Irrerius, by universal testimony, was the founder of all learned investigation into the laws of Justinian. He gave lectures upon them at Bologna, his native city, not long, in Savigny's opinion, after the commencement of the century. And, besides this oral instruction, he began the practice of making glosses, or short marginal explanations, on the law-books, with the whole of which he was acquainted. We owe also to him, according to ancient opinion, though much controverted (a later time, an epitome, called the Authentica, of what Gratiana calls the prolix and difficult (salsobris atque garulic) Novels of Justinian, arranged according to the titles of the Code.

Iroquoian (ir-ō-kwoi'an). A linguistic stock of North American Indians, historically of great importance though numerically inferior to several others. The conduct of a part of these tribes, which are collectively called Iroquois, in the colonial period markedly shaped the history of America north of Mexico, as at the first collisions they became the allies of the English against the French, and by their early procurement of firearms, perhaps more than by the preeminent valor and sagacity imputed to them by most writers, they mastered and drove off from immense districts all the tribes before occupying them which would not submit to their rule. The St. Lawrence River valley was their earliest known habitat, whence they gradually moved southwest along the shores of the great lakes. Cartier in 1535 found between Quebec and Montreal a people the recorded fragments of whose language indicate that they were Wyandots. (See Iroquois.) The Iroquoian tribes were notably sedentary and to a considerable extent agricultural, depending comparatively little upon hunting, and were remarkable for their skill in house-building and fortification. The remaining Indians of this stock, both in the United States and in Canada, are distinguished for their advance into civilization. As a rule they are prosperous and increasing in numbers. Their whole population now is about 43,000, of whom over 34,000 are in the United States and nearly 9,000 in Canada. They are divided both linguistically and geographically into 4 groups, as follows: northern group—Wyandot, Tionontati, Tohotaenat, Wearorono, Neuter, Hochelaga; central group—Mohawk, Onondaga, Onondaga, Cayuga, Seneca, Erie, Conestoga; southern group—Tuscarora, Nottoway, Meherrin, Chowanoc, Cohee; Cherokee group—Elati or Lower Cherokee, Middle Cherokee, and Atlati or Upper Cherokee. The name of the linguistic stock is taken from the form Iroquois, which has been applied specifically to the confederacy or league also called the "Five Nations," and later the "Six Nations."

Iroquois (ir-ō-kwoi'). [The name, given by the French, was derived from an exclamation used by the speakers of the confederacy.] A well-known confederacy of the North American Indians. They called themselves by a name meaning 'we of the long house,' also by another, meaning 'real men.' The Delaware name for them was Mengue, corrupted into Mingo. The English knew them as the Confederates or Five Nations, and, after the admission of the Tuscarora, as the Six Nations. The confederacy was, about 1540, composed of five tribes, Mohawk, Oneida, Onondaga, Cayuga, and Seneca, extending across New York State, in the order named, from Hudson River to Lake Erie. According to tradition they had before lived on the St. Lawrence River, whence they had been driven by Algonquian tribes. After procuring firearms from the Dutch, they made war upon all the surrounding tribes, driving off some, incorporating some, and making others tributary, until their rule was acknowledged from the Ottawa River to the Tennessee, and from the Kennebec to the Illinois and Lake Michigan. During the Revolution these tribes sided with the English, with whom they had before been allied against the French; and afterward the Mohawks and Cayugas followed Brant in a body to Canada.

They, with some individuals of other tribes of the confederacy, settled and still remain at a reservation on Grand River, Ontario, and at other points in that province. Those in the United States are on reservations in New York, except the Oneidas, who are chiefly at Green Bay, Wisconsin. The so-called Senecas of the Indian Territory are really "Mingos" collected from all the Iroquois tribes, and the Catholic Iroquois at Caughnawaga, St. Regis, and Oka have no connection with the confederacy. The numbers of the latter are now about 15,000, including mixed blood. See Iroquoian.

Irawaddy. See Irawadi.

Irredentists (ir-ē-den'tists). An Italian political party, formed in 1878 for bringing about the "redemption" or the incorporation into the kingdom of Italy of all regions situated near Italy where an important part of the population was Italian, but which were still subject to other governments, and hence called Italia irredenta ('unredeemed Italy').

Irrefragable Doctor, L. Doctor Irrefragabilis (dōk'tor-i-ref-rā-gā-b'i-lis). A surname given to the scholastic philosopher Alexander of Hales.

Irtys, or Irtish (ir'tish; Russ. pron. ir-tish'). A river in Sungaria and western Siberia, which joins the Obi about 190 miles north of Tobolsk. It traverses Lake Zaisan. Its chief affluents are the Ishim, Tobol, Bukhtarma and Om. Length, over 1,600 miles; navigable to Lake Zaisan.

Irun, or Yrun (ō-rōn'). A town in the province of Guipuzcoa, Spain, situated near the French frontier 19 miles southwest of Bayonne. Population (1887), 9,264.

Irus (i-rus). 1. In Homeric legend, a beggar of gigantic stature who kept watch over the suitors of Penelope, and was employed by them as a messenger. He was celebrated for his voracity.—2. The Blind Beggar of Alexandria in Chapman's play of that name. He assumes many disguises.

Iruwai (ir'ō-wi). A tribe or division of North American Indians formerly living in Scott Valley, Siskiyou County, California. In 1851 it had seven villages and an estimated population of 420. See Sustain.

Irvine (ir'vin). A seaport in Ayrshire, Scotland, situated on the river Irvine 23 miles southwest of Glasgow. Population (1891), 4,554.

Irving (ir'ving), Edward. Born at Annan, Dumfriesshire, Scotland, Aug. 4, 1792; died at Glasgow, Dec. 7, 1834. A Scottish preacher and divine. As a boy he was much influenced by the services of the extreme Presbyterians, seceders from the Church of Scotland. In 1812 he obtained the mastership of the academy at Kirkcaldy, where he formed a warm friendship for Thomas Carlyle. In 1818 he went to Edinburgh to prepare himself for the ministry, and Oct., 1819, became assistant to Dr. Chalmers in Glasgow. He removed to the little chapel in Hatton Garden, London, July, 1822, when he immediately won extraordinary popularity. At this time begin the peculiar mental and religious aberrations which are associated with his career. In May, 1828, he made a tour of Scotland with the object of proclaiming the imminence of the second advent. Another expedition to Scotland followed, and in 1830 his tract on "The Orthodoxy and Catholic Doctrine of Our Lord's Human Nature" exposed him to direct charges of heresy. The "unknown tongues," a pentecostal phenomenon, were first heard in March, 1830, from the mouth of Mary Campbell. They were at first heard only in private assemblies, but Oct. 16, 1831, the services of his new Regent Square church were disturbed by a woman who gave utterance to an outbreak of unintelligible discourse. An attempted prosecution for heresy failed in Dec., 1830; but on April 26, 1832, he was removed from his church. On March 13, 1833, he was condemned by the Presbytery of Annan on a charge of heresy concerning the sinlessness of Christ. This practically terminated his career. The "Irvingite" or "Catholic Apostolic Church" still survives. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Irving, Sir Henry (real name was John Henry Brodribb). Born at Keinton, near Glastonbury, England, Feb. 6, 1838. A noted English actor. He made his first appearance at the Sunderland Theatre in 1856. After playing at Edinburgh for some time he made his first London appearance at the Princess's Theatre in 1859. He made no distinct mark till 1870, when he played Digby Grant in Albery's "Two Roses." He played with success till 1874, when his performance of Hamlet created genuine interest. In 1873 he undertook the management of the Lyceum Theatre, where his success has been great. He has produced a large number of new plays and Shaksperian revivals. In 1883, 1884, 1886, and 1893 he came to the United States with his company, including Miss Ellen Terry. He is especially distinguished in "Hamlet," "Othello," "Merchant of Venice," "Richard III.," "Richeieu," "The Bells," "Louis XI.," "Henry VIII.," "Becket," etc. Knighted in 1895.

Irving, Theodore. Born at New York, May 9, 1809; died at New York, Dec. 20, 1880. An American clergyman and author, nephew of Washington Irving.

Irving, Washington. Born at New York, April 3, 1783; died at Sunnyside, near Tarrytown, N. Y., Nov. 28, 1859. An American historian, essayist, and novelist. He was the son of an Englishman, William Irving, who came from the Orkneys. He entered a law office when quite young, and wrote literary squibs for the "Morning Chronicle," under the pseudonym "Jonathan Oldstyle." His health obliged him to travel, and in 1804 he was sent abroad for two years. On his return he undertook the publication, with James K. Paulding, of "Salmagundi." In 1809 he published his "History of New York," by Diedrich Knickerbocker. Its success established his literary position. In 1810 he became a partner in a commercial house established by two of his brothers. In 1815, however, he went abroad again, and lived there till 1832. In 1826 he was attaché of the United States legation at Madrid, and in 1829 was made secretary of legation at London. He lived principally at Sunnyside (Wolfert's Roost) from 1832 till 1842, when he was appointed minister to Spain. He returned in 1846 to Sunnyside, where he lived till his death. Besides the works above mentioned, he wrote "The Sketch-Book" (which came out in parts in 1819, and collected in 1820), "Bracebridge Hall, or the Humourists" (1822), "Tales of a Traveler" (1824), "Life and Voyages of Christopher Columbus" (1828), "Chronicle of the Conquest of Granada" (1829), "Voyages of the Companions of Columbus" (1831), "The Alhambra" (1832), "Crayon Miscellany" (including "Tour on the Prairies," 1835), "Astoria, etc." (with Pierre M. Irving, 1836), "Adventures of Captain Bonneville, etc." (1837), "Oliver Goldsmith" (1849), "Mahomet and his Successors" (1850), "Wolfert's Roost" (1855), "Life of George Washington" (1855-59). Works in the "Geoffrey Crayon" edition (26 vols., 1880); "Life and Letters" edited by Pierre Irving (1861-67).

Irvingites (ir'ving-its). A religious denomination named from Edward Irving (1792-1834). Irving was not the founder of the sect popularly called after him, but accepted and promoted the spread of the principles upon which, after his death, the sect was formed. Its proper name is the Catholic Apostolic Church, and it has an elaborate organization derived from its twelve "apostles," the first body of whom was completed in 1835. It recognizes the orders of apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors or "angels," elders, deacons, etc. It lays especial stress on the early creeds, the eucharist, prophecies, and gift of tongues. It has an extremely ritualistic service and an elaborate liturgy. The adherents are not numerous, and are found chiefly in Great Britain. There are some on the continent of Europe and in the United States.

Irwin (er'win), Sir John. Born at Dublin, 1728; died at Parma, May, 1788. A British general, the son of Alexander Irwin. As lieutenant in his father's regiment he was granted a year's furlough for continental travel in 1748, when he commenced a regular correspondence with Lord Chesterfield, which continued for twenty years. He is supposed to have suggested to Chesterfield his paper on "Good Breeding," which appeared in the "World," Oct. 30, 1755. Irwin afterward became governor of Gibraltar (1768-68), and commander-in-chief and privy councillor in Ireland 1775.

Isaac (i'zak). [Heb., 'the laughter.' See extract below.] A Hebrew patriarch, son of Abraham and Sarah, and father of Jacob and Esau.

The name of his father Isaak is probably also an abbreviation for "Isaakel," 'He upon whom God smiles.' It may be that the holy tribe was so designated at a certain epoch; or the Isaakel may perhaps have been a Puritan group anterior to that of the Jakobel.

Renan, Hist. of the People of Israel, 1, 90.

Isaac I. Comnenus. Died 1061. Byzantine emperor 1057-59. He was elevated by the army in opposition to Michael VI., who was defeated and compelled to abdicate. He resigned the crown to Constantine Ducas in consequence of an illness supposed to be mortal, and entered a convent.

Isaac II. Angelus. Died 1204. Byzantine emperor 1185-95 and 1203-04. He succeeded Andronicus Comnenus, who was overthrown by a popular revolt. He was dethroned and blinded by his own brother, Alexius III., in 1195; but, on the latter's flight before the Crusaders, was replaced by them on the throne, together with his son Alexius IV., in 1203. Together with his son, he was supplanted by Alexius V. in 1204.

Isaac, Sacrifice of. A painting by Rembrandt, in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. Isaac lies bound on a heap of fagots; Abraham, kneeling over him, with his hand on the boy's face, is about to give the fatal blow, when the angel strikes the knife from his hand. The entangled ram is seen in the wooded background.

Isabella (iz-a-bel'ä). [F. Isabeau, Isabelle, It. Isabella, Sp. Isabel, Pg. Isabel, G. and Dan. Isabelle.] Born 1214; died at Foggia, Dec. 1, 1241. German empress, wife of the emperor Frederick II., and second daughter and fourth child of John, king of England, and Isabella of Angoulême. Her marriage with Frederick II. was concluded July 15, 1235. Her daughter Margaret was born Feb., 1237, and by marriage with Albert, landgrave of Thuringia, became ancestress of the Saxe-Coburg-Gotha house.

Isabella I., surnamed "The Catholic." Born at Madrigal, April 22, 1451; died at Medina del Campo, Nov. 26, 1504. Queen of Castile 1474-1504, daughter of John II. of Castile. She married, in 1469, Ferdinand of Aragon, conjointly with whom she succeeded her brother, Henry IV., as monarch of Castile in 1474. She equipped the expedition of Columbus in 1492. See Ferdinand I., King of Castile.

Isabella II. (Maria Isabella Louisa). Born at Madrid, Oct. 10, 1830. Queen of Spain 1833-1868, daughter of Ferdinand VII. whom she succeeded under the regency of her mother, Maria Christina. See Maria Christina, and Carlos, Maria José Isidoro de Bourbon, Don. She assumed personal control of the government in 1843; was deposed and banished by a revolution which broke out at Cadiz, Sept. 18, 1868; and resigned her claim to the throne in favor of her eldest son (afterward Alfonso XII.), June 25, 1870.

Isabella. 1. A character in Ariosto's "Orlando Furioso," loved by Zerbino, and killed by Rodomont.—2. A character in Shakspeare's comedy "Measure for Measure," the sister of Claudio, and object of the base passion of Angelo, but rescued and married by Vincentio, the duke.—3. A character in Webster's tragedy "Vittoria Corombona, or The White Devil": the wife of the Duke of Brachiano, lover of Vittoria. To shield him from the vengeance of her family because of his ill treatment of her, she purposely plays the shrew to make them think her worthless.

4. The "insatiate countess" in Marston's play of that name. She alternately attracts her lovers and induces their successors to kill them.—5. The wife of Biron in Southerne's "Fatal Marriage." She marries Villeroy, being deceived into a belief in Biron's death; and after his return and actual death she dies distracted. Isabella was a favorite part with Mrs. Barry, Mrs. Siddons, and other tragic actresses. The play was afterward known as "Isabella."

6. One of the principal characters in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "The Wonder."

Isabella of Angoulême. Died at Fontevraud, 1246. Queen of King John of England and daughter of Eymery, count of Angoulême, by Alicia, daughter of Peter of Courtenay, a younger son of Louis VI. of France. She was married to John during his visit to France, Aug., 1200. Her first son (afterward Henry III.) was born Oct. 1, 1207. In Dec., 1214, she was imprisoned in Gloucester by order of John, and was probably there when he died. In 1217 she returned to France, and May, 1220, married Hugh, count of La Marche.

Isabella of France. Born 1292; died at Hertford, Aug. 23, 1358. Queen of Edward II. of England, and daughter of Philip the Fair, king of France. They were married at Boulogne, Jan. 25, 1308. Her first son (afterward Edward III.) was born Nov. 13, 1312, at Windsor. Edward II. treated her with extreme unkindness. Driven from England by the influence of the Despencers, she raised an army, and with Roger Mortimer in command, Sept. 24, 1326, landed at Harwich, beginning the campaign which terminated with the deposition of Edward II. by the Parliament in London, Jan. 7, 1327, and the recognition of Edward III., then 14 years old. Isabella and Mortimer ruled in his name. In 1330 Edward III. and Henry of Lancaster conspired against her, and she was arrested with Mortimer at Nottingham, Oct. 18. Mortimer was executed.

Isabella of France. Born at the Louvre, Paris, Nov. 9, 1389; died at Blois, Sept. 13, 1409. The second daughter of Charles VI. of France, and second queen of Richard II. of England. The marriage contract was signed March 9, 1396, when she was 7 years old. After Richard's death she was restored to France (July, 1401), and June, 1404, married Charles, count of Angoulême, the poet.

Isabella (so called from Isabella of Castile, queen of Spain). The first European city in the New World, founded by Christopher Columbus, Dec., 1493, on a small bay of the northern shore of the island of Española or Haiti, 25 miles west of the present town of Puerto Plata. It was abandoned soon after the founding of Santo Domingo city, and only a few ruins now remain to mark its site.

Isabelle (ē-zā-bel'). 1. A young girl brought up by Sganarelle in Molière's "École des maris." He secludes her from all knowledge of the world or of pleasure, intending to marry her. She eludes his vigilance and marries Valère. See Léonore.

2. An amusing and mischievous girl in Dryden's "Wild Gallant."

Isabey (ē-zā-bā'), Eugène Louis Gabriel. Born at Paris, July 22, 1804; died at Lagny, Seine-et-Marne, April 27, 1886. A French painter, son of J. B. Isabey, noted especially for his marines. He went to Algiers in 1830, as royal marine painter, with the expedition of that year. He received medals of the first class in 1824, 1827, 1855, and became a member of the Legion of Honor in 1832 and officer in 1852.

Isabey, Jean Baptiste. Born at Naney, France, April 11, 1767; died at Paris, April 18, 1855. A French miniature painter, a pupil of Girardet and Claudet (at Naney), and of Dumont and David (at Paris). Among his portraits are those of Josephine, Napoleon, his marshals, members of the Congress of Vienna, etc.

Isabinda (is-a-bin'dā). One of the principal characters in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "The Busybody," the daughter of Sir Jealous Traffick, who keeps her from the sight of all men.

Isæus (ī-sē'ns). [Gr. Ἰσαῖος.] Born at Chaleis (at Athens?): lived in the first half of the 4th century B. C. One of the ten Attic orators. His 11 extant orations, mainly on contested inheritances, have been edited by Schommann (1831), Burmann (1883). English translation by Sir William Jones.

Isaiah (ī-zā'yā or ī-zī'yā). [Heb., 'salvation of Jehovah.'] A Hebrew prophet who prophesied from 740 B. C. till 701 B. C. He was the greatest of the Hebrew prophets and orators, a consistent opponent of the policy of the Hebrew kings to enter into entangling alliances with foreign powers. Once, however, the alliance with Assyria being formed, he counseled the keeping of faith, continually asserting that no dependence could be placed on Egypt. Chapters xl.-lxvi. of Isaiah, which relate to the captivity and return, are considered by some scholars the work of a post-exilic prophet called Deutero-Isaiah.

He was the greatest of a race of giants. He gave their final form to Hebrew ideas. He is not the founder of Judaism; he is its classical genius. Semitic speech reaches in him its highest combinations.

Renan, Hist. of the People of Israel (trans.), II. 408.

Isaiah's poetical genius is superb. His characteristics are grandeur and beauty of conception, wealth of imagination, vividness of illustration, compressed energy, and splendor of diction.

Ispendiyar (is-fen-di-yār'), in Pers., correctly, Asfandiyar (es-fen-di-yār'), or Aspandiyar (es-pen-di-yār'). A hero of the Shahnamah, son of King Gushtasp, the Constantine of the Zoroastrians. After many exploits he was called to conquer Arjasp, a demon king, who had taken captive two daughters of Gushtasp, and to restore his sisters. For this he undertook his "seven labors." Choosing, like Rustam, the shortest and most perilous way to the enemy's stronghold, he first slew two monstrous wolves; secondly, conquered a fierce lion and his mate; thirdly, slew a fierce dragon; fourthly, withstood the wiles of a beautiful woman who, caught in Asfandiyar's noose, became first a cat and then a wolf, and finally a black, flame-vomiting demon, and was then slain by him; fifthly, slew a Simurgh, a gigantic bird, which tried to bear him away; sixthly, brought his troops through a furious storm of wind and snow; and seventhly, traversed a deadly desert. Reaching the brazen fortress, Asfandiyar collected a hundred camels and entered it with his warriors disguised as a merchant caravan, when his brother Bishutan attacked it from without, as he within. After this success Gushtasp wished Asfandiyar to go against Rustam, to whom Kaikhosrau had given Zabul, Kabul, and Nimruz. Asfandiyar pleaded the nobility and services of Rustam, but the king was obdurate. Rustam came out to welcome Asfandiyar, but when told the errand of the latter refused to yield. The heroes fought on two successive days. Rustam was wounded but recovered and, guided by the Simurgh which had cared for his infancy, on the second day lodged an arrow, made by the Simurgh's direction from the kazu tree, in the eye of his antagonist, who fell. Zal and Rustam both came to offer sympathy, but Asfandiyar died, intrusting his son Bahman to the care of Rustam.

Isha (ē'sha; with Vedic accent, ē-sha'). [Skt., 'Lord.'] A title of Shiva; also, with a long, the name of an Upanishad of which Ishavasya is the first word. It is also known as the Vajrasanyas-hita Upanishad. It is translated by Muller in the "Sacred Books of the East," I. 311.

Ishbosheth (ish-bō'sheth). [Heb., 'man of shame.'] A son of Saul, proclaimed king of Israel after his father's death. See David.

In our text of the Books of Samuel, Saul's son and successor is called Ishbosheth, but in I Chronicles viii. 33 he is called Ishbaal. Ishbaal means 'Baal's man,' a proper name of a well-known Semitic type, precisely similar to such Arabic names as Imran-ib-Cais, 'the man of the 708 Cais.' W. R. Smith, O. T. in the Jewish Ch., p. 78.

Ishim (ish'im). A river of Siberia which joins the Irtysh about 120 miles southeast of Tobolsk. Length, about 1,000 miles.

Ishmael (ish'mā-el). [Heb., 'God heareth.'] The son of Abraham and Hagar: regarded by the Arabs as their ancestor.

Ishmaelites (ish'mā-el-its). The descendants of Ishmael, Abraham's son, who, as is related in Gen. xxi. 14, was driven into the wilderness with his mother, Hagar. His twelve sons were "princes" or heads of tribes. The Arabs regard him as their ancestor.

Ishpeming (ish'pem-ing). A city in Marquette County, northern Michigan, 14 miles west by south of Marquette: the center of an iron district. Population (1890), 11,197.

Ishtar (ish'tār), or Istar (is'tār). The principal and most popular deity of the Assyro-Babylonians, the goddess of love and war, uniting, as it were, the Aphrodite (Venus) and Athene (Minerva) of the Greeks, and corresponding in name and character to Ashtoreth (Astarte) of the Syro-Canaanites, only that she ruled the planet Venus while Ashtoreth was identified with the moon. In her warlike character she was conceived by the Babylonians as ruling the morning star; as goddess of love she ruled the evening star. In her former character she was also called Ammit, and had her principal seat of worship at Agaae, in the temple E-ulbar; in the latter character she was especially worshipped at Erech (Orchoe of the Greeks, modern Warka), in the temple E-ana ('House of Heaven'), with a voluptuous cult. With the Assyrians she was the wife of Bel, and was sometimes called Leiti ('Lady'); they distinguished between Ishtar of Ardea, who presided over battles, and Ishtar of Nineveh, in whom the voluptuous aspect predominated. Ishtar also occurs as an appellation, or generic name, for a goddess in general. On the relation of Ishtar to Tammuz, see Adonis and Iedubar.

Isidorian Decretals, The. A code of native and foreign canons which circulated in Spain in the 6th century, and was afterward accepted throughout the Roman Catholic Church: so called from Isidorus Hispalensis, who was erroneously supposed to have compiled it. Also called the Spanish Decretals.

Isidorus (iz-i-dō'rns) Hispalensis, or Isidore (is'i-dōr) of Seville. Born at Cartagena, Spain, about 560; died April 4, 636. A Spanish ecclesiastic and miscellaneous writer. He became bishop of Seville in 600. His works, which were held in high esteem during the middle ages, include "Originum seu etymologiarum libri xx." "De ecclesiasticis officiis libri duo," and "Sententiarum sive de summo bono libri tres." He has been erroneously accredited with the compilation of the so-called Isidorian Decretals (which see).

Isidro (ē-sē' drō), San. See the extract.

His [Lope's] subject was well chosen. It was that of the great fame and glory of San Isidro the Ploughman. This remarkable personage, who plays so distinguished a part in the ecclesiastical history of Madrid, is supposed to have been born in the twelfth century, on what afterwards became the site of that city, and to have led a life so eminently pious that the angels came down and ploughed his grounds for him, which the holy man neglected in order to devote his time to religious duties. From an early period, therefore, he enjoyed much consideration, and was regarded as the patron and friend of the whole territory, as well as of the city of Madrid itself. But his great honors date from the year 1598. In that year Philip the Third was dangerously ill at a neighboring village; the city sent out the remains of Isidro in procession to avert the impending calamity; the king recovered; and for the first time the holy man became widely famous and fashionable.

Isis (i'sis). 1. [Gr. Ἴσις.] In Egyptian mythology, the chief female deity, the sister, wife, and female counterpart of Osiris, and the mother of Horus. She is distinguished by the solar disk and cow's horns on her head, often surmounted by a diminutive throne, and bears the lotus scepter. By the Greeks she was identified with Io. Her worship in a modified form, as a nature-goddess, was introduced subsequently to the Alexandrine epoch into Greece, and was very popular at Rome from the end of the republic. The Greek and Roman priests and priestesses of Isis wore a special costume, and had as an attribute a peculiar metallic rattle, the sistrum. On her statue was an inscription mentioned by Proclus: "I am that which is, has been, and shall be. My veil no one has lifted. The fruit I bore was the Sun"; hence the well-known allusion to a mystery as "the veil of Isis," or as covered with "the veil of Isis."

Isis, at once the sister and wife of Osiris, and the mother of Horus. At Thebes she was known as Mut, 'the mother,' with the vulture's head; at Babastis as Sekhet, the bride of Pthah and daughter of Ra. As mother of Horus, she was named Hathor or Athor, 'the house of Horus,' identified by the Greeks with their Aphrodite, and confused with Astoreth by the Semites. The cow, with its horns, symbolizing the crescent moon, which in Egypt appears to lie upon its back, was consecrated to her, indicating at how early a time the bride of Osiris, the Sun-god, was held to be the moon. She was also identified with Sothis, the dog-star, and in later days with the planet Venus. All that is good and beautiful among men comes from her; she watches over the birth of children, and rocks the cradle of the Nile. As Neit, too, she is the authoress of weaving and of the arts of female life. Sayce, Anc. Empires, p. 64.

2. An asteroid (No. 42) discovered by Pogson at Oxford, May 23, 1856.

Isis. A name sometimes given to the Thames (England) in its upper course.

Iskanderun, Bay of or Gulf of. An arm of the Mediterranean, at its northeastern angle, situated between Syria and Cilicia.

Iskardo. See Skardo.

Isia (ēs'lā), José Francisco de. Born at Segovia, Spain, 1703; died at Bologna, Italy, 1781. A Spanish satirist and Jesuit preacher. He was the author of the satirical romance "Historia del famoso predicador Fray Gerundio de Campazas" ("History of the Famous Preacher Friar Gerundio de Campazas," 1758-70).

It was an attack on the style of popular preaching, which, originally corrupted by Paravicino, the distinguished follower of Gongora, had been constantly falling lower and lower, until at last it seemed to have reached the lowest point of degradation and vulgarity. The assailant was Father Isia, who was born in 1703 and died in 1781, at Bologna, where, being a Jesuit, he had been sent as an exile, on the general expulsion of his order from Spain.

Isles, Lord of the. A title assumed intermittently from the 12th to the 16th century by various Scottish chieftains who maintained a practical independence among the islands west of Scotland. Some of the most notable were John Macdonald (died 1388) and Alexander Macdonald, and the eleventh Earl of Ross.

Isles of Shoals (ilz ov shōlz). A group of small islands in the Atlantic Ocean, 10 miles southeast of Portsmouth, New Hampshire. They belong partly to Rockingham County (New Hampshire), partly to York County (Maine), and comprise Appledore, Star Island, etc. They are a noted summer resort.

Isleta (ēs-lā'tā). [Sp., 'little island.'] The name of two villages of the Tigua tribe of New Mexico. The main village lies 16 miles south of the city of Albuquerque, at the junction of the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé Railroad and Atlantic and Pacific lines, on the Rio Grande. It is inhabited by about 1,059 Indians, mostly of Tigua stock. The aboriginal name is Shichwihiabak. Isleta already existed, probably, when the Spaniards first colonized New Mexico in 1598, and a mission was established there previous to 1636. Another Isleta in Texas, on the Rio Grande 9 miles south of El Paso, was founded, about 1682, by Indian refugees from New Mexican Isleta. It has a small population.

Islington (iz'ling-tōn). A parish and parliamentary borough in the north of London, 2 miles north of St. Paul's. It returns 4 members to Parliament. Population (1891), 319,433.

Islip, Simon. Died 1366. Archbishop of Canterbury. He was consecrated in 1349. He derived his name from the village of Islip on the Cherwell near Oxford.

Isly (ēs-lē'). A small river in eastern Morocco, near the Algerian frontier. Here, Aug. 14, 1844, the French under Bugeaud defeated the troops of Morocco.

Ismail (is-mä-ēl'). A town in the government of Bessarabia, Russia, situated at the Kilia mouth of the Danube, in lat. 45° 21' N., long. 28° 46' E. It was formerly a Turkish fortress; was taken by the Russians in 1770, 1790 (stormed by Suvoroff, when 38,000 Turks were massacred), and 1809; and was ceded to Russia in 1812, to Rumania in 1856, and back to Russia in 1878. Population, 34,308.

Ismail Pasha (is-mä-ēl' pash'ā). Born 1830; died 1895. Khedive of Egypt 1863-79, son of Ibrahim Pasha. He succeeded Said Pasha as khedive in 1863; annexed Darfur in 1874; and was compelled to abdicate in favor of his son Tewfik Pasha in 1879.

Ismailia (is-mä-ē'lē-ā). 1. A small town in the Isthmus of Suez, Egypt, situated on the Suez Canal 47 miles south of Port Said; founded in 1863.—2. See Gondokoro.

Ismid (is-mēd'), or Iskimid (is-kē-mēd'). A town in Asia Minor, 57 miles southeast of Constantinople, at the head of the Gulf of Ismid; the ancient Nicomedia (which see). Population, estimated, 15,000.

Ismi-Dagon (is'mē-dā'gon). ['The god Dagon has heard me.'] The earliest known king or patesi (priest, king, or viceroy) of Assyria. In the ruins of the ancient city of Ashur (modern Kileh-Sherghat) were found bricks of a temple bearing his name, and from a reference to him in the annals of Tiglath-Pileser I. (1120-1100 B. C.) it was concluded that he lived about 1810 B. C.

Isnard (is-när'), Maximin. Born at Grasse, Var, France, Feb. 16, 1751; died there, in 1830. A French Girondist. He became a member of the Council of Five Hundred in 1795.

Isnik. The modern name of Nicæa.

Isnik, Lake. See Ascania.

Isoama. See Ibo.

Isocrates (i-sok'ra-tēz). [Gr. Ἰσοκράτης.] Born at Athens, 436 B. C.; died 338 B. C. One of the ten Attic orators, distinguished as a teacher of eloquence after about 392. Of his orations twenty-one are extant.

Thus this remarkable writer [Isocrates] lived through three of the most eventful generations in Greek history, and, though one of the most prominent writers of his time, may be said to have produced no influence whatever except upon the form of prose writing. For he was in no sense a thorough-going man. He was a curious combination of sophist and patriot, of would-be politician and philosopher, of really private and public man at the same time. The candour and honesty of his nature made him in feeling a patriot, while his want of appreciation for deeper politics prevented him from seeing the evils of despotism, or taking any thorough interest in the forms and varieties of constitutions. His bashfulness compelled him to remain in private life, while his vanity urged him to appear in public; his profession suggested to him the study of philosophy, while his intellect was incapable of understanding its higher problems. Thus his egotisms vanity and self-complacency were perpetually wounded by the consciousness that he had, after all, not made his mark upon the age, and that, though eminent and widely respected, he was neither consulted nor obeyed by the men whom he most desired to influence. He aspired to the position of a Swift or a Junius, with the talents of an Addison or a Pope. Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., II. 216.

Isola (ē'sō-lā). A small town in Italy, on the Liris about 60 miles east-southeast of Rome.

Isola Bella (bel'lā) and Isola Madre (mā'dre). [It., 'fair island' and 'mother island.'] The two chief islands of the Borromean Islands (which see) in Lago Maggiore.

Isola dei Pescatori (dā'ē pes-kä-tō'rē). An island in Lago Maggiore.

Isola Grossa (grōs'sä), or Lunga (lōng'gä). [It., 'great island' or 'long island.'] An island in the Adriatic Sea, belonging to Dalmatia, 10 miles west of Zara. Length, 26 miles.

Isolde, Isonde, Isoud. See Isult.

Isonzo (ē-son'zō). A river in Görz and Gradiska, Austria-Hungary, flowing into the Gulf of Trieste 13 miles northwest of Trieste. Length, about 80 miles.

Isouard (ē-zō-är'), or Isoard (ē-zō-är'), Nicolò. Born at Malta, Dec. 6, 1775; died at Paris, March 23, 1818. A Maltese composer, usually known as Nicolo. Author of about 33 operas, among which are "Michel Ange" (1802), "Cendrillon" (1810), "Joconde" (1813), "Jannot et Colin" (1814), etc.

Ispahan (is-pā-hän'), or Isfahan (is-fa-hän'). A city in the province of Irak-Ajemi, Persia, situated on the Zenderud in lat. 32° 39' N., long. 51° 45' E. The Great Mosque was built by Shah Abbas in the 16th century. The entrance to the sanctuary is by a keel-shaped arch set in a square panel adorned with inscriptions and arabesques in colored tiles. The archway is flanked by a double tier of deeply recessed arcades, and behind it rises a large pointed bulbous dome, whose surface is decorated with arabesques. Before the dome stand two slender cylindrical minarets, with a portion toward the top corbelled out to a greater diameter and crowned by cylindrical domed funils. The interior is arched in two tiers. The Bazar of the Tailors is a very rich and monumental example of Persian architecture. The distribution consists of wide and high corridors divided into bays by massive keel-shaped arches, and covered with domes on pendentives having open eyes for light at the apex. The walls are ornamented with colored tiles, and the arches and balustrades over the square lateral booths are filled with geometric pierced openwork. The Caravansary of Amin-Abad, on the road to Shiraz, is an octagon inclosing a central court. The gateway opens beneath a high keel-shaped arch which is flanked on each side by two superposed deeply recessed arches. The court, in the middle of which stands a prayer-platform, is surrounded by chambers for travelers, behind which there is a vaulted corridor with quarters for beasts of burden. Ispahan manufactures fabrics, weapons, etc. It was captured by Tamerlane 1387; was the capital and an important city of 600,000 inhabitants in the 17th century; and was sacked by the Afghans in 1722. Population, estimated, 60,000.

Israel (iz'rā-ēl). [Heb., 'Soldier of God,' or 'God is a warrior.'] A name given to Jacob after successfully wrestling with the angel (Gen. xxxii. 28). Hence his descendants were called the people of Israel. See Jews.

Israel. The kingdom of the northern tribes of the Israelites who seceded from the southern tribes in the reign of Rehoboam, 953 B. C. (or perhaps about 975). Their first king was Jeroboam. Prominent succeeding kings were Abah, Jehu, Joram, Jeroboam II., and Pekah. Elijah and Elisha belonged to the northern kingdom. Sargon, king of Assyria, captured Samaria, ended the kingdom, and carried a large part of the people into captivity in 722 or 721 B. C. Their ultimate fate has been the subject of much speculation, and they are frequently referred to as the lost tribes. They have been found in the Anglo-Saxons, the American Indians, etc. There seems to be no doubt, however, that some intermingled with the Assyrians, others returned to the southern kingdom, and still others are to be found in the scattered Jewish communities in Africa, Abyssinia, and elsewhere. Those remaining eventually united with Assyrian colonists and formed the Samaritans.

Israel in Egypt. An English oratorio by Handel, first performed April 4, 1739. The words are thought to have been selected by Handel himself from the Old Testament.

Israels (ēz-rā-äls'), Josef. Born at Groningen, 1824. A genre-painter of the Belgian school. He studied painting at Amsterdam under Kruseman, then went to Paris, where he worked in the atelier of Picot. His works have figured at the expositions of Paris, Brussels, and Rotterdam. He received a first-class medal at Paris in 1878, and a grand prix at the Exposition Universelle at Paris in 1889. Among his pictures are "Les dormeurs" (1868), "Retour" (1878), "Le pot au feu," and "Le jour de repos."

Israfeel, or Israfil (es-rä-fēl'). The angel of music. His voice is more melodious than that of any other creature. He is to sound the resurrection trumpet the last day. Koran.

Issachar (is'ā-kār). [Heb.; meaning doubtful.] 1. One of the patriarchs, son of Jacob and Leah. — 2. One of the twelve tribes of Palestine, dwelling west of the Jordan, south of Zebulon, and north of Manasseh. The territory included the valley of Esdraelon.

Issik-Kul (is'ik-köl). A lake in the province of Semirychensk, central Asia, about lat. 42° 20' N., long. 77° 30' E. Length, 112 miles. Height above sea-level, 5,000 feet.

Issoire (ē-swär'). A town in the department of Puy-de-Dôme, France, situated on the Couze 19 miles south-southeast of Clermont. It was captured by the Protestants in 1573, and was destroyed by the Catholics in 1577. It contains a church of St. Paul. Population (1891), commune, 6,182.

Issoudun (ē-sō-duñ'). A town in the department of Indre, France, situated on the Théols 17 miles northeast of Châteauneuf. It has an old keep (the "Tour Blanche"), and has been often besieged. Population (1891), 13,564.

Issus (is'us). In ancient geography, a town in Cilicia, Asia Minor, situated near the head of the Gulf of Issus (the modern Gulf of Iskanderun). Three notable battles were fought in its neighborhood: Alexander the Great defeated the Persians under Darius III, 333 B. C.; Septimius Severus defeated his rival Pescennius Niger, 194 A. D.; and Heraclius defeated the Persian army of Khusran, 622.

Issy (ē-sē'). A suburb of Paris, immediately southwest of the fortifications. Population (1891), commune, 12,830.

Istambul, or Istamboul (ēs-täm-böl'). A Turkish name of Constantinople.

Istar. See Ihtar.

Ister (is'tēr). A Latin name of the Danube.

Isthmian games. See Isthmian sanctuary.

Isthmian sanctuary, The. A sanctuary in the Isthmus of Corinth, near the eastern mouth of the modern canal. It was the seat of the Isthmian games, which were celebrated every two years, and were second in importance only to those of Olympia. The sacred inclosure, which was strongly fortified in the time of Augustus, is roughly triangular in shape, about 600 feet from east to west, and somewhat more from north to south. Within it were the temples of Poseidon (Doric) and Palemon (Ionic), portions of the architecture of both of which have been recovered. The northern wall of the sanctuary coincides with the great defensive wall crossing the isthmus. Outside of the inclosure, to the south, lies the stadium, in which the chief exercises were held, and to the west is the Roman theater, close behind which was the Greek theater, and beyond the Sacred Vale, with temples to Demeter and Persephone, Artemis, and Bacchus. Almost all topographical knowledge of this historic sanctuary is based upon the exploration made in 1883 by the French School at Athens.

Istib (is-tēb'), or Shtiople (shtē'plē). A town in the vilayet of Kosovo, European Turkey, situated in lat. 41° 41' N., long. 22° 20' E. Population (estimated), 20,000.

Istria (is'tri-ä), formerly Histria (his'tri-ä), G. Istrien (is'tri-en), formerly Histerreich (his'ter-rieh). [Gr. Ἰστρία.] A margravate in the Cisleithan division of Austria-Hungary, which forms with Görz-Gradiska and Trieste the administrative district of Küstenland. Capital, Parenzo. It is a peninsula, projecting into the Adriatic, and bounded by Trieste, Görz-Gradiska, Carniola, and Croatia. The surface is generally mountainous. Fruit and wine are produced in abundance. Istria is a separate crownland, though belonging administratively to Küstenland, and has a Diet of 33 members. Two thirds of the inhabitants are Slavs (Croats, Serbs, and Slovenes), and one third Italians (cities and coast). It was incorporated with Italy about the time of Augustus; was largely settled by Slavs; became a margravate in the 11th century; was in great part acquired by Venice; passed with Venice to Austria in 1797; formed a part of the Illyrian Provinces under Napoleon; and was restored to Austria in 1815. Area, 1,911 square miles. Population (1890), 317,610.

Istria, or Istropolis (is-trop'ō-lis). [Gr. Ἰστρία πόλις, or Ἰστροπόλις.] See the extract.

Istria, Ister, or Istropolis, at the mouth of the Danube or Ister, was a colony of the Milesians, founded about the time of the Cimmerian invasion of Asia Minor. (Peripl. Pont. Eux. p. 157.) Its name remains in the modern Wisler, but its site was probably nearer to Kostendje. Rawlinson, Herod., III. 67, note.

Isturiz (ēs-tō-rēth'), Francisco Xavier de. Born at Cadiz, Spain, 1790; died April 16, 1871. A Spanish politician and diplomatist, leader in the revolution of 1820. He was premier in 1836 and 1846, and subsequently ambassador in London, St. Petersburg, and Paris.

Itaborahy (ē-tā-bō-rā-ē'), Viscount of. See Rodrigues Torres, Joaquim José.

Italians (i-tal'yanz). 1. The primitive inhabitants of Italy. See the extract.

But whatever we make of the Etruscans, the rest of Italy in the older sense was held by various branches of an Aryan race nearly allied to the Greeks, whom we may call the Italians. Of this race there were two great branches. One of them, under various names, seems to have held all the southern part of the western coast of Italy, and to have spread into Sicily. Some of the tribes of this branch seem to have been almost as nearly akin to the Greeks as the Epirota and other kindred nations on the east side of the Adriatic. Of this branch of the Italian race, the most famous people were the Latins; and it was the greatest Latin city, the border city of the Latins against the Etruscans, the city of Rome on the Tiber, which became, step by step, the mistress of Latium, of Italy, and of the Mediterranean world. The other branch, which held a much larger part of the peninsula, taking in the Sabines, Aequians, Volscians, Samnites, Lucanians, and other people who play a great part in Roman history, may perhaps be classed together as Opiicans or Osci, in distinction from the Latins and the other tribes allied to them. These tribes seem to have pressed from the eastern, the Adriatic, coast of Italy, down upon the nations to the south-west of them, and to have largely extended their borders at their expense. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 45.

2. The inhabitants of Italy in general, ancient or modern.

Italian Molière, The. A surname sometimes given to Goldoni.

Italian Pindar, The. A surname sometimes given to Chiabrera.

Italian War of 1859. A war between France (under Napoleon III.) and Sardinia (under Victor Emmanuel) allied against Austria, for the liberation and unity of Italy. Victories were won by the allies at Montebello May 20, 1859, at Magenta June 4, and at Solferino June 24. Preliminaries of peace were negotiated at Villafranca July 11, and the treaty of Zurich was signed Nov. 10. The work of unifying Italy, begun by this war, was continued in 1860, 1866, and 1870.

Italica (i-tal'ik-ä). An ancient Roman town near Seville in Spain. It has ruins of an amphitheater, and was the birthplace of Trajan, Hadrian, and Theodosius.

Italiens (ē-tä-lyan'), Boulevard des. A famous street in the central part of Paris.

Italiens, Les. See Théâtre Italien.

Italy (it'ä-lē). [Gr. Ἰταλία, L. It. Sp. Pg. Italia, F. Italie, G. Italien.] 1. A kingdom of southern Europe, bounded by Switzerland and Austria-Hungary on the north, Austria-Hungary, the Adriatic Sea, and the Mediterranean on the east, the Mediterranean on the south, and France and the Mediterranean on the west. Capital, Rome. It comprises also Sicily, Sardinia, and some smaller islands, and is divided into 69 provinces (comprising 17 compartimenti). The government is a hereditary constitutional monarchy, with a parliament consisting of a senate of 300 members and a chamber of 508 deputies. The prevailing religion is Roman Catholic; the prevailing language Italian. The northern districts of the country are occupied by the Alps. South of these is the valley of the Po; and the boot-shaped peninsula in the center and south is traversed by the Apennines. The leading industry is agriculture, the chief products being cereals, wine, silk, olives, oranges, lemons, etc. The chief manufacture is silk; the chief exports silk, olive-oil, fruit, wine, and sulphur. The following are the leading events and incidents in Italian history: early occupied by the Iapygians, Oscans, Latins, Volscians, Sabines, Etruscans, Ligurians, Veneti (see Rome, Etruria, Magna Græcia); entry of the Gauls into northern Italy about the 6th century B. C.; the peninsula consolidated under Roman rule, first half of the 3d century B. C.; Roman Empire of the West overthrown by the Heruli and other tribes under Odoacer, 476 A. Protectorates: Abyssinia, Somaliland, Gallaland, Afar Country, etc.

The name of Italy has been used in several meanings at different times, but it has always meant either the whole or a part of the land which we now call Italy. The name gradually spread itself out from the extreme south to the north. At the time when our survey begins, the name did not go beyond the long narrow peninsula itself; and indeed it hardly took in the whole of that. During the time of the Roman commonwealth Italy did not reach beyond the little rivers Macra on one side, near Luna, and Rubico on the other side, near Ariminum. The land to the north, as far as the Alps, was not counted for Italy till after the time of Cæsar. Freeman, Hist. Geog., p. 43.

Northern Italy deserves its German appellation of Wallschland; for neither the Roman nor the Lombard conquest, nor the ravages of Goths, Huns, or Vandals, ever rooted out the offspring of those Gallic hordes which settled in the plain of the Po four centuries before our era. Rawlinson, Herod., III. 185.

2. One of the four great prefectures in the later Roman Empire. It comprised the dioceses of Italy, Illyricum, and Africa, corresponding to Italy and neighboring islands, that part of the Austrian empire and Germany northward to the Danube, and nearly all the western part of the Roman possessions in Africa.

3. A diocese of the later Roman prefecture of Italy. It comprised Italy and neighboring islands, and Rhetia (Tyrol, Grisons, southern Bavaria), and had 17 provinces.

Iturbide (ē-tōr-bē'dā). Agustin de. Born at Valladolid (now Morelia), Sept. 27, 1783; died at Padilla, Tamaulipas, July 19, 1824. A Mexican revolutionist, afterward emperor. He was a colonel in the Spanish army, and in 1820 was in command of the forces operating against Guerrero in the south. On Feb. 24, 1821, he published the celebrated manifesto known as the "Plan of Iguala," in which he proposed that Mexico should be made independent under a Spanish Bourbon prince. Guerrero and other leaders quickly adhered to this plan; the viceroy was forced to resign; and O'Donojo, who succeeded him, was induced to recognize the independence of Mexico in his sovereign's name. But Ferdinand VII. regarded the movement as a rebellion, and refused the crown which was offered to him. After much quarreling, Iturbide himself was proclaimed emperor May 18, 1822, and was crowned July 21. A strong opposition to him was quickly manifested. Santa Anna proclaimed a republic at Vera Cruz; an army of insurgents marched on Mexico; and in March, 1823, Iturbide was forced to resign. He was allowed to retire to Europe with a large pension, on condition that he should not return. Attempting to enter the country in July, 1824, he was arrested and shot.

Iturbide, Agustin de. Born 1863. Grandson of the emperor Iturbide. His mother was a native of the United States. In 1865 he was adopted by the emperor Maximilian, and made heir to the Mexican throne. After Maximilian's death he was taken to the United States, where he received part of his education. He is now (1894) an officer in the Mexican army.

Ituzingó (ē-tō-zā-ēng-rō'). A plain and rivulet in the southwestern part of the state of Rio Grande do Sul, Brazil, near the river Santa Maria; a southern branch of the Ibicuy. Ivory Gate, The. In classical mythology, the gate of sleep by which false dreams are sent from the lower world.

Ivrea (ē-vrā'ā). A town in the province of Turin, Italy, situated on the Dora Baltea 29 miles north-northeast of Turin; the ancient Eporodia. It was a Roman colony; was for a time the capital of a marquise of Ivrea; and was ceded to Savoy in 1248. It has a cathedral and castle. Population, commune, about 10,000.

Ivris (i-vrēs'), or Ibreez (i-bréz'). See the extract.

More than a century ago a German traveller had observed two figures carved on a wall of rock near Ibreez, or Ivris, in the territory of the ancient Lykaonia. One of them was a god who carried in his hand a stalk of corn and a bunch of grapes; the other was a man who stood before the god in an attitude of adoration. Both figures were shod with boots with upturned ends, and the deity wore a tunic that reached to his knees, while on his head was a peaked cap ornamented with horn-like ribbons. A century elapsed before the sculpture was again visited by an European traveller, and it was again a German who found his way to the spot. On this occasion a drawing was made of the figures, which was published by Ritter in his great work on the geography of the world. But the drawing was poor and imperfect, and the first attempt to do adequate justice to the original was made by the Rev. E. J. Davis in 1875. He published his copy, and an account of the monument, in the Transactions of the Society of Biblical Archeology the following year. He had noticed that the figures were accompanied by what were known at the time as Ilamathite characters. Three lines of these were inserted between the face of the god and his uplifted left arm, four lines more were engraved behind his worshipper, while below, on a level with an aqueduct which fed a mill, were yet other lines of half-obliterated hieroglyphs. It was plain that in Lykaonia also, where the old language of the country still lingered in the days of St. Paul, the Hitite system of writing had once been used.

Soyce, Hittites, p. 61.

Ivry-la-Bataille (ēv-rō'lā-bā-tāy'). A village in the department of Eure, France, 42 miles west of Paris. Here, March 14, 1590, Henry IV. defeated the Catholic Leaguers under the Duke of Mayenne. A memorial pyramid has been erected on the battle-field.

Ixion (iks-i'on). [Gr. Ἰξίων.] In Greek legend, a king of the Lapithæ, father of Pirithous, and father by a cloud (which was caused by Zeus to take the form of Hera) of the Centaurs. For boasting of the favors of the fictitious goddess, he was punished in the lower world by being fastened to an ever-revolving wheel.

Ixion in Heaven. A burlesque by Benjamin Disraeli, published in 1828.

Iztaccihuatl. See Iztaccihuatl.

Ixtapalapa (ēs-tā-pā-lā-pā). A village of Mexico, in the Federal District, 7 miles southeast of Mexico City. Before the Spanish conquest it was a place of importance on the canal between Lakes Tezcucō and Chalco, and was noted for its gardens. On an adjoining hill the sacred fire was kindled at the beginning of each cycle of 52 years. Population, about 3,000. Also written Ixtapalapan or Ixtapalapan.

Ixtlilxochitl (ēs-tēl-lē-hō-chēt'l), or Ixtlilxochitl (ēs-tēl-lē-hō-chēt'l). Born at Tezcucō, Mexico, about 1500. A son of the chief of Tezcucō, in Mexico, who, on his father's death, disputed the succession with his brother, Cacama (1516). The war ended in a division of the kingdom. Cortés supported the pretensions of Ixtlilxochitl and deposed Cacama. The former subsequently aided Cortés in various campaigns.

Ixtlilxochitl, Fernando de Alva Cortés. Born about 1568; died about 1648. A Mexican historian, of native race, descended from the ancient kings of Tezcucō. He was an official interpreter, and, by order of the viceroy, wrote various works on the ancient Mexicans. His history of the Chichimecs was published in the Kingsborough collection, and a French translation was printed by Ternaux-Compans in 1840.

Izabal (ē-thā-bāl'). A seaport of Guatemala, situated on Lake Izabal 107 miles northeast of Guatemala.

Izabal, Lake. A lake in Guatemala, communicating with the Caribbean Sea by the Rio Dulce. Length, about 30 miles. Also Golfo Dulce.

Izabel de Bragança (ē-zā-bel' de brā-gān'sā), Princess. Born at Rio de Janeiro, July 29, 1846. The eldest daughter of the emperor Pedro II. of Brazil, and heiress to the Brazilian throne until the abdication of her father in 1889. On Oct. 15, 1864, she married Louis Gaston d'Orléans, Comte d'Eu, by whom she has three living sons. During the absence of the emperor in Europe and America she was three times regent (1871-72, 1876-77, 1886-89). She favored the clerical party.

Izalco (ē-thāl'kō). [Nahuatl.] A volcano in the western part of Salvador, 6,328 feet high, which rose quite suddenly in the latter half of the 18th century. Ever since that time it has been almost constantly active, the eruptions occurring at very short intervals. Occasionally there are more violent outbreaks, as that of March 19, 1869.

Izar (ē-zār'). [Ar. al-izār, the girdle.] The bright third-magnitude star ε Boötis, a beautifully colored double star in the waist of the constellation.

Izard (iz'ard), Ralph. Born near Charleston, S. C., 1742; died May 30, 1804. An American politician, United States senator from South Carolina 1789-95.

Izcohuatl (ēs-kō-wāt'l), or Izcoatzin (ēs-kō-āt-sēn'). [Nahuatl, 'obsidian snake.'] Born about 1360; died in 1436. War-chief or (so-called) emperor of ancient Mexico from 1427. Under him the city first rose into prominence, and became the dominant power of the lake valley. Also Izcoatl, Izcoatl, etc.

Izdubar (iz-dō-bār'), also called Gilgamesh (gil-gā'mesh'). The principal hero of certain ancient Babylonian legends. They are called the Babylonian "Nimrod Epic," because Izdubar was considered the prototype of Nimrod, who is mentioned in Genesis x. The exploits of Izdubar are briefly as follows: Erech (Orchoe of the Greeks, modern Warka), the capital of Shinar (Shumir), had been governed by Du-uzi (Tammuz, Adonis), the husband of Ishtar. After his tragic death it was subjected by the Elamite invaders. In this emergency Izdubar comes from his native place, Marad, to Erech, and with the help of the demigod Ea-bani kills the last Elamite usurper Khumbaba, and delivers Erech. Thereupon Ishtar offers him her love and hand, but is roughly rejected by him and reminded of her former amours, which brought only ruin and death to the lovers. The insulted goddess cries to her father Ann for revenge. Ann creates a monstrous bull and sends it against Erech, but the animal is easily killed by Izdubar with the assistance of his friend Ea-bani. At last Ishtar prevails on her mother Anatu to smite Ea-bani with death, and Izdubar with a loathsome disease, a kind of leprosy. To get rid of his malady and to bring back his friend to life, Izdubar decides to seek for his ancestor Uasisadra, who was translated to the seat of the blessed and enjoys there immortality with the gods. After many adventures he reaches him. Uasisadra describes to him the deluge which once took place, and how he with his friends was saved in a ship that he had built at the advice of the god Ea, and then cures him of his disease. Izdubar thereupon returns to Erech, and upon his lamentation for Ea-bani the gods grant the latter the privilege of returning from the under world.

Iztaccihuatl (ēs-tāk-sē'hwāt'l), or Iztaccihuatl. [Nahuatl, from iztae, white, and cihuatl, woman.] A mountain in Mexico, north of Popocatepetl. Height, 16,960 feet. The name originated on the west side, where the mountain bears some resemblance to a woman lying extended in a white shroud. The summit is covered by glaciers.

Jabalpur (jub-al-pör'), or Jubbulpore (jub-bnl-pör'). 1. A division of the Central Provinces, British India. Area, 18,688 square miles. Population (1881), 2,201,633.—2. A district in the Jabalpur division, intersected by lat. 23° N., long. 78° E.

Area, 3,918 square miles. Population (1881), 687,233.—3. The capital of the district of Jabalpur, about lat. 23° 10' N., long. 80° 3' E. It is an important trading center. Population, including cantonment (1891), 84,480.

Jabbah (jab'bä). [Ar. iklil al-jebah, crown of the forehead.] The fine triple star ν Scorpii, of the fourth magnitude.

Jabbok (jab'ok). In Bible geography, a mountain stream of Gilead, Palestine, joining the Jordan about 25 miles north of the Dead Sea; the modern Zarka. Length, about 50 miles.

Jabesh, or Jabesh-Gilead (jä'besh-gil'ē-ad). [Heb., 'dry.'] In Bible geography, an important town in Gilead, Palestine. Its situation has not been identified.

Jabez (jä'bez). A person mentioned in 1 Chron. iv. 9, 10 as more honorable than his brethren.

Jabin (jä'bin). [Heb., 'intelligent.'] In Old Testament history: (a) A king of Hazor in Palestine, defeated by Joshua by the waters of Merom. Josh. xi. 1-3. (b) A king of Hazor, whose general, Siserä, was defeated by Barak. Judges iv. The accounts of these two kings and their overthrow are very much alike, and probably relate to the same person and event.

Jablunka (yab-lön'kä) Pass. A pass across the Carpathians in Austria-Hungary. It connects the basins of the Olsa in Austrian Silesia and the Waag in Hungary, and is traversed by a railway. Height, 1,970 feet.

Jahne (jab'ne), or Jabneel (jab'ne-el or jab'nēl), later Jamnia (jam'ni-ä or jam-ni'ü). A Philistine city which fell to the lot of the tribe of Dan, situated between Joppa and Ashdod, about an hour distant from the Mediterranean; the modern village of Yebna or Inna. It was conquered by the Maccabees; given by Augustus to Herod; and by the will of Salome, sister of Herod, became private property of the imperial house, but was destined to play an important part in Jewish history. During the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans, Titus granted permission to Jochanan ben Zaccai to establish there a Talmudic school. After the fall of Jerusalem a sanhedrin was also constituted, and Jahne became for centuries the center and nursery of the religious and national life of the dispersed Jewish community.

Jaboatão (zhä-bwä-tiän'). Antonio de Santa Maria. Born near Pernambuco, 1695; died after 1761. A Brazilian Franciscan author. He occupied various posts in his order, of which he was chronicler in Brazil. His most important work is the "Orbe Seraphico Novo Brasilico" (Part I, Lisbon, 1761; Part II, Rio de Janeiro, 1859). It is a history of the Seraphic Franciscans in Brazil, and contains much of general interest.

Jaca (hä'kä). A town in the province of Huesca, Spain, situated on the Aragon 66 miles north-northeast of Saragossa. It has a cathedral, and was formerly important.

Jachin (jä'kin). [Heb., '(God) establishes.'] 1. The fourth son of Simeon. Gen. xlvii. 10.—2. A priest, head of the 21st course, in the time of David.—3. A column set up in the court of Solomon's temple. Its companion was named Boaz.

The two pillars, Jachin and Boaz, were regarded as Hiram's chief d'œuvres, but were constructed, probably, in several pieces. The shafts, the capitals, and the bases were certainly distinct, and it is not certain that even the shafts were in one piece. The wonderfulness of the pillars was in their ornamentation rather than in their construction. Each was adorned with "chain-work" and "checker-work" (1 Kings vii. 17), with "nets" and with "pomegranates," two hundred of these, in two rows, being embossed on either column (1 Kings vii. 42).

Rauflinson, Phœnicia, p. 100.

Jachmann (yäch'män), Eduard Karl Emanuel. Born at Dantzig, Prussia, March 2, 1822; died at Oldenburg, Oct. 23, 1887. A German vice-admiral. He defeated the Danes near Jasmund March 17, 1864. He became president of the ministry of marine in 1867, and vice-admiral in 1868, and was commander-in-chief in the North Sea 1870-71.

Jack (jak). Captain. See the extract.

Another ally appeared at the camp. This was a personage long known in Western fireside story as Captain Jack, the Black Hunter, or the Black Rifle. It was said of him that, having been a settler on the farthest frontier, in the valley of the Juniata, he returned one evening to his cabin and found it burned to the ground by Indians, and the bodies of his wife and children lying among the ruins. He vowed undying vengeance, raised a band of kindred spirits, dressed and painted like Indians, and became the scourge of the red man and the champion of the white. But he and his wild crew, useful as they might have been, shocked Braddock's sense of military fitness; and he received them so coldly that they left him.

Parkman, Montcalm and Wolfe, I. 204.

Jack, Colonel. See Colonel Jack.

Jack and Jill. An English nursery song. Jill or Gill is an abbreviation of the once common feminine name Gillian or Julian (L. Juliana). In Icelandic mythology, Jack and Jill are two children kidnapped by the moon, while drawing water, which is carried on their shoulders in a bucket suspended from a pole. The Swedish peasants still account for the moon-spots in this way. A play with this title was popular at the English court between 1567 and 1578.

Jack and the Bean-stalk. An English nursery tale, founded on a world-wide myth. It is found among the Zulus of South Africa and the North American Indians, as well as among the races of Aryan descent.

Jack and the Bean-stalk may be added to the series of English nursery tales derived from the Teutonic. The bean-stalk is a descendant of the wonderful ash in the "Edda." Halliwell, Nursery Rhymes, p. 175.

Jack the Giant-killer. The hero of a nursery legend. The story was originally in Walter Map's book, and he obtained it from France in the early part of the 12th century. It was written in British or Armorican, and translated into Latin by Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Jack Brag. A novel by Theodore Hook, published in 1837. Jack Brag is a vulgar braggart who contrives to get into good society.

Jack Horner. An old nursery rime, the hero of which "sat in a corner eating his Christmas pie." It is one of the oldest of this class of rimes. A copy of his "pleasant history" is to be found in the Bodleian Library, which is in substance much the same as "The Fryer and the Boy," published in London 1617. Halliwell says "both are from the more ancient 'Jack and his Step-dame,' printed by Mr. Wright."

Jack-in-the-Green. A puppet character in the English May-day games.

Jackson (jak'son). [The surname Jackson stands for Jack's son.] A city and the capital of Jackson County, Michigan, situated on the Grand River 75 miles west of Detroit. It has flourishing manufactures and trade. Population (1890), 20,798.

He was member of Congress from Tennessee 1796-97; United States senator 1797-98; justice of the Supreme Court of Tennessee 1798-1804; defeated the Creeks at Talladega in 1813, and at Emuckfau and Horseshoe Bend in 1814; captured Pensacola from the English in 1814; defeated the English under Sir Edward Pakenham at New Orleans Jan. 8, 1815; commanded against the Seminoles 1817-18; was governor of Florida Territory in 1821; was United States senator from Tennessee 1823-25; was an unsuccessful candidate for President 1824; was elected as the Democratic candidate for President in 1828; and was re-elected in 1832. He inaugurated the "spoils system" in Federal politics by dismissing about 600 office-holders during the first year of his administration, as against 74 removals by all the preceding Presidents. In July, 1832, he vetoed a bill rechartering the Bank of the United States. He published, Dec. 11, 1832, a proclamation in answer to the nullification ordinance passed by South Carolina Nov. 24, 1832, declaring void certain obnoxious duties on imports. In this proclamation he announced his intention of enforcing the Federal laws, and ordered United States troops to Charleston and Augusta, with the result that the nullifiers submitted.

Jackson, Charles Thomas. Born at Plymouth, Mass., June 21, 1805; died at Somerville, Mass., Aug. 29, 1880. An American geologist and physician. He graduated at the Harvard Medical School in 1829, and after having completed his studies abroad practised medicine for a time at Boston. He eventually abandoned medicine, and in 1838 opened a laboratory at Boston for instruction in analytical chemistry. He became State geologist of Maine in 1836, and of Rhode Island in 1839, and in 1847 was appointed by Congress to survey the mineral lands of Michigan. He constructed in 1834 a telegraphic apparatus similar to that patented by Morse in 1835, and in 1852 he received a prize from the French Academy for the discovery of etherization.

Jackson, Thomas Jonathan, commonly called Stonewall Jackson. Born at Clarksburg, W. Va., Jan. 21, 1824; died near Chancellorsville, Va., May 10, 1863. A noted Confederate general in the American Civil War. He graduated at West Point in 1846; served as a lieutenant in the Mexican war; and resigned from the army in 1852, having become (1851) professor of physics and artillery tactics in Virginia Military Institute. He joined the Confederate army at the beginning of the Civil War, and served as a brigadier-general at the first battle of Bull Run, July 21, 1861. Leaving at a critical period in this engagement been sent forward to restore the battle on the Confederate left, he maintained an exposed position against great odds until the broken forces were enabled to rally. In rallying his troops General Bernard E. Bee cried: "See, there is Jackson standing like a stone wall! Rally on the Virginians!" (whence the sobriquet Stonewall Jackson). He was promoted major-general in Sept., 1861; was defeated by General Shields near Winchester, March 23, 1862; defeated General Banks at Winchester, May 25, 1862; fought an indecisive battle with General Fremont at Cross Keys, June 8, 1862; commanded a corps at the battles of Gaines's Mill, June 27, and Malvern Hill, July 1, 1862; defeated General Banks at Cedar Mountain, Virginia, Aug. 9, 1862; captured Harper's Ferry, Sept. 15, 1862; participated in the battle of Antietam, Sept. 17, 1862; commanded the right wing at Fredericksburg, Dec. 13, 1862; was promoted lieutenant-general; and was mortally wounded by his own men at the battle of Chancellorsville on the evening of May 2, 1863, as he was returning from a reconnaissance beyond the lines.

Jack Sprat. An English nursery rime.

Few children's rhymes are more common than those relating to Jack Sprat and his wife. "Jack Sprat could eat no fat," etc.; but it is little thought they have been current for two centuries. Such, however, is the fact, and when Howell published his Collection of Proverbs in 1650, p. 20, the story related to no less exalted a personage than an archdeacon:

"Archdeacon Pratt would eat no fat,
His wife would eat no lean;
'Twixt Archdeacon Pratt and Joan his wife,
The meat was eat up clean."
Italian, Nursery Rhymes.

Jack Tier. A novel by Cooper, published in 1848. It is a recasting of "The Red Rover."

Jacob (jä'kōb). [F. Jacobe, Sp. Jacobo, It. Jacopo, Giacobo, G. Dan. Sw. Jakob (in vernacular F. Jacques, Jaques, whence E. Jack), from Ll. Jacobus, Gr. Ἰακώβ, Heb. Yaqōbh, of uncertain origin, but explained as 'supplanter.' See James.] The son of Isaac and Rebekah, and twin brother of Esau: father of the twelve patriarchs, and ancestor of the Israelites. The date of his immigration into Egypt is given by Brugsch as about 1730 B. C.

A kind of synonym of Israel was Jakobel, "He whom El rewards," or "He who follows El, who marches step by step in the ways that He has traced." This name was abridged to Jacob, as that of Irahmel was to Irahm, or Calbel to Caleb. Beni-Jacob or Beni-Israel was the name of the tribe; and in course of time Jacob was taken to be a living person, grandson of Abraham.

Renan, Hist. of the People of Israel, 1. 90.

Jacobabad (jä'kōb-ä-bad'). ['Jacob's city,' named from Gen. John Jacob, 1847.] A town and military station in Sind, British India, about lat. 28° 14' N., long. 68° 28' E.

Jacobins (jak'ō-binz). 1. In France, the black or Dominican friars: so called from the Church of St. Jacques (Jacobus), in which they were first established in Paris.—2. The members of a club or society of French revolutionists organized in 1789 under the name of Society of Friends of the Constitution, and called Jacobins from the Jacobin convent in Paris in which they met. The club originally included many of the moderate leaders of the Revolution, but the more violent members speedily gained the control. It had branches in all parts of France, and was all-powerful in determining the course of government, especially after Robespierre became its leader, supporting him in the measures which led to the Reign of Terror. Many of its members were executed with Robespierre in July, 1794, and the club was suppressed in November.

Jacotot (zhä-kō-tō'), Jean Joseph. Born at Dijon, France, March 4, 1770; died at Paris, July, 1840. A French educator, professor of the French language and literature at Louvain 1818-40. He devised a method of instruction which is described in his "L'Enseignement universel" (1823).

His method of teaching is based on three principles: 1. All men have an equal intelligence; 2. Every man has received from God the faculty of being able to instruct himself; 3. Every thing is in every thing. The first of these principles is certainly wrong, although Jacotot tried to explain it by asserting that, although men had the same intelligence, they differed widely in the will to make use of it. Still, it is important to assert that nearly all men are capable of receiving some intellectual education, provided the studies to which they are directed are wide enough to engage their faculties, and the means taken to interest them are sufficiently ingenious. The second principle lays down that it is more necessary to stimulate the pupil to learn for himself than to teach him didactically. The third principle explains the process which Jacotot adopted. To one learning a language for the first time he would give a short passage of a few lines, and encourage the pupil to study first the words, then the letters, then the grammar, then the full meaning of the expressions, until by iteration and accretion a single paragraph took the place of an entire literature. Encyc. Brit., VII. 677.

Jaimini (jī'mi-ni). A Hindu saint and philosopher, said to have been the pupil of Vyasa, to have received from him the Samaveda, and to have founded the Purvamimansa school of Hindu philosophy.

Jainas (jī'nāj), or Jains (jīnz). [From Skt. jina, the victorious one.] A Hindu sect which numbers about 380,000, at least half of whom are in the Bombay Presidency. They are the followers of Jina, the "victorious," as the Buddhists of Buddha, the "awakened." A Jina is a sage who has reached omniscience, and who comes to reestablish the corrupted law. There have been 24 Jinas, as Buddha had 24 predecessors. They succeeded each other at immense intervals, their stature and term of life always decreasing. Like the Buddhas, the Jinas became deities. They have goddesses, Shasanevies, who execute their commands. Their images, sometimes colossal, especially in the Deccan, are numerous in the sanctuaries, which are almost all of a distinctive and elegant type. Next to the Jinas rank their immediate disciples, the Ganadharas, worshiped as guardian saints, and many deities borrowed from the Hindu pantheon, but who do not share the regular cultus. This cultus is akin to the Buddhist in having the same offerings and acts of faith and homage. Both use little bells. In both women have the same rights as men, and both practise confession, value pilgrimages, and devote four months of the year especially to fasting, reading their Scriptures, and meditation. The Jainas, like the Buddhists, reject the Veda as corrupt, to which they oppose their own Agnas as the true Veda. They have no sacerdotal caste. They observe the rules of caste among themselves, but without attaching to them religious significance. They have promoted literature and science, especially astronomy, grammar, and romantic literature. Like the Buddhists they are divided into a clerical body and a lay (Yatis, "ascetics," and Shravakas, "hearers"), but the monastic system is less developed. They have two principal sects: the Svetambaras, "having white garments," and the Digambaras, "those having the air as their garment," who go naked—designations applied to both clergy and laity. The first have the highest rank, but the second are more ancient. Both sects go back perhaps to the 5th century A. D. They are rather rivals than enemies. Another division is that into Northern and Southern Jainas, which, originally geographical, has extended to the canon and the entire body of traditions and usages. The Digambara Yatis now practise nudity only at their meals when these are taken in common. No Hindu sect is more rigorous in respect for and abstinence from everything that has life, though the Southern Jainas frequently practised religious suicide in the middle ages. The general doctrine of the Jainas is nearly like that of the Buddhists. They are atheists. The world is eternal. They deny the possibility of a perfect being existing from all eternity. The Jina became perfect. As the Buddhists have their Adibuddha, the Jainas have also returned to a sort of deism in their Jinapati, a supreme Jina. Beings are animate and inanimate. Animate beings are composed of soul and body, and their souls are eternal—a point of deviation from Buddhism. Not existence but life is evil to the Jainas, and Nirvana is to them not annihilation, but entrance into endless blessedness. The Jina reveals the means, the Triratna, the "three jewels," perfect faith in the Jina, perfect knowledge of his doctrine, perfect conduct. The parallelism of Buddhist and Jaina doctrine and usage extends also to the traditions in so many points that some have believed Yarthmanava or Mahavira, "the great hero," the Jina of the present age, to be identical with Gautama; but Bühler thinks he has discovered data which prove that Mahavira was a real personage, distinct from Gautama, whose real name was Nirgrantha Jinatiputra, i. e. the ascetic of the Jnatia, a Rajput tribe. Still Jainism must, in view of the affiliation of its doctrines, be regarded as a sect that took its rise in Buddhism. The Scriptures of the Svetambaras Jainas are comprised in 45 works, in 6 groups, collectively called Agamas, and written in a Prakrit dialect called Ardhamagadhi; those of the Digambaras are in Sanskrit, and still little known.

Jalapa, or Xalapa (hā-lā'pā), Aztee Xalapan. [See the extract below.] The capital of the state of Vera Cruz, Mexico, situated about 60 miles northwest of Vera Cruz. Population (1892), 18,000.

Jalapa (meaning 'place of water and sand') was an Indian town at the time of the Conquest; and because of its position on what, for a long while, was the main road between Vera Cruz and the City of Mexico it early became a place of importance. After the organization of the Republic it was for a time capital of the state of Vera Cruz. Between the years 1720 and 1777 a great annual fair was held here for the sale of the goods brought yearly by the fleet from Cadiz; whence is derived the name Jalapa de la Feria, frequently applied to the city in documents of the last century. Janvier, Mex. Guide, p. 435.

Jalaun (jā-loun'). 1. A district in the Jhansi division, Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 26° N., long. 79° E. Area, 1,469 square miles. Population (1881), 418,142.—2. A town in the district of Jalaun, in lat. 26° 9' N., long. 79° 22' E. Population, about 10,000.

Jamadagni (jā-mad-ag'nī). A rishi often mentioned with Vishvamitra as an enemy of Vasishtha, and sometimes as a descendant of Bhriгу. In epic poetry he is the son of Bhargava Richika and the father of five sons, of whom the most renowned was Parasurama. The Mahabharata and Vishnu Purana contain various legends regarding him.

Jamaica (jā-mā'kī). An island of the Greater Antilles, West Indies, belonging to Great Britain, situated in the Caribbean Sea 90 miles south of the eastern part of Cuba. Capital, Kingston. The surface is generally mountainous, the Blue Mountains in the east rising to 7,360 feet. The island has abundant vegetable and some mineral resources. The chief exports are sugar, rum, coffee, fruits, dye-woods, etc. Jamaica is a crown colony, with a governor, privy council, and legislative assembly. It was discovered by Columbus May 4, 1494; was settled by the Spaniards in 1509; and was conquered by the English in 1655. Many risings of the Maroons (or runaway slaves) occurred in the 18th century. The slaves were emancipated by purchase in 1834. A negro insurrection in 1865 was suppressed by Governor Eyre. The Caicos and Turks Islands, Cayman Islands, and a few smaller islands are dependencies of Jamaica. Length, 144 miles. Greatest width, 50 miles. Area, 4,200 square miles. Population (estimated, March, 1892), 649,524, including about 500,000 blacks, 120,000 colored, and only 20,000 whites, the remainder being coolies.

Jambudvīpa (jām-bū-dwē'pā). A name of India in Sanskrit poetry, and restricted to India in Buddhist writings, but strictly a poetical name for the whole earth, of which India was thought to be the most important part. In the Mahabharata the world is divided into seven circular dvipas, or continents, of which Jambudvīpa is the first, surrounded respectively by seven oceans in concentric belt; the mountain Meru, or abode of the gods, being in the center of Jambudvīpa, which again is divided into nine Varshas, or countries separated by eight ranges of mountains, the Varsha called Bharata (India) lying south of the Himavat (Himalaya) range. Jambudvīpa is so named from the Jambu (rose-apple) trees which abound in it, or from an enormous Jambu tree on Mount Meru.

Jamburg (yām'bōrg). A town in the government of St. Petersburg, Russia, situated on the Luga 68 miles southwest of St. Petersburg. Population, 4,238.

James (jāmz). [The E. name James, dial. also James (whence colloq. Jem and Jim), is from ME. James, also Jam, from OF. James, another form of Jaques, Jacques, from LL. Jacobus, Jacob. See Jacob.] There are several persons of this name who hold an important place in New Testament history. (1) The son of Zebedee and brother of the apostle John. Originally a fisherman, he was called to be a disciple of Jesus and an apostle. He was killed by Herod Agrippa (A. D. 44), and is the only apostle whose death is recorded in the Scriptures. According to one legend, he traveled and preached in Spain; according to another, his body was miraculously conveyed to Compostella, in Spain, and worshipped there. (2) "James the Lord's brother," author of the "Epistle of James." He is described as holding office in the church at Jerusalem, and appears to have been president of the council that met there in A. D. 50 or 51. He is also called "James the less" (or "the little") (Mark xv. 40), and in early church history "James the Just." (3) An apostle, distinguished as "James the son of Alphaeus," identified by many with "James the Lord's brother."

James, The General Epistle of. A New Testament epistle, written by "James the Lord's brother." It was written from Jerusalem, and is addressed to the twelve tribes of the Dispersion. Its main object is to inculcate the importance of practical morality.

James I. Born at Dunfermline, 1394; died Feb. 20, 1437. King of Scotland 1406-37, son of Robert III. and Annabella Drummond. He was captured by the English while on his way to France, and was detained in captivity until 1423. He repressed the great feudatories with the assistance of the clergy and the burghs, and maintained peaceful relations both with England and with France. He was murdered at Perth by the Earl of Atholl and Robert Graham.

James II. Born Oct. 16, 1430; died Aug. 3, 1460. King of Scotland 1437-60, son of James I. and Jane, daughter of the Earl of Somerset. He continued his father's policy of repressing the great feudatories with the assistance of the clergy and the burghs; and on Feb. 22, 1452, stabbed with his own hand the Earl of Douglas, who had entered into a treasonable alliance with the Earls of Crawford and of Ross, and whom he had enticed to Stirling by a safe-conduct. He was accidentally killed by a wedge from a bombard at the siege of Roxburgh.

James III. Born July 10, 1451; died June 11, 1488. King of Scotland 1460-88, son of James II. and Mary of Guelders. He favored men of inferior rank to the neglect of the great feudal houses, which provoked a rising of the latter under his son James. He was defeated by the rebels at Sauchieburn, June 11, 1488, and was killed in the fight.

James IV. Born March 17, 1473; died Sept. 9, 1513. King of Scotland 1488-1513, son of James III. and Margaret, daughter of Christian I. of Denmark. He headed the rebellious nobles who defeated and killed his father at the battle of Sauchieburn, June 11, 1488. He maintained peaceful relations with Henry VII. of England, whose daughter Margaret he married in 1502; but was forced by the aggressive attitude of Henry VIII. to seek an offensive alliance with France. He was defeated and killed by the Earl of Surrey at Flodden Field, Sept. 9, 1513, during an invasion of England in Henry's absence in France.

James V. Born at Linlithgow, April 10, 1512; died Dec. 14, 1542. King of Scotland 1513-42, son of James IV. and Margaret, daughter of Henry VII. of England. During his minority the regency was conducted first by his mother, and afterward by the Duke of Albany. He assumed personal exercise of the royal prerogatives in 1528. He was a vigorous administrator, protected the poor against oppression from the nobles, and mingled freely with the commons (sometimes under the incognito of "the Gndeman of Ballinbreich"), whence he is often called "the king of the commons." He became involved in war with England in 1542, and suffered the loss of an army under Sinclair at Solway Moss, Nov. 24, 1542.

James I. Born in Edinburgh Castle, June 19, 1566; died at Theobalds, March 27, 1625. King of England, Scotland, and Ireland 1603-25, son of Lord Darnley and Mary Queen of Scots. He became, on the abdication of his mother, king of Scotland as James VI. July 24, 1567; and by virtue of his descent, both through his father and his mother, from Margaret Tudor, daughter of Henry VII., succeeded to the English throne on the death of Elizabeth without issue, March 24, 1603, being crowned king of England (and Ireland) July 25, 1603. He was a learned but pedantic, weak, and incapable monarch, whence he was aptly characterized by the Duc de Sully as the "wisest fool in Europe." In domestic politics he sought to assert the theory of the divine right of kingship and of episcopacy; in his foreign relations he strove to maintain peace at all hazards, even to the prejudice of his natural allies, the Protestant powers on the Continent. He presided, in 1604, over the Hampton Court Conference between the bishops and the Puritans, at which the latter sought but failed to obtain a relaxation of the laws directed against nonconformists. In the same year he concluded peace with Spain, with which he had inherited a war from his predecessor in England; and appointed a commission to revise the English translation of the Bible, which commission completed the so-called King James version in 1611. He sanctioned in 1606 penal laws of increased severity against the Roman Catholics in consequence of the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot (which see) in the preceding year, and granted a patent organizing the London and Plymouth companies, the former of which founded the settlement of Jamestown in 1607, while a band of English separatists from Holland founded, without authority, the settlement of Plymouth in the territory of the latter in 1620. Another important event which took place in 1606 was the restoration of episcopacy in Scotland. He began in 1611 negotiations for the marriage of his eldest son Charles with a Spanish princess; and in the same year entered into a defensive alliance with the Protestant Union in Germany, which was followed in 1613 by the marriage of his daughter Elizabeth to the elector palatine Frederick V., head of the union. He refused to assist his son-in-law in the struggle with the emperor Ferdinand II, for the crown of Bohemia (see Frederick V., elector palatine, Ferdinand II., emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, and Thirty Years' War); and after the defeat of Frederick by the Imperialists on the White Hill, and the invasion of the Palatinate by the Spanish troops in 1620, sought by futile negotiations to induce Philip III. of Spain to reinstate Frederick in the electorate and to assist in restoring peace. In answer to a rebuke from the king for meddling in affairs of state by sending in a petition against popery and the proposed Spanish marriage, Parliament passed, Dec. 18, 1621, the Great Protestation, declaring that affairs which concerned the king and the realm were proper subjects for debate in Parliament. The king tore the page containing the protestation from the Journal of the Commons. In 1623 he reluctantly permitted Charles and the Duke of Buckingham to depart for Spain to conclude the negotiations for a marriage treaty which had been kept up, with interruptions, since 1611; but as Philip was unwilling to procure the restoration of the Palatinate, Charles and the duke returned in the same year, and the negotiations were finally abandoned.

James II. Born at St. James's Palace, Oct. 14, 1633; died at St. Germain, Sept. 6, 1701. King of England, Scotland, and Ireland 1685-88, son of Charles I. and Henrietta Maria. Before his accession he was known as the Duke of York. He became lord high admiral of England on the accession of his brother Charles II. in 1660; received a grant of the New Netherlands in 1664; embraced the Roman Catholic faith probably before 1672; and was forced by the Test Act to resign the admiralty in 1672. Under the guidance of Father Petre, his confessor and chief adviser, he aimed on his accession to make himself an absolute monarch and to restore the Roman Catholic Church. He increased the standing army from 6,000 to about 30,000 men by keeping up the military force raised to suppress the Scottish rebellion under the Duke of Monmouth in 1685, and granted commissions in the new regiments to Roman Catholics. He published a declaration of liberty of conscience for all denominations in England and Scotland early in 1687, and April 25, 1688, ordered the declaration to be read in all the churches. A petition from the primate and six bishops against the order was pronounced a seditious libel by the king, who sent the seven bishops to the Tower and brought them to trial before the Court of King's Bench. The trial resulted in acquittal June 30, 1688, and the same day an invitation, signed by the Earls of Danby, Devonshire, and Shrewsbury, the Bishop of London, and others, was despatched to William of Orange to save England from a Roman Catholic tyranny. William landed at Torbay Nov. 5, 1688, and Dec. 22 James escaped to France, where he was assigned the chateau of St. Germain by Louis XIV. as a place of refuge. In 1689 he made a descent on Ireland, but was totally defeated by William at the battle of the Boyne, July 1, 1690.

James. James, Henry. Born at New York, April 15, 1843. An American novelist and critic, son of Henry James. He was educated principally in Europe, and studied law at Harvard. He began to contribute to periodicals in 1864. Since 1868 he has lived mostly in England. Among his works are "Transatlantic Sketches" (1875), "A Passionate Pilgrim," etc. (1875), "The American" (1877), "The Europeans" (1878), "French Poets and Novelists" (1878), "Daisy Miller" (1878), "Hawthorne" (English Men of Letters series, 1879), "Confidence" (1880), "Portrait of a Lady" (1881), "Daisy Miller" (a comedy, 1883), "A Little Tour in France" (1884), "The Author of Beltramo," etc. (1885), "The Bostonians" (1886), "Princess Casamassima" (1886), "Partial Portraits" (1888), "The Real Thing," etc. (1893).

James, John Angell. Born at Blandford, Dorset, England, June 6, 1785; died at Birmingham, Oct., 1859. An English Congregational clergyman and religious writer. His best-known work is "The Anxious Inquirer."

James, Thomas. Born about 1593; died about 1635. An English navigator. On May 3, 1631, he sailed from Bristol in the Henrietta Maria to discover the "northwest passage into the south sea" and circumnavigate the globe. He reached Greenland in June, and sailed on to Hudson Bay, where he wintered. He reached England Oct. 22, 1632.

James, William. Died at London, May 28, 1827. A British writer on naval history. From 1801 to 1813 he was an attorney of the supreme court of Jamaica, and proctor in the vice-admiralty court. In 1812 he was in the United States, where he was detained as a prisoner. In March, 1816, he published "An Enquiry into the Merits of the Principal Naval Actions between Great Britain and the United States." In 1817 this pamphlet was enlarged as "A Full and Correct Account of the Chief Naval Occurrences of the Late War between Great Britain and the United States of America." He also published "The Naval History of Great Britain from the Declaration of War by France in 1793 to the Accession of George IV." (1822-24; second edition 1826). It is the standard work on the subject.

James Francis Edward Stuart, surnamed "The Pretender." See Stuart.

Jameson (jā'me-son), Mrs. (Anna Brownell Murphy). Born at Dublin, May 17, 1794; died at Ealing, Middlesex, March 17, 1860. A British author, the eldest daughter of D. Brownell Murphy, an Irish miniature-painter. From the age of 16 to 20 she was governess in the family of the Marquis of Winchester. About 1821 she entered upon the same service in the family of Mr. Littleton, afterward Lord Hatherton. Her journal was published anonymously as "A Lady's Diary," and then as "The Diary of an Ennuyée" in 1826. In 1825 she married a former lover, Robert Jameson, harrister; but they soon separated, Jameson going as judge to Jamaica. Her "Characteristics of Women" appeared in 1832. In 1842 she began the series of art works which made her famous with a "Companion to the Public Picture Galleries of London." She traveled extensively in Europe and America, and in 1847 revisited Italy to write her chief-œuvre, "Sacred and Legendary Art." This appeared in four parts: "Legends of the Saints" (1848), "Legends of the Monastic Orders" (1850), "Legends of the Madonna" (1852), and "The History of our Lord." The last was left unfinished, and was completed by Lady Eastlake after Mrs. Jameson's death. Among her other works are "Loves of the Poets" (1829), "Celebrated Female Sovereigns" (1831), "Visits and Sketches" (1834), "Winter Studies and Summer Rambles in Canada" (1838), "Social Life in Germany," a translation of the dramas of Princess Amelia of Saxony (1840), "Memories of the Early Italian Painters" (1845), and "Miscellaneous Essays," chiefly artistic (1846).

Jameson, James Sligo. Born at Alloa, Clackmannanshire, Aug. 17, 1856; died at Bangala on the Kongo, Aug. 17, 1888. A British naturalist and explorer. He visited Borneo in 1877, South Africa in 1878, the Rocky Mountains in 1882, and Spain and Algeria in 1884. On Jan. 20, 1887, he became the naturalist of the Emin Fasha Relief Expedition under Henry M. Stanley, contributing £1,000 to the funds. He was left as second in command of the rear column under Major Bartlett, and at Stanley Falls in 1888 witnessed the killing of a girl of 10 by the cannibals of Tippu Tib.

Jameson, Robert. Born at Leith, July 11, 1774; died at Edinburgh, April 19, 1854. A Scottish mineralogist. In 1798 he published the "Mineralogy of the Shetland Islands and of Arran," and in 1800 "Mineralogy of the Scottish Isles." In 1800 he went to Freiburg to study with Werner, and in 1804 was appointed regius professor of natural history at Edinburgh.

Jamesone (jā'me-son), George. Born at Aberdeen, Scotland, about 1588; died 1644. A Scottish portrait-painter, a pupil of Rubens with Vandyck; called the Scotch Vandyck. He returned to Aberdeen 1629, and established himself in Edinburgh about 1635. When Charles I. visited Scotland in 1635 he sat to Jamesone, and paid him with a diamond from his own hand. Several of his portraits in Scotland pass for Vandycks. In Aberdeen are several of his portraits and his picture of the Sibyls. His own portrait of himself is in the gallery at Florence, and another is at Cullen House, Banffshire.

Jamestown. The only town in the island of St. Helena. Population, about 3,000.

Jami (jā-mē'). Born 1411; died 1492. A celebrated Persian poet. His name was Nuruddin Abdurrahman, but he is known as Jami from his birthplace, Jam in Khorasan. He began his career as a general student, but later devoted himself especially to the philosophy of the Sufis under the Sheikh ul Islam Saaduddin whom he succeeded. He was the last great poet and mystic of Persia, and is said to have been the author of 99 works in both prose and verse. "The Seven Thrones" is thought by a native critic to combine the most exquisite compositions in the Persian language, with the exception of the "Five Poems" of Nizami. The 7 poems thus termed are "The Chain of Gold," "Salaman and Absal," "The Present of the Just," "The Rosary," "The Loves of Laila and Majnun," "Yusuf and Zulaikha," and "The Book of Alexander." Other works are a "Spring Garden" (i. e. a book on ethics containing anecdotes and fables written in both prose and verse), the "Magazine of Secrets," and a biography of the Sufis entitled "Exhalations of Intimacy or of Holiness." He was buried at Herat, the sultans of which were his patrons.

Jamieson (jā'mi-son), John. Born at Glasgow, March 3, 1759; died at Edinburgh, July 12, 1838. A Scottish clergyman, antiquary, and philologist. He entered Glasgow University at the age of 9, and was licensed to preach in 1781. He was settled in Edinburgh in 1797. His chief work is "An Etymological Dictionary of the Scottish Language" (1808; supplement 1825).

Jammia. See Jahme.

Jamrach (jām'rieh), Johann Christian Carl. Born at Hamburg, March, 1815; died at London, Sept. 6, 1891. A dealer in wild animals. He was the son of a dealer in curiosities in Hamburg. He became a dealer in wild animals in 1840, and acquired a monopoly of that trade, supplying menageries and zoological gardens.

Jamrud (jām-röd'). A ruined fort 9 miles west of Peshawar, Panjab, British India, at the entrance of the Khyber Pass.

Jamshid (Pers. pron. jem-shēd'). In Firdausi, the fourth king of the Pishdadian or earliest dynasty. He reigned 700 years, the first 300 of which were happy and beneficent. He softened iron and taught its use in the arts, taught weaving, distinguished castes, subdued and employed the devils or demons, discovered precious stones and minerals, invented medicine, and first practised navigation. In his homage men first celebrated the New Year. Death was unknown, but Jamshid became proud and forgot God. He was forced to flee before Dahak (see Achd Dahaka), and remained concealed 100 years, when he appeared on the shore of the China Sea only to be seized and slain under by Dahak. Jamshid is the Avestan Yima kshaeto, "Shining Yima" (see Yima), Sanskrit Yama (see Yama). Also called Jem.

Jamu (jum-ō'), or Jummoo (jum-mō'). A town in Kashmir, situated on the Tavi in lat. 32° 44' N., long. 74° 54' E. Population, about 8,000.

Janaka (jan'a-ka). In Hindu legend: 1. A king of Mithila, of the solar race. When Nimi died without a successor, the sages rubbed his body and produced from it a prince called Janaka, from being born without a procreator. He was the first Janaka, 20 generations earlier than Janaka the father of Sita.

2. King of Videha, and father of Sita. He was remarkable for his knowledge and sanctity. The sage Yajnavalkya was his priest. He refused to submit to the pretensions of the Brahmans, and asserted his right of performing sacrifices. He succeeded in his contention, for it is said that by his righteous life he became a Brahman and Rajarshi.

Janamejaya (jan-a-mā'ja-ya). In Hindu legend, a king, son of Parikshit and great-grandson of Arjuna. He listened to the Mahabharata, as recited by Vaishampayana, and so expiated the sin of killing a Brahman.

Jananschek (yā'nou-shek), Fanny (originally Franziska Magdalena Romance). Born at Prague, Bohemia, July 20, 1830. A Bohemian tragic actress. She made her first appearance at Prague, and in 1847 was engaged at the theater at Cologne. The next year she went to Frankfort, where she remained for 12 years. She came to the United States in 1863, and played successfully in the principal cities. She learned English at this time in order to play Shakspeare. In 1876 she appeared in London. She has again visited the United States and played successful engagements.

Jane Eyre (jān ār). A noted novel by Charlotte Brontë, published in 1847 under the pseudonym Currer Bell. Its title is the name of its principal character, a woman who is made interesting in spite of a lack of beauty, birth, money, and all the conventional attributes of a heroine. The book is partly autobiographical, and caused much comment, bringing its writer prominently before the public.

Jane Grey, Lady. See Grey and Lady Jane Grey.

Jane Seymour. See Seymour.

Janes (jānz). Edmund Storer. Born at Sheffield, Mass., April 27, 1807; died at New York, Sept. 18, 1876. An American bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

Jane Shore (jān shōr). 1. A tragedy by Chettle and Day, entered in Henslowe's "Diary" May, 1603. Ward says it was produced in 1602. It was thought to be a revision of an older play.
2. A tragedy by Rowe (1714). See Shore's Wife, and Shore, Jane.

The ballad of "Jane Shore" will be found in Percy's "Reliques." It is well known that the Jane Shore of real history survived Edward IV. for thirty years. The character, which had been rendered very popular by Churchyard's Legend of "Shore's Wife" in the "Mirror for Magistrates" (see "The Return from Parassus," i. 2), appears in a few scenes of "The True Tragedie of Richard III." (1594). Ward, Hist. Dram. Lit.

Janet (zhā-nā'), Paul. Born at Paris, April 30, 1823. A French philosopher and member of the Institute. He was professor of philosophy at the College of Bourges 1845-48, and at Strasbourg 1848-57. He became professor of logic at the Lycée Louis le Grand in 1857, and of the history of philosophy at the Sorbonne in 1864. He is one of the principal advocates of liberty of scientific research. He is the author of "La famille" (1855), "Histoire de la philosophie morale et politique, etc." (1858), "Études sur la dialectique dans Platon et Hegel" (1860), "La philosophie du bonheur" (1862), "Le matérialisme contemporain en Allemagne, etc." (1864), "Les problèmes du XIX^e siècle" (1872), "Philosophie de la révolution française" (1873), "Les causes finales" (1876), "Saint-Simon, etc." (1878), "La philosophie française contemporaine" (1879), "Les maîtres de la pensée moderne" (1883), "Les origines du socialisme contemporain" (1883), "Victor Cousin, etc." (1885), "Histoire de la philosophie, etc." (with G. Seailles, 1887), "Centenaire de 1789, etc." (1889), "La philosophie de Lamennais" (1890), "Lectures variées, etc." (1890), etc. He has also published several text-books, translated Spinoza's "God, Man, and Happiness," and Leibnitz's "New Essays on Human Understanding," and contributed articles on the liberty of thought to all the principal periodicals.

Janiculum (ja-nik'ū-lum), or Mons Janiculus (monz ja-nik'ū-lus). A long ridge or hill in Rome, on the right bank of the Tiber, extending south from the Vatican, and opposite the Capitoline and the Aventine. It is the highest of the hills of Rome, attaining opposite the Porta San Pancrazio, at about the middle of its extent, a height of 276 feet above the sea.

Janik (jā-nēk'), or Yanik (yā-nēk'). A district in the vilayet of Trebizond, Asiatic Turkey.

Janin (zhā-nān'), Jules Gabriel. Born at St.-Étienne, France, Feb. 16, 1804; died at Paris, June 20, 1874. A French novelist, feuilletonist, littérateur, and dramatic critic in the "Journal des Débats." He wrote "L'Âne mort et la femme guillotinée" (1829), "Barnave" (1831), "Histoire de la littérature et de la poésie, etc." (1832), "Histoire de France" for the plates of "La galerie historique de Versailles" (1837-43), "Voyage en Italie" (1839), "La Normandie historique" (1843), "La Bretagne historique" (1844), "Histoire de la littérature dramatique" (from the "Débats," 1851-55), "Bé ranger et son temps" (1866), "Circe" (1867), besides many romances, novels, etc.

Janina (yā'nē-nā). A vilayet in Albania, Turkey. Area, 7,025 square miles. Population (1885), 509,151. Also written Yanina, Jannina, Joannina, etc.

Janina. The capital of the vilayet of Janina, situated on the Lake of Janina in lat. 39° 48' N., long. 20° 54' E. It has important trade, and manufactures of gold lace, etc. It was taken by the Turks about 1431, and was flourishing in the time of Ali Pasha (1788-1822). Population, 20,000 (largely Greeks).

Janina, Lake of. A lake in Albania, near Janina. Length, 12 miles.

Janizaries (jan'i-zā-riz). [From Turk., 'new troops.'] A former body of Turkish infantry, constituting the sultan's guard and the main standing army, first organized in the 14th century, and until the latter part of the 17th century largely recruited from compulsory conscripts and converts taken from the Rayas or Christian subjects. In later times Turks and other Mohammedans joined the corps on account of the various privileges attached to it. The body became large and very powerful and turbulent, often controlling the destiny of the government; and, after a revolt purposely provoked by the sultan Mahmud II. in 1826, many thousand Janizaries were massacred, and the organization was abolished.

Jankau (yān'kau). A village in Bohemia, 32 miles south-southeast of Prague. Here, March 6, 1645, the Swedes under Torstenson gained an important victory over the Imperialists under Hatfield.

Jan Mayen Island (yān mā'en ī'land). An uninhabited island in the Arctic Ocean. It contains an extinct volcano, Mount Beerenberg (8,350 feet high), situated in lat. 71° 4' N., long. 7° 37' W. It was discovered by the Dutch navigator Jan Mayen in 1611.

Jannæus. See Alexander.

Jannes (jan'ēz) and Jambres (jam'brēz). Names given by St. Paul (2 Tim. iii. 8) to the Egyptian magicians who withstood Moses at Pharaoh's court.

Jansen (jan'sen; D. pron. yān'sen), Latinized Jansenius (jan-sē'nī-us), Cornelis. Born at Aequoi, near Gorkum, Netherlands, Oct. 28, 1585; died at Ypres, Belgium, May 6, 1638. A Dutch Roman Catholic theologian, founder of a sect named for him. See Jansenists. His chief work is "Augustinus, seu doctrina st. Augustini de humana natura sanitate, egritudine, medicina, etc." (1640).

Jansenists (jan'sen-ists). A body or school in the Roman Catholic Church, prominent in the 17th and 18th centuries, holding the doctrines of Cornelis Jansen. Jansenism is described by Catholic authorities as "a heresy which consisted in denying the freedom of the will and the possibility of resisting divine grace," under "a professed attempt to restore the ancient doctrine and discipline of the Church" (Cath. Dict.). It is regarded by Protestant authorities as "a reaction within the Catholic Church against the theological casuistry and general spirit of the Jesuit order," and "a revival of the Augustinian tenets upon the inability of the fallen will and upon efficacious grace" (G. P. Fisher, Hist. Reformation, p. 451).

Janson (yān'son), Kristoffer Nagel. Born at Bergen, Norway, May 5, 1841. A Norwegian poet and novelist, author of poems and tales in Norwegian dialect.

Janson, or Jenson (zhōn-sōn'), Nicholas. Died about 1481. A French printer and engraver who set up a printing establishment at Venice about 1470. He is known chiefly as the introducer of the roman type.

Januarius (jan-ū-ā'ri-us), Saint. A Christian martyr who was beheaded under Diocletian. He was bishop of Beneventum. Relics, which are asserted to be his head and some of his blood, are preserved at Naples. The blood is supposed to have the miraculous power of becoming fluid when it is brought near the head—a miracle which is performed for the edification of large numbers of people several times a year. His festival is kept in the Roman Church Sept. 19.

January (jan'ū-ā-ri). [Januarius (se. mensis), from Janus.] The first month of the year, according to present and the later Roman reckoning, consisting of thirty-one days.

January and May. Pope's version of Chaucer's "Merchant's Tale."

Janus (jā'nus). [Prob. connected with Gr. Zeús.] A primitive Italic solar deity, regarded among the Romans as the doorkeeper of heaven and the especial patron of the beginning and ending of all undertakings. As the protector of doors and gateways, he was represented as holding a staff or scepter in the right hand and a key in the left; and as the god of the sun's rising and setting he had two faces, one looking to the east, and the other to the west. His temple at Rome was kept open in time of war, and was closed only in the rare event of universal peace.

Janus Quadrifrons, Arch of. See Arch of Janus Quadrifrons.

Japan (ja-pan'). [Corrupted from Zipangu (of Marco Polo), corrupted from native Nippon or Nippon, Land of the Rising Sun; F. Japon, Sp. Japon, G. and D. Japan, Pg. Japão.] An empire of Asia, lying in the Pacific east of China, Korea, and Siberia. Capital, Tokio. It comprises four principal islands—the main island (Honshū), Yezo, Shikoku, and Kiushū, with about 4,000 small islands, including the Lochoo and Kurile groups. The surface is mountainous and hilly, culminating in Fuji-san (12,365 feet). The leading occupation is agriculture. The chief exports are silk, tea, rice, coal, copper, fish, lacquer, etc. The administrative divisions are 3 fu and 43 ken (or prefectures). There is also a subdivision politically into 85 provinces. The government is a limited monarchy, with an emperor, cabinet and privy council, and an Imperial Parliament composed of a House of Peers and a House of Representatives. The prevailing religions are Shintoinism and Buddhism. Authentic history begins about 500 A. D. Korean influence began at an early date, and Buddhism was introduced from Korea about 550. The shogun Yoritomo usurped the authority in 1192. Marco Polo visited the islands in the 13th century. A system of feudal baronage grew up; the Mikados were the emperors, but the real power belonged to the shoguns. The Portuguese traded with Japan from 1543 till their exclusion in 1638, and the native Christians were persecuted from 1624. The Tokugawa dynasty of shoguns began in 1603. Japan continued isolated, except for restricted trade with the Dutch, till the American expedition under Perry, 1853; he forced a commercial treaty, March 31, 1854, which was followed by commercial relations with other countries. The shogunate was abolished in 1867, and a civil war ended in 1868 in the recovery of full power by the Mikado. More recent events are abolition of the feudal system, 1871; annexation of the Bonin Islands, 1876, and of the Lochoo Islands, 1879; suppression of the Satsuma rebellion, 1877; constitution promulgated, 1890; first parliament met, 1890; war with China and acquisition of Formosa, 1894-95. (See China.) Area (exclusive of the territory recently acquired by treaty from China), 147,655 square miles. Population (1-95), 41,899,940.

Japan, Sea of. That part of the Pacific Ocean which lies between Japan on the east and south, Korea on the west, and Asiatic Russia on the north. It communicates with the Sea of Okhotsk by the Channel of Tataro on the north and the Strait of La Pérouse on the northeast, and with the Pacific by the Channel of Korea on the southwest and Sangar Strait on the east.

Japetus. The eighth satellite of Saturn, discovered by Cassini, Oct., 1671.

Japheth (jā'feth), or Japhet (jā'fet). According to the account in Genesis, the third son of Noah, and the ancestor of various nations in northern Asia and in Europe (in general, of the so-called Indo-European race). See Shem.

Attempts have been made to explain the names of the three sons of Noah as referring to the colour of the skin. Japhet has been compared with the Assyrian pattu, 'white'; Shem with the Assyrian samu, 'olive-coloured'; while in Ham etymologists have seen the Hebrew kham, 'to be hot.' But all such attempts are of very doubtful value. Sayer, Races of the O. T., p. 42.

Japurá (zhā-pō-rā'), or Yapurá (yā-pō-rā'), called by Spanish Americans Caqueta (kā-kā-tā). A river in Colombia and Brazil. It rises in the Andes near Popayan and joins the Amazon through a network of channels extending from about long. 63° to 67° W. Length, about 1,500 miles; navigable nearly 620 miles. The middle course lies in territory claimed by Ecuador.

Jaquenetta (jak-e-net'ā). In Shakspeare's "Love's Labour's Lost," a country maid with whom the "high fantastical Armado" is in love.

Jaques (jāks or jāks, or as F., zhāk; on the stage often pron. as if mod. L., jā'quēz). [F. Jaques, Jaques, from L.L. Jacobus, Jacob. From OF. Jaques is derived ME. Jakes, Jak, mod. E. Jack.] 1. In Shakspeare's "As you Like it," a companion of the exiled duke. He is usually spoken of as "the melancholy Jaques." He has not entered on this life with patience, but poses as a censurer of mankind.

2. A younger son of Sir Rowland de Bois in the same play is also named Jaques, and is spoken of sometimes as Jaques de Bois.—3. In Ben Jonson's comedy "The Case is Altered," a miser with a likeness to Shakspeare's "Shylock" in the scenes with his daughter.

Jaques (zhā'kes), Christovão. A Portuguese captain who, in 1526, was sent with a squadron to Brazil, with the title of governor. He captured some French ships on the coast, founded the first Portuguese settlement at Pernambuco (1527), and explored as far south as the Rio de la Plata. He was recalled in 1528.

Jaraes. See Charaes.

Jarasandha (jar-ā-sand'ha). In Hindu legend, son of Brihadratha, and king of Magadha. By the favor of Shiva he prevailed over many kings, and especially fought against Krishna, attacking him eighteen times. When Krishna returned from Dwaraka with Bhima and Arjuna to slay Jarasandha and release the captive kings, Jarasandha was slain by Bhima.

Jarchi. See Rashi.

Jardine (jār'din), Sir William. Born at Edinburgh, Feb. 23, 1800; died at Sandown, Isle of Wight, Nov. 21, 1874. A Scottish baronet and naturalist. His chief works are "Illustrations of Ornithology" (1830), "The Naturalist's Library" (1845; which he edited and in part wrote), "The Ichthyology of Annandale" (1853), "Birds of Great Britain and Ireland" (1876), etc.

Jarita (jar'i-tā). In the Mahabharata, a certain female bird. The saint Mandapala returned from the shades because he had no son, became a male bird, had by her four sons, and then abandoned her. In the burning of the Khandava forest she devotedly protected her children, who were saved by the influence of Mandapala with the god of fire.

Jarley (jār'li) Mrs. In Dickens's "Old Curiosity Shop," the merry, kind-hearted owner and exhibitor of Jarley's wax-works, "the delight of the nobility and gentry, and the peculiar pet of the royal family."

Jarlsberg (yār'ls-berg) and Laurvig (lour'vig). A maritime amt in southern Norway. Area, 895 square miles. Population (1891), 100,957.

Jarnac (zhār-nāk'). A town in the department of Charente, western France, situated on the Charente 17 miles west of Angoulême. It has important trade in brandy and wine. There, March 13, 1563, the Catholics under the Duke of Anjou defeated the Huguenots under Condé and Coligny. Population (1891), 4,880.

Jarndyce (járn'dis), John. In Dickens's "Bleak House," the owner of Bleak House, and guardian of Richard Carstone, Ada Clare, and Esther Summerson. It is his habit, when he is disappointed in human nature, to feel a severe east wind.

Jaridsida (járn-sé'dá). [ON. Jaridsida: Jaru, iron, and sida, side.] The first law code of Iceland under Norwegian sovereignty, compiled from old Norwegian laws and sent to Iceland by King Magnus in 1271. It is also called Hakon-arbok, having been erroneously ascribed to King Hakon Hakonsson. It met with strong opposition in Iceland, and was soon superseded by the Jonsbok.

Jaromierz (já'rō-měrts). A town in Bohemia, situated on the Elbe 66 miles east-northeast of Prague. Population (1890), commune, 6,925.

Jaroslaw. See Yaroslaw.

Jaroslaw (já'rō-sláv). A town in Galicia, Austria-Hungary, situated on the San 57 miles west-northwest of Lemberg. Population (1890), commune, 18,065.

Jarric (zhá-rěk'), Louis Étienne. Born at Les Cayes, 1757; died there, Feb. 21, 1791. A Haitian mulatto who, in 1789, was delegate to the French Assembly, and organized there the Society of Amis des Noirs, or Friends of the Blacks. Subsequently he was engaged with Ogé in a revolutionary descent on Santo Domingo, and was captured and put to death. See Ogé.

Jarrow, or Jarrow-on-Tyne (já'rō-on-tin'). A mining and manufacturing town in Durham, England, situated on the Tyne 6 miles east of Newcastle. It contains the ruins of a monastery, founded 681, which was the home of Bede. Population (1891), 33,682.

Jarvie (jár'vi), Baillie Nicol. A magistrate of Glasgow, a character in Sir Walter Scott's novel "Rob Roy."

Jasher (já'shěr), Book of. [Heb., 'upright.'] A lost book of Hebrew national songs, narrating the deeds of the heroes (upright men). Two passages in the Old Testament are quoted from it: the famous song which mentions the standing still of the sun (Josh. x. 13), and the lament of David over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 18). It is evident that the work cannot have been completed before the time of David, although the nucleus of the collection may have been in existence earlier. There are several Hebrew works of this title extant, and one forgery which appeared in England in 1751.

Jasmin (zhás-man'), Jacques. Born at Agen, France, March 6, 1798; died Oct. 4, 1864. A Provençal poet. He was known as the last of the troubadours and the "Barber Poet." His father was a composer of the burlesque comédies used at fêtes, charivaris, etc., and he accompanied him on his expeditions. Put at last in a seminary, he left it abruptly, and was employed in a barber's shop at Agen; later he entered this business his own account. His first work was called "Charivari" (1825). He also composed a great number of popular songs, patriotic odes, etc., and "Mons Sonbenis" ("My Souvenirs"), written in the patois of Agen, a dialect of the langue d'oc. The first collection of his works was published in 1835 under the title, taken from his profession, "Papillotes." His name reached Paris: he was presented to the king, and received the cross of the Legion of Honor and a pension. In 1852 the Academy granted him a "prix extraordinaire" for his Provençal poems. His principal poems are "L'aveugle de Castel-Cuillé" (1836), translated by Longfellow; "Flanconnetto" (1840); "Marthe la folle" (1844); "Les deux frères jumeaux" (1845); "La semaine d'un fils" (1849); etc.

Jason (já'son). [Gr. Iáson, the healer or atoner.] In Greek legend, the leader of the Argonautic expedition. He was born at Iolcus, was a son of Eson and Polymede, and was brought up under the instruction of Chiron. The legends concerning him are numerous and varied. His greatest exploit was the expedition to Colchis with the other Argonauts to obtain the Golden Fleece. This he secured by the aid of the sorceress Medea, daughter of Eetes, king of Colchis, who fell in love with him. She protected him from the bulls breathing fire and hooped with brass which he was obliged, in order to obtain the fleece, to yoke to the plow, and from the armed men who sprang up from the dragon's teeth which he was required to sow in the fields. From other perils, also, she saved him, and fled with him and the fleece. Jason finally deserted Medea. See Medea.

Jassy, or Yassy (yás'sé), or Jash (yásh). A city in Moldavia, Rumania, situated on the Bachelni, near the Pruth, in lat. 47° 10' N., long. 27° 36' E. It is the chief city of Moldavia, and was its capital from about 1564 to 1861. It has been frequently occupied by the Russians, and was nearly destroyed by janizaries in 1822. It has a university. A treaty was made here between Russia and Turkey in 1792, by which the Russian frontier was extended to the Dniester. Population (1880-1890), 72,850.

Jastrow (yás'trō). A town in the province of West Prussia, Prussia, situated in lat. 53° 27' N., long. 16° 47' E. Population (1890), 5,288.

Jász-Berény (yás'be'rány). A town in the county of Szolnok, Hungary, situated on the Zagyva 42 miles east of Budapest. Population (1890), 24,331.

Jataka (já'ta-ka). [Skt. jātaka, nom. jātakam, nativity, principles of nativity.] Among the Buddhists, a former birth of Shakyamuni, and a narrative regarding it; "Birth-story." The Jatakas are one of the sacred books of the Buddhists, a division of the Khuddakanikaya, or "collection of short treatises," in the Suttapitaka, or discourses for the laity. There is evidence of the existence of a collection so named as early as the Council of Vesali (about 380 B.C.). They were put into their present form in the Suttapitaka in the 5th century A. D. There were current among the Buddhists fables and parables ascribed to Buddha, the sanctity of which they sought to increase by identifying the best character in any story with Buddha himself in a former birth. Distinguished by quaint humor and gentle earnestness, they teach the duty of tender sympathy with animals. Many, if not all, of the fables of the Hitopadesha may be identified with them. The stories number 550. They have been edited in the original Pali by Fausboll, and are being translated by Rhys Davids and under his superintendence. Rhys Davids terms them "the most important collection of ancient folk-lore extant."

Jatayu (ja-tá'yō). In the Ramayana, a bird, the son of Vishnu's bird Garuda, and king of the vultures. As ally of Rama he fought, to prevent the carrying away of Sita, against Ravana who mortally wounded him. In the Puranas Jatayu is the friend of Dasharatha.

