(a) Even were Ramsay's identification of sons and heirs justifiable, there would not be any fitness in the assumption that the Gentile followers of Abraham in his faith are regarded as heirs of his faith. Ramsay says (Exp., '98b, p. 203 = Gal. chap. 31, p. 337): 'the idea that they are sons of Abraham . . . would certainly be understood by the Galatians as referring to the legal process called adoption, υιοθεσία.' Now Paul indeed expressly uses this word in speaking of their adoption (Gal. 45); but this adoption makes them sons of God. He cannot at the same moment have intended to make out that they were by adoption sons of Abraham. On the contrary, their designation as 'sons of Abraham' is to be regarded as a mere Hebraism. 'Sons of the Prophets' (2 K. 23 Am. 7 14 etc., see SON) are those who adhere to, or follow, the prophets. It is precisely in this sense that we read in Rom. 4 12 of the believing gentiles that they 'walk in the steps of the faith of our father Abraham which he had in uncircumcision.' In the same way we are dealing only with a Hebrew idea when Paul in Rom. 4 11*f.* 16-18 speaks of Abraham as their father. Ramsay's conjecture (Exp., '98b, p. 294*f.* = Gal. chap. 31 p. 342*f.*) that Paul uses this particular expression with a reference to the more comprehensive sense of the word pater (somewhat like protector), which is frequent in Latin, is quite away from the point.

(b) Even where it is possible to show that in some case a will comprising an adoption had been held to be irrevocable it would not be legitimate to assume that by the word διαθήκη, employed without qualification in Gal. 3 15 17, Paul and the Galatians understood a special kind of will—that, namely, associated with the adoption of a son; still less is it legitimate when it is remembered that in the case before us there can be no thought of adoption, Christ, God's own son (Rom. 8 32), being the sole heir. But if, as we contend, the apostle and his readers must have taken the word in its general sense, there is still less proof forthcoming for Ramsay's thesis that they must have held wills to be irrevocable. True, Ramsay says (Exp., '98b, p. 301 = Gal. chap. 33, p. 351): 'We think of a will as secret and inoperative during the lifetime of the testator, as revocable by him at pleasure, and as executed by him only with a view to his own death. A will of that kind could have no application to God, and no such analogy could have been used by Paul.' These words can hardly be understood otherwise than as meaning that what Paul had in his mind was adoption by a person still alive. But this is absolutely excluded; δαθῆναι in the language of the law as that had been long established in Paul's time never means anything else than a will made with reference to death (the sense of 'covenant' does not come into consideration here). It is of course true that the analogy to a man who makes arrangements with his death in view halts somewhat when applied to God; but that Paul does so apply it is unquestionable.

Thus another view of Gal. 3:15-17, which has the support of many scholars, though not taken into account by Ramsay, becomes all the more inevitable. When it is said (3:15) that 'no man maketh void or addeth to' a man's testament, the testator himself is not to be regarded as included in the proposition. He himself might perhaps have it in his power to change it. Only, this possibility does not come into account in the case under consideration. For in the apostle's view it is not God but the angels who are regarded as authors of the Mosaic law, which announces a change of the divine purpose—compared to a testament—given in the promise to Abraham. Of the angels he assumes that their action was on their own responsibility, not at the command of God. On this interpretation, the question whether it is with Greek or with Roman law that we are dealing, does not arise. In every system of law it holds good that an outsider cannot alter another man's will.

(c) As for Gal. 4:2, the plural 'guardians and stewards' (ἐπιτρόπους καὶ οἰκονομοὺς) makes it very improbable from the outset that the apostle is thinking of the son as being subject to the 'guardians' during one part of his minority and to the 'stewards' during another part only; for the law speaks, as is but natural, in the singular, of one tutor and one curator. If, however, Paul is thinking of both tutors and curators as discharging their office simultaneously it becomes impossible to detect his exact legal meaning. Equally impossible is it to do so if, as is not improbable, he is thinking of the father of the heir as still living. It must be remembered that in the figure the father is God. In 3:15-17 he is compelled to think of God as dead; but not in 4:1 f.

(d) Even if we grant, however, for the sake of argument, the possibility that Paul's manner of expressing himself in Galatians is in agreement with Greek law, what has been proved? Only that Paul himself was acquainted with this law, not by any means that his readers also were. Or has the apostle in other matters paid such careful regard to the circumstances of his readers? The Galatians were all, or nearly all, Gentile Christians (see next article, § 11) and yet he writes in a way that includes them also with reference to the Mosaic law, 'Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law' (3:13); 'we were kept in ward under the law . . . so that the law hath been our tutor,' etc. (3:23-25), and 'Christ redeemed them which were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons' (4:5). The church of Corinth in like manner was, practically, entirely Gentile; yet Paul writes (1 Cor. 10:1), 'our fathers were all under the cloud, and all passed through the sea,' etc. In the case of a writer who is so careless to guard his language on obvious and important points, it is futile to single out individual phrases, assume them to have been carefully chosen with reference to the special environment of the readers and on these to base far-reaching conclusions as to where that environment was (as, e.g., Ramsay does in Gal. chap. 35, p. 374).

The same remark applies to the proof of a South Galatian address which Ramsay finds in the 'tutor' (παιδαγωγός) of 3:24 f. on the ground that there were no slaves of this kind in North Galatia, or again in 3:28 because in South Galatia the women enjoyed greater independence than elsewhere (Expt., '986, pp. 433-436, 438 f. = Gal. chap. 39 f., pp. 381-385 389-391), and other proofs of the same nature.

It is probable that in Acts 20:4 we have an enumeration of the representatives of churches who had been

22. Acts 20:4. appointed as men of trust, in accordance with 2 Cor. 8:18-23, to see to the due conveyance of the proceeds of the great collection to Jerusalem. Among these, whilst we find two South Galatians—Gaius and Timothy—no North Galatian is mentioned; and from this it has been supposed that in 1 Cor. 16:1 South Galatia must be meant. The list, however, is not complete. It has no representatives of Corinth and Philippi,¹ and names of North Galatians can equally well have been omitted. Above all, it would have been quite irrational to carry moneys from South Galatia to Jerusalem by way of Macedonia² and run all the risks (2 Cor. 11:26) of such a journey. Moreover, Timothy was the constant companion of Paul, and in like manner Gaius also will have been a member of the company on other accounts than that of the collection.

1 Cor. 16:1 comes into consideration for the reason that Paul presumably used 'Galatia' in Galatians in the same sense as here. Now, 1 Cor. 16:1 is held to refer to South Galatia, because it is deemed improbable that Paul did not invite the South Galatians also to take a part in the great love-offering of the Gentile churches. But he may very well have invited them even if 1 Cor. 16:1 refers to North Galatia. Paul here says only that he has appointed a particular manner of making the collection in Galatia. It is open to us to suppose that he has not as yet had occasion to do this for South Galatia also, or that another method had already been adopted there.

In Galatians Paul makes no reference to the journey to Jerusalem mentioned in Acts 18:22. From this is drawn the inference that the epistle must have been addressed to South Galatia, because, as is shown by Gal. 4:13, Paul must have already visited the readers twice before the despatch of the epistle. These two visits can perhaps, if one is willing to be satisfied with the meagrest possible evidence, be held to be proved for South Galatia from Acts 13:14-14:20 and 14:21-23; or, the first visit from Acts 13:14-14:23 and the second from Acts 16:1-5; as far as North Galatia is concerned they are not to be found till 16:6 and 18:23. That, however, the journey of 18:22 f. may very well have occurred and yet not be mentioned in Galatians, see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 1c.

In Gal. 2:1-10 Paul speaks of the Council of Jerusalem as hitherto unknown to the Galatians. This also has suggested the inference that Paul's second visit to the readers must have occurred before the council—in other words, that it is related in Acts 14:21-23, and so must have been made to South Galatia. On the other hand, even if the Council of Jerusalem had already been held, Paul surely had every motive for keeping back as long as possible from newly-converted Gentile Christians all knowledge of the existence of misunderstandings of the kind. His principle was to feed such churches with milk, and to set forth Christ plainly before their eyes (1 Cor. 3:2 Gal. 3:1). At his second visit he had, it is true, found the churches already to some extent under the influence of Judaism (19, 'said before,' προειρήκαμεν, 53, 'again,' πάλιν); but the 'I marvel' (θαυμάζω) of 16 shows that he had left them in the honest belief that he had been successful in counteracting this danger.

From the 'again' (πάλιν) of 53 it is legitimate to infer that in this connection he had employed substantially the same arguments as those which he afterwards used in the epistle (e.g., 52-4 21-5 49); and we may regard it as a proof of his apostolical wisdom that he declined to make use of the controversies of the Council of Jerusalem in furtherance of his end.

At the Council of Jerusalem Paul supported the interests of the readers of Galatians, according to the 26. 'With you,' 'with you' (πρὸς ὑμᾶς) of 25. This would still hold good, however, even on the assumption that at that time they had not yet been converted—which was the case with the North Galatians. Paul was concerned at that crisis in vindicating freedom from the law for the churches which he was yet to found as well as for those which he had already established. Even if the letter be assumed to be addressed to South Galatians, 'with you' (πρὸς ὑμᾶς) constitutes only an individual application. That in the Council of Jerusalem Paul should have had in his mind only his South Galatian churches, and not equally those founded by him in Syria, Cilicia, etc., would be a wholly untenable supposition.

The sickness of Paul, alluded to in Gal. 4.13, Ramsay (Church, chap. 8, pp. 62-65) considers to have been malaria, which is endemic in Pamphylia, and, as he thinks, was the cause of the apostle's going for recovery to the more highly situated Antiochia Pisidia.

As Ramsay further (St. Paul, chap. 52) identifies this sickness with 'the thorn in the flesh,' it is very improbable that malaria can be meant. The view finds no real support in the fact that fever occurs in inscriptions as a punishment sent by the gods of this lower world, to which Ramsay supposes the 'messenger of Satan' (ἄγγελος σατανᾶ) of 2 Cor. 12.7b to refer (Exp., 1908, p. 217. = Gal. chap. 48, p. 423).

Unless 2 Cor. 12.7a is to be held to be meaningless, the apostle's malady was associated with ecstatic visions; and these are not, so far as we know, symptomatic of malaria, though certainly they are of epilepsy, with which Krenkel (among others) has identified Paul's 'thorn in the flesh' (Beitr. zur Aufhellung der Gesch. u. d. Briefe d. Ap. Paulus, 90, pp. 47-125, and, earlier, in ZWT, 73, pp. 238-244). Ramsay (Gal. chap. 48, p. 427) himself says: 'In fact, it is the visions which give probability to the theory of epilepsy. . . . The theory is seductive. But are we prepared to accept the consequences? . . . Has the modern world, with all that is best and truest in it, been built upon the dreams of epileptic insanity?' This is the argument of a theologian, not of a historian.

However this may be, the fact that Pamphylia exposes the traveller to risks of malaria is no proof that Paul could not possibly have been seized with illness even in North Galatia. Moreover, Paul says that on account of his sickness he was received as an 'angel of god' (ἄγγελος θεοῦ; Gal. 4.14). About any reception of this kind in Antiochia Pisidia (where, according to Ramsay, he had this illness), we read nothing in Acts (on the contrary, we are told of a persecution instigated by the Jews [13.50], of which Galatians says nothing); and Ramsay cannot think of him any longer as having been ill in Lystra, where, according to Ramsay, the favourable reception occurred.

Thus, whilst on the points formerly discussed, all that it was possible to prove was that the individual actual data warranted the North Galatian theory just as much as the Southern, here we have a consideration which makes positively for North and against South Galatia. On the four points remaining to be considered we come to this same conclusion.

Barnabas, it is thought, must have been personally known to the Galatians. He is introduced without remark in Gal. 2.19 13; and he was the companion of Paul only on his first journey, not on his second (Acts 15.36-40). Peter also, however, is mentioned in Gal. 1.18 without explanation; and Barnabas, although he was unknown to the Corinthians, is introduced in the same manner in 1 Cor. 9.6—it was enough that they had heard about him. Besides, Paul expresses himself as having been in so exclusive a sense the founder of the Galatian churches (Gal. 18 f. 31 f. 412-20) that it is almost impossible to suppose South Galatia to be meant. According to Acts 14.12, Barnabas was even taken for Jupiter in Lystra.

The apostrophe 'O Galatians' (ὦ Γαλάται), in 3:1 addressed to persons who, by origin, were much rather 29. 'O Galatians'; Gal. 3.1. Lycaonians or Phrygians, would be intelligible in an official manifesto; but in a letter such as this of Paul's it would become so only if besides New Galatians Old Galatians were included (against which supposition, see above, col. 1607, beg. of iii.). On the assumption that the apostrophe was addressed to the New Galatians alone, such a mode of address is in the highest degree improbable.

It must not be forgotten that Ramsay has been able to cite not a single instance, so far as Galatia is concerned, and in the case of the province of Asia, which had subsisted more than a century longer, only one, in which the inhabitants of districts first incorporated with the provinces by the Romans designated themselves by the official provincial name (CIG 36626; see St. Bibl. et eccl. 431). It is only by a series of exceedingly bold hypotheses that he endeavours (op. cit., 25, 46-55; Gal., introd., § 7, p. 64 f.) to establish a probability that Iconium and Lystra had already become part of Galatia before the setting up of the Roman province, about 160 B.C. Derbe, certainly, was not added to Galatia until 25 B.C., according to § 3, above, not until 47 A.D. Accordingly the aptness of the exclamation 'O Galatians' as addressed to the North Galatians, depends not on their Celtic descent, but on the fact that only in North Galatia was to be found the people who had borne that name from of old, and in common speech, not merely in official documents.

But we will not, however great the improbability, dispute the abstract possibility that Paul might have made use of the term 'Galatians' as a

30. 'Unto the Churches'; Gal. 1.2. comprehensive designation of inhabitants of several recently-added portions of the province of Galatia. Not even in such a case could he have made use of the address 'to the churches of Galatia' (ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις τῆς Γαλατίας; Gal. 1.2) in writing to South Galatia if there were churches already in North Galatia. Even if the letter were sent by the hands of a trusty messenger who quite understood where to deliver it, the article (ταῖς) would have been inadmissible. Now, the letter contains information about the Council of Jerusalem and the controversy with Peter in Antioch in Syria. If addressed to South Galatia, the letter must, accordingly, have been written between the date of the controversy and that of the founding of the North Galatian churches (Acts 16.6). If so, the first alternative is that it was written from Antioch, in Syria, before Acts 15.40; in which case the two visits of Paul implied in the 'the former [time]' (τὸ πρότερον) of Gal. 4.13 would have to be sought in Acts 13.14-14.20 and 14.21-23 (see above, § 24). Against this view we must bring an observation which also makes against Ramsay's dating of the epistle from Paul's next stay in Antioch in Syria (Acts 18.23; see St. Paul, chap. 84). On both occasions there was an immediate prospect of a renewed visit to the readers by the apostle. Ramsay considers that Paul may have entrusted the bearer of the epistle with an oral announcement of his proposed visit. In such a case, however (1 Cor. 4.18-21 16.5-8 2 Cor. 12.14 13.1 f.), the apostle's procedure is very different. Moreover, he manifestly writes Gal. 4.20 on the supposition that he is not about to see them soon.

A second possibility would be that the epistle was written between Acts 16.5 and 16.6. In that case Acts 13.14-14.23 would have to be reckoned as the first visit, and 16.1-5 as the second. How would this leave a sufficient interval during which, after the second visit, the Judaizers could have had time for going to the readers and so completely changing their attitude towards the apostle and his message, and for Paul to hear of all this before his arrival in North Galatia from the South?

Most decisive of all is Gal. 1.21. If the epistle were addressed to South Galatia, Paul would, according to 31. Gal. 121. Acts 13*f.*, have been with his readers in the period indicated in Gal. 121 between his first and his second visit to Jerusalem (see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 1*a*). It is not for a moment to be thought that Paul would have left unnoticed so very conclusive a proof of his absence from Jerusalem, and have mentioned precisely two other provinces which were not those to which his readers belonged.

On the very bold attempt, which has on this account been made, to transpose Acts 13*f.* so as to make it follow Acts 1534, see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 1*c*. In any case, the project will not be favoured by those who have any interest in maintaining the credibility of Acts. Ramsay (Church, chap. 63; St. Paul, chap. 83) proposes another way of meeting the difficulty. He brings the journey to Jerusalem mentioned in Gal. 121 into connection with Acts 926-30; and that in Gal. 21-10 into connection with Acts 1130 and 1225; and concedes that before Galatians was written Paul had certainly been a third and a fourth time in Jerusalem (Acts 15 and 1822), but maintains that there was no need to mention this in Galatians, as in that epistle all he wished to show was his independence of the original apostles at the time 'when he converted the Galatians.'

This last contention is not only destitute of any warrant from the text, but is also entirely inconsistent with the situation. The Judaizers could have overthrown Paul's authority in Galatia just as well if after his first missionary activity there he had shown that he was dependent on the original apostles. This was, in fact, what, according to Ramsay, actually happened. In Acts 15 'he was commissioned' 'by the older apostles' 'to deliver to them' (i.e., to the Galatians) 'the Apostolic decree' (Ramsay, Gal. chap. 18, p. 287). In these circumstances how can Paul still attach importance to his being able to prove that he was independent of the original apostles at first? Only on one assumption—that although his dependence became evident at the Council of Jerusalem, the Galatians are still unaware of it. If he takes for granted that they know it (according to Acts 164, which Ramsay holds to be historical, he himself personally informed the South Galatians of the apostolic decree), the proof of his independence in Gal. 111-210 is meaningless; if on the other hand he hopes by silence—nay, by the express declaration of 26 (ἐμοὶ οἱ δοκοῦντες οὐδὲν προσανέθετο: RV, 'they who were of repute imparted nothing to me')—to prevent his readers from learning or remembering the fact of his dependence, he is deliberately setting himself in his epistle to deceive them. In this case his moral character must be sacrificed to save the credibility of Acts. This is what Ramsay (Gal. ch. 19, p. 302) accuses the advocates of the North Galatian theory of doing when they hold that Paul leaves unnoticed the journey mentioned in Acts 1130 1225. That he did so, however, is assumed only by those of them who, like Ramsay, hold absolutely by the historical character of everything contained in Acts. In any case, for Paul to omit all mention of this journey would be a small matter compared with his hiding that dependence on the original apostles which is testified to by the apostolic decree. On the South Galatian theory, Paul could be exonerated only by placing Galatians earlier than Acts 15, and if Ramsay's date be adhered to, only by rendering Gal. 111-221 wholly purposeless. Moreover, it is quite illegitimate to identify Gal. 21-10, not with Acts 15 but with Acts 1130 1225 (see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 1*a*).

In Gal. chap. 18*f.*, pp. 286 304 Ramsay inclines not to identify the journey in Gal. 21-10 with any of those recorded in Acts, but to insert it between Acts 9 and Acts 1130. We do not press, as against this, that on such an assumption Paul has omitted to mention not two journeys, but three; for Ramsay may say of the one in Acts 1130 1225 what is said in COUNCIL, § 1*c*, of that in Acts 1822—that Paul does not mention it because in chaps. 3-6 he has lost sight of his intention to enumerate his visits to Jerusalem. So far as Acts is concerned, Ramsay's assumption that such a visit is omitted is much more remarkable. The main thing, however, is that by the assumption the situation is no wise improved: Paul still ignores his dependence on the original apostles at the Council of Jerusalem in Acts 15. On the contrary, on Ramsay's interpretation of Gal. 21-10 the situation becomes worse. According to Ramsay (Gal. chap. 18 p. 296) on the journey of Gal. 21-10, which is not mentioned in Acts, Paul 'consulted' (Gal. 22 [ἀνεθέμην]) the original apostles, 'asked their advice,' because his gospel 'was not fully matured until shortly before the beginning of the first journey' (Acts 131). This means entire dependence; for the contrast is that 'after it had fixed itself in his nature as the truth of God . . . he no longer "conferred with flesh and blood."' The upshot then is this: Paul seeks to make evident his independence of the original apostles precisely by recording this act of submission to them.

Equally impossible as an expedient is it to maintain that in Gal. 121 Paul is naming only two provinces (Syria and Cilicia) for the reason that they were the only provinces on account of his successful activity in which the Christians of Judæa 'glorified God' (124), and that he is silent on his sojourn in South Galatia because his mission in that country had perhaps ceased to have their approval. Without the aid of the untenable theory (see next article, § 10) of Clemen (to which Ramsay now [Gal. chap. 18, pp. 291, 296] seems to lean), it would be impossible to perceive why Paul should have conducted his mission in South Galatia on any other principles than those which he followed in Syria and Cilicia.

Above all, no unfavourable judgment on the part of the Jewish Christians regarding his mission to his readers could have determined the apostle to leave unused the clearest proof of all that he had kept away from Jerusalem. Gal. 123*f.* can be dispensed with as far as the primary object of the argument is concerned, and Paul would willingly have refrained from adding these verses had he been able at this point to say that during the interval in question he had been with his readers. C. GALATIANS ELSEWHERE.

In 2 Tim. 410 the reading varies between Γαλλίαν [N] and Γαλατίαν [WH]; and even if the latter be

32. 'Galatia,' adopted the reference may still be to 'Gaul' in Gaul.

Tim. and Macc. The current Greek name for Gaul during the first two centuries A.D. was Γαλατία (Γαλάται) unless the older title Κελτική (Κέλτοι, Κέλται) was employed.¹

To distinguish the Asiatic Celts the phrases οἱ ἐν Ἀσίᾳ Γαλάται (Plut. Mor. 258), ἢ κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν Γαλατία (Dios. Hist. med. 556), or Γαλλογαρκία, Γαλλογαρκοί (Strabo 130, 566) might be used; but generally the context must decide (cp Plut. Pomph. 31, 33, 38). Not until late did the Greeks adopt the Roman terms Γαλλία, Γάλλοι. It is in Herodian that we first meet with the distinction, adopted by modern writers, between Γαλλία = Gaul, and Γαλατία = Galatia in Asia Minor. There would be a strong tendency to alter Γαλατία into Γαλλία in NT MSS in this passage, owing to the general belief that western Gaul was meant, combined with the fact that at the time of their origin the word Γαλατία as applied to Gaul had been abandoned in favour of the Latin Γαλλία, αἱ Γαλλίαι (cp Theod. 2227, Galatiam dixit quas nunc nominamus Gallias).

On linguistic grounds, then, no general decision is possible. The passages in which the name occurs must be examined separately.

1. It has been argued that if Paul had meant Gaul he would, according to his usual practice, have used the Roman provincial name, and that, as Timothy was in Asia Minor, possibly even in Galatia, he would have avoided an ambiguous term. Paul was, however, after all, Greek in language and thought (cp Hicks, St. Paul and Hellenism, in Stud. Bibl. 47, 'he thinks in the tongue that he speaks and writes'). Further, if Crescens had actually gone to Timothy's own sphere of labour, more would have been said, and Timothy certainly could not fail to attach the right significance to the word. Finally, the combination with Dalmatia is significant (and is curiously paralleled on Mon. Ancyr.: cp Momms. Res gest. D. Aug. 95, ἐξ Ἰσπανίας καὶ Γαλατίας καὶ παρὰ Δαλαματῶν). The reference therefore is probably to Gaul. Although the churches of Vienne and Mayence claimed Crescens as their founder, their claim may be based merely upon this very passage.

2. In 1 Macc. 82 the Roman victories 'among the Galatians' (AV^{msk.} 'Frenchmen'; RV 'Gauls') are mentioned. The date is about 160 B.C., some sixty years after the Roman conquest of Cisalpine Gaul (Polyb. 2.14-34). That the reference is to this war is suggested by the addition 'and brought them under tribute,' and by the mention of Spain (v. 3); and by Livy (38.40) says nothing of tribute having been imposed upon the Asiatic Celts. On the other hand, the victorious march of Manlius through Galatia was of comparatively recent date (189 B.C.), and must have made a profound impression throughout the Seleucid dominions, so that the reference is almost certainly to that event.

3. In 2 Macc. 820 a victory gained by Jews in Babylonia 'against the Gauls' (RV, Gk. Γαλάται) is mentioned; perhaps an allusion to the victories of Antiochus I. Soter, king of Syria (281-261 B.C.). W. J. W.

A. GENUINENESS.

The genuineness of the four so-called 'principal' epistles of Paul—Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., and Gal.—so unreservedly accepted by the Tübingen school, has not been allowed to remain unquestioned in recent times. When the opposite view was first set forth with characteristic boldness by Bruno Bauer (Kritik d. paulin. Briefe, '50-'52), it received no serious attention; but it has recently been again pressed in all seriousness by Loman (Th. T., '82, '83, '86) and his many successors in Holland,¹ by Edwin Johnson, the anonymous author of Antiqua Mater ('87), and especially by Steck (Galaterbrief, '88).

Of the arguments brought against the genuineness of Galatians we may mention first: The difficulties presented by many of its details. For

1. Difficulties. For example, a contradiction has been found between 110 where the apostle disclaims any desire to please men, and 22 where, notwithstanding, he submits himself to the judgment of the original apostles. This, as well as many other examples of hypercriticism, we may safely disregard. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the epistle contains much that is obscure and (to us) surprising. It can only be welcomed as a gain for science that such difficulties have been pointed out anew. But the spuriousness of the epistle follows from them only by a petitio principii—viz., by assuming that the historical Paul, of whose writing we, in the view of these negative critics, do not possess a single line, was invariably in the habit of expressing himself with absolute clearness, and also that the text of what he wrote has at no point ever suffered at the hands of copyists.

For example, 17 is certainly obscure; but it admits of being interpreted as meaning 'another gospel which [is no gospel at all but] consists in nought else [or, rests upon nought else] than this, that there be some'—etc. Again, in 218 the thesis is: 'If I build up again the Mosaic law which I have declared to be obsolete, I thereby declare the life I have hitherto been living in freedom from the law to have been a life of transgression.

In 219 the sequence is unexpected; but the intention is to justify the implication in v. 18 of the sinfulness of again building up the law. In 110 the conjectural emendation τί γὰρ, with the mark of interrogation instead of the present ἀπρί γὰρ, has much to recommend it (as in Rom. 33; in Gal. ἀπρί occurs immediately before, in 19); so has the interpretation of μεῖθω as equivalent to κρησσω (or, still better, the supplanting of μεῖθω by a word bearing this meaning); for Paul apparently is here guarding himself against the same reproach as in 2 Cor. 45. Once more: in Gal. 320, the thesis sought to be established is that the law was given, not immediately by God, but mediately by angels, who were but inadequately fitted for the service. As a step in the proof, use is made of the (erroneous) assumption that only a plurality of persons will make use of a mediator, and that a single person will always communicate what he has to say personally and directly. The assumption here follows rabbinical modes of thought,—resembling the argument in 316 (against 320, Rom. 416), where it is urged that in the OT by the 'seed of Abraham' Christ alone can be meant, inasmuch as the word σπέρμα is used in the singular;—resembling, also, the argument elaborated in 421-31, according to which the Jews who continue in unbelief are the children not of Sarah but of Hagar. Here again it is a mere petitio principii to take for granted that the historical Paul must have been incapable of adopting such rabbinical lines of thought.¹

As regards other obscure points, there has been an attempt to explain them as due to unskilful borrowing from the author of Romans. It must

2. Romans used? be conceded not only that the two epistles have many thoughts in common, but also that in Romans these are for the most part elaborated with greater clearness.

In Gal. 36 the mention of Abraham comes in quite abruptly, whilst in Rom. 4 it fits naturally into the context; in Gal. 327 there is a mixture of two metaphors which in Rom. 63 and 1314 are applied separately and suitably; in Gal. 319 the words, literally taken, admit of being construed as meaning that the law was given in order to prevent transgressions, and only from Rom. 520 does it become clear that 'for the multiplication of transgressions' is what is intended.

On the other hand, positive blunders, of the kind that can occur only in the case of a compiler manipulating another man's work, cannot be shown anywhere.

In 56 circumcision is spoken of as a matter of indifference, and in v. 2 as positively hurtful; but, as the first passage is intended to refer only to those who had been circumcised before their conversion to Christ, whilst the latter has in view only those who, being already Christians, suffer themselves to be circumcised, there is no contradiction. Such a digression as we have in 3 11 f.; at the close of which 3 13 resumes the interrupted connection with 3 10, or such as occurs in 5 17 (from iva or perhaps even from ταύτα), can very well have been made by the historical Paul (or written on the margin by a very early reader). Many other points that at first sight are very puzzling to us we can easily suppose to have been clear to the Galatians through the oral teaching of Paul.

Steck, it is true, on the ground that we have no information as to what Paul may have preached in Galatia, forbids this supposition; and, in like manner, he holds it to be illegitimate to regard the collection alluded to in Gal. 2 10 as historical, independent evidence from other sources being wanting. On such lines as these we need not be surprised that in the single word προσῆμιν in Gal. 5 21 be finds conclusive evidence that the author of our epistle is quoting 1 Cor., and more particularly 6 9 f.

It is alleged, further, that use of the synoptical gospels is seen in at least Rom. 12 14 13 8-10 1 Cor. 13 2 7 10 f.

3. Synoptists earlier than Gal. ?

As it is maintained that these epistles are older than Galatians, it is relevant to discuss the allegation in the present connection. In point of fact, all the observed phenomena can be sufficiently explained by the assumption that the author knew the gospel history from oral sources. Indeed, it is actually in 1 Cor. 7 10 f. that the genuine (because stricter) form of the prohibition of divorce has been preserved.

It is not to be supposed that if Jesus had mentioned the case of adultery as an exception to the general prohibition—as we read in Mt. 5 32 19 9—any tradition would have overlooked such a mitigation; least of all is it to be supposed that Paul would have done so. In fact, the latter finds himself compelled on his own responsibility to establish a new exception—that, namely, by which it is provided that a marriage with a non-Christian may lawfully be dissolved if there seems no prospect of its being continued 'in peace' (1 Cor. 7 15).

The attempt to trace the account of the resurrection of Jesus in 1 Cor. 15 3-8 to the written synoptists also must be held a failure.

In view of the denial of the resurrection of Jesus current in Corinth, the writer of the epistle was under the most stringent necessity to adduce everything that could be alleged in proof of it. That being so, he would assuredly have passed over none of the circumstances connected with the event detailed in the gospels; least of all could he pass over what is related about the empty grave.

On the other hand, it is easy to understand why the synoptists left on one side the accounts recorded by Paul. What Paul constantly affirms is only that the risen Jesus had been seen. The synoptists believe that they have much more conclusive evidence to bring—namely, that Jesus had been touched, and that he had eaten.

It is claimed that extra-canonical writings also have been used in the composition of the four epistles. Even should this be made out as regards Philo (born about 20 B.C.; see Vollmer, Die A.T.lichen Citate bei Paulus, 83-98 [195]) and Seneca (died 65 A.D.; see Steck, 249-265, especially for Rom. 12 19), the genuineness of the epistles would not (when we consider the early date of these writers) thereby be impugned. Nor would it be impugned because of their employment of the Assumptio Moses.

George Syncellus, in the eighth century, finds such employment in Gal. 6 15; a MS of the eleventh century finds it in 5 6. Euthalius in the fifth century mentions an ἀπόκρυφον Μωϋσέως as source. The passage does not occur in the portion of the Assumptio that has come down to us (cp Schür. GVV, § 32, 5 3; [2], 2636, ET 5 81 f.; Clemens, Chron. d. Paul. Briefe, 257). Whether a Jewish book could have contained so anti-Jewish a proposition unless through interpolation by a Christian hand need not here be discussed. The Assumptio was in any case composed within the time of the sons of Herod the Great; in 6 6 f. (according to the most reasonable reading) it erroneously predicts for them a shorter reign than their father has had (see APOCALYPTIC, § 64).¹

4 Esd. was written, it is true, under Domitian, and would, therefore, be decisive of the question before us if the departure from the OT text in Rom. 10 7 could be traced to 4 Esd. 4 8. The variation, however, comes simply from Ps. 107 26; cp. 139 8.

It is also contended that, as compared with Acts, the representation given in Galatians is only of a secondary character. In particular, it is improbable (it is argued) that the historical Paul proclaimed his Gentile Christian gospel for fourteen years without gainsaying, that at the Council of Jerusalem he agreed to so manifestly untenable a solution of the matter, and in Antioch came into so violent collision with Peter (Gal. 2 19 11-21). As to this, see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM (§§ 4, 9, 3). The only serious difficulties are those arising from the statement in 1 22, that Paul was unknown by sight to the churches of Judæa, though they must have known him very well as their persecutor. The statement seems intended to mark with the utmost possible distinctness Paul's independence of the Jewish Christians. Even on the part of a writer of the second century, however, it would have been too grave a slip to say of the Palestinian Christians who had survived the persecution, that they had not known Paul. If written in the second century, the meaning of such a declaration could only be that the churches of Judæa, having been broken up and dispersed by the persecution, and only at a later date reconstituted, were as such unacquainted with Paul. Thus interpreted, however, the passage can very well have been written by Paul himself. That it is not quite literally accurate must be conceded: the reconstituted churches must still have included persons who had known Paul in his persecuting days. Still, it is easy to understand why Paul did not have these persons in his mind. What he wishes to prove is simply that his own Christianity had not been derived from any man, but had come to him immediately from Christ. Had he received any Christian instruction from man, that would have been after his conversion, not before; and there is no difficulty in believing that from the time of his conversion he had entered into no personal relations with the churches of Judæa, and, more particularly, that in Jerusalem at the time of his first visit (1 18 f.) he had remained incognito, and communicated only with Peter and James, since otherwise there was reason to apprehend a renewal of the persecution that had broken out against him in Damascus (2 Cor. 11 32 f.). Paul, accordingly, leaves out of consideration those persons in the churches of Judæa who had known him before his conversion, because their acquaintance with him then did not affect that independence of the Jewish Christian churches which he claimed for his own view of Christianity; and this cannot with any fairness be charged against him as a failure in veracity (1 20). On the other hand, that is exactly what, we are told by Steck, is so improbable historically—that Paul after his conversion remained away from Jerusalem for three whole years; and the view of Acts (9 19-30) is preferred. This brings us to what lies at the root of the question in this aspect—namely, the demand for a straightforward, rectilinear development in the history. It is, we are told, historically inconceivable that the view of Jesus and the original apostles, which was still entirely Jewish-legal, was followed immediately by that of the principal epistles of Paul, and only afterwards by the mediating view of Acts and the other writings. Steck, therefore, has made out—and he alone with fairly good success—what he considers to be straightforward development as follows:—Jesus, the original apostles, the historical Paul, Mk. and Mt., Lk., Acts, Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., the remaining Pauline Epistles (leaving out those to Timothy and Titus), then Marcion. To this series the objection suggests itself that, whilst its author makes out the historical Paul to have been only a shade freer from the law than Peter (Acts 16 3 21 18-26, e.g.,

5. Dependent on Acts ?

6. Theory of development.

It is, we are told, historically inconceivable that the view of Jesus and the original apostles, which was still entirely Jewish-legal, was followed immediately by that of the principal epistles of Paul, and only afterwards by the mediating view of Acts and the other writings. Steck, therefore, has made out—and he alone with fairly good success—what he considers to be straightforward development as follows:—Jesus, the original apostles, the historical Paul, Mk. and Mt., Lk., Acts, Rom., 1 and 2 Cor., Gal., the remaining Pauline Epistles (leaving out those to Timothy and Titus), then Marcion. To this series the objection suggests itself that, whilst its author makes out the historical Paul to have been only a shade freer from the law than Peter (Acts 16 3 21 18-26, e.g., are accepted as historical), he at the same time (p. 373, 369 f.) speaks of him as fundamentally free from the law, and names him as apostle of the Gentiles κατ' ἐξουσίαν; and Steck is open to the further criticism that he attributes to Acts the 'tendency' to smooth over differences—in other words, to go back to a point of the development that had been reached before. But the most fatal objection of all is that Steck himself, after an interval of no more than 1 year (Prot. KZ, 1889, pp. 108, 841), found it necessary to demolish the entire structure, and to place Rom. and Cor. before Lk. and Acts, because he (rightly) saw that Acts (see ACTS, § 16) could not be assigned to a date earlier than after the beginning of the second century, and because in Marcion (circa 140 A.D.) the existence of ten Pauline epistles—of which, moreover, three (Rom. and 1 and 2 Cor.), according to Steck's view, must be regarded as each made up of three (or more) originally independent pieces—is already recognised. Further, the historical evolution argued for by Steck will not for a moment allow two separate lines of development, such as the line of the synoptic and that of the Pauline Christology, to go on concurrently. Still, alongside that line of development of Christianity, which had its roots in Palestine, he recognises another, almost independent, which took its rise in the heathen philosophical ideas current in Rome—a line of development as belonging to which he reckons, for example, the principal epistles of Paul (denying at the same time their use of the Rabbinical forms of thought). Within his first-mentioned series, too, he recognises a certain weakening of the antinomism of Galatians in the minor Pauline epistles, as well as an accentuation of it in Marcion. In all this it becomes abundantly evident that historical science does not in the least require that a rectilinear development should be made out. It is, of course, the business of historical science to understand everything that happens; but a development is not unintelligible even if it runs far ahead of its own time, and afterwards falls back upon the footsteps it has already outrun, to retrace them anew, step by step. Were this otherwise, we should have to eliminate from history all its great and epoch-making men—Luther, for example, and, in the end, Jesus himself.

The fact is certainly eloquent that not only Bruno Bauer and others, but Loman also (down to 1884 at least), denied the historicity of Jesus, and that in this respect Johnson has even gone beyond the last-named. On the other hand, it is highly significant that it is not enough for Johnson if Bruno Bauer derives Christianity from the humanist ideas of Philo, Seneca, and the Roman emperors down to Marcus Aurelius. In this quarter he misses the oriental fervour which he deems necessary to the founding of a religion, and, therefore—it is the least he can do—he transfers the origination of Christianity out of such ideas to the East. Over and above this, he is compelled to see in Marcion a highly important reformer, through whom Christianity was at least liberated from its rudimentary Jewish beginnings. We find Steck, on the same lines, characterising as an original and spiritually-gifted person the very man who (in his view) put together the epistle to the Galatians with so little skill.

As far as Paul in particular is concerned, it must be admitted that any ordinary man in his position would assuredly have gone immediately after his conversion to Jerusalem for authentic instruction in his new faith. Now, what if Paul was not an ordinary man? The more fanatical he had been as a Pharisee in his zeal for the Mosaic law, the more clearly must he have recognised the impossibility of ever fulfilling it completely, and all the more manifest must it have been to him that in Christianity an altogether new way of salvation was opened up. Then, further, the appearance of Christ to him on the way to Damascus gave him a clearer view of the divine purpose of the death on the cross than all the original apostles together could have supplied. It was in this manner that he obtained an idea quite different from theirs of the Christ whom he had never seen on earth (so 2 Cor. 5:16 rightly interpreted). It was in this manner that he discovered in Christianity at once the true religion for the world and the divine decree of abrogation as regarded the Mosaic law. It was in this manner that he found himself constrained to vindicate the great religious blessing of freedom against every attempt at a re-imposition of bondage with the keenness which we perceive in Gal. 2:14-21 18 f. 5:12.

7. Objections The traces of a later age, which Steck believes himself to have discovered, have reference only to Rom. and 1 and 2 Cor.

It will be sufficient here to remark that in the first instance these would only justify the excision of a few verses—e.g., 1 Cor. 15:29 Rom. 16:1 (if baptism for the dead, or the institution of deaconesses, were still unknown within the lifetime of the apostle). Some of the particulars alleged by Steck rest upon false exegesis—e.g., where 1 Cor. 7:37 is taken as referring to a man wishing to preserve his virginity in monastic fashion—a sense which would require the word ἡσυχία.

8. Considerations implying an early date. On the other hand, the epistles contain much that would have been meaningless and even impossible in the second century.

The close adhesion to the Mosaic law which gives the chief occasion for Gal. and Rom. was, at that late date, but feebly represented (Just. Dial. 47; Ignat. ad Philad. 6:1; ad Magnes. 8:1 9:1 10:3, etc.). The gift of tongues, regarding which such elaborate precepts are laid down in 1 Cor. 14, was already unknown to the author of Acts, otherwise he would not have taken it (Acts 2:1-11) as meaning speech in existing foreign languages (see SPIRITUAL GIFTS). To put into the mouth of Paul an expression of the expectation of surviving till the second coming of Christ (1 Cor. 15:51 f.), would have been a most perverse proceeding on the part of a second-century writer. The case of the incestuous person (1 Cor. 5:1-8), the intimate relation between Paul and the Galatian churches (Gal. 4:12-20), the journeys of Timothy and Titus to Corinth, the charge of fickleness brought against Paul on account of a change in the plan of his tour (2 Cor. 1:12-24), and, indeed (very conspicuously), the whole of 2 Cor., are so personal and full of individuality, that in this case we are really entitled to draw the conclusion (so often illegitimate) that they could not have been invented. As it is conceded on all hands that the four epistles stand or fall together, that conclusion must apply with equal validity to the many portions of Rom., 1 Cor., and Gal., in which the individuality is less marked.

Lastly, the genuineness is sufficiently attested by the external evidence. If the four epistles are to stand or fall together, the first epistle of Clem. Rom. would be proof enough of their genuineness.

It cites (47:1-3) 1 Cor. by name as a writing of Paul, and (85:5 86:2-5) transcribes, without giving a name, Rom. 12:9 f. and even Heb. 1.

Now, this epistle of Clement (11) informs us that it was written in a time of persecution; it is still unaware of a distinction between πρεσβύτεροι (44:5) and ἐπίσκοποι (44:4 42:4 f.; see BISHOP, § 8, MINISTRY); and it knows nothing of Gnosticism. Probably, therefore, it was written under Domitian (93-96), or perhaps under Trajan (112-117); at the very latest, under Hadrian (circa 120). Its colourlessness forbids the suggestion that circumstances of the time, as indicated by it, are fictitious. If it were a product of imagination dating from 150-170 A.D., it would serve the interests of that time—viz., the idea of the episcopate and the polemic against Gnosticism. Let only this be further observed, that the principal Pauline epistles are largely made use of in 1 Pet. (especially, and manifestly, Gal. 3:23 5:13 17 in 1 Pet. 1:5 2:16 11, and Rom. 12 f. in 1 Pet. 3:8-12 4:7-11 2:13-18), and that there is a great probability that 1 Pet. dates from 112 A.D. The epistle of James also, which is of still earlier date (see CHRISTIAN, NAME OF, § 8), in like manner shows acquaintance, not only with the Pauline doctrines, but also with the text of the chief epistles.

The clearest proof is Jas. 4:1. This verse is clearly dependent on Rom. 7:23; otherwise the word μέλη would not have been used, for the context is speaking, not of the conflict of desires within the man, but of the conflict of the desires of one man against those of his fellow-men (ἐν ὑμῖν, as if ἐκ τῶν ἡδονῶν τῶν στρατηνομένων κατὰ τοῦ πλησίου, instead of which phrase we have, borrowed from Rom. 7:23, ἐν τοῖς μέλεσιν ὑμῶν).

Finally, on the evidence supplied by the Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions and Homilies, see SIMON MAGUS.

There is thus hardly any necessity for going into the evidence of Marcion, who about 140 admitted ten Pauline epistles into his church lectionary, or for calling attention to the wholesale execution among the extra-canonical writings (and even among the heathen writings) of the second century which has to be made by Johnson before he can affirm that the NT came into existence between Justin and Irenæus about 155-180 A.D., and that even Marcion perhaps was still unacquainted with any personal Christ—acquainted only with the ideal figure of a χρηστός (see CHRISTIAN, NAME OF, § 1).

B. OTHER PROBLEMS.

Having disposed of the objections to the genuineness of Galatians we turn to the remaining problems. The superior limit for the date of the epistle has 10. Date. been indicated already (see preceding article, § 24). In view of Gal. 16 it is not advisable to bring it much lower.

True, οὕτως ταχέως means, not 'so soon,' but 'so suddenly.' Thus the expression, considered in itself, allows the supposition that the beginning of the Galatians' falling away was of late origin—a supposition precluded by the other rendering—and requires us to think only that the subsequent steps of the declension, once begun, took but a short time. On the other hand, it has to be remembered that the churches had already begun to show inclinations towards Judaism before Paul's second visit, and that Paul believed himself to have obviated this by his oral communications with them. His surprise at the suddenness of the change that had come over them is intelligible only if we suppose the change to have happened shortly after his last visit.

Thus, the epistle is best assigned to the beginning of Paul's three-years' stay in Ephesus, whither he had gone after leaving Galatia (Acts 19:1).

On account of its similarity in contents to Romans, some have thought it necessary to assign the epistle to the same period. In that case its date would be some three or four years later; for it is highly probable that Romans was written during the apostle's last stay in Corinth (Acts 20:1-3; cp Rom. 16:23 with 1 Cor. 1:14). Only, identical subjects are not banded in an identical manner in the two epistles.

In Gal. 4:30 the Jews who continue in unbelief are expressly excluded from the inheritance, whilst in Rom. 9:3 11:25-32 the apostle shows a strong interest in their ultimate salvation. In Gal. 3:3 4:9 ζ the Mosaic worship is placed on precisely the same plane with that of the heathen, whilst in Rom. 7:12-14 the defect is sought, not in the Mosaic law, but only in the sinfulness of man. In Gal. 1:6-9 Paul anathematizes every doctrine not in accordance with his own, whilst in Rom. 1:12 (17) he recognises the doctrines which prevail in Rome, though devoting the whole letter to their correction, as on an equal footing with his.

Clemen (Chron. d. Paulin. Briefe, '93) appeals to those differences in support of his contention that Galatians is (as Steck also holds) the last of the four chief Pauline Epistles, in the belief that in this way he is able to accept what is true in Steck's position and yet to conserve the genuineness of the epistles. His proofs admit of being turned the other way. Besides, his theory that Paul, during the first period of his missionary activity, continued to be Jewish-Christian in his thought and teaching, and that he reached the culminating point of his anti-Judaism only at the end of his life, is erroneous. In the case of so energetic a thinker as the apostle, the development indicated above in § 5 f. is certainly more probable. As far as the apostle's earlier period is concerned, Clemen's view is in direct opposition to Gal. 1:16. The culminating point of Paul's antinomism must have been reached in his controversy with Peter in the Syrian Antioch at latest. That after that—nay, after his refusal to circumcise Titus at the time of the Council of Jerusalem—he continued to preach circumcision is inconceivable (cp preceding article, § 20 a). If this reproach, then, was levelled at him even at so late a date as that of Galatians (5:11; on 1:10 see below, col. 1625, n.), it cannot have been anything but a slander. If his adversaries were capable of this, there is nothing to show that with reference to any period after the apostle's conversion they had any ground for their assertion. They may safely be held to have applied to the present an assertion that was true only of the time during which Paul was still a Jew. It is also on general grounds probable that Paul in the closing years of his life became gentler, not, as Clemen says, harsher. The second coming of Christ he believed to be near at hand; yet, before this could happen the gospel had to be preached to all the world (Rom. 10:18 11:25). It must have become clearer and clearer to him that he and his disciples were not in a position to accomplish this by themselves, and that accordingly the Jewish-Christian way of looking at things also was willed by God. Phil. 1:15-18 expresses this with special clearness. In the Epistle to the Romans an irenic attitude was particularly desirable, inasmuch as he wished to establish friendly relations with the church in Rome, and thus to have a new centre from which to carry on activities. It is further worthy of remark that in Galatians, as in Rom. 3:25, the death of Christ is represented only as a propitiation for sins that are past—not yet, as in Rom. 8:3, as serving also for the averting of sins to come, and that the doctrine of the 'spirit' (πνεῦμα) in Gal. 5:16-25 is much less elaborately thought out than it is in Rom. 6:8.

On the home of the readers, see preceding article. As for their nationality—according to Gal. 4:8 5:2 6:12 f. they were, at least preponderantly, 11. Readers. Gentile Christians. Whether there may not also have been among them a sprinkling of Jewish Christians cannot be decided by reference to 3:13 23-25 4:5, for in that case all the readers together must have been Jewish Christians. These passages, therefore, show only that Paul is inadvertently applying to his readers that which holds good as regards himself (see preceding article, § 21, 3 d). In 4:21, on the other hand, he says, truly, not that his readers are yet under the law, but that they are now only contemplating the assumption of that yoke. That there was a Jewish element in the Galatian churches might be inferred more readily from 3:28, though here also, perhaps, Paul is speaking more from principle than was exactly required by the personal circumstances of his readers. The Judaizing emissaries, too, could have found access all the easier if born Jews already belonged to the churches. But the question must be allowed to remain undecided.

From 3:1 5:7 we learn that the Judaizing emissaries were personally unknown to Paul. Both before and

12. Judaizing emissaries. after his second visit they had been at work among the Galatians. Whether the same persons were engaged in this on both occasions we have no means of knowing; but on both occasions they wrought in the same spirit, though on the second with immeasurably greater success (see preceding article, § 25).

That one or more prominent persons were included among them follows from the ὄσως ἐάν ᾖ of 5:10. It is impossible, however, to say whether any individual (possibly one of the original apostles) is intended. For ὁ παράσσιον ὑμᾶς can mean 'every one who brings you into perplexity' just as easily as ὁ ἐρχόμενος in 2 Cor. 11:4 refers to all the Judaizers who had already arrived in Corinth (οἱ ὑπερβίαν ἀπόστολοι, 11:5), since the proposition that follows (ἀνείχεσθε, ἢ ἀνείχεσθε) does not state a conceivable case merely, but an actual fact. It is certain, however, that the original apostles, in Jerusalem at least, did not interfere with the activity of these παράσσιονες (1:7; cp 5:12; see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 3). From 6:12 ζ. some have thought it must follow that they themselves had not as yet been circumcised, but were only fanatical proselytes. In that case it would be incomprehensible why they should not have accepted circumcision long before, or how they could without this have brought the Galatians so far. The determination of the question lies not in the reading περιτετημένους, which is quite plainly a correction intended to make the meaning easier, but in taking the present οἱ περιτετιμένοι in a timeless sense—the men of the circumcision (cp 1 Thess. 2:12: ὁ καλῶν, 1 το: ὁ ῥυόμενος).

