

THE LIBRARY
OF
THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
LOS ANGELES

REFERENCE DEPARTMENT,
THE NATIONAL UNION,
6 JUN. 93
CLERICAL LIBRARY.

INDIAN MUTINY

OF

1857-8.

KAYE'S AND MALLESON'S HISTORY

OF THE

INDIAN MUTINY

OF

1857-8.

EDITED BY COLONEL MALLESON, C.S.I.

VOL. IV.

BY COLONEL MALLESON, C.S.I.

CABINET EDITION.

LONDON:

W. H. ALLEN & CO., 13, WATERLOO PLACE.

1889.

[All Rights reserved.]

LONDON :

PRINTED BY T. BRETTELL AND CO., RUPERT STREET, HAYMARKET W.

478
K18
188
29

IN THE HOPE THAT THIS BOOK MAY LIVE,
I DEDICATE IT

TO THE MEMORY OF MY BROTHER-IN-LAW,

Quintin Batty,

OF THE CORPS OF GUIDES,

ONE OF THE FIRST OF THE MANY GALLANT MEN WHO GAVE THEIR LIVES FOR THEIR COUNTRY ON THE RIDGE BEFORE DELHI.

THE WORDS WHICH HE UTTERED, WHEN, ON THE 9TH JUNE, 1857, HE RECEIVED THE WOUND WHICH HE KNEW TO BE MORTAL,

DULCE ET DECORUM EST PRO PATRIA MORI,

WERE CHERISHED

AS A MOST PRECIOUS INHERITANCE BY HIS BROTHER,

Wigram Batty,

WHO, ENTERING THE SERVICE AFTER HIS DEATH, WAS APPOINTED TO THE SAME REGIMENT, THE CORPS OF GUIDES, AND BY UNFLINCHING GALLANTRY AND DEVOTION WON FROM THE STERN FRONTIER MEN WHO COMPOSED IT THE ESTEEM AND AFFECTION

WHICH THEY HAD BORNE TO QUINTIN.

FOLLOWING THROUGHOUT HIS NOBLE LIFE

IN THE FOOTSTEPS OF HIS BROTHER,

HE EMULATED HIM IN THE MANNER OF HIS DEATH, FOR HE TOO DIED LEADING THE GUIDES IN A GALLANT CHARGE AGAINST THE ENEMIES OF ENGLAND,

AT FATHABAD, NEAR JALLALABAD, THE 2ND APRIL, 1879.

SIMILAR AS WAS THEIR LIFE,

SIMILAR AS WAS THEIR DEATH,

I WOULD NOT SEPARATE IN THIS DEDICATION
THE TWO GALLANT BROTHERS.

PAR NOBILE FRATRUM.

11852

PREFACE TO THE FOURTH VOLUME.

THE present volume narrates the story of the storming of Dehlí, the subsequent clearing of the country in the vicinity of that city, and the march to Agra and Kánhpúr. It proceeds then to deal with Sir Colin Campbell's journey from Calcutta to Kánhpúr; his relief of the garrison of Lakhnao; and his safe escort of the women and children of that garrison to Kánhpúr. It devotes then a chapter to the attack of the Gwáliár contingent on that central point, and to Windham's consequent action; another, to Colin Campbell's reply to their daring aggression. Narrating, then, the movements of the several columns of Walpole and Seaton, and of the main body under Sir Colin, in the North-West; the action of the Nipál troops under Jang Bahádur; and of the columns under Rowcroft and Franks in the Ázamgarh district and in eastern Oudh; it proceeds to describe the four months' defence of the Álambágh by the illustrious Outram; then, the last movements which preceded Sir Colin's attack on Lakhnao; then, the storming of that city. From this point the narrative returns to the Bengal Presidency proper, and describes the outbreaks in eastern Bengal, in eastern Bihár, in Chutiá Nagpúr, and their repression; deals then with the difficulties caused mainly by the suicidal action of the Government in western Bihár; gives in full detail the splendid action of Lord Mark Kerr in the relief of Ázamgarh, one of the two instances* on record in which a surprised army defeated the surprisers; proceeds then to the campaign of Lugard, Douglas, and their lieutenants, against Kunwar Singh and his brother Amar Singh, in western Bihár; describes the gallantry of Middleton, and the fertility of resource of, and striking success achieved by, Sir Henry Havelock.

* The other was that of Clive at Káverípák, February 23, 1752.

Returning to the North-West, it describes the campaigns in Rohilkhand and north-western Oudh, detailing the skilful movements of Hope Grant, of John Coke, and of Jones; the fatal incapacity of Walpole; the useless sacrifice of life before Ruiyá, culminating in the death of Adrian Hope; the gallantry of Ross-Graves, of Cafe, of Willoughby, of Cureton, of Sam Browne, of Hanna, and of many others; the all but successful daring and the death of the famous Maulaví; and the untimely end of Venables and of the great William Peel. The last chapter deals with the manner in which George St. Patrick Lawrence, one of four noble brothers, succeeded, amid great difficulties, in retaining British hold upon Rájputáná.

In the preface to the first edition to this volume, published nearly ten years ago (August 1879), I acknowledged the generous reception which its immediate predecessor had met with both in this country, in the Colonies, and in America. "It was not possible," I added, "writing of events, many actors in which survive, and to some of whom a record of their performances cannot be palatable, that I should absolutely escape hostile criticism." But the reception accorded to that volume did not surpass the welcome which the same generous public gave to that of which the present volume is something more than a reprint. Large as was the edition printed, within three weeks I was called upon to prepare a second, and I am informed that the demand for it has continued to the present day.

This new edition has been thoroughly revised. I have not only gone through it step by step with the original authorities, but I have compared the text with the information I have received since its first publication from several actors in the drama. In this way I have acquired additional information of a valuable character. The whole of this has been carefully utilised. I have, in consequence, not only made additions to the original text, but have re-written several portions of it. The result of the fresh information I have received has been, in almost every instance, to confirm the opinions regarding individuals recorded in the original edition. With respect to Hodson of Hodson's Horse, whilst I still hold to the views previously expressed, I have thought it only fair to the memory of that great soldier to present the other side of the shield. A distinguished officer who served throughout the siege of Dehli, to whom I communicated my intention in this respect, thus wrote in reply: "I am glad to read what you tell me about Hodson's case. I can never understand why the other side should always make him out such a bloodthirsty character. We may have heard other things against his character; but I don't remember that at the time he was looked upon by us as more bloodthirsty than any one else. It should be remembered that it was a fight without quarter; there was no love lost on one side or the other. His shooting of the princes (who, if brought in alive at the time, were as safe to have been hung or shot as when I saw their dead bodies lying in front of the Kotwálí), must, to say the least of it, have removed, very considerably, any chance of rising among thousands of discontented ruffians then around us."

I have dealt with this last argument in the text. It is unnecessary, therefore, to repeat it here. It would seem that, whilst the general consensus of opinion outside the camp of the force which assailed Dehlí was, and is, against Hodson in the matter of the slaughter of the princes, his comrades on the spot saw in the deed only an additional security for a small body of men occupying but half of the city, the defences of which had been stormed with great loss of life.

I wish to say, before I conclude, that no one is so thoroughly aware as I am of the many imperfections and shortcomings of this volume. Distant myself from the scene of action, for I was at Calcutta attached to the Audit department of the Government of India throughout the period of the Mutiny, I have had but one desire, and that has been, to tell the truth, the whole truth, without respect of persons. I believe I have succeeded in unearthing some gallant deeds which no previous writer had recorded; which had not even found their way into the despatches; and, by dint of earnest and patient inquiry, accompanied by much sifting of evidence, I have also been able, in some instances, to transfer the credit for a gallant achievement from the wrong to the right man. How difficult this is, no one can know who has not attempted the task. I recollect well, that just before the first edition of this volume appeared, whilst, in fact, I was engaged in examining the last proofs in galleys, I met in the street a distinguished actor in the scenes I had attempted to describe. He asked me when the volume would appear. I replied that it was on the eve of publication, and I should be greatly pleased if he would come to my rooms and read the chapter in which his own gallant achievements were specially recorded. He acceded at once to the request, came to my rooms, and sat down to read the sheets, having first asked my permission to make pencil notes in the margin. He sat reading six hours that day and two of the day following. He then handed back the sheets, expressing his general approval, but adding that I should find in the margin a few notes which might be useful. When he had left me I looked at the notes. The chapter was one in which I had taken all the pains in my power to unearth the deeds of brave men. The reader will imagine my surprise when, on looking at the notes written by my visitor in the margin, I saw attached to my description of every one of the gallant deeds enumerated, these words: "This is a mistake: I did this." For the contention to have been true my visitor must have been ubiquitous, for some of the deeds occurred on different parts of the field, almost at the same moment. Yet my visitor was an officer of the highest character, a great stickler for truth, and who would not knowingly have deviated from the straight line for a moment. But his imagination had overpowered him. The campaigns of 1857-8 had been the great event of his life. By degrees he had come to regard them as the only event. And, his mind constantly dwelling on the subject, he had come to regard himself as the only actor. This, I admit, is the worst case I met with; but I have had other experiences almost as curious.

Perhaps the reader will pardon me if I mention another fact personal to myself, which may perhaps serve to point a moral. Stationed as I have said, at Calcutta in 1857, I had viewed with the greatest indignation the tardy measures of repression adopted by the Government early in that year. I had but recently come down from Kánhpúr, where, as officer in charge of the commissariat department, I had witnessed the dissatisfaction of the sipáhis of the regiments there stationed, when, in the dead of night, Sir James Outram crossed the Ganges for the purpose of annexing Oudh. I stated, at the time, to the authorities all I had seen, and when the outbreak took place at Barhám-púr I did my best in my small way—for I was still only a subaltern—to convince them that the disaffection was general. But, apparently deaf to evidence, they pursued their own course, in the manner I have attempted to describe in the third volume. I kept my indignation within bounds until Lord Canning went down to the Legislative Council, and in two hours passed a Gagging Act for the press. Regarding this as a deliberate attempt to prevent the truth, hitherto well set forth by the Calcutta newspapers, from reaching England, I sat down to write a true record of the proceedings and events. A portion of this record appeared in England in, I think, August of the same year, in the form of a pamphlet, entitled, "The Mutiny of the Bengal Army." This pamphlet at once attracted attention; was quoted by the late Lord Derby in the House of Lords; and obtained, on that occasion, the name of the "Red Pamphlet," by which it is still remembered. I completed it up to the fall of Dehli the same year, and the second part had a sale almost equal to the first. I could not carry it on further because I was wrecked off the coast of Ceylon in February 1858, and lost all the materials I had collected. It happened that, many years later, in 1871, I made the acquaintance of the late Sir John Kaye. We speedily became intimate, and we had many discussions over the events of 1857-8. One day he told me that when my "Red Pamphlet" had appeared he had regarded it with horror; and that one of the secret objects he had in his mind when he undertook to write the history of the Mutiny, was to prove that the "Red Pamphlet was not to be trusted. "But," he added, "having since gone over the same ground, I am bound to tell you, that, however I may still differ from some of your conclusions, I have found your facts accurate throughout, and I shall state the fact in my preface to my third volume." I returned to India the following year, and I suppose Sir John forgot his intention, for in his third volume the promised testimony did not appear. I only mention it here to show how the truth of my narrative forced conviction even upon the mind of a man deeply prejudiced against my book the moment he himself had occasion to examine the sources whence its statements had been derived.

The sons of Great Britain have, during the building up of their vast and magnificent empire, accomplished wonders. But of all the marvels they have achieved there is not one that can compare with the re-conquest, with small means, of the great inheritance which had suddenly, as if by the wave of a magician's wand, slipped from their grasp. They were called upon at a moment's notice, without any previous warning, that is rather, without any symptom which their clouded vision would accept as a warning, to attempt, on the instant, a task which it had taken the valour of Clive, the sagacity of Warren

Hastings, and the genius of Wellesley, half a century to accomplish. Not for a second did they flinch from the seemingly unequal struggle. They held out, they persevered, they pressed forward, they wore down their enemies, and they won. It was the greatest achievement the world has ever seen.

How did they do it? The one ambition of my life yet remaining to me is to answer that question; to tell who really were the men who thus conquered the impossible. I have spared no pains to relate the story clearly, truly, and without favour. Proud of being an Englishman, I desire to place on a record that shall be permanent the great deeds of my countrymen. Lord Beaconsfield never wrote more truly than when he said that everything depends on "race." Other races have accomplished great things under exceptional circumstances. They have been aided by the genius of their leader, by the inferiority of their opponents, by a combination of events in their favour. But the race which inhabits these islands has known how to triumph, not only unaided, but when heavily handicapped by Fortune. It has triumphed, often despite the mediocrity of its leaders; despite enormous superiority of numbers against it; and when circumstances around seemed combined to overwhelm its representatives. As these have triumphed before, so will they triumph again. Their invincibility is due to the fact that, never knowing when they are beaten, they persevere long after the period when races, less persistent, would have abandoned the contest in sheer despair.

G. B. MALLESON.

27, West Cromwell Road.

May 1st, 1889.

LIST AND SHORT DESCRIPTION OF PLACES MENTIONED IN THIS, AND NOT DESCRIBED IN THE PRECEDING VOLUME.

ÁLAMBÁGH, The, is a garden in the suburbs of Lakhnao, literally "The Garden of the World," within an enclosure of 500 square yards. There is a building within the garden, containing many rooms in the second story. The Álambágh was built by the last King of Oudh, Wájid Álí, as an occasional residence for a favourite wife. Within the garden is Sir Henry Havelock's tomb, surmounted by an obelisk with an inscription written by his widow. The place commands the road from Lakhnao to Kánhpúr.

BIHÁR, EASTERN, a division of Bihár, called also, from its chief station, Bhálgalpúr, on both sides of the Ganges, between western Bihár and Bengal proper, with an area of 20,492 square miles and a population of eight millions. It comprises the districts of Munger, Bhálgalpúr, Púrniá, the Santal Parganahs, and Rajmahall.

CHAIBÁSÁ, the capital of the Kolhán, or Land of the Kóls, in the Singhbhúm district of Chutiá Nágpúr (the south-west frontier agency). It has a population of 6,000, but at its annual fair, which is famous, and held at Christmas time, upwards of 20,000 pilgrims are present. It lies on the right bank of the River Roro.

CHATR MANZIL, The, a handsome building in Lakhnao, lies to the north-east of the gaol, on the west bank of the Gúmtí. It was built by Násiru 'd dín. In 1857 it was surrounded by a high brick wall, which has since disappeared.

CHATRÁ, a town and municipality in the Chutiá Nágpúr district.

CHUTIÁ NÁGPUR, a mountainous district lying between Southern Bihár, Western Bengal, Orisá, and the Central Provinces. It is called Chutiá Nágpur from Chutiá, near Ranchí, the residence of the Rájahs of Nágpur. It is chiefly inhabited by aboriginal tribes, such as the Kols, Oraons, Mundás, Bhúmij, and Korwás. It contains the districts of Hazáribágh, with an area of 7021 square miles; of Lobárdágá, with 11,404; of Singlbhúm, with 4503; of Mánbhúm, with 4921; and of tributary Mahalls (districts), with 12,881 square miles. The highest summit of the mountainous range is attained at Parisnáth, 4500 feet above the sea. The chief towns are Hazáribágh, Ránchí, Chaibásá, Parúliá, and Palamáu.

CHITRAGÁON, incorrectly spelt Chittagong, is a hilly division in eastern Bengal, between the Phení and Náp rivers. It comprises the districts of Chitragáon (called Islámábád by the Emperor Aurangzíb), of Noákhálí, or Bhaluá, and of Tiparah and Hill Tiparah. The district of Chitragáon is bounded to the west by the sea.

DHÁKAH, strangely called Dacca by the early settlers, despite the fact that there is no letter "c," except in combination with an "h," in the language of the country of which it is a town, derives its name from Dhák, the Butea frondosa. It lies on the Vurí Gangá river, and is the chief town of the district and division of the same name. The division is bounded on the north by the Gáro hills, on the east by the Silhat district and Hill Tiparah, on the south by the Noákhálí district and the Bay of Bengal, and on the west by the Jasar, Patná, Bogará, and Rangpúr districts.

DÁRJÍLING, a mountain sanitarium in the division of Koch Bihár, near Sikkim. The sanitarium lies about 7000 feet above the sea. The distance from Calcutta is 246 miles, the whole of which can be travelled on a rail and steam-tramway.

DILKUSHÁ, The, literally "the heart-expanding; the exhilarating," is a villa outside the city of Lakhnao, built by Saadat Alí Khán, in the centre of an extensive deer-park. It stands about three-quarters of a mile S.S.E. of the Martinière. The building is now used as a hospital.

FARHAT BAKSH PALACE, the, was the royal palace in Lakhnao from the time of Saadat Alí Khán II. till 1850. It stands to the east of the Observatory and overlooks the river. The throne-room, known as the Kasr-í-Sultán, or Lál Bárahdarí, was set apart for Royal Durbárs. The gaol, considered the healthiest gaol in India, adjoins this palace to the south.

GANDAK, The. There are three rivers of this name—the Great, the Lesser, and the Little. The Great Gandak rises in the Nipál hills, and flows through the districts of Gorákhpúr, Champáran, Muzaffarpúr, Sáran, and Patná, near which city it falls into the Ganges. The Lesser Gandak rises also in the Nipál hills, and flows through the districts of Gorákhpúr and Sáran, uniting in the latter district with the Ghághrá. The Little Gandak rises on the northern boundary of the Sáran district, flows in a south-easterly direction for about 120 miles, then enters the Tirhút district, traverses it in the same direction for about seventy miles, where it joins the Bághmatí, which, in its turn, falls into the Great Gandak.

GHÁGHRÁ, The, also called Gogra, the chief river of Oudh, rises in the Nipál hills, traverses in Oudh the districts of Kherí, Bahráich, Gondah, Bárah Bankí, and Faizábád; then, in the north-west provinces, those of Bastí, Gorákhpúr, and Ázamgarh; then, in western Bihár, the district of Sáran. It falls into the Ganges at Chaprá, after a course of about 600 miles.

GHÁZÍPÚR, chief town of the district of the same name in the Banáras division, so called after its founder, Málík Saiyid Masúd Ghází, in A.D. 1330. Lord Cornwallis, who succeeded Marquess Wellesley as Governor-General of India, died here in 1805. The district is bounded on the north by the Ázamgarh and Sáran districts; on the west by those of Jaunpúr and Banáras, on the south by that of Sháhábád. Its chief rivers are the Ganges, the Ghághrá, the Sárgú, and the Gúmtí.

GORÁKHPÚR. The division thus called is bounded to the north by Nipál, to the east by the Gandak, to the south by the Ghághrá, and to the west by Oudh. The capital, also called Goráklpúr, is on the left bank of the Ráptí. It has an imámbárah (a kind of mosque) built by one of the rulers of Oudh, and near it is the temple of Gorákhnath, worshipped by the Jains. The means of communication in this district still leave much to be desired.

GÚMTÍ, The, rises in the mountains north of the Sháhjahánpúr district. It flows through the districts of Kherí, Lakhnao, and Sultaupúr, in Oudh, and through those of Jaunpúr and Banáras, in the North-West Provinces, falling into the Ganges seventeen miles north-east of Banáras. The length of its course is about 500 miles.

GWÁLIÁR, the capital of the dominions of Sindhíá. It lies on the Subanrekhá river, sixty-six miles south of Ágra. Within its limits may be comprehended the famous hill fort on an isolated rock 300 feet high, and about three miles in circumference; the Lashkar, or standing camp of the Máharájah, extending several miles from the north-west end of the rock; the old town along its eastern base; and the cantonment of Morá, on the Chambal, to the north, occupied, before the Mutiny, by the Gwáliár contingent, officered by British officers.

The dominions of Sindhíá, known under the generic term "Gwáliár," consist of several detached districts, covering an area of 29,067 square miles, and having a population of 3,115,857 souls. Of the districts so detached, the principal is bounded on the north-east by the Chambal, which divides it from the British districts of Ágra and Itáwah; on the east, in a very tortuous line, by Bundelkhand and the Ságar districts; on the south by the native states of Bhopál and Dhár; on the west by those of Rájarh, Jháláwar, and Kotá; and on the north-west by the Chambal, which separates it from the states of Karaulí and Dholpúr. The chief rivers are the Chambal, which receives the Chumblá, the Síprí, the Chota Kálá Sind, the Niwáj, and the Párvatí, the Narbadá, and the Sind.

IMÁMBÁRAH, The great, in Lakhnao, is a kind of mosque, built by one of the kings of Oudh, formerly contiguous to, now incorporated in, the Machhí Bhawan. Its central hall, 163 feet long, 53 feet broad, and 49½ feet high, has an arched roof without supports. The curve of the arch is 68 feet, and the wall is 16 feet thick. The Imámbárah is 303 feet long from east to west, 160 feet broad, and 62½ feet high. The reader will find an admirable description of this building, and of the other buildings in the great northern cities of India, in Murray's Handbook of the Bengal Presidency, compiled on the spot by Captain Edward Eastwick.

ITÁWAH, the chief town of the district of the same name, lies on the left bank of the Jannah. The district forms part of the Ágra division. It is bounded to the north by the Mainpúrí and Farrukhábad districts; to the west by the Ágra district, from which it is separated by the Jamnah, and the Gwáliár state; to the south by the Jamnah; and to the east by the Kánhpúr district. The town lies sixty-three miles south-east from Ágra.

JAGDÍSPÚR, a town in the Sháhábád district of the Patná division (western Bihár), ninety miles east of Banáras. About it, in and prior to 1857, were the ancestral estates of Kúnwar Singh.

JAIPÚR, capital of the state of the same name in Rájputáná. The state has an area of 15,250 square miles, and a population of two millions. It is bounded on the north by Bakánír and Hisár; on the east by Alwar and Bhasalpúr; on the south by Karaulí, Gwáliár, Búndi, Tonk, Mewár, and Ajmír; in the west by Kishngarh, Márwár and Bikánír. The centre is an elevated tableland, 1500 feet above the sea. The capital of the same name was founded by Rájah Jai Singh II. in 1723, and partially rebuilt and beautified by Rájah Rám Singh in 1843-6. It lies 140 miles west from Ágra, 150 south-west from Dehlí, and 400 north-west from Alláhábád.

JODHPÚR, or MÁRWÁR, is a native state in Rájputáná, lying to the east of Jaisalmír and Bikánír, having an area of 37,000 square miles, and a population of a million and three quarters. Its principal river is the Lúní. The capital, Jodhpúr, is a town surrounded by a wall, in which are seventy gates, each named after the place to which it leads. A fort, built on a rock 800 feet above the level of the court at its base, commands the city.

KADAM RASÚL, a brick building in Lakhnao, about 300 yards to the east of the Sháh Najaf. The literal meaning of its name is "the foot of the prophet."

KAISARBÁGH, the, a palace in Lakhnao built by the last of the kings of Oudh, Wájid Alí Sháh. It was begun in 1848 and finished in 1850, at a cost, including furniture and decorations, of £800,000. It includes the Bádsháh Manzil, built by Saadat Ali II., previously the private residence of the King. The ladies used to occupy apartments round the magnificent square beyond the Lákhí gate, so called from having cost a lakh of rupees. For a detailed description vide Murray's Bengal.

KALPÍ, a town in the Jaláun district, N.W.P., on the right bank of the Jamnah, was a very important place under Muhammadan rule. It lies forty-five miles south-west of Kanhpúr.

KÁNAUJ, a town on the Kálí Nadí, near its confluence with the Ganges, in the Furrukhábád district. Before the Muhammadan invasion it was the most famous city in India. It is now too ruinous for the ordinary geographer to do it reverence. Yet it was mentioned by Ptolemy (A.D. 140). Here Humáyun was finally defeated by Sher Sháh, in May, 1540.

KATAK, a town and district in Orísá, strangely miscalled by the barbarians who first visited it "Cuttack," which misnomer has been as barbarously perpetuated and retained. The district, covering an area of 3178 square miles, and watered by the Mahánadí, and its branch, the Katjúrí; by the Brahmaní, and its branch, the Kharsúá; and by the Baitarání; is hilly in its western, and low and swampy in its eastern sections. The population is about a million and a half. The town of the same name, also called Katak Banáras, lies on the right bank of the Mahánadí. It was built, 1200 A.D., by Anang Bhím Deo, King of Orísá.

MOTÍ MAHALL, THE, includes three buildings in Lakhnao. That, properly called by the name, is at the north end of the enclosure. It was built by Saadat Ali Khán. Along the river face Ghází u'd dín built the Muháarak Manzil to the east of the old bridge of boats, and the Sháh Manzil close to the bridge. In this latter used to take place the wild beast fights so dear to the rulers of Oudh.

MULTÁN, the chief town and fortress of the district of the same name, lying between the Satlaj, the Chináb, and the Ráví, and having a population of over half a million. The town lies four miles from the left bank of the Chináb. It is one of the bulwarks of India.

NIPÁL, an independent state in the mountainous range to the north of Bihár and Oudh. It is 500 miles long from east to west, and about 160 broad. It is mostly mountainous; but behind the lower range of the Himálayas are long, narrow, fertile valleys, about 4000 feet above the level of the sea, well watered and cultivated. The population numbers two millions. Of these 270,000 are aboriginal, called Newárs, Buddhists. The remainder are Gurkhás, who conquered the Newárs about the year 1700 A.D.

ORÍSÁ, once a kingdom, then a province; now a division, comprising the districts of Katak, Púri, or Jaganáth, Báleswar, sometimes, but incorrectly called Balasor, and nineteen tributary Mahalls. The division is bounded on the north and north-east by Chutiá Nágpur and Bengal; on the east and south-east by the Bay of Bengal; on the south by the Madras Presidency; and on the west by the Central Provinces. Exclusive of the Tributary Mahalls, it has an area of 9053 square miles, and a population of nearly four millions. Consult Murray's Handbook to Bengal for a graphic account of the journey from Calcutta to Púri and Katak.

PÚRNIÁ, a district in Eastern Bihár (q. v.) between Bhágalpúr and Nipál, with an area of 4957 square miles, and a population of a million and three quarters. The chief station, also called Púrniá, lies on both banks of the Little Kusí river, 78 miles to the north-east of Bhágalpur; 283 miles north-west of Calcutta; and 98 miles south-west from Dárjiling.

RÁJPÚTÁNÁ, a tract of Western India, so called from its being inhabited mainly by Rájputs. It is bounded on the north-east by the Panjáb and North-Western Provinces; on the south-east by the Indúr and Gwáliár states; on the south-west by Barodah and the districts of Bombay; on the west by Sindh; and on the north-west by the state of Baháwalpúr. It has an area of 129,750 square miles, and a population slightly in excess of ten millions. The states within it, all of which are under British protection, are, Bikánír, east of Baháwalpúr; Jaisalmír, south-west of Bikánír; Kishngarh, between Ajmír and Jaipúr; Karauli, between Jaipúr and Dholpúr; Alwar, north of Jaipúr and west of Mathurá; Tonk; Dholpúr; Udaipúr or Mewár, south of Ajmír; Dongapúr; Bánswará, south-east of Dongapúr; Partabgarh, north of Bánswará; Jaipúr; Jodhpúr, or Márwár; Bharatpúr; Bundi; Kotá; Jháláwar; and Sirohí.

RÁMGANGÁ, the eastern, a river of the Kumáun district rising on the southern declivity of the main chain of the Himálayas, at an elevation of 9000 feet. It holds a course generally south-easterly for about fifty-five miles, to Ramésar (in the Kumáun district, 1500 feet above the sea-level), where it unites with the Surjá.

RÁMGANGÁ, the western, rises in the southern declivity of the slopes of the Himálayas, not far from the eastern river of the same name; runs for twenty miles in a south-easterly direction; then becomes south-westerly, and so continues to its exit from the hills, ninety miles from its source. Ten miles further on it takes a southerly direction, holds it for fifteen miles, then receives, on its right, the waters of the Koh, and a little further on, on its left, those of the Sunká. Sixty miles lower it is augmented by the waters of the Deohá or Gárah. Ten miles below this last confluence it falls into the Ganges nearly opposite the ancient city of Kanáj (q. v.). Its whole course is about 373 miles.

ROHILKHAND, a division of the North-West Provinces, bounded by the Ganges, by Oudh, and by Kunáun, and watered by the Rám-gangá, the Kosilá, the Ganges, and the Ghághrá. It has an area of 10,882 square miles and a population slightly in excess of five millions. It is divided into the districts of Bijnáur, Murádábád, Badáun, Barélí, Sháhjahánpúr, and the Taráí Parganahs. It includes also the territory of the Nawáb of Rámpúr.

RÁPTÍ, The, rises in the sub-Himálayan ranges of Nipál, and, after many windings, enters the plains of Oudh, which it traverses in a south-easterly direction for ninety miles, passing through the Bahráich and Gondah districts. After running 400 miles it falls into the Ghághrá shortly before that river joins the Ganges. Its tributary, the Burha Ráptí, has a course of 134 miles.

SHÁH NAJAF, The, a palace built in Lakhnao by Ghází u'd dín Haidar, the first king of Oudh, in memory of a town in Arabia, where Ali, the successor of the Prophet, was buried. It stands about 350 yards to the east of the Motí Mahall, and 180 yards south of the west bank of the Gúmtí. It is a white mosque of scanty elevation, with an enormous dome.

SILHAT, sometimes but barbarously spelt "Sylhet," is a district in the Dhákah division, having an area of 5440 square miles, and a population of over 1,700,000 souls. The northern, eastern, and southern parts of the district are hilly. Its principal river, on the banks of which lies the chief station, also called Silhat, is the Surmá, which rises in Kachhár and falls into the Bráhmáputrá. Its chief products are lime, timber, oranges, ginger, and tea.

SÓN, The, rises in the elevated table-land of Amarkautak in the Biláspúr district of the central provinces, at about 3500 feet above the sea level, and flows northerly through an intricate chain of hills till it strikes the Kaimur range, the dividing range between the Jabalpúr and Sháhábád districts. From this point it takes an easterly course till it falls into the Ganges, about ten miles above Dánápúr, having meandered about 465 miles. In its lower section, of upwards of 160 miles, it first flows across the British district of Mírzápúr, and then, passing into western Bihár, separates Sháhábád from Gayá and Patná. The Són is crossed by the grand trunk road from Calcutta to the north-west on a stone causeway, and lower down, near Koelnár, the East India railway has been carried across it on a lattice girder bridge.

TÁRÁ, or TÁRÁWALÍ, KOTHÍ, The, the observatory, or star house, at Lakhnao, was built by Násir u'd dín Haidar under the superintendence of Colonel Wilcox, Astronomer Royal. In 1857 the famous Maulaví, Almad Ullah, of Faizábád, had his head-quarters here, and here were held the councils of war.

TIRHÚT, a district in western Bihár, between Nipál and the Ganges, with an area of 6343 square miles and a population of four and a half millions. It is watered by the Ganges, the Gandak, and the Bághmatí. To the north of it are the swampy forests of the Tarái. It comprises the towns of Muzaffanpúr, Hájípúr; near it, Sonpúr, famous for its fair, and Darbahghá, the seat of the Tirhút Rájahs. The district produces indigo, cereals, sugar, tobacco, opium, and saltpetre.

TÍSTÁ, The, flows from the Chatámu Lake, Thibet, through Sikkim, for about ninety-seven miles, marking the boundary between the Sikkim and Dárjiling districts for some distance till it receives the waters of the Great Ranjít. It then turns southward, and traverses the Dárjiling and Jalpáigurí districts in a south-easterly direction, then the Rangpur district. In the two last-named districts it is navigable, though navigation is often difficult. Finally, after a tortuous course of 313 miles from its source, it falls into the Bráhmaputrá. The Tístá is noted for frequent and violent changes in its course.

CONTENTS OF VOL. IV.

	PAGE
Preface	vii
List and short Description of Places mentioned in this Volume . . .	xiii

BOOK X.—THE RECONQUEST OF THE NORTH-WEST (SEPTEMBER—DECEMBER, 1857).

CHAPTER I.

THE STORMING OF DEHLÍ.

The Siege of Dehlí	1
General Wilson doubts the Success of an Assault	1
The Chief Engineer, Major Baird Smith	3
Baird Smith's Arguments in favour of an Assault	4
General Wilson yields to those Arguments	4
Description of the Fortifications of Dehlí	5
Plan of the Attack	6
Effective Strength of the Besiegers	7
General Wilson's Order to his Army	7
The Tracing of the Batteries begins on the 7th	8
Brind's Battery (No. 1) opens fire	9
And renders the Morí harmless	10
Gallantry of Lieutenant Lockhart	11
No. 2 Battery is traced and opens fire	12
Medley traces No. 3 Battery	13
The Enemy are alive to the Opportunities they had neglected . . .	14
The Great Artillery Duel	15
Splendid Conduct of the Bengal Artillery	16
The Engineers are sent to examine the Breaches	17
They report them practicable	18
The Columns of Assault detailed	19
The Commanders of the Columns of Assault	19
The Order of Assault	22
Nicholson orders the Advance	23
Storm of the First Column	23
Storm of the Second Column	24
The Explosion Party at the Kashmír Gate	25

	PAGE
Gallant Advance of the Third Column	26
The Storm of the Fourth Column	27
Reid is struck down and Lawrence assumes command	29
The Attack is repulsed	30
Disastrous Effect of this Repulse	30
Nicholson determines to press on	31
After losing many Officers, he leads the way, and is struck down	33
The Cavalry during the Storm	33
The Third Column falls back on the Church	35
Services of the Artillery	36
The Results of the Day's Work	37
The Losses of the Day	38
The Success does not correspond to the General's hopes	38
Neville Chamberlain urges him to persevere	39
Baird Smith is not less peremptory	40
On the 15th Preparations are made to push on	41
Progress made on the 16th	41
And on the 17th	43
The Attack on the Láhor Gate on the 18th fails	44
Despondency of General Wilson	44
Great Progress made on the 19th	45
The Jámi Masjid and Palace occupied on the 20th	46
Lieutenant Aikman captures the Selingarh	47
Dehli after the Capture	48
The King of Dehli, and the Influences about him	49
He takes refuge in the tomb of Humáyun	51
Whilst the Rebel Army evacuates the City	51
Hodson of Hodson's Horse	52
Hodson induces the King to surrender	53
Hodson induces the Princes to surrender	55
And murders them	55
Comments on the Deed	56
The Gates of the City are secured	57
Major Brind clears the City of the Scum of the Population	57
Death and Character of Nicholson	58
Remarks on the Siege	59

CHAPTER II.

THE ÁGRA SURPRISE AND THE DUÁB.

A Column is despatched south-eastwards under Greathed	61
Greathed moves on Balandshahr	62
Attacks and defeats the Rebels at that place	63
Death of Lieutenant Home	64
Greathed receives Letters from Ágra imploring Aid	65
The Condition of Ágra subsequent to the 9th September	66
Difficulties of its Position increased by the storming of Dehli	67
Greathed reaches Ágra on the 10th October	68
Encamps on the Parade Ground	69
His Camp is suddenly attacked by the Rebels	70

	PAGE
Battle of Ágra and Defeat of the Enemy	71
The " Surprise " greater to the Rebels than to the British	73
Greathed is superseded by Hope Grant	74
Who takes the Column to Káhn-púr, and thence to the Banni Bridge	74
Van Cortlandt re-establishes Order north of Dehlí	75
Showers is sent with a Column to the Districts west and south-west of Dehlí	75
On his return another Column, under Gerrard, is sent in the same direction	76
Combat of Narnúl	77
Splendid Feat of Colin Cookworthy	81
Gerrard beats the Rebels, and, while pursuing, is killed	82
Seaton succeeds Gerrard, and returns to Dehlí, preparatory to escorting a Convoy towards Káhn-púr	83

BOOK XI.—THE RECONQUEST OF OUDH.

CHAPTER I.

PREPARATIONS AND ACTION IN BENGAL.

State of Affairs in India on the Arrival of Sir Colin Campbell	84
The Enormous Difficulties by which he is beset	85
His Manner of " Organising Victory "	86
The China Troops begin to arrive	89
Captain William Peel and the Naval Brigade	89
Character of William Peel	90
Troops begin to arrive from England.	91
Sketch of the Districts intervening between Sir Colin Campbell's Base of Operations at Allahábád and Calcutta	91
Mr. George Yule and Eastern Bihár	92
Captain Dalton and Chutiá Nágpúr	95
The Madras Army	97
How that Army lent its Aid to Bengal	98
Major English defeats the Rebels at Chatra	100

CHAPTER II.

THE SECOND RELIEF OF LAKHNAO (NOVEMBER, 1857).

Sir Colin Campbell starts for the Seat of War	101
Colonel Powell and William Peel march towards Káhn-púr	102
Powell hears of the Enemy at Kajwá.	102
Battle of Kajwá, and Death of Powell	103
William Peel, succeeding to the Command, completes the Victory.	104
How the Fall of Dehlí drove the Gwáliár Contingent into the Field against the British	105
Consideration of Sir Colin's Position at Káhn-púr, and of the Reasons which prompted him to relieve Lakhnao before crushing the Gwáliár Troops.	105

	PAGE
He leaves a Force at Káhn-púr under Windham	106
And joins Hope Grant in the Plain beyond Banni	107
Outram and Havelock at the Residency	107
How Outram provided fresh quarters for his Troops	108
The Sorties at Lakhnao	109
Outram fails to open out the Káhn-púr Road	110
The Mining and Countermining	112
Altered Tactics of the Rebels	113
Some Casualties of the Siege	114
Outram improvises Telegraphic Communication with the Álabágh	115
Thomas Henry Kavanagh	116
Kavanagh penetrates in disguise the Enemy's Lines and reaches Sir Colin Campbell	117
Composition of Sir Colin's Relieving Force	117
Sir Colin inspects his Troops—the Effect	118
His Plan of Operations	118
He moves on, and encamps near the Álabágh	119
Adrian Hope carries the Fort of Jalálábád	120
The several Brigades of the Relieving Force	121
The Force carries the Dilkushá and the Martinière	122
Sir Colin holds his Position that Afternoon and the Night, repulsing several Attacks	123
The Rear-guard under Ewart, 93rd, reaches Camp	125
The 15th, and Preparations for the 16th	126
The Advance on the 16th	127
On the Sikandarbágh	128
Splendid Gallantry of Blunt, Bengal Artillery	128
The Storming of the Sikandarbágh	129
Richard Cooper, Ewart, Lumsden, and a few Followers leap through the Breach	129
The daring Gallantry of those Officers and their following	130
Their Gallantry gives time to their Comrades to force the Gate and Window	131
The Sikandarbágh is gained	133
The "Barracks" are captured	133
The Sháh Najaf	133
The Attack on the Sháh Najaf	134
Its Obstinate Resistance	135
Infantry, Artillery, and Naval Brigade are baffled	136
Till Sergeant Paton, 93rd, indicates a Way of which Adrian Hope takes Advantage, and the Place is gained	137
The Troops then bivouac for the Night	138
How the Merits of Officers cannot be discovered from the Mention of a few in the Despatches	139
Some of the Deserving Stormers	139
The Action of the Rebels during the 16th	140
Sir Colin's Plans for the 17th	141
He sends Brigadier Russell to secure his Left Flank	141
Hopkins storms the Mess House	142
And Garnet Wolseley occupies the Motí Mahall	143
The Meeting of Outram and Havelock with Sir Colin	144

	PAGE
The Proceedings of Outram and Havelock to open out a Communication with Sir Colin	145
The Difficulties which still remained after the Communications had been opened under Russell and Hale	147
The Operations on the Left Rear	150
Withdrawal of the Women and Children	151
And of the Force	152
The Cavalry during the Siege	153
Death of Havelock	153
His Character and Career	153
Sir Colin reaches the Álambágh and reorganises his Force	155
Leaves Outram with four thousand Men at the Álambágh, and moves towards Kánhpúr	155
Hears on the Road alarming Rumours, and receives more alarming Letters, regarding the State of Affairs at Kánhpúr	156
Leaving his Infantry to follow, he gallops to the Front with his Staff and Artillery	157
And discovers the Disaster by which Windham was threatened	158

CHAPTER III.

THE GWÁLIÁR CONTINGENT AND GENERAL WINDHAM AT KÁNHPÚR.

Explicit Instructions sent to Windham at Kánhpúr	159
Description of the Ground between Kalpí and Kánhpúr	160
Tántia Topí crosses the Jamnah at Kalpí, and occupies that Ground	161
Windham asks for and obtains permission to detain the Troops arriving at Kánhpúr	162
He marches beyond the Town and displays his Force.	163
Increasing Difficulties of his Position	164
Solicits Sir Colin's Sanction to a Plan of Offensive Defence	164
Communication with Lakhnáo having ceased, he takes up a Position on the Kalpí Road covered by the Canal.	165
The Rebels approaching him, he resolves to attack them	165
In the Battle Carthew and Kelly capture three Guns.	166
Windham learns that Sir Colin is marching on Kánhpúr	166
On the 27th he prepares to stand on the Defensive, when he is attacked [167
Carthew, on the right, repulses the Enemy	168
Windham is not so fortunate on the Left, but is forced by the superior Artillery Power of the Enemy to fall back	169
He hopes to make a stand at the Brick-kilns	169
His Injudicious Order, repeated, to Carthew to fall back exposes his Right	170
The Rebels attack the Intrenchments, but are driven back by Windham	171
Carthew stems the Advancing Tide	171
And gallantly repulses for the Night the Attack on the Right	171
Remarks on the Manœuvres of the Day	172
Windham makes his Dispositions for the 27th	173

	PAGE
Does not give Sufficient Strength to the Decisive Point	174
Carthew gallantly and successfully defends the Right	174
The Attack on the Left, not being the decisive Attack, is easily repulsed	175
Windham orders Carthew and Wilson to advance	175
Wilson's Repulse exposes Carthew's Right	176
Windham has no Supports on the Decisive Point	177
Splendid Tenacity of Carthew and the 34th	177
Carthew is forced to fall back on the Intrenchment	178
Carthew and Windham	179
Reinforcements are sent to Carthew, too few, and too late	180
The Aggressive Action of Windham justified in Principle	180
Sir Colin Campbell arrives on the Scene	181

CHAPTER IV.

SIR COLIN CAMPBELL RETRIEVES WINDHAM'S DISASTER.

Sir Colin has an Interview with Windham	182
The Rebels plan the Destruction of the Bridge	183
Sir Colin baffles them and crosses his Army	183
The Position occupied by the Enemy	184
They attempt to harass the British	185
Sir Colin despatches the Ladies and Children to Allahábád.	185
He detects the one weak Point in the Enemy's Position	186
The Strength of the Hostile Armies.	187
Sir Colin's Plan of Battle	188
Battle of Kánhpúr. Greathed threatens the Centre	189
Walpole employs the Right, whilst Adrian Hope turns the Right Flank	189
Desperate Struggle on the Canal is decided by William Peel's Dash	190
The Enemy are completely beaten	191
Mansfield is sent to cut them off at the Subahdár's Tank	192
Character of General Mansfield	192
He allows the Enemy to escape	193
Hope Grant is then sent to pursue them	194
He attacks and destroys them near Sheorájpur	194
Comments on Sir Colin Campbell's Tactics	196
The Part of the Programme remaining to be carried out	197

CHAPTER V.

FURTHER OPERATIONS IN THE DUÁB.

Sir Colin's Further Movements are hampered by Want of Carriage	199
He detaches Walpole to Mainpúrí	200
A few Fanatics bar his Way at Itáwah	200
Bourchier clears them out, and Walpole reaches Mainpúrí	201
Seaton starts from Dehlí with his Convoy for Mainpúrí	201
Suddenly hears that the Rebels are marching against him	202

	PAGE
He attacks and completely defeats them	203
Finds the Rebels at Patiáí	203
Where he again beats them	204
And to a great extent pacifies the Country	205
Again he defeats the Rebels near Mainpúrí	206
Daring Exploit of Hodson and McDowell	207
Seaton unites with Walpole	209

CHAPTER VI.

MOVEMENTS PRELIMINARY TO THE RECONQUEST OF OUDH.

Sir Colin marches from Kánhpúr towards Fathgarh	210
The Rebels lose their Opportunity of breaking down the Bridge over the Káí Nadí	211
Vaughan's skilful Gun Practice	212
Gallant Dash of the 53rd.	212
The Enemy are completely beaten	213
The Soldiers give an Ovation to Sir Colin	213
Gallant Conduct of Lieutenant Roberts	214
Reasons why the Commander-in-Chief advocated the Reduction of Rohilkhand prior to an Attack on Lakhnao	215
Reasons which actuated Lord Canning in deciding to attack Lakhnao in the First Instance	215
Lord Canning's Action justified	216
The Military Position occupied by Sir Colin considered	217
He leaves Seaton to command at Fathgarh	218
Deceives the Rohilkhand Rebels	218
Adrian Hope attacks and defeats them at Sútia	219
The Final Preparations for an Attack on Lakhnao	219
The British Army is at last in the Plains between Kánhpúr and Lakhnao. Its Composition	219

CHAPTER VII.

THE ADVANCE INTO EASTERN OUDH.

Jang Bahádúr of Nipál offers his Aid to Lord Canning	221
The Offer, after some delay, is accepted	221
The Nipál Troops are sent to Ázamgarh and Jaunpur	222
They surprise and defeat the Rebels at Manduri	223
And pacify the District	223
Lieutenant-Colonel Longden is sent with a Detachment to co-operate with the Nipál Troops	224
Combat at Chandá	224
Longden drives the Rebels from Atraulia	224
The Governor-General concludes an Arrangement with Jang Bahádúr for a further Supply of Nipál Troops led by himself	225
Roweroft defeats the Rebels at Sobanpúr	225
Jang Bahádúr occupies Gorákhpur	226

	PAGE
He defeats the Rebels at Phúlpur and enters Oudh	227
Description of General Franks's Column	228
Instructions given to Franks by Lord Canning	228
And by Mr. J. P. Grant	228
The Rebel Army opposed to Franks and its Positions	229
Nature of the Endeavours made to supply his Want of Cavalry	229
Franks attacks and beats the Rebels at Nasratpúr	230
He returns to Badlapúr and enters Oudh	230
He attacks and defeats Banda Husén at Chandá	231
And Mehndi Husén at Hamírpúr	232
Manœuvres between Franks and Mehndi Husén to gain Budháyan	232
Franks out-manceuvres his Rival, whereupon the Latter takes up a Position beyond Sultánpur	233
Strength and Weakness of the Position	233
Battle of Sultánpur	234
Gallantry of MacLeod Innes	234
Total Defeat of the Enemy	235
Franks is joined by the Jálandhar Cavalry under Aikman	235
Aikman's Splendid Daring	235
Franks is repulsed at Daurará	236
Summary of the Results of his Campaign	236
Henry Havelock, Patrick Carnegy, and Venables	237
Franks joins Sir Colin Campbell	238

CHAPTER VIII.

OUTRAM AT THE ÁLAMBÁGH.

Description of the Álambágh	239
Position taken up there by Outram	240
The Rebels in Lakhnao recover Confidence and resolve to attack him	241
The Attack on the 22nd December	241
Outram drives them back on the Dilkushá	241
They make another Attack on the 12th January	242
Olpherts foils them on the Right, Down on the Centre	243
And Outram on the Left.	244
Religious Influences affecting the Natives.	244
The Maulaví swears an Oath	244
Olpherts forces him to break it.	245
An Attack on the 16th January is repulsed	245
Discord in the Rebel Camp	246
The Maulaví attacks on the 15th February, and is repulsed	246
The Rebels resolve to make a Grand Assault on Sunday, 21st February	247
The Assault of Sunday, 21st February, is repulsed	248
They make another and Final Attack on the 25th	249
Battle of the 25th, and Repulse of the Rebels	249
Service rendered to England by Outram's Four Months' Defence of the Álambágh	250
The Men who aided Outram	252
Sir Colin Campbell reaches the Álambágh.	253

CHAPTER IX.

THE STORMING OF LAKHNAO.

	PAGE
Force at the Disposal of Sir Colin Campbell	254
Defences of Lakhnao	255
The Weak Point of the Defence—detected by Sir Colin	257
Sir Colin's Plan of Attack	257
He advances on the Dilkushá, captures it, and establishes Batteries there and at the Muhammadbágh	258
He orders Bridges to be thrown across the Gúmtí	259
And directs Outram to cross with a corps d'armée	260
Outram establishes himself on the Left Bank	260
The Programme assigned to him	260
Outram pushes forward to the Faizábád Road on the 8th, establishes himself there, and constructs Batteries	261
He storms the Chákar Kothí, and occupies the Bádsháhbágh on the 9th	262
Notifies his Success to Sir Colin by the Hoisting of a Flag	262
Major Nicholson, R.E., establishes a Battery enfilading the Enemy's Works	262
He observes that the Enemy's Lines seem abandoned.	263
Lieutenant Thomas Butler swims the Gúmtí to ascertain the Fact, and occupies the Lines until relieved by the Highlanders	263
Sir Colin carries the Martinière	264
The Line from the Gúmtí to the Vicinity of Banks's House is occupied	264
The British Position on the Evening of the 10th	265
Outram feels his Way to the Iron and Stone Bridges	266
He occupies the Positions then taken up the four Days following the 11th	267
The Sikandarbágh is occupied without Opposition	267
By the happy Audacity of three Engineer Officers the Kadam Rasúl and Sháh Najaf are gained	268
Lugard effects a Breach in the Begam Kothí	268
Adrian Hope's Brigade is ordered to storm it	269
Description of the Begam Kothí	269
The Begam Kothí is stormed	270
Death of Hodson	270
Position of the Assailants on the Evening of the 11th.	271
The 12th and 13th are given to the Engineers	272
On the 14th Franks storms the Imámbárah	272
The Troops, excited by their Victory, push on	273
They turn the Enemy's third Line of Works	274
Splendid Behaviour of the Sikhs, 10th, 90th, of Havelock, of Brasyer	274
The Supports come up	274
Franks and Napier resolve that the Advantage shall be pursued, and the Kaisarbágh is carried	275
The Scene of Plunder	275
Result of the Day's Work on the Right Bank	276
Outram proposes to cross by the Iron Bridge and intercept the Rebels in their Flight.	276

	PAGE
Sir Colin informs him that he may cross provided in doing so he does not lose a Single Man	277
Reflections on the Reply	277
Useless Pursuit of the Rebels on the 15th	278
Outram crosses near the Sikandarbágh and pushes on to the Residency.	279
Contrast between the Defence of the Residency by Europeans and by Natives	279
Outram captures the Residency, the Great Imábárah, and the Machhi Bhawan	279
The Retreating Rebels attack Walpole and are repulsed	280
An Attack made on the Álambágh is repulsed	280
Jang Bahádúr advances, covering Sir Colin's Left	281
Rescue of Miss Jackson and Mrs. Orr	281
Outram occupies Sharíf-ud-dáola's House	282
Lamentable Accident by an Explosion	282
Outram carries the Músá-bágh	283
Brigadier William Campbell allows the Rebels to escape	283
Gallantry of Hagart and Wilkin	284
Reflections on Brigadier Campbell's Conduct	284
Lord Canning's Proclamation	285
The City is cleared of the Rebels	286
Hope Grant beats them at Kursí	286
Remarks on the Campaign	287

BOOK XII.—PROGRESS OF EVENTS IN ORÍSÁ, BIHÁR, OUDH, EASTERN BENGAL, ROHILKHAND, AND RÁJPUTÁNA.

CHAPTER I.

EASTERN BENGAL, EASTERN BIHÁR, ORÍSÁ, AND THE SOUTH-WESTERN PROVINCE.

The Narrative returns to Bengal	290
Why the Interest of the History is now almost entirely with Sir Colin Campbell.	290
Lord Canning proceeds to Allahábád.	291
Panic in Calcutta on the 3rd March	291
The 34th at Chitrágaon Mutiny	292
The Attempt to Disarm the 73rd at Dhákah results in a Conflict and the Flight of the Troops	293
Loyalty of the Rájah of Tiparah	293
Prompt Action of the Government with Respect to Chitrágaon and Dhákah	294
The Chitrágaon Mutineers enter Tiparah	295
They are pursued and beaten, after a forced March, by the Silhat Light Infantry	295
Splendid Conduct of the Silhat Sipáhis	296
Death of Byng	296
Ultimate Fate of the Chitrágaon Mutineers	297

	PAGE
The Difficulties in Eastern Bihár are aggravated by the Events in Dhákah and Chitrágaon	297
Mr. George Yule, perceiving this, marches on Púrníá	297
He arrives just in time, for the 11th Irregulars promptly mutiny	298
Gallant Conduct of Mr. Francis Anstruther Elphinstone-Dalrymple, C.S.	298
The Prompt and Daring Action of Yule saves Púrníá	299
The Dhákah Rebels menace Jalpáigurí	300
Yule Marches against them	301
His Foresight and Activity do not prevent them from escaping	301
Yule pursues and drives the Rebels into Nipál	302
Major J. F. Richardson	302
Jang Bahádur orders his Lieutenant to co-operate with Yule	303
The Nipál Commander, by his unwillingness to divide his Forces, spoils the Plans of Yule and Richardson, and the Rebels escape	303
State of Chutiá Nágpúr in November 1857	304
Action of Lieutenant Graham in Pálámau	305
Action of Captain Leigh in Sambalpúr	306
Dangerous Position of Mr. Lushington and his Companions	306
Splendid Conduct of Mr. Cockburn, Commissioner of Katak	308
He pours Troops into Sambalpúr	308
The Rebels are defeated in Singhbhúm and Sambalpúr	308
Tranquillity is gradually restored in Chutiá Nágpúr	308

CHAPTER II.

KÚNWAR SINGH AND LORD MARK KERR.

Retrospect of Affairs in Western Bihár	310
That Province under Mr. Tayler's Successor	311
Kúnwar Singh returns to it	311
The Situation is aggravated by various Risings	311
False Military Movement of Rattray and Alonzo Money	312
They are out-mancœuvred by the Rebels, and Gayá is saved by the Gallantry of Skipwith Tayler	312
Mutiny of Two Companies of the 32nd Native Infantry	312
Rattray Avenges his Disaster of the 8th September, and fights an indecisive Combat with the 32nd	312
The Narrative proceeds to the Line of Communication between Allahábád and Lakhnao	313
Carthew at Fathpúr	313
He clears the Country on the Left Bank of the Jamnah	313
Campbell clears the Country near Allahábád	313
Movable Columns are sent to keep open the Line	314
The Effect being to secure Sir Colin's Operations against Lakhnao	315
Sotheby defeats the Rebels at Chandipur	316
Rowcroft defeats the Rebels at Ámórha and establishes himself there	317
Kúnwar Singh makes a Diversion in Eastern Oudh	318
Milman Attacks and drives back his Troops near Atraulia	319
The Opportunity of cutting off Milman from his Base is seized by Kúnwar Singh.	323

	PAGE
He forces back Milman on Ázamgarh	320
Lord Canning, hearing of Milman's Disaster, sends Lord Mark Kerr to relieve him	321
Character and Antecedents of Lord Mark Kerr	321
Lord Mark sets out with Four Hundred and Forty-four Men	322
He encounters the Enemy, Four Thousand strong, near Ázamgarh	322
Desperate Contest, and the Resolute Persistence of Lord Mark Kerr, who beats the Rebels, and relieves Ázamgar	323
Great Credit due on every ground to Lord Mark Kerr	325
His Victory probably saved Banáras from the Clutches of Kúnwar Singh	326
Fatal Error in Kúnwar Singh's Tactics	327

CHAPTER III.

KÚNWAR SINGH AND HIS SUCCESSORS AT BAY IN WESTERN BIHÁR.

Objects still remaining to Sir Colin to accomplish	328
He orders a Brigade under Lugard to Ázamgarh	328
Lugard defeats some Rebels near Tigra	329
State of the Ázamgarh Garrison	330
Wily Tactics of Kúnwar Singh	330
Lugard forces the Passage of the Tons	330
Death of Venables	331
The Rebels fall back unbeaten, and baffle their pursuers	331
Douglas is sent to pursue Kúnwar Singh	332
Kúnwar Singh baffles him at Naghai by retreating	332
He continues to evade a Decisive Action	333
But is caught and beaten at Manohar	333
Notwithstanding this, outwitting Cumberlege and baffling Douglas, he crosses the Ganges into Shahábád, and reoccupies Jagdispúr	334
Le Grand attacks him there and is totally defeated	335
Death of Kúnwar Singh, and Succession of his Brother Amar Singh	336
Lugard crosses into Shahábád	336
He repeatedly beats and disperses the Rebels, but they always reunite.	337
The Rebels harry the District and defy Pursuit	337
Lugard cuts Roads across the Jungles, and succeeds in driving the Rebels to a considerable Distance, when he is forced to resign his Command from Ill-health	338
His Successor, Douglas, has not even taken up the Command, when the Rebels return and renew their Depredations	339
Douglas determines to converge Seven Columns on a Belt into which he proposes to drive the Rebels	340
Reasons why he deferred the Execution of the Plan till the Conclusion of the Rainy Season	340
The Plan fails in consequence of the Delay of one of the Column Commanders	341
Sir Henry Havelock's Plan of Mounted Infantry is sanctioned	341
Great Success attends the Plan at the Outset	342

	PAGE
On a Second Occasion Havelock drives the Rebels into a Position from which they escape only in consequence of the Mistake of the Infantry	343
He again pursues them and drives them into the Kaimúr Hills	344
Where they are finally destroyed on the 24th November	344

CHAPTER IV.

THE PROGRESS IN OUDH AND ROHILKHAND—HOPE GRANT—PENNY—WALPOLE AT RUIYÁ—COKE—JOHN JONES—SAM BROWNE—WILLIAM PEEL—VENABLES.

Hope Grant is ordered from Lakhnao to the Districts watered by the Ghághrá	346
The Rebels make a daring Reconnoitring Expedition into his Camp	347
The Maulavi devises a Skilful Plan to surprise Hope Grant	347
The Plan fails owing to the Inability of the Leaders of his Cavalry to withstand Temptation	348
Hope Grant joins Jar Bahádur's Camp	348
Satiated Condition in which he found the Gurkhás	349
Sir Colin Campbell's Plans for the Reconquest of Rohilkhand	349
Seaton's Position at Fathgarh	350
He attacks, and, beating, foils the Plans of, the Rebels, at Kankar	350
General Penny marches towards Rohilkhand	351
The Enemy attempt a Surprise, and Penny is killed	351
The Column, commanded by Colonel Jones, joins the Commander-in-Chief	351
Nature of the Task entrusted to Walpole	352
Character of Walpole as a General	352
Walpole learns that the fort of Ruiyá is occupied by a Rebel Chief	353
Though informed by a Trooper that the Rebel Chief intends to evacuate the place, Walpole determines to attack it	354
He sends his Infantry in Skirmishing Order against the Walls	355
Gallantry of Grove, Cafe, and others	355
Adrian Hope rides up to the Skirmishers and is killed	356
Walpole orders a Retreat	356
The Rebels evacuate the Fort	356
Tributes to Adrian Hope	357
Walpole drives the Rebels from Sírsá, and joins the Commander-in-Chief	357
A Brigade assembles at Rúrkí under the Command of Colonel John Coke	358
Previous Service and Character of Colonel Coke	358
Coke is able, by his Practical Knowledge of the Natives and their Customs, to supply his Force with Carriage, otherwise not procurable	359
Coke is superseded by Brigadier-General John Jones; the change, however, not affecting the Working of the Force	360
Coke crosses the Ganges and completely defeats the Rebels at Bhogniwálá	361

	PAGE
Cool and resolute Feat of Arms accomplished by the Native Officer Jámádár Imám Bakhsh Khán	361
The Rebels are again defeated at Naghíná.	362
Cureton, after greatly contributing to the first Defeat, administers a second the same Day	363
The Deed of Cureton still the Talk of the Indian Army	363
Gallantry and Reward of Hanna	364
The People of Murádábád greatly discontented with Native Rule	364
Coke, splendidly aided by Angelo and others, seizes several Rebel Chiefs in Murádábád.	365
The Commander-in-Chief, advancing on Sháhjahánpúr, is baffled by the Evasion of the Maulaví and his following	365
He leaves a Garrison there under Hale, and marches on Barélí	366
Khán Bahádúr Khán and Barélí	366
Sir Colin advances on Barélí and pushes back the Rebels across the Natiá Nadi	367
The Gházís make a Tremendous Onslaught on the Highland Brigade	368
After maltreating Cameron and Walpole, they are slain where they fought	369
On Account of the Suffering of the Troops from Heat, and for other reasons, Sir Colin halts for the Day	369
The Gházís attack a Company of the 93rd, commanded by Richard Cooper	370
The Halt ordered by Sir Colin enables Khán Bahádúr Khán to with- draw	370
The Rúrkí Column advances from Murádábád and effects a Junction with Sir Colin	371
The Maulaví designs a Raid on Sháhjahánpúr	372
A Halt of Two Hours made on the Road enables a Spy to convey Intelligence of his Approach to Colonel Hale	372
Hale baffles the Maulaví, who occupies, and levies Contributions from, the Town.	373
Sir Colin sends General Jones to relieve Sháhjahánpúr	373
Jones penetrates to the Position occupied by Hale	374
Then, finding himself not strong enough, applies for Assistance	375
The Maulaví, on his Side, receives Reinforcements from all Parts	375
On the 15th he attacks Jones and is repulsed	376
Sir Colin was on the Point of distributing his Forces when he receives Jones's Appeal	376
He at once sets out for Sháhjahánpúr	377
He skirmishes with the Rebels, but, owing to his weakness in Cavalry is unable to obtain decisive Success	377
Sir Colin sends for Coke's Brigade	378
The Rebels fall back into Oudh	378
Conclusion of the Rohilkhand Campaign	378
Character and Previous Career of the Maulaví	379
His Influence in Causing the Mutiny	379
The Maulaví attempts to obtain Assistance from the Rajah of Powán	380
He is shot dead by the Rajah's Brother	380
The Claim of the Maulaví to the Character of a Patriot established	381
William Peel gradually recovers from his Wound	381

	PAGE
Cordial Reception prepared for him and for the Naval Brigade in Calcutta	381
Honours conferred upon him	381
He dies of Small-pox. Universal Appreciation of his Noble Character .	382
Venables, "the brave, self-denying English Gentleman"	383

CHAPTER V.

GEORGE ST. PATRICK LAWRENCE IN RAJPUTÁNA.

Rajputána from July, 1857	385
Effect on the Rájputs of the Suzerainty of the British as administered by General George Lawrence	385
The Disaffected Few—the Criminal Class and the Soldiery	386
An Outbreak in the Ajmír Gaol is suppressed	386
A slight Military Disturbance at Nasírábád is quelled	387
And Another at Nímach	387
Mount Ábu and its Inhabitants	388
Some Mutineers of the Jodpúr Legion scale Mount Ábu and fire on the English Soldiers as they sleep	389
The Mutineers are completely baffled and driven away	389
The Jodpúr Legion revolts at Erinpúram	390
Conolly shows a Daring Persistence in endeavouring to recall them to their Duty	391
At last a few Men rally round him	392
The strange Inconsistency of these loyal few	392
The Anádrá Mutineers arrive	392
After great Vicissitudes Conolly is allowed to go	393
The Case of Abbás Ali and Monck-Mason	393
The Rájah of Jodpúr sends an Army against the Rebels	394
The Thákur of Áwah rebels against his Liege Lord	394
He offers to submit on certain Terms, which Monck-Mason does not accept	394
The Rebels defeat the Jodpúr Troops at Pálí	395
General Lawrence marches against Áwah	396
But is compelled to fall back on Ajmír	397
Death of Monck-Mason	397
The Affairs of Kotá.	397
Major Burton denounces certain Men to the Maháráo, who repeats his Language to the Men denounced	398
The Kótá Troops rise and murder Burton and his Sons	398
Excuses of the Maháráo	399
The British are repulsed in an Attack on Jíran	399
Lawrence again attacks and captures Áwah	400
General Roberts arrives, and, marching on Kotá, completely defeats the Rebels	401
Pacification of Rájputána.	403
Reasons why Rájputána so easily weathered the Storm of the Mutiny .	403
George St. Patrick Lawrence	404

	PAGE
APPENDIX A.	405
APPENDIX B.	406
APPENDIX C.	410

LIST OF PLANS.

Plan to illustrate the Operations of the British Army before Dehli in the year 1857	to face page 18
Sketch of Operations for Relief and Withdrawal of Lakhnao Garrison	to face page 120
Sketch of the City of Kánhpúr	to face page 160
Plan to illustrate the Operations of the British Army before Lakhnao in March 1858	to face page 256

HISTORY OF THE INDIAN MUTINY.

BOOK X.—THE RECONQUEST OF THE NORTH-WEST.

[SEPTEMBER—DECEMBER 1857.]

CHAPTER I.

THE STORMING OF DEHLÍ.

I TAKE up the history of the siege of Dehlí from the 1st September. Nicholson's great victory at Najafgarh, gained the 25th August, had not only forced the enemy within their defences, but had ensured the safety of the siege-train then in progress from Fírúzpúr. From that moment, then, preparations were set on foot for the carrying out of active operations for the capture of the place.

Sept. 1.
The siege of Dehlí.

It was not, indeed, without much misgiving that the commander of the besieging army, Major-General Archdale Wilson, had given his consent to the adoption of a measure the success of which, he considered, would depend on accident.* In an elaborate letter, addressed on the 20th of August to the chief engineer, Major Baird Smith, General Wilson, dwelling with considerable emphasis on the difficulties that had attended the progress of the siege—on the fact that he and his army had in reality occupied the position of a besieged force—had announced his intention of commencing offensive operations against the city on the arrival

Doubts and fears of General
Wilson.

* His own words were: "It is evident to me that the results of the proposed operations will be thrown on the hazard of a die."

of the siege-train from Firúzpur, though with no "hope of being able to take the place until supported by the force from below." He concluded his letter—the contents of which he intended to send to the Governor-General as a justification of his conduct—with a request that Major Baird Smith would favour him with such remarks and emendations as his experience as Chief Engineer might suggest.*

* The entire letter, a perusal of which will make clear the position before Dehlí at the date on which it was written (20th August, 1857), runs as follows: "A letter has been received from the Governor-General urging our immediately taking Dehlí, and he seems angry that it was not done long ago. I wish to explain to him the true state of affairs: that Dehlí is seven miles in circumference, filled with an immense fanatical Musalmán population, garrisoned by full 40,000 soldiers armed and disciplined by ourselves, with 114 pieces of heavy artillery mounted on the walls, with the largest magazine of shot, shell, and ammunition in the Upper Provinces at their disposal, besides some sixty pieces of field artillery, all of our own manufacture, and manned by artillerymen drilled and taught by ourselves; that the Fort itself has been made so strong by perfect flanking defences erected by our own engineers, and a glacis which prevents our guns breaking the walls lower than eight feet from the top, without the labour of a regular siege and sap—for which the force and artillery sent against it has been quite inadequate; that an attempt to blow in the gates and escalade the walls was twice contemplated, but that it was considered, from the state of preparation against such attack on the part of the rebels, such an attempt would inevitably have failed, and have caused the most irreparable disaster to our cause; and that, even if we had succeeded in forcing our way into the place, the small force disposable for the attack would have been most certainly lost in the numerous streets of so large a city, and have been cut to pieces. It was, therefore, considered advisable to confine our efforts to holding the position we now occupy, which is naturally strong, and has been daily rendered more so by our engineers, until the force coming up from below could join to co-operate in the attack. That since the command of the force has devolved on me I have considered it imperatively necessary to adopt the same plan as the only chance of safety to the Empire, and that I strongly urge upon his Lordship the necessity of his ordering General Havelock's, or some other force, marching upon Dehlí as soon as possible. The force under my command is, and has been since the day we took our position, actually besieged by the mutineers, who, from the immense extent of suburbs and gardens extending nearly to the walls of the town, have such cover for their attacks that it has been very difficult to repel them, and at the same time to inflict such a loss as would deter a repetition of them. They have frequently been driven back with loss, but they immediately take refuge under the grape fire of their heavy guns on the city walls, and, on our retirement, re-occupied their former positions; every such attack upon them has entailed a heavy loss upon our troops, which we can ill spare, and has done us little good. I shall be reinforced by a siege-train from Firúzpur by the end of this or the beginning of next month, when I intend to commence more offensive operations against the city; but I cannot hold out any hope of being able to

Who and what sort of a man was he to whom the commander of the besieging army, at this important conjuncture, made his earnest appeal? Major Baird Smith was an honour even to the Corps of Engineers. To a knowledge ^{Baird Smith.} founded on extensive reading, to a mind which had thought out the several problems pertaining to Indian administration, he added a power of prompt and decisive action rarely bestowed except upon the senior wranglers of the University of Nature. He had travelled much, had mastered the several methods in which, in the countries of continental Europe, science, and especially the engineering science, had been laid under contribution to develop the latent forces of nature; and in India, had, as the administrative agent to whom was entrusted the completion of the Ganges Canal, applied the experience thus acquired to the perfection of that great work. The genius which could grasp great schemes of administrative reform was equally at home in the performance of those duties with which the military side of his profession brought him into contact. Chief Engineer of the army before Dehli, he had brought to the performance of his duties the large mind, the profound knowledge, the prompt decision which had characterised him in his civil work. Neither the shock and pain caused by a wound, nor the weakness and emaciation produced by a severe attack of camp scurvy, aggravated by diarrhoea, depressed his spirit or lessened his energies. Refusing to be placed on the sick list, though assured that mortification would be the consequence of a continued use of his wounded leg, Baird Smith clung to the last to the performance of his duty. The advice which he gave to General Wilson proved that never was his courage higher, take the place until supported by the force from below. As an artillery officer, I have no hesitation in giving my opinion that the attack on Dehli, garrisoned and armed as it now is, is as arduous an undertaking as was the attack on Bharatpúr in 1825-26, for which 25,000 troops and 100 pieces of artillery were not considered too large a force. I enclose a return of the original force which was sent down to capture this strong place, and also a return of the present effective force, including sick and wounded, from which his Lordship will see how desperate would have been any attempt to take the city by assault, more especially as the mutineers keep a large portion of their force encamped outside the city walls, who, on our assaulting the city, could easily attack and capture our camp, with all our hospitals, stores, and ammunition, unless a strong provision was made against it. Something of this sort I intend forwarding to the Governor-General, and shall be glad if you will return this with such remarks and emendations as your experience as Chief Engineer suggests."

never were the tone and temper of his mind more healthy, than when, bowed down by two diseases and suffering acutely from his wound, he seemed a livid wreck of the man he once had been.

It was to such a man that Wilson appealed. The answer was clear, emphatic, decisive. Baird Smith was for action, for prompt and immediate action. True it is, he reasoned, the besieged are more numerous than the besiegers; true it is their resources are greater, their position is formidable, their defences are strong. But in war something must be risked. In his opinion the risk of a repulse in a well-contrived and well-organised assault was infinitely less than the risk which would attend the waiting during a long and uncertain period for reinforcements from below. The waiting for reinforcements involved inaction—an inaction which might last for weeks. Such inaction, at a time when the Panjáb, denuded of its last troops, was quivering in the balance, involved a risk greater even than the risk of a repulse before the walls of the city. Nor was this last danger so great, in Baird Smith's estimation, as the General seemed to consider. He believed that it would be possible, by skilfully preparing and effectively delivering an assault, to reduce it to a small proportion. He gave the fullest expression, in his reply, to these convictions, and concluded by urging the General to prepare for and to deliver that assault without delay—before the enemy should have time to strengthen his position within and without the beleaguered city.

These arguments, forcible, clear, based on logic and reason, had their natural effect on General Wilson. Though he did not share to the full Baird Smith's opinions as to the probable result of an assault, he was brought to regard the risk which would thus be encountered as considerably less than the risk which would be involved by inaction. He yielded * then, and directed the Chief Engineer to prepare a plan of attack.

The reasons which influenced Baird Smith to advise immediate action.

Wilson yields, though without being convinced.

* General Wilson wrote thus on Baird Smith's memorandum: "It is evident to me that the results of the proposed operations will be thrown on the hazard of a die; but, under the circumstances in which I am placed, I am willing to try this hazard—the more so as I cannot suggest any other plan to meet our difficulties. I cannot, however, help being of opinion that the chances of success, under such a heavy fire as the working parties will be exposed to, are anything but favourable. I yield, however, to the judgment of the Chief Engineer."

The reluctant assent of General Wilson threw, practically, upon the shoulders of his Chief Engineer the responsibility for the assault. Far from shrinking from the burden, Baird Smith eagerly seized it. In conjunction with his second in command, Captain Alexander Taylor, a most able and indefatigable member of the same corps, one of those men who, once tried in difficult circumstances, are found to be indispensable, he submitted a plan—previously prepared, but subject to alteration resulting from daily-gained experience—simple, bold, and effective—easily workable, on the sole condition of hearty and zealous co-operation and obedience on the part of his subordinates. The result showed how well placed was the confidence bestowed by the Chief Engineer in the officers serving under his orders.

Baird Smith and Taylor prepare a plan of assault.

Before adverting to that plan, I propose to lay before the reader a short description of the defences of, and the approaches to Dehlí.

The characteristic features of the place were, at the time, thus officially described by Baird Smith: "The eastern face rests on the Jamnah, and during the season of the year when our operations were carried on the stream may be described as washing the base of the walls. All access to a besieger on the river front is therefore impracticable. The defences here consist of an irregular wall, with occasional bastions and towers, and about one half of the length of the river face is occupied by the palace of the King of Dehlí, and its out-work, the old Mughul fort of Selimgarh. The river may be described as the chord of a rough arc formed by the remaining defences at the place. These consist of a succession of bastioned fronts, the connection being very long, and the out-works limited to one crown-work at the Ajmir gate, and martello towers mounting a single gun at such points as require additional flanking fire to that given by the bastions themselves. The bastions are small, generally mounting three guns in each face, two in each flank, and one in the embrasure at the salient. They are provided with masonry parapets about twelve feet in thickness, and have a relief of about sixteen feet above the plane of site. The curtain consists of a simple masonry wall or rampart sixteen feet in height, eleven feet thick at top, and fourteen or fifteen at bottom. This main wall carries a parapet loop-holed for musketry, eight feet in height and eight feet in thickness. The whole of the land front is covered by a berm of variable width, ranging from sixteen to thirty feet, and having a scarp wall eight feet high. Exterior to this is a dry ditch, of about twenty-five feet in width, and from sixteen to twenty feet in depth. The counterscarp is simply an earthen slope easy to descend. The glacis is a very short one, extending only fifty or sixty yards from the counterscarp. Using general terms, it covers from the besiegers' view from half to one third of the height of the walls of the place. The defences, in a word, are 'modernised' forms of ancient works that existed when the city fell before Lord Lake's army in 1803. They extend about seven miles in circumference, and include an area of about three square miles. On the western side of Dehlí there appear the last out-lying spurs of the Aravalli mountains, and represented here by a low ridge, which disappears at its intersection with the Jamnah, about two miles above the place. The drainage from the eastern slope of the ridge finds its way to the river along the northern and the north-western faces of the city, and has formed there a succession of parallel or connected ravines of considerable depth. By taking advantage of these hollow ways admirable cover was constantly obtained for the troops, and the labour of the siege was materially reduced. The whole of the exterior of the place presents an extraordinary mass of old buildings of all kinds, of thick brushwood, and occasional clumps of forest trees, giving great facilities for cover, which, during the siege operations at least, proved to be on the whole more favourable to us than to the enemy."

The fortifications of Dehlí.

Such being the place, the plan of assaulting it traced by Baird Smith and Taylor may thus be described.

It was inevitable that the attack should be made on the northern face of the fortress—the face represented by the Morí, Kashmír, and Water bastions, and the curtain walls connecting them. These connecting curtains were merely parapets, wide enough only for musketry fire. It had been in the power of the enemy greatly to strengthen these defences by pulling down the adjacent buildings, and on their ruins erecting a rampart, from which a continued fire of heavy guns should be concentrated on an attacking force. In neglecting, as a rule, to use the advantage thus open to them, the rebel leaders added another example to many preceding it, of the absence from their councils of a really capable commander. The neglect was likely to be fatal to attack.

Plan of the

the defence, for it enabled the besiegers to concentrate on the curtains a fire sufficient to crush the defenders' fire and to effect breaches through which the infantry could be launched against the town.

The plan of the Chief Engineer, then, was to crush the fire of the Morí bastion at the north-west corner of the city. That fire silenced, the advance on the extreme left, which was covered by the river, would be secure, and there the assault would be delivered.

The simple wisdom of this plan will be at once recognised. In the first place the advance was effectually covered by the river on one flank, and partially so by trees and brushwood in front. The assault delivered, the assailants would not be at once involved in narrow streets, but there would be a space comparatively open in which they could act.

Its simplicity and wisdom.

On the 6th September all the reinforcements which could be expected, together with the siege-train, had arrived in camp. The effective rank and file, of all arms, amounted to eight thousand seven hundred and forty-eight men, of whom three thousand three hundred and seventeen were Europeans. In line with, and acting with them, were two thousand two hundred native levies from Kashmír, and some hundreds from Jhínd.

Sept. 6.

Effective number of the besieging
force.

The evening of the 7th was fixed upon for the commencement of the tracing of the batteries which were to assail the northern face of the city. On that day General Wilson issued to the troops an order, in which he announced to them that the time was drawing near when he trusted their labours would be over, and they would be rewarded for all their past exertions, and for the fatigue still before them, by the capture of the city. Much, he reminded the infantry, still remained to be accomplished. They had to aid and assist the engineers alike in the erection of the batteries and in covering parties; and, when the way should be smoothed for them by the scientific branches of the service, they would have to dare death in the breach. When it should come to that point it would be necessary for them to keep well together, to push on in compact and unbroken masses.

Sept. 7.

General
Wilson announces to the troops his intention to assault.

His appeal to
the infantry,

As for the artillery, their work, General Wilson warned them, would be harder than any they had till then encountered. He expressed, at the same time, his confidence that the members of that branch of the service would bring to the performance of that harder work the same cheerfulness and the same pluck which had characterised their labours up to that time.

Reminding the troops of the cruel murders committed on their officers and their comrades, as well as on their wives and children, General Wilson declared that, whilst the troops should spare the women and children who might fall in their way, they should give no quarter to the mutineers.

Upon the regimental officers he impressed the necessity of keeping their men together, of preventing plunder, of carrying out the directions of the engineers. The Major-General concluded by asserting his confidence that a brilliant termination of their labours would follow a zealous enforcement by the troops of his directions.

Before detailing the work which, on the evening of the 7th, followed the issue of this order, it is necessary to inform the reader that at the suggestion of Major Charles Reid,* who commanded on the ridge, a light battery had been erected on the night of the 6th upon the plateau of the ridge close to the Sámi' House. The object of this battery, known as Reid's battery, was to keep the ground clear and to protect the contemplated new heavy battery, No. 1, during its construction. Reid's battery contained eight light pieces, six 9-pounders, and two 24-pound howitzers, and was commanded by Captain Remmington.

To return.—On the evening of the day on which General Wilson's order was issued the engineers commenced their work. In pursuance of the resolve to trace out a battery, the fire from which should crush the Morí bastion, Captain Alexander Taylor, assisted by Captain Medley, proceeded at sunset, accompanied by half-a-dozen sappers, to Hindu Ráo's house. A site had previously been selected to the left of the Sámi' House, below the ridge on the open plain, and within seven hundred yards of the Morí bastion. Sand-bags had been taken down on the night of the 6th and covered over with grass and brushwood. These were found untouched by the enemy. The two engineers at once set to work to trace a battery on this spot. The battery, styled No. 1 battery, was divided into two sections. The right section, commanded by Major Brind,* intended to receive five 18-pounders and one 8-inch howitzer, was to silence the Morí bastion, and to prevent it from interfering with the real attack on the left; the left section, armed with four 24-pounders, under the command of Major Kaye, was designed to keep down the fire from the Kashmír bastion until the order to assault it should be given. These two sections were to be connected by a trench which, carried on beyond the left section, would communicate with the deep nullah close to the rear, and form a sort of first parallel, giving good cover to the guard of the trenches.

* Now General Sir Charles Reid, G.C.B.

Its right
section.

Its left
section.

The tracing of this battery had but just been completed when a strong covering party of Reid's Gurkhás arrived. Camels with fascines and gabions followed, and the work progressed rapidly during the night. The working parties were but little disturbed by the enemy, three well-directed showers of grape from the Morí alone reaching them.

The tracing completed.

In order to draw off the enemy's attention as much as possible, Major Reid, who was with Taylor and Medley, sent directions to Captain Remington to keep up a constant fire on the Morí bastion. This had the desired effect, for the Morí at once opened on Reid's battery and the Sámi' House, and did not again molest the working parties. Indeed the enemy did not discover till the day dawned this fresh work upon which the besiegers had been engaged. Much to their dismay they beheld Brind's battery all but completed. Though great efforts had been

Reid diverts
the fire from the Morí
bastion.

* Afterwards General Sir James Brind, K.C.B. He died at a ripe age last year (1888). General Wilson's orders in writing, and verbally given by the Assistant Adjutant-General of Artillery, Edwin Johnson, were to the effect that Major Brind, commanding the Foot Artillery of the Dehli Field Force, was to command the Key, or No. 1 battery; Majors Frank Turner and Edward Kaye being attached for the subordinate command of the right and left wings. Major Turner being struck down by serious illness, the left wing was placed under charge of Major Kaye, supervised throughout by Major Brind.

made, however, all was not ready in it, and but one gun was in position as the morning of the 8th dawned. The rebels on the Morí bastion were not slow to notice the results of the work of that long night. Instantaneously they took measures to demolish it. With the daylight there poured on the barely armed battery showers of grape and round shot. So terrible and so incessant was the fire, that almost every man who ventured from the protection of the battery was knocked over. To this storm the defenders of the battery had but one gun to reply. Major James Brind, one of the heroes of this long siege, who, as already stated, commanded the entire No. 1 battery, noting this, dragged, by great exertion, a howitzer to the rear, and fired over the parapet at the Morí. The fire of the enemy still poured in, however, fierce, incessant, relentless. Emboldened by the weakness of the British reply, they even thought it might be possible to carry by assault the newly made battery. With this object they despatched a body of cavalry and infantry from the Láhor gate. This little force, emerging from the gate with resolution, took at once the direction of the battery. But they had not gone far when they encountered a hot fire from the 18-pounder and howitzer in the right section of No. 1 battery, from the guns on the ridge, and the light guns on the plateau. This threw them into confusion—a confusion changed into a rout by the opportune discharge of a volley of grape from Brind's battery. The volley sent them back faster than they had come. All this time the men in this battery had been working hard, and, though pelted incessantly from the Morí bastion, they soon succeeded in finishing a second platform, then a third, soon after a fourth and a fifth. On the completion of each platform the gun placed on it opened at once on the enemy. The effect of the fire, thus gradually increasing, was soon felt on the Morí. In Major Brind the officers and men possessed a commander of great perseverance, rare energy, a strong will, and a thorough knowledge of his profession. Under his skilful direction the shot from the battery told with tremendous and unceasing effect on the masonry bastion. Gradually the fire from it diminished; by the afternoon it ceased altogether. The bastion was then

Sept. 8.

At dawn of day the enemy discover the new batteries.

Brind's splendid exertions.

The enemy's attempt to carry the battery is baffled.

The right section is armed.

Major Brind renders the Morí harmless.

a heap of ruins, and although the enemy, displaying rare courage, managed to replace the heavy guns in succession to those knocked over, and to discharge them at the battery, the want of cover made it deadly work, and their fire soon languished. One part of the Engineer's plan had thus been carried out. The Morí bastion had been made harmless. Heavy fire was, however, continued upon it from the right section and from the ridge until the night before the assault was delivered.

Whilst the right section of the battery had thus been blazing away at the Morí, the 24-pounders in the left section under Major Kaye had been doing their work well, their fire directed on the Kashmír bastion. This fire was continued day and night until noon on the 10th, when the battery caught fire from the constant discharge of our own guns. The sand-bags first caught the flame, then the fascines, made of dry brushwood, and at length the whole battery was in a blaze, which it was feared might extend to the right section and expense magazine.

The left
section

is destroyed by fire on the 10th.

Lieutenant Lockhart,* attached to Reid's Gurkhás, was at the time on duty with two companies of the regiment in the connecting trench between the two sections. The necessity to extinguish the fire was so apparent to him, that he at once suggested to Major Kaye whether it might not be possible to save the battery by working from the outside and top of the parapet. Kaye replied that he thought something might be done if a party were to take sand-bags to the top, cut them, and smother the fire with the sand. Lockhart instantly jumped on to the parapet, followed by six or seven Gurkhás, and began the work in the manner suggested. The enemy were not slow to discover what had happened, and, determined that the flames should not be extinguished, they at once brought every gun to bear on the blazing battery, pouring in a deadly fire of grape and musketry. Two of the Gurkhás fell dead, and Lockhart rolled over the parapet with a shot through his jaw. The shot, penetrating through the right cheek, passed under his tongue, and went out through the left cheek, smashing the right jaw to pieces.† The men, however,

Gallantry of Lieutenant Lockhart.

* Lieutenant Lockhart afterwards commanded, as Colonel Lockhart, the 107th Foot.

† The noble example set by Lockhart was witnessed by Major Reid, and persevered, and eventually succeeded, by means of the sand from the sand-bags, in extinguishing the fire, but the section was destroyed.

To return to the 7th. At the same time that the batteries just referred to were traced on the right, preliminary arrangements for the real attack had been made on the left. On the evening of the 7th, Kudsiabágh and Ludlow Castle were occupied by strong pickets. No opposition was offered to this occupation, the mutineers being impressed with the idea that the real attack would be made on the Morí. With these two posts strongly occupied as supports, the engineers were able, on the evening of the 8th, to trace out battery No. 2. This trace was made in front of Ludlow Castle, and five hundred yards from the Kashmír gate. Like battery No. 1—called, after the commandant, Brind's battery—it was divided into two portions, the right half being intended for seven heavy howitzers and two 18-pounders; the left, about two hundred yards distant, for nine 24-pounders. The fire from these two portions was intended to silence the fire from the Kashmír bastion, to knock away the parapet right and left that gave cover to the defenders,

Sept. 8.
Tracing of battery
No. 2.

mentioned as a case worthy, he considered, of the Victoria Cross. Unfortunately Reid's pencil reports, like many more despatches of his written daily from the ridge in pencil and under fire, were destroyed by General Wilson, as, being written in pencil and not in the regulated form, he could not consider them as "official." It thus happened that, when General Wilson penned his final despatch, he had none of Reid's pencil notes and reports to refer to. Reid subsequently represented that his recommendations had not been attended to; that he had again and again brought to notice the gallant conduct of the officers of the 60th Rifles and others who had served under him; and at length he himself sent in a supplementary despatch, through Colonel Norman, then Acting Adjutant-General. The reply he received was that in Lord Clyde's opinion "the time had altogether passed for publishing any further despatches relative to services of officers at Dehlí, which, however meritorious, are now of old date." This was in February 1859. Prior to this, Reid had been urging General Wilson to take notice of his recommendations. But it was in vain. Neither his pencil notes written under fire, nor his reports after the siege, were ever properly attended to, and many deserving officers were consequently left unrewarded. Among these was Captain John Fisher, second in command of the Sirmúr Battalion, who was on the ridge with the regiment throughout the siege, who commanded it during the assault, and who was the only officer out of nine who escaped being wounded. This officer did not even receive a brevet. For the same reason Major Reid's appreciatory mention of the services of the Engineer and Artillery officers, expressed in the strongest language, remained unpublished.

and to open the main breach by which the place was to be stormed.*

Warned by the experience of Brind's battery, no attempt was made to complete battery No. 2 in one night. On the 8th the tracing alone was completed. The wisdom of this cautious mode of proceeding was made clear the following day, when a sharp fire of shot, of shell, and of musketry was opened from the Kashmír and Water bastions, and the Selingarh, on the positions newly occupied. Little damage, however, was effected, and the work was pushed forward during the nights of the 9th and 10th. Before dawn of the 11th the battery had been completed and armed, and it was then unmasked. Major Campbell commanded the left section of it, and Major Kaye—transferred from the ignited left section of battery No. 1—the right, but the former officer having been wounded on the evening of the 11th, Captain Edwin Johnson,† Assistant Adjutant-General of Artillery, then serving in the battery, succeeded to the command, and held it to the moment of assault, when he resumed his place on General Wilson's staff.

The enemy
open fire upon it.

Sept. 9-11.

Battery No. 3.

The third battery was not completed before that night. This battery was traced by Captain Medley the evening of the 9th. With a boldness which was not rare, but the display of which, in this instance, testified to remarkable negligence on the part of the enemy, the engineers, supported by volunteers, both officers and men, from the Artillery and 9th Lancers, traced this battery within one hundred and sixty yards of the Water bastion. Seeking for a fit site for the battery, the director of the attack, Captain Medley, discovered a small ruined building, an out-office of the Custom House—a large edifice within one hundred and sixty yards of the Water bastion, and totally unoccupied by the enemy. Captain Medley took possession of the Custom House, and determined to trace

* These and the other details describing the plans of the engineers have been taken chiefly from a work entitled A Year's Campaigning in India. This book—written by Captain, afterwards Lieutenant-Colonel, Julius George Medley, R.E., himself a distinguished actor in the scenes he describes—gives an account of the proceedings at this memorable epoch of the siege, which may be almost styled authoritative, confirmed as it has been by the testimony of distinguished officers who took part in the preliminaries to the assault. Colonel Medley died about five years ago.

† Now Lieutenant-General Sir Edwin Johnson, G.C.B.

the battery inside the small ruined building referred to, the outer wall of which would conceal the work and give cover to the workmen. This daring measure completely succeeded. Though the enemy, suspecting something, though not the actual truth, peppered our workmen incessantly, these never flinched. When one man fell another would take his place.* Working in this way, the battery was finished and armed by the night of the 11th.

Another battery, No. 4, for four heavy mortars, commanded by Major Tombs, was traced and armed on the night of the 10th in a safe spot in the Kudsiabágh itself, ready to open fire when required.

The mutineers had by this time become alive to the fact that it was not from the right, but from the left, that the real attack was to issue. With an alacrity worthy of the highest praise they at once decided upon measures which, if commenced but forty-eight hours earlier, would have effectually baffled the attack. Seeing the effect which the fire from the still masked batteries must produce, they set to work to mount heavy guns along the long curtain. In other convenient nooks, out of reach of the fire of the attack, they mounted light guns.

Taking advantage, too, of the broken ground before them, they made in one night an advanced trench parallel to the left attack, and three hundred and fifty yards from it, covering the whole of their front. This trench they lined with infantry.

The heavy guns could not be mounted behind the long curtain in time to anticipate the attack; but at daybreak, on the morning of the 11th, the light guns above alluded to opened an enfilading attack from the right, whilst the muskets from the infantry and take measures to repel it.

The enemy detect the point from which the attack is to be made,

They open fire on the new batteries.

* Pándi did not know what we were at, but at any rate he knew the people were working in that direction, and he served out such a liberal supply of musketry and shell that night that the working party lost thirty-nine men killed and wounded. It was wonderful indeed to see with what courage the men worked.

“They were merely the unarmed Pioneers I have described above, and not meant to be fighting men. With the passive courage so common to natives, as man after man was knocked over, they would stop a moment, weep a little over their fallen friend, pop his body in a row along with the rest, and then work on as before.”—Medley.

in the new trench began a hot and unceasing fire. For a time there was no answer. But at 8 o'clock the two sections of No. 2 battery, unmasked, replied. They began with a salvo from the nine 24-pounders—a salvo greeted by cheers from the men in the battery. The effect was marked and decisive. As the site of the breach was struck huge fragments of stone fell, and the curtain wall disappeared in the ditch. The defenders on the Kashmír bastion attempted to reply, but in ten minutes their fire was silenced.

Effective
reply from
No. 2 battery.

For the rest of the day the guns of No. 2 battery continued to pound away at the walls. It was an exhilarating sight to watch the stone-work crumbling under the storm of shot and shell, the breach getting larger and larger, and the 8-inch shells, made to burst just as they touched the parapet, bringing down whole yards of it at a time.*

During the night the mortars from No. 3 battery kept the enemy on the alert with incessant fire. But the rebels were by no means idle. The light pieces already alluded to, reinforced by a heavy gun, playing from martello towers and from holes in curtain walls, maintained a constant and most effective front and enfilading fire on Nos. 1 and 2 batteries. This fire constantly raked our batteries from end to end. So terrible and so effective was it, that, at last, one of the guns of No. 1 battery was withdrawn from playing on the breach and placed in the epaulment to keep down, if possible, the enfilading fire. But even this did not prove very effectual. At one time General Wilson was inclined to make a rush at these guns from the right † and spike or capture them. But their position, within grape-shot of the curtain wall, rendered an attack on them difficult, and certain to be attended with loss. On the other hand, No. 3 battery would be completed on the morrow, and it was hoped that the effect of the full power of the artillery would be decisive.

The enemy's fire works destruction in
No. 1 and 2 batteries.

* Medley.

† In fact, Major Reid actually was instructed to make a night attack on the position, and four companies of Guides and Gurkhás were told off supplied with spikes for the purpose. At the same time the battery near the Sámi' House received orders from Major Reid to cover the attack and draw off the enemy's fire. Just then orders arrived from General Wilson countermanding the attack.

At 11 o'clock on the morning of the 12th, Greathed, of the Sep. 12. Engineers, aided by some native sappers, unmasked the embrasures. The battery was commanded by Major Scott, with the gallant Fagan as his second in command.
 In another minute the six guns of the battery
 No. 3 battery opens fire, opened fire. The effect was tremendous. The enemy's guns were dismounted or smashed; the Water bastion was beaten into a shapeless mass, and in a few hours the breach seemed almost practicable. But with tremen- the rebels showed no faint heart. Though their dous effect. guns were silenced, they continued to pour in so heavy and continuous a musketry fire that the air seemed alive with bullets. The loss of life was consequently severe. Fagan, who, in his over-anxiety to see the effect of the first salvo, had raised his head above the parapet, was shot dead. Still further to embarrass the attack, the enemy opened from the other side of the river an enfilading fire, which, though not so effective or so destructive as that carried on from martello towers, was still sufficiently annoying. But our gallant artillerymen never flinched. Throughout the day all the batteries poured in a fire from fifty guns and mortars on the devoted city.
 Splendid exertions of the Bengal Artillery. The heat was intense, the labour was severe, the danger was enormous. But during the long hours of the day, and of the night which slowly followed, those daring officers and men, sustained by the conviction that to their unflagging energies was entrusted a task necessary for the triumph of the British cause, stood firmly to their guns, resisting every weakness of the flesh, their hearts joined in one firm resolve, rejoicing in the sight of the Their con- destruction made by their guns, their mortars, tinued fire effects breaches in the defences. and their howitzers on the walls which had so long bidden them defiance.* The fire continued that day, that night, and the day following, the

* "At different times between the 7th and 11th," wrote Major Baird Smith in his despatch, "these batteries opened fire with an efficiency and a vigour which excited the unqualified admiration of all who had the good fortune to witness it. Every object contemplated in the attack was accomplished with a success even beyond my expectations; and I trust I may be permitted to say that, while there are many noble passages in the history of the Bengal Artillery, none will be nobler than that which will tell of its work on this occasion."

enemy still responding, and with considerable effect. On the afternoon of the 13th, General Wilson, in consultation with Baird Smith, thought that two sufficient breaches had been made. He accordingly directed that they should be examined.

For this dangerous duty four young engineer officers were selected, Medley and Lang for the Kashmir bastion, Greathed and Hone for the Water. The two first-named officers made their first attempt as soon as it was dusk, but they were discovered and fired at. They determined, therefore, to postpone the examination till 10 o'clock. To facilitate the accomplishment of his task, Medley requested the officers commanding the batteries to fire heavily on the breach till 10 o'clock, then to cease firing. He then arranged that six picked riflemen of the 60th Rifles should accompany himself and his companion, and that an officer and twenty men of the same regiment should follow in support, halting at the edge of the jungle while they went on to the breach. Should the officer see that the two engineer officers and party were being cut off, he was to bring his men to their support, sounding his whistle for them to fall back. Should, on the other hand, one of the examining party be wounded, or should the party require support, they were to whistle for him to advance.

Four engineers sent to examine the breaches.

Medley and Lang

It was a bright starlight night, and there was no moon. Just before the two officers and their party started, an 8-inch shell from the enemy buried itself deep in ground close to them, burst and covered them with earth. A minute later and the gongs sounded 10. The firing suddenly ceased. The explorers were at once on their feet, and, drawing swords, and feeling that their revolvers were ready to hand, began to advance stealthily into the enemy's country.

set out for the Kashmir bastion.

Safely, and without discovery, the two officers and their six followers reached the edge of the ditch. Not a soul was to be seen. The counter-scarp was sixteen feet deep, and steep. Lang slid down it; Medley then passed down by the ladder, and with two of the men descended after Lang, leaving the other four to retreat. In two minutes more they would have reached the top of the breach. But careful and stealthy as had been their movements, they had not

They reach the edge of the ditch:

cover the

descend into it;

been quite noiseless. Just at that moment they heard several men running from the left towards the breach.

find the enemy on the alert;

They, therefore, re-ascended, though with some difficulty, and, throwing themselves on the grass, waited for events. Prone in the deep shade, they could see, without being seen, against the clear sky, not twenty yards distant, a number of dusky forms. They watched them as they loaded their muskets. The moments were exciting, but the excitement did not return to the edge;

prevent Medley and his comrade from carefully examining, from the ground where they lay, the longed-for breach. They saw that it was large, that the slope was easy of ascent, and that there were no guns in the flanks. They had had experience that the descent was an easy one. It would be desirable, they felt, to reach the find the breach practicable;

top, but the dusky figures would not move, and any attempt to surprise them would be uncertain, and would involve possibly the loss of some, if not all, of their party. Besides, they had really gained the knowledge they had come to acquire. Medley, therefore, determined to be satisfied and to fall back. But how to fall back? There was but one way. Medley suddenly gave a preconcerted signal. At once they all started up and ran back. A volley followed them, but ineffectively. Untouched, they gained their own batteries and run back in safety.

in safety.

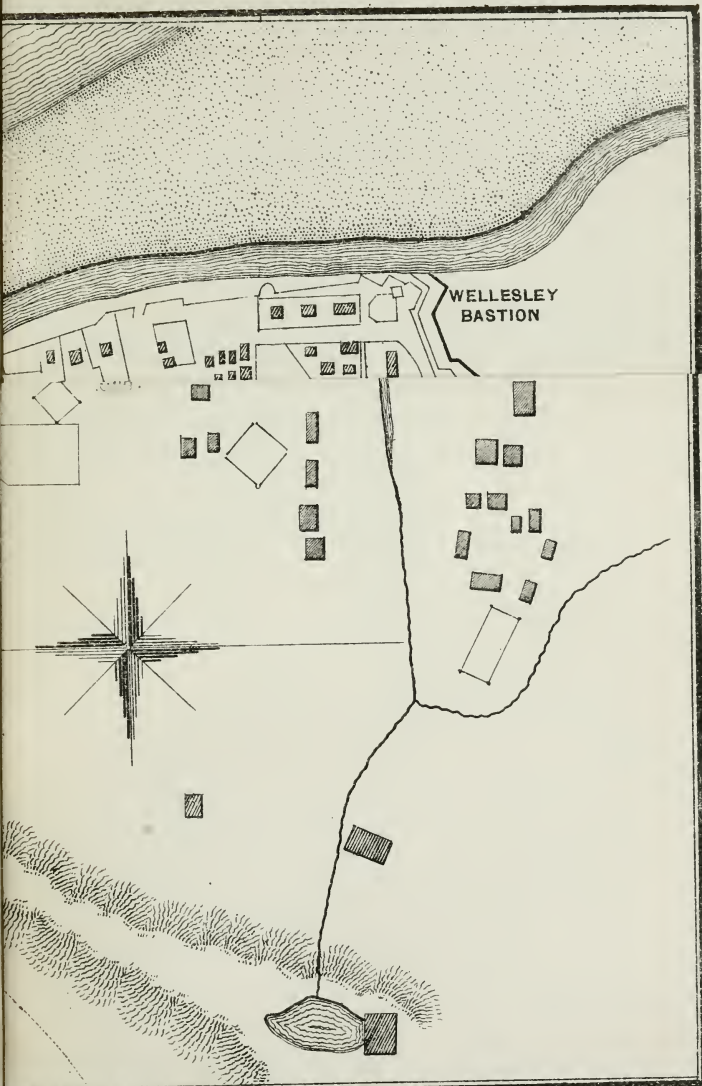

Greathed and Home had not been less successful in their expedition. They had examined the Water bastion; and, although they had found that the musketry parapets had not been so destroyed as they would be if the cannonade were to be continued a day or two longer, they reported the breach practicable.

Greathed and Home report the breach at the Water bastion practicable.

With these two reports before him, Baird Smith did not hesitate. The dangers of delay, the worn-out state of the men in the batteries, far outweighed any consideration which the condition of the musketry parapets in the Water bastion might suggest. He at once, then, advised General Wilson to deliver the assault at daybreak the following morning.

Baird Smith advises Wilson to deliver the assault at once.

In such a matter the General commanding could not but act on the advice thus tendered him. General Wilson immediately issued the necessary orders. To Brigadier

WELLESLEY
BASTION

PLAN
to illustrate the operations of the
BRITISH ARMY
BEFORE
DEHLI
IN THE YEAR 1857.

Scale, 4 Inches to a Mile

General Nicholson, of the Bengal Army, whose triumphant march through the Punjáb and subsequent victory at Najafgarh had made him the hero of the campaign, was assigned the command of the first column, destined to storm the breach near the Kashmír bastion, and escalate the face of the bastion. This column was composed of three hundred men of H.M.'s 75th Regiment under Lieutenant-Colonel Herbert; of two hundred and fifty men of the 1st Fusiliers* under Major Jacob; and of four hundred and fifty men of the 2nd Punjáb Infantry, under Captain Green; in all, one thousand men. The engineer officers attached to this column were Lieutenants Medley, Lang, and Bingham.

Wilson accepts the advice and assigns the commands of the several assaulting columns.

First column
Nicholson.

The second column was commanded by Brigadier William Jones, C.B., of H.M.'s 61st Regiment. It was formed of two hundred and fifty men of H.M.'s 8th Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Greathed; of two hundred and fifty men of the 2nd Fusiliers,† under Captain Boyd; of three hundred and fifty men of the 4th Sikh Infantry, under Captain Rothney; in all, eight hundred and fifty men. This column was to storm the breach in the Water bastion. The engineer officers attached to it were Lieutenants Greathed, Hovenden, and Pemberton.

Second column,
Brigadier William
Jones.

The command of the third column was confided to Colonel Campbell, H.M.'s 52nd Foot. It was composed of two hundred men of the 52nd, under Major Vigers; of two hundred and fifty men of the Kumáun Battalion, under Captain Ramsay; of five hundred men of the first Panjáb Infantry, under Lieutenant Nicholson: in all, nine hundred and fifty men. The duty assigned to it was to assault by the Kashmír gate after it should have been blown open. The engineer officers attached to it were Lieutenants Home, Salkeld, and Tandy.

Third column,
Colonel
Campbell.

The fourth column was commanded by Major Reid of the Bengal Army. It consisted of the Sirmur Battalion,‡ the Guide Corps, and such of the pickets, European and native, as could be spared from Hindu Ráo's house; in all (of these) eight hundred and sixty Fourth column,

Major Reid.

* Now 1st Battalion Royal Munster Fusiliers.

† Now 2nd Battalion Royal Munster Fusiliers.

‡ Now the Prince of Wales's Own Gurkhás.

men. But, in addition, there was a portion of the contingent of the Maharájah of Kashmír, commanded by Captain Richard Lawrence, and consisting of twelve hundred men. The task assigned to this column was to attack the suburb Kishanganj, and to enter the Láhor gate.* The engineer officers attached to this column were Lieutenants Maunsell and Tennant.

The fifth, or reserve column was commanded by Brigadier Longfield of H.M.'s 8th Regiment. It was composed Fifth column, as follows: two hundred and fifty men, H.M.'s 61st
 Brigadier Regiment, under Lieutenant-Colonel Deacon; four Longfield, hundred and fifty men, 4th Panjáb Infantry, under Captain Wilde; three hundred men, Bilúch Battalion, under Lieutenant-Colonel Farquhar; three hundred men of the Rajah of Jhínd's auxiliary force, under Lieutenant-Colonel Dunsford; in all, one thousand three hundred men. To these were subsequently added two hundred men of the 60th rifles, under Lieutenant-Colonel John Jones of that regiment, detailed in the first instance to cover the advance. This column, acting as a reserve, was to follow the first column. The engineer officers attached to it were Lieutenants Ward and Thackeray.

The officers appointed to the command of the five assaulting columns were, then, Nicholson, Jones, Campbell,
 The com- Reid, and Longfield. They were all picked men, manders of fitted alike by nature and by training for the task the assault- about to devolve upon them. Of Nicholson it is un-ing columns. necessary to say much. His exploits in the Panjáb, and but a few days before at Najafgarh, had made him the pa-Nicholson. ladin of the army. The commander of the second column, Brigadier William Jones, had served at Chiliánwálá and at Gujrát; had co-operated in the destruction of Jones. the enemy after that crowning victory by pursuing

* This was the plan laid down by General Wilson. Had Reid attempted to follow it literally, that is, to enter by the Láhor gate, his troops would have been exposed to the fire of the left face of the Láhor bastion, of the right face of the Burn bastion, and to the musketry fire from the loop-holed curtain connecting both bastions, which had been untouched by our artillery. Reid wrote to General Wilson to say that his column would be destroyed if he attempted anything of the sort, and proposed that, after taking Kishanganj and the suburbs, he should leave the Jammú contingent in the fortified sarai, and follow the dry bed of the canal, where his troops would be under cover the whole way to the Kábul gate, which, he had arranged with Nicholson, should be opened for him from the inside.

them, at the head of his regiment and a troop of artillery, to the Khaibar pass; and, during the siege of Dehli, had distinguished himself as brigadier of the 3rd Infantry Brigade. Colonel Campbell, commanding the third column, was the colonel of the 52nd. He had commanded his regiment with distinguished gallantry at Siálkôt, where it formed part of Nicholson's force. Campbell.

Major Reid, of the fourth column, belonged to the Bengal Army. Major Charles Reid had served in Sindh under Sir Charles Napier, throughout the Satlaj and Burmese wars, and had ever distinguished himself not less by energy and daring, than by readiness of resource and presence of mind. During the siege, whilst the remainder of the attacking force had occupied the old parade ground, covered by the ridge, Reid alone had held the ridge. All the pickets detached from the main force to various points on the ridge had been under his orders, and his only. The posts thus under his command had included the main picket at Hindu Ráo's house, the Observatory, the Sámi' House, the Crow's Nest, and the Sabzimandi. On the positions so indicated he had, between the 8th June* and the 14th September, repulsed no less than twenty-six attacks, displaying a daring, a coolness, and a presence of mind not to be surpassed. On the 17th June, with a small force of four companies of the 60th Rifles, his own regiment, the Sirmur Battalion, and twenty-five sappers, he had stormed the strong position of Kishanganj, destroying the enemy's batteries stationed there, and returning the same evening to his position on the ridge. Brigadier Longfield, commanding the reserve column, was brigadier of the second brigade during the siege. His conspicuous services fully entitled him to the post which was assigned him on this memorable occasion. Reid.
Longfield.

