L. Chorea Machabæorum.] Originally, a kind of morality or allegorical representation intended to remind the living of the power of death. It originated in the 14th century in Germany, and consisted of dialogues between Death and a number of typical followers, which were acted in or near churches by the religious orders. Soon after it was repeated in France. It became extraordinarily popular, and was treated in every possible way, in pictures, bas-reliefs, tapestry, etc. Death is made grotesque and a sort of "horrid Harlequin," a skeleton dancer or musician playing for dancing, leading all mankind. A dramatic poem which grew out of this was imitated in Spain in 1400 as "La Danza General de los Muertos." In 1425 the French, having illustrated each verse, had the whole series painted on the wall of the churchyard of the Monastery of the Innocents, where they acted the drama. In 1430 the poem and pictures were produced in London, and not long after at Salisbury (1469), Wortley Hall in Gloucestershire, and other places. In Germany it attained its greatest popularity. The drama was acted until about the middle of the 15th century, when the pictures became the main point of interest. There is a picture of this kind in the Marienkirche at Lübeck, and one was on the cloister wall of Klingenthal, a convent at Basel, both of the 14th century; the latter disappeared in 1805. One in the Campo Santo at Pisa is ascribed to Orcagna. In the reign of Henry VI, a processional Dance of Death was painted around the cloisters of old St. Paul's in London. Holbein has left fifty-three sketches for engraving, the originals of which are in St. Petersburg; these he called "Imagines Mortis"; they are, however, independent, and do not represent a dance. Lydgate wrote a metrical translation of the poem for the chapter of St. Paul's, to be placed under the pictures in the cloister. Various explanations of the name Macabre or Macabre have been given.

The name "Macabre" probably arose from the association of this subject with a painting that illustrated a thirteenth-century legend of the lesson given by certain hideous spectres of Death to three noble youths when hunting in a forest. They afterwards arrived at the cell of St. Macarius, an Egyptian anchorite, who was shown in a painting by Andrew Orgagna presenting them with one hand a label of admonition on the vain glory of life, and with the other hand pointing to three open coffins. In one coffin is a skeleton, in one a king.

Morley, English Writers, VI. 109.

Dancourt (don'kōr'), (Florent Carton). Born at Fontainebleau, France, Nov. 1, 1661; died at Courcelles-le-Roi, Berry, France, Dec. 6, 1725. A French comedian and playwright. His plays deal almost exclusively with the middle class. Among them are "Le chevalier à la mode" (1687), "Les honneurs de qualité" (1700), "Les trois cousins" (1700).

Dandie Dinmont. See Dinmont, Dandie.

Dandin, George. See George Dandin.

Dandin (don'dān'), Perrin. A name given to an ignorant and preposterous judge in Racine's "Les plaideurs" and in La Fontaine's "Fables," taken from Rabelais's "Perrin Dandin."

Dandolo (dān'dō-lō), Andrea. Born 1310; died Oct. 7, 1354. Doge of Venice 1343-54. He joined in 1343 the Crusade proclaimed by Clement VI. against the Turks, which ended in a peace advantageous to Venice in

Dandolo, Enrico. Born at Venice about 1108; died at Constantinople, June 14, 1205. Doge of Venice 1192-1205. He was the leader of the Venetians and Crusaders in the capture of Constantinople 1203 and 1204. He went as ambassador to the Byzantine court in 1173, and was blinded by order of the emperor Manuel.

Dandolo, Count Vincenzo. Born at Venice, Oct. 26, 1758; died there, Dec. 13, 1819. An Italian chemist and economist. He wrote "Fondamenti della fisico-chimica" (1796), "Discorsi sulla pastorizia," etc. (1806), etc.

Danelagh, or Danelaw (dān'lā). [Also Danelagh, Danelage, etc., after ME. or ML. transcriptions of the AS.; AS. Dena lagu, law of the Danes; Dena, gen. of Dene, the Danes; lagu, law.] That part of England where the Danish influence was paramount during the 9th and 10th centuries. It corresponded to the modern shires York, Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Leicester, Rutland, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, Buckingham, Bedford, and Herts.

Danes (dānz). [From ME. Dane (after ML. Dani, etc.), Dene, from AS. Dene, pl., = D. Deen = G. Däne, etc., = Icel. Danir, pl., = Dan. Dane, pl. Daner, also Dan-sk = Sw. Dan-sk; first in LL. Dani, pl.; ult. origin unknown.] The natives of Denmark. They were first described early in the 6th century as on the western coast of the Cimbric peninsula, in territory formerly occupied by the Heruli, whither, according to Jordanes, they had come from Scandinavia. The Old Danish language is preserved in numerous runic inscriptions, the oldest of which date from the Viking age (700-1050), and in literature from the 13th century. Three principal dialectic groups are distinguished, which are typically represented by the dialects of Scania in southern Sweden, Zealand, and Jutland. The Zealand dialect became the literary form at about the time of the Reformation, from which period modern Danish dates.

Danewerk (dān'e-verk), Dan. Dannevirke. ["Danes' work."] An ancient intrenchment or wall erected by King Götttrik in the 9th century as a protection of Denmark against invasion from the south. It extended from the Schlei to the Treene. It was strengthened in the 10th century and later, and was captured from the Danes by the Prussians April 23, 1848.

Dangeau (don'zhō'), Philippe de Courcillon, Marquis de. A French soldier, aide-de-camp to Louis XIV. whom he attended in all his campaigns. He wrote a voluminous journal, covering the period from 1684 to 1720, and giving in minute detail the occurrences and the etiquette of the court of Louis.

Dangle (dang'gl). An amateur critic, in Sheridan's farce "The Critic," whose peculiarities are agreeably described by his wife in the first scene; supposed to be a satire on Thomas Vaughan, a playwright.

And what have you to do with the theatre, Mr. Dangle? Why should you affect the character of a critic? I have no patience with you! Haven't you made yourself the jest of all your acquaintance by your interference in matters where you have no business? Are not you called a theatrical quidnunc, and a mock Mæcenas to second-hand authors? Sheridan, The Critic, i.

Danican (dā-nē-kōn'), François André, usually known as Philidor. Born at Dreux, France, Sept. 7, 1726; died at London, Aug. 31, 1795. A noted French chess-player and musical composer, author of "Analyse du jeu des échecs" (1777).

Daniel (dan'yel). [Heb., 'my judge is God.'] One of the prophets of the Old Testament. According to the book which bears his name, he (probably being of royal or noble descent) was carried off captive to Babylon in the third year of Jehoiakim (605 B. C.) and with three other Israelitish youths of noble blood, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah, was instructed in the language and learning of the Babylonians and educated for the king's service. They refrained from defiling themselves by partaking of the food of the king. Daniel was especially gifted with "understanding in all visions and dreams," and successfully exercised this gift by interpreting disquieting dreams of Nebuchadnezzar, and the mysterious writing on the wall which disturbed the revelry of Belshazzar (Dan. v. 5). At the accession of Darius he was made "one of the three presidents" of the empire. He was divinely delivered from the lions' den into which he was thrown for refusing to obey a decree of the king forbidding any one to ask a petition of God or man for thirty days except the king. He was still prosperous under Cyrus. In the third year of Cyrus he saw the vision on the bank of the Tigris, and this is the last notice about him in the Old Testament. He is referred to by Ezekiel as a pattern of righteousness and wisdom. In addition to his Hebrew name, a Babylonian one, Belteshazzar (which see), was given him. Legends about him grew up, as in the apocryphal additions to the biblical book which bears his name, "Bel and the Dragon," the story of Susanna and Daniel, etc. According to Mohammedan tradition, Daniel returned to Palestine, where he held the government of Syria, and finally died at Susa, where his tomb is still shown, and is visited by crowds of pilgrims.

Daniel, Book of. A book which in the English Bible, as in all other translations, follows Ezekiel as the fourth of the greater prophets, while in the original Hebrew Bible it has its place in the third division of the Canon, the Hagiographa. It is generally divided into two parts. The first, chapters i.-vi., contains historical incidents; the second, chapters vii.-xii., visions. Chapters i.-vii., inclusive, are written in Aramaic; the rest in Hebrew. The authenticity and historical character of the book were early called in question. Porphyry, in his discourses against the Christians, and most modern critics relegate the book in its present shape, on historical and linguistic grounds, to the period of the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes (about 167 B. C.). The writer exhibits a familiarity with the history of that period, while his historical references to the time in which Daniel is supposed to have lived are vague and in many instances incorrect: as, for instance, that Nebuchadnezzar was the father of Belshazzar, that the latter was the last Babylonian king, and that Darius, and not Cyrus, was the successor of Nabonidus in the rule over Babylonia. The language of the book contains numerous Persian and Greek words which point to a time when these empires had long been established. The object of the author may have been to encourage his people to constancy and faithfulness in the desperate struggle for their country and faith, showing them how the constancy and fidelity of Daniel and his three companions were rewarded, and revealing to them the glorious future which is to follow their present sufferings. This, however, does not exclude a historical basis of the narratives contained in the book; and it is not impossible that a Daniel similar to the one described in the book not only existed during the exile, but that also some written materials were extant from him, which the author of the 2d century, east, together with the traditions, into a literary form, with a special view to the circumstances of his own time.

Daniel (dän-yel'), Arnaud. See the extract.

Of the troubadours themselves none is mentioned with higher praise than Arnaud Daniel. Petrarch calls him gran maestro d'amore, the "great master of love, whose novel and beautiful style still (i. e. about the middle of the fourteenth century) does honor to his country"; and Dante, in his philological and metrical treatise "De vulgari eloquio," declares himself indebted to Arnaud for the structure of several of his stanzas. The "sestina," for instance, a poem of six verses in which the final words of the first stanza appear in inverted order in all the others, is an invention of this troubadour adopted by Dante and Petrarch, and, most likely through the medium of French models, by Mr. Swinburne. Hueffer, Troubadours, p. 45.

Daniel, Gabriel. Born at Rouen, France, Feb. 8, 1649; died at Paris, June 23, 1728. A French Jesuit historian and theologian, author of a famous "Histoire de France" (1713), etc.

Dannecker (dän'nek-er), Johann Heinrich von. Born at Waldenbuch, near Stuttgart, Oct. 15, 1758; died there, Dec. 8, 1841. A German sculptor. In 1771 he entered the Karlsschule at Stuttgart, where he was associated with Schiller. He designed at an early age some statues of children and caryatides which still adorn the chateau of Stuttgart and Hohenheim. Appointed court sculptor (1780) to Duke Charles of Württemberg, he went to Paris, where he studied with Pajou. In 1785 he went to Rome, where he met Canova, Goethe, and Herder. His statue of Ceres and Bacchus procured him admission to the academies of Milan and Bologna. On his return to Stuttgart (1790), he was appointed professor at the academy. His most famous work is a statue of Ariadne on a panther. Among his other works are a statue of Sappho, a bust of Schiller, a bust of Gluck (1809), etc.

He was senator from 1879, minister of justice in 1880, and of the interior in 1882, and prime minister from June 6, 1884, to May 7, 1885. He brought forward a bill for emancipation, which, though lost at the time, led to complete abolition of slavery three years later.

Dante (dan'te; It. pron. dän'te) (originally Durante) Alighieri. Born at Florence in May, 1265; died at Ravenna, Italy, Sept. 14, 1321.

A celebrated Italian poet. His father, Alighiero degli Alighieri, was of an ancient family. (The name is also spelled Aldigeri, Alaghieri, Algeri, Alleghieri.) He was a juriscult, and a member of the Guelph party. After its defeat at the battle of Montaperti, he went into exile. Dante, as he was called after the Florentine fashion of abbreviation, was, however, born in Florence. In the ninth year of his age he first saw Beatrice Portinari, then only eight years old, who inspired him with that romantic passion, or as some think impersonal and platonic love, which he narrates in the "Vita Nuova" and the "Divina Commedia." Beatrice was married in 1287 to Messer Simone de' Bardi, and died shortly after, at the age of twenty-four. Dante expresses no disappointment at her marriage, and seems to have had no desire for any intimate relation with her. About two years after her death he married Gemma Donati. He became passionately absorbed in the love of country, and at the age of twenty-four fought on the side of the Guelphs at the battle of Campaldino. He was intrusted with several foreign missions, and became an important factor in the Florentine government. His political ideas changed gradually, and from being an ardent Guelph and Florentine he became "the first Italian," as has been said; conceived a plan of general organization for the advancement of Italy; and endeavored to reconcile the Guelphs and Ghibellines. On the 15th of June, 1300, Dante was elected one of the priors of Florence. The struggles and riots of the Bianchi and Neri resulted in the destruction of half of Florence, Dante's house being pillaged and destroyed in his absence at Rome, to which city the Bianchi had sent him on an embassy. The Neri succeeded in establishing a government of their own, and passed a sentence of temporary banishment against him in 1302. He succeeded in obtaining aid from various courts, especially from Bella Scala, lord of Verona, his friend, who was the chief of the Ghibellines. In 1303 an unsuccessful attempt was made to take possession of Florence, and, humiliated by his exile and failures, Dante withdrew from a public career, and passed the rest of his life in wandering from one city to another, watching, and endeavoring to guide, the course of events from various retreats. Finally, in 1320, he went to Ravenna, and on his return from a mission to Venice fell ill, and, being worn out by failure and disappointment, died at the age of fifty-six years. He spent the years from 1304 to 1306 in study, and all his works except the "Vita Nuova" were written in solitary exile. His chief work is the "Divina Commedia" (which see). The "Vita Nuova" is practically the history of his love for Beatrice. It was probably finished in 1307. The "Convito," or Banquet, is almost a continuation of the "Vita Nuova." It gives much information about his life, and throws light on the "Divina Commedia." These were written in Italian. "De vulgari eloquio sive idiomatum" is a Latin treatise on the Italian language or vulgar idiom. It was begun in 1304, and is alluded to in the "Convito." "De monarchia," a treatise containing Dante's creed as a Ghibelline, was written between 1310 and 1314. There is a famous portrait of the poet as a young man, by Giotto, on the wall of the Bargello in Florence. It was injured by time and vandalism, and has been too much restored; fortunately, a tracing of it was made before this by an Englishman, and this tracing has been published by the Arundel Society. It and a death-mask are the only authentic likenesses of Dante.

There are fair grounds for believing that he [Dante] himself visited Oxford. Villan states that Dante, who was one of his contemporaries and neighbors at Florence, "went to the University (studio) at Bologna and then at Paris, and in other parts of the world." Boccaccio, a little later in point of time, mentions incidentally that Dante visited England as well as France; and Giovanni da Ravenna, Bishop of Fermo, writing in 1416, states positively that Dante studied the liberal arts at Padua and Bologna, and theology at Oxford and Paris. Some indirect evidence in support of this may be found in the "Divina Commedia," which contains a description of the coast of Flanders, an allusion to Westminster Abbey, and several scattered notices of English affairs. A close resemblance has also been traced between some of Dante's opinions and those of Roger Bacon, the great English philosopher. The date of Dante's undoubted sojourn at Paris must be placed either between the years 1287 and 1289, or between 1308 and 1314. Lyte, Oxford, p. 89.

Dantès (don-täs'), Edmond. The Count of Monte Cristo, in Dumas's novel of that name. He appears, for the furtherance of his revenge, as Lord Wilmore and the Abbé Busoni.

Danti (dän'tè), Vincenzo. Born at Perugia; died May 24, 1576. An Italian goldsmith, sculptor, military architect, and poet. He made the "Decapitation of St. John" over the door of the baptistry at Florence, and the statue of Pope Julius III. at Perugia.

Danton (don-tôn'), Georges Jacques. Born at Arcis-sur-Aube, France, Oct. 28, 1759; guillotined at Paris, April 5, 1794. A celebrated French revolutionist. He was the leader of the attack on the Tuileries, Aug. 10, 1792; was minister of justice in Aug.; was implicated in the "September massacres"; moved the formation of the Revolutionary tribunal, March, 1793; and was a member of the Committee of Public Safety April-Sept., 1793. He overthrew Hébert and his party with the aid of Robespierre, and was in turn overthrown by the latter. He was an orator of great power.

Dan Tucker (dan tuk'cr). A negro song with the refrain "Out o' de way, ole Dan Tucker"; said to refer to Captain Daniel Tucker of Virginia, second governor of Bermuda.

Danzic, or Dantsic (dant'sik). [G. Danzig, Pol. Gdansk, L. Gedanum.] A seaport, capital of the province of West Prussia, Prussia, situated on the Vistula 3 miles from its mouth, and on the Mottau and Radaune, in lat. 54° 21' N., long. 18° 39' E. It contains the Altstadt, Rechtstadt, Vorstadt, Niederstadt, Langgarten, and the Speicher Island, and is a strong fortress. It is one of the principal ports of Germany, and next to Odessa has the largest grain-trade in Europe. Its chief buildings are the Rathaus, the Exchange (Artushof or Junkerhof), the church of St. Mary, and a Franciscan monastery (with a museum). It was the capital of the duchy of Pommern. The town is mentioned as early as 997. It passed to the Teutonic Order about 1310, and for a time was a Hanseatic city. It came under the supremacy of Poland in 1466, but retained a large amount of independence. By the second partition of Poland it passed to Prussia in 1793. It was besieged and taken by the French under Lefebvre in 1807; was made a commonwealth in 1807; was besieged by the Allies in 1813, and taken (1814) after an eleven months' siege. It was restored to Prussia in 1814. Population (1890), commune, 120,338.

Danube (dan'üb). [G. Donau, Hung. Duna, L. Danuvius, later Danubius, Gr. Δαυοῦσιος.] The largest river of Europe next to the Volga, formed by the union of the Breg and Brigach near Donaueschingen in southern Baden; the Roman Danubius, or (in its lower course) Ister. It flows through Wurtemberg, Bavaria, and Austria-Hungary; separates Austria-Hungary and Rumania on the north from Servia and Bulgaria on the south; and empties into the Black Sea by three principal mouths, about lat. 44° 50'-45° 25' N. Navigable to 11 m. Its chief tributaries are, on the right bank, the Iller, Lech, Isar, Inn, Enns, Raab, Drave, Save, Morava, and Timok; on the left bank, the Altmühl, Naab, Regen, March, Waag, Gran, Theiss, Temes, Schyl, Aluta, Arlsh, Yalomitza, Sereth, and Pruth. Area of basin, about 300,000 square miles. Length, 1,770 miles.

Danube Navigation Commission, International. A commission appointed by the treaty of Paris in 1856, and several times continued. It has great authority over the Danube mouths, in constructing engineering works, making local regulations, etc., and to a less extent over the Danube as far up as the Iron Gates.

Danvers (dan'vèrz). A town in Essex County, Massachusetts, situated 15 miles northeast of Boston. It is the seat of the State insane asylum. Population (1890), 7,454.

D'Anville. See Anville.

Danville (dan'vil). The name of several towns in the United States. (a) A city and the county-seat of Vermilion County, Illinois, situated on the Vermilion River in lat. 40° 7' N., long. 87° 38' W. It is a railway and coal-mining center. Population (1890), 11,491. (b) The county-seat of Boyle County, central Kentucky, 89 miles south of Frankfort. Population (1890), 8,766. (c) A borough and the county-seat of Montour County, Pennsylvania, situated on the north branch of the Susquehanna 51 miles north of Harrisburg. It is noted for its iron manufacture. Population (1890), 7,998. (d) A city in Pittsylvania County, Virginia, situated on the Dan in lat. 36° 34' N., long. 79° 20' W.; the center of a tobacco-growing district. Population (1890), 10,305.

Danzig. See Dantzig.

Daphnæ (daf'nē) (town). See Daphne, 2.

Daphne (daf'nē). [Gr. Δάφνη, the laurel.] 1. In Greek mythology, a nymph, daughter of the river-god Peneus, or, in other accounts, of Ladon, an Arcadian. Her lover Leucippus pursued her in woman's clothing, and was killed by the nymphs at the instigation of Apollo. When the god in turn pursued her, she entreated that she might be transformed into the bay-tree, and he granted her petition.

2. The first Italian opera, as distinguished from a musical drama. It was produced by the Society of the Alterati in Florence, in a private house, in 1596. The music was by Giulio Caccini and Jacopo Peri (who both invented recitative), the words by Ottavio Rinuccini. Opitz made a German translation of the text, and Heinrich Schütz wrote new music for it. This was the first German opera, and was produced April 13, 1627, at Torgau, at the court of the elector John George I.

3. An asteroid (No. 41) discovered by Goldschmidt at Paris, May 22, 1856.

Daphne, 1. In ancient geography, a famous grove and sanctuary of Apollo, situated about 5 miles southwest of Antioch, Syria. It was established by Seleucus Nicator.—2. A town in ancient Egypt, about 25 miles from Pelusium: the Talpene of the Bible, and the modern Tel Deffeneh. Its site has recently been explored. Also Daphne.

Daphni, Convent of. See Athens (Greece).

Daphnis (daf'nis). [Gr. Δάφνις.] 1. In Greek mythology, a shepherd, son of Mercury and a Sicilian nymph. He was protected by Diana, and loved the chase. Pan gave him lessons in singing and on the flute, and the Muses endowed him with a love of poetry, and he is said to have originated bucolic poetry. He was turned into a stone according to one legend; according to another his eyes were torn out by a nymph for his infidelity to her, and he threw himself in despair into the sea. In ancient pastoral poetry his name was frequently given to shepherds.

2. A gentle shepherd in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "The Faithful Shepherdess"—3. An idyl by Gesner (1756).

Daphnis and Chloe (klō'ē). A Greek pastoral romance attributed to Longus (4th or 5th century A. D.), a Greek sophist. It recounts the loves and pastoral life of Daphnis, foster-son of Lamon, a goatherd, and Chloe, foster-daughter of Dryas, a shepherd. The manuscript of Mont-Cassin, taken to Florence, does not name the author. It is known principally through the French version of Amyot (1559), revised by Courcier. It has been translated and imitated in all European languages. Tasso's "Aminta," Montemayor's "Diana," d'Urfé's "Sirene," St. Pierre's "Paul and Virginia," and Allan Ramsay's "Gentle Shepherd" are founded on it.

Da Ponte (dā pon'te), Lorenzo. Born at Ceneda, near Venice, March 10, 1749: died at New York, Aug. 17, 1838. An Italian librettist and author. He wrote the words to Mozart's "Figaro" and "Don Giovanni."

Dapper (dap'p'r). In Ben Jonson's comedy "The Alchemist," a greedy and credulous lawyer's clerk who desires a "fly" (a spirit or familiar) of the Alchemist to enable him to cheat at horse-races by giving him prior information.

Dapperwit. A vain, foolish, and boastful rake in Wycherley's "Love in a Wood."

Dappes (däp), Vallée des. A small valley in the Jura, canton of Vaud, Switzerland. It was a subject of dispute between France and Switzerland 1815-62.

Dapple (dap'l). The name of Sancho Panza's ass in Cervantes's romance "Don Quixote."

Darab (dä'räb), or Darabgherd (dä-räb-gerd'), or Darabjird (dä-räb-jërd'). A city in the province of Farsistan, Persia, in lat. 28° 55' N., long. 54° 25' E. It is sometimes identified with the ancient Pasargadae.

Daras (dä'ras). An ancient town of Mesopotamia, situated near Nisibis. It was a frontier post of the Eastern Empire against Persia in the 6th century A. D.

Darbhanga (dä-bän'gä), or Durbunga (durbun'gä). 1. A district in Bengal, British India, intersected by lat. 26° N., long. 86° E. Area, 3,335 square miles. Population (1881), 2,633,447.—2. The capital of the above district. Population (1891), 73,561.

D'Arhlay, Madame. See Arblay.

Darboy (där-bwä'), Georges. Born at Fayl-Billot, Haute-Marne, France, Jan. 16, 1813; shot at Paris, May 24, 1871. A French prelate, archbishop of Paris 1863-71. He was arrested and assassinated by the Communists.

Darby (där'bi), John Nelson. Born at London, Nov. 18, 1800; died at Bonremouth, Hants, England, April 28, 1882. An English theologian and writer, for a time a minister of the Church of England; one of the founders of the Plymouth Brethren, or Darbyites. See Plymouth Brethren.

Darby and Joan. A married pair who are said to have lived in the 18th century in the West Riding of Yorkshire, noted traditionally for their long and happy married life. There is a ballad on the subject called "The Happy Old Couple," supposed to have been written by Henry Woodfall, though it has been attributed to Prior. A poem "Dobson and Joan," by "Mr. B.," is published with Prior's poem.

Darc, Jeanne. See Joan of Arc.

Darcet (där-sä'), Jean. Born Sept. 7, 1725; died at Paris, Feb. 13, 1801. A French chemist, director of the manufactory at Sèvres.

Darcet, Jean Pierre Joseph. Born at Paris, Aug. 31, 1777; died Aug. 2, 1844. A French chemist, son of the preceding. He effected improvements in the manufacture of powder.

Darcy (där'si), Mr. The lover of Elizabeth Bennet, in Miss Austen's "Pride and Prejudice." See Bennet.

Dardanelles (där-dä-nelz'). A strait connecting the Sea of Marmora with the Ægean Sea, and separating the peninsula of Gallipoli from Asia Minor: the ancient Hellespont. It is defended by castles at Tchanak-Kaleesi (known as the Castle of Asia; see extract below), Kilid-Bahr (known as the Castle of Europe), and at the Ægean entrance. It was crossed by Xerxes in 480 B. C., and by Alexander the Great in 334 B. C. The passage was forced by the British fleet under Admiral Duckworth in 1807. It was closed against foreign men-of-war by stipulations of 1841, 1856, 1871, and 1878, but was passed by a British fleet in Feb., 1878, to protect Constantinople from the Russians. In 1891 an agreement between Russia and the Porte was reached, by which the ships of the so-called volunteer fleet of Russia, bearing the flag of the merchant marine, are allowed free passage of the Dardanelles; but when they carry convicts or soldiers, notice of this fact must be given to the Porte. Length, about 45 miles. Average width, 3 to 4 miles; narrowest point, about 14 miles.

About 14 m. below the western point of that bay [Maito (Madytus)] are the famous Castles of the Dardanelles. The castles, Chanak-kaleesi, the earthenware castle, from a celebrated manufacture, or Sultanieh-kaleesi, on the Asiatic side [known as the Castle of Asia], and Kilid-bahri, or Kilid-bahar (the lock of the sea), on the European shore [known as the Castle of Europe], are called by the Turks Boghaz-hissarlari, and by the Franks the Old Castles of Anatolia and Romelia. Chanak-kaleesi, commonly called Dardanelles, is a town of 2,000 houses, on a flat point opposite the European fort. Kilid-bahri is built on the side of a projecting hill, and its castle is of less importance than that of Chanak-kaleesi. The equipment of the forts both on the European and Asiatic sides has recently been entirely reorganized. On the Asiatic side the fort of Sultanieh has been armed with Krupp guns, which will command a large section of the Straits both above and below the town. Some distance below the town a 40-ton Krupp gun has been mounted behind earthworks. Above the town are also batteries, one of which on the Najara Bourneon point has a heavy Krupp gun. On the European side the fort of Kilid-bahri, situated at the foot of a steep hill, has 15 large Krupp guns, and both above and below it are newly-constructed earthworks heavily armed. The barrow of Iccuba, or Cynossema, where the Athenians erected a trophy after their victory towards the end of the Peloponnesian war (Thucydides, viii.), is, or was, close to the European castle.

Murray, Handbook for Turkey, etc., p. 128 (ed. 1878).

Dardani (där'dä-ni). [Gr. Δάρδανος.] 1. An ancient Illyrian people of the southern highland of Mœsia. They became subject to the Macedonians under the Antigonis, and later to the Romans.—2. The inhabitants of Dardania (1), mentioned in the Iliad.

Dardania (där-dä-ni-ä), or Dardanicæ. [Gr. Δαρδανία, from the Dardani.] 1. In ancient geography, a territory in Mysia, with uncertain boundaries. It is mentioned, indefinitely, in the Iliad.—2. A district in the southwestern part of Mœsia. It was made a province by Diocletian.

Dardanius (där-dä-ni-us). Servant to Brutus in Shakspeare's tragedy "Julius Cæsar."

Dardanus (där'dä-nus). [Gr. Δάρδανος.] In Greek legends, a son of Zeus and Electra, and mythical ancestor of the Trojans.

Dardanus, or Dardanum (-num). [Gr. Δάρδανος or Δάρδανον.] In ancient geography, a city of Mysia, Asia Minor, situated on the Hellespont about 9 miles southwest of Abydos.

Darden (där'den), Miles. Born in North Carolina, 1798; died in Henderson County, Tenn., Jan. 23, 1857. An American noted for his size. His height was 7 feet 6 inches, and his weight (at death) about 1,000 pounds.

Dardistan (där-dis-tän'). ["Land of the Dardu," an Aryan race.] A region in central Asia. (See the quotation.) Also Jahistan ('land of the rebels').

Dardistan appears to be simply a convenient but somewhat misleading name employed by our geographers to express a large tract inhabited by different Aryan races of somewhat similar type. It includes the districts of Astor and Gilgit, . . . the little kingdoms of Hunza and Nagar, Yasin, the independent republics of the Hindu valley, and other countries south of the Hindu Koosh.

E. F. Knight, Where Three Empires Meet, p. 258.

Daredevil (där'dev'l). The Atheist in Otway's comedy of that name. He is a cowardly, boasting fellow, who when in danger forgets his principles and says "two dozen paternosters within a half hour."

Dares (dä'rëz). [Gr. Δάρης.] A priest of Hephestus in Troy, mentioned in the Iliad. The authorship of a lost work on the fall of Troy, a pretended Latin translation of which was written about the 5th (?) century A. D. was attributed to him in antiquity.

Dar-es-Salaam (där-es-sü-läm'). The capital of German East Africa. It has an excellent harbor, but is unhealthy. It rivals Bagamoyo as a meeting-place of the caravans from the lake region. It was ceded by the Sultan of Zanzibar to the German East African Company in 1885.

Daresté de la Chavanne (dä-rest' dé lä shä-vän'), Antoine Elisabeth Cléophas. Born at Paris, Oct. 25, 1820; died at Luency-les-Aix, France, April 6, 1882. A French historian, author of "Histoire de France" (1865-73), etc.

Dar-fertit (där-fer-tët'). A region in central Africa, south of Darfur.

Darfur (där'föör), or Darfor (där'föör). A country in the eastern part of the Sudan, Africa, situated about lat. 8°-16° N., long. 22°-28° E. It is inhabited by negroes and Arabs, and the religion is Mohammedan. Its chief towns are El-Fasher and Kober. It was conquered and annexed to Egypt in 1874, but revolted in 1882. Area, estimated, 175,000 square miles. Population, variously estimated from 1,500,000 to 4,000,000.

Darfur appears to have reasserted its independence. . . . The greater part of . . . Darfur is included within the sphere of influence of the British East African Company. Statesman's Year-Book, 1893, p. 320.

Dargaud (där-gö'), Jean Marie. Born at Paray-le-Monial, Saône-et-Loire, France, Feb. 22, 1800; died Jan. 5, 1866. A French historian and littérateur. His chief work is a "Histoire de la liberté religieuse en France" (1859).

Dariel Pass (dä-rê-l' pás). The chief pass in the Caucasus Mountains, situated in the central part of the chain. It is traversed by a military road, the route between Tiflis and Vladikavkaz. It is probably the ancient Caucasian or Iberian Gates. Elevation, about 8,000 feet.

Darien (dä'ri-en). A seaport in McIntosh County, Georgia, situated near the mouth of the Altamaha River in lat. 31° 22' N., long. 81° 26' W. It exports lumber. Population (1890), 1,491.

Darien, Colony of. An unsuccessful Scottish settlement on the Isthmus of Panama, founded by William Paterson. It was chartered by the Scottish Parliament in 1695; the enterprise was begun in 1698; and the settlement was abandoned in 1700.

Darien (dä'ri-en; Sp. pron. dä-rë-en'), Gulf of. A branch of the Caribbean Sea, lying north of the republic of Colombia and east of the Isthmus of Panama. See Urabá.

Darien, Isthmus of. See Panama, Isthmus of. The name is also used, in a restricted sense, for that portion of the Isthmus of Panama (or Darien) which forms a narrow neck between the Gulf of Darien and the Gulf of San Miguel.

Darinel (dar'i-nel). A comic shepherd, a character introduced into "Florisel de Niquea," the tenth book of "Amadis de Gaul." He strongly excited the rage of Cervantes.

Darius (da-rí'us) I. [Gr. Δαρείος; in the Old Testament Daryavesh; in the cuneiform inscriptions Daryavush or Daryamush; OPers. Darayavush.] Son of Hystaspes, and fifth in the descent from Achæmenes. He succeeded Cambyses on the Persian throne 521-486, after defeating the Magian Gaumata, who claimed to be Bardiya (the Greek Smerdis), brother of Cambyses. A record of his reign is given by himself in the long trilingual inscriptions of Behistun (which see). Besides the revolt in Persia itself, caused by the impostor Gaumata, he had to suppress two uprisings in Babylonia, led by Nidintu-Bel and Arachu, who gave themselves out for Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabonidus: in consequence of these uprisings he caused the fortifications of Babylon to be torn down. The other countries also fell away in turn, but at last were brought to submission. After restoring order in the empire he introduced regular taxation and uniformity of coinage, constructed roads, and founded a kind of postal system by placing stations and relays with saddled horses at regular intervals on the road between Susa and Sardis. To the capitals Susa in Elam, Ecbatana in Media, and Babylon, he added Persepolis in Persia proper, which was destroyed by Alexander the Great, but of which imposing ruins have survived. On account of his attention to trade and industry he was called "the Hæckster." His expedition over the Bosphorus and Danube into Scythia was unsuccessful. Toward the East he extended his supremacy to the Indus, and compelled North Africa to pay him tribute. Under him began also the great struggle between Persia and Greece (battle of Marathon in 490). His tomb is hewn in the rock at a place called Naksh-e-Rustem, near Persepolis, and is adorned with sculptures and inscriptions complementing those of Behistun. Darius I. is referred to in the Old Testament in connection with the building of the temple of Zerubbabel. In the second year of his reign he allowed the reumption of the building, and in the sixth it was completed (Ezra. vi. 15).

Dartmouth College, Case of. In the history of American jurisprudence, a case which derives great importance from its bearing on the law of corporations. It originated in a dispute between the president and trustees of Dartmouth College. The former, having been removed from office by the latter, appealed to the legislature of New Hampshire, which passed a bill amending the charter of the college, whereby a new corporation was created under the title of Dartmouth University, the property of the college being vested in the new corporation. The college trustees brought action in the Court of Common Pleas in 1817 to recover the property. The case came by appeal before the Supreme Court of the United States, which in 1819 rendered a decision in favor of the trustees. The decision held that a charter is a contract between the State and the corporation created by the charter, and that, as the States are prohibited by the Constitution from passing any laws impairing the obligations of contracts, charters are unalterable except by consent of the corporations created by them. The plaintiffs were represented by Daniel Webster.

Davenant, or D'Avenant, Sir William. Born at Oxford, England, Feb., 1606; died at London, April 7, 1668. An English poet and dramatist. Ovids is chiefly responsible for the story that Davenant was the son of Shakspeare, which seems to rest mainly on the fact that the latter used the inn of John Davenant (the father of William) at Oxford on his journeys to and from Warwickshire. About 1620 Davenant became page to the Duchess of Richmond, and then to Fulke Greville, Lord Brooke. In 1628, after the murder of Greville, he began to write plays, etc. In 1638 he was made poet laureate. About this time he had a severe illness which resulted in the loss of his nose, a fact frequently adverted to by the witty writers of the time. He was manager of Drury Lane Theatre for a time, but, becoming implicated in the various intrigues of the civil war, he fled to France. Returning in 1643, he was knighted at the siege of Gloucester. He was imprisoned for two years in the Tower for political offenses, and expected to be hanged. While there he published "Gondibert" (1651). This epic poem consisted of fifteen hundred four-line stanzas. After the Restoration he was in favor at court, and continued to write till his death. Among his plays are "Albion" published in 1629, "The Cruel Brother" (1636), "The Just Italian" (1636), "The Wits" (1636), "The Unfortunate Lovers" (1643), "The Siege of Rhodes" (1656), "Love and Honor" (1649), "Law against Lovers" (played in 1662), "The Rivals" (played in 1664), etc. He produced alterations of "The Tempest" (with Dryden, 1667) and of "Macbeth" (printed 1674) and "Julius Cæsar."

David (dā'vid). [Heb., 'beloved one.'] The second king of Israel, 1033-993 B. C. (Duncker): born at Bethlehem. Youngest (seventh) son of Jesse of the tribe of Judah. His pedigree is found in Ruth iv. His early youth was spent as shepherd of his father's flocks, where he had opportunity to develop his musical talent and to exercise his courage. After his disagreement with Saul, the prophet Samuel secretly anointed him king of Israel. He must then have been about eighteen years old. According to one account, he first came into contact with Saul when he was drawn to the court as a musician to drive away by his music the melancholy humor ("evil spirit") of the king, who then made him his armor-bearer; according to another (1 Sam. xvii.), Saul came to know him after he killed the giant Goliath and decided the battle between the Israelites and the Philistines. In 2 Sam. xxi. 19 it is stated that Goliath was killed by Elhanan; Jerome (Quæst. Hebr. ad loc.) makes Elhanan the same as David, similarly to Sayce who assumes that Elhanan was David's first name. Wellhausen, Stade, and others consider the whole account of this combat as legendary. His successes and the praises accorded to him by the people aroused the suspicion and the jealousy of Saul (whose daughter Michal he married), which subsequently turned into deadly hatred, so that he was often in jeopardy of his life. He first sought refuge with Samuel, then with the priests in Nob, which resulted in their massacre by Saul, and was finally driven to seek safety with the enemies of his people, the Philistines. There rallied around him "men who were in distress, in debt, and discontented." At the head of these freebooters or outlaws he undertook many expeditions and fought many skirmishes, which made him increasingly popular with the people. All this time he was pursued by Saul, whose mind became more and more darkened: twice the king came into his power, but because of his awe of the "anointed of the Lord" he did not avail himself of these opportunities (1 Sam. xxiv. 4 ff., xxvi. 7 ff.). He was compelled to become the vassal of the Philistine king Achish of Gath, who gave him for his support Ziklag on the frontier of Philistia. From here he undertook expeditions against the nomadic tribes of the border, while Achish believed that they were directed against Israel (1 Sam. xxvii.). The Philistines gathered a large army against Israel. In the battle of Gilboa (which see) Saul and his host lost their lives. To David, who was then about thirty years old, the crown now fell. For seven and a half years his reign was limited to Judah, with his seat at Hebron, while the other tribes were under the scepter of Ishbosheth, son of Saul, residing in Mahanaim, east of the Jordan. Ishbosheth, however, was murdered, and all the tribes recognized David as king: over the whole of Israel he reigned for thirty-three years. He removed his residence from Hebron to Jerusalem, which he took from the Jebusites, and there established himself in the "city of David," the oldest quarter of Jerusalem, on Mount Zion. Here also the temporary sanctuary was put up (2 Sam. vi.), which made the city the political and religious center of the nation, and gave to David's reign a genuine royal character. Through a series of successful wars against the Philistines, Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, Syrians, Amalekites, etc., and by the introduction of a regular administration and organization of court and army, he became the real founder of the monarchical government of Israel. The constitution of the tribes remained intact, but the military organization was a national one. Each tribe sent a contingent of men (over twenty years of age) to the national army, which stood under one commander-in-chief, Joab, David's nephew. The body-guard was formed, it seems, of foreigners, the Cherethites and Pelethites (supposed to be Philistines). The nucleus of the army consisted of the band of heroes (gibborim) who rallied about David while he was still an exile. The king presided over judicial cases, and was surrounded by a regular staff of military and administrative counselors and officers. David was also the actual founder of a sanctifying, divine worship, refining and enriching it by the influence of music and psalmody. The last period of his reign was much darkened by national misfortunes and domestic rebellions—the rebellion of his son Absalom, the uprising of Sheba ben Bishri, a drought and famine lasting three years, and a pestilence induced by the counting of the people. Even in his last days, when he was prostrated with the infirmities of age, his son Adonijah attempted to secure the succession to which David had appointed Solomon. This rebellion, however, like all the others, was successfully repressed, and David died peacefully at the age of seventy. He became the ideal king of Israel, the pattern and standard by which all succeeding rulers were measured, the prototype of the last perfect ruler, the Messiah, who is sometimes simply called David. As regards the Psalms, modern criticism denies him the authorship of many psalms bearing in the biblical Book of Psalms the superscription "of David." But there is no reason for entirely disconnecting David from this kind of Hebrew poetry. The probability is that not only did the psalm-poetry develop and flourish under his favor, but also that he himself composed many hymns.

David, or Dewi, Saint. Died in 601. The patron saint of Wales. He was bishop of Menevia (afterward called St. David's), where he founded a monastery. According to an account which has no historical foundation, he was appointed metropolitan archbishop of Wales at a synod held at Breff. He is commemorated as a saint on the 1st of March.

David Copperfield (dä'v' vid kop' ér-föld). A novel by Charles Dickens. It came out in twenty monthly parts, the first of which appeared in May, 1849. It was Dickens's favorite work: in it he portrayed in many important scenes his own history. The character from whom the book takes its name is a timid boy reduced to stupidity and finally to desperation by a cruel stepfather, Mr. Murdstone, by whom also his mother, a weak, affectionate woman, is crushed. He is sent at ten years of age to a warehouse in London, and employed in rough work at a trifling salary. Unable to bear this life, he runs away to his father's aunt, Miss Betsey Trotwood, an eccentric but kind-hearted woman, who adopts him. He becomes an author, and marries a childish, affectionate little woman, Dora Spenlow, whom he calls his "child wife." After her death he marries Agnes Wickfield.

He was educated at Cambridge, and from 1598 collaborated with Houghton, Chettle, Dekker, and others in numerous plays, all of which remained unprinted except "The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green." His chief work is "The Parliament of Bees" (1607).

Day, Mr. In Sir R. Howard's play "The Committee," the chairman of the committee, a kind of Tartuffe, under the thumb of his wife.

Day, or Daye, Stephen. Born at London about 1610; died at Cambridge, Mass., Dec. 22, 1668.

A pioneer of printing in New England. He was one of three pressmen engaged in 1638 by the Rev. Joseph Glover to operate a printing press which he was about to introduce into the colony of Massachusetts. Glover died on the voyage. The press was set up in the house of Rev. Henry Dunster, first president of Harvard College. The first book printed in the British-American colonies was issued from it in 1640: "The Whole Booke of Psalmes, faithfully translated into English metre." See Bay Psalm Book.

Day, Thomas. Born at London, June 22, 1748; died Sept. 28, 1789. An English author. He was educated at Oxford and the Middle Temple, and in 1775 was admitted to the bar. Having inherited a competent fortune, he did not seek practice, but devoted himself to literature and to the study of philosophy. He married Miss Esther Milnes in 1778, and in 1781 settled on a farm at Anningsley, Surrey, where he wrote his chief work, "History of Sandford and Merton" (1783-89).

Dead Heart, The. A play by Watts Phillips, produced in 1859. It was revised by Walter Herries Pollock for Henry Irving in 1889.

Dead Sea (ded sē). [LL. Mare Mortuum, Ar. Bahr-Lūt, F. Mer Morte, G. Toddes-Meer.] A salt lake in Palestine, situated 16 miles southeast of Jerusalem in the ancient "Vale of Siddim": the Laeus Asphaltites of the ancients, and the Sea of the Plain or of the Arabah, Salt Sea, or East Sea of the Scriptures. Its waters are intensely salt, and of great specific gravity. Its principal tributary is the Jordan, but it has no outlet, and its surface is 1,312 feet below the level of the Mediterranean. Length, 46 miles. Width, 6 to 9 miles. Depth varies from 1,800 feet to 3 or 4 feet in the shallowest section.

Dead Souls. A novel by Gogol, which appeared in 1841. He began to write it in 1837, and left it unfinished, destroying the concluding portions in a fit of religious mania. A certain Dr. Zaliatchenko, of Kieff, published in 1857 a continuation of it. An English translation, entitled "Tchitchikoff's Journeys, or Dead Souls," by Isabel F. Haggood, was published in New York in 1860.

At the time of serfdom a Russian proprietor's fortune was not valued according to the extent of his lands, but according to the number of male serfs which were held upon them. These serfs were called "souls." . . . The proprietor paid the capitation tax for all the souls on his domain; but as the census was rarely taken it happened that he had long to pay for dead serfs, until a new official revision struck them out from among the number of the living. It is easy to see what these dead souls must have cost a proprietor whose lands had been visited by famine, . . . and his interest in getting rid of them will be explainable. What seems more surprising is that there were people ready to purchase them.

Tchitchikoff, the hero of the book, an ambitious and evil-minded rascal, made this proposition to himself: "I will visit the most remote corners of Russia, and ask the good people to deduct from the number on their lists every serf who has died since the last census was taken. They will be only too glad, as it will be to their interest to yield up to me a fictitious property, and get rid of paying the tax upon it. I shall have my purchase registered in due form, and no tribunal will imagine that I require it to legalize a sale of dead men. When I have obtained the names of some thousands of serfs, I shall carry my deeds to some bank in St. Petersburg or Moscow, and raise a large sum on them. Then I shall be a rich man, and in condition to buy real peasants in flesh and blood."

De Vogüé, Russian Novelists (trans.), p. 75.

Deadwood (ded'wūd). A city, and the county-seat of Lawrence County, South Dakota, situated in the Black Hills in lat. 44° 21' N., long. 103° 43' W. It is an important trading center and mining town, gold and silver having been discovered in the vicinity in 1874. Population (1890), 2,366.

Dea Matres (dē'ē mā'trēz). [L., lit. 'goddesses mothers.'] See the extract.

We now come to a class of divinities which have a peculiar interest in connection with the early history of our island, the deities of the auxiliary races who formed so important an element of its population. Among these we must place, first, a class of deities commonly known by the title of the deæ matres. Altars and inscriptions to these deities are very numerous in Belgic Gaul and Germany, and more especially along the banks of the Rhine, where they are often called matronæ instead of matres, and they seem to have belonged to the Teutonic race. Not more than one altar to these deities has, I believe, been found in Italy, and we do not trace them in the classic writers. When the deæ matres are figured on the altars or other monuments, they are always represented as three females, seated, with baskets or bowls of fruit on their knees, which were probably emblematical of the plenty which they were believed to distribute to mankind.

Wright, Celt, p. 281.

Deák (dā'āk), Ferencz. Born at Söjtör, Zala, Hungary, Oct. 17, 1803; died at Budapest, Jan. 29, 1876. A Hungarian statesman. He entered the Reichstag in 1832; was minister of justice in 1848; and was the chief instrument in the construction of the Austro-Hungarian monarchy on the dualistic basis in 1867.

Deal (dēl). A seaport and sea-bathing resort in Kent, England, situated on the Downs 8 miles northeast of Dover. It was formerly one of the Cinque Ports, and contains Deal Castle. Near here Julius Cæsar is supposed to have made his first landing in 55 B. C. Population (1891), 8,893.

De Amicis (de ä-mē'chēs), Edmondo. Born at Oneglia, Italy, Oct. 21, 1846. An Italian writer of travels. He entered the Italian army in 1865, and fought at the battle of Custoza in 1866. After the capture of Rome in 1870 by the troops of Victor Emmanuel, he retired from the army in order to devote himself to literature. His works include "Ricordi di Londra" (1874), "L'Olanda" (1874), "Marocco" (1875), "Constantinople" (1877), "Pagine sparse" (1877), "Ricordi di Parigi," etc.

De Bry, Théodore. See Bry.

Decameron (de-kam'e-ron). [It. Il Decamerone; from Gr. déka, ten, and héméra, day.] A famous collection of 100 tales, by Boccaccio, published in 1353. Of these tales ten are represented as told each day for ten days, near Florence, during the plague of 1348. They were written from 1344 to 1350, and are preceded by a masterly description of the plague at Florence. They range from the pathetic to the grossly licentious. "There are few works which have had an equal influence on literature with the Decameron of Boccaccio. Even in England its effects were powerful. From it Chaucer adopted the notion of the frame in which he has inclosed his tales, and the general manner of his stories, while in some instances, as we have seen, he has merely versified the novels of the Italian. In 1566, William Prynne printed many of Boccaccio's stories in English, in his work called the 'Palace of Pleasure.' This first translation contained sixty novels, and it was soon followed by another volume, comprehending thirty-four additional tales. These are the pages of which Spenser made so much use. From Burton's 'Anatomy of Melancholy' we learn that one of the great amusements of our ancestors was reading Boccaccio aloud, an entertainment of which the effects were speedily visible in the literature of the country." Duntop, Hist. Prose Fiction, II, 148.

The seven imaginary ladies and three gentlemen whom Boccaccio supposed to shut out the horrors of the great plague of Florence, in 1348, by enjoying themselves in a garden with a ten-day feast of story-telling, presented—in the best and easiest, though nearly the first, Italian prose—among their hundred tales the choice tales of the day from the French fabliaux, from incidents of actual life, or from whatever source was open to the author. Even the machinery in which the tales are set came from the East, and had existed in a Latin form two centuries before. The number of the stories also was perhaps determined by the previous existence of the "Cento Novelle Antiche." Morley, English Writers, I, 22.

Decamps (de-kon'). Alexandre Gabriel. Born at Paris, March 3, 1803; died (as the result of an accident) at Fontainebleau, Aug. 22, 1860. A noted French painter, a pupil of Abel de Pujol. He visited Greece and the coast of Asia in 1827, and all his later work exhibits his preference for Oriental subjects.

Declaration of Independence. The public act by which the Continental Congress on July 4, 1776, declared the American colonies to be free and independent of Great Britain. A resolution of independence was offered by R. H. Lee, June 7, 1776. The committee appointed to draft the declaration consisted of Jefferson, Franklin, John Adams, Roger Sherman, and R. R. Livingston, and the document was written for the most part by Jefferson. It was signed by 56 members.

Declaration of Independence, Mecklenburg. See Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence.

Declaration of Right. An affirmation of the ancient constitutional rights of the English nation, prepared by the convention of the Commons, assented to by the Lords, and by William and Mary (who thereupon were declared king and queen, Feb. 13), in Feb., 1689. It was confirmed by Parliament as the Bill of Rights in Dec., 1689.

Décle (däkl), Lionel. A French traveler and ethnological collector. Accompanied by Ph. de Laing, he started in July, 1891, from Mafeking, Bechuanaland, and visited Palapye, Shesheke, failed to enter the Barotse country, returned to Matebele and Mashona Land, where he explored the subterranean lakes of Sinoya, and again reached the Zambezi on his way to Nyassa, 1892. Thence he proceeded up the Shire to Lakes Nyassa and Tanganyika (1893), intending to come out by Zanzibar.

Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. A celebrated history by Edward Gibbon, published 1776-88.

De consolatione philosophiæ (dē kon-sō-lā-shi-ō'nē fil-ō-sō'fi-ē). [L., 'on the consolation of philosophy.'] A celebrated Latin work in prose and verse, written by Boethius about 525 A. D. It was translated into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great. Chancer translated it into English prose before 1382. Caxton published it in 1480. See Boethius.

Boethius was not put to death at once, but was kept nearly a year in prison. After his condemnation he wrote that famous book, "The Consolation of Philosophy," which is the only one of all his works that still finds readers. It is not exactly a literary masterpiece, but as a book written from the heart, as the record of the meditations by which a brave and high-minded man consoled himself when, fallen suddenly from the height of wealth and power to the lowest abyss of misery, he was looking forward to an ignominious death, it has a deep interest, and will always be counted among the world's classics. It has been translated into every language in Europe; and amongst the English translators have been King Alfred, Chaucer, and, we are told, Queen Elizabeth.

Decumates Agri (dek-ū-mā'tēz ag'rī). [L., from decuma, tithe: title lands.] The name given by the Romans to the lands east of the Rhine and north of the Danube. About the beginning of the 2d century A. D. they were incorporated in the Roman Empire as a part of Rhetia.

We have seen that the history of Rome in her western provinces was, from an early stage of the Empire, a struggle with the Teutonic nations on the Rhine and the Danube. We have seen that all attempts at serious conquest beyond those boundaries came to nothing. The Roman possessions beyond the two great rivers were mere outposts for the better security of the land within the rivers. The district beyond them, fenced in by a wall and known as the Agri Decumates, was hardly more than such an outlying post on a great scale.

Dedan (dē'dan). [Heb., perhaps 'beloved,' 'darling.'] 1. A son of Raamah, son of Cush, son of Ham (Gen. x. 7), and his descendants.—2. A son of Jokshan, grandson of Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 3). In the prophets the Dedanites are referred to as being settled now in Edom (Idumea), now on the Persian Gulf. Some scholars (Gesenius, Winer) infer that the Cushite Dedanites and those from Keturah were in some way amalgamated by intermarriage, and formed a widely spread trading tribe. There are still ruins of a city in the northern Hedjaz (see Arabia) bearing the name of Dedan.

Dedham (dē'dam). The capital of Norfolk County, Massachusetts, situated 10 miles southwest of Boston. Population (1890), 7,123.

Dedlock (dēd'lok), Lady. The wife of Sir Leicester Dedlock in Dickens's novel "Bleak House": a haughty woman of fashion, secretly consumed with terror, shame, and remorse. She has an illegitimate child, Esther Summerson, but marries Sir Leicester, who is ignorant of her history. Her secret becomes known to Mr. Tulkinghorn, her husband's legal adviser, who tells her of his design to reveal it to him. She leaves home and dies from exposure and remorse at the gate of the graveyard where Captain Hawdon, the father of her child, is buried.

Dedlock, Sir Leicester. An extremely eccentric and stately old baronet in Dickens's novel "Bleak House." He is perfectly honorable, but prejudiced to the most unreasonable degree, with a genuine affection and admiration for Lady Dedlock.

Dee (dē). [L. Deva (which see).] 1. A river in North Wales and Cheshire, flowing past Chester into the Irish Sea northwest of Chester. Length, 90 miles.

Dēvia:—Skr. devī, "a goddess." Lith. déve, "a goddess;" Welsh, doin or duiu (now dwyf and mostly dwy), as in Duhr-Duin, Dyfrdwyf or Dyfrdwy, "the river Dee," literally "the Water of the Goddess;" Irish, dé, "a goddess," gen. dée, déi, dé, déa, dae, acc. dé.

2. A river in Kincardineshire and Aberdeenshire, Scotland, flowing into the North Sea at Aberdeen. Length, 87 miles.—3. A river in Kirkeudbrightshire, Scotland, which flows into the Solway Firth at Kirkeudbright Bay. Length, 48 miles.

Dee, John. Born at London, July 13, 1527; died in Dec., 1608. An English mathematician and astrologer. He took the degree of B. A. at Cambridge in 1545; was appointed one of the foundation fellows of Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1546; lectured on the Elements of Euclid at Paris about 1550; returned to England in 1551; was prosecuted on the charge of magic about 1555; gave exhibitions of magic at the courts of various princes in Poland and Bohemia 1583-88; and was appointed warden of Manchester College in 1595. He was patronized by Queen Elizabeth, who received instruction from him in astrology in 1564. According to the "Athens Cantabrigienses" he wrote 79 works, most of which have never been printed. His most notable work is "Monas Hieroglyphica" (1564).

Deeg, or Dīg (dēg). A fortified place in British India, in lat. 27° 25' N., long. 77° 15' E. It was captured by the British in 1804. It contains a palace built by Śūraj Mull toward the middle of the 18th century. The portion completed is about 700 feet square, and is traversed by a garden with beautiful architectural adornment. The north pavilion contains a fine audience hall, 77 by 54 feet, divided by a central range of arches. An adjoining side of the court is occupied by a great hall 108 by 87 feet, open on two sides and including four ranges of columns with arcades edged with sharply cut eusps. The cornices are particularly noteworthy: they are wide-spreading, often double, and supported by very richly sculptured brackets.

Deems (dēmz), Charles Force. Born at Baltimore, Md., Dec. 4, 1820; died at New York city, Nov. 18, 1893. An American clergyman and writer, pastor of the Church of the Strangers in New York city. He founded the American Institute of Christian Philosophy in 1881.

Deep River (dēp riv'ēr). A river of North Carolina which unites with the Haw to form the Cape Fear River 26 miles southwest of Raleigh. Length, over 100 miles.

Deer (dēr), Old. A village in Aberdeenshire, Scotland, about 30 miles north of Aberdeen. It is noted for an ancient manuscript ("Book of Deer") containing St. John's gospel and parts of the other three, belonging formerly to the old abbey, and now in the Cambridge University library.

Deerfield (dēr'feld). A town in Franklin County, Massachusetts, situated at the junction of the Deerfield River with the Connecticut, 32 miles north of Springfield. It was sacked and burned by French and Indians in 1704; and South Deerfield was the scene of the "Bloody Brook massacre" in 1675. Population (1890), 2,910.

Deerfield River. A small western tributary of the Connecticut in Massachusetts.

Deerslayer (dēr'slā'ēr), The. A novel by Cooper, published in 1841. (See Leatherstocking.) It is the first of the "Leatherstocking Tales," though published last.

Dées, or Dés (dā'ash or dash). The capital of the county of Szolnok-Doboka, in Transylvania, Hungary, situated on the Szamos 32 miles northeast of Klausenburg. Population (1890), 7,728.

Defarge (de-färzh'), Thérèse. In Dickens's "Tale of Two Cities," the wife of Ernest Defarge, the keeper of a wine-shop: a type of the remorseless women of the St. Antoine quarter during the French Revolution.

Defence of Poesie, The. The title given to Sir Philip Sidney's "Apologie for Poetrie" when printed for the second time in the third edition of the "Arcadia" in 1598.

Defence of Poetry. A volume in verse by Isaac D'Israeli, published in 1790: his first work.

Defender of the Faith. [L. Fidei Defensor.] A title conferred in 1521 by Pope Leo X. upon Henry VIII. of England, in recognition of the latter's treatise "Assertio septem sacramentorum" (1521), retained by succeeding English sovereigns.

Defand, or Defant (def-fōn'), Marquise du (Marie de Vichy-Chamrond). Born at the Château de Chamrond, France, in 1697; died at Paris, Sept. 24, 1780. A witty and cynical Frenchwoman, a leader in Parisian literary and philosophical circles. She was married to the Marquis du Defand in 1718, but soon separated from him and lived somewhat notoriously. In 1753 she became blind. She is noted for her correspondence with Voltaire, Hénault, Montesquien, Horace Walpole, and other great men of her time.

Defiance (dē-fi'ans). A town and the county-seat of Defiance County, northwestern Ohio, situated on the Maumee 50 miles southwest of Toledo. Population (1890), 7,694.

De finibus (bonorum et malorum) (dē fin'i-bus). [L., 'of the boundaries (of good and evil).'] A treatise in five books by Cicero, in the form of a dialogue, consisting in a presentation of the doctrines of the Greek schools concerning good and evil. It was written 45 B. C.

De Flores (de flō'rēs). In Middleton's play "The Changeling," an ill-favored, broken gentleman in the service of Vermandero, the father of Beatrice-Joanna. He loves Beatrice, who loathes him. Trusting in his devotion and poverty, she induces him to murder Alonso de Pivaco, to whom her father has betrothed her though she loves Alsemero. In a powerful scene he declares to her that she shall never marry Alsemero unless she first yields to him. He never relents, and after killing Beatrice dies triumphant, by his own hand, when the double discovery of the liaison and murder is made. "He is a study worthy to be classed with Iago, and inferior only to Iago in their class." Saintsbury.

Defoe (sometimes written De Foe) (de-fō'), Daniel. Born at London, probably in 1661; died at London, April 26, 1731. A celebrated English novelist and political writer. His father, whose name originally was Foe, was a butcher in St. Giles, Cripplegate. Daniel changed it to De Foe, or Defoe, about 1703. Little is known of his early life. He abandoned the idea of being a dissenting minister, went into business in 1685, and in 1688 was with King William's army. He traveled a good deal on the Continent. In 1692 he became bankrupt, but afterward paid his debts. He then secured a position as secretary to a pantle factory, and was accountant to the commissioners on glass duties. From 1698 he distinguished himself as a pamphleteer in favor of William III.'s policy. His ironical treatise "The Shortest Way with the Dissenters" in 1703 occasioned his arrest, and he was sentenced to be fined, to stand three times in the pillory, and to be "imprisoned during the Queen's pleasure." During this imprisonment he wrote constantly, and began his "Review," a newspaper issued at first once, afterward twice, and ultimately thrice, a week. It was published from Feb. 19, 1704, to June 11, 1713. During this time he also wrote about eighty other works. In 1704 he was released and went to St. Edmund's Bury and then back to London, where he took a prominent part in political intrigue. Finding himself generally objected to as a time-server and turncoat, he made an apology, "An Appeal to Honour and Justice" (1715), which did not remove the impression. From this time until his death he wrote industriously, "Robinson Crusoe" appearing in 1719. Among his other novels are "Life and Adventures of Duncan Campbell" (1720), "Captain Singleton" (1720), "The Fortunes and Misfortunes of Moll Flanders" (1722), "Journal of the Plague Year" (2d ed., entitled "History of the Plague," 1722), "History of Colonel Jack" (1722), "Roxana" (1724), etc. Among his political writings are "The True-Born Englishman" (1701), "The Shortest Way with the Dissenters" (1703), "Political History of the Devil" (1726), etc. See his Life by Minto (1879), in "English Men of Letters" series.

De Forest (de for'est), John William. Born at Seymour, Conn., March 31, 1826. An American novelist, miscellaneous writer, and soldier.

He served through the Civil War from 1861 to 1865, in the Southwest, and with Sheridan in the Shenandoah Valley. He received the brevet rank of major. From 1865 to 1868 he was adjutant-general of the veteran reserve corps. Among his works are "History of the Indiana of Connecticut," etc. (1853), "Oriental Acquaintance" (1856), "Seacliff" (1859), "Miss Ravenel's Conversion" (1867), "The Oddest of Courtships," etc. (1881), and many military sketches, essays, etc.

Dehra Dun (deb'-rā dön). A district in the Mirat division of the Northwest Provinces, British India, situated about lat. 30°-31° N., long. 78° E. Area, 1,193 square miles. Population (1881), 144,070.

De imitatione Christi (dō im-i-tā-shi-ō-nē kris-ti). A religious treatise commonly ascribed to Thomas a Kempis, but about which there has been much controversy; it places the rule of life in seclusion and renunciation. Other candidates have been put forward, among them John Gerson, the famous chancellor of the University of Paris, and an unidentified John Gersen, abbot of Vercelli (supported by the Benedictines), whose name appears as that of the author in one manuscript. For Gerson are brought forward a number of early MSS. and editions in France and Italy. "In favour of Thomas a Kempis has been alleged the testimony of many early editions bearing his name, including one about 1471 which appears to be the first, as well as a general tradition from his own times, extending over most of Europe, which has led a great majority (including the Sorbonne itself) to determine the cause in his favour. It is also said that a manuscript of the treatise De Imitatione bears these words at the conclusion: 'Finitus et completus per manum Thome de Kempis, 1441'; and that in this manuscript are so many erasures and alterations as to give it the appearance of his original autograph. Against Thomas a Kempis it is urged that he was a professional calligrapher or copyist for the College of Deventer; that the Chronicle of St. Agnes, a contemporary work, says of him: Scriptis Bibliam nostram totaliter, et multos alios libros pro domo et pro pretio; that the entry above mentioned is more like that of a transcriber than of an author; that the same chronicle makes no mention of his having written the treatise De Imitatione, nor does it appear in an early list of works ascribed to him." Hallam, Introduct. to Lit. of Europe, II. ii. § 63.

Deimos (dē-mōs). [Gr. δειμός, fear, terror; personified in the Iliad, and later regarded as a son of Ares (Mars).] A satellite of Mars, revolving about its primary in thirty hours and eighteen minutes. It was discovered by Professor Asaph Hall, of Washington, in Aug., 1877.

Deiotarus (dē-ī-ōt'-a-rus). [Gr. Δηϊόταρος.] Died about 40 B. C. A tetrarch and king of Galatia, and an ally of the Romans. He was defended before Cæsar by Cicero 45 B. C.

Deiphobus (dē-īf'-ō-bus). [Gr. Δηϊφῶβος.] In classical legends, a Trojan warrior, son of Priam and Hecuba. He appears in Shakspeare's "Troilus and Cressida."

Deipnosophists (dēp-nōs'-ō-fists). [From Gr. δειπνσοφισταί, Deipnosophistæ, the name of a work of Athenæus (see the def.); lit. 'the learned men at dinner,' from δειπνῶν, dinner, and σοφιστής, a learned man.] See the extract.

The Deipnosophists, or "learned guests," of Athenæus is a polyhistorical work chiefly made up of extracts from books in the library of Alexandria, and put into the form of a dialogue, or series of dialogues, supposed to have been carried on in the house of a learned and opulent Roman named Larentius or Laurentius, during an entertainment prolonged through many days. The guests are twenty-nine in number, and not only draw upon their memory for quotations suggested by incidents of the feast, but are expected by their entertainer to come furnished with excerpts from the best authors, which are produced and read when the occasion offers. This machinery enables Athenæus to give a sort of framework and external coherency to the carefully arranged contents of his note book; but, as in the well-known English books called "the Doctor" and "the Pursuits of Literature," the ventilation of the author's learning is the main object of the book. The work begins, like several of Plato's dialogues, with a conversation between Athenæus and a friend of his, one Timocrates, to whom he narrates "the discourses of the learned men," with all their quotations and extracts; and he sometimes interrupts the supposed dialogue, in order to address himself directly to Timocrates. Among the supposed guests are some of the most eminent men of the day, especially Masurius Sabinus, a descendant of the great jurist of the Augustan age, and himself one of the leading lawyers in the reign of Alexander Severus; Ulpian, whose death is supposed to take place soon after the entertainment; and Galen of Pergamum, "who has published so many writings on philosophy and medicine as to surpass all his predecessors, and who is equal in style to any of the ancients." These "learned guests" pour forth an unbroken stream of quotations extending through fifteen books, and touching on every subject which could be suggested by a banquet, and many others which are brought in by the head and shoulders, so that the work is a complete treasury of information on Greek literature, especially poetry, natural history, medicine, public and social usages, philology and grammar. The authors quoted by Athenæus are about 800, of whom about 700 would have been unknown but for him; and he sometimes gives us as many as 50 quotations from one author. The titles of books which he mentions are about 2,500, and he tells us himself that he had made extracts from more than 800 comedies belonging to the period of the middle comedy only. The extent to which this one book has contributed to repair the ravages of time, and especially to save choice fragments from the wreck of the great Alexandrian Museum, in which Athenæus pursued his studies, is shown by the text to which Schweighæuser appeals, namely, that if we look into any collection of the fragments of Greek poets, we shall see how large a proportion is due to the Deipnosophists.

Dejanira (dej-ā-nī-rā), or Deianeira (dē-ya-nī-rā). [Gr. Δηϊανειρα.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cæus and Althæa, sister of Meleager and wife of Hercules. She inadvertently caused his death by giving him the blood-steeped shirt of Nessus to wear—the latter having told her that she could compel the love of any one wearing it. It burned him to death, and she killed herself for sorrow.

Déjazet (dā-zhā-zā'), Pauline Virginie. Born at Paris, Aug. 30, 1798; died at Paris, Dec. 1, 1875. A celebrated French actress. She went on the stage almost from her cradle. She appeared for the last time Oct. 2, 1875.

Dejean (de-zhōn'), Pierre François Aimé Auguste, Comte. Born at Amiens, France, Aug. 10, 1780; died at Paris, March 18, 1845. A French soldier and entomologist. He served with distinction at Ligoy and Waterloo, and was appointed general in 1810, aide-de-camp of Napoleon in 1813, and general of division in 1814. He was the author of a catalogue of his collection of insects (1821-33), "Histoire générale des coléoptères" (1825-35), etc.

De Kalb (de kalb), Baron Johann (properly Johann Kalb). Born at Huttendorf, near Bayreuth, Bavaria, June 29, 1721; died near Camden, S. C., Aug. 19, 1780. A general in the American Revolution. He entered the French service in 1743, and the American service in 1777, and was mortally wounded at Camden Aug. 16, 1780. He was a peasant by birth.

Dekker (dek-ēr), Eduard Douwes; pseudonym Multatuli. Born at Amsterdam, March 2, 1820; died at Nieder-Ingelheim, Feb. 19, 1887. A Dutch writer. His works include "Max Havelaar" (1860), and other works on the Dutch Indies.

Dekker, or Decker (dek-ēr), Jeremias de. Born at Dort, Netherlands, about 1610; died at Amsterdam, 1666. A Dutch poet, author of a satire, "Lof der Geldzucht" ("Praise of Avarice"). His collected works were published in 1726.

Dekker, or Decker, Thomas. Born at London about 1570 (?); died at London (?) after 1637. An English dramatist, collaborator of Middleton, Webster, Massinger, Rowley, etc. Little is known of his life. He is first noticed in Heustlow's Diary in 1593; in Feb. of that year he was imprisoned in the Counter. Between 1598 and 1602 he wrote eight plays alone and many others in collaboration. In 1602 he published "Satiromastix, or the Uttrussing of the Humorous Poet," a satirical attack on Ben Jonson, with whom a quarrel had broken out before 1600, when Jonson reflected upon him in "Every Man out of his Humour" and "Cynthia's Revels." In 1601 Jonson attacked Dekker and Marston vigorously in "The Poetaster." "Satiromastix" was Dekker's retort. From 1613 to 1616 he seems to have been imprisoned in the King's Bench prison. He wrote many pamphlets ridiculing the follies of the times, and in the plays written with others he excelled in good shop scenes and those laid in inns, taverns, and suburban pleasure-houses. He also had a poetical and luxuriant fancy. He wrote alone "The Gentle Craft" (produced in 1599; published anonymously in 1600 as "The Shoemaker's Holiday, or the Gentle Craft"), "Bear a Brain" (1599), "Old Fortunatus" (1600), etc.; and, with Chettle, "Troilus and Cressida," "Agamemnon," and "The Stepmother's Tragedy" (1599); with Chettle and Haughton, "Patient Grissel" (1599); with Day and Haughton, "The Spanish Moor's Tragedy" (1600). With Webster and others he joined in 1602 in a play in two parts on Lady Jane Grey, which probably appeared as "The Famous History of Sir Thomas Wylt" in 1607. The first part of "The Honest Whore," etc., he wrote with Middleton in 1604. The earliest edition known of the second part is dated 1630, and there is nothing to shew that Middleton was concerned in it. "The Seven Deadly Sins of London" he published in 1606, and "News from Hell" in the same year. He also wrote "Westward Ho!" before 1605, and "Northward Ho!" "The Bellman of London" (1608), "Lanthorne and Candlelight" (the second part of "The Bellman" 1608), "The Gull's Hornbook" (1609), "The Roaring Girl," with Middleton (1611), "If it be not Good the Devil is in it" (1612), "The Virgin Martyr," with Massinger (1622), "Match Me in London" (published 1631), "The Sun's Darling," with Ford, was published in 1656 (the lyrical portions are thought to be Dekker's); "The Witch of Edmonton," with Ford and Rowley, probably written in 1621, published in 1658; and in 1637 Dekker republished "Lanthorne and Candlelight" as "English Villainies"; this was the last of his numerous works, the most important of which have been mentioned, and it is thought that he died shortly after its publication. *Diet. Delany (dē-lā'ni), Mrs. (Mary Granville). Born May 14, 1700, at Coulston, Wilts; died at Windsor, April 15, 1788. An English woman of literary tastes. She first married Alexander Pendarves, and afterward became the wife of Patrick Delany. She was the friend of the Duchess of Portland, and was called his "dearest Mrs. Delany" by George III. He gave her a house in Windsor, and a pension of £300 a year. She presented to the queen some of the "paper mosaic" for which she was famous, and became a great favorite with the royal family. She left six volumes of autobiography and letters, which contain much interesting gossip of the society of the time.

Delany, Patrick. Born in Ireland about 1683; died at Bath, May 6, 1768. A popular preacher, afterward dean of Down, in Ireland. He is noted as having been the intimate friend of Swift. In 1757 he began to publish a paper called the "Humanist," advocating the prevention of cruelty to animals. He wrote a number of volumes of sermons, "Reflections on Polygamy," etc. (1738), "The Life and Reign of David, King of Israel" (1740-42), "A Humble Apology for Christian Orthodoxy" (1761), etc.

De la Ramée (dè lä rä-mā'), Louise; pseudonym Ouida. Born at Bury St. Edmunds, England, in 1840. An English novelist, of French extraction. Her works include "Strathmore" (1865), "Chandos" (1866), "Idalia" (1867), "Tricotrin" (1868), "Fascarel" (1873), "Ariadne" (1880), "Moths" (1880), "Princess Napraxine" (1884), etc.

De la Rive. See La Rive.

Delaroche (de-lä-rosh'), Paul (Hippolyte). Born at Paris, July 17, 1797; died there, Nov. 4, 1856. A French historical and portrait painter. He began by studying landscape under Watelet, which he gave up for history after entering the studio of Baron Gros. He first attracted attention by his picture of "Joash saved from Death by Jehoshabath" (1822). He received the gold medal in 1824, became knight of the Legion of Honor in 1828, officer in 1834, member of the Institute in 1832, and professor at the Academy in 1833. The following year he went to Italy, and on his return painted the famous hemicycle of the Ecole des Beaux Arts. At the time of his second visit in July, 1844, he was made a member of the Academy of St. Luke.

Delarue (de-lä-rü'), Gervais, Abbé. Born at Caen, France, 1751; died 1835. A French historian and antiquarian, professor in the University of Caen. He wrote "Essais historiques sur les bardes, les jongleurs et les trouvères normands et anglo-normands" (1834), etc.

De la Rue, Warren. Born in Guernsey, Channel Islands, Jan. 18, 1815; died at London, April 22, 1889. An English astronomer and physicist, best known for the application of photography to astronomy. He was the collaborator of Balfour Stewart and Loewy in "Researches on Solar Physics."

Delaunay (de-lö-nä'), Charles Eugène. Born at Lusigny, Aube, France, April 9, 1816; drowned near Cherbourg, France, Aug. 5, 1872. A French astronomer, author of "Théorie de la lune" (1860-67), etc.

De launay, Le Vicomte. See Girardin, Delphine de.

De Launay, Mademoiselle. See Staal, Baronne de.

Delavigne (de-lä-vèny'), Jean François Casimir. Born at Havre, France, April 4, 1793; died at Lyons, France, Dec. 11, 1843. A French dramatist and poet. He began his studies in his native city, and completed them in Paris. As early as 1811 he attracted the attention of Napoleon Bonaparte by his "Dithyrambe sur la naissance du roi de Rome." He competed twice, but without success, for prizes of the French Academy; his subjects were in 1813 "Charles XII. à Narva," and in 1815 "Découverte de la vaccine." The events connected with Napoleon's downfall led Delavigne to write three elegies, "Les Messéniennes." Two of these, viz. "Waterloo" and "La dévastation du musée," were subsequently published with an article "Sur le besoin de s'unir après le départ des étrangers," and in this form they widely attracted attention and favor. "La vie et la mort de Jeanne d'Arc," "Tyrte," "Le voyageur," "A Napoléon," and "Lord Byron," were well received in 1824. The following year was spent in Italy, where Delavigne wrote the "Nouvelles Messéniennes." After the stormy days of the revolution of July, 1830, he composed "La Parisienne," set to music by Auber; also the "Dies irae de Kosciusko" and "La Varsoviennne." In 1843, in collaboration with his brother Germain, Casimir Delavigne wrote the libretto to Halévy's opera "Charles VI." His contributions to the stage include the "Vépres siciliennes" (1819), "Les comédiens" (1820), "Le paria" (1821), "L'Ecole des vicillards" (1823), "La princesse Aurélie" (1828), "Marino Faliero" (1829), "Louis XI." (1832), "Les enfants d'Edouard" (1833), "Don Juan d'Atriché" (1835), "Une famille au temps de Luther" (1836), "La popularité" (1838), "La fille du Cid" (1839), and "Le conseiller rapporteur" (1840). He was elected to the French Academy Feb. 24, 1825. His works were edited in full by his brother in 1845, 1855, and 1863. A separate reprint of his poems and plays was also made in 1863.