What their representations to the Galatians had been can be plainly gathered from the answers of the apostle. They had said that in order to gain salvation it was not enough to comply with the teaching of Paul, who had simply demanded faith in Christ crucified (31 f. 5) and risen, but that it was also necessary to fulfil all the prescriptions of the Mosaic law (32 5 10 54), to which alone the promise of salvation was attached (38 18 54). They had said that, on the other hand, the doctrine of Paul opened a wide door to moral laxity (513). These arguments on the merits of the case they fortified by personal ones. They maintained that Paul was not strictly an apostle at all, but dependent on the original apostles (11 11 f. 115-221). Only these, the 'pillars' (29; see COUNCIL, § 6), were competent to decide the true doctrine, as they had formerly (πρωτ., 26) been taught by the Lord himself when he was on earth. Wherever, therefore, the teaching of Paul departed from theirs, it was to be rejected. Nay, more, elsewhere (this is obviously what we are to understand) Paul himself was still preaching circumcision (511); he is thus in contradiction with himself if he has failed to exact it of the Galatians. Thereby he has deprived them of their title to salvation; and this he can have done only out of a desire to please men,¹ and so make the acceptance of Christianity seem easier than it really was. To these Judaizers, accordingly, the description in Acts 15 15 applies admirably. They had already brought it about that the Galatians observed the Jewish feasts (410), and were seriously thinking of receiving circumcision (51 f. 6 12 f.). Their moral character is represented by Paul as very despicable. He ascribes to them motives quite as low as the motives which they ascribe to him. It is not, he says, about the salvation of the Galatians that they are concerned: all that they seek is personal consideration among them (417) and repute with their Judaistic (perhaps even Jewish) co-religionists for having brought the Galatians to circumcision (613), and they are in dread of persecution by these same comrades should they fail to insist on circumcision in their proselytising efforts, and, like Paul, rest satisfied with faith in the cross of Christ (612). It is probable that in this Paul is as unjust to them as he was to Peter in charging him with hypocrisy (2 11-13; see COUNCIL, § 3). From their point of view, they could hardly do otherwise than, on religious grounds, hold Paul's preaching to be not only dangerous but also God-dishonouring. But we have seen that among the means which they made use of even slander had a place (511), and that they flagrantly violated the compact of the Council of Jerusalem (29).

It was to counteract the influence of those persons that Paul wrote Galatians. Its course of thought is not

14. Purpose of Galatians.

It is rightly apprehended if we view chaps. 1 f. as constituting a personal apologia, and chaps. 3 f. and 5 f. as forming respectively a dogmatic and a practical section. Nor does it avail to take the dogmatic portion as ending at 47 or 411, or not till 56 or 524, as if 4 21-31 were not intensely dogmatic, and 48-20 very much the reverse. The epistle must be viewed much more as being an epistle; repetitions must not be ignored or denied; and a chief turning-point must be recognised in 513.

After the salutation, 11-5, and statement of the position of matters, 16-10, there follows what constitutes the first main division of the epistle, the historical demonstration that the gospel of Paul is independent of the original apostles, and is of directly divine origin. Here there are three sections: 111-24 21-10 211-21. The second main division contains the dogmatic proof that Christian freedom and observance of the law are incompatible. This in the first instance occupies 31-47 continuously. Next follow a practical application to the readers (48-11), a calling to mind of their former good relations with Paul (412-20), a renewed proof from the OT (421-31), a new proof drawn from first principles (6 1-6), and a renewed application to the readers (6 7-12). The third main division consists (like Rom. 6-8) of exhortation and proof that morality is not impaired by Christian freedom—this in 5 13-24 in general terms, in 5 25-6 10 in relation to particular points of special importance for the readers. Finally, the autograph conclusion, 6 11-18, sums up once more the leading polemical points.

The importance of Galatians for its first readers undoubtedly consisted in the first instance in this—that it won them back to Paul and his gospel.

15. Place in history.

Thus much may be presumed, if 1 Cor. (161), which, as we gather from 168, was written at the close of the three-years' stay in Ephesus, is of a later date than our epistle (see above, § 10). For the history of primitive Christianity Galatians is a historical source of the first order. It constituted for the Tübingen school the Archimedean fulcrum by which it revolutionised the traditional conception of the history of the first century. What has already been said under ACTS (§§ 4 6 f.) and COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM (§§ 1 7-11) may suffice to show the magnitude and fundamental character of the errors to which we should have been exposed had this epistle not been preserved to us. The character of Paul, the imperiousness which he showed in the service of what he had recognised to be truth, his ardent love and zealous care for the churches which he had founded, the rabbinical ingenuity yet truly religious depth of his thinking, and at the same time the far-reaching nature of the differences that separated the various tendencies in the early church, find immediate expression here as hardly anywhere else.

In all time Galatians will be the charter of freedom, not only from the Mosaic law but also from every yoke that is imposed upon the religious life as an external condition of salvation without reference to any inner necessity of the soul. It was in this sense that it supplied Luther with a foundation from which to carry on his life-work against the freshly-asserted claims of work-righteousness in the Catholic Church of his day.

The outstanding commentaries are those of Luther (Latin in 1519, German in 1525, and fuller Latin in 1532); Winer (21; (4), 59); Ruckert (33); H. A. W. Meyer (41; (6), 70); (6), by Sieffert in '80, (6), '94, identical with γαβρ. H. [A], galbanum boni odoris [= גַּלְבָּנוֹן 'גַּר?], Ex. 3034†), which was an ingredient in the holy incense, is a resinous substance often mentioned by botanical writers, ancient and modern. Though the etymology of גַּלְבָּנוֹן, helb'nāh, is uncertain,¹ the names γαλβανη and galbanum are certainly connected with, and probably derived from, the Hebrew word.

The source of the gum is even yet not quite certain. Dioscorides and Theophrastus speak of it as the product of a Syrian narthex; but in modern times the galbanum of commerce is known to be produced only in Persia, and since Boissier it has generally been identified—e.g., by Flückiger and Hanbury⁽²⁾ (320 f.), and by Dymock (2152 f.)—as the gum of the umbelliferous Ferula galbaniflua, Boiss. et Buhse, and the kindred species F. rubricaulis, Boiss.² The resin is formed of 'tears

² Besides these, its principal known sources, however, there may have been others: thus Sir G. Birdwood speaks in this connection

GALEED (גַּלְעָד), i. or Jegar-Sahadutha (גַּרְשָׁדוּתָא נְהַרְיָהוּ), the former the Hebrew, the latter the Aramaic, designation of the heap or cairn which was a sign of the covenant between Jacob and Laban, Gen. 31.47 ('Galeed' again in v. 48).

The renderings of Ⓞ and Ⓥg. (on which see Nestle, Marg. p. 10 f.) show an uncertainty as to whether גַּלְעָד is a noun or a verb. For Galeed, βουνός μαρτυρεῖ [A], β. μάρτυς [Dsil E L]; ACERVUM TESTIMONII in v. 47. β. μαρτυρεῖ [ADL], β. μαρτυρίου [E]; GALAAD in v. 48. For Jegar-sahadutha, βουνός μάρτυς [A], β. τῆς μ. [Dsil L], βουνός μαρτυρίας [E]; tumulum testis.

Both have the same meaning—viz., 'heap of witness'—and the intention of the former is to suggest a derivation of the name GILEAD (q.v.).

The original tradition, however, must have been without this trivial etymology. גַּרְשָׁדוּתָא יַרְיָהוּ (Jegar-sahadutha) is certainly a corruption of גַּרְשָׁדוּתָא (Gar-Salhad), 'fortress of Salhad.'¹ We have to suppose that J and E both had access to stories of the lives of the patriarchs in a written form, among which was that of the meeting of Laban and Jacob. J's source of information contained one statement which was very possibly wanting in E's, and which J's account gave, partly in a mutilated, partly in a corrupt form. The early tradition must have said that Jacob set his face towards Gar-Salhad on Mount Hauran, but 'Gar-Salhad' had become corrupted into 'Gar-Sahad' (גַּרְשָׁדוּתָא) and 'on Mount Hauran' into 'on the mountain' (גַּלְעָד). The latter phrase may have originally stood in v. 25, where we now read גַּלְעָד, 'on the mountain.' Reasoning on the strange phrase Gar-Sahad, J seems to have come to the conclusion that it was really Jegar-sahadutha ('heap of witness' in Aramaic), and that it referred to a cairn which Jacob must have erected as a boundary mark, and this suggested explaining Gilead as a modification of Gal'ed, the Hebrew equivalent of Jegar-sahadutha. He forgot the improbability (pointed out by We. CH 43) that the grandchildren of 'Nahor' and Abraham—both sons of Eber—should have spoken different dialects; but how else could he have explained Gar-Sahad? That Wellhausen is wrong in treating v. 47 as a late archaeological gloss should be clear; 'heap of witness' is by no means an obvious explanation of 'Gilead,' and has to be accounted for. The verse belongs to J, but is misplaced; v. 48 should run, 'therefore he (Jacob) called it Gal'ed, but Laban called it Jegar-sahadutha.' Vv. 49 (on which see GILEAD, § 4) and 50 belong to E; they give an explanation of E's pillar (μαρτύριον) corresponding to that of J's cairn (gal). It has only to be added that Nahor is miswritten for Hauran (הור); the 'God of Nahor' in v. 53 (E) was originally 'the God of Hauran'—a phrase which lost its force when E, like J, brought the meeting of Laban and Jacob farther S. in order to suit the subsequent travels of the patriarch.

GALEED (גַּלְעָד) may also originally have stood in another important passage now evidently mutilated—viz., Josh. 22.34, where we read of a great altar set up by Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh, as a 'witness' (cp v. 27) to the tribes on both sides of the Jordan that those on the eastern side were equally worshippers of Yahwè, in the strict legal fashion, with their brethren on the W. (So Di., Bennett in SBOT; EV, following Pesh. and some Heb. MSS, is content with supplying גַּלְעָד.)

The narrative to which the passage belongs (vv. 9-34) must be very late, but may be based upon an early record which contained a second explanation of the name Gilead, connecting it with a great altar erected in early times by the eastern tribes. Whether this is probable or not, is a question on which critics are not at all unanimous. Those who agree with Di. will ascribe to the editor the anxious assurances of the eastern tribes that no sacrifices should be offered upon the altar, and certain other peculiarities, such as the indistinctness of the description of the locality of the altar (v. 10 f.), and the omission of the name of the altar (v. 34; cp Bennett). If on the other hand the narrative is 'an absolutely unhistorical invention framed to defend the doctrine of a unique sanctuary' (Kue. Hxx. 107, cp 339 f., and see We. CH 135), we must suppose that the name of the altar was accidentally omitted by a very early scribe, or perhaps (cp 1 S. 13.1 and Budde's crit. note in SBOT) was never inserted by the narrator. It is worth noticing that both in v. 11 and in v. 34 Ⓞ reads differently from MT. In

At any rate, both texts (and also Jos. Ant. v. 1.26) agree in not giving the name of the altar. Cp ED. T. K. C.

GALILEE (גַּלְיָלָה, גַּלְיָלָה [2 K. 15.29]; Aram. גַּלְיָלָה; Γαλιλαία [B]. -Γαλι. [B^aNAQT^vL and NT]; GALILAEA, G. GENTIUM).

The name gālil means 'circle,' 'district,' 'region.' Once only we find the qualifying addition 'of the nations'—viz., Is. 9.1 [8.23]. In the former time he brought into

1. Name. contempt the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali, but in the latter time he confers honour on the road to the sea, the other side of the Jordan, the district (gālil) of the nations' (Ⓞ Γαλιλαία τῶν ἐθνῶν). The latter phrase clearly means 'the district inhabited by a mixed population of Jews and foreigners.' Josh. 12.23 is partly parallel, for we should doubtless read (with Graf, St. A. 7. 1854, p. 870) 'the king of the nations of the gālil' (not, as in MT, 'of Gilgal'). Cp 1 Macc. 5.15, γαλιλαία ἀλλοφύλων; ἡ γαλιλαία simply, often in 1 Macc. (once in Macc. and twice in NT the article is omitted).

'Galilee' (to retain the convenient though late-coined Græcised name) seems at a comparatively early period to have specially designated the territory of Naphtali.

The cities mentioned in the list of Tiglath-pileser's conquests (2 K. 15.29) as constituting the gālil (Galilee) are, with probably one exception,¹ all in Naphtali, and, as if to prevent misunderstanding, the narrator sums up thus: 'and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali.'²

Although the early Naphtalites failed to occupy all the land which they coveted (Judg. 1.33), and in Gen. 30.7 f. Naphtali is the son of a slave-girl, Naphtali, like Zebulun, is praised for its heroism in a patriotic war (Judg. 5.18). Probably, therefore, the special application of the phrase 'district (of the nations)' to Naphtali arose out of the occupation of Naphtali by the Aramæans under Benhadad I. The chief (Naphtalite) Galilæan city was of course Kedesh, which is called 'Kedesh in the gālil (Galilee), in the hill-country of Naphtali' (cp Tob. 1.2).

The gālil was, however, a vague expression, and must surely have been sometimes used with a wider reference. For this we may cite 1 K. 9.10-13, though this passage is decisive only for the time when it was edited. The connection between the Cabul mentioned here and that of Josh. 19.27 seems hardly disputable. Whoever gave the last touches to the story of the despised twenty cities of 'Cabul' must have considered that the 'land of the gālil' extended to the Asherite town of Cabul, for to exclude the town of Cabul from the 'land of Cabul' would be as unnatural as to exclude the town of Goshen from the land of Goshen (Josh. 10.41; cp 15.51). In the time of Josephus we know that CABUL [q.v.] was a border city of Galilee, and there is every probability that this ancient place was spoken of as Galilæan long before this; Janoah, too, even if Asherite, was apparently regarded as Galilæan when 2 K. 15.29 was written, though the writer certainly seems to have applied the term 'Galilee' more especially to Naphtali. How, indeed, could Asher have failed to be included in the gālil haggōyīm? According to Judg. 1.31-33 the non-Israelitish element in Asher was considerably larger than that in Naphtali. The highly mixed origin of the tribe so-called is implied in Gen. 30.12 f. (birth of Asher), and is confirmed by the fact that the Hebrew tribesmen borrowed their name of Asher from their non-Israelitish parents, an extensive North Palestinian region having been called Aseru in the time of the Egyptian kings, Seti I. and Rameses II. (see ASHER, § 1).

The land of Zebulun also had a natural claim to be called Galileean. Zebulun is not indeed said to have been, like Asher, the son of a slave-girl, but, like Asher and Naphtali, it had to tolerate Canaanitish enclaves in its territory (Judg. 1.30), and, if Is. 9.1 [8.23] may be followed, it suffered, like Naphtali, from the invasion of Tiglat-pileser—i.e., was partly Aramaised. In the later passages Zebulun (which corresponds to the 'road to the sea'; see ZEBULUN) and Naphtali together form 'the district (gālil) of the nations,'¹ and very possibly in 1 K. 9.13 'the land of Cabul' should be emended into 'the land of Zebulun' (see CABUL), implying that the 'twenty cities in the land of the gālil' were in Zebulun.

After 734 B.C. 'the gālil' in its widest sense became an integral part of the Assyrian empire, and hence, though the greater part of the old Israelitish population remained, its purity must have become by degrees more and more contaminated. In 2 Ch. 30.10, however, there may be an allusion to post-exilic attempts of the Jews of South Palestine to strengthen the Jewish spirit in the N. 'as far as Zebulun,' and 1 Macc. 5.14-23 shows that Jews lived in 'Galilee' in Maccabean times. The term Galilee in post-exilic times, however, had obtained a wider meaning than of old. We know the boundaries of Galilee in the time of Josephus, and we may assume that they were the same in the preceding centuries. According to him, Galilee was bounded on the N. and W. by the territory of the Tyrians, to which Mount Carmel also belonged, on the S. by Samaria and Scythopolis (Beth-shean), on the E. by the trans-Jordanic region and by the Lake of Gennesaret (B/ iii. 31).

It was divided into two parts, Upper and Lower Galilee, the boundary line of which was, naturally, the plain of er-Rāmeḥ (the ha-Ramah of Josh. 19.36). The Mishna, which recognises the same divisions, though it adds the district of Tiberias (taken from Lower Galilee), names as the frontier city Kefar Hananyah;² Josephus, however (Vit. 188), mentions Bersabe or Beer-subai (see § 7). Elsewhere this historian mentions Kedasa or Kydasa (the ancient Kedesh) as a Tyrian fortress on the Galileean border (Ant. xiii. 56 B/ ii. 18 i. 23). This is important, for it suggests a change in the N. boundary of Galilee. In the N., Galilee seems to have lost; but in the S. it gained considerably, for Ginaia or En-gannim, S. of the Great Plain, marked the southern limit of Galilee. Sometimes, too, localities on the E. of the Lake of Gennesaret (or Sea of Galilee) are reckoned as Galileean (see, e.g., Jos. B/ ii. 81, where Judas of Gamala is called ἀνήρ Γαλιλαῖος)—a natural inconsistency.

Nominally, therefore, Galilee was cut off from the Lebanon by the territory of Tyre. It was, however, its relation to the Lebanon and to Hermon that made Galilee so rich in moisture,³ and especially in streams and wells, and therefore so pre-eminent in fertility, as compared with both Samaria and Judæa. There is no difference in this respect between Lower and Upper

Galilee; the distinction drawn in the Mishna is merely that the latter produces, and that the former does not produce, sycamores. Not only in Asher (Dt. 33.24), but also throughout Galilee, olives were so abundant that it was easier, as a Rabbi said, to support an entire legion by means of olives than in the land of Israel (where food is less easily had) to raise a single child.¹ Naphtali was specially famous for its vines, and for 16 m. round Sepphoris the land 'flowed with milk and honey' (Meg. 6*a*). All this luxury might have enervated the inhabitants but for the long stretches of highland country.

Upper Galilee, in particular (הַר נַפְתָּלִי, 'the hill-country of Naphtali'), consists of a broad mountain-ridge, a continuation of the Lebanon range. On the summit is a tract of undulating table-land, diversified by wooded heights and smooth green plains. In the centre of this table-land stood Kedesh-Naphtali, among whose rich pastures Heber, the Kenite, sojourned (Judg. 4.11). On the E. the mountains break down abruptly into the deep basin of the upper Jordan. On the W. the slopes are more gradual, and long ravines of singular beauty and wildness wind down to the sea-coast and the plain of Acre. These western declivities, once the possession of Asher, are still celebrated for their olive groves (cp the name Bir-zaith). The town of Şafed, perched on the culminating point of the mountain chain to the S., is one of the four sacred cities of the Jews. It is also noted as the centre of a wide volcanic region (see EARTHQUAKE, § 3).

The southern slopes of the mountain range, from the castellated heights of Şafed to the broad plain of Esdraelon, afford some of the most picturesque scenery in Palestine. Forests of evergreen oak sweep round the flanks of the hills in graceful belts, and line the sides of the valleys, leaving open glades, and undulating expanses of green grass, such as are seen in English parks. Here, too, are upland plains, like vast terraces, with rich soil and rank vegetation. The largest is that now called el-Baṭṭōf—fertile, but without sufficient drainage on the eastern side, and therefore marshy. There are others to the eastward, along the brow of the hills that encircle Tiberias, and extending down to Tabor. These are separated from the great plain of Esdraelon by a line of rocky but picturesque hills, which culminate on the E. in the dome of Tabor. Esdraelon stretches out beyond them like a sea of verdure, leaving in the distance the base of Carmel and the mountains of Samaria.

Lower Galilee was a land of husbandmen, famed for its corn-fields (the wheat of Chorazin was proverbial), as Upper Galilee was for its olive groves, and Judæa for its vineyards. The demand for the Galileean wheat must have been large indeed (cp Acts 12.20). GENNESARET (see GENNESAR), however, surpassed all other regions; its fertility excites Josephus to an unwonted enthusiasm (B/ iii. 32 f. 108). The best pomegranates came from Shikmonah—i.e., we can hardly doubt, the Sykaminos of Josephus, between Cæsarea and Acco, near Mount Carmel; and it should be noted that Eusebius (OS 267*γ*) expressly identifies Sykaminos and Hepha—i.e., the modern Haifa. Probably the old town lay a little to the N. of Haifa, on the site of some ruins still called 'the old Haifa.' For the oil of ancient Galilee cp 2 Ch. 2.10, and for its wheat and fat oxen (but not 'fowls'; see FOWL, § 2), 1 K. 4.23 [53]. Turning to the rivers and lakes, we must give the first place to the Jordan, all of which to the N. of the Lake of Gennesaret, and one-third of its length to the S., belonged to Galilee. Many small streams flowing from the eastern watershed meet the Jordan; those on the W., including the Kishon (Nahr el-Muḳaṭṭa'), flow into the Mediterranean (see KISHON). The Semachonitis or Lake of Hületh (not the 'Waters of MEROM') and the SEA OF GALILEE are the two lakes. The former is a triangular basin, about 6 ft. above the sea-level; it is very disappointing, being shallow and reedy; water-fowl abound in it. The latter is described in the next article. On the famous hot springs of Tiberias (rivalled by those of Gadara) see TIBERIAS.

The population of Galilee in the time of Jesus was of more diverse origin than it had ever been before.

5. Later population. The somewhat mixed old Israelitish population had been further modified by Phœnician, Ituræan (Arabian?), and Greek elements, so that the Jews, with perfect justice from their point of view, could look down on the Galilæans, whose imperfect legal orthodoxy and inaccurate pronunciation¹ soon 'bewrayed' them (Mk. 14:70 Mt. 26:73). Still, the Galilæans could boast of great names in their past history,² and they were themselves no cowards when their religion was at stake; the old spirit of the Naphtalites lived again in their descendants, however mixed the race of those descendants might be. They were doubtless too industrious to be strictly orthodox from a Pharisaic point of view; but the Messianic hope burned more brightly in Galilee than anywhere else in Palestine, and hundreds of inquirers from the populous Galilæan towns and villages followed the great Teacher wherever he went. He had a word for all. He knew them indeed, as brothers know brothers, for it can hardly be doubted that, as Prof. Percy Gardner has well said, 'according to all historic probability, Jesus of Nazareth was born at Nazareth' (Exploratio Evangelica, 254 [99]), or rather at the Nazarene or Galilæan Bethlehem, for which, by a misunderstanding, 'Nazareth' appears to have been substituted (see NAZARETH). This connection of Jesus with Galilee has been well treated by Renan, though he has doubtless fallen into exaggerations which repel sober minds.

'The region adjacent to Jerusalem is perhaps the most triste country in the world. Galilee, on the other hand, is full of verdure and of shade, the true country of the song of songs. During March and April the fields are carpeted with flowers. The animals are small, but of great gentleness. The forms of the mountains are more harmonious there than elsewhere, and inspire higher thoughts. Jesus seems to have had a special fondness for them' (Vie de Jesus (4), 67 f.).

The early history of Christianity cannot be understood apart from its physical environment. Galilee is dear to us, because by every right Jesus can be called a Galilæan, and must have imbibed the moral and physical influences of his village home; Umbria gives the key to St. Francis; Galilee, in some sense, gives the key to Jesus of Nazareth. How he 'had compassion' on its teeming multitudes we know from the Gospels, and it is no slight merit in Dr. Selah Merrill that he has supplemented the one-sided (though not untrue) statements of Renan by proving the density of the population of ancient Galilee.³ 'He who wandered among the hills and valleys of Galilee was never far from some great and populous city.'⁴ Yet, such are the revenges of history, this home of the fulfiller and transformer of the Law became, in the second century after Christ, the centre of Jewish study of the Law. Galilee must at this period have contained a large and wealthy Jewish population. Traces of their splendid synagogues are still to be found at Tell Hūm, Kerāzeh, Irhid, Kedès, Meirōn, Kefr Bir'im, and other places. Strangely enough, in six of these there are carved representations of animals.

6. Local influences on Jesus.

² In Jn. 7:52 for προφήτης we should probably read, with the Sahidic version, ὁ προφήτης, else strange ignorance is ascribed to the Jews. Prophets and other great men had come out of Galilee. See Keim, Jesus of Nazara, ET 8:13-15.
³ Josephus asserts (Vit. 4:5; B.J. iii. 8:2) that there were 204 cities and villages, the very least of which contained more than 15,000 inhabitants. We need not accept this.

The best-known localities in Jewish Galilee are in the lower part of the province. On the W. of the southern border, S. of the Wādy el-Melek, is

7. Chief localities. the village of Semūnīyeh, the ancient Simonias (Jos. Vit. 24), identified by the Talmud with SHIMRON [γ. v. i.]. The modern village of Yāfā, SW. of Nazareth, is the Japha of Josephus (B.J. ii. 206, iii. 7:31). The frontier town of Xaloth or Exaloth (B.J. iii. 3:1; Vit. 4:4) is the modern Iksāl; cp CHESULLOTH or CHISLOTH TABOR. Another frontier town, Dabaritta (Jos. Vit. 26:6; B.J. ii. 21:3), is the modern Debūriyeh, at the foot of Mount Tabor on the north, the ancient DABERATH. Close to or upon Mt. Tabor was a fortress called by Polyhius (v. 706) Atabyrion. S. of Tabor, on the slope of Little Hermon, is the small village of Nein, the Nain of the NT. The plain between Tabor and Gennesaret was called (Eus. OS 296:8) Saronas; the name is echoed in that of the village Sārōnā. ESDRAELON is treated elsewhere.

Let us now move westward from the shore of Gennesaret, and pause first at the ruins of Irhid, the Arbela of Josephus, famous in the history of Herod (B.J. 16:24), and look up to the round rocky hill called Kārn Ḥaṭṭīn (1135 ft. above sea-level), regarded by the Latins as the Mount of the Beatitudes, and identified by the Talmud with the ZIDDIM of Josh. 19:35. To the SW. is Kefr Kennā, which tradition identifies with CANA OF GALILEE. Conder's site for Cana ('Ain Kānā) has the seeming advantage of being only half an hour to the N. of Nazareth; the fountain flows on though the village has disappeared. But what if 'Nazareth' is really a mistake for the Nazarene Bethlehem? Šefūriyeh is no doubt Sepphoris, so famous in the Roman war; the Talmud calls it Sippori. Beit-Laḥm, the ancient Bethlehem of Zebulun and en-Nāšira, or Nazareth, require to be noticed together (see NAZARETH).

In the N. of the Plain of Baṭṭōf (the Asochis of Jos.) we pause with interest at the Tell Jefāt, upon which once stood the fortress of Jotapata, defended by Josephus (B.J. iii. 7:7); cp JIPHTAH-EL. The border cities, Kefr Ḥananyah and Bersabe, are respectively Kefr 'Anān and Abū Shebā (N. of Kefr 'Anān), unless, indeed, Bersabe is the Birsabee of Theodosius (circa 530 A.D.), which Guthe identifies with Khirhet el-'Orēmeh, above Khān Minieh on the Sea of Galilee.

Of the doubtless ancient sites in Upper Galilee, few have a proved biblical connection—e.g., Kerāzeh (Chorazin); Šafed (the Sefet of Tob. 1:1 in the Latin), the highest town in Galilee (2749 ft.), and, as some have fancied, the 'city that is set on a hill' of Mt. 5:14; Meirōn, where many old Jewish teachers are buried; el-Jish, the Gischaia of Josephus, and the Guš Ḥalab of the Talmud; and, to the NW., Kefr-Bir'im, already referred to. GALILEE, SEA OF (ἡ θάλασσα τῆς γαλιλαίας [Ti. WH]), a Hebraistic expression (see GEOGRAPHY, § 4) for the fine sweet-water lake through which the Jordan flows on the E. of Galilee.

It occurs five times (Mt. 4:18 15:29 Mk. 1:16 7:31 Jn. 6:1). Other names are (1) 'sea of Tiberias' (ἡ θ. τῆς Τιβεριάδος [Ti. WH], Jn. 21:1; (2) 'sea of Galilee,' of 1. Names. Tiberias' (ἡ θ. τῆς Γαλιλαίας τῆς Τιβ. [Ti. WH]), Lk. 5:1; (4) 'the sea' (ἡ θάλασσα), Jn. 6:11-25; (5) 'the lake' (ἡ λίμνη), Lk. 5:2 8:22f. 33- To these must be added (6) 'sea of Chinnereth' (ἡ θάλασσα), and (7) 'sea of Chinneroth' (ἡ θάλασσα), see CHINNERETH, CHINNEROTH; also (8) 'the water of Gennesar'—i.e., (RV) 'of Gennesareth', 1 Macc. 11:67. See GENNESAR. For Talmudic notices the reader will consult Neub. Glögr. 25, and Kohut, 'Lakes of the Holy Land,' JQR 4:691 (192).

The extreme length of this lake is 1.3 m.; its greatest width is little less than 7 m. It is an irregular oval in shape. Its surface is 681 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean. Its

2. Physical characteristics. Its greatest depth has been exaggerated by M'Gregor and Lortet.

As Barrois (1894) states, it varies from 130 ft. to 148 ft., according to the season, the greatest depth occurring along the course of the Jordan, through the meridional axis of the sheet. The surface temperature varies considerably. Down to 30 ft. it is on an average about 68° or 69°, and at 50 ft., 62° or 63°. Between 65 ft. and 130 ft., however, there is a uniform temperature of 59°. This is much higher than in the Swiss lakes at the same depth, but the lake of Tiberias lies at a much lower elevation, under a much hotter sun, and is fed from the sides and the bottom by several hot springs (see PEFC, '94, pp. 211-220).

The scenery of the lake disappoints some travellers; but arriving from the S. where the landscapes are by no means always pleasing, one feels it a relief to catch a first view of its pale blue waters and the steep but bare and by no means bold mountains which so nearly surround it.¹ It is unjust to speak of it as dreary. It is only under certain aspects that it presents a painful monotony of gray; the evening hues are delightful, and round it there is a broad beach of white pebbles with small shells. The Jordan enters at the extreme northern end and issues 'plunging and swirling' at the southern. Here there are wide openings, which permit a view of the valley, and suggest interesting excursions.

The favourable physical conditions of Gennesaret (גניסרת) have been referred to elsewhere (see GENNESAR). Here it suffices to add that the harvest on the shore is nearly a month earlier than on the neighbouring highlands of Galilee and Bashan. Frost is entirely unknown. The trees, plants, and vegetables are those usually found in Egypt—e.g., the palm, the Zizyphus lotus, and the indigo plant.

Though the whole basin of the lake, and, indeed, the Jordan valley, is of volcanic origin, as evidenced by the thermal springs and the frequent earthquakes, yet the main formation of the surrounding wall of mountains is limestone. A large number of black stones and boulders of basaltic tuffa are scattered along the slopes and upland plains, and dykes of basalt here and there burst through the limestone strata in the neighbourhood of Tiberias and along the northern shore.²

In the OT the lake is only mentioned in descriptions of boundaries. It receives ample compensation in the

3. NT references. NT, for its well-peopled, pleasant shores attracted the preacher of the kingdom of God. Four of its fisher-folk became his first disciples, with whom he took up his temporary abode in the 'village of consolation' (Capernaum)—he who was emphatically mēnāhem (i.e., Comforter, a Jewish title of the Messiah). The local colouring of the Gospel narratives which have the lake and its shores for their scene, is wonderfully true. The sudden storms—the multitude of fish—the 'desert place' near Bethsaida where there was 'much grass'—all this is in accordance with facts. The hot, tropical air of the Ghôr is often filled by the cold winds from Lebanon which rush through the ravines of the Peræan hills (Thomson). So much for the storms. The fish are famous, both for variety and for abundance (see FISH, § 1). Josephus (B/iii. 10:7) remarks—and Hasselquist corroborates this—that some of them are found also in the Nile.³ To Beth-saida the fish of the lake perhaps gave its name, and Taricheæ was mainly devoted to the curing of fish. The desert but grassy place intended in the narratives of the first feeding of the people (see especially Mk. 6:39) is surely the rich but swampy plain of el-Bateiḥa in the NE., at the N. end of which are the ruins of BETHSAIDA (g.v.). Nor can we doubt that towards the S. of the lake there were also 'desert (solitary) places,' even if they were only on high hill tops.

This consideration is important with reference to the two narratives of the feeding of the multitude. That

4. Feeding of the multitude. the same tradition may receive different forms, so that two distinct events appear (but wrongly appear) to be reported, is clear from the lives of the patriarchs. It is the application of the comparative method, not any wish to rationalise, that prompts many good critics to identify the two narratives referred to.¹ If this be done, we are placed in a position to rectify some very natural mistakes in the present form of the traditions. We shall see that the scene of the most original narrative of the feeding was probably not in the NE., but more towards the S. Jesus had gone hither to be as far as possible from Antipas,² and yet, even in this remote spot, he could not hide himself from eager followers. How did he deal with them? There was probably a gap in the oral tradition, and the early Christians did not shrink from filling it up by ascribing to him who was a prophet, and more than a prophet, a deed such as Elisha was said to have performed of old. How well they expanded the scanty suggestion of 2 K. 4:42-44!³ How much more spiritually suggestive are the evangelical narratives!

The view presented here is different doubtless from that commonly received; but it seems to remove not a few very real difficulties. Nor is it only geography and exegesis that owe something to a keener textual criticism. We are thus helped one stage further towards the perception that the central importance of the Gospel narratives does not consist in their freedom from the inevitable errors of much-edited popular traditions.

Let us now compare the various Gospel statements as to the scene of the reported event, assuming (as we may and must) that there is a duplication of the original story.

Mt. 14:13, 'When Jesus heard of it, he withdrew from thence in a boat to a desert place apart.' No name of a place is given before v. 34, where we read, '... they came to the land, unto Gennesaret.' Mt. 15:29, 'And Jesus... came nigh unto the Sea of Galilee; and he went up into a mountain, and sat there'; v. 39, 'And he sent away the multitudes, and entered into the boat, and came into the borders of (RV) Magadan.'

Mk. 6:31, 'Come ye yourselves into a desert place'; v. 45, 'And straightway he constrained his disciples to enter into the boat, and to go before him unto the other side to Bethsaida, while he himself sendeth the multitude away'; v. 53, 'And... they came to the land, unto Gennesaret.' Mk. 8:4, 'Whence shall we be able to fill these men with bread here in a desert place?' v. 10, 'And straightway he... came into the parts of Dalmanutha.'

Lk. 9:10, 'And he took them, and withdrew apart to a city called Bethsaida'; v. 12, 'for we are here in a desert place.' The reading in v. 10 is uncertain (cp Blass's edition of Lk.). RV follows Treg., Ti., WH. Certainly the reading of the received text (followed by AV) is the work of a corrector. It does not, however, follow that that of B and D, etc. (D has κώμην for πόλις) is the right one. We must leave the question open. There is nothing else in the text of Lk. to indicate exactly where the scene of the narrative is to be placed.

Jn. 6:1, 'Jesus went away to the other side of the sea of Galilee'; v. 3, 'And Jesus went up into the mountain'; v. 10, 'Now there was much grass in the place'; v. 17, 'And they entered into a boat, and were going over the sea into Capernaum'; v. 23, 'Howbeit there came boats from Tiberias, etc.'; v. 24, '... and came to Capernaum, seeking Jesus.'

The greatest difficulty here is in Mk. 6:45 (ἰσθμὸς εἰς τὸ πέραν πρὸς Βηθσαιδαν). Are there two Bethsaidas?

5. Bethsaida and Dalmanutha. or shall we suppose (GAS, HG 458; see BETHSAIDA, § 2) that 'going across' does not mean crossing to the W. shore, but only taking the short journey northward to Bethsaida? The present writer thinks both views improbable, and instead of adopting the reading of old MSS of the Itala (followed in AV^{ms}: 'over against Bethsaida') would suppose that there is a scribe's error, and that for 'Bethsaida' (Βηθσαιδα) we should read 'Tiberias' (Τιβεριαδα).

A similar change is certainly necessary in the case of Magdala (Rec. Text) or Magadan (Treg., Ti., WH) in Mt. 15.39, and Dalmanutha in Mt. 6.10. These names have been discussed over and over again (see DALMANUTHA), and the latest solutions are hardly more natural than the earliest. The name in the original tradition must have been one which would account equally well for all these forms, and it should be one of which we are not obliged to say with Bruce (speaking of Magadan in the Expositor's Bible) 'place wholly unknown.' It seems to have been Migdal-nunia¹ (מִגְדַּל נֻנְיָה, 'the tower of fish'), which was 1 R. m. from Tiberias, probably to the S. of that city.²

It will be seen that just as Bethsaida and Capernaum go together in one form of the tradition, so some unknown place on the E. coast (the neighbourhood of Gamala would suit) and Migdal-nunia go together in another.³ We may perhaps find traces of this latter view of the localities in Mk. 6.45 (reading Τιβεριαδα) and also in Jn. 6.23, where the ships are brought by the evangelist from Tiberias, because the spot where he places the feeding was obliquely opposite Tiberias.⁴ 'The land where they were going' (v. 21) was not Capernaum (a mistake surely of the redactor of the Fourth Gospel), hut Tiberias.

Nothing has been said here as yet of the calming of the storm. Here again the spiritual suggestiveness of the narrative makes it an inalienable treasure. We cannot, however, pin our faith to the literal accuracy of the beautiful story, any more than to that of Ps.

77.19 [20], 'Thy way was in the sea and thy path in the great waters,' and of Ps. 107.28-30; see especially the suggestive words with which the latter passage concludes,—'So he bringeth them unto the haven where they would be.' Such symbolic language is characteristic of faith in all earnestly-held religions, and the symbol soon fixes itself in narrative. These are no doubt held to be facts; but the facts are valued chiefly as vehicles of spiritual ideas, and never examined into with the strictness of historic investigation.

We referred above to a little-known Migdal, as almost certainly the Magdala of the received text of Mt. 15.39.

The ordinary view identifying it with Mejdal, that miserable village with which the plain of el-Ghawer begins, has to be abandoned. The Talmud mentions several

7. Magdala, Taricheæ, etc. Migdals in this neighbourhood; Mejdal was one of these—possibly that from which Mary Magdalene seems to have derived her name, scarcely the MIGDAL-EL (g.v.) of Joshua.

Other places on the W. shore are referred to in special articles (see, e.g., CAPERNAUM, CHORAZIN).

Let us now turn to the S. end of the lake, where stands the ruin of Kerak, at the point where the Jordan issues. Here we should probably place Taricheæ, which, according to Pliny (NH 5.15), in his day gave its name to the whole lake.⁵ Its site indeed is not undisputed, being sometimes placed at Mejdal, and though the theory of Grätz—Taricheæ = Migdal-nunia = Mejdal—is unacceptable,⁶ the simpler theory which has commanded the assent of Wilson (PEFQ, '77,

² See Neub. Geogr. 217; Buhl, 226; but cp Grä. MGWJ, '80, p. 484; who makes the distance 4 m. (we return to this later).

³ It would not do, therefore, to suggest that 'Bethsaida' (place of fish?) might be a second name of Migdal-nunia.

p. 10 ff.; Furrer, ZDPI 2.56 f. 12.194 f. 13.194 ff.), and Socin (Baed. Pal. (290) cannot be lightly rejected. Upon the whole, however, the arguments of Schürer (Gesch. 1.515) appear to be provisionally decisive in favour of Kerak; Conder, Guthe, and Buhl also incline in this direction. One would like to be able to speak more positively. Taricheæ was famous in the first Roman war; it was a centre of Galilean patriotism. Jesus may perhaps have been there; it is a little strange that it should nowhere be mentioned in the Gospels.¹

Turning round the lake from Kerak, we pause first at Kal'at el-Hošn, most probably the ancient Hippos (the Talmudic Sūsithā). The name of Gamala (mentioned above; famous in the Roman war)² seems to be preserved in that of the village of Jamli; Kersā is probably the ancient Gerasa (see GERASENES). But what an inadequate idea these few names give of the girdle of towns which inclosed the Sea of Galilee in ancient times! As Lamartine says, 'the borders of the Lake of Gennesaret seem to have borne cities instead of harvests and forests.'³ The scene is very different now. Without the help of the imagination even the travelled student will see nothing but a sheet of water unenlivened by vessels and surrounded by treeless hills. T. K. U.

GALL. (1) עֲנָר, rōš, or עֲנָר,⁴ rōš (γολη),⁵ Dt. 29.18 [17] 32.32 Ps. 69.21 [22], Jer. 8.14 9.15 [14] 23.15 Lam. 3.5.19 Am. 6.12: the same Hebrew word is in Dt. 32.33 rendered 'venom,' in Joh 20.16 'poison,' and in Hos. 10.4 'hemlock.' The word primarily denotes an extremely bitter plant (Hos. 10.4) and its fruit (Dt. 29.18 [17] etc.); it is constantly coupled with לֵבָנָה, la'ânāh, 'wormwood,' the two together denoting the extreme of bitterness. Though there is no evidence that the plant denoted by עֲנָר was poisonous, the word is metaphorically applied to the venom of serpents (Dt. 32.33 etc.), the notions of bitterness and of poison being closely conjoined in ancient thought (cp Di. on Joh 20.14).

As the etymology of the Heb. word is unknown and there is no kindred form in any other Semitic language, we have no data for discovering the particular plant intended, the proposed identifications with hemlock, colocynt, darnel, and poppy being alike conjectural. The reference in Hos. 10.4 points to some weed growing on cultivated land (as ἄγρωσις); whilst in Dt. 32.32 some berry-bearing plant is indicated. The colocynt, which is otherwise probable, is a plant that grows, not on cultivated, but on barren land. Cp Food, § 5, end.

(2) מֵרִירָה, m'rērāh, Joh 16.13†, and (3) מֵרִירָה, m'rērāh, Joh 20.14 25† (in ἄγρωσις, exc. v. 25, διαιτραίς [BA], διαιτρῆ [NC]), are analogous derivatives from slightly different forms of the same root (Lag. Uebers. 40), which denotes bitterness. They mean properly the human gall or bile; and, from the association of the ideas of bitterness and poison (see above), מֵרִירָה is once applied, like עֲנָר, to the venom of serpents (Job 20.14).

With regard to ἄ's third rendering, observe that in 42.5 f. the 'galleries' have no pillars. Cp Ass. mīlīku, mēteku, 'passage, road,' from √קתא, 'to pass on' (Del. Ass. HWB, s.v.). An architectural application of this word, however, is not mentioned. See TEMPLE.

1. A place included among the additional 'cities' of Judah in Ⓞ's text of Josh. 15 59a (Γαλλιμ [A]; see SBOT, 'Joshua,' Heb.). It occurs between Karem ('Ain Kārim;' see BETH-HACCEREM) and Baithir ('Bithir;' see BETHER i.); it was therefore W. of Jerusalem.

2. A hamlet to the N. of Jerusalem, mentioned with Laishah and Anathoth, Is. 10 30 (γαλλειμ [AQ], ταλειμ [N*]). It was the home of Palti, the husband of Michal (see BAHURIM), 1 S. 25 44 (ρομμα [B], γαλλει [A], -dd. [forte A*], γολιαθ [L]; γεθλᾱ [Jos.]). No plausible identification has been offered; the text is probably corrupt. Elsewhere (SBOT, Isaiah, Heb., Addenda)¹ it is proposed to read, for גַּלְגַּל (EV 'daughter of Gallim'), גַּלְגַּל. A place called Bethgilgal is mentioned in Neh. 12 29 (RV) in connection with Geba and Azmaveth, and one called Gilgal in Josh. 15 7, and Gellioth in Josh. 18 17. Probably the same village is meant in all the three passages (so independently G. A. Smith [GILGAL, § 6 (b)]): we cannot identify it, but we know whereabouts it must have stood. It seems to have grown up near a cromlech facing the ascent of Adummim which formed a conspicuous landmark, and was probably regarded as sacred.

GALLIO (Γαλλίων [Ti. WH]), proconsul (AV 'deputy') of Achaia probably towards the end of Paul's eighteen months' sojourn in Corinth

1. Facts from classical sources. Annæus Seneca, was a rhetorician of Corduba (Cordova), whence he migrated to Rome and became an eques; his mother Helvia was also probably a native of Spain (hence equestri et provinciali loco ortus in Tac. Ann. 14 53). L. Annæus Seneca the philosopher, and L. Annæus Mela, the geographer and father of the poet Lucan, were his full brothers, both younger than himself; his own name was Marcus Annæus Novatus, and to him under this name Seneca addresses his books De Ira. From his father he received a careful education, and in Rome he attracted the notice of L. Junius Gallio, a rhetorician of repute (cp Tac. Ann. 6 3), who ultimately adopted him, so that his full name became apparently L. Junius Annæus Gallio. Gallio's younger brother Seneca was in banishment in Corsica from 41 to 49 A.D., when he was recalled by Agrippina to be Nero's tutor (Tac. Ann. 12 8). There is no sufficient reason, perhaps, to suppose that Gallio shared in his brother's disgrace (but cp Ramsay, St. Paul, 258). Towards the close of the reign of Claudius, he received the governorship of the province of Achaia.

Achaia being a senatorial province between 27 B.C. and 15 A.D., and again from 44 A.D. onwards,² the term proconsul (ἀρχιπρωτοε) is rightly used in Acts 18 12, for the governor of such provinces bore always the title 'proconsul,' but in the case of Achaia the governors were of prætorian rank only, five years at least intervening between the prætorship and the appointment to a province (Marq.-Momms. Röm. Staatsv. 1 545). We thus know only approximately the date of Gallio's prætorship; nor is the year of his consulship ascertained; it was presumably later than his governorship. That he actually held the consulship is known from Pliny (HN 31 33), who tells us that he left

GAMALIEL

Rome post consulatum on a voyage for his health. This must have been a different occasion from that recorded by Seneca, who says that Gallio suffered from fever in Achaia, and went a voyage in consequence (Ep. Mor. 18 1 [104 1]: 'illud mihi in ore erat domini mei Gallionis, qui cum in Achaia febrim habere coepisset, protinus navem adscendit clamitans non corporis esse, sed loci morbum'). This allusion gives us the only corroboration of the proconsulship recorded in Acts. It has been suggested that the L. Junius given as consul suffectus with A. Marcellus at some time under Nero on a wax tablet from Pompeii is to be identified with Gallio (Nipp. in Hermes 12 130). We know that he was in Rome in Nero's fifth year (Dio Cass. 61 20 = 58 A.D.). His appeal for mercy saved his life for the moment when Seneca was driven to suicide in 65 A.D. (Tac. Ann. 15 73); but next year he also was one of Nero's victims (Dio Cass. 62 25 Jer. Chron. Eus.).

Gallio's genial and lovable and thoroughly upright character is sketched for us by his brother, and is summed up in the epithet 'dulcis' applied to him by Statius (Silv. 2 7 32) and by Seneca himself (Nat. Qu. 4 pref.:—quem nemo non parum amat, etiam qui amare plus non potest. . . Nemo enim mortaliuni uni tam dulcis est, quam hic omnibus). Dio (60 35) records a witticism of his, in which he spoke of Claudius, who was poisoned by his wife Messalina, as 'unco in celum raptus' (in allusion to the deification of dead emperors, and the haling of dead malefactors through the streets to the Tiber).

It has often been remarked that the narrative in Acts accords perfectly with Gallio's character as otherwise

2. Ref. in Acts. known; but the erroneous impression given by the phrase of AV in Acts 18 17 ('and Gallio cared for none of those things') has 'made his name proverbial for indifferentism in the Christian world' (Farrar, St. Paul, 410). To speak of his 'characteristic indifference,' or 'disdainful justice,' seems beside the mark. Ramsay (Church in R. Emp. 349 n.) points out that the Jews 'could act against the Roman Paul only by arousing official Roman action on some pretext.' It is a mistake to imagine that because Judaism was a religio licita Gallio could be invoked in the interests of Jewish orthodoxy (the recorded instances of official protection when Jewish privileges were attacked by municipal authorities are of quite different nature): in other words, the accusation, if exactly reproduced in v. 13, was designedly vague, and by the words 'contrary to the law' it was intended that Gallio should understand Roman law, which alone he was concerned to administer (so also Zahn, Einleit. 1 190). Further, in order to gain a correct conception of the incident, all idea of tumult must be rejected (κατεστρησαν ὁμοθυμαδον of v. 12 merely signifies united action on the part of the 'community of Jews' at Corinth). 'It is clear that Gallio's short speech represents the conclusion of a series of inquiries' (Ramsay, St. Paul, 258), in which the attempt of the Jews to prove that Paul's teaching put him outside the pale of Judaism, and so rendered him liable for introducing a new religion (cp the charge at Philippi, Acts 16 21, and Thessalonica, Acts 17 7) revealed the true grounds of their action. Gallio's refusal to accept a prosecution 'seems to show that he shared the broad and generous views of his brother about the policy of Rome in regard to the various religions of the provinces' (Ramsay, ib. 259). GAMALIEL (גַּמְלִיֵּאל; 'El is a reward'; § 28; cp GAMUL, and Palm. גַּמְלִיֵּאל; Γαμαλιήλ [BAL and Ti. WH]).

1. b. Pedahzur, a chief of Manasseh (Nu. 1 10 20 75 4 59 10 23 [P¹]).

2. Gamaliel, or Rabbān Gamaliel the elder, who, according to Jewish tradition, was the son of Simeon and the grandson of the famous Hillel,¹ is twice mentioned in the NT. Of his biography little is known beyond the facts that, early in the first century, he lived and taught in Jerusalem, where Saul of Tarsus is said to have been for some time his pupil (Acts 22 3); that he was a student of Greek literature; and that he was a member of the Sanhedrin, which body he successfully counselled to moderation in their treatment of the followers of Jesus (ib. 534 ff.).