Játiva, or Xátiva (há'té-vá), or San Felipe de Játiva (sán fá-lé'pá dá há'té-vá). A town in the province of Valencia, Spain, situated on the Albufera 31 miles south by west of Valencia; the ancient Suetabis. It has a castle; was noted in Roman times for linen manufactures; and was the birthplace of Pope Alexander VI. and of Ribera. Population (1887), 14,069.

Jats, or Jauts (játs). A mysterious race, perhaps Hinduized Scythians, first mentioned in the beginning of the 11th century. They opposed the invasion of Mahmud of Ghazni, by whom they were defeated, though they are said to have gathered 8,000 boats on the Indus. In Anang-Nab's reign they were banditti in the mountains of the interior of India. Increasing in strength under their chief Suraj Mal in the 18th century, they dictated the policy of the Moguls. Suraj Mal was killed when hunting in bravado in the imperial park at Delhi, which city he had undertaken to besiege. After a contest between the sons of Suraj Mal, their survivor, Ranjit Singh, secured the chiefs. When British power was established in northern India, Ranjit Singh was allowed to retain his territories, viz. Agra and its district, granted to Suraj Mal by Ahmad Shah as the price of his desertion of the Marhattas before the battle of Paniput. Disagreements arising between the English and the raja, Lord Cornwallis stormed and captured the Jat fortress of Dig Jan. 18, 1820, and ended finally their power.

Jaubert (zhō-bār'), Amédée Émilien Probe. Born at Aix, France, June 3, 1779; died at Paris, Jan. 20, 1847. A French Orientalist, author of "Éléments de la grammaire turque" (1823), translator of Idrisi's geography (1836-40), etc.

Jauer (you'ér). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, situated on the Wütemde Neisso 37 miles west of Breslau. It was formerly the capital of the ancient principality of Jauer. Population (1890), commune, 11,576.

Jauja (hou'há), or Xauxa (hou'ni). A town of the department of Junin, Peru, in a valley 11,150 feet above the sea, and 108 miles east of Lima. It was a large native city at the time of the conquest, and was Pizarro's temporary capital before the founding of Lima. Population, about 3,000.

Jaunpur (jou'n-pūr'). 1. A district in the Allahabad division, Northwest Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 25° 40' N., long. 82° 40' E. Area, 1,554 square miles. Population (1881), 1,209,663.—2. The capital of the district of Jaunpur, situated on the Gumti 35 miles north-northwest of Benares; formerly an important Mohammedan capital. Population, about 45,000.

Jaunthal (jou'n'täl), or Jaunerthal (jou'ner'täl), F. Val de Bellegarde (vål dé bel-gärd'). An alpine valley in the canton of Fribourg, Switzerland, joining the valley of the Saane at Broc.

Jauregui y Aldecoa (hou'rä-gō ē äl-dä-kō'ä), Agustin de. Born in Bazan, Navarre, 1708; died at Lima, Peru, April 27, 1784. A Spanish soldier and administrator. After serving in the West Indies and Portugal, he was captain-general of Chile 1773 to 1779, and viceroy of Peru July 20, 1780, to April 13, 1784. The revolt of Tupac Amaru took place during his term in the latter country. He died from the results of an accident a few days after giving up his office.

Java (jä'vä). One of the Sunda Islands, and the most important island of the Dutch East Indies.

Capital, Batavia. It is separated from Sumatra on the northwest by Sunda Strait, from Borneo on the north by the Java Sea, and from Bali on the east by Bali Strait, and borders on the Indian Ocean south. It is traversed by mountains throughout its length, and contains many volcanoes. Its soil is noted for its fertility. The chief exports are coffee, tea, sugar, indigo, and tobacco. It is divided into 22 residencies, under Dutch "residents" and the governor-general of the Dutch East Indies. The inhabitants are mainly Javanese, Madurese, and Sundanese. Various Hindu states were flourishing here prior to the introduction of Mohammedanism in the 15th century. Dutch rule commenced in 1610. The island was taken by the British in 1811, but restored to Holland in 1816. There was a native insurrection in 1825-30. Colonial system of enforced labor for the natives was introduced in 1830, modified by an agrarian law in 1870. Area, including Madura, 50,848 square miles. Greatest length, 664 miles. Greatest breadth, about 129 miles. Population, with Madura (1892), 24,284,069.

Javan (jä'van). According to Genesis, son of Japhet and ancestor of Elisha, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim. In Ezek. xxvii. 13 he is mentioned as carrying on trade with the Tyrians (compare also Isa. lxxi. 19). In all these passages the Ionians of Asia Minor are meant, with whom the Orientals were earliest and best acquainted. In the annals of Sargon (722-705 B.C.) they are mentioned by the name of Iavani (or, by the frequent interchange of r and l in Assyrian, Iamanni), and figure as pirates on the coasts of Phenicia and Asia Minor.

Javary (zhá-vü-ré'), Sp. Yavary (yü-vü-ré'). A southern affluent of the Amazon, forming the boundary between Brazil and Peru. It rises, presumably, near lat. 7° S. and long. 74° W., and after a very crooked course joins the Amazon in lat. 4° 15' S., long. 60° 56' W. (nearly). Most of the course is navigable. By existing treaties, the extreme source of the Javary (unknown) is the western terminus of the boundary between Brazil and Bolivia, and the northwestern terminus of that between Bolivia and Peru. Also written Javari.

Jean de Meun (zhōn dé muñ') (Jean Clopinel) (klō-pé-nel'). Born at Meun-sur-Loire, Orléanais, about 1250; died at Paris before Nov., 1305. One of the leading French poets of the 13th century. He is known chiefly as having continued, after a lapse of 40 years, "Le roman de la rose," a poem undertaken about 1237 by a young poet, Guillaume de Lorris, and left incomplete at the time of his death. In 1277 Jean de Meun was still a student in Paris. His translations into French include the "De re militari" of Vegetius (1284), the correspondence of Héloïse and Abélard, and Gerald Barri's "Topographia Hibernica." "L'Amitié spirituelle," translated from the English of the monk Ethelred, and the French translation of Boethius's "De consolacione philosophica" have both been lost. Between 1291 and 1296 Jean de Meun wrote his "Testament," a curious piece of work replete with sarcasm and criticism, especially of the women and of the mendicant orders of his day. Jeffrey (jef'ri), Francis, Lord Jeffrey. Born at Edinburgh, Oct. 23, 1773; died Jan. 26, 1850. A Scottish critic, essayist, and jurist. He was the son of George Jeffrey, deputy clerk in the Court of Session. He studied at Queen's College, Oxford, for a part of one year, 1791-92, and was admitted to the Scottish bar Dec. 16, 1794. The "Edinburgh Review" was started by a coterie of which Jeffrey, Sydney Smith, Brougham, and Horner were the chiefs, at the suggestion of Smith, who at first assumed control. He was, however, superseded by Jeffrey, who became responsible editor. The first number was published Oct. 19, 1802. Its success was immediate. As Brougham was the principal political contributor, the politics of the "Review" were those of the Whigs. Jeffrey's legal practice continued to increase until July 2, 1829, when he was unanimously chosen dean of the Faculty of Advocates, and resigned his editorship of the "Review" to Macvey Napier. In 1830 he was appointed lord advocate. After the passage of the Reform Bill he was returned to Parliament for Edinburgh, Dec. 19, 1832. In May, 1834, he accepted a seat in the Court of Session, and became Lord Jeffrey. Jeffrey visited America in 1813 for six months.

Lord Jeffrey was no every-day man. He invented the trade of editorship. Before him an editor was a bookseller's drudge; he is now a distinguished functionary.

Jeffreys (jef'riz), George, Baron Jeffreys. Born at Acton, Denbighshire, 1648; died at London, April 18, 1689. An English judge. He was called to the bar in 1668, and was appointed common sergeant of the city of London in 1671. Seeing no hope of further advancement from the popular party, with which he had hitherto been associated, he ingratiated himself with the Duke of York, with the result that he was appointed solicitor-general to the duke, and was knighted in 1677. In 1678 he was made recorder of London, a position which he was compelled by Parliament to resign in 1680. He became chief justice of Chester in 1680, and of England in 1683; was created Baron Jeffreys of Wem in 1685; and was elevated to the post of lord chancellor of England in 1685. He used his position as chief justice and as chancellor to transform the judiciary from a stronghold of the opposition to the chief agent in furthering the attempt of James II. to make himself an absolute monarch, and rendered himself notorious by the flagrant injustice and brutality which he displayed on the bench. (See Bloody Assizes.) He was imprisoned on the overthrow of James II., and died in the Tower of London.

Jehoahaz (jē-hō'a-haz). King of Israel 815-798 B. C. (Duncker), son of Jehu. He was held in subjection by Hazael, king of Damascus, who compelled him to reduce his army to 50 horsemen, 10 chariots, and 10,000 infantry. 2 Ki. xiii. 1-9.

Jehoiachin (jē-hoi'a-kin). King of Judah 597 B. C. (Duncker), son of Jehoiakim. He was, after a reign of three months and ten days, carried into the Babylonian captivity, with 10,000 of his subjects, by Nebuchadnezzar.

Jehoiada (jē-hoi'a-dā). High priest of Judah. When the usurper Queen Athaliah slew the members of the royal house of Judah in 843 B. C., he saved the prince Joash, whom he brought up in the temple. In 837 he headed a rebellion by which Athaliah was overthrown and Joash placed on the throne.

Jehoiakim (jē-hoi'a-kin). King of Judah 609-597 B. C. (Duncker), son of Josiah. He succeeded his brother Jehoahaz, who was deposed by Pharaoh-Necho. After the defeat of Pharaoh-Necho at Carchemish by Nebuchadnezzar in 605, he remained virtually independent until 600, when Nebuchadnezzar invaded his kingdom and compelled his submission.

Jenkinson (jeng'kin-son), Anthony. Died at Tighe, Rutland, Feb., 1611. An English sailor, merchant, and explorer. He began his career in the Levant (1546), visiting most of the Mediterranean countries. In 1553 he met Soliman the Great at Aleppo, from whom he obtained privileges for trade in Turkish ports. In 1557 he was appointed captain-general of the Muscovy Company's fleet, and their agent for three years. Their fleet reached the Dwina by way of the North Cape July 12, 1557, where he left it and proceeded overland to Moscow (Dec. 6). He was cordially received by the Czar, under whose protection he was enabled to proceed by way of Nijni Novgorod, Astrakhan, the Caspian Sea, and Klivia to Bokhara, where he arrived Dec. 23, 1558. After two months he returned to Moscow and London by the same route. In 1561 the journey was repeated as far as Astrakhan (June, 1562), whence he made a somewhat unsuccessful detour into Persia. He returned to Moscow Aug. 20, 1563, and to London, Sept. 28, 1564. He was the first Englishman to penetrate central Asia.

Jenkinson, Charles, first Earl of Liverpool. Born at Winchester, April 26, 1727; died at London, Dec. 17, 1808. An English politician, secretary at war under Lord North 1778-82, and president of the Board of Trade 1784-1801. He wrote "A Treatise on the Coins of the Realm" (1805), etc.

He was educated at Charterhouse and at Oxford (1786-89). In 1789 he went to Paris, where he was present at the capture of the Bastille. He entered Parliament in 1790. In 1796 he became by courtesy Lord Hawkesbury (Baron Hawkesbury 1803), and in 1799 was made master of the mint. In 1801 he entered the Foreign Office with a seat in the cabinet. In 1803 he was responsible for the failure to evacuate Malta according to the treaty of Amiens. On May 12, 1804, he was transferred to the Home Office, and became leader of the House of Lords. During the Whig ministry 1806-07 he led the opposition. Returning to the Home Office March 25, 1807, he opposed the Catholic emancipation movement; he became earl of Liverpool upon the death of his father (Dec., 1808). From June, 1812, to April, 1827, he was premier in a Tory ministry. He was a prime mover in sending Napoleon to St. Helena, and in the readjustment of French affairs in 1815 and 1818. During the reform struggle he uniformly followed the policy of forcible repression until 1826, when he seems to have recognized the necessity of modifying the Corn Laws.

Jenkins's Ear, War of. The name popularly given to the war between Great Britain and Spain which broke out in 1739, and became merged in the War of the Austrian Succession. Its immediate cause was the grievance of an English mariner, Robert Jenkins, who alleged that he had been tortured by the Spaniards, with the loss of his ear.

Jenner (jen'er), Edward. Born at Berkeley, Gloucestershire, May 17, 1749; died there, Jan. 26, 1823. An English physician, famous as the discoverer of vaccination. In 1770 he became a pupil of John Hunter in London, and also studied at the same time in St. George's Hospital. In 1773 he began to practise in Berkeley. His investigation of cowpox began very early, and was suggested by the local rustic tradition that the dairymaids who contracted the disease were exempt from smallpox. On May 14, 1796, he vaccinated a boy of eight with lymph from the hand of a dairymaid, and on July 1 inoculated the same boy with smallpox. The experiment was successful: an account of it was published June, 1798. The practice of vaccination gradually gained ground until in 1800 a great part of his time was taken up by the distribution of lymph, much of it in America. Honors came to him from every quarter, and on June 2, 1802, a grant of £10,000 was made to him by Parliament.

Jenner, Thomas. Flourished 1631-56. An author, engraver, and publisher. In the reigns of Charles I. and Charles II. he kept a print-shop at the Royal Exchange which was frequented by Pepys and Evelyn. Among his works are the "Soul's Solace" with thirty curious copperplate engravings (1631), "Directions for the English Traveller" (1643), "A Further Narrative of the Passages of these Times" (1648), "London's Blame if not its Shame" (1651). *Diet. Jerez, Francisco. See Xeres.

Jerez (or Xerez) de la Frontera (hā-reth' dā lā frōn-tā-rā). A city in the province of Cadiz, Spain, situated near the Guadalete 14 miles northeast of Cadiz; probably the ancient Asta Regia. It is celebrated for the production and export of sherry wine. It was the scene of a victory of the Saracens under Tarik over the West Goths under Roderic in 711. Alfonso X. recovered it in the middle of the 13th century. Population (1887), 61,708.

Jerez de los Caballeros (hā-reth' dā lōs kā-bāl-yā-rōs). A town in the province of Badajoz, Spain, 39 miles south of Badajoz. Population (1887), 8,953.

Jericho (jēr'ī-kō). In Bible geography, a city of Palestine, situated west of the Jordan and 14 miles east-northeast of Jerusalem. It was destroyed by Joshua and rebuilt by Ahab; was the residence of Herod the Great; was destroyed by Vespasian, rebuilt by Hadrian, and again destroyed by the Crusaders.

Jermyn (jēr'min), Henry, Earl of St. Albans. Born in England about 1600; died at London, Jan., 1684. An English statesman. In 1624 he was attached to the British embassy in Paris, and was returned to Parliament for Liverpool in 1628. On July 2, 1628, he became vice-chamberlain to the queen. He represented St. Edmundsbury in the Long Parliament, and was involved in the "first army plot" to overthrow Parliament, March, 1641. In the hostilities which followed he was engaged mainly in procuring war material on the Continent. He returned to England in 1643, was wounded at Auburn Chase Sept. 13, 1643, and was raised to the peerage as Baron Jermyn of St. Edmundsbury, Sept. 8. He returned to France with the queen in 1644 and directed her correspondence, the interception of which exposed the king's attempt to procure foreign aid. After the death of Charles I. he remained in France with Charles II. On April 27, 1660, he was created earl of St. Albans. At the Restoration Jermyn received many favors, his success being largely due to his influence with the queen mother. He was made ambassador to Paris, and employed himself in strengthening the influence of Louis XIV.

Jeroboam (jēr-ō-bō'am) I. King of Israel 933-927 B. C. (Duncker), son of Nebat of the tribe of Ephraim. He organized a revolt of the ten northern tribes against Rehoboam, and founded the kingdom of Israel (1 Ki. xi.-xiv., 2 Chron. ix.-xiii.).

Jeroboam II. King of Israel 790-749 B. C. (Duncker), son of Joash whom he succeeded. He was the most prosperous of the kings of Israel (2 Ki. xiv.).

Jerome (jēr-ōm' or jēr'ōm), Saint (Eusebius Hieronymus). [Gr. Ἱερώνυμος, sacred name; L. Hieronymus, It. Gerónimo, Girolamo, Sp. Jerónimo, Jeromo, Pg. Jeronimo, F. Jérôme, G. Hieronymus.] Born at Stridon, Pannonia, about 340; died at Bethlehem, Sept. 30, 420. A father of the Latin Church. He studied at Rome under Donatus the grammarian and Victorinus the rhetorician. In 373, during a journey through the Orient, he was attacked with a severe illness, on recovering from which he devoted himself to an ecclesiastical life. He became a presbyter at Antioch in 379, and in 382 removed to Rome, where he became secretary to Pope Damasus. After the death of this pontiff he entered a monastery at Bethlehem. He published a Latin version of the Bible, known as the Vulgate (which see), and by his knowledge of Greek and Hebrew introduced the treasures of the Eastern Church into the West. The best edition of his works is that by Vallarsi (1734-42).

Jérôme, King of Westphalia. See Bonaparte.

Jerome in the Wilderness. A painting by Titian, in the Brera at Milan. The solitary figure of the saint is broadly and vigorously treated. The background brings to mind a wild scene in Friuli, with its rocks, pines, and gnarled oaks.

Jerome of Prague. Born at Prague, Bohemia, about 1365; burned at Constance, Baden, May 30, 1416. A Bohemian religious reformer, an associate and follower of Huss. He was condemned for heresy by the Council of Constance, 1415-16.

Jerónimo (jēr-ōn'i-mō), or Hieronimo (hī-erōn'i-mō). The first part of. A play by Thomas Kyd. It was acted in 1588 or 1592. The only version extant was printed in 1605. The second part was called "The Spanish Tragedy" (which see). Jeronimo, the hero of both, is an old man, the marshal of Spain, who goes mad with grief over the murder of his son. His ravings were ridiculed by contemporary and later dramatists, and became regular expletives in the slang of the period. Shakspeare alludes to this in his "Go by Jeronimy" in his "Taming of the Shrew."

The two "Jerónimo" or "Hieronimo" plays were, as has been said, extremely popular, and it is positively known that Jonson himself, and probably others, were employed from time to time to freshen them up, with the consequence that the exact authorship of particular passages is somewhat problematical. Both plays, however, display, nearly in perfection, the rant, not always quite ridiculous but always extravagant, from which Shakspeare rescued the stage. Sainsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 74.

Jerrold (jēr'old), Douglas William. Born at London, Jan. 3, 1803; died there, June 8, 1857. An English dramatist, satirist, and humorist. He was the eldest son of Samuel Jerrold, an actor, and was brought on the stage when a child. In later life he occasionally acted, but was never inclined to the profession. His education was very slight: his knowledge of Latin, French, Italian, and English dramatic literature having been acquired entirely by his own efforts. From 1813 to 1815 he served as midshipman in the royal navy, which was engaged in operations against Napoleon in Belgium. Returning to London in 1816, he maintained himself as apprentice to a printer, and by contributions to periodical literature. A play, "More Frightened than Hurt," was produced in London April 30, 1821, and later in Paris. "Black-eyed Susan, or All in the Downs," produced June 8, 1822, at the Surrey Theatre, was his first important success. It was brought out also at Drury Lane in 1835. In 1826 he undertook the management of the Strand Theatre without success. He now turned his attention to the reviews and magazines, contributing to the "Athenaeum," "Blackwood's," etc. He attached himself to "Punch" at its appearance in 1841, and was a constant contributor until his death. His articles were signed G. His greatest success was "Mrs. Caudle's Curtain Lectures." From 1852 until his death he edited "Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper." He wrote about 40 plays.

Jerrold, William Blanchard. Born at London, Dec. 23, 1826; died at Westminster, March 10, 1884. An English journalist and author, eldest son of Douglas Jerrold. On the death of his father he succeeded to the editorship of "Lloyd's Weekly Newspaper." He was a Liberal in politics, and defended the North in the Civil War. His chief work is a "Life of Napoleon III." (1875-82). He wrote a number of plays, "Cool as a Cucumber" (1851), etc.

Jersey (jēr'zi). The largest, most important, and southernmost of the Channel Islands, capital St. Helier's, situated in lat. 49° 10' N., long. 9° 7' W. It exports potatoes, cattle, fruit, oysters, granite, etc. The government is vested in a lieutenant-governor appointed by the British crown, and the "states" (a local legislature). It is the M.L. Casarea. Length, 10 miles. Breadth, 5 to 6 miles. Area, 45 square miles. Population (1891), 54,513.

Jersey City. The capital of Hudson County, New Jersey, situated on the Hudson opposite New York. It is the terminus of many railway and steamer lines, and has important manufactures of tobacco, etc. It was formerly called Paulus Hook, and was incorporated as the City of Jersey in 1850, and as Jersey City in 1858. Population (1890), 163,003.

Jerseys (jēr'ziz), The. A collective name for East Jersey and West Jersey, into which New Jersey was temporarily divided in 1676.

Jerusalem (jēr-rō'sa-lem). [Heb. Yerushalēm or Yerishalāyim, probably 'city of peace'; in the Assyrian inscriptions Ursalimnu; in the tablets of Tel-el-Amarna Uru-Salim, Gr. Ἱερουσαλίμη, L. Hierosolyma.] The ancient capital of Palestine, regarded by the Jews still as their sacred city, and as a holy city by both Christians and Mohammedans. Its identity with Salem (Gen. xiv. 18) is disputed. It first appears as Jebus, the city of the Jebusites, from whom David captured it or its site, establishing himself in the "stronghold of Zion," and making it his capital. Its situation was suitable for a national metropolis: it lay in a mountain range of the tribe of Judah, and virtually in the center of the country, 33 miles from the sea and about 19 from the Jordan, while it was the more secure from being some distance off the great highroad of the nations. It was also a mountain city, situated in the heart of the "hill country," surrounded by limestone hills, and itself on the edge of the chain, its highest point being 2,552 feet above sea-level. Solomon beautified it by erecting the temple as a stable national sanctuary, and otherwise, and surrounded the city with a real wall. The accession of the ten tribes under Solomon's son Rehoboam left Jerusalem the capital of the southern kingdom only. Under Rehoboam it was invaded by the Egyptian king Shishak, and the temple and palace were in part despoiled (about 970 B. C.). Under Joram (848-844) the temple was again plundered by Arabian and Philistine hordes. Josiah, king of Israel, defeating King Amaziah of Judah, made a wide breach in the walls and spoiled the city. Under Uzziah (792-740) Jerusalem and all Judah enjoyed prosperity, but were visited by an earthquake. Hezekiah provided the city with water by means of a subterranean canal; in his reign it was besieged without success by Sennacherib. After Josiah fell in the battle of Megiddo, Judah was at the mercy of Egypt. Necho took Jehoahaz prisoner, and exacted a heavy fine from the city and country. Jerusalem was visited by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, after his victory over the Egyptians at Carchemish; probably the city was besieged, as he carried off some of the vessels of the temple. In 597 the Babylonians reappeared before Jerusalem: the city surrendered, the treasures of the temple and palace were pillaged, and King Jehoiachin, the whole court, 7,000 warriors, 1,000 artisans, etc. (in all 10,000), were carried off to Babylon. Zedekiah, made king in his stead, revolted against Babylon, and Nebuchadnezzar, after a terrible siege of 18 months, again captured Jerusalem (586). The Babylonians now carried off all the treasures that remained; the temple was burned, and the city and land deserted by all but the very poorest class. In 539 Cyrus issued a decree authorizing the rebuilding of the temple, and a large colony, comprising all classes, returned to Judah. After many delays the temple was finished in 516, and the city and its walls were rebuilt under Nehemiah, about 445. In 320 Jerusalem was taken by Ptolemy I. Soter. The high priest Simeon the Just (about 300-270) effected many improvements in the city. In 193 Judea came under the rule of the Seleucids, and Jerusalem opened its gates to Antiochus the Great. Under Antiochus Epiphanes (175-164) it again became a theater of massacre: in 170 he slew the citizens, plundered the temple, and carried off many captives; and in 168 his army, after a great slaughter, plundered and burnt the city, and destroyed the walls. Antiochus endeavored to enforce the introduction of heathen worship: the temple was desecrated and the observance of Jewish ceremonies was absolutely forbidden. This persecution provoked the successful rising of the Maccabees, and the temple was purified and consecrated again in 165. The city enjoyed prosperity under John Hyrcanus I. (135-105), but a struggle for the throne between two Maccabees resulted in Pompey's coming to Jerusalem in 63 and reducing it, and in an invasion in 40 by the Parthians. In 37 B. C. Jerusalem was taken by Herod with the aid of the Romans. Herod embellished it with palaces, theaters, gymnasia, etc., and especially by the rebuilding of the temple. He also completed the reconstruction of a fortress built by John Hyrcanus, naming it Antonia, after Mark Antony. Soon after Herod's death Judea was reduced to a Roman province, and Jerusalem was often the scene of riots and bloody encounters between the Jews and the Roman soldiers. The oppressive rule of the procurators, especially of Gessius Florus, led to resistance which ended in the destruction of Jerusalem. The city, with its triple walls, was besieged first by Cestius Florus, the governor of Syria, and for two years by the emperors Vespasian and Titus. Within it was ravaged by party quarrels, famine, and pestilence; and at last, after a most heroic resistance, it fell in 70 A. D. Its temple was burned, and it lost forever its political importance. For more than 50 years after its destruction by Titus, Jerusalem ceased to exist. About 130 the emperor Hadrian erected a town on its site, which he named Elia Capitolina, or simply Elia, and settled with a colony of veterans. About the same time a revolt under Bar-Cochba occurred, in which the Jews became masters of Jerusalem and attempted to rebuild the temple; and it took Julius Severus, the greatest general of his time, two years to recapture it. On the site of the temple various heathen temples were now erected. Jews were forbidden to enter it on pain of death, and a swine was sculptured over the gate leading to Bethlehem. Christian pilgrimages to Jerusalem began as early as the 3d century. Helena, mother of Constantine, visited it in 326, and the empress Eudocia in 438, and numerous churches were erected on the holy places. It was an episcopal see subordinate to Caesarea till after the Council of Chalcedon (451), when it became an independent patriarchate. It was taken by the Persians in 614, but was regained by Heraclius in 628. In 637 it fell into the hands of the Saracen Omar: it had then about 50,000 inhabitants. In 969 it passed over to Egyptian Fatimites. From 1099 to 1187 it was the capital of the kingdom of Jerusalem of the Crusaders, who slew most of the Mohammedan and Jewish inhabitants. Captured in 1187 by Saladin, it was surrendered in 1229 to the emperor Frederick II. Since 1244 it has been in possession of the Mohammedans, and since 1517 under Turkish rule. In 1800 Napoleon planned the capture of Jerusalem, but gave up his intention. Mehmet Ali, pasha of Egypt, took possession of it in 1832; in 1834 it was seized and held for some time by insurgent Bedouins; and in 1841 it was again restored to the sultan. Modern Jerusalem is a city of the vilayet of Syria, Asiatic Turkey, situated in lat. 31° 47' N., long. 35° 13' E. The Christian quarter occupies the north-west of it, the Mohammedan the northeast, the Jewish the southeast, and the Armenian the southwest. It is the residence of the Pasha of Palestine, and is now connected with Jaffa by railway. The most conspicuous edifice is the Haram esh Sherif, on the supposed site of the temple. Population, estimated, about 40,000.

Jerusalem. An opera by Verdi, produced at Paris in 1847.

Jerusalem, Council of. A council of the apostles, elders, and brethren, convened at Jerusalem 50 or 51 A. D. for the settlement of questions that had arisen regarding the recognition of Gentile Christians and the obligation of their being circumcised. The deliverance of the council is given in Acts xv. 23-29.

Already the peace of the flourishing community at Antioch had been disturbed by some of the more zealous converts from Jerusalem, who still asserted the indispensable necessity of circumcision. Paul and Barnabas proceeded as delegates from the community at Antioch; and what is called the Council of Jerusalem, a full assembly of all the apostles then present in the metropolis, solemnly debated this great question.

Milman, Hist. of Christianity, 1. 403.

Jerusalem, Kingdom of. A Christian kingdom in Syria, 1100-87, largely under French influence. It was continued as a titular kingdom, now held nominally by the house of Austria.

Jerusalem Chamber. A room at the southwest side of Westminster Abbey, dating from 1376 or 1386. Henry IV. died in this room. The Upper House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury meets in it. It probably derives its name from tapestries with the history of Jerusalem on them, which hung on the walls.

Jerusalem Coffee House. An old house in Cornhill, London. It is one of the oldest of the city news-rooms, and is frequented by merchants and captains connected with the commerce of China, India, and Australia. Timbs.

Jerusalem Delivered, It. Gerusalemme Liberata. An epic poem by Torquato Tasso, relating to the deliverance of Jerusalem from the unbelievers by the Crusaders under Godfrey of Bouillon (published 1581; English translations by Fairfax, 1600, and James, 1865).

Jervis (jér'vis), John, Earl St. Vincent. Born at Meaford, Jan. 9, 1735; died March 14, 1823.

An English admiral. He entered the royal navy as able seaman Jan. 4, 1749. Sept. 24, 1787, he was promoted rear-admiral, and in 1790 was returned to Parliament for Wycombe. Feb. 1, 1793, he became vice-admiral, and on July 1, 1795, was made admiral. On Nov. 29, 1795, he joined the fleet on the coast of Corsica as commander-in-chief. Sept. 25, 1796, he was ordered to abandon Corsica and the Mediterranean and to defend the Channel. To prevent the union of the allied fleet with the French squadron at Brest, he took up a position off Cape St. Vincent Feb. 1797. On Feb. 14 a battle was fought, resulting in the capture of four Spanish ships. He was at once gazetted to an earldom with the title of St. Vincent. He relinquished his command June 15, 1799. In the summer of 1800 he again entered the service in command of the Channel fleet. In 1801 he became first lord of the admiralty. On the collapse of the Addington ministry and the return of Pitt to power, St. Vincent's retirement from the admiralty became necessary. After the death of Pitt he again entered the service with the acting rank of admiral of the fleet, March, 1806, but was relieved April 24, 1807.

Jervis, Sir John. Born Jan. 12, 1802; died at London, Nov. 1, 1856. An English jurist, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. He was second cousin of John Jervis, Earl St. Vincent. He studied at Trinity College, Cambridge, and was called to the bar in 1824. From 1826 to 1832 he reported in the Exchequer court. Dec., 1832, he was returned for Chester as a Liberal in the first reform Parliament. He was appointed solicitor-general in 1846, and attorney-general in the same year. July 16, 1850, he was appointed lord chief justice of the Common Pleas. In 1848 were passed three bills which bear his name, regulating the duties of justices of the peace.

Jesi (já'sé). A city in the province of Ancona, eastern Italy, situated on the Esino 16 miles west-southwest of Ancona: the ancient Æsis or Æsium. It has a cathedral, and is noted as the birthplace of the emperor Frederick II. Population, about 12,000.

Jesse (jes'é). The father of David, king of Israel.

Jesse, John Heneage. Born 1815; died at London, July 7, 1874. An English historical writer. He published "Memoirs of the Court of England during the Reign of the Stuarts" (1840), and similar works.

Jessel (jes'el), Sir George. Born at London, Feb. 13, 1824; died there, March 21, 1883. An English jurist. He was the son of a Jewish merchant. He graduated at London University in 1843, and was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn in 1847. Jessel was returned to Parliament for Dover in Dec., 1868, and was appointed solicitor-general in 1871. During his tenure of office occurred the Geneva arbitration. In 1873 he was made master of the rolls.

Jesselmere. See Jaisalmir.

Jessica (jes'i-ki). In Shakspeare's "Merchant of Venice," the daughter of Shylock. She elopes with Lorenzo, taking her father's jewels and money. "A most beautiful pagan, a most sweet Jew."

Jesso. See Yezo.

Jessonda. An opera by Spohr, first produced at Cassel in 1823, and at London in 1840.

Jessor, or Jessore (jes-sör'). A district in Bengal, British India, intersected by lat. 23° N., long. 89° 30' E. Area, 2,276 square miles. Population (1881), 1,577,249.

Jests of Gonnella. The jests of the domestic fool of Nicolo d'Esto: they were printed in 1506.

Jesuits (jez'ú-its). [So called (first, it is said, by Calvin, about 1550) from the name given to the order by its founder (NL. Societas Jesu, the Company (or Society) of Jesus.) The members of the "Society of Jesus" (or "Company of Jesus"), founded by Ignatius Loyola in 1534, and confirmed by the Pope in 1540. Its membership includes two general classes (aymen, or temporal coadjutors, and priests) and six grades—namely, novices, formed temporal coadjutors, approved scholastics, formed spiritual coadjutors, the professed of three vows, and the professed of four vows. The professed of the four vows are the most influential class; they form the general congregation, and fill the highest offices and the leading missions. The general is elected for life by the general congregation. They were expelled from France in 1594; restored in 1603; again expelled in 1764, and for the last time in 1880. They were expelled from Spain in 1767, and at different times from various other countries. In 1773 the order was suppressed by Pope Clement XIV., but it was revived in 1814.

Jesus (jé'zus). [Gr. Ἰησοῦς, Saviour, from Heb. Jehoshua or Joshua, Jehovah is salvation: used in Acts vii. 45, Heb. iv. 8 for Joshua.] The personal name of the founder of Christianity, often joined with the official name Christ, the Anointed One (Jesus Christ or Christ Jesus). He is the central figure in the Christian religion, belief in whom as the Son of God and the Saviour of men is its distinctive characteristic. His personality has been the subject of much controversy. The Trinitarian doctrine that there is but one God and yet three equal subjects or "persons" in one Godhead is that now accepted generally throughout Christendom, the essence of the Father and Son being regarded as the same, as was maintained in the early church by the Homoiousians in opposition to the Homoiousians, who held that their natures are only similar, and the Heteroiousians, who held that they are different. According to the narratives of the four gospels, Jesus was born of Mary, a virgin of the tribe of Judah and family of David, in a stable at Bethlehem; was brought up as a carpenter in the workshop of his reputed father; entered, when about 30 years of age, on a public ministry; traveled for two or three years through Judea and Galilee, teaching and working numerous miracles, especially of healing, accompanied more or less by twelve men whom he had chosen as his disciples; was thereafter seized by the Jews, subjected to an irregular trial on a charge of blasphemy, handed over by the Jews to Pilate, the Roman governor, and ultimately sent by him to crucifixion; died on the cross, was buried, and on the morning of the third day rose again from the dead; was afterward seen of many witnesses; and forty days later ascended into Heaven. The birth of Jesus is now generally believed to have taken place about four years before the period from which we reckon our years in the vulgar or Christian era.

Jesús, Raphael de. See Raphael de Jesús.

Jesus College. A college of Cambridge University, England, founded in 1496 by John Alcock, bishop of Ely, on the site of a Benedictine monastery. The chapel is the old convent church, somewhat cut down; its architecture is Norman and Early English, with some Perpendicular interpolations.

Jesus College. A college of the University of Oxford, founded in 1571 by Queen Elizabeth: originally intended for Welsh students. It was rebuilt in 1621-67, and restored in 1856. The chapel (built 1621) is notable for its wainscoting of paneled oak, and the hall for its portraits and Jacobean screen.

Jesus Disputing with the Doctors. A painting by Paolo Veronese, in the Royal Museum at Madrid.

Jethro (jeth'rō). [Heb., 'excellence.'] A priest or chief of the Midianites who inhabited the southern point of Sinai, the father of seven daughters, one of whom, Zipporah, was married to Moses. In Ex. ii. 18, Num. x. 29 the name is given as Reuel. Perhaps the latter was his personal name, and Jethro an honorary title, or the discrepancy of the names may be due to separate and independent narratives. By the advice of Jethro, Moses appointed deputies to judge the people and to share the burden of government with him (Ex. xviii.).

Jeu de Paume (zhè dè pōm). Hall of the. [F. 'tennis.'] A building in Versailles, France. It is famous for the oath to form a constitution sworn here by the representatives of the Third Estate June 20, 1789.

Jeunesse Dorée (zhé-nés' dô-rá'). [F., 'gilded youth.'] In French history, a band of young men who formed a reactionary faction against the Jacobins after the 9th Thermidor, year 2 (July 27, 1794).

Jever (já'fer). A town in Oldenburg, Germany, 34 miles north-northwest of Oldenburg; formerly the chief town of Jeverland, an old division of Friesland.

Jevons (jev'onz), William Stanley. Born at Liverpool, Sept. 1, 1835; drowned while bathing near Hastings, Aug. 13, 1882. An English economist and logician. He was the son of a nail-maker and iron merchant of Liverpool. He entered University College, London, in 1851, and studied chemistry with his cousin, Sir Henry Roscoe. In 1853 he became assayer to the new mint at Sydney, Australia, resigning his appointment in 1859 to return to University College. From 1862 to 1864 he published numerous dissertations on currency and finance. In 1864 appeared his "Pure Logic, or the Logic of Quality apart from Quantity," based on the work of Boole. In 1865 he published a work on the exhaustion of the coal-mines. He was appointed to the chair of logic and political economy at Owens College, Manchester, in 1866, and to the professorship of political economy at University College in 1876. This he resigned in 1880. He published "The Substitution of Similars" (1860), "Studies in Deductive Logic" (1880), "The Principles of Science" (1874), "The Theory of Political Economy" (1871).

Jew, The Wandering. See Wandering Jew, The.
Jewel (jé'el), John. Born May 24, 1522; died at Monkton Farleigh, Sept. 23, 1571. Bishop of Salisbury. He graduated at Oxford (Merton College) in 1540, and was elected fellow of Corpus Christi in 1542. On the accession of Mary in 1553, Jewel was deprived of his fellowship, and fled to Frankfort March 13, 1555. On Mary's death he returned to England. His letters to Peter Martyr and other friends at this time are a valuable source of historical information. He was appointed a disputant at the Westminster Conference in 1559, preacher at Paul's Cross in June, 1560, and bishop of Salisbury in July, 1560. In 1562 appeared his "Apologia pro Ecclesia Anglicana," the first methodical statement of the Church of England's position against the Church of Rome. Jewel's complete works were collected under the direction of Archbishop Bancroft and published in 1609.

Jew of Malta, The. A play by Marlowe. It was written after 1588, and was frequently acted between 1591 and 1596. It was revived in 1601 and 1633, and in 1818 Kenn produced an altered version at Drury Lane. The earliest English edition extant is dated 1633, and was edited, somewhat altered, by T. Heywood. It presents the popular idea of an avaricious, murderous Jew.

There was an older play of "The Jew," named by Stephen Gosson in his "School of Abuse" as setting forth "the greediness of worldly choosers and the bloody minds of usurers," which seems to have been a treatment in one play of the two fables which form the groundwork of Shakespeare's "Merchant of Venice." Some years after the death of Marlowe we find evidence in Germany of the existence of a play in which Barabas of "The Jew of Malta" is made one with the Jew of the other play. It has, therefore, some rough features of resemblance to "The Merchant of Venice," and in the course of this piece it is to be observed that Barabas changes his name to Joseph.

Morley, English Writers, X, 117.

Jews (jöz). [From Judah.] Loosely, the Semitic nation that was earlier called Hebrews, Israelites, or the children of Israel; strictly, the people descended from the tribes of Judah and Benjamin (see Judah, Kingdom of). After the destruction of Jerusalem (70 A. D.) these were scattered throughout other countries. They still remain a distinct people, often oppressed and persecuted, but retaining their nationality and distinguished by specific characteristics. Their number at the present time is estimated at between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000, about 6,500,000 being in Europe.

Jewsbury (jöz'ber-i), Geraldine Endors. Born at Measham, Derbyshire, in 1812; died Sept. 23, 1880. An English novelist. She was the daughter of Thomas Jewsbury of Manchester. In 1841 she became associated with Thomas Carlyle and his wife, and removed to Chelsea, to be near them, in 1854. Among her novels are "Zoe" (1845), "The Half-Sisters" (1848), "Sorrows of Gentility" (1850), etc.; and she wrote several children's stories and short tales.

Jewsbury, Maria Jane (afterward Mrs. Fletcher). Born at Measham, Derbyshire, England, Oct. 25, 1800; died at Poonah, India, Oct. 4, 1833. An English author, sister of Geraldine. She wrote "Phantasmagoria, etc.," "Letters to the Young," "Lays of Leisure Hours," etc. Her best work appeared in the "Athenæum."

Joachimites (jō'a-kim-its). The followers or believers in the doctrines of an Italian mystic, Joachim (died about 1200), abbot of Floris. The most important feature of his doctrines was the belief that the history of man will be covered by three reigns: the first, that of the Father, from the creation till the birth of Christ; the second, that of the Son, from the birth of Christ till 1260; and the third, that of the Holy Spirit, from 1260 onward. This last view was developed by his adherents into the belief that a new gospel would supersede the revelation of the Old and New Testaments. These views had many supporters in the 13th century.

Joachimsthal (yō'ā-chim-s-täl). A mining and manufacturing town in Bohemia, situated in lat. 50° 23' N., long. 12° 54' E. Its silver-mines were celebrated in the 16th century. The word thaler, dollar, is derived from this place. Population (1890), commune, 7,046.

Joan, surnamed "The Fair Maid of Kent." [From Joanna.] Born 1328; died at Wallingford Castle, Aug. 7, 1385. The wife of Edward, prince of Wales, "the Black Prince," and mother of Richard II., probably the younger daughter of Edmund of Woodstock, earl of Kent, sixth son of Edward I. In Oct., 1330, the young queen Philippa took charge of her, and she became "in her time the most beautiful of all the kingdom (?) of England and the most lovable" (Froissart). She was first married to Sir Thomas Holland, steward of the household to William de Montacute, second earl of Salisbury. A few months after his death (Dec. 28, 1360) she married the Black Prince. The marriage was celebrated by Simon Islip (whom see), archbishop of Canterbury, at Lambeth, Oct. 10, 1361. Between 1362 and 1371 she was with the prince in Aquitaine, where her two sons Edward and Richard II. were born. The Black Prince died on June 8, 1376, and in June, 1377, Richard became king. At her interposition in 1378 proceedings against Wyclif at Lambeth were arrested. She also exerted all her influence to heal the breach between Richard and John of Gaunt. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Joan, Queen of Scotland, called "Joan of the Tower." Born in the Tower, London, about July, 1321; died Aug. 14, 1362. The fourth and youngest child of Edward II. and Isabella, daughter of Philip IV. of France. In the summer of 1327 Isabella and Mortimer, in the name of Edward III., proposed to Robert Bruce, then besieging Norham, the marriage of his son and heir David to Joan, and the marriage was included among the conditions of the peace concluded at Northampton, April, 1328. They were married at Berwick, July 12, 1328. The Scots called the princess "Joan Make-peace." The children were crowned at Stone Nov. 24, 1331. When Edward Balliol seized the crown of Scotland (Sept. 24, 1332), David and Joan fled to Dunbarton, and in 1334 to the Château Gaillard in France until May, 1341, when they returned to Scotland.

Joan. A mythical female pope, supposed to have reigned about 853-858. She is represented as of English descent, although born at Ingelheim or Mainz, and as having fallen in love with a young Benedictine monk, with whom she fled in male attire to Athens. After his death she removed to Rome, where she rose to the rank of cardinal. She was elected pope as John VIII. on the death of Leo IV., and died in childbirth during a public procession.

Joan of Arc (jō-an' or jōn oy ärk), F. Jeanne d'Arc or Darc (zhān dārĕ), called "The Maid of Orléans." Born at Domremy, Jan. 6, 1412; died May 30, 1431. The French national heroine. She was the illiterate daughter of a peasant proprietor at Domremy. At the time of her appearance in history the English were masters of the whole of France north of the Loire, and the queen mother Isabella supported the pretensions of her grandson Henry VI. of England to the throne of France in opposition to her son Charles VII. of France. According to a version of a prophecy by Merlin, which was current in her native province and with which she was undoubtedly familiar, France was to be overwhelmed with calamities, but was to be delivered by a virgin out of the forest of Domremy. She imagined that she heard supernatural voices commanding her to liberate France, and eventually gained access to the court of Charles VII., who intrusted her with the command of an army. She raised the siege of Orléans by the English, May 8, 1429, and gained the great victory of Patay, June 18, 1429, with the result that Charles VII. was enabled, July 17, 1429, to receive the consecrated oil at Rheims, where the kings of France were anciently accustomed to hold the coronation ceremonies. She was captured May 24, 1430, while defending Compiègne against the Duke of Burgundy; was sold by the duke to his allies the English; and was burned at the stake as a heretic at Ronen, May 30, 1431.

Joan of Arc. A painting by Bastien-Lepage, in the Metropolitan Museum, New York. The maid, as a coarsely dressed Lorraine peasant girl, leans against an apple-tree amid rustic surroundings, and looks upward with a rapt expression. Above float spectral figures of angels and of knights in armor.

Joanna (jō-au'jī) I. [Fem. of Joannes.] Died 1382. Queen of Naples 1343-82. She procured the murder of her first husband, Andrew, prince of Hungary, in 1345, and in 1346 married Prince Louis of Tarantum. She was expelled by Louis, king of Hungary, who invaded Naples to avenge the death of Andrew, but was restored in 1352. She was captured and put to death by the usurper Charles III. (whom see).

Joash. King of Judah 837-797 B. C. (Duneker), son of Ahaziah. He was the only prince of the royal house who escaped massacre on the usurpation of the throne by Athaliah (whom see). He was proclaimed by the high priest Jehoiada (whom see), who overthrew Athaliah, in 837. He put to death Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada, in anger at being rebuked for restoring the worship of Baal, and was murdered by his own servants during an invasion of the Syrians.

Job (jōb). [Heb. Jōb.] The hero of a book of the Old Testament named from him. He is a man of great wealth and prosperity, who is suddenly overtaken by dire misfortunes. These give rise to a series of discussions between Job and a number of friends who come to visit him. The problem discussed is whether suffering is always the punishment for sin, and, conversely, whether sin is always followed by punishment. Job asserts his righteousness, and his friends assume that his suffering must be a punishment for sin. A righteous man named Job is mentioned in Ezek. xiv. 14, but it is generally assumed that the book itself is not historical in character. This assumption is found as far back as the Talmud. The authorship has been ascribed to Moses, Jeremiah, Ezra, and other biblical writers. Some modern critics consider it an Israelitish production, and place it directly after the fall of Samaria (722 B. C.), while others hold that it is a Judaic production dating from the period of the Babylonian captivity. The work is poetic in form, with a prose prologue and epilogue. Some writers call it a drama, others a didactic lyric. It is held by some that the book in its present form is not the original poem. The prologue and epilogue are considered later additions. The speeches of Elihu (one of the friends) are held to be interpolations made in the interest of orthodox beliefs, and some writers consider still other passages interpolations made from the same point of view. The great literary merit of the book is recognized by all modern writers.

Jocasta (jō-kas'tā). A play by Gaseoigne and Francis Kinwelmarsh, acted in 1566. It has been supposed to be the only Early English play derived from the Greek, but is really a translation from the Italian of Lodovico Dolce.

Jocaste (jō-kas'tē), or Epicaste (ep-i-kas'tē). [Gr. Ἰοκάστη, Ἐπικάστη.] In Greek legend, the wife of Laius, and mother of Oedipus whom she afterward married. See Œdipus.

Jocelin, or Joscelin (jōs'e-lin). Flourished 1200. An English hagiographer, a Cistercian monk of the abbey of Furness in Lancashire, and later of the monastery at Down, northern Ireland. He wrote "Life and Miracles of St. Waltheof of Melrose," "Life of David, King of Scotland," "Life of St. Kentigern," "Life and Miracles of St. Patrick," and was probably the author of a "Life of St. Helen," and a work "De Britonni Episcopis" mentioned by Stowe.

Jocelin de Brakelonde. Flourished 1200. A native of Bury St. Edmunds, and chronicler of St. Edmund's Abbey. He entered the convent in 1173. His chronicle of the abbey covers the period from 1173 to 1202. The graphic account of the abbot Samson suggested Carlyle's "Past and Present" (1843).

Jochanan ben Zaccai (jō-kā'nān ben zak'ki). The celebrated founder of the school of Jabne (which see), and head of the Jewish community after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. He had a school in Jerusalem. At the outbreak of the revolution he urged the maintenance of peace with Rome. Later he managed to escape from the besieged city into the Roman camp, being carried out of the town as a corpse. He obtained from Vespasian permission to open a school in Jabne, and through the activity he displayed as head of the school and president of the Sanhedrim, which likewise took up its abode at Jabne, became the restorer and regenerator of Jewish national life out of the ruins of the state and temple. His last blessing to his disciples surrounding his death-bed was: "May the fear of God influence your actions as much as the fear of man."

Jodelle (zhō-del'), Étienne, Sieur de Lymodin. Born at Paris, 1532; died there, July, 1573. A French dramatic poet, a member of the Pléiade, and the founder of modern French tragedy and comedy. He wrote the tragedies "Cléopâtre captive" (1552), "Didon" (1553), the comedy "Eugène," etc.

Jodhpur (jōd-pōr'). 1. A native state in Rajputana, India, intersected by lat. 26° N., long. 72° E.; called also Marwar. It passed under British protection in 1818. Area, 37,445 square miles. Population (1891), 2,521,727.

1745; died at London, Jan. 26, 1831. An English classical scholar and dramatist, a friend of Dr. Johnson. He became member of Parliament for Seaford, Sussex, in 1794. He wrote "Philology of the English Language" (1820), "A Widow and no Widow" (produced at the Haymarket July 17, 1779), "The Persian Heroine," a tragedy (printed 1786, and acted under the patronage of the Persian ambassador June 2, 1819).

Joel (jō'el). [Heb., 'Jehovah is God.'] The second in order of the minor prophets of Israel. His prophecy, which consists of 3 chapters, is spoken partly in his own name and partly in that of Jehovah. It foretells judgments that are to come in Israel, exhorts the people to repentance and reform, and promises ultimate blessings. Its date has been much disputed.

Jogues (zhōg), Isaac. Born at Orléans, France, Jan. 10, 1607; killed at Canghaiwaga, N. Y., Oct. 18, 1646. A French Jesuit missionary. He entered the order of the Jesuits in 1624; was ordained priest in 1636; and in the same year went to Canada, being sent there as a missionary to the Hurons. He was captured in 1642 by the Mohawks, but escaped with the assistance of the Dutch in 1643. In 1646 he voluntarily returned to the Mohawks, with a view to establishing a mission; but was looked upon as a sorcerer and killed. He wrote a "Description of New Netherlands," a "Notice of René Goupil," and a "Journal" of his captivity, which have been published in the "Collections of the New York Historical Society."

Johanna. See Joanna.

Johanna (jō-han'ā) Island, or Anzuan (än-zō-än'), or Anjuan (än-jō-än'). One of the Comoro Islands, situated in Mozambique Channel, east of Africa, in lat. 12° 16' S., long. 44° 25' E. It is governed by a sultan residing at the head town, Johanna. Population (estimated), 12,000.

Johannot (zhō-ä-nō'), Alfred. Born at Offenbach, March 21, 1800; died at Paris, Dec. 7, 1837. A French historical painter. He was first known as the engraver of the pictures of Vernet and Ary Scheffer.

Johannot, Tony. Born at Offenbach, Nov. 9, 1803; died at Paris, Aug. 4, 1852. A French historical painter and engraver, brother of Alfred.

John (jōn), the Apostle. [Early mod. E. also Jon; also, after the L., Johan; ME. Jon (with long vowel, as in the gen. Jones, whence the mod. surname Jones), also Johan, OF. Johan, Jehan, Jean, F. Jean, Sp. Juan, Pg. João, It. Gianni, Gianni, Gian, D. Jan, G. Johann, Russ. Ivan, etc., from LL. Joannes, Johannes, Gr. Ἰωάννης, Heb. Jehohanan (in Eng. O. T. Johanan), 'the Lord graciously gave.' The form Jack, often used as a familiar substitute for John, is really a short form of Jacob.] One of the three disciples of Jesus who were admitted to closest intimacy with him, preëminently "the disciple whom Jesus loved." He was the son of Zebedee, and originally a fisherman. His brother James and he were designated "Boanerges," sons of thunder. He leaned on the bosom of Jesus at the last supper, and was present at the crucifixion, when Jesus committed his mother to John's special care. He is generally believed to have been the author of the gospel and the three epistles that bear his name, and also of the Apocalypse or Revelation, though the question of the authorship of all these has more or less been matter of discussion. Early ecclesiastical traditions tell that, after an enforced or voluntary exile to the isle of Patmos, he returned to Ephesus, and died there at a great age.

John, The Gospel of. The fourth gospel, the authorship of which is generally attributed to the apostle John. It has very much less in common with the other three gospels than they have with each other. Its main purpose is set forth in the book itself: "These are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and that, believing, ye might have life through his name" (xx. 31). While it is largely narrative, the discourses and sayings of Jesus have prominence (see especially xiv.-xvii.). The date usually assigned to it is from 80 to 90 A. D.

John, the Baptist. Born about 5 (?) B. C.; beheaded about 30 A. D. The forerunner of Jesus, and the last of the Hebrew prophets.

John I., Saint. Pope 523-526. He was a native of Tuscany, and was elevated on the death of Hormisdas. In 525 he was sent by Theodoric, king of the East Goths, at the head of an embassy to the Byzantine emperor to obtain toleration for the Arians, in which he was only partially successful. He was suspected by Theodoric of having secretly opposed the object of the mission, and was on his return thrown into prison, where he died. He is commemorated in the Roman Catholic Church on May 27.

John II., surnamed Mercurius (on account of his eloquence). Pope 532-535.

John III. Pope 560-573. During his pontificate Italy was ravaged by frequent incursions of the Lombards.

John IV. Pope 640-642. He was a native of Salona in Dalmatia, and condemned the Monothelitic formula of faith prepared by Sergius at the instance of the emperor Heraclius.

John V. Pope 685-686. He was a native of Antioch in Syria.

John VI. Pope 701-705.

John VII. Pope 705-707.

John VIII. Pope 872-882, a Roman by birth. He crowned the emperors Charles the Bald (875) and Charles the Fat (881), and paid tribute to the Saracens.

John IX. Pope 898-900.

John X. Pope 914-928. He was elevated through the influence of his mistress Theodora, a courtesan at Rome. He defeated the Saracens near the Garigliano in 916.

John XI. Born 906; died 936. Pope 931-932, son of Marozia (whom see) and Pope Sergius III. He was deposed by his brother Alberic, and died in prison.

John XII. Died 964. Pope 955-963, son of Alberic II., patrician of Rome, and grandson of Marozia (whom see). He called to his aid against Berengar II. of Italy, Otto I. of Germany, whom he crowned emperor in 962. He presently conspired against the emperor, however, and was deposed by him in 963.

John XIII. Pope 965-972.

John XIV. Pope 983-984. He was elected, through the influence of the emperor Otto II., to succeed Benedict VII., but was imprisoned by the antipope Boniface VII. in 984, and died probably by poison.

John XV. Pope 985-996.

John XVI. (Philagathus). Antipope 997-998. He was elevated by Crescentius on the expulsion of Gregory V. in 997, but was imprisoned and blinded by the emperor Otto III. in 998.

John XVII. (Sicco). Pope 1003.

John XVIII. (Fanasus or Fasanus). Pope 1003-09.

John XIX. Pope 1024-33.

John XXI. (or XX.). Pope 1276-77.

John XXII. (Jacques d'Éuse). Born at Cahors, France, about 1244; died 1334. Pope 1316-34. He made his residence at Avignon, and was wholly subservient to the interests of the French court. He opposed the emperor Louis the Bavarian, whose imperial dignity he offered to Charles the Fair of France. Louis, however, installed Nicholas V. as antipope at Rome in 1328, but on retiring from Italy was unable to prevent Nicholas from falling into the hands of John.

John XXIII. (Baltasare Cossa). Born at Naples about 1360; died at Florence, Nov. 22, 1419. Pope 1410-15. He served as a corsair in his youth; afterward studied at the University of Bologna; was created a cardinal in 1402; and in 1410 succeeded Alexander V., whose death he was suspected of having encompassed. He was opposed by the antipopes Benedict XIII. and Gregory XI., along with whom he was deposed by the Council of Constance in 1415.

John, G. Johann (yō'hän), surnamed "The Blind." Born about 1296; killed at the battle of Crécy, Aug. 26, 1346. King of Bohemia, of the house of Luxemburg, 1310-46. He fought at the battle of Mühldorf in 1322.

John, surnamed Lackland. Born probably at Oxford, Dec. 24, 1167 (?); died at Newark, Oct. 19, 1216. King of England 1199-1216, son of Henry II. and Eleanor. He ascended the English throne on the death of his brother Richard I. without issue. His succession was recognized also in the duchy of Normandy, but the lords of Anjou, Maine, and Touraine declared, according to their custom of inheritance, in favor of Arthur as the son of an elder brother. Having put Arthur to death in 1203, his French fiefs were declared forfeited by Philip II. of France, who took Château Gaillard, the last of John's strongholds in France, March 6, 1204. On the death of Hubert Walter, archbishop of Canterbury, in 1205, a disputed election for the archbishopric was followed by a reference to Rome, which resulted in the election of Stephen Langton by the command of Pope Innocent III. In 1206. John refused to recognize the new archbishop, and England was laid under an interdict in 1208. In 1212 the Pope issued a bull deposing John and entrusting the execution of the deposition to Philip II. of France. John made his peace with the Pope by consenting to hold his kingdom in fief from the Pope and to pay an annual tribute of 1,000 marks (May 15, 1213). He thereupon invaded France in alliance with the emperor Otto IV., the Flemish, and others, but was defeated with his allies at Bouvines in 1214. In the mean time the barons, with whom he had been embroiled ever since his accession by his exactions and misgovernment, had combined to secure a reform in the government, and on his return John was compelled to sign the Magna Charta (which see) at Runnymede, June 15, 1215. He appealed to the Pope, who declared the charter void. The barons retorted by declaring the crown forfeited and bestowing it upon Louis, son of Philip II. of France, who landed in England in 1216. John died during the ensuing war, and his opportune death preserved the crown for his son Henry III.

John (F. Jean) II., surnamed "Le Bon" ('the Good'). Died at London, April 8, 1364. King of France 1350-64, son of Philip VI. He was defeated and captured by the British under the Black Prince at Poitiers in 1356, and was restored to liberty by the peace of Brétigny in 1360.

John (P. João) I., surnamed "The Great." Born at Lisbon, April 22, 1357; died Aug. 11, 1433. King of Portugal 1385-1433, illegitimate son of Pedro I. He became grand master of Aviz in 1384, and was in 1385 elected to succeed his legitimate brother Ferdinand I., to the exclusion of Ferdinand's daughter Beatrice, wife of John I. of Castile. John of Castile sought to enforce his wife's claim, but suffered a decisive defeat at Aljubarrota, Aug. 14, 1385. John the Great married Philippa, daughter of John, duke of Lancaster.

John II., surnamed "The Perfect." Died in Oct., 1495. King of Portugal 1481-95, son of Alfonso V. During his reign Bartholomew Dias discovered the Cape of Good Hope (1486).

John III. Born at Lisbon, 1502; died 1557. King of Portugal 1521-57, son of Emanuel I. He introduced the Inquisition about 1526.

John IV., surnamed "The Fortunate." Died Nov. 6, 1656. King of Portugal 1640-56. He headed the revolution against Spain, whose authority he threw off, although the independence of Portugal was not formally recognized before 1668. He was the first of the house of Braganza.

John V. Born at Lisbon, Oct. 22, 1689; died July 31, 1750. King of Portugal 1706-50, son of Pedro II.

John VI. Born at Lisbon, May 13, 1767; died there, March 10, 1826. King of Portugal 1816-1826, son of Queen Maria I. He assumed in 1790 the title of regent for his insane mother, whom he succeeded in 1816. Expelled by the French in 1807, he transferred the government to Brazil, where he resided until 1821.

John III. Born 1537; died Nov. 17, 1592. King of Sweden 1568-92, second son of Gustavus Vasa. He deposed and murdered his brother Eric XIV., whom he succeeded.

John II. Casimir. Born March 21, 1609; died at Nevers, France, Dec. 16, 1672. King of Poland 1648-68, son of Sigismund III. He succeeded his stepbrother Ladislaus, and waged war with Sweden and Russia, with which powers he concluded peace at Oliva May 3, 1660, and Andrussov Jan. 20, 1667, respectively. He abdicated Sept. 16, 1668.

John III. Sobieski. Born at Olesko, Galicia, June 2, 1624; died June 17, 1696. King of Poland 1674-96. He brought an army of 20,000 Poles to the relief of Vienna, before which he gained a celebrated victory over the Turks Sept. 12, 1683.

John, surnamed "The Fearless." Born about 1370; assassinated 1419. Duke of Burgundy, son of Philip the Bold whom he succeeded in 1404. He assassinated the Duke of Orléans in 1407, and was at strife with the dauphin (Charles VII.).

John, G. Johann, surnamed "The Constant." Born June 30, 1468; died Aug. 16, 1532. Elector of Saxony, co-regent with his brother Frederick the Wise until the death of the latter (May 5, 1525). He was the Protestant leader at Spire 1529, and in the Smalkaldic League 1531.

John, Don. 1. In Shakspeare's comedy "Much Ado about Nothing," the bastard brother of Don Pedro of Aragon.—2. In Beaumont and Fletcher's comedy "The Chances," a hare-brained but honorable Spanish gentleman.

John, Eugenie; pseudonym E. Marlitt. Born at Arnstadt, Thuringia, Germany, Dec. 5, 1825. A German novelist. Among her novels is "Goldelse" (1866). See Marlitt.

John of Austria, generally called Don Juan or John of Austria. Born at Ratibon, Bavaria, Feb. 24, 1547; died near Namur, Belgium, Oct. 1, 1578. A celebrated Spanish general, illegitimate son of the emperor Charles V. by Barbara Blomberg. He defeated the Moriscos in Granada 1569-

1570; gained a naval victory over the Turks at Lepanto Oct. 7, 1571; captured Tunis 1573; and was governor of the Netherlands from 1574 until his death. He granted the "perpetual edict" in 1577, and in 1578 declared war against the insurgent provinces under William of Orange.

John of Beverley, Saint. Died at Beverley, Yorkshire, 721. An English prelate, bishop of Hexham 687, and bishop of York 705.

John of Beverley. Born at Beverley, Yorkshire; executed at St. Giles's Fields, Jan. 19, 1414. An English Carmelite theologian, identified with John of Beverley, the Lollard.

John of Bologna. [F. Jean de Boulogne, It. Giovanni da Bologna.] Born at Douai about 1530; died at Florence, 1608. A celebrated Italian sculptor. He was surnamed by the Italians "Il Fiammingo," from his birth in the Low Countries. He went to Rome when quite young, and submitted work to Michelangelo. After two years he settled in Florence. The great fountain of Neptune in Bologna was begun in 1563 and finished in 1566. From this he derived his name. The date of the "Mercury," now in Florence, his most popular statue, is not known. He also made the "Rape of the Sabinas" in the Loggia dei Lanzi, the equestrian statue of Cosmo I. in the Piazza della Signoria, the fountain in the Boboli Gardens (all at Florence); the giant statue of the Apennines at Pratolino; a charming statuette of Venus on a fountain at Petraja; and the bronze doors of the cathedral of Pisa.

John of Damascus (John Damascene or Joannes Damascenus), surnamed Chrysorroas. Born at Damascus at the end of the 7th century; died about 760 (?). A theologian and father of the Eastern Church. He is the reputed author of the romance "Barlaam and Josaphat." His works were edited by Le Quien (1712).

John of Gamundia. See the extract.

John of Gamundia was a mathematician and professor of astronomy. At his death, in the year 1442, he was chancellor of the University of Vienna. The calendars made by him were highly esteemed, and were engraved and printed for many years after his death. In his researches after old prints, the late R. Z. Becker, of Gotha, discovered one of the original blocks of a planar or poster edition of the Calendar of John of Gamundia. He describes it as about 10½ inches wide, 15½ inches long, and 1½ inches thick. The block was engraved on both sides.

John of Gaunt (corrupted from Ghent), Duke of Lancaster. Born at Ghent, March, 1340; died at London, Feb. 3, 1399. The fourth son of Edward III. In 1342 he was created earl of Richmond, and in 1359 married his cousin Blanche, second daughter of Henry, duke of Lancaster. On the death of Henry (May, 1361) and his eldest daughter Maud, duchess of Bavaria, he succeeded by right of his wife to the rank and possessions of the Dukes of Lancaster. In 1367 he accompanied the Black Prince on the Spanish expedition. Blanche died in 1369, and in 1371 he married Constance, eldest daughter of Pedro the Cruel, the deposed king of Castile. Returning to England in 1372, he styled himself King of Castile by right of his wife. Lancaster was constantly engaged in the struggle with France, but although a brave knight he was never a competent general, and his repeated failures contributed much to his increasing unpopularity. The Black Prince died June 8, 1376, and the Good Parliament, which under his patronage had undertaken to reform abuses, was dissolved. On July 6 the supreme power passed into the hands of Lancaster. His most powerful opponent, William of Wykeham, was disgraced. In the struggle with the clerical party Lancaster was drawn into an alliance with the Reformers, especially Wyclif whom he defended before the convocation at St. Paul's, Feb. 19, 1377. His brutal behavior excited a riot in London; his palace, the Savoy, was attacked, and he was forced to take refuge with Prince Richard and his mother, the widow of the Black Prince, at Kennington. Edward III. died June 21, 1377, and Richard II. became king, and Lancaster's political power declined. He was engaged in futile expeditions to France and Scotland. While absent in the north his extreme unpopularity was shown by the destruction of his palace of the Savoy in Wat Tyler's insurrection, June 13, 1381. Richard II. created him duke of Aquitaine March 2, 1390, and he assisted in negotiating the French treaty May 24, 1394.

John of Gischala. One of the heroes and leaders in the Judean war with Rome. He first gathered an army of volunteers, and fortified himself in his native place, Gischala, a small city in Galilee. Driven out by Titus, he fled to Jerusalem, and became one of the leading and ruling spirits, distinguishing himself by undaunted courage, heroism, and military ability. He had at last to grace the triumphal procession of Titus, and perished in a dungeon at Rome.

John o' Groat's (jon o' gròts) House. A locality in the county of Caithness, Scotland, in lat. 58° 38' N., long. 3° 4' W., near the northeastern extremity of the island of Great Britain.

John of Hexham. Flourished 1180. An English historian, prior of Hexham before 1178. He continued the chronicle of Symeon of Durham over a period extending from 1190-54. It deals mainly with the church in the north of England.

John of Lancaster, Duke of Bedford. Born June 20, 1389; died at Rouen, Sept. 14, 1435. Regent of England and France. He was the third son of Henry IV. of England by Mary, daughter of Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford. He was knighted at his father's coronation as one of the original knights companions of the Bath, and in 1405 was made constable of England and warden of the East Marches. In May, 1414, he was created duke of Bedford and earl of Kendall, and later earl of Richmond. He commanded the troops in the north until the death of Henry IV. (March, 1413). On Aug. 15, 1416, the fleet under his command won the great victory over the French in the Channel, and succeeded in relieving the besieged town of Harfleur; and in 1417 his expedition into Scotland was successful. At the death of Henry V. (Aug., 1422) he assumed the regency. To secure the alliance of Philip, duke of Burgundy, Bedford married his daughter Anne in 1423. His administration of France continued both successful and beneficial until the siege of Orléans (1428-29), which marks the appearance of Joan of Arc and the decline of English supremacy. Charles VII. was crowned king of France at Rheims July 17, 1429, and Joan of Arc unsuccessfully assaulted Paris Sept. 8, 1429. She was betrayed to the English, and executed May 30, 1431. Anne, duchess of Bedford, died Nov. 13, 1432, and Bedford sacrificed the alliance of Philip, duke of Burgundy, by marrying Jacqueline, daughter of Pierre, count of St. Pol, April 20, 1433. Philip entered into an alliance with the French king, thus thwarting Bedford's hopes, and terminating the French dominion of the English king.

John of Leyden (properly Johann Bockelson or Bockold). Born at Leyden about 1510; put to death at Münster, Westphalia, Jan. 23, 1536. An Anabaptist fanatic. He succeeded Matthesen as leader of the Anabaptists in Münster 1534, revolutionized the city, and established a theocracy or Kingdom of Zion, of which he was crowned king. He was imprisoned by the bishop of Münster in 1535. He is the subject of Meyerbeer's opera "Der Prophet."

John of London, or John Bever. Died 1311. An English chronicler, monk of Westminster Abbey. He was the author of "Compendatio lamentabilis in transitu Magni Regis Edwardi Quarti." He is supposed to have been the author of "Flores Historiarum" (from 1265 to 1306).

John of Luxemburg. See John, King of Bohemia.

John of Nepomuk. See Nepomuk.

John of Peterborough. Flourished 1380. The alleged author of the "Chronicon Petroburgense," probably an imaginary person.

John of Salisbury, surnamed Parvus ('the Little'). Born at Salisbury, Wiltshire, England, about 1115; died at Chartres, France, Oct. 25, 1180. A noted English ecclesiastic, scholar, and author, bishop of Chartres. In 1136 he went to Paris to attend the lectures of Abelard. He also studied with Alberic of Rheims, Robert of Melun, and William of Conches. At Chartres he laid the foundation of his classical scholarship. In 1141 he returned to Paris to study theology under Master Gilbert de la Porrée, Robert Pullus, and Simon de Poissy. In 1148 he attended the council held by Eugenius III. at Rheims, and followed the Pope to Rome. From 1150-64 he lived at the court of Canterbury with Archbishop Theobald. He was repeatedly intrusted with delicate affairs of state, and frequently visited the papal court in Italy. His close alliance with the bishops brought him into disfavor with Henry II., which obliged him to abandon England in 1164 and find shelter at Rheims. He later returned to Canterbury, and was present at the murder of Archbishop Thomas Becket. His works consist of his letters, "Politicarum," "Metalogicus," "Ethnicus," "Vita Sancti Anselmi," "Vita Sancti Thomae Cantuarum," "Historia Pontificalis." His collected works have been edited by Giles (1848).

John of Swabia. See Johannes Parricida.

John (G. Johann) Baptist Joseph Fabian Sebastian, Archduke of Austria. Born at Florence, Jan. 20, 1782; died at Gratz, Styria, May 10, 1859. An Austrian general, younger son of the emperor Leopold II. He was made commander-in-chief of the Austrian army in Bavaria in Sept., 1850, and was defeated by the French under Moreau at Hohenlinden, Dec. 3, 1800. In 1809 he obtained command of the Austrian army in Italy, and gained a victory over the viceroy Eugenio at Sacile April 16, but was defeated at Raab June 14, 1809. He commanded on the Rhine in 1815, and was chosen administrator of the empire by the German National Assembly in 1818 (resigned 1849).

John Frederick (jon fred'ér-ik), G. Johann Friedrich, surnamed "The Magnanimous." Born at Torgan, Prussia, June 30, 1503; died at Jena, March 3, 1554. Elector of Saxony, son of John the Constant whom he succeeded in 1532. He was one of the leaders of the Smalkaldic League. At Mühlberg, April 24, 1547, he was defeated by the emperor Charles V., captured, and forced to renounce the electorate. See Mühlberg.

John George I., G. Johann Georg. Born March 5, 1585; died at Dresden, Oct. 8, 1656. Elector of Saxony, in the Albertine line, second son of the elector Christian I. and Sophia, princess of Brandenburg. He succeeded his brother Christian II. in 1611.

John George II., G. Johann Georg. Born May 31, 1613; died at Dresden, Aug. 22, 1680. Elector of Saxony, eldest son of John George I. whom he succeeded in 1656.

John George III., G. Johann Georg. Born June 20, 1647; died at Tübingen, Sept. 12, 1691. Elector of Saxony, son of John George II. whom he succeeded in 1680. He took part in wars against France, aided the emperor against the Turks, and supported the Venetians in the Morea.

John George IV., G. Johann Georg. Born Oct. 18, 1668; died April 27, 1694. Elector of Saxony, son of John George III. whom he succeeded in 1691.

John, St. (the Baptist), in the Desert. 1. A painting by Titian, in the Accademia, Venice.—2. A painting by Raphael, in the Uffizi, Florence. St. John is represented as a youth of 15, with a panther-skin about his loins, pointing to a cross beside him. This picture is very familiar in engravings, etc.

John the Baptist, Life of. A series of 7 frescoes by Ghirlandajo (1490), in the choir of Santa Maria Novella, Florence. They begin with the "Angel and Zacharias," and end with the "Dancing of Herodias," and are of high interest not only for their inherent merit, but also for their portraits of contemporary Florentines.

Johns Hopkins University. An institution of learning at Baltimore, Maryland, founded by Johns Hopkins, a capitalist of that city, who died in 1873, leaving a bequest of $7,000,000 to be divided between the University and the Johns Hopkins Hospital, also at Baltimore. The university was incorporated Aug. 24, 1867, and was opened for instruction in Sept., 1876. It consists of a philosophical faculty, affording instruction in letters and science to graduate students. To this is attached a collegiate department for undergraduates. A medical school, opened by the Johns Hopkins Hospital in 1893, forms practically part of the university. The university, including the medical faculty and the collegiate department, has (1892-1893) 72 instructors and 551 students, of whom 347 are graduate students.

Johnson (jon'son), Andrew. Born at Raleigh, N.C., Dec. 29, 1808; died in Carter County, Tenn., July 31, 1875. The seventeenth President of the United States (1865-69). He was a member of Congress from Tennessee 1843-53; was governor of Tennessee 1853-57; was a United States senator 1857-62; was military governor of Tennessee 1862-64; was elected as Republican candidate for Vice-President in 1864, being inaugurated March 4, 1865; succeeded Lincoln as President April 15, 1865; and was elected United States senator from Tennessee in 1875. He was nominated to the vice-presidency by the Republicans in order to conciliate the war Democrats, and on his unexpected accession to the presidency it was found that his Democratic State-right convictions placed him hopelessly at variance with the Republican majority in Congress on the question of reconstruction. The quarrel with Congress came to a head on his attempting to remove Edwin M. Stanton from the secretaryship of war without the consent of the Senate, contrary to the tenure-of-office act passed over his veto March 2, 1867. He was impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors, but was acquitted (by a vote of 35 to 19, very little short of the two-thirds vote necessary to conviction) after a trial lasting from March 23 to May 26, 1868.

Johnson, Benjamin. Born 1665 (?); died Aug., 1742. An English actor. He joined the Drury Lane Company as a scene-painter in 1695, and in 1706 went to the Haymarket, where, Dec. 3, 1706, he played Corbaccio in Ben Jonson's "Volpone." He played first grave-digger, Polonius, and other Shaksperian parts, but was especially devoted to Ben Jonson.

Johnson, Charles. Born in 1679; died at London, March 11, 1748. An English dramatist. Among his plays are "Force of Friendship" (1710), "Love in a Chest" (1710), "The Wife's Relief, or the Husband's Cure" (1711), "Country Lasses, etc." (1715), "Celia, or The Perjured Lover" (1733), "The Cobbler of Preston," based on the "Taming of the Shrew" (1716), etc.

Johnson, Captain Charles. Flourished 1724-36. The name (probably a pseudonym) of the writer of "A General History of the Robberies and Murders of the most notorious Pyrates, and also their Policies, Discipline, and Government, from their first Rise and Settlement in 1717 to the present year, with the Adventures of two female Pyrates, Mary Read and Anne Bonny" (1724). Some of the lives are reproduced in Howard Pyle's "The Buccaneers and Marooners of America" (1891). Johnson, Eastman. Born at Lowell, Maine, July 29, 1824. An American genre- and portrait-painter. He studied at Dusseldorf, and later in Italy, Paris, Holland, and The Hague. He was elected national academician in 1860. Among his works are "The Old Kentucky Home" (1867), "The Old Stage Coach" (1871), "Husking Bee" (1876), "Cranberry Harvest" (1880).

Johnson, Edward. Born at Herne Hill, Kent, about 1599; died at Woburn, Mass., April 23, 1672. A historian of New England. He came to America as a joiner, probably with Governor Winthrop in 1630. From 1643 to 1671 he was chosen annually (except 1648) to the Massachusetts House of Representatives, of which he was speaker in 1655. He wrote a "History of New England from the English Planting in 1628 until 1652" (London, 1654).

Johnson, Esther. See Stella.

Johnson, Francis. Born 1796 (?); died at Hertford, Jan. 29, 1876. An English Orientalist. In 1824 he accepted the chair of Sanskrit, Bengali, and Telugu in the East India Company's college at Haileybury. His chief work is a "Persian Dictionary" (1st ed. 1829; 2d ed. 1852), "the most important contribution to Persian lexicography in any European language" (Dict. Nat. Biog.).

Johnson, Guy. Born in Ireland about 1740; died in the Haymarket, London, March 5, 1788. An American Tory and militia colonel. He served in the French war (1757), and under Jeffrey Amherst (1759-1760). He assisted his uncle, Sir William Johnson, in the Indian administration, and succeeded him as superintendent at his death in 1774.

Johnson, Herschel V. Born in Burke County, Ga., Sept. 18, 1812; died in Jefferson County, Ga., Aug. 16, 1880. An American lawyer and politician. He was United States senator from Georgia 1848-49; governor of Georgia 1853-57; Democratic candidate for the vice-presidency in 1860; and Confederate senator.

Johnson, Isaac. Born at Clipsham, Rutlandshire, England; died at Boston, Mass., Sept. 30, 1630. One of the founders of Massachusetts. He came to Salem with Winthrop in 1630, assisted in founding the first church in Charlestown July 30 of the same year, and on Sept. 7 superintended the settlement of Shawmut or Boston.

Johnson, James. Died at Edinburgh, Feb. 26, 1811. A Scottish engraver, publisher, and music-dealer. He published at Edinburgh "The Scots Musical Museum" (1787-1803), to which Burns contributed a number of pieces.

Johnson, Sir John. Born 1742; died at Montreal, Canada, Jan. 4, 1830. A British general in the Revolutionary War, son of Sir William Johnson.

Johnson, Manuel John. Born at Macao, China, May 23, 1805; died in England, Feb. 28, 1859. An English astronomer. In 1829 he began observing at St. Helena, and in 1833 published a catalogue of 606 principal stars in the southern hemisphere, winning the Astronomical Society's gold medal. On July 27, 1832, he observed the solar eclipse at St. Helena. In 1835 he matriculated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford, and graduated in 1839. In 1839 he succeeded Rigaud at Radcliffe Observatory, and published 18 volumes of "Radcliffe Observations."

Johnson, Reverdy. Born at Annapolis, Md., May 21, 1796; died there, Feb. 10, 1876. A noted American lawyer and politician. He was United States senator (Whig) from Maryland 1845-49; attorney-general 1849-50; United States senator 1863-68; and United States minister to Great Britain 1868-69. He negotiated a treaty with England for the settlement of the Alabama claims, which was rejected by the Senate.

Johnson, Richard. Born at London, 1573; died 1659 (?). An English poet and prose-writer. His best-known work is the "Famous Historie of the Seven Champions of Christendom": St. George of England, St. Denis of France, St. James of Spain, St. Anthony of Italy, St. Andrew of Scotland, St. Patrick of Ireland, and St. David of Wales. In 1603 he published "Anglorum Lachryme: in a sad passion complaining of the death of our late sovereigne lady Queene Elizabeth, etc.," in 1612 "The Crown Garland of Golden Roses"; etc.

Johnson, Richard Mentor. Born near Louisville, Ky., Oct. 17, 1780; died at Frankfort, Ky., Nov. 19, 1850. An American politician. He was member of Congress from Kentucky 1807-19, United States senator 1819-29, and member of Congress 1829-37. He was elected (Democratic) Vice-President in 1837, and served 1837-41, and was an unsuccessful candidate for the vice-presidency in 1840.

Johnson, Samuel. Born at Guilford, Conn., Oct. 14, 1696; died at Stratford, Conn., 1772. An American clergyman and educator, first president of King's College (Columbia College), New York, 1754-63.

Johnson, Samuel. Born at Lichfield, England, Sept. 18, 1709; died at London, Dec. 13, 1784. A celebrated English lexicographer, essayist, and poet. He was the son of Michael Johnson, book-seller at Lichfield, a High-churchman and Jacobite. He lost the use of one eye from scrofula, and was "touched" by Queen Anne. His meagre appearance and manner were against him through life. In 1728 he entered Pembroke College, Oxford, and resided there continuously until Dec. 12, 1729, and afterward at intervals until Oct. 8, 1731.

A Latin translation of Pope's "Messiah" (much admired by Pope) was written at this time. He began to suffer from violent attacks of the hypochondria which followed him through life. In 1732 he became usher at Market Bosworth school, but soon abandoned the place and returned to Lichfield and Birmingham, in which latter town he married a Mrs. Porter, July 9, 1735. He established a school at Edial, near Lichfield, in 1736, which soon failed. Among his pupils was David Garrick, with whom he started for London, March 3, 1737. In March, 1738, a Latin ode to Sylvanus Urban appeared in Cave's "Gentleman's Magazine," to which he became a regular contributor. In May, 1738, "London," an imitation of Juvenal, was published by Dodsley. The "Life of Savage" appeared in Feb., 1744. The plan of his dictionary, inscribed to Lord Chesterfield, was issued in 1747. The booksellers agreed to pay £1 5/6 for the copyright, including the entire work of preparation for the press. He employed 6 amanuenses, 5 of whom were Scotchmen. The book was based on an interleaved copy of Nathan Bailey's dictionary, and appeared in 2 volumes, folio, April 15, 1755. In Jan., 1749, he published the "Vanity of Human Wishes," the finest of his poems. His tragedy "Irene" (begun at Edial) was produced Feb. 6, 1749, with indifferent success by Garrick at Drury Lane. The "Rambler" appeared every Tuesday and Saturday from March 20, 1750, until March 14, 1752, and, with the exception of Nos. 10, 30, 44, 97, and 100, was entirely his work (No. 97 was written by Richardson). His wife died March 17, 1752. On Feb. 20, 1755, he received the degree of M. A. from Oxford. His work "Rasselas" was written in the evenings of one week in 1759. Among his political tracts is "Taxation no Tyranny" (1775), in answer to the address of the American Congress. After the accession of George III., Johnson received a pension of £300. During his last years he devoted himself almost exclusively to society and conversation, and his sayings and doings were carefully reported by Boswell and Mrs. Piozzi (Thrale). In 1773 he took his well-known journey with Boswell, an account of which was published in 1775 as "A Journey to the Western Isles of Scotland." He also wrote nearly all the numbers of "The Idler" (1758-60), and published an edition of Shakspeare in 8 volumes, with notes, in 1765.

Johnson, Sir William. Born at Warrentown, County Down, Ireland, 1715; died near Johnsonstown, N. Y., July 4, 1774. A British commander and magistrate in America, superintendent of Indian affairs in the colonies. In 1744 he was appointed colonel of the Six Nations by Governor George Clinton, and in April, 1755, by General Braddock, superintendent of the affairs of the Six Nations with the local rank of major-general. He commanded the provincial forces in the attack against Crown Point. In 1760 he commanded the Indian troops in the advance of Amherst on Montreal. He received a grant of land in the Mohawk valley called "King's land," where he built (1743) Fort Johnson, the village of Johnson (now Johnstown), and Johnson Hall (1764). He introduced sheep and blooded horses into the Mohawk valley. He published, in the "Transactions of the Philosophical Society," a paper on the "Languages, Custom, and Manners of the Indian Six Nations" (1772).

Johnson, William Samuel. Born at Stratford, Conn., Oct. 7, 1727; died at Stratford, Nov. 14, 1819. An American politician and scholar, son of Samuel Johnson (1696-1772), president of Columbia College (1787-1800).

Johnston (jon'ston), Albert Sidney. Born at Washington, Mason County, Ky., Feb. 3, 1803; killed at the battle of Shiloh, April 6, 1862. An American general in the Confederate service. He graduated at West Point in 1826; was chief of staff to General Henry Atkinson during the Black Hawk war in 1832; resigned from the army in 1834; enlisted as a private in the Texan army in 1836; succeeded Felix Huston as commander of the Texan army in 1837; was secretary of war for the republic of Texas 1838-40; served as colonel in the United States army during the Mexican war; commanded a successful expedition against the revolted Mormons in Utah in 1857; and was appointed commander of the Department of Kentucky and Tennessee in the Confederate service at the outbreak of the Civil War in 1861. He occupied Bowling Green, Kentucky, in the autumn of 1861, but was forced to retreat to Corinth, Mississippi, by the fall of Fort Donelson, Feb. 16, 1862. Having been reinforced by Generals Beauregard and Bragg, he attacked General Grant's army at Shiloh, April 6, 1862, and was killed about 2 P. M. by a ball which severed an artery of his leg. See Shiloh, Battle of.

Johnston, Alexander. Born at Edinburgh, 1815; died at Hampstead, Feb. 2, 1891. A Scottish portrait- and figure-painter. He is known from various portraits, "The Interview of the Regent Murray with Mary Queen of Scots" (1841), "The Covenanters' Marriage" (1842), etc.

He was president of the Central Railroad of New Jersey from its beginning till 1877, when he sacrificed his fortune in an effort to sustain its credit. He assisted in organizing the Metropolitan Museum of Art, and was its first president, but in 1889 his health forced him to resign this office. He was connected with many other educational and benevolent institutions.

Johnston, Joseph Eccleston. Born near Farmville, Va., Feb. 3, 1807; died at Washington, D. C., March 21, 1891. An American general in the Confederate service. He graduated at West Point in 1829; was promoted captain in 1846; served in the Mexican war 1846-47; was commissioned quarter-master-general of the United States army in 1860; and on the outbreak of the Civil War accepted a commission as brigadier-general in the Confederate service. In May, 1861, he took command at Harper's Ferry, where he was opposed by General Patterson. When General Beauregard was attacked by General McDowell, July 18, 1861, Johnston eluded Patterson, and on the 20th of 21st formed a junction with Beauregard, whom, although inferior in rank, he left in tactical command. He was promoted general Aug. 31, 1861. He afterward (1862) opposed McClellan in the Peninsula campaign, and was defeated at Williamsburg May 5, and at Fair Oaks May 31, 1862. He was defeated by Grant at Jackson May 14, 1863, while attempting to relieve Pemberton at Vicksburg. In the same year he was appointed to the command of the Army of the Tennessee, with headquarters at Dalton, Georgia, where he was required to oppose the advance of Sherman toward Atlanta. He was compelled to retreat across the Chattahoochee early in July, 1864, after having fought unsuccessful engagements at Resaca, May 15, and at Dallas, May 28, and was in consequence superseded in his command by General John B. Hood, July 17, 1864. Feb. 23, 1865, he was restored to the command of the Army of the Tennessee, with orders to oppose General Sherman, to whom he surrendered at Durham Station, N. He was the son of John Paul, a Scotch gardener. In 1773 he went to Virginia, and in 1775, under the assumed name of Jones, was appointed first lieutenant of the Alfred, a 30-gun frigate in the American navy. In 1777 he commanded the Ranger, a new 20-gun frigate; cruised in the Irish Sea and on the coast of Scotland; and on April 24, 1778, captured the Drake, a British sloop of war. Returning to Brest, he was superseded. When, in July, 1778, war began between France and England, an old East Indian, the Duc de Duras, was converted into a ship of war called the Bonhomme Richard (which see). She sailed, under the command of Jones, with the Alliance, Pallas, Cerf and Ven-geance, Aug. 14, 1779. They sailed around Ireland and Scot-land, and on Sept. 23 fell in with the Serapis (44 guns) and Countess of Scarborough (20 guns). The battle between the Serapis and the Bonhomme Richard, one of the greatest naval engagements in history, resulted in the surrender of the Serapis to the Richard, and the subsequent sinking of the latter. Jones abandoned the American service, and entered the French and later the Russian navy. After serving under Potemkin in the Black Sea, with the rank of rear-admiral, he returned to Paris in 1790.

In 1711 he edited some tracts by Newton.

Jones, William. Born at Lowick, Northamptonshire, July 30, 1726; died at Nayland, Suffolk, Jan. 6, 1800. An English clergyman and theological and miscellaneous writer. Among his works are "Catholic Doctrine of the Trinity" (1756) and "Figurative Language of the Holy Scripture" (1786).

Jones, Sir William. Born at Westminster, Sept. 28, 1746; died at Calcutta, April 27, 1794. A noted English Orientalist and linguist, youngest son of William Jones the mathematician. He entered University College, Oxford, in 1764, and became a fellow of that college in 1766. In 1770 he published a translation into French of the Persian life of Nadir Shah, brought to England by Christian VII. of Denmark. It was followed (1770) by the "Traité sur la poésie orientale." In 1771 he issued his grammar of the Persian language, followed by "Poems, consisting chiefly of translations from the Asiatic languages, etc." (1772), "Poeseos Asiaticae Commentariorum Libri Sex" (1774). He was called to the bar at the Middle Temple in 1774. In 1778 he published a translation of the "Speeches of Isaus in Causes concerning the Law of Succession to Property at Athens." His essay on the "Law of Bailments" appeared in 1781, and in the same year was issued the translation of the "Moallakat." He was knighted March 19, 1783, and made judge of the high court at Calcutta. In 1784 he founded the Bengal Asiatic Society. He was the first English scholar to master Sanskrit, and to recognize its importance for comparative philology. In 1794 he began a complete digest of Hindu law with the "Institutes of Hindu Law," followed by "Mohammedan Law of Succession" and "Mohammedan Law of Inheritance."

Jonesborough (jõnz'bur'õ). The capital of Clayton County, Georgia, 18 miles south of Atlanta. Here Aug. 31, 1864, the Federals under Howard repulsed the Confederates under Hardee, with a Federal loss of 1,149, and Confederate loss of about 2,000. Population (1890), 803.

Jönköping (jõn'chè-ping). 1. A laen in southern Sweden. Area, 4,447 square miles. Population (1893), 193,268.—2. The capital of the laen of Jönköping, situated at the southern end of Lake Wetter in lat. 57° 48' N., long. 14° 13' E. It is noted for its manufactures, especially of matches. A peace between Sweden and Denmark was concluded here in 1809. Population (1890), 19,682.

Jonsbok (jõns'bõk). [ON. Jónsbók.] The law code of Iceland under Norwegian sovereignty and later, brought from Norway to Iceland, in 1280, by Jon Einarsson, a lawyer, from whom it received its name. Like the Jarnsida, which it superseded, it was a compilation by King Magnus.

Jonson (jõn'sõn), Benjamin, usually known as Ben Jonson. Born at Westminster, 1573 (?); died Aug. 6, 1637. A celebrated English dramatist. His parentage is not certainly known. His mother married, while he was still a child, a master bricklayer said to have been named Fowler. He was sent to a school at St. Martin's-in-the-Fields, but was soon removed to Westminster school, where William Camden befriended him. After a somewhat obscure period he began to work for the stage: in 1597 he appeared in Henslowe's "Diary" as a player and a playwright to "The Admiral's Men." During a break with the Admiral's company his first extant comedy, "Every Man in his Humour," was offered to the rival company, the "Lord Chamberlain's Servants." It was accepted, and was performed at the Globe in 1598, Shakspeare playing in it. Jonson ranked from this time with the foremost dramatists of the period. He became involved in quarrels with Dekker and Marston, and in the plays of the two latter are characters attacking or ridiculing him, while he in turn satirized them in several of his plays. In 1603 he began to write "Entertainments," and in 1605 the first of his series of "Court Masques." He was in favor with the court, and his life now entered its most successful phase. The plays performed during 1605-16 ("Epicene," "The Alchemist," "Cataline," "Bartholomew Fair," and "The Devil is an Ass") are among his best. In 1613 he went to France as tutor to a son of Sir Walter Raleigh, and in 1618 he made his well-known pedestrian journey to Scotland. About this time he spent some weeks at the house of William Drummond of Hawthornden, whose notes of his talk are the principal source of his biography. On his return he wrote a narrative in verse of his adventures ("Underwoods, No. 62"). Between 1621 and 1623 the king raised Jonson's pension to £200, and the greatest calamity of his private life occurred—the burning of his library, which was one of the finest in England. In 1626 he was attacked with palsy, followed by dropsy, and was confined to his bed during his last years. He was appointed chronologer to the city of London in 1628, which increased his income; but his powers were failing and his next play, "The New Inn," was not heard to the end, and in 1631 his salary as chronologer was withdrawn. He brought out more plays and masks, and in 1634 his salary was restored. He lived three years longer, during which time he wrote little. "The Sad Shepherd," unfinished, was found among his papers. He was buried in Westminster Abbey, in the Poets' Corner. The political crisis at this time prevented the erection of an elaborate tomb which was intended, and a casual visitor, Sir John Young, caused "O rare Ben Jonson" to be cut on his tomb. Among his friends were all the people of culture of the time, notably Chapman and Fletcher. With Shakspeare he was less intimate; but the theory of his jealousy of the latter has been completely refuted by Gifford. Among his plays are "Every Man in his Humour" (acted 1598, printed 1601), "The Case is Altered" (1599, printed 1609), "Every Man out of his Humour" (1599, printed 1600), "Cynthia's Revels" (1600), "The Poetaster, etc." (1601, printed 1602), "Sejanus, his Fall," with another (1603, printed 1605), "Eastward Ho," with Chapman and Marston (1604, printed 1605), "Volpone, or the Fox" (1605, printed 1607), "Epicene, or the Silent Woman" (1609), "The Alchemist" (1610, printed 1612), "Cataline, his Conspiracy" (1611), "Bartholomew Fair" (1614, printed (folio) 1631), "The Devil is an Ass" (1616, folio 1631), "The Staple of News" (1625, folio 1631), "The New Inn, etc." (1629, printed 1631), "The Magnetick Lady" (licensed 1632, folio 1640), "A Tale of a Tub" (licensed 1633, folio 1640), "The Sad Shepherd, etc." (folio 1641), etc. Besides these, he wrote a number of "Masques," "Entertainments," and poems; among the latter are included "Epigrammes" (published 1616) and "The Forest," which contains his best songs, etc., up to 1616, most of which were subsequently published under the name of "Underwoods" (his own title) after his death (1640). The lines to the memory of Shakspeare prefixed to the Shakspeare folio (1623) were first included in Jonson's works by Gifford. He wrote several prose works, among which are "Timber, or Discoveries made upon Men and Matter," usually known as "Discoveries" (1641), and "The English Grammar made by Ben Jonson for the benefit of all strangers" (1640), etc. His works were first collected in a folio edition, of which the first volume, revised by himself, appeared in 1616, the second 1630-41. Whalley (1756) first edited him, and in 1816 Gifford brought out an edition, reprinted by Cunningham in 1875.

Jonzac (zhõn-zák'). A town in the department of Charente-Inférieure, France, 45 miles north of Bourdeaux. Population (1891), commune, 3,431.

Joodpoor. See Jodhpur.

Joonpoor. See Jainpur.

Joplin City (jõp'lin sit'i). A mining city in Jasper County, southwestern Missouri, situated in lat. 37° 3' N., long. 94° 35' W. Population (1890), 9,943.

Joppa. See Jaffa.

Joram (jõ'rãm), or Jehoram (je-hõ'rãm). King of Israel 851-843 B. C. (Duneker), son of Ahab. Joram, or Jehoram. King of Judah 848-844 B. C., son of Jehoshaphat.

Jorat (zhõ-rã' or zhõ-rãt'), G. Jurten (yõr'ten). A chain of heights in the canton of Vaud, Switzerland, northeast of Lansanne. It forms part of the watershed between the valleys of the Rhine and Rhone.

Jörd (yörd). [ON. Jörðh.] In Old Norse mythology, the goddess Earth, the wife of Odin and the mother of Thor.

Jordaens (yõr'dãns), Jakob. Born at Antwerp about 1593; died there, 1678. A Flemish painter of historical and genre scenes and portraits.

Jordan. See Jordanes.

Jordan (jõr'dãn). [Heb. Yarden, the descender; Gr. Ἰορδάνης, L. Jordanes, mod. Ar. Esh-Sheriah.] The chief river of Palestine. It rises in Anti-Libanus, traverses Lake Merom (Hulch) and the Sea of Galilee, and flows into the Dead Sea 19 miles east of Jerusalem. Its length is about 120 miles.

Jordan. A river in Utah which flows from Utah Lake into Great Salt Lake. Length, about 40 miles.

Jordan, David Starr. Born at Gainesville, N. Y., Jan. 19, 1851. An American naturalist and educator. He studied at Cornell University, receiving the degree of M. S. in 1872, and of LL. D. (honorary) in 1886. In 1875 he graduated in medicine at the Indiana Medical College. He was assistant on the United States Fish Commission 1877-91; professor of zoology at the Indiana University 1879-85, and its president 1885-91; and in the latter year was appointed president of the Leland Stanford Junior University. He has published "Manual of the Vertebrates of the Northern United States" (1876 and later editions), "Contributions to North American Ichthyology" (1877-1883), "Science Sketches" (1888), etc.

Jordan, Mrs. (assumed name of Dorothy Bland). Born near Waterford, Ireland, about 1762; died at St.-Cloud, France, 1816. An Irish actress, known as Dolly Jordan. She became the mistress of the Duke of Clarence (William IV.) in 1790.

As an actress in comedy Mrs. Jordan can have had few equals. Genest says that she had never a superior in her line, and adds that her "Hypolita" will never be excelled. Rosalind, Viola, and Lady Costello were among her best characters. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Jordan, Thomas. Born at London about 1612; died about 1685. An English actor, dramatist, and poet. He supported himself by promiscuous literary work, largely plagiarized, until 1671, when he was made part of the corporation of London in the capacity of poet to that body. Jordan conducted the lord mayor's shows for fourteen years with great success. Among his works are "Poetical Varieties or Variety of Fancies" (1637), "A Pill to Purge Melancholy" (1637), "The Tricks of Youth" (1663), "A New Droll, or the Counter Scuffle" (1663), "Money is an Ass" (1663), "Rosary of Rarities" (1659), etc.

Jordan (yõr'dãn), Wilhelm. Born at Insterburg, Prussia, Feb. 8, 1819. A German poet. He has written "Die Nibelungen" (1st part, "Sigfridsage," 1868; 2d part, "Hildebrands Heimkehr," 1874), dramas, "Demurgos," a poem (1852-54), translations, etc.

Jordanes (jõr-dã'nẽz), or Jordanis (jõr-dã'nis), or (erroneously) Jornandes (jõr-nãn'dẽz). A Gothic (Alan) historian and ecclesiastic of the 6th century: by a probably erroneous tradition, bishop of Ravenna. He wrote (in 551) "De Origine Getarum," often called the "Getica," a history of the Goths compiled from Cassiodorus and others, and "De summa temporum vel origine actibusque gentis Romanorum," a universal chronicle. The supposition that he may have been bishop of Croton in Italy is rejected.

Jörg (yõrç), Johann Christian Gottfried. Born at Predel, near Zeitz, Prussia, Dec. 24, 1779; died at Leipzig, Sept. 20, 1856. A German physician and medical writer, noted especially for his works on obstetrics.

Jörg, Joseph Edmund. Born at Immenstadt, Bavaria, Dec. 23, 1819. A Bavarian ultramontane politician and historian. His chief work is "Geschichte des grossen Bauernkriegs" (1850).

Jorgenson (yõr'gẽn'sõn), Jorgen. Born at Copenhagen, 1779; died in New South Wales about 1830. A Danish adventurer, governor of Iceland 1809.

Jornandes. See Jordanes.

Jortin (jõr'tin), John. Born at London, Oct. 23, 1698; died there, Sept. 5, 1770. An English church historian and critic. His father, Renatus Jortin, was a Huguenot exile. He was educated at Charterhouse and at Jesus College, Cambridge, where he graduated in 1719. In 1749 he was Boyle lecturer, and became archdeacon of London in 1764. His chief works are "Lusus poetici" (1722), "Life of Erasmus" (1758), and "Sermons and Charges" (1771-72).

Jorullo (jõ-rõl'yõ). A volcano in the state of Michoacan, Mexico, 160 miles west by south of Mexico. It was formed in 1759. Height, 4,041 feet.

Jörundfjord (yõ'rõn-fyõrd). One of the most noted fiords in Norway, on the western coast, southeast of Aalesund.

Josaphat. See Barlaam and Josaphat.

Joscelyn. See Jocelin.

Joscelyn, or Josselin (jõs'e-lin), John. Born 1529; died at High Roding, Essex, Dec. 28, 1603.

One of the earliest students of Anglo-Saxon. He graduated at Queen's College, Cambridge. He was Latin secretary to Parker, archbishop of Canterbury (1558), and at his suggestion made collections of Anglo-Saxon documents which he annotated.

Joseffy (jō-sēf'i), Rafael. Born at Presburg, Hungary, in 1852. A noted Hungarian pianist and composer; a pupil of Tausig. He has published a number of pieces for the pianoforte.

Joseph (jō'zēf). [Heb., of doubtful meaning; perhaps from a verb 'to add'; Gr. Ἰωσήφ, I. Josephus, F. Joseph, It. Giuseppe, Sp. José, José, Pg. José, Jozé, G. Joseph.] The son of Jacob and Rachel. He played an important part in traditional Hebrew history. He was sold by his brethren as a slave into Egypt, where he became prime minister and the progenitor of two Israelitic tribes, Ephraim and Manasseh. According to tradition his sale took place in the reign of the Hyksos or shepherd king Aphiobis. See Aphiobis.

Joseph. The husband of Mary the mother of Jesus.

Joseph I. Born at Vienna, July 26, 1678; died April 17, 1711. German emperor, son of Leopold I. He was crowned king of Hungary in 1689, and of the Romans in 1690, and succeeded to the empire in 1705. He continued the War of the Spanish Succession.

Joseph II. Born at Vienna, March 13, 1741; died at Vienna, Feb. 20, 1790. German emperor, son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa. He was crowned king of the Romans in 1764; succeeded to the empire in 1765; became co-regent with Maria Theresa in the Hapsburg dominions in 1765; took part in the War of the Bavarian Succession 1778-79; and became sole ruler in 1780. He proclaimed the "Edict of Tolerance" in 1781; abolished serfdom; and joined with Russia against Turkey in 1788.

Joseph, King of Naples, later of Spain. See Bonaparte.

Joseph, Father (François Leclerc du Tremblay). Born at Paris, Nov. 4, 1577; died at Rueil, Dec. 18, 1638. A French Capuchin monk, confidential agent of Richelieu.

Joseph of Arimathea. A rich Israelite who apparently was a member of the Sanhedrin at the time of the crucifixion. He was afraid to confess his belief in Jesus Christ. After the crucifixion, however, he went and begged the body of Jesus, and buried it in his own tomb. There is a legend that he was imprisoned for 42 years, which seemed but 3 to him on account of the Holy Grail which he kept with him in prison; and that he carried the Grail, after his release by Vespasian, to Britain, where he built the abbey of Glastonbury. There is an alliterative English romance "Joseph of Arimathea," written about 1350 (edited by Professor Skeat in 1871). Robert de Borron composed two versions of a "Legend of Joseph of Arimathea, or The Little St. Grail," in verse and in prose, which fell into the hands of Walter Map, who wrote the "Great Saint Grail" from them.

Joseph of Exeter, L. Josephus Iscanus. Flourished about 1200. A native of Exeter, one of the best medieval Latin poets in England. He resided much in France, and in 1188 went with Archbishop Baldwin on a crusade to the Holy Land, returning to England in 1190. His chief works are "De Bello Trojano" in 6 books, "Antiocheis," a poem on the third Crusade, "Panegyricus ad Henricum."

Joseph Andrews (jō'zēf an'drōz). The title of a novel by Fielding, published in 1742, and the name of its hero. He is represented as a young footman of great beauty who maintains his uprightness and chastity through a long series of trials. The most prominent and famous character in the book is that of the curate Parson Adams. (See Adams.) The book (said to have been suggested by the "Paysan Parvenu" of Marivaux) was at first intended to be merely a satire on Richardson's "Pamela," but it grew as its author worked upon it.

Joseph Bechor Shor (jō'zēf be-ehōr' shōr'). A Jewish scholar and biblical commentator of the 12th century, in the north of France.

Josephine (jō'zē-fēn) (Marie Joséphe Rose Tascher de la Pagerie). Born at Trois-Ilets, Martinique, June 23, 1763; died at Malmaison, near Paris, May 29, 1814. First wife of Napoleon I., and empress of the French. She removed to France in 1778; married, Dec. 13, 1779, the Vicomte de Beauharnais (who died 1794); and became the wife of Napoleon March 9, 1796. She was crowned empress in 1804, and was divorced in 1809.

Josephstadt (yō'zēf-stüt). A fortified town in Bohemia, situated on the Elbe 66 miles east by north of Prague. Population (1890), 6,097.

Josephus (jō-sē'fus), Flavius (Jewish name Joseph ben Matthias). Born 37 A. D.; died about 95. A celebrated Jewish historian. He was of illustrious priestly descent, and related to the Macabean house. A visit to Rome in his early years filled him with enthusiastic admiration for it and its institutions. At the outbreak of the Judeo-Roman war he was intrusted by the Sanhedrim with the governorship of Galilee, and as such took part in the war against Rome. But he weakened the province under his administration by sowing discord; and when the fortress Jotapata, after a most heroic resistance, was taken by Vespasian, he managed to save his own life after the remnant of the besieged had died by their own hands. Vespasian, glad to have him on his side as a guide and adviser, received him with courtesy and friendliness, and he remained with Vespasian and Titus, following them, after the fall of his people, to Rome, and living in the sunshine of their favor. He received large tracts of land in Judea and an annual pension, and adopted the name of Flavius after that of the imperial family. In Rome he wrote his work "The Jewish War," in 7 books, at first in the Syro-Chaldaic tongue and afterward in Greek. His "Antiquities of the Jews," a history of the Jewish people from the earliest times to 26 A. D., in 20 books, is a defense of the Jews against Apion, and is his own autobiography. In his writings he displays a great love for his nation and religion. His works are not only the most comprehensive and important source of information for the history of his times, but also are distinguished for their excellent historical style, which gained for him the title of a Hebrew Livy. He died under Domitian, and, according to some intimations, as a martyr to the faith of his race.

Joshua (jōsh'u-ū). [Heb. Yehoshua, whose help is Yahveh. See Jesus.] The successor of Moses as leader of the Israelites. He was the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, and was one of the two spies who reported favorably of Canaan. He was an attendant of Moses, who designated him as his successor. He led the nation into the land of promise, and was their captain in the wars that resulted in their peaceful occupation of it. The book that bears his name consists mainly of an account of the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan. It is of composite structure.

Josiah (jō-sī'ū). [Heb., 'Yahveh heals.'] King of Judah 640-609 B. C. (Duneker), son of Amon. He was defeated and slain by Pharaoh-Necho at the battle of Megiddo in the valley of Esdraelon. (2 Ki. xxii.-xxiv. 30, and 2 Chron. xxv.-xxxv.) He brought about important reforms, destroying all forms of idolatrous worship. It was under his reign that the priest Hilkiah found the book of the law. See Deuteronomy.

Jósika (yō'shē-ko), Baron Miklós. Born at Török, Transylvania, April 28, 1796; died at Dresden, Feb. 27, 1865. A Hungarian historical novelist. Among his chief novels are "Abafi" (1836), "The Poet Zrínyi" (1840), "The Last Bátor" (1838), "The Bohemians in Hungary" (1840), "A Hungarian Family during the Revolution" (1851), "The Family Mully" (1852), "Esther" (1853).

Josippon. The title of a history, in Hebrew, which originated in the 10th century in Italy, and which the author (under the pseudonym Joseph ben Gorion) claims to be a free translation of Josephus's historical works. The historical events are mingled with legends and tales which the author has drawn from the rabbinical literature. Hekesippus, the oldest compendium of the authentic Josephus, and the patristic writings. It was written in a kind of poetical prose, and was a great favorite with the Jewish people; it has been translated into many languages.

Josquin (zhos-kan') or Josse Desprez (dō-prā'), or De Prés (dè prā), Latinized to Jodocus a Pratis (jō-dō'kus ā prā'tis), or a Prato, or Pratensis (prā-ten'sis). Born at or near St.-Quentin, Hainault, about 1450; died at Condé, Hainault, Aug. 27, 1521. A celebrated Flemish composer, "one of the greatest masters of the Netherland school," author of masses, numerous motets, etc.

Josse (zhos), Monsieur. A jeweler in Molière's "L'Amour médecin." When asked how to cure a love-sick lady he recommends jewelry at once; hence the sarcastic phrase "Vous êtes orfèvre, M. Josse" ("You are a jeweler, Mr. Josse")—that is, you advise others for your own benefit.

Josselin (zhos-lan'). A town in the department of Loire-Inférieure, France, on the Oust 23 miles northeast of Vannes. The castle, a seat of the Rohan family, and the former abode of the Comtesse de Clisson, is a fine medieval stronghold with lofty walls overtopped by cylindrical, conical-roofed towers. The interior front, in the Flamboyant of the end of the pointed style, is highly picturesque, with gables, canopied windows, openwork parapets, and flanking tracery.

Jost (yōst), Isaak Markus. Born at Bernburg, Germany, Feb. 22, 1793; died at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Nov. 25, 1860. A German-Hebrew historian, teacher in Berlin and later (1835) in Frankfort. He wrote "Geschichte der Israeliten" (1820-29; "Neuere Geschichte der Israeliten," 1846-47), "Geschichte des Judentums und seiner Sekten" (1857-59), etc.

Jotapata (jō-tā-pā'tā). A fortress on the modern hill Tel Jéfât in Galilee. During the Judeo-Roman war it was held by Josephus. Forced by want of food and water to surrender to Vespasian, the garrison retired to a cavern and died by their own hands, with the exception of the general, Josephus, and one other.

Jotham (jō'tham). King of Judah 740-734 B. C. Jötunheim (yō'tön-him). [ON. Jötunheimr: Jötunn, giant, and heimr, world.] In Old Norse mythology, the realm of the giants; also called Utgard (ON. Utgardhr), the outer world. It was conceived to be situated in the extreme north.

Jotunheim (yō'tön-him). A mountain region in Norway, about lat. 61° 30' N. It contains the highest summits in the country, Galdhöppigen (8,400 feet) and Glitterind.

Joubert (zhō-bār'). Barthélemy Catherine. Born at Pont-de-Vaux, Ain, France, April 14, 1769; killed at the battle of Novi, Italy, Aug. 15, 1799. A French general. He served with distinction in Tyrol in 1797, and in Piedmont in 1798, and succeeded Moreau in Italy in 1799.

Joubert, Joseph. Born at Montignac, Périgord, May 6, 1754; died at Paris, May 4, 1824. A French moralist and man of letters. Extracts from his manuscripts, under the title "Pensees," were edited by Châteaubriand, and later (1842), under the title "Pensees, maximes, et correspondance," by Paul Raynal. Joueur (zhō-ör'), Le. A comedy by Regnard, produced in 1696. Mrs. Centlivre's "Gamerster" was adapted from it.

Jouffroy (zhō-frwä'). Théodore Simon. Born at Pontets, Doubs, France, July 7, 1796; died at Paris, Feb. 4, 1842. A noted French philosophical writer, a pupil of Cousin, professor at various institutions in Paris, and after 1838 librarian of the university. He translated Douglad Stewart and Reid, and wrote "Mélanges philosophiques" (1833), "Cours de droit naturel" (1835), etc.

Jougne (zhöny), Col de. A pass over the Jura, on the borders of Vaud, Switzerland, and Doubs, France, connecting Lausanne with Pontarlier.

Joule (jöl), James Prescott. Born at Salford, England, Dec. 24, 1818; died at Sale, Oct. 11, 1889. An English physicist, noted for his researches in the mechanical equivalent of heat. His paper on "Electro-Magnetic Forces" (1840) describes one of the earliest known attempts to measure an electric current by a definite unit. In a paper "On the Production of Heat by Voltaic Electricity" (1840) he first announced the law "that when a current of voltaic electricity is propagated along a metallic conductor, the heat evolved in a given time is proportional to the resistance of the conductor multiplied by the square of the electric intensity." This discovery was largely suggested by Ohm's "Die galvanische Kette" (1827). In a paper (1843) "On the Heat Evolved during the Electrolysis of Water," he demonstrated that the mechanical and heating powers of the current are proportional to each other. These discoveries led to a long series of experiments on the equivalence of heat and energy, which occupied the remainder of his life. In a paper "On the Caloric Effects of Magnetic Electricity and the Mechanical Value of Heat" (1843) it is stated that "the quantity of heat capable of increasing the temperature of a pound of water by one degree of Fahrenheit's scale is equal to . . . a mechanical force capable of raising 838 pounds to a perpendicular height of one foot." Joule made his final experiments in 1878, and the physical constant was determined to be 772.55 foot-pounds.

Jourdain (zhör-dan'), Alfonse, Count of Toulouse. Born in Syria, 1103; died at Aere, Palestine, 1148. Ruler of the greater part of southern France 1125-48.

Jourdain, Monsieur. In Molière's "Le bourgeois gentilhomme," a good, plain citizen, consumed with a desire to pass for a perfect gentleman. To this end he endeavors to educate not only himself but all his family. His astonishment at learning that he had been talking prose all his life has passed into a proverb.