Delaware (del'a-wär). [Pl., also Delawares.] A division of the North American Indians, classed as a tribe, but in many respects a confederacy. They formerly occupied the valley of the Delaware River in Pennsylvania, and the greater part of New Jersey and Delaware. The name was given by the English from the river where they were found, their council-fire being near the site of Philadelphia. They call themselves Lenape-Lenape ('original men' or 'preeminent men'). The French called them Loups ('wolves'), from their chief totemic division. In 1726 they refused to join the Iroquois in a war upon the English, and were stigmatized by the Iroquois as "women." In 1742 and later they were pressed successively to the Susquehanna and Ohio rivers, afterward to Missouri and Arkansas. Most of them are now in the Indian Territory, connected with the Cherokees. Their number is about 1,700. See Algonquian.

Delaware (del'a-wär). 1. One of the Middle States, and, next to Rhode Island, the smallest State of the American Union, lying between Pennsylvania on the north, Delaware River and Bay (separating it from New Jersey) and the Atlantic Ocean on the east, and Maryland on the south and west. The surface is generally level, but hilly in the north. The leading productions are wheat, Indian corn, and fruit (especially peaches). The State is divided into three counties; the capital is Dover, and the chief place Wilmington. It sends one representative and two senators to Congress, and has 3 electoral votes. It was permanently settled by Swedes under Peter Minuit in 1638; passed under the rule of the Dutch in 1655, and of the English in 1664. In 1682 it became united with Pennsylvania; in 1703 it received a separate assembly, but had a governor in common with Pennsylvania until the Revolution. It is one of the thirteen original States, and was the first State to ratify the Federal Constitution, Dec. 7, 1787. It was a slave State, but sided with the Union in the war of 1861-65. Area, 2,050 square miles. Population (1890), 168,493.

2. A river of the United States which rises in Delaware County, New York, and separates Pennsylvania and Delaware on the west from New York and New Jersey on the east. It expands into Delaware Bay about 40 miles below Philadelphia. On its banks are Trenton, Easton, Philadelphia, Camden, Chester, and Wilmington. Its chief tributaries are the Lehigh and Schuylkill, on the west. Length, 350 miles; navigable for ocean steamships to Philadelphia; tidal as far as Trenton.

3. A city and the county-seat of Delaware County, Ohio, situated on the Whetstone (Olen-tangy) River 23 miles north of Columbus. It is the seat of Ohio Wesleyan University. Population (1890), 8,224.

Delaware, Lord. See Delawarr.

Delaware Bay. An arm of the Atlantic Ocean and estuary of the Delaware River, which separates Delaware from New Jersey. Its entrance to the Atlantic, between Capes May and Henlopen, is about 13 miles in width. Length, about 55 miles. Greatest width, about 25 miles.

Delaware Water Gap. A village and summer resort in Monroe County, Pennsylvania, 65 miles northwest of New York. Also, the name of the adjoining gorge, 2 or 3 miles in length, by which the Delaware River passes through the Kittatinny Mountain (between walls 1,400 feet in height).

Delawarr, or Delaware, Baron. See West.

Delbrück (del'brük), Martin Friedrich Rudolf. Born at Berlin, April 16, 1817. A Prussian statesman. He entered the ministry of commerce in 1848, and was president of the chancery of the North German Confederation 1867-70, and of the imperial chancery 1871-76.

Delectable Mountains, The. A range of mountains in Bunyan's "Pilgrim's Progress," from which a view of the Celestial City is to be had. They are "Emmanuel's Land," and the sheep that feed on them are those for whom he died. See Isa. xxxiii, 16, 17.

Delémont (de-lä-môn'), G. Delsberg (dels'berg). A small town in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, situated on the Serne 18 miles southwest of Basel.

Delescluz (de-lä-klüz'), Louis Charles. Born at Dreux, France, Oct. 20, 1809; killed at the barricades, Paris, May 28, 1871. A French journalist and political agitator, leader of the Commune of Paris March-May, 1871.

Delessert (de-le-sär'), Baron Benjamin. Born at Lyons, Feb. 14, 1773; died at Paris, March 1, 1847. A French naturalist and philanthropist. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies 1817-38, and contributed largely to the introduction of savings-banks in France. He was a collaborator of De Candolle in the publication of "Icones selecte plantarum" (1820-46).

Delfshaven (delfs-hä'ven), or Delftshaven (delfts-hä'ven). A seaport in the province of South Holland, Netherlands, situated on the Maas 2 miles southwest of Rotterdam, of which, since 1886, it has formed a part. Here, July 22, 1620, the Pilgrim Fathers embarked for Southampton.

Delft (delft). A town in the province of South Holland, Netherlands, situated on the Schie 5 miles southeast of The Hague. It was formerly celebrated for the manufacture of pottery and porcelain. It contains some interesting buildings, the old and new churches, Frinshof and Stadhuis. It was the birthplace of Grotius, and the place of assassination of William the silent in 1584. Population (1894), commune, 31,125.

Delhi (del'hi), or Dehli (dä'le). 1. A division in the Panjab, British India. Area, 5,610 square miles. Population, 1,907,984.—2. A district in the above division. Area, 1,276 square miles. Population, 643,515.—3. The capital of the division and district of Delhi, situated on the Jumna in lat. 28° 40' N., long. 77° 18' E. The city of Indraprastha (which see) is said (Mahabharata) to have been built near the site of Delhi in the 15th century B. C. Delhi was captured by Mohammed of Ghor in 1193 A. D., and a few years later became the capital of a Mohammedan monarchy. It was sacked by Timur in 1398, and captured by Baber in 1526. Delhi became the capital of the Mogul empire, and was rebuilt by Shah Jehan in 1638-58. It was sacked by Nadir Shah in 1739, and occupied by the British under Lake in 1803, although it continued to be the residence of the titular Grand Mogul down to 1857. It was captured by the Sepoy mutineers May 11, 1857, and was besieged in June by the British and retaken Sept. 20, 1857. Among the notable structures in Delhi are: (a) The tomb of Humayun Shah, completed by his successor Akbar in the second half of the 16th century. The plan is about square; the tomb-chamber is octagonal, with great encoined portals on four of its sides and smaller octagonal chambers on the four others. The central space is covered by a graceful dome. The decoration is much simpler than that of the later Mogul architecture, consisting chiefly of keeled arcades of different sizes framed in rectangular panels. (b) The palace built by Shah Jehan in the middle of the 17th century. It has been called the most splendid of Oriental palaces. The massive towered wall incloses an area of about 1,600 by 3,200 feet. The main entrance opens on a noble vaulted hall 375 feet long, from which are reached in succession two spacious courts. On the second of these faces the hall of public audience, an open arched structure with scalloped arches and coupled columns in the exterior range. On another court, toward the river, is the hall of private audience (Dewan-i-Khas), similar to the first, but with square piers to its arches and beautiful inlaying in colored stones. On the river side stands also the Iking Mehal, or Painted Hall, an admirable structure, which includes a bath. (c) The Jami Masjid, or Great Mosque, built by Shah Jehan in the middle of the 17th century. It is very large, and the grouping of the three lofty monumental gates and the kiosked angle towers of its court with the lofty minarets, the great entrance-arch, and the three fine bulbous domes of the sanctuary produces an unusually impressive architectural effect. The court is raised on a high basement, and is surrounded by graceful open arcades. The minarets rise from the ends of the façade of the mosque proper, and between them and the central arch there are on each side five fine arcades surmounted by paneling in red sandstone and white marble. Above the cornice are placed a range of close-set, rounded battlements. Population (1891), 192,579.

Delia (dē'li-ä). [Gr. Δελία.] 1. A name given to Artemis, from the island of Delos, her birth-place. Similarly Apollo, the sun-god, was called Delius.—2. A shepherdess in Vergil's Eclogues.

Delian Confederacy. See Delos, Confederacy of.

Delight of Mankind. An epithet of the emperor Titus.

Delilah (de-lī'lä). [Heb. 'weak,' 'feeble'; Gr. Δαλίη.] A woman of the valley of Sorek, mistress of Samson. She discovered the secret of Samson's strength, and betrayed him to the Philistines. Judges xvi.

Delille, or Delisle (de-lél'), Jacques. Born at Aigueperse, Puy-de-Dôme, France, June 22, 1738; died at Paris, May 1, 1813. A French didactic poet and translator. His works include "Les jardins" (1780), "La pititié" (1803), a translation of Vergil's Georgics (1769), etc.

Jacques Delille and his extraordinary popularity form, perhaps, the greatest satire on the taste of the eighteenth century in France. His translation of the Georgics was supposed to make him the equal of Virgil, and brought him not merely fame, but solid reward. His principal work was the poem of "Les Jardins," which he followed up with others of a not dissimilar kind. Though he emigrated he did not lose his fame, and to the day of his death was considered to be the first poet of France, or to share that honour with Lebrun-Pindare. Delille has expiated his popularity by a full half century of contempt, and his work is, indeed, valueless as poetry.

Deliniers-Brémont. See Liniers y Brémont.

Deliro (de-lé'rö). A character in Ben Jonson's comedy "Every Man out of his Humour": a good, doting citizen, a fellow sincerely in love with his own wife, and so wrapt with a conceit of her perfections that he simply holds himself unworthy of her.

Delisle (de-lél'; often Anglicized to de-lil'), Guillaume. Born at Paris, Feb. 28, 1675; died there, Jan. 25, 1726. A French scientist, one of the founders of modern geography.

Delisle, Joseph Nicolas. Born at Paris, April 4, 1688; died at Paris, Sept. 11, 1768. A French astronomer, brother of Guillaume Delisle. His works include "Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire et au progrès de l'astronomie," etc. (1735), "Mémoire sur les nouvelles découvertes au nord de la Mer du Sud" (1752), etc.

Delitzsch (dä'litsh). A town in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated on the Lösser 12 miles north of Leipsic. Population (1890), commune, 8,949.

Delitzsch, Franz. Born at Leipsic, Feb. 23, 1813; died there, March 4, 1890. A noted German exegete and Hebraist. He became professor of theology at Rostock in 1846, at Erlangen in 1855, and at Leipsic in 1867. He represented strict Lutheranism. His numerous works include commentaries on "Habakkuk" (1843), "Genesis" (1852), "Hebrews" (1857), "Psalms" (1859-60), "Job" (1864), etc.; also "Sakrament des wahren Leibes und Blutes Jesu Christi" (1844), "System der biblischen Psychologie" (1855), etc.

Delitzsch, Friedrich. Born at Erlangen, Bavaria, Sept. 3, 1850. A German Assyriologist, son of Franz Delitzsch, appointed professor of Assyriology at Leipsic in 1877, and at Breslau in 1893. His works include an Assyrian grammar, an Assyrian dictionary, etc.

Delium (dē'li-um). [Gr. Δελίον.] In ancient geography, a place in Bœotia, Greece, situated on the coast 24 miles north of Athens. Here, 424 B. C., the Bœotians defeated the Athenians.

Delius (dē'li-um). [Gr. Δήλιος.] A surname of Apollo, from his birthplace in Delos.

Delius (dä'lé-ös), Nikolaus. Born at Bremen, Germany, Sept. 19, 1813; died at Bonn, Nov. 18, 1888. A German philologist and Shaksperian scholar, professor at Bonn 1855-80; author of a critical edition of Shakspeare (1854-61 and 1882), etc.

Della Crusca, Accademia. See Accademia della Crusca.

Della Cruscan School (del'ä krus'kan sköi). A small clique of English poets of both sexes who originally met in Florence about 1785. Their productions, which were affected and sentimental, were published in England in the "World" and the "Oracle." They were attacked by Gifford (1794-96) in "The Baviad" and "The Mæviad" (which see). Robert Merry adopted the pseudonym "Della Crusca," Mrs. Hannah Cowley "Anna Matilda" (which see), and Edward Jerningham "The Bard." These, with Edward Topham, the Rev. Charles Este, James Boswell, Mrs. Piozzi, and others, formed the school. They took their name from the Florentine Academia della Crusca (which see).

Dellys (del-léz'). A small seaport in Algeria, situated east of Algiers.

Delmar (del'mär), Alexander. Born at New York, Aug. 9, 1836. An American political economist, statistician, and mining engineer. He was the founder of the "Social Science Review," and its editor from 1864-66. In 1867 he was director of the Bureau of Statistics, and in the same year president of the Washington Statistical Society. His works include "Gold Money and Paper Money" (1862), "Essays on Political Economy" (1865), "What is Free Trade?" (1868), "The Resources, etc., of Egypt" (1874), "History of the Precious Metals" (1880), "A History of Money, etc." (1885), etc.

Delmonte y Tejada (däl-mou'tä é tä-nä'dä), Antonio. Born at Santiago de los Caballeros, Santo Domingo, Sept. 29, 1783; died at Havana, Nov. 19, 1861. A Spanish-American historian. Driven from his country in 1804 by the revolutionists, he resided in Havana after 1806, practising law and occupying several government positions. The first volume only of his "Historia de Santo Domingo" was published in Havana 1853.

Delolme (de-lölm'), Jean Louis. Born at Geneva, 1740; died in Switzerland, July 16, 1806. A Swiss constitutional writer. Having opposed the Geneva government by the publication of a pamphlet entitled "Examen des trois points des droits," he emigrated to England, where he lived many years. He returned to Switzerland in 1775. His works include "Constitution de l'Angleterre" (1771), of which an English translation, prepared by himself, appeared in 1775 as "The Constitution of England."

De Long (de long), George Washington. Born at New York, Aug. 22, 1844; died in Siberia, Oct. 30, 1881. An American explorer. He was graduated at the United States Naval Academy in 1865, and obtained the rank of lieutenant in 1863, and of lieutenant-commander in 1879. He accompanied Captain D. L. Braine on his Arctic expedition in 1873. Having been appointed to the command of the Jeanette, fitted out by James Gordon Bennett, Jr., for a three years' voyage of exploration in the Arctic waters, and placed under the authority of the United States government, he sailed from San Francisco, July 8, 1879, and proceeded to Cape Serdze Kamen, Siberia, whence he steamed northward until beset by the ice in about 71° 35' N., 75° W., Sept. 5, 1879. The vessel drifted to the northwest, and was crushed in 77° 15' N., 155° E., June 13, 1881. With fourteen others he reached the mouth of the Lena, Siberia, where the whole party perished of cold and starvation, except two men sent forward to obtain relief. His body and those of his companions were discovered March 23, 1882, by Chief Engineer George W. Melville, who with nine companions had been detached from the main party and had succeeded in reaching a small village on the Lena.

Deloraine (del-ö-rän'), William of. In Sir Walter Scott's poem "Lay of the Last Minstrel," a borderer and trusty vassal of the Buccleuch family. He is sent by the Lady of Branksome to fetch the magic book from the tomb of Michael Scott, the wizard.

Delord (de-lor'), Taxile. Born at Avignon, France, Nov. 25, 1815; died at Paris, May 16, 1877. A French journalist, historian, and politician. His chief work is a "Histoire du second empire" (1868-75).

Delorme, or de Lorme (dè lorm), Marion. Born near Châlons-sur-Marne, France, 1611; said to have died at Paris, 1650. A celebrated French courtesan, mistress of the Marquis de Cinq-Mars. In 1650 she was ordered to be arrested by Mazarin for her complicity in the Fronde, and was found dead by the officers. This, however, is thought to have been a ruse. She is even said to have lived to the age of 137 years. She was the friend of Ninon de l'Enclos. Victor Hugo wrote a novel with her name as title, and Bulwer introduces her in his play "Richelieu"; she was also the subject of a drama, "Cinq-Mars" (1826), by Alfred de Vigny.

De l'Orme (dè lorm), Philibert. Born at Lyons, 1515; died at Paris, Jan. 8, 1570. A noted French architect. He was court architect under Henry II.

Delos (dè'los), modern Gr. Mikra Dilos ('little Delos'). [Gr. Δῆλος.] The smallest island of the Cyclades, situated in the Ægean Sea in lat. 37° 23' N., long. 25° 18' E.; the ancient Astera or Ortygia. According to Greek legends it was originally a floating island, and was the birthplace of Apollo and Artemis. It was the seat of a great sanctuary in honor of Apollo, one of the most famous religious foundations of antiquity. From the time of Solon, Athens sent an annual embassy to the Delian festival. (See Delos, Confederacy of.) In 454 A. C. the sacred treasure of Delos was removed to the Athenian Acropolis. The island was an Athenian dependency down to the Macedonian period, when it became semi-independent, and in the 2d century B. C. it again became subject to Athens. The city of Delos was made a free port by the Romans and developed into a great commercial mart. The sanctuary of Apollo has been excavated by the French school at Athens since 1873. The work has advanced slowly, and is not yet complete; but it has been pursued with little interruption, and ranks as one of the chief achievements of its kind. The buildings described lie for the most part within the inclosure or temenos of Apollo, which is of trapeziform shape, and about 650 feet to a side. In addition to the interesting finds of architecture and sculpture, epigraphical discoveries of the highest importance have been made, bearing upon history and particularly upon the ceremonial and administration of the sanctuary.

Delos, Confederacy of. A Hellenic league, formed probably about 477 B. C., with its political center at Athens and its treasury at Delos (removed later to Athens). It was formed by Athens and various other maritime states (Ægina, Megara, Naxos, Thasos, Lesbos, Chios, Samos, etc.). Many of them were soon absorbed by Athens, and the league developed into an Athenian empire.

De Louterbourg. See Louterbourg.

Delpech (del-pesh'), Jacques Matthieu. Born at Toulouse, France, about 1775; murdered at Montpellier, France, Oct. 29, 1832. A French surgeon, author of "Traité de l'orthomorphie" (1828-29), etc.

Delphi (del'fi), modern Kastri. [Gr. Δελφοί.] In ancient geography, a town in Phocis, Greece, situated 6 miles from the Corinthian Gulf, at the foot of Mount Parnassus; the seat of a world-renowned oracle of Pythian Apollo, the most famous of antiquity. The oracle was of pre-historic foundation, and was still respected when alluded by Theodosius at the end of the 4th century A. D. Through the gifts of states and individuals who sought or had obtained the aid of the oracle, the Delphic sanctuary became enormously rich, not only in architecture and works of art, but in the precious metals. Its treasures of the last kind were plundered in antiquity, and Nero and other emperors robbed it of an almost incredible number of statues and other art works. There is, however, reason to hope that much in the way of sculpture, architecture, and historical inscriptions will be found by the French official excavators who began work in 1892. But little exploration had before been possible, because the village of Kastri covered the site of the sanctuary. The village has now been removed, preparatory to the French exploration. Besides the splendid temple of Apollo, the inclosure of the sanctuary contained a theater, the council-house, the Lesche, the Portico of the Athenians, a number of treasuries belonging to different states, and almost innumerable statues and other votive offerings. Buildings only second in importance were ranged outside of the inclosure.

Delphin Classics. [From L. delphinus, a dolphin (whence F. dauphin).] An edition of the Latin classics prepared by order of Louis XIV. for the use of the Dauphin ("In usum Delphini," for the use of the Dauphin): first works published in 1674 under direction of Bossuet and Huet. They are sometimes called "dauphins."

Delphine (del-fên'). A novel by Madame de Staël, published in 1802; so named from its principal female character. She dies of a broken heart.

Delphinus (del-fî'nus). [L., 'a dolphin.'] One of the ancient constellations, representing a dolphin. It is situated east of Aquila.

Delpit (del-pé'), Albert. Born at New Orleans, Jan. 30, 1849; died at Paris, Jan. 4, 1893. A French dramatist, journalist, and poet. Among his plays are "Jean Nu-Pieds" (1875) and "Les chevaliers de la patrie" (1873). He afterward published a novel, "Le fils de Coralie" (which was successful and was dramatized 1879), "Le père de Martial" (1881), and "La marquise" (1882), "Passionément," a comedy (1883), "Comme dans la vie" and "Tous les denx" (1890).

Delta (del'ä). Any tract of land, inclosed by the mouths of a river, in shape like the Greek letter delta (Δ); specifically, the delta of the Nile.

Herodotus considers the Delta to end at Heliopolis (ii. 7), which brings the point of the Delta nearly opposite the present Shoubra. Here the river separated into three branches, the Pelusiac or Bubastite to the E., the Canopic or Heracleotic to the W., and the Sebennytic, which ran between them, continuing in the same general line of direction northward which the Nile had up to this point, and piercing the Delta through its centre. The Tanitic, which ran out of the Sebennytic, was at first the same as the Businitic, but afterwards received the name of Tanitic, from the city of Tanis (now San), which stood on its eastern bank; and between the Tanitic and Pelusiac branches was the Isle of Myceporis, which Herodotus says was opposite Bubastis (ii. 166). The Mendesian, which also ran eastward from the Sebennytic, passed by the modern town of Mansoorah, and thence running by Mendes (from which it was called, entered the sea to the W. of the Tanitic. The Bolbitine mouth was that of the modern Rosetta branch, as the Bucolic or Phatmetic was that of Danietta, and the lower parts of both these branches were artificial, or made by the hand of man; on which account, though Herodotus mentions seven, he confines the number of the mouths of the Nile to five. These two artificial outlets of the Nile are the only ones now remaining, the others having either disappeared, or being dry in most places during the summer.

Rawlinson, Herod., II, 26, note.

Demochares (de-mok'ā-rēs). [Gr. Δημοκάρης.] An Athenian orator, nephew of Demosthenes. He came forward in 322 B. C. as an orator of the anti-Macedonian party, and after the restoration of democracy by Demetrius Poliorcetes in 307 became the leader of the popular party. He was several times expelled by the anti-democratic party, returning the last time in 287 or 286. He was sent as ambassador to Lysimachus about 282, and disappears from view in 280.

Democratic party. In United States history, a political party which arose about 1792. It was called first the Republican, later the Democratic-Republican, and afterward simply the Democratic party. It has opposed a strong central government, and has generally favored a strict construction of the Constitution. It has controlled the executive or the national government under the following administrations: Jefferson's, Madison's, Monroe's, Jackson's, Van Buren's, Polk's, Pierce's, Buchanan's, and Cleveland's. Its principal founder was Jefferson. It may be regarded as the successor of the Anti-Federalist party.

Democritus (dē-mok'ri-tus). [Gr. Δημόκριτος.] Born at Abdera, Thrace, about 460 B. C.; died about 357 B. C. A Greek philosopher, surnamed "The Abderite" and "The Laughing Philosopher." He inherited an ample fortune, which enabled him to visit the chief countries of Asia and Africa in pursuit of knowledge. He adopted and expanded the atomistic theory of Leucippus, which he expounded in a number of works, fragments only of which are extant. He is said to have been of a cheerful disposition, which prompted him to laugh at the follies of men (hence the surname "The Laughing Philosopher"). According to tradition he put out his eyes in order to be less disturbed in his philosophical speculations.

Democritus Junior. The pseudonym under which Robert Burton published his "Anatomy of Melancholy" (1621).

Demodocus (de-mod'ō-kus). [Gr. Δημόδοκος.] In the Odyssey, a famous bard who, during the stay of Ulysses at the court of Alcinoüs, delighted the guests by recounting the feats of the Greeks at Troy and singing the amours of Ares and Aphrodite.

Demosthenes (dē-mos'thē-nēs). [Gr. Δημοσθένης.] Died at Syracuse, 413 B. C. An Athenian general. In 425 he defended Tylos against the Spartans, and made the dispositions by which the enemy was forced to capitulate, although the glory of the exploit was claimed by Cleon, who relieved him in the command. He commanded under Nicias in the unsuccessful expedition against Syracuse in 413. Having been captured in the retreat, he was put to death by order of the Syracusan assembly.

Demosthenes. [Gr. Δημοσθένης.] Born at Pæania, Attica, in 384 or 385 B. C.; died in 322 B. C. The greatest of Greek orators. He is said to have been the pupil of the orator Isæus, and entered public life as a speaker in the popular assembly in 355. In 352 he delivered the first of a splendid series of orations directed against the encroachment of Philip of Macedonia, three of which are specifically denominated "Philippics."

In 346 he served as a member of the embassy which concluded with Philip the so-called peace of Phocætes. As Philip immediately after broke this treaty, Demosthenes came forward as the leader of the patriotic party in opposition to the Macedonian, which was headed by Eschines. In 340 he caused a fleet to be sent to the relief of Byzantium, which was besieged by Philip. On the outbreak of the Amphictyonic war, he persuaded the Athenians to form an alliance with Thebes against Philip, who defeated the allies at Charonea in 338, and usurped the hegemony of Greece. He was one of the leaders of the unsuccessful rising which took place on the death of Philip in 336; was exiled by the Macedonian party in 324; was recalled by the patriotic party on the outbreak of a fresh rising at the death of Alexander in 323; and on the capture of Athens by Antipater and Craterus in 322 fled to Calauria, near Argolis, where he took poison to avoid capture. His chief orations are three "Philippics" (351, 344, 341), three "Olynthiæ" (349, 349, 348), "On the Peace" (346), "On the Embassy" (343), "On the Affairs of the Chersonese" (341), "On the Crown" (330). The first printed collective edition of his orations is that published by Aldus at Venice in 1504. The best modern editions are those by Bekker (1823), Sauppe and Baier (1841), Dindorf (1846-51), and Whiston (1859-68). See Schäfer's "Demosthenes und seine Zeit" (1856-58). There is a portrait-statue of Demosthenes, one of the finest of antiquity, in the Vatican, Rome. The expression of the close-bearded face is anxious, but full of strength and high resolve. The position is easy, the clothing a full, plainly draped himation.

Demotika, or Demotica (de-mot'i-kā). A town in Rumelia, European Turkey, situated on the Maritza 23 miles south of Adrianople. Population, estimated, 8,000-10,000.

Denderah, or Dendera (den'dēr-ā). A town in Upper Egypt, situated on the Nile in lat. 26° 9' N., long. 32° 39' E.: the ancient Tentyrā or Tentyris. It is celebrated for its temple of Itathor, which, notwithstanding its late date (it was begun by the 11th Ptolemy, and the great pronaos was added only under Tibertius), is one of the most interesting buildings in Egypt, owing to its almost perfect preservation, even to the roof. The imposing hexastyle pronaos has four ranges of Itathoric columns; on its ceiling is a noted sculptured zodiac, combining Egyptian and classical elements. Next to the pronaos is a hypostyle hall of six columns, from which three chambers open on each side, and beyond this is a vestibule before a large hall in which stands an isolated cella. This hall is surrounded by a series of chambers, one of which in the middle of the back wall contained the emblematic sistrum of the goddess. The whole interior surface is sculptured, the art, however, being inferior. On the roof there is a small six-chambered temple to the local divinity Osiris-An.

On the celebrated zodiac of Dendera, the date of which is believed to be about 700 B. C., the signs of the zodiac arc exhibited in a primitive pictorial form, which leaves no doubt as to their significance. Taylor, The Alphabet, I, 7.

Dendermonde (den-dēr-mōn'de), F. Termonde (ter'mōnd'). A fortified town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated at the junction of the Dender and Schelde, 17 miles northwest of Brussels. In 1667, being besieged by Louis XIV., the town was defended by opening its sluices and flooding the adjacent country. It was captured by Marlborough in 1706, and by the French in 1745. Population (1890), 9,606.

Dendin (don-dān'), Perrin. An ignorant peasant, applied to as a judge, in Rabelais's "Pantagruel." His method was to let people fight till they were tired of it—a satire on lawyers who prefer the ruin of their client to the slightest concession. He loved eating and drinking, and settled the disputes of his neighbors while indulging these tastes.

Denmark (den'märk). [AS. Denemearc, F. Danemark, Dan. Dänmark, G. Dänemark, Icel. Dannörk, march, or boundary, of the Danes.] A kingdom in northern Europe, comprising part of the peninsula of Jutland, and a group of islands of which the principal are Zealand, Fünen, Laaland, Bornholm, Falster, Langeland, and Möen. Its surface is generally level. The capital is Copenhagen. The government is a constitutional hereditary monarchy, with a Rigsdag composed of an upper house (Landsting) of 66 members and a lower house (Folkething) of 102 members. The established religion is Lutheran. The army numbered in 1892 (on a war footing) 53,562. Its foreign possessions are the Faröe Islands, Iceland, Greenland south of latitude 73° N., Santa Cruz, St. Thomas, and St. John. In the early middle ages it was famous as the home of pirates. The different kingdoms in Denmark became consolidated into one in the 9th century. During this period Christianity was introduced, being confirmed in the reign of Canute (died 1035), who reigned also over England and Norway. It was separated from the other kingdoms after Canute's death. Danish conquests extended over the Baltic Wends in the 12th and 13th centuries, and for short periods over Estonia, Rügen, and various German districts. Norway, Sweden, and Denmark were united by the Union of Kalmar in 1397, but Sweden was finally separated from Denmark in 1523. Protestantism was introduced in the middle of the 16th century, and the country took part, on the Protestant side, in the Thirty Years' War. Dago, Ösel, and Gothland were lost to Sweden in 1645, as were also the Danish possessions in southern Sweden in 1658. Absolute power was obtained by the kings in 1660. Denmark having assumed a position of armed neutrality with respect to England, her fleet was attacked and defeated by Nelson in 1801, and in 1807 the British bombarded Copenhagen. Norway was ceded to Sweden in 1814. (For the relations with Schleswig and Holstein, see those names.) The Schleswig-Holstein war in 1864, waged unsuccessfully by Denmark against Prussia and Austria, resulted in the loss of Schleswig-Holstein and Lauenburg. The present constitution was adopted in 1866, and recent history has been marked by a constitutional struggle between the government and the people. Area, including the Faröe Islands, 15,289 square miles. Population (1890), 2,185,335. Population of colonies (1890), 114,229.

De Quincey (de kwinq'zi), Thomas. Born at Greenheys, Manchester, Aug. 15, 1785; died at Edinburgh, Dec. 8, 1859. An English essayist and miscellaneous writer. He was the son of Thomas De Quincey, a wealthy merchant, who died about 1792. He was sent to the Manchester grammar-school in 1801, but ran away in the following year, and, after a pedestrian tour in Wales, lived some time in extreme poverty in London. He subsequently studied at Oxford, without taking a degree. About 1808 he made the acquaintance of Coleridge and Wordsworth, which induced him to settle at Grasmere. He married Margaret Simpson in 1816. Some years later he lost his fortune, and in 1821 went to London in search of literary work. During his stay at Oxford he had contracted the habit of opium-eating, which grew upon him to such an extent that at one time he took 340 grains daily, and which eventually disabled him from protracted application to literary work. In 1821 he made his experience with this drug the basis of a narrative, entitled "Confessions of an English Opium-Eater," which appeared in the "London Magazine," and which established his reputation. He subsequently wrote much for "Blackwood's Magazine" and the "Edinburgh Literary Gazette," and eventually took up his residence at Edinburgh. His only separate publications were "Klosterheim" (1839), and "Logic of Political Economy" (1844). The most complete edition of his works appeared in 1852-55.

He was graduated at Cornell University, and was instructor there 1873-75; made short visits to Brazil 1870 and 1871; and in 1875 took a place on the Brazilian geological commission. Since that time he has been engaged in geological and geographical work in Brazil, acting on various commissions, and for some years as curator of the geological department of the national museum. Since 1886 he has been chief of the geographical and geological survey of São Paulo. He is the author of various papers on geology, paleontology, etc.

Derby, The. A race for three-year-olds at Epsom, established in 1780 by the Earl of Derby. The first Derby was won by Diomed, the property of Sir Charles Bunbury; afterward sent to America. "Derby Day" is the last Wednesday of May (sometimes the first of June). It is the great Cockney holiday, and 300,000 people are supposed to go to the Derby each year. The Derby has been twice won by fillies: in 1801 by Eleanor and in 1857 by Blink Bonny, each of which also won the Oaks of her year. The course is now 1½ miles, wide at the start and with steep ascent, then level for three furlongs, descending again to "Tattenham Corner," where it turns and goes straight home. The "2,000 guineas," the Derby, and the St. Leger constitute the "triple crown," which has been won by five horses, West Australian, Gladiator, Lord Lyon, Ormonde, and Common. Race.

Dercetas (dér'se-tas). A friend of Antony in Shakspere's "Antony and Cleopatra."

Derceto (dér'se'tō). [Gr. Δερκετώ.] The principal Philistine female deity, worshipped especially in Ascalon. She was represented in the form of a woman terminating in a fish, and is considered the female counterpart of Dagon. She was a nature goddess, the principle of generation and fertility, and corresponds in her attributes and the mode of her worship to Ashtoreth (Astarte) of the Canaanites and Syrians (the Assyro-Babylonian Ishtar). Also Derketo. See Atargatis.

Dereham (dēr'am). A small town in Norfolk, England, 16 miles west of Norwich.

Der-el-Bahri (der-el-bäh'rē), or Deir-el-Bahari (där-el-bä'hä-rē). A locality west of Thebes, Egypt, near the western bank of the Nile, famous for its ruins. Among the ruins is a temple built by Hatshepsut, sister of Thothmes II. and III. (about 1600 B. C.). The inclosure is preceded by a dromos 1,600 feet long, between lines of sphinxes, at the end of which rose two obelisks. The inner court is entered by a fine granite pylon, and behind it is the temple itself. The plan is peculiar, as the buildings extend up the slope of the mountain in stages connected by flights of steps. The masonry is of a beautiful fine limestone, and the sculptures are of great importance, representing especially sacrificial scenes, military triumphs and captives, and payment of tribute. A number of the inner chambers and passages are covered with pseudo-vaulting of stones corbeled out from the walls. Here, in 1881, Maspero made by chance a remarkable archaeological discovery—that of a number of mummies of the Pharaohs, including those of some of the most famous of Egyptian kings, among them Thothmes II. and Thothmes III., the conqueror of Assyria, Seti I., and the great Rameses II., the "Pharaoh of the Oppression." These mummies are in remarkable preservation, and supply a not inadequate picture of the features of the sovereigns in life. The discovery was made through a quarrel of some Arabs, who had found a pit near the Sheikh Abd-el-Gournah hill, and were surreptitiously removing the contents. The mummies had evidently been brought from the royal tombs, which lie at no great distance, and placed in this pit for safety during some threatened danger. They are now preserved in the Gizeh Museum, Cairo. A second important discovery of concealed mummies was made in 1891.

De Republica (dē re-pū'bli-kā). [L., 'of the Republic.'] A philosophical political treatise in six books, by Cicero, in the form of a dialogue between Africanus the younger (in whose garden the scene is laid), C. Laelius, and others. The theme is the best form of government and the duty of the citizen. It was written about 54-51 u. c. About one third of it has survived.

Desborough (dez'bur-ō), Colonel. The "brutally ignorant" brother-in-law of Cromwell in Scott's novel "Woodstock."

D'Escarbagnas, Countess. See Comtesse d'Escarbagnas.

Descartes (dä-kärt'), René (Latinized Renatus Cartesius). Born at La Haye, Touraine, France, March 31, 1596; died at Stockholm, Feb. 11, 1650. A celebrated French philosopher, founder of Cartesianism and of modern philosophy in general. He was graduated at seventeen from the Jesuit college of La Flèche, spent five years in Paris (1613-18), and then roamed about in search of knowledge in Germany, Italy, Holland, and Poland. In 1628 he attended the siege of La Rochelle as a volunteer. From 1629 to 1649 he led a retired life in Holland, spreading and defending his philosophical ideas. He finally went to Stockholm on the invitation of Queen Christina of Sweden; five months later he died there of pneumonia. The work that has made him famous as a philosopher is a short treatise entitled "Discours de la méthode" (Leyden, 1637). It was published in French together with three essays in support of his theories, "La dioptrique," "Les météores," and "La géométrie." In it he revolutionized the science of thought. Descartes himself published during his lifetime "Méditations de prima philosophia" (Paris, 1641; Amsterdam, 1642; translated into French, 1647), "Principia philosophiæ" (Amsterdam, 1644), "Traité des passions de l'âme" (Amsterdam, 1649), and a polemic pamphlet entitled "Epistola Renati Descartes ad Gisbertum Voëitium" (Amsterdam, 1643). After his death his friends published his "De l'homme" (1664), "Traité de la formation du fœtus" (1664), "Le monde ou traité de la lumière de Descartes" (1664), "Lettres" (1657-67), and "Opuscula posthuma, physica et mathematica" (Amsterdam, 1701). Descartes ranked among the foremost mathematicians of his day. A separate reprint was made of his geometry, and the work itself was translated into Latin in 1649, and recited in 1659 with notes and comments. In this form it constituted a classic standard throughout Europe, and presented an entirely new basis for the study of algebra and geometry.

Descent from the Cross. 1. A painting by Sodoma (Bazzi) (1504), in the Accademia at Siena, Italy. The group of mourning women is especially admired for the beauty of its conception and execution.

2. A fine painting by Gerard David, in the Chapelle du Saint Sang at Bruges, Belgium. The Virgin and Mary Salome are grouped with St. John about the body of Christ, which is supported by Nicodemus. In the background the cross is seen. The Magdalen and Joseph of Arimathea are painted on the wings.

3. A noteworthy painting by Cavazzola, in the Pinacoteca at Verona. It unites the naturalism of the 15th century with the freedom of the following period. With its companion pieces, the "Bearing of the Cross" and the "Agony in the Garden," it is the painter's masterpiece.

4. A painting by Correggio, in the Pinacoteca at Parma, Italy.—5. A painting by Titian, in the Accademia, Venice. It has been injured by restoration, but shows great invention and power of expression. It is remarkable as having been painted in Titian's ninety-ninth year (1576), the year of his death.

6. A painting by Rubens (1614), considered his masterpiece, in Antwerp cathedral, Belgium. The body has been detached and is being lowered by men on ladders; it is received below by St. John, beside whom kneel Mary Salome and the Magdalen. The Virgin stands behind.

Deschamps (dā-shōn'), Eustache, called Morrel. Born at Vertus, Marne, France, in the first part of the 14th century. A French poet. He was the author of ballades (1,175 in number), rondeaux, virelais, etc.; of one long poem, the "Miroir de mariage"; and of "Art de dicter" (a treatise on French rhetoric and prosody).

Deschamps de Saint Amand, Émile. Born at Bourges, Feb. 20, 1791; died at Versailles, April, 1871. A French poet.

Deschanel, Émile Augustin Étienne Martin. Born at Paris, Nov. 14, 1819. A French writer and journalist. In 1842 he was made professor of rhetoric at Bourges, and shortly after occupied the same chair at Paris. He entered journalism as a liberal, and was imprisoned and exiled in 1851. He returned in 1859, and became one of the editors of the "Journal des Débats." In 1876 he was elected to the chamber as a republican, and in 1881 he was elected a senator for life. He has published a number of anthologies with comments, "Les courtisanes grecques," "Le mal qu'on a dit des femmes," "Le bien qu'on a dit des femmes," etc. (1855-58), "La vie des comédiens" (1860), "Études sur Aristophane" (1867), "Le peuple et la bourgeoisie" (1881), "Benjamin Franklin" (1882). From 1832 to 1856 he published his lectures at the Collège de France, called "Le romantisme des classiques," much enlarged and revised.

Desclée (dā-klā'), Aimée Olympe. Born Nov. 18, 1836; died at Paris, March 9, 1874. A French actress. She excelled in the modern dramas "Frou-Frou," "Diane de Lys," etc.

Desdemona (dez-de-mō'nī). In Shakspeare's tragedy "Othello," the wife of Othello the Moor, and the daughter of Brabantio, a Venetian senator. Othello smothers her in an outburst of rage produced by a belief in her unfaithfulness, carefully instilled by Iago. According to Malone, the first woman (name unknown) who appeared in any regular drama performed the part of Desdemona.

The one characteristic which belongs to Desdemona, that highest charm of the womanly nature, which language names not, because he knows it not or believes not in it; namely, her humility, her harmless ingenuousness, her modesty and innocence. The mirror of this soul has ever been darkened by the breath of an impure thought; it abhors her to speak the mere word of sin; her name is clear and "fresh as Dian's visage." The gentleness of her soul and mind culminates—and this is the highest point of her nature—in a perfect freedom from suspicion too deeply rooted in her for this suspicious world. Gervinus, Shakespeare Commentaries (tr. by F. E. Bunnell, ed. 1880), p. 516.

Desden con el desden, El. ['Disdain met with disdain.] A play by Moreto (1618-69), the idea of which was taken from Lope de Vega. It is not known when it was first produced, but it is still played, and is one of the four classical pieces of the older Spanish drama. Under the title of "Donna Diana" it is familiar in Germany, and in 1864 Mr. Westland Marston produced it under the same name in England, his version being a translation of that of Schreyvogel. Molière's version, "La princesse d'Élide," was a failure. Count Carlo Gozzi produced it in Italian as "La Principessa Filosofa o il Contraveleno" ("The Philosophical Princess or the Antidote").

Desdichado (des-di-chā'dō). ['Disinherited.] In Sir Walter Scott's novel "Ivanhoe," the device assumed by Ivanhoe in the tournament at Ashby.

Despard (des-pārd), Edward Marcus. Born in Queen's County, Ireland, in 1751; died Feb. 21, 1803. An Irish conspirator. He entered the army in 1766, obtained the rank of captain about 1780, and in 1784 was appointed superintendent of His Majesty's affairs in the Spanish peninsula of Yucatan. Having been dismissed from this office on a frivolous charge, he organized a conspiracy against the government, in consequence of which he was arrested Nov. 16, 1802, and hanged at London.

Despenser (de-spen'sēr), Hugh le. Died Aug. 4, 1265. A justiciar of England. He first appears in 1256, when he was intrusted with Harestan Castle, Derbyshire. The first mention of him as justiciar is found in the Fine Rolls in 1261. He joined the baronial party at the outbreak of the war with Henry III. in 1263, and fell in the battle of Evesham.

Despenser, Hugh le. Born about 1262; died Oct. 27 (?), 1326. An English court favorite. He was the grandson of the justiciar Hugh le Despenser, who fell in the baronial ranks at Evesham. He was with the king in Gascony in 1294, was present at the battle of Dunbar in 1296, accompanied the expedition to Flanders in 1297, was sent on a mission to Pope Clement V. at Lyons in 1305, and was created earl of Winchester in 1322. On the death of the favorite Piers Gaveston in 1312, he became the leader of the court party in opposition to the baronial, and together with his son Hugh le Despenser obtained a complete ascendancy over Edward II. The unscrupulous manner in which the favorites used their power to further schemes of self-aggrandizement caused them to be banished 1321-22, and brought about a rising of the barons under Queen Isabella in 1326, which ended in the deposition of the king and the execution of the favorites. The elder Despenser was captured at the surrender of Bristol, where he was tried and executed on the charge of treason.

Despenser, Hugh le. Died Nov., 1326. An English court favorite, son of Hugh le Despenser, earl of Winchester. He was appointed chamberlain to Edward II. in 1313. Originally an adherent of the baronial party, he joined his father (whom see) in the support of the king about 1317, and obtained in an especial degree the royal favor. He was banished with his father in 1321, returning with him in 1322. On the rising of the barons under Queen Isabella in 1326, caused by the insolence and self-seeking of himself and his father, he fled with Edward from London, Oct. 2, 1326, but was captured at Llantrissant Nov. 16, 1326, and was tried and executed on the charge of treason.

Des Périers, Bonaventure. See Périers.

Des Plaines (dā plān), or Aux Plaines (ō plān). A river in southeastern Wisconsin and northeastern Illinois, which unites with the Kankakee to form the Illinois 40 miles southwest of Chicago. Length, about 150 miles.

Despoblado (dāz-pō-blā'dō). [Sp., 'uninhabited.'] The name given in the Andean regions of South America to any barren plateau which is so high and cold as to be practically uninhabitable. Also called Puñá. Specifically—(a) In southern Peru, the region between the central and western Cordilleras, an undulating tract from 14,000 to 15,000 feet high, with a general breadth of about 150 miles, narrowing northward and extending southward on the borders of Chile and Bolivia. (b) A desert plateau in southern Bolivia (department of Potosí), on the borders of Argentina.

Desportes (dā-port'), Philippe. Born at Chartres, 1545; died Oct. 5, 1606. A French poet, ecclesiastic, and diplomatist, a disciple of Ronsard, surnamed by his contemporaries "the French Tibullus."

Dessaix (de-sā'), Joseph Marie. Born at Thonon, Haute-Savoie, France, Sept. 24, 1764; died Oct. 26, 1834. A French general in the Napoleonic wars, surnamed by Napoleon "L'Intrepide" after the battle of Wagram (1809).

Dessalines (de-sā-lēn'), Jean Jacques. Born at Grande Rivière, 1758; died near Port-au-Prince, Oct. 17, 1806. A negro revolutionist of Haiti. He was a slave, joined the servile insurrection of 1791, rose to be second in command under Toussaint Louverture, and fought against the mulattos; he was notorious for savage courage and cruelty. In 1802 he resisted Leclerc's army in the west, but finally submitted. After Toussaint had been carried to France he headed another revolt, and, aided by the English, drove out the French (1803). On Jan. 1, 1804, he was proclaimed governor-general of Haiti for life, and on June 16, 1805, emperor, as Jean Jacques I. His despotism incited hatred, and he was eventually waylaid and killed.

Dessau (des'sou). The capital of Anhalt, Germany, situated on the Mulde near its junction with the Elbe, in lat. 51° 50' N., long. 12° 14' E. Dettingen (det'ting-en). A village in Lower Franconia, Bavaria, situated on the Main 16 miles southeast of Frankfurt. Here, June 27, 1743, the Anglo-German army under George II. of England defeated the French under Noailles.

Deucalion (dū-kā'li-on). [Gr. Δευκαλίων.] In Greek legend, a king of Phthia in Thessaly, a son of Prometheus and Clymene, who with his wife Pyrrha was saved from a deluge sent by Zeus. On the advice of his father he built a wooden chest in which he and his wife were saved. After floating for nine days he landed on Mount Parnassus and sacrificed to Zeus. To renew the human race, destroyed by the deluge, he and Pyrrha were directed to veil their faces and throw behind them the bones of their mother. Through a misunderstanding they threw stones, and those thrown by Deucalion became men and those thrown by Pyrrha women; and with these Deucalion founded a kingdom in Locris.

Deuteronomy (dū-te-ron'ō-mi). [LGr. δευτερονομίον, the second law.] The fifth and last book of the Pentateuch, containing the last discourses of Moses, delivered in the plain of Moab. It begins with a recapitulation of the events of the last month of the forty years' wandering of the Israelites in the desert (i.-iv. 40); then follows the main body of the book, setting forth the laws which were to regulate the Israelites when they should become settled in the promised land; while chapters xxvi.-xxviii. contain the farewell speeches of Moses. Deuteronomy is a manual of religion and social ethics. Compared with the other books of the Pentateuch it is distinguished by a warm, oratorical tone. The laws of the preceding books are modified, and their presentation is more spiritual and ethical. On account of these differences Deuteronomy is now assigned by many critics to a different author and date from the rest of the Pentateuch. Owing to the fact that the so-called reformation of King Josiah appears to carry out the principles of Deuteronomy, it is concluded that "the book of the law" discovered by the priest Hilkiah in the temple in 622 B. C., which began the reformation of Josiah, was Deuteronomy. But its composition must certainly have originated at an earlier date. This is put by many critics in the reign of Manasseh, 698-643 B. C.

Deutsch (doich), Emmanuel Oscar Menahem. Born at Neisse, Prussia, Oct. 28, 1829; died at Alexandria, Egypt, May 12, 1873. A German Orientalist, of Hebrew descent, assistant in the British Museum library.

Devarshis (dā-vār'shiz). [Skt.] In Hindu religion, Devarshis or sages who have attained perfection upon earth, and have been exalted as demigods to heaven.

Devens (dev'ens), Charles. Born at Charlestown, Mass., April 4, 1820; died at Boston, Jan. 7, 1891. An American jurist and general. He served with distinction in the Army of the Potomac 1861-1865, and was attorney-general of the United States 1877-1881.

Deventer (de'ven-ter), or Demter (dem'ter). A town in the province of Overijssel, Netherlands, situated on the Yssel 22 miles northeast of Arnhem. It produces "Deventer honey-cakes," butter, iron, etc. (See the extract.) Population (1889), 22,293.

A proof of this character was given in an institution of considerable influence both upon learning and religion, the college or brotherhood of Deventer, planned by Gerard Groot, but not built and inhabited till 1400, fifteen years after his death. The associates of this, called by different names, but more usually Brethren of the Life in Common (Gemeines Lebens), or Good Brethren and Sisters, were dispersed in different parts of Germany and the Low Countries, but with their head college at Deventer. They bore an evident resemblance to the modern Moravians, by their strict lives, their community (at least a partial one) of goods, their industry in manual labour, their fervent devotion, their tendency to mysticism. Hallam, Lit., p. 75.

De Vere (de vēr'), Sir Aubrey. Born at Curragh Chase, County Limerick, Ireland, Aug. 28, 1788; died there, July 5, 1846. An Irish poet. He was the eldest son of Sir Vere Hunt, and took the ancestral name of De Vere in 1832 by letters patent. He published "Julian the Apostate" (1822), "The Song of Faith," etc. (1842), "Mary Tudor" (1847; posthumously published), etc.

Devereux, Robert, second Earl of Essex. Born at Netherwood, Herefordshire, England, Nov. 10, 1567; beheaded at London, Feb. 25, 1601. An English nobleman, son of the first Earl of Essex, and a favorite of Queen Elizabeth. He was appointed in 1585 general of the horse to the expedition sent under Leicester to the aid of the States-General. In 1587 he attended the court of Queen Elizabeth, who at this time began to show him unmistakable signs of attention. He married the widow of Sir Philip Sidney in 1594, became a privy councillor in 1593, commanded the land forces in the expedition against Cadix in 1596, was appointed earl marshal of England in 1597, and became chancellor of Cambridge University in 1598. In 1599 he was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland, in which post he aroused the queen's anger by the failure of his operations against the Irish rebels. He returned to England to lay his defense before the queen in person, and, failing to regain his standing at court, formed a conspiracy to compel her by force of arms to dismiss his enemies in the council. He was arrested and executed on the charge of treason.

Devereux, Robert, third Earl of Essex. Born at London, 1591; died Sept. 14, 1646. An English general, son of the second Earl of Essex. He was appointed general of the Parliamentary army on the outbreak of the civil war in 1642; fought the Royalist forces in the drawn battle of Edgehill in 1642; captured

Reading, relieved Gloucester, and gained the first battle of Newbury in 1643; lost his army in the unsuccessful campaign in Cornwall in 1644; and resigned his command on the passage of the Self-Denying Ordinance in 1645.

Devi (dā'vē). In Hindu mythology, "the goddess" or Mahadevi ('the great goddess'), wife of the god Shiva and daughter of Himavat (that is, the Himalaya Mountains). She is mentioned under a number of names in the Mahabharata, but is especially developed in the Puranas. As the shakti or female energy of Shiva, she has two characters, one mild, the other fierce, and it is under the latter that she is especially worshipped. She has various names, referring to her various forms. In her terrible form she is Durga ('the inaccessible'). It is in this character that bloody sacrifices are offered to her, that the barbarities of the Durgapuja and Charakpuja are perpetrated, and that the orgies of the Tantrikas are held in her honor.

De Vigny. See Vigny.

Devil (dev'1), The. A noted tavern in Fleet street, London, near Temple Bar. The Apollo Club was held here. It was presided over by Ben Jonson, Shakspeare, Beaumont, Fletcher, and other celebrities frequented it. Devil's Bridge, or Pont-y-Mynach (pont-ē-mun'ach). A bridge over the gorge of the Mynach, near Aberystwith, in Wales.

Devil's Dyke. An ancient earthwork, 18 feet high (of prehistoric date), in Cambridgeshire, England, extending from Reach to Wood-Ditton. There is another natural "Devil's Dyke" near Brighton, England.

The Devil's Dyke, as this barrier is called, is clearly a work of defence against enemies advancing from the Fens; and as a defence to the East Anglians it was of priceless value, for, stretching as it did from a point where the country became fenny and impassable to a point where the woods equally forbade all access, it covered the only entrance to the country they had won. But if the dyke be the work of the conquerors of this part of the coast, its purely defensive character shows that their attack was at an end; and that it was rather as assailants than as a prey that they regarded the towns of Central Britain. Green, Making of England, p. 51.

Devil's Lake. A lake in the northeastern part of North Dakota. Length, 50 miles.

Devil's Law-Case, The. A romantic comedy by Webster, printed in 1623.

Devil's Parliament. [L. Parliamentum Diabolicum.] A nickname given to the English Parliament which met at Coventry, England, in 1459. It attained the leading Yorkists.

Devil's Thoughts, The. A short poem by Coleridge and Southey, sometimes known as "The Devil's Walk."

The famous "Devil's Thoughts" had appeared in its first form on 6 Sept. 1799. The first three stanzas of fourteen were by Southey. This amusing doggerel was reprinted in Coleridge's "Sibylline Leaves" (1817), and in his collected poems, 1829 and 1834, with due statement of Southey's share. It was imitated by Byron and claimed for Porson. In Southey's poems it is reprinted with many additional stanzas, including some referring to the Porson story. Dict. Nat. Biog., XI. 308.

Devil's Wall. A popular name for the southern portion of the Roman fortification called the Pfahlgraben (which see).

Devil upon Two Sticks, The. A comedy by Foote, first played May 30, 1768, and printed in 1778. Foote took it from Le Sage's "Le diable boiteux," and himself played the part of the devil. See Asmodeus.

Dhyani Buddha (dhyā'ni bōd'dhā). [Skt. dhyāna, Pali jhāna, meditation.] The earlier Buddhism teaches that above the worlds of the gods there are sixteen Brahmaloas, 'worlds of Brahma,' one above another. Those who attain on earth to the first, second, or third dhyana, or stages of 'mystic meditation,' are reborn in the lower of these worlds, three being assigned to each stage or dhyana. Those who attain the fourth enter the tenth and eleventh Brahmaloas. The remaining five are assigned to those who attain to the third path on earth, and who will reach Nirvana in the new existence, the third path being that of those who will never return to this world, in whose hearts, the last remnants of sensuality and malevolence being destroyed, not the least low desire for one's self, or wrong feeling toward others, can arise. To each of these five groups of worlds the Great Vehicle assigns a special Buddha, called Dhyani Buddha. These five Buddhas correspond to the last four Buddhas, including Gautama, and the future Buddha, Maitreya (see Bodhisattva). Each of these human Buddhas has his corresponding Bodhisattva and Dhyani Buddha, the latter being his pure and glorious counterpart in the mystic world, free from the degrading conditions of the material life. The material Buddha is only the emanation of a Dhyani Buddha living in the ethereal mansions of mystic trance.

Diable, Robert le. See Robert, etc.

Diable boiteux (dē-ā'bl bwā-tē'). Le. [F., 'The Lame Devil.'] A satirical romance by Le Sage, published in 1707. It was an imitation of a Spanish work entitled "El diablo cojuelo," written by Luis Velez de Guevara, and first printed in 1641, and of other satires (by Cervante and others) long current. In Guevara's production, "the student Don Cleofas, having accidentally entered the abode of an astrologer, delivers from a glass bottle, in which he had been confined by the conjurer, the devil (diablo cojuelo), who is a spirit nearly of the same description as the Asmodee ('diable boiteux') of Le Sage, and who, in return for the service he had received from the scholar, exhibits to him the interior of the houses of Madrid." (Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fict., II. 47.) "In the French version . . . an additional human interest is imparted by a fire, in which the cool-natured and grateful demon takes the shape of Cleofas in rescuing a young lady of high birth, and thereby secures for his liberator a prosperous marriage." (Saintsbury, French Lit.) The whole work is in dialogue form. Foote took from it his play "The Devil on Two Sticks." The title "Le diable boiteux" has been given to a number of other publications, newspapers, etc. See Asmodeus.

Dias, Antonio Gonçalves. See Gonçalves Dias.

Dias (dē'äs), Bartholomeu. Born about 1445; died May 12 (†), 1500. A Portuguese navigator. He was a gentleman of the royal household, and in 1486 was made commander of one of two small vessels (Infante commanding the other) destined to explore the coast of Africa. They passed Cape Negro, the farthest point attained by Diego Cam; followed the coast to lat. 29° 8'; thence sailed south in the open sea for thirteen days, suffering greatly from cold; turned eastward in search of land, and, not finding it, bore to the north, striking the coast east of the Cape of Good Hope, and following it to a point beyond Algoa Bay. The sailors refused to go farther; and, after taking possession of the land for Portugal, they returned around the cape and reached home in safety. Some accounts say that Dias was driven beyond the cape by a storm without observing it; in any case, he and his companions were the first to double the south end of Africa. In 1497 Dias sailed with the expedition of Gama, but remained trading on the West African coast. In 1500 he commanded a ship in Cabral's fleet, and was lost in a storm after leaving the Brazilian coast.

Diavolo, Fra. See Fra Diavolo.

Diaz, Bernal. See Diaz del Castillo.

Diaz (dē'äth), Porfirio. Born in Oaxaca, Sept. 15, 1830. A Mexican general and statesman. He served as a soldier in the war with the United States in 1847, led a battalion against Santa Anna in 1854, and in 1855 adhered to Juárez and the liberal party. In 1861 he was a deputy, but soon took the field and won a victory over the reactionist Marquez. During the French invasion he was one of the leaders of the defense, was captured at Puebla, May, 1863, but escaped, and headed the army of resistance in Oaxaca. Forced to surrender, Feb., 1865, he again escaped and raised new forces. After the withdrawal of the French army he rapidly gained ground against Maximilian's generals, taking Puebla April 2, 1867, and finally entering Mexico June 21, 1867. Soon after he was a candidate for the presidency, but Juárez was elected. General Díaz kept up a continual opposition to Juárez and his successor, Lerdo, and headed several revolts. In 1876 he finally drove Lerdo out, and in May, 1877, became president of Mexico. He quickly restored order and started an era of prosperity for the country. Not being by the constitution eligible to immediate reelection, he was succeeded by his friend General Gonzalez in Dec., 1880. He was again elected in 1884, and reelected in 1888 and 1892, the constitution having been amended to permit this.

Dickens (dik'enz), Charles. Born at Landport, near Portsmouth, England, Feb. 7, 1812; died at Gadshill, near Rochester, England, June 9, 1870. A celebrated English novelist. He was the son of John Dickens, who served as a clerk in the navy pay-office and afterward became a newspaper reporter. He received an elementary education in private schools, served for a time as an attorney's clerk, and in 1835 became reporter for the "London Morning Chronicle." In 1833 he published in the "Monthly Magazine" his first story, entitled "A Dinner at Poplar Walk," which proved to be the beginning of a series of papers printed collectively as "Sketches by Boz" in 1836. He married Catherine, daughter of George Hogarth, in 1836. In 1836-37 he published the "Pickwick Papers," by which his literary reputation was established. He became editor of "Household Words" in 1849, and of "All the Year Round" in 1859, and visited America in 1842 and 1867-68. His chief works are "Pickwick Papers" (1837), "Oliver Twist" (1838), "Nicholas Nickleby" (1838-39), "Master Humphrey's Clock" (including "Old Curiosity Shop" and "Barnaby Rudge," 1840-41), "American Notes" (1842), "Christmas Carol" (1843), "Martin Chuzzlewit" (1843-44), "Chimes" (1844), "Cricket on the Hearth" (1845), "Domby and Son" (1846-48), "David Copperfield" (1849-50), "Bleak House" (1852-53), "Hard Times" (1854), "Little Dorrit" (1855-57), "Tale of Two Cities" (1859), "Uncommenced Traveler" (1860), "Great Expectations" (1860-61), "Our Mutual Friend" (1864-65), "Mystery of Edwin Drood" (1870, unfinished). See his "Life" by John Forster (1871-74), "Dickens Dictionary," by Pierce (1872), "Letters of Dickens" (1880).

Dick Tinto. See Tinto, Dick.

Dickinson (dik'in-son), Anna Elizabeth. Born at Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 28, 1842. An American lecturer and advocate of woman suffrage, labor reform, etc. She lectured during the Civil War on war issues, and afterward generally on political subjects, "Women's Work and Wages," etc. In 1876 she went on the stage, but did not meet with success. She wrote a play, "An American Girl" (1880), and "What Answer?" (a novel, 1868), "A Paying Investment" (1876), "A Ragged Register of People, Places, and Opinions" (1879).

Dickinson, Emily. Born at Amherst, Mass., Dec. 10, 1830; died there, May 15, 1886. An American poet. She was the daughter of Edward Dickinson, treasurer of Amherst College. Her life was one of singular seclusion. Her poems were published in 1850 and in 1852, and her letters in 1854.

Dickinson, John. Born at Crosia, Talbot County, Md., Nov. 13, 1732; died at Wilmington, Del., Feb. 14, 1808. An American statesman. He was a member of the Colonial Congress of 1765, and of the first Continental Congress of 1774, and president of Pennsylvania 1782-85. He was also a member of the Federal Convention of 1787. He wrote the "Fabius" letters in 1783, and was the founder of Dickinson College.

Dickinson College. An institution of learning situated at Carlisle, Pennsylvania, founded by John Dickinson in 1783. Since 1833 it has been controlled by the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Dick's Coffee House. An old coffee-house, No. 8 Fleet street (on the south side, near Temple Bar), originally "Richard's": named from Richard Turner, or Turner, to whom the house was let in 1680. The coffee-room retains its old paneling, and the staircase its original balusters. Richard's, as it was then called, was frequented by Cowper when he lived in the Temple. Timba.

Dickson (dik'son), Samuel Henry. Born at Charleston, S. C., Sept. 20, 1798; died at Philadelphia, March 31, 1872. An American physician and medical writer. He was professor of the practice of medicine in Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, from 1858 until his death. He wrote "Dengue: its History, Pathology, and Treatment" (1826), etc.

Dicquemare (dèk-mär'), Jacques François Abbé. Born at Havre, France, March 7, 1733; died March 29, 1789. A French naturalist and astronomer, professor of experimental physics at Havre. He invented several instruments used in astronomy and navigation.

Dictum of Kenilworth. An award made between King Henry III. and the Commons in 1266 during the siege of Kenilworth. It reestablished Henry's authority; proclaimed amnesty; annulled the provisions of Oxford; and provided that the king should keep the charter to which he had sworn.

Dictys (dik'tis) Cretensis ('of Crete'). [Gr. Δίκτυς.] The reputed author of a Latin narrative of the Trojan war, entitled "Ephemeris Belli Trojani," the introduction to which represents him as a follower of Idomeneus. This narrative was one of the chief sources from which the heroic legends of Greece passed into the literature of the middle ages. It was probably composed by Q. Septimius about 300 A. D.

Didache. See Teaching of the Twelve Apostles.

Didapper (dī'dap-er), Beau. In Fielding's "Joseph Andrews," a rich, weak-minded fop with designs on Fanny.

Diddler (did'ler), Jeremy. A needy sponge in Kenney's farce "Raising the Wind": a type of the swindler. He does everything at other people's expense, particularly dining. He devours his friends' food and borrows their money with amusing nonchalance.

Diderot (dè-drô'), Denis. Born at Langres, Haute-Marne, France, Oct. 5, 1713; died at Paris, July 31, 1784. A celebrated French philosopher and writer. His father, a cutter by trade, gave him a classical education. After completing his studies in Paris, he spent two years in a law office, but devoted most of his time to Greek, Latin, mathematics, Italian, and English. Thereby he incurred his father's displeasure, and was cut off without a cent. He gave lessons in mathematics, and, when at the lowest ebb of fortune in 1743, married. His literary labors date from this same period. In 1743 he published "Histoire de la Grèce" (3 vols.), translated from Temple Stanyan; and in 1746-48 "Dictionnaire universel de médecine, de chimie, de botanique," etc. (6 vols.), translated with the aid of three collaborators from Robert James. This latter publication gave him the idea of the great work, in which he associated with himself the mathematician d'Alembert, "L'Encyclopédie," a repository of the results of scientific research in the middle of the 18th century. The publication was repeatedly checked in its progress, and was carried over more than twenty years (1751-72). To the twenty-eight volumes published within that period were joined six volumes of addenda (1776-77), and two volumes of tables (1780). Diderot received financial support from Catherine II. of Russia, who bought his valuable library but left him the use of it during his lifetime. He went to St. Petersburg in 1773-74, to return thanks to the "northern Seniramis." Among his works are "Pensées philosophiques" (1746), "Bijoux indiscrets" (1748), "Mémoire sur différents sujets de mathématiques" (1748), "Lettre sur les arénaux à des mathématiques" (1748), "L'histoire et le secret de la peinture au œuf" (1757), "Le fils naturel" (1757), "Le père de famille" (1758), "Entretien d'un père avec ses enfants" (1773), "Les deux amis de Bourbonne" (1773), "Voyage en Hollande," "Projet d'une université pour la Russie," "Le rêve de d'Alembert," "Jacques le fataliste," "La religieuse," "Le Neveu de Rameau," "Essai sur les régnes de Claude et de Néron" (1778 and 1782), etc. Diderot's art criticisms in the "Salons" (1763-69) are of superior merit, and his correspondence with Mademoiselle Volland affords the best available insight into the character of the writer as a man.

Diderot ranks in point of originality and versatility of thought among the most fertile thinkers of France, and in point of felicity and idiosyncrasy of expression among the most remarkable of her writers.

Sainsbury, French Lit., p. 481.

Didius Salvius Julianus (did'i-us sal'vi-us jō-li-ā-nus), Marcus, called later Marcus Didius Commodus Severus Julianus. Died at Rome, June 1, 193 A. D. Emperor of Rome March-June, 193. He served with distinction in the army, and twice held the consulship, the last time in 179.

On the murder of the emperor Pertinax by the pretorian guards in 193, the guards sold the imperial dignity to Didius, who had as his competitor Sulpitianus, the father-in-law of Pertinax. His elevation was not recognized by Septimius Severus, who marched with an army against Rome, whereupon the pretorian guards hastened to purchase the favor of Severus by putting the emperor to death.

Dido (dī'dō). [Gr. Διδώ.] A surname of the Phœnician goddess of the moon (Astarte), who was worshipped as the protecting deity of the citadel of Carthage. The goddess was in later time confounded with the Tyrian Elissa, founder of Carthage. See Elissa, Envid.

Dido, Queen of Carthage, The Tragedy of. A tragedy by Marlowe, published in 1594. Nashe is said to have finished it after Marlowe's death. Dido has been the subject of many plays in English and in French—notably by Jodelle in 1552, La Grange in 1576, Hardy in 1603, Soudry in 1636, and Franc de Pompiogon in 1734. Cristobal de Virnes, a Spanish poet of the 15th century, and Metastasio in Italian, also wrote tragedies on the subject. See Didone.

My own opinion is, that the play is in the main by Marlowe, and that Nashe's work lay chiefly in completing certain scenes which Marlowe had sketched in the rough.

Bullen, Intro. to Marlowe's Works, p. xlvi.

Dido building Carthage. A large painting by Turner, in the National Gallery, London. The scene is on a river-bank, with classical buildings in course of erection. Dido and her attendants are seen on the left.

Didone Abandonata (dè-dō'ne ä-bän-dō-nä-tä). [It., 'Dido Forsaken.'] A tragedy by Metastasio, produced in Naples in 1724; his first dramatic work. It had great success, and is probably the best modern play on the subject. It has been set to music by more than forty composers.

Didot (dè-dō'), Ambroise Firmin. Born at Paris, Dec. 7, 1790; died at Paris, Feb. 22, 1876. A French publisher, son of Firmin Didot. He published with his brother Hyacinthe many important works, including "Bibliothèque des auteurs grecs," "L'Univers pittoresque," "Nouvelle biographie générale," etc.

Didymus (did'i-mus). [Gr. Δίδυμος, the twin.] A surname of the apostle Thomas.

Didymus. Lived in the second half of the 1st century B. C. An Alexandrian grammarian and critic. He was a follower of the school of Aristarchus, and a contemporary of Cicero and the emperor Augustus. His works, consisting chiefly of compilations, covered a great variety of subjects, and were estimated by Seneca at four thousand; none of them is extant.

Didymus, surnamed "The Blind." Born 308,

309, or 314 A. D.; died 394, 395, or 399. An Alexandrian scholar and the ologian. He lost his sight in childhood, but nevertheless became one of the most learned men of his time. He was a teacher in the catechetical school of Alexandria upward of fifty years, and numbered among his pupils Jerome, Palladius, Ambrose of Alexandria, Evagrius, and Isidore of Pelusium. He opposed the Arians with great spirit, but supported Origen. His extant works include a treatise on the Trinity, translated into Latin by Jerome.

Dies Iræ (dī'èz i'rè). [L., 'day of wrath.'] A sequence appointed in the Roman missal to be sung between the Epistle and the Gospel in masses for the dead: named from its first words. It was written probably by Thomas de Celano, the friend of Saint Francis of Assisi, and is a hymn in triple rime stanzas. Its subject is the day of judgment. The transition from the terror of the day of wrath (dies iræ) to hope in salvation is used "as a natural preparation to the concluding prayer for eternal rest." Sir Walter Scott's translation in "The Lay of the Last Minstrel," beginning "O day of wrath, O dreadful day," is well known. There have been numerous versions and translations. The author of the old ecclesiastical melody to which it is sung is not known, but it was adapted to the words at the time they were written. It has been a popular subject with modern composers, notably Colonna, Bassani, Cherubini, Berlioz, Verdi, and Gounod in "Mors et Vita." It is also introduced with magnificent effect in Mozart's "Requiem." Grove.

This old Latin chant was accepted by the Roman Church as one of the sequentia of the requiem, before the year 1385. The original text is engraved upon a marble tablet in the Church of St. Francesco in Mantua. The present form of the chant is supposed to have been given by Felix Hämmerlin (in the early part of the 15th century), who omitted the former opening stanzas and added some others at the close. In this form it has appeared in the Catholic missals since the Council of Trent. The chant has been translated upwards of seventy times into German, and fifteen times into English. One of the closest versions, of the few in which the feminine rhymes are retained, is that of Gen. John A. Dix. Taylor, Notes to Faust.

Dieskau (dēs'kou), Ludwig August. Born in Saxony, 1701: died near Paris, Sept. 8, 1767. A German general in the French service. He became brigadier-general of infantry and commander of Brest in 1748, and in 1755 was sent to Canada with the rank of major-general to conduct the campaign against the English. With 1,200 Indians and Canadians and 200 regulars he undertook an expedition against Fort Edward in 1755. He was opposed by William Johnson, with 2,200 men, encamped on Lake George. Having ambushed and routed a detachment of 1,000 men under Colonel Ephraim Williams, he was himself totally defeated and captured in the ensuing attack on the British camp.

Dietrich von Bern (fon bern). In German legend, Theodor the Great, king of the East Goths, whose residence was at Verona (Bern). His life and adventures are the subject of the Old Norse Thidreks saga, "Saga Thidreks konungs at Bern," also called the Vilkina saga, whose material is from German sources, and is an element in various Middle High German poems, among them the "Nibelungenlied," "Biterolf," the "Rosengarten," and "Ermenrichs Tod." His birth and death are mysterious: he is descended from a spirit, and disappears, ultimately, on a black horse. His name is still preserved in popular legends. In the Lausitz the "Wild Huntsman," the mythical being who rides in furious haste across the heavens in violent storms, is called Dietrich von Bern. The name is also given to "Knecht Ruprecht." Many large buildings in different parts of Italy, among them the amphitheater in Verona and the Castle of St. Angelo in Rome, have been popularly ascribed to him.

It is an important fortified town and the emporium for Burgundy wines, and has considerable manufactures and a large trade in grain, etc. It contains a cathedral of St. Bénigne (see below), the churches of Notre Dame and of St. Michel, an old ducal palace (now the hôtel de ville, with an important museum), a palais de justice, and remnants of the castle and convent of Chartrouse. In early history it was a Roman camp, and it was burned by the Saracens in the 8th century. It had its counts and was the capital of Burgundy from the 12th century to 1477, when it passed to France. It was besieged by the Swiss in 1513, was occupied (after a struggle) by the Germans from Oct. 31 to Dec. 27, 1870, and was subsequently defended by Garibaldi against the Germans in Jan., 1871. The cathedral is of moderate size, but noteworthy for its excellent design and the beauty of its 13th-century tracery and ornament. The west front has a good porch and 2 low towers. Behind it are the ruins of a curious circular church of the Templars. Population (1891), 65,428.

Diksmuide. See Dixmude.

Dilettanti Society, The. A London society devoted to the encouragement of a taste for the fine arts, founded in 1734.

Dilke (dilk), Charles Wentworth. Born Dec. 8, 1789: died Aug. 10, 1864. An English journalist, editor of the London "Athenæum" (1830-1846), and of the "Daily News" (1846-49). He wrote much on the Letters of Junius.

Dilke, Sir Charles Wentworth. Born at London, Feb. 18, 1810: died at St. Petersburg, May 10, 1869. Son of C. W. Dilke; promoter of the exhibition of 1851, commissioner to the New York exhibition 1853, and one of the royal commissioners for the London exhibition 1862. He was made a baronet in 1862.

Dilke, Sir Charles Wentworth. Born at Chelsea, near London, Sept. 4, 1843. An English politician and author, son of Sir C. W. Dilke. He graduated at the head of the law tripos at Trinity Hall, Cambridge, in 1866; was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1866; was elected member of Parliament for the borough of Chelsea in 1868; was appointed under-secretary of state for foreign affairs in 1880; became president of the Local Government Board with a seat in the cabinet in 1882. He lost his seat in Parliament in 1886, but again became a member in 1892. He has published "Greater Britain: a Record of Travel in English-speaking Countries during 1866 and 1867" (1868), "Parliamentary Reform" (1879), "Present Condition of European Politics" (1887), "The British Army" (1888), "Problems of Greater Britain" (1890).

Dilman (dīl-män'). A town in the province of Azerbaijan, northwestern Persia, 73 miles west of Tabriz. Population, estimated, 6,000 (?).

Dilmun (dīl-mōn'). An ancient city situated on an island, or rather peninsula, in the Persian Gulf, now included in the lowlands of the coast. Sargon II., king of Assyria 722-705 B. C., relates on his monolith, found in Cyprus, that he received from Uperi, king of Dilmun, gifts and homage.

Diman (dī'män), Jeremiah Lewis. Born at Bristol, R. I., May 1, 1831: died at Providence, R. I., Feb. 3, 1881. An American historical writer and Congregational clergyman, professor of history at Brown University. He wrote "Theistic Argument" (1879), "Orations and Essays" (published 1882).

Dimanche (dē-mōnsh'), Monsieur. [F., 'Mr. Sunday.'] In Molière's "Don Juan" or "Le festin de Pierre," a tradesman who tries to collect money due him, but is never allowed to even ask for it, being constantly interrupted.

Dimetian Code (dī-mē'shi-an kōd). See extract on following page.

The custom [that the youngest child should have the dwelling-house when the property came to division] appears in Wates in what was probably its most primitive form. According to the laws of Hoel the Good, dating from the tenth century at latest, the inheritance was to be so divided that the homestead, with eight acres of land and the best implements of the household, should fall to the youngest son. The different editions of these laws are contained in the Dimetian Code for South Wales, and in the Venedotian Code for "Gwynedd" or the northern parts of the principality.

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 181.

Dimitri (dē-mē'trē), or Dmitri (dmē'trē). The Russian form of Demetrius (which see).

Dimitri Roudine (dē-mē'trē rō-dēn'). A novel by Turgenieff, published in 1855. It has been translated into French, German, and English. Dimitri is a cosmopolitan who affects to scorn Russian habits. He is the victim of his own error, and his disciples fall away from him.

Dimmesdale (dimz'-dāl), Arthur. A Puritan clergyman in Hawthorne's tale "The Scarlet Letter." He has a delicately sensitive nature, unable to bear the strain of the concealment of his sin with Hester Prynne, and equally unable to confess it and bear public obloquy.