It would be extremely interesting to have some outside confirmation of the two notices in the NT. That Paul himself makes no reference in his epistles to his teacher, appears strange. Looking back on his past history the apostle describes himself (Phil. 35 f.) in a way that we should hardly have expected in a pupil of Gamaliel, if the 'rabban' is to be judged by the notice in Acts 534 ff. Zahn (Eint. 13548 50 f.) warns us not to exaggerate the Hellenistic influences of Paul's home. His Pharisaism was an inheritance from his fathers (cp Acts 236, RV 'a son of Pharisees'); but in this case why did he choose out Gamaliel? The problem seems insoluble.

According to Wendt, Acts 538 f. may be based on some traditional saying of Gamaliel, which the author of Acts (who may have heard that Gamaliel's advice determined the action of the Sanhedrin) applied to the present case. Certainly provisional conjectures of this sort may be admitted. Any close connection, however, between Paul and Gamaliel is not without its difficulty.

There is a late and otherwise improbable Christian tradition to the effect that Gamaliel ultimately became a Christian, and received baptism at the hands of Peter and John; the same tradition located the tomb of 'Saint Gamaliel' at Pisa.¹ This tradition, however, is almost conclusively refuted by the fact that he is spoken of in the records of Judaism as having been the first of the seven 'rabbans' (see RABBI). Such an honorific title would scarcely have been bestowed upon a Christian Jew.

The Talmudists speak of him as having been the president of the Sanhedrin during the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. This, however, is certainly unhistorical, as may be seen from the NT and Josephus, where it is invariably the high priest who presides over the council. It should be added that the name Gamaliel is of frequent occurrence in the history of later Judaism. A grandson of the elder Gamaliel, who bore the same name, was the master and friend of Aquila, the 'Onkelos' of the Babylonian Talmud.

In describing the political and commercial relations of Tyre, Ezekiel (2711) says that 'the sons of Arvad were on [Tyre's] walls, and the Gammadim on [its] towers.' Plainly a proper name is required, and since 'Cappadocians' (Lagarde) and 'Cimmerians' (Halévy) do not accord well with the Phœnicians of Arvad, it is evidently wrong to emend גַּמְדִּים into נַמְרִים, with Lagarde and Halévy. Bearing in mind the numerous corruptions in the text of Ezek. 27, we need not hesitate to read גַּמְרִים 'the Simyrites' (or people of Simyra), called in EV 'the Zemarite(s)' (so Co. Ezech., ad loc.; Wl. AT Unt. 180). גַּמְרִים might easily be corrupted either into שַׁמְרִים (ש) or into נַמְרִים (M, etc.). 'The Arvadite' and 'the Zemarite' are mentioned together in Gen. 1018. Thus we once more get evidence of the close relation between Gen. 10 and Ezek. 27.

That a name so unfamiliar in later times as Kamadu (the Egyptian form) or Kumidi (Am. Tab. 87 75, and elsewhere) should be referred to (as נַמְרִים) is improbable, though it is not unnatural that some scholars,² who (needlessly) think Cornill's conjecture 'violent,' should think of identifying the two names. In Am. Tab. 87, Kumidi and Šumura³ are even brought into some degree of connection; Rib Addi states there that the fall of Šumura makes it hardly possible to hold Kumidi for the king. Guthe, with the assent of E. Meyer and Petrie, recognises the name Kumidi in the mod. Kāmid el-Lōz, 29 m. SE. of Beirut, 31 m. WNW. of Damascus. This is certainly 'an excellent position to command the upper Litāni basin,' so that

GARDEN (גַּן gan, Ass. gannatu, Arab. jannat^{mn}, Syr. gann'thā).

The Sem. word is derived from the root גַּן ganan, 'cover,' 'protect,' the garden being secluded from the surrounding uncultivated country and the incursions of strangers, and concealed by overshadowing trees from observation (cp Hellen. iv. 115, περιεργυμένοι παράδεισοι). In the Persian and the Greek period Hebrew also used גַּרְדֵּס gardēs (παράδεισος), park or garden of larger extent than קִנְיֹס (or גַּן); see Neh. 28 Cant. 413 Eccles. 25. In Assyrian kirū (pl. -ati) means a plantation of trees.

'Gardens' of the sort just described came in very early times to be specially attached to temples and also to the residences of wealthy persons. An illustration of the former will be found figured in

1. Egypt. Lepsius' Denkmäler (395), reproduced from the wall-painting in the tomb of Meryrē, high priest of King Chuen'aten of the eighteenth dynasty (circa 1400 B.C.; discovered at Tell el-Amārna). This figure represents the temple of the sun with the surrounding buildings. The space that intervenes between the buildings is planted with trees, and in every case the base of the trunk is enclosed in a round ridge of earth hollow in the centre in order to retain the water. Apparently there are also water-tanks for irrigation. All features, however, are not quite clear. From the same tomb we obtain other graphic details. A small house, the private residence of the priest, is depicted, and in one corner we have a glimpse of the garden portrayed in the conventional forms of old-world artists in which perspective is disregarded. Among the trees we can recognise the fig, the pomegranate, and the palm, whilst an arbour covered by a trailing grape-bearing vine is clearly visible.

The Theban tombs frequently represent gardens of considerable size divided into separate enclosures for vines, dates, and sycamores respectively. The interesting illustration given in Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. 1377, Erman, Life in Anc. Eg. 195, represents a large garden of rectangular shape surrounded by a wall. A canal of water flows in front. Between it and the wall there is a row of trees.

We quote from Erman's description:—

The house is concealed 'in the furthest corner of the garden; no sound from the stirring life on the canal could penetrate its seclusion. . . . There is no entrance except in front where a broad flight of steps leads down from the large porter's lodge to two small doors which open upon the canal. Through the chief entrance . . . we pass out of a small door directly into the vineyard which is seen in the centre of the plan. The luxuriant vines . . . are trained on trellis-work built up with stone; through these vine walks the paths lead straight up to the house. If we pass, however, through either of the side doors, we come to a part of the garden resembling a small park; here there is a fish-pond surrounded with palms and shrubs. . . . Two doors lead out of this garden; one into the palm-garden which occupies a narrow strip on either side of the piece of ground; the other door leads into the hinder portion of the garden. Whether we enter the right or left side we now come again to a "cool tank." . . . A pretty little arbour stands at the head of the pond; here the master would sit in the evening and watch the water-birds at their play in the water amongst the lotus and papyrus plants. Finally at the back surrounded by a double row of palms and high trees lies the house itself. . . .

Egyptian sovereigns took great interest in horticulture. Rameses III. (1200 B.C.), according to the Harris papyrus (i. 83 f.), made 'great vineyards, walks shaded by all kinds of fruit-trees laden with their fruit, a sacred way splendid with flowers from all countries.' Queen Hat-šepsut (Hatasu), living about 1500 B.C., imported thirty-one incense trees from their habitats by the Red Sea.

In a footnote to Sir G. Wilkinson's work (1378) we have a long list of trees which was discovered in the tomb of an officer of Thotmes I. In this catalogue we find date-palms, sycamores, acacias, quinces, tamarisks, willows, and figs.

In Babylonia and Assyria the features of garden cultivation are very similar and there also monarchs interested themselves in the art. Among ancient

2. Assyria and Babylonia. Babylonian documents we read of a garden similar to that just mentioned. This belonged to Merodach-baladan and contained the names of seventy-two trees, shrubs, and plants. This inscription, called the 'garden tablet,' is entitled at the close gannūti ša Mar'duk-ablu-iddina šarri, 'Gardens of King Merodach-baladan.'

Assyrian kings, as well as Babylonian, took a pride in planting gardens with choice and rare trees, brought from other lands. Tiglath-pileser I. (1100 B.C.) evinces this fondness for horticulture.

In his prism inscription (col. 7 17-27) he says: 'Cedar-trees, urkarinu and allakani trees I took away from the lands which I had conquered; trees which no one among my predecessors [i.e. former kings, my fathers] had planted, I planted them in the parks (širāti). Valuable garden-fruit which was not to be found in my own country I brought away, and caused the plantations of Assyria to bear these fruits.'¹

Four centuries later Sennacherib, in describing his 'palace without rival,' announces that he planted a great park 'resembling the Amanus land (mountain),' in which were 'all kinds of fragrant plants, fruit-trees, and the produce of the mountains and of Chaldea.'

Amid some obscure details we learn that a canal was dug ri kaspu from the river Husur, and that a pond was made. Vines and other fruit-trees as well as sirdu trees, cypresses, and palms were planted. Birds and other wild animals were placed among them.² A bas-relief representing a river and gardens watered by a canal, discovered by Layard at Kuyunjik, perhaps furnishes a rough illustration.

Esarhaddon also (in two prism-inscriptions), after describing the erection of a palace of hewn stone and cedar, passes on to describe (col. 6 14 ff.) the adjoining park thus: 'A lofty plantation like the Hamanu mountain, overgrown with all kinds of sweet-smelling bushes, I placed by its side' (KB 2 138).

From the deeds of Babylonian purchase and sale published by Peiser we may infer that a plantation of date-palms (širū gisimmari), sometimes bordering on a canal (širitu), formed a not infrequent accompaniment of a Babylonian private dwelling (Peiser, Keilinsch. Actenstücke, Sargonstein, col. 4 23-25; 12 1).

From the Babylonians the Persians acquired the art of horticulture and carried it to considerable perfection.

3. Persia. Thence the skill in planting, as well as the name for a cultivated park (pairidaēsa), spread to the Hebrews (פַּרְדֵּי) and also to the Greeks (παρδάειος; see PARADISE).

It is from Greek writers that we mainly derive our information respecting these parks. Thus Xenophon employs the word paradeisos in describing the large park attached to the palace of Cyrus at Kelæng in Phrygia through which the river Meander flowed, and which was stocked with wild animals of the chase.

Its extent may be surmised from the fact that Cyrus here reviewed his contingent of 11,000 Greeks (Inab. i. 27 ff.).

A biblical hint as to the size of these parks is conveyed in Esth. 15 where we are told that the Persian king gave a feast to all the inhabitants of Shushan in the precincts of the royal park attached to the palace. From Hellen. iv. 115 we learn that Pharnabazus also had his enclosed parks at Daskyleum, where animals for the chase were kept (cp Cyrop. i. 3 14). From Neh. 28 we acquire the additional detail that the keeper of the royal parks was an important court official by whom building materials were granted.

It is surely possible that Canaanite civilization presented features in the matter of garden cultivation analogous to those of the ancient empires

4. Canaan. of the Nile and of the Euphrates and Tigris. Phœnician inscriptions, however, yield us no information on the subject, whilst the biblical evidence is exceedingly scanty.¹

Under the circumstances mentioned above (§ 4) the features presented by the Paradise-narrative Gen. 2:8-17 are of special interest and value. The main portion of this account is acknowledged to belong to the earlier stratum of J (J₁). It is pointed out elsewhere

(see PARADISE) that vv. 10-14 are probably a later addition² to the narrative of J₁. The critical result is of considerable importance as we thereby eliminate the most definite Babylonian traits (mention of Euphrates, Tigris, Aššur, etc.) from the narrative. There is accordingly left to us a Palestinian narrative apparently based on an ancient tradition of Babylonian origin which had survived for several centuries at least on Canaanite soil and had then been remoulded.

Even when vv. 10-14 are removed from the section, there remain traits in the narrative that remind us of Assyria and Babylonia (see again PARADISE). The expression 'all kinds of trees agreeable to sight and good for food' (v. 9) recalls the phraseology of Esarhaddon's above-quoted inscription Kala rikki u isi hurrušu 'all kinds of fragrant spices and shrubs' (cp Khorsab. 143); and if we adopt the Assyriological explanation of ri as not 'mist' but 'stream of water' (cp Esarh. col. vi. 19 f.), the counterpart of the Babylonian irrigation canal is restored to us and the picture is fairly complete. It is clear too from Nu. 246 (J?) —see BALAAM, § 5) that garden-plantations were familiar features in Palestinian scenery in pre-exilic times.

On the text of this difficult passage see Dillmann, also Cheyne, Exp. T. 1040f (June '99), who critically emends (JQR Jan. 1900) the text more fully; cp CEDAR; PALM-TREE.

What are the precise facts underlying the tradition of Solomon's botanic lore (1 K. 4:33 § 5 13]), cannot be determined; but Phœnician influences would help to account for the great king's interest in plants. Later kings, at any rate, had their plantations. Ahab, who had a passion for building, coveted Naboth's vineyard in order to secure a suitable plantation as an adjunct to his palace (1 K. 21.2). In Heb. גַּן הַיְיָרֵאֵךְ , gan hayyārāk, furnishes, however, a very vague conception of its character.¹

Gardens were naturally chosen as burial-places. Trees having a sacred character are often conjoined with tombs (cp Gen. 35.8 and RS⁽²⁾ 196). Thus in 2 K. 21:826 we read that Manasseh and also his son were buried in the 'garden of Uzza' (see MANASSEH, UZZA ii.). In the time of Jesus, family burying-places were frequently in gardens (Jn. 19.41).

Through the king's garden the Jewish soldiers escaped, when Jerusalem was captured by the armies of Nebuchadrezzar (2 K. 25.4 Jer. 39.4).

8. Other ref.: Neh. 3.15; see plan in Stade's GVI earlier. 1593). In all these cases we have not a single descriptive trait presented in the biblical record. We must therefore supply this lack by the legitimate inferences which may be drawn from the general features of Hebrew civilization presented in OT literature. In the first place it is evident that in the eighth and the following century Israel had advanced in civilization. Am. 3.15 clearly shows that it was a common custom for the wealthy Hebrew citizen to have a winter and a summer mansion.² These were adorned with cedar woodwork and inlaid ivory (cp Is. 9.9 f. [8 f.]). That gardens possessing orchards affording a grateful shade were attached, may be accepted as certain (cp Am. 5.11). These would contain the well-known Palestinian fruit trees, the vine, fig, and pomegranate. The ideal of a happy life 'to sit under the shade of one's own vine and fig tree' (1 K. 4.25 [55] 2 K. 18.31 Mic. 4.4, cp Jn. 1.50), as well as the general features of the Paradise narrative, enable us to supply these main traits. Probably in pre-exilic Israel fruit-trees predominated. Nowhere do we read of fragrant plants or trees.

By Hos. 4.13 Is. 1.29 and 17.10 we are reminded that Hebrew sanctuaries had their plantations in sacred enclosures in which stood the terebinth, the oak, and the לְבָנָה (see POPLAR), together with the sacred pole representing the deity Asherah (see ASHERAH). Some different kind of sacred plantation is referred to in Is. 17.10 as 'plants of pleasure.' The view that they were connected with the worship of Adonis (see RV²⁶⁸) is not improbable. Robertson Smith (Proph.⁽¹⁾ 273, 425) thinks that pots of quickly withering flowers are referred to.³ The women who wept for Tammuz (Ezek. 8.14) may have covered the bier of their god with such pots or baskets. See, further, ADONIS.

Among the consequences of the Babylonian exile we

² See HOUSE, § 3, and cp $\text{חֵמֶה הַיְיָרֵאֵךְ}$ in the Bar-Rekub inscription from Zenjirli.

³ [In Is. 17.11 the swift destruction of the 'gardens' is not presented in MT so vividly as we should expect. The trouble is with the second part of the verse, the text of which Che. ('Isaiah,' SBOT, Heb., 195) has critically emended, so that the whole verse runs thus:—
(Even) though as soon as thou plantest them, thou fencest them in,
And early bringest thy shoots to blossom,
Thy grape-gathering shall perish in the day of sudden terror,
And thy young plants at the crash of ruin.]

may venture to place the improvement of Jewish horticulture. As we pass into the literature of

9. Later. the Persian and the Greek period, the portrayals of gardens become more vivid and detailed. See especially the picture of the 'garden barred and bolted,' with its 'well of living waters,' and its fruit-trees and fragrant plants in Cant. 4.12-16 6.2, and the description in Eccles. 2.4-6 (see CANTICLES, § 15; BATH-RABBIM). The comparison of the righteous to a well-watered garden (Is. 58.11) suggests that the writer was well acquainted with Babylonian canal irrigation. This resembles the imagery of Ps. 13, and similar language appears in Ecclesiasticus, where wisdom is compared to various trees (24.13 ff.), as the cedar, palm, rose, olive, cinnamon, and so forth, and lastly to a garden canal¹ (v. 30 f.). The Book of Enoch, too, yields some illustrations of our subject. In 32.3 f. (Charles) we read, 'And I came into the garden of righteousness, and saw beyond those trees many large trees growing there, including the tree of wisdom of which Adam and Eve ate, and which was like the carob tree' (see HUSKS). So in 61.12, we have the 'garden of life.'

We may infer from these descriptions that rich men in the Persian and Greek periods delighted in their gardens (cp Susan. 4. 15). In the time of Josephus, Jerusalem was crowded with gardens and hedges outside its walls in the Gihon valley (?) which debouches into the Kidron (B/v. 2.2). In the midst of these Titus nearly lost his life. Probably the garden of GETHSEMANE (q.v.) was not remote from this spot.

Baruch 6.70 [69] (Ep. of Jeremy) gives us an additional feature of magic superstition noticed by the Hellenistic Jewish writer. Gardens (including parks as well as the homely cucumber field) were provided not only with keepers (cp HUT), but also with προβοσκάνια 'scare-crows' to ward off evil spirits and probably birds and beasts as well. GAREB, THE HILL (גָּרֵב הַבְּרָכָה ; ΒΟΥΝΩΝ ΓΑΡΗΘ [BNAQ]), is named only in Jer. 31.39† as a landmark indicating the future great expansion of Jerusalem; see GOATH. Possibly it is the hill described in Josh. 15.8 at the N. limit of the Plain of Rephaim (Buhl, 95). In this case, G-R-B may be transposed from G-B-R—i.e., Gibbor[im], a synonym of REPHAIM [q.v., i.].

Pliny's statement (xix. 632), 'allium cepasque inter deos in iureiurando habet Ægyptus' (cp Juv. Sat. 15), points at least to such plants being common in ancient Egypt, though, according to Wilkinson (3350), 'there is no direct evidence from the monuments of their having been sacred.'² It is not indigenous in W. GATE (בֵּשַׁל, šā'ar; ΠΥΛΗ, also ΠΥΛΩΝ [BAFL]; cp Bib. Aram. בַּשְׂרִי Dan. 2:49 3:26), used collectively of the whole structure, including posts (מְצֻזוֹת, meṣuzōth), and doors (דְּלֵת, dleth), as well as the open space before it (פֶּתַח, pēthah, ΠΥΛΩΝ; cp Josh. 20:4). The doors themselves (the dual, Dt. 3:5 etc., suggests that there were two) seem not to have been hinged to the posts but to have revolved upon pins in sockets. When closed they were kept secure by 'bolts' or 'bars' (בָּרִיחַ, bəriāh), made of metal (1 K. 4:13), but often of some destructible material (see Am. 1:5 Nah. 3:13). For the denom. גַּרְשָׁה, šō'er, 'gate-keeper,' see PORTER.

One of the exploits of Samson (Judg. 16:1-3) may be mentioned here. When lodging at Gaza the hero rose in the middle of the night and went to the gate of the city. There he 'laid hold of the doors of the city-gate and the two gate-posts, and pulled them up, together with the bar,' and carried off the doors and the whole framework to the top of the hill facing Hebron (say 40 m.). The origin of the story can here only be glanced at. We may have in it a mere practical joke in keeping with Samson's jovial character. But a connection with some early mythical phrase, misunderstood by later generations, is not excluded. The descent of Heracles to the gates of the nether world has been compared by Steintal.²

The sanctity of gates is well known (cp THRESHOLD, § 2); the gates of Babylon had their special names, and temples beside them. This partly explains why justice was administered 'in the gate' (2 S. 15:2 Dt. 21:19 etc.), and this perhaps is how 'your gates' came to be equivalent to 'your cities' (Dt. 12:12 etc.; cp Ps. 87:2, 'the gates of Zion' || 'the dwellings of Jacob'). The 'gates' were also symbolical of the might of the city—gates of bronze such as could not easily be broken. Hence we read of the 'gates of Hades' (Mt. 16:18)—i.e., the power of Hades (traditionally described as a city).

In NT θύρα is translated 'gate,' Acts 3:2 AV; but cp DOOR. The usual terms are πύλη (Lk. 7:12; cp the 'gate Beautiful,' Acts 3:10), and πύλωνα, the latter of a palace (Lk. 16:20), house (Acts 10:17), or porch (Mt. 26:71; cp COURT, PORCH).

GATH (גַּת, 'wine-press'; ΓΕΘ [BNAL]; Jos. ΓΙΤΤΑ; Vg. GETH), one of the five royal or princely cities of the

1. References. Philistines (Josh. 13:3 1 S. 6:17). The ethnic form is GITTITE (גִּיטִי; δ γειθηαίος [BAL]); see 2 S. 6:10 f. 15:18 etc.; whether GITTITH in Ps. 8 (title) means 'Gittite,' is disputed (see GITTITH). It is not assigned in Josh. to any of the Israelitish tribes, and in Josh. 11:22 (D) [C^B om.] it is mentioned as inhabited by ANAKIM. The Philistine champion, Goliath, came from Gath (1 S. 17:4 etc.), and David took refuge with Achish, king of Gath (1 S. 21:10 [11] 27:2; ¹ see DAVID, § 5). ² According to 1 Ch. 18: David 'took Gath and her towns out of the hand of the Philistines'; this statement, however, may be based on a conjectural restoration of a defective text (see METHEG-AMMAH). At any rate, a Gittite named Ittai was the leader of 600 men in the service of David (2 S. 15:18, emended text; see ITTAI, 1), and on one occasion had equal rank with Joab and Abishai (18:2). Rehoboam is said to have fortified Gath (2 Ch. 11:8); but Uzziah, according to 2 Ch. 26:6, found Gath still a Philistine city, and when warring against the Philistines 'broke down the wall of Gath.' About fifty years earlier the Syrian king Hazael is said to have taken Gath as a preliminary to the siege of Jerusalem (2 K. 12:17). In Am. 6:2 (a passage later than the time of Amos; see AMOS, § 6 δ) reference seems to be made to another disaster that befell Gath—a disaster similar to, and nearly contemporaneous with, that which befell Calneh in 738 and Hamath in 720. The presumption, therefore, is, that Gath, as well as Ashdod, was taken by Sargon in 711. This is indeed attested as a historical fact by Sargon himself, who says, 'Asdudu, Gimtu, Asdudimmu³ I besieged, I conquered' (Khorsabad inscr., 104 f.). That Gimtu (= Gath) is here mentioned between Ashdod and the port of Ashdod (?) is probably no mere error of a scribe, but indicates that Gath then formed part of the Ashdodite territory (see ASHDOD). This may perhaps explain the fact that Amos (16-8), Zeph. (24), Jer. (? 47:5), and II. Zech. (9:5 f.) make no mention of Gath among the Philistine cities; it had fallen to a secondary position.

We also find Gath mentioned in a fragmentary context in 2 S. 21:20 22 (David's war with the Philistines). This derives plausibility from the fact that Goliath was certainly a Gittite. ⁴BA and Pesh. (Grā.) also read 'Gath' for 'Gob' in v. 18 (C^L γαζέθ), and Grätz would read 'Gath' for 'Gob' in v. 19 (see GOB).

'Gath' is referred to also in 1 S. 17:52 (cp C^B; see H. P. Smith), and in the elegy of David (2 S. 1:20), a reminiscence of which has produced the doubtless incorrect reading in Mic. 1:10, גַּתֵּינִי, 'Tell it not in Gath.' C^B agrees in reading 'in Gath,' and introduces a reference in the next clause to οὐ ἀνακειμύ [Sw. οὐ ἐν ἀκειμύ], 'the Anakim.' Elhorst and Winckler (AT Unterr. 185) would read גַּתֵּינִי אֶל־גִּלְגַּל, 'in Gilgal rejoice not'; Cheyne, for the sake of geographical consistency, גַּתֵּינִי אֶל־גִּלְגַּל, 'in Giloh rejoice not' (JQR 10 573 f. [198]).

'Gath of Philistia' (as Am. 6:2 calls it) is very probably referred to (as Kn-tu) in the Palestinian list of Thotmes III., nos. 63, 70, 93 (RP⁽²⁾ 5 48⁴), and (as Gimti and Ginti) in the Amarna tablets (1838 a; 1856). Am. Tab. 1838 a will be referred to again (see GEZER, § 1); it states that the warriors of Gazri (Gezer), Gimti (Gath), and Kilti (Keilah) have joined together to attack the land of Rubuti and of Urusalim (Jerusalem). The sites of Gazri, Kilti, and Urusalim are known; those of Gimti and Rubuti have to be investigated. Gimti ought to lie between Gazri and Urusalim, and it ought to be not less important a fortress than these places.

The biblical evidence with regard to the site of Gath

⁴ This can hardly be doubted. See WMM As. u. Eur. 393 (cp 159); E. Meyer, 'Glossen' in Aegyptiaca, 73.

is not as decisive as could be wished. The most definite passage is 2 Ch. 116-10, where, in the list of the cities fortified by Rehoboam, Gath occurs after Soco and Adullam and before Mareshah and Ziph. If, however, the Chronicler means the Philistine Gath, one cannot help thinking that he is in error (Jos. seems to call this place εσσα, or πσα); such an error might account for the name Betogabra borne by Eleutheropolis at a later time (see ELEUTHEROPOLIS, § i). Such a name as 'Wine-press-town,' however, may surely have been borne by more than two places in S. Palestine. Conder speaks of a large ruin called Jenneta, S. of Bêt Jibrin, which he proposes for the Kn-tu in the list of Thotmes III. (no. 70). From 1 S. 17⁵² (RV GAI [q.v.]) we gather simply that Gath lay more inland than Ekron.

The notices of Eus. and Jer. (*OS*² 244-20, 127 r5) are so confused that we are driven to suppose that they had no exact knowledge of the site of the Philistine city. Josephus (Ant. v. 122) places Gath within the tribe of Dan, and couples it with Jamnia; the Crusaders actually identified the two places.

At present there are two sites which have been defended by geographers of repute. M. Clermont-Ganneau (PEFQ, July '99, p. 204) has lately revived the theory of Thomson (LB, 564) and Tristram (Bible Places) that Gath, Eleutheropolis, and Bêt Jibrin are the same place. The most plausible argument is derived from the name Moresheth-Gath (Mic. 1¹⁴), which is thought to suggest that Mareshah was a suburb of Gath. Mareshah, however, was no mere suburb; and if 'Gath' in Mic. 1¹⁴ is correct, we must regard it, with Wellhausen (*Kl. Proph.*¹), as a vocative, and render 'Therefore must thou, O Gath, give farewell gifts to Moresheth.' More probably, however, הַת is a corruption of הַב (cp Chc. JQR 10576 ff., and see MORASTHITE).

There is only one site that seems to meet all the requirements of the case; it is worth mentioning, even if Dr. Bliss's excavations should one day prove it to be the wrong one. It is Tell es-Sâfiyeh¹ (collis clarus, William of Tyre), the Blanca guarda of the Crusaders, a tall white cliff 300 ft. above the valley of Elah, 18 m. from Ashkelon, 12 from Ashdod, and 6 from Eleutheropolis. J. L. Porter made a careful topographical study of Philistia in 1858 with the result that he convinced himself of the claims of Tell es-Sâfiyeh to be the ancient Gath. Some of our best geographers have followed him, though others prefer to keep Tell es-Sâfiyeh for the Mizpeh of Josh. 15³⁸. The objection of Sir C. Warren (Hastings, DB 2114a) that the sites of other Philistine fenced cities 'do not present any natural features capable of defence,' does not seem decisive. The disappearance of Gath from history is surely not more surprising than many other sudden blows to flourishing fortified cities.

'The site,' says Porter, 'is a most commanding one, and would form, when fortified, the key of Philistia. It is close to the mountains of Judah. The Tell is about 200 ft. high, with steep sides, now in part terraced for vineyards—Gath signifies a wine-press.' 'On the summit are the foundations of an old castle, probably that built, or rebuilt, by the Crusaders; and all around the hill are great quantities of old building stones. On the N.E. is a projecting shoulder, and the declivities below it appear to have been scarped. Here stands the modern village. Its houses are all composed of ancient materials, and around it are ruins and fragments of columns. In the sides of the hill, especially towards the S., a great number of cisterns have been excavated in the limestone rock' (Kittó's Bibl. Cycl. 276; cp Porter, Handbk. for S and P, 252).

Dr. Bliss's first report of his exploration of Tell es-Sâfiyeh (PEFQ, July '99) leaves it quite uncertain whether Gath was, or was not, on this interesting and important site. Inscriptions, however, such as will determine the point, may be reasonably hoped for. Dr. Bliss states ('Second Report,' PEFQ, Oct. '99) that the boundary of the ancient city on the S., E., and W. has been determined by the discovery of a massive rampart. The town was irregular in shape, measuring about 400 yds. in maximum length and about 200 yds. in maximum breadth, and thus contained a space about six times the size of the fort on

Tell Zakariyâ (Azekab?). The city walls are 12 ft. thick; they are built without mortar, like those at Tell Zakariyâ, but are twice as thick and twice as high; they are preserved in places to a height of 33 ft., and show a system of buttresses regularly spaced. They rest not on the rock, but on some 6 ft. to 10 ft. of débris, which is characterised by very early pre-Israelitish pottery. As their massive foundations must have been sunk in a considerable quantity of soil, we gather that they were not erected much before Jewish times. The gate has still to be found. At the N.E. of the Tell, at a depth of from 18 to 20 ft., has been discovered what appears to be a primitive sanctuary, with three standing stones, or menhirs, surrounded by a rude enclosure (cp WRS *Rel. Sem.*² 200 ff.); it is shown by the pottery to belong to what Dr. Bliss calls the later pre-Israelite period. It is unnecessary to give details of minor discoveries. It is much to be regretted that the position of the village and the cemeteries prevents a complete examination of the site of Tell es-Sâfiyeh, which must certainly have been occupied by a fortress long before the appearance of the Israelites and the Philistines.

GATH-HEPHER (גַּתְּהֶפֶר; ΓΕΘΗΟΦΕΡ [B], ΓΕΘΟΦΡΑ [L]; cp HEPHER), a place on the border of Zebulun, where the prophet Jonah was born (2 K. 14²⁵, ΓΕΘ ΔΥΟΦΕΡ [A]), mistakenly called GITTAH-HEPHER in AV of Josh. 19¹³ (RV, Gath-hepher; ΓΕΒΕΡΕ [B], ΓΑΙΘΘΑ [A], ΓΕΘΘΑΕ ΦΕΡ [L]); Jerome (Proem. in Jon.) says that the tomb of Jonah was shown in his day at the small village (haud grandis viculus) of Geth, 2 R. m. from Sepphoris on the road to Tiberias. In Talm. Jer. (Shêbêt 6 r) the place is called Hopher¹; a disciple of the school of Sepphoris could live at Hopher, because the two places were not 12 m. apart. Benjamin of Tudela (12th cent.) states that the tomb of Jonah lay on a mountain near Sepphoris. These data seem to point to the village of el-Meshhed, about 3 m. N.E. from Nazareth and 2 E. by S. from Sepphoris, where a tomb of Jonah is shown; the place lies between Yafâ (Japhia) and Rummâneh (Rimmon), as Gath-hepher did, according to Josh. 19^{12f}.

GATH-RIMMON (גַּתְרִמּוֹן). 1. A Danite town (Josh. 19⁴⁵, γεθρεμμων [BAL]), assigned to the Levites (Josh. 21²⁴, γεθρεμμων [B]). On the apparent misstatement of 1 Ch. 6⁵⁴ [69] (γεθρωων [B]) see DAN, § 8. Gath-rimmon must have lain a little to the E. of Joppa. In OS 246⁵⁹ it is placed between Diospolis and Eleutheropolis; but this is too far S. A γεθθα (Gath), however, is mentioned (OS 246⁷³) as situated between Antipatris and Jamnia, and as otherwise called γεθθαμ. Nobel suggests that this may be the GITTAIM of the OT; and our Gath-rimmon. There is a city called Giti-rim[u]n? in Am. Tab. 164⁴⁵.

2. A miswritten name in text of Josh. 21²⁵ (γεβαθα [B], βαθσα [A], but γεθρεμμων [L]). Gath-rimmon occurs in v. 24. The true reading must be either Beth-shean (בֵּית־שֵׁעַן), which is supported by Ⓞ^B (בֵּית־שֵׁעַן) and Ⓞ^A (בֵּית־שֵׁעַן), or, less probably, Bileam (1 Ch. 6⁵⁵ [70]—i.e., IBLEAM [q.v.]). Dillmann prefers the latter; but we want a compound name corresponding to Gath-rimmon. בֵּית־שֵׁעַן can easily have become גַּתְרִמּוֹן. Beth-shean and Ibleam are both mentioned in Josh. 17¹¹.

The most southern (2 K. 188) of the five chief cities of Philistia (1 S. 6¹⁷; cp Zeph. 24 Zech. 9⁵), mentioned in the lists of Rameses II. and III. (*RP*² 627 4r). In primitive times it was the S. limit of the AVVIM [I]

(Dt. 23), and afterwards was regarded as the most southern point of Palestine (Judg. 64; cp Gen. 1019), and of the province W. of the Euphrates (1 K. 424 [54] [G^{BAL} omit]).

According to Judg. 118 (γαζα [A*vid]) it was conquered by the tribe of Judah; but this verse is inconsistent with v. 19, and is based on a misunderstood gloss (see Budde's note). In Josh. 15 17 (R) Gaza is assigned to Judah; but this late passage has no historical authority. The enigmatical AVVA (AV AVA) in 2 K. 17 24, and IYVAH in 2 K. 18 34 19 13 Is. 37 13, should very possibly be Azzah=Gaza (גזא for גזי). See AVVA.

Gaza is mentioned once again in Judges (161-3); the passage has a twofold interest, legendary (see GATE) and topographical. An error has made its way into the text, which can perhaps be corrected; this we shall reserve for the close of the article. The next reference of interest (for 1 K. 424 [54] is late and unimportant) is concerned with Hezekiah's victory over the Philistines 'as far as Gaza' (2 K. 188). This victory is probably connected with the circumstance that Hezekiah sympathised with Ashdod in its rebellion against Assyria (713-711 B.C.), whereas Gaza remained quiet. Hezekiah's success against Gaza, however, was not lasting, for in 701 Sennacherib transferred a part of the territory of Judah to his faithful vassal Šil-Bel (?) of Gaza.¹ This strong city, however, had not always been so devoted to Assyria. In 734 B.C. Hanun sought, though in vain, to resist Tiglath-pileser, and in 720 Sargon in his turn had to take the field against this same king. How ill Hanun fared at the battle of Raphia is well known (see SARGON).

What happened to Gaza we are not told; but if the emendation of 2 K. 18 34, etc., proposed above be accepted, Sargon carried away the idols of Gaza, or, at any rate, introduced Ašur as the supreme deity. (The local deity of Gaza was called Marna, 'Lord' or 'our Lord.') So much at any rate would be implied by the words, 'Where are the gods of Hamath and of Arpad—of Sepharvaim and of Azzah [Gaza]?' Regardful of its commerce, Gaza seems from this time forward to have been punctual in its payment of tribute. Nabuna'id says that all his vassals as far south as Gaza contributed to the building of the temple at Harran (355 B.C.).

In the prophets there are three references to Gaza. Of these, Am. 16 f. is the only one that is undoubtedly genuine. Gaza is there threatened with punishment for delivering up Hebrew slaves to Edom, a country with which it naturally had close trade relations. Zeph. 24-6 is without a historical point of contact, and may therefore be a late insertion, framed on old models (see ZEPHANIAH ii.); so also Jer. 47 1-7 (where the heading is late; only Q^{mg} of G has γάζαν), and Zech. 9 5 (see JEREMIAH ii.; ZECHARIAH ii.). Herodotus, writing probably in the time of Nehemiah, calls the city of Gaza καθύρις; he says that it seemed to him not inferior to Sardis (3 5).²

In the NT there is one reference to Gaza (§ 3); but before referring to it we must briefly sketch the later history of the city. Its name means 'the strong'; and this strength is illustrated by its resistance for five months (332 B.C.) to the powerful engines employed by Alexander in besieging it (Arrian, Alex. 226 f.; Q. Curt. iv. 67); Strabo (as quoted next col., n. 5) states that it was destroyed at this time, and that it 'remained deserted' until his day. If, however, Strabo wrote this, he committed an error, for Gaza was a strong place in the wars of the Ptolemies and Seleucidæ, and is mentioned as such in the story of Jonathan the Maccabee (1 Macc. 11 61 f.).³

It was razed to the ground by the fierce Alexander Jannæus after a year's siege (Ant. xiii. 133). Gabinus, governor of Syria, rebuilt it (Ant. xiv. 53); Augustus gave it to Herod (Ant. xv. 73), after whose death it was annexed to the province of Syria (Ant. xvii. 114). In 65 A.D. it was destroyed by the Jews (BJ ii. 181), but soon recovered. Mela (temp. Claudius) calls it 'ingens urbs et munita admodum'; Eusebius (*OS*²) 242

62) says that it 'even now remains, a notable city of Palestine.' The most southern fortress of the Crusaders, however, was not Gaza, but Daroma, —i.e., Dër el-Balah, S. of Gaza, near the Egyptian frontier.¹ See further, GASm. HG 187-189.

We now turn to the much-disputed passage, Acts 826. As Philip was starting to meet the Ethiopian eunuch,

3. Acts 826 an angel said to him, 'Arise, and go toward the south unto the way that goeth down from Jerusalem unto Gaza: the same is desert' (so RV)—αὐτῆ ἐστὶν ἐρημος. Many commentators (e.g., Holtzmann and Blass) suppose one of the roads from Jerusalem to Gaza to be meant. This view is best supported by Robinson (BR 2640 ff.).

The most frequented at the present day, although the longest, is the way by Ramleh. Anciently, there appear to have been two more direct roads; one down the great Wādy es-Sarār by Beth-shemesh, and then passing near Tell es-Sāfiyeh; the other to Gaza through a more southern tract. Both these roads exist at the present day; and the latter now actually passes through the desert; that is, through a tract of country without villages, inhabited only by nomadic Arabs.²

It is not, however, the most natural interpretation of αὐτῆ ἐστὶν ἐρημος that these remarks presuppose. If the phrase were ἡ ἐστὶν ἐρημος, Robinson's view would be very much more plausible. We could not, indeed, illustrate by Arrian's words (bk. 3, p. 211) referring to the time of Alexander, ἐρήμην δ' εἶλαι τὴν ὄδον δι' ἀνορθίαν (quoted by Wetstein), because the narrator expressly says that there was water to be found on the road,³ so that the eunuch could be baptized.

The word 'this' (αὐτῆ), however, must surely mean Gaza,⁴ not the road to Gaza, and then the difficulty arises that Gaza in the time of Philip was (as we have seen) a large and flourishing city. Hug's explanation that the words αὐτῆ κ.τ.λ. refer to the destruction of Gaza by the Jews in 65 A.D., mentioned by Josephus (BJ ii. 181), is forced; what object would the notice serve? It has often been held (e.g., by Erasmus) that after Old Gaza had been destroyed, the new city was built on another site. G. A. Smith (HG 187) defends this with much plausibility. He thinks that the road to Egypt passed by the deserted Gaza, not by the new city, which was nearer the sea (but does not this involve an unnatural use of αὐτῆ?). And even if old Gaza were not absolutely deserted in Philip's time—even if the fine position had drawn people back, yet 'the name ἐρημος might stick to it.' Evidently this is not quite satisfactory. If Gaza were characterised at all, some other epithet than ἐρημος would have been used, at least if the notice αὐτῆ κ.τ.λ. comes from the writer of Acts. But does it really come from that writer?

From Beza's time to our own the words have repeatedly been viewed as a gloss, and it can hardly be denied that the clearness of the narrative gains by their omission. Schmiedel⁴ suggests that they may have a purely literary origin, and that the marginal note of a man who knew, perhaps from Strabo,⁵ that Gaza had been destroyed, and wondered that the road to a deserted city should be mentioned.

The only alternative to treating the words as a gloss seems to be to suppose a lacuna in the text, and to read αὐτῆ ἐστὶ πλησίον τῆς ἐρήμου, 'the same is near the desert' (whence the Ethiopian eunuch comes).

From its position as the last town on the road to Egypt Gaza was bound to be a place of importance (cp GASm. HG 184). Even now

4. Site, etc. it has tolerable bazaars, resorted to by native travellers.

³ So Wetstein, who thinks that the narrator remarks the coincidence that the prefect of the treasure (γάζα) was on the road to Gaza. He also quotes ancient authors who state that Gaza was so named from its riches.

⁴ Theol. Z. aus der Schweiz, 98, p. 50 f.

⁵ Strabo xvi. 230, ἐνδοξὸς ποτὲ γενομένην, κατεσπασμένη δ' ἐπὶ Ἀλεξάνδρου, καὶ μένουσα ἐρημος. The correctness of the last three words, however, is disputed. Jos. (BJ ii. 181) remarks that when Gabinus rebuilt Gaza, it had been 'long time desert.'

GAZA

The modern town (Ghazza) consists of four quarters, resembling so many large villages. Of these, one stands on the flat top of a hill, whilst the others are on the plain below.¹ The hill, within which no doubt are the ruins of successive cities, is crowned by the great mosque which was originally a Christian church, built by the Crusaders out of ancient materials. The town has no walls; but the sites of gates remain, and one of them (see below) is actually shown as that of the gate famous in the story of Samson (GATE). Broad, yellow sandhills separate Gaza from the sea; the sand is steadily encroaching on the cultivated ground. However, between the sand and a long ridge of low hills parallel to the coast the fertile soil produces abundance of the choicest fruit and vegetables. A large and magnificent olive grove, said to be of great antiquity, stretches to the northward; orchards of fruit and palm trees encompass the suburbs.²

The exact site of ancient Gaza is doubtful. It is certain, however, that the town stood on a hill in the time of Alexander, and this hill may have been that on which the main part of the modern Gaza stands.

'Broad mounds,' says Conder, 'surround this eminence, and appear in the middle of the buildings.' The ruins among the sandhills seem to be those of the ancient Majumas or port. 'A beautiful garden of lemons, surrounded by a mound, seems to mark the site of this second town; near it is a ruined jetty on the seashore.'³

Samson's gate, referred to above, is on the SE., and, riding farther for a mile, we come to the hill of el-Muntār, which commands a wide view over the whole plain away to the distant mountains that encircle Hebron. It is the highest point in the ridge of hills on the E., and is pointed out as the hill (הר) to which Samson carried the gate. Porter and Conder accept this as the 'real site.' Gautier, too (Souv. 128), thinks that el-Muntār must be the mound which the biblical narrator had in view. But how should the giant have got tired so soon? and how can 'before Hebron' mean 'looking towards the distant Hebron mountains'? 'Hebron,' however, is an improbable reading. The Danite champion would naturally keep to the SW. of Palestine. Probably the true reading in Judg. 163 is 'before Sharuhēn,' not 'before Hebron.' On the site of Sharuhēn, or Shaaraim, see SHARUHEN.

GAZARA (so RV always), GAZERA (Γαζαρά[Ν] [ANV]); one of the three chief fortresses of Judæa in the early Maccabæan story. Judas the Maccabee pursued Gorgias as far as Gazera (1 Macc. 415 γασσηρω [A], γαζ. [NV]). Bacchides, the adversary of Jonathan, fortified it against the Jews (952; Jos. Ant. xiii. 13), and among the exploits of his great successor Simon, the conquest of this stronghold takes a leading place (1 Macc. 1343-48; 4 cp 147 [γασσηρω, ANV], 33 ff. [γαρζαν, N*], 1528 35 [γασσηρω, A]).

A different account of this event is given in 2 Macc. 1032-38. The writer, who is opposed to Simon because he assumed the high-priestly dignity, transfers this achievement to his hero Judas, whose behaviour is so described as to contrast with the conduct ascribed to Simon in the authentic historical record of 1 Macc. (see Koster, Th. T. 1878, p. 519 f.; MACCABEES, SECOND, § 2 f.). Josephus (Ant. xiii. 6792; B. i. 22), as might be expected, follows the account given in 1 Macc.; nor can we attach any historical importance to the strongly biased statement of 2 Macc.

On obtaining possession of Gazara Simon installed his son John there as commander-in-chief of the Jewish forces (see MACCABEES i., § 7). Gazara or Gazera is of course the same place as GEZER (q.v., § 1). There is no occasion to seek for a second Gazara in order to avoid a discrepancy between 1 Macc. and 2 Macc.

GAZELLE, the better rendering of גֵּזֵל (גֵּזֵל, fem. גֵּזֵלָה, gēyāh; δοκάς [BAFL]), adopted by RV in Dt. 1215 22 145 1522 1 K. 423 [53] (ll גֵּזֵל, ayyāl; see HART), and by RV^{mg}. in Is. 1314 (δοκάδιον, Ⓞ) Prov. 65 etc.¹ for AV ROE (q.v.).

The gazelle—the word is derived through the Ar. gāzāl—was known to Assyrians, Aramæans and Arabians alike under the cognate forms sabitu, ṭabyā, and zabyū respectively; it is still common in all the country S. of Lebanon, and extends into N. Africa, and Asia Minor.

The modern representative Gazella dorcas is commonly known in Arabia as the thobby (cp Doughty, Ar. Des., Index, s.v.). It stands two feet in height at the shoulder, and its horns, which are lyrate, attain a length of 13 inches. In the broad sandy plains it is white in colour, but in the volcanic districts dark gray, closely approaching the colour of basalt (Ar. Des. 1328 395). For other species see ANTELOPE.

The gazelle has always been remarkable for its graceful appearance² and its extraordinary speed (cp 2 S. 218 1 Ch. 128). It is usually found in small herds, and is hunted at the present day by the Arabs with dogs and falcons. The 'chased gazelle' was a frequent sight not only in Palestine (Is. 1314 Prov. 65), but also in Assyria, and Egypt (see illustration in Riehm's HWB 1669).

The flesh of the gazelle was eaten by the Hebrews (1 K. 423 [53] Dt. 145); but the animal was not accepted as a sacrifice (Dt. 1215 22 1522)—even among the Arabs a gazelle is regarded as an inferior substitute for a sheep (We. Heid. (2) 115). Whatever be the origin of this usage, it can scarcely be due, at all events, to the belief that so common an animal would be an unworthy sacrifice.

Abundant analogy suggests that an animal that may be eaten, but not sacrificed, possessed, at an early period, a sacred character, and also was associated closely with some deity.³ Now in Arabia there were herds of sacred gazelles at Tabāla and Mecca, even in the time of Islam (We. Heid. (2) 106, cp WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 466), and it was told of the clan Harīth of S. Arabia that when they come across a dead gazelle they wash and bury it, and the whole tribe mourn over it for seven days (Rel. Sem. (2) 444). The latter practice implies either that the members of the tribe considered themselves of one kin with it, or that it was to them a deity (cp the weeping for ADONIS [q.v.]).⁴ The gazelles of Mecca were probably connected with the cult of el-Uzza, who is usually identified with Aphrodite (Venus, Ash-toreth), and Robertson Smith points out that among the Sabæans the antelope was connected with the worship of 'Athar (see ASHTORETH, § 3), and has been found figured upon coins from the Phœnician Laodicea⁵ along with the star and the dove, symbols of Ashtoreth (Kin. 194 f.). Was the gazelle sacred to Ashtoreth?

Personal names derived from the gazelle are found in the Ar. clan-name Zabyān, the S. Judean ZIBIAH (cp also ZIBIA), and the later DORCAS and TABITHA. See further GOAT.

GAZER (גֵּזֵר), 2 S. 525 AV, RV GEZER.

GAZEZ (גֵּזֵז)⁶ is twice mentioned in 1 Ch. 246, as a son of Caleb h. Hezron by his concubine Ephah, and as the son of Caleb's son Haran; 1 Ch. 246 (ὁ γεζουε [BA], ὁ γαζε, but in 46 ὁ γαζας [L], גֵּזֵז [Pesh.]). Pesh., omitting all mention of Moza and (the first) Gazez, presents the simple genealogical series, Caleb, Haran, and Gazez. Houbigant supposes the second Gazez to be an error for JAHDAI (v. 47).

On the confusions between Geba and Gibeah see GIBEAH, § 1.

During the Philistine domination there was a triumphal 'pillar' (see SAUL) at Geba (1 S. 13 3; τῷ βουνῷ [BL; A om.]), the primitive sanctity of which place is shown by its second title (according to a probable interpretation of 1 S. 10 5 [G τὸν βουνόν]; see GIBEAH, § 2 [3]), 'Gibeah of God.' The pillar was probably dedicated to the god of the Philistines. It was from Geba that JONATHAN started on the daring enterprise described in 1 S. 14; the expressions of v. 5 prove that Geba was on the S. and Michmash on the N. of a ravine; the ravine is the wild glen of Suweinî; and Geba must consequently be the modern Jeba'. Under ASA [g.v.] Geba was fortified with the stones and timber with which Baasha had begun the fortification of Ramah (1 K. 15 22 = 2 Ch. 16 6). So at least the present text states. It is a question, however, whether either Gibeah (Buhl, Pal. 171) or Gibeon may not rather be meant.

In 1 K. 15 22 G (πᾶν τὸν Λ) βουνὸν βετιαμὴν certainly favours Gibeah; Geba, Gibeah, and Gibeon are easily confounded. Nor can we in any case be quite sure that Geba from this period forward marked the N. limit of the southern kingdom,¹ Zech. 14 10 ('from Geba to Rimmon') and 2 K. 23 8 (in its present form) not being of pre-exilic origin. It may also be noted that in Is. 10 28-32, which describes the route of a northern invader, the writer takes an equal interest in the fate of Aiath (Ai), Geba, and Jerusalem.² It may plausibly be inferred that Ai was near the border of Judah when this passage was written, and we know that Josiah claimed sovereign authority over Bethel, NW. of Ai—Jeba' is about 5½ m. N. from Jerusalem; it stands on the top of a rocky ridge, commanding an extensive view, especially towards Dêr Dirwân (near Ai) and eṭ-Tayyibeh. The large hewn stones that appear in the foundations and walls of the houses are evidently ancient.

