INTRODUCTORY.

No writer approaching the eminence of Elizabeth Barrett Browning has been so little written about. Hitherto, nothing even claiming to be a biography of her has been published in her native land, whilst her works, which reveal so much of her inner self, have been attainable only in costly editions. It would almost appear as if it had been desired to retard, rather than promote, the popularity of one of England's purest as well as greatest poets.

All critical persons who have read the correspondence of Elizabeth Barrett Browning assign it a pre-eminent place in epistolary literature; yet it is only allowed to appear in fragments, without proper or responsible editorship. It is to be hoped that this injustice to the memory of a great writer will not continue much longer, because, as Mr. Browning has himself said of another great poet, "letters and poems are obviously an act of the same mind, produced by the same law, only differing in the application to the individual. . . . Letters and poems may be used indifferently as the basement of our opinion upon the writer's character; the finished expression of a sentiment in the poems giving light and significance to the rudiments of the same in the letters, and these, again, in their incipiency and unripeness, authenticating the exalted mood and re-attaching it to the personality of the writer."

Notwithstanding these pregnant words, as also Mr. Browning's uttered opinion that "it is advisable to lose no opportunity of strengthening and completing the chain of biographical testimony," the testimony to the goodness and greatness of our poetess which the publication of her literary correspondence would afford, is still withheld. Those letters of Mrs. Browning which have been published, it should be observed, do not express any repugnance to afford biographical information, but rather the reverse.

The mystery which has hitherto shrouded Mrs. Browning's personal career has caused quite a mythology to spring up around her name; and this fictitious lore the publications of those assuming to speak with authority have only increased. Miss Mitford, who saw Mrs. Browning frequently, knew her relatives intimately, and claimed to have received two letters a week from her, is utterly wrong in her biographical statements about her; Richard H. Horne, who published two volumes of Mrs. Browning's correspondence, muddles the dates almost beyond elucidation; whilst Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, who has contributed to the "Dictionary of National Biography" the most copious and authoritative memoir of Mrs. Browning extant, has, so far as biographical data are concerned, made "confusion worse confounded."

With examples so misleading, and material so restricted, neither accuracy nor substance sufficient for a volume might have been hoped for; but some past success in the paths of biography has encouraged me to place before the public what, with all its shortcomings, is the initial biography of Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.

CHAPTER I.

HOPE END.

THE Barretts were wealthy West Indian land-owners. Edward Barrett Moulton, a member of the family, assumed the additional surname of Barrett in accordance with his grandfather's will. Edward Moulton-Barrett, as he now styled himself, had not attained his majority when he married Mary, daughter of J. Graham Clarke, at that time residing at Fenham Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne. Of Mrs. Moulton-Barrett our records are scanty; it is known that she was several years older than her husband, and that, despite their disparity in age, she was tenderly loved by him.

In 1809 the Barretts were residing in London; and in that city, on Saturday, the 4th of March, their daughter, Elizabeth Barrett Barrett, is believed to have been born.<sup>1</sup>

Soon after the birth of their daughter the Barretts removed to Hope End, near Ledbury, Herefordshire. Hope End, an estate recently acquired by Mr. Barrett, had previously been the country seat of Sir Henry Vane Tempest, and was not unnoted for the beauty of its situation. It was located in a retired valley, a few miles distant from the Malvern Hills, and the Rev. J. Barrett, in a description he gave of the place some years previous to the birth of Elizabeth, says :—

“It is nearly surrounded by small eminences, and therefore does not command any distant prospect, except to the southward, nor is that very extensive ; but this defect is compensated by the various and beautiful scenery that immediately surrounds this secluded residence. In front of the house are some fine pieces of water ; on their banks are planted a variety of shrubs and evergreens, which, in conjunction with the water, look very ornamental. The Deer Park,” says the reverend gentleman in the pedantic phraseology of the period, “lies on the ascent of the contiguous eminences, whose projecting parts and bending declivities, modelled by nature, display much beauty. It contains an elegant profusion of wood, disposed in the most careless yet pleasing order. Much of the Park and its scenery is in view from the house, where it presents a very agreeable appearance."

The residence belonging to this charming estate was modern, and in keeping with the grounds; but it was not of sufficient grandeur to suit the semi-tropical tastes of its new proprietor. Mr. Barrett had the house pulled down and on its site erected an Oriental-looking structure, bedecked with "Turkish" windows and turrets.

A large family of sons and daughters sprang up rapidly around the wealthy West Indian, and the quaint residence and its pleasant environments re-echoed daily to the prattle of little tongues and the patter of little feet. Foremost of the band was Elizabeth. She was her father's favorite child; and he, who was proud of her intelligence, spared no pains to cultivate it. Although one of a large family, and presumably the sharer in the sports of her brothers and sisters, she appears to have been fond of solitude and solitary amusements. She was allowed a little room to herself, and thus describes it:—

"I had a little chamber in the house
As green as any privet-hedge a bird Might choose to build in. . . .

The walls

Were green, the carpet was pure green, the strait
 Small bed was curtained greenly, and the folds Hung green about the window, which let in
 The out-door world with all its greenery.
 You could not push your head out and escape
 A dash of dawn-dew from the honeysuckle."

A member of Mr. Barrett's family, who is said to remember Hope End as it was in those days, speaks of "Elizabeth's room" as a lofty chamber with a stained-glass window casting lights across the floor, and upon little Elizabeth as she used to sit propped against the wall, with her hair falling all about her face, — a childlike, fairy figure. "Aurora Leigh's" recollections, however, are probably accurate, and it may be assumed that her record of childish rambles in the early summer mornings when she would —

"Slip downstairs through all the sleepy house
 As mute as any dream then, and escape
 As a soul from the body, out of doors,
 Glide through the shrubberies, drop into the lane,
 And wander on the hills an hour or two,
 Then back again before the house should stir," — faithfully represents little Elizabeth's own doings.

Of Hope End and the surrounding scenery "Aurora Leigh" furnishes many glimpses; but whether the heroine's father, "who was an austere Englishman," who taught his little daughter Latin and Greek himself, is intended for Mr. Barrett, is more than doubtful. Indulgent as her father was in some things, he was sternly despotic in others; and although as she grew up Elizabeth evidently revered him, it is certain that he would never allow himself to be thwarted. There is evidence that the gentle wife, who flits like a colorless spirit across the early life-track of her celebrated child, had often to soothe the anger of the wealthy West Indian slave-owner against his own offspring.

Although little Elizabeth found some things "as dull as grammar on an eve of holiday," as a rule she took more kindly to grammars than children of her age generally do. At nine—she herself is the authority—the only thing the mystic number nine suggested to the little girl was that the Greeks had spent nine years in besieging Ilium! Pity for her lost childhood's pleasures rather than admiration for her precocity would arise, were it not palpable that infant necessity for play caused her to mingle frolic with her classical endowments. In the poem of "Hector in the Garden," Elizabeth Barrett tells that a device for amusement she invented when she was only nine years old was to cut out with a spade a huge giant of turf and, laying it down prostrate in the garden, style the creation of her childish fancy "Hector, son of Priam." Then, she says, —

"With my rake I smoothed his brow, Both his cheeks I weeded through."

Then she made her plaything —

"Eyes of gentianellas azure,
Staring, winking at the skies:
Nose of gillyflowers and box;
Scented grasses put for locks,
Which a little breeze at pleasure
Set a waving round his eyes.

"Brazen helm of daffodillies,
With a glitter toward the light;
Purple violets for the mouth,
Breathing perfumes west and south;
And a sword of flashing lilies,
Holden ready for the fight.

"And a breastplate made of daisies,
Closely fitting, leaf on leaf;
Periwinkles interlaced,
Drawn for belt about the waist;
While the brown bees, humming praises,
Shot their arrows round the chief."

Even at this tender age the little girl began to write verses, and dream of becoming a poet. She said,—

“I wrote versēs, as I dare say many have done who never wrote any poems, very early,—at eight years old and earlier. . . . I could make you laugh by the narrative of nascent odes, epics, and didactics, crying aloud on obsolete Muses from childish lips. The Greeks were my demi-gods, and haunted me out of Pope’s Homer, until I dreamt more of Agamemnon than of ‘Moses,’ the black pony.”

The result of this was an “epic” on “The Battle of Marathon.” The composition was completed before its author was eleven, and Mr. Barrett was so proud of the production that he had fifty copies of it printed and distributed. The little booklet, consisting of seventy-two pages, was dedicated to her father, from “Hope End, 1819.” “The Battle of Marathon” is divided into four books, and is truly described by its author as “Pope’s Homer done over again, or rather undone; for, although a curious production for a child, it gives evidence only of an imitative faculty and an ear, and a good deal of reading in a peculiar direction.”

“The love of Pope’s Homer threw me into Pope on one side, and Greek on the other, and into Latin as a help to Greek,” is her own record of this period of her life, contradicting the legend of her reading Homer in the original at eight years old. About the time of the grand epic, a cousin of Elizabeth was wont to pay visits to Hope End, where their grandmother, says Mrs. Ritchie, "would also come and stay. The old lady did not approve of these readings and writings, and used to say she would rather see Elizabeth's hemming more carefully finished off than hear of all this Greek."

Mr. Barrett evidently differed from the old lady in this respect, and encouraged his daughter both in her studies and her writings. In some of her earliest known verses, inscribed to him, Elizabeth says:—

"Neath thy gentleness of praise,
My Father, rose my early lays!
And when the lyre was scarce awake,
I lov'd its strings for thy lov'd sake;
Woo'd the kind Muses, but the while Thought only how to win thy smile,—
My proudest fame, my dearest pride,
More dear than all the world beside!"

Mrs. Barrett, who was still living when these lines were written, doubtless divided her affections more equally among her many little sons and daughters than did her husband; what with continuous ill health and a constant succession of children, she had something else to think of than "The Battle of Marathon," or "Hector, son of Priam." In those days it was the father's praise that sounded sweet to the little author's ears; in after life, when too late, a lost mother's love was more often the first thought of her verse.

The principal sharer of Elizabeth's childish amusements was her brother Edward. There was little more than a year's difference in age between them, and as he was, by all accounts, a suitable companion for her in both study and frolic, it was but natural that they should regard each other with intense affection. Alluding to the pet-name by which she was known in the family circle, she says:—

“ My brother gave that name to me
 When we were children twain,
 When names acquired baptismally
 Were hard to utter, as to see
 That life had any pain.”

In her earliest volume of poems, published in 1826, Elizabeth included “Verses to my Brother,” introduced by the quotation from “Lycidas,” “For we were nurs'd upon the self-same hill.” She addressed him as “Belov'd and best . . . my Brother! dearest, kindest as thou art!” adding:—

“ Together have we past our infant hours,
 Together sported childhood's spring away,

Together cull'd young Hope's fast budding flowers,
To wreath the forehead of each coming day!

“And when the laughing mood was nearly o'er,
Together, many a minute did we wile
On Horace' page, or Maro's sweeter lore;
While one young critic, on the classic style,
Would sagely try to frown, and make the other smile.”

Surrounded by happy children, companioned by a beloved brother, encouraged in her pursuits by a proud father, supplied by all that wealth could procure, it is easy to imagine that Elizabeth's early life was a happy one. Her greatest pleasure was apparently derived from reading. “I read,” she said, “books bad and good,” anything, in fact, in the shape of a book that could be got hold of.

Neither her indiscriminate and extensive reading, nor her close application to study, prevented her joining in pursuits suitable to her age and position. Riding and driving were among her amusements; and Mrs. Ritchie relates:—

“One day, when Elizabeth was about fifteen, the young girl, impatient for her ride, tried to saddle her pony alone, in a field, and fell with the saddle upon her, in some way injuring her spine so seriously that she was for years upon her back.”

That Elizabeth was an invalid for many years is certain, as it also is that to the end of her life she remained in delicate health; but although she remarked that at fifteen she nearly died, she attributed the origin of her illness to a cough; "a common cough," she said, "striking on an insubstantial frame, began my bodily troubles." Be the cause of her delicacy what it may, confinement and ill health only increased her passion for reading.

About this epoch in her life came to pass an event that must be regarded as one that influenced Elizabeth's future as largely as anything in her career. Her father obtained an introduction for her to the well-known Greek scholar, Hugh Stuart Boyd. Mr. Boyd, although blind, was a profound student of Hellenic literature, and an accomplished author. Under his friendly tuition the eager girl drank deep draughts of Grecian lore, and acquired a knowledge of its less studied branches that stood her in good stead in after days. In her poem on "Wine of Cyprus," addressed by her to this dear friend, she proves, by the happiness of her allusions and the condensation of character, how thoroughly she had grasped the most salient features of Greek literature: her poem is at once a proof of her capacity to acquire, and her friend's to instruct. Some of the stanzas are charming reminiscences of these early days :—

“ And I think of those long mornings
Which my thought goes far to seek,
When, betwixt the folio’s turnings,
Solemn flowed the rhythmic Greek.
Past the pane, the mountain spreading,
Swept the sheep-bell’s tinkling noise,
While a girlish voice was reading,
Somewhat low for ai’s and oi’s !

“ Then what golden hours were for us,
While we sat together there !
How the white vests of the chorus
Seemed to wave us a live air !
How the cothurns trod majestic
Down the deep iambic lines ;
And the rolling anapæstic
Curled, like vapor over shrines !

“ For we sometimes gently wrangled :
Very gently, be it said,
For our thoughts were disentangled
By no breaking of the thread !
And I charged you with extortions
On the noble fames of old, —
Ay, and sometimes thought your Porsons
Stained the purple they would fold.

“ Ah, my gossip, you were older,
And more learned, and a man !
Yet that shadow — the enfolder
Of your quiet eyelids — ran

Both our spirits to one level ;
 And I turned from hill and lea
 And the summer-sun's green revel,
 To your eyes that could not see!"

Elizabeth Barrett never forgot the advantages she had derived from the patient kindness and profound learning of the blind scholar, nor did he forego friendly correspondence with his apt and able pupil in after years. She deferred often to his opinion, despite her intense independence, and allowed his somewhat eccentric course of reading to influence her own studies. In later life she addressed three sonnets to this

" Steadfast friend,
 Who never didst my heart or life misknow," — on " His Blindness," " His Death, 1848," and his " Legacies " to her, which last consisted of his

" Æschylus,
 And Gregory Nazianzen, and a clock
 Chiming the gradual hours out like a flock
 Of stars, whose motion is melodious."

" The books," she says, " were those I used to read from," thus

" Assisting my dear teacher's soul to unlock
 The darkness of his eyes : now mine they mock,

Blinded in turn, by tears : now murmurous
 Sad echoes of my young voice, years agone,
 Entoning from these leaves the Grecian phrase,
 Return and choke my utterance."

Says Elizabeth :—

"All this time we lived at Hope End, a few miles from Malvern, in a retirement scarcely broken to me except by books and my own thoughts, and it is a beautiful country, and was a retirement happy in many ways. . . . There I had my fits of Pope and Byron and Coleridge, and read Greek as hard under the trees as some of your Oxonians in the Bodleian ; gathered visions from Plato and the dramatists, and eat and drank Greek and made my head ache with it."

The young girl by practice and increasing intensity of feeling was gradually learning to become a true poet. Most of the events of her life, she said, had passed in her thoughts, and these thoughts she had continuously striven to transmute into poesy. Many youths wrote verses ; but with her, "what is less common," as she remarked, "the early fancy turned into a will, and remained with me, and from that day poetry has been a distinct object with me, — an object to read, think, and live for."

Already as early as 1825 Elizabeth Barrett had contributed fugitive verses to literary publications of the day, but now her ambition prompted her to more daring flights. Her childish lines on "The Battle of Marathon" can scarcely be taken into account in any chronicle of her literary deeds ; but a volume which she published anonymously in 1826 marks a distinct epoch in her career. It was entitled "An Essay on Mind, and Other Poems ;" and the leading piece, written in heroic verse, and extending to eighty-eight pages, is produced in view, not without some doubts as to its truth, of the utterly false dictum of Byron, that "ethical poetry is the highest of all poetry, as the highest of all earthly objects is moral truth."

The lines display no originality of thought, are in the see-saw style of the Pope school, and are not very wonderful even for a girl of seventeen ; but the "Essay" is remarkable, as has been pointed out, "for the precocious audacity with which she deals with the greatest names in the whole range of literature and science. Gibbon, Berkeley, Condillac, Plato, Bacon, Bolingbroke, all come in for treatment in the scope of the young girl's argument."

Some of Elizabeth's words in her preface, needlessly long and wordy as it is, offer a much better specimen of her prose than does the "Essay on Mind" of her poesy, and, as the first known example of her unrhymed writings may be cited from. With youthful modesty she says :—

“I wish that the sublime circuit of intellect embraced by the plan of my poem had fallen to the lot of a spirit more powerful than mine. I wish it had fallen to the lot of one more familiar with the dwelling-place of mind, who could search her secret chambers and call forth those that sleep ; or of one who could enter into her temples, and cast out the iniquitous who buy and sell, profaning the sanctuary of God ; or of one who could try the golden links of that chain which hangs from heaven to earth, and show that it is not placed there for man to covet for lucre’s sake, or for him to weigh his puny strength at one end against Omnipotence at the other ; but that it is placed there to join, in mysterious union, the natural and the spiritual, the mortal and the eternal, the creature and the Creator. I wish the subject of my poem had fallen into such hands that the powers of the execution might have equalled the vastness of the design— and the public will wish so too. But as it is, though I desire this field to be more meritoriously occupied by others, I would mitigate the voice of censure for myself. I would endeavor to show that while I may have often erred, I have not clung willingly to error ; and that while I may have failed in representing, I have never ceased to love, Truth. If there be much to condemn in the following pages, let my narrow capacity, as opposed to the infinite object it would embrace, be generously considered ; if there be anything to approve, I am ready to acknowledge the assistance which my illustrations have received from the exalting nature of their subject, — as the waters of Halys acquire a peculiar taste from the soil over which they flow.”

Besides the “Essay on Mind,” preface, analyses, and notes, the little book contained fourteen short pieces pretty equally divided between Byronic and domestic themes. While none of these verses gave cause to believe in the advent of a great poetess, some of them, notably those beginning “Mine is a wayward lay,” were skilfully handled, and were not barren of felicitous turns of thought.

Reverting to the more personal history of the young poetess, we arrive at what may be deemed the first, and probably the greatest, real trouble she ever had to endure. For some time past Mrs. Barrett had had a continuance of ill health, and eventually, on the 1st of October, 1828, she died, at the comparatively early age of forty-eight. Elizabeth, herself an invalid, was left by her mother’s death not only the chief consoler of her widowed father, but to some extent the guardian and guide of her seven brothers and sisters.

How Elizabeth managed to bear her grief, or what part she took in household affairs, are mysteries which have not been revealed ; but she continued to seek consolation for human trouble, and an outlet for her ambition, — for ambitious she was, — in beloved Poesy. For a time, apparently, she was sent to France to pursue her studies, and contracted at least one strong friendship there ; but neither her words nor works evince that any strong imprint was made on her mind by that stay on French soil.

Storm-clouds were gathering at home, and Elizabeth's influence was wanted to soothe, and her companionship to cheer, her father. As a West Indian proprietor, his chief wealth was naturally derived from slave labor. The voice of the British people had gradually been growing louder and stronger against slavery, and finally, guided by Wilberforce and his compatriots, demanded its abolition. Emancipation, after a long and weary fight, was at last obtained ; and though still shackled by certain galling restrictions, the fiat went forth that henceforth unpaid compulsory labor should cease. Liberty for slaves in many instances meant ruin or, at the best, heavy pecuniary loss for their late owners. On Jamaica the blow fell with peculiar force, and the Barretts naturally felt the shock. Mr. Edward Moulton-Barrett's fortune appears to have been very largely affected by Emancipation, and one of the chief results of his diminished income would appear to have been the relinquishment of the Hope End establishment.

The place where so many happy days had been spent, so many fond dreams born and nourished, so many loving ties formed, had to be left. "Do you know the Malvern Hills, — the hills of "Piers Ploughman's Visions?" wrote Elizabeth in later years; "they seem to me my native hills, for I was an infant when I went first into their neighborhood, and lived there until I had passed twenty by several years. Beautiful, beautiful hills they are; and yet not for the whole world's beauty would I stand in the sunshine and shadow of them any more. It would be a mockery, like the taking back of a broken flower to its stalk."

CHAPTER II.

WOMANHOOD.

FROM Hope End the Barretts removed to Sidmouth, and resided there for two years. Nothing is known of the family doings during that time, save the publication, in 1833, of Elizabeth's second volume. This book was entitled "Prometheus Bound, translated from the Greek of Æschylus, and Miscellaneous Poems," and was issued as by the author of "An Essay on Mind." That author's own account is that her translation "was written in twelve days, and should have been thrown into the fire afterwards, — the only means of giving it a little warmth."

Miss Barrett's judgment on her own work is perhaps somewhat too sweeping; but as she not only replaced it in after life by a more mature version, but desired the earlier attempt should be consigned to oblivion, there can be no incentive to drag it into daylight again. All the copies not issued, she says, "are safely locked up in the wardrobe of papa's bedroom, entombed as safely as Œdipus among the olives."

“A few of the fugitive poems connected with that translation,” she added, “may be worth a little, perhaps; but they have not so much goodness as to overcome the badness of the blasphemy of Æschylus.”

Some of the fugitive pieces thus carelessly referred to are, indeed, worth something more than a little. The initial poem, styled “The Tempest: A Fragment,” not only suggests a tale of intense horror, but contains lines as grand, sonorous, and truly poetic as any blank verse Elizabeth Barrett ever published.

Several other short pieces in the 1833 volume are well worthy republication; as a reviewer has said they are, “for the most part, in no sense immature, or unworthy of the genius of the writer,” and certainly are equally good with many of those poems given in her collected works. There are some grand thoughts in “A Sea-side Meditation,” “A Vision of Life and Death,” “Earth;” and others in the volume are well worthy their author’s name, and very different from the general juvenilia of even eminent poets. There is sustained pathos, albeit bitter irony, in the lines, “To a Poet’s Child,” — presumably Ada Byron, — whilst none of the pieces are commonplace or devoid of some traces of their author’s peculiar originality and genius.

The lines "To Victoire, on her Marriage," unless totally different from all Elizabeth Barrett's personal poems, in being pure imagination instead of a record of real life, refer to a certain period of her life spent in France. There are not wanting proofs that Elizabeth Barrett proposed to republish, with revision, some of the poems, at least, of this volume of her early womanhood, as she did, indeed, still earlier but less meritorious pieces.

After two years' residence in Devonshire the Barretts removed to London, where Mr. Barrett took a house at 74 Gloucester Place. After the pure country air and invigorating sea-breezes, the change was naturally a trying one for all the household, but more especially did it affect Elizabeth. Her health for years past had been delicate, — as she said herself, at fifteen she nearly died, — and now it gave way entirely. Instead of rambling about Devonshire lanes, or gazing upon the varying ocean, she sat and watched the sun

"Push out through fog with his dilated disk
 And startle the slant roofs and chimney pots
 With splashes of fierce color. Or I saw Fog only, the great tawny weltering fog,
 Involve the passive city, strangle it
 Alive, and draw it off into the void, —
 Spires, bridges, streets and squares, as if a sponge
 Had wiped out London."

Notwithstanding, or rather because of, her want of health, Elizabeth devoted herself more and more to poesy. She no longer contented herself with the composition of poems, but began to send them for publication to contemporary periodicals. Chief among the friends outside her own immediate family circle whom she saw was John Kenyon, a distant relative. Mr. Kenyon, West Indian by birth, but European by education and choice, being in possession of ample means, was enabled to select his own method of living. Fond of literary and artistic society, and a dabbler in verse himself, he devoted his time to entertaining and being entertained by the makers of pictures and poems. Crabb Robinson, who knew everybody of his time worth knowing, describes Kenyon as having the face of a Benedictine monk and the joyous talk of a good fellow. He delights, he says, in seeing at his hospitable table every variety of literary notabilities, and was popularly styled the "feeder of lions." Coleridge, Wordsworth, and most of the best, as well as best known, literary folk of the day were among Kenyon's most intimate associates; and it was one among the many pleasant traits of his character to seek to introduce and make acquainted with each other such celebrities as he knew himself.

Such was Kenyon, whom it delighted Elizabeth Barrett to call "cousin," and to whom she naturally turned for advice in literary matters.

It was Kenyon who introduced the young poetess to most of her earliest literary friends, and he was the means of getting her poems accepted and works noticed by the chief literary journals of the day.. Many of her earlier poems have, doubtless, been lost sight of altogether, not so much on account of their unworthiness as through their author's carelessness or forgetfulness of their existence.

"The Romaunt of Margret," which appeared in the July part of the "New Monthly Magazine," was a great advance upon everything the poetess had as yet published, and was well calculated to enhance her reputation, not only among those few literary acquaintances who began to proclaim her as a rising star, but also with the outside public. This fine ballad is based upon the idea which permeates so many literatures, and has excited the imagination of so many great poets, of the possibility of man's dual nature; upon the possibility of a mortal being enabled, generally just before death, to behold the double or duplicate of himself.

Although here and there somewhat misty in the filling up, as are, indeed, many of her later poems, the "Romaunt" is worthy of its author's most matured powers. It has that weird, pathetic, indescribable glamour often found pervading the older ballads, but rarely discoverable in those of modern date, and is noteworthy as being the earliest known specimen of Miss Barrett's use of the refrain, a metrical, euphonic adornment which Elizabeth Barrett, as well as her contemporary Edgar Poe, doubtless adopted from, or rather had suggested to them by, Tennyson's resuscitation of it.

During May of this year Miss Barrett formed the acquaintance of Mary Russell Mitford, whose friendship and advice had no little influence on her future literary career. Miss Mitford, being up in London on a visit, was taken by her friend Kenyon sight-seeing; on the way they called at Gloucester Place, and after much persuasion induced Miss Barrett to go out with them. Miss Mitford described her as "a sweet young woman who reads Greek as I do French, and has published some translations from Æschylus, and some most striking poems. She is a delightful young creature, shy and timid and modest."

The day following Miss Mitford dined at Kenyon's, and there met several notabilities, including Wordsworth, described as "an adorable old man," Landor, "as splendid a person as

Mr. Kenyon, but not so full of sweetness and sympathy," and chief of all, "the charming Miss Barrett," who, so Miss Mitford wrote home, "has translated the most difficult of the Greek plays — the 'Prometheus Bound' — and written most exquisite poems in almost every style. She is so sweet and gentle, and so pretty, that one looks at her as if she were some bright flower." Again, Miss Mitford describes her as being at this time "of a slight, delicate figure, with a shower of dark curls falling on either side of a most expressive face, large, tender eyes, richly fringed by dark eyelashes, a smile like a sun-beam, and such a look of youthfulness that I had some difficulty in persuading a friend that the translatrix of Æschylus, the author of the 'Essay on Mind,' was, in technical language, 'out.'"

To another friend Miss Mitford described Miss Barrett as

"A slight, girlish figure, very delicate, with exquisite hands and feet, a round face with a most noble forehead, a large mouth, beautifully formed and full of expression, lips like parted coral, teeth large, regular, and glittering with healthy whiteness, large, dark eyes, with such eyelashes, resting on the cheek when cast down, when turned upwards touching the flexible and expressive eyebrow, a dark complexion, literally as bright as the dark china rose, a profusion of silky, dark curls, and a look of youth and of modesty hardly to be expressed. This, added to the very simple but graceful and costly dress by which all the family are distinguished, is an exact portrait of her."

Once introduced to each other, the acquaintance-ship between the two authoresses grew rapidly. "I saw much of her during my stay in town," writes Miss Mitford. "We met so constantly and so familiarly that in spite of the difference of age, intimacy ripened into friendship, and after my return into the country we corresponded freely and frequently, her letters being just what letters ought to be, — her own talk put upon paper."

No sooner had Miss Mitford returned home to the companionship of her idolized but extremely undeserving father, than she commenced a constant and voluminous correspondence with her new friend Elizabeth Barrett, confiding all her troubles to her, in return being made acquainted with the young poetess's aspirations and achievements. The first letter from the elder correspondent, soon after her return home, was entrusted for delivery, with some flowers, to Henry Chorley, an author and influential critic, "who, if he have the good luck to be let in, as I hope he may," says Miss Mitford, "will tell you all about our doings. . . . To be sure, I will come and see you when next I visit London, and I shall feel to know you better when I have had the pleasure of being introduced to Mr. Barrett, to be better authorized to love you, and to take a pride in your successes, — things which, at present, I take the liberty of doing without authority." Some not altogether needless advice to her young friend on the fault of obscurity wound up the epistle.

A few weeks later Miss Mitford returned to the charge, saying,—

"You should take my venturing to criticise your verses as a proof of the perfect truth of my praise. I do not think there can be a better test of the sincerity of the applause than the venturing to blame. It is also the fault, the one single fault (obscurity) found by persons more accustomed to judge of poetry than myself, — by Mr. Dilke, for instance (proprietor of the 'Athenæum'), and Mr. Chorley (one of its principal writers). Charles Kemble once said to me, with regard to the drama, 'Think of the stupidest person of your acquaintance, and when you have made your play so clear that you are sure that he would comprehend it, then you may venture to hope that it will be understood by your audience.' And really I think the rule will hold good with regard to poetry in general."

Happily, Miss Barrett did not try to bring her poetry down to the level of the stupidest person's comprehension, and although she never did free it from occasional obscurity, fortunately it never came within the category of "poetry in general."

In October Miss Barrett contributed to the pages of the "New Monthly Magazine" her lengthy ballad of "The Poet's Vow." It certainly justified Miss Mitford's hint that, though prepared to love ballads, she was "a little biassed in favor of great directness and simplicity." The poem, after opening with allusions to the duality of most mundane things, proceeds to recount, more or less directly, how a poet chose to forego all human intercourse. He gave away his worldly goods and spurned his bride expectant, in the hope, apparently, that by casting off the trammels of human sympathy he might escape the woes Adam had entailed upon the human race. To comprehend the nature of the vow and its result the poem must be read in its entirety.

"The Poet's Vow" is not only a beautiful poem, but is also one of the most characteristic and representative Elizabeth Barrett ever wrote. It has not the grasp of character of "Aurora Leigh," nor the gush and glow of passion which flows through the melody of "Lady Geraldine's Courtship;" but it has a mournful weirdness that haunts the memory long after the words of it have been forgotten. That no sane man could make such a vow, nor that making could keep it, is beside the question; the problem being one in every respect suitable for a poet to grapple with.

Poems of the mystical nature of the two last referred to were scarcely the class of writing to prove attractive to the clear-minded, somewhat conventional, kindly-hearted Miss Mitford, Miss Barrett's chief correspondent. From time to time in the course of her chatty epistles she cautions her young friend against lapses into obscurity, bidding her write "poems of human feeling and human action." Such warnings could not have hindered Elizabeth Barrett at any time from writing as she felt, but they may have caused her to feel occasionally that the human element should not be quite overshadowed by the psychological. Sometimes when she turned her thoughts to incidents of her daily life, she wrote with a simplicity and pathetic tenderness as unparalleled in their way as were her spiritualistic speculations in theirs. One such poem as these, entitled "My Doves," refers to a pair of doves recently sent to her from the tropics as a present. She wrote to Miss Mitford:—

" My little doves were ta'en away
From that glad nest of theirs,

Across an ocean rolling grey,
And tempest-clouded airs ;
My little doves, who lately knew
The sky and wave by warmth and blue.

“ And now, within the city prison,
In mist and chillness pent,
With sudden upward look they listen
For sounds of past content,
For lapse of water, swell of breeze,
Or nut-fruit falling from the trees.”

The doves formed quite a topic for the two authoresses to dilate upon. Miss Mitford considered that when she said that her father was quite charmed with Miss Barrett's account of the little brown birdies, she had, indeed, awarded high honor, and when she heard that they had so far grown accustomed to the strangeness of their new habitation as to build a nest and lay their eggs therein, she sent her love to them, with the hope that the eggs might be good. “It would be such a delight to you,” she wrote, “to help the parent birds to bring up their young.”

A few months after this incident Miss Barrett had a very different theme to write upon, and upon it she wrote in hot haste. William the Fourth died on June 20, 1837, and on July 1st the “Athenæum” contained a poem on “The Young Queen,” by E. B. B.

Why this poem, so characteristic of its author, should not have been included in her "Collected Works," where several earlier and less worthy pieces are given, it is difficult to say; but it is still less easy to comprehend what principle or plan has guided the editor's selection when we find excluded from the collection Miss Barrett's next production, "Victoria's Tears," a poem even finer than "The Young Queen," published the week following in the "Athenæum;" one quatrain of this poem has become quite a standard quotation:—

" They decked her courtly halls —
 They reined her hundred steeds —
 They shouted at her palace gates
 ' A noble Queen succeeds ! ' "

About 1837 a publication entitled "Finden's Tableaux of National Character, Beauty, and Costume," was started by W. and E. Finden. It was to be issued in fifteen monthly parts, each part to contain four plates, "designed and engraved by the most eminent artists," and "original tales and poems by some of the most distinguished authors of the day." Mrs. S. C. Hall undertook the editorship of the new publication, and obtained the assistance of several well-known writers as contributors. The illustrations were of that ultra-sentimental type which adorned fashionable annuals of fifty years ago; and although they would not in any way satisfy the more critical taste of the present time, were thought very highly of in those days. Instead of the illustrations being made to illustrate the text, writers had to manufacture, and generally in hot haste, poetry and prose to elucidate or accompany the illustrations. This system, unfortunately not yet abolished, was ruinous as a rule to the production of anything of permanent value; and yet, for various reasons, many truly high-class authors submitted to its tyranny. Elizabeth Barrett, strange to say, was one of those who did not deem it prostrating her talents to patch up pieces to accompany these pictorial shams, and for "Finden's Tableaux" wrote the introductory poem of "The Dream." The peg upon which she hung her lines was the picture of a chubby Cupid, surrounded by such conventional emblems as one would expect to see decorating a valentine. That her stanzas were unequal — that some of them were unworthy of their authoress — is not surprising, and the only matter for wonder is that she could have been persuaded into doing such hack work.

For the third number of the "Tableaux," to accompany one of these commonplace pictures, Miss Barrett wrote her ballad, "The Romaunt of the Page." The subscribers to the five-shillings part must, if they were intellectually capable of appreciating it, have been surprised at the power, originality, and beauty of the poem thus given to them.

Notwithstanding many defects, partly due to the nature of her inspiration, "The Romaunt of the Page," although not to be included among her finest poems, will always be a favorite one with Elizabeth Barrett's readers, because it is free from metaphysical obscurity and deals directly with the "human feeling and human action" Miss Mitford had so wisely recommended her to resort to as theme for her poesy. This same experienced counsellor, who had succeeded Mrs. Hall in the editorship of the "Tableaux," writing to her young correspondent on the 28th of June, says:—

MY SWEET LOVE, — I want you to write me a poem in illustration of a very charming group of Hindoo girls floating their lamps upon the Ganges, — launching them, I should say. You know that pretty superstition. I want a poem in stanzas. It must be long enough for two pages, and may be as much longer as you choose. It is for "Finden's Tableaux," of which I have undertaken the editorship; and I must entreat it within a fortnight or three weeks, if possible, because I am limited to time, and have only till the end of next month to send up the whole copy cut and dry. I do entreat you, my sweet young friend, not to refuse me this favor. I could not think of going to press without your assistance, and have chosen for you the very prettiest subject, and, I think, the prettiest plate of the whole twelve. I am quite sure that if you favor me with a poem, it will be the gem of the collection.

To these highly complimentary expressions Miss Mitford added that the proprietor had given her thirty pounds —

“That is to say, five pounds each for my six poets (I am to do all the prose and dramatic scenes myself); and with his five pounds . . . I shall have the honor of sending a copy of the work, which will be all the prettier and more valuable for your assistance. . . . If you can give me time and thought enough to write one of those ballad stories, it would give an inexpressible grace and value to my volume. Depend upon it, the time will come when those verses of yours will have a money value.”

Miss Barrett agreed to write the required verses, not, it may be assumed, for the money value, whatever may have been her motive. The “prettiest plate,” according to the dexterous editorial description, was as commonplace and conventional an engraving as one could meet with, even in those days, depicting a group of Hindoo girls, or rather women, following the traditional custom of testing their lovers' fidelity by launching little lamps fixed in cocoa-shells down the Ganges. If the lover were faithful the symbol boat floated away safely down the river; but if otherwise, the tiny token quickly disappeared. That "The Romance of the Ganges" was better than the usual run of such "plate" versification may be granted; but notwithstanding the fact that it is — as was all she wrote at this period of her life — replete with Miss Barrett's idiosyncrasies, it is a poor specimen of her skill, and scarcely worthy of the warm praise lavished on it by Miss Mitford.