It was 3 o'clock in the morning. The columns of assault were in the leash. In a few moments they would be slipped. What would be the result? Would the skill and daring of the soldiers of England triumph against superior numbers—defending, and defended by, stone walls; or would rebellion, triumphing over the assailants, turn that triumph to a still greater account by inciting by its means to its aid the Panjáb and the other parts of India still quivering in the balance? That, indeed, was the question. The fate of Dehlí was in itself the smallest of the results to be gained by a successful assault. The fate of India was in the balance. The repulse of the British would entail the rising of the Panjáb!

* Major Reid's services in the mutiny commence from even a prior date. He marched with his regiment from Dehrá on the 14th May, 1857, and by his vigorous action in the disturbed district of Balandshahr, opened communications with Mirath and Áligarh, and with the seat of Government in Calcutta, a service of vital importance, for which he received the thanks of the Governor-General in Council.

Sept. 14.
The enormous stake dependent on the result of the assault.

It had been decided that, whilst the first and second columns should direct their attack against the breaches near the Kashmír and Water bastions, an explosion party should steal ahead and blow up the Kashmir gate, through which the third column should then effect an entrance into the city. The explosion party consisted of Lieutenants Home and Salkeld of the Engineers; of Sergeants Smith, Carmichael, and Corporal Burgess, alias Grierson, of the Sappers and Miners; of Bugler Hawthorne, H.M.'s 52nd Light Infantry; and of eight native sappers. It was covered by two hundred men of the 60th Rifles, under Lieutenant-Colonel Jones of that regiment. The duty devolving on the Sappers and Miners and their officers, was, it is almost needless to state, to blow up the Kashmír gate; that of Bugler Hawthorne was to announce, by means of his bugle, to the storming party, that the explosion had done its work completely.

The order of assault.

Though preparations had been made to advance to the assault a little after 3 in the morning, some slight delay occurred, and the day was dawning ere the columns were in motion. All this time the besiegers' batteries were pouring in a heavy and continuous fire—a fire which the enemy, always on the alert, answered with rockets, shells, and round shot. It was amid the din and tumult caused by this artillery duel that, just after dawn, the first, second, and third columns started on their tremendous rrand. General Nicholson had the general management of the attack. He looked quiet but anxious. General Wilson rode up just as the columns were advancing, evidently full of anxiety.* No wonder that he was anxious, knowing, as he did

The first, second, and third columns set out.

* Medley. The General and staff remained at Ludlow Castle and the assault took place. "I well remember," writes to me Colonel Turnbull who know, the enormous issues at stake on the result of the dawning day's work.

The columns advanced as far as the ground opposite Ludlow Castle. There they halted. The first column then moved sharply to the left to take up its position in Kudsiabágh, there to wait for the signal; the second went further to the left, and formed up behind No. 3 battery; the third remained on the high road, to await there the bugle-sound which was to summon them to the Kashmír gate. The signal for the assault of the first and second columns was to be the sudden advance of the skirmishers of the 60th Rifles.

Their progress to the ground opposite Ludlow Castle.

The columns having taken up their positions, Nicholson gave the signal. The Rifles at once dashed to the front with a cheer, extending along and skirmishing through the low jungle—which at this point extends to within fifty yards of the ditch—and opening at the same time a fire on the enemy on the walls. At the sound of their advance, the engineer officers attached to the first column, previously posted on the edge of the jungle whence the column was to advance towards the breach, waved their swords to show the way to the stormers. The fire from our batteries had ceased, whilst that of the enemy, now thoroughly alive to the nature of the contest, continued incessant. Through this fire Medley and Lang and the ladder-men advanced at a quick walk till they reached the edge of the cover. Then, forming their ladder-men into a sort of line, they rushed to the breach, closely followed by the storming party, and in a minute gained the crest of the glacis. They were here in the open exposed to a terrific and unceasing fire from the breach and the open parapet walls, which told with fatal effect. So continuous was it that for ten minutes it was impossible to let down the ladders. "Man after man was struck down, and the enemy, with yells and curses, kept up a terrific fire, even catching up stones from Nicholson gives the signal to push on.

The engineers of the first column reach the breach.

The assailants are met by a terrible fire, was then serving on his staff, "leaving our horses outside, on his asking whether any one knew the way up to the top of Ludlow Castle. I led the way—we were all on foot—up the grand drive to the house. The General, behind me, when a shell tore up the ground, across the road, between us—turned round; the General smiled, and merely said: 'All right; go on.'" the breach in their fury, and, dashing them down, dared the assailants to come on."* But, undaunted by these cries and by the fire by which they were accompanied, the British soldiers did push on. They succeeded at length in getting two of the ladders into the ditch, and instantly the officers led their men down them.† Once in the ditch, to mount the escarp and scramble up the breach was the work of an instant. But the enemy did not wait for them. The insulting yells and curses ceased as the whilom utterers hurriedly vacated their position. "The breach was won, and the supporting troops pouring in fast, went down the ramp into the main-guard below."‡ but by desperate valour gain the breach.

Whilst the first column was thus carrying out, with daring and success, the work assigned to it, the second, under Brigadier William Jones, C.B., had not been less occupied. Led by its engineers, Greathed and Hovenden, the column advanced towards the breach in the Water bastion. By some mistake the supporting party of the stormers pressed forward on the right of the party, and, rushing to the counterscarp of the curtain, slid into its ditch, climbed its breach, and won the rampart. The stormers of the 8th,§ however, most of them carrying ladders, followed the engineers to the Water bastion. They had to make a slight détour to the right to avoid some water in the ditch, and, being in the open, they were exposed to the full fury of the enemy's fire, which, at this point, was incessant and well directed. The two engineer officers fell, severely wounded, and of the thirty-nine ladder-men, twenty-nine were struck down in a few minutes. But here, as at the Kashmír gate, British valour was not to be daunted. The ladders were at length placed and the breach was carried by the survivors, twenty-five

The second column.

Hovenden,

The bulk of it turn off to the right and gain the rampart.

however,

The stormers of the 8th King's incessant and well directed. The two engineer officers fell, severely wounded, gain the breach of the Water gate.

* Medley, who is my chief authority for all the details of the assault.

† The storming parties pushed on, two ladders were thrown into the ditch, and a brave officer, Fitzgerald, of H.M.'s 75th Regiment, who was killed directly afterwards, was the first to mount. As soon as I saw my first ladder down, I slid down into the ditch, mounted up the escarp, and scrambled up the breach, followed by the soldiers."—Medley.

‡ Medley.

§ Captain Baynes, Lieutenants Pogson and Metge, and seventy-five rank and file.

in number, headed by Captain Baynes, next to whom in seniority was Sergeant Walker.

Meanwhile the remainder of the column, which had entered by the curtain breach, had done wonders. Their entrance into a vital point of the defences, where an attack had not been expected, for the moment paralysed the enemy.

Brigadier Jones, who, in command of the column, had displayed great gallantry, took advantage of the disorder into which his sudden attack had thrown the defenders, to clear the ramparts as far as the Kábul gate, on the top of which he planted the column flag,* carried by a private of the 61st, Andrew Laughnan.

Brigadier Jones presses forward to the Kábul gate.

Before recording the proceedings of the third column, I propose to follow the explosion party, on whose action the movements of that column were to depend.

The composition of this party has already been given. Posted in front of the third column, it advanced straight on the Kashmír gate, in the face of a very hot fire.

The explosion party.

Undeterred by this fire, Lieutenant Home and four men, each carrying a bag of twenty-five pounds of powder, pushed on through a barrier gate, which was found open, across the ditch, to the foot of the great double gate. So great was the audacity of this proceeding, that, for a few seconds, it completely paralysed the enemy.

Splendid audacity of Home.

Firing only a few straggling shots, they closed the wicket with every appearance of alarm, and Home, after laying his bags, had time to jump into the ditch unhurt. Salkeld was not so fortunate. Before he could reach the gate the enemy had recovered from their panic, and, divining his object, had taken prompt measures to thwart it. From either side of the top of the gateway, and from the open wicket close by, they began to pour upon him and his party a deadly fire. Salkeld, nevertheless, laid his bags,

Salkeld lays his bags, but is wounded.

but was almost immediately after shot through the arm and leg, and fell back disabled on the bridge. He handed the portfire to Sergeant Burgess, bidding him light the fusee. Burgess, trying to obey, was shot dead. Sergeant Carmichael then seized the port-

Burgess and Carmichael are killed.

* This flag was presented by Sir William Jones to Her Majesty the Queen on the 1st January, 1877, the day of the proclamation of Her Majesty's title of Empress of India.

fire, lighted the fusee, but immediately fell, mortally wounded. The other sergeant, Smith, thinking that Carmichael had failed, rushed forward to seize the portfire, but noticing the fusee burning, threw himself into the ditch. The next moment the massive gate was shattered with a tremendous explosion. Home at once ordered Hawthorne to sound the bugle-call.* Fearing that in the noise of the assault the sound might not be heard, he had it repeated three times. The 52nd, anxiously awaiting the signal, did not hear it; but their colonel, the gallant Campbell, who also commanded the column, in front of which he had posted himself, noticing the explosion, and expecting the call, asked, not hearing it himself, whether it had reached the ears of any of those about him. Though no one had heard it, Campbell felt that at so critical a moment action was better than standing still.

Wonderful escape of Smith.

Home orders
the advance to be sounded.

Campbell does not hear the sound, but orders the advance on hearing the explosion.

He at once ordered the advance. The column responded eagerly. The 52nd gallantly led the way, and in less than a minute after the bugle had sounded they dashed on over the bridge, and entered the city just as the other columns had won the breaches.†

The 3rd
column.

Colonel Campbell, on gaining the main-guard inside the gate, at once re-formed his column, and pushed on with the intention of occupying the Kotwáli, and, if possible, the Jámi Masjid. He cleared the Water bastion, within which some of the enemy were still lurking, the church, and the enclosure known as the "Dehlí Gazette compound," and forced his way through the

Campbell
pushes on to within sight of the Jámi Masjid.

* A more daring and gallant achievement than that of the officers and non-commissioned officers mentioned in the text has never been recorded. Their subsequent fate cannot but inspire interest. Burgess and Carmichael were killed on the spot; Salkeld, Home, Smith, and Hawthorne were recommended by General Wilson for the Victoria Cross. But Salkeld succumbed in a few days to the severe wounds he had received; Home met his death shortly afterwards at Malagarh; Smith and Hawthorne survived, to receive the honours that they had so nobly earned. When Salkeld was dying, Sir Archdale sent an officer on his staff, Lieutenant Turnbull, of the 75th, to give him a bit of red ribbon, representing the Victoria Cross, to see whether this might stimulate him, and, as was hoped, save his life. All he could say was: "It will be gratifying to send it home."

† Lieutenant Home's Report; Bulger Hawthorne's Statement; Medley; Bayley's Assault of Dehlí.

Kashmír gate bazaar. A gun which commanded the line of advance was carried by a rush of a party of the 52nd, under Lieutenant Bradshaw, who, however, paid with his life on the spot the penalty of his daring. Still pressing forward, Campbell reached the gate opening on the Chándní Chauk. Forcing this, he advanced without much opposition, except from a musketry fire from a few houses. A sudden turn of the road brought him within sight of the Jámi Masjid, its arches and gates bricked up, impossible to be forced without powder-bags or guns, rendered safe against assault from mere infantry. Unwilling to forego the chance of storming this formidable position, Campbell remained in front of it for half an hour, under a fire of musketry from the houses, in the expectation of the successful advance of the other columns. But as time went on, and there were no visible signs of the approach of the one or the other, Campbell deemed it advisable to retire on the Begam Bágh, a large enclosure. He held this place for an hour and a half, exposed to a heavy fire of musketry, grape and canister. Here I must leave him whilst I trace the progress of the fourth column.

For want of support retires on the Begam bágh.

Much depended on the success of its attack. Commanded by Major Reid, it was designed to move from Hindu Ráo's house, on the right, against the suburbs of Kishanganj and Paháripúr, with a view of driving the enemy thence and effecting an entrance at the Kábul gate after it should be taken by General Nicholson. The successful advance of the first, second, and third columns depended, then, very much on the result of this flank attack.

Attack of the fourth column.

Major Reid's column, composed of detachments from eight different regiments, eight hundred and sixty men in all, with a reserve of twelve hundred infantry of the Jammú contingent, formed up at 4.30 A.M. on the Grand Trunk Road, opposite the Sabzimandi picket. Before 5 A.M. the column was ready, but the four horse artillery guns which were ordered to accompany the column had not arrived. Presently the guns came up, but the officer reported that there were only sufficient gunners to man one gun. Reid had no intention of taking one gun into action contrary to the rules of the service, so he directed the officer to obtain the full complement of gunners as soon as possible. It was now broad daylight, and Reid was anxiously listening for the explosion (the blowing in of the Kashmír gate), which was to have been the signal to advance, when he heard musketry fire on his right, and soon discovered that the party of the Jammú troops, four hundred infantry and four guns, which he had ordered to proceed direct from the camp at 3.45 A.M., for the purpose of making a diversion by occupying the Idgar, had become engaged with the enemy. No time under these circumstances was to be lost, so he at once pushed on with the column without the horse artillery guns, and more than half an hour before the attack of the other columns.

His column deficient in guns.

The Jammú troops, sent by Reid to make a diversion, become engaged with the enemy.

The detachment of the 60th Rifles, under Captain Muter, was thrown out in skirmishing order to the right of the road, while a feeling party of the Guides was sent a short distance ahead of the column. When within sixty yards of the canal bridge, Reid discovered that the enemy had manned their breast-works across the road, as also one work running parallel to the road, and that both of them had been considerably strengthened during the night. The head of the column approached the first line of breast-works, within fifty yards, when the enemy poured in a tremendous volley. The 60th Rifles meanwhile closed to the left, and with the Sirmur Gurkhás, made a dash, and instantly drove the enemy from his first line of defence. They at once retreated on their second line. Meanwhile a steady fire was kept up by the enemy from the loop-holed wall of Kishanganj, eighteen feet high, which completely commanded the position now gained by the head of Reid's column, and many of his men fell. Reid, who was standing on the parapet of the canal bridge, now observed that the enemy had been reinforced from the city. They came in thousands down the dry bed of the canal over which Reid was standing, and a large body appeared on the road, hesitating apparently whether they should drive our men from the breast-work already gained, or attack the detachment of the Jammú troops on the right, which had never approached the Idgar—a result of their starting from the camp nearly an hour after the time laid down. Guns at this time, whilst the enemy stood in a mass on the road, would have been invaluable, and would have proved of the greatest service to Reid, but, though the guns had been sent, no gunners, through some unaccountable mistake, were available to man them.

Reid advances.

Embarrassment felt by Reid from the want of artillery.

Reid was just about to feign an attack in front of the Kishanganj heavy batteries, whilst he should direct a real one in their flank and rear, when he was knocked over the parapet of the bridge with a musket-shot wound in the head, his engineer officer, Lieutenant Maunsell, who was standing near him, being struck in the same place. Up to this time, Reid states in his despatch, "all was going on admirably, the troops were steady, and well in hand, and I made sure of success." How long he lay on the ground insensible is not known—all thought he was dead—but when he came to his senses he found himself on the back of one of his Gurkhás. He then saw the party of the Jammú contingent on his right hard pressed. He sent for Captain Lawrence, who was his second in command, and, presently meeting him, directed him to take command and to support the right. The reserve, under Captain Lawrence, consisting of twelve hundred infantry of the Jammú contingent, was in rear of the column. The detached party of four hundred infantry destined for the Idgar had, meanwhile, become perfectly disorganised. They rushed into the main column, and caused the greatest confusion, making it difficult to distinguish friend from foe.

Reid is struck down.

On reviving
he makes over command to Richard
Lawrence.

The interval which had elapsed between the fall of Major Reid and his handing over the command to his successor had been very disastrous to the attack. Whether Major Reid, had he not been struck, would have succeeded, must ever remain a matter for conjecture. The officer to whom he resigned the command was a very capable man. He was one of "the Lawrences," and in the many positions of trust he had occupied under the Government had always served with credit and success. On this occasion he was not wanting to the reputation of the family. Succeeding to the command at a moment when, to use the emphatic language of the late Sir Herbert Edwardes,* "the day was lost," he did all that it was possible for a brave and capable commander to do. Before the command was made over to him, before even he was aware that Reid had been wounded, many of the officers who had been carrying out Reid's instructions, receiving no orders, and recognising that the attack had failed, had resolved to fall back. Falling back, they came upon Captain Lawrence, to whom they reported themselves, and who, finding matters had proceeded so far, directed all his efforts to ensure that the retreat should be orderly. Meanwhile a fresh complication had arisen. Captain Muter of the 60th Rifles, who was with the attacking column, seeing Major Reid fall, and apparently regarding Captain Lawrence in the light only of a political officer attached to the Kashmír force, assumed the command of the portion of the column with which he was serving. This caused considerable confusion; Captain Lawrence

* In consequence of a statement made in a pamphlet reflecting on Captain Lawrence, the matter connected with the command of the column after Major Reid's fall, was referred to Sir Herbert Edwardes, whose opinion, therefore, may be accepted as final. Sir Herbert's words are: "Major Lawrence would have appeared as having done the best with a command to which he succeeded when the day was lost."

Captain Lawrence effects an orderly retreat despite many difficulties,

however, succeeded in asserting his authority, and, finding that there was no hope of obtaining the artillerymen who had been applied for, and that the enemy, pressing forward on the right flank of the column, threatened his rear, he retired leisurely and in good order on the batteries behind Hindú Ráo's house. The attack on the Idgar, conducted by a portion of the Kashmír troops under Captain Dwyer, was still more unfortunate. The Kashmírics, greatly outnumbered, were not only repulsed, but lost four guns.

the attack of which is repulsed.

The repulse of the fourth column greatly increased the difficulties of the assault. I left the first and second columns, to which I must now return, victorious inside the breach. Nicholson at once collected the great body of his column on the square of the mainguard, then, turning to the right, pushed forward along the foot of the walls towards the Láhor gate. The second column, under Brigadier Jones, had previously cleared the ramparts, and, passing the Morí bastion, had planted their flag, in the manner already indicated, on the summit of the Kábul gate. Nicholson advanced beyond this in the hope of feeling the support of the fourth column. But we have seen that the attack of this column had failed, and it was this failure which now rendered the position of the advanced assailants difficult and dangerous in the extreme.

Disastrous effect on the other columns of the repulse of the fourth column.

In pushing along the foot of the walls towards the Láhor gate our troops had been assailed by musketry fire from the houses in the place, and by grape and round shot from the Selingarh and the palace. This, however, had not impeded the advance. But when the column had reached the western extremity of the town, and ascertained that, by the failure of the fourth column, the defences there were still in the hands of the enemy, they saw that their entire position was altered, and that they had before them another struggle at least as serious as that which they had but just then overcome.

The Láhor gate of the city was the gate which led to the Chándní Chauk or principal street of the city.

This gate was commanded by a bastion about two-thirds of the way between it and the Kábul gate.

Position of the Láhor gate.

But to reach this bastion not only had narrow streets, the houses in which were strongly manned, to be forced, but at the left of the attacking party would be exposed to a very heavy fire from the enemy now concentrating there. It was a prospect such as to make the boldest leader pause. Nicholson was a

The enemy concentrate in the narrow streets leading to it.

man of great daring, but there were men with him at the time, not less brave, who pointed out to him that under the circumstances in which he found himself it would be wise to be content with establishing himself in the houses which dominated the position, and await intelligence before advancing further. Seymour Blane of the 52nd, who acted as his brigade-major, strongly pressed this advice upon him. Major Jacob of the 1st Fusiliers, a most able and gallant officer, and who commanded the regiment on the occasion, supported this view. But Nicholson was impatient to press on. He believed that delays were dangerous, that the fullest advantage should be taken, at the moment, of the successful storm. More than two hours had already elapsed since his men had stood triumphant on the breach. A firm footing in

Nicholson is anxious to force them, despite of remonstrances to the contrary.

the city had been gained. But this was not in itself sufficient. The repulse of the fourth column had renewed the hopes of the enemy. To destroy these it was necessary, in the opinion of Nicholson, to penetrate into the city.

In front of the column was a lane, tolerably straight, about ten feet wide, but narrowed in places by projecting buttresses or towers with parapets. Where these buildings existed the roadway was narrowed to about three feet.* The city side of the lane was bounded by houses with flat roofs and parapets. Not only were all these buildings strongly occupied by the enemy, but the lane was further defended by two brass guns; one, about a hundred and sixty yards from its opening, pointed in the direction of the advance; the second, about a hundred yards in rear of the other, commanding it. Behind both was a bullet-proof screen, whilst, projecting as it were, from the wall, was the bastion commanding the Láhor gate, armed with heavy pieces, and capable of holding a thousand men.

It was this formidable position that Nicholson decided to attack whilst yet the enemy might still be under the influence of their defeat at three out of the four points attacked. On receiving the order, his men dashed gallantly up the lane, took the first gun with a rush, and then pushed on to the second. But within ten yards of this they were assailed by a fire of grape and musketry, and volleys of stones and round shot, thrown by hand, so severe that they recoiled under the terrible and ceaseless shower. There was no shelter for them, and they were forced to retire. It would be difficult to paint in colours too bright the exertions of their officers. Conspicuous amongst these was Lieutenant Butler of the 1st Fusiliers. This officer penetrated up to the bullet-proof screen already mentioned. How he escaped with his life was a marvel. At the screen two bayonets were thrust at him which pinned him between them as if he were between the prongs of a fork. There he stood, unable to advance or to retire, until, firing his revolver down the loop-holes, he forced the men who were thrusting at him to withdraw their weapons.†

The assailants were, I have said, forced to retire. Only, however, for a few moments. Re-formed, they again advanced. Again they captured the first gun, which was spiked by Captain Greville, 1st Fusiliers; again they dashed at the second. As they rushed on, their leader, Major Jacob of the 1st Fusiliers, a cool, daring, and accomplished officer, was mortally wounded. Lying there on the ground, knowing his hour had come, the gallant Jacob called to his men to press onward. But the fire was tremendous. Wemyss, Greville, Caulfield, Speke, Woodcock, Butler, all officers belonging or attached to the 1st Fusiliers, were in turn struck down. The men, greatly discouraged, were falling back a second time, when rushed to the front. His voice never rang more nobly, his presence was never more inspiring, than when, waving his sword, he summoned the men to follow where their general led. But the broken order could not be restored in a moment, and, before a sufficient number of men could respond to the call, John Nicholson was struck down by a bullet which pierced his body.

* "The 1st Bengal Fusiliers in the Delhi Campaign," an article contributed to Blackwood's Magazine for January 1858.

† "The 1st Bengal Fusiliers in the Delhi Campaign."

Jacob is struck down, and with him many officers of the 1st Fusiliers.

Nicholson

Nicholson then rushes to the front,

but is pierced by a bullet.

The wound was mortal, and Nicholson knew it to be so. But neither the agony of the pain, nor the certain approach of death, could quench the ardour of that gallant spirit. He still called upon the men to go on. He insisted on lying there till the lane should be carried. But he was asking dying, as he had asked living, that which was all but impossible. Without artillery, the enemy's position was too strong to be carried. Soldiers not accustomed to be baffled, the same men who that morning had carried the walls by escalade, had recoiled twice before it. In that lane alone eight officers and fifty men had fallen. There was nothing for it but to retire. The fallen hero was then carefully removed to his tent, and the men fell back on to the Kábul gate. Nicholson still lived, and, the lungs being uninjured by the ball, the doctors had some hope of his life. He alone had the certain conviction that the triumph for which he had prepared would escape his grasp.

He still urges the men on.

But the men are ultimately forced to retire.

the doctors conviction escape his grasp.

By the fall of Nicholson the command of the first and second columns, now established at or near the Kábul gate, devolved on Brigadier Jones, C.B.

Nicholson succeeded in command Jones.

Whilst the infantry were thus contending with success and mishap to establish themselves in the imperial city, the cavalry were not less actively employed outside the walls. It had never been absolutely certain that all the four columns would alternate

Action of the cavalry.

succeed in

their attack, whilst it was tolerably clear that the failure of any one of them would entail a counter assault from the victorious enemy. It was necessary likewise that the flanks of the assaulting columns should be efficiently covered. With wise prevision, then, General Wilson had directed Brigadier Hope Grant to move with the greater part of his cavalry and a troop and a half of Horse Artillery at the time of the assault to the vicinity of No. 1 battery, to check any attempt to take our storming columns in flank by sortie from the Láhor and Ajmír gates, and to hold himself in readiness to act as circumstances might require.

Hope Grant, taking with him two hundred men of the 9th Lancers, four hundred of the Sikh horsemen, and a troop and a half of Horse Artillery, under Major Tombs, moved to the point indicated. Handling his men skilfully, he effectually covered the assaulting columns. Moving onwards as the columns advanced, he then took up a position under the walls of the city, covering the batteries. Here he remained, ready for further action, till the moment when the movement of the enemy on his right showed him that the fourth column had been repulsed. In fact, the enemy following up that column had thrown themselves into the houses and gardens near Kishanganj, and now opened a heavy musketry fire on the cavalry. Hope Grant at once ordered the Horse Artillery to the front. Tombs galloped up, unlimbered, opened fire, and compelled the enemy to fall back. As they did so, the guns on the Burn bastion opened out on the cavalry. At a distance of five hundred yards, drawn up for action, though compelled to remain inactive, their presence on the spot constituted a material aid to the infantry then endeavouring to make good their position within the city. For two hours they stood to receive. General Wilson, alive to their danger, promptly despatched Captain Bouchier's battery to aid them. But the round shot from the Burn bastion continued to empty saddle after saddle, or to dismount officer after officer. Nine officers of the Lancers had their horses shot under them. Conspicuous on either side of this gallant regiment were the scarlet-clad horse of Dighton Probyn, and the Panjábis of John Watson in their slate-coloured garments. Gallantly they stood, conscious that thus exposing their lives without the power of

Hope Grant
and Tombs.

Their presence produces a material effect on the enemy's movements.

The gallantry displayed the greater because of the compulsory inaction.

retaliating they were serving the common cause. At the end of about two hours the cavalry were further reinforced by about two hundred of the Guides and Gurkhás. Shortly afterwards came the intelligence that the infantry had established their positions within the town. Then, and then only, did Hope Grant withdraw leisurely to Ludlow Castle, satisfied that he had not only prevented the enemy from following up their victory over the fourth column, but had occupied their attention with a very considerable result on the main operations.

We have now to consider the operations of the The reserve column. reserve column.

The commander of this column, Brigadier Longfield, having previously detached the wing of the Bilúch battalion, three hundred strong, to the right of No. 2 battery, followed No. 3 column through the Kashmír gate, and cleared the Collee gardens. One portion of the column, consisting of the 4th Panjáb Rifles and some of the 61st Regiment, occupied these gardens; whilst another, composed of the Jhind Auxiliary Force and some of the 60th Rifles, held the Water bastion, the Kashmír gate, Colonel Skinner's house, and the house of Ahmad Áli Khán, a large, commanding building.

The position of four out of the five columns of the attacking force as the evening set in may thus briefly be described. The entire space inside the city from the Water bastion to the Kábul gate was held by the first, second, and fifth columns. The fourth column, repulsed in its attack on Kishanganj, was holding the batteries behind Hindu Rao's house. We have still to account for the third column. I left that column, gallantly led by Colonel Campbell, holding a large enclosure parallel with the Chándní Chauk, called the Begam Bágh, anxiously expecting assistance from the other columns, and exposed to a heavy fire of musketry, grape, and canister.

The failure of the first column in its attempt to master the lane leading to the Chándní Chauk, and the repulse of the fourth column, account for the leaving in an unsupported position of Colonel Campbell. In advance of, and without communication with, the other columns; in the vicinity of a position strongly occupied by the enemy; liable to be cut off from the main body; the position was eminently dangerous. But Colonel Campbell knew himself, and he knew the men he commanded.

Results of the day's work.

Reason for the want of support accorded to the third column.

They were eager to dare, anxious to press on. But the Jámi Masjid had been made impregnable to an attack from infantry, and the Brigadier had neither artillery to beat down, nor powder-bags to blow up, the obstacles in the way of his men. Under these circumstances, taking a soldierly view of the situation, he had occupied the Begam Bágh, resolved to hold it till he could communicate with head-quarters. Whilst occupying this position he was rejoined by the Kumáun Battalion, belonging to his column, but which had in the advance diverged to the right, and had occupied the Kotwálí. An hour and a half elapsed, however, before he was able to communicate with head-quarters. Then, for the first time, he learned that the first and second columns had not been able to advance beyond the Kábul gate, and that he could not be supported.

A glance at the plan of Dehlí will make it evident, even to non-military readers, that with the main body unable to penetrate beyond the Kábul gate, it would be injudicious for the third column to attempt to hold the Begam Bágh during the night. Colonel Campbell, then, leisurely fell back on the church, the nearest point at which he touched the reserve column. Placing the 52nd in the church, he occupied Skinner's house with the Kumáun Battalion, and posted the 1st Panjáb Infantry in the houses at the end of the two streets that lead from the interior of the city into the open space around the church.* At the head of these streets guns had previously been posted.

I cannot leave the record of the achievements of what was accomplished on this terrible day without making some more particular reference to the special duties which devolved on the artillery.

When the third column entered the city through the Káshmir gate, it was followed by Major Scott's light field battery (No. 14). Heavy fighting was going on in the streets. Two guns, under Lieutenant M. M. FitzGerald, were at once sent to Ahmad Alí Khán's house on the right of the College gardens, to support the 60th regiment, which was soon after joined by the 52nd. Two guns, under Lieutenant Minto Elliot, joined the Bilúchis and 61st regiment in the College gardens, where Lieutenant Elliot was soon dangerously wounded. The remaining two guns, under Lieutenant Aislabie, joined Nicholson's column just as it had been compelled to retire to the Kábul gate, and assisted in all the subsequent fighting of that column until the capture of the Láhor gate. FitzGerald and Elliot's guns were more or less actively engaged in all the street-fighting that took place on the left and in the centre, including the capture of the magazine and bank. The losses of the battery in men and horses were considerable, but not greater than were to be expected when manœuvring in narrow streets under constant musketry fire from the houses.*

* Major Norman's Narrative in the Blue Book, No. 6, 1858.

A review of the work of the 14th September, 1857, will show that though the British loss had been heavy, though all had not been accomplished which it had been hoped to accomplish, yet not only had great obstacles been overcome, but a solid base had been obtained whence to continue and complete the work. In less than six hours the army had lost sixty-six officers, and eleven hundred and four men in killed and wounded. Four out of five of the assaulting columns were within the walls, but the position which they held was extended, and, owing to the failure of the fourth column, their right flank was threatened. The enemy were still strong in numbers, strong in guns, strong in position. They, too, had had success as well as reverses, and they had not yet abandoned all hope of ultimate victory.

Notwithstanding heavy losses a solid base for further operations had been gained.

The first care of the assailants was to secure as best they could the posts that they had so dearly gained. That night the engineers who were still fit for duty—they were but few, for out of seventeen ten had been struck down during the assault—were sent to fortify the advanced positions. Here they threw up barricades, and loop-holed and fortified the houses commanding the approaches. To maintain the flank communications between the heads of the several columns strong pickets, throwing out vedettes, were established.†

The positions gained are secured during the night.

* They remained in the city, horses in harness, without relief until late on the 17th of September, when they were sent back to Ludlow Castle very used up. A detachment of the gunners, under Lieutenant Aislabie, was retained in the College gardens until the 20th of September. They manned some heavy mortars and howitzers there, and shelled the palace and the bridge of boats.

† Medley.

Such was the result of the assault of the 14th September.

Review of the lodgment of the day.

At the cost of a very heavy loss of life a firm lodgment had been gained. The five assaulting columns numbered, exclusive of the Kashmir Contingent, five thousand one hundred and sixty men.

Of these, eleven hundred and four men and sixty-six officers, or about two men in every nine, had been killed or wounded. Amongst the brave men who were killed or died of their wounds, were Nicholson, of whom I shall write further on; Jacob of the 1st Fusiliers; Speke, 65th Regiment Native Infantry; Salkeld, Engineers; Roper, 34th Foot; Tandy, Engineers; Fitzgerald, 75th Foot; Bradshaw, 52nd Light Infantry; Webb, 8th Foot; Renfray, 4th Panjáb Infantry; Pogson 8th Regiment; MacBarnett, Davidson, and Murray, doing duty respectively with the 1st Fusiliers, the 2nd Panjáb Infantry and the Guides. The number of wounded officers amounted to fifty-two, of whom eight were Engineers. All these officers were but a type of the unreformed British army. They were men in whom their soldiers had confidence, whose physical energies had not been neutralised by a premature exercise of the powers of the brain, who had learned their duties in the practical life of camps, who were ever to the fore in manly exercises in cantonment, as eager as able to lead their men on the battle-field. Honour to their memory! However limited their acquirements might have been regarded by examiners, they at least knew how to lead their men to victory!

The determination not only to hold the ground already won, but to continue further operations, was not arrived at by General Wilson without considerable hesitation.

General Wilson is inclined to withdraw from the position he had gained,

The success achieved, important as it was, had not corresponded—I will not say to his anticipations, for he had never been very confident—but to his hopes. The repulse of the first and fourth columns, the mortal wound of Nicholson, the tremendous loss in killed and wounded, the conviction he personally acquired that evening that the city had yet to be taken,—all these considerations combined to work on a nature never very sanguine or self-reliant, and now enfeebled by anxiety and ill-health. The General's first thought had been to withdraw the assaulting columns to the positions they had so long held on the ridge.*

* Colonel Turnbull, then on Sir Archdale Wilson's staff, writes me that the

From this fatal determination General Wilson was saved by the splendid obstinacy of Baird Smith, aided by the soldier-like instincts of Neville Chamberlain. What sort of a man Baird Smith was, I have recorded in a previous page. Neville Chamberlain had been cast in a mould not less noble. A soldier almost from the hour of his birth, Neville Chamberlain united to the most complete forgetfulness of self a courage, a resolution, a coolness equal to all occasions. The only fault that the most critical could find with his action was that he was too eager to press forward. If a fault, it was a noble fault—a fault which the critics carefully avoided. But, warring against Asiatics, to go forward is never a fault, and I have been assured, not by one but by many, that Chamberlain's personal daring had contributed greatly to inspire with confidence the soldiers he commanded.

but is deterred by the remonstrances of Baird Smith and Neville Chamberlain.

Chamberlain was Adjutant-General of the Army. He had been a consistent counsellor of bold and daring measures, and he had more than once, after repulsing a sally of the enemy, led the counter-attack which had driven him headlong within the city. In one of these daring pursuits he had been severely wounded, and it was this severe wound which had prevented him from taking an active part in the actual assault. But from the summit of Hindu Ráo's house he had witnessed all the events of that memorable day. The repulse of the fourth column, and the demonstration made by the enemy to pursue that column, seemed for a moment indeed to imperil his position, and he had summoned the native guard to the roof to defend the threatened magazine. This danger was averted by the action, already recorded, of Hope Grant and the cavalry. But this episode in no degree diverted the attention of the Adjutant-General from the other events. He noticed the first successes of the other columns; then the check—the apparently insurmountable check—evidently a bar to further progress on that day. To Chamberlain its significance was clear and unmistakable. There was but one course to pursue. To hold at statement in the text had been disputed. He adds: "Even if the General had some idea of the kind, he had every excuse. The very plan which had been urgently pressed upon him had failed; the columns had been stopped and driven back; and, instead of taking the whole city, we merely held a short line of rampart in a city some seven miles round." There can be no doubt as to the correctness of the statement in the text.

any cost, the positions taken, to fortify them, and to make them the base of a fresh attack at the earliest moment. Unable to move himself, he sent to the General a record of his convictions, accompanied by an earnest request that he would hold the ground for the night.

Would the written request of the Adjutant-General, not actually on the spot, have alone sufficed to turn the General from the course which a personal inspection had at once suggested to him? It is doubtful. The General undoubtedly believed that the safety of the army would be compromised by the retention of the positions they had gained. Fortunately,

Baird Smith's resolute answer to Wilson.

Baird Smith was at his elbow. Appealed to by General Wilson as to whether he thought it possible for the army to retain the ground they had won, his answer was short and decisive, "We must do so."

That was all. But the uncompromising tone, the resolute manner, the authority of the speaker, combined to make it a decision against which there was no appeal. General Wilson accepted it.*

The following day, the 15th, was devoted to the securing of the positions gained, to the establishing and making use of mortar batteries to shell the city, the palace, and the Selingarh, to the restoring of order, and to the arranging of means for putting a stop to indiscriminate plundering. That our troops were permitted to carry out this programme with but slight disturbance from the enemy, shows how truly Baird Smith and Chamberlain had judged the position. It is not too much to affirm that a retrograde movement on the 15th would, for the time, have lost India. As it was, whilst a mortar battery, established by our engineers in the College gardens, effected considerable damage in the enemy's defences, and our men, under the cover of that fire, were able to occupy and fortify some houses in front of the position taken the previous evening, the enemy's fire from Selingarh and the magazine was comparatively ineffective. Already the depression of failure, which our retirement would have changed into the joy of triumph, was beginning to weight their efforts very heavily.

* Many other officers gave the General the same advice. Amongst others, prominently, his Assistant Adjutant-General of Artillery, Captain Edwin Johnson, who shared his tent. This officer not only constantly urged General Wilson to see the matter through to its bitter end, but sustained him in his hours of depression, and by his tact, judgment, and practical ability, contributed to bring his mind into a state willing to accept the advice of Chamberlain and Baird Smith. All the foremost officers of the army, Nicholson, Jones, Hope-Grant, Reid, and others, had been all along in favour of decisive action.

I have said that measures were taken on the 15th to restore order and to put a stop to indiscriminate plundering. The fact is, that the part of Dehli which our troops had occupied was the part which abounded in stores containing intoxicating liquors. What a temptation this would be to men faint from work of the severest character, and subjected for months to deprivations on the ridge, may easily be conceived. The indulgence in half an hour's unchecked impulse might paralyse the force. The danger was imminent, for the advanced guards fell victims to the snare. But it was met promptly and with energy. The General ordered that the whole of the liquor should be destroyed, and the order was, to a very great extent, carried out.

Temptations placed in the way of the Europeans.

The morning of the 16th dawned hopefully. During the night and in the early morning the enemy evacuated the suburb of Kishanganj, whence they had, on the 14th, repulsed the fourth column. The besiegers at once occupied the position, and captured five heavy guns which had been left there by the enemy. The great strength of the place made a deep impression on them, and they could only wonder why it had been evacuated. The fire from the English batteries also had, by this time, effected a breach in the magazine, and a party, consisting of H.M.'s 61st Regiment, three companies of the 4th Panjáb Rifles, and the wing of the Bilúch Battalion, was detached, personally directed by the General, to storm it. They did storm it with but little loss to themselves—three men only being wounded—another proof of the growing depression of the enemy. The capture was of the highest importance, the magazine containing a hundred and seventy-one guns and howitzers, most of them of the largest calibre, besides ammunition of every kind.

Sept. 16.
Kishanganj is evacuated by the rebels, and the magazine is stormed.

On the afternoon of the same day, the enemy made an attempt to recapture the magazine, as well as the workshops adjoining it. They advanced under cover of the fire of some guns in front of the palace gate, carried the workshops, but were driven back from the magazine, and ultimately from the workshops also. On this occasion, Lieutenant Renny of the Artillery displayed great coolness and contempt of death. For, mounting on the roof of the magazine, he pelted the enemy with shells which were handed to him with their fuses burning!*

Gallantry of Renny.

It would be natural to imagine that the fact that the army could not only hold its own, but make an impression upon the rebels so formidable as that implied by their abandonment of Kishanganj, and their feeble defence of the magazine, would have inspired the General with a confident hope as to the ultimate issue. But he was still desponding, and, with Nicholson dying and Chamberlain unable to take an active part in his operations, it needed all the exertions of the engineers, than whom it would have been impossible to have collected a more daring and energetic set of men,† to induce him to sanction the necessary forward movement.

Continued despondency of Wilson.

* The 5th troop 1st Brigade (Native) Bengal Horse Artillery was the only battery of native artillery which remained faithful to us when it had the chance of mutinying. It was quartered at Jalandhar when the mutiny occurred there. Lieutenant Renny then marched it to Dehlí. On the 9th of July, after the fanatic attack by the rebel cavalry on the right of our camp, it was thought advisable to take away its guns and horses as a precautionary measure. The native officers and men begged to be allowed to prove their loyalty, and were placed in charge of the mortar battery on the ridge, which they manned and worked without relief until the end of the siege.

On the 14th of September Lieutenant Renny took some of these native gunners into the city with him. They carried by hand a couple of 12-pounder mortars, and were usefully employed in shelling the houses and streets in front of our attack. Lieutenant Renny himself earned the Victoria Cross for his gallant conduct recorded in the text, at the attack on the magazine, and the loyalty of his troop was a striking proof of his personal influence. When the city had fallen, guns and horses were restored to his men, and the 5th troop 1st brigade did gallant service in the Rohilkhand campaign.

† Pre-eminent amongst these were Alexander Taylor, of whom Baird Smit thus wrote: "He was, throughout, my most able and trusted subordinate;" George Chesney, at a later period author of the Battle of Dorking; Fred Maunsell and Henry Brownlow, both shot down in the assault; Julius Medley, who to ability and daring added a genius for organization of no common order.

The tone of General Wilson's mind, at this particular period, may be gathered from his correspondence. "We took possession," he wrote at 2 o'clock on the afternoon of the 16th, "of the magazine this morning with the loss of only three men wounded. This advances us a little, but it is dreadfully slow work. Our force is too weak for this street-fighting, when we have to gain our way inch by inch; and, of the force we have, unfortunately there

On the 17th and 18th the advance was pushed still further. The brain-task fell to the engineers, it having been decided to avoid the line of the streets and to sap through the houses. In this way the bank, Major Abbott's house, and the house of Khán Muhammad Khán were taken, and the besiegers' posts were brought close up to the palace and the Chándní Chauk. During these days, too, the positions on the right and left, indicated by the Kábul gate and the magazine, were brought into direct communication by a line of posts.

Sept. 17-18.
The advance pushed on on the 17th and 18th by the engineers

Nor were the artillery silent. Whilst the steady progress of sapping was going on, the heavy mortars and guns in the magazine, and the recovered and re-armed batteries of the enceinte bastions and gates were at work, pouring a continuous flight of shells into the city and palace. Of the enemy's resistance it may be said that, though continuous, it was not characterised by the determination which had marked their conduct on the 14th. They had read their doom, and, though they still fought, their hearts were inspired neither by the hope of victory nor by the energy of despair. Many had abandoned the city. The courage of those who remained was still undaunted, but hopelessness of success had weakened their mental energies. Partly to this cause, partly likewise to the skill of the attack, it was due that the British losses on those days were small.

and by the artillery.

The resistance slackens.

The position of the attacking force on the evening of the 18th has thus been described: "The line of the canal may be said to have been our front; on its bank some light mortars were posted, to clear the neighbourhood of the Láhor gate; while light guns were posted at the main junction of the streets, and sand-bag batteries erected to prevent the possibility of a surprise."* The establishment of communications between the extreme right and left has been already mentioned. In the rear everything was our own.

Sept. 18.

is a large portion, besides Jammú troops, in whom I place no confidence. . . I find myself getting weaker and weaker every day, mind and body quite worn out. The least exertion knocks me down. I walk with difficulty, and fully expect in a day or two to be laid altogether on my bed. . . We have a long and hard struggle still before us; I hope I may be able to see it out."

* Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoys, Bouchier.

Still all was not couleur de rose. On the morning of that day an attack on the Láhor gate had been directed, and failed. Greathed, who directed that attack at the head of a column composed of detachments from the 8th, the 75th, and a Sikh Regiment, and supported by fifty men of the 1st Fusiliers, had to advance up a narrow lane leading into the Chándní Chauk through a gate at the end of it. This gate had been closed, and behind it dwelt the unknown. Greathed had led his men up the narrow lane, but as he approached the end leading into the Chándní Chauk the gate was suddenly thrown open and displayed to his astonished gaze a 24-pounder pointing at the assailants. This gun opened suddenly with grape on the column, whilst simultaneously from the houses on either flank poured a smart and continuous fire of musketry. No wonder that the men recoiled. They were enormously outnumbered, and occupied a cramped position, which gave no play for manœuvring. Greathed drew them back, and, bringing a 6-pounder to the front, ordered a charge under cover of the smoke. But all was in vain. For a moment indeed the hostile gun appeared to be in the possession of his men;* but the odds were too great, the position too confined; and the enemy were thoroughly on the alert. Recognising, after a fresh repulse, that the attack had failed, Greathed gave the order to retire. He effected his retreat in good order and without loss, the enemy not venturing to enter the lane.

Greathed's attack on the Láhor gate fails.

The repulse of Greathed's column filled the mind of General Wilson with despair. "We are still," he wrote, that same day, "in the same position in which we were yesterday. An attempt was made this morning to take the Láhor gate, but failed from the refusal its lowering effect on General

Wilson.

of the European soldiers to follow their officers. One rush, and it would have been done easily; but they would not make it. The fact is, our men have a great dislike to street-fighting; they do not see their enemy, and find their comrades falling from shots of the enemy who are on the tops of houses and behind cover, and get a panic, and will not advance. This is very sad, and, to me, very disheartening. We can, I think, hold our present position, but I cannot see my way out at all. I have now only three thousand one hundred men (infantry) in the city, with no chance or possibility of any reinforcements. If I were to attempt to push on into the city, they would be lost in such innumerable streets and masses of houses, and would be annihilated or driven back." The reader will remark that, desponding as are these words, they mark a step in advance of those uttered on the evening of the 14th. Then, General Wilson was inclined to retire to the ridge to save his army. On the 18th, though he still doubted of ultimate success, he felt he could hold his own.

* Blackwood's Magazine, January 1858. The writer of the article is known to the author: his statements may be relied upon.

On the 19th action of a different character was taken. A glance at the plan will show the position, previously described, attained on the evening of the 18th. Immediately in front of our right was the Burn bastion, no longer supported by the presence of a strong hostile force in Kishanganj and Tálíwárí. Now the Burn bastion commanded the Láhor gate, and with it the Chándní Chauk; and, though from the British advanced post in the Bank that important street could be occupied, it would be difficult to maintain it and to push on operations against the palace and the Jámi Masjid until the remaining strongholds on the enemy's left should be occupied.

Sept. 19.

The Burn
bastion.

To the clear minds of the Chief Engineer and of his principal coadjutor, Captain Alexander Taylor, the requirements of the position were apparent. With the concurrence, then, of the former, Captain Taylor obtained from the General an order to the Brigadier commanding at the Kábul gate to place at his disposal, for operations on the following morning, a body of men to work through the intermediate houses, and thus to gain the Burn bastion. Whilst this gradual and necessarily somewhat slow process was being adopted, a column of about five hundred men, taken from the 8th, and 75th, and the Sikh regiment, proceeded, under Brigadier William Jones, to attack the Láhor gate.

Alexander Taylor is authorised to work through to the Burn
bastion.

The sapping party, directed by Captain Taylor, gradually made their way through the detached houses situated between the Kábul gate and the Burn bastion, annoyed only by a constant musketry fire maintained by the enemy upon such of their number as were forced to show themselves. Progressing, as it were, step by step, they succeeded, as night fell, in occupying a house which completely overlooked the Burn bastion. From this

Its capture by Brigadier
Jones.

place they were able to pour a commanding fire upon the occupants of the latter, and they did this with so much effect that the enemy, convinced of the impossibility of holding it, evacuated it during the night. Brigadier Jones then pushed forward his men, and found it deserted. But his men were in a very unruly condition. Much brandy had fallen into their hands, and it was difficult to keep them steady.*

The news brought to the General that night (19th) by Lieutenant Turnbull of the 75th, attached to his staff, of the capture of the Burn bastion, could not fail to revive his spirits. It was an immense gain; for the possession of that bastion was the certain key to the capture of the Láhor gate. So impressed was General Wilson with the importance of the conquest that he sent some officers of his staff to spend the night in the bastion, and to take measures for its retention. The precaution, wise though it was, was not needed. The enemy by this time were thoroughly cowed, and, far from thinking of recovering the place, were hurrying out of the city as fast as their legs could carry them.

The capture of the Burn bastion was the beginning of the end. Early the following morning (the 20th) Sept. 20. Brigadier Jones's column, pursuing the advantage of the previous evening, carried the Láhor gate with a rush; the Garstin bastion fell also to their prowess. The Brigadier then received instructions to divide his force, and, whilst detaching one portion up the Chándní Chaulk to occupy the Jámi Masjid, to proceed with the remainder towards the Ajmir gate. The opportune arrival of Major Brind and his artillery caused the Brigadier to confide to him the command of the first portion. Brind, having under his orders, in addition to his own men, the 8th Regiment and the 1st Fusiliers, marched at once to the Jámi Masjid, and carried it without difficulty. He had no sooner occupied it than he perceived

The immense gain of the capture.

Sept. 20. Jones carries the Láhor gate, and Brind the Jámi Masjid:

*The men were in a very unruly state . . . Much brandy, beer, and other intoxicating liquors were left so exposed by the enemy, that it would seem they had almost been left about purposely; and though the officers endeavoured to persuade their men that the liquor was poisoned they did not succeed . . . One old soldier, a thirsty soul, taking up a bottle of brandy, and looking at it, said: "Oh no, Sir, the capsule is all right—Exshaw and Co.—no poison that."—Blackwood's Magazine, January 1858.

that the one thing wanting to assure the complete capture of the city was to assault the palace, promptly and without delay. He, therefore, on the spot, wrote a pencil note to the General reporting his success, and urging him to an immediate attack on the royal residence.

he then invites Wilson to attack the palace.

Meanwhile Jones had penetrated to the Ajmír gate. Almost simultaneously the main body of the cavalry, going round by the Idgar, found the camp of the mutineers outside Dehli evacuated, and secured the clothing, ammunition, and plunder left by the rebels in the hurry of their flight.

Completion of the occupation of the gate.

General Wilson responded to Brind's note by ordering the advance of the column at the magazine to attack the palace. The decreasing fire from the battlements of the residence, famous in history, famous in romance, of the descendants of Bábar, had made it abundantly clear that the last representative of the family which had for so long ruled in Hindustan had, with his family and attendants, sought refuge in flight. When the British troops (the 60th Rifles), pressing forward, reached the walls, a few fanatics alone remained behind, not to line them, for their numbers were too few, but careless, of life, to show to the very last their hatred of the foe they had so long defied. Powderbags were promptly brought up, and the General, anxious in the generosity of his heart, to do honour to the man who had helped to blow up the Kashmír gate, sent for Home to apply the match. The gates were then blown in, and the British troops entered and hoisted the British flag. The Selingarh fort had been occupied even a little earlier. Its capture was effected in a manner which demands a separate notice.

Wilson sends a force against the palace,

which is captured.

Some short time before the assault on the palace gate, Lieutenant Aikman, with a small party of Wilde's Sikhs, had been directed to feel his way to the left. Aikman, the most daring and intrepid of men, knew the ground thoroughly; and having received, as he imagined, permission to act on his own judgment, he resolved to effect an entrance into the Selingarh from the rear, and hold the enemy as in a trap. Accordingly he doubled round to the Calcutta gate, forced it open, and pushed on to the Selingarh. The few men in that fort fled on his appearance, and escaped across the river. Aikman's attention was then turned to the gateway at the narrow passage leading from the Selimgarh to the rear of the palace. This passage connected the rear gate of the palace with an arched gate over the fort, over which was a parapet. Were he able to gain possession of this, he could stop the escape of multitudes till the storming party should reach them from the front. Thus thinking, he acted without hesitation, shot the sentry at the gate opening on to the drawbridge leading into the rear of the palace, and placed his men in the best position to defend it. He then, with the assistance of the Sergeant-Major of Renny's troop or battery, set to work to spike the heavy guns directed against the Water bastion. He was in possession of the gate and drawbridge when the gates of the palace were blown in. The rush of the fugitives was not so great as had been anticipated, so extensive had been the flight on the two preceding days. But some at least were kept back. A more gallant or well-thought-out act was not performed even during that long siege.*

Aikman captures the Selingarh.

In the afternoon of the same day General Wilson, having given directions for the establishment of posts at the various gateways and bastions, took up his quarters in the imperial palace.

The appearance of Dehlí after the capture of the palace, the Selimgarh, and the Jámi Masjid had placed it in the hands of the British, has thus been graphically described by a gallant officer who took part in the assault and in the subsequent operations.†

Appearance of Dehlí after the capture.

“The demon of destruction,” wrote Colonel Bouchier, “seemed to have enjoyed a perfect revel. The houses in the neighbourhood of the Mori and Kashmír bastions were a mass of ruins, the walls near the breaches were cracked in every direction, while the church was completely riddled by shot and shell In the Water bastion the destruction was still more striking. Huge siege-guns, with their carriages, lay about seemingly like playthings in a child's nursery. The palace had evidently been hastily abandoned. The tents of Captain de Teissier's battery, stationed at Dehlí when the mutiny broke out, were left standing, and contained plunder of all sorts. The apartments inhabited by the royal family combined a most incongruous array of tawdry splendour with the most abject poverty and filth. The apartments over the palace gate, formerly inhabited by Captain Douglas, who commanded the palace guards, and Mr. Jennings the clergyman, were denuded of every trace of the unfortunate party which had inhabited its walls, and with whom, not many months before, I had spent a happy week. It was with a sad and heavy heart that I paced its now empty rooms, which could tell such terrible tales of the scenes there enacted."

* Official report of Major Wilde, commanding 4th Sikh Infantry.

† Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoys, by Colonel George Bouchier, C.B., R.A.

Dehlí was now virtually won. But, though the strong places had been occupied by British troops, thousands of the mutineers were still in the vicinity, armed, and ready to take advantage of any slackness of discipline. The very relief of guards and batteries was still a matter of danger and difficulty, nor did the event of the following day, which deprived the rebels of their nominal leader, lessen in any material degree the magnitude of the risk.

The King of Dehlí, his family, and his personal adherents had shown themselves as easily depressed by adversity as they had been cruel and remorseless when Fortune had seemed, in the early days of the revolt, to smile upon them. The result of the events of the 14th September had produced upon the mind of the King effects precisely similar to those which had, for the moment, mastered the cooler judgment of the British commander. We have seen that General Wilson, surveying his position on the evening of the 14th, declared that a prompt retreat to his original position could alone save the army. Baird Smith and Neville Chamberlain forced him, so to speak, to remain. On the other side, the King and his advisers, deeply impressed by the successful storm of the assailants, and not considering that success outweighed, or even balanced, by the repulse of the first and fourth columns, rapidly arrived at the conclusion that, unless the British should retire, the game was up. There was no Baird Smith at the right hand of the King to point out to him how many chances yet remained in his favour if he would but profitably employ the small hours of the night; no Neville Chamberlain to urge him, above all things, to dare. When the morning of the 15th dawned, and the British were seen to have retained their positions, to be

The King of Dehlí.

Sept. 14.

Sept. 15.

The persistence of the British depresses the adherents of the King.

making preparations for a further advance, the hearts of the King and his advisers fell, and they began even then to discount the future.

Still, as long as the Selimgarh, the palace, the Jámi Masjid, and the Láhor gate were held, no active measures for retreat were taken. But when, on the night of the 19th, the Burn bastion, virtually commanding the Láhor gate and the Chándní Chauk, was captured, the thought that had been the uppermost in every heart found expression. That thought was flight.

The commander-in-chief of the rebel army, the Bakht Khán, whom we have seen exercising so strong an influence at Barélí,* evacuated the city that night, taking with him all the fighting men upon whom he could depend. Ways of egress, that by the bridge of boats and those by the Khairáti and Dehlí gates, were still open to them; and of these they availed themselves. Bakht Khán exerted all his eloquence to induce the King to accompany him. He represented to him that all was not lost, and though the English had gained their stronghold the open country was before them, and that, under the shadow of his name and presence, it would be still possible to continue the war, always with a chance of success.

Had Bahádur Sháh possessed a spark of the persistent nature or the vigorous energy of his ancestors, of Bábar, or Humáyun, or of Ákbar, that appeal had not been made in vain. But he was an old man—one of that class of old men who have exhausted youth in their teens, and who become, with increasing years, more and more nerveless and irresolute. It is probable that throughout the mutiny the King had been a mere puppet in the hands of the others. Whilst the siege lasted the chiefs of the army had sustained their power over him by promises of ultimate victory. But with impending defeat their influence vanished; and the old King, acted upon by events, was in the humour to fall under any spell which might seem to promise him immunity for his misdeeds.

Such a spell was at hand. Of all the nobles about him the wiliest was Iláhí Bakhsh Mirzá, whose daughter was the widow of the eldest son of the King. It is probable that in the early days of the mutiny the counsels of Iláhí Bakhsh had been strongly in favour of vigorous action. But he had a keen eye for probabilities. The events of the 14th and 15th September had read to him no doubtful lesson. He foresaw the triumph of the English—a triumph fraught with ruin to himself and his family unless he could turn to account the few days that must still intervene.

* Vol. III. page 203, note.

He did turn them to account. Having made all his plans, he listened, without speaking, to the eloquent pleading made to the King by the commander-in-chief, Bakht Khán. When all was over, and when Bakht Khán had departed with a promise from the King that he would meet him the following day at the tomb of Humáyun, Iláhí Bakhsh persuaded the Mughul sovereign to accompany him to his house for the night. Having brought him there, he moulded him to his purpose. He pointed out to him the hardships which would follow his accompanying the army, assured him of its certain defeat, and then, showing the other side of the shield, indicated that a prompt severance of his cause from the cause of the sipáhis would induce the victorious English to believe that, up to that moment, he had acted under compulsion, and that he had seized the first opportunity to sever himself from traitors.

He moulds
the King to his purpose.

These arguments, urged with great force upon one whose brain power, never very strong, was waning, had their effect. When, the next day, the King of Dehlí, his zenana, his sons, and his nobles, met the rebel commander-in-chief at the tomb of Humáyun, he and they declined to accompany him. Rather than undergo the fatigues, the perils, the uncertainties attendant on the prolongation of a contest which they had encouraged, they deliberately preferred to trust to the tender mercies of the conqueror. What those tender mercies were likely to be did not seem to trouble much the degenerate Mughuls. They promised, at all events, a quick decision—a decision preferable to the agony of suspense.

Sept. 20.

The King refuses to accompany the army.

Bakht Khán and the rebel army then went their way, leaving behind the royal family and a numerous crowd of emasculated followers, the scum of the palace, men born never to rise above the calling of a flatterer or a scullion. So far had the plans of Iláhí Bakhsh Mirzá succeeded. The next step was more difficult. It involved the betrayal of his master.

The rebel army leaves
Dehlí.

Difficult, the task was not insurmountable. Chief of the native agents maintained by the English to obtain correct information regarding the movements of the enemy during the siege, was Munshí Rajab Alí, a man possessing wonderful tact, cleverness, assurance, courage—all the qualities which go to make up a spy of the highest order. He possessed to the full the confidence of the English administrators, and he was true to his employers. With this man Iláhi Bakhsh opened communications. Rajab Alí requested him simply to detain the royal family for twenty-four hours after the departure of the rebel army, at the tomb of Humáyun, and to leave the rest to him.

Rajab Alí communicated the information he had received to Hodson of Hodson's Horse; Hodson at once rode down to the General's head-quarters, communicated the news, and requested permission to take with him a party of his men to bring in the King. I have evidence before me which it is impossible to doubt that General Wilson was inclined to treat the King of Dehlí as a man who had placed himself outside the law. His instincts were in favour of awarding to him condign punishment. It was, then, with the greatest difficulty that those about him persuaded him to add to the consent he gave to Hodson's request the condition that the King, should he surrender, must be brought in alive. Hodson, taking fifty of his troopers with him, galloped down toward the tomb.

Who was Hodson? Some men are born in advance of their age, others too late for it. Of the latter class was Hodson. Daring, courting danger, reckless and unscrupulous, he was a condottiere of the hills, a free-lance of the Middle Ages. He joyed in the life of camps, and revelled in the clang of arms. His music was the call of the trumpet, the battle-field his ball-room. He would have been at home in the camp of Wallenstein, at the sack of Magdeburg. In him human suffering awoke no feeling, the shedding of blood caused him no pang, the taking of life brought him no remorse. The certaminis gaudia did not entirely satisfy his longings. Those joys were but preludes to the inevitable consequences—the slaughter of the fugitives, the spoils of the vanquished.*

* "If I get into the palace," he had written on the 30th of August, "the House of Taimúr will not be worth five minutes' purchase, I ween."

Hodson rode off, full of excitement, towards the tomb of Humáyun. As he approached that time-honoured structure he slackened his pace, and, making way cautiously to some ruined buildings near the gateway, posted his men under their shade. Having taken every precaution, he then sent to announce to the King his arrival, and to invite him to surrender.

Hodson rides to capture the King.

Within the tomb despair was combating with resignation. The favourite wife of the last of the Mughuls, anxious above all for the safety of her son, a lad not old enough to be implicated in the revolt, and yet not too young to escape massacre, was imploring the old man to yield on the condition of a promise of life; the mind of the old man, agitated by a dim recollection of the position he had inherited and forfeited, by despair of the present, by doubts of the future, was still wavering. Why had not he acted as Akbar would have acted, and accompanied the troops to die, if he must die, as a king? What to him were the few years of dishonour which the haughty conqueror might vouchsafe to him? Better life in the free plains of India, hunted though he might be, than life in durance for him, a king! But then rushed in the fatal conviction that it was too late. He had decided when he dismissed Bakht Khán! The Frank and his myrmidons were at his door!

The scene within the tomb of Humáyun.

Yet still the difficulty with him was to act on that decision. His mind was in the chaotic condition when everything was possible but action. For two hours, then, he hesitated, clutching at every vague idea only to reject it; his wife, his traitorous adviser, his surroundings, all urging upon him one and the same counsel. At last a consent was wrung from him to send a message to Hodson that he would surrender provided he should receive from that officer an assurance that his life should be spared.

The King surrenders on condition that his life be spared.

On receiving this message Hodson gave the promise.* Then,

* Four days later Hodson wrote in his journal: "I would much rather have brought him (the King) into Dehli dead than living." He in the same journal recorded his acquittal of the King of active participation in the revolt.

Hearing, some four months later, that his sparing of the King's life had been construed into personal leniency on his part, he wrote: "I see that many people suppose that I had promised the old King his life after he was caught. Pray contradict this."

issuing from his cover, he took post in the open space in front of the gate of the tomb, standing there alone to receive the royal prisoner. Preceded by the Queen and her son in palanquins, the King issued from the portico carried in a similar conveyance. Hodson spurred his horse to the side of the palanquin and demanded of the King his arms. The King asked if his captor were Hodson Bahádúr. Receiving an affirmative reply, the King asked for a promise from the Englishman's own lips of his life and of the lives of his wife and her son. The promise given, the arms were surrendered, and the procession moved towards the city. The progress was slow, and for a great part of the journey the palanquins were followed by a considerable number of the King's retinue—men never dangerous, and now thoroughly cowed. These gradually dropped off as the Láhor gate was approached. By that gate Hodson entered, traversed the Chándní Chauk, and brought the King to the Palace, he having expressed a desire to see Sir Archdale Wilson. But Sir Archdale refused to see him, and deputed his Aide-de-camp, Lieutenant Turnbull, to see him placed under a European guard in the Begam's palace. Turnbull executed this order.

Hodson receives the King as a captive, and makes him over to Sir A. Wilson.

So far Hodson had acted as a chivalrous officer of the nineteenth century. But the spirit of the condottiere now came into play. The same active agents who had informed him of the whereabouts of the King now came to tell him that two of the King's sons and a grandson, men who were reported to have taken part in the massacre of May, had not accompanied the rebel army, but were concealed in the tomb of Humáyun vicinity. The information excited all the savage instincts of Hodson. These men could not stipulate for mercy. He might himself "rid the earth of those ruffians." He rejoiced in the opportunity.* The following morning, then, having obtained permission from the General to hunt down the princes, he started, accompanied by his second in command,

Hodson learns that the King's sons and a grandson could be captured.

or in its

Sept. 21.
He starts with a hundred troopers to capture them.

* "In twenty-four hours I disposed of the principal members of the House of Taimur the Tartar. I am not cruel, but I confess that I did rejoice in the opportunity of ridding the earth of these ruffians."—Letter from Hodson, 23rd September, 1857.

Lieutenant McDowell, a hundred troopers, and his two spy-informers, Munshí Rajab Alí and Iláhí Bakhsh Mirzá, and rode for Humáyun's tomb. The three princes, Mirzá Kházár Sultán Mirzá, Mughul Mirzá, and Abú Bakht Mirzá, were in the tomb, attended by a considerable number of the scum of the people—the same who, the previous day, had seen, without resistance, their King carried off, and who were not more prepared to resist now. It is true that the more daring among them, seeing the approach of Hodson, implored the princes to resist, offering to defend them to the last. Better for the princes, ten thousand times better for Hodson's reputation, if the offer had been accepted. At least, then, the Englishman would have been able to aver that he killed his enemies in fair fight. But, with the example of their father before them, the princes hoped to gain the promise of their lives by negotiation. For two hours they implored that promise. Hodson steadily refused it. Their spirits weakened by the useless effort, the three princes then surrendered to the mercy and generosity of the conqueror.

Refuses to promise to spare their lives.

They surrender to his mercy and generosity.

They came out from their retreat in a covered cart. Similar carts conveyed the arms, of which Hodson, in the meanwhile, had deprived the crowd. Hodson placed troopers on either side of the cart which bore the princes, and directed it towards the Láhor gate. The people, the same miserable population who had previously followed the King, followed this procession also. Between them and the cart containing the princes were a hundred of Hodson's far-famed horsemen. There was no real danger to be apprehended from them. They were too cowed to act. Hodson would have rejoiced had they displayed the smallest intention to resist. He wanted blood. His senses were blinded by his brutal instincts. Five-sixths of the journey from the place of capture to Dehli had been completed without the display of the smallest hostility on the part of the crowd. Despairing, then, of any other mode of gratifying his longings, he made the pressure of the mob upon his horsemen a pretext for riding up to the cart, stopping it, and ordering the princes to dismount and strip to their under garments. Then, addressing the troopers, he told them in a loud voice, so as to be heard by the multitude, that the prisoners were butchers who had murdered English women and English children, and that it was the will of the Government that they should die. Then, taking a carbine from the hands of a trooper, he shot dead his three unresisting captives!

He shoots them when within a mile of Dehli.

The question as to whether Hodson was justified in taking the lives of the princes has been much debated. To Comments on
Hodson's act. many of the foremost men in India it has appeared as a brutal and unnecessary murder. To them it has seemed that it would have been just as easy to convey the princes safely into camp as it had been to convey the King. Such too, has ever been my opinion, and, notwithstanding all that has been said on the other side, I am still inclined to that view. But there is no doubt that the general feeling in the camp of the army, excited with the capture of Dehlí, justified Hodson. To this day men whose names cannot be mentioned without respect consider that the action he took was necessary for the safety of the British force. "No one," argue the supporters of this view, "unless he had been at Dehlí during the time, can form a true opinion on the question. Our small force was about 6,000 strong when we assaulted. In the assault we had about 1,400 killed and wounded. We had been opposed by a force of about 40,000. These had evacuated the city, and had gone no one knew whither. The General had been reluctantly induced to spare the King's life, for his name and that of his son still served as a tower of strength to the badma-áshis (scum) within the city. These, no doubt, would only have been too glad to turn upon us if they dared. The shooting of the princes at once deprived them of any one to look to. And, whether the deed were right or wrong, we feel assured that in their death the final blow was given to any kind of attempt at the reversal of our victory, either in the neighbourhood of Dehlí or to the north of it."

Whilst admitting the force of these remarks, and acknowledging the strength of the argument that those on the spot were best able to judge of the necessity of the case, and that these generally condoned the action of Hodson, I am bound to record my conviction that it still seems to me to have been unnecessary. The argument that the shooting of the two princes deprived the rebels of any one to look to will not hold water. The King was still alive. If Hodson had spared the lives of the princes, they would have been thrust into the same confinement as the King. One prince, too, had been spared. The rebels knew that the House of Taimúr was still represented. In my judgment, then, the shooting of the princes still remains one of the most painful episodes connected with the Mutiny.

It is now time to return to the city. I left it on the evening of the 20th, its outer defences fully occupied by the British troops. On the following morning began the work of securing the inner streets and gulleys. To Major James Brind—known in the camp for his gallantry, for his untiring energy, for the earnest and persistent manner in which he had pounded the enemy, as “Brind of the batteries”—was allotted the task, in conjunction with the Chief Engineer, of ensuring the safety of the gateways and posts.

A more high-minded, a more gallant, or a more merciful officer than Major James Brind never lived. Every soldier knew, and every soldier loved him. He brought to his task all the characteristics which had gained for him respect and affection. But that task was no light one. The scum of the rebel army still lurked in the place, hiding in mosques or buried in underground receptacles. As Major Brind went about it he was again and again startled by reports of cold-blooded slaughter of his soldiers, of their being enticed by a promise of drink into the dark corners of the city and there basely murdered. He found that numerous gangs of men were hanging about, prepared to interfere with the reliefs of the batteries and posts, and that it was even possible they might attempt to surprise the garrison. The time was critical. It was necessary to show the rebels that we were prepared for them. Major Brind, therefore, determined to make an example of the first gang of assassins who might be caught. Just at the moment a murder of an atrocious character was reported to him. Collecting a few artillerymen, Brind hastened to the spot, stormed the mosques and houses where the murderers and their associates were assembled, ordered the perpetrators to be executed, and made over the remainder to the authorities. This act of vigour, combined with acts of the same nature carried out by other commanding officers, had a wonderful effect. The remainder of the rowdy element quitted the city, and from that day forth there was neither murder nor disturbance. Major Brind was then able to continue, in comparative freedom from alarm, his task of making the gateways and other military posts as secure as possible from attack. Colonel Burn, an officer not attached to the force, but who, being on leave at the city of murderers and incen-daries.

Brind clears

the time, had joined it, was, on the 21st, nominated military governor of the city.

One sad event remains yet to be chronicled—the death of the heroic man who, sweeping across the Panjáb, had come down to reinforce the besieging army, to inflict a deadly blow on the enemy at Najafgarh, and to command the storming party on the 14th. After lingering for eight days, John

Sept. 22.
John Nicholson dies.

Nicholson died. As fortunate as Wolfe, he lived long enough to see the full success of the attack he had led with so much daring. At the age of thirty-seven he had gained the highest rank alike as an administrator and as a soldier. There never lived a man who more thoroughly exemplified the truth of the maxim that great talents are capable of universal application. Whatever the work to which he had applied himself, he had succeeded. His mastery over men was wonderful. His penetrating glance never failed in effect. It was impossible to converse with him without admitting the spell. With all that, and though he must have been conscious of his power, he was essentially humble-minded. "You must not compare me with Herbert Edwardes," he said to the writer in 1851. In appearance, especially in the eye and the contour of the face, he bore a striking resemblance to Lord Beaconsfield, as Lord Beaconsfield was when, as Mr. Disraeli, he first became leader of the Opposition. The resemblance had been remarked by many when he visited England in 1850. What he might have become it is difficult to guess. It is difficult because it would be hard to put a limit to his career. Looking at the point whence he started, at the reputation he had acquired at the age of thirty-seven—the reputation of being the most successful administrator, the greatest soldier, the most perfect master of men—in India, it is impossible to believe that he would have fallen short of the most famous illustrations of Anglo-Indian history, for to all the military talents of Clive he united a scrupulous conscience, and to the administrative capacity of Warren Hastings he joined a love of equal justice for the rights of all.

The stronghold had fallen, "the first great blow struck at the rebels' cause."*

Remarks on the siege.

from the 30th May to the final capture on the 20th September, had amounted to nine hundred and ninety-two killed, two thousand seven hundred and ninety-five wounded, and thirty missing, out of a force never numbering ten thousand effective men. But, in addition to these, many had died from disease and exposure.

“In the history of sieges,” wrote at the time an officer, in words the truth of which the lapse of thirty years has confirmed,* “that of Dehlí will ever take a prominent place. Its strength, its resources, and the prestige attached to it in the native mind, combined to render formidable that citadel of Hindustan. Reasonably might the Northern Bee or the Invalide Russe question our ability to suppress this rebellion if they drew their conclusions from the numerical strength of the little band that first sat down before Dehlí. But the spirit that animated that handful of soldiers was not simply the emulative bravery of the military proletarian. The cries of helpless women and children, ruthlessly butchered, had gone home to the heart of every individual soldier and made this cause his own. There was not an Englishman in those ranks, from first to last, who would have consented to turn his back on Dehlí without having assisted in meting out to those bloody rebels the retributive justice awarded them by his own conscience, his country, and his God.† It was this spirit that buoyed them up through all the hardships of the siege, that enabled them, for four long months of dreary rain and deadly heat, to face disease, privation, and death, without a murmur.”

It was indeed an occasion to bring out the rare qualities of the British soldier, to show how, under the untoward circumstances of climate, of wet, of privation, he can be staunch, resolute, and patient whilst waiting for his opportunity, daring when that opportunity comes. With soldier.

The British

* The Red Pamphlet.

† This was written in Calcutta, on the spot, in October, 1857, before the details of the siege had become known. Lieutenant, now Colonel Turnbull, then on the Staff of Sir Archdale Wilson, writes me that it is not quite accurate. “I had once,” he writes, “to take a message from Colonel Wilson (as he then was) to Sir Henry Barnard, to say that the Artillery could do nothing more, and that all we could do was to sell our lives as dearly as we could.” Again with reference to the remark in the text that no one would have consented to turn his back on Dehlí: “We were three times on the verge of a retreat; I do not think this tells against us, but on the contrary only shows what a desperate state we were in more than once; a state which has never been properly realised, nor, as far as the men were concerned, ever appreciated or rewarded.”

him, too, can claim equal laurels the splendid Gurkhá regiment of Charles Reid, the magnificent frontier warriors of the Guide Corps, the cavalry regiments of Probyn, Watson, and Hodson, the levies from the various parts of the Panjáb. These men were worthy to vie with the British soldier. Their names, unfortunately, do not survive for the advantage of posterity; but their commanders live to speak for them. They, in their turn, will leave the stage of this world. But, when the tale is told to our children's children, the names of Barnard, of Nicholson, of Baird Smith, of Neville Chamberlain, of Charles Reid, of Hope Grant, of John Jones, of Roberts, of Edwin Johnson, of Alec Taylor, of Tait, of James Brind, of Lockhart, of Turnbull, of Seaton, of Hodson, of Daly, of Tombs, of Renny, of Jacob, of Probyn, of John Coke, of Watson, of Medley, of James Hills, of Quintin Battye, of Speke, of Greville, of Aikman, of Salkeld, of Home, and of many others—for the list is too long—will be inquired after with sympathy, and will inspire an interest not inferior to that with which the present generation regard the achievements of their forefathers in Spain and in Flanders.*

His native
comrades.

The heroes of
the siege.

* Colonel Turnbull points out that it is a very strange fact that, whilst officers were allowed two years' service for being at the Alambágh, no similar boon was granted for the much harder service before, and in Dehlí. Yet, he continues, "the siege of, and the assault of Dehlí cost the lives of more officers and men than did the combined actions, (1) of Havelock, from his departure from Allahábád to the first relief of Lakhnao; (2) of Outram's defence of Lakhnao; (3) of Sir Colin Campbell's relief of Lakhnao in November, 1857; (4) of Outram's defence of the Alambágh; (5) of Windham's defence of Kánhpúr; (6) of Sir Colin Campbell's storming of Lakhnao; (7) of Sir Hugh Rose's campaign of Central India; (8) of Whitlock's campaign. The losses in these eight actions were less by two hundred than the loss sustained during the siege and assault of Dehlí alone. That loss amounted to 3835 in killed and wounded, not including the native contingents. The Artillery lost 25 per cent. of their number. Yet how disproportionate were the rewards." The real reason was that there was no Commander-in-Chief engaged before Dehlí to insist upon the just claims of the gallant men who served before it.—Vide Appendix A.

CHAPTER II.

THE ÁGRA SURPRISE, AND THE DUÁB.

DEEPLY sensible of the fact that a victory not followed up is a victory thrown away, General Wilson prepared, as soon as he felt his hold upon Dehli secure, to detach a force in the direction of Balandshahr and Áligarh to intercept, and, if possible, cut off the rebels.

Wilson follows up the capture of Dehli.

Had Nicholson lived, it had been the General's intention to bestow upon him the command of this force. On his death it was thought in camp that it would be offered to the commandant of the cavalry brigade, Brigadier Hope Grant. The presence of this gallant and able officer was, however, still thought necessary at Dehli. The officer selected was Lieutenant-Colonel Edward Greathed, commanding the 8th Foot.

by sending a force towards Ágra.

The force consisted of two thousand seven hundred and ninety men, composed as follows:—

	Europeans.	Natives.
Captain Remmington's Troop of Horse Artillery, five guns	60	—
Captain Blunt's Troop of Horse Artillery, five guns	60	—
Major Bouchier's Battery, six guns	60	60
Sappers	—	200
H.M.'s 9th Lancers	300	—
Detachments, 1st, 4th, and 5th Panjáb Cavalry, and Hodson's Horse	—	400
H.M.'s 8th and 75th Regiments	450	—
1st and 4th Regiments Panjáb Infantry	—	1,200
	<hr/>	<hr/>
	930	1,860

“Never,” wrote a distinguished member of the force,* “never

* Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoy Army during the Mutiny of 1857, by Colonel, now General Sir George Bouchier, K.C.B.

did boys escape from the clutches of a schoolmaster with greater glee than we experienced on the 21st September, when we received our orders to proceed on the following morning to the plain in front of the Ajmír gate, where a column was to be formed under the command of Colonel Greathed, H.M.'s 8th Foot, destined to scour the Gangetic Duáb." With the exhilarating feelings sufficiently indicated in the above extract, the force I have detailed marched on the morning of the 24th by way of the Hindan in the direction of Balandshahr.

Sept. 24.

Crossing the Hindan, and passing through Ghází-ud-dín Nagar, the force reached Dádri, twenty miles distant, on the 26th. There it was clearly proved that the Gújar inhabitants of the place had sacked the loyal town of Sikandarábád and committed other depredations. Their own homesteads were in consequence destroyed. Pushing on, Greathed reached

Sept. 26-27.

Greathed destroys Dádri and comes on the track of the rebels.

Sikandarábád on the 27th. Here he found himself upon the track of the enemy, a body of their cavalry having evacuated the place only on the day preceding. The distance from Sikandarábád to Balandshahr is about eight miles. Five miles from the latter is the fort of Malagarh, a place which had been held for upwards of three months by Wálidád Khán, a partisan of the royal family of Dehlí, and connected with it, it was said, by ties of blood. To expel Wálidád Khán from Malagarh was, then, the first object of Greathed's mission.

Starting in the early hours of the 28th, the column reached at daylight four cross roads within a mile and a half of Balandshahr. One of these cross roads led to Malagarh. Balandshahr was immediately in front of the column.

Sept. 28.

Moves on Balandshahr.

Noticing that a picket of the enemy's cavalry, stationed at the cross roads, fell back before his advanced cavalry of the British force on Balandshahr, Greathed divined at once that that station was the true point of attack. Despatching, then, to the left front two Horse Artillery guns, and forming a reserve under Major Turner to protect his baggage, he advanced, his troops well in hand, towards that town.

The rebels had occupied a position in front of the town, at a point where two roads leading to it converged. The position was well wooded, abounding in high crops, and in gardens, the walls of which were lined with infantry. Their guns were in the centre, concealed by the crops.

Position of the rebels.

On this position Greathed marched, four guns of Remington's troop moving on by the main road; Bouchier's battery, supported by a squadron of the 9th Lancers and the squadron of the 5th Panjáb cavalry, advancing on the right, the remainder of the cavalry with the other two guns of Remington's troop under Lieutenant Cracklow, on the left; the 8th and 75th Foot and the 2nd Panjáb Infantry being at the same time pushed forward through the gardens and houses of the civil station. Remington's guns pounded the enemy in front, while Bouchier advanced till he could gain a position to open a cross fire on their flank. He soon obtained such a position, and opened fire. The rebels, recognising their position to be untenable, fell back; the British centre immediately pushed forward, and drove them headlong into the town.

Greathed's
order of attack.

Meanwhile the cavalry under Major Ouvry and Cracklow's guns had circled round to the left, and though exposed in their progress to a severe fire from a *sarai which the enemy had fortified, and from the gaol, which momentarily checked them, they carried all before them. Their loss, though heavy, was not out of proportion to the results obtained by their dash. The advantage they had gained was followed up by the infantry and the remainder of the cavalry, and the rout of the rebels was completed. Four hours after the halt at the cross roads, the town, three guns, a quantity of baggage and ammunition, were in the hands of the victorious troops. The enemy lost about three hundred men, the victors forty-seven in killed and wounded.

The cavalry
turn the enemy's right.

The infantry
come up and complete the defeat of the enemy.

The wisdom of forming a reserve to cover the baggage was justified by the results. For no sooner had the main column advanced to attack the town than a flying party of the enemy made a dash at the baggage. Major Turner, however, beat them off, and Lieutenant Probyn, with the squadron of the 2nd Cavalry following them up, killed several of them.

An attack on the baggage repulsed with loss.

Lieutenant Watson, 1st Panjáb Cavalry, and Lieutenant Blair, 9th Lancers, greatly distinguished themselves in this action. Of Lieutenant Roberts, Assistant Quartermaster-General, so distinguished in later years, now the commander-in-chief in India, who throughout his brilliant career was ever foremost when real service was required, Captain Bouchier, who witnessed and shared his heroic efforts, writes that he "seemed ubiquitous."

* A traveller's resting-place.

Malagarh was, however, the main object of Greathed's hopes, and he at once reconnoitred with a view to attack it. But the blow inflicted at Balandshahr had penetrated to Malagarh. The rebels evacuated it in a panic, leaving behind them all the plunder they had collected there.

Sept. 23-
Oct. 2.

Greathed pushes on to Malagarh.

Greathed immediately occupied Malagarh, and issued orders to destroy its fortifications. In carrying out this operation an accident happened, by which the engineer, Lieutenant Home, was unhappily killed on the spot. Home was an officer of great distinction and greater promise. He was the sole surviving officer of the gallant band who had blown up the Kashmir gate on the morning of the 14th of September. For that act, one of many deeds of skill and daring, he had been promised the Victoria Cross. To die by accident after having survived the storming of the Kashmir gate seemed a hard dispensation; but, though Home did not live to reap the fulness of his reward, he had at least known how his former splendid service was appreciated by his comrades.

Accidental death of Lieuten-enant Home.

From Balandshahr the column marched, 3rd October, to

Oct. 3-9.
Khurja and its skeleton.

Khurja. On entering this town the soldiers were greeted by a sight calculated above all others to excite their feelings of resentment to boiling pitch.

"As we entered Khurja," writes Colonel Bouchier, "a skeleton was stuck up on the roadside, exposed to public gaze, against a wall. The head had been severed from the body, and cuts in the shin-bones were apparent, inflicted by some sharp instrument; and, in the opinion of a medical committee, this skeleton was that of a European female."

Khurja was on the high road to Aligarh. It had twenty-six thousand inhabitants, and was a place of some importance, for it paid a considerable revenue. The civil officer attached to the column was, therefore, strongly opposed to the prosecution of any measures of retaliation against the townspeople. Moved by his remonstrances, Greathed, despite the unconcealed indignation of his men, spared Khurja, pushed on to Áligarh, two marches in advance, where he believed he should meet a considerable force of the rebels.

The enemy, however, had evacuated Áligarh and taken to the open, and the place was substantially undefended. Greathed launched his cavalry in pursuit of the rebels; caught them in their headlong flight; and killed some two hundred and fifty of them. The British had only three men wounded. Leaving, then, a garrison in Áligarh, Greathed pushed on to Akbarábád, and was fortunate enough to surprise it with two notorious rebel chiefs within its walls. The two chiefs, Mangal Singh and Maitáb Singh, were tried and summarily executed.

The column gains Áligarh and pushes on to Akbarábád.

Greaded now pushed forward in the direction of Ágra, from which place "epistles, imploring aid in every language, both dead and living, and in cypher, came pouring into camp."* On the 9th October he was at Bijáigarh, forty-eight miles distant. Near this place, the troops came upon a house belonging to an indigo factory, containing all its furniture uninjured, and having servants in attendance. The contrast presented by the undisturbed appearance of this property to that offered by the other houses, deserted by their owners, in the disturbed districts, and which were found plundered and destroyed, struck the officers and men. The owner, an Englishman, had fled to Ágra. From Bijáigarh, in consequence of the urgent entreaties he received from Ágra, Greathed sent forward at midnight the cavalry and horse artillery by forced marches. Four hours later he followed with his infantry, using the utmost speed, mounting his men on elephants, carts, and camels. The despatches he received on the way became, as he proceeded, more and more urgent. "His credit was at stake," he was told, "if Ágra were attacked and he so near." Thus implored, he pressed on with the utmost expedition, overtook his artillery and cavalry, and with them crossed the Jamnah at the bridge of boats under the walls of the fort of Ágra on the morning of the 10th.

Oct. 9.

An instance of the forbearance of the rebels.

Oct. 9-10.

Greaded receives urgent prayers for assistance from Ágra.

To account for the urgent requisitions of the Ágra garrison,

* Bouchier's Eight Months' Campaign.

it is necessary to give a brief narrative of the occurrences at that place from the time we left it.

We left Ágra on the 9th September. The death of Mr. Colvin had left Mr. E. A. Reade the senior civil officer in the North-west Provinces. To great capacity for work, a clear brain, and a large understanding, Mr. Reade added the rare virtue of absolute disinterestedness. Conscious that inter arma silent leges, Mr. Reade at once wrote to the Supreme Government, recommending that until order were restored the administration should be vested in the hands of a military chief, and promising his hearty co-operation in any capacity. Pending the orders of Government, Mr. Reade, though the senior officer, retained only his office of Financial Commissioner.

Even before Mr. Colvin's death, Ágra had been agitated by the rumour of another attack. The 23rd Native Infantry, which, it will be recollected, had mutinied at Máu on the night of the 1st July—joining itself to the mutinous contingents of Central India—those of Mehidpúr, of Málwá, and of Bhopál—and to the rabble of the Native States, had reached Gwáliár. There, by the loyal exertions of Mahárájah Sindhia, in active correspondence with the political agent, Major Charters Macpherson, residing in the fortress of Ágra, they had been detained the whole of the month of August. To detain them so long the Mahárájah had strained his authority over his followers, and was at times in imminent personal danger. To restrain them longer was impossible. Early in September, threatened by the mutineers of Central India,

then, this force of Central Indian mutineers, joined by a number of Gwáliár malcontents, though not, it is believed, by any of the regular army of that State, broke loose from the capital, and marched on Dholpúr. This place lies nearly midway between Gwáliár and Ágra, being distant but thirty-four miles from the latter. The presence, then, of a large force of the three arms at Dholpúr constituted an undoubted threat to the fortress of Ágra.

So much was known at the time of Mr. Colvin's death. It was impossible to attempt to disturb the intruders by detaching from the fortress of Ágra any portion of the small garrison upon whom the safety of so many thousand lives depended. Thus it happened that the rebels, emboldened by the silent attitude of the English, began gradually to feel their way who are emboldened by the compulsory silent attitude of the garrison.

towards Ágra. Sending out detachments from Dholpúr about the 11th September, they spread over the districts of Khairagarh, Fathpúr-Sikri, Irádatnagar, and Fathábád, expelling from them the native officials in the pay of the British Government.

Sept. 11.

The storming of Dehlí, instead of lessening, aggravated for the moment the difficulties of the British authorities in Ágra. For, although the assault of the 14th September at Dehlí had resulted only in a partial success, yet the persistence of General Wilson, on the 16th and 17th, had had the effect of inducing the more soft-hearted of the rebels to quit the town. A considerable body of these men, led by a Shahzádeh named Fíruzsháh, bent their way from Dehlí towards Mathurá, reached that place on the 26th September, and joining there the rebel Sipáhis of the regular army—men mainly of the 72nd Native Infantry, led by one Híra Singh, a Subahdár of that regiment—effected a junction with the rebels from Central India.

The difficulties of the Ágra garrison momentarily aggravated by the fall of Dehlí.

Sept. 26.

To combat the facts and rumours surging about him, Mr. Reade, in conjunction with Lieutenant-Colonel Cotton, commanding the garrison, issued orders, on the 19th September, to set to work at once to level some obstacles which interfered with the free play of the guns mounted on the fort, and to mine some of the more prominent buildings, including the great Mosque, which were in dangerous proximity to the walls.

Sept. 19.
Measures taken in consequence by the Ágra authorities.

On the 30th September an order from Calcutta was received at Ágra, nominating Colonel Hugh Fraser, C.B., of the Engineers, to act as the Governor-General's Chief Commissioner for Ágra and its dependencies.

Sept. 30.
Colonel Hugh Fraser, C.B., is appointed Chief Commissioner.

Three days prior to the installation of Colonel Fraser, official intelligence had been received in Ágra of the complete success of the British arms in Dehlí, of the capture of the King, and the slaughter of his two sons and grandson. It was then anticipated that a column of the Dehlí force, released from its siege operations, would at once be despatched to Ágra by Gurgáon and Mathurá on the right bank of the Jamnah.

Great, then, was the consternation in the fortress when the news arrived that though a column under Colonel Greathed had been despatched south-eastwards, it had crossed the Jamnah and had taken the route of Khurja and Áligarh. To the minds of the British within the fortress there was present always the possibility that Greathed's force, regarding Ágra as secure in the strength of its fortifications, might push on towards Kánhpúr or Baréli, leaving the Ágra garrison threatened by the rebels of whom I have spoken. Hence it was that the urgent applications I have referred to were sent to Colonel Greathed,—applications imploring him to make the best of his way to Ágra, to relieve the garrison there from their unpleasant predicament, and to re-establish the Government of the North-west Provinces.

Sept. 30—
Oct. 10.

Reason for the urgent applications sent to Greathed.

Reason why these applications caused merriment in Greadhed's
force.

That these urgent applications should have been misunderstood, and have been the cause of some merriment among the officers of Greathed's force, is scarcely surprising. The officers and men of that column had for more than three months occupied a position before Dehlí, exposed to the fire of the enemy, to rain, and heat, and privations of every sort. They were fresh from the storming of the imperial city, and worn by exposure, by fatigue, by watchings,* their minds were scarcely tuned to listen to entreaties for help from men who, however anxious and wearisome their position, seemed to have enjoyed comparative ease in the shelter of the fortress.

We have already seen how Colonel Greathed, responding to the entreaties pressed upon him with so much urgency, turned off the Grand Trunk Road and hurried by forced marches to the threatened capital. When at sunrise on the morning of

* "We went," writes Mr. C. Raikes (Notes on the Agra Revolt), "to the royal bastion this morning, to see Colonel Greathed's movable column cross the bridge—Sikhs, Lancers, three batteries of Horse Artillery, and skeletons of two Queen's regiments. This column came in by long forced marches, owing to an express sent out by Colonel Fraser. From the bastion we went down to the Dehlí gate. The Queen's Sth passed within three yards of us. 'Those dreadful-looking men must be Afgháns,' said a lady to me, as they slowly and wearily marched by. I did not discover they were Englishmen till I saw a short clay pipe in the mouth of nearly the last man. My heart bled to see these jaded, miserable objects, and to think of all they must have suffered since May last, to reduce fine Englishmen to such worn, sun-dried skeletons."

the 10th he marched his force over the bridge of boats, cheered by the 3rd European Regiment on the bastions, to the gates of the fort, he was informed that the enemy, alarmed at his approach, had retired beyond the Kári Nadí, a stream about nine miles distant.*

Greathed reaches Ágra and is informed that the enemy have retreated.

The force halted on the public road in front of the fortress, whilst the Ágra authorities and Colonel Greathed were debating about the choice of an encamping ground. Two hours were spent in this discussion—a dreary two hours for men who had just completed a forced march of forty-eight miles. The “local executives,” touched doubtless by the sunburnt appearance of the troops, were all for encamping them “in a series of gardens overgrown with brushwood, where the guns would not have had a range of fifty yards, and where the cavalry could not possibly act,” but Greathed was too much of a soldier to accede, without urgent remonstrance, to such a proposition.

Difference of opinion as to the encamping ground.

Ultimately, Greathed’s proposal that his men should encamp on the parade ground, a magnificent grassy plain, with not

* An attempt has been made to deny this. In his official report, Mr. Phillips, Magistrate of Ágra, quotes a memorandum by Mr.—now Sir William—Muir, that “there was no intimation given to Colonel Greathed, by any of the authorities, on the morning of the 10th, that the enemy were recrossing.” But the presence of the enemy was either unknown or disbelieved, for I find it stated in a manuscript journal of a very high official: “Major Hennessy, Commandant of the Ágra Militia, had been on picket duty during the previous night (9th) with militia-men, mounted and foot, at the Metcalfe Testimonial and the cemetery beyond it. His warning of the approach of the enemy, though some of his scouts had been fired upon, was disregarded. Such was the confidence that the arrival of Colonel Greathed’s force would deter any attempt, that his repeated remonstrances led to his being summarily remanded to the Fort. The same information, given by one of Mr. Muir’s spies, was scornfully rejected.” Rejected—by whom? Certainly by the Ágra authorities. Mr. Muir himself, writing the same day to Sir Hope Grant, says, “It was a most complete surprise in one sense to us, but a greater one to them (the rebels).” Major Norman, now General Sir H. Norman, K.C.B., wrote in 1858: “The head authorities at Ágra informed Colonel Greathed that the insurgent force from Dholpúr was beyond the Kári Nadí, ten miles from cantonments, across which they would find difficulty in passing. . . . This information was given in positive terms.” It is clear, then, that convinced in their own minds that the enemy had crossed the Kári Nadí, and were ten miles distant, the Ágra officials conveyed their convictions on this point to Colonel Greathed. It was, perhaps, unwise in him to trust to this.

an obstacle within three or four hundred yards of it, and at that distance only a few high crops, were allowed to prevail. The camp was marked out, the horses were picketed, and the men went to their breakfasts. Some of the officers hastened into the fort, others from the fort poured into the camp, followed or accompanied by men of all sorts, who seized the long-wished-for opportunity of communicating with their friends of the outside world.

Greathed gains the point and encamps on the parade ground.

The men in the camp, having swallowed a hasty meal, were variously occupied. Some, pending the arrival of the baggage, now slowly coming up, had thrown themselves on the ground and were fast asleep; some were talking to their friends; some were assisting to pitch the few tents that had reached the ground. The long march had caused the camp to be pervaded by an air of listlessness and languor, common to men who have but just completed an undertaking of more than ordinary labour. Not a sign betokened an enemy. As far as the eye could reach, the horizon was clear. The high crops and trees which shut in the view at no great distance were stirred only by the breeze. After their long fatigues it seemed as though the weary soldiers were to enjoy at last a day of repose.

Greathed's camp.

The soldiers prepare to rest after their toil.

This sense of security was scarcely justified by the certain proximity of the enemy, and by the absence of any effort being made to ascertain whether the conjectures of the Ágra officials were correct. It was soon disturbed in a very sudden and remarkable manner. Four natives, apparently conjurors, and beating tom-toms, came strolling up to the advanced guard of the 9th Lancers. On the sergeant in charge ordering them off, one of them drew a sword from under his clothes and cut him down. Another sergeant moving up to the rescue was also wounded. These men were soon despatched by the troopers, but, before the alarm had reached the rear, round shot "from out the blue" came pouring into the camp. The familiar sound was sufficient for the soldiers of Dehli. The assembly was sounded, though the call was scarcely needed. To start to their feet, seize their muskets, mount their horses, and man the guns, was the work of an instant. But while this was doing the cannonade spread terror among

They are surprised by the enemy,

but promptly form up.

the camp followers, and surprise and consternation among the visitors.*

The enemy's horse, appearing as if by magic on the scene, took prompt advantage of the surprise, charged the still motionless artillery, and had sabred the gunners of one gun, when a dashing charge made upon them by a rapidly formed squadron of the 9th Lancers, drove them back in disorder. It cost the squadron dear, for Captain French, the squadron leader, was killed, and Lieutenant Jones, his subaltern, was dangerously wounded and cut up when dismounted. Greathed, who had hurried to the spot a few minutes after the attack had begun, lost not a moment in taking the necessary measures. He deployed his line and directed Watson to move off with a portion of his irregular cavalry to turn the enemy's left flank.

Gallant charge of the 9th Lancers.

Greathed
deploys his line.

The line when advancing was joined by Pearson's 9-pounder battery, which had been despatched from the fort on the first arrival of Greathed's column. This gallant officer, whose distinguished conduct has already been mentioned,† had brought this battery again into a state of efficiency by substituting for the native drivers, who had wholly deserted after the disastrous affair of the 5th July, volunteers from the Eurasian fugitives in the fort.‡ He now arrived at an opportune moment on the right of the line where there was no artillery, and where the infantry were giving ground under the fire of some heavy guns of the enemy which commanded the road along which their centre was advancing. As Pearson pressed forward, the limbers of three of these were

Pearson brings his battery to the ground, and, checking

the enemy, drives back
his left.

* "Such was the terrible panic among the latter," writes Sir George Bouchier, K.C.B., an eye-witness and actor in the drama, "that those officers who had gone into the fort and were eager to get back to their posts could not stem the torrent of affrighted beings; an officer of the Dragoons in attempting it was fairly carried off his legs and borne back with the crowd. Not satisfied with legitimate means of escape, the gun horses in many cases were seized as they were being led to the guns, and were found next morning in the fort."

† Note, Vol. III. pages 181-5.

‡ It is but justice to these men to record that, in consequence of their admirable behaviour on this and on other occasions, Lord Canning asked Captain Pearson if he would undertake to raise a battery of them. But there were several reasons why it was deemed inexpedient to give a permanent character to the experiment.

blown up and captured. Simultaneously the cavalry under Ouvry, with all the guns on the left under Turner, dashed forward with all speed. The rebels, who had not believed it possible that a surprised force could so quickly organise itself for an active advance, relaxed their efforts under the continuous and combined pressure. As the pressure became greater, they were seen to be giving way on all sides. A well-timed charge

The enemy's disorder is completed by the cavalry.

by Watson and Probyn completed their disorder; nor though, with their usual tactics, their cavalry attempted to make a diversion by threatening the camp, were they successful. A second charge of the Lancers and two squadrons of Hodson's Horse sent them back more quickly than they came.

Colonel Cotton arrives with the 3rd Europeans and assumes command.

Colonel Cotton had by this time arrived from the fort with the 3rd Europeans, and, as senior officer, had assumed the command. Detaching two companies of this regiment to strengthen the Panjáb infantry on the right flank, where the enemy were still contesting the ground under shelter of some high crops, he urged the whole line forward in pursuit. The rebels fell back in hasty disorder by the Gwáliár road, nor did they make a halt even at their camp, which was found standing about midway between Ágra and the Kári Nadí. Here the infantry, completely tired out, were halted, but the pursuit was continued with great vigour and success by the artillery and cavalry.

The enemy defeated and pursued.

"Once only," says Colonel Bourchier, "did they," the rebels, "make a stand. A few rounds of grape, however, scattered them in all directions, and the cavalry were soon among their flying ranks, doing great execution. For seven miles the road was one continued line of carts, guns, ammunition waggons, camels rushing about without their drivers, and baggage of every description—all of which fell into our hands. Not a gun or a cart recrossed the stream; all became prize owing to the rapidity with which the victory was followed up on the opposite bank. A few cavalry troopers made their appearance, but soon disappeared after a few rounds from the Horse Artillery. Thirteen pieces of ordnance, with an enormous quantity of ammunition, were brought into camp. Much that was useless was destroyed; and the enemy's camp, with the villages on which it abutted, was burnt."

Their guns and ammunition taken.

No victory could have been more rapid or decisive. It was especially creditable to the troops who had that morning marched into Ágra, and whom neither fatigue nor hunger, nor want of sleep, could stop when an enemy was within their grasp. Bouchier's 9-pounder battery had marched thirty miles without a halt before the action began. From first to last Greathed's cavalry and artillery had marched at least over sixty-four miles, and the infantry fifty-four miles of road, in less than thirty-six hours, only after that to move through the fields and fight a general action. It was a splendid performance—well marched, well fought, well followed up. The force did not return to their camp before 7 o'clock in the evening.

Merit due to the troops
who won it.

But it was a surprise! Yes—but a surprise also to the rebels. They were not aware, until the sleeping camp had been startled into activity by the fire of their guns, that it was Greathed's force which lay before them. They believed they had to do only with the garrison of Ágra. In adjusting the balance, then, of surprises, it must be admitted that the rebels had more reason than the British to regret the want of a careful look-out.

The surprise as great to the rebels as to the British.

The column halted at Ágra the three days following the battle. A supply of ammunition was obtained from the fort, and the wounded were sent into the hospital which had been improvised in the Motí Masjid. Here they were attended not only by the medical officers but by the ladies, whose zealous and tender exertions have been recorded in a previous volume.*

The column halts three days to refit.

Whilst the column lay halted at Ágra a change in the command of it was inaugurated.

Brigadier Hope Grant was Lieutenant-Colonel of the 9th Lancers. Left behind at Dehlí in command of the cavalry, he had felt keenly his separation from his splendid regiment. He could not, however, devise, nor could General Penny—commanding at Dehlí, in the absence of General Wilson, who on the fall of the place had proceeded on sick certificate to the Himálayas—devise any plan by which he could serve with the column to which his regiment was attached. For he was senior to Greathed, and General Penny did not possess the power to supersede that officer. One morning, however, when ruminating over the sad fate which compelled him to be inactive, Grant received a letter from Mr. (now Sir William) Muir, the Secretary to the Government of the North-West Provinces—a letter begun on the morning of the 10th October, and concluded while Greathed was beating the rebels—in which occurs the following passage: “You are is directed to proceed to Ágra and assume command of the column.

Hope Grant

to come on as sharp as you can. . . . You are to come on at once in the mail-cart if possible.” Grant, doubting the authority of Mr. Muir to confer upon him the command of a movable column, showed the letter to General Penny, who, reading through the lines, directed Grant to proceed to

Ágra, and gave him a written order to assume command of the column.

The column had left Ágra for Kánhpúr before Grant, hurrying night and day, reached that place. He overtook it, however, at Firuzábád, the third march out of Ágra, and at once assumed command. Pushing onwards, he reached Mainpúri, evacuated by its rebel Rájah, on

He assumes command,

the 19th, and arrived at Kánhpúr on the 26th October. The monotony of the march had been broken but once, Oct. 19–29.

reaches Kánhpúr,

by a skirmish, on the 23rd, of a squadron of the 9th Lancers and two squadrons of the Panjáb cavalry with some five hundred rebels, on the Káli rivulet, near Kanáuj. The skirmish had terminated in the complete defeat of the rebels; Lieutenant Dighton Probyn pursuing them as far as the Ganges, and capturing crosses the Ganges,

four guns, a large quantity of ammunition, and two store carts. At Kánhpúr arrangements were made whereby the strength of the column should be increased, by additions principally to its infantry, to about five thousand men. On the 30th, Grant crossed the Ganges for the Álambágh, but, in consequence of orders from the Commander-in-Chief, he halted within a few miles of it, near the village of Banthra, situated in a fine plain four miles and encamps in the plain beyond the Banni bridge.

Oct. 30.

on the Lakhnao side of the Banni bridge, there to await the arrival of the Commander-in-Chief, Sir Colin Campbell, on his way to commence operations for the final relief of Lakhnao. To gain this position, Grant had a skirmish with the rebels who had occupied the village of Banthra. He drove them out of it, however, without loss, and captured the only gun they possessed—a 9-pounder, the property of the East India Company.

Simultaneously with the advance of Greathed's column to relieve Ágra, a considerable body of native levies, raised and commanded by Van Cortlandt—an officer of foreign extraction who had served under Ranjit Singh, and had subsequently to the campaign of 1845-6 accepted civil office under the British Government—proceeded to restore order in the districts to the north-west of the imperial city. Van Cortlandt was well qualified for the task. He had had great experience of native soldiers, and he had shown on many an occasion, notably when he assisted Herbert Edwardes in that gallant officer's campaign of 1848, that he could make them fight. On this occasion his work was comparatively easy. The large villages all over the district submitted without a blow; many mutinous soldiers surrendered to him; the roads were opened; and on the 26th September he had so far reduced the large district of Rohtak to submission, that it was possible to re-establish the civil authorities, and even to collect revenue.

Van Cortlandt

reduces the districts to the northwest of Dehli.

Another column, under Brigadier Showers, the commanding officer of the 2nd European Regiment, was despatched on the 2nd October to clear the districts to the west and south-west. This column consisted of portions of the Carabineers, of a portion of Hodson's Horse, and the Guide Cavalry, of a field battery and two or three heavy guns and mortars, of the 2nd European Regiment, the 2nd Gurkhas, and a Regiment of Sikh Infantry. The first destination of this column was the fort of Jajhar, on the way to which place it had to march within a few miles of Ballabgarh.*

Brigadier Showers proceeds to the west and south-west.

The Rájah of this place had certainly admitted the authority of the King of Dehli. It is more than possible, it is probable, that he had to choose between such a course and destruction. Certain it is, that when he heard that the British force was in the vicinity of his capital, he drove out in his carriage to meet it. The British officer with whom he came in contact was the notorious Hodson. Hodson has recorded his opinion that the Rájah and his followers deserved to be exterminated; but the orders not to interfere with the native chief of Ballabgarh had been so positive that he was constrained to allow him to return,

The Rájah of Ballabgarh

submits.

* Also called, but incorrectly, Ballamgarh.

and the force, striking away from the road to Ballabgarh, marched through the Rewári district in the direction of Jajhar. The fort overlooking the town of Rewári was taken without opposition. Jajhar was next reached and occupied, the Nawáb having made his submission on the 18th. The still stronger fort of Kanáund in the same district, armed with fourteen guns, and containing five lakhs of rupees, surrendered the following morning to the Carabineers and Hodson's Horse, both having marched forty-one miles in fifteen hours. Being then on the borders of the sandy desert, Showers returned to Dehlí. In the course of his expedition he had occupied four forts, burnt many villages, and taken about seventy guns and £80,000, besides much ammunition and many horses. He had captured or forced to surrender, two princes, the Nawáb of Jajhar, and the Rájah of Ballabgarh,* and one notorious partisan, Hákim Abdúl Hak, chief of Gurgáon. The last-named was most justly hanged immediately after the return of the column to Dehlí.

Showers's column had scarcely returned to Dehlí when intelligence reached General Penny that the rebels, reinforced by the mutineers of the Jodhpúr legion, renew their excesses. had beaten the troops of the loyal Rájah of Jaipúr and reappeared in great force in the districts which had but just been traversed, reoccupying Rewári. It became necessary, therefore, to organise and despatch a second force to restore order. A column composed of the 1st Fusiliers, under Captain Caulfield, the 7th Panjáb Infantry, under Godby, a troop of Horse Artillery—the 3rd Brigade—under Colin Cookworthy, a heavy battery of 8-inch howitzers and 18-pounders, under Gillespie, a portion of the Corps of Guides, under Kennedy and Sandford, and the Multání horse under Lind, was ordered on this duty. The direction of it was bestowed upon Colonel Gerrard, an officer of merit and distinction trained in the 1st Fusiliers, and who then commanded that regiment.