Jourdan (zhör-don'), Comte Jean Baptiste. Born at Limoges, France, April 29, 1762; died at Paris, Nov. 23, 1833. A French marshal. Joyce's Country (jois'ez kun'tri). A district of County Galway, Ireland, lying north of Connemara.

Joyeuse (zhwā-yéz'). The sword of Charlemagne.

Joyeuse Garde (zhwā-yéz' gārd), La, or La Garde Joyeuse. In medieval romance, the castle of Lancelot of the Lake. It was given to him by Arthur for his defense of the queen's honor in a conflict with Sir Mador who had accused her of poisoning his brother. The name was changed from Dolorous Garde, or La Garde Doulooureuse, in honor of his victory. It is thought to have stood at Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Berwick, but for the dullness within its walls, seems almost as worthy of being called Joyeuse Garde as, both from its real and romance history of siege, conquest, and reconquest, it is of being remembered as Dolorous Garde.

Stuart Glennie, Arthurian Localities, III, 1.

J. S. of Dale. The pseudonym of F. J. Stimson.

Juan (hō-ān'). Spanish form of John.

It was discovered by a Spaniard, Juan Fernandez, about 1583; was a resort of buccaners in the 17th and 18th centuries; and is famous for the solitary residence of Alexander Selkirk 1704-09. Also called Mas a Tierra. Area, 36 square miles.

2. A group including the above island, Mas a Fuca (100 miles west of it), and the islet of Santa Clara. Total area, 72 square miles. The population is very small.

Juarez (hō-ā'reth), Benito Pablo. Born at Guelatao, Oajaca, March 21, 1806: died at Mexico, July 18, 1872. A Mexican liberal politician, of pure Indian blood. Banished by Santa Anna in 1853, he returned in 1855, was minister of justice under Alvarez, and in 1857 was elected president of the supreme court and vice-president of Mexico. After the fall of Comonfort (Jan., 1858), he became president by succession, but the reactionists had seized the government, and Juarez triumphed over them (Dec., 1860) only after a civil war. He was regularly elected president March, 1861. The invasion of Mexico by the French, English, and Spanish ostensibly in support of foreign bondholders (Dec., 1861), ended in the occupation of Mexico by the French (June, 1863), and the proclamation of an empire under Maximilian. Juarez was driven to the northern frontier, but on the withdrawal of the French army (Jan., 1867) quickly regained strength, and Maximilian was captured and shot. Juarez entered Mexico, and was reelected president Aug., 1867. Revolts continued, and though he was again elected in 1871, the northern states were in insurrection when he died.

Juarez Celman (nō-mān'), Miguel. Born at Cordoba, Sept. 29, 1844. An Argentine politician of the liberal party. He became president Oct. 12, 1886, but was forced to resign Aug. 6, 1890, by a revolution brought on by the financial panic of that year.

Juarros (hō-ār'rōs), Domingo. Born at Guatemala city, 1752: died there, 1820. A Central American priest and historian. He wrote "Historia de la Ciudad de Guatemala" (2 vols. 1808-18). There is an abridged English translation by John Bailey, entitled "Statistical and Commercial History of Guatemala" (London, 1823). The work is important for the history of Central America.

Jucunas (zhō-kō-nās'). A tribe of South American Indians, on the river Japurá near the confines of Brazil and Colombia. They are of the Arawak linguistic stock.

Judæa. See Judæa.

Judah (jō'dā). [Heb., 'praised'; Gr. Ἰουδάς, rarely Ἰουδα, Judas.] 1. One of the Hebrew patriarchs, the fourth son of Jacob and Leah.—2. The most powerful of the twelve tribes of Israel. Its territory was bounded by Dan and Benjamin on the north, the Dead Sea and Idumea on the east, Idumea and Simcon on the south, and the Mediterranean (nominally) on the west. It was subdivided into the districts of the mountain or hill country, the wilderness, the south, and the lowland.

Judah I., known as "The Prince" (ha-Nasi), or "The Holy" (ha-Qadosh). Flourished 190-220 A. D. The seventh patriarch and president of the Sanhedrim in succession from Hillel. He resided first in Tiberias, afterward in Sepphoris, and was, according to a tradition, on friendly terms with the emperor Antoninus. The principal work of his life consisted in the compiling of the thousands of decisions (halachoth: see Halacha) of the teachers of the law, which he arranged according to subjects and redacted as the Mishna (which see) in 6 orders or classes, each comprising the regulations of a certain branch of religious or social life.

Judah II. Patriarch about 225 A. D., grandson of Judah I. He moderated many laws bearing on the relation of Jews to heathen, and, according to a tradition, was an intimate friend of the emperor Alexander Severus.

Judah, Kingdom of. The southern kingdom of the Jews, comprising the tribes Judah and Benjamin. The northern kingdom of Israel seceded from it in the reign of Rehoboam (about 933 B. C.). Among its kings were Jehoshaphat, Jotham, Uzziah, Hezekiah, and Josiah. It was overthrown in 586 B. C. by Nebuchadnezzar, who carried many of the people to Babylon.

Judah ha Levi (jō'dā hā lā've). Born about 1085: died about 1140. A Spanish-Jewish poet and physician. In him the Jewish-Spanish renaissance of poetry reached its height of perfection of form and nobility and loftiness of subject-matter. Of his works there survive more than 800 secular poems, and more than 300 religious poems. He was also the author of an apologetical work in Arabic, "The Book of Argumentation and Demonstration for the Defense of the Oppressed Religion," better known by the title of the Hebrew translation, "Chozari." According to a tradition he undertook a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and was there trampled to death by a Saracen rider.

Judas (jō'dās), surnamed "The Gaulonite," or "The Galilean." A Jewish popular leader in the revolt against the census under the prefect Quirinus.

The sect of Judas the Gaulonite, or, as he was called, the Galilean, may be considered the lineal inheritors of that mingled spirit of national independence and of religious enthusiasm which had in early days won the glorious triumph of freedom from the Syro-Grecian kings, and had maintained a stern though secret resistance to the later Asmoneans, and to the Idumean dynasty. Just before the death of Herod, it had induced the six thousand Pharisees to refuse the oath of allegiance to the king and to his imperial protector, and had probably been the secret incentive in the other acts of resistance to the royal authority. Judas the Galilean openly proclaimed the unlawfulness of the impety, of God's people submitting to a foreign yoke, and thus acknowledging the subordination of the Jewish theocracy to the empire of Rome.

Milman, Hist. of Christianity, I, 141.

Judas Iscariot (jō'dās is-kar'i-ōt). [Heb. (see Judah); Gr. Ἰουδᾶς Ἰσκαριώτης. The surname Iscariot is from Kerioth in Judah.] One of the twelve apostles, the betrayer of Jesus.

Judas Maccabæus (jō'dās mak-ā-bē'ūs). Died 160 B. C. The second of the five sons of Mattathias the Hasmonean. He succeeded his father in 166 as commander and leader in the struggle against Antiochus Epiphanes. In the battles at Bethhoron and Bethzur (south of Jerusalem) he gained a decisive victory over the Syrians, and on the 25th Chisleu (December), 164, he entered Jerusalem and reconsecrated the temple: in memory of this event the feast of dedication (hanukkah) was instituted. Later he fought many battles, and at last fell in an encounter with the Syrians under Bacchides.

Judas Maccabæus. An oratorio by Handel, produced in London 1747.

Judd (jud), Sylvester. Born at Westhampton, Mass., July 23, 1813: died at Augusta, Maine, Jan. 20, 1853. An American Unitarian clergyman and author. His chief work is the romance "Margaret" (1845).

Jude (jōd), or Judas, Saint. [Heb.: see Judah.] One of the twelve apostles, probably identical with Thaddæus and Lebbaeus (doubtless a corruption of Thaddeus). There are no trustworthy traditions concerning him.

Jude, Epistle of. A book of the New Testament, written, not by the apostle Jude, but possibly by a brother of Jesus. He describes himself as a "brother of James," by whom the brother of Jesus may be meant. But both authorship and date are uncertain.

Judæa, or Judæa (jō-dē'ā). [L. Judæa, Gr. Ἰουδαία, from Ἰουδαίος, Jew, from Ἰουδάς, Judah.]

1. The southern division of Palestine in the Roman period, lying south of Samaria and west of the Jordan and Dead Sea, sometimes, however, including territory east of the Jordan.—2. An occasional name of the land of the Jews, or of Palestine.

Judæa, Kingdom of. See Judah.

Judenburg (jō'den-bōrg). A town in Styria, Austria-Hungary, situated on the Mur 36 miles west by north of Gratz. Population (1890), commune, 4,642.

Judges, Book of. [Heb. Sefer Shm.] A book of the Old Testament; so named because it gives an account of the history of Israel under the rule of a series of leaders called judges. It describes the transition period between the conquest of Canaan and the growth of a strong, stable government. The judge was chieftain in ancient Semitic communities, and the chief, of whatever title, always exercised juridical functions. The ancient Carthaginians called their rulers by the same name, sufetes. The most famous judges were Deborah and Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, Eli, and Samuel. According to its own chronology, the book covers a period of 410 years, but there are many difficulties in the way of the acceptance of this number.

Judgment of Paris, The. 1. A painting by Rubens, in the museum at Dresden. The three goddesses, accompanied by their attributes, and more or less completely undraped, stand in the foreground of a woodland. Paris sits on a stone holding the apple, with Mercury at his elbow offering advice. This is the original of the painting in the National Gallery, London.

2. A painting by Rubens, in the National Gallery, London. Mercury offers counsel to Paris, who is seated on a rock, in shepherd's costume; opposite stand the three goddesses, more or less undraped.

Judith (jō'dith). An Early English poem, probably of the 7th century, first printed in 1698.

In the same manuscript, which contains the only known copy of "Beowulf," is a fragment—about a fourth part—of another First-English poem, its theme being the Bible story of Judith. Professor Stephens infers, not only from its genuine poetic force, but from its use of a variation in the number of accents marking changes of emotion, a device found nowhere else in First-English except in Cedmon's Paraphrase, that the shaping of this poem is to be ascribed to Cedmon. Morley, English Writers, II, 181.

Judith. The name of the heroine of the Book of Judith (which see).

Judith, Book of. One of the apocryphal books of the Old Testament. It is a historical romance dating from the Maccabean period (probably from about 120 B. C.), and was apparently written in Hebrew. The original text is no longer extant; it exists at present in two distinct recensions, the Greek and the Latin. The heroine is named Judith (whence the name of the book), and is represented as a native of Bethulia. In order to deliver her native city, which is besieged by Holofernes, a general of the King of the Assyrians, she enters the Assyrian camp under the pretense of wishing to betray the city, gains admission to the general's tent through her extraordinary beauty, and slays him in his drunken sleep.

Judson (jud'son), Adoniram. Born at Malden, Mass., Aug. 9, 1788: died at sea, April 12, 1850. An American Baptist missionary. He settled in Burma in 1813. He translated the Bible into Burmese in 1835, and wrote a Burmese-English dictionary.

Juel (yö'el), Niels. Born at Copenhagen, May 8, 1629; died at Copenhagen, April 8, 1697. A Danish admiral, distinguished in the war against Sweden 1675-77.

Juggernaut (jug'ér-nüt). [A corruption of the Skt. Jagannatha, Lord of the world.] A name of Vishnu or Krishna, and also of Rama and Dattatreya, both incarnations of Vishnu. He is worshipped elsewhere in India, but the Jagannath festival at Puri, near Cuttack in Orissa, is especially celebrated. Its special feature is the drawing of the great car. Such cars, attached to every large Vishnu pagoda in the south of India, typify the moving active world over which the god presides. The Jagannath festival takes place in June or July, and for weeks before pilgrims come into Puri by thousands. The car is 45 feet high, 35 feet square, and supported on 16 wheels 7 feet in diameter. Balarama, the brother, and Subhadra, the sister of Jagannath, have separate cars a little smaller. When the images are placed on the cars, the multitude kneel, bow their foreheads in the dust, and, rushing forward, draw the cars down the broad street toward Jagannath's country house. The distance is less than a mile, but the journey takes several days. When the zeal of the pilgrims flags, 4,200 professional pullers drag the cars. An error underlies the common foreign conception of the festival. "In a closely-packed eager throng of a hundred thousand men and women under the blazing tropical sun deaths must occasionally occur. There have doubtless been instances of pilgrims throwing themselves under the wheels in a frenzy of religious excitement, but such instances have always been rare, and are now unknown. The few suicides that did occur were, for the most part, cases of diseased and miserable objects, who took this means to put themselves out of pain. The official returns now place this beyond doubt. Nothing could be more opposed to the spirit of Vishnu-worship than self-immolation. According to Chaitanya, the apostle of Jagannath, the destruction of the least of God's creatures is a sin against the Creator. Self-immolation he would have regarded with horror." Sir W. W. Hunter, Statistical Account of Bengal, XIX, 69 ff.

Juggernaut, better Jagannath (ju-gun-nüt'). A seaport in Orissa, Bengal, British India, situated in lat. 19° 48' N., long. 85° 49' E., celebrated for its temple and festival of the deity Juggernaut (which see). Also called Puri. Population, about 20,000.

Jugurtha (jög-ér'thij). Killed at Rome, 104 B. C. King of Numidia, son of Mastanabal and grandson of Masinissa. He usurped western Numidia in 117, and eastern Numidia in 112. A war with Rome commenced in 111, and he contended against Metellus in 109 and 108, and against Marins in 107. He was captured by Sulla in 106.

Juif Errant (zhü-érf' e-roñ'), Le. [F., 'The Wandering Jew.'] An opera by Halévy, first produced at Paris 1852.

Juive (zhüé'v), La. [F., 'The Jewess.'] An opera by Halévy, first produced at Paris 1835.

Jujuy (hü-hwö'). 1. The northwesternmost province of the Argentine Confederation, bounded on the east and south by Salta. Area, 17,000 square miles. Population (1887), 90,000.—2. The capital of the province of Jujuy, situated on the Rio Grande about lat. 24° 10' S., long. 65° 20' W. Also called San Salvador de Jujuy. Population (1889), 5,000.

Jukes (jöks), Joseph Beete. Born at Birmingham, Oct., 1811; died at Dublin, July 29, 1869. An English geologist. In 1839 he became geological surveyor of Newfoundland, and in 1842 naturalist to the expedition to the northeast coast of Australia. In 1846 he joined the British Geological Survey. In 1850 he became director of the Irish branch of the survey, and lecturer on geology at the Royal College of Science, Dublin. His chief works are "Excursions in and about Newfoundland" (1842), "Narrative of the Surveying Voyage of H. M. S. Fly" (1847), "A Sketch of the Physical Structure of Australia" (1850), "The Geology of South Staffordshire Coal-fields."

Jukovsky (zhö-köf'skë), Vasili Andreyevitch. Born Jan. 29, 1783; died at Baden, 1852. A Russian poet and translator. He translated Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," Byron's "Prisoner of Chillon," Moore's "Paradise and the Peri," Gray's "Elegy," etc.

Juli (hü'le). A village of Peru, department of Puno, on a terrace overlooking the southwest shore of Lake Titicaca, 13,100 feet above the sea. It was founded by the Jesuits as a mission station in 1577, and is celebrated in the history of the order.

Julia (jöö'lyä). [L., fem. of Julius.] Born 39 B. C.; died at Rhegium, Italy, 14 A. D. The daughter of Augustus Cæsar and Scribonia. She married in 25 M. Marcellus, on whose death in 23 she became the wife of M. Vipsanius Agrippa, by whom she became the mother of C. and L. Cæsar, Agrippa Postumus, Julia, and Agrippina. After Agrippa's death in 12 B. C., she married Tiberius. She was eventually divorced by Tiberius, and banished by her father, first to the island of Pandataria, and afterward to Rhegium, on account of her vices.

Julia. Born in 83 or 82 B. C.; died in 54 B. C. The daughter of Julius Cæsar and Cornelia. She married Cornelius Cæpio, from whom, at her father's command, she procured a divorce in order to become the wife of Pompey the Great in 59.

Julia. Died 28 A. D. The daughter of M. Vipsanius Agrippa and Julia, daughter of Augustus Cæsar. She became the wife of L. Emilius Paulus, by whom she became the mother of M. Emilius Lepidus and Emilia, first wife of the emperor Claudius. She inherited the vices of her mother, and was banished by Augustus in 9 A. D. to the island of Tremerus, where she died.

Julia. 1. In Shakspeare's comedy "Two Gentlemen of Verona," a girl loved by Proteus.—2. In Sheridan's comedy "The Rivals," the long-suffering object of the fractious jealousy of Falkland.—3. In J. Sheridan Knowles's play "The Hunchback," a type of commonplace sentiment.

Julia Domna. Died 217 A. D. A Roman empress. She was the wife of Septimius Severus, whom she married about 175, before his elevation to the imperial throne, and by whom she became the mother of Caracalla and Geta. She was originally a Syrian priestess, and through her influence as empress made Oriental religious rites fashionable at Rome.

Julia gens (jöö'lyä jenz). A celebrated patrician clan or house in ancient Rome. Its eponymic ancestor was Julius, the grandson or, according to some accounts, the son of Æneæ. The Julia gens was one of the leading Alban houses which Tullus Hostilius removed to Rome on the destruction of Alba Longa. Its family names in the time of the republic were Cæsar, Iulus, Mento, and Libo.

Julian (jöö'lyan), surnamed "The Apostate" (Flavius Claudius Julianus). [L. Julianus, spring from or pertaining to Julius; It. Giuliano, Sp. Julian, Pg. Julião, F. Julien.] Born at Constantinople, probably Nov. 17, 331 A. D.; died June 26, 363. Roman emperor 361-363, son of Julius Constantius and Basilina. He was, with the exception of a half-brother, Gallus, the only member of the Flavian family who escaped massacre on the accession of Constantine II. He was brought up in the Christian faith, and received an excellent education, which was completed in the philosophical schools at Athens. He was in 355 created Cæsar by Constantius, whose sister Helena he married, and by whom he was invested with the government of Gaul, Spain, and Britain. He made his residence chiefly at Paris, and in 357 defeated the Alamanni in a great battle near Strasburg. He was proclaimed emperor by his troops in 361, and was marching against Constantinople when the death of Constantius left him undisputed master of the empire. On his accession he publicly announced his conversion to paganism (whence his surname), and published an edict in which he granted toleration to all religions. In 363 he undertook an expedition against Persia, during which he was killed by an arrow while pursuing the enemy after a bloody engagement, June 26, 363.

Julian, Count. In Spanish legend, a governor of Andalusia in the 8th century. According to the story, his daughter Florinda was seduced by Roderic, and in revenge he betrayed Cænta to the Moors.

Julian Alps. The part of the eastern Alps east and southeast of the Carnic Alps, situated in Venetia, Carinthia, Carniola, and Görz-Gradiška. The culminating point is the Terglou (9,394 feet). The pass over the Julian Alps into Italy was of extreme importance, being traversed by the West-Gothic invaders, by Radagais, by Attila, and by others.

Julian Emperors. A collective name for the Roman emperors Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, as members by birth or adoption of the family of Julius Cæsar.

Julianists (jöö'lyan-ists). A sect of Monophysites which held the body of Christ to be incorruptible: so called from Julian, bishop of Halicarnassus early in the 6th century.

Jülich (yü'hlich), F. Juliers (zhü-lyä'). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, situated on the Roer 16 miles northeast of Aix-la-Chapelle: the Roman Juliaeum, and formerly the capital of the ancient duchy of Jülich.

Jülich, Duchy of. A medieval countship and duchy of Germany, which lay west of the electorate of Cologne. Capital, Jülich. It became united with Berg in 1423. Jülich, Berg, and Cleves were united in 1521. The extinction of the Cleves dual house in 1609 brought on the "Contest of the Jülich Succession," settled in 1666, when Brandenburg received Cleves, and Jülich and Berg passed to Pfalz-Neuburg. Jülich was acquired by France in 1801, was ceded to Prussia in 1814-15, and now belongs to the Rhine Province.

Julie (zhü-lé'). In Rousseau's "Nouvelle Héloïse," the wife of Volmar, and the mistress of Saint-Preux.

Julien (zhü-lyän'), Stanislas. Born at Orléans, France, Sept. 20, 1799; died at Paris, Feb. 14, 1873. A French Sinologist. He published various translations from the Chinese, "Syntaxe nouvelle de la langue chinoise" (1869-70), etc.

Julier (yö'yer). A pass in the canton of Grisons, Switzerland, leading from the Oberhalbstein valley to the Upper Engadine. It was used by the Romans. Height, 7,500 feet.

Juliers. See Jülich.

2. A character in Shakspeare's "Measure for Measure," a lady loved by Claudio.

Julius (jöö'yus) I. Bishop of Rome 337-352. He was a supporter of Athanasius.

Athanasius took up his residence at Rome, and under the protection of the Roman prelate, defied his adversaries to a new contest. Julius summoned the accusers of Athanasius to plead the cause before a council in Rome. The Eastern prelates altogether disclaimed his jurisdiction, and rejected his pretensions to rejudge the cause of a bishop already condemned by the Council of Tyre. The answer of Julius is directed rather to the justification of Athanasius than to the assertion of his own authority. The synod of Rome solemnly acquitted Athanasius, Paul, and all their adherents. The Western emperor joined in the sentiments of his clergy. A second council at Milan, in the presence of Constans, confirmed the decree of Rome.

Milman, Hist. of Christianity, II, 421.

Julius II. (Giuliano della Rovere). Born at Albezuola, 1443; died Feb. 21, 1513. Pope 1503-1513. He joined the League of Cambrai against Venice in 1508; formed the Holy League against France in 1511; and convened the fifth Lateran Council in 1512. He was a patron of literature and art.

Julius III. (Gianmaria de' Medici, later del Monte). Pope 1550-55.

Julius Africanus. See Africanus.

Julius Cæsar. See Cæsar.

Julius Cæsar. 1. A historical tragedy by Shakspeare, probably written in 1600 or 1601. It was not printed till 1623.—2. A tragedy by Sir William Alexander, earl of Stirling, published as "Cæsar" in 1604, and as "Julius Cæsar" in 1607.

Jullien, or Julien (zhü-lyän'), Louis Antoine. Born at Sisteron, Basses-Alpes, France, April 23, 1812; died near Paris, March 14, 1860. A French composer and musical director. In 1842 he began his annual series of concerts at the English Opera House. His aim was to "popularize music." He was in the United States from 1852 to 1854.

Jullunder. See Jalandhar.

July (jöö'h', formerly jöö'li). [From L. Julius, July, properly adj. (sc. mensis), month of Julius, so called after Julius Cæsar, who was born in this month, and who gave it this name when reforming the calendar. It was previously called Quintilis, or the fifth month. The name Julius in ME. and early mod. E. was commonly July.] The seventh month of the year, consisting of thirty-one days, during which the sun enters the sign Leo.

July, Government of. In French history, the government of Louis Philippe (1830-48), who was called to the throne in consequence of the revolution of July (which see).

July, Revolution of. In French history, the revolution of July 27, 28, and 29, 1830, by which the government of Charles X. and the elder line of the Bourbons was overthrown. The younger line (Orléans) was soon called to the throne in the person of Louis Philippe.

Jumala (yö-mä'lä). See the extract.

The highest god amongst the Finns is called Jumala, also Num, or Jilibeamertje, as protector of the flocks; but this last only amongst certain tribes. The word Jumala indicates rather the godhead in general than a divine individual; the god of the Christians is also often called Jumala. Therefore in the runes another name is more prominent; namely, Ukko, the old man, the grandfather, who sends thunder. Both are regarded by Castren as belonging to the air-gods; besides these, there are gods of the elements, such as water-gods and earth-gods.

La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 303.

Jumanas (zhö-mä-näs'). A race of Indians in northwestern Brazil (Amazonas), on the rivers Japurá and Içá, sometimes found on the Marañon, and probably extending into Colombia, where they are called Tecunas. They belong to the Maypuré linguistic stock, are divided into many petty hordes, live in fixed villages, plant manioc, and are generally peaceful. Their faces are tattooed as a tribal mark. Also written Chumanas, Chimanas, Shumanas, Xonanas, Ximanas.

Jumet (zhü-mä'). A manufacturing and mining town in the province of Hainaut, Belgium, 4 miles northwest of Charleroi. Population (1890), 23,927.

Jumièges (zhü-myäzh'). A village in the department of Seine-Inférieure, France, situated on the Seine 15 miles west of Rouen. The abbey church of the Benedictines, formerly the most important monastic monument of this region, is now a noble ruin, almost roofless. The west front has 2 square towers, octagonal above, and a projecting porch. The nave and aisles are round-arched, with alternate square and circular piers, and there is a great tower at the crossing.

Jumilla (hö-mël'yä). A town in the province of Murcia, Spain, 33 miles north of Murcia. Population (1887), 14,334.

Jumma Musjid. See Ahmedabad.

Jumna (jum'nä), or Jamuna (yä'mö-nä). A river of India, the chief tributary of the Ganges. It rises in the Himalaya, and joins the Ganges near Allahabad. On its banks are Delhi, Agra, and Allahabad. Length, 860 miles.

Junagarh (jö-na-gar'). 1. A native state in India, under British control, intersected by lat. 21° N., long. 70° 30' E.—2. The capital of the state of Junagarh, situated about lat. 21° 30' N., long. 70° 24' E. Population, about 24,000.

Junction (jungk'shon). A city in Geary County, eastern Kansas. Population (1890), 4,502.

June (jōu). [From L. Junius, June, properly adj. (sc. mensis), month of the family of Junius, from Junius, a Roman gentile name, akin to juvnis, young.] The sixth month of the year, consisting of thirty days, during which the sun enters the sign Cancer.

June, Jennie. The pseudonym of Mrs. Croly (Jennie Cunningham).

Juneau (jō-nō'). A mining town in Alaska, the largest in the Territory.

Jung (yōng), or Jungius (jun'ji-us). Joachim. Born at Lübeck, Germany, Oct. 22, 1587; died at Hamburg, Sept. 17, 1657. A German philosophical writer and botanist. He was professor of mathematics at Giessen 1600-14, and at Rostock 1625-28, and rector of the Johanneum at Hamburg 1628-57.

Jung, Johann Heinrich, generally called Stilling. Born at Im-Grund, Nassau, Germany, Sept. 12, 1740; died at Karlsruhe, Baden, April 2, 1817. A German mystic. He was professor of economics at Marburg 1787-1803, and later lived in retirement at Heidelberg and Karlsruhe. He wrote an autobiography (published as "Heinrich Stilling's Leben" 1806; continued 1817) and various mystical works.

Jungbunzlau (yōng-bōnts'lou). A manufacturing town in Bohemia, on the Iser 31 miles north-east of Prague. Population (1890), commune, 11,518.

Jungfrau (yōng'fron). [G., 'virgin.'] One of the chief mountains of the Bernese Alps, Switzerland, on the border of Bern and Valais, 13 miles south by east of Interlaken. It was first ascended in 1811. Height, 13,670 feet.

Jungkuhn (yōng'hōn), Franz Wilhelm. Born at Mansfeld, Prussia, Oct. 26, 1812; died at Lembang, Java, April 24, 1864. A German naturalist and explorer in Java and Sumatra. His chief work is "Java, seine Gestalt, Pflanzendecke, und innere Bauart" (1852-54).

Jungmann (yōng'män), Joseph. Born at Hnd-litz, Bohemia, July 16, 1773; died at Prague, Nov., 1847. A Bohemian philologist and historian of literature. His chief works are a "History of Bohemian Literature" (1825), and a "Czech-German Dictionary" (1835-39).

Juniata (jō-ni-at'ä). A river in Pennsylvania, formed by the junction of the Little Juniata and the Frankstown Branch at Petersburg. It joins the Susquehanna 13 miles northwest of Harrisburg; is noted for picturesque scenery; and has a total length of about 150 miles.

Junin (hō-nēn'). 1. An interior department of Peru, northeast of Lima. Population, about 200,000.—2. A town of the department of Junin, southeast of Lake Chincha-yocolla. It gave its name to a battle fought on a plain to the south, Aug. 6, 1824, in which the patriots under Bolívar defeated the royalists of Canterac. The action was decided entirely by the cavalry, and without the use of firearms. Population, about 2,000.

Junius (jō'nyus). The pseudonym of the unknown author of a series of letters directed against the British ministry, Sir William Draper, the Duke of Grafton, and others. The letters appeared in the London "Public Advertiser" from Nov. 21, 1768, to Jan. 21, 1772. Their authorship has been attributed to Edmund Burke, Earl Temple, and others; but they probably were written by Sir Philip Francis.

Junius (jō'ni-us), Franziskus. Born at Heidelberg, Baden, 1589; died at Windsor, England, Nov. 19, 1677. A German student of the Teutonic languages, son of Franziskus Junius. Among his works is "Etymologicum Anglicanum" (ed. by Lye 1743).

Junker (yōng'ker), Wilhelm. Born at Moscow, April 6, 1840; died at St. Petersburg, Feb. 13, 1892. An African explorer. After studying in Germany, Switzerland, and Russia, Junker began his career as an explorer by tours in Algeria and Tunis (1873-74), in Lower Egypt (1875), Suakim, Kassala, and Khartoum (1876), and Gondokoro and Makaraka as far as Van (1877), returning to Europe in 1878. Accompanied by his assistant Bohndorf, he returned in 1879 to Khartoum, where they embarked on the steamer Ismaïlia. In 1880-83 he explored the Nyam-Nyam and Monbuttu countries in all directions. He crossed and followed the Welle River several times, and reached Emin Pasha at Ladö, on the upper White Nile, at the close of 1883. For some time he was held in virtual captivity through the Mahdi insurrection, but he finally succeeded (after the failure of the relief expedition under G. A. Fischer) in making his way from Wadclai to the coast, arriving in Zanzibar in Dec., 1886. In 1887 he was again in Europe. He published "Reisen in Afrika" (1891).

Junkers (yōng'kérz). The members of the aristocratic party in Prussia which came into power under Bismarck when he was made prime minister in 1862.

Junkseylon. Same as Salung.

Juno (jō'nō). 1. In Roman mythology, the queen of heaven, the highest divinity of the Latin races in Italy next to Jupiter, of whom she was the sister and the wife. She was the parallel of the Greek Hera, with whom in later times she became to a considerable extent identified. She was regarded as the special protectress of marriage, and was the guardian of woman from birth to death. In Rome she was also the patron of the national finances, and a temple which contained the mint was erected to her, under the name of Juno Moneta, on the Capitoline. In her distinctively Italic character, Juno (called Lavinia, from the site at Lavinium of her chief sanctuary, or Hospita, the Protectress) was a war-goddess, represented as clad in a mantle of goat-skin, bearing a shield and an uplifted spear, and accompanied, like Athene, by a sacred serpent.

2. The third planetoid, discovered by Harding at Lilienthal, Sept. 1, 1804.

Junot (zhü-nō'), Andoche, Duc d'Abrantès. Born at Bussy-le-Grand, Oct. 23, 1771; died July 29, 1813. A French general. He entered the army in 1792; accompanied Bonaparte in his Italian and Egyptian campaigns; became a general of division in 1800; was appointed governor of Paris in 1806; and in 1807 commanded an army which invaded Portugal and captured Lisbon. Shortly afterward he was created duke of Abrantès. He was defeated by Sir Arthur Wellesley at Vimero in Aug., 1808, and compelled to evacuate Portugal.

Junot, Madame (Laure Permon), Duchesse d'Abrantès. Born at Montpellier, Nov. 6, 1784; died at Paris, June 7, 1838. A French author. She married General Junot about 1800. She is the author of "Souvenirs historiques sur Napoléon, la Révolution, le Directoire, le Consulat, l'Empire et la Restauration" (1831-1835), "Histoire des salons de Paris" (1837), etc.

Junqueira Freire (zhōn-kāy'rā frāy're), Luiz José. Born at Bahia, Dec. 31, 1832; died there, June 24, 1855. A Brazilian poet. From 1851 to 1854 he was a novice in a cloister of Carmelite monks, where he wrote his best-known poems, collected in the "Inspirações do claustro."

Junta (jun'ti). [Sp. junta (orig. fem. of junto), from L. junctus, fem. of junctus, joined.] In Spain, a consultative or legislative assembly, either for the whole country or for one of its separate parts. The most celebrated juntas in history were that convened by Napoleon in 1808 and the later revolutionary juntas.

Junto (jun'tō). In English history, a group of Whig politicians very influential in the reigns of William III. and Anne. Its chief members were Somers, Russell, Wharton, and Montague. They were the chief leaders of the party in Parliament.

Jupille (zhü-pēly'). A manufacturing town in the province of Liège, Belgium, 3 miles east of Liège.

Jupiter (jō'pi-tēr). [L., from Jovis (earlier Diovis, Gr. Zeús, Ind. Diaus) and pater, father Jove.]

1. In Roman mythology, the supreme deity, the parallel of the Greek Zeus, and the embodiment of the might and national dignity of the Romans. The central seat of his cult was the Capitoline Hill at Rome, where he had the title of Optimus Maximus ('Best and Greatest'). He was primarily a divinity of the sky, and hence was considered to be the originator of all atmospheric changes. His weapon was the thunderbolt. He controlled and directed the future, and sacrifices were offered to secure his favor at the beginning of every undertaking. He was also the guardian of property, whether of the state or of individuals. White, the color of the light of day, was sacred to him; hence white animals were offered to him in sacrifice, his priests wore white caps, his chariot was drawn by 4 white horses, and the consuls were dressed in white when they sacrificed to him upon assuming office. The eagle was especially consecrated to him. The surviving artistic representations of Jupiter are comparatively late, and betray Greek influence, imitating the type of the Greek Zeus. Also Jove.

2. The brightest of the superior planets, and the largest body of the solar system except the sun itself. Its sidereal period of revolution is 11.861808 Julian years, and its synodical period 399 days. Its mean distance from the sun is about 483,000,000 miles. Its equatorial diameter at its mean distance subtends an angle of 38", so that its real diameter is about one tenth that of the sun (which subtends 1,922"), and about 11 times that of the earth (the solar parallax being 8".9). Jupiter is flattened at the poles by no less than one seventeenth of its diameter. Its mass is about $\frac{1}{318}$ of that of the sun, or 304 times that of the earth, making its mean density only 1.3, that of the earth being taken at 5.5. Gravity at its surface is $\frac{2}{3}$ times that at the earth. The most remarkable feature of the appearance of this planet is the equatorial fascie or bands which cross its disk. These fascie subsist generally for months or even years, but occasionally form in a few hours. They sometimes have a breadth of one sixth of the apparent disk of the planet. There are also spots of much greater permanence. It is, however, probable that no solid matter can be seen, and quite doubtful whether any exists in the planet. The spots revolve about the axis in 9 hours, 55 minutes, and 35 seconds, but the white clouds in 51 minutes less time. From his photometric observations Zöllner calculates the albedo of Jupiter to be 0.6; so high a value as to suggest that the planet must be self-luminous. Jupiter has 5 satellites or moons. The fifth (which is about 111,910 miles from the planet, and of very small diameter, with a period of about 12 hours) was discovered by Barnard Sept. 9, 1892. The periods of revolution of the others are as follows: (1) 1d. 18h. 28m. 35.945s.; (2) 3d. 13h. 17m. 53.735s.; (3) 7d. 3h. 59m. 35.554s.; (4) 16d. 18h. 5m. 6.925s.

Jupiter Amon. Jupiter as identified with the Egyptian Amon.

Jupiter of Otricoli. A marble mask restored as a bust, the finest surviving antique head of Zeus. The features are massive and imposing; the beard is full, separated into locks; and the abundant hair rises from the forehead and falls down on both sides of the face.

Jupiter-Scapin. A sobriquet given to Napoleon I. See Scapin.

Jupiter Stator. [L., 'he who stays' flight.] Jupiter as the giver of victory in battle.

Jura (jō'ri). A chain of mountains in eastern France and western and northern Switzerland: the ancient Jura Mous or Jurassus. It extends from the junction of the Ain and Rhone to the junction of the Aare and Rhine. The designation is sometimes extended to include the prolongation through Baden, Wurtemberg, and Bavaria to the valley of the upper Main, called the German Jura, and subdivided into the Swabian Jura and Franconian Jura. The highest peaks are Dôle, Mont Tendre, Reulet, Crêt de la Neige, Credoz, etc. (over 5,000 feet). Length of French and Swiss Jura, about 180 miles.

Jura (zhü-rä'). A department of eastern France. Capital, Lons-le-Saunier. It is bounded by Haute-Saône on the north, Doubs and Switzerland on the east, Ain on the south, and Côte-d'Or and Saône-et-Loire on the southeast, and formed part of the ancient Franche-Comté. Area, 1,927 square miles. Population (1891), 273,028.

Jura (jō'ri). An island of the Inner Hebrides, belonging to Argyllshire, Scotland. It lies 4 miles west of the mainland, from which it is separated by the Sound of Jura, and is traversed by a range of hills. Length, 27 miles.

Jura, Franconian. See Franconian Jura.

Jura, Paps of. Two conical hills in the island of Jura, Scotland, about 2,500 feet in height.

Jura, Sound of. A sea passage separating the island of Jura from the mainland of Argyllshire, Scotland.

Jura, Swabian. See Swabian Jura.

Juripixunas. See Juris.

Juris (zhō-rēs'). [Abbreviated from Tupi juripixuna, black-mouthed, from their custom of tattooing the face so as to form a black mark about the mouth.] A tribe of Indians in the Brazilian state of Amazonas, on the north side of the upper Amazon, between the Japurá and Içá, occasionally ranging east to the Rio Negro. Formerly they were the most numerous and powerful tribe of this region, but they are now greatly reduced in numbers, and most of them have been amalgamated with the country population. They are divided into various hordes, have fixed villages and plantations, and are especially skilful in the use of the blow-gun. They are classed with the Maypuré stock, and are closely related to the Passés. The name has also been given to a tribe of Argentine (Chaco of the Lule stock).

Jurunas (zhō-rō'nās). [Tupi jurú, mouth, and una, black.] A tribe of Brazilian Indians of the Tupi race, on the river Ningu between 4° and 8° S. lat. They were formerly very numerous and warlike, and are said to have been cannibals. They tattooed a large black patch on the face (whence the name). The Jurunas still number several thousands, who live in villages and have small plantations. Also written Jurunas and Jurunas.

Jurupary (zhō-rō-pä-ré'). Among Indians of the Tupi race in Brazil, a mythical being supposed to persecute and sometimes to kill men. He dwells in the woods, and is described under various monstrous forms. The old missionaries identified him with the devil.

Jussieu (zhü-syé'), Adrien de. Born at Paris, Dec. 23, 1797; died there, June 29, 1853. A French botanist, son of A. L. de Jussieu. He wrote monographs on the Rutaceæ, Meliaceæ, and Malpighiaceæ, a "Cours élémentaire de la botanique," etc.

Jussieu, Antoine Laurent de. Born at Lyons, France, April 12, 1748; died at Paris, Sept. 17, 1836. A noted French botanist, nephew of Bernard de Jussieu. He wrote "Genera plantarum secundum ordines naturales, etc." (1789), "Introductio in historiam plantarum" (1837), "Exposition d'un nouvel ordre de plantes, adopté dans les démonstrations du jardin royal" (1774), etc.

Jussieu, Bernard de. Born at Lyons, France, Aug. 17, 1699; died at Paris, Nov. 6, 1776. A noted French botanist. At first a physician, he later devoted himself to the study of botany, and in 1758 became superintendent of the garden of the Trianon. He was the founder of the natural system of classification of plants.

Jussieu, Joseph de. Born in 1704; died April 11, 1779. A French botanist. In 1735 he went to Peru with Condamine and Godin. He spent 15 years studying the botany of the Andean region, paying special attention to cinchona plants. His collections were lost through the dishonesty of a servant, a misfortune which caused Jussieu to lose his reason. In this state he returned to France in 1771.

Juste (zhüst), Théodore. Born at Brussels, Jan. 11, 1818; died there, Aug. 12, 1888. A Belgian historian. His works include "Histoire de la Belgique" (1838), "Histoire de la révolution des Pays-Bas sous Philippe II." (1855-63), "Les fondateurs de la monarchie belge" (1865-84), etc.

Justin (jus'tin). Lived before the 5th century A. D. A Roman historian, author of an epitome of a lost history by Trognus (ed. by Dübner 1831), etc.

Justin, Saint, surnamed "The Martyr," or "The Philosopher." Died probably about 163 A. D.

A celebrated Greek church father. He was born of Greek parents at Flavia Neapolis, a Roman colony built on the site of the ancient Shechem in Palestine. He devoted himself to the study of philosophy, and became an adherent and a teacher of the Platonic system. Originally a pagan, he afterward embraced Christianity, and is said to have been scourged and beheaded at Rome.

Justin I. Died Aug. 1, 527. Byzantine emperor 518-527. He was of barbarian, probably Gothic, extraction, and was a native of Tauresium in Dardania. He entered the guards of the emperor Leo I., and was commander-in-chief of the imperial guards in the reign of Anastasius, on whose death in 518 he was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers.

Justin II. Died Oct. 5, 578. Byzantine emperor 565-578, nephew of Justinian I whom he succeeded. During his reign northern Italy was conquered by the Lombards, who founded the Kingdom of the Lombards in 568; and several important conquests were made by the Persians in the Asiatic provinces.

Justina (jus-ti'nä). [L., fem. of Justinus.] Patrons of Padua and (with St. Mark) of Venice. She is said to have been a native of Padua, and to have suffered martyrdom at that city in 304. Her supposed relics, said to have been recovered in 1177, are preserved at Padua in a church which bears her name. She is commemorated by the Roman Catholic Church on Oct. 7.

Justinian (jus-tin'i-an) I. (Flavius Anicius Justinianus), surnamed "The Great." Born at Tauresium, Dardania, Illyricum, probably May 11, 483; died Nov. 14, 565. Byzantine emperor 527-565, nephew of Justin I. whom he succeeded. He married in 525 Theodora, an actress, who exercised great influence during his reign, chiefly in ecclesiastical affairs. In 532 a fight broke out in the hippodrome between the Green and the Blue factions, the latter of which favored the emperor and the orthodox church. The fight spread from the hippodrome to the city, and the Green proclaimed Hypatius, nephew of Anastasius I., emperor. The revolt was put down by the general Belisarius with the assistance of the Blue, but not before 30,000 of the insurgents had been slain and a large part of the city destroyed, including the Church of Saint Sophia, which was rebuilt 532-537 with great splendor according to plans furnished by the architect Anthemius. In the East Justinian purchased peace from the Persians in 531, but in the West the victories of his generals Belisarius and Narses destroyed the Vandal and the Ostrogothic kingdoms in Africa and Italy respectively, and restored those countries to the Byzantine empire. An important event of his reign was the publication of the Justinian Code (which see).

Justinian II., surnamed Rhinotmetus ('ho whose nose is cut off'). Died in Dec., 711. Byzantine emperor 685-695 and 705-711, son of Constantine IV. He was deposed in 695 by his general Leontius, who cut off his nose and banished him to Cherson. He made his escape from Cherson, and regained his throne with the assistance of Terbelis, the king of the Bulgarians, in 705, but was overthrown by Philippicus in 711 and killed.

Justinian Code. The body of Roman law compiled and annotated at the command of the emperor Justinian. This consists of the "Pandects," or the condensed opinions of the jurists, in fifty books; the "Institutions"; and the "Novelle" or "Novelle Constitutions," a collection of ordinances—the whole forming the "Corpus Juris Civilis," or body of civil law, the most important of all monuments of jurisprudence.

Jüterbog (yü'ter-bog), or Jüterbock (yü'ter-bok). A town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated on the Nuthe 40 miles south-southwest of Berlin. It was the scene of a victory of the Swedes over the Imperialists in 1644. Population (1890), commune, 7,181.

Jutes (jôts). A Low German tribe which, with the Saxons and Angles, invaded Great Britain in the 5th century. According to tradition they were invited by the Britons to aid them against the Picts, and landed at Ebbsfleet, under Hengist and Horsa, about 449. They founded the kingdom of Kent. Their connection with Jutland has been matter of dispute. See the extract.

Now, as to the first settlement of Jutes under Hengist and Horsa (Horse and Marc), who established themselves in Kent, Hampshire, and the Isle of Wight, and whom Bede distinctly believed to have come from Jutland, it is to be observed that Jutland is now occupied by Danes, and that men from Jutland settling on our eastern coasts in the days of the Angles were called Danes; but that in this case they are called "Jutes," not "Danes," and do not seem to have been Danish. Where there has been a Danish settlement, towns commonly are found with names ending in "by." Thus in Lincolnshire, within a dozen miles of Great Grimsby, there stand Foresby, Uterby, Fotherby, Ashby-cum-Fenby, Barnoldby, Irby, Laceby, Keelby, Grashy, Brocklesby, Uceby. Yet throughout this "Jute" region of Kent, Hampshire, and the Isle of Wight there is not even one place to be found that has a name ending in "by." There is no clear ground for asserting, although it has been suggested as one way of conquering this difficulty, that a Germanic people occupied Jutland in the middle of the 5th century. . . . Dr. Latham . . . argues that the "Jutes" of the first settlement were, in fact, Goths; or that, if Jutes, they were Jutes who came in company with Goths, and that they came, not out of Jutland, but only from the coast of Gaul, across the straits that divide Gaul from Britain.

Morley, English Writers, I. 244-246.

Juthungi (jō-thun'jī). [L. (Ammianus) Juthungi.] A German tribe, a branch of the Suevi and a part of the Alamanni, in the war in Rhetia during the reign of the emperor Caracalla (A. D. 213). Later in the same century they were signally defeated by Aurelian on the upper Danube. The tribal appellation disappears in the 5th century, after which they were merged in the Suevi. Their original location is unknown.

Jutland (jut'land). [Dan. Jylland, G. Jütland.] The continental portion of Denmark. It forms the northern part of an extensive peninsula (the ancient Cimbric Chersonese), the southern part of which belongs to Prussia. It is bounded by the North Sea on the west, the Skager Rack on the north, the Cattegat on the east, and Schleswig-Holstein on the south. The surface is generally level, but hilly in the east. Its early inhabitants are said to have been Cimbric. (Compare Jutes.) Area, 9,743 square miles. Population (1890), 942,120.

Juvavia (jō-vā'vi-ä), or Juvavum (jō-vā'vum). The ancient name of Salzburg.

Juvenal (jō've-näl) (Decimus Junius Juvenalis). Lived about 60-140 A. D. A noted Roman rhetorician and satirical poet of the age of Trajan. Little is known of his life. Sixteen of his satires (in five books) are extant.

Juventas (jō-ven'tas). In Roman mythology, the goddess of youth.

Juxon (juks'ou), William. Born at Chichester, England, 1582; died at Lambeth, London, June 4, 1663. An English prelate, lord high treasurer of England and archbishop of Canterbury. In 1608 he entered St. John's College, Oxford, and became head of that college by Laud's recommendation Dec. 10, 1621. In 1626 and 1627 he was vice-chancellor of the university. On Oct. 3, 1633, he was created bishop of London, and on March 6, 1636, lord high treasurer, which office he resigned on May 17, 1641. He attended Charles I. during the negotiation of the treaty of Newport, during his trial, and on the scaffold, Jan. 30, 1649. In 1649 he was deprived of his see. At the Restoration he was made archbishop of Canterbury (Sept. 13, 1660). As a churchman he was devoted to Laud.

Juza (jō'zi). [Ar. al-jūza, the central; though the propriety of the epithet is rather obscure.] The fourth-magnitude star λ Draconis, in the tip of the monster's tail.

Jyotisha (jyō'ti-shā). [Skt., 'relating to the heavenly bodies,' astronomy, astrology.] The name of the Vedic calendar, a short tract giving the knowledge required for fixing the days and hours of the Vedic sacrifices. It has had a certain significance from being ranked with the Veda, but is of very late origin, dating from the 4th or 5th century A. D.

K 2. A high peak of the Himalaya, now known as Mount Godwin-Austen (which see). Ka (kâ). [Skt., 'the who?'] The inexplicable; the unknown. By an erroneous interpretation of the interrogative pronoun in a hymn of the Rigveda (x. 121—kasmâi devaya havistâ vidhema, 'what god shall we worship with the oblation?') the word ka, 'who,' is applied as a name to any chief god or object of worship, as Prajapati, Brahma, Vishnu, air, the sun, the soul, Yama. It is exalted into a deity. In the Puranas, Ka as a recognized god is even provided with an independent genealogy.

Kaaba, or Caaba (kâ'bâ or kâ'a-bâ). [Ar. ka'bah, a square building.] A cube-shaped, flat-roofed building in the center of the Great Mosque at Mecca: the most sacred shrine of the Mohammedans. In its southeast corner it contains the sacred black stone called hajar al aswad, said to have been originally a ruby which came down from heaven, but now blackened by the tears shed for sin by pilgrims. This stone is an irregular oval about seven inches in diameter, and is composed of about a dozen smaller stones of different shapes and sizes. It is the point toward which all Mohammedans face during their devotions. The Kaaba is opened to worshipers twice or three times a year, but only the faithful are permitted to approach it.

How natural stone-worship was amongst the Semites can be seen in the name Betylia, which has become the general name for all sacred stones; we need only remember the numerous time-honoured stones mentioned in the Old Testament, and the Kaabih at Mecca.

La Saussaye, Science of Religion, p. 85.

Kaaden (kâ'den). A town in Bohemia, situated on the Eger 54 miles west-northwest of Prague. Population (1890), 6,889.

Kaarta (kâr'tâ). A Fellatah state in western Africa, east of Senegambia, intersected by lat. 15° N., long. 10° W. Capital, Niore. It is within the French sphere of influence. Population, estimated, 300,000.

Kabail (ka-bîl'), or Kabyles (ka-bîlz'). A federation of Berber tribes in Algeria, Tunisia, and a few oases of the Sahara. The name is the plural of the Arabic word for tribe. The principal dialects spoken by the Kabail are that of Beni, the Zonave, the Showah or Zenati, that of Tuggurt, Wargla, that of the Beni Mazab, and that of the Shamba. See Berber.

So far as outward appearance is concerned, the Kabyles or Rifis of to-day might be found in an English or Irish village. The antiquity of the type which they exhibit is evidenced by the monuments of Egypt, where their ancestors are portrayed with the same blond features that they still display. Dolichocephalic, fair-haired, blue-eyed and white-skinned, they might be mistaken for that branch of the Keltic who are distinguished for their golden hair and their clear and freckled skin. Professor de Quatrefages believes that they are the lineal descendants of the race whose remains have been discovered in the caverns of Cro-Magnon in the French province of Périgord, along with paleolithic implements and the bones of the mammoth and the reindeer.

Sayer, Races of the O. T., p. 149.

Kabale und Liebe (kâ-bâ'le önt lô'be). A tragedy by Schiller, published in 1784.

Kabandha (ka-band'hâ). In the Ramayana, a monstrous Rakshasa slain by Rama. Mortally wounded, he asked Rama to burn his body; and, coming out of the fire in his real shape as a Gandharva (which see), advised Rama as to the war with Ravana.

Kabarda (kâ-bâr'dâ). A mountainous region on the northern slope of the Caucasus, belonging to the Terek territory, Russia.

Kabbala, or Cabala (kab'â-lâ). [Heb. qabbalah, reception, the mysterious doctrine received traditionally.] The theosophy or mystic philosophy of the Hebrew religion, which grew up mainly after the beginning of the 10th century, and flourished to the present time. The Kabbala employed itself in a mystic explanation of Deity and cosmogony, and in the creation of hidden meanings for the sacred Hebrew writings, thus drawing into its province all the Hebrew law and philosophy. Later Kabbalists pretended to find wonderful meanings even in the letters and forms of the sacred text, and made for themselves elaborate rules of interpretation.

Kabeiri. See Cabiri.

Kabinda (kâ-bên'dâ). See Cabinda and Kongo.

Katir (ke-bêr'). [Arabic kabir, great.] A Hindu religious reformer. He was a weaver, and probably a Mussulman by birth, who lived at Benares, and also at Magar near Gorakhpur, between 1483 and 1512. His teachings exercised an important influence in upper India in the 15th and 16th centuries, and formed the basis of the Sikh movement in the Panjab. Originally a Mussulman, he became a pupil of Ramananda and a Vaishnava with much of the democracy and tolerance of Buddhism; but he denounced all idol-worship, and taught Vaishnavism as a form of strict monotheism. True religion, he said, meant nothing but devotion to one God, whether called Vishnu, Rama, or Ilari, or by Mohammedan names. He rejects every malevolent distinction of caste, religion, and sect. All authority in faith and morals belongs to the guru, or spiritual guide, though the rights of conscience of the believer are reserved. Kabir's aim was evidently to found a religion that should unite Hindn and Mussulman.

Kabirpanthis (ke-bêr-pân't-hêz). ['Those who follow the path of Kabir.'] The followers of Kabir. They now form 12 principal branches, which have remained in communion notwithstanding some differences in faith and practice. Their center is Benares, but they are found in Gujarat, Central India, and as far as the Deccan. As they take pains to conform in unessentials to the usages about them, it is difficult to ascertain their number. At the end of the last century 35,000 took part in a melah at Benares. They are influential rather than numerous.

Kabrega (kâ-râ'gâ). See Nyoro.

Kabul, or Cabul (kâ-bôl'). 1. A province or division in eastern Afghanistan.—2. The capital of Afghanistan, situated on the river Kabul in lat. 34° 30' N., long. 69° 16' E., 6,000 ft. above sea-level. It is noted as a commercial and strategic center, and is famous for its fruit. It was taken by Timur, and by Nadir Shah (1738). The British occupied it in the first Afghan war: it was evacuated by them in Jan., 1842, and retaken in Sept., 1842. In the second Afghan war (1857-60) it was the scene of Cavazari's murder, and was captured by General Roberts, and evacuated by the British in 1880. Population, about 70,000.

3. A river which rises in Afghanistan and flows easterly past Kabul, emptying into the Indus in the Panjab at Attok, east of Peshawar. Length, about 270 miles.

Kabunga (kâ-bông'gâ). See Mandingo.

Kabyles. See Kabail.

Kacha (ka'châ). A son of Brihaspati who in the Mahabharata becomes a disciple of Shukra, the priest of the Asuras, to obtain a charm to restore the dead. Twice killed by the Asuras, Kacha is restored by Shukra at the intercession of Devayani, his daughter. A third time killed, his ashes are mixed with Shukra's wine; but Shukra revives Kacha within his own body, teaches him the charm, allows himself to be ripped open for Kacha's exit, and is in turn restored by Kacha. This incident is said to have caused Shukra to prohibit wine to Brahmans. When Kacha refuses to marry Devayani, she curses him with the loss of the charm, and he condemns her to be sought by no Brahman and to wed a Kshatriya.

Kachh, or Cutch (kueh). A native state under British control, south of Sind. Area, 6,500 square miles. Population (1891), 558,415.

Kachh, Gulf of. An arm of the Indian Ocean, south of Kachh and north of Kathiawar.

Kadambari (kâ-dam'ba-rê). A daughter of Chitraratha and Madira, whose name is given to a celebrated Sanskrit prose work, a kind of romance, written by Banabhatta and continued by his son in about the 7th century.

Kadapa, or Cuddapah (kud'â-pâ). A district in Madras, British India, intersected by lat. 15° N., long. 78° 30' E.

Kadesh (kâ'desh), more fully Kadesh Barnea (kâ'desh bâr-nê-â). [Heb., 'sanctuary.'] 1. A place on the southern boundary of the East Jordan territory, the modern Ain Kadish, in the country of the Azarime. It was the headquarters of the Israelites in their wanderings in the desert. Miriam, the sister of Moses, died here; the episode of the 'waters of strife' took place here; and from here the spies were sent out to investigate Canaan.

2. The capital of the Hittites, on the Orontes near Tel Nebi Mendel. About 1300 B. C. Rameses II. of the 19th dynasty gained there a decisive victory over the Hittites.

Like Carthage, Kadesh on the Orontes, the most southern capital the Hittites possessed, was also a "holy city."

Pictures of it have been preserved on the monuments of Rameses II. We gather from them that it stood on the shore of the Lake of Homa, still called the "Lake of Kadesh," at the point where the Orontes flowed out of the lake. The river was conducted round the city in a double channel, across which a wide bridge was thrown, the space between the two channels being apparently occupied by a wall. Sayer, Hittites, p. 100.

Kadiak (kâd-yak'), or Kodiak (kôd-yak'). An island in the Pacific Ocean, belonging to Alaska, situated about lat. 57° 30' N., long. 153° W. Length, about 90 miles. The inhabitants are Eskimos.

Kadjah (kâ-dê'jâ). The wife of Mohammed. Kadikoi (kad-i-kô'i), or Kadikeui (-kû'ê). A town in Asiatic Turkey, opposite Constantinople; the ancient Chaleeon.

Kado Hadacho (kâ'dô hä-dâ'chô), or Caddoques, or Cadodaquiox. The leading tribe of the Caddo Confederacy of North American Indians. See Caddo.

Kadom (kâ-dôm'). A town in the government of Tamboff, Russia, situated on the Moksha about 125 miles southwest of Nijni Novgorod. Population (1885-89), 7,258.

Kadur, or Cadoor (kâ-dôr'). A district in Mysore, India, intersected by lat. 13° 30' N., long. 76° E. Area, 2,984 square miles. Population (1881), 328,327.

Kaffa (kâf'fâ), or Gomara (gô'mâ-râ). A region in eastern Africa, about lat. 6°-8° N., long. 35°-38° E. It is on the border line of the British and Italian spheres of influence in East Africa.

Kafir, or Kafir, or Caffre (kâf'êr). [Ar., 'unbeliever,' 'infidel.'] A name given by the Arabs of East Africa to all pagan African natives, and adopted by the Portuguese, Dutch, and English of South and East Africa. In English the word has been used to signify (a) the Kafirs proper, consisting of the Xosa, Pondo, and Tembu tribes; (b) the Zulus and the Kafirs proper taken collectively, as distinguished from the Bechuana, Hottentots, and other South African natives; (c) the Bantu family, or all negroes south of the equator.

Kaffraria (kâf-frâ'ri-â). The country of the Kafirs, in South Africa. It is not an administrative term, though Transkei in Cape Colony is sometimes known as Kaffraria proper, and a region in the southeastern part of Cape Colony was formerly known as British Kaffraria. Kafirs are found in Natal and neighboring regions, as well as in Cape Colony. The Kafirs have been repeatedly at war with the British, especially in 1819, 1834-35, 1846-48, 1850-52, and 1877.

Kafiristan (kâ-fê-ris-tân'). A mountainous region in central Asia, on the border of Afghanistan and the British sphere of influence. Its approximate boundaries are the Hindu-Kush Mountains on the north, and the rivers Panjabir and Kanar. The inhabitants (estimated at about 200,000) are various related heathen tribes.

Kageyi (kâ-gâ'yê). See Sukuma.

Kagoshima (kâ-gô-shê'nâ), or Kagosima (kâ-go-sê'mâ). A seaport in the island of Kiusiu, Japan, situated in lat. 31° 32' N., long. 130° 30' E. It is a very old city, the seat of the manufacture of the celebrated Satsuma cracked faience. It was bombarded by the British in 1853. Population (1891), 56,643.

Kaikawus (ki-kā-wōs'). In the Shahnamah, the twelfth Iranian king, son of Kaiqubad, reigning 150 years. A dev or demon, disguised as a singer, sings before the king the beauties of Mazandaran, whence he resolves to conquer the country. Kaikawus succeeds with the aid of Rustam, who has his seven adventures during this war. (See Rustam.) The king next invades Hamavaran, the king of which yields to him and gives him his daughter Sandabah in marriage. The king of Hamavaran, however, treacherously seizes Kawus and imprisons him, during which time Afrasyab attacks Iran. Rustam defeats the three hostile kings and delivers Kawus. The war with Afrasyab lasts during the whole reign. The history of Kaikawus contains, besides the account of Rustam's seven adventures, that of Sahrab and that of Syawush. (See Sahrab, Syawush.) In his pride Kaikawus sought to fly to the heavens, and harnessed to his throne four eagles. Weary, they descended and threw the king on the ground near Amol. He escaped with his life, and, pardoned by God for his arrogance, ruled on. The name is the Kaoses of the Byzantine historians.

Kaikeyi (kai-kā'yē). In Hindu mythology, a princess of Kaikeya, wife of King Dasharatha and mother of his third son, Bharata. Carefully tending Dasharatha when wounded, she induced him to promise any two favors. She used this promise to procure the exile of Rama and the promotion of Bharata.

Kaikhusrav (present Pers. pron. ki-khus-rou'; earlier ki-khos-rou'). [See Kai. Khusrau is the Skt. sushravas, Avestan husravanh (nom. husrava), famous, Gr. Ἡρόσης and Chosroes.] In the Shahnamah, the thirteenth Iranian king. He reigned 60 years. He was the son of Syawush and Farangis, daughter of Afrasyab. After the murder of Syawush by Gurwi, Afrasyab was about to slay Farangis, that none of the offspring of Iraj might live; but Piran Wisah persuaded the king to put her in his care. Piran saved her child when born, and had him brought up by shepherds. Afrasyab, frightened by a dream in which the son of Syawush destroyed him, summoned Piran, who allayed the fears of Afrasyab by representing the boy as an idiot. When he warred with Kaikawus, Afrasyab sent Farangis and Khusrav to a remote place, but Giv found them and brought them to Kaikawus, who appointed Khusrav his successor. Khusrav continued the war, and slew Afrasyab. The name Kaikhusrav is identified with that of the elder Cyrus, with the legends of whom as told by the Greeks there are accordances.

Kailasa (kai-lā'sā). A mountain in the Himalaya, north of Lake Manasa. Shiva's paradise and Kuber's abode are said to be on Kailasa.

Kaiqubad (earlier Pers. pron. ki-kō-bād'; present Pers. pron. ki-kō-bād'). In the Shahnamah, the eleventh Iranian king, a descendant of Faridun, brought by Rustam from Mount Alburz at the bidding of Zal after the death of Garshasp. He reigned 100 years, building cities after Rustam, defeating Afrasyab, compelling Pashang to sue for peace. He left four sons, the eldest being Kaikawus. See Qubad.

Kaira (ki'rā). 1. A district in the government of Bombay, British India, intersected by lat. 22° 40' N., long. 72° 50' E. Area, 1,609 square miles. Population (1881), 804,800.—2. The capital of the district of Kaira, about lat. 22° 45' N., long. 72° 38' E. Population, about 12,000.

Kairwan (kir-wān'), or Kirwan (kēr-wān'). A city 87 miles south of Tunis. It is a holy Mohammedan city, founded about 670. The Djamaat es-Sehebi, or Mosque of the Companion of the Prophet, is the chief sanctuary of the city. Within the usual inclosing wall there are four beautiful arcaded courts, domed vestibules, the mosque proper, and the Shrine of the Companion, Abdullah ibn-Zemaa el-Beloui, a small domed structure with ornament of heterogeneous character and date. The remainder of the monument abounds with the richest Arabic decoration in plaster-work, inlaid tiles, elaborate carpentry, and color. The square minaret is incrustured with tiles, and has an Ajimez window in each face at the top. The great mosque of Sidi Akbar is a venerable monument occupying the northern corner of the city. In plan it is a rectangle which is divided into three parts, the place of worship proper, the vestibule, and the cloistered court in which stands the minaret. The mosque proper consists of 17 aisles of 8 arches springing from coupled columns of marble and porphyry. These columns number 296, and in the entire building there are 439, all taken from old Roman and Christian monuments. The mihrab and mimbar are beautifully ornamented. There is a central dome, which rests on porphyry columns about 42 feet high. The court is surrounded by a double arcade with coupled columns. Population, estimated, about 15,000. Also Kairoan, Kerouan, etc.

Kalevala (kai-le-vä'li), or Kalewala (kai-le-vä'li). [Kaleva, heroic; la, affix sig. 'abode': 'abode' or 'land of heroes.'] The national epic of Finland. The elements of the poem are ancient popular songs, hitherto orally transmitted, that have been collected in different parts of Finnish territory, for the most part within the present century. Short fragments of mythical poetry had been known in the 18th century, but the first considerable collection was published by Zacharias Topelius in 1822. The poem owes its present coherent form to Elias Lönnrot, who during years of assiduous labor collected the material in Finland proper, but principally in Russian Karelia eastward to the White Sea. Lönnrot's first edition, which appeared in 1835, contains 12,000 verses, for the first time systematically arranged as a connected whole. In 1849 appeared a second edition, containing nearly 23,000 verses, which is the present form of the poem. The Kalevala is written in eight-syllabled trochaic verse, with alliteration, but without rhyme. The whole is divided into 50 cantos or runes. Its subject-matter is mythical, with a few Christian elements. Its central hero is Väinämöinen, the god of poetry and music. It is the prototype, in form and contents, of Longfellow's "Hiawatha."

Kalgan (kai-gän'). A city in the province of Chihli, China, situated on the line of the Great Wall, 120 miles northwest of Peking. It has important transit trade, especially in tea. Population, estimated, 70,000.

Kalhana (kal'ha-nā). [Skt.] The name of the author of the Rajatarangini, a history of Kashmir, supposed to have lived about 1148.

Kali (ka'li). In Sanskrit, a name of the die or side of the die which is marked by one point: personified as an evil genius in the poem of Nala. Finding that Damayanti had chosen Nala, Kali, enraged, entered into him, and caused him to be worsted by his brother Pushkara in the game of dice in which Nala lost his kingdom, his wife, and even his raiment, and in consequence of which he became an exile.

Kali (kai'liē). [In the Vedas Agni has seven flickering tongues for devouring oblations: of these Kali is the black or terrible tongue. The word came to have the following meaning.] In Hindu mythology, the bloody consort of Shiva. (Calcutta is Kalighatta, the ghat or landing-place of Kali.) In her images the body is black, or dark-blue, the insides of the hands red. Her disheveled hair reaches to her feet. She has a necklace of human heads and a cincture of blood-stained hands, while she stands on the body of Shiva. Her tongue protrudes from her mouth, which is marked with blood. Bloody sacrifices are made to her. She has a celebrated temple at Kalighat, near Calcutta, which during her festivals swims with blood. She personifies destroying Time.

Kalidasa (kā-li-dā'sa). The greatest poet and dramatist of India. All that is related of his personal history is that he lived at Ujjayini or Ujjein, and that he was one of the 9 gems of the court of Vikramaditya; but since there have been several kings of that name at Ujjayini, his date remains uncertain. Wilson believed this Vikramaditya to be the one whose era begins 56 B. C. Bhuu Bajji identifies him with Harsha Vikramaditya of the middle of the 6th century. Monier-Williams gives the beginning of the 3d century as the date of Kalidasa; Lassen, the middle of the 2d; Kern, the first half of the 6th; Jacobi, the middle of the 4th; Shankar Pandit, a time prior to the middle of the 8th; and the southern Buddhists, the 6th. Weber assigns the composition of Kalidasa's three dramas to a period from the 2d to the 4th century of our era—the period of the Gupta princes, whose reigns correspond best to the legendary tradition of the glory of Vikramaditya. Kalidasa is the undisputed author of the two dramas Shakuntala and Vikramorvasi, and Weber and Shankar Pandit have submitted strong grounds for ascribing to him also the Malavikāgnimitra. The Raghuvansha, Kumarsambhava, Meghaduta, Ritusanhara, Nalodaya, and Shrutabodha have also all been ascribed to him with varying degrees of improbability. He is known to Europeans especially through the drama of Shakuntala, which, when first translated by Sir William Jones in 1789, produced such a sensation that the early success of Sanskrit studies in England and Germany may be ascribed to this masterpiece. He is characterized by consummate tact in the use of language, delicacy of sentiment, and fertility of imagination. See the several names.

Kalika (kā'li-kā). The goddess Kali.

Kalikapurana (kā'li-kā-pō-rā'na). In Sanskrit literature, one of eighteen Upapuranas, or secondary Puranas, containing about 9,000 stanzas, the object of which is to recommend the worship of Kali, the wife of Shiva, in one or other of her forms. It belongs to the Shakta form of Hindu belief, or the worship of the female powers of the deities. A remarkable feature of the work is the description of a number of rivers and mountains in Assam, suggesting to Wilson the possible Assamese origin, or origin in northeastern Bengal, of the Tantrika and Shakta corruptions of the earlier Hindu religion.

Kalilag and Damrag (ka-lē'lag and dam'rag). The name of the Syriac version of the original of the Panchatantra, and an important link in the genealogy of Indo-European folk-lore. That original, a Buddhist Sanskrit work in 13 chapters treating of the conduct of princes, and inculcating its doctrines in the form of beast-fables, was translated from Sanskrit into Pahlavi by a Persian physician named Barzoi at the command of Khusrav Nushirvan (531-579 A. D.). From the Pahlavi version, now lost, was translated, about 570 A. D., the older Syriac version, called after the two jackals, Karataka and Damanaka, who figured in the introduction to the Sanskrit original. A notice of this Syriac version had been preserved in a catalogue of Syriac writings made by Ebed-jesus, who died in 1318, and published by Asseman at Rome in 1725. A Chaldean bishop, Georgius Ebed-jesus Khayyath, on his way to the ecumenical council in 1870, stumbled upon a manuscript of this version in the episcopal library at Mardin. Through the mediation of the Italian scholar Guidi, and a wonderful combination of accidents and efforts, "the lost manuscript" was made known to Europe, and at last published and translated by Bickell (Leipzig, 1876). Bickell's work contains an important introduction by Benfey resuming the results (already published in his Pantschatantra) of his studies in the history of fable.

Kalilah and Dimnah (ka-lē'lä and dim'nä), or Fables of Pilpay (pīl'pā). The name of the Arabic translation of the Pahlavi translation of the Sanskrit original of the Panchatantra. It was made by Abdallah ibn al-Moqaffa, a Persian convert to Islam, who lived under the calif Al-Mansur and died about 760. The Arabic was published by De Saey in 1816, and an English translation by Knatchbull (Oxford, 1819). Kalilah and Dimnah is also the name of the later Syriac version made in the 10th or 11th century, edited by Wright and translated by Keith-Falconer (Cambridge, 1885). Keith-Falconer's introduction is a clear and full account of the history of Indo-European fable. See Kalilag and Damrag, and Pilpay.

It is bounded by Nebraska on the north, Missouri (separated in part by the Missouri River) on the east, Indian Territory and Oklahoma on the south, and Colorado on the west. It extends from lat. 37° to 40° N., and long. 94° 40' to 102° W. The surface is undulating, and the soil generally fertile. The chief mineral is coal, and the leading industries agriculture and stock-raising. It has 106 counties; sends 2 senators and 8 representatives to Congress; and has 10 electoral votes. It was part of the Louisiana Purchase, and was made a Territory in 1854. (See Kansas-Nebraska Bill.) It was colonized by both free- and slave-State settlers, and a bloody civil war broke out. The Topeka Constitution prohibiting slavery was formed in 1855, and the Leecompton Constitution sanctioning slavery in 1857. John Brown took a prominent part as a partisan anti-slavery leader. The Wyandotte Constitution forbidding slavery was adopted in 1859. Kansas was admitted as a State Jan. 29, 1861. It took a prominent part in the Civil War, and suffered much from raids. A prohibitory amendment to the constitution was adopted in 1880. Kansas has been one of the chief centers of the Populist party. Area, 82,080 square miles. Population (1890), 1,427,096.

Kant (känt), Immanuel. Born at Königsberg, Prussia, April 22, 1724; died there, Feb. 12, 1804. A celebrated German philosopher, one of the most influential thinkers of modern times; founder of the "critical philosophy." He was the son of a saddler in very moderate circumstances. His early education was obtained in his native city, where he entered the university in 1740 and began the study of theology. Subsequently he was tutor in several families, but took his degree in 1755 and settled as docent at the university. In 1766 he received a small salaried position in the Royal Library. Finally in 1770 he was made professor of logic and metaphysics, a position which he held until his death. Although he had advantageous calls to other universities, he preferred to remain in Königsberg, and during his whole life is said never to have been further away than Pillau, some 30 English miles distant. During his university career he lectured, not only on logic and the various branches of metaphysics, but also, at various times, on anthropology, physical geography, and mathematics. His first treatise, "Gedanken von der wahren Schätzung der lebendigen Kräfte," appeared in 1747. His real literary activity began in 1755 with the treatise on cosmic physics, "Allgemeine Naturgeschichte und Theorie des Himmels" ("General History of Nature and Theory of the Heavens"). In 1764 appeared "Beobachtungen über das Gefühl des Schönen und Erhabenen" ("Observations on the Sense of the Beautiful and the Sublime"). In 1766 he published "Träume eines Geistessehers" ("Dreams of a Ghost-seer"). The first of his great philosophical works, the most important in modern philosophy, appeared in 1781. This is the "Kritik der reinen Vernunft" ("Critique of Pure Reason"), in which he endeavors to ascertain the nature of the transcendental ideas of the human understanding and to establish the province of certain human knowledge. His second great work, the "Kritik der praktischen Vernunft" ("Critique of Practical Reason"), appeared in 1783. This treats of morals: according to it the ideas of God, human liberty, and immortality are postulates of practical reason. Finally, the third "Critique," an inquiry into the faculty of judgment, appeared in 1790 under the title "Kritik der Urteilskraft" ("Critique of the Power of Judgment"). In addition to the works mentioned, he published a number of smaller treatises and essays. To 1784 belongs the short essay "Was ist Aufklärung?" ("What is Enlightenment?"), which pronounces the century of Frederick the Great the age of German enlightenment. "Grundlegung der Metaphysik der Sitten" ("Foundation of the Metaphysics of Ethics") appeared in 1785. "Religion innerhalb der Grenzen der blossen Vernunft" ("Religion within the Limits of Mere Reason") in 1793. "Metaphysische Anfangsgründe der Rechtslehre" ("Metaphysical Elements of Legal Science") in 1797. A late edition of his collected works is that of Berlin (1868-1873), in 8 volumes.

Karabel (ká-rä-bel'). See the extract.

The Pass of Karabel is a narrow defile, shut in on either side by lofty cliffs, through which ran the ancient road from Ephesos in the south to Sardes and Smyrna in the north. The Greek historian Herodotus tells us that the Egyptian conqueror Sesostris had left memorials of himself in this place. "Two images cut by him in the rock" were to be seen beside the road which led "from Ephesos to Phokaea and from Sardes to Smyrna. On either side a man is carved, a little over three feet in height, who holds a spear in the right hand and a bow in the left. The hold of his accoutrement is similar, for it is Egyptian and Ethiopian, and from one shoulder to the other, right across the breast, Egyptian hieroglyphics have been cut which declare: 'I have won this land with my shoulders.'" These two images were the object of my journey. One of them had been discovered by Renouard in 1839, and shortly afterwards sketched by Texier; the other had been found by Dr. Beddoe in 1856. Sagee, Hiittites, p. 54.

Karaites (ká'rä-its). [Heb. qaraim, readers, scripturists.] A sect among the Jews which rejects the traditional law as it is fixed in the Talmud, and recognizes only the Pentateuch or five books of Moses as binding. The name is derived from Hebrew qará, 'to read'—i. e. adherents of the law that was written and read in opposition to the traditional law which originally was oral. The origin of the sect is ascribed to a certain Anan ben David, of Babylonia, in the 8th century A. D., who became leader of the anti-Talmudic movement in indignation at not being chosen exilarch or head of the Jewish community. The controversy between the Karaites and Talmudists has been productive of an accurate and rational study of the Bible on both sides. The sect never made great headway. Small communities of it linger in parts of Turkey, Syria, Egypt, Galicia (Austria), Lithuania, and the Crimea (Russia).

Karmat (kär'mät), surname of Hamdan ben-Ashath. The founder of the Karmathians (which see). Also Carmath.

Karmathians (kär-mä'thi-ans). [So named from Karmat, the principal apostle of the sect, a poor laborer, who professed to be a prophet.] A Mohammedan sect which arose in Turkey about the end of the 9th century. The Karmathians regarded the Koran as an allegorical book, rejected all revelation, fasting, and prayer, and were communistic, even in the matter of wives. They carried on wars against the califate, particularly in the 10th century, but disappeared soon after. According to some accounts the Druses developed from them.

Karna (kär'na). In Hindu mythology, son of Pritha or Kunti by Surya, 'the sun,' before her marriage to Pandu, and so the unknown half-brother of the Pandava princes. He was born equipped with arms and armor. The sage Durvasas had given Kunti a charm by which she might have offspring by any god invoked, and she chose the sun. Afraid of disgrace, Kunti exposed the child by the Yamuna, where it was found by the charioteer of Dhritrashtra, who had it reared by his wife Radha. In the war Karna took the part of the Kauravas, and was at last killed by Arjuna. After his death, his relationship becoming known, great kindness was shown to his family.

Karnak (kär'nak). A village in Egypt, on the eastern bank of the Nile, on the site of Thebes, famous for its remains of antiquity. The Great Temple extends to a length of about 1,200 feet from west to east, and is comparatively regular in plan. The double pylon of the great court is about 370 feet wide; the court is colonnaded at the sides, and has an avenue of columns in the middle. A second pylon follows, and opens on the famous hypostyle hall, 170 by 329 feet, with central avenue of 12 columns 62 feet high and 1½ in diameter, and 122 columns 42½ feet high at the sides. The lintel-blocks of the portal are 41 feet long. A narrow court follows, ornamented with Osiride figures and containing two obelisks, one of which is erect and is 97½ feet high, being surpassed only by that of St. John Lateran at Rome. This court precedes a structure containing the usual series of halls and chambers, and an isolated cella or sanctuary. Behind this building is another large open court, at the back of which stands the columnar edifice of Thothmes III., an extensive building containing a large hypostyle hall and many comparatively small halls and chambers. The existing temple appears to have been begun by Usersten I. (about 2700 B. C.), to whose modest foundation extensive additions were made by Thothmes I. and III., Seti I., Rameses II. and III., and Shishak (about 959 B. C.). The mural sculptures are vast in quantity, and highly interesting in character, particularly those which portray the racial characteristics of various conquered Asiatic peoples. A complete temple of Amen, built by Rameses III., extends toward the south from the great court. The pylon of Ptolemy Energetes is a conspicuous monument at the end of the long avenue of sphinxes leading from Luxor. The pylon has a single large square portal, and is surmounted by a frieze carved with the winged solar disk and by the overhanging cornice. It is covered inside and out with bands of sculpture representing Ptolemy and his queen paying honor to his predecessors and to the gods. In one of the interior compartments Ptolemy appears in Greek costume, an exceedingly rare type. The temple of Khonsu, one of the Theban triad, was founded by Rameses III. It is notable chiefly for its beautiful hypostyle hall, whose great columns and epistyle beams are deeply cut with hieroglyphs and with celanaglyphic reliefs of kings and divinities. The exterior wall also presents much remarkable sculpture. Also Carnac.

Karnal (kär-näl'). 1. A district in the Panjab, British India, intersected by lat. 29° 45' N., long. 77° E. Area, 3,396 square miles. Population (1881), 622,621.—2. The capital of the district of Karnal, in lat. 29° 42' N., long. 76° 57' E. Population, about 23,000.

Kean (kēn), Charles John. Born at Waterford, Ireland, Jan. 18, 1811; died at Chelsea, Jan. 22, 1868. An English actor, son of Edmund Kean. His first appearance was as young Norval in 1827, after which he played with his father till 1833. In 1842 he married Ellen Tree. In 1850 Charles Kean leased the Princess's Theatre, at first with Robert Keely; in 1851 he began his notable series of spectacular revivals. He was a careful but not a great actor. His last appearance was as Louis XI, at Liverpool in 1867.

Kean, Edmund. Born at London, Nov. 4, 1787; died at Richmond, May 15, 1833. A celebrated English actor. His father was of Irish descent; his mother was an itinerant actress named Anne Carey, who deserted him. He played children's parts about 1790, and in 1795 he ran away to sea. Under his mother's name (Carey) he led the life of a roving actor until 1806, when he first appeared in the Haymarket as Ganem in the "Momon-tainers." On Jan. 26, 1814, he appeared at Drury Lane, when he was very successful as Shylock. This was followed by Harlot, Othello, Iago, and Luke in "Riches." one of his greatest successes was in Lear at Drury Lane, April, 1820. His first appearance in New York was Nov. 29, 1820. He returned to Drury Lane in 1821 as Richard III., and played there at intervals until 1825 when (Nov. 14) he appeared at the Park Theater, New York. He continued to act at Drury Lane, Covent Garden, and elsewhere; but the irregularity of his life destroyed his career. From 1829 his health continued to decline, and he acted only occasionally from that time until May 15, 1833, when he died. He was probably unequaled as Richard III., Othello, Lear, and Sir Giles Overreach.

Kean, Mrs. (Ellen Tree). Born 1805; died at London, Aug. 21, 1880. An English actress. She made her first appearance in 1822-23. From 1836-39 she played in America. In 1842 she married Charles Kean, with whom she played leading parts, and whose success she greatly furthered.

Kemble, John Mitchell. Born at London, April 2, 1807; died at Dublin, March 26, 1857. An English philologist and historian, son of Charles Kemble the actor, and nephew of John Philip Kemble and Mrs. Siddons. He graduated at Cambridge in 1830. On Feb. 24, 1840, he succeeded his father as examiner of stage-plays, and held that office until his death. He edited "Beowulf" (1833-37). His most important works are his unfinished "The Saxons in England" (1849), and the "Codex Diplomaticus Ævi Saxonici" (1839-40).

Kemble, John Philip. Born at Prescott, near Liverpool, Feb. 1, 1757; died at Lausanne, Switzerland, Feb. 26, 1823. A celebrated English tragedian, son of Roger Kemble. In 1771 he left a Roman Catholic school in Staffordshire for the English college at Douai, where he received a good education; but he could not agree to his father's plan of having him enter the church. He played in his father's company while still a child, but on Jan. 8, 1776, he made his real debut at Wolverhampton as Theodosius, and played on the York circuit, as well as in Dublin and Cork with growing success till Sept. 30, 1783, when he made his first appearance in London at Drury Lane as Hamlet. Here he created a good deal of excitement and some unfriendly criticism; he had not yet measured the full extent of his power. He remained with this company for 19 years. In Nov., 1783, his sister, Mrs. Siddons, first played with him and overshadowed him. In 1788-89 he undertook the management of Drury Lane, and in 1802 of Covent Garden. It was on the occasion of his opening the New Covent Garden Theatre, in 1809, with a new scale of prices rendered necessary by the expenses incurred, that the famous "old-price riots" occurred. He was a stately actor, with a somewhat stilted and declamatory style. In Coriolanus he was at his best, but he won applause as Richard III., Hamlet, Cato, Wolsey, Zanga, Penruddock, Jagues, Pierre, Brutus, Hotspur, Octavian, etc. In comedy he was not so successful.

Kerethim (ker-'ē-'thim). See the extract.

David instituted a bodyguard of Kerethim and Pelethim, or rather of Cretans and Philistines (2 Sam. xv. 18), to whom the Hebrew of 2 Sam. xx. 23 adds a name which has been obliterated in our English version, the Carians. These foreign soldiers were a sort of Janissaries attached to the person of the sovereign, after the common fashion of Eastern monarchs, who deem themselves most secure when surrounded by a band of followers uninfluenced by family connections with the people of the land. The constitution of the bodyguard appears to have remained unchanged to the fall of the Judean state.

Kern-baby (kérn' bā-bi), or Kernababy (kér-nā-bā-bi). See the extract.

Let us take another piece of folklore. All North-country English folk know the Kernababy. The custom of the "Kernababy" is commonly observed in England, or, at all events, in Scotland, where the writer has seen many a kernababy. The last gleanings of the last field are bound up in a rude imitation of the human shape, and dressed in some rag-rags of flincy. The usage has fallen into the conservative hands of children, but of old "the Maiden" was a regular image of the harvest goddess, which, with a sickle and sheaves in her arms, attended by a crowd of reapers, and accompanied with music, followed the last cart home to the farm. It is odd enough that the "Maiden" should exactly translate the old Sicilian name of the daughter of Demeter. "The Maiden" has dwindled, then, among us to the rudimentary kernababy; but ancient Peru had her own Maiden, her Harvest Goddess.

Kerner (ker'ner), Andreas Justinus. Born at Ludwigsburg, Württemberg, Sept. 18, 1786; died at Weinsberg, Württemberg, Feb. 21, 1862. A German lyric poet and medical writer. He was destined at the outset for a mercantile career, but ultimately studied natural history at Tübingen, where he was intimately associated with Uhland and Gustav Schwab, with whom he founded the so-called Swabian school of poetry. After 1819 he was district physician at Weinsberg, where he died. His poems are characterized by a true lyric quality; one at least of them, the "Wanderlied" ("Wander Song"), has become a genuine folk-song. He was a believer in spiritualistic manifestations, and wrote several works in this field, among them "Die Scherin von Prevorst" ("The Prophetess of Prevorst"). His principal prose work is "Reiseshatten von dem Schattenspieler Luchs" ("Magie Lantern Pictures of Travel by the Exhibitor Luchs," 1811).

Kéroualle, or Querouaille (kā-rō-äl'), Louise Renée de, Duchess of Portsmouth and Aubigny. Born 1649; died at Paris, Nov. 14, 1734. Elder daughter of Guillaume de Penancoët, sieur de Kéroualle. She first appears as maid of honor to Henrietta, duchess of Orleans, sister of Charles II., and later to Queen Catharine. She became mistress of Charles II. in 1671, and on July 29, 1672, bore him a son, Charles Lennox, who was created duke of Richmond. She was naturalized and in 1673 created duchess of Portsmouth, and made lady of the bedchamber to the queen. In 1674 she was granted by Louis XIV. the fief of Aubigny in Berry. After the death of Charles II. she retired to Aubigny for the rest of her life.

Khoikhoïn (koi-koin'). The native name of the Hottentots. By their Bantu neighbors they are called Balawu or Batao. They occupy the southwestern extremity of Africa, mostly in German territory and in the Cape Colony. (For their physical appearance, see Hottentot-Bushman.) Though involved in relentless wars with the white intruders, with Bantu neighbors, and with people of their own kin, they have maintained themselves to this day, and are not decreasing. They have subjugated a Bantu tribe, the Hill Damara, forced upon it their own language, and almost destroyed another Bantu tribe, the Ovaherero. Most of them are now semi-civilized. The principal tribes are that of the Cape (speaking Dutch), the Korana, the Griqua or Bastards (half-breeds of mixed Hottentot and Dutch blood), the Gonaqua in the Eastern Province, and the Namaqua in German Southwest Africa. The last is the strongest tribe, numbering about 350,000. The main features of the Khoikhoïn language are—(1) In phonology: (a) the clicks which form an integral part of the words; (b) the musical tones by which several meanings of a monosyllabic root are differentiated. (2) In morphology: (c) monosyllabic roots; (d) three grammatical genders and three numbers; (e) the masculine and feminine letters identical with the Hamitic; (f) the use of post-positions as in the Hamitic family. Exceedingly rich in grammatical forms and in word-store, the Khoikhoïn dialects are also well provided with folk-tales, animal stories, and proverbs, many of which have been collected, but few published. See Hottentots and Bantu.

Khusrâu (khus-rô'), or Khosru (kos-rô'), or Chosroes (kos-rô-êz). [See Kaikhusrâu.] As Kaikhusrâu, the thirteenth Iranian king of the Shahnamah (see Kaikhusrâu); in history, the name of the twenty-first and twenty-third Sassanian kings. Khusrâu I. (called Nushirvan, "the generous mind") reigned 531-579. He had several wars with the Romans. At the conclusion of the first in 532 or 533, Justinian purchased peace by an annual tribute of 440,000 pieces of gold. One of the conditions imposed by Khusrâu was that seven Greek philosophers who were pagans should be allowed to live in the Roman Empire without persecution. At the close of the second war (543-561) Justinian promised an annual tribute of 40,000 pieces of gold, and received in return the cession of Colchis and Lazica. Khusrâu died before the end of the third war, which began in 571. He was one of the greatest kings of Persia. His empire extended from the Indus to the Red Sea, and large portions of central Asia, perhaps also a part of eastern Europe, recognized him as their king. He was despotic and cruel but firm, encouraging agriculture, trade, and learning. He caused various Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit works to be translated into Persian. Khusrâu II. (surnamed Parviz or Parvez, "the generous") reigned 590 or 591-628. He recovered the throne of his father Hormisdas IV. with the aid of the Byzantine emperor Maurice. After the murder of Maurice, Khusrâu made war upon the tyrant Phocas, conquering Mesopotamia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and Asia Minor, finally encamping at Chalcedon, opposite Constantinople. Heraclius saved the empire, recovering the lost provinces and carrying the war into Persia. Worn out, Khusrâu resolved in 628 to abdicate in favor of his son Merdaza; but Shirvan or Siroes, his eldest son, anticipating the design, put his father to death. No Persian king lived so splendidly as Khusrâu II.

Kickapoo (kik'â-pô). [Pl., also Kickapoos.] A tribe of North American Indians, formerly of the Ohio valley, and prominent in the history of the region to the end of the War of 1812. In 1852 many went to Texas and afterward to Mexico, and in 1873 some were brought back and settled in the Indian Territory. Their number at present (1894), both in the United States and Mexico, is estimated at 762. The name means "smooth," i. e. without rapids or obstructions, and is applied to rivers. See Algonquian.

Kidd (kid), Captain William. Born probably at Greenock, Scotland; hanged at Execution Dock, London, May 23, 1701. A notorious pirate. In 1695, on the recommendation of Robert Livingstone, a colonist, Richard Coote, earl of Bellmont, governor of Massachusetts Bay, placed Kidd in command of a privateer with a special commission to suppress piracy. Bellmont, Orford, Somers, Ronney, and Shrewsbury were to pay the greater part of the cost. His ship, the Adventure, sailed from Plymouth for New York, May, 1696, and from New York to Madagascar. It was soon reported, however, that Kidd had become a pirate himself, and when he returned to Boston, July, 1699, he was arrested. He pretended that he had been overpowered by his crew, and that acts of piracy had been committed against his will, and that other ships had been taken under French passes. He failed, however, to give a satisfactory account of the Queda Merchant, his last prize. Kidd and several of his crew were sent to England, and May, 1700, were tried at the Old Bailey and executed. A portion of the Queda Merchant's treasure was buried on Gardiner's Island, New York, and is popularly supposed never to have been recovered, but was removed by the colonial authorities in 1699.

Kieff (kê'ef), or Kiev (kê'ev). 1. A government of southwestern Russia, surrounded by the governments of Volhynia, Minsk, Tchernigoff, Pultowa, Kheron, and Podolia. The soil is fertile. Area, 19,691 square miles. Population (1890), 3,138,900.—2. The capital of the government of Kieff, situated on the Dnieper in lat. 50° 26' N., long. 30° 35' E. It is called the "mother city of Russia." The Cathedral of St. Sophia, founded in 1017 and restored in the 14th century after injury by the Tatars, was finally put in repair in 1850. It was originally a reproduction of St. Sophia at Constantinople on a scale of one fourth, and this original structure remains almost intact, but subsequent additions on all sides have made the church much larger. The plan is almost a square; the interior height is 731 feet; the height of the cross on the highest of the 7 domes, 154 feet. The main part of the interior is a Greek cross with arms 96 feet long and 26 wide. Nearly all the walls and arches are covered with mosaics on a gold ground, some of them Byzantine. The figure of the Virgin occupying the semi-dome of the chief apse is especially noteworthy. There are many curious frescos in the galleries and subsidiary parts of the church. There is a very fine old crypt. The Pecherskoi monastery (with its catacombs) and the university are also of interest. The city was the capital of the grand princes of Kieff; was sacked by the Mongols in 1240; passed later to Lithuania and Poland; and was annexed to Russia in the 17th century. Population (1893), 133,151.

Kieff (kê'ef), Grand Principality of. A grand principality of Russia in the middle ages. Under Oleg (about 900) the seat of the Varangian power was transferred to Kieff. After 1054 it was regarded as the head of the other Russian principalities. From the middle of the 12th century it lost its preeminence. It fell later to the Tatars and Lithuanians, and finally to Russia.

Kiel (kêl). A seaport in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, situated on Kiel harbor in lat. 54° 19' N., long. 10° 9' E. It is the chief German naval station in the Baltic, and the principal city of the province; has one of the finest harbors in Europe; and is the terminus of a canal to the North Sea, opened 1895. Docks and quays have been recently greatly developed. It has several art and other museums and a university. A peace was concluded here, Jan. 14, 1814, by which Denmark ceded Norway to Sweden and Helgoland to Great Britain, and received Swedish Pomerania and Rugen from Sweden. Population (1890), 63,172.

Kind-hart's Dream. A pamphlet written by Henry Chettle in 1592. In the preface is the first allusion to Shakspeare after that in Greene's "Groat-worth of Wit": "Because myselfe have seene his demenor no less civill than hee excellent in the qualite hee professes: besides divers of worship haue reported his vprightnes of dealing, which argues his honesty, and his factions grace in writing, that approves his art."

Kind Keeper, The. See Limberham.

King (king), Charles. Born at New York, March 16, 1789; died at Frascati, Italy, Sept. 27, 1867. An American journalist and educator, son of Rufus King; president of Columbia College 1849-1864.

King, Edward. Born at Cork, Nov. 16, 1795; died at Dublin, Feb. 27, 1837. An Irish writer on Mexican antiquities. He was a son of the third Earl of Kingston, and by courtesy had the title of Viscount Kingsborough. Most of his active life was devoted to his illustrated work "Antiquities of Mexico" (9 vols., and a portion of a 10th vol., imperial folio, London, 1830-48). In this he attempted to prove a Jewish migration to Mexico.

King, Francis S. Born in Maine in 1850. An American engraver, principally noted for wood-engraving. He was one of the organizers of the Society of American Wood-Engravers.

King, Philip Parker. Born at Norfolk Island, Dec. 13, 1793; died at Sydney, New South Wales, Feb., 1856. A British naval officer. From 1817 to 1822 he surveyed and charted the greater part of the north, northwest, and west coasts of Australia; and as commander of the Adventure was associated with Captain Fitzroy in surveying the southern coasts of South America, 1826-30. (See Fitzroy, Robert.) King published a narrative of his Australian survey, various charts and sailing directions of the regions surveyed by him, and contributed to Vol. I of the narrative of the voyage of the Adventure and Beagle. During the latter part of his life he resided at Sydney. He became rear-admiral on the retired list in 1855.

King, Rufus. Born at Scarborough, Maine, March 24, 1755; died at Jamaica, Long Island, N. Y., April 29, 1827. An American statesman and diplomatist. He was member of Congress from North Carolina 1811-16; United States senator from Alabama 1819-44; United States minister to France 1844-46; and United States senator from Alabama 1846-53. He was elected, as Democratic candidate, Vice-President in 1852, and took the oath of office at Havana in 1853.

King and No King, A. A play by Beaumont and Fletcher, licensed in 1611 and printed in 1619.

King Arthur. An epic poem by Bulwer Lytton, published in 1849.

King Arthur, or The British Worthy. A dramatic opera by Dryden, music by Purcell, performed and printed in 1691.

King Cole. A nursery rhyme: a legendary satire on King Cole, who reigned in Britain, as the old chroniclers inform us, in the 3d century after Christ. According to Robert of Gloucester, he was the father of St. Helena; and if so, Butler must be wrong in ascribing an obscure origin to the celebrated mother of Constantine. King Cole was a brave and popular man in his day, and ascended the throne of Britain amidst the acclamations of the people. Hallivell, Nursery Rhymes.

King Estmere. A ballad, preserved in Percy's "Reliques," relating the story of Estmere, king of England, who slew the Soudan of Spain and gained a wife.

Kingfisher (king'fish'ēr). A city in Kingfisher County, Oklahoma. Population (1890), 1,134.

King George's Sound. An excellent harbor at the southwestern corner of West Australia.

King George's War. In American history, the war waged by Great Britain and its American colonies against France and its Indian allies, being the American phase of the War of the Austrian Succession, 1741-48: so named from George II.

King Horn. An English "geste" of the 13th century. It is probably a translation from the French of "Horn and Rimenhild," written during the same century; but the original idea of the poem is much earlier. Morris.

King John, or Kyng Johan. A morality play with which is blended a historical play by John Bale, written probably about 1538.

King John. A historical play by Shakspeare, founded on "The Troublesome Reign of King John." It was written before 1598, and first printed in the 1623 folio.

King John, Troublesome Reign of. A play classed as a chronicle history. It is in two parts, partly prose and partly verse, probably acted in 1588 (Fleay), printed in 1591 (Ward), reprinted in 1611 as "by W. Sh.", and in 1622, after Shakspeare's death, as "by William Shakspeare." It is probably by Peele, with Lodge, Greene, and perhaps Marlowe.

Kinglake (king'lāk), Alexander William. Born Aug. 5, 1809; died Jan. 2, 1891. An English historian of the Crimean war. In 1844 he published "Eothen, or Traces of Travel Brought Home from the East." He went to Algiers in 1845. In 1854 he followed the army to the Crimea, and stayed until the siege of Sebastopol. The "Invasion of the Crimea" appeared in eight volumes between 1863 and 1867. He was member of Parliament 1857-68. In 1860 he vigorously denounced the annexation of Nice and Savoy.

King Lear. A tragedy by Shakspeare, written in 1606 and printed in 1608. "King Lear was probably on the stage when the old play of Leir on which it was founded was published." The latter is not tragical, and ends happily. "There can be no doubt that Shakspeare, who meant to pass off this old play as Shakspeare's." It was published as "The True Chronicle History of King Lear and his Three Daughters, etc., as it hath been divers and sundry times lately acted," and was last acted in 1594. Shakspeare's play was published as "Mr. William Shakspeare, His True Chronicle History, etc." The capital H is in thought to be intended to distinguish it from the older play. (Fleay.) Tate adapted Shakspeare's play in 1681, and Garrick produced "King Lear with restorations from Shakspeare" in 1756. The story of Lear was originally told by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and is to be found in Layamon's "Brut" and the "Gesta Romanorum." Hollishead repeats it, and Spenser gives it in the second book of the "Faerie Queene." The old ballad of "King Lear and his Three Daughters" is preserved by Percy. It is not certain whether it was written earlier or later than the play.

King-maker, The. A popular designation of the Earl of Warwick (1420-71), on account of his influence in securing the accession of Edward IV. and the restoration of Henry VI.

King of Bath, The. A nickname of Richard Nash.

King of Dunces. A name given to Colley Cibber in the "Dunciad."

King Philip's War. In American history, the war between the New England colonists and the confederated Indians (1675-76) under the lead of Philip, an Indian chief. King Philip was killed at Mount Hope, R. I.

King Pym. A nickname given to John Pym from his influence as a parliamentary leader.

King Richard. See Richard.

Kings, Books of. The eleventh and twelfth books of the Bible. In Hebrew manuscripts they are undivided, and form a continuous narrative of the Hebrew people from the later days of King David to the captivity of Judah in Babylon. The division into two books was first made in the Septuagint and retained in the Vulgate, in both of which they are named the third and fourth books of Kings (the two books of Samuel being the first and second); hence, in the English Bible, the double title "The first book of the Kings, commonly called the third book of the Kings," etc. The period embraces the reigns of all the kings of Israel and Judah, except San's and most of David's. The work was probably composed substantially before the end of the captivity, the compiler being supposed by some to have been a contemporary of Jeremiah. The authorship is uncertain.

Kingsborough, Viscount. See King, Edward.

King's College. A college of Cambridge University, founded in 1441 by Henry VI., and finished by Henry VII. and Henry VIII. The charter was granted July 10, 1443; the buildings were begun July 25, 1446. The great court is open toward the street, from which it is separated by a modern many-turreted gate and Perpendicular screen. On the west side stand the library and the provost's lodge. On the north side is the chapel, the boast of Cambridge, ranking as the finest example of ornate Perpendicular. It was built between 1446 and 1515. The great windows are filled with 16th-century glass; the fan-vaulting and the carved stalls are remarkable. The chapel measures 290 by 85 feet. The other buildings of the college are modern.

King's County. A county in Leinster, Ireland, bounded by Westmeath and Meath on the north, Kildare on the east, Queen's County on the south, Tipperary on the southwest, and Galway and Roscommon on the west. Area, 772 square miles. Population (1891), 65,563.

Kingsley (kingz'li), Charles. Born at Holne, Devonshire, June 12, 1819; died at Eversley, Hampshire, Jan. 23, 1875. An English clergyman and author. He studied at King's College, London, and then at Magdalene College, Cambridge. He became curate and later rector of Eversley, Hampshire, and in 1845 was made canon of Middleham. Kit-Cat Club, The. A London club which flourished, according to the generally accepted account, from 1703 to 1733. Its meetings were held at the "Cat and Fiddle," kept by Christopher Cat, a noted mutton-pieman, near Temple Bar. It was founded by members of the Whig party, and among its frequenters were Steele, Addison, Lord Orford, and others. Its name is thought to be derived from the name of the landlord of the tavern, though the "Spectator," No. 9, says it was from the name of the pies, which were called "kit-cats." The club occasionally met in summer at the house of Jacob Tonsou at Barn Elms, where a room was built for it, the walls of which were adorned with portraits of its members. As the ceiling was low, Sir Godfrey Kneller, who painted them, used a small canvas (36 by 28 inches), which has since gone by the name of kit-cat size.

The political significance of the Club was such that Walpole records that though the Club was generally mentioned as "a set of wits," they were in reality the patriots that saved Britain. Timbs, p. 52.

A German poet and officer (first in the Danish and then in the Prussian service). He was mortally wounded at Künersdorf (Aug. 12, 1759). His best-known poem is "Der Frühling" ("Spring," 1749).

Kleist (klīst), Heinrich Brühl Wilhelm von. Born at Frankfurt-on-the-Oder, Oct. 18, 1777; died at Waunensee, near Potsdam, Nov. 21, 1811. A German dramatist. He entered the army in 1795, but in 1799 left it to study at Frankfurt and Berlin. In 1801 he went to Paris, and afterward to Switzerland, where he again traveled in 1803. In 1804 he was given a subordinate government position at Königsberg, but resigned it after the disastrous battle of Jena. In 1807 he went to Dresden, and engaged there in editorial work on a newspaper. In 1809 he went to Prague, where he wrote as a pamphleteer against France in the war with Austria; but after the defeat of Wagram he returned to Berlin and again took up his work as a journalist. The first of his dramas, the tragedy "Die Familie Schroffenstein" ("The Family Schroffenstein"), appeared in 1803; "Amphitryon" in 1807; the tragedy "Penthesilea" in 1808; the chivalric drama "Kathchen von Heilbronn" in 1810; and the comedy "Der zerbrochene Krug" ("The Broken Jug") in 1811. He also wrote "Erzählungen" ("Tales," 1810-11), and a few lyrics. His fame is almost wholly posthumous. His literary efforts met with but little success during his life, and he at last not only became despondent, but was actually threatened with need. After first carrying out the promise he had made to a female friend, as morbid as himself, to kill her, he committed suicide when only 34 years old. Two dramas were published after his death: "Die Hermannsschlacht" ("The Battle of Hermann," i. e. Arminius), and "Der Prinz von Homburg" ("The Prince of Homburg"). "Robert Guiscard" is a fragment. His collected writings were first published at Berlin, 1826, in 3 vols.

Klönthal (klēn'täl). A valley in the canton of Glarus, Switzerland, west of Glarus.

Klopstock (klop'stok), Friedrich Gottlieb. Born at Quedlinburg, Prussia, July 2, 1724; died at Hamburg, March 14, 1803. A noted German poet. Before 1745, when he went to Jena to study theology, he had already conceived the plan of the religious epic afterward written as the "Messias" ("The Messiah"). In Leipzig, in 1748, he published anonymously, in the journal "Bremer Beiträge," the first three cantos of the poem. This same year he went as tutor to Langensalza. In 1750 he accepted the invitation of the poet and historian Bodmer to Zurich, but the succeeding year was summoned by the King of Denmark to Copenhagen, that he might there find the leisure to complete his poem. He remained there until 1771; went then to Hamburg; in 1775 was for a year in Karlsruhe; and then returned to Hamburg, where he subsequently lived. "The Messiah," a poem consisting of twenty cantos written in hexameters, did not appear in its complete form until 1773. "Geistliche Lieder" ("Religious Songs") appeared in 1758, and "Oden" ("odes") in 1771. He also wrote three dramas on biblical subjects: "Der Tod Adams" ("The Death of Adam," 1757), "Salomo" ("Solomon"), and "David" (1772). Three others were written on subjects from early national history: "Hermannsschlacht" ("The Battle of Hermann," i. e. Arminius, 1769), "Hermann und die Fürsten" ("Hermann and the Princes," 1784), "Hermanns Tod" ("Hermann's Death," 1787). The last three dramas were in prose interspersed with bardic choruses, so called, and were consequently named by him "Bardiete." Minor poems are the ode "An meine Freunde" ("To My Friends," 1747), later changed to "Wingolf," addressed to the poets of the Saxon school; the "Kriegslied" ("War Song"), written in 1749 in honor of Frederick the Great; and the ode "Hermann und Thunhelda," written in 1752. His principal prose work is "Die Gelehrtenrepublik" ("The Scholars' Republic," 1744), an art of poetry from his own standpoint. His complete works appeared (Leipzig, 1844-45) in 11 vols.

Klosterneuburg (klōs-ter-noi'börg). A town in Lower Austria, 6 miles north-northwest of Vienna. Population (1890), commune, 8,988.

He was educated at Eton and Oxford, and was Liberal member of Parliament for Sandhurst from 1857 till 1870, when he was raised to the peerage. He joined the Conservative party in 1885. He wrote "Crackers for Christmas" (1870), "Higgledy-Piggledy" (1875), and numerous other books for children.

Knaus (knous), Ludwig. Born at Wiesbaden, Prussia, Oct. 5, 1829. A noted German geure-painter, one of the leaders of the younger Düsseldorf school. He was a pupil of Sohn and Schadow at Düsseldorf 1846-52, studied in Paris till 1860, and was professor at the Berlin Academy from 1874 to 1884. He received first-class medals in 1855, 1857, and 1859, and a medal of honor in 1867.

Knebel (knä'bel), Karl Ludwig von. Born at Wallenstein, Bavaria, Nov. 30, 1744; died at Jena, Germany, Feb. 23, 1834. A German author, best known as a friend of Goethe.

Knecht Ruprecht (knēcht rō'precht). [G., 'Knight Rupert.'] The German genius of Christmas, corresponding to St. Nicholas, or Santa Claus. In some parts of Germany he is supposed to appear just previous to Christmas, with a bag on his back and a rod in his hand, to inquire into the conduct of the children, whom he rewards or punishes according to their deserts. The actual dispenser of gifts on Christmas Eve is, however, the Christ-child.

Kneller (nēl'ēr), Sir Godfrey (Gottfried Kneller). Born at Lübeck, Germany, Aug. 8, 1646; died at London, Oct. 19, 1723. A German-English portrait-painter. His father was a portrait-painter of Lübeck. Godfrey was sent to Leyden to study mathematics and fortification. He abandoned the career of a soldier and entered the atelier of Ferdinand Bol at Amsterdam, receiving probably some instruction from Rembrandt. In 1672 he went to Italy; from Italy he went to Hamburg. In 1675 he found his way to England, and to the patronage of Mr. Vernon, secretary to the Duke of Monmouth, and later to that of the duke himself, whose portrait he painted, and who recommended him to Charles II. For Charles he painted the portrait of Louis XIV. in Paris. He succeeded to the patronage of James II., William III., and Anne, and was knighted March 3, 1691. Some of his best portraits are in the series of admirals. He was contemporary and rival of Sir Peter Lely. He painted the portraits of ten reigning sovereigns.

Knep. See Knipp.

Knickerbocker's History of New York. A burlesque history of New York, by Washington Irving, published in 1809. This he wrote under the name of Diedrich Knickerbocker.

Knight (nit), Charles. Born at Windsor, England, March 15, 1791; died at Addlestone, Surrey, England, March 9, 1873. An English publisher and author. His chief work is a "Popular History of England" (3 vols. 1856-62). He edited "The Penny Magazine" (1832-45), "The Penny Cyclopædia" (1833-44), "The Pictorial Shakespeare" (1841), "The English Cyclopædia," etc.

Knight, James. Died at Marble Island, Hudson Bay, about 1719. An English explorer, and agent of the Hudson Bay Company. He was governor of Fort Albany in 1673, and of the Nelson River settlement in 1714. In 1718 he built the Prince of Wales Fort at the mouth of Churchill River. In June, 1719, he sailed with two of the company's fleets to discover the fabled Straits of Anian, and to search for gold. The expedition did not return, and a searching party in 1722 failed to find any trace of it. The wreck of the ships was discovered at Marble Island by a whaling party in 1767. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Knight, Joseph Philip. Born at Bradford-on-Avon, July 26, 1812; died at Yarmouth, 1887. An English composer of songs, including "Rocked in the Cradle of the Deep," etc.

Knight, Richard Payne. Born near Ludlow, Herefordshire, 1750; died at London, April 23, 1824. An English numismatist and archaeologist. About 1767 he went to Italy, and again in 1777 with Philip Hackert, a German painter, and Charles Gore. In his biography of Hackert, Goethe translated Knight's diary as the "Tagebuch einer Reise nach Sicilien." He was again in Italy in 1785, associated with Sir William Hamilton, British ambassador at Naples, and began his collection of bronzes with Fox. He wrote "An Account of the Remains of the Worship of Priapus lately existing in Isernia" (1786), "An Analytical Essay on the Greek Alphabet," "An Inquiry into the Symbolical Language of Ancient Art and Mythology," etc. He bequeathed to the British Museum his collection of bronzes, coins, gems, marbles, and drawings.

Knight of La Mancha. Don Quixote de la Mancha.

Knight of Malta, The. A play by Fletcher, Massinger, and another, produced before 1619, and printed in 1647.

Knight of the Burning Pestle, The. A mock-heroic drama by Beaumont and Fletcher, published anonymously in 1613. It was intended to satirize such plays as Heywood's "Four Prentices of London," in which extravagantly chivalric and knightly language was put into the mouths of the middle class. It was doubtless suggested by "Don Quixote."

Knight of the Rueful Countenance. Don Quixote: so called by Sancho Panza.

Knight of the Swan. See Swan and Lohengrin.

Knights (nits), The. A comedy of Aristophanes, exhibited in 424 B. C.

The play ["Knights"] personifies the Athenian Demos as an easy-going, dull-witted old man, with Nikias, Demosthenes, and Cleon among his slaves, among whom the latter has attained a tyrannical ascendancy by alternate bullying his fellows and flattering his master. By the advice of oracles, which play a great part all through the play, and which imply an earnest faith in religion among the Athenian people of that day, the former two persuade a low sausage-seller (Agoracritus) to undertake the task of supplanting Cleon. He is assisted by the chorus of Knights, who are determined enemies of Cleon, and who come in to defend their friends, and attack the demagogue, in their famous parabasis. The greater part of the remainder is occupied with the brazen attempts of both demagogues to out-bully one another, and to devise bribes and promises to gain Demos' favour. At last Agoracritus prevails and retires with Demos, whom he presently reproduces, apparently by eucyclema, sitting crowned, and in his right mind, heartily ashamed of his former follies.

Mahaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I. 442.

Knights, The. A comedy by Foote, produced in 1749, printed in 1754, in which he played Hartop.

Knightsbridge (nits'brij). 1. In old London, the bridge across the Tyburn, by which the old Reading road passed: so called from the manor of Neyte, near Kensington. W. J. Loftie, Westminster Abbey.—2. In modern London, the street which forms the southern boundary of Hyde Park. The cavalry barracks are here, near Rutland Gate.

Knights of the Golden Circle. A former secret order in the United States, in sympathy with the Secessionists.

Knight's Tale of Palamon and Arcite, The. One of Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." It is a recasting by Chaucer of his version of Boccaccio's "Teseida," which he made before he wrote the "Legend of Good Women."

The "Knight's Tale," in particular, naturally attracted the attention of the dramatists of the Elizabethan age, who were always on the lookout for suitable material. Upon it was founded an early play called "Palamon and Arcite" that has not come down. It was the work of Richard Edwards, and was produced in 1566 at Oxford University before Queen Elizabeth. A play with this title is also recorded by Henslowe under the year 1594 as having been acted four times. From the same tale also was avowedly taken the drama called "The Two Noble Kinsmen," which, when first printed in 1634, had on its title-page as authors the names of Shakespeare and Fletcher. Whether either had anything to do with it is still a debated question. Lounsbury, Chaucer, III. 68.

Knight's Vision, The. An allegorical painting by Raphael, in the National Gallery, London. In the foreground a youth sleeps, resting on his shield. Beside him stand two girls: one, personifying fame, holding out a sword and a book; and the other, representing pleasure, extending a myrtle-blossom. The background is occupied with rocks, hills, and towers. The work is of Raphael's youth, admirable in conception and execution.

Knin (knēn). A town in Dalmatia, Austria-Hungary, on the Kerka 26 miles northeast of Sebenico. Population (1890), commune, 21,077.