Whilst the editor was writing all sorts of laudatory things to and of her favorite contributor, "the most remarkable person now alive," and of her ballad, "The Romaunt of the Page," as "one of the most charming poems ever written," that contributor's life seemed hanging by a thread. At the very time that Miss Mitford was describing Elizabeth Barrett as "a young and lovely woman, who lives the life of a hermitess in Gloucester Place . . . and who passes her life in teaching her younger brothers Greek," that very person was suffering from what looked like a mortal illness. Whether she had broken a blood-vessel on the lungs, as is frequently stated, is problematical; but at any rate her lungs were affected, and her life, which had so long appeared waning, seemed about to flicker out. Notwithstanding the many poems she continued to write, and the long hours of study she contrived to undergo, nothing but her mind appeared to live ; her body was almost helpless.

At this time, also, occurred a domestic affliction to rack the invalid's mind. It was the death of her uncle, the only brother of Mr. Edward Moulton Barrett, and who was, says Elizabeth, "in past times more than an uncle to me." As he died childless, the whole of his considerable property devolved, it is believed, upon his brother and his brother's family.

In the letter Miss Barrett wrote to Miss Mitford, informing her of her uncle's death, alluding to her own delicate health, she remarked : "The turning to spring is always trying, I believe, to affections such as mine, and my strength flags a good deal, and the cough very little ; but Dr. Chambers speaks so encouragingly of the probable effect of the coming warm weather, that I take courage and his medicines at the same time, and to 'preserve the harmonies,' and satisfy some curiosity, have been reading Garth's 'Dispensary,' a poem very worthy of its subject."

Unfortunately, the hopes which Dr. Chambers endeavored to inspire his patient with were vain. The warm weather was so long in coming that year (1838) that even in the middle of May Miss Mitford wrote, bitterly, that it seemed as if it would never come. Shortly before that letter from Miss Mitford, Miss Barrett said to her, "Our house in Wimpole Street is not yet finished, but we hope to see the beginning of April in it. You must not think I am very bad, only not very brisk, and really feeling more comfortable than I did a fortnight since." The improvement foreshadowed, if not imaginary, was certainly not permanent. Miss Barrett continued bodily ill, although her mental vigor never faltered. In the midst of her ailments she prepared a collection of her poems, and arranged for their publication. Writing to Miss Mitford, to thank her for some encouraging words, she tells her the projected volume will include "a principal poem called the 'Seraphim,' which is rather a dramatic lyric than a lyrical drama." "I can hardly hope that you will thoroughly like it," is her comment; "but know well that you will try to do so. Other poems, longer or shorter, will make up the volume, not a word of which is yet printed."

Why Miss Barrett feared that her friend would not be altogether satisfied with the chief poem in her volume will readily be understood by those acquainted with Miss Mitford's ideas on the treatment of "sacred" themes. The preface was, in all probability, written with a view of combating just such objections as those of her way of thinking were likely to put forward. The preface states :—

"The subject of the principal poem in the present collection having suggested itself to me, though very faintly and imperfectly, when I was engaged upon my translation of the 'Prometheus Bound' . . . I thought that had Æschylus lived after the incarnation and crucifixion of our Lord Jesus Christ, he might have turned, if not in moral and intellectual, yet in poetic, faith from the solitude of Caucasus to the deeper desertness of that crowded Jerusalem, where none had any pity ; from the 'faded white flower' of the Titanic brow to the 'withered grass' of a Heart trampled on by its own beloved ; from the glorying of him who gloried that he could not die, to the sublime meekness of the taster of death for every man ; from the taunt stung into being by the torment, to His more awful silence, when the agony stood dumb before the love ! . . . But if my dream be true that Æschylus might have turned to the subject before us, in poetic instinct, and if in such a case . . . its terror and its pathos would have shattered into weakness the strong Greek tongue, and caused the conscious chorus to tremble round the thymele, how much more may I turn from it, in the instinct of incompetence! . . . I have written no work, but a suggestion . . . I have felt in the midst of my own thoughts upon my own theme, like Homer's 'Children in a Battle.'

"The agents in this poem are those mystic beings who are designated in Scripture the Seraphim. . . . I have endeavored to mark in my two Seraphic personages, distinctly and predominantly, that shrinking from and repugnance to evil which, in my weaker Seraph, is expressed by fear, and in my stronger one by a more complex passion. . . . To recoil from evil is according to the stature of an angel; to subdue it is according to the infinitude of a God."

If the leading poem of her book failed to make the impression on her readers Miss Barrett desired, it was neither owing to her want of the requisite learning, nor the poetic power to deal with her abstruse theme, but rather that the public preferred to abstract spiritualities such poems as Miss Mitford described, — "poems of human feeling and human action." With respect to the other shorter pieces in her book, the authoress claimed that though if her life were prolonged she would hope to write better verses hereafter, she could never feel more intensely than at that moment "the sublime uses of poetry and the solemn responsibilities of the poet." When it is considered that among the poems thus referred to were, besides those already spoken of, such examples of her genius as "Isobel's Child," "The Deserted Garden," "Cowper's Grave," and others equally representative of her various moods, and all now become permanent glories of our language and literature, the intensity of Elizabeth Barrett's feelings in their production will not be doubted for a moment by any one having belief in the "sublime uses" of her art, and in "the solemn responsibilities" alluded to by their architect.

CHAPTER III.

TORQUAY.

TOWARDS the autumn of 1838 Miss Barrett's condition grew critical. Almost as a last resource Dr. Chambers, her medical adviser, recommended her removal to a warmer situation than London. Whilst on the one hand it was feared she could not survive the winter in the metropolis, on the other a long journey was hazardous. Ultimately, in preference to trying a foreign climate, it was decided to risk a move as far as Torquay; and her brother Edward, a brother, as Miss Mitford says, "in heart and in talent worthy of such a sister," constituted himself her guardian. Miss Barrett herself said that her beloved brother meant to fold her in a cloak and carry her in his arms.

The journey to Torquay was accomplished in safety. Comfortable apartments, with a fine view of the bay, were obtained at the lower end of Brecon Terrace. At first the mild breezes of the south coast appeared to exercise a beneficial effect upon the invalid, and she was enabled to continue her correspondence with literary friends, especially with Miss Mitford. That lady writes on November 5, "My beloved Miss Barrett is better. . . . If she be spared to the world and should, as she probably will, treat of such subjects as afford room for passion and action, you will see her passing all women and most men, as a narrative or dramatic poet. After all," she adds, "she is herself in her modesty, her sweetness, and her affectionate warmth of heart, by very far more wonderful than her writings, extraordinary as they are." A few days after these eulogistic lines their writer received a letter from the subject of them, in which she remarks, "Whenever I forget to notice any kindness of yours, do believe, my beloved friend, that I have, notwithstanding, marked the date of it with a white stone, and also with a heart not of stone." Referring then to some precious seedlings which Miss Mitford from her own luxuriant little floral realm had sent her, she adds : —

"You said, 'Distribute the seeds as you please;' so, mindful of 'those of my own household,' I gave Sept. and Occy. [Septimus and Octavius, her youngest brothers] leave to extract a few very carefully for their garden, composed of divers flower-pots and green boxes a-gasping for sun and air from the leads behind our house, and giving the gardeners fair excuse for an occasional coveted colloquy with a great chief gardener in the Regent's Park. Yes, and out of a certain precious packet inscribed — as Arabel [her sister Arabella] described it to me — from Mr. Wordsworth — I desired her to reserve some for my very own self; because, you see, if it should please God to permit my return to London, I mean ('pway don't waugh,' as Ibbit says, when she has been saying something irresistibly ridiculous) — I mean to have a garden too — a whole flower-pot to myself — in the window of my particular sitting-room; and then it will be hard indeed if, while the flowers grow from those seeds, thoughts of you and the great poet may not grow from them besides."

A page or two more of such innocent chatter follows, and would seem to imply that the invalid's case was not deemed so hopeless, at least by herself, as had been imagined. Turning to more personal affairs, Miss Barrett says: —

"My beloved father has gone away; he was obliged to go two days ago, and took away with him, I fear, almost as saddened spirits as he left with me. The degree of amendment does not, of course, keep up with the haste of his anxieties. It is not that I am not better, but that he loves me too well; there was the cause of his grief in going, and it is not that I do not think myself better, but that I feel how dearly he loves me; there was the cause of my grief in seeing him go.

One misses so the presence of such as dearly love us. His tears fell almost as fast as mine did when we parted ; but he is coming back soon — perhaps in a fortnight — so I will not think any more of them, but of that. I never told him of it, of course, but, when I was last so ill, I used to start out of fragments of dreams, broken from all parts of the universe, with the cry from my own lips, ‘Oh, papa ! papa !’ I could trace it back to the dream behind, yet there it always was very curiously, and touchingly too, to my own heart, seeming scarcely of me, though it came from me, at once waking me with, and welcoming me to, the old straight humanities. Well ! but I do trust I shall not be ill again in his absence, and that it may not last longer than a fortnight.”

This exposure of her inmost thoughts is thoroughly characteristic of Elizabeth Barrett: the words not only show what intense affection existed between her and her father, but are representative of that semi-mesmeric state which illness, confinement, and over-study appear to have cast her into. Her religion was so real, so intense, so much a part of her existence at this period of her life, that it colored everything about her, and caused her to regard every incident for good or ill as if it were a direct interposition of the Deity. Seraphim and Cherubim, of whom she had recently written so much, were not the purely ideal personages of her poetic fancy, but she held on to her belief in them as strongly as if they were visually knowable; and she regarded Lucifer, Adam, Eve, and other characters of the ancient Scriptures as truly historical as Cæsar or Brutus, Antony or Cleopatra. Science was little more than blasphemy, and that the world had existed upwards of six thousand years the fancy at the best of over-heated imagination. Such a woman could be a poet of poets, a very woman of women, with a heart for all that suffers and exists, and yet at times so bigoted and so blinded by excess of faith that she could not rightly judge the motives and their main-springs of many of the best about her.

Life at Torquay passed away quietly enough. The invalid's physical state varied; yet on the whole a gradual improvement was evidently taking place in her physique. On the 3d of December she is found writing Miss Mitford one of her usual chatty epistles, discussing with her wonted clarity their various literary and personal matters of mutual interest, not, however, without some slight allusions to her own foreboding fancies. Referring to some disputes the editress of the "Tableaux" was having with its proprietor, Miss Barrett says, "You may make whatever use of me you please, as long as I am alive, and able to write at all ;” and that Miss Mitford did not fail to avail herself of this permission is self-evident. After some remarks about Mr. Kenyon, Miss Barrett observes, “So he won’t have anything to say to our narrative poetry in Finden? But he is a heretic, therefore we won’t mind. After all, I am afraid (since it displeases you) that what I myself delight in most, in narrative poetry, is NOT the narrative. Beaumont and Fletcher, strip them to their plots, your own Beaumont and Fletcher, and you take away their glory. Alfieri is more markedly a poet of action than any other poet I can think of, and how he makes you shiver !”

Speaking of the franking of her letter, she says, with the humor so frequently displayed in those earlier days of her career: “Little thinks the Bishop, whose right reverend autograph conveys my letter to you, that he is aiding and abetting the intercourse of such very fierce radicals. Indeed, the last time I thought of politics I believe I was a republican, to say nothing of some perilous stuff of ‘sectarianism,’ which would freeze his ecclesiastical blood to hear of.” The “fierce radicalism” of “dearest Miss Mitford” was, after all, scarcely strong enough to have disturbed his Grace’s equanimity, whatever her young correspondent's would have done, had he learned aught of it.

On the 5th of January, 1839, Miss Barrett writes to inform her friend that her wishes for a happy new year are already fulfilled, for "papa has come!" Then, speaking of certain family reports as to their friend Kenyon not appearing to be in such good spirits as is usual with him, she throws certain side-lights upon her own character. She observes:—

"It must be that the life he [Kenyon] leads, will tell at last and at least on his spirits. Only the unexcitable by nature can be supposed to endure continual external occasions of excitement. As if there were not enough—too much—that is exciting from within! For my own part, I can't understand the craving for excitement. Mine is for repose. My conversion into quietism might be attained without much preaching; and, indeed, all my favorite passages in the Holy Scriptures are those which express and promise peace, such as 'The Lord of peace, Himself give you peace always and by all means;' 'My peace I give you, not as the world giveth give I;' and 'He giveth his beloved sleep,'—all such passages. They strike upon the disquieted earth with such a foreignness of heavenly music. Surely the 'variety,' the change, is to be unexcited, to find a silence and a calm in the midst of thoughts and feelings given to be too turbulent."

In these remarks, so illustrative of her character at this period, Miss Barrett, as is not unusual with her, fails to appreciate the immense difference there is between opposite dispositions, between the bright, healthy, wealthy, much fêted man of the world, and the invalided, pious, somewhat superstitious "hermitess." "I am tolerably well just now," is her significant conclusion, "and all the better for the sight of papa. He arrived the day before yesterday."

But even all the kind care, much less the sight of dear ones, could not restore the invalid to health and strength. Her studies and her poetry, her readings and her correspondence, were carried on fitfully and during intervals of longer or shorter duration, as her forces permitted. To her enthusiastic praises of some foreign poetry, sent during this period to Miss Mitford, that lady rejoins, in a letter of May 28 :—

"After all, to be English, with our boundless vistas in verse and in prose, is a privilege and a glory; and you are born amongst those who make it such, be sure of that. I do not believe, my sweetest, that the very highest poetry does sell at once. Look at Wordsworth! The hour will arrive, and all the sooner, if to poetry, unmatched in truth and beauty and feeling, you condescend to add story and a happy ending, that being among the conditions of recurrence to every book with the mass even of cultivated readers—I do not mean the few.”

Much as the poetess loved and admired this experienced correspondent, she never allowed her ideas or advice to influence the thought or—save in the “Tableaux”—even the theme of her works, and continued to write poems in which the story, if any, was subordinated to the sentiment, and in which the ending was as far removed from happiness as possible.

The slow months dragged on at Torquay, and no great improvement took place in the invalid's condition; indeed, she went from bad to worse, and at last seemed scarcely to have any hold on life, so far as physical power was concerned. According to Miss Mitford, writing in March, 1840, since the 1st of October she had not been dressed, “only lifted from her bed to the sofa, and for the last month not even taken out of bed to have it made. Yet she still writes to me,” says her friend, “and the physicians still encourage hope; but her voice has not for six months been raised above a whisper.” Then again, writing about the same time to another correspondent, Miss Mitford says of the invalid:—

“The physicians at their last consultation said it was not only possible, but probable, that she would so far recover as to live for many years in tolerable comfort. In the mean while she writes to me long letters at least twice a week, reads everything, from the magazines of the day to Plato and the Fathers, and has written (vide the 'Athenæum' of three weeks ago) the most magnificent poem ever written by woman on the Queen's Marriage. Great as is her learning, her genius is still more remarkable, and it is beginning to be felt and acknowledged in those quarters where alone the recognition of high genius is desirable."

The poem thus highly praised appeared in the "Athenæum" of Feb. 15, 1840, as "The Crowned and Wedded Queen." Marvellous a production as it was, when the circumstances in which it was produced are considered, and abounding though it does in felicitous expressions, it scarcely realizes the pre-eminence Miss Mitford claims for it. Grander poems had been produced by women, had been produced by Miss Barrett herself, who certainly surpassed it a few weeks later by her most suggestive lines on "Napoleon's Return," written on the conveyance of Napoleon's body from St. Helena to Paris for reinterment in the French metropolis.

During the whole of the winter of 1839, and the first half of 1840, a constant exchange of correspondence was carried on between the invalid at Torquay and Miss Mitford and other correspondents, in which all the leading literary and other topics of the day were discussed in a way that proves, however prostrated by illness Miss Barrett may have been, her mental powers retained all their vigor, and that she still contrived to keep in touch, either by reading or conversation, with the outer world. But a calamity was impending that almost extinguished the dim spark of vitality left in her, and, as she averred, "gave a nightmare to her life forever."

The advent of summer and the warm breezes of the south coast had begun to effect some improvement in her constitution, and to cause her to regard the future somewhat hopefully. She had been nursed through the cold months with the utmost care and affection; of those devoting themselves to her, both in body and mind, none was more unwearied in attention and self-sacrificing for her sake than her eldest brother, Edward. Next to her father he was first in her heart and mind, and her affection for him was fully reciprocated. He seems to have been an amiable and admired young man, known and liked amongst the visitors and residents at Torquay. He joined in the general amusements of the place as often as he could leave his sister's couch, and had formed acquaintance with other young men of his own position in life at Torquay.

July came. One Saturday, it was the 11th, Edward Barrett arranged to go for a sail with two companions ; they were Charles Vanneck, the only son of the Hon. Mrs. Gerard Vanneck, a young man in his twenty-first year, and Captain Carlyle Clarke, nicknamed "Lion Clarke," on account of a narrow escape he had from the clutches of a lion he killed in Bengal. The three hired the "Belle Sauvage," a small pleasure-yacht noted for its great speed, and as winner of a large number of prize cups. They took with them an experienced pilot named White, and started for a few hours' trip, intending to go only as far as Teignmouth.

Saturday passed, and the boat did not return ; Mr. Barrett, Senior, was not at Torquay, and Miss Barrett had to endure the agony of uncertainty and suspense uncheered by her father's presence. Sunday came, and the boat did not return. The dreary agonizing hours passed, and no sign of the pleasure-party. At last a rumor reached Torquay, and found its way to the heart-sick watchers, that a boat corresponding in appearance with the missing one had been seen to sink off Teignmouth. The terrifying intelligence wanted confirmation ; and as there still remained a possibility that the young men might have gone on to Exmouth, searchers were sent to that place, as well as along the coast, to make inquiries. Their efforts were vain; nothing could be heard of the lost ones. At last full evidence of the worst was obtained; two boatmen of Exmouth deposed that they saw a yacht with four men on board sink off Teignmouth. In consequence of this information two boats, well manned and armed with grapnels and other appliances, were despatched to the spot where the yacht was supposed to have gone down, to search for the bodies.

How can the horror and misery of this time be told,—the dreadful suspense, which all the grief of the terrible truth could scarcely intensify; a widowed mother mourning for her only son; a father and brother for a brother and son, who had survived the dangers of war and deadly climes, only to sink into the deep almost in sight of home; and a sister, lying helpless on a sick-bed, wasting vain tears for the beloved companion of her life, who was gone forever, whose corse even could not be wept over, and who,—horror of horrors!—but for the affection which had brought him to her side, might still have been alive and happy! Thus thought Miss Barrett, as she lay utterly prostrated with anguish and suspense ; thus she argued in the midst of her terrible agony.

Mr. Barrett arrived, but his arrival seemed of little value now. In conjunction with the other bereaved persons he offered heavy rewards for recovery of the bodies ; but the days passed, and no vestige could be obtained. At last, on the 18th instant, it was announced that Captain Clarke's body had been picked up by the trawler, about four miles from Dartmouth, and although several days had elapsed since the accident, it was not in the least disfigured, and in the button-hole of his coat were still the flowers which he had worn when he started on the pleasure-trip. The days still came and went, and again the sea cast forth its dead. It was not until the 4th of August that the body of Edward Barrett was discovered ; it had been seen floating near the Great Rock, Torbay, and was picked up by a boatman and taken ashore. Mr. Barrett identified his son's body, a coroner's verdict of "Accidentally drowned" was returned, and the remains, together with those of Captain Clarke, and subsequently of William White, the pilot, were interred in the parish church of Tormohun, Torquay. Whether Charles Vanneck's body was ever found is doubtful.

The suspense was over, and "the sharp reality

now must act its part." Nor money, nor genius, nor love was now of any avail; and the poor broken-hearted invalid, lying half senseless on her couch, had neither mind nor hearing for aught save the cruel sea beating upon the shore, and sounding, as she afterwards said, like nothing but a dirge for the untimely dead. "The sound of the waves rang in her ears like the moans of one dying."

For months Elizabeth Barrett hovered between life and death. "I being weak," as she said, "was struck down as by a bodily blow in a moment, without having time for tears." Everything that love and wealth could do for her was done, and time and nature both soothed and strengthened her in her affliction. Some slight reflex of her feelings may be gained from a perusal of her poem "De Profundis," published only after death had claimed her also. The earlier stanzas express the depth of her despair when she was first enabled to comprehend the certainty of her loss. After the full heart has given vent to its wild passionate cry of utter hopelessness a ray of light breaks in, the consolation of religion is sought and found, and the weary heart, as expressed in the remainder of the poem, is soothed to rest by faith in Divine goodness.

During these months of misery, whilst the invalid's life was hanging by a thread, there appeared the most influential notice of her poetic efforts that had as yet been published. In the September number of the "Quarterly Review" a criticism was given of the various volumes of poetry she owned. The reviewer was not altogether unjust nor unappreciative, although Miss Barrett subsequently took an opportunity of controverting his animadversions upon some of her mannerisms. Attention was called to her extraordinary acquaintance with ancient classic literature, as also to the daring nature of her themes. Her beautiful lines on "Cowper's Grave" were selected for especial commendation, and an extract from "Isobel's Child," a poem the reviewer did not appear to recognize the full value of, was given as a "specimen of her general manner and power."

"The Seraphim" was noticed by the reviewer as a subject "Miss Barrett would not have attempted, if she had more seriously considered its absolute unapproachableness;" whilst her translation of "Prometheus," although pronounced "a remarkable performance for a young lady," was deemed uncouth, unfaithful to the original, and devoid of fire. Altogether the review was calculated to improve Miss Barrett's position in the world of letters, classing her, as it did, among "modern English poetesses," and manifestly to the disadvantage of those ladies whose names and works were coupled with hers. It was this classification, however, that annoyed our poetess more than aught else in the review.

Towards the end of November Miss Mitford was enabled to report that her friend was somewhat better; "but I fear," she added, "we dare not expect more than a few months of lingering life." But the vital spark did not flutter out, and the improvement in the invalid's condition, if slow, was, with some fluctuations, continuous. "I did not think," she wrote some few months later, "to be better any more; but I have quite rallied now, except as to strength, and they say that on essential points I shall not suffer permanently — and this is a comfort to poor papa." To another correspondent Miss Barrett wrote, as an excuse for not following up some literary labor:—

"No — no; the headache is no excuse. I have not frequent headaches, and if just now I am rather more feverish and uncomfortable than usual, the cause is in the dreadful weather, — the snow and east wind. . . . These extreme causes do, however, affect me as little, even less, my physician says, than might have been feared; and I think steadily — hope steadily — for London at the end of May, so to attain a removal from this place, which has been so eminently fatal to my happiness.

“The only gladness associated with the banishment here has been your offered sympathy and friendship. Otherwise, bitterness has dropped on bitterness like the snows more than I can tell, and independent of that last most overwhelming affliction of my life, from the edge of the chasm of which I may struggle, but never can escape.”

Writing on the 17th of May, 1841, to Richard H. Horne, the author of “Orion” and “Cosmo de’ Medici,” with whom she had already been a correspondent for some time past, she says:—

“I shall be more at ease when I have thanked you, dear Mr. Horne, for your assurance of sympathy, which, in its feeling and considerate expression a few days since, touched me so nearly and deeply. Without it I should have written when I was able,—I mean physically able,—for in the exhaustion consequent upon fever, I have been too weak to hold a pen. As to reluctancy of feeling, believe me that I must change more than illness or grief can change me, before it becomes a painful effort to communicate with one so very kind as you have been to me. . . . Besides the appreciated sympathy, I have to acknowledge four proofs of your remembrance, the seals of which lay unbroken for a fortnight or more after their removal here. . . . You have been in the fields—I know by the flowers—and found there, I suppose, between the flowers and the life and dear Mrs. Orme, that pleasant dream (for me !) about my going to London at Easter. I never dreamt it. And while you wrote, what a mournful contrary was going on here ! It was a heavy blow (may God keep you from such !). I knew you would be sorry for me when you heard."

A few days later she resumed her correspondence with Horne, chiefly with respect to his fine drama of "Gregory the Seventh," to which was prefixed an "Essay on Tragic Influence" : —

"I have read but little lately, and not at all until very lately ; but two or three days ago papa held up 'Gregory' before my eyes as something sure to bring pleasure into them. 'Ah ! I knew that would move you.' After all, I have scarcely been long enough face to face with him to apprehend the full grandeur of his countenance. There are very grand things, and expounded in your characteristic massiveness of diction. But it does so far appear to me that for the tragic heights, and for that passionate singleness of purpose in which you surpass the poets of our time, we shall revert to 'Cosmo' and 'Marlowe.' Well, it may be very wrong — I must think over my thoughts. And at any rate the 'Essay on Tragic Influence' is full of noble philosophy and poetry — perhaps the highest, — and absolutely independent, in its own essence, of stages ; which involve, to my mind, little more than its translation into a grosser form, in order to its apprehension by the vulgar. What Macready can touch 'Lear'? In brief, if the union between tragedy and the gaslights be less incongruous and absurd than the union between Church and State, is it less desecrative of the Divine theory? In the clashing of my No against your Yes, I must write good-bye."

Soon afterwards Miss Barrett commenced a series of most interesting letters to Horne in connection with dramatic subjects. He had solicited her signature for a memorial to Parliament, petitioning the abolition of the theatrical monopoly, and praying that "every theatre should be permitted to enact the best dramas it could obtain." In the most delicate yet determined way possible, the invalid recluse declined to comply with the request. "I tremble to do it," she says; "take a long breath before I begin, and then beg you to excuse me about the signature." Alluding to his belief that as soon as the monopoly was abolished a career of glory would commence at once for the best drama and the best dramatists, and that the public would immediately flock to those houses where good plays and good actors only were to be seen, Miss Barrett says:—

"As to the petition . . . you are sure to gain the immediate object, and you ought to do so, even although the ultimate object remain as far off as ever, and more evidently far. There is a deeper evil than licenses or the want of licenses, — the base and blind public taste. Multiply your theatres and license every one. Do it to-day, and the day after to-morrow (you may have one night) there will come Mr. Bunn, and turn out you and Shakespeare with a great roar of lions. Well! we shall see.”

Reverting to more personal matters, this determined and not to be persuaded invalid is found once more looking with eager eyes to her home in the distant metropolis.

“When do you go to Italy?” she asks; “for me, I can’t answer. I am longing to go to London, and hoping to the last. For the present — certainly the window has been opened twice, an inch, but I can’t be lifted even to the sofa without fainting. And my physician shakes his head, or changes the conversation, which is worse, whenever London is mentioned. But I do grow stronger; and if it become possible I shall go — will go! That sounds better, does n’t it? Putting it off to another summer is like a ‘never.’ ”

In her next letter, early in June, she informs Horne that she is —

“revived just now — pleased, anxious, excited altogether, in the hope of touching at last upon my last days at this place. I have been up, and bore it excellently, — up an hour at a time, without fainting, and on several days without injury; and now am looking forward to the journey. My physician has been open with me, and is of opinion that there is a good deal of risk to be run in attempting it. But my mind is made up to go; and if the power remains to me I will go. To be at home, and relieved from the sense of doing evil where I would soonest bring a blessing, — of breaking up poor papa's domestic peace into fragments by keeping my sisters here (and he won't let them leave me) would urge me into any possible 'risk,' — to say nothing of the continual repulsion, night and day, of the sights and sounds of this dreary place. There will be no opposition. So papa promised me at the beginning of last winter that I should go when it became 'possible.' Then Dr. Scully did not talk of 'risk,' but of certain consequences. He said I should die on the road. I know how to understand the change of phrase. There is only a 'risk' now — and the journey is 'possible.' So I go.

"We are to have one of the patent carriages, with a thousand springs, from London, and I am afraid of nothing. I shall set out, I hope, in a fortnight. Ah! but not directly for London. There is to be some intermediate place where we all must meet, papa says, and stay for a month or two before the final settlement in Wimpole Street; and he names 'Clifton,' and I pray for the neighborhood of London, because I look far (too far, perhaps, for me), and fear being left an exile again at those Hot Wells during the winter. I don't know what the 'finality measure' may be. The only thing fixed is a journey from hence."

Considering the condition Miss Barrett was in, and that she had even to recline on her back whilst writing, it is marvellous that she was enabled to write the quantity, apart from the quality, of matter that she did at this time. Besides her lengthy communications to Horne, Miss Mitford, and others, she was busy assisting the first-named correspondent in sketching out and writing a lyrical drama.

“Psyche Apocalypté,” the name finally adopted by the two poets as the title of their joint drama, was to be modelled on “Greek instead of modern tragedy.” The correspondence which the suggestions and dual labor on this drama gave rise to was most voluminous; and although the work was never completed, there was quite enough of it put together to justify Horne publishing the fair-sized pamphlet on it he eventually did.

Miss Barrett’s original conception of the work is shadowed forth in these words:—

“My idea, the terror attending spiritual consciousness, — the man’s soul to the man, — is something which has not, I think, been worked hitherto, and seems to admit of a certain grandeur and wildness in the execution. The awe of this soul-consciousness breaking into occasional lurid heats through the chasm of our conventionalities has struck me, in my own self-observation, as a mystery of nature very grand in itself, and is quite a distinct mystery from conscience. Conscience has to do with action (every thought being spiritual action), and not with abstract existence. There are moments when we are startled at the footsteps of our own being, more than at the thunders of God."

Horne accepted this psychological problem as the basis for the drama, taking good care, however, in his own practical way, to make it more comprehensible, and humanizing it by a fairly readable plot and the introduction of numerous supernumerary personages, human and otherwise. Much of it was already written when Miss Barrett's removal from Torquay and journey to London caused a lengthy interregnum in the work, and subsequent events intervened to prevent its continuation and completion.

In her charming literary correspondence with Horne, Miss Barrett furnishes many interesting little pieces of personal history. She does not refrain from jesting about her own invalided condition, and in the communication just cited from, says:—

"How you would smile sarcasms and epigrams out of the 'hood' if you could see from it what I have been doing, or rather suffering, lately! Having my picture taken by a lady miniature-painter, who wandered here to put an old view of mine to proof. For it was n't ' the ruling passion strong in death,' ' though by your smiling you may seem to say so,' but a sacrifice to papa."

A month later, and she, still a prisoned sprite, writes :—

"What made me write was indeed impatience—there is no denying it—only not about the drama. Do you know what it is to be shut up in a room by oneself, to multiply one's thoughts by one's thoughts—how hard it is to know what 'one's thought is like'—how it grows and grows, and spreads and spreads, and ends in taking some supernatural color—just like mustard and cress sown on flannel in a dark closet? . . . I was very sorry about the cough. Do not neglect it, lest it end as mine did; for a common cough striking on an insubstantial frame began my bodily troubles; and I know well what that suffering is, though nearly quite free from it now."

The fortnight within which the invalid was to risk a remove came and went, and still her letters bear the post-mark of hated Torquay. On the 4th August she writes: "I am gasping still for permission to move too; but papa has gone suddenly into Herefordshire, and I am almost sure not to hear for a week. Something, however, must soon be determined; and in the mean time, being tied hand and foot, and gagged, I am wonderfully patient." Ten days later, and still the Barretts did not risk removal. On the 14th Elizabeth wrote a characteristic letter to Horne wherein was much playful badinage, and the remark, in reference to her childish epic "Ah! when I was ten years old, I beat you all — you and Napoleon and all — in ambition; but now I only want to get home."

"I only want to get home!" such had been the burden of Elizabeth Barrett's wishes from month to month; and at last, late in the summer of 1841, she was conveyed to her father's residence in Wimpole Street in safety. All that is known of the journey is told by Miss Mitford, — a very imaginative person, be it remembered, in some things. "My beloved Miss Barrett," she says, "accomplished the journey by stages of twenty-five miles a day in one of the invalide carriages, where the bed is drawn out like a drawer from a table." She had not been home many days before Miss Mitford travelled up to London to visit her, and remarks, "I found her better than I dared to hope."

CHAPTER IV.

HOME.

MISS MITFORD found Elizabeth Barrett better than she had dared to hope, yet still an utter invalid. Speaking of her appearance now as contrasted with what it was when she first met her, she says :—

“ She has totally lost the rich, bright coloring, which certainly made the greater part of her beauty. She is dark and pallid ; the hair is almost entirely hidden ; the look of youth gone (I think she now looks as much beyond her actual age as formerly she looked behind it), nothing remaining but the noble forehead, the matchless eyes, and the fine form of her mouth and teeth — even now their whiteness is healthy. . . . The expression, too, is completely changed ; the sweetness remains, but it is accompanied with more shrewdness, more gayety, the look not merely of the woman of genius, — that she always had, — but of the superlatively clever woman. An odd effect of absence from general society, that the talent for conversation should have ripened, and the shyness have disappeared ; but so it is. When I first saw her, her talk, delightful as it was, had something too much of the lamp — she spoke too well — and her letters were rather too much like the very best books. Now all that is gone ; the fine thoughts come gushing and sparkling like water from a spring, but flow as naturally as water down a hillside, — clear, bright, and sparkling in the sunshine. All this, besides its great delightfulness, looks like life, does it not? Even in this weather — very trying to her — she has been translating some hymns of Gregory Nazianzen . . . and is talking of a series of articles for the ‘Athenæum,’ comprising critiques on the Greek poets of the early Christian centuries, with poetical translations. I had rather she wrote more ‘Cloud Houses,’ and have told her so ; and, above all, I had rather see a great narrative poem, of an interest purely human (for one can’t trust her with the mystical).”

“The House of Clouds,” alluded to by Miss Mitford, had appeared in the “Athenæum” of August 21. It was alone sufficient to have made a poetic reputation ; no poet ever penned a purer or more poetic piece, or one in which the music is wedded to the metre in more ethereal beauty. A sample stanza is sufficient to show what an artist in words Elizabeth Barrett could be at her best :—

“Cloud-walls of the morning’s gray,
 Faced with amber column,
 Crowned with crimson cupola,
 From a sunset solemn !

May-mists, for the casements, fetch,
Pale and glimmering ;
With a sunbeam hid in each,
And a smell of spring !”

Who but will agree with Miss Mitford in her wish that a poet who could indite such lovely lines should continue so to write, instead of squandering her genius over the hopeless task of trying to resuscitate the dry bones of those irretrievably dead Greek Fathers of the Church. But what Elizabeth Barrett willed she did ; and having made her mind up that the early Greek Christians kept the torch of Hellenic poesy from utterly fluttering out, she wrote a series of papers, and translated a lot of mouldering verse, to prove it to the public. These translations from and articles on “The Greek Christian Poets” duly appeared in the “Athenæum” of the following year. They are now chiefly memorable and valuable for their author’s sake, and as a specimen of her magnificent diction ; the opening sentence of the first essay is a splendid example of the richness and verbal picturesqueness of English prose in competent hands.

In the preceding October, Miss Barrett had published in the “Athenæum,” to which she was a frequent contributor, some charming, characteristic lines, entitled, “Lessons from the Gorse," and in many ways displayed increased literary activity. With reviving health her energies appeared to revive; and although she suffered much during the short frost which ushered in the early winter of 1841, she recovered quickly. Her correspondence with literary people increased, and at rare intervals friends were admitted into the darkened chamber in which she passed her time. She was, indeed, much better now that she had left behind the terrible, suggestive sound of the never-silent sea, and had regained the calm seclusion of home. She wrote continually, and read and studied unceasingly. Without these occupations for her mind, it has been suggested, she never could have lived. Her medical attendant did not comprehend this phase of her constitution, and remonstrated with her on her close application to her favorite Greek authors. To save herself from his diatribes she had a small edition of Plato bound up to resemble a novel.

Writing to Horne on the subject of her varied reading, Elizabeth Barrett says:—

“So you think I never read Fonblanque or Sydney Smith—or Junius, perhaps? Mr. Kenyon calls me his ‘omnivorous cousin.’ I read without principle. I have a sort of unity, indeed, but it amalgamates instead of selecting—do you understand? When I had read the Hebrew Bible, from Genesis to Malachi, right through, and was never stopped by the Chaldean—and the Greek poets, and Plato, right through from end to end—I passed as thoroughly through the flood of all possible and impossible British and foreign novels and romances, with slices of metaphysics laid thick between the sorrows of the multitudinous Celestinas. It is only useful knowledge and the multiplication table I have never tried hard at. And now—what now? Is this matter of exultation? Alas, no! Do I boast of my omnivorousness of reading, even apart from the romances? Certainly no! never, except in joke. It's against my theories and ratiocinations, which take upon themselves to assert that we all generally err by reading too much, and out of proportion to what we think. I should be wiser, I 'am persuaded, if I had not read half as much—should have had stronger and better exercised faculties, and should stand higher in my own appreciation. The fact is, that the ne plus ultra of intellectual indolence is this reading of books. It comes next to what the Americans call 'whittling.'”

These wise and pregnant sentences are well worth reproduction and pondering over, although it must be confessed that Elizabeth Barrett, even if her reading were so varied as she humorously asserts, is an apparent exception to the theory she propounds. Her large range of reading continually supplies her with apt allusions and appropriate similes. Her letters, as Miss Mitford exclaims, "are such letters!"