The Puritan clergyman, revered as a saint by all his flock, conscious of a sin which, once revealed, will crush him to the earth, watched with a malignant purpose by the husband whom he has injured, unable to summon up the moral courage to tear off the veil and make the only atonement in his power, is undoubtedly a striking figure, powerfully conceived and most delicately described.

Leslie Stephen, Hours in a Library, p. 223.

Dimoch, or Dymoch, or Dymoek, or Dimocke (dim'ok). The name of a Lincolnshire family which has held since 1377 the feudal office of "champion of England."

Dimsdale (dimz'-dāl), Thomas. Born in Essex, England, May 6, 1712; died in Hertford, England, Dec. 30, 1800. An English physician, known chiefly as an advocate of inoculation for the smallpox. He took up the practice of medicine at Hertford, and in 1767 published "The Present Method of Inoculation for the Small Pox," which obtained for him in 1768 an invitation to St. Petersburg to inoculate the empress Catherine and the grand duke Paul.

Dinah (dī'nā). [Heb., 'judged' or 'avenged'.] The daughter of Jacob by Leah. See Gen. xxx., xxxiv.

Dinah, Aunt. In Sterne's "Tristram Shandy," the aunt of Walter Shandy, who occupies herself with schemes for spending the money she leaves him.

Dinah Morris. See Morris.

Dinajpur (dē-nāj-pōr'), or Dinagopore (dē-nāj-pōr'). 1. A district in the Rajshahi division, Bengal, British India, intersected by lat. 25° 30' N., long. 88° 30' E. Area, 4,118 square miles. Population (1881), 1,514,346.—2. The capital of the above district, situated in lat. 25° 37' N., long. 88° 32' E. Population (1881), 12,560.

Dinan (dē-noā'). A town in the department of Côtes-du-Nord, France, situated on the Rance 29 miles northwest of Rennes. It was defended against the English by Du Guesclin in 1359. Population (1891), commune, 10,444.

Dinant. In Fletcher and Massinger's "Little French Lawyer," a gentleman who formerly loved and still pretends to love Lamira.

Dinant (dē-noā' or dē-nānt'). A town in the province of Namur, Belgium, situated on the Mense 14 miles south of Namur. It is fortified, and was formerly noted for its copper and brass wares. It was sacked by the Burgundians in 1466, and by the French in 1554 and 1675. Population (1890), 7,048.

Dinapur (dē-nā-pōr'). A town in the district of Patna, Bengal, British India, situated on the Ganges 5 miles west of Patna. It is an important military station, and was the scene of the mutiny of the Sepoy regiments in July, 1857. Population, about 37,000.

Dinaric Alps (di-nar'ik alps). [Named from Dinara, the highest summit.] A name given to those mountain-ranges in Dalmatia, Bosnia, Herzegovina, and Croatia which are clearly a continuation of the main Alpine system.

Dinazade. The sister of Scheherazade in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments." She passes the night in the bridal chamber, and asks her sister daily, just before daybreak, to relate for the last time one of her "agreeable tales." See Scheherazade.

Dindigal (din-di-gal'), or Dindigul (din-digul'). A small town in Madras, British India, in lat. 10° 20' N., long. 77° 57' E.

Dinding Isles (din-ding' ilz). An administrative division of the British colony of Straits Settlements, situated on the western side of the Malay peninsula about lat. 4° 20' N.

Dindorf (din'dorf), Wilhelm. Born at Leipzig, Jan. 2, 1802; died at Leipzig, Aug. 1, 1883. A noted German classical philologist. He was one of the collaborators in the revision of Stephanus's "The sarius lingue Græcæ" (1831-65), and edited "Demosthenes" (1846-51), "Poetae scientiæ Græci" (1830), etc.

Dindymene (din-di-mē'nē). [Gr. Δινδυμήνη, of Dindymum.] Cybele. Also called "the Dindymenian mother."

Dindymum (din'di-mum). [Gr. Δίνδυμον.] In ancient geography, a mountain in Galatia, sacred to Cybele.

Dingelstedt (ding-el-stet), Franz von. Born at Halsdorf, Hesse, Germany, June 30, 1814; died at Vienna, May 15, 1881. A German poet, novelist, and theatrical director. His works include "Lieder eines kosmopolitischen Nachtwächters" (1841), "Nacht und Morgen" (1851), the tragedy "Das Haus des Barneveldt" (1850), the novels "Unter der Erde" (1840), "Die Amazone" (1868), etc.

Dingwall (ding'wāl). The capital of Ross-shire, situated on Cromarty Firth 11 miles northwest of Inverness. Population (1891), 2,283.

Dinias and Dercyllis (din'i-as and dēr-sil'is'). The chief characters of an old Greek novel entitled "Of the incredible Things in Thule."

The book called "Wonders beyond Thule" was written by one Antonius Diogenes, who probably lived in Syria in the 2nd century before Christ, though it was the opinion of Photius that the work was written soon after the death of Alexander the Great. It was current as late as the 9th century, when its twenty-four volumes were summarised by the Patriarch Photius, who compressed the works of nearly three hundred authors into one volume to beguile the tedium of a residence in Bagdad. Our knowledge of the novel is gained partly from this epitome and partly from the fragments which can be gathered from the later classical writings. The plot turns on the loves and adventures of a Syrian maiden and Dinias, a traveller from Arcadia, the story of whose lives was recorded in a manuscript which Alexander the Great was supposed to find in their tomb.

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 78.

Dinka (din'kā). A great Nigritic tribe dwelling on both sides of the White Nile between 6° and 12° north latitude. Their territory is a vast and fertile plain covering 60,000 square miles. They differ from the Shilluk and Nuer (with whom they largely interlive, but whom they hate) by their higher stature, prominent foreheads, and their black, almost bluish, complexion. They are intelligent, skilful in the making of household articles, and frugal. Like the Shilluk, they are both pastoral and agricultural. Each village is under a chief who has little authority and recognizes no suzerain. The Dinka language is said to be related to that of the Bari, and to have prefixes like the Bantu tongues.

Dinkard (dēn-kārd'). [Pahlavi: properly Dinō-kardō, the deeds or enactments of the religion.] The largest and most important Pahlavi work in existence, containing a vast amount of information regarding the legends, writings, doctrines, and customs of the Zoroastrian religion. In its present state much of the work consists of a descriptive catalogue of the contents of the original compilation, interspersed with extracts in detail. The date of its latest revision must have been subsequent to the Mohammedan conquest of Persia.

Dinkelsbühl (dink'els-bül). A small town in Middle Franconia, Bavaria, situated on the Würnitz 44 miles southwest of Nuremberg. It was formerly a free imperial city.

Dinmont (din'mont), Dandie (Andrew). A Border farmer in Sir Walter Scott's novel "Guy Mannering": the grateful friend of Brown, who had saved his life. Sent by Meg Merriels, he protects Brown in the Portanferry jail, and after their escape helps him, under the guidance of Meg, to capture Hatteraick. He is the owner of Mustard and Pepper, the progenitors of the Dandie Dinmont terriers.

According to Mr. Shortreed, this good man (Willie Elliot) of Millburnholm was the great original of Dandie Dinmont. As he seems to have been the first of these upland sheep farmers that Scott ever visited, there can be little doubt that he sat for some parts of that inimitable portraiture; and it is certain that the James Davidson who carried the name of Dandie to his grave with him, and whose thoroughbred dead-bred scene is told in the Notes to Guy Mannering, was first pointed out to Scott by Mr. Shortreed himself, several years after the novel had established the man's celebrity all over the Border; some accidental report about his terriers, and their odd names, having alone been turned to account in the original composition of the tale. But I have the best reason to believe that the kind and manly character of Dandie, the gentle and delicious one of his wife, and some at least of the most picturesque peculiarities of the ménage à quatre hopes, were filled up from Scott's observation, years after this period, of a family with one of whose members he had, through the best part of his life, a close and affectionate connexion. To these who were familiar with him, I have perhaps already sufficiently indicated the early home of his dear friend, William Laidlaw, among "the braes of Yarrow." Lockhart, Life of Scott, I. 117.

Dinocrates (di-nok'ra-tēz). [Gr. Δεινοκράτης.] The ablest of the architects of Alexander the Great. He planned the new city of Alexandria, and rebuilt the Artemisium of Ephesus after its destruction by fire. This architect appears under eight different names given by Brunn.

Dinorah (dē-nō'riā). The original Italian title of an opera by Meyerbeer, first produced at Paris as "Le pardon de Ploërmel," April 4, 1859.

Dinter (din'ter), Friedrich. Born at Borna, Saxony, Feb. 29, 1760; died at Königsberg, Prussia, May 29, 1831. A German writer on pedagogies, professor of theology at Königsberg from 1822. His chief work is the "Schul-Lehrerbibel" (1825-28).

Dinwiddie (din'wid-i), Robert. Born in Scotland about 1690; died at Clifton, England, Aug. 1, 1770. A British official, lieutenant-governor of Virginia 1752-58. Shortly after his appointment he transmitted a report to the Board of Trade, recommending the annexation of the Ohio Valley and the erection of forts to secure the western frontier against the French. In 1753 he despatched George Washington to the French forts on the Ohio and Allegheny to remonstrate with their commanders for taking possession of British territory, and was subsequently one of the most strenuous supporters of the old French and Indian war.

Diocles (dī'ō-klēz). [Gr. Διοκλῆς.] A Syracusan popular leader, the reputed (chief) author of a code of laws named for him.

Diocles Carystius ('of Carystus'). A celebrated Greek physician of the 4th century B. C., born at Carystus in Eubœa.

Diocletian (dī-ō-klē'shian) (Caius Aurelius Valerius Diocletianus; surnamed Jovius). Born at Dioclea (whence his name), Dalmatia, 245 A. D.; died near Salona, Dalmatia, 313. Emperor of Rome. He entered the army at an early age, and, although of obscure origin, rose to important commands under Probus, Aurelian, and Carus. On the death of Numerianus, joint emperor with Carinus, he was proclaimed emperor by the army at Chæcedon in 284, and advanced against Carinus who was killed by one of his own officers. In 286 he adopted Maximian as his colleague in the government. In 292 the joint emperors appointed Galerius and Constantius Chlorus as their associates. Diocletian and Maximian retained the title of Augusti, while Galerius and Constantius were demoted to Cesars. Each of the rulers was independent in the local administration of his province, but the three junior rulers acknowledged Diocletian as the head of the empire. The empire was divided among them as follows: Diocletian received Thrace, Egypt, Syria, and Asia, with Nicomedia as his capital; Maximian, Italy, Africa, Sicily, and the islands of the Tyrrhenian Sea, with Milan as his capital; Galerius, Illyricum and the countries of the Danube, with Sirmium as his capital; and Constantius, Britain, Gaul, and Spain, with Treves as his capital. Diocletian subdued a revolt in Egypt in 296; Constantius restored the allegiance of Britain in the same year; and Galerius forced the Persians to sue for peace in 297. In 303 Diocletian, persuaded, it is said, by the false accusations of Galerius, ordered a general persecution of the Christians throughout the empire. He abdicated in 305, compelling Maximian to do the same, and retired to Salona in Dalmatia, where he spent his remaining years in the cultivation of his gardens. Diocletian and Maximian were succeeded as Augusti by Galerius and Constantius, who in turn appointed Severus and Maximinus Cesars. Diocletian inaugurated . . . the period of the Partnership Emperors. Himself borne to power by something not very unlike a mutiny of the troops on the Persian frontier, he nevertheless represented and gave voice to the passionate longing of the world that the age of mutinies might cease. With this intention he remodelled the internal constitution of the state and moulded it into a bureaucracy so strong, so stable, so wisely organised, that it subsisted virtually the same for more than a thousand years, and by its endurance prolonged for many ages the duration of the Byzantine Empire.

Hodykin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 15.

Diocletian, Baths of. Baths in ancient Rome founded by Maximian at the junction of the Quirinal and Viminal hills, and dedicated 305-306 A. D. A plan was made by Palladio in the 16th century, but the remains, though scattered over an area a mile in circuit, are now very scanty, apart from the splendid tepidarium, now the Church of Sta. Maria degli Angeli, and one of the domical halls which occupied the angles, now the Church of San Bernardo.

Diodati (dē-ō-dā'tē), Domenico. Born at Naples, 1736; died at Naples, 1801. An Italian archaeologist. His works include "De Christo græce loquente exercitatio" (1767), etc.

Diodati, Giovanni. Born at Geneva, June 6, 1576; died at Geneva, Oct. 3, 1649. A Swiss Protestant theologian, professor of Hebrew and later of theology at Geneva. He translated the Bible into Italian (1607).

Diodorus (dī-ō-dō'rus), surnamed Siculus ('of Sicily'). [Gr. Διόδωρος.] Born at Agrigium, Sicily; lived in the second half of the 1st century B. C. A Greek historian, author of a history in 40 books entitled a "Historical Library" (Ἱστοριολογία). See the extract.

The historical library of Diodorus consisted of forty books, divided into three great sections. The first of these sections, containing the mythical period down to the taking of Troy (which he places with Apollodorus 408 years before the commencement of the Olympiads, i. e. in B. C. 1138), occupies the first six books. The second section, from the seventh to the eighteenth book, contains a chronological history from the taking of Troy to the death of Alexander the Great. The third period, occupying the twenty-three remaining books, carries the history down to the British expedition of Julius Cæsar. Of these forty books, we have only a portion complete, namely books 1-5, containing the history of the Egyptians, Assyrians, Ethiopians, and Greeks; and books 11-20, containing the period from the invasion of Xerxes down to the year B. C. 302. The rest of the work is either lost altogether, or represented only by a series of fragments and extracts, of which the most considerable refer to books 30-40. The following is a general analysis of the remains of Diodorus:—Book I. On Egypt; its mythology, geography, and history; its laws, literature, and customs; and the Greeks who have travelled in the country. II. The legendary history of Assyria from Ninus to Sardanapalus; the Medes, Chaldeans, Indians, Scythians, Hyperboreans, Arabians, with an account of the island of Ceylon. III. On the Ethiopians, and other nations of Libya. IV. The mythology of Greece. V. On the Greek islands, and the Phœnician settlements in the Mediterranean. He also treats of the islands of the Atlantic, and of Arabia and its seas. XI. From the invasion of Xerxes (Ol. 75, 1) down to the war of Cyprus (Ol. 82, 2), with contemporary notices of Sicily, Egypt, and Rome. XII. From the war of Cyprus (Ol. 82, 3) to that of Syracuse (Ol. 91, 1), with notices of Sybaris, of Charondas, and Zaleucus, and the Decemvirate at Rome. XIII. From the war between Syracuse and Athens (Ol. 91, 2) down to that between Syracuse and the Carthaginians (Ol. 93, 4). XIV. From the time of the thirty tyrants (Ol. 94, 1) to the taking of Rome by the Gauls (Ol. 98, 2). XV. From the war between Artaxerxes and Evagoras (Ol. 98, 3) to the accession of Philip (Ol. 105, 2). XVI. Reign of Philip of Macedonia. XVII. Reign of Alexander the Great. XVIII. Successors of Alexander down to the domination of Agathocles in Sicily (Ol. 115, 3). XIX. Events in Greece, Sicily, and Italy down to the battle of Himera (Ol. 117, 2). XX. From the war of Agathocles in Sicily (Ol. 117, 3) down to the coalition against Antigonus (Ol. 119, 3).

Diogenes (di-ōj'e-nōz). [Gr. Διογένης.] Born at Sinope, Asia Minor, about 412 B. C.: died at Corinth, 323. A Greek Cynic philosopher, famous for his eccentricities. He emigrated to Athens in his youth, became the pupil of Antisthenes, and lived, according to Seneca, in a tub. While on a voyage from Athens to Ægina, he was captured by pirates who exposed him for sale on the slave-market in Crete. When asked what business he understood, he replied, "How to command men," and requested to be sold to some one in need of a master. He was purchased by Xenides, a wealthy citizen of Corinth, who restored him to liberty, and in whose house he passed his old age. At Corinth he was, according to tradition, visited by Alexander the Great. Alexander inquired whether he could oblige him in any way. "Yes," replied Diogenes; "stand from between me and the sun."

Diogenes, Antonius. The author of the romance "Dinias and Dereyllis" (which see).

Diogenes Laertius (lā-er'shi-us). [The surname Λαίρτιος or Λαερτιεύς is probably from his birthplace (?) Laerte in Cilicia.] Lived probably about 200 A. D. A historian and biographer, author of lives of the Greek philosophers in 10 books, from the early schools to the Epicureans. His work is chiefly valued as containing information preserved nowhere else.

Diogenes of Apollonia. Born at Apollonia, Crete: lived in the 5th century B. C. A Greek natural philosopher, a pupil of Anaximenes.

Diomed (di-ō-med). See Diomedes.

Diomed. A chestnut thoroughbred horse, foaled in 1777, by Florizel, dam by Spectator, second dam by Blank, third dam by Childers. Florizel by Hero traces directly to Byerly Turk. Diomed won the first Derby in 1780, and died in 1807. He was the sire of Ducro, sire of American Eclipse, also the sire of Sir Archy, sire of Timoleon, sire of Boston, sire of Lexington.

Diomed, Villa of. See Pompeii.

Diomed Islands (di-ō-mēd i'landz). A group of small islands in Bering Strait.

Diomedes (di-ō-mēd'ēz). [Gr. Διομήδης.] 1. In Greek legend, a king of Argos, and one of the most famous of the Greek warriors at the siege of Troy. He was the son of Tydeus who fell in the expedition against Thebes. He went with Stenelus and Euryalus to Troy as the commander of a fleet of 80 ships carrying warriors from Argos, Tiryns, Hermione, Asine, Troezen, Eione, Epidaurus, Ægina, and Mases. He was, next to Achilles, the bravest of the Greeks before Troy, and fought with the most distinguished among the Trojans, including Hector and Æneas.

2. A legendary Thracian king, son of Ares.—3. In Shakspeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," an attendant of Cleopatra.—4. In Shakspeare's "Troilus and Cressida," a Grecian commander.

Dion (di'on). [Gr. Δίων.] Born at Syracuse, about 408 B. C.: assassinated at Syracuse, 354 or 353 B. C. A Syracusan philosopher, a disciple of Plato. He expelled Dionysius the Younger from Syracuse in 356, and became ruler of the city in 355.

Dion. 1. A Sicilian noble in Shakspeare's "Winter's Tale."—2. The father of Euphrasia in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Philaster."

Dion Cassius (kash'i-us), surnamed Cocceianus (from some person named Cocceius or Cocceianus, perhaps his grandfather). Born at Nicæa, Bithynia, about 155 A. D.: died at Nicæa, after 230. A celebrated historian of Rome. He was consul about 220 and 229, and wrote in Greek a history of Rome in 80 books. See the extract.

The great work of Dion Cassius was a history of Rome . . . from the foundation of the city to the year A. D. 229. Besides this, a number of works, now lost or incorporated in his history, are attributed to him by Suidas and others. The history consisted of eighty books, of which Books XXXVII.—LX. have come down to us complete or nearly so, the remainder of the work being represented by fragments of different kinds. In the 16th century, when the whole work was in existence, excerpts were made from it by the order of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, and in the 12th century Zonaras undertook an abridgment of the first 20 books, which, with those from the 36th book to the end, were then extant. The latter part of the work, from the 36th to the 80th book, had been abridged in the 11th century by a monk named Joannes Xiphilinus. There are detached fragments, more or less considerable, of the 35th and 36th books, referring to the campaign of Lucullus against Mithridates, and Pompey's war with the pirates. On the other hand, there are many gaps in the 37th, 55th, 56th, 57th, 58th, 59th, and 60th books. The work was continued down to the time of Constantine the Great by some Christian writer, who is supposed to have been Joannes Antiochenus.

Dion Chrysostomus (kri-sos'tō-mus). [Gr. Χρυσόστομος.] Born at Prusa, Bithynia, about 50 A. D.: died at Rome about 117. A Greek rhetorician and philosopher. His 80 extant orations were edited by Reiske 1784.

Dione (di-ō'nē). [Gr. Διώνη.] 1. In Greek mythology, a female Titan, daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and mother by Zeus of Aphrodite.—2. A pastoral tragedy by John Gay, published in 1720.—3. The fourth satellite of Saturn, discovered by Cassini, March, 1684.

Dionysia (di-ō-nis'i-ä). [Gr. Διονύσια.] Ancient Greek festivals in honor of Dionysus. Of these, those of Athens were the most important, and are generally held to have been four in number: the Lesser or Rural Dionysia, the Lenaæ, the Anthesteria, and the Greater or City Dionysia. It now seems proved, however, that the Lenaæ and the Anthesteria were, in historic times at least, identical, and merely interchangeable names for the festival which centered about the Lenaæum, or sanctuary of Dionysus in the Marshes, whose shrine was opened on only one day in the year. The date of this festival was from the 11th to the 13th of Anthesterion (about March 2-4). The Lesser Dionysia were a wine-feast of very early origin, held throughout the Attic demes between the 8th and 11th of Posideion (about Dec. 19-22), accompanied by drinking, boisterous processions, and dramatic performances, of which those at the Piræus had the chief reputation. The Greater Dionysia were celebrated in Athens, probably from the 9th to the 13th of Elaphebolion (about March 28-April 2). On the first day there was a grand procession and a feast, besides a choral dance around the Altar of the Twelve Gods in the Agora; on the second day were held lyrical contests between choruses of boys and men; and on the last three days dramatic contests in the Dionysiac theater.

Dionysius (di-ō-nish'i-us), surnamed "The Elder." [Gr. Διονύσιος, from Διώνωσος, Dionysus: the name has become Denis (which see).] Born about 430 B. C.: died at Syracuse, 367. Tyrant of Syracuse. He contrived in 405 to have himself appointed sole general of the forces of the republic in the war against Carthage, whereupon he surrounded himself with a strong body-guard of mercenaries and usurped the government. He strengthened his position by marrying the daughter of the deceased party leader Hermocrates, and concluded peace with Carthage in 404. He declared war against Carthage in 397, and was besieged in 396 in Syracuse by the Carthaginians, who were compelled by pestilence and a successful sally of the Syracusans to raise the siege after an investment of eleven months. He concluded an advantageous peace in 392. He captured Rhegium in 387, and Croton in 379, which gave him a commanding influence among the Italian Greeks. His power and influence are said to have exceeded those of any other Greek before Alexander the Great. He encouraged letters, invited Plato to his court, and himself gained the chief prize at the Lenaæ with a play entitled "The Ransom of Hector."

Dionysius, surnamed "The Younger." Born about 395 B. C.: died at Corinth (?) after 343. Tyrant of Syracuse, a relative of Dion, and son of Dionysius the Elder whom he succeeded in 367. He was expelled in 356, restored in 346, and finally expelled in 343.

Dionysius, Saint. Born at Alexandria in the last part of the 2d century A. D.: died at Alexandria, 265. A theologian, called "the Great," bishop of Alexandria about 247. He was converted by Origen. Only fragments of his works remain.

Dionysius, Pg. Diniz. Born at Lisbon, Oct. 9, 1261: died at Santarem, Portugal, Jan. 7, 1325. King of Portugal 1279-1325. He founded the University of Coimbra.

Dionysius Exiguus (eks-ig'ū-us). [L., "the Little."] Born in Scythia: lived in the 6th century A. D. A monk and scholar of the Western Church who, in his "Cycelus paschalis," introduced the annunciation of the birth of Christ as the starting-point of modern chronology, thus establishing the Christian or Dionysian era. He placed the birth of Christ from three to six years too late.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus. Born at Halicarnassus, Caria: died at Rome about 7 B. C. A Greek rhetorician and historian, author of a history of Rome (Archæologia).

Dionysius of Halicarnassus (25 B. C.), in his Archæologia, i. e. Early History of Rome to 264 B. C., aimed at writing an Introduction to Polybius. He maintains, on fanciful grounds, that the Romans, who deserve to rule the world, are no "barbarians," but of Greek descent. We have Books I.—X., going down to 450 B. C., and fragments of Book XI. He did a better work in his rhetorical writings, and above all in his excellent essays on the Greek orators. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 148.

Dionysius Periegetes (per'i-ē-jō'tēz). [Gr. Περιηγητής, a guide, eicereone, or showman: so named from the title of his book. See the def.] Lived about the 4th (1st?) century A. D. The author of a geographical poem, "Periegesis" (Gr. Περιήγησις τῆς γῆς, a geographical description of the earth).

Dionysius the Areopagite. An Athenian, a member of the Areopagus, converted by St. Paul about 50 A. D. He was the reputed author of several Greek treatises ("The Celestial Hierarchy," "The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy," "Concerning the Names of God," "Of Mystical Theology," "Epistles" and a Liturgy) which appeared in the 6th century and were probably written in the 5th. They have been the subject of much theological and critical discussion.

Dionysus (di-ō-ni'sus). [Gr. Διώνυσος or Διώνυσος.] In Greek mythology, the god of wine. He was, according to the common tradition, the son of Zeus and Semele, the daughter of Cadmus of Thebes. Hera, jealous of the attention which Zeus bestowed on Semele, persuaded her in the guise of a friendly old woman to request him to approach her in the same majesty in which he approached his wife. Zeus appeared in thunder and lightning, with the result that Semele in her fright gave birth to Dionysus, whom Zeus rescued from the flames and sewed up in his thigh until he came to maturity. He was brought up by Ino and Athamas at Orchomenos; spent many years in wandering about the earth, introducing the cultivation of the vine; and eventually rose into Olympus. He was also called, both by the Greeks and the Romans, Bacchus, i. e. the riotous god, which was originally a surname of Dionysus.

Dionyza (di-ō-ni'zä). In Shakspeare's "Pericles," the wife of Cleon, governor of Tharsus. She attempts the murder of Marina, and with her husband is burned to death in revenge.

Diophantus (di-ō-fan'tus). [Gr. Διόφαντος.] Lived at Alexandria, probably in the 4th century A. D. A Greek mathematician, reputed inventor of algebra. His chief work is "Arithmetica" (edited by Fermat, 1670).

Dioscorides (di'os-kor'i-dēz), Pedacius (pe-dä'shi-us) or Pedanius (pe-dä'ni-us). [Gr. Διοσκορίδης, surnamed Πεδάκιος or Ηεδάκιος.] Born probably at Anazarba, Cilicia: lived in the 1st or 2d century A. D. A Greek physician, author of a treatise on materia medica.

Dioscuri (di-os-kū'ri). [Gr. Δίδασκουροι.] Castor and Pollux, according to Greek legends the sons of Leda and Zeus, or of Leda and Tyndareus (whence their patronymic Tyndaridae), and brothers of Helen. See Castor and Pollux.

Dioscurus (di-os-kū'rus). Died at Gangra, Paphlagonia, 451. Bishop of Alexandria 444-451. Having sided with the heretic Eutyches against Flavian, bishop of Constantinople, he convoked a synod at Ephesus in 449, which sustained the former and condemned the latter. This synod, over which he presided, was conducted with so much violence that it was stigmatized as the "Robber Synod." He was condemned and deposed by the Ecumenical Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Diospolis (di-os'pō-lis). [Gr. Διόσπολις, city of Zeus.] See Lydda.

Diospolis. Thebes in Egypt: hence, Diospolite dynasty, a Theban dynasty. See Thebes.

Diotima (di-ō-ti'mä). [Gr. Διοτίμα.] A priestess of Mantinea, the reputed teacher of Socrates, mentioned in Plato's "Symposium." She is probably fictitious.

Diphda (dif'dä). [Ar. difda' al-thāni, the second frog, the star Fomalhaut being the first.] An often used name for the star β Ceti. Also called Deneb Karlos.

Diphilus (dif'i-lus). [Gr. Δίφιλος.] Born at Sinope. One of the chief Athenian poets of the New Comedy, a contemporary of Menander. He is said to have exhibited a hundred plays. Fragments of his works are extant.

Diplomacy. A play adapted by Bolton and Savile Rowe from Sardou's "Dora," produced in 1878.

Dippel (dip'pel), Johann Konrad. Born at Frankenstein, near Darmstadt, Germany, Aug. 10, 1673: died at Berleburg, Prussia, April 25, 1734. A German mystic and alchemist. He invented Dippel's animal oil, and discovered Prussian blue.

Dipsodes (dip'sōdz), The. [Gr. διψώδης, thirsty.] A people in Rabelais's "Gargantua and Pantagruel." They were ruled by King Anarehe, and many of them were giants. Pantagruel subdued them.

Dipylon Gate (dip'i-lon gāt), The. [Gr. διπύλων, double-gated.] The chief gateway of ancient Athens, traversing the walls on the north-west side. As its name indicates, it was in fact a double gate, consisting of a strongly fortified rectangular court between an outer and an inner portal. Each portal also was double, having two doors, each 114 feet wide, separated by a central pier. The foundations of this gate, alone among those of ancient Athens, survive in great part, and from it toward the southwest extends a beautiful stretch of the original wall of Themistocles, built under Peloponnesian menace after the Greek victories over the Persians in 480 and 479 B. C. This wall, in its contrasted construction of admirably fitted blocks and rough stones, confirms literary witness to the haste of work spurred on by emergency. The Dipylon is identical with the Sacred Gate, and among the roads diverging from it is the Sacred Way to Eleusis. It was long held that an opening in the wall immediately southwest of the Dipylon was the Sacred Gate, but Dörpfeld has shown that this was a passage for the stream which he identifies as the Eridanus.

Diræ (dī'rē). The Furies. See Furiæ.

Dirce (dār'sē). [Gr. Δίρκη.] In Greek mythology, the second wife of Lycus, put to death by Amphion and Zethus, sons of Antiope, in revenge for her ill treatment of their mother. See Antiope. She was bound to the horns of a bull and dragged to death. Her execution is represented in the famous group "Farnese Bull" (which see). Her body was changed by Dionysus into a well on Mount Cithæron.

Directory, The. The body of five men who held the executive power in France from Nov. 1, 1795, to the coup d'état of 1799 (18th Brumaire, Nov. 9). It succeeded the Convention. During this period occurred the campaigns of Napoleon in Italy and Egypt, and other campaigns in Germany, etc.; French influence became powerful in Italy and Switzerland; the treaty of Campo-Formio was concluded with Austria; and France was nearly embroiled in a war with the United States. The personnel of the Directory was modified by a coup d'état, 18th Fructidor (Sept. 4, 1797, in which the republicans triumphed over the reactionaries. Toward the close of the period the Directory became discredited by defeats in Italy, and was overthrown by Napoleon and succeeded by the Consulate. See Brumaire.

Dirschau (dēr'shou), Pol. Szczewo (shehev'ō). A town in the province of West Prussia, Prussia, situated on the Vistula 19 miles southeast of Dantzie. It has a notable lattice-work iron bridge. Population (1890), 11,541.

Disco Bay. A bay on the west coast of Greenland, southeast of Disco Island.

Discobolus (dis-kob'ō-lus). [Gr. δισκοβόλος, thrower of the discus.] An antique copy, in the Vatican, Rome, of a famous statue by Myron. The body is bent forward and turned toward the right as the heavy discus is swung back, wonderful art being shown in the choice and expression of the moment of repose when, the backward motion completed, the powerful cast forward is on the point of execution.

Discordia (dis-kōr'di-ā). In Roman mythology, the goddess of dissension, corresponding to the Greek Eris.

Discours de la méthode. See Descartes.

Discovery, The. 1. A small ship which, under command of Captain George Waymouth, was sent out by the East India Company to "find the passage best to lye towards the parts or kingdom of Cataya or China, or the backe side of America." She sailed with the Godspeed from the Thames May 2, 1602, intending to make the coast of Greenland; but the voyage had no important result, though Waymouth probably paved the way for Hudson's discovery. In April, 1610, the latter sailed in the Discovery, and entered the strait which bears his name in June. Early in August he entered Hudson Bay. He spent three months in exploring it, and in November the vessel was frozen in. In June of the following year she was released, and shortly after a mutiny occurred. Hudson and others were set adrift, and were never again seen. The Discovery was taken home by the mutineers, and two years after this she was again sent to the Northwest with the Resolution under command of Sir Thomas Button. He discovered Nelson's River, which he called Port Nelson, and several points. In 1615 the Discovery set out with William Baffin and Robert Bylot, and again in 1616. In both these voyages many important discoveries and explorations were made. See Hudson, Henry.

Divide, Continental. The elevated ridge or water-parting in the Rocky Mountain region of the United States which separates the streams tributary to the Pacific Ocean from those tributary to the Atlantic; in a more restricted sense, a portion of the main divide, in the Yellowstone National Park, where it has about its narrowest crest.

Divina Commedia (dē-vē'nā kom-mā'dē-ā). ['Divine Comedy,'] A celebrated epic poem by Dante, in 3 parts—Inferno (Hell), Purgatorio (Purgatory), Paradiso (Paradise)—written during the period 1300-18. It has been translated into English by Cary, Longfellow, Norton, and others. Dante called it a comedy only because the ending was not tragical, and the epithet divine was given to it in admiration.

And so the spiritual sense of these works [the "Vita Nuova" and "Convito"] proceeds by definite steps upward to the higher mysteries of the "Divina Commedia." Here, after the early days of faith and love, and when, after the first passage of emotions of youth to the intellectual enjoyments of maturer years, enthusiasm also for philosophy has passed away, Dante, or the Soul of Man represented in his person, passes through worldly life (the wood of the first canto of the "Divine Comedy") into sin, and, through God's grace, to a vision of his misery—to the "Hell." But by repentance and penance—"Purgatory"—the marks of the seven deadly sins are effaced from his forehead, and the bright vision of Beatrice, Heavenly Love, whose handmaids are the seven virtues, admonishes him as he attains to "Paradise." There Beatrice the Beatifier, Love that brings the Blessing, is his guide to the end of the soul's course, the glory of the very presence of the Godhead, where a love that is almighty rules the universe.

Mortley, English Writers, III, 404.

Divine Doctor, The. [L. doctor divinus.] A surname of Ruysbroeck.

Divine Tragedy, The. A poem by Longfellow, published in 1871.

Dixie (dik'si). A popular name of the Southern States of the American Union. See Dirie's Land.

Dixie's Land. Said to have been originally a negro name for New York or Manhattan Island, later applied to the South. The phrase originated in New York early in the 19th century; it developed into a song, or rather into many songs, the refrain usually containing the word "Dixie" or "Dixie's Land." In the South Dixie is regarded as meaning the Southern States, the word being supposed to be derived from "Mason and Dixon's line," which formerly divided the free and slave States. It is said to have first come into use there when Texas joined the Union, and the negroes sang of it as "Dixie."

In the popular mythology of New York City, Dixie was the Negro's paradise on earth in times when slavery and the slave-trade were flourishing in that quarter. Dixie owned a tract of land on Manhattan Island, and also a large number of slaves; and his slaves increasing faster than his land, an emigration ensued, such as has taken place in Virginia and other States. Naturally, the Negroes who left it for distant parts looked to it as a place of unalloyed happiness, and it was the "old Virginny" of the Negroes of that day. Hence Dixie became synonymous with an ideal locality combining ineffable happiness and every imaginable requisite of earthly beatitude.

Bryant, Songs from Dixie's Land, note.

Dixmude (dē-müd'). Flem. Diksmuide. A small town in the province of West Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Yser 20 miles southwest of Bruges.

Doge's Palace. The palace of the doges of Venice. The present building was begun by Marino Faliero in 1354, but only the south and west façades retain their characteristic pointed architecture. The basement is a noble and massive arcade with cylindrical columns; above this is another arcade, with twice the number of columns, and graceful, sharp-cusped arches with a range of quatrefoils above them. The upper part of the building is a square mass, with later enriched balconies in the middle of each façade, broad pointed windows irregularly placed, a line of small circles above, and flamed battlements. The superstructure is in itself too heavy, but is rendered effective by the color of its diaper-work of pink and white marble. The allegorical and biblical sculptures of the capitals of the lower arcade and of the three angles of the palace are famous. The great entrance, the Porta della Carta, the court, and the Giants' Staircase with its colossal figures of Mars and Neptune are excellent works of the Renaissance. The halls of the interior are adorned with the masterpieces of Tintoret, Titian, Paolo Veronese, and other great Venetians.

Domfront (dôm-frôn'). A town in the department of Orne, France, situated on the Varenne 20 miles north of Mayenne. It has a ruined castle, and was long one of the chief Norman strongholds. It was captured by William the Conqueror in 1048, and was often besieged in the English and religious wars. Population (1891), commune, 4,932.

Domingue (do-man'g'), Michel. A Haitian general and politician, of African race. He became president of the republic in June, 1874, and, after a period of almost unequalled anarchy and tyranny directed against the mulatto party was forced to resign in 1875.

Dominic (dom'i-nik), Saint; called de Guzman. Born at Calahorra, Old Castile, Spain, 1170; died at Bologna, Italy, Aug. 6, 1221. The founder of the order of the Dominicans. He studied at the University of Palencia, and in 1194 became a canon of the cathedral at Osma. In 1204 he removed to Languedoc, where he preached with much vehemence against the Albigenses and founded the order of the Dominicans, which received the papal confirmation in 1216. He was subsequently appointed magister sacri palatii at Rome.

Dominica (dom-i-nê'kâ), F. La Dominique (dom-ê-nek'). An island in the Lesser Antilles, West Indies, belonging to Great Britain. It is situated north of Martinique and south of Guadeloupe, and is intersected by lat. 15° 30' N., long. 61° 25' W. Capital, Rosenu. The island, which is of volcanic origin, was discovered by Columbus in 1493; was ceded by France to England in 1763; but was occupied by France 1778-83 and later. It forms part of the colony of the Leeward Islands. Its chief product is sugar. Length, 29 miles. Breadth, 16 miles. Area, 291 square miles. Population (1891), 26,841.

Dominican Republic, often, but incorrectly, called Santo Domingo or San Domingo. [Sp. República Dominicana.] A republic occupying the eastern and larger part of the island of Santo Domingo, or Haiti, in the West Indies. It is broken by several mountain-chains, and in the interior there are elevated plains (especially the Vega Real) of great fertility and beauty. The majority of the inhabitants are of mixed Spanish, Indian, and negro blood, with some of pure African descent, and comparatively few whites. Spanish is the common language, though French and English are spoken in the coast towns. Roman Catholicism is the state religion, but other cults are tolerated. Agriculture, cattle raising, and timber-cutting are almost the only industries. The principal exports are sugar, coffee, tobacco, hides, and cabinet woods. The republic was formed in 1844, after a revolution by which it was separated from Haiti. From 1861 to 1865 it was held by Spain. In 1869 the president (Baez) signed with President Grant a treaty of annexation with the United States, which the Senate at Washington refused to ratify. There have been various wars with Haiti, political revolutions, and changes of the constitution. By the present amended constitution (adopted 1887) the president is elected for four years by universal suffrage, and there is a national congress of 22 members elected by restricted suffrage. Capital, Santo Domingo. Area (claimed), 18,045 square miles. Population (estimated, 1893), 417,000.

Dominie Sampson. See Sampson.

Domini (dom'ê-nês), Marco Antonio de. Born in the island of Arbe, Dalmatia, 1566; died at Rome, Sept., 1624. An Italian theologian and natural philosopher. He wrote "De republica ecclesiastica" (1617), "De radiis visus et lucis in vitris perspectivis et iride" (1611), etc.

Domino Noir (do-mê-nô' nwâr), Le. [F. 'The Black Domino.'] A comic opera by Auber, words by Scribe, first produced in Paris in 1837.

Domitian (dô-mish'ian) (Titus Flavius Domitianus Augustus). Born at Rome, Oct. 24, 51 A. D.; died at Rome, Sept. 18, 96. Roman emperor 81-96: the second son of Vespasian and Flavia Domitilla, and the brother of Titus whom he succeeded. He undertook a campaign against the Chatti in 83, in the course of which he began the construction of a boundary wall between the Danube and the Rhine. This wall was guarded by soldiers settled upon public lands (agri decumates) along its course. He carried on unsuccessful wars against the Dacians under Decebalus 86-90, when he purchased peace by the promise of a yearly tribute. He recalled Agricola, whose victories in Britain, 78-84, aroused his jealousy. The last years of his reign were sullied by cruelty and tyranny. He was murdered by the freedman Stephanus, at the instance of the empress Domitia and several officers of the court, who were in fear of their lives.

Domitilla. In Shirley's play "The Royal Master," a girl of fifteen years who, in an innocent delusion, fixes her love upon the king, mistaking his promise to provide her with a husband for a proof of personal affection.

Domitilla (dom-i-til'ä), Flavia. 1. The first wife of Vespasian. She had three children, Titus, Domitian, and Domitilla.—2. Wife or niece of the consul Flavius Clemens, said to have been banished to Paudataria by Domitian. She is regarded as a saint in the Roman Catholic Church.

Domleschg (dôm'leshk). A valley along the lower part of the Hinterrhein, in the canton of Grisons, Switzerland, south of Coire.

Domo d'Ossola (dô'mô dos'sô-lä). A town in the province of Novara, Italy, situated on the Toce at the Italian end of the Simplon Pass, near the Swiss frontier. Population, about 3,000.

Domrémy-la-Pucelle (dôm-râ-mê'lâ-pü-sel'), or Domrémy. A village in the department of Vosges, France, situated on the Meuse 29 miles southwest of Nancy. It is celebrated as the birthplace of Joan of Arc.

Don (don). The name of several rivers, the chief of which are: (a) A river of Russia which rises in the government of Tula and flows into the Sea of Azoff in lat. 47° 15' N., long. 39° 20' E.; the ancient Tanais. Its chief tributary is the Donetz. Length, about 1,100 miles; navigable for about 700 miles. (b) A river in the West Riding of Yorkshire, England, which joins the Ouse 18 miles south of York. Length, 55 miles; navigable to Sheffield (39 miles). (c) A river of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, which flows into the North Sea 1½ miles north of Aberdeen. Length, about 80 miles.

Donaghadee (don'â-êhâ-dê'). A seaport in County Down, Ireland, situated on the North Channel 16 miles northeast of Belfast.

Donalbain (don'al-bân). In Shakspeare's "Macbeth," son of Duncan, king of Scotland.

Donaldson (don'ald-son), James. Born at Aberdeen, Scotland, April 26, 1831. A Scottish Hellenist. He became principal of the united colleges of St. Salvator and St. Leonard in the University of St. Andrews in 1886, and in 1890 principal of the university. He has edited, in conjunction with Alexander Roberts, Ante-Nicene Christian Library (1867-72), and is the "The author of "Critical History of Christian Literature and Doctrine from the Death of the Apostles to the Nicene Council" (1864-66).

Donaldson, John William. Born at London, June 7, 1811; died at London, Feb. 10, 1861. An English classical philologist and biblical critic. His works include "New Cratylus" (1839), "Varronianus" (1844), "Jashar" (1854).

Donaldson, Thomas Leverton. Born at London, Oct. 19, 1795; died there, Aug. 1, 1885. An English architect and author. He was professor of architecture in University College, London, 1841-65, and emeritus professor from 1865 until his death. His works include "Pompeii" (1827), and "A Collection of the Most Approved Examples of Doorways from Ancient Buildings in Greece and Italy" (1833).

Donar (dô'nâr). The German form of Thor.

Donash ben Labrath (dô-nâsh' ben lâb-râth'). A Jewish grammarian and poet of the 10th century, native of Bagdad. He lived and wrote in Fez, and was an opponent of Menachem ben Saruk; both of them may be considered as among the earliest scientific Hebrew grammarians. Donash was the first to apply the Arabic meter to Hebrew verse.

Donatello (don-â-te'l'ô) (properly Donato di Niccolò di Betto Bardi). Born at Florence about 1386; died at Florence, Dec. 13, 1466.

A Florentine sculptor, one of the leading restorers of sculpture in Italy. His work may be divided into three periods: (a) That of realism (1410-24). The statues of the Campanile at Florence (including the famous Zuccone and Poggio), the St. John of the National Museum, and the bust of Niccolò da Uzzano, characterize this period. (b) That (1425-33) marked by the partnership with the sculptor-architect Michelozzo, with whose assistance he made the mausoleum of Pope John XXIII. in the baptistry at Florence, that of Cardinal Brancacci at Naples, and that of Bartolommeo Amegazzi in the Duomo at Montepulciano, and the bas-reliefs of the pulpit at Prato. (c) That (1433-66) in which the influence of antiquity became prominently manifested, as shown in the David and the Cupid in bronze at the National Museum in Florence, and numerous other productions. He may be considered as the precursor of Michelangelo.

Donatello. A character in Hawthorne's "Marble Faun," a young Tuscan count whose likeness to the statue of the faun by Praxiteles gives the title to the book. He is rumored to be a descendant of an ancient faun, and is described in the opening of the tale as possessed only of the happy, spontaneous life of such creatures. He impulsively commits murder for the sake of Miriam whom he loves, and is awakened to the higher responsibilities and life of man by his remorse and his passion.

Donati (dô-nâ'tê), Giovanni Battista. Born at Pisa, Italy, Dec. 16, 1826; died at Florence, Sept. 19, 1873. A noted Italian astronomer. He discovered the comet named for him, June 2, 1858.

Donation of Constantine. A medieval forgery, of unknown date and origin, which pretends to be an imperial edict issued by Constantine the Great in 324 conferring the sovereignty of Italy and the West on the papal see. It was probably composed about the middle of the 8th century. "It tells how Constantine the Great, cured of his leprosy by the prayers of Sylvester, resolved, on the fourth day from his baptism, to forsake the ancient seat for a new capital on the Bosphorus, lest the confinement of the secular government should cramp the freedom of the spiritual, and how he bestowed therewith upon the Pope and his successors the sovereignty over Italy and the countries of the West. But this is not all, although this is what historians, in admiration of its splendid audacity, have chiefly dwelt upon. The edict proceeds to grant to the Roman pontiff and his clergy a series of dignities and privileges, all of them enjoyed by the Emperor and his senate, all of them shewing the same desire to make the pontifical a copy of the imperial office. The Pope is to inhabit the Lateran palace, to wear the diadem, the collar, the purple cloak, to carry the sceptre, and to be attended by a body of chamberlains. Similarly his clergy are to ride on white horses, and receive the honours and immunities of the senate and patricians." Bryce, Holy Roman Empire.

Donatists (don'â-tists). [From Donatus the Great.] An early Christian sect in Africa which originated in a dispute over the election of Cæcilian to the see of Carthage, A. D. 311, occasioned by his opposition to the extreme reverence paid to relics of martyrs and to the sufferers for the Christian faith called confessors, and by the rivalry of Secundus, primate of Numidia. Secundus and the Numidian bishops declared Cæcilian's consecration invalid because conferred by Felix of Aptunga, whom they charged with being a traitor. They excommunicated Cæcilian and his party, and made one Majorinus bishop in opposition. The name Donatist came either from Donatus of Casa Nigra, who headed the party of Majorinus at the Lateran Council in 313, where it was condemned, or (more probably) from Donatus the Great, who succeeded Majorinus in 315, and under whom the schism became fixed. Repressed under Constantine, the Donatists revived under the favor of Julian the Apostate. Repressive measures, provoked by their frequent acts of fanatical violence, were resorted to from time to time. These measures, internal schisms, the conciliatory conduct of the orthodox clergy at a conference held at Carthage in 411, and the arguments of St. Augustine caused many to abandon Donatism, and the sect became insignificant, though not entirely extinct till the 7th century. The Donatist party held that it constituted the whole and only true church, and that the baptism and ordinations of the orthodox clergy were invalid, because they were in communion with traitors. They therefore rebaptized and reordained converts from Catholicism.

Donatus (dô-nâ'tus). Bishop of Casa Nigra during the Diocletian persecution, and leader of a party which courted martyrdom with fanatical enthusiasm, and regarded with horror the "traitors," or those who to escape their persecutors delivered up to them the sacred books. This division was the starting-point of the Donatist schism, though the party was named from Donatus the Great.

Donatus, surnamed "The Great." Bishop of Carthage 315, elected by the rigorists or opponents of the moderate party or "traitors" (see Donatists) to succeed Majorinus who had been elected by them in opposition to Cæcilian, elected by the moderates and deposed by the rigorists in a council assembled at Carthage. It was for this Donatus that the Donatist party was named.

Donatus, Ælius. Lived in the middle of the 4th century A. D. A Roman grammarian and rhetorician. Of his works we possess a Latin grammar,

"Ars grammatica," a commentary on Terence, and the preface and introduction (with other fragments) of a commentary on Vergil.

The only block-book without pictures of which we have any knowledge is the Donatus (the full title of the book is Donatus de octibus partibus orationis, or Donatus on the Eight Parts of Speech. It is sometimes designated as Donatus pro puerilis, "Donatus for Little Boys' Latin Grammar. It received its name from its author, Ælius Donatus, a Roman grammarian of the fourth century, and one of the instructors of St. Jerome. The block-book is but an abridgment of the old grammar: as it was usually printed in the form of a thin quarto, it could with propriety be classified among primers rather than with books. When printed in the largest letters, it occupied but thirty-four pages; when letters of small size were used, it was compressed within nine pages.

De Vinne, Invention of Printing, p. 254.

Donau (dō'nou). The German name of the Danube (which see).

Donaueschingen (dō'nou-esh'ing-en). A small town in the Black Forest, in Baden, 30 miles east of Freiburg, situated at the union of the Brigach and Brege. It contains the palace of the Prince of Fürstenberg.

Donaumoos (dō'nou-mōs). A marshy district in Bavaria, lying south of the Danube, near Ingolstadt. Formerly called Schrobenheimer Moos.

Donauwörth (dō'nou-vért). A small town in Swabia and Neuburg, Bavaria, situated at the junction of the Würnitz and Danube, 25 miles north of Augsburg. It was formerly an imperial city; was outlawed in 1607; was taken by Gustavus Adolphus in 1632, and by Ferdinand II. in 1634; and was incorporated with Bavaria in 1714. Here, Oct. 6, 1805, the French under Soult defeated the Austrians under Mack. The battle-field of Blenheim is in the vicinity.

Don Benito (dōn bā-nē'to). A town in the province of Badajoz, Spain, in lat. 38° 55' N., long. 5° 52' W. Population (1887), 16,287.

Don Carlos (don kār'los). 1. A tragedy by Otway, produced in 1676. The story is taken from the Abbé de St. Real, and the plot is simpler than in Schiller's play.

I think we should be justified in calling "Don Carlos" the best English tragedy in rhyme; by one leap the young Oxonian sprang ahead of the veteran Dryden, who thereupon began to "weary of his long-loved mistress, rhyme." Gosse.

2. A play by Schiller, completed in 1787.—3. An opera by Costa, words by Tarantini, produced in London June 20, 1844.—4. An opera by Verdi, words by Méry and Du Loë, first produced at Paris March 11, 1867.

Doncaster (dong'kas-tēr). [AS. Donecester, Doneceaster*, from L. Danum and AS. eaester, city.] A town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, England, situated on the Don: the ancient Danum, and the Saxon Donecester (whence the modern name). It is the scene of the St. Leger and other races (in September). Population (1891), 25,936.

Don César de Bazan (dōn sã-zãr' dẽ bã-zõn'). 1. A French comedy by Dumanoir and Denery, from an episode in Victor Hugo's play "Ruy Blas," produced in 1844. The comedy is also played in English. Don César is the ruined Count of Garrofa: he assumes the name of Zafari, and retains in his rags his frank, gay nonchalance.

2. A comic opera by Massenet, first produced at Paris Nov. 30, 1872.

Don Cossacks (don kos'aks). Province of the. A government in southern Russia, situated in the valley of the lower Don. Capital, Novo Teherkask. Area, 61,886 square miles. Population (1891), 2,078,878.

Donderberg (don'dẽr-bẽrg), or Dunderberg (dun'dẽr-bẽrg). ['Thunder Mountain.] The chief mountain at the southern entrance to the Highlands of the Hudson, New York, opposite Peekskill. Height, 1,090 feet.

Donders (don'dẽrs), Frans Cornelis. Born at Tilburg, Netherlands, May 27, 1818; died at Utrecht, March 24, 1889. A Dutch oculist. His chief work is "Anomalies of Accommodation and Refraction of the Eye" (published by the Sydenham Society, 1865).

Dondo (dõn'dõ). A town of Angola, West Africa, situated on the right bank of the Coanza River, and at the head of river navigation, a few miles from Cassalala, a station of the Loanda Railroad. It is the terminus of several caravan roads, and the principal market of the Cazengo coffee. Population, about 5,000.

Dondra Head (don'drã hed). The southernmost cape of Ceylon.

Donegal (don'ẽ-gãl). A maritime county of Ulster, Ireland, lying between Lough Foyle, Londonderry, and Tyrone on the east, Tyrone, Fermanagh, Leitrim, and Donegal Bay on the south, and the Atlantic Ocean on the north and west. Its surface is generally mountainous. Capital, Lifford. Area, 1,870 square miles. Population (1891), 185,635.

Donegal Bay. An inlet of the Atlantic Ocean on the western coast of Ireland, in lat. 54° 30' N.

Donelson (don'el-son), Andrew Jackson. Born near Nashville, Tenn., Aug. 25, 1800; died at Memphis, Tenn., June 26, 1871. An American diplomatist and politician. He was United States minister to Prussia 1846-49, and was the unsuccessful candidate of the American party for Vice-President in 1856.

Donelson, Fort. See Fort Donelson.

Donetz, or Donez (dõ-nets'). A river in Russia, the chief tributary of the Don, which it joins in lat. 47° 35' N., long. 41° E. Length, about 500-600 miles.

Dongan (dong'gan), Thomas (afterward Earl of Limerick). Born at Castletown, County Kildare, Ireland, 1634; died at London, Dec. 14, 1715. Colonial governor of New York 1683-88.

Dongan Charter. A charter for the city of New York, granted by Thomas Dongan, lieutenant-governor and vice-admiral of New York and its dependencies under James II. of England, dated April 27, 1686. It remained in force until 1730. An early charter of the city of Albany, by the same authority, is known by the same name.

Don Garcia (don gãr-sõ'ã). A tragedy by Alfieri, produced in 1785. It is drawn from the history of the Medici family. Don Garcia was one of the sons of Cosimo I.

Don Garcia de Navarre (dõ nã-vãr'). A play by Molière.

[It] may be called Molière's only failure. He styles it a comédie héroïque, and it is in fact a kind of anticipation of Racine's manner, but applied to less serious subjects. The jealousy of the hero is, however, the only motive of the piece, and its exhibition is rather tiresome than anything else. The play is monotonous and unrelieved by action. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 309.

Don Giovanni (don jõ-vãn'nẽ). An opera by Mozart, first produced at Prague Oct. 29, 1787.

The words were by Da Ponte. See Don Juan. Dongola (dong'gõ-lã). A province (mudiriyyeh) of Egypt, in Nubia, previous to the Mahdist revolt.

Dongola, New, native Ordeh. A town in Nubia, situated on the Nile in lat. 19° 10' N. It was built about 1820, and was the capital of the former Egyptian province of Dongola. It was abandoned by the Anglo-Egyptian forces to the Mahdists in 1886.

Dongola, Old. A ruined town of Nubia, situated on the Nile 76 miles southeast of New Dongola.

Doniphan (don'i-fãn), Alexander William. Born in Mason County, Ky., July 9, 1808; died at Richmond, Mo., Aug. 8, 1887. An American officer in the Mexican war. He conducted a regiment of Missourians from Valverde, New Mexico, to Chihuahua, Dec., 1846,—March, 1847.

Donizetti (dõ-nẽ-dzẽt'ẽ), Gaetano. Born at Bergamo, Italy, Nov. 25, 1797; died at Bergamo, April 8, 1848. A celebrated Italian operatic composer. He composed about 65 operas, among which are "Anna Bolena" (1830), "L'Elisir d'Amore" (1832), "Lucia di Lammermoor" (1835), "Lucezia Borgia" (1834), "La Favorita" (1840), "La Fille du Régiment," afterward "La Figlia del Reggimento" (1840), "Linda di Chamounix" (1842), and "Don Pasquale" (1843).

Don Juan (don jũ'an; Sp. pron. dõn nõ-ãn'). A partly legendary character of Spanish origin. Don Juan Tenorio, who lived in the 14th century, the son of an illustrious family of Seville, killed the commandant Uleoa after having seduced his daughter. The Franciscan monks, wishing to put an end to the debaucheries of Don Juan, enticed him to their monastery and killed him, giving out that the statue of his victim (which had been erected there), incensed at an insult offered him (so the plays he is jeeringly invited to supper), had come down and dragged him to hell. Both Spanish and Italian plays were written on the subject, and Borimon introduced him to the French stage. Don Juan is the type of skeptical libertinism, and as such has been made the subject of the drama "El burlador de Sevilla" ("The Deceiver of Seville"), by Tellez (Tirso de Molina) (17th century); of Molière's comedy "Don Juan ou le festin de Pierre" (1665); of Mozart's opera "Don Giovanni" (which see); of Byron's poem "Don Juan" (1819-24); of Grabbe's German drama "Don Juan und Faust" (1828); and of works by Corneille, Shadwell, Zamora, Goldoni, Gluck, Dumas, Zorilla, etc.

Don Juan. An incomplete poem by Byron, written in 1818 and published 1819-24.

Don Juan, ou Le Festin de Pierre (lẽ fes-tãn' dẽ pyãr'). [F.: see the def.] A comedy by Molière, first played in 1665. In 1673 it was turned into verse by Thomas Corneille. The second title is a mistake of Borimon who first introduced Don Juan to the French stage in 1668 in a play called "Le festin de Pierre" ("The Feast of Pierre"), which he translated from the Spanish phrase "El convidado de piedra" (le convié de pierre, 'the stone guest,' referring to the statue of the commandant [see Don Juan] whom he named Pierre to explain it). Molière, finding the title established, adopted it.

Donna del Lago (don'nã del lã'gõ), La. [It., 'The Lady of the Lake.'] An opera, based on Scott's poem, by Rossini, first produced at Naples Oct. 4, 1819.

Donndorf (don'dorf), Karl Adolf. Born at Weimar, Germany, Feb. 16, 1835. A German sculptor, professor of sculpture at the art school in Stuttgart from 1877.

Donne (don), John. Born at London, 1573; died at London, March 31, 1631. An English poet and divine. He studied at Oxford and Lincoln's Inn, and in 1590 was appointed secretary to Sir Thomas Egerton, keeper of the great seal, which office he lost about 1600 by a clandestine marriage with the lord keeper's niece. In 1610 he published a work entitled "Pseudo-Martyr," which procured for him the favor of James I., who persuaded him to take holy orders in 1615, made him a royal chaplain in the same year, and in 1621 appointed him to the deanery of St. Paul's. Besides his poems, a collective edition of which appeared in 1633, and his theological writings, the most notable of his works is "Biclarator. A Declaration of that Paradoxe or Thesis, That Self-homicide is not so naturally Sin, that it may never be otherwise," etc. (1644).

Donnelly (don'el-i), Ignatius. Born at Philadelphia, Nov. 3, 1831. An American author and politician. He was admitted to the bar, and in 1857 removed to Minnesota, where he was elected lieutenant-governor in 1859 and in 1861. He was a Republican member of Congress from Minnesota 1863-69. Author of "The Great Cryptogram: Francis Bacon's Cipher in the so-called Shakespeare Plays" (1857), "Atlantis" (1882), "Ragnarok" (1883).

Donner (don'ner), Georg Raphael. Born at Essling, Austria, May 25, 1692; died at Vienna, Feb. 15, 1741. A noted Austrian sculptor. He entered the imperial service in 1724, and in 1729 that of Prince Esterházy. His greatest works are the fountain of the Mehlmarkt and the fountain of Perseus at the old town hall, Vienna.

Donner Lake (don'ẽr lãk). A small lake in Nevada County, eastern California, in the Sierra Nevada.

Donnithorne (don'i-thõrn), Arthur. In George Eliot's novel "Adam Bede," a vain, weak, good-natured young man, whose remorse for Hetty's ruin lies chiefly in his chagrin at being found out and losing the approbation of his acquaintances.

Donnybrook (don'i-brũk). A village in County Dublin, Ireland, 1½ miles southeast of Dublin. It was formerly famous for its fair (held in August), proverbial for its good-humored rioting, established under King John (1199-1216), and suppressed in 1855.

Donoso (dõ-nõ'sõ), Justo. Born at Santiago, 1800; died at La Serena, Feb. 22, 1868. A Chilean bishop. He was rector of a theological seminary in Santiago, lecturer at the university, and judge of the ecclesiastical court. He was named bishop of Ancud in 1844, and was translated to the see of La Serena in 1855. His works on canonical law are authoritative throughout South America.

Donoso Cortés (kõr-tãs'), Juan Francisco Maria de la Salud, Marquis of Valdegamas. Born at El Valle, Estremadura, Spain, May 6, 1809; died at Paris, May 3, 1853. A Spanish politician, diplomatist, and writer. His works include "Consideraciones sobre la diplomacia" (1834), "La ley electoral, etc." (1835), etc.

Donovan (don'õ-vãn), Edward. Died at London, Feb. 1, 1837. An English naturalist concerning whose personal history little is known except that he was in early life possessed of a considerable fortune, which enabled him to travel and make collections of objects in natural history. His chief work is "General Illustrations of Entomology."

Don Pasquale (dõn pãs-kwã'le). An opera by Donizetti, first produced at Paris Jan. 4, 1843.

Don Quixote (Sp. pron. dõn kẽ-nõ'te; E. don kwiks'õt). A Spanish romance by Cervantes, printed at Madrid in two parts, the first in 1605, the second in 1615. In 1614, when the second part was nearly completed, an impudent attempt to malign the character of Cervantes was made by Alonso Fernandes de Avellaneda (thought to be a pseudonym of Luis de Aliaga), who produced a pretended continuation of the first part. Translations of "Don Quixote" have appeared in every European language, including Turkish. The principal English translations are those of Shelton (1612-20), Motteux (1719), Jarvis (1742), Smollett (1755), Bowle (1781), Ormsby (1855), Watts (1888). The book is named from its hero, Don Quixote de la Mancha, a Spanish country gentleman, who is so imbued with tales of chivalry that he sets forth with his squire Sancho Panza in search of knightly adventure with very amusing results. At the beginning of the work Cervantes announces it to be his sole purpose to break down the rogue and authority of books of chivalry, and at the end he declares anew that he had "had no other desire than to render abhorred of men the false and absurd stories contained in books of chivalry," exulting in his success as an achievement of no small moment. See Cervantes.

These two [Don Quixote and Sancho Panza] sally forth from their native village in search of adventures, of which the excited imagination of the knight, turning windmills into giants, solitary inns into castles, and galley-slaves into oppressed gentlemen, finds abundance, wherever he goes; while the esquire translates them all into the plain prose of truth with an admirable simplicity, quite unconscious of its own humor, and rendered the more striking by its contrast with the lofty and courteous dignity and magnificent illusions of the superior personage. There could, of course, be but one consistent termination to adventures like these. The knight and his esquire suffer a series of ridiculous discomfitures, and are at last brought home, like madmen, to their native village, where Cervantes leaves them, with an intimation that the story of their adventures is by no means ended.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 141.

Douglas (dug'las). A tragedy by the Rev. John Home, first produced in Edinburgh Dec. 14, 1756. It is partly founded on a Scottish ballad, "Childe Maurice." See Norval.

"Douglas" was first produced upon the regular stage on the 14th of December, 1756, at the Canongate Theatre (of which there is no sign now), in Play-house Close, 290 Canongate. According to tradition, however—and very misty tradition—it was performed privately some time before at the lodgings of Mrs. Sarah Warde, a professional actress, who lived in Horse Wynd, near the foot of the Canongate, and with the following most astonishing amateur cast: Lord Randolph, Rev. Dr. Robertson (principal of the University of Edinburgh); Glenalvon, Dr. David Hume (historian); Old Norval, Rev. Dr. Carlyle (minister of Musselburgh); Douglas, Rev. John Home (the author of the tragedy); Lady Randolph, Dr. Ferguson (professor of moral philosophy in the University of Edinburgh); Anna (the Maid), Rev. Dr. Hugh Blair (minister of the High Church of Edinburgh). Adam Ferguson as Lady Randolph and Hugh Blair as Anna must have added an unexpectedly comic element to the tragedy. It is not more than justice to say that Dugald Stewart, the biographer of Principal Robertson, asserts that the Randolph of this cast "never entered a play-house in his life."

Hutton, Literary Landmarks of Edinburgh, p. 28.

Douglas (dug'las). 1. A seaport and the capital of the Isle of Man, situated on the eastern coast in lat. 54° 10' N., long. 4° 27' W. It is a noted watering-place. Population (1891), 19,515.—2. A village in Lanarkshire, Scotland, 8 miles southwest of Lanark. In the neighborhood are St. Bride's Church and Douglas Castle.

Douglas, Archibald, fourth Earl of Douglas. Died Aug. 17, 1424. A Scottish nobleman, second son of Archibald, third Earl of Douglas. He was captured by the English in a border raid in 1402, and was kept a prisoner until 1408. In 1423 he commanded a Scottish army sent to the support of the French against the English, and in the same year was created duke of Touraine by Charles VII. of France. He fell in the battle of Verneuil, in France.

Douglas, Archibald, fifth Earl of Angus: surnamed "Bell the Cat." Died 1514. A Scottish nobleman, son of George, fourth Earl of Angus. He was one of the disaffected nobles who overthrew and murdered James III.'s favorite, the Earl of Mar, in 1482. At a meeting of the nobles to concert a plan of attack on the favorite, Lord Gray compared the meeting to that of the mice in the fable who proposed to sting the favorite. "Who will bell the cat?" Douglas answered, "I will bell the cat" (whence his surname). He was chancellor of the kingdom 1493-98. In Scott's poem "Marmion" he is represented as entertaining Marmion and Lady Clare at his castle by command of the king.

Douglas, Archibald, sixth Earl of Angus. Died in Jan., 1557. Grandson of the fifth earl. He married in 1514 Margaret, widow of James IV. and sister of Henry VIII., by whom he had Margaret, countess of Lennox, the mother of Darnley.

Douglas, David. Born at Seone, Scotland, 1798; killed in the Hawaiian Islands, July 12, 1834. A Scottish botanist. He visited the United States as botanical collector for the Royal Horticultural Society in 1823, and subsequently made several scientific journeys in America, spending the years 1829-32 chiefly in California. He contributed a number of papers to scientific journals.

Douglas, Ellen. The daughter of the outlawed James Douglas, in Sir Walter Scott's poem "The Lady of the Lake." Going to Stirling with the signet ring given her by the Knight of Snowdon (the king), she obtains the pardon of father and lover, though the generous king himself had loved her in disguise.

Douglas, Gawain or Gavin. Born about 1474; died at London in Sept., 1522. A Scottish poet, younger son of the fifth Earl of Angus. He appears to have studied at St. Andrews 1489-94, and became bishop of Dunkeld in 1515. He was subsequently banished for political reasons, and was well received at the court of Henry VIII. of England. His chief work is a translation of the Æneid into Scottish verse (1513, printed 1553).

Douglas, George, fourth Earl of Angus. Died 1462. A Scottish nobleman. He remained loyal to James II. in a rising of his kinsmen against the king, and commanded the royal forces at the battle of Arkinholm May 1, 1455, in which the insurgents were defeated. He received as a reward large grants of land from the confiscated estates, and may be regarded as the founder of the position of the earls of Angus as border chiefs.

Douglas, George. In Sir Walter Scott's novel "The Abbot," the seneschal of Lochleven Castle during his father's absence. Falling in love with his prisoner, Mary Queen of Scots, he aids her escape, and dies at the battle of Langside.

Douglas, Sir Howard. Born at Gosport, England, July 1, 1776; died at Tumbidge Wells, England, Nov., 1861. An English general and military writer; author of a "Treatise on Naval Gunnery" (1819), etc.

Douglas, Sir James, called "The Good Sir James" and "The Black Douglas." Killed in Spain, probably Aug. 25, 1330. A Scottish nobleman. He joined the standard of Bruce in 1306, and commanded the left wing of the Scottish army at the battle of Bannockburn, June 24, 1314. In accordance with the dying request of Bruce, he set out on a journey to the Holy Land, carrying with him Bruce's heart incased in a casket of gold. Arrived in Spain, he offered his services to Alfonso, king of Castile and Leon, against the Saracens of Granada, and fell in battle.

Douglas, James, second Earl of Douglas. Died in 1388. A Scottish nobleman, son of William, first Earl of Douglas. He commanded a force of 300 horse and 2,000 foot which ravaged the eastern border in 1388, and probably on the 19th of Aug. in that year (on the 9th according to the English chroniclers, on the 15th according to Froissart) defeated a superior force of the levy of the northern counties under Lord Henry Percy at Otterburn, himself falling at the moment of victory. His fame is celebrated in the Scottish ballad "The Battle of Otterburn" and the English ballad "Chevy Chase."

Douglas, James, ninth Earl of Douglas. Died at Lindores, Scotland, July 14, 1488. Last Earl of Douglas. He headed a rebellion against James II. of Scotland 1452-55, in consequence of which he was banished and deprived of his estates.

Douglas, John. Born at Pittenweem, Fife, Scotland, July 14, 1721; died at Salisbury, England, May 18, 1807. A British prelate and general writer. He was appointed bishop of Carlisle in 1787 (being translated to Salisbury in 1791) and dean of Windsor in 1788. Among his works are "Milton vindicated from the Charge of Plagiarism" (1751), and a book attacking Hume's argument on the miracles, entitled "The Criterion" (1752).

Douglas, Stephen Arnold. Born at Brandon, Vt., April 23, 1813; died at Chicago, June 3, 1861. An American Democratic politician. He learned the trade of a cabinet-maker, but afterward studied law and was admitted to the bar. He was elected a judge of the Supreme Court of Illinois in 1841; was a member of Congress from Illinois 1843-47; and was United States senator 1847-61. He advanced the doctrine of popular or "squatter" sovereignty in relation to slavery in the Territories, and reported the Kansas-Nebraska Bill in 1854. He was an unsuccessful candidate of the Democratic party for the presidency in 1860. He was nicknamed "The Little Giant."

Douglas, Sir William. Killed in 1353. A Scottish nobleman. He sided with David II. against Edward Balliol, and obtained as a reward the lordship of Liddesdale, whence he was surnamed "The Knight of Liddesdale." He was killed during a hunt in Ettrick forest by his kinsman William, lord (afterward earl) of Douglas.

Douglas, William, first Earl of Douglas. Died in 1384. A Scottish nobleman, nephew of "the good Sir James." He was trained in arms in France; returned to Scotland about 1348; recovered his paternal estates from the English; conducted numerous raids on the English border; was, along with the Earl of March, appointed warden of the east marches about 1350; and was created earl of Douglas by David II. in 1358.

Douglas, William, eighth Earl of Douglas. Died in 1452. A Scottish nobleman, son of James, seventh Earl of Douglas. He conspired against James II., by whom he was decoyed by a safe-conduct to Stirling Castle and put to death.

Douglass, David Bates. Born at Pompton, N. J., March 21, 1790; died at Geneva, N. Y., Oct., 1849. An American engineer. He was engaged on the Croton aqueduct 1833-36, on Greenwood cemetery (Brooklyn) 1837-40.

Douglass, Frederick. Born 1817; died Feb. 20, 1895. A noted American orator and journalist. He was the son of a negro by a white man, and was born a slave on the plantation of Colonel Edward Lloyd. Having escaped from his master in 1838, he eventually settled at New Bedford, Massachusetts, and in 1841 became an agent of the Massachusetts Anti-Slavery Society, a post which he retained four years. He founded in 1847, at Rochester, New York, "Frederick Douglass's Paper," the title of which was changed to "The North Star," and which was continued a number of years. In 1870 he founded at Washington, District of Columbia, "The New National Era," which he turned over to his sons Lewis and Frederick. He was United States marshal for the District of Columbia 1876-81, recorder of deeds in the District 1881-86, and United States minister to Haiti 1880-1891. He also published "The Life and Times of Frederick Douglass, from 1817 to 1882, Written by Himself" (1882).

Draco (drā'kō), or Dracon (drā'kon). [Gr. Δρακων.] Lived in the last half of the 7th century B. C. An Athenian legislator. He formulated the first written code of laws for Athens in 624 or about 621 B. C. On account of the number of offenses to which it affixed the penalty of death, his code was said to have been written in blood.

Draco. [L., 'the dragon.'] An ancient northern constellation. The figure is that of a serpent with several small coils. It appears at a very ancient date to have had wings in the space now occupied by the Little Bear.

Dracontius (dra-kon'shi-us), Blossius Æmilii. A Christian poet of the 5th century, an advocate in Carthage.

One of the most gifted African poets is Blossius Æmilii Dracontius of Carthage, by whom we possess a Christian didactic poem "De laudibus dei" in three books, short epics of which the subjects are taken either from ancient legends ("Hylas," "Raptus Helene," "Medea") or from rhetorical school exercises ("Verba Hierutis," "Deliberativa Achillis," "Controversia de statua viri fortis"), two epithalamia, and an elegiac poem ("Satisfactio") in which the author asks pardon of the Vandal king Gunthamund (a. 484-496) for having written a poem in honour of one of his enemies instead of himself.

Teuffel and Schube, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), II. 503.

Draft Riot. A riot in New York city, July 13-16, 1863, against the enforcement of the draft for the Federal army. During its progress several negroes were murdered and many maltreated. The riot, which cost about a thousand lives and the destruction of considerable property, was finally suppressed by the police and military.

Dragon of Wantley, The. An old ballad, preserved by Percy, which describes the victory over this dragon (who devoured damsels, houses, trees, etc.) by More of More Hall, who provided himself with armor covered with spikes. It is a parody on some ancient Kæmpevise. In a key appended to the ballad in the improved edition of the "Reliques," an attempt is made to explain it as an allegory. Henry Carey produced a burlesque opera with this title, Oct. 26, 1737; the music was by J. F. Lampe.

Dragoonades (drag-g-nādž'). [Also written Dragoonades; from F. dragoonade, from dragon, a dragoon: from the use of dragoons in such persecutions.] A form of persecution inflicted by the government of Louis XIV. upon the French Protestants in the period preceding the revocation of the edict of Nantes. It consisted in billeting troops upon the inhabitants as a means of converting them, license being given to the soldiery to commit all manner of misdeeds.

Dragontea (drā-gōn-tā'ā), La. A poem by Lope de Vega on the subject of Sir Francis Drake's last expedition and death.

The Dragontea, however, whose ten cantos of octave verse are devoted to the expression of this national hatred, may be regarded as its chief monument. It is a strange poem. It begins with the prayers of Christianity, in the form of a beautiful woman, who presents Spain, Italy, and America in the court of Heaven, and prays God to protect them all against what Lope calls "that Protestant Scotch pirate." It ends with rejoicings in Panama because "the Dragon," as he is called through the whole poem, has died, poisoned by his own people, and with the thanksgivings of Christianity that her prayers have been heard, and that "the scarlet lady of Babylon" meaning Queen Elizabeth—has been at last defeated.

Ticknor, Span. Lit., II. 171.

Drake, Sir Francis. Born probably at Tavistock, Devonshire, about 1540; died off Porto Bello, Jan. 28, 1596 (O. S.). An English naval hero. In 1567-8 he commanded a small vessel, one of two which escaped from the destruction of Sir John Hawkins's fleet by the Spanish. He visited the West Indies and the Spanish main in 1570 and 1571, and became convinced that the towns there would fall an easy prey to a small armed force. Accordingly, in 1572, he fitted out what was properly a freebooting expedition, England being then at peace with Spain. With only 3 vessels and 100 men he took Nombre de Dios and an immense treasure; but he was badly wounded in the attack, and his men abandoned both town and treasure. In return he burned a Spanish vessel at Cartagena, captured many ships, and intercepted a train loaded with silver on the isthmus. He also crossed to Panama, and was the first English commander who saw the Pacific.