Knipp (nip), or Knep (nep), Mrs. Flourished about 1670. An English actress. She probably first appeared as Epieene in Ben Jonson's "Silent Woman" in 1664, and what is known of her is principally from the entries in Pepys's "Diary." She disappears from the bills in 1678.

Mrs. Knipp (or Knep) . . . was a pretty creature, with a sweet voice, a mad humour, and an ill-looking, moody, jealous husband, who vexed the soul and bruised the body of his sprightly, sweet-toned, and wayward wife. Excellent company she was found by Pepys and his friends, whatever her horse-jockey of a husband may have thought of her, or Mrs. Pepys of the philandering of her own husband with the mix, whom she did not hesitate to pronounce a "wench," and whom Pepys himself speaks of affectionately as a "jade" he was always glad to see. Doran, Eng. Stage, I. 59.

Knipperdolling (knip'per-dol-ling), Bernhard. Beheaded at Münster, Prussia, Jan. 23, 1536. A German Anabaptist, stadtholder of Münster 1534-35, and supporter of the revolutionary acts of John of Leyden.

Knobelsdorf (knō'bels-dorf), Baron Hans Georg Wenzelslaus von. Born near Krossen, Prussia, Feb. 17, 1699; died at Berlin, Sept. 16, 1753. A German architect. He planned the castle of Sans Souci, Potsdam; the opera-house, Berlin; etc.

Knobnoses. See Gwamba.

Knolles (nōlz), Richard. Born probably at Cold Ashby, Northamptonshire, about 1550; died at Sandwich, Kent, 1610. An English historian of the Turks. He graduated at Oxford in 1565, and became master of the Sandwich grammar-school. His chief work is a "General Historie of the Turkes from the first beginning of that Nation" (1603).

Knollys (nōlz), Sir Francis. Born about 1514; died July 19, 1596. An English statesman. In 1542 he entered Parliament for Iffsham. In Dec., 1558, he was admitted to the privy council by Elizabeth; later he was made vice-chamberlain of the household; and in May, 1568, with Henry Scrope, was charged with the care of the fugitive Mary Stuart at Carlisle Castle. In July he removed her to Bolton Castle, Lord Scrope's seat.

Knollys, or Knolles, Sir Robert. Born in Cheshire about 1317; died at Sealthorpe, Aug. 15, 1407. An English soldier. He was one of the principal leaders of the companies of free lances, and in 1358 commanded the "Great Company" in Normandy. In 1359 he made a raid into Auvergne and threatened Avignon and the Pope (Innocent VI.). He continued his devastations in France until 1367, when he joined the Black Prince's Spanish expedition with his "Great Company." In 1369 he again joined the Black Prince in Aquitaine. In 1370 he commanded Edward III.'s expedition to Calais, ravaged Artois, Picardy, and Vermandois, and on Sept. 24 drew up in order of battle between Villieuif and Paris. Charles V. refused to fight, and Knollys retired into Normandy, where he lost a part of his army and was obliged to return to England. In Wat Tyler's insurrection, June, 1381, Knollys was placed in command of the forces of the city of London, and rode out with Richard II. to the interview at Smithfield.

Knosus. See Cnosus.

Knowell (nō'wel), The Elder. In Jonson's comedy "Every Man in his Humour," a sententious old gentleman. His humor is a strained solicitude for his son's morals. This character is said to have been played by Shakspeare.

Knowles (nōlz), James. Born 1831. An English architect and editor. He edited the "Contemporary Review" 1870-77, and the "Nineteenth Century" from 1877.

Knowles, James Sheridan. Born at Cork, Ireland, May 12, 1784; died at Torquay, England, Nov. 30, 1862. A British playwright. His father, James Knowles, and Richard Brinsley Sheridan were first cousins. He served in the militia, studied medicine, went on the stage, and taught school at Glasgow before his first play ("Caius Gracchus") was produced in 1815. In 1830 he left Glasgow and settled near Edinburgh. In 1834 he visited the United States. Until 1843 he continued to act at intervals both in his own plays and others. He also lectured, and in 1844 became a Baptist and preached at Exeter Hall and in other places sermons against Roman Catholicism, Cardinal Wiseman, etc. Among his chief plays are "Caius Gracchus" (1815), "Virginus" (1820), "William Tell" (1825), "Alfred the Great" (1831), "The Hunchback" (1832), "The Wife, etc." (1833), "The Beggar of Bethnal Green" (1834; abridged from "The Beggar's Daughter of Bethnal Green," 1828), "The Love Chase" (1837), "Love" (1839), "John of Procida, etc." (1840), etc. He also wrote a number of poems and tales, and adapted several plays, besides publishing his lectures on various subjects.

Knox (noks), Henry. Born at Boston, July 25, 1750; died at Thomaston, Maine, Oct. 25, 1806. An American general, distinguished as an artillery general in the Revolution: secretary of war 1785-95.

Knox, John. Born at Haddington, 1505; died at Edinburgh, Nov. 24, 1572. A celebrated Scottish reformer, statesman, and writer. In 1522 he entered Glasgow University, but does not appear to have graduated. He studied law and acted as notary at Haddington. In 1544 he became tutor to Francis and John, sons of Hugh Douglas of Longfildy, and Alexander Cockburn, eldest son of the Laird of Ormonist. At this time George Wishart, a Lutheran, sought asylum in the houses of Douglas, Cockburn, and Crichton, and exercised a powerful influence on Knox for heresy. His death was avenged by the murder of Cardinal Beaton May 29. Knox took refuge in April, 1547, with his pupils, in the castle of St. Andrews; was urged to become a preacher; and accepted a "call" from the congregation there. On July 31, 1547, St. Andrews capitulated to the French, and Knox was imprisoned in the galleys until Feb., 1549, when he was released and went to England. For two years he preached at Berwick. In 1550 he removed to Newcastle, and in 1551 was made one of the six royal chaplains. As such he assisted in the revision of the second prayer-book of Edward VI., issued Nov. 1, 1552. On the accession of Mary Tudor, Knox fled to Dieppe, and in 1554 visited Calvin at Geneva and Bullinger at Zurich. In Nov., 1554, he became pastor of the English congregation at Frankfurt-on-the-Main, but soon was forced to return to Geneva. In 1555 he returned to Berwick, and in the winter traveled about Scotland preaching and writing. On May 15, 1556, he was summoned by the bishops to appear at the Blackfriars Kirk in Edinburgh.

He came with so powerful a following that the prosecution was abandoned. He returned to Geneva in the summer of 1556. In 1558 he published the first and second "Blasts of the Trumpet Against the Mohnstrout Regiment of Women," which, originally directed against Mary of Guise, regent of Scotland, Mary, queen of England, and Catharine de' Medici, were destined to complicate his dealings with Elizabeth and Mary Stuart. Knox returned to Edinburgh in 1559. The regent Mary had at this time renewed her persecution of the Reformation; a riot occurred at Perth, where Knox was preaching; and the struggle began which ended in the deposition of the regent by the Convention in Edinburgh, Oct. 21, 1559, and her death June 10, 1560. On Aug. 17, 1560, his "Confession of Faith" was adopted without change, and Roman Catholicism was abolished by the Parliament. Francis II. of France, the husband of Mary Queen of Scots, having died Dec. 5, 1560, she returned to Scotland Aug. 19, 1561; and in the struggle between her Roman Catholic sympathies and the Protestantism of her people Knox had frequent dramatic encounters with her. He was, however, mainly occupied with the organization of the Presbyterian Church in Scotland. His works, of which the chief is his "Historie of the Reformation of Religion within the Realme of Scotland," collected and edited by David Laing, were published in 6 volumes in 1864.

Konde (kon'de), or Makonde (mā-kon'de). A Bantu tribe of Portuguese East Africa, on the Rovuma River. They tattoo themselves, and the women disfigure themselves by wearing the peble, a piece of wood stuck in the enormously distended upper lip. Their neighbors, the Mavia and Matambwe, speak dialects so closely allied to Konde that all three must be considered as dialectic variations of one language.

Kong (kong). A highland in West Africa, back of the Grain, Ivory, and Gold coasts. It was largely included in a French protectorate in 1889. The Kong Mountains of former maps are in reality a high plateau.

Kongo, or Congo (kong'gō), Pg. Zaire (zā-ē're), called by Stanley the Livingstone. A river of central Africa. It rises as the Luapula in the highland separating the basins of Lakes Tanganyika and Nyassa (about lat. 10° S.), rounds Lake Bangweolo on the south, flows northward through Lake Moero to Lake Lanji, and there receives the Lukuga as an affluent from Tanganyika. The united stream, now known as the Luabala, flows northward to Stanley Falls, beyond the equator, whence to the sea, over its main course, it is called the Kongo. It discharges into the Atlantic Ocean in lat. 6° S., about 240 miles southwest of Stanley Pool. It is navigable by ocean steamers from its mouth to Matadi (110 miles) and by river steamers from Stanley Pool to Stanley Falls. These two navigable sections are being connected by a railroad. It is second in volume to the Amazon, and is, among African rivers, next to the Nile in length. Its chief tributaries are the Aruwimi, Mobangi, and Kassai. It has been explored by Cameron, Livingstone, Stanley, and others. Length, estimated, about 3,000 miles.

Kongo, French, F. Congo Français (kōn-gō'frān-sā'). The official name, since 1891, of the French possessions between the Kongo and the Atlantic, lying south of the German territory of Kamerun. Previously they were called Gaboon, Gabon, or Gabonie, and Ouest Africain. The area is about 250,000 square miles, the population about 3,000,000. The country is fertile, but mostly insubstantial. The coast was discovered by the Portuguese in the 15th century, and held by them for a long period. In 1842 the French established their first trading-post on the Gaboon River, and extended their authority, in 1862, to Cape Lopez and the Ogowe River. When Stanley revealed the course of the Kongo, S. de Brazza connected the colony of Gaboon with Stanley Pool and annexed large tracts of country. The claims of France were recognized by the Berlin Conference in 1885. By an agreement made with Germany in 1894, French Congo extends behind the Kamerun northward to Lake Chad.

Kongo Free State, or Kongo Independent State, or Kongo State: official name, Etat Indépendant du Congo. A state in western Africa, recognized and defined by the conference of European powers at Berlin in 1885. It lies mostly on the left bank of the lower Kongo and the Mohangi, extending to the northeastern watershed of the Kongo basin, eastward to long. 30° E., and southward, mainly on that meridian, to about lat. 13° S. It is the successor of the International African Association, founded by Leopold II., and organized by Stanley. This company established stations, annexed lands, hoisted its own flag, which was first recognized by the United States, and became so aggressive as to conflict with Portugal, France, and England. The Berlin Conference constituted (Feb. 26, 1885) the Kongo State, with Leopold II. as sovereign. The conditions under which it received most of the Kongo basin as its sphere of influence were that all nations and religions should have equal privileges within its borders, and that free trade should prevail. The latter clause was modified by the Brussels conferences of 1890 so as to enable the Kongo State and other countries concerned in the Kongo Free Trade Basin to levy certain import duties. By will, dated Aug. 2, 1889, Leopold II. bequeathed to Belgium all his sovereign rights, and by the convention of July 3, 1890, he gave Belgium the right to annex the Kongo State after a period of 10 years. Government is in the hands of an administrator at Boma and of bureaus at Brussels, under the supervision of the King of the Belgians. The chief exports are ivory, rubber, nuts, coffee, palm oil. The principal state stations are Boma (the capital), Matadi, Leopoldville, Equator, Bangala, Stanley Falls, and Lunenburg. Estimated area, 900,000 square miles. Population, 14,000,000.

Kongo Nation. A great Bantu nation of West Africa, occupying both banks of the lower Kongo River. In its widest sense it consists of all the tribes between the Nyanga River, the upper Ogowe, Stanley Pool, the Kuango, and the mouth of the Lufuni (Lufine) River, south of Ambriz. The tribes north of the Kongo River speak dialects of the Kongo language, the principal being those of Loango, Kakongo, and Ngoio; and their beliefs, customs, industries, and physical appearance show a common origin; but at the time of the Portuguese discovery, in 1484, their allegiance to the King of Kongo had already become merely traditional. The Kongo Nation, in the strict sense, was and is composed of the tribes (called duchies and counties) of Mbamba, Sundi, Pango, Sonho, Batta, and Pemba, which to this day recognize the sovereignty of the King of Kongo, although they are practically independent of his control. At the time of the discovery, the nation of Angola, ethnically and linguistically distinct from that of Kongo, though related, still acknowledged a dependence upon that of Kongo. The decadence of this great kingdom was temporarily stemmed by the friendship of the Portuguese and the nominal adoption of Christianity, which gave a new luster and prestige to the court of Kongo. But the relapse into heathenism, constant civil wars, and the suicidal exportation of slaves to America undermined the kingdom so thoroughly that in 1847 one of the royal pretenders was installed by the help of Portuguese arms, and virtually accepted a sort of protectorate. By the act of the Berlin Conference, 1885, Portugal was allowed to occupy and hold most of the Kongo proper and Ngoio (Cabinda), while most of the tribes of Kongo stock dwelling north of the Kongo River were allotted to France, and the northern margin of the river to the Kongo State. The King of Kongo has become a Portuguese vassal, and his kingdom has been organized as a district of Angola. The capital of the district is Cahinda; that of the native kingdom is San Salvador. The Kongo State, holding only a trifling portion of the old kingdom of Kongo, is in no wise its successor. The Kongo language, called Kishi-kongo in the court dialect, and Ki-kongo in the river dialect, is purely Bantu, and closely related to (though distinct from) Kimbundu, the language of Angola. Owing to the growing missionary literature, the use of Ki-kongo is extending far into the Kongo State, and it bids fair to become one of the great literary languages of Africa. The dialects correspond to the tribes enumerated above, to which might be added Hungu.

Koran (kô'ran or kô-rân'). [Also rarely Coran, Quran, formerly also Core; with the Ar. article, Alkoran, Alcoran; = Turk. Pers. qurân, from Ar. quran, qoran, book, reading, from qará, read.] The sacred book of the Mohammedans. It is the most important foundation on which the Mohammedan religion rests, and it is held in the highest veneration by all sects in the Mohammedan Church. When being read it must be kept on a stand elevated above the floor. No one may read it or touch it without first making a legal ablution. It is written in the Arabic language, and its style is considered a model. The substance of the Koran is held to be uncreated and eternal. Mohammed was merely the person to whom the work was revealed. At first the Koran was not written, but entirely committed to memory. But when a great many of the best Koran reciters had been killed in battle, Omar suggested to Abu-Bekr (the successor of Mohammed) that it should be written down. Abu-Bekr accordingly commanded Zeid, an amanensis of the prophet, to commit it to writing. This was the authorized text until 23 years after the death of the prophet. A number of variant readings had, however, crept into use. By order of the calif Osman in the year 30 of the Hejira, Zeid and three assistants made a careful revision which was adopted as the standard, and all the other copies were ordered to be burned. The Koran consists of 114 suras or divisions. These are not numbered, but each one has a separate name. They are not arranged in historical order. These suras purport to be the addresses delivered by Mohammed during his career at Mecca and Medina. As a general rule the shorter suras, which contain the theology of Islam, belong to the Meccan period; while the longer ones, relating to social duties and relationships, to Medina. The Koran is largely drawn from Jewish and Christian sources, the former prevailing. Moses and Jesus are reckoned among the prophets. The biblical narratives are interwoven with rabbinical legends. The customs of the Jews are made to conform to those of the Arabians. Mohammedan theology consists in the study of the Koran and its commentaries. A very fine collection of Korans, including one in Urdu (the old Arabic character), is to be found in the Khedival Library at Cairo, Egypt.

Kremlin (krem'lin). [From F. kremlin (with accom. F. term. -in) = G. kremil, from Russ. kremil, a citadel, fortress.] The citadel of Moscow, Russia. It is a highly picturesque and interesting triangular inclosure, about 1½ miles in circuit, fortified with battlemented walls from which project cylindrical and square towers, many of them terminating in spires behind which rise the multifarious domes and bell-towers of the churches, brilliant with gold and colors. The present walls date from 1492. The Kremlin contains the imperial palace, the cathedrals of the Assumption, the Archangel Michael, and the Annunciation, the Miracle monastery, the Ascension convent, the arsenal, and the famous Great Hall. The Great Palace dates for the most part only from the middle of the present century, its predecessors having repeatedly been burned, the last one by the soldiers of Napoleon. It is a lofty structure of little architectural quality without, except for its great size, but of unusual richness within. Among the state apartments are the hall of St. George, the Alexander hall, the hall of St. Andrew, and the throne-room, all splendidly adorned with paintings, sculptures, and other works of art, all 68 feet wide, ranging from 100 to 200 feet long, and from 58 to 68 high. Several of the chapels also are noteworthy, as well as the Red Staircase, used only for grand functions and recalling many historic scenes from Ivan the Terrible and Peter the Great to Napoleon. The Treasury is extremely rich in ancient jewels and plate, including the old regalia: here also are the thrones of the last emperor of Constantinople and of the old Persian shahs, and the coronation-robos.

Krishna (krish'nä). ['The black.'] A Hindu deity. Originally the ethnic god of some powerful confederation of Rajput clans, by fusion with the Vishnu of the older theology Krishna becomes one of the chief divinities of Hinduism. He is indeed an avatar of Vishnu, or Vishnu himself. In his physical character mingle myths of fire, lightning, and storm, of heaven and the sun. In the epic he is a hero invincible in war and love, brave, but above all crafty. He was the son of Vasudeva and Devaki, and born at Mathura, on the Yamuna, between Delhi and Agra, among the Vadavas. Like that of many solar heroes, his birth was beset with peril. On the night when it took place, his parents had to remove him from the reach of his uncle, King Kansa, who sought his life because he had been warned by a voice from heaven that the eighth son of Devaki would kill him, and who had regularly made away with his nephews at their birth. Conveyed across the Yamuna, Krishna was brought up as their son by the shepherd Nanda and his wife Ya-hoda, together with his brother Balarama, 'Rama the strong,' who had been likewise saved from massacre. The two brothers grew up among the shepherds, slaying monsters and demons and sporting with the Gopis, the female cowherds of Vrindavana. Their birth and infancy, their juvenile exploits, and their erotic gambols with the Gopis became in time the essential portion of the legend of Krishna, and their scenes are to-day the most celebrated centers of his worship. When grown, the brothers put their uncle Kansa to death, and Krishna became king of the Yadavas. He cleared the land of monsters, warred against impious kings, and took part in the war of the sons of Pandu against those of Dhritarashtra, as described in the Mahabharata. He transferred his capital to Dvaraka ('the city of gates'), the gates of the West, since localized in Gujarat. There he and his race were overtaken by the final catastrophe. After seeing his brother slain, and the Yadavs kill each other to the last man, he himself perished, wounded in the heel, like Achilles, by the arrow of a hunter. The bible of the worshippers of Vishnu in his most popular manifestation, that of Krishna, consists of the Bhagavatapurana and the Bhagavadgita. See these words.

Kyd (kid), Thomas. Lived in the latter half of the 16th century. An English dramatist. He wrote usually on bloodcurdling subjects, and is best known by his two plays, "The First Part of Hieronimo or Hieronimo, etc.," published in 1605, and "The Spanish Tragedy" (licensed 1592, printed 1599 and 1602), written after the other, though purporting to precede it. He also translated Garnier's "Pompey the Great," known as "Cornelia," and wrote "Soliman and Perseda," etc. He is said to have died in poverty in 1595.

The well-known epithet of Jonson, "sporting" Kyd, seems to have been either a mere play on the poet's name, or else a lucus a non lucendo; for both "Hieronimo" and its sequel are in the glastliest and bloodiest vein of tragedy, and "Cornelia" is a model of stately dullness.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 74.

Labyrinth (lab'i-rinth). [L. labyrinthus, from Gr. λαβύρινθος.] A maze; especially, a subterranean structure having many intricate passages. Several such mazes were famous in antiquity. The greatest was that which lay near Lake Moeris, in the Fayum, Egypt, and was probably built by Amenemhat III. (about 2300 B. C.). According to Herodotus, it had 3,000 halls and chambers, half of them above ground and half below, and 12 covered courts. Only fragments of it remain. (See the extract below.) Another famous labyrinth (that of Crete) was fabled to have been built for King Minos by Dædalus, on the model of the Egyptian, but very much smaller. Its real existence is doubted. There also was one on the island of Lemnos and one on Samos.

This platform, which measures one thousand feet in length by eight hundred in breadth, represents the site of the Labyrinth—that famous building of which it was said by Herodotus that it was "larger than all the temples of Greece put together, and more wonderful than the pyramids." The Labyrinth was utterly destroyed by order of the Roman Government some seventeen or eighteen centuries ago, and all that remains of its former magnificence is this platform, beaped six feet deep with tins and tens of thousands of tons of limestone and granite chips. This tremendous destruction was undoubtedly wrought by order of the Roman Government, and the people who smashed up and quarried out the most splendid building of the ancient world lived in that little town on the southwest corner of the platform. As they went on clearing the site they made use of it for a cemetery; and so, in course of time, the last vestiges of the labyrinth disappeared, and the place thereof became a city of the dead. It was this cemetery which Mr. Petrie explored during the seasons of 1837-88 and 1888-89; and it was here that he discovered the extraordinary series of portraits, some of which are here reproduced from his original photographs.

Lady Hideous (lä'di hid'ē-us). See the extract.

On his [Perceval's] arrival he takes vengeance on the seneschal Kreuz, and accompanies Arthur to Carlon, where that prince holds a full court. During his stay there, he one day sees Lady Hideous pass, who loads him with her maledictions. Her neck and hands, says the romance, were brown as iron, which was the least part of her ugliness; her eyes were blacker than a Moor's, and as little as those of a mouse; she had the nose of a cat or an ape, and lips like an ox; her teeth were red, like the yolk of eggs; she was bearded like a goat, was lumped before and behind, and had both legs twisted. This paragon makes her excuses to King Arthur for not tarrying at his court as she had a long journey before her, but points out a castle where 570 knights, each with his lady, were detained in captivity. Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, 1. 177.

Laila (li'lâ) and Majnun (mej-nôn'). A heroine and hero of Arab romance, whose story has been versified by several Persian poets, notably by Nizami (1141-1202). Kais (called Majnun, 'mad,' after his love cost him his reason) was the son of a proud chief; Laila, a member of a humble tribe. Chancing to see Laila, Kais loved her and sought her in a search in which he became mad. His father at last discovered the stronghold of Laila's father, and asked her hand for his son; but the father refused to wed his daughter to a madman. Laila goes forth hoping to encounter Majnun wandering in search of her, and is seen by a prince, Ibn Salam, whom her father compels her to wed. Laila is imprisoned by Ibn Salam, but escapes and meets Majnun in the desert. Not able now to make her his wife, he sends her back. She dies of grief, and Majnun also a little later at her grave. Majnun is buried beside her. Zaid, Laila's faithful friend, sees a vision of the lovers happy in paradise.

Lakshmana (lâksh'ma-nâ). [Skt., 'having lucky marks'; from lakshman, mark, sign.] In Hindu mythology, son of Dasharatha by Sumitra, and twin brother of Shatrughna and half-brother and special friend of Rama. One eighth of Vishnu's divinity was manifest in him. A fierce war resulted from the mutilation by Lakshmana of Shurpanakha, Ravana's sister, who had attacked Sita on being repulsed by both Rama and Lakshmana. When Sita was carried off by Ravana, Lakshmana accompanied Rama in the search for her. He broke in upon Rama's interview with Kala, or Time, to save him from the curse of Durvasas, knowing that it would be fatal to do so. When he then retired, resigned, to the river Sharayu, the gods showered flowers upon him and bore him to heaven.

Lakshmi (lâksh'mê). [Skt., 'mark,' 'sign'; with or without pâpi, 'bad,' 'a bad sign,' 'misfortune'; in the older language usually with panya, 'prosperous,' 'a good sign,' 'good fortune,' and then personified.] In Hindu mythology, the goddess of fortune, wife of Vishnu and mother of Kama. The Ramayana describes her as springing like Aphrodite from the foam of the ocean when she was churned by the gods and Asuras. (See Kurma Avatar.) She appeared in full beauty with a lotus in her hand. Another legend represents her as floating on a lotus flower at the creation. She is said to have four arms, typifying her bounty, but is generally depicted with only two, as the type of beauty, and holding a lotus. The theory of incarnation identifies her with the wives respectively of Parashurama, Ramaachandra, and Krishna.

Lamartine (lâ-mâr-tên'), Alphonse Marie Louis. Born at Mâcon, Oct. 21, 1790; died at Paris, March 1, 1869. A celebrated French poet. Standing midway between the ages of classical and Romantic literature, Lamartine combined a modern spirit with the old form of expression. He ranks with Victor Hugo and Alfred de Musset among the foremost poets of the 19th century. At the age of twenty he was sent to foreign countries to complete his education. During a great part of the time he was away he lived in Italy. Lamartine's first work "Méditations poétiques" (1820) was epoch-making in the history of the new Romantic school. Its success was immediate; it went rapidly through thirty editions. The elegy "Lelae" is one of the most perfect compositions of its kind in French literature. Further poetic writings are "Les nouvelles méditations" (1823), "La mort de Socrate" (1823), "Dernier chant du pèlerinage de Childe Harold" (1825), "Harmonies poétiques et religieuses" (1830), "Jocelyn" (1836), "La chute d'un ange" (1838), "Recueils poétiques" (1839). In prose Lamartine wrote "Le voyage en Orient" (1835), "Histoire des Girondins" (1847), "Histoire de la révolution de février" (1849), "Graziella" (1852), "Histoire de la restauration" (1851-63), and many other works, remarkable at least for their style. He was intimately connected with the political life of his day, and attained great success as an orator. He was minister of foreign affairs in the provisional government of 1848. He was received into the French Academy in 1830.

In 1805 she married William Lamb (afterward Lord Melbourne), from whom she was separated in 1825. She was involved in intrigues with Byron, who left her in 1813. She wrote "Glenarvon" (1816), which contained a caricature of Byron, "A New Canto" (1819), "Graham Hamilton" (1822), "Ada Reis: a Tale" (1823).

Lamb, Charles. Born in Crown Office Row, in the Temple, London, Feb. 10, 1775; died at Edmonton, Dec. 27, 1834. A noted English man of letters, critic, and humorist. His father, John Lamb, was engaged in his youth in domestic service, and became the clerk of a butcher of the Inner Temple. In 1783 Charles entered Christ's Hospital (Blue-coat School), where he remained until Nov., 1789. Samuel Taylor Coleridge was a fellow pupil and lifelong friend. In 1789 Lamb became a clerk in the South Sea House, and in 1792 in the India House. The Lambs left the Temple, and in 1796 lodged in Little Queen street, Holborn. In 1796 Mary Lamb killed her mother in a fit of temporary insanity, and was placed under the guardianship of her brother Charles (her father being almost imbecile), who cared for her during the rest of his life. In 1796 Coleridge published in "Poems on Various Subjects" four sonnets by Charles Lamb. To a second edition in 1797 Coleridge added poems by Charles Lamb and Charles Lloyd. In 1798 was published a little volume of blank verse by Charles Lamb and Charles Lloyd, and later a "Tale of Rosamund Gray and Old Blind Margaret." In 1802 appeared "John Woodvil," a play, showing the influence of Beaumont and Fletcher and the writers of that period. "Mr. H.," a two-act farce, was produced at Drury Lane Dec. 10, 1805, and hopelessly damned. His first success was in "Tales from Shakspeare" (1807), in which Charles did the tragedies and Mary the comedies. This was followed by "Specimens of English Dramatic Poets Contemporary with Shakspeare" (1808), which secured his position as critic. His contributions to the "London Magazine" began with "Recollections of the South Sea House," Aug., 1820, signed "Eliá." Twenty-five essays thus signed were published in 1823 as the "Essays of Eliá." In 1822 Charles and Mary went abroad. In March, 1825, he was retired from the India House with a pension of £441 a year. In 1833 were published the "Last Essays of Eliá," his last literary work. He died in the next year. His sister survived till 1847.

Lambert, John. Born at Calton, near Malham Tarn, Yorkshire, 1619 (baptized Nov. 7); died 1683. An English general, distinguished in the Parliamentary service in the civil war. He served as colonel under Fairfax 1643-44; took part in the battle of Marston Moor; was appointed to the command of a regiment of foot in the "New Model" Jan., 1646; played a prominent part as leader of the discontented officers in the disputes between the army and Parliament in 1647; was made general of the northern army in Aug., 1647; served against the Scots in 1648 (at Preston Aug. 17-19); received the surrender of Pontefract March 22, 1649; and served as second in command under Cromwell in Scotland 1650, and at Worcester 1651. He became influential on the appointment of Cromwell as Protector; was a member of his council of state; advocated the making of the protectorship hereditary; and attained great civil and military influence in the state. But he refused to assent to the proposed assumption by Cromwell of the title of king; declined to take the oath of allegiance required by Parliament June 24, 1657; and resigned his commission July, 1657. After Cromwell's death he entered Parliament, regained in great measure his influence with the army and in the state, and defeated Sir George Booth at Winwick Bridge Aug. 19, 1659. He was cashiered Oct. 12, 1659, rebelled, intimidated Parliament, and became major-general of the army, member of the committee of safety, and the principal man in the state. When Monk declared for the Parliament, Lambert marched against him, but his army went to pieces and he was deprived of all his commands. At the Restoration he was tried and exiled to Germany. In 1667 he was transferred to the island of St. Nicholas in Plymouth Sound.

Lame Lover, The. A comedy by Foote, produced in 1770.

Lamennais (lä-me-nä'), Félicité Robert de. Born at St. Malo, June 19, 1782; died at Paris, Feb. 27, 1854. A French writer and philosopher. From earliest infancy he was dwarfed in stature, nervous, and irritable. He studied under his uncle's guidance, and taught himself Greek, Latin, and several modern languages. In time he became strongly attracted by the philosophical teachings of the 18th century, especially those of J. J. Rousseau. After publishing an essay, "Les philosophes," in 1802, he went to live for a while in the retirement of his native region. His "Réflexions sur l'état de l'église en France pendant le XVIII^e siècle, et sur sa situation actuelle" appeared in 1808, but was suppressed by the police until 1814. In 1811 he taught mathematics in the Seminary of St. Malo; the following year he took the first orders, and in 1816 became a priest. He published the first volume of his great work "Essai sur l'indifférence en matière de religion" in 1817; the second volume is dated 1820, and the third and fourth are from 1822-24. With a view to spread his religious ideas, he founded a paper "L'Avenir" (1830). His doctrines favoring freedom in religious matters were not approved by the clergy, and his fearless utterances led to frequent censure and condemnation before the courts. In 1838 he founded a new paper, "Le Peuple Constituant." His last appearance as a political writer was in connection with his management of the journal "La Réforme." Among Lamennais's works are "Mélanges religieux et philosophiques" (1819-35), "Les paroles d'un croyant," "Le livre du peuple" (1837), "Questions politiques et philosophiques" (1810), "L'Esquisse d'une philosophie" (1842-46). His "Discussions critiques" came out in 1856, and likewise his translation of Dante's "Divina Commedia."

Lamentation of Mary Magdalen. A spurious poem introduced in the early editions of Chaucer. It was inserted under the impression that it was the lost "Origenes upon the Maudeleyne," which was probably a translation from a piece attributed to Origen. This idea arose from Chaucer's lines in the prologue to the "Legend of Good Women,"

"He made also, goone is a greatè while,
Origenès upon the Maudelein."

Lamentations (lam-en-tä'shonz). A book of the Old Testament of which the authorship is by tradition ascribed to the prophet Jeremiah. It comprises five dirges. Its date and authorship are matters of dispute.

Lametrie, or La Mettrie (lä me-tré'), Julien Offray de. Born at St.-Malo, France, Dec. 25, 1709; died at Berlin, Nov. 11, 1751. A French materialist. He wrote "Histoire naturelle de l'ame" (1745; ostensibly translated from the English), "La faulx vengée" (1747; a satirical comedy), "L'Homme machine" (1748), "L'Homme plante" (1748), "Réflexions philosophiques sur l'origine des animaux" (1750), "Les animaux plus que machines" (1750), etc. He was the leader of French materialism in its most extreme form, and was persecuted for his opinions. He was driven from France to Holland, and thence to Prussia, where he found an asylum with Frederick the Great.

Lamia (lä'mä-i). [Gr. Lamia.] The capital of the nomarchy of Phthiotis and Phocis, Greece, situated in lat. 38° 54' N., long. 22° 27' E. It was an ancient city of Malis. The modern name was until recently Zituni, but the old name has been restored. Antipater was besieged here 323 B. C. Population (1889), 6,888.

Lamia, I. In classical mythology: (a) A daughter of Poseidon, the mother of the sibyl Hierophile. (b) The daughter of Belus. She was a Libyan queen, beloved by Zeus, and transformed through Juno's jealousy into a hideous child-devouring monster.

Lilith, the nocturnal female vampire of the Hebrews, mentioned in Isaiah, is rendered Lamia in the Vulgate. In the plural (Lamie), they appear to have corresponded, very nearly, to the witches of the Middle Ages, who, indeed, were then frequently called Lamie. Keats's poem of "Lamia" (1820), in which the bride, recognized by the keen-eyed sage, returns to her original serpent-form, represents another of the superstitions attached to the race.

B. Taylor, Notes to Faust, Pt. II.

2. A celebrated Athenian courtesan. In the sea-fight off Salamis 306 B. C. she fell into the hands of Demetrius and captivated him. Her sway was unbroken for many years, and she was noted for her extravagance. The Athenians and Thians consecrated temples in her honor under the name of Aphrodite.

Lamian War. A war in which Athens and its allies were defeated by Macedonia under Antipater, 323-322 B. C.; so named from the siege of Lamia by the allies.

Lancelot. Same as Lancelot du Lac.

Lancelot du Lac. A French Arthurian romance. It was probably the work of Walter Map in the latter part of the 12th century; a Scottish metrical romance "Lancelot of the Laik" was made from this at the end of the 15th century. Chretien de Troyes's metrical romance "Le Chevalier de la Charette" gives some of Lancelot's adventures, and was based on Map's prose romance. Sir Thomas Malory's "Morte d'Arthur" also does not give his entire story. Sir Lancelot was the son of Ban, king of Brittany, and was one of the most famous knights of the Round Table. He received the name "du Lac" from the fact that he was educated at the castle of Vivian, known as the Dame du Lac or Lady of the Lake. The main features of the legend are his guilty love for Guinevere and the exploits he performed in her service, and the war with Arthur in which his passion involved him. Guinevere retired to a convent, and Lancelot became a monk and a holy man, and died saying masses for the souls of his old companions in arms. He was the father of Sir Galahad by Elaine, the daughter of King Pelles, who is not the Elaine of Tennyson's poem.

Landnama Bók. See the extract.

The "Landnama Bók" was a development from the work of the priest Ari Fróthi, the son of Thorgr, and from another of the same kind. Its author was Sturla Thortharson, a judge in the Higher Court, who died in 1284, aged seventy. His work was edited by Hauk Erlendsson, who was himself a judge in the Higher Court from 1294 to 1334, and his "Landnama Bók" is Thortharson's with addition of facts from a history by Styrmir the Learned, wherever Styrmir had anything to add. This "Landnama Bók" (Book of the Taking of the Land), the fullest of the old Icelandic chronicles, is in five parts. The first treats of the discovery and settlement of the island, and the other four are given to a description of its several quarters, including detail as to the families by which each was settled. This record is of great value for the verification of the Sagas. Morley, English Writers, I, 271.

Land of Beulah. See Beulah.

Land of Cakes. Scotland: so named (in jest) on account of the general use of oatmeal cakes as an article of diet.

Land of Cockaigne. A popular poem assigned to the latter part of the 13th century. See Cockaigne.

A satire upon corruptions in the Church, that paints a Fool's Paradise for monks, wherein all the delights are sensual, and spiritual life passes for nothing. The Paradise of this satire, which spread through several countries, was entitled "the Land of Cockaigne," . . . or the land of animal delights painted by popular satire as the happy land of monks who had turned their backs upon the higher life to which they were devoted. An old German poet described it as "Dat edele lant van Cockengien." In what spirit this popular satire was written none can doubt when they find at the close how such a Paradise as it paints is to be earned only by seven years' wading chin-deep in swinish filth. Morley, English Writers, III, 354.

Land o' the Leal (land' o' f' r' n' e' l' e' l'). A mythical land of happiness. Lady Nairne, in her poem of that name, uses it for heaven, and the use has now become an accepted one.

Landon (lan'don), Letitia Elizabeth (later Mrs. Maclean); pseudonym L. E. L. Born at London (Chelsea), Aug. 14, 1802; died at Cape Coast Castle, Africa, Oct. 15, 1838. An English poet and novelist, wife (June, 1838) of George Maclean, governor of Cape Coast Castle. She was the author of poems (collected 1838, later editions 1850, 1873), the novels "Romance and Reality" (1831), "Francesca Carrara" (1834), "Lilith Churchill" (1837), "Lady Granard" (1842), etc. Her death, probably accidental, was due to a dose of a preparation of prussic acid.

Landor (lan'dor), Walter Savage. Born at Warwick, Jan. 30, 1775; died at Florence, Italy, Sept. 17, 1864. A noted English poet and prose-writer. He entered Trinity College, Oxford, in 1793; became conspicuous for his advocacy of republican principles; and was rusticated in 1794 for firing a gun (without damage to any one) at the windows of an obnoxious Tory. For some years he led an unsettled life, visiting Paris in 1802, and joining the Spaniards at Corunna against the French in 1808. In 1809 he purchased Llanthony Abbey, Monmouthshire, and in 1811 married Julia Thuyllier, daughter of a banker. A combination of troubles drove him in 1814 to Jersey, then to Tours, and in 1815 to Italy. In 1821 he settled in Florence, where he resided until 1835, when, separating from his wife, he went to England. He returned to Florence in 1858. He published "Poems" (1795), "Gebir" (1798), "Simonidea" (1806: English and Latin poems), "Count Julian" (1812), "Idyllia Heroica" (1814, enlarged 1820), "Imaginary Conversations" (1824-1848), "Citation and Examination of William Shakespeare . . . touching Deer-stealing, etc." (1834), "Pericles and Aspasia" (1836), "The Pentameron" (1837), "Andrea of Hungary and Giovanni of Naples" (1839), "Fra Rupert" (1840), "Hellenics" (1847, revised 1859), "Poemata et Inscriptiones" (1847), "Italics" (1848), "The Last Fruit of an Old Tree" (1853), "Dry Sticks Fagoted by W. S. Landor" (1858), "Heroic Idylls" (1863), etc.

Laodicea (lä-od-i-së'i). [Gr. Λαοδίκεια.] 1. An ancient city in Phrygia, Asia Minor, in the valley of Lycus, an auxiliary river of the Mæander 50 miles north of Aradus. It was one of the most northern of the Phœnician cities, and its original name was Ramantha. It did not attain great importance until the time of the Seleucids. Antiochus II. reestablished it and named it, after his wife, Laodicea, and it soon became a prosperous city. In 1402 A. D. it was destroyed by Timur, but its great ruins at Eski-Hissar are still witnesses of its former splendor. In the Apocalypse it is one of the congregations to which an epistle is addressed. 2. See Ladikiyeh.

Laodogant. In Arthurian romance, the father of Guinevere.

Laomedon (lä-om'e-don). [Gr. Λαομέδων.] In Greek legend, the son of Ilus and Eurydice, and father of Priam, founder and king of Troy. For an offense against Poseidon he was forced to offer his daughter Hesione to a sea-monster. Hercules found her chained to a rock, and agreed to free her for a pair of magical horses which Zeus had given to Laomedon in exchange for Ganymede. Laomedon failed to keep his promise, and Hercules captured his city and slew him and all his sons except Priam.

Laon (lä'n). The capital of the department of Aisne, France, situated in lat. 49° 33' N., long. 3° 35' E.; the Roman Bibrax, Laudunum, or Lugdunum Clavatum. It is a fortified town. Laon was the residence of the early kings; was the seat of a bishopric from about 500 to the Revolution; often changed hands; and suffered in the English, religious, and League wars. The French under Marmont were defeated here with heavy loss by the Allies under Blücher, March 9, 1814. Laon surrendered to the Germans Sept. 9, 1870. The cathedral is one of the most splendid of medieval monuments, possessing the finest west front after those of the cathedrals of Rheims, Paris, and Amiens. The style is early Pointed; the façade has a noble projecting porch of 3 great arches, above which are arcades in picturesquely broken ranges, and a magnificent rose, surmounted by 2 fine towers. The chevet is square, with a splendid rose above 3 lancets. The interior is admirably proportioned, 400 feet long and 80 high. There is a double triforium. The cathedral was designed for 9 towers and apses, most of which were completed; but the spires have all disappeared, with some of the towers. The accessory buildings are of unusual interest. Population (1891), commune, 14,129.

Laputa (lä-pü'tä). A flying island in Swift's "Gulliver's Travels."

In the voyage to Laputa the satire is directed against the vanity of human wisdom, and the folly of abandoning useful occupations for the empty schemes of visionaries. The philosophers of Laputa had allowed their land to run waste, and their people to fall into poverty, in their attempts to "soften marble for pillows and pin cushions," to "petrify the hoofs of a living horse to prevent them from foundering," to "sow land with chaff," and to "extract subseams from cucumbers, which were to be put in plials hermetically sealed, and let out to warm the air in raw, inclement summers." Tuckerman, Hist. of Prose Fiction, p. 176.

Lar. See Larcs.

Lar (lä'r). The capital of the province of Laristan, Persia, situated about lat. 27° 31' N., long. 54° 10' E. Population, estimated, about 12,000.

Lara (lä'rä). The name of a family belonging to the Castilian aristocracy of the 10th century, whose adventures have been made the subject of many ballads. See the extract.

The ballads which naturally form the next group are those on the Seven Lords of Lara, who lived in the time of Garcia Fernandez, the son of Fernan Gonzalez. Some of them are beautiful, and the story they contain is one of the most romantic in Spanish history. The Seven Lords of Lara, in consequence of a family quarrel, are betrayed by their uncle into the hands of the Moors, and put to death; while their father, with the basest treason, is confined in a Moorish prison, where, by a noble Moorish lady, he has an eighth son, the famous Mudarra, who at last avenges all the wrongs of his race. On this story there are above thirty ballads: some very old and exhibiting either inventions or traditions not elsewhere recorded, while others seem to have come directly from the "General Chronicle." Ticknor, Span. Lit., 1. 126.

Lara. A narrative poem by Lord Byron, published in 1814; so called from the name of its hero.

Laredo (lä-rä' thō). A seaport in the province of Santander, Spain, on the Bay of Biscay. It has a large trade in fish. Population (1887), 4,850.

Lares (lä-réz). In Roman antiquity, a class of infernal deities whose cult was primitive. They were looked upon as natural protectors of the state and family, and also as powerful for evil if not duly respected and propitiated. The public Lares, originally two in number, were the guardians of the unity of the state, and were honored with temples and an elaborate ceremonial. After the time of Augustus, at least, each division of the city had also its own public Lares (Lares compitales). The private Lares differed for each family, and were worshipped daily in the house, being domiciled either on the family hearth or in a special shrine. They received also special recognition upon every occasion of festivity, public or private, and on certain days devoted particularly to them, and claimed tribute alike from the bride upon entering the family and from the youth upon attaining his majority. The chief of the private Lares in each family, the domestic or household Lar (Lar familiaris) in the fullest sense, was the spirit of the founder of the family. To the family spirits were often added in later times, among the household Lares, the shades of heroes, or other personalities who were looked upon with admiration or awe. In their character as malignant divinities, the Lares were commonly classed under the title of Lemures or Larvae.

Largs (lärgz). A town in Ayrshire, Scotland, situated on the Firth of Clyde. It was the scene of a victory of Alexander III. over Hacon of Norway in 1263. Population (1891), 3,187.

La Salle (lä-säl). A city of La Salle County, Illinois, situated on the Illinois, at the head of navigation, 100 miles west-southwest of Chicago. Population (1890), 9,855.

La Salle (lä-säl'), Antoine de. A French poet. See the extract.

Critics have vied with each other in heaping unacknowledged masterpieces on his head. His only acknowledged work is the charming romance of "Petit Jean de Saintré." The first thing added to this has been the admirable satire of the "Quinze Jours du Mariage," the next the famous collection of the "Cent Nouvelles," and the last the still more famous farce of "Patheclin." There are for once few or no external reasons why these various attributions should not be admitted, while there are many internal ones why they should. Antoine de la Salle was born in 1398, and spent his life in the employment of different kings and princes:—Louis III. of Anjou, king of Naples, his son the good King René, the count of Saint Pol, and Philip the Good of Burgundy, who was his natural sovereign. Nothing is known of him after 1461. Of the three prose works which have been attributed to him—there are others of a didactic character in manuscript—the "Quinze Jours du Mariage" is extremely brief, but it contains the quintessence of all the satire on that honorable estate which the middle ages had elaborated.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 147.

La Salle (lä-säl), Jean Baptiste. Born at Rheims, France, April 30, 1651; died at Rouen, France, April 7, 1719. A French priest, founder of the "Brethren of the Christian Schools."

La Salle, Robert Cavalier, Sieur de. Born at Rouen, Nov. 22, 1643; died in Texas, March 20, 1687. A French explorer. He was of burgher descent; was educated by the Jesuits, with whom he was for a time connected; and in 1666 went out to Canada. In 1669 he set out upon a tour of western exploration, in the course of which he discovered the Ohio River. In the course of another journey, a year or two later, he explored the upper part of the Illinois. He was granted a patent of nobility in 1673. In 1679 he established Fort Crèvecoeur on the Illinois River, near the site of the present Peoria, which was intended as the starting-point of an expedition down the Mississippi. Returning in 1680 from a journey to Canada after supplies, he found the fort destroyed by the Iroquois. The garrison, under Henry de Tonti, had made good its escape, however, and afterward rejoined La Salle at Mackinaw. Organizing a new expedition, he set out from Fort Frontenac with Henry de Tonti, thirty Frenchmen, and a band of Indians in 1681, and, reaching the Mississippi by way of the Chicago portage and the Illinois River, descended to its mouth, which he reached April 9, 1682. In 1684 he led a band of colonists from France, intending to found a settlement at the mouth of the Mississippi. He landed at Matagorda Bay, Texas, which he mistook for a western outlet of the river, and was on his way to Canada to procure provisions for his colony when he was assassinated by some of his disaffected followers near a branch of the Trinity River, Texas.

Lasca, II. See Grazzini.

Lascaris (läs'kü-ris), Andreas Joannes or Janos or Janus. Born at Rhyndacus, in Phrygia, about 1445; died at Rome, 1535. A noted Greek scholar, resident in Italy and France after the fall of Constantinople. He first sought the court of Lorenzo de' Medici, and after his patron's death went to Paris where he taught Greek. In 1503, and again in 1505, he was French ambassador at Venice, and after 1508 went to Rome. His most notable work is an edition of the Greek anthology (1494). He also edited the Greek scholia on the Iliad, etc.

La Serena (lä sä-rä'nä). The capital of the province of Coquimbo, situated at the mouth of the Coquimbo River, in lat. 29° 53' S. It was founded by Valdivia in 1544, and was an important point in the early history of Chile. Coquimbo, its commercial port, is 7 miles southwest of it, but the two names are often used interchangeably. Population (1885), 17,230.

La Serna y Hinojosa (lä sär'nä ö ün-ö-hö'sä), José de. Born at Jerez de la Frontera, 1770; died at Cadiz, 1832. A noted Spanish general. In 1816, with the rank of major-general, he was put in command of the army in Upper Peru. He was defeated by the patriots at Salta and Junju, and, owing to disagreements with the viceroy, resigned in 1819, and was made lieutenant-general and president of the council of war; soon after this he was made commander of the army against San Martín. On Jan. 29, 1821, the viceroy Pezuela was deposed by his officers, and La Serna was put in his place. La Serna was forced to evacuate Lima July 6, 1821, but he kept his ground in the interior with great skill and resolution, making his capital at Cuzco. During three years and a half he was practically cut off from Spain. He was finally defeated by Sucre and captured with his whole army at the battle of Ayacucho, Dec. 9, 1824.

Las Heras (läs ä'räs), Juan Gregorio de. Born at Buenos Ayres, July 11, 1780; died at Santiago de Chile, Feb. 6, 1866. A Spanish-American general. In 1824 he was chosen governor of Buenos Ayres, and from May 9 of that year until Feb. 7, 1825, was acting president of the Argentine Confederation. Soon after he retired to Chile, where he resided until his death.

Lask (läsk). A town in the government of Piotrkow, Russian Poland, 92 miles southwest of Warsaw. Population (1890), 5,677.

Lasker (läs'ker), Eduard. Born at Jarocin, Posen, Prussia, Oct. 14, 1829; died at New York, Jan. 5, 1884. A German statesman, one of the founders and leaders of the National Liberal party. He entered the Prussian Landtag in 1865, and the German Reichstag in 1867, and headed the secessionists from the National Liberal party in 1880.

Lasker, Emanuel. Born at Berlin, near Berlin, Dec. 24, 1868. A noted German chess-player. His career from 1889 to 1894 has been one of continuous success. A match with W. Steinitz for the chess championship of the world, played March 15 to May 26, 1894, at New York, Philadelphia, and Montreal, resulted in favor of Lasker by 10 games to 5, with 4 draws.

Laski (läs'kä), or a Lasco (ä läs'kö), John. Born at the castle of Lask, Poland, 1499; died at Kalisz, Poland, Jan. 13, 1560. A Polish Protestant theologian, the second son of Jaroslaw, baron of Lask. He studied at Bologna 1515-17; was ordained a priest and dean at Gnesen 1521; went to Basel in 1523, and lived for a year with Erasmus; returned to Poland in Oct., 1525; and became bishop of Vesprim in 1524, and archdeacon of Warsaw in 1538. He became a reformer of the Swiss school. In 1540 he settled in Emden, East Friesland; was appointed pastor of a congregation there in 1542; went to England on the invitation of Cranmer in Aug., 1548, returning to Emden in March, 1549; and returned to England in May, 1550, remaining there until Sept., 1553. While in England he was superintendent of the Church of Foreign Protestants in London, and took an important part in the discussions of ecclesiastical affairs. He was a voluminous writer.

Lassa. See Lhasa.

Las Salinas (läs sä-lä'näs). A place about three miles north of Cuzco, Peru; so called because salt had been obtained there. Here, on April 23,

Lassalle (lä-säl'), Ferdinand. Born at Breslau, Prussia, April 11, 1825; died at Geneva, Aug. 31, 1864. A German socialist and agitator, leader in the German social-democratic movement. He published "Die Philosophie Herakleitos" (1858), "Das System der erworbenen Rechte" ("System of acquired Rights," 1861), etc. He was killed in a duel growing out of a love-affair.

Lassalle, Jean. A contemporary French operatic singer. He made his debut in 1871 at Brussels, and has sung with great success in Paris, London, and Vienna. In 1893-94 he came to the United States. His voice is a barytone, and his repertoire includes Telramund, Rigolotto, Hamlet, Gunther, Nelusko, etc.

Lassell (lä-sel'), William. Born at Bolton, Lancashire, June 18, 1799; died at Maidenhead, Oct. 5, 1880. An English astronomer, noted as a constructor of reflecting telescopes and as an observer. He discovered the satellite of Neptune Oct. 10, 1846, the eighth satellite of Saturn (Hyperion) Sept. 19, 1848 (simultaneously with Bond), and the two inner satellites of Uranus (Ariel and Umbriel) Oct. 24, 1851, and catalogued a large number of new nebulae.

Lassen (läs'sen), Christian. Born at Bergen, Norway, Oct. 22, 1800; died at Bonn, Prussia, May 8, 1876. A noted Norwegian Orientalist, professor at Bonn from 1830. He published "Indische Altertumskunde" ("Indian Antiquities," 1844-62), etc., edited various Sanskrit works, and deciphered the Old Persian cuneiform inscriptions ("Die altpersischen Keilschriften," 1836).

Lassen, Eduard. Born at Copenhagen, April 13, 1830. A Belgian composer. He went to Brussels when only two years old, where he received his musical education. In 1851 he took the government prize. In 1857 his opera "Le Roi Edgard" was produced at Weimar under the care of Liszt. Here he was made conductor of the court theater after the latter retired. Among his other works are "Franenob," "Der Gefangene," and "Tristan and Isolde"—all operas; the music to Sophocles's "Edipus," to Goethe's "Faust," to Hebbel's "Nibelungen," to Devrient's version of Calderon's "Circe," and to Goethe's "Pandora." He has also written several symphonies and a large number of songs which are famous.

Lassus (läs'us), Orlandus; or Lasso (läs'sö), Orlando (originally Roland Delattre). Born at Mons, Hainaut, 1520 (1530?); died at Munich, June, 1594. The leading composer (next to Palestrina) of the 16th century. In 1556 or 1557 he was made director of chamber-music to Albert V, duke of Bavaria, and in 1562 was made chapel-master. Here he composed the famous music for the Seven Penitential Psalms. He composed over 2,000 works, chiefly sacred, including between 50 and 60 masses, and a number of madrigals, songs, etc.

Last (läst), Doctor. A shoemaker who passes an amusing examination for the degree of M. D. in Foote's "The Devil upon Two Sticks."

Lastarria (läs-tä-rä'), José Victorino. Born at Ranagua, 1817; died at Santiago, June 14, 1888. A Chilean publicist and author. He held many important civil positions, and published works in various branches of literature; the most valuable of these relate to the constitutional history of Chile.

Last Days of Pompeii. A historical novel by Bulwer, published in 1834. The scene is laid chiefly at Pompeii, 79 A. D.

Last Judgment, The. Among the noted paintings with this subject are the following. (a) A painting by Fra Angelico da Fiesole, in the Old Museum at Berlin. It is an altarpiece in 3 parts. (b) A famous painting by Michelangelo, covering the entire end wall above the high altar of the Sistine Chapel, Rome. The composition is separated into 5 subdivisions: (1) above, angels with the emblems of Christ's Passion; (2) upper middle, Christ, with a gesture of condemnation, as the divine Avenger, with Mary at his feet; (3) on both sides, the chief of the elect; (4) at Christ's feet, the angel sounding the trumpet of doom; (5) below, the fate of those awakened from the dead, the blessed borne upward, and the accursed dashed down by angels and hurled by devils into torment. The painting has suffered from incense and taper smoke, and above all from the clothing, by overscrupulous popes, of many of Michelangelo's undraped figures. (c) A fresco in the Campo Santo, Pisa, formerly ascribed to Orcagna, but now to the Lorenzetti (1350). The blessed and the lost are rising from their graves, and being conducted to one side or the other by angels or by devils. Many great ecclesiastical and civil dignitaries are represented as in the latter case. The subject is powerfully presented; the gesture of condemnation made by Christ toward the damned is famous. (d) A very large painting by Rubens (1617) in the Old Pinakothek at Munich. The Three Persons of the Trinity occupy the central upper part of the canvas. Christ sits, as Judge, with uplifted right arm motioning to the dead to rise. The saints are gathered about the Deity. Below, the dead are returning to life, and the entire right side is occupied by the damned, who are hurled down to perdition by the archangel Michael with flaming sword. (e) An altarpiece by Roger van der Weyden (1447) in the hospital at Beaune, France. It consists of 9 compartments, with 6 more on the outside shutters, and contains portraits of Chancelor Rollin (the donor), of Philippe le Bon of Burgundy, and other personages. It is one of the finest of early Flemish pictures, beautiful in color. (f) A painting by Fra Angelico, in the Accademia, Florence. Christ turns toward the blessed, with a gesture of doom to the lost, who, as they rise from their graves, are dragged off by devils to their fate. Among the lost appear monks and even popes. The angels and the blessed upon the flowery meadows, and at the gates of paradise, are of the greatest beauty and charm.

Last Judgment, The. The English version of Spohr's oratorio "Die letzten Dinge," produced in 1830.

Last of the Barons, The. A historical novel by Bulwer, published in 1843, founded on the life of the Earl of Warwick.

Last of the Fathers, The. St. Bernard.

Last of the Goths, The. Roderick, the last monarch of the West-Gothic kingdom of Spain.

Last of the Greeks, The. Philopemen.

Last of the Knights, The. A surname of the emperor Maximilian I.

Last of the Mohicans, The. One of the "Leatherstocking" series of novels by Cooper, published in 1826. It is so called from the nickname of Uncas, one of its leading characters.

Last of the Troubadours, The. Jasmin.

Last Sigh of the Moor, The. See the extract.

There, at Padul, on a spur of the Alpujarras, Boabdil stood and gazed back upon the kingdom he had lost: the beautiful Vega, the towers of the Alhambra, and the gardens of the Generalife; all the beauty and magnificence of his lost home. "Allahu Akbar," he said, "God is most great," as he burst into tears. His mother Ayesha stood beside him: "You may well weep like a woman," she said, "for what you could not defend like a man." The spot whence Boabdil took his sad farewell look at his city from which he was banished for ever, bears to this day the name of "el ultimo sospiro del Moro," "the last sigh of the Moor." Poole, Story of the Moors, p. 267.

Last Supper, The. Among the noted representations of this subject are the following. (a) A painting by Dieric Bouts (1467), in St. Pierre at Louvain, Belgium. This is the central panel of a large altarpiece. The side panels are in the Berlin Museum. (b) A painting by Justus of Ghent, a pupil of Van Eyck, in the Istituto di belle Arti at Urbino. It is a beautiful early-Flemish picture, one of the oldest works in oils in Italy. Federico da Montefeltro, with his family, and the Persian ambassador are introduced as spectators. (c) A painting by Luca Signorelli (1512), in the duomo of Cortona, Italy. It represents Christ as distributing bread to 3 kneeling apostles, while the others wait grouped behind. (d) A famous wall-painting by Leonardo da Vinci, in the refectory of Santa Maria delle Grazie at Milan. Christ is seated at the middle of the table, while the apostles are ranged on each side of him, full of excitement at the announcement of his impending betrayal. The painting has suffered greatly from damp, abuse, and repainting.

Last Token, The. A painting by Gabriel Max, in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, New York. It shows a beautiful young girl in the Roman arena, exposed to wild beasts. Some spectator has thrown her down a rose. She stands over it, resting her hand against the wall, and, looking up, tries to distinguish the one who has pitched her.

Last Tournament, The. One of the "Idylls of the King," by Tennyson.

Las Vegas (läs vä'gäs). A town in San Miguel County, New Mexico, east of Santa Fé; a railroad and manufacturing center. Population (1890), 2,385.

Latacunga (lä-tä-kön'gü), or Tacunga (tä-kön'gü). A city, capital of the province of Leon, Ecuador, in lat. 0° 55' S., long. 78° 45' W. It was founded in 1534 on the site of an Indian village. Between 1678 and 1797 it was destroyed four times by earthquakes. Population (1891), about 12,000.

Latakia, or Latakiah. See Ladikiyah.

Late Lancashire Witches, The. A comedy by Heywood, revived and altered by Brome, acted at the Globe in 1634. Heywood's part is evidently founded on "The Witches of Lancaster" by T. Potts, 1613. Fleay.

Lateran (lat'g-ran), The. A palace in the eastern part of Rome. The present edifice dates from the 16th to 18th centuries. The palace was originally named from the Roman family Lateranus to which, until the time of Nero, it belonged. Nero put the last owner, Plantius Lateranus, to death, and appropriated the palace. It was given by Constantine (who also built a church in its precincts) to the Bishop of Rome. See St. John Lateran and Scala Santa.

Until the 14th century the Lateran was the usual residence of the pope; this was once a very extensive building, covering four times its present area. The original house is said to have belonged to the senator Plantius Lateranus in the reign of Nero; but the existing part on the line of the Aurelian wall is of the 3rd century. This house, which had become the property of the emperors, was given by Constantine as a residence for S. Sylvester; it was very much enlarged at many periods during the next ten centuries; in 1308 a great part was burnt, and in 1583 the ancient palace was completely destroyed by Sixtus V., and the present palace built by Domenico Fontana. The Capella Sancta Sanctorum is the only relic of the older palace. The present palace has never been used as a papal residence; in the 18th century it was an orphan asylum, and is now a museum of classical sculpture and early-Christian remains. J. H. Middleton, in Encyc. Brit., XXX, 835.

Lateran Council. The name of a number of ecclesiastical councils held in the Lateran Church at Rome. The following five are regarded by the Roman Catholic Church as ecumenical: (1) The council of 1123, under Calixtus II, which confirmed the Concordat of Worms (which see) and renewed the grant of indulgences promulgated by Urban II. in favor of the Crusaders. (2) The council of 1139, under Innocent II, which condemned the antipope Anacletus II, and Arnold of Brescia. (3) The council of 1179, under Alexander III, which declared that the popes should be elected exclusively by the college of cardinals, and that a two-thirds vote of the college should be necessary to form a valid election. (4) The council of 1215, under Innocent III, which condemned the Albigenses. (5) The council of 1512-17, under Julius II, and Leo X., which abrogated the canons of the Council of Pisa.

Lateran Palace. See Lateran, The.

Latham (lā'tham), John. Born at Eltham, near London, June 27, 1740; died Feb. 4, 1837. A noted English physician and ornithologist, one of the founders of the Linnean Society (1788). His last years were spent in Winchester. He published "A General Synopsis of Birds" (1781-85), "Index Ornithologicus sive Systema Ornithologicum" (1790), "A General History of Birds" (11 vols. 1821-28), etc.; the illustrations of the last-named work were all designed, etched, and colored by himself.

Latham (lā'tham), Robert Gordon. Born at Billingborough, Lincolnshire, March 24, 1812; died at Putney, March 9, 1888. A noted English philologist, ethnologist, and physician. He was a graduate of King's College, Cambridge, 1832; professor of English in University College, London, 1839; and lecturer and assistant physician at Middlesex Hospital. He published "Norway and the Norwegians" (1840), "The English Language" (1841), "An Elementary English Grammar" (1843), "A Handbook of the English Language" (1851), an edition of Johnson's "Dictionary," and numerous works on ethnology.

To the late Dr. Latham belongs the credit of having been the first to call in question the prevalent belief [with regard to the origin of the Aryans]. As early as 1851, in his edition of the Germania of Tacitus, he ventured to assert that no valid argument whatever had been produced in favour of the Asiatic origin of the Aryans. He maintained, on the other hand, that a European origin was far more probable.

Taylor, Aryans, p. 20.

Lathbury (lath'bur-i), Thomas. Born at Brackley, Northamptonshire, 1798; died at Bristol, Feb. 11, 1865. An English ecclesiastical historian. He was vicar, after 1848, of St. Simon's, Baptist Mills, Bristol, and the author of "A History of the English Episcopacy, etc." (1836), "The State of the Church of England from the Introduction of Christianity to the Period of the Reformation" (1839), "A History of the Convocation of the Church of England, etc." (1842), "A History of the Non-Jurors, etc." (1845), "A History of the Book of Common Prayer and other Books of Authority" (1858), etc.

Lathom House. A place in Lancashire, England, 13 miles northeast of Liverpool. The present house, the seat of the Earl of Lathom, was built in 1750. The older house was defended by Charlotte de la Trémoille, the Countess of Derby, against the Parliamentary forces in 1644, and taken by them in 1645.

Lathrop (lā'throp), Francis. Born at sea near the Sandwich Islands, June 22, 1849. An American portrait and decorative painter, brother of G. P. Lathrop. He studied with T. C. Farrer and Maxod Brown and at the Royal Academy, Dresden. He assisted Burne-Jones and William Morris in London, and came to the United States in 1873. His decorative work is in the Metropolitan Museum and Trinity Church (New York), and the Bijou Theater (Boston), etc.

Lathrop (lā'throp), George Parsons. Born at Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, Aug. 25, 1851. An American journalist and miscellaneous author, son-in-law of Hawthorne. He was assistant editor of the "Atlantic Monthly" 1875-77. He has written "A Study of Hawthorne" (1876), "A Masque of Poets" (1878), "An Echo of Passion" (1882), "Spanish Vistas" (1883), "Newport" (1884), "Behind Time" (1885), etc.

Latimer, Darsie. See Redgauntlet (Sir Arthur Darsie).

Latimer (lat'i-mēr), Hugh. Born at Thurstaston, Leicestershire, about 1485; burned at Oxford, Oct. 16, 1555. A celebrated English prelate and reformer. He graduated B. A. at Cambridge in 1510; became a priest; rose in favor at court, especially with Cromwell, and obtained the benefice of West Kingston (or Kington), Wiltshire; was cited to appear before the Bishop of London on a charge of heresy Jan. 29, 1532; recanted April 10; was made a royal chaplain 1534, and bishop of Worcester 1535; and resigned his bishopric July 1, 1539, on account of his opposition to the Act of the Six Articles (by his own account at the request of the king). He was ordered into the custody of the Bishop of Chichester, but was soon released. During the reign of Edward VI, he regained his influence at court, and identified himself more closely with the Reformation. On the accession of Mary he was arrested and committed to the Tower (Sept., 1553); was sent to Oxford with Ridley and Crammer to defend their doctrines regarding the mass before the divines of the two universities, March, 1554; was excommunicated April 20; and was burned with Ridley "at the ditch over against Balliol College," Oct. 16, 1555.

Latin America. A collective term for all the countries and islands of America in which the Spanish, Portuguese, or French races are predominant; broadly speaking, all of South America, Central America, Mexico, and most of the West Indies.

Latin Empire, The. The empire established by the Crusaders of western and southern Europe at Constantinople in 1204. It was overthrown and succeeded by the (restored) Byzantine empire in 1261.

Latini (la-ti'ni). In ancient history, the Latins, or people inhabiting Latium.

Latini (lä-tē'nō), Brunetto. Born at Florence, 1230; died there, 1294. An Italian poet, scholar, and orator. His most noted work is an encyclopedia ("Trésor") written in French.

Latin League. A confederation of the cities of Latium, existing in Italy in the earliest historic times, and continuing till 338 B. C., when the Latin towns were finally incorporated in the dominion of Rome. According to the earliest tradition, the league included thirty cities, among which Alba Longa held the preëminent place. After the fall of Alba, Aricia, Lanuvium, and Tusculum, with other important communities not originally included, were united with the league. The confederation held assemblies in the grove of Ferentino, below Marino in the Alban hills, and had a common religious sanctuary in the temple of Jupiter Latiaris on the summit of the Alban Mount (Monte Cavo), where annual sacrifices were celebrated.

Latin Quarter. The quarter of Paris on the south side of the Seine, in the vicinity of the Sorbonne. It has been frequented for centuries by the student class.

Latin Union. A monetary alliance of France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, formed by convention Dec. 23, 1865, and joined by Greece in 1868. Its object was the maintenance and regulation of a uniform interchangeable gold and silver coinage, based on the French franc. Its limited term was continued by two renewals (1878 and 1885), Belgium withdrawing on the latter occasion and adopting the single gold standard.

Latinus (la-ti'nus). In Roman legend, a king of Latium, father of Lavinia.

Latin War, The Great. A war between Rome and Latium, 340-338 B. C., ending in the subjugation of the latter.

Latium (lā'shi-um). In ancient geography, the part of central Italy lying along the Mediterranean southeast of Etruria and northwest of Campania. The name was originally restricted to the land of the Latins, chiefly comprised in the Roman Campagna. Its chief cities formed a league, which was at war with Rome 340-338 B. C., and was incorporated with Rome after 338 B. C. In an extended sense Latium (also Latium Adjectum or Novum) was the region from the Tiber to the Liris or to Mount Massicus, including the territories of the Latins, Hernicans, Volscians, and Auruncans, and (in part) of the Equians.

Latmus (lat'mus). [Gr. Λάτμος.] In ancient geography, a mountain-range in Caria, Asia Minor, east of Miletus.

Finding Ribault's settlement abandoned, he built Fort Carolina on the St. John's river in Florida, in June, 1564. The fort was stormed and the garrison massacred by the Spaniards under Menendez de Aviles, Sept. 21, 1565. Laudonnière escaped with a number of other fugitives to England, and afterward returned to France. He wrote "L'Histoire notable de la Floride, contenant les trois voyages faits en icelle par des capitaines et pilotes français" (1586).

Lauenburg (lou'en-bōrg). A circle in the province of Schleswig-Holstein, Prussia, lying north of the Elbe, bordering on Hamburg, Lübeck, Meeklenburg, and Hannover. It is fertile, and abounds in forests. The ancient inhabitants were Polabs. It formed part of the old Saxon duchy. On the fall of Henry the Lion in 1189 it fell to Bernard of Ascania, and it continued in that family (with the exception of a few years at the beginning of the 13th century, when it belonged to Denmark), under the name of Saxe-Lauenburg, until the extinction of the Ascanian line in 1689. There were several claimants to the duchy. It finally passed to Hanover in 1705, and followed its fortunes; was ceded in 1815 to Prussia, which immediately ceded it to Denmark in exchange for Swedish Pomerania; was taken from Denmark (see Schleswig-Holstein War) in 1864; and was taken possession of by Prussia in 1865. divia was killed (Jan. 1, 1554), and during the next three years was the most noted and successful of the Indian leaders. He was eventually defeated and killed by Villagra at the battle of Mataquito. Lautaro's deeds are celebrated in the "Araucana" of Ercilla.

Lautaro (lou-tä'rö) Society. [Sp. Sociedad de Lautaro.] A secret political society, originally established in various Spanish cities during the first years of the 19th century. It was affiliated with the Gran Rencion Americana (which see), and had for its aim the emancipation of Spanish South America. The first American branch (called the Lautaro Lodge) was formed at Buenos Ayres, by San Martin and others, about July, 1812. In Jan., 1813, it obtained practical control of the government at Buenos Ayres, and during the succeeding years, until about 1823, was the hidden moving spring of nearly all political action on the patriot side.

The Lodge of Lautaro was not a machine of government or of speculative propaganda, it was an engine of revolution, of war against a common enemy and of defense against internal dangers. Under its auspices was created the first popular assembly which gave form to the sovereignty of the people; to it was due that spirit of propaganda which characterized the Argentine revolution, and the maintenance of the alliance with Chile, which gave independence to half the continent.

Law (F. pron. lä'ö), Jacques Alexandre Bernard, Marquis de Lauriston. Born at Pondicherry, India, Feb. 1, 1768; died at Paris, June 10, 1828. A French marshal and diplomatist. He served with distinction at Ragusa, Wagram, Bantzen, Leipsic, etc.

Law (lä), John. Born at Edinburgh, April, 1671; died at Venice, March 21, 1729. A celebrated financier and projector of commercial schemes, the son of a goldsmith and banker. In April, 1694, he killed "Beau" (Edward) Wilson in a duel in London and was condemned to death, but escaped to the Continent where for a time he led a roving life, largely that of a gambler; at the same time endeavoring to secure the adoption by various governments of his banking and other financial schemes, especially of his plans for the issue of paper money, of which he was an earnest advocate. In May, 1716, he, with others, founded the Banque Générale, and succeeded in carrying out with success his views with regard to paper currency, his notes being accepted in payment of taxes, and commanding a premium over specie. Soon after this he acquired from the French government control of the territory then called "Louisiana" for colonization and trade, the "Compagnie d'Occident" being incorporated for this purpose in 1717: an enterprise which became famous under the name of "The Mississippi Scheme" or "The System." This company soon absorbed the East India and China companies (being thereafter known as the "Compagnie des Indes"), the African Company, the mint, and the power of receivers-general, thus becoming supreme both in the American and Asiatic commerce of France and in its internal financial affairs. Meanwhile, in 1718, the "Banque Générale" had been transformed into the "Banque Royale," with Law as director-general and its notes guaranteed by the king. On Jan. 5, 1720, Law was made controller-general of finance, and on Feb. 23 the company and the bank were combined. For a while the "System" prospered, fortunes were made in speculation, and Law possessed great power; but the overissue of paper money and the hostile action of the government brought on the catastrophe, and in May, 1720, the "System" collapsed. Law was driven from France and his estates were confiscated. In Dec., 1720, however, he was invited by the czar Peter to take charge of the finances of Russia, but declined. Later (1721) he returned to England, remaining there until 1725, when he went to Italy.

Law, Thomas. Born at Cambridge, England, Oct. 23, 1759; died at Washington, D. C., Oct., 1834. The seventh son of Edmund Law, bishop of Carlisle. He emigrated to America in 1793, became a friend of Washington, and married, as his second wife, Anne Custis, daughter of Martha Washington. He wrote several works on financial topics.

Law, William. Born at King's Cliffe, near Stamford, Northamptonshire, 1686; died there, April 9, 1761. An English controversial and devotional writer, a graduate of Emmanuel College, Cambridge, and for a time tutor of Edward Gibbon, father of the historian; author of "A Serious Call to a Devout and Holy Life" (1728), etc. About 1740 he came under the influence of the mysticism of Jakob Böhme.

Lazarillo (laz'á-ril'ó). 1. A character in Beaumont and Fletcher's "The Woman-Hater," described as a voluptuous "swell-feast" in the old dramatic personæ. He is a poor and hungry courtier, whose whole soul is given to the subject of delicate eating, with a particular desire toward an umbrana's (fish's) head, which he pursues through the play and finally obtains by marrying its possessor.

2. A character in Middleton's play "Blurt, Master Constable," a Spanish gentleman of exaggerated etiquette.

Lazarillo de Tormes (lá-thá-rél'yó dá-tór'mes). A work by Diego Hurtado de Mendoza (first known edition 1553), the autobiography of a boy, "Little Lazarus," who began life as the guide of a blind beggar. "With an inexhaustible fund of good-humor and great quickness of parts, he learns, at once, the cunning and profligacy that qualify him to rise to still greater frauds and a yet wider range of adventures and crimes in the service successively of a priest, a gentleman starving on his own pride, a friar, a seller of indulgences, a chaplain and an alcaznil, until, at last, from the most disgraceful motives, he settles down as a married man; and then the story terminates without reaching any proper conclusion, and without intimating that any is to follow." (Ticknor.) The book enjoyed great popularity. Starvation is raised to the dignity of an art. It was "the foundation for a class of fictions essentially national, which under the name of the gusto picaresco, or the style of the rogues, is as well known as any other department of Spanish literature, and one which the 'Gil Blas' of Le Sage has made famous throughout the world." Ticknor.

Leander (lē-an'dér). [Gr. Λειανδρος.] In Greek legend, a youth of Abydos, the lover of Hero. Each night he swam the Hellespont to visit her in her tower at Lesbos. One stormy night the light in the tower, by which his course was guided, was extinguished, and he perished. His body was washed ashore, and on discovering it Hero threw herself from her tower and was killed.

Léandre (lá-on'dr). 1. The rival of Lélia in Molière's comedy "L'Étourdi."—2. The son of Géronte in "Les fourberies de Scapin."—3. The lover of Lucinde in "Le médecin malgré lui."

Leaning Tower. See Pisa.

Lear (lér), also Leir, Lir, and Leyr. A mythical king of Britain. See the extracts, and King Lear.

"Lir" was another Ocean god who was worshipped both in Ireland and Britain. He appears in the Irish romance on "the fate of the Children of Lir" as a king of the divine race whose children were turned into swans by enchantment; "and the men of Erin were grieved at their departure, and they made a law and proclaimed it throughout the land, that no one should kill a swan in Erin from that time forth." In the Welsh histories he appears as "Lear." According to the version in Geoffrey of Monmouth's history, which Shakespeare adopted as the framework of his tragedy, King Lear built the town of Leicester about the time when Amos was a prophet in Israel; and his daughter Cordelia is represented as burying him in a vault under the River Sore, which had been originally built as a Temple of Janus. Elton, Origins of Eng. Hist., p. 279.

After the death of Brutus the author of Perceforest drags us through the history of his numerous descendants. One of these monarchs is King Leyr, whose story was first related of a Roman emperor in the Gesta Romanorum, and was afterwards told of the British monarch in the Chronicle of Geoffrey of Monmouth. These works were the origin of Shakespeare's celebrated tragedy, which, however, differs so far from them that both in Geoffrey's Chronicle and Perceforest the events have a happy conclusion, as Cordelia defeats her sisters and reinstates her father on the throne. From Perceforest the tale had found its way into Fabyan's "Concordance of Histories," written in the time of Henry VII., and thence passed into various lamentable ballads of the death of King Leyr and his three daughters, of which the catastrophe probably suggested to Shakespeare the tragic termination which he has given to his drama. The story of King Lear is also in the fifteenth chapter of the third book of Warner's "Albion's England," and in Spenser's "Faery Queen" (book 2, canto 10), where, in conformity with the romance and chronicle, the war against the sisters has a successful termination:

"So to his crown she restored him again,
In which he dyde, made ripe for death by eld."

Dunlop, Hist. of Prose Fiction, I. 240.

Lear, Edward. Born at London, May 12, 1812; died at San Remo, 1888. An English artist and writer, best known from his ornithological and other zoological drawings. He assisted as draftsman J. Learned Blacksmith, The. A name given to Elihu Burritt.

Leatherhead, Lanthorn. In Ben Jonson's comedy "Bartholomew Fair," a toy-man who is said, though on doubtful authority, to be intended to ridicule Inigo Jones, with whom Jonson had a continual quarrel.

Leatherstocking. A name given to Natty Bumppo in some of Cooper's novels, which are hence called the "Leatherstocking novels." He is also called Hawkeye, the Trapper, the Pathfinder, and the Deerslayer.

In "The Pioneers," "The Last of the Mohicans," "The Prairie," "The Pathfinder," and "The Deerslayer" figures the character of Leatherstocking, than whom no fictitious personage has a greater claim to interest. His bravery, resolution, and woodland skill make him a type of the hardy race who pushed westward the reign of civilization.

Tuckerman, Hist. of Eng. Prose Fiction, p. 397.

Lebadeia, or Lebadea. See Livadia.

Lebanon (leb'á-nón). [Heb., 'the white.'] The lofty mountain-range in the southern part of Syria, which runs on its western skirts from northeast by north to southeast by south, and extends in one unbroken dorsal ridge to a distance of more than 100 miles: the classical Libanus, and the el-Libnan of the Arabs. It is bounded on the north by the Nahr el-Kebir (the classical Eleutherus) near Tripolis and Homs. Its highest summits rise in the north. Beginning with the Jebel el-Akra (4,500 feet), it rises till it attains near Beirut and Tripolis in the Jebel el-Machmal the height of 10,016 feet, and in the Dahr el-Kodib 10,052 feet, which is overtopped by the Timarun (10,539 feet). At the height of 7,500 feet the French built in 1863 a post-road leading from Beirut to Damascus. From this pass the mountain gradually slopes down to the valley of the Litany. Lebanon consists mainly of limestone. It is cut through by many gorges, ravines, and gleans, with here and there tremendous chasms and precipices that descend for nearly a thousand feet. The peaks of the Mach-mal and Kodibare clothed with snow eight months in the year, while in the ravines the snow never melts. From these snow-peaks the name of the mountain is derived. Of the chief ornament of Lebanon in ancient time, the cedars, there still exist small groups on many places in the mountain, the largest consisting of about 350 trees, at the foot of the Machmal. Lebanon is still covered with industrious villages and monasteries, and adorned with gardens of olives, dates, figs, mulberries, and other fruit-trees. It exhibits the greatest variety in its climatic conditions and the character of its soil, so that an Arabian poet has said of it: "The winter is upon its head, and the spring upon its shoulders, the autumn in its bosom, and at its feet slumbers the summer." Lebanon is inhabited by Mohammedans, Druses, and Maronite Christians. Opposite Lebanon on the east side is Anti-Lebanon or Anti-Libanus (which see). Between the two ranges is inclosed the great and fertile valley of Bikh, called by the Greeks and Romans Coelo-Syria ("hollow Syria"), cut through by the rivers Asi and Litany (the classical Orontes and Leantes), and containing the city of Baalbec, with its magnificent ruins. In the Assyrian inscriptions Lebanon is mentioned by the name of Lidnānu as the chief source from which the Assyrian kings procured costly woods for their buildings.

It has been said that the glory of Delille as the greatest poet of the last quarter of the century was shared by a writer whom his contemporaries surnamed (absurdly enough) Pindar. Escouchard Lebrun had a strange resemblance to J. B. Rousseau, of whom, however, he was by no means a warm admirer. Like his forerunner, he divided his time between bombastic lyrics and epigrams of very considerable merit. Lebrun was not destitute of a certain force, but his time was too much for him.

Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 398.

Lemnos (ləm'nos), mod. Limno (lim'nō) or Limni (ləm'nē), It. Stalimene (stā-lē-mā'ne). [Gr. Λήμνος.] An island in the Ægean Sea, belonging to Turkey, situated in lat. 39° 50' N., long. 25° 20' E. Chief town, Kastro. The surface is hilly. It was long famous for its earth ("terra sigillata Lemnia"). It was sacred to Hephestus in ancient times; was conquered by Miltiades; and was in 1657 acquired by the Turks from the Venetians. Length, about 20 miles. Population, about 20,000 (mainly Greeks).

The myth ran that in Lemnos at the time of the Argonautic expedition there were no males, the women having revenged their ill-treatment upon the men by murdering them all. The Argonauts touched at the island, and were received with great favour. They stayed some months, and the subsequent population of the island was the fruit of this visit. Hypsipyle, the queen, had twin sons by Jason. Sophocles wrote a tragedy, which is lost, upon this piece of ancient story. Ravulinson, Herod., III. 116.

Yakutsk is on its banks, and the chief tributaries are the Vitim, Vilui, and Aldan. Its delta was noted in the De Long expedition, and is also famous for its mammoth ivory. Length, about 2,800 miles.

Lenæa (lə-nē'ā). [Gr. Ληναία.] The "feast of vats," an ancient Greek festival in honor of Dionysus. It was held at Athens in the month Gamelion (Jan.-Feb.), at the Lenæum. There was a great public feast, and then the people went in procession, with jesting and mockery, to the theater.

Fragments of lists of dramatic authors, and their victories, are still being found about the acropolis and the theatre at Athens, and from the publications of them by Komanudea in the Athenaion, Bergk has endeavoured to reconstruct the chronology of the drama. His conclusions have been contested by Köhler, and are as yet uncertain. But he has probably established this much, that while the tragic contests were carried on at the greater Dionysia, in the city, and in spring time, and recorded since about Ol. 64, the winter feast of the Lenæa in the suburbia was originally devoted to comedy, which was not recognized by the state till about Ol. 79. In Ol. 84 new regulations were introduced, probably by Pericles, according to which tragic contests were established at the Lenæa, and comic admitted to the greater Dionysia. From this time both kinds of contests were carried on at both feasts, and in the great theatre. But as the Lenæa was only a home feast, and not attended by strangers, a victory gained there was by no means of the same importance as a victory before the great concourse of citizens and visitors in the spring, and consequently they were separately catalogued.

Leopardi (lē-ō-pār'dē), Alessandro. Born in the second half of the 15th century: died some time before 1545. A Venetian sculptor and architect. In 1487 he was banished from Venice for forgery, but was recalled about 1490 to finish the Colonna statue begun by Verocchio: this he did in 1496. He signed his name on the girth of the saddle, and was called ever after "del Cavallo." He also made the pedestal of the statue.

Leopardi, Count Giacomo. Born at Recanati, Italy, June 29, 1798: died at Naples, June 14, 1837. An Italian poet and philologist. He was from his youth sickly and deformed, was educated at home, and devoted himself to the study of the Greek and Latin classics. He published in 1818 an ode to Italy, in which he lamented the political and intellectual degeneracy of his country, and which created a profound impression. Other odes in the same vein, notably one occasioned by Cardinal Ma's discovery of part of Cicero's "De republica," shortly secured for him a place among the first lyric poets of Italy. His writings are marked by a tone of despair which has placed him among the leaders of modern pessimism. He went in 1822 to Rome, where he prosecuted the study of philology. He afterward resided during short periods at Recanati, Bologna, Florence, Rome, and Naples. The first collective edition of his poems was published in 1824. A collection of miscellaneous prose essays, which are hardly inferior to his poems in point of style, was published in 1827 under the title of "Operette morali." His works have been edited by Ranieri ("Opere," 1846-80) and Unguioni ("Opere inedite," 1878-80).

Leopold (lē-ō-pōld) I. [G. Leopold, Leupold, F. Leopold, Sp. Pg. It. Leopoldo, from OHG. Luitpald, Luitpald (G. He married Princess Charlotte, daughter of George IV. of England, in 1816; refused the crown of Greece in 1830; was elected king of the Belgians 1831; and married Princess Louise, daughter of Louis Philippe, in 1832.

Leopold II. Born at Brussels, April 9, 1835. King of the Belgians since 1865, son of Leopold I. He married the archduchess Marie Henriette of Austria in 1853. He founded in 1876 the International African Association. See also Kongo Free State.

Leopold (lē-ō-pōld) I. Born June 9, 1640: died at Vienna, May 5, 1705. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1658-1705, second son of Ferdinand III. He succeeded his father in the empire, in the hereditary Hapsburg dominions, and in Hungary in 1658. War broke out with the Turks in 1661, and lasted until 1664, when a victory of the imperial general Montecuccoli, at St. Gotthard on the Raab, secured the conclusion of a truce for 20 years. In 1672 the emperor joined Brandenburg in support of Holland against Louis XIV. of France. Peace was concluded in 1679 at Nimwegen, where the emperor was forced to cede Freiburg in the Brisgau to France. In 1682 a second war broke out with the Turks, who were called in by the Hungarian magnates under Tokoly. The grand vizir Kara Mustapha invested (July 14, 1683) Vienna, which was defended by Rüdiger von Starberg. The siege was raised by John Sobieski, king of Poland, and Charles, duke of Lorraine, Sept. 12, 1683. A victory by the imperial general Prince Eugene at Zenta, in 1697, brought about the peace of Carlowitz (which see) in 1699. Through the claim of his family to the throne of Spain, vacated by the death of Charles II, he became involved in the War of the Spanish Succession (see Spanish Succession, War of), which was continued under his successors Joseph I. and Charles VI.

Leopold II. Born May 5, 1747; died March 1, 1792. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1790-92, third son of Francis I. and Maria Theresa. He was grand duke of Tuscany 1765-90, and succeeded his brother Joseph II. as emperor in 1790. He formed an alliance with Prussia. Feb. 7, 1792, against revolutionary France, and died just as hostilities were about to begin.

Leovigild. King of the Visigoths in Spain 569-586. See the extract.

Leovigild was in many ways one of the greatest kings of his time. A bold and skillful general, he subdued the kingdom of the Sueves in the northwest of Spain, wrested from the emperor's soldiers several of the cities which they had occupied, and brought the native inhabitants of the peninsula into complete subjection. He built fortresses and founded cities, established a new system of administration of the kingdom, and made many new laws suited to the altered needs of his people. It was under his firm rule that the Goths and the Romanised natives were taught to feel themselves to be the fellow subjects of one kingdom, and so the process began which ended in the complete blending of the two peoples into one. It will be remembered that Southerly, in his poem of "Roderick," in the complete blending speaks of:

"The golden pome, the proud array
Of ermine, aureate vests, and jewelry,
With all which Leovigild for after kings

The name of Leovigild, however, is best known on account of the tragic story of the rebellion of his eldest son Ermengild, honoured in later ages as a saint and martyr of the Catholic Church. The cause of trouble was, in this instance as in many others in Visigoth history, a Frankish marriage. The bride whom Leovigild obtained for his son was Ingunthis, the young daughter of Siebert and Brunhild, and the wedding was celebrated in Toledo with the splendid ostentation of which the king was so fond. Ermengild had already received from his father a share in the kingly dignity, and Leovigild hoped that the marriage with a Frankish princess would help to ensure his son's succession to the crown. But the young daughter of Brunhild belonged of course to the Catholic faith; and Queen Goiswintha (the widow of Athanagild, whom Leovigild had married) was a bigoted Arian. The Frankish historian Gregory of Tours tells the story that Goiswintha dragged Ingunthis to the ground by her hair, beat her cruelly, and then forced her to undergo baptism by an Arian priest. Very likely this is pure fiction, but it seems to be true that Queen Goiswintha and her daughter-in-law quarreled so much that Leovigild, for the sake of peace, was glad to send his son to Seville as ruler of Southern Spain.

Lesches (les'kêz), or Leschens (les'kûs). [Gr. Λέσχος, Λέσχης.] Born at Pyrrha, near Mytilene, about 700 B. C. One of the so-called cyclic poets, author of an epic entitled "The Little Iliad" (Ἰλιάς μικρά), in four books. It was designed to be a supplement to the Iliad of Homer, and related the events which followed the death of Hector—namely, the fate of Ajax, the exploits of Ulysses, the fall of Troy, etc.

Lescot (les-kô'), Pierre. Born at Paris about 1510; died Sept. 10, 1578. A noted French architect. About all that is known of his personal history is derived from a poem by Ronsard, and the accounts of the royal buildings. He was practically the first architect of France to employ the classic forms in a truly classic way, previous attempts being largely influenced by Gothic feeling. His work is considered the best that the Renaissance produced in France. He was made architect of the Louvre Aug. 3, 1546, and retained the office as long as he lived. That part of the Louvre which was built by Lescot consists of the western side south of the Tour d'Orléans, which stands upon the foundations of the great hall of Philippe Auguste, and, with a lower roof, remains just as Lescot left it; the Pavillon du Roi, remodeled; and the western half of the south side, also remodeled. It is the oldest portion of the present palace, and has furnished the type which has been followed throughout the building.

Lesghians (les'gi-anz). A collection of tribes living in Daghestan, Caucasus, Russia. Their religion is a form of Mohammedanism. Number estimated at 461,000.

Lesina (les'ê-nâ). 1. An island in the Adriatic Sea, belonging to Dalmatia, Austria-Hungary, intersected by lat. 43° 8' N., long. 17° E. Length, 43 miles.—2. A seaport on the island of Lesina. Population (1890), 3,596.

Leskovatz (les'kō-vāts). A town in Serbia, situated on the Vetrmitza in lat. 42° 56' N., long. 21° 57' E. Population (1890), 12,132.

Leslie (les'li or lez'li), Alexander, first Earl of Leven. Born about 1580; died at Balgonie, Fifeshire, April 4, 1661. A Scottish general, long in the service of Charles IX. of Sweden, and Gustavus Adolphus, in the campaigns against Russia, Poland, Denmark, and Austria. In 1628 he compelled Wallenstein to raise the siege of Stralsund, and in 1630 seized the island of Rugen for the Swedish king. He was made field-marshal in 1636. He returned to Scotland, and identified himself with the Covenanters, resigning from the Swedish service in 1638. The organization and command of the Scottish army were intrusted to him. He captured Aberdeen and Edinburgh Castle in 1639, but resigned in June of that year in order that there might be no obstacle to the proposed peace with Charles. On the rupture of the peace, he resumed his position as general (April, 1640). In 1644 he led an army into England to support the Parliament, and took part in the battle of Marston Moor, where the troops under his command were routed. (See Marston Moor.) He was relieved of his command May 11, 1648, but assumed it again in 1648 when Cromwell threatened Scotland. In 1651 he was surprised and captured by a body of English horse, carried to London, and imprisoned in the Tower, from which he was soon released.

Leslie, or Lesley, Charles. Born at Dublin, Ireland, July 17, 1650; died at Glaslough, Monaghan, Ireland, April 13, 1722. A British non-juror (Jacobite) and controversialist. He was an opponent of William III. whom he attacked in a pamphlet "Gallienus Redivivus, or Murderer will out" (1695; a principal authority on the Glencoe massacre, of Burnet ("Tempora mutantur," 1689), Tillotson, and others. He also attacked the Quakers ("The Snake in the Grass, or Satan transformed into an Angel of Light" (1690), and other pamphlets) and the Jews, and engaged in political controversies. His best-known work is "A Short and Easy Method with the Deists" (1698). He was obliged to leave England (1711) to avoid arrest on account of his political opinions, and later joined the household of the Pretender, whom he ardently supported.

Leslie, Charles Robert. Born at London, Oct. 19, 1794; died there, May 5, 1859. A noted English painter and writer, son of Robert Leslie, an American. He went to America with his parents in 1799, returned to England in 1811 to study art, and became a pupil of Allston and West, and a close friend of Constable. In 1833 he was for a brief period instructor of drawing at West Point. He was professor of painting at the Royal Academy 1848-52. Among his works are numerous portraits (Washington Irving, Scott, Dickens as Bobadil, etc.), "Sir Roger de Coverley going to Church" (1819), "Among the Gypsies" (1829), illustrations of Irving's "Sketch-book" and "Knickerbocker," "May-day Revels in the Time of Queen Elizabeth" (1821), "The Taming of the Shrew" (1831), "Columbus and the Egg" (1835), etc. He wrote "Memoirs of John Constable" (1845), "Handbook for Young Painters" (1855), "Autobiographical Recollections" (edited by Taylor, 1865), "A Life of Reynolds" (completed by Taylor, 1865).

Leslie, David. Died 1682. A Scottish general, first Lord Newark. He was colonel of horse under Gustavus Adolphus, but returned to Scotland in 1640 to support the cause of the Covenanters, and was appointed major-general in the Scottish army under the Earl of Leven. At the battle of Marston Moor, in which the troops under Leven were routed by Rupert, he with Cromwell stood firm, and won the day. His part in the victory, which was ignored by Cromwell, has been much discussed, but it was certainly an important one. On Sept. 13, 1645, he defeated Montrose. He later supported the cause of Charles II., and was defeated by Cromwell at Dunbar Sept. 3, 1650, and again at Worcester. He was captured and confined in the Tower until 1660. After the Restoration he was created Lord Newark.

Leslie, Eliza. Born at Philadelphia, Nov., 1787; died at Gloucester, N. J., Jan. 2, 1858. An American authoress, sister of C. R. Leslie; published "Domestic Cookery Book" (1837), etc.

Leslie, Frank (the assumed name of Henry Carter). Born at Ipswich, England, 1821; died at New York, Jan. 10, 1880. An American publisher, founder (1855) of "Frank Leslie's Illustrated Newspaper."

Leslie, or Lesley, John. Born Sept. 29, 1527; died at Guirtenburg, near Brussels, May 30, 1596. A Scottish Roman Catholic prelate and historian, bishop of Ross, a partizan and influential adviser of Mary Queen of Scots, and her agent in many affairs during her imprisonment. He was involved in the Norfolk conspiracy, and was confined in the Tower, and later transferred to Farnham Castle. In 1573 he was released. He wrote a history of Scotland, partly in Latin (1572) and partly in Scotch (published 1830), and various other works.

Leslie, Sir John. Born at Largo, Fifeshire, Scotland, April 16, 1766; died at Coates, near Largo, Nov. 3, 1832. A Scottish physicist and geometer, made professor of mathematics at Edinburgh 1805. He wrote an "Inquiry into the Nature and Properties of Heat" (1804), "Elements of Geometry" (1809), "Geometrical Analysis" (1821), "Elements of Physics" (1823), etc.

Leslie, Thomas Edward Cliffe. Born in Ireland, 1827; died at Belfast, Ireland, Jan. 27, 1882. A British political economist. He was appointed professor of jurisprudence and political economy in Queen's College, Belfast, in 1853. He wrote "Land Systems and Industrial Economy of Ireland, England, and Continental Countries" (1870), "Essays on Political and Moral Philosophy" (1879), etc.

Lesly, Ludovic. In Scott's "Quentin Durward," an archer of Louis XI.'s body-guard, called Le Balafre from a scar on his face.

Lespinasse (lä-'pi-näs'), Mademoiselle Julie Jeanne Eléonore de. Born at Lyons (baptized Nov. 19, 1732); died at Paris, May 22, 1776. A French letter-writer and leader of society. She was the illegitimate daughter of the Comtesse d'Albon. In 1754 Madame du Deffand, who had become blind, invited her to live with her. For ten years they presided together over their fashionable and literary salon. At the end of that time they quarreled, and Mademoiselle Lespinasse established herself elsewhere with D'Alembert, who lived with her in a curious sort of relationship till her death.

During this time she was a gracious hostess, and a bond of union to many men of letters, especially those of the younger philosophic school. But this is not what gives her her place here. Her claim rests upon a collection of love-letters, not addressed to D'Alembert. She was thirty-four when the earliest of her love affairs began, and had never been beautiful. When she died she was forty-four, and her later letters are more passionate than the earlier. Her first lover was a young Spaniard, the Marquis Gonsalvo de Mora; her second, the Comte de Guibert, a poet and essayist of no great merit, a military reformer said to have been of some talent, and pretty evidently a bad-hearted coxcomb. To him the epistles we have are addressed.

Saintsbury, Short Hist. French Lit., p. 417.

[Published by the widow of Guibert in 1809.]

Lesseps (les'eps; F. pron. le-seps'), Vicomte Ferdinand de. Born at Versailles, France, Nov. 19, 1805; died near Paris, Dec. 7, 1894.

A celebrated French engineer and diplomatist. He was ambassador at Madrid in 1848, and was sent on a special mission to Rome in 1849. He is chiefly known as the projector and engineer of the Suez Canal, work on which was commenced in 1859, and which was opened in 1869. He afterward formed a company for the purpose of cutting a canal through the Isthmus of Panama, and work on the canal began in 1881. The scheme collapsed, and a judicial inquiry into the affairs of the company resulted in a sentence of imprisonment against De Lesseps in 1893, which was not carried into effect. He published "Lettres, etc., pour servir à l'histoire du canal de Suez" (1875). See Suez Canal, Panama Canal.

Lessines (les-sen'). A town in the province of Hainaut, Belgium, situated on the Dender 26 miles west-southwest of Brussels. Population (1890), 8,225.

Lessing (les'sing), Gotthold Ephraim. Born at Camenz, Upper Lusatia, Jan. 22, 1729; died at Brunswick, Feb. 15, 1781. A celebrated German dramatist and critic. His father was a clergyman. He attended school at Camenz and Meissen, and in 1746 went to Leipsic to study theology. Instead, however, of pursuing his studies in this direction, he soon gave his principal attention to the theater. In 1748, in his third semester at the university, was produced his first comedy, "Der junge Gelehrte" ("The Young Scholar"). His association with the theater having given offense to his parents, he was summoned home. He soon, nevertheless, returned to Leipsic, where he matriculated as a student of medicine. This same year (1748) he went to Berlin, where he supported himself by making translations and writing criticisms, reviews, and original work. In 1751 he went to Wittenberg to complete his studies at the university. After taking the degree of master, he returned to Berlin in 1752. In 1751 he had already published a collection of poems under the title "Kleinigkeiten" ("Trifles"). In 1753 he began the publication of his collected works, two volumes of which were issued that year, two in 1754, and two more in 1755, in which year he also wrote his first tragedy, "Miss Sara Sampson." Several comedies fall in this early period, namely, "Der Misogyn" ("The Misogynist"), "Die Juden" ("The Jews"), "Der Freigeist" ("The Freethinker"), "Der Schatz" ("The Treasure"). He had also written a number of Anaerontic poems, poetic fables, epigrams, and didactic poems. In the autumn of 1755 he returned once more to Leipsic, where with slight interruptions he remained until 1757. In 1758 he went back to Berlin, and began there the following year, in conjunction with Moses Mendelssohn and the bookseller Nicolai, his "Litteraturbriefe" ("Letters on Literature"), which were continued down to 1765. He published too, at this time, a collection of prose fables, a number of odes in prose, and the one-act tragedy "Philotas," and sketched the plan of a "Faust," which, however, was never written. In 1760 he went to Breslau as secretary to General von Tauentzien. In 1763 he wrote the comedy "Minna von Barnhelm," which was not published until 1767. From Breslau he returned in 1765 to Berlin, where he next wrote his great critical work "Laokoon," which was published in 1766. The succeeding year he went to Hamburg in order to take part as a critic in the foundation of a German national theater. The result of this undertaking was the series of dramatic criticisms published twice a week from 1767 to 1769 under the title "Hamburgische Dramaturgie" ("Hamburg Dramaturgy"). In 1768 appeared "Briefe antiquarischen Inhalts" ("Antiquarian Letters"), directed against Professor Klotz of Halle. In 1769 appeared the archaeological treatise "Wie die Alten den Tod gebildet" ("How the Ancients depicted Death"). In this year he received a call as librarian to the ducal library in Wolfenbüttel, a position which he held from the spring of 1770 until his death. In 1772 appeared the tragedy "Emilia Galotti." From 1773 to 1781 were published a series of "Contributions to History and Literature from the Treasures of the Wolfenbüttel Library" ("Beiträge zur Geschichte und Literatur aus den Schätzen der Wolfenbüttel. Bibliothek"), "Fragmente eines Wolfenbüttelischen Ungenannten," theological criticisms purporting to be extracts from the writings of "an anonymous Wolfenbütteler," but really written by the Hamburg professor and philosopher H. S. Reimarus, published from 1774 to 1778, involved him in a bitter controversy with Pastor Goeze of Hamburg. Against him he wrote the scathing polemics contained in his "Anti-Goeze," which appeared also in 1778. This same year was published "Ernst und Falk, Gespräche für Freimaurer" ("Ernst and Falk, Dialogues for Freemasons"). In 1779 appeared the drama "Nathan der Weise" ("Nathan the Wise"), and in 1780, finally, the treatise "Die Erziehung des Menschengeschlechts" ("The Education of the Human Race")—like the "Anti-Goeze" papers and "Nathan," a result of the theological controversies of the last years of his life. His collected works were published in Berlin 1825-28, in 32 vols.; and again, by Karl Lachmann, in Berlin 1838-40, in 13 vols.

Lessing, Karl Friedrich. Born at Breslau, Prussia, Feb. 15, 1808; died at Karlsruhe, Baden, June 5, 1880. A German historical and landscape painter, grandnephew of G. E. Lessing. Many of his subjects were taken from scenes in the life of Huss.

L'Estrange (les-tränj'), Sir Roger. Born at Hunstanton, Norfolk, Dec. 17, 1616; died at London, Dec. 11, 1704. An English journalist and royalist pamphleteer, licensor of the press under Charles II. and James II. He served in the royal army against the Parliament, and in an attempt to carry out a plot for the capture of Lynn was betrayed, arrested, and condemned to death, but remained at Newgate until 1648, when he escaped to Holland. He returned to England in 1653. In 1663 he was appointed surveyor of printing-offices and licensor of the press, and founded "The Intelligencer" (Aug. 31) and "The News," both of which ceased to exist in 1666. From 1681 to 1687 he issued the "Observer." He published a great number of pamphlets political and personal, "The Fables of Æsop and other Eminent Mythologists with Moral Reflections" (1692), "The Works of Flavius Josephus compared with the Original Greek" (1702), a translation of the "Vision of Quevedo," etc.

Leucippe and Cleitophon (lū-sip'ē and klē'tō-phon). A Greek romance by Achilles Tatius, written in the 5th century.

The story [by Achilles Tatius] is entitled "the adventures of Leucippe and Cleitophon," in eight books. Its chief merit consists in the descriptions in which it abounds; the incidents are complicated and tedious, and the character of the hero is below contempt. The probability of the narrative is quite overthrown by the awkward machinery. The hero, Cleitophon, tells his own story, from the third chapter of the first book down to the end of the romance, without any interruption from the unknown listener, who happens to be looking, with him, at a picture of the rape of Europa. The dramatis personæ are Hippias of Tyre, who has two children by different mothers, Cleitophon and Calligone; Sostratus, the brother of Hippias, his wife Panthia, and his daughter Leucippe; Cleinias, the cousin of Cleitophon; a cunning slave, Satyrus; Menelaus, an Egyptian, whose acquaintance Cleitophon makes when he runs away with Leucippe from Berytus to Alexandria; certain pirates and soldiers; Melitte, a supposed widow of Ephesus, but residing at Alexandria, who falls in love with Cleitophon, and induces him to marry her, in the belief that Leucippe is dead; Thersander, the husband of Melitte, who had escaped from shipwreck without her knowledge; and Sosthenes, the slave of Thersander. All these parties make their entries on the stage with melodramatic exactness; everybody appears at the critical time; and, in spite of all difficulties, the lovers are united at the end of the piece.

K. O. Müller, Hist. of the Lit. of Anc. Greece, III. 356. (Donaldson.)

Leucippus (lū-sip'us). [Gr. Λεύκιππος.] Lived about 500 B. C. A noted Greek philosopher, founder of the atomic school of philosophy.

He was afterward charged with the transformation of the Château de Vincennes. He succeeded Lemercier as architect of the Louvre and Tuileries, and completed the eastern and northern sides, except the portico of Perrault. At the Tuileries Louis XIV. ordered Lévan to remodel the palace, which he did at the expense of De l'Orme's work, leaving intact only the order of the Rez de Chaussée. He also built the Pavillon de Marsan and the old Pavillon de Flore. In 1661 he built the Palais des Quatres Nations, now the Institut. He was also the first architect of Saint Sulpice, and built the Chapel de la Salpêtrière, Saint-Louis en l'Île, etc. He aided two pavilions and an orangerie to the old Château de Versailles built by Louis XIII.

Levites (lè'vīts). 1. In Jewish history, the descendants of Levi, one of the sons of Jacob; the tribe of Levi.—2. Specifically, a body of assistants to the priests in the tabernacle and temple service of the Jews. This body was composed of all males of the tribe of Levi between 30 (or 25) and 50 years of age, exclusive of the family of Aaron, which constituted the priesthood. Originally they guarded the tabernacle, and assisted in carrying it and its vessels, and in preparing the corn, wine, oil, etc., for sacrifice; they furnished the music at the services, and had charge of the sacred treasures and revenues. After the settlement in Palestine they were relieved of some of these duties, but assumed those of religious guides and teachers. Later they were also the learned class, and became scribes, judges, etc. They were allowed no territorial possessions, except thirty-five cities in which they lived, supported by tithes on the produce of the lands of the tribes. The Levites were divided into three families, which bore the names of the sons of Levi—the Gershonites, the Kohathites, and the Merarites.

Libanius (li-bā'ni-us). Born at Antioch, Syria, about 314 A. D. A Greek sophist. His orations and declamations were edited by Reiske (1791-97).

From his autobiography and letters, as well as from the numerous works which he has left us, Libanius is better known to modern scholars than any sophist of the fourth century. He was born about A. D. 314 at Antioch on the Orontes, of a distinguished family, and after receiving there some part of his early training, to which, however, he does not revert with much respect or gratitude, he betook himself to Athens, at the age of twenty, in the ardent hope of finding there all the teaching which he required. The account which he gives of his adventures in that university furnishes us with a curious picture of the state of learning in the fourth century. The rival professors had press gangs of students who had sworn allegiance to them, and who forcibly seized on all freshmen and carried them off to their own lecture-room. Although Libanius had determined beforehand which of the sophists he wished to attend, he was kidnapped, as soon as he entered the city, by the adherents of another teacher, from whom he was again seized by an opposition gang and obliged to take the oath to their master. In this thralldom he was detained for five years, when the riotous sophists were for a time displaced and he was promoted to one of the chairs.

It has held office under Grey, Melbourne, Russell, Aberdeen, Palmerston, Gladstone, and Rosbery as prime ministers.

Liberal Unionists. In British politics, a party formed in 1886 by the secession from the Liberal party of those who objected to Gladstone's Home Rule proposals. They act generally with the Conservatives, their recognized leader being the Marquis of Hartington (now Duke of Devonshire).

Liberation, War of. [G. Befreiungskrieg.] A name given by the Germans to the war of the Allies against the French in 1813-14. A leading result was the freeing of various German states from French occupation and influence.

Liberator, The. An antislavery paper published at Boston 1831-65, edited by Garrison.

Liberator, The. 1. [Sp. El Libertador.] The title of Simon Bolivar. The municipality of Caracas, after he had taken that city from the Spaniards, proclaimed him Oct. 13, 1813, "Salvador de la Patria, Libertador de Venezuela" ('Savior of the Country, and Liberator of Venezuela'). The title of Liberator of New Granada was conferred on him after the battle of Boyacá, Aug., 1819; and that of Liberator of Peru after the victory of Ayacucho in 1824.

2. A surname of O'Connell.

Liber de Hyda (lî'bèr dē hî'dä). See the extract.

A circumstantial account of the foundation of the schools of Oxford in the year 886 is to be found in the Liber de Hyda, a monastic record which seems to have been compiled during the second half of the fourteenth century. It professes to give a list of the original staff of teachers. St. Neot and St. Grimbold are stated to have given lectures on theology, Asser on grammar and rhetoric, John, a monk of St. David's, on logic, music, and arithmetic, and another monk of the same name, on geometry and astronomy. The absence of any allusion to lectures on medicine or law may be due to the fact that the compiler of the Liber de Hyda was a monk who, as such, had no interest in either of these branches of study. He shows himself singularly inaccurate as to the history of Oxford in his own century, for he states positively that the University had its abode outside the North Gate until the year 1314, and used the church of St. Giles as its formal place of assembly. Lyte, Oxford, p. 241.

Liberia (li-bê'ri-ä). A negro republic on the western coast of Africa, extending from about 6° 40' W. about 400 miles along the coast to the northwest. Capital, Monrovia. The coast is low. Tropical products are exported. The government is vested in a president and a congress comprising a senate and a house of representatives. Liberia was founded by free negroes sent by the American Colonization Society in 1822, and was declared independent in 1847. Area, estimated, 14,300 square miles. Population, estimated, 1,068,000.

Liber Pontificalis (lî'bèr pon-tif-i-kä'lis). [L., 'book of the Pope.'] A work containing the lives of the popes from St. Peter to Stephen VI. It has been attributed to Anastasius Bibliothecarius, but without ancient authority.

Liber Studiorum (lî'bèr stü-di-ō'rüm). [L., 'book of studies.'] A volume of studies by Turner, the English landscape-painter. He published it 1806-16 with a desire to rival Claude's "Liber Veritatis."

Libertad (lê-ber-täth'). A maritime department in northwestern Peru. Capital, Trujillo. The old department of Libertad, formed in 1825 from the colonial intendency of Trujillo, embraced also the present departments of Amazonas, Cajamarca, Lambayeque, and Piura, which have been separated from it at different times. Area, 18,765 square miles. Population (1876), 147,541.

Libertine, The. A tragedy by Thomas Shadwell, produced in 1676. It is professedly derived from "Il Atheisto Fulminato," but apparently from Molière's "Don Juan."

Liberty Bell, The. A famous bell cast in London in 1752. It bore the motto "Proclaim liberty throughout the land unto all the inhabitants thereof." It was afterward recast at Philadelphia, with the same inscription, and it was rung when the Declaration of Independence was adopted by Congress. It is now in Independence Hall in Philadelphia.

Liberty Enlightening the World. A colossal figure formed of plates of bronze on an iron framework, supported on a high granite pedestal, on Bedloe's Island in New York Bay. The figure represents a robustly formed woman, fully draped in Greek tunic and mantle, and diademed, holding a torch in her uplifted right hand. The height of the statue is 151 feet; of the pedestal, 155. It is by the sculptor Bartholdi, and is a gift made to the United States by popular subscription by the people of France. The pedestal was designed by Richard M. Hunt, and paid for by popular subscription in the United States. The statue was inaugurated in 1886.

Liberty Tree, The. An elm-tree formerly standing on Washington street, Boston. Effigies of objectionable persons were hung upon it during the Stamp Act excitement. A building now covers its site.

Liber Veritatis (ver-i-tä'tis). [L., 'book of truth.'] A collection of original drawings by Claude Lorraine. There are six copies in existence: one is at Chatsworth, England.

Libitina (lib-i-tî'nä). An ancient Italian goddess of gardens, vineyards, and voluptuous pleasures, identified with Venus as "Venus Libitina." She was also goddess of death and of the dead, and in this aspect was later identified with Proserpine. A piece of money was deposited in her temple for every one who died in Rome.

Libius Severus (lib'i-us se-vē'rus). A Roman emperor. See the extract.

Libius Severus, "a Lucanian by nation," was the man whom Ricimer had selected to wear the diadem snatched from the head of the murdered Majorian. He was proclaimed Emperor at Ravenna, on the nineteenth of November, 461. He died at Rome on the fifteenth of August, 465. Those two dates sum up in truth the whole of our knowledge respecting this faint shadow of an Emperor. It should, perhaps, be added that one authority states that he "lived religiously."

Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, II, 433.

Libollo. See Libollo.

Libourne (lê-börn'). A town in the department of Gironde, France, situated at the confluence of the Isle and Dorlogne, 18 miles east-north-east of Bordeaux. It exports wine, brandy, etc. Population (1891), commune, 17,867.

Libra (lî'brä). [L., 'the balance.'] An ancient zodiacal constellation, representing an ordinary pair of scales. This constellation was not commonly used among the Greeks, its place being occupied by the Chele, or Scorpion's Claws. It is found, however, in all the Egyptian zodiacs going back to 600 B. C.; but there is reason to believe that it is not so old as the rest of the zodiac (that is, 2,000 years or more B. C.). Its principal stars, Kiha borealis and Kiha australis, 2.7 and 3.0 magnitudes respectively, are at the base of an isosceles triangle of which Antares forms the vertex.

Libreville (lê-br-vê'l'). The capital of French Congo, about 32 miles north of the equator, on the Bay of Gaboon. It consists of the French town, where the government buildings, the hospital, and the Catholic mission attract attention, and of the suburbs Glasstown and Baraka, where foreign traders reside and American Presbyterians have their mission station. The nucleus of the native population was formed by a settlement of liberated slaves.