Writing early in December, 1841, that lady says she has just been reading a favorite book of Miss Barrett, lent her by that dear friend. It is Stilling's "Theory of Pneumatology," and Miss Mitford faithfully describes it as "a most remarkable collection of ghost stories, dreams, etc., very interesting for its singular mixture of credulity, simplicity, shrewdness, and good faith." This letter contains the first intimation of Miss Barrett's leaning to a belief in apparitions, — a belief which doubtless laid the foundation of her future credulity in matters connected with that modern imposture, Spiritualism.

Miss Mitford, in her voluminous correspondence with Elizabeth Barrett, continued to make remarks anent her spiritual theories. At first the elder lady appeared to somewhat sympathize with her friend's views; but as they became more pronounced, and credence was given to the more outré forms of modern superstition, Miss Mitford retreated from the field.

In the following February one learns that Miss Barrett is much better in health, and that she can even walk from the bed to the sofa, — quite a grand deed for her. The report for the next month shows maintained improvement, and her friends are now quite hopeful for her. Her reading continues to be as varied and large as ever, and her letters to be filled with her clever comments upon what she reads. Her chief correspondent was Miss Mitford, who encouraged her to her utmost by praises of her great and growing powers. She writes, —

“My love and ambition for you often seem to be more like that of a mother for a son, or a father for a daughter (the two fondest of natural emotions), than the common bond of even a close friendship between two women of different ages and similar pursuits. I sit and think of you, and of the poems that you will write, and of that strange, brief rainbow crown called Fame, until the vision is before me as vividly as ever a mother’s heart hailed the eloquence of a patriotic son. Do you understand this? And do you pardon it? You must, my precious, for there is no chance that I should unbuild that house of clouds; and the position that I long to see you fill is higher, firmer, prouder than ever has been filled by a woman.”

Great as was Miss Barrett’s improvement, and well as she had borne the winter, we find that even by April she is unable to do more than move into the next room at the most, and that she is still unable to receive any new visitors. Her interchange of letters with Miss Mitford, however, becomes more frequent than ever, and from them one is enabled to learn what books the two ladies are reading, what their opinions upon them and upon the leading literary topics of the day are, and what each is doing as regards literature. As for Miss Barrett, little save literature seemed to her worth living for. Books, books, books, were almost the sole object of her life, and to read or write them her only occupation. Almost the only unliterary subject introduced is "Flush," a favorite spaniel, presented to the poetess by Miss Mitford.

The year 1842 passed away quietly for Elizabeth Barrett. Her health's improvement — slow, very slow, if sure — was the chief and most important event for her. If she wrote much, she published little or nothing beyond a few poems, and "The Greek Christian Poets," already spoken of. But during this time she was steadily preparing a new collection of poetry, of priceless value, for the press. Writing to Horne in December, she says, in her jesting way: —

"The world is better than I imagined, and since I wrote to you about booksellers, I have had an inkling of a reason for believing what I had not faith for previously, that in the case of my resolving to deliver up a volume of poems to my own former publisher, he would print it without being paid for it."

The first few months of 1843, like the last few of its predecessor, are almost a blank as far as any records of Miss Barrett's career are available. In April, Miss Mitford says she has a letter from her, "more cheerful and healthy than any I have received for a very long time." And on the 14th of June the poetess sends a more than usually humorous letter to Horne, in reference to the distribution of his grand epic of "Orion," published originally at the price of One Farthing. This nominal price, Horne says, was fixed in order to save the author the trouble and expense of sending copies to his numerous friends. Miss Barrett's first letter on the subject, which reads as if she were pretending to be piqued with the poet, shows that, after all, he did not escape either gratuitous distribution or literary correspondence in consequence. Certainly, if all his correspondents had possessed the epistolary talent of this one, he would have had nothing to regret at the failure of his plan. She writes:—

"I have read and forwarded your letter to Miss Mitford, who tells me in a letter yesterday (a cross stitch) that, in spite of all I can say, she is glad of having written to you, because you 'will be obliged to say something in your answer.' Well! I also am glad that somebody is curious besides myself; and I am not sorry that the somebody should be herself, being jealous of her, 'with Styx nine times round me,' in natural proportion to her degree of glory and victory and twenty-five promised copies!

"Very well, Mr. Horne!

"'It is quite useless,' said I to Miss Mitford, 'that you should make your application! Have I not asked for six copies and been refused?' Now carry the result of the application historically downwards — and me with it!

"As to your suggestion about the compromise of her and my struggling heroically for these spolia opima, — really you can know little of what heroes, female heroes, are made, to suggest such a thing! I have told Miss Mitford (to disabuse you at once) that not if she and you asked me on your four knees to touch a page of the twenty-five would I consent to such a thing. I make feminine oaths against it. I DON'T CHOOSE TO DO IT. . . . Not in the least do I approve of your distributing the second edition in the manner of the first. The cause of it, and the object in it, are inscrutable to me, particularly as I don't hold to the common opinion that much poetry has made the author mad. Papa says, 'Perhaps he is going to shoot the Queen, and is preparing evidence of monomania,' — an ingenious conjecture, but not altogether satisfactory."

The letter from which these extracts are taken had not been written long before the writer began to fear that their humorous banter might be taken too seriously; so she indited another epistle about "Orion," saying, —

"I am more sorry . . . at having written a very silly note to you. That it was simply silly — meaning that it was n't seriously silly — I beg you to believe. I am apt to write the thought or the jest, as it may be, which is uppermost — and sometimes, too, when it is not uppermost. I struggle against a sadness which is strong, by putting a levity in the place of it. Now, you will wonder what I have been writing if you have not received the note yet; and so I will explain to you that it was only some foolishness about the twenty-five copies, — about Miss Mitford's victory and my defeat. κ. τ. λ."

The tone of this and other letters written by Elizabeth Barrett is explained by what she writes in a following communication to Horne. Referring to her great shyness in meeting strangers, she says: "But that you won't believe, because, as Mr. Kenyon says, I grow insolent when I have a pen in my hand, and you know me only 'by that sign.' I sometimes doubt to myself (do you know, besides) whether if I should ever be face to face with you, the shame and the shyness would not annihilate the pleasure of it to me!"

That this shyness was real, no student of Elizabeth Barrett's life and letters can doubt, and that it was that which oftentimes forced her into writing somewhat overstrained and bold epistles, — so different to her retiring nature, — just as very bashful people often blurt out more forcible and more courageous things than really brave but more self-possessed persons would dare to.

As the year advanced, and there were no signs of the invalid's falling back into her former sad condition, Miss Mitford, assisted by Mr. Kenyon, endeavored to impress upon Mr. Barrett the advantages likely to accrue to his daughter by her being got out of town; but either he or the invalid herself feared the risk, and nothing was done. Her collection of poems, which it was arranged Moxon should publish, was rapidly approaching completion. It was to be in two volumes, and not to contain anything included in the previous, the 1838 collection. One important piece to be in this new work had appeared in "Blackwood" for August, under the title of "The Cry of the Children." It had been suggested by the "Report" of Horne on "The Employment of Children in Mines and Manufactories." He had been appointed by the Government an Assistant Commissioner to the Commission appointed to inquire into the subject, and his evidence, says Miss Barrett, excited her to write the poem named "The Cry of the Children." This poem, which Edgar Poe well characterized as "full of a nervous unflinching energy—a horror sublime in its simplicity—of which Dante himself might have been proud" created quite a sensation on its appearance, and has been deemed, with much show of probability, to have hastened and helped the passing of the initial Act of Parliament restricting the employment of children of tender years. The poem is grand in its pathos and passion, in the simplicity of its suffering children, and the hardly restrained and lofty anger at their treatment. Some stanzas should be cited, if only to show what a lofty position their author had now achieved in the realms of poetry:—

"Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers,
     Ere the sorrow comes with years?
 They are leaning their young heads against their mothers',—
     And that cannot stop their tears.
 The young lambs are bleating in the meadows,
     The young birds are chirping in the nest;
 The young fawns are playing with the shadows,
     The young flowers are blowing towards the west;
 But the young, young children, O my brothers,
     They are weeping bitterly!
 They are weeping in the playtime of the others,
     In the country of the free.

" Do you question the young children in their sorrow,
     Why their tears are falling so?
 The old man may weep for his to-morrow,
     Which is lost in Long Ago;
 The old tree is leafless in the forest,
     The old year is ending in the frost;
 The old wound, if stricken, is the sorest,
     The old hope is hardest to be lost;
 But the young, young children, O my brothers,
     Do you ask them why they stand
 Weeping sore before the bosoms of their mothers
     In our happy Fatherland?
 . . . . .

" For all day the wheels are droning, turning,
     Their wind comes in our faces, —
 Till our hearts turn, — our heads with pulses burning,
     And the walls turn in their places;
 Turns the sky in the high window blank and reeling,
     Turns the long light that droppeth down the wall,
 Turn the black flies that crawl along the ceiling, —
     All are turning, all the day, and we with all!
 And all day the iron wheels are droning,
     And sometimes we could pray:
 O ye wheels (breaking out in a mad moaning),
     Stop! be silent for to-day!'
 . . . . .

" Now tell the poor young children, O my brothers,
     That they look to Him and pray;
 So the blessed One who blesseth all the others,
     Will bless them another day.
 They answer, ' Who is God that He should hear us,
     While the rushing of the iron wheels is stirred?

When we sob aloud, the human creatures near us
 Pass by, hearing not, or answer not a word!
 And we hear not (for the wheels in their resounding)
     Strangers speaking at the door;
 Is it likely God, with angels singing round Him,
     Hears our weeping any more?

“Two words, indeed, of praying we remember,
     And at midnight’s hour of harm, —
 Our Father, looking upward in the chamber,
     We say softly for a charm.<sup>1</sup>

We know no other words except Our Father.
 And we think that in some pause of angels’ song
 God may pluck them with the silence sweet to gather,
 And hold both within His right hand which is strong
 Our Father! If He heard us, He would surely (For they call Him good and mild)
 Answer, smiling down the steep world very purely,
     Come and rest with me, my child.’”

Another piece included in the collection, “To Flush, my Dog,” is of a very different calibre, although replete with excellence in its way. Flush, the many years canine companion and four-footed friend of the poetess, was a gift from Miss Mitford, and, says Elizabeth Barrett, “belongs to the beautiful race she has rendered celebrated among English and American readers. The Flushes have their laurels as well as the

Cæsars, the chief difference (at least the very head and front of it) consisting, according to my perception, in the bald head." If Miss Mitford made Flush celebrated by her prose, Miss Barrett immortalized him by her poesy. "Loving friend," she writes, —

"Loving friend, the gift of one
Who her own true faith hath run
Through thy lower nature ;
Be my benediction said
With my hand upon thy head,
Gentle fellow creature !

"Like a lady's ringlets brown
Flow thy silken ears adown,
Either side demurely,
Of thy silver-suited breast
Shining out from all the rest Of thy body purely.

"Darkly brown thy body is,
Till the sunshine, striking this Alchemize its dulness, —
When the sleek curls manifold
Flash all over into gold,
With a burnished fulness.

"Underneath my stroking hand,
Startled eyes of hazel bland
Kindling, growing larger, —

Up thou leapest with a spring,
 Full of prank and curvetting,
 Leaping like a charger.

“ Yet, my pretty sportive friend,
 Little is 't to such an end
     That I praise thy rareness !
 Other dogs may be thy peers
 Haply in these drooping ears,
 And this glossy fairness.

“ But of thee it shall be said,
 This dog watched beside a bed
     Day and night unweary, —
 Watched within a curtained room,
 Where no sunbeam brake the gloom
 Round the sick and dreary.

“ Other dogs in thymy dew
 Tracked the hares and followed through Sunny moor or meadow ;
 This dog only crept and crept
 Next a languid cheek that slept,
 Sharing in the shadow.

. . . . .

“ And if one or two quick tears
 Dropped upon his glossy ears,
     Or a sigh came double, —
 Up he sprang in eager haste,
 Fawning, fondling, breathing fast,
 In a tender trouble.

“ And this dog was satisfied,
 If a pale thin hand would glide
     Down his dewlaps sloping, —
 Which he pushed his nose within,
 After, — platforming his chin

. . . . .

“ Therefore to this dog will I,
 Tenderly, not scornfully,
     Render praise and favor !
 With my hand upon his head,
 Is my benediction said,
     Therefore, and forever.”

The allusion to the “ other dogs in thymy dew ” who “ tracked the hare,” is suggested by an incident told the poetess by Miss Mitford in one of her chatty letters. This lady’s spaniel, the sire of the second Flush, does not appear to have been, at all times, so sedate as his daughter. One evening, when his mistress was taking her wonted walk, the one daily walk which she said kept her alive, her Flush found a hare and quested it for two miles. She says: —

“ I heard him the whole time, and could follow by the ear every step that they took, and called in desperate fear lest some keeper should kill my pet. To be sure, as Ben [her servant] and my father said when I returned and told my fright, ‘ Flush is too well known for that.’ But you can comprehend my alarm at finding that the more I called, the more Flushie would not come ; whilst he was making the welkin ring with a tongue unrivalled amongst all spaniels that ever followed game. Instead of pitying me, both my father and Ben were charmed at the adventure. The most provoking part of it was that when, after following the hare to a copse on the other side of the avenue, he had at length come back to me, he actually, upon crossing the scent again, as we were returning homeward, retraced his steps and followed the game back to cover again. This, which was the most trying circumstance of all to me, was exactly what, as proving the fineness of his nose, Ben and his master gloried in. Indeed, Ben caught him up in his arms, and declared that he would back him against any spaniel in England for all that he was worth in the world. So, I suppose, to-morrow he'll run away again."

In further proof of the value of the Flush family, Miss Mitford on another occasion recounts how a half sister of Miss Barrett's Flush "is so much admired in Reading that she has already been stolen four times — a tribute to her merit which might be dispensed with — and her master, having upon every occasion offered ten pounds reward, it seems likely enough that she will be stolen four times more."

The dog-stealers were also the bane of Miss Barrett. Writing to Horne in October of this year, she says : —

“Yes, I have recovered my pet. No, I have ‘idealized’ none of the dog-stealing. I had no time. I was crying while he was away, and I was accused so loudly of ‘silliness and childishness’ afterwards, that I was glad to dry my eyes, and forget my misfortunes by way of rescuing my reputation. After all, it was excusable that I cried. Flushie is my friend, my companion, and loves me better than he loves the sunshine without. Oh, and if you had seen him when he came home and threw himself into my arms, palpitating with joy, in that dumb inarticulate ecstasy which is so affecting—love without speech! ‘You had better give your dog something to eat,’ said the thief to my brother when he yielded up his prize for a bribe, ‘for he has tasted nothing since he has been with us.’ And he had been with them for three days, and yet his heart was so full when he came home that he could not eat, but shrank away from the plate and laid down his head on my shoulder. The spirit of love conquered the animal appetite even in that dog. He is worth loving. Is he not?”

In the letter containing the foregoing account of Flushie’s return home from his unlawful detention, his fond mistress had placed a very neat and characteristic pen-and-ink portrait of little Flush, which was humorously made to resemble herself. This sketch was jocularly sent in lieu of her own portrait, which Horne had solicited for insertion in his forthcoming work, entitled

“Here I send you one of the ‘Spirits of the Age,’ strongly recommending it to a place on your frontispiece. It is Flush’s portrait, I need scarcely say; and only fails of being an excellent substitute for mine through being more worthy than I can be counted.”

Later on she writes:—

“Mr. Kenyon was with me yesterday, and praised ‘Orion’ most admiringly. He accused me of the ‘Athenæum’ paper,<sup>1</sup> and convicted me against my will; and when I could no longer deny, and began to explain and ‘pique myself upon my diplomacy,’ he threw himself back into his chair and laughed me to scorn as the least diplomatic of his acquaintance. ‘You diplomatic!’”

In her correspondence with Horne generally the topics discussed were literary, and frequently referred to projects in which one or both were co-operating. The following letter from her, dated August 31, is, however, more relative to her personal affairs than usual:—

“Ah, my dear Mr. Horne, while you are praising the weather—stroking the sleek sunshine—it has been, not exactly killing me, but striking me vigorously with intent to kill. It was intensely not, and I went out in the chair, and was over-excited and over-tired, I suppose ; at least, the next day I was ill, shivering in the sun, and lapsing into a weariness it is not easy for me to rally from. Yet everybody has been ill, which — in the way of pure benevolence — ought to be a comfort to me ; and now I am well again. And the weather is certainly lovely and bright by fits, and I join you in praising the beauty and glory of it ; but then, you must admit that the fits, the spasmodic changes of the temperature from sixty-one degrees to eighty-one, and back again, are trying to mortal frames, more especially to those conscious of the frailty of the ‘native mud,’ in them. If I had the wings of a dove, and could flee away to the south of France, I should be cooing, peradventure, instead of moaning. Only I could not leave everything, even then ! I must stay, as well as go, under any circumstances, dove or woman.

“By the way, two of my brothers are on the Rhine at this moment. They have gone, to my pain and pleasure, to see Geneva, and come home at the end of six weeks, by Paris, to re-plunge (one of them) into law.

“It pleases me to think of dear Miss Mitford reading my ‘House of Clouds’ to you, with her ‘melodious feeling’ for poetry, and the sweeter melody of her kindness ; and it moreover pleased me to know that you liked it in any measure. Mr. Boyd told me that ‘he had read my papers on the Greek Fathers with more satisfaction because he had inferred from my "House of Clouds" that illness had impaired my faculties.' Ah! but I hope to do something yet, better than the past. I hope, and shall struggle to it.

"I have had a great pleasure lately in some correspondence with Miss Martineau, the noblest female intelligence between the seas, 'as sweet as spring, as ocean deep.' She is in a hopeless anguish of body, and serene triumph of spirit, with at once no hope and all hope! To hear from her was both a pleasure and honor for me."

It is a gratification to know that this high appreciation of one great-souled woman for another — another, too, in many things so different! — was fully reciprocated, and that shortly after the opinion just cited was given, Harriet Martineau told Edward Moxon she deemed "Miss Barrett the woman of women," and that there was nothing to be likened to her recent two volumes of poems.

Not long after the publication of "Chaucer Modernized," in which he was greatly assisted by our poetess, Horne projected a work to be entitled "A New Spirit of the Age." The title, if not the theme, was suggested by Hazlitt's well-known work, and, like that, it was to be a work of criticism, but literary criticism only. "As in the case of 'Chaucer,'" says Horne,

“the work was to be edited and partly written by myself, and the principal and most valuable of my coadjutors was Miss Barrett. The critique entitled “William Wordsworth and Leigh Hunt,” he proceeds to tell us, “was written in about equal proportions by Miss Barrett and myself.” This was done at first in separate manuscripts, and then each interpolated the work of the other “as the spirit moved.” It was written in letters, and some of them of considerable length.

“I believe I am making public for the first time,” says Horne, “the fact that the mottoes, which are singularly happy and appropriate, were for the most part supplied by Miss Barrett and Robert Browning, then unknown to each other.”

The article on the merits of “Walter Savage Landor,” Horne is our authority for saying, was mainly the work of Miss Barrett. “It was forwarded in two letters, which were carefully transcribed. What she had done was preceded by a few biographical and other remarks, founded upon communications forwarded to me by Mr. Landor.” That Miss Barrett’s observations on Landor are noteworthy needs no confirmation ; but that a portion, at least, of the autobiographical information in the article — such as the marvellous anecdote of its hero's connection with the First Napoleon, related by the man himself as an instance of his "great hatred and yet greater forbearance" — was palpably evolved from pure imagination, is self-evident.

The classicism of Walter Savage Landor's style was calculated to inspire Miss Barrett with admiration for his undeniable genius, and perhaps to some extent to blind her to his many eccentricities. Her critique on his writings, and the cause of their slow growth into popular favor, is not only a valuable example of her marvellously clear insight into the real nature of such things, but is a wonderful specimen of her terse and trenchant prose.

The following lines written to Horne by Miss Barrett during the progress of his "New Spirit," and with reference to it, are very interesting as proving, what our readers may have already discovered, that there was a light and humorous side to her personality :—

"You will conclude, from certain facts, that I am very like a broom! — not Lord Brougham, who only does a little of everything ; and not a wheeled brougham, which will stop when it is bidden ; and not a new broom, which sweeps clean and then has done with it ; but that bewitched broom in the story, which, being sent to draw water, drew bucket after bucket, until the whole house was in a flood. Montaigne says somewhere that to stop gracefully is a sure proof of high race in a horse. I wonder what not to stop at all is proof of—in horse, man, or woman? After all, I am not improving my case by this additional loquacity; and the case is bad enough. . . . You asked me to write four or five pages for your work, and I have written what you see! . . . Indeed, I did not mean to write so much—I didn't think of writing your whole book for you!"

Miss Barrett's correspondence with Horne ranges rapidly from grave to gay in its treatment of literary and other themes, during the latter months of 1843 and the first quarter of 1844. Her letters furnish almost the only knowledge we have of their writer's existence during the period named, and are chiefly due to her co-operation in the "New Spirit of the Age." As an embodiment of Miss Barrett's untrammelled and real opinion of her contemporaries they are replete with interest; frequently with a few vitalizing words furnishing a more vivid portrait of a celebrity or notoriety of the day than an ordinary bookmaker will in a volume. She possessed power of insight that enabled her to penetrate through the mere action of individuals and behold clearly their motives. With no one, apparently, was she on more friendly terms than with Miss Mitford; and yet frequently does she give proof that she refrains from showing her heart to that amiable but extremely indiscreet lady, as also that she comprehended thoroughly the limited range of that correspondent's literary qualifications. Nevertheless, Miss Barrett fought nobly on behalf of Miss Mitford whenever she had the opportunity. It would be difficult to cull from any man's essay, however much an experienced literary man of the world he might be, a clearer, more condensed, and more impartially worded critique on a fellow author than one on Miss Mitford by Elizabeth Barrett, sent to the editor of "The New Spirit of the Age."

In the course of their correspondence anent the various personages to be introduced in the projected work, Horne had desired his fair contributor to write on one side only of her paper and to leave wide margins to her manuscript, in order, evidently, to permit of his alterations and annotations. She replied:—

"Very well! I will be good as I am fair,—that is, by courtesy. And I will be very courteous to your right honorable printers, who can't be at the trouble to turn over a leaf or read from anything except large paper, and an inch of margin on each side! Very well, they shall have their will ; although, to be sure, I have been in the habit of writing for the press on the ordinary long note paper, and on both sides the page, and never heard a printer's murmur."

In her postscript she says :—

“ ‘How I do go on in the dark !’ To be sure I do. The dark, you know, is my particular province, even without the political economy. That would have made me a Princess of Darkness.”

Miss Barrett's allusion to the darkness will be more readily comprehended, when it is known that after the return to London she lived in a large darkened chamber whence, for some years, she never went farther than the bedroom adjoining. She makes frequent allusions to this solitary confinement in her poems, and occasionally in her correspondence, as in the following letter to a fellow poet :—

“I am thinking—lifting up my pen—what I can write which is likely to be interesting to you. After all, I come to chaos and silence, and even old Night, it is growing so dark. I live in London, to be sure, and except for the glory of it, I might live in a desert—so profound is my solitude, and so complete my isolation from things and persons without. I lie all day, and day after day, on this sofa, and my windows do not even look into the street. To abuse myself with a vain deceit of rural life, I have had ivy planted in a box, and it has flourished and spread over one window, and strikes against the glass, with a little stroke from the thicker leaves, when the wind blows at all briskly. Then I think of forests and groves. . . . It is my triumph, when the leaves strike the window-pane. And this is not to sound like a lament. Books and thoughts and dreams (too consciously dreamed, however, for me—the illusion of them has almost passed) and domestic tenderness can and ought to leave nobody lamenting.”

To Horne, in reply to his request that she would furnish him with some biographical particulars of herself, for use in his article on her in the “New Spirit of the Age,” she says:—

“So you think that I am in the habit of keeping biographical sketches in my table-drawer for the use of hypothetical editors?

“Once, indeed, for one year, I kept a diary in detail and largely; and at the end of the twelve months was in such a crisis of self-disgust that there was nothing for me but to leave off the diary. Did you ever try the effect of a diary upon your own mind? It is curious, especially where elastic spirits and fancies are at work upon a fixity of character and situation. . . .

“My dear Mr. Horne, the public do not care for me enough to care at all for my biography. If you say anything of me (and I am not affected enough to pretend to wish you to be absolutely silent, if you see any occasion to speak), it must be as a writer of rhymes, and not as the heroine of a biography: you must not allow your kindness for me to place me in a prominence which I have to deserve — and do not yet deserve. And then as to stories, my story amounts to the knife-grinder's, with nothing at all for a catastrophe. A bird in a cage could have as good a story. Most of my events, and nearly all my intense pleasures, have passed in thoughts."

"For the rest," she adds, "you see that there is nothing to say: it is a blank;" and considering how little, up to this time, she had done to startle the world, how few even of her better poems were before it, it must be confessed that Horne's request for particulars of her life seems to have been rather premature. Still, she could not dismiss the idea from her mind, and resuming the subject, says: —

"Yet I could write an autobiography, but not now, and not for an indifferent public; of whom, by the way, I never did and do not complain, seeing that they received my 'Seraphim' with some kindness, and that everything published previously by me I reject myself, and cast upon the ground as unworthy. The 'Seraphim' has faults enough, — and weaknesses besides, — but my voice is in it, in its individual tones, and not inarticulately."

Miss Barrett's projected paper on "Wordsworth and Leigh Hunt" for "A New Spirit," aroused a controversy between the editor and contributor: they were fully agreed as to the treatment of Wordsworth, but over Leigh Hunt held a somewhat excited discussion. Hunt's theological ideas did not come up to the standard of Miss Barrett's faith; but, upon the assurance of Horne that the man was really "a religious man," only not quite orthodox, she relented towards him, adding to her remarks upon the tone of his poetry, —

"May I say of myself that I hope there is nobody in the world with a stronger will and aspiration to escape from sectarianism in any sort or sense, when I have eyes to discern it, and that the sectarianism of the National Churches, to which I do not belong, and of the Dissenting bodies, to which I do — stand together before me on a pretty just level of detestation."

In a subsequent note, referring to the projected paper on herself, after protesting that she will be neither surprised nor disconcerted if the remarks are not of the pleasantest, she says: —

"For the rest, or rather under the whole, if I myself am not tame about the 'Seraphim,' it is because I am the person interested. I wonder to myself sometimes, in a climax of dissatisfaction, how I came to publish it. It is a failure, in my own eyes; and if it were not for the poems of less pretension in its company, would have fallen, both probably and deservedly, a dead weight from the press."

In a further epistle, dated in December, she confesses curiosity to know whom it is Mr. Horne now, with some mystery, is wishing her to write on:—

"Not Dr. Pusey!" she exclaims. "Thank you for the 'not.' And not a political economist, I hope, nor a mathematician, nor a man of science—such a one as Babbage, for instance—to undo me. I am a little beset with business just now, being on the verge of getting another volume into print—with one or two long poems struggling for completion at my hands, in order to a subsequent falling upon the printer's."

Later letters continue to discuss the merits and demerits of various authors omitted from, or commented upon, in "A New Spirit of the Age." Several female contemporary writers are passed in review, and then the novelists come under notice. Here, as everywhere, Miss Barrett does not hesitate to express her own opinions, although they may differ widely from her editor's. She remarks:—

"It appears to me that you cultivate scorn for the novel-readers, or else have no comprehension for them, dividing them into classes of Godwin-readers, Fielding-readers, Richardson-readers, James-readers, and so forth. You have no sympathy for persons who, when they were children, beset everybody in the house, from the proprietor to the second housemaid, to 'tell them a story,' and retain so much of their childhood — green as grass — as that love of stories.

“ Oh, that love for story-telling! It may be foolish, to be sure ; it leads one into waste of time and strong excitements, to be sure ; still, how pleasant it is ! How full of enchantment and dream-time gladnesses ! What a pleasant accompaniment to one's lonely coffee-cup in the morning or evening, to hold a little volume in the left hand and read softly along how Lindoro saw Monimia over the hedge, and what he said to her ! After breakfast we have other matters to do, — grave 'business matters,' poems to write upon Eden, or essays on Carlyle, or literature in various shapes to be employed seriously on. But everybody must attend to a certain proportion of practical affairs of life, and Lindoro and Monimia bring us ours. And then, if Monimia behaves pretty well, what rational satisfaction we have in settling her at the end of the book ! No woman who speculates and practises 'on her own account' has half the satisfaction in securing an establishment that we have with our Monimias, nor should have, let it be said boldly. Did we not divine it would end so, albeit ourselves and Monimia were weeping together at the end of the second volume? Even to the middle of the third, when Lindoro was sworn at for a traitor by everybody in the book, may it not be testified gloriously of us that we saw through him, and relied implicitly upon an exculpating fidelity which should be

'in' at the finis, to glorify him finally? What, have you known nothing, Mr. Editor, of these exaltations? Indeed, your note looks like it.'

The correspondence with Horne in respect to matters connected with the "New Spirit" ran on into the new year. One note in January contained some very appropriate and truthful words on Byron, one of Elizabeth Barrett's childish idols, to whom, with her usual unswerving tenacity, she held true in her maturity: —

"Horne!" she exclaims, "do you, too, call Byron vindictive? I do not. If he turned upon the dart, it was by the instinct of passion, not by the theory of vengeance, I believe and am assured. Poor, poor Lord Byron! Now would I lay the sun and moon against a tennis-ball that he had more tenderness in one section of his heart than —— has in all hers, though a tenderness misunderstood and crushed, ignorantly, profanely, and vilely, by false friends and a pattern wife. His blood is on our heads — on us in England."

Many contemporaries included in or suggested for "A New Spirit of the Age" are criticised by Miss Barrett with independence of expression and vigor of thought, — that vigor which is absurdly styled "masculine;" but enough has been said to prove that her mastery of language was not confined to poesy only, and that her thoughts could be told as fluently, yet as condensedly, in prose. With some few words from her letters on Horne's paper about herself, — a paper of which she saw nothing until it appeared in print, — we can take leave of "A New Spirit of the Age." To write about herself was, as Horne points out, a nice and delicate thing; but, as he adds, "she gets through it with the ease of any truthful person who believes in the truthfulness of another."

"It has been haunting me all this morning that you may be drawing the very last inference I should wish you to draw from my silence. But I have been so unwell that I could not even read, and the writing has been impossible; and people cry out even now, 'Why, surely you are not going to write!'

"I must write. It is on my mind and must be off it.

"First to thank you for the books, which it was such unnecessary kindness for you to send, and then for the abundant kindness in another way, which will, at the earliest thought, occur to you. My only objection to the paper is, that the personal kindness is too evident. My objection, you will see, leaves me full of gratitude to you, and fills to the brim that Venetian goblet of former obligations which never held any poison.

"You are guilty of certain exaggerations, however, in speaking of me, against which I shall oppose my dele, as you allow me. For instance, I have not been shut up in one room for six or seven years — four or five would be nearer; and then, except on one occasion, I have not been for ‘several weeks together in the dark’ during the course of them. And then, there is not a single ‘elegant Latin verse’ extant from my hand. I never cultivated Latin verses. . . .

“There is nothing to alter — that is, nothing to add — in relation to myself; but there are some inaccuracies, as I have explained to you.”

In a later letter Miss Barrett returns to the subject of Horne’s paper on herself, saying:

“Bear in your mind, then, with regard to me, that I thoroughly understand the fulness both of your kindness and your integrity. You are my friend, I hope, but you do not on that account lose the faculty of judging me, or the right of judging me frankly. I do loathe the whole system of personal compliment as a consequence of a personal interest, and I beseech you not to suffer yourself ever by any sort of kind impulse from within, or extraneous influence otherwise, to say or modify a word relating to me. The notice as it stands can be called ‘inadequate’ only in one way, — that you enter on no analysis of my poetical claims in it. In every other respect you know it is extravagantly laudatory. You have rouged me up to the eyes. . . .

“In any case of your approaching the subject of my poetry, you will please me best by speaking out the truth as it occurs to you, broadly, roughly, coarsely, in its whole dimensions. I set more price on your sincerity than on your praise, and consider it more closely connected with the quality called kindness. Recollect that these people who offer a pin to me that they may prick you with it in passing, do not care a pin for me. . . . I want kindness the rarest of all nearly — which is truth.”

CHAPTER V.

FAME.

As early as February, 1843, Elizabeth Barrett had prepared another volume of poems for the press, but was unable to find a publisher willing to undertake the risk of publication. Moxon, when applied to, declared that Tennyson was the only poet he did not lose by.

In the spring of 1844 she tells Horne :—

“I hope my book will be out in a few weeks now. It fags me and over-excites me too much. Perhaps you will think me improved? Perhaps; I seem to myself to have more strength. I only wish that bodies and souls would draw together.”

Her hope notwithstanding, the poems remained unpublished all through the summer, and when at last the collection appeared, it had grown into two well-filled volumes which, after all, were issued by Moxon. The work was inscribed to her father in as affectionate terms as was her childhood's poetry, and the Dedication is interesting as showing, apart from other reasons, on what a footing she still lived with her surviving parent. She writes :—

“My father, when your eyes fall upon this page of dedication, and you start to see to whom it is inscribed, your first thought will be of the time far off when I was a child and wrote verses, and when I dedicated them to you who were my public and my critic. Of all that such a recollection implies of saddest and sweetest to both of us, it would become neither of us to speak before the world ; nor would it be possible for us to speak of it to one another with voices that did not falter. Enough that what is in my heart when I write thus will be fully known to yours. And my desire is that you, who are a witness how if this art of poetry had been a less earnest object to me, it must have fallen from exhausted hands before this day — that you, who have shared with me in things bitter and sweet, softening or enhancing them, every day — that you, who hold with me, over all sense of loss and transiency, one hope by one name — may accept from me the inscription of these volumes, the exponents of a few years of an existence which has been sustained and comforted by you as well as given. Somewhat more faint-hearted than I used to be, it is my fancy thus to seem to return to a visible personal dependence on you, as if indeed I were a child again ; to conjure your beloved image between myself and the public, so as to be sure of one smile ; and to satisfy my heart while I satisfy my ambition, by associating with the great pursuit of my life its tenderest and holiest affection.”

Her Dedication was followed by a lengthy Preface, which was to no small extent a criticism on her own collection, especially on the chief poem in it. After stating that the collection now offered to the public consisted of poems written since the publication of the 'Seraphim' volume, and which were now, with a few exceptions, printed for the first time, she refers to the "Drama of Exile," the initial piece, "as the longest and most important work (to me!) which I have ever trusted into the current of publication."

The theme of the "Drama of Exile" is so daring, and the execution, despite innumerable faults, so excellent, that either condemnation or praise is hard to award. The great defect in what the poetess intended should be her masterpiece is that, notwithstanding the introduction of Adam and Eve, and the self-sacrificing love of the latter for her partner in sorrow, it is almost entirely devoid of human interest. Admiration is frequently compelled by bursts of true lyrical beauty; but the heart never throbs with hope nor thrills with terror for the poetic phantasmata whose weeping and wailing fill so many pages of the drama. There are, it is true, some magnificent passages of poetry in the work, notably Lucifer's description of the effect of the curse upon animal creation. Reminding Adam of "when the curse took us in Eden," he says:—

" On a mountain-peak,
 Half-sheathed in primal woods, and glittering
 In spasms of awful sunshine, at that hour
 A lion couched — part raised upon his paws,
 With his calm, massive face turned full on thine,
 And his mane listening. When the ended curse
 Left silence in the world, right suddenly
 He sprang up rampant, and stood straight and stiff
 As if the new reality of death
 Were dashed against his eyes, and roared so fierce (Such thick carnivorous passion in his throat Tearing a passage through the wrath and fear),
 And roared so wild, and smote from all the hills
 Such fast, keen echoes crumbling down the vales
 Precipitately, that the forest beasts,
 One after one, did mutter a response
 In savage and in sorrowful complaint,
 Which trailed along the gorges. Then, at once,
 He fell back, and rolled crashing from the height."

This is a magnificent picture most grandiloquently portrayed, but it is the finest passage in the "Drama." Its author appears to have felt that there was something wanting in her work, and therefore strives to explain away what might be objected to, and to deprecate criticism, by a lengthy Preface.

