 ing its exercise; the latter is a fixed and permanent disposition to obey all the orders we may receive, and put up with any treatment to which we may be exposed.
Obéissance, while it directs the actions, leaves every thing else free; it may therefore execute its orders sullenly, or even with remonstrances and complaints. Submission extends to the mind and heart; its humility refrains even from the slightest murmurs.

[On is often translated into English by the passive form of the verb (V. Ex. 1). This is sometimes elegant. O after such words as en, ou, et, que, qui, qu'à, si, etc., that would form with it a hiatus or produce any other dissonance, frequently becomes for euphony l'on (V. Ex. 1); unless the on is immediately followed by te, ta, toi, lui, or other word beginning with (V. Ex. 1). In interrogations, when on would follow a verb ending in a or e, a preceded and followed by a hyphen (-), is placed between them for the sake of euphony (V. Ex. 1).

Syn. — PAUVRETÉ, INDIGENCE, DIABÉTÉ, BÉGIN, NÉCESSITÉ. Pauvreté (poverty) is a condition of fortune, opposed to opulence, in which one is destitute of the conveniences of life. Indigence (indigence) is that degree of poverty which excludes not only conveniences, but also absolute necessaries. Diabète (scarcity) is the opposite of abundance, and seems to proceed from an accidental want of provisions, rather than from a deficiency of the means of procuring them. Bégin (want) and nécessité (need) have less reference to an absolute state than to the absence, on a special occasion, of things so essential that we are constrained to ask them of others: with this distinction, that bégin indicates a less pressing want than nécessité.

 Ser. — SÉRMENT, JUREMENT, JURON. The serment is employed to render a promise more solemn and binding; the jurément serves to confirm the truth of testimony; the juron is an expetive used in conversation to strengthen one's assertions. The serment (oath) of a prince cannot bind him to any act that violates the laws or is contrary to the interests of the state. The most solemn jurément (oath) does not make the habitual liar more worthy of belief. The frequent use of jurons (oaths) betokens one who is as low as he is wicked.
 Ser. — SÉRMENT, VGE. The serment (oath) is a solemn declaration by which we invoke the vengeance of God if we fail to fulfil a promise; the vœu (vow) is an engagement entered into voluntarily to the Deity himself, by which we impose on ourselves an obligation to do certain things to which we would not otherwise have been bound. J. shun kept his serment (oath) to the Gibeonites, who were pleading the deceit by means of which it was obtained. Jephthah, when it was too late, lamented his fatal vœu (vow).

see in a —. Qui n'a pas de —s, qui ne fait pas de —s, dreamless.

Syn. — SONGE, RÊVE. Songe, in its literal sense, implies a state of alumber; rêve to that limited, but is equally applicable to what are called in English day-dreams. The waking man has rêves and reason; the poetical rêve, in which cases songe could not be properly employed.

When rêve is used, like songe, to denote the thought or series of thoughts of a person in sleep, it implies vagueness, wildness, incoherence, and the absence of all probability and reason; the songe, on the other hand, is characterized by such vividness, so natural a connection between its parts, and such an appearance of reality, that it makes a deep impression on the mind. So in their figurative significations, we say of what is ridiculous or unlikely that it is a rêve; we call a thing that is merely transient, vain, or illusory, a songe.

[TEL in the first sense takes the art. before it (V. Ex. 1). In the 6th acceptance it takes no art. at all (V. Ex. 6). In the 7th sense it is always in the sing. in French (V. Ex. 7).]

Sm.—TEL, PARTI, SEMBLABLE. Of these terms of comparison, the first is stronger than the second, and the second than the third. Tel implies perfect conformity in the objects compared; pareil expresses such a close resemblance between them, that, though differing in minor points, they may be used indiscriminately; semblable denotes that, while quite distinct in nature and character, there still exists such a general likeness or analogy, that the mind involuntarily connects them together. A lion, tel que a lion, has all the fury and distinctive characteristics of that animal; pareil à a lion, he has the same degree of fierceness; semblable à a lion, he imitates its ferocity, and so on; actually that the idea of a lion suggests itself to all that behold him.