Libro de Tasas (lê'brō dā'täs'). [Sp., 'book of rules' or 'laws.'] A code of laws and regulations compiled under the direction of the viceroy Toledo for the government of Peru. They were promulgated at different times, the first instalment being dated Oct. 13, 1572. The Libro de Tasas was founded partly on the unwritten Inca laws, partly on ancient Spanish legislation, and partly on rules established by the Council of the Indies. The country was divided into corregimientos (abolished in 1783); the duties of officers were defined; and it was directed that the Indians should be governed by their own chiefs, subject to the viceroy. The mita, or forced labor of the Indians, was confirmed and regulated. These rules were the basis of the Peruvian colonial laws, and to some extent of those of the republic.

Libro d'Oro (lê'brō dō'rō). [It., 'book of gold.'] 1. A roll or register of the noble families of a state or province, with the list of their estates; an institution of the Italian republics of the middle ages, the most famous being that of Venice. Hence—2. By extension and in the way of allusion, any list or imaginary list of titles of honor, or the like.

Lichfield (lieh'fêld). ['The field of the dead.'] A city in Staffordshire, England, 14 miles north by east of Birmingham. The cathedral is a large and impressive church, mostly of the 13th and 14th centuries. The exterior is marked by its three lofty spires, the central one built by Wren. The west front is covered, except the space taken by the great central window, with arcades forming niches for about 100 statues. The details of the ornament are of great beauty. The nave has a fine triforium; the choir has none. The Lady chapel terminates in a polygonal chevet, said to be the only example of this normal pointed form in an English cathedral. The handsome 16th-century windows were brought from a convent near Liège. The cathedral measures 403 by 65 feet; length of transepts, 149; height of vault, 60; height of central spire, 260. There is an interesting oblong octagonal chapter-house. Lichfield was the birthplace of Samuel Johnson. It was made a bishopric about 650, and was an archbishopric for a few years at the close of the 8th century. It was besieged by the Parliament in 1643. Its manufactures are. Population (1891), 7,864.

Licina gens (li-sin'i-ä-jenz). A celebrated plebeian clan or house, of uncertain origin, in ancient Rome. The first member of the gens who obtained the consulship was C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, 364 B. C. The Licinii almost constantly occupied high offices of state until in the 4th century they obtained the imperial dignity. Their family names are Calvus (with the agnomen Esquilinus and Stolo), Crassus (with the agnomen Dives), Geta, Lucullus, Macer, Murena, Nerva, Sacerdos, Varus. The following cognomen are more in the nature of personal surnames than family names: Archias, Crecina, Damasippus, Imbrex, Lartius, Lenticulus, Nopos, Proculus, Regulus, Rufinus, Scyllus, and Tegula.

Licinian (li-sin'i-an) Laws or Rogations. A collection of laws proposed by the Roman tribunes Licinius Stolo and Sextius 376 B. C., and passed 367 after a long obstructive contest. They provided that one of the consuls must be a plebeian; that no person could occupy more than 500 jugera of the public land; that interest on debts should be deducted from the principal and the balance paid in three years; and that plebeians should be admitted to the College of the Sibylline Books. There were provisions limiting the cattle on the public lands and limiting the slave labor on large estates.

Licinius (li-sin'i-us) (Caius Licinius Calvus Stolo). A Roman tribune who proposed the Licinian Laws (which see).

Licinius (Caius Flavius Valerius Licinianus). Born in Dacia; killed at Thessalonica, 324 A. D. A Roman emperor. He was made Augustus by Galerius in 307. In 313 he married Constantia, sister of Constantine the Great. He defeated Maximianus in the same year, whereby he became sole ruler of the East. In 314 he became involved in war with Constantine, who had made himself sole ruler of the West. Peace was shortly concluded, but a new war begun in 323 ended in his defeat and death.

Lie (lé), Jonas Lauritz Edemil. Born at Eger, near Drammen, Norway, June 11, 1833. A Norwegian novelist. He entered the naval academy at Frederiksværn, but a year later was forced to give up this career because of near-sightedness. Subsequently he studied jurisprudence at Christiania, and ultimately settled at Kongsvingen in the practice of his profession. Here he also found time for journalistic work, and made frequent contributions to journals and periodicals. In 1864 appeared a first collection of poems. In 1865 he removed to Christiania in order to devote himself wholly to literature. His first novel, "Den Fremsynete" ("The Foreseer"), appeared in 1870. With government assistance he now spent a summer in travel in the north, the fruit of which was "Fortællinger og Skildringer fra Norge" ("Tales and Descriptions of Norway"), and then was enabled to undertake a journey to Rome. His next novel, "Tremasteren Fremtiden eller Liv nordpaa" ("The Bark Future, or Life up North," 1872), was a description of Norse life at sea, the direction in which he has made his particular fame. This was followed in 1874 by his most widely known novel, "Løden og hans Hustru" ("The Pilot and his Wife"). Results of his Italian journey were "Fanfulla," "Antonio Banniera," and the lyrical drama "Faustina Strozzi" (all from 1875). "Thomas Ross" (1878) and "Adam Schrader" (1879) are novels of city life. "Rutland" (1881) is a sea story. A three-act comedy, "Orabows Kat," was successfully produced in Christiania and Stockholm. Of late years he has lived much abroad (alternately in Stuttgart, Berchtesgaden, and Dresden), but has recently again taken up his residence in Norway.

Light Brigade, Charge of the. A celebrated charge made by the Light Brigade of 670 men, under Lord Cardigan, on a Russian battery at Balaklava, Oct. 25, 1854. The command to charge (about which there has been much dispute) was given to Lord Cardigan by Lord Lucan, in pursuance of orders issued by Lord Raglan. There was a battery in front, a battery on each flank, and Russian riflemen on both sides. According to Cardigan's account (Kinglake), "the time occupied from the movement of the brigade to the attack to the time of re-forming on the same ground did not exceed twenty minutes—the distance passed over was one mile and a quarter, at the lowest calculation—and in that space of time 300 men who had gone into action, only 195 were wounded, or missing, and 396 horses were put hors de combat. Of the 670 men who had gone into action, only 195 were mounted when the brigade re-formed on the ground from which they had moved off, and during the engagement 24 officers were killed or wounded." Tennyson's lyric on the charge is well known.

Ligon (lig'ôn), Richard. An English royalist who, having lost his fortune, emigrated to Barbados in 1647. Soon after his return in 1650, his creditors cast him into prison, where he died. He published "A True and Exact History of Barbadoes" (London, 1656), which is the best of the early works on that island.

Ligonier (lig-ô-nêr'), John (Jean Louis), Earl Ligonier. Born at Castres, France, Nov. 7, 1680; died April 28, 1770. A distinguished English soldier, of Huguenot descent, made field-marshal and Earl Ligonier of Ripley, Surrey, in 1763. He came to England in 1697; entered the army under Marlborough in 1702, and took part in all the military events till 1710; was appointed governor of Fort St. Philip, Minorca; became brigadier-general and major-general in 1739; commanded the English infantry at the battle of Fontenoy, May 11, 1745; and was commander-in-chief of the British forces at the battle of Rancoux, Oct. 11, 1746. He was made prisoner at the battle of Lawfeld, July 2, 1747.

Liguori (lê-gwô'rô'), Alfonso Maria de'. Born at Marianella, near Naples, Sept. 26, 1696; died at Noera dei Pagani, Italy, Aug. 1, 1787. An Italian theologian, founder of the order of the Redemptorists in 1732. Among his works are "Theologia moralis" (1755), "Homo apostolicus" (1782), etc.

Liguria (li-gû'ri-â). In ancient geography, the country of the Ligurians, in northwestern Italy and southeastern France. At the time of Augustus it was included between the Mediterranean and the rivers Var, Po, Trebbia, and Magra. Originally it extended beyond these limits. It was at war with Rome from about 200 B. C. to about 120 B. C.; and was finally subjugated 14 B. C.

Ligurian Sea. [L. Ligusticum Mare.] In ancient geography, that part of the Mediterranean which lies near Liguria.

Li-hung-chang (lê-hông-châng). Born about 1821 in Gan-luwy province. A noted Chinese statesman, known as "the Bismarck of Asia." He joined General Gordon in opposing the T'âl-p'ing rebellion against Tatar rule: they were successful, both receiving the yellow jacket and the three-eyed peacock's feather, the highest orders bestowed by the emperors. He was appointed viceroy of Chih-li province and senior grand secretary of state in 1870, remaining the intermediary between China and the world at large until the beginning of the war with Japan. With the first reverses of the war of 1894, on the Chinese side, his enemies prevailed upon the emperor to strip him of his highest decorations, and, later, he was obliged to share the command of the army with Prince Kung, the emperor's uncle. Later still he and Prince Kung were superseded in command of the army by Liu-kun-yi, an enemy of Li. But at the close of the war, after ineffectual efforts by others, Li-hung-chang was made the high commissioner for China, with absolute powers, and brought about an agreement for peace between his country and Japan. He was the organizer of the only body of modern soldiers China employed, the founder of her navy of modern ships, the builder of her only railway. The faults of the Chinese army for which he was degraded early in the war were due to the weakness and ignorance of the Tsung-li-yamen, the board which conducted the war, and to which Viceroy Li was subordinated. He is now (1895) prime minister of China.

Lilburne (lil'bên), John. Born at Greenwich, England, about 1614; died at Eltham, Aug. 29, 1657. An English political agitator and Puritan pamphleteer. He was arrested Dec. 11, 1637, on the charge of printing unlicensed books (Prynne's and others), whipped and pilloried, and imprisoned until released at the opening of the Long Parliament. At the battle of Brentford he was taken prisoner, and was subsequently tried for treason, but was exchanged in 1643, and became (1644) lieutenant-colonel of dragoons. He was several times imprisoned and fined for scandalous attacks on persons of authority, and finally tried for sedition. Notwithstanding his acquittal, he was transferred to the Tower, thence to Elizabeth Castle, Guernsey, and from there to Dover Castle (Oct., 1655). He became a Quaker, and shortly after that Cromwell released him. He wrote a large number of controversial pamphlets.

Lilburne, Robert. Born in Durham, 1613; died at St. Nicholas Island, 1665. An English "regicide," brother of John Lilburne. He was an officer (colonel of infantry) in the Parliamentary army and in Dec., 1648, was appointed one of Charles's judges, and signed his death-warrant. In the Scottish campaigns (1651) he served with distinction, and was rewarded by Parliament. At the Restoration he was tried and condemned to death, but the sentence was not executed. He died a prisoner.

Lillibullero (lil'i-bu-lê'rô), or Lilliburlero (-bêr-lê'rô). A political song satirizing James II. of England, who had made an unwelcome nomination to the lord-licutenancy of Ireland. It was written by Lord Wharton about 1686. The music was by Henry Purcell, originally a march or quickstep. The song is the merest doggerel, but contributed a great impetus to the revolution of 1688. The whole army and the people sang it constantly. The taking refrain "Lillibullero bullen a la" (which is said to have been a watchword of the Irish Roman Catholics in their massacre of the Protestants in 1641) was specially adapted to the music of the quickstep with which the soldiers were familiar.

Lilliput (lil'i-put). A country on the shore of which Gulliver is wrecked, in Swift's "Gulliver's Travels." The inhabitants (the Lilliputians) were so small that Gulliver was a giant to them.

Lilly (lil'i), William. Born at Diseworth, Leicestershire, May 1, 1602; died at Hershams, June 9, 1681. A noted English astrologer and prophet. He was the author of a series of almanacs (1644-80, yearly), of many prophetic pamphlets, of the "Christian Astrology" (1647), long an authority on the art (reprinted as an "Introduction to Astrology," 1852), of the "True History of King James I. and King Charles I." (1651), and of "The History of Lilly's Life and Times" (1715), an autobiography. He resided in London 1620-66, and after that at Hershams.

Lily (lil'i), William. Born at Odiham, Hampshire, England, about 1468; died at London, 1522. A noted English grammarian, a friend of Colet, Erasmus, and More, and one of the first teachers of Greek in England. He studied the classics in Italy under Sulpicius and Pomponius Letius, and in 1512 was appointed high master of Colet's school in St. Paul's Churchyard. He contributed a Latin syntax ("Grammatices Rudimenta") to the "Editio" of Colet (1509), and, with the aid of Erasmus, wrote a syntax ("Absolutissimus de octo orationis partium constructione"), published in 1513. The two ("Editio" and "Absolutissimus") were revised and combined as a Latin grammar (1540), entitled "Institutio compendiaris totius grammaticæ, etc.," which was again issued, in altered form, in 1574, under the title "A Short Introduction of Grammar, etc." In this form it was used and quoted by Shakspeare. It was the national Latin grammar, and continued in popular use in various editions for many years.

Lilybæum (lil-i-bê'um). In ancient geography, a city near the promontory of Lilybæum (at the western extremity of Sicily: now Cape Boçò), founded by Carthage; the modern Marsala (which see). It was besieged and finally taken by the Romans 250-241 B. C.

Limnæ (lim'nê). [L., from Gr., 'the marshes.'] A region in ancient Athens, important as the seat of the earliest cult of Bacchus and the first rudimentary dramatic performances in Athens, and also important from the standpoint of topography. It has long been placed on the maps to the south of the Acropolis and the Dionysiac theater; but Dorpfeld has adduced reasons which may be accepted as conclusive for shifting it far to the northwest, so that it embraces the neighborhood of the Dipylon gate.

Limoges (lê-mözh'). The capital of the department of Haute-Vienne, France, situated on the Vienne in lat. 45° 50' N., long. 1° 16' E.: the Roman Augustoritum. Its porcelain manufactures are celebrated, and there are also manufactures of textiles and shoes. Kaolin is exported. The cathedral was begun in the 13th century, but the nave was only partly completed by the 16th; the remainder has lately been added. The interior is high and imposing. It possesses, though displaced, a remarkable rood-loft of 1533, covered with sculptures. Limoges was the capital of the Lenovices, and was a flourishing Roman city. It consisted of two towns in the middle ages. It suffered in the English and Huguenot wars; was sacked by the Black Prince in 1370; was the former capital of Limosin; and suffered from plague and fires. It was a center of the enameling industry from the 12th to the 16th century. Population (1891), 72,697.

Limousin (lê-mö-zän'). An ancient government of France. Capital, Limoges. It was bounded by Marche on the north, Auvergne on the east, and Guienne on the south and west, corresponding generally to the department of Corrèze and a large part of Haute-Vienne. The ancient inhabitants were the Lenovices. It passed with Eleanor of Aquitaine to Henry II. (of England), a century later to Brittany, and in the 15th century to the house of Albret. Henry IV. united it with the French crown.

It is bounded by Yorkshire (separated by the Humber) on the north, the North Sea on the east, Norfolk on the southeast, Cambridge and Northampton on the south, Rutland on the southwest, Leicester and Notts on the west, and Yorkshire on the northwest. The surface is generally level. It is partly occupied by the Fens (drained in the 17th and 18th centuries); is an important agricultural county; and is noted for the beauty of its parish churches. It formed part of ancient Mercia, later of the Danelagh. Area, 2,646 square miles. Population (1891), 472,878.

Lincoln. The capital of Lincolnshire, England, situated on the Witham in lat. 53° 14' N., long. 0° 33' W.: the Roman Lindum Colonia, or simply Lindum. The cathedral is a grand building, founded in the 11th century, but rebuilt in the end of the 12th and the first half of the 13th. The exterior is characterized by its 3 square towers—the central tower 262 feet high, and the 2 of the west front 200 feet high. The west front has 3 great arches corresponding to the nave and aisles, around which and in front of the towers is built a wide arcaded screen flanked by turrets. The gable between the towers is very richly ornamented. The portals are Norman. The square east end and the lateral elevations, with their double transepts, are of beautiful Early English. The imposing interior is for the most part Early English. The choir, inclosed by a Decorated screen, is Early English except the 5 easternmost bays (finished 1280), which constitute the celebrated Angel Choir, so called from its sculptured figures of angels. The stalls are of the 14th century. The dimensions of the cathedral are 480 by 89 feet; length of western transepts, 220 feet; height of vaulting, 82. The cloister and chapter-house are of the 13th century. The city contains many medieval buildings of interest. It has some trade and manufactures agricultural implements. It was important in the Roman and Saxon periods, and was a chief town of the Danelagh. Stephen captured its castle, and was defeated near it by partisans of Matilda in 1141. The castle was taken by the barons in 1216, and by the Parliamentarians in 1644. Population (1891), 41,491.

Lincoln. A city and the capital of Logan County, central Illinois, 28 miles northeast of Springfield. It is the seat of Lincoln University (Cumberland Presbyterian). Population (1890), 6,725.

Lincoln. The capital of Nebraska and of Lancaster County, situated on Salt Creek, lat. 40° 49' N., long. 96° 46' W. It is the seat of the State university; is a railroad center; and has a trade in grain and cattle. It was settled in 1867. Population (1890), 55,154.

Lincoln, Abraham. Born in Hardin County, Ky., Feb. 12, 1809; died at Washington, D. C., April 15, 1865. The sixteenth President of the United States. He was descended from a Quaker family, of English origin, residing in the middle of the 18th century in Berks County, Pennsylvania. His grandfather emigrated from Virginia to Kentucky about 1780.

His father, Thomas Lincoln, settled with his family in Indiana in 1830, and in Illinois in 1830. His mother was Nancy Hanks, Thomas Lincoln's first wife. He left his father's home soon after settling in Illinois, and after following various occupations, including those of a farm laborer, a salesman, a merchant, and a surveyor, was admitted to the bar in 1836, and began the practice of law at Springfield in 1837. He served first as a captain and afterward as a private in the Black Hawk war in 1832; was a Whig member of the Illinois State legislature 1834-42; and was a Whig member of Congress from Illinois 1847-1849. In 1858, as a Republican candidate for United States senator, he held a series of joint discussions throughout Illinois with the Democratic candidate, Stephen A. Douglas, in which he took a pronounced stand against the institution of slavery. This debate attracted the attention of the country, and in 1860 he was nominated as candidate for President by the Republican party. The disunion of the Democratic party secured for him an easy victory. He received 180 electoral votes against 72 for John C. Breckinridge, candidate of the Southern Democrats; 39 for John Bell, candidate of the Constitutional Union party; and 12 for Stephen A. Douglas, candidate of the Northern Democrats; and was inaugurated on March 4, 1861. His election was the signal for the secession, one after another, of the slave States of the South, and for the organization of the Confederate States (which see). Hostilities began with an attack by the Secessionists of South Carolina on the Federal troops at Fort Sumter, April 12, 1861. The fort surrendered on the 13th. On the 15th a call was issued by the President for 75,000 volunteers, and the control of events passed from the cabinet to the camp. (See Civil War.) He proclaimed a blockade of the Southern ports April 19, 1861; and Sept. 22, 1862, issued a proclamation emancipating all slaves in States or parts of States which should be in rebellion on Jan. 1, 1863. He was re-elected president by the Republican party in 1864, receiving 212 electoral votes against 21 for George B. McClellan, candidate of the Democratic party. He began his second term of office March 4, 1865. He entered Richmond with the Federal army April 4, 1865, two days after the flight of the Confederate government; and was occupied with plans for the reconstruction of the South when he was shot by John Wilkes Booth at Ford's Theater, Washington, April 14, 1865, and died on the following day. Numerous biographies of Lincoln have been published, the most comprehensive of which is that by J. G. Nicolay and John Hay (1890).

He discovered Lake Ngami in 1849; explored the Zambesi and Kuanza basins to Loanda 1851-54; recrossed the continent from Loanda to Kilimane, discovering Victoria Falls, in 1855; led a government expedition up the Zambesi and Shire rivers, and discovered Lakes Shirwa and Nyassa, 1858-59; explored the Rovuma valley in 1866, the Chambezi in 1867, and Lakes Tanganyika, Moero, and Bangweo's 1867-68; was at Ujiji in 1869; navigated Tanganyika, and was driven back by the Manyema; was relieved by Stanley at Ujiji in 1871; parted with Stanley in Unyamwebe in 1872, and returned to Lake Bangweolo; and succumbed there to dysentery in 1873. His body was carried to the coast, and was buried in Westminster Abbey April 18, 1874. He wrote "Missionary Travels in South Africa" (1857), and a "Narrative of an Expedition to the Zambesi" (1865). "The Last Journals of David Livingstone" were published in 1874.

Livius (liv'i-us), Saint. Died 656 (?). An ecclesiastic, called "the Apostle of Brabant," concerning whose life (if indeed he existed at all) little is recorded.

Livius Andronicus. See Andronicus.

Livny (liv'në). A town in the government of Orel, central Russia, situated on the Sosna 75 miles southeast of Orel. Population, 20,358.

Livonia (li-vö'ni-ä), G. Livland or Liefland (lêf'lânt), F. Livonie (lê-vö-në'). A government of Russia, one of the Baltic provinces. Capital, Riga. It is bounded by Esthonia on the north, Lake Peipus, Pskoff, and Vitebsk on the east, Courland (separated by the Duna) on the south, and the Gulf of Riga on the west. The island of Osel belongs to it. The surface is mainly level. The inhabitants are chiefly Letts and Esthonian. The nobility is German. The prevailing religion is Protestant. Livonia was the nucleus of the dominions of the Livonian (Sword-bearer) Knights, who began their settlements in 1201. In 1237 they united with the Teutonic Order. The Prussian and Livonian Knights were separated in 1521. After the dissolution of the order (1558-61) Livonia was for a short time a kingdom. After some changes it became Polish in 1582; passed to Sweden 1660 (having been conquered by Sweden in 1621-25); and was annexed to Russia in 1721. It is being Russified like the other Baltic provinces. Area, 18,158 square miles. Population (1887), 1,229,468.

Llanos (Sp. pron. lyä'nös). [Sp., from llano, a flat field.] A name given in many parts of Spanish America to large tracts of open land; in a special manner, and in a geographical sense, to the Llanos del Orinoco or de Venezuela, lying principally in Venezuela, with extensions into Colombia. They comprise nearly all the space between the Orinoco and its delta, the coast-range of Venezuela, and the Eastern Cordillera of Colombia as far as the Vichada branch of the Orinoco (about lat. 5° N.). The total area is probably 150,000 square miles, and most of it is quite flat and near the sea-level; but some parts are varied with table-topped hills a few hundred feet high. During the rainy season large areas are overflooded. The llanos are thinly inhabited, and the only industry is grazing, immense herds of cattle being kept in a nearly wild state. Llanos de Chiquitos, or Llanos de los Chiquitos (dä lös ehê-kê'tös). An extensive plain in eastern Bolivia, in the departments of Santa Cruz and Chuquisaca, extending from the mountains of Santa Cruz de la Sierra nearly to the river Paraguay. It is continuous with the Gran Chaco on the south, consists of grass-lands varied with woods or with scattered trees, has occasional isolated hills, and contains few inhabitants except Indians. Portions in the east are annually overflooded.

Llanos de Guaraos (gwā-rā'ōs). A northern extension of the Llanos de Chiquitos, near the river San Miguel.

Llanos de Manso (mān'sō) or de Manzo (mān'thō). A portion of the Chaco region of South America, in the extreme southeastern part of Bolivia, between the rivers Pilcomayo and Paraguay. In the 16th century this region was conceded to Andres Manso for colonization.

Llanquihue (lyān-kē'wā). A province of Chile, about lat. 41° S. Capital, Puerto Montt. Area, 7,823 square miles. Population (1891), estimated, 74,818.

Llewelyn, or Llywelyn (in full Llywelyn ab Gruffydd (lō-el'in ab grū'fēth)). Died 1282. Prince of Wales 1246-82, nephew of David II, whom he succeeded. He supported the English barons under Simon de Montfort against Henry III., and was defeated with them at Evesham in 1265. He refused to do homage to Edward I., whereupon the latter subdued Wales in 1277. He subsequently revolted, and fell in battle.

Lloque Yupanqui (lyō'kā yō-pān'kē). [Quechua: lloque, left-handed; yupanqui, you will count, i. e. great.] Third sovereign of the Inca line of Peru. According to the best chronologies, he ruled in the last quarter of the 14th century. He made few conquests. Acosta calls him Jaguarhuarque. Also written Loque Yupanqui, etc.

Llorente (lyō-rān'tā), Juan Antonio. Born near Calahorra, Aragon, March 30, 1756; died at Madrid, Feb. 5, 1823. A Spanish historian. He was a priest, though holding rationalistic views, and from 1789 to 1801 was general secretary of the Inquisition. Under Joseph Bonaparte he received charge of the confiscated property of the Inquisition and the religious orders, and in 1809 was ordered to examine the archives of the Inquisition and write its history. When the French were driven out of Spain he retired with them to Paris, where his history of the Inquisition was published 1817-18. It was strongly condemned by the Roman Catholic authorities, and he was interdicted from performing priestly functions. In 1822 he published a French edition of the principal works of Las Casas, with a biography; and the same year a work on the popes, which was condemned by the government; he was ordered to leave Paris. He published various other works, principally on Spanish history.

Lloyd (loid), Charles. Born at Birmingham, Feb. 12, 1775; died at Chaillot, near Versailles, Jan. 16, 1839. An English poet, a friend (and pupil) of Coleridge (with whom he lived for some time) and of Lamb. He became insane about 1815, and died in a madhouse.

Lloyd, Edward. Flourished about the beginning of the 18th century. The keeper of a coffee-house in Tower street, London, and later (1692) of "Lloyd's Coffee House" in Lombard street. His coffee-house became the center of ship broking and marine insurance. He published a paper, "Lloyd's News" (Sept., 1636, Feb., 1697), which was revived as "Lloyd's List" (1726), containing shipping and commercial news. From him the association and the corporation now known as "Lloyd's" were named.

Lloyd, Edward. Born at Thornton Heath, Surrey, Feb. 16, 1815; died at Westminster, April 8, 1890. A London publisher, founder (1842) of "Lloyd's Illustrated London Newspaper," and after 1876 proprietor of the "Daily Chronicle."

A Portuguese romance-writer and soldier (in the service of John I. of Portugal, by whom he was knighted in 1385); reputed author of the famous romance "Amadis of Gaul" (which see).

Lobengula (lō-beng-gō'lā). ['The defender.'] Born about 1833; died 1894. King of the Matabele (see Matabele), a son of Mosilikatse. He was long feared as a powerful warrior and persistent opponent of Christianity and civilization in his kingdom; but finally the British South African Company succeeded in obtaining from him, in exchange for improved firearms and ammunition, permission to settle in Mashonaland and to exploit its gold-mines. As soon as the company had built Fort Salisbury and supplied it well with men, artillery, ammunition, and provisions, it provoked the Matabele with a view to seizing their territory. In the war which ensued, in 1893, the brave Matabele regiments were mowed down by Maxim guns and dispersed by cavalry in several engagements. A decisive battle, in which 500 Matabele and only one white man fell, was fought on Oct. 23, some thirty miles from Bulawayo, Lobengula's capital. The latter was taken without further resistance and the king pursued as a fugitive. In his flight he managed to entrap and kill Major Wilson and his detachment.

Locke (lok), David Ross; pseudonym Petroleum V. Nasby. Born at Vestal, Broome County, N. Y., Sept. 20, 1833; died in 1888. An American political satirist. He commenced in 1860 the publication of the "Nasby Letters," contributed chiefly to the "Toledo Blade."

Locke, John. Born at Wrington, Somerset, Aug. 29, 1632; died at Oates, High Laver, Essex, Oct. 28, 1704. A celebrated English philosopher, one of the most influential thinkers of modern times. His father was a lawyer, and a captain in the Parliamentary army. Locke was educated at Westminster School (of which Busby was head-master), and at Christ Church, Oxford, where he graduated in Feb., 1656. He continued to reside at Oxford, and was for brief periods lecturer on Greek, lecturer on rhetoric, and censor of moral philosophy. In Dec., 1665, and Jan., 1666, he accompanied Sir Walter Vane as secretary on a mission to the Elector of Brandenburg. On his return he again went to Oxford to study medicine, but did not take a degree. In 1667 he became a member of the family of the (later) Earl of Shaftesbury, at first as physician and afterward as confidential agent. In 1669 he drew up a constitution for the colonists of Carolina, of which Shaftesbury (then Ashley) was one of the lords proprietors. Through his patron Locke was appointed secretary of presentations in 1672, and secretary of the council of trade 1673-75. He visited France in 1672, and again 1675-79. After the fall of Shaftesbury, Locke became an object of suspicion, and found it necessary (1683) to escape to Holland where he remained until 1689. In this year he became commissioner of appeals. From 1691

he resided at Oates, High Laver, Essex, in the family of Sir Francis Masham. His chief work is the "Essay concerning Humane Understanding" (1690; four subsequent editions, revised by Locke, appeared 1694, 1695, 1700, 1706). Among his other writings are several letters "Concerning Toleration" (1689 [Latin and English], 1690), "Two Treatises on Government" (1690), "Some Thoughts concerning Education" (1693), etc. Various collective editions of his works have been published. Locke was the founder of the English and French "sensational" philosophy and psychology, and the skeptical application of his principles by David Hume led Kant to the development of the "critical" philosophy.

Locker (lok'ér), Frederick. Born 1821; died May 30, 1895. An English poet, writer of "vers de société." He married as his second wife the daughter of Sir Curtis Lamson, and assumed the name of Locker-Lamson. Among his poems are "London Lyrics" (1857 and 1870), "Patchwork" (1879). He edited "Lyra Elegantiarum" in 1860, and contributed to various periodicals.

Locofocos (lök-fök'köz). In United States history, the equal-rights or radical section of the Democratic party about 1835; by extension, in disparagement, any of the members of that party. The name was given in allusion to an incident which occurred at a tumultuous meeting of the Democratic party in Tammany Hall, New York, in 1835, when the radical faction, after their opponents had turned off the gas, relighted the room with candles by the aid of locofoco matches. The Locofoco faction soon disappeared, but the name was long used for the Democratic party in general by its opponents. Often abbreviated Locos.

Locri Epicnemidii (lök'ki e-pik-nē-mid'i-i). In ancient geography, a Greek people dwelling along the Maliae Gulf, north of Phocis; so named from Mount Cnemis.

Locri Epizephyrii (ep'i-ze-fir'i-i), or Locri. In ancient geography, a city in southern Italy, situated on the coast in lat. 38° 15' N., long. 16° 15' E. Its site is near the modern Gerace. It was founded by the Locrians of Greece; was closely allied with Syracuse in the 4th century B. C.; and vacillated between Rome, Pyrrhus, and Carthage in the 3d century B. C. A Greek Ionic temple of Persephone, of the 5th century B. C., has been recovered by excavation here.

Locrine (lök'krin). A mythical king of England. He was the eldest son of Brute or Brutus, and the father of Sabrina, celebrated in Milton's "Comus." His story is told in Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Locrine. A tragedy published anonymously in 1595, probably written by Peele and Tilney about 1585. It has been ascribed to Shakspeare (from the initials W. S. on the title-page) and to Marlowe. The plot was taken from Holinshed, based on Geoffrey of Monmouth.

Locri Opuntii (ök-pun'shi-i). In ancient geography, a Greek people living north of Beotia and opposite Euboea; so named from Opus, their chief town. The name sometimes includes the country of the Locri Epicnemidii.

Locri Ozolæ (ök-zö-lä). In ancient geography, a Greek people living along the Corinthian Gulf, west of Phocis. The origin of the name is doubtful.

Locris (lök'kris). In ancient geography, a division of middle Greece, occupied by the Locri Epicnemidii and Locri Opuntii, or eastern Locrians, and the Locri Ozolæ, or western Locrians.

Locusta (lök-kus'ti). A professional poisoner living at Rome about 54 A. D. Juvenal speaks of her as the agent for ridding many a wife of her husband, and Tacitus as "long reckoned as among the instruments of government." She was employed by Agrippina to prepare a poison for the emperor Claudius. She was executed in the reign of Galba.

Lohengrin (lō'en-grin). [MHG. Loherangrin, Lohengrin.] In German legend, the mythical knight of the swan, the son of Parzival, and a knight of the Holy Grail. He is carried in a boat drawn by a swan to Antwerp, where he becomes the husband of the Princess of Brabant, on the condition that she shall never ask his name. She nevertheless breaks the agreement, and the swan comes with the boat and bears him away to the Grail. Allusion is made to his history at the end of the poem "Parzival," written by Wolfram von Eschenbach between 1205 and 1215. He is also mentioned in the "Titirel," written by one Albrecht between 1260 and 1270; and the same legend is the subject of the poem "Schwanritter" ("The Swan Knight"), by Konrad von Würzburg (died 1287), who does not, however, connect his hero with the Grail. A poem "Lohengrin," later remodeled under the name "Lorenz," written by an unknown author in Bavaria before 1290, gives a detailed history of the mythical knight. The legend has been localized on the lower Rhine as well as on the Schelde.

Lohengrin. A romantic drama, composed (words and music) by Richard Wagner in 1847, founded on the poem of "Lohengrin." It was first produced at Weimar under the direction of Liszt in 1850, and was produced at London May 8, 1875.

Loka (lō'ka). [Skt., 'world.'] A world. In Hindu works, the triloka, or three worlds, are generally heaven, earth, and hell. Another division gives seven, exclusive of seven hells (patalas). The upper worlds are (1) the earth; (2) the space between earth and sun, the region of the saints; (3) Indra's heaven, between the sun and the pole-star; (4) Maharloka, the usual abode of Bhriḡu and other saints; (5) the abode of Brahma's sons, Sanaka, Sananda, and Sanatsumara; (6) the abode of the Vairagias; (7) the abode of Brahma. The first three are destroyed at the end of each kalpa, or day of Brahma; the last four at the end of his life. The Sankhya and Vedanta schools recognize eight lokas: (1) that of the superior deities; (2) that of the Pitris, Rishis, and Prajāpatis; (3) that of the moon and planets; (4) that of the inferior deities; (5) that of the Gandharvas; (6) that of the Rakshasas; (7) that of the Yakshas; (8) that of the Pishachas. See these words.

Lokapalas (lō-ka-pā'laz). [Skt., 'guardians of the world.'] In Hindu mythology, the deities who preside over the eight points of the compass: i. e., the four cardinal and four intermediate. They are Indra, E; Agni, S.E.; Yama, S.; Surya, S.W.; Varuna, W.; Yau, N.W.; Kuvera, N.; Soma, N.E. Each of these has an elephant who helps to protect the region: these are also known as Lokapalas.

Lokeren (lō'ker-en). A town in the province of East Flanders, Belgium, situated on the Durme 23 miles northwest of Brussels. It has flourishing manufactures and trade. Population (1887), 19,667.

Loki (lō'kē). [ON.: lok, end; ljúka, lika, to close, end.] In Old Norse mythology, the god of destruction. His father was the giant Fárbauti (ON. Firbauti), his mother Laufey or Nal (ON. Nít). By the giantess Angurboda (ON. Angrbodha) he had 3 children: the Midgard-serpent, the Fenris-wolf, and Hel. Loki had throughout a twofold nature. He was of handsome appearance but of evil disposition, and was at the same time the friend and the enemy of the gods. For his evil deeds he was finally seized by the gods and bound. Over him was set a serpent whose poison would have fallen in drops upon his face had not his wife, Sigyn, caught them in a bowl. He was freed at Ragnarok, when he and Heimdall slew each other.

Lokman (lok-mān'). [Ar. Luqmān, called "The Wise."] The reputed author of a collection of fables in Arabic. Luqmān is the title of the 31st surah of the Koran, in the 11th verse of which are found the words "We gave to Luqmān wisdom." To this shadowy character have been ascribed the circumstances and sayings of a number of men; hence Lokman has been represented as a nephew of Job or Abraham, a counselor of David or Solomon, Balaam, an ugly Ethiopian slave, a king of Yaman, a tailor, a carpenter, a shepherd. The fables are very like those of Æsop, and still more like those of Syn-tipala. Many are of Greek origin, and a number of them go back, as do the fables of Pilpay, to Indian originals. They were first put into their present form by an Egyptian Christian named Barsama, probably toward the end of the 13th century. They were first edited (with a Latin translation) by Erpenius (Leyden, 1615). Recent editions are by Rodiger (2d ed. 1839) and Devenbourg (1850).

Lola Montez. See Gilbert, Marie D. E. R.

Lollards (lōl'ardz). [From MD. Lollaerd, one who mumbles prayers or hymns.] 1. A semi-monastic society for the care of the sick and the burial of the dead, which originated at Antwerp about 1300. Also called Cellites.—2. The English followers of Wyclif, adherents of a wide-spread movement, partly political and socialistic, and in some respects anticipating Protestantism and Puritanism, in the 14th and 15th centuries. They were also called Bible men, from their reverence for the Bible. They differed on some points both among themselves and from Wyclif, but in the main condemned the use of images in churches, pilgrimages to the tombs of saints, the temporal lordship of the clergy, the hierarchical organization, papal authority, religious orders, ecclesiastical decorations, the ceremony of the mass, the doctrine of transubstantiation, waging of wars, and capital punishment. Some of them engaged in seditious proceedings, and they were severely persecuted for more than a hundred years, especially after the adoption of a special statute ("De heretico comburendo") against them in 1401. Lollards were very numerous at the close of the 14th century, and perhaps formed later part of the Lancastrian party in the Wars of the Roses.

Lolli (lō'lī), Antonio. Born at Bergamo, Italy, about 1730; died in Sicily, 1802. A noted Italian violinist. He played with success in Stuttgart, St. Petersburg, Paris, and infrequently at London. "Owing to the eccentricity of his style of composition and execution, he was regarded as a madman by most of the audience." Burney, Hist. Music, IV. 680.

Lollius (lō'lī-us). An unknown author from whom Chaucer professed to have derived various things in his poems. He seems to stand for Petrarch, Boecaccio, and others, and "occupies in English poetry very much the same position as Junius in English politics" (Lounsbury, Studies in Chaucer, II. 411).

Lolo (lō'lō), or Balolo (bā-lō'lō). A great Bantu nation of the Kongo State, occupying the basins of the Lulongo, Tshuapa, and Lomami rivers in the horseshoe bend of the Kongo River, between Lake Leopold and Stanley Falls.

L'Olonnois (lō-lo-nwā'), François. Died in Costa Rica about 1668. A French buccaneer and pirate, noted for his ferocity. He was transported to the West Indies for crimes, joined the buccaneers as a common sailor, rose to high command among them, and from 1660 ravaged the coasts of Central America. He was eventually wrecked, and was killed by Indians. His real name is supposed to have been Jacques Jean David Nau.

Lolos (lō'lōz). A race of aborigines in western China, on the Tibetan frontier.

Lom (lōm). A river in Bulgaria, joining the Danube at Rustchuk. It was the scene of Turkish victories over the Russians, Aug.-Sept., 1877.

Lomami (lō-mā'mē). One of the great affluents of the Kongo River, which it joins on the left bank midway between Stanley Falls and the Aruwimi. It has its source near lat. 10° S., and its mouth near lat. 1° N., running parallel with the Luabala from south to north. It was discovered by Cameron, and is also called Boloko. Lomami is also the name of an affluent of the Sankuru.

Lombard (lōm'bārd), Peter, L. Petrus Lombardus (pē'trus lōm-bār'dus). Born at Novara, Italy, about 1100; died at Paris, 1160. An Italian theologian, appointed bishop of Paris in 1159. He was surnamed "Master of Sentences," from his work "Sententiarum libri IV" ("Four Books of Sentences"). See Book of Sentences.

Lombardi, I. An opera by Verdi, produced at La Scala, Milan, in 1843. Much of the music was afterward used by him in the opera "Gerusalemme."

Lombard League. An association between Brescia, Bergamo, Mantua, Verona, Cremona, Treviso, and other cities of Lombardy and northern Italy, founded in 1167 for protection against Frederick Barbarossa. It rebuilt Milan, defeated Frederick at Legnano in 1176, and secured liberties by the peace of Constance in 1153. It was renewed against Frederick II in 1226.

Lombardo (lōm-bār'dō), Pietro. Died in 1515. A Venetian architect. The name Lombardo was the patronymic of many north Italian artists who flourished in Venice from the middle of the 15th to the beginning of the 16th century. It is associated with a large class of works peculiar to the early Renaissance in Venice. The most definite personality of the school is Pietro the architect, to whom are attributed two altars in the choir of San Marco (1462-1471), the Church of Santa Maria dei Miracoli (begun in 1480), the monument to Dante (1482) at Ravenna, the Vendramini palace, the tomb of Doge Pietro Mocenigo in San Giovanni e Paolo, and the Moro chapel in San Giobbe. He was made director of public works March 15, 1499. The anonymous marbles which have been classed as belonging to the school of the Lombardi comprehend nearly all the Renaissance work produced about 1475-1550. Martino Lombardo is also noted as having built the Senola di San Marco and the San Zaccaria in Venice. It is not known whether or not he was the son of Pietro. To the Lombardi family also belong Tullio, Antonio, and Giulio (sons of Pietro), Santi, and Moro. The last probably came from Bergamo.

Lombardo-Venetian Kingdom. A kingdom constituted by Austria in 1815 out of the Italian territories assigned to her by the Congress of Vienna. It comprises Lombardy, Venetia, and Mantua. Lombardy was ceded to Victor Emmanuel in 1859, and Venetia and Mantua were surrendered to him in 1866.

Lombards (lōm'bārdz, formerly lum'bārdz). [Appar. 'long-beards.'] The natives or inhabitants of Lombardy in Italy. The name is used more specifically for the members of the Germanic tribe (Longobards) who about 568, under Alboin, conquered the part of northern Italy still called Lombardy, and founded the kingdom of that name, which was afterward extended over a much larger territory, and was finally overthrown by Charlemagne in 774. In old London the name Lombards was generic, and was applied to foreign merchants from southern Europe, but more especially to representatives of the great houses of the northern Italian cities. They also established themselves in France, chiefly at Nîmes and Montpellier. See Lombard street.

Lombard street. A street in the City, London, where the Lombard merchants of the middle ages established themselves before the reign of Edward II. With the Germans of the Steelyard they engrossed the more profitable branches of English trade. The goldsmiths seem to have had the most ready money. On occasion they lent money on interest, and gradually took up the business of banking, as it was then understood. They did not call themselves bankers, but kept "running cashes" or current accounts. In 1677 there were no less than thirty-seven goldsmiths keeping "running cashes" in Lombard street. The seizure by Charles I. of £200,000 stored in the Tower forced them to keep their money in circulation, and was practically the origin of modern systematic banking. (Compare Lombards.) Lombard street is now a great banking center.

Lombardy (lom'bar-dī). A Teutonic kingdom, founded in 568 by Alboin, which comprised at its height a large part of northern and central Italy. Its capital was Pavia. Various Lombard duchies (as Benevento) were founded further south in Italy. See Lombards.

Londinium (lon-din'i-um). The Roman name of London.

London (lun'don). [L. Londinium, origin uncertain; F. Londres, It. Londra, Sp. Londres.] The capital of England and seat of the government of the British empire, the largest and most important city in the world, and its principal business and financial center. It is situated in the counties of Middlesex, Surrey, and Kent, on both sides of the Thames, about 50 miles from its mouth, in lat. 51° 30' 48" N., long. 0° 5' 48" W. (St. Paul's Cathedral), occupying an area of about 117 square miles, and having upward of four million inhabitants. For purposes of registration and administration this vast center of population is variously subdivided. The City of London proper (generally called "The City") is little over a square mile in extent, and had in 1891 a population of only 37,504. It extends along the north bank of the Thames from the Temple to the Tower, and northward as far as Holborn and Finsbury Circus, and is the business center, its "day" population exceeding 300,000 in 1891. It has a distinct administration under the lord mayor, with 25 other aldermen and a court of common council. The rest of London forms an administrative county, which since 1888 has been under the control of the London County Council of 118 members. "The City" returns 2 members to the House of Commons, and the administrative county is divided into the following 27 boroughs, comprising 57 electoral divisions, each of which returns 1 member: Battersea and Clapham (2 members), Bethnal Green (2), Camberwell (3), Chelsea, Deptford, Finsbury (3), Fulham, Greenwich, Hackney (3), Hammersmith, Hampstead, Islington (4), Kensington (2), Lambeth (4), Lewisham, Marylebone (2), Newington (2), Paddington (2), St. George (Manor Square), St. Pancras (4), Shoreditch (2), Southwark (3), Strand, Tower Hamlets (7), Wandsworth, Westminster, and Woolwich. London was probably an ancient British town. It appears to have been resettled by the Romans about 43 A. D., and Londinium (called also Augusta) was the capital of Britannia in the last part of the Roman period. After the departure of the Romans (about 410) and in the early Saxon period its history is obscure, though there were bishops of London from the 7th century. It was plundered by the Danes, and rebuilt by Alfred and Athelstan. It received a charter from William I., and many privileges from Henry I. By the 14th century its commerce had greatly developed. The insurrection of Wat Tyler occurred in 1381. London sided with the Yorkists in the Wars of the Roses, and with the Parliamentarians in the civil war. It was scorched by the plague in 1665, and was almost entirely destroyed by the great fire of 1666. A financial panic happened in 1720, and the "No-Popery" riots in 1750. The "Great Exhibition" of 1851 was the first of the international exhibitions; it was followed by another in 1862. (For various objects of interest (the British Museum, the Guildhall, the Monument, the National Gallery, the Houses of Parliament, Royal Academy, St. Paul's Cathedral, the Tower, Westminster Abbey, etc.), and for very many local details, see the special headings.) Population (1891), of the registration county of London, 4,211,056 (2,687,084 in Middlesex, 1,568,896 in Surrey, and 367,076 in Kent); of "Greater London" (including the metropolitan and City of London police districts, partly in Essex), 5,633,332. The administrative county has about 20,000 more residents than the registration county.

London, Treaty of. The name of a number of treaties concluded at London between England and other powers, chief among which are the following. (a) The treaty of July 6, 1827, between England, France, and Russia, whereby those powers agreed to compel Turkey and Greece to accept their mediation with a view to restoring peace in the East. Greece was to be made autonomous under the sovereignty of the sultan, the Mohammedan population was to be removed, and the Greeks were to receive possession of all Turkish property in Greece on the payment of an indemnity. The offer of mediation was rejected by Turkey, which resulted in armed intervention. (b) The treaty of Nov. 15, 1851, between Great Britain, France, Austria, Prussia, and Russia, for the settlement of the Belgian question. It prescribed, among other things, that Belgium and Holland should bear separately the debts which they had contracted before the union, and that they should share the liabilities contracted since. The treaty was eventually carried out. (c) The treaty of 1832 between England, France, Russia, and Bavaria, by which the crown of Greece was given to Frederick Otto, second son of the king of Bavaria. (d) The treaty of March 13, 1871, by which the signatory powers of the treaty of Paris (which see) of 1856 acceded to the demand of Russia to strike out the clauses neutralizing the Black Sea.

London, University of. An educational institution, founded at London in 1836, which confers degrees after examination, but provides no courses of instruction.

London Bridge. The first of the bridges across the Thames at London, situated at the head of navigation, half a mile above the Tower. The earliest structure of which there is historical record was destroyed Nov. 16, 1091, by a storm and high tide. The first stone bridge was built 1176-1200 on a wooden foundation. It consisted of 20 arches. The roadway was 926 feet long, 60 feet above water, and 40 feet wide. Houses were built upon it, and in course of time it became a continuous street with 3 openings on each side to the river. A chapel of St. Thomas Becket stood upon the east side. The superstructures were repeatedly devastated by fire, most notably the great fire of 1666. The eleventh span from the Southwark end formed a drawbridge flanked by a tower built in 1126, on the top of which were stuck the heads of persons executed for treason. All the superstructures were removed in 1757. The present stone bridge, built by the Rennie, was begun March 15, 1824, and opened Aug. 1, 1831. It stands about 180 feet above the site of the old structure, which was pulled down in 1832. It is 920 feet long, 56 feet wide, and 55 feet high, and the central span is 150 feet.

London Company. A company of merchants and others dwelling in and near London, formed for the purpose of planting colonies in America. It was chartered in 1606, founded a colony at Jamestown in 1607, and was dissolved in 1624.

London Protocol. 1. The protocol of May 8, 1852, by which the great powers recognized Prince Christian of Glücksburg and his male descendants as heirs to Denmark, including Schleswig and Holstein. It was not ratified by the German Diet or the estates of Schleswig and Holstein.—2. The protocol of March 31, 1877, by which the great powers called upon Turkey to make peace with Montenegro and to carry out certain reforms affecting the Christian populations in the sultan's dominions. It was rejected by the Porte, and Russia alone took up arms against Turkey.

London Wall. A Roman wall built between 350 and 369 around London. It inclosed 330 acres. There were two gates in it—the western gate, now Newgate, for the Pretorian way or Watling street; and the northern gate, for the road to York, or Ermine street, now Bishops-gate. There was also a gate at the bridge at Dowgate, and possibly one at Billingsgate. During the Danish invasion the wall was broken down, but was restored by Alfred in 886. Posterns were then opened at Ludgate, at Cripplegate, and probably at what was later Moorgate. The wall was kept up till comparatively modern times, and fragments of it are still discernible. The most notable portion is in the street now called London Wall, between Wood street and Aldermanbury.

He was United States minister to Turkey 1880-81.

Longsword (lóng'sörd), Richard. A son of Henry II. Rosamond Clifford has long been said to be his mother.

The evidence of Longsword being Rosamund's son is equally untrustworthy, and the fact is discredited by all sound recent historical writers. The name of his true mother is unknown even in early tradition. The argument, drawn from the grant made to Longsword by his father, shortly before his death, in 1188, of the manor of Appleby in Lincolnshire, rests on a confusion between that manor and the manor of Appleby in Westmoreland, which was held by Rosamund's family, the Cliffords.

Notes and Queries, 8th ser., III, 293.

Long Tom. A 42-pound gun, originally part of the armament of the French line-of-battle ship Hoche, captured by the English 1798, and sold to the Americans. It was used during the French attack on Haiti in 1804; was dismounted till 1812; and was placed on the General Armstrong, which ran the blockade of the British at New Orleans, Sept. 9, 1814. This vessel ran into the bay near Horta, Fayal, for water after an encounter with a British squadron, in which she was rendered helpless. Long Tom was dismantled, and lay at Fayal till it was brought back to New York on the steamship Vega April 18, 1883, through the efforts of Colonel Reid, the son of the commander of the General Armstrong.

In the storming of Lookout Mountain, Nov. 24, 1863, the Federals were under the immediate command of Hooker, and advanced up the northern face. Owing to the heavy mist on the mountain-side, the battle is often called "the battle above the clouds."

Loomis (lô'mis), Elias. Born at Willington, Conn., Aug. 7, 1811; died at New Haven, Aug. 15, 1889. An American mathematician and physicist. He graduated at Yale in 1830, and was professor of mathematics at Western Reserve College 1837-44, of natural philosophy at the University of the City of New York 1844-63, and of natural philosophy and astronomy at Yale 1860-80. He published a series of mathematical textbooks, including "Plane and Spherical Trigonometry" (1848), "Elements of Algebra" (1851), "Elements of Geometry and Conic Sections" (1851).

Loos (lôs). A town in the department of Nord, France, immediately west of Lille. Population (1891), commune, 7,924.

Loosjes (lôs'yes), Adriaan. Born on the island of Texel in 1761; died at Haarlem in 1818. A Dutch novelist and poet. He was intended, at the outset, for the church, but became a bookseller, a calling which he followed until his death. He wrote the volume of poems "Minnezangen" ("Love Songs," 1783), the epic "De Ruyter" (1784), and a number of dramas. His principal work is, however, his romances. These are the historical novels "Frank van Borselen en Jacoba van Beijeren" (1790-91), "Charlotte van Bourbon" (1792), "Hugo de Groot en Maria van Reijgersbergen" (1794), "Louise de Colligny" (1803), "Johan de Witt" (1805). They were followed by a series of contemporary character sketches in three parts, under the title "Zedelijke Vertalen" ("Moral Tales," 1804-05). The novel "Historie van Mejnrouw Susanna Bronkhorst" ("The History of Miss Susanna Bronkhorst," 1806-07) was in epistolary form. His principal historical novel, "Maurits Lijfslager," was the next to appear (1808). This was followed, finally, by four others: "Hillegonda Buisman" (1808), "Lotgevallen van den Heere R. J. van Golstein" ("The Adventures of Mr. R. J. van Golstein," 1809-10), "Robert Hellermans" (1815), and "Johan Wouter Blommestein" (1816).

Lopamudra (lô-pä-mô'drä). In Hindu mythology, a girl whom the sage Agastya formed from the most graceful parts of different animals and introduced into the palace of the King of Vidarbha, who believed her to be his daughter. When she was grown, Agastya, who had formed her that he might have a wife after his own heart, asked her in marriage. Her name is explained as meaning that the animals suffered loss (lopa) by her engrossing of their distinctive beauties (mudra), such as the eyes of the deer.

Lopez (lô'pâth), Cape. A cape on the western coast of Africa, situated in lat. 0° 36' S., long. 8° 44' E.

Lopez (lô'pâth, locally lô'pâz), Carlos Antonio. Born near Asuncion about 1795; died there, Sept. 10, 1862. President of Paraguay. He was made first consul March 12, 1841, and from that time was practically dictator. Elected president for 10 years in 1844, he was reelected for 3 years in 1844, and for 7 years in 1857; but these elections were merely nominal, since Congress simply obeyed his orders. His arbitrary acts caused constant quarrels with foreign nations, and in 1859 the United States sent a squadron to the Plata to enforce demands against him; in this case he offered to submit the question of damages to arbitration, but subsequently evaded the claim.

Lopez, Francisco Solano. Born at Asuncion, July 24, 1826 or 1827; died near the Aquidaban, March 1, 1870. A Paraguayan soldier and statesman, son of Carlos Antonio Lopez. On the death of the elder Lopez, Sept. 10, 1862, he assumed the executive by virtue of his father's will, and convoked a congress which elected him president for 10 years. Having previously made secret preparations for war, he interferred in the quarrel of Brazil and Uruguay, and finally, without previous declaration of hostilities, seized a Brazilian mail steamer which was ascending the river (Nov., 1864). Soon after this he sent a large force to invade Matto Grosso, a Brazilian province, and made war on the Argentine. This led to the alliance of Brazil, Uruguay, and Argentina against Paraguay, and a long and bloody struggle. (See Triple Alliance, War of the.) As the events of the war turned against him, his despotism and cruelty bordered on insanity. In many of his worst acts it appears to have been influenced by his Irish mistress, known as Madam Lynch. In 1868 several hundred natives and foreigners were arrested, tortured, and executed on an entirely unproved charge of conspiracy; they included generals, ministers, judges, bishops, priests, merchants, foreign consuls, and his own brothers and brothers-in-law. The American minister, Mr. Washburn, was only saved by the timely arrival of a United States gunboat, and two members of the legation were tortured.—Driven at length from Asuncion, he retreated to the interior with a small force, was surprised near the river Aquidaban by a Brazilian force, and was killed with his eldest son.

Lopez, José Hilario. Born at Popayan, Feb. 18, 1798; died at Neiva, Nov. 27, 1869. A New Granadan (Colombian) general and politician. From March 7, 1849, to March 7, 1852, he was president of New Granada. Under him slavery was abolished (Jan., 1852), and various changes were made in the direction of a federal form of government. In 1854, and again from 1859 to 1862, he fought on the side of the federalists, part of the time as commander-in-chief; and on the triumph of his party was made a member of the provisional government 1862-63. Later he was president of Tolima, and in 1867 was named commander-in-chief of the army, but soon retired.

Lopez, Narciso. Born in Venezuela, 1798 or 1799; died at Havana, Cuba, Sept. 1, 1851. A Spanish-American general and filibuster. He fought against the patriots in Venezuela, and subsequently against the Carlists in Spain, where he was governor of Valencia 1839, and became general in 1840. In 1841 he went to Cuba, became involved in revolutionary plots, and in 1849 fled to the United States. Thence he organized three filibustering expeditions. The first (1849) was stopped by the United States authorities; the others (May, 1850, and Aug., 1851) left New Orleans and reached Cuba, but resulted disastrously, and Lopez was finally captured and shot with many of his followers.

Lopez, Vicente Fidel. Born at Buenos Ayres, 1814. An Argentine author, son of Vicente Lopez y Planes. In 1874 he was made rector of the University of Buenos Ayres. Among his works are "Luzes del Perú anteriores a la conquista," "Tratado de derecho Romano," and "Historia de la República Argentina." He edited the "Revista del Río de la Plata."

Lopez de Villalobos (dā vĕl-yā-lō'vōs), Rui. Died at Amboyna, East Indies, 1546. A Spanish navigator, a relative of Antonio de Mendoza, viceroy of Mexico. In Nov., 1542, he sailed from the west coast of Mexico with a small fleet destined to form a colony in the Philippine Islands; but his ships were scattered by storms, he quarreled with the Portuguese of the Moluccas, and in the end the enterprise was given up. Most of the members of the expedition returned to Europe by the Cape of Good Hope, Villalobos dying on the way.

Lopez de Zúñiga (thōn'yē-gā), Diego de, Count of Nieva. Born in Spain about 1520; died at Lima, Peru, Feb. 20, 1564. Viceroy of Peru from April 17, 1561. He led a loose life, and, as was supposed, was assassinated by a jealous husband.

Lopez Pacheco Cabrera y Bobadilla (pā-ehā'kō kā-brā'rā ē bō-bā-thĕl'yā), Diego, Duke of Escalena and Marquis of Villena. Died after 1643. A Spanish administrator. He became viceroy of Mexico Aug. 28, 1640. Owing to his being related to the royal house of Portugal, which at this period separated from Spain, he was an object of suspicion, and this was increased by his quarrels with the visitador Palatox. On June 9, 1642, he was arrested, and soon after sent to Spain. There he cleared himself of all charges, and was appointed viceroy of Sicily.

Lopez y Planes (plā'nes), Vicente. Born at Buenos Ayres, 1784; died there, 1856. An Argentine jurist and politician. He was acting president for a short time in 1837, and president of the Supreme Court during the dictatorship of Rosas. After the fall of Rosas he had temporary charge given him of the government (1852), and subsequently was elected governor of the province of Buenos Ayres. He was the author of the Argentine national hymn.

Lorraine (lō-rān'), G. Lothringen (lō't-ring-en), L. Lotharingia (lō-thā-rin'jii). A region which as a lordship has varied greatly in medieval and modern times, but has always been on the border between France and Germany. It was originally the realm of Lothaire (son of Lothaire I., emperor of the Romans), who inherited it in 855. This kingdom, which existed but for a few years, was included mainly between the Rhine, Schelde, Meuse, Saône, and the Alps. Lorraine appears as a duchy about 911, and became an imperial fief under Henry the Fowler. About 939 the division was made of Lower Lorraine (which developed into the separate duchies of Brabant, Limburg, etc.) and Upper Lorraine. The latter continued an imperial fief. The bishoprics of Metz, Toul, and Verdun were annexed to France 1552. Lorraine was several times conquered by France in the 17th century. It was given to Stanislaus of Poland in 1737, and on his death in 1766 reverted to France. The region thus annexed constituted a grand government with its capital at Nancy, and was bounded by Luxemburg and Prussia on the north, the Palatinate on the northeast, Alsace on the east, Franche-Comté on the south, and Champagne on the west. It was afterward transformed into the departments of Meuse, Moselle, Meurthe, and Vosges. In 1871 part of it (German Lorraine) was ceded to Germany. This forms the district (Bezirk) of Lothringen in Elsass-Lothringen (Alsace-Lorraine), with Metz as capital, having an area of 2,431 square miles, and a population (1890) of 510,392. The remaining part (French Lorraine) comprises the departments of Meuse, of Meurthe-et-Moselle, and also that of Vosges.

Loti (lô-tê'), Pierre. See Viaud, Louis Marie Julien.

Lotophagi (lô-tof'ä-jî). [Gr. λωτοφάγοι, lotus-eaters.] The lotus-eaters; in Greek legend, especially as given in the Olysssey, the name of a people who ate the fruit of a plant called the lotus, conjecturally identified with various plants which have borne that name. Those of the followers of Odysseus or Ulysses who ate of it are described as being rendered forgetful of their friends and unwilling to return to their own land. In historical times a people known under the name of Lotophagi lived on the northern coast of Africa in Tripoli, and on the island of Meninx (Lotophagitis, modern Jerba) in Tunis.

Lötschenthal (lêt'shen-räl). The valley of the Lonza, a right-hand tributary of the Rhone, canton of Valais, Switzerland, about 13 miles west-northwest of Brieg.

Lotze (lôt'se), Rudolf Hermann. Born at Bautzen, Saxony, May 21, 1817; died at Berlin, July 1, 1881. A noted German philosopher, psychologist, and physiologist, professor of philosophy at Göttingen 1844-81. In 1881 he was appointed professor of philosophy at Berlin. He opposed, as a physiologist, the theory of a "vital force"; was one of the founders of physiological psychology; and, as a metaphysician, elaborated a system of ideal-realism or teleological idealism. He published notable articles in Wagner's "Handwörterbuch der Physiologie," "Metaphysik" (1840), "Allgemeine Pathologie und Therapie als mechanische Naturwissenschaften" (1842), "System der Philosophie" ("Logik," 1843, revised 1874; "Metaphysik," 1878), "Allgemeine Physiologie des körperlichen Lebens" (1851), "Medizinische Psychologie" (1852), "Mikrokosmos" (1856-1864), "Geschichte der Aesthetik in Deutschland" (1868), etc.

Louis (lô'is or lô'ê) I, surnamed "Le Pieux" and "Le Débonnaire." [E. Lewis, F. Louis, II. Luigi or Lodovico, Sp. Luis; Pg. Luiz, L. Ludovico, G. Ludwig.] Born 778; died on an island in the Rhine, near Mainz, June 20, 840. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 814-840, son of Charles the Great whom he succeeded. He established in 817 an order of succession in accordance with which his eldest son Lothair was to inherit the imperial title with Austrasia and the greater part of Germany, while the rest of the empire was to be divided among his younger sons Pepin and Louis. He married a second wife in 819, and in 829 modified the order of succession adopted in 817 in such a manner as to give Charles, a child of his second marriage, Alamaania, with the title of king. The three elder sons revolted in consequence, and he was compelled to surrender by the defection of his troops on the Field of Lies, near Colmar, in Alsace, in 833. He was liberated by Louis and restored to the throne in 834.

Louis, surnamed "The German." Born about 804; died at Frankfurt, Aug. 28, 876. King of Germany 843-876, son of the emperor Louis I. (whom see). On the death of his father he united with his brother Charles against Lothair, whom they defeated at the battle of Fontenay in 841. By the treaty of Verdun in 843, which finally settled the dispute as to the division between the brothers, he received the whole of Germany east of the Rhine, and Mainz, Spire, and Worms on the west. He is commonly regarded as the founder of the German kingdom.

Louis II. Born about 822; died 875. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 855-875, son of the emperor Lothair I, whom he succeeded in Italy. He was crowned king of Lorraine by the Pope in 872, in opposition to his uncles Charles the Bald and Louis the German, the throne of Lorraine having been vacated by the death of his brother Lothair in 859.

Louis III. Died 920 (917?). Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 901-905, son of Boso, king of Provence. He acceded to the throne of Provence in 890; was crowned emperor in 901; and was deposed in 905 by Berengarius I. of Italy, by whom he was blinded and sent back to Provence.

Louis, surnamed "The Child." Born 893; died 911. King of Germany 900-911, son of the emperor Arnulf. He acceded at the age of six, and the government was conducted chiefly by Hatto, archbishop of Mainz. During his reign Germany was devastated by the Magyars or Hungarians. He was the last of the Carolingians in Germany.

Louis IV, surnamed "The Bavarian." Born 1286; died near Munich, Oct. 11, 1347. Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire 1314-47, son of the Duke of Bavaria. He was opposed by Frederick, duke of Austria, whom he made prisoner at the battle of Muldorf in 1322. He was crowned emperor in 1328. In 1338 the electoral princes met at Rhense, where they adopted resolutions to the effect that the emperor derived his right to the German and imperial crowns by virtue of his election by the electoral princes, independent of any coronation by the Pope.

Louis I. Born at Strasburg, Aug. 25, 1786; died at Nice, Feb. 29, 1868. King of Bavaria 1825-48, son of Maximilian I. Joseph. He was a patron of art and literature. On the outbreak of the revolution in 1848 he abdicated in favor of his son Maximilian II.

Louis II. Born at Nymphenburg, near Munich, Aug. 25, 1845; died June 13, 1886. King of Bavaria 1864-86, son of Maximilian II. He supported Austria against Prussia in 1866, and Prussia against France in 1870-71. He joined the North German Zollverein in 1867, and became a member of the German Empire in 1871. He is chiefly known as the patron of Richard Wagner.

Having become insane, he was confined in the palace of Berg on Lake Starnberg, near Munich, in 1886, and committed suicide by drowning in the lake.

Louis I., King of France. See Louis I., Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire.

Louis II., surnamed "Le Bègue" (F., 'the Stammerer'). Born 846; died at Compiègne, France, April 10, 879. King of France 877-879, son of Charles the Bald.

Louis III. Born about 863; died 882. King of France (conjointly with his brother Carloman) 879-882, son of Louis II.

Louis IV., surnamed "D'Outre-Mer" (F., 'from beyond seas'). Born 921; died 954. King of France 936-954, son of Charles the Simple. During his reign the kingdom was practically governed by Hugh the Great and other powerful vassals. He received his surname from the fact that he was, on the death of his father, carried to England by his mother, Edgith, sister of Athelstan, king of England, to avoid falling into the hands of his rival, Rudolph of Burgundy, who had been elected king of France by the nobles. He returned from England on the death of Rudolph in 936.

Louis V., surnamed "Le Fainéant" (F., 'the Slingard'). Born 966; died May, 987. King of France 966-987, son of Lothair. He was the last of the Carolingians in France.

Louis VI., surnamed "Le Gros" (F., 'the Fat'). Born about 1078; died 1137. King of France 1108-37, son of Philip I. He made Suger, abbot of St. Denis, his chief minister.

Louis VII., surnamed "Le Jeune" and "Le Pieux" (F., 'the Young' and 'the Pious'). Born about 1120; died 1180. King of France 1137-80, son of Louis VI. He took part (1147-49) in the second Crusade, and in 1152 divorced his wife, Eleanor of Poitou (whom see), who married Henry of Anjou (afterward Henry II. of England) in the same year. He retained during the earlier part of his reign his father's great minister, Suger.

Louis VIII., surnamed "Le Lion." Born 1187; died at Montpensier, Auvergne, France, Nov. 8, 1226. King of France 1223-26, son of Philip Augustus. He married Blanche of Castile, granddaughter of Henry II. of England, in 1200, and in 1216 was offered the English crown by the barons in opposition to John. He landed in England in 1216; but after the death of John the barons gradually went over to the court party, which recognized John's son, Henry III.; and he returned to France in 1217.

Louis IX. (St. Louis). Born at Poissy, France, April 25, 1215; died near Tunis, Aug. 25, 1270. King of France 1226-70, son of Louis VIII. He undertook a crusade in 1248; captured Damietta in 1249; and during an expedition against Cairo was defeated by the Ayyubid sultan, Toorinshah (Almoznab) and captured, with the whole French army, in April, 1250. He was liberated on the evacuation of Damietta and the payment of a ransom, and returned to France in 1254. He surrendered Poitiers, the Limousin, and southern Saintonge to Henry III. of England in 1259, in return for which the latter renounced his claim to Normandy, Anjou, Maine, Touraine, Poitou, and northern Saintonge. He undertook a crusade against Tunis in 1270, during which he died. He was canonized by Boniface VIII. in 1297.

Louis X., surnamed "Le Hutin" (F., 'the Quarreller'). Born 1289; died 1316. King of France 1314-16, son of Philip IV. He inherited the kingdom of Navarre through his mother, Joan of Navarre, in 1305.

Louis XI. Born at Bourges, France, July 3, 1423; died at Plessis-les-Tours, near Tours, France, Aug. 30, 1483. King of France 1461-1483, son of Charles VII. He destroyed the power of the great feudatories, and laid the foundation of the absolute monarchy which afterward obtained in France. The arbitrary and perfidious measures which he adopted provoked a conspiracy of the nobles under the lead of Charles the Bold of Burgundy. The conspirators organized a "league of the public weal," and fought a drawn battle at Montherly in 1465, but succumbed to the diplomacy of the king, who detached Charles the Bold and the Duke of Berry by bribery. After having destroyed his less formidable opponents, he made war on Charles, who allied himself with Edward IV. of England. On the death of Charles, at the battle of Nancy against the Swiss in 1477, he united the duchy of Burgundy with the crown. In 1481 he obtained possession of Provence, Anjou, and Maine by the extinction of the house of Anjou.

Louis XII., surnamed "The Father of the People." Born at Blois, France, June 27, 1462; died Jan. 1, 1515. King of France 1498-1515, a descendant of the younger son of Charles V., and founder of the branch line of Valois-Orléans. He divorced his wife, Jeanne, daughter of Louis XI., and married (1499) Anne of Brittany, widow of Charles VIII., in order to retain the duchy of Brittany for the crown. In 1499 he expelled Ludovico Moro and took possession of Milan, to which he laid claim as the grandson of Valentina Visconti. He conquered Naples in 1501 in alliance with Ferdinand the Catholic of Aragon, but disagreed with his ally over the division of the spoil, with the result that his army was defeated by the Spanish general Gonzalvo de Cordova on the Garigliano in 1503. In 1508 he joined the emperor Maximilian, Pope Julius II., and Ferdinand the Catholic in the League of Cambray against Venice. The Pope, however, who feared the presence of the French in Italy, negotiated in 1511 the Holy League with Venice and Ferdinand the Catholic for the expulsion of the French; the league was afterward joined by the emperor and Henry VIII. of England. Henry and the emperor defeated Longueville at Guinegate in the "battle of the spurs," Aug. 16, 1513, and the French were in the same year expelled from Italy; but Louis succeeded in breaking up the league by diplomacy, and was preparing to reconquer Milan when he died.

Louis XIII. Born at Fontainebleau, France, Sept. 27, 1601; died at St. Germain-en-Laye, France, May 14, 1643. King of France 1610-1643, son of Henry IV. He succeeded under the regency of his mother Marie de Médicis; was declared of age in 1614; and married Anne of Austria in 1615. In 1614 he summoned the States-General, which were not summoned again before the Revolution of 1789. In 1624 he chose as his prime minister Richelieu, whom he maintained in office until Richelieu's death in 1642. The chief results of his reign, due to the policy of Richelieu, were the destruction of the political power of the Huguenots, which was completed by the siege and capture of Rochelle 1627-28; the centralization of the government in the hands of the king, who was made independent of the nobles and the parliament; and the abatement of the power of the house of Austria, whose preponderance in Europe was irretrievably lost by the intervention of France and Sweden in the Thirty Years' War. See Richelieu.

Louis XIV., surnamed "Le Grand" (F., 'the Great'). Born at St.-Germain-en-Laye, France, Sept. 5 (1673), 1638; died at Versailles, France, Sept. 1, 1715. King of France 1643-1715, son of Louis XIII. and Anne of Austria. He ascended the throne under the guardianship of his mother, who chose Cardinal Mazarin as her chief minister. He was declared of age at fourteen, but retained Mazarin in office until the cardinal's death in 1661, when he assumed personal control of the government. He assumed the direction of affairs at a time when the policy inaugurated by Richelieu and continued by Mazarin had made the Bourbons absolute at home and paramount abroad. The reforms of Colbert, his controller-general of the finances (1661-83), swelled his treasury while promoting industry and economy; and those of Louvois, his minister of war (1666-91), transformed his army into the most perfect military organization in Europe. His desire of conquest and dreams of a French universal monarchy embroiled him in numerous wars, in which his arms were sustained by Turenne, Condé, Luxembourg, Catibat, Villars, Vendôme, and Vauban. His first war (1667-68) was fought with Spain on account of the Spanish Netherlands, which he claimed through his wife Maria Theresa, daughter of Philip IV. of Spain. It was ended by the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, and resulted in the acquisition of a number of fortified towns on the Belgian frontier. His second war (1672-78) was directed against Holland supported by the Empire, Spain, Brandenburg, and Sweden, and resulted in the acquisition of territory from Spain and Austria at the peace of Nimwegen. In 1681 he annexed Strasbourg (see Reunion, Chambers of), and in 1685 revoked the Edict of Nantes (which see). His third war (1688-97) was with England, the Netherlands, the Empire, Spain, and Savoy, and concerned the Palatinate, to which he laid claim. It was unsuccessful, and was ended by the peace of Ryswick, by which Alsace and Strasbourg were formally ceded to France. His fourth war (1701-14) concerned the succession in Spain, whose throne he claimed for his grandson, Philip of Anjou. In this war he fought, after 1703, almost single-handed against the bulk of Europe. (See Spanish Succession, War of) The peace of Utrecht (1713) and of Rastatt and Baden (1714) secured Spain for his grandson, but left Louis with an exhausted treasury and a broken army. As a result of these wars, of the vicious fiscal policy which he introduced after the death of Colbert, and of his bigoted and intolerant policy toward the Huguenots, which drove 60,000 families from France, the country was prostrated, and the way prepared for the Revolution. The reign of Louis XIV. has been styled the Augustan Age of France.

Louis XV. Born at Versailles, France, Feb. 15, 1710; died at Versailles, May 10, 1774. King of France 1715-74, great-grandson of Louis XIV. During his minority the government was administered by the Duke of Orléans. He was declared of age in 1723, and in 1725 married Marie Leszcinska, daughter of Stanislas, the deposed king of Poland. On the death of the Duke of Orléans in 1723, the Duke of Bourbon was appointed prime minister. He was in 1726 superseded by Fleury, after whose death in 1743 the government was conducted by appointees of the king's mistresses Pompadour and Du Barry. In 1741 Louis joined the coalition against Maria Theresa of Austria (see Austrian Succession, War of), and was a party to the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle in 1748. In 1754 hostilities broke out between the French and the English in America without any declaration of war (see French and Indian War), and in 1756 he became involved in the Seven Years' War as the ally of Maria Theresa and Russia against Prussia and England. He lost by the treaty of Paris in 1763 Canada and Louisiana, and at his death left the kingdom impoverished, oppressed, and discontented.

Louis XVI. Born at Versailles, France, Aug. 23, 1754; guillotined at Paris, Jan. 21, 1793. King of France 1774-92, grandson of Louis XV. He married in 1770 Marie Antoinette, daughter of Maria Theresa of Austria, who was at first extremely popular, but afterward incurred the dislike of the people, and whose influence was exerted for the maintenance of the system of favoritism which obtained at court. On ascending the throne in 1774, he appointed Turgot minister of finance. The finances were in extreme disorder, dating from the closing years of the reign of Louis XIV., and the temper of the nation had been roused by the waste and incompetence under Louis XV. Turgot began a series of reforms which were opposed by the nobility and the clergy, with the result that he was superseded by Necker in 1777. Louis recognized the independence of the United States in 1778, and sent an army and a fleet to their support, which materially assisted in securing the peace of Paris between the United States and Great Britain in 1783. France concluded a separate treaty with Great Britain in the same year. On the conclusion of peace, the French troops which had been employed in America returned enthusiastic for freedom and a republican form of government. In 1781

Necker resigned, owing to the failure of the court to support his financial reforms, and Calonne became minister of finance in 1783. He gratified the court by securing new loans, but the increasing deficit compelled him to resign in 1787. He was followed by De Brienne, who advised the king to convoke the States-General, which had not met since 1614. The States-General convened at Versailles in May, 1789, and enabled the nation to give expression to the revolutionary tendencies which had been fostered by generations of misrule. (See French Revolution.) The weak and vacillating king, acting on the advice of his queen, refused, until too late, to grant the demands of the popular party, but could not be induced to adopt energetic measures to resist them. France was declared a republic in 1792, and Louis was executed Jan. 21, 1793, after a mock trial by the Convention.

Louis XVII. Born at Versailles, France, March 27, 1785; died in the Temple, Paris, June 8, 1795. Titular king of France, second son of Louis XVI. and Marie Antoinette. He became daphin in 1789, was imprisoned in the Temple in 1792, and was proclaimed king by the émigrés on the execution of his father in 1793, but died in prison. See Williams, E.

Louis XVIII. (Stanislas Xavier). Born at Versailles, France, Nov. 17, 1755; died at Paris, Sept. 16, 1824. King of France 1814-24, younger brother of Louis XVI. He emigrated in 1791, and assumed the royal title on the death of Louis XVII. (whom see) in 1795. He ascended the throne on the fall of Napoleon in 1814, and promulgated a constitution based on the English model. He was expelled by Napoleon in March, 1815 (see Hundred Days), and was restored by the allied armies in June, 1815.

Louis XI. A melodrama by Casimir Delavigne, produced in 1832. Boncicault wrote an English version in 1846. Henry Irving is identified with the character.

Louis, Pierre Charles Alexandre. Born at Aî, Marne, France, 1787; died at Paris, 1872. A French physician. He wrote "Recherches sur la fièvre typhoïde" (1828), etc.

Louis Napoléon. See Napoleon III.

Louis Philippe (lô'ê fi-lêp'), surnamed "Roi Citoyen" (F., 'Citizen King'). Born at Paris, Oct. 6, 1773; died at Claremont, England, Aug. 26, 1850. King of the French 1830-48, son of Philippe Egalité, duc d'Orléans. He favored the Revolution, and served under Dumouriez against the Austrians, but became involved in the conspiracy of his chief against the republic, and found himself compelled to join the émigrés. He returned to France on the restoration of the Bourbons in 1814, and was restored to his hereditary estates. On the deposition of Charles X. in 1830, he was elected by the deputies and peers to the vacant throne, chiefly at the instance of Lafayette. He was deposed by the revolution of Feb., 1848.

Louis William I. Born at Paris, April 8, 1655; died at Rastatt, Baden, Jan. 4, 1707. Margrave of Baden. He fought with distinction against the Turks 1683-91, and against the French in the War of the Spanish Succession.

Louisa (lô-ê-zâ), G. Luise (lô-ê-ze). Born at Hannover, March 10, 1776; died at Hohenzeitz, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, July 19, 1810. A celebrated queen of Prussia, wife of Frederick William III.

Louisa, or Luisa, Miller. An opera by Verdi, first produced at Naples 1849.

Louisa Ulrica (lô-ê-zâ ùl-rê'kâ), Queen of Sweden. Born July 24, 1720; died July 16, 1782. Wife of Adolphus Frederick of Sweden, and sister of Frederick the Great: a patron of art and science.

Louisburg (lô'is-bêrg or lô'ê-bêrg). A ruined fortress on the coast of Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, situated in lat. 45° 53' N., long. 60° W. It was built by the French after the peace of Utrecht (1713); was besieged and taken by a New England force under Pepperell, June 17, 1745; was restored in 1748; and was again besieged and taken by the British under Amherst July 27, 1758.

Louise (lô-ê-z') of Savoy. Born at Pont-d'Ain, France, 1476; died about 1531. The mother of Francis I. of France. She was twice regent, and negotiated the peace of Cambray ("Ladies' Peace") in 1529.

Louisiade (lô-ê-zê-äd') Archipelago. An archipelago of small islands, belonging since 1885 to Great Britain, southeast of Papua, intersected by lat. 11° S., long. 153° E.

Louisiana (lô-ê-zi-an'ä). One of the Southern States of the United States of America. Capital, Baton Rouge; chief city, New Orleans. It is bounded by Arkansas and Mississippi on the north, Mississippi and the Gulf of Mexico on the east, the Gulf of Mexico on the south, and Texas on the west. Its northern boundary is lat. 33° N. It is separated partly from Texas by the Sabine, and from Mississippi by the Mississippi and Pearl. The surface is generally level, in part occupied by swamps and alluvial lands. It abounds in forests. The chief industry is agriculture. The leading products are cotton, sugar, rice, and Indian corn. It is the leading State in the production of sugar. It has 59 parishes (corresponding to the counties of the other States), sends 2 senators and 6 representatives to Congress, and has 8 electoral votes. It was explored by De Soto in 1541, by Marquette in 1673, and by La Salle in 1682; was settled by the French under Iberville and Bienville about 1700; was granted to Law's company in 1717, but in 1732 reverted to the crown; was ceded by France to Spain in 1763; was retroceded to France in 1800; was purchased by the United States in 1803 (see Louisiana Purchase); was made a separate Territory (the Territory of Orleans) in 1804; had the portion east of the Mississippi annexed in 1810; was admitted to the Union in 1812; ceded Jan. 26, 1861; was largely occupied by the Federals 1862-63; and was readmitted in June, 1868. There were rival State governments under Kellogg (Republican) and McEnery (Democrat) in 1872-1874. The disputed electoral vote for President in 1876 was given to Hayes by the Electoral Commission in 1877. Area, 45,720 square miles. Population (1890), 1,118,587.

Louisiana Purchase. The territory which the United States in 1803, under Jefferson's administration, acquired by purchase from France, then under the government of Bonaparte as first consul. The price was $15,000,000. The purchase consisted of New Orleans and a vast tract extending westward from the Mississippi River to the Rocky Mountains, and from the Gulf of Mexico to British America.

Louisiana Territory. That part of the Louisiana Purchase which is not included in the present State of Louisiana. It was formed in 1804. The name was changed to Missouri Territory in 1812.

Louisville (lō'is-vil or lō'i-vil). The capital of Jefferson County, Kentucky, situated at the falls of the Ohio River in lat. 38° 15' N., long. 85° 45' W. It is the largest city of Kentucky, and has important trade in tobacco, provisions, and whisky. The other leading industries are pork-packing and the manufacture of agricultural implements, leather, wagons, cement, wood-work, etc. It was founded in 1778, and is often called Falls City. Population (1890), 161,123.

Loulé (lō-lā'). A town in the province of Algarve, Portugal, situated in lat. 37° 4' N., long. 7° 54' W. Population, 14,448.

Loupgarou (lō-gā-rō'). [F., 'a werwolf.'] A leader of the giants in Rabelais's "Gargantua and Pantagruel." Pantagruel, becoming angry with him, picked him up by the ankles and used him like a quarter-staff.

Loups. See Delaware and Mahican.

Lourdes (lōrd). A town in the department of Hautes-Pyrénées, France, on the Gave de Pau 13 miles south-southwest of Tarbes. It contains an ancient castle, and is famous as a place of pilgrimage. The basilica and the subterranean Church of the Rosary are noteworthy, but interest centers in the grotto in which the Virgin is said to have appeared to a peasant girl, Bernadette Soubirous, in 1858, and disclosed to her the miraculous properties of the spring which the pilgrims visit. Population (1891), commune, 6,976.

Lourenço Marques. See Lorenzo Marques.

Louth (louth or louth). A maritime county in Leinster, Ireland. It is bounded by Armagh on the north, the Irish Sea on the east, Meath on the south, and Meath and Monaghan on the west. A city in the province of Brabant, Belgium, situated on the Dyle 16 miles east of Brussels. The chief manufacture is beer. The hôtel de ville, or town hall, is one of the most elegant of the characteristic late-Pointed Flemish civic edifices. St. Pierre is a handsome 15th-century church containing many fine paintings, especially the "St. Erasmus" and the "Last Supper" of Dieric Bouts, and a sculptured tabernacle 50 feet high. The pulpit, in the peculiar Flemish style (1742), represents "St. Peter's Denial" and the "Conversion of St. Paul," with life-size figures beneath palm-trees. The university, founded in 1426, is attended by about 1,300 students. In the middle ages Louvain was the capital of Brabant, and a leading center of cloth manufacture. An unsuccessful insurrection of the weavers against the nobility in 1378 was followed soon afterward by the emigration of many citizens. Population (1895), 41,003.

Louverture, or L'Ouverture, Toussaint. See Toussaint Louverture.

Louvet de Couvray (lō-vā' dē kō-vrā'), Jean Baptiste. Born at Paris, June 11, 1760; died at Paris, Aug. 25, 1797. A French revolutionist and novelist, a deputy to the Convention in 1792. He wrote the novel "Les amours du chevalier de Faublas" (1787-89).

Louviers (lō-vyā'). A town in the department of Eure, northern France, situated on the Eure 14 miles south by east of Rouen. It has flourishing manufactures, especially of cloth. Population (1891), commune, 9,979.

Louvois (lō-vwā'), François Michel Letellier, Marquis de. Born at Paris, Jan. 18, 1641; died July 16, 1691. A noted French statesman, minister of war under Louis XIV. 1666-91. He organized the French standing army.

Louvre (lōvr). A castle (in Paris) of the kings of France from or before the 13th century, and the chief royal palace until Louis XIV. built Versailles. The existing palace was begun by Francis I. in 1541, and was extended by his successors down to Louis XIV., who added much, including the imposing east front with its celebrated Corinthian colonnade, 570 feet long, with 28 pairs of coupled columns. Napoleon I. made some additions, to which Napoleon III. added very largely; and the present republic has rebuilt a large section of the north wing which was burned by the Commune. The whole forms one of the most extensive and historically interesting buildings in the world. The façade on the west side of the court ranks as the most perfect example of the early French Renaissance; the addition of Catharine de Médicis are also architecturally important. Those of Napoleon III., while less pure in style, are of great richness, with profuse use of sculpture. In the interior the splendid Galerie d'Apollon, rebuilt by Louis XIV., is one of the few apartments which retain their original aspect. A great part of the interior has been occupied since 1793 by the famous museum, and successive governments have employed the best artists at their command for its decoration.

Lovania. The Latin name of Louvain.

Lovat (lō'vāt). A river in Russia, flowing into Lake Ilmen opposite Novgorod. Length, about 300 miles.

Lovat (lō'vāt), Lord. See Fraser, Simon.

Lovatz (lō'vāts), Turk. Loftcha (lof'chä). A small town in Bulgaria, situated on the Osma about lat. 43° 10' N., long. 24° 42' E. It was stormed by the Russians Sept. 3, 1877.

Love and Business. A miscellany by George Farquhar, printed in 1702.

Love and Death, and Love and Life. Companion paintings by George Frederick Watts, of London. In the former Death, a white-draped figure, crushes Love back among garlands of roses, and forces his way through a portal. In the latter Love guides and aids Life, a fair young girl, undraped, up a rough ascent, while flowers spring up in his footsteps.

Love and Honour. A play by Davenant, licensed 1634, printed 1649, and revived with great success after the Restoration.

Love at a Venture. A comedy by Mrs. Centlivre, printed in 1706. It is founded on T. Corneille's "Le galant double." See Double Gallant, The.

Loveby (luv'bi). The wild gallant in Dryden's play of that name.

Love Chase, The. A comedy by J. Sheridan Knowles, produced in 1837.

Love for Love. A comedy by Congreve, printed in 1695.

Those who will take the pains to read this tedious drama (Otway's "Friendship in Fashion") will perceive that Congreve deigned to remember it in the composition of his exquisite masterpiece, "Love for Love." The hero in each case is named Valentine, and Blagene, Otway's tiresome button-holer and secret-monger, is a clumsy prototype of the inimitable Tattle. Gosse.

Love in a Forest. A play adapted from Shakspeare's "As you Like it" by Charles Johnson in 1723.

Love in a Maze. A comedy by Shirley, licensed in 1631. The title was borrowed by Dion Boucicault for a comedy in 1844.

Love in a Riddle. A pastoral by Cibber, printed in 1729. This was written in imitation of the "Beggars Opera," and played at Drury Lane on Jan. 7, 1729. It was hissed by Cibber's enemies, and converted into "Damon and Phillida." Dict. Nat. Biog.

Love in a Tub. See Comical Revenge, The.

Byron). Born Dec. 10, 1815; died Nov. 29, 1852. The daughter of Lord Byron.

Lovelace, Richard. Born in Kent, 1618; died at London, 1658. An English Cavalier poet. He was educated at the Charterhouse and at Gloucester Hall, Oxford. He was imprisoned by the Parliament in 1642; took part in the siege of Dunkirk in 1646; and was imprisoned on his return to England in 1648. He was released after the king's execution, but his estate was spent, and he died in poverty in the purlieus of London. In 1649 he published "Lucasta" (from Lux Casta, his name for Lucy Sacheverell); this was revised while he was in prison. After his death his brother collected and published his poems as "Lucasta: Posthume Poems" (1659). His name survives chiefly on account of his lyrics "To Althea from Prison" and "To Lucasta on going to the Wars."

Loveless (luv'les). A character in Cibber's comedy "Love's Last Shift," and in its continuation, Vanbrugh's "The Relapse": a debauched libertine. He grows weary of his wife, Amanda, in six months; leaves the country and his debts behind him; and returns penniless to England to reform and be forgiven (after a "Relapse" with Berinthia) by Amanda whom he really loves.

Loveless, Elder. The principal male character in Beaumont and Fletcher's play "The Scurful Lady." He is a snit of the lady, who scorns and flouts him; but in the end he wins her by a trick.

Loveless, Young. The brother of the elder Loveless: a heartless, callous prodigal.

Love Lies a Bleeding. See Philaster.

Lovell, Mansfield. Born at Washington, D. C., Oct. 20, 1822; died at New York, June 1, 1884. An American general in the Confederate service.

Lovel the Widower. A novel by Thackeray, published in 1861.

Lovely (luv'li), Ann. A character in Mrs. Centlivre's comedy "A Bold Stroke for a Lover": an heiress to win whom Colonel Fainwell, her lover, disguises himself as the real Simon Pure whom she was intended by her guardian to marry.

Love makes the Man, or the Pop's Fortune. A comedy by Cibber, made from Fletcher and Massinger's "Custom of the Country" and "Elder Brother." It was acted and printed in 1701.

Lover (luv'er), Samuel. Born at Duldin, Feb. 24, 1797; died at St. Heliers, July 6, 1868. An Irish novelist, song-writer, and painter. His chief novels are "Rory O'More" (1837; it was dramatized and had a run of 108 nights) and "Handy Andy" (1842). His "Songs and Ballads" were published in 1839, including "The Angel's Whisper," "The Low-backed Car," "The Four-leaved Shamrock," "Molly Bawn," "Father Molloy," etc.

Lovere (lō-vā're). A town in northern Italy, on the Lake of Iseo 21 miles north-northwest of Brescia.

Lover's Complaint, A. A poem by Shakspeare, written probably in 1593-94, but published with the sonnets in 1609. Fleay.

Lover's Leap. A promontory at the southwestern extremity of Leucas (Santa Manra), Ionian Islands: the traditional scene of the death of Sappho.

Lover's Life, Complaint of a. A poem inserted in the 16th-century editions of Chaucer, and attributed to him. Manuscript authority gives it to Lydgate.

Lovers' Melancholy, The. A play by Ford, produced in 1628, printed in 1629. This play contains the celebrated contention between the nightingale and the musician from Strada.

Lovers' Progress, The. A play by Fletcher and Massinger, printed in 1647. "The plot is taken from D'Audignier's 'Histoire tragico-comique de notre temps,' 1615. . . . This play is unquestionably a revised version of the 'Wandering Lovers,' a play licensed 6 Dec., 1623, and may be identified with the 'Tragedy of Cleander' (ascribed to Massinger), which was performed at Blackfriars 7 May, 1634. A play called 'The Wandering Lovers or The Picture' was entered in the 'Stationers' Register' 9 Sept., 1653, as a work of Massinger. In spite of the puzzling after-title the entry probably refers to the 'Lovers' Progress.'" Bullen.

Lovers' Quarrels. A play by King, altered from Vanbrugh's "The Mistake" in 1790.

Lover's Vows. A comedy by Mrs. Inchbald, produced at Covent Garden Oct. 11, 1798. It is from Kotzebue.

Love's Contrivance, or Le Médecin Malgré lui. A comedy by Mrs. Centlivre, acted and printed in 1703. It was taken from "Le medecin malgré lui" and "Le mariage forcé" by Molière.

Love's Cure, or the Martial Maid. A play, probably by Massinger and Middleton according to Bullen. Fleay thinks it was by Beaumont and Fletcher, altered by Massinger. It was produced about 1623, printed 1647.

Love's Labour's Lost. A comedy by Shakspeare, produced in 1599, printed in 1598. Various changes were made in it in 1597, when it was retouched for a court performance. The title is "A pleasant conceited Comedy as it was presented before her Highness this last Christmas. Newly corrected and augmented by W. Shakspeare. Imprinted 1598." This is the first appearance of Shakspeare's name on a play title-page. There is no doubt that an earlier version existed. Morley; Fleay.

Love's Labour's Won. A lost play by Shakspeare, printed in 1600, and entered in the "Stationers' Register" Aug. 23, 1600. It is probably the original of "Much Ado about Nothing," as it was called "Benedict and Bettris" when acted before King James in 1612-13, although presented that same Christmas to Prince Charles, the Palatine, and Lady Elizabeth under its proper name. Fleay.

Love's Last Shift, or the Fool in Fashion. A comedy by Cibber, produced in Jan., 1694. Vanbrugh's "Relapse" is a sequel to this. See Fop-pington, Lord.

Love's Metamorphosis. A comedy by John Lyly, published in 1601.

Loves of the Angels, The. A poem by Thomas Moore, published in 1822.

Loves of the Plants, The. The second part of the "Botanic Garden," a versified treatise on botany, by Erasmus Darwin, published in 1789. The first part, "The Economy of Vegetation," did not appear till 1792.

Loves of the Triangles, The. A satirical poem by Canning and Frere, published in the "Anti-Jacobin." It was in ridicule of Erasmus Darwin and his "Loves of the Plants."

Love Spell, The. See Elisir d'Amore.

Love's Pilgrimage. A romantic comedy by Fletcher and another, probably written by 1612. It was printed in 1647. The plot is from a novel of Cervantes, and a part of Jonson's "New Inn" is incorporated in it. Fleay identifies it with "The History of Cardenio."

Lübeck. A free city of Germany, forming with its territory a state of the German Empire. The city is situated on the Trave and Wakenitz in lat. 53° 52' N., long. 10° 41' E. It is among the leading German seaports, and has a large trade in timber, tar, wine, grain, etc., with Russia, Sweden, and Denmark, and regular steam communication with the Baltic ports. The cathedral was built between the 12th and the 14th century. The nave and transepts are Romanesque, the aisles and choir pointed. The spires are 394 feet high. The Rathaus, completed in 1442, is a characteristic example of the style of medieval brick building developed here. It consists of two wings at right angles, with large gables and picturesque spires. A fine Renaissance entrance-hall and stair were afterward added. The interior, late-pointed in character, contains much that is of artistic interest. The Holsten Thor is a picturesque medieval gateway, built in 1477. Lübeck was founded in 1143; was ceded to Henry the Lion; became a free imperial city in 1226; took the lead among the cities of the Hansatic League; sided with the Reformation in 1531; was incorporated with France in 1810; became independent in 1813; and has been successively a member of the Germanic Confederation, the North German Confederation, and the German Empire. Population (1890), 63,590.

Lübeck, Principality of. A district forming a part of the dominions of Oldenburg, situated north of the free city of Lübeck. Chief city, Eutin. Under the old German Empire it was ruled by prince-bishops, and in 1803 was annexed to Oldenburg. Population (1890), 34,718.

Lüben (lū'ben). A town in the province of Silesia, Prussia, 14 miles north of Liegnitz. Population (1890), 6,131.

Lübke (lūb'ke). Wilhelm. Born at Dortmund, Prussia, Jan. 17, 1826; died at Karlsruhe, April 5, 1893. A noted German historian of art. He was professor of the history of art and of archeology at the polytechnic school at Zurich 1861-66, at the similar school in Stuttgart 1866-85, and at the technical high school at Karlsruhe 1885-93. Among his works are "Geschichte der Architektur" (1855), "Grundriss der Kunstgeschichte" ("Outlines of the History of Art," 1860), "Geschichte der Plastik" ("History of the Plastic Art," 1863), etc.

Lublin (lū'blin). 1. A government of Russian Poland, bordering on Galicia and the governments of Volhynia, Siedlec, and Radom. Area, 6,499 square miles. Population (1891), 1,059,959.—2. The capital of the government of Lublin, situated on the Bistrzyca 92 miles southeast of Warsaw. It is the chief town of Russian Poland after Warsaw and Łódz, and has manufactures of woollens, etc. It was a place of importance under the Jagellons. The union of Poland and Lithuania was proclaimed here in 1569. The city was taken by Charles in 1703, and by the Russians in 1831. Population (1893), 51,930.

Lubulo (lū-bū'lū). A country, tribe, and dialect of Angola, West Africa, on the left bank of the Kuanza River, between Dondo, Pungo Andongo, and Bailundo. The country is mountainous and fertile; the tribe is independent, and governed by petty chiefs. The dialect belongs to the Kimbundu language.

Lubuku (lū-bū'kū). See Luba.

Luca Giordano. See Giordano.

Lucan (lū'kān) (Marcus Annæus Lucanus). Born at Cordova, Spain, 39 A. D.; committed suicide 65 A. D. A Roman poet and prose-writer, author of the "Pharsalia," in 10 books, an epic poem on the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey. See Pharsalia. He was forbidden by Nero, through jealousy, to recite in public, and in revenge joined the conspiracy of Piso. He was betrayed, and by a promise of pardon was induced to turn informer; but, after denouncing his mother and his other accomplices, he was condemned to death. He anticipated his punishment by causing his veins to be opened.

Lucan, Earl of. See Sarsfield, Patrick.

Lucan, Third Earl of (George Charles Bingham). Born at London, April 16, 1800; died Nov. 10, 1888. A British general and field-marshal. He became a major-general in 1851, and commanded the cavalry in the Crimean war. He was largely responsible for the charge of the Light Brigade.

Lucania (lū-kā'nī-ā). In ancient geography, a division of southern Italy. It was bounded by Campania, Samnium, and Apulia on the north, the Gulf of Tarentum on the east, Bruttium on the south, and the Tyrrhenian Sea on the southwest. The surface is mountainous. The inhabitants were Lucanians (a branch of the Samnites) and Greeks on the coast. It was reduced by Rome in the 3d century B. C.

Lucaris (lū-kā'ris), Cyrillus. Born about 1572; murdered 1638. A reforming prelate of the Greek Church. He became patriarch of Constantinople in 1621.

Lucasta. See Love-lucc, Richard.

Lucas van Leyden (lū'kās vān lē'den) (Lucas Jacobsz). Born at Leyden about 1494; died there, 1533. A Dutch engraver and painter.

Lucayans (lū-kī'anz). [Sp. Lucayos, from some Indian word.] The aboriginal inhabitants of the Bahama Islands. They were the first Americans encountered by Columbus, who described them as a mild and indolent race, living partly by agriculture, and going naked. It appears that their language was related to that of Cuba and Haiti, and probably they were of Arawak stock. Their foreheads were artificially flattened, as is shown by recently discovered skulls. Early in the 16th century many thousands of them were induced, by false promises, to go to Española, where they were enslaved; others were carried off by force, and in a few years all had perished.

Lucayans (lū-kī'ōs). The name originally given by the Spaniards to the Bahama Islands, from the Indians who inhabited them. It is still used occasionally, principally by Spanish authors.

Luca (lūk'kū). A province of Tuscany, Italy. It was made a principality by Napoleon for his sister Elisa Bacciochi; was granted as a duchy to Maria Louisa of Spain in 1815; and was annexed by Tuscany in 1847. Area, 558 square miles. Population (1891), 288,637.

Luca, F. Lucques (lūk'). The capital of the province of Lucca, Italy, situated in lat. 43° 51' N., long. 10° 31' E.: the Roman Luca. It is noted especially for silk manufactures, and also for oil and woolen manufactures. The cathedral (duomo) is a notable medieval church with arched exterior. The exterior is remarkable for its rich inlaid work in colored stone, representing hunting scenes. The interior has round arches below with massive piers, a high triforium with rich tracery, and a low clearstory with circular windows. The so-called "Tempietto," in one aisle, is a little octagonal domed Renaissance temple, built in 1482 to receive the Oriental crucifix called the Volto Santo. San Giovanni is an early basilica with later medieval alterations. The chief portal has a fine Romanesque relief of the Virgin, with the apostles and angels. The fluted columns of the nave are Roman. The old Lombard baptistry is 50 feet square; it has a remarkable 14th-century dome on pendentives. The Deposito di Mendicanti (poorhouse), formerly the Palazzo Borghi, is a fine example of an Italian medieval palace (1413) designed for defense. It is of red brick, with traceried windows, and has a high tower. There are considerable remains existing of a Roman amphitheater, of date about 100 A. D., though the arena is occupied by the Piazza del Mercato. It had two tiers of 54 arches, and could seat about 10,000. One of the entrance gates, in rusticated masonry, survives. Luca was an ancient Italian town, and became a Roman colony about 177 B. C.; was the seat of a medieval duchy, and later of a republic; belonged to Pisa in the 14th century; and became independent in 1369. It was conquered by the French in 1797. Population (1891), about 76,000.

Luca, Bagni di. [It. 'baths of Lucca.'] A watering-place in Italy, situated on the Lima 14 miles north by east of Luca.

Luca, Pauline. Born at Vienna, April 24, 1841. A noted German opera-singer. Her parents were Italian. Her voice is a full soprano. She made her debut at Olmütz in 1859 as Elvira in "Ernani." In 1861 she roused great enthusiasm at Berlin, and was engaged as court singer for life there. She was also successful in London in 1863, and sang there nearly every season till 1872. In that year she resigned her position at Berlin and came to the United States. She returned to Europe in 1874, and sang in nearly all the great cities except Berlin. She married Baron Radhen in 1865.

Luca (lūk'). In Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors," a female servant.

Lucena (lū-thā'nī). A town in the province of Cordova, Spain, situated on the Cascajar 37 miles south-southeast of Cordova. Population (1887), 21,271.

Lucentio (lū-sen'shiō). In Shakspeare's "Taming of the Shrew," an accomplished young student from Pisa, whose skillful wooing of Bianca forms the underplot of the play.

Lucera (lū-chā'rā). A town in the province of Foggia, Italy, 10 miles west-northwest of Foggia: the ancient Luceria. It has a cathedral and a castle. The latter, built on the site of the classical citadel by the emperor Frederick II., is of great extent and imposing aspect. Population, about 14,000.

Lucerne (lū-sēr'n'; F. pron. lū-sār'n'), G. Luzern (lū-tser'n'). 1. A canton of Switzerland, bounded by Aargau on the north, Zug and Schwyz on the east, Unterwalden on the southeast, and Bern on the south and west. Its surface is hilly and mountainous. It is one of the four Forest Cantons, and sends 7 members to the National Council. The prevailing language is German, and the religion Roman Catholic. Lucerne joined the League of the Forest Cantons in 1332. It took part in the battle of Sempach in 1386, and annexed the Entbuch at the beginning of the 15th century. It was part of the Helvetic Republic. In 1847 it was the leading member of the Sonderbund (which see). Area, 570 square miles. Population (1888), 135,360.

2. The capital of the canton of Lucerne, situated at the outflow of the Reuss from the Lake of Lucerne, in lat. 47° 3' N., long. 8° 18' E. It is a central point for tourists. The Reuss is crossed here by two interesting old bridges. The Kapellbrücke is a roofed bridge, having 154 subjects painted on the interior of the roof, most of them from the legends of Sts. Mauritius and Leodegar, the patrons of Lucerne. The picturesque medieval Wasserthurn stands in the middle of the river, beside the bridge. The Mühlen- or Spreuer-Brücke is another roofed bridge: the inner side of its roof is painted with an elaborate Dance of Death. Other objects of interest are the Lion of Lucerne (see below), Hofkirche, Gletscher-Garten, and Rathaus (with antiquarian museum). Near the city are the Rigi, Pilatus, etc. It was founded on the site of a monastery. It was occupied by the federal troops in the Sonderbund war (1847). Population (1888), 20,571.

Lucerne, Lake of, or Lake of the Four Forest Cantons, G. Vierwaldstättersee (fēr-vält'-stet-ter-zä). A lake in Switzerland, bordering on the four cantons Lucerne, Schwyz, Uri, and Unterwalden. It is irregular in shape. Locally it is divided into the Luzernersee, Alpnachersee, Küsnachtersee, Urnersee or Bay of Uri, Gersauersee, and Weggissee. It is traversed by the Reuss, which has its outlet at Lucerne. Violent winds prevail on it. It is bordered by lofty mountains (Rigi, etc.) and is famous for its magnificent scenery and for the legendary history of William Tell. Length, 23 miles. Height above sea-level, 1,435 feet.

Lucerne, Lion of. A famous piece of sculpture, by Thorwaldsen, commemorating the heroism and devotion of nearly 800 Swiss guards who died to save Louis XVI. in the attack on the Tuileries, Aug. 10, 1792. The colossal figure of the crouching lion, transfixed and dying but still faithfully defending the lily shield of France, is carved in the round in a recess in the face of an upright, vine-draped rock, in a little park, at Lucerne. A commemorative inscription, with the names of the officers killed, is cut in the rock.

Lucetta (lū-set'tij). A waiting-woman in Shakspeare's "Two Gentlemen of Verona."

Luchaze (lū-chā'ze), or Baluchaze (bā-lū-chā'-ze). A Bantu tribe of Angola, West Africa. They live between the head streams of the Kuito River, southeast of Bihe, in a beautiful wooded country. They are related to the Ambucua and Nangela tribes, like their fore teeth, wear skins and knob cloth, and are clever iron- and copper-smiths. They obtain their pottery by barter. Their granaries are large, and their villages clean and well built.

Luchon. See Bagnères-de-Luchon.

Lucia (lū'shiā), Saint. [L. fem. of Lucius; E. Lucy.] A martyr of the primitive church in Syracuse, who perished during the persecution of Diocletian. According to the legend, she rejected a pagan suitor whom her mother desired her to marry, was denounced as a Christian, and was condemned to be outraged, but escaped this fate and died in prison. She is the patroness especially of those who suffer from distemper of the eyes.

Lucia. In Southerne's "Sir Antony Love, or The Rambling Lady," a young girl who disguises herself as a man (Sir Antony) and follows her lover to win him. She is the "rambling lady."

Lucia di Lammermoor (lū-chē'ā dē lām-mer-mōr'). An opera by Donizetti, produced at Naples in 1835, at Paris in 1839, at London in 1838 in Italian and in English in 1843. The plot is from Scott's "Bride of Lammermoor."

Lucian (lū'shiān). [Gr. Λουκιανός, L. Lucianus.] Born at Samosata, Syria, about 120 A. D.; died about 200. A celebrated Greek satirist and humorist. He was a free-thinker, attacking with pungent satire the religious beliefs of his time; for this, according to Suidas, he was called "the Blasphemer," and was torn to pieces by dogs—doubtless a pious invention. He wrote rhetorical, critical, and biographical works, romances, dialogues, poems, etc.

Lucian (169 A. D.), a native of Samosata on the Euphrates, lived to write Attic prose which, though by no means faultless, was the best that had been written for 400 years. His "Dialogues of the Gods," almost Homeric in their freshness and almost Aristophanic in their fun, bring out the ludicrous side of the popular Greek faith; the "Dialogues of the Dead" are brilliant satires on the living. In his "Auction of Philosophers" the gods knock down each of the great thinkers to the highest bidder; Socrates goes for about £500; Aristotle for a fifth of that sum. . . . Much historical interest belongs to his sketch of "Perigrinus," a man whom he represents as having been an Christian. . . . His "Timon," the misanthrope, is interesting in connection with Shakspeare's play. The "Veracious History," a mock narrative of travel, is the original of such books as "Gulliver's Travels." Lucian has much in common with Swift, and more, perhaps, with Voltaire.

Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 153.

Lucian. Born at Samosata, Syria, about 240 A. D.; martyred at Nicomedia, Bithynia, about 312. A theologian and biblical critic, presbyter of Antioch, who was put to death as a Christian under Maximin. Little is known of his career. He was the reputed author of a creed which was submitted to the Synod of Antioch (341) as a substitute for the Nicene Creed, and which is said to have been adopted by a semi-Arian synod in Caria in 367.

Luciana (lū-si-ā nī). In Shakspeare's "Comedy of Errors," the sister of Adriana.

Lucianists (lū-shiān-ists). The followers of Lucian or Lucan, a Marcionite leader in the 2d century, who taught that the actual soul and body of a man would not come forth in the resurrection, but some representative of them.

Lucifer (lū-si-fēr). [L., 'light-bringing.'] The morning star; the planet Venus when it appears in the morning before sunrise; when it follows the sun, or appears in the evening, it is called Hesperus, or the evening star. The name "day-star" is applied by Isaiah figuratively to a king of Babylon; this was rendered in the authorized version by "Lucifer." From this passage (Isa. xiv. 12) the name was, by mistake, also given to Satan.

Pandemonium, city and proud seat
Of Lucifer; so by allusion call'd
Of that bright star to Satan paragon'd.

Milton, P. L., x. 425.

Lucifer. Died 371 A. D. A bishop of Caliris (Cagliari) in Sardinia, a fierce controversialist, and founder of a sect of Luciferians named from him, whose chief tenet was that no bishop who had conformed in any measure to Arianism could retain his rank if he rejoined the orthodox party.

Lucile (lū-sē'lē). A narrative poem by the Earl of Lytton (Owen Meredith), published in 1860.

Lucilius (lū-sil'i-us), Caius. Born at Suessa Aurunca, Campania, about 180 B. C.; died at Naples, 103 B. C. A Latin satirical poet, author of "Satura," miscellaneous poems containing a very free criticism of contemporary life.

Lucina (lū-si'nā). In Roman mythology, the goddess who presided over childbirth, considered as a daughter of Jupiter and Juno, but frequently confused with Juno or with Diana. She corresponded more or less closely to the Greek goddess Ilithyia.

Lucinde (lū-sānd'). 1. The daughter of Sganarelle in Molière's "L'Amour médecin."—2. The daughter of Géronte in Molière's "Le médecin malgré lui." It is to cure her that Sganarelle is obliged to pretend to be a doctor.

Lucio (lū-shiō). A fantastic and profligate character in Shakspeare's "Measure for Measure."

Lucius (lū'shius). [L., 'pertaining to the light or daybreak'; Gr. Λοῦκος, It. Lucio, Sp. Lucio, Pg. Lucio, F. Luce.] Bishop of Adrianople in the 4th century. He was expelled from his see by the Arians about 340; appealed to the Roman Council under Julius, which ordered his restoration—a decree which was resisted by the Eusebians in his diocese; and was finally reestablished in his see by Constantius, in accordance with the decision of the Council of Sardica.

Lucius I. Bishop of Rome 253-254.

Lucius II. (Gerhard da Caccianamichi). Died Feb. 25, 1145. Pope 1144-45. He was killed by a stone thrown during the insurrection against the papal government.

Lucius III. (Ubaldo Allucingoli). Died Nov. 24, 1185. Pope 1181-85.

Lucius. 1. In Shakspeare's tragedy "Julius Cæsar," a boy, a servant of Brutus.—2. In Shakspeare's "Cymbeline," a general of the Roman forces.—3. In Shakspeare's (?) "Titus Andronicus," the son of Titus. He has a son who is also named Lucius.—4. In Shakspeare's "Timon of Athens," a flattering lord; also, in the same play, a servant who waits on Timon's creditors.

Lucius Junius Brutus. A tragedy by Andrieux, produced at the Comédie Française in 1830.

Lucius Junius Brutus, Father of his Country. A tragedy by Nathaniel Lee, produced in 1681.

Lucka (lök'ä). A small town in Saxe-Altenburg, Germany, situated on the Schnander 18 miles south of Leipsic. Here, May 31, 1307, the Thuringians defeated the Imperialists under Philip of Nassau.

Luckau (lök'ou). A small town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated on the Berste 47 miles south by east of Berlin. Here, June 4, 1813 the Prussians and Russians under Von Bülow defeated the French under Gudinot.

Lücke (lū'ke). Gottfried Christian Friedrich. Born at Egein, near Magdeburg, Prussia, Aug. 23, 1791; died at Göttingen, Feb. 14, 1855. A German theologian, professor successively at Berlin, Bonn, and Göttingen. He wrote "Kommentar über die Schriften des Evangelisten Johannes" ("Commentary on the Writings of the Evangelist John," 1820-32), etc.

Luckenwalde (lök'en-väl-de). A town in the province of Brandenburg, Prussia, situated on the Nuthe 29 miles south by west of Berlin. It manufactures cloth, etc. Population (1890), 18,008.

Luckner (lök'ner), Count Nikolaus. Born at Cham, Bavaria, Jan., 1722; guillotined at Paris, Jan. 4, 1794. A general in the Dutch and German and (after the Seven Years' War) in the French service. He became a marshal in 1791, and was condemned and put to death by the Revolutionary tribunal on a charge of treason.