"The Vision of Poets," the second longest poem in the collection, is referred to by her as an attempt to express her view of the poet's mission, "of the self-abnegation implied in it, of the great work involved in it, of the duty and glory of what Balzac has beautifully and truly called la patience angélique du génie; and of the obvious truth, above all, that if knowledge is power, suffering should be acceptable as a part of power." Without in any way indorsing Miss Barrett's theory, and, indeed, feeling that it is radically false to nature and genius, and that no poet should humiliate himself to the "world's use," or suffer unresistingly the humiliation of the "world's cruelty," it must at once be acknowledged that the grandeur and power of the poem is likely to blind readers to its perverse doctrine. Apart from Dante and Shakspeare, it would be difficult to meet with so great a condensation of thought, such abridged yet complete characterization, as is frequently met with in this marvellous poem; and yet, all things considered, it is not perhaps very strange that the "Vision of Poets" has failed to elicit the applause of critics, and indeed to find that many of them have refrained from speaking of it at all. In the whole range of literature it would be difficult to parallel, in prose or verse, such concise yet descriptive portraiture as the poem contains. It is replete with compound words and epigrammatic sentences, but it must be confessed that the "Conclusion" is out of tone with the rest of the poem, and uncalled for. Every poem should, as Elizabeth Barrett says herself, have "an object and a significance;" but her propensity to drag in a moral, or to tag on a didactic dissertation of some kind, even from an artistic point of view, disfigures her most beautiful work.

Her Preface to the collection concludes with the hope that some of the faults which she had formerly been reproached with may have been outgrown:—

"Because-some progress in mind and in art every active thinker and honest writer must consciously or unconsciously make, with the progress of existence and experience, and in some sort—since 'we learn in suffering what we teach in song'—my songs may be fitter to teach. But if it were not presumptuous language on the lips of one to whom life is more than usually uncertain, my favorite wish for this work would be, that it be received by the public as a step in the right track, towards a future indication of more value and acceptability. I would fain do better—and I feel as if I might do better: I aspire to do better. . . . In any case, while my poems are full of faults—as I go forward to my critics and confess—they have my heart and life in them; they are not empty shells. . . . Poetry has been as serious a thing to me as life itself; and life has been a very serious thing : there has been no playing at skittles for me in either. I never mistook pleasure for the final cause of poetry, nor leisure for the hour of the poet. I have done my work, so far, as work, — not as mere hand and head work, apart from the personal being, but as the completest expression of that being to which I could attain, — and as work I offer it to the public, feeling its shortcomings more deeply than any of my readers, because measured from the height of my aspiration ; but feeling also that the reverence and sincerity with which the work was done should give it some protection with the reverent and sincere.”

The collection was received by quite an outburst of applause. Although the critics, with their usual dread of committing themselves too deeply, all found something to object to in the work, one admiring what another disliked, and the other disliking what the former admired, they all arrived at the conclusion that another true and great poet had arisen. “The critics,” says Miss Barrett, “have all, according to their measure, been kind and generous to me. For the newspapers, besides those I mentioned, the ‘Examiner’ sounded a clarion for me. I am well pleased altogether.” To Horne she says:

“I have had a long and most kind letter from Harriet Martineau, and from Mrs. Jameson, and a kind note from Mr. Landor, and others. Now, I do beseech you, by whatever regard you may feel for me (in which I am ambitious to believe), to write to me a kind letter too ; that is, a sincere letter. Do not fancy yourself obliged to write compliments to me, — surely our friendship has outgrown such mere green wood. I promise not to enact the Archbishop of Granada if you speak the truth to me. . . . ‘The Drama of Exile,’ the longest poem, has been thrown aside by nearly all the official critics as inferior to the rest, and perhaps, as a whole, is unsuccessful. ‘Lady Geraldine’s Courtship’ appears to be the popular favorite. Oh for life and strength to do something better and worthier than any of them ! I feel as if I could do it.”

In this instance all must now agree that the popular voice was the voice of justice. The “Drama of Exile,” evidently the author’s favorite, her most ambitious performance, and the work on which she had relied for fame, is a failure ; a grand failure it is true, but from the very nature of its theme bound to be more or less a failure, notwithstanding the fact that it contains passages of extraordinary grandeur and is replete with others of lyrical sweetness.

“Lady Geraldine’s Courtship” is, deservedly, one of the most popular poems of the age. The best-known legend connected with its composition was doubtless originally promulgated by Miss Mitford to account for its wonderful rush of glowing language, and to enhance the mystery of its authoress, of whose personality so few people knew anything. The poem, making forty-two octavo pages, was averred to have been written within the space of twelve hours, — written off at electric speed in order to make up the number of sheets required by the American publisher of the poems. How much of truth may be contained in this myth is hard to say; but that Miss Barrett composed at times with great rapidity is a fact. Much of the rugged rhythm and apparent carelessness of construction which characterize so many of her poems is doubtless due to the speed at which they were evolved, and to the same cause may be ascribed their occasional obscurity and other defects; but that their defective or affected rhyming was not due to this cause we have her own words to prove.

Of "Lady Geraldine's Courtship" Edgar Poe, no careless critic, said that, with the exception of Tennyson's "Locksley Hall," he had never perused a poem "containing so much of the fiercest passion with so much of the most ethereal fancy." "Lady Geraldine's Courtship" he somewhat too dogmatically pronounced to be "the only poem of its author which is not deficient, considered as an artistic whole. Her constructive ability," he added, "is either not very remarkable, or has never been properly brought into play. In truth, her genius is too impetuous for the minuter technicalities of that elaborate art so needful in the building up of pyramids for immortality."

It is but justice to Poe to tell that, after a full and frank exposition of her faults and her fancied faults, he gives ungrudging praise to her merits, not only deeming her poetic inspiration to be of the highest, the most august conceivable, but declaring it to be his deliberate opinion, "not idly entertained, nor founded on any visionary basis," that she had "surpassed all her poetical contemporaries of either sex, with a single exception," the exception being Tennyson. Poe's most enthusiastic admiration for Miss Barrett led him to do his best to spread a knowledge of her works in the United States, where, indeed, he was the pioneer of her fame. He dedicated to her — "To the noblest of her sex" — his last and most valuable volume of poems. Something of what the lady thought of him will be learned later on.

The story told in "Lady Geraldine's Courtship" — "A Romance of the Age," as it is subtitled — is devoid of sensational episodes or romantic incidents. It is almost barren of plot, and is founded on the threadbare basis of being told by the chief actor in a letter to a friend. The writer of the story is supposed to be a poet named Bertram, a man of the people, who has won a place in society by his poetic talent : —

“And because I was a poet, and because the people praised me,
With their critical deductions for the modern writer’s fault,
I could sit at rich men’s tables, though the courtesies that raised me
Still suggested clear between us the pale spectrum of the salt.”

Lady Geraldine, meeting him, invites him to her country residence, Wycombe Hall, in Sussex. She, an earl’s daughter, is proud and noble, and being richly dowered with halls and castles, is beset by many suitors, all of whom are treated with disdain. Of course, Bertram falls passionately in love with her : —

“Yet I could not choose but love her — I was born to poet uses —
To love all things set above me, all of good and all of fair.”

Meeting and conversing with her daily, and reading his own or other poets’ writings to her, her hold upon him becomes more and more intense, until at last he cannot fly her presence, hopeless though he feels his love to be, and knowing that the longer he lingers near her the stronger grow his chains. Tangled in love's meshes, Bertram follows in the retinue of his fair hostess, wandering with her and her companions about the glorious grounds. Lady Geraldine is thus described as one day she stood:—

“ Thus, her foot upon the new-mown grass — bareheaded — with the flowings
 Of the virginal white vesture, gathered closely to her throat,
 With the golden ringlets in her neck, just quickened by her going,
 And appearing to breathe sun for air, and doubting if to float, —
 With a branch of dewy maple, which her right hand held above her,
 And which trembled a green shadow in betwixt her and the skies,—
 As she turned her face in going, thus, she drew me on to love her,
 And to study the deep meaning of the smile hid in her eyes.”

Thus Bertram continues to linger, although he knows how hopeless his case must be; he lingers still, like the stag “that tries to go on grazing with the great deep gun-wound in his neck.” And Lady Geraldine, although she has many suitors, smiles upon them "with such a gracious coldness that they could not press their futures" upon her decision. Until one day Bertram, accidentally placed in an inner chamber, becomes the unintentional auditor of some one pleading for the lady's hand:—

"Well I knew that voice ; it was an earl's, of soul that matched his station, —
Of a soul complete in lordship, — might and right read on his brow:
Very finely courteous ; far too noble to doubt his admiration
Of the common people, — he atones for grandeur by a bow."

The poor poet, compelled to listen against his will, hears the lady reject her noble suitor, it is true, but, in answer to an inaudible remark from the earl, hears her respond, —

"And your lordship judges rightly. Whom I marry shall be noble,
Ay, and wealthy. I shall never blush to think how he was born."

When Bertram heard this, and knew that whatever foolish hopings against hope he may have entertained were forever dashed to the ground, he forbore no longer, but rushed into her presence, as her lordly suitor retreated, and "spake out wildly, fiercely," —

"I plucked up her social fictions, bloody-rooted, though leaf verdant, —
 Trod them down with words of shaming, — all the purples and the gold,
 And the 'landed stakes' and lordships — all that spirits pure and ardent
 Are cast out of love and reverence, because chancing not to hold.

"‘For myself I do not argue,’ said I, ‘though I love you, Madam, —
 But for better souls, that nearer to the height of yours have trod ;
 And this age shows, to my thinking, still more infidels to Adam,
 Than directly, by profession, simple infidels to God.’

. . . . .

"But at last there came a pause. I stood all vibrating with thunder
 Which my soul had used. The silence drew her face up like a call.
 Could you guess what word she uttered? She looked up as if in wonder,
 With tears beaded on her lashes, and said, ‘Bertram!’
     it was all.

"If she had cursed me — and she might have — or if even, with queenly bearing,
 Which at need is used by women, she had risen up and said,
 ‘Sir, you are my guest, and therefore I have given you a full hearing ;
 Now, beseech you, choose a name exacting somewhat less, instead,’

“I had borne it! but that ‘Bertram’ — why, it lies there on the paper
A mere word, without her accents, — and you cannot judge the weight
Of the calm which crushed my passion! I seemed swimming in a vapor, —
And her gentleness did shame me, whom her scorn made desolate.”

After this, what follows is not difficult to guess; and it does not come as a surprise to learn this solution of her words:—

“Softened, quickened to adore her, on his knee he fell before her —
And she whispered low in triumph, ‘It shall be as I have sworn!
Very rich he is in virtues, — very noble — noble, certes;
And I shall not blush in knowing that men call him lowly born!’”

The poverty of the plot, the improbability of the whole story, the author’s frequent ignorance of worldly matters, the faulty and too long deferred rhymes, lapses in the rhythm, and occasional commonplaces, all vanish in the passionate glow of thought, in the rush of burning words, and the magnificent flood of imaginative poetry, bearing everything along with it in a resistless torrent of glory and grandeur that fairly overpowers and conquers the most critical reader’s judgment.

Besides the more prominent pieces already alluded to, the 1844 collection contained several other pieces of supreme merit. The sonnet, a condensed and artificial form of poesy almost outside the fluent muse of Elizabeth Barrett, had several pages devoted to it; but their merits were less conspicuous, although studded with beauties, than was usual with her work. "The Soul's Expression," as an autobiographic revelation, is interesting; "Grief" contains some fine thought, such as "I tell you hopeless grief is passionless;" and "The Prisoner" concludes with a grand idea; but as yet her sonnets, although vigorous, were somewhat unskilfully wrought, and uncouth in expression.

The miscellaneous poems cannot be too highly praised, nor too often perused; fresh beauties burst forth at every glance. "The Lay of the Brown Rosarie" is replete with scintillations of true poetic fervor; it is styled a ballad, but is of a purer tone and a more etherealized spirit than is generally prevalent in ballad poesy, ancient or modern. In its circumscribed space the story is complete; and although undisfigured by the "moral" so frequently and needlessly dragged in by Miss Barrett, is all through its dramatic course illuminated by an under-glow of suggested meaning.

“The Duchess May,” another ballad, of more heroic mould, is less in sympathy with our century’s way of thinking. It contains grand lines and stirring thoughts ; but the narrative is improbable, the subject not in unison with the age’s tendencies, and therefore unsuited to its author’s own practical, if passionate mind. To “The Lost Bower,” interspersed as it is with personal allusions, reference has already been made. It is replete with passages of the purest poesy, and leaves an impression upon the reader’s mind of mingled melody and pathos, childish simplicity and womanly wisdom, which time will vainly try to efface. The following lines from “The Lost Bower” will, like petals picked from a lovely blossom, suggest how beauteous the complete bloom may be : —

“Green the land is where my daily
Steps in jocund childhood played ;
Dimpled close with hill and valley,
Dappled very close with shade ;
Summer-snow of apple-blossoms running up from glade to glade.

“There is one hill I see nearer,
In my vision of the rest ;
And a little wood seems clearer,
As it climbeth from the west,
Sideway from the tree-locked valley to the airy upland crest.

“ Small the wood is, green with hazels,
 And, completing the ascent,
 Where the wind blows and sun dazzles,
 Thrills in leafy tremblement :
 Like a heart that, after climbing, beateth quickly through content.

“ Yet in childhood little prized I
 That fair walk and far survey :
 ’T was a straight walk, unadvised by
 The least mischief worth a nay, —
 Up and down — as dull as grammar on an eve of holiday !

“ But the wood, all close and clenching
 Bough in bough and root in root, —
 No more sky (for over-branching)
 At your head than at your foot, —
 Oh, the wood drew me within it, by a glamour past dispute.

“ On a day, such pastime keeping,
 With a fawn’s heart debonair,
 Under-crawling, over-leaping
 Thorns that prick and boughs that bear,
 I stood suddenly astonished — I was gladdened unaware !

“ From the place I stood in, floated
 Back the covert dim and close ;
 And the open ground was suited
 Carpet-smooth with grass and moss.
 And the bluebell’s purple presence signed it worthily across.

“ Here a linden-tree stood, brightening
 All adown its silver rind ;
 For, as some trees draw the lightning,
 So this tree, unto my mind,
 Drew to earth the blessed sunshine, from the sky where it was shrined.

“ Tall the linden-tree, and near it
 An old hawthorn also grew ;
 And wood-ivy like a spirit
 Hovered dimly round the two,
 Shaping thence that Bower of Beauty which I sing of thus to you.

“ As I entered, mosses hushing
 Stole all noises from my foot :
 And a round elastic cushion,
 Clasped within the linden’s root,
 Took me in a chair of silence, very rare and absolute.

“ So, young muser, I sate listening
 To my Fancy’s wildest word —
 On a sudden, through the glistening
 Leaves around, a little stirred,
 Came a sound, a sense of music, which was rather felt than heard.

“ Softly, finely, it inwound me ;
 From the world it shut me in, —
 Like a fountain falling round me,
 Which with silver waters thin
 Clips a little marble Naiad, sitting smilingly within.

“ I rose up in exaltation
 And an inward trembling heat,

And (it seemed) in gestic of passion
 Dropped the music to my feet,
 Like a garment rustling downwards — such a silence followed it.

“ In a child-abstraction lifted,
 Straightway from the Bower I past ;
 Foot and soul being dimly drifted
 Through the greenwood till at last
 In the hill-top’s open sunshine I all consciously was cast.

. . . . .

“ I affirm that, since I lost it,
 Never bower has seemed so fair ;
 Never garden-creeper crossed it
 With so deft and brave an air ;
 Never bird sung in the summer, as I saw and heard them there.”

These stray extracts can give but a faint idea of the pathetic beauty of the whole poem ; of its gust of melodious musical melancholy, which “ resembles sorrow only as the mist resembles rain.” Haplessly, like so many of its author’s best pieces, the story is burdened and drawn out by a lengthy, unneeded “ moral ” being appended to it.

In “ A Child Asleep ” are to be found thoughts and similes worthy of the highest poetic parentage ; but one idea, “ Folded eyes see brighter colors than the open ever do,” is scarcely an improvement upon Coleridge's beautiful verse, "My eyes make pictures when they are shut." "The Cry of the Children," and some other splendid pieces gathered into this collection, have already received notice; but amid the remainder may be specially pointed out "The Fourfold Aspect," "A Flower in a Letter," "The Cry of the Human," with its terrible opening, —

“ ‘There is no God!’ the foolish saith,
 But none, ‘There is no sorrow;’
 And Nature oft the cry of faith
 In bitter need will borrow.
 Eyes, which the preacher could not school,
 By wayside graves are raised;
 And lips say, ‘God be pitiful,’
 Who ne'er said, ‘God be praised!’” —

"A Lay of the Early Rose," despite its obtrusive moral, "Bertha in the Lane," "A Rhapsody of Life's Progress," that "most musical, most melancholy" "Catarina to Camoëns," "The Romance of the Swan's Nest" and others of various kinds of excellence, — and all possessed of power and beauty sufficient for each one separately to make the reputation of any lesser poet. The peculiar pathos of "The Romance of the Swan's Nest" dowers it with some indefinable fascination, and causes it to have for us a pre-eminence of charm we have never been able to explain. It is as sweet as the aroma from new-mown hay, yet as sad as the ceaseless moan on the sea-bruised beach. It is short, and all worthy to be given in full :—

Little Ellie sits alone
Mid the beeches of a meadow,
By a stream-side, on the grass :
And the trees are showering down
Doubles of their leaves in shadow,
On her shining hair and face.

She has thrown her bonnet by,
And her feet she has been dipping
In the shallow water's flow ;
Now she holds them nakedly
In her hands, all sleek and dripping,
While she rocketh to and fro.

Little Ellie sits alone, —
And the smile, she softly useth,
Fills the silence like a speech ;
While she thinks what shall be done, —
And the sweetest pleasure chooseth
For her future within reach !

Little Ellie in her smile
Chooseth : “ I will have a lover,
Riding on a steed of steeds !
He shall love me without guile ;
And to him I will discover
The swan's nest among the reeds.

“ And the steed shall be red-roan,
And the lover shall be noble,
With an eye that takes the breath, —
And the lute he plays upon,
Shall strike ladies into trouble,
As his sword strikes men to death.

“ And the steed it shall be shod
All in silver, housed in azure,
And the mane shall swim the wind,
And the hoofs, along the sod,
Shall flash onward in a pleasure,
Till the shepherds look behind.

“ But my lover will not prize
All the glory that he rides in,
When he gazes in my face !
He will say, ‘ O Love, thine eyes
Build the shrine my soul abides in ;
And I kneel here for thy grace.’

“ Then, ay, then — he shall kneel low, —
With the red-roan steed anear him,
Which shall seem to understand —
Till I answer, ‘ Rise, and go !
For the world must love and fear him
Whom I gift with heart and hand.’

“ Then he will arise so pale,
I shall feel my own lips tremble
With a yes I must not say —
Nathless, maiden-brave, ‘ Farewell,’
I will utter and dissemble —
‘ Light to-morrow with to-day.’

“ Then he will ride through the hills
 To the wide world past the river,
 There to put away all wrong !
 To make straight distorted wills, —
 And to empty the broad quiver
 Which the wicked bear along.

“ Three times shall a young foot-page
 Swim the stream, and climb the mountain,
 And kneel down beside my feet —
 ‘ Lo! my master sends this gage,
 Lady, for thy pity’s counting !
 What wilt thou exchange for it ?’

“ And the first time, I will send A white rosebud for a guerdon, —
 And the second time, a glove !
 But the third time — I may bend
 From my pride, and answer, ‘ Pardon —
 If he come to take my love.’

“ Then the young foot-page will run —
 Then my lover will ride faster,
 Till he kneeleth at my knee !
 ‘ I am a duke’s eldest son !
 Thousand serfs do call me master, —
 But, O Love, I love but thee !’

“ He will kiss me on the mouth
 Then, and lead me as a lover
 Through the crowds that praise his deeds !
 And, when soul-tied by one troth,
 Unto him I will discover
 That swan’s nest among the reeds.”

Not yet ended, rose up gayly,
Tied the bonnet, donned the shoe,
And went homeward, round a mile,
Just to see, as she did daily,
What more eggs were with the two.

Pushing through the elm-tree copse,
Winding by the stream, light-hearted,
Where the osier pathway leads
Past the boughs, she stoops and stops!
Lo! the wild swan had deserted,
And a rat had gnawed the reeds.

Ellie went home sad and slow.
If she found the lover ever,
With his red-roan steed of steeds,
Sooth I know not; but I know
She could show him never — never
That swan's nest among the reeds!

Another remarkable and still more powerful poem is "The Dead Pan," with which the collection concludes. In its beauties and, it must be acknowledged, in its faults, this piece is thoroughly idiosyncratic of its author. "The poem," says Elizabeth Barrett, "was partly inspired by Schiller's "Götter Griechenlands," and partly by the tradition recorded by Plutarch, that at the moment of Christ's death on the cross a cry was heard sweeping across the sea, "Great Pan is dead!" and that then and forever all the oracles of heathendom ceased. "It is in all veneration to the memory of the deathless Schiller," says the poetess, "that I oppose a doctrine still more dishonoring to poetry than to Christianity."

To John Kenyon, whose "graceful and harmonious paraphrase of the German poem was the first occasion of the turning" of her thoughts towards the theme, she inscribed "The Dead Pan." Thoroughly typical of her style is the opening invocation:—

"Gods of Hellas, gods of Hellas,
Can you listen in your silence?
Can your mystic voices tell us
Where ye hide, — in floating islands,
With a wind that evermore
Keeps you out of sight of shore?
Pan, Pan is dead."

Of the many peculiar rhymes which Miss Barrett — sometimes "without rhyme or reason" — persistently made use of in this and other of her poems, the quoted stanza does not present an unfair example. Her correspondence with Horne on the subject is not only amusing, but also characteristic of her unchangeableness of will when she believed in her own ideas. She had forwarded Horne the manuscript of her poem, and requested his opinion upon it.

What was his full reply is unknown, but he remarks : " Of course, I admired its poetry and versification ; but concerning her views of perfect and imperfect, or allowable rhymes, in that and several of her other productions, I wished once for all to object, and give full reasons for it. . . . I took objection to many of the rhymes. I did not like 'tell us' as a rhyme for 'Hellas,' and still less 'islands' as a rhyme for 'silence.'" Other still less excusable examples were objected to, such as "rolls on" and "the sun ;" "altars" and "welters ;" "flowing" and "slow in ;" "iron" and "inspiring ;" "driven" and "heaving," and so forth. What little effect her brother poet's animadversions had upon Miss Barrett, the following words will show :—

"MY DEAR MR. HORNE, — Do you know I could not help, in the midst of my horror and Panic terror, smiling outright at the naïveté of your doubt as to whether my rhymes were really meant for rhymes at all? That is the naïveté of a right savage nature, — of an Indian playing with a tomahawk, and speculating as to whether the white faces had any feeling in their skulls, quand même! Know, then, that my rhymes are really meant for rhymes, . . . and that in no spirit of carelessness or easy writing, or desire to escape difficulties, have I run into them, but chosen them, selected them, on principle, and with the determinate purpose of doing my best. . . . What you say of a 'poet's duty,' no one in the world can feel more deeply in the verity of it than myself. If I fail ultimately before the public — that is, before the people, for an ephemeral popularity does not appear to me worth trying for — it will not be because I have shrunk from the amount of labor, where labor could do anything. I have worked at poetry; it has not been with me reverie, but art. As the physician and lawyer work at their several professions, so have I, and so do I, apply to mine.

“. . . With reference to the double rhyming, it has appeared to me employed with far less variety in our serious poetry than our language would admit of generally, and that the various employment of it would add another string to the lyre of our Terpander. . . . A great deal of attention — far more than it would take to rhyme with conventional accuracy — have I given to the subject of rhymes, and have determined in cold blood to hazard some experiments. . . .

“ And now, upon all this, — to prove to you that I do not set out on this question with a minority of one, — I take the courage and vanity to send to you a note which a poet whom we both admire wrote to a friend of mine, who lent him the manuscript of this very 'Pan.' Mark! no opinion was asked about the rhymes; the satisfaction was altogether impulsive, — from within. Send me the note back, and never tell anybody that I showed it to you; it would appear too vain. Also, I have no right to show it. It was sent to me as likely to please me, and pleased me so much and naturally, on various accounts, and not the least from the beauty of the figure used to illustrate my rhymatology, that I begged to be allowed to keep it. So send it back, after reading it confidentially, and pardon me as much as you can of the self-will fostered by it."

After such a response, Horne, as will be readily imagined, dropped the subject of allowable rhymes; but it is most interesting to learn that the poet whose opinion had proved so satisfactory to Miss Barrett was Mr. Robert Browning, at that time personally unknown to her.

Writing on the 3d December to Horne, Miss Barrett says: —

"The volumes are succeeding past any expectation or hope of mine. . . . I continue to have letters of the kindest from unknown readers. I had a letter yesterday from the remote region of Gutter Lane, beginning, 'I thank thee!' . . . The American publisher has printed fifteen hundred copies. If I am a means of ultimate loss to him, I shall sit in sackcloth."

There was no need to have feared for the American any more than for the English publisher; both found Miss Barrett's poems a good investment. Her reputation, indeed, was of almost as early a growth in the United States as in Great Britain. Edgar Poe, if not the first, was one of the first to introduce her to the American public, issuing some of her earlier pieces through the pages of "Graham's Magazine," which he was then editing.

In a critique he subsequently wrote on Miss Barrett's poetry, Poe alludes to certain shortcomings in the technicalities of verse, especially bewailing her inattention to rhythm, an error that might have been fatal to her fame, but concludes with the declaration that the pen is impotent to express in detail the beauties of her work. "Her poetic inspiration," he remarks, "is the highest; we can conceive nothing more august." Nevertheless, he perceives that her sense of art, pure in itself, "has been contaminated by pedantic study of false models, — a study which has the more easily led her astray, because she placed an undue value upon it as rare as alien to her character of woman. The accident," he considers, "of her having been long secluded by ill-health from the world . . . has imparted to her . . . a comparative independence of men and opinions with which she did not come personally in contact, a happy audacity of thought and expression never before known in one of her sex."

Lofty as was Poe's opinion, and exalted his praise of her, Elizabeth Barrett did not appear to care altogether for his remarks. Writing to Horne in May, 1845, she says:—

“Your friend Mr. Poe is a speaker of strong words ‘in both kinds.’ . . . Mr. Poe seems to me in a great mist on the subject of metre. . . . But I hope you will assure him from me that I am grateful for his reviews, and in no complaining humor at all. As to ‘The Raven,’ tell me what you shall say about it. There is certainly a power, but it does not appear to me the natural expression of a sane intellect in whatever mood; and I think that this should be specified in the title of the poem. There is a fantasticalness about the ‘Sir or Madame,’ and things of the sort, which is ludicrous, unless there is a specified insanity to justify the straws. Probably he — the author — intended it to be read in the poem, and he ought to have intended it. The rhythm acts excellently upon the imagination, and the ‘Nevermore’ has a solemn chime in it. . . . Just because I have been criticised, I would not criticise. And I am of opinion that there is an uncommon force and effect in the poem.”

Writing subsequently to Poe on the subject of this poem, Miss Barrett says:—

“‘The Raven’ has produced a sensation, a ‘fit horror,’ here in England. Some of my friends are taken by the fear of it, and some by the music. I hear of persons haunted by the ‘Nevermore,’ and one acquaintance of mine, who has the misfortune of possessing a ‘bust of Pallas,’ never can bear to look at it in the twilight. Our great poet, Mr. Browning, is enthusiastic in his admiration of the rhythm.”

Encouraged by her remarks, Poe sent her a copy of a selection of his "Tales," just published ; and Miss Barrett, writing to a friend, alludes to the story entitled "The Facts in the Case of M. Valdemar" thus :—

"There is a tale of his which I do not find in this volume, but which is going the rounds of the newspapers, about mesmerism, throwing us all into most admired disorder, or dreadful doubts as to whether it can be true, as the children say of ghost-stories. The certain thing in the tale in question is the power of the writer, and the faculty he has of making horrible improbabilities seem near and familiar."

The great success of her latest literary venture naturally brought Miss Barrett a large increase of correspondence ; nevertheless, she contrived to maintain epistolary chatter with such old friends as Miss Mitford and Horne. One prominent theme with her at this period was the marvellous recovery of Harriet Martineau, after several years of confirmed illness. This cure of a disease considered hopeless by orthodox medical men was ascribed to mesmerism. It naturally created a lively sensation, even beyond the boundaries of medical and literary circles, and no one appears to have been more deeply and permanently impressed by the affair than Elizabeth Barrett, who was naturally inspired with admiration and interest for the sturdy independence, in some respects akin to her own, of her friend, correspondent, and contemporary, Harriet Martineau. Writing to an American friend, Miss Barrett remarks :—

“ Harriet Martineau’s mesmeric experience . . . is making a great noise and sensation here, and producing some vexation among her unbelieving friends. It was, however, worthy of herself, having, according to her own belief, received a great benefit from means not only questionable but questioned, to come forward bravely and avouch the truth of it. Do you believe at all? I do; but it is in the highest degree repulsive to me as a subject, and suggestive of horror. It is making great way in England, and, as far as I can understand, is disputed more by the unlearned than the learned.”

Writing to Horne, November, 1844, she says :

“As you remind me, Miss Martineau is a great landmark to show how far a recovery can go. She can walk five miles a day now with ease, and is well, she says,—not comparatively well, but well in the strict sense. . . . She has an apocalyptic housemaid (save the mark!) who, being clairvoyante, prophesies concerning the anatomical structure of herself and others, and declares ‘awful spiritual dicta’ concerning the soul and the mind and their future destination; discriminating, says Miss Martineau, ‘between what she hears at church and what is true.’ . . . I am credulous and superstitious, naturally, and find no difficulty in the wonder; only precisely because I believe it, I would not subject myself to this mystery at the will of another, and this induction into things unseen. My blood runs the wrong way to think of it. Is it lawful, or, if lawful, expedient? Do you believe a word of it, or are you sceptical like papa?"

Miss Martineau, with her usual stern idea of duty, considered it right that her cure and its cause should be told to the public. Unfortunately, her medical attendant, in order to controvert her theory, departed from the rules of his profession, ignored the rights due to a patient, and made public particulars which he, at least, should have kept private. Alluding to these circumstances in a letter subsequent to the above, Miss Barrett says:—

“Miss Martineau is astonishing the world with mesmeric statements through the medium of the ‘Athenæum;’ and yet, it happens so that, I believe, few converts will be made by her. The medical men have taken up her glove brutally, as dogs might do,—dogs exclusive of my Flush, who is a gentleman. . . . I hear that Carlyle won’t believe in mesmerism, and calls Harriet Martineau mad. ‘The madness showed itself first in the refusal of a pension; next, in the resolution that, the universe being desirous of reading her letters, the universe should be disappointed; and thirdly, in this creed of mesmerism.’ I wish (if he ever did use such words) somebody would tell him that the first manifestation, at least, was of a noble frenzy, which in these latter days is not too likely to prove contagious. For my own part, I am not afraid to say that I almost believe in mesmerism, and quite believe in Harriet Martineau."

Miss Mitford's correspondence with our poetess was very voluminous during the greater part of 1844 and 1845, but little of personal incident enters into it. The elder lady was enchanted to learn that Miss Barrett intended in future "to write narrative poetry, and narrative poetry of real life," and endeavored to arouse in her mind, but with scant success, an admiration for the first Napoleon.

That in literature, if in nothing else, woman should not only compete with man on an equal footing, but be judged by a similar measure, is a truth all right-minded men would feel, one would think; and yet it is a truth not very widely promulgated or generally recognized. Elizabeth Barrett was not the woman to feel and not assert her ideas on such a theme. "Please to recollect," she says, writing to Horne on the subject of eminent women, "that when I talk of women, I do not speak of them as many men do, . . . according to a separate, peculiar, and womanly standard, but according to the common standard of human nature."

Her fidelity to a conviction could not be shaken by any amount of popular prejudice or private influence. Her ideal of a truth once conceived nothing could destroy, or argument upset. She had formed strong opinions with regard to Leigh Hunt's theology, and consequently looked on his writings with suspicion. "There may be sectarianism in the very cutting off of sectarianism," she says ; and instances his omission, in a critical work upon poetry, "of one of the very noblest odes in the English language, — that on the Nativity, — because it is not on the birth of Bacchus."

Such remarks — and they abound in her characteristic epistles — are of great biographical value, as throwing light upon her firm and thoroughly independent mind. By far the larger portion of her correspondence that has as yet come to light is purely literary. Books and their builders is her constant theme. The popularity of her works in the United States caused her to receive many letters from Americans, and sometimes drew her into discussions with them on the social and other aspects of their country. Writing to one of her New England friends, she says : —

"The cataracts and mountains you speak of have been — are — mighty dreams to me ; and the great people which, proportionate to that scenery, is springing up in their midst to fill a yet vaster futurity, is dearer to me than a dream. America is our brother land, and, though a younger brother, sits already in the teacher's seat and expounds the common rights of our humanity. It would be strange if we in England did not love and exult in America. . . . It is delightful and encouraging to me to think that there, 'among the cataracts and mountains,' which I shall never see—and there is 'dream-land'—sound the voices of friends; and it shall be a constant effort with me to deserve presently in some better measure the kindness for which I never can be more grateful than now.

"We have one Shakspeare between us—your land and ours—have we not; and one Milton? And now we are waiting for you to give us another. Niagara ought,—

'And music born of murmuring sound
Shall pass into his face.'

In the mean time we give honor to those tuneful voices of your people which prophesy a yet sweeter music than they utter. . . .

"You will wonder a good deal,—but would do so less if you were aware of the seclusion of my life,—when I tell you that I never consciously stood face to face with an American in the whole course of it. I never had any sort of personal acquaintance with an American man or woman; therefore you are all dreamed dreams to me,—'gentle dreams' I may well account you."

In another characteristic letter, written about this time to her American correspondent, Miss Barrett says:—

“Poor Hood is dying, in a state of perfect preparation and composure, among the tears of his friends. His disease has been consumption—is, in fact; but the disease is combined with water on the chest, which is expected to bring death. To a friend who asked him the other morning how it was with him, he answered with characteristic playful pathos, ‘The tide is rising, and I shall soon be in port.’ It is said of him that he has no regrets for his life, except for the unborn works which he feels stirring in his dying brain,—a species of regret which is peculiarly affecting to me, as it must be to all who understand it. Alas! it is plain that he has genius greater than anything he has produced; and if this is plain and sad to us, how profoundly melancholy it must be to him. The only comfort is that the end of development is not here.”

The light reflected on her own mental organization by these excerpts is profoundly interesting, and affords a deeper insight into her character than could possibly be obtained by the study of her works written solely for the public eye. In a lighter mood, and somewhat as a relief to the more sombre shades of thoughts lately displayed, one may revert to some of her playful but not less idiosyncratic sayings about her dog Flush. Writing to the American correspondent just referred to, she says:

“As to Flush, I thank you for him, for being glad that he has not arrived at the age of ‘gravity and baldness;’ and I can assure you of the fact of his not being yet four years old (the very prime of his life), and of his having lost no zest for the pleasures of the world, such as eating sponge-cake and drinking coffee à la crème. He lies by me on the sofa, where I lie and write. He lies quite at ease between the velvet of my gown and the fur of my couvre-pied; and has no wicked dreams, I can answer for it, of a hare out of breath, or of a partridge shot through the whirring wing; if he sees a ghost at all, it is of a little mouse which he killed once by accident. He is as innocent as the first dog, when Eve patted him.”

In Miss Barrett's correspondence with another literary friend of this period, the late Thomas Westwood, of poetic repute, the name of Flush frequently figures. On one occasion, says Mr. Westwood, she had expressed regret at the increasing plumpness of her pet. Apparently the gentleman had suggested starvation as a remedy, for her reply runs thus:

“Starve Flush! Starve Flush! My dear Mr. Westwood, what are you thinking of? And besides, if the crime were lawful and possible, I deny the necessity. He is fat, certainly; but he has been fatter. As I say sometimes, with a sigh of sentiment, — he has been fatter, and he may therefore become thinner. And then, he does not eat after the manner of dogs.

I never saw a dog with such a ladylike appetite, nor knew of one by tradition. To eat two small biscuits in succession is generally more than he is inclined to do. When he has meat, it is only once a day, and it must be so particularly well cut up and offered to him on a fork ; and he is subtly discriminative as to differences between boiled mutton and roast mutton, and roast chicken and boiled chicken, that often he walks away in disdain, and 'will have none of it.' He makes a point, indeed, of taking his share of my muffin and of my coffee, and a whole queen's cake when he can get it ; but it is a peculiar royalty of his to pretend to be indifferent even to these ; to refuse them when offered to him ; to refuse them once, twice, and thrice, — only to keep his eye on them, that they should not vanish from the room by any means, as it is his intention to have them at last. My father is quite vexed with me sometimes, and given to declare that I have instructed Flush in the art of giving himself airs, and, otherwise, that no dog in the world could be, of his own accord and instinct, so like a woman. But I never did so instruct him. The 'airs' came as the wind blows. He surprises me just as he surprises other people, — and more, because I see more of him. His sensibility on the matter of vanity strikes me most amusingly. To be dressed up in necklaces and a turban is an excessive pleasure to him ; and to have the glory of eating everything that he sees me eat is to be glorious indeed. Because I offered him cream cheese on a bit of toast and forgot the salt, he refused at once. It was Bedreddin and the unsalted cheese-cake over again.<sup>1</sup> And this although he hates salt, and is conscious of his hatred of salt; but his honor was in the salt, according to his view of the question, and he insisted upon its being properly administered. Now, tell me if Flush's notion of honor and the modern world's are not much on a par. In fact, he thought I intended by my omission to place him below the salt.