From his return, in Aug., 1573, to Sept., 1576, Drake served under the Earl of Essex in Ireland. In Dec., 1577, he started on another freebooting expedition, in which he passed the Strait of Magellan, obtained an immense booty on the Pacific coast of Spanish America, crossed the Pacific, and returned to England by way of the Cape of Good Hope, arriving in Sept., 1580. This was the first English circumnavigation of the globe. Queen Elizabeth knighted Drake on his own ship, and gave him important commands. In 1584-85 he was a member of Parliament. From 1585 to 1588 he commanded a powerful expedition to the West Indies and the Spanish main, in which he took and ransomed Santo Domingo and Cartagena, ravaged the coasts of Florida, and on his way back brought off the remnant of the English Virginia colony. In 1587 he made a descent on the coast of Spain, and destroyed numerous unfinanced vessels intended for the Spanish Armada, besides capturing a rich Portuguese East Indian. In July, 1588, he commanded under Lord Howard in the combat with the Spanish Armada, and next year he was one of the commanders in a descent on the Spanish and Portuguese coasts, which proved unsuccessful. For several years thereafter he was engaged in peaceful pursuits, and in 1593 was again elected to Parliament. In 1595 he commanded another West India expedition, which met with little success, and in which both he and Sir John Hawkins died.

In 1744 he entered the army, and in 1762 commanded, with the rank of brigadier-general, a successful expedition against Manila. He published in 1769 a letter, dated Jan. 26 of that year, defending the Marquis of Granby against the aspersions of "Junius," which led to a spirited controversy. He was promoted major-general in 1772. The correspondence between Draper and "Junius" was published separately under the title of "The Political Contest" (1769).

Draper's Letters. A series of letters published in 1724 by Dean Swift, under the pseudonym M. B. Draper. They were directed against the acceptance in Ireland of a copper coinage the patent for supplying which had been accorded to William Wood, who with the Duchess of Kendal, the king's mistress (who obtained him the privilege), was to divide the profit arising from the difference between the real and the nominal value of the halfpence (about 40 per cent.). Owing to the public excitement raised by these letters the patent was canceled. Wood was compensated with a pension, and Swift gained a popularity which he never lost till his death. A large reward was offered at the time for the discovery of the author.

Dred Scott Case. In American history, a celebrated decision by the Supreme Court of the United States, which derived its importance from its bearing on the constitutionality of the Missouri Compromise of 1820. Dred Scott, a Missouri slave who had been taken to the territory covered by the Missouri Compromise, and had there sued for his freedom, was sold to a citizen of another State. He then transferred his suit from the State to the Federal courts, under the power given to the latter to try suits between citizens of different States; and the case came by appeal to the Supreme Court. The decision of the Supreme Court, which was published in 1857, put Scott out of court on the ground that a slave, or the descendant of a slave, could not be a citizen of the United States or have any standing in Federal courts. The opinion of the chief justice also attacked the validity of the Missouri Compromise, on the ground that one of the constitutional functions of Congress was the protection of property; that slaves were recognized by the Constitution as property; and that Congress was therefore bound to protect slavery in the Territories.

Druid (drō'id), Dr. The Welsh tutor of Lord Abberville, in Cumberland's play "The Fashionable Lover."

Druids (drō'idz). [Of Old Celtic origin.] 1. The priests or ministers of religion among the ancient Celts of Gaul, Britain, and Ireland. The chief seats of the Druids were in Wales, Brittany, and the regions around the modern Dreux and Chartres in France. The Druids are believed to have possessed some knowledge of geometry, natural philosophy, etc. They superintended the affairs of religion and morality, and performed the office of judges. The oak is said to have represented to them the one supreme God, and the mistletoe when growing upon it the dependence of man upon him; and they accordingly held these in the highest veneration, oak-groves being their places of worship. They are said to have had a common superior, who was elected by a majority of votes from their own members, and who enjoyed his dignity for life. The Druids, as an order, always opposed the Romans, but were ultimately exterminated by them.

2. The members of a society called the United Ancient Order of Druids, founded in London, in 1781, for the mutual benefit of the members, and now comprising numerous lodges, called groves, in America, Australia, Germany, and elsewhere.

He quelled a mutiny of the legions in Pannonia in 14; was consul in 15; was appointed governor of Illyricum in 16; was consul in 21; and in 22 was invested with the tribunicia potestas, whereby he was declared heir apparent to the throne. He was poisoned by the favorite Sejanus, who aspired to the succession.

Drusus, Marcus Livius. Died probably 109 B. C. A Roman politician. He was tribune of the plebs conjointly with Cains Gracchus in 122, his election having been procured by the senate, whose members were alarmed at the democratic innovations of the latter. In collision with the senate he opposed his veto to the bills brought forward by his colleague, and introduced instead bills of similar import, but making more extravagant concessions, which were passed by the senate. He was consul in 112, and while governor of Macedonia, which he obtained as his province, defeated the Thracian Scordisci.

Drusus, Marcus Livius. Died at Rome, 91 B. C. A Roman politician, son of Marcus Livius Drusus. He became in 91 tribune of the plebs, whose favor he won by largesses of corn and by the introduction of a bill providing for a new division of the public lands. This bill, together with another which restored to the senate the places on the juries of which it had been deprived by C. Gracchus, was passed by the comitia, but declared null and void by the senate. He was assassinated as he was about to bring forward a proposal to bestow the citizenship on the Italians. His death gave the signal for the outbreak of the Social War.

Drusus, Nero Claudius. Born 38 B. C.: died in Germany, 9 B. C. A Roman general, brother of Tiberius. He was the son of Livia by Tiberius Claudius Nero, and was born shortly after the marriage of his mother with the emperor Augustus. He was adopted, together with his brother Tiberius, by the emperor; and at an early age married Antonia, the daughter of Marcus Antonius. He subdued a revolt in Gaul in 13, and, starting in 12 from the left bank of the Rhine, undertook four campaigns in Germany proper, in the course of which he led the Roman armies to the Weser and the Elbe. He died on the way back, in consequence of a fall from his horse.

Dryden (drü'den), John. Born at the vicarage of Aldwinkle All Saints, Northamptonshire, England, Aug. 9 (?), 1631; died at London, May 1, 1700. A celebrated English poet and dramatist. He was graduated at Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1650. In 1663 he married Lady Elizabeth Howard, the sister of his friend Sir Robert Howard. Originally a Parliamentarian, he went over to the Royalist side, and was poet laureate and historiographer royal 1670-88. In 1679 he had a quarrel with Rochester, which caused him to be cudgelled in the street by masked bravos. The unsettled state of public feeling after the Popish plot, which induced him to write his series of satires (of which "Absalom and Achitophel" was the first), brought down upon him a storm of libels. He was converted to Roman Catholicism in 1686, but his sincerity has been impugned. His critical writings were numerous and on various subjects. He wrote many prologues, epilogues, and dedications, and after his conversion to Roman Catholicism employed his pen in defense of his faith. His chief poems are "Heroic Stanzas" on the death of Cromwell (1658), "Astrea Redux," celebrating the Restoration (1660), "Annus Mirabilis" (1667), "Absalom and Achitophel" (1681: the second part with Tate, 1682), "The Medal" (1682), "MacFlecknoe" (1682), "Religio Laici" (1682), "The Hind and the Panther" (1687), "Translation of Virgil" (1697), "Alexander's Feast" (1697); also translations of Juvenal, Ovid, etc. His chief plays are "The Indian Emperor," "Almanzor and Almahide, or the Conquest of Granada," "Aurenczebe," "All for Love," "Secret Love, or The Maiden Queen," "Sir Martin Mar-all," "Don Sebastian," "An Evening's Love, or The Mock Astrologer," "Marriage à la Mode," "The Kind Keeper," "Amboyna," "The Spanish Duchess, The. The pseudonym of Mrs. Margaret Argles Hungerford.

Duchess of Devonshire. 1. A portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds, at Althorp Park, England. The figure is shown in full length, wearing a plumed turban, and about to descend a flight of steps. 2. A noted portrait by Gainsborough, stolen from the gallery of the New British Institution, London, in 1876. The duchess is represented in full length, standing in a garden walk, and wearing a broad-brimmed plumed hat.

Duchess of Malfi, The. A tragedy by Webster, played about 1612, printed in 1623. There is a dramatic version of the story among Lope de Vega's works, and it forms the subject of one of Kanello's "Novelle." It is Webster's most popular play, the one oftenest read, and the most original. The crime for which the duchess is reduced by her family to insanity and death is her secret marriage with her steward whom she loved.

This refinement of a noble mind by suffering is the keynote to the Duchess of Malfi, and the wretchedness that comes upon her only illuminates and purifies her lovely character. . . . In Webster's version the Duchess is presented before us as a woman of supreme rank and high spirit, whose power of mind and healthiness of purpose have kept her uncontaminated by the frivolous conventionalities of a court life. She dares to act for herself; though a sovereign, she does not forget she is a woman, and sees nothing ignoble in the faithful love of a subject.

Gosse, Seventeenth Century Studies, p. 55.

Bosola. . . . I'll describe her [the Duchess]. She's sad, as one long us'd to't, and she seems Rather to welcome the end of misery, Than shun it; a behaviour so noble, As gives a majesty to adversity: You may discern the shape of loveliness More perfect in her tears than in her smiles: She will muse for hours together; and her silence, Methinks, expresseth more than if she spake.

Webster, Duchess of Malfi.

Ducis (dü-sē'), Jean François. Born at Versailles, France, Aug. 22, 1733; died at Versailles, March 31, 1816. A French dramatic poet, best known as an adapter of "Hamlet" and others of Shakspeare's plays to the French stage. His best original work is "Abufar" (1795).

Dudley, Sir Edmund. Born about 1462; executed at London, Aug. 18, 1510. An English politician. He was educated at Oxford and at Gray's Inn, is said to have been made a privy councillor at twenty-three, and was chosen speaker of the House of Commons in 1504. He was employed as a fiscal agent by Henry VII., and incurred popular odium by the rigor with which he enforced the extortionate claims of the crown. On the death of Henry VII. in 1509, he was beheaded on the charge of treason, in company with Sir Richard Empson, another of Henry VII.'s fiscal agents.

Dudley, Lord Guildford. Executed at London, Feb. 12, 1554. Son of the Duke of Northumberland. He married Lady Jane Grey May 21, 1553. He was implicated in his father's ill-starred attempt to place Lady Jane on the throne on the death of Edward VI. (July 6, 1553), and was executed on the charge of treason.

Dudley, John, Duke of Northumberland and Earl of Warwick. Born 1502; beheaded Aug. 22, 1553. An English politician and soldier, son of Sir Edmund Dudley. He was made warden of the Scottish marches and great admiral by Henry VIII. in 1542, and was created earl of Warwick and high chamberlain of England on the accession of Edward VI. in 1547. In 1549 he overthrew the protector Somerset, and assumed the chief control of the government. He was created duke of Northumberland in 1551. With the object in view of transferring the crown from the Tudors to his own family, he persuaded Edward VI. to grant letters patent excluding Edward's sisters, Mary and Elizabeth, from the succession and appointing Edward's cousin, Lady Jane Grey, heir presumptive to the crown, whereupon he married Lady Jane to his son, Guildford Dudley. At the death of Edward, he found himself unable to prevent the accession of Mary, and was executed for treason.

Dudley, Joseph. Born at Roxbury, Mass., 1647; died at Roxbury, April 2, 1720. An American politician. Dudley, Robert, Earl of Leicester. Born June 24, 1532 or 1533; died at Cornbury, Oxfordshire, England, Sept. 4, 1588. An English courtier, politician, and general, son of John Dudley, duke of Northumberland. He participated in the attempt of his father and brother to place Lady Jane Grey on the throne at the death of Edward VI. in 1553, and was in consequence sentenced to death on the charge of treason in 1554, but was pardoned later in the same year. On the accession in 1558 of Elizabeth, whose affections he had gained during the ascendancy of his father at the court of Edward VI., he became her chief favorite, and intrigued, though unsuccessfully, to obtain the consent of the great nobles to a marriage, in the interest of which project he was said to have procured the murder of his wife Lady Amy (1560). He was created earl of Leicester in 1564, and in 1575 entertained Queen Elizabeth with great magnificence at Kenilworth. In 1585 he was appointed to the command of the English army sent to the aid of the States-General against the Spaniards, but was recalled in 1587, owing to incompetence. He was, however, restored to favor on his return, and in 1588 was appointed lieutenant and captain-general of the queen's armies and companies to resist the Spanish Armada.

Dudley, Thomas. Born at Northampton, England, 1576; died at Roxbury, Mass., July 31, 1652. A colonial politician. He came to Massachusetts as deputy governor in 1630; governor 1634-35, 1640-41, 1645-46, 1650-51.

Born at Villers-Cotterets, Aisne, France, July 24, 1803; died at Puy, near Dieppe, Dec. 5, 1870. A noted French dramatic author and novelist. His father, General Alexandre de la Pailleterie Dumas, was the natural son of the Marquis Alexandre Davy de la Pailleterie, a rich colonist of Santo Domingo, and of a negro whose name was Dumas. He came to Paris in 1823, and obtained a clerkship through the assistance of General Foy. One of his first essays was an "Éclaircissement sur la mort du Général Foy" (1825). As his name attracted attention, it was often attached to books with which he himself had either very little or nothing to do. Both independently and in collaboration with others, Dumas wrote for the stage many plays which are collected in the "Théâtre" (6 volumes, 1834-36; 15 volumes, 1837-74). He took an active part in the revolution of 1830. After the insurrection of June, 1832, he traveled, and published a number of books as the result of his journey. He published three collections of stories: "Nouvelles contemporaines" (1826), "Souvenirs d'Antony" (1835), and "La salle d'armes" (1838). His novels were composed either independently or in collaboration with others, and include "Le capitaine Paul" (1838), "Acté" (1839), "Aventures de John Davy" (1840), "Le capitaine Pamphile" (1840), "Maitre Adam le Calabrais" (1840), "Othon l'archer" (1840), "Graxès" (1841), "Aventures de Lyderic" (1842), "Frogon" (1843), "Ascanio" (1843), "Le chevalier d'Harmental" (1843), "Fernande" (1844), "Amarty" (1844), "Gabriel Lambert" (1844), "Le château d'Épstein" (1844), "Cécile" (1844), "Les trois monnaquétaires" (1844); with its sequels, "Vingt ans après" (1845) and "Dix ans plus tard on le vicomte de Bragelonne" (1848-50), "Le comte de Monte-Cristo" (1844-45), "Les frères corses" (1845), "Une fille du régent" (1845), "La reine Margot" (1845), "La guerre des femmes" (1845-46), "Le chevalier de Maison-Rouge" (1846), "La dame de Monsoreau" (1846) and its sequel "Les quarante-cinq" (1848), "Le batarde de Mauléon" (1846), "Mémoire d'un médecin" (1846-1848); with its sequels "Ange Pitou" (1853) and "La comtesse de Charny" (1853-55), "Les mille et un fantômes" (1849), "La femme au collier de velours" (1851), "Olympe de Clèves" (1852), "Un Gil Blas en Californie" (1852), "Isaac Laquedem" (1852), "Le pasteur d'Ashbourn" (1853), "El saltador" (1853), "Conscience innocent" (1853), "Catherine Blum" (1854), "Ingénue" (1854), "Les Mohicans de Paris" (1854-58) and its sequel "Salvator" (1855-59), "Les compagnons de Jehu" (1857), "Les louves de Macheoul" (1859), "Madame de Chamblay" (1863), "La San Felice" (1864-65), and "Les Blancs et les Blancs" (1867-68). Dunstan (dun'stan), Saint. Born near Glastonbury, England, 924 or 925; died at Canterbury, England, May 19, 988. Archbishop of Canterbury. He was the son of Heorstan, a West-Saxon noble, and was brought up at the abbey of Glastonbury and at the court of Ethelstan, by whom he was appointed abbot of Glastonbury not later than 945. He became the chief adviser of Eadred (reigned 946-955), but was banished by Eadred's successor, the young king Eadwig, whose ill will he incurred by refusing to consent to a marriage between him and Ælfgifu; and by rudely bringing him back to the banqueting-hall when, at his coronation, he left it for her society. He was recalled by Eadwig's successor, Edgar, by whom he was created archbishop of Canterbury in 959 and restored to political power. He retained his influence at court during the reign of Edward, but appears to have lost it on the accession of Æthelred II. in 978.

Durandana (dü-rän-dä'nä). The sword of Roland (Orlando). It is also called Durandul, Durenda, Durindana, etc.

He (Roland) had fought all day in the thickest of the fray, dealing deadly blows with his good sword Durenda; but all his prowess could not save the day. So, wounded to death, and surrounded by the bodies of his friends, he stretched himself on the ground, and prepared to yield up his soul. But first he drew his faithful sword, than which he would sooner have spared the arm that wielded it, and saying, "O sword of unparalleled brightness, excellent dimensions, admirable temper, and hilt of the whitest ivory, decorated with a splendid cross of gold, topped by a beryl apple, engraved with the sacred name of God, endued with keenness and every other virtue, who now shall wield thee in battle, who shall call thee master? He that possessed thee was never conquered, never daunted by the foe; phantoms never appalled him. Aided by the Almighty, with thee did he destroy the Saracen, exalt the faith of Christ, and win consummate glory. O happy sword, keenest of the keen, never was one like thee; he that made thee, made not thy fellow! Not one escaped with life from thy stroke." And lest Durenda should fall into the hands of a craven or an infidel, Roland smote it upon a block of stone and brake it in twain. Then he blew his horn, which was so resonant that all other horns were split by its sound; and now he blew it with all his might, till the veins of his neck burst. And the blast of that dread horn,

On Fontarabian echoes borne, reached even to King Charles's ear as he lay enamped and ignorant of the disaster that had befallen the rear-guard eight miles away. Poole, Story of the Moors, p. 36.

Durandarte (dü-rän-där'te). A legendary Spanish hero whose exploits are related in old Spanish ballads and in "Don Quixote," II, 23. He was the cousin of Montesinos, and was killed at the battle of Roncesvalles. One of the ballads, a fragment, can be traced to the "Cancionero" of 1511, and one, "Durandarte, Durandarte," to the old "Cancioneros Generales." Ticknor.

Dürer (dü'r'er), Albrecht. Born at Nuremberg, Bavaria, May 21, 1471; died there, April 6, 1528. A famous German painter and engraver, the founder of the German school. He was the son of a goldsmith who first instructed him in his trade and then apprenticed him to the painter Michael Wolgemuth for three years and a half, after which (1490) he visited Strasbourg, Colmar, Basel, and Venice where he was much impressed by the works of Mantegna. He returned in 1494 and married Agnes Frey. He probably worked in the studio of Wolgemuth until 1497, when he removed to an atelier of his own. From 1505 to 1507 he lived in Venice. Then followed his most active years in Nuremberg. From 1512 he worked for the emperor Maximilian, who made him his court painter, and whom he attended at Augsburg in 1513 as deputy for his native city to the assembled Diet. In 1521-22 he visited the Netherlands. He attended the coronation of Charles V. at Aix-la-Chapelle, and obtained the appointment of court painter before his return to Nuremberg, where he continued to work until his death. He may be regarded as the inventor of etching. As a designer of woodcuts and an engraver he ranks higher than as a painter. His woodcuts number nearly 200, including "The Apocalypse" (16 subjects), "The Greater Passion" (12 subjects), and "The Lesser Passion" (37 subjects). His copperplates number over 100, including "Melancholia," "Death and the Devil," "The Little Passion" (16 subjects), "St. Jerome in his Study," etc. Among his paintings are "Adoration of the Trinity" (Vienna), "Adam and Eve" (Florence), "Four Apostles" (Nuremberg), etc. He wrote "Von Menschlicher Proportion" (1528), and works on "Measurement" (1525) and "Fortification" (1527). Dürer never employed fresco, although he furnished the designs for the mural decorations of the city hall at Nuremberg, the "Calumny of Apelles" and the "Triumph of Maximilian."

Durham (dur'um). [ME. Durum, Duresme, altered from Dunholm, AS. Dunholm (ML. reflex Dunholmum, Dunelmum, Dunelmia), hill-isle, from dun, hill (down), and holm, island; applied orig. to the rocky peninsula on which the first church was built.] 1. A county in northern England, lying between Northumberland on the north, the North Sea on the east, and Westmoreland and Cumberland on the west. It is separated from Yorkshire by the Tees on the south. It is mountainous in the west, is rich in minerals, particularly coal and lead, and is noted for its breed of cattle. It was a county palatine until 1836. Area, 1,012 square miles. Population (1891), 1,016,559.

2. The capital of the county of Durham, situated on the Wear in lat. 54° 46' N., long. 1° 35' W. It contains a castle founded in 1072 by William the Conqueror, and rebuilt by Bishop Hugh of Puiset a hundred years later. The interior possesses many features of interest, as the beautiful Norman arcade, door, and gallery, the Norman chapel beneath the 14th-century keep, the refectory of the 14th century, and a 17th-century carved staircase of oak. The castle is now occupied by Durham University. The cathedral of Durham is a monument of great intrinsic importance, which is enhanced by its imposing position on the brink of a steep hill above the river Wear. The west front is flanked by two massive square towers, and a tower of similar form rises high over the crossing. The present church was founded at the end of the 11th century, and was practically completed by the middle of the 12th. The Lady chapel or Galilee is later, and the curious east transept called the Nine Altars, at the eastern extremity of the choir, is of the early 13th. The cloister is Perpendicular. The Norman interior is exceedingly impressive. The piers of the nave are alternately cylindrical and square, with engaged shafts; the former are covered with zigzag and other line-patterns. The altar-screen and episcopal throne arc of the 14th century, the stalls of the 17th. The eastern or Nine Altars transept is architecturally beautiful, and is very skillfully joined to the older work. The Galilee chapel, projecting in front of the western facade, has four interior walls resting on round chevron-molded arches which spring from slender clustered columns, the whole supporting the roof in a manner rather Saracenic than Northern. The dimensions of the cathedral are 510 by 80 feet, length of transepts 170, height of vaulting 70, of central tower 214. The old monastic buildings are still almost complete, and are of high interest. Durham was, perhaps, a Roman station. It became the seat of the old bishopric of Lindisfarne in 995, and its bishops were, in the middle ages, nearly independent rulers over the palatinate of Durham. Population (1891), 14,863.

3. A city in Durham County, North Carolina, northwest of Raleigh. It has important tobacco manufactures. Population (1890), 5,485.

Earth (ērth). [Usually, but without much probability, referred to √ *ar, plow.] The terraqueous globe which we inhabit. It is one of the planets of the solar system, being the third in order from the sun. The figure of the earth is approximately that of an ellipsoid of revolution or oblate spheroid, the axes of which measure 12,756,506 meters and 12,713,042 meters, or 7,926 statute miles and 1,041 yards and 7,899 statute miles and 1,023 yards, respectively, thus making the compression 1:293. The radius of the earth, considered as a sphere, is 3,958 miles. The mean density of the whole earth is 5.6, or about twice that of the crust, and its interior is probably metallic. The earth revolves upon its axis in one sidereal day, which is 3 minutes and 55.91 seconds shorter than a mean solar day. Its axis remains nearly parallel to itself, but has a large but slow gyration which produces the precession of the equinoxes. The whole earth revolves about the sun in an ellipse in one sidereal year, which is 365 days, 6 hours, 9 minutes, and 9 seconds. The elliptic, or plane of the earth's orbit, is inclined to the equator by 23° 27' 12".68 mean obliquity for Jan. 0, 1890, according to Hansen. The earth is distant from the sun about 93,000,000 miles.

East India Company. The name of various mercantile associations formed in different countries in the 17th and 18th centuries for the purpose of conducting under the auspices of the government a monopoly of the trade of their respective countries with the East Indies. (a) The Danish East India Company was organized in 1618; was dissolved in 1634; was reorganized in 1670; and was finally dissolved in 1729, when its possessions, the chief of which was Tranquebar on the Coromandel coast, were ceded to the government. (b) The Dutch East India Company was formed by the union of several smaller trading companies March 20, 1602. It received from the state a monopoly of the trade on the further side of the Strait of Magellan and of the Cape of Good Hope, including the right to make treaties and alliances in the name of the States-General, to establish factories and forts, and to employ soldiers. It founded Batavia in Java on the site of a native city in 1619, and in the middle of the 17th century held the principal seats of commerce throughout the Indian archipelago, including Ceylon, Sumatra, Java, and Borneo, and had flourishing colonies in South Africa. It was dissolved and its territories transferred to the state Sept. 12, 1795. (c) The English East India Company, composed originally of London merchants, was incorporated by Queen Elizabeth Dec. 31, 1600, under the title of "The Governor and Company of Merchants of London trading with the East Indies." It obtained from the court of Delhi in 1612 the privilege of establishing a factory at Surat, which continued to be the chief British station in India until the organization of Bombay. In 1645 it received permission of the natives to erect Fort St. George at Madras. In 1661 it was invested by Charles II. with authority to make peace and war with infidel powers, erect forts, acquire territory, and exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction in its settlements. In 1665 it obtained a grant of the island of Bombay, which formed part of the dowry of Catharine of Portugal. In 1675 it established a factory on the Iugh in Bengal, which led to the foundation of Calcutta. In 1749 it inaugurated, by the expulsion of the Rajah of Tanjore, a series of territorial conquests which resulted in the acquisition and organization of British India. A government board of control was established by Parliament in 1784, and in 1858 the company relinquished altogether its functions of government to the crown. (d) The French East India Company was founded by Colbert in 1664. It established a factory at Surat in Aug., 1675, and acquired Pondicherry, which became the capital of the French possessions on the Coromandel coast. It was dissolved Aug. 13, 1769, when its territories were ceded to the crown. (e) The Swedish East India Company was formed at Gothenburg, Sweden, in 1741, and was reorganized in 1806.

Ebingen (ê'bing-en). A town in the Black Forest circle, Württemberg. Population (1890), 6,864.

Ebionites (ê'bi-on-its). [From LL. Ebionitæ, pl., Gr. Ἐβιωναῖοι, from Heb. 'ebyônîm (pl. of 'ebyôn), lit. 'the poor'; the origin of the application of the name is uncertain.] A party of Judaizing Christians which appeared in the church as early as the 2d century, and disappeared about the 4th century. They agreed in (a) the recognition of Jesus as the Messiah, (b) the denial of his divinity, (c) belief in the universal obligation of the Mosaic law, and (d) rejection of Paul and his writings. The two great divisions of Ebionites were the Pharisaic Ebionites, who emphasized the obligation of the Mosaic law, and the Essenic Ebionites, who were more speculative and leaned toward Gnosticism.

Eblis (eb'lis), or Iblis (ib'lis). In Arabian mythology, the chief of the evil spirits. Beckford introduces him in "Vathek." See Azazel.

His person was that of a young man whose noble and regular features seemed to have been tarnished by malignant vapours. In his large eyes appeared both pride and despair; his flowing hair retained some resemblance to that of an angel of light. In his hand, which thunder had blasted, he swayed the iron sceptre that causes the monster Ouaranabad, the Afrits, and all the powers of the abyss to tremble. Beckford, Vathek, p. 192.

Eblis, Hall of. See the extract.

In the midst of this immense hall, a vast multitude was incessantly passing, who severally kept their right hands on their hearts (which were on fire), without once regarding anything around them. They had all the livid paleness of death. Their eyes, deep sunk in their sockets, resembled those phosphoric meteors that glimmer by night in places of interment. Some stalked slowly on, absorbed in profound reverie; some, shrieking with agony, ran furiously about, like tigers wounded with poisoned arrows; whilst others, grinding their teeth in rage, foamed along, more frantic than the wildest maniac. Beckford, Vathek, p. 191.

Eboli (â'bô-lê). A town in the province of Salerno, Italy, 45 miles east-southeast of Naples. Population (1881), 9,089.

Eboli, Princess of (Anna de Mendoza). Born in June, 1540; died at Pastrana, Spain, Feb. 2, 1592. Daughter of Don Diego Hurtado de Mendoza, viceroy of Peru, and mistress of Philip II. of Spain. She married in 1559 the favorite Rui Gómez de Silva, prince of Eboli. While mistress of the king she sustained similar relations to the minister Antonio Perez. She was, in consequence of a political intrigue, betrayed by Escovedo, the secret agent at the court of Don John of Austria. Escovedo being murdered soon after by Perez, she was suspected of complicity in the crime, and was banished from court in 1579. She figures as one of the characters in Schiller's "Don Carlos."

Eboracum (ê-bor'â-kum), or Eburacum (ê-bur'â-kum). The Roman name of York.

Eburacum is the spelling given in the Itinerary of Antoninus, in Ptolemy, and in the geographer of Ravenna, while an inscription formerly found in York, but not preserved, as well as the Roman historians who mention this place, call it Eboracum. The weight of authority, however, seems to be turned in favour of the former by an inscription more recently discovered, and certainly reading EBVR. Wright, Celt, p. 128.

Ebrard (â'brârt), Johann Heinrich August. Born at Erlangen, Bavaria, Jan. 18, 1818; died there, July 23, 1888. A German clergyman of the Reformed Church, and theological and miscellaneous writer.

Ecbatana (ek-bat'a-nâ), or Agbatana (agbat'a-nâ), or Achmetha (âk'me-thî). [Ancient Persian Hangmatâna; in Babylonian inscriptions Agamatânu or Agamtânu; modern Hamadân.] The capital of Media, built, according to fable, by Semiramis. It was captured and plundered by Cyrus in 550 B. C., and was used by the Persian monarchs as a summer residence. Alexander the Great spent some months there in 324 B. C. It is mentioned in the Bible (Ezra vi. 2) as the place in which the decree of Cyrus permitting the Jews to rebuild the temple was found. Hamadân is one of the most important cities of modern Persia.

Eccard (ek'kârd), Johannes. Born at Mühlhausen, Thuringia, in 1553; died at Berlin in 1611. A German musician, noted as a composer of church music. In 1589 he was made kapellmeister to the margrave of Brandenburg at Königsberg; in 1608 he was given the same position under the Kurfürst at Berlin. He wrote both sacred music and songs.

Ecce Homo (ek'sê hô'mô). [L., 'behold, the man!'] The name given (from the words of Pilate) to representations of Christ with the crown of thorns. Among the best-known paintings of this subject is one by Titian (1543), in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. Christ, bleeding and crowned with thorns, is led out from the palace above a flight of steps by soldiers. Below are a mocking company of soldiers and people, in which a portrait of the sultan Suliman is conspicuous.

Ecce Homo: A Survey of the Life and Work of Jesus Christ. The chief work of Professor John Robert Seeley of Cambridge, England. It was first published anonymously in 1865. It created much excitement among various Protestant denominations, and elicited a number of replies.

Eckhardt (ēk'härt), or Eckart, The trusty. [G. der treue Eckhardt.] An old man in German traditional lore, in the legend of Frau Holle or Holde (Venus). He appears in the Mansfeld country on the evening of Maundy Thursday with a white staff to save the people from the furious host which travels in Holle's train. His duties differ in different traditions. Sometimes he is the companion of Tammbauer, and has even been considered to be the same person. He is also said to be in the service of Holle, and to sit outside the Venusberg to warn passing knights of the dangers therein, to which the enamoured Tammbauer had abandoned himself. He is also doomed to abide at the Venusberg till the judgment.

Eckhart, or Eckart, or Eckardt; generally styled Meister. Born, probably at Strasburg, about 1260; died about 1328. The founder of German mysticism. He was accused of heresy in 1327, but denied the charge and appealed to the Pope, who declared in 1329 (bull "In Cena Domini," March 27) that Eckhart's doctrines were partly heretical.

Ector, or Hector, de Maris, Sir. In Arthurian romance, the brother of Sir Lancelot. He mourned his death with a bitter lament, and afterward went with Sir Bois and seven other knights to the Holy Land, where they died on a Good Friday.

Ecuador (ēk'wā-dor; Sp. pron. ā-kwā-dōr'). [Sp. República del Ecuador, Republic of the Equator.] A republic of South America, lying between Colombia on the north, Peru on the south, and the Pacific Ocean on the west. Eastward its claims extend to the confines of Brazil, but Colombia and Peru dispute all the territory to the eastern base of the Andes. At present (1894) the actual jurisdiction of Ecuador extends to about long. 73° W., on the river Napo, and does not include any part of the Marathon or upper Amazon. The country is traversed from north to south by the Andes, which form a continuous eastern range and a roughly parallel but much broken western range, containing some of the highest peaks in South America and numerous volcanoes. Between the mountains there are several high table-lands or basins. The coast regions and those east of the mountains are low, hot, and covered in great part with forest. The principal products and exports are cacao, hides, sugar, and rubber. The inhabitants are whites (of Spanish descent), Indians, and mixed races. The executive is vested in a president elected for 4 years, and congress consists of 2 chambers. There are 16 provinces besides the Galapagos Islands. The Roman Catholic is the state religion, and the only one tolerated. Capital, Quito. At the time of the conquest, the greater part of Ecuador was subject to the Incas of Peru. It was conquered by the Spaniards 1533-34, and under the name of Kingdom of Quito was a presidency attached to the viceroyalty of Peru. The Spanish rulers being expelled with the aid of Bolívar 1822-23, the country was united to the Colombian confederation until 1830, when it seceded and adopted its present name. Since then it has suffered greatly from political revolutions. Area in jurisdiction, about 155,000 square miles; claimed, 275,964 square miles. Population, about 1,260,000.

Edam (ē'dam). A town in the province of North Holland, Netherlands, situated near the Zuider Zee 11 miles northeast of Amsterdam. It is noted for its cheese. Population (1891) 6,424.

Edda (ed'ä). [ON. Edda, poetics. Etymologically connected with ON. æðr, poetry, meter, mind, soul.] A work written (in prose and verse) by Snorri Sturluson (born 1178; died by assassination 1241), containing the old mythology of Scandinavia and the old rules for verse-making; also, a collection of ancient Icelandic poems. The name Edda (whether given by Snorri himself is not known) occurs in the inscription of one of the manuscripts of the work. Snorri's Edda as it was originally written consisted of three parts: the Gylfaginning (deception of Gylfi), an epitome of the old mythology; Skaldskaparmál (art of poetry), an explanation of poetical expressions and periphrases; and Háttatal (list of meters), a laudatory poem on the Norwegian king Hakon Hakonson, and Jarl Skuli, in which all forms of verse used in the old poetry are exemplified. To this was ultimately added a Fornmál (preface), and the Bragaræður (sayings of Bragi), describing the origin of poetry, and in some manuscripts Thulur, or a rimed glossary of synonyms, lists of poets, etc. The work was intended as a handbook of poets. In the year 1643 the Icelandic bishop Brynjulf Sveinsson discovered a collection of old mythological poems which was erroneously ascribed to Sæmund Sigfusson (born 1056; died 1133), and hence called from him Sæmundar Edda hins Frodha, the Edda of Sæmund the Learned. The poems that compose this Edda are of unknown origin and authorship. They are supposed to have been collected about the middle of the 13th century, but were composed at widely different periods down from the 9th century, to the first half of which the oldest is to be assigned; hence the name now given to this collection, the Elder or Poetic Edda, in distinction from the Younger or Prose Edda of Snorri, to which alone the name Edda legitimately belonged. The Elder Edda is usually considered to include 32 poems (some of them fragmentary), 29 of which are in Brynjulf's MS., the Codex Regius of the Edda, and three from other sources.

Eddystone (ed'i-stōn) Rocks. ['Whirlpool rocks.'] A reef in the English Channel, south of Cornwall, in lat. 50° 10' 49" N., long. 4° 16' W. On them a famous lighthouse was erected 1696-99, and has been rebuilt in 1706, 1756-59, and 1879-82. In the present structure the light (159,600 candle-power) is 133 feet above the sea, and can be seen for 17½ miles.

Eden (ē'den). [Traditionally derived from Heb. 'eden, delight, pleasure, probably connected with Babylonian edinnu, field or park.] In biblical history, the name of the first abode of man, in the midst of which a garden, the garden of Eden (the "paradise"), was planted. The position of Eden is described in Gen. ii. 8 ff. by four rivers that go out from it, and by the countries they surround or pass in their course. Of these two, the Euphrates and Tigris (Hebrew Perath and Hiddekel), are the well-known rivers of Mesopotamia; and the other two, Pishon and Gihon, have been identified with various streams. One of the latest hypotheses, that of Friedrich Delitzsch, assumes that the narrator in Genesis thought Eden located near the city of Babylon and meant by the rivers Pishon and Gihon two canals; he also attempts to identify the countries mentioned in this passage with territories in that region. It is generally agreed that the description in Genesis alludes to the Mesopotamian valley.

Eden. A river in Westmoreland and Cumberland, England, which flows into Solway Firth 8 miles northwest of Carlisle. There are other small rivers of this name in Great Britain. Length, about 65 miles.

Eden, Emily. Born in Old Palace Yard, Westminster, March 3, 1797; died at Richmond, England, Aug. 5, 1869. An English novelist and traveler, daughter of William Eden, first Baron Auckland. She resided in India 1835-42, and wrote "Portraits of the People and Princes of India" (1814), "The semi-detached House" (1859), "The semi-detached Couple" (1860), etc.

Eden, George, Earl of Auckland. Born near Beckenham, Kent, Aug. 25, 1784; died Jan. 1, 1849. An English statesman, son of William Eden, first Lord Auckland. He was president of the Board of Trade and master of the mint in Lord Grey's cabinet (1830-34), first lord of the admiralty 1834 and 1835, and governor-general of India 1835-42. He ordered the deposition of Dost Mohammed in 1838, and thus commenced the Afghan war. He was created earl of Auckland in 1839.

Eden, Richard. Born about 1521; died 1576. An English translator. He studied at Cambridge; held a position in the treasury 1544-46; was private secretary to Sir W. Cecil 1552; and was appointed to a place in the English treasury of Prince Philip of Spain in 1554, a position which he lost soon after, owing to an accusation of heresy. In 1562 he entered the service of a French nobleman, with whom he traveled extensively. Eden's name as a translator is appended to many books on geography, travels, navigation, etc. Among these are "A Treatise of the Newe India" (1553; a translation of part of Munster's "Cosmographia"), which is the first intelligible description in English of America; and "Decades of the Newe World" (1555; mainly a translation of Peter Martyr's work).

Eden, William. Born April 3, 1744; died May 28, 1814. The first Lord Auckland, son of Sir Robert Eden of Winderstone Hall, Durlham. He entered Parliament in 1774; was one of the commissioners sent to America in 1778; held various offices in the ministry; was employed to negotiate a commercial treaty and other agreements with France 1785-87; and was ambassador to Spain and to Holland. He was raised to the peerage in 1789. He wrote "Principles of Penal Law" (1772), "History of New Holland" (1787), etc.

Edessa (ē-des'sj), or Ægæ (ē'jē). In ancient geography, the early capital of Macedonia, represented by the modern Vodena, 47 miles west-northwest of Saloniki.

Edessa. A city in Mesopotamia, in the vilayet of Aleppo, Turkey, in lat. 37° 13' N., long. 38° 25' E.; the modern Urfa or Orfa. Its ancient name was also Antiochia or Callirrhoe. It became the capital of an independent kingdom in 137 B. C., and under Trajan was made tributary to Rome. In the 4th and 5th centuries it was an important seat of Christian learning. It belonged to Mohammedan powers, except in the 11th century, when it was held by the Byzantine empire, and in 1097-1144, when it was held by the Crusaders and was the capital of a Latin principality of Edessa. It was sacked by the Turks in 1147, and was finally possessed by them in 1637. Population, estimated, 40,000.

Edfu (ed'fō). A town in Upper Egypt, situated near the left bank of the Nile in lat. 24° 59' N.; the ancient Apollinopolis Magna, Coptic Atho. The celebrated temple of Edfu is the most perfect existing example of an ancient Egyptian religious edifice. It was founded by Ptolemy Philopator in 222 B. C. The entrance is by a massive double pylon 250 feet wide and 115 high, from which the strong inclosing wall is carried around the temple. Within the pylon lies the great court with its peristyle of columns. Behind it lies the hypostyle hall, to the rear of which is a second hall with 3 ranges of 4 columns, from which opens the double vestibule of the isolated sanctuary, on the passage around which are placed, as usual, a number of small chambers. The abundant sculptures, though in style mere imitations of the older Pharaonic work, are from their subjects both interesting and instructive. The length of the temple is 450 feet.

Edgar (ed'gär), or Eadgar. Born 944; died July 8, 975. A king of England, son of Edmund (Eadmund) and Ælfgifu. He ascended the throne in 958 as successor to his brother Eadwig (Edwy). He ruled the whole nation (West Saxons, Northumbrians, and Mercians), and his quiet reign gained for him the surname "The Peaceful." He is said to have ceded Lothian (northern Bernicia) to Kenneth of Scotland.

Edgar. In Shakspeare's "King Lear," the son of the Earl of Gloucester.

Edinburgh (ed'n-bur-g), or Edinburghshire, or Mid-Lothian. A county of Scotland, lying between the Firth of Forth on the north, Haddington, Berwick, and Roxburgh on the east, Selkirk, Peebles, and Lanark on the south, and Linlithgow on the northwest. Area, 362 square miles. Population (1891), 434,276.

Edinburgh (ed'n-bur-g). [Formerly Edinborow, Edinbro, ME. Edinburh, Edenborow, earlier Edwinesburgh, Edwinesburg, AS. Eadwines burh, Edwin's castle.] The ancient capital of Scotland, in the county of Edinburgh, 2 miles south of the Firth of Forth, in lat.

55° 57' N., long. 3° 12' W.; often called "the modern or northern Athens," both from its topography and as a seat of learning. See Dunedin. It is noted for its picturesque situation on ridges near Calton Hill and Arthur's Seat. It is the seat of the judicial and administrative government of the country, and an important publishing and literary center. It contains a university, castle, Holyrood Palace, Scott monument, St. Giles's Church, the Parliament House (with the Advocates' Library), the Royal Institution, the National Gallery, St. Mary's Cathedral, and various charitable and educational institutions. The castle, a citadel and palace, occupies a high rock in the middle of the city. The exterior has been greatly modified, but much in the interior remains as of old, including some of the royal apartments and the Romanesque chapel. Here are preserved the royal regalia of Scotland. The Parliament House is now occupied by the Supreme Law Courts. It is a large Renaissance building, with porticos of Ionic columns over an arcaded and rusticated basement. The great hall has a handsome roof of oak, and contains interesting portraits and statues. The cathedral (St. Giles's Church) was founded in the 12th century, but the present structure is of the 15th. The interior has high nave-pillars and pointed arches. The transept is Norman, with massive piers supporting the tower. The fine recessed and sculptured west doorway is modern. St. Mary's Cathedral, the masterpiece of Sir G. Gilbert Scott, was completed 1879. It is a spacious structure in the Early English style, with an imposing central spire 295 feet high. Edinburgh was fortified by the Northumbrian king Edwin (whence its name Edwio's Burgh) about 617; succeeded Perth as the capital 1437; was taken and sacked by the English in 1544, and again (by Cromwell) in 1650; and was occupied by the Young Pretender in 1745. It is famous in the literary history of the last half of the 18th and first half of the 19th century, through its connection with Hume, Robertson, Dugald Stewart, Adam Smith, Burns, Scott, Wilson, the "Edinburgh Review," etc. Population (1891), 261,261.

Edinburgh, Duke of. See Alfred.

Edinburgh, University of. A famous seat of learning, founded in 1582 by James VI. It comprises the faculties of arts, divinity, law, and medicine. Its library contains about 150,000 volumes and 2,600 manuscripts. There are 42 professors, besides lecturers, and the number of matriculated students in 1892-93 was 3,227. Conjointly with the University of St. Andrews it sends a member to Parliament. The large university building is of the 18th century. The celebrated medical school occupies a magnificent modern Renaissance building.

Edinburgh Review. A literary and political review, founded at Edinburgh in 1802 by Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, Brougham, Horner, and others.

A knot of clever lads (Smith was 31, Jeffrey 29, Brown 24, Horner 24, and Brougham 23) met in the third (not, as Smith afterwards said, the "eighth or ninth") storey of a house in Edinburgh, and started the journal by acclamation. Leslie Stephen, Hours in a Library, III, 140.

Edison (ed'i-son), Thomas Alva. Born at Milan, Ohio, Feb. 11, 1847. A celebrated American inventor. He became at the age of twelve a newsboy on the Grand Trunk Line running into Detroit, and subsequently a telegraph operator. He came in 1871 to New York, where he perfected the duplex telegraph (1872), and invented the printing telegraph for gold and stock quotations, for the manufacture of which later appliance he established a workshop at Newark, N. J. In 1876 he removed to Menlo Park, N. J., and later to West Orange, N. J., where he has devoted himself to inventing. Among his inventions are his system of duplex telegraphy (which he subsequently developed into quadruplex and sextuplex transmission), the carbon telephone transmitter, the micro-transmitter, the aeroplane, the megaphone, the phonograph, and the incandescent electric lamp.

Edisto (ed'is-tō). A river in South Carolina, formed by the union of the north and the south branch, and flowing into the sea by two channels about 25 miles southwest of Charleston. Length, over 150 miles.

Edith (ē'dith). [ME. Edith (ML. Editha), AS. Eadgith.] Died at Winchester, Dec. 19, 1075. An Anglo-Saxon queen. She was the daughter of Godwine, earl of Wessex, and married Edward the Confessor in 1045, receiving Winchester and Exeter as her morning gift. She is said to have planned the murder of Gospatric, one of the king's thegns, in 1064, at the instigation of her brother Tostig, earl of Northumberland. She founded a church at Wilton, which was consecrated in 1065; and on the death of her husband retired to Winchester, in the quiet possession of which she was allowed to remain by William the Conqueror.

Edith. 1. One of the principal characters in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Bloody Brother."— 2. The Maid of Lorn in Scott's poem "The Lord of the Isles."

Edith Dombey. See Dombey.

Ediya (ed-ē'yā). The black tribes which inhabit the island Fernando Po, West Africa. Physically degenerate, they also live in a very low state of culture. They speak a Bantu language which is related to those of the fronting mainland and subdivides itself into a number of dialects. Some authors call it Fernandian. From their form of salutation, the Ediya are generally known by the name of Babis. Those who have adopted Christianity are making progress in civilization.

Edmund (ed'mund), or Eadmund, Saint. [AS. Eadmund, L. Edmundus, F. Edmond, It. Edmondo, Sp. Pg. Edmundo.] Born about 840; killed by the Danes 870. King of East Anglia 855-870.

Edmund, Saint. Born at Abingdon, England, Nov. 20, probably between 1170 and 1175; died at Soisy, France, Nov. 16, 1240. Archbishop of Canterbury. He was the son of one Edward or Reinold Rich, studied at Oxford and Paris, and in 1233 was appointed archbishop of Canterbury. He came forward as a champion of the national church against papal encroachment; but, finding himself unable to resist the appointment of 300 Italians to as many English benefices, abandoned his archiepiscopal see in 1240 and took refuge in the monastery of Pontigny, in France. He died at Soisy, whither he had gone for the benefit of his health, and was canonized in 1247. He is also called Edmund Rich and Edmund of Pontigny.

Edmund I., or Eadmund, surnamed Magnificus ('the Magnificent'). Born about 922; killed at Pucklechurch, Gloucester, England, May 26, 946. King of the West Saxons and Mercians. He was the son of Edward the Elder, and a brother of Athelstan whom he succeeded in 940. He subdued Cumbria (945), which he bestowed on Malcolm I. of Scotland. He was killed by a robber named Liofa while keeping the feast of St. Augustine of Canterbury at Pucklechurch, Gloucestershire. The robber having entered the hall unbidden, the king ordered a cup-bearer to remove him, and when the robber resisted came to the cup-bearer's relief. In the struggle that ensued he was stabbed to death with a dagger.

Edmund II., or Eadmund, surnamed Ironside. Born probably about 989; died, probably at London, Nov. 30, 1016. King of the West Saxons. He was the son of Ethelred "the Unready," whom he succeeded in April, 1016. After many victories over the Danes, he was defeated in a bloody battle at Assandun (Ashington) in Essex by Canute, with whom he was forced to divide his kingdom, provision being made, it is said, that the survivor should be sole king. He retained Wessex, Essex, East Anglia, and London, while Canute received Northumberland and Mercia. His death, which was probably due to natural causes, has been attributed by later tradition to poison administered by Eadric Streona at the instance of Canute. After his death Canute took possession of the whole kingdom.

Edmund. In Shakspeare's "King Lear," a bastard son of the Earl of Gloucester.

Edmunds (ed'mundz), George Franklin. Born at Richmond, Vt., Feb. 1, 1828. An American statesman. He was a Republican senator from Vermont to Congress 1866-91; was a member of the Electoral Commission in 1877; and was acting Vice-President 1883-85. He is the author of the Edmunds Act of 1882 for the suppression of polygamy in Utah, and of an act passed in 1887 pertaining to the same subject.

Edmunds, John. A felon, the principal character of the tale "The Convict's Return," in Charles Dickens's "Pickwick Papers."

Edohwe (ed'ō-hwā). A tribe or division of North American Indians, formerly living on Klamath River, Siskiyou County, California, where a few now remain. In 1851 it had 24 villages, with an estimated population of 1,440. See Sastean.

Edom (ē'dom), or Idumea (id-ū-mē'ā). [Heb., 'reddish,' 'muddy.'] The region in the lowland south of the Dead Sea, bounded on the west by the desert of Paran, and on the northeast by the mountains of Moab: the modern Wadi el Arabah and the surrounding mountainous country, extending southward to the Ælantic Gulf, and including the seaports Elath and Eziongeber. The most important cities of this rugged barren territory were Bozrah, the capital Maon, Phunon, and Sela, afterward called Petra, from which the whole district was named Petra. The Edomites were descendants of Esau, the brother of Jacob, and were, therefore, designated as "brothers of Israel" (Num. xx, 14, Deut. ii, 4, 8), but became later the hereditary enemies of Israel: Saul attacked them (I Sam. xiv, 47) and subdued them (2 Sam. viii, 13). After the division of the Israelitish kingdom they came under the supremacy of Judah, but made frequent and sometimes successful attempts to regain their independence. They were for the last time subjected by Uzziah about the middle of the 8th century B. C. Tiglath-Pileser III. made (about 743) Kauš Malik, king of Edom, tributary. Esarhaddon (684-668) mentions Kauš Gabri of Edom among the tributary kings. In the time of Nehuchadnezzar (604-561) Edom, still ruled by a king, was attacked by the Babylonians. During the captivity they took possession of portions of Judea, while their own territory was occupied by Arabic tribes, the Nabatheans, and was called, after the city of Petra, Arabia Petra. The Hasmonean king John Hyrcanus took Dora and Morissa and forced the Idumeans to accept Judaism about 130 B. C. Afterward they became the rulers of the Jews in the person of Antipater and his descendants the Herodians. The last king of this race, Herod Agrippa II., died about 100 A. D., but the name of Idumea vanishes from history with the fall of Judea.

Edred, or Eadred (ed'red). Died at Frome, England, Nov. 23, 955. A king of England, youngest son of Edward the Elder and Eadgifu, and brother of Edmund I. whom he succeeded in 946. His government was controlled by his mother and Dunstan; his reign was marked by revolts in Northumbria.

Edrei (ed're-i). [Heb., 'strong,' 'mighty,']

In Old Testament history, the capital of Og, king of Bashan. Near it Og was defeated by the Israelites. The city was with the territory assigned to the tribe of Manasseh.

Edric (ed'rik), or Eadric. Put to death by Canute, 1017. An English nobleman, ealdorman of Mercia, chief adviser of Æthelred the Unready.

Edrisi. See Ibriis.

Edward (ed'wärd), surnamed "The Elder." [AS. Eadweard, guardian of property, L. Edwardus, F. Edouard, It. Eduardo, Edoardo, Odoardo, Sp. Eduardo, Pg. Eduardo, Duarte, G. Eduard.] Died at Farnold, Northamptonshire, in 925. King of the West Saxons, son of Alfred the Great whom he succeeded in 901. He defeated his cousin Ethelwald, who disputed his title to the throne. On the death of his sister Ethelreda (Ethelreda), the widow of Æthelred, ealdorman of Mercia, he incorporated Mercia (which had long acknowledged the overlordship of the West-Saxon kings) with Wessex. He completed the conquest of the Danelagh, or Five Boroughs of the Danes, conquered East Anglia and Essex, and received the submission of Strathclyde and all the Scots. At his death he ruled Wessex, Kent, and Sussex by inheritance; Mercia, Essex, and East Anglia by conquest; and Northumberland, Wales, Scotland, and Strathclyde as overlord.

Edward, surnamed "The Martyr." Born probably in 963; murdered March 18, 979. King of the West Saxons, son of Edgar whom he succeeded in 975. He was elected by the witan through the influence of Saint Dunstan, primate of England, in spite of the measures taken by his stepmother, Elfrida, to secure the crown for her son Æthelred. He was murdered by her order, and was succeeded by his stepbrother, Æthelred II.

Edward, surnamed "The Confessor," from his reputed sanctity. Born at Islip, Oxfordshire, about 1004; died Jan. 5, 1066. King of the West Saxons, son of Æthelred II. and Emma of Normandy. He lived chiefly in Normandy during the Danish supremacy, and was elected to the throne of his father through the influence of Godwine, earl of Wessex, on the death of Harthacnut, in 1042. He married Edgitha, daughter of Godwine, in 1045. He died without issue, and was succeeded by his wife's brother Harold, whose title was disputed by William, duke of Normandy. A notable event of his reign was the compilation, in 1070, of the so-called "Laws of Edward the Confessor." He was canonized in 1161.

Edward I., surnamed "Longshanks." Born at Westminster, England, June 17-18, 1239; died at Burgh-on-the-Sands, near Carlisle, England, July 7, 1307. King of England 1272-1307. He was the son of Henry III. and Eleanor of Provence. In 1254 he married Eleanor of Castile. He took an active part in the struggle between his father and the barons, inflicting a decisive defeat on their leader, Simon de Montfort, at Evesham in 1265. He engaged, 1270-72, in the seventh Crusade, and was returning from the Holy Land when he heard of his accession to the throne. He reached England in 1274, in which year he was crowned. In 1276 he began the conquest of Wales, which had become practically independent during the barons' wars, and in 1284 annexed that country to England. He expelled the Jews from England in 1290. On the death of the Maid of Norway, granddaughter of Alexander III. of Scotland, the Scottish estates were unable to decide between the two chief claimants to the throne, Baliol and Bruce, with the result that Edward was appointed arbitrator. He decided in favor of Baliol, whose homage he received. In 1294 he became involved in a war with France, which formed an alliance with Scotland. In 1296 he defeated the Scots at Dunbar, compelled Baliol to resign the crown, carried the Scotch coronation-stone to London, and placed Scotland under an English regent, who was, however, defeated by the patriot Sir William Wallace in 1297. Edward defeated the Scots under Wallace in the battle of Falkirk, July 22, 1298. In 1303 he concluded the peace of Amiens with France, having married in 1299 Philip IV.'s sister, Margaret. Invading Scotland in 1303, he received the submission of Bruce, and in 1305 he ordered the execution of Wallace, who had been betrayed to the English. He died on the way to Scotland, where a new insurrection had placed Bruce on the throne in 1306. Among the chief internal events of his reign were the publication of the first statute of Winchester in 1275; the separation of the old King's Court into three tribunals (the Court of Exchequer, Court of King's Bench, and Court of Common Pleas); the development of the jurisdiction of the Royal Council (later the Star Chamber) and of the chancellor; the publication of the statute of mortmain in 1279, and the statute of Winchester in 1285; and the summons in 1295 of the first perfect Parliament.

Edward II. Born at Carnarvon, Wales, April 25, 1284; murdered at Berkeley Castle, near Gloucester, England, Sept. 21, 1327. King of England 1307-27. He was the fourth son of Edward I. by his first wife, Eleanor of Castile. He was created in 1301 the first Prince of Wales. On his accession to the throne he recalled his favorite, Piers Gaveston, who had been banished by Edward I. He married Isabella of France in 1308. The insolence of Gaveston having aroused the anger of the barons, the favorite was banished through their influence in 1308, only to be shortly recalled by the king. In 1310, in consequence of the incompetence of Edward, who was completely under the ascendancy of Gaveston, the government was intrusted by the barons to 21 ordinaries, who procured the passage of the ordinances of the Parliament of 1311, in accordance with which Gaveston was exiled, and provisions were made for annual Parliaments and for the reform of administrative abuses. In 1312 the barons brought about the execution of Gaveston, who had been recalled by the king. In 1314 Edward was defeated by the Scots under Robert Bruce at the battle of Bannockburn (June 24). The exile of his new favorites, the two Despuchers, by Parliament in 1321 involved him in a war with the barons, who were defeated at the battle of Boroughbridge in 1322. In 1323, after an unsuccessful invasion of Scotland, he concluded a peace for thirteen years with Bruce, whose assumption of the royal title was passed over in silence. His queen, Isabella, having in 1325 been sent to France to negotiate with Charles IV. concerning the English fleets in France, intrigued with Roger Mortimer and other disaffected barons, landed in England in 1326, captured Bristol, executed the Despuchers, and imprisoned Edward, who was deposed by Parliament and murdered in Berkeley Castle.

Edward III. Born at Windsor, England, Nov. 13, 1312; died at Shene (Richmond), England, June 21, 1377. King of England 1327-77. He was the son of Edward II. and Isabella of France. On the deposition of his father, he was proclaimed king under a council of regency, the actual government being exercised by the queen and her favorite, Roger Mortimer. He married Philippa of Hainault in 1328, and in the same year concluded the treaty of Northampton with the Scots, in which Robert Bruce was recognized as king. In 1330 he took the government into his own hands, securing the execution of Mortimer and imprisoning the queen-mother. On the death of Bruce in 1329, Edward Baliol seized the crown, to the exclusion of Bruce's infant son David. Baliol did homage to Edward, and a revolt of the nobles drove him across the border. Edward defeated the national party at Halidon Hill in 1333, and restored Baliol. In 1338 he became involved in a war with France (the Hundred Years' War), whose throne he claimed in right of his mother. In 1346, at the battle of Neville's Cross, his army defeated the Scots under David II. (Bruce), who had recovered the Scottish throne in 1342; the Scots, however, succeeded in maintaining their independence. He gained with his son, the Black Prince, the victory of Crécy over the French in 1346, and reduced Calais in 1347, while the Black Prince gained the battle of Poitiers in 1356. In 1360 he concluded with the French the peace of Breigny, by which he renounced the French crown and Normandy, Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, in return for the cession in full sovereignty to England of Aquitaine, Ponthieu, Guisnes, and Calais. He subsequently, in a war with Charles V., lost all his possessions in France, with the exception of Bordeaux, Calais, and Bayonne. During his reign occurred several visitations of the "black death" (1348-49, 1361, and 1369).

Edward IV. Born at Rouen, France, probably April 29, 1441; died April 9, 1483. King of England 1461-83. He was the son of Richard, duke of York, and Cecily Nevill, daughter of the Earl of Westmoreland. He was known as the Earl of March previous to his accession, and played a prominent part in the struggle of his house (the house of York) with that of Lancaster for the possession of the throne. In conjunction with the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick he defeated the Lancastrians under Henry VI. at Northampton in 1460, and took the king prisoner. His father, the Duke of York, was defeated and killed at the battle of Wakefield later in the same year, whereupon Edward succeeded to the title, defeated the Lancastrians at the battle of Mortimer's Cross in 1461, and was proclaimed king at London March 4, 1461. The early part of his reign was disturbed by constant attempts of the Lancastrians to regain the throne. In 1464 he secretly married Elizabeth Grey, daughter of Richard Woodville, Baron Rivers, and widow of Sir John Grey, a Lancastrian, which caused a revolution under the Earl of Warwick, who joined forces with the Lancastrians and proclaimed the deposed and captive Henry VI. king. Edward suppressed the rising in the battles of Barnet (April 14, 1471) and Tewkesbury (May 4, 1471), in the former of which Warwick was slain.

Edward V. Born in Westminster Abbey, Nov. 2 or 3, 1470; murdered in the Tower of London in 1483. King of England April-June, 1483. He was the son of Edward IV. by Elizabeth Woodville. He succeeded to the throne under the regency of his uncle Richard, duke of Gloucester, who secretly put him and his brother to death and usurped the government.

Edward VI. Born at Hampton Court, England, Oct. 12, 1537; died at Greenwich, near London, July 6, 1553. King of England 1547-1553. He was the son of Henry VIII. by his third queen, Jane Seymour, and succeeded to the throne under the regency of his uncle, the Duke of Somerset, who was supplanted about 1550 by the Duke of Northumberland. During his reign occurred the publication of the 42 articles of religion and the introduction of the Book of Common Prayer. Before his death he was induced by the Duke of Northumberland to assign the crown to Lady Jane Grey, to the exclusion of Mary and Elizabeth.

Edward, Prince of Wales, called "The Black Prince." Born at Woodstock, England, June 15, 1330; died at Westminster, England, June 8, 1376. Son of Edward III. He fought with distinction at Crécy in 1346; gained the victory of Poitiers in 1356; was created duke of Aquitaine in 1363; defeated the Castilians at Navarrete in 1367; and stormed Limoges in 1369.

Edward I. A play by Peele, printed in 1593.

This work occupies a very noteworthy position in the progress of English tragedy; for it marks the transition from the Chronicle Histories, of which we met with an example in Bale's "Kynge Johan," where elements of the morality are still present, to the Histories of Shakspeare. Ward, Hist. Dram. Lit.

Edward II. A tragedy by Marlowe, entered on the Stationers' Register July 6, 1593. It was probably written about 1590, but was not published till 1598, after Marlowe's death. Charles Lamb remarks that "the reluctant pangs of abdication royalty in Edward furnished hints which Shakspeare since improved in his Richard III."

Edward III. A tragedy attributed to Marlowe, founded on Holinshed's "Chronicle," acted in 1590. It was entered on the Stationers' Register in 1595; was printed anonymously in 1596, and at one time was attributed to Shakspeare.

Edward IV. A play by Heywood, printed in 1600.

Edwardes (ed'wärdz), Sir Herbert Benjamin. Born at Frolesley, Shropshire, England, Nov. 12, 1819; died at London, Dec. 23, 1868. An English general and author, distinguished in the Sikh wars in India 1845-49. He published "A Year on the Punjab Frontier" (1851), etc.

Edwards (ed'wärdz), Amelia Blandford. Born at London in 1831; died at Weston Super Mare, Somerset, April 15, 1892. An English novelist, miscellaneous writer, and Egyptologist. She showed talent for drawing and music, and in 1853 began to write for periodicals, and devoted herself from 1880 to archeological studies. In 1883 she became the honorary secretary of the Egyptian exploration fund. She received the title of doctor of philosophy from Columbia College, New York, and lectured on the antiquities of Egypt, etc., in 1889 and in succeeding years in the United States. "A Thousand Miles up the Nile" (1877) was illustrated from her own sketches. Among her novels are "Barbara's History" (1864), "Lord Brackenbury" (1860), "Debenham's Vow" (1870), "Half a Million of Money," "Miss Carew" (1865), "Hand in Glove," etc. She also wrote "A Summary of English History" (1856), "An Abridgment of French History" (1858), "Pharaohs, Fellahs, and Explorers" (1891), etc., and in 1905 published a volume of ballads.

Edwards, Bryan. Born at Westbury, Wiltshire, May 21, 1743; died at Southampton, July 15, 1800. An English West India merchant and historian. He lived in Jamaica 1760-92, when he returned to England. He established a bank at Southampton, and in 1796 was elected to Parliament. He is best known for his "History of the British Colonies in the West Indies," of which the first two volumes were published in 1793; later editions are greatly enlarged, the best being that of 1819. His "Historical Survey of St. Domingo," first published in 1797, is generally appended to the later editions of the "History."

Edwards, George. Born at Stratford, Essex, England, April 3, 1693; died at Plaistow, near London, July 23, 1773. An English naturalist. He published a "History of Birds" (1745-51), "Gleanings of Natural History" (1758-64; 3 volumes additional to the "History"), etc.

Edwards, Henri Milne. See Milne Edwards.

Edwards, Jonathan. Born at East Windsor, Conn., Oct. 5, 1703; died at Princeton, N. J., March 22, 1758. An eminent American theologian and metaphysician. He was pastor of the Congregational Church at Northampton, Massachusetts, 1727-50; missionary to the Indians at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, 1751-58; and president of Princeton College in 1758. He published "A Treatise concerning the Religious Affections" (1746), "Qualifications for Full Communion in the Visible Church" (1749), "An Essay on the Freedom of the Will" (his most celebrated work, published 1754), "Doctrine of Original Sin Defended" (1758), "History of the Redemption" (1772).

Egypt (é'jijpt). [Heb. Mizraim, ASSYR. Muqur, AR. Miqr, COPTIC Keme, GR. Αἴγυπτος, L. Ægyptus, F. Égypte, G. Ägypten, I. Egitto.] 1. A country in northeastern Africa, now a dependency of Turkey, famous for the great antiquity and former splendor of its civilization. It is bounded by the Mediterranean on the north, and extends southward, including the delta and the valley of the Nile, to the first cataract (lat. 24° 6' N.). On the east it is bounded by the Gulf of Suez and the Red Sea, and on the west by the desert. It includes also the Sinaitic peninsula and a strip on the western coast of Arabia. The present southern limit of its possessions is in the neighborhood of the second cataract. Egypt proper consists practically of the delta and a narrow strip on each side of the Nile. The soil has been celebrated for its productiveness, due to the inundations of the river, and it was long the granary of Rome. Modern Egypt has 14 mudiriyehs or provinces, with Cairo as the capital and Alexandria as the seaport. The government is a hereditary vicerealty, ruled by a khedive, subordinate to Turkey. The inhabitants are Egyptians (fellahien, town-people, and Bedawin), Nubians, Abyssinians, Levantines, Turks, negroes, Armenians, Jews, and Europeans. The leading religion is Mohammedan, but there are many Copts. The prevailing language is Arabic. The history of ancient Egypt was given by Manetho under 31 dynasties. (See Manetho.) These dynasties are thus grouped by Mariette: the Ancient Empire, dynasties I.-XI.; the Middle Empire, dynasties XI.-XVIII.; the New Empire, dynasties XVIII.-XXXI. The 1st dynasty was founded by Menes in 5004 B. C., according to Mariette. During the early dynasties Memphis was the center, and in the time of the 4th occurred the building of the Pyramids (about 4000 B. C.—Mariette). The construction of Lake Moeris and the Labyrinth are assigned to the 12th dynasty. Thebes now became the center, and later the invasion of the Hyksos occurred (in the 15th dynasty). After a period of confusion and obscurity Egypt was united under the great Theban 18th dynasty, and under this and the 19th reached its highest point in extent and in the grandeur of its monuments. Among the great sovereigns were Thothmes III., Seti I., and Rameses II. The "Pharaoh of the Exodus" has frequently been identified with Menephtah of the 19th dynasty, and the date stated approximately at about 1300 B. C. With the next dynasty began the decline. There were some revivals of power, and in the 7th and 6th centuries Greek settlements began; but in 527 B. C. Egypt was conquered by Cambyses, and this Persian dynasty ranks as the 27th. From 406 B. C. native rulers again held power, but in 340 B. C. a short-lived Persian dynasty (the 31st and last of Manetho) began; this was overthrown in 332 B. C. by Alexander the Great. After his death Egypt was ruled by his general Ptolemy and Ptolemy's successors down to the death of Cleopatra (30 B. C.), when Augustus annexed it to the Roman Empire. Egypt was an important center of Christianity. In about 640 it was conquered by the Saracens, and formed in later times part of the Omniad and Abbasside empires. The Fatimites ruled it from 909 to 1171, and thereafter the Ayubites until 1250; to these succeeded the Mamelukes, who in turn were overthrown by the Turks under Selim I. in 1517. Egypt was invaded by Bonaparte in 1798, but the French were expelled in 1801. In 1806 Mehemet Ali became pasha, and the country developed greatly. A successful war with Turkey was cut short in 1840 by the intervention of the powers. In 1869 the Suez Canal was opened. From 1879 France and England exercised a joint supervision over the khedive; but a native revolt, begun under Arabi Pasha in 1881 and suppressed by England in 1882, was followed in 1883 by the abolition of the joint control, and the appointment of an English financial adviser. The Mahdists in the Sudan revolted in 1881-85, and in spite of the resistance of Gordon at Khartoum and the campaigns of Wolseley and others the provinces south of the second cataract were lost. Area, 380,000 square miles. Population, 6,817,265.

Ægyptus in old times the name of the Nile, which was so called by Homer (Odys. iv. 477; xiv. 257); and Strabo (xvii. p. 691) says the same was the opinion of Nearchus. Manetho pretends that the country received the name from Ægyptus, a surname of King Sethos (or Sethi). Aristotle thinks that "Ægypt was formerly called Thebes," and Herodotus states, in opposition to the opinion of the "Ionians," that "Thebes (i. e. the Thebaid) had of old the name of Egypt." And if this is not confirmed by the monuments, the word "Ægypt" was at all events connected with Egypt, a city of the Thebaid. From Keht, Koft, or Coptos, the modern inhabitants have been called Copts; its ancient name in hieroglyphics was Kwt-hor; and Mr. Poole is evidently right in supposing this to be the same as the Biblical Caphor. He thinks the name "Ægypt" is composed of Ata, "land," and Γύπτος; and is to be traced in the Ai-Capitor, "land (or coast) of Capitor," in Jeremiah (xvii. 4). The word Coptite is found in a Gnostic papyrus, supposed to be of the second century (see note 3 on ch. 83). Egypt is said to have been called originally Actia, and the Nile Aetos and Siris. Upper Egypt, or the Thebaid, has even been confounded with, and called, Ethiopia; perhaps too by Pliny (vi. 35; see notes on ch. 110); Nahum (iii. 9) calls Ethiopia and Egypt the strength of No (Thebes); and Strabo says (i. p. 57) that Menelaus' journey to Ethiopia really meant to Thebes. The modern name Musr or Misr is the same as the Biblical Mizraim, i. e. "the two Misrs," applied to Egypt, which corresponds to "the two regions" of the sculptures; but the word Misr does not occur on the monuments.

Rawlinton, Herod., II. 23.

2. A diocese of the prefecture of the East, in the later organization of the Roman Empire.

Egyptian Expedition, The. An expedition undertaken by the French against Egypt in 1798-1801, with the ultimate object of attacking the British empire in India. It was commanded by Napoleon Bonaparte; sailed from Toulon with 35,000 men May 19, 1798; conquered Malta June 12, 1798; defeated the Mamelukes in the battle of the Pyramids July 21, 1798; captured Cairo July 22, 1798; suffered the loss of its fleet by the victory of Nelson at Abukir Aug. 1, 1798; and in 1799 invaded Syria, but was in the same year repulsed by the Turks and the English at St. Jean d'Acre, and retreated to Cairo. In Aug., 1799, Bonaparte returned to France, leaving in command Kléber, who was murdered in 1800, and was succeeded by Menou. Menou concluded a treaty with the English at Cairo in 1801, in accordance with which Egypt was restored to the Ottoman Porte, and the French army transported to France by the English fleet.

Ein feste Burg (in fes'te börg). [G., 'a strong fortress.'] The first words of a hymn by Martin Luther ("Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott"), a version of Psalm xlvi. The hymn was probably written in 1530. The tune seems to have appeared in Koph's "Psalmen und geistliche Lieder," probably in 1538. The form now used is by Sebastian Bach, given in various cantatas, and differing slightly from Luther's original. The words have also been modernized.

Einhard (im'härd), incorrectly Eginhard. Born in Austrasia about 770; died at Seligenstadt on the Main, Germany, March 14, 840 (?). A Frankish scholar and biographer of Charles the Great. He was of noble birth, and was educated at the monastery of Fulda. He removed not later than 796 to the court of Charles the Great, by whom he was appointed minister of public works, and was sent in 806 as imperial legate to Rome. He was retained in office by Louis le Débonnaire, to whose son Lothaire he became tutor in 817. He retired in 830 to Mulinheim (which he named Seligenstadt), where he erected a monastery. He was married to Imma who was the sister of Bernhard, bishop of Worms, but who was transformed by later tradition into a daughter of Charles the Great. He wrote a life of Charles the Great ("Vita Caroli Magni").

Einsiedeln (in'zē-deln). [G., equiv. to L. solitarius, a hermitage; according to the legends, St. Meinrad (9th century) lived here as a hermit.] A town in the canton of Schwyz, Switzerland, 22 miles east-northeast of Lucerne. It is one of the most celebrated of pilgrim resorts. The monastery (nonasterium eremitarum) was founded in the 9th century, and in 1294 received the standing of a principality from the emperor Rudolph. The buildings of the monastery have suffered many rebuildings, the last early in the 18th century; and, though of great extent, the architecture is in an uninteresting Italian style. The large church has two slender towers; its interior is tawdry with gilding and ornament in questionable taste. In its portraits, library, and material resources, the venerable monastery is still rich. Population (1888), 8,506.

Ekron (ek'ron). [Heb., 'uprooting.'] One of the five chief cities of the Philistines, situated 12 miles northeast of Ashdod; the modern Akir. It contained an oracle. "According to the Assyrian inscriptions, when most of the towns in Palestine revolted on the death of Sargon, Padi, king of Ekron, remained faithful. His subjects, however, rebelled and handed him over to King Hezekiah, at Jerusalem, who retained him a prisoner until he was released and resettled on the throne by Sennacherib." Smith, Dict. of the Bible.

Elagabalus (ē-lā-gab'ā-lus), or Heliogabalus (hē-li-ō-gab'ā-lus) (originally Varius Avitus Bassianus). Born at Emesa, Syria, 205 A. D.; died 217. Emperor of Rome. He was the son of Sextus Varius Marcellus and Julia Soemias, and first cousin of Caracalla. He became while very young a priest in the temple of the sun-god Elagabalus at Emesa. Being put forward as the son of Caracalla, he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers in 218, in opposition to Macrinus who was defeated on the borders of Syria and Phœnicia in the same year. He gave himself up to the most infamous debauchery, and abandoned the government to his mother and grandmother. He adopted his cousin, Bassianus Alexander, who succeeded to the throne as Severus Alexander. He was put to death at Rome by the pretorians.

Elah (el'ah). Valley of. [Heb., 'valley of the cerebintin.'] The valley in which the Israelites were encamped when the duel between David and Goliath occurred; the modern Wady Es-Sant.

Elaine (e-lan'). In the Arthurian legends: (a) The half-sister of King Arthur. She bore a son, Mordred, to Arthur. (b) The daughter of King Pelles. She was the mother of Lancelot's son Sir Galahad. (c) The "lily maid of Astolat" who pined and died for Lancelot. Tennyson makes her story the subject of his "Elaine." (d) The daughter of King Brandegoris, who bore a child to Sir Bors de Ganis. In Malory's "Arthur" the statement is so worded that Elaine might be the name of the child. (e) The wife of Ban of Benoic (Brittany), mother of Sir Lancelot. She was also called Elein.

Elam (el'am). [In the Assyro-Babylonian inscriptions Elamtu, highland; OPers. Uvadsha (from which the modern Chuzistan arose), with the Greeks Κεσία (Herodotus), Sustiana (during the Macedonian period), and Elymais (Strabo).] The country and ancient empire east of the lower Tigris, south of Media, and north of the Persian Gulf. It is a country of fertile and picturesque mountains, valleys, and ravines, the only flat tract being on the shores of the Persian Gulf; and was in very high antiquity the seat of a mighty empire of which Susa was the capital. The oldest historical information about Elam is that it subjugated Babylonia about 2300-2076 B. C. The Elamite dynasty is identical with the Median of Berossus, which ruled over Babylonia about 2300-2076 B. C. Among these Elamite kings is very probably to be counted Chedorlaomer (Kudur-Lagamaru) of Gen. xiv. The next historical notice is that Elam was subdued by Nebuchadnezzar I., king of Babylonia, about 1130 B. C. From the 8th century B. C. on, Elam was connected with the rivalry between Assyria and Babylonia, supporting the latter against the former. Elam was defeated by Sargon in 721 and 710, and by Sennacherib in several campaigns, especially in the decisive battle at Halule on the Tigris about 691. In 645 Asurbanipal destroyed Susa. Soon after this catastrophe Elam is met with under the dominion of Theisepes. In union with Media and Persia it helped to bring about the fall of Assyria and Babylonia. It shared thenceforth the fate of the other Assyrian provinces, and had no history of its own. The ancient Elamites were not Semites. This is ascertained by the names of their kings, which are alien to all of the Semitic dialects, and by their representations on the monuments, which exhibit a type widely different from the Semitic. The enumeration of Elam among the sons of Shem in Gen. x. 22 may perhaps be accounted for by the fact that the Elamite valley was early settled by the Semites, who predominated over the non-Semitic element of the population, and also by the fact that the Elamites on the other hand had for more than two centuries the upper hand in Semitic Babylonia.