Gerrard marched from Dehlí on the 10th of November, reached Rewári, fifty miles south-west of the imperial city, on the 13th, and reoccupied the fort without opposition. Here he was joined by two squadrons of the Carabineers. At Kanáund, which he reached two days later, he was met by a detachment of the Hariáná Field Force—of the three arms, including, in addition to the police and native levies, the 23rd Panjáb Infantry—under Captain Stafford. Thence he pushed on over a very sandy plain difficult to traverse to Narnul, where, it was understood, the enemy had mustered in force.

* The unfortunate Rájah was subsequently tried and hanged at Dehlí.

Gerrard
joined by detachments under Stafford.

It was true that on the morning of that very day, the 16th November, the rebels had occupied the village of Narnul in considerable force. They occupied it, however, only to prove for the fiftieth or sixtieth time in this memorable year, that neither strong positions, nor numbers, nor personal courage, will avail when there is no leader able to take full advantage of those positions, of those numbers, or of that valour.

Nov. 16.

The rebels
meanwhile had occupied Narnul.

Never was there a stronger exemplification of the harmlessness of lions, when the lions are led by asses. Narnul was a very strong place. It lay under a hill about four hundred feet high, which formed part of a ridge extending some miles to the south-east. It was covered in front—the front facing the road by which the British force would have to advance—by low walls, forming admirable defensive cover. A large and well-filled tank with steep banks, standing much above the surrounding plain, distant only about two hundred yards from the village, and commanding the road to it, afforded another strong position, which infantry might advantageously have occupied. The ground to the left was broken and uneven, but the plain in front was level and broad, admirably adapted to the movements of cavalry, in which arm the rebels were very strong.

Their splendid position—and the folly which prevented their keeping it.

Such was the position occupied early on the morning of the 16th November by the rebel army, flushed with recent victory over the Rájput levies of Jaipur. It was clear that their leader, Sancand Khán, a near relative of the Nawáb of Jajhar, was well aware that a British force was moving against him, for he had specially selected the strong position of Narnul as one against which that force would spend its strength in vain. But, although the country people were well disposed towards him, he made no effort to procure information re-

The rebel leader learns that the English are marching against him.

garding his enemy's movements. He posted no vedettes, he sent out no scouts. Wielding a numerous cavalry, he trusted entirely to his own eyesight to learn when and in what manner the British would advance.

Notwithstanding this information he posts neither vedettes nor scouts.

It would appear that he expected the British early on the morning of the 16th. But when the clock struck eight, then nine, and when then the hands began to point towards ten, and not a single speck of dust was visible on the horizon, he gave them up for the day, and retiring to his camp, near a dilapidated fort of the same name, about two miles in the rear, there gave orders to his men to dismount and eat. He thus deliberately abandoned, though for the short space of only one hour, a position which it would have required all the dash, all the energy, all the exertions of the small British force, numbering altogether about two thousand five hundred men, to carry. That hour was fatal to him.

As up to 10 the English had not come in sight, he vacates his splendid position.

The fact was, that the impediments in the road between Kanáund and Narnul had terribly—though, owing to the incompetence of the rebel leader, fortunately—delayed Gerrard's advance. The distance to the fort of Narnul was but fourteen miles, and Gerrard had started at 1 o'clock in the morning. Yet, in the first instance, the enormous difficulty experienced by the artillery in traversing the narrow and sharp-angled streets of Kanáund, and, in the second, the depth of the sand in the road which followed, so hindered the advance, that in ten hours they were only able to accomplish twelve miles! At 11 o'clock Gerrard reached the village of Narnul, now guiltless of the presence of an enemy.

Causes which had fortunately retarded the British.

How he and his officers grumbled at the inevitable delay, may well be imagined. Not one of them could imagine that Fortune was working for them—that the blind goddess was really removing the difficulties in front and plotting to spare the lives of many—to give them in the plain the easy victory which, though still certain, would have been difficult and bloody in the village.

The delay smooths away great difficulties.

At Narnul, I have said, Gerrard saw no signs of the enemy. The difficulties of the march had greatly fatigued his men. He therefore halted while a dram was served out, and the men devoured the small store of food which each had carried with him. They had hardly finished this frugal meal when "a slight cloud of dust was seen to rise over a gentle swell of the ground to the left in front." * Another smile from Fortune! Sanand Khán had withdrawn his men for an hour that they might break their fast at the encampment near the ruined fort: he was now returning, hoping to reoccupy his strong position!

The enemy return to occupy their position.

In a moment the British infantry stood to their arms, the cavalry were in the saddle. A trooper belonging to the Corps of Guides rode to the front to reconnoitre. As he nears the rising ground a bullet strikes the ground close to him. But prior even to that evidence of the presence of the enemy he had seen enough. He turned to report to his commanding officer, but before he could reach him the rebel horsemen showed themselves in numbers moving from left to right along the crest of the rising ground. Meanwhile Gerrard had ordered an advance, the Carabineers and the Guides on the right, linked to the centre by a wing of the 7th Panjáb Infantry, and six light guns. In the centre the 1st Fusiliers, the heavy 18-pounders, which it had cost so much trouble to drag across the sand, a company of the Guide Infantry, and the 23rd Panjáb Infantry. To connect the centre with the Irregular Cavalry and Multáni Horse on the left, and protected by the Sikh Infantry, were four light Sikh guns. In front of all rode Gerrard, a handsome man, with bright dark eyes and wavy grey hair, his red coat covered with decorations, conspicuous on his white Arab, surrounded by his staff. So steady were the movements, it might have been an ordinary field-day.

A Guide trooper reconnoitres.

The enemy show themselves in numbers.

Gerrard advances.

The trooper of whom I have spoken had scarcely rejoined his regiment when the enemy's guns opened with grape on our right. There replied to them first the light guns of the assailants; next the big eighteens and an 8-inch howitzer. Many hostile saddles are emptied; so the rebels, thinking this poor work, mass their cavalry on their left, and come down with a shout. But the movement has been foreseen, and the Carabineers and Guides, moving up at the same moment, gallop to meet

The cavalry of the rival hosts join.

* Blackwood's Magazine, June 1858. The writer of the article was present at the affair.

them. About midway between the two lines the rival hosts join.

It was a gallant conflict. Never did the enemy fight better.

The cavalry
conflict.

There was neither shirking nor flinching. Both sides went at it with a will. The Guides were commanded by Kennedy,* "the worthy son of a worthy sire," and he led them with a skill and a daring which could not be surpassed. The Carabineers, splendidly led by Wardlaw, who commanded the entire cavalry, equalled, if they did not surpass, their former splendid achievements. Never was there a charge more gallant, and certainly never were the British Cavalry met so fairly or in so full a swing by the rebel horse. As the rival parties clashed in deadly shock, the artillery fire on both sides was suspended as it were by instinct, the gunners gazing with outstretched necks at the converging horsemen.

The result was not long doubtful. Though the enemy fought with the courage of despair, though they exposed their lives with a resolution which forbade the thought of yielding, they were fairly borne down. The Carabineers and the Guides forced them back, cleaving down the most stubborn foemen, till the remainder, overpowered, sought safety in flight. Then Wardlaw and Kennedy, mindful of the mistake of Prince Rupert, gathered up their men, and, instead of pursuing the routed horsemen of the enemy, wheeled suddenly round to the left, and came down with a swoop on the enemy's guns. The shock was irresistible; the gunners who stood were cut down. Leaving the guns, the cavalry then went on to prevent any rally on the part of the enemy's horse. Scarcely, however, had they passed by when conflict.

The infantry

the enemy's infantry and gunners, recovering from their panic, pushed forward, re-took their lost guns, and opened fire on our advancing infantry. They were not allowed to continue for long this hazardous game. For, the 1st Fusiliers, coming up with a run, reached the guns after two rounds had been fired, and recaptured them.

On the British left the cavalry movement had not been so successful. The Multání Horse, new levies, had not displayed the alacrity to come to close quarters which their comrades on the right had so conspicuously manifested. In vain did their gallant commander,

The conflict
on the left.

* Now Major-General Kennedy, C.B.

Lieutenant Lind, dash amongst the foe. But few at first followed him. Noting this, the Field Engineer, Lieutenant Humphrey, who that day acted as Aide-de-Camp to Gerrard, rode up to the hesitating mass, called upon them to follow him, and charged single-handed the rebel horse. Then the Multánís followed, not, however, until the gallant Humphrey had been unhorsed and cut down, receiving a severe wound in his right arm; another, slighter, on the left side of his body; "while a third entirely divided his leather helmet and thick turban which covered it, fortunately without injuring his head." He subsequently recovered.

But the action was over. The right and the centre had won it, and the charge of the Múltánís, tardy though it was, completed the good work of their comrades.

The enemy completely defeated.

The enemy, beaten and in disorder, fell back through the gardens and broken ground on their left, in full retreat to their camp. The British followed them up with vigour, each arm vying with the other. It was on this occasion that the Horse Artillery performed a feat unsurpassed even in the annals of that splendid regiment. It is thus recorded by an eye-witness: *

Cookworthy's gallant feat.

"On turning up from the left, the Artillery got into a ploughed field, which was separated from the road by a mud wall fully three feet high. At this, Dawes's troop, this day commanded by Captain Cookworthy, † rode at full gallop. On they come—over go the leaders, nicely both together, next follows the centre pair, and lastly the wheelers take the leap; then, with a sort of kick and a bump, over goes the gun on to the hard road. The Fusiliers were so delighted that they gave a willing cheer, while the Sikhs, who witnessed the feat, said nothing for some time, but looked on with open mouths and eyes; at last, 'Truly that is wonderful!' burst from their lips spontaneously." ‡

The old Bengal Artillery.

* Blackwood's Magazine, June 1858.

† Now Major-General Colin Cookworthy.

‡ The credibility of this story has been questioned by a reviewer, who, I venture to believe, was not present on the occasion. The feat was, nevertheless, witnessed by Dr. Brougham, then attached to the 1st Fusiliers, and by many others. General Cookworthy still happily lives, and, if appealed to by the reviewer, will be able to satisfy that gentleman, if any evidence short of that of his own eyesight can satisfy him, that the writer in Blackwood's Magazine, who was present, told the exact truth.

Of such was the old Bengal Artillery, unsurpassed and unsurpassable!

Colonel Gerrard, the commander of the column, had ridden in front the whole time. He was the only man of the force—his orderly officer, Captain Osborn alone excepted—dressed in red, the infantry wearing the kháki,* or dust-coloured uniform, then authorised for service in the field. As in the fight, so in the pursuit, Gerrard maintained his prominent position. He pushed forward, directing the men, till he reached a rivulet with partially wooded banks. On these banks he drew in his horse, whilst he directed the movements of the troops to the other side. To him, thus sitting on his white Arab and giving directions calmly, one of his staff officers, Lieutenant Hogg, suddenly pointed out a man on the opposite bank taking deliberate aim at him. Just then the man fired, but missed. Hogg entreated the Colonel to move back. Gerrard replied that he would move in a minute, but that he must see what was going on. But, before he did move, the man had reloaded and fired. This time his aim was true. Gerrard fell mortally wounded, and died in two hours.

Gerrard,
directing the pursuit,

is killed.

By the death of Gerrard the command devolved upon Captain Caulfield, then commanding the 1st Fusiliers. But, before the intimation of his promotion reached him, the troops, carrying out Gerrard's plan, had crossed the rivulet, and had stormed the enemy's camp. The action, however, was by no means over. The rebel horse, rallying on the right, made a sudden charge on Lind's Multánis and recaptured two of their lost guns. Their success, however, was but momentary. Two companies of the Fusiliers, under Lieutenant Warner, charged and recovered the guns, whilst the main body of the regiment, under McFarlane, expelled the rebel infantry from the still remaining buildings in the fort of Narnul. The rebels then dispersed, leaving in the hands of the victors the eight guns, their camp, and the fort.

Caulfield takes command.

The enemy make a sudden stroke for victory,

main body

but are foiled.

Nov. 17-23.

The next day Caulfield gave the force a rest, only sending out parties of horse to ascertain the direction in which the enemy had fled. This direction proving to be the south-east, towards the dominions of the Rájah of Alwar, Caulfield sent off on the 19th to follow them. The rebels were, however, invisible. On the 23rd the force reached Paltaóli. Here it was joined by its new commander, Lieutenant-Colonel Seaton, C.B., sent for that purpose from Dehlí. To that place Seaton marched the force to prepare it to escort to the camp of the Commander-in-Chief at Káhn-púr a large convoy of grain and stores—covering above eighteen miles of road. Here I must leave him, to return once more to Calcutta, there to note how the Commander-in-Chief selected by Lord Palmerston to crush the mutiny was preparing to carry out his task.

* Kháki, the Hindustáni for "dusty."

Seaton is sent to replace Gerrard; he returns to Dehlí preparatory to marching towards Káhn-púr.

BOOK XI.—THE RE-CONQUEST OF OUDH.

CHAPTER I.

PREPARATIONS AND ACTION IN BENGAL.

SIR COLIN CAMPBELL had arrived in Calcutta on the 13th of August. At that moment affairs were seemingly at their worst. The North-west Provinces, Dehlí, Rohilkhand, and Oudh were lost. The Panjáb was fermenting. Central India was in a state of veiled rebellion. The very existence of the English in India was depending upon the early capture of Dehlí, and Dehlí still held out.

State of affairs throughout India on the arrival of Sir Colin
Campbell.

The latest accounts received from the districts occupied by the rebels were far from reassuring. The British force before Dehlí was believed to be more besieged than besieging. The British garrison in Ágra was known to be isolated; cut off from communication with the outer world. All that men knew of Lakhnao was that the small British force there had sustained a defeat in the field, and was shut in an enclosure, not in a military point of view defensible, charged with the care of a large number of women and children; that Havelock, after two heroic efforts to relieve them, had been forced to fall back upon Kánhpúr.

But, if these accounts were sufficient to dishearten, the private information received was scarcely calculated to console. Every day made the loyalty of the Sikhs more questionable. Every day increased the difficulty of Sindhiá to restrain his troops from a movement against Ágra, or, more to be dreaded still, upon Kánhpúr. Every day relaxed our hold upon the princes of Rajpútáná and of Bundelkhand, whilst from the Western Presidency there came unmistakable symptoms that order in

The British
hold on the country decreasing every day.

the southern Maráthá country could be maintained only by a strong and vigorous hand.

What was Sir Colin Campbell's position? What were his means? Thanks to the skill, the energy, the daring of a few men who had come to the front in the heart of the crisis—to Neill, to Frederick Gubbins, to Vincent Eyre, and to William Tayler—the British held Allahábád and the important cities between that fortress and Calcutta, of Banáras, of Gházípúr, and of Patná. The occupation of these three salient points enabled them to hold four others of lesser though of great importance, and by their means to command the great river artery between Calcutta and Allahábád. But the holding of these posts involved the occupation of them by troops whose services were urgently needed in the field. This, too, at a moment when the reinforcements from England were only beginning to arrive.

Sir Colin finds that, though certain centres are held, there has been a great dissemination of troops east of Allahábád.

The distance by river between Calcutta and Allahábád is eight hundred and nine miles. When Sir Colin Campbell arrived, no troops were available for active purposes. Two regiments indeed, the 5th and 90th, had been despatched to join Havelock's force at Kánhpúr. All the others were employed in keeping open the river communication between Calcutta and Allahábád.

He has no troops available for active purposes.

It is true there was the grand trunk road—Mr. Beadon's famous line of six hundred miles, though in point of fact the distance was somewhat less. But along this road the railway extended only to Rániganj, a hundred and twenty miles. Thence it was necessary to march, and the route was not only long, but, as events proved, in spite of Mr. Beadon, it was liable to be traversed by the rebels. The troops marching upon it, therefore, might at any moment be diverted for other duties.

Mr. Beadon's line still, and always, in danger of being broken.

The refusal of Lord Canning's Government in the month of July to order the disarming of the native regiments at Dánápúr had added still further to the difficulties of the new Commander-in-Chief. Two regiments of foot and a battery of artillery were thus diverted from the general plan—the plan which had made Lakhnao the point at which the first great blow was to be dealt—in order to quell a rebellion which, had the members of the Government of India been unfettered by sophisms and theories, would never have occurred—the rebellion in western Bihár.

The results of Lord Canning's refusal to disarm the Dánápúr native regiments still felt.

But, if Sir Colin Campbell had no men with whom to operate, it might be imagined that the Government had at least provided for him resources to be made available for the troops expected from China and from England. It was mainly for that object, it will be recollected, that Sir Patrick Grant had decided to remain at Calcutta. There could not be a greater delusion. Dreaming of reorganisation, sanguine that the coming troops would at once settle the business, Sir Patrick, and, following him, his colleagues, the members of the Government, had opened wide their mouths in expectancy. They had done but little, and that little had been almost forced upon them by the energy of the town-Major—Major Cavenagh.* Under his inspiration some arrangements had been made for the reception of the

Want of foresight of the Supreme Government.

* I regret that, in describing in the earlier editions, somewhat in detail, the stimulating effect on the provisions of means for the equipment and progress of the army produced by the arrival of Sir Colin Campbell in Calcutta in August 1857, I should have seemed to undervalue the services of a most distinguished officer, Major Orfeur Cavenagh. I take the earliest opportunity of endeavouring to supply the omission. The Government of India had not under its orders in Calcutta an officer more deserving, or who rendered in that city such excellent service as did Major Cavenagh. In the early stages of the mutiny, and before the arrival of Sir Colin Campbell, it was Major Orfeur Cavenagh who, as town and fort-major of Fort William, had officially represented to the Government the necessity of being prepared to receive the expected reinforcements. He had suggested that he should be allowed an assistant who should superintend all disembarkations, render any assistance to commanding officers on their arrival, and have under his charge a staff of servants to be kept complete and allotted to troops on their arrival. As usual, Cavenagh's suggestions were negatived, though permission was given him to entertain the servants should he consider it necessary to do so. On this permission he acted, and, throughout the mutiny, under his own superintendence, he kept up a body of native servants. Eventually a disembarkation officer was appointed, not, however, as assistant to the town-major. To enable this officer to carry out his duties successfully, Cavenagh directed his own subordinates to recognise him as his deputy, and afford him every aid as though he were his assistant. The only occasion on which Sir Colin did attempt to interfere with Cavenagh's arrangements for the disposition of the troops in Calcutta was with respect to the Cavalry recruits. The result was so unsatisfactory that Cavenagh was not interfered with a second time. The sixth volume will contain in fuller detail the services rendered by this officer.

expected troops. But no means of transport had been prepared; no horses, either for cavalry or artillery, had been provided; Enfield rifle ammunition was deficient, and no effort had been made to supply the deficiency; flour was even running out, and nothing had been done to procure a fresh supply; guns, gun-carriages, and harness for field batteries were either unfit for service or did not exist; and, though the gun-foundry of Kásípúr was at their door, no fresh orders had been given to the superintendent.* Sir Colin Campbell's first care was to supply these deficiencies. He moved the Government to the purchase of horses on a large and necessarily an expensive scale; to indent on England for Enfield rifle ammunition whilst stimulating the manufacture of it on the spot; to procure flour from the Cape; to cast field guns at the Kásípúr foundry; to manufacture tents; to make up harness. Before the end of August Sir Colin had quintupled the activity of the "departments," and had infused even into the Government a portion of his own untiring energy.

Sir Colin Campbell has "to organise victory."

Nor was his attention confined to the preparations necessary for the troops before they could stir one foot from Calcutta. Those troops were to move forward—but how? I have given a description, in outline, of the two routes which were open to them—the river route and the land route. But useful, and in some respects superior, as the river route had been in the months of June, July, and August, Sir Colin could not but feel that, with the cessation of the rainy season, the river would fall, and the way by it would become tedious and uncertain. He therefore resolved to do all in his power to improve the land route and to quicken the means of transport. With this view, under his inspiring pressure, the Government established the bullock train. This train was composed of a number of covered waggons, in each of which a fixed number of European soldiers could sit at ease. To draw these, a proportionate number of bullocks were posted at stages all along the road. The starting-point of the bullock train was the railway terminus at Rániganj, a hundred and twenty miles from Calcutta. The soldiers, leaving the train, were supposed to enter the bullock carriages and to travel in them all night and in the early hours of the morning and evening, resting for food during the heat of the day. This scheme was soon brought to perfection, and was made to work so as to land daily in Allahábád two hundred men fresh and fit for work, conveyed in the space of a fortnight from Calcutta.

He moves the Government to organise a bullock train to convey troops to Allahábád.

* Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

The scheme is soon brought to perfection.

But, I have said, Mr. Beadon's famous line of six hundred miles, once already rent in twain, was still far from safe. Constant revolts rendered it less and less so every day. The Rámgarh battalion, stationed at Ránchí, on the left of the road, had broken the bands of discipline, and menaced all the salient points within easy distance of that station. Similarly, on the right of the road, the remnants of the Dánápúr garrison, of the 5th Irregular Cavalry, and, subsequently, the mutinous portion of the 32nd Native Infantry, had joined the levies of Kúnwar Singh, and had spread consternation along the central portion of the line. These mutinous bands constituted the great difficulty of Sir Colin Campbell. Not that they were sufficiently formidable to check a British force. Could they have been found collected, a regiment or two of Europeans would have annihilated them. But, spreading over a vast tract of country, they harassed every district and threatened every post. For the moment Sir Colin's one care was to ensure the safety of the small parties travelling along the Trunk Road in the bullock train.

Dangers which threatened the line to be traversed by the bullock train.

Sir Colin orders patrol parties to secure it.

To attain this end he formed movable columns, of about six hundred men each, infantry and artillery, to patrol the road. This measure, successful in so far that it secured the passage of the troops, was less so in another way. It afforded to the civil authorities the temptation of diverting some of the troops to small and comparatively unimportant local operations on the flanks, "so that," says a well-informed writer, "at one period, out of about two thousand four hundred men who were proceeding by the different routes to Allahábád, one thousand eight hundred were, on one pretence or another, laid hold of by the civil power, and employed for the time being in operations extraneous to the general plan of the campaign." *

The temptation thus afforded to the civil authorities to use these troops for local purposes sometimes irresistible.

The efforts initiated by Sir Colin Campbell to produce resources and to ensure the safety of the road were beginning to bear good fruit when most of the troops diverted by Lord Elgin from the China Expedition arrived. These consisted of the 93rd Highlanders, the 23rd Fusiliers, three companies of the 82nd Foot, two companies Royal Artillery, and one company of Sappers. About the same time also, that is during September and in the first week of October, there arrived from the Cape of Good Hope a company of Royal Artillery with fifty-eight horses and about five hundred of the 13th Light Infantry. To hurry forward these troops had now become a matter of the greatest necessity. In the interval before their arrival Dehli had, it is true, fallen, but Lakhnao had not been relieved; so far from it, the British force that had reached our garrison in the Residency, besieged itself by the rebels, had been thus withdrawn from active operations, and had left a gap on which an enterprising enemy might act with fatal effect.

Troops of the China Expedition reach Calcutta.

The gap left by the retention of Ootram's troops in Lakhnao,

The rebel troops of Gwáliár were displaying unwonted activity, and it certainly was in their power at this particular period to cut the British line in two, and sever communications between Calcutta and Kánhpúr. To press on troops quickly to Allahábád, where equipments were being prepared, became then an imperative duty. To this end every exertion was made. Horses were taken bodily from regiments which had mutinied, and were pressed into service. The Military Train Corps, composed to a great extent of old dragoons, was formed, by means of some of the horses thus become available, into a cavalry regiment, and they, too, were sent on with the rest.

necessitates prompt and active measures.

But before a single man of the China expeditionary Corps had left Calcutta, there had set out from that city, in river steamers, a gallant body of men, gallantly commanded, destined to cover themselves with glory in a series of actions for which they had no special training. In another part of this history I have alluded to the arrival in Calcutta of H.M.'s ships Shannon and Pearl, and of the offer made by Lord Elgin to place those vessels with their respective crews at the disposal of the Governor-General. The offer was accepted, and, on the 18th August, Captain William Peel had started for Allahábád in the river steamer Chunar with a flat in tow, conveying four hundred and fifty men, six 65-cwt. 8-inch hollow shot or shell guns, two 24-pound howitzers, and two field-pieces. Captain Peel took with him also a launch and cutter belonging to the Shannon.*

The Shannon and Pearl.

Aug. 18.

Captain William Peel was a man who would have made his mark in any age and under any circumstances. To an energy that nothing could daunt, a power that seemed never to tire, he added a freshness of intellect, a fund of resource, which made him, in the expressive language of one of his officers, "the mainspring that worked the machinery." Bright and joyous in the field, with a kind word for every comrade, he caused the sternest duty, ordered by him, to be looked upon as a pleasant pastime. "The greatness of our loss we shall in all probability never know," wrote Dr. Russell, on learning of his untimely death from small-pox. And, in truth, that reflection of the genial correspondent represents the exact measure by which to gauge the value of Peel's services. Starting from Calcutta on an expedition unprecedented in Indian warfare, he conquered every obstacle, he succeeded to the very utmost extent of the power to succeed. He showed eminently all the qualities of an organiser and a leader of men. Not one single speck of failure marred the brightness of his ermine. His remarkable success in a novel undertaking, on an untried field—a success apparently without an effort—was in itself a proof that, had he survived, his great powers might have been usefully employed in larger and more difficult undertakings. There must have been something very much above the common in the man who, not exercising supreme command, was able to stereotype his name in the history of his native land. Yet William Peel accomplished this. To the chaplets of fame placed by his father on the altar of his country, he, still young, added another not less immortal.

Peel reached Allahábád on the 2nd September. There he was joined on the 20th of the following month by the second party from the Shannon.* By this junction the number of his brigade was brought to five hundred and twenty men, exclusive of officers. The Pearl brigade, of a hundred and fifty-five men, under Captain Sctheby, R.N., was shortly after placed at the disposal of the authorities of Patná.

* The following officers accompanied Captain Peel: Lieutenants Young, Wilson, Hay, and Salmon, R.N.; Captain Gray and Lieutenant Stirling, R.M.; Lieutenant Lind of the Swedish Navy; the Rev. G. L. Bowman; Dr. Flanagan; Mr. Comerford, Assistant Paymaster; Messrs. M. Daniel, Garvey, E. Daniel, Lord Walter Kerr, Lord Arthur Clinton, and Mr. Church, midshipmen; Messrs. Brown, Bone, and Henri, engineers; Mr. Thompson, gunner; Mr. Bryce, carpenter; Mr. Stanton assistant-clerk; and Messrs. Watson and Lascelles, naval cadets.—The Shannon's Brigade in India.

The Shannon brigade reaches Allahábád.

We left Sir Colin Campbell in Calcutta engaged in "organising victory." We have seen how in September and the first week of October he had been gladdened by the arrival of troops from China and the Cape, how he had at once sent them to the point of rendezvous in batches of two hundred daily. During the next fortnight there had arrived the remainder of the 82nd Foot, a hundred and ninety-eight men of the 38th, H.M.'s 34th, a hundred and forty-four men of the 42nd Highlanders, and a hundred and two recruits for the local European regiments. These were quickly followed by six hundred and twelve men of the Royal Artillery, nine hundred and three of the Rifle Brigade, 2nd and 3rd battalions, two hundred and ninety of the 42nd Highlanders, three hundred and fifty-two of the 54th Foot, six hundred and twenty-seven of the 88th, and eight hundred and eighty-three recruits. Having placed upon a thoroughly-well organised basis the scheme for despatching these reinforcements as expeditiously as possible to the front, Sir Colin Campbell, with the Army Head-quarters and Staff, set out, on the 27th October, by post for Allahábád.

Sept.-Oct. 26.
More troops reach Calcutta.

The operations of Sir Colin Campbell demand an entire chapter to themselves. It will be advisable that, before entering upon them, I should clear the road behind him, and place before the reader a general view of the transactions in Bengal and Bihár since Vincent Eyre's splendid gallantry had redeemed the mistakes of the Government in those important provinces.

The narrative clears the road behind
Sir Colin
Campbell.

The large division of Bhágalpúr, comprising the districts of Bhágalpúr, Munger,† Púrníá, and Santália, and the subdivision of Rájmahall, was governed by Mr.

Bhágalpúr.

* The second detachment from the Shannon consisted of a hundred and twenty men, under Lieutenants Vaughan and Wratishaw; Mr. E. H. Verney, mate; Mr. Way, midshipman; and Mr. Richards, naval cadet.

† Munger, strangely transmogrified by the early English settlers into "Monghyr," is a very ancient town, on the right bank of the Ganges, famous for its iron manufactories. It was made the capital of Bihár by Mir Kásim in 1760.

George Yule as Commissioner. The division constituted the eastern moiety of the province of Bihár. The headquarters were at the station of Bhágalpúr, on the Ganges, two hundred and sixty-six miles westward of Calcutta.

Mr. George Yule* was a good specimen of a manly, true-hearted gentleman. He was essentially a man of action. His even-handed justice had gained for him — what was rare in those days—the confidence alike of the native ráfyat and the European planter. Both classes alike trusted him, and both were prepared to obey his orders without hesitation or murmur.

Up to the time when the native garrison of Dánápúr broke out into revolt, there had been no signs of disaffection in the Bhágalpúr division. The troops quartered there—the 5th Irregular Cavalry, with their headquarters at Bhágalpúr, the 32nd stationed at Báusí, and the 63rd at Barhámpúr, had, with the exception noted in the preceding volume,† displayed no inclination to follow the example of their mutinous brethren. The conduct of Major Macdonald on the occasion in question had greatly impressed the men of the 5th, and the strong will of that courageous man had repressed the smallest inclination on the part of his soldiers to manifest the sympathies which, subsequent experience proved, they held in secret. The men of the corps had, subsequently to the event of the 12th of June, been detached to various stations in the division, as well to divide them as to overawe the turbulent classes.

Although ruling over a native population numbering, besides the Santáls, about six millions, Mr. Yule had considered it unnecessary to ask for, or to accept, the services of a European detachment, however small. He believed that, if the districts contiguous would but remain loyal, he would be able, with the help of his assistants and the planters, to maintain order in Bhágalpúr. He did so, successfully, till the third week of July. But when, during that week, the mutiny of the 12th Irregular Cavalry and the native regiments quartered at Dánápúr threatened the loss of western Bihár, he deemed

Mr. George Yule.

The native troops in eastern Bihár.

Mr. Yule, at the outset, tries to maintain order without European troops, but the threatening aspect of affairs forces him to detain a few.

* Afterwards Sir George Yule, K.C.S.I.

† Vol. III. page 24.

it prudent to detain at Bhágalpúr ninety men of the 5th Fusiliers, then being towed up the river, and to despatch fifty men of the same regiment to garrison the important fortress of Munger.

The proceedings of the native soldiers of the Dánápúr garrison, almost invited to mutiny by the supine action of the Supreme Government, combined with the immediate rising of Kúnwar Singh to render the condition of eastern Bihár dangerous in the extreme. Not only was it impossible any longer to rely upon the native soldiers in that province, but it had become necessary, for the security of life and property, to prove to the disaffected that the head wielding executive power was thoroughly aware of the danger, and that the hand was thoroughly ready to meet it.

Effect on eastern Bihár of the Dánápúr mutiny.

Mr. Yule, as a practical man, accustomed to command, was well aware that occasions may arise when an active demonstration is the best defence. Such an occasion had, in his opinion, arisen in eastern Bihár, and he prepared to act accordingly.

Fore-resolved, it was necessary to be fore-armed. His first act, then, had been to press into his service the detachment of the European troops passing by, and secure Bhágalpúr and Munger. The importance of this precautionary measure can scarcely be over-rated. The occupation of those two stations, both salient points on the Ganges, was absolutely essential to the free navigation of that river, and it must be remembered that in July, when Mr Beadon's line of six hundred miles had been broken, the Ganges constituted the only safe highway between Calcutta and Allahábád.

The securing of two salient points in his division assures the navigation of the Ganges.

Great as was the advantage thus gained, another, second only to it in importance, naturally followed. The native troops stationed at Barhampúr had not, up to that time, thanks to the timid policy of the Government, been disarmed. Had Bhágalpúr and Munger not been occupied by Europeans, the armed mutinous soldiers scattered over western Bihár would have held uninterrupted communication with their brethren on either side of them, and a general insurrection would probably have ensued.

and stops communication between the disaffected of eastern and western Bihár,

But the occupation of those stations cowed the disaffected for the time. They were content to wait. The fate of eastern Bihár now depended on the result of the siege of Árah. To that spot the eyes of the natives were turned with an excitement daily increasing.

who now wait for the result of the siege of Árah.

One rather remarkable circumstance deserves to be noticed.

The natives not always inclined to trust the news they receive.

Ill news generally, it is said, flies quickly. But it is a fact that, throughout the troubled times of the mutiny, news betokening evil to the rebels did not fly surely to their friends. It was not that the rebels failed to transmit to those friends a true record of events. But that record came, not written on paper, but by word of mouth. The result was that, when the news was bad, the men who received it, impatient of inaction, and confident of ultimate success, refused to believe it. Their sanguine natures induced them to imagine that the Europeans had invented the bad news and had caused it to be conveyed to them by men whom they had suborned. They proceeded to act then, in very many cases, as though the bearing of the news were exactly contrary to the actual meaning of the words in which it was conveyed.

So it happened on this occasion. The 5th Irregular Cavalry in the districts round Bhágalpúr had, in common with the other native soldiers in the province, waited long for the result of the leaguer of Árah. Had they not waited, but broken out, the difficulties of the British position in Bihár would have been enormously increased.

The 5th Irregular Cavalry in eastern Bihár mutiny.

But they delayed action until they should hear of its fall. On the 14th August information reached the men of the 5th that Árah had been relieved by

They try to reduce the 32nd,

Eyre. They believed this story to be a weak invention of the enemy—that the contrary had happened. That night, therefore, they deserted, and pushed with all speed for Báusí, where the 32nd Native Infantry were stationed.

But, before the mutineers of the 5th Irregulars reached the 32nd Native Infantry, the men of that regiment had received positive proof of the utter and absolute defeat of their brethren at Árah and Jagdispúr. Mr. Yule, too, with an energy worthy of the occasion, had despatched to their commandant, Colonel Burney, a special messenger, warning him of the departure in his direction of the 5th. Burney was a capable man, a splendid linguist, and thoroughly conversant with the native character. He harangued his men, and made it palpably clear to them that, whether they should march eastward or westward, they would march to destruction. He spoke eloquently, and with effect. When the 5th Irregulars, then, on the 16th, presented themselves at Báusí, they were received by the 32nd with bullets and bayonets. The 5th, baffled in their hopes, continued their course viá Rohní to Árah.

who, under the influence of Colonel Burney, repel them.

For the moment the active measures of Yule had conjured from eastern Bihár all danger. It was, however, otherwise in the neighbouring district of Chutiá Nágpúr. This mountainous district lies between southern Bihár, western Bengal, Orisá, and the Central Provinces. It is called Chutiá Nágpúr from Chutiá near Ránchí, the residence of the Rájahs of Nágpúr. It is chiefly inhabited by aboriginal tribes, such as Kols, Oráons, Mundás, Bhúmij, and Korwás. Its chief military stations were Hazáribágh, Ránchí, Chaibásá and Parúliá.

Chutiá Nágpúr.

At Hazáribágh there was quartered in July 1857 a detachment of the 8th Native Infantry; at Ránchí, the headquarters and artillery of the local Rámgarh battalion; and at Chaibásá and Parúliá, detachments of that battalion. The acting Commissioner of the district was Captain Dalton.

July.

The news of the mutiny of the native garrison at Dánápúr and of the rising of Kúnwar Singh, reached Hazáribágh on the 30th July. The detachment of the 8th Native Infantry at once mutinied, and drove their officers and the civil authorities from the station.

Effect in Chutiá Nágpúr of the mutiny at Dánápúr.

Those were still the days of confidence. Almost every officer of the native army, whilst admitting and deploring the disaffection of other regiments, believed implicitly in the loyalty of his own men. When, then, intelligence reached Dorandá, the civil station adjoining Ránchí, that the troops at Hazáribágh, only sixty miles distant, were shaky, the officer commanding at that station despatched Lieutenant Graham with thirty horsemen of the Rámgarh Irregular Cavalry, two companies of the Rámgarh battalion, and two guns, to Hazáribágh, to disarm them. Graham marched, but he had not reached the second stage before Captain Oakes met him with the information that the detachment of the 8th Native Infantry had mutinied the previous day. That same night his own infantry mutinied, seized, in spite of his protestations, the guns and ammunition, as well as four elephants, the property of Captain Dalton, and marched back to Ránchí, breathing hostile imprecations against the Europeans there stationed. The cavalry remained staunch.

The troops in the province generally mutiny.

Captain Dalton and a few European officers were at Ránchí.

Captain Dalton abandons Ránchí and proceeds to Hazáribágh.

They received timely information of the revolt. The defence of the place was impossible. They remained there, however, till the latest safe moment, and then proceeded to Hazáribágh, now abandoned by the rebels, and whither Lieutenant Graham with a few horsemen who had remained faithful had preceded them.

The plunder of Ránchí and Dorandá.

The stations of Ránchí and Dorandá fell into the hands of the rebels, who plundered the treasury, fired cannon at the church, released the prisoners, and destroyed private property.

Efficient measures taken by Dalton to restore order.

Meanwhile, Dalton, ably seconded by the officers of the Rámgarh battalion and the cavalry, by his own civil officers, Captains Davies and W. H. Oakes, was exerting himself to restore order in Hazáribágh. In this he was loyally assisted by the Rájah of Rámgarh. This petty chief placed at the Commissioner's disposal some forty or fifty armed men. With the aid of these men, and of the few native horsemen and foot soldiers who had remained faithful, Dalton not only tranquillised Hazáribágh, but he recovered a large quantity of the property seized by the rebels, and captured many of them. In a few days he was able to re-open the courts, and to transact official business as usual.

Parúliá and Chaibásá.

At Parúliá and at Chaibásá, the other posts in Chutiá Nágpúr occupied by native troops, scenes had taken place similar to those enacted at Ránchí and Hazáribágh. On the 5th August, the Sipáhis of the Rámgarh battalion, stationed at those places, mutinied, plundered the treasury, released the prisoners, and sacked the private houses of the Europeans. These, few in number, fell back upon Rániganj.

The Rájah of Rámgarh, at the time that he afforded to the Commissioner of Chutiá Nágpúr the aid in armed men of which

I have spoken, had expressed his strong conviction that it would be difficult to hold Hazáribágh against the surging influences around it, unless European troops should be sent to occupy it. He had therefore pressed upon Captain Dalton the necessity of asking at once for a European regiment.

Loyal conduct of the Rájah of Rámgarh.

Captain Dalton asked for a European regiment. It was but natural and proper that he should do so. But how was it possible for the Government to comply? Dehlí had not fallen. The districts below Kánhpúr were in the state which I have endeavoured to describe in the opening pages of this chapter.

Dalton
applies for European
troops.

Sir Colin

Campbell had just arrived, but Sir Colin Campbell had not a soldier to dispose of. When an army was urgently required at Kánhpúr, it was not in his power to do more than to organize transport for the troops which were to come, but which had not arrived.

None are available.

It happened, however, that the Government had other resources at its disposal, and that it was possible to use these for the double purpose of tranquillising Chutiá Nágpúr and of then lending a hand to the force which was concentrating at Allahábád.

Other resources at the disposal of the Government.

The native soldiers of the army of the Madras Presidency—those of one regiment, the 8th Light Cavalry, excepted—had not been tainted by the mutinous spirit which had disgraced their brethren in the Bengal army. In-

The Madras
army.

heritors of the fame of the men who had fought the French soldiers of Lally, who had helped to wrest Southern India from the grasp of Haidar Alí, the Madras Sipáhis had come forward, on the first bursting of the storm, to offer their services, had begged—to use their own touching language—“to be granted an opportunity of proving their faithful attachment to the Government which had cherished them.” After some hesitation, the Government of India responded favourably to the request thus pressed upon them. On the 5th August, the 27th Regiment Madras Native Infantry, and a wing of the 17th Regiment Native Infantry, landed in Calcutta. They were speedily followed by the remaining wing of the 17th Regiment, some native artillerymen, a company of sappers, half of the E Troop Horse Artillery, and a little later by a Rifle battalion composed of the Rifle companies of the 1st, 5th, 16th, 24th, 36th, 49th, and 54th Regiments of Native Infantry, the whole under the command of Brigadier M. Carthew.

Of Brigadier Carthew I shall have to speak more in detail further on. It will suffice here to state that to a thorough knowledge of his profession he combined great quickness of military vision, the capacity and the nerve to strike at the right moment. All that he did, he did thoroughly and well. With larger opportunities it cannot be doubted that he would have achieved great things.

Brigadier Carthew.

The Madras troops constitute the other resources at the disposal of the Government.

Besides the troops of the Madras Army already enumerated, there were others marching by land from Katak in eastern Bengal. Among these was the 18th Madras Native Infantry, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Fischer.

These Madras troops constituted the further resources at the disposal of the Government of India to which I have alluded, and which enabled them to give a satisfactory reply to Captain Dalton's requisition for European troops.

They pointed out to him, in effect, that the moment the artillery, then daily expected from Madras, should arrive, a considerable force would be sent to restore order; that one column would proceed along the grand trunk road to Barhí and Hazáribágh, the other direct to Parúliá and Ránchí. The Government expressed a hope that until these reinforcements should arrive Captain Dalton would be able to maintain himself at Hazáribágh.

Reply of the Government to Dalton's requisitions.

But this was just what Captain Dalton could not at the moment do. Matters became so threatening that he, accompanied by his few adherents, was forced, on the 13th, to fall back on Bagoda. Here he remained for a few days, when he was joined by a hundred and fifty of Rattray's Sikhs, under Lieutenant Earle. With these men, Dalton reoccupied Hazáribágh.

Difficulties of Dalton.

But the mutineers were still at large, and although the Government, grown wise by experience, had endeavoured to prevent any augmentation of their forces by the disarming, on the 2nd August, of the 63rd Native Infantry, the 11th Irregular Cavalry, and the troops of the Nawáb Názim at Barhámpúr, yet the presence of a considerable body of revolted soldiers of all arms in the vicinity of the grand trunk road—the line of six hundred miles—constituted a danger which it was necessary to meet, and meet quickly. The danger was increased by the sudden mutiny, accompanied by the murder of their officers, of two companies of the 32nd Native Infantry at Deogarh in the Santál districts.

Difficulties of
the Government.

enhanced by further mutinies.

The Government therefore revised their plans. Renouncing their intention of working on two lines, they directed Colonel Fischer, commanding a detachment of Madras troops, to mass them, and march by way of Dorandá on Hazáribágh.

Fischer is ordered to march direct on Hazáribágh.

Fischer received this message at Barhí on the night of the 13th September. He had with him his own regiment, a few Sikhs, a detachment of the 53rd Foot, and two guns.

Before the message arrived, he had ascertained that the mutineers had left Chutiá Nágpúr, probably for Rhotágarh: he submitted that instead of marching on Hazáribágh, he should move to intercept them in their retreat. This was agreed to in principle, but other contradictory telegrams from headquarters disarranged Fischer's plans. When at length he received the orders to carry out his own ideas, he had already despatched Major English with a hundred and fifty men of the 53rd and a hundred and fifty Sikhs towards Dorandá.

Fischer despatches a detachment, 53rd, under English towards Dorandá.

Whilst English was marching on Dorandá, Rattray, with two hundred Sikhs, was intrenched at Dehrí, and Fischer, with the main body, was moving towards Jalpá. No one knew where the enemy was. "It is incredible, but a fact," wrote Colonel Fischer, on the 24th September, to the Chief of the staff at Calcutta, "that the Rámgarh mutineers, with their guns, are moving about in a small province, and not an official, civil or military, can tell where they are to be found." A careful consideration of probabilities induced Fischer, however, to think that Chatrá, a town in the Hazáribágh district, would prove to be their place of refuge. He reported the circumstances and his opinion to the Chief of the staff. The answer he received took the form of a direction to cease all operations against the insurgents and to confine himself to protecting the grand trunk road. The same post conveyed instructions to Major English to assume charge of the operations in Chutiá Nágpúr under the direct orders of the Commander-in-Chief.

Fischer is directed to protect the trunk road.

Major English marched then on Chatrá, reached that place at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 2nd October, and encamped on the west side of the town. That officer's force now consisted of a hundred and eighty men of the 53rd Foot, a hundred and fifty Sikhs, and two guns, in all about three hundred and fifty men. The rebels amounted to three thousand. Nothing daunted, English attacked them, and, after a resistance lasting over an hour, completely defeated them. The survivors fled in great disorder, hotly pursued for some distance, leaving in the hands of the victors four guns and waggons complete, forty carts laden with ammunition, ten elephants, twenty-nine pairs of ordnance bullocks, and several boxes of treasure. The loss of the British amounted to forty-two killed and wounded: that of the enemy was never accurately known.

This action removed the greatest danger from the grand trunk road. Though English's detachment, in the pressing circumstances of the times, was not allowed to remain in the province, Rattray's Sikhs were left there, and these excellent soldiers, under the guidance of their active and energetic commander, proved themselves fully competent to make head against the insurgents in Chutiá Nágpúr and in the districts immediately to the north and east of it.

English to operate against the insurgents. English attacks the enemy at Chatrá, and completely defeats them.

The province is then left to the protection of Rattray.

CHAPTER II.

THE SECOND RELIEF OF LAKHNAO NOVEMBER, 1857.

SIR COLIN CAMPBELL left Calcutta for Allahábád on the 27th October. The insecurity of the road was almost illustrated by his capture.* The two revolted companies of the 32nd Native Infantry had pushed northwards, travelling on the elephants they had purloined. Sir Colin and his staff travelled without an escort. They reached Shergháti in safety. Again setting out, they had proceeded ten or twelve miles, when a turn of the road revealed to the driver of the foremost carriage fourteen elephants laden with native soldiers, and escorted by some twenty-five sawárs. Fortunately the bullock train with a British detachment was some short distance behind. On this train the carriages at once fell back. But for the good look-out and prompt action of the drivers, the Commander-in-Chief could not have escaped capture—and worse.

Sir Colin
starts for the seat of war, and runs a risk of being captured.

* A few hours before the occurrence narrated in the text Sir Colin met, travelling by "dák gári" (post) to Calcutta, Lieutenant Turnbull of the 78th, late A.D.C. to Sir Archdale Wilson, conveying duplicate despatches to Calcutta, with the account of the successful assault on Dehli.

It is interesting to note how, in those difficult times, an energetic officer was able to traverse the long distance between Dehli and Calcutta. Sir Archdale Wilson had left Dehli the 4th of October. On leaving he entrusted to Turnbull duplicate despatches for Lord Canning, giving full particulars of the assault. Turnbull started, accompanying reinforcements for Greathed's column; reached that column the day after the fight at Ágra; then pushed on to Kánhpúr; then by "dák gári" to Allahábád and Banáras; thence by mail-cart to Rániganj. Meeting Sir Colin in the manner already noted, he pushed on to Calcutta, and reached Government House early the 31st May, being the first European to reach the Presidency from the zone north of the Mutiny since its outbreak.

On the evening of the 1st November, Sir Colin arrived at Allahábád. The troops of the Line and the Naval Brigade, pushed to that station by the energy of the Commander-in-Chief, had, under his instructions, left it in strong columns or detachments for Kánhpúr. Some of these had reached that place without encountering an enemy on the road. The case was otherwise with the column of which a detachment of Peel's Naval Brigade, under Peel himself, formed a considerable portion.

One detachment of the Naval Brigade, consisting of a hundred men and four officers, escorting the siege train, had left Allahábád for Kánhpúr on the 23rd October; the second detachment, under Peel himself, followed on the twenty-eighth. Accompanying this second detachment, were a wing of the 53rd Regiment, a company of the 93rd, drafts for different regiments, and a company of Royal Engineers, the whole under the command of Colonel Powell, C.B., of the 53rd. It is with this last detachment that I have at present to deal.

This column reached Fathpúr, about midway between Allahábád and Kánhpúr at midnight of the 31st October. That afternoon, information had reached Powell that the revolted regiments of the Dánápúr garrison, the same whom Eyre had driven out of Bihár, their ranks swollen by other mutineers, were then occupying a strong position at the village of Kajwá, some twenty-four miles north-west of Fathpúr. Their numbers were estimated at, in round numbers, two thousand Sipáhis, and about the same number of untrained adherents.

Kajwá is rather a famous place in Indian history. Here it was, in January 1659, that Aurangzib gained the empire of Hindustán by a decisive victory over his brother Shujá. Close to the town is a spacious garden, walled and turreted, flanked by enclosures, capable, when held by good soldiers, of offering a solid resistance to an advancing foe. Moreover, troops occupying this place barred the road to any column marching from Fathpúr to Kánhpúr.

Powell possessed the truest instincts of a soldier. He had been in Fort William in command of his regiment when the mutiny broke out. He had watched every turn it had taken, and throughout, when our fortunes seemed lowest, had proclaimed his certain confidence

The troops as they reach Allahábád are sent on in strong detachments to Kánhpúr.

The Naval Brigade and 53rd detachment, commanded by Colonel Powell.

Powell learns at Fathpúr that the rebels are close at hand.

Kajwá.

Colonel Powell, C.B.

in the ultimate success of our arms. He had panted for action. Now, unexpectedly, the opportunity came to him. He marched on at once to Fathpúr and arrived there at midnight. That night he made all his preparations for a forced march and an attack on the following morning.

At half past 5 o'clock on the morning of the 1st November, Powell set out with a detachment, increased before coming into action to five hundred and thirty men. It consisted of a hundred and three officers and men of the Naval Brigade under Peel; one company of Royal Engineers, under Captain Clarke; two companies (one hundred and sixty-two men) of the 53rd; one company of the 93rd, under Captain Cornwall, and a company made up of the men of different detachments, under Lieutenant Fanning. It had two 9-pounder guns, under Lieutenant Anderson. Captain William Peel was the second in command.

He marches against the rebels at Kajwá.

It was not till 3 o'clock on the afternoon of the following day that Powell came in sight of the enemy. He saw at a glance that he had them. Instead of taking advantage of the walled garden and the buildings in Kajwá, they had placed their right on open ground, covered by some sand hillocks, forming a sort of embankment; their left on higher ground on the other side of the road. They had three guns posted on the road, two somewhat in advance, the third on a bridge near the village behind. A field of standing corn in front of their position concealed their skirmishers.

Nov. 2.
False position of the enemy.

Powell attacked at once. Pushing the enemy's skirmishers out of the corn-fields, he made a dash at the two foremost guns, the fire of which had done great execution amongst his men. He had just secured these when he fell dead with a bullet through his forehead. The command then devolved on Peel.

Powell attacks them ;
is killed just as he had captured two guns.

Whilst the 53rd, under Powell, had been marching on the guns, the Naval Brigade, on the right, had forced back the enemy's left. The position of the battle was then changed. The enemy, driven back on the left, now faced the road, and the British, whose right had been thrown forward, faced them. Peel gave them no time to rally. Posting a strong force to secure his new

The Naval Brigade force back the enemy's left ;

Peel then cuts their force in two, and defeats them.

position, he carried his troops round the upper end of the embankment, cut the enemy's force in two and drove them from their positions, capturing their camp, two of their guns, and a tumbril.

Pursuit was impossible. The infantry had marched seventy-two miles in three days, and Peel had no cavalry. His losses, too, had been severe, amounting in killed and wounded to ninety-five. That of the enemy was estimated at three hundred. The captured guns and tumbril, as well as a third gun, and three tumbrils, abandoned by the rebels in their flight, were brought into camp the same evening. Peel then regained the high road and pursued his march to Kánhpúr.

This successful action was fought the day Sir Colin Campbell arrived at Allahábád. It made the way clear for his further progress. Sir Colin stayed at Allahábád only one day. He did not quit it, however, until he had perfected all the arrangements for the districts he had left, those especially by which a force under Colonel Longden, of the 10th Foot, was to clear of rebels the district of Ázamgarh and its neighbourhood. The movements of this force will be referred to hereafter.

The Commander-in-Chief reached Kánhpúr on the 3rd November. Rejecting the counsels which conceited men attempted to thrust upon him, he had resolved, before doing anything else, to relieve Lakhnao. Oudh was the ulcer which had up to this time swallowed up all the reinforcements which had been pushed up from Calcutta, which was attracting to it the hardened warriors released by the fall of Dehli. At all costs the heart of Oudh must be pierced: Lakhnao must be really conquered before a single step could be taken to subdue enemies still rising up on many sides.

I use the expression, "still rising up," advisedly. It had been very generally believed that the fall of Dehli would terminate the revolt. It did nothing of the sort. It is true that it saved India: that is, occurring when it did, it prevented the insurrection of the Panjáb. On the other hand, it added greatly to the number of our enemies in the field. The rebellious Sipáhis, cooped up till its fall in Dehli, spread in detachments over the country. But, perhaps, its most important result was

Result of the action.

Sir Colin reaches Allahábád, and, pushing on,

arrives at Kánhpúr. Nov. 3.

His resolve to march on Lakhnao justified.

The immediate effect of the fall of Dehli is to add to the enemies of the British.

the manner in which it affected the trained soldiers of the Maharájah of Gwáliár.

In the volume immediately preceding I have narrated how, whilst the troops of Sindhiá had mutinied, Sindhiá himself had remained loyal to his British overlord. Sindhiá continued loyal to the end. When, on the 22nd September, he received certain tidings of the complete conquest of Dehlí, his joy could not contain itself. At last he was free from the tension that had almost killed him. He could breathe: he could talk: he could even laugh. It often happens that sudden transition from anxiety to its opposite can find relief only in exaggerated expressions of pleasure. It was so in this instance. Sindhiá's joy was so unmistakable, that the trained soldiers, whom till then he had succeeded in detaining at Gwáliár under various pretences, broke loose from his grasp, and sought a chief who would lead them against the English. After brief negotiation they agreed to the terms offered by the Rání of Jhánsí and her confederate, Tántiá Topí, the Maráthá chief, who, under the orders of Náná Sáhib, had superintended the massacre of Kánhpúr. Tántiá at once assumed command of the rebel forces. A wary, capable, astute man, he alone of all the natives brought by the mutiny to the front—Kúnwar Singh and the Oudh Maulaví alone excepted—showed any great qualities of generalship. Tántiá was a man to be feared. Fortunate was it for the British that the Gwáliár soldiers had not earlier placed themselves under his orders, for his first act on taking up his office was to march them southwards to occupy a position which should threaten Kánhpúr.

Its effect on Sindhiá and on the Gwáliár contingent.

A weaker mind than that of Sir Colin Campbell might have been deterred, by the action of Tántiá Topí, from leaving Kánhpúr with a small garrison and marching to a contest which must be desperate, and might be doubtful, at Lakhnao. But, in war, something must always be risked. The information from Lakhnao was to the effect that the store of provisions could not well last to the end of the month. There we had our soldiers, our women, our prestige. That was the decisive point—and Sir Colin had a way of always striking at the decisive point.

Reasons which prompted Sir Colin to march, in the first instance, on Lakhnao.

Before he reached Kánhpúr, then, he had made all his arrangements for an advance on Lakhnao. I have already stated that Hope Grant's column had reached Kánhpúr on the 26th October, and had been there increased to an effective strength of five thousand five hundred; that he had crossed the Ganges on the 30th, and, pushing forward, had encamped on the plain between Banní and the Álabágh, to await there the arrival of Sir Colin. In this position Grant formed the point d'appui upon which all the detachments and store carts, as they came up, were to mass themselves. Daily there arrived something in the way of provisions and carriage—for the certainty of having to carry back with him the women and children had not been lost sight of by the Commander-in-Chief.

Sir Colin Campbell joined Hope Grant on the 9th. The interval—from the 3rd to the 9th—had been spent by the Commander-in-Chief in arranging for the protection of his base—that base being Kánhpúr. He left behind him at that station about five hundred Europeans. These consisted of four companies of the 64th Regiment, strengthened by men belonging to other regiments to four hundred and fifty men; forty-seven men of the Naval Brigade; and some eighteen or twenty artillerymen. There were besides a few Sikhs, who, with the artillerymen, manned a field battery of four guns, which had been hastily improvised. This garrison was placed under the command of Major-General Charles A Windham, C.B., of Redan celebrity. Windham was directed by the Commander-in-Chief to place his troops within the intrenchment which, on the reoccupation of Kánhdúr by Havelock in July, had been hastily constructed on the river; not to attack any enemy unless by so doing he could prevent the bombardment of the intrenchment; to send into Oudh, by wings of regiments, the detachments of European infantry which might arrive; on no pretext to detain them unless he should be seriously threatened, and, even in that case, to ask for instructions from the Commander-in-Chief. Windham was authorised, however, to keep back the brigade of Madras native troops, expected the following day, the 10th November, until the intentions of the Gwáliár contingent should become developed.

Hope Grant's position beyond the Banní bridge.

Nov. 9.

protection

The force left at Kánhpúr commanded by Windham.

Instructions given to Windham.

Having, by these instructions, secured, as he believed, his base, Sir Colin Campbell started on the 9th, accompanied by his staff, to join Hope Grant's camp in the sandy plain four miles beyond Banní. He reached it that afternoon, had a cordial meeting with Hope Grant and his old friends of the Dehlí force, and, after a short conversation, gave his orders for the following day. In pursuance of these orders, Colonel Adrian Hope was sent forward to the Álambágh, the following day, in charge of a large convoy of provisions. The provisions were to be left there, and the carts laden with sick and wounded to be sent back to Kánhpúr. That same day a portion of the siege-train, escorted by the Naval Brigade, arrived in camp. This had been expected. But it had been preceded by an arrival which had not been altogether anticipated. Suddenly, in the early morning of the 10th, there presented himself to the astonished gaze of Sir Colin Campbell, a European gentleman, disguised as a native, and who, in that disguise, had managed to make his way through the beleaguering forces, carrying on his person important despatches. His name was Kavanagh. To understand thoroughly the nature of the information he brought, I must ask the reader to return with me to Lakhnao, and to view the Residency on the morrow of the arrival of the relieving force under Outram and Havelock.

Sir Colin
joins Hope Grant.

Nov. 10.
Kavanagh
joins Sir Colin from the Residency.

On the night of the 25th September, the advanced portion of Havelock's force had entered the Residency. They were followed the next morning by all but the rear-guard. Thanks to the splendid exertions of Colonel Napier, R.E., and the valour and skill of Crump, of Olpherts, of Fraser, of Private Duffy—of the artillery—of Lowe of the 32nd, who covered the movement, of Dodgson and of others, the wounded men and the guns were brought safely to the new ground occupied by the British, and to which reference will be presently made, on the 27th. It had been already discovered that the advent of Outram's force constituted not a relief but a reinforcement; that means of transport for the ladies and children, the sick and the wounded, were wanting; that an enormous addition had been made to the hospital list; and that, even had transport been available, the combined force was not strong enough to escort it to Kánhpúr. But one course, then, remained open to Outram, and that was to hold the Residency until he should be effectively relieved by Sir Colin Campbell.

September.
Outram and Havelock in the Residency.

Outram's first care was to provide accommodation for the largely increased force. With this view, he at once caused the palaces extending along the line of the river, the Táráwálá Kothí, the Chatar Manzil,* and the Farhat Bakhsh, to be occupied, the enemy's works and guns in the vicinity being at the same time destroyed.

The manner in which Outram provides accommodation for the increased force.

The palaces extending along the river are taken

These posts were taken on the morning of the 26th September. One party, composed of a hundred and fifty men of the 32nd Regiment, under Captain Lowe, commanding that regiment, attacked the rebels in the Captain Bazaar, drove them into the Gúntí with loss, and captured three large and four small guns.

Another, composed of the 13th Native Infantry, under Lieutenant Aitken, assaulted the gateway leading to the Farhat Bakhsh palace, and carried it with considerable loss to the enemy. It was mainly in consequence of these sorties that the palaces above mentioned fell into the hands of the British.

These new posts were held by the troops forming Havelock's command, and were under his personal orders. The old garrison, reinforced by the Madras Fusiliers, continued, under Brigadier Inglis, to occupy their posts in the Residency. There remains to be mentioned the Álambágh. The reader will remember that this place had been occupied by Havelock on the 23rd September, and that he had stored there the baggage of the force, and left in it a guard of two hundred and fifty men. This small party had under its charge many of the wounded, several of whom speedily became convalescent and able to bear arms. Separated from the Residency as was the Álambágh by the city, which was still and was likely to remain in the hands of the rebels, it was very defensible. A fortified enclosure, the garrison brought to defend it two heavy guns and two 9-pounders, besides other guns taken from the enemy. They had ammunition and water, every necessary of life except a large store of provisions. It was very desirable to maintain the position as a touching point for a relieving army. But the want of provisions constituted a difficulty. Outram therefore instructed Major

* Táráwálá Kothí, literally "the Star Mansion:" the Observatory, built for one of the Kings of Oudh under the superintendence of Colonel Wilcox, Astronomer Royal; Chatar Manzil, literally "the Umbrella Palace;" Farhat Bakhsh is a proper name.

McIntyre, 78th Highlanders, the senior officer at the post, to hold it as long as he could do so, and only in case of absolute necessity to fall back on Kánhpur.

To rid himself entirely of his native cavalry, useless inside a fortified enclosure, Outram, at an early period after his arrival, directed Lieutenant Hardinge to endeavour to arrange so that they should all quit the enclosure in the dark of the night, and, if successful in this, make at once for Kánhpúr. Hardinge got his men under arms and endeavoured to lead them out. But the sound of his horses' hoofs was the signal for a heavy and concentrated fire upon them from the loop-holed houses of the streets through which they had to pass—a fire so heavy and so concentrated that the attempt had to be abandoned. It was clear that the enemy were well on the alert. The result was that the horses, reduced in the absence of grass to feed on the bark and branches of the trees, died in great numbers, and those that survived became so emaciated as to be utterly unfit for service.

He attempts to get rid of the native cavalry,

but the enemy baffle him.

The six weeks which followed the arrival of Outram's force have not been inaptly described as the blockade. His arrival had terminated the siege. The danger of being overwhelmed by the masses of the enemy had in a great measure passed away. But, in spite of this change in their condition, events were of frequent occurrence which served to keep up the soldierly excitement of the garrison. There was only this difference in the feeling. Before the reinforcements had reached it, it had generally been the excitement of defence; it had now become the more stirring excitement of attack.

Difference between the period prior, and that subsequent, to the relief.

On the 27th September, for instance, a party of the 1st Fusiliers, and some men of the 32nd Regiment, under the command of Major Stephenson, made a sortie for the purpose of taking some guns in the enemy's Kánhpúr battery. The British troops were met by a very heavy fire from the enemy, and, although they succeeded in spiking three of the enemy's guns, they were unable to bring them back within the defences. On their return, they were exposed to so destructive a fire from the tops of houses and loopholes that they found it most difficult to carry in their killed and wounded. One sergeant, severely wounded, must have been left on the ground, had not a private of the 32nd, William Dowling by name, in the most gallant manner, and with the assistance of Captain Galway 1st Madras Fusiliers, carried him to a place of safety. Lieutenant Huxham of the 48th Native Infantry, was wounded.*

Sortie of the 27th September.

The unexampled losses which the 32nd Regiment had suffered may be gathered from the fact that, on this occasion, they were commanded by Lieutenant Warner, of the 7th Light Cavalry, solely because there were no regimental officers available. Tried as this gallant regiment had been during the siege, its men were yet detailed for every sortie and for every attack.

Thus, on the 29th September, three sorties were made simultaneously. One of these proceeded from the left square of the Brigade Mess; the second from the Sikh Square; the third from the Redan. The party charged with the last-named sortie, and which I will distinguish as the third party, composed of two hundred men, with a reserve of a hundred and fifty, from the 32nd and 5th Fusiliers, drove the enemy from their guns, and advanced till they came to a lane commanded by an 18-pounder. In this advance they lost Captain McCabe of the 32nd, a most distinguished officer, who was then leading his fourth sortie. Major Simmons of the 5th Fusiliers was also shot dead; and, it being ascertained that no further advance could be made without considerable loss, the party was recalled. The second party, from the Sikh Square, commanded by Lieutenant Hardinge, was composed of men from the 32nd, 78th, and 1st Madras Fusiliers, two hundred in all, and supported by some men of the 13th Native Infantry, under Lieutenant Aitken. They succeeded in demolishing several houses and batteries. The first party, from the Brigade Mess, commanded by Captain Shute, and composed of men from the 32nd, 64th, and 84th, succeeded in destroying a 24-pounder gun, and in spiking two mortars, and four native guns of small calibre. Their loss was very severe, quite disproportionate to the service rendered. Again, on the 2nd November, Lieutenant Hardinge led a party composed of the 32nd, 84th, 1st Madras Fusiliers, and seven artillerymen, to destroy some guns on the Kánhpúr road. This was done effectively and almost without opposition.

* For his conduct on this occasion, following on previous acts of distinguished gallantry, Private Wilham Dowling, of the 32nd Foot, received the Victoria Cross.

To write a detailed account of these operations would require a volume devoted wholly to the siege of Lakhnao. Dealing with a large subject, I unwillingly confine myself to a simple statement of deeds in which every man was a hero. In these the officers of the Indian army were not one whit behindhand. Constantly recurring are the names of Wilson, Aitken, Ouseley, Apthorp, Forbes, Graham, and Cubitt, of the Infantry; the Engineers, McLeod Innes, Anderson, and Hutchinson; there were, too, many others. Some, not less prominent, and whose names will be found mentioned further on, were killed. With them, too, Thornhill of the Civil Service, one of the most daring of men.*

The officers and men of the Indian
army.

On the 2nd October, Outram, finding that the garrison were greatly annoyed by a fire from a very strong battery—known as Phillips's Garden battery, on the Kánhpúr road—ordered out a party formed of detachments from several regiments under October.

Napier attacks Phil-lips's Garden
battery,

* As a proof of the fidelity and gallantry of the native troops, I may mention that every native officer of the 13th Bengal Native Infantry was either killed, wounded, or died during the siege. The Subahdár-Major of the regiment, Amar Singh, a gallant old Rájput, received two wounds at Chinhat, but struggled back into the Residency with the beaten troops from that fatal field and served throughout the siege and for many years afterwards as Subahdár-Major of the Regiment of Lakhnao.

Débidín Misr, the drill háwaldár of the 13th, got through the siege without a wound, in spite of his conspicuous gallantry, and was for many years subsequently, after the retirement of Amar Singh, Subahdár-Major of the Regiment of Lakhnao.

Hírálál Misr, a Sipáhi of the 48th, at the commencement and throughout the siege was the right-hand man of Captain James, the head of the Commissariat. He displayed the greatest gallantry and intelligence, and died a few years ago a Subahdár of the Regiment of Lakhnao. He, like many of the distinguished native officers, who served throughout the defence, received a village in perpetuity.

Many other gallant Sipáhis, especially of the 13th, may be mentioned. Séoráj Singh (severely wounded on the 20th June under Loughnan, defending Innes's post), Indra Singh, both Sipáhis of the 13th when the siege commenced, and native officers when Sir Colin Campbell came to the relief of the Residency, are worthy of mention, as are Anúka Singh and Hírálál Singh, both Sikhs; Rámnarain Pándi, who greatly distinguished himself, under Lieutenant Aitken, in the sortie of the 26th of September. All ranks of this gallant regiment, the 13th, as well as the 48th and 71st Native Infantry, received the Order of Merit.

Colonel Napier to storm it. Napier conducted the attack with his usual combination of science and daring, and took the battery—a very strong one—with the loss of two men killed and eleven wounded. He captured three guns—two 9-pounders and a 6-pounder. There was nothing strange in this: but it was remarkable that he should have rescued a private soldier of the Madras Fusiliers, who had been three days in the power of the enemy, without their knowing it. The man had fallen down a well, and had remained there, undiscovered by the rebels who were occupying the place.

Outram had been very much impressed with the advantage which must accrue from adopting the direct Kánhpúr road as the mode of communication with the Alanbágh. To carry out this idea, he directed Major Haliburton, of the 78th Highlanders, to extend the position in that direction, working from house to house. This operation, which was full of danger, was begun on the 3rd. The next day Haliburton was mortally wounded. Stephenson of the Madras Fusiliers, who succeeded him, shared the same fate on the 5th. Still the work was persevered with. Several houses were pierced through. At last, on the 6th, a large mosque was reached. This place was of great strength in itself, and was occupied in considerable force. To reduce it would have required more extensive operations than, in the state of the garrison, would have been convenient. The operations, therefore were relinquished, but the intermediate houses were blown up and the 78th were located in the garden, in which rested the battery captured on the 2nd. This became an important permanent outpost, and not only protected a considerable portion of the old intrenchment, but connected it with the palaces which had been occupied on the 26th and 27th.

The work of mining and countermining, so remarkable during the siege, was, during the blockade, still further developed under the superintendence of Colonel Napier. Aply seconded by the engineer officers, Crommelin, Anderson, McLeod Innes, Hutchinson, Russell, Limond, and by others, all the efforts of the enemy in this direction were frustrated. The post to which I have alluded as occupied by the 78th Highlanders, and called Phillips's garden, from its situation outside the intrench-

and captures
three guns.

Remarkable rescue of a soldier.

Outram endeavours to open out the Kánhpúr
road,

but is baffled.

Development of the work of mining and counter-mining.

ment, offered temptations to the enemy's miners which were irresistible. But Hutchinson successfully countermined them. The Sikhs of the Firúzpúr regiment (Brasyer's) became very skilful in this work, and always baffled the enemy. Some of the 32nd, trained during the siege, likewise made themselves remarkable for their dexterity. For general purposes, a company of miners was formed of volunteers from the several corps, and placed under the orders of Captain Crommelin. These "soon gave him the ascendancy over the enemy, who were foiled at all points, with the loss of their galleries and mines, and the destruction of their miners in repeated instances."*

The occupation of Phillips's garden by the 78th Highlanders formed a part of the plan conceived by Outram for relieving the old garrison from all molestation on its east, north-east, and south-east faces; that is from the Kánhpúr road to the commencement of the river front. The plan was completed by the occupation as outposts of three strong positions commanding the road to the iron bridge. Whilst these posts and that held by the 78th received the brunt of the enemy's attacks, the defences of the original intrenchment were thoroughly repaired, and new batteries to mount thirteen guns were constructed.

The limits of the British position are extended.

The effect of the occupation of these outposts on the enemy was remarkable. During the siege they had occupied positions within a few yards of our intrenchments. From these they were now driven back to a distance so great, that their musketry fire had no chance of doing mischief inside the old position. They accordingly, with considerable skill, altered their tactics. They withdrew their guns to a point whence the balls would clear the outer defences and fall within the intrenchment. The plan was ingenious, and was so far well worked that the point of fire was constantly shifted. But for one defect, it might have been very damaging. That defect consisted in want of confidence

Altered tactics of the rebels.

* Sir James Outram's official report. "I am aware," wrote Outram in the same report, "of no parallel to our series of mines in modern war. Twenty-one shafts, aggregating two hundred feet in depth and three thousand two hundred and ninety-one feet of gallery, have been executed. The enemy advanced twenty mines against the palaces and outposts; of these they exploded three which caused us loss of life, and two which did no injury; seven had been blown in, and out of seven others the enemy have been driven and their galleries taken possession of by our miners."

in the success of the plan, which produced, therefore, want of continuity in the working of it. This defect was fatal.

On the 9th of October, the garrison were cheered by news that Dehlí was completely in our power; that the King was a prisoner; and that Greathed had set out to lead a brigade to Kánhpúr. This news was confirmed the following day by the further intelligence of the victory gained by Greathed at Balandshahr.

The garrison hear of the complete success at Dehlí and of Greathed's march.

From this date the chief enemy to combat was impatience. Relief was a question of time, and, if relief would but arrive before the 20th November, Outram felt that all would be well. He ought to have known that his stock of provisions would last much longer. But on this point an utterly mistaken impression prevailed. Outram believed, from the information officially given him, that, even on the reduced scale of rations allowed, the supplies in the Residency would not feed the force longer than the 20th. But this was an entire misconception on the part of the supply department. The supplies would have lasted for a far longer period. The error might have had evil consequences. For it was mainly the belief that Outram's supplies were nearly exhausted that induced Sir Colin Campbell to march to Lakhnao before disposing of Tántiá Topí and the Gwáliár troops. And the non-disposal of them by him almost landed us in disaster.

November. Mistake regarding the quantity of provisions in stock.

Still, though the greatest enemy was impatience, the efforts of the enemy outside the walls never slackened; nor were they wholly without effect. Between the 25th September and the 10th November, Lieutenant Graydon of the 44th Native Infantry, an excellent officer, in command of Innes's post, was shot dead while superintending the works beyond that post. I have noticed the death of McCabe whilst gallantly leading his fourth sortie. Captain Hughes of the 57th Native Infantry, doing duty with the 32nd, was mortally wounded at the attack of a house which formed one of the enemy's outposts. Captain Lowe, commanding the 32nd, was severely wounded. Wounded also were Browne, Edmonstone, and Assistant-Surgeon Darby, of the same regiment. On the south side of the intrenchment the fire continued to be specially galling, several bullets entering the loop-holes. Complete exposure on this side was certain death. On the 4th November, Dashwood, of the Bengal army, a very gallant officer, lost both his legs by a round shot, whilst sketching in the Residency compound. He had been warned by a first shot passing near him, but he would not stir.

Some casualties of the siege.

On the 6th November, news reached the garrison that Hope Grant had encamped on the ground on the Lakhnao side of the Banní bridge, and that he was to wait there for Sir Colin Campbell, whose arrival at Kánhpúr was also announced.

The garrison hears of the advance of Hope Grant.

It now became a point with the generals to devise some plan of communicating with the Commander-in-Chief. Sir James Outram had previously forwarded to the Álabágh a despatch for Sir Colin, in which were contained plans of the city and its approaches, and his own ideas as to the best mode of effecting the junction of the relieved with the relieving forces.

Outram devises a plan of communication with the Commander-in-Chief.

He had advised the Commander-in-Chief to make a détour from the Álabágh to the right of the Dilkushá, and to advance thence by the Martinière and Sikandarbágh. By means of a preconcerted signal, he ascertained that his despatch had safely reached the Álabágh. The success of this mode of communication suggested the improvising of a semaphore telegraph, and the idea was no sooner conceived than it was carried out.*

But, though written descriptions might be useful to the Commander-in-Chief, their value could in no respect equal that which might be conveyed by an intelligent member of the garrison, by one who had undergone the siege and withstood the blockade, and who could cast the light of personal experience on the insufficient description of a despatch. But where was a man to be found who would dare the risk—who would undertake to penetrate the serried lines of the enemy, knowing that death was synonymous with discovery? Disguise was necessary, an almost impossible disguise, for the fair skin of the European, the light hair, the foreign accent, could scarcely escape detection Necessity felt in the garrison for personal communication with Sir Colin Campbell.

* "All necessary particulars," writes Mr. Martain Gubbins, "being fortunately found under the head 'Telegraph,' in the Penny Cyclopædia in my library, the General ordered the immediate erection of a semaphore on the top of the Residency, and copies of the necessary instructions were sent to the Álabágh."

To ask a man to attempt this was to ask him to encounter something worse than death in its ordinary aspect, to expose himself to the ignominious fate of the spy!

To ask a man to dare this risk was, every one felt, impossible. But every one felt, at the same time, that it was a risk which it was most desirable should be undertaken. Such was the common thought: such the whisper of the garrison. It has often been found, amongst Englishmen, that the occasion produces the man. It produced him, even on this, when the risks of death were enormous, and when the death would be an ignominious death. A clerk in one of the civil offices, by name Thomas Henry Kavanagh, caused General Outram to be informed, some time on the 9th November, that he was prepared to traverse in disguise the hostile lines, and to convey a letter to the Commander-in-Chief in his camp near Banní. Mr. Kavanagh's offer was the more heroic, inasmuch as, of all the garrison, he was perhaps the most difficult man to disguise. Tall, taller than the ordinary run of natives, he was very fair—fair of a freckly fairness—and his hair glittered as gold. But, perfectly cognisant of these drawbacks to disguise, Mr. Kavanagh offered himself. General

Outram loved a gallant deed: but, brave as he was, and loving bravery in others, he yet shrunk from exposing a man blindly to the consequences of a deed such as that which Kavanagh proposed. He told him frankly the risks he ran, the almost certain fate that would befall him. But Kavanagh had made up his mind. Dangers there were, he knew. But, having in view the all-important consequences of his mission, he would brave them.

Having made up his mind, and received his commission, Kavanagh proceeded to disguise himself. He chose the garb of a Badmásh—a native “swashbuckler”—a soldier for plunder, of the sort which abounded in the ranks of the rebels. He put on a pair of tight silk trousers, fitting close to the skin, a tight-fitting muslin shirt, and over this a yellow silk short jacket. Round his waist he bound a white waistband, over his shoulders he threw a coloured chintz cloth, on his head he placed a cream-coloured turban, his feet he inducted into the slipper-like shoes worn by the natives of India. His face down to the shoulders and his hands down to the wrist, he caused to be stained with lamp-black dipped in

Thomas
Henry
Kavanagh,

notwithstanding his thoroughly European characteristics,

volunteers to traverse the enemy's lines in disguise.

The garb he chose.

oil. His hair he cut short. Thus disguised, and wearing the shield and sword peculiar to the swashbuckler, Kavanagh, at 9 o'clock on the evening of the 9th November, accompanied by a faithful native spy, by name Kanaují Lál, set out. He sets out

His journey, though not without its alarms,* proved that Mr. Kavanagh had not counted vainly on his brave and resolute heart. He could not, indeed, reach the Álabágh, but, passing by it, he fell in on the morning of the 10th, with a party of Panjáb Cavalry, by whom, after receiving their warm greeting and hearty congratulations, he was escorted to Sir Colin Campbell. Nov. 10.
and succeeds.

The information thus received by that gallant commander supplied the one link which, till then, had been wanting to his complete mastery of the position. The following morning his engineer park arrived, and orders were issued for an advance the next day. But that afternoon Sir Colin devoted to an inspection of the men with whom he was to accomplish the relief of the long-beleaguered garrison—to deal the first deadly blow at the revolters of Oudh. Who and what were those men? They were composed mainly of the remnants of regiments which had already fought and bled against the mutineers. They were, of the Line, the 8th, a wing of the 53rd, the 75th and 93rd Regiments; of Sikhs, the 2nd and 4th Panjáb Infantry; of Cavalry, the 9th Lancers, and detachments of the 1st, 2nd, and 5th Cavalry, and of Hodson's Horse; of Artillery, sixteen guns, all tried at Dehlí; a few Bengal sappers, and some Panjábí pioneers; and of the Naval Brigade, two hundred and fifty men, with eight heavy guns, and two rocket tubes, mounted on light carts. The total number of fighting men, European and Native, was estimated at three thousand four hundred men. Nov. 11.

Sir Colin
Campbell's
force.

Such were the men whom Sir Colin Campbell inspected on the afternoon of the day prior to the advance. "The scene," writes one who was present on the occasion,† "was striking. The small army was Sir Colin inspects them.

* Mr. Kavanagh wrote an account of this journey, How I Won the Victoria Cross, Ward and Lock. He died, in St. Thomas's Hospital, about five years ago (1883).

† Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858. The writer was, I believe, Sir Archibald Alison, whose share in the events, the description of which will follow, gave brilliant promise of the soldierly excellence which has followed.

drawn up in quarter-distance columns in the centre of a vast plain, surrounded by woods. On the edge of these the pickets were posted. A mere handful it seemed. The guns of the troops and batteries who came down from Dehli looked blackened and service-worn, but the horses were in good condition, the harness in perfect repair, the men swarthy, and evidently in perfect fighting trim. The 9th Lancers, with their blue uniforms and white turbans twisted round their forage caps, their flagless lances, lean but hardy horses, and gallant bearing, looked the perfection of a cavalry regiment on active service. Wild and bold was the carriage of the Sikh cavalry, riding untamed-looking steeds, clad in loose fawn-coloured robes, with long boots, blue or red turbans and sashes, and armed with carbine and sabre. Next to them were the worn and wasted remains of the 8th and 75th, clad entirely in slate-coloured cloth. With a wearied air, they stood grouped round their standard—war, stripped of its display, in all its nakedness. Then the 2nd and 4th Panjáb Infantry, tall of stature, with eager eyes overhung by large twisted turbans, clad in short sand-coloured tunics—men swift to march forward in the fight—ambitious both of glory and of loot. Last stood, many in numbers, in tall and serried ranks, the 93rd Highlanders. A waving sea of plumes and tartans they looked, as, with loud and rapturous cheers, which rolled over the field, they welcomed their veteran commander, the chief of their choice. It was curious to mark the difference between the old Indian troops and the Highlanders in their reception to Sir Colin. Anxious and fixed was the gaze of the former as he rode down their ranks—men evidently trying to measure the leader who had been sent to them from so far. Enthusiastic beyond expression was his reception by the latter. You saw at once that to him was accorded their entire confidence—that, under him, they would go anywhere and do anything.”

Their different costumes and appearance.

Reception of Sir Colin by the 93rd;

by the veterans of Dehli.

At sunrise the following morning the troops advanced. The plan upon which Sir Colin Campbell, well instructed by Sir James Outram and possessing the advantage of the presence by his side of Mr. Kavanagh, had determined, was to move on the Álambágh; to store within that enclosure all the tents, and, having drawn to himself the detachments still in rear, to make, with a wide sweep, a flank march to the right, on the Dilkushá park and the Martinière; starting afresh from these points, to force the canal close to its junction with the Gúmtí; then, covered by that river, to advance, up its right bank, on the Sikandarbágh. This point once secured, a portion of the force could make a dash southwards on the barracks north of Hazratganj, and having seized them, would erect three batteries to play on the outworks of the Kaisarbágh. The main body, meanwhile, forcing the Sháh Najaf and the Motí Mahall, would open out the way for a junction with Outram. To support this operation, Outram would co-operate by a heavy fire on the intermediate positions held by the enemy from all the guns in the Residency; having forced these, he would move out, with all his sick and wounded, women and children, and treasure, between the Gúmtí and the Kaisarbágh, and effect a junction with the Commander-in-Chief. It was based upon the plan drawn up by Outram, and transmitted to Sir Colin by the hands of the gallant Kavanagh, on the 9th.*

†Nov. 12.
Plan of operations.

To carry out this plan, the little army set out at sunrise on the morning of the 12th November. It had marched barely three miles when the advanced guard, headed by a squadron of Hodson's Horse, commanded by Lieutenant Gough, striking the road leading to Jalálábád,† came at once under the fire of some light guns, covered by a line of field-works. The moment the sound was heard, Captain Bouchier brought up his field battery, and opened a fire which soon silenced the hostile guns. The rebels then attempted to remove these guns, but Gough, dashing forward, was amongst advances.

The army

Jalálábád,†

Bouchier
silences, and Gough pursues the rebels.

* Vide Appendix A. Objection has been taken to the statement made in the text to the effect that Sir Colin Campbell's plan was based on the plan furnished by Outram. It has even been asserted that Sir Colin's plan differed, in all respects save one, from that proposed by Outram. But Sir Colin Campbell admitted that he deviated from Outram's in one particular only. To avoid street fighting he kept away from the ambush indicated by Outram, and took his course by the open ground near the Gúmtí. The question, then, resolves itself into this: Outram, anxious to assist Sir Colin by conveying to him the knowledge he had acquired on the spot, transmitted to him, by the hands of the daring Kavanagh, most valuable information; Sir Colin used that information largely though not blindly, that is, he carried out the main plan, though he did not rigidly adhere to all the details. Outram's plan will be found detailed in Appendix B., I have ascertained that it was drawn out by himself alone. In stating, then, in the text, that Sir Colin's plan was based on Outram's, I am stating the literal truth.

† Jalálábád, Anglicé, "the town of splendour."

them like lightning, and drove them from the field with the loss of two of their pieces.

No further opposition was offered to the progress of the force to the Álabágh.* That same evening the camp was pitched close to that enclosure: but, as it thus came under the fire constantly directed by the enemy on that place, its position had to be changed to another, which brought it under cover of the Álabágh. Here the force halted for the following day.

The Álabágh was, at this time, held by Major McIntyre of the 78th Highlanders, nine hundred and thirty Europeans, a few Sikhs, and eight guns. McIntyre's original garrison of two hundred and eighty men had been from time to time augmented by parties from Kánhpúr, escorting the provisions which had maintained his garrison. It is a proof of Major McIntyre's skill, energy, and arrangement, that although from his first occupation of the post, on the 25th September, to the date of his relief—a period of forty-nine days—he had been incessantly annoyed by the fire of the batteries erected by the enemy about the place, he had only lost one European soldier, and that two only had been wounded. The native camp-followers and the cattle had, however, suffered severely.

On the evening of the 12th he was, I have shown, relieved. The following day was devoted by Sir Colin Campbell to making arrangements for a decisive advance on the 14th. First he despatched a small brigade, under the command of Colonel the Hon. Adrian Hope of the 93rd Highlanders—an officer of great attainments and brilliant promise—to take possession of the fort of Jalálábád, in the right rear of the position at Álabágh. Hope found that the fort, which might have been advantageously held, being constructed of thick mud with good flanking defences, had been evacuated. He therefore rendered it useless by blowing in one of its faces, and returned.

Adrian Hope carries the fort of Jalálábád.

Whilst one brigade was engaged in this operation, Sir Colin caused to be stacked within the enclosure all the camp equipage not required for the hard work in prospect. He directed, also, that whilst preparations made on the 13th for an advance the following day. supplies for fourteen days for himself and the troops

* Álabágh, Anglicè "the Garden of the Universe."

SKETCH OF operations for RELIEF AND WITHDRAWAL OF LAKHNAO GARRISON.

REFERENCES.

- | | |
|--|--|
| A Blind Horse Artillery | E Naval Brigade breaching Mess House |
| B Breaching Battery | F Mortar Battery shelling "D" |
| C Naval Brigade breaching the Shah Naji | P Naval Brigade breaching Kousar Bagh |
| D Mortars shelling the Shah Naji | |

NOTE

In Artillery positions the "100" does not denote the correct number of Guns, only in general terms that it is an Artillery Battery in Lakhnao should accompany him, every soldier should carry in his haversack provisions for three days' consumption. Then, too, he received his last reinforcements from Kánhpúr, distributed to their several regiments the men brought up by various detachments he found in the Álambágh, and made a fresh division of his force into brigades. By successive reinforcements, and the junctions with the Álambágh garrison, the force had now been augmented to about five thousand men of all arms,* with forty-nine guns. It was then thus re-arranged: the 75th regiment, not three hundred strong, and which had suffered much from previous service, was directed to occupy the Álambágh, aided by fifty Sikhs of the regiment of Firúzpúr, and a detachment of artillery under Captain Moir. The detailing of these troops for the purpose indicated reduced the force effective for field operations to about four thousand seven hundred men.

Rearrangement of the force;

not three hundred

the Álam-bágh detachment,

The naval brigade, commanded by Captain William Peel, consisted of two hundred and fifty men of the crew of the Shannon, seamen and marines, having with them eight heavy guns and howitzers, drawn by bullocks, and two rocket tubes mounted on light carts. Vying with these in zeal and ardour was the artillery brigade, composed of Travers's 18-pounder battery, Remington's and Blunt's troops of Horse Artillery, half a troop of Madras Horse Artillery under Captain Bridge, and Bouchier's battery. This brigade was commanded by Brigadier Crawford, R.A.

the naval brigade and artillery,

The cavalry brigade, commanded by Brigadier Little, was composed of two squadrons of the 9th Lancers, and one each of the 1st, 2nd, and 5th Panjáb Cavalry, and of Hodson's Horse.

the cavalry,

The Engineers' Department, commanded by Lieutenant Lennox, R.E., was composed of a company of Royal Engineers, a company of Madras Sappers, a few Bengal Sappers who had served at Dehli, and two companies of newly raised Panjáb Pioneers.

the engineers,

* Naval Brigade and Artillery, four hundred and fifty; cavalry, nine hundred; infantry, three thousand five hundred and fifty; sappers, two hundred; heavy guns, twelve; mortars, ten; light field guns, twenty-seven.

The infantry brigades were the third, the fourth and the fifth. The third, commanded by Brigadier Greathed, was composed of the remnant of the 8th Regiment; of a battalion of detachments of three regiments shut up in Lakhnao; and of the 2nd Panjáb Native Infantry. The fourth, led by Brigadier Adrian Hope, was the strongest of all. It was composed of the 93rd Highlanders and a wing of the 53rd, the former fresh from England, the latter from Calcutta; of the 4th Panjáb Infantry, and a weak battalion of the regiments shut up in Lakhnao. The fifth brigade, commanded by Brigadier Russell, was composed of the 23rd Fusiliers and a detachment of the 82nd Regiment. Hope Grant, with the rank of Brigadier-General, had the general direction of the force under the supervision of the Commander-in-Chief.*

Hope Grant has general supervision of the force.

On the evening of the 13th Sir Colin rode out to reconnoitre. The following morning, at 9 o'clock, the troops having first partaken of a good breakfast, he gave the order to march. The advance was made from the right, through the fields, crossing the several roads leading from the city at right angles. The enemy had not evidently anticipated this circuitous movement, as, whilst their scouts watched the route of the British from the tops of trees, small bodies of them were seen hastily endeavouring to throw up cover at the several points by which it was likely that the head of the advanced column would turn towards the city.

Nov. 14.
The order to advance is given;

The turning movement was made at the point expected, and the advance, bringing forward their right shoulders, moved directly on the wall of the Dilkushá park. Up to this moment no opposition had been offered by the rebels; but, as the advance neared the enclosure, a heavy matchlock fire was opened upon it from the left. Reinforcements were at once sent to the front, and the British guns opened upon the group whence this fire proceeded, and silenced it. Some rebel skirmishers then showed themselves emerging from the park, but the British skirmishers, horse, foot, and artillery, advancing, drove them speedily back, and pushed them through the grounds of the Dilkushá park, over the crest of the plateau, to the Martinière, about a mile and carries the Dilkushá.

* Sir Hope Grant's Incidents of the Sepoy War, page 179.

below it, on the banks of the Gúmtí. The Dilkushá was thus carried, almost without a blow.

This operation, described though it be in a few lines, had occupied two hours. The loss on both sides had been considerable, as the enemy did not stand to receive, but retreated after discharging their pieces. The work had been easy for the assailants, and they were ready for more.

They did not halt then in the Dilkushá, but, running and cantering across the park, pressed on to the Martinière. The rebels were in advance of them, and the sight of these men running in panic had inspired their comrades, entrusted with the defence of the Martinière, to do something to check the pursuit. They succeeded, by considerable exertions, in turning two guns on the advancing cavalry, but, before they could produce any perceptible effect, Bouchier and Remington opened upon them. Their fire was quickly followed by discharges from Travers's 18-pounders, and from a heavy howitzer brought up by Captain Hardy, R.A. Many rounds had not been fired when the infantry, composed of a battalion made up of companies from the 5th Fusiliers, the 64th and 78th Foot, and the 8th Foot, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton of the 78th, came up, dashed down the slope, and carried the Martinière, the enemy not waiting to receive them, but retreating across the canal with all speed, followed by our cavalry. In the course of the pursuit Lieutenant Watson* of the Bombay Army, commanding the squadron of the 1st Panjáb Cavalry, encountered and slew in a hand-to-hand encounter the leader of the enemy's party, a native officer of the 15th Irregular Cavalry. Watson had a narrow escape, his opponent having discharged his pistol at him within a few feet of his body.

Both these important places having been carried, and the ground up to the edge of the canal being held by our troops, it devolved upon the Commander-in-Chief to make arrangements for securing his new position. He accordingly brought up Adrian Hope's brigade (the 4th), and arranged it in position in the gardens of the Martinière. He located there likewise Remington's troop of horse artillery.

The British skirmishers dash at the Martinière, which they carry.

Lieutenant

Watson's hand-to-hand encounter.

Sir Colin Campbell makes arrangements for holding the ground up to the edge of the canal.

* Now Lieutenant-General Sir John Watson, K.C.B. and V.C.

Russell's brigade (the 5th) he posted on the left in front of the Dilkushá, whilst on the plain in front of the Martinière, occupying a line drawn from the canal on their right to the wall of the Dilkushá park on their left, he placed Little's brigade of cavalry and Bouchier's battery. Somewhat later in the afternoon, in pursuance of orders issued by Sir Colin, with a view to guard his communications with the Álambágh from being cut off by a turning movement on his left, Brigadier Russell pushed forward several companies of his infantry to occupy two villages on the canal, covering the left of the British position.

These arrangements had not been made one moment too soon.

The enemy
prepare to attack him;

They were hardly completed, when it became evident, from the massing of troops on their centre, that the enemy were contemplating an aggressive movement. To gain information as to its probable nature,

Captain Grant of the 9th Lancers galloped forward to reconnoitre. He was received by a crashing musketry fire, which, however, left him unscathed. Little at once ordered Bouchier

but the attack had been previously discounted.

to the front, supporting him with his cavalry. It was then seen how wise had been the occupation of the two villages already referred to, for the enemy, creeping down to the bed of the canal, had opened upon them a heavy and continuous fire; but as soon as Bouchier's guns opened upon their supporting masses they fell back very rapidly to the city. A few more discharges cleared the canal bed.

Little, having accomplished his mission, withdrew to the

They make a second attempt;

Martinière compound, and orders were at once issued for a night bivouac. But scarcely had the horses been untraced than the enemy, regathering courage, made a second and more desperate attempt to turn the British position. About four hundred yards to the proper right of the wall of the Dilkushá park, as one faces the canal, is the bridge connecting the Martinière plain with the Hazratganj main street. It was on this bridge that the rebels now, about 5 o'clock in the afternoon, came down in great numbers and with several guns.

If they had counted on finding the British troops unprepared, but are baffled by Adrian Hope,

they were disappointed. Stealthy as had been their movements, they had been watched by a man who never missed an opportunity. As they approached the bridge Adrian Hope brought up his brigade with an alacrity not to be surpassed. The 93rd he placed lining a mud-wall opposite the bridge. On either side of them were the 53rd and the 4th Panjábis. Remington's troop galloped at once to the front, closely followed by the remainder of the artillery, and opened fire on the enemy. The cavalry were handy. As each successive regiment came up, it lined the banks of the canal.

Bourchier's battery and Peel's 24-pounders occupied a position on some high ground on the left of the bridge, whence they were able to direct a concentric fire on the angle formed by the canal near the bridge, and where the enemy were massed in large numbers.

aided by William Peel
and Bourchier.

Their fire speedily "crushed" * the enemy out of this position. Then Adrian Hope, forming up his brigade, pushed across the bridge, drove back the enemy with heavy loss, and secured a lodgment on the other side. The attack of the rebels had failed. †

Then did the British troops bivouac for the night, Adrian Hope's brigade, flanked by Bourchier's battery, two guns of the naval brigade, and a troop of cavalry, on the canal; Russell's brigade on their right; Greathed's in the rear; the bulk of the artillery on the high ground to the left, and the cavalry on the summit of the plateau round the Dilkushá house behind the centre. The men slept with their arms by their side, ready for prompt action.

They bivouac
for the night.

The following day, the 15th, was spent in making preparations for the grand advance. The Dilkushá palace was to be made a second depôt for the stores and baggage, which would have needlessly encumbered an army that had to fight in the streets. The heavy baggage, consisting of everything pertaining to the officers and soldiers, had been placed in charge of a strong rear-guard, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Ewart, H.M.'s 93rd Highlanders. This officer, whose splendid gallantry was soon to be displayed in a position more advanced and still more dangerous, had had no easy time of it. Although his men had been under arms on the 14th at the

Nov. 15.

Ewart, 93rd Highlanders, commands
the rearguard.

* Blackwood's Magazine, June 1858.

† In this action our force lost two very promising officers, Captain Mayne, of the Bengal Artillery, and Captain Wheatley, of the Carabineers, doing duty with the 9th Lancers. A few hours before, Wheatley, talking with some comrades of the approaching Christmas, had remarked, "I wonder how many of us will then be alive." He was a very gallant officer.

same time as the rest of the army, his progress, charged as he was with a large convoy, had necessarily been slow. The enemy, hovering about the main force, but afraid to attack it, had singled out the rear-guard as their prey. The attacks which they made upon it were incessant. But, well aided by Blunt of the Bengal, and Crawford of the Royal, Artillery, Ewart beat back every assault. The attacks had, however, necessarily delayed him, and he was unable to bring his convoy into camp before the 15th. He brought it then, having accomplished skilfully a difficult and harassing task.

Then did Sir Colin make his final arrangements. The whole of his heavy baggage, his supplies for fourteen days, he stored in the Dilkushá. Into the palace all the sick and wounded were conveyed. Defences were thrown up round that building, and a force was detailed to guard it. This force consisted of five field guns, half the 9th Lancers, the Military Train, a squadron of Panjáb Cavalry, and the remnant of the gallant 8th, about three hundred strong—the whole under the command of Brigadier Little of the 9th Lancers.

But, though the 15th was a day of preparation, the enemy did not leave the fighting qualities of our soldiers untested. About mid-day, huge masses of infantry supporting two horse artillery guns, made a strong demonstration against the extreme right of the British position. Their pickets, however, were on the alert, and, the guns (two guns of the Madras Native Horse Artillery) speedily opening fire, the enemy fell back. As the point thus threatened was that from which it was intended to make the advance the following morning, Sir Colin deemed it advisable to draw the enemy's attention to another quarter. He accordingly a little later in the day made a strong reconnoissance in front of our extreme left, and subsequently massed all our artillery on that point. He further directed that, during the night, a fire of mortars should be directed on the point opposite our left, so as to keep the enemy's attention fixed there, whilst silence should be preserved at the other end of the line.

Having made all the arrangements which skill and foresight could suggest, Sir Colin signalled to Sir James Outram, by a code previously arranged, that he would advance on the morrow.

Aided by Blunt and Crawford, he repulses every attack.

Arrangements made at the Dilkushá.

The afternoon and night prior to the advance.

Sir Colin signals to Outram his intention to advance.

Early on the morning of the 16th the heavy guns were withdrawn from the advanced pickets on the canal, and the detachments of Adrian Hope's brigade which had been sent to the front rejoined their regiments. The men first breakfasted. Then, a strong body of cavalry, with Blunt's troop of Horse Artillery and a company of the 53rd, forming the advance guard, moved forward from the extreme right. The way crossed the canal, then dry; followed then for about a mile the bank of the Gúmtí, led them through a narrow line, through thickly wooded enclosures, and then made a sharp turn to the left on to a road which, turning again, ran between low mud houses, for about a hundred and twenty yards parallel to the Sikandarbágh. Following the advance guard marched Adrian Hope's brigade; then Russell's; then the ammunition and engineers' park. Greathed's brigade, now reduced by the retention of the 8th at the Dilkushá, remained till mid-day occupying the position on the canal, so as to protect the left rear of the main body. It then followed the remainder of the force as its rear guard.

Nov. 16.

regiments.

The advance
on the 16th.

The precautions taken by Sir Colin the preceding afternoon and evening had been successful, for the enemy's attention had been completely diverted from the line of advance he had contemplated. His advanced guard, then, marched along the bank of the Gúmtí, through the lane and enclosures, without meeting an enemy. Suddenly it made the sharp turn to the left already described. Then the enemy for the first time took the alarm. First from men occupying huts and enclosures in advance of the building, then from the mass of men in the Sikandarbágh* itself, poured an overwhelming fire on the troops forming the advance. Their position was, in a military point of view, desperate, for they were exposing their flank to the enemy. For a distance of a hundred and twenty yards to the walled enclosure of Sikandarbágh, they were broadside on to the enemy's fire. Our officers saw the position clearly. Before a shot had been fired a staff officer remarked to his right-hand comrade, "If these fellows allow

The British
advance comes in contact with the enemy.Danger of its position.

* The Sikandarbágh, Anglicè "the garden of Alexander," is a high-walled enclosure about a hundred and fifty yards square, with towers at the angles.

one of us to get out of this cul de sac alive, they deserve every one of them to be hanged.”*

The situation was indeed critical. The gallant 53rd (one company only), in skirmishing order, lined indeed the enclosures bordering on the lane; but their numbers were few, and the fire of the enemy was concentrated; the cavalry were jammed together, unable to advance, and the high banks on either side seemed to offer an impassable barrier to artillery.

But only “seemed.” Up the steep bank the daring Blunt led his gallant troop, and, “conquering the im-possible,” brought them, guns and all, into an open space between the Sikandarbágh and another large loop-holed building, exposed as he galloped on to a terrific cross-fire. Here unlimbering, with remarkable coolness and self-possession, he opened with his six guns on the Sikandarbágh. Never was anything done better.

Whilst Blunt was engaged on this gallant deed, Adrian Hope’s brigade, disengaging itself, had come up with a rush and driven the enemy first from the enclosures bordering the lane, and then from the large building of which I have spoken opposite the Sikandarbágh. This gave it access to the open space on which Blunt had unlimbered. Travers followed with his heavy battery, and, the sappers and miners having demolished a portion of the high bank, he too was able, by the aid of the infantry, to bring two of his 18-pounders into position and to open fire against the angle of the enclosure. In less than half an hour their fire opened a hole in the wall which might be practicable for stormers.

Meanwhile the infantry of Adrian Hope’s brigade, after the achievement already related, had been ordered to lie down, covered by a small bank and some trees. But the moment the breach was considered practicable the bugle-sound gave the signal for assault. It was made by the 93rd Highlanders and the 4th Panjáb Rifles, supported by the 53rd and a battalion of detachments. Springing to their feet, the Highlanders under Lieutenant-Colonel Ewart, and the Sikhs under Lieutenant Paul, dashed

* Blackwood’s Magazine, October 1828. The writer of the article quoted either made or heard the remark. He was, as I have already stated, himself a distinguished actor in the campaign.

forward. "It was," writes an eye-witness,* "a glorious rush. On went, in generous rivalry, the turban of the Sikh and the dark plume of the Highlander. A native officer of the Sikhs"—Subahdár Gokal Singh, specially mentioned by the Commander-in-Chief in his despatch—"waving his talwár above his head, dashed on full five yards in front of his men. The Highlanders, determined not to be left behind, strained nerve and limb in the race. Their officers led like gallant gentlemen, shaking their broadswords in the air. Two young ensigns springing over a low mud wall gave the colours of the regiment to the breeze. Paul with voice and accent urged on his wild followers." All ran towards the hole—a small hole in a bricked-up doorway, about three feet square and about the same distance from the ground. A Sikh of the 4th Rifles reached it first, but he was shot dead as he jumped through. A similar fate befell a Highlander in his track. A young officer of the 93rd, Richard Cooper by name, outstripping the majority of his comrades, was more fortunate. Flying, so to speak, through the hole, he landed unscathed. "His jump into it," wrote the gallant Blunt, who witnessed it, "reminded me of the headlong leap which Harlequin in a pantomime makes through a shop window, and I thought at the time that if he was not rushing to certain death life would be very uncertain to those first making entrance by that ugly blind hole." Cooper was almost immediately followed by Colonel Ewart of the 93rd; Ewart by Captain John I. Ewart, Lumsden, of the 30th Native Infantry, but attached as interpreter to the 93rd Highlanders; Lumsden by three privates of that regiment, they again by eight or nine men, Sikhs of the 4th Panjáb Rifles and Highlanders. Another officer, Captain Burroughs† of the 93rd, also penetrated within the enclosure, but was almost immediately attacked and severely wounded. Altogether, besides the three officers, about a dozen men, Sikhs and Highlanders, had jumped within the enclosure, when, from

Richard
Cooper,

Ewart,
Lumsden,

* Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

† Colonel Ewart wrote me in December 1880. "I cannot tell you positively who was first in through the hole. Captain Burroughs claimed the honour, and certainly he was in before me, as, when I jumped through, I noticed him inside with his head bleeding from a sabre cut." On this I would observe, that possibly Captain Burroughs entered by another aperture. The preponderance of evidence goes to show that through "that ugly blind hole" the officers jumped in the order stated in the text.

some reason yet undiscovered, the supply from outside suddenly stopped. The enclosure in which these fourteen men and twelve Sikhs and Highlanders found themselves was a hundred and fifty yards square, with towers at the angles, and in the centre of the eastern face a building, consisting of a room opening out into a courtyard behind it, the grass growing all over the ground of the enclosure sufficiently high to conceal the enemy from view. There were, however, two pathways—the one to the left leading to the gate; the other, to the right, to the building in the centre of the eastern face.

Losing not a moment after he had daringly jumped in, Cooper dashed along the path to the right, closely followed by Ewart, Lumsden, and about a dozen soldiers. No other officer accompanied them. Following the path, they reached an angle of the enclosure, turned it, and in three seconds more found themselves in front of the square building I have already described. There were rebels in front of it, rebels within it, rebels in the courtyard behind it. But on this occasion, as on so many others, boldness was prudence. The rebels outside, astonished by the sudden appearance of the three British officers and their following, ignorant of their numbers, and believing, it may be presumed, that the main entrance had been forced, ran hurriedly into the building, and attempted to make their way through a small door into the courtyard behind. The three officers and their men dashed after them, and a hand-to-hand encounter ensued. Cooper, after greatly distinguishing himself and laying many low with a sword wielded by an arm of more than ordinary strength, was singled out by a native officer of the regiment of Lodiáná, and received from him a slash across the forehead at the same moment that he laid his antagonist dead at his feet. Lumsden, emulating Cooper, was clearing a way for himself, when he was killed by a musket shot.* Ewart, forcing his way into the courtyard, pushed forward with his following jump into the enemy's walled enclosure.

Cooper, Ewart, Lumsden, and their followers come face to face with the enemy's masses.

Cooper is slashed across the head.

* Colonel Ewart wrote me, after the appearance of the second edition of this work: "Lumsden behaved in a most gallant manner, immediately before his fall I saw him waving his sword over his head, at the same time calling out: 'Come on, men, for the honour of Scotland.' He belonged to Aberdeenshire, and was a fine fellow. His conduct was the more creditable, as, being only an interpreter, he need not have joined the stormers."

against the men at the other end of it. Some of these men had muskets, some swords and shields. They allowed Ewart to approach within ten yards of them, when those who had muskets fired a volley. Fortunately they fired high. One ball pierced Ewart's bonnet. The few Highlanders and Sikhs then rushed at them, and a desperate hand-to-hand encounter ensued. One tall rebel, armed with sword and shield, singled out Ewart for destruction, but that gallant officer was beforehand with him, and shot him, and five others who followed him, dead with his revolver. Still in the end numbers might have prevailed, when at the critical moment the bulk of the Brigade, Highlanders, the Sikhs, and the 53rd, poured in to the rescue.

Notwithstanding the splendid achievement of Ewart, the contest is doubtful, when the remainder of the storming party arrive.