"My nearest approach to starving Flush (to come to an end of the subject) is to give general instructions to the servant who helps him to his dinner 'not to press him to eat.' I know he ought not to be fat, — I know it too well; and his father being, according to Miss Mitford's account, square at this moment, there is an hereditary reason for fear. So he is not to be 'pressed;' and, in the mean time, with all the incipient fatness, he is as light at a jump, and as quick of spirits as ever, and quite well."

In a subsequent letter, she again refers to her pet thus: —

"May I tell you that I have lost and won poor Flush again, and that I had to compound with the thieves, and pay six guineas in order to recover him, much as I did last year, — besides the tears, the tears! And when he came home he began to cry. His heart was full, like my own. Nobody knows, except you and me and those who have experienced the like affections, what it is to love a dog and lose it. Grant the love, and the loss is imaginable ; but I complain of the fact that people, who will not or cannot grant the love, set about wondering how one is not ashamed to make such a fuss for a dog. As if love (whether of dogs or man) must not have the same quick sense of sorrow. For my part, my eyelids have swelled and reddened both for the sake of lost dogs and birds, and I do not feel particularly ashamed of it. For Flush, who loves me to the height and depth of the capacity of his own nature, if I did not love him, I could love nothing. Besides, Flush has a soul to love. Do you not believe that dogs have souls? I am thinking of writing a treatise on the subject, after the manner of Plato's famous one.

“The only time almost that Flush and I quarrel seriously, is when I have, as happens sometimes, a parcel of new books to undo and look at. He likes the undoing of the parcel, being abundantly curious ; but to see me absorbed in what he takes to be admiration for the new books is a different matter, and makes him superlatively jealous. I have two long ears flapping into my face immediately from the pillow over my head, in serious appeal. Poor Flushie ! The point of this fact is, that when I read old books he does not care.”

Nowhere was the name of Elizabeth Barrett now more honored or lauded than in the United States, and many were the Americans who strove to obtain her co-operation in their schemes, philanthropic or otherwise. The Abolitionists were the most energetic and successful. There were evident reasons why the daughter of Edward, the niece of Samuel, Barrett should not take any prominent part in public questions connected with slavery; but Elizabeth could not but feel deeply for all enduring sorrow or oppression, and such, she was persuaded, were the negroes in America. Her aid was obtained, she wrote a poem on the subject,—a poem intended to further the abolition of slavery,—and sent it to America. She appeared to have repented subsequently of the work, and expressed a hope that the lines would not be published. They appeared, however, in 1845, in "The Liberty Bell" as "A Curse for a Nation."

Her friendly tone notwithstanding, the lines appear to have created some soreness, and to one American correspondent who had remonstrated with her about them she wrote:—

"Never say that I have cursed your country. I only declared the consequences of the evil in her, and which has since developed itself in thunder and flame. I feel, with more pain than many Americans do, the sorrow of this transition time; but I do know that it is a transition; that it is a crisis; and that you will come out of the fire purified, stainless, having had the angel of a great cause walking with you in the furnace."

These prophetic words, referring to the result of the great conflict in America, she did not live to see verified.

During 1845 Miss Barrett continued a fitful correspondence with Miss Mitford and Horne. The latter she had not as yet seen personally ; but Miss Mitford visited her from time to time, occasionally travelling up from Reading in the morning and returning home the same evening,— a great fatigue for the elderly lady, as she admitted. Miss Barrett's health now seemed to have permanently improved, and there was only the English winter to fear. On the 29th September she writes to Horne :—

“ My foot is in the air, — balanced on the probability of a departure from England, for some land of the sun yet in the clouds. Italy perhaps, Madeira possibly, — there to finish my recovery, or rather to prevent my yearly rechute in the wintry cold ; so let me hear from you quickly. . . . I am likely to go very soon if at all, — the uncertainty is dominant, — and I have been long and continue still in great vexation and perplexity from this doubtfulness. . . . If I go to Italy, it will be by sea, and high authorities among the doctors promise me an absolute restoration in consequence of it ; and I myself have great courage and hope when I do not look beyond myself. I have been drinking life at the sun all this summer (and that is why the fountains of it have seemed so dry to you and the rest of the world); but though in improved health and courage, I am sometimes a very Jacques for melancholy, and go moralizing into a thousand similes half the uses of the day. . . . Miss Mitford proposed kindly coming to see me before I left England; but I have no spirits just now to make farewells of. When I set up my Republic against Plato's, nobody shall say good-by in it, except the 'good haters' one to another."

A saddening and in other ways distressing event which took place soon after the above letter was written rendered the hoped-for journey still more needful. How it came about was thus: Somewhere in the autumn of 1837 Miss Mitford had forwarded Elizabeth Barrett a note introducing Haydon, the artist, remarking, "Miss Arabel will like his vivacity and good spirits." An acquaintanceship was formed, apparently by correspondence, between the poetess and the artist, and continued till the death of the latter. In 1842 Haydon forwarded to Miss Barrett, for her acceptance, a portrait he had painted of Wordsworth on Helvellyn and her acceptance of the valuable gift ran thus:—

My intention was to return by your messenger, when he should come for the picture, some expression of my sense of your very great kindness in trusting it with me, together with this sonnet ; but having since heard from my sister (Arabel) that it may be almost as long as I wish (no ! it can't be so long) before you send such a messenger, I cannot defer thanking you beyond to-day, lest you should fancy me either struck dumb with the pleasure you conferred, or, still worse, born an ungrateful person. Nay, dear Sir, believe how different is the reality from the last supposition.

I have indeed looked at your picture until I lost my obligation to you in my admiration of your work, but in no other way have I been ungrateful. How could I be so? I have seen the great poet who, "reigns over us" twice, face to face, and by you I see him the third time. You have brought me Wordsworth and Helvellyn into this dark and solitary room. . . . You will judge the sonnet too, and will probably not acquit it. It confesses to speaking unworthily and weakly the feeling of its writer ; but she is none the less your obliged

ELIZABETH BARRETT.

The sonnet, which can scarcely be deemed a success, — that is, a success for Miss Barrett, — appeared in the "Athenæum" of October 9. Together with the portrait that had been the source of its inspiration, Haydon sent the poetess a sketch of his projected picture of Curtius leaping into the gulf ; and several little courtesies appear to have passed between the two during the two or three succeeding years. Haydon, who was in a chronic state of pecuniary embarrassment, appears to have occasionally troubled Miss Barrett by leaving in her charge pictures that might otherwise have passed into the possession of the law, or the law's officers. He was also whimsical, eccentric, and often maddened by his treatment by the public. Miss Mitford records how he had painted a portrait of her, "far bigger than life, and with equal excess of color, but otherwise like." Her father did not praise this production enough to please the artist, who felt that it was not considered a success. He took it home and cut out the head, which, however, he preserved. Some days before his melancholy death he sent this portrait to Miss Barrett, because, as he said, he knew she would value it. The next day he called on her at Wimpole Street, to say that he could not part with the portrait, he could only lend it to her. This was three days before his death. The circumstances attending the unfortunate artist's fate are well known. To endeavor to attract some share of the notice the public was bestowing upon less worthy objects, he exhibited one of his most ambitious paintings in a room opposite to where "General Tom Thumb" was displaying himself. The result was disastrous: whilst the natural phenomenon was visited by thousands, the painting was utterly deserted ; and its unhappy exhibitor, in despair, put an end to his own existence. "The grotesque bitterness of the antagonism," says Miss Barrett, "was too much for Haydon,—the dwarf slew the giant."

Besides the shock which the news of Haydon's suicide was to Miss Barrett, she was placed in a sad state of trouble by the information that by taking charge of his manuscripts and papers whilst he was in an insolvent state she had in some way infringed the law, and might find herself entangled in controversy with his creditors. Happily this fright proved groundless, as did also the fear that she was expected to edit or have anything to do with the twenty-six large volumes of Diary he had left in her charge. Says Miss Mitford :—

"I take it that they will be very interesting, not so much about art, but about poetry and literature, and the world in general, poor Haydon having been the friend of almost every eminent man for the last forty years ; but he was so keen and close an observer, and so frank and bold a writer, that the publication of the 'Memoirs' will be terribly dangerous, and would have killed Elizabeth Barrett."

The letter in which Miss Barrett communicated her own account of her feelings on this occasion is sufficiently explicit. She says :—

“The shock of poor Mr. Haydon’s death overcame me for several days. Our correspondence had ceased a full year and a half; but the week preceding the event he wrote several notes to me; and by his desire I have under my care boxes and pictures of his, which he brought himself to the door. Never did I imagine that it was other than one of the passing embarrassments so unhappily frequent with him. Once before he had asked me to give shelter to things belonging to him, which, when the storm had blown over, he had taken back again. I did not suppose that in this storm he was to sink, poor, noble soul!

“And be sure that the pecuniary embarrassment was not what sank him. It was a wind still more east; it was the despair of the ambition by which he lived, and without which he could not live. In the self-assertion which he had struggled to hold up through life he went down into death. He could not bear the neglect, the disdain, the slur cast upon him by the age, and so he perished. . . . His love of reputation, you know, was a disease with him; and, for my part, I believe that he died of it. That is my belief.

“In the last week he sent me his portrait of you [Miss Mitford] among the other things. When he proposed sending it, he desired me to keep it for him; but when it came, a note also came to say that he ‘could not make up his mind to part with it; he would lend it to me for a while;’ a proof, among the rest, that his act was not premeditated,—a moment of madness, or a few moments of madness : who knows? I could not read the inquest, nor any of the details in the newspapers."

Beyond the shock the news of this tragedy gave Miss Barrett, she suffered no other ill effects from it. Poor Haydon's effects were handed over to his legal representatives, and the poetess released from all further trouble about them. She was not, however, successful in getting away on her projected journey during the succeeding winter ; but the dreaded relapse did not befall her. Her health continued to improve beyond all hopes, whilst the foretoken of a great coming happiness must have kept her in a fantasy of joy brighter than she could have ever, or for long past years, have looked for.

MARRIAGE.

THE early summer of 1846 brought Elizabeth Barrett into somewhat close communion with a new friend, Anna Jameson. Kenyon, apparently, was the medium by which these two talented women were introduced to each other. Mrs. Jameson was visiting at 51 Wimpole Street, next door to our poetess, and seems to have made more efforts than one to obtain an interview with her neighbor. Miss Barrett writes:—

“She overcame at last by sending a note to me from the next house. Do you know her? She did not exactly reflect my idea of Mrs. Jameson. And yet it would be both untrue and ungrateful to tell you that she disappointed me. In fact, she agreeably surprised me in one respect, for I had been told that she was pedantic, and I found her as unassuming as a woman need be,—both unassuming and natural. The tone of her conversation, however, is rather analytical and critical than spontaneous and impulsive, and for this reason she appears to me a less charming companion than our friend of Three Mile Cross, who 'wears her heart upon her sleeve,' and shakes out its perfumes at every moment. She — Mrs. Jameson — is keen and calm and reflective. She has a very light complexion, pale lucid eyes, thin colorless lips, fit for incisive meanings, a nose and chin projective without breadth. She was here nearly an hour, and, though on a first visit, I could perceive a vague thought or expression that she would not permit to pass either from my lips or her own. Yet nothing could be greater than her kindness to me, and I already think of her as a friend."

When once Miss Barrett had permitted any one to gain the sanctuary of her presence she became, if the visitant satisfied her expectations, a firm friend and a trusty believer in the entire goodness of the new addition to her limited circle. Mrs. Jameson came as the authoress of several well-known works, as a woman who had suffered, and as a distinguished woman who earnestly sought her acquaintance. These qualifications bore fruit, and a close intimacy was the result. Says Mrs. Jameson's biographer:—

"This early period of their acquaintance produced a multitude of tiny notes in fairy handwriting, such as Miss Barrett was wont to indite to her friends, and which are still in existence. Some of these are most charming and characteristic, and illustrate the rise and rapid increase of a friendship that never faltered or grew cool from that time up to the death of Mrs. Jameson."

One of these characteristic little notes, quoted by the biographer, alludes, in Miss Barrett's usual humorously exaggerated style, to her loss of voice, and the inconveniences resulting from it. Says Miss Barrett:—

"I am used to lose my voice and find it again, until the vicissitude comes to appear as natural to me as the post itself. . . . You are not to think that I should not have been delighted to have you in a monodrama, as I heard Mr. Kenyon one morning when he came and talked for an hour, as he can talk, while the audience could only clap her hands or shake her head for the yea and nay. I should have been delighted to be just such an audience to you; but with you I was too much a stranger to propose such a thing, and the necessary silence might have struck you, I thought, as ungrateful and uncomprehending. But now I am not dumb any longer, only hoarse, and whenever I can hear your voice it will be better for me altogether."

In the correspondence which was now carried on between the two ladies, the same subjects which were being discussed with Miss Mitford and Horne formed the staple themes. Mrs. Jameson, with energetic, humanitarian feelings, more akin to Miss Barrett's towards the seething humanity around us than to the optimistic contentment of Miss Mitford, felt herself stirred by the Report of the Commissioners on the Employment of Women and Children. Even as Elizabeth Barrett had been inspired to write her poem, "The Cry of the Children," so Anna Jameson was moved to express her feelings on the topic in a prose article published in the columns of the "Athenæum." Here was a subject both women could converse upon and sympathize with; but in the marvellous recovery by mesmerism of a third friend they apparently had reason for differing. "I am more and more bewildered by the whole subject," said Miss Barrett. "I wish I could disbelieve it all, except that Harriet Martineau is well."

Mrs. Jameson's interest in the poetess increased with time. Her own literary engagements rendered it necessary for her to visit France and Italy; but learning that it was deemed essential for Miss Barrett's health she should winter abroad, she generously offered Mr. Barrett to take charge of his daughter and accompany her to Italy. The offer was not accepted, but the object of the elder lady's solicitude, in tendering her her thanks, said, "Not only am I grateful to you, but happy to be grateful to you;" adding, "First I was drawn to you, then I was, and am, bound to you." When Mrs. Jameson left England, she was bade farewell in another little note, in which Miss Barrett deplored her inability to call and bid good-bye in person, as she was "forced to be satisfied with the sofa and silence."

But neither the sofa nor silence was destined to be the lot of Elizabeth Barrett. The most momentous event of her life, the turning-point of her destiny, was at hand. Among the few living poets of whom she was wont to speak and write with admiration was Robert Browning. He had been characteristically mentioned in "Lady Geraldine's Courtship," and from that time forward his name and reputation found frequent mention in her correspondence. Browning's father had been an old schoolfellow of Kenyon; it was therefore the most natural thing in the world that the wealthy man of the world should take a more than usual interest in the rising young poet.

Kenyon was wont to take all the best new books to his cousin, and to introduce to her, as far as her health and inclination allowed, the most noteworthy of their authors. Browning was so fortunate as to be included among the latter. He had travelled, and had seen personally what Elizabeth Barrett had only read of or dreamed about. It is no wonder that a feeling stronger and deeper than had as yet stirred the depths of her heart should grow up and impel the poetess towards the poet. With so many themes and thoughts in common as they had, it is no matter for surprise that the correspondence which they commenced, and for a long time continued, should grow and deepen into something warmer and more sympathetic than the usual interchange of literary manuscripts arouses.

How their friendship waxed, how their affection intensified, and how, finally, they cast in their lots together, is a sweet romance the world knows not and never can know the record of, beyond what they, the two dramatis personæ, chose to tell themselves. "If you would know what she was," says a friend, "read 'One Word more.' He made no secret of it; why should another?" In that piece, originally appended to his collection of poems styled "Men and Women," Browning so far took the world into his confidence as to tell it, as if the telling had been needed, who his "moon of poets" was. And, indeed, through many of his works from that time henceforth does the thought of one beloved wind like a golden thread through the woof of his multi-colored imagination.

The time has not come — can scarcely ever come — when their story may be told fully ; but Robert Browning has told, in his poet-speech, how his heart had realized an ideal, and Elizabeth Barrett has contributed her share towards the glorification of eternal Love in her exquisitely beautiful “Sonnets from the Portuguese.” These sonnets, this delicate confession of a pure woman’s love, were written, it is averred, some time before her marriage, and were not shown to her husband until after they were wed. Of course, they are not translations, and the fiction that they were to be found in any language but her own was but the last thin veil with which Elizabeth Barrett faintly concealed the passion she was so proud of.

Miss Barrett, although personally unacquainted with Mr. Browning until a comparatively short time before their marriage, had previously been his admirer and correspondent. Writing to an American correspondent in the spring of 1845, she had said :—

“Mr. Browning, with whom I have had some correspondence lately, is full of great intentions ; the light of the future is on his forehead ; . . . he is a poet for posterity. I have a full faith in him as poet and prophet.”

Their personal knowledge of each other had not, evidently, existed long before they discovered the strength of their regard for one another. To the lady, at any rate, this revelation must have been a startling discovery. Advanced into her thirty-eighth year, she had little prospect and probably little inclination to depart from the course in life she believed marked out for her. Hitherto her personal acquaintances had been so few that love and marriage can scarcely have entered into her schemes for life: as she says in the "Sonnets": —

"I lived with visions for my company,
 Instead of men and women, years ago,
 And found them gentle mates, nor thought to know
 A sweeter music than they played to me. . . .
                                   Then THOU didst come . . . to be,
 Belovèd, what they seemed."

Heavy griefs and precarious health had been hers, it is true; but her sorrows, saddening though they were, had been soothed by kindness and all that wealth could provide. Had she been enabled, like the majority of the world's women, to enter into the labors and struggles of the life around her, she would have placed her sorrow on one side; but, separated as she was both from the activity and ordinary anxieties of life, she nursed her griefs as if they had been petted babes, and fed her favorite sorrows with unceasing tears. She sang: —

“A heavy heart, Belovèd, have I borne
From year to year until I saw thy face,
And sorrow after sorrow took the place
Of all those natural joys.”

But all these long-hoarded and much-cherished griefs — truly become, through lapse of time, but ideals — now became as visionary and transient as dreams. A sudden change had taken place. “The face of all the world is changed, I think,” she wrote. The ideas of Death, which she had long regarded as near, were transformed, and a restless energy took the place of her ancient languor. Most truly does she image forth, in the first of her love sonnets, the change which had taken place in her whole being: —

“I saw, in gradual vision through my tears,
The sweet, sad years, the mélancholy years,
Those of my own life, who by turns had flung
A shadow across me. Straightway I was 'ware,
So weeping, how a mystic shape did move
Behind me, and drew me backward by the hair,
And a voice said, in mastery, while I strove,
'Guess now who holds thee?' 'Death!' I said. But, there,
The silver answer rang, 'Not Death, but Love!'"

Henry Chorley, a literary friend who made the acquaintance of Miss Barrett through the medium of Miss Mitford, said her marriage with the author of "Paracelsus" was more like a fairy-tale than anything in real life he had ever known. Charming and appropriate as the union of the two poets seemed to many, there was one, and he the most interested and first to be consulted in the matter, who would not look upon it in such a light. To the outer world the persistent and lasting antagonism of Mr. Barrett to the marriage of his daughter with Mr. Browning may seem absurd and unnatural; yet, without prying too deeply into the private motives which inspired his dislike to the match, the few glimpses which are obtainable of his passionate yet obstinate nature render his behavior with regard to this matter far from inexplicable. Mr. Barrett's immovable will, his determination not to falter from a resolution when once formed, was a salient trait of character inherited by his favorite and famous child. Elizabeth Barrett had been her father's idol: apparently a confirmed invalid, whom Death might claim at any time, he had lavished upon her everything love or wealth could afford. The space left vacant in his passionate heart by the death of his wife had been largely refilled by his adoration of his daughter. The fame she had created for herself was partly reflected upon him, her father and protector. The affection and pride which had prompted him to publish her childish productions must have appeared amply justified by her present success. And now, after all the long years of anxiety and affection had begun to produce their reward in improved health and widespread reputation, she, his own favorite child, proposed to leave her home and endow a stranger with all the fruits of her fame and the hours of her recovered health. No; the anger of Mr. Barrett towards his so much beloved daughter is neither unique nor singular, when his temperament is considered.

Writing to Horne just after her marriage, our poetess states her experience that all her maladies came from without, and "the hope that if unprovoked by English winters, they would cease to come at all. The mildness of the last exceptional winter," she remarks, "had left me a different creature, and the physicians helped me to hope everything from Italy." Winter, with all its accumulative terrors, was rapidly nearing; on one hand was "the sofa and silence" of home, shared with an estranged father and a probable relapse into illness, and on the other, Hope, Italy, and Love! The contest between Love and Duty, if severe, could not last long or be doubtful. "Our plans," said the lady to Horne, "were made up at the last in the utmost haste and agitation,—precipitated beyond all intention."

On the 12th September, 1846, Elizabeth Barrett was married, at the Marylebone parish church, to Robert Browning, and immediately after the newly-wedded pair started for Italy, by way of Paris.

The marriage was an intense surprise for all those who only knew Elizabeth Barrett as a chronic invalid, hovering between life and death. Henry Chorley, who was selected as one of the trustees of Mrs. Browning's marriage settlement, says, "I cannot recollect when I have been more moved and excited by any surprise beyond the circle of my immediate hopes and fears" than when "she married, after an intimacy suspected by none save a very few, under circumstances of no ordinary romance, and in marrying whom she secured for the residue of her life an emancipation from prison and an amount of happiness delightful to think of, as falling to the lot of one who, from a darkened chamber, had still exercised such a power of delighting others."

Miss Mitford, Horne, and other friends expressed equal surprise, but none of them had the wonder brought home to them so startlingly as Mrs. Jameson. She had left her friend unable to accompany her abroad, — “forced to be satisfied with the sofa and silence,” — and directly afterwards, almost as soon as she had reached Paris, she received a note from Mr. Browning, telling her that he had just arrived from England, and that he was on his way to Italy with his wife, the same “E. B. B.” she had just taken leave of! “My aunt’s surprise,” says Mrs. Macpherson, “was something almost comical, so startling and entirely unexpected was the news.”

Mrs. Jameson, of course, called on the Brownings, and persuaded them to leave the hotel they were staying at for a quiet pension in the Rue Ville l’Evêque, where she was residing. They remained together in Paris for a fortnight, during which period Mrs. Jameson wrote to a friend : —

“I have also here a poet and a poetess, — two celebrities who have run away and married under circumstances peculiarly interesting, and such as render imprudence the height of prudence. Both excellent ; but God help them ! for I know not how the two poet heads and poet hearts will get on through this prosaic world. I think it possible I may go on to Italy with them.”

The possibility came about, and the whole party, Mr. and Mrs. Browning and Mrs. Jameson and niece, travelled slowly southwards to Pisa, where the newly-married couple proposed living for a while at least. How Mrs. Browning contrived to endure all the anxieties and labors of the journey seems incomprehensible. "My poor invalid friend," writes Mrs. Jameson, "suffered much from fatigue ; and, considering that she had passed seven [sic] years without ever leaving her room, you can imagine what it was to convey her from Paris to Pisa. Luckily our journey was nearly over before the heavy rains commenced."

"Love really is the wizard the poets have called him, — a fact which I always doubted till now. But never was such a miraculous proof of his power as her travelling across France by diligence, by railway, by Rhone-boat, — anyhow, in fact ; and having arrived in Pisa so much improved in health that Mrs. Jameson, who travelled with them, says, 'she is not merely improved, but transformed.' I do not know Mr. Browning ; but this fact is enough to make me his friend."

Mrs. Macpherson, speaking of the enchanting memories of that journey from Paris to Pisa, spent in such companionship, says: "The loves of the poets could not have been put into more delightful reality before the eyes of the dazzled and enthusiastic beholder;" but she only permits herself, in the life of her aunt, to recall in print one scene among many of this wonderful journey. She says:—

"We rested for a couple of days at Avignon, the route to Italy being then much less direct and expeditious, though I think much more delightful, than now; and while there we made a little excursion, a poetical pilgrimage, to Vaucluse. There, at the very source of the 'chiare, fresche e dolci acque,' Mr. Browning took his wife up in his arms, and carrying her across the shallow, curling water, seated her on a rock that rose throne-like in the middle of the stream. Thus love and poetry took a new possession of the spot immortalized by Petrarch's loving fancy."

Mrs. Browning herself alluded to the pilgrimage to Vaucluse, "where the living water gushes up," she says, "into the face of the everlasting rock, and there is no green thing except Petrarch's memory. Yes, there is, the water itself,—that is brightly green,—and there are one or two little cypresses."

Three weeks were spent by Mrs. Jameson and her niece travelling with the Brownings, and another three weeks with them in Pisa, where, says Mrs. Macpherson, "the poet pair, who were our closest associates, added all that was wanted to the happiness of this time." Well may Mrs. Macpherson, who was only sixteen then, have recalled those times and their associated memories as a golden oasis in her existence.

The Brownings settled in Pisa for several months, intending to winter there, it having been recommended as a mild, suitable residence for Mrs. Browning. In a letter to Horne, dated December 4, she says:—

"We are left to ourselves in a house built by Vasari, and within sight of the Leaning Tower and the Duomo, to enjoy a most absolute seclusion and plan the work fit for it. I am very happy and very well. . . . We have heard a mass (a musical mass for the dead) in the Campo Santo, and achieved a due pilgrimage to the Lanfranchi Palace to walk in the footsteps of Byron and Shelley. . . . A statue of your Cosmo looks down from one of the great piazzas we often pass through on purpose to remind us of you. This city is very beautiful and full of repose, — 'asleep in the sun,' as Dickens said."

Mr. Browning, in a note attached to his wife's letter, says: "She is getting better every day, — stronger, better wonderfully and beyond all our hopes."

The newly-married pair spent the winter in Pisa, at the Collegio Ferdinando, in a street terminated by the palace in which Cosmo the Great, Horne's hero, slew his son. The change was in every way beneficial for our poetess, — a change, as she told an American correspondent in the beginning of 1847, "from the long seclusion in one room to liberty and Italy's sunshine; for a resigned life I take up a happy one." Apologizing for a lengthy silence, she adds: —

"I shall behave better, you will find, for the future, and more gratefully; and I begin some four months after the greatest event of my life by telling you that I am well and happy, and meaning to get as strong in the body by the help of this divine climate as I am in the spirit — the spirits! So much has God granted me compensation. Do you not see already that it was not altogether the sight of the free sky which made me fail to you before. . . . My husband's name will prove to you that I have not left my vocation to the rhyming art in order to marry: on the contrary, we mean, both of us, to do a great deal of work, besides surprising the world by the spectacle of two poets coming together without quarrelling, wrangling, and calling names in lyrical measures. . . . We live here in the most secluded manner, eschewing English visitors and reading Vasari, and dreaming dreams of seeing Venice in the summer. Until the beginning of April we are tied to this perch of Pisa, as the climate is recommended for the weakness of my chest, and the repose and calmness of the place are by no means unpleasant to those who, like ourselves, do not look for distractions and amusements in order to be very happy. Afterwards we go anywhere but to England; we shall not leave Italy at present. If I get quite strong I may cross the desert on a camel yet, and see Jerusalem. There's a dream for you! Nothing is too high or too low for my dreams just now."

For some time before and for a long time after her marriage, Mrs. Browning did not publish anything of importance. But, need it be said, neither her pen nor brain were idle, nor, indeed, was her zest for literary matters dormant. Poetic aspirations still swayed her thoughts; to an American proposition to issue a selection from her poems she lent a pleased attention, only wishing to have a voice in the selection. To the suggestion of a prose volume she gave a decided negative, for the time at least. She continued to enjoy literary gossip about her favorite authors, and being informed that Tennyson, then in Switzerland, was "disappointed with the mountains," expressed her wonder that any one could be disappointed with anything in Nature. "She always seems to me," was her remark, "to leap up to the level of the heart."

In her political feelings Mrs. Browning continued to be somewhat ahead of her contemporaries, and did not increase her popularity by the readiness with which she gave expression to ideas generally antagonistic to the views of the majority. As yet she had not obtained a very intimate knowledge of the aspirations for liberty with which the hearts of the Italians around her were burning, but was greatly roused by "the dreadful details from Ireland. Oh, when I write against slavery," she exclaimed to an American friend, "it is not as one free from the curse; 'the curse of Cromwell' falls upon us also! Poor, poor Ireland! But nations, like individuals, must be 'perfected by suffering,'" was her comment, to which she added the hope that "in time we shall slough off our leprosy of the pride of money and of rank, and be clean and just and righteous."

It is a pleasant surprise to learn that Mrs. Browning had her old friend and favorite, Flush, with her at Pisa. "He adapts himself," she says, "to the sunshine as to the shadow, and when he hears me laugh lightly, begins not to think it too strange." And whilst referring to her faithful dog, a few words may be devoted to the remainder of his history. After the marriage of his dear mistress, with her he forsook the sofa and silence to see the world. He accompanied her to France and Italy, and, as Mr. Westwood informs us, "wagged his tail in Casa Guidi Windows; had one or two perilous adventures,—lost his coat, and became a dreadful guy in the warm climate; but he lived to an advanced old age, and was beloved and honored to the end."

Towards the spring, Pisa became unsuitable in various ways as a residence for the Brownings. Apart from climatic considerations it was doubtless found to be insufferably dull. To a friend Mrs. Browning wrote:—

"As to news, you will not expect news from me now; until the last few days we had not for months even seen a newspaper, and human faces divine are quite rococo with me, as the French would say."

From Pisa the Brownings removed to Florence. To Horne, Mrs. Browning wrote that in June they left the latter city for Ancona, in order to be cooler, and found that they were

"leaping right into the caldron. The heat was just the fiercest fire of your imagination, and I seethe to think of it at this distance. But we saw the whole coast, from Ravenna to Loretto, and had wonderful visions of beauty and glory in passing and repassing the Apennines. At Ravenna we stood one morning, at four, at Dante's tomb, with its pathetic inscription, and seldom has any such sight so moved me. Ravenna is a dreary, marshy place, with a dead weight of melancholy air fading the faces of its inhabitants; and its pine forest stands off too far to redeem it anywise."

Florence grew to be a second home and a domestic shrine to Mrs. Browning. Her first impressions of it were pleasant, and the pleasure became permanent. Writing from the Tuscan capital to Horne, she says:—

"Here we live for nothing, or next to nothing, and have great rooms, and tables and chairs thrown in; and although hearing occasionally that Florence is to be sacked on such a day, and our Grand Duke deposed on such another, I have learned to endure meekly all such expectations, and to hold myself as safe as you in your garden through them all. One thing is certain,—that the Italians won't spoil their best surtouts by venturing out in a shower of rain through whatever burst of revolutionary ardor, nor will they forget to take their ices through loading of their guns."

And later on she says: "All I complain of at Florence is the difficulty of getting sight of new books, which I, who have been used to a new 'sea-serpent' every morning, in the shape of a French romance, care still more for than my husband does. Old books we can arrive at, and besides, our own are coming over the sea."

Then, lapsing from badinage to a more serious tone, she adds: "So used am I to be grateful to you, that it scarcely can be a strange thing to read those most kind words in which you promise a welcome to my husband's poems; only you will believe that kindness in that shape must touch me nearest."

When they finally settled in Florence, the Brownings removed to a romantic old palace known as Casa Guidi, and here, with some short intervals of absence, the poetess passed the remainder of her life. She kept up her correspondence with friends in England, but rarely received any English people into her residence, her chief visitors being American and Italian. Mr. Browning being well versed, not only in Italian literature and lore, but in the political needs and wrongs of the people, his wife also naturally studied and mastered the whole subject, and became, if possible, more Italian than the Italians themselves. With all the strength of her character, with that indomitable determination which all through life inspired her, she took up and adopted, and with heart and brain fought for, the cause of Italy. In the Casa Guidi Italian patriots found a sympathetic welcome and a rallying-place. Americans also, found there a genial reception and an enthusiastic admirer of their country; it is from them chiefly, indeed almost exclusively, that we know how Mrs. Browning looked and lived and labored in her happy Florentine home.

One American author who visited the poetess and her husband in Casa Guidi, in 1847, records of his visit that in the evening Mr. Browning presented him to his wife:—

“The visitor saw seated at the tea-table, in the great room of the palace in which they were living, a very small, very slight woman, with very long curls drooping forward almost across the eyes, hanging down to the bosom, and quite concealing the pale small face, from which the piercing, inquiring eyes looked out sensitively at the stranger. Rising from her chair, she put out cordially the thin, white hand of an invalid, and in a few moments they were pleasantly chatting, while the husband strode up and down the room, joining in the conversation with a vigor, humor, eagerness and affluence of curious lore which, with his trenchant thought and subtle sympathy, made him one of the most charming and inspiring of companions.”

This same Transatlantic informant talks of having been, a few days later, with the Brownings and one or two others, to Vallombrosa, the whole party spending two days there together.

“Mrs. Browning was still too much of an invalid to walk, but she sat under the great trees upon the lawn-like hillsides near the convent, or in the seats of the dusky convent chapel, while Robert Browning at the organ chased a fugue, or dreamed out upon the twilight keys a faint throbbing toccata of Galuppi."

In an undated letter to Miss Mitford, Mrs. Browning tells of a visit — doubtless the same just referred to — she made to the monastery of Vallombrosa, and of being dragged there in a grape-basket, without wheels, drawn by two oxen, remarking that she and her maid were turned away by the monks "for the sin of womanhood." The American acquaintance of Mrs. Browning continues: —

"In all the conversation she was so mild and tender and womanly, so true and intense and rich with rare learning, there was a girl-like simplicity and sensitiveness and a womanly earnestness, that took the heart captive. She was deeply and most intelligently interested in America and Americans, and felt a kind of enthusiastic gratitude to them for their generous fondness of her poetry."

Another account throwing some light upon that home in the Casa Guidi as it appeared in those days, is furnished by Mr. George Stillman Hillard. Mr. Hillard, also an American, says:

"One of my most delightful associations with Florence arises from the fact that here I made the acquaintance of Robert and Elizabeth Browning. . . .

A happier home and a more perfect union than theirs it is not easy to imagine ; and this completeness arises, not only from the rare qualities which each possesses, but from their adaptation to each other. . . . Mrs. Browning is in many respects the correlative of her husband. As he is full of manly power, so is she the type of the most sensitive and delicate womanhood. She has been a great sufferer from ill-health, and the marks of pain are stamped upon her person and manner. Her figure is slight, her countenance expressive of genius and sensibility, shaded by a veil of long brown locks ; and her tremulous voice often flutters over her words like the flame of a dying candle over the wick. I have never seen a human frame which seemed so nearly a transparent veil for a celestial and immortal spirit. She is a soul of fire enclosed in a shell of pearl. Her rare and fine genius needs no setting forth at my hands. She is also, what is not so generally known, a woman of uncommon, nay, profound learning, even measured by a masculine standard. Nor is she more remarkable for genius and learning than for sweetness of temper, tenderness of heart, depth of feeling, and purity of spirit. It is a privilege to know such beings singly and separately ; but to see their powers quickened, and their happiness rounded, by the sacred tie of marriage, is a cause for peculiar and lasting gratitude. A union so complete as theirs — in which the mind has nothing to crave, nor the heart to sigh for — is cordial to behold and cheering to remember."

CHAPTER VII.

CASA GUIDI WINDOWS.

THUS in quiet happiness lived in their pleasant Italian home the two poets, Robert and Elizabeth Browning. They continued to write their immortal poems, cheered by each other's society, but published little or nothing, and saw little of the outer world. Few Englishmen found their way into the interior of Casa Guidi, the majority of visitors still being Americans and Italians. Mrs. Browning continued to correspond with Miss Mitford and other friends in both New and Old England, and she repeatedly alluded to her domestic happiness, the only cloud which now rested upon her life, save perhaps her chronic constitutional delicacy, being the rupture with her father. He appears never to have forgiven her for her marriage, and persistently refused to open her letters or even to allow her name to be mentioned to him.

An event was about to happen, however, to draw the poet pair still closer together and to still further wean the poetess from the painful memories of the "sofa and silence" of her old home. On the 8th of February, 1849, Miss Mitford received a letter from Mrs. Browning which, besides giving her an account of the civic troubles of Florence, prepared her for the happy news shortly to be communicated. On the 9th of March, 1849, Mrs. Browning's only child, a son, named after his two parents Robert Barrett Browning, was born.

Italy, Florence, above all Casa Guidi, had now stronger and unbreakable ties for the heart as well as the powerful brain of Elizabeth Browning. Was not her child, "my own young Florentine," a native of the land she had learned to love so well, the land of her married happiness? It was in that new home, where the three happiest years of her womanhood had passed, was born her

"Blue-eyed prophet; thou to whom
The earliest world-day light that ever flowed,
Through Casa Guidi windows chanced to come!"