El-Araish (el-ä-räsh'), or El-Arish (el-ä-rësh'), or Larache. A seaport in Morocco, situated on the Atlantic in lat. 35° 13' N., long. 6° 9' W. Population, about 5,000.

El Dorado (el dö-rä'dō). [Sp., 'the gilded.'] The reputed king or chief of a fabulous city of great wealth (Manoa) which, during the 15th century, was supposed to exist somewhere in the northern part of South America. According to the story, the chief was periodically smeared with oil or balsam, and then covered with gold-dust until his whole body had a gilded appearance. Beginning about 1532, great numbers of expeditions were made by the Spaniards in search of this phantom: the explorers suffered terrible hardships, and hundreds died. The conquest and settlement of New Granada resulted from the quest; the mountain regions of Venezuela, the Orinoco and Amazon, and the great forests east of the Andes, were made known to the world; and later in the 16th century the English, led on by Sir Walter Raleigh, penetrated into Guiana, obtaining a claim on that country which resulted in their modern colony. It has been supposed that the story of El Dorado arose from a yearly ceremony of an Indian tribe near Bogota. The chief, it is said, was smeared with balsam and gold-dust, after which he threw gold, emeralds, etc., into a sacred lake and then bathed there. But this ceremony was never witnessed by the Spaniards, and the story may be simply another version of the Dorado myth. In common and poetical language the name El Dorado has been transferred to the city or country which was the object of the quest.

Eleusis (e-lū'sis). [Gr. Ἐλευσίς.] A deme of Attica, Greece, the seat of a very ancient cult of Demeter, and of the famous Eleusinian mysteries. The most important monuments lay within the sacred inclosure, which consisted of a spacious terrace on the eastern slope of the Acropolis, surrounded by a massive wall. The precinct was entered by two propylæa or monumental gateways in succession, and its chief building was the temple of the mysteries, whose unique architecture and successive transformations, as well as those of the entire precinct, have been revealed by the excavations of the Archaeological Society of Athens, prosecuted at intervals since 1822. The propylæa were two monumental gateways to the sacred inclosure. The lesser propylæa constituted a comparatively simple structure, with three doorways separated by ante, before which stood ornate columns. The greater were a reproduction, by Appius Claudius Pulcher in 48 B. C., of the famous propylæa of the Athenian Acropolis. The temple (sekos) of the mysteries of Demeter and Kora was rebuilt in the 5th century B. C. and altered later. It measured within 178 by 170 feet, and was surrounded along the walls by 8 tiers of step-seats for spectators of the ceremonies. In every side except the northeast there were two doors. Along the southeast side was carried the great Doric portico of Philon, of 12 by 2 columns.

Elgin (el'gin) Marbles. A collection of Greek sculptures comprising the bulk of the surviving plastic decoration of the Parthenon, and a Caryatid and column from the Erechtheum, and recognized as containing the finest existing productions of sculpture. The marbles were brought from Athens between 1801 and 1803 by the Earl of Elgin. The Parthenon sculptures were executed under the direction of Phidias, about 440 B. C. The collection includes remains of the pediment statues in the round, a great part of the frieze, in low relief, about 525 feet long, which surrounded the exterior of the cella, and 15 feet of the metopes of the exterior frieze, carved in very high relief with episodes of the contest between the Centaurs and the Lapiths. Among the chief of the pediment figures are the grand reclining figure of Theseus, Iris with wind-blown drapery, and the group of one reclining and two seated female figures popularly called the "Three Fates." The cella frieze represents the idealized Panathenæan procession to the Acropolis, made up of youthful cavalymen, chariots, led sacrificial victims, young girls with utensils, magistrates, and spectators, who set out from the southwest angle of the cella and proceed by both long sides to the east front, where in presence of an assembled company of the gods the chief priest prepares to perform his solemn rites. The skill with which the exceedingly low relief of this frieze is carried out is unparalleled in art.

He became professor of geology at the École des Mines in 1829, and at the Collège de France in 1832, and perpetual secretary of the Academy of Sciences in 1853. He published "Carte géologique de France" (1843), "Recherches sur quelques-unes des révolutions de la surface du globe" (1829-30), "Notices sur les systèmes de montagnes" (1852), etc.

Eliezer (el-i-ē'zer). [Heb., 'God is help.'] In the Old Testament, the name of several persons. The most notable are: (a) The chief servant of Abraham, called Eliezer of Damascus. (b) The second son of Moses and Zipporah.

Eligius (e-lij'us), or Éloi (ā-lwā'), Saint. Born near Limoges, France, about 588; died Dec. 1, 659. Bishop of Noyon. He came to Paris in 610, and gained the favor of Clotaire II. and Dagobert I. both by his skill as a goldsmith and by his piety, which he displayed in founding churches and monasteries and in distributing alms to the poor. Although a layman, he was made bishop of Noyon by Clovis II. in 641 (640?).

Elihu (e-li'hū). [Heb., 'God is He.'] The name of several persons in the Old Testament, of whom the most notable is one of the friends of Job. He describes himself as the youngest of the interlocutors.

Elijah (ē-li'jā). [Heb., 'Yahveh is my God';] in the New Testament Elias, Gr. Ἠλίας.] A Hebrew prophet of the 9th century B. C. An account of him is given in 1 Ki. xvii.-xli., 2 Ki. i.-xi., and 2 Chron. xxi. 12-15. He appears before Ahab, king of Israel (who had given himself up to the idolatry of his Phenician wife Jezebel), and predicts a great drought. Compelled to seek refuge in flight and concealment, he is miraculously fed by ravens in the torrent-bed of the stream Cherith, and by the widow of Zarephath, whose dead son he restores to life. In the extremity of the famine he reappears before Ahab, before whom he calls down fire from heaven to consume a sacrifice to Jehovah, with the result that the king orders the extermination of the prophets of Baal, who are unable to call down fire to consume the offerings to Baal. He then puts an end to the drought by prayers to Jehovah. Later he denounces Ahab and Jezebel for having despoiled and murdered Naboth, and is eventually carried to heaven in a chariot of fire.

Elijah. An oratorio by Mendelssohn, with words from the Old Testament. He was assisted by Schubert in selecting the words, and by Bartholomew with the English words. It was first performed at Birmingham, Aug. 26, 1846.

In 1805, having attained the grade of colonel, he was sent to the Rio de la Plata, and given command of the forces operating against the English. In April, 1810, he was recalled to Spain, but returned at the end of the year as viceroy of Buenos Ayres, appointed by the Spanish junta of the regency. The junta of Buenos Ayres refused to recognize his commission, war followed, and Elfo was besieged in Montevideo, but eventually arranged a treaty with the revolutionists by which both parties recognized the authority of Ferdinand VII. and the unity of the Spanish nation, and agreed to refer their differences to the Spanish Cortes (Oct. 20, 1811). Elfo was recalled to Spain two months after, and in 1812 and 1813 commanded against the French in Catalonia and Valencia, winning a series of brilliant victories. In 1814 he was made governor and captain-general of Valencia and Murcia. The revolution of 1820 caused his deposition and imprisonment. Some of his friends made an armed attempt to liberate him: the plot failed, and Elfo, accused of instigating it, was found guilty by a court martial and executed.

Eliot, Sir John. Born at Port Eliot, on the Tamar, England, April 20, 1592; died in the Tower of London, Nov. 27, 1632. An English patriot. He was educated at Oxford, studied law in London and in 1625, as a member of the first Parliament of Charles I., came into prominence by the vehemence and irresistible eloquence with which he supported the measures of the constitutional party. As the leader of the opposition in the second Parliament (1626) he was sent to prison, in company with Sir Dudley Digges, by the king; but was released, together with Sir Dudley, when Parliament refused to proceed to business without them. In the third Parliament (1628-29) he had a principal share in drawing up the Remonstrance and the Petition of Right. He was arrested on the dissolution of Parliament in 1629, and sentenced, on a charge of conspiracy against the king, to a fine of £2,000, and to imprisonment until he should acknowledge his guilt.

Elishah (e-li'shā). In Gen. x. 4, the eldest son of Javan; identified with the Æolians, with Sicily, and with the north coast of Africa.

Cyprus, too, would seem to be meant in Genesis, since we are told that the "sons of Javan" were Elishah and Tarshish, Kittim and Dodanin. Elishah is doubtless Hellas, not Elis, as has been sometimes supposed. In Ezek. xxvii. 7 it is said that "blue and purple" were brought to Tyre "from the isles of Elishah," that is to say, from the isles of Greece. Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 47.

Elisire d'Amore, L'. ['The Elixir of Love.'] An opera by Donizetti, first produced at Milan in 1829 or 1832 (Grove). The English version was called "The Love Spell," and was produced at Drury Lane in 1839.

Elissa (ē-his'sij), or Elisa. Under the surname Dido, the heroine of the fourth book of Vergil's Æneid. According to the tradition she was the daughter of King Matgen, grandson of Ith-Baal of Phenicia. She was married to her uncle Siharbaal or Siharbas (the Greek Acerbas and the Syrians of Vergil). After her husband was murdered by her brother Pygmalion, she set out at the head of Tyrian colonists to Africa, where she founded Carthage. To escape wedding the barbarian king Tarbas she erected a funeral pyre and stabled herself upon it. According to Vergil her death was due to her despair at her desertion by Æneas. In the popular mind she became confounded with Dido, a surname of Astarte as goddess of the moon, who was also the goddess of the citadel of Carthage.

Elissa. In Spenser's "Faerie Queene," the eldest of three sisters who were always at odds. See Medina.

Eliud (ē-lī'ud). A Jew mentioned in the genealogy of Christ.

Elizabeth. Born at Greenwich, near London, Sept. 7, 1533; died at Richmond, near London, March 24, 1603. Queen of England 1558-1603. She was the daughter of Henry VIII. and Anne Boleyn; was brought up in the Protestant faith; studied the classical languages under Roger Ascham; and is said to have been proficient in French and Italian. On her accession she appointed as secretary of state Sir William Cecil (later Baron Burleigh), who remained her chief adviser for forty years, until his death in 1598. She repealed the Roman Catholic legislation of the previous reign, re-enacted the laws of Henry VIII. relating to the church, published the Thirty-nine Articles (1563), and completed the establishment of the Anglican Church. In 1564 she concluded the treaty of Troyes with France, by which she renounced her claims to Calais in consideration of 220,000 crowns. In 1587 she signed the death-warrant of Mary Queen of Scots, who, expelled by a rebellion of her subjects, had taken refuge in England in 1568, and who, by means, it is said, of forged documents, had been involved by the government in a conspiracy of Savage, Ballard, Babington, and others against Queen Elizabeth. In 1588 her admiral Howard, assisted by Drake, Hawkins, Frobisher, Winter, and Raleigh, defeated the Spanish Armada in the English Channel, and prevented an invasion of England. Her reign, which was one of commercial enterprise and of intellectual activity, was made illustrious by Shakspeare, Sidney, Spenser, Tyndale, and Ben Jonson.

Elwes was his mother's name, which he took in 1750. He inherited wealth and was well educated, but was controlled by a morbid disinclination to spend money upon his personal wants, which manifested itself in various extraordinary ways. In other respects he was not illiberal, and he was extravagant in speculation and gaming.

Ely (ē'li). [ME. Ely, Eli, AS. Elig, eel island, from ēl, æl, eel, and ig, island.] A city in Cambridgeshire, England, 15 miles north-northeast of Cambridge. It contains a famous cathedral, a building of great size, begun in 1083. The nave and west tower were completed toward the end of the 12th century, and the west porch or galilee dates from about 1215. The Norman choir was replaced by the existing presbytery in the middle of the 13th century, and the octagonal central lantern was finished in 1328. The large Lady chapel adjoining the north transept, with elaborate vaulting and ornate arcading under the large windows, was built in the middle of the 14th century. The exterior of the church is distinguished by its high, castellated west tower. Under the tower is a curious galilee or entrance-porch, which opens into an unfinished west transept. The nave is imposing, with its long ranges of Norman arches and its lofty triforium-gallery. Its roof is of wood. The vaulting of the octagon forms the only existing pointed dome of its type. The presbytery is among the most excellent achievements of decorated work. The cathedral measures 520 by 77 feet; length of transept, 178; height of nave, 62; of choir-vaulting, 70. Population (1891), 8,017.

Elysium (ē-lîz'ium). The abode of the souls of the good and of heroes exempt from death, in ancient classical mythology. It is described, particularly by later poets, as a place of exceeding bliss. Some have thought it to be in the center of the earth, some in the Islands of the Blest, and some in the sun or mid air. In the Odyssey it is a plain at the end of the earth "where life is easiest to man. No snow is there, nor yet great storm nor any rain." It is often called the Elysian Fields.

Elze (el'tse), Friedrich Karl. Born at Dessau, Anhalt, Germany, May 22, 1821; died at Halle, Jan. 21, 1889. A German literary critic, professor of the English language and literature at Halle from 1875. He published critical editions of "Hamlet" (1857, 1882), of Chapman's "Alphonsus," and of Rowley's "When you see me," etc., "Essays on Shakspeare," "William Shakspeare" (1876; English translation 1885), "Notes on Elizabethan Dramatists" (1880-84), etc.

Elzevir (el'ze-vîr), or Elsevier, or Elzevier (el'ze-vêr). A famous family of Dutch printers, celebrated especially for their editions of classical authors, and of French authors on historical and political subjects (a series known as "Les petites républiques"). The original name was Elsevier or Elzevir; in Latinized form it was Elzevirius, which was finally corrupted into Elzevir. Louis, the founder of the family, was born at Louvain, near Brussels, about 1540, and died at Leyden, Feb. 4, 1617. The first book he printed was "J. Drusii Ebraicae questionum, sive questionum ac responsionum libri duo" (1583), but the first book he published at his own risk was a Eutropius by P. Merula (1592). He had seven sons, five of whom followed his profession: Matthieu (1564(5)-1640), Louis (1566(7)-1621(?)), Gilles (died 1651), Joost (1575(6)-1617(?)), and Bonaventure (1583-1652). The last was the most celebrated. In 1626 he took into partnership his nephew Abraham, a son of Matthieu. In 1647 Jean (1622-61), son of Abraham, joined them, and after their death Daniel (1626-80), son of Bonaventure, came into the firm. He left it in two years, and Jean continued alone till his death. Daniel went to Amsterdam in 1654, and entered into partnership with Louis (1604-70), the third of his name. The latter had established a printing-press there in 1638. Isaac, a son of Matthieu, established a press in Leyden which was in existence from 1616 to 1625. The last printers of the name were Peter, grandson of Joost, who printed a few volumes at Utrecht between 1667 and 1672, and Abraham, the son of Abraham the first, who was university printer at Leyden 1681-1712.

Many of the Elzevir editions bear no other typographical mark than simply the words Apud Elsevirios, or Ex officina Elseviriana, under the rubric of the town. Isaac took as typographical mark the branch of a tree surrounded by a vine branch bearing clusters of fruit, and below it a man standing, with the motto non solus. The third Louis adopted Minerva with an olive branch, and the motto ne cerva oleas. When the Elseviers did not wish to put their name to their works they generally marked them with a sphere, but of course the mere fact that a work printed in the 17th century bears this mark is no proof that it is theirs. The total number of works of all kinds which bear the name of the Elseviers is 1213, of which 968 are in Latin, 44 in Greek, 126 in French, 32 in Flemish, 22 in the Eastern languages, 11 in German, and 10 in Italian. Encyc. Brit.

After studies in medicine and ornithology he went, in 1865, to Turkey, where he accompanied a high official in his journeys until 1873. In 1875 he made a short visit to Germany. In 1876 he joined Gordon Pasha, then governor of the Sudan, explored the Nile up to Lake Albert, and visited Mtessa in 1877. In 1878 he was made bey and governor of the Equatorial Provinces. In a few years he raised his ruined provinces to relative prosperity, made rich scientific collections, and completed the accounts of Schweinfurth and Junker. From 1883 he was cut off, by the Mahdi, from communication with Egypt, and his position soon became precarious. Stanley went to his relief, and both reached the east coast in 1889. In the service of Germany he returned to the lakes in 1890, accompanied by Dr. Stuhlmann and Lieutenant Langheld. He established the station of Bukoba, and left it in charge of Lieutenant Langheld. With Dr. Stuhlmann he then proceeded westward, intending, despite contrary orders, to make his way to the west coast by way of the Shari. At Momfu west of Albert Nyanza, the rebellion of his carriers compelled him to change his route (1891). Dr. Stuhlmann returned to the coast with the richest harvest of scientific data ever gathered by an African expedition. Emin was killed by the Arabs, by order of Chief Kibonge, near Nyangwe, in October, 1892. Two of the murderers confessed their crime to R. Dorsey Mohun, United States agent in the Kongo Free State, in April, 1894.

Emma (em'ā). A novel by Jane Austen, published in 1816.

Emmanuel, or Emanuel (e-man'ū-el). See Immanuel.

Emmanuel College. A college of Cambridge University, founded in 1584, on the site of a convent of the Black Friars, by Sir Walter Mildmay for the defense of Puritanism. Some of the buildings of the convent were adapted to the uses of the college. The chapel was built by Wren. Over the cloister there is a gallery of portraits. The library possesses many treasures.

Emmanuel's Land. See Delectable Mountains.

Emmaus (em'ā-us or e-mā'us). [Gr. Ἐμμαούς.] In scriptural geography, a village of Palestine not far from Jerusalem. Its exact position is unknown. It was long identified with a city (Emmaus, later Nicopolis, modern Amwās) about 20 miles from Jerusalem.

Emmendingen (em'men-ding-en). A town in the circle of Freiburg, Baden, situated near the Elz 10 miles north of Freiburg. Here, Oct. 19, 1796, the Austrians defeated the French under Moreau. Population (1890), 4,039.

Emmenthal (em'men-täl). A valley in the canton of Bern, Switzerland, east of Bern, noted for its fertility and beauty. It is traversed by a tributary of the Aare, the Emme. The chief town is Langnau.

Emmerich (em'mer-ich). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, situated on the Rhine, near the Dutch frontier, in lat. 51° 50' N., long. 6° 14' E.; the ancient Embricia. It has a minster. Population (1890), 8,237.

Emmet (em'et), Robert. Born at Dublin in 1778; hanged at Dublin, Sept. 20, 1803. An Irish revolutionist, brother of Thomas Addis Emmet. He was, like his brother, a leader of the United Irishmen, and in July, 1803, put himself at the head of an unsuccessful rising in Dublin. He escaped to the Wicklow Mountains, but returned to take leave of his affianced, Sarah Curran, with the result that he was captured and hanged. His attachment to Miss Curran is celebrated by Moore in his famous poem "She is far from the land where her young hero sleeps."

Emmet, Thomas Addis. Born at Cork, Ireland, April 24, 1764; died at New York, Nov. 14, 1827. An Irish lawyer and politician, brother of Robert Emmet. He was admitted to the Irish bar in 1790, was elected secretary of the Society of United Irishmen in 1795, and became one of the directors of the society in 1797. He was implicated in the rebellion of 1798, in which year he was arrested, together with the other directors. He was imprisoned until 1802, and in 1804 emigrated to New York, where he practised law, and in 1812 became attorney-general of the State.

Emmez. See Jamez.

He graduated at West Point in 1831; became lieutenant of topographical engineers in 1838; served on the staff of General Kearny during the Mexican war; was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers March 17, 1852; commanded a division under General Banks in Louisiana in 1863; commanded the 19th army corps in the Red River expedition in 1864; and fought with distinction at Opequan Creek, Sept. 19, 1864, and at Fisher's Hill, Sept. 22, 1864. He wrote "Notes of a Military Reconnaissance in Missouri and California" (1848), and "Report on the United States and Mexican Boundary Survey" (1853-59).

Emory College. An institution of learning at Oxford, Georgia, incorporated in 1836. It is under the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church (South).

Empedocles (em-ped'ō-klēz). [Gr. Ἐμπεδοκλῆς.] Born at Agrigentum, Sicily; lived about 490-430 B. C. A Greek philosopher, poet, and statesman. He was a supporter of the democratic party in his native city against the aristocracy, and possessed great influence through his wealth, eloquence, and knowledge. He followed Pythagoras and Parmenides in his teachings. He professed magic powers, prophecy, and a miraculous power of healing, and came to have, in popular belief, a superhuman character. He was said to have thrown himself into the crater of Etna in order that, from his sudden disappearance, the people might believe him to be a god.

The figure of Empedocles of Agrigentum, when seen across the twenty-three centuries which separate us from him, presents perhaps a more romantic appearance than that of any other Greek philosopher. This is owing, in a great measure, to the fables which invest his life and death with mystery, to his reputation for magical power, and to the wild sublimity of some of his poetic utterances. Yet, even in his lifetime, and among contemporary Greeks, he swept the stage of life like a great tragic actor, and left to posterity the fame of genius as a poet, a physician, a patriot, and a philosopher.

Synopsis, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 207.

Empedocles on Etna. A classical drama by Matthew Arnold, published in 1853 and 1867.

Empire City. A name sometimes given to New York as the metropolis of the Empire State.

Empoli (em'pō-lē). A town in the province of Florence, Italy, on the Arno 15 miles west-southwest of Florence. Population (1881), commune, 17,487.

Emporia (em-pō'ri-ā). The county-seat of Lyon County, Kansas, situated on the Neosho River 52 miles southwest of Topeka. Population (1890), 7,551.

Empon (em'pōn), or Emson, Richard. Executed at London, Aug. 17, 1510. An English politician. He was associated with Edmund Dudley in the execution of the obnoxious financial policy of Henry VII., and became the object of popular hatred by the rigor with which he collected the taxes and penalties due to the crown. After the death of Henry he was executed with his associate on the charge of treason.

Empusa (em-pū'sā). [Gr. Ἐμψυσα, one-footed.] In Greek legend, a cannibal monster sent by Heate (under various forms) to frighten travelers. The Lamie were reckoned among the Empusa. An Empusa is mentioned in "The Frogs" of Aristophanes, and also in the life of Apollonius Tyaneus by Philostratus, and Goethe introduces one in the second part of "Faust." The last has not the same habit of transformation as the others, but surpasses them all in her hideous appearance and her cannibalistic habits.

Ems (emz). [Gr. (Strabo) Ἀμισίος, (Ptolemy) Ἀμισίος; L. Amisia, Amisius, later Emisa, Emisa.] A river of Prussia which rises in Westphalia near Paderborn, and flows through the Dollart into the North Sea at the Dutch frontier. Length, 180 miles.

Ems, or Bad Ems (bād emz). A town and watering-place in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, on the Lahn 7 miles southeast of Coblenz. It is one of the most frequented health-resorts in Germany, on account of its hot mineral springs. Here occurred the famous interview, July 13, 1850, between William I. of Prussia and the French ambassador Benedetti, which precipitated the Franco-German war. Population (1890), 5,472.

Emser (em'zer), Hieronimus. Born at Ulm, Germany, March 26, 1477; died at Dresden, Nov. 8, 1527. A German theologian. He became in 1504 secretary to Duke George of Saxony, who gave him a benefice in Dresden. An account of the disputation at Leipsic (1519), which he gave in an open letter addressed to John Zack of Prague, occasioned a violent controversy with Luther. He attacked Luther's translation of the Bible, and published in 1527 a translation of the New Testament after the Vulgate.

Enambuc (ā-nōn-būk'), or Esnambuc, Pierre Vandroque Diel d'. Born, probably at Dieppe, about 1570; died on the island of St. Christopher (St. Kitts), West Indies, Dec., 1636. The founder of the French West Indian colonies. He engaged in privateering cruises, and in 1625 established a colony on St. Christopher, at the same time that the crew of an English vessel settled there. D'Enambuc was aided by Richelieu, and though his colony was driven out for a time by the Spaniards (1629), and passed through many vicissitudes, it ultimately prospered. He founded others in various islands.

Enanthe (ē-nan'thē). [See Euanthe.] In Fletcher's "Humorous Lieutenant," the name under which Celia disguises herself.

Enara (ā-nā'rā), or Enare (ā-nā'rā), Lake. A large lake in the extreme northern part of Finland, with an outlet into the Arctic Ocean.

Enchanted Horse, The. A fabulous horse in "The Arabian Nights' Entertainments." Firouz Schah, the Prince of Persia, is carried by the enchanted horse to the palace of the Princess of Bengal, and persuades her to return with him. The Indian who owns the horse abducts her. The Sultan of Kashmir rescues her. Firouz Schah follows them, disguised as a dervish, and by a clever ruse gains possession of princess and horse.

Enchanted Island, The. Dryden's alteration of Shakspeare's "Tempest."

Encina, or Enzina (en-thē'nā), Juan de la or del. Born at or near Salamanca, Spain, about 1469; died at Salamanca, 1534. A Spanish poet, founder of the Spanish drama. He was for a time in the household of the first Duke of Alba; went to Rome, entered the church, and became chapel-master to Leo X.; visited the Holy Land; and became prior of Leon. He published a collection of his dramatic and lyric poems, "Cancionero" (1496; enlarged 1509).

Enciso (en-thē'sō), Martin Fernandez de. Born about 1470; died after 1528. A Spanish lawyer. He went to America with Bastidas in 1504, and settled as a lawyer at Santo Domingo. In 1509 he joined the enterprise of Ojeda for colonizing Tierra Firme. Ojeda sailed in Nov., 1509, and Enciso followed with another ship in May, 1510. Ojeda having left the colony, Enciso took command of the survivors and founded Antigua (Darien), but he was soon deposed and banished by Balboa and others. He went to Spain, and in 1514 returned to Darien as alcaicil mayor of Pedrarias's expedition. Late in 1514 he led an expedition against the Indians of Centi. Probably he soon returned to Spain. In 1519 he published there his "Suma de geografía," which gives the first account in Spanish of the New World.

Encke (eng'ke), Johann Franz. Born at Hamburg, Sept. 23, 1791; died at Spandau, near Berlin, Aug. 26, 1865. A German astronomer. He became in 1825 secretary of the Academy of Sciences and director of the observatory in Berlin. He is best known from his investigation of the comet named for him.

Encke's Comet. A comet discovered by Pons at Marseilles, Nov. 26, 1818, and more fully investigated by J. F. Encke, for whom it was named.

Enkratites (en'krā-tits). [Gr. Ἐνκρατίται, lit. 'the self-disciplined,' 'continent.'] In the early history of the church, especially among the Gnostics, those ascetics who refrained from marriage and from the use of flesh-meat and wine. They were members of various heretical sects, although sometimes spoken of as a distinct body founded by the apologist Tatian of the 2d century. They were also called Continentes.

Encyclopaedia Britannica (en-sī-klō-pē'dī-ā brī-tan'ī-kā). An English "dictionary of arts, sciences, and general literature," first published, in parts, at Edinburgh 1768-71. The publication of the last (9th) edition was commenced in 1875 and completed in 1888.

Encyclopedia, The. See Encyclopédie.

Encyclopédie (ōn-sē-klō-pā-dē'): full title, "Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers" ('Methodical Dictionary of the Sciences, Arts, and Trades'). A French encyclopedia. See the extract.

It was a French translation, by John Mills, of Chambers's "Cyclopædia" which originally formed the basis of that famous "Encyclopédie" which, becoming in the hands of D'Alembert and Diderot, the organ of the most advanced and revolutionary opinions of the time, was the object of the most violent persecution by the conservative party in church and state, and suffered egregious mutilations at the hands not only of hostile censors but of timorous printers. So thoroughly was it identified with the philosophic movement of the time that the term encyclopédiste became the recognized designation of all attached to a certain form of philosophy. Appearing at Paris in 28 vols. between 1751 and 1772, it was followed by a supplement in 5 vols. (Amst. 1774-77) and an analytical index in 2 vols. (Paris, 1789). Voltaire's "Questions sur l'Encyclopédie" (1770) formed a kind of critical appendix. La Fontaine's "Épître de l'Encyclopédie" (Paris, 1768) gave a résumé of the more important articles, and under the same title Hennequin compiled a similar epitome (Paris, 1822-23). Chambers's Encyc., IV. 335.

Encyclopedists, or Encyclopædists (en-siklo-pē'dists). The collaborators in the encyclopædia of Diderot and D'Alembert (1751-65). The Encyclopedists as a body were the exponents of the French skepticism of the 18th century.

Endeavor, The. A British ship commanded by Captain Cook, then lieutenant. It was sent out in 1768 by the Royal Society to the Pacific to observe the transit of Venus. Captain Cook returned in 1771, having made important explorations and discoveries. See Cook, James.

Endeavor Strait. [Named from the Endeavor, Captain Cook's ship.] A strait in north Australia, east of the Gulf of Carpentaria, between Cape York and Wolf Island.

Endor (en'der). Johann. Born at Vienna, Nov. 3, 1793; died at Vienna, March 16, 1854. An Austrian historical and portrait-painter.

Enderby Land (en'dēr-bi land). [First discovered by Dirk Gherritsz (1599), and named for him; later (1831) named by the English captain Biscoe of the whaler Tula for his employers.] A district in the Antarctic region, about lat. 67° S., long. 50° E.

Endicott (en'di-kot). John. Born at Dorechester, England, 1589; died at Boston, Mass., March 15, 1665. A governor of the Massachusetts colony. He emigrated to America in 1628; conducted an expedition against the Pequot Indians in 1636; and was made deputy governor in 1641, governor in 1644, and major-general of the colonial troops in 1645. From 1649 until his death, he was governor, except in 1650 and in 1654, when he was deputy governor. He was a zealous Puritan, and persecuted the Quakers, four of whom were executed in Boston under his administration.

Endicott, William Crowninshield. Born at Salem, Mass., 1827. An American politician and jurist. He was judge of the Massachusetts Supreme Court 1873-82, and Democratic secretary of war 1885-89.

Engbien (ōn-giān'). 1. A town in the province of Hainaut, Belgium, 18 miles southwest of Brussels. It has manufactures of lace. Population (1890), 4,313.—2. A watering-place near Paris on the north.

Engbien, Duc d' (Louis Antoine Henri de Bourbon-Condé). Born at Chantilly, Oise, France, Aug. 2, 1772; executed at Vincennes, near Paris, March 21, 1804. A French prince, son of Louis Henri Joseph, duke of Bourbon. He emigrated from France in 1789, and fought under his grandfather, the Prince of Condé, 1792-1801, when he retired to private life at Ettenheim in Baden. Here he was arrested March 15, 1804, though on neutral territory, by French troops under orders from Napoleon. He was tried before a military tribunal during the night of March 20-21, on the charge of complicity in the conspiracy of Cadoudal against the life of Napoleon, and, although no evidence was taken, was sentenced and shot at Vincennes at day-break March 21, 1804. This proceeding excited general indignation throughout Europe, and, aside from its moral aspect, is considered one of the gravest political blunders which Napoleon committed. Fyffe.

Engis (ōn-zhō'). See the extract. A more favourable specimen of this type is the celebrated skull (index, 7052) which was found seventy miles south-west of the Neanderthal in a cavern at Engis, on the left bank of the Meuse, eight miles south-west of Liège. It was embedded in a breccia with remains of the mammoth, the rhinoceros, and the reindeer. It has usually been referred to the quaternary period, but as a fragment of pottery was found in the same deposit it is possible that the contents of the cave may have been swept in by water, so that the skull may be only of neolithic age. Taylor, Aryans, p. 107.

England (ing'glānd). [Early mod. E. also Englond, Englond, ME. England, Englond, Ingland, Ingland, earlier Engleclond, AS. Engla-land, land of the Angles; G. England, F. Angleterre, It. Inghilterra, Sp. Pg. Inglaterra, D. Engeland.] A country of Europe, which forms with Wales the southern portion of the island of Great Britain. It is bounded by Scotland (partly separated by the Tweed, Cheviot Hills, and Solway Firth) on the north; the North Sea on the east; the Strait of Dover and the English Channel (separating it from France) on the south; and the Atlantic Ocean, Bristol Channel, Wales, and the Irish Sea on the west. It includes the Isle of Wight and a few smaller islands. The surface is generally level or undulating in the east, south, and center; and mountainous in the northwest (Lake District), near the Welsh border, and in the southwest. The highest mountain is Scafell Pike (3,210 feet). The chief river-systems are those of the Thames, Humber, and Severn. It has important agriculture, but its chief interests are commercial, manufacturing, and mining. It (with the rest of Great Britain) has almost a monopoly of the ocean carrying-trade of the world. The largest commercial cities are London, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, Leeds, Sheffield, Bristol, and Bradford. The chief manufactures are cotton and woolen goods, iron and steel, hardware, leather, etc. Its mineral products are iron and coal, tin, copper, etc. England has 40 counties (Northumberland, Durham, York, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Lancashire, Cheshire, Stafford, Derby, Nottingham, Lincoln, Norfolk, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Rutland, Leicestershire, Shropshire, Hereford, Worcester, Warwick, Northampton, Bedford, Suffolk, Essex, Hertford, Middlesex, Buckingham, Oxford, Gloucester, Monmouth, Wiltshire, Berkshire, Surrey, Kent, Sussex, Hampshire, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall); its capital is London, and its government a constitutional hereditary monarchy. The Anglican Church is established, and there are many Protestant dissenting bodies and a large following of the Roman Catholic Church. (For its foreign possessions, see Great Britain.) There are some monuments of its primitive inhabitants before the Celts, of whom, however, but little is known. Among the leading events in English history are invasions by Julius Cæsar, 55 and 54 B. C.; subjugation of the Celtic Britons by the Romans, 43 A. D., and succeeding years (Agricola's campaigns, 78-84); abandonment by the Romans, 410; invasions by the Jutes, Angles, and Saxons, beginning in 449 (C) and extending through the 6th century; Christianity introduced from Rome in 597, and from Scotland soon after; the early English kingdoms of Kent, Northumberland, Mercia, Wesseax, East Anglia, etc., merged under Egbert of Wesseax as "king of the English" in 827; division of England between Alfred and the Danes by the treaty of Wedmore, 878; consolidation of the country under Edward, Athelstan, etc., in the 10th century; second Danish invasion, under Sweyn, about 1000; rule of Canute the Dane and his sons, 1016-42; Norman conquest under William I., 1066; commencement of the Plantagenet line under Henry II., 1154; separation of Normandy and other French provinces, about 1304; granting of Magna Charta, 1215; beginnings of parliamentary government, about 1264-65; Hundred Years' War, about 1337-1453; kings of house of Lancaster, 1399-1461; kings of house of York, 1461-85; Wars of the Roses, 1455-85; Tudor dynasty (beginning with Henry VII.), 1485; introduction of the Reformation under Henry VIII., and Edward VI., Roman Catholic worship restored by Mary, Church of England restored by Elizabeth (1558-1603); accession of the Stuart line and personal union with Scotland under James I., 1603; beginnings of the colonial empire, 17th century; civil war between Charles I. and Parliament, 1642-48; period of the Commonwealth and Protectorate, 1649-59; restoration of the monarchy under Charles II., 1660; revolution of 1688, and accession of William of Orange and Mary, 1689; Act of Settlement, 1701-01; union with Scotland, 1707; accession of the Hanoverian dynasty (with George I.), 1714; large territorial acquisitions in America and India, 1763; loss of the United States, 1783; union with Ireland, 1801; wars with France, 1792-1802, 1803-14, and 1815; passage of Catholic Emancipation Act, 1829; Electoral Reform Acts, 1832, 1867-68, and 1884-85; abolition of slavery, 1833; accession of Victoria, and separation of Hanover, 1837; Afghan war, 1838-42; Chinese war, 1840-42; Chartist agitation, Irish agitation (about 1845); repeal of the English Corn-Laws, 1846; Crimean war, 1854-56; Chinese wars, 1856-58 and 1860; Indian mutiny, 1857-58; act for disestablishment of the Irish Church, 1869; Irish Land Act, 1870; Elementary Education Act, 1870; Ashantee war, 1873-74; Afghan war, 1878-80; Zulu war, 1879; Transvaal war, 1881; Irish Land Act, 1881; wars in Egypt and Sudan, 1882-85. Area, 50,540 square miles. Population (1891), 27,483,490. See Great Britain, Wales, Scotland, Ireland.

England, John. Born at Cork, Ireland, Sept. 23, 1786; died at Charleston, S. C., April 11, 1842. An Irish-American prelate of the Roman Catholic Church, appointed first bishop of Charleston 1820.

Ennius (en'i-us), Quintus. Born at Rudiae in Calabria, 239 B. C.; died at Rome (?), 169 B. C. A famous Roman epic poet, one of the founders of Latin literature. He served in the Roman army in Sardinia (204 B. C.), and there met M. Porcius Cato, who brought him to Rome, where he taught Greek and translated Greek plays. He gained Roman citizenship in 184. He was the author of "Annales" (in 13 books, only fragments of which survive), an epic poem on the early history of Rome, designed as a pendant to the Homeric poems; of tragedies; and of miscellaneous poems in various meters. "He was a missionary of culture and free thought, and he turned the Roman language and poetry into the paths in which they continued for centuries afterwards."

Ennodius (e-nô'di-us), Magnus Felix. Born at Arles or Milan, about 473; died at Pavia, July 17, 521. Bishop of Pavia (Ticinum). He was raised to the bishopric about 511, and was sent by the Pope to Constantinople in 515 and in 517 for the purpose of negotiating a union between the Eastern and Western churches, in which he failed. The best printed edition of his works, which include some poems and letters, a panegyric on Theodoric, a defense of Pope Symmachus, and a life of Saint Epiphanius of Pavia, is that by Sirmondi (Paris, 1611).

Enns, or Ens (ens). A river of Austria which joins the Danube near the town of Enns. It separates, in part, Upper Austria ("ob der Enna") from Lower Austria ("unter der Enns"). Length, about 125 miles.

Enns. A town in Upper Austria, on the Enns near the Danube, 9 miles southeast of Linz; the Roman Laureacum. Population (1890), commune, 4,674.

Enzio (en'zê-ô). Born at Palermo about 1225; died in prison at Bologna, Italy, March 14, 1272. An illegitimate son of the emperor Frederick II. of Germany, and titular king of Sardinia. He defeated the Genoese near Meloria, May 3, 1241, and was defeated and imprisoned by the Bolognese in 1249.

Êoîæ (ê-oi'é). [Gr. αἰ'Ἰοία; so called because each sentence began with ἡ'ἰοία, 'such was she.'] See the extract. The work was attributed to Hesiod.

This poem, the "Êoiaë," . . . celebrated the heroines of Boeotia and Thessaly from whose union with gods had sprung heroes; and formed a fourth book to the "Catalogue of Women," an epic history of Dorian and Æolian women, famous indeed, but not of that half-divine rank which belonged to the "heroines." These names of poems show how the Hesiodic school was connected with Dorian Lycris, where the position of women was peculiarly high. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 45.

Eolus. See Eolus.

Eon de Beaumont (â-ôn' dè bô-mou'), Charles Geneviève Louis Auguste André Timothée d' (generally called the Chevalier d'Eon). Born at Tonnerre, Yonne, France, Oct. 5, 1732; died at London, May 21, 1810. A French diplomatist, a secret agent of Louis XV. He served the king at the court of the empress Elizabeth of Russia 1755-60, and later in London. He was particularly noted for his success in assuming a female disguise.

Eos (ê'os). [Gr. Ἠώς.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of the dawn, daughter of Hyperion, and sister of Helios and Selene: called by the Romans Aurora.

Eostra (êos'trâ). [AS. Eostra (Beda), for Eastræ. (F. AS. easter, OHG. ostara, Easter.)] The goddess of spring (the dawn of the year). Her cult was probably common to the West-Germanic tribes, although no specific mention is made of her except among the Anglo-Saxons. The name has been perpetuated in Easter, which is supposed to have been originally applied to the spring festival held in her honor.

Eothen (ê-ô'then). [Gr. ἠώθεν, from the dawn.] A book of travels in the East, by Alexander William Kinglake, published 1844.

Eötvös (ét-vêsh), Baron József. Born at Budapest, Hungary, Sept. 3, 1813; died at Budapest, Feb. 2, 1871. A Hungarian novelist, publicist, statesman, and orator, minister of worship and public instruction 1867-71. He wrote the novels "Karthausi" ("The Carthusian," 1838), "A falu' jézuzoje" ("The Village Notary," 1844), "Magyarország 1814-ben" ("Hungary in 1814," 1847).

Epaminondas (ê-pam-i-non'das). [Gr. Ἐπαμεινώνδας, Ἐπαμεινώνδας.] Born about 418 B. C.; died at Mantinea, Arcadia, Greece, 362 B. C. A famous Theban general and statesman. He defeated the Spartans at Leuctra in 371; invaded the Peloponnese; founded Megalopolis (in Arcadia); and was victorious and was mortally wounded at Mantinea in 362.

Epanomeria (â-pâ-nô-mâ-rê'i). A town on the island of Santorini (Thera), in the Grecian Archipelago. It is remarkable for its position on precipitous rocks.

Epeiros. See Epirus.

Eperies (â-pâr'yés), Hung. Eperjes (ê'per-yesh). The capital of the county of Sáros, Hungary, situated on the Tarca in lat. 48° 59' N., long. 21° 17' E. It was founded by a German colony, and was the scene of the execution of Protestants by the Imperialist Carafa in 1687. Population (1890), 10,371.

Épernay (â-per-nâ'). A town in the department of Marne, France, situated on the Marne 19 miles northwest of Châlons-sur-Marne. It is the chief center of the trade in champagne, the wine being stored here in vaults in the chalk rock. Population (1891), commune, 18,361.

Ephesiaca. See Habrocomas and Authia.

Ephesus (ef'e-sus). [Gr. Ἔφεσος.] In ancient geography, one of the twelve Ionian cities of Asia Minor, in Lydia, situated on the Cayster, near its mouth, in lat. 37° 57' N., long. 27° 21' E. It was conquered by Lydia, Persia, Alexander the Great, and the Romans. It was celebrated for its temple of Artemis, and as a great commercial city, but was unimportant in the middle ages. It was a place of residence of Paul, and the seat of the third general council in 431, and of the Robber Synod in 449. On its site are Ayasuluk and other small villages. Among its ruins are: (a) The great theater mentioned in Acts xix. 23. It is Greek in plan, with Roman modifications. The cavea, 455 feet in diameter, has two precincts, with 11 cunei in the two lower ranges, and 22 in the highest, which is skirted by a colonnaded gallery. The orchestra is 110 feet in diameter, and the proscenium 22 feet wide. (b) The odeum, ascribed to the 2d century A. D. In plan it is a half-circle 153 feet in diameter. There is one precinct, with 5 cunei below and 10 above it, and a Corinthian gallery around the top. The orchestra is 30 feet in diameter; the stage has 5 doors and Corinthian columns. (c) A stadium, ascribed to the time of Augustus. It is 550 feet long and about 200 wide. The north side and semicircular east end are supported on vaulted substructions, the south side on the rock of the hillside. A double colonnade was carried along its entire length, and communicated with the upper gallery of the stadium by a series of stairways. (d) A temple of Artemis (Diana of the Ephesians), a famous sanctuary founded in the 6th century B. C., and rebuilt in the 4th. The temple was Ionic, dipylar, octastyle, with 21 columns on the flanks, and measured 164 by 321 feet. The base-diameter of the columns was 6 feet, their height 55. The base-drums of 36 columns of the front and rear were beautifully sculptured with figures in relief: there are examples in the British Museum. The cella had interior ranges of columns, Ionic in the lower tier, Corinthian above.

Ephesus, Council of. 1. The third ecumenical council, called by Theodosius II. in connection with Valentinian III., held at Ephesus under the direction of Cyril of Alexandria in 431 A. D. It opened with 160 bishops (increased to 198), and included for the first time papal delegates from Rome, who were instructed not to mix in the debates, but to sit as judges over the opinions of the rest. It condemned the heresy of Nestorius without stating clearly the correct doctrine. 2. The so-called Robber Council, convoked by Theodosius, held at Ephesus under the presidency of Dioscurus of Alexandria in 449. It included 135 bishops. It reinstated Eutyches in the office of priest and archimandrite, from which he had been expelled by the Synod of Constantinople (448), and deposed Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, who was so roughly handled that he died of his injuries shortly after.

Ephialtes (ef-i-al'téz). [Gr. Ἐφιάλτης.] In classical mythology, a blind giant who was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right by Hercules.

Ephialtes. Died 456 B. C. An Athenian statesman and general. He was the friend and partizan of Pericles, and was the principal author of a law which abridged the power of the Areopagus and changed the government of Athens into a pure democracy. He was, according to Aristotle, assassinated by Aristodocus of Tanagra, at the instance of the oligarchs.

Ephorus (ef'ó-rus). [Gr. Ἐφωρος.] Born at Cummé: lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C. A Greek writer, author of a universal history, fragments of which have been preserved.

Ephraem (é'fra-em) Syrus ('the Syrian'). Born probably at Nisibis, Mesopotamia, about 308 A. D.: died at Edessa, Mesopotamia, about 373. A theologian and sacred poet of the Syrian Church. The chief edition of his works was published at Rome 1732-43.

Ephraim (é'fra-im). [Heb., 'double fruitfulness.'] 1. In Old Testament history, the younger son of Joseph, and founder of the tribe of Ephraim. — 2. One of the twelve tribes of Israel: so called from its founder, Ephraim, the son of Joseph. It occupied a central position in Palestine, being bounded on the east by the Jordan, on the west by the Mediterranean and the tribe of Dan, on the south by the tribe of Benjamin, and on the north by that of Manasseh. After the death of Saul the tribe of Ephraim, together with all the other tribes except Judah, recognized Eshbaal (Ishbosheth) as legitimate king in opposition to David; but on the murder of Eshbaal submitted in common with the other tribes to the hegemony of Judah under David. On the death of Solomon it revolted (probably about 975 B. C.) under Jeroboam from Rehoboam, the son of Solomon, and formed, in conjunction with all the tribes except Judah, Simeon, part of Benjamin, and the Levites, a separate kingdom, which retained the name of Israel, and adopted Shechem as its capital. This kingdom was destroyed by the Assyrians in 722 B. C.

Ephthalites. The White Huns. See Huns.

Epic Cycle, The. See the extracts.

There was a mass of songs and legends about Troy which the two great epics left untouched. This material was worked up, between 776 B. C. and 550 B. C., by a number of epic poets of the Ionian school, who aimed at linking their poems with the Iliad and Odyssey as introductions or continuations. In later times, compilers of mythology used to make abstracts in prose from these epics, taking them in the chronological order of the events, so as to make one connected story. Such a prose compilation was called an epic cycle (or circle), and the compilers themselves were called cyclic writers. In modern times the name "cyclic" has been transferred from the prose compilers to the poets.

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 37.

It was once commonly believed that the remaining epic poets equally avoided touching upon one another, that they composed their own poems upon a fixed chronological plan, each resuming where the other had finished, and so completing an account of what is called the epic cycle, from the birth of Aphrodite in the "Cypris" down to the conclusion of the "Nostoi," or "Telegonia," of Euragmon. But it seems clearly made out now that no such fixed system of poems existed; that the authors, widely separated in date and birthplace, were no corporation with fixed traditions; that they did overlap in subject, and repeat the same legends; and that the epic cycle does not mean a cycle of poems, but a cycle of legends, arranged by the grammarians, who illustrated them by a selection of poems, or parts of poems, including, of course, the Iliad and Odyssey, and then such other epics as told the whole story of the Theban and Trojan wars, down to the conclusion of the heroic age.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 86.

Epicarmus (ep-i-kür'mus). [Gr. Ἐπιχαρμος.] Born in the island of Cos about 540 B. C.: died at Syracuse at an advanced age (ninety or ninety-seven). A Greek comic poet. At an early age he was carried to Megara, in Sicily, and thence, when Megara was sacked by Gelon, to Syracuse. Thirty-five titles of his comedies are extant, and he is said to have written 52 plays.

The notice that he [Epicarmus] added letters to the alphabet arises either from some later letters being first adopted in his works, or from his intimacy with Simonides at Syracuse. It is not impossible, as Simonides did adopt some additions, that he persuaded Epicarmus to spread their use in copies of his very popular plays.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 402.

Epicène (ep'i-sén), or The Silent Woman. [Gr. Ἐπικῆνος, of either gender, promiscuous.] A comedy by Ben Jonson, produced in 1609. Epicène was a supposed silent woman who really spoke softly and in monosyllables. She was brought to Morose, who had an insane horror of noise, by his nephew who wished to play him a trick. After the wedding Epicène scolds, screams, and develops into a virago; but after many noisy, rough tricks and jokes which drive Morose to the verge of distraction, he is relieved by his nephew Sir Dauphine, who, in consideration of the payment of his debt and the promise of a proper allowance, reveals the trick, which is that Epicène is really a boy in disguise; consequently there never was a "silent woman." Colman the elder wrote a version of this play. It was produced by Garrick in 1776.

Epictetus (ep-ik-té'tus) of Hierapolis. [Gr. Ἐπικτήτος.] A celebrated Stoic philosopher. He was a native of Hierapolis in Phrygia, was a freedman of Epaphroditus (the freedman and favorite of Nero), was a pupil of Musonius Rufus, and taught philosophy at Rome until 94 (89?) A. D., when he removed to Nicopolis in Epirus, in consequence of an edict of Domitian banishing the philosophers from Rome. Although he left no written works, his essential doctrines are preserved in a manual compiled by his pupil Arrian. He taught that the sum of wisdom is to desire nothing but freedom and contentment, and to bear and forbear; that all unavoidable evil in the world is only apparent and external; and that our happiness depends upon our own will, which even Zeus cannot break.

Epictetus Mammon, Sir. See Mammon.

Epicurus (ep-i-kú'rus). [Gr. Ἐπίκουρος.] Born in Samos, 342 B. C.: died at Athens, 270 B. C. The founder of the Epicurean school of philosophy. He was the son of Neocles, an Athenian cleric settled in Samos, and belonged to the Attic deme of Gargettus (whence he is sometimes called the Gargettian). He is said to have studied under Xenocrates at Athens, and subsequently taught at Mytilene and Lampsacus. In 306 he opened a school in a garden at Athens, where he spent the remainder of his life. He is said to have written about 300 volumes, fragments only of which are extant. His will, 4 epistles, and a list of 44 propositions containing the substance of his ethical philosophy, have been preserved by Diogenes Laertius. He taught that pleasure is the only possible end of rational action, and that the ultimate pleasure is freedom. He adopted the atomistic theory of Democritus, while bringing into it the doctrine of chance.

Epidamnus (ep-i-dam'nus). An ancient name of Durazzo. See Durazzo.

Epidaurus (ep-i-dá'rus). [Gr. Ἐπίδαυρος.] 1. A maritime town of Illyricum. It was destroyed some time after the reign of Justinian, and was replaced by Ragusa. It was a Roman colony.

2. A town on the eastern coast of Peloponnesus, in the district called Argolis under the Romans. Throughout the flourishing period of Grecian history it was an independent state, possessing a small territory (Ἐπίδαυρα), bounded on the west by the Argæa, on the north by the Corinthia, on the south by the Trezenia, and on the east by the Saronic Gulf. (Smith.) It was the most celebrated seat of the ancient cult of Æsculapius. The sanctuary occupied a valley among hills, at some distance from the city. An inner inclosure contained a temple to Æsculapius, the architecturally important tholos of Polyceletus, extensive porticos which served as hospitals to the sick who came to seek the aid of the god and his priests, and many votive offerings. Outside of this inclosure were the stadium, one of the most important of ancient theaters, a gymnasium, propylæa, and other buildings, the arrangements for the collection and distribution of water being especially noteworthy. Almost all our knowledge of this sanctuary comes from the extensive excavations conducted by the Archaeological Society of Athens since 1881, which are still (1893) incomplete.

Epidaurus Limeræ (li-mé'rî). [Gr. Ἐπίδαυρος ἢ Λιμυρᾶ.] In ancient geography, a town on the eastern coast of Laconia, Greece, 22 miles north-northwest of Cape Malea.

Epigoni (e-pig'ó-nî). [Gr. ἐπίγονοι, descendants.] In Greek mythology, the seven sons of the seven Argive chiefs who had unsuccessfully attacked Thebes. The Epigoni, ten years after the first attempt, defeated the Thebans and avenged their fathers. This was supposed to have occurred shortly before the Trojan war.

Epigoni. A Greek epic poem of the Theban cycle, by Antimachus of Claros, relating to the renewal of the mythical war between Argos and Thebes by the "descendants" of its heroes.

Epimenides (ep-i-men'i-déz). [Gr. Ἐπιμενίδης.] Lived in the 7th century B. C. A Cretan poet and prophet.

Epimetheus (ep-i-mé'thüs). [Gr. Ἐπιμηθεύς, afterthought.] In Greek mythology, the brother of Prometheus and husband of Pandora. Although warned by his brother, he accepted Pandora as a gift from Zeus, with the result that through her curiosity she liberated evils peculiar to man, which Prometheus had concealed in a vessel.

Épinac (â-pé-nâk'). A town in the department of Saône-et-Loire, France, 11 miles east-north-east of Autun. It is the center of a coal-mining region. Population (1891), commune, 4,061.

Épinal (â-pé-nâl'). The capital of the department of Vosges, France, situated on the Moselle in lat. 48° 10' N., long. 6° 26' E. It has some manufactures, and contains the departmental museum and a library. It was occupied by the Germans Oct. 12, 1870. Population (1891), commune, 23,223.

Épinal glossary. An Anglo-Saxon and Old-Saxon glossary preserved at Épinal, France. It was originally from the Abbey of Moyen Montier, near Lenonnes. "The type of its writing is of the time of the Culdees; its letters being First-English, as written by the Celtic priests who laboured for the conversion of the English. It is ascribed by Mr. Sweet to the end of the seventh century." (Morley.) Mr. Sweet has edited a facsimile of this glossary, published at London in 1883.

Épinay (â-pé-nâ'), Madame de la Live d' (Louise Florence Pétronille Tardieu d'Esclavelles). Born at Valenciennes, March 11, 1726; died April 17, 1783. A French author, an intimate friend of Grimm and Jean Jacques Rousseau. For the latter she erected a cottage, the Hermitage, in the garden of her château, la Chevrette, near Montmorency. Her "Mémoires et correspondance" was published in 1818, and her collected works in 1869.

Epiphanius (ep-i-fâ-ni-us), Saint. Born near Eleutheropolis, Palestine, about 315 A. D.: died at sea near Cyprus, 403. A father of the Eastern Church. He became in 367 bishop of Constantia (the ancient Salamis) in Cyprus. He took a prominent part in the theological controversies of his day, and was present at the synods of Antioch (370) and Rome (382), where questions pertaining to the Trinity were debated. He died on the return voyage from Constantinople, whither he had gone to oppose the heresy of Origen. He wrote a treatise against heresies entitled "Panarion," a dogmatic work entitled "Anchoratus," etc.

Epipsychidion (ep-i-psi-kid'i-on). ['A little poem on the soul'; from Gr. ἐπί, upon, ψυχή, soul, and dim. -ιδιον.] A poem by Shelley, published in 1821.

Epirus, or Epeiros (é-pî'rus). [Gr. Ἠπειρος.] In ancient geography, that part of northern Greece which lies between Illyria on the north, Macedonia and Thessaly on the east, Ætolia, Acarnania, and the Ambracian Gulf on the south, and the Ionian Sea on the west (to the Acroceranraian promontory). In earlier times the name was given to the entire western coast southward to the Corinthian Gulf. The kingdom of Epirus was at its height under Pyrrhus (295-272 B. C.). It was ravaged by Æmilius Paulus in 167 B. C.; was a part of the Roman Empire 146 B. C.-1204 A. D.; was overrun by Albanians in the 14th century; was conquered by the Turks in the 15th century; and now forms part of the Turkish vilayet Janina, and part of the territory ceded to Greece in 1881.

Episcopus (ep-is-kô'pi-us) (Latinized from Bischof or Bishop), Simon. Born at Amsterdam, Jan. 1, 1583; died at Amsterdam, April 4, 1643. A Dutch theologian, one of the leaders of Arminianism. He published "Confessio" (1621), "Apologia" (1629), "Institutiones Theologicae," etc.

Epistolæ Obscurorum Virorum. [L., 'Letters of Obscure Men.'] A collection of forty-one anonymous letters, first published in 1515, satirizing the ignorance, hypocrisy, and licentiousness of the Roman Catholic monasteries at the time of the Reformation. It was occasioned by the controversy between Reuchlin and Pfefferkorn, a converted Jew, who advocated the destruction, as heretical, of the whole Jewish literature, except the Bible, and who was supported by the Dominicans of Cologne. The authorship of the letters is attributed by some to Ulrich von Hutten, Crotus, and Buschius.

Epithalamium (ep'i-thâ-lâ'mi-um). A poem by Spenser, published in 1595: a marriage song for his own bride.

For splendour of imagery, for harmony of verse, for delicate taste and real passion, the "Epithalamium" excels all other poems of its class.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 87.

Eponym Canon (ep'ó-nim kan'ou). The name given by Assyriologists to the list of archons or chief magistrates in Assyria. This office of archon, called in Assyrian limmu, passed in rotation every year to different high dignitaries. Each king was limmu in the second year of his reign, and he was followed by the general of the army, or tartan. The limmu gave the name to the year in which he held this office (hence the term eponymus, in Greek 'one from whom somebody or something is named'). Documents and events were dated with these names (as in Rome with the names of the consuls of each year). The lists of the limmu were carefully and accurately kept. The custom probably goes back to a remote date, but the four lists of limmu found which are known by the name of Eponym Canon cover the years 911-666 B. C. As each king was limmu in the second year of his reign, the Eponym Canon became of the greatest importance for the chronology of the Assyrian kings. Further and still more interesting information has been derived from these tables, which contain alongside of the name of the limmu a short notice of the principal events of his year. Thus, for instance, during the reign of Assur-dan III. (772-754) an eclipse of the sun in Nineveh is recorded, and according to the calculations of the astronomers such an eclipse took place on the 15th of June, 763, so that this notice is of prime importance for early chronology.

Epping (ep'ing). A town in the county of Essex, England, 16 miles northeast of London. Population (1891), 2,565.

Epping Forest. A royal forest in southwestern Essex, England, formerly called Waltham Forest. Its area formerly was about 60,000 acres; it now contains 5,600 acres, preserved by London, and opened to the public as a pleasure-ground in 1882.

Épréménil. See Espréménil.

Epsom (ep'som). [Supposed to be equivalent to Ebba's home; so named from Saint Ebba, queen of Surrey, A. D. 600.] A market-town in the county of Surrey, 15 miles southwest of London. In 1618 the mineral spring from which Epsom salts were first made was discovered, and in the latter part of the 17th century Epsom became a fashionable resort, and remained so until 1736, when the tide turned to Bath and Cheltenham. It was especially affected by Charles II. Races were run on the downs a mile and a half south of the town probably as early as the reign of James I., but its importance as a race-course begins with the establishment of the Oaks and the Derby in 1779 and 1780. The spring meeting opens yearly about the middle of April, and the Derby and Oaks are run about the end of May. Population (1891), 8,417.

Epsom Wells. A comedy by Thomas Shadwell, produced in 1675.

Epworth (ep'wérth). A small town in Lincolnshire, England, 24 miles northwest of Lincoln; the birthplace of John Wesley.

Ecuador, Confederación do. See Confederação do Equador.

Era of Good Feeling. In United States history, a name given to the period from 1817 to about 1824, which was marked by internal harmony and the absence of strong party feeling.

Érard (ā-rür'). Sébastien. Born at Strasbourg, April 5, 1752; died at Passy, near Paris, Aug. 5, 1831. A French manufacturer of pianofortes, harps, and organs. He invented the double-action harp in 1808, and made improvements in pianos and organs.

Erasistratus (er-a-sis'tra-tus). Born probably in the island of Ceos; lived about 300 B. C. A Greek physician and anatomist.

Erasmus (e-raz'mus), Desiderius (originally Gerhard Gerhards ('Gerhard's son'), D. Geert Geerts). [Gr. ἐπίκουος, beloved, desired; the L. desiderius has the same sense.] Born at Rotterdam, probably Oct. 28, 1463; died at Basel, Switzerland, July 12, 1536. A famous Dutch classical and theological scholar and satirist. He was the illegitimate son of Gerhard de Praet, was left an orphan at the age of thirteen, and was defrauded of his inheritance by his guardians, who compelled him to enter the monastery of Stein. He entered in 1491 the service of the Bishop of Cambrai, under whose patronage he was enabled to study at the University of Paris. He subsequently visited the chief European countries, including England (1498-99 and 1510-14), and in 1521 settled at Basel, whence he removed to Freiburg in Breisgau in 1529. Refusing all offers of ecclesiastical preferment, he devoted himself wholly to study and literary composition. He aimed to reform without dismembering the Roman Catholic Church, and at first favored, but subsequently opposed, the Reformation, and engaged in a controversy with Luther. His chief performance was an edition of the New Testament in Greek with a Latin translation, published in 1616. Besides this edition of the New Testament his most notable publications are "Colloquies" and "Encomium Moriae." A collective edition of his works was published by Le Clerc 1703-06.

Éraste (ā-rüst'). 1. The exasperated lover in Molière's comedy "Les fâcheux" ('The Bores'). He has an appointment with Orphise whom he loves, and every person in the play comes in and prevents it.

2. The lover of Julie in Molière's "M. de Pourceaugnac."—3. The lover of Lucille in Molière's comedy "Le dépit amoureux," usually called "Lovers' Quarrels" in English.

Erastians (e-ras'tianz). Those who maintain the doctrines held by or attributed to Thomas Erastus, a German polemic (1524-83), author of a work on excommunication, in which he proposed to restrict the jurisdiction of the church. Erastianism, or the doctrine of state supremacy in ecclesiastical matters, is often, but erroneously, attributed to him.

Erastus (e-ras'tus), Thomas (Grecized from Lieber or Liebler). [Gr. ἐραστός, lovely, beloved.] Born at Auggen, near Badenweiler, Germany, 1524; died at Basel, Switzerland, 1583. A physician and Protestant controversialist. His chief work, a collection of theses on excommunication, was published in 1589.

Erato (er'a-tō). [Gr. Ερατώ.] In Greek mythology, the Muse of erotic poetry. In art she is often represented with the lyre.

Eratosthenes (er-a-tos'the-nōz). [Gr. Ἐρατοσθένης.] Born at Cyrene, Africa, about 276 B. C.; died about 196 B. C. An Alexandrian astronomer, geometer, geographer, grammarian, and philosopher: "the founder of astronomical geography and of scientific chronology." He measured the obliquity of the ecliptic, and introduced a method of computing the earth's magnitude. Fragments of his "Geographica" (Γεωγραφικά) are extant.

Erbach (er'bäch). A small town in the province of Starkenburg, Hesse, situated in the Odenwald 21 miles southeast of Darmstadt. It has a castle, and was formerly the seat of an independent county. Population (1890), 2,788.

Ercilla y Zúñiga (ār-thél'yā ē thōn-yō'gā), Alonso de. Born at Madrid, Aug. 7, 1533; died there, Nov. 29, 1594. A Spanish soldier and poet. In 1554 he took service with Jeronimo de Alderete, who had been appointed governor of Chile. He led an adventurous life in South America until 1562, when he returned to Spain. In 1569 he published the first part of "La Araucana" (followed later by the second and third parts), the finest heroic poem in the Spanish language. It has also historical value.

Erckmann-Chatrian (erk'män-shā-trē-ōñ'). The signature of the literary collaborators Emile Erckmann (born at Phalsbourg, Meurthe, May 20, 1822) and Louis Gratien Charles Alexandre Chatrian (born at Soldatenthal, Meurthe, Dec. 18, 1826; died at Rainey, Seine, Sept. 3, 1890). In 1843 these two men became associated in literary labors, the former writing chiefly and the latter editing and adapting for the stage. Among their first publications are "Science et génie" and "Schinderhannes" (1850), and many short stories. The series of novels to which Erckmann-Chatrian owe, in great part, their reputation includes "Le Fou Yégo" (1862), "Madame Thérèse, ou les volontaires de 1792" (1863), "Histoire d'un conscrit de 1813" and "L'Ami Fritz" (1864), "Waterloo" and "Histoire d'un homme du peuple" (1865), "La guerre" and "La maison forestière" (1866), and many others. Their dramatic compositions and adaptations are "Georges, ou le chasseur des ruines" (1848), "L'Alsace en 1814" (1850), "Le Juif polonais" (1869), "L'Ami Fritz" (1876), "Madame Thérèse" (1882), "Les Rantzau" (1884), etc. Erckmann claims the sole authorship of the novel "Les brigands des Vosges il y a soixante ans" (1850), a totally different version of which was published by him in "La Revue de Paris" under the title "L'illustre docteur Mathéus" (1857). Since Chatrian's death, Erckmann has contributed to "Le Temps" two publications, "Kaleb et Khora" and "La première campagne du grand-père Jacques," the latter being the first in a series of stories dealing with the wars of the empire.

Ercles (er'klēz). A corruption of Hercules.

Bot. . . . Yet my chief humour is for a tyrant: I could play Eracles rarely, or a part to tear a cat in, to make all split. . . . This is Eracles' vein, a tyrant's vein; a lover is more condoling. Shak., Midsummer Night's Dream.

[Ercles—Hercules—was one of the roarers of the old rude stage. Thus Greene, in his "Groatworth of Wit," 1592: "The twelve labours of Hercules have I terribly thundered on the stage." Hudson, Note to M. N. D.]

Ercta (er'ctā), or Ercte (-tē). [Gr. Ἐρκτη, Ἐρκτη.] In ancient geography, a mountain in northern Sicily, about 4 miles north of Palermo; the modern Monte Pellegrino. It was a stronghold of Hamilcar Barca in the last part of the first Punic war.

Erdélyi (er'däl-ye), János. Born at Kapos, Ung. Hungary, 1814; died at Sárospatak, Zemplin, Hungary, Jan. 23, 1868. A Hungarian writer. His chief works are collections of Hungarian folk-songs (1846-48) and folk-tales (1855).

Erdmann (erd'män), Axel Joachim. Born at Stockholm, Aug. 12, 1814; died at Stockholm, Dec. 1, 1869. A Swedish geologist and mineralogist.

Erdmann, Johann Eduard. Born at Wolmar, Livonia, Russia, June 13, 1805; died at Halle, June 12, 1892. A German philosopher, professor at Halle. He published "Versuch einer wissenschaftlichen Darstellung der Geschichte der neuern Philosophie" (1834-53), etc.

Erdmann, Otto Linné. Born at Dresden, April 11, 1804; died at Leipzig, Oct. 9, 1869. A German chemist. He published "Lehrbuch der Chemie" ("Manual of Chemistry," 1828), etc., and founded the "Journal für praktische Chemie" in 1834.

Erebus (er'ē-bus), or Erebos (-bos). [Gr. Ἐρεβος.] In Greek mythology, the son of Chaos and brother of Nyx.

Erebus. An active volcano in Victoria Land, Antarctic regions, about lat. 78° S., long. 168° E. Height, about 12,367 feet.

Erec (ē'rek) and Enid (ē'nid). See the extract and Enid.

One of the most beautiful of these metrical tales is "Erec and Enide," by Chrestien de Troyes. Erec vanquishes a knight who had insulted an attendant of Queen Genevra at a national hunt. After the battle, Erec discovered on the domains of the person he had conquered his beautiful niece, called Enide, who resided near her uncle's castle, but had been allowed by him to remain in the utmost poverty. Erec marries this lady, and soon forgets all the duties of chivalry in her embraces; his vassals complain bitterly of his sloth, and Enide rouses him to exertion. Attended by her alone, he sets out in quest of adventures, of which a variety are related.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 264.

Erech (ē'rek). One of the four cities of the kingdom of Nimrod, in Shinar or Babylonia; the Greek Orchoē. It was identical with Truk of the inscriptions, and is now represented by the mound of ruins of Warka, situated on the left bank of the Euphrates southeast of Babylon. It was one of the oldest seats of Babylonian civilization, and had a college of learned priests and a large library. It was also the chief seat of the worship of Ishtar as the evening star, and of Nana. According to an inscription of Asurbanipal (605-562 B. C.) Erech was, in 2280 B. C., invaded by the Elamite king Kudur-nachundi, who carried off the image of Nana to Elam, where it remained for 1,635 years, till he (Asurbanipal), in 645, at the conquest of Susa, returned it to its ancient seat. Around the ruins of Erech are found many tombs, so that it would seem that it served as a kind of necropolis.

Erechtheum (ē-rek-thē'um). An Ionic temple in Athens dating from the end of the 5th century B. C., remarkable for its complex plan and architectural variety, as well as for its technical perfection. It included a shrine to Athena Polias (as guardian of the city), altars to several other divinities, the tomb of Erechtheus (whence its name), the salt spring evoked by Poseidon, and several other peculiarly sacred memorials. The shrine of Athena faced the east, and had the form of a prostyle hexastyle cella. On the north side, at a lower level, there is a portico of four by two delicately sculptured columns, with access by a monumental doorway to a hall traversing the building behind the cella of Athena. The west wall of this hall was formed of a high basement-wall, upon which stood four piers having on their outer face the form of Ionic semi-columns. The wall is usually restored as having windows in the intercolumniations. At the west end of the south side is the famous Porch of Caryatids, whose rich entablature rests on the heads of six female figures, four in front, ranking as the finest of architectural sculpture. On the west side of the temple was the inclosure in which grew the miraculous olive-tree of Athena, and on which lived the priestesses and the high-born maidens who were selected every year to serve the goddess.

Erechtheus (ē-rek'thūs), or Erichthonius (e-rik-thō'ni-us). In Greek legend, a son of Hephestus, and an autochthonous hero of Athens: often confounded with another of the same name, sometimes represented as his grandson.

Eregli (e-reg'li), or Erekli (e-rek'tli). A town in the vilayet of Kastamuni, Asiatic Turkey, situated on the Black Sea in lat. 41° 17' N., long. 31° 25' E.: the ancient Heraclea. It is the center of a coal-mining region. Population, about 4,000.

Eretria (e-rē'tri-ā). [Gr. Ἐρέτρια.] In ancient geography, a city on the island of Eubœa, Greece, 29 miles north of Athens. It was a rival of Chalcis, was destroyed by the Persians in 490 B. C., and was afterward rebuilt. An ancient theater has been excavated on its site by the American School at Athens. The cave is supported on an artificial embankment. It was divided by radial stairways into 11 cone, and is 266 feet in diameter. The orchestra, 81 feet in diameter, presents a highly important feature, here first recognized, in an underground passage leading from its center to the interior of the stage-structure. This explains several obscurities in the classical drama.

Erfurt (er'fört). A city in the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated on the Gera in lat. 50° 58' N., long. 11° 17' E. It is famous for its horticulture, and has varied manufactures. It contains a noted cathedral, a church of St. Severus, and an Augustine monastery which has a cell once occupied by Luther. The town was founded very early, and was a member of the Hanse League. It was an object of strife between Saxony and the electorate of Mainz, and passed finally to the latter. It was acquired by Prussia in 1802, was taken by the French in 1806, and was ceded to Prussia in 1815. It had a university from the 14th century to 1816. In 1808 it was the scene of a conference between Napoleon, Alexander I., and German princes, and in 1850 was the seat of the German Unions-parliament. Population (1890), 72,360.

Eric (ē'rik), Sw. Erik (ā'rik), Saint. Died near Upsala, Sweden, May 18, 1160. King of Sweden, elected to the throne of Upper Sweden in 1150. He undertook in 1157 a crusade against the heathen Finns, part of whom he conquered and baptized. Soon after his return to Upsala he was attacked by the Danish prince Magnus Hendrikson, and fell in battle.

Eric XIV., King of Sweden. Born Dec. 13, 1533; poisoned Feb. 26, 1577. Son of Gustavus Vasa whom he succeeded in 1560. He elevated his mistress, Katrina Månstötter, to the throne, after having made unsuccessful overtures of marriage to Queen Elizabeth of England and Mary Queen of Scots. His violence and misgovernment caused his deposition in 1568 by a conspiracy of the nobles headed by his brothers John and Charles. He was, according to tradition, put to death in prison by poison.

Eric the Red. The founder of the first Norse settlement in Greenland (?). According to the Icelandic sagas, he killed a man in Norway and fled to Iceland, whence he was sent into temporary banishment for a similar outrage; whereupon, in 982, he set sail toward the west in quest of a strange land sighted in 876 by the Norse sea-rover Gunnbjörn. He discovered the country which he named Greenland, and lived there three years, when he returned to Iceland for colonists and supplies for a permanent settlement, which he founded apparently in 985.

Ericht (er'icht). Loch. A lake in Scotland, situated on and near the border of Perthshire and Inverness-shire. It is the outlet to Loch Rannoch and the Tay. Length, nearly 15 miles.

Erichthonius. See Erechtheus.

Ericson (er'ik-son), Leif. A Norse adventurer, son of Eric the Red. According to the Icelandic sagas, he sailed from Greenland with 35 companions about 1000 A. D., in quest of a strange land to the west which had been sighted in 986 by the Norseman Bjarni Herjulfson. He discovered the country which he named Vinland from the grape-vines he found growing in it, and spent a winter there. The coast on which he landed has been variously identified — by some as that of Labrador or Newfoundland, and by others as that of New England.

Ericsson (er'ik-son), John. Born in the parish of Fernebo, Wermland, Sweden, July 31, 1803; died at New York, March 8, 1859. A famous Swedish-American engineer and inventor. He went to England in 1826, and to the United States in 1830. He constructed the calorific engine in 1833; applied the screw to steam navigation 1836-41; and invented the turreted ironclad Monitor 1862. (See Monitor.) His later inventions include a solar engine, the torpedo-boat destroyer, etc.

Ericsson, Nils. Born Jan. 31, 1802; died at Stockholm, Sept. 8, 1870. A Swedish engineer, brother of John Ericsson. He became second lieutenant in the engineer corps of the Swedish army in 1823; was promoted lieutenant in 1828, captain in 1830, and major in 1832; and in 1850 was appointed colonel in the mechanical corps of the navy. He was director-in-chief of the state railways 1855-62, and was knighted in 1854.

Eridanus (er'id'a-nus). [Gr. Ἐριδανός.] In Greek legend, the name of a large river in northern Europe, later identified with the Rhône, or, usually, with the Po. It was connected with the myth of Phaethon. See Phaethon.

Eridu (er'id-dö). An ancient city in Babylonia, the modern Abu Shahrein, situated on the left bank of the Euphrates, not far from Mugheir, nearly opposite to the Arabic city Suk es-Shuyh. It was the principal seat of Ea, the Assyro-Babylonian god of the ocean.

Erie (er'i). A tribe of North American Indians formerly living in western New York and along the southern shore of Lake Erie from the Genesee to the Cuyahoga River in Ohio. The word is derived from their Huron name, signifying 'Cat people,' from which the French called them Nation du Chat. In 1653 the Senecas conquered and absorbed them. See Troquian.

Erie. A city, port of entry, and county-seat of Erie County, Pennsylvania, situated on Lake Erie in lat. 42° 8' N., long. 80° 6' W. Its chief industry is iron manufacture, and it has a large trade. It occupies the site of Fort de la Presqu'île, built about 1749. Population (1890), 40,634.

Erie, Lake. The southernmost and shallowest of the Great Lakes, lying between Ontario on the north, New York, Pennsylvania, and Ohio on the south and southeast, and Michigan on the west. It communicates with Lake St. Clair by the Detroit River at its upper end, and discharges its waters into Lake Ontario by the Niagara River. It receives the Maumee. On its banks are Buffalo, Cleveland, Sandusky, and Toledo. Length, about 250 miles. Average breadth, about 40 miles. Area, 9,600 square miles. Height above sea-level, 578 feet.