How these had forced their way remains now to be told. Impatient of the delay which would be caused by jumping singly through a narrow hole, the bulk of the storming party had turned to the left to force a way by the gate of the enclosure. This gate was locked and barred; and although the men used all their efforts, firing their pieces at the lock, some time elapsed before it gave way. But at last it yielded, and the 93rd and Sikhs dashed through it. Almost simultaneously the 53rd forced a barred window to the right of it and joined in the rush to the rescue of Ewart, of Cooper, still fighting in spite of his wound, and their comrades.

How they had been delayed.

I have been particular in describing in full detail the services of these two gallant officers, both belonging to the 93rd Highlanders, of Lumsden attached to the same regiment, and of Burroughs, not only because they and the ten or twelve men who followed them were the first to penetrate within the enclosure of the Sikandarbagh, nor because their action had a direct effect on the ultimate issue, holding, as they did, the rebels in check while the main body of the storming party were engaged in endeavouring to force an entrance by the main gate, but because, whilst many officers were mentioned in the despatch,* the splendid services of these two gallant men did

The splendid gallantry of Ewart, Cooper, and Lumsden unnoticed and unrewarded.

* "The attack on the Sikandarbagh had now been proceeding for about an hour and a half, when it was determined to take the place by storm through a small opening which had been made. This was done in the most brilliant manner by the remainder of the Highlanders, the 53rd and 4th Panjáb Infantry, supported by a battalion of detachments under Major Barnston."

not receive even a bare notice. It is fit that, even after the lapse of twenty years, history should atone, as far as atonement is possible, for official neglect.

To return, I have already stated that, whilst Ewart and Cooper and their small following were making fierce head against the mass of rebels opposed to them, a considerable body of the 93rd and the 4th Panjáb Rifles, outside the enclosure, had, by strenuous exertions, succeeded in forcing the

The stormers drive back
the rebels.

main doorway, whilst the 53rd had driven in the window on its right. Through these, and through Cooper's hole, which the sappers had succeeded in enlarging, the stormers poured as fast as they could make their way. As they entered, the rebels fell back into the towers at the angle of the enclosure, and opened a heavy and continuous musketry fire on our men, occasionally diversifying this mode of fighting by descending to a hand-to-hand encounter.

Ewart captures a colour, cutting down
its defenders.

In one of these, Colonel Ewart succeeded in cutting down two native officers who guarded a colour, and in capturing the colour,* which he presented with his own hand to Sir Colin Campbell.

The fight for the possession of the enclosure was bloody and desperate, the rebels fighting with all the energy of despair.

Official Despatch of Sir Colin Campbell, dated 18th November, 1857. It will be observed that neither Ewart nor Cooper is mentioned. Yet Cooper's splendid deed was well known in camp. I have seen letters from distinguished officers stating that he was pointed out to them as the man "who had leapt into the breach." When, a few days later, the officers of the 93rd were called upon to elect from among themselves one member whom they considered entitled to receive the Victoria Cross for distinguished conduct and bravery under fire in the field, although the majority of the officers voted for Captain W. D. Stewart, many voted for Ewart and Cooper. No other officer was voted for. "On that occasion," wrote three years later one, not the least distinguished amongst them, "I, for one, gave my vote in Cooper's favour, conscientiously considering that he had justly earned the distinction . . . I know that this was the opinion of others besides myself . . . Cooper and Ewart both deserved to receive the Victoria Cross." Yet their gallant deeds were not even mentioned. It is true that Colonel Ewart was subsequently made a Companion of the Bath and Aide-de Camp to the Queen, but Cooper was left out in the cold—where he still remains.

* This was another splendid deed buried till now in silence. Ewart had observed the colour in question in one of the rooms into which the rebels had retreated. He determined to get possession of it, and made a dash quite unassisted, at the room. He found the entrance to it defended by two native officers armed with talwárs, each on either side of the doorway. He fought them both and killed them, receiving himself two sabre cuts.

Nor did the struggle end when our men forced their way inside. Every room, every staircase, every corner of the towers was contested. Quarter was neither given nor asked for, and when at last the assailants were masters of the place more than two thousand rebel corpses lay heaped around them. It is said that, of all who garrisoned it, only four men escaped, but even the escape of four is doubtful.

After a desperate slaughter, the Sikandar-bágh is gained.

Meanwhile, whilst detachments of the 93rd, of the 53rd, and the 4th Panjáb Rifles were gradually overcoming resistance in the enclosure, some companies of the 93rd and 53rd, supported by two guns of Blunt's battery, had pushed forward through the opening, and following the plain nearly southward for almost half a mile, had attacked and effected a lodgment in a large building called "The Barracks," and which formed at about half the distance the angle of the rectangular road, used in contradistinction to the direct road which connected the Sikandarbágh with the Kaisarbágh. In this attack Captain Stewart, of the right wing of the 93rd, greatly distinguished himself by capturing two guns which commanded the approaches to the Barracks.

The "Barracks" captured.

Captain Stewart, 93rd.

But the shorter road from Sikandarbágh to the Residency ran directly westward between the large loop-holed building, stormed in the first instance by Adrian Hope's brigade and the Sikandarbágh itself, across an open plain about twelve hundred yards broad. "About three hundred yards along this road there is a small village, with garden enclosures round it;" while about two hundred and fifty yards further on, and a hundred yards to the right of the road, stood the Sháh Najaf,* a large mosque, situated in a garden enclosed by a high loop-holed wall. This wall is nearly square and very strong. Between it and the plains is a thick fringe of jungle and enclosures, with trees, and scattered mud cottages, which make it impossible to get a distinct view of the place until you come close on it. Between it and the Sikandarbágh, amidst jungles and enclosure, to the right of the little plain, was a building on a high mound called the Kadam Rasúl." †

The Sháh Najaf.

* So called from 'Najaf,' a town 98 miles from Baghdad, where Ali, the successor of the Prophet Muhammad, was buried.

† Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

The afternoon was now waning, and Sir Colin Campbell deemed it essential to carry the Sháh Najaf. The operation was dangerous and most difficult. Success, to most men, would have seemed uncertain. Failure was ruin. Of all the actions in the campaign this was the most critical. How it was done has been described by an actor in the scene, with a vigour of touch and with life-like freshness which it is impossible to surpass. I have read nothing which conveys the scene more vividly to the mind. I am sure, then, I shall be pardoned, if, instead of using my own language, I borrow the account of the daring action from one who saw it, and who wrote what he saw.*

Sir Colin determines to carry the Sháh Najaf.

“Hope,” says the writer, taking up the story from the point where I left it, “having now drawn off his brigade from the Sikandarbágh, led it against the village, which he cleared and occupied without much difficulty; while Peel brought up his 24-pounders, mortars, and rocket frames, and placed them in battery against the Sháh Najaf in an oblique line, with their left resting on the village. The musketry fire which streamed unceasingly from that building and the surrounding enclosures was most biting and severe; and after nearly three hours battering it was still unsubdued. An attempt, made with great gallantry by Major Barnston with his battalion of detachments, to drive the enemy from the fringe of jungle and enclosures in front, by setting fire to the houses, proved unsuccessful; but on the right the Kadam Rasúl was assaulted and carried by a party of Sikhs.

Preliminaries to the attack.

“In the narrow lane leading up from the rear, meanwhile, the utmost confusion prevailed. The animals carrying the ordnance and the engineer supplies, unable to advance from the enemy’s fire in front—unable to get out on either side, and pressed forward by those in rear—got completely jammed, insomuch that an officer, sent to bring up ammunition and all Greathed’s disposable infantry to the now hard-pressed front, had the utmost difficulty to get the men on in single file; whilst, some houses having been wantonly set on fire by the camp-followers, the passage was for a time entirely blocked up; and it was only when the flames were abating that a string of camels, laden with small-arm ammunition, which was urgently required by the troops engaged, could with great risk and toil be forced through the narrow and scorching pass. Even then, however, the confusion near the Sikandarbágh had got to such a pitch, that all passage had become impossible; and, had it not been that a staff officer discovered a by-path leading into a broad road which abutted on the Sikandarbágh, neither men nor ammunition could have been brought up.

The confusion in the lane communicating with the rear.

* Blackwood’s Magazine, October 1858.

“In front of the Sháh Najaf the battle made no way. The enemy, about 4 o'clock, got a heavy gun to bear upon us from the opposite bank of the river, and their very first shot blew up one of Peel's tumbrils, whilst their deadly musketry had obliged him to withdraw the men from one of his pieces and diminished the fire of the others. The men were falling fast. Even Peel's usually bright face became grave and anxious. Sir Colin sat on his white horse, exposed to the whole storm of shot, looking intently on the Sháh Najaf, which was wreathed in volumes of smoke from the burning buildings in its front, but sparkled all over with the bright flash of small arms. It was now apparent that the crisis of the battle had come. Our heavy artillery could not subdue the fire of the Sháh Najaf; we could not even hold permanently our present advanced position under it. But retreat to us there was none. By that fatal lane our reflux force could never be withdrawn. Outram, and Havelock, and Inglis, with our women and children, were in the front, and England's honour was pledged to bring them scatheless out of the fiery furnace. What shot and shell could not do, the bayonets of the infantry must accomplish. But the crisis was terrible. Even as the fate of the French empire hung at Wagram on the footsteps of Macdonald's column, so did the fate of our Indian dominions depend that day on the result of the desperate assault now about to be undertaken.

The battle makes no way against the Sháh Najaf.

“Collecting the 93rd about him, the Commander-in-Chief addressed a few words to them. Not concealing the extent of the danger, he told them that he had not intended that day to employ them again, but that the Sháh Najaf must be taken; that the artillery could not bring its fire under, so they must win it with the bayonet. Giving them a few plain directions, he told them he would go on with them himself.

Sir Colin harangues the 93rd,

“To execute this design, Middleton's battery of the Royal Artillery was to pass Peel's guns on the right, and, getting as close as possible to the Sháh Najaf, to open a quick and well-sustained fire of grape. Peel was to redouble his, and the 93rd to form in column in the open plain, close to the village, ready to rush on.

and determines to win it with the bayonet.

“Middleton's battery came up magnificently. With loud cheers, the drivers waving their whips, the gunners their caps, they galloped forward through that deadly fire to within pistol-shot of the wall, unlimbered, and poured in round after round of grape. Peel, manning all his guns, worked his pieces with redoubled energy, and under cover of this iron storm, the 93rd, excited to the highest degree, with flashing eyes and nervous tread, rolled on in one vast wave. The grey-haired veteran of many fights rode, with his sword drawn, at their head. Keen was his eye, as when in the pride of youth he led the stormers of St. Sebastian. His staff crowded round him.

Sir Colin.

Hope, too, with his towering form and gentle smile, was there, leading, as ever was his wont, the men by whom he was loved so well. As they approached the nearest angle of the enclosure, the soldiers began to drop fast; but, without a check, they reached its foot. There, however, they were brought to a stand. The wall, perfectly entire, was nearly twenty feet high, and well loop-holed; there was no breach, and there were no scaling-ladders. Unable to advance, unwilling to retire, they halted and commenced a musketry battle with the garrison. But all the advantage was with the latter, who shot with security from behind their loops, and the Highlanders went down fast before them. At this time nearly all the mounted officers were either wounded or dismounted. Hope and his aide-de-camp were both rolling on the ground at the same moment, with their horses shot under them: his major of brigade had just met with the same fate: two of Sir Colin's staff had been stricken to the earth: a party, which had pushed on round the angle to the gate, had found it covered so well by a new work in masonry as to be perfectly unassailable. Two of Peel's guns were now brought up to within a few yards of the wall. Covered by the fusilade of the infantry, the sailors shot fast and strong; but, though the masonry soon fell off in flakes, it came down so as to leave the mass behind perpendicular, and as inaccessible as ever.

Adrian Hope.

The Sháh Najaf baffles them all.

“Success seemed now impossible. Even Hope and Peel, these two men, iron of will and ready of resource, could see no way. Anxious and careworn grew Sir Colin’s brow. The dead and wounded were ordered to be collected and carried to the rear. Some rocket frames were brought up, and threw in a volley of these fiery projectiles, with such admirable precision, that, just skimming over the top of the rampart, they plunged hissing into the interior of the building, and searched it out with a destroying force. Under cover of this, the guns were drawn off. The shades of evening were falling fast—the assault could not much longer be continued. Then, as a last resource—the last throw of a desperate game—Adrian Hope,* collecting some fifty men, stole silently and cautiously through the jungle and brushwood away to the right, to a portion of the wall on which he had, before the assault, thought he perceived some injury to have been inflicted. Reaching it unperceived, a narrow fissure was found. Up this, a single man was, with some difficulty, pushed. He saw no one near the spot, and so helped up Hope, Ogilvy (attached to the Madras Sappers), Allgood the Assistant-Quartermaster-General, and some others. The numbers inside soon increased, and as they did so they advanced, gradually extending their front. A body of sappers, sent for in haste, arrived at the double: the opening was enlarged, the supports rushed in. Meanwhile, Hope’s small party, pushing on, to their great astonishment, found themselves almost unopposed. Gaining the gate, they threw it open for their comrades. The white dresses of the last of the garrison were just seen gliding away amidst the rolling smoke into the dark shadows of the night. Panic-stricken apparently by the destruction caused by the rockets, and the sudden appearance of some of the assailants within the walls, they fled from the place and gave up the struggle just when victory was secure.

“Never had there been a harder-fought day,† but never was a result gained more satisfactory.”

* I believe that, in point of fact, Adrian Hope’s attention was drawn to this portion of the wall by Sergeant Paton, 93rd, who was the first to discover its weakness. For this act Paton received the Victoria Cross.

† It was an action almost unexampled in war.”—Sir Colin Campbell’s Despatch, 18th November, 1857.

Success seems impossible.

As a last resource, Adrian Hope attempts a flank movement, which succeeds.

A lodgment had been gained for the night. Every man felt now that the work was virtually accomplished. It is true that between the position gained and that occupied by Outram there were still buildings which the rebels would fight to maintain. But those buildings taken all together did not equal one Sháh Najaf. The men who had, under the circumstances narrated, stormed that mosque, might justly feel confident that the difficulties of the morrow could not be insuperable. No wonder that "there was joy now in every heart—there was light in every eye."

The order then was given to bivouac for the night. The main body of the 93rd garrisoned the Sháh Najaf; another portion of that regiment, under Colonel Ewart, occupied the barracks, already adverted to. The troops not occupying these two posts lined the roads, maintaining the communications between the three points—the Barracks, Sikandarbágh, and the Sháh Najaf. The field hospital for the wounded was established in some huts opposite the Sikandarbágh, which might be regarded as the central point of the position taken up for the night. The men lay down in line with their arms in their hands.

Whilst they are sleeping I may advert, I fear too briefly, to some of the deeds of gallantry accomplished during that eventful day. Not all the brave actions performed on the battle-field can come under the notice of a commander; nor coming under his notice, are they always mentioned. The stereotyped form of despatch-writing prevailing in, if not peculiar to, the British army necessitates the mention of all officers on the staff of the commander, of the divisional and brigade commanders and their staffs, of the officers commanding regiments and batteries, of all heads of departments. Not to mention any one of these officers is to disgrace him. It follows that such stereotyped mention is without real value. This hard-and-fast rule is unjust. It may sometimes happen that a particular staff officer or a particular regimental commander fails to distinguish himself, that he makes serious blunders. Such matters are at once known in the camp. But, when the despatch appears, the capable finds himself bracketed in one chorus of praise with the incapable, the clear-headed with the dullard, and the general public knows no difference between them. Hence, I repeat, the stereotyped praise of despatches is really without value.

How justice is not done to deserving officers in despatches.

But there is some praise which is not stereotyped. Such is the praise, for instance, awarded for special deeds of daring. Applause of this sort is real and genuine. Yet, while its genuineness when applied cannot be questioned, it is undeniable that many greatly distinguish themselves whose names are never brought forward. No stranger can be sure, when addressing an officer of the British army, that he is not speaking to an undecorated hero.

How justice might be done.

I have mentioned, in the proper place, the splendid achievements, in the early part of the day, of Ewart, of Richard Cooper, of Lumsden, and of Burroughs.

The heroes of the day.

Those "undecorated heroes" were undoubtedly the men who made the first entrance into the Sikandarbágh. But on a day when so many distinguished themselves they were not the only heroes. One non-commissioned officer and two privates of the 93rd, Dunley, Mackay, and Grant, effected their entrance into the Sikandarbágh by the hole through which Cooper had leapt, though after him, and gallantly supported their officers. More fortunate than these, they received the Cross for their daring. Sergeant Munro of the same regiment received the Cross for distinguished conduct in the same enclosure. In the 53rd Regiment, Lieutenant Ffrench, and Privates Kenny and Irwin, and, in the 84th, Captain the Hon. H. A. Anson,* deservedly received the Cross for conspicuous daring in the capture of the Sikandarbágh. Later in the same day, Captain Stewart of the 93rd secured the Cross for the capture of two of the enemy's guns at the Barracks. I have already mentioned Sergeant Paton of the 93rd.† The Cross was given to this daring non-commissioned officer "for distinguished personal gallantry in proceeding alone round the Sháh Najaf under an extremely heavy fire, discovering a breach on the opposite side, to which he afterwards conducted the regiment, by which means that important position was taken." There were many others not less deserving even than this man. What could exceed the gallantry of Blunt of the Bengal Horse Artillery, taking his guns over an "impossible" wall, and calmly unlimbering on the plain between a heavy fire on either side of him; the imperturbable coolness of William Peel, the daring of Travers, of

* Captain Anson's gallant conduct at Balandshahr, already mentioned, had previously entitled him to the Cross.

† Page 137, note.

Middleton, of Bouchier, of Longden, of Walker, of Hardy—killed fighting with his guns,—of Ford, of Brown, and of Bridge—all gunners, Royal and Bengal? “It is impossible,” wrote Sir Colin Campbell, “to draw any distinction between any of these officers. They all distinguished themselves under very arduous circumstances.” Of Adrian Hope I have already spoken. The bare statement of his action is sufficient. Not less deserve to be mentioned the two Alisons, sons of the historian, Paul, MacQueen, Biddulph, Oldfield, Barnston, Wood, Keen, Welsh, McNamara, Lumsden—killed at the Sikandar-bágh,—all of whom were spoken of in the camp. But the list is too long, for there are many others.

Whilst the men are still sleeping on their arms, it is fit, too, that I should state that, during the hours employed by the troops under Sir Colin Campbell in attacking the Sháh Najaf, the Residency garrison, under Sir James Outram, were using all their efforts to effect a diversion. They captured some of the positions to the east of the Residency, and from these maintained a continuous fire of guns and mortars on the rebels. I shall give a more detailed account of their proceedings in the proper place.

But I must not omit to record here the fact that, whilst our men had been struggling onwards, winning with difficulty those important posts, the enemy had threatened their flanks and their communications. They had attacked, fortunately without result, the Martinière and the Dilkushá, and had even shown themselves in force on the road to the Álambágh. They were seen, too, in numbers on the opposite bank of the Gúmtí. What would have been the position of the army, with the enemy all about it, and the lane by which it had advanced completely blocked up, had the attack on the Sháh Najaf failed, the reader may imagine. Happily, it did not fail.

The British and Sikh troops, lying in unbroken order, their arms by their sides, slept the sleep of men who had earned their rest that sixteenth night of November. They were awakened early in the morning of the 17th, not by their own bugles, but by the bells of the city and the beating of the enemy's drums. It seemed as though an attack was imminent. The British soldiers sprang up with alacrity, each man

Outram, during this day, is endeavouring to effect a diversion.

The action of the rebels during the day indicates a resolve to wait for the failure of the direct attack.

The night of the 16th, and morning of the 17th.

in his place, ready for action. But the enemy did not come on. Sir Colin Campbell was, therefore, able to carry out his own plan and to choose his own time.

His plan was, first, to carry the Mess-house, a large masonry building, defended by a ditch twelve feet broad, surmounted by a loop-holed wall behind, about midway between the Sháh Najaf and the Kaisarbágh. The Mess-house carried, the Motí Mahall, lying due north of the former, and on the direct road from the Sháh Najaf to the Residency, would be the next point of attraction. Could the Motí Mahall be carried, a junction with Outram would be the certain consequence. That alone would be a good day's work. Much would still remain to be accomplished. The strong positions of the Kaisarbágh—covered by the Tára Kothí—and of the Begam's palace, covering the vast city behind them, would still remain in the occupation of some 30,000 unsubdued foes, and it was in the face of these that Sir Colin would have to withdraw the women and children, the sick and the wounded.

Sir Colin's plans for the 17th.

The difficulties before him.

Knowing all this—that absolute success on the 17th would be the prelude to difficulties of a new kind on the 18th and the days following the 18th—Sir Colin marked the commencement of his operations on the first-named day with great caution. First, he deemed it advisable to secure his left flank. It was true that he had a force at the barracks, connected with the Sikandar-bágh; but, as the enemy commanded all the massive buildings south of the Barracks, and even to the eastward of them, it would not be difficult for them to make a détour, avoiding the Barracks, and to act on our left rear. To prevent this, Sir Colin detached the 5th Brigade under Brigadier Russell to carry the house called Banks's house and four bungalows close to the Barracks, to convert them into military posts. To make the plan clear to the reader, I may state that Banks's house occupied a position on the edge of the city, on the city side of the canal, directly south of the Barracks, and somewhat south of an imaginary straight line, from west to east, drawn from the Kaisarbágh to the canal. The four bungalows were to the north of it, close to the Barracks. A direct road led from Banks's house across the canal to the Dilkushá. It will thus be seen that, possessing now the Barracks and the Dilkushá, the determines to attack Banks's house and the bungalows.

Sir Colin secures his left flank;

occupation of Banks's house and the bungalows would sever the communication between the Kaisarbagh and the Dilkushá and would cover the left rear of the attacking force.

Having thus made arrangements to secure his communications, Sir Colin directed William Peel to open fire with his heavy guns on the Mess-house—formerly the Mess-house of the 32nd Foot. He “was determined to use his guns as much as possible in taking it.”* The fire continued from the early morning till 3 o'clock in the afternoon. At that hour, the musketry fire of the enemy having been almost completely silenced, it appeared to Sir Colin that the Mess-house might be stormed without much risk. He ordered on this duty a company of the 90th Foot, under Captain Wolseley,† and a picket of the 53rd, sixty strong, under Captain Hopkins, Major Barnston's battalion of detachments under Captain Guise of the 90th,‡ and some of the 4th Panjáb Rifles, under Captain Powlett.

William Peel
cannonades
the Mess-house.

The troops ordered to storm it.

The feat of arms devolving upon these men to attempt was no light one. The Mess-house, a building of considerable size, was surrounded by a loop-holed mud wall, covering a ditch about twelve feet broad, scarped with masonry. The ditch was traversed by drawbridges, but whether these were down or up was unknown to the storming party.

Never was a daring feat of arms better performed. Leading his men at the double across the intervening space, exposed to a hot fire from the neighbouring buildings, Hopkins of the 53rd, known as one of the most daring men in the British army, reached the mud wall of which I have spoken, dashed over it, crossed the drawbridge, fortunately left down, and entered the Mess-house. He had but just gained the place when Roberts, now the Commander-in-Chief in India, galloped up, handed him a Union Jack, and requested him to hoist it on one of the turrets. Followed by one of his men, Hopkins climbed upon the roof, and, giving three cheers, planted the flag on the summit. The cheers were responded to by a shout from his men, but the flag had not been up ten minutes before a round shot cut the staff, and sent

Captain Hopkins storms it,

* Sir Colin Campbell's Despatch, dated 18th November.

† Now Lord Wolseley.

‡ Major Barnston had been severely wounded the previous day in the attack on the Sháh Najaf.

it down into the garden. Again did Hopkins plant it, and again was it knocked down. He asked to hoist it again, but, just at the moment, an order arrived from the Commander-in-Chief forbidding the further display of it. Whilst searching for the flagstaff in the garden, Hopkins had come across Sir Colin, and the latter, after a brief colloquy, placed him in command of the Mess-house. He did not quit it till relieved the following morning by Captain Rolleston of the 84th.*

Simultaneously Wolseley, moving on a different point, had attacked the houses to the right of the Mess-house, whilst Irby, with a company of the supports, attempted to clear those on the left. Both attacks were successful, and the rebels, driven out, fled in panic to the Motí Mahall.

The victorious stormers followed the fleeing enemy, Wolseley being determined to push his advantage to the utmost. He had, it is true, no orders to attack the Motí Mahall, but the inborn instinct of the soldier had taught him that nothing tended so much to bloodless victory as immediate pressure upon a defeated foe. He hurried on therefore to the wall of the Motí Mahall, but the opposition offered was great, and the wall was solid, and the gateway had been blocked up. He had, therefore, to send back for the sappers. These promptly came up, and succeeded after a time in making narrow openings in the wall. Through these Wolseley and his men eagerly rushed, and attacked the network of buildings within. The resistance they encountered was, however, stout and even desperate, every room being contested. At length, however, he expelled the enemy, and the Motí Mahall, the last building held by the rebels on the line communicating with Outram and Havelock, came completely into British possession.† and follows

the enemy to the Motí Mahall,

which, after a keen resistance, he storms.

An open space, nearly half a mile in width, still intervened between the assailants and the advanced positions of Outram

* In previous editions the credit of the flag incident was erroneously given to Captain Wolseley. The error was corrected in the Appendix to the 3rd Volume, corresponding to the 5th of this edition, published in 1880.

† In his life of Lord Wolseley Mr. Lowe states that the Commander-in-Chief was very angry with Captain Wolseley for thus exceeding his instructions, though the result was so satisfactory and beneficial. Ultimately Sir Colin's anger cooled down, and he recognised the value of the achievement, accomplished with so much dash and gallantry.

and Havelock. This space was exposed to a heavy musketry fire from the Kaisarbágh and could not be crossed without imminent risk. But the risk did not prevent the two gallant generals and their staff from crossing the space to meet the Commander-in-Chief. They started—eight officers and one civilian. They were Outram, Havelock, Napier (now Lord Napier of Magdála), Vincent Eyre, young Havelock (now Sir Henry Havelock), Dodgson, the Deputy Adjutant-General, the aide-de-camp Sitwell, the engineer Russell, and the gallant Kavanagh. They had not gone many paces before they were seen by the enemy, and the musketry fire from the Kaisarbágh redoubled. Napier was struck down, young Havelock was struck down, Sitwell and Russell were struck down. Outram, Havelock, Eyre, Dodgson, and Kavanagh, alone reached the Motí Mahall uninjured. Then, to borrow once again the appropriate language of Sir Colin Campbell, “the relief of the garrison had been accomplished.”

The conversation between the Commander-in-Chief and his four visitors, though animated and joyful, was not long. The visitors had to return across the terrible space. They set out at a run. Outram and Kavanagh were able to keep it up. But Havelock, weak and ill, soon tired. Turning to Dodgson, he exclaimed, “I can do no more, Dodgson, I can do no more.” Dodgson, than whom no braver, no more modest, and no more deserving soldier ever lived, at once supported the gallant veteran. Resting on Dodgson, then, the illustrious soldier traversed, at a slow and measured pace—the only pace of which his strength was capable—the ground still remaining to be gone over, the enemy’s balls striking all around them, at their feet, just short of them, just before them, just behind them, but all missing their mark.

I propose now to devote a few moments to explain in detail the manner in which Outram and Havelock had accomplished their portion of the allotted task. I left Outram on the 9th November, sending off the devoted Kavanagh, disguised as a native, to the camp of the Commander-in-Chief. From that date Outram was made aware, by means of preconcerted signals, of each move of Sir Colin Campbell’s force; of his successive arrivals at the Álambágh and the Dilkushá, and of his movement against the Sikandarbágh and the Sháh Najaf on the morning of the 16th.

Outram,
Havelock, Dodgson, and Kavanagh
return.

Havelock and Dodgson.

The proceedings of Outram and Havelock.

The time, so long and eagerly looked for, had now when it would be possible for the troops pent up in the Residency and the adjoining buildings to co-operate actively with the relieving force. With his usual self-denial, Outram once again assigned to the illustrious Havelock the honour of conducting this critical operation. In pursuance of his instructions, Havelock selected from his division a body of about twelve hundred men, and held them in readiness, on the first signs of the successful storming of the Sikandarbágh, to drive the enemy from the strong positions which would still intervene between him and the advancing columns of the Commander-in Chief.

Nov. 16.
Havelock
assumes command of the advance.

The force selected by Havelock consisted of a hundred and sixty men of the 5th Fusiliers, under Lieutenant Mara; of forty-eight of the 64th Regiment, under Captain Shute; of a hundred and sixty of the 84th, under Captain Wills; of a hundred and forty-two of the 78th Highlanders under Captain Lockhart; of a hundred and eighty-one of the 90th Light Infantry, under Lieutenant-Colonel Purnell; of a hundred of the Regiment of Firúzpúr, under Lieutenant Cross. Of artillery, he had three batteries of heavy guns, howitzers, and mortars, commanded respectively by Vincent Eyre (with the rank of Brigadier), Olpherts, and Maude, R.A. Each column was likewise accompanied by a party of miners, with tools and powder-bags, under the command of an engineer officer. The engineer officers were Russell, Hutchinson, and Limond. To these also was attached Captain Oakes. The reserve was composed of two hundred men from the 5th Fusiliers, 78th Highlanders, and Regiment of Firúzpúr.

Composition of the advance.

Havelock had occupied the Farhat Bakhsh palace. It was his intention, as soon as the attack on the Sikandarbágh should be pronounced, to blow up, by means of mines previously prepared, the outer wall of the Farhat Bakhsh palace, and open a continuous fire upon the enemy from the heavy batteries which had been constructed behind it. As soon as that fire should produce a certain effect, the infantry would rush forward and storm two buildings between Farhat Bakhsh palace and the Motí Mahall, known as the Haran-kháná* and the steam-engine house. Under these, mines had been constructed. It may be convenient to state that, on the two

Havelock's
plan.

* Anglicæ, Deerhouse.

batteries constructed behind the outer wall of the Farhat Bakhsh were mounted four 18-pounder guns, one 8-inch iron howitzer, four 9-pounder field guns, and two 24-pounder field howitzers. In position behind these were six 8-inch mortars, under Captain Maude, R.A.

At about 11 o'clock Havelock learned that the advancing force was operating against Sikandarbagh. He at once gave orders for the explosion of the mines under the outer wall of the Farhat Bakhsh. It happened, unfortunately, that the result of the explosion was not nearly so effective as he had hoped, and it devolved upon the batteries to complete the work which the mines had only very partially accomplished. Vincent Eyre and the officers serving under him were, however, in no way discouraged. A continuous fire, lasting over three hours, not only demolished the remaining obstacles of the wall, but produced a very considerable effect on the buildings beyond it. So great was it, indeed, that at 3 o'clock Havelock formed his columns of assault in the square of the Chatar Manzil—outside the battered wall of the Farhat Bakhsh—and ordered his engineers to fire the mines laid under the two buildings beyond.

At a quarter past 3, two of the mines of the Haran-kháná exploded with good effect. A quarter of an hour later the signal for assault was given. "It is impossible," wrote Havelock in his despatch, "to describe the enthusiasm with which this signal was received by the troops. Pent up in inaction for upwards of six weeks, and subjected to constant attacks, they felt that the hour of retribution and glorious exertion had returned." Their action corresponded to the feelings which swayed it. Dashing forward with a cheer, they carried the Haran-kháná, then the engine-house, and were thus in a position to extend their hands to their friends of the advancing force, as soon as these should have captured the Motí Mahall. I have already shown how this was done.

"The relief of the garrison was accomplished." Yes—but to quote once again from the gallant writer whose account of Lord Clyde's campaign is a masterpiece of description of military movements,* "a most difficult and dangerous task still remained. The

He gives orders for action,

and carries
the enemy's position as far as the engine-house.

The difficulties that yet remained.

* Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

garrison, with women and children, sick and wounded, guns and stores, had to be withdrawn; and to effect this in the face of the vast force of the enemy was no easy task. One narrow winding lane alone led to the rear, and through it the whole force had to be filed. To protect the march of the convoy, the whole of the immense line, extending from the ruined walls of the Residency to the wooded park of the Dilkushá, required to be held, and this gave a most hazardous extension to our forces—far too weak for the maintenance of so extended a position. To keep any considerable reserve in hand was impossible.”

The circumstances were indeed such as to merit the earnest care and consideration which the Commander-in-Chief devoted to them. Fortunately, Sir Colin Campbell was a man of iron nerves, of splendid resolution. He could act promptly and steadfastly even when confronted by so great a difficulty as that which now presented itself. His plans were quickly formed. The enemy still occupied the Kaisarbágh in great force. From the Kaisarbágh they threatened the flank and the left rear of the British army. To permit an enemy so numerous to occupy a position so strong and so threatening whilst carrying out the delicate operation which it had now devolved upon Sir Colin Campbell to attempt, was more than any prudent commander could agree to. Sir Colin's first object, then, was to silence the fire from the Kaisarbágh. This silenced, two lines of retirement might be open to him.

Sir Colin Campbell is equal to cope with them.

I have already stated * that on the 17th November Sir Colin had detached the 5th Brigade, under Brigadier Russell, with some artillery and rockets, to carry the house called Banks's house and four bungalows, adjacent to the Barracks, with a view of converting them into military posts covering his left rear. Russell found the positions well fortified, and strongly garrisoned. But he was equal to the occasion. The four bungalows were first stormed. A detachment of the 2nd Panjáb Infantry, led by a gallant subaltern, Lieutenant Keen, was then pushed forward to Banks's house. This officer occupied that house without difficulty and remained there with fifty Sikhs, during the remainder of the operations for the relief of Lakhnao. His position was extremely dangerous, for the enemy were in great numbers, and, in his comparatively isolated position, he might at any moment be overwhelmed before assistance could reach him. But he showed a bold front which daunted the enemy.

His plans.

Brigadier Russell carries Banks's house and the bungalows.

* Page 141.

The chain of posts covering the British left rear was now complete. The proper right of this chain was the Barracks, occupied by Lieutenant-Colonel Ewart and three hundred of the 93rd, its proper left Banks's house; the right centre was formed of the four bungalows referred to, the left centre by gardens. But, precisely at the moment when Russell's brigade had succeeded in occupying the right centre and left of the position, there rose in the minds of the rebels the conviction that such occupation barred to them the road by which they intended to operate, and that they must at any cost expel the British. Throughout the night of the 17th and during the whole of the 18th, then, they kept upon the right and right centre of the position, a vigorous and unceasing fire from muskets and from an 18-pounder. Had it been Sir Colin Campbell's intention simply to occupy these posts whilst his large convoy was being withdrawn by the line he had advanced, this incessant fire, however annoying, would have had no important result. But Sir Colin Campbell having resolved, as I have shown, to dominate in the first instance the fire of the Kaisarbágh, and thus to secure properly a second line of retirement by the Barracks and Banks's house, the line of posts had become a base from which to attack and occupy certain buildings between them and the Kaisarbágh. In this view the heavy fire kept up by the enemy during the 18th possessed a far greater importance.

The first building Russell had decided to attack was the hospital, the nearest important post to the four bungalows and the Barracks. But, before he could move, it was necessary to silence the enemy's fire. This could only be done by means of artillery. Early on the morning of the 18th, then, Sir Colin directed Colonel Biddulph of the Bengal Army, head of the Intelligence Department, to proceed in company with Major Bouchier, to reconnoitre the roads leading to the Barracks and the canal, with the view of discovering whether guns could not be taken down to co-operate with Russell.

Russell's
position

Nov. 18.
is fired upon by the rebels.

Reasons why
the retention of the post was important.

Russell reconnoitres the roads.

To no nobler and more zealous men could this dangerous task have been entrusted. Bouchier, to whose splendid services I have already referred, was one of the most daring officers of his unsurpassed regiment—the Bengal Artillery. Biddulph was cool, intelligent, and a thorough soldier. They quickly found a road, and then with the utmost speed brought down a 9-pounder and a 24-pound howitzer, and four 5½-inch mortars. The gun and the howitzer were placed in position in front of the bungalow, on the extreme right, the mortars behind the bungalow.

Bouchier
and Biddulph.

The fire then opened. Brigadier Russell was almost immediately placed hors de combat by a contusion.* Colonel Biddulph then assumed the command. The fire continued with great effect, and the rebels withdrew their 18-pounder. Biddulph then organised a column for an attack on the hospital. But as he was explaining his plans to the officer next to him in command, Lieutenant-Colonel Hale of the 82nd, a bullet, which had previously traversed the cap of the latter, penetrated his brain.

Russell is wounded.

Biddulph
is killed.

Hale then assumed command. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon, he led his column to the assault, covering it with a quick fire from the 24-pound howitzer. Traversing some intermediate gardens, he attacked the hospital. The resistance, however, was obstinate, nor did he drive out the enemy until they had inflicted a severe loss on his column. Nor, unfortunately, was he able to maintain himself in the hospital after it had been stormed. Its thatched roof was kindled by the enemy, and the heat of the flames alone forced him to retire. He withdrew, then, in perfect order, to his original position.†

Hale assumes
command,

but can make no progress.

* The story is thus told by Colonel Bouchier (Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoys): "The 18-pounder (rebels') was not about one hundred and twenty yards distant, and, to avoid giving notice to the enemy of our intentions by opening an embrasure, the muzzle of the 9-pounder was crammed through a hole that a shot had just made. The riflemen declared they had not been able to load again. As we fired, so did they. A cloud of dust is all I remember. Brigadier Russell, Captain Ogilvy, and I were on our backs. Poor Russell had just been grazed on the back of the neck: the clods broken from the wall had knocked us over."

† Colonel Bouchier thus mentions a gallant deed, performed on this occasion, which deserves a permanent record in history. "Lieutenant

Whilst the struggle, followed by the retirement, had been going on at the hospital, the rebels, thinking that the central position, that between the Barracks and Sikandarbagh, must have been thereby weakened, attacked the pickets in considerable force. But Sir Colin Campbell, attentive to every detail, was no sooner cognisant of the situation, than he himself brought up Remmington's troop of Horse Artillery, a company of the 53rd, and a company of the 23rd, to meet the attack. These were absolutely the only troops of which he could dispose, but they were sufficient. The conduct of Remmington's troop elicited the admiration of the whole army. "Captain Remmington's troop of Horse Artillery," wrote Sir Colin, "was brought up, and dashed right into the jungle with the leading skirmishers, and opened fire, with extraordinary rapidity and precision. Captain Remmington distinguished himself very much. I superintended this affair myself, and I have particular pleasure in drawing your Lordships' attention to the conduct of this troop on this occasion as an instance of the never-failing readiness and quickness of the horse artillery of the Bengal Service." The attack was repulsed.

The enemy
attack the centre pickets.

Splendid conduct of Remming-
ton's troop.

Thus ended the 18th. The British had maintained the position covering their left rear, but had made no substantial progress towards gaining a second line of retirement. The difficulties experienced in seizing the posts which would command such a line rendered it advisable once more to reconnoitre the ground between the positions actually held and the canal, to ascertain whether it was possible, abandoning the projected line of retirement by the direct road from Sikandarbagh to Banks's house, to withdraw the guns and the troops by one of the unmetalled roads behind the bungalows already occupied.

The roads on the left again
reconnoitred,

Harrington, Bengal Artillery, and another officer (whose name I regret I never knew) belonging to H.M.'s service, with a gunner of artillery and a drummer of infantry, did most gallant service. A man of the storming column had been wounded and left in the garden for an hour and a half. The drummer stuck by him, and dashed into the picket to report the fact. The little party above mentioned, under a very hot fire, rushed out and brought in the wounded man. As they left the picket, a round shot struck the ground under their feet.' Lientenant Harrington received the Victoria Cross.

The reconnoissance showed that the roads in that locality, though heavy, were practicable for artillery. On receiving a report to this effect, Sir Colin determined to withdraw his force by the road by which he had advanced. He therefore directed Colonels Ewart of the 93rd, Hale of the 82nd, and Wells of the 23rd, commanding the posts covering the left rear, simply to maintain their positions, whilst he would himself personally superintend the delicate operations of the withdrawal, by the road already traversed, of the sick and the wounded, the women and the children. The order was simple, comprehensible to the meanest capacity, and was carried out to the letter.

and are found practicable for guns.

Nov. 19-22.
Sir Colin's plan of retirement.

On the morning of the 20th, whilst Captain Ogilvy, already mentioned in these pages, was, under the direction of Colonel Hale, engaged in intrenching the positions covering the left rear, Sir Colin Campbell began to carry out the withdrawal. As a preliminary measure, William Peel, on the morning of that day, opened on the Kaisarbágh a tremendous fire from his heavy guns. This fire continued during that day, the day following, and the 22nd, increasing every hour in intensity. It gradually assumed the character of a bombardment. The enemy suffered enormous losses, and on the evening of the 22nd three breaches in the walls of the Kaisarbágh invited assault. They expected it. Such, however, was not the intention of Sir Colin. The bombardment had, in fact, been used to cover the withdrawal of the women and children, sick and wounded. Long before it concluded, these had reached the Dilkushá in safety. The effecting of the three breaches on the evening of the 22nd was used to carry out the retreat of the glorious garrison of Lakhnao. Whilst the rebels passed that night in devising measures to meet the assault which they expected on the morrow, the garrison which had so long held them at bay, the veterans of Inglis's force, the victors in many fights of Havelock's and Outram's, began, at midnight, their retirement. The guns which they could not carry away they rendered useless. Then, "behind the screen of Campbell's outposts, Ingliss's and Havelock's toilworn bands withdrew. Then these began also to retire; the pickets fell back through the supports, the

The retirement.

William Peel opens fire on the Kaisarbágh with signal effect.

The rebels expect an assault, under cover of which expectation Sir Colin withdraws, supports glided away between the intervals of the reserve—the reserve, when all had passed, silently defiled into the lane—thick darkness shrouded the movement from the gaze of the enemy—and, hours after the position had been quitted, they were firing into the abandoned posts. Hope's brigade, which had so nobly headed the advance, had also covered the retreat. Before daylight on the 23rd, the last straggler had quitted the camp at Dilkushá."*

Whilst the Commander-in-Chief was thus effecting the well-planned retirement, in the security gained by his skilful operations against Kaisarbágh, his lieutenants, Hale, Ewart, and Wells, covering his left rear, had remained occupying the positions they had gained and intrenched. During the three days of the bombardment of the Kaisarbágh, the rebels had never relaxed their musketry fire against those positions. But they had attempted no assault. The fact that they made no attempt at all is another remarkable proof, added to the many already cited, of the absolute deficiency of military ability amongst their leaders. For Banks's house was not only entirely separated from the other posts, but it was garrisoned only by fifty Sikhs, who might have been overwhelmed ere succour could have reached them.

But no such attempt was made, and Hale and his lieutenants, as soon as he had ascertained that the Commander-in-Chief had advanced far enough on his line of retreat, evacuated the barracks and bungalows, and fell back on the Dilkushá by the road which had been selected after the reconnoissance of the 19th. They rejoined the main force at this place early on the morning of the 23rd.

The re-united force remained at the Dilkushá during that day and the ensuing night. But there was no rest for officer or private. The detachment parties who had come up with the relieving force had to be distributed to their several regiments; carriages had to be allotted; arrangements for the formation of the convoy of the women and children under responsible officers had to be made. In a word, there was made on this day a reorganisation of the whole force to remain in operation as far as the Álambágh.

without being molested.

How Hale covered the left rear.

Hale rejoins Sir Colin at the Dilkushá,

where the army halts, but does not rest.

Looking back from this place—the first halt—after the successful relief, I find a sincere pleasure in paying the tribute of the historian to the splendid exertions of one arm of the service, whose place on the field of action has not yet been specifically mentioned. The storming of the Sikandarbágh, of the Sháh Najaf, of the Motí Mahall, of the bungalows adjacent to the Barracks, was the united work of the artillery and the infantry; the bombardment of the Kaisar-bágh, of the artillery and the sailors. During this time the cavalry, ever ready, always on the alert, prompt to take advantage of every opening, had been engaged in covering advanced movements, in keeping up the long line of communications, and in repelling the counter attacks of the enemy on the extreme right.

Such services were necessary to the safety of the force, and, though they might be less prominent, they were not inferior in value to those of the other arms. The names of Little and of Ouvry, of Probyn, of Watson, of Younghusband and of Gough, still live in the memory of those who served under them.

Nor, when writing of the halt at the Dilkushá, dare I omit to chronicle the one mournful event which tinged the joy of the relief. That day Havelock, who had been long ailing, passed away to his last home. He had lived long enough to hear that his Queen and his countrymen had appreciated his noble qualities, that his name had become a household word among the homes and the hearths of England.

The life of Havelock had been a life devoted to his profession. He had made the strict performance of duty his polar star. Gifted with military abilities of a very high order, and conscious that he possessed those abilities, he had borne without repining the sapping torment of slow promotion, and its inevitable results—employment in positions below his capacity. But every trial of Fortune had found Havelock cheerful, resolute, and devoted. To the smallest office he gave his best abilities. And, whilst thus labouring, he had striven also to prepare himself for the eventualities which were to follow.

A story is told of the famous Scot-Austrian Marshal Loudon, that, when he was a Major on frontier duties in Croatia, he used to spend his leisure in studying an enormous map of the Austrian dominions. This map he had placed on the floor of one of his rooms. His wife, jealous of this devotion, burst open, one day, the door of his study, and, seeing Loudon on his knees, tracing a particular route on the map, exclaimed, in a pet, "I wonder what pleasure you can find in eternally studying that map?" Loudon, turning to her, replied: "Leave me alone, my dear; the knowledge I am now acquiring will be useful to me when I become a Marshal of the Empire." Not only did Loudon become a Marshal of the Empire, but he came also to be recognised as the one Austrian general whom the great Frederick respected.*

Similar was the course pursued by Havelock. He studied all his life for the future. Similar, too, was the result. When the opportunity did come, he used it in a manner which electrified his contemporaries, which gained for him the confidence and devotion of his soldiers. His daring march from Allahábád to Kánhpúr against enemies excited by the slaughter of our countrymen; the splendid defiance of rule which he showed by, to effect a great end, fighting the battle of Kánhpúr with a river in his rear; the skill with which he gained it; the inspired audacity which characterised his marches into Oudh; the confidence with which he resolved, at all risks, to hold on to the position he had taken up at Kánhpúr—a position in a military sense false, inasmuch as his communications were liable to be severed;—all these deeds stamp him as a general of the very first order. He was bold and daring in conception, prompt and sudden in execution, persistent and unshaken in his resolves. The jealousy of men, in whose hands the opportunities granted to Havelock would have shattered, has attempted, since his death, to diminish his glory. But the poisoned darts have rebounded, blunted, from the iron cuirass of the warrior. His deeds speak for themselves. The incidents of that Kánhpúr campaign will live, an imperishable record of his glorious qualities. The statue which adorns Trafalgar Square, whilst it will show his outward form to the generations which shall have known him not, will whet their curiosity to inquire regarding the early training

* On one occasion after the Seven Years' War, when Joseph II. entertained Frederick at Neustadt, in Moravia, Loudon had modestly taken a seat towards the end of the table on the opposite side to that on which Frederick was seated. "Come up to here and sit near me," called to him the latter. "I would rather see you by me than opposite to me."

and later deeds of one who, in a short and glorious campaign, illustrated all the qualities which combine to form a commander of the first rank.

Havelock died on the 24th. On the morning of the 26th his remains were consigned to a humble grave in the Álambágh. His gallant son, the leaders who had been associated with him, Campbell, Grant, Outram, Napier, Inglis, and others, and a crowd of officers, followed him to his last resting-place. He had fought a good fight: he had died, as he had lived, in the performance of duty.

Havelock
buried at the Álambágh.

To return. On the afternoon of the 24th, Sir Colin, having made all his arrangements, marched with his men and the train of women and children whom they guarded, leaving Outram's division, in front of the Dilkushá, to cover his retirement. That evening Sir Colin, with his long convoy, reached the Álambágh. The rebels had made no demonstration against Outram, and that officer, having received a supply of carriage from Sir Colin, fell back and rejoined his chief on the 25th. As Outram was preparing to fall back, the rebels showed themselves for a moment—only, however to disappear. They had not forgotten the rough lessons of the preceding days.

Sir Colin and his convoy reach the Álambágh.

Nov. 25.

With the junction of the divisions of the army at the Álambágh came the necessity for making a new distribution of it. Three matters pressed themselves particularly on Sir Colin's attention, viz. the safe transport of the ladies and children to Kánhpúr, the necessity of dealing with the Gwáliár mutineers, and the occupation by a sufficient force of the Álambágh. The second of these matters was a cause of considerable anxiety, inasmuch as Sir Colin had for many days received no communication from General Windham, commanding at Kánhpúr, and it was impossible to say how circumstances had gone with him subsequently to the 9th November.

Fresh distribution of the force at the Álambágh.

The third matter was, naturally, that first settled. Sir Colin decided on the 26th that Sir James Outram should remain at Álambágh with a force augmented to about four thousand men of all arms, twenty-five guns and howitzers, and ten mortars. Outram would thus occupy a position threatening Lakhnao, and would retain it till the Commander-in-Chief, having placed his convoy in

Nov. 26.
Outram
ordered to remain at the Álambágh.

safety and disposed of the Gwáliár mutineers, should return, to act offensively against the city of Lakhnao. To maintain the communication with Kánhpúr, a post at the Banní bridge, up to that time occupied by the wing of a Madras native regiment and two guns, was strengthened by a detachment of European troops.

Having made this disposition on the 26th, Sir Colin set out for Kánhpúr at 11 A.M. on the 27th. He had with him about three thousand men, including the wasted remnant of the 32nd Regiment, and the few survivors of the native pensioners who had responded to the call of Sir Henry Lawrence. Under the convoy of the troops were the ladies, the children, the sick and the wounded, numbering altogether about two thousand, and the treasure which had been rescued from Lakhnao. That same evening Sir Colin encamped at the Banní bridge. In reply to an inquiry as to whether any communication had been received from Kánhpúr, the officer there commanding reported that not only had he heard a cannonade during that day, but during the day previous also.

This information was of an alarming nature. If Windham had been overwhelmed, the rebels would certainly have destroyed the bridge of boats, and the British would be cut off from their own provinces, which for the moment would be in the power of the rebels.

There was nothing for it but to march on with the utmost expedition. Early on the following morning, the force pressed onward. "At every step the sound of a heavy and distant cannonade became more distinct; but mile after mile was passed over, and no news could be obtained."* Just before noon, however, a native who had been concealed behind a hedge, ran forward, and delivered a missive to the Staff at the head of the advance guard. "He had a small rolled-up letter in the Greek character, addressed 'Most urgent, to General Sir Colin Campbell, or any officer commanding troops on the Lakhnao road.' The letter was dated two days previously, and said that, unless affairs shortly took a favourable turn, the troops would

Nov. 27.

Sir Colin and the remainder of the force start for Kánhpúr;

reaches Banní,

but can hear nothing of Windham.

His position should Windham have been overwhelmed.

A cannonade is heard in the distance.

Receives news of an impending disaster to Windham, unless he were speedily relieved.

* Blackwood's Magazine.

have to retire into the intrenchment; that the fighting had been most severe; and that the enemy were very powerful, especially in artillery. It concluded by expressing a hope that the Commander-in-Chief would therefore see the necessity of pushing to their assistance with the utmost speed.”*

The information contained in this note converted into certainty the impressions which the sound of the cannonade had produced. It deepened the anxiety of the leaders, the impatience of the troops. The scene that followed has thus been painted by an eye-witness:—† “The impatience and anxiety of all became extreme. Louder and louder grew the roar—faster and faster became the march—long and weary was the way—tired and footsore grew the infantry—death fell on the exhausted wounded with terrible rapidity—the travel-worn bearers could hardly stagger along under their loads—the sick men groaned and died—but still on, on, on, was the cry.”

The scene that followed described by an eye-witness.

After progressing in the usual order for a short time, the tension became too great for Sir Colin. Leaving the infantry to march on with the convoy, he pressed forward with the cavalry and horse artillery. On reaching Mangalwár, about five miles on the Lakhnao side of the Ganges, he halted his troops, directed the artillery to fire salvoes to announce the approach of assistance, and galloped forward with his staff, in mingled hope and fear regarding the condition in which he might find the bridge of boats. As he approached the river a glance dissipated every doubt on this head. Through the glimmering light, for evening had set in, the bridge was seen to be intact. Flames rising in every direction, mingling with the light of the setting sun, showed that the enemy must have taken the city and a large part of the cantonments; that the tents intended for the ladies and children, the sick and wounded from Lakhnao, and the stores of clothing intended for the defenders of the Residency, must have been destroyed; whilst the artillery fire occasionally directed at the bridge, and he announces his approach by salvoes;

The tension too great for Sir Colin;

then gallops on with his staff;

* A Lecture on the Relief of Lucknow, by Colonel H. W. Norman, C.B. Sir Colin stated that he received three notes in succession, vide Bouchier's Eight Months' Campaign.

† Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

musketry fire near the river bank, proved that a sharp crisis was impending. In a word, to use the language of an officer on Sir Colin's staff, "the veil which had so long shrouded us from Windham was rent asunder, and the disaster stood before us in all its calamity." *

has a glimpse of the disaster

What that disaster was, and how it came about, will form the theme of the next chapter. I leave Sir Colin and his staff galloping, on the dusky evening of the 28th November, across the bridge, the preservation of which might yet enable him to repair the evil that had been accomplished.

as he gallops across the bridge into Kánhpúr.

* Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

CHAPTER III.

THE GWÁLIÁR CONTINGENT AND WINDHAM AT KÁNHPÚR.

IN the preceding chapter I mentioned that when, on the 9th November, Sir Colin left Kánhpúr to join his army in the plain beyond Banní, he had left at that station about five hundred Europeans and a few Sikhs under the command of Major-General C. A. Windham. On the 6th November, in a memorandum addressed to that officer, he had directed him to occupy and improve the intrenchment which had been constructed on the river; to keep a careful watch over the movements of the Gwáliár force; to send into Oudh, by detachments of wings, unless he should be seriously threatened, any European infantry that might arrive; but to detain, if he should think fit, the brigade of Madras native troops, expected the following day, until the intentions of the Gwáliár contingent, expected to arrive at Kálpí* on the 9th, should become developed. In case of any pronounced movement towards Kánhpúr on the part of that force, General Windham was directed to make as great a show as possible of the troops at his disposal by encamping them conspicuously and in extended order in advance of the intrenchment, which, however, was to be sufficiently guarded. On no account was he to move out to attack, unless compelled to do so by force of circumstances, in order to save the intrenchment from being bombarded.

Detailed instructions given to General
Windham,

* Kálpí lies on the right bank of the Zannah in the Jalaun district. It was a place of great importance in the times of the Mughuls.

It is a proof alike of the careful supervision which Sir Colin Campbell exercised over the generals subordinate to him, but placed in independent command, and of the anxious attention which he devoted to that particular position, that, two days later, he sent to General Windham a second memorandum, in which he entered in full detail into the possibilities before that officer. Every movement of the Gwáliár troops was provided for; the corresponding action of General Windham was defined; and the retention of certain troops and the despatch into Oudh of others were again insisted on.

supplemented by a second memorandum still more in detail.

General Windham prepared at once to carry out the directions of the Commander-in-Chief in their most essential point. The rendering of the intrenchment secure against any attack was that point. The intrenchment guarded, though it did not absolutely protect, the passage of the river, the commissariat stores, and two of the hospitals. Windham, then, at once took measures to clear the glacis and the country beyond it, to extend and strengthen the works, and to train men to work the guns. For the intrenchment he had nine guns worked by a detachment of the Naval Brigade commanded by Lieutenant Hay, R.A. Six field guns would, he expected, arrive with the Madras force on the 10th. He had, besides, two 9-pounders and one 24-pounder howitzer, with ammunition in their waggons. But, there being no gunners attached to these guns, Windham set to work to train some Sikh soldiers for that purpose.

Windham
takes steps to carry out Sir Colin's orders.

Artillery at his disposal.

Meanwhile, Tántiá Topí was preparing to establish his claim to generalship. Well served by his agents, Tántiá had received very minute and very timely information regarding the movements of Sir Colin Campbell. He arrived with the revolted Gwáliár contingent at Kálpí on the 9th November. Kálpí lies on the right bank of the river Jamnah, forty-six miles south-west from Kánhpúr. The direct road between the two places ran through the villages of Bhognipúr and Suchandi. From Suchandi to Kánhpúr the distance is fourteen miles, the road being intersected at the fourth mile-stone by the Pándu rivulet, at the eighth by the Ganges canal. Another line, which led to positions a little to the north-east of Kánhpúr, must now be referred to.

Tántiá Topí
arrives at Kálpí.

The country between Kálpí and Kánhpúr.

Leaving Kalpí, and passing through Bhognipúr, this road, just about midway from the latter to Suchandi, branches off to Akbarpúr. Thence, running nearly north, it touches the Pándu rivulet at Sheoli, and then, taking a turn to the north-west, crosses at a distance of four miles the Ganges canal, and, prolonging itself for two miles, reaches the village of Sheorájpúr on the grand trunk road about three miles from Sarai Ghát on the Ganges, and twenty-one miles north-west of Kánhpúr.

To march on Kánhpúr, Tántiá had first to cross the Jamnah. There was no one to oppose the passage. He had left at Jáláun his treasure and impedimenta. Kalpí he garrisoned with three thousand men and twenty guns. Then, on the 10th, he crossed the Jamnah. The passage effected, Tántiá, determined not to make too decided a demonstration until Sir Colin Campbell should have absolutely committed himself to the relief of Lakhnao, and, hoping that the rebel troops there would find means to detain him at least the time necessary for the perfect carrying out of his own scheme, moved slowly forward with about six thousand men and eighteen guns to Bhognipúr. Leaving here twelve hundred men and four guns, he advanced by Akbarpúr to Sheoli and Sheorájpúr, occupying the first-named place with two thousand men and six guns, Sheoli with the same number and four guns, and Sheorájpúr with one thousand men and four guns.

Plans and hopes of the rebel commander.

He occupies the salient points between Kánhpúr and the Jamnah;

These operations, beginning about the 10th November, were completed about the 19th. Their effect was completely to sever the communications between Kánhpúr and the west and north-west—the country on which it had been mainly dependent for its supplies.

thus severing the communications between Kánhpúr and its supply-country.

Windham had been neither blind nor indifferent to the movements of the enemy. He was duly informed of the passage of the Jamnah and the occupation of positions reaching to the Ganges, some twenty miles to the north-west of his position. What did this movement forebode? Some thought that the march on the Ganges at a prudent distance from Kánhpúr indicated an intention to cross unmolested into Oudh to act there on the rear of Sir Colin Effect of Tántiá Topf's movements on Windham.

He divines the reasons which actuate the rebel leader.

Campbell. Windham was not of this opinion. Crediting Tántiá Topí with merely natural acuteness, he could not believe that he had any other intention but that of taking advantage of Sir Colin's absence to crush him at Kánhpúr. He believed, in fact, that Tántiá would act as a general in his position ought to act.

Yet, believing this, convinced of it, he had still those positive and reiterated orders of the Commander-in-Chief which required him to forward into Oudh by detachments of wings of regiments the European troops as they should arrive. General Windham, whilst obeying these instructions, made an urgent representation to Sir Colin Campbell, informing him of the disquieting reports he was daily receiving regarding the movements of the Gwáliár contingent, and requesting permission to retain such troops as he might consider absolutely necessary for the defence of the place. Pending a reply, he continued to forward the incoming detachments towards Lakhnao.

On the evening of the 14th November the required permission arrived. On the morning of that day the Madras brigade, commanded by Brigadier Carthew, had marched into Kánhpúr. It was but a shadow of its former self. One of the regiments of which it had been composed, the 17th Native Infantry, had been left, by superior orders, at Fathpúr, to maintain the communication between Allahábád and Kánhpúr. Carthew brought with him, then, only the wing of one native regiment, the 27th, four 9-pounders, manned by natives, and two manned by Europeans. Between this date and the 26th the force was increased by successive companies or drafts of the 34th, 82nd, 88th Regiments, of the Rifle Brigade, and by the remaining wing of the 27th Madras Native Infantry. But the course of the narrative will show that not all of these were retained.

Windham was now more at ease. On the 17th, following the instructions he had received, he took up a position beyond and to the west of the town, near the junction of the Dehlí and Kalpí roads, and encamped there. This camp, composed of detachments from the 34th, 82nd, 88th, and Rifle Brigade, and of the right wing

Communi-cates to Sir Colin the enemy's movements.

Receives permission to detain European troops.

Brigadier Carthew
arrives;

is followed by detachments of European regiments.

Windham
Takes up a position west of the town, of the Madras Native Regiment, the 27th, with six guns, was placed under the command of Brigadier Carthew. Windham thus entirely followed out his orders, making a show of his troops, encamping them conspicuously, at the same time that he covered the town and with it the buildings between the town and the intrenchment, some of which had been prepared for the reception of the Lakhnao ladies, and in others of which supplies had been stored.

and displays
his troops.

Matters so continued till the 20th. On that date Windham had become aware of the movement of the Gwáliár contingent I have already described, and of their occupation of strong positions stretching from Kalpí to Sheorájpúr. Nor was this all. Up to the 19th he had received intelligence of the successful attacks made by the Commander-in-Chief on the Sikandarbágh and the Sháh Najaf. But from that date all communication from Lakhnao, even from the Álambágh, ceased; while, to add to his perplexity, he received, on the 22nd, information that the enemy had surprised and defeated the police force stationed to guard the Banni bridge, on the high road to Lakhnao!

Communication with the Commander-in-Chief ceases.

Windham learns that the Banni bridge has been surprised.

The occupation of the Banni bridge by the rebels permitted to continue, lead to fatal consequences; for Windham could not know how, since the 19th, it had fared with Sir Colin Campbell. It was quite possible, with thirty thousand still unconquered rebels in Lakhnao, that he might yet have to fight hard for it. Under these circumstances the conduct of Windham was marked by great judgment and great self-denial. Not caring to consider, in the presence of this possibly great danger, that Tántiá Topí and his trained soldiers were pressing upon him, he deliberately diminished his force to re-open the communications with Lakhnao. At 3 o'clock on the morning of the 23rd the right wing of the 27th Madras Native Infantry, with two 9-pounder guns manned by Europeans, marched by his orders, to re-occupy the Banni bridge.

He despatches troops to re-occupy that bridge.

Notwithstanding the permission he had received, and on which he had acted, to detain at Kánhpúr the European troops who might arrive, Windham had felt from the first that the showy position he had, in obedience to orders, taken up beyond the city, would in no way defend Kánhpúr in case of a serious attack. Under no circumstances could he prevent the enemy from bombarding the bridge with their heavy guns. The extent of the position, too, would prevent its proper defence with even the larger number of troops at his disposal, while, in the event, almost certain were he attacked seriously, of having to fall back on the intrenchment, the city and the houses I have spoken of would fall into the enemy's hands. With respect to the intrenchment, it should be borne in mind that, though Windham had done much to strengthen it, it was not, in a military sense, defensible.

Windham is thoroughly aware of the difficulties and danger of his position.

Windham was a brave and adventurous soldier. His position not being, in point of fact, defensible, he asked himself whether an aggressive defence might not present better chances of success. Thinking the matter over, he devised a scheme which he was prepared to carry out, and, on the very day on which he had taken up the position at the junction of the Dehlí and Kalpí roads—the 17th November—he transmitted this scheme to Lakhnao to obtain for its execution the sanction of the Commander-in-Chief.

He transmits to Sir Colin a plan of aggressive defence.

This scheme was based on the honoured principle of taking advantage of the separation from each other of the enemy's posts and of destroying them in detail. The enemy had taken up positions, as already stated, at Bhognipúr, Akbarpúr, Sheoli, and Sheorájpúr. Between the two last-named villages at the distances of three miles and two miles flowed the Ganges canal. Windham conceived the idea of transporting twelve hundred men in the night by this canal, taking his guns along the towing-path, and falling upon one or other of the positions (Sheoli or Sheorájpúr), overwhelming it, always able to fall back on Kánhpúr before the enemy from Akbarpúr could reach it.

Nature of the scheme.

To the request containing this plan Windham received no answer. The roads were closed. Meanwhile he had simply maintained his position and had sent off troops, as already mentioned, to regain the Banní bridge. But he had every day fresh causes for disquietude. The very day that he had heard of the defeat of the police force at the Banní bridge information reached him that rebels were crossing over from Oudh to swell the ranks of Tántiá Topí's force. It was necessary to take some decisive step. He hesitated to attempt a plan so opposed to his instructions as the canal-plan without special sanction. But something must be done. Windham knew, from his reading, from his instincts, from conversation with officers experienced in Indian warfare, that the most certain mode of defeating an Asiatic enemy is to march straight against him. At half past 8 o'clock on the morning of the 24th, then, he broke up his camp, and, marching six miles south-westward, took up a position close to the bridge by which the road to Kalpí crosses the canal. The position was comparatively strong, for his entire front was covered by the canal, and he was still nearer to the intrenchment than the enemy.

Receiving no reply from Sir Colin,

he takes up a position on the Kalpí road.

The Gwáliár troops, noting Windham's forward movement, regarded it as a challenge. They accepted it. That very day the detachment at Akbarpúr set out for Suchandi. Between this village and the canal, about midway, runs the Pándu rivulet. The rebels reached Suchandi on the 24th; the banks of the Pándu on the 25th. As soon as information of this movement reached Brigadier Carthew he despatched a special messenger with it to the General. Windham at once galloped to the camp, and reached Carthew's tent a little after midnight—during the first hour of the 26th.

The rebels accept his challenge, and march to the Pándu.

Windham at once made his plans. Dividing his force into two brigades, he placed Carthew at the head of the first, composed of the 88th Connaught Rangers, four companies of the 2nd battalion Rifle Brigade, and four 6-pounder guns, manned by natives. The second brigade, consisting of the 34th Regiment, four companies of the 82nd, and four 9-pounder guns, drawn by bullocks and manned by Europeans and Sikhs, he gave to Colonel Kelly of the 34th. Windham had also at his disposal a hundred native troopers and ten men of the 9th Lancers. With this force he determined to take the initiative the following morning. His plan was to deal the most advanced division of the enemy a heavy blow; then, returning to his base, repeat, should occasion offer, the same tactics on another portion of their force.

Windham prepares to attack them.

Before daylight of the 26th, Windham, having taken precautions to guard his baggage, to protect the canal bridge, and to observe the enemy on the side of Sheorájpúr, rode forward to reconnoitre. He found the rebels posted beyond the Pándu rivulet, then nearly dry. They numbered about two thousand five hundred infantry, five hundred cavalry, and they had six guns of large calibre. Windham at once sent back orders for his troops to advance. The order was forthwith obeyed.

He reconnoitres, and advances

to the attack.

Carthew led forward his brigade from the right, the men of the Rifle Brigade leading in skirmishing order. The enemy were seen in masses in front of a large tope of trees, but as the skirmishers approached they moved to their right. This movement completed, their guns in the tope opened a very heavy fire. The balls passed over the skirmishers and fell right into the 88th, who were following them, knocking over many officers and men. Carthew brought his guns into position as quickly as possible, and, opening upon the enemy, silenced their fire, whereupon Kelly, from the position on the left, led the 34th at the guns, and captured three of them (two 8-inch iron howitzers and one 6-pounder gun). Such, in brief, was the story of the main fight. I may add that, prior to Colonel Kelly's attack, a portion of his regiment had repulsed a charge of the enemy's cavalry. These did not appear again until later in the day, but it will be seen that they then made their presence felt.

Carthew
silences the enemy's fire,

and Kelly, pushing on the 34th, captures
their guns.

The capture of the guns was followed by the flight of the enemy, who were pursued for some distance. Windham then drew off his troops and marched back towards the city. This retrograde movement inspired the enemy with courage, and their cavalry, coming to the front, became so insolent that Windham halted and deployed his troops. It was no part of the enemy's game, however, to attack the British force in the open, so they again drew off. Windham then marched his force to a new position near the town across the Kalpí road, immediately in front of some brick-kilns. A letter from the Commander-in-Chief's camp had reached him to the effect that all was well, and that the army was marching towards marches back to the city, but, threatened by the enemy's cavalry,

Windham

takes up a new position across the Kalpí road.

Kánhpúr. Windham hoped, then, that the blow he had inflicted that day might serve as a deterrent to the enemy at least till the Commander-in-Chief should arrive. Their loss had been severe; his own amounted to ninety-two killed and wounded.

But the leader of the rebel army was no fool. The blow dealt by Windham, far from frightening him, had disclosed to his astute mind the weakness of the British leader. A force, completely victorious, does not as a rule fall back beyond the position it had occupied before the action had commenced; nor, in falling back, does it allow itself to be threatened with impunity by the troops it had defeated. But these things had happened to the little army of Windham. It had been victorious on the field—a fact proved by the capture of three of the enemy's guns. But the necessities of his position had forced Windham, after his victory, to fall back, threatened by the enemy's horse, to a position nearer to the city than that he had occupied before the battle. Tántiá Topí read then the necessities of Windham's position as he would have read an open book, and, with the instincts of a real general, he resolved to take advantage of them.

Tántiá Topí,
perceiving Windham's weakness, resolves to
attack him,

Far, then, from allowing Windham the respite of twenty-four hours, which would, that General hoped, bring the Commander-in-Chief to his aid, Tántiá Topí directed that portion of his force which had engaged at Suchandi the previous day to stand to their arms at daybreak, ready for a forward movement, but to withhold that movement until the detachments at Sheoli and Sheorájpúr, which would march in the night, should open fire on the right flank of the British. That fire was to be the signal for a general attack.

in front and
in flank.

Meanwhile, Windham, hoping much from the blow he had delivered the previous day, had not the less prepared for possible eventualities. His troops stood to their arms at daybreak. But, as there were neither signs of an enemy, nor any certain information as to his movements, they were dismissed, at 9 o'clock, to their breakfasts. The General, after partaking of his morning meal, ordered up two 24-pounder guns, drawn by bullocks, and manned by seamen of the Shannon, and then went to reconnoitre. The aspect of affairs evidently did not satisfy him, for

Windham,
standing on the defensive,

at 11 o'clock he sent down to the camp an order for the whole force to stand to their arms. An hour later, just as the British gun in the intrenchment fired the mid-day signal, he rode into camp. He had scarcely arrived when a heavy cannonade was opened on the right flank of the British. Almost simultaneously a shell exploded over the trees in their front. It was evident that an attack in force had begun on all points.

Cool and prompt in action, Windham at once directed Brigadier Carthew, with the 34th, two companies of the 82nd, and four 6-pounder guns, to take up and hold a position on the right, defending the approaches to the town by the Bithúr road. Carthew at once moved off, detaching the 34th to occupy some gardens on the left of his position, throwing some fifty men of the 82nd into some ruined huts on its right, and covering the guns in the centre with the remainder of the two companies of that regiment. As his brigade, so to call it, was marching to the points indicated, the enemy opened fire upon it at a long range. But so effective was the reply from the 6-pounders and Enfields, so steady and continuous their fire, that the rebels ceased their attack on that side.

In the front, forming the extreme left of his position, Windham had not been so fortunate. He had there five companies of the 2nd battalion Rifle Brigade, the 88th Regiment, two 9-pounder guns, and two 24-pounder howitzers and two 24-pounder guns manned by seamen of the Shannon. To the right of this position, in a wood midway between it and that occupied by Carthew, was posted the main body of the 82nd.

Windham placed the guns in the centre of his position, supporting them by the Rifle Brigade and the 88th on either flank. Before the first gun had been fired, he proceeded himself to the right to watch the attack in that quarter, leaving the left brigade in charge of Colonel Walpole of the Rifle Brigade. The 24-pounder guns were then pushed to the front so within sight of the enemy.* The enemy, on sighting them, fired the first shot from a gun they had placed on the road. The British guns at once replied, but they had not fired two rounds when the rebels opened fire with grape and cannister from batteries in front and on the right flank of Windham's position. So superior, from their immense superiority in the number of guns, was their fire, that Windham, on his return, an hour later, from the right brigade, found that his men were getting all the worst of it.* The rebel leader, with great judgment, kept back his infantry, and fought Windham with his artillery alone. The advantage he derived from his greatly superior numbers was enormous, for those numbers enabled him to form a semicircle round the British position. Any attempt on the part of Windham to break through this semicircle at any point would have placed it in the power of the rebel leader to lap over and overwhelm his far inferior force.

* The Shannon Brigade in India, page 36.

The great superiority of the rebels in artillery makes itself felt.

Windham used all the means in his power to make head against the enemy. Their flanking fire he attempted to silence by turning upon it one of the 24-pounders worked by the men of the Shannon. But all would not do. The position was not tenable against an enemy superior in numbers and who fought only with their guns. To add to his misfortunes, the bullock-drivers, not liking the prospect, deserted as fast as they could, and, as a final blow, ammunition began to run short. Orders were accordingly given to fall back on the brick-kilns, a little to the left of the position Windham had taken up on the night of the 26th. Windham at the same time sent for the 34th to reinforce him, and directed Carthew, by an order twice repeated, to fall back also on the brick-kilns.†

Finding his position untenable, Windham falls back on the brick-kilns, and orders Carthew to do the same.

Carthew, meanwhile, had held the position on the right, and with the force at his disposal he could have continued to hold it. But, at this moment, Windham, to protect his retiring movement, sent for the bulk of the 34th. This regiment, which had covered itself with glory by its repulse of the enemy, was accordingly sent to reinforce the left brigade. It found that brigade in considerable disorder. The two big guns had been for the moment abandoned, and the men were falling back disheartened. The 34th came up in time to take the initiative in dashing at the big guns, and, with the aid of the sailors, in bringing them on with the retreating column.

Before this, Windham had reinforced his left with the 34th, taken from Carthew.

* The casualties had been severe. Amongst the officers, Lieut. Hay, R.N., commanding the detachment of the Shannon men, had been severely wounded. He was afterwards killed in New Zealand.

† Windham stated subsequently that he afterwards countermanded that order, but the countermand never reached Carthew.

Windham
falls back.

But the retiring movement had served as a signal for the enemy to advance. They crowded on in numbers, firing their guns. The English fell back, confused and in disorder, on the brick-kilns. Here it was hoped a stand might be made. It was 5 o'clock, and Windham, thinking the position now reached might be held, and anxious for the condition of the right brigade, weakened by the withdrawal of the 34th, left General Dupuis, R.A., in command, with orders to hold the brick-kilns, if possible, and galloped to the right.

The enemy
follow.

Windham gallops to the right.

But before he could reach the right brigade the order to retire, which he had sent to it, had had its fatal effect. It is true that, weakened by the withdrawal of the 34th, the brigade could with difficulty hold its ground against the enemy pressing on it. But, coping bravely with the difficulty, Carthew did hold it. So convinced was he of the value of the position, that he did not act on the first order which he received. The second order was imperative. He was forced to obey his general, and he fell back.*

Fatal effect of Windham's
reiterated order to Carthew to fall back.

When Carthew reached the brick-kilns, confusion seemed worse confounded. The carriage cattle had been driven off, whilst the tents of the encampment had been struck, and, with most of the heavy baggage, were lying in disorder on the earth. Just then, an order reached Dupuis to fall back on the intrenchment. Windham, as he was riding to look after his right brigade, had received intelligence that the rebels, turning the extreme right

Great confusion at the brick-kilns.

* Captain Drury, who was Brigadier Carthew's brigade-major on this occasion, thus described the situation in a letter to a friend at Madras: "The other position" (Windham's) "of the force had not fared so well, and the General sent for the 34th to strengthen the encampment. Shortly afterwards we were ordered to return to the encampment and occupy some brick-kilns immediately in its rear. This order was repeated, and it was not until the second time that we commenced falling back to the place directed. This order was a grave error. General Windham says he sent a countermand afterwards. That never came."

of his extended position, had occupied the lower part of the city, and were then attacking his last stronghold. Fortunately, at the moment a detachment of the 2nd battalion Rifle Brigade arrived opportunely from Fathpúr. Windham, placing himself at their head, drove the enemy from the lower part of the town, at the same time that he sent the order to Dupuis to fall back on the intrenchment. This movement had been just begun when Windham, riding towards the force after the exploit just recorded, personally directed Carthew to take two companies of the 88th and his four 6-pounders, to return to the position he had vacated on the right, and, on reaching the Bithúr road, to fall back on and occupy the theatre. This building lay about a quarter of a mile south of the intrenchment, and was filled with stores and clothing for the troops.

The rebels attack the intrenchment, but are driven back.

Windham orders a retreat on the intrenchment, but directs Carthew to defend his right.

Whilst the main body, abandoning tents and the soldiers' kits, fell back on the intrenchment, "pursued by the enemy and harassed by musketry,"* Carthew moved to the right to execute Windham's latest order. Between the suburb through which he had to pass and the Bithur road were the abandoned lines of a native regiment. On debouching from the suburb, he saw the enemy's skirmishers feeling their way down the road toward the intrenchment. They were exposing their right flank to Carthew, but the moment they saw him they fell back in soldier-like style and occupied the abandoned lines I have spoken of. But Carthew, sending his men at them with the bayonet, drove them out in fine style, and as far as the Bithúr road. Here he came upon their guns, which at once unlimbered and opened fire. But Chamier's four 6-pounders were at hand. They had had to make a short détour to avoid the narrow streets, but they came up with all possible haste, and, worked magnificently by the swarthy gunners of the Madras army, they silenced and drove back the guns of the enemy. Had Carthew had four companies instead of two, he would have captured the enemy's guns. But it was Carthew moves to the right, and drives back the enemy,

* The Shannon Brigade in India, page 36. A private letter from a soldier of the 34th says: "They took all our kit and encampment, which we saw burning during the night."

growing dark, and his few men were dispersed in skirmishing order. He could not rally in time a sufficient number for a rush.

Carthew had, however, completely fulfilled his instructions. and occupies the theatre. He had gained the Bithúr road. Here he halted, alike to collect his men and show a front to the enemy. But the enemy had had enough of it. He then fell back, unmolested, on the theatre—the one officer in high command who had been victorious in every encounter on that eventful day!

The theatre constituted now the centre of a chain of outposts, forming a semicircle about a quarter of a mile in front of the intrenchment. The left of this semicircle rested on the canal, the right in an outwork on the river Ganges. This outwork was occupied by the 64th. He halts here for the night, barricading a bridge over a deep nullah in his front. Carthew's small force, having just barricaded a bridge in their front over a narrow but deep nullah, bivouacked on the road near the theatre. The 88th occupied the road leading from the canal to the town. The remainder of the force and the guns were withdrawn within the intrenchment.

The laurels of the day rested certainly with the rebels. Remarks on the events of the day. They had driven back the British force, had compelled it to renounce the defence of the town. With a little more enterprise they might probably have cut it off altogether. The fact is, Windham occupied, with seventeen hundred men, a very extended position, and he attempted to defend this position against an enemy computed, erroneously, I think, at twenty-five thousand trained soldiers, but who probably numbered fourteen thousand. It is possible, however, that if he had been content with holding the position he had taken up on the night of the 26th, near the brick-kilns, he could have maintained it. For the right flank of that position was covered by Carthew's brigade and by the linking detachments of the 82nd and 34th. But, by pushing his own brigade forward on the Kalpí road to a position in which its whole front and right flank were exposed to the enemy's fire, he virtually invited defeat. When he at last ordered Dupuis to fall back on the brick-kilns it was too late. His ill-judged order to Carthew, resisted as long as possible by that officer, to abandon the position he had successfully defended, gave an opening to the enemy to penetrate on his right. When, after the evil had so far worked its effect as to necessitate the order to Dupuis to fall back, Windham attempted to repair it by sending back Carthew to his old position, Carthew did, indeed, by a display of skill and daring, prevent the mischief from becoming irremediable. But the position at the brick-kilns, which might have been maintained, had to be abandoned and the town to be sacrificed.

The night passed quietly. The British, that is to say, were not assailed. But the glare of the flames, and the tumult outside their position, proclaimed the triumph of the rebels. A great anxiety reigned within the British lines. Windham passed the night in consultation with the officers he most trusted. At one time he hoped to be able to redeem the past by a night attack on the rebels, but he could obtain no trustworthy information as to the locality of the enemy's guns. Nothing remained to him, then, but to make the best preparations to repel the renewed attack to be expected on the morrow.

That night Windham issued to the senior officers of his force the instructions for carrying out the plan upon which, after mature consideration, he had decided. To Colonel Walpole—commanding five companies of the Rifle Brigade under Lieutenant-Colonel Woodford, two companies of the 82nd Regiment under Lieutenant-Colonel Watson, and four guns—two 9-pounders manned by Madras gunners, and two 24-pounder howitzers manned by Sikhs, under Lieutenant Green, R.A.—he confided the defence of the advanced portion of the town on the left bank of the canal, that is, the portion in the left rear of the brick-kilns separated from them and from the rest of the town by the canal; to Brigadier Carthew—having under him the 34th, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Kelly, the flank companies of the 82nd, and the four Madras 6-pounders under Lieutenant Chamier—the defence of the Bithúr road, in a position more advanced than, and a little to the right of, that occupied the previous day. The intrenchment was entrusted to the care of the 64th under Brigadier N. Wilson, who was also to guard against a turning movement on the right by establishing a post at the Baptist Chapel; whilst Windham himself, having under him the 88th Regiment commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Maxwell, should

The night that followed.

Windham issues instructions for the morrow.

Line of defence entrusted to Walpole, to Carthew,

to Wilson,

Windham

to Windham himself.

defend the portion of the town nearest the Ganges, on the left bank of the canal.

Before the action has begun, the impartial reader cannot but be struck by the disproportionate force allotted to Brigadier Carthew. That officer had to defend the key of the position. He had proved his capacity the day before ; and yet to him, occupying the post which was certain to draw upon him the weight of the enemy's attack, a force was assigned not larger than that given to Walpole, whose position was far more defensible.

Disproportionate force allotted to guard the key of the position.

At daylight on the 28th the several movements indicated took effect. Carthew pushed across the bridge he had barricaded the previous evening with the 34th and guns, covering his flanks with the two companies of the 82nd. He had just reached the point at which the road turned off to the position he was to occupy a little to the right, when the Assistant Quartermaster-General, Captain M'Crea, brought him an order from the General to fall back on to the bridge. This position, then, Carthew took up, covering his left with two companies, occupying with three the ruined houses in the front and on the flanks of the bridge, and keeping the remainder at the bridge. The detached party on the right consisted of one company of the 34th, commanded by Captain Stewart. The house it occupied was a lofty building with a flat roof, and from this roof Stewart noticed the advance of the enemy's artillery to a position whence their guns could bear with decisive effect on the bridge. A zealous, intrepid officer, beloved by the regiment, Stewart posted his men in positions whence they could pick off the enemy's gunners. They succeeded in this task beyond their hopes, in spite of the grape and round shot which came pouring upon them. This state of things continued for more than two hours, from half-past 9 o'clock till noon, the enemy pouring in shot and shell, the 34th and 82nd replying with musketry, and Chamier's two small guns* doing all the mischief of which they were capable. The enemy made no way, but their artillery fire

Carthew, after advancing, is ordered to fall back and defend the bridge.

Captain Stewart.

Successful defence offered by Carthew.

* The other two had been withdrawn, most unnecessarily, to defend the Allahábád road.

did considerable execution, and though they, too, suffered severely from the British fire, their immense superiority in numbers enabled them to fill up vacancies as they occurred.

This was the state of affairs on the right at 12 o'clock. On the left Walpole had received the attack of the enemy. But the enemy's attack on the left bank of the canal, though made in force and with great resolution, was but the adjunct to his main attack on the right. The left advanced position was not the decisive point of the scene of action, yet on this point the British were posted in numbers sufficient to beat back the enemy; and, though Windham from his post to the rear of them sent and brought up supports, those supports were not required to ensure the repulse of the enemy, for Walpole had achieved that result without them.* A real general, having under his command in reserve a fine British Regiment such as was the 88th, seeing that Walpole was able to hold his own, would at once have hurried to the scene of action, which the lay of the ground and the importance of the position to be gained there must have shown him to be the decisive scene. The stores, clothing, and impedimenta of all sorts were on the side which Carthew was defending—not where Walpole was successfully fighting.

But Windham did not possess the coup-d'œil of a general. Instead of hurrying to the support of Carthew, he despatched to him, at 12 o'clock, his Assistant Quartermaster-General, Captain M'Crea, to direct him to advance once again up the road, and promising him that the 64th Regiment under N. Wilson would make a parallel advance on his right. To cover this movement of the 64th, M'Crea took with him, to strengthen that regiment, forty men of a company of the 82nd, till then under Carthew's orders.

That the reader may more clearly comprehend the movements which followed, I may here state that after crossing

Success of Walpole on the left.

Criticisms on Windham's conduct at this conjuncture.

He sends an order to Carthew to advance,

Brigadier
and to Wilson.

* "On the left advance, Colonel Walpole, with the Rifles, supported by Captain Greene's battery, and part of the 82nd Regiment, achieved a complete victory over the enemy, and captured two 18-pounder guns. The glory of this well-contested fight belongs entirely to the above-named companies and artillery."—General Windham's Despatch, 30th November 1857. The italics are mine.

the bridge the road runs up the centre of a parade-ground about six hundred yards long and two hundred yards wide, traversed by a watercourse, and having houses on both sides of it. On the advance being sounded, the three companies which till then had occupied the ruined buildings in front and on the flanks of the bridge pushed across the plain in skirmishing order, in spite of a continual shower of grape from three guns posted at the further end of it. When within about one hundred yards of these, Captain Stewart, who was leading his men in splendid style, was shot through the thigh. The adjutant of the 34th, Leeson, at once supplied his place, but the fire from the front and from the buildings on either side was so hot that it was impossible to reach the guns.

To gain breath, the men lay down in the water-course of which I have spoken, whilst Carthew, mounted, in the middle of the parade-ground, endeavoured to collect a sufficient number of men to make a rush at the enemy. But, crippled by the paucity of his numbers—a paucity caused by the necessity of guarding his left flank—his efforts in this respect were fruitless. He was more successful, however, in his attempt to bring Chamier's two guns to the front. These, unlimbering, replied to the enemy's fire; and, splendidly served by the Madras gunners, in the course of twenty minutes not only silenced it, but compelled the enemy to withdraw their pieces. Then was the chance if Carthew had but had one squadron of horse at his disposal. He had not a single trooper; and just at the moment he discovered that Wilson's attack on his right had failed, and that his right rear was threatened by the rebels.

Captain M'Crea, taking with him forty men of the 82nd, had directed Brigadier Wilson to move to the front parallel with Carthew. The two companies covered the advance, harassed by a fire from six guns in position in their immediate front.* When within about a hundred yards of these guns, the skirmishers charged them and for a few minutes had them in possession. Unfortunately the main body were too far behind, and the rebels, recovering from their first panic, came on in overwhelming numbers, and cut to pieces many of the heroic band of skirmishers. There fell here Brigadier Wilson, Captain M'Crea, Captain Morphy, Major Sterling, Lieutenant McKenna, Lieutenant Gibbins, all nobly fighting. The supports came up only in time to cover the retreat of the few survivors.

* General Windham writes thus in his Despatch: "Brigadier Wilson thought proper, promoted by his zeal for the service, to lead his regiment against four guns placed in front of Brigadier Carthew." Brigadier Wilson did nothing of the sort. The guns upon which he advanced were nearly half a mile from the guns in front of Carthew's troops. They were, as stated in the text, covering the line upon which Windham himself had, by the mouth of M'Crea, ordered Wilson to advance.

exposes Car-
thew's right.

Windham had thus engaged, without supports, his entire right wing on the decisive point of the scene of action. The available

Criticism on Windham conduct at this con-
juncture.

supports were in his own hand on a side part of action, never intended by the enemy to be the decisive point. The advance in parallel lines on the right, ordered by himself, had, owing to one of those accidents always likely to occur in war, failed. Carthew had indeed repulsed the enemy, but he had no men to follow him up. The 64th had been repulsed, and their repulse endangered Carthew's right. Now was the moment when supports would have been invaluable. They might even have changed the face of the day.

His right rear threatened—for the 64th had been gradually forced back on the intrenchment—Carthew very gradually, and showing a bold front to the ever-increasing enemy, fell back on the bridge. But how different was his position here to what it had been in the morning! Then, the bridge was the centre of a chain of posts, both flanks being guarded, and his front covered. Now, the flanking parties had fallen back and he was isolated.

Carthew falls back to his old position,

now scarcely defensible,

Still, Carthew knew the importance of the position, and he resolved to hold it as long as he could. But the enemy's attacks became more and more furious, the number of his guns increased and their fire became more concentrated. Still Carthew did not move. He had but two guns with which to reply, but the gallant Chamier and the sturdy Madrásis worked them with a will.

but which he still bravely defends.

But every moment was pregnant with some new danger for him. The rebels, climbing to the roofs of the houses which the retirement of the 64th and of the detachment which connected him with that regiment had left empty, poured upon the gallant soldiers of the 34th a stream of fire. But the unconquered soldiers of that splendid regiment still held on. Twice did they clear the streets in their front, twice the Church compound on their right. But the continuous stream of fire of which I have spoken would not allow them to hold the positions they had gained at the point of the bayonet. More than that, the enemy shifted their position so that Chamier's guns could no longer bear on any vital point, whilst the fire from the roofs caused the defenders to drop fast.

A strong reinforcement might still have saved the position. Carthew sent for it. Pending its arrival this gallant leader went amongst the men, cheering them, and keeping them to their work. Even when the position had become practically untenable, when the enemy had all but turned his flanks, and when the party he had sent under Colonel Simpson of the 34th to keep open his communications was forced back, he still held on. Still the reinforcements did not come. At last, when it was absolutely certain that unless he were to retire he would be cut off, Carthew reluctantly gave the order—to give which when he could no longer hold out he had the authority of Windham—to fall back on the trenchment.*

All this time where was Windham? Windham was with the victorious left wing, where his presence was not needed. What he was precisely doing, or why he did not hasten to strengthen the key of his position,

Gallantry of the 34th;
and increasing numbers of the enemy.
In spite of Carthew's splendid tenacity,
he is at last compelled to fall back.
Carthew and Windham.

* "I have not the slightest hesitation," wrote, on the 11th December 1857, Lieutenant-Colonel Simpson of the 34th to Brigadier Carthew, "in giving my opinion about the brigade retiring from the position we held on the bridge on the evening of the 28th November. It is my firm conviction that you had no other alternative—that if you had not retired the brigade would have been cut off, as the enemy were completely outflanking us on our left. By your orders I sent round two companies of this regiment to check them, which they did for the moment, but could not make a stand, as they in turn were quite outflanked on their left. When the two officers commanding those companies (officers in whom I have the greatest confidence) came back and told me what was going on, and, from what I saw myself, I spoke to Colonel Kelly, Colonel Gwilt, and one or two more of the regiment, and I myself, and I think others, told you that if we did not retire we should be cut off. You then, reluctantly, gave the order to retire."

may never be known. He never attempted to explain his action. In his dispatch he endeavoured, in the most ungenerous manner, to cast, by implication, the blame of the defeat on Carthew. "Brigadier Carthew," he wrote, "of the Madras Native Infantry, had a most severe and strong contest with the enemy from morning to night; but I regret to add that he felt himself obliged to retire at dark." This passage conveyed to the mind of Sir Colin Campbell the impression that Brigadier Carthew had, at a critical period, retired from his post without orders; and, on the 9th December, he animadverted very severely in an official memorandum on such conduct. When Carthew received the memorandum he took it at once to Windham, who—it will scarcely be credited—advised him not to reply to it. But Carthew had too nice a sense of his own honour to act upon such advice. He not only replied to it, but forced from Windham an acknowledgment that he himself had given the Brigadier authority to retire when he could no longer maintain his position. Upon this, Sir Colin Campbell not only withdrew his censure, but expressed his regret that under an "erroneous impression" he should have given pain to a meritorious officer.*

But,—to return to the question,—where was Windham? I

* Lieut. Charles Windham, R.N., wrote me in 1880, objecting to the account, as given in the text, of the events of the day, especially to the imputation of want of generosity on the part of General Windham towards Brigadier Carthew. Mr. Windham enclosed a pamphlet which his father had written on the subject, the perusal of which, before I had written my history, would, Mr. Windham wrote, have caused me to omit "all allusion to a circumstance which, whilst entirely beyond the control of the general in command, was the one which, above all others, contributed to that result," viz. "the misfortune which befell the civil town—Kánhpúr." The pamphlet sent me by Lieut. Windham consists mainly of an attempt to cast the blame of the defeat upon an officer whose name is not mentioned. Having read it, and having with a view to this edition carefully re-read all the authorities upon which my account is based, I find no reason whatever to alter a single line of this narrative. It is supported in every particular by evidence which cannot be controverted. Before I published it, I sent the chapter in proof to more than one of the officers engaged in the battle upon whose judgment and fairness I could rely, and they testified, in letters I possess, to its absolute correctness. I believe I have rendered full justice to General Windham. To say that he committed one error is not a charge which affects his reputation as a gallant soldier who, on a day of great trial, did many things extremely well. It is pleasing to read that, in the pamphlet sent me, he writes thus of General Carthew: "No one at Cawnpore (Kánhpúr) did better service than this officer."

As he is falling back Carthew receives reinforcements, not begun his retreat, the reinforcement was too small to be of much avail. Windham states that he himself took down this reinforcement, and, returning, ordered up two companies of the 82nd. But it was too late—the mischief had been done; a strong reinforcement an hour earlier might have saved the position. It was not too late in time.

fell back in good order within the intrenchment. It was then quite dark.

He and his officers and men had been for thirty-six hours almost without food and sleep. He had exposed himself to the hottest fire throughout the day. His cool and calm courage had been the admiration of every one. His efforts had been splendidly supported by all under his command. In the 34th alone three officers had been killed and eight wounded. The total number of killed and wounded in Windham's operations up to the night of the 28th amounted to three hundred and fifteen. Carthew brought back with him all his guns.

The plain account I have given of the day's proceedings requires little comment. That Windham was justified in deciding to make an aggressive defence cannot, I think, be questioned. It is the opinion of those best qualified to form an opinion that, regard being had to the enormous superiority of the rebels in artillery, a purely defensive system would have ensured the destruction of his force, and the occupation of Kánhpúr by the rebels, with consequences—Sir Colin and the women and children of the Lakhnao garrison being on the other side of the river—the evil extent of which it would be difficult to exaggerate. Windham, by his military instincts, saved the country from this disaster, and he is entitled to all the credit due to a daring initiative. That the action might have been more skilfully fought is certain; but the aphorism of Napoleon, that in war victory is to the general who makes the fewest mistakes, must never be forgotten. Mistakes will be made; and it should be remembered that this was the first time

Carthew, the 34th, and the rest of his brigade.

Windham's aggressive defence probably saved Kánhpúr.

that Windham had held an independent command in the field.

Both wings fell back that evening into the intrenchment. The town of Kánhpúr, the theatre and the houses, full of clothing and stores, or prepared for the reception of the Lakhnao ladies, fell into the hands of the rebels.

Destruction consequent on the British defeat.

But before the right wing had reached the intrenchment, whilst Carthew, nobly daring, was still holding on to the Baptist Chapel, an event full of importance had occurred. Sir Colin Campbell had arrived, the precursor by a few hours of his army.

CHAPTER IV.

SIR COLIN CAMPBELL RETRIEVES WINDHAM'S DISASTER.

THE second chapter of this book left Sir Colin Campbell, followed by his staff, crossing the bridge of boats into Kánhpúr. The shades of evening were falling, and the light was the short twilight which in India follows the setting of the sun. As he ascended at a gallop the road leading to the gate, some men of the Rifle Brigade, posted on the rampart, recognised their general, and their loud and repeated cheers announced his arrival alike to Windham's soldiers and their enemy. Windham was within the intrenchment, and Sir Colin had hardly reached him when a demand for reinforcements arrived from the Baptist Chapel—a proof that even then Carthew was still, with the small means at his disposal, attempting the impossible. The reinforcements were sent, but they arrived too late, and Carthew fell back in the manner already related. With his arrival within the intrenchment the fighting for the night ceased.

Sir Colin reaches the intrenchment.

Sir Colin remained some time with Windham, listening to his report and asking questions. He then communicated to him his plans. He would recross the river to his camp; as soon as possible the next morning drive the rebels with his guns from the positions they had taken up near the bridge, and then send over his infantry. Sir Colin then rode back to his camp "into which, all night, the guns, stores, women, and sick continued to stream."*

Early the following morning Sir Colin proceeded to execute his plans. Peel's heavy guns had reached the ground, from their march of thirty miles, only an hour before sunrise. The astute leader of the rebel army had noticed with the early light of the morning the mass of soldiers filling the plain on the Oudh bank of the river, and that sight had told him that unless he could break the bridge his chances of ultimate victory would melt away. But there was yet time to break the bridge. He had therefore brought down his heaviest guns to the positions on the banks of the river whence he had the previous day driven the 64th, and had opened upon it a heavy, but fortunately an ill-directed, fire. Sir Colin Campbell had foreseen that the rebels would try this last chance. Allowing, then, the men of the Naval Brigade but one hour for rest and food, he despatched them at sunrise to a point above the bridge of boats whence they could play on the enemy's guns. The artillery fire from the intrenchment was directed to the same point. For some time the artillery combat appeared not unequal, but gradually the guns of the British asserted their superiority. Then commenced the passage of the cavalry, the horse artillery, and of Adrian Hope's brigade. As they crossed, dark masses of smoke mingled with sheets of flame, arising from the store-laden buildings so well defended by Carthew the previous day, proved that the enemy had given up the contest for the bridge, and that they had set fire to the stores to cover their change of position. But it was yet possible that they might attempt a counter-stroke on the weakened camp, crowded with non-combatants, on the Oudh bank of the river. The upper course of the river was in their possession; they had numberless boats at their command. What could be easier than to take advantage of the divided state of the British force and overwhelm the weaker portion? But the contingency had entered into the calculations of Sir Colin. By 9 o'clock he had crossed the troops I have already mentioned. On reaching the Kánhpúr bank he directed these to take up a position facing the city, their right resting on a point near the intrenchment, their left stretching towards the grand trunk road. As soon as they had done this, Sir Colin crossed himself and established his headquarters on the Kánhpúr side, leaving Brigadier Inglis to protect the convoy until all the troops should have passed over. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon the passage of the convoy commenced. During that

The rebels attempt to break the bridge of boats.

Sir Colin, foreseeing the attempt, baffles them.

The enemy fire the captured stores.

Sir Colin takes measures to meet every eventuality and every attack.

The passage of the troops continues without a break till the evening of the 30th.

Nov. 30.

afternoon, during the ensuing night, and till 6 o'clock on the evening of the 30th, the passage of the convoy and of the troops forming the rear-guard continued. Practically it was not interrupted by the rebels, and by the hour I have mentioned it was accomplished. The ladies and children, sick and wounded, were taken across the canal to a camp on the plain near "the mouldering remains and riddled walls of the position Wheeler had held so long."

The rebels still continued to hold the town and the line of the canal passing through it to the westward. They were in considerable numbers, had a strong force of artillery, were flushed with victory, and they had as their leader a man of very great natural ability. They were evidently resolved to try conclusions with Sir Colin, and they had perhaps some reason for believing that even Sir Colin might find it a very difficult, perhaps an impossible, task to drive them from the position they had occupied.

That position was, indeed, extremely strong. "Their left," to quote from the actor in the scene whose graphic journal I have so largely used,* "was posted among the wooded high grounds, intersected with nullahs, and thickly sprinkled with ruined bungalows and public buildings, which lie between the town of Kánhpúr and the Ganges. Their centre occupied the town itself, which was of great extent, and traversed only by narrow winding streets, singularly susceptible of defence. The portion of it facing the intrenchment was uncovered; but from the camp of our army it was separated by the Ganges canal. . . . Their right stretched out behind this canal into the plain, and they held a bridge over it, and some lime-kilns and mounds of brick in its front. The camp of the Gwáliár contingent was situated in this plain, about two miles in rear of the right, at the point where the Kalpí road comes in." The reader will be able the better to picture to himself the position if he will bear in mind that the right of the enemy was in the position whence they had dislodged Windham on the 27th; the left, that whence they had driven Carthew and Wilson on the 28th; and that the town, between the two, and up to the Ganges canal, formed the centre. This position was held by an enemy whose numbers were at the time com

Confidence of
the rebels.

Great strength of their position.

* Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

puted at twenty-five thousand men, with forty guns. It is certain that, even granting the correctness of this computation, the number of their trained soldiers did not exceed fourteen thousand.

Their numbers.

To attack a position so strong, and so numerously guarded, Sir Colin felt that he would require the services of all the men of whom he could dispose. It was then, obviously, a main condition to despatch to Allahábád the ladies and children, the sick and wounded, before engaging in an action. Victorious though he felt he would be, the presence of the convoy near the battlefield, whilst constituting a danger to its members, would deprive him of the troops necessary to protect it against contingencies. His first care, then, was to arrange for the despatch of the convoy.

As a preliminary to attacking them,

I have already stated that, by 6 o'clock on the evening of the 30th November, every man, woman, and child had crossed into Kánhpúr. The days of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd December were devoted to the perfecting of arrangements for the despatch of the convoy to Allahábád. The rebels did not fail occasionally to remind the Commander-in-Chief of their presence. On the first they attacked the British outposts.

Dec. 1-3.

Sir Colin arranges to despatch the ladies and children to Allahábád.

Although they were not in great force, and were easily repulsed they managed, nevertheless, to effect some damage. Ewart, of the 93rd, whose gallantry at the storming of the Sikandarbágh will be remembered, had his left arm carried away by a round shot, his regiment being at the time under cover of the unfinished barracks. On the 2nd the rebels opened a very brisk cannonade, apparently pointed at the tents occupied by Sir Colin Campbell and the head-quarter staff. The cannonade became so pronounced, that the Commander-in-Chief detached a body of riflemen to occupy some houses near the canal, commanding the position occupied by the battery which was annoying him. This movement compelled the enemy to withdraw.

The enemy try to interrupt him.

At length the arrangements for the transport of the convoy were completed. The communications between Kánhpúr and Allahábád, interrupted during Sir Colin's absence, had been restored, and, on the night of the 3rd December, the convoy, composed of the women and children who had survived the dangers and trials of the siege of Laknao, of the wounded

The convoy starts on the night of the 3rd December.

Dec. 3.

who had shared those dangers and trials, or who had bled to relieve them, started for Allahábád. If for them war ceased thenceforth to be an affair of personal concern, inasmuch as they were no longer exposed to the fire of the enemy, the memory of its dread effects could not fail to accompany them. The sufferings of more than a lifetime had for many of that gentle cohort been crowded into the brief period of three months. There were few amongst them who had not experienced the loss of some one near and dear to them, of a husband, a child, a relation; and, rescued though they were, many were still leaving behind to the chances of death from a ruthless enemy the one dear companion, without whom the burden of life would be indeed hard to bear.

Relieved from the anxiety which the presence of such a convoy within his lines could not fail to produce, Sir Colin Campbell prepared to attack the enemy. One strong reason moved him to delay still for a few days. For, whilst the convoy was near, it was always possible for the rebels, though beaten in action, to double round and destroy it. He wished, too, to arrange for the disposition of those slightly wounded men whom it had not been considered necessary to despatch to Allahábád. These were brought within the intrenchment.

In spite of the check given to them on the 2nd, the rebels still continued their attacks on the British position. On the 4th, they floated down the Ganges a number of fire-boats, which, carried by the current against the bridge of boats, should set it on fire. This attempt was detected in sufficient time to cause it to be frustrated. On the afternoon of the 5th, they opened a heavy fire of artillery on the left pickets, whilst they threatened, or seemed to threaten, to turn that flank with infantry. The enemy's artillery fire gradually extended along their whole front. It needed a considerable display of troops and a continuous fire from the British guns to force them to cease their attack. Sir Colin Campbell determined it should be their last. He would himself take the initiative the next day.

I have already described the position held by the rebels. The reader will not have failed to perceive that whilst it was strong, and, in a military sense, unassailable in the centre and on the left—as, whilst that left rested on the Ganges, both it and the centre and part of

The attack delayed till the convoy should be out of distance.

The rebels still endeavour to harass Sir Colin.

Dec. 4-5.

The one weak point of the position of the rebels

the right were enormously strengthened by the possession of buildings, bridges, narrow streets, and winding lanes—the extreme right was comparatively weak. It was weak because it rested almost without cover on a broad plain, intersected only by the canal. This canal, whilst it covered the centre and right, could be crossed in front of the latter only by two bridges. Whilst assailable with difficulty in front, the right was thus liable to be turned and driven in on its centre. This turning movement promised, moreover, another advantage. The troops executing that movement would naturally seize the Kálpí road—which formed, so to speak, a prolongation of the ground occupied by the enemy's right wing; and the seizure of that road, by depriving the Gwáliár troops of their natural line of retreat, would drive them, were the execution to correspond with the design, into the British net. This idea decided Sir Colin's plans. He resolved to mass the largest number of troops on his left—the decisive point—to attack and defeat the enemy's right before it could receive assistance from the centre; then, taking possession of the Gwáliár camp, establish himself on the Kálpí road, and striking at the enemy's communications, compel him to renounce the strong positions occupied by his centre and left.

Dec. 5.

is detected by
Sir Colin.

One word as to the number and composition of the enemy's force. I have already said that it has been computed at twenty-five thousand men with forty guns. But, I repeat, it is difficult to believe that more than one half of these, or, at the outside, fourteen thousand, were trained soldiers. The Gwáliár contingent was composed of four companies of artillery, two regiments of cavalry, and seven regiments of infantry, a total of about seven thousand men. There may have been in addition an equal number of trained Sipáhi regiments, some of which had attached themselves to Náná Sáhib—who commanded on the left—in the earlier period of the mutiny, others which had come in from Bundelkhand and Central India. The remainder of the force consisted of the adherents of the Rání of Jhánsí, attached to the Gwáliár troops on the right; and of the undisciplined and irregular followers of Naná Sáhib and of other discontented landowners on the left.

Reasons for limiting the number of the trained soldiers of the enemy.

Sir Colin's Campbell's force consisted of about five thousand infantry, six hundred cavalry, and thirty-five guns. His infantry were divided into four brigades. That called the 3rd, commanded by Brigadier Greathed, consisted of the wasted remnant of the 8th, of the 64th, and of the 2nd Panjáb Infantry; the 4th, under Adrian Hope, was composed of the 53rd Foot, the 42nd and 93rd Highlanders, and the 4th Panjáb Rifles; the 5th, commanded by Inglis, counted the 23rd Fusiliers, the 32nd Regiment, and the 82nd; the 6th, led by Walpole, was formed of the 2nd and 3rd battalions Rifle Brigade, and a detachment of the 38th Regiment. The cavalry was the same as that which we have already seen doing such good service at the relief of Lakhnao—the 9th Lancers, and detachments of the 1st, 2nd, and 5th Panjáb Cavalry, and Hodson's Horse, commanded by the same gallant leader, Brigadier Little. The artillery consisted of the guns of the Naval Brigade, led by William Peel, of the troops of Blunt and Remington, of the batteries of Bouchier, Middleton, Smith, Longden, and Bridge, commanded in chief by Dupuis. The engineer brigade, the same as that which had served in Oudh, was commanded by Colonel Harness. To Windham was consigned the command of the intrenchment—a command, it will be seen, of considerable importance. Hope Grant acted, nominally, in command of the whole force, but his real position was that of second to Sir Colin Campbell.