The boy grew and prospered, and with its growth grew the mother's health and joy. Miss Mitford wrote this year:—

"How earnestly I rejoice, my beloved friend, in your continued health, and how very, very glad I shall be to see you and your baby! Remember me to Wilson [Mrs. Browning's maid], and tell her that I am quite prepared to admire him as much as will even satisfy her appetite for praise. How beautifully you describe your beautiful country! Oh that I were with you, to lose myself in the chestnut forests, and gather grapes at the vintage! If I had but Prince Hassan's carpet, I would set forth, and leave Mr. May [her medical adviser] to scold and wonder when he comes to see me to-morrow. . . . Kiss baby for me, and pat Flush."

The letter just quoted from intimates a probability of Mrs. Browning's visit to England. Indeed, for all her love for Italy she could not quite forego her affection for the old country, and, as she had previously told Horne in 1848, "We have n't given up England altogether; we talk of spending summers there, and have a scheme of seeing you all next year if circumstances should permit of it." Circumstances did not, however, work together happily for this scheme, and instead of summer in England, the autumn was spent at the Baths of Lucca. An intention to winter in Rome was also given up, and Christmas was spent in Florence, where Mr. Browning completed for publication his poem, "Christmas-Eve and Easter Day," and his wife wrote the first part of her poem, "Casa Guidi Windows," although the second portion of it was not written until two years later, the complete work being published in 1851.

It is apparently this restful period of Mrs. Browning's life that is referred to by Mrs. Ritchie when she remarks:—

“Those among us who only knew Mrs. Browning as a wife and as a mother have found it difficult to realize her life under any other condition, so vivid and complete is the image of her peaceful home, of its fireside where the logs are burning, and the mistress established on her sofa, with her little boy curled up by her side, the door opening and shutting meanwhile to the quick step of the master of the house and to the life of the world without, coming to find her in her quiet corner. We can recall the slight figure in its black silk dress, the writing apparatus by the sofa, the tiny inkstand, the quill-nibbed penholder, — the unpretentious implements of her work. ‘She was a little woman; she liked little things.’ Her miniature editions of the classics are exquisite, with her name written in each in her sensitive fine handwriting, and always her husband's name added above her own, for she dedicated all her books to him; it was a fancy she had.”

In the spring the Brownings appear to have visited Rome, and there was again some talk of their visiting England, passing through Paris on the way; but for the present the project was abandoned. Wordsworth died in April, and a suggestion was made by the “Athenæum” that the vacant laureateship should be given to Mrs.

Browning. "We would urge," says the journal, "the graceful compliment to a youthful queen which would be implied in the recognition of the remarkable literary place taken by women in her reign."

A notable circumstance happened in May, and one that cannot have failed to have made a marked impression upon Mrs. Browning's highly sensitive nature. Margaret Fuller and her husband, Count d'Ossoli, spent their last evening on shore with the Brownings, previous to their departure for the United States. The vessel they sailed in was wrecked, and they never touched land again alive. Margaret Fuller was not probably a woman with whom our poetess could ever be much in sympathy, but her tragic death and the circumstance of her last night on shore having been passed in her company must have left an indelible impression upon the mind of Mrs. Browning. Another acquaintanceship probably formed about this time was that of Isa Blagden, whose sympathy with some subjects should have drawn her towards the mistress of Casa Guidi. On Italian aspirations for liberty, on the Napoleonic myth, and upon the mysteries of mesmerism — which latter subject continued greatly to exercise Mrs. Browning's mind — they must have been in full accord. Other Florentine friends were W. W. Story, the American sculptor, and his wife. They were the most intimate friends of the Brownings, and for several summers visited and lived with them in Siena. Story's reminiscences of Mrs. Browning during the latter period of her life are among the most interesting extant of her, and will have to be largely cited from.

Thus the year 1850 passed away undisturbedly so far as the poetess was concerned. Besides her domestic ties she was busy with her pen, preparing for publication in a complete form her poem of "Casa Guidi Windows." The poem never was and never will be popular. It contains little likely to arouse the sympathies of its author's usual readers, and to most Italians is naturally a sealed book. Mrs. Browning, living amid a people whom she came to regard to no little extent as fellow-countrymen and friends, was naturally intensely impressed by their wrongs and moved by their aspirations for liberty. As was customary with her, her feelings found vent in song. "Casa Guidi Windows" was the result of her impressions "upon events in Tuscany of which she was a witness;" but despite its powerful passages and occasional felicities of speech, it is impossible to regard it as a success.

“It is a simple story of personal impression,” says Mrs. Browning, but that is just what it strikes the reader as not being. It is full of recondite allusions, comprehensible only to those fully conversant with Florentine literary and political history. It deals with numerous political things unsuited to poesy, however worthy of prose, from which indeed, despite some outbursts of sweetest song, the work through a great portion of its length is barely discernible. As Mrs. Browning’s work it will be read with interest, although interest of a somewhat languid type; but at the present day it will be difficult to discover readers who can be moved to any great amount of enthusiasm by the author’s passionate and evident sincerity. She claimed for it only that it portrayed the intensity of “her warm affection for a beautiful and unfortunate country,” and that the sincerity with which the feeling was manifested indicated “her own good faith and freedom from partisanship.” She also considered the discrepancy which the public would see between the two parts of the poem — “the first was written nearly three years ago, while the second resumes the actual situation of 1851” — a sufficient guarantee to her readers of the fidelity of her contemporary impressions. The causes which gave rise to her singing are no longer operative ; her prophecy of Italy's future has been fulfilled, and her poem, as all political poems, can now only be of value for, and only judged by, its poetic worth. Unfortunately, when judged by the only standard now possible to gauge it by, "Casa Guidi Windows" cannot be regarded as one of its author's successes, any metrical music it contains being but too frequently chiefly conspicuous by the harshness of the long passages of prose by which it is overwhelmed. Probably the sweetest lines in the work are those with which the poem opens : —

"I heard last night a little child go singing
 'Neath Casa Guidi windows, by the church,
O bella libertà, O bella ! stringing
 The same words still on notes he went in search
 So high for, you concluded the upspringing
 Of such a nimble bird to sky from perch
 Must leave the whole bush in a tremble green,
 And that the heart of Italy must beat
 While such a voice had leave to rise serene
 'Twixt church and palace of a Florence street !"

Of course there are many quotable lines in the poem, and some grand thoughts, notably that referring to Charles Albert, who, "taking off his crown, made visible a hero's forehead."

The temporary repression of liberty in Tuscany and the neighboring States undoubtedly had a very depressing effect upon Mrs. Browning, and rendered her more than ever desirous of leaving Florence for a time. A longing to see her native land once more, doubtless possessed her ; besides which business matters necessarily rendered occasional visits to England almost unavoidable.

Accordingly, in the summer of 1851, accompanied by her husband, she left Florence for England. Among the places visited on the homeward journey was Venice ; and Miss Mitford, alluding to a letter she had received from her from that city, says Mrs Browning is so well, " she was to be found every evening at half-past eight in St. Mark's Place, drinking coffee and reading the French papers, whence they adjourned to the opera, where they had a box upon the best tier for two shillings and eightpence English."

The Brownings took Paris in their way, finally reaching London after an absence of nearly four years. Mrs. Browning returned to England full of fame, — fame not only on her own account but on account of her husband, — a happy wife, a devoted mother, and apparently restored to health. What a contrast to her departure on that autumn four years ago, when, almost like a fugitive, the supposed chronic invalid had escaped from her "sofa and silence" across the waters to an unknown fate!

One of the first to call and welcome her was Miss Mitford, who says:—

"I have had the exquisite pleasure of seeing her once more in London, with a lovely boy at her knee, almost as well as ever, and telling tales of Italian rambles, of losing herself in chestnut forests, and scrambling on mule-back up the sources of extinct volcanoes."

Not only were old friendships revived but new friendships formed upon this pleasant return to her native land. Among those who now made her acquaintance was Bayard Taylor, the well-known American author and traveller. His reminiscences of the poetess and her surroundings are replete with interest. He says:—

"In the summer of 1851 a mutual friend offered me a letter to Browning, who was then with his wife temporarily in London. . . . Calling one afternoon in September, at their residence in Devonshire Street, I was fortunate enough to find both at home, though on the very eve of their return to Florence. In a small drawing-room on the first floor I met Browning, who received me with great cordiality. In his lively, cheerful manner, quick voice, and self-possession, he made upon me the impression of an American rather than an Englishman. He was then, I should judge, about thirty-seven years of age; but his dark hair was already streaked with gray about the temples. His complexion was fair, with perhaps the faintest olive tinge, eyes large, clear, and gray, and nose strong and well-cut, mouth full and rather broad, and chin pointed, though not prominent. . . . He was about the medium height, strong in the shoulders but slender at the waist, and his movements expressed a combination of vigor and elasticity.”

After this graphic if somewhat interviewer style of describing Mr. Browning, Bayard Taylor proceeds to give an equally characteristic sketch of another notable personage present, — of a man also closely connected with the story of our poetess: —

“In the room sat a very large gentleman of between fifty and sixty years of age. His large, rosy face, bald head, and rotund body would have suggested a prosperous brewer, if a livelier intelligence had not twinkled in the bright, genial eyes. This unwieldy exterior covered one of the warmest and most generous of hearts. . . . The man was John Kenyon, who, giving up his early ambition to be known as an author, devoted his life to making other authors happy. . . . His house was open to all who handled pen, brush, or chisel. . . . He had called to say good-by to his friends, and presently took his leave. ‘There,’ said Browning, when the door had closed after him, ‘there goes one of the most splendid men living, — a man so noble in his friendships, so lavish in his hospitality, so large-hearted and benevolent, that he deserves to be known all over the world as Kenyon the Magnificent.' ”

Mrs. Browning now entered the room, and the American visitor says her husband ran to meet her with boyish liveliness. He thus describes her : —

“ Slight and fragile in appearance, with a pale, wasted face, shaded by masses of soft chestnut curls which fell on her cheeks, and serious eyes of bluish-gray. Her frame seemed to be altogether disproportionate to her soul. . . . Her personality, frail as it appeared, soon exercised its power, and it seemed a natural thing that she should have written ‘The Cry of the Children,’ or ‘Lady Geraldine’s Courtship.’ ”

Both the husband and wife, says Taylor, expressed great satisfaction with their American reputation, adding that they had many American acquaintances in Florence and Rome. “ In fact,” said Mr. Browning, “ I believe that if we were to make out a list of our best and dearest friends, we should find more American than English names.”

Mrs. Browning having expressed a desire to hear something from their guest as to the position of Art in America, and having, in the course of conversation, declared her belief that a republican form of government is unfavorable to the development of the Fine Arts, Bayard Taylor dissented, and had a powerful ally in Mr. Browning, who declared that "no artist had ever before been honored with a more splendid commission than the State of Virginia had given to Crawford. . . . A general historical discussion ensued," continues Taylor, "which was carried on for some time with the greatest spirit, the two poets taking directly opposite views. It was good-humoredly closed at last, and I thought both of them seemed to enjoy it. There is no fear that two such fine intellects will rust: they will keep each other bright."

Their child, "a blue-eyed, golden-haired boy of two years old," was now brought into the room, and introduced. "He stammered Italian sentences only," says Taylor; "he knew nothing, as yet, of his native tongue."

A few days after this interview the Brownings left England. It was impossible for Mrs. Browning to think of undergoing the risk of wintering in her native land; so, as soon as the year began to chill into autumn, she had to seek a refuge abroad. Writing to her old friend Horne, on the 24th of the month, to ask his acceptance of the new editions, recently published, of her own and her husband's poems, she says, "We leave to-morrow for Paris." They appear to have wintered in the French capital, and whilst there happened one of the most pleasant and interesting incidents in Mrs. Browning's life, — her interview with George Sand.

As early as 1844 the poetess had styled her famous contemporary "the greatest female genius the world ever saw." Naturally, from her thoroughly English nature and temperament, Mrs. Browning contemned, with all the intensity of her soul, much that was innately natural to George Sand; but she fully recognized her humanity and genius, and felt urged to pay homage to both. Comparing her to Sappho, she deemed that, like her prototype, she had "suffered her senses to leaven her soul, to permeate it through and through, and make a sensual soul of it;" but she indulged the hope that George Sand was "rising into a purer atmosphere by the very strength of her wing."

Inspired by such views, Mrs. Browning wrote her two sonnets on George Sand, — "A Desire" and "A Recognition," and included them in the 1844 edition of her poems. Of course, she had not then met this "large-brained woman and large-hearted man," and it was not until the winter of 1851-52 that the interview — they had but one — took place between the two chief women of their age.

Introduced by a letter from Mazzini, and accompanied by her husband, Mrs. Browning called on her French contemporary, who had come to Paris in order to intercede with the President of the Republic (afterwards Napoleon III.) for a condemned prisoner. Mrs. Browning found George Sand in quite a lowly room, with a bed in it, after a fashion common in France. Upon seeing the famous Frenchwoman, Mrs. Browning could not refrain from stooping to kiss her hand; but George Sand threw her arms round her visitor's neck and kissed her on the lips. What passed at that interview may not be told; and although what impression our poetess may have made upon the novelist is unknown, George Sand inspired Mrs. Browning with extremely favorable ideas. She described her as not "taller than I am;" and Elizabeth Browning, we know, was very short and small. George Sand's complexion appeared to her a pale olive, her hair dark, nicely parted, and gathered into a knot or bunch behind. She tells of her dark glowing eyes, low voice, noble countenance, quiet simple manners, restrained rather than ardent, graceful and kind behavior, and simple attire, — altogether a most charming person, and one well worthy the friendship even of England's pure and noble poetess. They parted, never to meet again.

The Brownings appear to have prolonged their stay in Paris for some months, and Miss Mitford received occasional letters from Mrs. Browning, as full of vivid word-painting as of yore, when, as she says :—

“ Before Mr. Browning stole her from me, we used to write to each other at least twice a week, and by dint of intimacy and frequency of communication could, I think, have found enough matter for a correspondence of twice a day. It was really talk, fireside talk, neither better nor worse, assuming necessarily a form of permanence-gossip daguerreotyped.”

Notwithstanding Mrs. Browning's “ terrible Republicanism,” as Miss Mitford terms it, she acquired a truly marvellous belief in Louis Napoleon's goodness and genius. This belief once planted in her mind, nothing could erase or shake it; and as Miss Mitford, after having believed in an idealized First Napoleon, was fully prepared to see her idea realized in a Third Napoleon, Mrs. Browning continued to fill her letters to her old friend with presumed evidences of the greatness and magnanimity of her latest hero. She endeavored to convert her friends to her views, and, declares Miss Mitford in April of this year, says that “ everybody in Paris ” is coming round to an opinion similar to that she holds of the Prince President.

Some time in the summer of 1852 the Brownings returned to England, and stray notices of their appearance in London are in existence. Crabb Robinson records in his "Diary," under date of October 6, that he met them at dinner at Kenyon's. He remarks that Mrs. Browning, whom he had never seen before, was not the invalid he had expected. He describes her as having "a handsome oval face, a fine eye, and altogether a pleasing person." He suggests that "she had no opportunity of display, and apparently no desire, whilst her husband," he deems, "has a very amiable expression. There is a singular sweetness about him."

The Brownings were not able to prolong their stay in England into the autumn on account of the delicate health of the poetess. The sudden setting in of cold weather brought on a recurrence of her trying cough, and compelled her to fly from her native land. In company with her husband she spent a week or two in Paris, and then they left for Italy, leaving a promise to revisit England in the summer. Mrs. Browning was greatly exercised in her mind as to whether the publication of her recent work on "Casa Guidi Windows" might not incite the Florentine authorities to exclude her from the city, and thus keep her out of her home and away from her household gods. There is no evidence, however, at hand to show that she had any difficulty in re-entering either the city or her residence ; indeed, as Miss Mitford remarked, there was not so much danger of her being turned away as of her being retained against her will.

In correspondence with Miss Mitford, early in 1853, Mrs. Browning, after referring to the fact that her husband's drama, "Colombe's Birthday," was to be produced at the Haymarket in April, with Miss Helen Faucit (now Lady Martin) in the character of the heroine, recurs to her admiration for Napoleon III. Many people find it difficult to comprehend how a woman of Mrs. Browning's calibre could ever have admired and trusted the author of the coup d'état ; but an analysis of her mental temperament renders a comprehension of her ideas on this subject comparatively easy. In the first place must be borne in mind the tenacity with which she clung to a belief when once she had accepted it. She had regarded the First Napoleon as the mighty doer of a divine mission, and the Third as his successor in that line, but as unsullied with the crimes of the first Emperor. The aid and maintenance which he gave to the cause of Italian liberty crowned the third of the Bonapartes in her eyes with a halo of glory, and completed the subjugation of her mind; henceforth, all that he did was justified in her sight. Not unnaturally, the mist of glory in which she beheld her hero enveloped, surrounded and included his entourage. To Miss Mitford she says of the Emperor:—

“I approve altogether, none the less that he has offended Austria, in the mode of arrangement; every cut of the whip in the face of Austria being a personal compliment to me,—at least, so I consider it. Let him head the democracy, and do his duty to the world, and use to the utmost his great opportunities. Mr. Cobden and the Peace Society are pleasing me infinitely just now, in making head against the immorality (that’s the word!) of the English press. The tone taken up towards France is immoral in the highest degree, and the invasion cry would be idiotic if it were not something worse. The Empress, I heard the other day from the best authority, is charming, and good at heart. She was educated at a respectable school at Bristol, and is very English, which does not prevent her shooting with pistols, leaping gates, driving four-in-hand, or upsetting the carriage, when the frolic demands it,—as brave as a lion, and as true as a dog. Her complexion is like marble, white, and pale, and pure; her hair light, inclining to sandy—they say she powders it with gold-dust for effect; but her beauty is more intellectual and less physical than is commonly reported. She is a woman of very decided opinions. I like all this — don't you? and I like her letter to the Préfect, as everybody must. Ah! if the English press were in earnest in the cause of liberty, there would be something to say for our poor, trampled-down Italy — much to say, I mean. Under my eyes is a people really oppressed, really groaning its heart out; but these things are spoken of with indifference."

Another subject alluded to by Mrs. Browning in the same communication — a subject which was largely influencing her mind, and almost rivalling Italy in her thoughts — was that singular manifestation of human credulity known as "spirit-rappings." Although not altogether a modern invention or superstition, it was not until about this period that this phase of Spiritualism acquired any large or widely-spread popularity. The fashion or mania for this form of superstition sprang into existence in the United States of America, rapidly spread to Great Britain, and, in more or less violent shapes, infected many surrounding countries. One of the most important victims to the new epidemic was Mrs. Browning. Her letters of this period are filled with allusions to Spiritualism, and its strangest development, "spirit-rappings."

To a woman of such strong common-sense

as Miss Mitford, her friend's belief in such things as these "manifestations" appeared almost incomprehensible. Writing in March of this year to Fields, the American publisher, she remarks, "Mrs. Browning is most curious about your rappings, — of which, I suppose, you believe as much as I do of the Cock Lane ghost, whose doings they so much resemble." And then again, about a month later, she writes, "Only think of Mrs. Browning giving the most unlimited credence to every 'rapping' story which anybody can tell her!" Some weeks subsequent she again writes, "Mrs. Browning believes in every spirit-rapping story — all — and tells me that Robert Owen has been converted by them to a belief in a future state;" whilst directly afterwards she reiterates, "Mrs. Browning is positively crazy about the spirit-rappings. She believes every story, European or American, and says our Emperor consults the mediums, which I disbelieve."

Elizabeth Browning's strong credence in Spiritualism is not more difficult to dissect and understand than is her belief in Louis Napoleon. The great charm in Spiritualism for her was that, if true, it proved there was a life hereafter. To a woman of her intense religious cast of thought, a woman who clung with the sternest tenacity to dogmas she so often had to hear refuted and contemned, this revelation was at once a weapon and a shield. She was only too eagerly ready to accept the new doctrine; and once accepted, she was, as is already manifest, not the woman to relinquish it again. Chorley, who had long been her intimate friend, alludes to the fact that her friendship for him, though it continued through life, was interrupted by "serious differences of opinion concerning a matter which she took terribly to heart,—the strange, weird questions of Mesmerism, including clairvoyance; for all these things were combined and complicated with the mysteries of Spiritualism." Says Chorley:—

"To the marvels of these two phenomena (admitting both as incomplete discoveries), she lent an ear as credulous as her trust was sincere and her heart high-minded. But with women far more experienced in falsity than one so noble and one who had been so secluded from the world as herself, after they have once crossed the threshold, there is seldom chance of after retreat. Only, they become bewildered by their tenacious notions of loyalty. It is over these very best and most generous of their sex that impostors have the most power.

"I have never seen one more nobly simple, more entirely guiltless of the feminine propensity of talking for effect, more earnest in her assertion, more gentle yet pertinacious in differences, than she was; like all whose early nurture has chiefly been from books, she had a child's curiosity regarding the life beyond her books, co-existing with opinions accepted as certainties, concerning things of which (even with the intuition of genius) she could know little. She was at once forbearing and dogmatic, willing to accept differences, resolute to admit no argument; without any more practical knowledge of social life than a nun might have when after long years she emerged from her cloister and her shroud."

E. D(owden?), writing with respect to Mrs. Browning's apparently inscrutable admiration for the Napoleonic régime, utters views so corroborative of Chorley, and, save some exaggeration, so coincident with our own, that they may be cited from the article in "Macmillan's Magazine:" —

"All her feelings on political subjects were intensified not only by her woman's impetuosity, but by the circumstances of her secluded life. To me her judgments, both for good and bad, seemed oftentimes like those of a dweller in some city convent. Out of the cloister windows she could see the world moving without, but in its active life she had neither share nor portion. For many years past the days had been few in number, — almost to be counted upon the fingers, — throughout the long year, on which she was carried down into the open air to gaze upon the world from a carriage-seat. All, indeed, that one of more than common intellect, and who watched over her with more than a woman's care, could bring her of gleanings from the outer world, she had to aid her in her thoughts; all that books, written in almost every modern language, could bring her of instruction, she sought for eagerly; but still no aid of books or friends could supply what daily contact with active life alone can give. It was thus that the views of the world had something of the unreality of cloister visions."

Mrs. Browning's interest in the cause of Italian freedom continued to increase with her increase of knowledge of the people. To her English friends she wrote in the hope of arousing in them something of the sympathy she felt for her unfortunate neighbors, but as yet with slight success. To Miss Mitford she said, "I see daily a people who have the very life crushed out of them, and yet of their oppressions the English press says nothing;" and Miss Mitford's comment to a friend on these and similar complaints was: "Fancy Mrs. Browning thinking Louis Napoleon ought to take up the cause of those wretched Italians; and I hear from all quarters that they get into corners and slander one another. It is an extinct people, sending up nothing better than smoke and cinders and ashes,—a mere name, like the Greeks."

Such opinions as this conservative old English lady uttered were entertained by the great majority of her country-people and by the people of most countries; and the aspirations of Mrs. Browning and her Italian friends were regarded as the idle dreams of poets. The poets' time was as yet to come.

During the hot summer of 1853 the Brownings sojourned at the Baths of Lucca. They returned to Florence in the autumn, and thence proceeded to Rome for the winter. Their stay in the latter city was somewhat prolonged; and their son, the little Robert, suffered from malaria, but seems to have rapidly recovered. During this stay in Rome Mrs. Browning became acquainted with Harriet Hosmer, the well-known American sculptor. Miss Hosmer was a favorite pupil of Gibson, and allowed to occupy a portion of the English sculptor's studio, where during work-time she might be found, "a compact little figure, five feet two in height, in cap and blouse, whose short, sunny brown curls, broad brow, frank and resolute expression of countenance, gave one at the first glance the impression of a handsome boy." Naturally, Mrs. Browning informed Miss Mitford of the new acquaintance she had made; and that dear, prejudiced, insular-minded old lady wrote in a horrified tone to a correspondent: "Mrs. Browning has taken a fancy to an American female sculptor, — a girl of twenty-two, a pupil of Gibson, — who goes with the rest of the fraternity of the studio to breakfast and dine at a café, and keeps her character!"

The Brownings returned to the quietude of their Florentine home, and during the remainder of the year made no history to speak of. In December Miss Mitford speaks of having been advised by the poetess to try mesmerism for her health, which was now completely broken up; and on the 10th of the following January, 1855, the poor, kindly-hearted, if time-serving, old lady was released from her long suffering. The death of her old friend and correspondent must have been a severe blow for Mrs. Browning; but her hands and brain were now so full of her longest and most important poem, that doubtless her sorrow was mitigated, if not stifled, by the excitement of the work's approaching completion.

CHAPTER VIII.

AURORA LEIGH.

THE original conception of a celebrated poem can rarely be traced. The "most mature" of her works, as Mrs. Browning terms "Aurora Leigh," had evidently been germinating in its author's mind for several years before it was deemed fit to face the fierce glare of publication. As early as 1843 Mrs. Browning intimated to Horne the possibility that she could, and in certain circumstances might, write her own autobiography. Did not those words embody the germ idea of the "fictitious autobiography" which, after so many years and modified by so many causes, she called "Aurora Leigh"?

Years before her work saw the light, or indeed was much beyond the embryo stage, Mrs. Browning had given intimation of her intentions with respect to it to friends. Early in 1853 Miss Mitford had mentioned to Fields, the American publisher, that Mrs. Browning was engaged upon a "fictitious autobiography in blank verse, the heroine a woman artist, I suppose singer or actress," says the old lady, "and the tone intensely modern." Whether Miss Mitford had seen or heard any passages from the poem so as to know what the tone was, or whether she derived her impression from what the poetess had said, is unknown; but at any rate she was kept advised as to its progress, and in July, 1854, wrote to the same Mr. Fields, saying that Mrs. Browning asked her to inquire if he would like to bring out the new poem. The publisher, with a lack of acumen not unparalleled in his profession, let the opportunity slip, and the work was secured by a New York rival. A few months later Miss Mitford, after telling a correspondent that Mrs. Browning's poem, which has been three years in hand, and of which four thousand lines are already written, has never been seen—not a word of it—by its authoress's husband, exclaims, "A strange reserve!"

During the years the work was in progress it seems to have been written at odd moments; and when her maternal cares summoned her the manuscript was laid down, or if a visitor came it was thrust away out of sight. It was not until March, 1856, that Mrs. Browning let her husband see any of the work, and then she placed the first six books of it in his hands.

The remaining three books were written much more rapidly than the others, and the whole work was completed and transcribed in 1856, in London, in the house of Mrs. Browning's friend and kinsman, John Kenyon, to whom the book was dedicated as a "sign of esteem, gratitude, and affection."

With as much of the manuscript of "Aurora Leigh" as was ready, the Brownings left Italy for England; and at Marseilles, so Mrs. Ritchie tells us, —

"By some oversight the box was lost in which the manuscript had been packed. In this same box were also carefully put away certain velvet suits and lace collars in which the little son was to make his appearance among his English relatives. Mrs. Browning's chief concern was not for her manuscripts, but for the loss of her little boy's wardrobe, which had been devised with so much tender motherly care and pride. Happily, one of her brothers was at Marseilles, and the box was discovered stowed away in some cellar at the Customs there."

At Paris the Brownings again met Bayard Taylor; and the American remarks about the forthcoming poem, that it is entirely new in design, and that the authoress "feels a little nervous about it." The nervousness was natural, but needless; probably no long poem ever met with so enthusiastic a reception. The success of "Aurora Leigh" was immediate and wide, and its publication invoked a chorus of praise of which time has somewhat modified the tone. Barry Cornwall, alluding to it as "the most successful book of the season," adds: "It is, a hundred times over, the finest poem ever written by a woman." Landor, writing of it to John Forster, says, in many pages "there is the wild imagination of Shakspeare. . . . I had no idea that any one in this age was capable of so much poetry. I am half drunk with it." Other equally laudatory things were said by the choicest spirits of the time; and Mrs. Browning was at once, and doubtless forever, awarded one of the loftiest places in the fane of Poesy.

The splendor and grandeur of "Aurora Leigh" cannot be gainsaid; but at the period of its production literary England was somewhat more enthusiastic, and public taste somewhat more volcanic in its ebullitions than nowadays, when a surfeit of sweets has somewhat blunted the appetite for such things. "Aurora Leigh" was a novelty; the rush of impassioned arguments, startling comparisons, and brilliant similes carried the reader along at fever heat, never allowing him time to linger over the improbabilities of the tale or to criticise its faulty construction.

The plot of this autobiography — this three-volume novel in verse — is evidently founded, although probably unconsciously, upon Charlotte Brontë's "Jane Eyre," whilst the character of Romney, the hero, frequently reminds the reader of Hollingsworth of "The Blithedale Romance." Such coincidences of thought, however, are common among contemporaries, and only prove how really limited is man's imagination.

The mere story of "Aurora Leigh," stripped of its poetry, is not unlike many novels in prose. It is the record of a life told by the heroine herself. Aurora, the daughter of an English father and an Italian mother, was born in Florence. When five years old a great misfortune befell her: her mother died, and the sunshine of infancy faded out of her little life; for "Women know

The way to rear up children (to be just).
They know a simple, merry, tender knack
Of tying sashes, fitting baby-shoes,
And stringing pretty words that make no sense
And kissing full sense into empty words;
Which things are corals to cut life upon,
Although such trifles; children learn by such Love's holy earnest in a pretty play."

Aurora's father was an "austere Englishman," but had loved his wife almost madly. When left with nothing to love but his little girl, for her sake he contrived with "his grave lips" to smile "a miserable smile." For a time he led a lonely life with his only, his child companion, teaching her such stray scraps of learning as came into his mind: "Out of books he taught me all the ignorance of men." But after a few years, "entranced with thoughts, not aims," her father died; and Aurora, now thirteen, was doubly orphaned, —

"There ended childhood: what succeeded next
I recollect as, after fevers, men
Thread back the passage of delirium."

When her last parent died, Aurora was conveyed from her native land to England, and placed in charge of her aunt, — her father's sister. This aunt (Miss Leigh) is wonderfully well described, — this prim English gentlewoman, with

"Cheeks in which was yet a rose
Of perished summers, like a rose in a book, Kept more for ruth than pleasure," — and is, indeed, the one successful delineation of the tale. Miss Leigh

"Had lived, we'll say,
A harmless life, she called a virtuous life,
A quiet life, which was not life at all
(But that, she had not lived enough to know),
Between the vicar and the country squires,

The Lord-Lieutenant looking down sometimes
 From the empyreal, to assure their souls
 Against chance vulgarisms, and, in the abyss,
 The apothecary looked on once a year,
 To prove their soundness of humility.
 The poor-club exercised her Christian gifts
 Of knitting stockings, stitching petticoats,
 Because we are of one flesh after all
 And need one flannel (with a proper sense Of difference in the quality), and still
 The book-club, guarded from your modern trick
 Of shaking dangerous questions from the crease, Preserved her intellectual."

The kind of life the half-wild child of the sunny South had to endure with her strait-laced English relative may be conceived. All her warm-heartedness was chilled, and her girlish affections were suppressed, if not blighted. Thrown upon her own resources, she found solace in poetry and in dreams of artistic life. One day, in the fancied seclusion of the grounds, poetic ardor betrayed her into crowning herself, in anticipation of the world's recognition, with a wreath of ivy. Thus bedecked, she was discovered by her cousin Romney, the heir of the Leigh estates, — a calm, earnest philanthropist, who had his dreams, more extravagant even than Aurora's. His ambition was to break down the strong barriers existent between the masses and classes ; to elevate the poorest and vilest by the personal intercourse and aid of his own social order. At great personal sacrifice and toil he had commenced the crusade himself, and now, after lecturing Aurora sadly on the folly of her day-dreams, he besought her to relinquish them, and not strive to swerve from "a woman's proper sphere," concluding his harangue by asking her to become his wife.

With all the scorn of her youthful pride Aurora declined to become the wife of "a man who sees a woman as the complement of his sex merely." Romney went his way sadly, leaving Aurora still more sad; for, as the reader sees, and as her aunt saw, she really loved her cousin. Miss Leigh's wrath with her niece when she hears that she has rejected Romney, and the silent torture, a thousand times worse than words, she inflicts upon her, are ended by the sudden death of the aunt. Had not Romney, in succeeding to the Leigh property, endeavored by a palpable stratagem to invest Aurora with a portion of his inheritance, he might perchance have won her; but her pride, wounded by his attempt thus to make her his debtor, compels her to dismiss him once more.

Aurora, whose worldly wealth consists only of a few hundred pounds, proceeds to London to earn fame and bread, whilst Romney busies himself more earnestly than ever in schemes for ameliorating the condition of the poor and the unfortunate. In the course of his labors Romney discovers and aids a poor out-cast, Marian Erle, whose beauty and purity, if they do not altogether wean his heart from Aurora, at any rate, combined with his desire to read a lesson to the pride of caste, induce him to engage himself to her. The wedding is arranged to take place at St. James's Church ; and the élite of London society is not only invited by the bridegroom, but actually attends, to see the modern version of "King Cophetua and the Beggar Maid" enacted. Not only are these grandees present, but, at Romney's invitation, all that is foul and disreputable amongst the dregs of London life is there represented. In vain, however, is this assemblage : poor Marian has been spirited away, subjected to unutterable outrage ; and Romney is once more left solitary and discomforted, besides being discredited and roughly handled by the rabble for whom he had made such sacrifices.

Some time after this mysterious affair Aurora starts for Italy. Making a short stay in Paris, she encounters Marian Erle, or rather the wreck of her who was erstwhile the fresh and fair wearer of that name. The poor wronged girl

“She . . .

Approached the bed, and drew a shawl away :
You could not peel a fruit you fear to bruise
More calmly and more carefully than so —
Nor would you find within, a rosier flushed Pomegranate.

“ There he lay upon his back,
The yearling creature, warm and moist with life
To the bottom of his dimples, — to the ends
Of the lovely tumbled curls about his face ;
For since he had been covered over-much
To keep him from the light glare, both his cheeks
Were hot and scarlet as the first live rose
The shepherd’s heart-blood ebb’d away into,
The faster for his love. And love was here
As instant ! in the pretty baby mouth,
Shut close as if for dreaming that it suck’d ;
The little naked feet drawn up the way
Of nestled birdlings ; everything so soft
And tender, — to the tiny holdfast hands,
Which, closing on a finger into sleep,
Had kept the mould of ’t.

. . . . .
The light upon his eyelids pricked them wide,
And, staring out at us with all their blue,
As half-perplexed between the angelhood
He had been away to visit in his sleep
And our most mortal presence — gradually
He saw his mother’s face, accepting it
In change for heaven itself, with such a smile .
As might have well been learnt there.”

When Aurora learns the whole of poor Marian's tale her heart warms towards her, and she takes charge of her and her baby, taking them with her to Italy. Here, in the repose of her old home, Aurora finds that rest her feverish sorrow had so much needed. She had not long dwelt in the quietude of her Italian home, however, before her cousin appears once more, and in the nobility of his heart offers to wed the poor injured Marian and to adopt her fatherless child. The unwedded mother sees that the happiness proffered her cannot now be hers, and, contented with such joy as her babe can afford her, gratefully declines the offer and leaves Romney to Aurora.

Aurora now learns that Romney's plans for succoring the wretched and the criminal had all failed ; that his house, Leigh Hall, had been destroyed by the rabble ; that he himself, in striving to rescue one of the inmates, had been irretrievably blinded, and had been driven by calumny from the neighborhood. Her love no longer restrainable, she flings herself into the blind man's arms, and all the pent-up feelings of years find vent in a burst of acknowledged affection.

Such is a tame summary of the story which invoked so enthusiastic a reception throughout the English world of letters. Our plain prose can, of course, afford no conception of the magnificent aspirations, the glowing thoughts, the brilliant scintillations of genius, the innumerable gem-like passages of pathos, the passionate rushes of language, and the daring assaults upon time-honored customs with which this crowning work of woman's genius is replete; nothing but citation from end to end can do justice to "Aurora Leigh." When the glamour of perusal has passed off, however, and the reader begins to take a calm survey of the whole story, he is astounded at the extent of its shortcomings. The poem is most needlessly lengthened and hampered by continual digressions which interrupt without enriching the narrative. Nearly all the incidents are of an improbable, not to say impossible nature. None of the characters introduced, save that of the aunt, are lifelike or typical. Romney Leigh's opinions and purposes, so far as they can be comprehended, are something more than Quixotic, they are unnatural, and could never have been conceived by a sane, much less a practical, English philanthropist; they appear to be introduced only to discredit the "Christian Socialism" of such men as Maurice, Charles Kingsley, and their compatriots. No such rabble as that present at the projected wedding in St. James's could have been gathered together within an English church, nor could English gentlemen and gentlewomen have talked and acted as Mrs. Browning makes her dramatis personæ do. The poem leaves the impression on the mind of having been written by a great poet, but by a great poet whose knowledge of the world had been gained from books and not from actual contact with its men and women; not from personal experience of its daily toils and troubles, its hard-earned triumphs and undeserved defeats.