Lucknow, or Lakhnau (luk'nou). 1. A division in Oudh, British India. Area, 4,504 square miles. Population (1881), 2,622,681.—2. A district in the division of Lucknow, intersected by lat. 27° N., long. 81° E. Area, 989 square miles. Population (1881), 696,824.—3. The capital of Oudh and of the district of Lucknow, situated on the Gumti about lat. 26° 52' N., long. 80° 55' E. It manufactures gold and silver brocade, muslin, etc. Among the chief buildings is the mausoleum Imambara, a great hall dating from the middle of the last century, and one of the most interesting productions of the later Indian-Saracenic style. The plan is rectangular, 263 by 145 feet. The fine central hall, 162 by 53 feet, is arched on both sides and flanked in front by a porch and at the back by a gallery. Each end presents an octagonal room and two closed side chambers. The vaults are formed in thick, solid masses of concrete, precisely according to the ancient Roman system. The general effect is picturesque and impressive, though the ornamental details show decadence. Lucknow was defended (at first under Sir Henry Lawrence) against the Indian mutineers July-Sept., 1857; relieved by Havelock Sept. 25; again relieved by Campbell Nov. 17; and finally captured by Campbell March, 1858. Population (1891), with cantonment, 273,028.

Luck of Eden Hall, The. A drinking-cup long preserved at Eden Hall in Cumberland. According to "Notes and Queries," Feb. 18, 1893, it is still in existence. It is a chalice of enameled glass, and is of 19th-century workmanship, presumably Venetian. There is a legend that the luck of the Musgrave family depends on its preservation:

"If this cup either break or fall,
Farewell the luck of Eden Hall."

Luzon (lū-sōn'). A town in the department of Vendée, western France, 20 miles north of La Rochelle. Here, 1793, the French republicans defeated the Vendéans. It has a cathedral. Population (1891), commune, 6,536.

Luzon. See Luzon.

Lucrece (lū-krēs'). [L. Lucretia.] A poem by Shakspeare, published in 1594.

Lucretia (lū-krē'shiā). In Roman legend, the wife of Tarquinius Collatinus. Her rape by Sextus Tarquinius led to the overthrow of the Tarquins and the establishment of the republic. See Sextus.

Lucretia, or the Children of Night. A novel by Bulwer Lytton, published in 1846.

Lucretia gens (lū-krē'shiī jenz). A Roman patrician, and later also plebeian, clan. Its surnames were (patrician) Triepitinus, (plebeian) Gallus, Ofella, Vespillo, and Carus.

Lucretius (lū-krē'shius) (Titus Lucretius Carus). Born at Rome, probably about 96 B. C.; died Oct. 15, 55 B. C. A celebrated Roman philosophical poet. He was the author of "De rerum natura" ("On the Nature of Things"), a didactic and philosophical poem in six books, treating of physics, of psychology, and (briefly) of ethics from the Epicurean point of view. He committed suicide probably in a fit of insanity. According to a popular but doubtless erroneous tradition, his madness was due to a love-philter administered to him by his wife.

Lucrezia Borgia. See Borgia.

Lucrezia Borgia (lō-krät'sē-ä bor'jä). An opera by Donizetti, first produced at Milan in 1834. The words were adapted from Victor Hugo's play of the same name, produced at Paris in 1833. The opera was produced at the Italiens in 1840, and was at once stopped by Victor Hugo. The words were rewritten and called "La Ringata." Grove.

Lucrezia Floriani (flō-rē-ä'nē). A novel by George Sand, published in 1846.

Lucrine (lū'krin) Lake. In ancient geography, a small salt-water lake in Campania, Italy, 9 miles west-northwest of Naples; the Roman Lucus Luerninus, modern Lago Lucrino. It was famous for its oysters.

Luc-sur-Mer (lūk'sür-mär'). A watering-place in the department of Calvados, France, on the English Channel 10 miles north of Caen.

Lucullus (lū-kul'us), Lucius Licinius, surnamed Ponticus. Born probably about 110 B. C.; died about 57 B. C. A Roman general. He served under Sulla in the East; was curule edile in 79, and consul in 74; defeated Mithridates in Asia Minor 74-71; defeated Tigranes near Tigranocerta in 69; and was recalled to Rome in 66. He was afterward famous for his wealth and his luxury. His villas at Tusculum and near Neapolis were famous for their splendor, and he is said to have expended fabulous sums on his table. He was the first to introduce cherries into Italy. He was also a collector of books and a patron of learning.

Lucy (lū'si). [From L. Lucia (which see).] 1. In Sheridan's comedy "The Rivals," a clever waiting-maid of great apparent simplicity.—2. The rival of Polly in Gay's "Beggars' Opera." Lud (lud). In Gen. x., the fourth in the list of the children of Shem.

The name Lud, which follows that of Arphaxad, cannot be correct. The reading must be corrupt, though it is impossible to conjecture what it could originally have been. Lud or Lydia belongs to a different zone from that of the children of Shem, and, as we have seen, is already referred to under the name of Magog.

Lud (lud). A mythical king of Britain.

The association of Lud, or "King Lud" as he has come to be called in English, with London, is apparently founded on a certain amount of fact: one of the Welsh names for London is Caer Lúd, or Lud's Fort, and if this is open to the suspicion of having been suggested first by Geoffrey, that can hardly be supposed possible in the case of the English name of Ludgate Hill. The probability is that, as a temple on a hill near the Severn associated him with that river in the west, so a still more ambitious temple on a hill connected him with the Thames in the east; and as an aggressive creed can hardly signalize its conquests more effectually than by appropriating the fanes of the retreating faith, no site could be guessed with more probability to have been sacred to the Celtic Zeus than the eminence on which the dome of St. Paul's now rears its magnificent form. Rhys, Celtic Heathendom, p. 129.

Luddites (lud'its). A name given to the rioters who attempted to destroy machinery at Nottingham and elsewhere in England, 1811-12 and 1816; so called from a man named Lud.

Luden (lō'den), Heinrich. Born at Loxstedt, near Bremen, April 10, 1780; died at Jena, Germany, May 23, 1847. A German historian, professor of history at Jena. His chief work is a "Geschichte des deutschen Volks" (1825-37: "History of the German People" to 1237).

Lüdenscheid (lū'den-shid). A town in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, 34 miles northeast of Cologne. Population (1890), 16,169.

Lüderitzland (lū'der-its-land). The region around Angra Pequena, annexed by Germany 1884. It is now included in German Southwest Africa.

Lüders (lū'ders), Count Alexander. Born Jan. 26, 1790; died at St. Petersburg, Feb. 13, 1874. A Russian general. He served in the Turkish war 1828-29, in the Polish insurrection 1831, and in the Caucasus; defeated the Hungarians at Schässburg July 31, 1849; was commander-in-chief in the Crimea 1856; and was governor of Poland 1861-62.

Ludewig (lō'de-vig), Hermann Ernst. Born at Dresden, Oct. 14, 1809; died at Brooklyn, Dec. 12, 1856. A German-American bibliographer. He published "Literature of American Local History" (1846-48), etc.

Ludgate (lud'gāt). [Possibly from the legendary British king Lud.] An old gate of the City of London. In the earlier history of the city, all the region between the city and Westminster was a marsh or fen, and the only western egress was by Watling street at Newgate. Later the fen was filled up, the "Strand" road was made, and Ludgate was built some time in the 12th century. The gate itself was for a long time used as a prison, but was abandoned when Newgate was built. Ludgate was destroyed in 1760, except the statue of Elizabeth, which still stands by St. Dunstan's Church.

Ludgate Hill. A London street running directly west from St. Paul's.

Ludhiana (lō-dē-ä'nā). 1. A district in the Panjab, British India, intersected by lat. 30° 50' N., long. 76° E. Area, 1,375 square miles. Population (1881), 618,835.—2. The capital of the district of Ludhiana, about lat. 30° 53' N., long. 75° 54' E. Population, about 40,000.

Ludovisi Ares (lō-dō-vē'zē ä'rēz) or Mars. An antique marble statue in the Villa Ludovisi, Rome, discovered in the Renaissance period near the Piazza Campitelli. The figure is of colossal size. The god is represented seated in an easy position, as if resting from effort, on a rock, against which lean his greaves and circular shield. The right leg is extended; the left is raised and supported on the helmet, which rests on the ground. The hands are crossed on the left knee, the left holding a sword. The face bears a calm expression, the glance being directed forward, as in reflection. The chlamys, the only garment, has slid down from the shoulders, and its folds lie loosely about the hips and over the thigh. An Eros, with quiver beside him, sits on the ground behind the god's right leg. From marks on the left shoulder and below, a figure completing the group appears to be missing; this may have been another Eros, a Nike, or an Aphrodite. The work is held by most authorities to be a good copy of an original of the school of Lysippos.

Ludovisi Juno. A colossal head in the Villa Ludovisi, Rome. It is one of the most impressive conceptions of the Greek Hera, ascribed by the best critics to an Attic artist of the early 4th century B. C. The calm oval face is crowned with an ornamented stephane.

Ludovisi Palace. See Villa Ludovisi.

Ludwig. The German form of the name Louis. Ludwig (lōd'vīc), Karl Friedrich Wilhelm. Born Dec. 29, 1816; died April 27, 1895. Luitprand. See Luitprand.

Luz. See Louis.

Luke (lōk). [L. Lucas, Gr. Λουκάς.] The author, according to tradition, of the third gospel and also of the Acts of the Apostles. He has been regarded as identical with the Luke several times mentioned in the New Testament as a companion of St. Paul (called in Colossians "the beloved physician"). Of his life little is known. According to tradition he was a painter as well as a physician. Whether or not he suffered martyrdom is uncertain. His symbol is the ox (often winged), which was given him as an emblem of sacrifice and priesthood because "he devoted about the priesthood of Jesus Christ."

Luke, Gospel of. The third gospel, attributed by tradition to Luke, the companion of St. Paul.

Lukmanier (lōk-mān'yer). A pass on the border of the cantons of Grisons and Ticino, Switzerland. It connects Dissentis, in the valley of the Rhine, with Biasca, in the valley of the Ticino. Height, 6,290 feet.

Lummi (lum'mē). A tribe of North American Indians, now on the Tulalip reservation, Washington. Their former habitat was on Lummi River, Washington. They number (1893) 295. See Salishan.

Lumpkin (lump'kin), Tony. In Goldsmith's comedy "She Stoops to Conquer," an ignorant, noisy, conceited country squire, both loutish and vicious. Liston was noted for his performance of this part.

The widow Blackacre and her son are like her lawsuit—everlasting. A more lively, palpable, bustling, ridiculous picture cannot be drawn. Jerry is a hopeful lad, though undutiful, and gets out of bad hands into worse. Goldsmith evidently had an eye to these two precious characters in "She Stoops to Conquer." Tony Lumpkin and his mother are of the same family, and the incident of the theft of the casket of jewels and the bag of parchments is nearly the same in both authors.

Hazlitt, Eng. Poets, p. 103.

Luna (lū'nā). [L., 'the moon.'] The Italian goddess of the moon. She had at Rome an ancient sanctuary on the Aventine and a temple on the Palatine. The latter was illuminated at night.

Luna. In ancient geography, a city in Italy, near the site of the modern Spezia.

Luna (lō'nā), Alvaro de. Born 1388; died 1453. A Spanish courtier and poet. He became a page at the court of John II. of Castile 1408, rising quickly to the position of favorite and minister. He was made constable of Castile in 1423; exiled through the influence of the grandees in 1427; recalled in 1430, and made grand master of the order of St. James of Compostella; exiled 1439, and recalled 1445; and intrusted with the command of the army. Having lost the favor of the king, he fell a victim to a conspiracy of the court nobles; was arrested in Burgos April 5, 1453; and shortly after was executed at Valladolid.

Luna, Pedro de. See Benedict XIII.

Lunalilo (lū-nā-lē'lō). Born at Honolulu, Hawaiian Islands, Jan. 31, 1835; died there, Feb. 3, 1874. King of the Hawaiian Islands 1873-74.

Luna y Arellano (lō'nā ē-ā-rā-l-yā'nō), Tristan de. Born in Aragon early in the 16th century. A Spanish captain. He served under Coronado in northern Mexico in 1539. In 1559 he was given command of an expedition destined to conquer and colonize Florida, of which he was named governor. He sailed from Vera Cruz in June, with 13 ships and a force variously given at from 500 to 2,000 men; and in Aug. formed a settlement, probably on Santa Rosa Bay. Most of his ships were shortly after lost in a hurricane; the men, after great suffering, mutinied; and in 1561 the enterprise was abandoned. Luna went to Havana, and thence returned to Mexico in 1562.

Lund (lōnd). A city in the laen of Malmöhus, Sweden, situated 9 miles northeast of Malmö and 23 miles east of Copenhagen; the medieval Londinum Gothorum. The cathedral, reputed the finest church in Scandinavia, was built about the middle of the 11th century, and has been well restored. In style it is Romanesque, with a group of 5 towers and a semi-circular apse. The remarkable crypt contains a monumental well. The university was founded in 1668, and has about 800 students. Lund is an important medieval city; was the seat of an archbishopric from 1104 to 1536; and was the scene of a defeat of the Danes by the Swedes in 1676, and of a treaty between Denmark and Sweden in 1679. It was frequently a royal residence, and was the place where Tegner lived. Population (1891), 15,091.

Lund, Peter William. Born at Copenhagen, Denmark, June 14, 1801; died at Lagoá Santa, Minas Geraes, Brazil, May 5, 1880. A Danish naturalist. He traveled in Brazil from 1827 to 1830, and returned to that country in 1831 on a scientific mission from the government of Russia. In 1834 he fixed his residence at Lagoá Santa, and the remainder of his life was passed in the exploration of the numerous limestone caves of Minas Geraes, and the study of the fossil (Quaternary) animals found in them. Of these he discovered several hundred species.

Lunda (lōn'dā). A great Bantu nation and kingdom, recently divided between Portuguese Angola and the Kongo State. Muata-Yamvua, the ruler of Lunda, was at one time the head of an empire extending from the Kwanjo River to the Lualaba, including, at the extreme northwest and southeast, the vassal states of Muene Putu Kassongo and Muata Cazembe, and in the southwest the Kioko nation. The Lunda tribe occupies the basins of the upper Kassai and Lulua. They have a fine physique, like the Baluba, and are friendly to the whites, but are lazy and given to slave-trading. Weakened by feuds, they are victimized by the Makioke, their nominal vassals, and are powerless to resist the encroachments of the whites. The Lunda language differs little in structure from Kimbundu, the language of Angola.

Lundy (lun'di) Island. A small island in the Bristol Channel, 27 miles west-northwest of Barnstaple, Devonshire, England.

Lundy's Lane (lun'diz lān). A road leading westward from Niagara River, near Niagara Falls. Here, July 25, 1814, a battle was fought (called also the battle of Bridgewater or of Niagara) between the Americans (2,600) under Brown and the British (4,500) under Drummond. The British were repulsed, but afterward returned and kept possession of the field. American loss, 852; British, 878.

Lüneburg (lū'ne-bōrg). 1. A former principality, now a government district in the eastern part of the province of Hannover, Prussia. The surface is generally level. It was the ancient inheritance of the Wolf family. The duchy of Lüneburg grew into the electorate (later the kingdom) of Hannover (which see).

2. The capital of Lüneburg, situated on the Ilmenau 26 miles southeast of Hamburg. It has manufactures of salt and cement. It is an ancient Hanse town. The War of Liberation opened here with a defeat of the French under Morand, April 2, 1813. Population (1890), 20,327.

Lüneburg Heath, G. Lüneburger Heide (lū'ne-bōrg-er hī'de). A moor in the province of Hannover, Prussia, north of Celle.

Lunel (lū-nel'). A town in the department of Hérault, southern France, 15 miles east-north-east of Montpellier. It has trade in muscat wines. Population (1891), commune, 6,793.

Lunéville (lū-nā-vēl'). A city in the department of Meurthe-et-Moselle, France, near the confluence of the Meurthe and Vezouze 16 miles east-southeast of Nancy. It is a commercial and manufacturing center, and contains a noted riding-school and a château. It was the capital of Lorraine in the 18th century. The emperor Francis I. was born here. Population (1891), 21,542.

Lunéville, Peace of. A treaty which the emperor concluded with France at Lunéville Feb. 9, 1801. France received the left bank of the Rhine. The arrangements made with Austria by the peace of Campo-Formio were confirmed; Tuscany was ceded to Parma; and the Cisalpine, Ligurian, Helvetic, and Batavia republics were recognized. It was the beginning of the end of the Holy Roman Empire.

Lungasi (lōng-gā'sē). An African river and tribe of Kamerun.

Lupaca (lō-pā-kā'). The dialect formerly spoken by a branch of the Aymará Indians of Bolivia. See Aymará.

Lupercal (lū-pēr-kal). [See Lupercus.] A grotto near the western angle of the Palatine Hill, in ancient Rome, dedicated, according to tradition, by the original Areadian settlers to Lupercus, a Latin rustic deity. It was the den of the she-wolf that suckled Romulus and Remus. As time went on the Lupercal was adorned architecturally, and its decoration was renewed by Augustus. Near the Lupercal was the Ficus Ruminalis, the fig-tree beneath which Romulus and Remus were left by the retiring waters of the Tiber, and above it was the primitive thatched hut preserved to imperial days as a relic of Romulus.

Lupercalia (lū-pēr-kā'li-ā). [See Lupercal.] One of the most ancient of Roman festivals, celebrated every year in the middle of February. The origin of the festival is older than the legend of Romulus and the wolf, with which, as with the Greek cult of Pan, it was sought later to connect it. It was originally a local purification ceremony of the Palatine city, in which human victims were sacrificed in the Lupercal cave near the Porta Romana, after having been conducted around the walls. In historic times the victims were goats and a dog, and the celebrants ran around the old line of the Palatine walls, striking all whom they met with thongs cut from the skins of the slaughtered animals. These blows were reputed to preserve women from sterility. The divinity of the Lupercalia was the old Etrurian god Inuus, akin to Mars.

Lupercus (lū-pēr'kus). [L., 'he who wards off the wolves.'] The god Inuus as the protecting deity of shepherds.

Lupus (lū'pus). [L., 'a wolf.'] An ancient southern constellation, the Wolf, representing a beast held by the hand of the Centaur. It has two stars of the third magnitude.

Lur (lōr). A tribe of central Africa, occupying a wide district northwest of Albert Nyanza. Their customs are similar to those of the Wanyoro, whose nomadic suzerainty they acknowledge. The accent and the ground-words of the Lur language are identical with those of the Shuli, from which it is separated by the Madi. Both may belong to one cluster with Shilluk.

Luray (lū-rā') Cave. A cave in Page County, Virginia, near Luray, 78 miles west by south of Washington. It consists of numerous chambers extending over a large area, and is especially remarkable for its enormous stalactites. It was discovered in 1878.

Lure (lūr). A town in the department of Haute-Saône, France, 17 miles east by north of Vesoul. Population (1891), commune, 4,838.

Lurewell (lūr'wel), Mistress. A character in Farquhar's comedy "The Constant Couple"; a jilt with a strong desire to wreak vengeance on men for the wrongs done her.

Lurgan (lēr'gan). A town in County Armagh, Ireland, 19 miles southwest of Belfast. Population (1891), 11,447.

Luria (lō-rē-ā), Isaac. Born at Jerusalem, 1534; died 1572. One of the most celebrated and influential Jewish cabalists and mystics. His teachings were published by his disciple Hayim Vital Calabrese in the works "Tree of Life" ("Ez ha-Hayim"), "Book of Transmigrations" ("Sepher ha-Gilgulim"), and "Book of Gleamings" ("Sepher ha-Likutim").

Luristan (lō-ris-tān'). A province of western Persia, bordering on Turkey. The surface is mountainous. Population, estimated, 300,000.

Lurlei. See Lorelei.

Lurline (lēr-lēn'). An opera by Wallace, first produced at Covent Garden in 1860.

Lusatia (lū-sā'shiä), G. Lausitz (lou'sits). A region in Germany, now included in the kingdoms of Saxony and Prussia. Its early inhabitants were Slavs, and, though partly Germanized, it still has a large population of Slavs (Wends). It was a mark or march on the border of the empire. Upper Lusatia (Ober-Lausitz), in the southern part, was acquired by Brandenburg from Bohemia about 1253. Lower Lusatia (Nieder-Lausitz), in the northern part, was acquired by Brandenburg early in the 14th century. Upper Lusatia was gained by Bohemia in 1346, and Lower Lusatia in 1373. Lusatia belonged temporarily to Hungary in the second half of the 15th century. With Bohemia it passed to the house of Hapsburg in 1526. It was ceded by Austria to Saxony in 1835. Lower Lusatia and part of Upper Lusatia were ceded by Saxony to Prussia in 1815.

Lushais. A nomadic race living on the frontier of Assam, Bengal, and Burma, about lat. 24° N., long. 93° E.

Lusiad (lū'si-ad), The. The national epic of Portugal, by Camoens, published in 1572. It has been translated into English by Fanshawe, Mickle, Musgrave, Mitchell, and others. It is in 10 cantos, containing 1,102 stanzas. See the extract.

The poem on which the general reputation of Camoens depends, usually known under the name of the Lusiad, is entitled by the Portuguese "Os Lusíadas," or the Lusitanians. It appears to have been the object of the author to produce a work altogether national. It was the exploits of his fellow-countrymen that he undertook to celebrate. But, though the great object of the poem is the recital of the Portuguese conquests in the Indies, the author has very happily succeeded in embracing all the illustrious actions performed by his compatriots in other quarters of the world, together with whatever of splendid and heroic achievement historical narration or popular fables could supply. It is by mistake that Vasco da Gama has been represented as the hero of Camoens, and that those portions of the work not immediately connected with that commander's expedition are regarded as episodes to the main action. There is, in truth, no other leading subject than his country, nor are there any episodes except such parts as are not immediately connected with her glory.

Simonds, Lit. of South of Europe, II. 480.

Lusignan (lū-zēn-yōn'). A town in the department of Vienne, western France, 16 miles southwest of Poitiers. It is noted for its ruined castle (built, according to fable, by the fairy Mélusine). The family of Lusignan furnished kings to Jerusalem and Cyprus. Population (1891), commune, 2,164.

Lusignan, Guy of. See Guy of Lusignan.

Lusitania (lū-si-tā'ni-ā). In ancient geography, the country of the Lusitanians, comprising the modern Portugal to the river Duero, and adjoining parts of western Spain. In a later, more extended use, it was one of the Roman provinces into which Hispania was divided by Augustus.

Lussin (lōs-sēn'). An island in the Adriatic Sea, about lat. 44° 35' N., belonging to the crownland of Istria, Austria-Hungary. Length, about 20 miles.

Lussin-Piccolo (lōs-sēn'pik'kō-lō). A seaport on the island of Lussin, Istria, Austria-Hungary. Population (1890), commune, 7,634.

Lust's Dominion, or the Lascivious Queen. A play published in 1657. It was attributed to Marlowe, and was published as his in 1657; but it is probably the same play as "The Spanish Moor's Tragedy," now attributed to Dekker, Haughton, and Day, published Feb. 13, 1600. Although the play as it exists dates from 1600, it was certainly founded on a much older one. Fleay.

Lute-Player (lūt'plā'er), The. A painting by Caravaggio, in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. A youth, who wears a white shirt, is seated at a table singing to his lute. On the table are flowers, fruit, and books.

Lutetia, or Lutetia Parisiorum (lū-tē'shi-ā par-is-i-ō'rum). [F. Lutèce.] 1. The Roman name of Paris. The town, the chief seat of the Parisii, was an inconsiderable place in Roman times. —2. An asteroid (No. 21) discovered by Goldschmidt at Paris, Nov. 15, 1852.

Luther (lō'thēr), Martin. Born at Eisleben, Prussian Saxony, Nov. 10, 1483; died there, Feb. 18, 1546. A German reformer and translator of the Bible. His father, who was a slate-cutter by trade, removed with his family to Mansfeld the year after the birth of the son. His early education was obtained at Magdeburg, and at Eisenach (1498), where he lived with Frau Ursula Cotta. In 1501 he matriculated at the University of Erfurt for the study of jurisprudence. He took his examination in 1505, and subsequently delivered lectures on the physics and ethics of Aristotle. This same year, against the wishes of his family, he determined to become a monk, and entered the Augustine monastery at Erfurt. In 1507 he was consecrated a priest, and in 1508 was called as professor of philosophy to the University of Wittenberg. In 1510 he went to Rome on business connected with his monastic order. In 1512, after his return to Wittenberg, he was made doctor of theology. His first important action in the direction of ecclesiastical reform was his publication, Oct. 31, 1517, on the church door at Wittenberg, of ninety-five theses against the sale of indulgences by the Dominican Tetzel. His propositions were immediately condemned as heretical, and violent attacks were made upon him from various quarters, both before and after a summons to Rome, which he did not obey. In 1520 he published his famous "Address to the Christian Nobles of the German Nation," which was followed by the tract "On the Babylonian Captivity of the Church of God." This same year, together with his adherents, he was formally excommunicated by Leo X., and his writings were burned at Rome, Cologne, and Louvain. He retaliated by publicly burning, at Wittenberg, the bull of excommunication and the decretals of the Pope, to whom he now renounced all allegiance. At the Diet of Worms, April, 1521, whether he was summoned by the emperor (Charles V.), he made the celebrated speech which ended with: "There I take my stand. I can do naught else. So help me, God. Amen." In spite of his vigorous defense of his doctrines, he was proscribed by the emperor. On his return from Worms, through the Thuringian Forest, he was, by order of his friend, the Elector of Saxony, ostensibly taken prisoner and conveyed to the Wartburg, at Eisenach, where he remained in disguise the following ten months under the name of Junker Georg. During this time he translated the New Testament into German, and had already completed it when he left the Wartburg in March, 1522. At this time, in spite of a new proscription by the emperor, he returned to Wittenberg, and delivered there a series of sermons against the fanaticism of the puritanical image-breakers. Here, too, was published this same year the translation of the New Testament. He had already begun the translation of the Old Testament, of which the books of Moses were put into print in 1523 and the Psalms in 1524; and in this latter year appeared also his first hymn-book. In 1524, further, he laid aside his cowl, and in 1525 married Katharina von Bora, a nun, who had renounced her vows and left the convent. From 1526-29 he was engaged in the preparation of a new church service. In this latter year, also, he engaged in the conference at Marburg with Zwingli and other Swiss divines. The Lutheran translation of the whole Bible, completed in 1532, was finally published in 1534. It was revised in 1541, and the subsequent editions of 1543 and 1545 also received a few amendments. During the whole of his struggles for the Reformation, he wrote numerous polemical pamphlets which exhibited him as a most powerful though passionate controversialist. His "Tischreden" ("Table-Talk") contains his opinions on a variety of subjects, the principal source of the material being Lauterbach's "Tagebuch" ("Diary") from 1538. In 1530 he began to make a new version, in prose, of Esop's and other classical fables. Besides prose, he also wrote a number of sacred hymns, whose prototype in construction and melody he found in the folk-songs. The "Hymn-Book" of 1524 contains four hymns written by him; that of 1545 thirty-seven. In the edition of 1528 was published for the first time the most celebrated of his hymns, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," written in 1527, the melody of which he is also said to have composed. Luther is to be regarded as the founder of the present literary language of Germany—that is, of New High German, so called. In his "Tischreden" he states his language to be that of the Saxon Chaucery, to which, in reality, his early writings closely conform. It is, however, not the language of the court, but of the people, and much of the vocabulary of the Bible translation has been drawn from Low German as well as from High German sources. In this sense he is, as he is frequently asserted to be, the real creator of the present language. His own language, contrasted in his early and later writings, shows a distinct progression toward a more consistently normalized and universal form. The Bible translation permanently established the literary language of Germany. Books were written afterward, notably in Switzerland, in dialect, but they are in an ever decreasing minority, and writers and printers in all parts of German-speaking territory soon accepted the language of Luther as a standard to which they consciously or unconsciously conformed. A good complete edition of his works is that published at Erlangeu, 1826-57, in 67 volumes.

Lütke (lüt'ke), Count Feodor Petrovitch. Born at St. Petersburg, Sept. 17 (O. S.), 1797; died at St. Petersburg, Aug. 8 (O. S.), 1882. A Russian navigator. His narrative of his journey around the world was published 1834-36.

Luton (lūt'on). A town in Bedfordshire, England, 30 miles north-northwest of London. It is the chief seat of English straw-plait manufacture. Population (1891), 30,005.

Lutrin (lii-trān'), Le, [F., 'the leetern.'] A mock-heroic poem by Boileau-Despréaux, published in 1674.

Lutter am Barenberge (lüt'ter am bā'ren-ber-ge). A village in Brunswick, Germany, 23 miles south-southwest of Brunswick. Here, Aug. 27, 1626, the Imperialists under Tilly defeated the Danes under Christian IV.

Lutterworth (lut'ér-wérth). A small town in Leicestershire, England, 29 miles east of Birmingham. Wyeliff was rector of the parish for the last ten years of his life.

Lüttich (lüt'tiēh). The German name of Liège. Lüttringhausen (lüt'tring-hou-zen). A town in the Rhine Province, Prussia, 23 miles north-east of Cologne. Population (1890), commune, 10,498.

Lutuamian (lō-tō-am'i-an). A linguistic stock of North American Indians, comprising the Klamath and Modoc tribes which formerly occupied the region of Little and Upper Klamath lakes, Klamath marsh, and Sprague River, Oregon, extending into northern California. This territory is mainly embraced by the Klamath reservation, where about 750 survivors of the two tribes reside. There are also 84 Modoc in Indian Territory. The name is derived from a Pit River word meaning 'lake.'

Lützen (lüt'sen). A small town in the province of Saxony, Prussia, 11 miles southwest of Leipzig. Two important battles were fought here. (1) A victory was gained by the Swedes (about 13,000) under Gustavus Adolphus over the Imperialists (towards 30,000) under Wallenstein, Nov. 16, 1632. The Swedish king was killed, and was succeeded in command by Bernhard of Saxe-Weimar. (2) On May 2, 1813, a victory was gained by the French army (135,000) under Napoleon over the allied Russians and Prussians (about 70,000) under Wittgenstein. Napoleon was unable to follow up his victory. The battle is frequently called the battle of Grossgorschen.

Lutzk (löt'sk), or Luck (löt'sk). A town in the government of Volhynia, Russia, situated on the Styr about lat. 50° 45' N., long. 25° 20' E. Population (1885-89), 14,165.

Lützw (lüt'so), Baron Ludwig Adolf Wilhelm von. Born at Berlin, Prussia, May 18, 1782; died at Berlin, Dec. 5-6, 1834. A Prussian general, commander of the Lützw "free corps" or "black troop" in 1813.

Luz (lök's), Adam. Born at Obernburg, Bavaria, 1766; guillotined at Paris, Nov. 4, 1793. A Girondist deputy to the Convention from Mainz in 1793.

Luxembourg (lük-soñ-bör'), Duc de (François Henri de Montmorency-Bouteville). Born at Paris, Jan. 8, 1628; died at Versailles, France, Jan. 4, 1695. A French marshal, a relative and a companion of Condé. He served in the wars against Spain and Holland; defeated the Prince of Waldeck at Fleurus in 1690; and defeated William of Orange at Steenkerke in 1692, and at Neerwinden in 1693.

Luxembourg, Palace of the. A palace in Paris, built by Debrasse (1615-29) for Maria de' Medici. There are 3 stories, the lowest arched, with entablatures and coupled pilasters between the windows. The well-proportioned fronts are marked by projecting, high-roofed pavilions. The smaller diameter of the rectangles is about 300 feet. The large court is now colonnaded. Many of the interior apartments are splendidly painted and adorned with sculpture. Since the Revolution this former royal palace has served as the House of Peers or of the Senate, and has long contained a museum of art. The Museum of Modern Art is now removed to a new building on the west of the Petit-Luxembourg, Rue Vaugirard.

Luxemburg (luk'sem-börg; F. pron. lük-soñ-bör'). A province of Belgium. Capital, Arlon. It is bounded by Namur and Liège on the north, Rhenish Prussia and the grand duchy of Luxembourg on the east, France on the south, and France and Namur on the west. The surface is hilly. It has important minerals, including iron and slate. Annexed to Belgium 1839. Area, 1,706 square miles. Population (1893), 213,155.

Luxemburg (luk'sem-börg; D. pron. lük'sem-börg), F. Luxembourg (lük-soñ-bör'), old form Lützelburg. A grand duchy of Europe. Capital, Luxembourg. It is bounded by the Rhine Province of Prussia on the northeast and east, Lorraine on the south, France on the southwest, and Belgium on the west. The surface is a low table-land. It lies mainly in the basin of the Moselle, which is on its eastern border. The leading occupation is agriculture. Iron ore occurs in abundance. The government is a constitutional monarchy, administered by a grand duke and a chamber of 45 deputies. It belongs to the German Zollverein. The religion is Roman Catholic. The prevailing language is German. Luxembourg formed part of the Holy Roman Empire. It was a countyship in the middle ages. It furnished the emperors Henry VII. (1308), Charles IV. (1347), Wenceslaus (1378), and Sigismund (1411). It was united in personal union with Bohemia in 1310; became a duchy in 1354; and passed to Burgundy in 1443. It passed with the Netherlands to the house of Hapsburg, and to Spain. Part of it was ceded to France in 1659. It was ceded to Austria in 1713, and was conquered by France 1794-95. By the Congress of Vienna (1815) it was made a grand duchy under the rule of the King of the Netherlands, and became a member of the German Confederation. It joined the Belgian revolt against the Netherlands, and continued provisionally in Belgian hands until 1839, when part of it was ceded to Belgium, the King of the Netherlands ruling as grand duke over the remainder. It entered the Zollverein in 1842, and ceased to be a part of Germany in 1866. Its neutrality was guaranteed by the treaty of London in 1867. In 1890 the crown passed to Adolf of Nassau. Area, 998 square miles. Population (1890), 211,088.

Luxemburg, formerly Lützelburg. The capital of the grand duchy of Luxembourg, situated on the Petrusse and Alzette in lat. 49° 37' N., long. 6° 7' E. It has a remarkably picturesque situation, and consists of the Oberstadt and Unterstadt. Formerly it was celebrated for its fortifications, strengthened by Vauban and others; and it has often been besieged. It was garrisoned by the Prussians 1815-67. The fortifications were in great part demolished after the treaty of 1867. Population (1890), 18,187.

Luxeul (lük-séy'). [L. Luxovium.] A town in the department of Haute-Saône, situated 17 miles northeast of Vesoul. It has noted mineral springs. It had an abbey in the middle ages. Population (1891), commune, 4,811.

Luxor (lük'sör or lök'sör). A village in Upper Egypt, situated on the Nile, in lat. 25° 39' N., on part of the site of the ancient Thebes. It is celebrated for its antiquities, which include a very large and complex temple built by Amenhotep III. and Rameses II. The buildings of Rameses form the present front of the temple, and were preceded, at the end of a great dromos of sphinxes leading to Karnak, by two beautiful obelisks of red granite, one of which remains in situ, and the other stands in the Place de la Concorde, Paris. Before the large double pylon of Rameses's court are two colossal seated statues of himself. The court is surrounded by a double range of columns. Beyond, the avenue to the buildings of Amenhotep makes a sharp angle and meets the pylon of the court, which is surrounded by a double colonnade. The buildings behind the court contain a great number of chambers and an isolated sanctuary, all profusely sculptured and colored.

Luynes (lü-ën'), Duc de (Charles d'Albert). Born at Pont-St.-Esprit, Gard, France, Aug. 5, 1578; died Dec. 15, 1621. A French courtier, a favorite of Louis XIII.

Luynes, Duc de (Honoré Théodoric Paul Joseph d'Albert). Born at Paris, Dec. 15, 1802; died at Rome, Dec., 1867. A French archaeologist.

Luz (löz). A district in southeastern Baluchistan.

Luz (lüz). A town in the department of Hautes-Pyrénées, France, 26 miles south of Tarbes. It is noted for its springs and for its fortified church. Population (1891), commune, 1,507.

Luzern. The German name of Lucerne.

Luzon, or Luçon (lö-zon'; Sp. pron. lö-thön'). The largest island of the Philippines. The surface is largely mountainous. It contains Manila, the capital of the group. Area, 40,875 square miles. Population (1887), 3,442,941.

Luzzara (löt-sä-rä). A village in the province of Reggio nell' Emilia, Italy, situated on the Po 14 miles south-southwest of Mantua. It was the scene of a drawn battle between the Imperialists under Prince Eugene and the French and Spanish forces under Vendôme, Aug. 15, 1702.

Lvyoff (l-vof'), Alexei. Born at Reval, Russia, May 25 (N. S. June 5), 1799; died near Kovno, Russia, Dec. 16 (N. S. 28), 1870. A Russian composer, author of the Russian national hymn (1833).

Lyæus (li-ë'ns). [Gr. Λυαῖος.] In Greek mythology, the god who frees from care: a surname of Bacchus.

Lyall (li'al), Edna. The pseudonym of Ada Ellen Bayly.

Lycabettus (lik-a-bet'us). [Gr. Λυκαβηττός.] A red rocky hill rising amid the northeastern outskirts of Athens to a height of 910 feet above the sea, or 670 above the city. It is a very conspicuous object in the landscape, presenting from most points of the city the general form of an abrupt, slightly concave cone; there is, however, beyond a slight depression, a long ridge behind it. Upon the top stands a small chapel of St. George. The view is very extensive. On the southern slope is the large reservoir built by Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, which still supplies the city.

Lycæus (li-së'us). [Gr. Λυκαῖος, the Lycæan; from Mount Lycæum in Arcadia.] In Greek mythology, a surname of Zeus.

Lycæon (li-kä'on). [Gr. Λυκαῖον.] In Greek legend, a king of Arcadia, for his impiety changed into a wolf (or killed by lightning).

Lycæonia (lik-a-ë'ni-jî). [Gr. Λυκαονία.] In ancient geography, a province of Asia Minor. Chief city, Iconium. It was bounded by Galatia on the north, Cappadocia on the east, Cilicia on the south, and Pisidia and Phrygia on the west. Sometimes it included Isauria, and sometimes it was included in Cappadocia. Surface elevated.

Lyceus, Lyceus (li-së'us). [Gr. Λύκειος, perhaps (from λύκος, wolf) 'wolf-slayer.'] In Greek mythology, an epithet of Apollo.

Lycæum (li-së'um). [Gr. Λύκειον.] A gymnasium and exercise-ground of ancient Athens, lying on the right bank of the Ilissus, at the place now called Ilissia, a short distance east of the palace garden. It was dedicated to Apollo Lyceus, and was already the chief gymnasium of Athens in the time of Pisistratus. It was noted for its fine groves of plane-trees. Aristotle and his disciples formed the habit of discussing their philosophy while following the shady walks of this gymnasium, and hence received the name of Peripatetics.

Lycia (lis'i-jî). [Gr. Λυκία.] In ancient geography, a division of Asia Minor, bordering on the Mediterranean and on Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia. The surface is mountainous. The Lycians aided the Khita against Rameses II. Its 23 cities formed the Lycian League. It was conquered by Persia in the 6th century B. C., and afterward passed to Macedon, Egypt, Syria, and finally to Rome.

Lycians (lis'i-anz). The inhabitants of Lycia; especially, a race inhabiting ancient Lycia. Arvan or Indo-European in language, as is shown by important inscriptions in a peculiar character recently recovered and elucidated. The Lycians seem to have exerted considerable influence in early days on the Greeks, especially through their worship of Apollo. Interesting monuments of their architecture and sculpture have been brought together in the British Museum. Some sculptures found in Lycia vie in refinement with the riper archaic art of Attica.

Lycidas (lis'i-das). A shepherd in Vergil's third Bucolic.

Lycidas. An elegiac poem by Milton (published 1637), commemorating the death of his friend Edward King.

Lyck (lik). A town in the province of East Prussia, situated on the river and lake Lyck in lat. 53° 49' N., long. 22° 21' E. Population (1890), 9,682.

Lycon (li'kon). [Gr. Λύκων.] Lived in the 3d century B. C. A Greek Peripatetic philosopher.

Lycophron (li'kof-ron). [Gr. Λυκόφρων.] Born at Chaleis, Eubœa; lived in the 3d century B. C. A noted Alexandrian tragic poet and grammarian. His only extant poem is the "Alexandra" or "Cassandra," comprising about 1,400 iambic verses, in which Cassandra predicts the results of the voyage of Paris to Sparta.

Lycopolis (li-kop'o-lis). [Gr. ἡ Λύκων πόλις.] An ancient city in Egypt, whose ruins are near the modern Siût.

Lycurgus (li-kér'gus). [Gr. Λυκοῦργος.] Lived probably in the 9th century B. C. A Spartan legislator, the traditional author of the laws and institutions of Sparta.

Lycurgus. Born at Athens about 396 B. C.; died about 323 B. C. An Attic orator, son of Lycophron of the aristocratic family of the Eteobutadæ. He was thrice appointed manager of the Athenian finances for terms of 5 years each. Only one entire oration of Lycurgus is extant.

Lydda (lid'i). A place in the territory of Benjamin: in the Old Testament Lod. In Acts it is mentioned in connection with a miracle performed by Peter. During the Judeo-Roman war it was destroyed by Cestius Gallus. After the uprising of Bar-Cochba it became the seat of a Talmudical school. It was also an episcopal see, and in 445 a council was held there at which Pelagius defended himself. Tradition makes it the birthplace of St. George, where he also was buried. In 1191 it was destroyed by Saladin, and in 1271 sacked by the Mongols. At present it is a village (Ludd) with a church of St. George, situated between Ramleh and Jaffa.

Lydgate (lid'gât), Doctor. A physician in George Eliot's "Middlemarch." He is ambitious, but a selfish wife takes the savour out of his ambition, and he dies a comparatively young and obscure man.

Lydgate, who has received a true vocation, whose intellectual passion predestines him to far-resonant action in the world of scientific research,—Lydgate, against whom the temptations of the flesh and the devil would have been idle, is subdued by that third enemy of man, the world, incarnated in the form of a creature (Rosamond) with feminine voice, swan-like neck, perfectly turned shoulders, exquisite curves of lip and eyelid, and, hidden behind these, the hardness of a little solid soul.

Dweden, Studies in Literature, p. 281.

Lydgate, John. Born at Lydgate, near Newmarket, about 1370; died about 1451. An English poet. He is said to have studied at both Oxford and Cambridge, and later in France and Italy (but this is doubtful). He entered the church in 1389. He gained a position as poet at the court of Henry IV., which he held during the reign of Henry V. and after the accession of Henry VI. After 1390 he made the acquaintance of Chaucer, and often calls himself "Chaucer's disciple." His numerous works include "Falls of Princes," a narrative poem written between 1430 and 1435; "Troy Book," in heroic couplets, containing a panegyric on Chaucer (1412-20; first printed by Pynson in 1513); "The Story of Thebes," intended as an additional Canterbury tale (about 1420); "The Life of Our Lady," a religious narrative poem, printed by Caxton in 1484; "The Dance of Death," from the French, printed first in 1554 (also, with Holbein's drawings, in 1791); "The Court of Sapience," a philosophical work, printed by Caxton (1481?); "The Temple of Glass," printed by Caxton (1479?); and a number of lives of saints, allegories, fables, historical and political poems, satires, etc. "The Complaint of the Black Knight," which was attributed to Chaucer, is by Lydgate, and also a number of the minor poems which have been attributed to Chaucer.

Lydia (lid'i-jî). [Gr. Λυδία.] A country occupying the western coast of Asia Minor, bordering on the Ægean Sea and on Mysia, Phrygia, and Caria. The old name of it seems to have been Meonia, and its inhabitants a division of the adjacent Phrygians. Later it was invaded by Semites, who gave it the name of Lydia (compare the Old Testament Lud, descendants of Shem, Gen. x. 22). The name Meonia was afterward confined to the eastern part of the country, and Lydia to the western. About 700 B. C. a revolution overthrew the Semitic reign, and brought the native dynasty of the Mermaidæ to the throne, with Gyges as first king. Under them Lydia rose to the position of a mighty kingdom extending from the coast to the river Halys, with Sardes as capital. The prosperous Greek cities were brought either to subjection or alliance. But under the fifth and best-known of the dynasty, Croesus, the Lydian empire was brought to a sudden end by the Persian conqueror Cyrus, who in 546 B. C. captured Sardes and the king himself. From the Persians Lydia passed over, through Alexander the Great, to Syria, and later to Eumenes of Pergamum. During the Roman period Lydia formed a separate province, with Sardes as capital. Sardes was a prominent episcopal see (compare Rev. iii. 1), but was destroyed by Timur in 1402 A. D. Lydia is now a Turkish province, with the cities Smyrna, Manissa (the classical Magnesia), and Aidin. To the Lydians is ascribed the invention of coins, and the oldest coins thus far found are those of Lydia.

Lye (li), Edward. Born at Totnes, Devonshire, 1694; died at Yardley-Hastings, Northamptonshire, Aug. 19, 1767. An English philologist, author of an Anglo-Saxon and Gothic dictionary (1772).

Lyell (li'el), Sir Charles. Born at Kinnordy, Forfarshire, Scotland, Nov. 14, 1797; died at London, Feb. 22, 1875. A celebrated British geologist. He graduated at Oxford (Exeter College) in 1819; studied law; was secretary of the Geological Society 1823-26; traveled on the Continent with Murchison in 1828; became professor in King's College, London, in 1831; was elected president of the Geological Society in 1835 and 1836, and again in 1849 and 1850; traveled and lectured in the United States in 1841, 1845-46, 1852, and 1853; was knighted in 1848; and was president of the British Association in 1864. He is especially famous as an opponent of the older catastrophism in geology. His works include "Principles of Geology" (3 vols. 1830-33), "Elements of Geology" (1838; later editions called "A Manual of Elementary Geology"), "The Antiquity of Man" (1863), "Travels in North America" (1845), "A Second Visit to the United States of North America" (1849), "The Student's Elements of Geology" (1871).

Lyell, Mount. [Named for Sir Charles Lyell.] A peak of the Sierra Nevada, California, in the neighborhood of the Yosemite. Height, 13,190 feet.

Lyfing. See Living.

Lygdamis (lig'gá-mis). Lived in the 6th century B. C. A Greek tyrant of Naxos.

Lying Lover, The, or the Ladies' Friendship. A comedy by Steele, produced in 1703. It was taken from P. Corneille's "Le menteur."

Lykia. See Lycia.

Lyly (lil'i), John. Born in the Weald of Kent about 1534; died at London, Nov., 1606. An English dramatist and novelist. He graduated at Oxford (Magdalen College) in 1573; went to London, where he entered upon literary work and endeavored to establish himself at court; championed the bishops in the "Martin Marprelate" controversy; and became a member of Parliament in 1589 (reelected in 1593, 1597, and 1601). His principal work is "Euphues, or the Anatomy of Wit" (which see), which brought into prominence the affected style named from it "Euphuism." In the Marprelate controversy he wrote "Pappe with a Hatchet, etc." He also wrote a number of plays, including "Alexander and Campaspe," "Sapho and Phao," "Endimion, the Man in the Moon," etc.

Lyly's two secrets are in the first place an antithesis more laboured, more monotonous, and infinitely more pointless than Macanlay's—which antithesis seems to have met with not a little favour, and was indeed an obvious expedient for lightening up and giving character to the correct but featureless prose of Ascham and other "Latiners." The second was a fancy which amounts to a mania for similes, strung together in endless lists, and derived as a rule from animals, vegetables, or minerals, especially from the Fauna and Flora of fancy. It is impossible to open a page of "Euphues" without finding an example of this eccentric and tasteless trick, and in it, as far as in any single thing, must be found the recipe for euphuism pure and simple. As used in modern language for conceited and precious language in general, the term has only a very partial application to its original, or to that original's author. Indeed Lyly's vocabulary, except occasionally in his similes, is decidedly vernacular, and he very commonly mingles extremely homely words with his highest flights.

Lyme-Regis (lim're'jis). A seaport and bathing-place in Dorset, England, situated on the English Channel 26 miles east of Exeter. The Duke of Monmouth landed here in his rising of 1685. Population (1891), 2,365.

Lymfjord. See Limfjord.

Lymington (lim'ing-ton). A seaport and watering-place in Hampshire, England, situated at the junction of the Lym with the Solent, 13 miles southwest of Southampton; noted for yacht-building. Population (1891), 4,551.

Lynch (linch), Charles. Born 1736; died 1796. A Virginia planter and colonel. He is said to have set himself, in conjunction with two neighbors, to secure good order by punishing offenders with stripes or banishment without process of law. This is said to be the origin of the expression "lynch law."

Lynch, Patricio. Born at Santiago, Chile, 1824; died at sea, May, 1886. A Chilean naval officer, of Irish descent. After entering the navy, 1838, he was permitted to take service with the British marine 1840-47. In 1865 he fought against the Spaniards. In 1880 he ravaged the northern coast regions of Peru; subsequently commanded a division in the attack on Lima; and was military governor of that city for the Chileans, May 4, 1881, to Oct. 22, 1883. He deposed and imprisoned President Calderon, Nov., 1881, and in 1883 invested Iglesias with supreme power. He carried away a vast amount of plunder. From 1884 to 1886 he was minister to Spain.

Lynch, Thomas. Born in Prince George parish, S. C., Aug. 5, 1749; lost at sea, 1779. An American politician, a signer of the Declaration of Independence as delegate to Congress from South Carolina in 1776.

Lynch, William F. Born in Virginia, 1801; died at Baltimore, Oct. 17, 1865. An American naval officer. He commanded an exploring expedition to the Jordan and Dead Sea in 1843, and published a narrative of the expedition (1849). Later he was in the Confederate service.

Lynchburg (linch'bërg). A city in Campbell County, Virginia, situated on the James River 91 miles west by south of Richmond. The chief industry is tobacco manufacture. It was founded in 1786. The Confederates used it as a base of supplies in the Civil War. Population (1890), 19,700.

Lynmouth (lin'muth). A village of Devonshire, England, near Barnstaple; noted for its picturesque situation.

Lynn (lin). A city in Essex County, Massachusetts, situated on Lynn harbor 10 miles northeast of Boston. It is noted for its extensive manufacture of shoes, and for leather manufacture. It was settled in 1629, became a city in 1850, and was devastated by fire in 1889. Population (1890), 55,727.

Lynn, Ethel. The pseudonym of Mrs. Beers (Ethelinda Eliot).

Lynn Regis (lin rē'jis), or King's Lynn. A seaport in Norfolk, England, situated on the Great Ouse, near the Wash, in lat. 52° 45' N., long. 0° 24' E. It has important commerce. It was a famous port in old times, and was visited by various monarchs. Population (1891), 13,265.

Lynton (lin'ton). A village of Devonshire, England, near Barnstaple; noted for its picturesque situation.

Lynx (lingks), The. A small northern constellation, introduced by Hevelius in 1690, the name being chosen because the sharp-sightedness of a lynx is required to distinguish any of its stars. It is placed between the Great Bear and Auriga, north of the Twins. Its ten brightest stars are of the fifth magnitude.

Lyó-Baa. See Milla.

Lyon (li'on), Mary. Born at Buckland, Mass., Feb. 28, 1797; died at South Hadley, Mass., March 5, 1849. An American teacher, founder of Mount Holyoke Female Seminary (South Hadley), of which she was principal 1837-49.

Lyon, Matthew. Born in Wicklow County, Ireland, 1746; died at Spadra Bluff, Ark., Aug. 1, 1822. An American politician, member of Congress from Vermont 1797-1801, and from Kentucky 1803-11.

Lyon, Nathaniel. Born at Ashford, Conn., July 14, 1818; killed at Wilson's Creek, Mo., Aug. 10, 1861. An American general. He served in the Mexican war, and at the beginning of the Civil War rendered efficient service to the Union cause as commander of the United States arsenal at St. Louis. He captured a force of Secessionists at Camp Jackson, Missouri, in May, 1861; was appointed commander of the Department of Missouri in June, 1861; defeated the Secessionists at Booneville, June 17, 1861; and was defeated and killed at Wilson's Creek, Missouri, Aug. 10, 1861.

Lyonnesse (li-o-nēs'), or Leannoys. A mythical region near Cornwall, in the Arthurian cycle of romance. It was the land from which Arthur came, and of which Meliadus was king. Tristram, the son of the latter, was also born there. It is said to be more than 40 fathoms under water between the Land's End and the isles of Scilly, the sea having gradually encroached upon the land.

Lyonnais (lê-ô-nā'). An ancient government of France. It was bounded by Burgundy on the north, the Saône and Rhone on the east, Languedoc on the south, and Auvergne and Bourbonnais on the west. It comprised Lyonnais proper, Forez, and Beaujolais, and formed essentially the departments of Rhône and Loire. Lyonnais proper was a medieval county. It was united to France by Philip the Fair in 1307.

Lyons (li'onz), F. Lyon (lê-ôn'). The capital of the department of Rhône, France, situated at the junction of the Saône with the Rhone, in lat. 45° 46' N., long. 4° 49' E.: the ancient Lugdunum. It is the second city in France, a fortress, and a great railway, commercial, and manufacturing center. It has the largest silk manufactures in the world. The cathedral, chiefly of the 12th and 13th centuries, has an exceedingly impressive interior. There are double aisles, and fine roses in both transepts and in the west front. The medieval glass is magnificent, and the tracery illustrates the entire development of medieval architecture. The exterior is much masked by abutting buildings, but is admirable where visible. The churches of Notre Dame de Fourvières (modern), of Aïny (chiefly Romanesque), and of St. Nizier, the hôtel de ville, the palais des arts (containing picture-galleries, sculpture, antiquities, natural-history collections, marbles), the bourse, and the Académie Universitaire (with 5 faculties) are noteworthy. Lyons was founded by Greeks in 560 B. C.; was developed especially by the Roman consul Plancus 41 B. C.; was the capital of Lugdunensis; was made by Claudius a Roman colony; was the capital of the first Burgundian kingdom, and afterward passed to the Franks; was plundered by the Saracens in the 8th century; came under the power of the Archbishop of Lyons; and was united to France at the beginning of the 11th century. Two important councils were held there (1245 and 1274). Its silk industry suffered from the revocation of the Edict of Nantes in 1685. Revolting against the Convention, it was besieged in 1793 and partly destroyed by Collot d'Herbois. Since then it has been the scene of several insurrections, especially in 1834. A great inundation visited it in 1856. It was the birthplace of Claudius, Marcus Aurelius, Irenæus, Caracalla, Ambrose, and Ampere. Population (1891), 416,029.

Lyons (li'onz). A city in Clinton County, Iowa, situated on the Mississippi 32 miles northeast of Davenport. Population (1890), 5,799.

Lyons. The capital of the Erie Wayne County, New York, situated on the Erie Canal 33 miles east by south of Rochester. Population (1890), 6,228.

Lyons, Edmund, Lord Lyons. Born at Burton, Hampshire, Nov. 29, 1790; died at Arundel Castle, Nov. 24, 1858. A British admiral and diplomatist. He was minister at the court of Athens 1835-49, to the Swiss Confederation 1849-51, and then to Sweden. In 1853 he was appointed (then a rear-admiral) second in command in the Mediterranean. He played an important part in the Crimean war, becoming naval commander-in-chief in Jan., 1855. He was created Baron Lyons in 1856.

Lyons, Gulf of. See Lion, Golfe du.

Lyons, Richard Bickerton Pemell, first Earl Lyons. Born at Lymington, England, April 26, 1817; died at London, Dec. 5, 1887. An English diplomatist, son of the first Baron Lyons. He was minister to the United States 1858-65, and ambassador to Turkey 1865-67, and to France 1867-87. He succeeded his father as the second Baron Lyons in 1858, and was created Viscount Lyons in 1881 and Earl Lyons in 1887.

Lyra (li'ra). [L., "the lyre."] An ancient northern constellation, representing the lyre of Hermes or of Orpheus. Also called The Harp. The brightest star of this constellation is Vega (a Lyre). It is the seventh in order of brightness in the heavens, and the third brightest in the northern hemisphere, being half a magnitude brighter than a standard star of the first magnitude. It forms, with two small stars near it, an equilateral triangle, one of the most striking configurations of the summer sky. Vega, Arcturus, and Polaris form a large triangle, nearly right-angled at Vega.

Lyrical Ballads. A collection of poems by Wordsworth and Coleridge, including the latter's "Ancient Mariner," published in 1798.

Lys (lés), or Leye (l'é). A river in northeastern France and western Belgium, which joins the Scheldt at Ghent. Length, 127 miles; navigable 98 miles.

Lysander (li-san'dër). [Gr. Λίσανδρος.] Killed near Haliartus, Bœotia, Greece, 395 B. C. A Spartan commander. He gained the victory of Notium in 407, and that of Ægospotami in 405, and took Athens and destroyed its walls in 404.

Lysander. In Shakspeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," a young Athenian in love with Hermia.

Lys dans la Vallée, Le. A novel by Balzac, written in 1835-36.

Lysefjord (lü'se-fyörd). A fiord on the southwestern coast of Norway, near Stavanger. It is inclosed by high mountains, and the scenery is of remarkable grandeur. Length, 23 miles.

Lysias (lis'i-as). [Gr. Λυσίας.] Died about 350 B. C. One of the ten Attic orators. He lived at Thurii until about 412, and later at Athens, and lived in exile under the rule of the Thirty Tyrants, 404. See the extract.

Lysias did a great work for Attic prose, and is, in his own style, one of its most perfect writers. He broke away from the stiff monotony of the old school, and dared to be natural and simple, using the language of daily life, but with perfect purity and grace. His father was a Syracusan, and Lysias, though born at Athens, had not the rights of a citizen. After passing his youth and early manhood at Thurii in south Italy, he settled at Athens, a wealthy man, in 412 B. C. In 404 he fled from the Thirty Tyrants, who had put his brother Polemarchus to death; and, after the restoration of the Democracy, impeached Eratosthenes, one of the Thirty, in the most splendid of his extant speeches (403 B. C.), the only one which we know that he himself spoke at Athens. But in 388 B. C. he addressed the assembled Greeks at Olympia, in a fine speech of which we have a fragment, urging them to unite against the two great foes of Greece—Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, in the west, and Persia in the east. The speech "Against Agoratus" (399 B. C.?) was written for the impeachment of an informer who had slandered away the lives of citizens under the Thirty Tyrants. The great majority of our 34 speeches were composed by Lysias for his clients to speak in public or private causes. Jebb, Greek Lit., p. 113.

Lysicrates (li-sik'ra-tëz), Choragic Monument of. The finest surviving example of this class of Greek monuments. It consists, above a cubic base, of a cylindrical structure 9 feet in diameter with 6 engaged Corinthian columns. The roof is cut from a single block of marble, and is crowned by a rich anthemion-acroterium. The graceful reliefs of the frieze represent the chastisement of the Tyrrhenian pirates by Bacchus.

Lysimachus (li-sim'a-kus). [Gr. Λυσίμαχος.] Born at Pella (?), in Macedonia (of Thessalian parentage), about 361 B. C.; killed at the battle on the plain of Corus, Asia Minor, 281 B. C. A general of Alexander the Great. After the latter's death, he received the kingdom of Thrace. He joined the league against Antigonus in 315; assumed the title of king in 306; was one of the victors at Ipsus in 301; received a large part of Asia Minor; obtained Macedonia 287-280; and was finally defeated by Seleucus Nicator.

Lysippus (li-sip'us). [Gr. Λύσιππος.] Flourished about 372-316 B. C. A Greek sculptor, a native of Sicyon. According to Pliny he revised the canon of Polyclitus, making the head smaller, the legs longer, and adjusting details to a greater elongation. This new canon has been preserved in the Apoxyomenus of the Vatican, which was discovered in 1849, and is a very perfect copy of the great bronze original placed by Agrippa before his baths in Rome. Lysippus also developed and fixed the extreme athletic type in Hercules, whom he repeatedly represented. A small table figure of Hercules in bronze was made for Alexander, and carried about with him in his campaigns. It was afterward owned by Hannibal and Sulla. The Torso Belvedere is supposed to have been copied from this figure by Apollonius of Athens. Through Chares of Lindus his characteristics were transmitted to the great Rhodian school which produced the Laocoon. Lysippus was the favorite sculptor of Alexander the Great, and author of most of his portraits in sculpture.

Lysis (lī'sis). A dialogue of Plato: the narration by Socrates of a conversation on friendship which took place in a palestra outside the walls of Athens, between himself, the boyish friends Lysis and Menexenus, Hippothales, and Ctesippus.

Lysistrata (lī-sis'tra-tā). A comedy of Aristophanes, exhibited in 411 B. C.

Lyskamm (lē's'käm). A peak of the Valais Alps, immediately west of Monte Rosa. Height, 14,890 feet.

Lysterfjord (lūs'ter-fyörd). A northeastern arm of the Sogne Fjord, on the western coast of Norway. Length, 25 miles.

Lystra (lis'trā). [Gr. Λύστρα.] In ancient geography, a city in Lycaonia, Asia Minor: position undetermined.

Lyte (lit), Henry Francis. Born at Kelso, Scotland, June 1, 1793; died at Nice, France, Nov. 20, 1847. A British hymn-writer, author of "Abide with me," etc.

Lyttelton (lit'el-ton), George, first Baron Lyttelton. Born at Hagley, Worcestershire, England, Jan. 17, 1709; died there, Aug. 22, 1773. An English author and politician. Maassluis (mäs'slois), or Maaslandsluis (mäs'länt-slois). A small town in the province of South Holland, Netherlands, situated on the Meuse 10 miles west of Rotterdam.

Maastricht. See Maastricht.

Mab (mab), Queen. [Orig. Ir. Medb, 'queen' of Connaught, mentioned in Irish poems about the year 1100. The ordinary etym. from W. mab, a child, has no basis of fact. See Mabinogion.] In fairy and folk lore, the fairies' midwife. She is first mentioned as Queen Mab in Shakspeare's "Romeo and Juliet," i. 4. Drayton introduces her in his "Nymphidia," written several years later, and Ben Jonson in his "Entertainment of the Queen and Prince at Althrope." Shakspeare represents her not only as adroit in all kinds of teasing and mischief, but as the hag Nightmare herself. She is the fairies' midwife—that is, the fairy whose duty it is to deliver the fancies of men and to produce dreams by driving over the sleeper in her chariot. Titania, the fairy queen, is not the same person. In Shelley's "Queen Mab" she has a wider sphere, and is made to rule over men's thoughts.

Maba (mä'bü). The largest tribe of Wadai, living in the northern portion of central Sudan, Africa. It is of Nigritic stock, largely Mohammedan, and composed of 22 tribes (Kodoi, Malanga, Madaba, Mat-lamba, Kondongo, Kadjanga, Karanga, etc.), all speaking different dialects of Maba, which is understood beyond its own territory. Maba slaves used to be exported to the east coast, while their neighbors went to the west coast. The ruler of Wadai must be born of a Maba woman.

Mabillon (mä-bē-yōn'), Jean. Born at St.-Pierremont, Ardennes, France, Nov. 23, 1632; died at Paris, Dec. 27, 1707. A noted French scholar and historian, a member of the Benedictine order. He lived after 1664 in the Abbey of St.-Germain-des-Prés in Paris. His works include "Acta sanctorum ordinis S. Benedicti" (1668-1702), "Vetera sancto-rum" (1675-85), "De re diplomatica" (1681), "Museum Italicum" (1687-89), etc.

Mabinogion (mab-i-nō'gi-on), The. The fairy tales and romances of the Welsh. See the extract.

Mabinogion is the plural of the Welsh word mabinogi, which means instruction for the young—the word being derived from mab, a child, and the same root running through many words with a like sense, Queen Mab herself included. The great collection of these tales is at Jesus College, Oxford, in a MS. volume of the fourteenth century, known as the Red Book of Hergest, of which the tales have been published, both in the original Cymric and in a delightful English translation, as the Mabinogion, by Lady Charlotte Guest (now Schreiber), who takes the word Mabinogion as simply meaning stories for the young. The Mabinogion thus represented contains Welsh versions of three of the French Arthurian romances by Chrestien de Troyes, namely, "The Lady of the Fountain," and among the notes to it the text of the "Chevalier au Lion," with which that story corresponds; "Peredur, the son of Erawc," corresponding to the "Percival le Gallois" of Chrestien; and "Geraint, the son of Erbin," which is his "Erec and Enide." Besides these, in the Mabinogion are two British tales ascribed to the time of King Arthur, "Kilhwch and Owen" and the "Dream of Rhonabwy." The rest are tales in which King Arthur does not appear, or is named only as by interpolation—namely, "Pwyll, Prince of Dyved"; "Braewen, the Daughter of Llyr"; "Math, the Son of Mathonwy"; these four being the sections which Professor Rhys regards as the foundation of the Mabinogion; the rest, being later editions, are, besides the Arthur romances already named, the "Dream of Emperor Maximus," "Lludd and Llevelys," and the romance of "Talesin." Morley, English Writers, III. 257-259.

Since the publication of Lady Charlotte Guest's edition of the Mabinogion the idea seems to prevail that any Welsh tale of respectable antiquity may be called a Mabinogi, plural Mabinogion, but there is no warrant for so extending the use of the word; and, of the eleven stories contained in Lady Charlotte Guest's collection, only four are entitled to be called Mabinogion. More strictly speaking, they are not Mabinogion so much perhaps as the "four branches of the Mabinogi." The word Mabinogi is derived from Mabinog, and that was a term belonging to the bardic system, meaning a sort of a literary apprentice or young man who was receiving instruction from a qualified bard; and the lowest description of Mabinog was one who had not acquired the art of making verse. The inference to be drawn is that Mabinogi meant the collection of things which formed the Mabinog's literary training and stock in trade, so to say. He was probably allowed to relate the tales forming the four branches of the Mabinogi at a fixed price, but he was usually a young man, not a child in the nursery, and it is utterly wrong to suppose the Mabinogion to be nursery tales. Rhys, Arthurian Legend, pp. 1, 2.

Mably (mä-blé'), Gabriel Bonnot, Abbé de. Born at Grenoble, France, March 14, 1709; died at Paris, April 23, 1785. A French publicist, elder brother of Condillac. For a time he was secretary to his uncle Cardinal Tencin, and was occupied with diplomatic affairs; but he soon gave up his office, and thereafter lived in retirement. He wrote "Parallèle des Romains et des Français" (1740), "Observations sur les Romains" (1751), "Observations sur l'histoire de France" (1765), "Droit publique de l'Europe" (1748), "Entretiens de Phocion" (1763), etc.

Macabey. See Gossaert.

Mac. [Gael. mac, Ir. mac, W. map, mab, also ap, ab, a son, Goth. magus, a son.] An element, usually a conjoined prefix, in many Scotch and Irish names of Celtic origin, cognate with the Welsh ap-, signifying 'son,' and being thus equivalent to the Irish O'-, the English -son or -s, and the Norman Fitz-. The prefix is either written in full, Mac-, or abbreviated to Mc- or M'-, which in works printed in the British Isles almost invariably appears as M'—the abbreviated form being followed by a capital letter, while Mac takes a capital after it but rarely. Thus a name may be variously spelled as Macdonald (rarely MacDonald), McDonald, or M'Donald; so Mackenzie, McKenzie, or M'Kenzie, etc. In alphabetical lists, names with this prefix, however written, are properly entered in the place of Mac.

Macaber, or Macabre. See Dance of Death.

Macadam (mak-ad'am), John Loudon. Born at Ayr, Sept. 21, 1756; died at Moffat, Nov. 26, 1836. A Scottish engineer, inventor of the system of macadamizing roads.

Macaire (ma-kär'). A chanson de geste, written in a mixed French and Italian dialect. The MS. was discovered in Venice, and was published in 1866 by M. Gueissard at Paris. It contains the original of the well-known story of the dog of Montargis.

Macaire, Robert. A typical villain in French comedy, originally an assassin heavily loaded with crimes. He was transformed by Frédéric Lemaître into an adroit highwayman and fripon, which is an amiable diminutive of thief. See Robert Macaire.

Macbeth (mak-bèth'). Killed at Lumphanan, Aberdeenshire, Scotland, 1057 (1056?). A Scottish chieftain. He killed Duncan 1040 (1039?), and was proclaimed king of Scotland. He was defeated by Siward at Dunsinane, Perthshire, in 1064. He is the hero of a tragedy of the same name by Shakspeare. See the following.

Macbeth. A tragedy by Shakspeare. Its first recorded production is April 20, 1610, but it is thought to have been played before, and revised by Shakspeare in 1606. It is thought to have been reduced to the form of the 1623 folio by Middleton about 1622 (Fleay). The story is from Holinshed. Davenant produced an adaptation printed in 1674—not 1673, as is usually said, which is probably Betterton's version (Furness). It is not known precisely when it was first produced, but probably before 1664. It was more like an opera, with music by Matthew Lock, and it held the stage till Garrick restored the Shakspeare version. In 1773 Macklin first dressed Macbeth in his native costume; Garrick had been accustomed to wear the uniform of a military officer of the time. The character of Macbeth is that of a man of acquired though not constitutional courage, tempted by ambition to treachery and murder. Before he commits the crime he wavers and shudders at both end and means; but, once made resolute through the courage of his wife, he goes forward to subsequent murders through fear of discovery and defeat. "Lady Macbeth, like all in Shakspeare, is a class individualized: of high rank, left much alone, and feeding herself with day-dreams of ambition, she mistakes the courage of fantasy for the power of bearing the consequences of the realities of guilt. Hers is the mock fortitude of a mind deluded by ambition; she shames her husband with a superhuman audacity of fancy which she cannot support, but sinks in the season of remorse, and dies in suicidal agony." Coleridge, Lects. on Shak., etc., p. 375.

Macbeth. An opera by Verdi, first produced at Florence in 1847, and at Paris in 1865.

Maccabæus, Judas. See Judas Maccabæus.

Maccabees (mak'a-bèz), The. [From Maccabi (see below).] A family of heroes who became the deliverers of Judea and Judaism during the bloody persecutions of the Syrian king Antiochus Epiphanes, 175-164 B. C., and afterward established a dynasty of priest-kings which lasted until supplanted by Herod in 40 B. C. The original name of the family was the Hasmoneans. It consisted of the aged Mattathias and his five sons, Jochanan, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan, living at Modin, a small town near Jerusalem. When the sufferings of the Jews at the hands of the Syrians became unbearable, and the existence of the Jewish religion was at stake, Mattathias and his sons became the leaders of an open rebellion against Antiochus. On Mattathias and his sons being summoned by Apelles, one of the Syrian overseers, to sacrifice to the gods, Mattathias answered, "If all the people in the kingdom obey the order of the monarch to depart from the faith of their fathers, I and my sons will abide by the covenant of our forefathers." When one of the Jews approached the altar to sacrifice in Jupiter, Mattathias rushed upon the spostat and killed him at the altar. His sons then fell upon Apelles and his troops, killed them, and destroyed the altar. Gradually an army of religious patriots rallied around these hero-leaders, and carried on a kind of guerrilla warfare against the oppressing Syrians. Mattathias died in 167, appointing Judas as his successor in the command, and Simon as the man of counsel. Judas bore the name "Maccabi," either made up of the initials from the Hebrew words mī kamocho ba'elim Jehovah ("Who is like thee among the gods, Jehovah?"), or derived from the Hebrew word makab, 'a hammer,' expressive of his heroism (compare Charles Martel), and gave by his genuinely heroic bearing his name to this whole glorious epoch of Jewish history. For the rest of the history of this race, with which that of Judea is intimately interwoven, see Alexander Jannæus, Aristobulus, Herod, and Judas Maccabæus.

His "Cronographia do Brasil" (2 vols. 1873) had a wide circulation.

Macedon. See Macedonia.

Macedonia (mas-ē-dō'ni-ā), [Gr. Makedōnia.] In ancient geography, a country of southeastern Europe, of vague limits. It lay north of the Egean Sea and Thessaly, east of Illyria, and west of Thrace, separated from Illyria by the Scardus Mountains. The chief rivers were the Axios (Vardar) and Strymon; the chief cities, Edessa, Pella, and Thessalonica. Macedonia was not originally a part of Hellas. It first became powerful under Philip. (See Macedonian Empire.) Its possession was contested by Alexander's successors, and was finally obtained by Antigonos Gonatas about 278. The Macedonians were defeated by Rome at Cynoscephalæ in 197, and finally at Pydna in 168, and Macedonia was made a Roman province in 146. It is now a part of Turkey, its inhabitants being chiefly Bulgarians, Greeks, and Turks.

Macedonia. A diocese in the southern part of the later Roman prefecture of Illyricum (Macedonia, Epirus, and Greece).

Macedonian (mas-ĕ-dō'ni-an) Empire. The empire built up by Philip (who reigned 359-336 B. C.) and Alexander the Great (336-323). It included at its greatest extent Macedonia, Greece, Thrace, Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, Assyria, part of Armenia, and the countries comprised in the modern Persia, Afghanistan, Baluchistan, western India, and a large part of central Asia. The empire was divided under Alexander's successors — the chief divisions being Macedonia, Egypt, Syria, Pergamum, Bithynia, Rhodes, and Greek states.

Macedonians (mas-ĕ-lō'ni-anz). 1. The natives or inhabitants of ancient Macedonia. The Macedonians, the conquerors of Greece and of many other countries, have generally been regarded as not Hellenes, or genuine Greeks, although they used the Greek language.

West of the Thracian district in antiquity was the abode of the Macedonians, whose language, in spite of the scanty remains in which it is preserved to us, shows itself undoubtedly to be Greek and nearly related to Doric. There has then rightly been a tendency, gathering strength of late, to regard the tribe of the Macedonians as the portion, left behind in the north, of the Greek people, whose original abode was at the foot of Olympus, and perhaps even further north still.

Schrafer, Aryan Peoples (tr. by Jevons), p. 431.

2. The followers of Macedonius, bishop of Constantinople in the 4th century, who denied the distinct existence and Godhead of the Holy Spirit, which he conceived to be a creature or merely a divine energy diffused through the universe. Members of this sect were also known as Marathionians and Pneumatomachi. The Semi-Arians were often called by this name, and the name of Semi-Arians was also given to the Macedonians in the proper sense.

Macedonian Wars. Wars between Rome and Macedonia: (1) 214-205 B. C., when Philip V. fought in alliance with Carthage; (2) 200-197, when Philip V. was defeated by Flamininus at Cynoscephalæ (197); (3) 171-168, when Perseus was defeated by Æmilius Paulus at Pydna (168); (4) 149-148, soon after which Macedonia was made a Roman province.

Machault, or Machaut (mä-shō'), Guillaume de. Born about 1284; died after 1370. A French poet and musician. Chaucer's indebtedness to him is marked. "A native of Champagne and of noble birth, he early entered, like most of the lesser nobility of the period, the service of great feudal lords. He was chamberlain to Philip the Fair, and at his death became the secretary of John of Luxembourg, the well-known king of Bohemia. After the death of this prince at Crécy, he returned to the service of the court of France and served John and Charles V., finally, as it appears, becoming in some way connected with Pierre de Lusignan, king of Cyprus. His works were very numerous, amounting in all to some 80,000 lines, of which, until recently, nothing but a few extracts was in print. In the last few years, however, 'La Prise d'Alexandrie,' a rhymed chronicle of the exploits of Lusignan, and the 'Voir Dit,' a curious love-poem in the style of the age, have been printed. Besides these, his works include numerous ballades, etc., and several long poems in the style of those of Froissart." Sainsbury, French Lit., p. 102.

He was descended from a noble but impoverished family, and was the son of Bernardo Machiavelli, a jurist. He is said to have studied under Marsello Virgilio Adriani, although little is known of his youth and education. He was in 1498 appointed secretary to the Dieci di Libertà e Pace at Florence, by whom he was employed in numerous diplomatic missions to the petty states of Italy, to France, and to Germany. He was deprived of office on the return of the banished Medici in 1512, and in 1513 was imprisoned and put to the torture on suspicion of conspiring against Giovanni de' Medici. He was, however, released in the same year, and retired to a country estate near San Casciano, where he devoted himself to literary pursuits. His chief works are "Il Principe" ("The Prince"), "Istorie fiorentine" ("The Florentine History"), "Arte della guerra" ("Art of War"), "Discorsi" (essays on Art and government), "Mandragola" and other comedies. His complete works were edited in 8 vols. in 1813. (See Principe, II.) Also Machiavelli.

Machin (mak'in), or Macham (-am), Robert. The legendary discoverer of Madeira. He is represented as an English squire who fled from England with his innamorata, Anna d'Arset or Dorset, daughter of a powerful noble at the court of Edward III. The vessel in which he sailed was driven by stress of weather to the coast of an unknown island, where he landed with part of the crew at a port which they named Machico. During their absence the ship was driven out to sea, and Anna, who had remained on board, died of grief and fatigue, while Machin and his companions made their way to Spain and thence to England. His story incited the Spanish and the Portuguese to search for the island, which was found by Gonsalves Zarco in 1419. The legend was first printed in the "Descobrimientos" of Antonio Gadyano (1503-57), of which Bakhty published a translation in 1601.

Macready (mak-rē'di), William Charles. Born at London, March 3, 1793; died at Cheltenham, April 27, 1873. A noted English tragedian. His father was an actor and manager of the theater at Birmingham where Macready made his first appearance in 1810. In 1816 he appeared in London at Covent Garden. In 1837 he had advanced to the front rank of his profession, having for many years struggled for supremacy with Kean, Young, and Charles Kemble. He then undertook the management of the Covent Garden Theatre, and produced Shakespeare's plays. After two seasons he abandoned it and played in the provinces and in Paris. He managed the Drury Lane Theatre 1831-43. He made several visits to America, during the last of which occurred the famous Astor Place riot (which see). In 1851 he left the stage. He was noted for his Macbeth, Cassius, Lear, Henry IV., Iago, Virginius, Richelieu, and other parts.

Macrinus (ma-kri'nus), Marcus Opeius. Born at Caesarea, Mauretania, 164 A. D.; killed in Cappadocia, 218. Roman emperor 217-218. He was of humble origin; was admitted to the service of the emperor Septimius Severus at the instance of the favorite Plantianus; and was appointed prefect of the pretorians by Caracalla, whose murder he instigated and whom he succeeded. He was signally defeated by the Parthians at Nisibis, and was defeated and killed by the partisans of Elagabalus who succeeded him.

Macusis (mä-kō-sēz'). A tribe of Indians of the Carib stock, inhabiting the open lands of south-western British Guiana and the adjacent parts of Brazil and Venezuela. Formerly they ranged northward to the Orinoco, and were very numerous and warlike. They are now reduced to a few thousands, who are friendly to the whites, but are practically independent. They are of darker color than the other Guiana tribes, well formed and athletic, and very cleanly. Their houses are grouped in small villages, and they cultivate manioc and other plants. Also written Maucis or Maucis.

MacVeagh (mak-vā'), Wayne. Born at Phoenixville, Chester County, Pa., April 19, 1833. An American politician. He was admitted to the bar in 1856; was United States minister to Turkey 1870-71; was United States attorney-general under President Garfield in 1881; and was appointed ambassador to Italy in 1893.

Madagascar (mad-ā-gas'kār). An island in the Indian Ocean, east of southern Africa, from which it is separated by the Mozambique Channel. Capital, Antananarivo. It extends from about lat. 12° to 25° 35' S. The surface in the interior is generally elevated and mountainous. The productions are tropical. Tamatave is the chief port. The government is a monarchy. The inhabitants and language are Malagasy. The leading tribe is the Hovas. The state religion is Christianity. Madagascar was early visited by the Arabs, and was discovered by the Portuguese in 1506. The introduction of Christianity under Radama I. (1810-28) was followed by a persecution of the Christians under Queen Ranavalona I. (1828-61). A war with France in 1883-85 was terminated by a treaty (Dec. 12, 1885) establishing a French protectorate. Length, about 975 miles. Greatest breadth, about 350 miles. Area, about 228,500 square miles. Population, estimated, 3,500,000.

Madan (mad'an), Martin. Born in 1726; died at Epsom, May 2, 1790. An English Methodist divine. He was called to the bar in 1748, but shortly abandoned law in order to enter the ministry, and was for many years chaplain to the Lock Hospital. He is chiefly known as the author of "Telyphthora" (1780), in which he advocated polygamy.

Mad Anthony. A nickname often given Anthony Wayne on account of his reckless bravery. Mad Cavalier, The. A surname of Prince Rupert, nephew of Charles I. of England.

Maddaloni (mä-dä-lō'nē). A town in the province of Caserta, Italy, situated 15 miles north-east of Naples. Population (1881), 17,072.

Madden (mad'en), Sir Frederick. Born at Portsmouth, Feb. 16, 1801; died at London, March 8, 1873. An English antiquary and paleographer. He became assistant keeper of manuscripts in the British Museum in 1828, and head of the manuscript department in 1837. He edited "Havelok the Dane" (1828), Layamon's "Brut" (1847), Matthew Paris's "Historia Anglorum" (Rolls Series, 1866-69), and, with Josiah Forshall, Wyclif's Bible (1850).

Madden, Sir George Allan. Born at London, Jan. 3, 1771; died at Portsmouth, Dec. 8, 1828. A British general. He entered the British army in 1788; served in Corsica in 1794, in Portugal 1797-1800, and in Egypt in 1801; and was compelled to retire from the service about 1802 in consequence of a quarrel with a superior officer. He was appointed brigadier-general in the Portuguese army in 1809, and commanded a brigade of cavalry at Fuente de Cantos (Sept. 15, 1810), where he saved the Spanish army by charging a superior force of French hussars. He was made marchal de campo in the Portuguese service in 1813, and in 1819 was promoted major-general in the British army (in which he had previously been reinstated in recognition of his services in the Peninsular war).

Madeira (mä-dä'ē-rä). The largest tributary of the Amazon, into which it flows about lat. 3° 25' S., long. 58° 48' W. The chief head streams are the Mamoré, Beni, and Itenez (or Guapire). Total length, including the Mamoré, about 2,000 miles.

Madeira (mä-dē'rä); Pg. pron. mä-dä'ē-rä). [So called with ref. to the forest which once covered it: from Pg. madeira, wood, from L. materies, matter.] The chief of the Madeira Islands, belonging to Portugal, situated in the Atlantic Ocean west of Africa. The chief town is Funchal, lat. 32° 38' N., long. 16° 54' W. The surface is mountainous and picturesque. The chief products are wine and sugar. The inhabitants are of Portuguese descent. The island is noted as a health-resort. It was visited by the Portuguese in 1419, and colonized by them about 1420. It was occupied by the British in 1801, and from 1807 to 1814. Length, 32 miles.

Madeleine (mä-d-län'), Church of the. A church in Paris, begun under Louis XV. and Louis XVI., but not finished until 1842. At the end of the 18th century it was determined to build the present church in the Rue Royale, to complete the architectural scheme of the Place de la Concorde; and the first stone was laid April 13, 1764. Countant d'Iry, the architect, died in 1777, and was succeeded by Couture, who demolished the works already under way and substituted a plan of his own. The Revolution put an end to the work, but the empire revived it under the name of the Temple à la Gloire; and the work owes its present character to Vignon. It is a huge Roman Corinthian temple, measuring 141 by 354 feet, and 100 high, on a raised basement. It is a peripteros of 8 by 18 columns, without windows, with frieze richly sculptured with garlands, and the tympanum of the south façade filled with a colossal group of sculpture representing Christ as the judge of the world. The interior forms a great hall lighted from above: it is effective, and richly adorned with painting and sculpture.

Madelon (mä-d-lōn'). One of the "précieuses ridicules" in Molière's play of that name. She takes the more romantic name of Polixena.

Mademoiselle, La Grande, or Mademoiselle. See Montpensier.

Madge Wildfire. A madwoman in Scott's "Heart of Midlothian."

Madhava (mä'dhā-va), or Madhavacarya (-vä-chär-yä). [Skt., 'the learned Madhava,' or 'the teacher Madhava'; from ācārya, teacher, especially of the Veda.] A great Hindu scholar of the 14th century. He was the author, or reputed author, of great commentaries on the Rig- (in conjunction with Sayana), Yajur-, and Samaveda, of the Nyayamata-vistara, the Sarvadarshanasangraha, the Parasharasmritiyakhya, the Sankshepashankaravijaya, the Kalanirayana, and other works. He was the prime minister of Sangama, who began to reign at Vijayanagara about 1336, and of Bukka I., who began to reign about 1361. He died at the age of 90. The circumstance that so many works are ascribed to Madhava and his brother Sayana is explained by the Hindu practice according to which works composed by order of a distinguished person bear his name. According to Burnell the two names denote one person, Sayana being the Bhoganatha or mortal body of Madhava, the soul, identified with Vishnu; and the 29 writings current under the name of Madhava all proceed from Madhava himself, and were composed during 30 of the 55 years between 1331 and 1386, which he spent as abbot of the monastery at Shringeri under the name of Vidyaranya, 'forest of knowledge.' Weber disputes the identification of Madhava and Sayana ("Literarisches Centralblatt," 1873, p. 1421).

Mad Heracles (Hercules), The. A tragedy by Euripides, exhibited about 420 B. C. It portrays Heracles's rescue of his family from Lycus, a Theban tyrant; the slaughter of his wife and children by him in a sudden attack of madness; and his return to sanity.

Madi (mä'dē). An African tribe dwelling on the banks of the Nile, north of Albert Nyanza, and bordering on the Lur and Shuli tribes, with whom it is related in physique and customs but not in language. The latter shows affinity with the Makaraka dialect of Nyam-Nyam, and also with the Nyangbara. It is rich in monosyllables, and has a jerking accent. A subtribe of the Mittu is also called Madi, but the two are not related.

Madison (mad'i-son). A city and the capital of Jefferson County, Indiana, situated on the Ohio 38 miles north-northeast of Louisville. It has pork packing and other flourishing industries. Population (1890), 8,936.

jean bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church, president of William and Mary College 1777-1812.

Madison, James. Born at Port Conway, Va., March 16, 1751; died at Montpelier, Orange County, Va., June 28, 1836. The fourth President of the United States (1809-17). He graduated at Princeton College in 1771; was a delegate to Congress from Virginia 1780-83, and to the Constitutional Convention of 1787; was member of Congress from Virginia 1789-97; drew up the Virginia Resolutions of 1793; was secretary of state 1801-09; was elected President as Democratic candidate in 1808; and was reelected in 1812. War was declared with Great Britain in 1812 (see War of 1812). He was associated with Jay and Hamilton in the composition of the "Federalist" (which see). He left many manuscripts, some of which have been published in "Madison Papers" (3 vols. 1840) and "Letters and other Writings" (4 vols. 1865).

Madison Square. A public park, six acres in extent, in New York city, bounded by Fifth Avenue, 23d street, Madison Avenue, and 26th street. It was originally the junction of the Bloomingdale road and old Boston road.

Madison Square Garden. A place of amusement in New York city, architecturally notable not only for its great size, but also for its successful artistic treatment, completed in 1890. It combines an amphitheater 300 feet long and 200 wide, a theater, a concert-hall, a dining-hall, and a roof-garden. The architecture is a plain rendering in yellow brick and terra-cotta of a good type of the Spanish Renaissance, with a single main story of round-arched windows above the basement. The front is adorned above the cornice with colonnaded loggias of considerable extent, and below with fine arcades covering the sidewalk and springing from shafts of polished granite. At the angles are placed towers terminating in pavilions, which are repeated in the middle of the front and at the base of the great square tower which rises from the south side. This tower reproduces the famous Giralda at Seville, upon a somewhat reduced scale and with the ornament greatly simplified. It is 332 feet high to the head of the crowning statue.

Mädler (mä'd'ler), Johann Heinrich von. Born at Berlin, May 29, 1794; died at Hannover, March 14, 1874. A German astronomer, professor at Berlin 1837-40, and professor and director of the observatory at Dorpat 1840-65. He published a map of the moon (1834-36), "Allgemeine Selenographie" (1837), "Populäre Astronomie" (1841), "Die Centralsonne" (1846), "Die Eigenbewegungen der Fixsterne" (1856), etc.

Madman of the North. A surname given to Charles XII. of Sweden.

Madoc (mad'ok). A legendary Welsh prince, said to have discovered America about 1170. He is the subject of a poem by Southey (1805).

Madonna (ma-don'ä). [It., 'my lady'; specifically, 'Our Lady,' the Virgin Mary.] Of the numerous pictures with this subject, the following are among the most noted. (1) Madonna and Child, with St. John, sometimes called the Albrandini or Garvagh Madonna: a painting by Raphael, in the National Gallery, London. (2) Madonna and Child, with St. John and Angels: a painting by Sandro Botticelli, in the National Gallery, London. The picture is characterized by the beautiful roses of the hedge in the background. (3) Madonna and Child, with SS. Jerome and Sebastian, called the Madonna della Rondine from the swallow which figures in the composition: a small painting by Crivelli, in the National Gallery, London. (4) Madonna and Child: a painting by Murillo, in the museum at Dresden. The Virgin sits on a stone bench, holding the Child, who leans his head on his hand against her breast. (5) Madonna and Child, with SS. John and Catharine: a painting by Titian, in the National Gallery, London. (6) Madonna degli Ansdei ('of the Ansdei'), from the Marlborough collection: a painting by Raphael (1506), in the National Gallery, London. The Virgin is seated on a high throne, holding the Child and reading from a book; on either side stand St. John and St. Nicholas of Bari. This is the finest Raphael in Great Britain. It is sometimes called the Blenheim Madonna. (7) Madonna de la Servilleta ('of the napkin'): a celebrated painting by Murillo (about 1676), in the museum at Seville, Spain. The Virgin, seen in half-length, holds the Child on her left arm. He appears to be struggling to escape. According to tradition it was painted, in the absence of canvas, on a table-napkin supplied by the cook. (8) Madonna della Casa d'Alba ('of the house of Alba'): a small but noted painting by Raphael (1509), in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. The picture is circular, with a landscape background. The Virgin is seated on the ground; the Child rests partly on her knee, and seizes a cross held by the infant St. John, who kneels beside him. (9) Madonna della Cesta ('of the basket'): a painting by Correggio, in the National Gallery, London. The Virgin is seated on a grassy bank, holding the Child on her knee; in the background St. Joseph is seen working. (10) Madonna della Rosa ('of the rose'): a painting by Parmigianino, in the museum at Dresden. The Virgin has given the Child a rose, which he holds as he lies with one hand resting on a globe typifying the earth. (11) Madonna della Verdura ('of the meadow'): a painting by Raphael (1506), in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. The Virgin sits in a meadow studded with flowers; before her are the infant Christ and the boy St. John, who kneels and presents a cross to Jesus. The type is that of the Belle Jardinière and the Madonna del Cardellino. (12) Madonna del Rosario ('of the rosary'): a large painting by Caravaggio, in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. The Virgin is enthroned; SS. Peter Martyr and Dominic are distributing wreaths of roses among the assembled people. (13) Madonna del Rosario ('of the rosary'): a painting by Murillo, in the Dulwich Gallery, England. The Virgin, seated among clouds, has the Child on her lap. He holds a rosary, which the Virgin holds also. Beneath are angels. (14) Madonna del Rosario: one of Van Dyck's finest paintings (1623), in the chapel of the same name at Palermo, Sicily. The Virgin, surrounded by cherubim and attended by saints, extends a rose-garland to St. Dominic, while St. Rosalie kneels before her. (15) Madonna di Casa Tenapi: a painting by Raphael (1506), in the Old Pinakothek at Munich. The Virgin, in half-length, stands, holding the Child in her arms, in a landscape with a town in the background. (16) Madonna di San Sisto, or Sistine Madonna: a famous painting by Raphael (1518), in the museum at Dresden. It was bought by the elector Augustus III. in 1754 from the Benedictine monastery at Piacenza. It represents the Virgin, holding the Child, advancing among clouds, surrounded by cherub faces; at the left Pope Sixtus II. kneels in adoration, and at the right St. Barbara looks down and out of the picture. Below, two winged cherubs, familiar in popular reproductions, lean on a parapet looking upward. (17) Madonna in Adoration: a painting by Francesco Francia (about 1500), in the Old Pinakothek at Munich. The Virgin, standing, adores the Child, who lies before her in a bower of roses. (18) Madonna Nicolini: a painting by Raphael (1508), in Panshanger House, England. The Virgin sits holding the Child on a white cushion. Also called the large Cowper Madonna. (19) Madonna of Burgomster Meyer: a famous painting by Hans Holbein the younger (about 1525), belonging to the Princess Charles of Hesse-Darmstadt. It represents the Virgin, crowned, standing in a niche, holding against her breast the Child, whose left arm is extended in blessing. At the Virgin's feet kneel Burgomaster Meyer of Basel, his first and second wives, his daughter, and a boy who supports a nude child. An old copy in the Dresden museum was until 1871 held to be the original. (20) Madonna of St. Francis: a painting by Correggio (1514-15), in the museum at Dresden. The Virgin is enthroned beneath a canopy; about her head are a radiant nimbus and a circle of cherubs. Before the throne are ranged SS. Francis and Anthony of Padua, and SS. John and Catharine. (21) Madonna of the Rocks: a painting by Leonardo da Vinci, in the National Gallery, London. It represents the Virgin and Child, with the adoring St. John and an angel, amid a landscape of cliffs. It is a replica, with some modifications, of the Virge aux Rochers in the Louvre. (22) Madonna of the Cherries: a painting by Titian (about 1508), in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. The Virgin sits behind a parapet on which the Child stands holding a bunch of cherries. The boy St. John stands below, and SS. Joseph and Zacharias at the sides. (23) Madonna of the Grapes: a small painting by Martin Schongauer, in the Imperial Gallery at Vienna. The Virgin, who is seated on a bench, plucks a berry from a bunch of grapes and offers it to Jesus, who stands in her lap with his arms around her neck. St. Joseph, with an ox and an ass, is seen in the background. (24) Madonna with Saints: a painting by Titian, sometimes called the Madonna with the White Lady, in the museum at Dresden. The Child is held on the Virgin's lap by St. John, and adored by SS. Paul and Jerome and the Magdalen. The Magdalen is richly robed in white (whence the popular name of the picture). (25) Madonna with St. John the Baptist and St. Mark, and outside St. Peter and St. Mark: a triptych by Fra Angelico, in the Uffizi, Florence, one of his most admired works. The Madonna is surrounded by twelve angels playing on musical instruments. (26) Madonna with Angels: one of the most noted paintings of Sandro Botticelli, in the Uffizi, Florence. The Virgin sits writing, attended by angels, while others support a crown over her head. The Child holds a pomegranate and reaches out for his mother's writing hand. (27) Madonna with Angels, Apostles, and Saints: a noted painting by Duccio di Buoninsegna (end of 13th century), in the Dnomo at Siena, Italy. It is the chief Sienese painting of its time, somewhat archaic in type. (28) Madonna del Sacco ('of the sack'): a fresco by Andrea del Sarto (1525), in the Chiostro dei Morti of Santissima Annunziata, Florence. It is a Holy Family, and is named from the sack against which Joseph is leaning reading. (29) Madonna del Divino Amore ('of the divine love'): a painting by Raphael, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. The Virgin, with hands clasped behind the Child pressed to her breast, is praying. Christ blesses the youthful Baptist while holding St. Elizabeth by the hand. Joseph is walking slowly behind the group. (30) Madonna della Sedia or Seggiola ('chair' or 'little chair'): a famous painting by Raphael, in the Pitti Gallery, Florence, perhaps the master's most popular work. The picture is circular. The young mother, a beautiful peasant girl, sits in an arm-chair pressing her Child to her bosom with an air of calm happiness, while the boy St. John stands reverently at her knee. (31) Madonna della Scodella ('of the little bowl'): a painting by Correggio, in the Pinacoteca at Parma, Italy. It is an episode of rest during the flight into Egypt, described as a painted poem of family happiness, bright in light, color, and thought, and with accompaniment of Correggio's charming angels. (32) Madonna della Misericordia ('of pity'), the Virgin interceding for the people of Lucca: a beautiful painting by Fra Bartolommeo, in the Palazzo Pubblico at Lucca, Italy. Christ appears above, a majestic figure. (33) Madonna del Cardellino ('of the thistle-bush'): a painting by Raphael, in the Uffizi, Florence. The Virgin, graceful and of very sweet expression, sits on a mossy bank, with the child Christ and St. John at her knee. (34) Madonna del Baldachino ('of the canopy'): a painting by Raphael, in the Galleria Pitti, Florence. The Virgin is enthroned in a domed niche, beneath a canopy whose draperies are supported by two long-robed angels. The Child sits smiling on her knee, playing with his toes. Several saints are in attendance. (35) A painting by Cimabue (1270), in Santa Maria Novella, Florence. It was the most notable painting of its day, and when finished was borne to the church in a popular procession. The Virgin is enthroned, with the Child on her knee, and six attendant angels, the whole on a gold ground. Some of the Byzantine stiffness and conventionality remains, but in expression and in naturalness of drapery and movement the picture justifies the admiration it excited. (36) Madonna with two Angels playing on musical instruments: an altarpiece by Giovanni Bellini, in Santa Maria dei Frari at Venice. The side compartments contain St. Benedict and St. Nicholas, each with a companion. (37) Madonna of Pesaro: a votive picture over 17 feet high, by Titian, in Santa Maria dei Frari at Venice. In technical perfection and splendor of color this is one of Titian's finest paintings. The seated Madonna, holding the Child on her knee, inclines graciously toward the kneeling donor of the picture, the senator Benedetto Pesaro, in presence of St. Francis, St. Anthony of Padua, and St. Peter, and of other dignitaries of the Pesari. (38) Madonna of the Green Cushion: a painting by Andrea Solario of Milan, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin, her head shrouded in white, is suckling the Child, who lies on a green pillow. The landscape background is pleasing, and the color very brilliant. (39) Madonna del Coniglio ('of the rabbit'): a celebrated painting by Titian, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin is seated on the ground with her hand on a white rabbit, to the delight of the infant Christ, who is held by St. Catharine. (40) Madonna della Vittoria: a beautiful painting by Mantegna, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin, holding the infant Christ, sits in an overarched bower, between SS. Michael and Maurice; in front are St. Elizabeth with St. John, and Francesco Gonzaga of Mantua, kneeling, over whom the Virgin makes a gesture of blessing. A relief of the Fall of Man appears on the pedestal of the Virgin's throne. (41) Madonna with the Diadem: a painting by Raphael, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin, wearing a coronet, kneels, with the boy St. John beside her, and lifts the covering from the sleeping Child. (42) Madonna and Child with St. Anna: one of the finest paintings of Leonardo da Vinci, in the Louvre, Paris. The Virgin is seated in St. Anna's lap, and supports the Child, who is playing with a lamb, amid a fair landscape. (43) See Orléans Madonna.

Among his works are "Godefroy de Bouillon proclaimed King of Jerusalem" (1839), "Maria Christina as a Nun, etc." (1843), "The Women at the Sepulcher" (1845), and many portraits of noted persons.

Madre de Deus (mä'dre de dá'os), Gaspar da. Born at Santos, São Paulo, 1714; died in São Paulo, 1804. A Brazilian Benedictine monk and historian. He is best known for his "Memorias para a historia da Capitania de S. Vicente" (Lisbon, 1797; Rio de Janeiro, 1847), a work of great historical value.

Madrid (ma-drid'; Sp. pron. mä-thrē'h). [Sp. Madrid. Ar. Majrit, ML. Majoritum.] 1. A province in New Castile, Spain. Area, 2,997 square miles. Population (1887), 682,644.—2. The capital of Spain and of the province of Madrid, situated on the Manzanares in lat. 40° 25' N., long. 3° 42' W. It stands on a plateau 2,150 feet above sea-level, nearly in the geographical center of Spain. The Church of San Francisco, finished in 1784, is a great rotunda, with a dome 163 feet high, an apse, and three domed chapels radially arranged on each side. The interior is remarkable for its spaciousness, and for its profuse decoration in sculpture and painting by modern masters. The royal palace, begun in 1737, is imposing from its great size and its fine situation on a lofty terrace above the river Manzanares. The royal armory is a unique collection of splendid medieval and Renaissance armor, arms, banners, and trappings, a large proportion of which was actually used by some of the most famous personages in Spanish history (Charles V., Philip II., Isabella the Catholic, the Gran Capitán, Pedro the Cruel, Don John of Austria, etc.). The bronze statue of Philip IV., by Montañés (19 feet high), in the Plaza del Oriente, cast in Florence in 1640, ranks as one of the finest equestrian statues existing; the horse prances, with no support but his own hind legs. The Museo del Prado, or Royal Museum, ranks as one of the great galleries of paintings of the world, excelling, more especially, in the masterpieces of Murillo and Velasquez. Madrid was a Moorish outpost; was taken from the Moors in 1083; became a favorite residence of Charles V., and was made the capital by Philip II. in 1560; was occupied by the French in 1808-13; and has been the scene of various insurrections (1808, etc.). Population (1887), 472,228.

Madrid, Treaty of. A treaty between the emperor Charles V. and Francis I. of France, signed Jan. 14, 1526. Francis was released from captivity in return for the cession of Burgundy and other concessions.

Madridejos (mä-THĒ-THĪ' hōs). A town in the province of Toledo, Spain, 37 miles southeast of Toledo. Population (1887), 6,578.

Madrigal de las Altas Torres (mä-d-rē-gäl' dā lās ä'l'täs tōr'rās). A small place near Medina del Campo, Spain, said by some to be the birthplace of Isabella.

Madura (mä-dō' rä). An island of the Dutch East Indies, north of Java, from which it is separated by the Strait of Madura. Length, about 100 miles.

Madura. 1. A district in Madras, British India, intersected by lat. 10° N., long. 78° E. Area, 8,401 square miles. Population (1881), 2,168,680.—2. The capital of the district of Madura, situated on the Vaigai in lat. 9° 55' N., long. 78° 9' E. The great temple here was built for the most part in the early 17th century. The inclosure forms a rectangle 720 by 840 feet, with a lofty pyramidal gopura or pylon in the middle of each face. The choultry, or columned hall, of Tirumulla Nayak (about 1650), built to receive the chief local divinity during his annual visit to the king, is 333 feet long and 105 wide, with 4 ranges of cruciform piers, all richly sculptured, and presents an imposing effect. The piers of the façade exhibit figures in the round of prancing horses resting their fore feet and bodies on groups of soldiers beneath them. Population (1891), 87,428.

Madvig (mäd'vig), Johan Nicolai. Born at Svaneke, Bornholm, Denmark, Aug. 7, 1804; died at Copenhagen, Dec. 13, 1886. A celebrated Danish philologist and statesman. He was professor at Copenhagen, at first (1829) of the Latin language and literature, and later of classical philology; minister of public worship 1848-51; and later inspector of public instruction. His chief works are a Latin grammar (1841), "Adversaria critica" (1871-73), "Die Verfassung und Verwaltung des römischen Staats" (1883), etc.

Mad World, A, my Masters. 1. A dialogue by Nicholas Breton, printed in 1603.—2. A play by Middleton, probably produced in 1606. It was printed in 1608. Mrs. Aphra Behn copied it in "The City Heiress," and it was used by Charles Johnson in "Country Lasses."

Mæander (mæ-an'dēr). The ancient name of the Menderes.

Mæatæ (mæ-ä'tē). A warlike tribe in the south of Scotland and north of England, just beyond the Roman wall.

Mæcenās (mæ-sē'nās), Caius Cilnius. Died 8 B. C. A Roman statesman and patron of literature. He was descended from an ancient Etruscan family, and belonged to the equestrian order. He appears in 40 as the agent of Octavianus (afterward emperor under the title of Augustus) in negotiating a marriage with Scribonia, daughter of Libo, the father-in-law of Sextus Pompeius. He was intrusted with the administration of Rome during the absence of Octavianus on an expedition against Pompeius in 36; and after the battle of Actium in 31, when Octavianus made himself master of the Roman world, urged him to establish an empire instead of restoring the republic. He remained, with Agrippa, the chief adviser of Augustus down to 16, when he became estranged from his master and retired to private life. He was the friend and patron of Horace and Vergil, and wrote a number of works, fragments only of which are extant.

Mælar. See Mälär.

Mælstrom (mä'l'strom). A celebrated whirlpool or violent current in the Arctic Ocean, near the western coast of Norway, between the islands Moskenisö and Varö, formerly supposed to suck in and destroy anything that approached it at any time, but now known not to be dangerous except under certain conditions.

Mæonia (mæ-ō'ni-ä). The ancient name of Lydia, Asia Minor.

Mæonides (mæ-on'i-dēz). [Gr. Μαιώνιδης.] A surname of Homer, a native (according to one account) of Mæonia.

Mæotis Palus (mæ-ō'tis pä'lus). [Gr. ἡ Μαίωτις λίμνη.] The ancient name of the Sea of Azoff.

Maerlant (mä'r'länt), Jacob (de Coster) van. Born probably at Maerlant, on the island of Voorne (date unknown); died at Damme, near Bruges, after 1291. A Flemish poet. He was apparently a sacristan in Maerlant, as is inferred from the title "de Coster" given him in one of his works. He became, ultimately, town clerk at Danne, where he died, and where a statue has been erected to him. He was the founder of the didactic school of poetry in the Netherlands. His principal work is the long poem (after a Latin original) "Spieghel Historiel" ("Mirror of History"), begun in 1283 and left uncompleted at his death. Among his other works are the romantic poems "Trojen" and "Alexander" (after French originals); "Der Natuere Bloeme" ("Flowers of Nature"); "Heimelijckheid der Heimelijckheden" ("The Secret of Secrets"); "Rijmbijbel" ("Rime Bible")—all after Latin originals; a strophic dialogue, "Wapene Martijn"; and the poem "Van den Lande van over Zee" ("Of the Lands over the Sea"), a sermon on the Crusades. He has been called "the father of Dutch poets."

Maestricht, or Maastricht (mä's'triçht), G. Maastricht (mä's'triçht). The capital of the province of Limburg, Netherlands, situated on the left bank of the Meuse, in lat. 50° 51' N., long. 5° 42' E.; the Roman Trajectum Superius, and medieval Trajectum ad Mosam. It has flourishing manufactures and trade. Formerly it was a very strong fortress. The chief attractions are the old church of St. Servatius, and in the vicinity the Petersberg sandstone quarries. It was a Roman town, and later frequently a Frankish royal residence; was afterward held by the dukes of Brabant and bishops of Liège; was taken by Alexander of Parma in 1579, by Prince Frederick Henry of Orange in 1632, by the French in 1673 and 1748, and again by the French under Kléber in 1794; and was held by the Dutch against the Belgians in 1830. Population (1890), 32,676.

Maeterlinck (met'ér-lingk), Maurice (Mooris). Born in 1864. A noted Belgian poet. He went to Paris in 1886, where he came under the influence of Villiers de l'Isle-Adam. Among his works are "Serres chaudes" (poems), the dramas "Les aveugles," "La princesse Maleine," "Les sept princesses," "L'Intruse," "Pelléas et Mélisande," "La quenouille et la besace," "Trois petits drames pour marionnettes," and various critical works.

Mafrā (mä'frä). A town in the province of Estremadura, Portugal, 18 miles northwest of Lisbon. The royal palace, founded in 1717 in emulation of the Escorial, is an enormous rectangle, the long sides measuring 770 feet, and contains 866 rooms, the finest of which is the great library. The domed church is well proportioned and incrustated in good taste with colored marbles. Population, about 3,000.

Magadha, or Magada (mag'ä-dj). An ancient empire in India, corresponding generally to the modern Behar and Oudh. Its capital was Pataliputra. It was flourishing about 300 B. C.

Magadoxo (mag-ä-dok'sō; Pg. pron. mä-gü-dō'shō), or Magadoxa (mag-ä-dok'sä; Pg. pron. mä-gü-dō'shü), or Makadishu (mä-kü-dō'shü). A town on the eastern coast of Africa, situated in lat. 2° 2' N., long. 45° 25' E. It is subject to Zanzibar. Population, estimated, 4,000.

Magalhães (mä-gäl-yiñs'), Benjamin Constant Botelho de, generally known as Benjamin Constant. Born at Rio de Janeiro, 1838; died there, Jan. 22, 1891. A Brazilian republican, one of the leaders of the revolution of Nov. 15, 1889. He was secretary of war, and for a time of posts and telegraphs, in the provisional government.

Magalhães, Domingos José Gonçalves de, Visconde de Araguaya. Born Aug. 13, 1811; died July 10, 1882. A Brazilian poet and diplomatist. He is regarded as the leader of the romantic school in Brazilian literature. Of his numerous poetical works the best known are "A Confederação dos Tamoyos," an epic (1857), "Mysterios" (1858), and "Urania" (1862).

Magalhães, Fernão de. [Sp. Fernando de Magalhães; F., G., and E. generally Ferdinand Magellan.] Born at Sabrosa, Traz-os-Montes, Portugal, about 1480; died on the island of Maetan, Philippines, April 27, 1521. The discoverer of the Strait of Magellan and of the Philippine Islands. He served with the Portuguese in the East Indies 1505-12, and in Morocco in 1514. He complained that his services were not properly rewarded, and formally renounced allegiance to Portugal in 1517; went to Spain; and, in conjunction with Rui Faleiro, another Portuguese, offered to find for Spain a western passage to the Moluccas, maintaining that those islands were outside of the hemisphere which, by treaty, had been assigned to Portugal for conquest. (See Tordesillas.) Charles V. accepted the plan, and fitted out for the expedition a government squadron of 5 ships and 205 men. At first Magalhães and Faleiro were made joint commanders, but later Faleiro was separated from the expedition, and Magalhães remained in full command. The squadron sailed from San Lucar, Sept. 20, 1519, and touched at Madeira. Soon after the vessel, or inspector, Juan de Cartagena, refused to obey commands, and was arrested. Reaching the Brazilian coast, they stopped at Rio de Janeiro Bay, Dec. 13-26; explored Rio de la Plata Jan. 10-Feb. 7, 1520; and on March 31 reached the port of San Julian on the Patagonian coast, where Magalhães decided to winter. Three of the captains, with their ships' crews, joined by Juan de Cartagena, mutinied against this order, but were subdued, one being killed in the struggle and another executed. Cartagena and a priest were abandoned on the coast. One of the ships was lost in a reconnaissance southward; and the Spaniards had slight encounters with the Indians, whom they described as a race of giants. On Oct. 21 the squadron reached the entrance to the Strait of Magellan (called by the commander Todos los Santos), and passed through after losing another ship, which became separated and returned to Spain. They reached the Pacific (so called by Magalhães) Nov. 28, 1520; kept at first to the north, then northwest and west; discovered a few islands, among others the Ladrones; suffered greatly from bad food and water, and from scurvy; and, misinformed of the position of the Moluccas, kept too far north, discovering the Philippines March 16, 1521. The King of Zebu, one of the islands, was very friendly to the Spaniards, made a formal act of allegiance to Spain, and was baptized with several hundred of his subjects; but in an attack on the unfriendly natives of Maetan, Magalhães was killed with several of his men. Soon after the King of Zebu revolted and murdered 27 Spaniards, including Serrano and Barboza whom they had elected captains. The survivors burned one of their vessels, and in the remaining two, after various wanderings (in which they discovered Borneo and lost more men), reached the Moluccas. There they loaded with spices; one of the ships, the Trinidad, attempted to reach Panama, but failed; and the Victoria, with 18 men, arrived in Europe by the Cape of Good Hope, thus making the first voyage around the world. Magallanes (mä-gäl-yä'nes). A territory of Chile, comprising the region south of about lat. 47° S., the coasts of the Strait of Magellan, and the western portion of Tierra del Fuego. Area, 75,292 square miles. Population (1893), 3,283.

Magallanes, Fernando de. See Magalhães, Fernão de.

Magan (mä-gän'), or Makan (mä-kän'). A geographical name occurring in the cuneiform inscriptions. Its meaning is not certain, but it probably designated the Arabian coast.

Magariños Cervantes (mä-gä-rën'yōs ther-vän'tes), Alejandro. Born in Montevideo, 1826. An Uruguayan author. He has published "Estudios históricos sobre el Rio de la Plata," "La Iglesia y el Estado," several volumes of poems, etc.

Magdala (mag'dä-lä). [Gr. Μαγδαλά; preferably Magadän.] In biblical geography, a town in Palestine, situated on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee; the modern El-Mejdel. The form Magadan is preferable.

Magdala (mäg-dä'lä). A stronghold in Abyssinia, situated in lat. 11° 22' N., long. 39° 25' E. It was captured in 1863 by the British under Sir Robert Napier, who in consequence was created Baron Napier of Magdala.

Magdalen (mag'dä-len). See Mary Magdalen. Among the numerous paintings of this subject the following are notable. (1) A painting by Correggio, in the museum at Dresden. The Magdalen lies on the ground amid a thickly wooded landscape, supporting her head on one elbow and reading intently. Her form is wrapped in dark-blue drapery, which leaves the bust and feet bare. (2) A picture by Paolo Veronese, by some considered his masterpiece, in the Pinacoteca at Turin. Mary is portrayed anointing the Saviour's feet. (3) A painting by Tintoret, in the Scuola di San Rocco at Venice. It is remarkable for its wild landscape background, full of stormy light and fantastic with tangled laurel. The figure of the Magdalen is small. (4) A painting by Titian (familiar in reproductions), in the Pitti Gallery, Florence. It is the picture of a beautiful woman, her undraped shoulders and bust enveloped in her rich golden hair, and with uplifted, tearful face and eyes. (5) A painting by Titian (about 1561), in the Hermitage Museum, St. Petersburg. The figure, seen half-length, is lightly draped; the partly exposed neck and breast are veiled by the flowing hair. The skull and open book are introduced as attributes. (6) Death of the Magdalen: a celebrated painting by Rubens, in the musée at Lille, France.