2. (γαῖβαι [B], -av [N], ταιβαν [A]), a place in N. Palestine, between which and Scythopolis Holofernes is said to have encamped (Judith 3 10). According to Grove (Smith's DB⁽¹⁾ 1659) it is the modern Jeba', in a strong position, 3 m. N. of Samaria on the road to Jenn (En-gannim); but this is not near enough to Scythopolis; the place was N. of Dothan (see v. 9). It is perhaps rather ENGANNIM [g.v., 2], the Γιννα of Josephus, which is on the boundary between the mountains of Samaria and the plain of Esdraelon. Cp, however, Buhl, 210. T. K. C.

GEBAL (גֵּבָל, 'mountain-height,' probably a false vocalisation for gûbâl; cp Ass. gubli, gubla), the Byblus of the Greeks, and, according to ancient legends, one of the oldest places of the habitable globe, still survives in the small maritime village Sebeil,³ S. of el-Batrûn (Botrys) and about 4 m. N. of Nahr Ibrâhîm (the river Adonis). It is rich in archæological remains, dating from the early times of Egyptian suzerainty; cp Renan, Miss. de Phén. 153 ff.; Baed. Pal.⁽³⁾ 386, and on its religious associations esp. Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 172 ff.

² Grove (Smith's DB⁽¹⁾ 1659 a) argues from the reference to the bivouac (בִּיבּוּאָ) at Geba that this place is mentioned 'as the northern boundary' of Judah. This seems rather arbitrary.

Like all Phœnicians the men of Gebal were renowned sailors, and were skilled in shipbuilding (cp Ezek. 27 9, βυβλοιοι [B*Q^{mg.}], βι. [B¹vid.AQ^a], γαῖβαλ βυβλωῖω [Q^{mg.}]), a reputation of many centuries' standing. The Egyptian K^uq^ui (k=ג, q=ב, n=ל) is already a well-known seaport (see WMM Is. u. Eur. 188 ff.). Gebal is frequently mentioned in the Amarna tablets (Gubal, Gubla) and in the later cuneiform inscriptions. The names of some of its kings have been preserved. These are Tâ-kâ-ru-b'-râ in the Egyptian Pap. Golenischeff (Is. u. Eur. 395 f.), cp Punic Sicharbas (both = וברבעל; וברבעל); Si-bi-it-ti-bi-li (שבועת-בעל?) temp. Tiglath-pileser III.; Mil-ki-a-ša-pa (מלכיאשת), temp. Esarhaddon; and U-ru-mil-ki (ארומלך, ancestor of הגליל below), temp. Sennacherib.

Apart from the passage in Ezekiel (above) further reference to Gebal in the OT is obscure. Were the Gebaltes, as RV supposes, employed by Solomon as stone-masons in the building of the temple, 1 K. 5 18 [21] (הַבְּנֵי) or rather הַבְּנֵי, cp above)? The specific mention of Gehal after the 'builders of Hiram' is strange and unnatural. AV's rendering 'stone-squarers' is equally unreliable, and the suggested emendation הַבְּנֵי, 'and they bordered them' (Then, Klo., Benz., cp Ges.-Buhl, and BDB, s.v.), finds scanty support.¹ Again, in Josh. 13 5, the land of the GIBALITES (ΑΒΑΛΙΤΕΣ; την γῆν γαλιαθ φυλακιστευμ [B], τ. γ. γαβλι φ. [A], τ. γ. γαβλι φυλακιστευμ [L]) is mentioned by D₂ as one of the confines of the land unconquered by Israel. Di. (cp also Bennett, SBOT) has already pointed out that the present MT is corrupt, and reads הַבְּנֵי הַגְּבָלִי (ער). It seems probable, however, that הַבְּנֵי (הַבְּנֵי) has corruptly arisen from the following הַבְּנֵי; we have no reason to suppose that Gebal was the name of a district in D's time. The difficulty is evaded in a different manner by Bu., Steuernagel, who read הַבְּנֵי הַגְּבָלִי.

Gebal, famous as the birthplace of Philo, was formerly the centre of the Tammuz cult. Already in the Egyptian period it was under the patronage of Hathor-Astarte, with whom we may compare the billi ša Gubla of frequent occurrence in Am. Tab., and בעלת גבל upon the well-known Phœnician inscription of Yehawmelek (יהואמלך), king of Byblus (CYS 1, no. 1). There may be an allusion to the 'Lady of Gebal' in Is. 10 4, where, according to the emended text (see Lag. Academy, 15th Dec. 1870), the (northern) Israelites are taunted with their futile attempts to propitiate Phœnician, Egyptian, and Assyrian (Babylonian) deities. The words are:

Beltis has sunk down, Osiris is broken,
And under the slain they fall.

The first line of the couplet seems to have taken the place of some effaced words; it represents, therefore, the thoughts of a writer later than Isaiah (cp Am. 5 26). By Beltis (the female counterpart of BEL) he means the goddess of Gebal, whose cultus was fused with that of the Egyptian Isis (see Che. 'Isaiab,' SBOT, ad loc.). S. A. C.

GEBAL (גֵּבָל). Among the enemies of Israel enumerated in Ps. 83 7 [8] (גַּבְלִים [B], ΓΑΒΛΑΛ [N^{c.a.}(?R)], ΓΕΒΔΑΛ [A(?R)T])² we find the name of Gebal. This has long ago been identified with Jibāl, the term used by Arabic writers, and even by the Arabs of the present day, to designate the northern part of Mount Seir, the ancient home of the Edomites. The Arabic name Jibāl, which means simply 'mountains,' 'mountain country,' probably came into use at the time when the Arabic-speaking Nabatæans took possession of the country in question, while the Edomites settled in southern Judæa

GEBER

In Jos. (Ant. ii. 12 and iii. 21) the country is called γαβολίτις, a form with a peculiar vocalisation; but the same writer employs γαβαλίται as the nomen gentile (Ant. ix. 91). Eus. (OS) several times mentions γαβαλίτις (so apparently Steph. Byz. (Jos. Ant. iii. 21)) as well as γαβαλαήνη and γαβαλαϊτική. The name is likewise found often in the Targums, somewhat rarely in the Pesh.,¹ to represent the Heb. גֵּבֵר (SEIR). T. N.

GEBER (גֵּבֵר), 'a man,' see NAMES, § 64, and on vocalisation, § 6.

1. The son of Geber or, better, BEN-GEBER (so AVmg. and RV) was prefect of Argob under Solomon (1 K. 413; υἱὸς γαβερ [BA], υἱ. γαβερ-[L], γαβαρης [Jos. Ant. viii. 23]). See RAMOTH-GILEAD (2).

2. Geber b. Uri, prefect of the land of Gad (so 6BA; MT wrongly 'Gilead'), which is described further as 'the country of Sihon'² (1 K. 41819), υἱὸς ἀδαι [B], υἱ. ἀδαι [L], γαβερ υἱ. ἀδαι [A]. 'Uri' is hardly right. Klo. suggests 'Uriah' (2 S. 2338); but 6 suggests יִרְיָ, 'Iddo' (1 Ch. 621 [6], ἀδαι [B]); a Zechariah b. Iddo held another prefecture beyond Jordan (v. 14). HIDDAI (cp 6L-ἀδαι) is less probable. The close of the verse contains a great error. The Hebrew (with which contrast EV) has 'one prefect who was in the land—an imperfect and quite unintelligible clause. Ewald and Tg. read 'in the land of Judah'; but this leaves the most faulty part of the clause untouched—viz., that which precedes 'who' (וְיָשָׁר). Klo., who has done so much for this obscure section, reads 'and one (chief) prefect was over all the prefects who were in the land'; he also supplies the name of this chief prefect from v. 5, where we read, 'And Azariah b. Nathan was over the prefects.' T. K. C.

GEBIM (גֵּבִים), ΓΙΒΒΕΙΡ [BNAQ]), a place near Jerusalem, mentioned between Madmenah (?) and Nob (?), Is. 1031†. Eusebius and Jerome (*OS*² 2482 1305) identify it with Geba, 5 R. m. N. of Gophna, probably the mod. Jibiā, and Conder (Hastings' DB 2117 δ) approves this; but neither Jibiā nor el-Jib (usually held to be GIBEON [g.v., § 4]), with which Hitzig (cp PEFQ ('75) 183) identifies Gebim, is in the right district. No such place as Gebim is known elsewhere, and several names in Is. 1028-32 are probably, or even certainly, corrupt.

This name in particular ('the cisterns'?) is in itself improbable. It is proposed (SBOT, 'Isa.' Addenda) to read גֵּבִירִים—i.e., Bahurim; this place seems to have been not far from Jerusalem on the old road to Jericho. The emendation suits the mention of Anathoth in v. 30 and of the Mt. of Olives (if this is really referred to; see Nob) in v. 32. T. K. C.

GECKO (גֵּכְוֹ), Lev. 1130† RV, AV FERRET [g.v.].

GEDALIAH (גְּדַלְיָהּ, and גְּדַלְיָהּ in 1. 4, 5; 'Yahwé is great,' § 38; found also on tombs near Nippur, time of Darius [Hilprecht]; [o] ΓΟΔΟΛΙΑC [BNAQL]).

1. b. Ahikam b. Shaphan, a Jewish governor of Judah (under Nebuchadrezzar), who resided at Mizpah. A man of upright character, trusted alike by Jews and by Chaldeans, he was cruelly murdered, as a nominee of the hated Babylonians, together with the Chaldeans who were about him. One of the traders of the Jewish guerilla bands (Johanan b. Kareah) heard of the plot against the governor's life, and warned him; but in vain. He was treacherously slain by ISHMAEL [g.v., 2], who, with ten companions, had been entertained by the governor. Johanan pursued the murderer, but was only able to deliver the Jewish captives whom Ishmael had carried off (2 K. 2522 Jer. 40 [6 47] 5-41 [6 48] 16; in Jer. 408 γαλαδιαν [Q^{mg}], 411 f. הַלִּיגִי גֹלְיָהּ [N*]). See AMMON, § 5 (end); ISHMAEL, 2; ISRAEL, § 43; JEREMIAH.

2. b. Pashhur, a chief belonging to Jerusalem, temp. Jeremiah, Jer. 381 (γολίας [N*]).

3. h. Hezekiah, an ancestor of Zephaniah (Zeph. 11).

4. h. Jeduthun, 1 Ch. 253 (τοῦνα [B]) 9 (γαλουία [B]).

5. One of the b'ne JESHUA [g.v., ii., 5], Ezra 1018 (γαβαλεία [BA], γαβαλεία [N], -δαιας [L])=1 Esd. 919, JOADANUS (ιωδανος [B], ιωδαανος [A], ιαδδαιας [L], a corruption of γαβαλείας; see the form in 6L).

GEDDUR (ΓΕΔΔΟΥΡ [Λ]), 1 Esd. 530=Ezra 247, GIDDEL, 1; or GAHAR.

² The words, 'and of Og, king of Bashan,' are obviously an incorrect interpolation (see v. 13).

GEDOR

GEDEON (ΓΕΔΕΩΝ [A], ΓΕΔCΩΝ [N], om. B), Judith 81; also Heb. 1132 (ΓΕΔΕΩΝ [Ti. WH]); RV GIDEON [g.v.].

GEDER (גְּדֵר)—i.e., 'wall' or 'fortified place'; cp GEDERAH), one of the thirty-one royal Canaanite cities in the list of Joshua's conquests, mentioned with Gezer, Debir, Arad, and Libnah; Josh. 1213 (ἀει [B], ΓΔΔΕΡ [AL] and Eus. *OS*² 24427). BAAL-HANAN, 2, the Gederite (1 Ch. 2728, גְּדֵרִי, γεδωρείτης [B], γεδωρ [A], γεδωρείτης [L]), may have been a native of this place. See also BETH-GADER. It should be noted that in 1 Ch. 251 Beth-gader seems, according to one view of v. 55, to stand in close relation to Kirjath-sepher.

GEDERAH. 1. (גְּדֵרָה)—i.e., 'the enclosed [fortified] place,' cp Geder, ΓΔΔΕΙΡΑ [*OS*² 24537]. One of the towns in the lowland of Judah mentioned with Adullam, Socoh, Azekah, and Shaaraim (Josh. 1536 γαδρηα [BA], -cp. [L]). Its position agrees fairly with that of the Kh. Jedireh (see GEDEROTH); but more probably (see KIDRON, § 1) Gederah in Josh. 1536= κεδρων of 1 Macc. 1539=mod. Katra. The gentile Gederathite (1 Ch. 124: גְּדֵרָתִי, γαδαραθειειμ [B], γαδαρα [N], γαδρηωθι [AL]), applied to JOZABAD, [g.v., 1], may be derived from this place, or may refer to the Judahite GEDOR [g.v., 1].

2. Gederah (גְּדֵרָה) is mentioned with NETAIM (נֵטַיִם) in a singular account of a guild of brothers of the B'ne SHELAH [g.v., 1]; 1 Ch. 423 RV. AV, however, translates '(among) plants (net'aim) and hedges' (gederah); cp RVmg. (αζαειμ και γαβαρηα [B], ατα και γαδρηα [A], ετα και γαδειροις [L]). See SHELAH, 1.

GEDEROTH (גְּדֵרוֹת), Josh. 1541, or 'גְּדֵרָה', 2 Ch. 2818; ΓΔΔΗΡΩΘ [AL]), one of the third group (which includes Lachish, Eglon, and Lahmam) of lowland cities of Judah; Josh. 1541 (ΓΕΔΔΩΡ [B]). It is mentioned also in 2 Ch. 2818 (ΓΔΔΗΡΩ [B]) along with Bethshemesh, Aijalon, and Soco as having been taken from Ahaz by the Philistines. This collocation suggests that there may have been two cities of the same name, one lying more to the E. than the other. The more westerly is probably the κεδρων [ANV] of 1 Macc. 153941 169 (CEDRON, RV KIDRON, καιδρων [A] in 1539; χεβρων [N^{a-c,b}], κεδρω [VA], κεδρων [N*], in 1541), and the γεδρωθς [Gedrus] of Eusebius and Jerome (OS 12732 24539), defined by them as a very large village 10 R. m. from Lydda on the road to Eleutheropolis (cp Buhl, Pal. 188). This corresponds fairly well with the modern 'Katra 3½ m. S. by W. from 'Akir' (Ekron), or 'Ghedera about 4 m. SE. of Jabneh'; but the site seems to be too much in Philistine territory. The more easterly one may possibly be the Khirbet Jedireh (see PEF map, sheet 14) situated in close proximity to 'Ain-Shems (Beth-shemesh) and Yälö (Aijalon).

In Jer. 4117 for Geruth-chimham we should probably read Gidroth-chimham (see CHIMHAM).

GEDEROTHAIM (גְּדֵרוֹתַיִם), 'place of enclosures,' see NAMES, § 107), a place in the Shephelah of Judah, Josh. 1536†, in which passage 6BAL has kal al epaulais aut'ns, possibly through misunderstanding a mark of abbreviation in the Heb. (גְּדֵרָה).

Nöld. (Untersuch. 101) omits Gederothaim, as due to a corrupt repetition of Gederah; similarly Mühlau in Riehm's *HWB*².

GEDOR (גְּדוֹר,—i.e., 'enclosure'; ΓΕΔΩΡ [BAL]).

1. A city in the hill country of Judah; Josh. 1558 (γεδδωρ [B]), 1 Ch. 127 (γεδδωρ [NL]), the modern Jadur, a small ruin, 2890 feet above sea-level, 6½ m. N. from Hebron, somewhat westward of the road to Bethlehem, with which also should perhaps be identified the BETH-GADER (g.v.) of 1 Ch. 251.

In 1 Ch. 417 f. Gedor, Soco, and Zanoah are represented as second cousins of Eshtemoa; they were grandchildren of MEKED by his Jewish wife whilst Eshtemoa was his grandchild through his Egyptian (?) wife. In 1 Ch. 44 Gedor is brought into genealogical relationship with Bethlehem; in 1 Ch. 831 (δουρ [B], γεδουρ [A], γεδδωρ [L]) 937 (κεδουρ [B], γεδουρ [A], γεδδωρ [L]) with Gibeon.

2. For Gedor (גִּדּוֹר) in 1 Ch. 4:39 we ought to read with GERRAR (γεραρα [BAL]—i.e., גִּרָר). See SIMEON.

GE-HARASHIM (גִּישְׁרֵי הַיַּרְדֵּן), 1 Ch. 4:14 RV, and Gehaharashim (גִּישְׁרֵי הַיַּרְדֵּן), Neh. 11:35 RVmg. See CHARASHIM.

GEHAZI (גִּיזַי) and גִּיזַי = 'valley of vision'?, cp Is. 22:5; גִּיזַי [BAL], Gizzi; or perhaps rather GIHONI (גִּיחֹנִי), see VISION, VALLEY OF, § 76), the confidential servant (גִּישְׁרֵי) of Elisha. He is introduced twice in the story of the Shunammite woman (2 K. 4:12, 25-31); first as suggesting that the birth of a son would be the most acceptable return for her hospitality (vv. 13-15, however, seem to interrupt the text, and may come from another source; see KAT 392), and secondly as running before Elisha to lay the prophet's staff on the dead child's face. He is mentioned again at the close of the story of Naaman as fraudulently obtaining from the restored leper two talents of silver and two 'changes of raiment,'—i.e., sets of costly or holiday garments, and as being smitten with the 'leprosy of Naaman' (2 K. 5:20-27). See LEPROSY. Another narrative (8:4 f.), evidently out of chronological order (see especially Kue. Ond. i. b., § 25, n. 12 f.), represents Gehazi as engaged in familiar converse with a king of Israel who is questioning him on the great deeds of Elisha (see ELISHA, § 2). W. E. A.

GEHENNA (ΓΕΕΝΝΑ [Ti. WH]; also ΓΕΕΝΝΑ, but incorrectly, the word being derived from Aram. ܓܝܢܢܐ). On the original Hebrew expression, and on the position and history of the locality so designated, see HINNOM; and on eschatological developments, see ESCATOLOGY, §§ 10, f. 63 (3) 70 (iii. f.) 81 (3, iii.).

GELILOTH,—i.e., stone-circles (Josh. 18:17; ΓΑΛΙΛΑΩΘ [B], ΑΓΓΑΛΛΙΛΩΘ [A], ΓΑΛΙΛΩΘ [L]). See GILGAL, § 6 (b), and GALLIM, 2.

GEMALLI (גִּמְלִי), father of AMMIEL, 1. Nu. 13:12 (ΓΑΜΑΙ [B], ΓΑΜΑΛΙ [AL], Μ.ΛΙ [F]).

GEMARIAH (גִּמְרִיָּהּ, גִּמְרִיָּהּ, 'God accomplishes,' § 31; γαμαρ[ε]λας [BNAQ]).

1. The son of SHAPHAN and father of Michaiah, mentioned in connection with the reading of Jeremiah's prophecy by Baruch (Jer. 38:10, f. 12, 25).
2. b. Hilkiyah; he was sent by Zedekiah to Nebuchadrezzar and bore a letter of Jeremiah to the captive Jews (Jer. 29:3).

GENEALOGIES. The word 'genealogy' is frequently found in the ordinary sense of an enumeration of ancestors and descendants in the natural order of succession, in the EV of Chron.—1. Character-istics. Ezra-Neh., where גִּנְיָהּ (deriv. uncertain) 'genealogy' (Neh. 7:5f), and its denominative שְׁחִיבָה 'to reckon by genealogy,' are used to express the book and the act of registration respectively. The Hithpaal of גִּי is once found with the meaning 'to declare one's pedigree' in Nu. 1:18 [P], and the derivative toledōth (תּוֹלְדוֹת), 'generations,' is of frequent occurrence, especially in P in GENESIS (q.v., § 2), to denote genealogies properly so called. This is the sense in which the English word is used in RV of Heb. 7:3 (ἀγενεαλόγητος), ὁ (ὡς) γενεαλογούμενος).

To form a correct estimate of the nature and worth of OT genealogies we must remember that the terms of relationship are used in a wider sense among the Semites than with us. When two or more clans have a traditional sentiment of unity and regard each other as brothers (cp GOVERNMENT, § 9, end), this may be a survival from a time when the groups formed but one; on the other hand, a historical tradition of a common ancestor does not always necessarily follow, since,

1 ὁ renders γενεαλογεῖσθαι (1 Ch. 5:1), ἐγκαταλογίζεω (2 Ch. 31:18 [B]), καταλοχισμός (six times), καταλοχία (2 Ch. 31:18 [A]), ἀριθμός (four times); βιβλίον τῆς συνοδίας [BNA], β. τ. γενεαλογίας [L] for שְׁחִיבָה (Neh. 7:5). In Ezra 2:62 שְׁחִיבָה is simply transliterated as μεθωσσειμ (BA; but οἱ γενεαλογούντες in L). From שְׁחִיבָה are derived the later names of the books of Chron.—Ezra-Neh.; viz.—מגילות כתיב היחס—Bab. Bathra, 15a), ספר היחסים (Pes. 62).

according to Semitic custom, any covenant relation makes men brothers.¹

Other terms, 'father,' 'mother,' 'son,' and 'daughter,' are used in an equally wide sense (see KINSHIP, § 6, etc.). It is a common Semitic idiom to call a land or town the father or mother of its inhabitants or of its various divisions; thus Mizraim begets Ludim, etc. (Gen. 10:13), SALMA [q.v.] is the father of Beth-lehem (1 Ch. 25:1), the dependencies of Beth-shean are called its 'daughters' (Judg. 1:27; cp DAUGHTER), and the members of any guild or clan are frequently referred to as 'sons' (cp, e.g., sons of JEDUTHUN).² Observe also such notices as 'Gilead begat Jephthah' (Judg. 11:1b, based on vv. 1a 7; see Moore, SBOT, ad loc.).

Hence the scheme by which statistical information and geographical data are represented in the form of a narrative, or an ethnology, becomes perfectly intelligible (cp Gen. 10:22-24 25:1-4 13-16, and see below). It is always possible to put into the form of a genealogy the composition and relative history of any people or place at any given time,³ and obviously, therefore, lists which have originated at different times (when clan or tribal-divisions may have varied) will be found to contain formal contradictions.⁴

The early conception of the formation and division of clans and tribes in the Semitic world is most clearly seen in the genealogical schemes of the 2. Theory of Genealogists. Arabs.⁵ It was commonly assumed by them that all groups were patriarchal tribes formed by subdivision of an original stock on the system of kinship through male-descent, and that each tribe bore the name or cognomen of the common ancestor.

After a while, it was supposed, a tribe would break up into two or more divisions, each embracing the descendants of one of the sons of the great ancestor and each taking its name from him. Successive divisions and subdivisions would take place until at length there would be a number of divisions, clans, septs, etc., all of which traced themselves back to a common ancestor (see GOVERNMENT, § 2). In Arabia, there were, in fact, two ultimate stocks, the Yemenite (Kahān) or S. Arabian (cp JOKTAN), and the Ishmaelite (Adnan, subdivided into Nizār, Ma'adū) or N. Arabian, and every individual who possessed a nishā, or gentile, was able to trace his genealogy back to one of these.

Similarly in Israel every man by virtue of his being a member of a clan or tribe was able to point to Jacob, the father of all the tribes, as his great ancestor.⁶ Now this theory—for it is nothing more—is based upon the mode of reckoning descent in the male line, which, as is becoming ever more generally recognised, is an aftergrowth and has superseded the more primitive method of matriarchy; see GOVERNMENT, §§ 2-4, KINSHIP, § 3 f.

1. The great majority of OT genealogies of individuals are found only in post-exilic writings. Whereas in Judges, Samuel, and Kings there are

3. Rise of genealogical zeal. scarcely any genealogical statistics at all, Chronicles and the writings belonging to its age are full of them. We find no trace in the earliest times of any special class (similar, e.g., to that found among some tribes in India and elsewhere) whose business it was to keep a knowledge of the facts of relationship. Genealogies of individuals are the exception, and those which are found rarely reach back more than one or two generations.⁷

2. As a corollary to this the taking of a wife is sometimes used genealogically to signify that a clan (personified as a man) has settled upon a certain district (personified as a woman); see AZUBAH, 1, and cp CALEB, § 3 f. See also DAUGHTER, 3 f., FATHER.

1 Thus Amos (1:9) speaks of Tyre (but see MIZRAIM, § 2 b) and Israel as allied by a 'covenant of brothers' (ברית אחים).

2 As a corollary to this the taking of a wife is sometimes used genealogically to signify that a clan (personified as a man) has settled upon a certain district (personified as a woman); see AZUBAH, 1, and cp CALEB, § 3 f. See also DAUGHTER, 3 f., FATHER.

3 For artificial examples see Sprenger, Das Leben u. d. Lehre d. Mohammad, iii. cxliv; G. A. B. Wright, Was Israel ever in Egypt? 33 f.

4 This may explain, e.g., why SHEBA (q.v., iii.) is a son of Cush in Gen. 10:7, but a son of Joktan ib. 28. See also TIMNA, UZ.

5 On Arabian genealogies see Sprenger, op. cit. iii. cxx-clxxx, and, more especially, Robertson Smith's luminous exposition in Kinship, chap. 1.

6 Whether the names Jacob-Israel may represent a fusion of two separate stocks cannot be discussed here; see TRIBES.

7 Contrast, for example, the brief Joshua b. Nun (Josh. 1:1) with the lengthy ancestry ascribed to Bezaleel (Ex. 35:30 [P]). The exceptions will be found to be due chiefly to the presence of a conflate text.

The same remark holds good, also, in the case of the older Arabian genealogies. Meyer (Entst. 163) observes that an analysis of the Ar. genealogies in Wüstenfeld's tables shows that those of the contemporaries of Muhammad hardly ever go back beyond the grandfather, often not even beyond the father.

A census-taking is mentioned in 2 S. 24, but the chapter is not an early one, and even civic lists are only alluded to in comparatively late passages (cp Dt. 23:2-8 [3-9] Jer. 22:30 Ex. 32:32 [P] Ps. 56:8 [9] 109:28 [20] 87:6 Mal. 3:16 Ezek. 13:9 Dan. 12:1-4 [3] [see ISAIAH ii., § 5], etc.).

There is no reason for doubting, however, that a distribution of communities into clans and families goes back to an early age (cp § 4 f., below, and see HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 2), but such a division of Israel as is spoken of in Josh. 7:16 ff. and 1 S. 10:21 can scarcely refer to pre-Davidic times; the unity of Israel, there represented, is in itself a sign of a later view. In Josh. l.c., Achan is usually designated 'b. Zerah' simply (see Bennett, SBOT), and Zerah is better known as a post-exilic Judahite clan.¹

It may be added that genealogies were not common among the Egyptians of the Old Empire. It is always the individual, seldom the race or family, who is dealt with. A genealogy of seven generations, cited at the beginning of the eighteenth dynasty, and another reaching back to the grandfather, in the following dynasty, are therefore exceptional. Complete genealogical trees only appear during the latest epoch of Egyptian history, in the times of the Ethiopian kings, the Psammetichs and the Persians. There is no trace of surnames, not even of vague appellatives, until we reach the decadence of the Egyptian kingdom (Erman, Life in Anc. Eg. 138).

2. Genealogical zeal among the Jews seems to have first arisen during the Exile. They feared lest the continuity of the race should be broken; they desired to be written in the register (כְּתוּב) of the 'house of Israel' (cp Ezek. 13:9); and hence it happened as one of the results of their religious isolation that the man who could claim descent from the exiles in Babylon was considered to be a member of the community rather than the native of Judæa.² This importance attached to genealogical pretension and to the proof of the absence of foreign admixture is one of the chief evidences of the legal spirit manifested among the Jews after the Exile, which could hardly have appeared before the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. In the case of the priests a special impetus was afforded by the newly established desire to distinguish between the priests, the sons of ZADOK, and the Levites—a feeling which appears in Ezekiel as a novelty. The growth of the care bestowed upon priestly genealogies is well known (see below, § 7 [iv.]), and an early example of the result is seen in Ezra 2:59 f., a passage belonging perhaps to a register of the restored Israel (see EZRA ii., § 9) where certain families, both secular (the b'ne Delaiah, Nekoda, Tobiah) and priestly (the b'ne Habaiah, Hakkoz, Barzillai), were unable to produce their genealogies, in consequence of which the latter were deemed 'polluted' and dismissed from the priesthood.³

3. To Arabia again we may turn for an instructive example of the rise of a love for genealogies (see WRS Kin. 6 ff.). In the reign of the caliph Omar I. a system of registers was drawn up to prove the right of each claimant, who was entitled through kinship with the prophet or through participation in his early struggles, to the spoil taken from the 'infidels,' and to ensure its just distribution among the 'true believers.' A great impetus was thus given to genealogical research, and from that time onwards the genealogists became an important class. Much oral tradition existed, and doubtless material was to be found in the official records; but as these sources were fragmentary and limited in range, conjecture had to be resorted to.⁴ The genealogists made the pedigree of Muhammad (obviously a most untrustworthy one) the backbone of all their work, and grouped the northern Arabs in such a way that every great ancestor or tribe was a brother or cousin of some ancestor of Muhammad. To make the number of ancestors tally with the lapse of time presumed to intervene, 'dummy' names (e.g., Kais, 'Amr, Zaid,

² We. Prol., E.T. 494.

³ The passage is later than Ezra; the names of the priestly families occur elsewhere in the book, cp Meyer, Entst. 170.

'Abdallah) were introduced.¹ In dealing with the older material, place-names were transformed into ancestors or ancestresses, and sometimes even tribal designations were taken and treated as the names of ancestors.² It was to the advantage of a weak community to discover some bond of connection with a stronger neighbour, whilst a powerful chief was equally desirous of including as wide a kinship as possible. Moreover, it was the scheme of the genealogist to treat the political combinations of his time as the expression of ancient bonds in kinship (for an example see SPARTA). The inevitable result was much genealogical fiction; not only were the names of his own time thrown back by the genealogist into the past, but also those which had become traditionally famous were inserted in the ancestry of his contemporaries, and the more honourable the individual the more reputable and famous became his ancestry. In fine, 'the system of the genealogists and the method by which traditional data are worked into the system are totally unworthy of credit' (Kin. 11).

The OT genealogies begin with the creation of mankind. A man and a woman stand at the head³ (see

4. Genealogies ADAM AND EVE), and a series of seven names carries mankind down to Lamech in Genesis. (Gen. 4:1-24 [JJ]). This list, like the old γενεαλογίαι of the Greeks,⁴ is doubtless the remains of a historical connection once woven out of primitive stories, and deals with the introduction of civilisation (see CAINITES; HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 2).

A parallel genealogy based on it is given by P in chap. 5; it is a dry uninteresting list, and the primitive simplicity of the legend is cumbered with a complicated system of chronology (CAINITES, § 12, SETHITES). P's genealogies in Genesis are based throughout upon a specific scheme (GENESIS, § 2), in marked contrast with those in JE—where they are merely the string connecting the narratives—they form in fact the principal feature of his history.

For Gen. 10, which in the form of a genealogy gives a conspectus of the surrounding nations, and shows the supposed relation of the Hebrews to the other peoples of the habitable globe, see GEOGRAPHY, § 11 f. P now confines himself to Shem, the 'father' of the Hebrews, and brings us down by a list of seven names to Terah, Abraham's father (chap. 11).⁵ Here again there is much dispute as to the nature of the names occurring in the list, although it is probable that they are ethnographical.⁶ From Abraham onwards a number of old genealogies are presented by J. Jacob and Esau are brothers, the former intentionally represented as the younger (see ESAU). Moab and Ben-Ammi (Ammon) are sons of Lot (cp the Edomite name LOTAN), and the relationship presumed between Israel (Jacob), Edom (Esau), Moab and Ammon points to their belief in having had at some time a common history. The close relationship with Aram which finds expression in Gen. 28 ff. expresses a feeling which could hardly have arisen before David's time.

The assumption that certain tribes were of Aramæan origin may perhaps explain that phase of the early Hebrew tradition which brings the patriarch Jacob into connection with Aram and marries him to an Aramæan stock. When tribes of different origin unite, their early tribal traditions (Urgeschichte) become fused, with the result that they possess a tradition in common.

Other genealogies express relations between Ishmael

¹ These were got by doubling known names or using personal names of no tribal significance' (Kin. 10); cp the Gershonite genealogies, § 7 (iii. 2) below.

² The Ar. Khozā'a ('separated ones') were so called because they broke off from the Asd in the great Yemenite dispersion. The genealogists, however, made Khozā'a the name of their ancestor (see WRS Kins. 17). The member of the dog-tribe 'banu Kilāb' were similarly made to descend from an ancestor 'Kilāb.' The genealogical notices of Anak and Arba were not less cursorily derived; see ANAKITES.

⁵ The triple division of the b'ne Terah finds an analogy in the three Levitical heads, and the three guilds of singers.

⁶ The list includes the mythical ancestor of all Hebrews—viz., 'Eber' (see EBER, 1). Similarly the Berbers (lit. 'barbarians') invented an ancestor Berr whom they, influenced by Mohammedan lore, connected with Noah. (Another genealogy represents their ancestor as 'Berber,' a descendant of Canaan b. Ham b. Noah.)

and Isaac (half-brothers), and tribes of the great spice-bearing region in S. Arabia are traced from Abraham through a wife who bears the significant name Keturah ('incense'); Gen. 25 1-6 (J).

A later genealogy makes Ishmael the father of certain Arabian tribes which, at the time of its compilation, occupied the Syrian desert (Gen. 25 13 P). Ishmael, in post-exilic and Rabbinical times, became the common designation for the Arabs generally, and these, in turn, were wont to trace their ancestry back to Nabit (Nebaioth), or Kahlan (Joktan), sons of Ishmael; cp above, § 2.

Jacob, the younger¹ son of Isaac, is understood to be the father of the twelve tribes, the chief of whom were descended from his wives, RACHEL and

5. Tribal genealogies. LEAH [gg.v.]. That four of the tribes are sons of concubines might show that they were looked upon as of less importance, and as not belonging to Israel in the same sense as the others (see DAN 1; GOVERNMENT, § 13).

It is only in the later writings that the twelve tribes are represented as coexistent and enjoying unbroken continuity. Moreover, the number twelve is certainly artificial,² and was obtained, either by the omission of Levi or by reckoning the two 'sons' of Joseph as one.

Further, it may be questioned whether 'Judah' with its S. Palestinian elements (see CALBE, JERAHMEEL) was ever a tribe previous to the time of David, and whether the priestly tribe of Levi does not owe its enumeration among the 'twelve' to the desire to place its members on the same genealogical footing with the rest. See, further, JUDAH, LEVI, and cp TRIBES.

The subdivisions of the tribes are enumerated in Gen. 46 8-27 Ex. 6 14-26 Nu. 26 5-51 [all P], and at greater length in 1 Ch. 2 ff. For an estimation of their contents and value, see the separate articles.³

It must suffice here to observe that a study of the names which are found in these tribal lists often affords suggestive hints concerning the relations of the tribes to one another. The truth of the old folk-legend which spoke of Israel and Edom as brothers is fully borne out by the significant number of names common to Edom and Judah (and Benjamin).⁴ The tribe of Simeon, though unknown in historical times, seems, nevertheless, to have dwelt on the extreme SW. of Judah, and hence it is not surprising to find names in the Simeonite list which have affinities with Edom (see BILHAH, 1, SHAUL), Judah (ZERAH, HAMUEL), Ishmael (MIBSAM, MISHMA) and Jerahmeel (ISHI). See also below, § 7 [v.].

It has been stated above (§ 3 [1]) that the great majority of genealogies are found only in P and kindred literature (Ch.-Ezra-Neh.), and it remains now to

6. The Chronicler's genealogies. consider their genuineness and value. It is only just to suppose that the Chronicler had older lists to work upon; but the Oriental genealogist was no incorruptible judge, and not only would he be sure to have spurious evidence placed before him—'a novus homo desires a noble pedigree'—but his lists when fragmentary would have to be supplemented and completed.⁵ Faithful to the spirit of his age he idealizes and magnifies the past, and in many of his genealogies we are able to see that he employed the same methods as did his Arabian brother centuries later.

² Cp the number of the b'ne Nahor (Gen. 22 20 ff.), the b'ne Ishmael (Gen. 25 13 f.), the families of Gad and Asher (Nu. 26 15 ff. 44 ff.) and of Ephraim and Manasseh (ib. 28-37). For non-Semitic analogies see Spiegel, Iranische Altertumskunde, 223 ff.

³ The tribes with their subdivisions amount to seventy; this number, too, is most probably artificial.

⁴ Common to (α) Edom and Judah are Husham (cp Hushah), Iram (cp Ira), Jether (cp Ithran and see ЈЕТНЕТН), Korah, Onam (cp Onan), Shobal and Zerah; (β) Edom and Benjamin, Ashbel (cp Ashbea), Iri (cp Iru, IRAM), Jeshu, Manahath, Shepho (cp Shephupham and SHUPHAM?), Onam (cp Oni), Bela, Johab.

Thus over sixteen of the twenty-four 'beads' ordained by David (1 Ch. 24) are names of post-exilic priests and Levites, and it is only reasonable to suspect that the Chronicler desires to show that the honourable families of his own day lived, or were founded, centuries previously under David.

A list in Neh. 11 13 mentions 'Meshillemoth b. Immer.' But the name Meshillemoth is essentially the same as Meshullam, and when the writer of 1 Ch. 9 12 found in his copies both forms (so, at least, we are entitled to assume) he accordingly wrote down 'Meshullam b. Meshillemoth (so ⁶ BAL for Meshillemoth; see MESHILLEMOTH, 2) b. Immer' (for another similar instance cp below, § 7 [iv.] end).

Of a different character are the lists in 1 Ch. 2 18-24 7 30-40, where it is evident that we are dealing no longer with individuals but with clan- or place-names; cp Gray, HPN 239 f. In 1 Ch. 2, for example, one can distinguish pre-exilic from post-exilic sources, and it is possible to see expressed in genealogical form the fact which is known from other sources, that Caleb, whose seat in pre-exilic times lay in the Negeb of Judah, migrated north, and after the Exile appears in the district around Jerusalem (see Wellh. De Gent.; CHRONICLES, § 10; and cp CALEB, § 2 f.).

The structure and nature of the names themselves may sometimes prove helpful in considering the antiquity of a list, and the fact that the majority of the names in the list 1 Ch. 4 34-41 are those of the Chronicler's own time and 'are at least not genuine survivals' makes it probable that the list is largely an invention (Gray, op. cit. 236 f.). It is not difficult to observe the methods of the genealogist in compiling ancestral lists, and a good example is seen in the post-exilic genealogy of David which is wholly wanting in the earlier writings (see DAVID, § 1 a, n. 1). It is the object of the author of ESTHER (g.v., § 1, end) to make Mordecai a Benjamite, and so, when he fashions a genealogical list, he includes among the ancestors of Mordecai such well-known Benjamites as Kish and Shimei (see SHIMEI, 10), whilst the second Targum actually adds Machir and Mephibosheth.¹

(i.) Method.—Fuller details regarding the intricate genealogies of the Levites and priests must be sought for in the minor biographical articles; here it must suffice to indicate the lines upon which the Hebrew (post-exilic) genealogist seems to have worked, and to try to discover the various views to which he intended his lists to give expression.

To start with the belief that these genealogies are wholly trustworthy or that they proceeded from one hand² would quickly involve us in a hopeless maze. Contrast, for example, the ancestry which 1 Ch. 6 gives of the three contemporaries Asaiah (seven members, 1 Ch. 6 30 [15] 15 6), Ethan (twelve), and Heman (nearly twenty),³ and observe that Ethan's immediate ancestors reappear in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch. 29 12). Libni and Shimei are both Gershonite and Merarite divisions; Jabath and Shimei are varying sons and grandsons of Gershon. Amasai and Mahath, like Mushi and Mahli, are sometimes brothers, at other times father and son. Instances of similar inconsistencies might easily be multiplied.

In order to gain some idea of the origin of the Levitical genealogies we may start with the working theory that they are the result of later genealogizing skill, which has endeavoured to bring together into some sort of family relationship clans and divisions formerly quite distinct (cp § 2 above). Thus we find that one of the simplest lists of the Levitical families enumerates merely the clans of Jeshua, Bani (or Binnui), Hodaviah (Judah, Hodiah), and Kadmiel (cp Ezra 2 40 [see HODAVIAH, 4] 39 Neh. 9 4).⁴ Another equally simple but more interesting scheme in Nu. 26 58⁵ enumerates five misf'p'oth of the Levites—קַרְחִי, מְרַשֵׁי, קַרְחִי, קַרְחִי, קַרְחִי (6⁶ BAFL-om). Again, when 1 Ch. 15 5-7 divides the Levites among the families of Gershom, Kehath (EV Kohath), Merari, Elizaphan, Hebron, and Uzziel, it is apparent that we are a step nearer the famous triple division—the three

⁵ The verse is hardly from the same source as vv. 57, 59 f.

great names have been introduced, but are on an equality with the rest. At a later stage Libni is assigned either to Gershon or to Merari, to the latter of which Mahli¹ and Mushi were consistently reckoned; the rest were ascribed to Kehath.²

(ii.) Singers and Porters.—Together with these developments we have to notice the gradual 'Levitzing' of divisions and classes formerly distinct—viz. the singers and porters (or doorkeepers).

(a) The familiar triple division of Asaph, Heman, and Ethan (or Jeduthun), assigned to Gershon, Kehath, and Merari respectively (1 Ch. 6), is preceded by an earlier in Neh. 11 17, where the singers are Mattaniah b. Mica, Bakbukiah (see BAKBAKKAR), and Abda (or Obadiah) b. Shammua.³ A later hand has probably supplied the names of ancestors tending to associate them with Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (cp 6BA).

(b) Now the singers or 'b'ne Asaph' were primarily kept distinct from the porters, and both classes were separated from the Levites (Ezra 2 41 Neh. 7 44; see WRS, OTJC (2) 204); see ASAPH, 3. The next step was the inclusion of the guild of porters in the name 'Korah,'⁴ although it must be observed that Korah is not yet a Levite. He is absent from the list of Levites in 1 Ch. 23, and in the earlier phase of P's account of the rebellion in Nu. 16 Korah is actually not yet a Levite (cp Kue. Hex. 334 f., and see KORAH ii., § 2).⁵ Next we find that both Asaph and Korah are Levitical divisions. There are, therefore, Levites of Asaph (2 Ch. 29 13, cp 20 14), and Levites of the Korahites (2 Ch. 20 19). Still another stage finds Asaph incorporated in Korah under the eponym of Abiasaph or Ebiasaph (see ASAPH, 3, ABIASAPH), and finally Korah is assigned to Kehath—observe that in 2 Ch. 20 19 Korah and Kehath are still distinct—and, strangely enough, Asaph is removed from Korah b. Kehath and assigned to Gershon.

(c) Traces of these changes are seen in the survival of the eponym Abiasaph (see ASAPH, 3), which is reckoned as a 'son' of Korah, and in the fortunes of certain names belonging to these classes. In 2 Ch. 29 13 Mattaniah and Zechariah are of the b'ne Asaph (cp Zaccur and Nathaniah, sons of Asaph in 1 Ch. 23 2), in 2 Ch. 20 14 they reappear in the genealogy of Jahaziel an Asaphite Levite.⁶ Comparing 1 Ch. 9 19 31 (Mattithiah) 26 1 f. we find them sons of Shallum (or Meshelemiah) traced through Asaph to Korah; and finally Zechariah and Meshullam (= Shallum) turn up as Kehathites in 2 Ch. 34 12.

(d) According to the later genealogies the singers and porters Ethan (or Jeduthun), Hosah and Obed-edom belong to Merari. Quite consistently, therefore, the names Hashabiah and Jeshaiiah appear as sons of Merari (Ezra 8 19), or sons of Jeduthun (1 Ch. 25 3), and the former is a Merarite (1 Ch. 9 14), and a member of Ethan's genealogy (1 Ch. 6 45 [30]). Of the two sons of the Merarite Jeduthun, Uzziel and Shemaiah (2 Ch. 29 14), the latter is a descendant of Jeduthun (1 Ch. 9 16 = Neh. 11 17 [Shammua]), a son of Obed-edom (1 Ch. 26 4), and a Merarite Levite (1 Ch. 9 14), and both names perhaps go to build up the genealogy of the Merarite Asaiah in the forms Shimea b. Uzza (1 Ch. 6 29 f. [14 f.]). Similarly Hilkiah and Shimri, 'sons' of the Merarite Hosah (1 Ch. 26 10 f.), may perhaps correspond to the Shemer and Hilkiah in the genealogy of the Merarite Ethan (1 Ch. 6 45 f. [30 f.]). See also IBSA.

Not only was Asaph removed from Korah to Gershon, but it is probable that Ethan was once ascribed to Gershon, and, curiously enough, from 1 Ch. 15 7 17 we should expect to find that Heman, too, was Gershonite!⁷ This is apparently due to the fact that the three heads of the 'singers' were, at one stage, treated

² Observe that Elizaphan is a 'son' of Uzziel, the Kehathite, in Nu. 8 30 (P).

³ 6BA omits the second name; perhaps the earliest division was a twofold one.

⁶ Cp also Mattaniah and מְרַרִי Levites of the b'ne Asaph (1 Ch. 9 15).

as independent Levitical divisions (see Neh. 11 15-17),¹ and in the process of incorporating all the Levites among the three 'sons' of Levi, the positions of the heads of the singers were not at first definitely settled.

(iii.) Levitical lists in 1 Ch. 6.—The Chronicler's method of building up genealogies from names traditionally current will account for the remarkable inconsistencies and striking resemblances which the most superficial consideration reveals.

(a) Some of the Merarite names in 1 Ch. 6 have already been noticed (above [ii.] d.). Of the others, Malluch and Amzi (6 44 46) have priestly associations (cp Neh. 11 12), Mahli and Mushi are usually brother clans, and the former is also the head of a Merarite genealogy ending with ASAIAH [3] (1 Ch. 6 29 f. [14 f.]). It is, moreover, a feature of considerable significance that this Merarite list has little in common with that in 1 Ch. 23 21-23, 24 27-30, which probably represents an earlier stage in the genealogical schemes.²

(b) The Gershonite genealogies in 1 Ch. 6 descend (a) to Jeatherai (or Ethni), and (b) to Asaph, the intermediate names being probably 'dummy' names (Maaseiah [of which Baaseiah is a corruption], Berechiah, Malchijah, Michael are sufficiently colourless and common). The names מְרַרִי וְיֹאחָז בְּרִיּוֹתָם seem to be related in some way to the Gershonite עֲרֹן בֶּן יֹאחָז וְזַכָּר of 2 Ch. 29 12.³

(c) The largest and most important branch of post-exilic Levites are the b'ne Kehath, the most prominent branches of which are Amram—to which Moses (the father of the subdivision Gershon) and Aaron belong—and Korah b. Izhar⁴ b. Kehath. Korah is associated with the porters (see above), and his three 'sons' Assir, Abiasaph, and Elkanah (Ex. 6 24 etc.) are here descendants in a regular line (1 Ch. 6 37 [22]). The ancestry of the Korahite Heman is rendered particularly complicated by repetitions.⁵ The names in 2 Ch. 29 12 f. again proved an invaluable quarry for the genealogist, and from them he borrowed Mahath b. Amasai, and Joel b. Azariah. The list comprises, appropriately enough, names borrowed from the genealogy of Samuel, who, as the genealogist knew, was a doorkeeper (1 S. 3 15).⁶

(iv.) High priests' genealogy.—The high priests from Aaron to the captivity are traced through Amram to Kehath (1 Ch. 6 3-15 [5 29-41], cp 49-53).

The list is substantially the same as the genealogy of Ezra in Ezra 7 1 (= 1 Esd. 8 2), which recurs, with some changes, in 2 Esd. 1 7. That in 1 Ch. 6 starts with (1-3) Aaron, Eleazar, and Phinehas, names common to, and derived from, P. (4) Abishua⁸ (Abiezer, Jos. Ant. v. 11 5) is no longer extant. The following five names are new (5-9):—Bukki, Uzzi, Zerabiah, Meraioth, and Amariah (in Jos. Ant. viii. 1 3; Bukki, Joatham, Meraioth, Arophæus). Nos. 10-12: Ahitub, Zadok, and Ahimaa are derived from 1 and 2 S. (see AHITUB, 1, AHIMAAZ, 1). Of nos. 13-15 (Azariah, Johanan, Azariah) it must be to the first that the misplaced note 6 10b [5 36b] refers; it is related to 1 K. 4 22 (also a gloss). Nos. 16-18 duplicate 9-11, and finally nos. 19-22 (Shallum, Hilkiah, Azariah, Seraiiah) carry us down to Jehozadak. An allowance of forty years for each generation gives us nearly 960 years, agreeing approximately with the received post-exilic chronology. The thirteenth name will coincide with the rebuilding of the temple and the twenty-third⁹ with the captivity; cp the similar artificiality in GENEALOGIES ii., § 1.

The unhistorical nature of this list of high priests needs no demonstration. The inclusion of Zadok is as remarkable as the ignoring of the famous line from Eli to Abiathar (1 S.), due, perhaps, to the later exaltation of the Zadokites (see ZADOK, 1).¹⁰ We find no men-¹ 2 Ch. 29 12-14 enumerates Levites of Kehath, Gershon, Merari, Elizaphan (see § 7 [i.] end), Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun.

² Note, e.g., the mention of Moses, 23 14 f.

³ Perhaps we may connect the Gershonite יֹאחָז (1 Ch. 15 7) with Joel (יֹאחָז for MT יֹאחָז) b. Eliasaph in Nu. 8 24.

⁴ In 1 Ch. 6 22 [7] his 'father' is called Amminadab; but see ELISHABA.

⁵ Elkanah to Elkanah, 6 34 35a [19 20a] = 25 [10] f. Joel to Ebiasaph 36b 37a = 23 [7] f.