Erie, Lake, Battle of. A naval victory gained near Put-in-Bay, Lake Erie, Sept. 10, 1813, by the American fleet (9 vessels, 54 guns, 490 men) under O. H. Perry over the British fleet (6 vessels, 63 guns, 502 men) under Barclay.

Erie Canal. The chief canal in the United States, extending from the Hudson River at Albany to Lake Erie at Buffalo. Its construction was due mainly to the efforts of De Witt Clinton 1817-25. Its present length is 350 miles. Width at surface, 70 feet; at bottom, 56 feet. Depth, 7 feet.

Erigena (er-ij'e-nä), Johannes Scotus. [Eri-gena, born in Ireland.] Born probably in Ireland between 800 and 815; died probably about 891. A noted scholar of the Carolingian period. He came to the court of Charles the Bald before 847, and became director of the palatial school, during the incumbency of which office his chief literary work was done. He is said by William of Malmesbury and others to have been invited to England by Alfred the Great (about 833), to have been appointed teacher at the school of Oxford and abbot of Malmesbury, and to have been killed by his own pupils. His chief work was the translation of Dionysius Areopagita, and the consequent introduction of Neoplatonism into western Europe. The most notable of his original productions is "De Divisione Nature" (edited by Gale 1681, Schluter 1838, and Floss 1853).

Erigone (er-ig'ö-në). [Gr. Ἐριγόνη.] In Greek mythology, the daughter of Icarus. She was changed to a constellation (the Latin Virgo).

Erin (er'in). See Ireland.

Erinna (er-in'ä). [Gr. Ἐριννα.] Born at Rhodes or Telos; lived about 600 B. C., dying at the age of nineteen. A celebrated Greek poetess, a friend of Sappho, and her companion in Mytilene. Fragments of a poem, entitled "The Spindle," and some epigrams are all that remain of her work.

Erinyes (er-in'i-ëz). [Gr. Ἐρινύες.] In Greek mythology, female divinities, avengers of iniquity. According to Hesiod they are daughters of Ge (earth), sprung from the blood of the mutilated Uranus; according to others, of night and darkness. They were also called the Eumenides and, by the Romans, Furiæ or Diræ. In later times their number was limited to three, Alecto ('the unresting'), Megæra ('the jealous'), and Tisiphone ('the avenger').

Eriphyle (er-i-fi'lë). [Gr. Ἐριφύλη.] In Greek mythology, the wife of Amphiaraus and sister of Adrastus. She was slain by her son Alcmaeon for persuading his father to join the expedition against Thebes, in which he met his death.

Eris (er'is or er'is). [Gr. Ἔρις.] In Greek mythology, the goddess of discord, sister of Ares and, according to Hesiod, daughter of Nyx. In revenge for not having been invited to the nuptials of Peleus and Thetis, she threw among the guests a golden apple bearing the inscription "To the Fairest." A dispute arose between Aphrodite, Hera, and Athena concerning the apple, whereupon Zeus ordered Hermes to take the goddesses to Mount Gargarus, to the shepherd Paris, who should decide the dispute. He awarded the apple to Aphrodite, who in return assisted him in carrying off the beautiful Helen from Sparta, which gave rise to the Trojan war. In Vergil Discordia takes the place of Eris.

Erith (er'ith). A town in Kent, England, on the Thames 13 miles east of London.

Eritrea (er-rë-trä'ä). The official name, since 1890, of the Italian colony on the Red Sea. The first annexation by Italy was that of Assab in 1880. Massowah, the natural harbor of Abyssinia, is the capital. The population of Eritrea is estimated at 450,000. The boundaries on the coast are Ras Kasar and Raheita. The inland boundary is undefined, but in a general way it extends southwestward from Ras Kasar to the Atbara, thence along approximately the line of 35° E. long. to the upper Juba River in 6° N. lat., and down the latter to its mouth. The lower portion of this boundary separates the region from the British sphere of influence. Italy claims a protectorate over Abyssinia, but the latter disclaims it.

Erivan (er-i-vän'). A government of Transcaucasia, Russia, north of Persia and Turkey. It is known also as Russian Armenia, and was ceded to Russia by Persia in 1828. Area, 10,745 square miles. Population (1887-89), 677,491.

Erivan. The capital of the government of Erivan, situated on the Sanga in lat. 40° 12' N., long. 44° 31' E. It was stormed by the Russian general Paskevitch in 1827. It contains the palace of the Persian viceroys, now appropriated to the needs of the Russian authorities, a large building with several courts. One of the halls has been restored in the original style, and is decorated with paintings of Persian heroes, as Abbas Mirza and Nadir Shah, and with inlaid work in colored glass. In one of the courts stand two mosques. The larger dates from the 17th century, and is incrustated within and without with brilliantly enameled tiles, those covering the dome being blue. Esarhaddon (e-sär-had'on). [Assyr. Ašur-aha-iddin, Assur has given a brother.] King of Assyria 680-668 B. C., the son and successor of Sennacherib. The reign of this king marks the highest glory and power of the Assyrian empire. He first had to quell the disturbance caused by the assassination of his father at the hands of his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer (2 Ki. xix. 37. Isa. xxxvii. 38). Then he restored the city of Babylon, which had been destroyed by his father. His expeditions extended from Media to Cilicia, and from the frontier of Elam to Arabia, and reached even to Egypt. Among the kings subject to him he enumerates, in his prism-inscription of 673, Baal, king of Tyre, Manasseh of Judah, Kaugabri of Edom, Muzuri of Moab, etc. Three years before this he destroyed Sidon. His most significant conquest was that of Egypt. After several campaigns he defeated Tarku (Biblical Tirhakah), the third of the 25th or Ethiopian dynasty, in the battle of Memphis (671), and practically converted Egypt and Ethiopia into an Assyrian province. He drove the Ethiopians out of Egypt, divided the country into districts, and placed over them submissive though mostly native rulers, chief among whom was Necho, who was put over Sais and Memphis. He added then to his many titles that of "King of Kings of Lower and Upper Egypt and Ethiopia." Like all the Sargonides, Esarhaddon was a great builder. Besides the restoration of Babylon may be mentioned his great palace in Nineveh, for the construction of which 22 subject kings had to provide the material, and which, as the excavations in the mounds of Kuyunjik and Nebi-yunus have shown, was adorned with winged lions and bulls and sphinxes. In 668 Esarhaddon abdicated in favor of his son Assurbanipal.

Eskimauan (es'ki-mā-an). [From Algonkin eskimantik, eaters of raw flesh.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians whose habitat extends coastwise from eastern Greenland to western Alaska and to the extremity of the Aleutian Islands, a distance of over 5,000 miles. The winter or permanent villages are usually along the coast. The interior is also visited for hunting reindeer and other animals, though the natives rarely penetrate inland farther than 50 miles, a strip of coast 30 miles wide representing the average area of Eskimauan occupancy. The stock comprises the Greenland, Labrador, middle, Alaskan, Aleutian, and Asiatic groups. Of the 20 principal villages of the Greenland Eskimo, 17 are on the eastern coast, where settlements have extended to lat. 74° 30'. On the west coast villages extend to Smith Sound in lat. 78° 18', while in Grinnell Land permanent habitations have been found in lat. 81° 44'. The Labrador group has 4 prominent villages and a number of lesser settlements reaching as far south as Hamilton Inlet (lat. 55° 30'); formerly their villages extended to Belle Isle Strait (lat. 50° 30'). The middle Eskimo inhabit 20 permanent villages, their range extending from the southern extremity of Ellesmere Land, Jones Sound, nearly to James Bay in Hudson Bay, and westward to Alaska, except the coast between the mouth of Coppermine River and Cape Bathurst, and from the territory of the Mackenzie Eskimo, about the Mackenzie delta, to Point Barrow. These stretches were used only as hunting-grounds. There are 23 permanent villages of the Alaska group. The range of this group extends from Point Barrow westward and southward over almost the entire coast as far as Atka or Copper River, where the Koluschan domain begins. The Point Barrow Eskimo do not penetrate far inland, but to the south the tribes reach to the head waters of the Nunatog and Koyuk rivers, visiting the coast only to trade. The Aleutian group, commonly called Unangan or Aleut, formerly occupied the entire Aleutian Archipelago; but since the advent of the Russians and the introduction of the fur-trade, their territory has greatly diminished. Atka and Unalaska are its principal villages. The stock is represented in north-eastern Asia by the Yuit, of Chukchi Peninsula, who are comparatively recent arrivals from the American coast. The number of the Eskimo is estimated at 34,000, distributed as follows: Greenland group, 10,872; Labrador group, 2,000; middle or Baffin Land group, 1,100; Alaskan group, 20,000. The number of the Yuit or Asiatic group is small.

Esprénacnil, or Épréménil (ā-pṛ-mā-nēl'), Jean Jacques Duval d'. Born at Pendiachery, India, 1746; died at Paris, April 23, 1794. A French politician. As a prominent member of the Parliament of Paris he defended in 1788 the privileges of that body against royal encroachment, with the result that he was committed to custody. Having been deputed to the States-General by the noblesse of Paris in 1789, he supported the royal cause; and in 1791, at the close of the National Assembly, of which he was a member, he formally protested against the new constitution. He was sent to the guillotine by the Revolutionary tribunal.

Espirit des Lois (es-prē'dā lwā). [F., 'Spirit of the Laws.'] A celebrated philosophical work by Montesquieu, published at Geneva in 1748.

The title may be thought to be not altogether happy, and indeed rather ambiguous, because it does not of itself suggest the extremely wide sense in which the word law is intended to be taken. An exact, if cumbersome, title for the book would be "On the Relation of Human Laws and Customs to the Laws of Nature." The author begins somewhat formally with the old distinction of politics into democracy, aristocracy, and monarchy. He discusses the principles of each and their bearings on education, on positive law, on social conditions, on military strength, offensive and defensive, on individual liberty, on taxation and finance. Then an abrupt return is made from the effects to the causes of constitutions and polity. The theory of the influence of physical conditions, and especially of climate, on political and social institutions—a theory which is perhaps more than any other identified with the book—receives special attention, and a somewhat disproportionate space is given to the question of slavery in this connection. From climate Montesquieu passes to the nature of the soil, as in its turn affecting civil polity. He then attacks the subject of manners and customs as distinct from laws, of trade and commerce, of the family, of jurisprudence, of religion. The book concludes with an elaborate examination of the feudal system in France. Throughout it the reader is equally surprised at the varied and exact knowledge of the author, and at his extraordinary fertility in general views. This fertility is indeed sometimes a snare to him, and leads to rash generalisation.

Essenes (e-sēnz'). [LL. Esseni, from Gr. Ἐσσηνοί, also Ἐσσαίοι; ulterior origin uncertain.] A Jewish sect of the 2d century B. C., supposed to have sprung from the Chasidim, the zealous religious-political party that originated during the struggles of the Maccabean period against Hellenistic invasions. The Essenes, however, refrained from all political and public affairs, forming a kind of religious order. Their ideal was to attain the highest sanctity of priestly consecration. To this end they separated themselves from the world, and lived in settlements in the desert west of the Dead Sea. Most of them lived there in communism and celibacy. Other peculiarities were disapproval of oaths and war, strict observance of the Sabbath, and, especially, scrupulous attention to the Levitical laws of cleanliness. Their name is said to be derived from their frequent bathing. Their asceticism evolved a theoretical mysticism, and miraculous cures and exorcisms were ascribed to them. Their external symbols were the white garment, apron, and sbovel. They never gained any hold on Judaism, and their number never exceeded 4,000. Their relation to Christianity, and their influence on it, are much discussed points.

In 1704 he first appeared on the English stage, where he played many important characters, such as Falstaff, Sir Joslin Jolly, and Old Fell-lair; he also created many comedy parts, and wrote several plays. He was the first provider of the Beefsteak Club, and in the "Tatler" he is described under the name of "Tom Mirror."

Este (es'te). A town in the province of Padua, Italy, situated 17 miles southwest of Padua: the ancient Adeste. It is noted for its castle (rocca) and leaning campanile. The rocca, the seat of the Este family, built in 1343 and strengthened by the Scaligers, is a battlemented medieval fortress with a mighty keep. Population, about 6,000.

Este. One of the oldest and most celebrated of the princely houses of Italy, according to modern genealogists a branch of the house of the Guelphs. It traces its origin to Oberto II., margrave of Casal Maggiore, the youngest son of the margrave Oberto I., imperial count palatine in Italy under the emperor Otto I. Oberto's grandson, Azzo II., was invested by the emperor Henry III. with Este and other Italian fiefs, was created duke of Milan, and adopted the name of Este. His two sons Welf IV. and Fulco I. became the founders, respectively, of a German and an Italian branch of the house of Este, the German branch being in modern times represented by the houses of Brunswick and Hanover. The Italian branch furnished the leaders of the party of the Guelphs in Italy in the 13th and 14th centuries, its chief seats being at Ferrara, Modena, and Reggio. Borsio received the title of duke of Modena and Reggio from the emperor Frederick III. in 1452, and that of duke of Ferrara from Pope Paul II. The male line of the Italian branch of the house of Este became extinct at the death of Hercules III. in 1903. His only daughter, Maria Beatrice, married Archduke Ferdinand of Austria, third son of the emperor Francis I., who became the founder of the Austrian branch of the house of Este, the male line of which became extinct in 1875.

Ethbaal (eth-bá'al). [Assyr., "with Baal": called by the Greeks Ἐθωβαός, Ἰθωβαός, Ithobalus.] A king of Tyre. He was the father of Jezebel, the wife of Ahab, king of Israel. In the Assyrian inscriptions he is called Tubalú. Ethbaal II. is mentioned in the annals of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon. Josephus represents him as king of Sidon as well as of Tyre.

Ethelred (eth'el-red), Ailred, or Ealred. Born in 1109; died June 12, 1166. An English ecclesiastical writer. He was educated at the Scottish court, entered the Cistercian order, and became abbot of Revesby in Lincolnshire, and afterward of Rievaulx in Yorkshire. His works include "Historia de Vita et Miraculis S. Edwardi," "Genealogia Regum Anglorum," "De Bello Standardi," and "Historia de Sanctimoniali de Watton" (which have been published in Sir Roger Twysden's "Historie Anglicane Scriptores decem" (1652). His theological works were collected by Richard Gibbons. The "Margarite Vita" attributed to him is not his work.

Etherege (eth'é-er-cj), George. Flourished about 1588. An English classical scholar. He was born in Oxfordshire, studied at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and was licensed to practise medicine in 1545. He was regius professor of Greek at Christ Church, Oxford, 1547-1550 and 1554-59. His health was seriously impaired by frequent imprisonments during a period of thirty years on account of his adherence to the Roman Catholic faith. He was living in 1583, but his death is not recorded. His works include a Latin translation of Justin Martyr, various poems in Greek and Latin, the Psalms of David in Hebrew verse set to music, and a manuscript copy of musical compositions.

Etherege, Sir George. Born 1635 (?); died 1691. An English dramatist. The facts of his early life are obscure. In 1676 he was obliged to leave the country with Rochester on account of a disgraceful brawl, but before 1685 had obtained diplomatic employment. He was sent to The Hague by Charles II., and in 1685 to Ratibon by James II. He disgusted the Germans by his habits of debauchery and breaches of etiquette. In 1688 he retired hastily to Paris, where Luttrell reports that he died. He wrote "The Comical Revenge" (1694), "She Would if She Could" (1698), and "The Man of Mode, or Sir Fopling Flutter" (1676). He was the inventor of the comedy of intrigue.

Two more atrocious libertines than these two men [Etherege and Sir Charles Sedley] were not to be found in the apartments at Whitehall, or in the streets, taverns, and dens of London. Yet both were famed for like external qualities. Therege was easy and graceful, Sedley so refinedly seductive of manner that Buckingham called it "witchcraft," and Willmot "his prevailing, gentle art." I, humbler witness, can only say, after studying their works and their lives, that Therege was a more accomplished comedy-writer than Sedley, but that Sedley was a greater beast than Therege. Doran, Eng. Stage, I. 140.

Ethiopia, or Æthiopia (ē-thi-ō'pi-ä), Heb. Cush. [L. Æthiopia, Gr. Αἰθιοπία (sc. $\gamma\eta$ or $\chi\acute{o}\rho\alpha$), from Aithiops, an Ethiopian.] In ancient geography, a country south of Egypt, corresponding to the kingdom of Meroë, from the neighborhood of Khartum northward to Egypt. In a more extended sense it comprised Nubia, northern Abyssinia, Sennar, and Kordofan. It was closely connected with Egypt. Conquered by Egyptian kings of the 12th dynasty, lost in the period of the Hyksos, and reconquered under the 18th dynasty, it remained with Egypt until after the 20th dynasty. An Ethiopian founded the 25th Egyptian dynasty. Under Psammetichus (7th century B. C.) many Egyptians emigrated to Ethiopia. It was ruled by a female dynasty, the Candaces, about the Christian era. It is now held by the Mahdists and Abyssinians.

Étienne (ā-tyen'). Charles Guillaume. Born at Chamouilly (Haute-Marne), Jan. 6, 1778; died at Paris, March 13, 1845. A French dramatist, poet, and journalist. His first important work was "Le rêve," an opera, with music by Gressink (1799), which had such success as to induce him to devote himself to the drama, producing a great number of plays, among which is the comedy "Erneys et Palaprat" (1807). To 1810 his best play, "Les deux gendres," appeared. A short divertimento, "Une matinée du camp on les petits bateaux," followed in 1814 by another, "Une journée an camp de Bruges," induced the Duke of Bassano to appoint him his private secretary. He accompanied him to Germany and Poland. On his return he first became connected with the "Journal de l'Empire." He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies, signed the Address of the 221 in 1830, and later was a member of the Chamber of Peers. He was also the author of a number of political pamphlets and of a "Histoire du théâtre français" (1802).

Étienne du Mont (ā-tyen' dü môn), St. [F., "Saint Stephen of the Mount."] A noted florid-Pointed church in Paris, founded in 1517. The west front was added by Henry IV. The church is famous for its graceful roof-loft in carved stone, which spans the nave in a low arch from opposite pillars around which wind its two spiral stairs. The church possesses some beautiful glass, and the rich 13th-century shrine of Ste. Geneviève.

Eton (é'ton). A village of about 2,500 inhabitants in Buckinghamshire, England, situated on the Thames, opposite Windsor, 22 miles west of London. Eton College, one of the most famed of English public schools, was founded in 1440 by Henry VI. The low and picturesque battlemented and towered brick buildings inclose two courts, which communicate by a vaulted passage. The large Perpendicular chapel forms the south side of the outer quadrangle. The new quadrangle was finished in 1889.

Étourdi (ā-tör-dé'), L'. [F., 'The Heedless One.'] A comedy by Molière, presented at Lyons 1653.

Étretat (ā-tré'tá'). A watering-place in the department of Seine-Inférieure, France, on the English Channel 14 miles north-northeast of Havre.

Etruria (ē-trö'ri-ä). [L. Etruria, Uetruria, Gr. Ἐτροπία (the reg. Gr. name being Τυρρηνία, the country of the Etrusci, Etruscans. Hence Tuscan, Tuscany.] In ancient geography, a division of Italy which extended along the Mediterranean, and was separated from Umbria, the Sabine territory, and Latium by the Tiber, and from Liguria by the Apennines. It nearly corresponds to modern Tuscany. It contained a confederation of 12 cities—probably Veii, Clusium, Tarquinii, Falerii, Cere, Volsinii, Cortona, Perugia, Arretium, Vulci, Volaterra, and Vetulonia. The Etruscan developed as a great naval power, influential in northern and central Italy, and had possessions on the Po and in Campania. Etruscan kings ruled at an early time in Rome (probably till about 500 B. C.). The Etruscans were defeated by Syracuse in a naval battle in 474 B. C., and suffered from the invasion of the Gauls about 400. Veii was lost to Rome in 396. Defeat by Rome at the Vadimonian Lake in 283 was followed by the fall of Tarquinii and the other Etrurian cities.

Etruria. A village in Staffordshire, England, noted as the seat of the Wedgwood potteries.

Etruria, Kingdom of. A kingdom formed by Napoleon from the grand duchy of Tuscany in 1801, and bestowed upon the Crown Prince of Parma. It was annexed to France in 1808.

Etrurians (ē-trö'ri-äuz), or Etruscans (ē-trus'-känz). The ancient inhabitants of Etruria, the modern Tuscany. See Etruria.

The Etrurians are the most mysterious people of antiquity. We meet them in the sculptured chronicles of ancient Egypt as the Tursha, and in the pages of the earliest Greek writers as the Tyrrhenes, or Turseni. According to ancient tradition, they came from Lydia in prehistoric times, and colonized Latium. Certain details of their costumes and customs appear to be identical with those of Lydia, and the legend is probably based upon fact. But until the inscriptions of Etruria can be read, we are not likely to solve this problem. The Etruscan characters closely resemble the archaic alphabets of Asia Minor; but no scholar has yet succeeded in identifying more than proper names and the names of deities.

Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 91. Lately the discovery of an inscription on the island of Lemnos seems to render probable the identity of the Etruscans with the Pelasgian Tyrrhenians of the Mediterranean. La Sausseye, Science of Religion, p. 324.

Éttingen (et'ling-en). A town in Baden, 4½ miles south of Karlsruhe. It has manufactures of paper, etc., and is noted for its Roman antiquities. Here the French under Moreau defeated the Austrians under Archduke Charles, July 9 and 10, 1796. Population (1890), 6,548.

Etymologicum Magnum (et'i-mó-loj'i-kum mag'num). [ML., tr. Gr. τὸ ἐτυμολογικὸν μέγα, the great dictionary.] See the extract.

The remaining great lexicon of the Byzantine age, the Etymologicum Magnum as it is called, does not puzzle us by assuming the name of any definite author. It may, indeed, be doubted whether there was not more than one compilation bearing this name, and whether it denoted more than a bookseller's or scribe's collection and edition of divers glossaries made up from the works of the most eminent grammarians. The work has already appeared in two different forms, derived from manuscripts of two different classes: the one, which is sometimes called the Etymologicum Sylburgianum, because the first critical revision was that which Sylburg founded on the original publication of Marcus Musurus; the other, which is termed the Etymologicum Gudianum, because it was derived by Sturz from a manuscript at Wolfenbüttel, belonging originally to Marquard Gude. There is, indeed, reason to suppose that the work published by Musurus got its title of Etymologicum Magnum from its first editor or from its printer Cullierius. The age of the work may, however, with some probability, be assigned to the 10th century or thereabouts. It may be best described as a farrago of extracts from the most esteemed grammarians, copied slavishly and arranged in alphabetical order.

Eudes (éd), or Odo (ō'dō), Count of Paris. Died in 898. King of France 887 (888)-898. He defended Paris against the Normen under Rollo in 885-886, and on the deposition of Charles the Fat, in 887, was elected king of France by a party among the nobles. In 893 Charles the Simple, son of Charles the Fat, was set up as rival king, and Oudes was compelled to cede to him the country between the Seine and the Rhine.

Eudes I. Died in Cilicia, March 23, 1103. Duke of Burgundy. He fought under the standard of Alfonso VI., king of Castile and Leon, against the Saracens in 1087. He afterward departed on a crusade to the Holy Land, and died in Cilicia.

Eudes II. Died in 1162. Duke of Burgundy. He compelled Thibaut of Champagne to do homage for the county of Troy in 1143.

Eudes III. Died at Lyons, July 6, 1218. Duke of Burgundy. He took part in 1209 in the crusade against the Albigensians, and in 1214 commanded the right wing of the French army at the battle of Bouvines.

Eudes IV. Died at Sens in 1350. Duke of Burgundy. He married the daughter of Philip, king of France, in 1318.

Eudes. Born 665; died 735. Duke of Aquitaine and Vasconie (Gascogne). His dominions were invaded by the Saracens under Abd-er-Rahman, who were repulsed with the aid of Charles Martel at Poitiers in 732.

Eudes. Died in 1037. Count of Champagne.

He was defeated and killed in an attempt to make himself master of Lorraine.

Eudes de Montreuil (éd de môn-trèy'). Died 1289. A French sculptor, architect, and engineer. He went to the Holy Land in 1248, and in 1250-51 constructed the fortifications of Jaffa. In 1254 he returned to Paris. In 1262 he built the Church of the Cordeliers, and that of the Chartreux in 1276. In the church of the Cordeliers he was accorded sepulture, and erected his own tomb with life-size statues of himself and his two wives. This monument was described in the reign of Henry II. It was destroyed in 1880.

Eudeve. See Opata.

Eudocia (ū-dō'shiā). [Gr. Εὐδοκία, esteem, honor.] Born at Athens about 393; died at Jerusalem about 460. A Roman empress. She was the daughter of the sophist Leontius, or, as he is also called, Heraclitus of Athens, who gave her a careful education. She married the emperor Theodosius II. in 421, having previously exchanged her original name Athenais for Eudocia at baptism. Having supplanted the emperor's sister, Pulcheria, in the administration of the government, she effected the convention of the so-called Robber Council of Ephesus in 449, at which Flavian, the patriarch of Constantinople, was deposed by the Eutychians. Shortly after this the emperor took up the cause of the orthodox party, in consequence of which, as well as of his jealousy, she was banished to Jerusalem in 449. She wrote a number of poems, including a paraphrase of the Octateuch.

Eudocia. A Byzantine empress, wife of Constantine XI., and afterward of Romanus IV. At his death in 1067 Constantine bequeathed the empire to her and their three young sons, Michael VII., Andronicus I., and Constantine XII. Although bound by oath not to marry again, she espoused Romanus in 1068, and made him a colleague in the empire with herself and her sons, whereupon Joannes Ducas, brother of Constantine XI., made Michael VII. sole emperor, and banished Eudocia to a convent. She compiled a dictionary of history and mythology, entitled ῥωμα, or "Collection (or Bed) of Violets," which is still extant.

Eudoxia (ū-dok'si-ā). [LGr. Εὐδοξία, good report, honor.] A Byzantine empress, daughter of the Frank Bauto. She married in 395 Arcadius, by whom she became the mother of Theodosius II., or "the Younger." She acquired a complete ascendancy over her husband, and procured the exile of Chrysostom, patriarch of Constantinople, who inveighed against the avarice and luxury of the court.

Eudoxia. Born at Constantinople, 422. A Roman empress, daughter of Theodosius II. She married in 436 or 437 Valentinian III., who was murdered by Petronius Maximus in 455. Compelled to marry the usurper, she called in Genseric, king of the Vandals, who took Rome and carried off Eudoxia and her two daughters, Eudocia and Placidia, to Carthage. Maximus was killed in the flight. Eudoxia was after some years sent to Constantinople with an honorable escort.

Eudoxians (ū-dok'si-anz). The followers of Eudoxius, patriarch of Constantinople and an extreme Arian of the 4th century: same as Anomæans, Actians, and Enomians.

Eudoxius (ū-dok'si-us). [Gr. Εὐδοξιος.] Died 370. A patriarch of Constantinople. He became bishop of Antioch in 347, and patriarch of Constantinople in 360. He was an Arian and the leader of the Eudoxians.

Eudoxus (ū-dok'sus) of Cnidus. [Gr. Εὐδοξος.] Born about 409 B. C.; died about 356 B. C. A Greek astronomer, geometer, and physician. He is said to have been the first to introduce the use of the celestial globe into Greece, to have corrected the length of the year, and to have adduced the fact that the altitude of the stars changes with the latitude as a proof of the sphericity of the earth.

Eudoxus of Cyzicus. Born at Cyzicus, Asia Minor; lived in the second half of the 2d century B. C. A Greek navigator in the Egyptian service, said to have circumnavigated Africa from the Red Sea to the Strait of Gibraltar.

Eugene (ū-jēn'). Prince (François Eugène de Savoie-Carignan). [Gr. εὐγενής, well-born; L. Eugenius, F. Eugène, It. Sp. Pg. Eugenio, G. Eugenius, Eugen.] Born at Paris, Oct. 18, 1663; died at Vienna, April 21, 1736. A celebrated Austrian general. He was the son of Prince Eugène Maurice de Savoie-Carignan, comte de Soissons, by Olympia Mancini, a niece of Cardinal Mazarin. He was intended for the church, and when about ten was created abbot of Carignan. Being refused a commission in the French army by Louis XIV., he entered the service of Austria, with the rank of colonel, in 1683. He was in 1696 appointed commander-in-chief of the imperial army against the Turks, whom he totally defeated at Zenta in 1697, and compelled to accept the peace of Carlowitz in 1699. At the outbreak of the War of the Spanish Succession, he invaded Italy, defeated Catinat at Carpi and Villeroi at Chiari in 1701, and fought a drawn battle with Vendôme at Luzzara in 1702. After suppressing an insurrection under the younger Rákoczy in Hungary, he joined Marlborough in Germany, where their allied forces defeated the French and Bavarians at Blenheim Aug. 13, 1704. He returned in 1705 to Italy, where, by a victory over Marsin and the Duke of Orleans at Turin, Sept. 7, 1706, he expelled the French from Italy. In cooperation with Marlborough in the Netherlands and in northern France, he won the battle of Oudenarde in 1708, captured Lille in 1708, and gained the victory of Malplaquet in 1709. He negotiated the peace of Rastadt with France in 1714. The war with the Turks having broken out anew, he defeated the latter at Peterwardein in 1716 and at Belgrad in 1717, and forced them to accept the peace of Passarowitz in 1718.

Eugene Aram. A novel by Bulwer Lytton, published in 1832. Hood's poem on the same subject is called "The Dream of Eugene Aram." See Aram, Eugene.

Eugène de Beauharnais. See Beauharnais. Eugénia (ū-jē'nī-ā). [Fem. of Eugenius; F. Eugénie.] 1. A female name, the feminine of Eugenius.—2. An asteroid (No. 45) discovered by Goldschmidt at Paris, June 26, 1857.

Eugénie (ē-zhā-nē') (Eugenia Maria de Montijo de Guzman, Countess of Teba). [See Eugenia.] Born at Granada, Spain, May 5, 1826. The second daughter of Don Manuel Fernandez de Montijo, and wife of Napoleon III. whom she married Jan. 30, 1853. After the fall of the empire she fixed her residence at Chislehurst, Kent, England; later (1880) at Farnborough Hill.

Eugenie (ū-jē'nī), Sir Dauphine. In Ben Jonson's "Epicoene, or the Silent Woman," the witty and impecunious nephew of Morose. See Epicoene.

Eugénie Grandet (ē-zhā-nē' grōn-dā'). A novel by Balzac, written in 1833, published in 1834. The heroine, Eugénie, is sacrificed to the cold-blooded avariciousness of her father. This is one of Balzac's best novels.

Eugenius (ū-jē'nī-us) I., Saint. [See Eugene.] Born at Rome; died there, June 1, 657. Pope 654-657.

Eugenius II. Born at Rome; died there, Aug. 27, 827. Pope 824-827.

Eugenius III. Born at Pisa, Italy; died at Tivoli, Italy, July 8, 1153. Pope 1145-53. He was expelled from Rome by the populace, which, incited by the preaching of Arnold of Brescia, sought to restore the ancient republic; and was enabled by the aid of Roger of Sicily to return in 1149. Compelled in the following year to abandon Rome once more, he afterward lived mostly at Segni. During his reign the second Crusade took place (1147-49), chiefly through the instrumentality of his teacher, St. Bernard of Clairvaux.

Eugenius IV. (Gabriel Condolmieri). Born at Venice, 1383; died at Rome, Feb. 23, 1447. Pope 1431-47. He became involved in a contest with the Council of Basel (opened March 12, 1431). Having ordered the dissolution of this body and the convening of another council at Ferrara in 1437, he was deposed in 1439 by the Council of Basel, which set up an antipope in the person of Felix V., the schism thus produced continuing till the death of Eugenius. He signed with the emperor John Paleologus a convention for the reunion of the Greek and Latin churches in 1439.

Eugenius. In Sterne's "Tristram Shandy," the friend and mentor of Yorick.

Eugippius, or Eugyppius (ū-jīp'i-us). An Italian monk. He was a pupil of St. Severinus of Noricum, whose remains were brought about 488 to Castrum Lucullanum, near Naples, there to form the nucleus of an abbey of which Eugippius became the second abbot. He wrote a life of St. Severinus (511), which is an important source of early German history.

Eugubine (ū'gū-bin) Tables. [From the place of their discovery, the ancient Iguvium, later Eugubium, modern Gubbio.] Seven brazen tablets containing inscriptions, discovered near Gubbio, Italy, in 1444, and now preserved there. They form the chief monument of the ancient Umbrian language. Four of the tablets are wholly Umbrian, one is partly Umbrian and partly Latin, and two are Latin. The inscriptions relate to the acts of a corporation of priests.

Euhemerus. See Eremerus.

Eulalia (ū-lā'li-ā). Saint. [Gr. Εὐλαλία, fair speech; F. Eulalie.] A Roman virgin martyr, tortured to death during the persecution of Diocletian in 308.

Eulengebirge (oi'len-ge-bēr'ge). A mountain group of the Sudetic chain, southwest of Breslau. Its chief point is the Hohe Eule, 3,325 feet high.

Eulenspiegel (oi'len-spē-gel). Till or Tyll. [G., 'owl-glass.' The name of a German of the 14th century who was probably born at Kneitlingen, near Brunswick, and buried at Mölln (according to a history of his life written in North Germany in 1483 and translated into High German and printed about 1550). Only a small part of the deeds attributed to him are possibly his own. The name is merely the center about which have been grouped popular tales describing the mischievous pranks of a vagabond of peasant origin. The stories have been widely translated. A recent edition is that of Lelpsic, 1854, by Lappenberg, who erroneously assumes Thomas Murner to have been the author of the book.

Euler (oi'ler), Leonhard. Born at Basel, Switzerland, April 15, 1707; died at St. Petersburg, Sept. 7 (O. S.), 1783. A celebrated Swiss mathematician. He was a pupil, at Basel, of Jean Bernoulli. On the invitation of the empress Catherine he went to St. Petersburg, where he became (1730) professor of physics, and later (1733) succeeded Daniel Bernoulli in the academy. During the later years of his life he was partly and in the end wholly blind, but conducted his elaborate calculations mentally. He published "Mechanica" (1736-42), "Theoria motuum planetarum et cometarum" (1744), "Introductio in analysin infinitorum" (1748), "Institutiones calculi differentialis" (1755), "Institutiones calculi integralis" (1768-70), "Dioptrica" (1769-71), "Anleitung zur Algebra" (1771), "Opuscula analytica" (1783-1785), "Lettres à une princesse d'Allemagne" (1768-72), etc.

Eumæus (ū-mē'us). [Gr. Εὐμαῖος.] The faithful swineherd of Ulysses, a character in the Odyssey.

Eumenes (ū-me-nēz). [Gr. Εὐμένης.] Born at Cardia, Thrace, about 361 B. C.: put to death in Gabeine, Elymnia, 316 B. C. One of the successors of Alexander the Great. He defeated Craterus in 321, and was betrayed by his soldiers to Antigonus.

Eumenes II. Died 159 (?) B. C. King of Pergamum 197-159 (?) B. C. He was the son of Attalus I, whom he succeeded. He cultivated the friendship of the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Antiochus the Great. He was present in person at the decisive battle of Magnesia, and, on the restoration of peace, was rewarded by the addition of Mysia, Lydia, and Phrygia to his kingdom. He was a patron of learning, and founded at Pergamum one of the famous libraries of antiquity.

Eumenides (ū-men'i-dēz). [Gr. Εὐμενίδες, the gracious ones.] A euphemistic name for the Eriuyes in Greek mythology.

Eumenides, The. A tragedy of Æschylus, forming the third of the great trilogy ("Agamemnon," "Choephoroi," "Eumenides") exhibited at Athens in 458 B. C.

Eumolpus (ū-mol'pus). [Gr. Εὐμόλπος, the good chanter.] In Greek mythology, a priestly bard, reputed founder of the Eleusinian mysteries.

Eunapius (ū-nā'pi-us). [Gr. Εὐνάπιος.] Born at Sardis, 347 A. D. A Greek sophist. He was a pupil of Proeresius of Athens, where he lived during the later part of his life. He was a Neoplatonist and a violent opponent of Christianity. He appears to have lived till the reign of the emperor Theodosius the younger. He wrote "Lives of Philosophers and Sophists," still extant.

Eunice (ū'nis). [Gr. Εὐνίκη, happily victorious.] The mother of Timothy (2 Tim. i. 5).

Eunomia (ū-nō'mi-ā). [Gr. Εὐνομία.] 1. In Greek mythology, one of the Horæ.—2. An asteroid (No. 15) discovered by De Gasparis at Naples, July 29, 1851.

Eunomians (ū-nō'mi-anz). The followers of Eunomius. See Eunomius.

Eunomius (ū-nō'mi-us). [Gr. Εὐνόμιος.] Born at Dacora, Cappadocia; died there, about 392. Bishop of Cyzicus and leader of the Anomæans or Eunomians. He was a pupil of Aëtius, and an extreme Arian. His chief work is an "Apology" (English translation by Whiston, 1711). See Actius.

Eunuchus (ū-nū'kus). [L., from Gr. εἰνούχος, a eunuch.] A comedy by Terence, founded in great part upon the play of the same name by Menander.

Terence has suggested many modern subjects. The Eunuchus is reflected in the "Bellamira" of Sir Charles Sedley and "Le Muet" of Brueys; the Adelphi in Molière's "École des Maris" and Baron's "L'École des Pères"; and the Phormio in Molière's "Les Fourberies de Scapin." Crittwell, Hist. of Roman Lit., p. 54.

Eupatoria (ū-pa-tō'ri-ā), or Kosloff (kos-lov'). A seaport in the Crimea, in the government of Taurida, Russia, situated on Kalamita Bay 41 miles north of Sevastopol. It was occupied by the Allies in 1854-56, and was unsuccessfully attacked by the Russians Feb. 17, 1855. Population (1889), 15,440.

Eupatridæ (ū-pat'ri-dē), The. [Gr. Εὐπατριδαί, the well-born.] The land-owning aristocracy in ancient Athens (Attica), as distinguished from the Geomori or peasants, and the Demiurgi or artisans. On the abolition of royalty they found themselves in exclusive possession of political rights, which were gradually curtailed, notably by Solon (594 B. C.) and Cleisthenes (509 B. C.), until in the time of Pericles Athens was transformed into a pure democracy.

Eupen (oi'pen), F. Néau (nā-ō'). A manufacturing town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, 10 miles south-southwest of Aix-la-Chapelle. It was ceded by Austria to France in 1801, and passed to Prussia in 1815. Population (1890), 15,440.

Euphemia (ū-fē'mi-ā). [Gr. Εὐφροσύνη, of good report; F. Euphémie, It. Sp. Pg. Eufemia.] A female name.

Euphorbus (ū-fōr'bus). [Gr. Εὐφορβος.] In Greek mythology, a brave Trojan, son of Pan-thos and brother of Hyperenor. He was slain by Menelaus, who dedicated Euphorbus's shield in the temple of Hera, near Mycenæ. Pythagoras professed to be animated by his soul.

Euphorion (ū-fō'ri-on). [Gr. Εὐφρόριον.] Born at Chaleis, Eubœa, 274 B. C.: died in Syria, probably about 200 B. C. A Greek grammarian and poet; fragments edited by Meineke (1823).

Euphranor (ū-frā'nōr). [Gr. Εὐφρανῶρ.] Born near Corinth: lived in the middle of the 4th century B. C. A Greek statuary and painter. His treatises on symmetry and color were much used by Pliny in the compilation of his 35th book. Lucian ranks his sculpture with that of Phidias, Alcámenes, and Myron, and his painting with that of Apelles, Parrhasius, and Action.

Euphrasia. See Bellariva.

Euphrasia (ū-frū'zhii). [Gr. Εὐφροσύνη, of good cheer.] The Grecian Daughter in Murphy's tragedy of that name. She is the daughter of Evander, a king of Sicily, who is imprisoned and starved by the tyrant Dionysius. She succors him with milk from her own breast, and finally stabs the tyrant and restores her father to his throne.

Euphrates (ū-frā'tēz). [Assyr. Purattu, Heb. Perath, Opers. Ufrates, Ar. Furat, Gr. Εὐφράτης, Εὐφροσύνη.] A great Mesopotamian river which has its origin in the Armenian mountains. It is formed from the East Euphrates (Murad-Su), which rises northeast of Erzerum, and a branch rising northwest of Lake Van. The united river then makes a wide circuit westward, breaks through the mountain-chain of the Taurus, enters the terrace region at the modern Birejik, and turns in a meandering course toward the Tigris. In the neighborhood of Bagdad these two rivers approach one another, and there the Babylonian canal-system begins. In its lower course, below Babylon, the Euphrates has changed its bed, shifting more and more westward. According to notices in classical authors, confirmed by the inscriptions, it came in ancient time nearer Sippara (Sefharvaim, modern Abu-Ihabba) and Uruk (modern Warka) than now; and it did not empty into the sea, united with the Tigris, through the Shatt el-Arab, as at present. As late as the time of Sennacherib (705-681 B. C.) and his successors, the twin rivers flowed separately into the Persian Gulf, which extended then at least as far as Cerna. Babylon has been rightly termed "the gift of Euphrates and Tigris." The soil is formed from the alluvial deposits of these rivers, and this formation still continues. During the winter months the Euphrates has but little water in its bed; but in the spring, and especially toward the summer solstice, it swells by the melting of the snow of the mountains, which often causes disastrous floods. In Gen. ii. 14 the Euphrates is mentioned as one of the four rivers of paradise.

Euphronius (ū-frō'ni-us). In Shakspeare's "Antony and Cleopatra," an ambassador from Antony to Cæsar.

Euphrosyne (ū-fros'i-nē). [Gr. Εὐφροσύνη, mirth.] 1. In Greek mythology, one of the three Charites or Graces.—2. An asteroid (No. 31) discovered by Ferguson at Washington, Sept. 2, 1854.

Euphues (ū-fū-ēz), or the Anatomy of Wit. [Gr. Εὐφύης, well-grown, goodly.] A novel by John Lyly, published in 1578-79. This book and its successor, "Euphues and his England," published 1580-81, brought into prominence and into further use the affected jargon, full of conceits and extravagances, used by the gallants of Elizabeth's court. Euphues is an Athenian youth who embodies the qualities implied in his name. He is elegant, handsome, amorous, and roving. "Rosalynde, or Euphues's Golden Legacy" is a similar novel by Thomas Lodge. See Rosalynde.

Euphues, his Censure to Philautus, etc. A pamphlet by Robert Greene, published in 1587, and intended as a continuation of Lyly's "Euphues."

Euphues Shadow, the Battaile of the Senses. A pamphlet by Thomas Lodge, edited by Greene and published in 1592.

Eupolis (ū-pō-lis). [Gr. Εὐπόλις.] An Athenian comic poet (born 449 B. C.), a contemporary and rival of Aristophanes. He is said to have been drowned in the battle of Cynossema, 411 B. C.

That he [Eupolis] was brilliant in his wit, and refined in his style, is plain from the fact that he co-operated with Aristophanes in his "Knights," of which the last parabasis, beginning from v. 1290, is recorded by the scholiast to have been his composition. He afterwards may have quarrelled with Aristophanes, for they satirised one another freely. In style and in genius he stood nearest to his great rival, and his comedies seem to have possessed most, if not all, of the features which make the Aristophanic comedy so peculiar in literature.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 430.

Eupompus (ū-pom'pus). [Gr. Εὐπόμπος.] Born at Sicyon: lived in the 4th century B. C. A Greek painter, founder of the so-called Sicyonian school of painting. The work of Eupompus and his successor Pamphilus was to introduce the characteristics of Doric sculpture into painting.

Eurasia (ū-rā'shiā or -zhii). [Eur(ope) and Asia.] The continental mass made up of Europe and Asia: not generally recognized as a geographical designation.

Eure (ēr). A department of France, capital Evreux, forming part of the old province of Normandy. It is bounded by Seine-Inférieure on the north, Oise and Seine-et-Oise on the east, Eure-et-Loir on the south, Orne on the southwest, and Calvados on the west. Area, 2,290 square miles. Population (1891), 349,471.

Eure. A river of northern France which joins the Seine 10 miles south of Rouen. Length, about 120 miles.

Eure-et-Loir (ēr-ā-lwār'). A department of France, capital Chartres, formed from parts of the ancient Orléanais, Perche, and Normandy. Its boundaries are Eure on the north, Seine-et-Oise on the east, Loir-et on the southeast, Loir-et-Cher and Sarthe on the south, and Orne on the west. It has been called "the granary of France." Area, 2,267 square miles. Population (1891), 284,683.

Eureka (ū-rē'kā). The county-seat of Eureka County, Nevada, situated about lat. 39° 30' N., long. 116° W. It has silver- and lead-mines. Population (1890), 1,609.

Eureka. A seaport city, the capital of Humboldt County, California, situated on Humboldt Bay in lat. 40° 48' N., long. 124° 10' W. Population (1890), 4,858.

Eric (ū'rik), or Evavic (ev'ā-rik), L. Evaricus (ev-ā-rī'kus). Died 484 or 485 A. D. A king of the West Goths. He was a younger son of Theodoric I., and obtained the government in 466 by the murder of his brother Theodoric II. He conquered the whole of the Spanish peninsula, with the exception of the northwestern corner, which he allowed the Svisic kings to hold as his vassals, and destroyed the small remnant of Roman dominion in Gaul, thereby raising the West-Gothic kingdom to its highest point of power.

Euripides (ū-rīp'i-dēz). [Gr. Εὐριπίδης.] Born in Salamis, probably Sept. 23, 480 B. C.: died in 406 B. C. A celebrated Athenian tragic poet. He was the son of Mnesarchus and Cleito, who appear to have fled from Athens to Salamis on the invasion of Xerxes, and was, according to popular tradition, born in that island on the day of the battle of Salamis. He studied physics under Anaxagoras and rhetoric under Prodicus, and at about the age of twenty-five produced the "Pelopides," the first of his plays which was acted. He is said to have gained the first prize in five dramatic contests, the first of which occurred in 441. He left Athens for the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia, about 408, owing, it is said, to the ridicule thrown upon him by the populace in consequence of the attacks of Sophocles and Aristophanes. He died at the Macedonian court (according to doubtful tradition being torn to pieces by a pack of hounds set upon him by two rival poets, Arrhidæus and Cræteus), and was buried with great pomp by Archelaus, who refused a request of the Athenians for his remains. He wrote 75 plays, of which the following 18 are extant: "Alceste," "Medea," "Hippolytus," "Hecuba," "Andromache," "Ion," "Suppliants," "Hæcæleidae," "Hæcæus Mæimænos," "Iphigenia among the Tauri," "Troades," "Helena," "Phœnisæ," "Electra," "Orestes," "Iphigenia at Aulis," "Bacchæ," and "Cyclops."

Euripus (ū-rī'pus). [Gr. Εὐριπος, a narrow channel, esp. the one here mentioned.] The narrowest portion of the channel which separates Eubœa from the mainland. Width at the narrowest part, opposite Chalcis, 120 feet. It is remarkable for its changes of current.

The name Euripus applies, strictly speaking, only to the very narrowest part of the channel between Eubœa and the mainland (Thucyd. vii. 29; Strab. ix. 585), which is opposite to the modern town of Erigio, where the bridge now stands. Routledge, Herod., IV. 308, note.

Europa (ū-rō'pī), or Europe (-pē). [See Euro-pe.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Phœnix, or of Agenor, sister of Cadmus, and mother by Zeus of Minos and Rhadamanthus. She was borne over the sea to Crete by Zeus, who assumed the form of a white bull. See Ito.

The bull, whose form was assumed by Zeus in order to carry off Europa, a Phœnician damsel, was seen to be the bull of Amu, the Semitic Heaven god, the same bull which we recognize in the constellation Taurus; and Europa, the "broad-faced" maiden, is only another form of Istar, the broad-faced moon, instead of being identical with Urvasi, the Vedic dawn-maiden. Taylor, Aryans, p. 302.

Europa and the Bull. A painting by Titian (1562), in Cobham Hall, near Rochester, England. Europa is being carried through the waves on the bull's back; one Cupid follows, supported by a dolphin, and two fly above. Europa's maidens are seen on the distant shore.

Europe (ū'rō'pē). [From Semitic ereb, darkness, evening, properly sunset, 'the land of the setting sun'; Gr. Εὐρώπη, L. Eurōpa.] 1. The smallest great division of the eastern continent. It is bounded by the Arctic Sea on the north, the Atlantic on the west, and the Sea of Marmora, Black Sea, and the Mediterranean on the south. On the east its boundaries toward Asia are generally taken as the Caucasus, the Caspian, the Ural River, the Ural Mountains, and the Kara. Length, southwest and northeast, 3,400 miles. Breadth, north and south, 2,400 miles. It lies within lat. 71° 11' N. (North Cape) and lat. 35° 59' N. (Cape Tarifa), and long. 9° 31' W. and long. 66° E. Population, 357,379,000. Area, 3,850,000 square miles. In literature the name occurs first in the Homeric hymn to Apollo, and denotes there the country north of the Peloponnesus, i. e. Thracia. The knowledge of Europe possessed by the ancients was, as in all geographical matters, very deficient. It started from the coasts of the Mediterranean, and remained for a long time confined to the three southern peninsulas and the shores of the Euxine. In Herodotus the Phasis is considered as the boundary between Asia and Europe. Later it is the Tanais. The interior of Spain, Gaul, and the countries north of the Alps were opened only through the Roman conquests. Scandinavia and northern Sarmatia remained in obscurity throughout antiquity. From a geographical point of view Europe is a large peninsula, sent forth by Asia to the west. It is a grand division of the globe, not so much from its large extent as from its having long been the center of human culture and civilization. Its geographical conditions also gave it an advantage over the other parts of the globe. It is characterized by a certain symmetry and proportion, and by a rich variety of geological, geographical, and climatic conditions.

Europe, as a geographical term, not improbably designated at first merely the plain of Thebes.
Taylor, The Alphabet, II. 19, note.

2. A province of the later Roman Empire, immediately about Constantinople. Freeman.

Eurotas (ū-rō'tās). [Gr. Εἰρώτας, prob. 'black river.'] In ancient geography, a river of Laconia, Greece, flowing into the Mediterranean 25 miles southeast of Sparta; the modern Iri or Iris. Length, about 45 miles.

Eurus (ū'rus). [L. Eurus, Gr. Εἶρος, the east wind, connected with εἶος, ἡῖος, L. Aurora, the dawn.] The east wind.

Euryanthe (ū-ri-an'thē). An opera by Weber, first produced at Vienna in 1823.

Eurybiades (ū-ri-bi'a-dēz). The leader of the Spartan naval contingent, and nominal commander of the united fleet of the allied Greek states, in the defensive campaign in 480 B. C. against the Persians, whom he defeated in the battles of Artemisium and Salamis.

Eurydice (ū-ri-dī'sē). [Gr. Εὐρυδική.] In Greek mythology, the wife of Orpheus. She died from the bite of a serpent, whereupon Orpheus descended into Hades, and by the charms of his lyre persuaded Pluto to restore her to life. He did this on condition that she should walk behind her husband, who should not look back until both had arrived in the upper world. Orpheus, overcome by anxiety, looked round only to behold her caught back into the infernal regions.

Eurydice, 1. Wife of Amyntas II., king of Macedonia, and mother of Philip.—2. A Macedonian princess, granddaughter of Perdiccas III. of Macedonia.

Eurydice, 1. An opera by Caccini and Peri, first produced at Florence in 1600. The words were by Rinuccini, and this, with "Dafne" by the same composers, was the beginning of modern opera. See Daphne.

2. A tragedy by Mallet, produced Feb. 22, 1731, at Drury Lane, and revived in 1759.

Eurymedon (ū-rim'ē-don). [Gr. Εὐρυμέδων.] Killed near Syracuse, 413 B. C. An Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war.

Eurymedon. A small river in Pisidia and Pamphylia, Asia Minor, which flows into the Mediterranean; the modern Capri-Su. Near its mouth, 368 or 405 B. C., the Greeks under Cimon defeated the Persian fleet and army.

Euryome (ū-riu'ō-mē). [Gr. Εὐρύομη.] In Greek mythology, a daughter of Oceanus. According to Hesiod she was the mother, by Zeus, of the Charites or Graces.

Eusebians (ū-sē'bi-anz). The followers of Eusebius of Nicomedia, an Arian bishop of Constantinople in the 4th century A. D. See Arians.

Eusebius (ū-sē'bi-us) of Cæsarea, surnamed Pamphili. [From Gr. εὐσεβής, pious.] Born probably at Cæsarea, Palestine, about 264 A. D.; died there, about 349. A celebrated theologian and historian, sometimes called "the Father of Church History." He was appointed bishop of Cæsarea about 315, and in 325 attended the Council of Nicea, where he was appointed to receive the emperor Constantine with a panegyric oration, and to sit at his right hand. His complete works have been edited by Migne (1856-57).

Eusebius of Dorylæum. A Greek theologian of the 5th century. He held some office about the imperial court at Constantinople, when he took holy orders, in consequence, it is said, of a controversy with Nestorius, bishop of Constantinople. He subsequently became bishop of Dorylæum, and distinguished himself by his zeal against the Eutychians.

Eusebius of Emesa. Died at Antioch about 360 A. D. An ecclesiastic of the Greek Church. He was a native of Edessa in Mesopotamia, and became bishop of Emesa in Syria. He wrote several books enumerated by Jerome, which are now lost. A number of homilies commonly attributed to him are probably spurious.

Eusebius of Nicomedia. Died at Constantinople, 342 A. D. An Arian bishop who held in succession the sees of Berytus, Nicomedia, and Constantinople. He was banished from Nicomedia in consequence of a refusal to sign the condemnation of Arius pronounced by the Council of Nicea in 325, but was restored through the influence of Constantia, sister of Constantine. He procured the convening of the Council of Tyre which condemned Athanasius in 334, and effected the restoration of Arius.

Eusebius of Samosata. Died about 379. An orthodox prelate. He became bishop of Samosata, his native place, probably before 361 A. D. He refused, contrary to the emperor's command, to give up some documents intrusted to him proving the election of Meletius as bishop of Antioch, which were demanded by the Arians for the purpose of annulling the election. He was banished about 371, but was restored in 378. He was killed by an Arian who threw a stone at him from the roof of a house.

Euskirchen (ois'kērē-en). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, near the Erft 22 miles south by west of Cologne. Population (1890), 8,820.

Eustace (ūs'tās) the Monk. [From Gr. εὐστάθος, steadfast, strong; ML. Eustathius, F. Eustache, Eustathe, It. Eustazio, Eustachio.] A French freebooter of the 13th century. He was for a time seneschal of the Count of Boulogne, and eventually became the leader of a band of pirates who fought in turn for France and for England, according as their interest was best served. He was captured while bringing a squadron to the support of Louis, son of Philip Augustus, who had been proclaimed king of England, and was executed as a pirate and traitor. He was long remembered on the coasts of France and England for his cruelty and daring exploits, and is the hero of a ballad, written shortly after his death, which attributes to him the power of magic.

Eustache (ēs-tāsh'). St. A large church in Paris, of unique architecture, begun in 1532 upon the constructive principles of the late-Pointed style, but with the exterior forms and decoration of the Renaissance. The arches are semicircular, the buttresses are classical pilasters, and the piers are superposed combinations of columns of different orders. The interior is well proportioned and impressive; it has double aisles, and is 345 feet long and 144 wide. The nave is 103 feet high. There are excellent frescos in the chapels.

Eustachio (ā-ōs-tā'kē-ō), or Eustachius (ūs-tā'ki-us), Bartolommeo. Born at San Severino, Ancona, Italy; died Aug., 1574. An Italian anatomist, professor of anatomy at Rome, and physician to the Pope. He described the Eustachian tube and Eustachian valve. His "Tabule anatomice" was published in 1714.

Eustathians (ūs-tā'thi-anz). 1. The orthodox faction in Antioch in the 4th century A. D., who objected to the replacing of Eustathius, bishop of Antioch, by an Arian.—2. An extreme ascetic sect of the 4th century A. D., probably so called from Eustathius, bishop of Sebaste in Pontus.

Eustathius (ūs-tā'thi-us) of Antioch. [Gr. Εὐστάθιος. See Eustace.] Born at Side, Pamphylia; died at Philippi, Macedonia, about 340 (?). A Greek prelate, an opponent of Arianism.

Eustathius of Thessalonica. Born at Constantinople; died at Thessalonica, 1198. A Greek classical scholar and religious reformer, archbishop of Thessalonica. His chief work was a commentary on Homer which, "besides serving to elucidate the Greek language by many important criticisms, drawn from sources that have since been lost, contains, like the works of Photius and Suidas, innumerable references to the Greek classics, and thus furnishes the means of ascertaining the integrity and the genuineness of the text of those authors, as they are now extant" (Taylor, Hist. Anc. Books, p. 83).

Eustis (ūs'tis), William. Born at Cambridge, Mass., June 10, 1753; died at Boston, Feb. 6, 1825. An American physician and politician. He was secretary of war 1809-13, and governor of Massachusetts 1823-25.

Eutaw Springs (ū'tā springz). A place in South Carolina, near the Santee about 50 miles northwest of Charleston. It was the scene of a battle, Sept. 8, 1781, between about 2,000 Americans under Greene and about 2,300 British under Stewart. The American loss was 535, the British about 631. It is described as a technical British victory.

Euterpe (ū-tēr'pē). [Gr. Εὐτέρπη, the well-pleasing.] 1. In classical mythology, one of the Muses, a divinity of joy and pleasure, the patroness of flute-players. She invented the double lute, and favored rather the wild and simple melodies of primitive peoples than the more finished art of music, and was thus associated more with Bacchus than with Apollo. She is usually represented as a virgin crowned with flowers, having a flute in her hand, or with various musical instruments about her.

2. An asteroid (No. 27) discovered by Hind at London, Nov. 8, 1853.

Euthydemus (ū-thi-dē'mus). [Gr. Εὐθύδημος.] A dialogue of Plato, the narration by Socrates of a conversation which took place at the Lyceum between himself, the sophists Euthydemus and Dionysodorus, Crito, Cleinias, and Ctesippus. Its theme is virtue and instruction in virtue, and it is a satire upon the sophists and the older philosophy.

Eutin (oi-tēn'). The chief town in the principality of Lübeck, belonging to Oldenburg, Germany, 19 miles north of Lübeck. It was anciently the seat of a bishopric. It is associated with Voss and Count Stolberg, and is the birthplace of Weber. Population (1890), commune, 4,625.

Eutropius (ū-trō'pi-us). [LL., from Gr. Εὐτρό- πιος, versatile or well-disposed.] Died about 370 (?) A. D. A Roman historian, author of a concise history of Rome ("Breviarium ab urbe condita") from the founding of the city to the death of Jovian, 364 A. D., long in popular use.

Eutropius, surnamed "The Eunuch." A Byzantine statesman. He was a chamberlain in the household of Arcadius on the latter's accession to the throne as emperor of the East in 395 A. D. In the same year he persuaded the young emperor to marry Eudoxia, daughter of the Frank Bauto, instead of the daughter of the minister Rufinus. After the murder of Rufinus in 395 by Gainas, in which he was probably an accomplice, he obtained control of the government. He was elevated to the rank of a patrician in 398, and was made consul in 399. At the instance of Eudoxia and Gainas he was surrendered in 399 to the rebellious Goths in Asia Minor.

Eutyche (ū'ti-kēz). [Gr. Εὐτυχής.] Lived in the 5th century A. D. A heresiarch of the Eastern Church, founder of the sect of the Eutycheians. The heresy was condemned at the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Eutycheians (ū-tik'i-anz). The followers or those holding the doctrine of Eutyche. He taught that Christ had but one nature, the divine, so that it was proper to say that God had been crucified for us. He was an opponent of Nestorius, and the founder of the sect of Monophysites.

Euxine (ūk'sin), The. See Black Sea.
Eva (ē'vā), Little. [See Eve.] In Mrs. Stowe's "Uncle Tom's Cabin," the daughter of St. Clare; a child whose friendship for Uncle Tom and whose early death form an important part of the novel.

Evagoras (ē-vag'ō-ras). [Gr. Εὐαγόρας.] Killed 374 B. C. A king of Salamis, in Cyprus, from about 410-374 B. C.

Evagrius (ē-vag'ri-us), surnamed Scholasticus. [Gr. Εὐάγγελος.] Born at Epiphania, Coele-Syria, about 536; died after 594. A Syrian church historian, author of an "Ecclesiastical History."

Ewald (ā'vāld), Johannes. Born at Copenhagen, Nov. 18, 1743; died at Copenhagen, March 17, 1781. A celebrated Danish lyric poet. He studied theology at the University of Copenhagen, but left suddenly to enter the Prussian military service. He soon, however, deserted to the Austrians, and after a year and a half again deserted and returned to Copenhagen and resumed his studies. His first work, "Lykkens Temple" ("The Temple of Fortune"), an allegorical narrative in prose, appeared in 1764. A poem on the death of King Frederick V. (1766) established his fame as a lyric poet. A lyrical drama, "Adam og Eva" ("Adam and Eve"), appeared in 1769; a prose tragedy, "Rolf Krage," in 1770. In 1774 appeared the tragedy "Balder's Dod" ("Balder's Death"), the first Danish drama written in iambic pentameter. His greatest work, "Fiskerne" ("The Fishermen"), written in 1778, is a dramatized description of fisher life. It contains some of his best lyrics, among them "Kong Kristian stod ved højen Mast" ("King Christian stood by the lofty Mast"), which has become a national song. He left an uncompleted autobiography, "Johannes Ewalds Levnet og Mening" ("Johannes Ewald's Life and Opinions"). His complete works, "Samtlige Skrifter," appeared in Copenhagen 1850-55, 6 vols.

Evan (ēv'an). See the extract.

The story of the King of Thule next appears in a legal form, familiar to the student of Blackstone. In this shape it recounts the oppressions of "Events," or "King Evan the Third," or "Evan the sixteenth," according to various versions, who at some time before the Christian era made a law appropriating the wives of his subjects to himself; but, after a quarrel which lasted for about 1,100 years, the barbarous tribute was, at the request of King Malcolm's queen, commuted for a money payment. It has been discovered after much research that the ancient king, his law and its repeal, are all equally mythical. But the story remained down to recent times the stock example of the horrors of the feudal system.

Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 84.

Evander (ē-van'dēr). [Gr. Εὐάνδρος.] In classical legend, a son of Hermes, and the leader of an Areadian colony into Latium 60 years before the Trojan war.

Evangelical Alliance, The. The name of an association of Christians belonging to the Evangelical denominations. It was organized by a world's convention in London in 1846, and its object is to promote Christian intercourse between the different orthodox Protestant denominations, and more effective cooperation in Christian work. Branches exist in all countries where there are considerable Protestant communities. Several general conferences have been held, in which reports were received concerning the religious condition of the world. Among the most important results obtained by the alliance is the establishment of a week of prayer, the week commencing with the first Sunday of January in each year, now largely observed throughout Protestant Christendom.

Evangeline (ē-van'je-lin). [F. Évangéline, NL. Évangéline, from Gr. εὐάγγελος, bringer of good news.] An idyllic poem by Longfellow, published in 1847; named from its heroine. It is founded on the removal of the Acadians by the British in 1755. Evangeline is accidentally parted from her lover, Gabriel, whom she seeks hopelessly but faithfully all her life, as he seeks her. They pass near one another many times, but never meet until he is dying in a hospital many years after.

Evans, Augusta J. See Wilson, Mrs.

Evans (ev'anz), Frederick William. Born June 9, 1808; died March 6, 1893. An elder in the Shaker denomination, and writer on religious subjects. He emigrated to America in 1820, and in 1830 joined the community of Shakers at Mount Lebanon, N. Y., of which he was presiding elder from 1855. He published "A Short Treatise on the Second Appearing of Christ in and through the Order of the Female" (1853), "Autobiography of a Shaker" (1869), "Religious Communion" (1871), etc.

Evans, Sir George De Lacy. Born at Moig, County Limerick, Ireland, Oct. 7, 1787; died at London, Jan. 9, 1870. A British general. He served against the French in the Spanish peninsula 1812-1814, and against the Americans at Baltimore, Washington, and New Orleans in 1814-15; commanded the British legion sent to suppress the Carlist rebellion in Spain 1835-37; commanded a division of the British army in the Crimea 1854-55; and was promoted general in 1861.

Evans, Sir Hugh. In Shakspeare's "Merry Wives of Windsor," a ludicrous, officious, and simple-minded Welsh parson.

Sir was formerly applied to the inferior clergy as well as to knights. Fuller in his "Church History" says: "Such priests as have Sir before their Christian name were men not graduated in the university: being in orders, but not in degrees; while others, entitled 'masters,' had commenced in the arts." Besides Sir Hugh, Shakspeare has Sir Oliver Mar-text, the Vicar, in "As You Like It," Sir Topas in "Twelfth Night," and Sir Nathaniel, the Curate, in "Love's Labour's Lost." Hudson, note to M. W. of W.

Evans, John. A colonial deputy governor of Pennsylvania under William Penn 1704-09. He was not a Quaker, and quarreled continually with the Assembly, which refused to raise troops against the French and Indians.

Evans, Mary Ann. See Cross, Mrs.

Evans, Oliver. Born at Newport, Del., 1755; died at New York, April 21, 1819. An American mechanic and inventor. He invented machinery used in milling, the application of which to mills worked by water-power effected a revolution in the manufacture of flour, and is said to have invented the first steam-engine constructed on the high-pressure system, the drawings and specifications of which he sent to England about 1795. He wrote "Young Millwright's and Miller's Guide" (1795), etc.

Evans, William. Died in 1632. A giant, a porter of Charles I. He was nearly 8 feet high, and is introduced in Fuller's "Worthies" and in Scott's "Peveril of the Peak."

Evanson (ev'an-son), Edward. Born at Warrington, Lancashire, England, April 21, 1731; died at Coleford, Gloucestershire, England, Sept. 25, 1805. An English clergyman and controversialist. He became vicar of South Mimms in 1768, and rector of Tewkesbury in 1769. In 1778 he resigned his living, and opened a school at Mitcham. He wrote "Dissidence of the Four Generally Received Evangelists" (1792), etc.

Evelina (ev-e-lí'na). [Dim. of Era, Eve.] A novel by Madame d'Arblay (Frances Burney), published in 1778, named from its principal character.

It was for a long time believed that Miss Burney was only seventeen when she wrote "Evelina." If so, it was indeed an extraordinary book; but the question depended upon the exact period of her birth; and when Croker edited "Boswell's Life of Johnson," he took the pains, most properly and naturally one would think, to ascertain the fact by examining the parish register of the town where she was born, and it turned out that she was twenty-six when "Evelina" was published.

Evelyn (ev'e-lin), John. Born at Wotton, Surrey, England, Oct. 31, 1620; died at Wotton, Feb. 27, 1706. An English author. He was the second son of Richard Evelyn; was admitted a student at the Middle Temple in 1637; and received the honorary degree of D. C. L. in 1669. The years 1641-47 he passed principally in travel, with occasional returns to England. For a short time he joined the king's army. He was a strong Royalist, and in 1649 published a translation of La Mothe le Vayer's "Of Liberty and Servitude," with a Royalist preface, for which he was "threatened." In 1652, thinking the cause of the Royalists hopeless, he settled at Sayes Court, Deptford, the estate of his wife's father, Sir Richard Browne, ambassador at Paris. He lived here till 1694, when he went to Wotton to live with his elder brother. At the death of the latter, in 1699, the estate became his, and he passed the rest of his life here. At both places he devoted himself to gardening. He was in favor at court after the Restoration, and held some minor offices. He was much interested in the Royal Society, of which he was a fellow in 1661, one of the council in 1662, secretary 1672. He obtained for it the Arundelian library in 1678, and for the University of Oxford the Arundelian marbles in 1677, both from the Duke of Norfolk. He was treasurer of Greenwich Hospital 1695-1703. Among his works are "The State of France, etc." (1652), "A Character of England" (1659), "Apology for the Royal Party, etc." (1659), "Fumifugium" (1661), "Sculptura, etc." (1662), "Silva, etc." (1664), "Kalendarium Hortense" (1664), "Numismata, etc." (1697), "The Complete Gardener" (translated from the French of Quintin, 1698), etc. His memoirs, first published in 1818-19, edited by William Bray, contain his letters and diary.

Evemerus (ē-vem'e-rus), or Eumerus (ū-em'e-rus), or Euhemerus (ū-hem'e-rus). [Gr. Ἐβήμερος.] Lived in the second half of the 4th century B. C. A Greek mythographer. He wrote a "Sacred History" (Ἱστορία Ἁγιά), in which he gave an anthropomorphic explanation of current mythology.

The most famous of the later theories was that of Eumerus (316 B. C.). In a kind of philosophical romance, Eumerus declared that he had sailed to some No-man's-land, Panchæa, where he found the verity about mythical times engraved on pillars of bronze. This truth he published in the Sacra Historia, where he rationalized the fables, averring that the gods had been men, and that the myths were exaggerated and distorted records of facts.

Evil Merodach (ē'vil mer'ō-dak). [Babylonian Avel or Amel Marduk, man (i. e. 'servant') of the god Merodach.] Son of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon 561-559 B. C. He released the Judean king Jehoiachin from prison, after 37 years' confinement, and honored him above all the vassal kings. He was killed in a rebellion led by his sister's husband, Neriglissar (Nergalsarazer), who then seized the Babylonian crown. According to Berossus he rendered himself odious by his arbitrary and unwise rule.

Evora (ā'vō-rā). The capital of the province of Alentejo, Portugal, 76 miles east by south of Lisbon. It contains remains from the Roman city of Eboræ. The cathedral is an interesting church of the 13th century, with rose-windows in the transepts, and a west porch or narthex containing tombs and opening into the nave by a fine sculptured doorway; the interior has clustered columns, and there is a later Pointed cloister. A Roman triumphal arch, in masonry of large blocks, is in good preservation. A Roman temple of Diana, a Corinthian structure 40 by 68 feet, is unusually well preserved. It is hexastyle prestyle, with a deep pronaos, having 3 columns on each flank in addition to the angle-column. The sculpture and details are of good execution.

Excalibur (eks-kal'i-bër), or Excalibar, or Es-calibor. The sword of the mythical King Arthur. Arthur received it from the hands of the Lady of the Lake. It had a scabbard the wearer of which could lose no blood. Some versions of the romance call it "Miradoise." There seems, however, to have been also another sword called Excalibur in the early part of the story. This was the sword, plunged deep into a stone, which could be drawn forth only by the man who was to be king. After two hundred knights had failed, Arthur drew it out without difficulty.

Excelsior Geyser. One of the largest geysers in the world, in the Yellowstone National Park, Wyoming. It has thrown a column of water to a height of from 200 to 300 feet.

Exe (eks). [ME. Ere, AS. Exa, recorded in Eran ceaster, Exeter, and Eran mûtha, Exmouth.] A river in Somerset and Devon, England, flowing into the English Channel 10 miles south-southeast of Exeter. Length, 54 miles.

Exeter (eks'e-tër). [ME. Exeter, Excetre, Exceter, Excetre, AS. Exanceaster, Eaxceaster, city of (on) the Exe.] 1. A cathedral city, the capital of Devonshire, England, on the Exe, near its mouth, in lat. 50° 43' N., long. 3° 31' W. It is a seaport, and has some foreign trade. It manufactures gloves and agricultural machinery. It is said to be the oldest English city having continuous existence. It was taken by William I. in 1068, was unsuccessfully besieged by Perkin Warbeck in 1497 and by Cornish insurgents in 1549, and was taken by Prince Maurice in 1643, and by Fairfax in 1646. The cathedral, which is 408 feet in length by 76 in breadth, was founded in the 12th century, but in its present form dates, except the two Norman transept-towers (with one exception the only example of transept-towers in England), from between 1230 and 1394. The west front presents a strange design, its lower portion being an imitation in stone of a wooden screen, with three tiers of statues in niches; above is a large window with good tracery. The interior is rich and effective, with fine arches, vaulting with central rib and very numerous radiating ribs, and interesting medieval tombs and bishop's throne. Population (1891), 37,580.

John Shilligford tells us that Exeter was a walled city before the Incarnation of Christ; and, though it is not likely to have been a walled city in any sense that would satisfy either modern or Roman engineers, it is likely enough to have been already a fortified post before Caesar landed in Britain. Freeman, Eng. Towns, p. 61.

2. A town in Rockingham County, New Hampshire, situated on the Exeter River 13 miles southwest of Portsmouth. It is the seat of Phillips Academy (which see). Population (1890), 4,234.

Exeter Book, The. [L. Codex Exoniensis.] A collection of Anglo-Saxon poems given by Bishop Leofric to the library of the cathedral of Exeter, England, between 1046 and 1073. It "contains pieces apparently detached which are now regarded as forming a connected poem upon Christ, by Cynewulf (hymns to the saviour, to the Virgin, to the Trinity, on the Nativity, Ascension, and Harrowing of Hell); also hymns of praise and thanksgiving; poems on the Day of Judgment and the Crucifixion, and on Souls after Death; a short sermon in verse; and the 'Legend of St. Guthlac,' a metrical paraphrase of the Latin 'Life of St. Guthlac,' by Felix, a monk of Croyland Abbey" (Morley, Eng. Writers, II, 199). It also contains a paraphrase of the "Song of Hananiah, Mishaël, and Azariah," "The Phoenix," "Legend of St. Juliana," "The Wanderer," "The Seafarer," a poem on Christian morality, "Widsith," "The Wonders of Creation," "The Panther," "The Whale," "The Address of the Soul to the Body," "Song of Deor the Bard," and a collection of riddles. The book was first published by the London Society of Antiquaries in 1842 as "Codex Exoniensis, etc."

Exeter College. A college at Oxford, England, founded by Walter de Stapeldon, bishop of Exeter, in 1314. The endowment was increased by Sir William Petre in 1565. The buildings have been often restored, and are in part modern.

Walter de Stapeldon, Bishop of Exeter, was the founder of the college which now bears the name of that see. In April, 1314, he conveyed the rectory of Gwinear, in Cornwall, to the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, on condition that they should apply the income to the maintenance of twelve scholars studying philosophy at the University; and he purchased for these scholars two houses in the parish of St. Peter in the East, at Oxford, known respectively as Hart Hall and Arthur Hall. The original members of the foundation were placed in Hart Hall, which in consequence received for a while the name of Stapeldon Hall. It was not long, however, before the Bishop resolved to provide them with a more comfortable abode. In October, 1315, he bought a tenement called St. Stephen's Hall, an adjoining tenement called La Lavandrie, and a third to the east of them, situated just within the town wall, between the Turl and Smith Gate. Thither the twelve scholars removed, and the name of Stapeldon Hall was transferred to the little group of buildings which thus became the nucleus of Exeter College. Lyle, Oxford, p. 137.

Exeter Hall. A building on the Strand, London, used for religious, charitable, and musical assemblies. It was purchased for the Young Men's Christian Association in 1880.

Exmoor (eks'mör). A hilly moorland and marshy region in western Somerset and northern Devon, England. It is noted for its breed of ponies and for wild deer. The scene of Blackmore's novel "Lorna Doone" is laid in it. Highest point (Dunkery Beacon), 1,707 feet.

Exmouth (eks'muth). [ME. Eremuth, AS. Eran mûtha, mouth of the Exe.] A town and watering-place in Devonshire, England, situated at the mouth of the Exe, 10 miles southeast of Exeter. Population (1891), 8,097.

Exmouth, Viscount. See Pellew.

Exodus (ek'sō-dus). [Gr. ἔξοδος, from ἔξ, out, and ὁδός, a way.] The second book of the Old Testament. It takes its name from the deliverance (which it describes) of the Israelites from their bondage under the Pharaohs, and their departure from Egypt.

Exploits (eks-ploits') River. The largest river in Newfoundland. It has a northeasterly course, and falls into the Bay of Exploits, in Notre Dame Bay. Length, 200 miles.

Expounder of the Constitution. An epithet popularly applied to Daniel Webster.