The advanced positions of the British force occupied the suburb called Generalganj, an old bazaar of very considerable extent along the canal, facing the centre of the enemy. This post had been held since the 30th by Greathed, and upon him and his brigade had fallen the brunt of the skirmishing of the subsequent days. Sir Colin's plan of attack was simple. Whilst Greathed should continue to occupy his position facing the enemy, Windham was to open on the enemy's left from the intrenchment a very heavy fire, so as to draw the attention of the rebel leaders to that point. The rest of the infantry, meanwhile, were to be massed in contiguous columns behind, and covered from view by, the old cavalry lines, buildings to the left rear of Greathed's position, and communicating by a cross road running immediately in their rear, at a distance of rather less than half a mile, with the grand trunk road. As soon as Windham's fire should produce the intended effect, the turning movement would be attempted. To facilitate this,

Number and composition of the British force.

Position occupied by the British force.

Sir Colin's plan of attack.

certain orders were given to Greathed and to the other brigadiers, the purport of which the narrative of the action will disclose.

Early on the morning of the 6th December, Sir Colin Campbell struck his camp, and, to avoid the slightest risk of accident, despatched it to the river side under a guard. This having been accomplished, and the men having breakfasted, Windham, at 9 o'clock, opened fire. The enemy promptly replied, and in a few moments the earth shook with the noise of a terrific artillery combat. Under cover of this fire, the infantry were massed in the position I have indicated, whilst the cavalry and horse artillery were held in readiness, at the same time, to cover the turning movement and to make a détour to the left, and, crossing the canal by an unguarded bridge about a mile and a half further up, to threaten the enemy's rear, and to cut him off or intercept him when defeated.

Sir Colin begins the action at 9 o'clock on the 6th December with a fire of artillery.

Dec. 6.

The artillery duel continued about two hours. gradually slackened, and Greathed, in pursuance of his instructions, moved forward on to the canal, occupying the houses near it and from them opening a severe musketry fire on the enemy's centre. At the same time the main body proceeded to carry out the plan confided to them.

It then

Greathed makes a false attack on the centre,

The position assigned to each brigade may thus be stated. Walpole, with the sixth, immediately on Greathed's left, was to cross the canal above the town, and, advancing along its face, was to mask every gate, and prevent the enemy from affording assistance to their right wing. Meanwhile, on his left, which was the extreme left, Adrian Hope would debouch with the fourth brigade, supported by Inglis with the fifth, and carry out the turning movement.

whilst Walpole, Hope, and Inglis prepare to turn the right.

When, then, the fire of the artillery slackened, and the rattle of Greathed's musketry was heard, Walpole, assisted by Smith's battery, dashed with his riflemen at the bridge, crossed the canal, and moved along the outskirts of the western face of the town. As he did this, a strong fire opened from the heavy guns of the Naval Brigade, and from Bouchier's and Longden's batteries massed on the left.

Walpole crosses the canal.

The fire had scarcely opened when Adrian Hope brought his brigade into the open, supported by that of Inglis, and covered by the cavalry and horse artillery. The dust raised by the progress of the latter effectually concealed from the enemy the movements of the infantry. They marched to the left, in the direction given by the cross road already indicated. Suddenly, when they reached a point rather beyond a line parallel with the brick-kilns which played so prominent a part in Windham's fight of the 27th, the infantry brigades brought forward their left shoulders—the cavalry and horse artillery still continuing their forward movement parallel with the canal. Hope had covered his advance with the Sikhs of the 4th Panjáb Rifles in skirmishing order, supported by the 53rd. As these gallant men pushed forward, there opened upon them a very heavy fire of shot and shell from the enemy's guns posted behind the canal. At the same time masses of the rebel infantry, protected by the brick-kilns and by mounds formed by the operation of brick-making, poured in a rattling fire of musketry. But the attacking troops were not to be baulked. The Sikhs, splendidly supported by the 53rd, rushed on at the double, and, driving the enemy from the mounds, gained for themselves a momentary shelter. Only momentary, however.

Adrian Hope turns the right of the rebels.

Splendid conduct of the 4th Panjáb Sikhs and the 53rd.

the bridge bridge had

Obeying an order conveyed to them, they rushed at over which the rebels had fallen back. But the been well cared for by the enemy. Upon it

Firm resistance of the enemy at the canal.

guns were pointed, whilst the rallying infantry of the enemy, recovering heart, again poured upon the skirmishers incessant volleys. For a moment the struggle seemed doubtful, when a rumbling sound was heard,

William Peel brings up a 24-pounder and opens fire.

and William Peel and his sailors, dragging with them a heavy 24-pounder, came up with a run, dashed through the skirmishers, planted the gun on the bridge, and opened fire. The effect of this splendid deed was electric. Whilst it roused the assailants to the wildest enthusiasm, it completely cowed the enemy. Highlanders, Sikhs, and 53rd, dashing by the gun, or fording the canal, rushed on the enemy, and, capturing their guns, drove them back in the wildest

The canal is forced, disorder. The Gwáliár camp was now almost within their grasp.

But, before the infantry could reach it, the battery of the gallant Bouchier, always in the

and the enemy are beaten.

front, passed them at a gallop, and, unlimbering, opened fire. In a few minutes the infantry had repassed them, and the Gwáliár camp was their own.*

Sir Colin Campbell joined his two left brigades at the enemy's camp. His measures had been completely successful. Windham's bombardment of the rebels' left had concentrated their attention on that quarter; then Greathed's threatened attack on their centre so far imposed upon them, that they made no attempt, as a really capable general assuredly would have done, to pierce that—the weakest point of the British line; Walpole had successfully prevented the centre from debouching by the western faces of the town to support their right. Adrian Hope and Inglis, Peel, Bouchier, and the gallant officers with their brigades and batteries, had done the rest. There was but one drawback to his complete satisfaction. The guide sent with the cavalry and horse artillery had misled them, and they were not on the spot when the camp fell into our hands. They came up shortly afterwards, however, in time to join in the pursuit which Sir Colin at once directed along the Kalpi road, and which was continued by Sir Colin in person to the fourteenth milestone.†

General view of the action.

The enemy are pursued along the Kalpi road.

Completeness of the victory over the Gwáliár
troops.

It was a great victory. The most formidable portion of the enemy's army, the Gwáliár contingent, had been completely defeated; their camp, with all their stores, magazines, and a part of their matériel, had been captured. In a word, the right wing of the

* "So complete was the surprise, so unexpected the onslaught, that the chapátis were found heating upon the fires, the bullocks stood behind the hackeries, the sick and wounded were lying in the hospitals; the smith left his forge, and the surgeon his ward, to fly from the avenging bayonets. Every tent was found exactly as its late occupants had sprung from it."—Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

† "For two miles without a check the pursuit was carried on by the battery alone" (Bouchier's), "accompanied by Sir Hope Grant and his staff. Four times in that distance did we come into action, to clear our front and flanks, until General Grant, thinking wisely we were too far from our supports, determined to wait until the cavalry arrived. A halt was called; not until it was required, for the horses, though in the condition of racers, had felt the pace. A small cloud coming nearer and nearer is seen on the left. The head of the cavalry column debouches from a grove. The order for a further pursuit is given. The cavalry spread like lightning over the plain in skirmishing order. Sir Colin takes the lead. The pursuit is continued to the fourteenth milestone, assuming all the character of a fox-hunt."—Bouchier's Eight Months' Campaign against the Bengal Sepoys.

rebel army, its head, its brain, had been severed from the body.

The centre and left of the enemy were thus cut off, shut up in Kánhpúr. They had but one line of possible retreat, that by the Bithúr road.

On the Bithúr road, due north of the city, and immediately in rear of the enemy's left, was a large tank, known as the Subahdár's Tank. As the Commander-in-Chief had cut them off on the right, and Greathed and Windham had imposed upon them in front, the occupation of this position would, Sir Colin Campbell felt, force the surrender of the entire force of the enemy.

Before, then, he had started to pursue the beaten right wing, he ordered a force to occupy it at once. Whether he felt his presence more necessary with the pursuers, or whether, in the generosity of his heart, he desired to give a chance to one of his generals, I know not. But, considering the regard, almost amounting to affection, he felt for the officer whom he did select for this duty, it is, I think, probable that he was anxious to give him an opportunity of distinguishing himself as a commander. This officer was the Chief of the Staff, Major-General William Mansfield.

General Mansfield was, in many respects, a remarkable man. Tall, and soldierly in appearance, it was impossible for any one to look at his face without feeling certain that the man before whom he stood possessed more than ordinary ability. Conversation with him always confirmed this impression. Mansfield was a man of more than ordinary ability. He could write well, he could speak well, he was quick in mastering details, he possessed the advocate's ability of making a bad cause appear a good one. He had that within him to procure him eminence in any profession, excepting one. He was not, and could never have become, a great soldier. Possessing undoubted personal courage, he was yet not a general at all, except in name. The fault was not altogether his own. Nature, kind to him in many other respects, had denied him the penetrating glance which enables a man to take in, on the instant, the exact lay of affairs in the field. His vision, indeed, was so defective that he was forced to depend for information regarding the most trivial movements upon the report of others. This was in itself a great misfortune. It

The centre and left still shut up in Kánhpúr.

Their line of retreat.

Sir Colin, before pursuing the Gwáliár troops, sends Mansfield to occupy that line of retreat.

General Mansfield.

was, in the case of Mansfield, made irreparable by a haughtiness and innate reserve which shrank from reliance upon any one but himself. He disliked advice, and though swayed, perhaps too easily, by those whom he loved and trusted, he was impatient of even the semblance of control from men who were brought in contact with him only officially and in a subordinate position. Hence it was that, when in independent command, unable to take a clear view himself, he failed to carry out the action which, to so clever a man, would undoubtedly have recommended itself, had he had the leisure to study it over a map, in the solitude of his closet.

General Mansfield took with him the whole of the infantry with which Sir Colin had turned the enemy's right wing, with the exception of the 23rd and a wing of the 38th, which he left to guard the captured camp.

The troops with Mansfield.

It was about 2 o'clock in the afternoon. Mansfield advanced, the Rifles skirmishing in front, the heavy guns following, then the main body, the 93rd Highlanders in reserve. The position on which Mansfield was ordered to march—and which, if properly occupied, would completely cut off the enemy—was one to the north of and close to the Subahdár's Tank. Driving the enemy before him, he marched to this point, and there halted.

He advances towards the Subahdár's Tank.

He then ordered the infantry to lie down. He could not see, and would not believe, that he had placed them in a position where they could not act, and in which, if the enemy had had any audacity, they might easily have been cut off from the rest of the force. But the enemy had but one idea, that of escaping. The troops were held back, apparently to facilitate their escape. Their indignation was unbounded. More than one senior officer pointed out to Mansfield the golden opportunity he was losing. But he could not be persuaded to do more than to withdraw his infantry from the false position in which he had placed them. He still insisted on keeping back his men, whilst the horse and the foot and the artillery of the rebels filed down the road to Bithúr.

Consequence of his defective vision.

Indignation of the troops.

This passive action not only rendered the movement to the Subahdár's Tank useless, but, in accordance with the invariable rule of warfare of India, it emboldened the enemy to venture an artillery attack upon the stationary British. This, indeed, was repelled, but

The enemy are emboldened, and carry off their guns to Bithúr.

Mansfield still allowed the enemy to carry off all their guns without let or hindrance.*

The left wing and centre of the enemy thus succeeded in making good their retreat on Bithúr. Thus it came about that the victory, though great, was not absolutely decisive, for Mansfield's inaction had made it necessary to follow it up with another blow.

Dec. 8. Giving his men one clear day's rest, Sir Colin detailed a body of troops for this duty on the 8th. The officer he selected this time to command was Hope Grant—a tried, daring, noble-hearted soldier.

At 1 o'clock in the afternoon of the 8th, Hope Grant set out on his mission. He had with him Adrian Hope's brigade, composed of the 42nd and 93rd Highlanders and 4th Panjáb Rifles; five hundred and fifty-one cavalry; Middleton's field battery, Remington's troop of horse artillery, and a hundred sappers, or about two thousand seven hundred men of all arms. It was known that the rebels had retreated by the Bithúr road; but, as it was considered far from improbable that they might attempt to cross into Oudh by the Sarai ferry, about three miles from Sheorájpúr, Grant had received discretionary power to change his route in that direction.

Dec. 9. In the course of his march Grant, careful to examine the traces of the retreat, satisfied himself that the rebels had taken the road leading to the ferry. He therefore continued his march, halting only at sunset for a light meal, direct to Sheorájpúr. He reached that place a little before daylight. Leaving here, under a small guard, the impedimenta not absolutely necessary for combat, Grant dashed across the country with the bulk of his force for the ferry. When within about a mile of it, he galloped to the front to

* "Their guns might have been taken," wrote Mansfield, in his despatch, "but I refrained from giving the necessary order, being aware that it was contrary to your Excellency's wish to involve the troops among the enclosures and houses of the new cantonments," &c. Whether Sir Colin Campbell was satisfied with this explanation may be doubted. Let the reader contrast the notice in his despatch, without comment, of Mansfield's inaction, with his laudatory remarks in the same despatch on Hope Grant's operations two days later. With respect to the absolute correctness of the account in the text of Mansfield's operations, I appeal with confidence to the surviving officers of the 93rd and of the other regiments present on the occasion.

reconnoitre. Whilst thus engaged, the men of his escort were fortunate enough to capture alive a trooper of the rebel force. From this man Grant learned that he had arrived in time; that the rebel guns were on the banks of the river, and that the crossing was to take place that day. Having satisfied himself that the man had told the truth, Grant sent back orders for the cavalry, guns, and infantry to come on with all speed. The remainder of the story is best told in the words of the noble and gallant soldier who commanded.* “The narrow road ran sometimes parallel to, and sometimes through, a sort of quicksand. Under a high bank, and close to the river, we found the long-sought-for 24-pounder † embedded up to its axle-trees. We had great difficulty in getting our guns over this bad ground; but at last we reached sounder soil, and then we advanced rapidly. As soon as we came within one thousand yards of the enemy, a tremendous fire opened upon us; but Lieutenant Warren, a fine young fellow, who commanded the leading guns, never stopped until within five hundred or six hundred yards of the rebels, when he opened fire on them. In a few minutes Captain Middleton joined him with the remainder of the battery. Captain Remington now galloped up with his troop, and came into action in an excellent position behind a bank, at a range of two hundred yards or less. This concentrated artillery-fire told with such terrible effect upon the enemy, crowded into a mass, with their guns, bullocks, baggage, that they gave way and retreated as fast as possible along the river bank, where it would have been difficult to pursue them in force, owing to the marshy state of the ground. However, the irregular cavalry managed to overtake and to cut up some of them. My gallant regiment, the 9th Lancers, was in support of our batteries. We captured fifteen of the enemy’s guns, with the finest bullocks I ever saw, belonging to the Gwáliár contingent. We were only just in time; for, as we came up to the ferry, we found the rebels preparing to embark the guns in some boats which

He finds
them,

and defeats
them, capturing their guns.

* Incidents in the Sepoy War, compiled from the private journals of General Sir Hope Grant, G.C.B.

† This was one of the two 24-pounders captured in the Kalpi road on the 6th, but which mysteriously disappeared whilst our troops were continuing the pursuit.

they had collected for the purpose." A gallant and effective deed of arms, told in the modest language eminently characteristic of the chief actor in the scene! But Hope Grant was as modest as he was daring, as careless of self as he was prodigal of his zeal. His forced march of twenty-five miles, and the prompt movement which followed it, enabled him to repair to a great extent the mismanagement at the Subahdár's Tank on the 6th.

The rebel army was now utterly crushed. In the two days' fight, the 6th and the 9th, it had lost thirty-two guns, a strong position, and a vast number of killed. The two parts of which its army was composed had been for ever separated; the one driven headlong to Kalpí; the other, prevented from crossing into Oudh, had fled without its guns to Bithúr, there still within our reach. These great results had been accomplished by the British with a loss to them of only ninety-nine killed and wounded!*

The battle established the right of Sir Colin Campbell to be regarded as a great commander. In attacking with five thousand men an army of fourteen thousand regular troops, in addition to some odd thousands of irregulars, occupying a very strong position, it was necessary to run some risk; and there can be no doubt that in leaving Greathed's weak brigade, not exceeding a thousand men, to guard his centre whilst he massed the rest of his army against the extreme right of the enemy, Sir Colin did leave an opening of which a Napoleon or a Frederick would have taken advantage. But the great thing for a general is to know when to dare. Sir Colin knew that the opponents' general was neither a Napoleon nor a Frederick, and that the soldiers he commanded were neither Frenchmen nor Prussians. He felt that with his actual opponents he could take liberties which they would not resent. It is true that he risked his centre, but the false attack which it made reduced all danger in that quarter to a minimum. Knowing his enemy, as he did, it was a sound and daring policy, a policy certain to obtain the end he was aiming at—that of preventing an attack—to order Greathed to feign an onslaught on the enemy's position at the moment he was about to hurl the bulk of his forces against their right wing. This movement would appear to the enemy the necessary corollary of the heavy artillery fire to which they had been subjected from the intrenchment. The plan succeeded, as it eminently deserved to succeed. Completely imposed upon, the enemy's centre and left remained quiet whilst their right was being destroyed. They allowed the centre to be hemmed in in front by Greathed's weak brigade, and on the right by Walpole—and why? Simply because Greathed and Walpole played offensive and not defensive parts. Sir Colin understood Indian warfare well, and he knew that attack almost invariably made up for inferiority in numbers.

* The official return was: two subalterns, one sergeant, ten rank and file, killed; two field officers, three captains, four subalterns, one staff-sergeant, five sergeants, seventy-one rank and file, wounded.

The theoretical weakness in his plan of attack was, then, under the circumstances of the case, no weakness at all. The plan was admirably adapted to the occasion, and the execution was worthy of the general. It was no barren victory. One section of the rebel army did indeed escape, though with heavy loss, to Kalpí, but the other, forced to evacuate the town, was pursued to the Ganges, and deprived of its power for mischief on the banks of that river.

Nor did Bithúr itself escape. Sir Colin Campbell, on receiving from Hope Grant a report of his success, directed that officer to march at once on the residence of Náná Sáhib and destroy it. Grant set out on the 11th. He found the place evacuated. He carried out his orders by blowing up the temple and burning the palace. Amongst the booty discovered in a large well contiguous to the palace were “some curious pots, lamps which seemed of Jewish manufacture, and spoons of a barbaric weight. All were of the purest metal, and all bore an appearance of antique magnificence.”

Of the large programme Sir Colin Campbell had sketched out for his operations in the North-west Provinces and Oudh, the two first had now been accomplished. He had relieved Lakhnao, and he had utterly defeated the rebel army threatening Kánhpúr. His way was now clear for the performance of the third act of the drama—the opening communications between Kánhpúr and the Panjáb. This accomplished, he would be free to take vengeance on Lakhnao, and to reconquer Rohilkhand.

It is necessary that the reader should bear in mind that, whilst the main action of the campaign rested with the army led by the Commander-in-Chief, there were other actors who contributed effectively,

Dec. 9-11.

Bithúr is destroyed.

Two parts of Sir Colin's plans have been accomplished.

Minor parts of the great scheme to be considered.

though on a smaller scale, to bring to a perfect conclusion the general scheme which had been sketched out. In a previous chapter* I have referred to the order given to Colonel Seaton to escort a convoy from Áligarh to the south-west. His movements, which would also serve to reopen completely communication with the north-west, will be noticed in the next chapter. I shall then have to transport the reader to the east and north-east, to witness the other operations, conducted by columns under Brigadiers Franks and Rowcroft, and by the Nipalese force under Jang Bahádur, having for their object to co-operate in the fourth great movement contemplated by Sir Colin Campbell—the re-conquest of Lakhnao.

* Page 83.

CHAPTER V.

FURTHER OPERATIONS IN THE DUÁB.

AFTER the decisive actions of the 6th and 9th December, Sir Colin Campbell was naturally desirous to push on-wards whilst the memory of the defeat of the rebels should be yet fresh in the minds of the combatants and their sympathisers. But there was one material difficulty in the way of his progress. His means of transport were restricted. It had taxed his energies to the utmost to procure carriage in sufficient abundance to serve for the transit of the ladies and children, sick, and wounded, he had rescued from the Residency. These, to the number of at least two thousand, had been sent to Allahábád. In leaving Outram with four thousand men at the Álambágh, he had supplied him with the means of moving his troops in case of necessity. For his own entire army, forced to march rapidly a distance of fifty miles, he had not retained the wherewithal to enter upon a harassing campaign. He could equip a column, but not an army. The supply of camels from northern and central India was cut off. He was forced, then, to remain inactive until the carriage conveying the convoy of ladies should return from Allahábád.

Sir Colin's movements hampered by want of carriage.

December.

This carriage did not reach Kánhpúr till 23rd December. Meanwhile Sir Colin had been maturing his plans. Fathgarh—the Fathgarh whose Nawáb, the Nawáb of Farrukhábád, had cast in his lot with the rebels, and had aided the mutinous Sipáhis in the destruction of our countrymen*—Fathgarh was the first point to be attacked. The occupation of this place, about midway between Allahábád and Dehlí, would complete the command over the Duáb, which had been secured only partially by the reconquest of Dehlí and the maintenance of Ágra and Allahábád. That point regained, Rohilkhand would still remain to be conquered and Lakhnao to be regained. To quench the embers of the insurrection in the minor places on the left bank of the Jamnah, and to the east of Allahábád, flying columns would, it was hoped, prove sufficient.

The carriage arrives,

* Vide Volume III. pp. 230-2.

Sir Colin Campbell's movements against Fathgarh were planned with his usual caution. Availing himself of Seaton's march from Áligarh, he directed Walpole to make a semicircular sweep by the Kalpí road viá Akbarpúr to Itáwah and Mainpúrí, at once threatening the Kalpí force and clearing of rebels the districts dependent upon Ágra. At Mainpúrí Walpole would effect a junction with Seaton, who was to wait for him there. These, uniting their forces, were then to march on Fathgarh, upon which place the Commander-in-Chief would move by the direct road from Kánhpúr. In recounting these separate movements, I propose to follow first Walpole, then Seaton; then, leaving the two combined, to proceed to the leader, who had the shortest distance to traverse, and upon whom it would devolve to fight the decisive battle.

Walpole, taking with him the 2nd and 3rd battalions Rifle Brigade, a detachment 38th Foot Bouchier's battery, Blunt's troop of horse artillery, and one company of sappers, set out on the morning of the 18th December. The column marched by Akbarpúr to Itáwah without adventure of any kind. Itáwah had been plundered in the early days of the mutiny.* It was now a wreck; the church, the court-house, the private residences were in ruins; but it was held by the rebels.

On learning of Walpole's approach the majority of these men evacuated the place. A few fanatics, however, occupying a covered, square, loop-holed enclosure, determined to hold on to the last. Few in number, armed only with muskets, they were animated by a spirit fiercer even than the spirit of despair—by a determination to die martyrs to their cause. Walpole reconnoitred the place. It was, for a place to stop an army, insignificant. It could easily be stormed. Yet to storm it in the face of its occupants would cost valuable life, and it seemed that easier and less costly means were available.

* Volume III. pp. 106-8.

These easy means were at first tried. Hand grenades were thrown in; an attempt was made to smoke out the occupants with burning straw. But all in vain. Through their loop-holes the rebels poured in a constant and effective fire on the assailants, and for three hours kept them at bay. At last it was resolved to blow up the whole place. For this purpose Bouchier, aided by Scratchley of the Engineers, made a mine, with a number of his gun cartridges. The explosion of this conferred on the defenders the martyrs' honours they coveted. It buried them in the ruins.

The place they occupy is blown up.

This happened on the 29th December. The column marched without further adventure to Mainpúri, and the following day, the 3rd February, joined Brigadier Seaton's force at Bepar, fifteen miles distant, on the road to Fathgarh.

Walpole reaches Mainpúri.

Meanwhile Seaton, appointed to the command of the force ordered to escort to Kánhpúr a large convoy of grain and stores,* had set out on the 9th December for Áligarh. He had under him, of artillery, two hundred and thirty-three men, manning six 9-pounder guns, two 6-pounders, two 18-pounders, one 8-inch howitzer, and two 5½-inch mortars; of cavalry, a squadron of the Carabineers, and a few of the 9th Lancers, a hundred and forty in all, and Hodson's Horse, five hundred and fifty strong, led by Hodson; of infantry, the 1st Fusiliers, three hundred and seventy-six strong; the 7th Panjáb Infantry, five hundred and forty strong; of sappers, a hundred and twenty. He was joined on the march by Wale's Horse and some Sikhs.

Composition of Seaton's force.

The night before Seaton left Dehli he was informed that a considerable body of rebels had assembled in the Áligarh district, and that they were threatening to attack the small force with which Colonel Farquhar held it. With characteristic vigour, Seaton, in spite of his convoy, proceeded to Áligarh by forced marches.

Seaton, learning that the rebels are in the Áligarh district,

Arriving there, he placed his convoy under the guns of the Áligarh fort, made arrangements for a field hospital, rid himself of every ounce of extra baggage, and, taking with him a small portion of the fort garrison (a hundred men of the 3rd Europeans) under Major Eld, set out to join Farquhar. He found him encamped at a place called marches against them,

* Vide page 83.

Gangarí, close to the suspension bridge over the Kálí river. The enemy were believed to be some thirteen miles distant.

and sends Hodson to reconnoitre.

Seaton at once, then, crossed the river, marched a mile and a half, encamped in some fields, and sent Hodson to the front to reconnoitre.

Whilst Hodson, accompanied by Major Light of the Bengal Artillery, a very gallant and skilful soldier, were galloping to the front to reconnoitre, Seaton and the other officers sat down to their breakfasts, whilst the men, hungry after their march, watched the cook-boys as they prepared for them the same stimulating meal. The officers had breakfasted, the men were about to sit down to their breakfasts, already placed, smoking hot, before them, when the alarm called them, fasting, to their posts. Half when the alarm is sounded.

a minute before, Light, galloping at full speed, had brought the information that the rebels were advancing on both flanks. At once all was bustle and animation. The infantry, without waiting to put on their coats, turned out, as in the Dehlí days, with their muskets and side-arms. The cavalry were in their saddles in less than three minutes. The gunners, always on the alert, were not a whit

The troops
turn out, fasting.

behindhand. In less time than it has taken to describe it, all arms of the force, thus suddenly alarmed, were in their places. On the extreme right were the Carabineers and Lancers; on the extreme left Hodson's Horse; the 1st Fusiliers and a hundred men of the 3rd Europeans were in the centre behind the guns; on the left of the 1st Fusiliers were the Sikhs and Rifles.

Seaton moved forward to meet the enemy. He had scarcely Seaton advances against

the rebels.

set his troops in motion when Hodson rode up and reported to the Brigadier that he had seen the rebels some miles in front filing through a village with guns; that, having watched their further proceedings, he had sent on Light to make his report. Hardly had he finished speaking when the heads of the enemy's columns appeared in sight—two large bodies, one on each flank. Their infantry soon followed, filling up the gap between the two. Seaton at once ordered the guns to the front. These at once opened on the enemy. The hostile guns replied, and though the reply was feeble, yet from the position they had taken up they were able to rake the British line. Seeing this, Wardlaw of the Carabineers, who had received discretionary orders, charged the enemy's battery. The guns turned at once upon the gallant soldiers led most gallantly. But nothing stopped them. Out of the five officers with the Carabineers, three, Wardlaw, Hudson, and Vyse, fell dead; the lieutenant of the handful of Lancers charging with them, Head, was dangerously wounded, whilst of the men six were killed and eleven wounded; but the guns were captured! The cavalry were then led by the only surviving officer, Lieutenant Russell, along the fields, and his men, making good use of their carbines, cleared out the enemy without further loss.

Gallant charge of the Carabineers, who, in spite of losses, capture the guns.

Whilst this was happening on the right, Hodson on the left had dashed with his regiment against the enemy's horse, and had overthrown them.

Hodson overthrows the enemy on the right.

The infantry did not pause to receive. Throwing away their arms, they ran to hide themselves in the fields and ravines, or to continue their flight over the country. They had lost all their guns, one 9-pounder and two 6-pounders, and—what was of greater importance—had received "great discouragement." It appeared that they had no idea that Seaton had come up; they hoped to have to do only with Farquhar's small force of Baluchís. The discovery that a considerable European force was marching through the districts was a warning to them that from that time forth their occupation was gone!

The enemy completely defeated.

Their mistake.

This fight received from the name of the town near which it was fought the title of the combat of Kásganj. That town was occupied the following morning. It was a strong place, filled with brick houses, possessing a handsome mosque remarkable for its curious roof and numerous minarets, surrounded by old gardens, encompassed with strong mud walls, and, if well defended, would have been hard to take. Seaton then pushed on to Saháwar, and the next day, the 17th, to Patiáli. When, however, passing through a village about two miles off this place, a few shots were heard, and Hodson, who was with the advanced guard, sent word that the enemy's outposts had fired their muskets, and galloped off. On receiving this report, Seaton brought all his men through the village, then halted, and served out bread and grog to the men, whilst Hodson and the engineers went to the front to reconnoitre.

Seaton occupies Kásganj, and pushes on to Patiáli,

where, hearing of the rebels, he sends Hodson to reconnoitre.

engineers

In about twenty minutes Hodson returned to report that the enemy had formed across the road, barring the entrance to Patiáli; that their right and right centre were resting on some large ravines, on the right face and front of which earthworks had been thrown up; that their left centre and left were posted in front of gardens and enclosures, covered on the extreme left by their cavalry, posted in an open country. In front of the centre of their position, and about half a mile from it, was a small village, through which they had calculated the British force would advance. They had laid their plans accordingly.

Hodson reports the position occupied by the enemy.

On hearing this report, Seaton disposed his force for action. On the right he massed Hodson's Horse, the Carabineers and Lancers, and some light guns; in the centre the Europeans; on the left the native infantry, and the heavy guns. His plan was to turn their left flank.

Seaton forms his plan.

Occupying, then, the small village of which I have spoken with a few men, and thus constituting that village the left of his position, he brought four guns to the front on the extreme right, and sent four more to take up a position almost enfilading the enemy's position from left to right. But before these could unlimber the enemy opened fire from a battery of twelve guns. In a few minutes, however, the British guns replied, and the duel commenced in earnest. The artillery contest lasted about thirty minutes, the cavalry and infantry meanwhile being halted. But, as the fire from the British guns had, during those thirty minutes, been gradually gaining on that of the enemy, when that time elapsed, Seaton could contain himself no longer. Giving the order to the infantry to advance, he charged himself at the head of the cavalry. The enemy did not await that charge. They broke and fled, and when the infantry, which had advanced on receiving the order, reached the spot, they found that their efforts were not required: they had been forestalled by their gallant Brigadier.*

Begins the battle with an artillery duel;

then, charging, gains it with his cavalry.

* "On we move, and, to our surprise, without receiving a shot from the enemy, whose guns, we found, on reaching their position, had been captured by Colonel Seaton, who had led the Staff and horse artillery, with some few of Hodson's Horse. In fact, seeing the enemy wavering, this bold charge, led by Seaton, decided matters, so far as the guns were concerned."—The 1st Bengal Fusiliers after the fall of Delhi (Blackwood's Magazine). The writer of the article was at the time attached to the 1st Fusiliers.

The gallant charge of Seaton decided the day ; but it did not stop the slaughter. The Carabineers, the Lancers, Hodson's Horse, and the Artillery "got in" among the fleeing enemy, and pursued them for seven miles, taking blood for blood. It is computed that not less than six hundred of the rebels succumbed in the pursuit.

The rebels are pursued and slaughtered;

On the side of the British the loss was singularly small, one man only having been killed and three wounded. The number of guns taken amounted to thirteen. Amongst the trophies captured on this occasion were the elephant, the silver howdah, and the sword of the Hakím, hereditary commander-in-chief of the Nawáb of Farrukhábád. The Hakím himself had been killed by Hodson. In the choice of an open position in front of one very defensible, he had clearly demonstrated that the qualities which go to form an efficient commander-in-chief are not hereditary.

among them their hereditary commander-in-chief.

Seaton halted three days at Patiáli, chiefly to give time to the administrative officers to reorganise their establishments and settle the country. This halt showed him the marvellous effect which his triumphant march had produced. On all sides the rebels were falling back, terrified, on Fathgarh, or endeavouring to cross the Ganges into Oudh. Some bodies of them, of whose movements he heard, and against whom he despatched a small force, fled on the appearance even of a reconnoitring party !* Seaton thought, then, that he might fairly return for his convoy.

Great effect on the country of this victory.

Accordingly on the 21st he retraced his steps. On the 22nd, when within a few miles of Kásganj, he was met by Mr. Cocks, the Civil Commissioner of the division, with the information that a notorious rebel, named Jowáhir Singh, who had fought against him at Patiáli, had doubled round, and had returned with one son, wounded in that engagement, to Kásganj. Hodson was at once sent to the front to dispose of the question. He disposed of it in his own manner. He killed the son ; the father, taken prisoner, was tried by a military commission and blown from a gun that evening. He deserved his fate, for not only was he in receipt of a pension

Hodson disposes of two noted rebels.

* "On the appearance in the distance of the reconnoitring party they had fled precipitately. The officer went over the ground on which they had been encamped, and found their food still cooking on the fire, their pots and pans, and all their baggage standing apart. The fear of us had fallen on all the district round about."—From Cadet to Colonel, by Sir Thomas Seaton, K.C.B.

from the British Government as a native officer, but he was receiving also the emoluments attaching to the Order of British India, of which he was a member.

From Kásganj Seaton sent Major Eld to escort the captured guns to Áligarh and to despatch the convoy thence under charge of the escort with which he furnished him. He then resumed his march to Ítah. There he received information that the Rájah of Mainpúri, a debauchee, named Tej Singh, had raised a force with the intention of barring the road to him.

Seaton
arranges for the convoy,

and marches on Mainpúri.

Upon Mainpúri, then, Seaton marched, viá Karaulí.

At Karaulí, fourteen miles from Mainpúri, Seaton learned from his scouts that the young Rájah had drawn up his little force in position across the road from Karaulí just above the junction with the grand trunk road leading to Ágra; that he had occupied walled gardens on either side of the road, and had Learns on his march that the rebel Rájah is in his path, to oppose his progress.

covered the road itself with field-works.

Seaton's plan was instantly made. When within a mile of the enemy's position, he turned off from the main road by a path to the right, hiding his movement, as far as possible, by the dust made by the cavalry, until he had gained a position whence he could rake the enemy's line from left to right. In vain did the enemy bring their guns to bear on him. Seaton continued his movement until he had reached the point he was aiming at. The British guns then opened. Two rounds were sufficient. The enemy fled in disorder, abandoning, on the field and in the fort, which they did not attempt to defend, eight guns. Their loss cannot be properly estimated; it did not probably exceed a hundred. Seaton's amounted to two wounded!

Seaton out-
manœuvres,

and defeats
him.

The action near Mainpúri was fought on the 27th December. Seaton halted in the vicinity of that place till the 31st, whilst Hodson of Hodson's Horse made a daring and most successful effort to open communications with the Commander-in-Chief. Many gallant deeds were performed during the mutiny, but not one exceeded this in cool and deliberate courage.

Seaton halts
at Mainpúri.
Hodson proposes to open communication with the Commander-
in-Chief.

My opinion of Hodson has been already recorded. He was a free-lance of the Middle Ages. But, if his action towards the unarmed and captive princes of the House of Taimúr proved that the instincts of the Hodson invaluable as a partisan leader.

natural savage reigned strong within him, his fearlessness, his contempt of danger, his joy in the battle, his ever cool brain, made him invaluable as a partisan leader. When a risk for the general good was to be undertaken, Hodson always came forward to undertake it. In matters affecting, or likely to affect, him physically, he never counted the cost. He was invaluable to a commander. Was information regarding the enemy's movements required, Hodson would get it. Was a delicate movement at a particular period of a battle considered essential, the execution of it was entrusted to Hodson. Always in the position where his presence was needed, always the first to detect a false movement, always with his life in his hand ready to risk it, Hodson could not fail to be the right-hand man of his general. "He is indefatigable," said Seaton, to General Penny, when asking for his services—"a soldier of the highest class; I have unbounded confidence in him, and would rather have him than five hundred more men."

The undertaking to which he now devoted himself was one requiring nerve, intelligence, and activity of the highest order. Seaton's camp was at Mainpúri. The Commander-in-Chief was reported to be at Gursuháganj, about forty miles from Mainpúri, marching from Fathgarh. But the country between the two places was the country into which the rebels, so often beaten, had been driven, and though some, doubtless, had reached Fathgarh, others had lingered on the road. The rebels beaten at Mainpúri must of necessity be there.

Still, it was very advisable to attempt to open out communications with the Commander-in-Chief, and, the task being difficult and dangerous, Hodson naturally volunteered to execute it. His offer was accepted, and on the morning of the 30th he set out, taking with him his second in command, M'Dowell, a very gallant officer, and seventy-five of his own men. He carried on his person Colonel Seaton's despatches.

Hodson rode straight to Bewar, fourteen miles distant. There he left all his escort except twenty-five men. With these and with M'Dowell he continued his course to Chhibrámau, another fourteen miles, where he again made halt.

From this point he determined to push on to Gursuháganj accompanied only by M'Dowell. The distance was about twelve miles. Leaving, then, the twenty-five

Danger of the undertaking he proposed to accomplish.

Hodson and M'Dowell start on their dangerous errand.

Leaving their escort behind,

they reach their destination to find the Chief still distant from it.

native troopers in Chhibrá máu, the two officers rode on alone. They reached Gursuhaganj in safety, only to find, however, that the Commander-in-Chief's camp was at Míran-kí-sarai, some fifteen miles further off.

Alarming nature of the situation ; but they push on, and gain the Chief's camp in safety.

The situation was alarming. The villagers reported that the rebels, seven hundred strong with four guns, were within two miles of the place. But hesitation never entered into the calculations of Hodson. He and his comrade continued their journey, and reached the headquarter camp, without adventure, at 4 o'clock in the morning. They had ridden fifty-five miles in ten hours, without change of horses.

While he is there the road he traversed is occupied by the rebels.

It happened that on the road between Chhibrá máu and Gursuhá ganj, Hodson had bestowed alms upon a native. A very short time after he had left the former place, it had been entered by a party of two thousand rebels on their way to Fathgarh. These men overpowered and killed the troopers, and, having gathered from the villagers that Hodson and his companion would return, they resolved to lay wait for them. Meanwhile, Hodson had been splendidly received by Sir Colin Campbell, had been closeted with him the greater part of the day, and had dined with him. At 8 o'clock in the evening, he and M'Dowell set out on their return journey. They

Hodson and M'Dowell start to return ;

they are warned of the danger threatening them.

proceeded without adventure till within five or six miles of Chhibrá máu. Here they were stopped by the native whom Hodson had befriended in the morning, with the information that Chhibrá máu was occupied by the rebels, who were on the look-out for them. It was near midnight, the moon was bright, and the wind cold. It was neither the time nor place for deliberation, nor did Hodson require it. He determined to push on. Dismounting, then, from their horses, he and his companion led them to the soft unmacadamised strip which forms the border of an Indian road, and, followed by the native, walked on. They gradually approached Chhibrá máu : they entered it : they saw the camp of the enemy : they heard the hum of voices : but they reached unseen the further end of the village. On emerging from it, they dismissed their guide, with a promise from him to join them in their camp, remounted, and rode on.

By prudent boldness they escape the danger,

At Bewar they were met by a party which Seaton, hearing of the surprise at Chhibrámaú, had sent out to look for them. and return.

Seaton, indeed, alarmed at the reports brought in by the troopers left at Bewar, had moved on to that place on the 31st. Here he remained with his convoy till the 3rd January, when, as already related, Brigadier Walpole joined him there. Seaton effects a junction with Walpole. Seaton's force came at once under the orders of that officer.

CHAPTER VI.

MOVEMENTS PRELIMINARY TO THE RE-CONQUEST OF OUDH.

It is time now to return to the Commander-in-Chief.

The carriage necessary for the movement of the force under his command returned from Allahábád on the 23rd December. Sir Colin marched from Kánhpúr on the 24th. Clearing the country lying between the main road and the road by which he had despatched Walpole with his left brigade, and stripping the Ganges of boats with a brigade on his right, Sir Colin reached Míran-kí-sarai on the 30th. It was at this place that he met Hodson in the manner I have related in the preceding chapter. The following day he reached Gursuháganj. Here a road branches off from the main road, and leads the traveller over the Kálí Nadí, traversed by a suspension bridge at a distance of five miles from the junction of the roads to Fathgarh.

Sir Colin
Campbell
sets out for Fathgarh.

The advance of the Commander-in-Chief had been acting on the various detachments of rebels in the manner of a loaded net sunk in a stream, followed by men wading, and drawn upwards by men on both banks. Walpole and Seaton prevented escape on one side, Sir Colin drove his victims up on the other. There was one outlet, however, which neither commanded, and for this the harassed tribe was now making. The outlet was Fathgarh.

The rebels driven from all sides towards Fath-
garh.

The Kálí Nadí barred the entrance of a hostile force into Fathgarh. But I have said that it was spanned by a suspension bridge. The rebels, jammed into the place from all sides, some fleeing from Seaton, some from Walpole, some from the Commander-in-Chief, began, recovering from their panic, to reflect that their last chance of safety lay in the removal of the suspension bridge. But this reflection, like so many that occurred to them in this campaign, came just too late.

They determine, too late, to destroy the bridge over the Kálí Nadí.

However, on the 31st, they sent down a party to destroy the bridge. Had they worked with a will, they might have succeeded. But, though they effected some damage that night, they left the piers and the main chains intact, hoping, it may be supposed, to deal with them on the morrow.

They begin their work of destruction,

But, for the destruction of the bridge there was to be no morrow. Early on the morning of the 1st January, Sir Colin detached Adrian Hope's brigade, reinforced with two 24-pounders and one 8-inch howitzer, under Lieutenant Vaughan of the Naval Brigade, and some engineers, sappers, and cavalry, to the Kálí Nadí, with orders to drive away the enemy and to repair the bridge in case it should be found damaged. On the approach of Adrian Hope the rebels fled, and the engineers and sappers, covered by a strong infantry picket, at once set to work to repair the damage done to the bridge. They laboured with so much earnestness that day and through the night, that by half-past 7 o'clock the next morning the bridge was in a fit state to be traversed.

but are checked by Adrian Hope.

Jan. 1-2.

The labours of the British troops had but just been completed, and the sailors, who had helped in the work, were on the river-bank washing their garments, when the Commander-in-Chief and his staff arrived to examine the position. Halting, Sir Colin noticed a large village, facing the bridge, at a distance of about three hundred yards, flanked on its right by some tall trees. In front of the village was a small square building, which proved afterwards to be a toll-house. The road from the river-bank gradually ascended to a point beyond the village, which it intersected.

Sir Colin comes up and reconnoitres the ground beyond the bridge.

Sir Colin had had barely time to make these observations when the rebels, who till then had kept out of sight, poured into the village, and opened a heavy musketry fire upon the group of which the Commander-in-Chief was the centre. Under cover of this fusillade, they brought up two guns, and opened fire on the pickets sent across to guard the bridge-head, and on the bridge itself. Sir Colin at once sent orders to the main body of his troops, then about four miles in rear, to push on. Till they could come up, he directed Adrian Hope to hold the bridge, but on no account to attack the enemy.

The rebels open fire upon him.

Adrian Hope at once detached the 53rd across the bridge to reinforce the pickets, directing them to extend under cover of the bank, and to keep up thence a brisk musketry fire. One wing of the 93rd he kept in hand, ready, if necessary, to support the skirmishers. The other wing had been detached to guard the ford, three miles lower down the stream.

Adrian Hope keeps them in check.

Jan. 2.

The 53rd, crossing the bridge, found a partial, though inadequate, cover from the mounds and ridges of earth and the tall grass covering the bank. Lying down here, they opened on the enemy a very effective fire. Meanwhile, Vaughan's three guns crossed the bridge, and, taking up a position close to a yellow bungalow near its northern end, opened fire on the village.

The 53rd lie down beyond the bridge and open fire.

Still the rebels continued their fusillade; and their leader, noting that a gun placed under cover of the toll-house would sweep the bridge, brought up one of his pieces to that position between 2 and 3 o'clock, and opened from it. The effect was most damaging to the British, one shot alone killing or wounding eight men. This practice continued for some time, when the guns of the Naval Brigade, splendidly directed by Vaughan, succeeded in dismounting the piece and blowing up the tumbril.*

Vaughan dismounts one of the enemy's pieces.

The gun which had caused so much destruction had scarcely been dismounted when the 53rd, disregarding their orders to remain where they were, made a simultaneous rush to the front on the toll-house, clearing out the enemy. Sir Colin was furious at this disobedience, and vainly tried to check it.† The men of the 53rd had heard

The 53rd rush to the front.

* The manner in which this work was done reflects so much credit on all who were concerned in it, that it merits a notice more detailed than that which I have given in the text. "Lieutenant Vaughan now pointed and fired one of our guns at the small gun of the enemy, which was concealed behind the corner of a house, and annoying us much. His first shot struck the roof of the house; his second struck the angle of the wall about half-way down; and a third dismounted the gun and destroyed the carriage. Captain Peel, who was standing by, said: 'Thank you, Mr. Vaughan; perhaps you will now be so good as to blow up the tumbril.' Lieutenant Vaughan fired a fourth shot, which passed near it; and a fifth, which blew it up and killed several of the enemy. 'Thank you,' said Captain Peel, in his blandest and most courteous tones; 'I will now go and report to Sir Colin.'"—The Shannon's Brigade in India. E. H. Verney.

† "The Commander-in-Chief was terribly annoyed, and, riding up to the regiment, pitched into it well. But these wild Irishmen were incorrigible that they were to be relieved, and they were determined to be in the front. There was nothing for it but to support them. Fortunately, the heads of the main column were now at hand. The 93rd crossed the bridge in support of the 53rd, whilst Greathed's brigade, following, advanced up the slope to the left, flanked on the extreme left by the cavalry led by Hope Grant. As the infantry advanced on the village, the enemy abandoned it. Upon this, Hope Grant, taking on his men round at a trot, caught the enemy as they were emerging from the other end, and, charging in échelon of squadrons, completely broke them. Then despair seized upon the rebel mass; breaking their ranks, throwing aside their arms, they fled in wild confusion; but the horsemen were upon them and amongst them, and the slaughter was terrible; for several miles they rode along, spearing and cutting down at every step; and the progress of their swift advance might be marked by the smoke of exploded tumbrils curling up amidst the dark-green trees."*

Complete
defeat of the rebels.

The rout of the enemy was complete. Eight guns, several colours, palanquins, and ammunition waggons fell into the hands of the victors. The rebels did not cease their flight even when they reached the fort of Fathgarh, but, hastily seizing on all that was portable in their camp outside that fort, hurried in panic and dismay across the same river which many of them had crossed but six short months before, arrogant with the pride of revolt, thirsting for the blood of the officers whom whilom they had sworn to obey! They fled into Rohilkhand.

They flee into Rohilkhand.

The ovation the Commander-in-Chief received from his soldiers that evening is thus described by an eye-witness, one of the gallant actors in that stirring scene: "Their return from this" (the return of the cavalry from the pursuit) "was a stirring sight of war. In front came the 9th Lancers, with three captured standards at their head; the wild-looking Sikh horsemen rode in the rear. As they passed the Commander-in-Chief he took off his hat to them, with some words of praise and thanks. The Lancers shook their lances in the air and cheered; the Sikhs

Ovation given by the soldiers to Sir
Colin.

Whenever he began to speak, a lot of them exclaimed, as loud as they could, 'Three cheers for the Commander-in-Chief, boys!' until at length he himself was obliged to go away, laughing."—Hope Grant's Incidents.

* Blackwood's Magazine, October 1858.

took up the cry, waving their sabres above their heads. The men carrying the standards gave them to the wind; the Highland brigade, who were encamping close by, ran down and cheered both the victorious cavalry and the veteran Chief, waving their bonnets in the air. It was a fair sight, and reminded one of the old days of chivalry. When Sir Colin rode back through the camp of the Highlanders, the enthusiasm of the men exceeded description." *

Sir Colin's losses amounted to four men killed, two officers and eight men wounded. Those of the enemy were naturally much greater.

I have mentioned the skilful conduct of Vaughan of the Naval Brigade at this action, but I cannot quit the subject without referring to the gallantry of Roberts, the same Roberts who at a later period won so much honour and distinction in Afghánistán, and who, at the time I am writing, holds the high office of Commander-in-Chief in India. In pursuing the rebels, this officer, then a lieutenant, came suddenly upon and engaged two sipáhis with a standard, cut one of them down, and captured the standard. Continuing his onward course, he cut down another sipáhi, who was keeping a trooper at bay. For these acts, succeeding many others of a similar character, Roberts received the Victoria Cross.

Sir Colin halted for the night some twelve miles from Fathgarh. Early the next morning he marched for that place, blew open the gate of the fort, and entered without opposition. So great had been the previous confidence, and so complete the present panic of the rebels, that they had left in the fort uninjured a valuable stock of timber, stored for the purpose of making gun-carriages; steam-engines; guns of all sorts; and a large quantity of soldiers' clothing. They had even neglected to cut the bridge of boats communicating across the Ganges with the opposite bank. This bridge was at once secured.

The next day Walpole's column, strengthened by Seaton's, and escorting the convoy previously mentioned, marched into Fathgarh. The army thus concentrated amounted to more than ten thousand men, well supplied with camp equipage and means of transport.

Gallantry of Roberts.

Sir Colin reoccupies Fathgarh, and there concentrates his flying columns.

Jan 4.

Thus was accomplished successfully the third portion of the original programme of the Commander-in-Chief. Communication with the north-west had been re-established: the Duáb had been cleared of rebels. Those rebels had escaped into Rohilkhand. That province and the province of Oudh still remained in open revolt. The dealing with them was to constitute the fourth scene of the drama.

The third portion of his programme accomplished.

It was the opinion of Sir Colin Campbell that the three months of cold weather which yet remained to him might be most profitably employed by following the enemy into Rohilkhand. By stamping out the rebellion in that province he would, he believed, assure the more easily the submission of the whole of the north-west. The separate forces then operating, as will be hereafter described, in western and central India, in Rájputáná and in Bundelkhand, would at the same time restore order and tranquillity throughout those parts of India. Oudh alone would remain; and Sir Colin was of opinion that Oudh, hemmed in by the Gurkhás in one extremity, and by troops whom he would dispose in summer quarters from that extremity to the further border, might wait his pleasure—might remain, that is to say, for some months longer in the hands of the rebels, until the ensuing cold season would permit his troops to operate more effectually in that country. Rightly regarding his European troops as the mainstay, the backbone of his army, he was unwilling, if it could be avoided, to expose them to the exhaustion and loss inseparable from a hot-weather campaign—a campaign carried on under circumstances which would often require the employment of small detachments, hurried and forced marches, exposure to the mid-day sun, and possibly to the heavy autumnal rains.

Sir Colin Campbell is in favour of dealing with Rohilkhand before re-conquering Oudh.

But, in the opinion of the Council of the Government of India, the political exigencies of the time were so pressing, that they overbore considerations which, if prompted partly by sound rules of military science, were dictated in the main by regard for the health and preservation of the European soldier. Lord Canning and the members of his Council were guided in the views they propounded by two great principles: the one, that no rest should be given to the rebels—that they must be attacked and pursued until they should submit; the other, that the main object of the next movement should be the re-capture of Lakhnao. These were cardinal points with the Government. Fitting in with them, too, was another consideration, which, if of a less pressing character, was yet not unimportant. I allude to the co-operation of the Gurkhás, led by the Prime Minister of Nipál, Jang Bahádur. These troops, ten thousand in number, were occupying a position from which they could co-operate effectively with the British in Oudh. Were Sir Colin to deal immediately with Oudh, they would join in the action. But it could not be expected, if the Oudh campaign were adjourned, that these men, natives of the Himálayas, would remain during the hot and rainy seasons in the plains exposed to a climate with which they were naturally unfitted to cope.

Lord Canning prefers that the re-conquest of Lakhnao should first be attempted.

Arguments in favour of the course adopted by Lord Canning.

There are few, I think, who would be disposed now to question the wisdom of the course recommended by the Government of India. It seems to me that every consideration favoured its adoption. Alike in war and in politics, it is always advisable to strike a decisive blow at the most important of the exposed points of an enemy. In this case Lakhnao was that point. Lakhnao taken, the heart of the rebels would be broken. No other great rallying-place would remain to them. So long, on the other hand, as that regal city should remain in their possession, their adherents would continue to nourish hope, and it would require more than ordinary tact and care to prevent the renewal of uprisings in parts which had been already overrun.

Again, of the two provinces, Rohilkhand and Oudh, the latter was by far the most formidable, the most important. The pacification of Rohilkhand would produce little or no effect on the men of Oudh. On the contrary, the re-conquest of Lakhnao would be felt in every village and in every corner of Rohilkhand. To this must be added the important consideration that whilst Outram was, with some difficulty, holding the Álambágh with nearly four thousand men, rebels from all parts of India were daily crowding into Lakhnao. This fact alone would show that the case of Lakhnao was the more pressing.

The necessity of dealing in the first instance a deadly blow at Lakhnao was insisted upon with so much force by Lord Canning that it became a law to the Commander-in-Chief. It devolved, then, upon him to make his preparations to carry into effect the settled plan.

The Commander-in-Chief adheres to Lord Canning's views.

At Fathgarh, situated on the Ganges, at the south-western extremity of the border-line between Oudh and Rohilkhand, Sir Colin was occupying a position of no small advantage. It effectually barred the entrance into the re-conquered districts of mutineers from the capital of Rohilkhand—Baréli—seventy-seven miles distant; from the north-western division of Oudh; and from Lakhnao. The river-line between Fathgarh and Kánhpúr was strongly held, there being intermediate posts at Bithur and Mirán-ki-sarai. It was impossible for Sir Colin Campbell to undertake the contemplated measures against Lakhnao without the aid of a siege-train. Now, the siege-train was at Ágra. The distance between Ágra and Kánhpúr, the point whence the advance on Lakhnao must be made, is a hundred and seventy-nine miles. The road passed through Itáwab, whence Walpole had but recently expelled the rebels, and in the vicinity of districts cleared by Seaton. The victory near Fathgarh and the occupation of that place by Sir Colin had made the road safe against attacks from the left whilst the siege-train should be on its way.

Advantageous position occupied by Sir Colin at Fathgarh.

The road between Kánhpúr and Ágra protected on the left flank,

Scarcely less secure was it from danger on the right. For, although the broken remnant of the Gwáliár contingent was supposed to be at Kalpí or in its vicinity, the men forming it could scarcely have recovered from the heavy blow and sore discouragement inflicted upon them on the 6th December. It seemed almost certain, too, that they would feel in their rear the effects of the superhuman efforts which it was known were being made by the British troops in Central India and in Bundelkhand to get at them; whilst the fact that Kánhpúr was guarded by a brigade under Inglis, that the communications with Allahábád were preserved by a Madras brigade under Carthew, and that those between that place and Banáras were protected by another brigade under Franks, left them, in reality, but one line upon which they could act against the siege-train—the line by Akbarpúr, and that was the line which Walpole had but very recently cleared, and along which no force could march from Kalpí without exposing its right to Kánhpúr and Bithúr.

and on the right.

The siege-train was then ordered from Ágra. Whilst it was on its way, Sir Colin had time to organise the measures he considered necessary to secure his conquests and to facilitate his movements. To guard the position at Fathgarh and the districts to the west and south-west of it, including Itáwah, Mainpúri, and Míran-kí-sarai, he required an officer of more than ordinary intelligence and decision, well acquainted with the natives, and capable of arriving at and acting on a decision. For this command he selected Colonel Seaton. What Seaton was may be gathered from the account I have given of his march from Dehlí to Bewar. A gallant soldier, shrinking from no responsibility, always ready to give his life for his country, he was just the man to hold a position full of difficulty and danger. The post that was offered him came emphatically within that category. For, to hold Fathgarh and the districts which Fathgarh covered, Sir Colin proposed to leave him only two weak English regiments,—one of which only, the 82nd, was at Fathgarh—the 7th Panjáb Infantry, a 9-pounder field battery, and three hundred and fifty newly raised native horsemen; this, too, when fifteen thousand rebels were within seven miles of Fathgarh! But, difficult as was the task, Seaton was equal to it.

Sir Colin makes preparations for Lakhnao.

Meanwhile, Sir Colin endeavoured to amuse the Rohilkhand rebels. His great object was to mislead them—to impress them with the idea that Baréli was the object of his attack. Immediately after occupying Fathgarh, he had sent Adrian Hope's brigade to scour the country in the vicinity. On Hope's return, learning that a force of fifteen thousand men had assembled at the town of Allahganj on the banks of the Rám-gangá river, some seven or eight miles distant, Sir Colin sent Walpole's brigade, with guns, cavalry, and sappers, to make a demonstration against them. Walpole's orders were to make as much display as possible, but not to commit himself to an engagement across the river. He carried out these orders to the letter; he made as though he would repair the bridge, which the rebels had broken down, across the Rám-gangá; and, to add to the delusion, Sir Colin rode out himself and made a careful reconnoissance of the spot. The ruse succeeded admirably, for the rebels were completely deceived, and, for a time, became rooted to the left bank of the river.

Sir Colin manoeuvres so as to induce a belief that Rohilkhand is his object.

Whether suspicion gradually dawned upon them, or whether they were well served by their spies, I do not know. But it is certain that, after remaining in this position ten or twelve days, they detached a body of five thousand men to attempt an incursion into the re-conquered districts. These men, crossing the Rámangá at a point above that watched by Walpole, marched to a ferry on the Ganges, called Surajghát, about twelve miles above Fathgarh, crossed that river, and occupied the village of Shamsábád. At ten o'clock on the evening of the 26th January, Adrian Hope's brigade, consisting of the 42nd, the 93rd, the 4th Panjáb Rifles, Remington's and Blunt's troops of Bengal Horse Artillery, two squadrons of the 9th Lancers, and half of Hodson's Horse, was sent to attack them. Marching all night, Adrian Hope found the enemy at 8 o'clock in the morning posted at the village of Sutiá, half a mile from Shamsábád. As soon as the rebels saw the English their guns opened fire. Hope did not reply till well within distance; but, when he did reply, it was with considerable effect. At the fifth discharge the rebels broke and fled. Hodson and the 9th Lancer squadrons were amongst them at once, and, though the rebel cavalry fought well, the slaughter of them was great. The British loss did not exceed five or six killed and about twenty wounded. Amongst those wounded mortally was M'Dowell, the gallant second in command of Hodson's Horse, the companion of Hodson in many a daring enterprise. Hodson himself was wounded in two places. The enemy were pursued eight or nine miles. Those who escaped re-crossed the Ganges into Rohilkhand, leaving four guns in the hands of the victors.

Adrian Hope
defeats the rebels at Sutiá.

Meanwhile, in order the better to relieve pressure on Seaton's small brigade, Sir Colin Campbell had arranged with the Chief Commissioner of the Panjáb, Sir John Lawrence, that a force should be organised at Rurki for the purpose of entering Rohilkhand from the north-west. This column, he had reason to believe, would be ready to set out on this expedition on the 1st February. It was now approaching that date; Hope's victory at Sutiá had been severe enough to impose prudence on the rebels for a few days; the siege-train was well on its way to Kánhpúr; Seaton had had a week to examine the lay of the districts committed to his care and prudence; there was no reason for further delay. Sir Colin was anxious to return to the place which was to be his base in the new campaign, to see how the works he had ordered to cover the bridges were progressing, to be present there to receive the siege-train, and to despatch it across

Final preparations before marching on Lakhnao.

the Ganges to the first advanced position on the Lakhnao road—the station of Unáo. He left Fathgarh, then, on the 1st February, followed by the cavalry and the horse artillery, and, making forced marches, reached Kánhpúr on the 4th. Hope's brigade and the artillery park started the same day by regular marches, whilst Walpole's brigade, strengthened by a portion of that which Seaton had brought down, stayed a few days longer, to cover to the last the communications with Ágra. But by the 23rd February all had crossed the Ganges into Oudh. On the sandy plains between Unáo and Banni were massed engineers, artillery, horse, foot, commissariat waggons, camp-followers, the most efficient European army ever ranged in the plains of India. It counted seventeen battalions of infantry, fifteen of which were British; twenty-eight squadrons of cavalry, including four English regiments; fifty-four light and eighty heavy guns and mortars. They are there on the eve of their departure. The morrow will see them start for the rebellious city, the capture of which will be so fatal to many among them. I must leave them for the moment; for before I describe their deeds it is fitting that I should narrate the manner in which Jang Bahádur and Franks had been co-operating from the south-east, and how Outram and his gallant companions were bearing up in the Álambágh.

CHAPTER VII.

THE ADVANCE INTO EASTERN OUDH.

AMONG the offers of assistance which, in the early days of the revolt, had been made to the Governor-General was one of peculiar significance. Jang Bahádur, the virtual ruler of the independent Hill State which, touching the British territory at Kumáun, extends all along the north-east border of Oudh, then rejoining British territory at a point in the Gorákhpur district due north of the station of the same name, continues the touch to within a few miles of Dárjiling—Jang Bahádar had, in the month of May, placed the whole military resources of Nipál at the disposal of the Governor-General. The independent position occupied by Nipál, the known ability of the man, who, though only Prime Minister, wielded all real authority in the country, the certainty that the overthrow of the British could scarcely fail to offer great opportunities to an able general commanding a compact and well-disciplined army, gave to Jang Bahádur's proposal the appearance of being inspired by a pure and generous friendship. Few untravelled independent rulers would have acted in a similar manner. But Jang Bahádur had but a few years previously visited Europe. This visit had enlightened him on many points, and on one point in particular. It had convinced him that, under all circumstances, England would be able to maintain her hold on India. It became therefore with him a matter of interest to support the stronger combatant.

Jang Bahádur offers at an early date to aid to suppress the revolt.

Lord Canning thanked Jang Bahádur for his offer, but it was not till some time in the month of June that he accepted it. In pursuance of the agreement between the contracting parties, Jang Bahádur in July despatched three thousand Gurkhás from Khátmandu. These, entering the British territory at a point north of Gorákhpur, marched on that place, and reached it at the end of the month. Their arrival was the signal for the disarming of the Sipáhis stationed there (1st August). The neighbouring stations of Ázamgarh and Jaunpúr were then in the throes of anarchy. Vainly had the heroic Venables, the indigo-planter, who had been steadfast among the faint-hearted, struggled and fought for order. It is true that on the 16th July, after a gallant fight of the few against many, he had repulsed the rebels in an attack on Ázamgarh. But, after the victory, his own followers had shown symptoms of mutiny, and he and the few Europeans who followed him had been forced, on the 30th July, to retreat on Gházípur. To restore order, then, in Ázamgarh and its vicinity, the arrival of the Nipálese troops was opportune. They occupied Ázamgarh on the 13th August, and Jaunpúr on the 15th. Meanwhile, on their evacuating it, Gorákhpur was taken possession of by rebels from Oudh, commanded by one Muhammad Husen.

The offer, after some delay, is accepted;

and a few Gúrkah troops are sent to the Ázamgarh
district.

The Government of India, to ensure concert between these allies and its own troops, had transmitted orders to the military authorities at Banáras to appoint certain officers, left unemployed by the mutiny of their regiments, to join and act with the Nipálese. In obedience to these orders, Captain Boileau and Lieutenants Miles, Hall, and Campbell came to Jaunpúr and took up the duties assigned to them. Two or three weeks elapsed before an opportunity offered of testing the quality of the allied troops, but in the third week of September the approach to Ázamgarh of a large body of rebels gave an occasion of which they eagerly availed themselves.

British officers sent to represent the Government with the Nipál
troops.

Ázamgarh was the point threatened. Lieutenant-Colonel Wroughton, commanding at Jaunpúr, deemed it advisable then to detach the Shér regiment of Nipálese, twelve hundred strong, and two guns, to reinforce that station.

Ázamgarh
is again threatened.

The Nipálese left Jaunpúr at 10 A.M. on the 18th September, marched forty miles that day, and reached Ázamgarh at 6 o'clock in the evening. It had transpired, meanwhile, that the rebels were encamped at or near a village called Mánduri, ten miles distant; and, it being surmised that they were ignorant of the arrival of the Nipál reinforcement, it was determined to surprise them. Accordingly, at half past 1 o'clock the next morning, the Shér regiment again set out, accompanied by Captain Boileau as English officer in charge of the force, by Mr. Wynyard the judge, by Mr. Venables, the gallant planter, whose recent services I have just referred to, and by three other officers. Mánduri was reached a little after sunrise. The rebels were found strongly posted, their centre covered by the village, and their flanks protected by fields of sugar-cane, then at their full height. Nothing daunted, the Nipál colonel, Shamshér Singh, formed his men up in five columns, and dashed at that strong position. Their onslaught was so fierce, that in ten minutes the rebels were in full flight, leaving on the field three brass guns. They lost about two hundred men killed and wounded. On the side of the Nipálese two were killed and twenty-six wounded. Mr. Wynyard, in his report of the action to his civil superiors, alluded in the highest terms to the conduct of the Nipál troops. Regarding Mr. Venables, who commanded the cavalry, he wrote ; “ He was always where fighting was hardest ; he was first up at the first gun taken, and killed three men with his own hand.”*

The Nipál troops and Mr. Venables surprise and defeat the rebels.

This victory had an excellent effect. Up to that time the British authorities had felt some hesitation in employing their allies against the rebels, but with the victory of Mánduri all uncertainty vanished. To march fifty miles in two days, and then to win a battle in an unknown country, would have reflected credit on veteran soldiers. The success obtained on this occasion not only filled the English officers with confidence, it emboldened them to follow up the step already taken. On the 27th September, Colonel Wroughton, accompanied by the civil officers of the district, marched with another party of Nipál troops from Jaunpúr against, and occupied, Mubárakpúr—the stronghold of a rebel Rájah, Irádat Khán ; took that chieftain prisoner ; tried, and hanged him. Proceeding onwards, Wroughton and the Nipál troops pacified the entire district. On the 29th, the authorities at Ázamgarh made a similar demonstration from that place, and with similar success. Atráolia, the stronghold of the rebel leader Béni Mádhu, was occupied, its fortifications were destroyed ; and, although Béni Mádhu escaped, he quitted the district. Up to the borders of Oudh order was thus for the time restored.

The victory is followed up.

* So sensible were the rebels of the immense service rendered by Mr. Venables to his country that they offered a reward of five hundred rupees for his head.

To support the Nipál troops, the Government had, in September, directed the despatch from Banáras of a small force, consisting of three hundred and twenty men of the 10th Foot, two 9-pounder guns, a small detachment of European artillery, and a hundred and seventy of the 17th Madras Native Infantry, under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Longden of the 10th Foot. But, before this small force could reach the scene of action, the Oudh rebels had again crossed the frontier, and had encountered and been beaten by the Nipálese at Kudya on the 19th October, and at Chandá on the 30th of the same month.* The last-named action was severe enough to merit a separate record. The rebels, numbering from four to five thousand men, were strongly posted and had seven guns. The Nipál troops counted only eleven hundred men with two guns. The battle, obstinately contested, terminated in the complete defeat of the rebels, with a loss on their side of three hundred killed. Four of their guns were taken. But the victory was dearly purchased. Lieutenant-Colonel Madan Mán Singh and eleven men were killed, and fifty-nine were wounded. The gallantry of the Nipál troops had been conspicuous. Of one of them, Lieutenant Gambhír Singh, it is related in the official account of the action that, "single-handed, he took a gun, cutting down five of the artillerymen, and wounding and driving away two others." This gallant ally was covered with wounds, but eventually recovered.

Longden reached Jaunpúr just after the action of Chandá. Three days after his arrival (4th November) the Oudh rebels, to the number of one thousand, with two guns, again crossed the Oudh frontier, and seized the fort of Atráolia. The attention of Longden was at once called to the fact. Uniting his force to that of the Nipálese, he marched out at once, and, on the ninth, cannonaded the place so vigorously, that the enemy evacuated it during the night.

But the fact that the British territory was still liable to invasion, and that the British troops, though strong enough to repel an isolated attack, were not strong enough to defend the whole frontier, and might be forced, under certain circumstances, to fall back on Banáras, induced the Government of India to conclude with the Nipál Government a new arrangement. In virtue of this, it was arranged that Jang Bahádur should proceed himself to the scene of action with a force of nine thousand picked troops, and that to this force Colonel MacGregor should be attached with the rank of Brigadier-General. At the same time measures were taken greatly to increase the British force on the eastern frontier of Oudh. Large reinforcements were sent to the Jaunpúr force, and that force so strengthened was placed under the command of one of the ablest officers in the British Army, Brigadier-General Franks, C.B. Similarly, another mixed force was organised in western Bihár by Colonel Rowcroft to move from Tírhút along the Gandak towards Gorákhpur. These three separate corps d'armée had but one primary object,—to clear the British districts to the north of Banáras and east of Oudh; as soon as these districts should be cleared, one corps would remain in observation, whilst the other two would march to co-operate with Sir Colin Campbell in his attack on Lakhnao. It will be necessary, then, to deal with the three separately.

* Kudya is a village twelve miles to the west of Ázamgarh; Chandá is in the Sultánpur district of Oudh, thirty-six miles from Jaunpúr.

The Government concludes an arrangement with Jung Bahádur for assistance led by himself.

The British force is likewise strengthened.

Rowcroft's force was composed of thirty men of the Royal Marines, a hundred and thirty of the Pearl Naval Brigade under Sotheby, three hundred and fifty Nipál troops, fifty men of the Bengal Police Battalion, and four 12-pounder howitzers, two of which were mountain-train guns. It occupied an intrenched camp at Mirwá, about forty-nine miles from Chaprá. Seven miles distant, at Sobanpúr on the west bank of the little Gandak,* lay a small rebel army, computed to consist of twelve hundred regular Sipáhis, and four thousand armed adventurers, of whom a hundred were mounted, with four guns. On the morning of the 26th December, Rowcroft, who had waited for the arrival of the Goráknáth Nipál regiment from Sigáulí, marched to attack the rebel force.

Colonel Rowcroft's force

beats the rebels at Sobanpúr,

* There are three rivers called "Gandak"—the great, the lesser, and the little. The last rises on the northern boundary of the Chaprá district (western Bihár), flows in a south-easterly direction for about a hundred and twenty miles, then leaves the district of Chaprá and enters that of Tírhut, which it traverses in the same direction for about seventy miles, when it joins the Bághmatí. The united streams subsequently fall into the great Gandak.

Their position was strong on two out of its three objective points. They occupied a village, covered in front by a tank with high banks, and on the right by a tope of trees: the left was comparatively uncovered. Rowcroft halted within half a mile of the place and rode forward to reconnoitre. He resolved to render useless the enemy's strong positions in the centre and on the right by turning his left. He did this with great coolness and success. The Nipál troops behaved splendidly under fire. Sotheby of the Naval Brigade managed the artillery with great skill. The Minié rifles of the Royal Marines, directed by Lieutenant Pym, produced a striking effect. The result was that the enemy, attacked a little after 10 o'clock, were completely beaten by half past 1, forced back from Sobanpúr, and followed six miles further to Majáulí, and thence driven across the Gandak, with the loss of one large iron gun. Rowcroft followed up his victory the next day by crossing the river and destroying the homesteads of the leading rebels. Then, in pursuance of instructions he had received from Brigadier-General MacGregor, under whose orders he had been placed, he marched to Burhat Ghát on the river Ghághrá, there to await further instructions.

Jung Bahádur's little army, meanwhile, setting out from Nipál, had crossed the British frontier. On the 23rd December, it reached Bhetiá, eighty-two miles east of Gorákhpur. Here it was joined by MacGregor. Continuing its march, it crossed the river Gandak on the 30th, and arrived in the vicinity of Gorákhpur on the 5th January. Gorákhpur was occupied by the rebels, but by rebels disheartened, divided in purpose, and hopeless of success. When attacked, then, the following morning by the Nipál army, they made but a feeble resistance, but fled across the Ráptí,* leaving seven guns in the possession of the conquerors. These lost but two men killed. Seven were wounded. The loss of the rebels amounted to about two hundred.

* The Ráptí takes its rise in the sub-Himálayan ranges of Nipál, and, flowing round a long spur of mountains, enters the plains of Oudh, which it traverses in a south-easterly direction for ninety miles, passing through the Bahráich and Gondah districts; it finally joins the Ghághrá after a course of four hundred miles.

The civil administration was at once re-established in Gorákhpur. The British districts were cleared of rebels. At the same time, awaiting the time when the Nipál force at Ázamgarh should cross the Oudh frontier in co-operation with that under General Franks, MacGregor transmitted orders to Rowcroft to embark his little force in boats and ascend the river.

Civil administration restored in Gorákhpur.

Before Rowcroft came up, the moment referred to had arrived, and Jang Bahádur, starting from Gorákhpur on the 14th February, reached Barári, on the left bank of the Ghághrá* on the 19th. On the evening of that day, Rowcroft anchored within four miles of that place, and landed on the right bank. There, on the morning of the 20th, he was joined by a brigade of the Nipál force, with six guns. Rowcroft then received orders to bring up his boats to Phúlpúr, so as to allow of their being used for the passage of the remainder of the Nipál force at that place. But, before he could carry out this order, information reached Rowcroft that Phúlpúr was occupied by the rebels. Accordingly he marched on that place, drove the rebels from it and captured three of their guns. Then, bringing up his boats, he made of them a bridge spanning the stream, and allowed the Nipál troops to cross. It was then arranged that Rowcroft, with the Pearl Brigade, the Yeomanry Cavalry, which had joined him, and two Nipál regiments, should occupy Gorákhpur, to keep open the communications, whilst Jang Bahádur should march viá Sultánpur on Lakhnao.

Rowcroft approaches the Nipál force, and defeats the rebels at Phúlpúr.

Crossing the Ghághrá, Jang Bahádur marched to Ambarpur on the 25th February. The road to that place was commanded by a small fort, having a triple line of defence within a bamboo jungle, and defended by thirty-four men. It was necessary to storm this post, for, though it might be turned, its continued occupation by the rebels would enable them to act on the communications of the advancing force. The Nipál troops, then, were sent against it. It was defended with so much vigour and resolution, that the assailants lost seven men killed and forty-three wounded before they gained possession of it. The defenders died, all, at their posts.

Jang Bahádur enters Oudh, and storms a strong fort.

* The Ghághrá is the chief river of Oudh. It rises in the sub-Himálayan ranges of Nipál, traverses Oudh and western Bihár, and falls into the Ganges at Chaprá after a course of about six hundred miles.

The effect of this capture was great, for two days later the rebels evacuated a larger fort occupied by two hundred men, towards which the Nipálese were advancing. Neither their passage across the Gúmtí near Sultánpur, nor their further progress to Lakhnao, was disturbed by the enemy. They ^{March 10-11,} reached the vicinity of that city on the 10th March, ¹⁸⁵⁸ and moved into line with the British army on the 11th, in full time to take part in the capture of that city.

I propose now to turn to General Franks. On the 29th November that officer had been appointed to command the troops in the Ázamgarh and Jaumpúr districts. The force at his disposal consisted of about five thousand five hundred men—of whom three thousand two hundred were Nipálese—and twenty guns. His own ^{his force ;} brigade was composed of the 10th, 20th, and 97th Foot, the 6th company 13th battalion, and 8th company 2nd battalion Royal Artillery; detachments of the 3rd battalion Madras, and of the fifth battalion Bengal, Artillery, and a detail of native artillery. The Assistant ^{his Assistant Adjutant-General ;} Adjutant-General of the force was Captain H. Havelock, son of the famous general, and who had served under Franks, as Adjutant of the 10th Regiment, for six years. This gallant officer, on learning the nomination of his old colonel to the command of the force, had at once applied to serve with it; and on the application being granted, though still suffering from severe wounds, had hastened to join. Franks was officially informed that his main duties would ^{his instructions.} consist in protecting Banáras against attack, in preventing the rebels from crossing the Ganges into Bihár, in recovering British districts occupied by them. It was at the same time impressed upon him, in a memorandum, that the safety of Banáras was the prime, the main consideration, to which every other was to be subordinated.*

Nevertheless, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Central Provinces, ^{Supplementary instructions given to him by Mr. Grant.} Mr. J. P. Grant, in communicating this memorandum to Colonel Franks, wisely supplemented it with a description of the state of the frontier, of the rebel chiefs, of their following, of the positions they had taken up, as well as of the probable means of offence and defence at their disposal. This memorandum, written clearly and with accurate knowledge, proved of inestimable value.

* Lord Canning's Memorandum, dated 29th November, 1857, addressed to Colonel Franks.

By the end of December, Franks had organized his force, and had placed it in strong defensive positions, showing a bold front to the invader. His right column was near Ázamgarh. His centre some miles in front of Jaunpúr, and his left at Badlapúr. Though the attitude taken up imposed on the rebels so far as to prevent them from hazarding an attack, it did not hinder them from pillaging and plundering the districts about a hundred and twenty miles to the west of Jaunpúr.

He shows a bold front to the invader.

The leader of the rebels was called Mehndí Husen. He called himself Názim of Sultánpur. Like many men who rise to the surface in a period of riot and disorder, he was an adventurer, whose main object in life was to secure for himself something tangible out of the general wreck. He had under him about fifteen thousand men, mostly matchlock-men, of whom not more than a third could be depended upon to fight. The rebel leader had his headquarters at Chandá, a town thirty-six miles from Jaunpúr, on the direct road from that station to Sultánpur; but his lieutenant, Fazal Azím, occupied a strong position at Saráun, just fourteen miles north of Allahábád. His outposts were within four miles of that place.

The rebel leader

and his army.

Franks had no regular cavalry. He had, indeed, thirty-eight mounted policemen, known as the Banáras Horse, commanded by Captain Matheson. To compensate as far as possible for the deficiency, he had mounted twenty-five men of the 10th Foot, and placed them under the command of Lieutenant Tucker of the Bengal Cavalry. The services rendered by these men can scarcely be exaggerated, but their numbers were insufficient to effectively follow up a victory. It would have been easy for him, with the force at his disposal, to beat the pseudo Názim or his lieutenant; but a barren victory—a victory which could not be efficiently followed up—would be useless. The Government and the Commander-in-Chief were equally alive to the necessity that Franks should be supplied with horsemen in sufficient numbers, and they did all that seemed to them possible under the circumstances. But the supply could only proceed by detachments. The first of these,

How Franks's want of cavalry was attempted to be supplied.

composed of two squadrons of the Bays, and four horse artillery guns, was despatched from Allahábád on the 20th of January to reinforce him.

As soon as he heard that cavalry were on their way to join him, Franks (21st January) moved forward with his left column, numbering fourteen hundred men, of whom eight hundred were Nipálese, and six guns, to Sikandrá, seven miles from Saráun. He found that Fazal Azím, with eight thousand men and fourteen guns, was still at that place. Fazal Azím heard at the same time of the arrival at Sikandrá of General Franks. The country all about Saráun being open, he broke up his camp that night and advanced to Nasratpur, a very strong position, held then by an ally, an influential talukdár, Béni Bahádur Singh. In this position, extremely strong by nature, and the approach to which had been rendered more difficult by art, the two friends hoped to be able to give a good account of any assailant, even though that assailant should be British.

Franks learned next morning of the retreat of the rebels. He could not attack them at once, for his cavalry had not come up, and he had directed them to join him at Sikandrá. The day of the 22nd, then, was devoted to preparing for the move, which he thought would scarcely be delayed beyond the morrow. Franks meanwhile gathered all the information possible regarding the enemy's position, and, whilst receiving this, he erected a kind of stockade, or fortified enclosure, there to leave his baggage whilst he should march on the enemy.

In this way the day passed, anxiously towards the closing hours, for the sun set, and no cavalry appeared. At last, about eight o'clock, they arrived, accompanied by four horse artillery guns. There was no more hesitation. Next morning Franks sent his men in two columns against the enemy. The strength of the position did not stop them; Nipálese rivalled European. With the loss of only six men slightly wounded, the stronghold was captured; the rebels hastily fleeing to save as many of their guns as possible. Two of these were captured; but the density of the jungle, in the first instance, and the difficult nature of the ground beyond the jungle, in the second, greatly impeded the action of the Franks moves forward.

The enemy advance to a strong position.

Franks waits for his cavalry.

Franks attacks and beats the rebels.

cavalry, and the rebels, acquainted with the by-paths, were able to carry the remainder across the Oudh frontier.

After the action, Franks was forced, in obedience to orders, to his regret, to send back the cavalry to Allahábád. The cavalry sent back to Allahábád.

Having destroyed the rebel stronghold, Franks moved to Saráun, re-established the civil authorities in the districts bordering on Allahábád, and then returned to Badlapúr, preparatory to an advance by Šultánpur on Lakhnao. Thence he moved eight miles in advance to Singramáu, close to the frontier, there to await the action of Jang Bahádur, on his right, at Gorákhpur. Franks moves to the Oudh frontier at Singramáo,

We have seen how the arrival of Rowcroft at Gorákhpur on the 19th February had loosened the hands of the Nipál Mahárájah. Franks set out the same day for Šultánpur. The distance was thirty-three miles, but the greater portion of it was occupied by the rebels. Their advanced post, Chandá, thirteen miles from Singramáu, was guarded by eight thousand men, of whom two thousand five hundred were Sipáhis trained by British officers; and another strong corps of ten thousand men lay within a few miles of them. and advances to Šultánpur.

Franks, I have said, marched on the 19th from Singramáu. His plan was to move rapidly and defeat the enemy's forces in detail, and he carried out his programme to the letter. Reaching Chandá about eight o'clock in the morning, he found the place occupied by the rebel corps I have already mentioned. This corps, eight thousand strong, had eight guns, a good position, and every incentive to make a sturdy resistance. Its commander, a civil officer, named Banda Husen, had despatched very early that morning express messengers to his chief, the pseudo-Názim, Mehndi Husen, informing him of the approach of the British, and begging him to move up with his following of ten thousand men to his support. Could he resist but for three hours, that support was assured to him. He reaches Chandá.

But the impetuous onslaught of the British and Nipálese was not to be withstood even for three hours. Sipáhis from four trained regiments were there, but they were there only to give way, almost without a serious effort. After a contest, which did not cost the allies a single man, Chandá was occupied, and the enemy were pursued three miles further to Rámpurá. Proceedings of the enemy.

Franks attacks and defeats Banda Husén,

At Rámpúrá Franks halted—only for two hours. He had become aware that the reinforcements under Mehndi Husen were on their way, and he had made up his mind to deal with them before they should recover from the panic which the defeat of the Chandá force would certainly inspire. He took ground, then, to the left, and occupied the village of Hamírpur. Mehndi Husen was in full march for Chandá when he learned from some fugitives of the defeat of his lieutenant. Surprised as he was, he still hoped to retrieve the day. After a short halt for reflection, he made a circuit, and, as the shades of evening were falling, he appeared on the left rear of Franks's position. But Franks was not so to be caught. At once changing front, he dashed at the rebels. Surprised, when they had hoped to surprise, they made but the semblance of resistance, and then fled in disorder. Owing to the lateness of the hour, Franks pursued them but a short distance: he then bivouacked on the ground he had occupied before the action.

and Mehndi Husen.

The loss of the allies in these two actions amounted to only eleven wounded—a proof of the slightness of the resistance. That of the enemy cannot be accurately computed; but the speed of their flight and the paucity of cavalry with the victors would induce the belief that it was not considerable.

Losses on both sides.

Importance to both parties of the fort of Budháyan.

The pseudo-Názim rallied his forces at Wári, intent on renewing the struggle. Between the contending armies and Sultánpur was a very strong fort, surrounded by a jungle, and completely commanding the approaches to that town—the fort of Budháyan. The Nazim was thoroughly well aware of the importance of this position, and he resolved to secure it. But Franks possessed a knowledge not inferior and a determination at least equal. He possessed, too, this advantage, that at Hamírpur he occupied a position from which he could deal a blow at any enemy who should attempt to attack Budháyan from Wári. The Názim did, nevertheless, make the attempt, and in a manner which entitled him to some consideration as a general. It was far from his desire to encounter the English in the plain. The recollection of the battle of the previous day was strong within him. But he was anxious to mislead his enemy, and gain a post from which he could defy him.

But he failed. Do what he would, Franks always put himself in his way. After a long day of manœuvring, it came to this,—that the army which was ready to fight a battle would gain Budháyan. The Názim would do everything but that. Franks would do everything including that. The greater daring gained the day, and on the afternoon of the 21st Franks occupied the strong fortress. The Nazim, baffled, though not discouraged, made a long détour, and turning the town of Sultánpur, took up a position at Bádsháhganj, two miles beyond it, ready there to dispute the further progress of the allies; on this point, he rallied all his scattered partisans, and the troops of Banda Husen. Here, too, he was joined by Mírzá Gaffúr Beg, a general of artillery under the ex-king of Oudh, who had been sent from Lakhnao for the express purpose of assuming the command and of driving back Franks. He assumed the command, but he did not drive back Franks.

Franks out-manœuvres
the Názim, who takes up a strong position near Sultánpur.

Franks had halted at Budháyan on the 22nd to await the arrival of the Láhor Light Horse and the Pathán cavalry, urgently required and anxiously expected. But, as these had not arrived on the early morning of the 23rd, he felt constrained to act without them. He set out, then, at 6 o'clock in the morning of that day, to attack the enemy.

Franks is constrained to act without cavalry.

The position which Gaffúr Beg occupied was very formidable. It may thus be described. His whole front was protected by a deep and winding nullah, which ran into the Gúmtí. The main body extended in a line, a mile and a half in length, in the plain behind that nullah, the left resting on the Sultánpur bazaar, the centre placed behind the ruined lines of the police battalion; the right covered by a range of low hillocks in advance of the village and strong masonry buildings of Bádsháhganj. The nullah which covered his front was crossed by the road leading to Lakhnao, and which Franks must traverse. To prevent such a movement, Gaffúr Beg placed his principal battery on this road. The rest of his guns were distributed along his front, three being posted in the village near the bazaar on his extreme left, six in the masonry buildings of Bádsháhganj on his right.

The position
of the rebels
at Sultánpur.

Formidable though the position was, it had one great fault. It could be turned on its right. The road from Allahábád to Lakhnao, to the south-west, crossed the nullah at a point out of reach of the enemy's fire, and led to ground behind their right. Gaffúr Beg had forgotten this, for he had pushed neither cavalry nor scouts in that direction.

Its defects.

Franks marched, as I have said, at 6 o'clock in the morning.

Franks detects the weak point of the rebels' position.

At about 9 o'clock, or a few minutes after, his advance guard, composed of the twenty-five mounted men of the 10th Foot, and thirty-eight men of the Banáras Horse, which constituted his only cavalry, caught sight of the enemy's outposts on the nullah. Franks at once halted his force. He had detected the weak point in the position of the enemy, and had resolved to profit by it.

Feigning a front attack, occupying the enemy by a demonstration which had all the appearance of being real, he moved his infantry and light guns obliquely to the left, and seized the Allahábád road. The feigned attack so completely concentrated upon it all the attention of the enemy, that they heeded not the movement of the infantry brigades, and those brigades had reached a position completely in rear of the enemy's right before the latter had the smallest suspicion that they were not in front of them. Their surprise, when the Anglo-Indian force deployed and attacked, may be surmised. In vain did they attempt to rectify the error, to bring their guns round to the new front:—it was too late. The English pushed forward with a decision that allowed no time to repair mistakes. In advance even of the skirmishers, a gallant officer of Engineers, who had during the siege of Lakhnao rendered the most splendid service, Macleod Innes, Macleod Innes.

Battle of Sultánpur.

secured the first hostile gun, as the rebels were abandoning it. Falling back from this, the rebels rallied round another gun further back, from which the shot would, in another instant, have ploughed through the advancing columns. Macleod Innes noticed the danger. He never stopped to consider, but galloping up, alone and unsupported, he shot the gunner as he was about to apply the match, and remaining undaunted at his post, the mark for a hundred matchlockmen who were sheltered in some adjoining huts, kept the artillerymen at bay till assistance reached

His splendid gallantry.

him.* The British line then swept on, and its left soon reached the high road to Lakhnao. A minute later and it had captured the central battery. Franks himself, cap in hand, led the skirmishers of the 10th Foot right up to the guns, which the enemy's gunners served to the last, dying at their posts. After this, the battle was over. Fugitives in vast numbers, who had left behind them twenty guns (one 32-pounder, two 24-pounders, two 18-pounders, four 12-pounders, one 9-pounder, and ten smaller pieces), their camp, their baggage, and their ammunition, covered the plains, followed by the British horsemen and the infantry. How many of them were killed or wounded it is impossible to record. "Had the Láhór Light Horse and Patháns reached me six hours sooner," wrote Franks, "when the whole plain was covered with fugitives, whom the utmost efforts of my infantry could not overtake, their loss would have been considerably heavier." The casualties on the side of the British amounted to two killed and five wounded. The cavalry referred to—augmenting the cavalry force under Franks to six hundred sabres—arrived on the ground shortly after the action was over.

* For this splendid act Macleod Innes—who, happily, still survives—received the Victoria Cross.

The enemy
totally defeated,

but not efficiently pursued for want of cavalry,

The next morning Franks was joined by the Cavalry.* This body of horse, raised on the Guide principle under the auspices of Colonel Lake, Deputy Commissioner of Jálándhar, only a few months before, and equipped and drilled by Lieutenant Aikman, had marched from the Satlaj to join Franks in an incredibly short space of time—the last march covering forty miles. "I did not expect you for a fortnight," exclaimed Franks, as he welcomed Aikman: "had I known you would have been here, I would at any cost have postponed the action." It will be seen that, though too late to share in the battle of Sultánpur, Aikman was to inaugurate the arrival of his new levies by an action not yielding in brilliancy to any performed in the campaign.

Jálándhar

who arrive after the action.

Aikman joins with the Jálándhar
cavalry.

The road to Lakhnao was now apparently open, and there seemed little chance of any further opposition being offered. But on the early morning of the 1st March, Aikman, who had been posted for the night three miles in advance of the camp with a hundred of his men,

Gallant deed of Aikman.

* This regiment was subsequently absorbed into the 3rd Sikh Cavalry.

learned that a body of five hundred rebel infantry, two hundred cavalry, and two guns, under a noted rebel chief, Mansab Ali, who had long evaded pursuit, occupied a position three miles off the high road, on the banks of the Gúmtí. This was quite enough for Aikman. Despatching a trooper to Franks, begging him to send up in support the cavalry and the guns, he led his men to the spot, charged the enemy, totally defeated them, killed more than a hundred of them, and drove the survivors into and across the Gúmtí, capturing the two guns. This gallant and successful charge was made under every disadvantage of broken ground, and partially under the flanking fire of a hostile fort. Nothing could exceed the splendid daring displayed by Aikman on this occasion. For some time he was at sword's point with several rebels at the same time, and from one of them he received a severe sabre-cut across the face. The cool and resolute courage with which he continued to fight inspired his men with the supreme resolution which caused the combat to terminate in the successful manner I have described.* The cavalry and the guns arrived after the fight was over.

After this crowning event of his victorious march, Franks pushed on, and, on the morning of the 4th, reached a mosque a mile beyond the town of Améthi, eight miles from Lakhnao. He had received orders from the Commander-in-Chief to advance. Learning, however, that the fort of Daurára, two miles to the right of the road, was occupied by a large body of the rebels with two guns, Franks, apprehensive that that body, if unmolested, might annoy his long train of baggage, resolved to drive them out.

The resolution in itself was perfectly sound, but the mode in which it was carried out left much to be desired. The repulse at Duadrára. Against the fort Franks detached, with a body of cavalry, only two horse artillery guns. In vain did Havelock protest, as far as he could protest, urging the general to use the two 24-pounder howitzers which were available. Franks was obstinate. The result was that the two horse artillery guns, moved up successively to four hundred, three hundred, and even two hundred yards of the fort, failed to breach the walls or to silence the matchlock fire of the rebels. Subsequently the 24-pounder howitzers were brought up, the outer defences were forced, and the hostile guns were captured; but the rebels barricaded themselves in a house guarded by a massive gate, and still bade defiance to the British. The shot from one of their own guns which had been turned against this making no impression upon it, and a fire kindled against it producing no effect, and the only engineer officer, Macleod Innes, having been severely wounded while trying to burst the gate open, Franks determined to withdraw. The force then resumed its march and joined Sir Colin the same evening.*

* Lieutenant, afterward Lieutenant-Colonel, Aikman received the Victoria Cross for this gallant act. He died in the autumn of 1888.

This was the last action which signalised Franks's successful march from the borders of eastern to central Oudh. He joined Sir Colin on the night of the 4th March, having, in thirteen days, marched a hundred and thirty miles, beaten an enemy immensely superior in four general actions, and captured thirty-four pieces of ordnance, with the small loss of thirty-seven officers and men killed and wounded. Such leading needs no comment. Franks was known as one of the best regimental officers in the British army. This short campaign stamped him as qualified to take very high rank among its generals. The repulse at Daurará was little more than an accident, arising from over-confidence.

Results of Franks's
campaign.

It is true he was well supported. In Captain, now Sir Henry, Havelock, he had an Assistant Adjutant-General, who combined to a vigorous frame an ardent love of his profession and a clear head, able to detect the weak points of an enemy's position, and to devise the means of profiting by his faults. Havelock was a born general, and, possessing as he did the entire confidence of Franks, his intuition may be discerned in every action but one of this short campaign. That one was the last. Against the attack with insufficient means, when sufficient means were available, Havelock protested with all the energy of his nature. Had his advice been followed, the great opportunity which had been in the grasp of Franks would not have been denied him.

Havelock.

But there was another gentleman attached to Franks's staff, whose services deserve special mention. I allude to Mr. Patrick Carnegy, of the uncovenanted service.

Patrick
Carnegy.

* It was believed that this check had important consequences for Franks. He had been selected by Sir Colin to command the corps d'armée which was to act on the left bank of the Gúmtí; but when, it is said, Sir Colin heard of the slap on the face he had received at Daurará, he struck his name out and substituted that of Outram.

The son of a general officer in the service of the Company, Patrick Carnegy had wanted the interest which in those days was required to obtain for a man a commission in the military service. Forced to become a civilian in the uncovenanted grade, Carnegy had brought to the performance of his duties an intelligence, an industry, and a zeal which would have won his spurs in any profession. He worked his way up steadily. He gained the confidence of the Government and the affection of the people. His tact and judgment enabled him to steer clear through every crisis. In Franks's camp he had charge of the intelligence department, and in this office his knowledge of the people, their language and their customs, made him invaluable. Brought constantly into connection with Havelock, who was scarcely less distinguished as a linguist, a desire to attain the same ends in the same plain straightforward manner brought about an intimate friendship, in itself most advantageous to the public service.* "His information regarding the enemy has proved so correct," wrote General Franks, "that on it alone the whole of my operations might have been planned: he has always accompanied me in the field, and assisted in carrying orders under the heaviest fire." Another non-military gentleman, Mr. Venables, whose services will be more specially referred to further on, rendered splendid service in this campaign. Colonel Longden, of the 10th Foot, showed, too, special qualifications for the service in which he was employed, that of commanding the advanced guards of marksmen and light guns.

The troops led by these men from the eastern side of the province have at last been brought to the scene of action, their part in which is to be so brilliant. But before I narrate their deeds, or the deeds of their comrades now marching from Kánhpúr, it is fit that I should briefly tell how Outram had borne his part in the period which had elapsed since the Commander-in-Chief, on the 26th November, had entrusted to his untiring energy the safe keeping of the Álambágh, and to his watchful eye a supervision over Lakhnao.

The story
reverts to
Outram.

* In subsequent years Mr. Carnegy rose as high in the service as it was possible for an uncovenanted officer to rise. Had he had a commission, or had he entered the Civil Service, there is scarcely any position in India to which he might not have attained. He died about four years ago.

CHAPTER VIII.

OUTRAM AT THE ÁLAMBÁGH.

IN the second chapter of this book,* I stated that on the 26th November Sir Colin Campbell, marching with his large convoy to Kánhpúr, had left to occupy the Álambágh and to threaten Lakhnao, until he should return, Major-General Sir James Outram, with a force of between three and four thousand men of all arms, and twenty-five guns and howitzers.† As the period of Sir Colin Campbell's return is now approaching, it is fit that I should relate how Outram and his gallant warriors had comported themselves during the more than three months which intervened between the departure and the return of the Commander-in-Chief.

The Álambágh, "the Garden of the World," was one of the royal gardens, being a square of five hundred yards, enclosed by a wall about nine feet high, and entered by a handsome gateway. In the centre was a double-storied garden-house of masonry. The garden had been full of fruit trees; but these had been cut down, and all traces of them had disappeared. The wall, on the city side, had been strengthened by a strong ramp of earth; and an interior earthen ramp or traverse had been thrown all round the centre building to protect it from the enemy's fire. Well-formed earthen bastions had been erected at each angle,

The Álam-
bagh.

* Page 155.

† The European force consisted of three hundred and thirty-two artillerymen, two hundred and ninety-two cavalry, two thousand seven hundred and seventy-one infantry; the Native, of a hundred and eight artillerymen, seventy-seven cavalry, and eight hundred and sixty-two infantry, or in all four thousand four hundred and forty-two. But, of these, five hundred and forty were detached to the Banní bridge. The infantry regiments were the 5th, the 95th, the 84th, the 98th, the 90th, the 1st Madras Fusiliers, the Firúzpúr Regiment, the 27th Madras Native Infantry, and the Madras Sappers.

and the face of the enclosure next the road was protected by a ditch. It lay on the right of the high road coming from Kánhpúr, at a distance of about two miles from the outskirts of the city of Lakhnao.

Outram did not occupy the Álambágh with his main force. Holding it with a small detachment and a few guns, he pitched his camp in the open, about half a mile behind it. He thus occupied a position across the road, extending to the right and left on either side; on the right as far as the fort of Jalálábád, and covered on all points by batteries, trenches, and abattis; on one or two by some happily situated swamps.

The artificial defences I have indicated were not thrown up at once, they were developed as the energy of the enemy showed them to be required. But that enemy had received a lesson so severe in the storming of the Sikandarbágh and of the Sháh Najaf, and in the bombardment of the Kaisarbágh, that several days elapsed ere he ventured to show himself on the track of the conqueror who had robbed him of his prey. Nor was it till the early days of December that any indications of life or movement whatever were visible on his part. But on the 2nd December it became apparent that he had recovered heart, and that he was preparing an attempt to dislodge Outram.

The British right, resting on the fort of Jalálábád, was tolerably secure. The leader of the rebels, the famous Maulaví, known as Ahmad Sháh, far from meditating an attack in that quarter, had devised a plan, not at all despicable had it been carried out with sufficient force and with energy, whereby, amusing the whole front of the British, he should suddenly turn their left, and, pouncing on the Banní bridge, hem them in between two fires.

The manner in which the Maulaví prepared to execute this plan indicated a return of confidence. His men began, in the first week of December, to throw up batteries in front of the British left. When these were completed, they proceeded to extend them towards their proper left, opposite the right centre of the British. Whilst these works were in progress, they threatened the British position, skirmishing up to within grape distance, but always making their attacks in front. They repeated these

Position
taken up by Outram.

The enemy greatly disheartened by the successful withdrawal.

Their leader devises a skilful plan to expel
Outram.

Recovering confidence, they begin to work out their plan.

attacks until the gunners of Outram's force came to look forward to a daily visitation as a matter of course.

At length, on the 22nd December, the rebels threw off the mask, and attempted to carry out the programme they had drawn up. They sent a detachment of four thousand infantry, four hundred cavalry, and four guns, to march by the villages of Gailí and Badrúp to Banní, and there, in the rear of the British force, to intrench themselves, severing the communications with Kánhpúr.

The rebels
make their attack.

The plan was skilful, and, had it been as skilfully executed, it might have greatly embarrassed the British. But, two days before it was executed, it had been betrayed to Outram by his spies. Possessing thus the inestimable advantage of complete acquaintance with his enemy's designs, Outram determined to play their own game against them; and, whereas they were trying to sever his communications with Kánhpúr, he determined to see if he could cut them off from Lakhnao.

Their plan
had been betrayed to
Outram.

The rebels set out on the night of the 21st December, reached the village of Gailí, and, occupying a position between that village and Badrúp, encamped for the night. In that position they were not quite cut off from Lakhnao, for the left of their position was but half a mile from the Dilkushá, which had, since Sir Colin's departure, been strongly re-occupied by the insurgents.

The rebels
try to sever Outram's
communications.

Against the rebels so encamped, Outram started very early on the morning of the 22nd, with a force consisting of twelve hundred and twenty-seven infantry, under Brigadier Stisted, a hundred and ninety cavalry, under Major Robertson, and six 9-pounder guns, under Captain Olpherts. At daybreak he came upon them. Sending his centre against their main position, with his left he drove them from Gailí, doubling them back on Badrúp. Surprised, the rebels scarcely attempted resistance as these manœuvres were being carried out. They lost their four guns and an elephant. At Badrúp Stisted again attacked them, and forced them to relinquish their hold. They then changed their line of retreat, and fell back on the Dilkushá. The pursuit then ceased, and in sufficient time. For the detachments from the main rebel army, hearing the attacks them,

Outram

and drives them back on the Dilkushá.

uproar, were crowding from the Dilkushá to retrieve the day. They arrived in time only to receive their beaten comrades. The loss of the rebels exceeded fifty killed. That of Outram amounted to two killed and some eight or ten wounded.

This repulse considerably checked the enemy's ardour, and during the three weeks that followed they but once made a manifestation of attack. On this occasion they confined themselves to a long cannonade, ineffective against the British position, but too successful in killing a most prominent artillery officer, Lieutenant D. Gordon. Nothing further occurred till the 12th January. But on that day the rebels made a supreme effort for victory.

After three weeks' comparative rest, the courage of the rebels returns

Circumstances seemed to favour them. They were well served by their spies, and they had learned that on the 8th January Outram had weakened his force by four hundred and fifty infantry, eighty cavalry, and four guns, detached to protect a convoy of empty carts—to be laden and returned—he was sending on learning that Outram has weakened his force.

into Káhnepúr.

A rebel partisan, named Mansab Álí, was at this time in the district, in communication with the main body of the Lakhnao rebels. The task had been assigned to him to hover about the main line of British communication, and to harass and, when possible, to cut off small detachments and convoys. It had become known to Outram that early in January this man had received considerable reinforcements from Lakhnao. Hence it was that he had detached a large covering party with the convoy I have alluded to.

Reasons for weakening the force.

The Lakhnao rebels waited till they believed that the convoy and its escort had reached Káhnepúr. They then, on the morning of the 12th January, made their long-meditated attack.

They came out in force—to the number, it is estimated, of thirty thousand. Massing this large body opposite the extreme left of Outram's position, they gradually extended so as to face his front and his left flank, thus covering nearly six miles of ground. Threatening with their left, their right centre and right advanced to the real attack.

The rebels make their supreme effort.

Outram waited till the enemy's movement should take some ascertainable form. He allowed them, therefore, to extend—even round his left flank. But the moment their advance was sufficiently pronounced he dealt, with rapidity, the counter blow he kept ready for delivery. Forming up his two brigades, the one consisting of seven hundred and thirteen, the other of seven hundred and thirty-three European troops, to face the front attack of the enemy, he directed the ever-daring Olpherts to take four horse artillery guns, and, supported by a detachment of the Military Train, to dash at the overlapping right of the enemy. The protection of the rear of the position in case it should be threatened, was confided to the volunteer and native cavalry.

Outram develops his plans.

With the dash and energy eminently characteristic of the man, Olpherts took out his guns at a gallop, and, pushing to the front, opened fire on the rebel masses just as they had begun the second overlapping movement, to gain the rear of the British position. The vigorous assault made by Olpherts completely disconcerted them. Renouncing their turning efforts, they fled in confusion and dismay.

Olpherts foils the enemy's right.

Whilst Olpherts was thus delivering a decisive blow on the extreme right, a repulse, scarcely less signal, had been inflicted upon the rebel troops opposed to the British left centre. These advanced with considerable spirit into a grove of trees in front of the picket commanded by Captain Down, of the Madras Fusiliers, and usually occupied by him. Down allowed them to come rather near; then, dashing at them with the bayonet, drove them back with loss. Whilst the enemy were thus being repulsed in their attacks on the left and the left centre, they had not been idle on the British right. This part of the British line was covered by the fort of Jalálábád, upon which some rough repairs had been executed, and it was considered comparatively unassailable. Knowing this, and deeming it probable that because the fort was considered strong it would be therefore weakly garrisoned, the rebel leader, whilst threatening, as we have seen, the left, and making on that side a noisy demonstration, had quietly massed a large body of infantry against the picket connecting the right with Jalálábád, and, bringing their three guns to the front, opened upon that picket a heavy fire. But here, too, Outram was equal to the occasion. Bringing to the front, from the left of the right brigade, detachments of the 5th Fusiliers and Brasyer's Sikhs, and two guns of Moir's bullock battery, he took up a position which gave him the right flank of the enemy, and then opened upon that flank. The effect was instantaneous. The rebels abandoned the advanced position, evacuated the village they had occupied, and, though for a time they continued the fire from their guns, their practice was bad, and caused no damage.

Down foils their centre.

Simultaneously with the attack just described, the enemy advanced against the Álambágh, and established themselves in a thick cover close to that enclosure. From this, about 12 o'clock, they advanced into the open. Here, however, they became exposed to a heavy fire from Maude's guns and riflemen, and were soon driven back.

By 4 o'clock in the afternoon the rebels were in full retreat on all sides. Their losses must have been considerable. Outram's amounted, on that day, to only three wounded.

The serious manner in which the rebels were affected by their repulse and their losses was manifested in a very curious manner. The natives of India are peculiarly influenced by religious influences. They believe in fortunate days and periods—days and periods peculiarly auspicious for producing certain results. It happened that the most learned pandit in Lakhnao had declared on the 12th January that, unless the British were driven from their position within eight days from that period, they never would be expelled; and, moreover, that the period in question, from the 12th to the 20th inclusive, was peculiarly favourable to effecting their expulsion. In consequence of this prophecy, it had been resolved by the rebels to give the British no rest throughout the period indicated.

But, when the attack, prepared with so much foresight, and delivered with all the skill of which they were capable, failed, their spirits sank to zero; and, in spite of the pandit, they remained quiescent on the 13th and two following days. Nor was it till the 16th that they made their second attempt.

But though they made no attack on the British position, they did attempt to intercept the convoy. The active and determined Maulaví had sworn that he would capture the convoy and ride back into Lakhnao through the British camp. He left Lakhnao with a considerable force without baggage, on the night of the 14th, turned the

Outram foils
their left,

and they are driven back from the Álambágh,

Religious influences affecting the natives.

The Man-
laví's oath,

British camp, and took up a position from which he could advantageously pounce on the convoy. Everything seemed to favour him. A violent dust-storm was blowing towards the direction whence the convoy was approaching, and its leader had no warning. But again did Outram's prescience baffle him. Reports as to the Maulaví's movements had reached that general, and he, noting how the weather seemed to favour an attack, ordered out Olpherts with two guns and a detachment of the Military Train, on the road to Banní. He subsequently supported this small body with the rest of the battery and the Military Train, a detachment of Wale's Horse, and the 90th Light Infantry.