⁷ See, for other lists, Jos. Ant. x. 8 6, and the Jewish Seder Olam.

tion of Jehoiada, Zechariah, or Urijah; nos. 15-18 find no support in the historical books, nor can we reconcile the priests Amariah (2 Ch. 19 11), Azariah (2 Ch. 26 17 31 10), Hilkiyah (2 Ch. 34 9) with no. 20 f.

So highly was Ezra the scribe esteemed that his name takes the place of Jehozadak, and he appears in Ezra 7 2 as the son of Seraiah at the end of the long list of high priests. (Nos. 9-14, however, are omitted in 1 Esd. 8 2 Esd. 1, and by MT [and G² BAL] in Ezra, loc.) He is thus made to be a contemporary of ZEDEKIAH, who lived 130 years previously. His genealogy in 2 Esd., however, has received an interesting addition; between nos. 16 and 17¹ are inserted the names of Eli, Phinehas, and Ahijah, derived directly from 1 S. (cp 14 3). The new names in Jos. (Ant. x. 8 6) and the Seder 'Olam are of no critical value; the former enumerates ten names between nos. 13 and 19, several of which recur in the latter writing.²

The key to the origin of the high priests' genealogy is perhaps found in Neh. 11 11, where nos. 20, 19, 18, Meraioth (= Amariah, no. 16 ?), and 17 are the ancestors of the priest Scraiah, the grandfather of Jeshua (cp 1 Ch. 6 14 [5 40], Ezra 3 2) in the ascending line. It is interesting to find that || 1 Ch. 9 11 has Azariah for Scraiah, and that the genealogist has been content to incorporate both names in the list of high priests (no. 21 f.), an exact parallel to which procedure is seen in 1 Ch. 9 12 (see above, § 6). The intervening names from Aaron downwards would be easily supplied once the start had been made (observe the duplicates). A place had to be found for Zadok, and (as in 1 Ch. 24; cp § 6) the most important care of the genealogist was to introduce priestly names famous in his own time or traditionally renowned.

(v.) Origin of Levitical names.—When it is recognised that the Levitical genealogies have passed through several stages before reaching their present form, it is obvious that in discussing the origin of the Levites too much stress must not be laid upon the names of the three great heads. As representing Levitical divisions they have no great claim to antiquity. Gershon is derived directly from Gershom b. Moses, and it is not impossible that Merari (מֵרָרִי, an ethnic) has originated from Miriam (מִרְיָם, cp MERAIOTH). This leads us to the 'Mosaic' origin of Levitical names, the most famous example of which is Mushi—'the Mosaicite' (see also ELIEZER, GERSHOM, GERSHON, MUSHI).

That names in the family of Moses were derived from Levi (1 Ch. 23 14) is a perversion in the interests of a post-exilic age; note that Shubael b. Gershom b. Moses (1 Ch. 23 10) is no other than Shubael, an Amramite (1 Ch. 24 20); and that Shelomith b. Eliezer (1 Ch. 28 25 f.) becomes chief of the (Levitical) line Izhar (23 18).³ It is curious, also, to find in the genealogy of the Levite Gershom, properly the son of Moses, the names SHIMEI (11), JAHATH (2), ZIMMATH (10), and ZERAH (2), corresponding to SHAMMAH (1), NAHATH (1), Mizzah (מִצַּח), and ZERAH (3), sons of the Edomite Reuel (Gen. 36 13), the traditional name of Moses' father-in-law.

Suggestive of S. Palestinian origin are, moreover, the names KORAH (q.v., i.), JESHUA and, in Nu. 26 58, Mahli (cp MAHALATH), where, moreover, the ethnics Hebron and Libni remind us of the S. Palestinian Hebron and Libnah. The 'Hebronite' Jekameam (יֶקָמֵאָם) perhaps derives his name from יֶקָמֵם (see JOKNEAM), the Merarite Eder and Jeremoth (יֶרְמוֹת) from Eder (Josh. 15 21) and יֶרְמוֹת (see JARMUTH), and the Kehathite Shamir from the locality in Josh. 15 48. Jerahmeel b. Mahli b. Merari is, in itself, a significant hint for the origin of some of the Levitical clans⁴; for other connections see AMASAI (1), AMASA, JEUSH. Finally, one notes the un-Hebraic character of several of the Levitical names (Kehath, Ithamar, Izhar, Jeatherai [if correct], etc.), which, perhaps, may be due to their S. Palestinian origin; cp the name GERSHOM (q.v.). The eponym Simeon,¹ the 'brother' of Levi, has probably left its mark in the Levitical division Shimei,² variously assigned to Gershon or Merari, and it is not impossible that the Kehathite Izhar (יִזְחָר) was primarily the same as the 'son' of Simeon who is named יִזְחָר (see JAHATH, 2, n.).³ These evidences, pointing to a S. Palestinian origin for the Levites, agree with the tradition that Yahwè's worship came from the S.⁴ See LEVITES.

GENEALOGIES OF JESUS

From the above evidence we may infer that the Levites came from the S. of Palestine, and that they were not confined to any one particular tribe or clan. This makes it probable that the term 'Levite' (on its meaning see Hommel, AHT 278 f.) was a later designation applied to special members of the southern clans who, it has been suggested elsewhere, had come originally from Kadesh-barnea (EXODUS i. §§ 4 ff., KADESH i. § 3). Since, therefore, there is reason for supposing that such well-known figures as ETHAN (2), HEMAN and OBED-EDOM were of southern extraction (see also MAHOL), it would appear that the Chronicler was not wholly unwarranted in making them Levites. Moreover, when he ascribes to David the inauguration and establishing of the Levites, may this not be merely based upon the circumstance that the southern clans did actually attain importance first under David?

The care spent over genealogies by no means diminished in later times (1 Macc. 2 Bar. 1 Tob. 11), and in the time of Josephus (c. Ap. 1 7, see also Vita, 1) all the priests were able to adduce evidence to show the purity of their descent by means of public documents which he refers to as δημοσται δέκτοι. According to the Talmud (Kidd. 76 b) there were men who spent their time wholly in making and studying genealogies which were based upon those in Ch.-Ezra-Neh.⁵ But when Elizabeth is called a daughter of Aaron (Lk. 15), Anna an Asherite (ib. 236), or Paul a Benjamite (Rom. 11 1), and Hillel the Babylonian is traced back to David (even the 'desposyni' in Domitian's time claimed a direct descent from David), we cannot suppose that every link in the long chain of ancestors was known. Yet, how great was the importance attached to the registry of birth and ancestry is proved by the genealogies prefixed to the gospels of Matthew and Luke in which Christ's origin is traced back to Abraham and Adam respectively (see article below).

See Sprenger, Das Leben u. d. Lehre d. Mohammed; WRS Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia (especially chap. 1); Wellh. de Gentibus, etc., Prolog. (4) 211 ff.; 9. Literature. art. Berlin, 'Gershonite and Merarite Genealogies' in JQR 12 291 ff. (1900) illustrates their complicated character, and seeks to show that the Levites fell into twenty-four subdivisions corresponding to the 'heads' in 1 Ch. 24 1-19. For general principles see M' Lennan, *Studies in Anc. GENEALOGIES OF JESUS IN MATTHEW AND LUKE. While Mk. and Jn. manifest no interest in the pedigree of Jesus (βίβλος γενέσεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ [Ti. WH])—Jn. 7 7 representing the tenet of Messianic doctrine current among the Jews (cp Weber, Syst. d. altyn. Theol. 339 ff.) that the origin of the Messiah is a secret—the two fuller gospels produce formal genealogical tables.

The first point of interest was to prove that Jesus was 1 The name may survive in the Assyrian land of Sa-mi-[n]a] on the road S. to Musri (Wi. Musri, etc., 8). 2 See WRS JPh. 996 ('80). 3 Of the Simeonite names which are reported (1 Ch. 4 24 ff.), several are elsewhere borne by Levites: Rephaiah, Seraiah, and Shallum are also Judahite, and one (see HORI) distinctly suggests a S. Palestinian origin. 4 Thus, e.g., there were worshippers of Yahwè at Zephath in the time of Elijah (1 K. 17 9, MT Zarephath, see ZAREPHATH). 5 Cp Talm. לררש אלא לררש דבר תנו דבר הימים לררש where it is said that the commentaries on 1 Ch. 8 37-9 44 (from Azel to Azel) amounted to 900 camel-loads. ³ The Aaronite Elieazar is later than the Mosaicite Eliezer just as Shubael is probably a modification of the Calebite Shobal (see SHUBAL).

⁴ Undue stress, perhaps, should not be laid upon the circumstance that Abihail and Obed are names common to Jerahmeel and Merari (the latter through Obed-edom). Abihail (see MICHAEL) perhaps occurs also in the family of Kish (also a Merarite name, see KISH, 2). With the Jerahmeelite Zaza we may probably connect the Gershonite Zizah (1 Ch. 23 11).

descended from David. For whilst this question is only once touched upon in Jn. (7.42) and only thrice in Mk. (10.47 f. 11.10 12.35-37), the Davidic sonship appears in Mt. and Lk.

1. Aim and specific character. (not to speak of the passages parallel to those cited from Mk.) as a matter of fundamental importance in the preliminary history (cp Lk. 1.27 32 69 2.4 11 Mt. 1.20, and in the story of the Magi, Mt. 2, the designation of the 'new-born king of the Jews'), as it is also emphasized further, in a manner analogous to the cases in Mk., in Mt. 9.27 12.23 15.22. The genealogies, however, reach back even beyond David; in Mt. to Abraham, in Lk. to Adam. This tracing of the line back to Adam (Lk.) may be connected with the conception of the Messiah as a second Adam, for which reason the patriarchal head of the new mankind is brought into relation to that of the old. On the same analogy, since there is no interest, anywhere else in the NT, in regarding Christ as the son of Abraham, the tracing back of the line at least as far as to him might be due to a wish to bring into mutual relation the father of the people of promise and the father of the people of fulfilment.

That the pedigree in Mt. is in a special degree specifically Jewish in its character, appears from its delight in playing with numbers—three series each of twice seven names—and from the succession downwards from David being traced through the line of Jewish kings. The pedigree adopted by Lk. at least does not emphasize numerical features (11 × 7), follows a different branch of David's family, and does not pause at Abraham any more than at David. We may perhaps distinguish it as the Hellenistic and Mt.'s as the Palestinian, attempt to connect Jesus the Messiah with sacred history by a genealogy. That the one came into the hands of the first evangelist, the other into the hands of the third, may be accidental.

The two genealogies are beyond doubt mutually independent scholarly attempts. That adopted by Mt.

2. Mt.'s list. (11-17) follows the linguistic form of Gen. 4.18 Ruth 4.18-22 1 Ch. 2.10-14, the heading, the phrase 'Book of the Generation' (βιβλος γενέσεως), being taken from Gen. 5.1. The table contains thrice fourteen names, fourteen from Abraham to David, fourteen from David to Jechoniah, fourteen from Jechoniah to Jesus.

The reckoning, however, is not quite accurate. For the first series (vv. 2-6) needs both Abraham and David, and the third (vv. 12-16) both Jechoniah and Christ, to make up the number fourteen, and yet the second series (vv. 6-11) must count either David or Jechoniah over again, without which it contains but thirteen names (see, further, below, b).

(a) The series from Abraham to David (vv. 2-6) is taken from 1 Ch. 2.1-14; only, in addition to the case of Tamar (RV Tamar) the wife of Judah (v. 3), mention is twice made of the mother, viz. in the case of Rachab (RV Rahab v. 5) the mother, and of Ruth (v. 5) the wife, of Booz (RV Boaz)—the latter based on Ruth 4.13, the former without any support from the OT and indeed in the face of chronological impossibility.

Rabbinic scholars also interested themselves in these women. On Tamar and Ruth compare Weber, Atsynag. Theol. 341. Rahab they transformed into an inn-keeper (Jos. Ant. v. 1.27) and traced to her eight prophets (Lightfoot, Hor. Heb. 180; Menschen, NT u. Talm. 40). She was an object of interest also to the early Christians, as Heb. 11.31 and James 2.25 show. Perhaps they interpreted 'harlot' allegorically as 'heathen': the fact that Ruth was a Moabite, and Rahab a heathen, would then explain the interest of Christians in their mention in the pedigree of the Messiah.

(b) In the second series (vv. 6-11) the list of kings is reduced to fourteen.

As compared with 1 Ch. 3.11 Joash (ωας), Amaziah (αμασιας) and Azariah (αζαρια) are omitted between Ozias (RV Uziah, οζιας) and Joatham (RV Jotham, ιωθαμ [v. 9]), and Jehoiakim (ωακειμ) between Josias (RV Josiah; ιωασιμ) and Jechonias (RV Jechoniah, ιεχωνιας [v. 11]). Zedekiah (ζεδεικιας) may be represented by 'brethren' (αδελφοις [v. 11]) inasmuch as, according to 1 Ch. 3.16 2 Ch. 36.10 he is mentioned as brother—sole brother it is true—of Jechoniah (ιεχωνιας) (otherwise in Jer. 37.1 and 2 K. 24.17). Perhaps Jehoiakim (ωακειμ) dropped out later, so that the second series also originally contained fourteen names.

(c) For the third series (vv. 12-16) there is no authority in the OT, which mentions (1 Ch. 3.17 Ezra 5.3 Neh. 12.1 Hag. 1.1) only Salathiel (RV Shealtiel; σαλαθιηλ [v. 12]) and Zorobabel (RV Zerubbabel; ζοροβαβελ [v. 12 f.]), and we have no hint of the origin of the names. For the rest, the names from David to Jechoniah are to be distributed over a period of about 460 years, those from Jechoniah to Christ over one of about 590 years.

The genealogy given by Lk. (3.23-38) begins with

GENEALOGIES OF JESUS

Christ and leads upwards, using the simple formula, usually employed in the OT in giving Lk.'s list. names, of adding the father's name in the genitive.

The series from David to Adam (vv. 32-38) follows the lists of 1 Ch. 1.1-4 24-27 2.1-14 and Ruth 4.18-22. However, in the line from Abraham to Adam (vv. 34-38) the name Cainan (κανανη ΒΝ etc.) is used a second time (v. 36; cp v. 37) between Sala (RV Shelah; σαλα [v. 35]) and Arphaxad (αρφαξαδ [v. 36]); while in the line from David to Abraham (vv. 32-34) αδμειν (B etc.; omitted in EV; Admin in RVmg. and αρνει (RV Arni; AV has 'Aram') have been inserted (v. 33) in place of αραμ between Aminadab (αμιναδαβ) and Esrom (εσρωμ). Neither change finds any support in the OT. Armi (αρνει) might indeed be an ancient variant for Aram (αραμ). In this case, what we have is the insertion of new names at some place that seemed suitable before and at another after Abraham—additions which, like the omissions of Mt., may be explained by the love for round numbers. For there are now (vv. 38-31) from Adam to David (inclusive) 35 (i.e., 5 × 7) names, or (if we look more closely) from Adam to Abraham (vv. 38-34) 3 × 7 and from Isaac to David (vv. 34-31) 2 × 7 (i.e., 14 as in Mt.). Between Christ and David (vv. 23-31), however, Lk. gives us a list nowhere to be found in the OT. Instead of the line of kings he gives us that of David's son NATHAN [2] (ναθαμ; 1 Ch. 3.5). It is all the more remarkable that the list coincides with that of Mt. in the names Salathiel (RV Shealtiel; σαλαθιηλ) and Zorobabel (RV Zerubbabel, ζοροβαβελ, v. 27) and in no more. From Nathan (ναθαμ [BN*] 1 v. 31) to Salathiel (v. 27) we have again 3 × 7 names, and so from Zorobabel to Christ (Mt. giving in each case fourteen, or, rather, from Zorobabel only twelve). The father of Salathiel, however, is called Jechonias (RV Jechoniah; ιεχωνιας [v. 12]) in Mt., Neri (νηρει [v. 27]) in Lk.; while the son of Zorobabel is Abiud (αβιουδ [v. 13]) in the former and Rhesa (ρησα [v. 27]) in the latter. The intention, however, is in both cases unmistakably the same, in spite of the divergence of the genealogies, to find a place in a list for the two famous names. The agreement on the other hand of Mt. and Lk. in the name of Joseph's grandfather, Matthan (μαθθαν [v. 15]) and Matthat (μαθθαθ [v. 24]) respectively, may well be accidental, since the father and son of the latter bear quite different names in the two lists.

Lk.'s plan of following, not the royal line, but a lateral branch of David's house, may have been due to the reflection that the Messiah could

4. The two lists and their value. not come of the line rejected in Jechoniah (Jer. 22.28 30 36.30).

The conjecture that one of the genealogies follows the line of Mary is excluded by the fact that both end in Joseph, as well as by the Hebrew custom of attending only to the genus patris. Moreover it is Joseph, not Mary, that Lk. declares to be of Davidic descent (1.27 2.4). The two genealogies are independent attempts to establish the ancestry of Jesus as Messiah and thus to connect him with the sacred past. The round numbers figuring in both of them show how little they aimed at simply reproducing documents. The complete divergence makes it more probable that the pedigree did not admit of documentary establishment. All that was postulated was descent from Zerubbabel, David, and Abraham. The mode of supplying the intervening links was a matter of indifference. Proof of the physical descent of Jesus from David was doubtless not to be found. Nor in Jesus' days was there need for such; for the Messiah was in any case de jure David's son—i.e., heir and legitimate successor; and if any one ever had occasion to turn this ideal into a natural sonship, this was done by deducing the latter from the former. If Jesus was the Messiah, he was David's son, and no documentary proof of the fact was needed. For there is no trace anywhere of any one's having deduced the Messiahship of Jesus from his being son of David, or having sought to oppose the former claim by questioning the latter.

H. v. s.

[One singular error in Lk.'s genealogy may be indicated here, the more so as Bacon (Hastings, DB 2.140), following Plummer (Comm. on St. Luke, 104), has perhaps not explained it aright.

5. Rhesa, etc. It is the introduction of the name Rhesa (ρησα) between Joanan (so RV; AV Joana) and Zorobabel (Lk. 3.27).

The view of these two scholars is that Rhesa is simply the Aram. word רֶשָׁה (Rēshā), 'chief,' which was mistaken (as Dr. Plummer puts it) by 'some Jewish copyist (?)' for a fresh name in the genealogy, but which was really a title appended to the name Zerubbabel. Thus the original order of the names will have been, Zerubbabel-Kesha, Joanan, Juda. The title of Zerubbabel, however, was not, as far as we know, Rēshā. He was 'governor of Judah'; not merely one of the 'heads' of the community, but in supreme authority; in Hag. 1:22 the Targ. renders רִבְּבֵל 'governor (of)' by מֶלֶךְ. We must not, of course, follow Herzfeld (Gesch., A. 379 ff.) in his inferences from the Breviarium of the pseudo-Philo (on which cp. cit. 264 f.). If, then, a disarrangement of names is to be supposed, it is better to identify Rhesa with ASSIR [7.2.], and to suppose the original order to have been this, 'the son of Joanan, the son of Zerubbabel, the son of Salathiel, the son of ASSIR, the son of Neri.' 'Assir his son' is a Talmudic reading in 1 Ch. 3:17 and may have been that adopted in the genealogy reproduced in our text of Lk. 3:23-38. רִבְּבֵל might, by accidental transposition of letters, easily become רִבְּבֵל or רִבְּבֵל; or, since the error began in a Greek document, ασσιρ might become ρησα (ρησια). Note that μελγει (Melch) may be a fragment of μελχιε|ιραμ (1 Ch. 3:18), κωσαν (Cosam) of ωσανω|θ, and even perhaps εμπαδαμ of εμπαδαμ [εμπαδαμ]; though see ELMODAM. W. C. Allen (Exp. T. 11:135 ff.) has argued that the writer of Mt. compiled the genealogy in chap. 1 with the help of 1 Ch. 1-3; it is clear at any rate that the second genealogy is partly derived from this source.—T. Genesis is to modern apprehension the first book of a comprehensive Hebrew history from the creation of the world to the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar (Gen.—2 K.); more particularly of its former half, which ends with the conquest and settlement of Canaan (Gen.—Josh.). To the Jews who made the division, however, Genesis was the first part of a smaller whole, ending with the death of Moses (Gen.—Dt.), which, from its predominating character, they called the law (Torah), and which they divided into five books (Pentateuch).¹ The first book, whose opening chapters describe the creation of the world, bears in the Greek Bible the title Γένεσις κόσμου,² commonly abbreviated Γένεσις,³ which is derived from Gen. 2:4 (⊙^{EL}). In Hebrew it is usually cited by its first words בראשית ('In the beginning').⁴

The Book of Genesis consists of two parts: first, The Primæval History of Mankind (1-11:26); including the creation of the world, the origin of evil, the beginnings of civilization, the great flood, the confusion of tongues and dispersion of peoples; and exhibiting in the form of genealogies the relation of the races of men to one another, and the place of the Semites, and particularly of the Hebrews, among them; and, second, The History of the Forefathers of the Israelitish People, beginning with the migration of the Terahites (11:27-32), and ending with the burial of Jacob at Hebron and the death of Joseph in Egypt (50). The periods of this history are represented by three generations: Abraham (12:1-25:18), Isaac (25:19-36), and Jacob (37-50). In each of these periods the son through whom the line descends becomes the central figure in the story before the death of his father; the other branches of the family are briefly catalogued and dismissed (the sons of Keturah, 25:1-4; Ishmael, 25:12-18; Esau, 36; cp also Moab and Ammon, 19:30-38; the descendants of Nahor, 22:20-24). The goal of the history is kept constantly in view by a series of promises of numerous posterity and of possession of the land of Canaan, made first to Abraham and repeated in like terms to Isaac and Jacob.⁵ A similar method appears in 1-11:26. Closer examination shows a somewhat more artificial scheme marked by the recurrence of the formula, 'This is the genealogy of N. N.', by which the book appears to be divided into ten sections: viz.—1-4⁶ 5:1-6:8 6:9-9:29 10:1-11:9 11:10-26 11:27-25:11 25:12-18 25:19-35 29:36 1-43 37-50.

It is a fortunate circumstance that the author of the Pentateuch has so faithfully preserved the representation 2. Sources: P. works from which he borrows. This renders critical analysis possible, and enables us to recover, at least in part, the older histories from which our Pentateuch was compiled.¹ These older works are primarily two, one of which is commonly called, from its predominating interest in the religious and especially the sacerdotal institutions of Israel, The Priestly History and Law-book (P); the other, from its affinity with the literature of the flourishing period of prophecy, is sometimes named The Prophetic History (JE).² The former is marked by such peculiarities of matter, style, and diction that the parts of Genesis which are derived from P are easily separated from JE; and consequently in this part of the analysis there is substantial unanimity among critics.³ It is not always so easy to distinguish from P the additions and changes which were made by the author, or rather compiler, of our Hexateuch (R_P), or by later editors; since both R_P and the diaskeuasts who followed him belonged to the school of priestly scribes, and in thought and expression show close affinity to P. In Genesis, however, the additions are of small extent,⁴ and the changes only such as the union of two distinct and not always contemporaneous sources rendered necessary.⁵ For the present purpose, therefore, the priestly stratum may be treated as a whole.

To it are assigned: 6. The reconstruction of P discloses no serious gaps;⁸ and the redactor's partiality for this source makes it antecedently probable that he preserved it substantially intact. It thus appears that P's Genesis—if we may use the name thus—was much shorter than the history of the same period in JE.⁹ The groundwork of P is a series of interconnected genealogies—viz., Adam (5:1-28 30-32), Noah (6:9 f.), Noah's sons (10:1-7 20 22 f. 31 f.), Shem (11:10-26), Terah (11:27 31 f.), Ishmael (25:12-17), Isaac (25:19 f. 26b), Esau (36), Jacob (35 22b-26 37 2).¹⁰ These are constructed upon a uniform plan: each bears the title, 'This is the genealogy of N. N.'; each begins with a brief recapitulation connecting it with the preceding table;¹¹ the method is the same throughout. The genealogies are made the basis of a systematic chronology;¹² and short historical notices are appended to them, as in the case of 2 This name must not be taken to imply that JE was written by prophets, nor that it has in the proper sense a prophetic character; still less must 'prophetic' be understood to connote antagonism to the priesthood. 'Popular History' would perhaps be a better designation.

Abraham and Lot (12^{ab} 5 13⁶ 11^b 12^a 16 1^a 3 15^f. 19^{2g}); but the only things in the story of the patriarchs which are related in any detail are the covenant with Abraham (17; cp 35^{g-12} 48³⁻⁶) and the purchase of the family sepulchre at Hebron (23). With the exception of these chapters, the patriarchal history in P is a meagre abstract,¹ and would hardly be intelligible except to readers familiar with the fuller narratives. In the primæval history the creation and the flood are narrated at some length; for all the rest we have only genealogies and a chronology. The author's predominating interest in the history of religious institutions is apparent throughout. The sabbath had its beginning and its perpetual type in the rest of God after the creation of the world; the prohibition of eating flesh with the blood in it is the new commandment given to Noah and his sons (i.e. to all mankind) after the flood; the covenant with Abraham has the seal of circumcision, practised, in somewhat different form, by Ishmaelites (and presumably Edomites) as well as Israelites. The contrasted accounts of the marriages of Esau and Jacob (26^{34 f.} 27⁴⁶ 28⁹) reflect the stress which strict Judaism put upon purity of race—unlike Edom, Israel shunned intermixture with the peoples of Canaan.

In contrast with the popular character of JE the treatment of the history in P makes the impression of a work of study and reflection. An antiquarian interest is often apparent. 3. P contrasted with J and E. The unconscious anachronisms of the older writers, in whose pictures of the past their own present is always recognisable, are sedulously avoided; in their place we find a calculated archaism. The chief sources of P in the patriarchal history were obviously the same older narratives which, united with P, have been preserved to us—viz., J and E; nor is it demonstrable that in these chapters any other sources were employed.² In the primæval history the dependence of P upon J is evident; but the problem is rendered difficult by the lack of homogeneity in J itself (see § 7). The marked differences between P and J in the story of the flood are most naturally explained by the hypothesis of recurrence to the Babylonian original, perhaps in a variant form. It has been conjectured, not without plausibility, that Gen. 1 is based upon a Yahwistic cosmogony which it supplanted; but the relation of this assumed original to the main stock of J is obscure. In any case our J was not P's sole source in Gen. 1-11.³

From its very nature P's compend lacks the living interest of JE's fuller narrative. From a literary point of view also there is a vast distance between the freedom, ease, and poetic charm of the older writers and the stiff and constrained style of P, who always seems to be labouring not to be misunderstood.⁴ Theologically, on the other hand, P stands on a higher plane than his predecessors. The unity of God is assumed without controversy; God is absolute and supramundane; creation is a transcendent act for which a specific term is necessary; history is in an eminent sense the work of God, the execution of a divine plan; revelation is without sensible mediation—theophanies, angels, dreams have disappeared; its successive stages, marked by the names of God—Elohim, El-Shaddai, Yahwè—correspond to three stages in the history of religion, the covenants with Noah, Abraham, and Israel. The religious institutions of Israel had their origin at Sinai; sacrifices were not offered in the patriarchal age. Anthropomorphisms are avoided, or reduced to those harmless figures without which men can hardly speak of a personal God at all; anthropopathisms are still more scrupulously shunned. The mythical elements in the primæval history are almost completely eliminated or neutralised. The chapters in the lives of the forefathers which gave offence to a more refined morality are passed over in silence. The colourlessness of P's narrative is in part due to this expurgation. Alike in the lofty theology, the historical pragmatism, and the moral depuration, the reflection of a later age is manifest.¹

creation of the world to the death of
4. Sources: JE. Joseph,² in which we recognise the second chief source used by the author of our Genesis (JE). This narrative has a distinctly popular character, resembling the older parts of the books of Judges and Samuel. The stories are such as we may suppose to have been gathered from living tradition, and they are told with the spirit and freedom of the best folk-tales. Compared with P, this source as a whole represents a less advanced stage of religious development. Certain differences in this respect which may be observed in particular stories, as well as some diversities of conception and expression, might be attributed to the diverse origin of the stories or to divergence in oral tradition. The numerous and striking doublets in the patriarchal history, however, and especially the way in which they are combined, prove that the material of JE was not drawn immediately from popular tradition, that the author had before him at least two older written histories of this period.³ One of these histories (J) from the beginning uses the name Yahwè; the other (E), like P, throughout Genesis employs only Elohim or hi-Elohim—a peculiarity which for a time deceived the critics, and led them to attribute the elohistic stories of the patriarchs to P, with which they have otherwise no affinity.⁴ In all other respects E is much more nearly akin to J; the resemblance in matter, form, and spirit is indeed so close that, where for any reason the criterion of the divine names fails us, it is often impossible to determine with confidence from which of the two sources, J or E, certain parts of the composite narrative are derived. The difficulty of the analysis is enhanced by the fact that the author of the older history (R_{JE}) united his parallel sources more intimately, and in general treated his material more freely than did the author of our Genesis (R_P).⁵ In the analysis of JE there is therefore a wider margin of uncertainty, and much greater diversity of opinion among critics.

The narrative of E begins abruptly in Gen. 20, plunging into the midst of the story of Abraham;⁶ the beginning has not been preserved.⁷ In 20-22 E is the principal source (J in 21 1^a 2^a 6^b 7—combined with P—33 22 20-24; R_{JE} 20 18 21 34 22 14^b-18). In 24^f. the removal of the parts assigned above to P (§ 2) leaves the narrative of J unmixt.⁸ At the beginning of 26 (1-6) R_{JE} has enlarged upon the original text of J which may be recognised in 1^a 6 2^a 3^a 6 (5 R_D); 15 18 are also by R_{JE}; the remainder is from J. In 27 1-45 J is the main source; but the duplication at more than one point and certain peculiarities of expression show that the (closely parallel) narrative of E has also been laid under contribution; to the latter we may with some probability ascribe the verses which represent Jacob as deceiving his father by wearing kid skin on his neck and hands.⁹

⁴ See HEXATEUCH, §§ 2, 6 ff. 12.

⁶ E seems to have been used, however, by R_{JE} in the first verses of 15.

⁷ For a conjecture as to the reason, see Kue. Hex. § 8, n. 8. On the question whether E originally had a primæval history parallel to Gen. 1-11, see below, § 7.

⁸ Some transposition has probably taken place in 24-26.

In 28 10-22, 27. 11 f. 17 f. 20-22 are from E (13-16 R_{JE}). The greater part of 29 f. is from J; but with a considerable, though not always precisely definable, admixture of E—notice the interchange of Yahwè and Elôhim, the double etymologies of the names of several of Jacob's children (30 16 and 18, 20, 23 and 24), and the different accounts of Laban's contract with Jacob (30 25 ff.).¹ Chap. 31 is chiefly from E (J in 1 3 25-27 46 48-50). To E belong also 31 55-32 2 [32 1-3] 130-21 [146-22] 23 [24]; the rest of the chapter is from E (? R_{JE} 9-12 [10-13] 32 [33]). In 33 J is still the chief source (E in 5b, perhaps 8-10* 18b-20). The groundwork of 34 is J (1-3* 7 11 f. 13* 19 25* 26 30 f.); the second element, ascribed by some critics to E₂, is more probably of later origin (see above, § 2). Chap. 35 1-8 16-20 are chiefly E; 21 f.* J (the rest of the chapter is from P). Chap. 36 10-39, or at least 31-39 are ascribed by many to J (or J₂). In 37 J is found in 2* 3 f. 12-18 (in the main) 20a 21 23b 25-27 28* 32 f. 35; the remainder is from E. In the rest of the story of Joseph the two sources are not so closely interwoven; the author's method was to make large extracts from one or the other, introducing here and there traits taken from the parallel narrative. Thus 38 39 are almost wholly from J (traces of E in 39 1-7); 40-42 are from E, with sporadic verses or clauses of J (40 12 3b 5b 15b; 41 41 49*); 42 2a 46-6a 7 27 f. 38); 43 f. again are from J (E only in 43 14 23(4)); 45-46 5a are chiefly E (J in 45 1a 2* 4b 5* 13 f. 28 46 1a); 46 28-47 6 47 13-26 29-31 is from J; in 48 E is found in 1 8b 9a 10b-12 15 f. 20-22; the rest (after P is removed) is J. Chap. 49 1-27, the so-called Blessing of Jacob, was probably included in J. Chap. 50 1-11 14 are chiefly, if not wholly, from J; 15-26 from E. For a fuller exhibition of the grounds and results of the analysis, and discussion of particular points, see the works whose titles are given in § 9.

The history of the patriarchs is related at considerable length in both J and E. The two narratives are in general closely parallel, representing slightly different versions of the same stories. These chapters therefore offer the most favourable opportunity for a comparison of the two sources. From a literary point of view J is the better narrator. His vocabulary is rich and varied; while the intractable Semitic sentence becomes in his hands wonderfully flexible and expressive. He tells his story directly, swiftly, with almost epic breadth, and with just that degree of circumstance which gives the note of reality. Nor is he simply content to bring before us with unequalled vividness the external action; he makes us enter into the inner drama, the feelings and motives of the actors.³

The religious element in the stories is constant and pervasive. The forefathers are favourites of Yahwè, who guides them in all their migrations, and is with them everywhere to protect and bless them. He appears to them in person, and holds converse with them as a man with his friends; they answer him with pious reverence, but with the freedom of intimacy.⁴ Yahwè is the living God of simple faith and childlike imagination; reflection has not yet begun to find his immediate intervention in the ordinary affairs of men inconsistent with his exalted Godhead. The morality of the patriarchs naturally reflects in the main the moral standards of the author's age; in this, as in religion, the forefathers are idealised by popular legend, and are not consciously created ideal figures. A didactic aim, a disposition to underscore the lesson of the story, nowhere appears. The 'fine vein of ethical and religious reflection' which has sometimes been attributed to J is the result in part of an erroneous analysis; in part it comes of ascribing to the author the very modern reflections of his interpreters. Of the influence of the prophetic movement of the eighth century there is no trace in those parts of J which on other grounds we have reason to regard as original; the work represents the soil in which the new prophecy had its roots, not the first fruits of that prophecy.

E is not quite the equal of J in the art of narrative or in mastery of the language; though the distance between them is not very great. The treatment is on the whole less poetical, the impression which his story makes less vivid. Compared with the parallels in J, the patriarchal legends in E show the beginnings of theological reflection. The consistent avoidance of the name Yahwè down to the moment of its revelation to Moses (Ex. 3 14) is evidence of this. The story of the offering of Isaac, teaching that God refuses human sacrifice, and accepts a ram instead of the firstborn, is also from E.¹ True theophanies, such as J describes, do not occur in E; if God appears to men, it is not in bodily reality, but in dreams; when he speaks to them, it is by a voice from heaven. The idealising of the patriarchs goes a step farther; Abraham, for example, is a prophet, whose intercession is effectual with God; a disposition to remove or mitigate offensive traits of the tradition is hardly to be ignored. There is also a touch of learning in E; he notes that the Syrian Laban spoke Aramaic (Jegar-sahadutha; but see GALEED, 1), and that the ancestors of Israel in their old home beyond the Euphrates were heathen;² especially in things Egyptian—topography, customs, names, etc., he brings out a good deal of knowledge. In this also E appears to be younger than J.

The great mass of material common to J and E, and the close resemblance, even in details, between the two versions of the patriarchal story, prove that they must have had a proximate common source, in which the traditions of the forefathers had been united, and to a certain degree fixed.

In this common stock, from which both J and E are drawn, a fusion of the traditions of Israel and Judah had already been effected; traditions of the central sanctuaries—Bethel, Shechem, Gilgal—stand side by side with those of Hebron and the remoter south—Beersheba and Beer-labai-roi—and of Mahanaim and Peniel E. of the Jordan.³ There can be no doubt that this fusion took place in Israel, rather than in Judah;⁴ observe that—in J as well as in E—Rachel is the beloved of Jacob, Leah the unloved wife who was foisted on him by deceit; that Joseph and Benjamin are his favourite sons; and that Joseph is the one character who is throughout above reproach. The variations which J and E present in the reproduction of this common tradition are in part attributable to the individuality of the authors, in part, as has been already intimated, to a somewhat different religious point of view; in part, however, they reflect the particular interests of Israel and Judah. When we find, for example, in the story of Joseph and his brethren, that in E Reuben is the good brother who tries to save Joseph from them, and is afterwards their leader and spokesman, as it was his birthright to be, whilst in J this rôle is played by Judah, we can hardly fail to recognise in the latter a Judæan recension of a story which in its origin was certainly Ephraimite.

Critics are agreed, without dissent,⁵ that E was written in the northern kingdom. In regard to J there is not the same unanimity, some scholars attributing it also to an Ephraimite author,⁷ whilst the majority believe it to be of Judæan origin. The reasons for the former opinion, however, prove no more than that the common stock of Israelite tradition from which both J and E are drawn was collected and systematised at the Ephraimite sanctuaries (§ 5, end). On the other hand, we have already noted in the story of Joseph (§ 5, end) one decisive indication that J gives us a Judæan version of the history. This is confirmed by other evidence. The legends of Abraham and especially of Isaac—the heroes of the southern saga—are given much more fully in J than in E; and, what is more significant, the original locality of the story is preserved, whilst in E Abraham is removed from Hebron to Beersheba, a sanctuary much frequented by pilgrims from the northern kingdom. In other points also the greater interest of J in the situation in the south of Palestine is manifest; note the genealogies of (Joktan) Keturah, Ishmael, Esau (all J; see GENEALOGIES i., § 4); the large space given to the relations of Jacob and Esau; local Judæan clan-legends such as Gen. 38; Kenite traditions in the primæval history, etc. (see CAIN).

6. Age of J and E; method of R_{JE}.

There is no evidence of literary dependence on either side; what J and E have in common is drawn from the common stock of tradition. A comparison of the two such as we have made in § 5, especially in their religious standpoint, shows that J is the more primitive; E gives signs of more advanced historical and theological reflection. Since we have no reason to think that the development of the southern kingdom was much behind that of Israel, we may safely infer that J is the older of the two sources.¹ Both were written at a time when the national spirit was unbroken, and when the ancient holy places which are the scenes of so much of the patriarchal history were in all their glory. Nor did the authors who tell with so much interest of the founding of the cultus at these sanctuaries dream that the worship which was offered to Yahwê there in their own day was not acceptable to him. They wrote, therefore, before the fall of the northern kingdom (734, 721 B.C.); and since even E is untouched by the teaching or the spirit of Hosen,² we must take our lower limit at least a generation earlier, say about 750 B.C.

The rare historical allusions in Genesis do not enable us to determine the date of the two sources more exactly. Gen. 11²⁵ presupposes the complete subjection of the Canaanites, the work of David and Solomon; 27²⁹ (J) refers to the conquest of Edom by David, and 40 to the re-establishment of its independence under Joram (died 842 B.C.; 2 K. 8²⁰ ff.); 31⁴⁴ ff. (J and E) derives its significance from the conflicts between Israel and the Aramæans of Damascus over the frontier in Gilead in the second half of the ninth century. The Egyptian names in the story of Joseph (E; E₂) in the judgment of competent Egyptologists point to the times of the twenty-sixth dynasty (7th cent. B.C.). To this century Gen. 22 also probably brings us.

The allusions in the prophets of the eighth century, especially in Amos and Hosea, to the patriarchal stories are not of such a nature as to make it certain whether they are derived from J or E, or from some other source. On the whole, so far as the evidence in Genesis goes, we should be inclined to assign to E a date near the middle of the eighth century, while J may be put a half-century or more earlier.

Additions have been made to both J and E by later hands. Thus, Gen. 12¹⁰⁻²⁰, though exhibiting affinity to J, is manifestly a younger variant of the story 20⁶⁻¹¹ (J), and is violently intruded in its present connection. A number of other passages are regarded by most critics as secondary accretions to the original narrative of J;³ it is in some cases difficult to say whether they should be ascribed to R_{JE} or to previous editors of J. (On the strata of J in the primæval history, see § 7 below.) The secondary elements in E are in Genesis of less importance; one strand of 34 is by some thought to have this origin.⁴

In uniting J and E, R_{JE} plainly desired to make the history as complete as possible, and took pains to omit no significant detail which he found in either narrative.⁵ He adapted his method to the nature of the sources and their mutual relations; sometimes transcribing almost unchanged long passages from one or the other, sometimes so closely interweaving them as to baffle our analysis. In general he appears to reproduce the text of his authors faithfully, though not altogether so mechanically as R_P. His own additions are for the most part designed either to connect and harmonise the extracts from the sources or to emphasise the religious motives of the history. The language of these additions resembles that of J rather than of E; but in both thought and style there is a marked approximation to the

² Later additions to E (E₂), which in Genesis are not many, are here disregarded.

³ Gen. 13¹⁴⁻¹⁷ 18¹⁷⁻¹⁹ 22^{6-33a} 39 (Kue., Co.). Kuenen thinks that such passages belong to the Judæan recension of J; the original work (J₁) was Ephraimite.

Deuteronomic school. There is no doubt that the author was a Judæan, and that his history was composed in the seventh century. In Genesis there is nothing to indicate whether he wrote before or after the reforms of the year 621. Nor are there in this book more than sporadic traces of a Deuteronomistic redaction.

We have seen that E first appears in the story of Abraham (Gen. 20-22; perhaps in 15¹⁻⁵); if this source also included a history of the beginnings of mankind, no part of it has been preserved.² In the primæval history the subtraction of P leaves a narrative Gen. 1-11.¹ which has the general characteristics of J.

Closer examination shows, however, that this narrative is not consistent throughout. It was long ago observed that by the side of the Yahwistic version of the deluge-myth there are passages which know nothing of the great flood, and by all their implications exclude such a catastrophe. This is conspicuously the case with the account of the origin of civilisation among the posterity of Cain (4¹⁷⁻²⁴); further, in 9²⁰⁻²⁷ 11¹⁻⁹ (see CAINITES, § 2; DELUGE, § 14). Nor, if we remove the story of the flood and what else is obviously connected with it, does the remainder appear to be homogeneous; chap. 4¹⁻¹⁶, for example, is in striking conflict with 4¹⁷⁻²² (see CAIN). The conviction has thus forced itself upon critics that J in Gen. 1-11 is not a unit; and much labour and ingenuity have been expended in efforts to solve the difficult problems which the chapters present.³

The simplest hypothesis is that the original primæval history of J, which embraced 2^{4b-3} 4¹² 22^{16b-24} 6¹⁻⁴ 9²⁰⁻²⁷ 11¹⁻⁹, was supplemented by another writer who introduced the Babylonian deluge-myth; a Sethite genealogy (now supplanted by P's) of which only 4²⁵ ff. 6²⁹ remain (see SETHITES); and an ethnographical table in the form of a genealogy of which parts are preserved in chap. 10: chap. 4^{2a*} 3^{16a}, though also secondary, is of different origin and was probably inserted by an earlier hand.⁴ A methodical and acute attempt to explain the phenomena by the hypothesis of composition has been made by Budde,⁵ who supposes that two distinct, though not independent, Yahwistic versions of the primæval history were combined by a third hand. The older of these (J₁), the ancient Hebrew primæval history, comprised substantially the same parts of Gen. 1-11 that are ascribed by Kuenen to the original text of J. A later writer (J₂) enlarged this to a primæval history of mankind by taking up the Babylonian mythical cycle transformed in the spirit of a lofty monotheism. This writer incorporated in his work as much of J as he was able to adapt to his other material and to his religious standpoint; producing thus, not an enlarged edition of J₁ but a counterpart designed to supersede it. A subsequent editor (J₃) united J₁ and J₂, harmonising them as well as he was able. It was in this composite form that the Yahwistic narrative in Gen. 1-11 lay before the author of the Hexateuch (R_P) and was by him combined with the primæval history of P.⁶

Two chapters in Genesis have been thought to be derived from special sources. (a) Gen. 14 narrates the

Gen. 14-49. Lot, recovery of the spoil of Sodom, and meeting with Melchizedek, king of Salem and priest of El-elyôn.

Opinions differ widely about the historical value of this chapter, some critics regarding it as a factitious legend, without any discoverable basis of fact, whilst others take it for a substantially trustworthy record of that remote age. This much controverted question is discussed in the article CHEDORLAOMER; here we must confine ourselves to the literary problem. It is now generally recognised that in its present form the story cannot be derived from any one of the chief sources of the

Pentateuch. Dillmann and Kittel (cp Ewald) endeavour to show that the late author (R or R_p) drew the substance of the story in E, which in turn drew the facts from an older special source, presumably a Canaanite account of the Elamite invasion.¹ The point of view and interest of the story are, however, distinctly Israelite throughout; there is no trace of a different representation; the supposed foreign original can hardly have furnished more than the mere setting—Dillmann himself admits that it may only have narrated the successful participation of the Hebrews in the war against the Eastern Kings—and for this it is unnecessary to assume a special source. Nor is the hypothesis that E furnished the basis of the present text much better supported.

The impression which the contents and style of the chapter make as a whole is of affinity with P and the midrashic elements in Chronicles rather than with the older Israelite historians.

(b) Gen. 49 1-27² is a poem, in which the dying patriarch Jacob delineates the character and forecasts the future of his twelve sons. Praises for some and prophecies of power and prosperity are mingled with severe censure of others and unfavourable predictions, so that Testament of Jacob would be a more suitable name for the poem than Blessing.³ The predictions reflect historical events long subsequent to the supposed time of their utterance—the settlement of the tribes in Palestine, the decadence of Reuben, the breaking up of Simeon and Levi, the rise of Judah to pre-eminence. Nothing in the poem points to a date earlier than the establishment of the Davidic kingdom.

The blessing of Joseph is thought by many critics to contain allusions to the northern kingdom (266), and to the Syrian wars of the ninth century (237), to which a reference is also found in 19 (Gad);⁴ the interpretation of these verses is, however, controverted. Reminiscences of the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5) are unmistakable in 137; on the other hand the blessing of Moses (Dt. 33) is plainly dependent upon Gen. 49.⁵

Some scholars question whether the historical background is the same throughout; the chapter seems to them rather a collection of sayings of diverse origin and age, from the period of the Judges to that of the Syrian wars, to which only a unity of redaction belongs.⁶ The poem as a whole makes, however, the impression of a work of one conception, though it is not free from glosses and perhaps longer interpolations.⁷

The pre-eminence given to Judah leaves no doubt that the author was of that tribe; the historical allusions which can be most certainly traced (in 4 to Gen. 35 22 in 5-7 to Gen. 34) are to the Judæan Tradition (J). It is, therefore, generally, and with all probability, inferred that the Testament of Jacob was incorporated in J.

GENNÆUS (ΓΕΝΝΑΙΟΥ [V]), 2 Macc. 12 2 RV, AV GENNEUS (g.v.).

GENNESAR ([τὸ ὕδωρ τοῦ] γεννησαρ [A], 1 Macc. 11 67) and Gennesaret (γεννησαρετ; but D. It. (Vg.), Pesh., Syr. Cur. and Lewis, γεννησαρ), a name of the Sea of Galilee, derived from a district, also called Gennesaret, on the W. side of the sea, towards its N. end: Mt. 14 34 and Mk. 6 53, 'they came to the land, unto Gennesaret' (ἐπὶ τῆν γῆν εἰς γ. [WH]); Lk. 5 1, 'he was standing by the lake of Gennesaret' (παρὰ τῆν λίμνην γ.). The best form is Gennesar, the גניסר (גניסר) of the Talmud and the Targums, the γεννησαρ of Josephus (γ. λίμνη or ἡ γεννησαρίτις). Talmud and Targums identify Gennesaret with the Chinnereth of the OT—i.e., the name belongs primarily to a city supposed by the Jews to have lain on the W. shore of the Sea of Galilee.

Thus, 'Chinnereth,' said R. Johanan (Meg. 6a), 'is Gennesarat. Why? Because its fruits are as sweet as the artichoke (בניןרא). According to R. Berachya, however (Ber. rab. 98), Gennesar was so called because it had princely gardens (גנין שריון).¹ Though Dillmann accepts the old Jewish identification, it is difficult to see the critical grounds for this. The very old name Chinnereth cannot be corrupted² from the recent name Gennesar, nor can Gennesar have arisen out of Chinnereth. It is probable, however, that Chinnereth was on the Sea of Galilee, and not impossible that Chorazin is a popular distortion of the old name Chinnereth (transposition of letters, and z for th). Chinnereth (misvocalized?) may be connected with Ass. karānu, (1) 'vine,' (2) 'wine';³ Gennesar is most probably from גן, 'garden' or 'plantation,' and גליל 'Galilee'⁴ (or a district of Galilee), a collateral form of which name (גליל or גלילת) is implied in the use of Nazōrean (ναζωραῖος) for Galilean in Mt. 2 23, and in the phrase the [Ne]farite Bethlehem, בית לחם (בית לחם) in contradistinction to 'Bethlehem of Judah' (see NAZARETH, and cp JOSEPH iii., § 8 f.).

The classical passage on the land of Gennesaret is Jos. B./iii. 10 8.⁵ The length of the district is estimated at 30 stadia, its breadth at 20. 'It is marvellous in beauty. The hardy walnut-tree grows there, but none the less the palm, which flourishes in hot climes, and close to it fig and olive trees. An ambition of nature, one might call it. Of the most princely fruits—grapes and figs—it gives an unbroken supply for ten months together, as well as other kinds. In addition to this excellent temperature, it is watered by a most fertilizing spring called καθαρναουμ (Capernaum).' The Talmud is equally enthusiastic (see Neub. Geogr. 45).

It is no doubt the plain of el-Ghuwr (the little Ghōr), which stretches, 'in the form of an irregular parallelogram, verging almost to a crescent,'⁶ from the cliffs at 'Ain et-Tin ('fountain of the fig tree') to the hill behind Mejdol, on the S., a space measuring 3 m. by 1 1/2 m. It is shut in by rugged hills, except on the N. and NW., where there is a steep descent from the hill-country of Naphtali, and from the plains of Lower Galilee, respectively. Its soil is a rich, basaltic loam, but cultivated only in patches. The rest is covered with thickets of nebk trees, oleanders, dwarf palms, and gigantic thistles and brambles. The melons and cucumbers grown on the plain are the best and earliest in Palestine. This is of course due to the great depression of the plain.