Expunging Resolution. A resolution introduced into the United States Senate by T. H. Benton of Missouri, to erase from the journal the censure passed by the Senate on President Jackson, March 28, 1834, relating to the bank controversy. It was first introduced in 1834, and was carried Jan. 16, 1837.

Fabius Maximus Rullianus, Quintus. Died about 290 B. C. A Roman general. He was consul six times, the first time in 322 and the last in 295, and was dictator in 315. He distinguished himself in the third war against the Samnites, over whom and their allies he gained the decisive victory of Sentinum in 295.

Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, Quintus, surnamed Cunctator ("the Delayer"). Died 203 B. C. A Roman general. He was consul for the first time in 233, when by a victory over the Ligurians he obtained the honor of a triumph. In 218 he was at the head of the legion sent by the Roman senate to demand reparation of Carthage for the attack on Saguntum. After the defeat of the consul Flaminius by Hannibal at Thrasymenus, he was, in 217, appointed dictator. Avoiding pitched battles (whence his surname Cunctator, "delayer"), he weakened the Carthaginians by numerous skirmishes. Dissatisfaction having arisen at Rome with this method of carrying on the war, a bill was passed in the senate dividing the command between the dictator and his master of the horse, Minucius, who engaged with Hannibal, and would have been destroyed if Fabius had not hastened to his assistance. Fabius was succeeded in command by the consuls Paulus Æmilius and Terentius Varro, who, adopting a more aggressive policy, were totally defeated at the battle of Cannæ in 216. He was consul for the fifth time in 209, when he inflicted a severe loss on Hannibal by the recapture of Tarentum in southern Italy.

Fabius Pictor (fā'bi-us pik'tor), Quintus. A Roman historian. He served in the Gallic war in 225 B. C., as also in the second Punic war, and was sent to Delphi, after the battle of Cannæ in 216, to consult the oracle as to how the Roman state could propitiate the gods. He was the author of a history of Rome including the period of the second Punic war. This history, which is now lost, was written in Greek, and was highly esteemed by the ancients.

It is noted for its manufacture of silk and paper, and formerly of faience, which is named from it. It has a cathedral and picture-gallery, and is defended by a citadel. It was the birth-place of Torricelli. The cathedral (duomo) is a large and handsome Renaissance basilica of 1581, containing some good paintings and sculptured tombs. The shrine of San Savino, the earliest local bishop, by Benedetto da Majano (1472), consists of an altar, above which is the sarcophagus, with six reliefs of scenes from the saint's life, and other sculptures. Population (1881), 13,998.

Faerie Queene (fā-ē-ri kwēn), or Fairy (fār'i) Queen, The. An allegorical poem of chivalry by Edmund Spenser. The original plan comprised 12 books. Of these I-III, were published in 1590, and IV-VI, in 1596. Fragments of later books were published in 1611.

Spenser's letter to Raleigh appended to the fragment of "The Faerie Queene," "expounding his whole intention in the course of this work," said only that "he laboured to pourtrait in Arthure, before he was king, the image of a brave knight, perfected in the twelve moral virtues, as Aristotle hath devised, the which is the purpose of the first twelve books; which if I finde to be well accepted, I may be perhaps encouraged to frame the other part, of politike virtues, in his person after that hee came to be king." It was left for the reader to discover how grand a design was indicated by these unassuming words. Spenser said that by the Faerie Queene, whom Arthur sought, "I mean glory in my general intention, but in my particular I conceive the most excellent and glorious person of our soveraine the queene, and her kingdom in Faeryland."

Morley, English Writers, IX, 317.

Twelve knights, representing twelve virtues, were to have been sent on adventures from the Court of Gloriana, Queen of Fairyland. The six finished books give the legends (each subdivided into twelve cantos, averaging fifty or sixty stanzas each) of Holiness, Temperance, Chastity, Friendship, Justice, and Courtesy; while a fragment of two splendid "Cantos on Mutability" is supposed to have belonged to a seventh book (not necessarily seventh in order) on Constancy. Legend has it that the poem was actually completed; but this seems improbable, as the first three books were certainly ten years in hand, and the second three six more. The existing poem, comprehending some four thousand stanzas, or between thirty and forty thousand lines, exhibits so many and such varied excellences that it is difficult to believe that the poet could have done anything new in kind.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 88.

Fæsulæ (fes' ū-lē). The ancient name of Fiesole.

Fafnir (fāf'nēr). [ON. Fafnir.] In the Old Norse version of the Siegfried legend, a son of the giant Hreidmar (ON. Hreidmarr). Fairfax, Ferdinando, second Baron Fairfax. Born March 29, 1584; died March 14, 1648. A Parliamentary leader in the civil war. He represented the county of York in the Long Parliament, in which he acted with the popular party; and at the beginning of the civil war was appointed to the command of the Parliamentary forces in Yorkshire. He was defeated by Newcastle on Adwalton Moor, near Bradford, June 30, 1643, and was besieged by the same general at Hull Sept. 2-Oct. 11, 1643, when he raised the siege by a successful sally. He defeated Colonel John Bellasis at Selby April 11, 1644, and, joining forces with the Scots, was stationed with his army on the right of the Parliamentary line at Marston Moor, July 2, 1644, where he gave way before the onslaught of Prince Rupert, who was in turn defeated by Cromwell.

Fairfax, Robert. Born Feb., 1666; died Oct. 17, 1725. A British rear-admiral. He commanded a vessel in the English fleet at the reduction of Gibraltar, July 23, and in the battle of Malaga, Aug. 13, 1704. He was made rear-admiral in 1708.

Fairfax, Thomas, third Baron Fairfax. Born at Denton, Yorkshire, Jan. 17, 1612; died Nov. 12, 1671. A celebrated Parliamentary leader in the civil war in England. He was the son of Ferdinando, second Lord Fairfax; was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge; and learned the art of war under Sir Horace Vere in the Low Countries. At the outbreak of the civil war he was appointed second in command of the Parliamentary forces in Yorkshire; captured Wakefield May 21, 1643; and commanded the horse of the right wing at the battle of Marston Moor. He was appointed commander-in-chief of the Parliamentary army Jan. 21, 1645, and in April of the same year organized the "New Model." He defeated Charles I. at Naseby June 14, 1645; defeated Goring at Langport, Somersetshire, July 10, 1645; reduced Bristol Sept. 10, 1645; and took Oxford June 20, 1646. He disapproved of the seizure of the king by Joyce, but was forced by the attitude of the army to acquiesce in this measure as well as in "Pride's Purge" and in the execution of the king. On the establishment of the Commonwealth, he was reappointed commander-in-chief of all the forces in England and Ireland, March 30, 1649, but resigned, June 25, 1650, on account of conscientious scruples about invading Scotland. During the rest of the Commonwealth period, and during the Protectorate, he lived in retirement at Sun Appleton, Yorkshire. He represented Yorkshire in Richard Cromwell's Parliament, in which he acted with the opposition. Having in Nov., 1659, entered into negotiations with Monk for the restoration of Charles II., he placed himself at the head of an army, and, Jan. 1, 1660, took possession of York, and later in the same year was chosen to head the commissioners of the two houses sent to the king at the Hague. He left two autobiographical works: "A Short Memorial of the Northern Actions during the War there, from the Year 1642 till 1644," and "Short Memorials of some Things to be cleared during my Command in the Army."

Fairfax, Thomas, sixth Baron Fairfax. Born at Denton, Yorkshire, 1692; died near Winchester, Va., March 12, 1782. An American colonist. Falkland. A romance by Bulwer Lytton, published anonymously in 1827.

Falkland. The principal character in Godwin's novel "Caleb Williams." His chief thought is to preserve his honor from stain. He stabs his enemy Tyrel in the back, in a moment of passion, and allows two innocent persons to hang for the murder. From that time his desire is for concealment. Caleb Williams, his secretary, discovers the secret, and is pursued by the hirelings of Falkland. He finally accuses the latter, who confesses the crime and dies of shame. In "The Iron Chest," a dramatization by Colman, he is Sir Edward Mortimer.

The character of Falkland, the chief actor, which is formed on visionary principles of honour, is perhaps not strictly an invention, as it closely resembles that of Shamoto in Beaumont and Fletcher's "Nice Valour." But the accumulated wretchedness with which he is overwhelmed, the inscrutable mystery by which he is surrounded, and the frightful persecutions to which he subjects the suspected possessor of his dreadful secret are peculiar to the author, and are represented with a force which has not been surpassed in the finest passages and scenes of poetic or dramatic fiction.

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, II. 573.

Falstaff (fál'stáf). 1. A comic opera by Balfe, produced in London in 1838. The words are by Maggione.—2. An opera by Nicolai, produced at London in 1864. It was originally brought out in Berlin in 1849 under the name "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor" ("The Merry Wives of Windsor").

3. An opera by Verdi, produced at Milan Feb. 9, 1893.

Falstaff, Sir John. A celebrated character in Shakspeare's historical play "Henry IV." (1st and 2d parts), and also in "The Merry Wives of Windsor." He is a very fat, sensual, and witty old knight; a swindler, drunkard, and good-tempered liar; and something of a coward. Falstaff was originally called Sir John Oldcastle. The first actor of the part was John Hemming.

Shakspeare found the name of John Oldcastle in the . . . older play of "Henry V.," in the Chronicle he found a John Oldcastle, who was page to the Duke of Norfolk who plays a part in "Richard II.," and this, according to Shakspeare, his Falstaff (Oldcastle) had been in his youth. When the poet wrote his "Henry IV.," he knew not who this Oldcastle was, whom he had rendered so distinct with the designation as Norfolk's page; he was a Lord Cobham [Sir John Oldcastle, known as the good Lord Cobham], who had perished as a Lollard and Wickliffe in the persecution of the church under Henry V. The Protestants regarded him as a holy martyr, the Catholics as a heretic; the latter seized with eagerness this description of the fat portly, and gave it out as a portrait of Lord Cobham, who was indeed physically and mentally his contrast. The family complained of this misuse of a name dear to them, and Shakspeare declared in the epilogue to "Henry IV." that Cobham was in his sight also a martyr, and that "this was not the man." At the same time, he changed the name to Falstaff, but this was of little use; in spite of the express retraction, subsequent Catholic writers on church history still declared Falstaff to be a portrait of the heretic Cobham. But it is a strange circumstance that even now under the name of Falstaff another historical character is again sought for, just as if it were impossible for such a vigorous form not to be a being of reality. It was referred to John Fastolf, whose cowardice is more stigmatized in "Henry VI." than history justifies; and this too met with the public blame, although Shakspeare could have again asserted that he intended Fastolf as little as Cobham. Gervinus, Shakspeare Commentaries (tr. by F. E. Bunnett, ed. 1880), p. 300.

Fan (fäng). A powerful African nation of the French Kongo (Gabun). They now extend north to Batanga, and up the Livindo River into German Kamerun. Since the beginning of the 19th century they have moved gradually and steadily from the highland of the sanga basin down to the coast, and the Mpongwe seem to be doomed to disappear before them. The Fan are hunters, and are traders in ivory and rubber. The old men still practise cannibalism secretly. The Fan are lighter in color than their Bantu-negro neighbors, and their implements also show an independent type. They are intelligent, and learn quickly the white man's ways. Some think they are related to the Nyam-Nyam; others have suggested their identity with the Gialgi or Jagas of Portuguese historians; but the Jagas were Bateke. The Fan language is Bantu, though mixed with other elements. Also called Fangue, Mpongwe, Oshiba, and Palouins by the French.

Fanariots, or Phanariots (fa-nar'i-ots). [From Fanar, Turk. Fenar, a quarter of the old city of Constantinople, named from a light-tower (NGr. qavápe) which it formerly contained.] The Greek inhabitants of Fanar, Constantinople; in a restricted use, the Greek official aristocracy, which formerly possessed great political influence at Constantinople.

Farnese, Pier Luigi, Duke of Parma and Piacenza. Killed Sept. 10, 1547. The son of Pope Paul III. He was created duke in 1545.

Farnese Bacchus. A celebrated Greek torso of the 4th century B. C., in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The forms are fine, and the modeling simple yet highly expressive of the voluptuous nature of the god. It is of the school of Praxiteles.

Farnese Bull. A large group of Greek sculpture of the Trallian school (3d century B. C.), in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. It represents the chastisement of Dirce by her stepsons for her treatment of their mother Antiope, by binding her to the horns of a bull. It is much restored, but is very remarkable for its composition and execution. It was discovered in the baths of Caracalla in 1546.

Farnese Flora. A celebrated antique statue in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The goddess holds her Ionian tunic with her right hand as she steps forward, the motive being a familiar one in archaic statues of Venus. The figure is remarkable for its grace, despite its height of 11½ feet.

Farnese Hercules. A celebrated Greek statue in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The demigod is represented undraped, leaning on his club. The bearded head is somewhat small, and the muscular development prodigious. It dates from the early empire.

Farnese Homer. An antique bust in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. It is admirable in execution, and remarkable for the profound intellectuality of its expression. It is perhaps the finest example of its familiar type, which is that universally associated with Homer.

Farnese Juno. A colossal antique bust of Juno (Hera), in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The expression is one of calm repose, high and unbending. The hair is bound with a simple fillet. It has been demonstrated that this bust is a copy of the type of Polyctetus (420 B. C.).

Farnese Minerva. A Greek statue of Pallas (Athene Parthenos), found at Velletri, and now in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The type is that of the great statue of the Parthenon. The goddess wears the Attic helmet with a sphinx and two figures of Pegasus, and the wings on her breast. The arms are restored: the right is extended to hold the Victory, and the left raised to sustain the spear.

Farnese Palace. A celebrated palace of the Farnese in Rome, founded in the first part of the reign of Leo X. It was begun by San Gallo the younger, was continued by Michelangelo, and was completed by Giacomo della Porta. It is adorned with frescos by Annibale Caracci.

Faro (fä'rō). A seaport and the capital of the province of Algarve, Portugal, in lat. 37° N., long. 7° 51' W. The cathedral, a large church whose nave-vaulting springs from lofty cylindrical columns, is apparently a Roman basilica altered by the Moors. Population (1878), 8,561.

Faro, Capo del. A promontory forming the northeastern extremity of Sicily, 8 miles northeast of Messina: the ancient Pelorum Promontorium.

Farochon (fä-rō-shôn'), Jean Baptiste Eugene. Born at Paris, 1807; died there, July 1, 1871. A French sculptor and medallist.

Faroe, or Faro (fä'rō), Islands. [Dan. Färøerne, sheep islands.] A group of 24 islands belonging to Denmark, situated in the Atlantic between the Shetlands and Iceland, intersected by lat. 62° N., long. 7° W. Seventeen of the islands, including Stromo, Osterø, Syderø, Vaagø, Sandø, and Bordo, are inhabited. The capital is Thorshavn. The language is a dialect of the Norse. The islands were colonized by Norwegians in the 9th century. Area, 514 square miles. Population (1890), 12,954.

Farquhar (fär'kwär), George. Born at Londonderry, 1678; died April, 1707. An Irish dramatist. He studied at Trinity College, Dublin, 1694-95, became a corrector of the press, and appeared on the stage at Dublin, apparently without success. He removed to London in 1697 or 1698, and in 1699 his first play, "Love in a Bottle," was successfully produced at Drury Lane. He obtained a lieutenant's commission from the Earl of Orrey, possibly in 1702, and saw some service, which enabled him to write the "Recruiting Officer," produced in 1706, one of his most successful plays. He married in 1703, and died in great poverty, leaving a widow and two daughters. Besides the plays already mentioned, he wrote "A Constant Couple" (1699), "Sir Harry Wildair" (1701), "The Inconstant, or the Way to Win Him" (1702), "The Twin Rivals" (1702), "The Stage Coach" (1704), and "The Beaux' Stratagem" (1707).

Farragut (far'a-gut), David Glasgow. Born at Campbell's Station, Tenn., July 5, 1801; died at Portsmouth, N. H., Aug. 14, 1870. A celebrated American admiral. He was the son of George Farragut, a Spaniard who emigrated to America in 1776 and fought in the Continental army in the Revolutionary War. He was adopted by David Porter, who procured for him an appointment as midshipman in the United States navy in 1810, and under whom he served in the Essex when she was captured by the Phebe and the Cherub in the harbor of Valparaiso, March 28, 1814. He was promoted lieutenant in 1825, commander in 1841, and captain in 1855. In Jan., 1862, he was appointed commander of a naval armament destined, together with a land force under General Benjamin F. Butler, for the reduction of New Orleans. He sailed from Hampton Roads Feb. 2, 1862, and on April 18, 1862, began the bombardment of the lower defenses of New Orleans, Forts Jackson and St. Philip. He passed the forts on the night of April 23-24, and after destroying the Confederate fleet, consisting of gunboats and the iron-clad ram Manassas, compelled the surrender of the city on April 25, which was followed by that of the forts on April 28. He turned the city over to General Butler May 1, 1862. On June 28, 1862, he attacked the batteries at Vicksburg, which he succeeded in passing, only to find the city impregnable to attack on the river-front. On July 15 he once more ran the batteries, and returned to New Orleans. He was promoted rear-admiral July 16, 1862. On March 14, 1863, he attempted to run the batteries of Port Hudson with a fleet of vessels and gunboats to assist General N. P. Banks in his siege of that place, but succeeded in passing only with his flagship, the Hartford, and a gunboat which was lashed to her side. On Aug. 5, 1864, supported by a land force under General Gordon Granger, he passed Forts Morgan and Gaines, at the entrance to Mobile Bay, and after a desperate struggle captured the Confederate iron-clad Tennessee. Although unable to capture the city of Mobile, on account of shoal water and obstructions in the channel, the object of his expedition, which was to put an end to the blockade-running at Mobile, was effectively accomplished. Forts Gaines and Morgan surrendered soon after. In Dec., 1864, Congress created for him the rank of vice-admiral, and in 1866 that of admiral.

Farrakhabad (far-ruk-ä-bäd'), or Farrukhabad, or Furruckabad. 1. A district in the Agra division, Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 27° N., long. 79° 30' E. Area, 1,718 square miles. Population (1881), 907,608.—2. The capital of the district of Farrakhabad, situated on the Ganges in lat. 27° 23' N., long. 79° 36' E. The Mahattas were defeated here by Lake in 1804, and the place was held by mutineers 1857-58. Population (1891), 73,180.

Farrant (far'ant), Richard. Born 1530 (?); died at Windsor, 1585. An English composer. He was organist and master of the chorists at St. George's Chapel, Windsor, 1564-69, when he was reinstated as a gentleman of the Chapel Royal, a position which he had previously held. He subsequently, however, returned to Windsor. He has been erroneously credited with the authorship of the anthem "Lord, for thy tender mercies' sake." Among his genuine works are a service given by Tudway in A minor, called "Farrant's High Service," and two anthems "Call to remembrance" and "Hide not thou thy face."

Farrar (far'är), Frederic William. Born at Bombay, British India, Aug. 7, 1831. An English clergyman, educator, theologian, and philological writer. He was educated at the University of London and at Cambridge; was ordained in 1854; was head-master of Marlborough College 1871-76; was select preacher to Cambridge University in 1868 and 1874-75; was appointed a canon of Westminster Abbey and rector of St. Margaret's in 1876; and became archdeacon of Westminster in 1883. He has published the following works of fiction: "Eric, etc." (1858), "Julian Home" (1859), "St. Winifred's, etc." (1863). His theological works are "Witness of History to Christ" (1871), "Life of Christ" (1874), "Life and Work of St. Paul" (1879), "Early Days of Christianity" (1881), etc.

Fasher (fäsh'er). The capital of Darfur, in the Sudan, Africa.

Fashion (fash'on), Sir Novelty. In Cibber's "Love's Last Shift," "a coxcomb that loves to be the first in all foppery." Vanbrugh metamorphosed him into Lord Foppington in "The Relapse."

The interest of the audience in Sir Novelty does not center in him as an unprincipled rake (he is, however, sufficiently unscrupulous), as it is attracted towards him as a "beau," a man of fashion, who professes to see nothing tolerable in himself, solely in order to extort praise for his magnificence from others. . . . He is the first man who was ever called "beau," which title he professes to prefer to "right honourable," for the latter is inherited, while the former is owing to his surprising wits and unexampled gallantry. Doran, Eng. Stage, II, 20.

Fashion, Tom. In Vanbrugh's comedy "The Relapse," the younger brother of Lord Foppington (formerly Sir Novelty Fashion). He

Fashionable Lover, The. A play by Cumberland, produced in 1772.

Fashionable Tales, or Tales of Fashionable Life. Tales by Miss Edgeworth. The first instalment appeared in 1809, and the last in 1812. They comprise "Eunui," "The Dun," "Manconvrinz," "Alberia," "Vivian," "The Absentee," "Madame de Fleury," and "Emilie de Coulanges."

Fashoda (fä-shō'lä). A town in the Shilluk country, Africa, on the White Nile about lat. 9° N.

Fassa (fäs'sä). The upper part of the Avisio valley in southern Tyrol, noted for the Dolomite Mountains.

Fasti (fas'ti). [L. (sc. dies, days), pl. of fastus, lit. 'on which one may speak': used absolutely for a day on which court can be held, a court-day.] See the extract.

The Pontifices, who possessed the art of keeping account of the time, arranged also the fasti, i. e. a list of the days for "awards" or the administration of the law (dies agendi, dies fasti), this being part of the table of each month (Kalendarius), enumerating also the feasts, games, markets, sacrifices, etc., falling on each day, to which were gradually joined first the anniversaries of disasters, and then other short notices of historical events, as well as observations on the rising of certain constellations. After these fasti had been made public, private persons also undertook the compilation of fasti in the shape of tables or books, and they became the subjects of learned discussions. After the introduction of the Julian era (709-45) these publications became again official, and were made by the Emperor in his quality of pontifex maximus. We possess a number of fragments of calendars which were engraved or written (partly) at Rome and in neighbouring Italian towns, and which extend from the 5th century B. C. to the time of Claudius (from a. 723-31 B. C. to 804-51 A. D.). When the new chronology had become sufficiently familiar, the industry of private persons found there a new field. There are still two complete calendars in existence, an official one of the 4th century written by Furius Dionysius Philocalus A. D. 354, and a Christian revision of the official calendar composed by Polemius Silvius (A. D. 448 sq.). From denoting lists of days and months, the name of fasti was also transferred to lists of years containing the names of the chief annual magistrates (fasti consulares), the triumphs held in each year (fasti triumphales), and the priests (fasti sacerdotales). Fragments of fasti in this sense of the word have likewise come down to us, and of these the fasti capitolini are by far the most important. Teuffel and Schreibe, Hist. Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), I, 166.

Fasti. A poetical Roman calendar by Ovid.

Fasti Capitolini (fas'ti kap'i-to-li'ni). [L., 'fasti of the Capitol.' See Fasti.] Marble tablets containing a register of the Roman consuls and other chief magistrates, excavated at Rome in 1546 or 1547, and preserved in the Capitol.

Fastnet (fast'net) Light. A lighthouse off Cape Clear, County Cork, Ireland, in lat. 51° 23' N., long. 9° 36' W.

Fastolf (fas'tolf), Sir John. Born probably in 1378; died at Caister, Nov. 5, 1459. An English soldier and benefactor of Magdalen College, Oxford. He was a page of Thomas Mowbray, duke of Norfolk, and afterward entered the service of Thomas of Lancaster (duke of Clarence), Henry IV.'s second son, who became lord-deputy of Ireland in 1401. He was appointed by Henry V. custodian of the castle of Veves in Gascony in 1413; became lieutenant of Normandy and governor of Maine and Anjou in 1423; took John II, duke of Alençon, prisoner at the battle of Vermeuil in 1424, and was created a knight of the Garter in 1426. On Feb. 12, 1429, during Lent, while conveying provisions, consisting chiefly of herrings, to the English before Orleans, he repulsed an attack of a largely superior French force under the Comte de Clermont at Rouvray ("the Battle of the Herrings"), and June 18, 1429, was defeated with Talbot at Patay. He retired from military service in 1440. He left a legacy for the founding of a college at Caister, which was diverted by papal authority to Magdalen College, Oxford. He is supposed by some to be the original of Shakespeare's Sir John Falstaff. See Falstaff.

Fata Morgana (fä'tä mor-gä'nä). The fay or fairy Morgana, the sister of King Arthur, in medieval romance. She lived in the Isle of Avalon, where Ogier the Dane was taken and became her lover. In "Orlando Innamorato" she appears as a personification of Fortune. She is subject only to Demogorgon. She is also called "Morgaine" (and "Morgan") "la fee" and "Morgue la Fay." The name Fata Morgana is given to a mirage seen in the Strait of Messina, superstitiously supposed to be caused by Morgana.

Fatal Curiosity. 1. An episode in Cervantes's "Don Quixote." It relates to the excessive trial of a wife's faithfulness.—2. A tragedy by Lillo, published in 1737. It has been imitated in "The Shipwreck," and was altered and reproduced by Colman, senior, in 1782.

Fatal Discovery, The. A play by John Home, produced by Garrick in 1769.

Fatal Dowry, The. A tragedy by Massinger and Field. It was produced in 1632, and was pillaged by Rowe in his "Fair Penitent."

Fatal Marriage, The, or The Innocent Adultery. A tragedy by Southerne, acted in 1694. On its revival in 1757 the comic under-plot was omitted, and the play was afterward renamed "Isabella."

Fates (fāts), The. [L. Fata.] In Roman mythology, the Paræ, or destinies personified, corresponding to the Greek Mœræ (which see).

Fath Ali. See Feth Ali.

Father Hubbard's Tales, or The Ant and the Nightingale. A coarse but humorous attack on the vices and follies of the times, partly in prose and partly in verse, by Thomas Middleton. It was suggested by Spenser's "Prosopopola, or Mother Hubbard's Tale." It was published in 1604.

[The title of "Father of" so-and-so is given to many persons, often without reason or historical accuracy. The following list contains some of the most common titles of this sort.]

Father of Angling, The. Izaak Walton.

Father of Comedy, The. Aristophanes.

Father of Ecclesiastical History, The. Eusebius of Cæsarea.

Fathers, The, or The Good-natured Man. A play by Fielding, brought to light 24 years after his death.

Fathers, The Apostolic. Those fathers of the church who were during any part of their lives contemporary with the apostles. They are six: Barnabas (lived about A. D. 70-100), Clement of Rome (died about 100), Hermas (lived probably about the beginning of the 2d century), Ignatius (died probably 107), Papias (lived probably about 130), and Polycarp (died 155).

Fathers and Sons. A novel by Turgenieff, published in 1862. In it theoretic nihilism is presented and defined. The destructive skepticism of the medical student Bazaroff, "the new man," in whom Turgenieff portrayed the spirit of a new epoch, aroused much hostility against him.

"A nihilist," said Nicholas Petrovitch, . . . "signifies a man who . . . recognizes nothing?" "Or rather who respects nothing," said Paul Petrovitch. . . . "A man who looks at everything from a critical point of view," said Arcadi. "Does not that come to the same thing?" asked his uncle. "No, not at all; a nihilist is a man who bows before no authority, who accepts no principle without examination, no matter what credit the principle has."
Turgenieff, Fathers and Sons (tr. by Schuyler), v.

Fathigarh (fut-ê-gâr'h'), or Futtigarh (fut-tê-gâr'h'). A town and station in the division of Agra, Northwest Provinces, British India, situated on the Ganges 3 miles east of Farrakhabad.

Fauriel (fô-rê-el'), Claude Charles. Born at St.-Etienne, France, Oct. 21, 1772; died at Paris, July 15, 1844. A French philologist, historian, critic, and politician. He published "Histoire de la Gaule méridionale sous la domination des conquérants germains" (1836), "Histoire de la croisade contre les hérétiques albigeois" (translated from the Provençal, 1837), "Histoire de la littérature provençale" (1846), "Bante et les origines de la langue et de la littérature italienne" (1854).

Faust (foust). 1. A tragedy by Goethe, commenced in 1772, and published as "Faust, ein Fragment" in 1790. Part I, complete, was published as "Faust, eine Tragodie" in 1808; part 2, finished in 1831, was published in 1833. It has been translated into English by Bayard Taylor, Blackie, Anster, Hayward, Martin, and others (nearly 40 in all). Goethe accomplished the transformation of Faust from a common necromancer and conjurer into a personification of humanity, tempted and disquieted, but at length groping its way to the light. See Goethe.

2. An opera by Gounod (words, after Goethe, by Carré and Barbier), represented at the Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, March 19, 1859.—3. An opera by Spohr, first produced at Frankfurt in 1818. The words, which do not follow Goethe's play, are by Bernhard.

Faust (foust), Johann. See Fust.

Faust, or Faustus (fâ'stus), Doctor Johann. A person born at Kundling (Knittlingen), Württemberg, or at Roda, near Weimar, and said to have died in 1538. He was a man of licentious character, a magician, astrologer, and soothsayer, who boasted of performing the miracles of Christ. It was believed that he was carried off at last by the devil, who had lived with him in the form of a black dog. The legends of Faust were gathered from the then recent traditions concerning him in a book which appeared at the book-fair at Frankfort-on-the-Main in 1587. It was called "The History of Dr. Faustus, the Notorious Magician and Master of the Black Art, etc." Soon after its appearance it became known in England. "A metrical version of it into English was licensed by Aylmer, Bishop of London, before the end of the year. In 1588 there was a rimed version of it into German, also a translation into Low German, and a new edition of the original with some slight changes. In 1589 there appeared a version of the first German Faust book into French, by Victor Palma Cayet. The English prose version was made from the second edition of the original, that of 1588, and is undated, but probably was made at once. There was a revised edition of it in 1592. In 1592 there was a Dutch translation from the second German edition. This gives the time of the carrying off of Faustus by the devil as the night between the twenty-third and twenty-fourth of October, 1538. The English version also gives 1538 as the year, and it is a date, as we have seen, consistent with trustworthy references to his actual life. Marlowe's play ("The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus") was probably written in 1588, soon after the original story had found its way to England. He treated the legend as a poet, bringing out with all his power its central thought — man in the pride of knowledge turning from his God." (Morley, Eng. Writers, IX, 254.) This play was brought to Germany about the beginning of the 17th century, and, after passing through various developments on the stage, finally became a puppet-play, which is still in existence. Lessing wrote parts of two versions of the story. Müller, the painter, published two fragments of his dramatized life of Faust in 1778. Goethe's tragedy (which see) was not published till 1808. Klinger published a romance "Faust's Leben, Thaten und Hellenfahrt" (1791; Borrow translated it in 1826). Klingemann published a tragedy on the subject (1815). Heine a ballet "Der Doctor Faust, ein Tanzpoem" (1851), and Lennau an epic "Faust" (1830). W. G. Wills adapted a play from Goethe's "Faust," which Henry Irving produced in 1885. Calderon's play "El Magico Prodigioso" strongly resembles Goethe's and Marlowe's plays, though founded on the legend of St. Cyprian.

Fausta (fâs'tâ), Cornelia. Born about 88 B. C. A daughter of the Roman dictator L. Cornelius Sulla by his fourth wife, Cæcilia Metella. She married at an early age C. Memmius, by whom she was divorced. In 65 B. C. she married T. Annius Milo. She was notorious for her conjugal infidelity. The historian Sallust is said to have been one of her paramours.

Fausta, Flavia Maximiana. Died probably in 326. A Roman empress, daughter of the emperor Maximianus Herculius. She married in 307 Constantine the Great, by whom she was the mother of Constantine, Constantius, and Constans. She is said to have induced Constantine by false accusations to put Crispus, his eldest son by a former marriage, to death, and to have been suffocated in a heated bath by order of her husband, in consequence of the discovery of the innocence of Crispus.

Faustin I. See Soulouque.

Faustina (fâs-tî'nâ), Annia, surnamed Junior, [L. Faustina, from faustus, fortunate.] Died near Mount Taurus, Asia Minor, 175 A. D. A Roman empress, daughter of Antoninus Pius by Annia Galeria Faustina. She married Marcus Aurelius in 145 or 146. She surpassed her mother in profligacy, and is said to have been incited by her intrigues the unsuccessful rebellion of Avidius Cassius.

Faustina, Annia Galeria, surnamed Senior. Born about 104 A. D.; died 141. A Roman empress. She married Antoninus Pius before his elevation to the throne in 138, and died in the third year of his reign. She was noted for her profligacy. A temple dedicated to her memory in the Via Sacra may still be seen in a perfect state of preservation. There is a colossal bust of her in the Vatican, Rome. It is a well-characterized piece of portrait-sculpture, and a good example of the best works of Roman art.

Faustus. See Faust.

Fauvelet (fôv-lâ'), Jean Baptiste. Born at Bordeaux, France, June 9, 1819. A French painter of genre scenes and flowers.

Favara (fä-vä'ra). A town in the province of Girgenti, Sicily, 4 miles southeast of Girgenti. Population (1881), 16,051.

Favart (fä-vär'), Charles Simon. Born at Paris, Nov. 13, 1710; died at Belleville, near Paris, May 12, 1792. A French dramatist and writer of comic operas.

Mr. Petrie has brought to light [in the Fayum] the earliest Greek alphabetical signs yet discovered; for the most ancient specimens of the Greek writing previously known are the rock-cut and the lava-cut inscriptions found in the very ancient cemeteries of Santorio and Thera, and the famous Greek inscription cut upon the leg of one of the colossi at Abu-Simbel. The Abu-Simbel inscription is contemporaneous with the Forty-seventh Olympiad, and Lenormant attributes the oldest of the Thera inscriptions to the 9th century before Christ. But the potsherds found by Mr. Petrie in the Fayum carry back the history of the alphabet to a period earlier than the date of the Exodus, and six centuries earlier than any Greek inscriptions known. Edwards, Pharaohs, Fellahs, etc., p. 79.

Felton, John. Hanged at Tyburn, Nov. 28, 1628. An English assassin. He entered the army at an early age, and served as a lieutenant under Sir Edward Cecil at Cadiz in 1625. Made reckless by poverty, and inflamed by the reading of the Remonstrance of Parliament, he assassinated, Aug. 23, 1628, the Duke of Buckingham, who had refused him the command of a company.

Felton, Septimius. See Septimius Felton.

Feltre (fēl'tre). A small town in the province of Belluno, Italy, 45 miles north-northwest of Venice.

Feltre, Duc de. See Clarke, H. J. G.

Female Quixote, The. A novel by Mrs. Lennox, published in 1752. It was intended to ridicule the novels of the romantic school of Gomberville and Scudéry.

The heroine, Arabella, the only child of a widowed and misanthropic marquis, is supposed to be brought up in seclusion in the country, where she has access to a library full of old romances, by which her head is almost as much turned as that of the Knight of La Mancha was by the same kind of study. She takes a young gardener in her father's service for a nobleman in disguise, and is with difficulty undeceived when he gets a thrashing for stealing carp from a pond.

Fenians (fē'ni-anz; in def. 1 also fen'i-anz). [In the first sense also written Finnians and Finnians; formed, with Latin suffix -ian, from Ir. Feinn, Feinne, oblique case of Ir. Fianm, pl. Fianna; see def. 1.] 1. A modern English form of Irish Fianm, Fianna, a name applied in Irish tradition to the members of certain tribes who formed a militia of the ardrigh or king of Eire or Erin (the Fianna Eirionn, or champions of Erin). The principal figure in the Fenian legends is Finn or Fionn, who figures as Fingal in the Ossianic publications of McPherson, in which the name of Ossian stands for Oisín, son of Finn. The Fenians, with their hero Finn, while probably having a historical basis, became the center of a great mass of legends which may be compared with the legends of "King Arthur" and the "Round Table." In the Ossianic version the Fenians are warriors of superhuman size, strength, speed, and prowess. Also Fian, Fion.

2. An association of Irishmen known as the Fenian Brotherhood, founded in New York in 1837 with a view to secure the independence of Ireland. The movement soon spread over the United States and Ireland (where it absorbed the previously existing Phoenix Society), and among the Irish population of Great Britain, and several attempts were made at insurrection in Ireland, and at invasion of Canada from the United States. The association was organized in district clubs called "circles," presided over by "centers," with a "head center" as chief president, and a general "senate"; an organization afterward modified in some respects. Between 1863 and 1872 eleven "national congresses" were held by the Fenian Brotherhood in the United States, after which it continued in existence as a secret society.

Fennell (fen'el), James. Born Dec. 11, 1766; died June 14, 1816. An English actor and dramatist. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, and at Lincoln's Inn, London, and in 1787 appeared at the Theatre Royal, Edinburgh. He subsequently played in London, and about 1793 emigrated to America. He published "Linda and Clara, or the British Officer" (1791), and an "Apology" for his life (1814).

Fenris (fen'ris). [ON.] In Old Norse mythology, a water-demon in the form of a gigantie wolf; hence also called Fenris-wolf (ON. Fenrisulfr). He was the son of Loki and the giantess Angurboda (ON. Angroboða), and the brother of the Midgard serpent and the goddess Hel. He was fettered by the gods, but freed himself at Ragnarok and slew Odin. He was, in his turn, slain by Vidar (ON. Vidharr), Odin's son.

Fens, The. See Fen Country.

Fenton (fen'ton). In Shakspeare's "Merry Wives of Windsor," a gentleman in love with Anne Page. He intends to marry her for her money alone, but her charms subdue him.

Fenton, Edward. Died in 1603. An English navigator. He accompanied Sir Martin Frobisher on his second and third northwest voyages in 1577 and 1578 respectively, and in 1582-83 commanded an expedition in search of the northwest passage, in which he was accompanied by William Hawkins (junior) and John Drake.

Fenton, Elijah. Born at Shelton, Staffordshire, May 20, 1683; died Aug., 1730. An English poet. He graduated with the degree of B. A. at Jesus College, Cambridge, in 1704, and subsequently was for a time head-master of the grammar-school at Sevenoaks. He assisted Pope in the translation of the Odyssey. He wrote a tragedy "Mariamne" (acted in 1723), in which he was assisted by Southerne.

Fenton, Sir Geoffrey. Died at Dublin, Oct. 19, 1608. An English translator and politician. He was the son of Henry Fenton of Fenton in Nottinghamshire, and was for many years principal secretary of state in Ireland, being knighted for his services in this capacity by Queen Elizabeth in 1589. His chief work is a translation of a number of novels from Boissuet and Belleforest's "Histoires tragiques, extraictes des œuvres italiennes de Bancel [Bancello]," published under the title of "Certaine Tragical Discourses written out of French and Latine by Geffraie Fenton," etc. (1607).

Fenton, Lavinia. Born in 1708; died in 1760. An English actress. She was the daughter of a naval officer named Beswick. Her mother afterward married a man named Fenton. She made her first appearance in 1726, and was successful especially as Polly Peacham in "The Beggar's Daughter." She married the Duke of Bolton in 1751, after living with him for many years before the death of his wife, which took place in that year.

Fenton, Reuben E. Born at Carroll, N. Y., July 1, 1819; died at Jamestown, N. Y., Aug. 25, 1885. An American politician, governor of New York 1865-69, and United States senator from New York 1869-75.

Fenwick (fen'wik), George. Died March 15, 1657. An English colonial official. He settled at the mouth of the Connecticut River as agent for the patentees and governor of the fort of Saybrook in 1630. The fort having been sold to the colony of Connecticut in 1644, he returned to England in 1645. He served in the Parliamentary army during the civil war, was made governor of Leith and Edinburgh Castle in 1650, and was one of the eight commissioners appointed in 1651 for the government of Scotland. He was also appointed one of the commissioners for the trial of Charles I., but did not act.

Fenwick, Sir John. Beheaded on Tower Hill, Jan. 28, 1697. An English conspirator. He was descended from a Yorkshire family; served in the army, in which he obtained the rank of major-general (1688); and entered Parliament in 1677. He was arrested in 1696 for complicity in a plot against the life of William III., and caused a sensation by accusing Marlborough, Godolphin, Russell, Shrewsbury, and other leaders of the Whig party of treasonable negotiations with the Jacobites.

Feodor (fä'ō-dōr) I. Ivanovitch. [Russ. Fedor = E. Theodore, from Gr. Θεόδωρος.] Born May 11, 1557; died Jan. 7, 1598. Czar of Russia March 18, 1584, - Jan. 7, 1598. During his reign the church of Russia was declared independent of the Patriarch of Constantinople, and a separate Russian patriarchate established. He was the last of the house of Rurik.

Feodor II. Alexievitch. Born in 1589; murdered June 10, 1605. Czar of Russia April 5 - June 10, 1605, son of Boris Godunoff.

Feodor III. Born June 8, 1636; died at Moscow, April 27, 1682. Emperor of Russia, eldest son of the emperor Alexis, whom he succeeded in 1676.

Feodosia (fä-ō-lō'sē-ä), or Kaffa (käf'fü). [Tatar Kefë.] A seaport and watering-place in the Crimea, government of Taurida, Russia, about lat. 45° 5' N., long. 35° 20' E. The Greek colony of Theodosia was founded here by Milesians. The place was the seat of an extensive trade in the middle ages, its population reaching 150,000. It was held by the Genoese from the 13th to the 15th century, and by the Turks from 1475 until 1774, when it was ceded to Russia. Population (1880), 13,199.

Feramorz (fer'a-mörz). In Moore's "Lalla Rookh," a young poet. He is Ahris, the suitor of Lower Bueharia, who is betrothed to Lalla Rookh. He wins her heart in his disguise, and reveals himself only when she is led into his presence as a bride.

Ferdinand (fēr'di-nand) I., surnamed "The Just." [F. Ferdinand, Ferrand, It. Ferdinando, Ferrando, Sp. Hernando, Fernando, G. Ferdinando.] Born 1379; died 1416. King of Aragon 1412-16. He was a prominent supporter of the anti-pope Benedict XIII. at the beginning of the Council of Constance (1414-18), but after the deposition of John XXIII. and the abdication of Gregory XII. he was in 1415 induced by the emperor Sigismund to withdraw his support in the interest of the unity of the church.

Ferdinand II., King of Aragon. See Ferdinand V., King of Castile.

Ferdinand (fēr'di-nand; G. pron. fer'dē-nand) I. Born at Vienna, April 19, 1793; died at Prague, June 29, 1875. Emperor of Austria, son of Francis I. whom he succeeded March 2, 1835. He inherited a weak constitution, mentally and physically, which compelled him to abandon the administration of the government to others, especially to the imperial chancellor Metternich, whose absolute and reactionary policy provoked the revolution of 1848. He abdicated in favor of his nephew Francis Joseph, Dec. 2, 1848.

Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick. See Brunswick, Duke of (Ferdinand).

Ferdinand I., surnamed "The Great." Died at Leon, Spain, Dec. 27, 1065. King of Castile and Leon. He was the second son of Sancho III. of Navarre, who acquired possession of Castile in 1028. He was invested by his father in 1033 with the sovereignty of Castile, which was created an independent kingdom. He defeated Beruodo of Leon at Lantada, near Rio Carrion, in 1037, whereupon he became king of Leon also. He fought with success against the Moors, extending the Christian frontiers from the Duero to the Mondego, and reducing to vassalage the rulers of Toledo, Saragozza, and Seville. He assumed the title of emperor of Spain in 1136.

Ferdinand II. Died 1188. King of Leon 1157-1188, son of Alfonso VIII. His repudiation of Urraca, his wife, involved him in a war with his father-in-law, Alfonso I. of Portugal, whom he defeated and captured at Badajoz in 1167. He gained a brilliant victory over the Moors at Santarem about 1181. During his reign the great military order of Alcantara was chartered (1177) by Pope Alexander III.

Ferdinand III., surnamed "The Saint." Born about 1200; died 1252. King of Castile and Leon, son of Alfonso IX. of Leon by Berengaria, sister of Henry I. of Castile. He became king of Castile on the death of Henry in 1217, and succeeded his father as king of Leon in 1230. He captured Ubeda from the Moors in 1234, Cordova in 1236, Jaen in 1246, and Seville in 1248. He was canonized by Clement X. in 1671, and is commemorated on May 30. He caused to be collected and to be translated into the vulgar tongue the "Forum Julicum," or code of Visigothic laws, which forms one of the oldest specimens of Castilian prose. During his reign a law was passed (1239) which made of Leon and Castile a single inseparable kingdom.

Ferdinand IV. Born 1285; died 1312. King of Castile and Leon, son of Sancho IV. whom he succeeded in 1295.

Ferdinand V. (II. of Aragon and Sicily, III. of Naples), surnamed "The Catholic." Born at Sos, Aragon, March 10, 1452; died at Madrigalejo, Estremadura, Spain, Jan. 23, 1516. King of Castile. He was the son of John II. of Navarre and Aragon, who associated him with himself in the government of Aragon in 1466, and in 1468 declared him king of Sicily. In Oct., 1469, he married Isabella, sister of Henry IV. of Castile, and heirress of that throne. Ferdinand and Isabella were, on the death of Henry in 1474, recognized as joint sovereigns of Castile by the nobles and the junta of Segovia; but a strong party, including the Marquis of Villena, the grand master of Calatrava, and the Archbishop of Toledo, supported by Alfonso V. of Portugal and Louis XI. of France, declared in favor of Juana "la Beltrajeja" (i. e., daughter of Beltran), whom Henry had in his will acknowledged as his legitimate child and designated as his successor. Ferdinand defeated Alfonso at Toro, with the result that the whole of Castile submitted to Isabella and her consort in 1479. He succeeded his father in Aragon in the same year (Navarre going to his sister Leonora de Foix). In 1482 he resumed the war against the Moors, which resulted in the conquest of Granada in 1492. He joined in 1495 the emperor, the Pope, and the states of Milan and Venice against Charles VIII. of France, who was expelled from Naples, and Ferdinand ascended the Neapolitan throne in 1504. On the death of Isabella, Nov. 26, 1504, he was proclaimed regent of Castile. In 1511 he formed an alliance with Venice and Pope Julius II. for the expulsion of the French from Italy. Navarre, on the other hand, entered into an alliance with France. This gave him a pretext for invading Navarre, which was conquered in 1512, and incorporated with Castile in 1515. He thus united under his sway the four kingdoms into which Spain was at this time divided (Aragon, Castile, Granada, and Navarre), besides Sicily and Naples. The chief events of his reign, besides those already mentioned, were the establishment of the Inquisition at Seville (1480), the annexation to the crown of the grand-mastership of the military orders of Calatrava (1487), Alcantara (1494), and San Jago (1499), the expulsion of the Jews (1492), and the discovery of America by Columbus.

Ferdinand VI. Born Sept. 23, 1712; died at Villaviecosa, Aug. 10, 1759. King of Spain, son of Philip V. whom he succeeded in 1746. He was a party to the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle (Oct., 1748), which terminated the War of the Austrian Succession (1740-48). He maintained a strict neutrality on the outbreak of the Seven Years' War in 1756, notwithstanding the overtures both of England and of France, the former of which offered Gibraltar and the latter Minorca as the price of his assistance. Of a weak constitution and a melancholy temperament, he withdrew as far as practicable from European politics, abandoning the government to his ministers Eusebio, Carvajal, and Wall, who took into their counsels the queen Barbara, daughter of John V. of Portugal, the royal confessor Balbaco, and the singer Farinelli, who acquired an extraordinary influence over the king. On the death of the queen in 1758, he fell into an extreme melancholy, which developed into insanity.

Ferdinand VII. Born at San Ildefonso, near Madrid, Oct. 14, 1784; died at Madrid, Sept.

29, 1833. King of Spain, son of Charles IV. He ascended the throne March 19, 1808, a popular revolution at Aranjuez having compelled his father to abdicate. On May 6, 1808, he was forced by Napoleon to renounce his throne, and was interned at Valençay until March, 1814, when he returned to Spain. He abolished the liberal constitution of 1812, restored the Inquisition, and complied generally with the demands of the Absolutist or Apostolical party. A revolution restored (March 9, 1820) the constitution of 1812, which was abolished through French intervention in 1823. He abolished the Salic law by the pragmatic sanction of March 29, 1830. See Carlos, Don (Carlos Maria José Isidoro de Bourbon).

Ferdinand I. Born at Aleará, Spain, March 10, 1503; died at Vienna, July 25, 1564. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, younger brother of the emperor Charles V. He married in 1521 the princess Anna of Hungary, on the death of whose brother, Louis II., in 1526, he was elected king of Bohemia and Hungary. His title to the throne of Hungary was disputed by John Zápolya, who, supported by the Turks, obtained possession of a part of the country. He became in 1541 president of the council of regency appointed to govern Germany during the emperor's absence in Spain, was elected king of the Romans in 1531, and became emperor on the abdication of Charles in 1556. He exerted himself, but with little success, to settle the religious disputes between the Protestants and the Roman Catholics in Germany. He negotiated the treaty between the emperor and the elector Maurice of Saxony in 1552. In 1519 Charles and Ferdinand succeeded Maximilian I. in the Austrian dominions, and in 1521-22 Charles relinquished his share in this sovereignty to his brother.

Ferdinand II. Born at Gratz, Styria, July 9, 1578; died at Vienna, Feb. 15, 1637. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire. He was the son of Charles, duke of Styria, by Maria of Bavaria, and cousin of the emperor Matthias whom he succeeded as king of Bohemia in 1617, as king of Hungary in 1618, and as emperor in 1619. In 1619 he was deposed from the throne of Bohemia by the Protestant estates of that kingdom, who were irritated by infringements of the "Majestatsbrief" of 1609, and who chose as his successor the elector palatine Frederick V., head of the Protestant Union and of the German Calvinists. He allied himself with Maximilian, duke of Bavaria, head of the Catholic League, with Spain, and with the Lutheran elector of Saxony. Frederick having been overthrown in the battle on the White Mountain, near Prague (Nov. 8, 1620), Ferdinand destroyed the "Majestatsbrief" and extirpated Protestantism in Bohemia. His whole reign was occupied with the war against the Protestants (Mausfeld, Christian of Brunswick, Christian IV. of Denmark, and Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden); but before his death, owing to the murder of Wallenstein, the opposition of Richelieu, and the ability of the Swedish generals, he lost all hope of crushing Protestantism. See Thirty Years' War.

Ferdinand III. Born at Gratz, Styria, July 11 (or 13), 1608; died at Vienna, April 2, 1657. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, son of Ferdinand II. On the assassination of Wallenstein in 1634, he was invested with the nominal command of the imperial army, the real command being exercised by Gallas, and took part in the victory over the Swedes at Nordlingen Sept. 6, 1634. He signed the peace of Westphalia Oct. 24, 1648. He succeeded his father in Hungary, Bohemia, the archduchy of Austria, etc., and in the empire in 1637.

Ferdinand I., etc., Kings of Leon. See Ferdinand I., etc., Kings of Castile.

Ferdinand I. Born about 1424; died Jan. 25, 1494. King of Naples, illegitimate son of Alfonso V. of Aragon. Pope Calixtus III. refused to recognize his title to the kingdom, which his father had bequeathed him in 1458; and John of Anjou, thinking to regain the throne of his ancestors, attacked and defeated him July 7, 1460. He made his peace with the successor of Calixtus, Pius II., and, with the aid of the Albanian chief Scanderbeg, inflicted a decisive defeat on John of Anjou at Troja Aug. 18, 1462.

Ferdinand II. Born July 26, 1469; died Oct. 7, 1496. King of Naples 1495-96, son of Alfonso II. and grandson of Ferdinand I. His father abdicated in his favor on the invasion of his dominions by Charles VIII. of France. Naples was occupied by the French, and Ferdinand had to flee, but regained his throne by the aid of Gonzalvo de Cordova, the great general of Ferdinand V. of Castile.

Ferdinand III., King of Naples. See Ferdinand V. of Castile.

Ferdinand IV., King of Naples. See Ferdinand I., King of the Two Sicilies.

Ferdinand I. Born about 1345; died in 1383. King of Portugal 1367-83. On the death of Pedro in 1369, he claimed the throne of Castile, which was seized by Henry of Trastámara, illegitimate brother of Pedro. He renounced his claim in 1371, after some indecisive fighting. He was the last of the direct Burgundian line, which had reigned in Portugal from about 1112. He was succeeded by his natural brother John, grand master of the order of Avis.

Ferdinand II. Born at Vienna, Oct. 29, 1816; died Dec. 15, 1885. Titular king of Portugal, son of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. He married Maria II. of Portugal in 1836, and was regent 1853-55.

Ferdinand I. (IV. of Naples). Born at Naples, Jan. 12, 1751; died there, Jan. 4, 1825. King of the Two Sicilies, son of Charles III. of Spain. He reigned in Naples 1759-1806 and 1815-25 (the interval being occupied by the French domination), and in Sicily 1759-1825. He consolidated his states as the Two Sicilies in 1816.

Ferdinand II. Born at Palermo, Jan. 10, 1810; died at Naples, May 22, 1859. King of the Two Sicilies 1830-59, son of Francis I. whom he succeeded. His oppressive and despotic reign provoked numerous political disturbances, which culminated in 1848 in a popular rising in Sicily. This rising was quelled in 1849 by the bombardment of the principal cities, an expedition which acquired for him the epithet of "Bombardier." His treatment of political suspects was made the subject of two letters addressed to the Earl of Aberdeen by Mr. Gladstone, who visited Naples in 1850.

Ferdinand III. Born at Florence, May 6, 1769; died at Florence, June 18, 1824. Grand Duke of Tuscany and Archduke of Austria, younger son of the emperor Leopold II. whom he succeeded as grand duke in 1790. He reigned until 1799, and from 1814 to 1824.

Ferdinand IV. Born June 10, 1835. Grand Duke of Tuscany, son of Leopold II. whom he succeeded in 1859. His dominions were incorporated with Sardinia in 1860.

Ferdinand. 1. In Shakspeare's "Tempest," the son of the King of Naples, and lover of Miranda. — 2. In Shakspeare's comedy "Love's Labour's Lost," the King of Navarre. — 3. In Webster's "Duchess of Malfi," the Count of Calabria and brother of the duchess. He is a cynical villain, who murders his sister who has injured his family pride. — 4. In Sheridan's "Duenna," the lover of Clara.

Ferdinand, Count Fathom, Adventures of. A novel by Smollett, published in 1753; so called from the name of its hero, who is a repulsive scoundrel.

Ferdusi. See Firdausi.

Fère (fâr). La. A town in the department of Aisne, France, situated on the Oise 14 miles northwest of Laon. It has an artillery school. Population (1891), commune, 5,394.

Fère Champenoise (fâr shônp-nwâz'), La. A town in the department of Marne, France, 22 miles southwest of Châlons-sur-Marne. Here, March 25, 1814, the Allies defeated the French.

Ferentino (fâ-ren-té'no). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, 42 miles southeast of Rome; the ancient Ferentinum. Besides its cathedral, castle, and ancient town wall, it is noted for an ancient theater, unexcavated, but in its stage structure the most perfect on the Italian mainland, and in other ways remarkable. The back wall of the stage is 136 feet long, with 7 doors, and is held to be Etruscan. The stage is Roman; its structure is of brick. It has three doors, and a narrow passage extends behind its whole length. The cavea is surrounded by a semicircle of beautiful arches. The chord of the cavea is 200 feet, the depth of the stage 33. Population (1881), 7,679.

Ferghana (fer-ghâ'nâ), or Fergana (fer-gâ'nâ). A province of the Russian general government of Turkestan, central Asia, in the upper valley of the Sir-Daria, about lat. 39° 30' - 42° N., long. 70° - 74° E. It corresponds to part of the ancient Sogdiana, and was formed from the khanate of Khokand by Russia in 1876. Area, 35,634 square miles. Population, 785,650.

Fergus (fer'gus) I. A mythical king of Scotland. According to a fictitious chronology he was the son of Ferchard, first king of Scotland; came to Scotland from Ireland about 330 B. C. to repel an invasion of the Picts and Britons; and was drowned on his return off Carrickfergus, which was named after him.

Ferracuta (fer'a-küt), or Ferragus (fer'a-gus), It. Ferrau (fer-rou'). A giant celebrated in medieval romance. He appears with various attributes, in the story of "Valentine and Orson," as Ferracuta. He has in his castle an enormous brazen head which answers any question put to it. In some romances he is a Portuguese giant; in others a Spanish knight; in others a Saracen; in all of enormous strength, and invulnerable till Orlando vanquishes him.

While in Navarre, it is reported to Charles that a Syrian giant of first-rate enormity, called Ferracutus (the Ferrau of the Italians), has appeared at Nagera. This creature possessed most exuberant proportions: he was twelve cubits high, his face was a cubit in length, and his nose a measured palm. As soon as Charles arrived at Nagera, this unwieldy gentleman proposed a single combat, but the king was so little tempted by a personal survey that he declined his offer. Ogerius the Dane was therefore selected as the Christian champion; but the giant, trussing him under one arm, carried him off to the town, and served a succession of knights in a similar manner. Orlando at length went out against him. The Saracen, as usual, commenced the attack by pulling his antagonist from the saddle, and rode off with him, till Orlando, exerting all his force, seized him by the chin, and both fell to the ground. When they had remounted, the knight, thinking to kill the pagan, only cut off the head of his horse. Ferrau being now on foot, Orlando struck a blow on his arm that knocked the sword from his hand; on which the giant slew his adversary's horse with a pat of his fist. After this the opponents fought on foot, and with swords, till towards evening, when Ferrau demanded a truce till next day. Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, 1, 278.

He composed four or five operas, much sacred music, and a good deal of pianoforte music.

Fetter Lane. A street in London running from Fleet street to Holborn Viaduct.

During the middle ages Fetter Lane slumbered; but it woke up on the breaking out of the Civil War, and in 1643 became unpleasantly celebrated as the spot where Waller's plot disastrously terminated. . . . One of the pleasantest memories of Fetter Lane is that which connects it with the school-days of Charles Lamb. Dryden and Otway, it is said, lived opposite each other in Fetter Lane. Thorbury, Old and New London, I. 94.

Feuchères (fê-'shâr'), Baronne de (Sophie Dawes or Daws). Born in the Isle of Wight about 1795; died in England, Jan. 2, 1841. A woman of low birth, mistress of Louis Henri Joseph de Bourbon, prince de Condé (1756-1830). She married Baron de Feuchères in 1818, and was separated from him in 1822.

des femmes, etc." (1866), "Histoire des usages funèbres, etc." (1857-61), "L'Allemagne en 1871" (1872), and other works.

Feyjoo y Montenegro (fā-ē-hō' ē mōn-tā-nā'-grō), Frey Benito. Born at Cardamiro, near Orense, Spain, Oct. 18, 1676; died at Oviedo, Spain, Sept. 26, 1764. A noted Spanish critic and scholar, a Benedictine monk. He published "Teatro critico universal" (1726-60), "Cartas eruditas y curiosas" (1760), etc.

Still, when, in 1726, Feyjóó printed a volume of essays connected with his main purpose, he was able to command public attention, and was encouraged to go on. He called it "The Critical Theatre"; and in its different dissertations—as separate as the papers in "The Spectator," but longer and on graver subjects—he boldly attacked the dialectics and metaphysics then taught everywhere in Spain; maintained Bacon's system of induction in the physical sciences; ridiculed the general opinion in relation to comets, eclipses, and the arts of magic and divination; laid down rules for historical faith, which would exclude most of the early traditions of the country; showed a greater deference for woman, and claimed for her a higher place in society, than the influence of the Spanish Church willingly permitted her to occupy; and, in all respects, came forth to his countrymen as one urging earnestly the advancement of education, the pursuit of truth, and the improvement of social life. Eight volumes of this stirring work were published before 1739, and then it stopped, without any apparent reason. But in 1742 Feyjóó began a similar series of discussions, under the name of "Learned and Inquiring Letters," which he finished in 1760, with the fifth volume, thus closing up the long series of his truly philanthropic, as well as philosophical, labors.

Tielkeer, Span. Lit., III, 272.

Fez (fez), Ar. Fās (fās). 1. A sultanate in the northern part of Morocco, annexed to Morocco proper in the middle of the 16th century.—2. The southernmost division (kaimakalik) of the Turkish vilayet of Tripoli in northern Africa, situated about lat. 24°-30° N., long. 11°-18° E.; the ancient Phazania, or land of the Garamantes. It consists of a desert inclosing many oases. It became subject to Tripoli in 1842. The capital is Murzuk. Area, about 156,000 square miles. Population, about 50,000.

Fezziwig (fez'i-wig). The name of a family in Dickens's "Christmas Carol." It comprises a jolly old father, a mother ("one vast substantial smile"), and three fair daughters.

Fiacre (fē-ā'kér; F. pron. fyā'kr), or Fiachrach, Saint. Died at Breuil, near Paris, France, about 670. The patron saint of gardeners. He was a native of "Ireland, the country of the Scots," and lived many years at Breuil (near Paris), where he erected an oratory to the Virgin Mary. He is celebrated as a worker of miraculous cures, and is commemorated on the 30th of Aug. An inn at Paris, which was known as the Hôtel de St. Fiacre, is said to have been (about 1650) the first station for the hire of carriages; hence the origin of the word fiacre for a hackney-coach.

Fiammetta (fē-ā-met'tā). In the works of Boccaccio, the name given to Maria (daughter of the King of Naples), beloved by him. She is the subject of his romance entitled "Amorosa Fiammetta."

Fichel (fē-shel'), Benjamin Eugène. Born at Paris, Aug. 30, 1826. A French genre painter, pupil of Paul Delaroche.

Fichte (fieh'te), Immanuel Hermann von. Born at Jena, Germany, July 18, 1796; died at Stuttgart, Aug. 8, 1879. A German philosopher, son of J. G. Fichte. He was professor of philosophy at Bonn 1835-42, and at Tübingen 1842-63. He published "System der Ethik" (1850-53), "Anthropologie" (1856), "Psychologie" (1864), etc.

Fichte, Johann Gottlieb. Born at Rammenau, near Kamenitz, in Upper Lusatia, Germany, May 19, 1762; died at Berlin, Jan. 27, 1814. A celebrated German metaphysician. He was the son of a poor weaver. He attended school at Pforta, and studied subsequently at the universities of Jena and Leipzig. His first philosophical work, "Kritik aller Offenbarung" ("The Critique of All Revelation"), appeared in 1792. In 1793 he became professor of philosophy at Jena. The following year appeared his principal work, "Grundlage der gesamten Wissenschaftslehre" ("Fundamental Principles of the Whole Theory of Science"). After 1799, with the exception of the summer of 1806 (when he delivered a course of lectures at Erlangen), and a part of the disastrous years 1806-07, he lived in Berlin, where, during the winter of 1807-08, he delivered the celebrated "Reden an die deutsche Nation" ("Addresses to the German Nation"). At the opening of the University of Berlin in 1810 he was made professor of philosophy, and was the second rector of that institution. His complete works were published by his son (1845-46) in 8 vols.

Fidelia (fi-dē'li-ä). [From L. fidelis, faithful.] 1. In Wycherley's "Plain Dealer," a young girl disguised as a boy, Fidelio, who follows Manly. She is a sort of imitation of Shakspeare's Viola.—2. The Foundling in Moore's play of that name.

Fidelio (fē-dā'lyō). An opera by Beethoven, first produced in Vienna Nov. 20, 1805. It was Beethoven's only opera, and was several times altered by him. The words were adapted from Bouilly's comic opera "Léonore, ou l'amour conjugal," but it was never played under the name of "Léonore," though Beethoven wished to call it so. Three editions of the pianoforte score are, however, printed with that title. The "Leonora Overtures" were written for "Fidelio." Leonora, the wife of Florestan, a state prisoner, assumes the disguise of a boy, Fidelio, to save her husband's life.

Fidenæ (fi-dē'nē). In ancient geography, a city of Latium, situated on the Tiber 5 miles northeast of Rome. The site is occupied by the modern Castel Giubileo.

Fides (fī'dēz). [L., 'faith.'] An asteroid (No. 37) discovered by Luther at Bilk, Oct. 5, 1855.

Fiebres (fē-ā'bres). [Sp., 'fevers.'] A nickname given in Guatemala, and to some extent in other Central American countries, to the liberal party. It was in common use from the period of independence until 1850 or later. The liberals were sometimes called Anarquistas or to their opponents. Opposed to Aristocratas or Serviles. See Serviles.

Field (fēld), Cyrus West. Born at Stockbridge, Mass., Nov. 30, 1819; died at New York, July 12, 1892. The founder of the Atlantic Cable Company, son of David Dudley Field (1781-1867). He established in 1840 a paper-business at New York, from the active management of which he retired in 1853 with a fortune. He organized about 1854 the New York, Newfoundland, and London Telegraph Company, which connected the American continent with Newfoundland by a submarine cable in 1856. In 1856 he organized the Atlantic Telegraph Company, which, with the assistance of the English and United States governments, succeeded after two failures in laying a submarine cable between Ireland and Newfoundland. The first public message was sent by Queen Victoria to the President Aug. 16, 1858; the cable ceased to work Sept. 1 following. The submerging of a new cable was begun in 1865. It broke in 1865, after 1,000 kilometers had been paid out. Finally, in 1866, the laying of another cable was accomplished, and July 29 of that year an over-ocean telegram was received in the United States. The cable lost in 1865 was recovered and completed later in 1866. The Great Eastern was employed as a transport in the submerging of the last two cables.

Field, David Dudley. Born at East Guilford, Conn., May 20, 1781; died at Stockbridge, Mass., April 15, 1867. An American clergyman and historical writer. He wrote "A History of the Town of Pittsfield, in Berkshire County, Massachusetts" (1844), and "Genealogy of the Brainerd Family" (1857).

Field of the Forty Footsteps. See the extract. The fields behind Montagu House were, from about the year 1680 until towards the end of the last century, the scenes of robbery, murder, and every species of depravity. . . . Tradition had given to the superstitious at that period [1800] a legendary story, of the period of the Duke of Monmouth's rebellion, of two brothers who fought in this field so ferociously as to destroy each other; since which their footsteps formed from the vengeful struggle were said to remain, . . . nor could any grass or vegetable ever be produced where these "forty footsteps" were thus displayed. This extraordinary area was said to be at the extreme termination of the north-east end of Upper Montagu Street. They were built over about 1800. Rimbault.

Fields (fēldz), James Thomas. Born at Portsmouth, N. H., Dec. 31, 1817; died at Boston, April 24, 1881. An American publisher and author. He was successively a partner in several book-firms at Boston, and edited the "Atlantic Monthly" 1862-1870. He wrote "Yesterdays with Authors" (1872), and edited, in conjunction with E. P. Whipple, "The Family Library of British Poetry, from Chaucer to the Present Time, 1350-1878" (1878).

Fiennes (fē-cuz'), James, Baron Saye and Sele. Died July 4, 1450. An English nobleman. He was the second son of Sir William de Flenness; served in the French wars; was made constable of Dover and warden of the Cinque Ports in 1447; was created a baron, with the title of Lord Saye and Sele, in 1447; was in 1447 appointed constable of the Tower of London; and was made lord treasurer in 1449. He was beheaded by the mob, in the insurrection under Cade in 1450.

Fiennes, Thomas, ninth Baron Dacre. Born in 1517; executed at Tyburn, June 29, 1541. An English nobleman. He was one of a party of youths who engaged in a poaching frolic in the park of Mr. Nicholas Pelham at Laughton, April 30, 1541; and one of the park keepers was mortally wounded in a scuffle. The whole poaching party was, apparently under pressure from the king, prosecuted for murder, and Lord Dacre and three of his companions were condemned to death.

Fierabras (fē-ā-rā-brā'). [From L. ferum, iron, as in the name Bras-de-Fer; in English, Sir Ferumbras.] One of the paladins of Charlemagne. He gave his name to the most popular of the French Charlemagne romances. It remains in a Provençal version and a French version, in two MSS. of the 14th century and two of the 15th. A prose version of it was printed at Geneva in 1478, and Caxton's "Lyf of the Noble and Crysten Prynce, Charles the Grete," printed in 1485, was a translation from that French prose version of Fierabras. M. Gaston Paris has pointed out that Fierabras is an expansion of an earlier poem, "Balan," with the scene of action changed to Spain, and with improvements in the story. The poem of "Balan" appears in English as the romance of "The Sowdon of Babylon." "Sir Ferumbras" is a translation from the later "Fierabras, the work of an ecclesiastic of Exeter, after 1077" (Morley, Eng. Writers, VI, 67).

Fierabras. An opera by Franz Schubert, composed in 1823, but never produced. It is said to contain his best work.

Fieschi (fē-es'kē), Joseph Marie. Born at Murato, Corsica, Dec. 3, 1790; executed at Paris, Feb. 16, 1836. A Corsican adventurer who made an attempt on the life of Louis Philippe, July 28, 1835.

Fiesco (fē-es'kō). A tragedy by Schiller, published in 1783.

Fiesco, Giovanni Luigi, Count of Lavagna. Born at Genoa about 1524; drowned at Genoa, Jan. 2, 1547. A Genoese noble, a leading conspirator against Andrea Doria, Jan., 1547. He is the subject of the tragedy "Fiesco," by Schiller, 1783.

Fiesole (fē-ā'sō-le). A small town in the province of Florence, Italy, 4 miles northeast of Florence; the ancient Fiesule. It has straw-plaiting industries. An old Etruscan city, it contains Etruscan and Roman antiquities. It was the headquarters of Catiline 63-62 B. C., and was the scene of the victory of Stilicho over the Teutonic invaders under Radagais about 406. La Badia, a monastery, designed by Brunelleschi, finished in 1466, is one of the most beautiful monastic foundations of the Renaissance. There are two most graceful cloisters, each in two arched tiers. The church is in large part the original Romanesque structure, with a dome at the crossing, a cradle-vault, and delicate sculpture and painted incrustation. The Roman theater is in excellent preservation. The semicircular cavea has over 20 tiers of seats in position, in part rock-hewn, with several radial stairways, vaulted substructions, and fine entrance-arches at the wings. The diameter is 220 feet, that of the orchestra 69. The cathedral was founded in 1028, and altered in the 13th century. There are 3 naves, divided by 14 antique columns of different sizes and orders, and a transept with domed crossing. Structure and ornament are closely similar to those of San Miniato, Florence. The Salutati Chapel contains a beautiful relief and a bust by Mino da Fiesole (1466).

Fiesole, Giovanni Angelico da, generally called Fra Angelico (real name Guido, or Guidolino da Pietro, called Giovanni on taking orders). Born at Vecchio, in the province of Mugello, Italy, 1387; died near Rome, March 18 (?), 1455. A celebrated Italian painter of religious subjects. He seems to have been early impressed by the Miniaturists. In 1407 he entered, with his brother Benedetto, a miniaturist, the Dominican convent in Fiesole. From 1409 to 1418 he lived at Foligno and Cortona; from 1418 to 1436 at Fiesole; from 1436 to 1445 at Florence (in the convent of San Marco); and from 1445 to 1455 at Rome. His most important works are the frescoes at Orvieto (1447), and the decoration of the Chapel of the Saint-Sacrament in the Vatican. The Florentine period was most productive of easel-pictures, which include the "Coronation of the Virgin" now in the Louvre, the same subject (a favorite one) now in the Fitz, a "Last Judgment," etc. He is especially celebrated for the spirituality and mystical charm of his saints and angels. The monastery of San Marco, now the Museo di San Marco, was decorated by Fra Angelico and his pupils, and some of his best frescoes are there.

Fiévée (fyā-vā'), Joseph. Born at Paris, April 8, 1767; died at Paris, May 7, 1839. A French journalist, novelist, and (royalist) political writer. He wrote the romances "La dot de Suzette" (1798) and "Frédérie" (1799).

Fifth Monarchy Men. A sect of millenarians of the time of Cromwell, differing from other Second-Adventists in believing not only in a literal second coming of Christ, but also that it was their duty to inaugurate this kingdom by force. This kingdom was to be the fifth and last in the series of which those of Assyria, Persia, Greece, and Rome were the preceding four; hence their self-assumed title. They unsuccessfully attempted risings against the government in 1657 and 1661.

Figaro (fē'gā-rō). A character introduced by Beaumarchais in his plays "Le barbier de Seville," "Le mariage de Figaro," and "La mère coupable": used later by Mozart, Paisiello, and Rossini in operas. In the "Barbier" he is a barber; in the "Mariage" he is a valet. In both he is gay, lively, and courageous; his stratagems are always original, his lies witty, and his shrewdness proverbial. He is a type of intrigue, adroitness, and versatility. In the "Mère coupable" he has become virtuous and has lost his verve. He also appears in Holcroft's "Follies of a Day," taken from Beaumarchais's "Mariage de Figaro."

Figaro, Le. A satirical Parisian journal, founded in 1826, discontinued in 1833, and refounded by Villemessant in 1854.

Finl. See Masolino.

Finiguerra (fē-nē-gwer'rā), Maso. Lived in the middle of the 15th century. A Florentine goldsmith and worker in niello, the reputed inventor of copperplate engraving.

The introduction of copper-plate printing is attributed to Maso Finiguerra, a goldsmith of Florence, who is supposed to have made his first print about the year 1452. It cannot be proved that Finiguerra was the inventor, for prints by this method were made in Germany as early as 1446. De Finne, Invention of Printing, p. 27.

Finistère (fin-is-tār'). [ML. finis terræ, end of the land.] The westernmost department of France, capital Quimper, bounded by the English Channel on the north, Côtes-du-Nord and Morbihan on the east, and the Atlantic Ocean on the south and west: part of the ancient Brittany. He published "Lectures on Revivals" (1835), "Lectures to Professing Christians" (1836), "Sermons" (1839), "Theology" (1846).

Finns (finz). [Also Fins; ME. Finnes, AS. Finnas, Icel. Finnar, Sw. Dan. Finnar, ML. Fenni, perhaps identical with L. Finni, Gr. Φίννοι, the name of an obscure northern tribe mentioned by Tacitus and Ptolemy.] The natives of Finland; the Finlanders; specifically, that branch of the Finnic race which inhabits Finland and other parts of northwestern Russia. They call themselves Suomi or Suomalaiset.

The Finnish branch of the Mongolian race to which the Laps, Fins, Esths, and Livonians belong possessed probably in past ages a large part of Northern Europe, and was driven out more and more by the immigrations of Germanic tribes, or became mixed with them. Tacitus already mentions the Fins in his Germania, but he could only obtain obscure reports about their mira fertas. The nation of the Fins is the principal stem of this branch.

La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 302.

Finsbury (finz'ber-i). A district of London lying north of the Thames. As a parliamentary borough it is bounded by St. Pancras on the west, Islington on the north, Shoreditch on the east, and the City and Strand on the south, and consists of three distinct constituencies—Central, Holborn, and East. The district was once the great prebendal manor of Holywell, and was leased by its incumbent in 1315 to the mayor and community of the city for an annual rent of 20 shillings; this lease ran out in 1867. Loftie.

In 1498 all the gardens which had continued time out of mind without Moorgate, to wit, about and beyond the lordship of Finsbury, were destroyed, and of them was made a plain field to shoot in. It was called Finsbury field, in which there were three windmills, and here they usually shoot at twelve score. (Stow, 1633, p. 913.) In Jonson's time this was the usual resort of the plainer citizens. People of fashion, or who aspired to be thought so, probably mixed but little in those parties; and hence we may account for the indignation of Master Stephen at being suspected of such vulgarity. An idea of a similar kind occurs in Shakspeare: "As if thou never walk'dst further than Finsbury." Henry IV. First Part, act iii, sc. 2. Gifford, Note to Jonson's "Every Man in his Humour," p. 4.

Finsbury Park. A London park of about 120 acres, laid out on the old grounds of Hornsey Wood House.

Fiote (fyō'te). The Kongo language.

Firbolgs. One of the earliest races of Ireland, in the legendary history of the country.

In Ireland there were the same two races, which are graphically described by McFiris in his Book of Genealogies. One race, which he calls the Fir-Bolg, had dark hair and eyes, small stature and slender limbs, and constituted the despised servile class of the Irish people. They belong, says Mr. Skene, "to the same class with the Silures, and may be held to represent the Iberian race which preceded the Celtic." The other race, called the Tuatha De Danann by McFiris, was tall, with golden or red hair, fair skin, and blue or blue-grey eyes. Taylor, Aryans, p. 78.

Firdausi, Firdusi, etc. See Abul Kasim Mansur.