Olpherts revelled in danger. He possessed the coup-d'œil of a dashing leader, was ready in resource, and quick to act as circumstances might require. He waited for the enemy till he came in the open, and then opened on them and killed or dispersed them. The Maulaví was wounded and narrowly escaped capture.

and Olpherts's
performance.

Early on the morning of the 16th, between 1 and 3 o'clock, the convoy returned with supplies to the camp. The force was thus increased again by about four hundred men. No attack was anticipated, and many officers were about to unpack and distribute some of the private stores arrived, when, about 9 o'clock, the enemy made a sudden and very formidable attack on a picket guarding a battery in the process of erection, between Jalálábád and the camp. No guns were mounted here, and the picket had to fall back on the intrenchment; but the alarm had no sooner been given than Brasyer's Sikhs, ready for any emergency, rushed to the front, and, rallying the picket, put the enemy to flight and captured their leader, attired in the imaginary costume of the god Hanúmán.* He turned out to be a Brahman, very influential with his countrymen. The enemy's loss was severe.

The British
convoy safely arrives in camp.

An attack on the right is repulsed by Brasyer's
Sikhs.

On the left the rebels confined themselves for several hours to a cannonade on the position. Their attack, though it ranged along the whole front, seemed specially directed against the picket occupying a village on the extreme left. Their grape and round shot came in very thick at this point, but beyond sending their cavalry within

That on the left

* "Hanúmán," the deity who takes the form of the monkey.

a thousand yards of the British front, only to be driven back, they made no demonstration with the other arms till evening had set in. But as soon as it was dark they pushed forward masses of infantry against the village. The officer commanding at this point was Major Gordon, 75th Regiment. Gordon allowed the enemy's masses to approach within eighty yards, and then opened upon them with three guns and musketry, and drove them off immediately. The left rear was guarded by Olpherts with four horse battery guns and a detachment of the Military Train. With these he beat back the cavalry demonstration above indicated. The British loss from the enemy on this occasion amounted to one killed and seven wounded.

The failure on this occasion completed the discouragement of the rebels. From that time forth until the 15th February they confined themselves to demonstrations, to attempts to excite alarm—and to incessant bugling. Outram's spies announced attacks for given dates, but the dates passed by and the attacks were not made. Meanwhile the conviction seemed to be stealing into their minds that they were bound to a losing cause. They heard of the loss of Fathgarh, and rumours even reached them of the capture of Baréli. This conviction was not slow in producing discord in their councils, and blows between rival chieftains. On the 22nd January the troops led by the Moulaví, and those obeying the orders of the Begam came to a sharp encounter, resulting in the slaying of about a hundred men. All this time the advance portion of Sir Colin's force was approaching, and on the 23rd January Outram received a reinforcement of ten guns escorted by a part of the 34th Regiment. To counterbalance this, the remnants of the heroic 75th, of Dehlí renown, left on the 14th February for the Himálayas.

At last, goaded by the Maulaví, who, after a brief imprisonment by the Begam's party, had escaped and re-assumed his ascendancy in the rebel councils, the enemy hazarded an attack on the 15th. They attempted their favourite plan of turning the left. But Outram was ready for them. The 90th turned out, and Olpherts, always full of zeal, galloped to the front with his guns, accompanied by the cavalry of the Military Train. When within is driven back

by Gordon and Olpherts.

Thencefor-ward till the 15th Feb: u-ary the enemy cease to attack in force.

Contentions
among the rebels.

Outram receives reinforcements.

The Moulaví attacks on
the 15th,

four hundred yards of the rebels, Olpherts unlimbered and poured in round after round. The rebels could not stand it, but broke and fled. The British lost one man killed and one wounded.

but Olpherts drives him back.

On the morning of the 16th the rebels threatened to renew the attack, but, after a great deal of show, they retired. In the evening, however, they came on against the whole British front as though they were in earnest. They made four separate advances, and retired as often, coming under musketry fire only on one point, the extreme left of the British. But, finding the picket on the alert, they made no serious attack even here. Their advances were accompanied by yells and shouts and the clang of brass instruments. This day they admitted a loss of sixty killed and wounded.

Further vain manifestations of the rebels.

Stores were now coming in daily from Kánhpúr, and the movements of the various brigades of Sir Colin Campbell's force had become so pronounced as to spread conviction amongst the rebel leaders that unless they could, within the next five or six days, succeed in their projects against Outram, they would be forever baffled. They determined, therefore, to try one last grand assault—an assault better planned, on a larger scale, and more sustained than any of its predecessors. Having ascertained from their spies that it was the custom of the General and a large proportion of officers and men to attend church-parade early on Sunday morning, they fixed upon an early hour on the following Sunday, 21st February, for their great blow.

The rebels determine to attempt one last assault.

They had calculated correctly. The men of the right brigade were attending a church parade, the General being with them, when masses of the enemy began to concentrate opposite the extreme right and left of the British position. Captain Gordon, whom we have known as aide-de-camp to General Neill, and who was now on the staff, noticed the movements of the enemy from No. 2 battery, and rode down to report the fact to the General. Outram at once sent down the Assistant Adjutant-General, Captain Dodgson, to turn out the left brigade, whilst the batteries opened all along the line. For the enemy, originally massing their forces on both flanks, had gradually extended inwards, and were threatening the whole position. They had advanced, in fact, to within five hundred yards of the British position before the troops were turned out ready to receive him. But then the old story was repeated. On the right the enemy, advancing against Jalálábád, were checked by an artillery fire, whilst Captain Barrow, with two hundred and fifty of the volunteer cavalry and two guns, coming up from behind that fort, dashed upon a party sent to turn the British position, and drove them back to their main body. On the left, Olpherts and a squadron of the Military Mounted Train, under Major Robertson, carried out the same plan, with the same success. Forced now to make a front attack, and threatened in turn on their left, the enemy did not long persevere. Once indeed they made as though they would try and overwhelm the left turning party, but at the decisive moment some well-directed rounds of shrapnel and round shot induced them to pause. "He who hesitates is lost" is a truth more applicable even to warfare than to the ordinary affairs of life. They did not renew their design, but, at a quarter past 10 o'clock, fell back, beaten, baffled, and humiliated, to the city. They admitted to a loss of three hundred and forty men killed and wounded. That of the British amounted to nine men wounded.

Sunday, 21st February.

The rebels
fell back beaten.

The last, the most desperate, and the best-fought attack was made on the 25th February. During the few days immediately preceding, troops from Kánhpúr had been gradually pouring in, and up to that date the force under Outram's orders had been strengthened by the arrival of Remington's troop of horse artillery, of the 7th Hussars, of Hodson's Horse, and of the 1st Bengal Fusiliers. Hence he was now able, should he think fit, to retaliate more effectively on the enemy in the open plain.

Outram
receives reinforcements.

The despairing attack of the rebels was made with all the pomp and circumstance of war. For the first time the royal Begam, mounted on an elephant, attended by the Prime Minister and principal nobles, similarly mounted, accompanied the assailants. The proceedings began by a violent cannonade directed against the Álambágh at 7 o'clock in the morning. This lasted an hour. A little later, about 10 o'clock, a strong force was sent to threaten the British left, while the main body began to march along the right front, to the right, and out of the range of the guns. Of this force, which consisted of between twenty and thirty thousand men, a

The rebels
make a final attack in sheer desperation.

moiety, after passing the extreme point of the British right, made a sharp turn to the right again, and continued this until they had gained a position, sheltered by trees, in the right rear of the fort of Jalálábád. The other moiety, with which was the Begam, halted at the turning angle, so as to support the attack, or to maintain communications with the main posts, as might be required. The advanced portion began at once to shell the fort of Jalálábád.

The movement of the rebels to the right rear of the British position had been so pronounced that, at last, Outram thought he had them. Taking with him his right infantry brigade, four of Olpherts's guns, four of Remington's, a squadron of the 7th Hussars, the Military Train, and detachments of Hodson's Horse and Graham's Horse, he started, a little before 10 o'clock, to the right, to cut off the advanced moiety of the rebels, whilst Barrow's Volunteers and Wale's Horse, making a détour, should take them in rear.

Outram attempts to cut off the rebels from their base.

The line taken by Outram naturally brought him in sharp contact with the second or reserve moiety of the rebel army. The cavalry with this reserve, numbering nearly a thousand, supported by infantry, came up to within seven hundred yards of Outram's left flank, and threatened to come nearer. But the ubiquitous Olpherts, always ready, at once wheeled his four guns to the left, and, advancing a short distance, unlimbered and opened fire. The effect was remarkable. The Begam left the field, the Prime Minister followed in attendance, and the courtiers accompanied to guard the Prime Minister. The consternation caused by the fire of Olpherts's guns had not abated—for the enemy had begun to fall back—when Remington came up at full gallop, and, taking up a position about four hundred yards to the left and in advance of Olpherts, opened fire on the retreating enemy; the squadron of the 7th Hussars and Brasyer's Sikhs advanced with them, and kept the rebel cavalry in check.

He first drives back their supports.

Made secure of his left by the action of these gallant men, Outram pushed forward with the remainder of his force to deal with the first or advanced moiety of the enemy's army. Acting under his orders, Brigadier Campbell of the Bays took with him the Military Train and detachments of Hodson's

Brigadier Campbell charges and captures two guns.

Horse and Graham's Horse, and advanced beyond Jalálábád. Turning then to the right, he came in full view of the enemy. Alarmed by the sound of Olpherts's and Remington's guns, the rebels, sensible of the presence of danger, were forming up hurriedly when they caught sight of Campbell's horsemen. Campbell gave them no time for reflection, but at once charged the two guns which had been playing on the fort. The Sipáhis, surprised as they were, did not flinch. They met the charge with courage, and though, as its result, the two guns remained in the hands of the Military Train, fifty corpses about them testified to the desperate valour of the defenders.

The enemy's infantry meanwhile had fallen back on a tope of trees, from the upper branches of which some of their marksmen kept a constant fire on Outram's force as it approached. The defence of this tope was so sustained as to give time for the main body of the rebels to fall back and recover their line of retreat. They even once again threatened the fort, but gave way before the persuasive powers of Olpherts and Remington.

It was now half-past 2. The fighting for the day was apparently over. But the rebels were resolved to make one final effort. Strengthening their right with the troops who had fought in the morning, they made a desperate attack, about 5 o'clock, on the village forming the left front of the British position. Never had they fought with greater determination. They took possession of the tope of trees in front of the village, and then pressed on, encouraged by the fact that the British picket, just then short of ammunition, was falling back. But their triumph was short. A reinforcement came up, and forced them to retire. All that night, however, they continued their endeavours to take that village, threatening at the same time the entire left front of the position. Nor was it till the dawn of the following day that they gave up the task as hopeless.

With this attack the defence of the Álambágh may be said to merge into the more exciting drama of Lakhnao. It is, however, impossible to leave the gallant defenders of that important position without endeavouring, however inadequately, to indicate the great service which their prolonged occupation of it had rendered to the country. For more than three months

The rebels
succeed in falling back, and then make a final effort,

but are baffled.

Service rendered to the country
by the successful occupation of the Álambágh.

Outram, with a force originally nearly four thousand strong, and subsequently often smaller, had kept in check the main army of the rebels. That army, known in November to count thirty thousand men, most of them trained soldiers, under its banners, had been gradually augmented after the fall of Dehlí to more than treble that strength.* Between that augmented army and the Ganges lay Outram and his four thousand men—his right, his left, his rear, equally exposed. His nearest base was the Ganges; but between him and that base lay forty miles of road, guarded only at one point, the Banní bridge, and which, if sometimes occupied by the British, was occupied only by long convoys. He was, so to speak, in the air, liable to meet attacks on all sides. In point of fact, he was attacked on all sides—in front, on his flanks, and in his rear. If there be any who might be inclined to make light of the service rendered by his successful defence, I would ask them to consider what the state of affairs would have been had Outram succumbed to the attacks made upon him on all sides. He had no line of retreat but that leading to the Ganges. Driven from the Álambágh, he would have fallen back, hotly pursued, on that river. In the face of such pursuit, could he have crossed by the frail bridge of boats? No one will affirm that to have been possible; he would have been lost; Kánhpúr would have been reoccupied; Sir Colin's communications would have been severed; the rebels might have captured Állahábád, and—the Ázamgarh district and Bihár being in revolt—they could then have penetrated to Calcutta. All this would have been possible, but all this Outram and his gallant followers prevented by their gallant defence.

* Outram ascertained, on the 27th January, that the strength of the enemy on that date was as follows:—

37 trained regiments of sipáhis	27,550
14 regiments of new levies	5,400
106 Najíb, or irregular regiments	55,150
26 regiments of cavalry	7,100
Camel corps	800
					96,000

This computation did not include artillerymen, the number of whom was unknown, nor the armed followers of the talukdárs, estimated at 20,000. Altogether there could not have been less than 120,000 armed men in Lakhnao on that date.

Of Outram himself I have often spoken; but who were his followers? First, deserving a large meed of praise, comes Colonel Berkeley, of the 32nd Regiment, occupying virtually the position of chief of his staff. Than Berkeley it would have been difficult to find a more competent officer. To great activity of body he joined a head to devise the most complicated movements, and skill and coolness to carry them into execution. "He possesses," wrote Outram, after bearing testimony to his services, "to an extent I have rarely seen equalled, the power of securing the confidence, acquiring the respect, and winning the personal regard of those with whom he is thrown in contact." He was, in very truth, the right hand of his chief; and the relations between them, founded on mutual respect, were of the most cordial character.* Fit to be bracketed with Berkeley may be mentioned Vincent Eyre, Brigadier of the artillery force, who sustained to the full the reputation he had gained at Árah. In Olpherts and Maude he had lieutenants of more than ordinary skill and daring, always to the front, and always full of fight. Dodgson, the Assistant Adjutant-General—the most modest, the least pushing, but the bravest of men; always cool, calm, self-possessed, and yet always in the place where his services were most required; Macbean, the able and energetic commissariat officer, without whose fertility of resource the army could not have been fed; Moorsom, the Assistant Quartermaster-General, uniting to the finest qualities of a fighting soldier the skill of the accomplished draughtsman;—it was to his skill, indeed, that Outram and Havelock were indebted for the plan which enabled them to penetrate so skilfully to the Residency; Gould Weston, who had served throughout the long defence of that Residency in command of Fayrer's horse, and of whom, now attached to the Intelligence Department, Outram wrote in the despatch he penned after the capture of Lakhnao, that "he has signalized himself by the spirit and gallantry which he displayed on several occasions, and has been of much use to me"; Chamier and Hargood, most efficient as staff officers; Alexander Orr and Bunbury, useful from their knowledge of the country and the people; Barrow and Wale, daring cavalry leaders; Brasyer, of Brasyer's Sikhs—whose name in those stirring times was a household word; Nicholson, of the Royal Engineers, unsurpassed in his profession;—these are but a few names amongst the many of the gallant men who contributed to that splendid defence.

* This most gallant officer did not long survive the campaign in which he was so gloriously engaged.

But it has become a thing of the past. On the 1st March the Commander-in-Chief visited the Álambágh, and on the 3rd his troops were seen marching past that post. To the Commander-in-Chief, then, I must now return.

CHAPTER IX.

THE STORMING OF LAKHNAO.

THE total force at the disposal of Sir Colin Campbell for the siege of Lakhnao amounted to twenty thousand men and a hundred and eighty guns. With such an army Sir Colin was able to act on a scientific plan, at once effective and sparing of the lives of his soldiers.

The plan to be carried out had been the subject of many conversations between Sir Colin Campbell and the Chief Engineer, Brigadier Napier—now Lord Napier of Magdala—who had been his guest for some time at Kánhpúr. From these conversations a thorough understanding had been arrived at as to the general direction of the attack.*

* The statement, in the text, made by me in the first edition of this volume, regarding the part taken by Brigadier Napier in the plan for the attack on Lakhnao, having been taken objection to, I drew attention in the second edition to the official papers on the subject extracted from Volume X. of Professional Papers of the Corps of Royal Engineers. I now attach extract from a letter, dated the 4th of February, 1858, addressed by Brigadier Napier to Sir Colin Campbell, containing his proposals for the attack—all of which were accepted and carried out.

“MY DEAR SIR COLIN.—

“I am afraid you will be disappointed at not receiving the projects, but our people have been bringing a considerable amount of intelligence to fill up our plans, which have tempted me to enter into details. I may, however, briefly state that, notwithstanding the enemy has made a good many defences, and thrown up a ditch and rampart round the north side of the Kaisarbágh, and has endeavoured to cut away all the passages across the canal, I do not apprehend any great difficulty.

“I would propose to encamp the force sufficiently far behind the Dilkushá to be out of fire; to establish a bridge on the Gúmtí to pass over artillery and cavalry, to cut off the enemy’s supplies, and to deter them from bringing out guns on the north side of the river to annoy us.

“To cross the canal in the first instance at Banks’s house, under cover of our

The city of Lakhnao stretches in an irregular form on the right bank of the Gúmtí, for a length from east to west of nearly five miles, and an extreme width at the west side of one and a half mile; the east side diminishes in width to less than one mile.

Lakhnao.

Two bridges, one of iron and the other of masonry, span the Gúmtí, leading the traffic of the country from the north of the Gúmtí into the heart of the city.

A canal of deep and rugged section, enclosing the east and south sides, bears away to the south-west, leaving the approach to the west side of the city open, but intersected with ravines; towards the north-east, where the canal joins the Gúmtí, its banks are naturally shelving and passable.

March 1.
The canal.

The important positions within the city at the time of the siege were the Kaisarbágh, a palace about four hundred yards square, containing several tombs or ranges of buildings; not originally fortified, but strengthened since the November preceding; the Farhatbaksh palace, and the palaces adjoining it; the Residency; the ruins of the Machchí Bhawan, commanding the masonry bridge and on the south side of it; a series of strong buildings, the Great Imámbárah, the Jam'ánia-bágh, the Shesh-Mahall,

Description
of the strong places within the city.

artillery, and to place guns in position to bear on the mass of buildings which flank the European infantry barracks, the hospital, the Begam's house, and the Hazratganj—the places which rendered the European barracks so barely tenable—and to take that mass of buildings with the barracks.

"This position takes in flank all the defences of the north side of the Kaisarbágh, and from them we may penetrate gradually to the Kaisarbágh with the aid of the sapper and gunpowder, at the same time that we will occupy your old ground between the Kaisarbágh and the Gúmtí, to have positions for our artillery of all kinds to play on the Kaisarbágh and its surrounding buildings. We shall, during this time, be steadily penetrating through the buildings on the left of the European barracks, making irresistible progress until we reach the Kaisarbágh.

"Until we take that place we shall have as little street-fighting as is possible, and I hardly expect they will await an assault. But if they should do so, and defend the remainder of the city, we must advance, under cover of our mortars, until we occupy the bridges, which will certainly clear off the remainder, or they will starve.

"Jalálábád will be our depot, and when we have got the enemy's guns driven off, we may bring our park up to the Dilkushá.

"I should have chosen your old passage across the canal, but the enemy have cut a new one across the neck of a loop, and have put guns behind it, so that, as far as the intelligence guides us, Banks's house will be easier."

and Alí Nakí Khán's house, extending to the west along the banks of the river, and more or less surrounded by streets and houses; the Músabágh, a mile and a half beyond it; the Imámbarah and a range of palaces stretching from the Kaisarbágh towards the canal. Beyond the canal on the east side of the city was the Martinière, a fine range of buildings; and overlooking this and the eastern suburbs, on the brow of a table-land, stood the Dilkushá.*

The enemy, profiting by experience, had strengthened their defences by works exhibiting prodigious labour. Sir Colin Campbell's former route across the canal, where its banks shelved, was now intercepted by a new line of canal of very formidable section, flanked by strong bastions. This line of defence was continued up the canal beyond the Chárbágh bridge, more or less complete, and the banks of the canal had been scarped and rendered impassable.

The enemy had three lines of defence. A strong battery of three guns, resting against a mass of buildings called the Hazratganj, supported the outer line, at the junction of three main roads. A second line of bastioned rampart and parapet rested with its right on the Imámbarah, a strong and lofty building; thence, embracing the Mess House, it joined the river bank near the Motí Mahall. A third line covered the front of the Kaisarbágh.

These defences were protected by a hundred guns. In addition, all the main streets were protected by bastions and barricades, and every building of importance, besides being loop-holed, had an outer work protecting its entrance.

Brigadier Napier recommended that the east side should be attacked. His reasons were that that side offered the smallest front, and would therefore be more easily enveloped by the attack; that it possessed ground for planting the artillery—a condition not possessed by the western side; that it gave the shortest

The enemy had strengthened their defences.

Their three lines of defence.

Napier recommends an attack on the eastern side.

* Kaisarbágh, "the Imperial Garden." Jam'ania-bágh, "the garden of meeting." Shesha-Mahall, "the palace of mirrors." Machhí-Bhawan, "the house of fish." Imámbarah, "the building of the Imáms." Farhatbaksh Palace was the royal palace till the last King of Oudh built the Kaisarbágh. The Martinière, a building 2500 yards S.S.E. of the Sikandarbágh, was built and endowed by the famous Claude Martin. For a full description of these and other places in Lakhnao, the reader is referred to the excellent description by Captain Eastwick in Murray's Handbook to Bengal.

ations of the

ARMY

Y A O

858.

PLAN
to illustrate the operations of the
BRITISH ARMY
BEFORE
LAKHNAO
IN MARCH 1858.

Scale 4 Inches to 1 Mile

N.B. The Portion shown thus  is the continuation of the original fortification represents the new military works

approach to the Kaisarbágh; and that the positions in it were better known. The west side, moreover, presented a great breadth of dense, almost impenetrable, city, resting on the strong buildings on the river bank. Even were these obstacles to be overcome, the Kaisarbágh and the principal defences would still remain to be reduced.* This reasoning prevailed, and it was decided to attack Lakhnao on the eastern side.

I have not alluded to the northern side. Why the rebels should have neglected to throw up defences on that side seems, at the first glance, most strange. The real reason affords an additional proof to the many already cited of the absence of original thinking power from their ranks. The natives of India are essentially creatures of habit, of custom. When set to repeat a task already once accomplished, they follow implicitly the lines previously trodden. So it was now. Havelock and Outram, in their attempt to relieve Lakhnao, had advanced by the Chár-bágh bridge; Sir Colin Campbell, in November, had crossed the canal and attacked the Sikandarbágh. Neither the one nor the other had approached the Gúmtí. Hence, drawing the conclusion that the courses pursued before would be followed again, the rebels neglected the Gúmtí, and concentrated all their energies on the lines previously attacked.

Reasons why the northern face was neglected.

Sir Colin Campbell detected at a glance the error they had committed, and he resolved to profit by it. He had men enough at his disposal to risk a division of his forces. He determined, then, to send across the Gúmtí a division of all arms, which, marching up that river, should take the enemy's position in reverse, and, by the fire of artillery, render it untenable. At the same time, advancing with his main force across the canal, he would turn the enemy's position, and move by the Hazratganj on the Kaisarbágh. Whilst a strong force should hold the base of the triangle, Outram's force would occupy one side of it. Rather more than one half of the opposite side would be held by the Álambágh force and the Nipálese.

Sir Colin detects the weak point.

His plan of attack.

* The foregoing—commencing from the paragraph headed "Lakhnao"—is almost a literal transcript from the report of the Chief Engineer, Brigadier Napier, dated 31st March, 1858—a report addressed to the Chief of the Staff, but published by Lord Canning, Nov. 17th, 1858.

Neither the remaining part of that side nor the western side could, with the troops at his disposal, be hemmed in, but it was to be hoped that as Sir Colin advanced his base, Outram might move round the angle on one side, whilst the Álambágh force and the Nipálese might close up round the corresponding angle on the other. Should the execution equal the design, the entire rebel force would be reduced to extremities.

Early on the morning of the 2nd March, Sir Colin Campbell began to execute his plan. Taking with him the headquarters of the Artillery Division (Sir A. Wilson and Colonel Wood, C.B.) and three troops of horse artillery (D'Aguiar's, Tombs's, and Bishop's), two 24-pounders and two 8-inch howitzers of the Naval Brigade, and two companies of sappers and miners; the headquarters of the Cavalry Division (Hope Grant), and Little's Cavalry Brigade (9th Lancers, 2nd Panjáb Cavalry, detachment 5th Panjáb Cavalry, 1st Sikh Irregulars); and the 2nd Division of Infantry (Sir E. Lugard), comprising the 3rd and 4th Brigades; 3rd Brigade (Guy), 34th, 38th, and 53rd; 4th Brigade (Adrian Hope), 42nd and 93rd Highlanders and 4th Panjáb Rifles); he marched on the Dilkushá park. Passing the fort of Jalálábád within sight of the Álambágh force, Sir Colin drove in the advanced pickets of the enemy, and captured a gun. The palace was then seized and occupied as an advanced picket on the right—a small garden, known as Muhammad-bágh, fulfilling the same purpose on the left. It was found impossible to bring up the main body of the infantry, for the enemy's guns, in position along the canal, completely commanded the Dilkushá plateau. Sir Colin therefore drew back his infantry as far as was practicable, while he issued orders to erect batteries with all convenient haste at the Dilkushá and the Muhammad-bágh to play on the enemy and keep down their fire. Until the batteries could be established—and they were not established till late on the night of the 2nd—the British troops were greatly annoyed by an unremitting fire, directed with precision on a point the range to which was thoroughly well known.

March 2.
Sir Colin
advances

on the Dilkushá,
which he captures,

and erects
batteries
there to keep down the fire
of the rebels.

March 3.
The batteries
open,

But when, on the morning of the 3rd, the batteries established at the Dilkushá and Muhammad-bágh opened their fire, that of the rebels began perceptibly to slacken. They were, in fact, forced to withdraw their guns, and though, from the further distance whence they directed a new fire, the shot occasionally ranged up to and into the British camp, it caused but a trifling loss. On that day and the day following, then, the remainder of the siege-train, together with the 3rd Division (Walpole's), comprising the 5th and 6th Brigades, 5th Brigade (Douglas), 23rd Fusiliers, 79th Highlanders, 1st Bengal Fusiliers; 6th Brigade (Horsford), 2nd and 3rd battalions Rifle Brigade, 2nd Panjáb Infantry; closed up on the Dilkushá.

and silence
the enemy's guns.

March 4.
More troops are massed
on the Dil-
kushá.

The line now occupied by the British force touched the Gúmtí on its right at the village of Bibiapúr, then, stretching towards the left, intersected the Dilkushá, and, proceeding towards Jalálábád, stopped at a point about two miles from that fort. The interval was occupied by one native regiment of cavalry, Hodson's Horse, nearly sixteen hundred strong. Outram's force, from which three regiments had been withdrawn, still occupied its old position.

New line occupied by the British.

To complete the formation necessary if the complete success at which Sir Colin Campbell aimed were to be insured, another strong division of troops was yet required. This want was supplied on the morning of the 5th by the arrival of Brigadier-General Franks with the gallant force of Europeans and Nipálese whose gallant deeds have already been imperfectly recorded.

Franks and his troops
arrive.

But before complete communication with Franks had been established, that is, on the evening of the 4th, Sir Colin had directed that two pontoon bridges should be thrown across the Gúmtí near Bibiapúr. It was across those bridges that he would despatch the division of the army intended to march up the Gúmtí and take the enemy's position in reverse.

Sir Colin orders the conquerors to bridge the Gúmtí.

The engineers worked at the bridges all that night with so much energy and effect, that before the morning of the 5th dawned they had completed one of them. Across this was at once despatched a strong picket, which began without a second's delay to throw up a small earthwork to defend the bridge-heads.

A picket is thrown across one of these on
the 5th.

As the enemy showed shortly in some force in a village at a distance of about a thousand yards, some guns were brought down to the river-bank close to the bridges to silence the enemy's fire whenever it should become annoying. The precaution enabled the engineers to continue their work throughout that day and during the following night.

By midnight on the 5th the two bridges and the embankments connecting them with the level on both sides were completed. Sir Colin, having counted on this, had directed Outram to cross to the left bank with a strong division at 2 o'clock in the morning to carry out the plan I have already detailed. Outram had with him Walpole's division of infantry, the 2nd Dragoon Guards, the 9th Lancers, the 2nd Panjáb Cavalry, detachments from the 1st and 5th Panjáb Cavalry, D'Aguilar's, Remmington's, and Mackinnon's troops of horse artillery, and Gibbons's light field battery. Hope Grant accompanied him as second in command. It had been intended that he should cross at 2 o'clock in the morning; but the night was dark, the ground was broken and full of water-courses, and the troops had much difficulty in finding their

Both completed on the night of the 5th.

out the plan

March 6. Outram is ordered to cross.

way. Outram, who had ridden on in front to the bridges, dismounted, and, knowing that nothing that he could do would hasten the arrival of his corps, sat on the ground and lighted a cigar. It was close upon 4 o'clock when the 2nd Panjáb Cavalry, leading the way, reached the ground. Then the crossing began. Sir

The difficulties of the ground delay him.

Colin, angry at the delay, anxious that the troops should cross before the dawn should discover them to the enemy, came down to stimulate their movements.* His presence, due to a natural anxiety, really added nothing to the effect. The staff officers were in their places, doing their work calmly and efficiently, and before the day broke the whole force had completed the passage of the Gúmtí. The place which it had left vacant on the right bank was at once occupied by Franks's division, the fourth.

Sir Colin's anxiety for the prompt crossing.

The reader will not fail to see that Outram, on the left bank of the river, was in a position to execute the first move in the game. He was to push up the left bank of the Gúmtí, and turn and render untenable the strong position of the enemy on the other side of it. When it should become apparent that he had turned the first line of those works, then, but not till then, would the second move be made by Sir Colin himself with the troops waiting for Outram's success in the position of which the Dilkushá may be called the centre.

Importance of the position on the left bank of the river.

* "Sir Colin, being anxious to get his men across before the enemy could discover our intention and open upon us, rode down to the river-side and pitched into everybody most handsomely, I catching the principal share."—Hope Grant.

In pursuance of this plan, Outram, drawing up his force in three lines, marched up the left bank of the river for about a mile. The river there made a turn; so Outram, throwing forward his right, and leaving the sinuosities of the river, moved straight on in the direction of the city. A party of the enemy's cavalry which shortly afterwards appeared on his left was charged, routed, and pursued, though with the loss of Major Percy Smith of the Queen's Bays, described as an excellent officer. No further interruption to the progress of the force was offered, and it encamped that evening about four miles from the city, which it faced, its left resting on the Faizábád road, about half a mile in advance of the village of Chinhat.

Outram
pushes forward to the Faizábád
road.

The following day and the 8th were spent mainly in skirmishing—the enemy advancing and being invariably repulsed. Outram, whilst maintaining his position, threw his pickets gradually much more forward. On the 8th, in obedience to instructions from Sir Colin, he sent back D'Aguilar's troop of horse artillery and the 9th Lancers, receiving in exchange twenty-two siege guns. That night he constructed two batteries, armed with heavy guns, within six hundred yards of the enemy's works, on the old racecourse.

March 7-8.
He advances his pickets and constructs
batteries.

At daybreak the following morning, the 9th, he made his attack. Preluding it with a heavy fire from the newly constructed batteries, he detached a column of infantry under Walpole to attack the enemy's left, and, after forcing it back, to wheel to the left and take them in the rear. He designed, meanwhile, to lead in person the left column across the Kokrail stream to a point whence, on the success of the right column being pronounced, it could attack and occupy a strong building known as the Yellow House—the Chákar Kothí—the key of the position of the rebels, and the occupation of which would turn and render useless the strong line of intrenchments erected by them on the right bank of the Gúmtí.

His plan of attack on the 9th.

The result corresponded entirely to Outram's soundly based hopes. Walpole drove the enemy's left through the jungles and villages covering their position, and, then bringing his right forward, debouched on the Faizábád road, in rear of their most efficient battery, which, however, was found empty. The left column, meanwhile, which had marched at 2 o'clock in the morning to take up the position assigned to it, as soon as it learned that Walpole had reached the Faizábád road, attacked the Yellow House. The rebels were there in numbers, but, with the exception of nine, they did not show fight, but made so rapid a flight along the banks of the river that before the guns could open upon them they were out of reach. The "nine," however, clung to the building, and killed or wounded more than their own number. Amongst them were Anderson of the Sikhs, and St. George of the 1st Fusiliers. It was only by firing salvos from the horse-artillery guns that they were eventually dislodged.* The success of the column was notified to Sir Colin Campbell by the hoisting of the colours of the 1st Fusiliers on the roof of a small room erected on the second story of the Yellow House.

The column then pressed forward, following the rebels, and drove them rapidly through the old irregular cavalry lines and suburbs to the Bádsháh-bágh, and thence to the river, where they effected a junction with the right wing. The whole line then halted, and, occupying the houses and breastworks on the banks of the stream, opened and maintained a heavy fire on the rebels who lined the walls and occupied the gardens. Under cover of this fire three heavy guns and a howitzer were placed in position to enfilade the works in rear of the Martinière. Another battery of two 24-pounder guns and two 8-inch howitzers was likewise erected near the river to keep down the fire from the town.

The first battery I have mentioned—that composed of three heavy guns and a howitzer—occupied the extreme left of Outram's line. It was commanded by Major Nicholson, R.E., of whose services at the Álambágh I have already spoken, and protecting the guns was a party of the 1st Fusiliers under a very gallant and capable officer, Captain Salusbury. The guns had been unlimbered

* Hope Grant. They killed or wounded three officers and nine men.

when Nicholson remarked that the hostile lines seemed abandoned by the rebels. Salusbury proposed to cross with a party of his men and ascertain the fact, but Nicholson considered it would be too hazardous to leave the guns without protection. At this conjecture a young lieutenant of the 1st Fusiliers, named Thomas Butler, and four privates, volunteered to go down to the river-bank and signal their presence to the Highlanders of Adrian Hope's brigade, who were discerned at a distance of about six hundred yards on the other side of the river. They ran down accordingly; but shouting and signalling were alike useless—they could attract no attention.

Butler volunteers to signal to the Highlanders on the right bank.

It was very important to open the communication, and, all other means having failed, Butler did not hesitate an instant to try the last and the most hazardous. It was about 3 o'clock in the afternoon; the river was some sixty yards wide, its depth was considerable, the stream was strong. But Butler, caring for no consequences, heedless of the chance that the batteries on the other side might be occupied, took off his coat and swam across. He landed in rear of the batteries, which he found unoccupied. Mounting the parapet of one of the works, he quickly attracted attention, and after some delay, caused by the stupidity of a staff officer, who considered it would not be correct to occupy the abandoned works without special orders, the Highlanders and the 4th Panjáb Rifles relieved him. During the time that Butler, wet, cold, and unarmed, occupied the works, he was twice fired at by the distant enemy, but he did not leave them to swim back until he had made them over to the men of Adrian Hope's brigade. For his cool gallantry on this occasion Butler received the Victoria Cross.

Unable to attract their attention, Butler swims the river, and attracts

the attention of the 93rd.

Outram's movement on the 9th had thus answered every expectation. He occupied the left bank of the Gúmtí as far as the Bádsháh-bágh; the hostile batteries on the other side of the river were enfiladed. The enemy were completely taken in reverse. I propose now to show how on that same day, the 9th, Sir Colin Campbell profited by Outram's manœuvres.

Result of Outram's operations on the 9th.

The Commander-in-Chief had waited patiently in his position at the Dilkushá whilst Outram, on the 6th, the 7th, and the 8th, was executing the manœuvres which were the necessary preliminaries of the attack on the 9th, just described. Early on the morning of that day, the guns and mortars, which, by Sir Colin's orders, had been placed in position on the Dilkushá plateau during the preceding night, opened a very heavy fire on the Martinière. This fire was maintained until, about 2 P.M., the hoisting of the British ensign on the roof of the little room on the second story of the Yellow House, made it clear to Sir Colin that Outram's attack had succeeded. Then, without the slightest delay, he launched Adrian Hope's brigade (the 4th), supported by the 53rd and 90th Regiments, the whole commanded by Lugard, against the Martinière. The effect of Outram's work that afternoon then became quickly apparent. The enfilading fire from the batteries which he had erected had caused the abandonment of a post which otherwise would have offered a strenuous resistance. It fell, so to speak, without a blow. The rebels, who had withdrawn their guns, fled precipitately across the river. The British loss was extremely small; and, but for the fact that the returns record a dangerous wound inflicted by a musket ball on the gallant William Peel,* they would be too slight to be specially recorded.

Sir Colin, in his turn, advances,

and carries
the Mar-
tinière.

Not content with the capture of the Martinière, Adrian Hope's brigade pushed onwards. The 4th Panjáb Rifles, gallantly led by Wylde, supported by the 42nd Highlanders, climbed up the intrenchment abutting on the Gúmtí, and proceeded to sweep down the whole line of hostile works till close to the vicinity of Banks's house. It was to this brigade that the men belonged who occupied the fortified place which the gallant Butler had stormed single-handed. This and the works forming a line from the Gúmtí to a point not far from Banks's house were occupied during the night by Adrian Hope's brigade and the 53rd Regiment.

Adrian Hope occupies the works

from the Gúmtí to the vicinity of Banks's house.

The work of the 9th had, then, resulted in success on both the lines of operation. Outram, establishing himself on one side of the parallelogram, had made it possible for Sir Colin to push up the other side of it—and this he had effectively done.

The next day, the 10th, Outram intended to be a day of preparation rather than of conflict. The rebels being in considerable force in the suburbs in his front, he wished to strengthen the position he had already gained. But the rebels, fully aware now of the danger threatening them from across the Gúmtí, came on in considerable force and attacked a picket held by the 79th Highlanders. They were, however, repulsed with loss, and the work designed by Outram proceeded thenceforward undisturbed. To ensure its rapid execution, the cavalry under Hope Grant patrolled the vicinity of the camp. This patrolling produced occasional conflicts with detached parties of the rebels, and in one of these Major Sandford, of the 5th Irregular Cavalry, an officer of much promise, was killed. Throughout this day Outram's batteries at the mosque west of the Chákar Kothí played on Hazratganj and the Kaisarbágh.

* "He went out with his usual nonchalance to find a suitable place for some guns to be posted to breach the outer walls of the Martinière, when he was shot in the thigh by a musket ball."—The Shannon's Brigade in India.

Outram strengthens his position during the 10th.

The same day the Commander-in-Chief was content to complete the work of the previous evening by the storming and occupation of Banks's house. This was accomplished by Lugard with the troops already indicated, and with but trifling loss.

Sir Colin storms Banks's house.

By the evening of the 10th two sides of the parallelogram were all but completely occupied. The attempt to pierce its centre—to force the line stretching from Banks's house to a point beyond the Kaisarbágh—was now to be made. Strong as were the buildings which constituted the value of that inner line, the position of Outram on the opposite bank of the Gúmtí, and of Sir Colin Campbell now firmly established across the canal, having in Banks's house a post strong for attack, caused the chances to be very much in favour of the assailants. For, whilst Outram enfiladed the enemy's works on one side, Sir Colin was now able to turn them on the other.

Total result of the fighting on the 10th,

position of

and prospects of the morrow.

In pursuance of the plan already indicated, Outram was directed to employ the evening and night of the 10th in establishing batteries which should rake the enemy's works, and annoy the defenders of the Kaisarbágh with a fire vertical and direct. He was also instructed to resume his offensive movement on the morning of the 11th by attacking the positions covering the iron and stone bridges—the former leading to the Residency, the latter to the Machchí Bhawan—and, by carrying them, to command the iron bridge from the left bank of the river.

March 10-11.

Outram is directed to attack the positions covering the iron and stone bridges.

Outram carried out these instructions to the letter. He established, during the night, batteries which bore, in the manner prescribed, on the Mess-house and on the Kaisarbágh. On the 11th, shortly after daylight, he led Walpole's column—the right—(79th Highlanders, 2nd and 3rd battalions Rifle Brigade, 1st Bengal Fusiliers, Gibbons's light field battery, and two 24-pounders) to gain a position commanding the iron bridge. The column, covered by the Rifles, worked its way through the suburbs till it reached a mosque within an enclosure at the point where the road from the Bádsháh-bágh joins the main road to cantonments, about half a mile from the iron bridge. The place being very defensible, Walpole left there the 1st Fusiliers, and proceeded towards the stone bridge. On his way to this bridge he surprised and captured the camp of Hashmat Álí, Chaudhári* of Sandíla, with that of the mutinous 15th Irregulars, took two guns and their standards, and killed many of those soldiers faithless to their salt. Sending Gould Weston with a troop of the Bays to cut off the fugitives from Makhanganj—a service which Weston performed very efficiently—Outram pushed on, without serious opposition, to the head of the stone bridge. Finding, however, that it was commanded by the enemy's guns, as well as by musketry fire from several high and stone-built houses from the opposite side of the river, he deemed it more prudent to retire to the mosque at the cross roads, there to remain till the operations I am about to record had been completed. He then fell back on his camp behind the Bádsháh-bágh.

Meanwhile the left column (23rd Fusiliers, 2nd Panjáb Infantry, two 24-pounder guns, and three field battery guns), commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Pratt, starting twenty minutes after the right column, had met with considerable opposition, and, being exposed to the fire of a hostile battery from the right side of the river, had suffered considerable loss. It succeeded, however, in occupying all the houses down to the river's bank and the head of the iron bridge, to the right of which Pratt placed in battery the two 24-pounder guns. It was a difficult and dangerous operation, and, though it succeeded, it cost Outram the lives of two of his most gallant officers, Captain Thynne of the Rifle Brigade, and Lieutenant Moorsom, Deputy Assistant

* Chaudhári, a village chief. Sandíla is an important town in the Hardui district, thirty-two miles north-west of Lakhnao.

Quartermaster-General, a soldier of remarkable talent and promise. He was guiding the column, and was killed while reconnoitring in front of it.

It may be convenient, for the sake of clearness, here to add that the positions taken up by Outram on the 11th continued to be occupied by him on the 12th, 13th, 14th, and 15th. During those days he carried out, with March 11-15. vigour and accuracy, the purpose he had in view—the maintenance of an enfilading fire, raking the positions which the Commander-in-Chief was assailing on the other side of the river. Having been reinforced on the 12th by four 18-pounder guns, two 10-inch howitzers, and five 10-inch and four 5½-inch mortars, he erected, in addition to the batteries already enumerated, three more to play on the Kaisarbágh; and when that strong place fell, as I am about to recount, on the morning of the 14th, he turned the fire of those batteries against the Residency and the buildings to the right of the bridge. It can easily be conceived the enormous assistance rendered to the main attack by this heavy enfilading fire, maintained without the slightest intermission. It had been possible to do even more, but Outram was hampered, as I shall show in its proper place, by restrictions to action placed on him by the Commander-in-Chief.

I now return to Sir Colin. I left him, on the evening of the 10th, established on the city side of the canal on a line stretching from the Gúmtí to Banks's house. March 10. Whilst the Chief Engineer, Brigadier Robert Napier, maintained a heavy fire from Banks's house on the works in front—especially on the block of palaces known as the Begam Kothí—Lugard, bringing forward his right, occupied, without opposition, the Sikandarbágh—famous in Sir Colin's first advance for the splendid gallantry of Ewart, Cooper, Lumsden, and their dozen followers, Highlanders The Sikandar-
bágh
occupied. and Sikhs—and then prepared to work his way to the Sháh Najaf. His operations were greatly facilitated by the noble daring of three engineer officers attached to his column, Medley, Lang, and Carnegy.

From three to four hundred yards to the right front of the Sikandarbágh stood an isolated building high on a mound overlooking the river, called the Kadam Rasúl.* Beyond this again, but in close vicinity to it, was the Sháh Najaf, the building, which, in Sir Colin's first advance, had almost made him falter, and the capture of which was due to the keen observation and happy audacity of Sergeant Paton* and Adrian Hope. Both these posts were immediately outside the enemy's second line of works, which ran in front of the Motí Mahall, the old Mess-house, and the Tára Kothí. Lang, noticing that the two posts I have referred to, the Kadam Rasúl and the Sháh Najaf, were very quiet, proposed to his companions that they should reconnoitre, and possibly occupy, them. The three officers at once set out, followed by four native sappers. Creeping quietly up to

* Literally, "The foot of the Prophet."

The happy audacity of three engineer officers gains the Kadam Rasúl

the Kadam Rasúl, they found it abandoned. Entering it and ascending the little winding staircase, they looked down into the garden of the Sháh Najaf.

This seemed also abandoned. But not liking to make, with four men, an attack, which, if the interior of the place were occupied, would certainly fail, the engineers, leaving the four sappers to guard their conquest, returned to the Sikandarbagh to ask for men to take the Sháh Najaf. The officer commanding at that post declined, however, to take upon himself a responsibility not greater than that from which, in the case of the Kadam Rasúl, the engineers had not flinched, whereupon Medley rode to Banks's house to obtain an order from Lugard.

and the Sháh Najaf.

Lugard gave it at once, and Medley, returning, had placed at his disposal one hundred men. With these and fifty sappers, the engineers entered the Sháh Najaf and found it abandoned. As it was but two hundred yards from the line of intrenchments already spoken of, the engineers at once set to work to make it defensible on the side nearest the enemy, and, at Medley's suggestion, a hundred men were thrown into the place.†

Whilst this operation was successfully conducted on the right, the guns from the heavy batteries on the left were pouring shot and shell on the Begam Kothí. The contiguous palaces known under this designation were extremely strong, capable, if well defended, of resisting for a very long time even the fighting

Lugard effects a breach in the Begam Kothí,

* Vide p. 137.

† This deed of happy audacity was not mentioned in the despatches. It was, however, well known in camp. My account of it is taken almost verbatim from the statement of one of the actors, to whom it is unnecessary further to refer.

power sent against them by Sir Colin Campbell. But, in warring against Asiatics, the immense moral superiority which assault gives to an assaulting party is an element which no general can leave out of consideration. The truth of the maxim was well exemplified on this occasion. About half-past 3 o'clock in the afternoon, a breach was effected which opened a way to stormers. The breach, indeed, was so narrow, and the defences behind it were so strong, that, if the men who lined them had been animated by a spirit similar to that which inspired the assailants, no general would have dared to attempt an assault. But Lugard, believing in the overpowering influence of an assault made by British troops on Asiatics, on the breach being pronounced, gave, without hesitation, the order to storm. It is possible that, had he been aware of the extreme strength of the mine defences,* he might have held back for a while, but even that is doubtful.

The storming party consisted of those companions in glory, the 93rd Highlanders and the 4th Panjáb Rifles. It was indeed fitting that to the men who, in the previous November, had stormed the Sikandarbágh and carried the Sháh Najaf, should be intrusted the first difficult enterprise of Sir Colin's second movement on Lakhnao. Fortunate in their splendid discipline, in their tried comradeship, in their confidence each in the other, the 4th Panjáb Rifles and the 93rd Highlanders enjoyed the additional privilege of having as their leader one of the noblest men who ever wore the British uniform, the bravest of soldiers, and the most gallant of gentlemen. Those who had the privilege of intimate acquaintance with Adrian Hope will recognise the accuracy of the description.

and sends
Adrian Hope's brigade to storm it.

The block of buildings to be stormed consisted of a number of palaces and courtyards, one within the other, surrounded by a breastwork and deep ditch. The artillery fire had breached the breastwork and the wall of the outer courtyard, but some of the inner walls had not been seriously injured. They were occupied by a considerable body of Sipáhis, probably exceeding five thousand in number.

Description
of the Begam Kothí.

* "At the Begam's palace the defences were found, after the capture of the place, so much stronger than could be observed or had been believed, that the General said that had he known what lay before the assaulting column he should have hesitated to give the order for advance."—Twelve Years of a Soldier's Life in India, p. 393, note.

At 4 o'clock in the afternoon Adrian Hope led his men to the assault, the 93rd leading, the 4th Panjáb Rifles in support. The Sipáhis, not yet daunted, met their assailants in the breach, and for a short time their greatly superior number offered an obstacle difficult to overcome. But individual valour, inspired by a determination to conquer, was not to be withstood. The Adjutant of the 93rd, William McBean, cut or shot down eleven of the enemy with his own hand. Many of the men emulated, if they did not equal, the example set them by their adjutant. The Panjábis, pressing on from behind, added to the weight of the attack. Their behaviour excited the admiration of every one. When a Highlander chanced to fall, his native comrades rushed forward to cover his body and avenge his death. The splendid rivalry of the two soon made itself felt. Forced back from the breach, the Sipáhis scarcely attempted to defend the strong positions yet remaining to them. They seemed to have but one object—to save themselves for a future occasion.

The Begam Kothí is gained. But the Highlanders and the Panjábis pressed them hard. Quarter was neither asked for nor given, and, when the Begam Kothí was evacuated by the last survivor of the garrison, he left behind him, within the space surrounded by the deep ditch of which I have spoken, six hundred corpses of his comrades! It was "the sternest struggle which occurred during the siege."*

The capture of the Begam Kothí opened to the Chief Engineer, Brigadier Napier, the means of dealing destructive blows against the remaining positions of the enemy. It brought him inside the enemy's works, and the enclosures the assailants had stormed now served as a cover from the enemy's fire. "Thenceforward," says Sir Colin, in his report, "he pushed his approach, with the greatest judgment, through the enclosures by the aid of the sappers and of heavy guns, the troops immediately occupying the ground as he advanced, and the mortars being moved from one position to another as ground was won on which they could be placed."

The storming had been effected with comparatively small loss on the side of the British. But amongst those who fell was one who had made a name for himself as a most daring and able soldier. Hodson, of Hodson's Horse, was mortally wounded on this day. He had joined the storming party, had entered the breach with Robert Napier, and had been separated from him in the mélée. He was not wounded during the storm; but, after the breach had been gained, he rushed forward to hunt for Sipáhis who might be concealed in the dark rooms and recesses of the palace. Coming suddenly upon a party of these, he was fired at and mortally wounded. The Highlanders avenged his death, for they bayoneted every man of the group which had fired at him.

* Sir Colin Campbell's Official Report.

My opinion of Hodson has been recorded in an early page of this volume. I have little to add to it. His abilities were great, his courage was undeniable, his brain was clear amid the storm of battle, his coolness never left him on the most trying occasions. As a partisan soldier he was not to be surpassed. But the brain which was clear was also calculating. The needless slaughter of the princes of the House of Taimúr would seem to indicate that he was born more than a hundred years after the era when all his qualities would have obtained recognition. Trenck and his Pandours were too bloody and too savage for the civilisation of 1756; and Trenck was never accused of shooting unarmed prisoners.

The position of the assailing force on the evening of the 11th was in considerable advance of that it had occupied in the morning. It was now pushed forward to the Sháh Najaf on the right, and it held the Begam Kothí on the left. Before the Kaisarbágh could be assailed, the Mess-house, the Hazratganj, and the Imámbárah had first to succumb.

Position of the assailants the evening of the 11th.

On that day the Nipál troops, led by the Mahárajah Jang Bahádur, were brought into line. This reinforcement enabled Sir Colin Campbell, as I shall show, to extend the plan of his operations on the succeeding days.

The Nipál troops arrive.

The following day, the 12th, was a day chiefly for the engineers. Their work proceeded steadily and surely. Some changes, however, were made in the disposition of the troops. Lugard's division, the 2nd, which had hitherto been in the front, was relieved by Franks's, the 4th. The Nipál troops, too, were, as I have said, brought into line, and ordered to advance on the British left, so as to hold the line of the canal beyond Banks's house.

Franks's division comes to the front on the 12th.

The 13th was likewise an engineers' day. Avoiding the main road, which was well defended by the enemy's batteries, March 12-18. Napier pressed forward on a line about a hundred and twenty yards to its left and parallel to it, sapping through the houses, out of the line of the enemy's fire. When necessary, the heavy guns opened breaches for his advance, and the sappers, supported by the infantry, pushed on slowly but steadily, enlarging the breaches communicating with the rear, so as to have a way ready for supports, should they be required. The overwhelming superiority of the British artillery fire, supported as it was by Outram's enfilade, and cross fire from the other side of the Gúmtí, effectually prevented any serious annoyance from the enemy's guns. The rebels maintained, however, from the neighbouring houses, a hot fire of musketry on the advance, to which the men forming the latter replied effectively.*

The Nipálése operate on the extreme left.

This day, too, the Nipál force, crossing the canal, moved against the suburb considerably to the left of Banks's house. We shall see that this operation drew the attention of a portion of the rebel force to that quarter.

By the evening of the 13th the task assigned to the engineers had been completed. All the great buildings on the left up to the Imámbárah had been sapped through. The battery which had been playing on the massive walls of that building had effected a breach, and it was hoped that it would be sufficiently practicable on the morrow to permit an assault.

Position on the evening of the 13th.

Early on the morning of the 14th, the heavy guns, at a distance of thirty yards, were still pounding at the breach—"the 8-inch shot, at this short distance, walking through three or four thick masonry walls in succession as if they had been so much paper." † The enemy were replying from the walls with musketry fire. At length, about 9 o'clock in the morning, the breach was reported practicable; and the stormers, who had been drawn up, awaiting the signal, received the order to assault.

The morning of the 14th.

Franks storms the Imámbárah.

The storming party was composed of sixty men of Brasyer's Sikhs and two companies of the 10th Foot, supported by the remainder of the two regiments. These men, gallantly led, dashed at the breach with all the impetuosity of their pent-up energies. The defenders waited to receive them; nor was it until after a very sharp struggle that they were forced back in disorder. But, once forced back, they fled as though panic-stricken, and in a few minutes the Imámbárah was in the possession of the stormers. The support and reserve followed, completing the lodgment. In the assault there fell a very gallant officer of the regiment of Firuzpúr, Captain Dacosta, who had volunteered for this special service. He had lived a life which had brought him many enemies, but the hostility of the bitterest of them would have changed to admiration had they witnessed the heroic manner in which he led his men to the assault.

* A Year's Campaigning in India.—Medley.

† Medley.

The gain of the Imámbárah did not quench the zeal of the stormers. The rebels were in such haste to save themselves that, emerging from the Imámbárah through the great gateway into the road, they ran as fast as they could to the Kaisarbágh. Brasyer's Sikhs, burning to avenge Dacosta's death, dashed after them as they fled, and a few men of the 10th joined in the pursuit. Following in a parallel line, a portion of the 90th, guided by the Deputy Assistant Adjutant-General of the Division, Henry Havelock, forced their way into a palace which commanded three bastions of the Kaisarbágh. Once in that position, they brought to bear upon the enemy's gunners below them a fire so withering that one by one these deserted their guns, the last they discharged being an 8-inch howitzer, which was only abandoned under pressure not to be withstood. This daring advance made by Havelock had the most important consequences. By it the second line of the enemy's defences, the line stretching from the Gúmtí, in front of the Mess-house, to the Imámbárah, was turned. Its defenders, panic-stricken at seeing their position thus taken in reverse, had no thought but to save themselves. Abandoning, then, the second line, they ran into the buildings yet intervening between the Imámbárah and the Kaisarbágh, and from behind the walls of these endeavoured to stay the further progress of our troops. Then it was that the engineers proposed to suspend operations for the day, and to proceed by the slower process of sap. But the men, the Sikhs of Brasyer's regiment especially, were not to be restrained. The joy of conquest had mastered every other feeling. Led by Brasyer and Havelock, they effected an entrance into a bastion by a vacant

The stormers gain a position commanding a portion of the Kaisarbágh.

Brasyer's Sikhs gain a courtyard adjoining the Kaisarbágh.

embrasure, and forced their way, cheering, under a terrible fire, into a courtyard adjoining the Kaisarbágh, driving the enemy before them.

Seeing the possibilities before him—the chance of gaining the Kaisarbágh at a blow—Havelock ran back to the detachment of the 10th Foot, commanded by Captain Annesley, and ordered it to the front. Obeying with alacrity, the 10th dashed to the front and joined the Sikhs. A portion of these latter, led by Brasyer, diminishing by casualties as they went, pushed daringly on, nor did they halt until, expelling the enemy before them, they had penetrated to the Chíní * Bazaar, to the rear of the Tára Kothí and Mess-house, thus turning the third line of the enemy's works.

The enemy, congregated in numbers at not less than six thousand in the Tára Kothí and the Mess-house, now finding themselves taken in reverse, evacuated these buildings, and endeavoured to re-enter the city by an opening in the further gateway of the Chíní Bazaar. Had they succeeded in so doing, they would have cut off Brasyer and his gallant band, which must then have been overwhelmed. But Havelock, advancing with sixty Sikhs, in support of Brasyer, promptly seized two adjoining bastions, and, turning the six guns found there on the enemy, so plied their masses, issuing from the positions above named, with round shot, grape, and musketry, that he stopped their dangerous movement and turned them back.

This action assured the posts won by the advanced party. Gradually Havelock's small body was strengthened by a company of the 90th, brought up by Colonel Purnell himself, and from that moment success was certain.

By this time the fourth note sent by Havelock urging him to come on reached Franks, and that gallant officer at once pushed forward with every available man to aid the advanced parties. His arrival shortly after with his supports, accompanied by the Chief Engineer, made the position of the attacking party completely solid. The only question now to be solved was, whether the advantages already so wonderfully achieved should or should not be turned to immediate account by the storming of the Kaisarbágh.

* Chini, Anglicé, "Chinese."

Every consideration seemed to urge the attempt. Although that morning it had been intended to storm only the Imámbárah, events had moved so quickly, the assailants had displayed so much energy and daring, the enemy had been so mastered by panic, that it seemed advisable to push on whilst the stormers were still eager, the rebels still dejected.

Shall the advantage be pursued?

Accordingly, after a brief consultation, Franks and Napier resolved to push on. Reinforcements were sent for from the rear, and an order was despatched to the troops at the Sikandarbágh and the Sháh Najaf on the right to push forward. The reinforcements soon came up, and whilst the troops on the right advanced and occupied, with but little resistance, the Motí Mahall, the Chatar Manzil, and the Tárá Kothí, Franks sent his men through the court of Saadat Ali's mosque into the Kaisarbágh itself. The Kaisarbágh is a rectangular enclosure, made up of a series of courts and gardens, interspersed with marble summer-houses. These were still full of Sipáhis, who, from the roofs and from the summits of the houses in the adjoining enclosure, poured a heavy musketry fire on the invaders. But, the British once within the garden, the game for which the rebels were struggling was lost, and, in a comparatively short space, those of them who had failed to escape lay dead or in death's agony.

The Kaisarbágh is stormed.

Then began a scene of plunder, of which it is difficult to give an adequate description. The glowing words of an eye-witness, then in the zenith of a literary fame which still lives, mellowed by time and increased by experience, brings it, however, as vividly before the reader as words can bring a scene so rare and so terrible. "The scene of plunder," wrote Dr. Russell, "was indescribable. The soldiers had broken up several of the store-rooms, and pitched the contents into the court, which was lumbered with cases, with embroidered cloths, gold and silver brocade, silver vessels, arms, banners, drums, shawls, scarfs, musical instruments, mirrors, pictures, books, accounts, medicine bottles, gorgeous standards, shields, spears, and a heap of things which would make this sheet of paper like a catalogue of a broker's sale. Through these moved the men, wild with excitement, 'drunk with plunder.' I had often heard the phrase, but never saw the thing itself before. They smashed to pieces the fowling-pieces and pistols to get at the gold mountings, and the stones set in

The plundering which followed.

the stocks. They burned in a fire, which they made in the centre of the court, brocades and embroidered shawls for the sake of the gold and silver. China, glass, and jade they dashed to pieces in sheer wantonness; pictures they ripped up, or tossed on the flames; furniture shared the same fate. . . . Oh the toil of that day! Never had I felt such exhaustion. It was horrid enough to have to stumble through endless courts which were like vapour baths, amid dead bodies, through sights worthy of the Inferno, by blazing walls which might be pregnant with mines, over breaches, in and out of smouldering embrasures, across frail ladders, suffocated by deadly smells of rotting corpses, of rotten ghee, or vile native scents; but the seething crowd of camp-followers into which we emerged in Hazratganj was something worse. As ravenous, and almost as foul as vultures, they were packed in a dense mass in the street, afraid or unable to go into the palaces, and, like the birds they resembled, waiting till the fight was done to prey on their plunder.”*

The day's work was over. A work great, unexpected, and, in every sense of the word, magnificent. The line which in the morning had stretched from the Sháh Najaf to Hazratganj now ran from the Chatar Manzil to the Residency side of the Kaisarbágh. Two strong defensive lines of works, garrisoned by thirty to forty thousand men, had been turned, and the great citadel on which the second of those two lines rested had itself been stormed!

It was, I repeat, a great, even a magnificent work, but it might, and ought to, have been greater. Its greatness and magnificence were due mainly to the Sikhs and the 10th Foot, to the gallant leading of Havelock and Brasyer, the confident daring of Franks, and the skill of Napier—its want of completeness must be attributed solely to the Commander-in-Chief. How this was so I shall explain in a few words.

In a previous page I have narrated how, on the 13th, 14th, and 15th, Outram continued to occupy his positions on the left bank of the Gúmtí commanding the direct approaches to the iron bridge, but restricted from further movement in that direction by the orders of the Commander-in-Chief. The iron bridge led across the river to a point not far from the Residency. Now, when,

Outram
proposes to cross by the iron bridge.

* My Diary in India.—W. H. Russell.

on the 14th, the stormers under Franks attacked the Imámbárah, and, pushing onwards, dashed against the Kaisarbágh, the enormous effect which would have been produced by the crossing of the river and the penetrating into the very heart of the enemy by Outram's division, may be imagined. Outram wished to carry out such an operation, and applied to the Commander-in-Chief for permission to do so. In reply he was informed by the Chief of the Staff that he might cross by the iron bridge, but "that he was not to do so if he thought he would lose a single man." A more extraordinary proviso never accompanied a permission to advance granted to a general in the presence of the enemy. It was tantamount to an absolute prohibition. Outram had that afternoon reconnoitred the enemy's position across the river. His plans were laid, his troops were ready to attack, but he saw that there was at least one gun on the bridge; that the bridge itself was commanded by a large mosque and by houses which had been loop-holed; and that the rebels, in anticipation of a forward movement on his part, had laid their batteries in such a manner as to render it difficult and dangerous. Not only, then, would he have lost one man, but probably very many. On the other hand, the passage of the Gúmtí by Outram that afternoon would have been fatal to the enemy, for it would have in a great measure cut off their retreat. Their slain would have been counted by thousands, and, in all probability, the province of Oudh would have immediately succumbed. The rebels who escaped on the 14th were the rebels who fell back on the forts and strong places of the province, there to renew the resistance which had broken down in the capital. Had they been cut off, that resistance would not have been possible!

That they were not attacked in their retreat was due solely to Sir Colin's order to Outram not to advance if the advance would cost him the life of one single man. Why the hands of a gallant soldier like Outram were thus tied is a question which has never been answered. True it is that Sir Colin had only contemplated on the 14th an attack on the Imámbárah. The Kaisarbágh, in his programme, was reserved for the day following. But he had sufficient experience of war to be aware that the unexpected is always possible, and, knowing that, he committed a grave error when he restricted the action of a lieutenant, and such a lieutenant, occupying a position which, under certain circumstances, could be made fatal to the enemy. In the camp the order was attributed to the counsels of Mansfield; but the responsibility rested, and still rests, with Sir Colin.

Unsatisfactory reply of the Commander-in-Chief.

Comments on the Commander-in-Chief's reply.

To return. The 14th, as we have seen, had been a day devoted entirely to work, and to little but work. It was necessary to take early measures to consolidate the progress which had then been made. To this end the 15th was devoted — on the right bank of the Gúmtí. Under the orders of the Commander-in-Chief powder was removed, mines were destroyed, and mortars were fixed for the further bombardment of the positions still held by the rebels on the line of advance, up the right bank of the river, and in the heart of the city.

The 15th
on the right bank of the river.

On the left bank it was different. Here two movements were ordered, both of which would have been more effective if directed the previous day. Sir Colin, sensible now that the door of retreat had been left too open to the enemy, despatched Hope Grant, with eleven hundred cavalry and twelve horse artillery guns, to pursue them along the Sitápúr road. Brigadier Campbell was likewise directed to move with his infantry brigade, some guns, and fifteen hundred cavalry from the Álambágh on the Sandíla road. Neither of these operations came to anything. The rebels had taken neither the Sandíla nor the Sitápúr road, and the only effect of the two movements, combined with a third on the 16th, to which I am about to refer, was to leave open to them the road to Faizábád, by which more than twenty thousand of them eventually escaped.

The 15th
on the left bank.

Hope Grant and Campbell are sent to pursue the rebels,

who, however, escape.

The third movement was made by Outram. That general was directed on the 16th to cross the Gúmtí, near the Sikandarbágh, with Douglas's brigade, the 5th (23rd, 29th Highlanders, 1st Fusiliers), and join the Commander-in-Chief at the Kaisarbágh, leaving Walpole's brigade still in its position on the left bank watching the iron and stone bridges.

March 16.
Outram ordered to cross the Gúmtí.

He crosses near the Sikandar-
bágh.

Outram crossed the Gúmtí by a bridge of casks, far removed from the fire of the enemy, near the Sikandarbágh, and, joined by the 20th Regiment and Brasyer's Sikhs, marched towards the Kaisarbágh by a road made the previous day by the sappers. On the way

Sir Colin rode out to the force and gave his final instructions to Outram. These were to push on through the Residency, take the iron bridge in reverse, and then, advancing a mile further, to storm the Machchí Bhawan and the great Imámbárah.

and moves
on the Residency.

Outram pushed on at once, passed through the Kaisarbágh, and then moved straight on the Residency. As his little force neared the venerated and battered defences of that monument of British valour, the 23rd leading, it was assailed by a fire of musketry from the line of posts which Aitken and Anderson, Sanders and Boileau, Graydon and Gould Weston, and many noble men had defended so long and so bravely. But now the positions were inverted. Then the assailants were Asiatics, the defenders mostly Englishmen. Now Asiatics defended, Englishmen assailed. The difference showed itself in a remarkable manner. For, whereas, in the former case the Englishmen defended themselves, unassisted, for eighty-four days, in the latter the Asiatics were disposed of in less than half an hour. One charge of Outram's division, and the enemy fled, panic-stricken and panting, from the classic ground.

Contrast between the English and the Indian defence of the Residency.

The 23rd pursued the fleeing rebels, followed by Brasyer's Sikhs and the 1st Fusiliers. Two companies of the 23rd under Lieutenant-Colonel Bell, guided* by Gould Weston, pressed rapidly forward, and, taking the enemy's defences in reverse, captured the gun of which I have spoken as commanding the passage across the iron bridge. The force then pushed on, taking in reverse the batteries between the two bridges. Meanwhile Major Cotter crowned the Residency height with a field battery of Madras Artillery, and, opening a heavy fire on the Machchí Bhawan, maintained it till he was relieved by two 65 cwt. 8-inch hollow-shot or shell guns of the Naval Brigade. After these had played with effect for some time on the devoted place, the 1st Fusiliers and Brasyer's Sikhs were sent forward to finish the work. This they did without difficulty, and the Machchí Bhawan and great Imámbárah fell into their hands, the enemy abandoning seven guns. In this advance Captain

Outram, pushing forward, captures the great Imámbárah and the Machchí Bhawan.

* Outram's despatch.—This was a duty often assigned to Captain Weston, one for which his knowledge of the localities peculiarly fitted him.

Salisbury of the 1st Fusiliers and Lieutenant MacGregor,* doing duty with that regiment, greatly distinguished themselves.

Whilst these operations were successfully progressing on the right bank of the Gúmí, a number of the enemy, driven from the Residency and other places, poured over the stone bridge, and, the better to cover their design of retreating on Faizábád, made a strong attack on Walpole's pickets. The attack was repulsed, but the rebels made good their retreat.

A more serious counterblow had been attempted in another quarter.

The garrison of the Álambágh had been reduced by the number of troops withdrawn by Sir Colin to less than a thousand men of all arms. These were made up of about four hundred infantry, the Military Train, a small detachment of the 7th Hussars, and some artillery. The post was commanded by Brigadier Franklyn.

At 9 o'clock on the morning of the 16th the rebels came down in considerable masses of the three arms. Whilst their infantry menaced the front of the British position their cavalry and artillery endeavoured to force back the left flank, and to get round it, with the view of giving their infantry the opportunity they were awaiting.

To meet this movement Franklyn ordered four guns and the Military Train and cavalry, under Robertson, to the village in the rear of his position, whilst to Olpherts and the four guns which remained to him he entrusted the defence of his left.

These arrangements were made just in time. The rebels had been coming on boldly, but no sooner did Olpherts sweep the plain with his guns than their cavalry first halted, and then began to retire. A few of them did indeed make a sudden dash at the left front picket, and even entered the village in which it was; but eventually these, too, followed the example of their comrades.

Meanwhile the main body of the infantry attacked the front, throwing out skirmishers, and advancing beyond the British rifle-pits. But Vincent Eyre, who commanded the whole of the artillery, arranged his guns in such a manner as to rake their whole line from left to right, whilst the infantry brigade, commanded by Brigadier Stisted, waited for them to come on.

* The late General Sir Charles MacGregor, K.C.B., C.S.I., C.I.E., one of the ablest, most prescient, and energetic men of whom the Indian Army could boast. I do not think there ever lived his superior.

in the centre
by Vincent Eyre.

The fire of the guns first checked the rebels and then drove them back; but the fact that the attack began at 9 o'clock and ceased only at half-past one will give some idea of its determined nature.

Two days previously, the 14th, the Commander-in-Chief had requested Jang Bahádur and the Nipálese to move to his left, up the canal, and take in reverse the positions which, for three months, the rebels had occupied in front of the Álabágh, the garrison of which was now reduced to two regiments. Jang Bahádur carried out the instructions conveyed to him with ability and success. One after another the enemy's positions, from the Chár-bágh bridge up to the Residency, with their guns, fell into his hands. This operation, which effectually covered, as it was carried out, the Commander-in-Chief's left, occupied several days. The losses the Nipál chief experienced were inconsiderable.*

Jang Bahádur covers the Commander-in-Chief's
left.

The 17th, Outram, pursuing his onward course, occupied, without resistance, in the morning, the Husení Mosque and the Daulat Khána.† In the afternoon he moved, with a brigade (Middleton's field battery, two 8-inch howitzers, one company native sappers, wing 20th Foot, wing 23rd Foot, wing 79th Highlanders Brasyer's Sikhs), to occupy a block of buildings known as

Outram continues his forward movements
on the 17th.

* Jang Bahádur's successful advance was memorable for the recovery from captivity of two English ladies—Miss Jackson and Mrs. Orr. In the third volume of this history (note, p. 252-6) I have given a sketch of the adventures of the Sítápúr fugitives, and have told how it was that on the 17th March only two of these, Mrs. Orr and Miss Jackson, survived. On the 20th March two British officers attached to the Nipál troops, Captain McNeill and Lieutenant Bogle, when exploring some deserted streets near the Kaisarbágh, were informed by a friendly native of the place in which the two ladies were confined. They at once procured the aid of a party of fifty Nipálese, and after walking through narrow streets—about half a mile—they reached a house occupied by one Wájid Álí, an officer of the old Court. In a room within the house they found the two ladies, dressed in Oriental costume. They at once procured a palanquin, and notwithstanding the opposition threatened by a body of ruffians, who would have prevented the rescue, they conveyed the ladies in safety to the camp of Jang Bahádur.

† One of the royal palaces. Literally, "the house of happiness."

Sharíf-ud-Daula's house. The enemy made no resistance, but hastily evacuated the place. The success, however, was marred by a deplorable accident. In the courtyard in rear of the Jammi Masjid, impeding the progress of the troops, nine carts, laden with gunpowder packed in tin cases and leather bags, were found. Outram directed Captain Clarke and Lieutenant Brownlow of the Engineers to remove the carts, and to dispose of the powder by throwing it into a large and deep well. If the order had been carefully carried out, no accident could possibly have occurred. But it is supposed that in the course of the operation a tin case struck the side of the well near the surface and ignited. The fire communicated itself to the powder in the carts, and caused an explosion, which resulted in the death of the two officers and about thirty men. Others were also injured, more or less seriously.

An explosion causes loss of life.

On the 18th, Outram's advanced post (a picket of the 20th under Lieutenant Gordon) cleared the houses and streets in front of it, though not without meeting a sharp opposition from the enemy. In carrying out this operation the men captured a very fine brass 9-pounder gun, loaded to the muzzle with grape, and pointed down the street which they had to clear. The demoralised state of the enemy was made clear by the fact that they abandoned it on the advance of the British without waiting to discharge it.

Further progress on the 18th.

It had become known during these last two days, to the Commander-in-Chief, that the rebels had occupied, to the number of from eight to nine thousand, the Músá-bágh, a large palace with gardens and enclosures, standing in the midst of an open country filled with trees, about four miles to the north-west of Lakhnao, near the right bank of the Gúmtí. These rebels were believed to be animated by the presence of the Begam and her son, and of the more desperate leaders of the revolt. Sir Colin Campbell was resolved, now that all the strong points in the city itself were in his hands, to expel them from this last stronghold.

Sir Colin learns that a large number of rebels are still in the Músá-bágh.

On the morning of the 19th, therefore, Outram, under instructions from Sir Colin, marched against the Músá-bágh. His force consisted of two squadrons of the 9th Lancers; one company Royal Artillery; one company native sappers; Middleton's field battery; two 18-pounders, two 8-inch howitzers, four 8-inch mortars, under Captain Carleton, R.A.; three companies 20th Regiment; seven companies 23rd Regiment; 79th Highlanders and 2nd Panjáb Infantry. Whilst this force marched against the place from the advanced positions in the city, Sir Hope Grant, still on the left bank of the Gúmtí, was directed to cannonade it, and, on the enemy being dislodged, to fall upon those of the garrison who should attempt to cross the river; at the same time Brigadier Campbell of the Bays was ordered to take up, with a brigade of infantry, fifteen hundred cavalry, and a due proportion of guns, a position on the left front of the Músá-bágh, ready to pounce upon the rebels when Outram should expel them from their stronghold. The Nipálese troops were likewise directed to enter the city, from the Chárbágh line of road, towards the rear of the Húséní Mosque. This time it was hoped and believed there would be no fugitives; but again expectation was baulked.

March 19. Outram marches on the Músá-bágh.

Between Outram's advanced posts and the Músá-bágh there stood, near the Gáo Ghát, on the Gúmtí, a house belonging to the last prime minister of Oudh, the Nawáb Alí Nakí Khán, at the time a prisoner in Calcutta. A company of the 79th, led by Lieutenant Evereth, attacked and drove the rebels from this place. Outram's further advance was delayed nearly two hours by the necessity of breaking through a thick wall. When at last this obstacle was removed, the troops pushed on through the suburbs to the Músá-bágh. Here the enemy appeared in great strength, but on Outram threatening their flanks, at the same time that his guns opened fire on their front, they hastily abandoned the place, leaving behind them two guns, which had been posted to protect the approaches to it.

Captures Alí
Nakí Khán's house and the Músá-bágh.

They fled by the line which Campbell should have commanded. But where was Campbell? "With his large force of cavalry and artillery," writes Sir Hope Grant, "there was a splendid opportunity for cutting off the large masses of fugitive rebels, yet nearly all were allowed to escape." The gallantry of Colonel Hagart, of Slade, Bankes, and Wilkin, all of the 7th Hussars, splendid as it was, was far from atoning for the mistakes of his chief. I proceed to show the manner in which it was displayed.

Close to the position taken up by Campbell was a village with a small mud fort, of which the enemy had taken possession.

To dislodge them Campbell sent a troop of the 7th Hussars, some of Hodson's Horse, a few of the 78th, and two of Tombs' guns, the whole under the command of Colonel James Hagart of the 7th Hussars. A couple of shells had been fired into the fort, when the rebels, to the number of fifty, rushed out and made a dash at the guns. Hagart ordered the 7th to charge; but, before they could get well in motion, Slade, who commanded the charging party, was severely wounded, and Bankes and his charger were cut down. Wilkin charged to his side, but, as he warded off the blow directed at his wounded comrade, his horse reared. This caused him to miss his aim, and he received at the same moment a severe wound on the foot. Wheeling again to the rescue, he cut down the rebel who was on the point of killing Bankes. The loss of their officers had somewhat disconcerted the men; but Wilkin, severely wounded as he was, effectually rallied them, and, joined by Hagart, who came up opportunely, once again charged the rebels, and cut down nearly all who remained. These two officers particularly distinguished themselves.*

This was almost the solitary achievement of Campbell's fine brigade. No attempt whatever was made by him to cut off the fleeing enemy. His conduct was officially attributed to his having lost his way. "But," records an officer who wrote of these occurrences the year following that in which they took place, "his error appears to have partaken of wilfulness. He moved his force in utter disregard of the statement of his guides, in opposition to the protestations and explanations of all to whose

* Hope Grant's Incidents of the Sepoy War. Sir Hope Grant further adds regarding Hagart's daring exploit: "Everything about him bore traces of his gallant struggle. His saddle and his horse were slashed about both in front and behind, his martingale was divided, his sword-hilt dented in, the pocket-handkerchief severed as clearly as with a razor, and a piece of the skin of his right hand cut away."—Sir Hope Grant recommended Hagart for the Victoria Cross. Wilkin, now Major Wilkin, was also twice recommended for the Victoria Cross for his gallant conduct. Hagart received neither reward nor recognition, but Wilkin eventually got a brevet majority. The reason why the recommendation in the case of Hagart was not attended to is, to say the least, curious. "Sir Colin Campbell," writes Sir Hope, "did not, however, forward the recommendation, as he considered the reward an inappropriate one for an officer of so high a rank as Hagart." The italics are my own. Bankes died of his wounds.

information and advice he was bound to listen."* Consequently the greater number of the rebels escaped.

Not, however, all. Outram, keenly alive to the necessity of following up a victory, no sooner noticed that the rebels were abandoning the Músá-bágh, than he detached in pursuit two squadrons of the 9th Lancers, which he had, in anticipation, posted near the enemy's left flank. For four miles the men of this splendid regiment, despite of the obstacles offered by nullahs almost impassable and ravines difficult for horsemen, pursued the enemy, nor did they desist till they had captured six guns, and killed about a hundred of the foe.

Splendid pursuit by the 9th
Lancers

Nor were the 9th Lancers alone in the chase. The field artillery and infantry followed them in support as rapidly as possible, and captured the remaining four guns of the twelve possessed by the rebels that morning.

and the Artillery.

After this decided success Outram left the 2nd Panjáb Infantry in occupation of the Músá-bágh, and returned to his positions of the previous day.

The following day copies of Lord Canning's Oudh proclamation were received in camp. That proclamation professed to confiscate the whole proprietary right in the soil of Oudh, save in the case of six comparatively inferior chiefs. To rebel landowners who should at once surrender to the Government immunity from death and imprisonment was promised, provided only that they could show they were guiltless of unprovoked bloodshed. To those who had protected British lives special consideration was promised.

March 20.
Lord Canning's Proclamation.

Of the proclamation itself I shall speak in another place. I will only refer here to the effect it produced in the camp. It arrived just when the city of Lakhnao had been gained, but when Oudh was still in insurrection, and when the rebel army, which had vainly defended the city, had cast itself on the districts, there to offer a fresh resist-

Effect of it in the camp.

* Calcutta Review, March 1859, Art. "The Campaign of 1857-8." The writer continues: "But whatever may have been the cause of his erratic proceedings, whether they were accidental or whether they were worthy of blame, we believe that the mischief which resulted from them was incalculable; that to them is attributable such organization as the enemy were enabled to maintain, and the perseverance and pertinacity with which they still carried on a guerilla warfare with the British."

ance. Every leading man who had taken a part in the campaign was struck with the impolicy, at such a moment, of disinheriting a whole people, that people being still armed and in the field. "I have not," wrote Dr. Russell,* who was attached to the headquarter staff, "heard one voice raised in its defence; and even those who are habitually silent now open their mouths to condemn the policy which must perpetuate the rebellion in Oudh." Owing to the urgent remonstrance of Sir James Outram, authority was given to insert in the proclamation a qualifying clause, by virtue of which a further indulgence was held out to those who would throw themselves on British mercy, a claim to which would be strengthened by aid which might be given in the restoring of peace and order. But the other clauses remained.

Something remained to be effected even in the city itself. The Maulaví—the most obstinate of the rebel leaders—had returned to Lakhnao; he was still there, at Shádatganj, in its very heart, occupying, with two guns, a strongly fortified building, whence he bade defiance to the British. To dislodge him, Lugard was detached, on the 21st, with a portion of the division which had conquered the Begam Kothí, the first day of the attack. The troops employed were the 93rd Highlanders and the 4th Panjáb Rifles. Seldom did the rebels display so much pertinacity and resolution as on this occasion. They defended themselves most bravely, and were not driven out until they had killed several men and severely wounded many others on our side. When at last they were dislodged, they were met by Brigadier Campbell's brigade of cavalry, this time on the spot, and were pursued, with considerable loss, for six miles. The Maulaví, however, effected his escape.

The following night, that of the 22nd, Hope Grant was ordered out at midnight with a strong force (two troops horse artillery, two 18-pounders, two howitzers, four Cohorn mortars, nine hundred cavalry, and four regiments of infantry) to attack the enemy, reported to be four thousand strong, at Kursí, a small town twenty-five miles from Lakhnao, on the Faizábád road. The mistake of a guide delayed the march, but at 4 A.M. on the 23rd Kursí was

A qualifying clause added to it on the suggestion of Outram.

March 21.
The city is cleared of rebels

by the 93rd and 4th Panjáb Rifles.

March 22.
Hope Grant defeats the rebels at Kursí.

* My Diary in India, by William Howard Russell.

sighted. The enemy did not await an assault, but, on the appearance of the British troops, began to evacuate the town. Upon this Hope Grant sent his cavalry at them. Two squadrons of the Panjáb Cavalry under Captain Browne,* and a party of Watson's Horse led by Captain Cosserat, dashed at them. "Captain Browne, who commanded," wrote Sir Hope Grant, in his diary, "seeing some guns moving off, charged the rebels in the most magnificent style. Five times he rode clean through them, killing about two hundred, and taking thirteen guns and a mortar. His unfortunate adjutant, Lieutenant Macdonald, was shot dead in the act of cutting down a Sipáhi. Captain Cosserat was shot through the face, and died shortly after."

The enemy having been pursued for some time, Hope Grant returned to Lakhnao.

With this action the operations in Lakhnao and in its immediate vicinity ended. The city was captured. It had been gained at a loss—from the 2nd to the 21st March inclusive—of a hundred and twenty-seven officers and men killed, and five hundred and ninety-five wounded. Notwithstanding two errors which I have indicated—the one attributable to the Commander-in-Chief himself, the other, in the first instance, to one of his brigadiers—it is impossible to withhold admiration of the skill with which the operations were planned, of the courage with which they were carried out. The plans of the rebels, based on the conjecture that the British force would advance by the lines of the previous November, were entirely baffled by the masterly movement across the river. That movement, which placed an enemy on their flank, raking their defences, completely cowed them. It took all the heart out of them. Enfiladed from the opposite bank of the river, they could not offer a stern or determined resistance to the foe advancing on their front. The weakness of their defence of the Imámbárah and the Kaisarbágh was due in a very great degree to the moral depression which the position occupied by Outram had caused in their minds.

But if, as has been well asserted,† the strategy of Sir Colin Campbell in his attack on Lakhnao "must ever be the subject of admiration on the part of the military student of this campaign," it is fit that history should mark the blunder which prevented it from

Remarks
on the campaign.

Claims of Sir Colin to a high or to the highest rank
as a general.

* Now Major-General Sir Sam Browne, V.C., K.C.B.

† Medley.

being decisive. Outram was a lieutenant to be trusted. He was cool and daring in action, always kept his troops well in hand, and carefully guarded his communications. No living man had a greater or more profound knowledge of the native character. If any man, in the circumstances in which he was placed, might have been trusted to act on his own judgment, that man was Outram. Yet when, at a critical period of the advance, Outram, firmly seated on the left bank, proposed to co-operate with the Commander-in-Chief in a manner which would have rendered the victory of the latter absolutely decisive, the proposal was refused in language totally unworthy of Sir Colin Campbell. He was forbidden to cross "if he thought he would lose a single man." The reasons for this prohibition have never been published. Dr. Russell, who was very much in the confidence both of Sir Colin and of Outram, whilst admitting the "blot" caused by Outram's compulsory inaction, does not explain the motive by which Sir Colin was actuated to make it compulsory.* Whether, as some assert, it was prompted by Mansfield, or whether it was the emanation of his own mind, Sir Colin, as the issuer of the order, was responsible for it, and he alone must bear the blame. That order derogates from his claim to be placed in the rank of the greatest commanders. He must be classed as a great general of the second rank, a general who could skilfully plan, carefully carry out that plan, who could achieve a victory, but who could not render it absolutely decisive.

Reasons which are decisive against his claim to the highest rank.

The prohibition to Outram to cross the Gúmif.

The appointment of William Campbell and the approval of his failure.

The second failure to pursue the beaten enemy is due likewise, though in a lesser degree, to Sir Colin Campbell. For the delicate operation he was bound to select an officer specially qualified, and, if not acquainted with the country, yet ready to listen to the experienced officers at his elbow or to understand the language of the guides. He appointed, on the contrary, an officer new to the country, who would listen to nobody,

* "The relations between Sir Colin and General Outram, though not unfriendly, are a little stiff, on account of past events, and Outram is not the man to act in opposition to the commands of his superior officer. Had Sir Colin not bound Outram's hands so tightly, the advance would have taken place, and a tremendous slaughter of the enemy must have followed."—My Diary in India.—W. H. Russell.

who could not understand the guides, and who, consequently, let slip a golden opportunity. Yet this action, which allowed thousands of rebels to escape, was justified by Sir Colin Campbell.

“Brigadier Campbell, in command of the cavalry on the left,” he writes, in his despatch, “performed his detached duty with much vigilance and judgment. His march round the city on the 19th inst., which was a running fight for the greater part of the day, was a very difficult one.” What it really was has been recorded in these pages.

These errors, however, stood alone, and the capture of Lakhnao in March 1858 will remain to all time a splendid achievement of skill and daring.

BOOK XII.—PROGRESS OF EVENTS IN EASTERN BENGAL, ORÍSÁ, BIHÁR, OUDH, ROHILKHAND, AND RAJPÚTÁNÁ.

CHAPTER I.

EASTERN BENGAL, EASTERN BIHÁR, ORÍSÁ, AND THE SOUTH WESTERN FRONTIER.

It will be conducive to the clearness of the narrative if, before recording the events in the North-west Provinces which immediately followed the capture of Lakhnao, I return for a moment to Calcutta, record the progress made towards the restoration of order in eastern Bengal and the Bengál. Bihárs, and progress thence towards Allahábád by way of Ázamgarh and the adjacent districts. Then I propose to trace the action of Carthew in guarding the important line between Allahábád and Kánhpúr. Returning north-westward, I shall record the action of Seaton in the vicinity of Fathgarh, of Walpole in Oudh, of Lugard, Rowcroft, and Douglas in the Ázamgarh, Gházipúr, and Sháhábád districts and in Bihár, of Jones and Coke in Rohilkhand, and of Sir Colin Campbell in Baréli. The book will close with an account in detail of the progress of events in Rajpútáná.

When Sir Colin Campbell, on the 27th November, had left Calcutta for Kánhpúr, he carried with him the power of the country. For the moment the civil authority, though nominally existing, was in abeyance. The fate of India was in the hands, not of Lord Canning, but of Sir Colin Campbell; and although, as I have noted on one important occasion, the opinions of the Governor-General in Council exercised a potential influence on the general plan of campaign of the Commander-in-Chief, yet to the hands of the latter functionary its execution was committed. From the moment, then, when Sir Colin Campbell left Calcutta to direct the military measures for which he had been preparing, he became the chief centre of interest; and the capital, giving habitation though it did for a time to the Governor-General and his Council, was proportionately shorn of its importance. Thenceforward Calcutta deserves notice as the port for the reception of the troops, and the depôt of stores and supplies from England; the terminus whence the new arrivals started for the seat of war, and the invalids and wounded for Europe. The continuous attacks made upon the rebels satisfied the longings even of those who had been the severest critics of the tardy, the hesitating, and the half-hearted action of Lord Canning and his councillors; while the social tranquillity of the capital, no longer in real danger, was but once disturbed, and then by a panic which had for its foundation a want of confidence in the firmness of the Government.

Reasons why Calcutta ceased, after the departure of Sir Colin, to exercise an all-absorbing influence on the campaign.

In the third week of January, 1858, Lord Canning quitted Calcutta and proceeded to Allahábád. A few days after his arrival at that place (9th February), he abolished the temporary office of Chief Commissioner of Ágra, till then held by Colonel Fraser, C.B., and drew the whole of the north-west divisions, that of Dehlí excepted, within one lieutenant-governorship. A few days later, Mr. J. P. Grant, who at a trying and critical period had governed with marked ability the Central Provinces, returned to Calcutta to take up the office of President of the Council, the Governor-General assuming the charge which Mr. Grant thus vacated.

It was after the return of Mr. Grant to Calcutta that the panic of which I have spoken occurred. Nothing happened, indeed, which ought to have alarmed men's minds, but in times of excitement the slightest causes often produce the most startling effects. The case was simply as follows. On the 3rd March, a telegraphic message from Barrackpúr was received in Calcutta to the effect that the Sipáhis of two native regiments stationed there were deserting in bodies of ten and twelve, and making their way to the capital. People did not stay to reflect that the Sipáhis had been disarmed; that in addition to regular troops there was a fine volunteer regiment—horse, foot, and artillery—

Lord Canning proceeds to Allahábád.

Dehlí ex-

Change in the administration.

Panic of the 3rd March in Calcutta.

in the city. The information conveyed by the telegram was circulated in exaggerating terms; and the inhabitants of the suburbs, consisting mainly of Eurasians, became much alarmed. Pickets of the volunteer guards were promptly posted at the points supposed to be threatened; the streets were patrolled by the volunteer cavalry; the artillerymen took post at their guns. But no enemy appeared. Some Sipáhis had indeed deserted, but with no intention of attacking Calcutta. The panic passed away more quickly even than it had been produced.*

It passes away.

In eastern Bengal there had been some cause for anxiety. On the 18th November, the detachments of the 34th Regiment Native Infantry, stationed at Chitrágaon,† mutinied, plundered the treasury, released the prisoners from the gaol, burnt down their own lines, fired the magazine, and then left the station, carrying off with them three elephants, the property of Government, and the whole of the treasure they found in the collectorate, with the exception of three hundred and forty rupees in cash. These, as well as the stamps, the Government securities and records, they left untouched. They attacked none of the Europeans, and the only man who suffered at their hands was a native gaoler who protested against their proceedings. Him they killed. They then made off in the direction of Tiparah, but at Sítákund they left the high road,

Eastern Bengal.

Nov. 18.
Mutiny of the 34th at Chitrágaon.

* Sir Orfeur Cavenagh writes me, on the subject of this panic, as follows:—
“On the 2nd of March, about 6 P.M., I received a note from General Ramsay stating that he had received information that arms had been collected in the suburbs of Calcutta for the purpose of being distributed amongst the men of the Reserve guard, on their march down to the fort, to enable them to make an attack on the European residents. The general begged me to be on the alert, and to cause a search to be made for the arms. Mr. Dorin was then President of the Council, and I rode over to his house and showed him the note. He requested me to instruct the civil authorities to make the requisite search for the arms, and to quietly intimate to commanding officers, including Turnbull, who commanded the volunteers, that it was possible that the services of the troops might be required, so that they might be ready to turn out if necessary. No orders were given for any pickets to be posted, nor was the garrison guard under arms. It was late before I returned to the fort, as I had to ride over to Álipúr to see F., who was the magistrate by whom orders for the search had to be made. Only a few muskets were discovered. This was the real cause of the alarm to which you refer. I was rather surprised at hearing of the excitement that had taken place at Calcutta.”

† Vide short description of places, page xv.

and, making for Hill Tiparah, endeavoured to find their way along the hills in a north-westerly direction, avoiding British territory.

Four days later an attempt was made by Lieutenant Lewis, Indian Navy, to disarm the detachments of the 73rd Native Infantry, and Native Artillery, stationed at Dhákah, numbering about three hundred and fifty Sipáhis. Lewis had at his disposal four officers and eighty-five men, English sailors, and two mountain-train howitzers. He was aided likewise by some thirty volunteers, including Messrs. Carnac, Bainbridge, and Macpherson, of the Civil Service, and Lieutenants Dowell and Hitchins of the Bengal Army.

Lewis disarmed, without resistance, the detached guards at the public offices. But, when he marched to the lines, he found the Sipáhis drawn up close to their magazine, with two 6-pounders in their centre. Parties of them also occupied strong brick-built buildings in the vicinity, the walls of which had been carefully loop-holed. Lewis deployed his force, but before the movement was completed the Sipáhis opened upon him with canister and musketry. Replying with one volley, Lewis then charged with his infantry, whilst the two mountain guns opened on the left rear of the enemy. The charge was most successful. The rebels were driven, one by one, from their strong positions. They had lost one of their guns, but to preserve their second they made a last desperate stand. A young midshipman, named Arthur Mayo, charged it, however, at the head of twenty men, and, aided by a flank attack made at the same time, captured it.* The Sipáhis then broke and fled. Forty-one dead bodies were counted on the ground, eight men were brought in desperately wounded, three were drowned or shot in the river. This success was not attained without some loss. The list of killed and wounded contained one man killed, five dangerously, eight severely, and four slightly wounded, in all eighteen. The Sipáhis who escaped at once went off in a north-westerly direction, making, it was believed, for Jalpáiguri, the headquarters of the regiment. Prevented from reaching that place, they found a temporary refuge in Bhután.

Nov. 22.
Attempt to disarm the native troops at Dhákah.

They resist,

but are beaten;

many are killed;

the survivors
escape.

* For this act Mr. Mayo received the Victoria Cross.

The action of the local authorities at Chitrágaon was prompt and effective. Whilst arrangements were made at the station for the security of European life in case the Sipáhis should return to it, the Commissioner communicated at once with the Rájah of Tiparah. This loyal feudatory at once directed his retainers and subjects to check the progress of the mutineers, and, if possible, to close the passes against them. The Commissioner called likewise upon the two principal zamindárs occupying the hill districts which it was thought the mutineers would traverse, to summon their men to arms and follow them up, and either to attack them or to shut them up in the defiles which lay before them. The manner in which this appeal was responded to, and the results it produced, will be related immediately.

Nor was the action of the Government at Calcutta less satisfactory. Dealing with the cases of Dhákah and Chitrágaon as intimately connected the one with the other, they despatched, on the 26th November, by river from Calcutta, three companies of the 54th Regiment, and a hundred seamen; on the 27th, by the same route, another party of sailors. It was the intention of the Government, that whilst the detachment of the 54th should proceed at first to Dhákah, and thence pursue the Chitrágaon rebels in the direction it would be ascertained they had taken, the Indian Naval Brigade should move northwards to Rangpúr and Dínájpur to protect the country towards which it was believed the mutineers from both stations were making their way. Their arrival at their destination on the 10th December contributed greatly to the preservation of order in the neighbouring districts.

The Chitrágaon mutineers were, meanwhile, beginning to experience the drawbacks to a march across the hills, pursued and threatened by enemies. On leaving Sítákund, they had followed a northerly course, and, crossing the ferry at Rámgarh ghát, had pushed on towards Udaipúr, thence towards Agartálah, the residence of the Rájah of Tiparah. That chief, hearing of their approach, despatched a considerable body of men, who stopped them at Sankhula on the 2nd December. Turning then westward, they entered British terri-

Chitrágaon.

The Rájah of Tiparah exercises his influence in favour of the British.

Nov. 26-27.

Prompt action of the Government of India.

December.

The Chitrágaon mutineers

traverse the hill ranges

tory at or near Mugra, and made their way towards Singár hill—about one and a half day's journey north of Komilá, and on the direct route to Silhat. In their progress they had been much harassed; they lost the three elephants, and about ten thousand rupees of the treasure they had stolen; of the prisoners they had released from the gaol, many were daily being captured; they found the mountain paths difficult, and though the hillmen were ready enough, for payment, to cut a way for them, their progress was necessarily slow. But worse things were in store for them.

and suffer much distress.

Harassed by the opposition of the Rájah of Tiparah, and of the zamindars of whom I have spoken, the mutineers resolved to make their way to Manipúr. On their way to that place, they descended from the hills, attacked and plundered, on the 15th December, a police-station in British territory. This attack gave to the British the information they had desired as to their position. Mr. Allen, the chief civil officer at Silhat, had the capacity to discern that the European troops would arrive too late to intercept the rebels. He took upon himself, then, the responsibility of ordering the Silhat Light Infantry, commanded by Major the Hon. R. B. Byng, into the field. That regiment left Silhat in pursuit of the rebels that very day, the 15th, and reached Partábgarh, a distance of eighty miles, by a forced march, in thirty-six hours. At Partábgarh, Byng received information from Mr. Dodd, who had accompanied the force for the special purpose of guiding it, that the rebels had changed their route, and would be at Látú, a place which they had passed through on the night of that day, the 17th, or very early the next morning. Látú was twenty-eight miles from Partábgarh; the men had made a forced march of eighty miles, but with one voice they expressed their willingness to return. The road led through jungles and swamps, but, setting out, they marched back cheerily. Dodd, who had ridden on in advance, met the column as it was entering the village of Látú at dawn on the 18th, with the information that the rebels were close at hand. Before line could be formed, they were seen advancing in good order. The hostile parties saw each other simultaneously, but, before they could

They attack a police station in British territory.

The Silhat Light Infantry are sent in pursuit of them.

After forced marches,

they encounter them at Látú.

come to blows, the rebels made many efforts to seduce the men of the Silhat Light Infantry—one-half of whom were Hindústánis—to make common cause with them. But their persuasions were answered by the cold steel of the bayonet. Notwithstanding their long march, the loyal soldiers of the Silhat regiment displayed a vigour and an energy which carried all before them. In the early part of the action their gallant leader, Major Byng, was killed.

Byng is killed.

This occurrence only roused them to greater fury. The post he had held was filled by Lieutenant Sherer, an officer of rare merit—a son of the gallant soldier whose splendid audacity at Jalpáigurí I have described in the preceding volume—and Sherer gave the rebels no breathing-time. After a fierce struggle, in which the rebels lost twenty-six men killed and a still larger number wounded, he forced them to abandon the field, and to seek shelter in the close and difficult jungles which lie between Látú and Manipúr.

Sherer succeeds, and drives the rebels into the jungles,

Into these jungles it was impossible to follow them. All that Sherer could do was to send detachments to watch the issues from the jungle into Manipúr. Having seen to this, he returned to Silhat. The party of the 54th Regiment, which had been sent on to Silhat and had even marched towards Látú, was ordered back, first to Dhákah, and a few weeks later to Calcutta.

where they cannot be followed.

After their defeat by Sherer, the Chitrágaon mutineers marched north-eastwards, and entered the Manipúr territory. There they were joined by one of the Manipúr princes, with a few followers. The hopes they might have conceived from this accession of strength were, however, of short duration. On the 12th January they were attacked by a party of the Silhat corps, under Captain Stevens, and, after a fight which lasted two hours, they were driven into the jungles, with the loss of twenty men killed. Ten days later, the same officer, having learnt where they were encamped, succeeded in surprising them while their arms were piled, and putting them to flight, with the loss of all their arms and accoutrements. On this occasion they lost ten men killed. Eight days later another detachment of them was attacked and completely defeated, with the loss of thirteen men, by a small party

The Chitrágaon mutineers entering Manipúr

are attacked and beaten
by Captain Stevens, who again surprises
them.

of the Silhat regiment, led by a native officer, Jámadár Jagathir. This was the finishing stroke. Since their departure from Chitrágaon, the rebels had lost two hundred and six men in battle. Those who survived were now blocked up in hilly country, the passes leading out of which were closed, and there the greater number perished miserably.

The survivors are blocked up in the mountains.

Thus, by the firm attitude and the fearlessness of responsibility on the part of the civil authorities, especially of Mr. Allen, and by the daring leading of a few European officers and the gallantry of their native followers, order was re-established in the important districts to the east of Calcutta. All this time Colonel Sherer was nobly maintaining his position at Jalpáigurí, dominating, by the force of his character, the armed native regiment which he commanded.

Result of firmness and promptitude.

I pass on now to eastern Bihár, the division under the control of Mr. George Yule. Although the relief of Árah by Vincent Eyre, in the month of August 1857, and the subsequent storming by that gallant soldier of the stronghold of Kúnwar Singh, had, for the moment, averted danger from eastern Bihár, the elements of revolt still continued to smoulder in that province. These elements were fostered by scarcity, caused by long-prevailing drought, and the temper of the people in the vicinity of Munger was manifested as the year began to wane by an increased and increasing number of highway robberies and other crimes.

Eastern Bihár and George Yule.

Nov.—Dec. The normal difficulties in that province

Under these circumstances the outbreaks at Dhákah and Chitrágaon assumed a very threatening character. The station of Jalpáigurí belonged to the division ruled by Mr. Yule. The headquarters and main body of the 73rd Native Infantry, commanded by Sherer, were at that station. The Sipáhis who had mutinied and resisted so stoutly at Dhákah belonged to that regiment. It seemed only probable, then, that they would make their way to Jalpáigurí, and incite their comrades to revolt.

are increased by the outbreaks at Dhákah and Chitrágaon.

The Government had despatched a body of British sailors to Púrníá, midway between Bhágalpúr and Jalpáigurí, and these men were due at that station at the end of November. But this precaution did not seem to Mr. Yule to be sufficient. With the concurrence of the Government, then, he moved, on the 27th November, the small detachment of the 5th Fusiliers, then at Munger, to Púrníá, accompanying them himself. He arrived there on the 1st December, and, finding all quiet, marched on the next day towards Kishnganj, thirty-one miles distant.

Yule marches with troops to Púrníá.

He was not a moment too soon. On the nights of the 4th and 5th December the detachments of the 11th Irregular Cavalry at Madárganj and Jalpáiguri mutinied, and went off, spreading alarm throughout the district.

The detachments at Madárganj and Jalpáiguri mutiny.

The conduct of the civil officers in the district at this crisis was worthy of all praise. At many of the stations they had nought to depend upon but their own brave hearts. Not for a moment did their courage falter or their presence of mind fail them. Macdonald, the Collector of Rangpúr, placed all the moneys in the Government Treasury upon elephants, and moved with it into the jungle, hoping that the rebels, finding Rangpúr evacuated, would be too hardly pressed to search him out. The rebels, however, never went near Rangpúr, but made straight for Dínájpúr. The Collector of this place was Mr. Francis Anstruther Elphinstone-Dalrymple, one of the ablest men in the Civil Service, but whose prospects had been ruined by long years of persecution on purely private grounds by those wielding authority in Bengal. But, if Dalrymple's worldly fortunes stood low, his courage was as high, and his determination was as unshaken, as they were when, a young civilian, he volunteered for and served in the first China war.* He had upwards of a hundred thousand pounds in his treasury, and he determined to fight for it. He packed off, then, by water, to Calcutta, the solitary missionary of the station and his wife. Then summoning Grant the judge, Drummond

December.

The civil officers of the district.

Macdonald.

Francis Anstruther Elphinstone-Dalrymple;

* Mr. F. A. Elphinstone-Dalrymple accompanied a party of soldiers sent during that war from the Rustomjee transport to attack a battery. As there appeared some chance that the party would arrive late, Dalrymple persuaded the mate to beach the boat at once in the centre of the battery, thus taking the lead of the whole force. He himself was the first man in the battery. At Chusan he accompanied the 55th Regiment in the storm of the steep hill and the intrenched camp. At Chinghai he was on the deck of H.M.S. Nemesis with Captain Hall, afterwards an admiral, better known as Nemesis Hall, fighting the batteries, and subsequently at the taking of Ningpo. He carried Sir Henry Pottinger's despatches to Lord Auckland.

the magistrate, Brown the assistant, Harold Holm, a Dane, connected with indigo and well known and much liked in those parts, and a few other Europeans and Eurasians, he posted them, with their rifles and ammunition, in his official court, and, at their head, awaited there the coming of the rebels. Their arrival within twelve miles of the station was announced. Any moment, then, they might appear. But amongst Dalrymple and his companions there was but one thought—to defend the station to the very last, to die rather than abandon the trust confided to them. Fortunately for them, the rebels, when within a short distance of the place, received intelligence of the movements of the British seamen previously referred to. Instead, then, of marching on Dínájpúr, they hurried off to Púrniá, there to fall into the clutches of Yule. Dalrymple and his companions were not attacked. Not the less, however, did they deserve for their splendid resolution the praise and the credit which were never officially awarded to them!

his splendid resolution.

The rebels move off to Púrniá.

Yule meanwhile, marching northwards, had reached Kishan-ganj. There he heard of the revolt at Madárganj and Jalpáigurí, and that the revolters had taken the road leading to Púrniá. No time was to be lost. He set out at once to return to Púrniá, and, marching all day, accomplished the distance, with the aid of his elephants, by sunset. He arrived in good time. The mutineers, ignorant of Yule's rapid march, were entering the town early the following morning with a view to plunder it, when they found themselves face to face with the Europeans. After an exchange of shots, they fell back a few miles, halted, and encamped. It was difficult for Yule, who had only infantry, to bring mounted men to action, but he resolved to try. That night he marched out his men, and at daylight came up with the enemy, just as they were preparing to set out. The rebels, putting on a bold face, charged, but were beaten back with the loss of thirteen of their number. They then fled to the north. Yule had saved Púrniá by his prompt action. He did more. Pushing on rapidly, the morning of the 12th, with his party, he succeeded, notwithstanding the obstructions offered by the numerous and extensive quicksands of the Kusí, in crossing that river, and reaching Náthpúr before the rebels. Finding their

Yule returns to Púrniá, encounters

the rebels,

saves Púrniá,

onward progress thus checked, and cut off, by movements of which I shall speak immediately, from a retrograde movement, the mutineers took refuge for the moment in Nipál, only, however, to meet their fate at a later period.

and drives
the rebels
into Nipál.

Meanwhile, on the first news of the mutiny of the irregular cavalry, all the available troops, European and Gurkhá, amounting to a hundred of the former and three hundred of the latter, had been sent down from Dárjiling to Pankibári, and thence on to Jalpáigurí. They served to strengthen the hands of Sherer. Acting on the principle that boldness is prudence, this firm and resolute officer had blown from the guns, in the presence of his armed native regiment, two troopers caught in the act of revolt.

Jalpáigurí.

Four days later the seamen of whom I have spoken as having been detached from Calcutta, on the news of the Dhákah mutiny, to protect the districts of Rangpúr and Dinájpúr, arrived at Bagwah, thirty miles east of the former, and, pushing on quickly, reached their destination on the 15th December.

The seamen reach Rang-púr.

Yule, I have said, had, by his prompt and vigorous movements, saved the British districts on the right bank of the Kusí from invasion, and forced the rebels to seek refuge in Nipál territory. There, at a place thirty-six miles from the British frontier, they were detained by the Nipálese authorities, pending instructions from Jang Bahádur. It was useless for Yule to wait any longer on the frontier, or to disquiet himself regarding the fate of men no longer able to plunder and destroy. And it happened that just at the moment his energies were required in another part of his

The rebels in the Nipál territory.

division. In a previous page I have recorded how the Dhákah mutineers, resisting the attempt made to disarm them, had set off from that station for Jalpáigurí, but, finding it impossible to traverse the intervening country, had been forced to take refuge in Blután. Yule, as he lay with his small force at Náthpúr, received an express informing him that the Dhákah rebels were threatening Jalpáigurí from the north-east, and urging him to march to that place.