The principal spring is the 'Ain el-Mudawera ('round fountain'), which is 25 minutes N.W. of el-Mejdel. The basin, enclosed by a round wall, and alive with small fish, is concealed by thickets; but the water wells out in a full stream. The spring which excites the enthusiasm of Josephus is no doubt the 'Ain et-Tābiga.

The Greek name mentioned in the texts of the Pilgrims was Heptapēgon; there are in fact seven springs, mostly hot, which to-day supply motive power to a mill. An aqueduct built in the rock brought the water southward to the plain. This is one reason why Tell Hūm can hardly be the ancient Capernaum. Josephus (see above) is positive as to the name, and there was certainly no provision for guiding the water towards Tell Hūm.¹ 'Ain et-Tin, near which is Khān Mīnyeh (the most probable site for CAPERNAUM), is distinguished by the sweetness of its water, which hursts forth impetuously and hurries to the lake. Close at hand are other springs; hence, in Burchard's time, the pastures of Mīnyeh were proverbial for their richness. The largest volume of water, however, is that supplied by the Wādī er-Rahāqīyeh, which is scattered over the plain in all directions by small canals and watercourses (Rob. BR 282). GENNEUS RV Gennæus (ΓΕΝΝΑΙΟΥ [V]-ΝΕΟΥ [A]; in Syr. ܨܢܢܝ, apparently the father of APOLLONIUS, 5 (2 Macc. 122), who is thus distinguished from the other two men of that name mentioned in 2 Macc. 35 421.

GENTILES. The Hebrew term Gōyim (גוֹיִם)—i. e., 'nations'—is specially used for the aggregate of non-Israelite nations (Neh. 58), as opposed to and contrasted with Israel, socially, racially, politically (Ps. 21), and religiously (Ps. 135 15). As connoting this contrast, gōyim is translated in AV often, and in RV

1. Terms. less frequently (see Preface), 'Gentiles' or 'heathen' (in G commonly ἔθνη, in Vg. gentes), whilst עַם, 'am (used of Israel—e. g., Ex. 15 13 Is. 426 Di.), is rendered 'people' λαός, populus. In Rom. 29 f., AV inconsistently renders ἔθνη 'Gentile,' thus effacing the later antithesis between Jew and Greek (see HELLENISM, § 2).

In the Apocrypha and NT the same distinction is preserved side by side with the new one just referred to. In Lk. 2 32 ἔθνη and λαός σου ἰσραηλ are contrasted.

From another point of view the contrast between Israelites and non-Israelites is expressed by the term גוֹיִם, 'wicked' = גוֹיִם, gōyim 'nations' (e. g., Ps. 95 6). Other general terms used synonymously with gōyim are: עַמִּים, ammim, Lev. 20 24 Ps. 33 10, and often; אֲמִיּוֹת, ammim, Ps. 117 1; אֲמִיּוֹת, ammim, Ps. 21. All these terms = peoples. Also אָדָמִים, 'men', Jer. 32 20 Zech. 9 1, and אָדָמִים, 'sons of men', Ps. 58 2 [3] (Smend, AT Rel.-gesch. 380); אָדָמִים, 'man', Ps. 56 1 [2] (We., in Smend, 380). Similarly, in NT, κόσμος is used of the world, excluding and opposed to the Church.

The individual foreigner is נֶכְרִי, nochrī, EV 'stranger,' 'foreigner'; גֵּר, ger, RV 'strangers'; אֲרָם, aram, EV 'stranger' or, if he becomes a resident alien, גֵּר, ger, EV 'stranger,' 'sojourner'; אֲרָם, aram, EV 'stranger,' 'sojourner.' In the later books of OT (2 Ch. 30 25; Bertholet, Stellung d. Isr. 178) and in later Heb., גֵּר, ger, 'Proselyte.' Cp STRANGER, PROSELYTE.

During its nomad life, Israel was scarcely a well-defined whole, clearly marked off from all non-Israelite peoples; its constituent elements were

2. Israel before the Conquest of Canaan. still somewhat variable. Some of the tribes or clans which afterwards constituted Israel may have been, at times, connected with non-Israelites as closely as with Israel, if not more closely. Israel, at this stage, figures as a loosely connected group of tribes or clans, similar in character to the other groups which made up the wandering population of the Arabian and Syrian deserts. Genesis (J, followed later by P) suggests that the first stage of the religious differentiation of Israel is the consciousness on the part of these Arab and Syrian nomads of a religious and ethical status distinct from that of the more civilised Chaldeans. In response to a divine call Abraham and Lot migrate westward.

In our present text only P narrates the migration of Terah and therefore of Nahor the ancestor of Laban, but that of Nahor seems implied in J, Gen. 24 1 cp E, 31 53 'the God of Abraham and the God of Nahor.' This group, Abraham, Lot, Nahor, stands for Israel, the Ishmaelite, Keturaites, and other Arabs (Gen. 22 20-24), Ammon, Moab and Edom, and Aram. So, in Gen. 9 26 Yahwè is the God of Shem. Also Lot—i. e., Moab and Ammon—is the subject of Yahwè's special care; Ishmael and Edom are blessed of Yahwè, and Laban speaks of Jacob as 'Blessed of Yahwè,' Gen. 24 31.

As these ideas of tribal kinship are not likely to have arisen after the settlement in Palestine, we may probably regard them as handed down by tradition from the nomad period. Thus apparently the Israelite tribes in their nomad state regarded themselves as part of a complex of tribes of a similar religious status, in a measure superior to or, at any rate, distinct from that of other peoples. At the same time each tribe and group of tribes would have its own sacra, whose sanctity, however, could not differ in kind from those of other tribes. Thus, on the one hand, the idea of the gōyim or non-Israelite peoples as contrasted in religious status with Israel was for the present impossible—(a) because Israel was not yet a nation clearly marked off from kindred clans, (b) because Israel was unconscious of any difference in kind between its own and other religions. On the other hand, the elements of the distinction between Israel and the gōyim were present—(a) in the special relation of Israel and its kindred tribes to Yahwè, and (b) in the possession by each tribe or group of tribes of its own special sacra.

The settlement in Canaan and the stirring incidents that preceded it, united Israel by a common history, cut off the nation from the nomad tribes,

3. Israel in Canaan in the pre-prophetic period. and fixed and defined not only its national scope, constitution, and life, but also its special relation to Yahwè.

The necessary wars of the early period, and especially the strong united monarchy of Saul, David, and Solomon contributed to strengthen the newborn self-consciousness of Israel. The settlement in Canaan, however, as has been shown elsewhere, also brought into play an exactly opposite tendency (see ISRAEL, § 8 f., GOVERNMENT, § 11 f.).

In the early periods of the settlement in Canaan, Israel had no sense of any marked contrast, religious or otherwise, between itself and the Canaanites, so that down to the appearance of Elijah it shows little trace of any religious particularism. It is true, it made special claims for its national God, but only in the same sense as the neighbouring peoples. It does not seem to have risen to the consciousness that Yahwè was absolutely unique, and had universal and exclusive claims to obedience. Other gods also are thought of as real, with legitimate claims over their own peoples. An exile from the land of Yahwè must serve other gods (1 S. 26 19). Probably Am. 7 17 Hos. 9 3 ff. represent traditional ideas in speaking of foreign lands as unclean—i. e., not admitting of the worship of Yahwè. Chemosh is able to bestow an inheritance on the Ammonites (Judg. 11 24; Smend, 111 f.).

The attitude of Israel towards foreigners is largely conditioned by the chronic hostility common to half-civilised nations in primitive times. War is sacred, and Yahwè the national champion; hence the enemies of Israel are also the enemies of Yahwè, and their destruction (see BAN, § 2 f.) is a religious act well-pleasing to him. On the other hand, hospitality to strangers is a sacred duty, and the resident alien (גֵּר) is carefully protected and provided for. Moreover, Israel had friends and allies as well as enemies. The patriarchal narratives of JE were doubtless current during this period. The close kinship claimed with Moab, Edom, Ammon, Aram, and the Arabs suggests friendship and even a certain community of religious feeling between Israel and many of its neighbours (see above); compare the alliances with Tyre and Hamath. Moreover, according to J, the human race is of one divinely-created stock descended through Noah from Adam. Neither the character of Israel itself nor its relations to its neighbours suggest that the term foreigner connoted any religious ideas peculiar to Israel. On the other hand, the population of the Hebrew state was very heterogeneous. In addition to the surviving Canaanites, according to Ex. 12 38 Nu. 11 4 (JE), Israel included foreign elements before the settlement; and the many references to resident aliens (גֵּרִים) suggest that there were in Israel considerable numbers of other foreigners.¹ As has been well pointed out, the religious status of foreigners in Israel did not differ essentially from their status elsewhere. The relations of Israel to resident aliens are political and social rather than spiritual.² This does not of course apply to the permanent non-Israelite population, Canaanites, etc. As we have seen, the interaction of religious influences between the latter and Israel is a most important feature in the development of the Hebrew attitude towards non-Israelites and their religion. During this period the tendency was towards assimilation and syncretism.

In tracing the development of the doctrine of the gōyim, it is convenient to treat the prophets and Judaism as two consecutive stages; but no hard and fast chronological line can be drawn between them: they overlap for a considerable period. It is not merely that there were germs of Judaism in the prophets, and that the writings, and, in some measure, the ideas and spirit of the prophets survived even to the Christian era; the great movement which began with Amos and Hosea continued at least till 2 Isaiah; whilst Judaism begins formally in Deuteronomy, and Ezekiel belongs far more to the Judaistic than to the prophetic stage of Jewish theology.

i. Particularism.—Jewish particularism had its root in the reaction against the syncretistic tendencies of the previous period. Elijah, Elisha, and their successors felt that Baal-worship, or any confusion of Yahwè with Baal or Moloch, or any assimilation of his worship to theirs, corrupted the national life and dissolved that close union of Yahwè with Israel which was essential to the very existence of the nation. The struggle was continued, in varying forms, till the fall of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. In a measure the prophets started from the conception of national gods to whom the nation should be loyal (Jer. 211)—e.g., Israel to Yahwè; but their application of the principle was novel. National gods expected a profusion of sacrifices from their peoples; but if they were duly honoured they did not grudge any tribute offered by their worshippers to other gods. The prophets and JE, however, claimed for Yahwè Israel's exclusive homage (Ex. 203).

This protest against Yahwè being confounded or associated with 'other gods' involved an assertion of his unique character and authority. When the prophetic revelation declared the absolute morality of Yahwè, it implied alike his uniqueness (Kayser-Mari, OT Theol. 142) and his supremacy. 'Other gods,' who neither professed morality themselves nor exacted it from their worshippers, were obviously inferior and abominable (נִלְוֵי וְרִי; Dt. 725 f. 27 15 Is. 44 19). Yahwè's supremacy over the nations is implied in the prophetic oracles concerning foreign nations, in his use of Assyria and Chaldea as instruments to chastise Israel, and this uniqueness and supremacy are most fully stated in 2 Isaiah; cp also the use of the general term Elohim for the God of Israel in E. While stress is chiefly laid on the incomparable superiority of Yahwè, the necessary deductions as to 'other gods' are drawn with increasing clearness. A certain reality is still ascribed to them, and their worship by other nations seems regarded as legitimate; Dt. 4 19 has been interpreted to mean that Yahwè assigned the host of heaven as objects of worship to all the nations under the whole heaven (cp Jer. 2 11), and, according to Smend (182, 206), Jer. 2 8 23 13 Is. 30 22 31 7 recognise a certain reality in heathen gods. Still, they are אֱלֹהִים לֹא, 'no gods' (Is. 28 etc. Hab. 2 18 Ezek. 30 13), אֱלֹהִים לֹא, 'not gods' (Jer. 2 11); in Dt. 7 26 their images are banned (בָּנִי); so in 1 K. 18 Yahwè is shown to be 'the God' (אֱלֹהֵינוּ) by the discomfiture of Baal (cp 2 K. 5 15 19 15-18 Is. 41 23 f.). In Is. 44 9-20 and the dependent passage, Jer. 10 1-9 (post-exilic addition), the foreign gods are identified with their idols and overwhelmed with contempt as stocks and stones. In Ezek. 30 13 the 'no-gods' are to perish; cp the Aramaic gloss, Jer. 10 11.

This exaltation of Yahwè, in all its varying aspects, established a religious contrast between Israel and other nations. (a) Baal-worship and the corruptions of the high places had arisen from intercourse with foreigners, hence the religious polemic tended to social separatism. (b) The inferiority of foreign gods implied the religious inferiority of foreigners. (c) The foreign invaders did not recognise that they were instruments of Yahwè; they went beyond their commission in oppressing Israel, and did not acknowledge Yahwè's supremacy. Hence they excited the righteous indignation of their victims; they set themselves in opposition to Yahwè, and gōyim came to represent a world at enmity with him, and therefore doomed to destruction (Jer. 10 25; Schultz, OT Theol. 2373 ff., ET). (d) The exaltation of Yahwè, the God of Israel (Dt. passim), implied the exaltation of Israel. Israel is the wife of Yahwè (Hos. 2 3 Jer. 2 2 Ezek. 16 Is. 54 5 f.), united with him by a special covenant (Hos. 2 18 [20] Jer. 11 10, etc.). Judah (and especially Jerusalem) is exalted as the special dwelling of Yahwè: Am. 1 2 Mic. 4 1-3=Is. 2 2-4 (the authorship and date of these passages is matter of controversy).

The growing tendency to particularism is clear in the literature. The prophets consistently denounce foreign alliances.

E, in the relations of Abraham 'the Prophet' to Abimelech, Gen. 20 21 22-31, foreshadows the spiritual pre-eminence of Israel (Bertholet, 84). According to Smend (197) the conception of the anti-religious character of the Gentiles is first found in Hos. 8 10 9 1. Dt. 7 1-6 displays fierce hostility to the Canaanites of Western Palestine, probably as types of foreign races. All intermarriage with them is forbidden. In Dt. 23 3 [4] the Ammonites and Moabites are excluded from the congregation of Israel to the tenth generation. So in Hab. 1 4 13 Israel is righteous (צַדִּיק) and the Chaldeans wicked (רָשָׁע). Lam. 1 10 says of the gōyim who sacked Jerusalem 'whom thou didst forbid to enter thy congregation.'

ii. Universalism.—Nevertheless, the prophetic exaltation of Yahwè tended not only to particularism but also to universalism. It was, indeed, natural that the supremacy of Yahwè over the nations should be thought of as manifesting itself in their chastisement; thus many of the oracles of the nations seem to contemplate their utter ruin, especially Jer. 25 15-33 46 28. Naturally, too, in Is. 60, etc., Israel shares Yahwè's political supremacy. Still, as time went on, it was obvious that although many calamities befell the gōyim, and great empires like Assyria disappeared, yet the gōyim as a whole remained. The fact that their extinction was not, at any rate, the immediate purpose of Yahwè is recognised and explained in two ways: (a) Some passages speak of the restoration or renewed prosperity of at least a remnant of certain nations—e.g., Jer. 46 26¹ (Egypt) 48 47¹ (Moab) 49 6¹ (Ammon) 49 39¹ (Elam) Ezek. 29 13 ff.¹ (Egypt). (b) Other passages contemplate a double judgment of the gōyim, one in the immediate future from which they may recover, and another later, which will involve their complete and final overthrow. In Ezek. 38 f., after the overthrow of Chaldea, which was to be the prelude to the restoration of the Jews, Gog and Magog are induced to attack Judah that they may be totally destroyed (cp Is. 24 22 66 18 f. Zeph. 3 8 ff.; Smend, 381 f.). Again, however much Israel might be interested in its own political supremacy, politics were closely connected with religion. Thus Yahwè's supremacy implied religious claims upon the gōyim, his supremacy was not complete unless they acknowledged and obeyed him; but he was the God of Israel, and such obedience implied the religious supremacy of Israel.

So in Is. 2 2-4²=Mic. 4 1-3 all nations are to come to Zion to learn the true religion; in Is. 19 18-25² Egypt and Assyria are to be united with Israel as Yahwè's people; in Is. 23 17 f.² the merchandise of Tyre is to be consecrated to Yahwè (interpretation doubtful); in Jer. 13 14 f. the neighbours of Israel are to be restored if they will learn the ways of Yahwè (cp 8 17 f.² 16 19 ff.). These ideas of the comprehension of gōyim amongst the worshippers of Yahwè, and of the mission of Israel to reveal him, reach their climax in the passages in which 2 Isaiah sets forth the servant of Yahwè—i.e., Israel—as 'a light to the Gentiles' and 'my salvation unto the ends of the earth' (40 6; cp 51 4). So in 42 5 Yahwé's care is for all mankind, in 45 22 Yahwé appeals to all the ends of the earth to turn to him, in 44 5 45 14 ff. 52 4 f. the restoration of Israel leads the gōyim to recognise Yahwé as the one God; cp 1 K. 8 41-43.

Similarly, Dt. shows a kindly feeling towards some of the kindred nations; in 21-13 it was Yahwé who gave Esau and Moab their inheritance, and the children of Esau are the brethren of Israel; in 23 7 (5) Edomites and Egyptians are commended to the kindly consideration of Israel. Yahwé is not wholly taken up with Israel, he cares in like manner for Philistines and Syrians (Am. 9 7). Nebuchadrezzar is his servant (Jer. 25 9) and Cyrus his anointed (Is. 45 1).

Moreover Dt. extends to the resident alien a share in the religious duties and privileges of the Israelite (16 10-17; participation in feasts). The provision of sabbath rest for the gēr in Ex. 20 10 22 12 is often regarded as due to R_D (Bertholet, 102).

Whenever OT consciously deals with the doctrine of man it recognises a religious relation of man as man with Yahwé; hence the gōyim are the objects of the justice of Yahwé and may perish under his chastisements, but they may also honour and obey him and receive his favours.

We have seen that the prophetic revelation, in exalting Yahwé above other gods, initiated two apparently

5. Judaism. contrary tendencies towards (i.) Jewish particularism, (ii.) universalism in religion; with a tendency to identify the gērīm more closely with Israel. We have now to trace the further development of these tendencies.

It should be noted, however, first of all, that the prophetic exaltation of Yahwé by no means developed, as we might have expected it to do, into an abstract monotheism. It is not upon the imaginary character of other gods that Judaism dwells, but upon their subordination to the only God worthy of the name (Ps. 18 31 [32]). The constant reference to the sacred objects of heathenism as 'abominations,' 'filth,' etc., suggests of itself that a kind of reality, a kind of sanctity (שִׁבְרָה) attaches to them (Smend, 206, n. 1); they continue to belong to the class of superhuman beings, either as angels or as demons. This, however, does but intensify the earnestness of Jewish opposition to heathenism. Hence the old question as to the position of the gērīm came to be viewed in a new light. If the Jews were to be absolutely separate from the gōyim, they had to decide whether to exclude the gērīm altogether or to include them in Israel. They adopted the latter course. The gērīm, who had shared the captivity, shared also the antagonism of the Jews to the Chaldeans; the differences between Jews and gērīm were forgotten in the infinitely greater differences between both and their oppressors (Bertholet, 110). Thus, for Ezek. 47 22 and P (Ex. 12 49, etc.), the religious status of the gērīm is practically identical with that of the Jews. Two important non-Israelite bodies were at last formally incorporated into the Jewish community by being genealogically connected with Israelite tribes, the Kenites with Judah, 1 Ch. 2 55 4 73, the temple-servants with the Levites, 1 Ch. 6 31-48 [16-23] 9 14-34. See KENITE, NETHINIM.

i. Jewish particularism.—The shame and misery of the exile and of much of the post-exilic period fostered and deepened Jewish hatred of foreigners. Their consciousness of spiritual pre-eminence prompted them to claim political distinction. Yahwé gives Egypt, Ethiopia, and Seba as a ransom for Israel (Is. 43 3). They were constantly exasperated by the contrast between their claims and their achievements. The old prophetic condemnation of Israel as corrupt, and the consequent sentence of ruin, lay in the background. The psalter—which, at any rate in its present form, mainly expresses the sentiments of post-exilic Judaism—dwells with much iteration on the contrast between Israel, sinful indeed, but yet the righteous people of Yahwé, and the gōyim, who are wicked (רְשָׁעִים) and God's enemies (Ps. 82 [3] 68 2 74 4-23 83 3 [4] 89 51 [52]). Israel still looked for deliverance through the ruin of the gōyim (Hag. 2 21 f. Zech. 1 18-21 [21-4] 14 Dan. 12 1 Ps. 2; cp ARMAGEDDON, Rev. 16 12-16 19 11-21). The intensity of Jewish feeling towards foreigners is specially shown by Pss. 7 35 69 109 and the Book of Esther. Moreover, the legislation from Dt., through Ezek., the Law of Holiness, and the various Priestly Laws, to the Mishna and the Talmud, all tended to make the Jews a race apart. Not only were foreigners excluded from the temple and intermarriage with them strictly forbidden, but the manifold regulations as to ceremonial cleanness produced mutual dislike and contempt between Jew and Gentile. They prevented any mitigation of race antipathy by social intercourse; and made every distinction between Jew and Gentile a mark of religious superiority, a token that Israel is kādōš (EV 'holy'; see CLEAN, § 1), as becomes the people of Yahwé.

Even the two rites of the eucharist and baptism have been most fruitful sources of bitterness and schism in Christendom. The countless rites of Judaism worked similar results still more effectually. Theological contrasts intensified the mutual alienation. Prophets might see mankind at the feet of the God of Israel; but there were no signs of any realisation of such visions. Meanwhile these same prophets had put an end to the old indifference to and tolerance of the worship of other gods by foreigners. The fierce and scornful denunciation of these gods obviously involved the condemnation of their worshippers (Is. 41 24 44 9 47 9 52 1 11; Smend, 371). As far as foreigners understood the Jewish faith, this assumption of superiority would be intensely irritating, scorn would beget scorn, and mutual alienation and hostility would rapidly increase.

Thus the Exile would naturally incline loyal and zealous Jews to particularism; and exiles who returned with Ezra and Nehemiah or at an earlier period would be specially loyal and zealous. Palestine, as they found it on their return, was wholly at variance with all their religious ideals. Indeed the very existence of revealed religion was in jeopardy. The population left behind in Palestine after Samaria and Jerusalem had fallen was probably as heterogeneous in race as that of the old Hebrew states. Samaria, moreover, had been partially re-peopled by foreigners who, in a fashion, worshipped Yahwé and became amalgamated with the remnant of the Israelites, thus introducing a new link between Israel and the gōyim. During the Exile relations were established between these Samaritans, the remnant of the Jews, and the neighbouring tribes. Thus the Jews in post-exilic Palestine tended to become a mixed community, with an eclectic faith, in which Yahwé, though the highest in rank, would have been indistinguishable in character from the foreign gods. The Jews, indeed, would have been a mere section of a loose aggregate of peoples in Palestine (Ezra 4 1 f.). In spite of Ezra 4 3, 'We have nothing in common, that ye should join us in building a temple for our God,'¹ in which Zerubbabel repudiates all connection with the Samaritans, it is clear that both among the nobles and among the people Ezra found many Jews who lived in the closest intercourse with their Samaritan and Gentile neighbours. The connection had been cemented by frequent intermarriage. Ezra and Nehemiah specially attacked this latter practice, and after a long and desperate struggle succeeded in dissolving such marriages illegal in the future (Ezra 9 f. Neh. 10 30 13, see EZRA i. § 5 f.). Thus they prevented the Jews from being merged in the neighbouring tribes, and made them a people by themselves, cut off from the gōyim as by a physical barrier. By the establishment of a Samaritan religious community, with a temple of its own, Nehemiah's enemies confessed themselves defeated. They no longer hoped to force themselves into the temple at Jerusalem and the Jewish fellowship. Henceforward the orthodox doctrine respecting the gōyim was that of P; they were unclean persons, whose presence would pollute the sacred land, people, and temple, and who were therefore to be kept aloof from these as much as possible. Ezra 6 21 speaks of those who 'separated themselves from the uncleanness of the gōyim of the country.' P's denunciations of the abominations (מְנוּחָה) of the Canaanites and of all association with them are a standard to determine the behaviour of the Jews towards other foreigners (Lev. 18 24-30 20 23 Nu. 33 50-56; cp Is. 35 8 52 1 Ps. 10 16 78 55 79 1).

ii. Universalism in Religion.—The tendency to particularism, however, did not extinguish the universalist aspect of the prophetic teaching; partly no doubt because the writings of the prophets were read and their authority acknowledged. The actual political opponents of Ezra and Nehemiah seem to have been worldly and half-heathen; yet earnest, spiritual men, who may have given a general support to the reforms, protested against pushing particularism to extremes; Ruth (on the date see RUTH, BOOK OF) favours mixed marriages, and Jonah is a strong protest against hatred towards the gōyim.

Other universalist passages were probably written without any thought of their relation to current particularism; they were ideal rather than practical. The catholic spirit of the prophets, which (as we have seen, § 4 ii.) especially manifests itself in 2 Isaiah, reappears in Is. 19:25 (on the date, see ISAIAH ii., § 9 [10]), Zech. 14:6 etc. This tendency shows itself even in the strictly Judaistic literature. P (Gen. 1 9:1-7) recognises the divine origin and sanctity of man as man; Zech. 2:11 [15] 9:7 Mal. 1:11 Tob. 13:11 speak of many nations submitting themselves to God. Moreover the form of the Wisdom literature is cosmopolitan; the contrast is not between Jew and Gentile, but between wise and foolish.

Finally, particularism and universalism blended in proselytising. Mankind might all enjoy the divine favour, and yet this favour might still be strictly limited to Jews, by the simple condition that mankind must become Jews, must receive circumcision, the physical token of Judaism, and adopt its social and religious customs. Even in this attempted combination the old antagonism broke out afresh. The school of Hillel (cp Mt. 23:15) were zealous in proselytising and sought to make admission to Judaism easy; the school of Shammai were strongly opposed to proselytes; and relics of the conflict are still to be read in the Talmud (Bertholet 319 ff.). On the other hand, Jewish particularism was constantly endangered by the influence of HELLENISM (g.v.) and by political relations with foreign powers.

The Jews prayed and offered sacrifices for their suzerains (Jer. 29:7 Ezra 6:9 ff. 7:15-23 1 Macc. 7:33 Bar. 1:11 Jos. B/ii. 17 2) and for friendly nations (1 Macc. 12:11: Spartans; Pss. 45 and 72 have been supposed to be written in honour of Ptolemy Philadelphus. The Maccabees and the Herods had very close and often very friendly relations with foreign powers, Greek, Roman, Arab,

Syrian, and Parthian. These relations often led foreigners to adopt Judaism and circumcision; but they also exercised a strong influence upon the Jews. The DISPERSION (g.v.) of the Jews had a similar twofold effect.

Thus from B.C. 200 we constantly meet with a strong Hellenising party in Palestine, and a similar tendency asserted itself elsewhere. It was checked in Palestine by the success of the Maccabæan revolt and the zeal of the Pharisees. Christianity, by drawing to itself the universalist elements, secured the victory over particularism in Judaism. Judaistic Christians, indeed, attempted to secure that Gentiles should not be admitted to the Church, unless they became Jews; but Paul finally delivered Christianity from Jewish exclusiveness by enforcing the principle that in Christ 'there is neither Jew nor Greek.' Here we touch the fringe of a new and great subject—HELLENISM (g.v.). Cp GALATIANS, § 12 f.

GENUBATH (גִּנְבַּת בְּאֵר) ΓΑΝΗΒΑΘ [BAL]), son of Hadad the Edomite (1 K. 11:20). The text is in much disorder (see HADAD i., 3; MIZRAIM, § 2 b). We shall best restore v. 19 f. as follows, assuming that Hadad had fled to Mizrim (the N. Arabian Muṣri), the king of which land, or of the larger realm to which it belonged, was called Pir'u—'And he gave him as a wife the sister of his (own) wife, and she bore him his son Genubath and reared him (גִּנְבַּתָּהּ, Kto.) in the midst of Pir'u's house. And Genubath was in the house of Pir'u in the midst of Pir'u's sons.' Probably Genubath, like his father, became a fierce enemy of Israel. His name (Genubath?) may mean 'foreigner'; cp Ar. januba, 'peregrinus fuit' (cp, however, NAMES, §§ 63, 78). Speculations based on Egyptian (PSBA 10:372 ff.) are misplaced. See JQR 11:551 ff. The object of this article is not to discuss the identification of places. That can in general be done better under the several place-names,² and is here a means, not an end. The object is to investigate the nature of the geographical conceptions of the Hebrews and the extent of their geographical information. The last three centuries (200 B. C.—100 A. D.) of the period covered by the scheme of this Encyclopædia are treated more briefly, because, as the Hebrews became more and more a part of the Hellenistic or the Roman world, they came to share more and more fully the general geographical ideas and information of a world that lies beyond the immediate scope of the work; see Strabo's map (below, col. 1691).

Among the ancient Hebrews there is little evidence of interest in geography as a scientific study. Their view of the earth as a whole seems to have been

1. Early notions. for the most part unreflecting and dependent on their common experience of natural phenomena.

Chief among these were the apparent rising and setting of the heavenly bodies (especially the sun), and the horizon-line enclosing the visible earth.

The sun 'goes out' (צָא), Judg. 5:31 Gen. 19:23 [J] Is. 13:10; מָצָא is sun-rise, Ps. 19:7 [6] in the morning, and at night 'goes in' (בָּא), Gen. 15:12 17 [J] 28:11 [E], and often; מָצָא is sun-set, Ps. 104:19 = West, Dt. 11:30 Jos. 14). Reflection upon this appears in the very late passage Eccles. 1:5.

The earth is a stationary mass; its trembling is a sign of supernatural power (Judg. 5:4 Is. 2:19 21).

That its surface is relatively flat and circumscribed, seems to follow from the expression (poetical and comparatively late; but this may only arise from the fragmentary character of our sources) אֶרֶץ אֲחֵרָה, 'ends of the earth' (Dt. 33 17 1 S. 2 10 Mic. 5 4 [3] Jer. 16 19 Ps. 28; cp WIND), as well as from the story of the flood (Gen. 1 7).

In the earliest times the question of support for this earth, felt to be solid and firm, was not raised.

There was water beneath it (Ex. 20 4 [E], Gen. 49 25 [older poem in J], whence Dt. 33 13; see Dr. ad loc.]; cp Gen. 1 11 [P]); but not until P. 242 (probably pre-exilic, see Ols., Bā., Che. O.P.S. 236) does the conception of Yahwē's founding the earth upon the seas appear. This may be nothing more than poetic imagery; and the same remark will apply to the thought of its resting on pillars (poet. and late; 1 S. 28 Ps. 104 5 Job 38 4 Is. 48 13, etc.). A still bolder conception is that of Job 26 7: 'Who hangeth [the] earth upon nothingness' (בְּלִימָה) Che. הַבְּלִימָה).

The rising and setting of the heavenly bodies gave the Hebrews, like other peoples, the standard of direction. They took their stand facing the sunrise.

2. Cardinal Points.

What we call the East they called the Front (קִדְמָה, Gen. 28 128 [J], and often) or place of dawning (מִזְמֶרֶת; ἀνατολή). So our West was for them the Behind (אֲחֵרָה, Is. 9 12 [11], cp Zech. 148 Joel 2 20), but usually (from their situation in Palestine) the direction of the sea (יָם, Gen. 128 13 14 28 14 [J], and often). The North they called the Left (שְׂמָאלָה, Gen. 14 15 Job 23 9 Josh. 19 26) but usually the Hidden, or Dark (צִלְמוֹת)—probably (if this be the true interpretation)¹ because in N. latitudes the N. is farthest from the course of the sun. The South was the Right (יְמִינָה, 1 S. 23 24 [J], etc.; יְמִינָה, Zech. 6 6 9 14 Job 39 26 Ex. 26 18 [P]; chiefly in P, Ezek., and late poet.), but also (most probably) the Shining (רִיחָה; also poet. and late; Dt. 33 23 Job 87 17 Eccles. 1 6 11 3, and often Ezek. [v. BDB 204 8]), and also the Dry, Barren (בָּרָה, Gen. 12 9 [J], and often, see Di. on Gen. 12 9; הַבָּרָה is, however, usually a specific name—the South Country, the southern part of Judah and the adjoining region to the south). Cp NEGBE, EARTH (FOUR QUARTERS OF).

How far did the knowledge of the Hebrews extend in these several directions? The extreme limits, as far as our canonical books testify—and their information was doubtless often fragmentary and vague—were these: On the E. to Media, Elam, Persia, with an allusion to India (הִינד; see INDIA) in Esth. 1 1 8 9 1 (OPHIR and SINIM are doubtful); on the N. to a range of (peoples and) countries extending from Northern Armenia (Magog, Ashkenaz, Ararat, Togarmah) across Asia Minor (Gomer, Tubal, Meshek); on the W., past Cyprus (Kittim), Ionia (Javan), Crete (Kaphtor), Carthage (or Sicily [Elisha]), to Tartessus (Tarshish) in Spain; on the S. to Ethiopia (Cush), and Southern Arabia (Sheba, Haḏramaut).

It is possible that Hebrew knowledge extended still farther; the Greek historians learned of regions farther N. (Thracians, Kimmerians, Herod. 4 11 f., Strabo, vii. 2 2, Frag. 47); the Phœnicians, if the Greeks can be believed, sailed farther W. and NW., and, commissioned by the Egyptians, circumnavigated Africa (on the same authority, Herod. 4 42; it was under Necho, 610-594 B.C.; cp E. Meyer, G.A.I. § 411; Wiedemann, AG 627; Junker, Umschiffung Afrikas durch die Phönizier, 1863); the Assyrians pushed farther to the NE. Something of this knowledge may have come to the Hebrews in Palestine, and doubtless did to the Jews of the Dispersion, before our last canonical OT book was written. Here, however, we can only conjecture. We are without definite testimony.

Within these limits certain great physical features are noted, such as seas and rivers, and (less often) mountain ranges and deserts.

i. Of seas the Mediterranean naturally takes the first place; it is the sea.

יָם, 'the sea' (Nu. 13 29 [E], and very often in all periods [see יָם = West, above]); so also plur. יָמִים, Judg. 5 17 and (prob.) Dan. 11 45 (Meinh., Bev.); more fully 'the great sea of the sunset,' Josh. 1 4 23 4 (both D); so in Assyrian tiamtu rabitu sa subinu samti, Schr. Namen der Meere, 171 ff.), and simply 'the great sea' (Nu. 34 6 f. Josh. 15 12 47 [all P or R]; cp Josh. 1 1

Ezek. 47 10 15 19 f. 48 28); 'great and wide-stretching sea' (Ps. 104 25) is rather a description than a name; also 'the hinder (or western) sea,' Dt. 11 24 34 2 (perhaps with pedantic explicitness) Zech. 14 8 Joel 2 20 (in these by contrast with the 'front [or eastern] sea').

Particular parts of the Mediterranean were known as 'the sea of the Philistines' (Ex. 23 31 [E]) and 'the sea of Joppa' (2 Ch. 2 16 [15] Ezra 3 7).

ii. The RED SEA [g. v.] is yam Sūph (יַם סוּף), referring usually to the western arm between Sinai and Egypt (Ex. 10 19 [J] 13 18 [E] and often).

'Sea of Sūph' also may be simply 'the sea,' when the reference is clear from the context (Ex. 14 16 26 [E], and often); also 'sea of Egypt' (Is. 11 15). In 1 K. 9 26 יַם סוּף denotes the gulf of 'Akaba; cp the parallel expression 'Elot on the shore of the sea in the land of Edom' (2 Ch. 8 17).

iii. Of local importance and often mentioned is the 'Salt Sea'—i. e., the Dead Sea.

יַם הַמֵּלַח (Gen. 14 3 Josh. 3 16 [J], etc.), called also 'sea of the 'Arabāh' (יַם הָעֲרָבָה), Josh. 3 16 Dt. 3 17 2 K. 14 25, etc.; 'the front (= eastern) sea,' יַם הַיְמָנִי, Ezek. 47 18 Zech. 14 8 Joel 2 20 (see hinder sea, above, § 2, begin.); and simply יַם (Is. 16 8 Jer. 48 32).

iv. More rarely we hear of the 'Sea of Chinnereth' or 'of Chinnērōth' (= Lake Gennesaret, Sea of Galilee), יַם כְּנֶרֶת, Nu. 34 11 Josh. 13 27 [both P], and יַם כְּנֶרֶת, Josh. 12 3 [D]; simply יַם, Dt. 33 23 (see CHINNERETH, GENNESAR).

These seas are thus known under slightly varying names in all OT times.

The OT knows nothing of the Euxine and Caspian Seas, and nothing of the smaller but nearer lakes of Van and Urumiyeh. Its acquaintance with Magog and the early history of Gomer, as well as with NE. Assyria and E. Armenia, is therefore imperfect, or else its interest in these great sheets of water is not sufficient to secure mention of them. It is possible that the Persian Gulf is to be recognised in the phrase 'desert of the Sea' (יַם הַדְּשֵׁרֶת), Is. 21 1 (so Di.; but the text is doubtful; see Che. SBOT).

The phrase 'from sea to sea' occurs three or four times (יַם לְיָם, Am. 8 12 Zech. 9 10 Ps. 72 8; cp יַם לְיָם, Mic. 7 12) marking the limits of the region from which the Jewish exiles will return (in Mic. 7 12 read 'from sea to sea'), and of the dominion of the great future king of Israel (Zech. 9 10 Ps. 72 8). In Am. 8 12, however, if the passage be genuine, the two seas intended will be the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean. It is true this seems an improbable designation of the boundaries of the northern kingdom. Hence (and for other reasons; see AMOS, § 14) Am. 8 11 f. may be a later insertion.

The general term sea (or seas), as a comprehensive name for the watery portion of the earth's surface, is a late idea. The contrasted idea is that of dry land, which, in the cosmogony of P, is thought of as having emerged to view by the process of collecting within certain limits the waters that originally covered the entire earth (see Gen. 1 9 f. 21 ff. Job 38 8 16 Ps. 69 35 89 104 6 ff. Prov. 8 29 Eccles. 1 7, etc.).

5. Rivers. Rivers played an important part in the history of OT times.

Of foreign rivers the most important are the Euphrates and the Nile.

i. The Euphrates is often simply 'the river.'

פְּרָת, Euphrates (Gen. 2 14 [J]), הַנְּהַרְפְּרָת (Gen. 15 18 [J] Dt. 1 7 11 24 Josh. 1 4 [D], etc.), 'the River,' הַנְּהַר (Gen. 31 21 Ex. 23 31 Nu. 22 5 Josh. 24 2 f. 14 f. [all E] 2 S. 10 16 Is. 7 20 1 K. 4 24 [5 4] 14 15 Jer. 2 18, etc.); less often, redundantly, 'the river, the river Euphrates' (Dt. 11 24), and 'the great river, the river Euphrates' (Gen. 15 18 Dt. 1 7 Josh. 1 4); it is called יַם because of its vastness and might (Jer. 51 36 [Graf, not Gie.], and according to Del. also Is. 21 1).

The people believed that across the Euphrates lay their early home (Josh. 24 2 f. 14 f. [E]). On the question of the earliest historical seats of the Israelites, see ISRAEL, § 1 ff.; EXODUS i., § 1 ff.; HEBREW, § 1. ARAM-NAHARAIM (Gen. 24 10, etc. [J]) contains certainly a reference to the Euphrates; it became the ideal boundary of their land on the NE. (Gen. 15 18 [J] Dt. 1 7 11 24 Josh. 1 4 [all D]), a boundary which, according to Israel's tradition, Solomon for a time realised (1 K. 4 21 [5 1] 4 24 bis [5 4]); not only did the crossing of it make an epoch in the individual life (Jacob, Gen. 31 21 [E]), but the Euphrates formed also a real boundary between the Assyrian and Babylonian kingdoms and the territory to the W. Just as, on the one hand, we find Assyrian kings noting with care the fact of a passage of the Euphrates (see, e.g., COT on 1 K. 20 1) as a departure from their own soil, so on the other, the challenging Egyptian army under Necho went thither against Assyria (2 K. 23 29), and of Nebuchadrezzar's conquest it is said that 'the king of Babylon had taken, from the 'river of Egypt' [see EGYPT, RIVER OF] unto the River Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt' (2 K. 24 7); and so we have the promise of the return of scattered Hebrews 'from Egypt even to the River' (Mic. 7 12). The Euphrates became in poetical usage one of the boundaries of the known world, in the phrase 'from the River unto the ends of the earth' (Ps. 72 8 = Zech. 9 10).

ii. THE NILE is known as יַרְדֵּן, יַרְדֵּן, a word of Egyptian origin meaning stream (see EGYPT, § 6), but usually employed in the OT with the art. as a proper name.

So in Gen. 41 1 f. 3 18 Ex. 1 22 Am. 8 8, and often; in Am. 8 8 9 5 it occurs also יַרְדֵּן מִצְרַיִם (Nile), stream of Egypt, and in Is. 19 5 Nah. 3 8 bis even as יַרְדֵּן; cp Is. 27 1 and יַרְדֵּן, Ezek. 82 2.

Although the Nile was historically less important (to the Hebrews) than the Euphrates, the references to it show a more intimate and particular acquaintance.

It was bordered by reeds or sedge (רִמָּה, Gen. 41 2 18 [see FLAG, 2]; סֹבֵךְ, Ex. 2 3 5 [see FLAG, 1]; cp קִנְיָה [see REED, 1] and סֹבֵךְ, Is. 19 6) and by meadows (רִמָּה, Is. 19 7 [see REED, 2]); it was divided into arms, branches, or canals, יַרְדֵּן קַנְיָה, יַרְדֵּן (Is. 7 18), יַרְדֵּן קַנְיָה (Is. 19 6), 'Nile-streams of Egypt' (cp SHIHOR OF EGYPT); it was used for bathing (Ex. 2 5); its water, for drinking (Ex. 7 18 21 24); it had fish (Ex. 7 21 Is. 19 8, cp Ezek. 29 4), and frogs (Ex. 8 3 [7 28] 8 9 11 [5 7])—all in JE passages of Hex.; it had its periods of rising and falling (Am. 8 8 9 5); it comprehended abundant crops—hence the phrase 'the seed of Shihor, the harvest of the Nile' (Is. 23 3, but on the text see SBOT 'Isaiah'); the drying up of the Nile was therefore the worst calamity for Egypt, Is. 19 5 ff. נְהַרִּים, 'river,' is applied to the Nile only in Is. 19 5). On the 'rivers of Cush' (Is. 18 1 Zeph. 3 10) see CUSH, § 1.

iii. The Tigris (HIDDEKEL), being mentioned in only two books, can be treated more briefly.

Gen. 2 14 [J] mentions the Tigris as one of the Eden rivers. The description (which is probably later than the mention of the name) is as follows: 'This is the one that flows in front of Assyria.' Dan. 10 4 is the only other passage which refers by name to the Tigris; it is noteworthy that the Tigris is here styled 'the great river' (elsewhere the Euphrates); in Dan. 12 5 bis, 6 f. it is called יַרְדֵּן—another indubitable sign of late date.

This scanty reference to so important a stream cannot fail to surprise us. Even more strange is it, however, that the nearer river Orontes is entirely ignored. Nor do we hear the names of Araxes and Kyros; the Oxus and the Indus are as little known as the Ganges, the Danube, or the Tiber. The most easterly stream mentioned is the Elamite river UJAI (q.v.), and that not until the second century B.C. (Dan. 8 2).

iv. Within a narrower area the water-courses or 'wādys' (וַדִּי = Ital. fiumara) attracted attention, being especially characteristic of Canaan and the adjacent territory, and conditioning its development. As the Euphrates was the ideal limit of Israelitish domain on the NE., so a ravine (and its stream) served the same purpose on the SW. This is the Wādy el-Arish, the natural frontier of Palestine towards Egypt (see EGYPT, ii.), described by Esarhaddon (Del. Par. 3 11) as 'the wādy of Egypt where there was no river.'

The term nahal mat Musur ('wādy of Egypt') exactly represents מצוֹת מִצְרַיִם, and we have a right to be surprised to find the phrase מצוֹת מִצְרַיִם נְהַרִּים (Gen. 15 18 [JE]). The subject is treated elsewhere (EGYPT, RIVER OF); but the present writer may express his opinion that נְהַרִּים is an error of the text (observe וַדִּי almost immediately afterwards) for נְהַרִּים. True, וַדִּי has ἀπό τοῦ ποταμοῦ for the usual χεῖμαρρον, or, as in Josh. 15 4, φάραγος; but it has ποταμοῦ also in 1 K. 8 65.

Few but the most familiar mountains or mountain ranges are brought before us. Outside of Palestine

6. Mountains. the most famous mountain is that connected by tradition with Moses (see SINAI), NE. from which lay Mount SEIR (strictly, the mountain region of Seir). See also HOR, PISGAH, ARARAT, § 3. That Mt. Taurus should be ignored is surprising, for this was the barrier between Syria and Asia Minor. Nor is anything said of Mt. Zagros, NW. of Media; or of the Elamitic and Susian mountains. The Caucasus would be beyond the Israelitish horizon.

Of deserts (מִדְבָּר) as an important feature of the earth's surface the Hebrews were well aware (see DESERT).

i. There were among them (see EXODUS i., § 2 f.) early recollections of the sparsely populated region—offering pasturage yet often desolate and wild, and not the natural home of a settled people—stretching from their own southern border farther southward to Elath and to Sinai, forming the western boundary of Edom, and extending SW. to the confines of Egypt. This is the 'wilderness' or desert referred to in Gen. 14 6, with which compare Gen. 21 21 (E, 'Ishmael dwelt in the wilderness of Paran'), Nu. 12 16 (E, a station in the wanderings), 10 12 (P, distinguished from, and bordering on, the 'wilderness of Sinai'), 13 3 (whence explorers were sent out), 26 (both P; the addition of Kadesh in v. 26 seems to be from R). It was, according to the representation of P and D, in the desert of Paran that Israel spent most of the forty years of its wandering (see WANDERINGS). It is called the desert of Edom (מִדְבָּר אֶדוֹם) in 2 K. 3 8. Abutting on the desert of Paran (מִדְבָּר פָּרָן) on the N. seems to have been 'the desert of Beer-sheba' (Gen. 21 14 [E]). In P the more comprehensive name of the desert N. of Paran was the 'desert of Sin' (מִדְבָּר שֵׁן; see ZIN); it was the southern limit of the land explored by the spies (Nu. 13 21, cp 34 3), and in it lay Kadesh (20 1 27 14 bis, 33 36 Dt. 32 51; see on the other hand Nu. 13 26, above). S. of the desert of Paran lay the desert of Sinai (see above), mentioned by name in Ex. 19 1 f. Lev. 7 38 Nu. 1 1 19 and eight times more in P, commanded by the Sinai group of mountains; NW. of that, toward Egypt, lay the desert of Sin (not Shin), מִדְבָּר שֵׁן, Ex. 16 1 (between Elim and Sinai) 17 1 Nu. 33 11 f. (all P). The portion of the desert immediately bordering on Egypt is in the older tradition connected with Shur (Ex. 15 22 [JE]), and in the later with that of Etham (Nu. 33 8; cp Ex. 13 20, both P). Nearly the same seems to be meant by 'the wilderness of the Red Sea' (Ex. 13 18 [E]) and 'the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea' (Dt. 1 40 21). The simple term 'the wilderness' is applied, now to the whole 'desert of the wandering' (Ex. 23 31 [E], etc.), now to a particular part (e.g., Ex. 16 2 f. and often), subject to the ordinary principles of clearness.

ii. Of the great Arabian Desert we hear comparatively little, and that little relates to its western edge. 'The desert which is before Moab, on the sunrise side,' it is called in Nu. 21 11 [JE].

In Judg. 11 22 the wilderness (הַמִּדְבָּר) is the (eastern) limit of Israelitish territory E. of the Jordan; 'like a steppe-dweller' (מִדְבָּרִי) in the desert, Jer. 3 2, is a simile of lying in wait; Jer. 25 24 speaks of 'all the kings of Arabia, and all the kings of the border tribes that dwell in the desert' (Gie., Co. emend text by excision; cp 2; but the reference to the desert remains). From the desert comes the east wind (Hos. 13 15 Jer. 4 11, cp Job 1 19). The 'Sabæans' of Ezek. 23 42 must, however, be given up, and perhaps the whole reference in that verse to 'the wilderness' or 'desert' (which without the Sabæans loses its value for our present purpose). Some familiarity with this desert is indicated also by the allusion to the ostriches in Lam. 4 3 Job 39 13 ff.

The 'wilderness of Damascus,' 1 K. 19 15, is the upper part of the same desert (if text and transl. are right; see KINGS, BOOK OF, § 8; HAZAEL)—i.e., the Syrian Desert. This is.

denoted also by the descriptive phrase '(Tadmor) in the wilderness' (2 Ch. 8.4), after which 1 K. 9.18 Kr. has been shaped; the original TAMAR (q.v.) of 1 K. 9.18 does not allow such an inference. The verses just cited (it may be observed in passing) show that cities might flourish in the midst of 'desert'—see also the other late passages, Josh. 15.61*f.* 20.8 (all P) 1 Ch. 6.78 (63), not to mention Is. 42.11. (On smaller deserts in the W. Jordan territory cp PALESTINE.)

Even this imperfect survey shows that the Hebrews had no great interest in geography as such. The various characteristics of the earth's surface were not noticed or thought of by them except as they came into some direct relation with their own life. The poetic imagination no doubt often laid hold of natural phenomena, and has left us some vivid pictures. From the nature of the case, however, these are general, not specific. The spirit of exact scientific observation does not appear. Such reports as may have reached Israel of the nature of the countries in which the more distant nations dwelt seem to have made little impression. Outside of their own experience they were more concerned with persons and peoples than with soil and mountain-peak and stream, with desert and sea.