Magdalena (mäg-dä-lä'nä). The chief river of Colombia. It flows by a delta into the Caribbean Sea, about lat. 11° N. Its chief tributary is the Cauca. Length, about 1,050 miles; navigable to the vicinity of Honda (620 miles).

Magdalena. A department in the northeastern part of the Republic of Colombia, bordering on the Caribbean Sea on the north and on Venezuela on the east. Capital, Santa Marta. Area (including the peninsula of Goajira), about 27,900 square miles. Population (1890), about 140,000.

Magdalen (mag'dä-len or mäd'lin) College: in full St. Mary Magdalen College. A college of Oxford University, founded in 1457 by Bishop Waynflete. The charter was issued in 1458, and the foundation-stone was laid May 5, 1474. The most notable feature of the college is a tower of singular beauty.

Magdalene (mag'dä-len) College. A college of Cambridge University, England, founded in 1519. The Pepsian Building in the second court contains Pepsy's library, the MS. of his "Diary," and many other literary treasures and curiosities.

The College of St. Mary Magdalene originated in two messages granted by Henry VI. in 1428 to the Benedictine House of Troyland for the convenience of those monks who wished to study at Cambridge. Out of these messages, or on their site, a house was gradually constructed for the general use of the Benedictine Order, "different monasteries building different portions; thus Ely built one chamber, Walden a second, Ramsey a third," says Dr. Cairns; and so late as 1777 Cole saw the arms of Ely in the spandrels of the door at the north-west corner of the court. Clark, Cambridge, p. 210.

Magdalen (mag'da-len) Islands. A group of small islands in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, belonging to Quebec, Canada, situated northeast of Prince Edward Island. The chief occupation is fishing. Population, about 3,000.

Magdeburg (mäg'de-bö-ro). The capital of the province of Saxony, Prussia, situated on the Elbe in lat. 52° 8' N., long. 11° 39' E. It consists of the city proper and four suburbs, and is a powerful fortress. It is the center of the German sugar trade; is one of the leading commercial centers in Germany; and has manufactures of cotton, wool, tobacco, spirits, chicory, etc. The cathedral, of the 12th and 13th centuries, with later towers, measures 330 by 105 feet: height of the spire of the north tower, 337 feet. The choir and radiating chapels recall in style the French Romanesque; the western portions are pointed. The sculptured west portal is magnificent. There are choir-stalls of the 14th century, and many beautiful tombs, especially that of Archbishop Ernst by the noted Vischer, with figures of the twelve apostles. Magdeburg was founded in the 9th century. A Benedictine monastery was established there by Otto the Great. It became an archbishopric about 907, and was an important Hanseatic town. The Reformation was introduced in 1524. It was besieged and taken by Maurice of Saxony in 1550-51; resisted Wallenstein in 1629; was stormed and sacked by Tilly in 1631 (with the massacre, it is said, of 30,000 persons); was governed after the Reformation by archbishops and administrators; was secularized in 1618; was annexed to Brandenburg in 1680; was taken by the French in 1806; and was restored to Prussia in 1814. Population (1890), 202,234.

Magdeburg, Centuries of. An ecclesiastical history of the first 1,300 years of the Christian era, in which the records of each century occupy a volume. It was compiled by a number of Protestants at Magdeburg, and was published at Basel 1560-1574.

Magendie (mā-zhōn-dē'), François. Born at Bordeaux, France, Oct. 15, 1783; died at Paris, Oct. 7, 1855. A French physiologist, professor of anatomy in the Collège de France, especially noted for experiments on the physiology of the nerves. Among his works are "Précis élémentaire de physiologie" (1816), "Leçons sur les phénomènes physiques de la vie" (1835-38), "Leçons sur les fonctions et les maladies du système nerveux" (1839).

Magenta (mā-jen'tā). A small place near the river Ticino in Lombardy, Italy, about 15 miles west of Milan. Here, June 4, 1859, a notable victory was won by the allied French and Sardinians (55,000) over the Austrians (75,000) under Gyulai. The emperor Napoleon III. was nominally in command of the allies, but the chief credit belonged to MacMahon, who was afterward created duke of Magenta. The loss of the victors was 4,000; that of the Austrians, 10,000, besides prisoners. The battle led to the occupation of Milan.

Magerö (mā'ge-rē). The island of Norway on which the North Cape is situated.

Maggia (mäd'jä), Valle. An Alpine valley in the canton of Ticino, Switzerland, north of Lago Maggiore.

Maggiore (mäd-jō're), Lago, F. Lac Majeur. [It., 'greater lake.'] One of the chief lakes of northern Italy, situated on the border of Italy and the canton of Ticino in Switzerland: the Roman Lacus Verbanus. It is traversed by the Ticino; other tributaries are the Fosa and Maggia. It contains the Borromean Islands, and is famous for picturesque scenery. On its banks are Luino, Locarno, Intra, Pallanza, etc. Its northern part is called the Lake of Locarno. Height above sea-level, 645 feet. Length, 37 miles.

Maghiana (mā-gē-ā'njā). The capital of the district of Jhang, Panjab, British India, situated about lat. 31° 16' N., long. 72° 21' E. Population, about 10,000.

Maghreb (māg-reb'). An Arabic word for 'sunset' and 'west,' applied by Arabs to Morocco and to all northwestern Africa and Spain. Compare Arabic.

Magi (mā'ji). [L., from Gr. Μάγοι.] 1. The members of the learned and priestly caste in ancient Persia, who had official charge of the sacred rites, practised interpretation of dreams, professed supernatural arts, and were distinguished by peculiarities of dress and insignia. Their origin may be traced to the Akkadians, the earliest settlers of the lower Euphrates valley. The first biblical reference to the Magi occurs in Jer. xxxix. 3, 13, where a Babylonian rab-mag, or chief of the Magi, is mentioned in connection with the siege, capture, and rule of Jerusalem.

2. The "wise men" who, according to the Gospel of Matthew (ii. 1, 2), came from the East to Jerusalem to do homage to the new-born King of the Jews. A tradition as old as the 2d century (resting on Ps. lxxii. 10, Isa. xlix. 7) makes them kings, and at a later period the names Melchior, Kaspar, and Balthasar became attached to them. As the first of the pagans to whom the birth of the Messiah was announced, they are honored at the feast of the Epiphany: in the calendar, however, the three days immediately following the first of the new year are called after them. In works of art the youngest of them is represented as a Moor.

Magliabechi (mā-l'yā-bek'ē), Antonio. Born at Florence, Oct., 1633; died July 4, 1714. An Italian bibliophile. He was for many years librarian of Cosimo III., grand duke of Tuscany; and was famous for his vast and varied knowledge of languages and antiquities. He bequeathed to the grand duke a valuable collection of manuscripts and early editions, which now forms part of the Biblioteca Nazionale at Florence.

Magna Charta, or Magna Carta (mag'nā kār'tā). The great charter of the liberties (Magna Charta Libertatum) of England, granted and sealed by King John in a conference between him and his barons at Runnymede, June 15, 1215. Its most important articles are those which provide that no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or proceeded against, except by the lawful judgment of his peers or in accordance with the law of the land, and that no sentence or aid shall be imposed in the kingdom (except certain feudal dues from tenants of the crown), unless by the common council of the kingdom. The remaining and greater part of the charter is directed against abuses of the king's power as feudal superior. The charter granted by Henry III. is only a confirmation of that of his father, King John.

Magna Græcia (mag'nā grō'shīū). [L., 'great Greece.'] In ancient geography, the name given to the part of southern Italy colonized by Greeks. Among the leading cities were Cumæ, Crotona, Sybaris, Metapontum, Locri, Rhegium, Tarentum, Thurii, Hieraclea, and Neapolis. Its most flourishing period was the 7th and 6th centuries B. C.

Magnalia Christi Americana. [L., 'the mighty works of Christ in America.'] An ecclesiastical history of New England, by Cotton Mather, published in 1702 (new ed. 1853).

Magnan (mān-yōn'), Bernard Pierre. Born at Paris, Dec. 7, 1791; died at Paris, May 29, 1865. A French marshal. He repressed the insurrection in Lyons in 1849, and aided in the coup d'état of 1851.

Magnano (mān-yā'nō). A place in northern Italy, 26 miles west of Parma. Here, April 5, 1799, the Austrians under Kray defeated the French under Scherer.

Magentius (mag-nen'shius). Died 353 A. D. Roman emperor 350-353. He murdered Constantine and usurped the western provinces of the empire in 350, but was defeated by Constantius at Mursa in 351, and committed suicide to avoid capture in 353.

Magnesia (mag-nē'shīū). [Gr. Μαγνησία.] In ancient geography, the easternmost district of Thessaly, Greece, bordering on the Ægean Sea and the Pagusean Gulf. It is supposed that magnetic ore was first found here, and that from this the word magnet is derived.

Magnesia. 1. In ancient geography, a city in Ionia, Asia Minor, 14 miles southeast of Ephesus; often called Magnesia ad Mæandrum. The temple of Artemis Leucophryne, here, is one of the most magnificent of ancient monuments, rebuilt about 300 B. C. as an Ionic pseudodipteros of 8 by 15 columns, measuring 100 by 186 feet. The cella had pronaos and opisthodomos with 2 columns in antis. The frieze, now in the Louvre, bears reliefs of combats between Greeks and Amazons. The temple stood in a splendid peribolos surrounded by Doric porticoes. There are also remains of a theater of the 4th century B. C., with later modifications, and of a large stadium.

2. A city in Lydia, Asia Minor, situated on the Hermus 20 miles northeast of Smyrna; often called Magnesia ad Sipylum: the modern Manissa (which see). Here, 190 B. C., the Romans under Scipio Asiaticus defeated Antiochus the Great.

Magnetick Lady, The, or Humours Recon-ciled. A comedy by Ben Jonson. It was licensed and acted in 1632, but not published till 1640.

Magnificat (mag-nif'i-kat). [L. magnificat; as used in the Vulgate, Luke i. 46, "Magnificat anima mea Dominum."] The song or hymn of the Virgin Mary in Luke i. 46-55, beginning "My soul doth magnify the Lord." It is very similar to the song of Hannah (Sam. ii. 1-10), which has accordingly been called the Old Testament Magnificat. The Magnificat was in use in the hours or daily service of the Christian church as early as about 560 A. D. In the Greek Church it is called the Ode of the Theotocos. It was at first omitted from the American Prayer-book, but was restored in 1886.

Magnin (mān-yañ'), Charles. Born at Paris, Nov. 4, 1793; died at Paris, Oct. 8, 1872. A French dramatic critic. He wrote "Les origines du théâtre en Europe" (1838), "Histoire des Marionnettes" (1852), etc.

Magnus (mag'nus) I., surnamed "The Good." King of Norway 1035-47, and of Denmark 1042-1047, son of St. Olaf.

Magnus III., surnamed "Barfod" ('Bar-foot'). Died Aug. 24, 1103. King of Norway 1093-1103. He conquered the Orkneys and the Hebrides, and was killed before Dublin during an invasion of Ireland.

Magnus, Heinrich Gustav. Born at Berlin, May 2, 1802; died at Berlin, April 4, 1870. A noted German chemist and physicist, professor of physical technology at Berlin 1834-69. He published in Pogendorff's "Annalen," and the proceedings of the Berlin Academy of Sciences, a number of important papers on chemistry and physical topics.

Magnusen, or Magnussen (māg'nōs-sen), Finn. Born at Skalholt, Iceland, Aug. 27, 1781; died at Copenhagen, Dec. 24, 1847. A noted Icelandic archæologist, appointed professor at Copenhagen in 1815. He was the author of important works on the elder Edda, and on Norse mythology, literature, and antiquities.

Magnusson (māg'nōs-son), Arne or Arni. [L. Magnæus.] Born in Iceland, 1663; died at Copenhagen, Jan., 1730. A noted Icelandic historian and archæologist. He became secretary of the royal archives in 1697, and professor of history and Danish antiquities at the University of Copenhagen in 1713. He made a notable collection of Icelandic manuscripts.

Magny (mān-yē'), Olivier de. Born at Cahors; died about 1560. A French poet, author of "Les amours" (1553), "Les gayetés" (1554), "Les soupirs" (1557), and "Les odes" (1559).

Mago (mā'gō). A Carthaginian general of the 6th century B. C., the reputed organizer of the military system of Carthage.

Mago. A Carthaginian naval commander of the 4th century B. C., distinguished in the wars with the Syracusans 396-392, and later suffete or king of Carthage.

Mago. The commander of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily 343 B. C., the ally of Hieron in his struggle with Timoleon. His conduct of the campaign was marked by cowardice, and on his return to Carthage he committed suicide.

Mago. Died 203 B. C. (about 193 B. C.?). A Carthaginian general, younger brother of Hannibal. He accompanied his brother to Italy 218 B. C., supported Hasdrubal in Spain 215 B. C., and was defeated by Scipio at Silpia 206 B. C.

Magog. See the extract, and Gog.

For an explanation of Magog we must go to the prophet Ezekiel. He tells us (xxxviii. 2) that Magog was the land of Gog, "the chief prince" of Tubal and Meshech. Gog is the Gugu of the Assyrian inscriptions, the Gyges of the Greeks; and in Magog, therefore, we must see a title of Lydia. The name is evidently a compound of that of Gog; perhaps it represents the Assyrian Mat Gugi, or 'country of Gugu.' Sayce, Races of the O. T., p. 45.

Magoon (mā-gōn'), Elias Lyman. Born at Lebanon, N. H., Oct. 20, 1810; died at Philadelphia, Nov. 25, 1886. An American Baptist clergyman and writer. His works include "Orators of the American Revolution" (1848), "Republican Christianity" (1849), etc.

Magruder (mā-grō'dèr), John Bankhead. Born in Winchester County, Va., Aug. 15, 1810; died at Houston, Texas, Feb. 19, 1871. An American general in the Confederate service. He graduated at West Point in 1830; served in the Mexican war 1846-47; served as a major-general at the battle of Malvern Hill, July 1, 1862; and was appointed commander of the Department of Texas, Oct. 16, 1862. He afterward served under the emperor Maximilian of Mexico.

Maguana (mā-gwā'nā). A region or "province" in the southwestern part of the island of Haiti at the time of the conquest. Its principal caecique was Caonabo.

Maguelonne (mäg-lon'). A former seaport on the Mediterranean, about 10 miles south of Montpellier, France. It was built by the Phœceans, and destroyed by Charles Martel 737, and finally by Louis XIII. 1633. There is a ruined cathedral on the site.

After many voyages as officer and captain of Austrian and American ships, he went to Brazil (1844), and thence to the Congo and Angola (1847-48), settling in Bilhe. He visited the Muata Yamvo in 1850 and the Kuncene River in 1852; then entered the Portuguese service and founded a settlement at Lucia Bay. Only the first volume of his "Keiscn in Südafrika, 1849-57," has been published (1859).

Magyars (mō'dyörz). [Hung., from Turk. ma-jär.] The members of a race, of the Finno-Ugrian stock, which invaded Hungary about the end of the 9th century, and settled there, where it still forms the predominant element of the population. See Hungary.

Mahabaleshwar (ma-hä-bä-lesh-wür'). A health-resort in Bombay, British India, situated on the Western Ghats about lat. 17° 57' N., long. 73° 40' E.

Mahabharata (ma-hä-bhā'ra-tā). [Mahābhāratā-ākhyāna, great Bharata story; or, more briefly, Mahābhārata.] The name of one of the two great epics of ancient India, the other being the Ramayana. It contains over 100,000 distichs, divided into 18 parvas ('knots' or 'joins,' and then 'sections,' 'chapters'). It is about eight times as large as the Iliad and Odyssey together. The tales originally composing it were probably first circulated in prose, and put later into metrical form. They may have existed several centuries before our era, but there is no satisfactory evidence as to their date. Neither is there better as to their authors. They are ascribed to Vyasa, "the arranger," called also Krishna Dvaipayana; but as the same Vyasa is the reputed compiler of the Vedas, Puranas, and other works, no historical value can be attached to the detail. Scarcely a fourth of the poem is taken up by the main narrative. The rest consists of inserted episodes and diverse accretions, which are, aside from minor additions, either narratives of the ancient or mythical history of India, theogony and cosmogony, or didactic and dogmatic matter. To the first class belong the episodes of Nala and Shakuntala, to the third the Bhagavadgita. Thus through constant accretion the Mahabharata became a sort of encyclopedia of India, intended by the Brahmanic authors for the Kshatriya or military caste. Krishna Dvaipayana is said to have taught the poem to his pupil Vaishampayana, who recited it at a festival before King Janamejaya. The leading subject is the great war between the Kauravas and the Pandavas, who were descendants through Bharata from Puru, the ancestor of one branch of the lunar race. The following is a brief summary of the main story: The two brothers Dhritarashtra and Pandu were brought up in their royal home at Hastinapura, about 60 miles northeast of Delhi. Dhritarashtra, the elder, being blind, Pandu became king. Pandu had 5 sons — Yudhishtira, Bhima, and Arjuna by Kunti, and Nakula and Sahadeva by Madri. These are called the Pandavas, and are types of heroic excellence. Dhritarashtra had 100 sons, of whom the chief was Duryodhana. These are called the Kauravas, and are represented as altogether bad. After Pandu's death the Pandavas were brought up with the Kauravas by Dhritarashtra, who made his nephew Yudhishtira heir apparent. Yudhishtira's exploits having excited the ill will of the Kauravas, the Pandavas went to the King of Panchala, whose daughter Draupadi became their common wife. After this alliance, in order to reconcile the feud, Dhritarashtra divided his kingdom, giving Hastinapura to his sons, and to his nephews a district in the southwest, where they built Indraprastha, the modern Delhi. Here the Pandavas lived for a time happily under the rule of Yudhishtira. Once, however, Dhritarashtra held at his capital a great assembly to which came the Pandavas. In a game of dice with Duryodhana, Yudhishtira lost wealth, kingdom, brothers, and wife, when by a compromise the Pandavas agreed to give up their portion of the kingdom for 12 years and remain incognito for a thirteenth. They retired with Draupadi to the Kamayaka forest on the Sarasvati, and dwelt there 12 years. In the fourteenth year they demanded their possessions, but in vain; hence the great war, in which they overthrew the reigning house, slew Duryodhana, and got back their kingdom. In the present poem the story of the combat is extended through several books. When Yudhishtira is crowned in Hastinapura, Bhishma, leader of the Kauravas, though mortally wounded, instructs him on the duties of kings through 20,000 distichs and then dies. In the 17th book the Pandavas renounce the kingdom, and in the 18th, the last, they ascend to heaven with Draupadi. (For a fuller account, see Monier-Williams's "Indian Wisdom," xiii. xlv.) The complete text of the Mahabharata has been printed at Bombay and at Calcutta. An attempt at a complete translation into French by Fauche was interrupted by his death. This translation is in many respects untrustworthy. Several episodes have been often translated into various modern languages, notably the Nala and the Bhagavadgita (which see).

Mahabhashya (ma-hä-bhā'shya). [Skt., 'great commentary;'] contraetred from vyākharayamahābhāshya, great commentary on grammar.] In Sanskrit literature, Patanjali's commentary on the grammatical sutras of Panini, written some time between B. C. 140 and 60 A. D. It is not a full commentary on Panini, but with some exceptions a commentary on the Varttikas, or critical remarks of Katyayana on Panini. It is a paramount authority in all matters relating to classical Sanskrit grammar. There is a photolithographed edition by Goldstuecker and a translation of 40 pages by Ballantyne.

Mahadeva (ma-hä-dä'va). [Skt., 'the great god.'] 1. A name of Shiva. — 2. In the history of Buddhism, a schismatic teacher who is said to have lived 200 years after Buddha's death.

Mahadevi (ma-hä-dä've). [Skt., 'the great goddess.'] A name of Devi, the wife of Shiva. See Devi.

Mahan (ma-han'), Alfred Thayer. Born Sept. 27, 1840. An American sailor and writer on naval history. He became midshipman in 1859, lieutenant in 1861, lieutenant-commander in 1865, commander in 1872, and captain in 1885. He was made lecturer on history, strategics, and tactics in, and president of, the United States Naval War College. In 1894 he was in command of the Chicago. He has written several important works: "The Gulf and Inland Waters" (1883), "Influence of Sea Power upon History 1660-1783" (1890), "Influence of Sea Power upon the French Revolution and Empire 1793-1812" (1892), and a "Life of Admiral Farragut" (1894).

Mahan (ma-han'), Asa. Born at Vernon, N. Y., Nov. 9, 1800; died at Eastbourne, England, April 4, 1889. An American clergyman, educator, and author. He became president of Oberlin College in 1835, a position which he held until about 1850. He afterward held similar positions at Cleveland University and Adrian College, Michigan. Among his works are "System of Intellectual Philosophy" (1845), "Science of Logic" (1857), and "Critical History of Philosophy" (1883).

Mahan, Dennis Hart. Born at New York, April 2, 1802; died near Stony Point, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1871. An American military engineer. He was professor of engineering at West Point from 1832 until his death, holding also the office of dean after 1838. He committed suicide by drowning in a fit of insanity. Among his works are "Treatise on Field Fortifications" (1836), "Course of Civil Engineering" (1837), and "Military Engineering" (1865-67).

Mahan, Milo. Born at Suffolk, Va., May 24, 1819; died at Baltimore, Sept. 3, 1870. An American clergyman of the Protestant Episcopal Church, brother of D. H. Mahan. His chief work is a "History of the Church" (1860; new ed. 1872).

Mahanadi, or Mahanuddy (mä-hä-nud'i). A river in British India, which flows by a delta into the Bay of Bengal, about lat. 20° N. Length, over 500 miles. It has a large discharge.

Mahanaim (mä-hä-nä'im). [Heb., 'double camp.'] In Old Testament geography, a place in Palestine, east of the Jordan and north of the Jabbok. Its exact position is unknown. It was taken by Shishak.

Mahanataka (ma-hä-nä'ta-ka). [Skt., 'the great drama.'] In Sanskrit literature, a name of the Hanumannataka (which see).

Mahanoy City (mä-hä-noi' sit'i). A borough in Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, 109 miles northwest of Philadelphia: the center of a coal-mining region. Population (1890), 11,286.

Mahapralaya (ma-hä-prä'la-ya). [Skt., 'the great dissolution.'] In Hindu belief, the total destruction of all things at the end of a kalpa, when the seven Lokas and their inhabitants, saints, gods, and Brahma himself, are annihilated.

Mahapuranas (ma-hä-pö-rä'naz). [Skt., 'the great Puranas.'] The Vishnupurana and the Bhagavatapurana.

Maharajpore (mä-hä-rä-j-pör'). A village in Gwalior, India, 51 miles south of Agra. Here, Dec., 1843, the British under Gough defeated the Mahrattas.

Mahavansha (ma-hä-va'n'sha). [Skt., 'history of the great families' (of Ceylon).] The name of two Pali works on the history of Ceylon from the earliest times to the death of King Mahasena (302 A. D.). The older work, probably composed by monks at Anuradhapura in Ceylon, was read in public by command of King Dhatusena (469-477 A. D.). The younger work, a continuation of the elder, was composed by Mahanama, son of an aunt of Dhatusena. The Pali form of the name is Mahavanso, the above the Sanskrit. The first volume of a text and translation by Turnour appeared at Colombo, 1837.

Mahavira (ma-hä-vē'ra). [Skt., 'great hero.'] A name of Rama and other personages, but especially of the 24th or last Jina, or deified saint of the Jainas (which see). His legendary history is given in the Kalpasutra and the Mahaviracharita, sacred books of the Jainas. The points of contact between his legend and that of Buddha have led some to identify the two. According to Buhler, however, Mahavira was a distinct personage whose real name was Nirgrantha Jnatiputra, "the ascetic of the Jnatis," a Rajput tribe. According to Williams, most scholars are now of opinion that Mahavira was a contemporary of Gautama Buddha, and that the Jainas were an independent skeptical sect a little antecedent to the Buddhists and their rivals. Williams's "Judaism," p. 529; Barth's "Religions of India," p. 148 ff.

Mahaviracharita (ma-hä-vē-ri-cha'ri-ta). [Skt., 'the exploits of the great hero' (Rama).] 1. A Sanskrit drama by Bhavabhuti, translated by Wilson and Piekford. — 2. [In this sense usually written -charitra.] The exploits of Mahavira (the Arhat), a work in Jaina Prakrit held in great estimation by the Jainas. See Mahavira.

Mahayana (ma-hä-yä'na). See Great Vehicle.

Mahdi (mä'dē). [Also sometimes Mehdee; lit. 'the guided or directed one.'] According to Mohammedan belief, a spiritual and temporal ruler destined to appear on earth during the last days. Some sects hold that the Mahdi has appeared, and in concealment awaits the time of his manifestation. There have been a number of pretended Mahdis, of whom the latest of importance was the chief whose armed followers resisted the advance of the British troops into the Sudan in 1884-85, and overthrew the Egyptian power in that region, which they continued to hold. The belief apparently grew out of the Jewish belief in the coming of the Messiah.

It is from the descendants of Alee that the more devout Moslems expect the Mehdee, who is to reappear on earth, in company with the Prophet Elias, on the second coming of Christ. J. P. Brown, The Dervishes, p. 74.

Mahdi, or 'the well-guided,' is the name given by the Shi'ites to that member of the family of 'Ali who, according to their belief, is one day to gain possession of the whole world, and set up the reign of righteousness in it. Encyc. Brit., XVI. 570.

Mahé (mä-hä'). The chief island of the Seychelles group, Indian Ocean.

Mahé. A seaport and small settlement belonging to France, situated on the Malabar coast of India, in lat. 11° 42' N., long. 75° 32' E. Population (1888), 8,349.

Mahé (B. F. Mahé de Labourdonnais). See Labourdonnais.

Mahican (mä-hik'an). [Native name; 'wolf' according to some, or 'seaside people' according to others.] A tribe or a loose confederacy of North American Indians. When first known they occupied both banks of the upper Hudson river, extending north nearly to Lake Champlain, west to Catskill Creek, and east into Massachusetts. Their council-fire was first at Schodac, on an island near Albany; but, owing to the pressure of the Mohawks, many of them migrated to the Susquehanna River and near Wyoming valley, Pennsylvania, in the vicinity of the Delaware and Munses, with whom they afterward removed to Ohio and lost their identity. In 1736 those in the Housatonic valley were collected at Stockbridge and called by that name. The French included them with other tribes under the name Loups. Their two principal divisions known to the English were the Mahican, or Mohican, on the upper Hudson and Housatonic rivers, and Mohegan (which see), or Monhegan, on the lower Connecticut River, both of which were often called River Indians and confounded, though historically distinct. See Algonquian.

Mahidpore, or Mahedpore. See Mahadpur.

Mahi Kantha (mä'hē kán'thä). A collection of native states in India, under the protection of Great Britain, intersected by lat. 24° N., long. 73° E. Area, 9,300 square miles. Population (1881), 517,485.

Mahmud (mä-möd') I. [A form of Mohammed.] Born 1696; died 1754. Sultan of Turkey 1730-54, son of Mustapha II., and nephew of Ahmed III. whom he succeeded. He compelled Austria to cede Belgrad in 1739.

Mahmud II. Born July 20, 1785; died July 1, 1839. Sultan of Turkey 1808-39, brother of Mustapha IV. whom he succeeded. He carried on an unsuccessful war against Russia 1809-12. In 1821 the Greeks began a war of independence, and after the defeat of his fleet by the allied fleets of France, England, and Russia at Navarino (1827), and the capture of Adrianople by the Russians (1829), he was compelled in 1829 to sign the peace of Adrianople, which secured the independence of Greece. He massacred a large number of the janizaries in 1826 and reorganized the army, and at his death was engaged in a war with Mehemet Ali, viceroy of Egypt.

Mahmud of Ghazni, surnamed "The Great." Born about 971; died at Ghazni, Afghanistan, 1030. Sultan of Ghazni 997-1030, son of Subuktigin. He professed Islam, and made twelve great expeditions against the infidels of India, besides carrying on important wars in central Asia. He extended his victories from the Tigris to the Ganges, and from the Indian Ocean to the Oxus.

Mahone (ma-hōn'), William. Born in Southampton County, Va., Dec. 1, 1826; died at Washington, D. C., Oct. 8, 1895. An American politician. He served in the Confederate army during the Civil War, obtaining the rank of major-general; became afterward the leader of the Readjuster party in Virginia; and was United States senator from Virginia 1881-87.

Mahony (mäh'o-ni), Francis. Born at Cork, Ireland, about 1804; died at Paris, May 18, 1866. An Irish journalist and poet, known by the pseudonym of "Father Prout." He was educated for the priesthood in Paris and Rome, and was ordained, but about 1834 gave up his calling and began to write on the staff of "Fraser's Magazine." The articles which he contributed were published as "Reliques of Father Prout" in 1836; a final volume was published in 1876 by Blanchard Jerrold. He contributed to "Bentley's Magazine" and wrote the "Daily News" from Rome for some years. These letters were published as "Facts and Figures from Italy," by Don Jeremy Savonarola, Benedictine Monk, in 1847. He retired to a monastery in 1864, and died there.

Mahrattas, or Marhattas (ma-rat'iz). A race of Hindus, inhabiting western and central India, who in the 17th and 18th centuries conquered and ruled many states, of which they formed a confederation, but which are now largely under British rule. They are Brahmans in religion, but differ physically from other Hindus, and have a distinct Hindu dialect, the Marhatti (Marathi). Their power was at its height about 1750. They were defeated by Ahmed Shah at Panipat in 1761. The war in which they were engaged with the British in 1775-82 was undecided; in that of 1803 Wellesley (Wellington) gained the victories of Assaye and Argaum, and Lake those of Aligarh and Laswari; and in that of 1816-18 the Mahrattas were again decisively beaten. They number about 12,000,000.

Mähren (mä'ren). The German name of Moravia.

Mahu. A fiend alluded to in Shakspeare's "King Lear."

Maia (mä'yä). [Gr. Maia.] 1. In Greek mythology, the eldest of the Pleiades, mother by Zeus of Hermes.—2. In Roman mythology, the Bona Dea.—3. The star 20 Pleiadum, which is surrounded with an adorning nebulosity that was discovered by photography.

Maida (mä'dä). A place in Calabria, Italy, 13 miles west of Catanzaro. Here, July 4, 1806, the British defeated the French under Reynier.

Maiden. See Maidu.

Maiden, The. A name given to a sort of guilotine which the regent Morton introduced into Scotland. He was himself beheaded by it in 1581.

Maidenhead (mä'du-hed). A town in Berkshire, England, situated on the Thames 28 miles west of London. Population (1891), 10,607.

Maiden Lane. 1. A street in London, between Covent Garden and the Strand. Andrew Marvell, Turner the landscape-painter, and Voltaire lived here at different times. The name is said to have been given from an image of the Virgin which once stood there.

2. A street in New York, running from Broadway, opposite Cortlandt street, southeast to the East River.

Maiden Queen, The. Queen Elizabeth of England.

Maid in the Mill, The. A comedy by Fletcher and Rowley, produced in 1623. "The plot is taken partly from Gongalo de Cespedes's 'Gerardo' and partly from a novel of Bandello." (Bulletin.) A droll, called "The Surprise," was made from this play, and is in "The Wits."

Maid Marian. Robin Hood's sweetheart in the old ballads. She was the daughter of an earl, and loved Robin Hood when he was earl of Huntingdon. When he was banished to the "merry greenwood," she dressed herself as a page and followed him, living with his company as a virgin huntress till the marriage rites could be performed. This is the most popular of the legends concerning her.

Maid of Artois, The. An opera by Balfe, produced in 1836. It contains the song "The Light of Other Days."

Maid of Athens. The daughter of Theodore Maeri, a consul at Athens. She made Byron's acquaintance, and he is said to have addressed to her the song beginning "Maid of Athens, ere we part."

Maid of Bath, The. A comedy by Foote, produced in 1771. The play holds up to ridicule (as Mr. Flint) Mr. Walter Long, who behaved shamefully to the Maid of Bath, the Miss Linley who afterward married Richard Brinsley Sheridan.

Maid of Honor, The. 1. A play by Massinger, printed in 1632. Kemble altered and produced it in 1785, with Mrs. Siddons in the east.—2. An opera by Balfe, produced in 1847. The subject is the same as that of Plotow's "Martha."

Maid of Mariendorp, The. A play in verse by James Sheridan Knowles, produced in 1838.

Maid of Norway, The. A surname of Margaret, queen of Scotland 1285-90.

Maimatchin (mä-mä-chén'). A trading town in Mongolia, on the Siberian frontier opposite Kiakhta.

Maimbourg (mäi-bör'), Louis. Born at Naney, France, 1610; died at Paris, Aug. 13, 1686. A French Jesuit church historian.

Maimene (mä-mä'ne), or Maimana (mä-mä'nä). 1. A district in northern Afghanistan, about lat. 36° N., long. 64° 40' E.—2. The chief town of the district of Maimene.

Maimonides (mä-mon'i-dez) (Moses ben Maimun, also called Maimuni or, after the initials of his name (Rabbi Moses ben Maimun), Rambam; in Arabic, Abu Amram Musa ben Maimun Obaid Allah). Born at Cordova, Spain, in 1135; died in 1204. The most celebrated Jewish scholar, philosopher, and writer of the middle ages. In him the scientific development of Judaism in Spain reached its climax. He brought order and system into the chaotic masses of Talmudic literature, pointed out the aims and directions of religio-philosophical studies, and brought as far as this can be done—Judaism and philosophy into harmony. His family had to fly before the persecutions of the Almohades to Fez, where for many years they were obliged to conceal their religion. Here Moses became, by association with Mohammedan scholars, thoroughly acquainted with the Aristotelian philosophy. In 1165 the family emigrated from Fez by way of Palestine to Egypt, and settled in Fostat (old Cairo), where the father of Maimun died. Moses first supported the family by trading in jewels. He next devoted himself to medicine, and subsequently became physician to Saladin's successor. At the same time he was chief rabbi of Cairo. Of his writings may be mentioned a short scientific treatise on the Jewish calendar, and another on the terms used in logic ("Miloth hitgagyon"), written before his twenty-third year. In 1168 he produced his first great work, a commentary on the Mishnah, written in Arabic. His greatest and most comprehensive work, on which he labored for ten years (1170-80), is the "Repetition of the Law" ("Mishneh Torah"), also called the "Strong Iland" ("Yad Haazakah"), written in Hebrew. It is a masterly, systematic exposition in 14 books of the whole of the Jewish law as contained in the Pentateuch and the vast Talmudic literature. It was preceded by a small Arabic introduction, "Book of the Commandments" ("Sefer ha-Mivvot"), containing a treatise on the 613 precepts of the law. His philosophical work par excellence is the "Guide of the Perplexed" ("Dalat al-Hairin"); Hebrew "More Nebuchim"; written in Arabic. It is divided into three parts. The first treats of the anthropomorphic expressions found in the Bible, and of the religio-philosophical sects; the second of eternity and the creation of the world; the third contains a rational explanation of the commandments of Scripture. Of his lesser writings may be mentioned "An Epistle on Apostasy" ("Iggereth ha-Shemad"), in which he contends that Islam is not as bad as paganism, and that the feigned accommodation to it was not absolutely culpable; "An Epistle to Yemen" ("Iggereth Teman"), an exhortation to the Jews in South Arabia not to be led astray by false Messiahs; "A Treatise of Moses" ("Pirke Mosheh") on medical subjects; "A Treatise on Happiness" ("Perakim be-Haqlachah"); and "A Treatise on the Unity of God" ("Ma'amar ha-Yibud"). He was also the first to condense the dogmatical tenets of Judaism into 13 articles of faith, which found a place in the Jewish liturgy. His writings caused bitter disputes. He was condemned by many as a heretic, and his works were burned. But at last he was recognized as "the light of the West" (ner ha-ma'arbi) and "the great eagle" (ha-nefer ha-gadol), and the saying was applied to him that "from Moses (the lawgiver) unto Moses (Maimonides) there has been none like unto Moses."

Main (män; G. pron. mün), F. Mein (män). The most important of the right-hand tributaries of the Rhine: the ancient Moenus. It is formed by the union of the White Main and Red Main near Kulmbach, Bavaria, and joins the Rhine opposite Mainz. It is navigable to its junction with the Regnitz. The chief towns on its banks are Schweinfurt, Würzburg, Aschaffenburg, Offenbach, and Frankfurt. Length, about 300 miles.

Main, Spanish. See Spanish Main.

Maina (mä'nä). A rugged peninsula in the southern part of the Peloponnesus, Greece, east of the Gulf of Koron.

Mainas. See Maynas.

Mainau (mä'nou). A small island in the Überlingersee of the Lake of Constance, the property of the Grand Duke of Baden. It had formerly a commandery of the Teutonic Order.

Maine (män). [F., perhaps from the second element of the Old Celtic name (L. Cenomanni).] A former government in northern France: the country of the ancient Cenomanni. Chief city, Le Mans. Including Perche, it was bounded by Normandy on the north, Orléans on the east, Touraine and Anjou on the south, and Brittany on the west, corresponding generally to the departments of Mayenne and Sarthe. It was a countyship in the middle ages; was conquered by William of Normandy in 1063; was united to Anjou 1110, and with Anjou became united to England in 1154; was conquered by Philip Augustus of France about 1204; and after several separations was reunited to France in 1481.

Maine. A river in the department of Maine-et-Loire, France. It is formed by the union of the Mayenne and Sarthe, and joins the Loire near Angers. Length, about 7 miles.

Maine. [In the charter granted by Charles I. in 1639 named "The Province or Countie of Mayne," because regarded as a part of "the Mayne Lande of New England."] The north-eastermost State of the United States of America, and one of the New England States. Capital, Augusta; chief city, Portland. It is bounded by the province of Quebec on the north, New Brunswick on the east, the Atlantic on the southeast and south, and New Hampshire and Quebec on the west, extending from lat. 43° 4' to 47° 28' N., and from long. 66° 57' to 71° 7' W. The surface is hilly, and in the northwest and north mountainous, the highest summit being Mount Katahdin. The chief lake is Moosehead Lake; the chief rivers, the Saco, Androscoggin, Kennebec, Penobscot, and St. John. The coast-line is deeply indented. The State contains many places of summer resort. The leading occupations are agriculture, fishing, lumbering, ship-building, and commerce. Among the chief products are lumber, ice, building-stone, and cotton goods. It is the second State in the Union in fisheries. It has 16 counties, sends 2 senators and 4 representatives to Congress, and has 6 electoral votes. It was early visited by the Cabots, Verrazano, Gosnold, Pring, and other explorers. Attempts at colonization were made by the French under Du Monts in 1604, and by the English in 1607. The first permanent settlement dates from about 1623. Maine was merged in the "province of Massachusetts Bay" in 1691, and became a separate State in 1820. A boundary dispute with Great Britain was settled in 1842. The "Maine liquor law" was passed in 1851. There was a dispute for the governorship between the Republicans and the "Fusionists" (Democrats and Greenbackers) 1872-80. Area, 33,040 square miles. Population (1890), 661,084.

Maine, Sir Henry James Sumner. Born Aug. 15, 1822; died at Cannes, Feb. 3, 1888. A distinguished English jurist. He studied at Cambridge, where, in 1847, he became regius professor of civil law, a position which he held until 1854. He was called to the bar in 1850; became reader on Roman law and jurisprudence at the Inns of Court, London, in 1852; was legal member of council in India 1862-69; was Corpus professor of jurisprudence at Oxford 1869-78; and in 1887 became Whewell professor of international law at Cambridge. Among his works are "Ancient Law" (1861), "Village Communities" (1871), "Early History of Institutions" (1875), "Dissertations on Early Law and Custom" (1883), "Popular Government" (1885), and "International Law" (1888).

Maine de Biran (mān dō bō-roñ') (Marie François Pierre Gonthier de Biran). Born Nov. 29, 1766; died at Paris, July 16, 1824. A French royalist politician and noted philosophical writer. He was one of the administrators of the department of Dordogne in 1795, and a member of the Council of Five Hundred in 1797. His works were edited by Cousin 1834-1841, and in 1859 were published his "Œuvres inédites," edited by F. Naville and, after his death, by E. Naville.

Maine-et-Loire (mān'ā-lwār'). A department of western France. Capital, Angers. It is bounded by Mayenne and Sarthe on the north, Indre-et-Loire on the east, Vienne, Deux-Sèvres, and Vendée on the south, and Loire-Inférieure on the west, and is formed chiefly from the ancient Anjou. The surface is hilly. The department, which is traversed by the Loire, is rich in agricultural produce and has flourishing manufactures. Area, 2,748 square miles. Population (1891), 518,589.

The capital of the district of Mainpuri, situated in lat. 27° 14' N., long. 79° 3' E. Population, about 20,000.

Maintenon (mānt-nōn'). A small town in the department of Eure-et-Loir, France, situated on the Eure 37 miles west-southwest of Paris. It was a place of some importance in the time of Louis XIV. and Louis XV.

Maintenon, Françoise d'Aubigné, Marquise de. Born in a prison at Niort, France, Nov. 27, 1635; died at St.-Cyr, near Versailles, April 15, 1719. The second wife of Louis XIV. She was the granddaughter of Agrippa d'Aubigné, and the daughter of Constant d'Aubigné who was imprisoned as a malcontent. On the death of her mother she found herself in abject poverty, and was married in 1651 to the kindhearted wit and poet Scarron, who offered either to pay for her entrance to a convent or to make her his wife. She lived nine years with him, and their saloon was frequented by the intellectual society of the time. In 1660 he died, and left her again in poverty. Her pension was discontinued in 1666 at the death of Anne of Austria, who had augmented it, and it was not till 1669 that Madame de Montespan gave her the charge of her son by Louis XIV. She was given a large income and a house at Vaugirard in which to bring up this child and another, born later, in secrecy. She was devoted to them, and established an ascendancy over the heart of the king, who advanced her to various positions in the court. In 1673 she purchased the estate of Maintenon, and in 1678 the king made it a marquise. In 1685, two years after the death of the queen, Madame Maintenon married Louis privately. Her influence was almost unbounded in matters both of church and state, and she was a patroness of letters and the fine arts. Her somewhat questionable position induced her to behave with rigid propriety, and her reputation for orthodoxy was extreme. She founded a home for the daughters of poor gentlemen at St.-Cyr, and on the death of the king she retired there for the rest of her life.

Mainz (mānts), F. Mayence (mā-yōns'), E. sometimes Mentz (ments). The capital of the province of Rhine-Hesse, Hesse, situated on the left bank of the Rhine, opposite the mouth of the Main, in lat. 50° N., long. 8° 16' E.: the Roman Mogontiacum or Magontiacum. It is an important strategic point, and one of the strongest fortresses in Germany; has extensive commerce by the river and by railway, especially in wine; and has important manufactures, particularly of leather and furniture. The cathedral, one of the most interesting monuments of the Rhenish Romanesque, was founded in 975 on a different site. It has been repeatedly ruined by fire, and was finally restored much in its existing form after the fire of 1811. It is a large cruciform church, with pseudo-transpts at the west end also. Both east and west ends are flanked by towers, and larger polygonal arcaded towers surmount both crossings. The eastern apse, with its rich arched beneath the roof and its curious gables, is highly picturesque. The main entrance is on the north side. The interior has been adorned with mural paintings designed by Veit; it contains a remarkable number of monumental tombs of all ages. There are many statues of emperors and electors, and some fine glass. The cathedral is 366 feet long and 150 wide; the vaulting is 89 high. The cloister is of the early 15th century. Other objects of interest are the electoral palace (with library, picture-gallery, and collections), statue of Gutenberg (a native of Mainz), Church of St. Stephen, and citadel. Mainz was a Celtic town and was the site of a Roman camp, and capital of Germania Superior. It was ruled by the archbishops (electors) of Mainz, except for a period of about 200 years, terminating in 1462, during which time it was a prominent member of the League of Rhenish Towns. It was called "the Golden Mainz." Formerly it had a university. It was conquered by the Swedes in 1631, and by the French in 1644 and 1688; was occupied by the French in 1792, retaken after a siege in 1793, ceded to France in 1801, and assigned to Hesse-Darmstadt in 1816. Population (1890), 72,059.

Mainz, Electorate of. One of the three ecclesiastical electorates of the Holy Roman Empire. The archbishopric of Mainz appears in the time of Boniface (about 750) as the most important in the eastern Frankish dominions. It was recognized as one of the seven electorates in 1556. In 1801 its possessions left of the Rhine were ceded to France. In 1803 Erfurt, Eichsfeld, and the Thuringian possessions were ceded to Prussia. Other possessions passed in 1803 to Hesse-Cassel, Hesse-Darmstadt, Nassau, etc. The confessor Dalberg received Ratisbon, Aschaffenburg, and Wetzlar, and the archiepiscopal dignity passed to Ratisbon. The elector renounced his possessions in 1813. In 1814-15 the recent territories of Mainz fell to Hesse-Darmstadt, Bavaria, Nassau, etc.

Maipo, or Maipu (mā'pō); often, but incorrectly, written and pronounced Maipú (mā-pō'). A river of Chile, crossing the province of Santiago about 7 miles south of Santiago City. It gave its name to a battle fought on a plain by its northern bank, April 5, 1818, in which 5,000 patriots under San Martín defeated 5,500 Spaniards under Osorio. The patriots lost 1,000 in killed and wounded, and 1,000 Spaniards were killed. Osorio escaped, but all his principal officers and 2,200 men surrendered. This victory retrieved the defeat of Cacha Rayada, and practically secured the independence of Chile.

Maipures. See Maipures.

Mairet (mā-rā'), Jean. Born at Besançon in 1604; died there in 1686. A French dramatist. He has been called "the French Marston." In 1631 (1629?) his most noted play, "Sophonisbe," was produced. Among his other plays are "Sylvie," "Virginie," "Roland Furieux," "Sidonie," "sylvainre," "Athénais," "Marc Antoine, ou la Cléopâtre," etc.

Maisson (mā-zōn'), Marquis Nicolas Joseph de. Born at Epinay, near Paris, Dec. 19, 1771; died at Paris, Feb. 13, 1840. A French marshal. He served in the Napoleonic campaigns, and commanded the expedition to the Morea 1828-29.

Maison Carrée (mā-zōn' kār-ā'). [F., 'square house.'] An ancient building at Nîmes, France, perhaps the most perfect of surviving Roman temples. It is assigned to the 2d century. It is a Corinthian hexastyle pseudoperipteros, with 11 columns on the flanks, on a raised basement with steps in front, and measures 40 by 76 feet, and 40 feet high. "It is constructed with the optical refinement of the curved horizontal lines hitherto considered peculiar to the Parthenon and other Greek temples of the 6th and 6th centuries B. C." (W. H. Goodyear, Amer. Jour. of Archaeol., X. 1).

Maison Dorée, La (lā mā-zōn' dō-rā'). [F., 'the gilded house.'] A noted restaurant in Paris, situated on the Boulevard des Italiens. It was built by Lemaire in 1839.

Maisonneuve (mā-zō-név'), Jules Germain François. Born at Nantes, France, 1810. A French surgeon, author of many surgical works.

Maisonneuve, Sieur de (Paul de Chomedey). Died at Paris, Sept. 9, 1676. Governor of Montreal 1642-64. He was a native of Champagne, entered the French army in his youth, and was the leader of a band of colonists who arrived at Quebec in 1641 and settled at Montreal in 1642. He remained governor of the colony at Montreal until 1664, when he was removed from office, and returned to France.

Maistre (māstr'), Joseph Marie, Comte de. Born at Chambéry, Savoy, April 1, 1754; died at Turin, Feb. 26, 1821. A French statesman, writer, and philosopher. Joseph de Maistre was one of the greatest writers in the French language since the days of Voltaire and Rousseau. His family was of French origin, but this particular branch had settled in Savoy as early as the 17th century, and had sworn allegiance to the King of Sardinia. The eldest of ten children, he prepared to follow his father's calling and become a magistrate. On completing his classical studies under the Jesuits, he left home and took up the study of law in Turin. In 1788 he became senator of Savoy, but at no time was he in sympathy with the judiciary duties of his office. He emigrated at the time of the French Revolution, and spent several years in Switzerland and northern Italy. After residing some time in Sardinia in a diplomatic capacity, he finally went to St. Petersburg as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the King of Sardinia (1802-17); this is by far the most brilliant period in his political and literary life. One of his earlier publications that had made his name known throughout Europe was the "Considérations sur la révolution française" (1796). During the period of his residence at the Russian capital he kept up a voluminous correspondence. He wrote a "Essai sur le principe général de justice divine" (1815), "Du pape" (1819), "De l'église gallicane" (1821), "Soirées de Saint-Petersbourg" (1821), and "Examen de la philosophie de Bacon" (1823). On the ex-minister's return to Turin, the King of Sardinia bestowed numerous honors upon him. Joseph de Maistre's letters were edited many years after his death, and afford a valuable insight into the privacy of his thought and life. Two separate publications exist: "Lettres et opuscules inédits du Comte Joseph de Maistre" (1851) and "Mémoires politiques et correspondance diplomatique de Joseph de Maistre" (1858).

Maistre, Comte Xavier de. Born at Chambéry, Savoy, Oct., 1764; died at St. Petersburg, June 12, 1852. A Savoyard soldier and author, brother of Joseph de Maistre. He served in youth in the army of Piedmont, and after the occupation of Piedmont by the French in 1798, took part in the Austrian and Russian campaign in Italy (1799). In the same year he went to Russia, where he rose to the rank of major-general. He wrote "Voyage autour de ma chambre" ("Journey round my Room," 1794, in the style of Sterne; written while under arrest for taking part in a duel), "Le lépreux de la cité d'Aoste" (1812), "La jeune Sibérienne" (1815), "Prisonniers du Caucase" (1815), "Expédition nocturne autour de ma chambre" (1825).

The chief merit of these works [of de Maistre], as of the less mannered and more direct "Prisonniers du Caucase" and "Jeune Sibérienne," resides in their dainty style, in their singular narrative power (Sainte-Beuve says justly enough that the "Prisonniers du Caucase" has been equaled by no other writer except Mérimée), and in the remarkable charm of the personality of the author, which escapes at every moment from the work.

Saintsbury, French Novelists, p. 144.

Maita Capac. See Mayta Capac.

Maitland (mā'tland). A town in New South Wales, Australia, situated on Hunter River 83 miles north by east of Sydney. Population (1891), including East and West Maitland, 10,214.

Maitland, Sir Frederick Lewis. Born at Rankelour, Fife, Sept. 7, 1777; died off Bombay, Nov. 30, 1839. A British rear-admiral. He was stationed off Rochefort in command of the Bellerophon after the battle of Waterloo, under instructions to intercept Napoleon, who opened negotiations with him July 10, 1815, for permission to sail for the United States. He refused his consent in the absence of instructions from the government, but offered to carry Napoleon to England. Napoleon embarked in the Bellerophon July 15, and Aug. 7 was transferred to the Northumberland off Berry Head. Maitland was promoted rear-admiral in 1830, and was appointed commander-in-chief in the East Indies and China in 1837. He wrote "Narrative of the Surrender of Buonaparte and of his Residence on board H. M. S. Bellerophon," etc. (1826).

Maitland, John, Lord Maitland of Thirlestane. Born about 1545; died at Thirlestane, Oct. 3, 1595. A Scottish politician. He became lord privy seal of Scotland in 1567, and spiritual lord of session in 1568; supported the cause of Mary Queen of Scots against the Presbyterian party; in 1567 was made chancellor by James VI. (afterward James I. of England); and was raised to the peerage as Lord Maitland of Thirlestane in 1590. By his advice James consented to the act establishing the church on a strictly Presbyterian basis.

Maitland, John, second Earl and first Duke of Lauderdale. Born at Lethington, May 24, 1616; died at Tunbridge Wells, Aug. 20 (24?), 1682. A Scottish politician, son of John Maitland, first Earl of Lauderdale. He became one of the commissioners for the Solemn League and Covenant in 1643, and a member of the joint committee of the two kingdoms in 1644; afterward joined Prince Charles in his exile; and on the Restoration became the chief adviser of Charles II. in Scottish affairs, a position which he held to establish the absolutism of the crown both in the church and in the state. He was created duke of Lauderdale in 1672.

Maitland, Samuel Roffey. Born at London, Jan. 7, 1792; died at Gloucester, Jan. 19, 1866. An English clergyman, and theological and historical writer. He was librarian to the Archbishop of Canterbury 1838-48. Among his works are "The Dark Ages" (1843) and "The Reformation in England" (1849).

Maitland, Thomas. The nom de plume of Robert Buchanan.

Maitland, William, of Lethington. Born about 1528; died at Leith, June 9, 1573. A Scottish politician. He studied at the University of St. Andrews and on the Continent, and afterward became secretary to Mary Queen of Scots, whose cause he supported against the Scottish reformers. He was captured at the surrender of Edinburgh Castle to the English May 29, 1573, and died in prison.

Maittaire (mā-tār'), Michel. Born in France, 1668; died at London, Sept. 18, 1747. A French bibliographer and classical editor. He was a teacher in Westminster School 1695-1747. His chief work is "Annales typographici" (1719-41).

Maiwand (mā-wānd'). A locality west of Kandahar, Afghanistan. Here, July 27, 1880, the Afghans (9,000) under Ayub Khan defeated the British (2,470) under Burrows. The British loss was 964 killed and 167 wounded. This has also been called the battle of Kushk-i-Nakhd.

Majano (mā-yā'nō), Benedetto da. Born at Majano, 1442; died May 24, 1497. A Florentine sculptor and architect. He began as a worker in wood mosaic. Early in life he went to Hungary in the service of King Corvinus. After his return he designed the Strozzi palace, the corner-stone of which was laid in 1459. In 1491 he made the monument to Filippo Strozzi in Santa Maria Novella. He went to Faenza to sculpture the monumental altar of Sao Savino for the Duomo 1471-72. On his return to Florence he made the marble pulpit of Santa Croce.

It is bounded by Seville on the northwest, Córdoba on the north, Granada on the east, the Mediterranean on the south, and Cadiz on the west. It is traversed by mountain-ranges. The chief products are grapes, sugar, and tropical fruits. The area is 2,824 square miles. Population (1887), 519,977.

2. A seaport and the capital of the province of Malaga, situated on the Mediterranean in lat. 36° 43' N., long. 4° 25' W.: the ancient Malaea. It is the chief seaport of Spain after Barcelona, exporting grapes, raisins, wine, olive-oil, oranges, lemons, figs, lead, etc. The cathedral, begun in 1538, but not completed until 1719, is very large (the vaulting being 130 feet high), but is built in a heavy bastard Corinthian architecture, with tawdry decoration. The carved wooden Renaissance choir-stalls, however, are superb, the 68 large figures of saints with their emblems being especially noteworthy. Malaga was probably founded by the Phenicians; was taken by the Moors about 711; was besieged and taken by Ferdinand the Catholic in 1487; and was taken by the French in 1810. It figured conspicuously in the troubles of 1868 and 1873. Population (1887), 134,016.

Malavikagnimitra (mä-lä-vi-käg-ni'mi-tra). [Skt., 'Malavika and Agnimitra.'] A Sanskrit drama, very probably by Kalidasa. It treats of the loves of King Agnimitra and Malavika, a girl in the train of his queen Dhariini. There is an epitome by Wilson in his "Hindu Theatre." For the plot, see also Williams's "Indian Wisdom," p. 478. Translation by Tawney.

Malay (mä-lä') Archipelago, Eastern Archipelago, or Indian Archipelago. An extensive group of islands lying south and southeast of Asia. It includes, among others, Sumatra, Java, Borneo, Celebes, Bali, Lombok, Sumbawa, Flores, Sandalwood Island, Timor, and the Moluccas. The Philippines are often included, and sometimes Papua, the Andaman Islands, and the Nicobar Islands. The inhabitants are chiefly of Malay or Papuan race. With the exception of the northern face of Borneo, almost the entire region is under Dutch domination. The eastern half of Timor is a Portuguese government. See the respective names.

Malay Peninsula, or Malacca (mä-lak'ä). A peninsula at the southern extremity of Asia, connected with the rest of Further India by the Isthmus of Kra, and terminating in Cape Romanina. It lies between the Gulf of Siam and the China Sea on the east and the Bay of Bengal and the Strait of Malacca on the west; is traversed by a mountain-range; and is divided politically into Siamese possessions, British possessions (Straits Settlements), and Malay states (Perak, Johor, etc., in alliance with Great Britain). The chief races are Malays, Siamese, Chinese, and Negritos. Area, estimated, 70,000 square miles. Population, estimated, 650,000.

Malay-Polynesian (mä-lä'pol-i-në'sian). A family of languages occupying most of the islands of the Pacific, from Madagascar to Easter Island (not, however, Australia and Tasmania, nor the central parts of Borneo and New Guinea, and of some other of the large islands), together with the Malay Peninsula. Its principal branches are the Malayan, of the peninsula and the islands nearest it, and the Polynesian, of the great mass of scattered islands (including Madagascar and New Zealand); to these is added by many the Melanesian, of the Fiji Archipelago and its vicinity, which others regard as a separate family. The languages are of extreme simplicity in regard both to phonetic and to grammatical structure.

Malays (mä-läz'). [E. Malay, F. Malais, G. Malaje, Russ. Malaï, etc., Malay Orang Malayu, Malay man.] The natives of Malacca or the Malay Peninsula, or of the adjacent islands.

Malbrough (mä-l-brök'), or Malbrook (mal-brük'). A celebrated French song, commencing "Malbrough s'en va-t-en guerre." The authors of words and music are not certainly known, but it probably dates from about 1769. Marie Antoinette took a fancy to it in 1781, and it became popular throughout France, after which Beaumarchais introduced it in "Le mariage de Figaro" in 1784, and Beethoven repeated it in his "Battle Symphony" (1813), as the symbol of the French army. The air is that to which "We won't go home till morning" is sung. Grove.

Malchin (mä-l-chën'). A town in Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Germany, situated on the Peene 57 miles east by north of Schwerin. Population (1890), 7,298.

Malcolm (mal'kom or mä'kom) I. [ME. Malcolm, Malcolyn, AS. Malcolm; Gael. Calum.] Died in 954. King of Scotland 943-954. He annexed Moray to the Scottish kingdom in 943.

Malcolm II. Mackenneth. Died Nov. 25, 1034. King of Scotland 1005-34. He gained the throne by defeating and killing Kenneth III. at Monzievaird, Perthshire, in 1005; was repulsed with great slaughter by Uchtred, son of Waltheof, earldom of Northumbria, in an attack on Durham in 1006; and married his daughter to Sigurd, jarl of Orkney, in 1008. During his reign Lothian and Cumbria north of the Solway were annexed to Scotland.

Malcolm III., called Canmore. Died Nov. 13, 1093. King of Scotland 1054-93, son of Duncan I. He ascended the throne on the defeat of the usurper Macbeth by Earl Siward of Northumbria July 27, 1054, which was followed by his own victory at Lumphanan in Aberdeenshire, where Macbeth was slain. He was crowned at Scone April 25, 1057, and in 1058 married Margaret as his second wife, through whose influence the Roman ritual was introduced into Scotland. In 1070 he supported the cause of his brother-in-law, Edgar Atheling, but was obliged to do homage to William the Conqueror at Abernethy in 1072. He was defeated and slain by Morrel of Bamborough near the Ane, at a place which afterward received the name of Malcolm's Cross. Shakspeare introduces him in "Macbeth."

Malcolm IV., surnamed "The Maiden." Born in 1141; died at Jedburgh, Dec. 9, 1163. King of Scotland 1153-65, son of Henry, and grandson of David I. whom he succeeded. He was compelled to surrender to Henry II. of England at Chester in 1157 the fiefs granted to his grandfather by Matilda, mother of Henry II., in return for the assistance of the Scots against Stephen, and in 1159 served as an English baron in the expedition against Toulouse.

Malcolm, Howard. Born at Philadelphia, Jan. 19, 1799; died at Philadelphia, March 25, 1879. An American Baptist clergyman and writer. Among his works are a "Dictionary of the Bible" (1828), "Travels in South-eastern Asia" (1839), etc.

He received a commission in the East India Company's service in 1781; was governor of Bombay 1827-30; and was Tory member of Parliament for Luncannon 1831-32. He wrote a "Political History of India" (1811), a "History of Persia" (1815), etc.

Malcontent, The. A play by Marston, acted in 1601, printed in 1604. Another edition, augmented by Webster, appeared the same year.

Then came Marston's completest work in drama, "The Malcontent," an anticipation, after Elizabethan fashion, of "Le Misanthrope" and "The Plain Dealer." Though not free from Marston's two chief vices of coarseness and exaggerated cynicism, it is a play of great merit, and much the best thing he has done, though the reconciliation, at the end, of such a husband and such a wife as Piero and Aurelia, between whom there is a chasm of adultery and murder, again lacks verisimilitude.

Sainsbury, Hist. of Elizabethan Lit., p. 198.

Malczewski (mäl-chev'skō), or Malczeski (mäl-ches'kē), Antoni. Born about 1792; died at Warsaw, May 2, 1826. A Polish poet. His chief work is a narrative poem, "Marja" (1825).

Malesherbes (mäl-zärb'), Chrétien Guillaume de Lamoignon de. Born at Paris, Dec. 6, 1721; guillotined at Paris, April 22, 1794. A noted French statesman, president of the "cour des aides" (1750) and director of the press. He was minister under Louis XVI. and his counsel (1792-93) before the Convention. He was arrested (Dec., 1793) and condemned to death by the Revolutionary tribunal on a charge of treason.

Malespin (mä-läs-pēn'), Francisco. Born about 1800; died at San Fernando, Salvador, 1846. A Central American soldier and politician. He was commandant-general of Salvador in 1841, and on Sept. 20 of that year headed the revolution which deposed Cañas and put the aristocratic party in power. Thereafter he was the leading spirit in Salvador, and became president Feb. 5, 1844. He had two wars with Guatemala in 1844, and at the end of that year, in alliance with Honduras, invaded Nicaragua, taking Leon after a terrible siege (Jan. 24, 1845), and committing many atrocities. In his absence he was deposed (Feb. 2, 1845), and, attempting to recover his place, was captured and shot.

Malespina (mä-läs-pē'nä), Alejandro. Born about 1750; died at Cadiz about 1810. A Spanish navigator who, from 1789 to 1794, commanded a surveying expedition on the western coast of South and North America. He penetrated to lat. 60° N. in search of a passage from the Pacific to the Atlantic, and subsequently returned to Spain by way of the East Indies.

Malet (mä-lä'), Claude François de. Born at Dôle, France, June 28, 1754; executed at Paris, Oct. 29, 1812. A French general, head of an unsuccessful conspiracy against Napoleon in Oct., 1812. He was of noble family, an ardent republican, and entered the army at the age of sixteen.

Malet, Lucas. The pseudonym of Mrs. William Harrison, the youngest daughter of Charles Kingsley.

Malevole. The name assumed by Giovanni Altopronto, formerly duke of Genoa, a character in Marston's play "The Malcontent," to which he gives its name.

Malherbe (mäl-är'b'), François de. Born at Caen in 1555; died at Paris, Oct. 16, 1628. A celebrated French poet. His studies, begun in his native city, were continued at Paris, and completed at Basel and Heidelberg. He was married in 1581, and spent much of his time in southern France. One of his first compositions, "Les larmes de Saint-Pierre," was published at Paris in 1587. Before the close of the century he had written his ode to Duperrier entitled "Consolation sur la mort de sa fille," and had addressed odes to Henry IV. and Marie de Médicis. His ambition to become court poet was realized about 1605. He was presented to the king, and remained in residence at court till the death of Henry IV. in 1610, and was then further retained during the minority of Louis XIII. The best modern edition of his works is that of Ludovic Lalanne and Ad. Regnier for the "Collection des grands écrivains de la France" (Paris, 5 vols. 1862-69). Malherbe's claims to recognition lie in the nicety of his vocabulary, the purity of his expression, and the perfection of his verse. Boileau, in his "Art poétique," hailed him in the oft-quoted words: "Enfin Malherbe vint." "Contemporaneous writers, however, surnamed Malherbe 'le tyran des mots et des syllabes' ('the tyrant of words and syllables')."

Mali. See Mandingo.

Malia (mä'lē-ä), Cape. A promontory at the southeastern extremity of Laconia, Greece; the ancient Malea.

Malibran (mä-lē-brōn'), Madame (Maria Felicitá Garcia), later Madame de Bériot. Born at Paris, March 24, 1808; died at Manchester, England, Sept. 23, 1836. A celebrated operatic singer, daughter and pupil of Manuel Garcia. Her voice was a contralto. In 1824 she appeared in public for the first time at a musical club. Her operatic debut was on June 7, 1825, in London, where she took the place of Pasta who was ill. She made a great sensation, and was at once engaged for the rest of the season. Shortly after this she went to New York with her father. In the midst of a successful season there he married her to Mr. Malibran, who soon became bankrupt. In 1827 she left him and returned to France. She sang with increasing success in Paris, London, and other cities till the time of her death. In 1836 she married the violinist De Bériot, with whom she had lived from 1830.

Malone, Edmund. Born at Dublin, Oct. 4, 1741; died at London, April 25, 1812. An Irish literary critic and Shaksperian scholar. He graduated at Trinity College, Dublin, and in 1763 went to London and became a law student in the Inner Temple. Returning to Ireland, he was called to the Irish bar in 1767. Not long after this his father's death left him in possession of a small estate and sufficient money to live upon. He therefore returned to London to devote himself to literature. He soon entered the best political and literary society, and counted among his friends Johnson, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Bishop Percy, Burke, Canning, Horace Walpole, and others. His edition of Shakspeare was published in 1790, but he had previously written an "Attempt to ascertain the order in which the plays of Shakspeare were written" (1778), a supplement to Johnson's edition of Shakspeare (1780), containing observations on the Elizabethan stage and the text of 5 plays wrongly ascribed to Shakspeare, etc. He published an edition of Sir Joshua Reynolds's works in 1797, and an edition of Dryden, 4 volumes of which appeared in 1800. Besides writing a number of minor works, he found time to devote himself to book-collecting, and accumulated a large library. After his death the greater part of it was sent to Oxford. He left material for another edition of Shakspeare, which was published by James Boswell the younger in 1821, and is known as the "third variorum Shakspeare," sometimes as "Boswell's Malone."

Manco Capac or Ccapac (män'kö kä-päk'). The traditional first father of the Incas of Peru, and founder of the Inca monarchy. According to the legend, he was the child of the sun, and was sent with his sister and wife, Mama Ocello Huaco, to civilize the Indians. One of the stories represents him as advancing northward from Lake Titicaca, with a golden wand, which sank into the ground at the place where, warned by this sign, he founded the city of Cuzco. Another fable makes him one of four brothers who issued from a cave in the valley of the Vilcamayu. It is believed that Manco Capac was a real personage, probably the chief of a small tribe in the Vilcamayu valley, whence by force or policy he reached Cuzco (though he did not found it), and, acquiring the leadership there, laid the foundations of the Inca empire.

Manco (män'kö): called Manco Inca, Inca Manco, Manco Inca Yupanqui, and, incorrectly, Manco Capac or Ccapac II. Born about 1500; died 1544. Son of the Inca Huaina Ccapac of Peru, and brother of Huascar. After the death of Atahualpa and Huascar he was recognized by Pizarro (Nov., 1533) as the rightful sovereign of Peru, and was crowned at Cuzco; but he had no real power, and was virtually a prisoner. In April, 1536, he escaped, raised an army, and besieged Cuzco and other Spanish strongholds. Finally defeated in 1537, he retired to the mountains of Vilcabamba, whence he kept up a predatory warfare. He was killed by some fugitive followers of the younger Almagro who had taken refuge with him.

Mandæans (man-dë'anz). [From NL. Mandæus, from Mandæan Mandä, knowledge, gnosis.] A very ancient religious body, still found, though its members are few, in the southern part of Babylonia. The religion of the Mandæans is a kind of Gnosticism retaining many Jewish and Parsee elements. They worship as divine beings a number of personifications, especially of the attributes or names of God. Also called Mandaites, Nasoreans, and Sabians, and, by a misunderstanding, Christians of St. John.

In 1714 he published his "Inquiry into the Origin of Moral Virtue," with notes, under the title "The Fable of the Bees, or Private Vices Public Benefits," which was pronounced a nuisance by the grand jury of Middlesex in 1723. His other works are "Treatise of Hypochondriacal and Hysterical Passions" (1711), "Free Thoughts on Religion" (1720), "A Modern Defense of Public Necessity" (1740).

Mandeville, Sir John. The reputed writer of a 14th-century book of travels. The author calls himself Jehan de Mandeville, or John Maundeville, knight of St. Aubin or St. Alban, England, and says that, starting on Michaelmas day, 1322 (or 1332), he visited Turkey, Armenia, Tatar, Persia, Syria, Arabia, Egypt, Libya, Ethiopia, Chaldea, Amozonia, and India. The book is, however, a compilation intended as a guide to pilgrims to the Holy Land, based upon William of Boldensele (1330) and Friar Odoric of Pordenone (1330). The original was in French, and the oldest manuscript is in that language, dated 1731. The English version was made in the early part of the 15th century by an unknown hand. The manuscripts are numerous.

Mandeville, William de. Died at Rouen, Nov. 14, 1189. Third Earl of Essex and Earl or Count of Aumale. In 1177 he went on a crusade with Philip, count of Flanders. In 1189 he accompanied Henry II. in his flight from Le Mans.

Mandingo (män-dëng'gö), or Mandenga (män-dëng'gä). An important negro nation of West Africa. The principal tribes and dialects are the Soninke, Malinke, and Bambara; the smaller tribes, Kabunga, Toronka, and Jalnaka. The suffix -ngu or -nka signifies "people." The Mandingos, though negroes, are less dark than the Wolofs, and are good metal-workers, agriculturists, traders, and herdsmen. They are mostly Mohammedan. In the middle ages Mali, on the Niger, was the capital of a great negro kingdom which finally succumbed to the attacks of the Mossi, the Twarick, and the Sonrhai (1500).

Mandla, or Mundlah (mund'lä). A district in the Central Provinces, British India, intersected by lat. 22° 45' N., long. 81° E. Area, 4,719 square miles. Population (1881), 301,760.

Mandogarth. A ruined city in India, southwest of Indore. It was the capital of the old kingdom of Malwa.

Mandricardo (man-dri-kär'dö). The son of Agricola in Boiardo's and Ariosto's "Orlando." He laid siege to Albracca for the love of Angelica, and was slain by Orlando. He is noted for his pride and emuldy.

Mandubii (man-dü'bi-i). In ancient geography, a people living in central France, north of the Edui. Their chief town was Alesia.

Manduria (män-dö'ri-i). A town in the province of Lecce, southeastern Italy, situated 25 miles southwest of Brindisi. Population (1881), 8,865.

Manes (mä'nëz). See Mani.

Manet (mä-nä'), Édouard. Born at Paris in 1833; died there, April 30, 1883. A French genre-painter, pupil of Couture. He was the founder and head of the Impressionist school, and had great influence in his time, though his merit has been much disputed.

Manetho (man'e-thö). An Egyptian historian and priest. He was a native of Sebennytus, in Lower Egypt, and lived about 250 B. C. He wrote a history of Egypt in Greek, fragments only of which are extant.

Egyptian by birth and priest by profession, Manetho, besides being instructed in all the mysteries of his religion, must have also been conversant with foreign literature, for he was a Greek scholar, and equal to the task of writing a complete history of his own country in that language. Mariette, Outlines, p. 3.

Manfred (man'fred). Born about 1231; killed at the battle of Benevento, Italy, Feb. 26, 1266. King of Sicily, an illegitimate son of the emperor Frederick II. He was prince of Tarentum and regent till the accession of Conrad IV. in 1252; became regent for Conrad in 1254; was crowned king in 1258; and was defeated and slain at Benevento by Charles of Anjou.

Manfred. The Prince of Otranto, the principal character in Walpole's "Castle of Otranto."

Manfred. A dramatic poem by Lord Byron, published in 1817. It was so called from the name of its hero, Manfred, who in Byron's own words is "a kind of magician who suffers from a half-unexplained remorse." He lives in a castle among the Alps, and is substantially alone throughout the piece. Schumann wrote music for this drama and adapted it for the stage himself: it was first produced by Liszt in Weimar in 1852. It was put on the stage as a play in England in 1863, Mr. Phelps playing Manfred.

Manfredonia (män-fre-dō'nē-ä). A seaport in the province of Foggia, Italy, situated in lat. 41° 38' N., long. 15° 55' E. It is near the site of the ancient Sipontum, whose inhabitants were transferred to Manfredonia by Manfred about 1261. Population (1881), 8,324.

Manfredonia, Gulf of. An indentation of the eastern coast of Italy, east of Manfredonia.

Mangalia (män-gä-lē-ä). A small seaport in the Dobrudja, Rumania, situated on the Black Sea 27 miles south of Kustendji. Population (1889-1890), 7,888.

Mangalore (mang-gä-lōr'), or Mangalur (mang-gä-lōr'). A seaport, the capital of South Kanara district, Madras, British India, situated in lat. 12° 52' N., long. 74° 51' E. It was taken by Tipu Saib in 1784. In 1799 it became British. Population (1881), 32,099.

Mangalore, Treaty of. A peace concluded 1784 between the British and Tipu Saib, on the basis of a mutual restitution of conquests.

Mangan (mang'gan), James. Born at Dublin, May 1, 1803; died in Meath Hospital, June 20, 1849. An Irish poet. His chief works are "Romances and Ballads of Ireland" (1850), "German Anthology" (1849), "Poets and Poetry of Munster" (1849).

Mangbuttu (mäng-bōt'tō). See Mombuttu.

Mangi (mäng'gē), or Mangu (mäng'gō). A country of Asia, described by Marco Polo. It is supposed to be the same as southern China.

Mangoni (män-gō'nē). See Zulu.

Mangues (män'gās), or Chorotegans (chō-rō-tā'gāns). A tribe of Indians which, at the time of the conquest, occupied the vicinity of Lake Managua in Nicaragua. They formed numerous populous villages. The Mangues are believed to have been an offshoot of the Chiapanecs (which see).

Mangu (mäng'gum), Willie Person. Born in Orange County, N. C., 1792; died at Red Mountain, N. C., Sept. 14, 1861. An American Whig politician. He was United States senator from North Carolina 1831-36 and 1840-53.

Manhattan Island (man-hat'an ī'land). An island at the mouth of the Hudson, lying between that river on the west, Spnyten Duyvil Creek and Harlem River on the north, East River on the east, and New York Bay on the south. It forms the principal part of the city of New York. Length, 14 miles. Greatest width, 2½ miles. Area, about 22 square miles.

Manheim. See Mannheim.

Mani (mä-nē'). A ruined city of Yucatan, Mexico, about 45 miles south of Merida. According to Indian accounts it was settled by the Mayas, under the Totul Xiu chiefs, after the abandonment of Mayapan. The last chief submitted to the Spaniards in 1541.

Mani (mä'nē), or Manes (mä'nez), or Manichæus (man-i-kē'us). The founder of Manichæism. The only source of information about him that is comparatively credible is the Mohammedan tradition. He was born 215-216 A. D., and received a careful education from his father, Futak, at Ctesiphon. Futak connected himself later with the sect of the Mughlasilah, or 'Iaptists,' in southern Babylonia, which had absorbed Christian elements, and thus made his son acquainted with different forms of religion. Only at the age of 25 or 30 did Mani begin to proclaim his new religion, and this he did at the court of Sapor I. He undertook long journeys into Transoxiana, western China, and southward as far as India, and sent forth disciples in the interest of his faith. Returning to the Persian capital in the last years of Sapor I. (about 270), he gained adherents even at court, but was at last imprisoned and put to flight through the hostility of the Magians on whom the king was dependent. Sapor's successor Hormuz seems to have been more favorable, but Bahram I. abandoned Mani to the Magians and had him crucified in the year 276-277 A. D. Mani composed a number of works and epistles, which were known to the Mohammedan historians, but are now lost. The Fihrist reckons seven principal works—six in Syriac and one in Persian. The name of the Persian work is not given in the extant form of the Fihrist, but it is conjectured that it may have been the Artang (pron. ert-ang'), or 'Holy Gospel,' of which mention is made in the "Acta Archelai" and elsewhere among Western writers. These "Acta," extant in a Latin translation from a Greek original of which some extracts are preserved in Epiphanius, purport to describe a dispute between Archelaus, bishop of Carchar in Mesopotamia, and Manes. They are a chief source of the Western tradition as to Manes, but, besides being of entirely uncertain authorship and date, bear upon their face marks indicating that they are only a polemic treatise put on literary grounds in the form of an alleged debate. They have the authority of a historical novel, not that of a history.

Mania (mä'nī-ä). An old Italian goddess of the dead (Manes), mother of the Lares by Mercury. She was a daughter of the river-god Almo, and was originally named Lara. Jupiter deprived her of her tongue for betraying his secret amours.

Manica (mä-nē'kü). See Nika, Monomotapa, and Mashonaland.

Manichæans, or Manichæans (man-i-kē'anz). The followers of Mani. See Mani. Manichæism was the old Babylonian religion of nature, modified by Christian and Persian elements, elevated into a gnosis, and subjecting human life to stringent regulation. According to Mani, a realm of light and a realm of darkness have always been opposed to each other. In the visible world both are mingled. The object of the world is to free the light from the intermingled darkness. Christ was sent for this end, but the apostles misrepresented his doctrine. This Mani was sent to restore. The object of Manichæan ethics was to purify the elements of light and attain freedom from those of darkness; hence the three seals—those of the mouth, the hand, and the bosom. The first forbids unclean food, such as the flesh of animals and wine; the second, any traffic in things involving the elements of darkness; the third, every gratification of sexual desire, even marriage being forbidden. There was a rigorous system of fasts, Sunday being regularly and Monday generally so observed. The Manichæan prayed 4 times a day, preceding each prayer by ablution, and turning toward the sun, the moon, or the north as the seat of light. The prayers were addressed to the God of light, to the whole kingdom of light, to the angels, and to Mani. The rigidity of the system was mitigated by distinguishing between the elect or perfect (perfect Manichæans) and the catechumens or auditors (the secular Manichæans). For the latter the stringency of the requirements was somewhat relaxed. The church had in all five gradations: (1) the teachers Mani and his successors; (2) the administrators, bishops; (3) the elders, presbyters; (4) the elect; and (5) the auditors. The worship was simple, and consisted of prayers, hymns, and ceremonies of adoration. Manichæism first gained a firm footing in Persia, Mesopotamia, and Transoxiana. The seat of its pope was for centuries at Babylou, and then at Samarkand. It penetrated the Roman Empire in the reign of Probus (about 280 A. D.), and spread rapidly after 330, finding its most numerous adherents in North Africa, Augustine being an auditor for nine years. Leo the Great first took energetic state measures against it. Valentinian III. punished the Manichæans with banishment, Justinian with death. Vandal persecution destroyed them in North Africa. Traces of Manichæism are, however, found in the history of the Catholic Church until the 13th century. The latest important work on the subject is Kessler's "Untersuchung zur Genesis des manichæischen Religionssystems" (1876).

Manihiki (mä-nē-hē'kē) Islands. A group of small islands in the central Pacific, between the Marquesas and Union Islands.

Manila (mä-nē'lä), sometimes written Manilla (ma-nil'ä). The capital of the Philippine Islands and of Luzon, situated in Luzon, on Manila Bay, in lat. 14° 36' N., long. 120° 58' E. It comprises the city proper, Binondo, and various suburbs, and is the chief seat of Spanish commerce in the Pacific. Hemp, cigars, coffee, sugar, etc., are exported; the leading manufacture is cigars. It contains a cathedral and a university. Manila was founded by the Spaniards in 1571; was taken by the English in 1762; and has often been devastated by earthquakes. Population (1887), 154,000.

Manilian Law (ma-nil'i-an lä). In Roman history, a law proposed by Caius Manilius in 66 B. C., granting to Pompey extraordinary powers in the East, including the command of the Mithridate war. It was supported by Cicero in his oration "Pro lege Manilia" ("For the Manilian Law").

Manilius (ma-nil'i-us), Caius. Lived in the first half of the 1st century B. C. A Roman tribune (66 B. C.), proposer of the Manilian Law.

Manin (mä-nēn'), Daniele. Born at Venice, May 13, 1804; died at Paris, Sept. 22, 1857. An Italian patriot. He was the leader of the revolution which broke out against Austria at Venice in 1848, and in the same year was chosen president of the republic of St. Mark proclaimed by the insurgents. The city was, however, compelled to surrender to the Austrians in 1849 after a heroic resistance, and he spent the rest of his life in exile at Paris.

Manipur, or Mannipur (man-i-pör'). A native state in India, intersected by lat. 24° 40' N., long. 94° E., under British influence. Capital, Manipur. A serious rising against the British occurred here in 1891. Population (1881), 221,070.

Manissa (mä-nis'ä), or Manisa (mä-nēs'ä). A city in the vilayet of Aidin, Asia Minor, Turkey, situated on the Hermus (Sarabat) 20 miles northeast of Smyrna; the ancient Magnesia ad Sipylum. (See Magnesia.) It has manufactures of cotton, etc. Population, estimated, 40,000-50,000.

Manistee (man-is-tē'). A river in Michigan, flowing into Lake Michigan at Manistee. Length, about 130 miles.

Manistee. A city and the capital of Manistee

County, Michigan, situated on Lake Michigan, at the mouth of the Manistee River, in lat. 44° 14' N. It is noted for its manufacture and export of lumber; it has the largest shingle manufactures in the world. Population (1890), 12,812.

Manitenerys (mä-nē-tā-nā-rēs'). A tribe of Brazilian Indians, living in a wild state on the river Purús. They have been variously referred to the Pano, Carib, and Maypure stocks.

Manito (man'i-tō), or Manitou (-tō). [Algonkin.] Among certain of the American Indians, a spirit or other object of religious awe or reverence, whether a good or evil spirit or a fetish. Two manitos or spirits are spoken of by preeminence, the one the spirit of good, the other the spirit of evil.

The Père Paul le Jeune remarks, "The savages give the name of Manitou to whatever in nature, good or evil, is superior to man. Therefore, when we speak of God, they sometimes call him 'The Good Manitou,' that is, 'The Good Spirit.' The same Père Paul le Jeune says that by Manitou his flock meant un ange ou quelque nature puissante. Il y'en a de bons et de mauvais. Lang, Mythe, etc., II. 45.

Manitoba (man-i-tō'bij or man'i-tō-bij'). A province of Canada. It is bounded by Assiniboia on the west, Saskatchewan on the northwest, Keewatin on the north, the Northwest Territory and Ontario on the east, and the United States on the south. The surface is generally level. The province is noted for its wheat. It is governed by a lieutenant-governor and a legislative assembly. The inhabitants are of British origin, with many French Canadians and Russian Mennonites. Manitoba was a part of the Hudson Bay Company's territory. It was settled in 1812, its early name being the Red River Settlement. It entered the Dominion in 1870. The Riel insurrection occurred in 1869-70. In 1885 the Canadian Pacific Railroad was finished. Capital, Winnipeg. Area, 64,066 square miles. Population (1891), 152,506.

Manitoba, Lake. A lake in Manitoba, southwest of Lake Winnipeg. It discharges into Lake Winnipeg. Length, over 100 miles.

Manley (man'li). Mrs. (Mary de la Rivière). Born in the isle of Jersey, or Guernsey, about 1672; died at Lambeth Hill, July 11, 1724. A British novelist, dramatist, and political pamphleteer, daughter of Sir Roger Manley, and bigamous wife of John Manley of Truro. On May 26, 1709, she published "Secret Memoirs and Manners of Several Persons of Quality of both Sexes, from the New Atlantis," usually known as "The New Atlantis," devoted entirely to intrigue and scandal. She was arrested for libel Oct. 29, 1709, and discharged Feb. 13, 1710. She also published "The Power of Love, in Seven Novels" (1720), "Memoirs of Europe, etc." (1710), etc. She died at the house of Barber, a printer, with whom she had lived for some years.

Manlius Capitolinus (man'li-us kap'i-tō-lī-nus), Marcus. Died 384 B. C. The deliverer of the Capitol at Rome from the Gauls. He was a patrician by birth, and was consul in 392. According to tradition, he was aroused by the cackling of geese one night when the Gauls, who were besieging the Capitol under Brennus in 390, attempted to surprise the fortress, and, collecting a handful of men, repelled the attack. To this circumstance the origin of his surname Capitolinus is commonly ascribed, although it was also borne by his father and had already acquired the force of a family name in his gens. In 385 he began to champion the cause of the plebeians against the patricians, with a view to making himself tyrant of Rome, and in the following year was arrested by the dictator Camillus. He was tried in the Patulian grove, instead of on the Campus Martius, which commanded a view of the Capitol, and was sentenced to be thrown from the Tarpeian rock.

Manlius Imperiosus Torquatus (im-pē-ri-ō-sus tōr-kwātus), Titus. A Roman hero. He was a son of the dictator L. Manlius Capitolinus Imperiosus; was elected military tribune in 362 B. C.; and in 361 served under the dictator T. Quintius Pennus against the Gauls. During this campaign he slew a gigantic Gaul in single combat in the presence of the two armies, and despoiled him of a chain (torques), which he placed around his own neck (whence the surname Torquatus). He was appointed dictator in 353, and again in 349, and was consul in 347, 344, and 340. During his third consulship, while engaged with his colleague, P. Decius Mus, in a campaign against the Latins, he put to death his own son, who, contrary to orders, fought and killed in single combat an enemy from the opposing army.

Manlius Torquatus, Titus. Died 202 B. C. A Roman general. He was consul in 235 and 234, and dictator in 208. During his first consulship he conquered the Sardinians, after whose subjugation the Romans enjoyed a brief period of universal peace, the temple of Janus being closed for the first time since Numa Pompilius. He opposed the ransom of the prisoners taken by Hannibal at Cannæ in 216, and gained a decisive victory over the Carthaginians in Sardinia in 215.

Manlius Vulso (vul'sō), Cnæus. A Roman consul 189 B. C. He defeated the Galatians in Asia Minor.

Manly (man'li). 1. In Jonson's "Devil is an Ass," a young gallant, the friend of Wittipol.—2. The "plain dealer" in Wycherley's play of that name. He is a brutalized caricature of Molière's Alceste.—3. In Vanbrugh and Cibber's "Provoked Husband," a man of worldly good sense.

Mann (man), Sir Horace. Born 1701; died at Florence, Italy, Nov. 6, 1786. An English diplomatist and virtuoso. In 1740 he became envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the court of Florence, and retained that post until his death. Manners (man'erz), Charles, fourth Duke of Rutland. Born March 15, 1754; died at Dublin, Oct. 24, 1787. An English statesman, eldest son of John Manners, marquis of Granby. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge (M. A. 1774), and became member of Parliament for the University of Cambridge in 1774. In 1775 he protested against the taxation of the American colonies. He succeeded his grandfather as duke of Rutland May 29, 1779, and on Feb. 11, 1784, was appointed lord lieutenant of Ireland. He advocated the legislative union of Ireland with England.

Manners, John, Marquis of Granby. Born Aug. 2, 1721; died at Scarborough, Oct. 18, 1770. An English general, eldest son of John, third duke of Rutland. He was educated at Eton and Cambridge. In 1741 he became member of Parliament for Grantham; in 1745 he was made colonel of the "Leicester Blues"; in 1755 major-general; in 1759 lieutenant-general, serving at Minden (Aug. 1, 1759); and commander-in-chief of the British contingent in Germany Aug. 14, 1759. He fought with great bravery at Warburg (July 31, 1760), at Villinghausen (July 15, 1761), at Gravenstein (June 24, 1762), and at Homburg (Aug. 6, 1762). His portrait was twice painted by Reynolds.

Manners, John James Robert, seventh Duke of Rutland, better known as Lord John Manners. Born Dec. 13, 1818. An English Conservative politician, second son of the fifth Duke of Rutland. He was commissioner of works 1852, 1853-59, and 1866-68, postmaster-general 1874-80 and 1885-86, and chancellor of the duchy of Lancaster 1886-92. He succeeded his brother in the dukedom March 2, 1887. He was one of the leaders of the "Young England" movement. He published "England's Trust, and Other Poems" (1841), "Notes of a Cruise in Scotch Waters" (1850), etc.

Manners-Sutton (man'erz-sut'on), Charles. Born Feb. 14, 1755; died at Lambeth, July 21, 1828. Archbishop of Canterbury, fourth son of Lord George Manners-Sutton, and grandson of John, third duke of Rutland. He was educated at the Charterhouse and at Cambridge; was rector of Averbham-with-Kelham in Nottinghamshire in 1785; was bishop of Norwich in 1791; and was archbishop of Canterbury in 1805.

Mannheim (män'him). The northern administrative district of Baden.

Mannheim, or Manheim. A city of Baden, situated at the junction of the Neckar with the Rhine, in lat. 49° 29' N., long. 8° 28' E. It is very regularly built; is the chief commercial center of the upper Rhine; has trade in grain, tobacco, coffee, petroleum, etc.; and has manufactures of cigars, machinery, mirrors, etc. The river, harbor, and docks are extensive. The chief building is the grand-ducal castle (with antiquarian collections and picture-gallery). There is a noted theater. Mannheim was founded in 1606; was destroyed in the Thirty Years' War, and by the French in 1688; became the capital of the Palatinate in 1720; was bombarded and taken by the French in 1794; and was ceded to Baden in 1803. Population (1890), 79,058.

Manning (man'ing), Daniel. Born at Albany, N. Y., Aug., 1831; died at Albany, Dec. 24, 1887.

An American Democratic politician, secretary of the treasury 1885-87.

Manning, Henry Edward. Born at Totteridge, Hertfordshire, July 15, 1808; died at Westminster, Jan. 14, 1892. An English cardinal. He was the youngest son of William Manning, a West India merchant. He entered Harrow in 1822, and Balliol College, Oxford, in 1827, where Charles Wordsworth was his tutor, and William E. Gladstone an associate. He was made a fellow of Merton, Oxford, in 1832, and was ordained rector of Woollington-cum-Graffham in 1833. He was married Nov. 7, 1833, and his wife died July 24, 1837. In 1840 he was created archdeacon of Chichester. He took no part in the secession of Ward and Newman, but continued a leader of the High-church party until 1848. In May, 1848, he visited Rome, and on his return found himself in opposition to the established church. In April, 1850, he resigned his archdeaconry, and on June 14, 1851, was ordained a priest of the Roman Catholic Church. In 1854 he was made D. D. by the Pope, and installed as superior of the "Congregation of the Oblates of St. Charles" at Bayswater (March 31, 1857). On April 30, 1865, he succeeded Cardinal Wiseman as archbishop of Westminster, and was created cardinal March 31, 1875. He was the author of "Unity of the Church" (1842), "Temporal Mission of the Holy Ghost" (1865), "Temporal Power of the Pope" (1866), "England and Christendom" (1867), etc.

Manning, James. Born at Elizabethtown, N. J., Oct. 22, 1738; died at Providence, R. I., July, 1791. An American Baptist clergyman, first president of Brown University (Providence) 1765-90.

Manning, or Mannyn, Robert, or Robert of Brunne. Lived in the latter part of the 13th and the commencement of the 14th century. An English chronicler and poet. He was a native of Brunne in Lincolnshire, and in 1283 joined the Gilbertine canons at Sempringham. He wrote "Handlyng Synne" (1303), a translation of the "Manuel des Pechiez" of William of Waddington, who wrote in the time of Edward I.; "The Chronicle of England" (finished in 1338); and "Meditacions of the Soper of our Lorde Ihesus, etc." He was in no sense a historian, as his work was not original; and his importance is entirely literary. Dict. Nat. Biog.

Manny (man'i), or Mauny, Sir Walter, afterward Lord de Manny. Died at London, Jan. 15, 1372. The founder of the Charterhouse, London. He was a native of Manny, near Valenciennes, Hainaut, and a fellow-townsmen of Froissart. He probably came to England with Queen Philippa in 1327, and was knighted in 1331. He was one of the ablest of the soldiers of Edward III. In 1371 he was licensed to found a house of Carthusian monks to be called "La Salutation Mère Dieu." This Charterhouse became the London Charterhouse (which see).

Man of the World, The. 1. A novel by Mackenzie, published in 1773.—2. A comedy by Macklin, first played in 1781.

Manon Lescaut (mä-nôn' les-kō'). A romance written by the Abbé Prévost, published in 1733, appended to "Memoirs of a Man of Quality."

But he [Prévost] would have been long forgotten had it not been for an episode or postscript of the "Mémoires" entitled "Manon Lescaut," in which all competent criticism recognizes the first masterpiece of French literature which can properly be called a novel. Manon is a young girl with whom the Chevalier des Grieux, almost as young as herself, falls frantically in love. The pair fly to Paris, and the novel is occupied with the description of Manon's faithlessness—a faithlessness based not on want of love for Des Grieux, but on an overmastering desire for luxury and comfort with which he cannot always supply her. The story, which is narrated by Des Grieux, and which has a most pathetic ending, is chiefly remarkable for the perfect simplicity and absolute lifelikeness of the character-drawing. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 420.

Manosque (mä-nōsk'). A town in the department of Basses-Alpes, France, 40 miles north-northeast of Marseilles. Population (1891), 6,572.

Manresa (män-rä'sä). A manufacturing town in the province of Barcelona, Spain, situated on the Cardener 32 miles northwest of Barcelona. Population (1887), 22,685.

Man's Bewitched, The, or The Devil to Do about Her. A comedy by Mrs. Centlivre, produced in 1709.

Mans (mon'), Le. The capital of the department of Sarthe, France, situated on the Sartho in lat. 48° 1' N., long. 0° 11' E.: the ancient Vindinum or Suindinum. It has a trade in poultry and manufactures of linen, sail-cloth, etc. The cathedral has a massive round-arched 12th-century nave, and a very fine, light 13th-century choir, 5-aisled, having 12 radiating chapels, beautiful tracery, and a world-famous display of medieval glass. The Church of Notre Dame de la Couture, the ancient abbey buildings (containing the prefecture, museum, and library), and the Museum of Historical Monuments are also of interest. Le Mans was the capital of the ancient Auverci Cenomani, and the capital of Maine; was the birthplace of Henry II. of England; and was many times besieged, especially by Henry IV. in 1589. Here, Dec., 1793, the French republicans under Marceau defeated the Vendéans under La Rochejaquelein; and here, Jan. 19 and 12, 1871, the Germans under Prince Frederick Charles defeated the French army of the Loire under Chanzy. Population (1891), 57,412.

Mansart, or Mansard (mon-sär'), François. Born at Paris, Jan. 23, 1698; died there, Sept. 23, 1666. A noted French architect. He revived the use of "Mansard" roofs about 1650; they had been employed about 100 years before by Lesnot, but Mansart's name was now given to them. He built the churches of Sainte-Marie de Chaillot, the Minimes de la Place Royale, the Visitation de Sainte-Marie in the Rue Saint-Antoine, etc., and numerous châteaux; that known as the Château de Maisons-sur-Seine is the most famous.

Mansart, Jules Hardouin. Born at Paris, April 16, 1645; died at Versailles, May 11, 1708. A celebrated French architect, nephew of François Mansart. He built the Château de Clagny for the residence of Madame de Montespan, and was so much of the courtier as to gain not only an enormous fortune but the notice of the king, who heaped honors upon him. He directed all the principal architectural works of Louis XIV., including the building of the palace of Versailles, the Maison de Saint-Cyr, the Grand Trianon, the dome of the Hôtel des Invalides (perhaps his greatest work), the Place Vendôme, the Place des Victoires, etc.

Mansel (man'sel), Henry Longueville. Born at Cosgrove, Northamptonshire, Oct. 6, 1820; died at Cosgrove Hall, July 30, 1871. An English metaphysician. He matriculated at St. John's College, Oxford, June 11, 1839; was ordained in 1845; was appointed Bampton lecturer in 1855; and in 1868 was made dean of St. Paul's. In metaphysics he was a follower of Sir William Hamilton, and developed the latter's theory of "the conditioned." Among his works are "Phronetisierion, or Oxford in the Nineteenth Century," an imitation of Aristophanes (1850), "The Limits of Demonstrative Science Considered" (1853), "On the Philosophy of Kant" (1856), the article on metaphysics in the eighth edition of the "Encyclopedia Britannica" (1857), "Bampton Lectures" (1858), etc.

Mansel, or Maunsel (män'sel), John. Died at Florence, Jan., 1265. An English military ecclesiastic, keeper of the seal and counselor of Henry III. He was brought up at court, and on Nov. 8, 1246, received the custody of the privy seal. He was one of Henry's chief advisers. He held at one time 300 benefices, with a rental of 18,000 marks. In the struggle with the barons in 1262 he fled to France, and his holdings were taken from him.

Mansfeld (mäns'felt). 1. A former county of Germany, which lay west of the Saale, and is now in the government district of Merseburg, Prussian Saxony. It fell in 1780, on the extinction of the reigning house, partly to Prussia and partly to Saxony. Since the Napoleonic period it has belonged entirely to Prussia.

2. A town in the province of Saxony, Prussia, 38 miles south of Magdeburg, capital of the former county of Mansfeld. Luther lived here in his early youth.

Mansfeld, Count Ernst von. Born 1580; died near Zara, Dalmatia, Nov. 29, 1626. A celebrated German general, natural son of Count P. E. von Mansfeld. He was educated by his godfather Ernest, archduke of Austria, and distinguished himself as a soldier in the Spanish and in the imperial service. In 1610 he embraced the Reformed faith, and entered the service of the Protestant Union. In 1618, when the head of the union, the elector palatine Frederick V., was elevated to the throne by the Protestant estates in Bohemia, he became commander-in-chief in that country. After the disastrous battle on the White Hill (which see), at which he was not present, he maintained a brilliant but unequal contest against the Imperialists in Germany. He was defeated by Wallenstein at Dessau, April 25, 1626.

Mansfeld, Count Peter Ernst von. Born July 10, 1517; died May 22, 1604. A German general. He served under the emperor Charles V. and under his son Philip II. of Spain; was for a time governor of Luxembourg; and in 1592 succeeded the Duke of Parma as governor-general of the Netherlands, a post which he held two years.

Mansfield (manz'fēld). A town in Nottinghamshire, England, 15 miles north of Nottingham. Population (1891), 13,925.

Mansfield, Charles Blachford. Born at Royner, Hampshire, May 8, 1819; died at London, Feb. 26, 1855. An English chemist and traveler. He discovered the method of extracting benzol from coal-tar, and thus laid the foundation for the aniline industry. In 1850 he traveled in Brazil and Paraguay. He died from the effects of an explosion of naphtha while preparing benzol. He wrote "Aerial Navigation" (1850), and "Letters from Brazil and Paraguay" (posthumous).

Mansfield, Earls of. See Murray, David, and Murray, William.

Mansfield, Joseph King Fenno. Born at New Haven, Conn., Dec. 22, 1803; died Sept. 18, 1862. An American general. He commanded at Washington 1861, and was mortally wounded at Antietam 1862.

Mansfield, Mount. The most noted summit of the Green Mountains, Vermont, 20 miles east of Burlington. It was long considered to be the highest of the range. Height, 4,070 feet.

Mansfield, Richard. Born in Helgoland, in 1857. A German-American actor. He has obtained success in America both as tragedian and comedian.

Mansfield College. A college founded at Oxford in 1886, especially for members of non-established churches. Students must be graduates in arts of some recognized university.

Mansfield Park. A novel by Jane Austen, written in 1796, published in 1814.

Mansilla (mān-sēl'yā), Lucio. Born at Buenos Ayres, 1792; died 1871. An Argentine general, brother-in-law of the dictator Rosas. In 1845 he was commander-in-chief of the army under Rosas, and was defeated at Punta de Obligado by the combined British and French fleet, Nov. 20.

Mansilla de García (mān-sēl'yā dā gār-thē'ā), Eduardo (née Mansilla). Born at Buenos Ayres, 1838. An Argentine novelist. In 1855 she married Manuel García, a diplomatist. She has published several novels of Argentine customs and historical episodes, including "El Médico de San Luis," "Lucía Miranda," and "Pablo, ó la vida en las pampas"; the last was translated into French.

Mansion House, The. The official residence of the lord mayor of London, situated $\frac{1}{2}$ mile east of St. Paul's. It was begun in 1789. The front has a fine hexastyle Corinthian pedimented portico. The suite of state apartments contains some excellent modern statues and paintings.

Manso de Velasco (mān'sō dā vā-lās'kō), José Antonio, Count of Superunda. Born in Biscay about 1695; died after 1762. A Spanish soldier and administrator. He served in the War of Succession; was captain-general of Chile 1735-45; and viceroy of Peru July 12, 1745-Oct. 12, 1761. His administration in the latter country was longer than that of any other viceroy, and was distinguished for excellence. The great earthquake which destroyed Lima and Callao, Oct. 28, 1746, occurred during his rule.

Manson (man'son), George. Born at Edinburgh, Dec. 3, 1850; died in Devonshire, England, Feb. 27, 1876. A Scottish painter in water-colors.

Mansos (mān'sōs). [Sp., from manso, tame.] A tribe of semi-nomadic aborigines, from the banks of the Rio Grande in southern New Mexico, who were Christianized by Fray García de San Francisco, a Franciscan, in the first half of the 17th century, and in 1659 were transferred to the present site of El Paso del Norte in northern Chihuahua. There are still a few families dwelling at the latter place, but they have adopted the mode of life and customs of the northern Mexicans. Some of the older men, however, still preserve the language of the tribe and many of the primitive rites and religious practices.

Mansur. See Al-Mansur.

Mansurah (mān-sō'rā). A town in Lower Egypt, situated on the Damietta branch of the Nile, 50 miles west by south of Port Said. Near it, in 1250, Louis IX. of France was defeated by the Egyptians. Population (1882), 26,784.

Mantianus (man-ti-ā'nus), or Matianus (mā-ti-ā'nus). An ancient name of Lake Urmiah.

Mantineia (man-ti-nē'ä), or Mantineia (nī'ä). [Gr. Mantiveia.] In ancient geography, a city in Arcadia, Greece, situated 43 miles southwest of Corinth. It was the scene of several battles; in 418 B. C. the Spartans defeated the Athenians and Argives; in 362 B. C. the Thebans under Epaminondas defeated the Spartans and allies; and in 207 or 206 B. C. Philopomen, general of the Achean League, defeated the Spartans.

Martinino (mān-tē-nē'nō). An island reported to Columbus, 1492-93, by the Indians of Haiti. He understood them to say that it was inhabited by Amazon women. The name was a corruption of the Carib Madinina, corresponding to the modern Martinique.

Manton (man'ton), Joseph. Born about 1766; died at Maida Hill, June 29, 1835. An English gunsmith. He patented many improvements in large and small arms, and was a principal mover in the introduction of the percussion system.

Mantua (man'tū-ä). A province in Lombardy, Italy. Area, 912 square miles. Population (1891), 307,768.

Mantua, It. Mantova (mān'tō-vā). The capital of the province of Mantua, Italy, situated on an island in the Mincio, in lat. 45° 9' N., long. 10° 47' E. It is a strong fortress. The chief objects of interest are the Church of San Andrea, cathedral, ducal palace, museum of antiquities, and Palazzo del Tè (with works by Giulio Romano). It is noted in art history for its connection with Mantegna and Romano, and has an academy of sciences and arts. It was the home of Vergil, who was born in the neighborhood. It was a Guelph town; was ruled by the Gonzaga family; and was capital of the duchy of Mantua. It was sacked by the Imperialists in 1630; besieged by the French under Bonaparte in 1796-97, and taken in 1797; and held by the French under the Napoleonic régime but restored to Austria in 1814. It was one of the fortresses of the Austrian "Quadrilateral." In 1866 it was ceded to Italy. Population (1891), estimated, 300,000.

Mantua, Duchy of. A former Italian marquiseate and duchy. The territory was ruled by the family of Gonzaga from about 1328 to 1708, and by Austria 1708-97; belonged to the Cisalpine Republic, kingdom of Italy, etc., 1797-1814; passed to Austria in 1814; and was ceded to Italy in 1859 and 1866.

Mantuan (man'tū-an) Bard, or Mantuan Swan. A surname of Vergil as a native of Mantua.

Mantuan War. A war for the succession to the duchy of Mantua, 1628-30. The Duke of Nevers, supported by France, was confirmed as duke in opposition to the Imperialist candidate.

Manu (ma'nō). In Sanskrit, man; man collectively; mankind; the Demiurge; one of a class of fourteen demiurgic beings, each of whom presides over a Manvantara, 'interval or period of a Manu.' The first in order of these is called Svayambhūva, as sprung from Svayambhū, the self-existent, identified with Brahma, who divided himself into two persons, male and female, whence was produced Viraj, and from him the first Manu. This Manu Svayambhūva is a sort of secondary creator. He produced ten Prajapatis, 'lords of creatures,' and these again seven other Manus. Of these the seventh, Manu Vaivasvata, 'the sun-born,' is the Manu of the present period, and is regarded as the progenitor of the present race of beings. He has been compared to Noah, from various legends of his preservation from a deluge by Vishnu, or by Brahma, in the form of a fish. He was the founder and first king of Ayodhya, afterward reigned over by Ikshvaku, his son, founder of the solar race. Manu Vaivasvata's daughter Ila married Budha, son of Soma, 'the moon,' and ancestor of the lunar race. To Manu Vaivasvata are ascribed the so-called "Laws of Manu" and a work on Vedic ritual. Upon the first seven are to follow seven other Manus.

Manu, Laws of. Until recently, the designation commonly employed for the Manava-dharmashastra, which native tradition regarded as the law-book of Manu (see Manu), but which the scholars of to-day view as the law-book of the Manavans. The works constituting the Veda in its broader sense fall into the three classes of Sanhita, Brahmana, and Sutra, or text, exposition, and brief rule. Chief among the last are the Kalpasutras, or 'ceremonial rules,' many important families having each its distinct Kalpasutra. This Kalpasutra was divided into Shrautasutra, 'rules for the fire-sacrifices'; Gṛhyasutra, 'domestic usages'; and Dharmasutra, 'sacred law.' The Sutras are in mingled prose and verse; the Dharmasutras are a later metrical recast in the ordinary epic meter of antecedent Dharmasutras; and the Manavadharmashastra is such a recast of a Manavadharmasutra, or is the law-book of the Manavans. Out of classiness differences grew various Caranas, or 'schools,' in which Vedic traditions were handed down. The Manavans were a school of the Black Yajurveda. Of the Maitrayaniya branch of the schools of the Black Yajurveda there are still some survivors in western India who call their Sutras Manavasutras. The occasion of the recast was the development—beside the sectarian schools, which studied exclusively a single branch of the Veda—of non-sectarian schools, whose teachings claimed validity for all Aryans. These compiled from the only locally valid sectarian Sutras a school-book intended to be systematic, complete, and generally valid, and the Manava Dharmasutra was chosen as its basis from the greatness of the name of the legendary Manu. By interpreting the title as 'of Manu,' they had an authoritative name to commend their work. Perhaps one half of the present work consists, however, of additions to the original, drawn from popular metrical maxims, and made, as Bühler thinks, at the date of the recast, which he considers to be between 100 B. C. and the 2d century A. D. (For a general account of the character and contents, see Williams's "Indian Wisdom," pp. 211-294. For the literature, see Lanman's "Sanskrit Reader" (Boston: Ginn and Co.), p. 349, from which the above view is taken.) It was first translated from the original by Sir William Jones. The most recent translations, accompanied by valuable introductions, are those of Bühler ("Sacred Books of the East," vol. xxv) and Burnell (Trubner).

Manuel (man'ū-el). A tragedy by Charles Robert Maturin, produced at Drury Lane March 8, 1817, with Kean in the title rôle.

Manuel I. Comnenus. Born about 1120; died Sept. 24, 1180. Byzantine emperor 1143-80, son of the emperor Calo-Joannes. He permitted the Crusaders, under Conrad III., emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, and Louis VII. of France, to pass through his dominions in 1147, and in 1148 repelled an invasion of Greece by the Normans under Roger, king of Sicily. He was totally defeated by the Turks at Myrioccephalus in 1176.

Manuel II. Palæologus. Died 1425. Byzantine emperor 1391-1425, son of John VII. Being besieged in Constantinople by the sultan Bajazet, he implored the aid of western Europe, and an army composed of the chivalry of France, Germany, and Hungary came to his assistance, but was totally defeated by the sultan at Nicopolis in 1396. Bajazet was, however, compelled to raise the siege in 1402 in order to meet the Tatar conqueror Timur, by whom he was defeated and captured at Angora. Manuel passed the subsequent years of his reign in peace, though in a state of semi-dependence on Mohammed, the son of Bajazet.

Manuel (mā-nō-el'), Don Juan. Born 1282; died 1347. A Spanish statesman and writer. Of the royal house of Castile and Leon. His best-known work is the "Conde Lucanor," a collection of fifty tales in the Oriental style.

Manuel (mā-nō-el'), E. The nom de plume of Ernest L'Épine, a French writer, who is not to be confounded with Eugène Manuel, the author of "Pages Intimes," etc.

Manuel (mā-nō-el'), Nikolaus. Born at Bern, Switzerland, about 1484; died at Bern, 1530. A Swiss painter and poet.

Manutius (ma-nū'shius), Aldus, It. Aldo Manuzio (āl'dō mā-nōt'sē-ō) or Manucci. Born at Bassiano, near Velletri, Italy, about 1450; died at Venice, Feb. 3, 1515. An Italian classical scholar and celebrated printer, the founder of the Aldine press at Venice about 1490. He published editions of Aristotle, Aristophanes, Herodotus, Demosthenes, Plato, and other Greek classics, and Latin and Italian works.

Manutius, Aldus, "The Younger." Born at Venice, Feb. 13, 1547; died at Rome, Oct. 28, 1597. An Italian printer and classical scholar, son of Paulus Manutius.

Manutius, Paulus. Born at Venice, June 12, 1511; died there, April 6, 1574. An Italian classical scholar, author, and noted printer, son of Aldus Manutius.

Man with Pinks. A noted painting by Jan van Eyck, in the Old Museum at Berlin. It is a bust portrait of a man wearing a fur-lined cloak and a high fur cap, and holding white pinks in one hand and red in the other.

Man with the Iron Mask, The. A French state prisoner, confined in the Bastille (where he died Nov. 19, 1703), Pignerol, and other prisons in the reign of Louis XIV. His name was never mentioned, but he was buried under that of Marchiali, and he always wore a mask of iron covered with black velvet. He has been supposed to be (1) the Duke of Vermandois, a natural son of Louis XIV. and Madeleine de la Vallière; (2) an elder brother of Louis XIV., the son of Anne of Austria and the Duke of Buckingham; (3) a twin brother of Louis XIV.; (4) Count Matthioli, a minister of the Duke of Mantua, imprisoned for the head of a conspiracy to assassinate the king and his ministers. This last conjecture was considered the most reasonable until 1891, when Captain Bazeries, of the garrison of Nantes, published in the "Progrès de Nantes" (republished in "Le Temps," Aug. 7, 1891) a translation of some cipher despatches of Louis XIV. and of Louvois, apparently showing that the prisoner was Général de Bulonde, who raised the siege of Conco unecessarily and compromised the success of the campaign. Louis shut him up at Pignerol for reasons of his own, instead of dooming him to the fate of a traitor, which was his due. Opinions still differ as to the identity of the prisoner.

Manx (mangks). The native language of the inhabitants of the Isle of Man, which belongs to the Gaelic branch of the Celtic tongues, and is thus closely allied to the Irish and the Gaelic.

Manzanares (mān-thū-nā'res). A small tributary of the river Jarama, in Spain. Madrid is situated on it.

Manzanares. A town in the province of Ciudad Real, Spain, situated on the Azuer in lat. 39° N., long. 3° 27' W. Population (1887), 9,699.

Manzanillo (mān-thā-nēl'yō). A seaport on the southern coast of Cuba. It has a trade in coffee, sugar, and fruit. Population (1887), 34,220.

Manzano (mān-zā'nō), El. [Sp. manzana, apple.] A settlement of recent origin in central New Mexico, east of the Rio Grande. It lies on the eastern border of well-known and extensive deposits of rock-salt.

Manzoni (mān-zō'nē), Alessandro. Born at Milan, March 7, 1785; died at Milan, May 22, 1873. A noted Italian novelist and poet, the chief of the Italian romantic school. He went in his early youth to Paris with his mother, who was a daughter of the Marquis Beccaria, and who introduced him to literary society. He became acquainted with Volney, Madame Condorcet, Faurel, and others, and became imbued with many of their deistical and other opinions. In 1807 he returned to Italy, and was made a member of the Italian senate in 1800. He wrote the historical novel "I Promessi Sposi" (1825-27; translated into English as "The Betrothed Lovers"). Among his other works are the tragedies "Il Conte di Carmagnola" (1820), "Adelchi" (1823), the lyric poem "Il cinque Maggio" ("The 5th of May," an ode on Napoleon's death, 1821), "Inni sacri" (1810; sacred lyrics), "Osservazioni sulla morale cattolica" (a vindication of Catholic morality), "Storia della Colonna infame" (a historical treatise, 1842).