The Dhákah
rebels threaten Jalpáigurí.

Yule at once set out, and, marching sixty-four miles in thirty-six hours, reached Kishanganj, thirty-one miles north-east of Púrniá. Another long march of thirty miles brought him, on the 22nd, to Titálía. Here he received a dispatch from Jalpáigurí recommending him to take up a position between Siliguri and Pankabári, on the road to Dárjiling, there to await further intelligence. Yule complied, waited patiently till the 26th; but, as the promised intelligence was still withheld, he determined to act on his own responsibility. The ideas he had formed on the subject were singularly clear and correct. Granted, he argued, that the rebels intended to move on Dárjiling or on Jalpáigurí, they must of necessity cross the river Tístá. The Tístá is a river gradually increasing on the plains to a width of from seven to eight hundred yards, deep, rapid, and difficult. To the rebels scarcely any other option was offered than to cross at the Cháwá Ghát, where facilities for such a purpose existed. Now, Cháwá Ghát had not been occupied, and Yule, tired of waiting, resolved to act upon his own instincts, and occupy it. But the delay caused by waiting for intelligence which did not come had been fatal. As he approached the ghát through the jungle, his advanced parties discovered the enemy on the left bank of the river, occupying a position so strong and so favourable for defence, that it would have been madness for him, with his small force, to attack it. But there was still one way open to him to bar their progress. That was to occupy the only practicable road by which they could advance, and give them battle when they should attempt to move forward.

Yule marches to meet them;

forms correct ideas as to their movements.

He moves on Cháwá Ghát, and occupies the road.

Yule accordingly occupied that road. But the rebels, more wily than he believed them to be, broke up their camp that night, and marching by an unfrequented by-path, turned his position, crossed the Mahánandá river, and made for the Dárjiling road. Yule discovered, early on the morning of the 28th, that he had been thus out-manceuvred. Promptly did he repair his error. Leaving his camp standing, he took up a position on the Dárjiling road, and awaited the approach of the enemy. He waited in vain all that day. As evening approached, there being no signs of the rebels, he determined to move back to the camp to allow his men to break their fast. But they had scarcely left the road when the enemy were seen emerging from the jungle by a path some little distance from the position he had held during the day. Yule at once sent his

The rebels turn his position, and eventually escape.

advanced party in pursuit. But so rapidly did the rebels rush across the road and the open country between the place of their issue and the next thick jungle, that the British had only time to fire one volley, and, although Captain Burbank and his sailors continued the pursuit for two or three hours, they failed to come up with the enemy.

The Jalpáigurí party, consisting of Europeans and Gurkhás, commanded by Captain Curzon, 52nd Light Infantry, had been equally unsuccessful. False information had sent them to one ford of the Tístá whilst the rebels crossed by another.

But the failure he had encountered made Yule only the more resolved to follow the Dhákah mutineers to the bitter end. Occupying as he did the inner line of communication, whereas the rebels, by their flight, had gained the outer line, it was still possible for him, by marching along the edge of the forests which skirt the Nipál frontier, to guard the British territories from incursion.

This course he adopted. Marching westward, in parallel lines with the rebels, he having the inner line, he forced them to cross the Nipál frontier. Continuing within the British territory this parallel march, he again, on the 3rd January, crossed the Kusí at Náthpúr. On that day the rebels were distant from him between forty and fifty miles, at a place called Chatrá, at the foot of the hills at the point where the Kusí issues from them, thirty-six miles within the Nipál frontier—the whole intervening space being jungle.

On the 11th Yule's party was strengthened by the arrival of Major Richardson, with the Bengal Yeomanry Cavalry. It was a great accession. Major Richardson was one of the most gallant men living. He had distinguished himself at the storming of Multán in a manner which would have procured for him the Victoria Cross had that symbol of distinction then existed. As it was, his conduct in leading the stormers elicited an expression of marked admiration from the then Commander-in-Chief, Lord Gough, and proved the stepping-stone to advancement in his profession. The Bengal Yeomanry Cavalry was composed of men, many of them Eurasians, some Europeans and well born, who had enlisted for that special service, on special terms, to aid in suppressing the mutiny in July and August 1857. When the corps was first raised Lord and marches parallel with them.

But Yule follows them up,

Major J. F. Richardson

and the Yeomanry Cavalry

Canning was very anxious to select as its commandant an officer who should possess alike the power of attraction and the power of command, who could rule as well as dominate, and inspire affection as well as fear. At the moment Richardson landed from furlough to Europe in Calcutta. He was at once recognised as the man for the situation. The choice was in all respects pre-eminently good.

Richardson joined Yule on the 11th January. The rebels were still at Chatrá. Just about the same time the practical reply of Jang Bahádur to Yule's representations regarding the mutineers of the 11th Irregulars was received. That reply took the shape of an order to his lieutenant on the spot, Ratan Mán Singh, to attack the mutineers, in co-operation with the English. It unfortunately happened that the force at the disposal of Ratan Mán Singh consisted mostly of untrained infantry militia, and only a few trained artillerymen with their guns. The Nipálese commander was therefore unwilling to assent to any manœuvre which would necessitate division of his own force. After some discussion, then, it was agreed between himself on the one side, and Mr. Yule and Major Richardson on the other, that whilst the Nipál troops should guard the roads leading eastward, and Richardson with his cavalry should watch the right bank of the Kusí, Yule's infantry should attack Chatrá. Yule and Richardson were aware that it would have been far better that the Nipál commander should watch the left as well as the right bank of the river, for the upper part of the left bank could not, from the nature of the country, be effectually guarded by cavalry. But, under the circumstances, it was the best thing to be done, and, after all, they both believed that the rebels would fight. To give time to the Nipál commander to make his arrangements, the 21st was fixed upon as the day for the attack.

This delay proved fatal to the success of the plan. Yule crossed the Nipál frontier on the 14th, and on the 19th reached Pirará, about ten miles from Chatrá. Richardson meanwhile had advanced to Chauría, a place which commanded the only path by which he believed the mutineers could possibly proceed westward, should they cross the river above it. But whether the mutineers had been join Yule.

Jang Bahá-
dur.

Orders his lieutenant to attack the rebels.

Plan of the allied forces to hem them in.

Delay in its execution proves fatal

to its success,

warned, or whether they gained information from their scouts, it is certain that as soon as they heard that Yule had reached Pirará, they crossed the river, and marched westward. Yule and Richardson pushed after them; but, as it was seen that the rebels were following a line of country totally impracticable for cavalry, Richardson proceeded by rapid marches to Darbangáh to cover Tírhút, whilst Yule * returned to his division—which was not subsequently disturbed. The mutineers succeeded in making their way into north-eastern Oudh, only eventually to fall by the bullet and the sword.

Before proceeding to western Bihár, I propose to say a few words regarding the extensive district on the south-western frontier, known as Chutiá Nágpúr. In a preceding page of this volume † I have briefly recorded how Major English had, on the 2nd October, inflicted a severe defeat upon the rebels at Chatrá.‡ But this victory, important as it was in effecting the security of the grand trunk road, was far from restoring order to the country. From that period, and for several months following, the energies of Captain Dalton, Major Simpson, Lieutenant Graham, Lieutenant Stanton, of Colonel Forster and the Shekawátí battalion, and other excellent officers, were devoted to the arduous task of repelling attack, of checking petty risings, of suppressing pretenders to power, of hunting down armed freebooters, of recovering places which had been surprised, and of avenging the injuries, in some cases amounting to death, inflicted upon the unarmed and unoffending.

To enter into full detail of the various marches and counter-marches of the companies and small detachments engaged for months in this desultory warfare, would require far more space than could be fairly allotted to a subject which, however important in itself, forms only an adjunct to the main story. No officers deserved better of their country than those who served in Chutiá Nagpur: none exhibited greater zeal, greater energy,

* In the month of May following, when the return of Kúnwar Singh had again thrown the affairs of western Bihár into confusion, Mr. Yule offered to the Government the services of himself and twenty well-mounted gentlemen to act against the rebels in that province. The offer was declined.

† Page 100.

‡ Not to be confounded with the Chatrá within the Nipál frontier.

Chutiá Nágpúr after
Oct. 1857.

Reasons why it is unnecessary to enter into full detail.

greater self-reliance, greater devotion; but, after the defeat of the rebels by English at Chatrá, their action affected the course of events, not generally throughout Hindustan, but in Chutiá Nágpúr alone. For this reason I shall be justified, I believe, if I recount in less detail than I have given to the actions of Sir Colin Campbell and his lieutenants, and to occurrences bearing directly on the main story, the principal events which marked the period of disturbance in the country forming the south-west frontier of Bengal.

In the district called Pálámau, affairs seemed, so late as November 1857, to be very critical. There Lieutenant Graham, with a handful of men, occupied a large house containing from three to four hundred native women and children. The house belonged to a loyal Thákur,* and was encircled by a strong wall. In this Graham was besieged by a body of rebels, whose numbers, amounting at first to two thousand, gradually rose to six thousand. Whilst a portion of these blockaded Graham, without daring to assault him, the remainder plundered the country all about.

Pálámau in November.

To relieve Graham two companies of the 13th Light Infantry, under Major Colter, were despatched from Sásarám on the 27th November. Thither also was directed the Shekawátí battalion under Major Forster. Colter relieved Graham on the 8th December, but, though the presence of two companies of English troops in the rebellious district would have been invaluable, the necessity of guarding the grand trunk road was paramount, and Colter was ordered to lead back his men to Sásarám. But, though he was forced to leave, the good he had effected remained behind him. Graham had employed the first hours after his relief in seizing the person of Débi Bakkas Rái, a man suspected of being the real prompter of the rebellion. This bold action led to proof that the suspicion was well founded, for the rebellion in Pálámau at once collapsed. Then, too, did well-disposed chiefs, previously held in check by fear of the rebels, declare themselves in favour of the British; and Graham, though not strong enough without reinforcements to assume the offensive, was confident, notwithstanding the departure of Colter, to be able to hold his own.

The rebellion in Pálámau collapses.

The wave of insurrection passed then into the district of

* Thákur, a land-owner: in Rajpútaná, a small chief or baron.

Singhbhúm. A large party, composed of the representatives of no less than three tribes, assembled at a place called Ayúdhya, and proclaimed the brother of one of the local rájahs, the Rájah of Purahát, to be their ruler. Fortunately a party of Rattray's Sikhs, commanded by Captain Hale, was in the neighbourhood. Hale, supported by the followers of one of the local chieftains, attacked and dispersed the followers of the pretender. But for some time the insurrection remained unsubdued.

This victory was succeeded by a multitude of small affairs in the several districts, in most of which the advantage inclined to the side of authority. It was not, however, always so. On one occasion the Commissioner of the Mánbhúm and Singhbhúm divisions, Mr. Lushington, attended by Dr. Hayes and accompanied by Captain Hale, Lieutenant Birch, and fifty Sikhs, who had been engaged in seizing men convicted of murder, found themselves suddenly surrounded by not less than three to four thousand infuriated Kóls, armed with arrows, who had stolen up unperceived. Nothing but the steady gallantry of the Sikhs extricated the party from their perilous position. They had to fight their way through their numerous opponents, and it was only by great perseverance, and at the expense of a large casualty roll, that they ultimately succeeded. Twenty-five Sikhs were wounded, one mortally; one was killed. Captain Hale was wounded in four places; Lieutenant Birch had his arm pinned to his side by an arrow; Mr. Lushington and Dr. Hayes were also wounded. Of the enemy a hundred and fifty are said to have fallen. The British party was, however, forced to abandon its camp equipage in order to effect a secure retreat.

Some time before this the spirit of insurrection had travelled to the southerly district of Sambalpúr. Up to the month of September that district had been guarded by two companies of the Rámgarh battalion, and a sergeant's party of Rámgarh Horse. But no sooner had the men composing this small force heard of the mutiny of their comrades at Házáribágh than they displayed a disposition to follow their example. In this emergency Captain Leigh, who represented the civil authority of the government in the district, applied to Dangerous position of Mr. Lushington and his followers.

He is extricated by the valour of the Sikhs.

Sambalpúr.

Leigh applies for reinforcements,

Katak* for, and obtained the assistance of, two companies of the 40th Madras Native Infantry. In October, finding these troops insufficient to repress the disorder caused by mutinous Sipáhis and the followers of the rebel landowners, Leigh again applied to Katak for aid. His demand was complied with—Lieutenant Hadow, Madras Artillery, being sent with two mountain guns, escorted by another company of the 40th Madras Native Infantry, to reinforce him.

which are supplied.

Hadow reached Sambalpúr on the 4th of November. The next morning he marched out with a small party, commanded by Captain Knocker of the 40th, to storm the pass of Shergátí. This was effected without much loss. The small column then scoured the district, destroying the villages and mud forts belonging to the disaffected. In these operations, and in those of a similar nature which followed, fever was more fatal to the British officers than was the enemy's fire. At one time all the officers in the district, Captain Leigh and Lieutenant Hadow excepted, were prostrated by this disease.

Operations in the Sambalpúr district.

In spite of the efforts of the authorities the rebellion in Orísá showed no signs of abating. In December, Dr. Moore, on his way to Sambalpúr, was intercepted and murdered by the rebels. Apothecary Hanson, who was following him, had a narrow escape. Captain Leigh, hearing of his approach, sent a party of native police on an elephant to bring him in. This party started from the one side about the same time as a party of the rebels set out on the other—the distances being nearly equal, and the objects identical—to obtain possession of the person of Hanson. The race was very exciting: but the British just won it.

The insurgents still gain ground.

The excesses committed by the rebels reached so great a height at this period that Captain Leigh applied to the Commissioner, Captain Dalton, for further assistance. Such was the demand, however, for troops elsewhere that Captain Dalton was unable to comply with his request. Captain Leigh was in despair. More than half the troops at his disposal were prostrated by sickness, and but one officer, Lieutenant Hadow, was fit for duty.

Dalton is unable to furnish aid;

* Katak, incorrectly spelt Cuttack, is the chief town of one of the three districts of Orísá. It lies on the right bank of the Mahánadi.

At this conjuncture, Mr. Cockburn, of the Civil Service, Commissioner of Katak, taking a clear view of the situation, resolved, at all hazards, to support British authority in Sambalpúr. Not only did he write to the Madras Government to transfer a body of its local troops for special service in that district, but he took upon himself the responsibility of ordering thither the remaining wing of the 40th Madras Native Infantry. At the same time he directed the enlistment at Katak, for the same service, of two companies of local Sipáhis. With a view to ensure prompt action, the district was temporarily transferred to the zealous and watchful superintendence of Mr. Cockburn. Mr. Cockburn assumed charge on the 19th of December.

Before the wing of the 40th could reach Sambalpúr Captain Leigh was strengthened by the arrival on the 29th of December of a squadron of the Nágpúr Irregular Cavalry, under Captain Wood. Drawing to himself one hundred and fifty men of the 40th Madras Native Infantry and fifty of the Rámgarh Infantry, Wood attacked the main body of the rebels the following morning. Not only did he defeat them and slay three of their chiefs, but he surrounded the village in which the principal leader of the insurrection, Súrandar Sáhí, lay concealed. This fact having been ascertained, the men began searching the houses for him.

Then occurred one of those untoward events wrongly called accidents, which spoil the best laid plans. The capture of this chief would have probably caused the rebellion in the district to cease, and half an hour's further search would have ensured his capture. But Captain Wood had been wounded, and just as the search promised to be successful the bugle sounded the recall. The bugle-sound was not only a reprieve to Súrandar Sáhí; it gave fresh life to the rebellion.

But, notwithstanding this, affairs throughout Chutiá Nágpúr began to mend with the dawning year. On the 7th January Major Bates forced the Shergátí pass; two days later Captain Shakespear stormed the Singhura pass and over-ran the country with his cavalry; on the 21st January Captain Dalton and Lieutenant Graham completely defeated the rebels near the Pálámau fort; and about the same time Colonel Forster, with the Shekáwatí battalion, restored order in Singhbhúm. These successes were but Cockburn supplies it.

Captain Wood
defeats the
rebels,

but misses the main point of his victory.

Tranquillity is gradually restored.

followed by others of a similar character. Captain Dalton pursued the rebels from place to place. Ably seconded by Mr. Cockburn—who had strengthened the disposable force by the addition of a wing of the 5th Madras Native Infantry—and assisted by Colonel Forster, by Ensign Wardlaw, by Captain Moncrieff, and by other officers placed at his disposal, he gradually re-established everywhere British authority. The embers of disaffection continued, indeed, to smoulder long after every enemy had disappeared from the field, and it was not before the close of 1858 that perfect tranquillity could be said to reign in every corner of Chutiá Nágpur.

CHAPTER II.

KÚNWAR SINGH AND LORD MARK KERR.

TAKING the reader with me north-westward, I propose to narrate now the state of affairs in western Bihár; to explain how the communications between Kánhpúr and Allahábád had been preserved; then, proceeding to the Ázamgarh districts, to show how insurrection triumphed there for a moment, only to be driven back to seek a refuge, destined to be of long duration, in the districts and jungles which owned the authority of the remarkable landowner, Kúnwar Singh.

Retrospect of western Bihár.

I have told in the third volume how the important division of western Bihár, saved by Mr. William Tayler during the dark and terrible days of June and July 1857, then exposed, by the wilful blindness of the Government, to dangers more acute, more vivid, more active than those which he, single-handed, had overcome, had been preserved from immediate destruction by the gallantry of Vicars Boyle, of Wake, of Colvin, and their companions, and, finally, completely rescued by the splendid daring of Vincent Eyre. I have recorded the ingratitude with which one of these gentlemen, Mr. William Tayler, had been treated by the Government he had served with an energy all-absorbing and a success most signal, and how the other principal actor in the drama, Vincent Eyre, after storming the stronghold of Kúnwar Singh, had been ordered to join the avenging army of Outram. From the hour of their departure a new era was inaugurated in western Bihár—an era in which truckling took the place of independence, and a desire to discover mistakes in Mr. Tayler's administration superseded the determination to suppress, before all, the dangers threatening the State.

For some weeks after his departure the effect of Eyre's victories continued to be felt in western Bihár. The Government, alive at last, after one revolt had been quelled, to the advisability of preventing another, had placed under the orders of Mr. Samuells, the successor of Mr. Tayler, two hundred Europeans, for the safeguard of Patná, and had despatched a gun-boat, under the orders of the Magistrate of Chaprá, to patrol the banks of the Ghághrá. But, as time went on, the misguided spirits in the province began to be sensible that Eyre had left them, and that the spirit of William Tayler no longer inspired the administration. Though Patná, thanks to the presence of British troops, was reported to be quiet, strong precautionary measures were not the less taken. The opium godown was fortified, six guns were placed in position bearing on the town, and the most stringent measures were taken to avert a collision between the townspeople and the Europeans.

Patná under
Mr. Tayler's
successor.

The aspect in the district was even less assuaging. Kúnwar Singh, with a thousand men, had taken up a position on the Són river, and it became known that dangerous and discontented characters, such men as his brother Amar Singh, Nisban Singh, and Juban Singh, were flocking to his standard. At the same time, the 5th Irregular Cavalry, whose disarming Mr. Tayler had before ineffectually recommended, and whose mutiny in eastern Bihár I have already recorded,* were allowed to spread over the districts in the western province, and to plunder with impunity.

The difficulties of the position in western Bihár were greatly aggravated by the evacuation of Gorákhpur by the British civil authorities, one alone excepted,† on the 13th August, and subsequently by all; by the consequent pressure of rebels into British districts from Oudh; and by the exposure of the districts of Chaprá, Champáran, and Muzaffarpur to the incursions of the leader of the Oudh rebels, Mehndi Husén.

The difficulties in western Bihár aggravated by risings elsewhere.

These difficulties soon came to a head. The mutinous 5th Irregulars, finding no one to oppose their course, destroyed the public buildings at

The mutinous 5th Irregulars approach Gayá.

* Vide page 94.

† The exception was Mr. F. M. Bird, the joint magistrate. The circumstances connected with the stay of this gentleman in Gorákhpur will be recorded in the sixth volume.

Nawáda, and marched in the direction of Gayá. Rattray, with a small force of Sikhs and Europeans, numbering about two hundred, had been posted to protect Gayá. But, learning that the rebels were approaching that place, he, acting on the strongly pressed advice of Mr. Alonzo Money, marched out on the 8th September to attack them. But the rebels, almost all mounted,* took advantage of Rattray's advance from his base to go round his position—inflicting upon him, in his vain attempts to hinder them, a loss of twenty wounded—and to reach Gayá some hours before he could fall back. Arrived at Gayá, they liberated four hundred prisoners from the gaol, and attacked the fortified house which the residents had prepared as a place of refuge. But in this attempt they were repulsed, owing mainly to the spirited conduct of Mr. Skipwith Tayler, son of the late Commissioner of Patná.

Rattray marches to meet them, and is defeated.

The disorder was subsequently further aggravated by the mutiny, on the 9th October, of two companies of the 32nd Native Infantry at Deogarh and by threatened movements on the part of Kúnwar Singh. The Commissioner had at his disposal Rattray's Sikhs, a portion of the Naval Brigade, under Captain Sotheby. Colonel Fischer's brigade of Madras troops entered the western Bihár districts early in October. Besides which Lieutenant Stanton of the Engineers was at Sásarám and its vicinity, and the energy, the zeal, and the activity of this officer compensated to a very great extent for the paucity of fighting men.

Two companies of the 32nd Infantry.

Forces at the disposal of the Commissioner.

Rattray was the first to come in contact with the rebellious Sipáhis. This officer had avenged his disaster of the 8th September by defeating a body of rebels on the 7th of the following month at Akbarpúr, and he now went in pursuit of the mutinous 32nd. On the 6th November he caught them at the village of Danchua. The numbers on both sides were equal, and the contest was severe. Night fell whilst the combat was raging: then covered by darkness, the rebels effected a retreat.

The events which followed each other in western Bihár until the formation of Colonel Rowcroft's force in November, present a constant succession of skirmishes, of movements against petty forts, and similar occurrences of a purely local character. To Rowcroft I shall return shortly. But before doing so it seems incumbent upon me, for the clearness of the subsequent narrative, to describe, as concisely as may be, the occurrences in the districts and on the grand trunk road between Allahábád and Kánhpúr during the period intervening between Sir Colin Campbell's battle of Kánhpúr and the final fall of Lakhnao.

* They consisted of the 5th Irregulars and other horsemen who had mutinied, amounting to six hundred. Accompanying them was a large party of marauders, some mounted on ponies, some on foot.

The road between Kánhpúr and Allahábád.

After the battle of Kánhpúr, Brigadier Carthew was detached, with the Madras Brigade, to command at Fathpúr. The command was an important one, as Fathpúr was exposed to attacks from the districts south-west of Kánhpúr—from Kalpí, from Jhánsí, from Bundelkhand. Fathpúr, moreover, faced—a narrow strip of lane on the right bank of the Ganges alone intervening—the south-western frontier of Oudh, and was at any moment liable to incursions from flying parties of rebels. It devolved, therefore, upon Carthew, not only to thrust back attacks from these opposite quarters, but to guard intact the trunk road—the line of communication between Kánhpúr and Allahábád. The fact that troops and well-guarded convoys were constantly marching up the road doubtless facilitated his task, and enabled him to employ advantageously such passing troops to aid him in clearing the districts lining the road.

Carthew at Fathpúr.

The task which devolved upon him.

The duties devolving upon the officer commanding at the south-eastern end of the line of which I am writing—the station of Allahábád—were of not less importance. Situated at the confluence of the great rivers the Jamnah and the Ganges, abutting alike on Bundelkhand, on Oudh, and on the disturbed districts of Ázamgarh and Jaunpur, Allahábád was a place always threatened, and yet to be preserved at all risks. Allahábád was, in fact, at once the outlying frontier fortress of the province of Bihár and its key.

Campbell at Allahábád.

At the time of which I am writing, December 1857 and January 1858, the officer commanding at Allahábád was Brigadier Campbell.

Carthew took up his command at Fathpúr on the 19th December. Just before he arrived (11th December) a small party under Colonel Barker, R.A., had made a raid amongst the disaffected villages in the district, had burned some, and had expelled the turbulent villagers from others. In this way the district had been purged of its disloyal citizens. The revenue returns and the supply of provisions to the headquarters proved, almost at once, how very beneficial had been these domiciliary visits.

Fathpúr.

The expelled villagers had fled across the Jamnah, and it was on the right bank of this river, from Kalpí down to Bandah, that mutineers from Gwáliár, Jhánsí, and Bundelkhand, even fugitives from Fathgarh, now began to assemble. Amongst them were the Rájah of Charkhári and a brother and nephew of Náná Sáhib; some accounts even spoke of Náná Sáhib himself. Certain it is that the rebel leaders who had their headquarters at Jalálpur on the Betwah, near Kalpí, exercised the right of sovereignty by calling upon the landowners west of the Jamnah to furnish money and recruits for the service of the representative of the Peshwá.

The rebels assemble on the right bank of the Jamnah.

Across the Jamnah it was not possible to act. The Commander-in-Chief, however, deemed it especially advisable that the districts to the east of that river should be kept clear of the mutineers. In accordance, then, with instructions which he issued, Carthew marched on the 10th January with a small force (two horse artillery guns, four companies Rifle Brigade, two hundred 17th Madras Native Infantry) along the Kánhpúr road. On reaching Jahánábád, he turned westward towards Kalpí, communicated with the 34th Regiment, sent from Kánhpúr to co-operate with him, and then moved on to Bhognipúr. The occupation of this place, the locality of which has already been indicated,* forced the several rebel parties who had come over from Kalpí to recross the Jamnah. Carthew then in compliance with an order received from Brigadier Inglis, pushed on to Sikandrá, and then returned leisurely, viá Kánhpúr, to Fathpúr. He had thoroughly purged the district of rebels.

Carthew clears the country on the left bank.

Brigadier Campbell clears the country across the Ganges.

About the same time (5th January) Brigadier Campbell, with a brigade composed of the 79th Highlanders, a regiment of the Rifle Brigade, some foot and horse artillery, and a newly-raised cavalry levy, the Banáras Horse, effectually cleared the districts near Allahábád, on the left bank of the Ganges. His operations were in every respect successful, and in three encounters which he had with the rebels the latter admitted a considerable loss.

* Vide page 160.

But the efforts of these columns occasionally despatched into the districts could not prevent a fresh appearance of the enemy after their departure. It was natural that so long as the Lakhnao question remained unsolved, the delta west of Káuhpúr, that is the narrow strip lying between the two great arteries the Ganges and the Jamnah, should be constantly threatened, and almost as constantly invaded. It was necessary, therefore, to patrol the entire district. In March a movable column,* commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Christie, engaged in this work, moved down to the village of Dháná, near the left bank of the Jamnah, to prevent a threatened passage of the river at that point. Christie found the enemy occupying Siraulí, a town in the Hamirpúr district, on the right bank opposite Dháná, and engaged in firing on that village. By a judicious advance of his artillery, he drove the enemy from Siraulí, and set fire to the town, but the want of boats prevented him from crossing in pursuit.

Movable columns patrol the district.

Occasional raids still continued. On the 26th March a corps of rebels crossed the Jamnah near Hamirpúr, plundered and burned the village of Ghátampúr, and then returned. But this was an expiring effort. The fall of Lakhnao placed an overwhelming force at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief, whilst, on the western side of the Jamnah, another active leader, whose name will occupy a most prominent part in the succeeding volume, was pressing, with all the decision and enterprise of a great commander, the chiefs and leaders whose troops had so long been attempting to harass the British line of communications. It was just after the fall of Lakhnao that the action of Sir Hugh Rose and General Whitlock began to make itself felt. Just then, too, Sir Colin Campbell despatched a small force, under Colonel Maxwell, to Kalpí. The proceedings of these several forces will be narrated in their due course. Meanwhile it may be stated that the work of supervision and control exercised by Brigadier Carthew had been eminently useful to the Commander-in-Chief.

Effect on the district of the fall of Lakhnao.

* One 12-pounder howitzer, one 6-pounder gun; seventy men, 8th Irregular Cavalry; two hundred and forty-four men, 80th Foot; two hundred and fifty-seven, 17th Madras Native Infantry.

What Rowcroft and Sotheby had effected with their brigades up to the time of their occupation of Gorákhpur, I have already narrated.* I propose now to take up the story of their action from the point where I left them, and to show how it was that the Ázamgarh and Jaunpur districts fell again into extraordinary confusion.

Rowcroft, arriving at Gorákhpur on the 19th February, had defeated the rebels on the 20th, and on the 25th had been left, by the departure towards Lakhnao of the Nipálese, in command at Gorákhpur. Two days prior to his arrival, Captain Sotheby, R.N., of the Naval Brigade, who was escorting boats up the river Gágghrá with a force of a hundred and thirty men of that brigade, thirty-five Sikhs, and sixty Nipálese, had attacked and captured the fort of Chándipur,† garrisoned by three hundred men. This fort was situated on the left bank of the river, in the midst of a dense bamboo jungle. Yet so well planned was Captain Sotheby's attack, that the capture of the fort and the guns and the property it contained cost his force a loss of only four wounded! Amongst these was Captain Charles Weston, of the 36th Native Infantry, a very gallant officer. It is due to add that the attack was most efficiently aided by the guns of a river steamer—the Jamnah.

Within the British district of Gorákhpur, sixty-eight miles to the west of it, and nine miles east of Faizábád in Oudh, is the town of Ámórha. Thither Rowcroft now marched, and on the 4th March took up a position not far from the intrenched camp of Belwá, then occupied by a large rebel force. The rebel force alluded to was composed of upwards of fourteen thousand men, led by the pseudo-Názim Mehndi Husén, the Rájahs of Gondah and Chardah, and other disaffected chiefs. Included in their ranks were two thousand five hundred trained Sipáhis, composed of the 1st, 10th, and 53rd Native Infantry, recently completed to five hundred men each, seven hundred men of the 2nd Oudh Police, and about three hundred of the 5th Regiment Gwáliár contingent.

The approach of Rowcroft disconcerted the hopes which these rebel chieftains had entertained of taking advantage of the concentration of the main British army before Lakhnao to make a raid down into Ázamgarh and Jaunpur districts, and possibly to reach Banáras. But there was, it seemed to them, one mode—and a very certain mode—whereby to rid themselves of Rowcroft and his following, and then to prosecute their intentions. This was to attack him, with the vastly superior force at their disposal, as he lay at Ámórha.

* Pages 225-8.

† Chándipur is forty miles to the south-east of Faizábád.

They march to attack
Rowcroft,

Thus thinking, they acted. Early on the morning of the 5th March they marched towards the British camp, distant from them some seven miles. They had approached at half-past 8 within a mile of it when they were met by Rowcroft and Sotheby and Richardson. A severe contest ensued. The trained Sipáhis of the rebel force fought with great courage and determination, but they lacked the cool leading of the European officer, which, under other circumstances, had so often gained them victory. Sotheby's Naval Brigade greatly distinguished itself. The enemy were already shaken when Richardson ordered the Yeomanry Cavalry to charge. The first charge caused the enemy to waver, the second compelled them to give ground, a third drove them in headlong flight from the field. They were then pursued to their intrenchments at Belwá, losing between four and five hundred killed and wounded, and abandoning eight guns on the field. The intrenchments at Belwá gave them a safe refuge, for the cavalry could not penetrate within them.

and are totally defeated.

The charge of the Yeomanry
Cavalry.

Rowcroft remained at Ámórha, waiting for reinforcements to enable him to attack the strong position of the rebels. Subsequently, on the 17th April, and again on the 25th, he met and defeated them in the plain between the two positions; but before this had happened events had occurred in the districts to his left rear—the districts of Ázamgarh and Jaunpur—which compel me to return thither.

Rowcroft remains at Ámórha.

I have already related how Kúnwar Singh, after his expulsion by Vincent Eyre from Jagdispúr, had hung about the districts of western Bihár to the terror of the successor of Mr. William Tayler and of the Government of Bengal. One of the three natives of India thrown up to the surface by the mutiny, who showed

Kúnwar
Singh in western Bihár.

any pretensions to the character of a strategist—the others being Tántiá Topí and the Oudh Maulaví—Kúnwar Singh had carefully forborne to risk the fortunes of his diminished party by engaging in a conflict which, however favourable might be its commencement, must certainly end in his complete defeat.

His policy. Sháhábád, though the region of his birth, the district in which lay his confiscated estates, was too carefully watched, he felt, to present the chances which would alone justify in his eyes a departure from his system of reserve. His actual force was small. He

His force. had with him about twelve hundred Sipáhis, trained in the Indian army, and a few hundreds of untrained adherents, dependents of himself, his brother, and other discontented landowners of the province. With such a force he could not hope to make a serious impression. But when he saw how British troops were being hurried up from every quarter to take part in the attack on Lakhnao, when he heard that the Nipálese and Franks had pushed on for that city, leaving the western frontier of the British provinces bordering Oudh comparatively denuded of troops, then he saw his opportunity, then he resolved to make a push for eastern Oudh, and, combining with the numberless rebels still at large in that part, to make a dash on Ázamgarh, and, if successful there, to avenge the storming of Jagdispúr by a dash on Allahábád or Banáras.

Fortune greatly favoured him. At the moment when he crossed into Oudh, Rowcroft at Ámórha was confronting the intrenched camp of the rebels at Belwá. His inability to storm that position had singularly encouraged the enemy. They, too, like Kúnwar Singh, had designs on Ázamgarh, and, though their main plan had been for the moment baffled by the defeat inflicted upon their attacking columns on the 5th March, yet Rowcroft's inability to follow up his victory had incited them to pursue their original design by other means. Still holding the camp at Belwá, they detached then a considerable force to the south-east, and this force, during its march, attracted to itself many detachments which had escaped the bayonets and horsemen of the victorious Franks. With these troops, Kúnwar Singh succeeded in effecting a junction at Atráuliá on the 17th or 18th March.

The Ázamgarh district was then guarded by a small British force consisting of two hundred and six men of the 37th

He resolves to make a diversion in eastern Oudh.

Regiment; sixty Madras Cavalry, the 4th; and two light guns, under the command of Colonel Milman of the 37th. At the time when Kúnwar Singh and his rebel allies took up their position at Atráuliá, Milman was encamped in the district at Koilsa, not far from Ázamgarh. The distance between Ázamgarh and Atráuliá is twenty-five miles. The reader will recollect that Atráuliá is the fortress which, on the 9th November preceding, had been captured by Colonel Longden, and by him partially burnt and destroyed. Dependent upon it was a small fort, comparatively insignificant. The fortress itself covered a number of strong buildings, all loop-holed. The outer wall was fifteen feet high.

Atráuliá.

On the afternoon of the 21st March, Milman received from Mr. Davies, magistrate of Ázamgarh, the intelligence of the vicinity of the rebels. He at once broke up his camp, marched all night, and, at daybreak on the 22nd, came upon the advanced guard of the enemy's force, not occupying the forts, but posted in three or four mango-groves, contiguous to each other. Without giving them time to recover from their surprise, he attacked and defeated them, the 4th Madras Cavalry behaving with great dash and resolution. The enemy being dispersed, Milman determined, before advancing further, to give the men their breakfasts. He accordingly halted in the mango-groves whence he had expelled the rebels, and his men, piling their arms, prepared to enjoy the matutinal meal. But the cup was dashed to the ground just as the hand was about to raise it to the lips. The breakfast was almost ready when information was suddenly brought to Milman that the enemy were advancing in great force!

Milman beats the enemy near Atráuliá,then halts to breakfast,when the rebels march on him.

It was too true. At last the opportunity for which Kúnwar Singh had longed through so many dreary months had come to him. An enemy, though European, yet vastly inferior in numbers; an enemy worn out by a long march, by deprivation of sleep, by fasting; an enemy twenty-five miles from his base and with no supports! What more could a general long for? Everything was in his favour. Kúnwar Singh, then, marched to a victory which he deemed assured. The imagination can almost picture him making to the confidant by his side an exclamation near akin to that which burst from the lips of Wellington when

Milman's
position as Kúnwar
Singh pictured it.

he noticed the false movement of Marmont which brought on the battle of Salamanca! *

Yes, Milman was lost. Galloping forward, followed by some skirmishers, as soon as he received the news of which I have spoken, the English leader beheld the enemy in great strength, some covered by a mud wall, others in fields of sugar-cane and in topes of trees. Still, hoping that a daring movement on his part would check their further progress, he ordered an advance. But the numbers of the enemy exceeded his in the proportion of eight to one. Outflanked, it was impossible to advance. Forced back, he at least maintained a bold front. The enemy, never attempting to charge, contented themselves with a steady advance and a steady musketry fire. Once, indeed, as the British troops neared the camp at Koilsa, which they had quitted the previous evening, the rebels made a desperate effort to outflank them. But a timely charge of the 4th Madras Cavalry, which had shown remarkable steadiness, frustrated this movement. Then it was that, tired, worn out, wearied, having lost many men in killed and wounded, the survivors found their way into the encamping ground of Koilsa.

Not, however, to discover a refuge there. The rumour of their mishap had preceded them. A panic had seized the camp-followers, most of whom had fled, taking their bullocks with them. The foe was still near; the camp was not defensible; there was no food. Milman, then, abandoning the camp equipage, continued his retreat to Ázamgarh. He reached that place the same day, and, whilst making every preparation to defend it in case it should be attacked, sent off expresses to Banáras, Allahábád, and Lakhnao for assistance.

The express despatched to Banáras reached that station on the 24th March. Forty-six men of the Madras Rifles were instantly despatched to Ázamgarh. The following day a hundred and fifty men of the 37th Regiment from Gházipúr, and two days later a hundred and thirty of the same regiment, reached Ázamgarh, and penetrated within the intrenchment before it had been attacked by the rebels. Colonel Dames of the 37th then Milman endeavours to check the advance of the rebels.

He falls back on Koilsa.

Thence on Ázamgarh, whence he despatches messengers for aid.

Some reinforcements reach Ázamgarh.

* "Mon cher Alava, Marmont est perdu."

assumed the command. On the 27th he attempted a sortie with two hundred Europeans, two guns, and sixty Madras Cavalry, and, though successful at first, was repulsed with the loss of one officer and eleven men killed and wounded. He then retreated into the intrenchment, and thenceforward acted on the defensive.

The express despatched to Allahábád reached that place on the 27th. Lord Canning was at Allahábád. The news caused him anxiety. Knowing what sort of a man Kúnwar Singh was, that he possessed audacity and courage, and that he knew the value of time in military operations, he realised at once the danger of the situation. He saw how possible it was for the Jagdispúr chieftain, reinforced as he daily was by troops who had escaped from Lakhnao, to overwhelm Milman at Ázamgarh, and then, rapidly traversing the eighty-one miles which separated that place from Bánaras then almost ungarrisoned, to seize that important city, and thus sever the communications between Calcutta on the one side and the Governor-General of India at Allahábád and the Commander-in-Chief of the army at Lakhnao on the other.

Lord Canning hears of Milman's disaster, and at once realises its magnitude.

Just then the headquarters and right wing of the 13th Light Infantry happened to be at Allahábád. The officer commanding that regiment was Colonel Lord Mark Kerr. For the moment that officer and the wing he commanded constituted the only means upon which Lord Canning could depend to conjure away the danger. Lord Canning sent for Lord Mark, and explained to him the position. Lord Mark comprehended it on the instant. That same evening he set off for Banáras with the wing of his regiment, and, having full powers to pick up and take with him whatever troops he might meet, to push on with all speed to Ázamgarh.

He orders
Lord Mark
Kerr to push on to Ázam-
garh.

For the required service there was not in the British army an officer better qualified than Lord Mark Kerr. Spare of body, active, a splendid horseman, inured to fatigue, endowed with a courage and coolness which shone with greater lustre in the presence of danger, he was the type of the daring and resolute British officer. He had commanded his regiment in the Crimea. In India he had excited the wonder of his comrades, those especially of the Indian service, by the immunity with which, bareheaded, he was able to dare the rays of the powerful Indian

sun. A stern disciplinarian, he was just, and, being just as well as stern, he was beloved by his men. He appreciated even the many good qualities of the natives of India whom he was combating, and advocated the policy of mercy after repression. But that he was resolved to repress he showed by the eagerness with which he set out on the mission confided to him by the Governor-General.

Lord Mark Kerr, and the wing of his regiment, three hundred and ninety-one strong, including nineteen officers, then set out that same evening, reached Banáras on the 31st March, picked up there a troop—fifty-five men and two officers—of the Queen's Bays, seventeen gunners and one officer, with two 6-pounder guns and two 5½-inch mortars, and started thence for Ázamgarh at ten o'clock on the night of the 2nd April. His entire force consisted, then, of twenty-two officers and four hundred and forty-four men.

Marching with all speed, Lord Mark Kerr reached Sarsána, eight miles from Ázamgarh, the evening of the 5th. There he received, and during the night continued to receive, most pressing letters from the staff officer at Ázamgarh, begging him to push on without a moment's delay. But hurriedly to march a force of four hundred and forty-four men, tired from a long journey, across a country utterly unknown to any of them, to relieve a place besieged by an army whose numbers certainly exceeded five thousand, and might amount to fifteen thousand, was an idea not to be entertained by a prudent commander. Defeat would but precipitate the evil he had been sent to avert. Lord Mark Kerr, then, wisely resolved to defer his march till the dawn of day should approach.

He set out at 4 o'clock on the morning of the 6th—Good Friday—a reconnoitring party of the Bays, with whom was Lord Mark, leading the way. After a march of two hours, one of the Queen's Bays pointed out to Lord Mark that the banked ditches to the right and left were crowded with armed men, lying in ambush and evidently on the look-out for him. His mind was instantly made up. Pretending not to observe these, he dismounted himself and made his cavalry dismount, and kept them halted till his train of elephants, camels, and carts, two miles in length, should close up. This continued for an hour or more, the enemy thinking all the time that he had the British relieving Lord Mark Kerr arrives within eight miles of Ázamgarh, and halts for the dawn.

He marches on the 6th and comes on the rebels, force secure in his grasp. As soon as they arrived on the spot, he despatched a company of the 13th to the right front to clear the ditches of the enemy. In this he so far succeeded, that the rebels fell back on their left, but almost at the same time a heavy fire opened from the buildings and the mango groves of which I have spoken, and which, and fights them. on the left of the road from the British advancing line, constituted the enemy's right. Lord Mark threw out his men in skirmishing order and brought up the guns, which, at a distance of five hundred yards, began to throw shrapnel on to the enemy's threatening left, where Kúnwar Singh was conspicuous on a white charger. The enemy's infantry, however, were so numerous that they were able to spread out all round him, on his rear as well as on his flanks, and it required all the soldierly skill of the British leader to keep them at a distance. Lord Mark's position was complicated Great difficulties of his position. by the necessity of defending the large train of animals accompanying the force, and the capture of which would, naturally, be a special object of the rebels. These animals, when the action had begun, had turned round with fright and bolted to the rear, the mahouts clinging to the elephants, whilst the drivers, descending from the carts, had run off, calling upon the trees and bushes to cover them. Everything now depended upon Lord Mark's ability to make head against the enemy. Up to this time, when the fight had lasted an hour, though he still held the position he had taken up, he had made no impression upon them; and just at the moment he could discern in rear of their skirmishers their reserves forming up in quarter-distance column, whilst a large body was being detached with the evident purpose of penetrating between him and the baggage animals. In this, before long, the rebels partly succeeded; for they set fire to many of the carts.

The situation was now very critical. Lord Mark, whilst trying to defend his flanks and his rear, had gradually pushed on the two 6-pounders already mentioned to within sixty yards of the main building, but their fire still produced but little effect on its walls. He had been anxious to try the effect of shelling, but the two mortars had been halted in a very disadvantageous position for that purpose, and to move them, so that they would be brought to bear with effect it was now necessary to draw

Critical situation of Lord Mark Kerr.

The slightest hesitation would have lost him.
them back a short distance. But this could not be done. The movement to the rear was interpreted as a retreat, and the enemy advanced with loud shouts. He felt the main building was the key of

His splendid perseverance the enemy's position, and must be carried at any price. At last the two 6-pounders succeeded in effecting a small breach in its outer wall, and, the volunteers being called for, some thirty or forty men rushed to the storm. They found the breach not quite practicable; but, far from falling back, they set to work vigorously to enlarge it. Their labours disclosed an inner wall as yet uninjured. Upon this Lord Mark ordered is crowned with success.

them to set fire to the roof and wooden portions of the building, then to fall back. They obeyed this order with alacrity and effect. It was a splendid piece of work, for, shortly after they had fallen back, and the firing had recommenced from one gun—the other being used to prevent the enemy from pressing too closely on the British rear—the flames from the fire the stormers had kindled forced the enemy to evacuate the building. Instantly, Lord Mark, who had just organised a second assault, sent the Bays to the front. The rebels did not await the shock of their charge, and space was at once cleared for a further advance.

The rebels are repulsed in an attack made, meanwhile, on the baggage.
But, while the position of the enemy in front was being thus forced, they had completed the circle, and were now attacking the rear of Lord Mark's small force. In this part of the field a high embankment crossed the road. This embankment the enemy now seized and opened from it a heavy musketry fire. Captain

Wilson Jones of the 13th, commanding the company of that regiment which formed the rear guard, at once faced about and charged them. He drove the enemy back, but lost his own life.

Lord Mark leaves the baggage with Major Tyler, Lord Mark's position was now peculiar. He had pierced the enemy's centre; the way to Azamgarh lay open to him; on his left, the rebels, terrified by the defeat in the centre, were rapidly falling back; but, on the right, they still menaced him, whilst in his rear the flight of the carmen and drivers had left the baggage exposed. Under these circumstances, Lord Mark, bearing in mind the great object of his expedition, resolved to leave a sufficient force to hold front to the right, whilst he should push on with the main body to Ázamgarh, rally to himself, and return with any loyal sipáhis he might find there, believing that these, on a pinch, would drive the carts. He probably calculated that the enemy, believing themselves threatened by the the movement, would be glad to retreat while they could. Sending, then, Major Tyler of the 13th, a cool and capable officer, to command the rear and baggage guards, he pushed forward on the Ázamgarh road.

and moves on Ázamgarh.

His anticipations were almost immediately realised. The enemy's left wing, frightened by his forward movement, beat a hasty retreat. Then, as if by magic, many of the carters and drivers and mahouts reappeared, and Major Tyler pushed on rapidly after his chief. No further opposition was offered to Lord Mark. A village which had to be traversed, and which might have been easily defended with a few men, was abandoned. The stone bridge across the river leading to the intrenchment was reached at 11 o'clock. This bridge had been rendered impassable by the rebels, and after their flight they still continued to maintain a heavy fire on it. It was repaired under this fire by Lieutenant Colomb, R.A., acting under the orders of Lord Mark. As soon as it had been rendered serviceable, Lord Mark sent for the Madras Rifles from the intrenchment, and despatched them to aid in escorting the carts and elephants. They accomplished this task without opposition, and the baggage was brought in in safety.

He is rejoined en route
by Major Tyler, and enters Ázamgarh.

This gallant action reflects the greatest credit on the troops and the commander. Lord Mark was accompanied by Lieutenant-Colonel Longden of the 10th Foot and Mr. Venables, the daring indigo-planter, whose previous gallant achievements have brought him more than once before the reader; and no doubt the previous experience of these two gallant men was useful to him. But he was the leader; upon him it depended whether to advance against numbers or to retreat before numbers. Upon his shoulders rested the responsibility, and to him must be accorded the praise. When it was urged upon him by these brave men to abandon the convoy and to make for the intrenchment, he merely replied "Wait a bit: we'll win yet," and persevered. The number against whom he contended did not, at the lowest computation, fall short of four thousand men, and probably greatly exceeded it. Against these, deducting his baggage guards, he

Credit due to Lord Mark Kerr.

could not put in line more than three hundred men. In the daring, the conduct, and the success of the achievement, Lord Mark Kerr's relief of Ázamgarh may be classed with Vincent Eyre's relief of Árah.

Nor, whilst awarding Lord Mark Kerr this high praise for his daring, can History deny him the not inferior merit of military prudence. The imploring letters he received for immediate aid on his arrival at Sarsána might have induced a less prudent commander to start that night on an errand, the accomplishment of which successfully might well be supposed to depend on the most absolute promptitude. There can be no more tormenting pressure on the mind of a commander than the knowledge that his countrymen within a few miles of him may perish for want of immediate relief; that the few hours of the night, well employed, would bring them that relief; but that prudential considerations compel him not to use those hours. Lord Mark Kerr felt that pressure, and yet had the wisdom to resist it.

The state of affairs at Ázamgarh was bad indeed. Milman's force, after its precipitate and disastrous retreat, had marched straight into the intrenchments within the gaol, leaving the town to the mercy of the rebels. But these moved so cautiously that the reinforcements of which I have spoken * were able to enter. Two days later, the rebels occupied the town and beleaguered the gaol. Fortunately, this was surrounded by a deep ditch, and Kúnwar Singh did not care to risk an assault. He invested the place, and trusted to the effects of famine and an unremitting fire. He even had it in contemplation to blockade the gaol and to march on Banáras, and there can be no doubt that this programme would have been carried out but for the splendid achievement of Lord Mark Kerr.

The action fought by Lord Mark had cost the British a casualty list large in proportion to the number engaged, eight officers and men being killed and thirty-four severely or dangerously wounded. At such a price the defeat of Kúnwar Singh was cheaply purchased. That leader had showed himself greater as a strategist than a tactician. His plan of campaign was ad-

His prudence equalled his daring.

State of affairs in zamgarh.

Defects in Kúnwar Singh's tactics.

* Vide page 320-1.

mirable, but in carrying it into execution he committed many serious errors. Milman gave him a great, an unexpected opportunity. He had that officer at his mercy. When Milman's men were waiting for their breakfast in the mango grove near Atraulia, it was in the power of Kúnwar Singh to cut them off from Ázamgarh. He preferred to attack them in front. Then, when he had forced him to fall back, he did not press the pursuit with sufficient vigour. A capable commander would still have cut them off. Once having seen them housed in Ázamgarh, he should have left a portion of his force to blockade them, pressed on with the remainder towards Banáras, and occupied a position in which he could have engaged Lord Mark Kerr with advantage. He had at his disposal, it subsequently transpired, about twelve thousand men. To oppose these the few men led by Lord Mark were alone available. Everything was within his grasp had he dared to stretch out his hand. The chances are that, capable man as he was, he saw all this. But he was not supreme master of the situation. Every petty leader who had brought his contingent to serve under him wished to dictate a programme. The counsels of the rebels tended, then, almost always to a compromise.

Probable cause of his false tactics.

I have now recorded the result of the message sent from Ázamgarh to Banáras and Allahábád. Another result was produced by the message despatched to Lakhnao. What that was will be narrated when I return to the army still massed in the conquered city.

CHAPTER III.

KÚNWAR SINGH AT BAY IN WESTERN BIHÁR.

I LEFT Sir Colin Campbell master, on the 21st March, of Lakhnao. I propose to narrate now the measures which he adopted to reap every possible advantage from his conquest.

Three main objects first presented themselves to his attention.

The action still remaining to be accomplished. The first was the strengthening of the weak places which had been threatened during his advance; the second, the formation of a movable column for the re-conquest of western and north-western Oudh; the third, the re-conquest of Rohilkhand. Combined with this last was the necessity of holding out a hand to the brigade of Seaton, left at Fathgarh, and to the columns of Jones and Penny still accomplishing, or about to accomplish, the work which had remained to be carried out for the complete pacification of the North-western provinces.

On the 24th March Sir Colin detailed a considerable force to constitute, for the moment, the garrison of Lakhnao.* The command of this force was intrusted to Sir Hope Grant.

On the 28th the Military Train, the 10th Regiment, and a field battery left for Allahábád. The same day Sir Colin received information of Milman's disaster near Ázamgarh, narrated in the previous chapter. His movement to repair the misfortune was as prompt as could be desired. On the 29th Sir E. Lugard was despatched, with a brigade of infantry (10th,† 34th, 84th), seven hundred Sikh sabres, and eighteen pieces of artillery, by the direct road to Ázamgarh, taking Atrauliá en route. Whilst

* Two troops horse artillery; two field batteries; four garrison batteries one company engineers; three companies pioneers.

The 2nd Dragoon Guards; the Láhor Light Horse; 1st Sikh Cavalry; Hodson's Horse; the 20th, 23rd, 38th, 53rd, 90th, 97th Regiments, and 1st Madras Fusiliers; Headquarters 27th Madras Native Infantry; 5th Panjáb Infantry.

† The 10th had started on the 28th en route to England, but were recalled by an express that night.

Lugard would thus relieve Ázamgarh, the advance of Jang Bahadúr's force towards Faizábád, on their return to Nipál, would, it was hoped, relieve Rowcroft, whom I left encamped at Amorah.

I propose, in the first instance, to follow the course of Sir E. Lugard. But before setting out with him I may state that there still remained at Lakhnao four regiments of cavalry and eight of infantry, with artillery in proportion, to be accounted for. These were constituted as a movable column, at the head of which was placed Brigadier-General Walpole. To him I shall revert in due course.

Lugard left Lakhnao on the 29th March. The distance to Ázamgarh was fifteen marches. Pushing on as rapidly as possible, he reached Sultánpúr the 5th April. It had been his intention to cross the Gúmtí at this place, and march direct on Ázamgarh. But to carry out this plan would have necessitated a week's delay. The bridge had been destroyed by fire, and there were no boats. Under these circumstances he resolved to continue his march down the right bank, and to make, in the first instance, for Jaunpur.

A few miles only from Jaunpur, to the north-west of it, and on the direct road from Sultánpor, lies the village of Tigra. Within four miles of this village a rebel force of three thousand men, one third of whom were trained sipáhis, and two guns, under the command of Ghulám Husén, had appeared on the 10th April, threatening Jaunpur. The following day this rebel force attacked and burnt a considerable village within six miles of Tigra. The afternoon of that day Lugard reached Tigra, and heard of the vicinity of the rebels. He had made a sixteen-mile march, his troops were exhausted, the heat of the day was excessive. He therefore resolved to remain where he was till his men should have rested and the sun be less oppressive. Towards evening, however, he received information that the rebels were on the move. He at once turned out his men, dashed after them, caught and attacked them. The rebels attempted for a moment to stand, but they could not resist the terrible onslaught of the cavalry. After a short resistance, they turned and fled, leaving eighty killed and their two guns on the field. On the side of the victors six sawárs were wounded. There was but one killed—but the loss was the loss of a most gallant officer, who had rendered excellent service

Mar.—April.
He sets out 29th March,

and defeats
the rebels
near Tigra.

April.
Death of Charles
Havelock.

during the mutiny. He who fell was Lieutenant Charles Havelock, a nephew of the renowned general.

Lugard marched on the next day to Didarganj, relieved the Gurkhás at Jaunpur by three companies of the 37th Regiment, and then pushed on for Ázamgarh. On the 14th he was within seven miles of that place. Ázamgarh was still invested by the force under Kúnwar Singh, computed to be thirteen thousand strong; but, if that leader had been unable to force his way into the British intrenchment when it was occupied by Milman's small force, still less was he capable of making an impression upon it after the reinforcements from

Ghazipúr and Banáras had reached the place. Indeed, the British garrison had been so greatly increased that, had it taken the field, it might have ended the campaign at a blow. Colonel Dames, who commanded, was, however, restrained from action by the express orders of Sir Colin, and directed to await in his intrenched position the arrival of Sir E. Lugard. The rebels, therefore, still occupied the town, and still threatened the intrenchment. On the approach of Lugard, on the 15th, Kúnwar Singh drew up his forces along the banks of the little river Tons,* commanding the bridge of boats across it, and resolved to dispute the passage.

But the wily chieftain had matured plans far deeper than even those about him could fathom. He knew very well that the soldiers who had failed to stop the small force of Lord Mark Kerr would have no chance against the more considerable brigade of Sir E.

Lugard. He therefore so arranged his forces that, whilst those upon whom he could most depend should defend the passage of the Tons as long as possible, the great bulk, traversing the town, should march with all speed to the Ganges, and, crossing that river at or near Gházipúr, should endeavour to reach his native jungles at Jagdíspúr, there to renew the war.

Lugard attacked the rebels with great vigour. But for some time he failed to make any impression upon them. They held the bridge of boats with a resolution and perseverance worthy of veterans, and it was not until they had by their long resistance ensured the safety of their comrades that they fell back. Lugard then crossed the

* There are three rivers of this name. That mentioned in the text is known as the North-eastern Tons. It is an off-shoot from the Ghághrá.

Tons, and at once detached half a troop of horse artillery, the Military Train, and two squadrons 3rd Sikh Cavalry in pursuit. In this action Mr. Venables, the indigo-planter, always to the front, always daring, and always, from his intimate acquaintance with the country, eminently useful, was severely wounded. To the regret of every soldier, he died of his wounds. He had rendered splendid and unpaid service to his country. In the earlier days of the mutiny, when all had been clouded and gloomy, he had set a noble example to everybody, and, when his station had been abandoned by the civilians, had shown the power of preserving order which even one resolute Englishman can wield in India. Honour be to his memory.

Death of
Mr. Venables.

The rebels had taken every advantage of the firm resistance made by their comrades at the Tons, and the pursuers had a gallop of twelve miles before they caught sight of them. And when they did see them the sight was far from reassuring. Instead of a defeated and scattered host seeking safety in flight, they came upon a body of men retiring unbroken and in good order. There were the men of the old Dánápúr brigade, of the 7th, 8th, and 40th Native Infantry covering the retreat of a large body of followers. But the pursuers did not hesitate. They charged—to make, however, no impression. “It was all we could do,” wrote one of the officers engaged, “to hold our own against such odds. Immediately our cavalry charged they stood and formed square, and used to abuse and tell us to come on.” The loss of the British was considerable. Hamilton of the 3rd Sikhs, a very gallant officer, was wounded and unhorsed when charging the squares. As he lay on the ground, the rebels cutting at him, Middleton of the 29th Foot and Farrier Murphy rushed to his assistance, and succeeded in rescuing his body, which otherwise would have been cut to pieces. The wounds Hamilton received were, however, mortal. Ultimately, by great daring, the British forced the enemy to fall back; but they fell back in perfect order, leaving only three of their guns in the hands of the assailants, who had completely failed to break them.* The British, therefore, halted

The rebels retreat, but are not beaten.

The pursuers make little impression upon them.

* A little after the rescue of Hamilton, a body of rebels dashed forward, with talwárs drawn, to cut down a wounded and dismounted trooper of the military train. Again did Middleton dash forward, drive them back, and, dismounting, place the wounded trooper on his horse.

at Nathupur, where they had fought, watched the enemy disappear in the direction of the Ganges, then sent their killed and wounded into Ázamgarh, with a request for reinforcements.

Lugard, after crossing the Tons, had pitched his camp, and drawing to himself the garrison of Ázamgarh, was preparing to move actively against two rájahs, allies of Kúnwar Singh—who, after the battle, had taken a northerly direction towards Oudh—and to watch the reuniting portions of Ghulám Husén's force. But, the moment he received the report of the pursuing column halted at Nathupur, he detached Brigadier Douglas at the head of a wing of the 37th, the 84th, one company Madras Rifles, four guns Major Cotter's battery Madras Artillery, two 5½-inch mortars, to reinforce them. Douglas started at once, and reached Nathupur that night (16th April).

Meanwhile Kúnwar Singh had halted at the village of Naghai, about fourteen miles from Nathupur. The reasons which influenced Kúnwar Singh, at so critical a conjuncture, to discontinue his retreat, cannot be divined. It is fair to believe, however, that knowing, from the custom of his enemy, he would be pursued, he hoped to be able to strike that enemy a blow so disabling as to permit him to continue his retreat without further molestation. Certain it is that he had occupied a strong position, and arranged his forces with considerable skill. Occupying groves of large trees, he had covered his front with breastworks, and had disposed his guns so as to reap the greatest possible advantage from their working. Here Douglas found him on the morning of the 17th, and here he attacked him. But again did Kúnwar Singh display great tactical ability. He kept Douglas at bay till he had secured two lines of retreat for his main columns, which he had divided.

He then fell back leisurely, and, though many of his men were cut up, they maintained to the end of the day their determined and orderly attitude. As soon as Douglas's pursuit—continued for four or five miles—relaxed, the two divided columns reunited, and took up a position for the night.

Douglas lay that night at Ahúsi, within six miles of the rebels. Early next morning he started again in pursuit. But the rebels had been equally prompt,

Lugard sends Douglas in pursuit.

April 16-17.

Kúnwar
Singh halts at Naghai.

Douglas attacks him
there.

Kúnwar
Singh falls back skillfully.

April 17-20.

Douglas
pursues,

and marched that day without molestation to Nagra,* eighteen miles distant. They were followed all day by the British cavalry and horse artillery, but the infantry did not come up in time to permit Douglas to engage. He encamped that night within three or four miles of the enemy's position. But Kúnwar Singh was well served by his spies. No sooner had he heard that the British had halted for the night than he broke up his camp, marched to Sikandarpúr, crossed the Ghágrá by the ford near that place, and pushed on to Manohar, in the Gházipúr district. There he and his followers halted, wearied and hungry, hoping they might have time for sleep and food before their pursuers should appear.

and Kúnwar
Singh
retires.

But Douglas was determined to allow them little time for either. At midnight on the 18th he heard of their move towards Sikandarpúr. At 2 o'clock in the morning he was on their track, and marching all day, picking up many stragglers as he proceeded, he bivouacked that night within four miles of Kúnwar Singh's position. He did not rest there long. Hoping to catch the enemy, he turned out his men at a very early hour on the 20th, and, marching rapidly, found himself at daylight in front of his still resting enemy.

Douglas tracks and at last reaches him.

That position was neither so strong nor so well chosen as that at Naghai. The defence consequently was less determined, and the disaster was greater. Douglas advanced his infantry under cover of a fire from his guns, at the same time that he threatened the enemy's right with his cavalry. The rebels made no stand, but fled in disorder, leaving on the field a brass 9-pounder gun, several limbers and waggons, an immense quantity of ammunition, a large amount of treasure, a number of carts and bullocks, four elephants, and the colours of the 28th Regiment Native Infantry, which were found wrapped round the body of a Subahdár who was shot. The rebels were pursued for six miles, but, in pursuance of a preconceived plan, their several columns took different routes, to reunite again at a given hour of the night at some settled spot. Where this spot was Douglas found it impossible to discover. Accordingly,

April 20.

Douglas completely defeats the rebels at Manohar.

* Nagra is a town in the Ázamgarh district. It lies forty-five miles to the east of the town of that name on the road to Chaprá.

when darkness set in, he bivouacked, prepared to move early on the morrow.

But Kúnwar Singh had displayed his customary subtlety.

Kúnwar
Singh eludes Cumberlege and crosses the Ganges into Bihár.

His object was to cross the Ganges. He had impressed on the country people and on many of his own following, that having no boats it would be necessary to cross the river on elephants, of which a certain number still remained. By this report he hoped to deceive the English general. But, meanwhile, he had, by means of his agents, collected a sufficient number of boats at Seopur Ghát, seven miles below Ballia. When, therefore, night fell, he marched off to this point, and outwitting Colonel Cumberlege, who, with two regiments of Madras cavalry, was waiting to pounce upon him at Ballia, succeeded in embarking all his men except two hundred before the British appeared on the scene. Douglas, indeed, had started in pursuit at 2 o'clock in the morning, but, misled by the false information circulated by Kúnwar Singh, he only reached the right track in time to cut off the two hundred men of whom I have spoken, to capture some elephants and another brass gun, and to sink one—the last—of the enemy's boats.

April 21-22.

Kúnwar Singh thus crossed the Ganges in safety. He made

He retires to Jagdispúr.

his way without delay to his ancestral domain at Jagdispúr. Here he found his brother, Amar Singh, with several thousand armed villagers ready to support him. Kúnwar Singh posted these and the few men who, after crossing the Ganges, had adhered to his fortunes, in the jungles covering his castle—the same thick jungles which Vincent Eyre had forced on the 12th August of the preceding year.

But if, as I have already had occasion to remark, there was no William Tayler to exercise a vigilant supervision over the several districts of western Bihár, neither was there a Vincent Eyre to retrieve the errors of the Bengal Government. It happened that Árah was at this time occupied by a party of a hundred and fifty men of the 35th Regiment, a hundred and fifty of Rattray's Sikhs, and fifty sailors of the Naval Brigade, the whole under the command of Captain Le Grand of the

* The town which gives its name to this ghát, Seopur Diar, is two miles from the northern bank of the Ganges, and five miles north-east from Ballia, which is a flourishing town with a municipality.

35th. Le Grand, knowing well what Vincent Eyre had accomplished in the same locality; how, with a smaller force at his disposal, he had beaten an enemy certainly not less numerous and far better armed and disciplined than the enemy now occupying the same position, determined, if possible, to emulate his example. Accordingly, on the 23rd April, he marched from Árah with the force I have mentioned, and two 12-pounder howitzers. Early on the morning of the 23rd he came upon the little army of Kúnwar Singh. It consisted of about two thousand men, dispirited, badly armed, and without guns. It occupied the thick jungle, about a mile and a half in depth. Le Grand began the action with a fire from his two howitzers. These, however, seemed to make no impression on the enemy, and the infantry were then brought up to make the charge which, when they are well led, has never failed against Asiatics. The exact course of the events which followed has never been clearly explained. But this is certain, that at a critical moment of the advance into the thick jungle, when the men in extended order were about to rush forward with a cheer, the bugler sounded the retreat. By whom the order to sound was given, or whether it was intended to sound the retreat, is not known. The effect of it on a scattered body of men unable to see each other was to cause irretrievable confusion. To repair it Le Grand used every means in his power, but in vain. The evil had been done. The men fell back in disorder, followed by the enemy, and, abandoning the howitzers, fled to Árah. The 35th suffered very severely. Two-thirds of their number, amongst them Le Grand and two officers, were either killed* or died from heat-apoplexy on the retreat. The gunners, refusing to retire, were killed at their guns. The disaster was complete.

This disaster threw the district once more into disorder. A panic ensued at the station of Chaprá, and expresses were sent from Danápúr to Brigadier Douglas, urging him to cross the river without delay. Douglas, whose incessant pursuit of Kúnwar Singh without tents had tried his men to the utmost, had been inclined, when the rebel chief had escaped his clutches, to wait till his Captain Le Grand resolves to attack him.

April 23.

He attacks him,

and is completely defeated.

Brigadier Douglas crosses into Shahábád.

* The casualties were in killed: 35th, a hundred and two men; sailors, nineteen; Sikhs, nine; officers, three.

heavy baggage should arrive. But, on receipt of the expresses from Dánápúr, he crossed the Ganges, 25th April, at Sína Ghát, pushed on the 84th Foot and two guns to Árah on the 29th, and followed himself two days later.

But, before Douglas could act against the rebels, a material change had taken place in the conduct of their affairs. Whether Kúnwar Singh was wounded at the action fought at Manohar, or, whether, as some of his followers aver, as he was crossing the Ganges, this is certain, that immediately on his arrival at Jagdispúr he underwent amputation of the wrist. He was an old man, and the shock was too much for him. He died three days after he had defeated Le Grand.

Kúnwar Singh was succeeded by his brother Amar Singh. Though hardly the equal of his brother in military skill, Amar Singh was not one whit behind him in energy and resolution, and the manner in which he conducted the operations which followed left little to be desired in a partisan leader.

The rebels, after defeating Le Grand, had followed up their victory by an attack on Árah. Though repulsed, they still continued to threaten it, and, as their numbers were daily augmenting, Douglas thought it advisable to await the arrival of Lugard, who had warned him of his approach.

Lugard, who, since I last spoke of him, had remained at Ázamgarh, occupied in clearing the surrounding districts, had no sooner heard of Kúnwar Singh's successful passage of the Ganges and the disaster of Le Grand, than he set off with a portion of his brigade, crossed the sacred stream on the 3rd and two following days of May, and marched at once to the neighbourhood of Árah.

The news he received there led Lugard to believe that the rebels, who were reported to number eight thousand, were intrenching themselves in the jungle between Bihiyá and Jagdispúr. He resolved, therefore, to occupy with his main body a position in front of the western face of the jungle, guarding Árah with a detachment, whilst Colonel Corfield, commanding a small force at Sásarám, should march from that quarter to his aid.

Lugard reached Bihiyá on the 8th, sent back thence the detachment to guard Árah, and then marched on the 9th to a plain a little to the west of Jagdispúr. Here he intended to halt to await the arrival of Corfield. But the enemy's action forced him to change his plan. On the afternoon of that day Amar Singh, covering his movement by a threatened attack on Lugard's camp, marched from the jungles with the bulk of his following in the direction of Árah. Forced, then, to attack at once, Lugard checked the advance on Árah with his cavalry and guns; then, dividing his force into three columns, he drove the enemy before him, and occupied Jagdispúr. In this operation he did not lose a single man killed, and only a few were wounded. The rebels fell back on Satwarpúr, a village in the jungle district.

Lugard occupies Jagdispúr.

The day following, Lugard, sensible of the necessity of following up his advantage, set out in pursuit. On the 11th he was joined at Piru, seven miles southwest of Jagdispúr, by Corfield, who, fighting almost daily and always successfully, had made his way from Sásarám. That same day he surprised and defeated the rebels at Hatampúr. From this date, skirmishes were of daily occurrence. On the 12th, Lugard beat the rebels at Jathin, whilst Corfield drove them from Duvim. On the 20th they were again beaten, though they managed to kill an officer, Dawson, of the Military Train. Lugard, however, avenged his death on the 27th by inflicting a crushing defeat upon them at Dalílpur, recapturing the two howitzers they had taken from Le Grand. On this occasion he did not lose a single man.

Progress of the campaign.

But these victories did not crush the rebellion in the district. On each occasion the rebels, knowing every inch of the country, dispersed to reunite in nearly the same strength as before. Dividing themselves into small parties, they organised a system of freebooting, dangerous to life and property, and threatening to the stations, the peaceful villages, and the isolated posts all over the country. It was impossible to wage a war of extermination. Yet the jungles offered the rebels a means of defying for a series of months disciplined soldiers led by skilled and capable generals. In vain were their positions marked, encircled, and then marched upon from different quarters. The smallest delay on the part of one of the converging columns gave the rebels the opportunity, of which they were ever prompt to avail themselves, to escape. Nor was it until the genius

The persistent dispersion of the rebels,

only to reunite.

They defy pursuit, until a new scheme is devised by a staff officer with the force.

of a staff officer serving under Douglas devised a plan, based upon his experience of its efficiency elsewhere, that a certain means was attained for the extermination or expulsion of the persistent rebels. The nature of that plan will be developed in the pages which follow.

After the defeat at Dalílpur on the 27th, the rebels broke up into small parties, and commenced their new trade of marauding on a large scale. One party attacked and destroyed an indigo factory near Dumráun, another plundered the village of Rájpur near Baksar, a third threatened the railway works on the Karamnásá. These proceedings spread dismay and disorder throughout the Sháhábád district.

They harry the district.

In the campaign up to the point which I have now reached, the British troops had suffered greatly from the heat and exposure to the sun. But, in the presence of the occurrences just

Lugard again
defeats them,

recorded, Lugard was compelled to keep them actively employed. To facilitate their movements and to lessen the chances of the escape of the enemy, he set to work to intersect the jungles by roads. On the 2nd June, he divided his force into two parts, the one at Keshwá, the other at Dalílpur, opposite points on the edge of the jungle. Between these he cut a broad road.

June.

Occupying this with a line of posts as a base, he attacked the rebels from the outside on the 4th, and defeated them with great slaughter, the 10th and 84th showing great dash and daring. But still many managed to escape.

but many escape.

It would be tedious to follow the course of every skirmish ; to show how Douglas pursued the rebels with energy and vigour towards Baksar, and how the main body yet managed to elude his pursuit ; how they again and again baffled Lugard. He could beat but could not crush them. He had not, in fact, the means of

Lugard
resigns his command from ill-health.

maintaining a continuous and crushing pursuit. The rebels, therefore, though repeatedly beaten, were able to rally at a distance and return by a circuitous route to the corner of the jungle. But, by the 15th June, Lugard had so far succeeded that the rebels had been expelled to a further distance from the jungles than had ever been the case previously, and he was able to report that the task entrusted to him had been practically completed. Wearied and broken down by the unparalleled hardships of the contest, Lugard was in fact forced by the state of his health to resign his command and proceed to England. The troops were then ordered into quarters. But they had scarcely retired from the field, when the rebels, strong in a conviction of real success in the past, and confident that the rainy season would secure them immunity for the four months to come, reoccupied their old positions, their numbers daily increased by recruits from all parts of the country.

It was under these circumstances that Brigadier Douglas, C.B., was appointed to succeed Lugard. He had no sinecure. He had not even assumed command when he heard that, owing to the manoeuvres and intrigues of Amar Singh, the rebel prisoners in the gaol at Gayá had been released, and, joined by the police and the convicts, had driven the English into their intrenchment. This outrage—which was speedily repaired—was followed up by a raid into the station of Árah, the garrison of which had been cunningly enticed away, and by the burning of a gentleman's bungalow. The civil authority had, in fact, everywhere disappeared.

June—Sept.
Douglas succeeds him.

Difficulties of Douglas on first assuming his command.

Under these circumstances, the British authorities resorted to stronger measures. First they placed Douglas in command of the whole of the disturbed districts as far as Dánápúr. Then they augmented the troops under his command to a numerical strength of seven thousand. Douglas began at once to work on a system. He organised strong posts at easy distances from each other in all directions. He located his troops in such a manner that it would be easy to mass them at short notice on one particular point. He sent out trusted Sipáhis in disguise to penetrate the designs of the mutineers, and even to bring in their leaders, alive or dead. He continued with great effect the practice, initiated by his predecessor, of covering the jungles with roads. Finally, as a supreme remedy, he elaborated a plan for driving the rebels into Jagdispúr, as a common centre, and for there finishing the campaign—as he had every right to expect—by the assault and capture of that stronghold.

Douglas devises means to baffle and subdue the rebels.

This plan, it will be observed, involved the deferring of larger operations until October or November. Meanwhile it was necessary to secure the grand trunk road. On this road, which traverses the lower portion of the district from east to west, and the safety of which was of vital importance to Sir Colin Campbell and his army, large bodies of troops under Colonel Turner, C.B., 97th Regiment, were constantly employed. For the four months that followed Turner was unremittingly engaged on this arduous but necessary service.

Operations are necessarily deferred till after the rains.

The rebels on their side were very persevering. Amar Singh reoccupied Jagdispúr, and his adherents, in small parties, kept the districts in continued disturbance throughout July, August, and September. They seemed to be ubiquitous. Many places in opposite directions were attacked about the same time. Their principal depredations, however, were confined to the country south of the Ganges and west of the Són river.

It is true they met several reverses. On the 9th September, Colonel Walters defeated them at Rámpur; on the 20th, Captain French and a party of the 35th destroyed their boats on the Són; on the 14th October, Mr. Probyn, of the Civil Service, and twenty Sikhs, ran up a creek on the Sháhábád side of the river and destroyed four large boats defended by three hundred and seventy-five Sipáhis and a hundred horsemen—a most gallant performance. Not the less, however, did the rebels continue to threaten Árah; they even attacked the cavalry picket at that station.

But the end was now approaching. The rainy season was passing away. In one point of view it would have been advisable to defer serious operations until it had actually passed. It was feared, however, and not without reason, that on the complete cessation of the rains, the rebels, thoroughly aware of the preparations made against them, would cross the Són and carry rapine and the sword into the districts which had up to the time been free from their presence. Consequently Douglas resolved to begin operations on the 13th October.

On the 9th of that month he set out from Dánápúr to carry into execution the plan he had carefully and elaborately devised. The ground was still swampy, and this was likely to prove a material disadvantage in a campaign the success of which depended upon the exact punctuality of arrival at a given point of several converging columns.* But Douglas had taken his measures with precision. From several points he set in motion, on the 13th October, seven different columns, the object of all being to drive the rebels before them to the common centre, Jagdispúr, there to fall upon them and finish the campaign at one stroke.

* It may be convenient to state that the district in question may be roughly described as a triangle, each side of which measured fifty miles. It was bounded on the north by the Ganges, on the east by the Són, and on the west and south transversely by the hilly districts of Mírzápúr.

Success crowned his earlier combats. On the 14th Douglas drove the rebels out of Kárisát. On the 16th, Durnford, leading the Baksar column, defeated them, though after a determined resistance, at Kámp-ságar. On the 17th Turner's column headed and defeated them at Piru, and followed hotly in pursuit. These movements had been so thoroughly executed that the rebels, numbering four thousand five hundred, were pressed in on all sides towards the centre, and it was known on the evening of the 17th that they were all within the circle, the outlets on the outer ring of which were watched by the seven converging columns.

The rebels are pressed within the Jagdispúr jungles.

Douglas believed that he had them, and he had a right to believe it. Nothing but a mistake on the part of one of the leaders of the seven columns could save them, and he had impressed his orders so strongly on those leaders, and had made them see so clearly the issue at stake, that he had every reason to feel confident. He fixed the assault for noon of the following day. The result showed the mistake of reckoning with absolute certainty on the success of a manœuvre, the threads of which are in the hands of seven men, the failure of any one of whom, whether from accident or stupidity, would spoil the combination. The failure of one man out of the seven effectively ruined Douglas's well-thought-out plan. Six of the columns converged punctually to the common centre, only to find the place evacuated. The seventh column, commanded by Colonel Walters of the 53rd, had been delayed five hours by an inundation consequent on the cutting of embankments, and the rebels had escaped by the outlet he had left them!

Douglas orders the columns to converge on Jagdispúr.

Owing to Colonel Walters' mistake the rebels escape.

It was at this period that the staff officer to whom I have alluded in a preceding page submitted to the general a plan which he believed would meet the difficulties of the case. The staff officer, who was no other than Major Sir Henry Havelock, Deputy Assistant Adjutant-General of the force, had, in his experience of Franks's advance without cavalry from the eastern frontier of Oudh to Lakhnao, noticed the enormous service which a few mounted soldiers of the 10th Foot, carrying rifles on horseback, had been able to render. Conceiving the idea, some time before Douglas had set out from Dánápúr, that the services of a few men might be advantageously utilised in a similar manner, he had caused forty riflemen of the 10th Foot to be hastily trained by Captain Bartholomew of that regiment. He now proposed approved and adopted. to Douglas, to employ the men so trained as mounted infantry—as men, that is to say, who could pursue and overtake the enemy, then, dismounting, hold them in check till the main force should arrive. Douglas gave his cordial assent. Whereupon Havelock, first increasing the Havelock sets out. forty men to sixty by volunteers from the 10th, set out to head the rebels, who, he learned, were marching towards the Són. He took with him three troops of the Military Train and sixty cavalry as supports.

Havelock's plan

The orders given to Havelock were to endeavour, by a forced march, to interpose between the rebels and the Són, whilst two columns of infantry should be despatched in the same direction, one to the north, the other to the south, of their line of flight, so that, should he succeed in turning them, they would find themselves surrounded. The plan of his campaign.

Havelock set out from his post near Jagdispúr at a little past 8 o'clock on the night of the 18th; he reached Árah at 1 o'clock in the morning of the 19th, halted there for six and a half hours, and, starting again at half-past 7, reached the Són before the rebels. The latter, finding themselves headed, halted, remained irresolute for twelve hours, and then retraced their steps south-westward. Havelock heads the rebels;

Havelock's mounted column followed, maintaining by patrols a constant communication with the infantry detachments, and guiding their movements. The mutinied Sipáhis, now fairly aroused to a sense of their danger, put forth their best efforts to out-march their pursuers, and, after an ineffectual attempt to re-enter the Jagdispúr jungle, pushed directly westward. The pursuing mounted riflemen were sadly embarrassed by rice-fields, inundated to a depth of from one to two feet, making one continuous swamp for miles. These the rebels on foot avoided by moving along the "bandhs," or ridges used to confine the water. Still Havelock gradually gained on them. On the afternoon of the 29th of who try to escape by pushing westward.

October he overtook their rear-guard of four hundred infantry near Nonádí, and succeeded, by a rifle-fire maintained by dismounted men on two faces, one directed on the main body, the other on the rear-guard, in cutting off the latter from the former, and hemming it into the village till Colonel Turner's infantry column should arrive. Turner then stormed the village, and slew three hundred rebels. About a hundred, the balance, dashed out in sheer desperation, but they were at once "ringed" in an adjoining field by Havelock's mounted riflemen, who shot them down till their numbers were so reduced that the supporting cavalry, bursting in on them, sword in hand, sabred almost every man. Only three or four, amongst whom was Amar Singh himself, disguised, found safety in a neighbouring cane-crop. This was the most effective blow that had been struck against the Sháhábád rebels. Its success is to be attributed solely to the use of the new mounted riflemen, without whose presence the enemy would, as on every former occasion, have escaped unscathed through their superior speed.

The mounted riflemen overtake them, and cut them up.

The main body of rebels had meanwhile continued its flight, after several doubles, finally due west. Following on its track, Havelock again overtook it after a forty miles' march, on the afternoon of the 21st. The infantry column, under Brigadier Douglas's personal command, guided by reports from the mounted rifles, had been able to follow the foe in straight lines from point to point of his numerous twistings and doublings, so that, when the Sipáhis, thoroughly fagged, halted that afternoon to cook, it was sufficiently near to be expected to take part in the combat. Havelock's column approached the rebels while they were thus employed; but, instead of dashing at them at once, Havelock, very wisely, made a circuit, so as to head them towards Douglas's infantry. As soon as he had reached the proper point he charged, drove them from their cooking, and, circling them in on three sides with skirmishers, kept them in check for three hours in the plain, waiting for the infantry to come up. There was now every hope that the success of the previous day would be repeated, but this expectation was not realised. By a mistake of the person guiding Douglas's infantry, his column was brought up in the rear of Havelock's force instead of behind that of the rebels, who at once availed themselves of this error,

Havelock resumes pursuit, and overtakes the rebels, who escape, from the mistake of a guide, and get a ten hours' start.

and slipped out of the opening left for them. Evening, setting in at the same time, gave them ten hours' darkness to cover their flight. But, thoroughly terrified now at finding that they could not shake off their pursuers, they abandoned all attempt to do mischief in the district, and confined all their efforts to the one object of escape. Favoured by the long hours of darkness, and by the whole population of the district, who constantly and systematically misled the pursuers by false information, they marched in the next forty hours sixty-three miles further without being overtaken, making for a range of hills which bound the south-west of the district, and are accessible from the plain only by three difficult passes.

But Havelock's mounted riflemen, not to be shaken off, again overtook the enemy on the evening of the 23rd. The horses were by this time so exhausted that it was impossible either to head or to charge the rebels, who, drawing up in two solid squares flanking each other, steadily continued their way to the hills. But at every step men and horses fell in their very midst under the long-range rifles of the pursuers, who, while thus inflicting a severe punishment, were themselves beyond reach of the enemy's muskets. Not a minute but witnessed the capture of baggage-animals, including Amar Singh's elephant, carrying a howdah containing his suit of chain armour. The rebels continued, nevertheless, their hurried flight to the Kaimúr hills.* But so great had been the terror inspired by the new arm, now for the first time in India employed against them, and from which escape seemed impossible, that even the telegraph wire, which it had always been their main object to destroy, remained uncut along the trunk road which they crossed in their flight; and the whole of the British depot establishments there—of vital importance to the regular supply of troops and stores to the army under Lord Clyde—remained uninjured. Havelock's loss in this singular pursuit, which covered two hundred and one miles in five days and nights, was only three men killed and eighteen wounded. But forty-three horses died of fatigue. The rebel loss in the three actions of the 19th, 20th, and 21st

Havelock a third time overtakes the rebels and punishes them.

Terror of the rebels at the practice of the new Enfield rifle.

* The Kaimúr range extends south-west from latitude 24° 40', longitude 82°, for about 70 or 80 miles. It has an elevation of about 2000 feet. It divides the valley of the south-western Tons, Jabalpur district, from that of the Són, Sháhábád district.

October was not less than five hundred killed, including those hemmed in and subsequently destroyed by Colonel Turner's column at Nonádí.

Thus sixty men, organised on a novel plan, and aided by a handful of cavalry, had effected, with almost nominal loss, in five days, what three thousand regular troops had for six months failed to accomplish—viz. the complete expulsion of four thousand five hundred rebels from the province, and the infliction on them of a punishment the impression of which has not to this day been effaced. When once the inhabitants of the district became aware that the enemy was opposed by troops against whom they could not only hope for no success in the field, but whom it was impossible for them to shake off in flight, their confidence in British power returned, and the restoration of order became an easy task.

Success of Havelock's plan of mounted riflemen.

Oct.—Nov.

Meanwhile, the Jagdispúr jungle had been cut down and cleared away. The rebels were gradually driven from place to place, their hiding-places being occupied as the pursuers advanced. It is true that in the long pursuit the rebels managed once or twice to pounce upon the baggage of their enemies. But, in its results, the plan inaugurated by Havelock was most successful. On the 24th November Douglas surprised, by a night march, the main body of the rebels at Salia Dahár, in the Kaimúr hills, killed many of them, and took all their arms and ammunition. Before the year ended he could boast that the districts under his command had been completely cleared. The campaign had been more trying, more fatiguing than many which are counted more glorious in their results. Never had troops in India made longer, or more continuously long, marches. On one occasion, I may repeat, the British infantry marched twenty-six miles a day for five days; and the average daily march of Havelock's cavalry was scarcely less than forty miles.

Complete collapse of
the rebels.

CHAPTER IV.

THE PROGRESS IN OUDH AND ROHILKHAND. HOPE GRANT: PENNY:
 WALPOLE AT RÚIYÁ: COKE: JOHN JONES: SAM BROWNE:
 WILLIAM PEEL: VENABLES.

I RETURN once more to Lakhnao. Of the army which conquered that city, one division, that commanded by Sir E. Lugard, has been disposed of in the preceding pages. There remain still the corps d'armée under Hope Grant, and the division under Walpole. I shall deal first with the former.

On the 9th April, Sir Hope Grant, commanding the force already noted,* received instructions in person from the Commander-in-Chief, to march at once with a column to Bári, twenty-nine miles from Lakhnao, to drive thence a body of rebels who had collected there under the famous Maulaví; then marching eastwards to Muhammadábád, and following the course of the Ghágrá, to reconnoitre a place called Bitaulí, where it was rumoured the Begam of Lakhnao with six thousand followers had taken post; thence to march to Rámnagar to cover the march of the Nipálese troops on their return to Nipál.

To carry out these instructions, Hope Grant marched from Lakhnao on the morning of the 11th April. He took with him Middleton's battery, Mackinnon's troop of horse artillery, two 18-pounders, two 8-inch howitzers, two 5½-inch Cohorn mortars, the 7th Hussars, one squadron 2nd Dragoon Guards, Wale's Panjáb Horse, the 2nd battalion Rifle Brigade, the 38th Foot, the 1st Bengal Fusiliers, five hundred men of Vaughan's Panjáb Corps (the 5th), one hundred sappers and miners with a proportion of engineer officers—in all, about three thousand men.

A curious incident, emblematic of the progress made by the rebels in the art of daring yet crafty reconnoitring, occurred on the night of the following day. Hope Grant had encamped about three parts of the way between Lakhnao and Bári. As he lay there that night, a troop of irregular cavalry penetrated within the line of pickets, which at that point were drawn from Wale's Horse. When challenged, they replied, with the most absolute truth, that they belonged to the 12th Irregulars. They did not add that their regiment had mutinied so far back as July of the previous year, and murdered their commandant.* The pickets, replied to in this confident manner, suspected nothing, and allowed the new-comers to pass on. The mutineers, having seen all they cared to see, quietly slipped out and returned to Bári.

* Vide page 328, note.

During reconnoitring by the rebels.

The plan which the rebel leader, who was no other than the Maulaví, adopted on receiving the information which the men of the 12th had acquired, did credit to his tactical skill. He at once occupied a village about four miles on the Bári side of the British encampment with his whole force. This village was covered all along its front by a stream, the banks of which on the side nearest to it were high, and the ground leading up to which was honeycombed. It was a very strong position. The idea of the Maulaví was to hold the village with his infantry, whilst he sent his cavalry by a circuitous route to fall on the flanks of the attacking force. It was really a brilliant idea; for the British force, he was aware, would march at daybreak, entirely unsuspecting of his presence, and, could he but conceal his infantry from view till the British were well within range, and restrain his cavalry till the resistance from the side of the village had begun, the chances of success seemed to be all in his favour.

The Maulaví's plan

shows great skill.

But the brilliant idea was spoilt by the mode in which it was executed. Hope Grant did indeed march at daybreak, unsuspecting of danger. The bulk of the enemy's cavalry, avoiding the line of march, was rapidly gaining a position on his rear, there to fall upon the six thousand carts which were carrying the baggage of the force, when their leaders were tempted by the sight of two guns in the British advance, lightly guarded by Wale's Horse, to throw to the winds the plan of their general and attempt to capture the guns. For a moment fortune seemed to favour them. They surrounded the picket, wounded the officer commanding it, Lieutenant Prendergast, and had the guns in their power. Just as they were about to carry them off, however, they caught sight of a troop of the 7th Hussars, led by Captain Topham, on the point of charging them. Without awaiting the charge, they abandoned their prey, galloped off, and endeavour to recur to the original plan. But they had spoilt it.

His cavalry are tempted to spoil it.

Their easy success

is changed into defeat.

The British were now thoroughly awake. Hope Grant made prompt arrangements for the protection of his rear guard, and, though the enemy made two considerable efforts to capture the baggage, they were baffled, first by a splendid charge of the 7th Hussars troop under Topham, and secondly by a volley, delivered within thirty yards of them, by two companies of the 1st Bengal Fusiliers. Completely baffled in their plans, they then retreated.

The rebels are forced to retreat,

Meanwhile, Hope Grant pushed forward with his infantry to the village. He noticed the strength of the position, the difficulty it might give him were it well defended. But the premature action of the cavalry, while it had ruined the plan of the Maulaví, had taken all the heart out of his followers. Prepared to surprise the British force and even to resist should the cavalry charge throw it into disorder, they did not care to meet the assault of the troops which had already repulsed the cavalry. Under the circumstances they preferred to wait for a more favourable opportunity, and evacuated the village without firing a shot.

and evacuate the village.

Pushing on to Bári and eastward from that place, Hope Grant reached Muhammadábád on the 15th, and Rám-nagar on the 19th. Rám-nagar was but six miles from Bitaulí, the spot where it was rumoured the Begam and her followers had taken post. But the Begam, wise in her generation, had not awaited the arrival of the English general, and Bitaulí was found evacuated.

Hope Grant rushes on to Rám-nagar.

Bitaulí evacuated, Hope Grant proceeded to look after Jang Bahádur's Nipálese. He found them at Masaulí, midway between Rám-nagar and Nawábganj. In his journal, the general gives a vivid description of the condition of our allies. "The European officer in command," he writes, "had great difficulties to contend with in marching through a country so filled with rebels. His force consisted of eight thousand men with twenty guns; yet he could only reckon on two thousand men for actual fighting purposes. He had two thousand sick and four thousand carts; and each of the latter being filled with tents, private property, and loot, required, according to the usages of these troops, a man to guard it."* From this place Hope Grant marched southwards to protect the road between Kánhpúr and Lakhnao, then threatened at Unáo. After some skirmishes of no great moment, in which the rebels were invariably dispersed, he reached the fort of Jalálábád, near Lakhnao, on the 16th May. Here, for the present, I must leave him, to follow the plans of the Commander-in-Chief with respect to Rohilkhand.

Jung Bahá-dar's Nipá-lese.

Their condition described by Hope Grant.

May.

Hope Grant returns to Lakhnao.

It had been determined by the Governor-General, the reader will recollect, that the re-conquest of this province should follow the re-capture of Lakhnao, and Sir Colin Campbell found Lord Canning still firm in this respect. He himself would have preferred to wait till the hot season had passed. But Lord Canning, with a clear idea of the necessities of the situation, insisted on immediate action. The rebels who, by Sir Colin's own carelessness, had been allowed to escape from Lakhnao, had fled into Rohilkhand. Thence at all costs they must be expelled, with promptitude and energy.

Sir Colin's plans for the reconquest of Rohilkhand.

In accordance with this view, Sir Colin arranged to converge three columns, starting from different points, on the doomed province. One of these, commanded by General Penny, was directed to cross the Ganges at Nadaulí and join Walpole's division, marching from Lakhnao, at Miránpúr Katra, twenty miles to the west of Sháhjahánpur. Another, starting from Rúrki, would penetrate into the province from the north-west. Connected, to a certain extent, with these operations was a third at Fathgarh under Seaton, guarding the south-eastern entrance

* Hope Grant's Incidents of the Sepoy War.

As these troops took no further part in the war, it may be convenient to state here that they continued their retreat from Masaulí towards their own country, and effected it without molestation. They reached Gorákhpur early in May, and resumed their march thence on the 17th idem. In consequence of the number of their carts they experienced some difficulty in crossing the Gandak at Bagaha, in the Champárau district. Marching thence by way of Bhetíá and Sigaulí, they crossed the Nipál frontier early in June.

into Rohilkhand on the one side, and the districts between the Ganges and the Jamnah on the other.

Seaton, left by Sir Colin Campbell, at the end of January, in command of the Fathgarh district, had employed the time which passed till the fall of Lakhnao in strengthening the fort of Fathgarh, in removing the bridge of boats to a point under the walls of the fort, and in practising his artillery at marks on the other side of the river near the positions which an advancing enemy would be likely to take up. The rebels meanwhile continued to threaten him from the Rohilkhand side of the Rámangá, though they took care to keep out of the range of his guns.

But, as time went on, and Seaton made no move, whilst reinforcements flocked into the rebel camp, the situation became critical. It became still more so when the rebel Rájah of Mainpúri, Téj Singh, entered their camp, and incited them to profit by the supineness of the British at Fathgarh to cross the Ganges and raise the Duáb.

But Seaton, supine as apparently had been his action, had been neither blind nor indifferent to the proceedings of the enemy. He had held his hand so long as it seemed probable that they would remain on the left bank of the river; but the moment they showed a disposition to attempt to burst the door of the Duáb, he resolved to attack them.

Hazardous as it was, with his slender force, to assault a powerful enemy, Seaton could not really act otherwise. For the occupation of the Duáb by a large rebel force would close the grand trunk road, and cause the preparations, now about to be set in action, against Rohilkhand, to be indefinitely delayed.

Seaton ascertained that the rebels occupied three strong positions: one at Álíganj, seven miles from Fathgarh, on the further bank of the Rámangá; a second at Bangáun, three miles from a ferry on the Ganges, twenty-four miles above Fathgarh; and a third at Kankar, in the same direction, twenty-two miles distant. Now, in the opinion of Seaton, Álíganj was so strong as to be proof against attack; Bangáun was too far off for a night's march. He resolved, then, to attack Kankar. Kankar being situated between Álíganj and Bangáun, he believed, to

Seaton at Fathgarh.

The rebels think of resuming the offensive.

Seaton
watches their proceedings.

Consequences had he remained supine.

He resolves to attack the central position of the rebels.

use his own expression, that "if he knocked out the middle post the upper one would collapse on the lower."

So, indeed, it proved. Leaving Fathgarh with his small force (a thousand infantry, three hundred cavalry, and five guns) at 11 o'clock on the night of the 6th April, Seaton reached Kankar by daylight, drove back the enemy's cavalry, and then stormed the villages occupied by the infantry, inflicting upon them a loss of two hundred and fifty killed and wounded, and taking three guns. In this action Lieutenant de Kantzow greatly distinguished himself. Seaton had only five men killed and seventeen wounded. The immediate effect of his victory was very important. The rebels renounced their idea of invading the Duáb, and the division at Áliganj was so affected by it that its leader broke down the bridge across the Rámgangá.

He defeats them and baffles their main plans.

Whilst Seaton was thus keeping fast the door of the province, Penny was moving down from Balandshahr to join in the operations contemplated by the Commander-in-Chief in Rohilkhand. His force consisted of two hundred of the Carabineers, three hundred and fifty-three of the 64th, three hundred and sixty of the Baluch Battalion, two hundred and fifty Multáni Horse, three hundred and twenty 2nd Panjábis, and six heavy and six light guns. Penny met Sir Colin Campbell at Fathgarh on the 24th, then crossed the Ganges, and pushed on to Úsehat, a town on the further side of one of the confluent streams of the main stream. Úsehat was found deserted, and Cracroft Wilson, the political officer with the column, brought the general information that the enemy had fled into Oudh, and that his march to Budáun would not be opposed. Penny accordingly started on the night of the 30th April to make a night march of upwards of twenty miles to that place. He had reached Kakrálá, riding with Cracroft Wilson at the head of the advanced guard, commanded by Captain Curtis, when some dusky forms and some lights were noticed a short distance ahead. It was quite dark, and before the nature of these appearances could be ascertained, a discharge of grape came into their midst. Penny was never seen again alive, and it was supposed that his horse, frightened by the sudden discharge, started off, and carried him into the ranks of the enemy.

General Penny

occupies Úsehat

and marches to Budáun;

he is suddenly attacked by the rebels and killed.

cable, is out of place as a preface to a short campaign conducted by the commander in question—a campaign which I have already described as “offering no difficulties.” If the campaign offered no difficulties, it may be urged, surely any man, even a Walpole, might have carried it to a successful issue. Thus to brand a commander with incapacity when the occasion did not require capacity, is as unnecessary as ungenerous!

Possible objections to such a delineation.

It would be so, indeed, if the campaign, devoid of difficulty as it was, had not been productive of disaster. But the course of this history will show that, though there ought to have been no difficulties, Walpole, by his blundering and obstinacy, created them, and, worse than all, he, by a most unnecessary—I might justly say by a wanton—display of those qualities, sacrificed the life of one of the noblest soldiers in the British army—sent to his last home, in the pride of his splendid manhood, in the enjoyment of the devotion of his men, of the love of his friends, of the admiration and well-placed confidence of the army serving in India, the noble, the chivalrous, the high-minded Adrian Hope.

The objections replied to.

Walpole, I have said, set out from Lakhnao on the 7th April. His orders were to advance up the left bank of the Ganges, and so to penetrate into Rohilkhand. For the first week the march was uneventful. But on the morning of the 15th, after a march of nine miles, Walpole found himself in close vicinity to Ruiyá, a small fort fifty-one miles west by north from Lakhnao, and ten miles east of the Ganges. The fort was enclosed by a mud wall high on its northern and eastern faces, loop-holed for musketry, defended on those sides by a broad and deep ditch, and covered by a thick jungle. It was provided with irregular bastions at the angles, and had one gate on the western, another on the southern face. It belonged to a petty landowner named Nirpat Singh, a man who was a rebel as long as rebellion seemed profitable, but who had not the smallest inclination to run his head against a British force. Walpole had received information the previous day that Ruiyá was occupied by rebels, and there can be no doubt that their number was, as usual, greatly exaggerated. The two or three hundred men who followed Nirpat Singh had been increased by report to fifteen hundred.

Walpole marches to Ruiyá.

April 15.

Description of Ruiyá.

It happened that one of the troopers of Hodson's Horse, who,

Information given by a trooper of the state of affairs within Ruiyá. taken prisoner in some previous encounter, had been confined within the fort of Ruiyá, found means that morning to escape, and to penetrate into the British camp. Taken to the general, he informed him of the state of affairs within the fort, and that Nirpat Singh was prepared, after making a show of resistance, sufficient to save his honour, to evacuate it that afternoon, leaving one gate open for the British to walk in.

Walpole gave no credit to the man's story. What was worse, he would not even reconnoitre. He clung to the belief that the fort was garrisoned by fifteen hundred men, and, it would seem, he was anxious to win his spurs by driving them out of it.

Actual state of the southern and western faces of Ruiyá. He did not, I have said, take the trouble to reconnoitre. The slightest examination would have shown him that, whilst the northern and eastern faces were strong, covered by dense underwood and trees, the western and southern were weak, and incapable of offering defence. These faces were approached by a large sheet of water, everywhere very shallow, and in many places dried into the ground, and the walls there were so low that an active man could jump over them. But, I repeat, Walpole made no reconnoissance. Without examining the fort at all, he sent his men in a blundering, hap-hazard manner against its strongest face!

The rebels were prepared to evacuate the fort, and they had intended to fire a few rounds and retreat. But, when they saw the British general sending his infantry in skirmishing order against the face which could be defended, they changed their minds, and determined to show fight. Meanwhile Walpole had ridden up to a company of the 42nd that was in advance, commanded by Captain Ross Grove,* and had directed that officer to extend and pass through the wooded ground in his front; then to close on the fort, hold the gate, and prevent the enemy from escaping. Another company of the same regiment, led by Captain Green, was to move in support.

Pushing through the forest before them, the 42nd dashed across the open space between the trees and the fort, and lay down on the edge of the counterscarp of the ditch, which had

* Now Major Ross retired.

till then been invisible. During their advance the enemy had poured upon them a continuous fire. That fire now became increasingly hot, and, as the men had no cover, many of them were shot down, killed or wounded. After waiting here for some time, Grove sent a bugler to the general to tell him that there was no gate, but that if he would send scaling-ladders he would escalate the place. It was evident by this time to Grove that no other attack was being made.

The attack on Ruiyá is repulsed.

To his message to Walpole Grove received no answer. Then, as the casualties were becoming serious—there being only a few paces between his men and the enemy—he sent another message asking for a reinforcement as well as ladders, and pointing out that it was impossible to cross the ditch without the latter.

Presently, Captain Cafe came down with his Sikhs, the 4th Panjáb Rifles. Without communicating with Grove, Cafe dashed into the ditch a little to the left of the 42nd. There his men, having no ladders, were shot down like dogs. It was marvellous that any escaped. Amongst the officers killed was Edward Willoughby, a young officer of the 10th Bombay Native Infantry, who, though on the sick-list, had left his dooly to join in the fight. Of the hundred and twenty men Cafe had brought with him, forty-six men were killed and two wounded. Finding it useless to persevere, Cafe drew back the remnant of his men, and asked the 42nd to help him to recover Willoughby's body. Grove, unable to go himself, being in command, gave him two privates, Thomson and Spence. With these men Cafe returned to the ditch and brought back the body, Cafe being wounded. He received the Victoria Cross for his gallantry; so, likewise, did Thomson. Spence died two days later from a wound he received in carrying out his splendid deed.

No orders had reached Grove, who, with his men, remained still exposed to the enemy's fire, when, a short time afterwards, Adrian Hope came up, accompanied only by his aide-de-camp, Butler. It would seem that, whilst the troops I have mentioned were acting in the manner there described on one face of the fort, Walpole, alarmed at the consequences of his own rashness, had caused the heavy guns to open on the walls from the side opposite to that on which the skirmishers still were. Soon after they had opened fire, a report was made to Adrian Hope that the balls from the heavy guns were going over the fort and dropping amongst the skirmishers. He at once rode up to Walpole. What passed between them cannot with any certainty be known, but it seems probable that Walpole doubted the truth of the report, for, on his return from the conversation, Hope declared to Butler that he would go and see for himself. The moment Grove saw him he sprang to his feet, and, rushing to him, said, "Good God, general! this is no place for you; you must lie down." But it was too late. Even at the moment his immense frame had become a target to the enemy, not to be missed. He was shot through the chest, and died almost immediately in Grove's arms. Whilst holding him, Grove's own bonnet and kilt were shot through.

Grove then told Butler that he could not and would not retire without orders, and that scaling-ladders were the things he wanted. Butler went back to report to Walpole. Meanwhile, in the hope of finding some means of entering the fort, Grove crawled round the edge of the ditch, followed by two men, to keep down, as far as they could, the enemy's fire. He persevered till one of the two men was killed by a round shot from the British guns discharged from the other side, when, finding his effort fruitless of results, he returned. A few minutes later the Brigade-Major, Cox, came up with the order to retire. This order the two companies of the 42nd obeyed in as strict order and steadiness, by alternate files, as if they had been on a parade ground.

Their losses had been heavy. Lieutenants Douglas and Bramley and fifty-five of their followers were killed; two other officers were wounded. The bodies of the dead officers were not allowed to remain where they fell. Quarter-master Sergeant Simpson, Privates Douglas and Davis, especially distinguished themselves in the dangerous and heroic work of recovering them.* Lieutenant Harington of the Artillery was also killed.

Adrian Hope had fallen. Then, the retreat having been ordered in the manner I have described, Brigadier Hagart was directed to bring off the dead. Walpole rode back to camp. That same night the rebels evacuated the fort. Nirpat Singh kept his word. He marched out after vindicating his honour! But, thanks to Walpole, at what a cost to us!

The loss the country sustained by the deaths of Willoughby, of Douglas, of Bramley, of Harington, and of the hundred and odd men uselessly sacrificed before Rúiya was great—but the loss of Adrian Hope was a cause for national sorrow. His death was mourned on the spot by every man in the camp. Loud and deep were the invectives against the obstinate stupidity which had caused it. Nor, though thirty years have since passed away, is he yet forgotten.*

* They all received the Victoria Cross.

Mourning for Adrian Hope
in the camp.

Adrian Hope was indeed a man to be loved. “A gentler, braver spirit never breathed—a true soldier, a kind, courteous, noble gentleman, in word and deed; devoted to his profession, beloved by his men, adored by his friends—this indeed is a sad loss to the British army.” So wrote on the spot William Howard Russell. Nor was the testimony of the Governor-General and the Commander-in-Chief less genuine. “No more mournful duty has fallen upon the Governor-General in the course of the present contest,” wrote Lord Canning, “than that of recording the premature death of this gallant young commander.” “The death of this most distinguished and gallant officer,” wrote Sir Colin Campbell, “causes the deepest grief to the Commander-in-Chief. Still young in years, he had risen to high command; and by his undaunted courage, combined as it was with extreme kindness and charm of manner, had secured the confidence of the brigade in no ordinary degree.”

By the public and by the authorities.

April 22.

Walpole pushed on the following day, and on the 22nd reached the village of Sírsá, forty miles beyond the fatal Rúiyá. Sírsá is a strong village on the right bank of the Rámgangá, not far from Álíganj, the place occupied by the rebels who had so long annoyed Seaton. And, in fact, they were the same rebels who had now crossed the river. The experience he had gained at Rúiya had made Walpole careful of his infantry. This time he brought his artillery to bear on the village in front, whilst he sent his cavalry to turn their flank. The manœuvre was so far successful that the enemy were driven out of the village, leaving their four guns behind them, and forced to cross the river in such

Walpole
expels the rebels from Sírsá.

* It is a curious commentary on the principle, then, as now, in fashion, of conferring honours on men, not for the deeds they achieve, but for the high positions they occupy, that the general who lost more than one hundred men and Adrian Hope, in failing to take this petty fort, was made a K.C.B.

Though he failed to take the fort, he was yet a divisional commander.

but the bulk of them
escape.

disorder that they did not destroy the bridge which spanned it. But no proper arrangements had been made for following up the victory, and the great bulk of the rebels escaped.