Of the artistic imperfections of "Aurora Leigh" much has been said and much could still be said. Of its halting metres, its long passages of pure prose, its pedantic allusions and needless coarsenesses, its continual introduction (in an apparently reckless way) of names which the generality of readers hold in reverential awe, of a fondness for repeating quaint and unusual words, and of many other blemishes the critics have already told the tale. For ourselves, we deem that when these imperfections—for imperfections they are—occur, they are either wilfully introduced by the poetess, or they are the result of hasty execution. Mrs. Browning should not have published her great work so rapidly; she should have retained it by her, and have revised it carefully, instead of throwing it off in haste and then giving it to the world in still greater haste.

When all has, however, been said against "Aurora Leigh" that can be said, how grand a monument of genius it remains! With what genuine bursts of poetry is it not interspersed! What utterances of truth and of humanity are imbedded in its pages! How few Englishmen would have uttered, even if they had thought them, such pregnant words as these:—

"The English have a scornful, insular way
Of calling the French light. The levity
Is in the judgment only, which yet stands;
For, say a foolish thing but oft enough
(And here's the secret of a hundred creeds,
Men get opinions, as boys learn to spell,
By reiteration chiefly) the same thing
Shall pass at last for absolutely wise."

Another passage alluding to eminent women that has been quoted often, and is not yet trite, is, —

"How dreary 't is for women to sit still
On winter nights by solitary fires,
And hear the nations praising them far off."

It is followed by these less known but equally pathetic lines, —

"To sit alone
And think, for comfort, how, that very night,
Affianced lovers, leaning face to face,
With sweet half-listenings for each other's breath,

Are reading haply from some page of ours,
 To pause with a thrill, as if their cheeks had touched,
 When such a stanza, level to their mood,
 Seems floating their own thoughts out — ‘ So I feel
 For thee.’ ‘ And I, for thee : this poet knows What everlasting love is !’ . . .

“ To have our books
 Appraised by love, associated with love,
 While we sit loveless ! it is hard, you think ?
 At least, ’t is mournful.”

Here, too, is true philosophy, —

“ All men are possible heroes : every age Heroic in proportion. . . .

“ Every age,
 Through being beheld too close, is ill discerned
 By those who have not lived past it. We ’ll suppose Mount Athos carved, as Persian Xerxes schemed,
 To some colossal statue of a man :
 The peasants, gathering brushwood in his ear,
 Had guessed as little of any human form
 Up there, as would a flock of browsing goats.
 They ’d have, in fact, to travel ten miles off
 Or ere the giant image broke on them ;
 Full human profile, nose and chin distinct,
 Mouth, muttering rhythms of silence up the sky,
 And fed at evening with the blood of suns ;
 Grand torso — hand that flung perpetually
 The largesse of a silver river down
 To all the country pastures. ’T is even thus
 With times we live in, — evermore too great
 To be apprehended near.”

And, here, a truth but little recognized, —

“The best men, doing their best,
Know peradventure least of what they do :
Men usefullest i' the world are simply used.”

But enough! A few lines here and there from “Aurora Leigh” cannot portray what the poem is. It is a veritable “autobiography,” a true record of the inner life — that truest life — of a great and good woman; and no one can expect to find so correct a portraiture of Mrs. Browning in any book as they will in this poem. They must read it as the true memoir, of which our volume and any others which may be written about her are only the corollary.

“Aurora Leigh” was finished in England, whither the Brownings came on a visit during the summer of 1856. They were the guests of John Kenyon, at least during a portion of their stay, the last pages of the poem having been completed at his town house. Whilst in London the Brownings naturally mingled in literary society, and some very interesting glimpses are obtainable of them during this visit, among others none more characteristic than that afforded by Nathaniel Hawthorne, who afterwards became so intimate with them in Italy. He describes his first meeting with them, at breakfast, in the house of Monckton Milnes, afterwards Lord Houghton. He says:—

“Mr. Milnes introduced me to Mrs. Browning, and assigned her to me to conduct into the breakfast-room. She is a small, delicate woman, with ringlets of dark hair, a pleasant, intelligent, and sensitive face, and a low, agreeable voice. She looks youthful and comely, and is very gentle and lady-like. And so we proceeded to the breakfast-room, which is hung round with pictures, and in the middle of it stood a large round table, worthy to have been King Arthur’s; and here we seated ourselves without any question of precedence or ceremony. . . . Mrs. Browning and I talked a good deal during breakfast, for she is of that quickly appreciative and responsive order of women with whom I can talk more freely than with any man; and she has, besides, her own originality wherewith to help on conversation, though I should say not of a loquacious tendency. She introduced the subject of Spiritualism, which, she says, interests her very much; indeed, she seems to be a believer. Mr. Browning, she told me, utterly rejects the subject, and will not believe even in the outward manifestations, of which there is such overwhelming evidence. We also talked of Miss Bacon; and I developed something of that lady’s theory respecting Shakspeare, greatly to the horror of Mrs. Browning, and that of her next neighbor, — a nobleman whose name I did not hear. On the whole, I like her the better for loving the man Shakspeare with a personal love. We talked, too, of Margaret Fuller, who spent her last night in Italy with the Brownings; and of William Story, with whom they had been intimate, and who, Mrs. Browning says, is much stirred about Spiritualism. Really, I cannot help wondering that so fine a spirit as hers should not reject the matter till at least it is forced upon her. I like her very much."

After they left the breakfast-table they entered the library, where, Hawthorne says, "Mr. Browning introduced himself to me, — a younger man than I expected to see, handsome, with brown hair. He is very simple and agreeable in manner, gently impulsive, talking as if his heart were uppermost."

In October the Brownings returned to Italy, not waiting, apparently, for the publication of "Aurora Leigh," which appeared simultaneously in England and America. They had not returned to their Florentine home long ere they were startled by the news of Kenyon's death. He died on the 3d of December, at his marine residence in Cowes, Isle of Wight, and having no near relatives, left his large property among his literary and other friends. Kenyon, who was known among his intimates as "the Apostle of Cheerfulness," crowned a long career of generosity and friendship by leaving handsome legacies to those who really required them, among those who participated being Mr. and Mrs. Browning, to whom he left the very acceptable sum of ten thousand five hundred pounds.

A few months later, and death was again busy in Mrs. Browning's family circle. On the 17th of April her father died, in the seventy-first year of his age, and was buried in Ledbury Church by the side of the wife who had predeceased him so many years. Her father's death, and the fact that he had not even alluded to her in his will, must have been a severe blow to Mrs. Browning; but comforted by the company of her husband and child, and deeply engrossed as she now was in Italian politics, the shock would naturally be far less severe than it would have been in bygone years. Nevertheless, memories of the dear old days when she had been that father's darling must have surged across her sensitive mind; and the thought that he had passed away without remembrance of her must have sorely wounded her feelings, and, it is not too much to suggest, have weakened her physically as well.

For some months there is little to record of Mrs. Browning's literary history. In the summer she removed with her husband and child to Bagni di Lucca in search of a few months' rest and quietude. No sooner, however, had they arrived than a friend was attacked with gastric fever; and for six weeks they were kept in a state of anxiety and watchfulness on his behalf.

Just as the friend recovered sufficiently to get back to Florence, another and a greater trial awaited them. Their little boy Robert was attacked by the fever, and for a fortnight the Brownings were in a condition of dire suspense on his account. Writing in October to Leigh Hunt, Mrs. Browning says :—

“We came here from Florence a few months ago, to get repose and cheerfulness from the sight of the mountains . . . instead of which . . . we have done little but sit by sick beds and meditate on gastric fevers. So disturbed we have been ; so sad !—our darling, precious child the last victim. To see him lying still on his golden curls, with cheeks too scarlet to suit the poor patient eyes, looking so frightfully like an angel !—it was very hard. But this is over I do thank God, and we are on the point of carrying back our treasure with us to Florence to-morrow, quite recovered, if a little thinner and weaker, and the young voice as merry as ever. You are aware that that child I am more proud of than twenty ‘Auroras,’ even after Leigh Hunt has praised them. He is eight years old, and has never been ‘crammed,’ but reads English, Italian, French, German, and plays the piano—then, is the sweetest child ! sweeter than he looks. When he was ill he said to me, ‘You pet ! don’t be unhappy about me. Think it’s a boy in the street, and be a little sorry, but not unhappy.’ Who could not be unhappy, I wonder?”

It must have been a joy after such trials to return to the comfort of their own home in Florence. Casa Guidi and its inmates have been described by many, but no more attractive picture of them has been given than that by W. W. Story, the American sculptor. At this period, he says, speaking of those who like himself were favored visitors:—

“We can never forget the square ante-room, with its great picture and pianoforte, at which the boy Browning passed many an hour; the little dining-room covered with tapestry, where hung medallions of Tennyson, Carlyle, and Robert Browning; the long-room, filled with plaster casts and studies, which was Mr. Browning’s retreat; and, dearest of all, the large drawing-room, where she always sat. It opens upon a balcony filled with plants, and looks out upon the iron-gray church of Santa Felice. There was something about this room which seemed to make it a proper and especial haunt for poets. The dark shadows and subdued light gave it a dreamy look, which was enhanced by the tapestry-covered walls and the old pictures of saints that looked out sadly from the carved frames of black wood. Large book-cases, constructed of specimens of Florentine carving selected by Mr. Browning, were brimming over with wise-looking books. Tables were covered with more gayly-bound volumes, the gifts of brother authors. Dante’s grave profile, a cast of Keats’s face and brow taken after death, a pen-and-ink sketch of Tennyson, the genial face of John Kenyon, Mrs. Browning's good friend and relative, little paintings of the boy Browning, — all attracted the eye in turn, and gave rise to a thousand musings. A quaint mirror, easy-chairs and sofas, and a hundred nothings that always add an indescribable charm, were all massed in this room. But the glory of all, and that which sanctified all, was seated in a low arm-chair near the door. A small table, strewn with writing materials, books, and newspapers, was always by her side."

Story was so intimate a friend of the Brownings that his words about them have more than usual worth; and that his impressions were recorded at the time they were felt makes them all the more valuable. Of the lady herself, the presiding spirit of this poetry-haunted home, he says: —

"To those who loved Mrs. Browning — and to know her was to love her — she was singularly attractive. Hers was not the beauty of feature, it was the loftier beauty of expression. Her slight figure seemed hardly large enough to contain the great heart that beat so fervently within, and the soul that expanded more and more as one year gave place to another. It was difficult to believe that such a fairy hand could pen thoughts of such ponderous weight. . .

"It was Mrs. Browning's face upon which one loved to gaze, — that face and head which almost lost themselves in the thick curls of her dark brown hair. That jealous hair could not hide the broad, fair forehead, 'royal with truth,' as smooth as any girl's, and 'too large for wreath of modern wont.' Her large brown eyes were beautiful, and were in truth the windows of her soul. . . .

"Mrs. Browning's character was well-nigh perfect. Patient in long-suffering, she never spoke of herself, except when the subject was forced upon her by others, and then with no complaint. She judged not, saving when great principles were imperilled, and then was ready to sacrifice herself upon the altar of Right. . . . She was ever ready to accord sympathy to all, taking an earnest interest in the most insignificant and humble. . . . Thoughtful in the smallest things for others, she seemed to give little thought to herself; and believing in universal goodness, her nature was free from worldly suspicions."

Mr. Story speaks of her conversation as most fascinating. He remarks:—

"It was not characterized by sallies of wit or brilliant repartee, nor was it of that nature which is most welcome in society. It was frequently intermingled with trenchant, quaint remarks, leavened with a quiet graceful humor of her own; but it was eminently calculated for a tête-à-tête. Mrs. Browning never made an insignificant remark. All that she said was always worth hearing. . . . She was a most conscientious listener, giving you her mind and heart as well as her magnetic eyes. Though the latter spoke an eager language of their own, she conversed slowly, with a conciseness and point that, added to a matchless earnestness, — which was the predominant trait of her conversation as it was of her character, — made her a most delightful companion. Persons were never her theme, unless public characters were under discussion, or friends were to be praised, — which kind office she frequently took upon herself. One never dreamed of frivolities in Mrs. Browning's presence ; gossip felt out of place. . . . Books and humanity, great deeds, and, above all, politics, which include all the grand questions of the day, were foremost in her thoughts, and therefore oftenest on her lips. I speak not of religion, for with her everything was religion. Her Christianity was not confined to church or rubrics ; it meant civilization. Association with the Brownings, even though of the slightest nature, made one better in mind and soul. It was impossible to escape the influence of the magnetic fluid of love and poetry that was constantly passing between husband and wife. The unaffected devotion of one to the other wove an additional charm around the two, and the contrasts in their natures made the union a more beautiful one."

In harmonious contrast with Mr. Story's reminiscences of Mrs. Browning may be cited the more vivid and picturesque sketches of Casa Guidi's inmates, made by the author of "The Scarlet Letter" and his talented wife. In the summer of 1858 Hawthorne took the Villa Montauto, just outside the walls of Florence, and he and his family became intimate with the Brownings. The story of their intercourse must be related, as nearly as possible, in the language of the Hawthornes themselves; and if in some instances it be somewhat iterative of the records made by Mr. Story or others, it will be none the less valuable as confirmatory of the impressions produced by the inhabitants of Casa Guidi upon other equally independent observers.

In his "Italian Note-Books," under date of June 8, 1858, we find Nathaniel Hawthorne writing thus:—

"There was a ring at the door, and a minute after our servant brought a card. It was Mr. Robert Browning's, and on it was written in pencil an invitation for us to go to see them this evening. He had left the card and had gone away; but very soon the bell rang again, and he had come back, having forgotten to give his address. This time he came in; and he shook hands with all of us, — children and grown people, — and was very vivacious and agreeable. He looked younger and even handsomer than when I saw him in London two years ago, and his gray hairs seemed fewer than those that had then strayed into his youthful head. . . .

"Mr. Browning was very kind and warm in his expressions of pleasure at seeing us; and, on our part, we were all very glad to meet him. He must be an exceeding likable man."

The favorable impression made by the English poet upon the American romancist was evidently shared by the latter's family, as indeed may be learned from Mrs. Hawthorne's notebook. Her descriptions of Mr. Browning and his domestic circle are, if possible, even more graphic and interesting than her husband's; at any rate they supplement and complete the charming picture he conjures up to the "mind's eye" of the poet home in Casa Guidi. She says: "Mr. Browning's grasp of the hand gives a new value to life, revealing so much fervor and sincerity of nature. He invited us most cordially to go at eight and spend the evening." She continues: "At eight we went to Casa Guidi;" and Hawthorne himself says:—

"After some search and inquiry we found the Casa Guidi, which is a palace in a street not very far from our own. It being dusk I could not see the exterior, which, if I remember, Browning has celebrated in song. . . . The street is a narrow one; but on entering the palace we found a spacious staircase and ample accommodation of vestibule and hall,—the latter opening on a balcony, where we could hear the chanting of priests in a church close by."

Mrs. Hawthorne adds:—

"We found a little boy in an upper hall with a servant. I asked him if he were Pennini, and he said ‘Yes.’ In the dim light he looked like a waif of poetry, drifted up into the dark corner, with long curling brown hair, and buff silk tunic embroidered with white. He took us through an ante-room, into the drawing-room, and out upon the balcony. In a brighter light he was lovelier still, with brown eyes, fair skin, and a slender, graceful figure. In a moment Mr. Browning appeared, and welcomed us cordially. In a church near by, opposite the house, a melodious choir was chanting. The balcony was full of flowers in vases, growing and blooming. In the dark-blue fields of space overhead the stars — flowers of light — were also blossoming, one by one, as evening deepened. The music, the stars, the flowers, Mr. Browning and his child, — all combined to entrance my wits.”

Hawthorne, on his first visit, appears to have been chiefly impressed with the elfin appearance of the little boy Robert, whom “they call Pen-nini for fondness.” This cognomen, he was informed, was “a diminutive of Apennino, which was bestowed upon him at his first advent into the world because he was so very small, there being a statue in Florence of colossal size called Apennino.” Hawthorne says:—

“I never saw such a boy as this before, — so slender, so fragile, and spirit-like, not as if he were actually in ill-health, but as if he had little or nothing to do with human flesh and blood. His face is very pretty and most intelligent, and exceedingly like his mother’s. He is nine years old, and seems at once less childlike and less manly than would befit that age. I should not like to be the father of such a boy, and should fear to stake so much interest and affection on him as he cannot fail to inspire. I wonder what is to become of him, — whether he will ever grow to be a man; whether it is desirable that he should. His parents ought to turn their whole attention to making him robust and earthly, and to giving him a thicker scabbard to sheathe his spirit in. He was born in Florence, and prides himself upon being a Florentine, and indeed is as un-English a production as if he were a native of another planet.”

The romancist proceeds in his characteristic style : —

“ Mrs. Browning met us at the door of the drawing-room, and greeted us most kindly, — a pale, small person, scarcely embodied at all; at any rate only substantial enough to put forth her slender fingers to be grasped, and to speak with a shrill yet sweet tenuity of voice. Really I do not see how Mr. Browning can suppose that he has an earthly wife any more than an earthly child; both are of the elfin race, and will flit away from him some day when he least thinks of it. She is a good and kind fairy, however, and sweetly disposed towards the human race, although only remotely akin to it. It is wonderful to see how small she is, how pale her cheek, how bright and dark her eyes. There is not such another figure in the world; and her black ringlets cluster down into her neck and make her face look the whiter by their sable profusion. I could not form any judgment about her age ; it may range anywhere within the limits of human life or elfin life. When I met her in London, at Lord Houghton's breakfast-table, she did not impress me so singularly, — for the morning light is more prosaic than the dim illumination of their great tapestried drawing-room, and besides, sitting next to her she did not have occasion to raise her voice in speaking, and I was not sensible what a slender voice she has. It is marvellous to me how so extraordinary, so acute, so sensitive a creature can impress us as she does with the certainty of her benevolence. It seems to me there were a million chances to one that she would have been a miracle of acidity and bitterness.”

Mrs. Hawthorne's account of their hostess is quite as representative as her husband's. She describes her as —

“Very small, delicate, dark, and expressive. She looked like a spirit. A cloud of hair falls on each side her face in curls, so as partly to veil her features ; but out of the veil look sweet, sad eyes, musing and far-seeing and weird. Her fairy fingers looked too airy to hold, and yet their pressure was very firm and strong. The smallest possible amount of substance encloses her soul, and every particle of it is infused with heart and intellect. I was never conscious of so little unredeemed, perishable dust in any human being. I gave her a branch of small pink roses — twelve on the stem — in various stages of bloom, which I had plucked from our terrace vine ; and she fastened it in her black velvet dress with most lovely effect to her whole aspect. Such roses were fit emblems of her. We soon returned to the drawing-room, — a lofty, spacious apartment, hung with Gobelin tapestry and pictures, and filled with carved furniture and objects of vertù. Everything harmonized, — poet, poetess, child, house, the rich air, and the starry night. Pennini was an Ariel, flitting about, gentle, tricky, and intellectual.”

What a picture does not this present to the mind's eye, — the Hawthornes and the Brownings gathered together in that weird old Florentine palace, and conversing as only they could ! How thoroughly one can sympathize with Mrs. Hawthorne when she exclaims :—

“ It rather disturbed my dream to have other guests come in ! Eventually tea was brought and served on a long narrow table, placed before a sofa, and Mrs. Browning presided. We all gathered at this table. Pennini handed about the cake, graceful as Ganymede.”

Hawthorne, who appears to have been much interested in young Browning, says :—

“ Little Pennini sometimes helped the guests to cake and strawberries, joined in the conversation when he had anything to say, or sat down upon a couch to enjoy his own meditations. He has long curling hair, and has not yet emerged from his frock and short hose.

It is funny to think of putting him into trousers. His likeness to his mother is strange to behold!"

After alluding to there being other guests present, Hawthorne remarked that —

"Mr. Browning was very efficient in keeping up conversation with everybody, and seemed to be in all parts of the room and in every group at the same moment; a most vivid and quick-thoughted person, logical and common-sensible, as I presume poets generally are in their daily talk."

A pleasant evening was passed by that group of noteworthy persons, who have now nearly all escaped from the "coffin of their cares." The conversation was general. Hawthorne records:

"The most interesting topic being that disagreeable and now wearisome one of spiritual communications, as regards which Mrs. Browning is a believer, and her husband an infidel. . . . Browning and his wife had both been present at a spiritual session held by Mr. Hume, and had seen and felt the unearthly hands, one of which had placed a laurel wreath on Mrs. Browning's head. Browning, however, avowed his belief that these hands were affixed to the feet of Mr. Hume, who lay extended in his chair, with his legs stretched far under the table. The marvellousness of the fact, as I have read of it and heard it from other eye-witnesses, melted strangely away in his hearty gripe, and at the sharp touch of his logic, while his wife ever and anon put in a little gentle word of expostulation.

“I am rather surprised that Browning’s conversation should be so clear and so much to the purpose at the moment, since his poetry can seldom proceed far without running into the high grass of latent meanings and obscure allusions.”

Mrs. Browning’s health was too delicate to permit late hours, so her visitors had to leave about ten. She expressed her regret that she should not see much of the Hawthornes for some time, as she was going with her husband to the seaside, but hoped to find them in Florence on her return.

Two days later, however, in response to Mrs. Browning’s invitation, Mrs. Hawthorne called with her daughters at Casa Guidi. Mrs. Browning did not receive till eight in the evening; but as the younger child would have been in bed by that time, Mrs. Hawthorne was asked to bring her at one in the day. Mrs. Hawthorne says :

“We rang a great while, and no one answered the bell; but presently a woman came up the staircase and admitted us, but she was surprised that we expected to see Mrs. Browning at such a time. I gave her my credentials, and so she invited us to follow her in. We found the wondrous lady in her drawing-room, very pale, and looking ill; yet she received us affectionately, and was deeply interesting as usual. She took R—— into her lap, and seemed to enjoy talking to and looking at her, as well as at Una. She said, 'Oh, how rich and happy you are to have two daughters, a son, and such a husband!' Her boy was gone to his music-master's, which I was very sorry for; but we saw two pictures of him. Mrs. Browning said he had a vocation for music, but did not like to apply to anything else any more than a butterfly; and the only way she could command his attention was to have him upon her knees, and hold his hands and feet. He knows German pretty well already, and Italian perfectly, being born a Florentine.

"I was afraid to stay long, or to have Mrs. Browning talk," comments the visitor, "because she looked so pale and seemed so much exhausted, and I perceived that the motion of R——'s fan distressed her. I do not understand how she can live long, or be at all restored while she does live. I ought rather to say that she lives so ardently that her delicate earthly vesture must soon be burned up and destroyed by her soul of pure fire."

On the 25th of June, Mrs. Hawthorne records in her diary:—

"We spent this evening at Casa Guidi. I saw Mrs. Browning more satisfactorily, and she grows lovelier on farther knowing. Mr. Browning gave me a pomegranate bud from Casa Guidi windows, to press in my memorial book. . . . The finest light gleams from Mrs. Browning's arched eyes, — for she has those arched eyes so unusual, with an intellectual, spiritual radiance in them. They are sapphire, with dark lashes, shining from out a bower of curling, very dark, but, I think, not black hair. It is sad to see such deep pain furrowed into her face, — such pain that the great happiness of her life cannot smooth it away. In moments of rest from speaking her countenance reminds one of those mountain sides, ploughed deep with spent water-torrents, there are traces in it of so much grief, so much suffering. The angelic spirit, triumphing at moments, restores the even surface. How has anything so delicate braved the storms? Her soul is mighty, and a great love has kept her on earth a season longer. She is a seraph in her flaming worship of heart, while a calm, cherubic knowledge sits enthroned on her large brow. How she remains visible to us with so little admixture of earth, is a mystery; but fortunate are the eyes that see her and the ears that hear her.”

On the 2d of July the Brownings left Florence for France, intending to spend the remainder of the summer in Normandy; and Mrs. Hawthorne pathetically exclaims, “There seems to be nobody in Florence now for us!”

CHAPTER IX.

BEFORE CONGRESS.

FOR some months the records of Mrs. Browning's story are nought but blank pages. Burning, heart-burning questions, however, were coming to the fore, thrilling her delicate frame and agitating her weary heart with volcanic themes. Instead of the quietude and repose her invalided constitution needed, she gave herself up with her usual ardency to the aspirations of her Italian friends and neighbors. "To her," says Mr. Story, "Italy was from the first a living fire." Her joy and enthusiasm at the Italian uprising in 1848 was fervently sung in the early portion of "Casa Guidi Windows;" the second part expresses her sorrow and dejection at the abortive results of that revolution. Still she hoped on, watching events from her Florentine home with a firm trust that the days of fulfilment would arrive. She was angered with her native land, or rather with its leaders, that they turned their back upon the trials and struggles of her adopted country, and scorned them for what she deemed their insular view of the world.

Her hopes, however, were largely if not entirely gratified. Says Mr. Story:—

“It is a matter of great thankfulness that God permitted Mrs. Browning to witness the second Italian revolution. No patriot Italian gave greater sympathy to the aspirations of 1859 than Mrs. Browning. . . . Great was the moral courage of this frail woman to publish the ‘Poems Before Congress’ at a time when England was most suspicious of Napoleon. Greater was her conviction when she abased England and exalted France for the cold neutrality of the one and the generous aid of the other in this War of Italian Independence. Bravely did she bear up against the angry criticisms excited by such anti-English sentiment.”

During the uprising of the Italians in 1859, when, aided by the French, they were successful in driving their oppressors back from so large a portion of Italian soil, Mrs. Browning’s pen and brain both worked hard for the cause she had so strongly at heart. Her poems and her life at this period are part of Italian history. Above all did she exalt and glory in the ideal Emperor her imagination had portrayed. The hero she had already believed the Third Napoleon to be was now fully confirmed. Had he not sworn to free Italy from sea to sea, and was he not aiding her people to accomplish this great object by defeating and driving out the hated Tedeschi? With full faith in her Emperor she wrote her passionate lines on "Napoleon the Third in Italy."

July came, and with it the sudden and maddening Treaty of Peace. Mrs. Browning could not but mourn with Italy at the overthrow of hopes which had appeared so close on their realization, yet were so rudely crushed. In the first pangs of her grief, when stunned if not crushed by the course of events, she addressed to her son those bitter lines, "A Tale of Villafranca," beginning:—

"My little son, my Florentine,
 Sit down beside my knee,
 And I will tell you why the sign
 Of joy which flushed our Italy
 Has faded since but yesternight,
 And why your Florence of delight
 Is mourning as you see."

Mr. Story avers that the news of the Imperial Treaty of Villafranca, following so fast upon the victories of Solferino and San Martino, almost killed Mrs. Browning. "That it hastened her into the grave," he says, "is beyond a doubt, as she never fully shook off the severe attack of illness occasioned by this check upon her life-hopes."

Notwithstanding, however, his failure to fulfil his promise to Italy, notwithstanding the annexation of Nice and Savoy, Mrs. Browning would not give up her faith in Napoleon the Third; as Savage Landor said of it, "If that woman put her faith in a man as good as Jesus, and he should become as wicked as Pontius Pilate, she would not change it." In language somewhat more to the purpose, Professor Dowden points out, in explanation of Mrs. Browning's belief of one whose political deeds were often so diametrically opposed to her own principles:—

"She saw a great work being worked out around her, and instinctively she believed that in the workers also there must be something great and godlike. Still, the keenness of Mrs. Browning's Imperialism dated from the time of the Italian War. It is difficult to convey an idea to strangers of the intenseness of all her feelings about Italy. Hers was no dilettante artistic love, but a deep personal attachment for the land of her home and her affections. All who had written or spoken or worked in behalf of Italy were as welcome to her as friends of long standing; while for those who had exerted their powers against Italy, as open enemies or false friends, she felt as personal an enmity as it was possible for that gentle nature to feel against any living being. One who knew her towards the end of her life has told me that her last words to him, at their parting, were to thank him, with thanks that were little merited, because he had done something for the cause of Italy. Higher thanks, however undeserved, she knew none to give.

“This being so, it would have been strange had she not shared the common Italian feeling about the Emperor of the French. . . . In this world men, after all, look to the facts, not to motives, and . . . you cannot escape the broad fact that, in the hour of Italy’s need (before, mind you, not after the victory) it was the Emperor Napoleon alone who came forward to rescue Italy, who overthrew the tyranny of Austria, and who, willingly or unwillingly, thereby created the Italian kingdom. . . . This is the one simple fact which the Italians have not forgotten and cannot forget; and of this fact Mrs. Browning’s mind took hold with all the ardor of her love for Italy, and all the intensity of her poet’s feelings.”

Sick at heart and bodily ill, Mrs. Browning spent a weary, suffering summer. In July she removed with her husband to Siena, and spent the autumn there. Both in Siena and in Florence, whither they returned for a few days’ rest before proceeding to Rome for the winter, the Brownings were much interested in the troubles and eccentricities of Walter Savage Landor. But for the kindly care of Mr. Browning, it is hard to say what would have been the ultimate fate of the strange old genius. He saw to his immediate wants, and made such pecuniary arrangements with Landor's relatives as secured him from any further dread of downright poverty. Apartments were secured for him in the close vicinity of Casa Guidi, and Mrs. Browning's old servant, Wilson, was induced to devote herself to the care of him. Wilson, who had been a more than servant to her mistress, was most faithful in the discharge of her duties to the new master, and fairly fulfilled the trust reposed in her by the Brownings, notwithstanding she had family ties of her own.

The winter was spent by the Brownings in Rome, where the mild climate seemed to have somewhat restored the invalid, for such the poetess was again. In the beginning of 1860 she collected her recent political pieces, and published them as "Poems Before Congress." In her Preface, dated February, she says:—

"These poems were written under the pressure of the events they indicate, after a residence in Italy of so many years, that the present triumph of great principles is heightened to the writer's feelings by the disastrous issue of the last movement, witnessed from Casa Guidi windows in 1849. . . .

"If the verses should appear to English readers too pungently rendered to admit of a patriotic respect to the English sense of things, I will not excuse myself on such, nor on the grounds of my attachment to the Italian people, and my admiration of their heroic constancy and union. What I have written has simply been because I love truth and justice — quand même — more than Plato and Plato's country, more than Dante and Dante's country, more even than Shakspeare and Shakspeare's country."

After urging that non-intervention in a neighbor's affairs may be carried too far, may only mean passing by on the other side when that neighbor has fallen among thieves, she earnestly entreats her countrymen to "put away the Little Pedlingtonism, unworthy of a great nation, and too prevalent among us. If the man who does not look beyond this natural life is of a somewhat narrow order," she argues, "what must be the man who does not look beyond his own frontier or his own sea?" And then, in language of real poetic grandeur, and with a visionary hope of what appears not yet very near unto realization, she says: —

"I confess that I dream of the day when an English statesman shall arise, with a heart too large for England, having courage in the face of his countrymen to assert of some suggested policy, 'This is good for your trade; this is necessary for your domination; but it will vex a people hard by, it will hurt a people farther off, it will profit nothing to the general humanity, therefore, away with it, — it is not for you or for me.' When a British minister dares speak so, and when a British public applauds him speaking, then shall the nation be glorious, and her praise, instead of exploding from within from loud civic mouths, come to her from without, as all worthy praise must, from the alliances she has fostered, and the populations she has saved."

Some of the poems in the volume thus heralded certainly contained a few bitter allusions to England, and contrasted her conduct, and of course not to her advantage, with that of France. Yet, that there was very much in the book to arouse the wrath Mrs. Browning believed she had aroused in her native country, is preposterous. The asperity of a few reviews, such as that which Chorley deemed it his political duty to indulge in, could have had very little influence upon any class in England, however much the literary susceptibilities of the authoress may have magnified it. To an American friend Mrs. Browning said: —

"My book has had a very angry reception in my native country, as you probably observe; but I shall be forgiven one day; and meanwhile, forgiven or unforgiven, it is satisfactory to one's own soul to have spoken the truth as one apprehends the truth."

That England did sympathize very strongly with Italy in her struggles for independence, no one who reads the history of the time can doubt, and that her moral and political aid was of immense value to the Italian cause cannot be gainsaid; but English statesmen did not deem it for their country's welfare to interfere too actively, especially while the occult motives of Napoleon were to be taken into account, and this it was that stirred up Mrs. Browning's anger. She, whose heart and brain throbbed but for Italy, could not brook the reticence of England, the reluctance of Englishmen to join Napoleon in his adventurous, perhaps chivalrous, policy. During 1860 she continued to pour forth passionate poems on behalf of Italy, or inspired by Italian themes; but none of them, it must be confessed, equal in poetic value to some lines entitled "Little Mattie," which she published in the "Cornhill Magazine." In this lyric she attained a higher standard of poetic excellence than she had done for some years past.

About this time, in viewing Rome's gift of swords to her heroes, Napoleon and Victor Emmanuel, she caught a severe cold, which is said to have affected her lungs. The autumn, also, saw her prostrated with sorrow at the news of her favorite sister's death. Again was Rome resorted to for the winter, and once more the balmy air seemed to revive her drooping form, so that she believed and wrote that she was "better in body and soul."

At intervals she continued to write short poems ; but one entitled "The North and the South," written in May, in honor of Hans Christian Andersen's visit to Rome, was the last she ever wrote. During the same month the Brownings returned to Florence, and although she had found the overland journey very fatiguing, her Florentine friends considered Mrs. Browning had never looked better than when in these early days of June she returned to Casa Guidi.

Mr. Story recounts that in the last conversation but one which he had with Mrs. Browning after her return home, they discussed Motley's recently written letters on the American Crisis, and that she warmly approved of them. "Why," she said, referring to the attitude assumed by foreign nations towards America at that time, — "why do you heed what others say? You are strong, and can do without sympathy ; and when you have triumphed, your glory will be the greater."

Mrs. Browning had not returned to Florence more than a week or so before she caught another severe cold, and one of an even more threatening character than usual. Medical aid was obtained ; but although anxiety was naturally felt, there does not appear to have been any idea of imminent danger entertained until the third or fourth night, when, says Mr. Story, whose account must now be mainly followed, "those who most loved her said they had never seen her so ill."

The following morning, however, the poetess appeared to be better, and for a day or two was supposed to be recovering. She herself was of this belief, and those about her had such confidence in her vitality that the worst seemed to have been passed. Says Mr. Story :—

"So little did Mrs. Browning realize her critical condition, that until the last day she did not consider herself sufficiently indisposed to remain in bed, and then the precaution was accidental. So much encouraged did she feel with regard to herself, that on this final evening an intimate female friend was admitted to her bedside, and found her in good spirits, ready at pleasantry, and willing to converse on all the old loved subjects. Her ruling passion had prompted her to glance at the 'Athenæum' and 'Nazione;' and when this friend repeated the opinions she had heard expressed by an acquaintance of the new Italian Premier, Ricasoli, to the effect that his policy and Cavour's were identical, Mrs. Browning 'smiled like Italy,' and thankfully replied, 'I am glad of it; I thought so.' Even then her thoughts were not of self."

Little did this friend think, as she bade the poetess "good-by," that it was indeed a farewell she was taking. Friends who called to inquire after her were sent away cheered with the assurance that she was better, and even her "own bright boy," says Mr. Story, as he bade his mother good-night, was sent to bed consoled by her oft-repeated, "I am better, dear, much better."

One only watched her breathing through the night, — he who for fifteen years had ministered to her with all the tenderness of a woman. It was a night devoid of suffering to her. As morning approached, and for two hours previous to the dread moment, she seemed to be in a partial ecstasy, and though not apparently conscious of the coming on of death, she gave her husband all those holy words of love, all the consolation of an oft-repeated blessing, whose value death has made priceless. Such moments are too sacred for the common pen, which pauses as the woman poet raises herself up to die in the arms of her poet husband. He knew not that death had robbed him of his treasure until the drooping form grew chill. Her last words were, "It is beautiful!"

GRATEFUL FLORENCE.

MRS. BROWNING died at half-past four in the morning of June 29, 1861, in the fifty-third year of her age, of congestion of the lungs. From the shattered condition of her lungs, the physicians asserted that her existence could not have been prolonged, in any circumstance, many months.

From the grief of those dearest to her the veil may not be rudely torn. Suffice to say that on the evening of July 1 all that remained of England's great poetess was reverently borne to the lovely little Protestant cemetery looking out towards Fiesole. The bier was surrounded by a sympathetic band of English, Americans, and Italians, whose intense sorrow dared hardly display itself in presence of the holy grief of the husband and the son of her whom they had loved so well.