Maoris (mā'ō-riz or mou'riz). [From maori, lit. 'native,' 'indigenous.'] The primitive inhabitants of New Zealand, a Polynesian race of the Malay family, distinguished for their natural capacity and vigor. Most of them now profess Christianity, but they have vigorously though unsuccessfully resisted English dominion.

The Maoris, when first discovered by Europeans, were in a comparatively advanced stage of barbarism. Their society had definite ranks, from that of the Rangatira, the chief with a long pedigree, to the slave. Their religious hymns, of great antiquity, have been collected and translated by Grey, Taylor, Bastian, and others.

Lang, Myth, etc., II. 27.

Map (map), or Mapes (māps), Walter. Born probably about 1140; died about 1210. A medieval author and satirist. He was of a Welsh family in Herefordshire, and studied in Paris from about 1154 to 1160. He was present at the court of Henry II., while Thomas Becket was still chancellor, as one of the clerks of the royal household, and was employed as an itinerant justice. In 1179 Henry II. sent him to the Lateran Council at Rome. In 1197 he was made archdeacon of Oxford. The only undoubted work extant by Map is the "De nugis curialium" ("Courtiers' Triflings"), composed between 1182 and 1192. He has also been credited with a large share in the composition of the Arthurian romances, and it is probable that the "Lancelot" is based on an Anglo-French poem by him. A great part of the "Goliardic" or satirical verse of the 12th and 13th centuries is doubtless by Map.

Mapimi (mā-pē'mē), Bolson de. [Origin of name unknown.] A section of the Mexican states of Chihuahua and Coahuila in northern Mexico, parts of which are quite arid and low, while others are very fertile and well watered.

Mapures. See Maypures.

Maqui. See Tusayan.

Maquiritares (mā-kē-rō-tā'res). An Indian tribe of Venezuela, on the Ventuari, a branch of the upper Orinoco, ranging at times, it is said, as far east as the confines of British Guiana. They are of Carib stock, have rarely had any intercourse with the whites, and still retain their savage independence. Though living in regular villages and having small plantations, they are much given to wandering. The tribal relations are very loose.

Mar (mār). A district of Aberdeenshire, Scotland, forming the southern part of the county. The Earls of Mar derive their title from it.

Mar, Juan Manuel del. Born at Cuzco, 1806; died at Lima, June 15, 1862. A Peruvian statesman. He was minister of war under Castilla 1855-60, and in 1859 was temporarily in charge of the executive. In 1860 he was elected first vice-president under the new constitution.

Mara (mā'rā), Madame (Gertrud Elisabeth Schmeling). Born at Cassel, Germany, Feb. 23, 1749; died at Revel, Russia, Jan. 20, 1833.

A noted German soprano singer. She studied with Hiller at Leipzig, and about 1771 made her debut at Dresden, where she had immediate success and was made court singer. In 1784 she went to London, where she sang to enthusiastic audiences. She was connected with the opera in London till 1791, but was better suited for concerts and oratorios on account of her weak physique and lack of knowledge of acting. After singing in Paris, Vienna, and the German cities with success, she lost her voice in 1802 or thereabouts, and supported herself by teaching. She married Mara the violoncellist about 1771.

Marabouts (mar'a-bōts). [Also Marabost.] The members of a Moorish priestly order or race of northern Africa, successors of the Morabits or Almoravides, a Mohammedan sect or tribe who ruled Morocco and part of Spain in the 11th and 12th centuries. The Marabouts are reputed as saints, prophets, and sorcerers, and exercise great influence over the Berbers and Moslem negroes.

Maracaibo, or Maracaybo (mā-rā-kī'bō). A seaport in Venezuela, situated on the outlet of Lake Maracaibo about lat. 10° 48' N., long. 71° 45' W. It is an important commercial city, exporting coffee, hides, cocoa, etc.; is the seat of a national college; and was formerly the seat of a Jesuit college. It was founded in 1571. Population (1888), 34,284.

Marahuas. See Marauas.

Marais (mā-rā'), Le. [F., 'the marsh.'] In the politics of the first French Revolution, the group of members who sat in the lower part of the assembly.

Marais, Le. 1. The name especially applied to the region lying east of the Rue St.-Denis and north of the Rue St.-Antoine, within the fortifications of Charles V. in Paris. It was subject to inundation. A large part of it was held in the middle ages by the Knights of the Temple.

2. A swampy region in the western part of France, near La Rochelle. In ancient times it was an arm of the sea.

Marajó (mā-rā-zhō') formerly also Joannes (zhō-ān'nās). An island between the estuaries of the Amazon and the Pará, belonging to the state of Pará, Brazil. Length, 165 miles. Greatest width, about 100 miles.

Marandaise. The sword of Ryanec.

Maranhão, or Maranham (mā-rān-yān'). A state of Brazil, bounded by the Atlantic on the north, Piahy on the east and southeast, Goyaz on the southwest and west, and Pará on the west and northwest. Area, 177,566 square miles. Population, estimated (1894), 550,000.

Maranhão, or Maranham, or São Luiz do Maranhão (sān lō-ēzh' dō mā-rān-yān'). A seaport, capital of the state of Maranhão, situated on the island São Luiz in lat. 2° 32' S., long. 44° 18' W. It exports hides, cotton, sugar, rice, etc. Maranhão was founded by the French in 1612, but was taken by the Portuguese three years after. Population (1890), 38,000.

Maranhão, State of. [Pg. Estado do Maranhão.] A colonial division of Portuguese South America. In 1621 Portuguese America was divided into two states—Brazil and Maranhão. The latter included at first all from Ceará northward. Ceará was subsequently separated from it, and the remaining portion was divided into various captaincies, eventually reduced to four which correspond to the modern states, Piahy, Maranhão, Pará, and Rio Negro (now Amazonas). The colonial state was suppressed in 1774.

Marañon (mā-rān-yōn'). [Probably corrupted from the Tupi paraná, the sea, a name given by the Indians to this and other great rivers.] A Spanish-American name for the Amazon. It is used especially in Peru, and geographers have adopted the term, somewhat vaguely, to indicate the upper or Peruvian portion of the river.

Marañones (mā-rān-yō'nes). [Lit. 'conspirators': from the Spanish maraña, a plot.] The name adopted by the followers of Aguirre. (See Aguirre.) It has been erroneously supposed that the word Marañon was derived from it.

Marash (mā-rāsh'). A town in the vilayet of Aleppo, Asiatic Turkey, situated near the Jihun 100 miles north by west of Aleppo. In ancient times it was probably a city of the Hittites. Numerous inscriptions have been found there. Population, estimated, 15,000.

Marat (mā-rā'), Jean Paul. Born at Bondry Switzerland, May 24, 1744; assassinated at Paris, July 13, 1793. A French revolutionist. He studied medicine at Bordeaux; practised his profession with conspicuous success at London and at Paris; and wrote a number of meritorious scientific works, chiefly on electricity and optics. At the beginning of the Revolution in 1789 he began to publish a paper entitled "L'Ami du Peuple," in which he boldly advocated a republican form of government and incited the populace to violence. He was in 1792 elected to the National Convention, in which, as the most ultra-revolutionary of the Jacobin party, he was attacked by the Girondists, who were in a majority. He was tried before the Revolutionary tribunal, but was acquitted April 24, 1793, and with Danton and Robespierre overthrew the Girondists June 2, 1793. He was stabbed to death by Charlotte Corday while in his bath seeking relief from a skin-disease.

Maratea (mā-rā-tā'ā). A small seaport in the province of Potenza, Italy, situated on the Gulf of Policastro in lat. 39° 59' N., long. 15° 43' E.

Marathon (mar'a-thon). [Gr. Marabōn.] A plain in Attica, Greece, 18 miles northeast of Athens, between Mount Pentelicos and the sea. It is celebrated for the battle of Sept., 490 B. C., between the Greeks (10,000 Athenians and 1,000 Plataeans), under Miltiades, and over 100,000 Persians, under Datis and Artaphernes. The result was a Greek victory, due to the tactics of Miltiades. The Greek loss was 192; the Persian, 6,400. The victory ended Darius's attempt against Greece, and is classed among the decisive battles of the world. The conical mound, 40 feet high and 200 in diameter, which covers the Athenian dead marks the central point of the famous battle. All doubt as to its identification was set at rest by a recent excavation of the Archaeological Society of Athens, which disclosed ashes, charred remnants of the funeral pyre, and fragments of pottery of the beginning of the 5th century B. C.

Marâtre (mā-rā'tr), La. A play by Balzac, produced at the Théâtre Historique, Paris, in June, 1848.

Marble Cañon, The. A noted cañon of the Colorado River, in northern Arizona, above the Grand Cañon.

Marble Faun, The. A romance by Hawthorne, published in 1860. The English edition, published in the same year, is called "Transformation, or the Romance of Monte Beni." See Donatello.

The sole idea of the "Marble Faun" is to illustrate the intellectually and morally awakening power of a sudden impulsive sin, committed by a simple, joyous, instinctive, "natural" man. The whole group of characters is imagined solely with a view to the development of this idea.

R. H. Hutton, Essays in Lit. Crit.

Marblehead (mār'bl-head). A seaport and summer resort in Essex County, Massachusetts, situated on Massachusetts Bay 15 miles northeast of Boston. It has manufactures of boots and shoes; was formerly one of the chief towns of the State; and is noted for its fisheries. The original settlers were largely from the Channel Islands. Population (1890), 3,202.

Marbois (mär-bwä'), François, Marquis de Barbé-. Born at Metz in 1745; died at Paris in 1837. A French statesman and writer. In 1803 he conducted the treaty of the cession of Louisiana to the United States.

Marburg (mär'börg). A town in the province of Hesse-Nassau, Prussia, situated on the Lahn 49 miles north of Frankfort-on-the-Main. It has manufactures of pottery, etc. The chief buildings are the Church of St. Elizabeth (13th century) and the castle (noted for its Rittersaal (1280-1320) and chapel). The university, founded by Philip, landgrave of Hesse, has from 800 to 900 students, and a library of 150,000 volumes. Marburg was the residence of St. Elizabeth in the 13th century, became one of the capitals of Hesse, and was the scene of outbreaks of the Hessian peasants against the French in 1806 and 1809. Population (1890), 13,581.

Marcceau (mär-sö'), François Séverin des Graviers. Born at Chartres, France, March 1, 1769; died at Altenkirchen, Prussia, Sept. 23, 1796. A French general. He served in Vendée in 1793, and at Fleurus in 1794; captured Coblenz in 1794; and served along the Rhine 1795-96.

Marcellians (mär-sel'i-anz). The professed followers of Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra in the 4th century. The Marcellians held the doctrine, nearly agreeing with that of the Sabellians, that the Holy Spirit and the Word, or Logos, are merely impersonal agencies and qualities of God, and that the incarnation of the Logos is temporary only. It has been doubted by some whether Marcellus held the views ascribed to him.

Marcellinists (mär-se-lin'ists). The adherents of Marcellina, a female gnostic of the 2d century, and a teacher of Gnosticism in Rome. Also Marcellinians.

Marcellinus (mär-se-li'nus). Bishop of Rome from June 30, 296, to Oct. 25 (?), 304. He is said to have yielded during the persecution under Diocletian to the demand to offer incense to the pagan gods, and to have repented and suffered martyrdom.

Marcellinus, or Marcellianus (mär-sel-i-ā'nus). A Roman officer, in the 5th century, who became the independent prince of Illyricum, and after the death of Valentinian III. an unsuccessful aspirant to the throne. During the reign of Majorian the title "Patrician of the West" (Patricius Occidentis) was conferred upon him, and he aided that emperor in defending Sicily from the Vandals. He again opposed the Vandals in Sicily 464-468. He was assassinated by his allies.

Marcellinus. A count of Illyria, and one of the first ministers of Justinian, living in the first half of the 6th century; author of a chronicle of the events from the accession of Theodosius to the year 534 (continued by a later hand to 566). It is much fuller for the affairs of the East than for those of the West.

Marcellinus, Ammianus. See Ammianus.

Marcello (mär-eh'lo), Benedetto. Born at Venice, July 31 (?), 1686; died at Breseia, Italy, July 24, 1739. A noted Italian composer. His most important work is the musical setting of 50 of the psalms (1724-27), paraphrased by Girolamo Giustiniani.

Marcellus (mär-sel'us). [L., dim. of Marcus.] An illustrious Roman plebeian family of the Claudia gens.

Marcellus II. Pope 1555.

Marcellus, Marcus Claudius. Born before 268 B. C.; slain near Venusia, Apulia, 208 B. C. A celebrated Roman general and statesman. He was five times consul (first in 222); defeated the Gauls, during his first consulship, at Clastidium, slaying with his own hand their leader, Britomartus; defended Nola against Hannibal 216; captured Syracuse 212; and, taking the command in Apulia, contended against Hannibal in southern Italy until his death in a skirmish near Venusia.

Marcellus, Marcus Claudius. Killed about 46 B. C. A Roman consul (51 B. C.), an adherent of Pompey.

Marcellus, Marcus Claudius. Born 43 B. C.; died at Baiæ, Italy, 23 B. C. The son of C. Claudius Marcellus and Octavia, sister of Augustus, and the adopted son and favorite of the latter, whose daughter Julia he married.

Marcellus, Nonius. A Roman grammarian who flourished about the beginning of the 4th (?) century; author of an extant treatise, "De compendiosa doctrina per litteras ad filium."

The work is intended to assist in explaining the authors, both as regards their diction (cap. 1-12) and their subject-matter (cap. 13-20), and it is invaluable to us on account of its numerous quotations from early Roman literature, in spite of the author's total want of solid information, judgment, and accuracy.

Teuffel und Schwabe, Hist. of Rom. Lit. (tr. by Warr), II, 328.

March (mähreh). [From L. Martius, the month of Mars.] The third month of our year, consisting of thirty-one days. It was the first month of the ancient Roman year till the adoption of the Julian calendar, which was followed by the Gregorian. Previous to the latter it was reckoned the first month in many European countries, and so continued in England until 1752, the legal year there before that date beginning on the 25th of March.

March (mähreh), Slav. Morava (mō-rä'vä). A river in Moravia, and on the boundary between Hungary on the east and Moravia and Lower Austria on the west; the Roman Marus. It joins the Danube 6 miles west of Presburg. Length, 220 miles; navigable to Göding.

March (mähreh). A town in Cambridgeshire, England, situated on the Nen 24 miles north of Cambridge. Population (1891), 6,995.

March, Ausias or Augustin. Born at Valencia toward the end of the 14th century; died about 1460. A noted Spanish poet, of noble rank, seignior of Beniarjo and a member of the Cortés of Valencia in 1446. "He has been called the Petrarch of Catalonia, and is said to have equalled the lover of Laura in elegance, in brilliancy of expression, and in harmony; and while, like him, he contributed to the formation of his language, which he carried to a high degree of polish and perfection, he possessed more real feeling, and did not suffer himself to be seduced by a passion for conceit and false brilliancy." Simondi, Lit. of South of Europe, I, 172.

March, Earls of. See Mortimer.

March, Francis Andrew. Born at Millbury, Mass., Oct. 25, 1825. An American philologist, especially noted as an Anglo-Saxon scholar. He became professor of the English language and comparative philology at Lafayette College (Easton, Pennsylvania) in 1858. Among his works are "Method of Philological Study of the English Language" (1865), "Comparative Grammar of the Anglo-Saxon Language" (1870), an "Anglo-Saxon Reader" (1871), etc.

Marche (märsh). An ancient government of France. Capital, Guéret. It is bounded by Berry on the north, Bourbonnais on the northeast, Auvergne on the east, Limousin on the south, and Poitou and Angoumois on the west, and corresponds generally to the modern department of Creuse and part of Haute-Vienne. It became a county in the 10th century, and was a fief united permanently to France in the middle of the 16th century.

Marche. A small town in Belgium, 27 miles southeast of Namur.

Marchena (mär-chä'nä). A town in the province of Seville, Spain, 32 miles east of Seville. Population (1887), 14,752.

Marches (märch'ez), It. Marche (mär'ke). A compartimento of Italy, lying along the Adriatic Sea east of Umbria. It comprises the provinces Pesaro-ed-Urbino, Ancona, Macerata, and Ascoli Piceno.

Marches. The border regions of England and Wales.

Marchesi (mär-kä'sē), Pompeo. Born at Salltrio, near Milan, Aug. 7, 1789; died at Milan, Feb. 7, 1858. An Italian sculptor. His best-known work is "The Good Mother" (in Milan).

Marchfeld (märch'felt). A plain in Lower Austria, near Vienna, between the Danube and the March. Here, July 13, 1260, Ottocar, king of Bohemia, defeated Béla IV. of Hungary; and in the neighborhood, Aug. 26, 1278, Rudolf of Hapsburg defeated Ottocar. It also contains the battle-fields of Aspern and Wagram.

Marchi (mär'kō), Giuseppe Filippo Liberati. Born at Rome about 1735; died at London, April 2, 1808. An Italian painter and engraver. He came to England in 1752, studied in St. Martin's Lane Academy, and was Sir Joshua Reynolds's chief assistant. He practised mezzotint engraving, and from 1766 to 1775 exhibited engravings with the Society of Artists.

Marchienne-au-Pont (mär-shyen'ō-pōn'). A town in the province of Hainaut, Belgium, situated on the Sambre 31 miles south of Brussels. Population (1890), 22,308.

Marchioness, The. A little servant in the "Old Curiosity Shop," by Dickens; so nicknamed by Dick Swiveller.

Marcian. See Marcianus.

Marciana (mär-chä'nä). A small town in the island of Elba, Italy.

Marcian Codex. See the extract.

The discovery of the Marcian codex of the Iliad at Venice, by Villoison, and the publication of its text and scholia (Venice, 1778), known as Schol. Ven. A, form an epoch in the history of Homeric studies. It is from these notes that we derive all our information about the several old editions used or produced by the Alexandrian critics. The text is also furnished with the critical marks of Aristarchus and his pupils, which are explained in a prefatory note. Machaffy, Hist. of Classical Greek Lit., I, 41.

Marcianus (mär-shi-ā'nus), or Marcian (mär'shi-an). Born about 391; died 457. Emperor of the East 450-457. He was raised to the throne by Pulcheria, widow of the emperor Theodosius the younger, whom he married at her own request, and is represented as a wise and firm ruler. He refused to continue the tribute paid by his predecessor to Attila, saying to the Hunnish ambassador, "I have iron for Attila, but no gold."

Marcion (mär'shion). A noted heretic of the 2d century, son of a bishop of Sinope in Pontus. He founded an important sect (see Marcionites), and was the author of a recension of the Gospel of Luke and of the Epistles of Paul.

Marcionites (mär'shion-its). The followers of Marcion of Sinope, a Gnostic religious teacher of the 2d century, and the founder at Rome of the Marcionite sect, which lasted until the 7th century or later. Marcion taught that there were three primal forces: the good God, first revealed by Jesus Christ; the evil matter, ruled by the devil; and the Demiurge, the finite and imperfect God of the Jews. He rejected the old Testament, denied the incarnation and resurrection, and admitted only a gospel akin to or altered from that of St. Luke and ten of St. Paul's epistles as inspired, and authoritative. He repeated baptism thrice, excluded wine from the eucharist, inculcated an extreme asceticism, and allowed women to minister.

Marck (märk), William de la. Died 1485. A historical character in Scott's novel "Quentin Durward," nicknamed the "Boar of Ardennes" on account of his resemblance to the animal both in looks and in disposition.

Marcke (märk), Émile van. Born at Sèvres, Aug. 20, 1827; died at Hyères in 1891. A noted French landscape- and animal-painter, pupil of Troyen. Many of his works are in America.

Marcomanni (mär-kō-man'ni). [L. Cæsar Marcomanni, Gr. (Ptolemy) Μαρκουμανοί.] A German tribe, a branch of the Suevi, first mentioned by Cæsar as in the army of Ariovistus. In the campaigns of Drusus they were on the middle and upper Main, but under their king Maroboduus they moved eastward into Bohemia, and were later further to the south in the Danube region, between the Lech and the Inn. In the 2d century they were signally defeated by Marcus Aurelius in the so-called Marcomannic war. They were in frequent conflict with the Romans down to the 4th century, when the name disappeared.

Marco Polo. See Polo.

Marcos de Obregon (Vida del Escudero). A Spanish romance by Vicente Espinel (1618). Le Sage was said by Voltaire to have based his "Gil Blas" on it, but this is an exaggeration.

Marcosians (mär-kō'si-anz). The followers of Marcus, perhaps of Ephesus, a heresiarch of the 2d century. The leading features of his system were a ritual imitating the Christian eucharist (at which he apparently caused a miraculous change in the color and quality of the wine), ministrations and prophecy of women, a cabalistic use of numbers and letters, antinomian licentiousness, and a Gnostic system of cons. He is known chiefly from the writings of Irenæus. His followers were not numerous.

Marcou (mär-kō'), Jules. Born at Salins, France, April 20, 1824. A French geologist. He explored various points on Lake Superior with Agassiz in 1848, and afterward many other portions of the United States both alone and with government expeditions. Among his works are "Geological Map of the United States" (1853), "Geology of North America" (1858), "Carte géologique de la terre" (1862), "Recherches géologiques sur le Jura suisse" (1846), "Lias et Trias, ou le nouveau grès rouge en Europe, etc." (1859), "Lettres sur les roches du Jura" (1860), "De la science en France" (1869).

Marqu-en-Barœul (märk'ōn-bä-rély'). A town in the department of Nord, France, near Lille. Population (1891), commune, 9,752.

Marcus (mär'kus). Bishop of Rome 336 A. D.
Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (mär'kus ä-ré'-li-us an-tō-ni'nus), originally Marcus Annæus Verus, commonly known as Marcus Aurelius. Born at Rome, April 20, 121 A. D.; died in Pannonia, March 17, 180. A celebrated Roman emperor 161-180. He was the son of Annius Verus, and was a nephew of Antoninus Pius, by whom he was adopted in 138, and whom he succeeded as emperor in 161, with Lucius Verus, also an adopted son of Antoninus Pius, as his associate in the government. He was a pupil of the Stoic Cornelius Fronto, and is frequently called "the philosopher" on account of his devotion to philosophy and literature. In 162 Verus undertook an expedition against the Parthians, but soon abandoned himself to dissipation at Antiochia. His generals, however, stormed Artaxata, burned Seleucia and Ctesiphon, reconquered Mesopotamia, and enabled him to dictate terms of peace in 165. In 166 a war broke out with the Marcomanni and Quadi, which was continued with various fortunes during the rest of the reign of Aurelius. Verus died in 167, leaving his colleague sole emperor. In 175 the general Avidius Cassius organized a revolt in Syria, but was killed by his own officers in the same year. Aurelius died in Pannonia, either at Vindobona (Vienna) or at Sirmium, March 17, 180, after a wise and prosperous reign of 19 years. He wrote a work in Greek, entitled "The Meditations" of Marcus Antoninus." There is a bronze equestrian statue of Marcus Aurelius in the Piazza del Campidoglio, Rome, the finest piece of ancient bronze-work surviving. The emperor, simply robed, extends his arm in token of peace; the horse is of heavy build. It was set on its present pedestal by Michelangelo in 1538.

Marcus Aurelius, Column of. See Column of Marcus Aurelius.

Marcy (mär'si), Mount, or Tahawus. [Named from W. L. Marey.] The highest summit of the Adirondacks, New York, situated in Keene, Essex County, 45 miles south-southwest of Plattsburg. Height, 5,345 feet.

Marcy, Randolph Barnes. Born at Greenwich, Mass., April 9, 1812; died at Orange, N. J., Nov. 22, 1887. An American general, father-in-law of General McClellan. He graduated at West Point in 1832; served in the Mexican war, during which he was promoted captain; was appointed chief of staff to General McClellan at the beginning of the Civil War in 1861; was commissioned brigadier-general of volunteers in the same year; and in 1863 was made inspector-general of the United States army, with the rank of brigadier-general, being retired in 1881. He wrote "Explorations of the Red River in 1852" (1853), "The Prairie Traveller" (1859), "Thirty Years of Army Life on the Border" (1866), and "Border Reminiscences" (1872).

Marcy, William Learned. Born at Southbridge, Mass., Dec. 12, 1786; died at Ballston Spa, N. Y., July 4, 1857. An American statesman. He served in the War of 1812; was United States senator (Democratic) from New York 1831-33; was governor of New York 1833-38; was Mexican claims commissioner 1839-42; was secretary of war 1845-49; and was secretary of state 1853-57.

Mardia (mär'di-ä). In ancient geography, a place in Thrace, near Adrianople. Here Constantine defeated Licinius 314 A. D.

Mardian (mär'di-an). An attendant of Cleopatra, a character in Shakspeare's "Antony and Cleopatra."

Mardi gras (mär'dē grā). [Fr., lit. 'fat Tuesday': so called from the French practice of parading a fat ox (boef gras) during the celebration of the day.] Shrove Tuesday; the last day of carnival; the day before Ash Wednesday (the first day of Lent), which in some places, as in New Orleans, is celebrated with revelry and elaborate display.

Mardin (mär'den'). A town in the vilayet of Diarbekir, Asiatic Turkey, situated about 55 miles southeast of Diarbekir. Population (estimated), 15,000.

Mardonius (mär-dō'mi-us). [Gr. Μαρδόνιος, OPers. Marduniya.] Killed at the battle of Platea, 479 B. C. A Persian general, son of Gobyras and a sister of Darius. He married the daughter of Darius and sister of Xerxes. He commanded an unsuccessful expedition against Greece in 492, and was commander in Greece after the battle of Salamis (480). He was defeated and probably slain at the battle of Platea. According to Ctesias he was wounded at Platea, and, being afterward sent by Xerxes to plunder Delphi, was killed there by hailstones.

Marduk. See Merodach.

Marduk-idin-achi (mär'dök-i-dēn'ä'chē). [Merodach gave the brother.] A Babylonian king about 1115-1106 B. C. He engaged in war with Tiglath-Pileser I., king of Assyria 1120-1100 B. C., and was at first victorious, conquering Ekalate ('city of palaces') and carrying off the images of the god Ramman to Babylon, where they remained until the time of Sennacherib (705-681 B. C.). In the second year of the war (1106) he was defeated and lost his life. Tiglath-Pileser then took Babylon, Sippara, and other Babylonian cities.

Marduk-nadin-shum (mär'dök-nä'din-shōm). [Merodach is giver of the name.] King of Babylonia about 852-840 B. C. When his brother Marduk-bel-usati had driven him out of his kingdom, he invoked the help of the Assyrians. Thereupon Salmanser II. invaded Babylonia (852), killed Marduk-bel-usati, and restored Marduk-nadin-shum to the throne.

Margaret of Angoulême, or of Valois, or of Alençon, or of Navarre. Born at Angoulême, France, April, 1492; died in Bigorre, France, 1549. Queen of Navarre, daughter of Charles of Orléans (duc d'Angoulême) and sister of Francis I. of France. She married (1509) the Duc d'Alençon, and later Henri d'Albret, king of Navarre. After the death of the king in 1544, she assumed the direction of the government. For a time she was favorably disposed toward Protestantism, but later abandoned it. She is especially famous as a patroness of literature and as the author of the "Heptameron" (which see). A number of her poems were published (1547) by Sylvius de la Haye under the title "Marguerites de la marquise des princesses, etc." Her letters were published 1841-42.

Margaret of Anjou. Born probably at Pont-à-Mousson or Nancy, France, March 23, 1430; died at Dampierre, near Saumur, Aug. 25, 1482. Queen consort of Henry VI. of England. She was the daughter of René of Anjou and Isabella of Lorraine, and was married to Henry VI. at Titchfield Abbey, April 22, 1445. The marriage was brought about by William de la Pole, earl (afterward duke) of Suffolk, in confirmation of a truce with France, and was extremely unpopular with the nation, which desired a continuance of the war (the Hundred Years' War). Margaret, after her marriage, supported the peace policy of Suffolk and afterward of the Duke of Somerset. In August, 1453, Henry was seized with his first attack of insanity, and in the following October the queen gave birth to her only son, Edward. A contest for the regency ensued between her and the Duke of York (until the birth of Edward heir presumptive to the throne), who represented the popular party, and who was appointed protector of the realm in March, 1454. The protectorate came to an end with the king's recovery in January, 1455; but the birth of an heir apparent and the hostile attitude of the queen induced the Duke of York to take up arms in 1455, thereby inaugurating the series of wars between the houses of Lancaster and York known as the Wars of the Roses (which see), which ended in the defeat and capture of Margaret and the death of her son at Tewkesbury, May 4, 1471, and in the death of her husband in the Tower of London, May 21, 1471. Margaret was liberated in 1475 on the renunciation of her claim to the throne and on the payment of a ransom by Louis XI. of France, and returned to the Continent.

Margaret of Austria. Born at Ghent, Belgium, Jan. 10, 1480; died at Mechlin, Belgium, Dec. 1, 1530. Daughter of the emperor Maximilian I., regent of the Netherlands 1507-30. She married the infante John of Spain in 1497, and Philibert II. of Savoy in 1501. She negotiated the peace of Cambray in 1529.

Margaret of Valois, or of France. Born at St.-Germain-en-Laye, 1553; died at Paris, March 27, 1615. Daughter of Henry II. and Catherine de' Medici. She married Henry of Navarre (later Henry IV. of France) Aug. 18, 1572. The marriage was the precursor of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. Henry fled from the court, and Margaret did not rejoin him until 1578. In 1582 she abandoned him, later rejoined him, and was divorced in 1599. In her last years she became a patroness of science and literature. Her "Mémoires" were published in 1628.

Margaret Beaufort. See Beaufort.

Margaret Tudor. Born at Westminster, Nov. 29, 1489; died at Methven Castle, Scotland, Oct. 18, 1541. Queen of James IV. of Scotland, and eldest daughter of Henry VII. of England. She was married at Holyrood, Aug. 8, 1503. Dunbar wrote a poem on the occasion, and was her constant attendant. Her fourth child (later James V.) was born April 10, 1512. James IV. was killed at Flodden, 1513. On Aug. 6, 1514, she married Archibald Douglas, sixth earl of Angus, and on Oct. 8, 1515, gave birth to Margaret Douglas, later countess of Lenox and mother of Lord Darnley. She was divorced March 11, 1527, and in March, 1528, acknowledged her marriage with Henry Stewart, created Lord Methven by James V.

Maria Stuart. A tragedy by Schiller, founded on the fortunes of Mary Queen of Scots, published in 1801.

The technical qualities of "Maria Stuart" are of the highest order, but the subject does not seem to have interested Schiller very deeply. Encyc. Brit.

Maria Theresa (mā-rē'ā te-rē'sā). Born Sept. 10, 1638; died at Versailles, France, July 30, 1683. Queen consort of Louis XIV. of France. She was the daughter of Philip IV. of Spain, and married Louis XIV. in 1660. She is frequently called Maria Theresa of Austria (i. e., of the house of Austria or Hapsburg).

Maria Theresa (or Theresia). Born at Vienna, May 13, 1717; died at Vienna, Nov. 29, 1780. Archduchess of Austria and queen of Hungary and Bohemia, daughter of the emperor Charles VI. She married Francis of Lorraine in 1736, and on the death of her father in 1740 succeeded to the hereditary possessions of the house of Austria by virtue of the Pragmatic sanction. Her title being disputed, she became involved in the War of the Austrian Succession, which, with the exception of some unimportant cessions, including that of Silesia to Prussia, left her in the possession of her inheritance. Her husband was elected emperor as Francis I. in 1745. Her desire to recover Silesia led to the Seven Years' War (1756-63), which, however, ended in a confirmation of the cession. She made her son Joseph II. co-regent in 1765. See Pragmatic Sanction; Austrian Succession, War of; and Seven Years' War.

Marianne (mār-yān'), La. A French republican secret society which was formed to overturn the government instituted by the coup d'état of 1851. It received orders from the society in London of which Ledru-Rollin and Mazzini were members. One of its passwords was "Connaissez-vous Marianne?" and the answer was "De la montagne." In 1854 the government arrested many members of the society, and punished them by longer or shorter terms of imprisonment. Also called, in English, Mary Ann.

Marianne, ou les Aventures de la Comtesse de. . . . A novel by Marivaux, published in eleven volumes 1731-41.

Marianne has been said to be the origin of "Pamela," which is not exactly the fact. But it is certain that it is a remarkable novel, and that it, rather than the plays, gave rise to the singular phrase "Marivaudage," with which the author, not at all voluntarily, has enriched literature. The plot is simple enough. A poor but virtuous girl has adventures and recounts them, and the manner of recounting is extremely original. A morally faulty but intellectually admirable contemporary, Crébillon the younger, described this manner excellently by saying that the characters not only say everything that they have done and everything that they have thought, but everything that they would have liked to think but did not. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 418.

Marianne Islands. See Ladrone Islands.

Marias (mā-rē'ās), Las Tres. [Sp., 'the three Marias.'] A group of three small islands in the Pacific, west of Mexico, about lat. 21° 30' N., long. 106° 30' W.

The castle of the Teutonic Order, the finest medieval secular monument in Germany, was founded in 1274 as an outpost against the heathen Prussians, and soon became the seat of the grand master. In 1335 the Mittelschloss was added. The Hochschloss, next the town, incloses a quadrangle surrounded by beautiful cloisters, and includes the Marienkirche, a fine pointed church with admirable sculpture. The Mittelschloss also incloses a quadrangle, and measures about 300 by 270 feet. It contains the residence of the grand master and the state apartments. The splendid vaulting of the great hall is supported by a single column 38 feet high and only 10 inches thick. The assembly hall is also admirably vaulted, and has 3 slender central columns. The Vorburg, the third division of the castle, constituting the outer defenses, has been in part destroyed. Marienburg was the residence of the grand masters of the Teutonic Order 1309-1457. Later it belonged to Poland. Population (1890), 9,624.

Marienwerder (mā-rē'en-ver-der). A town in the province of West Prussia, Prussia, 45 miles south by east of Dantzie. It was an ancient town of the Teutonic Order, and has a cathedral and a castle. Population (1890), 8,295.

Marietta (mā-rī-et'ā). A city, capital of Washington County, Ohio, situated at the junction of the Muskingum with the Ohio, 94 miles east-southeast of Columbus. It occupies the site of prehistoric mounds, and is the oldest town in Ohio (founded in 1788). It is the seat of Marietta College, founded in 1835. Population (1890), 8,274.

Marignolli (mä-rên-yô'l'le), Giovanni de'. An Italian traveler in China. He was sent by Pope Benedict XII, on a mission to the Khan of Cathay or China in 1338, resided several years at Peking, and returned to the papal court at Avignon in 1353. He became chaplain to the emperor Charles IV, in 1354, and was afterward appointed bishop of Bisignano. He incorporated notes of his travels in a chronicle of Bohemia which he compiled by order of the emperor.

Marihueno (mä-rê-wä-nô'). A rocky hill on the coast of Chile, fronting the bay of Arauco and a few miles north of the town of that name. The coast road passes along its side. This hill was a favorite stronghold of the Araucanian Indians, and on or near it many of the bloodiest battles of the Araucanian war were fought, especially in 1554, 1563, and 1568. A fort was built on the top of the hill by Sotomayor in 1589. Also written Marihueno.

Marinsk (mä-rê-insk'), or Marinsk (mä-rinsk'). A small town in the government of Tomsk, Siberia, situated on the Kiya about 100 miles east-southeast of Tomsk.

Marina (mä-rê'nä). Born in Goazacoalco (Mexico) about 1501; died in Mexico after 1550. A Spanish name given to the Indian woman who became the mistress of Hernando Cortés, and was a prominent character in the conquest of Mexico. She was sold as a slave to the Tshascan Indians, and was one of the girls given by them to the Spaniards in 1519; owing to her knowledge of the Mexican language, she acted as interpreter. She bore several children to Cortés. In 1524 she was married to a Spanish captain named Juan Jaramillo. The name Marina was corrupted by the Indians to Malina, to which they added the titular suffix tezi, making Malintzin. This name was also given to Cortés.

Marina (mä-rî'nä). In Shakspere's (?) "Pericles, Prince of Tyre," the daughter of Pericles and Thaisa. She was sold by perfidy as a slave at Mytilene, where Pericles found her.

Marineo (mä-rê-nä'ô). A town in the province of Palermo, Sicily, 12 miles south of Palermo. Population, commune, 9,673.

Marini (mä-rê'nô), or Marino (mä-rê'nô), Giovanni Battista. Born at Naples, Oct. 18, 1569; died at Naples, March 25, 1625. A noted Italian poet, known in France as Le Cavalier Marin. His works include "Adone" (1623), "La strage degli innocenti" ("The Massacre of the Innocents," 1633), sonnets, etc.

Giovanni Battista Marini, the celebrated innovator on classic Italian taste, and who first seduced the poets of the seventeenth century into that labored and affected style which his own richness and vivacity of imagination were so well calculated to recommend. The most whimsical comparisons, pompous and overwrought descriptions, with a species of poetical punning and research, were soon esteemed, under his authority, as beauties of the very first order. Sismond's, Lit. of the South of Europe, I. 451.

Marino (mä-rê'nô). A town in the province of Rome, Italy, 13 miles southeast of Rome. Population (1881), 6,136.

Mariño (mä-rên'yô), Santiago. Born on the island of Margarita about 1788; died at La Victoria, Sept. 4, 1854. A Venezuelan general, prominent in the war for independence. After the first defeat of the patriots he invaded eastern Venezuela with only 45 men, rapidly gained ground, and was soon master of a large territory; but the rivalry between Mariño and Bolívar prevented them from cooperating until forced to do so, and eventually led to the defeat of both. Mariño was prominent in later campaigns and at Carabobo.

Marino Faliero (mä-rê'nô fä-lê-ä'rô). A tragedy by Lord Byron, published in 1820.

Marinus (Popes). See Martin.

Mario (mä-rê'ô), Marchese di Candia. Born at Cagliari in 1812 (Grove); died Dec. 11, 1883. A celebrated Italian opera-singer. His voice was a tenor. He made his debut in 1828 as Robert le Diable, having previously sung only in the fashionable society to which his noble birth admitted him. It was not till 1846 that he took the high rank in his profession which he afterward held. He sang with Grisi for twenty-five years in London, Paris, and St. Petersburg, and married her on the dissolution of her previous marriage. He left the stage in 1867. He was considered the best lover of the operatic stage.

Marion (mar'i-on). The capital of Marion County, central Ohio. Population (1890), 8,327.

Marion (mar'i-on), Francis. Born at Winyaw, near Georgetown, S. C., 1732; died near Eutaw, S. C., Feb. 27, 1795. An American Revolutionary general, distinguished as a partisan leader in South Carolina 1780-82. He served at Eutaw Springs in 1781.

Marion Delorme (mä-rê-ôn' dè-lôrm'). A play by Victor Hugo, produced in 1831. Marion Delorme also appears in Bulwer's play "Riche-lieu."

Mariotte (mä-ryot'), Edme. Born in Burgundy about 1620; died at Paris, May 12, 1684. A noted French physicist, prior of St.-Martin-sous-

Beaune, near Dijon. He made many discoveries in hydrodynamics. His "Traité du mouvement des eaux" was published in 1736. The name "Mariotte's law" has been given to the principle (earlier discovered by Boyle) that at any given temperature the volume of a given mass of gas varies inversely as the pressure which it bears.

Mariposa (ma-rê-pô'sä). [Sp., 'butterfly': first applied to a county of California, and afterward taken for the stock name.] A county in the central part of California, east by south of San Francisco. It contains the Yosemite Valley and the Big Tree Grove.

Mariposa Grove. A grove of gigantic trees (Sequoia) in Mariposa County, California.

Mariposan (mar-i-pô'san). [From Mariposa.] A linguistic stock of North American Indians, comprising the Yokut and Cholovone divisions, which embraced about 25 small tribes. The Yokut, or southern division, formerly inhabited that portion of California which is drained by the Fresno, the upper San Joaquin above the Fresno, Kings, Kaweah, and Tule rivers; the northern, eastern, and western shores of Tulare Lake; and a narrow strip in and along the foot-hills from the middle of the western shore of the lake to Mount Pinos on the south. The Cholovone, or northern division, which was separated from the Yokuts by tribes of Moquehumian stock, occupied the east bank of the San Joaquin from the Stanislaus to the point where the former turns westward to enter Suisun Bay. In 1850 the tribes of the stock contained 2,000 to 3,000 individuals, but the number has gradually diminished until in 1890 but 167 remained. These are under the mission agency.

Marischal, Earls. See Keith.

Marisco (mä-ris'kô), or Marsh (märsh), Richard de. Died at Peterborough, May 1, 1226.

Maritime Province. See Küstenland.

Maritza (mä-rêt'sä). A river in Eastern Rumelia and European Turkey; the ancient Hebrus. It flows past Philippopolis and Adrianople, and empties into the Ægean Sea near Enos. Length, 270 miles. It is navigable in its lower course.

In 1364 the first encounter between the northern Christians and the invaders took place on the banks of the Maritza, near Adrianople, whither Louis I., king of Hungary and Poland, and the princes of Bosnia, Serbia, and Wallachia, pushed forward to put an end once for all to the rule of the Ottoman in Europe. Lala Shahn, Murad's commander-in-chief, could not muster more than half the number of troops that the Christians brought against him; but he took advantage of the state of drunken revelry in which the too confident enemy was plunged to make a sudden night attack, and the army of Hungary, heavy with sleep after its riotous festivities, was suddenly aroused by the beating of the Turkish drums and the shrill music of their flutes. The Ottomans were upon them before they could stand to arms. "They were like wild beasts scared from their lair," says the Turkish historian Sa'ud-din; "speeding from the field of fight to the waste of flight, those objects poured into the stream Maritza and were drowned." To this day the spot is called Sirf Sindighi, "Serbs' rout." Poole, Story of Turkey, p. 36.

Mariupol (mä-rê'pôly). A seaport in the government of Yekaterinoslaff, Russia, situated on the Sea of Azoff, at the mouth of the Kalmius, about lat. 47° 7' N., long. 37° 35' E. Population (1893), 19,926.

Marius (mä-rê-iüs'). A character in the novel "Les Misérables," by Victor Hugo.

Marius (mä-ri-us), Caius. Born near Arpinum, Italy, about 155 B. C.; died 86 B. C. A celebrated Roman general. He served in the Numantine war in 134; was tribune in 119, and pretor in 115; was legate under Metellus in the Jugurthine war 109-108; was consul in 107, 104, 103, 102, 101, 100, and 86; commanded against Jugurtha 107-106, and against the Cimbri and Teutones 104-101; defeated the Teutones at Aix in 102, and the Cimbri at the Raudian Fields, near Verceil, in 101; and defeated the Marsi in the Social War in 90. His rivalry with Sulla caused the first civil war in 88. He was driven from Rome in that year, but returned, and with Cinna captured Rome in 87, and proscribed the aristocrats.

Marivaux (mä-rê-vô'), Pierre Carlet de Chamberlain de. Born at Paris, Feb. 4, 1688; died Feb. 12, 1763. A French dramatist and novelist. He plays he wrote previous to 1720 were distinct failures. His best work was done between 1722 and 1746; in that time he wrote some twenty-five plays, foremost among which stand "Le jeu de l'amour et du hasard" (1730), "L'École des mœurs" (1732), "Les fausses confidences" (1736), "Le legs" (1736), and "L'Épreuve" (1740). All Marivaux's plays are more or less alike in their subject-matter. As Sainte-Beuve remarks, the various situations are effected not through outside events, but by the expression of inner feelings on the part of the different characters. Difficulties arise entirely through the fault of the lovers themselves, either in their curiosity, their timidity, their ignorance, their pride, or their pique. As a novelist Marivaux wrote "Marianne" (which see), his masterpiece; also "Le paysan parvenu" (1735) and "Tharamond, ou les folies romanesques" (1737). Marivaux's peculiar style has been named for him marivaudage. The term is now generally used in a depreciative sense. On the whole, Marivaux is original in his conceptions, and may be ranked next to Molière. He was received into the French Academy in 1743.

Mark (märk). An ancient countship of Germany, now comprised in the province of Westphalia, Prussia, in the government district of Arnsberg. The countship arose in the middle ages, and became united with Cleves about 1400. In 1666, in consequence of the contest of the Jülich succession, it passed to Brandenburg. It passed to France in 1807, and formed part of the duchy of Berg. In 1813 it was restored to Prussia.

Mark (märk), Saint. [L. Marcus, Gr. Μάρκος.] The writer to whom is assigned by tradition the authorship of the second gospel. He has been generally supposed to be identical with the "John whose surname was Mark," mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (particularly as a companion of Paul and Barnabas, and after their separation of Barnabas alone), and with the Mark whose name occurs in other passages in the New Testament (Pauline Epistles and 1 Peter). Probably the person mentioned in the Acts and the Pauline Epistles is not the same as the one named in the Epistle of Peter.

Mark, Gospel of. The second gospel, the authorship of which is traditionally assigned to Mark. It is the most original of the synoptical gospels. It has been regarded as reflecting especially the influence of Peter.

Mark, St., Basilica of. A famous Venetian basilica, founded in 830 to receive the relics of the evangelist brought from Alexandria, rebuilt in 976, and given its definitive form in 1052. It is the most famed Byzantine structure of western Europe, cruciform in plan, with five great domes on pendentives, and many smaller domes in subordinate positions. The outer aisle-atrium was added later; with its five deep, many-columned arches, repeated and fantastically canopied above, its rich mosaics, and the wonderful color of its incrustated marbles, it gives, with the domes and many pinnacles, to the exterior its picturesque and unique character. The four celebrated bronze horses in front of the upper middle arch came from Constantinople, and probably adorned originally a Roman triumphal arch. The interior, though it measures only 205 by 164 feet, is one of the most impressive in the world. Almost the whole surface of walls, domes, and arches is covered with magnificent mosaics, representing Old and New Testament scenes on a gold ground. Most of the capitals of the columns are of the finest Byzantine, though some are classical; and the roof-screen, surmounted by its long row of statues, is at once beautiful and venerable. Externally and internally, and despite regrettable restorations, St. Mark's is the most superb piece of architectural coloring in the world.

Mark. The cowardly and treacherous king of Cornwall, in Arthurian romance.

Mark appears in his more general form in the older romance as evidence that the later romance-writer found in the king's treachery some sort of palliation for what Sir Walter Scott calls the extreme ingratitude and profligacy of the hero. Caz, Pop. Romances, Int., p. 38.

Markab (mär'kab). [Heb. and Ar., usually 'a wagon' or 'a chariot,' sometimes 'a saddle.' The name is from the Alphonsine tables.] The bright second-magnitude star a Pegasi, at the base of the horse's neck.

Mark Antony. See Antony.

Markham (märk'am), Clements Robert. Born at Stillingfleet, near York, July 20, 1830. An English traveler, geographer, and historian. He served in the navy; took part in an arctic expedition 1851; traveled in Peru 1852-54; and in 1860 visited Peru and India as commissioner to introduce cinchona plants into the latter country. He was secretary of the Royal Geographical Society 1863-83, and was attached to the Abyssinian expedition of 1867-68. His works include "Travels in Peru and India" (1862), "History of the Abyssinian Expedition" (1869), "The War between Peru and Chile" (1882), "History of Peru" (1892), works on arctic exploration, etc. He has edited various reprints of works on South America for the Hakluyt Society.

Markham, Frederick. Born near Lewes, Sussex, Aug. 16, 1805; died at London, Dec. 21, 1855. An English lieutenant-general. He served as lieutenant-colonel in the Panjab campaign 1848-49. In 1854 he was made major-general, and in 1855 received the local rank of lieutenant-general. He commanded the second division before Sebastopol.

Markham, Gervase or Jervis. Born about 1568; died at London, Feb., 1637. An English author. He fought in the Low Countries and in Ireland, and was a poet and dramatist.

Markham, John. Born at Westminster, June 13, 1761; died at Naples, Feb. 13, 1827. An English admiral, the second son of William Markham, archbishop of York. In March, 1775, he entered the navy, and in 1776 joined Lord Howe in New York. He was made post-captain Jan. 3, 1783. When in Feb., 1801, Lord St. Vincent was appointed first lord of the admiralty, he made Markham a member of the board.

Markham, William. Born at Kinsale, Ireland, April, 1719; died at London, Nov. 3, 1807. Archbishop of York. He graduated at Oxford in 1742. In 1753 he became head-master of Westminster School; in 1767 dean of Christ Church, Oxford; in 1771 bishop of Chester; and in 1777 archbishop of York.

Marlborough, Dukes of. See Churchill and Spencer.

Marlborough, Sarah Jennings, Duchess of. Born near St. Albans, May 29, 1669; died (probably) at Marlborough House, Oct. 18, 1744. A celebrated favorite of Queen Anne. She married John Churchill, afterward Duke of Marlborough, in 1678. In 1683 she was appointed one of the ladies of the bedchamber to Anne, then the princess Anne, with whom she was very intimate. Her imperious nature and strong intellect for a while entirely dominated the latter, but her rule became unbearable, and she was superseded in the queen's affection by Mrs. Masham. In 1711, on the dismissal of Marlborough from office, she retired from the queen's service, and passed the rest of her life in a series of bitter quarrels. See Morley, Mrs.

Marlborough House. The London residence of the Prince of Wales. It is a large building of brick trimmed with stone, with extensive gardens fronting on the Mall. It was built for the first Duke of Marlborough by Wren in 1710.

Marlitt (mär'lit), E., pseudonym of Eugenie John. Born at Arnstadt, in Thuringia, Dec. 5, 1825; died there, June 22, 1887. A German novelist. Her father was a portrait-painter. In her seventeenth year she was sent by her foster-mother, the Princess of Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, to Vienna to receive instruction in vocal music, but became deaf and was obliged to give up a contemplated musical career. Subsequently she lived for eleven years at the court of the princess, but ultimately took up her residence in her native place. Beginning with "Die zwölf Apostel" ("The Twelve Apostles"), which was published in 1865, all her stories have first appeared in the journal "Die Gartenlaube." Other works are "Goldelse" ("Gold Elsie"), "Blaubart" ("Blue Beard"), "Das Geheimnis der alten Mamsell" ("The Old Mamsell's Secret"), all 1868, "Thüringer Erzählungen" ("Thuringian Tales," 1869), "Reichsgräfin Gisela" ("Countess Gisela," 1870), "Heideprinzesschen" ("The Moorland Princess," 1872), "Die zweite Frau" ("The Second Wife," 1874), "Im Hans des Kommerzienrats" ("In the House of the Counselor," 1877), "Im Schillingshof" (1879), etc.

Marlow, Great. See Great Marlow.

Marlow (mär'ló), Young. The son of Sir Charles Marlow in Goldsmith's "She Stoops to Conquer." He is extremely shy with women of reputation and virtue, but an impudent fellow among women of another stamp; hence Miss Hardcastle "stoops" to the disguise of a barmaid "to conquer" him.

Marlowe (mär'ló), Christopher. Born at Canterbury (baptized Feb. 26, 1564); killed in a street fight at Deptford, June 1, 1593. An English poet and dramatist, son of John Marlowe, a shoemaker of Canterbury. He graduated B. A. at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, in 1583. He may have seen some military service, but more probably settled in London at once, and attached himself to the "Lord Admiral's Company" as dramatist. Most of his plays were produced by that company. "Tamburlaine" was licensed for publication Aug. 14, 1590, and is ascribed to Marlowe on internal evidence alone. His second play, "The Tragedy of Dr. Faustus," was entered on the "Stationers' Register" Jan. 7, 1601. Twenty-three performances were given by Henslowe between 1594 and 1597, and by English companies at Graz in 1608, at Dresden in 1626, and frequently in Vienna. "The Jew of Malta" was written after 1588, and was frequently acted between 1591 and 1596, and by English companies at Passau in 1607 and Graz in 1608. On April 24, 1818, a version by S. Penley was brought out by Edmund Kean at Drury Lane. "Edward II." was entered on the "Stationers' Register" July 6, 1593. He was also concerned in "The Massacre at Paris" and "The Tragedy of Bido," and there are indications that he assisted in writing some of the earlier Shakespearian plays. He wrote two satirical paraphrases of the "Hero and Leander" of Musaeus, which was finished by George Chapman. "Come live with me and be my love" was first printed in the "Passionate Pilgrim" in 1599.

Marlowe, Owen. Born in England, Aug. 1, 1830; died at Boston, Mass., May 19, 1876. An American actor. His first stage appearance in America was in Sept., 1855. He was noted as Sir Lucius O'Trigger, Captain Hawtree, etc.

Marly-le-Roi (mär'lé'lé-rwí'). A village in the department of Seine-et-Oise, France, situated on the Seine 10 miles west of Paris. It was formerly noted for its chateau of Louis XIV. Near it is Marly-la-Machine, a hamlet noted for its hydraulic works for supplying Versailles with water. Population, 1,200.

Marmier (mär-myá'), Xavier. Born at Pontarlier, France, June 24, 1809; died Oct. 11, 1892. A French littérateur, author of travels and translator from the German. He made a journey to Scandinavia and Lapland at the expense of the government in 1836-38; was appointed professor of foreign literature at Rennes in 1839; and became librarian of the ministry of public instruction at Paris in 1841, and in 1846 custodian of the library of Sainte-Genève. He published histories of the German, Danish, and Swedish literatures, a history of Iceland, translations from the German and Scandinavian, etc.

Marmion (mär'mi-on). A narrative poem by Sir Walter Scott, published in 1808. Macready adapted it for the stage, and played it at his benefit.

Marmion, Shakerley or Shackerley. Born near Brackley, Northamptonshire, Jan., 1603; died at London, Jan., 1639. An English dramatist and poet. He wrote "Holland's Leaguer" (licensed and printed 1632), "A Fine Companion" (1633), "The Antiquary" (his best-known play; acted in 1636, printed 1641). He also wrote "Cupid and Psyche," and other poems.

Marmol (mär-mól'), José. Born in Buenos Ayres about 1818; died there, Aug. 12, 1871. An Argentine author. He was exiled by Rosas, fought against him, and was subsequently a member of Congress and director of the national library. His works include many poems and dramas, and "La Amalia," a romance of the time of Rosas, which has been translated into French and German.

Marmolejo, Alonso de Góngora. See Góngora Marmolejo.

Marmont (mär-món'), Auguste Frédéric Louis Viesse de, Duc de Raguse. Born at Châtillon-sur-Seine, France, July 20, 1774; died at Venice, March 2, 1852. A French marshal. He served with distinction in the Napoleonic campaigns, particularly at Marengo (1800) and Ulm (1805), and in the campaigns of 1809 and 1813-14; was governor-general of the Illyrian Provinces 1809-11; was defeated by Wellington at Salamanca July 22, 1812; and surrendered his army to the provisional government April, 1814. He unsuccessfully attempted to suppress the revolution of 1830. His "Mémoires" were published 1856-57.

Marmontel (mär-món-tel'), Jean François. Born at Bort, Limousin, July 11, 1733; died at Abbeville, Enre, Dec. 31, 1799. A French writer. He was brought up by the Jesuits, and destined for the church. In 1741 he was appointed substitute instructor in philosophy at Toulouse. His first piece of literary work, an ode (1743), proved a failure. Encouraged by Voltaire's sympathy, however, he came to Paris, and took several prizes in literary competition (1745-47). He wrote several tragedies, "Denys le tyran" (1748), "Arsitomène" (1749), "Cléopâtre" (1750), "Les Béracides" (1752), and "Egyptus" (1753), but his success was not great as a poet. Then he turned his attention to prose, and contributed largely to the "Encyclopédie." He recast several of his articles and published them subsequently in book form, such as his "Poétique française" (1763), and his "Éléments de littérature" (1767); this latter work places him second to La Harpe only as a propagandist of literature in the 18th century. He had already acquired renown by his "Contes moraux" (1761), his philosophical novel "Bélisaire" (1767), and his historical novel "Les Incas" (1777). He published further "La Pharsale," translated from Lucan (1761), and wrote the words for several comic operas, as "Le Huron" (1768), "Zénire et Azor" (1771), "Didon" (1783), and "Pénélope" (1785). Between 1789 and 1792 he published in "Le Mercure" a second series of "Contes moraux." His posthumous works are "Mémoires d'un père à ses enfants" (1804), and "Leçons d'un père à ses enfants sur la langue française" (1806). He was elected to the French Academy in 1763. He is a truly representative disciple of Voltaire.

Called again to the Egyptian Sudan by Gordon, he explored the Makaraka and Kordofan, and returned and wrote "Reisen in der Aequatorialprovinz und in Kordofan" (1876). In 1879 he was again with Gordon fighting the slave-traders.

Maro (mär'ró). The family name of Vergil (Publius Vergilius Maro).

Marocco. See Morocco.

Marchetti (mär-ró-ke'té). Carlo. Born at Turin, 1805; died at Paris, Jan. 4, 1868. An Italian sculptor, royal academician, and baron of the Italian kingdom. He was educated at the Lycée Napoléon at Paris, and studied sculpture with Baroo Bosio. His chief works are equestrian statues of the Duke of Orleans, the equestrian statue of Richard Cœur de Lion at Westminster, the equestrian statues of the Queen and Duke of Wellington at Glasgow, and the Inkerman monument at St. Paul's.

Maronites (mar'ó-nits). A section of the Syrian population, settled chiefly on and around Mount Lebanon, from Tripolis in the north to Tyre and the Sea of Galilee in the south. Their number is about 200,000. They live by cattle-breeding, agriculture, and silk-culture. They form a separate ecclesiastical community, having been originally Monothelites (holding that in Christ there was only one will). Since 1182 they have been gradually united to the Roman Catholic Church, but still retain some of their special privileges, as the Syrian liturgy and marriage of the lower clergy. They also consider themselves politically a separate nation, being ruled by a Christian pasha and by sheiks chosen from their aristocracy, and only paying a tribute to the Turkish government. The name Maronites is derived from an old monastery which was situated on the Orontes (modern al-Azi) between Hamah and Emesa, and was so named after a saint who lived in the 4th century (mar meaning in Syrian 'lord,' 'master,' then 'saint'; maron, my lord). Some derive it from a village, Maronea, situated east of Antioch.

Maroons (mär-rónz'). The name formerly given in Jamaica to bands of fugitive slaves and their descendants. They formed villages in the mountains in the 17th century. Early in the 18th century they became formidable under their leader, Cudjoe, attacking plantations and openly opposing government troops. In 1788 Governor Trelawney made a treaty of peace with them, securing their freedom and granting them lands. They rebelled in 1795, were partially reduced in 1796, and many of them were sent to Nova Scotia and Sierra Leone. The last outbreak of the survivors was in 1798. The name (French négres marrons) is sometimes applied to the bush negroes of Guiana.

Maros (mor'ósh). A river in Transylvania and Hungary which joins the Theiss near Szegedin. Length, about 600 miles; navigable from Karlsburg.

Maros-Vásárhely (mor'ósh-vá'sháir-hely). (G. Neumarkt (noi'márkt). The capital of the county of Maros-Torda, Transylvania, situated on the Maros in lat. 46° 28' N., long. 24° 35' E.; the chief town of the Szeklers. Population (1890), 14,212.

Marot (mä-ró'). Clément. Born at Cahors, 1497; died at Turin, 1544. A noted French poet. He was sent to Paris at an early age to study law, but the work was not to his taste, and he soon gave it up. His father had been court poet to the Queen of France, Anne de Bretagne, and through him the son obtained access to the court circles, where he won the good will of Marguerite de Valois. When Francis I. came to the throne of France in 1515, Clément Marot attracted the king's attention by his poem "Le temple de Cupidon," and was retained by him at court. The poet followed his royal patron on his expeditions, and led on the whole an eventful life. Besides a great deal of original poetry, Marot translated portions of Vergil, Ovid, and Petrarck, also 52 psalms of David. His complete works have been variously edited; the last edition from the author's lifetime is dated 1544. His modern editors are Fressnoy (1731), Rapilly (1821), Jannet (1868-72), and Guiffrey, whose work is still (1894) in course of publication.

Marozia (ma-ró'zi-ji). Died before 945. A Roman woman notorious for her profligacy and for the influence she exercised over the papal court. She was the daughter of the infamous Theodor and Theophylactus, became the mistress of Pope Sergius III., and married successively Alberic I., prince of Rome, her stepson Guido, and Hugo, king of Italy. She was instrumental in raising three popes to the throne, among whom was her son by Sergius, John XI. She was eventually imprisoned by her son Alberic. See Alberic II.

Marplot, or the Second Part of The Busy Body. A comedy by Mrs. Centlivre, produced in 1710. Henry Woodward altered it, and called it "Marplot in Lisbon." Martin Marplot is a silly, cowardly fellow, who spoils everything he undertakes. He differs somewhat from Mar-all in Dryden's play, and is the original of the more modern Paul Pry.

Marprelate Controversy, The. A vigorous and vituperative pamphlet war waged by the Puritans against the defenders of English Church discipline about 1589. The pamphlets were written by a number of persons, but were published under the name of Martin Marprelate. Udall was the originator of the controversy, but afterward announced his disapproval of the Martinist methods. The press which printed the tracts was moved from place to place to avoid government suppression, and was once seized, near Manchester, but the publications were continued. Penry, Barrow, Job Throckmorton, Fenner, John Field, and others have all been supposed to be the authors of the tracts, but some think Martin Marprelate to have been a layman about the court. The controversy was suppressed by the death of Udall in prison, and the execution of Penry and Barrow in 1593.

So great was the stir that a formal answer of great length was put forth by "T. C." (well known to be Thomas Cooper, Bishop of Winchester), entitled, "An Admonition to the People of England." The Martinists, from their invisible and shifting citadel, replied with perhaps the cleverest tract of the whole controversy, named, with deliberate quaintness, Hay any Work for Cooper? ("Have You any Work for the Cooper?" said to be an actual trade London cry). Thenceforward the mêlée of pamphlets, answers, "replies, duplies, quadruplies," became, in small space, indescribable. Petheram's prospectus of reprints (only partially carried out) enumerates twenty-six, almost all printed in the three years 1588-1596; Mr. Arber, including the preliminary works, counts some thirty.

Saintsbury, Hist. of Eng. Lit., II, 245.

Marquesas (mär-kä'säs) Islands. [So named from the Marquis of Cañete (see Hurtado de Mendoza, Garcia); F. les Marqueses.] A group of islands in the South Pacific, north of the Low Archipelago, situated about lat. 7° 50'-10° 30' S., long. 138° 30'-140° 50' W.; also called the Mendaña Islands. Nukahiva and Hivaona are the largest. The surface is mountainous. They were discovered by Mendaña in 1595, and again by Cook in 1774. In 1842 they became a French protectorate. Area, 480 square miles. Population, 5,145.

Marquette (mär-ke't'). A city and the capital of Marquette County, Michigan, situated on Lake Michigan about lat. 46° 32' N., long. 87° 26' W. It exports iron ore. Population (1890), 9,093.

Marquette, Jacques. Born at Laon, France, 1637; died near Lake Michigan, May 18, 1675. A French Jesuit missionary and explorer in America. He accompanied Joliet in his voyage down the Wisconsin and Mississippi and up the Illinois in 1673. He died while attempting to establish a mission among the Illinois. He wrote a description of the expedition of 1673, entitled "Voyage et découverte de quelques pays et nations de l'Amérique Septentrionale."

Marquez (mär'ke'th), José Arnaldo. Born about 1825; killed in the defense of Lima, Jan. 15, 1881. A Peruvian poet. He took part in the early civil wars, was several times banished, and traveled in Chile, Cuba, and the United States. In later life he occupied various consular and diplomatic positions. Marquez is regarded as the best of modern Peruvian poets, especially in the lyric style. He published a book of travels in the United States, and various other prose works.

Marquez, José Ignacio. A Colombian politician, president of New Granada for a short time in 1832, and again 1837-41. During the latter period a civil war broke out, in which Marquez was victorious, but which did great injury to the country.

Marquez, Leonardo. Born in the city of Mexico about 1820. A Mexican general, prominent under Miramon in the struggle against Juárez (1858-60). Subsequently he sustained the French intervention; was Maximilian's minister to Constantinople; returned in 1866, and undertook the defense of Mexico (April, 1867); was closely besieged by Díaz, and repeatedly defeated; and resigned on June 19, and escaped to Havana. He was accused of great cruelty, and was called "the tiger of Tacubaya," in allusion to his massacre of prisoners at that place in April, 1859.

Marquis (mär'kwis), The. 1. In early Peruvian history, Francisco Pizarro, who was created a marquis by Charles V. in 1535. There is no record of a special designation for the marquise. —2. In early Mexican history, Hernando Cortés, marquis of the Valley of Oaxaca from 1529.

Marquise (mär-kez'). A town in the department of Pas-de-Calais, France, 14 miles southwest of Calais. It has marble-quarries. Population (1891), commune, 3,511.

Marr (mär), Carl. Born at Milwaukee, Mich., 1859. An American figure-painter. He studied at Berlin and at Munich. Among his works are "The Mystery of Life" (at the Metropolitan Museum, New York), "The Flagellants" (1889), and "1806 in Germany" (1890).

Marracci (mär-rä'chē), Lodovico. Born at Lucca, Italy, 1612; died at Rome, Feb. 5, 1700. A distinguished Italian Orientalist. His most important work is an edition of the Koran with a Latin translation (1698), to which he devoted nearly forty years of labor.

Marrast (mä-rä'), Armand. Born at St.-Gaudens, France, June 5, 1801; died at Paris, March 10, 1852. A French politician and journalist. He was secretary and member of the provisional government and mayor of Paris in 1848, and president of the Constituent Assembly 1848-49.

Marriage. A novel by Miss Susan Edmonstone Ferrier, published anonymously in 1818. This novel was begun in concert with Miss Clavering, a granddaughter of the Duke of Argyll, who soon, however, relinquished her share of the work, and Miss Ferrier completed it alone.

Marriage à la Mode. [F. mariage à la mode, fashionable marriage.] 1. A play by Dryden, acted in 1673.—2. A series of six paintings by Hogarth (1745), in the National Gallery, London. The subject is the disastrous consequences of marriage, without love, in high life; and is illustrated through scenes of hollow festivity, profligacy, dueling, the execution of the victor for murder, and the suicide of the guilty wife.

Marriage à la Mode, or the Comical Lovers. A comedy by Colley Cibber, a combination of the comic scenes of Dryden's "Marriage à la Mode" and "The Maiden Queen," produced in 1707.

Marriage at Cana. 1. A painting by Paolo Veronese, in the museum at Dresden. The table is in an open court with monumental architecture. Christ is seated with a brilliant company, for the most part in Venetian dress.

2. A painting by Paolo Veronese (1563), in the Louvre, Paris. The picture measures 32 by 21 feet, and is throughout a triumph of coloring. The subject is treated as a sumptuous banquet, in a rich architectural setting. Many of the personages are portraits of sovereigns and other distinguished people of the 16th century. The musicians represent the chief Venetian painters.

3. A famous picture by Tintoret, in the sacristy of Santa Maria della Salute, Venice.

Marriage of St. Catharine. There are numerous paintings of the "Sposalizio," or Mystical Marriage of St. Catharine of Siena, thus designated. The following are the more important: (1) A masterpiece by Correggio (1519), in the Louvre, Paris. The child Christ, seated on the Virgin's knee, holds St. Catharine's ring-finger, upon which he is about to place a ring. St. Sebastian, holding his arrows, looks over St. Catharine's shoulder. (2) A painting (called the Piccolo Sposalizio) in distinction from the Louvre masterpiece) by Correggio, in the Museo Nazionale, Naples. (3) A painting by Innocenzo da Imola, in San Giacomo Maggiore, Bologna, Italy. (4) A triptych by Hans Memling (1479), in the Hospital of St. John at Bruges, Belgium. The Virgin, holding the Child, sits under a portico, attended by floating angels; St. Catharine kneels, about to receive the ring. At the sides stand the two s. s. John, St. Barbara, angels, and monks. On one wing is painted the story of Salome, on the other the vision of St. John the Evangelist. (5) A painting by Murillo, in the Church of Los Capuchinos at Cadiz. While at work on this picture, in 1682, the painter fell from his scaffolding and received injuries which caused his death. (6) A painting by Rubens, in the Church of the Augustinians at Antwerp, Belgium. The Virgin is enthroned; the Child on her knee leans toward St. Catharine, extending the ring; behind are St. Joseph, several apostles and other saints, and angels. (7) A decorative painting by Paolo Veronese, in Santa Caterina at Venice. The youthful figure of the saint is especially beautiful.

Marriage of the Virgin. 1. One of the most important paintings of Perugino, in the musée at Caen, France.—2. A celebrated painting by Raphael, in the Brera at Milan. Mary and her attendant maidens stand at the spectator's left; Joseph, bearing the flowering staff, and behind him the suitors with the barren staves, face them at the right; while the venerable high priest in the middle performs his function, and a youth in the foreground breaks his dry staff across his knee. The temple occupies the background, in the form of a domical 16-sided building with an arcaded peristyle of 16 columns.

Married Man, The. A play by Mrs. Inchbald, produced in 1789. It is taken from "Le philosophe marié" of Destouches.

Marrow Controversy. A controversy in the Church of Scotland, about 1719-22, relating to the doctrines which were of the type more recently called "evangelical," set forth in the book entitled "The Marrow of Modern Divinity" by Edward Fisher (1644). Ebenezer and Ralph Erskine and Thomas Boston were among the "Marrow men."

Marrucini (mar-ö-si'ni). In ancient geography, a people in Italy, dwelling near the Adriatic, north of Samnium. They were allied to the Marsi.

Marryat (mar'i-at), Florence. Born at Brighton in 1837. An English novelist, the daughter of Frederick Marryat. She married first Colonel Ross Church, and afterward Colonel Francis Lean. She is also known as a dramatic reader. She was editor of "London Society" 1872-76, and has published many novels, and a life of her father (1872).

Marryat (mar'i-at), Frederick. Born at London, July 10, 1792; died at Langham, Norfolk, Aug. 9, 1848. A captain in the British navy, and novelist. In 1806 he entered the navy, and in 1815 was made commander. He was serving on the St. Helena station when Napoleon died. He resigned 1830, and devoted himself to literature. He published "Frank Midshipman, or Adventures of a Naval Officer" (1829), "The King's Own" (1830), "Peter Simple" (1834), "Mr. Midshipman Easy" (1836), "Japhet in Search of a Father" (1836), "Snarleywo" (1837), "Jacob Faithful" (1834), "The Phantom Ship" (1839), "Masterman Ready" (1841), "The Children of the New Forest" (1847), "The Little Savage" (1848). He edited the "Metropolitan Magazine" from 1832 to 1835.

Mars (märz). 1. A Latin deity, identified at an early period by the Romans with the Greek Ares, with whom he originally had no connection. He was principally worshiped as the god of war, and as such bore the epithet Gravidus; but he was earlier regarded as a patron of agriculture, which procured him the title of Silvanus, and as the protector of the Roman state, in virtue of which he was called Quirinus. In works of art Mars is generally represented as of a youthful but powerful figure, armed with the helmet, shield, and spear; in other examples he is bearded and heavily armed.

2. The planet next outside the earth in the solar system. Its diameter (about 4,200 miles) is only 0.53 that of the earth, its superficies 0.28, and its volume 0.147. Its mean density is 0.71 that of the earth, so that the density of its crust may very likely be the same as the earth's; but the weight of a given mass at the surface of Mars is only three eighths of the weight of the same mass on the earth. The strength of materials is therefore relatively much greater there, and mountains, animals, and buildings would naturally be much larger. The mean distance from the sun is 141,500,000 miles. The eccentricity of its orbit is very much greater than that of the earth, being 0.093 as compared with 0.017; the inclination of its equator to its orbit is about the same. Its day is half an hour longer than ours. Its year is 687 of our days. The surface of Mars has been carefully mapped, and is characterized by the predominance of land and the great number of canals and straits. Its color is strikingly red. Its climate is, perhaps, not very different from that of the earth. It has two moons, discovered by Professor Asaph Hall in Washington in 1877, conformably to the prediction of Kepler, and realizing the fancies of Swift and Voltaire. The inner of these, Phobos, revolves in less than eight hours, so that to an observer on the planet it rises in the west and sets in the east; the outer, Deimos, revolves in thirty hours, so that it appears nearly stationary for a long time. The symbol of Mars is ♃, which seems to show the shield and spear of the god.

Mars in Repose. A colossal Greek statue of the school of Lysippus, in the Villa Ludovisi, Rome. The god, in the guise of a strong, healthy youth, sits quietly with both hands on one raised knee; he holds his sheathed sword, and his round shield stands beside him. An Eros sits at his feet.

Mars, Hill of. See Areopagus.

Mars (märs), Mlle. (Anne Françoise Hippolyte Mars-Boutet). Born at Paris, Feb. 9, 1779; died there, March 20, 1847. A celebrated French actress, distinguished in comedy. She made her début at the age of 14 at the Théâtre Feydeau, and shortly after entered the Comédie Française. She made her first great success in "L'Abbé de l'Épée" in 1803, and later worked a great reform in stage costume, playing her parts in dress of a proper date. Her manner in high comedy was perfectly simple and true, and she was unequalled in the précieuses and coquettes of Molière and Marivaux. She left the stage in 1841 with a large fortune.

Mar Saba (mär sä'bä). A monastery of the Greek Church, situated in the Kedron valley 34 miles distant from Jerusalem. It derives its name from the founder, St. Sabas, who was born in Cappadocia about 439, and died 532.

Marsala (mär-säl'lä). A seaport in the province of Trapani, Sicily, situated in lat. 37° 07' N., long. 12° 26' E. It occupies part of the site of the ancient Lilybæum, is a cathedral city, and has an export trade in wine. Garibaldi landed here in 1860. Population (1881), 19,732.

Marschner (märsh'ner), Heinrich. Born at Zittau, Saxony, Aug. 16, 1795; died at Hannover, Dec. 14, 1861. A noted German composer. He was joint kapellmeister with Weber and Morlacchi of the opera at Dresden (1823-26), kapellmeister of the Leipzig theater (1827-31), and court kapellmeister at Hannover after the last date. He was the author of the operas "Der Vampyr" (1828), "Hans Heiling" (1833), etc.

Marsden (märz'den), William. Born at Verval, Ireland, Nov. 16, 1754; died near London, Oct. 6, 1836. An English Orientalist and numismatist. He received an appointment in the service of the East India Company at Sumatra in 1771. In 1785 he returned and established an East India agency in Gower street, London. In 1804 he was made first secretary of the admiralty. His chief works are "History of Sumatra" (1783), "Dictionary and Grammar of the Malayan Language" (1812), "Numismata illustrata orientalia" (1823-1825). He presented his collection of 3,447 Oriental coins to the British Museum.

Marsdiep (märs-dēp'). A strait in the Netherlands, separating the island of Texel from the mainland.

Marseillaise, La (lä mär-se-yäz'). A popular French patriotic song. The words and music are by Claude Joseph Rouget de Lisle, a captain of engineers, and were composed at Strasburg in a fit of enthusiasm on the night of April 24, 1792. It was first called "Chant de guerre pour l'armée du Rhin."

The "Chant de guerre" was sung in Dietrich's [the mayor's] house on April 25, copied and arranged for a military band on the following day, and performed by the band of the Garde Nationale at a review on Sunday, the 29th. On June 25 a singer named Mireur sang it at a civic banquet at Marseilles with so much effect that it was immediately printed and distributed to the volunteers of the battalion just starting for Paris. They entered Paris on July 30, singing their new hymn; and with it on their lips they marched to the attack on the Tuilleries on August 10, 1792. From that day the "Chant de guerre pour l'armée du Rhin" was called "Chanson" or "Chant des Marseillais," and finally "La Marseillaise." The "Marseillaise" has often been made use of by composers. Of these, two may be cited: Salieri, in the opening chorus of his opera "Palmyra" (1795), and Grison, in the introduction to the oratorio "Esther" (still in MS.), both evidently international. Schumann uses it in his song of the "Two Grenadiers" with magnificent effect; and also introduces it in his overture to "Hermann und Dorothea."

Grove, Dict. of Music, II, 220.

Marseilles (mär-sälz'), F. Marseille (mär-säy'). [L. Massilia, Gr. Μαγνησία.] The capital of the department of Bouches-du-Rhône, France, situated on the Mediterranean in lat. 43° 18' N., long. 5° 24' E. It is the third city and the principal seaport of France, and also the chief seaport of the Mediterranean. In Europe it ranks after London, Liverpool, and Hamburg. Its commerce is with Africa, Italy, the Levant, the Indies, etc. It is the terminus of the Messageries Maritimes and other steamer lines. Its especial trade is in grain, coffee, hides, silk, wool, and oil-seeds. The leading manufacture is soap. It has a large artificial harbor. The chief promenade is the Prado. Among its notable buildings are the Museum of Fine Arts, the bourse, the Palais de Justice, and the cathedral, a modern building by Vandoyer, in a modified Byzantine style, built in alternate courses of dark and light stone. The Palais de Longchamp is a fine modern Renaissance building, forming a monumental termination to the great Durance aqueduct. It consists of two wings which contain the museums of painting and natural history, and are connected by a colonnade with a central pavilion from which issues a beautiful fountain in the form of a cascade. The city was founded by Greek colonists from Phœacia about 600 B. C.; became an important colonizing and commercial center in southern Gaul; was destroyed by the Saracens, and rebuilt; was ruled by viscounts; was independent for a short time in the 13th century; was deprived of its freedom by the counts of Provence; was united to France in 1413; had its privileges taken away in 1660; was punished for its royalist principles in the Revolution; and was noted in 1792 for the march of its volunteers to Paris with the "Marseillaise" (which see). It has frequently suffered from epidemics. It was the birthplace of Thiers. Population (1891), 403,749.

Marsh (märsh), or de Marisco, Adam. Born probably in Somerset; died about 1257. A learned English Franciscan monk. He was educated at Oxford, and later taught in the Franciscan school there. He was an intimate friend of Grosseteste and Simon de Montfort.

Friar Roger Bacon, a writer by no means inclined to flatter the members of his own order, can hardly find words strong enough to express his admiration of his friend Adam Marsh. In one passage he classes him with Solomon, Aristotle, Avicenna, and Grosseteste as "perfect in all knowledge"; in another he describes Grosseteste and Marsh as "the greatest clerks of the world, and men perfect in knowledge divine and human." Some of the letters of "the Illustrious Doctor," as Marsh was formerly styled, have been preserved, and, if they scarcely warrant the high encomium of Bacon, they are at least interesting records of an unselfish and honorable life. The Oxford friar had as his two chief correspondents Robert Grosseteste, the champion of the English church, and Simon de Montfort, the champion of the English people. Lytle, Oxford, p. 51.

Marsh, Mrs. (Anne Caldwell). Born in Staffordshire about 1798; died there, Oct., 1874. An English novelist. Among her works are "Two Old Men's Tales" (1846), "Emilia Wyndham" (1846 and 1888), and "Norman's Bridge."

Marsh, George Perkins. Born at Woodstock, Vt., March 15, 1801; died at Vallombrosa, Italy, July 24, 1882. An American philologist, diplomatist, and politician. He was member of Congress from Vermont 1842-49; and United States minister to Turkey 1849-53, and to Italy 1861-82. He published a "Compendious Grammar of the Old Northern or Icelandic Language" (1838), "The Camel" (1856), "Lectures on the English Language" (1861), "Origin and History of the English Language" (1862), "Man and Nature" (1864; revised as "The Earth as Modified by Human Action," 1874).

Marsh, Herbert. Born 1757; died at Peterborough, England, 1839. Bishop of Peterborough. His chief work is a translation of the "Introduction to the New Testament" by Michaelis (1792-1801).

Marsh, Othniel Charles. Born at Loekport, N. Y., Oct. 29, 1831. A distinguished American paleontologist, professor at Yale University since 1866. His special study is the extinct vertebrates of the United States. His works include "Odontornithes? a Monograph on the Extinct Toothed Birds of North America" (1880), "Dinocerata: a Monograph on an Extinct Order of Gigantic Mammals" (1883), etc.

Marshal (mär'shal), William. Born about 1146; died at Caversham, near Reading, May 14, 1219. First Earl of Pembroke and Strigul of the Marshal line, and regent of England. When King Stephen besieged John Marshal at Newbury in 1152, William was made hostage for his father at the royal court. In 1170 he was placed by Henry II. in charge of his oldest son, Henry. At the death of Henry II. he served Richard I. On Richard's death Marshal declared for John. He was present at Runnymede, June 15, 1215.

John died Oct. 19, 1216, and on Nov. 11, 1216, Marshal was chosen regent.

Marshal Forwards. A nickname of Blücher. Marshall (mär'shal). A city and the capital of Calhoun County, southern Michigan, situated on the Kalamazoo 100 miles west of Detroit. Population (1890), 3,968.

Marshall. A city and the capital of Harrison County, eastern Texas, situated about 245 miles northeast of Austin. Population (1890), 7,207.

Marshall, Humphrey. Born in Kentucky, Jan. 13, 1812; died at Louisville, Ky., March 28, 1872. An American politician and soldier. He was member of Congress from Kentucky 1849-52 and 1855-1859; United States commissioner to China 1852-53; and later a Confederate general and member of Congress.

Marshall, John. Born in Fauquier County, Va., Sept. 24, 1755; died at Philadelphia, July 6, 1835. A celebrated American jurist. He acted in the Revolutionary War; was a member of the Virginia convention to ratify the constitution in 1788; was a United States envoy to France 1797-98; was a member of Congress from Virginia 1799-1800; was secretary of state 1800-1801; and was chief justice of the United States Supreme Court 1801-35. He published a "Life of Washington" (5 vols. 1804-07), the first volume of which was published separately under the title of "A History of the American Colonies" (1824).

Marshall, John. Born at Ely, Cambridgeshire, Sept. 11, 1818; died Jan. 1, 1891. An English anatomist and surgeon. In 1838 he entered University College, London, and in 1844 was admitted a member, and on Dec. 7, 1849, a fellow, of the Royal College of Surgeons of England. He was appointed professor of surgery at University College in 1866, and of anatomy at the Royal Academy in 1873. In 1883 he became president of the Royal College of Surgeons.

Marshall, William. Flourished 1630-50. An English engraver. He engraved portraits of Donne, Milton, Shakspeare, Bacon, and Charles I. on horseback.

Marshall, William Calder. Born at Edinburgh, 1813; died June 16, 1894. A Scottish sculptor. Among his works are "Sabrina," a statue of Sir Robert Peel (in Manchester), decorations in the Houses of Parliament and St. Paul's, etc.

Marshall, Gent, William. The pseudonym under which Horace Walpole wrote "The Castle of Otranto."

Marshall Islands. An archipelago of atolls in the Pacific Ocean, under German protection since 1885, situated about lat. 5°-12° N., long. 161°-172° E. It comprises two main groups, Rakik and Ratak. They were discovered by Saavehira in 1529, and explored by Marshall and Gilbert in 1788. Area (with Brown and Providence Islands), about 150 square miles. Population, about 15,000.

Marshall Pass. A noted pass in the Cordilleras of Colorado, in the neighborhood of Gunnison. It is traversed by a railway. Height, 10,858 feet.

Marshalltown (mär'shal-toun). A city, capital of Marshall County, Iowa, situated on the Iowa River 48 miles northeast of Des Moines. Population (1890), 8,914.

Marshalsea (mär'shal-sē) Prison. A prison in Southwark, London, used latterly for debtors, and abolished in 1849. Martinus Scriblerus (măr-ti'nus skrib-lĕ'rus), Memoirs of. A satire written principally by John Arbuthnot, published in 1741. Pope and Swift were also among the contributors and members of the Scriblerus Club.

The famous Martinus Scriblerus Club, in which Pope, Swift, and Arbuthnot took the leading parts, was formed, at Pope's suggestion, for the purpose of satirizing broadly all literary incompetence. During the latest period of Pope's career the projects of Scriblerus were constantly present to the mind of that poet, and "the great and wonderful work of 'The Dunciad'" is the most celebrated of his fragmentary contributions to the labours of the club. Swift, on the other hand, was to exert himself on the creation of a satirical romance, and the first intimation which the world received of this production was a mysterious series of allusions in Pope's "Memoirs of Scriblerus," in which the four parts of Martin's Travels were rudely sketched. They were to form "very extraordinary voyages into very extraordinary nations," and to "manifest the most distinguishing marks of a philosopher, a politician, and a legislator."

Martius (măr'tĕs-ŏs), Karl Friedrich Philipp von. Born at Erlangen, April 17, 1794; died at Munich, Dec. 13, 1868. A Bavarian naturalist. From 1817 to 1820 he traveled with Spix in Brazil, under the auspices of the Bavarian government. On his return he was knighted. In 1826 he was appointed professor of botany in the University of Munich, and in 1832 conservator of the botanical garden, but resigned both positions in 1864. The results of the Brazilian expedition were published at the expense of the Bavarian government as "Reise in Brasilien" (3 vols. and atlas, 1823-31), and in a series of richly illustrated works on animals and plants, the latter by Martius. His work on palms was published from 1823 to 1850 in 3 folio volumes. He planned and edited the first volumes of the "Flora Brasiliensis" (begun in 1840), one of the greatest botanical works ever undertaken. His contributions to Brazilian ethnology are important. His minor works embrace over 160 titles.

Mártos (măr'tŏs). A town in the province of Jaen, Spain, 41 miles north-northwest of Granada. Population (1887), 16,356.

Martyn (măr'tin). Henry. Born at Truro, England, Feb. 18, 1781; died at Tokat, Armenia, Oct. 16, 1812. An English missionary. He graduated at Cambridge (St. John's College) in 1801, and became a fellow of his college in 1802. His career was suggested by reading the life of David Brainerd. He arrived at Calcutta as chaplain of the East India Company in 1806, and began to preach to the natives at Cawnpore. In 1811 he visited Persia, and in 1812 started on his return to England by way of Constantinople. He died on the way at Tokat. His "Journals and Letters" appeared in 1837. His works include "The New Testament translated into the Hindoostanee Language from the Original Greek" (1814) and "The New Testament translated into Persian" (1827).

Martyn, John. Born at London, Sept. 12, 1699; died at Chelsea, Jan. 29, 1768. An English botanist, son of Thomas Martyn, a Hamburg merchant. In 1725 he contributed the technical botanical terms to Bailey's dictionary; in 1728 issued the first edition of his "Historia plantarum rariorum"; in 1730 entered Emmanuel College, Cambridge; and in 1732 was elected professor of botany at Cambridge.

Martyr, Justin. See Justin, Saint.

Martyr, or Martir (măr'tĕr). Peter: commonly called Peter Martyr de Anghiera or Angleria. Born at Anghiera, in the state of Milan, Feb. 2, 1455; died in Granada, 1526.

An Italian courtier and historian. In 1487 he went to Spain with the Count of Tendilla, and remained in the service of Queen Isabella. In 1492 he opened a school for young nobles in Madrid; later he was tutor of the Spanish princes; and in 1501 he was sent as ambassador to Venice and Egypt. In 1524 he became a member of the Council of the Indies, and he held other public offices. "De Orbe Novo," his principal historical work, treats of the first thirty years of American discovery. His published letters are also of historical value.

Martyrdom of St. George. A picture by Paolo Veronese, over the high altar of the Church of San Giorgio in Braida, in Verona.

Martyrdom of St. Lawrence. A painting by Rubens, in the Old Pinakothek at Munich. The saint is being forced down on the gridiron by an executioner and a soldier; an attendant is putting wood on the fire, and soldiers and spectators complete the group. An angel with the martyr's crown and palm hovers above.

Martyrios mine (măr-tĕr-rĕ-ŏs mĭn). A gold-mine said to have been discovered in the interior of Brazil, in the region now embraced in northern Matto Grosso, about 1655. The knowledge of the locality, if it ever existed, was lost. Numerous expeditions were made in search of it, and these, though without the desired result, were important in other respects. Search for the mine is occasionally made even at the present day.

Martyrs, Les. [F., 'The Martyrs,'] A prose epic on the triumph of Christianity, by Châteaubriand (1809).

The unequal but remarkable prose epic of "Les Martyrs" [of Châteaubriand]. This, the story of which is laid in the time of Diocletian, shifts its scene from classical countries to Gaul, where the half-mythical heroes of the Franks appear, and then back to Greece, Rome, and Purgatory. Saintsbury, French Lit., p. 427.

Martyrs, Les. An opera by Donizetti, produced at Paris in 1840, in London as "I Martiri" in 1852: an adaptation of Donizetti's "Polinto."

Marure (mă-rŭ-ră), Alejandro. Born near Quezaltenango, 1803; died in Guatemala City, 1866. A Guatemalan politician and historian. His principal works deal with the history of Central America from 1511 to 1844.

Marvejols (măr-vzhŏl'). A town in the department of Lozère, southern France, situated on the Colagne 11 miles west-northwest of Mende. Population (1891), 4,672.

Marvel (măr'vel), Ik. The pseudonym of Donald Grant Mitchell.

Marvell (măr'vel), Andrew. Born March 31, 1621; died Aug. 18, 1678. An English poet and satirist. He graduated at Cambridge in 1638. In 1653 he became tutor of Cromwell's ward, William Dutton, and in 1657 was appointed Milton's assistant in the Latin secretaryship. He is known chiefly for his satires on Charles II. and the Stuarts, originally circulated in manuscript and collected in "Poems on Affairs of State" (1689). His most notable poem is the "Horatian Ode" to Cromwell (printed 1776). He also wrote "The Rehearsal Transposed," a successful attack on Parker for his assaults on the non-conformists (1672-73). Perhaps the most noted of his minor poems is his "Nymph Complaining" (or "The White Faun").

Marvellous Boy, The. A name given to Thomas Chatterton.

Marwar. See Jodhpur.

Marwood (măr'wid). Mrs. One of the principal characters in Congreve's comedy "The Way of the World."

Marx (mărks), Adolf Bernhard. Born at Halle, Prussia, Nov. 27, 1799; died at Berlin, May 17, 1866. A German composer and writer on music, author of "Lehre von der musikalischen Komposition" (1837-47), etc.

Marx, Karl. Born at Tross, Prussia, May 5, 1818; died at London, March 14, 1883. A German socialist. He studied jurisprudence, philosophy, and history at Bonn and Berlin, and in 1842 became editor of the "Rheinische Zeitung" at Cologne, on the suppression of which in 1813 he went to Paris, where he devoted himself to the study of sociology and political economy. He was soon expelled from France at the instance of the Prussian government, and took refuge at Brussels. On the outbreak of the revolutionary movement in Germany in 1848, he returned to Cologne, where he founded the "Neue Rheinische Zeitung." He was, however, expelled from Prussia again in 1849, and eventually settled at London, where he continued his socialistic agitation. He was the controlling spirit of the International from its foundation in 1864 to its disruption in 1872. His chief work is "Das Kapital" (1867).

Mary (mărĭ). [Heb. Miriam, Gr. María or Maria, L. Maria, F. Marie, It. Sp. Pg. G. Maria, See Miriam.] The mother of Jesus. According to the Gospel narrative, the angel Gabriel, sent from God to Mary, "a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David," told her that she was to bring forth a son, adding the explanation that the holy thing to be born of her was to be conceived of the Holy Ghost. This "annunciation" is commemorated as a church festival on March 25, which is hence known as Lady-day. In due time she gave birth to the child Jesus in a stable at Bethlehem. Very little is told in the New Testament of Mary's personal history. The doctrine of her immaculate conception and consequent sinlessness is an article of faith in the Roman Catholic Church, promulgated Dec. 8, 1854, by a bull of Pope Pius IX. which declares that from the first instant of her conception the Blessed Virgin Mary was kept free from all taint of original sin. In that church, and in the Greek Church, she is regarded as the most exalted of created beings: while angels and saints have that secondary veneration or worship paid to them which is called "dulia," she alone is entitled to "hyperdulia," and her intercession is invoked more than that of all others. She is often called "The Virgin," and in art "The Madonna."

Mary. The sister of Martha and Lazarus, resident at Bethany.

Mary I. (Mary Tudor), called "Bloody Mary." Born at Greenwich Palace, Feb. 18, 1516; died Nov. 17, 1558. Queen of England and Ireland, only surviving child of Henry VIII. and Catharine of Aragon. She was affianced first to the dauphin in 1518, and later to Charles V. in 1522. An attempt was also made to marry her to Francis I. in 1526. At the divorce of Catharine in 1533, Mary was adjudged illegitimate, but on Feb. 7, 1544, the crown was entailed upon her after Edward or any lawful child of the king. Edward VI. died July 6, 1553, and on July 13, 1553, Mary was proclaimed queen at Norwich, and crowned at Westminster Oct. 1, 1553. The council proclaimed Lady Jane Grey queen; but Mary quickly overcame opposition. She married Philip of Spain (later Philip II.) at Winchester, July 25, 1554. An insurrection headed by the Duke of Suffolk in favor of his daughter, Lady Jane Grey, and one of Kentishmen led by Sir Thomas Wyatt were suppressed early in this year. In 1555 Parliament restored the papal power, and revived the penal laws against heresy. The first martyr was burned at Smithfield, Feb. 4, 1555. After 1556 her principal adviser was Cardinal Pole. (See Pole, Reynald.) On Nov. 10, 1558, the last heretics were burned at Canterbury, the total number of martyrs during her reign being 300.

Mary II. Born at St. James's Palace, April 30, 1662; died at Kensington Palace, Dec. 28, 1694. Queen of England, Scotland, and Ireland, eldest child of James II. By the death of her younger brother, Edgar, in 1671, she became heiress presumptive to the crown, and on Nov. 4, 1677, married William, prince of Orange. In the struggle with James II. she identified herself with her husband. On Dec. 22, 1688, James II. fled to France, and on Feb. 13, 1689, William and Mary assented to the "Declaration of Right," and were crowned joint sovereigns. She took little interest in public business, and in the king's absence ruled through the council.

Mary Queen of Scots (Mary Stuart). Born in Linlithgow Palace, Dec. 7 (87), 1542; beheaded at Fotheringay, Feb. 8, 1587. Third child and only daughter of James V. of Scotland and Mary of Guise. By the death of James (Dec. 14, 1542) she became queen, and was crowned at Stirling Castle Sept. 9, 1543. On July 7, 1548, a marriage with the dauphin (Francis II.) was agreed upon. She was sent to Saint-Germain on Oct. 11, and educated with the royal children of France. They were married at Notre Dame April 24, 1558. At the death of Mary Tudor (see Mary I) on Nov. 17, 1558, Mary Stuart laid claim to the English throne, as great-granddaughter of Henry VII., on the ground of Elizabeth's illegitimacy. Francis II. succeeded Henry II. of France on July 10, 1559, and the union of the three kingdoms seemed probable: but he died Dec. 5, 1560. On Aug. 19, 1561, Mary landed at Leith. Her scheme for a marriage with Don Carlos of Spain having been thwarted, on July 29, 1565, she married Lord Darnley, son of Lady Margaret Douglas, next heir after Mary to the English throne. She labored assiduously to restore the Roman Catholic faith in her kingdom, and to establish an absolute royal authority. Her refusal to grant Darnley the crown matrimonial, and his part in the murder of Rizzio, created an estrangement which terminated in the murder of Darnley with her consent Feb. 10, 1567. She married Bothwell, the murderer of Darnley, May 15, 1567; was seized by the lords, June 15, 1567, and imprisoned in Lochleven Castle; and was compelled to abdicate in favor of her son (James VI.) in July. She escaped May 2, 1568; was defeated at the battle of Langside May 13, 1568; and fled to England. Elizabeth confined her first at Carlisle, and then in various other castles. She was removed to Fotheringay Sept. 25, 1568; tried Oct. 14-15 on the charge of conspiring against the life of Elizabeth; and beheaded Feb. 8, 1587.

Mary of Burgundy. Born at Brussels, Feb. 13, 1457; died at Brussels, March 27, 1482. Daughter of Charles the Bold. She married Maximilian (later German emperor) in 1477.

Mary of Egypt, Saint. A half-mythical African saint whose history is founded on that of a female anchorite who lived and died in a desert near the river Jordan in Palestine: she bewailed her sins there for many years, and was accidentally discovered. This is a very ancient tradition, and is supported by contemporary evidence. Many picturesque and miraculous additions have been made to her story, which in its present form is attributed to St. Jerome. She is said by him to have lived in Alexandria about the year 365, and to have far exceeded Mary Magdalene, with whom she is frequently confounded, in the infancy of her early life: they are sometimes united in pictures as joint emblems of female penitence. Mary of Egypt is distinguished by three loaves which she took to the desert with her when she repented of her sins. The earliest pictures of her are thought to be in a series on the wall of the chapel of the Barzello, Florence, and there is a celebrated picture of her by Tintoretto at the Scuola di San Rocco, Venice.

St. Mary of Egypt was early a popular saint in France, and particularly venerated by the Parisians, till eclipsed by the increasing celebrity of the Magdalene. She was styled, familiarly, La Gipsienne (the Gipsy), softened by time into La Jussienne. The street in which stood a convent of reformed women dedicated to her is still la Rue Jussienne. We find her whole story in one of the richly painted windows of the cathedral of Chartrea; and again in the "Vitraux de Bourges," where the inscription underneath is written "Segipitia."

Mrs. Jameson, Sacred and Legendary Art, I, 389.

Mary of France. Born about March, 1496; died at Westhorpe, Dec. 24, 1533. The third daughter of Henry VII. of England. On Oct. 9, 1514, she married Louis XII. of France, who died Jan. 1, 1515. She soon after married Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk; their daughter Frances was the mother of Lady Jane Grey.

Mary of Guise, or of Lorraine. Born at Barle-Duc, Nov. 22, 1515; died at Edinburgh, June 7, 1560. Queen of James V. of Scotland, and mother of Mary Queen of Scots; the eldest daughter of Claude, duke of Guise. On Aug. 4, 1534, she married Louis of Orleans, who died June 9, 1537. She married James V. of Scotland in June, 1538, and Mary Stuart was born Dec. 7 (8?), 1542. James V. died Dec. 14, 1542. On April 12, 1554, Mary was made regent of Scotland. In March, 1559, Henry II. of France sent her instructions to suppress heresy in Scotland. A conflict with Knox and the Reformers resulted in her suspension from the regency Oct. 21, 1559.

Mary of Modena. Born at Modena, Oct. 5, 1658; died at Saint-Germain, France, May 7, 1718. Queen of James II. of England, the only daughter of Alfonso IV. of Modena (Este). Her marriage with the Duke of York (James II.) was concluded at Dover, Nov. 21, 1673. The Prince of Wales (see Stuart, James Francis Edward) was born June 10, 1688 (O. S.). Her previous children had died in infancy, and rumors of substitution were immediately credited. On the invasion of England by William of Orange, she joined James II. at Saint-Germain.

Mary Barton. A novel by Mrs. Gaskell, published in 1848.

Mary de Medici. See Maria de' Medici.

Mary Magdalene (mag-da-lé'né, or as English mag'da-lén), or Magdalen (mag'da-len) (Mary of Magdala). A woman described by Luke, and mentioned elsewhere in the gospels, as a demoniae from whom seven devils had been cast out, and who was closely associated with Jesus, especially at the resurrection. She has commonly been identified, erroneously, with the woman who was "a sinner" mentioned in Luke (vii. 37-50), and also, with even less ground, with Mary of Bethany. See Magdalen.

Mary Tudor. See Mary I.

Maryborough (mā'ri-bur-ō). A seaport in Queensland, Australia, situated on the Mary River 140 miles north of Brisbane. Population (1886), 9,000.

Maryland (mer'i-land). [Named in honor of Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I.] One of the thirteen original States of the United States of America, comprised (according to the common classification) in the Southern States. Capital, Annapolis; chief city, Baltimore. It is bounded by Pennsylvania on the north, Delaware and the Atlantic on the east, Chesapeake Bay on the south, Virginia and West Virginia (separated by the Potomac) on the south and west, and West Virginia on the west. It extends from lat. 37° 53' to 39° 43' N., and from long. 75° 4' to 79° 33' W. The boundaries on the south and west are very irregular. It is divided into two parts (the eastern called the Eastern Shore) by Chesapeake Bay. It is mountainous in the west. The chief agricultural products are tobacco, Indian corn, and wheat; the leading manufactures are iron and steel, and cotton. It is noted for the production of oysters. It contains 24 counties, sends 2 senators and 6 representatives to Congress, and has 8 electoral votes. Maryland was formerly a proprietary colony under the Baltimore family (patent issued 1632; colony established at St. Mary's 1634). It had serious disputes with Claiborne in the 17th century; was noted for its religious tolerance; was governed as a royal province 1691-1716; had a boundary dispute with Pennsylvania which was settled by the establishment of "Mason and Dixon's line" about 1766; ratified the United States Constitution in 1788; was plundered by the British in 1813 and 1814; was one of the slave States; and was the scene of the battle of Antietam, and of various other engagements in the Civil War. Area, 12,210 square miles. Population (1890), 1,042,390.

Maryland! My Maryland! A song popular among the Confederates in 1861-65, written by J. R. Randall in 1861. It was sung to the college tune of "Lauriger Horatius."

Marylebone (mā'ri-le-bōn; popularly mār'li-bun). A parliamentary borough in the north-western part of London, between St. Pancras and Paddington. It returns 2 members to Parliament. Population (1891), 142,381.

Marylebone Gardens. A formerly celebrated place of entertainment in London. It consisted principally of a garden at the back of "The Rose" tavern on High street, Marylebone. It was in existence in the middle of the 17th century. It was planted with trees and had a large bowling-green. In 1738 an orchestra was added, and morning and evening performances of burletta, etc., were given. The gardens were also used for tea-drinking. Its popularity gradually died out, and about 1778 the site was built over. Beaumont street and part of Devonshire Place now cover it. The tavern was rebuilt in 1855, and the Marylebone Music Hall was built behind it. Green.

Mary-le-Bow, St. See St. Mary de Arcibus.

Maryport (mā'ri-pōrt). A seaport in Cumberland, England, situated on the Irish Sea, at the month of the Ellen, 26 miles southwest of Carlisle. Population (1891), 8,784.

Mary River Indians. See Chepenafu.

Marysville (mā'riz-vil). A city, capital of Yuba County, California, situated at the junction of the Yuba and Feather rivers, 110 miles north-northeast of San Francisco. It has a flourishing trade, and is a fruit center. Population (1890), 3,991.

Marysville Indians. See Chepenafu.

Mar Zutra (mār zō'trā). A distinguished teacher of the law (Talmud) at the Academy of Sora, and head of the Jewish community, or Prince of the Captivity (Resh-galūtha), in Babylonia, at the beginning of the 5th century.

Masa (mā'sā). An ethnic and linguistic cluster of the Central Sudan, embracing the Musgu, Makari, Logone, Mandara, Gamergu, and Batta tribes and dialects.

Masaccio (mā-sit'chō) (Tommaso Guidi; called Masaccio, 'careless Thomas?'). Born at Castello San Giovanni di Valdarno, Tuscany, Dec. 21, 1401; died at Rome (?) about 1429. A noted Italian painter, of the Florentine school, called the father of modern art, as he rescued it from mediævalism. His most celebrated works are frescos in the Brancacci chapel in the Carmine, and in Santa Maria Novella, at Florence, and several pictures now in the Berlin Museum. The frescos have been a school of instruction for all succeeding painters: even Michelangelo and Raphael have been indebted to him.

Mas a Fuera (mās ä fwā'rä). [Sp., 'more outward.'] A small island 100 miles west of Juan Fernandez.

Masai (mā-sī'), or El Moran (el-mō-rän'). An African nation occupying the vast and arid plateau between Lake Baringo and Nguru. Like their northern neighbors, the Wakwafi, they call themselves Eloikob, 'men.' They are of mixed Hamitic and Negro type, but are included by some in the Nuba-Fulah group. The young and able-bodied men lead a military life in camp, having women in common; the old men, children, and women inhabit villages and tend the cattle. The despised tribe of the Andorobo are hunters and middlemen between their proud brethren and the agricultural Bantu.

Masalit (mā-sā'lit). A Nigritic tribe of the Eastern Sudan, in Wadai and on the borders of Darfur, found in scattered independent clans who pretend they are Arabs.

Masaniello (mā-sä-nyel'lo), properly Tommaso Aniello. Born about 1622; died at Naples, July 16, 1647. A Neapolitan insurrectionist. He was a fisherman and a fruit-vender. Provoked by the loss of his scanty possessions, which were sold to pay a fine imposed on his wife for attempting to smuggle a bag of flour into the city, he headed a revolt of the populace in July, 1647, against the Duke of Arcos, Spanish viceroy of Naples, who was compelled to abolish the taxes on the necessities of life and to restore the charter of exemption granted by the emperor Charles V. He was assassinated by the adherents of the viceroy after he had given orders to his own followers to return to their occupations.

Masaniello. See Muette de Portie.

Masarwa (mā-sär'wä). See Bushman.

Mas a Tierra (mās ä te-er'rä). [Sp., 'more landward.'] Another name for Juan Fernandez.

Masaya (mā-si'ä). A town in Nicaragua, Central America, about 20 miles southeast of Managua. Population, about 12,000.

Mascagni (mäs-kän'yē), Paolo. Born at Castello, near Siena, Italy, Feb. 5, 1752; died at Florence, Oct. 19, 1815. A noted Italian anatomist. He was professor of anatomy at Siena 1774-1800, at Pisa 1800-01, and at Florence (at the hospital of Santa Maria Meora) after 1801. He is best known from his study of the lymphatics.

Mascagni, Pietro. Born at Leghorn, Dec. 7, 1863. An Italian musical composer, director of the Philharmonic Society at Cerignola. Besides various orchestral works and songs, he has written the operas "Cavalleria Rusticana," "L'Amico Fritz," and "I Rantzau."

Mascali (mäs-kä'lē). A small town in the province of Catania, Sicily, 18 miles north-northeast of Catania.

Mascara, or Maskara (mäs-kä-rä'). A fortified town in the department of Oran, Algeria, about 50 miles southeast of Oran. It became the residence of Abd-el-Kader in 1832; was burned by the French 1835; and was taken by them in 1841. Population (1891), commune, 16,482.

Mascarene (mäs-kä-rēn') Islands, or Mascarenhas (Pg. pron. mäs-kä-rēn'yās) Islands. A name given to Mauritius, Réunion (or Bourbon), and Rodriguez collectively, in the Indian Ocean; so called because Rénnion was discovered by the Portuguese navigator Mascarenhas in the 16th century.

Mascarille (mäs-kä-rēl'). An adroit ingenious unscrupulous valet who appears in three of Molière's plays: "L'Étourdi," "Le dépit amoureux," and "Les précieuses ridicules." In the last he is at his best, and assumes the rôle of a marquis to oblige his master. His name has passed into the language, and has become a synonym for skilful impudence, effrontery, lying, and intrigue.

Mascaron (mäs-kä-rōn'), Jules. Born at Aix, March, 1634; died at Agen, France, Nov. 20, 1703. A French ecclesiastic, bishop of Tulle (1671), celebrated as a pulpit orator.

Mascezel (mā-sē'zel). A brother of Gildo, who in 398 commanded a Roman army in Africa against his brother, and defeated him. See Gildo.

The fate of Mascezel, the re-vindicator of Africa, is an enigma. The version given by Zosimus is that generally accepted. He says that he returned in triumph to Italy; that Stilicho, who was secretly envious of his reputation, professed an earnest desire to advance his interests; but that when the Vandal was going forth to a suburb (probably of Milan), as he was crossing over a certain bridge with Mascezel and others in his train, at a given signal the guards crowded round the African and hustled him off into the river below. "Thereat Stilicho laughed; but the stream, hurrying the man away, caused him to perish for lack of breath." Hodgkin, Italy and her Invaders, I, 265.

Masceze. See Creek.

Maséres (mā-zär'), Francis. Born at London, Dec. 15, 1731; died at Reigate, May 19, 1824. An English mathematician, historian, and reformer. He graduated at Cambridge in 1752, and in 1758 was called to the bar. (He is introduced by Charles Lamb in his "Old Bencher of the Inner Temple.") From 1766 to 1769 he was attorney-general of Quebec, and corsitor baron of the exchequer from 1773 to 1824. Among his works are "Dissertation on the Use of the Negative Sign in Algebra" (1758), "Doctrine of Permutations and Combination" (1795), "Scriptores optici" (1823), "A View of the English Constitution" (1781), etc.

Maserfeld (mä'ser-feld). A locality, apparently near Oswestry, where, in 642, Oswald, king of Northumbria, was defeated and slain by Penda.

Masers de Latude. See Latude.

Mash (māsh). In Babylonian and Assyrian literature, the name of the great Syrian and Arabian desert which forms the southern and south-western border of the Euphrates and Tigris territory. It is considered by some to be identical with Mesha, in Gen. x. 30, and the small kingdom Mesene, on the Persian Gulf.

Masham (mash'am), Lady (Abigail Hill). Died Dec. 6, 1734. An intimate friend of Queen Anne, the daughter of Francis Hill of London. She entered the service of Lady Rivers, and afterward of her cousin the Duchess of Marlborough at St. Albans, and later became lady of the bedchamber to Queen Anne, in whose favor she at length supplanted the Duchess. In 1707 she married Samuel Masham, who was created Baron Masham in 1712. In 1711 she was given charge of the privy purse of Queen Anne. She was a woman of plain appearance, but intelligent, and very serviceable to the queen, over whom she exerted considerable influence.

Mashita (mā-shé'tä). A locality in Moab, Palestine, notable for a palace built by Khusrav II. in 620. It is a square of 730 feet a side. The walls are strengthened by semicircular towers, and the interior contains spacious courts, a series of vaulted halls, and a triangular hall which was covered by a dome on pendentives. The chief façade, almost 200 feet long, displays a square doorway between polygonal towers. Though never finished, this façade is remarkable for its decoration of zig-zags, rosettes, pediments, etc., all sculptured with diaper-work of vines and foliage combined with birds and animals, as delicate in execution as the ornament of the Alhambra.

Mashonaland (ma-shō'nä-land or mā-shō'nä-land). [Named after the Mashona tribe, which is subject to the Matabele.] A high, salubrious, and gold-bearing country between the Matabele and the Zambesi. Formerly considered Portuguese, it was annexed by England in 1888 and placed under the British South Africa Company in 1889. The pioneer expedition reached Mount Hampden in 1890. In 1893 the white population numbered 3,000, of whom 1,500 were able-bodied men. Salisbury, the capital, had a bank, hospital, churches, newspapers, etc., and the townships Victoria, Hartley Hill, and Untali were rising centers. The railroad from Beira was building. For interesting ruins there, see Zimbabwe.

Massachusetts (mas-a-chö'set). [Native; at the great hills, i. e. the Blue Hills of Milton.] A tribe or undefined confederacy of North American Indians, formerly living about Massachusetts Bay from Plymouth to Salem (including the basins of the Neponset and Charles rivers). Their number was much reduced by pestilence in 1617. About 1650 they were gathered into the villages of the Praying Indians, and lost their tribal autonomy. See Algonquian.

Massachusetts (mas-a-chö'sets). [From the Massachusetts Indians.] One of the New England States, and one of the thirteen original States of the United States of America. Capital, Boston. It is bounded by Vermont and New Hampshire on the north, the Atlantic on the east, the Atlantic, Rhode Island, and Connecticut on the south, and New York on the west. It extends from lat. 41° 14' to 42° 53' N., and from long. 69° 53' to 73° 32' W. The surface is generally hilly (Taconic and Hoosac ranges in the west), but is low in the southeast. The chief rivers are the Connecticut, Housatonic, Merrimac, and Charles. The leading occupations are commerce, manufactures, and fisheries. It is the first State in the manufacture of boots and shoes and of cotton and woolen goods. Massachusetts contains 14 counties, sends 2 senators and 13 representatives to Congress, and has 15 electoral votes. It was explored by Gosnold in 1602, and by John Smith in 1614, and was settled by the English (by the Pilgrims at Plymouth in 1620, and by the Puritans at Salem in 1628 and at Boston in 1630). The confederate union of the Massachusetts, Plymouth, New Haven, and Connecticut colonies existed from 1643 to 1684. King Philip's war took place in 1675-76; the union with Plymouth Colony in 1691; the Salem "witchcraft" trials in 1692. The State took an important part in the colonial wars, and in the resistance to British oppression; and was the scene of the outbreak of the Revolution in 1775; and was the scene of Shays's Rebellion in 1786-87. Called the "Old Bay State." Area, 8,315 square miles. Population (1890), 2,238,943.

Massachusetts Bay. A colony founded at Salem, Massachusetts, in 1628, under John Endicott, and greatly increased in 1630 by the arrival of a large force under Winthrop. Its capital was removed to Boston. The Plymouth Colony was in 1691 incorporated with it.

Massachusetts Bay Company. A colonizing company chartered in 1629, and growing out of the Dorchester Company. Its immediate cause was the danger to political and religious freedom in England under Charles I. Endicott was the first local governor. In 1630 Winthrop, as the new governor, conducted a large expedition, which founded Boston.