He was educated at Worms, and subsequently traveled extensively. In 1574 he was made doctor of law at Basel, and afterward lived in Strasburg, Spire, and Forbach. He was a voluminous writer, and, after Luther, the most prominent and powerful advocate of Protestantism. In 1572 appeared a verified history of "Till Eulenspiegel," "Aller Praktik Grossmutter" ("The Grandmother of all Prognostication"), a satire on the prophetic calendars of the day, and "Claus Narr." In 1573 appeared "Flohatz" ("Flea-hunt"), a comic poem. In 1575 appeared his principal work, an imitation of Rabelais's "Gargantua," "Auffentherliche, Naupengeheurliche Geschicklitterung." The following year appeared the narrative poem "Gluckhaft Schiff" ("Fortunate Ship"). His "Podagmatische Trostbüchlein" ("Book of Comfort in Gout") dates from 1577. "Elzchtbüchlein" ("Marriage Book") from 1578. His polemic writings were first in Latin and in German. In the vernacular are "Bienenkorb" ("Beehive," 1579), directed against the Church of Rome, and "Jesuiterbüchlein" ("Jesuit Hat," 1580), against the Jesuits. He also wrote a number of psalms and hymns.

He graduated at Cambridge (B. A. 1487), and became vice-chancellor of the university in 1501, and professor of divinity in 1503. He was elected chancellor of the university in 1504 (and repeatedly reelected), and became bishop of Rochester in Oct. of the same year. From 1505 to 1508 he was president of Queens' College. He was one of the most prominent supporters of the new learning, and a friend of Erasmus (who visited Cambridge at his invitation); but was hostile to the Reformation. He opposed the doctrine of royal supremacy and the divorce of Henry VIII., and was the confessor and chief adviser of Queen Catharine. He was duped by the Nun of Kent (see Burton, Elizabeth), and was condemned to imprisonment and forfeiture of goods, but escaped with a fine of £300. His refusal to comply with the Act of Succession and the Act of Supremacy led to his conviction of treason and his execution.

Fisher, John. Born at Hampton, England, 1748; died at London, May 8, 1825. An English divine, appointed bishop of Exeter in 1803 and of Salisbury in 1807.

guardians of King Edward VI.; and filled important offices (though several times in disgrace) under Elizabeth, to whose hand he at one time aspired.

Fitzalan, Richard. Born 1307 (?); died 1376. An English soldier and statesman, Earl of Arundel and Warrene. He played a conspicuous part in the wars of Edward III., and in the politics of that reign. At Crécy he commanded the second division of the English army.

Fitzalan, Richard. Born 1346; died 1397. An English naval and military commander, Earl of Arundel and Surrey. On March 24, 1387, he, with Nottingham, defeated a Spanish, Flemish, and French fleet off Margate, and captured nearly 100 vessels laden with wine. He was one of the most prominent of the enemies of Richard II., and conspired against him. He was arrested by the king, was convicted of treason, and was decapitated on Tower Hill. He was revered by the people as a martyr.

Fitzalan, Thomas. Born 1381; died Oct. 13, 1415. An English soldier and statesman, Earl of Arundel and Surrey. He was conspicuous as a supporter of the throne in the wars and the politics of the reigns of Henry IV. and Henry V.

Fitzdottrel (fits-dot'rel). In Ben Jonson's "The Devil is an Ass," a simple but conceited Norfolk squire. He develops into an impostor. The name alludes to the foolishness of the dotterel.

Fitzdottrel is one of those characters which Jonson delighted to draw, and in which he stood unrivalled, a gull, i. e., a confident coxcomb, selfish, cunning, and conceited. Gifford, Notes to "The Devil is an Ass."

Fitzgerald (fits-je'r'ald), Lord Edward. Born at Carton Castle, near Dublin, Oct. 15, 1763; died in prison at Dublin, June 4, 1798. An Irish politician and revolutionist, fifth son of the first Duke of Leinster. He served in the army in Ireland and in 1781 in America, and was wounded at the battle of Eutaw Springs. Later he served in New Brunswick; went to Detroit, where he was admitted into the Bear tribe; and descended the Mississippi to New Orleans. He returned to England; was removed from the army for attending a revolutionary banquet; and joined the United Irishmen, in whose treasonable conspiracy he took a leading part. He was arrested, and died from a wound inflicted by one of his captors.

Fitzgerald, Lady Edward. Born at Fogo Island, Newfoundland, about 1776; died at Paris, Nov., 1831. The wife of Lord Edward Fitzgerald, whom she married in 1792. Though, according to general report, she was the daughter of Madame de Genlis and the Duke of Orleans (Philippe "Egalité"), it appears that her parents' name was Sims, and that she was sent to Paris in 1782 as a companion to the children of the duke. She was married under the name of Anne Stéphanie Caroline Sims, but is best known by her pet name "Famela."

Fitzgerald, Edward. Born at Bredfield House, near Woodbridge, Suffolk, March 31, 1809; died at Merton, Norfolk, June 14, 1883. An English poet and translator. He published "Euphrasia: a Dialogue on Youth" (1851), "Polonius: a Collection of Wise Saws and Modern Instances" (1852), a translation of six dramas of Calderon (1853), a translation of the "Quatrains" of Omar Khayyám (1859; his most celebrated work), and other translations.

Fitzgerald, Lady Elizabeth, surnamed "The Fair Geraldine." Born at Maynooth, Ireland, 1528 (?); died 1589. The youngest daughter of the ninth Earl of Kildare. To her Henry Howard, earl of Surrey, addressed a series of songs and sonnets, first published in Tottel's "Miscellany" in 1557. She married, when about fifteen years old, Sir Anthony Browne, who died in 1548, and about 1552 the Earl of Lincoln (Edward Fiennes de Clinton).

Fitzgerald, Katherine, Countess of Desmond. Died 1604. The second wife of Thomas Fitzgerald, twelfth Earl of Desmond, noted for her great age. According to tradition she lived to be about 140 years old, and she was probably upward of 104 when she died.

Fitzgerald, Thomas, tenth Earl of Kildare. Born 1513; executed at Tyburn, Feb. 3, 1537. An Irish nobleman, put to death for treason. On the report that his father, the ninth Earl of Kildare, had been executed in the Tower, he renounced his allegiance and headed an unsuccessful rebellion.

Fitzgerald, William. Born at Lifford, Limerick, Ireland, Dec. 3, 1814; died at Killaloe, Nov. 24, 1883. An Irish divine, professor at Trinity College, Dublin, 1847-57, bishop of Cork 1857-62, and bishop of Killaloe 1862-83. He published numerous works, including an edition of Butler's "Analogy" (1849).

Fitzgerald, William Thomas. Born in England, of Irish parentage, about 1759; died at Paddington, a suburb of London, July 9, 1829. A British poet, now known chiefly from a reference to him in Byron's "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers."

Fitzgibbon (fits-gib'on), John, Earl of Clare. Born near Donnybrook, Ireland, 1749; died Jan. 28, 1802. A British jurist, appointed lord chancellor of Ireland in 1789, and created earl of Clare in 1795. He was also made (1799) a peer of Great Britain as Baron Fitzgibbon. He played an important part in Irish politics.

Fitzherbert, Mrs. (Maria Anne Smythe). Born at Bambridge, Hampshire, England, July, 1756; died at Brighton, March 29, 1837. Wife of George IV. of England. She married Edward Weld in 1775, and was left a widow in the same year; married Thomas Fitzherbert (died 1781) in 1778; and became the wife of the Prince of Wales (George IV.) Dec. 21, 1785. The marriage to the prince was invalid; but she maintained her connection with him, with the consent of her church (Roman Catholic), even after his marriage with Caroline of Brunswick.

Fitzherbert, Thomas. Born at Swynnerton, Staffordshire, 1552; died at Rome, Aug. 17, 1640. An English Jesuit, rector of the English College at Rome 1618-39. He published a number of controversial works.

Fitzherbert, William. Died 1154. An English prelate, elected archbishop of York in 1142. He was canonized by Pope Honorius in 1227.

Fitzjames (fits-jámz'), James, Duke of Berwick. Born at Moulins, France, Aug. 21, 1670; died at Philippsburg, June 12, 1734. A noted soldier, illegitimate son of James, duke of York (James II.), and Arabella Churchill, sister of the Duke of Marlborough. He was educated in France. In 1687 he was created duke of Berwick; later served under the Duke of Lorraine in Hungary; was made governor of Portsmouth; and in 1688 fled with his father to France. He promoted the attempt to replace James on the throne by a descent on Ireland; was present at the battle of the Boyne; and became commander-in-chief of the king's forces in Ireland. In 1691 he joined the French army, in which he rose to the rank of marshal, becoming a French subject in order to secure this promotion. He fought in Flanders, under Bouffiers, in 1702; commanded the French army in Spain in 1704; captured Nice in 1706; and defeated the allied English and Portuguese at Almanza in 1707. He was killed at the siege of Philippsburg.

Fitzosbern (fits-oz' bérn), William. Died 1071. A Norman noble, a friend and prominent supporter of William the Conqueror, created by him earl of Hereford. He was one of the chief promoters of the Conquest, fought at the battle of Hastings, and acted as viceroy during the absence of William. He was killed at the battle of Cassel in 1071.

He became a member of Parliament in 1774; served in the war of the American Revolution 1777-78; became chief secretary for Ireland in 1782; and was appointed secretary at war 1783. He was one of the authors of the "Rolliad."

Fitzroy (fits-roí'), Augustus Henry, third Duke of Grafton. Born Oct. 1, 1735; died at Euston Hall, Suffolk, March 14, 1811. An English statesman. He was secretary of state for the northern department, July, 1765-May, 1766, and became first lord of the treasury in the administration of Pitt in July, 1766. As a result of Pitt's illness, Grafton was the head of the ministry after Sept., 1767. He resigned in Jan., 1770.

Fitzroy, Henry, first Duke of Grafton. Born Sept. 20, 1663; died Oct. 9, 1690. An illegitimate son of Charles II. of England, by Barbara Villiers, countess of Castlemain. He obtained considerable distinction as a soldier, and was mortally wounded in the attack on Cork under Marlborough.

Fitzroy, Robert. Born at Ampton Hall, Suffolk, July 5, 1805; died at London, April 30, 1865. A British naval officer. From 1828 to 1830, and again from 1831 to 1836, he commanded the Beagle in extended surveys of the South American coast and in the circumnavigation of the globe. During the second trip Charles Robert Darwin accompanied him as naturalist. The Geographical Society awarded him its gold medal to Fitzroy in 1837. In 1839 he published "Narrative of the Surveying Voyages of H. M. ships Adventure and Beagle," in 3 vols. (the third by Darwin). He was governor of New Zealand 1843-45, and superintendent of the Woolwich dockyard 1848-49, and held other important posts. Several well-known works on navigation and meteorology were published by him, and he is regarded as the founder of the modern meteorological service. Pressure of work connected with his duties as chief of the meteorological service of the Board of Trade caused his mind to give way, and he committed suicide.

Fitzstephen (fits-sté' ven), William. Died about 1190. A clerk, friend, and biographer of Thomas Becket. His "Vita Sancti Thomae" was first printed in 1723 (in Sparkes's "Historiae Anglicanae Scriptores").

Flaccus, Caius Valerius. A Roman poet of the time of Vespasian, author of a heroic poem, "Argonautica" (8 books), a free imitation of Apollonius of Rhodes.

Flaccus, Quintus Horatius. See Horace.

Flacius (flā'shi-us) (Latinized from Vlacich), Matthias, surnamed Illyricus ('the Illyrian'). Born at Albona, Istria, March 3, 1520; died at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, March 11, 1575. A noted German Protestant scholar and controversialist. He was a pupil of Luther at Wittenberg, and was professor of Hebrew there 1544-49, when he withdrew on account of his opposition to the Augsburg and Leipzig Interims. In 1558 he was appointed to a professorship at Jena, but was deprived of his office in 1561 on a charge of Manichæism. He was the principal collaborator on the "Centurie Magdeburgenses" (Basel, 1559-74), the first history of the church written from the Protestant point of view. His plan was conceived by him. He also wrote the "Javis scriptura sacre" (1567), which forms the basis of biblical hermeneutics.

Flacourt (flā-kör'), Étienne de. Born at Orléans, France, 1607; died at sea, June 10, 1660. A French governor of Madagascar 1648-55. He published "Histoire de la grande île Madagascar" (1658; second, enlarged edition 1661), "Dictionnaire de la langue de Madagascar" (1658).

Flagellants (flaj'e-lants). [From L. flagellare, whip, scourge.] A body of religious persons who believed that by whipping and scourging themselves for religious discipline they could appease the divine wrath against their sins and the sins of the age. An association of flagellants founded about 1200 spread throughout Europe, its members marching in processions, publicly scourging their own bare bodies till the blood ran. Having by these practices given rise to great disorders, they were suppressed; but the same scenes were repeated on a larger scale in 1348 and several subsequent years, in consequence of the desolating plague called the "black death." These flagellants claimed for their scourgings the virtue of all the sacraments, and promulgated other heresies. There have been also fraternities of flagellants authorized by the Roman Catholic Church. Some flagellants have held doctrines opposed to the Roman Catholic Church, and approximating those of Protestantism.

Flagellum Dei (flā-jel'um dē'i). [L., 'scourge of God.'] A surname of Attila. See the extract.

This title, "Flagellum Dei," occurs with most wearisome frequency in the medieval stories about Attila; and wherever we meet with it, we have a sure indication that we are off the ground of contemporaneous and authentic history, and have entered the cloud-land of ecclesiastical mythology. Later and wilder developments in this direction attributed to him the title of "grandson of Nimrod, nurtured in Engedi, by the grace of God King of Huns, Goths, Danes, and Medes, the terror of the world." There may have been a tendency, as Mr. Herbert thinks, to identify him with the Anti-Christ of the Scriptures, but this is not proved, and is scarcely in accordance with the theological idea of Anti-Christ, who is generally placed in the future or in the present rather than in the past.

Hootgkin, Italy and her Invaders, II. 106.

Flaget (flā-zhā'), Benedict Joseph. Born at Contourant, Auvergne, France, Nov. 7, 1763; died at Nazareth, Ky., Feb. 11, 1850. A French-American bishop of the Roman Catholic Church. He emigrated to America in 1792, and was consecrated bishop of Bardstown, Kentucky, in 1810. The seat of his diocese was removed from Bardstown to Louisville in 1811.

Flagg (flag), Wilson. Born at Beverley, Mass., Nov. 5, 1805; died at North Cambridge, Mass., May 6, 1884. An American naturalist. He wrote "Birds and Seasons of New England" (1874), etc.

Flagon (flag'on), Moll. In Burgoyne's comic opera "The Lord of the Manor," a low camp-follower. The part was first played by Dicky Suett. Liston also played it, the character not being one that could be played by a woman. Genest says that Burgoyne took it from Steele's Kate Matchlock in "The Funeral."

Flahaut (flā-ō'), Comtesse de. See Souza-Botelho.

Flahaut de la Billarderie (flā-ō' dé là bē-yārd-rē'), Comte Auguste Charles de. Born at Paris, April 21, 1785; died there, Sept. 1, 1870. A French general and diplomatist. He was made general of brigade and aide-de-camp to Napoleon I. in 1813, and served with distinction at the battles of Leipzig, Hanau, and Waterloo. He was appointed minister plenipotentiary to Berlin in 1831, and was ambassador to Vienna 1841-48. He was made senator in 1853.

Flambard (flam'bārd), Rannulf or Ralph. Died Sept. 5, 1128. A Norman bishop of Durham and justiciar, the chief minister of William Rufus. He was held to be responsible for most of the iniquities of that reign.

Flamborough (flam'bur-ō). In Goldsmith's "Vicar of Wakefield," the name of a farmer and his family.

Flamborough Head. A headland on the coast of Yorkshire, England, in lat. 54° 6' 58' N., long. 0° 4' 51' W. (lighthouse). It rises to a height of 450 feet.

Flameng (flā-māng'), François. Born at Paris in 1859. A French historical painter, son of Léopold Flameng the engraver. He was a pupil of Cabanel, E. Hédonin, and Jean Paul Laurens. His picture "The Girondins Summoned" took a prize in the Salon of 1879.

Flameng, Léopold. Born at Brussels, Nov. 22, 1831. A noted French engraver. He was born of French parents, and went to France in 1858. He has exhibited at the Salon since 1859, and has engraved or etched many of the best pictures of Rembrandt, Murillo, Rubens, Leonardo da Vinci, Scheffer, Bida, Cabanel, Gainsborough, Toulmonche, Munkaczey, and others.

Flameng, Marie Auguste. Born at Metz, July 17, 1843; died at Paris, 1893. A French painter. He was a pupil of Dubufe, Mazerolle, Pavis de Chavannes, E. Delaunay, and others.

Flamineo (fla-min'ē-ō). In Webster's tragedy "The White Devil," the brother of Vittoria Corombona, the "white devil." He is an incarnation of selfish depravity: the most beautiful and poetic ideas and words in the play are nevertheless put in his mouth.

Flaminia (flā-mē'nō-ā). A province of Italy, near the Flaminian Way, in the division of the country under the later Roman Empire.

Flaminian Way (flā-min'ī-an wā), or Via Flaminia (vī'ā flā-min'ī-ā). One of the oldest and most famous highways of ancient Rome. It extended in a direct line from Rome to Ariminum (Rimini), and was built by the censor Caius Flaminius in 220 B. C. Its superintendence was held to be so honorable an office that Augustus himself assumed it in 27 B. C., as Julius Caesar had been curator of the Apian Way. Augustus restored it through its entire extent, in commemoration of which triumphal arches were erected to him over the road at Ariminum and at Rome; the arch at the former place still exists. Much of the old pavement survives, together with many tombs by the roadside.

Flamininus (flā-mī-nī'nus), Titus Quintus. Born about 230 B. C.; died about 174 B. C. A Roman general and statesman. He was consul in 198, defeated Philip V. of Macedonia at Cynoscephale in 197, and proclaimed at Corinth the freedom of Greece in 196.

Flaminius (flā-min'ī-us). Servant to Timon in Shakspeare's "Timon of Athens."

Flaminius, Caius. Died 217 B. C. A Roman general and politician. He was tribune of the people in 232, in which year he procured the passage of a law distributing the Ager Gallicus Picenus among the plebeians. He pacified the Insubres while consul in 223, and while censor in 220 constructed two celebrated public works which bore his name: the Circus Flaminius and the Via Flaminia. During his second consulate he was totally defeated by Hannibal at Lake Trasimene in 217, and fell in the battle.

Flaminus, Caius. A Roman general, son of Caius Flaminius. He was elected pretor in 103 B. C., and obtained Hispania Citerior as his province. After having subdued the Trinates and the Apunni, two Ligurian tribes, he employed his soldiers in the construction of a military road from Bononia to Arretium.

Flammariou (flā-mī-rō-ān'), Camille. Born at Montigny-le-Roi, Haute-Marne, France, Feb. 25, 1842. A noted French astronomer. In 1852 he took charge of an observatory at Juvisy, near Paris. He has written "La pluralité des mondes habités" (1862), "Les mondes imaginaires et les mondes réels" (1864), "Les merveilles célestes" (1865), "Catalogue des étoiles doubles et multiples en mouvement" (1875), "Astronomie populaire" (1880), "Les étoiles, etc." (1883), "Le monde avant la création de l'homme" (1886), "Uranie" (1889), etc.

Flammock's Rebellion. A rebellion which broke out in Cornwall, England, under Thomas Flammock in 1497, occasioned by the imposition of a tax to defray the cost of a Scottish war. The insurgents marched on London, but were defeated at Blackheath June 17, 1497. Their leaders, including Flammock, were executed June 28.

Flamsteed (flam'stēd), John. Born at Denby, near Derby, England, Aug. 19, 1646; died at Greenwich, Dec. 31, 1719. A famous English astronomer, appointed the first astronomer royal March 4, 1675. He is especially noted for the importance of his observations, many of which were turned to account by Newton. He became a bitter enemy of Newton.

Flamsteed's "British Catalogue" is styled by Baily "one of the proudest productions of the Royal Observatory at Greenwich." Its importance is due to its being the first collection of the kind made with the telescope and the clock. Its value was necessarily impaired by defective reduction, and Flamsteed's neglect of Newton's advice to note the state of the barometer and thermometer at the time of his observations rendered it hopeless to attempt to reduce from them improved results by modern processes of correction. The catalogue showed besides defects attributable to the absence of the author's final revision. Sir William Herschel detected errors so numerous as to suggest the need of an index to the original observations printed in the second volume of the "Historia Cælestis." Miss Herschel undertook the task, and showed, by recomputing the place of each star, that Flamsteed had catalogued 111 stars which he had never observed, and observed 569 which he had not catalogued ("Phil. Trans.," LXXXVII, 203). Her catalogue of these omitted stars was published by order of the Royal Society in 1798; they were by Baily in 1829 arranged in order of right ascension, and identified (all but seventy) by comparison with later catalogues ("Memoirs Royal Astr. Soc.," IV, 129). Dict. Nat. Biog.

Flanders (flan'dērz). [ME, Flandres, Flann-deres, Flandres, F. Flandre, G. Flandern, ML. Flaudria, D. Vlaanderen, Flem. Vlaanderen.] An ancient country of Europe, extending along the North Sea from the Strait of Dover to the mouth of the Schelde, and corresponding to parts of the present departments of Nord and Pas-de-Calais, France, the provinces of East and West Flanders, Belgium, and the southern part of the province of Zealand, Netherlands. It formed part of Neustria by the peace of Verdun (843). Baldwin became the first count of Flanders in 862. Flemish cities became very important in the middle ages, and the citizens maintained a long struggle against French influence under Jacob and Philip van Artevelde and other leaders. The country was united to Burgundy in 1384 through the marriage of Philip of Burgundy to Margaret of Flanders. It passed in 1477 to Austria through the marriage of Maximilian to Mary of Burgundy. In 1529 it was freed from homage to France. Part of it passed to Holland in 1648, and part was acquired by France in 1659, 1668, 1678, and 1713. The remainder followed the fortunes of the Austrian Netherlands, and in the new kingdom of Belgium forms the provinces of East and West Flanders.

Flanders, East. A province of Belgium, bounded by the Netherlands on the north, Antwerp and Brabant on the east, Hainaut on the south, and west Flanders on the west. It is noted for its development of agriculture and manufactures. Area, 1,158 square miles. Population (1834), 670,398.

Flanders, French. A former province of France, corresponding generally to the modern department of Nord.

Flanders, Henry. Born at Plainfield, N. H., 1826. An American legal writer. He has practised law in Philadelphia since 1850. He has published "Lives of the Chief Justices of the Supreme Court of the United States" (1855-58), and an "Exposition of the Constitution of the United States" (1860).

Flanders, Moll. See Fortunes of Moll Flanders.

Flanders, West. A province of Belgium, bounded by the North Sea on the northwest, the Netherlands and East Flanders on the east, Hainaut on the southeast, and France on the south and southwest. Area, 1,249 square miles. Population (1894), 755,349.

Flandin (flān-dān'), Eugène Napoléon. Born at Naples, Aug. 15, 1809; died 1876. A French archaeologist and painter. He wrote "Études sur la sculpture perse," "Relation du voyage en Perse" (1843-54), "Monuments de Ninive" (1846-50), "L'Orient" (1856-64), etc.

Flandrin (flān-dran'), Jean Hippolyte. Born at Lyons, France, March 23, 1809; died at Rome, March 21, 1864. A French historical painter, a pupil of Ingres. He is best known for his decorative paintings in the churches of St.-Germain-des-Prés and St.-Vincent-de-Paul in Paris.

Flandrin, Jean Paul. Born at Lyons, May 8, 1811. A French landscape-painter, brother of J. H. Flandrin. He is a representative of the school of French classical landscape-painting.

Flannen (flan'en) Islands, or The Seven Hunters. A group of uninhabited islets west of Lewis in the Hebrides, Scotland.

Flash (flash), Captain. In Garriek's play "Miss in her Teens," a cowardly braggart.

Flash, Sir Petronel. In Chapman, Marston, and Jonson's comedy "Eastward Hoe," a knight adventurer. He is eager to escape from town to the untried land of Virginia.

Flatbush. See Kitnanhan.

Flatbush (flat'bush). A town in Kings County, Long Island, New York, contiguous to Brooklyn on the southeast. It was the scene of part of the battle of Long Island, Aug. 27, 1776. Population (1800), 12,338. Annexed to Brooklyn in 1894.

Flateyjarbók (flät'y-jiir-bök). [ON., 'book of Flatey.'] An Icelandic manuscript, named from the island Flatey off the northern coast of Iceland, where it was owned in the 17th century. It contains a collection of sagas bearing upon the lives and times of the Norwegian kings Olaf Trygvason and Olaf the Saint: at the end are annals down to the year 1394. It is the most extensive of Icelandic MSS., and one of the principal sources of information concerning the discovery of America by the Norsemen. It was written between the years 1380 and 1395 by two Icelandic priests. In 1662 it came as a present from Bishop Brynjulf of Iceland to King Frederick III. of Denmark. It is preserved in the Royal Library in Copenhagen.

Flathead (flat'hed) Lake, or Selish (sē'lish) Lake. A lake in Missoula County, Montana, about lat. 48° N., long. 114° 15' W. Its outlet falls into Clarke's Fork. Length, about 30 miles.

Flatheads. See Choctaws and Salishan.

Flattery (flät'er-ī), Cape. A cape in the northwestern part of Washington, projecting into the Pacific Ocean in lat. 48° 23' 20" N., long. 124° 44' 30" W. (lighthouse).

Flaubert (flō-bär'), Gustave. Born at Rouen, Dec. 12, 1821; died at Croisset, near Rouen, May 8, 1880. A French writer and novelist. He is regarded as the master of naturalism. He traveled in Brittany, Greece, Syria, Egypt, etc., and undertook to relate his travels, but went no further than an opening paper entitled "A bord de la Cange." In 1857 he published in "La Revue de Paris" the novel "Madame Bovary," and in "L'Artiste" "La tentation de Saint Antoine." The former gave rise to considerable litigation, Flaubert being ultimately cleared of a charge of immorality in literature. In 1858 he visited the site of ancient Carthage, and in 1862 published "Salammbo." This was followed in 1869 by "L'Éducation sentimentale, roman d'un jeune homme," and in 1877 by "Trois contes." Flaubert's plays, "Le Candidat" and "Le château des fleurs," were failures; they were published after his death in "La Vie Moderne" (1885). His other posthumous publications are "Bonvard et Pérouchet" (in "La Revue Politique et Littéraire"), "Lettres à George Sand" (1884), "Par les champs et par les grèves," reminiscences of Brittany in "Le Gaulois," an essay on Rabelais, a voluminous correspondence, etc.

Flauto Magico, II. See Zauberflöte.

Flavel (flav'el), John. Born at Bromsgrove, Worcestershire, England, about 1630; died at Exeter, June 26, 1691. An English Presbyterian clergyman and devotional writer. His best-known work is "Husbandry Spiritualized" (1669).

Flavian (flā'vi-an), L. Flavianus (flā-vi-ā'nus), of Antioch. 1. Died 404 A. D. Bishop of Antioch 381-404. He was appointed by the Synod of Constantinople, which was composed exclusively of Oriental bishops, to succeed Meletius. This action perpetuated the schism which at the time divided the orthodox church at Antioch, as the bishops of Egypt and the West refused to withdraw their support from Paulinus, bishop of the opposite faction.

2. Died at Petra, Arabia, 518. Bishop of Antioch 498-512. He was deposed by the emperor Anastasius through the machinations of the Monophysite Xenias, bishop of Hierapolis, who intimidated him into anathematizing the decrees of the orthodox council held at Chalcedon in 451.

Flavian of Constantinople. Died at Hypepe, Lydia, Aug. 11, 449. Bishop of Constantinople from about 447 to 449. He procured the excommunication of the heretic Eutyches at a synod held at Constantinople in 448, but was himself deposed and excommunicated by the Eutychian party at the synod known as the Robber Synod, held at Ephesus in 449. He died a few days after, in consequence, it is said, of bodily injuries sustained at the synod. He was canonized by the Council of Chalcedon in 451.

Flavian Emperors, or Flavian Cæsars. The Roman emperors Vespasian and his sons Titus and Domitian, who belonged to the house of Flavian.

The Flavian Emperors ought, perhaps, hardly to be classed together, so little was there in common between the just, if somewhat hard, rule of Vespasian, or the two years' beneficent sway of Titus, "the delight of the human race," and the miserable tyranny of Domitian. But the stupendous Colosseum, the Arch of Titus, and the Amphitheatre at Verona serve as an architectural landmark to fix the Flavian period in the memory; and one other characteristic was necessarily shared by the whole family, the humble origin from which they sprang. After the high-born Julii and Claudii, the descendants of pontiffs and censors, noblemen delicate and fastidious through all their wild debauch of blood, came these sturdy sons of the commonality to robe themselves in the imperial purple; and this unforgettened lowness of their ancestry, while it gave a touch of meanness to the close and frugal government of Vespasian, evidently intensified the delight of Domitian in setting his plebeian feet on the necks of all that was left of refined or aristocratic in Rome.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 6.

All the more strange does it seem, when we consider the humble extraction of these Emperors, that their name should have remained for centuries the favorite title of Emperors no way allied to them in blood, a Claudius (Gothicus), a Constantine, a Theodosius, and many more having prefixed the once ignoble name of Flavius to their own. And hence, by a natural process of imitation, the barbarian rulers who settled themselves within the limits of the Roman Empire in the 4th and 5th centuries, Burgundian, Lombard, Visigoth, adopted the same mysteriously majestic fore-name, unconsciously, as we must suppose, selecting the very epithet which best described their own personal appearance, yellow-haired sons of the north as they were, among the dark-colored Mediterranean populations.

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I. 7.

Flavigny (flā-vēn-yō'), Valérien. Born near Laon, France; died at Paris, April 29, 1674. A noted French Orientalist, professor of Hebrew in the College of France.

Flavius (flā'vi-us). 1. In Shakspeare's "Julius Cæsar," a Roman tribune.—2. In Shakspeare's "Timon of Athens," the faithful steward of Timon.

Flavius, Cneius. An early writer on Roman law. He was the son of a freedman, and became secretary to Appius Claudius Cæcus. He obtained possession of the forms and technicalities pertaining to the law of practice, the knowledge of which was confined to the patricians and pontiffs, and published them in a collection known as the "Jus Flavianum." He was afterward made a senator by Appius Claudius, and was elected curule edile in 303 B. C. Also called Caius and Amnius.

Flaw (flā). In Foote's comedy "The Cozeners," one of the cozeners or cheats.

Flaxman (flaks'man), John. Born at York, England, July 6, 1755; died at London, Dec. 7, 1826. A famous sculptor and draftsman. His father was a molder, and kept a shop in Covent Garden for the sale of plaster images. By his own efforts he learned enough Greek and Latin to read the poets. At fifteen he entered the Royal Academy. In 1770 he exhibited a figure of Neptune in wax. In Aug., 1787, he went to Italy for seven years. During this period were made the illustrations of the Odyssey, and to Æschylus and Dante. He was elected associate of the Royal Academy in 1797, and full member in 1800. From this time until the end of his life he executed many works, among which one of the most celebrated is the Shield of Achilles from the description of Homer. He was appointed professor of sculpture at the Royal Academy in 1810.

Nature, so prodigal to the English race in men of genius untutored, singular, and solitary, has given us but few seers who, in the quality of prolific invention, can be compared with Flaxman. For pure conceptive faculty, controlled by unerring sense of beauty, we have to think of Phidias or Raphael before we find his equal.

Symonds, Studies of the Greek Poets, I. 177.

Fleance (flē'ans). In Shakspeare's "Macbeth," the son of Banquo. See Banquo.

Flèche (flāsh), La. A town in the department of Sarthe, France, on the Loir 29 miles north-east of Angers. It has a noted military college. Population (1891), commune, 10,249.

Fléchier (flā-shyá'), Esprit. Born at Pernes, Vaucluse, France, June 10, 1632; died at Montpellier, France, Feb. 16, 1710. A French pulpit orator, made bishop of Nîmes in 1687. He is noted especially for his funeral orations. His complete works were published in 1782.

Flecknoe (flēk'nō), Richard. Born apparently in Ireland; died about 1678. A British poet and playwright of slight merit. He furnished Dryden with the name "MacFlecknoe," under which he satirized Shadwell.

Fleece'em (flēs'm), Mrs. In Foote's play "The Cozeners," a cheat and confederate of Flaw.

Mrs. Grieve, the woman who had extorted money on pledge of procuring government appointments, and who had not only deceived Charles Fox, by pretending to be able to marry him to an heiress, but had lent him money rather than miss his chariot from her door, was fair game, and was well exposed, in Mrs. Fleece'em.

Doran, Eng. Stage, II. 126.

Flee from the Press. A short poem by Chaucer, printed before the folio of 1532. It is sometimes known as "Frith," "Balade de bone Counsel," "Good Counsel of Chaucer" (Shirley), and "Balade that Chaucer made on his beeth-bedde" ("probably a mere bad guess," Skeat).

Fleet Prison, The. An old London prison, formerly standing on the east side of the Fleet brook, where it now runs under Farringdon street. It was nearly eight hundred years old when it was destroyed in 1846. It was called the "gaol of the Fleet" in the time of Richard I., and was a debtors' prison as early as 1290. It was used also as a state prison for religious and political offenders till 1641, when it was reserved entirely for debtors. It was burned by Wat Tyler's men in 1381. In 1666 it was burned in the Great Fire, and again in 1780 by rioters. In the 17th and early part of the 18th century persons wishing to be married secretly came within the rules of the Fleet, where degraded clergymen were easily found, among the debtors, to perform the ceremony. This was stopped by act of Parliament in 1754. Attention was called to the outrageous treatment of the prisoners in 1726, when the warden was tried for murder.

Fleet street. A London street running from Ludgate Circus to the Strand and the West End. It is named from the Fleet brook. In the early chronicles of London many allusions are made to the deeds of violence done in this street. The London practices waged war against young students in the Inns of Court, etc. By the time of Elizabeth the street had become a favorite spot for shows of all descriptions: "puppet-shows and monsters" are frequently alluded to. It is now one of the busiest streets of London.

Fleet, The. [Early mod. E. and ME. Flete, the stream.] A tidal stream which flowed by the western wall of old London City. The creek took its rise in the clay beds east of the Hampstead Hills. At Battle Bridge, near King's Cross, it entered a deep valley between high clay banks, from which it did not emerge until it reached the river. In Roman times the only road from the city westward crossed the Fleet by a bridge from Snow Hill, Newgate, to Holborn Hill (high Holborn). Later another was made opposite Ludgate, and this crossing was called Fleet Bridge. The road which led to it was called Fleet street (which see). The tidal portion of the Fleet was navigable in the reign of Edward I. The brook is now a main sewer of London, and empties into the Thames at Blackfriars Bridge. The allusion to the Fleet ditch in the literature of the 16th and 17th centuries is accounted for by the fact that the water from the bed of the brook or river having been diverted from its course, the offal, etc., thrown into it was not carried off, and became a nuisance.

Fleetwood (flēt'wūd). A seaport and watering-place in Lancashire, England, situated on Morecambe Bay 36 miles due north of Liverpool. Population (1891), 9,274.

Fleetwood, Charles. Died 1692. An English Parliamentary general, lord deputy of Ireland 1654-55. He married Bridget Ireton, daughter of Oliver Cromwell and widow of Henry Ireton, in 1652.

Fleetwood, William. Born at London, Jan. 1, 1656; died at Tottenham, near London, Aug. 4, 1723. An English bishop (of St. Asaph 1708, and of Ely 1714) and pulpit orator.

Flegel (flā'gēl), Robert. Born at Wilna, Germany, Oct., 1855; died at Brass, West Africa, Sept. 11, 1886. An African explorer. In 1875 he went to Lagos as clerk in a German trading factory. When an English expedition went up the Niger and Benue rivers, he accompanied it in the Henry Venn, and took a survey of both rivers. The German-African Association commissioned him to explore Sokoto and Nupe in 1880. He proceeded overland to Loko, on the Benue; reached Yola, the capital of Adamawa, in 1882; and discovered the Ngamdore source of the Benue. In 1883 he revisited Adamawa, but failed in his attempt to reach the Kongo by that route. On his return to Germany in 1884, he urged the occupation of the Benue basin by German commerce and authority. With imperial support he undertook a third expedition to Adamawa, but the Royal Niger Company frustrated his efforts. He was recalled, and died at Brass, in 1886.

Flégère (flā-jär'). A height in the Alps of Mont Blanc, northeast of Chamonix, celebrated for its view. Height, 5,925 feet.

Fleischer (flī'sher), Heinrich Leberecht. Born at Schandau, Saxony, Feb. 21, 1801; died at Leipsic, Feb. 10, 1888. A noted German Orientalist, professor of Oriental languages at Leipsic from 1835. He published editions of Abul-feda's "Historia ante-Islamica" (1831), Beidhawi's commentary on the Koran (1844-48), "Grammatik der lebenden persischen Sprache" (founded on the grammar of Mohammed Ibrahim; 2d ed. 1875), etc.

Fleming (flēm'ing), John. Born near Bathgate, Jan. 10, 1785; died at Edinburgh, Nov. 18, 1857. A Scottish clergyman and naturalist. He was professor of natural philosophy in Aberdeen University 1834-43, and of natural science in the Free Church College, Edinburgh, from 1845. He wrote "Philosophy of Zoology" (1822), "The Temperature of the Seasons" (1851), and many scientific papers.

Fleming, Lady May. In Sir Walter Scott's novel "The Abbot," a maid of honor to Mary Queen of Scotland, imprisoned with her at Lochleven.

Fleming, Margaret. Born Jan. 15, 1803; died Dec. 19, 1811. The daughter of James Fleming of Kirkealdy, Scotland. She was the pet of Sir Walter Scott, and was a remarkably precocious child. Her diary and poems are exceedingly quaint. Her life was written by Dr. John Brown: "Pet Marjorie: a Story of Child Life Fifty Years Ago" (1858).

Fleming, Paul. Born at Hartenstein, Saxony, Oct. 5, 1609; died at Hamburg, April 2, 1640. A German poet. He studied medicine at Leipsic. The Thirty Years' War drove him to Holstein, where he soon joined an embassy of the Duke of Schleswig-Holstein to Moscow, and afterward (1635) another to Ispahan. He was above all a lyric poet, and wrote both in German and in Latin. Among his poems is the well-known hymn "In allen meinen Thaten." His collected works, which are both secular and religious in character, were published after his death under the title "Teutsche Poeniata" 1646.

Fleming, Paul. The principal character in Longfellow's prose romance "Hyperion."

Fleming, or Flemmyng, Richard. Born at Crofton, Yorkshire; died at Sleaford, Jan., 1431. An English prelate. He was bishop of Lincoln 1419, and founder of Lincoln College, Oxford, 1427.

Fleming, Rose. In Dickens's "Oliver Twist," a gentle girl who marries Harry Maylie.

Flemings (flēm'ingz). The natives of Flanders, an ancient countship now divided between Belgium, France, and the Netherlands; specifically the members of the Flemish race, nearly allied to the Dutch both in blood and in language.

Flemish (flēm'ish). The language spoken by the Flemings. The Flemish language is a form of that Low German of which the Dutch is a type. The chief external difference between Dutch and Flemish is in the spelling—the spelling of Dutch having been reformed and simplified in the present century, while Flemish retains in great part the archaic features of 16th-century spelling.

Flensburg (flēns'börg), Dan. Flensborg (flēns'börg). A seaport and commercial town in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, on the Flensburg Fjord, situated in lat. 54° 47' N., long. 9° 26' E. Population (1890), 36,444.

Flers (flār). A town in the department of Orne, France, situated in lat. 48° 44' N., long. 0° 35' W. It has cotton manufactures. Population (1891), commune, 13,860.

Fleishy School, The. A name given to a number of English poets—Swinburne, Morris, Rossetti, and others—by R. W. Buchanan in the "Contemporary Review."

Flestrin (flēs'trin), Quinbus. The Man-Mountain: the name which the Lilliputians gave to Gulliver.

Fleta (flē'tā). An anonymous Latin book on English law, written about 1290. From a statement in the one extant manuscript, that "this book may well be called Fleta because it is written in Fleta," it is inferred that it was written by a prisoner in the Fleet.

Fletcher (flēch'ēr), Andrew, of Saltoun. [The surname Fletcher means 'arrow-maker.'] Born at Saltoun, Haddingtonshire, 1655; died at London, Sept., 1716. A Scottish politician and political writer. He was a prominent member of the Scottish Parliament under Charles II. and William III.

Fletcher, Giles. Born at Watford, Hertfordshire, about 1549; died at London, March, 1611. An English civilian and poet, father of Giles (the younger) and Phineas Fletcher. He was graduated at King's College, Cambridge, of which he became a fellow in 1568. In 1588 he was sent as ambassador to Russia, and published an account of that country in 1591, which was suppressed. It was called "Of the Ruise Common Wealth, etc." It was abridged, and passages were suppressed by Hakluyt and Purchas, and reprinted as "The History of Russia, etc." (1643) and also, with the original title, for the Hakluyt Society (1856). He also wrote "Licia: Poems of Love, etc." (1593), etc.

Fletcher, Giles (the younger). Born 1588 (?):

died 1623. An English poet, younger son of Giles Fletcher. He wrote "Christ's Victorie, etc." (1610), etc.

Fletcher, James Cooley. Born at Indianapolis, 1823. An American missionary and author. From 1851 to 1865 he made several extended journeys in Brazil as a missionary, and for a time he acted as secretary of the United States legation at Rio de Janeiro. His "Brazil and the Brazilians" was first published with the joint names of D. P. Kidder and J. C. Fletcher, and was founded on the "Sketches in Brazil" of the former author; later editions bear only Fletcher's name. He was United States consul at Oporto 1869-73, and subsequently missionary to Naples. Since 1877 he has resided at Indianapolis.

Fletcher, John. Born at Rye, Sussex, England, Dec., 1519; died at London, Aug., 1625. An English dramatist and poet. He was the intimate friend and literary partner of Francis Beaumont. They wrote together from about 1606 till 1616, living together for a part of that time.

The stage tradition that Beaumont was superior in judgment to Fletcher is supported by sound criticism. In the most important plays that they wrote together Beaumont's share outweighs Fletcher's, both in quantity and in quality. Beaumont had the firmer hand and stouter manner; his diction was more solid; there was a richer music in his verse. Fletcher excelled as a master of brilliant dialogue and sprightly repartee. In the management of his plots and in the development of his characters he was careless and inconsistent. But in his comedies the unceasing liveliness and hustle atone for structural defects; and in tragedy his copious command of splendid declamation reconciles us to the absence of rarer qualities. A. H. Bullen.

To Fletcher alone may be assigned the plays "The Faithful Shepherdess" (printed about 1606), "Wit Without Money" (played not earlier than 1614, printed 1639), "Bonduca" and "Valentinian" (played before 1619, printed 1647), "The Loyal Subject" (licensed 1618, printed 1647), "The Mad Lover" (played before 1619, printed 1647), "The Humorous Lieutenant" (probably played later than 1619, printed 1647), "Women Pleas'd" (probably played about 1620, printed 1647), "The Island Princess" and "The Pilgrim" (presented at court 1621, printed 1647), "The Wild-goose Chase" (presented at court 1621, printed 1652), "Monsieur Thomas" (printed 1630), "The Woman's Prize" (played before 1633), "A Wife for a Month" (played before 1624, printed 1647), "Rule a Wife and have a Wife" (played in 1624, printed 1640), "The Chances" (played before 1625, printed 1647), To Beaumont and Fletcher, "The Woman Hater" (licensed and printed 1607), "The Scornful Lady" (played probably 1609, printed 1616), "The Maid's Tragedy" (played not later than 1611, printed 1619), "Philaster" (played not later than 1611, printed 1620), "A King and No King" (licensed 1611, printed 1619), "Four Plays in One" (played as early as 1608 (Fleay), printed 1647), "The Knight of the Burning Pestle" (written probably before 1611, printed 1613), "Cupid's Revenge" (printed in 1615; Fleay thinks Field assisted), "The Coxcomb" (played in 1613 or earlier, printed 1647), "To Fletcher and Massinger and others," "The Honest Man's Fortune" (played 1613, printed 1647; Field perhaps assisted), "The Knight of Malta" (played before 1619, printed before 1647), "Thierry and Theodoret" (written probably about 1616, printed 1621; some other author is thought to have assisted), "The Queen of Corinth" (played before 1619, printed 1647; Middleton and Rowley appear to have written some of it), "Sir John Van Olden Barnavelde" (played in 1619, printed by Bullen in his "Collection of Old English Plays" in 1882), "The little French Lawyer" (written about 1620, printed 1647), "A Very Woman" (played probably 1621, printed in 1635), "The Custom of the Country" (mentioned in 1628 as an old play, printed 1647), "The Double Marriage" and "The False One" (written about 1620, printed 1647), "Beggars Bush" (played 1622, printed 1647), "The Prophetess" and "The Sea Voyage" (licensed 1622, printed 1647), "The Elder Brother" (printed 1637), "The Lovers' Progress" (printed 1647), "The Spanish Curate" (licensed 1622, printed 1647), "Love's Pilgrimage" (printed 1647; probably nearly all by Fletcher), "The Nice Valour, or The Passionate Mad-Man" (perhaps written before 1624, printed 1647; Fleay thinks Middleton rewrote much of it), "The Laws of Candy" (printed 1647; largely by Massinger), "The Fair Maid of the Inn" (licensed 1626, printed 1647; with Rowley), "The Two Noble Kinsmen" (printed 1634, as by Fletcher and Shakspeare), Doubtful plays, "The Captain" (written before 1613, printed 1647; Fletcher had assistance, probably either Jonson or Middleton), "Wit at Several Weapons" (played about 1614, printed 1647; shows traces of Middleton and Rowley), "The Bloody Brother" (printed probably 1639; perhaps written by Fletcher and Jonson and revised by Massinger), "Love's Cure" (written probably about 1623, printed 1647; probably by Massinger and Middleton (Bullen), Beaumont and Fletcher altered by Massinger (Fleay)), "The Maid in the Mill" (played in 1623; with Rowley), "The Night-Walker, or The Little Thief" (played 1634, printed in 1640 as by Fletcher; probably an alteration by Shirley of an older play), "The Coronation" (printed in 1640 as by Fletcher, licensed in 1635 by Shirley who claimed it), "The Noble Gentleman" (licensed 1626, printed 1647; Fletcher is thought to have had no hand in it, or in "Faithful Friends"), "The Widow" (written about 1616, printed 1652; thought by Bullen to be probably wholly by Middleton). (Dict. Nat. Biog.) See Beaumont.

Fletcher (originally De la Fléchère), John William. Born at Nyon, Switzerland, Sept. 12, 1729; died at Madeley, England, Aug. 14, 1785. An English clergyman and writer. Fletcher of Madeley was a contemporary and fellow-laborer of John Wesley, and was a man of remarkable personal influence from his saintly life, his earnest preaching, and his devoted pastoral work.

Fletcher, Phineas. Born at Cranbrook, Kent, England, April, 1582; died about 1650. An English poet, son of Giles Fletcher. His chief works are "Sicelides," a pastoral play (1614, printed 1631); "The Purple Island, or the Isle of Man, together with Piscatory Ecloges and other Poetical Miscellanies" (1633); etc.

Fleuranges (flé-roinzh'), Seigneur de (Robert de la Marck). Born at Sedan, France, 1491; died at Longjumeau, near Paris, Dec., 1537. A French marshal and historian. He wrote "Histoire des choses mémorables depuis 1499 jusqu'en l'an 1521," etc.

Flippanta (fli-pan'tā). In Vanbrugh's "Confederacy," a lady's-maid. She is shameless and witty.

Flite (flit), Miss. In Dickens's "Bleak House," "a curious little old woman," deranged by long waiting for the settlement of her suit in chancery.

Floberge (flō-bärzh'). The sword of Renand de Montauban.

Flodden (flod'n). A hill in Northumberland, England, 12 miles southwest of Berwick. At its base on Sept. 9, 1513, the English (32,000) under Earl of Surrey defeated the Scots (30,000) under James IV. The loss of the English was from 3,000 to 4,000; that of the Scots is variously given as from 5,000 to 12,000. The king and many of the nobles were among the slain.

Flodoard (flō-dō-är'), or Frodoard (frō-dō-är'). Born at Épernay, France, 894; died March 28, 966. A French chronicler who was for a time keeper of the episcopal archives at Rheims. He wrote a history of the church of Rheims, and a chronicle of France from 919 to 966.

Flood (flud), Henry. Born 1732; died at Farmley, County Kilkenny, Dec. 2, 1791. An Irish orator and politician. He entered the Irish Parliament in 1759, and was soon recognized as the leader of the opposition. He joined the government forces in 1775, when he was made vice-treasurer of Ireland and given a seat in the Irish privy council. Removed from these posts in 1781, he returned to the opposition, which now followed the lead of his rival Grattan. He subsequently became a member of the English Parliament.

Flor (flōr), Roger di. Died at Adrianople, 1306 (1307?). A military adventurer. He was the second son of a German falconer in the service of the emperor Frederick II, named Robert Blum, who adopted the Italian name of Flor and married an heiress of Brindisi. He entered the order of the Temple, but was degraded from his rank for misconduct at the siege of Acre. He entered the pay of Frederick of Aragon, king of Sicily, who made him vice-admiral of Sicily, and in whose service he gained great distinction. In 1302, at the close of the long war which Frederick waged against the house of Anjou at Naples for the possession of Sicily, he induced the discharged mercenaries, mostly Catalans and Aragonese, to enter the service of the Byzantine emperor Andronicus II. against the Turks. These troops, which constituted an army of 6,000 men known as the Catalan Grand Company, arrived at Constantinople under his leadership in 1303, and in 1304 relieved Philadelphia, which was invested by the Turks. Roger married Maria, granddaughter of Andronicus II., in 1303, and in 1306 was created Caesar. He was assassinated by George, the general of the Alan mercenaries.

Flora (flō'rā). [L., from flos (flōr-), flower.] 1. In early Italian and Roman mythology, the goddess of flowers and spring. — 2. An asteroid (No. 8) discovered by Hind at London, Oct. 18, 1847.

Flora. A painting by Titian, in the Uffizi, Florence. It is a portrait of a woman, half undraped, with loosened hair, and flowers in her hand.

Flora McFlimsey. See McFlimsey.

Flora Temple (flō'rā tem'pl). A bay trotting mare, foaled in 1845, by a Kentucky hunter, dam Madame Temple. She held the world's trotting record of 2; 19 $\frac{3}{4}$ for many years.

Flordelise, or Flordelis (flōr'de-lis). The wife of Brandimart, in both Boiardo's and Ariosto's "Orlando." She searches long for him, and after his death takes up her abode in his tomb, where she lives till her own death, which soon occurs.

Flordespina (flōr-des-pē'nā), or Flordespine (flōr'des-pin). A princess in both Boiardo's and Ariosto's "Orlando." She loves Bradamant, being deceived by her armor and taking her for a knight.

Floréal (flō-rā-äl'). [Revolutionary F., from L. flos (flōr-), flower.] The name adopted by the National Convention of the first French republic for the eighth month of the year. In the years 1 to 7 it extended from April 20 to May 19 inclusive, and in the years 8 to 13 from April 21 to May 20.

Floré et Blanche fleur. An early French metrical romance of which the theme is the love of a young Christian prince for a Saracen slave-girl who has been brought up with him. She is sold into a fresh captivity to remove her from him, but he follows her and rescues her unharmed from the harem of the Emir of Babylon. (Saintsbury.) Boccaccio used the story in his prose "Il Filicopo." Konrad Fleck translated it into German. There are four English versions known, none perfect. The Early English Text Society has printed one of them. Also known as Fleur et Blanche fleur.

Florence (flōr'ens). [It. Firenze and formerly Fiorenza, F. Florence, G. Florenz, L. Florentia, flowery city, from florere, bloom, flower, flourish.] The capital of the province of Florence, Italy, situated on both sides of the Arno, at the foot of spurs of the Apennines, in lat. 43° 46' 4" N., long. 11° 15' 22" E. (observatory): called "La Bella" ("the beautiful"). It is famous for its art collections (Uffizi and Pitti Palace galleries), and the beauty of its situation and environs, and has been celebrated for centuries as the leading center of Italian literature and art. Other objects of interest are the Ponte Vecchio; the Piazza della Signoria, on which are the Palazzo Vecchio and the Loggia dei Lanzi; the national library, Piazza del Duomo, with the cathedral, baptistery, and campanile; the archaeological museum, national museum, academy of fine arts, Dante's monument, museum of San Marco; the palaces of the Strozzi, Corsini, and others; the Cascine, Boboli Gardens, and Square Michelangelo. (For the principal churches, see below.) The city was the birthplace of Dante, the residence of Boccaccio and the Humanists (Bruni, Poggio, etc.), and the scene of the labors of Cimabue, Giotto, Gaddi, Aretino, Brunelleschi, Luca della Robbia, Ghiberti, Donatello, Lippi, Ghirlandajo, Fra Angelico, Leonardo da Vinci, Raphael, Michelangelo, Andrea del Sarto, and other distinguished artists. Florence rose to prosperity in the 12th century, when the inhabitants of Fiesole removed thither, and in time became a great commercial center. It was the scene of continual struggles between the Guelphs and Ghibellines in the 13th century. It took the leading part in the Renaissance movement. The Medici family became paramount under Cosimo de' Medici in 1434, and Florence was at its height under Lorenzo de' Medici, 1469-1492, and later. Under the lead of Savonarola it was a "theocratic republic" about 1495-98. The Medici, expelled in 1494, were restored in 1512, banished in 1527, and again restored in 1530 after a siege by the emperor Charles V. In 1532 they became dukes of Florence. In 1569 the history of Florence merges in that of Tuscany, of which it was the capital. It was the capital of the kingdom of Italy 1865-71. The cathedral (duomo) of Santa Maria del Fiore, as now existing, was begun in 1298. When the base of the dome was reached (1420), the space to be covered, 138 feet in diameter, was so great that the closing of it with a dome was believed impossible; but Filippo Brunelleschi undertook it, and in 1446 completed the wonderful work which marks an epoch in architecture and is the first great triumph of the Renaissance. The dome is octagonal, slightly pointed, and surmounted by a lantern the apex of which is 387 feet above the pavement. The cathedral is 500 feet long, and 128 feet across nave and aisles. The exterior is incrustured with colored marbles inlaid and arranged in panels, the general effect of which is not good. The grouping of the dome with the pentagonal apse and transepts and intermediate members is extremely impressive. The decorative sculpture is most delicate, but too small in scale. The façade has been built since 1875. The nave is 153 feet high, the aisles 96; but there are only 4 square bays, making the proportions so bad that the effect of enormous size is lost. The cathedral has fine glass, sculptures, and paintings, and some good tombs. The Church of Santa Croce, begun in 1294 by Arnolfo, is 460 feet long and 134 wide. This is the Pantheon of Florence; among its chief tombs are those of Michelangelo and Leonardo (Bruni) Aretino. Church and cloister arc full of monuments of artistic or historic interest. Among the frescos are some of Giotto's finest works, and a fine series of the Nativity by Taddeo Gaddi. San Lorenzo is one of the earliest of Renaissance churches, begun in 1425 by Brunelleschi, and decorated in the interior in part by Michelangelo. It is famous for the monuments by Michelangelo in its Sagrestia Nuova of Giuliano and Lorenzo de' Medici. They are similar in design. Each has a seated idealized statue of the deceased in a niche above, and below a sarcophagus on which are two nude, half-reclining figures, one male and one female. The figures on the tomb of Giuliano represent Day and Night; those on that of Lorenzo, Aurora and Twilight. They are of herculean proportions, yet full of repose, and rank among the most famous works of sculpture. The Night has been called Michelangelo's masterpiece. Or San Michele is a curious Ptolemaic church, built in 1284 by Arnolfo as a market and granary. It is in three stories, the two upper ones being vaulted from a massive central column. The open arcades of the original market were closed, and received beautiful tracery windows. Between the arcades are inserted 14 niches in marble containing some of the best of Florentine statues by Verrocchio, Ghiberti, Donatello, and others. The interior contains the splendid tabernacle of Orcagna in white marble, and beautiful reliefs illustrating the life of the Virgin and the Virtues. San Miniato al Monte is a notable church rebuilt in 1013, and illustrating the transition from the Roman basilica plan to the normal Romanesque. Santa Maria Novella is a church of the 13th century, a fine example of the Italian Ptolemaic. The campanile is lofty, with pediments and spire. The glory of the church is its frescos by Cimabue, Ghirlandajo, Orcagna, and Giotto. The Church of Santa Maria del Carmine is architecturally of little interest since the fire of 1771, but famous for its Brancacci chapel adorned with frescos by Masaccio and Filippino Lippi illustrating the stories of Adam and Eve and of St. Peter. The Badia is the church of a former Benedictine monastery, rebuilt in the 17th century; but the exterior of the 13th-century east end remains almost perfect. The church contains superb sculptured tombs and other works by Mino da Fiesole. The beautiful campanile of Giotto is one of the architectural ornaments of Florence. The Bargello, or the palace of the Podestà of the Florentine Republic, built in the 13th century and restored after a fire a century later, is a massive building of hewn stone. The great rooms and halls are splendidly restored in the style of the 14th century, and are appropriated to the Museo Nazionale. The Certosa, or Carthusian monastery, founded in 1341 by Niccolò Acciajuoli and built by Orcagna, but altered in the Renaissance, presents the appearance of a medieval fortress. The church has an inlaid pavement of marble, good frescoes, and handsome carved stalls. Population (estimated, 1894), commune, 200,390.

Florence. The province in the compartimento of Tuscany, Italy, in which the city of Florence is situated. Area, 2,265 square miles. Population (1891), 815,506.

Florence. A city in Lauderdale County, in the northwestern corner of Alabama, on the Tennessee River. It has iron manufactures. Population (1890), 6,012.

Florence, Council of. See Ferrara-Florence, Council of.

Florence, William James. Born at Albany, July 26, 1831; died at Philadelphia, Nov. 19, 1891. An American comedian. His family name was Conlin. He made his first appearance on the stage in 1849, in Richmond, as Tobias in "The Stranger," and came to New York in 1850. In 1853 he married Malvina Pray, whose sister married Barney Williams. He wrote several Irish and Yankee plays, and he and his wife began to appear as stars in such plays, he as an Irishman and she as a Yankee girl. Among his best characters were Bob Brierly in "The Ticket-of-Leave Man," Obenreizer in "No Thoroughfare," and the Hon. Bardwell Slote in "The Mighty Dollar." For a time before his death he played with Joseph Jefferson, acting Sir Lucius O'Trigger in "The Rivals," and Zekiel Homespun in "The Hair-at-Law."

In 1835 he was succeeded by Rocafuerte, but continued virtually to rule as commander of the army, and was reelected president in 1839 and again in 1843. In 1840 and 1841 he assisted the government of New Granada against the revolutionists, taking the field in Pasto; and he suppressed many revolts in Ecuador during his different terms. In 1845 fresh revolts broke out, and though the insurgents were beaten, General Flores found it prudent to resign. He left the country, and only returned in 1863 to take part in the war against the dictator Franco. After Franco's overthrow Flores accepted the office of vice-president, and in 1864 commanded the army for the suppression of a rebellion incited by Franco.

Flores, Venancio. Born in 1809; assassinated at Montevideo, Feb. 19, 1868. An Uruguayan general and politician. He was a leader of the party called "Colorados" in the revolt against Oribe in 1853. He was elected president March, 1854; but Oribe commenced a counter-revolt Sept., 1855, and in the end both Oribe and Flores resigned their claims to prevent further war. Flores retired to Buenos Ayres, where he was an officer under Mitre. Returning in April, 1863, he led the Colorados in a revolt against President Berro, and his successor Aguirre. Brazil, having declared war against Aguirre, supported Flores, and in 1865 Aguirre was forced to resign. Flores was made provisional governor, and in 1866 was elected president of Uruguay. He joined Brazil and the Argentine Republic in the war against Paraguay, taking personal command of his troops in the campaigns of 1865 and 1866.

Fonseca (fon-sā'kā), Gulf or Bay of. An inlet of the Pacific, bordering on San Salvador, Honduras, and Nicaragua. Length, about 45 miles. Also called Gulf of Conchagua.

Fonseca, Juan Rodriguez de. Born at Toro, near Seville, 1441; died at Burgos, Nov. 4, 1524. A Spanish ecclesiastic and administrator. He was successively archdeacon of Seville, bishop of Badajoz, Palencia, and Conde, archbishop of Rosario in Italy, and bishop of Burgos, besides being head chaplain to Queen Isabella and afterward to Ferdinand. He is known principally for the control which he exercised over all business relating to the New World. This began with the preparations for the second voyage of Columbus in 1493, and except during the regency of Ximenes, was continued until his death. The council of the Indies was organized by him in 1511, and he was its first chief. Bishop Fonseca opposed Columbus, Cortés, and Las Casas in many matters, and he used his position unscrupulously for the benefit of himself and his friends. He favored Magalhães.

Fonseca (fôn-sā'kā), Manuel Deodoro da. Born in Alagoas, Aug. 5, 1827; died at Rio de Janeiro, Aug. 23, 1892. A Brazilian general and politician. In 1889, having been lightly punished for alleged insubordination, he joined other military malcontents in a plot against the government. The emperor, Pedro II., was deposed (Nov. 15, 1889) and a republic proclaimed, Fonseca being placed at the head of the provisional government. A constitutional assembly met Jan. 20, 1891, adopted a federal constitution, and on Feb. 24 elected Fonseca president for four years. He opened the first legislative congress June 15, 1891, but a violent opposition to the government was soon manifested, and congress was dissolved by the president Nov. 4. Opposition and disorder continued, and on Nov. 23 Fonseca was forced to resign, the vice-president, Peixoto, taking his place.

Fonseca (fôn-sā'kā), Marchioness of (Eleonora Pimentel). Born at Naples about 1768 (1758?): died at Naples, July 20, 1799. A Neapolitan patriot. She married the Marquis of Fonseca in 1784. She sympathized with the French republicans, and was an active adherent of the popular party in Naples. During the ascendancy of the latter 1798-99 she founded and edited the anti-royalist "Monitore Neapolitano." She was executed on the restoration of the Neapolitan monarchy.

Fontaine, Jean de la. See La Fontaine.

Fontaine (fôn-tün'), Pierre François Léonard. Born at Pontoise, near Paris, Sept. 20, 1762; died at Paris, Oct. 10, 1833. A French architect, a collaborator of Percier. He executed the Arch of the Carrousel (Paris), etc.

Fontainebleau (fôn-tân-blô'). A town in the department of Seine-et-Marne, France, 37 miles south-southeast of Paris. The palace was from the middle ages one of the chief residences of the kings of France. It is of great extent, the buildings, which display various types of Renaissance architecture, inclosing six courts. The chief entrance is by a monumental flight of steps of horseshoe plan. The apartments, magnificent in their decoration and furnishings, were fitted up under different reigns since that of Francis I., and are of great historic and artistic interest as preserving intact their original character. Some of the mural paintings are by Primaticcio. The gardens are fine, and the park and forest world-famous. This was the favorite residence of Napoleon I., who abdicated here in 1814. The forest of Fontainebleau (42,500 acres) is considered the most beautiful in France. It has become the resort of the modern French school of landscape-painters, many of them living at Barbizon, Chailly, Marlotte, and other villages near. Among the original painters of this school, which was founded by Théodore Rousseau, are Corot, Dupré, Daubigny, and Diaz Troyon, François Millet, Courbet, Charles Le Roux, Fleury, Véron, Flers, Eugène Lavielle, Riou, and many others are noted exponents of its style. The revocation of the Edict of Nantes was signed at Fontainebleau in 1685, as were also the peace preliminaries between Great Britain, France, Spain, and Portugal in 1762. Population (1891), 14,222.

Fontainebleau, Peace of. A treaty concluded at Fontainebleau, Nov. 8, 1785, between the emperor and the Dutch. The former renounced his claim to the right of free navigation of the Schelde beyond his own dominion, as well as his pretension to Maestricht and the adjacent territories, receiving 10,000,000 guilders as compensation.

Fontaines (fôn-tân'), Comtesse de (Marie Louise Charlotte de Pelard de Givry). Died in 1730. A French novelist. She wrote "Histoire d'Aménophis, prince de Lydie" (1725), "Histoire de la comtesse de Savoie" (1726), etc. Her complete works were published in 1812.

Fontana, Lavinia. Born at Bologna, Italy, about 1542; died at Bologna, 1614. An Italian portrait-painter, daughter of Prospero Fontana.

Fontana, Prospero. Born at Bologna, Italy, about 1512; died at Rome, 1597. An Italian painter.

Fontanes (fôn-tân'), Marquis Louis de. Born at Niort, France, March 6, 1757; died at Paris, March 17, 1821. A French politician and poet, made president of the Corps Législatif in 1804. His collected works were published in 1837.

The chief importance of Fontanes in literature is derived not from any performances of his own, but from the fact that he was appointed intermediary between Napoleon and the men of letters of the time, and was able to exercise a good deal of useful patronage.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 401.

Fontanges (fôn-tonzh'), Duchesse de (Marie Angélique de Scoraille de Roussille). Born 1661; died at Paris, June 28, 1681. A mistress of Louis XIV.

Fontarabia. See Fuenterrabia.

Fontenailles (fôn-tân-yā'), or Fontenay. A village in the department of Yonne, France, near Auxerre; the ancient Fontanetum. Here, in 841, Charles the Bald and Louis the German defeated the emperor Lothaire.

Fontenay-le-Comte (fôn-tân-lé-kôm'tē). A town in the department of Vendée, France, 27 miles northeast of La Rochelle. It suffered in the Huguenot and Vendean wars. Population (1891), commune, 9,864.

Fontenelle (fôn-tên-ē'), Bernard le Bovier de. Born at Rouen, France, Feb. 11, 1657; died at Paris, Jan. 9, 1757. A French advocate, philosopher, poet, and miscellaneous writer. He was the nephew (through his mother) of Cornéille, and was "one of the last of the Précieuses, or rather the inventor of a new combination of literature and gallantry which at first exposed him to not a little satire" (Saintsbury). He wrote "Poésies pastorales" (1688), "Dialogues des morts" (1683), "Entretiens sur la pluralité des mondes" (1686), "Histoire des oracles" (1687), "Éloges des académiciens" (delivered 1699-1740).

Fontenoy (fôn-tên-wū'). A village in the province of Hainaut, Belgium, 5 miles southeast of Tournai. Here, May 11, 1745, the French (about 70,000) under Marshal Saxe defeated the allied English, Dutch, Hanoverians, and Austrians (about 50,000) under the Duke of Cumberland. The loss on both sides was very great.

Fontevrault (fôn-tē-vrô'). A place in the department of Maine-et-Loire, France, 9 miles southeast of Saumur. The abbey church, consecrated in 1119, is an important example of the domical church. In the south transept are fine tombs, with portrait effigies of the first Plantagenet sovereigns of England.

Fonthill (font'hil) Abbey. A magnificent residence built on Lansdowne Hill, near Bath, England, by Beckford, the author of "Vathek." Its marked peculiarity was a tower 280 feet high.

During the progress of the building the tower caught fire, and was partly destroyed. The owner, however, was present, and enjoyed the magnificent burning spectacle.

It was soon restored; but a radical fault in laying the foundation caused it eventually to fall down, and leave Fonthill a ruin in the lifetime of its founder.

Foote (fût), Andrew Hull. Born at New Haven, Conn., Sept. 12, 1806; died at New York, June 26, 1863. An American admiral, son of S. A.

Foote. He captured the Canton forts in 1856, and Fort Henry Feb. 6, 1862, and commanded the naval force at Fort Donelson Feb. 14, 1862, and at the reduction of Island No. 10, March-April, 1862.

Foote, Maria, Countess of Harrington. Born, probably at Plymouth, in 1797; died Dec. 27, 1867. An English actress, the daughter of a Samuel Foote who claimed descent from the famous actor. She was more celebrated for her personal charms than for her acting, and retired from the stage, after a somewhat notorious career, in 1831, on her marriage with Charles Stanhope, earl of Harrington.

Foote, Mary (Hallock). Born at Milton, N. Y., Nov. 19, 1847. An American novelist and artist. She has lived since 1876 in California, Idaho, and Colorado; and her novels, illustrated by herself, are pictures of Western life and scenery. Among them are "The Led-Horse Claim," "John Bodewin's Testimony," "Cœur d'Alene," and "The Chosen Valley."

Foote, Samuel. Born at Truro, England, 1720; died at Dover, England, Oct. 21, 1777. An English dramatist and actor. He first appeared on the stage in 1744. In 1747 he opened the Haymarket Theatre with a mixed entertainment, in which he played Fondlewife in "The Careless Husband" (a farce taken from Congreve's "Old Bachelor"), and other parts, principally in "Divisions of the Morning," which he wrote and acted himself. His talent for mimicry was his chief gift, and he employed it upon prominent personages of the day in his satirical entertainments "Tea at 6:30," "Chocolate in Ireland," "An Auction of Pictures," etc. In 1776 he caricatured the notorious Duchess of Kingston in the "Trip to Calais," an act which subjected him to much opposition and to an indictment. Among his plays are "The Knights" (1749), "Taste" (1752), "The Englishman in Paris" (1753), "The Englishman Returned from Paris" (1756), "The Author" (1757), "The Minor" (1760), "The Orators" (1762), "The Mayor of Garratt" (1763), "The Patron" (1764), "The Commissary" (1765), "The Devil upon Two Sticks" (1768), "The Lamer Lover" (1770), "The Maid of Bath" (1771), "The Nabob" (1772), "The Bankrupt" (1773), "The 'Ozeners" (1774), "The Capuchin" (1776; an alteration of the "Trip to Calais"). He also wrote a number of witty prose tracts, etc. From his seething wit he was known as "the English Aristophanes."

Foote, Samuel Augustus. Born at Cheshire, Conn., Nov. 8, 1780; died there, Sept., 1846. An American politician. He was United States senator from Connecticut 1827-33, and governor of Connecticut in 1834. He introduced "Foote's Resolution" (which see) Dec., 1829.

Foote's Resolution. A resolution introduced into the United States Senate by S. A. Foote, Dec. 29, 1829. It instructed the committee on public lands to inquire into the expediency of limiting the sale of public lands for a certain period to those which had already been offered for sale. It occasioned the famous debate in the senate between Webster and Hayne in Jan., 1830.

Fopling Flutter, Sir. See Flutter, Sir Fopling.

Foppa (fop'pā), Vincenzo. Born at Brescia, Italy, at the beginning of the 15th century; died at Brescia, 1492. An Italian painter.

Foppington (fop'ing-ton), Lord. In Vanbrugh's comedy "The Relapse," a foolish fine gentleman, a further development of Colley Cibber's Sir Novelty Fashion in "Love's Last Shift." He also appears (as Lord Foppington) in Cibber's "Careless Husband," and in Sheridan's "Trip to Scarborough," an alteration of "The Relapse."

Lord Foppington, in the "Relapse," is a most splendid caricature; he is a personification of the foppery and folly of dress and external appearance in full feather. He blazes out and dazzles sober reason with ridiculous ostentation. Still I think this character is a copy from Etheridge's Sir Fopling Flutter; and upon the whole, perhaps, Sir Fopling is the more natural growth of the two.

He became a member of the Prussian Chamber of Deputies in 1858, and of the House of Peers in 1873; and in 1867 entered the Reichstag, of which he was president 1874-79. He was one of the founders of the National Liberal party in 1866, and in 1884 joined the Freisinnige party. He was chief mayor of Berlin from 1878 until his death.

Ford (förd), John. Born at Ilstington, Devonshire, England, 1586 (baptized April 17); died after 1639. An English dramatist. Little is known of his life except that he was a member of the Middle Temple and not dependent on his pen for his living, and that he was popular with playgoers. He apparently retired to Ilstington to end his days. His principal plays are "The Lovers' Melancholy" (printed 1629), "Tis Pity She's a Whore" (1633), "The Broken Heart" (1633), "Love's Sacrifice" (1633), "The Chronicle History of Perkin Warbeck" (1634), "The Fancies Chaste and Noble" (1638), "The Lady's Trial" (1639), "The Sun's Darling" (with Dekker, 1656), "The Witch of Edmonton" (with Dekker, Rowley, etc., 1658). His works were collected by Weber in 1811, by Gifford in 1827, and by Dyce (Gifford) in 1869.

Ford, Master. A well-to-do gentleman in Shakespeare's "Merry Wives of Windsor." He assumes the name of Master Brook, and induces Falstaff to confide to him his passion for Mistress Ford and his success in duping Ford her husband.

Ford's jealousy is managed with great skill so as to help on the plot, bringing out a series of the richest incidents, and drawing the most savoury issues from the mellow, juicy old sinner upon whom he is practising. The means whereby he labours to justify his passion, spreading temptations and then concealing surprises, are quite as wicked as anything Falstaff does, and have, besides, the further crime of exceeding meanness; but both their meanness and their wickedness are of the kind that rarely fail to be their own punishment. The way in which his passion is made to sting and lash him into reason, and the crafty discretion of his wife in glutting his disease and thereby making an opportunity to show him what sort of stuff it lives on, are admirable instances of the wisdom with which the Poet delights to underpin his most fantastical creations. Hudson, Intro. to M. W. of W.

Ford, Richard. Born at London, 1796; died at Heavitree, near Exeter, 1858. An English traveler and author. He wrote a "Handbook for Travelers in Spain" (1845), one of the first and best (and in its original form the fullest) of Murray's Handbooks.

Formorians (fôr-mô'ri-anz). See the extract.

The first people, then, of whose existence in Ireland we can be said to know anything are commonly asserted to have been of Turanian origin, and are known as "Formorians." As far as we can gather, they were a dark, low-browed, stunted race, although, oddly enough, the word Formorian in early Irish legend is always used as synonymous with the word giant. They were, at any rate, a race of utterly savage hunters and fishermen, ignorant of metal, of pottery, possibly even of the use of fire; using the stone hammers or hatchets of which vast numbers may be seen in every museum. Lawless, Story of Ireland, p. 5.

Formosa (fôr-mô'sä), (Chin. Taiwan (ti'wän')). [Pg., 'the beautiful.'] An island east of China, forming, until ceded to Japan 1895, the province of the same name in China. It is traversed by mountains. Its products are tea, sugar, coal, etc. The chief towns are Tamsui, Taiwan, and Kelung. It is inhabited by Chinese and aborigines (Malayan, Negro). The western part of the island was colonized by the Chinese about 200 years ago. It was the principal scene of warfare in the war of France with China in 1844-1885; was blockaded by the French fleet, and in part occupied by the French; and was the theater of several combats (the French being led by Admiral Courbet) in 1885. Forrest (for'est), Edwin. Born at Philadelphia, March 9, 1806; died there, Dec. 12, 1872. A celebrated American actor. He first appeared on the regular stage in 1820 as Douglas in Home's play of that name. His first notable success was in New York, where he played "Othello" in 1826. In 1836 he appeared in London as Spartacus in "The Gladiator." After this he played with success both in England and America, until in 1845 in London he was hissed in "Macbeth." He attributed this to Macready's influence, and shortly after, when the latter was playing Hamlet in Edinburgh, Forrest stood up in his box and hissed violently. It is believed that this was the original cause of the Astor Place riot in 1849, of which the immediate occasion was the attempt of Forrest's admirers to prevent Macready from appearing in the Astor Place Opera House. His last appearance in New York was in Feb., 1871, and in March of that year he appeared for the last time as an actor in Boston. He afterward, however, gave Shaksperian readings, which were not successful. He left his house in Philadelphia as a home for aged actors. Here also he collected a large dramatic library. One of his most characteristic parts was Aylmere in "Jack Cade," which was written for him by Robert T. Conrad. Among his great parts were Lear, Coriolanus, Othello, Virginius, Damon, Spartacus, Tell, etc.