Five days later, 27th April, Walpole was joined by the Commander-in-Chief on the Rohilkhand side of Fathgarh. The force then marched on Shahjahán-púr, which the enemy had evacuated. It then pushed on without opposition to Miránpúr Katrá, where it united with the troops lately commanded by Penny, on the 3rd May.

The Commander-in-
Chief joins.

I proceed now to trace the course of the Rúrki column, commanded by Brigadier-General Jones of the 60th Rifles.

Sir Colin Campbell had, in the first instance, decided that the force forming at Rúrki to march thence across Rohilkhand to Baréli should be merely a brigade force, and he had appointed Colonel John Coke, commanding the 1st Panjáb Infantry, to lead it.

A brigade formed at Rúrki.

Colonel Coke was one of the best known and most distinguished officers of the Panjáb Frontier Force. To a thorough knowledge of his profession he added an acquaintance with the natives of India not to be surpassed, and a rare power of bending them to his will. He had seen much service. He had been with Sir Charles Napier in Upper Sindh, with Gough at Chilianwála and Gújrát, with Gilbert in pursuit of the Sikhs. After the conclusion of the second Sikh war, he served continuously, up to the outbreak of the mutiny, on the frontier. There his name became a household word. Scarcely an expedition was undertaken against the wild border tribes but Coke bore a part in it. Twice was he wounded; but his unflinching demeanour, his power of leadership, whilst it gained the supreme confidence of his men, extorted respect and admiration from his enemies. Wherever he might be, his presence was a power.

Colonel Coke.

His previous service.

Summoned to Dehlí early in August, Coke brought to the part assigned him in the siege all the qualities which had made his name on the frontier. He was always prominent in the fight, always daring and self-reliant.*

* I may be pardoned if I relate here one special act, amongst many, which illustrated his conduct at this period. On the 12th August Coke received instructions from Brigadier Showers to turn out the European picket at the Metcalfe stables, and, taking the men composing it with him, to proceed

The force into command of which he suddenly fell was such as might well have inspired him with the hope of gaining distinction as an independent commander. It was composed of a troop of the 9th Lancers, of Cureton's Multání Cavalry, of a wing of the 60th Rifles, of the 1st Panjáb Infantry, of the 1st Sikhs, and of the 17th Panjáb Infantry. The artillery portion of it was formed of Austin's light field battery and two 18-pounders.

The troops composing his brigade.

Coke had arrived at Rúrki on the 22nd February, but April was approaching, before, with the assistance of Baird Smith, who was then at that station, he had been able to complete his commissariat arrangements. The country, in fact, had been so thoroughly exhausted that but little carriage was procurable. In this dilemma Coke's practical knowledge and fertility of resource came into play. He had read how, in the olden days of Indian warfare, the Brinjáris—dealers who carry their grain on pack cattle—had made themselves eminently serviceable. Calling to mind, then, that at the actual season these men were accustomed to pasture their Scarcity of carriage.

His practical knowledge causes the deficiency to be supplied, through the Metcalfe gardens and attack the guns which had been firing on the picket the preceding day. No information was given him as to the locality of the guns; but, having been quartered at Dehlí before the outbreak, Coke imagined that he would find them in the vicinity of Ludlow Castle. He directed, then, the officer commanding the picket to extend the men on his right, and to follow the direction he should take. At the same time he ordered Lieutenant Lumsden, commanding his own regiment, to skirmish through the gardens on his left—the direction in which he expected to find the enemy in force. He then rode through the gardens towards Ludlow Castle. On reaching the boundary wall of the gardens on the main road leading to the city, he found that an embrasure had been made in the wall of the garden. At the same moment he saw the enemy's guns—two nine-pounder brass guns—in the road with horses attached, but no one with them, the enemy having apparently taken refuge in Ludlow Castle when driven out of the Metcalfe gardens by Lumsden. The horses' heads were turned towards the city. An alarm—a stray bullet—a discharge close to them—might start them off at any moment. Quick as lightning the idea flashed into Coke's brain that, if he could but turn the horses' heads towards the camp, it would little signify how soon the horses might be alarmed; they would, of themselves, capture the guns for the British. On the instant he alighted from his horse, got down through the embrasure into the road, ran to the horses of the leading gun, and turned them up the road towards cantonments. Whilst doing this he was shot in the thigh by the enemy in Ludlow Castle, but the guns were captured. He had done his self-allotted task, and reaped his only reward in the admiration of all who witnessed his splendid daring.

cattle in the Tarái,* he sent thither, found them, and made such arrangements with their head men as enabled him to conquer a difficulty which many another man would have found insurmountable.

The carriage had been supplied, all the arrangements for the march of the force had been completed, the force was about to march, when Coke was suddenly superseded. It seemed good to Sir Colin Campbell to make the command of the field force a divisional command.

Brigadier-General Jones superseded him.

The other wing of the 60th Rifles was accordingly added to it, and with that wing came Colonel John Jones, with the rank of Brigadier-General, to command the whole. Coke acted as brigadier and second in command under Jones.

In reality the change was only in name. General Jones was a very brave man, but he was unwieldy in body, and incapable of very great activity. But he had no jealousy, and he was gifted with rare common sense. He saw at a glance that Coke was the man for the work, and he was content to leave it in his hands. In the campaign that followed, then, and of which he reaped all the credit, he never once interfered with Coke's arrangements. That officer continued to be supreme—in all but name.

The real command of the force

General Jones—nicknamed at the time, from his habit of denouncing vengeance against the rebels, "The Avenger"—joined the force early in April. On the 17th of that month he opened the campaign by crossing, unopposed, the Ganges at Hardwár.

The force crosses the Ganges at Hardwár.

The rebel troops were occupying the thick forest on the left bank of the river in considerable force. They were aware that the British would be compelled to march through this forest, and, as it was traversed in many places by deep canals, they hoped to find opportunities for attacking them at advantage.

The position and hopes of the rebels.

Jones had learned from Coke the general position of the enemy, and he had authorised that officer, as brigadier commanding the advance, to make the necessary arrangements for

* Tarái; literally, low ground flooded with water. In Rohilkhand "the Tarái" forms a district with an area of 938 square miles. It is bounded on the north by Kumáun, on the east by Nipál and Pilibhít, on the south by Bareíl, Murádábád, and the state of Rámpur. It consists of a narrow strip of land, about ninety miles long by twelve broad, lying at the foot of the hills where the springs burst from under the bhábar forests of Kumáun.

forcing it. When, then, he had crossed the Ganges, Coke pushed on rapidly with the advance in the direction of the town of Nágál, near which it was known the enemy's main force was located. But he had marched only four miles when he fell in with a considerable body of rebels posted in a thick jungle, and their front covered by a canal, at a place called Bhogníwálá. They had six guns, which at once opened on the British. But Austin, bringing up his field battery, promptly replied to them, whilst the infantry, in skirmishing order, steadily advanced. When they reached the canal, the bed of which was nearly dry, they had a fair view of the rebels. At that moment Lieutenant Gostling, commanding a troop of the Multání Horse, let loose his men, and forced them back. This was the decisive moment. Coke, bringing the bulk of Cureton's regiment (the Multání Horse), and Austin's battery well to the front, charged the rebels whenever they attempted to form. This action, constantly repeated, produced the desired result. The rebels gave way under the pressure, abandoning their camp equipage and guns, casting away their arms, and even throwing off their clothes to facilitate escape. The Multánis followed them for some miles, cutting up a large number of them, and capturing four guns. On this occasion Lieutenant Gostling killed eight men with his revolver. The loss of the victors was small, amounting to one man killed and sixteen wounded. That of the conquered was considerable.*

Coke pushes on and finds the rebels at Bhogníwálá.

He completely defeats them.

The following morning a very brilliant and very daring feat of arms was accomplished, under the inspiration of Cureton, by a native officer of the Multání Horse, Jámádár Imán Bakhsh Khán. Conceiving that the rebels defeated on the previous day might have taken refuge in the thick jungle to the north of Najíbábád, Cureton despatched the Jámádár mentioned and forty troopers to patrol in that direction. The Jámádár, in carrying out this duty, received information from villagers that a rebel Nawáb with five hundred followers was in occupation of a fort called Khót, a few miles distant. With happy audacity, Imán Bakhsh Khán proceeded Brilliant feat of arms by a native officer.

* That it was very great may be inferred from the saying of the natives, "that the spirits of the dead still haunt the scene, and that their groans may be heard in the night."—Vide Cornhill Magazine for January 1863, article "Indian Cossacks," containing a spirited account of this little campaign by an actor in it.

at once to the fort, and summoned the garrison to surrender. He so imposed on them by his bearing and threats that they yielded unconditionally. Imám Bakhsh disarmed and dismissed the garrison, made prisoner of the Nawáb, and then returned to camp to report his brilliant exploit.*

That day, the 18th, Jones pushed on, first to Najíbábád, then, finding that place abandoned, to the fort of Fathgarh,† also deserted by the enemy. In these two places he captured eight guns besides ammunition and grain. On the 21st, having in the interval been joined by four heavy guns and a squadron of the Carabineers, he marched to Naghína, where, he had been informed, the rebels, numbering ten thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry, with fifteen guns, had taken up a strong position.

He found their position strong indeed. Its front was covered by the canal, guarded by ten guns; a battery of five guns protected a bridge on their left, whilst a tope of trees covered the right.

The British force marched directly on to the canal. Whilst the guns on the right attacked the enemy's battery on the bridge, the 60th Rifles and the 1st Panjáb Infantry, with the Multánís on the left, crossed the canal and formed up to the right—the 1st Sikhs, under Gordon, clearing, meanwhile, its banks. By the time the canal had been cleared, the force which had crossed it had gained a position completely turning the enemy's right. The order was then given to charge. Never was a charge more successful. The rebels, panic-stricken, made no attempt to defend their guns, but fled in wild confusion. On this day Cureton rendered splendid service with his Multánís. He pursued the enemy for five miles, and, notwithstanding the resistance of despair which he and his followers encountered, he did not rest until he had slain their chiefs and captured their elephants and guns. It was a greater glory for him to rescue an unfortunate English telegraph signaller, who, previously taken prisoner by the rebels, had been brought into the field that he might witness the defeat of his countrymen!

* He received the third class of the Order of Merit—an insufficient acknowledgment of such a deed.

† In the Bijnáur district, not to be confounded with the Fathgarh in the Farrukhábád division.

Cureton rescued this man at great personal danger to himself.*

But the toil of the day was not yet over. On returning from the slaughter of the chiefs with his two hundred mounted followers, Cureton descried, approaching the main body of the defeated enemy, a compact force of eight hundred infantry, five hundred cavalry, and some guns. The presence with him of the captured elephants of the Nawábs made it probable, he thought, that the rebels would regard the Multánís as a party of their own friends. He accordingly drew up into a grove by the roadside to await their approach. On they come, and the grove containing their supposed friends is almost reached. "Still not a sound issues from the trees, not a greeting strikes the ear, not a signal meets the eye. Suddenly a clear English voice rings out the word 'Charge!' and in an instant the Multánís are in the midst of the panic-stricken foe. Taken by surprise, daunted by the fury of the onset, the rebels do not resist long, but flee in all directions, leaving upwards of one hundred dead on the ground, and a green standard and several guns as trophies." †

Cureton
defeats the remnant that had escaped.

In the combat of Naghíná the British loss was small in comparison with that of the rebels. The army had to regret, however, the death of Lieutenant Gostling, a gallant and meritorious officer, who fell in the final charge of which I have spoken. Where all so distinguished themselves it is difficult to single out any officer for special notice, but I cannot omit to record that the cavalry leading of Cureton was talked of in camp at the time, and has been handed down to the new generation as a most brilliant example of the combination of skill, daring, readiness of resource, and practical ability.

Death of Lieutenant
Gostling.

How Cure-ton's feat of arms was regarded.

* "Indian Cossacks."—Vide, note below.

† The Cornhill Magazine, January 1863, Art. "Indian Cossacks." The author of this article, who is believed to be a distinguished officer of the British army, thus proceeds: "With this feat of arms end the gallant deeds of Cureton and his Multánís in the action of Naghíná. They may well be proud of that day; for to defeat cavalry and artillery, then infantry, then again cavalry, artillery, and infantry combined, in the latter case contending against enormous odds, were exploits of which even a veteran corps might boast. How much more, then, a young regiment only three months raised, and engaged that day in its second action!"

Amongst the volunteers present whose gallantry was marked was a young student of the Rûrki Civil Engineer College named Hanna. The desperate gallantry of this gentleman, who accompanied Cureton, procured him two serious wounds. It was then believed that he was a young officer, nor was it till after the fight was over that his real calling was discovered. Thanks to the strong recommendation of Cureton and his own intrepid spirit, Mr. Hanna obtained an unattached commission in the Indian army.

The victory was decisive. Thenceforward the progress of the column was not seriously opposed. Bijnâur was reoccupied without opposition. Jones did not delay there, but pushed on rapidly to Murádábád.

The course of affairs at this station had not impressed the inhabitants with the advantage of the native rule of Khán Bahádur Khán,* and they had heard with anxious and beating hearts of the progress of the columns of the Avenger. The pent-up longings of their hearts had been confirmed and strengthened by the loyal attitude of a neighbouring native chieftain, the Nawáb of Rámpur,† who had from the first exerted himself to maintain the authority of the British. As Jones advanced nearer and nearer, these feelings displayed themselves in action.

It happened on the 21st April, that Firuzsháh, a prince of the royal house of Dehlí, who had cast in his lot with the Rohilkhand revolvers, marched upon Murádábád, and demanded money and supplies. The townspeople refused, whereupon the prince, after some negotiation, endeavoured to help himself by force. The townspeople were still resisting when Firuzsháh received information that the avenging columns of the British were approaching. Instantly he desisted and beat an ignominious retreat. But the following day he returned secretly into the native part of the town.

Jones arrived in the vicinity of Murádábád on the 26th April.

His camp was there joined by Mr. Inglis, C.S., a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with the characters

The force reaches Murádábád.

The loyalty of the inhabitants is shown by the expulsion of Prince Firuzsháh.

* Vol. III. pages 222-3.

† An Indian Gazetteer will show the student nearly forty places called Rámpur or Rámpura. The Rámpur mentioned in the text is bounded on the north by the Tarái district; on the east and south by the Baréli district; on the west by the Murádábád district. The upper classes of the inhabitants are mostly Rohílá Afgháns.

and doings of the rebel chiefs then figuring in Rohilkhand. Inglis informed Brigadier Coke that many prominent leaders of the revolt were at the moment hiding in the city of Murádábád, and that it would not be impossible, by the exercise of daring and prudence, to seize them. These two qualities shone conspicuously in the character of Coke. He at once made arrangements to effect the capture of these men. Posting the Multání cavalry so as to guard the outlets of the city, he entered with a body of infantry and proceeded to the houses indicated to him. The task was difficult and dangerous, but it resulted in success. Twenty-one notorious ringleaders of the revolt were actually taken. Others were slain defending themselves. In this affair Lieutenant Angelo greatly distinguished himself. Bursting open the door of one of the houses, he seized a prominent rebel leader and one of his sons. Whilst engaged in this work he was fired at from one of the upper rooms of the house. He at once rushed upstairs, forced the door of the room whence the firing had proceeded, and found himself face to face with seven armed men. Nothing daunted, he shot three of them with his revolver, and kept the remainder at bay with his sword till reinforced from below. Firuzsháh, unhappily, escaped.

Coke captures several rebel chiefs.

A few days later Jones again started to take part in the operations which the Commander-in-Chief was directing against Báréli, and to which I must now return.

The force moves on Baréli.

I have already stated that the Commander-in-Chief, with the force from Fathgarh joined to that of Walpole, had reached Sháhjahánpúr on the 30th April, and had found it evacuated. It was not so much the evacuation of this important place as the escape of the rebel army which had held it, commanded by the Maulaví, accompanied, it was believed, by Náná Sáhib* and his followers, in the direction of Oudh, which caused vexation to Sir Colin. It was a proof that, notwithstanding his great efforts, the campaign had failed in one important particular. Though he had planned that four army-corps, starting from different points,

The rebels evacuate Shahjahán-púr.

notorious

April 30.

The consequent failure,

* Before evacuating Sháhjahánpúr, Náná Sáhib is said to have caused all the official buildings to be destroyed, in order that the Europeans, on their arrival, might find no shelter.

to a great degree, of the plan of the campaign" should converge on Baréli and Sháhjahánpúr, enclosing the rebels on four sides, their most formidable enemy had managed to break through the meshes, and to break through them, too, on the side for which he and Walpole were mainly responsible! However, there was no help for it. The Rohilkhand rebels were still in Baréli. They, at all events, he was resolved, should not escape him.

Leaving at Sháhjahánpúr five hundred men of the 82nd under Colonel Hale, De Kantzow's Irregular Horse, and four guns, Sir Colin pushed on, picked up Penny's column—commanded by Jones of the Carabineers—at Miránpúr Katrá on the 3rd May, and on the 4th arrived at Farídpúr, a day's march from Baréli.

Khán Bahádur Khán was still holding sway in the capital of Rohilkhand. The exact amount of his force cannot be stated with certainty. Spies had rated it at thirty thousand infantry, six thousand horse, and forty guns, but it certainly did not reach anything like that number. The feeling that animated leader and men was the reverse of sanguine, for they knew that the town was threatened on both sides. Nevertheless there were amongst them a certain number of fanatics (Gházís) who were resolved to sell their lives dearly, neither to give nor to accept quarter.

Baréli itself did not offer a strong defensible position. The town consists of a main street, about two miles long, having occasionally narrow offshoots on both sides. Outside these streets were large suburbs formed of detached houses, walled gardens, and enclosures; outside these again were wide plains intersected by nullahs. One of these, called the Natiá Nadí, covered the town on the south side. Its banks were steep, and, if well protected, it was capable of presenting an obstacle to an advancing enemy. But it was bridged, and the bridges had not been broken.

Khán Bahádur Khán heard on the 5th of the arrival of the Commander-in-Chief at Farídpúr. He was likewise aware that Jones was advancing from Murádábád. There was yet a way of escape open to him—the way he subsequently followed—in the direction of Pilibhít. But the hot Rohílá blood of the descendant of Háfiz Rahmat forbade him to flee without striking a to a great degree, of the plan of the campaign"

Sir Colin moves on Baréli.

State of affairs in Baréli.

May 4.

Defensive position of Baréli.

Khán Bahádur Khán resolves to look Sir Colin in the face.

blow for his cause. He determined to meet the British force in the open plain outside the town.

On the evening of the 4th May he took up his position. Crossing the Natiá Nadí, he placed his guns on some rising ground—sand-hills—which commanded the line by which the British must advance, covered by his first line of infantry, whilst he guarded both his flanks with his cavalry. His second line occupied the old cantonment nearer to the town.

He takes up a position.

To force this position Sir Colin Campbell had under his orders a very considerable force. He had two brigades of cavalry,* the first commanded by Brigadier Jones, 6th Dragoon Guards, the second by Brigadier Hagart, 7th Hussars; Tombs's and Remington's troops of horse artillery, Hammond's light field battery; two heavy field batteries under Francis; and the siege-train with Le Mesurier's company and Cookworthy's detachment, the whole commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Brind; some sappers and miners under Colonel Harness; the Highland brigade under Leith Hay, consisting of the 93rd, 42nd, 79th, 4th Panjáb Rifles, and the Balúch battalion; Brigadier Stisted's brigade, consisting of seven companies 64th Foot, 78th Highlanders, four companies 82nd, 2nd Panjab Infantry, 22nd Panjáb Infantry.

Composition of Sir Colin's force.

Very early on the morning of the 5th Sir Colin broke up from Farídpúr and marched on Baréli. As he approached the place the vedettes reported the presence of the enemy. It was 6 o'clock. Sir Colin halted his troops and formed them in two lines. In the first line he placed the Highland regiments, supported by the 4th Panjáb Rifles and the Balúch battalion, with a heavy field battery in the centre, and horse artillery and cavalry on both flanks. The second line, consisting of the remainder of his force, he disposed to protect the baggage and siege-train. The numerous cavalry displayed by the enemy seemed, in the opinion of Sir Colin, to render this precaution necessary.

Sir Colin marches on Baréli;

May 5.

forms up his troops in order of battle.

It was striking 7 o'clock just as these dispositions were com-

* The first cavalry brigade was composed of two squadrons 6th Dragoon Guards and Lind's Multání Horse; the second, 9th Lancers, 2nd Panjáb Cavalry, detachments Láhó Light Horse, 1st Panjáb Cavalry, 5th Panjáb Cavalry, and 15th Irregular Cavalry.

The rebels fall back before him. pleted. Sir Colin then moved forward. He had not marched a hundred yards before the enemy's guns opened upon him. But the British force advanced with so much steadiness and precision that the rebels promptly abandoned their first line, and made no attempt to defend the stream. Their infantry fell back on the old cantonment, covered by their cavalry and horse artillery, both of which occasionally made as though they would charge the British line. Nothing came of it, however. The British force still continued to press on, capturing as they reached the rivulet the guns which the rebels had failed to remove.

The rivulet, not defended, offered but a slight obstacle to the advance of the British army. Whilst the left of their first line held the bridge, the right crossed it. The first line then advanced about three-quarters of a mile towards the town. The heavy guns were then rapidly passed over in succession, and were placed in a position to rake the enemy's second line. The troops then halted to allow time for the siege-train and baggage to close up.

Whilst the troops formed up thus halted, the 4th Panjáb Rifles occupying some old cavalry lines on the left, the enemy made a desperate effort to change the fortunes of the day.

In my description of the troops led by Khán Bahádur Khán I stated that there were amongst them a certain number who were resolved to sell their lives dearly, and neither to give nor accept quarter. I alluded to the Gházís, men who believed that the taking the life of an infidel opened to the slayer the gate of Paradise, and who were thus impelled by the most self-interested of all motives to court, sword in hand and desperation in every act, the death which was to give them a glorious immortality.

The line, formed up, was halting, when a considerable body of these fanatics, "fine fellows, grizzly-bearded elderly men for the most part, with green turbans and kamarbands,* every one of them wearing a silver signet-ring, a long text of the Korán engraved on it,† rushed out from the right, and dashed at the village held by the 4th Panjábis. "They came on," wrote the eye-witness I have

Sir Colin crosses the Nattia rivulet, and takes up a fresh position.

The rebels make a counter attack.

* "Kamar-band": a girdle, a long piece of cloth girt round the loins.

† Dr. W. H. Russell.

already quoted, "with their heads down below their shields, their talwárs flashing as they waved them over their heads, shouting 'Dín, Dín!'"* dashed at the village, swept the surprised Sikhs out of it with the élan of their rush, and then hurled themselves against the 42nd Highlanders, who were moving to the support, and to cover the re-formation of the Panjábis. Fortunately Sir Colin happened to be close to the 42nd. He had just time to call out "Stand firm, 42nd; bayonet them as they come on!" The 42nd did stand firm. The Gházís could make no impression upon their serried ranks. They killed some of them indeed; and they acted up to their professions. Not one of them went back. Killing, wounding, or failing to kill or to wound, every man of them who had flung himself against the Highland wall was bayoneted where he had fought.

But a portion of them had swept past the 42nd and had dashed to the rear, where were Cameron commanding that regiment, and, a little further back, Walpole, of Ruiyá renown. Three of the Gházís dashed at Cameron, pulled him off his horse, and were about to despatch him, when Colour-Sergeant Gardner of the 42nd dashed out of the ranks and bayoneted two of them, whilst a private shot the third.* Walpole narrowly escaped death from a similar cause; he was saved by men of the same regiment.

This attack repulsed, the 42nd, supported by the 4th Sikhs and a part of the 79th, advanced, sweeping through the empty lines and pushing forward for about a mile and a half into the old cantonment. The heat was intense; the men had suffered so greatly from the heat, from thirst, and even from sunstroke, that Sir Colin thought it advisable to sound the halt for the day, even at the risk of leaving a door of escape to the enemy—for Baréli had not been entered.

Another reason weighed to a certain extent with him in arriving at this conclusion. During the attack of the Gházís, the enemy's cavalry, skilfully handled, had galloped round the British left, with a view to plunder the baggage. The amount of alarm, con-

Danger of Cameron,

him, when the ranks

and of Walpole.

4th Sikhs

The British troops
advance,

when Sir Colin suddenly halts them.

The rebels
attack the baggage, but are repulsed.

* Meaning: "For our faith, our religion."

† Gardner received the Victoria Cross. I regret to be unable to record here the name of the private.

fusion, and panic created by this movement amongst the drivers and camp-followers is not to be described. A few rounds from Tombs's guns, and a threatened counter-attack from the Carabineers and the Multání Horse succeeded, indeed, in soon dispersing the enemy. But Sir Colin deemed it, nevertheless, desirable that the impedimenta should close up with the main force. Directing, then, a portion of the 79th and 93rd to seize all the suburbs in their front, he placed the troops as far as possible in the shade, and halted for the day.

Sir Colin orders the baggage guards to close up.

The attack thus made on the suburbs led to fresh encounters with the Gházís. One company of the 93rd—led by Lieutenant Cooper, whose gallant bearing at the Sikandarbágh had been the theme of admiring comment*—sent on this duty, arrived at a spot near the suburbs where some artillery guns under Lieutenant-Colonel Brind were posted. Brind pointed out to Cooper the position which he believed the Gházís were occupying. That officer, carefully noting the place, posted his men in some ruined houses and under cover of some walls to the left and left front of it. The guns then opened fire. After a few rounds the buildings occupied by the Gházís caught fire. The Gházís rushed out. Some five or six made a dash at Cooper. Two of these he shot dead, a third he killed after a brisk pursuit; with a fourth he then engaged in a sword fight, when the Ghází was shot dead by a private. The others were disposed of by the men.

Fresh encounter with the Gházís.

The halt ordered by Sir Colin, desirable as it was for the health of the troops, was, in a military point of view, fatal. It gave Khán Bahádur Khán a chance which he eagerly seized. No sooner had the shades of darkness fallen than the wily Rohílá quietly withdrew the bulk of his trained forces from the town and stole away to Pilibhít, thirty-three miles north-east of Baréli, leaving only a rabble to maintain a show of resistance.

The halt enables Bahádur Khán to withdraw,

When, then, the following morning, the guns of Sir Colin Campbell began to play upon the city, they met with no reply. The sound of artillery fire was indeed heard on the opposite side, but that fire proceeded from the guns of Brigadier General Jones.

and the city is virtually evacuated.

May 6.

I left that officer marching from Murádábád towards Baréli to attack that city on the side opposite to that by which Sir Colin Campbell had approached. The march was one long-continued skirmish. At Nurganj, twenty-one miles from Baréli, the Multáni cavalry and Pathán horse again did admirable service, completely defeating the rebels, and capturing several guns. As he approached with the leading division of the force to Baréli, Coke could obtain no tidings of Sir Colin or his movements; but, whilst waiting for information, some Hindu retail dealers announced to him that the rebels had deserted their guns placed at the entrance to the city. With a combined caution and daring adapted to the circumstances, Coke determined to proceed himself, and, should the story prove true, to take possession of the guns. He took with him a detachment of the Pathán cavalry. But he had hardly come within sight of the guns, barely within range, when the falsehood of the traders' tale became apparent—for the guns at once opened fired on his party. Fortunately the rebels were unable to control their impatience, or the consequences might have been disastrous. As it happened, one trooper only was killed. Coke at once sent back for the heavy guns and the infantry; then, placing a company of the 60th Rifles in a walled garden commanding the entrance to the city, ordered the guns to open fire. Ten minutes later the enemy's guns were silenced. Coke then led the Panjáb infantry regiments into the city and penetrated as far as the great mosque. Cureton's cavalry had meanwhile been sent to operate outside with the double view to cut off the rebels from their line of retreat to the north and to open out communication with Sir Colin. The action of the cavalry outside speedily made itself felt within the city, for the rebels, fearing for their line of retreat, evacuated the place with so much haste, that when Coke proceeded to make arrangements to force his way further, he discovered that none were required, as the city had been deserted. The next day, the 7th May, a junction was effected with Sir Colin.

* Vide page 129.

General Jones closes in on the other side.

May 7.

Coke presses on with the advance, and effects a junction with Sir Colin.

May 7.

The second time the rebels had eluded Sir Colin

The town had indeed been conquered, but the bulk of the rebel army had escaped. This was the second occasion in this short Rohilkhand campaign in which the rebel leaders had outmanœuvred the British commander: on the first, the Maulaví had doubled back from Sháhjahánpúr into Oudh; on the second, Khán

Bahádur Khán had succeeded in escaping to a point not far from the Nipál frontier, along which it would not be difficult to penetrate into the same kingdom.

But the Maulaví was influenced by motives nobler than those indicated by a mere avoidance of his powerful enemies. With the prescience of a capable general he had counted on the probability that Baréli would offer to the British army a certain resistance; and he had resolved to avail himself of the opportunity thus offered to make a raid upon Sháhjahánpúr and overpower the small garrison which he hoped would be left there.

Sir Colin Campbell had left in Sháhjahánpúr a wing of the 82nd, a detachment of artillery with two 24-pounders and two 9-pounders, and De Kantzow's Irregular Horse—the whole under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel Hale, C.B., of the 82nd. The habitable houses in Sháhjahánpúr having been unroofed, by order, it was stated, of Náná Sáhib, Hale had pitched his camp in a tope of trees near the gaol, indicated to him by Sir Colin as the place to be held should he be attacked. The enclosure round the gaol he at once proceeded to make defensible, placing in it his guns and as large a stock of provisions as he could procure. Working with great zeal and energy, Hale completed his preparations in one day—the day on which the Commander-in-Chief left him to proceed to Baréli—the 2nd May.

Meanwhile the Maulaví and his army had reached Muhamdí. There he found, eager to join him in any attack on the British, the Rájah of that place, and one Mián Sáhib, one of the old Lakhnao chiefs, each at the head of a considerable body of armed men, most of them mounted. Their plans were quickly formed. Learning that the bulk of the British force would leave Sháhjahánpúr for Baréli on the morning of the 2nd, they resolved to attempt to surprise the place and cut up the detachment left to guard it the following morning.

They marched that day and part of the night of the 2nd to carry out this resolve. But again an excellent plan was spoiled by inefficient execution. Had the Maulaví pushed on, he would have reached the town in the dead of night, and it is possible that he might have reaped all the advantage of a complete surprise. But,

Skilful strategy of the Maulaví.

Force left in Sháhjahánpúr under Colonel Hale.

The Maulaví
resolves to surprise
Hale's force.

His plan is ruined by a halt on the road.

when within four miles of the place, he halted to rest his men. The halt was fatal to his complete success. Native spies employed by the British were on the alert, and one of these flew with the intelligence of his dangerous vicinity to Colonel Hale.

Hale is informed of his approach.

Hale acted at once with the prudence which the circumstances required. He had been ordered to remain on the defensive. Instantly, then, he moved his stores and camp equipage into the gaol, covering the transfer with four companies of the 82nd. He then went forward with De Kantzow's Horse to reconnoitre. The sudden apparition of vast bodies of cavalry, numbering about eight thousand, covering the plain, proved the truth of the spy's story. De Kantzow,* truly one of the heroes of the mutiny, always ready for action, always cool and resolute, was for a charge to check their advance. Hale, mindful of his orders, would not permit it, but, falling back, brought all his men within the gaol enclosure, thence to bid defiance to the enemy.

May 3.

with four

He reconnoitres,

and then falls back on the gaol.

enclosure,

Meanwhile the Maulaví and his allies, pressing on, speedily mastered the undefended town, seized the old fort, and then imposed a money requisition upon the wealthier inhabitants. In acting thus he simply conformed to the customs of war as practised in Europe. Simultaneously he placed his guns, eight in number, in position against the gaol. From this day, the 3rd, till the morning of the 11th, he bombarded the British position incessantly, without, however, producing any other effect upon Hale and his comrades than increasing their resolve to hold out until assistance should arrive.

The Maulaví occupies and plunders the town.

Intelligence of the state of things at Sháhjahánpúr first reached Sir Colin Campbell on the 7th. On that very day he had become master of Baréli, and had effected a junction with the Rúrkí column under Jones. The news was like a message from heaven. Fortune gave him a chance to repair the error by which the Maulaví had been allowed to escape him on his march, and this time he was determined that there should be no mistake. He at once sent for Brigadier John Jones, and directed him to march the following morning with a brigade, the nature and composition of which he indicated, to Shahjahánpúr, there to deal with the Maulaví. He gave him further discretionary power to pursue his success, and, should he think it advisable, to attack Muhamdí.

Sir Colin learns of the state of affairs at Sháhjahánpúr.

May 7-11.

* Vide Vol. III, pages 104-6; and page 351 of this volume.

He orders Jones to march on Sháhjahán-púr.

The troops composing the brigade ordered on this duty were the 60th Rifles, the 79th Highlanders, a wing of the 82nd, the 22nd Panjáb Infantry, two squadrons of Carabineers, the Multání Horse, with some heavy guns and some horse artillery. With this little force Jones marched on the morning of the 8th. Shortly after sunrise on the 11th he reached a point close to Sháhjahánpúr, where the road branches out to the city and cantonments. Immediately afterwards the advance guard reported the presence of the enemy. Jones at once drew up his Composition of Jones's force.

He advances on Sháhjahánpúr, men, the heavy guns in the centre, and then moved forward. He soon came in sight of the enemy, huge masses of horsemen, formed up and ready, apparently, to dispute the further progress of the British. A few shots from the heavy guns checked them, and, the Highlanders and Rifles pushing on in front whilst the horse artillery guns opened on their flanks, the hesitation which had been gradually creeping on them developed into retreat, and, very soon after—the British continuing the same tactics—retreat into flight. Their detachments still, however, held the old fort, the bridge of boats over the river, the stone bridge over the Kanarat Nadí, the houses in the town, all loop-holed, and the position was in all respects formidable. But Jones was too quick for them. Pushing forward his skirmishers and horse artillery, he drove the enemy to the banks of the river opposite to the entrance to the city, and by a heavy and continuous and presses back the enemy, fire forced them to abandon the idea they had attempted to put into execution of destroying the bridge of boats, and drove them within the city. Bringing up then his heavy guns and mortars, he compelled them to abandon, one after the other, the old fort, the stone bridge, and other commanding positions. He had now only the town to deal with. Made aware, by the reports which reached him, that all the houses in the main street had been loop-holed, and that the enemy counted upon

May 11.

Jones traverses the suburbs

his forcing an entrance through that street, Jones resolved to baffle the rebels by avoiding the route indicated, and by taking the road which led through the eastern suburbs. He met with no opposition as he traversed the suburbs, but no sooner did he emerge into a space near the new school-house, than he discovered a body of rebel cavalry. He at once attacked them, drove them back, and then quickened their movements by a few rounds of shrapnel. The Carabineers, who came up in the nick of time, were at once sent in pursuit. At first the rebels seemed inclined to measure swords with that gallant regiment, but second thoughts prevailed, and they fled, leaving a gun and ammunition waggon in the hands of their pursuers. Jones halted for a quarter of an hour in the open space I have mentioned, to allow his men to form up, and then pushed on by the church and across the parade ground to the gaol, still held by the gallant Hale and his comrades. But there commenced the difficulties of the relieving force. The main body of the enemy was here found assembled. Their advanced positions—leading through the main street, and which could only have been forced at great risk and with enormous loss—had been turned by the skilful manœuvre of Jones. But in this open plain, where the masses of their cavalry could act freely, they were too strong to be attacked with any hope of success. Jones, therefore, was forced to maintain himself on the defensive until reinforcements should reach him from Baréli. To wait for these he established himself in a strong position, flanked on one side by the gaol.

and drives the rebels before him.

May 11-14.

He effects a junction with Hale, and waits for reinforcements.

So passed the 11th. The 12th, 13th, and 14th were spent in preparations for the encounter looming in a very near future, Jones engaged in increasing his means of resistance, the Maulaví in welcoming fresh allies. And, indeed, those allies poured in with an alarming celerity. It was not alone the rabble escaped from previous fights, the discontented landsmen, the freebooters by profession, who flocked to his standard. There came, likewise, one after another, the Begam of Oudh, the prince Firuzsháh, and, although Náná Sáhib did not himself appear, he sent a body of his followers, whose presence gave colour to the rumour that he too was not afraid to meet in fair fight the countrymen of those whom he had murdered. Rumour lied.

Reinforcements, too, flock to the Maulaví.

May 14-15.

Náná Sáhib loved his life too well to risk it in a battle with the English.

By the evening of the 14th all these reinforcements had

The Maulavi attacks Jones. poured into the Maulavi's camp. On the 15th he struck his great blow. He attacked Jones with his whole force. But the troops led by Jones were men unaccustomed to show their backs to a foe. Charged and charged again, they repelled every assault. Jones's deficiency in cavalry would not permit him to retaliate, to carry the war into the enemy's camp. But at least the enemy gained no ground from him. His men clung, then, with all the stubbornness of their natures, to the positions which they had been ordered to defend; and when evening fell, and the baffled enemy ceased their attack, they could boast that they had not lost so much as an inch. They could make the same boast when, three days later, the Commander-in-Chief appeared in person on the scene. To him I must now return.

When Sir Colin Campbell had despatched Jones to Sháhjahánpúr on the 8th, he imagined that he had certainly disposed of the Maulavi and had cleared the country as far as Muhamdí in Oudh. Regarding, then, the Rohilkhand campaign as virtually settled, he had begun at once to distribute his forces. He had nominated General Walpole as divisional commander of the troops in Rohilkhand. He had indicated the regiments which were to remain at Baréli itself; those to proceed to Lakhnao; and the one or two which were to march to Mirath. He had ordered likewise Brigadier Coke to proceed on the 12th with a column, consisting of a wing of the 42nd Highlanders, the 4th Panjáb Rifles, the 1st Sikh Infantry, a portion of the 24th Panjáb Infantry, a squadron of the Carabineers, a detachment of the 17th Irregular Cavalry, and a considerable force of artillery, with three weeks' supplies for the Europeans and four weeks' for the natives, towards Pilibhít, the line of retreat taken by Khán Bahádur Khán.

Having made these arrangements, Sir Colin had deemed that he might safely return himself to some central station on the great line of communication, whence he could more easily direct the general campaign. Taking with him, then, his headquarter staff, the 64th Foot, two troops of the 9th Lancers, the Balúch Battalion, Tombs's troop of horse, and Le Mesurier's company of foot, artillery, he had started from Baréli in the direction of Fathgarh on the 15th.

On the 16th, at Farídpúr, he received Jones's message. Sir Colin at once sent to Baréli for the remainder of the 9th Lancers, Sir Colin, on detaching Jones to Sháhjahánpúr, distributes his forces,

May 15-18.

and sets out for Fathgarh and the next day moved cautiously forward to Tilhar.* That evening he received information that the Maulaví, whilst still pressing Sháhjahánpúr, had withdrawn the bulk of his troops in the direction of Muhamdí, the entire length of the road to which he commanded.

Hearing, on the march, of Jones's position, he turns towards Sháhjahánpúr.

The next morning, the 18th, Sir Colin marched towards Sháhjahánpúr. As he approached the place, a strong force of the enemy's cavalry, calculated to number fifteen hundred men, with five guns, threatened to attack him. But it was little more than a demonstration, and Sir Colin, passing the ground on which he had previously encamped, made a partial circuit of the city to the bridge of boats. Crossing this, unopposed, he traversed the city, and effected a junction with

He effects a junction with Jones.

May 18.

Brigadier-General Jones.

But even then the British force was too weak in cavalry to encounter the enemy with any hope of a decisive result—a result, that is to say, fraught not only with defeat but with an annihilating pursuit. The truth of this presumption was fully shown that very day.

His cavalry skirmish with the rebels,

Sir Colin had no intention whatever to engage the enemy. It happened, however, that a reconnoitring party of horse was fired on by the enemy from four guns posted in a fortified village called Panhat; the sound of the guns brought out the masses of the enemy's cavalry; and these again attracted to the field the Commander-in-Chief and his whole force. The battle then partially engaged. The 82nd, pushed forward, occupied the village of Panhat, on the right front.

which brings on an action

They were followed by the horse artillery, and a field battery, and part of the 9th Lancers and the Irregulars. The 79th then took possession of a grove of trees in the centre of the position, near a small rising ground, on which were posted a couple of heavy guns; whilst a heavy field battery, supported by a wing of the Rifles, with parties of the Carabineers and Balúchis, covered the left flank. It was a strong defensive position, on which the enemy could make no impression. In the artillery and cavalry skirmish which followed, the rebels displayed more than ordinary skill and courage, and, although in the end they which, for want of cavalry, is indecisive.

* Tilhar lies fourteen miles to the west of Sháhjahánpúr.

May 18-24. gave ground, no attempt was made to pursue them.

Sir Colin, in fact, was quite satisfied with the repulse of the enemy. He preferred to defer a decisive battle till he should have more troops, especially more cavalry. He sent off, then, a despatch to Brigadier Coke, directing him to bring down his brigade with all possible speed.

Sir Colin sends for Coke's brigade.

Coke at once turned back, and joined the Commander-in-Chief on the 22nd. On the 24th the whole force marched to attack the enemy. But again the Maulaví baffled Sir Colin. Whilst his light cavalry did their utmost to hinder the British advance on Muhamdí, retiring

He then marches to attack the rebels, the moment the pursuers halted to discharge their guns, the Maulaví and his allies evacuated that place, after destroying the defences, and fell back into Oudh.

who fall back into Oudh.

They had similarly treated Kachíaní, the mud fort which had previously given shelter to European fugitives. The expulsion of the rebels from Rohilkhand was the one result of the campaign.

How they were followed up and hunted down in Oudh I shall tell in another chapter. The occurrences in Ráj-pútáná, long neglected, demand immediate attention.

Close of the summer campaign.

It will suffice here to state that, on the expulsion of the Maulaví from Rohilkhand, the Rohilkhand and Rúrkí field forces were broken up, the regiments of which they were composed being detailed for other duties. The Commander-in-Chief himself, accompanied by the headquarter staff, resumed his journey to Fathgarh (Farrukhábád); Brigadier Seaton, relieved by Colonel M'Causland in his command at that place, was appointed to Sháhjahánpúr, having under him the 60th Rifles, the 82nd, the 22nd Panjáb Infantry, the Multání Horse, two squadrons of the Carabineers, and some artillery. Coke turned with his force to Muradábád, to act as Brigadier commanding the district; the 64th went to Miráth; the 9th Lancers to Ambála; the 79th to Fathgarh. The army was broken up. In north-eastern India, Oudh alone remained to be thoroughly subjugated.

But I cannot leave the scene of so many combats without recording events which, either from their historical interest or from the deep personal sympathy they excited, demand special notice. The first of these, not in date, not in importance, not in the sympathy it excited, but in the connection which it bears to the contents of this chapter, is the death of the Maulaví of Faizábád. The Maulaví was a very remarkable man. Sir Thomas Seaton, who had many opportunities for arriving at a just opinion, has described him as "a man of great abilities, of undaunted courage, of stern determination, and by far the best soldier among the rebels." It has been surmised, and with great reason, that before the mutiny occurred the Maulaví was travelling through India on a roving commission, to excite the minds of his compatriots to the step then contemplated by the master-spirits of the plot. This at least is known: that such a commission was undertaken; that the Maulaví travelled to the parts of India which subsequently proved the most susceptible to the revolt; that he was the confidential friend and adviser of a very prominent member of the deposed royal family of Lakhnao. If, as I believe, the mutiny was in a great measure determined not less by the annexation of Oudh than by the sudden and treacherous manner in which that annexation was carried into effect—that the greased cartridges were simply a means used by the higher conspirators to force to revolt men who could be moved only by violence to their faith—the story of the action of the Maulaví only seems natural. Certain it is that in April 1857 he circulated seditious papers throughout Oudh; that the police did not arrest him; and that to obtain that end armed force was required. He was then tried and condemned to death. But, before the sentence could be executed, Oudh broke into revolt, and, like many a political criminal in Europe, he stepped at once from the floor of a dungeon to the footsteps of a throne. He became the confidential friend and adviser of the Begam of Lakhnao, the trusted leader of the rebels.

The Maulaví.

In person the Maulaví was tall, lean, and muscular, with large deep-set eyes, beetle brows, a high aquiline nose, and lantern jaws. Of his capacity as a military leader many proofs were given during the revolt, but none more decisive than those recorded in this chapter. No other man could boast that he had twice foiled Sir Colin Campbell in the field!

His death he owed, strange to say, not to his enemies, but to his quondam allies. After his retreat from Muhamdí, determined to use every means in his power to hinder the complete success of the British, the Maulaví

His appearance and ability as a leader.

His death follows immediately

the close of the summer campaign. started off, armed with the authority and money of the Begam, for Powáin, a town on the frontiers of Oudh and Rohilkhand, eighteen miles north-east of Sháhjahánpúr. The Rájah of this place was supposed to possess a certain amount of influence, and it was the Maulaví's object to induce him and others to join in a new league against the British.

The Maulaví started for Powáin, with a small following, on the 5th June, having previously sent forward a messenger to make known his wishes to the Rájah. The manner of it. The Rájah, Jagan-náth Singh by name, was a fat unwieldy man, not given to martial feats, desirous to sit at home at ease, and particularly anxious to avoid giving offence to the British in the hour of their triumph. He, however, consented to grant the Maulaví a conference. Upon this the Maulaví pushed on to Powáin.

On reaching that place he found, to his surprise, that the gates were closed, the walls manned, and the Rájah, his brother, and his armed retainers, were lining the ramparts which overlooked the gateway. Amid these unpromising appearances the conference began. The Maulaví soon satisfied himself that unless he could overawe the Rájah his eloquence would be wasted. To overawe him, then, he made the driver of the elephant upon which he was mounted urge the animal forward to burst open the gate. The elephant advanced, and applied his head with such force to the barrier, that in a second or two it must inevitably have yielded. In this crisis the Rájah's brother, inspired by the urgency of the occasion, seized a gun and shot the Maulaví dead. His followers at once turned and fled. The Rájah and his brother then and there cut off the Maulaví's head, and, wrapping it in a cloth, drove to Sháhjahánpúr, thirteen miles distant. Arrived at the magistrate's house, they entered, and found that official and his friends at dinner. They immediately produced the bundle, and rolled the bloody head at the feet of the Englishmen. The day following it was exposed to view in a conspicuous part of the town, "for the information and encouragement of all concerned."*

* The Government paid the Rájah a reward of five thousand pounds for killing the Maulaví.

Thus died the Moulvi Ahmad 'alláh of Faizábád. If a patriot is a man who plots and fights for the independence, wrongfully destroyed, of his native country, then most certainly the Maulaví was a true patriot. He had not stained his sword by assassination; he had connived at no murders; he had fought manfully, honourably, and stubbornly in the field against the strangers who had seized his country; and his memory is entitled to the respect of the brave and the true-hearted of all nations.

Tribute due to the Moulaví.

Naturally enough, the British Government rejoiced to be rid of a formidable enemy. But another death, occurring a few weeks earlier, caused an outburst of the deepest sorrow in the heart of every Englishman serving in India—throughout the homes and the hearths of England. The reader who has accompanied me so far will have marked with pride and pleasure the record of the splendid achievements of the Naval Brigade under its gallant and accomplished leader, William Peel; they will remember that on the 9th March, when seeking a suitable place for the posting of some guns to breach the outer wall of the Martinière, William Peel was shot in the thigh by a musket-ball. The ball, however, was extracted, and the progress to convalescence after the extraction, if slow, was solid and hopeful.

William Peel.

With the capture of Lakhnao the work of the Naval Brigade was regarded as completed. On the 1st April, then, the sailors struck their tents, and started for Kánhpúr on their way to Calcutta. Great preparations were made to receive them in that city. The Government had decided to notify their sense of their splendid services by giving them a public reception, and the Calcutta people, for once in accord with the Government, were resolved that the reception should yield, in heartiness, in sincerity, and in splendour, to none by which a body of public men had ever been greeted in their palatial city. No one foresaw that the daring leader, for whom the greatest ovation was reserved, would be called to his last home too soon to witness the admiration of his non-combatant countrymen.

April.

Reception designed for him and his brigade in Calcutta.

One gratification, indeed, had been reserved for William Peel. On the 2nd March he had received the mark of the approval of his Gracious Sovereign, intimated by his nomination to be an Aide-de-Camp to the Queen, and by the bestowal of the Knight Commandership of

Honours awarded to William Peel
by the Crown.

the Bath. They were fit honours for his noble service, rewards of the nature he would prize the most, as constituting spontaneous testimony from his Sovereign of the efforts he had made to suppress the rebellion, the possible mischief of which, if unchecked, no one had recognised more clearly than had the First Lady in the Realm.*

William Peel reached Kánhpúr in safety. Though still weak, he was still slowly gaining strength, when, on the 20th April, he was attacked by confluent small-pox. His frame had been too much weakened to bear the shock. On the 27th he succumbed to the disease.

In him England lost one of the worthiest, of the noblest of her sons. How thoroughly he had impressed his spirit on the men whom he led may be gathered from the journal of one of them. "I cannot say," wrote Lieutenant Verney, on the 30th April, "what a sad loss we all feel this to be, and how deeply his death is felt and regretted by every officer and man; the mainspring that worked the machinery is gone. We never felt ourselves to be the Shannon's Naval Brigade, or even the Admiralty Naval Brigade, but always Peel's Naval Brigade." But the grief was not confined to the gallant men who had followed him. It was overpowering; it was universal; it was realised that England had lost a king of men.

The Government were not slow in giving expression to the universal feeling. On the 30th April Lord Canning issued a general order, in which, after notifying the sad fact and recapitulating his services, he thus eloquently recorded his sense of the extent of the catastrophe, of the greatness of the man:—"The loss of his daring but thoughtful courage, joined with eminent abilities, is a heavy one to this country; but it is not more to be deplored than the loss of that influence which his earnest character, admirable temper, and gentle kindly bearing exercised on all within his reach—an influence which was exerted unceasingly for the public good, and of which the Governor-General believes it may with truth be said, that there is not a man of any rank or profession who, having been associated with Sir William Peel in these times of anxiety and danger, has not felt and acknowledged it."

He is attacked by small-pox, and dies.

Universal grief at his death.

General order issued on the occasion by Lord Canning.

* Life of the Prince Consort, vol. iv. chapter 78.

The memory of his great name and his great deeds still survives. In the Eden Gardens of Calcutta a statue in white marble recalls to the citizens, by whom those gardens are nightly thronged, the form and fashion of him who was indeed the noblest volunteer of this or any age, who was successful because he was really great, and who, dying early, left a reputation without spot, the best inheritance he could bequeath to his countrymen.*

Marble statue of him in Calcutta.

I have already recorded the death of Venables. This gentleman, an indigo-planter, had, by his unflinching daring, saved the district of Ázamgarh in June 1857, when its natural guardians had withdrawn from it. Subsequently he had struggled bravely against the invaders from Oudh, and had ridden with Franks, as a volunteer, in his glorious march from the eastern frontier of Oudh to Lakhnao. Withdrawing thence to Allahábád, "broken in health and spirits, anxious for rest, looking forward eagerly to his return to England,"† he was persuaded by the Governor-General to return to Ázamgarh, once again seriously threatened. The reader will Venables.

* The death of William Peel was a double misfortune to the officers of the Shannon brigade. He had been very sparing of praise in his despatches. It had been his intention personally to press the claims of the officers whom he knew to be deserving. His premature death frustrated this idea.

† Letter from Lord Canning to the Committee of the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce, assembled in June 1858, to devise a fitting monument to Mr. Venables. The letter ran thus:—"It will be a satisfaction to me to join in this good work, not only on account of the admiration which I feel for the high qualities which Mr. Venables devoted to the public service, his intrepidity in the field, his energy and calm temper in upholding the civil authority, and his thoroughly just appreciation of the people and circumstances with which he had to deal, but also, and especially, on account of circumstances attending the last service which Mr. Venables rendered to his country. After the capture of Lakhnao, where he was attached to Brigadier-General Franks's column, Mr. Venables came to Allahábád. He was broken in health and spirits, anxious for rest, and looking forward eagerly to his return to England, for which his preparations were made. At that time the appearance of affairs near Ázamgarh was threatening; and I asked Mr. Venables to forego his departure from India, and return to that district, with which he was intimately acquainted, there to assist in preserving order until danger should have passed away. He at once consented cheerfully; and that consent cost him his life. I am certain that the Court of Directors, who are fully informed of all particulars of Mr. Venables' great services and untimely death, will be eager to mark, in such manner as shall seem best to them, their appreciation of the character of this brave, self-denying English gentleman; and I am truly glad to have an opportunity of joining with his fellow-countrymen in India in testifying the sincere respect which I feel for his memory."

recollect how useful were the services he then rendered to the gallant Lord Mark Kerr. Nor were those subsequently given to Sir E. Lugard less remarkable. It was in the performance of "these great services," inspired by the highest sense of duty, that, on the 15th April, he was struck down. The wound was mortal. "A few days afterwards," wrote in eloquent language some years ago an able and conscientious historian,* "death, resulting from the wound, cut short the sufferings and belied the hopes of this 'brave, self-denying English gentleman,' one among many such who in those days of sharp trial proved their right to be held in equal honour with the best-rewarded officers of the East India Company and the Crown."

The noble service he rendered to his country.

* Trotter's History of the British Empire in India.

CHAPTER V.

GEORGE ST. PATRICK LAWRENCE IN RÁJPÚTÁNÁ.

I HAVE brought the history of events in Rájputáná up to the end of June 1857, and have shown how the foresight and energy of General G. St. P. Lawrence had till then baffled all the efforts of the mutinous soldiers who had been located in that extensive country to support British authority.

Rájputáná.

The tranquillity restored in June continued throughout July. General Lawrence maintained his headquarters at Ajmír, but he moved thence occasionally, as his military and political duties required, to Bíaur and Nasírábád. To show his confidence in the Mairs, he would have no other guard but a native officer's party of the Mairwára battalion, and it is only fair to those loyal men to add that the events which followed, many of them peculiarly trying, fully justified that confidence.

Continues tranquil.

It was a considerable evidence of the satisfaction felt by the princes and people of Rájputáná with the mild but effective suzerainty of the British that they showed no sympathy with the revolted Sipáhis. The exactions of Amír Khán and the grinding tyranny of the Maráthás were not so remote that the recollection of them could be entirely forgotten. The forty succeeding years of peace and prosperity, of protection against outer enemies, had been a proof of the advantage of the British connection too practical to allow the existence of a wish that the connection should be severed. The native princes of Rájputáná felt keenly, that whatever might be the result of such severance, even were it to be effected, it would not be to their advantage; and they knew from the experience of the past that complete success in the field of military hordes was the certain prelude to unbridled licence, to a condition of rule without law.

Effect on the princes and people of the mild sway of the British.

These sentiments of the people were fully displayed on more than one occasion during the months that followed the outbreaks at Nímach and Nasírábád. The air was infected with panic; the movement of a corporal's guard was magnified into a great military demonstration; rumours, slight in their origin, were multiplied by every mouth that repeated them, until the resemblance to the original disappeared altogether. In this state of affairs the merchants, the bankers, the trading community in the great centres of Rájputáná, terrified by the reports, would send away their families for security, and then come to "their father," the Governor-General's agent, for advice and protection.

In every instance General Lawrence succeeded in calming their fears, and in inducing them to recall their families. His own example tended not a little to inspire them with confidence. When at Ajmír he never once allowed the routine of civil duties to be interrupted, but he held open court, almost daily visiting the city, where, in spite of the fierce and sullen looks of the disaffected, he was always regarded with respect. Treating the people with a generous confidence, General Lawrence was nevertheless stern, even severe towards all wrong-doers, and never once relaxed the reins of strict and efficient discipline.

I have spoken of "the fierce and sullen looks of the disaffected." In all great cities, in all large countries, there must be some who hate restriction. The criminal class, the men who, having nothing, would live by other means than by honest industry and toil, answer to this description. But, above all, in the circumstances of 1857, towered the fact that the leaders of the disaffection were the soldiery. Throughout this period there was, there could not help being, a considerable amount of sympathy between the native soldiers of the Company and the native soldiers of the indigenous princes. They were of the same caste and the same class; they often came from the same recruiting-ground. The causes which impelled the British Sipáhis to mutiny could not fail to influence greatly their comrades in other services. These were the men whose looks were fierce and sullen, these the classes from whom danger was to be apprehended.

From these classes the danger came. On the 9th August an outbreak took place in the Ajmír gaol, and fifty prisoners escaped. But General Lawrence was

The confidence bestowed by them in General Lawrence.

General Lawrence's demeanour.

The disaffected few.

An émeute in the Ajmír prompt. He rode out himself with a detachment of the mounted police, previously warned by him to be in readiness, to pursue the escaped convicts, caught them, and, when they turned to resist, attacked and recaptured all who were not slain. It was a sign of the good feeling of the respectable classes, that when Lawrence set out on this pursuit many leading Muhammadans of the city volunteered to accompany him.

gaol is suppressed.

On the day following, one of the other classes referred to—the military class—showed its teeth. One of the regiments accompanying the force for which Lawrence had made a requisition on Dísá, and which had reached Nasírábád on the 12th June, was the 12th Bombay Native Infantry. A trooper of the 1st Bombay Lancers, suddenly mounting his charger, had galloped in front of the lines of his regiment, endeavouring by cries and threats to induce his comrades to mutiny. The Bombay Lancers, however, were staunch, and some of them mounted their horses to pursue the rebel. Noting this, the trooper discharged his carbine at the native officer superintending the mount, and fled to the lines of the 12th, where he was received and sheltered. Meanwhile the Brigadier, Henry Macan, had come on to the parade ground. He at once ordered the men of the 12th to turn out. Only forty obeyed. Upon this the Brigadier called out the guns, and, bringing up a company of the 83rd, proceeded to the lines of the 12th. The original mutineer, the trooper of the 1st Cavalry, fired at him but missed. The rebel himself was then shot by an artillery officer. The men of the 12th were paraded, and all who had disobeyed the order to turn out were disarmed. Their muskets were found loaded. The ringleaders were then tried by court-martial, five were hanged and three sentenced to imprisonment for life. Twenty-five had previously deserted. To the remainder, their arms, on their expression of contrition, were restored, and they behaved well in the field ever afterwards.

Slight outbreak at Nasírábád is easily suppressed by Brigadier Macan.

A similar feeling displayed itself about the same time at another station. I have already stated * that, after the revolt of the native troops at Nímach, General Lawrence, having no other soldiers at his disposal,

A similar occurrence at Nímach

* Vol. III. p. 171.

had caused that place to be occupied by detachments from Mewár, Kotá, and Búndí. Subsequently, placing little trust in the men of these detachments, he had ordered up a force composed of one squadron of the 2nd Bombay Light Cavalry, one hundred men of the 83rd, and two hundred of the 12th Bombay Native Infantry, to relieve them. But some of the relievers were as bad as the relieved. About the 12th August some disaffected men of the 2nd Light Cavalry and the 12th is successfully met by Colonel

Jackson.

Native Infantry endeavoured to promote a disturbance. But Colonel Jackson, the commanding officer, acted with great promptitude. Before the mutiny had actually declared itself, he brought up the 83rd, and seized the ringleaders. Some of these were arrested, eight escaped, one man of the 83rd was killed, an officer and two men were wounded, but the mutiny was nipped in the bud.

But the mutinous feeling had been too widely spread over the province to be checked by one or two failures on the part of its promoters, nor had the officers at the out-stations the same means of repression at hand as those possessed by the commandants at Nímach and Nasírábád.

The station of Mount Ábu, in the native state of Sirohí, was the summer residence of the Governor-General's agent, and generally of the wives and families of the officers serving under him. There, at this time, were congregated the wife and two daughters of Mount Ábu,

the summer residence in Rájpútáná.

General Lawrence, and the wives and families of many officers serving in the field. In the European barracks were likewise thirty convalescent soldiers of the 83rd. To protect the station was a detachment of from sixty to seventy men of the Jodhpúr legion—whose headquarters were at Erinpuram*—under the command of Captain Hall.

The Jodhpúr legion consisted of artillery, cavalry, and infantry. The guns—two 9-pounders—were drawn by camels and manned from the infantry. The cavalry consisted of three troops, each having two native officers, eight non-commissioned officers,

Composition
of the Jodhpúr legion.

seventy-two troopers, and a trumpeter. The infantry was formed of eight companies of Hindustánis, each having two native officers, twelve non-commissioned officers, and eighty privates; and three companies of Bhíls, each counting seventy men besides native officers. The legion, especially the cavalry portion of it, had a good reputation for efficiency.

* Erinpuram, from which the final letter is generally but incorrectly excised, lies one hundred and thirty-five miles south-west of Nasírábád and seventy-eight miles south of Jodhpúr.

On the 19th August a company of the infantry portion of the legion, which had been sent with the view of holding in check a rebel chief in the neighbourhood, arrived at a place called Anádrá, two miles from the foot of the mountain pass leading to Ábu. A troop of cavalry of the same legion had arrived there a few days previously, and had been distributed in small parties in the different villages to protect the road from Dísa to Ábu.

The following afternoon Captain Hall arrived at Anádrá to give orders for the occupation by the detachment of certain villages. The Sipáhis and their baggage had been soaked by heavy rain, but the men seemed cheery and well-disposed. Having given the necessary orders, he returned to Ábu. But on his way he met a háwaldár belonging to the detachment at that place, who, in reply to his question, said that he was going to see his newly arrived friends. This was true so far as it went: but the háwaldár deemed it unnecessary to add—what, nevertheless, was proved from subsequent inquiry to be the fact—that “he had been deputed to manage the attack which was to come off the following morning.”*

The morning of the 21st was thick and hazy, and the people residing at Ábu, under the influence of murky atmosphere, kept their beds late. Not so the men of the Jodhpúr legion at Anádrá. They rose very early, climbed the hill, and, under the cover of the dense fog, crept unseen to the door of the barracks, in which lay, buried in sleep, the thirty sick and invalid British soldiers. The native assassins then peeped through the window and saw their intended victims sleeping. Then raising their muskets, they poked the muzzles through the windows—and fired.

They aimed too high! The British soldiers starting from sleep at that sound, unwonted at Ábu, divine the cause, seize their muskets, and begin to load. But then another volley is poured in, harmless as its pre-

A company and a troop of the legion meet at Anádrá.

Captain Hall inspects them and finds them cheery.

The men at Anádrá mutiny, climb the hill, and fire into the barracks.

Failure of the mutineers.

* Prichard's Mutinies in Rájputáná.

decessor. By this time the muskets of the British soldiers are loaded, they rush out, they reply. The result is "singular but satisfactory; one mutineer fell—the rest ran away."*

While the main body was thus engaged at the barracks, another party of mutineers had crept round to Captain Hall's house, to dispose, if possible, of a man whom they knew to be capable and resolute, and whose influence they dreaded. Arrived in front of the house, they became aware that Captain Hall was asleep. They at once extended in line in front of it, and by word of command fired a volley within. Again was the result futile. Hall, awakened by the noise, managed to escape by a back door with his family into the schoolhouse, which had been fortified as a place of refuge. Leaving his family there, he took with him a small guard of four men of the 83rd, and, charging the assailants, drove them off. He was speedily joined by the remaining men of the 83rd, and the mutineers were driven from the hill. The murky fog which still prevailed rendered pursuit impossible.

Only one European was wounded, and that was Mr. Alexander Lawrence, son of the General. Hearing the firing, he had started for Captain Hall's house, when the Sipáhis noted and shot him—in the thigh. The wound was severe, but he recovered. †

The mutineers, baffled first by their own clumsiness, and secondly by the spirit of the men they had tried to murder, made at once for the headquarters of the regiment—the station of Erinpuram. The only Europeans at this station at the time were the adjutant, Lieutenant Conolly, two sergeants and their families. Early on the morning of the 22nd, a letter from one of the baffled mutineers was brought to Conolly by his orderly, Makhdúm Bakhsh by name. This letter, addressed to the men at headquarters, called upon them to revolt and join their comrades "who had been to Ábu, fought with the Europeans, and taken all precautions." Conolly immediately mounted his horse and rode down to the parade ground. A glance showed him that the spirit of mutiny had infected the troops. The gunners were running to their guns, shouting to Conolly, as they ran, to keep off. Conolly then determined to appeal to the Bhíls, who had no sympathies of caste, of kindred, or even of common origin, with the men of the other branches of the legion. But to reach the Bhíls he was forced to pass the lines of the cavalry. These, too, he saw were mutinying, and though he stopped to order them to turn out under arms, but not to stir from their lines, his orders were not attended to. At last he reached the Bhíls. He found them loyal and ready to obey him, except so far as to march against the loaded guns and muskets of their more numerous comrades. As a last resource, Conolly rode back to make an appeal to the infantry. He found them mad with excitement, and refusing to hear a word. He then tried the gunners. But, as he neared the guns, the men shouted to him to keep off; as he persisted in advancing, they wheeled their guns round, and pointed the muzzles at him, holding the portfires ready. Conolly then turned his horse's head, and, changing his direction, rode again at the guns, taking them in flank. Upon this several troopers rode at him, between him and the guns, and, pointing their carbines at him, exclaimed, "Go back, or we will fire." Conolly then called out with a loud voice that those on his side should join him. A few troopers only rode to his side.

* Prichard.

† He fortunately survives to reply to the calumnies directed against his father, after that father's death, of General Showers.—Vide Vol. III.

Trying position of Lieutenant Conolly.

He appeals to the Bhíls,

then to the infantry,

then to the gunners,

and fails with all.

Meanwhile the Sipáhis had begun the work of plunder. The two English sergeants with their wives and families, two men, two women, and five children, unable to stem the tide, had abandoned their houses, and were seeking refuge in vain flight. Conolly sent for them to join him in the cavalry lines. They came. "Here, then," writes the chronicler of the story of the mutinies in Rájputáná,* "the little band of Englishmen and women were collected, utterly helpless, surrounded by bloodthirsty villains,

The small English colony is in great straits;

* Lieutenant Iltudus Thomas Prichard, of the 15th Regiment Native Infantry, a soldier and a scholar of no mean capacity. The mutiny of his regiment disgusted Mr. Prichard with military service. He left the army after 1858, and devoted himself to literature, in which he played, in India, a conspicuous and honourable part. His work on the mutiny is styled The Mutinies in Rájputáná: a Personal Narrative.

every instant plunging deeper and deeper into their career of crime, from which there was no drawing back, and becoming more and more intoxicated with the unbridled indulgence of their passion for plunder, lust, and rapine."

It was indeed a terrible and a trying position. It was soon to become worse. Gradually many of the men who had responded to Conolly's call began to show a disposition to desert him. Amongst them, however, were a few noble and loyal spirits, who in this dark hour dared to show that they preferred honour to life. A risaldár,* Abbás Alí by name, came forward, and, taking off his turban in a solemn manner before the more infuriated of the rebels, declared to them that, before they should offer violence to the English, they would have to pass over his body. His example was followed by another native officer, Abdul Alí. The orderly, too, Makhdúm Bakhsh, the recipient of the letter referred to in a previous page, exerted himself to save his officer. Ultimately forty-five troopers swore to stand by Conolly or to die in his defence.

With a strange inconsistency, however, they would not ride off with Conolly and the sergeants and sergeants' families: they would not allow them to depart alone. They offered to allow Conolly to ride away, taking charge of the children; but, as for the parents, it was impossible, they said, to save them. With a spirit becoming a British officer, Conolly under those circumstances declined to leave. He resolved to save his comrades with himself, or to share their fate.

Meanwhile the rebels had brought their guns to bear upon the cavalry lines. To prevent the escape of the Europeans and the loyal troopers, they then insisted that all the cavalry horses should be picketed close to the guns, and that the Europeans, now their captives, should be sent to occupy a small tent on the parade ground, carefully guarded.

So that long night passed. The next morning the Anádrá mutineers, fresh from their baffled attempt on Ábu, marched into the station with a swagger scarcely consistent with their actual performances. However much minded they may have been to avenge their defeat on the prisoners, they were unable to do so without a fight with their own brethren. For the faithful "forty-five" still kept jealous guard. They contented themselves, then, with an outpouring of abuse.

* A native cavalry officer—a squadron commander.

The ways of the mutineers throughout the mutiny were inscrutable. They were so specially on this occasion. We have seen that, on the day of the revolt of Erinpuram, the revolters were willing to allow Conolly to go, but not the sergeants and their wives. On the evening of the second day they came to a resolution to permit the two sergeants, their wives and children, to depart, but to retain Conolly. Conolly, careless regarding himself, intent only on saving the lives of the men and women under his charge, made no objection. The sergeants and their families were then allowed to quit the station. The mutineers then marched from the station in the direction of Ajmír, taking Conolly with them, a prisoner, mounted but carefully guarded.

Conolly had given up all hope of life. But never was he in outward appearance more cheery. He has left in a letter to a friend a vivid account of the occurrences of that and the following day. On the third day he was allowed to depart, and he rode into Erinpuram, followed by three faithful troopers.* The risaldár who had first proved his loyalty, then wrote to Captain Monck-Mason, the political agent at Jodhpúr, offering to desert with a large body of the cavalry, and the guns, provided he and his comrades should be pardoned and reinstated in the service of the Government. It may be convenient to state here that Monck-Mason was anxious to accept the offer, but his hands were tied by the order of Government, which prohibited all officers from making terms with rebels while they had arms in their hands. Monck-Mason therefore replied that, though he was precluded by recent orders from accepting the terms offered, yet that if Abbás Alí would act as a faithful soldier and servant of the British Government, and weaken the cause of the rebels by deserting in the manner he proposed, there was no doubt but

The rebels dismiss the sergeants and their families, and carry away Conolly.

The rebels allow Conolly to depart.

The "loyal" rebels offer to submit on promise of a pardon,

* Vide Appendix C.

that his case would be leniently dealt with by the Government, and he would probably receive an unconditional pardon and a suitable reward. Abbás Alí, regarding this reply as a refusal, became an active leader of the rebel cause. The results were serious to the British cause, and especially serious to Captain Monck-Mason himself.

which the political agent has no power to grant.

The Rájah of Jodhpúr sends an army against the rebels.

The rebels, after dismissing Conolly, pushed on towards Ajmír with the intention of taking it. Their line of march lay through the Jodhpúr country. To stop them, and, if possible, to annihilate them, the Rájah, acting in conformity with the advice of Monck-Mason, despatched his own army, commanded by his favourite officer, a very daring and a very gallant man, who had given several instances of his courage—Anár Singh—to Pálí,* a place on the high road to his capital. To aid Anár Singh with his counsels, a British officer, Lieutenant Heathcote, was, by order of General Lawrence, despatched from the Rájputáná field force, of which he was Deputy-Assistant Quartermaster-General. The Jodhpúr troops intrenched themselves at Pálí.

Meanwhile the rebels, advancing towards that place, had arrived at Áwah. The Thákur or baron of this stronghold was in rebellion against his liege lord, the Rájah of Jodhpúr. A man of a long and proud lineage, of great repute throughout the country, the Thákur was naturally unwilling to enter into any bond of alliance with men whom he regarded as the revolted hirelings of the European. But revenge is sweet. And he, probably the second man in importance in Márwár, believing that his wrongs cried out for vengeance, persuaded himself that all means were fair in war. A rebel against his Rájah, he was likewise to that extent a rebel against the British suzerain of that Rájah. Before, however, he would consent to the terms which the rebel Sipáhis, in their anxiety to gain him, pressed upon him with urgency, he despatched a messenger to the British agent, Monck-Mason, to tell him that if the British Government would accord him certain conditions, which he named, he would return to his allegiance, would keep the gates of his fort closed against the

The Thákur of Áwah

makes offers of submission to Monck-Mason,

* Pálí is one hundred and eight miles to the south-west of Nasírábád.

mutineers, and, if co-operated with either by a British force or by the troops of the Rájah, would open fire upon their camp, which was within gunshot of his walls.

Again was Monck-Mason tempted. Sound policy would have induced him to accept the Thákur's offer. The conditions named were of no great practical importance, relating as they did more to sentimental than to real grievances. But his hands were tied.

which that officer has no power to accept.

He had no authority to treat with rebels still in arms. He had no authority at all to treat with this Thákur, whose first complaint lay against the Rájah, and he was not the man, able as he was in many respects, to assume responsibility, even in the hour of danger. He replied, then, to the effect that, so long as the Thákur was in rebellion, he could not treat with him. He added that the Thákur's quarrel was with his own Rájah, and that the Rájah had frequently expressed his determination to hold no communication with him unless he should confess his error, throw himself upon his mercy, and pay up his arrears of revenue. The result of this reply was that the Thákur and the rebel Sipáhis came to terms, and together marched towards Pálí.

He therefore coalesces with the rebels.

They marched towards Pálí; but, when they saw the entrenched position of the Jodhpúr troops, they did not care to attack it. The delay which ensued, trying as it was to men situated as were the Jodhpúr troops, might have been endured but for the evil effect it was sure to produce on the native courts and the native troops of Rájputáná. These could not understand the utility of a Torres Vedras. In their eyes, royal troops who would not advance were half beaten. The moment was especially full of anxiety for the officer responsible for the security of this important part of India, and General Lawrence was justified in the desire he expressed to the Rájah that some more active measures should be taken by his troops than those involved "in dancing attendance on the rebels, like orderlies."

The rebels march on Pálí.

Considerations which moved the Jodhpúr troops not to remain quiet.

But, before General Lawrence's letter reached Jodhpúr, the commander of the royal troops, Anár Singh, had left his strong position and encamped in close proximity to the rebels. Here, on the early morning of September 8th, his camp was surprised by the enemy. His men gave way, and though he, with a few, a very few, kindred spirits, fought bravely to the last, giving their lives for their Rájah, the valcur of a few men could not redeem the day. His camp, his guns, his military stores fell into the hands of the rebels. Heathcote, after using every effort to induce the men to stand, mounted his horse and galloped from the field.

The rebels attack and defeat the J. dhpúr troops.

General Lawrence was at Ajmír when the events I have recorded occurred. From the 21st to the 26th August he received no intelligence from Ábu, but on the 22nd a letter had reached him from Conolly at Erinpuram, telling him of the anticipations he entertained of an outbreak at that station. Five days later he received the bare outline of the occurrences at both places; of the mutiny at the one, and the attack on the sleeping Europeans at the other.

We have seen that the European forces at the disposal of Lawrence were all required for the maintenance of order at the great military centres in Rájputáná, and that few men, if any, could really be spared for service in the field. No one can wonder, then, at the anxiety expressed by the Governor-General's agent for the prompt and energetic action on the part of the Jodhpúr troops. But, after the defeat of those troops at Páli, Lawrence, considering, and rightly considering, that the effect on the country would be very injurious if the course of the rebels were not promptly checked, assembled as soon as possible a small force at Bíaur for the purpose of co-operating with the Jodhpúr troops. This force was composed of a hundred and fifty men of the 83rd, a portion of the Mairwára battalion, the 1st Bombay Lancers, two 12-pounders, three 6-pounders, and two mortars.

The rebels, after their victory over the Rájah's troops, had fallen back on Áwah, the fortifications of which they proceeded to strengthen. Áwah is surrounded by a high wall, and can be approached only through a dense jungle. Being well supplied with guns, it could claim to be defensible against the small force which Lawrence was marching against it.

He arrived before it on the 18th, and proceeded at once to make a reconnaissance in force. This had the effect of causing the enemy to bring a strong fire to bear upon his men from every gun on their walls. It was seen that the place was strong and could scarcely

General
Lawrence

assembles a small force to coerce the rebels.

The rebels fall back on Áwah.

General
Lawrence
arrives before Áwah.

be carried by an assault. Lawrence, then, hoping that the enemy would come out and attack him, fell back on the village of Chulawás, about three and a half miles distant. Here he was to have been joined by Monk-Mason, but that officer, on arriving within three hundred yards of the place where the General was standing, was decoyed by the enemy's bugle-sound—similar to that of the British—and was shot dead. He was a man of many and varied accomplishments, and his sudden death was felt severely by all who knew and loved him.

Monck-Mason is killed.

Lawrence remained three days at Áwah. The rebels left him in peace, busily occupied in strengthening their position. Unable with his actual force to take the place, and having to a certain extent impressed the people of the country through which he marched, Lawrence then fell back leisurely on Ajmír and Nasírábád. Áwah had, indeed, defied him, and Kotá was in a state of rebellion, but, with those exceptions, Rájpútáná remained for the three months that followed loyal and submissive. It may be convenient to add a word here regarding the proceedings at Áwah. Not many days elapsed before the proud Thákur and his rebel allies quarrelled. Instead of coming to blows, however, they sensibly agreed to separate. The Thákur remained at Áwah; the Sipáhis took their way towards Dehlí. They were encountered, completely defeated, and many of them cut up by a British force under Gerrard at Nárnúl on the 16th October following.*

Lawrence falls back on Ajmír.

Ultimate fate of the Jodh-
púr legion.

The State called Kotá, an offshoot from the more ancient principality of Búndí, borders on the south-west frontier of Sindhiá's dominions, and has an area of five thousand square miles, and a population of four hundred and thirty-three thousand souls. In 1857 the ruling chief was Maháráo Rám Singh. An auxiliary force of the three arms, commanded by European officers, had been maintained in the State since 1838. The entire cost of this force was maintained by the Maháráo. The political agent, representing the British Government, was Major Burton.

Kotá.

* Pages 78–82. I may add that the Risaldár, Abbás Alí, was ultimately pardoned by Lord Canning.

The reader is aware that, when the troops of the regular army revolted at Nímach, Lawrence had caused that station to be reoccupied by detachments from the contingents of Mewár, Kotá, and Búndí, until such time as the Europeans he had sent from Dísá should arrive.* Major Burton had accompanied the Kotá troops on that expedition. He did not, however, return with them, General Lawrence having requested him to remain at Nímach for some three weeks, as "in those unsettled times he could not have confidence in his troops."

Troops from Kotá temporarily occupy Nímach.

Major Burton and his sons return to Kotá.

Major Burton, consequently, remained at Nímach. But, after the occurrences at Áwah to which I have adverted, deeming his presence at the capital of the State to which he was accredited necessary for the assurance of the policy of the Maháráo, he set out to return to Kotá, accompanied by two of his sons, the one aged twenty-one, the other sixteen, but leaving behind him, under the safeguard of the British troops at Nímach, his wife and four remaining children. He reached Kotá on the 12th October, was visited by the Maháráo in state the following morning, and returned the visit on the 14th. The Maháráo subsequently stated that at the return visit Burton gave him the names of some of his officers whom he knew to be disaffected, and impressed upon him the advisability of punishing or at least dismissing them.

The Maháráo betrays Burton to the men whom he had denounced,

Whether Burton gave this advice can never be certainly known; but this is certain, that that same day the Maháráo caused the officers and men of the contingent to be informed that he had given it!

Officers and men were, in very truth, alike disaffected, and, being so, the communication made to them by order of the Maháráo determined them to take the law into their own hands. Accordingly they assembled the following morning, killed Mr. Salder, the Residency surgeon, and Mr. Saviell, the doctor of the dispensary in the city, who resided in a house in the Residency grounds, and then attacked the Residency itself.

who attack the Residency,

The guards and servants fled from the premises and hid themselves in the ravines close by. Major Burton and his two sons, left with a single servant, a camel-driver, took refuge in a room on the roof of the house. The revoltors then fired round shot into the Residency. "For four hours," writes General Lawrence in his graphic account of the mournful transaction,* "these four brave men defended themselves, till at length the Residency was set on fire, and Major Burton, feeling the case desperate, proposed to surrender on condition of the mob sparing his sons' lives. The young men at once rejected the offer, saying they would all die together. They knelt down and prayed for the last time, and then calmly and heroically met their fate. The mob had by this time procured scaling-ladders, and, thus gaining the roof, rushed in and despatched their victims, the servant alone escaping. Major Burton's head was cut off and paraded through the town, and then fired from a gun, but the three bodies were by the Mahárájah's order interred that evening."

and murder Burton, his sons, and other Europeans.

The Maháráo at once communicated the occurrence to General Lawrence, accompanying the communication with the expression of his regret and with the excuse that the troops had taken the law into their own hands and that he was powerless. He may have been powerless, but he had, perhaps, unwittingly, set the troops on. The Government of India subsequently intimated their opinion that, though innocent of fore-knowledge, the Maháráo had not wholly performed his duty, and reduced the salute due to him as Maháráo of Kotá from seventeen to thirteen guns.

The Maháráo excuses himself.

The tragedy at Kotá was not the only outrage which disturbed the peace of the country during the month of October. About the same time that Burton was being besieged in the Residency of the former place, a party of rebels from Mandesar, led by a chief who pretended relationship to the royal house of Dehlí, marched on and seized Jíran, a fortified town with a very strong defence, within twelve miles of the cantonment of Nímach. It was impossible to allow such an outrage to pass unnoticed. On the 23rd October there was sent from Nímach to attack the rebels a force of four hundred men, with two guns and a mortar. The men were chiefly Bombay native troops, cavalry and infantry, but they were

Disturbances near Nímach.

* Reminiscences of Forty-three Years' Service in India, by Lieut.-General Sir George Lawrence, K.C.S.I., C.B.

headed by fifty men of the 83rd, the whole commanded by Captain Tucker. They found the enemy still at Jíran. Tucker at once opened fire with his guns, and when these had played some time upon the defences he sent his infantry to attack the town. But the rebels sallied out in overwhelming numbers, drove back the infantry, and, pushing on, captured the mortar. Upon this the cavalry charged, recovered the mortar, compelled the enemy to re-enter the town, and silenced their fire. But the place itself was too strong for the efforts of a force so small and so lightly provided; the loss already incurred had been heavy, two officers, Tucker and Read, having been killed, and three wounded; a retreat was therefore ordered. Strange to say, the enemy evacuated Jíran that night.

The repulse at Jíran.

The rebels advance again in greater numbers and attack Nímach.

Their retreat, however, was only the prelude to an advance in larger numbers. On the 8th November a body of them, numbering four thousand, advanced on Nímach, occupied the station, and forced the European and native troops to take refuge within the fortified square. This they attempted, but vainly, to escalate; then, after a siege of fifteen days' duration, hearing that reinforcements were advancing to the aid of the British, they fell back.

On receiving intelligence of the murder of Major Burton and his sons, General Lawrence had made an urgent requisition to Bombay for troops. The first and smaller detachments of these began to arrive in Rájputáná in January 1858, but it was not until March that the reinforcements assumed a sufficient strength to justify decisive action on a larger scale.

Lawrence
applies for reinforcements.
1858.
January.

The detachments which arrived in January, however, enabled General Lawrence to throw off the quiescent attitude which he had till then deemed it politic to assume. In January he was able to detach a force of eleven hundred men, with a due proportion of guns, under Colonel Holmes, 12th Bombay Native Infantry, against Áwah. Holmes invested the place on the 19th, and the same day his guns opened fire. At the end of five days a practicable breach had been made, and the assault was ordered for the following morning. The garrison, perfectly cognisant of all that was going on in the British camp, resolved not to await it. Fortunately for them there raged that night a storm

On the arrival of some of them
he besieges

and captures
Áwah.

so fearful, and there ruled a darkness so intense, that sentries only a few paces apart could neither see nor hear each other. Under cover of these portents the rebels evacuated the place in the night.

The strength of the fortifications of Áwah, when it was occupied next morning by the British troops, were such as to justify to the full General Lawrence's determination regarding it in the previous September. It had a double line of defences, the inner of strong masonry, the outer of earthwork, both being loop-holed. Thirteen guns, three tons of powder, and three thousand rounds of small arms ammunition were found in the place. The keep, the bastions, and all the masonry works were blown up and destroyed, so as effectually to prevent the stronghold becoming a nucleus of rebellion for the future.*

The fortifications of Áwah justify Lawrence's previous retirement.

This act of vigour had a very salutary effect. Order was maintained in the country; and in March, when the reinforcements from Bombay poured in, the difficulty of the task for which troops had been required in the previous November had in no way increased.

The reinforcements numbered five thousand five hundred men of all arms. They were composed of the 72nd, 83rd, and 95th regiments, the 10th Bombay Native Infantry, the 8th Hussars, the 1st Bombay Lancers, the Sindh Horse, Brown's battery of artillery, eighteen field-pieces, of which ten were 8-inch mortars and howitzers, and a corps of sappers and miners. They were commanded by Major-General H. G. Roberts of the Bombay army.

The main reinforcements arrive

On the arrival of General Roberts in March, General Lawrence resigned the military command into his hands, and reverted to his civil and political functions as agent to the Governor-General. In this capacity he accompanied the force.

under General Roberts.

The first operation to be attempted was the recovery of Kotá. Ever since the murder of Major Burton disorder had prevailed in that State. The Sipáhis, having tasted the pleasure of revolt, drained the cup to the very dregs. They imprisoned the

The state of Kotá after the murder of Burton.

* Forty-three Years in India, Sir G. Lawrence.

Maháráo in his palace. They then forced him to sign a paper consisting of nine articles, one of which was to the effect that he had ordered the murder of Major Burton. The Maháráo endeavoured by compliance to keep the rebels in good humour, but meanwhile he despatched secretly messengers to the Rájah of Karaulí, begging him to send troops to his aid. The Rájah complied, and his troops, faithful to their liege lord, drove the rebels from the part of the town of Kotá in which the palace was situated, and released the Maháráo. They were still occupying it, for the defence of that prince, when Roberts arrived in Rájputáná. The rebels, however, continued to hold the other parts of the town, the inhabitants of which had been reduced already by pillage and other excesses to extreme misery.

A military march from Nasírábád, the head-quarters of Roberts's force, to Kotá, was not a march which a general could regard as being necessarily a pleasure trip. Not only did the town of Kotá occupy a formidable position, covered by the river Chambal on one side, and by a large and deep lake on the other, but the approach to it offered many positions capable of easy defence by a small force against one much larger. Chief amongst these was the Mukandara pass—a long and narrow valley between two ranges of hills.*

But once more the rebels displayed a marked deficiency of true military instinct. They made not the smallest attempt to defend even one of the difficult positions. Roberts, marching from Nasírábád on the 10th, encamped on the north bank of the Chambal, opposite Kotá, on the 22nd March. He found the rebels in complete possession of the south bank, on which they had planted their guns, many in number, and some of them large in calibre. Roberts ascertained at the same time that the fort, the palace, half the city, and the ferry over the river were held by the Maháráo with the Karaulí troops.

Early on the morning of the 25th, information reached him that the rebels were making an assault on the palace with a view to seize the ferry. Roberts instantly sent across three hundred men of the 83rd, under Major Heath, to aid the Maháráo. The attack of the rebels

The road between Nasírábád and Kotá.

Roberts
penetrates to Kotá.

He attacks and completely defeats the
rebels.

* Famous in Anglo-Indian story for Monson's retreat through it.

was repulsed. On the 27th, Roberts crossed over himself with six hundred of the 95th, and two 9-pounders, and, having placed the heavy guns in the fort in position to bear on the enemy's camp, he opened upon it on the 29th a heavy fire of shot and shell. On the 30th, whilst the remainder of the force cannonaded the rebels' position from the north bank, Roberts, marching from the fort in three columns, moved on it on the south bank, and gained it with very small loss. By this brilliant manœuvre he not only completely defeated the enemy, but captured fifty guns! The cavalry, however, failed to intercept the rebels, and they almost all escaped.

The British troops occupied Kotá for three weeks. At the end of that time, the authority of the Maháráo having been completely re-established, General Roberts evacuated it and returned to Nasírábád, despatching a portion of his force to garrison Nímach. With the fall of Kotá, peace and order had been completely restored throughout Rájpútáná, and, although two months later both were broken by Tántiá Topí, the action of this famous leader was strictly an invasion. Tántiá induced neither prince nor peasant to join his standard.

The authority of the Maháráo is restored.

Of all the large tracts of territory inhabited mainly by a people boasting a common origin, not one passed through the trying period of 1857-8 with smaller injury to itself, with less infliction of suffering and bloodshed, than the territory of Rájpútáná. Parcelled out as it is into eighteen sovereign States, each ruled by its own independent chief, the circumstance may seem surprising.

The reason why Rájpútáná was, by comparison, little affected by the mutiny.

But the causes of it are not far to seek. I attribute the result mainly to the fact that no people in India had suffered so much or so recently as the Rájpúts from the lawlessness which characterised the sway immediately preceding the suzerainty of the British—the sway of the Maráthás. When the policy of Marquess Wellesley towards the Rájpút States was reversed in 1805 by Lord Cornwallis and Sir George Barlow, a system of oppression and misrule was inaugurated, under which the buffalo was to the man who held the bludgeon, and the fair daughters of the land were to the strong arm of the marauder. For twelve years the sufferings of Rájpútáná cried to Heaven for redress. That redress came only when, in 1817, the Marquis of Hastings reverted to the policy of his great predecessor. Under that policy the princes of Rájpútáná have been secured against invaders from outside and against each other. Since that period every man has been able to lie down in his own mango-grove, and to eat of his own date-tree. Security has prevailed throughout the land. The honour of every man and of every woman has been secured. It was the sense of this security, enjoyed under British suzerainty, that ensured the loyalty of the great bulk of the Rájputés during the troublous times of the Mutiny.

It is proper to add that this recollection of past and present benefits was stimulated and enforced by the choice made by the Government of India of the agents to carry out their policy. Foremost among these was George St. Patrick Lawrence. His tact, his energy, his fearlessness, his readiness of resource, when he had not a single European soldier at his disposal, stamped him as a man eminently fitted to rule in troublous times. The display of these qualities begat confidence in the minds of the native princes, fear and dismay among the adventurers who welcomed turmoil. His presence, thus, proved itself to be worth an army. But for his promptitude, Ajmír would have fallen, and, with Ajmír occupied by two or three regiments of rebellious Sipáhis, British authority would have disappeared. The preservation of Rájputáná, then, will ever be connected with the name of this gallant and distinguished officer.*

The inroad of Tántiá Topí into Rájputáná, and the campaign in pursuit of that famous leader, will be treated of in its proper place in the next volume. Before dealing with him it will be my pleasing duty to record the statesmanlike measures by which Lord Elphinstone caused Bombay to become a strong wall of support to the threatened edifice of British rule in India, and to narrate how Sir Hugh Rose illustrated the highest genius of the inspired warrior by his daring and successful campaign in Central India.

George
St. Patrick
Lawrence.

The story
reverts to Bombay.

* Since these lines were first published the illustrious man to whom they refer has been carried to his last home. Those who had the privilege of knowing him will never forget the straightforward manliness which characterised all his thoughts and all his actions. The opportunities which were granted to his brothers, Henry and John, were never vouchsafed to him. But this may at least be said of him, that in no conjuncture of life was he ever baffled: to every trial he rose superior. He left a reputation without spot, and many loving friends to mourn him.

APPENDIX A.

(Vide note to page 60.)

WITH reference to the common saying that Lord Lawrence saved the Panjáb, and thereby saved India, it may be fair to remark that this opinion was not supported by many of the officers who served with the Dehli Field Force during the siege: their views may be shown by the following extracts taken from a letter written by Lieut.-Colonel Turnbull (who served throughout the siege on the personal staff of Sir Henry Burnard, General Reed, and Sir Archdale Wilson) to Mr. Bosworth Smith, with reference to Lord Lawrence's share of credit for the work done at Dehli, as described in that Author's book:—

“The one figure which stands pre-eminently forward in this narrative” (Mr. Bosworth Smith's ‘Life of Lord Lawrence’) “of the siege of Dehli, is that of Sir John Lawrence. All others sink into insignificance. The terrible anxiety of our generals, receiving constant entreaties (if not more) from Láhor to do something; to take active measures to push on, &c., when it would have been ruinous, if not practically impossible, to do so; the fearful prostration of mind and body by such a strain in a climate reaching sometimes 133 degrees in a headquarters tent, the perpetual knowledge that if nothing were done they might be blamed, and, if anything were done and failed, the blame would be theirs also; more especially as the consequence of any such failure would be the rising of the Panjáb; all this does not seem to have been sufficiently taken into account. It was Sir John Lawrence who urged our instant move on Dehli. When we got there we found ourselves checked, surrounded, and outnumbered. He denuded the Panjáb of troops, and sent them to us, thus enabling us to hold our own, and thus to save the Panjáb, and India. It is hard to see how, with the original responsibility resting on him, he could have done anything less.

“The siege of Dehli has never been sufficiently estimated in England, and for several reasons. No one can know what really went on there except those who were there. The fall of Dehli took place in September. Sir Colin Campbell had arrived in Calcutta the 13th August. From that moment all attention was riveted on him; and, soon after, on Lakhnao. Troops arrived from the Cape by October; the China expedition was directed to India; troops and officers, whose numbers and names had already become well known during the Crimean War, came out; full battalions, one thousand strong, took the place of attenuated regiments of two hundred and fifty; and last, not least, war-correspondents kept the English public well up in all the minor details of what was then occurring. The natural consequence was, that the recollection of things done at Dehli faded away. The terrible anxieties of the commanders, the gallantry and sufferings of the officers and men, were either passed over, or, if remembered, were soon obliterated by the newspaper descriptions of what was even then going on. One person could not be passed over, and that was Sir John Lawrence. From his constant correspondence with the Government at the Presidency, his work could not be forgotten. The centre of the work above the zone of the Mutiny was the taking of Dehli, so that his name was, in England, more immediately connected with it; and, in the opinion of some, he never used such opportunities as came to his lot afterwards as fully as he might have done in remembering those who were one of the stepping-stones to his advancement."

Colonel Turnbull was a most gallant officer. In his despatch after the battle of Badli-ki-Sarai, Sir Henry Barnard specially mentioned the "daring devotion" of his two aides-de-camp, Captain Turnbull and his own son. The praise was well merited, for both were to the front whenever service was to be rendered and danger to be encountered.

APPENDIX B.

(Page 117 of text.)

FROM SIR JAMES OUTRAM TO THE OFFICER COMMANDING THE RELIEVING FORCE.

[Along with the following important and deeply interesting letter, Sir James Outram forwarded a plan of the ground intervening between the Álambágh and the Residency, together with minute descriptions of every position and building capable of being held by the enemy. The plan was based on the surveys made by the late Captain Morrison prior to the outbreak, the only surveys that had been made of Lakhnao. The copy of this plan, which will be found at the end of the volume, should be consulted in the perusal of the following letter. It is Plan No. I.]

My communication of the 14th instant informed you I consider your first operation should be the occupation of the "Dilkushá" house and park, by a direct movement to that place from the Álambágh. The fort of Jalálábád, which is situated a mile or a mile and a half to the right of that route, is said to be occupied by the enemy, with two guns; but it is too distant to interrupt that line of communication, and it is not likely to be maintained after the Dilkushá, in addition to Álambágh, has been occupied in its rear. I think it hardly worth while, therefore, to waste time against that place, which at the commencement of the outbreak was little capable of defence, and is not likely since to have been repaired or stored sufficiently to admit of its retention. The guns now there appear to have been sent merely to interrupt the forage parties from Álambágh. (A description of Jalálábád, as it was just before the outbreak, is appended.) Yet it will be prudent, in afterwards communicating with Álambágh, to afford a strong escort until it is known whether or not Jalálábád is evacuated.

The direct advance from Álambágh viâ Charbágh, and the main street marked (1) (1) (1) on the plan, should not be attempted, very formidable opposition being prepared on the opposite side of the Charbágh bridge, the bridge itself being destroyed, and the passage strongly fortified; besides which, there are two miles of street to pass through, in which every means of obstruction has been prepared, the houses loopholed, and guns in position at various points, with ditches, mines, and other obstacles. For the same reason I would deprecate any attempt to force the street which runs from the junction of the Dilkushá and Martinière roads to the Kaisarbágh, marked (2) (2) (2).

At Dilkushá, it is stated, there are at present only some Rájwára matchlockmen, with cavalry at Bíbipur village perhaps, and at the Martinière; but these are almost certain to decamp when you approach, and may perhaps suffer considerably ere they get across the canal, if followed up sharply by cavalry and horse artillery. Two guns were said to be at Dilkushá some days ago, probably those now at Jalálábád. If still there, they would have to be abandoned ere they could be crossed over the canal, if followed up.

It is possible that some of the so-called Regular Infantry may be sent over to the Dilkushá when they hear of your approach. If so, they will but add to their own confusion and panic flight when you attack, for never by any chance do they stand in the open. Two regiments of infantry and one of cavalry, sent out to oppose Major Barston's convoy, fled at his approach without firing a shot; and on every occasion where whole hosts of them were opposed to ourselves it was just the same. The Dilkushá palace cannot be maintained under fire of our artillery, having large windows on every side. If any force of the enemy is assembled there, they must suffer awfully from your guns in escaping across the canal; Or, should they fly to the Martinière, they will be in a similar predicament when you follow them up.

On seeing the Dilkushá occupied by your troops, the enemy would most probably occupy the Martinière. After lodging your baggage in the garden to the rear of, and commanded by, the Dilkushá house (and surrounded by walls without houses, something like Álambágh, and easily defensible), you would proceed against the Martinière through the road marked (3) (3) (3). But it would be well, ere getting within musket-range of the building, to throw a few shells and round shot into it, in case it should be occupied by the enemy, whose fire from the terraced roof might cause much loss ere you get near enough to rush up and blow open doors for entry. It would be well for you to have some one with you well acquainted with the Martinière building. And it may be a matter for your consideration whether it would not be better, if the place appears strongly fortified, to mask it by encamping your troops between the road (3) (3) and the canal, contenting yourself by bombarding the Martinière during the day and night, which will almost ensure its evacuation before morning. The mound marked (4)* would be a favourable site for a 24-pounder battery, which would command the opposite bank of the canal, where you purpose effecting your passage to protect the sappers in making a road for your guns.

It is possible the bridge leading to the Martinière may not be destroyed, and that you may prefer advancing over it. But, on reconnoitring, you will, I believe, find places where the canal may be crossed without much difficulty further down, towards (6), which would enable you to turn any defensive works the enemy may prepare on the main road (2) (2) (2). If you cross the bridge, therefore, I would recommend you turning to the right after passing it, and making your way through the mud huts (indicated by the brown colour on the plan) until you get into the road running from (6) to (W) (W) (W)—W denotes some deserted and destroyed infantry lines—leaving the houses, marked D D D, on your left, and thus making your way into the road (7) (7), which passes the open front of the enclosure in which the barracks are situated. Should the barrack buildings be occupied (they were precipitately abandoned when we advanced from the same quarter), it may be prudent to throw a few shot and shell ere the infantry advances to the attack. Having large doors, open on both sides, as is customary in European barracks in India, I anticipate little difficulty in your effecting an entry. Staircases lead to the terraced roof from the interior of the centre room. The terrace is considerably raised above, and therefore commands the houses of the Hazratganj), and a few rifles placed there could keep down any musketry fire from thence (Hazratganj), which alone could disturb the party left in occupation of the barracks when you advance further. But it would be necessary to throw up a parapet of sand-bags, or screens of shutters, to protect the riflemen on the roof, as it has no parapet. The south wall of the enclosure is, however, sufficiently high to afford some protection against direct fire.

Should you cross by the bridge, your whole force would, I presume, come that way. And your next operation, after leaving an adequate guard for the barracks (say 300 or 400 infantry, some cavalry, and a couple of guns; or, probably, you might secure a gun, or two guns, which the enemy are said to have there), would be to proceed by the road (7) (7) to the Sikandrabágh (G), which, if held, could easily be breached by 24-

* Sir J. Outram afterwards availed himself of this mound to plant a 24-pounder battery of the Shannon Brigade, which effectually kept down the enemy's fire opened on the rear division under his command, when he finally retired to the Álambágh.

or 18-pounders—the wall being only about 2½ feet thick—vide enclosed description.* It is said to be occupied by Mán Singh, with some 200 or 300 Rájwárás and two guns; the former are pretty sure to bolt when your guns open upon the place, and two or three shells are thrown into it.

If you cross the canal at (6), the main body of your force should proceed by the road from (6) to (W). A regiment and portion of artillery might, perhaps, make their way by the road which leads direct to the Sikandrabágh (8) (8); but as it is not well defined, it may be more prudent to keep all together till you occupy the barracks.†

Should you have met with opposition, or been delayed much in crossing the canal, the day will be pretty far advanced ere you have occupied the barracks and Sikandrabágh. These might be the limit of your operation that day—encamping your force between, and a little in advance of, those two points, with its right rear on Sikandrabágh, and the barracks on its left rear—thus obtaining a tolerably open plain to encamp on, with almost clear space in front, from which your guns would play upon the buildings which still intervene between your camp and our position, namely, the Sháh Nuja (H), Moti Mahall (K), Mess-house (M), and Tára Kothí (N), which, if held, might be bombarded from both our positions prior to commencing combined operations next morning. You would then decide on the garrisons to occupy the barracks and Sikandrabágh, to maintain communication with Dilkushá, where your baggage would, I trust, be secure in the garden, protected by 200 men occupying the house, and a couple of guns. About the same strength (with convalescents) would suffice for Álambágh, aided by the enemy's guns we have there. And, perhaps, two of our own guns, supported by 100 riflemen, would hold the Martinière, with a small body of cavalry to command the plain down to the canal. A strong picquet also should be placed in the nearest huts to the road by which you cross the canal. You would, perhaps, occupy the houses D D also, as further security for your communications.‡ Another point to which you should turn your attention while

* The Commander-in-Chief's force met with serious opposition at the Sikandrabágh, owing to their having approached it by a cross-road from the rear, whence their breaching guns could not be brought up until the troops had been exposed for some time to a heavy fire. Had they come by the broad pakka (macadamised) road leading from the barracks, as suggested, their heavy guns could have opened upon the place while the infantry remained out of musketry fire. A practicable breach would then have been made, or the shelling would have driven the enemy out. As it was, however, the occupants, greatly more numerous than reported, had no means of egress, and were destroyed to a man; but our own troops also suffered severely in taking the place.

† Neither the roads (7) (7) or (8) (8) were followed by Sir Colin Campbell's force, which was taken by a more circuitous and intricate road than either, and suffered greatly before its guns could be brought to the front.

‡ All this was carried out, with the exception that the barracks and the delayed in breaching the Sikandrabágh is the destruction of the bridge of boats some few hundred yards thence.* If a troop of horse artillery and cavalry are sent off rapidly to any point commanding the boats, many men would be destroyed with the boats that would be sunk by your guns; and the destruction of the boats will prevent the enemy's force on the other side of the Gúmtí coming over to molest you at night.

The signal that you are crossing the canal will be my notice to spring certain mines, and storm the posts now held by the enemy in my immediate front (9) (9); and, once in possession of these, I shall open my guns on the buildings above mentioned, and endeavour also to silence the fire of the Kaisarbágh, which commands the open space between us, to favour our junction next morning † when our united batteries could be turned upon the Kaisarbágh. And they would, I hope, in a day or two, effect its capture, which is necessary to ensure th entire submission of the city.

NOTE BY THE AUTHOR.—This extract has been taken from Sir James Outram's General Orders, Despatches, and Correspondence, published in 1860 (Smith, Elder, and Co.). All the notes attached to it were made by the editor of that volume.—G. B. M.

APPENDIX C.

(Page 393.)

LIEUTENANT CONOLLY thus wrote to Captain Black, regarding his escape: "Such a scene of confusion I never saw; some Sipáhis firing at Bhíls, they shot seven poor wretches on the parade-ground, who, I declare were only looking at the novel scene. During the day we halted. The first day we marched to —, and a greater rabble never crossed country than our once smart legion: not a Sipáhi hardly saluted me. I was taken to Abbás houses D D were refused in the advance to the Sikandrabágh, and had therefore, to be taken afterwards, and (it is believed) at a greater loss than had they been assailed in the first instance.

* The enemy's leaders themselves caused the bridge to be broken up to prevent the flight of their followers.

† This was done. Sir James Outram's troops stormed and took the buildings (9) (9) on the day Sir Colin took the Sikandrabágh. Sir James then opened his batteries on the Mess-house, Kaisarbágh, &c., exactly as here proposed, until the junction was effected; and the Kaisarbágh could have soon after been taken, had it not been determined to withdraw our forces for a time.—(See the despatches of General Havelock, Brigadier Eyre, Colonel Napier, &c., in reference to these operations.)

Alí's tent at —, and the infantry were a little behind, when a tremendous row commenced. Some Míнас made a rush at the carts; the infantry thought it was an attack; away went the cavalry to see to matters, cut up a few Bhíls, and, seeing no one else, pulled up to look about them. Another row, and rush towards where I was standing near my saddled horse. I can't say I was desperately alarmed, for all hope of life I had cast aside some hours before, when we marched. The rush towards me was caused by some amiable Sipáhis taking the opportunity to make a run at me. Abbás Alí and his men saw it, and were soon between us; but I cannot enter into details of self; once again they attempted to get at me at Dulá. What made them so mad was, that my strenuous attempts to seduce the cavalry had been made known to Mihrwán Singh, and he swore I should die. At Dulá they had three or four rows—councils they called them—about me. At last, Mihrwán Singh and the other beauties, seeing Abbás Alí would not give me up, said I might go solus. Next morning, they sent again to say, No, I should not go. However, Abbás Alí and his men surrounded my *chárpái all night; we none of us slept, and on the morning of the 27th, when the force was ready, the guns were loaded, the infantry shouldered arms, and I was brought up. I was told to ride to the front; poor Dokal Singh the háwaldár-major, and some others, ran out blubbing; Abbás Alí and Abdul Alí rode up on each side, made me low salaams, and told me to ride for it; that not a sawár should be allowed to interfere with my retreat. My three sawárs, who, I have forgotten to say, had stuck to me as if I had been their brother since the very beginning, by a preconcerted plan, were ordered to see me off a little way. I could not help giving a farewell wave of the hand to the infantry in irony; they shouted and laughed, the band struck up, and that is the last I saw of the legion. I rode right into Erinpuram with three sawárs; I came straight here, and the people seemed ready to eat me with joy. The names of the three sawárs are, Nasir-ud-din, second troop; Íláhí Bakhsh, third troop (the man who used to ride my grey); and Momin Khán, first troop. They left everything behind, and, I must say, are three as fine fellows as I wish to see. By the bye, the cavalry said, if I would agree to turn Musalmán, to a man they would follow me. Very kind of them. They offered me money when I was coming away, and also on the march. I took twenty rupees from Abbás Alí; now I wish I had taken my pay; they twice offered it. Now is our time, the legion is divided. Jawan Singh † golandáz, and his party, about seven other golandáz (gunners), will play the infantry a trick if they can. I have told Jawan Singh I will myself give him five hundred rupees if he breaks with the infantry. Abbás Alí, the háwaldár-major, and Abdul Alí, are in danger on my account, and they are kept with their men under the guns night and day. I feel most glad to think I did

* Chárpái, a bedstead; literally, "of four feet."

† Golandáz, a gunner; literally, "a thrower of balls."

them as much harm as I could. Makhdúm Bakhsh had a musket put to his breast for letting me ride with my sword on. I was a bone of contention. I have this morning sent a sharp kásid to Abbás Alí, telling him, for his own sake, to try and communicate with Mason, who, I believe, is at Pálí, and to whom I have written to try and communicate with Abbás Alí."

* Kásid—a courier.

END OF VOL. IV.

23

University of California
SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY
405 Hilgard Avenue, Los Angeles, CA 90024-1388 Return this material to the library from which it was borrowed.

JUL REC

Q1 APR 13 1998

JUL

REC'D YRL 27 2003

Form L9-25

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA
AT LOS ANGELES
LIBRARY

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

A 000 224 289 9