There, amid the dust of illustrious fellow-poets, and where tall cypresses wave over the graves, and the beautiful hills keep guard around, rises a stately marble cenotaph, designed by Sir Frederick Leighton, to the memory of the authoress of "Aurora Leigh." Owing, however, to the removal of the old city walls of Florence, the Protestant cemetery is now included within the city limits, and further interments there are forbidden by law; but the place is preserved by the municipality.

As long as the language she wrote in lives, the memory of Elizabeth Barrett Browning will exist; but it is pleasant to know that the people among whom she lived and labored during the latter years of her life, and whom she loved so well, were not forgetful of her. Upon Casa Guidi the municipality of Florence placed a white marble slab, and thereon, inscribed in letters of gold, are these words written by Tommaseo:—

APPENDIX.

BIRTH OF MRS. BROWNING.

THE date and place of Mrs. Browning's birth have been variously stated. For some years biographers wavered between London and Hope End, Herefordshire, as her natal place. Quite recently Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, authorized by Mr. Browning, declared Burn Hall, Durham, the place, and March 6, 1809, the date of Mrs. Browning's birth. My researches have enabled me to disprove these statements. In "The Tyne Mercury," for March 14, 1809, is announced for March 4, "In London, the wife of Edward M. Barrett, Esq., of a daughter."

Having published my data, their accuracy was challenged by Mr. Browning, who now asserted that his wife was "born on March 6, 1806, at Carlton Hall, Durham, the residence of her father's brother." Carlton Hall was not in Durham, but in Yorkshire, and, I am authoritatively informed, did not become the residence of Mr. S. Moulton Barrett until some time after 1810. Mr. Browning's latest suggestions cannot, therefore, be accepted.

All the obtainable evidence favors my statement. In 1806, Mr. E. Moulton Barrett, not yet twenty, is scarcely likely to have already had the two children assigned him. Most decidedly he had no children born by that date at either Burn Hall, Durham, or Carlton Hall, Yorkshire. A daughter was unquestionably born to his wife in London, March 4, 1809. In 1840 Mrs. Browning referred to her childish epic, "The Battle of Marathon," as written when she was ten, and at a later period spoke of it having been produced when she was about eleven: it was published in 1820. She also referred to her "Essay on Mind," published in 1826, as "written when I was seventeen or eighteen."

Having these data before me, it is difficult to assign any other date and place than those given in this work for the birth of Mrs. Browning.

Famous Women Series.

MADAME DE STAËL.

By BELLA DUFFY.

One Volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

It is a brilliant subject, and handled in a brilliant as well as an intelligent manner. — The Independent.

The biography of this remarkable woman is written in a spirit of candor and fairness that will at once commend it to the attention of those who are seeking the truth. The author is not so much in love with her subject as to lose sight of her faults; nor is she so blind to Madame de Staël's merits as to place confidence in the many cruel things that have been said of her by her enemies. The review of Madame de Staël's works, which closes this volume, exhibits rare critical insight; and the abstract of "Corinne" here given will be welcomed by those who have never had the patience to wade through this long but celebrated classic, which combines somewhat incongruously the qualities of a novel and an Italian guide-book. In answering the question, Why was not Madame de Staël a greater writer? her biographer admirably condenses a great deal of analytical comment into a very brief space. Madame de Staël was undoubtedly the most celebrated woman of her time, and this fact is never lost sight of in this carefully written record of her life. — Saturday Evening Gazette.

It treats of one of the most fascinating and remarkable women of history. The name of Madame de Staël is invested with every charm that brilliance of intellect, romance, and magnetic power to fascinate and compel the admiration of men can bestow. Not beautiful herself, she wielded a power which the most beautiful women envied her and could not rival. The story of her life should read like a novel, and is one of the best in this series of interesting books published by Roberts Brothers, Boston. — Chicago Journal.

We have Messrs. Roberts Brothers to thank for issuing a series of biographies upon which entire dependence may be placed, the volumes in the "Famous Women Series" being thus far invariably trustworthy and enjoyable. Certainly the life of Madame de Staël, which Miss Bella Duffy has just written for it, is as good as the best of its predecessors; of each of which, according to our reasoning, the same thing might appropriately be said. Miss Duffy has little to tell of her subject that has not already been told in longer biographies, it is true; but from a great variety of sources she has extracted enough material to make an excellent study of the great Frenchwoman in a small space, which has never been done before successfully, so far as we know. Considering the size of the book, one marvels at the completeness of the picture the author presents, not only of Madame de Staël herself, but of her friends, and of the stirring times in which she lived and which so deeply colored her whole life. Miss Duffy, though disposed to look at her faults rather leniently, is by no means forgetful of them; she simply does her all the justice that the facts in the case warrant, which is perhaps more than readers of the longer biographies before referred to expect. At the end of the volume is a chapter devoted to the writings of Madame de Staël, which is so admirable a bit of literary criticism that we advise the purchase of the book if only for its sake. — The Capital, Washington.

Famous Women Series.

MRS. SIDDONS.

By NINA H. KENNARD.

One Volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

The latest contribution to the "Famous Women Series" gives the life of Mrs. Siddons, carefully and appreciatively compiled by Nina H. Kennard. Previous lives of Mrs. Siddons have failed to present the many-sided character of the great tragic queen, representing her more exclusively in her dramatic capacity. Mrs. Kennard presents the main facts in the lives previously written by Campbell and Boaden, as well as the portion of the great actress's history appearing in Percy Fitzgerald's "Lives of the Kembles;" and beyond any other biographer gives the more tender and domestic side of her nature, particularly as shown in her hitherto unpublished letters. The story of the early dramatic endeavors of the little Sarah Kemble proves not the least interesting part of the narrative, and it is with a distinct human interest that her varying progress is followed until she gains the summit of popular favor and success. The picture of her greatest public triumphs receives tender and artistic touches in the view we are given of the idol of brilliant and intellectual London sitting down with her husband and father to a frugal home supper on retiring from the glare of the footlights. — Commonwealth.

We think the author shows good judgment in devoting comparatively little space to criticism of Mrs. Siddons's dramatic methods, and giving special attention to her personal traits and history. Hers was an extremely interesting life, remarkable no less for its private virtues than for its public triumphs. Her struggle to gain the place her genius deserved was heroic in its persistence and dignity. Her relations with the authors, wits, and notables of her day give occasion for much entertaining and interesting anecdotal literature. Herself free from humor, she was herself often the occasion of fun in others. The stories of her tragic manner in private life are many and ludicrous. . . . The book abounds in anecdotes, bits of criticism, and pictures of the stage and of society in a very interesting transitional period. — Christian Union.

A fitting addition to this so well and so favorably known series is the life of the wonderful actress, Sarah Siddons, by Mrs. Nina Kennard. To most of the present generation the great woman is only a name, though she lived until 1831; but the present volume, with its vivid account of her life, its struggles, triumphs, and closing years, will give to such a picture that is most lifelike. A particularly pleasant feature of the book is the way in which the author quotes so copiously from Mrs. Siddons's correspondence. These extracts from letters written to friends, and with no thought of their ever appearing in print, give the most spontaneous expressions of feeling on the part of the writer, as well as her own account of many events of her life. They furnish, therefore, better data upon which to base an opinion of her real personality and character than anything else could possibly give. The volume is interesting from beginning to end, and one rises from its perusal with the warmest admiration for Sarah Siddons because of her great genius, her real goodness, and her true womanliness, shown in the relations of daughter, wife, and mother. Modern actresses, amateur or professional, with avowed intentions of "elevating the stage," should study this noble woman's example; for in this direction she accomplished more, probably, than any other one person has ever done, and at greater odds. — N. E. Journal of Education.

Famous Women Series.

MARGARET OF ANGOULÊME,
QUEEN OF NAVARRE.

By A. MARY F. ROBINSON.

One Volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

The latest addition to the excellent "Famous Women Series" is a sketch of the Queen of Navarre, one of the most deservedly famous women of the sixteenth century. In political influence she is fitly compared to Queen Elizabeth of England and Margaret of Austria; and as to her services to religion, she has been referred to as "the divinity of the great religious movement of her time, and the upholder of the mere natural rights of humanity in an age that only respected opinions." The story of this remarkable woman is here told briefly, and with a discrimination that does credit to the biographer. — Times-Star, Cincinnati.

Margaret of Angoulême furnishes a noble subject, which has been ably treated. Miss Robinson's sketch proves thorough research and a clear conception of her work, possessing a perfect knowledge of the characters and events connected with that period. She is in sympathy with every movement, and explicit in detail, being strictly confined to facts which may be authentically received. . . . This excellent biography is a source of enjoyment from the first page to the last, and should be read by every student and lover of history. It abounds in instructive and enjoyable reading, furnishing a valuable addition to this popular series. — Utica Press.

One of the most readable volumes thus far in the "Famous Women Series" has just been published by Roberts Brothers. It is Mary F. Robinson's "Life of Margaret of Angoulême, Queen of Navarre." Judging from the fifty different authorities that the writer has consulted, it is evident that she has taken great pains to sympathize with the spirit of the era which she describes. Only a warm imagination, stimulated by an intimate knowledge of details, will help an author to make his reader realize that the past was as present to those who lived in it as the present is to us. Miss Robinson has compiled a popular history, that has the easy flow and lifelike picturesqueness which it is so often the aim of the novelist to display. Such books as this, carefully and even artistically written as they are, help to fill up vacant nooks in the minds of those who have read large histories in which personal biography can hold but a small place; while at the same time they give the non-historical reader a good deal of information which is, or ought to be, more interesting than many a fiction. Nor does Miss Robinson estimate the influence of Margaret of Angoulême wrongly when she traces the salvation of a nation to her mercy and magnanimity. — N. Y. Telegram.

It is reasonable and impartial in its views, and yet clear in its judgments. The immense importance of Queen Margaret's influence on the beginnings of modern thoughts in France is clearly set forth, but without exaggeration or undue emphasis. Miss Robinson is especially happy in her portrayal of Margaret's complex character, which under her hand becomes both human and consistent; and the volume, although small, is a valuable addition to the history of France in the sixteenth century. — Boston Courier.

SUSANNA WESLEY.

BY ELIZA CLARKE.

ONE VOLUME. 16mo. CLOTH. PRICE, $1.00.

The "Famous Women Series," published at a dollar the volume by Roberts Brothers, now comprises George Eliot, Emily Brontë, George Sand, Mary Lamb, Margaret Fuller, Maria Edgeworth, Elizabeth Fry, the Countess of Albany, Mary Wollstonecraft, Harriet Martineau, Rachel, Madame Roland, and Susanna Wesley. The next volume will be Madame de Staël. The world has not gone into any ecstasies over these volumes. They are not discussed in the theatre or hotel lobbies, and even fashionable society knows very little about them. Yet there is a goodly company of quiet people that delight in this series. And well they may; for there are few biographical series more attractive, more modest, and more profitable than these "Famous Women." If one wanted to send a birthday or Christmas gift to a woman one honors, — whether she is twenty or sixty years old need not matter, — it would not be easy to select a better set than these volumes. To be sure, Americans do not figure prominently in the series, a certain preference being given to Englishwomen and Frenchwomen; but that does not diminish the intrinsic merit of each volume. One likes to add, also, that nearly the whole set has been written from a purely historical or matter-of-fact point of view, there being very little in the way of special pleading or one-sidedness. This applies especially to the mother of the Wesleys. Mankind has treated the whole Wesley family as if it was the special, not to say exclusive, property of the Methodists. But there is no fee-simple in good men or women, and all mankind may well lay a certain claim to all those who have in any way excelled or rendered important service to mankind at large. Eliza Clarke's life of Susanna Wesley tells us truly that she was "a lady of ancient lineage, a woman of intellect, a keen politician," and profoundly religious, as well as a shrewd observer of men, things, and society at large. . . . Her life is that of a gifted, high-minded, and prudent woman. It is told in a straightforward manner, and it should be read far beyond the lines of the Methodist denomination. There must have been many women in Colonial New England who resembled Susanna Wesley; for she was a typical character, both in worldly matters and in her spiritual life. — The Beacon.

Mrs. Wesley was the mother of nineteen children, among whom were John, the founder, and Charles, the sweet singer, of Methodism. Her husband was a poor country rector, who eked out by writing verses the slender stipend his clerical office brought him. Mrs. Wesley was a woman of gentle birth, intense religious convictions, strong character, and singular devotion to her children. This biography is well written, and is eminently readable, as well as historically valuable. — Cambridge Tribune.

One volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price $1.00.

"So far as it has been published, and it has now reached its ninth volume, the Famous Women Series is rather better on the whole than the English Men of Letters Series. One had but to recall the names and characteristics of some of the women with whom it deals, — literary women, like Maria Edgeworth, Margaret Fuller, Mary Lamb, Emily Brontë, George Eliot, and George Sand; women of the world (not to mention the other parties in that well-known Scriptural firm), like the naughty but fascinating Countess of Albany; and women of philanthropy, of which the only example given here so far is Mrs. Elizabeth Fry, — one has but to compare the intellectual qualities of the majority of English men of letters to perceive that the former are the most difficult to handle, and that a series of which they are the heroines is, if successful, a remarkable collection of biographies. We thought so as we read Miss Blind's study of George Sand, and Vernon Lee's study of the Countess of Albany, and we think so now that we have read Mrs. Elizabeth Robins Pennell's study of Mary Wollstonecraft, who, with all her faults, was an honor to her sex. She was not so considered while she lived, except by those who knew her well, nor for years after her death; but she is so considered now, even by the granddaughters of the good ladies who so bitterly condemned her when the century was new. She was notable for the sacrifices that she made for her worthless father and her weak, inefficient sisters, for her dogged persistence and untiring industry, and for her independence and her courage. The soul of goodness was in her, though she would be herself and go on her own way; and if she loved not wisely, according to the world's creed, she loved too well for her own happiness, and paid the penalty of suffering. What she might have been if she had not met Capt. Gilbert Imlay, who was a scoundrel, and William Godwin, who was a philosopher, can only be conjectured. She was a force in literature and in the enfranchisement of her sisterhood, and as such was worthy of the remembrance which she will long retain through Mrs. Pennell's able memoir." — *R. H. MARGARET FULLER.

By JULIA WARD HOWE.

One volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price $1.00.

“A memoir of the woman who first in New England took a position of moral and intellectual leadership, by the woman who wrote the Battle Hymn of the Republic, is a literary event of no common or transient interest. The Famous Women Series will have no worthier subject and no more illustrious biographer. Nor will the reader be disappointed, — for the narrative is deeply interesting and full of inspiration.” — Woman's Journal.

“Mrs. Julia Ward Howe's biography of Margaret Fuller, in the Famous Women Series of Messrs. Roberts Brothers, is a work which has been looked for with curiosity. It will not disappoint expectation. She has made a brilliant and an interesting book. Her study of Margaret Fuller's character is thoroughly sympathetic; her relation of her life is done in a graphic and at times a fascinating manner. It is the case of one woman of strong individuality depicting the points which made another one of the most marked characters of her day. It is always agreeable to follow Mrs. Howe in this; for while we see marks of her own mind constantly, there is no inartistic protrusion of her personality. The book is always readable, and the relation of the death-scene is thrillingly impressive.” — Saturday Gazette.

“Mrs. Julia Ward Howe has retold the story of Margaret Fuller's life and career in a very interesting manner. This remarkable woman was happy in having James Freeman Clarke, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and William Henry Channing, all of whom had been intimate with her and had felt the spell of her extraordinary personal influence, for her biographers. It is needless to say, of course, that nothing could be better than these reminiscences in their way.” — New York World.

“The selection of Mrs. Howe as the writer of this biography was a happy thought on the part of the editor of the series; for, aside from the natural appreciation she would have for Margaret Fuller, comes her knowledge of all the influences that had their effect on Margaret Fuller's life. She tells the story of Margaret Fuller's interesting life from all sources and from her own knowledge, not hesitating to use plenty of quotations when she felt that others, or even Margaret Fuller herself, had done the work better.” — Miss Gilder, in Philadelphia Press.

MADAME ROLAND.

By MATHILDE BLIND,
AUTHOR OF "GEORGE ELIOT'S LIFE."

One volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

---

"Of all the interesting biographies published in the Famous Women Series, Mathilde Blind's life of Mme. Roland is by far the most fascinating. . . . But no one can read Mme. Roland's thrilling story, and no one can study the character of this noble, heroic woman without feeling certain that it is good for the world to have every incident of her life brought again before the public eye. Among the famous women who have been enjoying a new birth through this set of short biographies, no single one has been worthy of the adjective great until we come to Mme. Roland. . . .

"We see a brilliant intellectual woman in Mme. Roland; we see a dutiful daughter and devoted wife; we see a woman going forth bravely to place her neck under the guillotine, — a woman who had been known as the 'Soul of the Girondins;' and we see a woman struggling with and not being overcome by an intense and passionate love. Has history a more heroic picture to present us with? Is there any woman more deserving of the adjective 'great'?"

"Mathilde Blind has had rich materials from which to draw for Mme. Roland's biography. She writes graphically, and describes some of the terrible scenes in the French Revolution with great picturesqueness. The writer's sympathy with Mme. Roland and her enthusiasm is very contagious; and we follow her record almost breathlessly, and with intense feeling turn over the last few pages of this little volume. No one can doubt that this life was worth the writing, and even earnest students of the French Revolution will be glad to refresh their memories of Lamartine's 'History of the Girondins,' and again have brought vividly before them the terrible tragedy of Mme. Roland's life and death." — Boston Evening Transcript.

"The thrilling story of Madame Roland's genius, nobility, self-sacrifice, and death loses nothing in its retelling here. The material has been collected and arranged in an unbroken and skilfully narrated sketch, each picturesque or exciting incident being brought out into a strong light. The book is one of the best in an excellent series." — Christian Union.

MARIA EDGEWORTH.

By HELEN ZIMMERN.

One volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price $1.00.

"This little volume shows good literary workmanship. It does not weary the reader with vague theories; nor does it give over much expression to the enthusiasm — not to say baseless encomium — for which too many female biographers have accustomed us to look. It is a simple and discriminative sketch of one of the most clever and lovable of the class at whom Carlyle sneered as 'scribbling women.' . . . Of Maria Edgeworth, the woman, one cannot easily say too much in praise. That home life, so loving, so wise, and so helpful, was beautiful to its end. Miss Zimmern has treated it with delicate appreciation. Her book is refined in conception and tasteful in execution, — all, in short, the cynic might say, that we expect a woman's book to be." — New York Tribune.

"It was high time that we should possess an adequate biography of this ornament and general benefactor of her time. And so we hail with uncommon pleasure the volume just published in the Roberts Brothers' series of Famous Women, of which it is the sixth. We have only words of praise for the manner in which Miss Zimmern has written her life of Maria Edgeworth. It exhibits sound judgment, critical analysis, and clear characterization. . . . The style of the volume is pure, limpid, and strong, as we might expect from a well-trained English writer." — Margaret F. Preston, in the Home Journal.

"We can heartily recommend this life of Maria Edgeworth, not only because it is singularly readable in itself, but because it makes familiar to readers of the present age a notable figure in English literary history, with whose lineaments we suspect most readers, especially of the present generation, are less familiar than they ought to be." — Eclectic.

"This biography contains several letters and papers by Miss Edgeworth that have not before been made public, notably some charming letters written during the latter part of her life to Dr. Holland and Mr. and Mrs. Ticknor. The author had access to a life of Miss Edgeworth written by her step-mother, as well as to a large collection of her private letters, and has therefore been able to bring forward many facts in her life which have not been noted by other writers. The book is written in a pleasant vein, and is altogether a delightful one to read." — Utica Herald.

GEORGE SAND.

By BERTHA THOMAS.

One volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

"Miss Thomas has accomplished a difficult task with as much good sense as good feeling. She presents the main facts of George Sand's life, extenuating nothing, and setting naught down in malice, but wisely leaving her readers to form their own conclusions. Everybody knows that it was not such a life as the women of England and America are accustomed to live, and as the worst of men are glad to have them live. . . . Whatever may be said against it, its result on George Sand was not what it would have been upon an English or American woman of genius." — New York Mail and Express.

"This is a volume of the 'Famous Women Series,' which was begun so well with George Eliot and Emily Eronté. The book is a review and critical analysis of George Sand's life and work, by no means a detailed biography. Amantine Lucile Aurore Dupin, the maiden, or Mme. Dudevant, the married woman, is forgotten in the renown of the pseudonym George Sand.

"Altogether, George Sand, with all her excesses and defects, is a representative woman, one of the names of the nineteenth century. She was great among the greatest, the friend and compeer of the finest intellects, and Miss Thomas's essay will be a useful and agreeable introduction to a more extended study of her life and works." — Knickerbocker.

"The biography of this famous woman, by Miss Thomas, is the only one in existence. Those who have awaited it with pleasurable anticipation, but with some trepidation as to the treatment of the erratic side of her character, cannot fail to be pleased with the skill by which it is done. It is the best production on George Sand that has yet been published. The author modestly refers to it as a sketch, which it undoubtedly is, but a sketch that gives a just and discriminating analysis of George Sand's life, tastes, occupations, and of the motives and impulses which prompted her unconventional actions, that were misunderstood by a narrow public. The difficulties encountered by the writer in describing this remarkable character are shown in the first line of the opening chapter, which says, 'In naming George Sand we name something more exceptional than even a great genius.' That tells the whole story. Misconstruction, condemnation, and isolation are the penalties enforced upon the great leaders in the realm of advanced thought, by the bigoted people of their time. The thinkers soar beyond the common herd, whose soul-wings are not strong enough to fly aloft to clearer atmospheres, and consequently they censure or ridicule what they are powerless to reach. George Sand, even to a greater extent than her contemporary, George Eliot, was a victim to ignorant social prejudices, but even the conservative world was forced to recognize the matchless genius of these two extraordinary women, each widely different in her character and method of thought and writing. . . . She has told much that is good which has been untold, and just what will interest the reader, and no more, in the same easy, entertaining style that characterizes all of these unpretentious biographies." — Hartford Times.

FAMOUS WOMEN SERIES.

EMILY BRONTË.

By A. MARY F. ROBINSON.

One vol. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

"Miss Robinson has written a fascinating biography. . . . Emily Brontë is interesting, not because she wrote 'Wuthering Heights,' but because of her brave, baffled, human life, so lonely, so full of pain, but with a great hope shining beyond all the darkness, and a passionate defiance in bearing more than the burdens that were laid upon her. The story of the three sisters is infinitely sad, but it is the ennobling sadness that belongs to large natures cramped and striving for freedom to heroic, almost desperate, work, with little or no result. The author of this intensely interesting, sympathetic, and eloquent biography, is a young lady and a poet, to whom a place is given in a recent anthology of living English poets, which is supposed to contain only the best poems of the best writers." — Boston Daily Advertiser.

"Miss Robinson had many excellent qualifications for the task she has performed in this little volume, among which may be named, an enthusiastic interest in her subject and a real sympathy with Emily Brontë's sad and heroic life. 'To represent her as she was,' says Miss Robinson, 'would be her noblest and most fitting monument.' . . . Emily Brontë here becomes well known to us and, in one sense, this should be praise enough for any biography." — New York Times.

"The biographer who finds such material before him as the lives and characters of the Brontë family need have no anxiety as to the interest of his work. Characters not only strong but so uniquely strong, genius so supreme, misfortunes so overwhelming, set in its scenery so forlornly picturesque, could not fail to attract all readers, if told even in the most prosaic language. When we add to this, that Miss Robinson has told their story not in prosaic language, but with a literary style exhibiting all the qualities essential to good biography, our readers will understand that this life of Emily Brontë is not only as interesting as a novel, but a great deal more interesting than most novels. As it presents most vividly a general picture of the family, there seems hardly a reason for giving it Emily's name alone, except perhaps for the masterly chapters on 'Wuthering Heights,' which the reader will find a grateful condensation of the best in that powerful but somewhat forbidding story. We know of no point in the Brontë history — their genius, their surroundings, their faults, their happiness, their misery, their love and friendships, their peculiarities, their power, their gentleness, their patience, their pride, — which Miss Robinson has not touched upon with conscientiousness and sympathy." — The Critic.

"'Emily Brontë' is the second of the 'Famous Women Series,' which Roberts Brothers, Boston, propose to publish, and of which 'George Eliot' was the initial volume. Not the least remarkable of a very remarkable family, the personage whose life is here written, possesses a peculiar interest to all who are at all familiar with the sad and singular history of herself and her sister Charlotte. That the author, Miss A. Mary F. Robinson, has done her work with minute fidelity to facts as well as affectionate devotion to the subject of her sketch, is plainly to be seen all through the book." — Washington Post.

HARRIET MARTINEAU.

By MRS. F. FENWICK MILLER.

16mo. Cloth. Price $1.00.

"The almost uniform excellence of the 'Famous Women' series is well sustained in Mrs. Fenwick Miller's life of Harriet Martineau, the latest addition to this little library of biography. Indeed, we are disposed to rank it as the best of the lot. The subject is an entertaining one, and Mrs. Miller has done her work admirably. Miss Martineau was a remarkable woman, in a century that has not been deficient in notable characters. Her native genius, and her perseverance in developing it; her trials and afflictions, and the determination with which she rose superior to them; her conscientious adherence to principle, and the important place which her writings hold in the political and educational literature of her day, — all combine to make the story of her life one of exceptional interest. . . . With the exception, possibly, of George Eliot, Harriet Martineau was the greatest of English women. She was a poet and a novelist, but not as such did she make good her title to distinction. Much more noteworthy were her achievements in other lines of thought, not usually essayed by women. She was eminent as a political economist, a theologian, a journalist, and a historian. . . . But to attempt a mere outline of her life and works is out of the question in our limited space. Her biography should be read by all in search of entertainment." — Professor Woods in Saturday Mirror.

"The present volume has already shared the fate of several of the recent biographies of the distinguished dead, and has been well advertised by the public contradiction of more or less important points in the relation by the living friends of the dead genius. One of Mrs. Miller's chief concerns in writing this life seems to have been to redeem the character of Harriet Martineau from the appearance of hardness and unamiability with which her own autobiography impresses the reader. . . . Mrs. Miller, however, succeeds in this volume in showing us an altogether different side to her character, — a home-loving, neighborly, bright-natured, tender-hearted, witty, lovable, and altogether womanly woman, as well as the clear thinker, the philosophical reasoner, and comprehensive writer whom we already knew." — The Index.

"Already ten volumes in this library are published; namely, George Eliot, Emily Brontë, George Sand, Mary Lamb, Margaret Fuller, Maria Edgeworth, Elizabeth Fry, The Countess of Albany, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the present volume. Surely a galaxy of wit and wealth of no mean order! Miss M. will rank with any of them in womanliness or gifts or grace. At home or abroad, in public or private. She was noble and true, and her life stands confessed a success. True, she was literary, but she was a home lover and home builder. She never lost the higher aims and ends of life, no matter how flattering her success. This whole series ought to be read by the young ladies of to-day. More of such biography would prove highly beneficial." — Troy Telegram.

ELIZABETH FRY.

BY MRS. E. R. PITMAN.

One vol. 16mo. Cloth. Price $1.00.

"In the records of famous women there are few more noble examples of Christian womanhood and philanthropic enthusiasm than the life of Elizabeth Fry presents. Her character was beautifully rounded and complete, and if she had not won fame through her public benefactions, she would have been no less esteemed and remembered by all who knew her because of her domestic virtues, her sweet womanly charms, and the wisdom, purity, and love which marked her conduct as wife, mother, and friend. She came of that sound old Quaker stock which has bred so many eminent men and women. The time came when her home functions could no longer satisfy the yearnings of a heart filled with the tenderest pity for all who suffered; and her work was not far to seek. The prisons of England, nay, of all Europe, were in a deplorable condition. In Newgate, dirt, disease, starvation, depravity, drunkenness, &c., prevailed. All who surveyed the situation regarded it as hopeless; all but Mrs. Fry. She saw here the opening she had been awaiting. Into this seething mass she bravely entered, Bible in hand, and love and pity in her eyes and upon her lips. If any one should ask which of all the famous women recorded in this series did the most practical good in her day and generation, the answer must be, Elizabeth Fry."—New York Tribune.

"Mrs. Pitman has written a very interesting and appreciative sketch of the life, character, and eminent services in the causes of humanity of one of England's most famous philanthropists. She was known as the prison philanthropist, and probably no laborer in the cause of prison reform ever won a larger share of success, and certainly none ever received a larger meed of reverential love. No one can read this volume without feelings of admiration for the noble woman who devoted her life to befriend sinful and suffering humanity."—Chicago Evening Journal.

"The story of her splendid and successful philanthropy is admirably told by her biographer, and every reader should find in the tale a breath of inspiration. Not every woman can become an Elizabeth Fry, but no one can fail to be impressed with the thought that no woman, however great her talent and ambition, can fail to find opportunity to do a noble work in life without neglecting her own feminine duties, without ceasing to dignify all the distinctive virtues of her sex, without fretting and crying aloud over the restrictions placed on woman's field of work."—Eclectic Monthly.

Famous Women Series.

GEORGE ELIOT.

By MATHILDE BLIND.

One vol. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

"Messrs. Roberts Brothers begin a series of Biographies of Famous Women with a life of George Eliot, by Mathilde Blind. The idea of the series is an excellent one, and the reputation of its publishers is a guarantee for its adequate execution. This book contains about three hundred pages in open type, and not only collects and condenses the main facts that are known in regard to the history of George Eliot, but supplies other material from personal research. It is agreeably written, and with a good idea of proportion in a memoir of its size. The critical study of its subject's works, which is made in the order of their appearance, is particularly well done. In fact, good taste and good judgment pervade the memoir throughout." — Saturday Evening Gazette.

"Miss Blind's little book is written with admirable good taste and judgment, and with notable self-restraint. It does not weary the reader with critical discursiveness, nor with attempts to search out high-flown meanings and recondite oracles in the plain 'yea' and 'nay' of life. It is a graceful and unpretentious little biography, and tells all that need be told concerning one of the greatest writers of the time. It is a deeply interesting if not fascinating woman whom Miss Blind presents," says the New York Tribune.

"Miss Blind's little biographical study of George Eliot is written with sympathy and good taste, and is very welcome. It gives us a graphic if not elaborate sketch of the personality and development of the great novelist, is particularly full and authentic concerning her earlier years, tells enough of the leading motives in her work to give the general reader a lucid idea of the true drift and purpose of her art, and analyzes carefully her various writings, with no attempt at profound criticism or fine writing, but with appreciation, insight, and a clear grasp of those underlying psychological principles which are so closely interwoven in every production that came from her pen." — Traveller.

"The lives of few great writers have attracted more curiosity and speculation than that of George Eliot. Had she only lived earlier in the century she might easily have become the centre of a mythos. As it is, many of the anecdotes commonly repeated about her are made up largely of fable. It is, therefore, well, before it is too late, to reduce the true story of her career to the lowest terms, and this service has been well done by the author of the present volume." — Philadelphia Press.

MARY LAMB.

By ANNE GILCHRIST.

One volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

"The story of Mary Lamb has long been familiar to the readers of Elia, but never in its entirety as in the monograph which Mrs. Anne Gilchrist has just contributed to the Famous Women Series. Darkly hinted at by Talfourd in his Final Memorials of Charles Lamb, it became better known as the years went on and that imperfect work was followed by fuller and franker biographies, — became so well known, in fact, that no one could recall the memory of Lamb without recalling at the same time the memory of his sister." — New York Mail and Express.

"A biography of Mary Lamb must inevitably be also, almost more, a biography of Charles Lamb, so completely was the life of the sister encompassed by that of her brother; and it must be allowed that Mrs. Anne Gilchrist has performed a difficult biographical task with taste and ability. . . . The reader is at least likely to lay down the book with the feeling that if Mary Lamb is not famous she certainly deserves to be, and that a debt of gratitude is due Mrs. Gilchrist for this well-considered record of her life." — Boston Courier.

"Mary Lamb, who was the embodiment of everything that is tenderest in woman, combined with this a heroism which bore her on for a while through the terrors of insanity. Think of a highly intellectual woman struggling year after year with madness, triumphant over it for a season, and then at last succumbing to it. The saddest lines that ever were written are those descriptive of this brother and sister just before Mary, on some return of insanity, was to leave Charles Lamb. 'On one occasion Mr. Charles Lloyd met them slowly pacing together a little foot-path in Hoxton Fields, both weeping bitterly, and found, on joining them, that they were taking their solemn way to the accustomed asylum.' What pathos is there not here?" — New York Times.

"This life was worth writing, for all records of weakness conquered, of pain patiently borne, of success won from difficulty, of cheerfulness in sorrow and affliction, make the world better. Mrs. Gilchrist's biography is unaffected and simple. She has told the sweet and melancholy story with judicious sympathy, showing always the light shining through darkness." — Philadelphia Press.

RACHEL.

By Mrs. NINA H. KENNARD.

One Volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $1.00.

---

"Rachel, by Nina H. Kennard, is an interesting sketch of the famous woman whose passion and genius won for her an almost unrivalled fame as an actress. The story of Rachel's career is of the most brilliant success in art and of the most pathetic failure in character. Her faults, many and grievous, are overlooked in this volume, and the better aspects of her nature and history are recorded." — Hartford Courant.

"The book is well planned, has been carefully constructed, and is pleasantly written." — The Critic.

"The life of Mlle. Élixa Rachel Félix has never been adequately told, and the appearance of her biography in the 'Famous Women Series' of Messrs. Roberts Brothers will be welcomed. . . . Yet we must be glad the book is written, and welcome it to a place among the minor biographies; and because there is nothing else so good, the volume is indispensable to library and study." — Boston Evening Traveller.

"Another life of the great actress Rachel has been written. It forms part of the 'Famous Women Series,' which that firm is now bringing out, and which already includes eleven volumes. Mrs. Kennard deals with her subject much more amiably than one or two of the other biographers have done. She has none of those vindictive feelings which are so obvious in Madame B.'s narrative of the great tragedienne. On the contrary, she wants to be fair, and she probably is as fair as the materials which came into her possession enabled her to be. The endeavor has been made to show us Rachel as she really was, by relying to a great extent upon her letters. . . . A good many stories that we are familiar with are repeated, and some are contradicted. From first to last, however, the sympathy of the author is ardent, whether she recounts the misery of Rachel's childhood, or the splendid altitude to which she climbed when her name echoed through the world and the great ones of the earth vied in doing her homage. On this account Mrs. Kennard's book is a welcome addition to the pre-existing biographies of one of the greatest actresses the world ever saw." — N. Y. Evening Telegram.

THE COUNTESS OF ALBANY.

BY VERNON LEE.

One volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price $1.00.

"It is no disparagement to the many excellent previous sketches to say that 'The Countess of Albany,' by Vernon Lee, is decidedly the cleverest of the series of biographies of 'Famous Women,' published in this country by Roberts Brothers, Boston. In the present instance there is a freer subject, a little farther removed from contemporary events, and sufficiently out of the way of prejudice to admit of a lucid handling. Moreover, there is a trained hand at the work, and a mind not only familiar with and in sympathy with the character under discussion, but also at home with the ruling forces of the eighteenth century, which were the forces that made the Countess of Albany what she was. The biography is really dual, tracing the life of Alfieri, for twenty-five years the heart and soul companion of the Countess, quite as carefully as it traces that of the fixed subject of the sketch." — Philadelphia Times.

"To be unable altogether to acquiesce in Vernon Lee's portrait of Louise of Stolberg does not militate against our sense of the excellence of her work. Her pictures of eighteenth-century Italy are definite and brilliant. They are instinct with a quality that is akin to magic." — London Academy.

"In the records of famous women preserved in the interesting series which has been devoted to such noble characters as Margaret Fuller, Elizabeth Fry, and George Eliot, the life of the Countess of Albany holds a unique place. Louise of Albany, or Louise R., as she liked to sign herself, possessed a character famed, not for domestic virtues, nor even for peculiar wisdom and creative power, but rather notorious for an easy-going indifference to conventionality and a worldly wisdom and cynicism. Her life, which is a singular exponent of the false ideas prevalent upon the subject of love and marriage in the eighteenth century, is told by Vernon Lee in a vivid and discriminating manner. The biography is one of the most fascinating, if the most sorrowful, of the series." — Boston Journal.

"She is the first really historical character who has appeared on the literary horizon of this particular series, her predecessors having been limited to purely literary women. This brilliant little biography is strongly written. Unlike preceding writers — German, French, and English — on the same subject, the author does not hastily pass over the details of the Platonic relations that existed between the Countess and the celebrated Italian poet 'Alfieri.' In this biography the details of that passionate friendship are given with a fidelity to truth, and a knowledge of its nature, that is based upon the strictest and most conscientious investigation, and access to means heretofore unattainable to other biographers. The history of this friendship is not only exceedingly interesting, but it presents a fascinating psychological study to those who are interested in the metaphysical aspect of human nature. The book is almost as much of a biography of 'Alfieri' as it is of the wife of the Pretender, who expected to become the Queen of England." — Hartford Times.