Among the first countries with which we should expect to find the Hebrews making (or renewing)

9. Egypt. acquaintance would be Egypt and Ethiopia. The latter country (the African Cush) seems to have come within their ken in the eighth century

(Am. 9.7, and especially Is. 18.1*b* Zeph. 3.10 + Is. 20.3-5 [but cp ISAIAH, BOOK OF, § 9, beg.] 2 K. 19.9), when the 25th—Ethiopian—dynasty was making itself felt in Palestine.² An increased familiarity with Egypt is also attested by the writings of the prophets.

Isaiah (30.4) refers to ZOAN and HANES, Hosea (9.6; cp Jer. 2.16 etc.) to Moph or Noph—i.e., Memphis—and Nahum (3.8), with great particularity, to the Egyptian Thebes (NO-AMON, [q.v.], Ass. Ni-i, cp Egypt nt 'city,' Steindorff BAS 1.596*f.*; for later references to No = No-Amon, see Jer. 46.25, Ezek. 30.14-16). Such remoter neighbours of Egypt as Put (צוּט) ; see on Gen. 10.6 below, § 22) also, and Lubim (לְבִימִי) Libyans—if it be not the same as Lehabim (לְהַבִּימִי) Gen. 10.13 [see below, § 15(4)] occur for the first time in Nah. (3.9).

It was, singularly enough, the Babylonian conquest of Judah that made many Judæans better acquainted with Egypt. The fear caused by the murder of GEDALIAH led a large

10. Babylonia and Assyria. remnant of the people to flee into Egypt (Jer. 41.17*f.* 43.1-7), and then began the familiarity with Egyptian cities exhibited by Ezekiel. Of course, this was but a small part of the geographical debt which the Hebrews owed to the Babylonians and (we may now add) the Assyrians. Contact with these nations did more than anything else to change their geographical knowledge of the country E. of the Euphrates from fragmentary tradition to definite acquaintance.

Direct contact with Babylonia began after the fall of the N. kingdom with the famous embassy of MERODACH-BALADAN to Hezekiah. Contact with Assyria naturally began earlier. In the historical books the name appears first in 2 K. 15.19-29, which tells that Tiglath-pileser (III.), = Pul, devastated (B.C. 734) the same northern districts that Benhadad had ravaged 175 years earlier (Ijon, Abel-beth-maacah, Janoah, Kedesh [of Naphtali] and Gilead as well (cp his own record, COT ad loc.); but Israel had already learned to know Assyria in the previous century under AHAB and JEHU (qq.v.). Amos does not name it (but see AMOS, col. 149, foot); yet he certainly refers to it (6.14), and the expectation of the coming of the Assyrians underlies his book. Hosea names it often (5.13 7.11 8.9 9.3 10.6 11.5 11.12 [2] 14.3 [4]). It is even possible that Shalmaneser IV. (2 K. 17.3) is referred to in Hos. 10.14 as Shalman (see BETH-ARBEL). We find Assyria in Micah (5.5 [4]f., cp 7.12), and abundantly in Isaiah (7.18 20.1 etc.). Nahum's prophecy is devoted to an announcement of its overthrow (cp Zeph. 2.13); 2 K. 17.1-6 gives the account of Samaria's fall before it, and the deportation of the inhabitants to various places in the Assyrian empire.

It need hardly be said that the Hebrews, so far as we know, made no attempt to construct a map of the world.

11a. No maps. If they had done so, it would doubtless have appeared to us grotesque enough. Even the comparatively sober geographical data of Eratosthenes (3rd cent. B.C.) and Strabo (near the beginning of the Christian era; see the accompanying reproduction), who combined all the information they could procure, with painful laboriousness, yield maps quite recognisable, it is true, but much distorted.

Hebrew cartographers of the seventh or the fifth century B.C. would have produced much more astonishing maps, we may be sure. Attempts have been made to construct maps of the world as known to the Hebrews, or at least of the central portion of it, on the basis of the description of Eden and its rivers in Gen. 2.¹ These attempts are interesting in a high degree; but the data are not sufficient in amount or in certainty to make them secure. The utmost we can say is that one or two of them are quite possible. At best they can claim to give only the view of one writer, at a single period.

The four maps given here (after col. 1666) have a much more modest aim. They are meant simply to indicate the actual regions on the earth's surface as now known, which were embraced by Hebrew knowledge at different periods. For purposes of comparison, at least, these may perhaps be quite as useful as an attempt to construct such as the Hebrews themselves would have drawn.

Little interest as the Hebrews had in geography in the abstract, they could not remain impervious to the

11b. Geographical Lists. influences which were enlarging their knowledge of the world, nor wholly escape the impulse to systematize that knowledge. The most convincing evidence of this appears in the lists which tabulate it in some detail. These lists were arranged on a genealogical scheme, representing assumed racial connection, or contiguity or historical association (see Di. Gen. 168); see GENEALOGIES i., § 1 f. They were compiled by the same hands that undertook the story of the national life.

The motives underlying the lists can be only conjectured. An interest in geography pure and simple was hardly one of these motives, although the geographical order is here and there discernible in the arrangement of names. The names are usually those of peoples, and it would be more exact to call the lists ethnographical. They appear to represent the circle of peoples (arranged with some regard to locality) which at the time fixed the attention of the authors. Their purpose is not the same as that of the Assyrian catalogues of tributaries, or the more formal Egyptian lists of foreign cities and tribes. In those we have chiefly the parade of conquest. The Hebrew lists show a much more impersonal, or at least more dispassionate, interest. They include peoples with whom the Hebrews had no practical concern, and their own conquerors are named with perfect calmness. All indications point to an intellectual purpose. The impulse to write history was already at work, and with it the desire of providing a setting for the history, which should present what was known of other peoples, and indicate their organic relations.

The first consecutive list of this kind appears not earlier than the end of the ninth century. Israel was firmly established in its own land,—had a fixed point of observation. David had made it compact and powerful. The commerce and foreign relations of Solomon had led the thoughts of the people outside their own land. The Phœnicians were followed, in thought, as they traversed the Mediterranean, and their reports were heard in Jerusalem as well as in Samaria. The national self-consciousness was beginning to assert itself—even although the political life was divided—so as to develop the historical instinct, and lead to the recognition of other peoples as historical units, like themselves. Finally, a great new power was looming up on the eastern horizon. All these circumstances contributed to the formation and systematic arrangement of historico-geographical ideas.

The document which embodies such an arrangement is the genealogical table of the descendants of Noah's three sons in Gen. 10. This is really a list of the peoples which, at the time of the writers, seemed of consequence. The chapter is not homogeneous. It is formed by the union of two distinct lists of different dates. The older (J) was probably compiled about 800 B.C.; the younger (P) perhaps 350 years later.

There is great unanimity among critics in assigning to P vv. 1-7 20 22 f., 31 f., and practical unanimity also as to J (vv. 8-19 21 23-30); the (slight) divergences relate to the different layers of J, and to the work of the Redactor, to whom v. 24 is assigned by almost all. Neither list is preserved in its original form.

The lists of J and P afford the framework for a geographical scheme. When we attempt to combine these with the other data, however, for the purpose of tracing the growth of geographical knowledge among the Hebrews, we are met by difficulties which can be surmounted only in part ; our results must often be provisional.

The nature of our sources is such that it is impossible to be always sure at which point in the history a given geographical fact first appeared. The documents have passed through so many hands, that conceptions of different dates may easily be present. Conversely, geographical ideas may have existed long without finding expression in the surviving literature.

Especial difficulty attaches to a clear representation of the geographical horizon in the early period.

Very early documents are few, and the later accounts of early matters have to be received with discrimination. Each particular statement must be carefully weighed, and the probabilities considered. Direct Egyptian and Canaanitish influence on early geographical knowledge in Israel is an unknown quantity. We cannot jump to the conclusion that the Amarna tablets, important as they are, represent knowledge which was, or speedily became, the common property of the Hebrew invaders a century or two later. By degrees, no doubt, much geography known to the Canaanites would be appropriated by the new-comers, but how much, and how long it took, we are wholly without means of deciding. Uncertainty meets us, also, as to the amount of genuine geographical material in the traditions of early nomadic wanderings. We are quite in the dark as to Hebrew contact with the Hittites and the Aramæans between the conquest and David's time.

In these circumstances it has seemed wisest, both in the following descriptions and in the accompanying maps, to deal somewhat rigidly with the materials, and to require a maximum of evidence for the facts presented. A careful student will be able to expand the area of certainty, as evidence may seem to justify.

It would appear that to the generations following the Hebrew settlements in Canaan the outside world was of little consequence. The unanimity of traditions pointing to Egypt compels us to regard acquaintance with that country as among their earliest possessions. There is no reason to think that they had any but the vaguest ideas of Africa to the W. and S. of Egypt. The same is true of the lower shores of the Red Sea and the interior of Arabia. The roving Amalekites on their southern border, the Edomites, Moabites, and Ammonites, to the SE. and E., were of course in full view. Midian, on the eastern side of the eastern branch of the Red Sea, was closely associated with their early wanderings, and was looked upon as Israel's half-brother (Gen. 25 2 f.), and the story of Gideon preserves an account of a desperate conflict with a branch of the same people—predatory Bedouin, like the Amalekites, during the time of the Judges (see MIDIAN). There were traditions of an early Aramæan home, and even, as there seems no good reason to doubt, of a still earlier one in Babylonia;¹ local traces of Babylonian influence in Canaan may have revived and confirmed these traditions; but they can hardly have been outlined with geographical clearness. As to the northern boundary of Hebrew knowledge in this period our sources are very scanty. The one great literary monument of these troubled years, the Song of Deborah, composed in the N., and dealing with events in the N., does not carry us beyond the immediate vicinity of the plain of Megiddo. Hazor is mentioned in Judg. 4—a good source of the second order—as also in Josh. 11 (JE), and Judg. 13 3 3 (cp Josh. 11 8) carry us northward on the coast as far as Sidon. Hints at wider knowledge of northern geography are afforded only by late documents. Reminiscences of Egyptian campaigns may no doubt have preserved on the soil the names of northerly regions; but from the Hebrew documents themselves we cannot derive, for this period, any acquaintance with territory northward of a line joining Sidon, Lebanon, and Hermon.

On the W. the sea was the limit. There is no evidence that in this period the Hebrew mind ventured across it. If the first intercourse with Phœnicia brought knowledge of Phœnician traffic, no trace of this knowledge has been left in the records of the early time.

A much more extended area and a more detailed acquaintance with Babylonia and with Aramæan localities must be recognized for this period if we could suppose that Gen. 14 represents knowledge in the possession of the Hebrews at this time, whether due to their own ancient tradition, or to local history appropriated by them after the conquest. The question of the existence in this noteworthy chapter of good historical material cannot be discussed here (see GENESIS, § 8 a). It is quite possible to answer the question in the affirmative, and at the same time to maintain, as the evidence requires us to do, that the chapter cannot be used as a source of information for the geographical knowledge of the time of the Judges. Cp Lehmann, Altor. Chron. p. 84 ('98).

The advent of the Philistines, the alliances and conquests of David, and the alliances and luxury of Solomon widened the geographical knowledge in Hebrew horizon, and filled in spaces which were nearly or quite vacant.

David's wars (see DAVID, § 8) with Hadadzezer and his allies must have afforded some definite acquaintance with the Aramæan country as far as the Euphrates. Maacah, Geshur, Zobah, Hamath, and Damascus now grew familiar. Mesopotamia became a neighbour. David's friendship with Hiram of Tyre must have led to knowledge of lands beyond the sea, and the Philistines brought with them to the shores of Canaan the news of Caphtor as their early island home: Caphtor is with probability identified by most scholars with Crete (see PHILISTINES; but cp CAPHTOR, CHERETHITES).¹

As the Philistines were new-comers, some report of their origin would naturally spread at once; hence, although the name of Caphtor does not appear till the eighth century, it is probable that it was known under David and Solomon.

Solomon's reign enlarged the Hebrew world still more. That there were variant traditions of the extent of his kingdom appears from 1 K. 54 compared with 55 (EV 42425) and with 1124; we cannot even tell whether the Euphrates was sufficiently known in Solomon's time to justify the mention of Tiphshah (Thapsacus) in the late passage 1 K. 54 [424]. The mention of 'Tadmor' (i.e., Palmyra) in 2 Ch. 84 is at any rate valueless for the time of Solomon (see TAMAR). On the other hand, the probable emendation of 1 K. 1028 f. which finds there a mention of the northern lands Musri and Kuē as the source of the Hebrew supply of horses (see MIZRAIM, § 2 [a], CHARIOT, § 5, col. 726, u. 1), brings us to the very foot of the Taurus mountains, S. of which the Syrian Musri lay, and even through the mountain-passes of the Amanus into Cilicia, to which Kuē belonged (see CILICIA, § 2).

A still more notable extension of geographical knowledge took place toward the S. If the story of the visit from the queen of Sheba stood by itself it might not be enough to assure us of the actual acquaintance of Solomon's time with Southern Arabia. But the impulse given to exploration and commerce by Solomon's luxury led to the fitting out of ships on the gulf of Akaba, which sailed away southward on long cruises, bringing them into close contact with the Arabian shores. Besides the various tropical products (not all quite certain; see APES, GOLD, IVORY, OPHIR, PEACOCKS), with which they contributed to the splendour and the entertainment of the court, they brought reports of distant lands, and whether or not OPHIR (q.v.) was in Arabia, it is certain that at least Arabian territory bordering on the Red Sea must have been observed and described. The same is true of the African shore of the Red Sea; how much further S. and E. the new knowledge stretched we cannot tell, and the voyagers themselves may have been as ignorant of the real geographical relations of Ophir as Columbus and his sailors were in regard to the West Indies; but it is quite certain that a large extent of the earth's surface, before unknown, must from that time onward have been taken into the more or less definite conceptions of the educated Hebrews.

It is probable that those conceptions now embraced at least one remote point in the W. Phœnician voyages, colonies, and settlements were already opening markets in many quarters to the trade of the cities from which they set out. It is likely that the Phœnicians had planted themselves before the tenth century on the coast of Spain, at Tartessus.² Since Phœnician seamen went with Solomon's ships, and these ships are called 'ships of Tarshish'—i.e., large sea-going vessels, such as were fit to go to Tarshish (1 K. 1022, cp Is. 216)—there is a presumption in favour of some Hebrew knowledge of Tarshish in Solomon's time (although 1 K. 10 was written much later), and TARSHISH ([i.] q.v.) is admittedly Tartessus.

Solomon's fleets were not successfully imitated by his successors; but a new agent now appears. After these

12c. In 8th fleets the strongest influence in enlarging cent. B.C. the Hebrew view of the world was the westward extension of Assyrian power.

That power took a fresh start under Ašur-našir-pal (885-860 B.C., see ASSYRIA, § 31), who marched to the Mediterranean, and received tribute from the Mediterranean cities. Of direct contact with Israel we do not hear; but the silence of the Hebrew records cannot prevent us from saying that, with the intimacy between Phœnicia and the house of Omri, then on the Israelitish throne, Israel must have learned lessons in Assyrian geography from Ašur-našir-pal. We cannot of course tell how far even the names of territories overrun by him on the remote Assyrian borders—Kummuh, the Muški, the Nairi-lands, the regions of the Upper and the Lower Zāb, and the rest—became known in Palestine; but Eastern Mesopotamia, the Tigris and its cities, must have begun to take a place in Hebrew thought.

Shalmaneser II. (860-825 B.C.), whom Ahab's men faced, under Benhadad, in 854, and who received tribute from Jehu, must have continued the geographical teaching begun by his father. Rammān-nirari III. (812-783 B.C.) brought it apparently still closer home, for not only Phœnicia and Israel, but also Philistia and Edom recognised his sovereignty by tribute, and since probably the former, and certainly the latter, in its mountain fastnesses, would hardly do so without previous personal contact, we must suppose, either that two streams of Assyrian invasion enclosed Judah on the E. and on the W., or, if Edom was reached by the western route, that the southern border of Judah was skirted. In any case, by the middle of the eighth century, at which time, certainly, J's geographical survey was complete, the kingdom of Judah, in which J wrote, had facilities nearly as ample as those of Israel for knowing the main features of Assyrian geography. Judean embassies were, it is true, not yet passing to and fro, carrying tribute, and bringing back new impressions and the stories of strange lands, but the knowledge gained in this way by their neighbours would in the course of time naturally become theirs.

Shalmaneser II. and his successors had come into close relations with Babylonia, and ancestral tradition would lead the Hebrews to an especial interest and even inquisitiveness regarding it, which would result in some familiarity with local names, while by no means yielding precise and full knowledge, or dispelling the mystery overhanging that ancient Semitic home.

The first part of J's list that is preserved to us looks toward the E. It begins abruptly with a summarized

13a. J's statement regarding an individual monarch Babylonia. of Babylonia—NIMROD [q.v.], son of Cush. The sites of BABYLON and ERECH are well known; those of ACCAD and CALNEH (1) are not yet identified. Shinar (שִׁנָר) most probably represents the Babylonian Šumēr, or its dialectic variation Šūngēr.¹ Whether the term 'land of Shinar' in Gen.
1010 includes all Babylonia, from the sea northward, we cannot however say. Another tradition preserved by J makes a plain (שְׁפָלָה) 'in the land of Shinar' the scene of the building of Babel, and of the sudden dispersion of the race (Gen. 111-9; see BABEL). The only contribution made by this passage to the vexed question as to the geographical limits of Šumēr consists in the requirement that it shall contain both Babylon and Erech. Familiarity with the name is indicated especially by the expression 'a goodly mantle of Shinar' (Josh. 721 [JE]; see RV^{mg}); 'land of Shinar' occurs also in Zech. 511 Dan. 12, and Shinar, Is. 1111.

If J located his Eden (Gen. 2) in Babylonia, his geographical information concerning the region must be regarded as still vague. The Euphrates and the Tigris approach each other there, and were doubtless connected by canals; but as to the rest, the description is unrecognisable. This, however, would not of itself disprove the theory that he had that locality in mind. Without entering into the vexed question of CUSH (q.v.), mentioned in Gen. 213 108, we may note here that Ašur-našir-pal and Shalmaneser II. both encountered the Kaššites, and it is by no means impossible that in the mind of J there was already confusion between the Kaššites and the Arabian and African Kuš. The embassy of Merodach-baladan to Hezekiah (2 K. 20), at the end of the eighth century, although it seems to presuppose some mutual acquaintance, was plainly a novelty, and is quite consistent with much mutual ignorance, as well.

The assignment of the beginning of Nimrod's kingdom to Babylonia, and the stress laid on the 13b. J's Assyria. subsequent founding of Assyrian cities, points to an ultimate Assyrian source for at least vv. 10-12. AŠŠŪR, EV 'Asshur' (אֲשׁוּר), is undoubtedly here, as in 214 and elsewhere, the country of Assyria (see especially 'land of Assyria,' parallel with 'land of Nimrod' Mic. 56 [5]), not the old capital Ašur on the W. bank of the Tigris (at Kal at-Sherkāt about 45 m. below Nimrūd; see ASSYRIA, § 5).

HEBREW GEOGRAPHY AT FOUR DIFFERENT PERIODS.

I. HEBREW GEOGRAPHY IN THE TIME OF THE JUDGES.

II. HEBREW GEOGRAPHY IN THE 10th. CENTURY B.C.

III. HEBREW GEOGRAPHY IN THE 8th. CENTURY B.C.

IV. HEBREW GEOGRAPHY IN THE 5th. CENTURY B.C.

The Assyrian kingdom, like the Babylonian, is represented by four cities (see NINEVEH, CALAH, REHOBOTH-IR, RESEN), for the words, 'that is the great city,' in Gen. 10^{2b}, which imply the view that these several cities made up the one great Nineveh (cp Jon. 1.2 3.2 4.11, where the city is of enormous size), are probably a gloss. It is J also who mentions the Tigris (see above, § 5, iii.).

Western Mesopotamia becomes familiar. Not only do we find the city of Nahor and ARAM-NAHARAIM (q.v.),¹ besides other references to this region as of early interest in Hebrew migrations (Gen. 24¹⁰; cp 22^{20 ff.} 23¹⁰, etc., J), but the exiles of Samaria are planted by the Habor (Chaboras), the river of Gozan (2 K. 17.6), and Gozan, Harran, Kesheph, (Bit-)Adini and Telassar all figure in the conquests of Assyria (2 K. 19.12), and all show knowledge of the same region, by the close of the eighth century.

The northern border of Assyria is still obscure. At the NE corner of the Mediterranean, whilst on land we do not get across the Amanus, in the sea the island of Cyprus (Kittim) comes into view. It is not in J's list; but it meets us

14. J's knowledge of the West. in Nu. 24.24 (JE), as well as in Is. 23.

It is doubtful whether Nu. 24.24 belongs to an early stratum of JE, and, without claiming Kittim where it first occurs in the much disputed 'oracle of Tyre' (Is. 23.1b), we may admit Kittim in v. 12 as belonging to the poem, and may not unreasonably ascribe it to the hand of Isaiah. It is true that this would of itself take us back no further than 725 B.C.; but the reference to Kittim is made in such a way as to imply previous acquaintance.

From Assyria in the NE. J's list passes to Egypt in the SW. In the same group are eight 15. J's other peoples, marking as many territorial distinctions (Gen. 10.13 ff. = 1 Ch. 1.11 f.).

1. First are the LUDIM, who are quite distinct from the LUD (q.v.) of Gen. 10.22 (P) = 1 Ch. 1.17, and must be sought in Africa. More we cannot say, and our present ignorance extends to several other names in the same group. The very next one is an example.

2. Of Anamim (only here, and in 1 Ch. 1.11) we know nothing geographically, and the name is not even certain textually.²

3. KASLUHIM, EV CASLUHIM,³ is just as obscure. See PHILISTINES.

4. LEHABIM perhaps = Lübin, לוֹבִים, Libyans. [Ⓜ]AEL, however, has λαβειμ, or λαβειν 1 Ch. [A], whilst לוֹבִים is λιβυες (see Nah. 3.9 [BNAQ] 2 Ch. 12.3 [BAL], 16.8 [BAL]; and לוֹבִים, Dan. 11.43† Baer); read also Lüb, לוֹב for Heb. לוֹב (AV CHUB, RV CUB), Ezek. 30.5; [Ⓜ]BAQ λιβυες (Co. WMM As. u. Eur. 115).

The passages do not help to fix the boundaries of Libya.

5. Naphtūhim is in doubt. Possibilities are: (1) Napata (in Cush), a view of Tuch and de Goeje; see also Di.; (2) Na-pah, '(people) of Ptaḥ'—i.e., inhabitants of Memphis (where the god Ptaḥ had his chief seat), and Middle Egypt generally (Kn. ad loc., Ebers); and (3) the origination of פתח' out of פתח'—i.e., פְּתֻחִים, 'northern land' (cp [6], so Erman, ZATW 10.118 f.).

6. Pathrūsīm (פְּתֻרִים) is the gentilic from Pathrōs (פְּתֻרִים)—i.e., in Egyptian, 'land of the S.'; in cuneiform, Paturisī, which is referred to in Jer. 44.1 as a region distinct from Migdol, Tahpanhes, and Noph, in Jer. 44.15 (Graf, Gie.) and in Is. 11.11 (Βαβυλωνίας [BNAQ]) as distinct from Mizraim or Egypt, and in Ezek. 30.14 among the Egyptian towns and districts (Noph, Zoan, No, Sin, etc.) on which judgment shall fall. In Ezek. 29.14 it is called the land of the 'origin' (RVmg.) of the Egyptians (a good historical tradition).

7. On Caphtorim and (8) the Philistines see § 12b. From Egypt J's list passes northward along the coast, and mentions Canaan and his 'sons.' Verse 15 names two of these—viz., SIDON and Heth.

16. J's Canaan, etc. The Hittites, or sons of Heth, are treated elsewhere (see HITTITES). Suffice it to notice that for J they are simply an aboriginal Canaanitish people, by the side of the Phœnicians.

The following verses present several difficulties. They contain gentilic nouns, which is peculiar,—not in itself, for already in v. 13 f. the genealogical scheme has become a transparent fiction, but because of the disagreement in form with Sidon and Heth.

In part the verses suggest the familiar list of Canaanitish peoples which Israel is to dispossess, as contained in the account of the Exodus and march to Canaan furnished by J and D (e.g., Ex. 38 Dt. 7.1); but in part they are different. The PERIZZITES (q.v.) are wholly lacking. The Canaanites do not appear; Canaan is here, not one among the particular peoples, but the comprehensive term uniting all the rest. Heth is an unusual form, and is set apart from the rest of the list. There are here also five names (v. 17 f.) which do not occur in the lists elsewhere, and differ from the four preceding (except the Jebusites of Jerusalem), in being plainly geographical.

1. 'The Arkite' is a gentilic derived from the city name Arka (Ass. Arka, COI; mod. Tell 'Arka, Burckhardt, Travels, 162; Rob. BR 8 App. 183), northward from Tripolis at the NW. foot of Lebanon. See ARKITE.

2. 'The Sinite' is of doubtful derivation. Del. Par. 282 proposes to read שִׁינִי and to connect with the city Siannu (= Siānu) 'on the shore of the sea' mentioned by Tiglath-pileser III. with Arka (and Simirra) 3 R. 9.46. Strabo (xvi. 2.18) mentions a town Sinna, Jerome (Quæst. ad loc.) a civitas Simi in this region, and Breydenbach (Reise, 1483) a village Syn about 2½ m. from Nahr 'Arka. See SINITE.

3. On 'the Arvadite' see ARVAD.

4. 'The Zemarite' is from the city Simir(ra) mentioned repeatedly by Tiglath-pileser III. and his successors, 745 ff. B.C. (Schr. COI on Gen. 10.18, Del. Par. 281 f.), and long before in the Amarna letters, as Sumur (Bezold, op. cit. 155; otherwise Winckler, op. cit. 40*); it was known to the Greeks as σινυρα (see reff. in Di.). It is perhaps the modern Sumra, between Ruād and Tripolis (Bäde. Pal. 407; see other reff. in Buhl-Ges. Lex., s.v.). Cornill restores שִׁמִּירִים in Ezek. 27.11 (see GAMMADIM).

5. Finally, 'the Hamathite,' from the well-known city of HAMATH (q.v.) on the Orontes, and his successors, 745 ff. B.C. All these are places in the extreme N., and can be, in most cases, with certainty identified.

This increases our surprise at finding them combined (v. 16 f.) with the 'Jebusite and the GIRGASHITE (q.v.) and the HIVITE' (q.v.), which are either in the S. or are geographically vague.

'The Amorite' is a name which requires separate treatment. We may understand it to be used here in the same sense which it bears elsewhere in the stereotyped lists of Canaanitish peoples, and assume that v. 16, as well as 'the Hivite' in v. 17, is not a part of J's original table (see AMORITES).

The account of the sons of Canaan in J comes to an end with two more general remarks: v. 18 'and afterward (i.e., after Canaan had begotten these sons—in the course of time, by degrees) were the families of the Canaanite spread abroad'; v. 19 in its turn, gives the boundary of the Canaanites.

It is evident from a comparison of vv. 18 and 19 that in both cases the Canaanites are the inhabitants of Canaan (Phœnician colonies, e.g., are not included). וַיִּפְּרֹץ, v. 18, must therefore mean, 'spread out so as to occupy the land of Canaan.' Verses 15-18, however, contain names (i.e. in v. 16 f.) which certainly cover substantially the Canaanitish territory; v. 18b is not intelligible if the whole space over which they spread is already occupied by them. The characteristic names of the present list are, however, all in the N., and it seems highly probable that the others (Jebusite, Amorite, Gîrgashite, Hivite) are not original, but inserted by a scribe who missed the familiar forms.

If the above criticism be sound, what J tells us is that the original seat of the Canaanites was in the N. (= Phœnicia and Hamath), and that they spread from that region over Canaan.

This obliges us to take a further step. Verse 19 cannot give the boundary of these original northern Canaanites. It does not even include them, for it goes no farther N. than Sidon, and all the other names under consideration (Heth, Arka, Sin, Arvad, Simir, and Hamath) are to the northward of Sidon. Moreover it passes down at least as far as Gaza (reading גַּזָּרָה, 'towards Gerar'); but Gaza is near the southern border of the Philistine territory, which must therefore be included in the Canaanitish border; but evidently the Philistines are, for J, not Canaanites (v. 14).

It appears, then, that not only the five names in vv. 16-17 a, but also the border-tracing v. 19, are later additions. If this is the case, however, the וַיִּפְּרֹץ ('spread abroad') of v. 18 is no longer to be explained by v. 19, and may well refer to the planting of Phœnician colonies, which is more in accord with the meaning of פָּן (e.g., Gen. 118*f.* Zeph. 3 to Is. 24*f.* Ezek. 11 17 and often).

The next geographical reference in J is in v. 26.

Verses 21-25 simply connect the Eberites with Shem, the eldest son of Noah, and fix the time of the division of the peoples.

Verses 26-30 name the sons of Joktan (see JOKTAN), and give their locality. The names, as far as identified, prove to be Arabian (see special articles).

17. J's sons of Joktan. The interior of the Arabian peninsula, whose coast had been skirted by Solomon's fleets, was gradually disclosing itself. Hadramaut (HAZARMAVETH, Gen. 10 26 = 1 Ch. 1 20) appears for the first and only time in the OT, side by side with Sheba (see § 3). The more settled Arabian communities are coming into view. Amalek and Midian, the wilder Bedawin of the desert, have disappeared.¹

Verse 30 gives the limits of the territory of these descendants of Joktan:—'from שָׁרְפָן towards הַר הַצְּפוֹן the mountain of the East.'

The change of Mesha to Massa (מַסָּא), a branch of the Ishmaelites, is plausible. Massa would then mark the northern limit of the tribes of Yokfan. See MESHAI.

Sephar, the opposite limit (שֵׁפָר), must be sought in the S. if שָׁרְפָן is in the N. It is usually identified (but with doubtful warrant) with the ancient Himyarite capital Tatar, perhaps (Ges. and Buhl) the seaport of Hadramaut (near Mirbat) now called Isfar or Isfar (see SEPHAR).

'The mountain of the East' is too general an expression to give precision to undefined geographical terms (cp GOLD, § 1 c).

The list of J ends here. It was doubtless once fuller than it is now; R has contented himself with a selection.

The only sons of Shem to whom J devotes space, besides Eber and Pëleg, are Joktan and his Arabian descendants. We miss, e.g., all reference to Aram, which J would not ignore.

J has contributed only part of the materials to Gen. 10. We have now to consider the contribution of P.

The longer the relations with Phœnicia and with Assyria continued, and the closer they became, the greater their effect on the geographical knowledge of the Hebrews.

18. Geographical knowledge in the 6th cent. B.C. The fall of the Northern Kingdom and the settlement of foreigners in that territory meant less to them geographically than it would have done if there had been northern writers to make use of new knowledge that the colonists brought.

The exile of Judah took place under very different conditions, and, after the Babylonian power had passed to the Persians, the religious and literary activity at Jerusalem not only manifests a vivid acquaintance with distant countries before known only by reports at second hand, but also shows that there were men who had learned from their own observation, as well as from the heterogeneous character of the armies which had conquered them—men who knew something of the remoter campaigns of their foreign sovereigns, and who had a growing familiarity with the traffic of the world.

Accordingly the circumference of P's map is greater than that of J. He follows a different order; but, to aid in comparison, it will be simpler to rearrange his material, and begin, as in the case of J, with the East.

We have particularly a wealth of eastern, north-eastern, and northern details. Babylonia is of course familiar (see below); Elam (Gen. 10 22)

19. P's Eastern and Northern Geography. and Susiana are now well known,—Nehemiah was at home in Susa (SHUSHAN, Neh. 1 1),—Media (MADAI) appears often (Is. 13 17 Gen. 10 2 etc.), and had indeed probably been known for centuries (2 K. 17 6); it is the Assyrian Madai (Rammân-nirari [812-783 B.C.]—Esarhaddon [681-668]), E. of Assyria, NE. of Babylonia; its capital, ECBATANA (ACHMETHA) is mentioned in ¹ We find Midian still in the later writers of Is. 60 6 and Hab. 3 7, where they are simply poetic representatives of distant peoples. In 1 K. 11 28 the text is doubtful (Then, cp Benzinger). As for Amalek, if credence can be placed in 1 Ch. 4 42*f.* the last remnant of it was destroyed in the time of Hezekiah. In Ps. 83 7 [8] the mention of it is in a poetic figure, either to designate present foes by the title of an ancient foe, or to describe the character of the present ones (cp Baethgen).

GEOGRAPHY

Ezra 6 2. Persia appears first in Ezek. 27 10 38 5 (see however, PARAS), and then abundantly in Ezra.

Persia is not explicitly connected with Cyrus before the time of the Chronicler (when it is superabundantly joined with his name; 2 Ch. 36 22*f.* Ezra 1 1*f.* 8 3 7 4 3 5). The contemporary mention of him in Is. 44 28 46 1 does not, it is true, reveal any knowledge of Anzan, or Susiana, as his early dominion; but neither does it displace such knowledge by the inexact substitution of Persia, which afterwards grew so familiar.

P's list as preserved does not mention Babylon. It was needless. Familiarity with Babylonia is of course a marked feature of the exilic and post-exilic literature.

Besides the frequent mention of the Chaldæans from the time of their appearance before Jerusalem under Nebuchadrezzar (Jer. 22 25 21 4 9 etc.) we have frequent mention of the land of the Chaldæans.

Specific mention, in Jer. 24 5 25 12 (om. G, Hi., Gie., etc.), also 50 1 8 25 45 51 4 54 Ezek. 13 12 13; reference, in Jer. 50 10 51 24 35 Ezek. 11 24 16 29 23 15*f.* Dan. 9 1 (in Is. 23 13 the text is corrupt).

For the Hebrews the land of Chaldæa is the land of which Babylon was the chief city. Of an earlier Chaldæan home in S. Babylonia they show no knowledge.¹ It was only after Babylon became the Chaldæan capital that the Chaldæans attained importance for Israel (Judah; cp Merodach-baladan, 2 K. 20).

Chaldæa is identified with Babylon in Ezek. 12 13 23 16, cp Jer. 50 1; see also Jer. 21 4 etc. In Ezek. 23 15 we have explicitly 'sons of Babylon, whose home (lit. kindred-)land is Chaldæa.' The mention of both Chaldæa(ns) and Babylon is by far most frequent in Jeremiah (Chaldæa 46 times; Babylon 169; the land of Chaldæa, especially Jer. 50*f.*); the expression 'land of Babel' (Babylon) is peculiar to Jer. 50 28 51 29; 'the kingdom of the Kasdim' in Dan. 9 1 is the kingdom of Darius.

There is a reference to Southern Babylonia in the (land) MERATHAIM (rather Merathim) of Jer. 50 21, if this is equivalent to the Ass. (mat) marrati, 'sea-land'—i.e., land on the shore of the Persian Gulf (so Del., Schr.). In what part of Babylonia PEKOD (Jer. 50 21 Ezek. 23 23) is to be sought is unknown; the cuneiform Pukudu does not help us. The general situation of SHOA and KOA seems to have been determined (E. of lower Tigris).

1. The absorption of Assyria into the Babylonian Empire has not prevented P and his contemporaries from maintaining an acquaintanc

20. P's Northern Geography. with more northern countries. Eastern Armenia (ARARAT, 1) had been introduced to the Hebrews through the account of Sennacherib's murder (2 K. 19 37), was known—perhaps in a wider sense—to the author of Jer. 51 27 before the Persian conquest of Babylon, and was incorporated into P's version of the flood (Gen. 8 4). It has been observed [§ 4], and it is not a little surprising, that neither here nor anywhere do we find biblical mention of the Armenian lakes, Van and Urumiyeh. If Arpachshad (Gen. 10 22 24; see ARPHAXAD) contains the name of Arrapachitis, then P's knowledge actually penetrated into the region between these lakes, and yet he does not name them. MINNI and ASHKENAZ [9*q.v.*] are also in Armenia, and RIPHATH and TOGARMAH at least in Western Armenia, whilst P knows GOMER [1] (the Gimirai of the Assyrian inscriptions appear in Cappadocia from the time of Esarhaddon); see Gen. 10 2*f.* It is plain therefore that, when P's list was made out, the Taurus and the Amanus, although still unmentioned (see above, § 6), have ceased to be an absolute barrier.

The fifth son of Japhet is Tubal, the Assyrian Tabali, and the sixth Meshech, the Assyrian Muški (Gen. 10 2 = 1 Ch. 1 5), almost always named together; only in Is. 66 19 does Tubal appear without Meshech (as a distant nation; but G reads Moşox for Heb. מֹשֶׁחַ, see Du., che. SBOT, Marti), and in Ps. 120 5 Meshech without Tubal (|| or opp. Kedar). Since Bochart they have been identified with the Moschi (μοσχοι) and Tibareni. Schrader (KFG, l.c.) shows that as late as Esarhaddon the Tabali bordered on Cilicia, and that the Muški were just NE. from them. They push up from the south like a wedge, between Cappadocia and Armenia. Since they appear in the second row of P's northern peoples, it is now clear that P knew them before they were driven farther N. See TUBAL.

Tiras (Gen. 10.2 = 1 Ch. 1.5) is the seventh son of Japhet; not identified with certainty; on a possible connection with the ancient Tirseni, see TIRAS.

On the difficult name 'Magog' (Gen. 10.2) see GOG. We can only infer that P set 'Magog' in the N. The traditional identification of him with the Scythians (Jos. Jer.), though without definite evidence, is plausible. The Scythians came down, as fierce northern raiders, late in the seventh century (Zeph. Jer.), and little would be known with precision about a region so distant as that from which they came.

2. Before passing entirely away from the N. and E. we must notice P's account of the Aramæans.

Gen. 10.23 gives four sons of Aram who in 1 Ch. 1.17b appear as sons of Shem. Gether is unidentified.

For Uz, the connection with Nahor (Gen. 22.21) would lead us to look beyond the Euphrates, and the relation to Aram (Gen. 10.23) would make no difficulty.

The exegetical details of Job will be treated elsewhere. There is no objection to locating Uz somewhere on the N. side of the Arabian desert, where indeed Ptolemy (v. 19.2) speaks of a people called the Αιθρα who lived W. of the Euphrates. We also find Uz connected with Edom (Gen. 36.28 P, and Lam. 4.21 [om. 5]). So, too, 6's addition to the book of Job refers to him as 'dwelling in the Ausitid land on the borders of Idumæa and Arabia'.¹

On Jer. 25.20 see Uz. Del. (Par. 259) claims to have found the name Uz, under the form 'mat Ussä', on an inscription of Shalmaneser II. (Obelisk, l. 154); if correct, Uz must have been near the Orontes, but Winck. (KB 1.146) reads Kun(?)-uzza as a man's name. Del. (ZAF 287 f.) thinks of the extreme N. of the Syrian desert, in the region of Palmyra;² but Lam. 4.21 opposes this. All these data cannot be made to refer to one single region; but Robertson Smith's suggestion that Uz denotes all the scattered tribes—or rather the various tribes who worshipped the same god, 'Aud (𐤀𐤅𐤍)',³ a god well known to heathen Arabia—is not favoured by the connection of 𐤀𐤅𐤍 with Aram, or with a home E. of the Euphrates, although this is not conclusive.

MASH (g.v.), which occurs only here, is connected by Di. (after Ges. Thez.) with Mons Mas(us), now Tür Abdür, northward from Nisibis—the mountain range separating Armenia from Mesopotamia (Strabo xi. 142; Ptol. v. 18.2), which may well have been peopled by Aramæans. Accepting this conjecture, we might proceed to identify Hüli, the remaining son of Shem, with the district Hül'a (from Ass. hulu, 'sand'?), mentioned by ÄSÜR-NĪSĪR-pal in connection with Mons Masius (Del. Par. 259). This, however, is uncertain.

In the time of P light has been pouring over the W. also. It is possible, notwithstanding the present order of the names, that Lud, fourth son of Shem (Gen. 10.22), is to be identified with Lydia, which Cyrus's conquest had made familiar. Identification with the African Lud (Ludim, v. 13) is out of the question; and to connect Lud with the Egyptian Rēnu (Ruten) of Northern Syria (WMM As. u. Eur. 143 ff.) is opposed by phonetic laws (Erman in COT, ad loc.). The connection of Lud with Shem is no insuperable obstacle to its identification with Lydia. See LUD.

The next name (in geographical order) is quite certain. The fourth son of Japhet is Javan = the Ionian. In Dan. 8.21 11.2 10.20, and probably in Zech. 9.13 (if the text is correct), the reference is to the Macedonian power. In Ezek. 27.13 Is. 66.19 the original reference to Ionians is more prominent. See JAVAN.

Four descendants are assigned to Javan (Gen. 10.4). Of these, Tarshish and Kittim, as we have seen, early became familiar to the Hebrews; ELISHAH (g.v.), which occurs elsewhere only in the phrase '𐤍 𐤅𐤍, 'coast-lands of Elishah' (Ezek. 27.7), may perhaps be Carthage; on the fourth descendant see DODANIM. The intervening spaces offer room for the unnamed islands and coast-lands (𐤍 𐤅𐤍 𐤍, Gen. 10.5) so abundantly referred to in the later literature.

² So Jos. (Ant. i. 64) says that Uz (ὄσση) was the founder of Trachonitis and Damascus (cp Jer. Quest. Gen. 10.23); but whence had he the tradition?

The term '𐤍 (𐤍 𐤅𐤍) is only here in P; but it is characteristic of the late literature, and has a consistent, although general, geographical use. The singular '𐤍 appears in Is. 20.6 used of the Palestinian coast (including Judah) and so in 23.2 6 of the Phœnician coast, and in Jer. 47.4 of the coastland of Σαήτωρ (g.v., § 1); in Jer. 26.22 we read of 'the kings of the coastland which is beyond the sea' (with kings of Tyre and Sidon). In the wider application, however, it is elsewhere pl., and is sometimes more, sometimes less, defined. It always, as far as can be determined, refers to coasts of the Mediterranean. It is otherwise quite indefinite (of coast-lands, whether of islands or continents, often with idea of distance) Jer. 8.10 Ezek. 26.15 18 bis 27.3 15 35 39.6 Is. 41.15 42.4 10.12 49.1 51.5 60.18 60.9 66.19 Ps. 72.10 97.1 Dan. 11.18; fully 𐤍 𐤅𐤍 Is. 11.11 24.15 Esth. 10.1; 𐤍 𐤅𐤍 𐤍 occurs Zeph. 2.11 as in Gen. 10.5; less often the pl. is used of particular coasts: of Kittim Jer. 2.10 Ezek. 27.6, and of Elishah Ezek. 27.7; once it means 'islands', Is. 40.15, and once (if the text is right; see SBOT, 'Isa.' Heb. 201) 'habitable ground', Is. 42.15. The earliest indefinite use of the pl. is Jer. 31.10 Zeph. 2.11; all the others are in Is. (second and third) Ezek. Esth. Dan. and late Psalms, unless Is. 11.11 be an exception, which, however, in view of the usage, is most unlikely. See further, ISLE.

In v. 6 P goes on to the sons of Ham. These are Kūsh, Mīsrāim, Phut, and Canaan. The first two are unquestionably African. Kush here is

22. P's Sons of Ham. probably the same as in Is. 18.1 etc. (αἰθιοπία)—i.e., the country S. of Egypt (see ETHIOPIA). Mīsrāim (see MIZRAIM) has no doubt substantially the same meaning as in J (§ 15); Phut occurs as early as Nahum (3.9).

Also in Jer. 46.9, with Kūš and Lūdim; read perhaps Lubim, Ezek. 30.5 with Kūš and Lud, probably also Lub; see Co.; in both these last as part of the Egyptian army; 27.10 with Pāras [see, however, PARAS] and Lūdi, as in the Tyrian army; 38.5 with Pāras [see, however, PARAS] and Kūš as belonging to the herds of Gog, and in Is. 66.19 (Tarshish, Pul [rd. Ḥūl, φουδ, BQmg.], Lūdi, Tubal, Javan). In Jer. 46.9 and Ezek. 27.10 38.5 6 reads λῆβες; see Jos.; in Nah. 3.9 τῆς φωνῆς καὶ λίβες represents 𐤍 𐤅𐤍; 𐤍.

On the whole 6 points to identification with the Libyans, or a part of them adjoining Egypt on the W.

For another view see PUT. WMM As. u. Eur. 114 ff. argues strongly on phonetic grounds for Punt (on the African shore of the Red Sea); but he minimizes and explains away the evidence of 6. He also adduces the order of names in an inscription of Darius (v. Spiegel, APK 54 l. 30); Putiya, Kūsiya, Māciya—i.e., Punt, on the Red Sea coast (beginning from the E.), Kūš, inland, etc.; but as Yasna = Javan precedes, the order from E. to W. is by no means certain. The whole matter is doubtless involved and difficult.

P's list of the sons of Mīsrāim has not been preserved; knowledge of Egypt, however, although perhaps not covering greater distances than in the eighth century, was certainly more intimate, from Tahpanhes on the frontier (Jer. 43.7 ff. etc., Ezek. 30.18) to Thebes, far up the Nile (Nō; Nah. 38 Ezek. 30.14 ff.); see these vv. also for other Egyptian cities. Ezekiel (29.10) takes us as far S. as Ašwān ('from Migdol to Syene' [read Sewān = Ašwān]), to say nothing of Cush (see § 23).

If we reserve Kūsh, the only non-African son of Ham, according to P's list (as far as preserved to us), is Canaan. This represents the pre-Israelitish population of the land which bears the same name (see CANAAN).

Passing over SEBA and HAVILAH (g.v.), we pause

23. P's Sons of Cush. at the difficult tribal name Sabtāh (Gen. 10.7, where 21 could have κηθω || 1 Ch. 1.9).

Tuch and Knobel propose σαββαθα or Sabota (see reff. in Di.), an ancient Arabian commercial city, Sab. 𐤍 𐤅𐤍 (but v=β?) whilst Glaser (Sitzber. 2.252 f.) thinks of σαββα (Ptol. vi. 7.30), near the (W.) shore of the Persian Gulf.

Sabteca (Gen. 10.7) is unknown. See SABTECA.

We have left Ra'ma(h) (Gen. 10.7 𐤍 𐤅𐤍 1 Ch. 1.9), with his two sons. Of these sons, Sheba has been considered already (§§ 3, 17). For the other see DEDAN.

The descendants of Ra'ma(h) being Arabian, it is not surprising that the same is true of Ra'mah.

The name occurs elsewhere only in Ezek. 27.22 among the traders of Tyre (with Sheba). The g in 6's forms (see RAAMAH) agrees with Sab. 𐤍 𐤅𐤍. It is plausible to connect with the ραμμανίται (Strabo, xvi. 4.24), between the μναίοι and the χαρραμωίται, for Sab. 𐤍 𐤅𐤍 is near Me'in (𐤍 𐤅𐤍; SW. Arabia). See further RAAMAH.

In this connection it is interesting to notice the increase in other exilic and post-exilic writers of names of tribes living in the N. Arabian and Syrian desert. ISHMAEL (q.v.) is known to J, who specifies the limits of the Ishmaelite roivings (Gen. 25 18); but he is better known to P. It is partly that the desert tribes encroached on former Israelitish territory, and so became known, partly that the tribes dwelling nearer Babylonia became acquaintances of the Hebrews by way of Babylon, and partly that the movements of peoples and individuals were becoming, from various causes, more frequent and extended, and general information more widely diffused. The population of the desert between Palestine and Babylonia became more definitely known to the Hebrews as the Jewish community was preparing to take on its later form. Of precise geographical yield there is here, however, very little. The list of Ishmael's twelve sons (Gen. 25 13 ff. [P] = 1 Ch. 1 29 ff.) well illustrates the facts (see especially Di. and reff.).

Such names as Kedar (Jer. 2 10 Ezek. 27 21 Is. 21 16 f. etc.) and Nebaioth (Is. 60 7 etc.; see on these, ISHMAEL, §§ 2, 4) now begin to appear, and the prophets have already begun to use the name Arabian with a definite significance (Jer. 25 24 Ezek. 27 21, see ARABIA, § 1).

At the end of Gen. 10 7 the list of P is interrupted by that of J. In v. 20 P reappears in a closing formula (as it does also in v. 31 f.). v. 22 f. deal with the sons of Shem (see above). With v. 23 P's list ends abruptly.

It remains only to consider a few later notices. The trading habits of the Jews, developed in and after the exile, not only resulted in the planting of Jewish colonies at various foreign centres, such as Alexandria, which naturally became sources of geographical knowledge, but also doubtless led them in the track of the conquering Macedonians (cp DISPERSION, § 11 f.). We are therefore not surprised to find, in a late book, a mention of INDIA (Esth. 1 1 89), which marks one of the youngest geographical notes of the OT and the farthest eastern point reached by biblical geography. If the land of Sinim in Is. 49 12 were China, the limit would be much farther eastward; but this interpretation can no longer be maintained (see SINIM). It will be observed that even Strabo knows nothing to the E. of India.

It is noteworthy that down to the time of this late reference, even after the long Hebrew contact with Babylonia and the adjacent countries to the E., there is no sign of acquaintance with the remoter Orient; nor is there even yet any clear token of familiarity with overland trade-routes to countries as distant as India. This is quite in keeping with the silence of our Assyrian and Babylonian sources on the same subjects, and points to the conclusion that such trade-routes were opened much later, or were much more insignificant, and perhaps shorter, than some have been inclined to suppose.

The geography of the Apocryphal books shows the transition from the older Hebrew geography to that of the Hellenistic and Roman worlds.

25. Apocrypha. We find much of the older geography continued and enlarged. Babylon is the familiar scene in Baruch, the Song of the Three Children, Susannah, Bel and the Dragon, as Media (Ecbatana, Rages) is in Tobit. The river HYDASPES [q.v.] appears as a novelty in Judith 16 and the city of Persepolis in 2 Macc. 9 2. Idumæa, 1 Macc. 4 29 61 6 31 etc., is named often, Egypt occasionally (e.g., 1 Macc. 11 13). In the distance are the SCYTHIANS (2 Macc. 4 47), as an example of a barbarous people. Arabia in a wide sense is frequent (e.g., 1 Macc. 11 16). The names of Syria (e.g., 1 Macc. 11 2 60), COLESYRIA (e.g., 1 Macc. 10 69, 2 Macc. 3 5), and Ptolemais (1 Macc. 5 15 22 etc.) now appear; also the harbour of Tripolis (διὰ τοῦ κατὰ Τρίπολιν λιμῆνος; 2 Macc. 14 1), Antioch (1 Macc. 4 35, etc.), and Daphne near it (2 Macc. 4 33).

As we move farther W. there is still more novelty. In the sea we have of course Cyprus (2 Macc. 10 13 12 2) and the Cyprians (4 29), and Crete (e.g., 1 Macc. 10 67); on land we have Cilicia (e.g., 1 Macc. 11 14 Judith 17 12) and Tarsus (2 Macc. 4 30); Asia as a kingdom (1 Macc. 8 6 11 13 etc.); the Galatians (8 2; RV 'Gauls'). Crossing the Ægean we have 'Alexander the Macedonian' (1 Macc. 1 1), and besides [ἡ] γῆ χερτιέλιμ (cp τὸν περσῶν κτιέων βασιλέα 85), in the same verse (and elsewhere) τὴν ἐλλάδα; the Spartans (σπαρτιάται) appear, especially in 1 Macc. 12 2 5 f. 20 f. We encounter an 'old man of Athens' in 2 Macc. 6 1; but this is doubtful (see GERON). Especially noteworthy is 1 Macc. 15 23, which contains a list of countries, including Sampsames, Samos, Rhodes, Gortyna, Cnidus, Cyrene, to which letters were sent from Rome (v. 15). The new power of Rome (1 Macc. 1 10 etc.) is often mentioned, and, farthest W. of all, the land of Spain (1 Macc. 8 3).

The meagreness of reference in these books to territory E. of Media and Persia indicates in part a lack of geographical interest and in part the ignorance of the authors. The Book of Tobit, whose scene is laid in Media, shows little trace of real acquaintance even with that country. The mention of India in the additional chapters of Esther (13 1 16 1) is a mere repetition of that in the Hebrew Esther, and that of 1 Macc. 8 8 is an obvious textual error.

A survey of NT geography would take us into regions that have hitherto hardly come within view; but such a 26. NT. survey is not necessary for the purposes of this article (see above, introduction). A large part of it would almost resolve itself into a study of the missionary journeys of Paul (see PAUL, GALATIA). It is enough to refer to the wide range of his journeys in Asia Minor, Greece, and the Greek islands and lastly his journey from Jerusalem to Rome, journeys that are familiar from deservedly popular works, the latest of which is Ramsay's St. Paul the Traveller (a valuable contribution).

We might almost say that to study the NT geography is to study the geography of the Roman province of Asia. In fact not only the Acts of the Apostles and the Epistles of Paul but also the Apocalypse of John (chaps. 1-3) send us mentally on a tour of investigation in Asia. It must not be forgotten, however, that whilst Rome could be introduced into the OT only by the Rabbinic device of taking 'Edom' as a symbol for 'Rome' (cp EDOM, § 10), 'Rome' itself stands written plainly again and again in the second part of the NT. Once the great missionary looks even beyond Rome—not merely to Tarshish, but to Spain (Rom. 15 24 28). Thus the realised and unrealised travelling purposes of Paul embrace a large section of the Roman empire. Against his will he even visited the island of Malta, where Punic was spoken. The soil of Africa he never touched, though in a remarkable catalogue of countries of the Jewish Dispersion (Acts 2 9 f.) the 'parts of Libya about Cyrene' are mentioned, and one would almost have expected to read in the sequel that Africa as well as Asia had been visited by Christian missionaries.

The passage, which, as Blass remarks, is in the style of prophecy, runs thus,—'Parthians and Medes and Elamites, and the dwellers in Mesopotamia, in Judæa (?) and Cappadocia, in Pontus and Asia, in Phrygia and Pamphylia, in Egypt and the parts of Libya about Cyrene, and sojourners from Rome, both Jews and proselytes, Cretans and Arabians, we do hear them speaking in our tongues the mighty works of God.' 'Judæa', however, is plainly a scribe's error. Jerome would read 'Syria'; Tertullian 'Armenia'; elsewhere (see INDIA) 'Ionia' is proposed. There is special interest in the mention of the Jews from Parthia (see PARTHIANS).

GEON (ΓΗΩΝ [BNA]), Ecclus. 24 27 AV, RV GIHON, 3 (q.v.).

GEPHYRUN (ΓΕΦΥΡΟΥΝ [A] om. V, Syr.), apparently the name of a city, called also Caspin (see CASPHOR), which was taken by Judas (2 Macc. 12 13 RV); but the relation between the two names is obscure. The former name might plausibly be identified with the Gephyrus of Polybius (see EPHRON i, 2), if the distance between the proposed sites of Caspin and Ephron were not too great to permit this.

Very possibly G is corrupt (so RVmg.). Some read πόλις γεφύραις (so cod. 55; cp Vg. firmam pontibus), or γεφύραν (Grot. Zö.), where γεφ. might have the sense of 'dams' or 'mounds.' AV translates, 'to make a bridge' (γεφύρου).

GERA (גֵּרָא), a compound of גֵּרָ? § 68; cp Phoen. גֵּרָא; גֵּרָא [BAL], a prominent Benjamite division to which belonged EHUD (Judg. 3:15), and SHIMEI, 1 (2 S. 16:5 19:16 [17], 1 K. 28). This and the name BECHER [g.v.] are the only Benjamite divisions mentioned in the historical books.

Gera is mentioned in late genealogical lists in Gen. 46:21 (GADL adds that he was the father of ARN) and 1 Ch. 8:35 (גֵּרָא [B v. 5] etc. (on the complications see H. W. Hogg, JQR 11:102-114 [98]), and cp BENJAMIN, § 9 ii. β). It is omitted in Nu. 26:38-40. Marq. (Fund. 22) discovers the gentilic גֵּרָאִי in 2 S. 23:36 (MT 'Bani the Gadite, the Gadite'); but see HAGRI.

GERAH (גֵּרָה), prop. 'grain,' Ass. girā, see Muss-Arnolt; βόλος [BAFL], obolus [Vg.], mā'ā, zāā [Pesh.], Ex. 30:13 Lev. 27:25 Nu. 3:47 18:16 Ez. 45:12f. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

GERAR (גֵּרָר), גֵּרָרָא [ADEL], a place (and a district?) in the extreme SW. of Palestine or, perhaps more strictly (unless a second place of the same name be meant), in N. Arabia—mentioned by J in Gen. 10:19 26:16 17:20 26, by E (?) in Gen. 20:1f. (in v. 2 γα[γα]ραρων [E]), and by the Chronicler in 2 Ch. 14:13 ([12]f. γε[δω]ρ [BA]).

Since the time of Rowlands, it has been generally identified with the ruins called Umm el-Jerār, about 5 m. S. of Gaza, in a deep and broad torrent-bed called Jurf el-Jerār (the upper part of the Wady Ghazza). This identification suits 2 Ch. 14, where, after defeating Zerah near Mareshah (Mer'ash, near Beit Jibrin), Asa pursues his foes as far as Gerar; also Gen. 10:19, where 'towards Gerar' is given as an alternative geographical point to 'unto Gaza' (even if the latter should be a gloss, it is probably correct), and 26:1, where Abimelech, who resides in Gerar, is called 'king of the Philistines' (Philistia cannot have reached much farther S. than the 'strong' city of Gaza). It is inconsistent, however, with Gen. 26:21f., where SITNAH and REHOBOTH (g.v.) are localised in the valley of Gerar, and with Gen. 20:1 where 'and he sojourned in Gerar' is an alternative geographical statement to 'and dwell between KADESH (i.) and SHUR' (g.v.). The passages just mentioned absolutely require a more southerly situation for Gerar than that proposed by Rowlands and adopted by Robinson, Socin (*Baed.*⁶) 143, and Mühlau (Riehm's *HWB*⁶). For these passages at any rate the site fixed upon by Trumbull (Kadesh Barnea, 63f. 255) and Guthe (ZDPV 8:215) seems indispensable. SW. of Ain Kadis is the Wady Jerār, a lateral valley of the W. esh-Sherāif, which issues into the W. el-'Arish; the name, as Robinson who describes it remarks, nearly corresponds to the Gerar of the OT.

In short, it is probable that there were two Gerars, and that J, who was equally unaware of this and of the true situation of Rehoboth and the other wells, confounded them, and consequently made Abimelech a 'king of the Philistines,' which the lord of Rehoboth and Sitnah cannot have been.

This view of the locality intended in the original form of the tradition, of which we have J's recast in Gen. 26, is confirmed by the version of the same folk-story given by J in his life of Abraham (Gen. 12:10-20), where the scene of the story is laid in Mizraim. That J understood the Mizraim of this tradition to be the land of Egypt, is obvious. There is indeed no special Egyptian colouring, but the mention of Pharaoh is enough to prove this reference. Elsewhere, however, it has been shown (see MIZRAIM, § 2δ) that some of the early traditions may have been misunderstood by J, through his ignorance of the early application of the term Mizraim (or Misror) to a region bordering on Edom, and adjoining the 'Wady of Mizraim,' in N. Arabia (see EGYPT, BROOK OF). This region probably included the territory between Kadesh and Shur, and also the wells Rehoboth and Sitnah. Winckler (AF 1:32) suggests that יִינֵר בְּנֵרָר, 'And he sojourned in Gerar,' in Gen. 20:1 may be an editorial addition, designed to harmonise the following narrative (E) with that in Gen. 26 (J). This is very probably correct; otherwise we must insert 'also,' and attach the words in question to v. 2 (so Strack), a most undesirable expedient. The modern name Jerār means 'pots'; but this is no guide to the sense of the Hebrew Gerar (cp the modern name of BEER-SHEBA).

Of the two Gerars only the first is known to tradition. It is, however, not the K-ru-ru of the famous list of Thotmes III., which was hardly near Gaza (WMM As. u. Eur. 159). Josephus apparently knows of Gerara as a Palestinian city (Ant. i. 121). Eusebius mentions it as 25 R. m. S. of Eleutheropolis, and as capital of Geraritica (OS 240:28; cp 299:74 77:80). It seems to be mentioned in the Talmud (Neub. Glog. 65). Sozomen (Hist. 6:32) says that there was there a large monastery. Cp GERRHENIANS.

GERASENES, THE COUNTRY OF THE. In the original tradition of the casting out of the legion of demons it was, most probably, stated that Jesus was met by a demoniac, or by two demoniacs, in the 'country of the Gerasesenes.' The story occurs in three forms, and according to both AV and RV, the three evangelists differ as to the scene. In Mt. 8:28 AV gives 'Gergesenes,' RV 'Gadarenes'; in Mk. 5:1 and Lk. 8:26 AV gives 'Gadarenes,' RV 'Gerasesenes.' It is not very easy to say in each case which is the best reading.

In Mt., Ti., Treg., WH., and Weiss adopt γαδαραῶν; in Mk., Ti. and WH agree in preferring γερασσηῶν; in Lk., WH adopts γερασσηῶν, but Ti. γεργεσσῶν (so K).

'Gergesenes' may, however, be confidently rejected. It has arisen out of 'Gerasesenes,' and supplies an example of the tendency of the scribes to repeat the initial g in gad or gar at the beginning of the next syllable (see GIRGASHITE). It was equally the habit of the scribes to substitute a well-known for an uncommon name. 'Gerasesenes' therefore is to be preferred to 'Gadarenes,' if we can only find a Gerasa which was on the E. coast of the Sea of Galilee; to identify this Gerasa with Jerās (see GILEAD, § 6) is out of the question. To start with, we have some reason to expect that there was such a place, because Origen (In Ev. Joann. 6:24) states that there was an 'ancient city' called Gergesa near the Lake of Tiberias, and hard by it a precipice, with which the descent of the swine into the lake was traditionally connected. So also Eusebius (OS 248:14).

Under 'Gergesa, where the Lord healed the demoniacs,' he says, καὶ νῦν δεικνύται ἐπὶ τοῦ ὄρους κώμη παρὰ τὴν λίμνην Τιβεριάδος εἰς ἣν καὶ οἱ χοῖροι κατεκρημνίσθησαν· κείτῃ καὶ ἀνωτέρω. Further, in an earlier place (242:68), where γεργασεῖ is treated of, it is defined as ἐπέκεινα τοῦ Ἰορδάνου παρακειμένη πόλις τῷ Γαλααδ ἢ ἐλαθε φιλῆ Μανασση. He adds that 'it is said to be Gerasa, a notable town of Arabia. And some say that it is Gadara. And the Gospel makes mention of the Gerasesenes'; and under Γερασσηῶν, 244:24, we read that 'Gergasi is in Basanitis, from which the children of Israel were unable to expel the Geshurites' (cp 127:18 under 'Gesom').

The probability is that Origen and Eusebius had really heard of a place on the Sea of Galilee called Gersa, and now that it has been shown that 'on the left bank of the Wady Semak, and at the point where the hills end and the plain stretches out towards the lake,' are ruins called Kersa, and that about a mile south of this the hills approach within forty feet of the lake, terminating in 'a steep, even slope,' we can hardly doubt that here is the lost Gerasa. 'The site,' says Sir C. W. Wilson,¹ 'is enclosed by a wall three feet thick. On the shore of the lake are a few ruined buildings, to which the same name is given by the Bedouin.' Thomson (LB 375), who first of all indicated these ruins, states (in harmony with Wilson) that though it was but a small place the walls can be traced all round, and there seem to have been considerable suburbs.

Thomson further states that there are ancient tombs in the high grounds about the ruins of Kersa (cp Macgregor, Rob Roy on the Jordan, 423). About Gadara on the Hieromax, caves are also abundant, and the territory of the city seems to have extended to the lake. GADARA (g.v.), however, is at least six miles from the lake, and though this is maintained by Keim, was certainly not intended in the original tradition. The possibility that Kersa is Gerasa is not taken into account by G. A. Smith (HG 458 f.), who identifies it with Gergesa, and considers 'Gergesenes' to be 'the reading supported by the documents.'

For a statement of the documentary evidence see WH App. 11; from which we can hardly avoid the inference that Γαδαραίων is probably correct in Mt., Γερασσηνίων in Mk. and Lk. The decision, however, is not historically of great moment; γερασσηνίων is virtually supported by the MSS which present γεργεσηνίων, for the reason given above, and should be preferred. With the statements of Eusebius in OS, cp the parallel passages in Jerome (viz. 180 18 125 27). The most important variation is at the close of the latter passage, which reads 'quidam autem ipsam esse Gadaram aestimant, sed et evangelium meminit Gergesenorum.' The authority of Eus. and Jer. for calling it Manassite appears to be merely the general statement in Josb. 13 29-31.

GERGESITES (οἱ γεργεσαῖοι [BNA]), Judith 5 16 AV, RV GIRGASHITES (g.v.).

GERIZIM, MOUNT (הַר גְּרִזִים) [Sam. writes the two words as one, הַרְגְּרִזִים; 'mountain of the GIRZITES' (g.v.); less probably from גְּרִז = גָּרַז, 'to cut in two'; the vocalization of a certainly primitive name has but slight authority; ΓΑΡ(Ε)ΙΖΕΙΝ [BAFL], but ΓΑΖΙΡΕΙΝ [A in Dt. 11 29 Judg. 9 7] and ΓΑΡΙΖΙΕΙΝ [V. A] in 2 Macc. 5 23, EV GARIZIM), the mountain (now called Jebel et -Tör) on the southern side of the valley or fissure in which Shechem lies, facing Ebal which is on the north. The height of Gerizim (properly Gerizzim) is 2849 ft.; that of Ebal 228 ft. more. The former is composed almost entirely of nummulitic limestone; in its rocky slopes are large caverns which were probably once quarries. The ascent at the present day cannot be called difficult, and the splendid view from the summit amply rewards the climb. One feels that if the union of N. and S. Israel could only have been accomplished, the sacred mountains Gerizim and Ebal, with the beautiful city nestling between them, might have been thought by Israel's leaders to have superior claims to Mt. Zion and Jerusalem.

A remarkable description is given of the situation of Gerizim in a passage hitherto much misunderstood. Moses has set before the Israelites a blessing and a curse, and directs them, when they have been brought into the land of promise, to 'put the blessing upon Mount Gerizim, and the curse upon Mount Ebal, on the other side Jordan, beyond Jericho, towards the entrance into Shechem, in the land of the Canaanites, who dwell in the House of the Tower beside the sacred trees [tree ?] of Moreh' (Dt. 11 29 f.).¹

The terrible state of corruption into which this passage early fell, led Eusebius (OS [2], 248 89) to state that according to the Scripture Gerizim and Ebal were 'near Golgoth'.² Dt. 11 29 f. which is Galgala' (Γολγοθα, ἡ καὶ Γαλγαλα. ταύτης εἶναι πλησίον ἢ γραφῆ διδάσκει τὸ Γαριζειν καὶ τοῦ Γαβαλα δρους), and an acute proposal has been made to identify the 'Gilgal' of the received text with the ruins called Juléjil, SW. of the valley of Shechem (see GILGAL, § 5). This, however, does not suit the phrase 'over against (κατὰ) Gilgal', and on grounds of principle it is undesirable to attempt identifications until the passage containing a place-name has been thoroughly scrutinised from the point of view of textual criticism. Juléjil may represent an ancient Gilgal or cromlech; but this does not show that it is referred to in Dt. 11 30. On the other hand, the text, as emended, gives a thoroughly accurate picture.

The 'entrance into Shechem is completely commanded by these two grand mountains, Ebal and Gerizim, as indeed the description in another striking passage (Josh. 8 33) also presupposes. 'Near the eastern end, the vale is not more than 60 rods wide' (Thomson), and from the highest gardens in the W. corner of Nāblus we turn at once to the path which skirts the rocky slopes of Gerizim. At no great distance is a platform of rock, with a projecting triangular crag, about 10 ft. in diameter, from which, as from a pulpit, Jotham could easily have shouted his parable in the ears of the people below¹ (Judg. 9 7), 'running away' afterwards (cp EV's naïve rendering of יָנַס v. 21) before Abimelech could take him. Nor is this, probably, the only portion of the story of Abimelech which refers to Gerizim. When that tyrant heard that all the people of the tower of Shechem were gathered together, we are told, he took his men to a mountain close by to get wood to set their refuge on fire. With axes he and his men cut down branches of trees and carried out his stern plan (Judg. 9 47-49). The mountain referred to can only be Ebal or Gerizim, and the corruption of Gerizim into ZALMON [g.v., i.] or Hermon (Ⓢ^{HAL}) is easy.

Dean Stanley's attempt to provide Gerizim with other historical associations (the meeting of Abram and Melchizedek and the sacrifice of Isaac) can hardly be called a success. The Samaritan traditions are of no historical value and have no sound biblical basis. One of them even represents Jacob as having had his great vision (Gen. 28 11 f.) on the summit of Gerizim (on the ruins called Lōze? [the Luza of OS 19 27 4 5 135 13] see Rob. BK). See SAMARITANS.

There are still two biblical passages in one of which possibly or probably and in the other beyond any doubt

Mt. Gerizim is referred to—viz., Is. 66 1

3. Other references. Jn. 4 20 f. Certainly if Is. 66 1-4 is post-exilic (and it is difficult to maintain any longer an exilic date), we can hardly find any other concrete object for the passage than that first assigned by Duhm—viz., the intention of the Samaritans to build a temple to Yahwē on Mt. Gerizim³ (see ISAIAH ii, § 21). Still, owing to the brevity of the passage we can scarcely claim more than high probability for this conjecture.

The second passage is also somewhat enigmatical. A modern writer quoted by Wetstein⁴ remarks on v. 22, 'Christ and the woman were both agreed in the object of worship. The question she puts is only which is the true place for it. But how is that determined by the answer?' The truth is that Jesus goes beyond the question of the Samaritan woman. He asserts (or is made to assert) that neither the Jerusalem nor the Gerizim temple is a fit place for spiritual worshippers, but also denies that the Samaritans as a body worship the Father (who requires spiritual worship) at all; and he looks forward to the time when the Samaritans shall give up the cultus on Mt. Gerizim without accepting (as the author of Is. 66 1-4 had doubtless wished) the cultus on Mt. Zion.⁵ Thus Mt. Gerizim, which loomed above Jesus and the woman as they conversed by Jacob's well ('in this mountain, v. 20), gave occasion to Jesus, according to the Fourth Gospel, to enunciate the great principle of spiritual religion. We must not, however, allow ourselves to exaggerate the blame extended by Jesus to Mt. Gerizim. Partisans of the temple at

² May we compare the name of the village Tallāzā, a little to the N. of Ebal, sometimes identified with TIRZAH (g.v., 1)?

³ König, it is true, sees no necessity for any 'concrete motive' such as Gressmann suggests (the rebuilding of the temple at Jerusalem). The writer of vv. 1-4 wishes to emphasise his conviction that only a 'house of prayer' (cp 66 7) was 'an appropriate place of worship for Yahwē' (The Exiles' Book of Consolation, 201 f. [99]). Is. 66 1-4 according to him is an exilic passage, but 66 5 ff. were added after the building of the temple.

GERON

Jerusalem were, in his eyes, not less 'sectarian' than partisans of the temple on Gerizim. See SAMARITANS.

The summit of this mountain testifies to a succession of faiths. The most prominent monument is not the most important; it consists of ruins of the castle built by

4. Ruins. Justinian in 533 A.D. to protect the Christian church erected in 475 A.D. (the foundations of which still remain). In the centre of the plateau, however, is something much more venerable—a smooth surface of rock which is the traditional site of the altar of the temple of the Samaritans, and therefore their 'Holy of Holies.' The cup hollow in it resembles those in many Syrian dolmens, and may well have been used in primæval times for libations. Conder (Syrian Stonelore, 169 f.) suspects that, though this rock may once have been enclosed, there was no proper temple. Josephus, however, had no interest in exaggerating, and his words are plain—a temple like that at Jerusalem (Ant. xi. 82). The drafted blocks of the walls of Justinian's castle may possibly belong to a still older structure (Baed. (9) 256). In the foundations of the western wall there are some ten or twelve large stones beneath which tradition places the 'twelve stones,' brought up from the bed of the Jordan by the Israelites (Josh. 4.20). The place where the lambs of the Samaritan passover are killed is a short way down the W. slope of the mountain, a little above the spot where the Samaritans pitch their tents seven days before the feast. For an account of the passover ceremony, see SAMARITANS.

Gerizim rejoices in a copious spring of delicious water (the Rās el-'Ain), which may quench the thirst of the scanty band of Samaritans at passover time, but was naturally insufficient for the multitude gathered on the mountain and slaughtered by Cerealis in the time of Vespasian (see Jos. BJ iii. 7.32).

GERON, an Athenian, introduced by RV^{mg}. into an account of measures taken by Antiochus Epiphanes against the Jewish religion (2 Macc. 6 r). The text has γέροντα Ἀθηναίων [VA], which EV renders 'an old man of Athens.' The || passage, 1 Macc. 1.44, speaks of messengers sent by the king. The leader of these messengers would naturally be either a civil or a military official under Antiochus.

Probably ἀθηναίων is a clerical error for ἀντιοχεύα; Vet. Lat. and Vg. have 'Antiochenum,' which may of course be the conjecture of a translator, but is none the worse because it is ancient. It is a further question whether γέροντα is not itself corrupt; RV^{mg}, perhaps unintentionally, suggests this view. But Ewald's rendering, 'a senator of Antioch' (Hist. 5.298, n. 5), is very plausible. The name of the official was not necessary; the Ar. vers., however, gives it as Filkūs (see Grimin, ad loc.). For a subtle but hardly necessary critical conjecture see Koster, Th. T 12.496 (78).

The town of Gerra (τὰ γερρά, Strabo, xvi. 233; γερρών δριον, Ptol. iv. 5.11) lay between Pelusium and Rhinocolura, but can hardly be intended here, since the coast as far N. as Rhinocolura was at this time Egyptian (cp Polyb. v. 80.3). The Syriac reads G-Z-R. More probably, however, we should read γεραρηων, which agrees with the reading γεραρηων of one MS (cod. 55). 'From Ptolemais unto the Gerarenes' (see GERAR) would represent the whole of Palestine in its widest extension from N. to S.

Compare the expression in 1 Macc. 11.59 where Simon is made captain of the country 'from the LADDER OF TYRUS (about 100 stadia N. of Ptolemais) unto the borders of Egypt.'

GERSHON (גרשון), for which in Ch. regularly גרשון and גרשו with the exception of 1 Ch. 6.1 [5.27], ΓΕΛΕΩΝ [A], 23.6 ΓΗΡΣΑΜ [A]; ΓΕΛΕΩΝ [BAFL], b. Levi, is mentioned only in P and Ch. He is the first-born of Levi in Gen. 46.11 (γερσων [AD]), Ex. 6.16 (γερσων [AF]) 1 Ch. 6.1, and makes up with Kēhāth and Merari the three chief subdivisions of the Levites. Although the first-born, he is overshadowed by the Kehathites (to whom Aaron belonged). His sons Libni and Shimei (Ex. 6.17 Nu. 3.18 21 1 Ch. 6.17 [2] 23.7) were known, according to the Chronicler's conception, already in David's time (1 Ch. 23.7-11).

The sons of Gershon or the Gershonites (הגרשונים; δ γεδσω[ε] [BAFL], δ γερσσω[ε] [BA]) are numbered at 7500 in the wilderness (Nu. 3.22)—which has an artificial look when we recollect that the whole number of the Levites is enumerated at about three times that number, viz. 23,000 (Nu. 26.62). P describes moreover their special work at the tabernacle and also the position taken up by them on their journeyings (ib. 3.25 4.24 7). Far more important, however, is the notice of the cities apporportioned to them (Josh. 21.27 33 γερσων [AL]; 1 Ch. 6.62 [47] 71-76 [56-61] γερσων [A]); these all lay to the N., in Manasseh beyond Jordan, Issachar, Asher, and Naphtali, and if we take this in connection with the notice of Jonathan b. Gershom b. Moses in Judg. 18.30 it would appear that the priests of Dan formed a group which traced its origin back to Moses, and derived its name from his first-born.¹ In the post-exilic and priestly genealogies the place of Gershon b. Moses is taken by Gershon b. Levi; compare the similar case of ELIEZER b. Moses and ELEAZAR b. Aaron. See GENEALOGIES i., § 7.

 Ⓜ^a's γερσσω may be due to a misreading, or possibly enough points to an original גרשם (so Ki. SBOT, see GERSHOM). It is noteworthy that in both cases the Calebite name finds evident analogies in names of N. Arabian origin.

GESHEM (גרשם), ΓΗΡΣΑΜ [BNA], ΓΙC. [L], GOSEMI, called 'the Arabian,' an ally of Sanballat and Tobiah, and an opponent of Nehemiah (Neh. 2.19 6.1 f. 6). In Neh. 6.6 the name takes the form GASHMU (גרשמו, γοσεμ [N^c-a mg.], om. BN^a*A; GOSEMI); the correct form is probably Gushamu, a well-known Arabian name (cp Cook, Aramaic Glossary, s.v. גושם).

GESHUR (גרשור). 1. A territory in NE. Palestine, adjoining the Israelite possessions, and reckoned as Aramæan (2 S. 15.8). According to 1 Ch. 2.23 (om. Pesh.), Geshur and other Aramæan peoples took the Havvoth-jair from the Israelites. It may often be dangerous to treat statements of this kind in 1 Ch. 1-9 as historical; but the statement here made is not in itself improbable; it implies that Geshur was at any rate N. of the Havvoth-jair. Still less reason is there to doubt the correctness of the geography of Dt. 3.14 Josh. 12.5 (late as these statements are), except indeed as to the localisation (in Dt. l.c.) of the Havvoth-jair in Bashan rather than in N. Gilead (see HAVVOTH-JAIR).

In these passages the Geshurites and the Maacathites are mentioned together as bordering on the territory of Og king of Bashan, and therefore on that of Israel. Hence Guthe (ZDPV 12.233), Wetzstein, and G. A. Smith incline to place Geshur and Maacah in the modern province of Jōlān (Gaulanitis); Geshur would of course be S. of Maacah.

Conder (Smith's DB(2)) and von Riess (Bibel-Atlas(8), '95), indeed, still prefer to identify it with the plain of Jēdūr, which is SE. of Hermon and NE. of en-Nukra. This view is not only linguistically hazardous, but also involves identifying en-Nukra with Bashan, and placing the Havvoth-jair outside the N. boundary of Gilead. Furrer (ZDPV 13.198) places Geshur still farther E. He identifies it with the Lejā, that great lava plateau which lies E. of en-Nukra and NE. of the Jebel Haurān, and corresponds approximately with Trachonitis; but his reasons are very insufficient.

It is a disputable point whether Ishbaal was really king 'over Gilead and over the Geshurites' (2 S. 2.9 Pesh., Vg.). For two reasons:—First, because in Absalom's time (2 S. 15.8) 'Geshur in Aram' (?) was an independent state, and secondly, because though in Josh. 13.11 (cp v. 13) Joshua is said to have assigned Geshur and Maacah to the two-and-a-half tribes beyond Jordan, we cannot safely accept this as correct in the face of the contrary statements in Dt. 3.14 Josh. 12.5. The truth probably is that 'in Aram' in 2 S. 15.8 and 'Geshurites' in 2 S. 2.9 are incorrect readings. See GESHUR, 2; ASHURITES.

In Josh. 12.5 B has γεγεσει, in Dt. 3.14 BBAFL [but B γαργασει, see Swete] γαργασει (cp Eus. in OS 244.24, who takes γεσουρευμ to be the city of γαργασει in Bashan where the Israelites did not destroy the Geshurites); BAF in Josh. 12.5 γεσουρευ, BL γεσουρευ. Other forms are: in 2 S. 15.37 14.23 15.8 γεδσουρ [BA], γεσουρευ [L]; in 1 Ch. 2.23 γεδσουρ [B], γεσουρευ [A], γεσουρ [L]; in Josh. 13.13 γεσει [B], γεσουρ [L]. In Josh. 12.5 Pesh. exceptionally has 'Endor'.

גֶּשׁוּרִי, 'the Geshurite.' A district at the extreme limit of Palestine, S. of Philistia, Josh. 13.2 (AV Geshuri), 1 S. 27.8 (EV 'the Geshurites'; so RV in Josh.). The former passage (late) introduces a description of the land in the SW. towards Egypt, which in Joshua's old age still remained unconquered. A reference to the northern Geshur is therefore impossible. In the latter passage the Hebrew text gives, as the names of peoples or districts attacked by David from Ziklag, 'the Geshurite, the Girzite or Gerizite (see GIRZITES), and the Amalekite.' B, however, gives only two names; one of the first two names in MT is doubtless a doublet. Wellhausen, Driver, and Budde give the preference to the second name in the form sanctioned by the Kre, viz. גִּרְזִי, 'the Girzite,'—i.e., the Canaanites of GEZER (so RVMS, see Judg. 1.29; 1 K. 9.16). But Gezer lay too far N. It is better to read either 'the Girzite' or 'the Geshurite,'¹ and the latter is on the whole the more probable, for the Girzites probably belonged to northern or central Canaan. It was probably a chieftain of these southern Geshurites whose daughter Maacah became one of David's wives and mother of Absalom. He is called Talmi, which is also the traditional name of a Hebronite giant (Judg. 1.10; see HEBRON, § 1); David's close connection with S. Palestine is well known, and the list of the children born to him in Hebron in 2 S. 3.2-5 mentions the son of Abigail the Carmelite just before Absalom. Maacah is given as the name of a concubine of Caleb (1 Ch. 2.48). This theory accounts more fully than the rival view for Absalom's flight recorded in 2 S. 13.37 (cp 14.23 15.8). In the southern Geshur, close to and yet outside of Judah, the pretender would have every opportunity of preparing for his revolt. Ahiphophel (Ahiphelet?) and Amasa, his chief supporters, belonged to S. Judah, and it was the tribe of Judah which was principally concerned in the rebellion (cp 2 S. 19.11 [12] ff.).¹ The only objection to this is that in 2 S. 15.8 Absalom says to David, 'Thy servant vowed a vow while I dwelt at Geshur in Aram.' This specification, however, would rather be expected in 2 S. 13.37. It is clear that בארם 'in Aram' is a gloss (for כְּבָאֲרָם?), suggested by the vicinity of the northern Geshur to that of Maacah.

The suggestion of Glaser (AHT 242) that in Josh. 13.2 1 S. 27.8 we should read for גֶּשׁוּרִי, גֶּשׁוּרִי (see ASSHURIM), should also be mentioned; consistency would then oblige us to change Absalom's 'Geshur' into 'Ashur.'

B in 1 S. l.c. gives only γεσει; BL gives both names (γεσει [A] or γον γεσουραϊον [L] and γον γεσειον). Afterwards, instead of 'Shur,' BL gives 'Geshur' (γεσουρ). In Josh. 13.2 B γεσει, BL γεσουρ [L], Pesh. 'Endor.' In 2 S. 13.37 B adds εις την μαχαβ [B] ('to the land of Maacah'), ε. γ. γ. μαχαβ [A], ε. γ. χαλαμα [L]. T. K. C.-S. A. C.

GETHER (גֵּתֵר) = גֵּתֵרִי [i.e. GESHUR, 1]; Marq. ZATW 8.155; γαθερ [AEL]), one of the 'sons' of ARAM (Gen. 10.23, 1 Ch. 1.17 γαθερ [L]).

GETHSEMANE (ΓΕΘΣΗΜΑΝΕΙ [Ti. WH])—i.e., 'oil press,' see OIL; the word is Aramaic, but the form somewhat uncertain [= (ם)שֶׁמֶן]תָּרֵץ.

1. In NT. Dalm. Gramm. 152. The forms γεσημανει, γησαμ.=(ם)שֶׁמֶן תָּרֵץ; GETHESEMANI, GESEMANI is given in Mt. 26.36 Mk. 14.32 as the name of the place to which Jesus retired with the disciples after the Last Supper. In both passages it is called χωριον (see FIELD, 9); EV renders 'place' (but see RVMS); the word answers to the Latin praedium (so Vg. in Mk., but villa in Mt.). What is meant is a piece of ground enclosed by a wall or fence of some sort; this is confirmed by Jn. 18.1, which speaks of a 'garden' (κηπος; see GARDEN, § 7) and uses the expressions 'he went in' (εισῆλθεν, v. 1) and 'he went out' (εξηλθεν, v. 4). Lk., like Jn., does not name Gethsemane and uses the vague expression 'place' (τόπος; 22.40). Possibly it belonged to owners who willingly afforded access to Jesus; at all events, he was in the habit of resorting to it (Lk. 21.37 22.39), and the habit was known to Judas Iscariot. Doubtless the enclosure contained a press, perhaps also a house in which the other disciples, apart from Peter, James, and John, may have sheltered. It has been conjectured that the owner may have been Mary the mother of John Mark, that she may have had some kind of country-house there, and that the young man mentioned in Mk. 14.51 f. may have been Mark himself suddenly aroused from his slumbers. In any case, we know that Gethsemane was situated (Jn. 18.1) to the E. of KIDRON [q.v., § 3] and was regarded as belonging to the Mt. of Olives (Lk. 21.37 22.39). Thus we have to think of Jesus as quitting the town by one of the gates of the eastern wall, descending into the Kidron valley, crossing the bed of the brook, and reascending on the other side. It is at Gethsemane that the touching scenes recorded by the evangelists are placed—the agony and prayers of Jesus, the sleep of the apostles, the arrival of Judas and his train, the arrest; the NT does not enable us to fix the site more exactly.

Tradition became more precise. From the fourth century onwards, perhaps from the time of the visit of the Empress Helena, the garden of Gethsemane has been shown at the foot of the Mt. of Olives on the left bank of the Kidron, some fifty yards from the present bridge.

Eusebius tells us that in his day the faithful were diligent in prayer at the place, and Jerome says it had a church (OS(2) 180.24; 248.20). The Franciscans, to whom the ground now belongs—it measures about 150 ft. by 140—surrounded it with a wall in 1848, adorned it with chapels, and laid it out as a European garden with walks, borders, and beds (the oriental garden is a plantation of trees; see GARDEN).

It contains eight old olive trees which pilgrims willingly believe to date from the time of Christ, or at least to come from trees of that date. On the other hand, it has to be remarked not only that olives are not in the habit of attaining so great an age, but also that, according to Josephus (BJ vi. 11 f.), all the trees about Jerusalem were cut down by the army of Titus at the time of the siege. The earliest trace of a tradition relative to the olives of Gethsemane does not go back farther than to the sixteenth century. Some hundred yards to the N. of the garden a cave (ancient cistern), transformed into a Latin sanctuary—the Grotto of the Agony—is shown; the suggestion is that here is the place spoken of by Lk. (22.41) as 'about a stone's cast' from where the three apostles were. The Greeks have a garden called Gethsemane close to but distinct from that of the Latins; the Russians also have built a church in the neighbourhood. See PEFQ, 1887, p. 159; 1889, p. 176.

The authenticity of the site, then, is not demonstrable; but neither is it utterly improbable. In reality, however, the scene must at all events have been larger. It may have been perhaps more to the N., or more to the S., in the valley; or, more probably still, further to the E., higher up on the western slope of the Mt. of Olives, though not on the very top—a site ill adapted for a retreat (Reland, 857). If Lk. (21.37 22.39) had said ἐπὶ instead of εἰς (τὸ ὄρος), the expression would have been more conclusive against the traditional site (Eus. OS⁽²⁾ 218.20 has πρὸς τῷ ὄρει; Jer. OS⁽²⁾ 130.24, ad radices montis Oliveti). The Emperor Hadrian caused extensive terracing to be made in the Kidron valley; by these doubtless the previous contours were considerably modified (PEFQ, '93, p. 80).

GEZER (גִּזְרִים, cp two places, one of them near Aleppo, called el-Jazra [Yākūt, Mu'jam al-buldān, 271 l. 1]; most usually ΓΑΖΕΡ [BAL]), an ancient Canaanitish city said to have been conquered by Joshua (Josh. 10.33 [ΓΑΖΗC, BA] 12.12), and situated on the S. border of Ephraim (16.5, not in MT [cp v. 3]; ΓΑΖΑΡΑ [BA], -ΡΩΝ [L]), towards the W. (1 Ch. 7.28); a Levitical city (Josh. 21.21 [ΓΑΖΑΡΑ, B; -ΖΕΡΑ, L], 1 Ch. 6.67 [52]). It remained Canaanitish (Josh. 16.10 Judg. 1.29) until 'Pharaoh, king of Egypt,' or, as has been conjectured, Fir'u, king of the N. Arabian Musri (see GENUBATH, HADAD i. [3], MIZRAIM, § 2 [δ]), took and burned it, and gave it as a marriage portion to his daughter, Solomon's bride (1 K. 9.16, γεζερ [A]; for B see 4.33; L 5.3); Solomon fortified it (v. 17). It is mentioned in 2 S. 5.25 (AV GAZER, γαζηρα [BAL]) = 1 Ch. 14.16 (γαζαρα [B], -ζηρα [AL] = MT גִּזְרִים) as the limit of David's pursuit of the Philistines; obviously it was on the border of the Philistine territory. In 1 Ch. 20.4 'Gezer' is given where the text of Samuel (2 S. 21.18) gives 'Gob.' As Maspero has pointed out, it is the Qazir (W. Max Müller, Kā-di-ry) of Thotmes III.'s list of names of Palestinian cities (RP⁽²⁾ 551); in the Amarna tablets it appears as Gazi, whose ruler Yapaḥi protests his fidelity to the Pharaoh (KB 5328 ff.). On its share in the revolt against Rameses II. see EGYPT, § 58; and on the mention of it in the 'Israel inscription' see EGYPT, § 60.

As Gazara (γαζαρα) it is frequently mentioned in the Maccabæan wars (1 Macc. 4.15 etc.); see GAZARA. In the time of John Hyrcanus it was taken by Antiochus VII. Sidetes; but at the conclusion of the war the Hasmonæans were permitted to retain it, apparently through the intervention of the Romans (see Schürer, GJV 1.206 f.).

By Strabo (xvi. 229) it is mentioned as γαδαρίς 'which also the Jews appropriated'; but he seems to have somewhat confused it with Gadara beyond Jordan. In Josephus (Ant. xii. 7.4) the form γαδαρα also occurs for Gezer, and, in a Notitia Episcopatum, βεγεων γαδαρων near Azotus is distinguished from γαδαρα between Pella and Capitolas. At a synod in Jerusalem in 536 there were two bishops, each of Gadara. In the OS (244.16; 127.10) it is Gazara (γαζαρα a 'villa' or κώμη) 4 m. northward from Nicopolis. (See ZDPV 17.30-41.)

The long-lost site of Gezer was discovered in 1873 by Clermont-Ganneau, close to the village of Abū Shūsheh, a little to the S. of Ramleh, towards

2. Site. Jerusalem. It is the high and isolated point known as Tell Jezzer, which being just 4 m. W. by N. from 'Amwās (Emmaus-Nicopolis) is no doubt the Gazara referred to in OS. The Tell is described (see PEFM 2428-440) as having terraces of rude stone, and a sort of citadel at its eastern end. There are also rock-hewn tombs, and a great reservoir near the modern European farm, and the correctness of Ganneau's identification is placed beyond dispute by his discovery of three bilingual inscriptions—one of which includes the word גִּזְרִים 'Gezer'¹—which are placed palæographically between the Hasmonæan and the Herodian periods.

For the present state of the archaeological questions which have been raised, see his Archæological Researches in Palestine, 2257; Recueil d'Archæol. Orient. 1.351-391, cp 401. Ganneau has shown that Tell Jezzer is the Mont Gisart, near which in 1177 Baldwin IV. gained a victory over Saladin. See also Lagrange, Rev. Bibl. 1899, pp. 422-427.

GEZITES, THE (גִּזְרִיָּתִים), Kr., for which Kt. THE GERZITES (AV^{ms}); in 1 S. 27.8 (Ο ΓΕΖΡΑΙΟΣ [AL]), where RV more correctly has GIRZITES (q.v.); see also GIRGASHITE), mg. GIZRITES. THE GESHURITES (see GESHUR, 2) and the Gizrites (?) are mentioned together. 'The Gezrites' might mean the Canaanites of GEZER (q.v.), but more probably should be deleted. See GIRZITES.

GIAH (גִּיָּה; ΓΑΙ [BA], ΓΙΕΖ [L]), supposed to be the name of a place on the road in which Joab pursued Abner (2 S. 2.24). See, however, GIBEAH, § 2 (6).

GIANT, GIANTS. 1. גִּבּוֹרִים, גִּבּוֹרִים, rāphā'; גִּבּוֹרִים, rāphā'im, 2 S. 21.16 ff. Gen. 14.5 etc., see RAPHAH (2), REPHAIM (1). According to Duhm, Rephaim means (a) giants, (b) the shades (Manes), inasmuch as the God-defying giants were hurled into Shēōl and became the chief among the inhabitants of Shēōl. See, however, DEAD, § 3.

2. גִּבּוֹרִים, nephilim, Gen. 6.4 Nu. 13.33¹. See NEPHILIM.
3. גִּבּוֹרִים, gibbōr (γυγας, often in Ⓞ). The rendering is based on the Ar. use of jabbārūn for 'giant' (cp Gen. 6.4); but moderns prefer the sense 'warrior'; cp David's gibbōrim or 'warriors.'
4. גִּבּוֹרִים, ANAKIM (q.v.), may also be explained as 'giants.'

GIBBEAR (גִּבְעָר; ΓΑΒΕΡ [B], ΓΑ. [AL]), a district of Judah mentioned in the great post-exilic list, Ezra 2.20 (see EZRA ii. § 9, § 8 c).

It has been proposed to read גִּבְעוֹן, 'Gibeon' (so Berth.-Ryssel as in || Neh. 7.25, γαβαων [B^{NAL}]), but against this see GIBEON, § 3. Guthe prefers גִּבְעָר or גִּבְעָר following 1 Esd. 5.17 (RV BAITERUS; [γῶν] βατρηπος [BA]). See BETHEN i.

GIBBETHON (גִּבְעָתוֹן; ΓΑΒΑΘΩΝ [BAL]), a city which, according to 1 K. 15.27 16.15 (ΓΑΒΑΩΝ [B]), 17. in Baasha's time and after it, belonged to the Philistines, and was apparently their frontier fortress towards Ephraim (see PHILISTINES). Possibly it is the same as Gibeah of Phinehas (see GIBEAH, § 2 [2]). In Josh. it is Danite (19.44; βεγεθων [B], γαβαθων [L]) and

Levitical (21 23; γεθεδαν [B*], γεθαιβαν [B^{vid.}], γαβεθων [A], γεβθων [L]).

Conder's identification with Kibbiah, to the NE. of Lydda, reappears in PEF map, but not in those of Fischer-Guthe or Buhl. Kibbiah does not appear to be an important site. G. A. Smith (HG 351) favours it; but it is surely too far N. for a Philistine stronghold. All memory of Gibbethon seems to have been lost from a very early date. Eusebius and Jerome (OS² 128 15; 246 52) after enumerating several places named Gabathon, content themselves with adding: 'there is also another γαβαθων (Gatbaba) of the Philistines in the Book of Kings.'

GIBEAH. Any isolated eminence such as those which abound in the central plateau of Palestine might be called גִּבְעָה, gib'ah, as distinguished from har, 'mountain,' 'mountain range,' or 'mountain district.' The distinction cannot, however, be rigorously carried out.

We will first consider the two places called Gibeah without any descriptive qualification. It must be borne in mind that Geba, Gibeah, and Gibeon

1. Without qualification. are very liable to be confounded; for example, in Judg. 20 10, and perhaps in v. 33 (but see Budde, ad loc.), 'Geba' should be 'Gibeah'; in v. 31 'Gibeah' should probably be 'Gibeon'; in v. 43 'Gibeah' should perhaps be 'Geba.' So, too, in 1 S. 13 2 15 14 2 16 'Gibeah' has been written in error for 'Geba'; and in 2 S. 21 6 'Gibeah of Saul' for 'Gibeon'; see the commentaries of Moore, Budde, and H. P. Smith. On 1 K. 15 22 see GEBE, 1, and on 1 Ch. 8 29 (= 9 35) see below.

1. A city of Judah, included in the same group with places to the SE. of Hebron (Josh. 15 57; γαβαα [BAL]).

In 1 Ch. 2 49 it is called Gibeā (גִּבְעָה; γαβαλ [B], -βαα [A], γαββαα [L]), and a Calebite origin is assigned to it. It may be (see Di.) either the Gabaa (γαβαα) or the Gabatha (γαβαθα) of Eus. and Jer. (OS² 246 55; 128 18). There is a K^bu, no. 114 in the name-list of Thotmes III. (RP² 5 53).

2. (γαβαα [BAL]; ὁ βουνός [often in G^L]; οἱ βουνοὶ [Hos. 58]). A city of Benjamin ('G. of Benjamin,' 1 S. 13 2 [?]; γαβεε [B], 15 [om. A], 14 16 γαβεε [B]; cp Judg. 19 14; also 'G. of the children of Benjamin,' 2 S. 23 29 γαβαεθ [B], but G^L has τοῦ βουνοῦ). It seems to be identical with GIBEAH OF SAUL (גִּבְעָה נַחֲשֵׁת, 1 S. 11 4 (γαβααθα [A*], γααθα [A^a], βουνόν [L]), 13 2 (γαβεε [B]), 15 34 (βουνόν [L]), 2 S. 21 6 (γαβαων [BA], βουνῶ [L]), 1s. 10 29 (G αγγα). but not with the GIBEAH of Josh. 18 28 (γαβαωθ [BL], -ααθ [A]), nor with 'Gibeah of God' (see § 2 [3]). In Hos. 58 9 (G τοῦ βουνοῦ), 10 9 (G τῶ βουνοῦ) it is called 'the Gibeah' (גִּבְעָה). The reference in Is. 10 29 is important as clearly distinguishing the two places Geba and Gibeah. The title 'Gibeah of Saul' implies that this was Saul's birthplace (cp SAUL); probably the true text of 1 S. 9 1 and of 1 Ch. 8 29 (= 9 35) stated distinctly that Saul's father was of Gibeah of Benjamin.¹ The gentile Gibeathite (גִּבְעָתִי; ὁ γεβωθελιτης [B^N], ὁ γαβαωνιτης [L], ὁ ταβαθιτης [A]) occurs once (1 Ch. 12 3).

Gibeah was the scene of one of the most elaborate narratives of the Book of Judges; chap. 20 describes how the assembled tribes captured the guilty city of Gibeah, and destroyed the Benjamite army, except 600 men (see BENJAMIN, § 5; JUDGES ii., § 13).² In the history of Saul frequent mention is made of the royal city (references above). Two passages are specially helpful in fixing its situation. From Judg. 19 12-14 it appears that Gibeah was on or near the main N. road, and S. of Ramah; and from 1 S. 10 2-7 10-13 that from Beeroth (see below, § 2 [3]) to Geba and from Geba to Saul's home was an easy journey. Both passages become intelligible if Gibeah is located, as Gross and Valentiner first suggested,¹ and as Robinson established, at Tell (or Tulcil) el-Fül, a bare conical hill (2754 ft. above sea-level) about 4 m. N. of Jerusalem, towards er-Rām.

According to Josephus, 'Gabah Saul' was from 20 to 30 stadia from Jerusalem on the way thither from Gophna (Ant. v. 28 and B^v v. 2 1 combined), which suits the proposed site. Moore, however, would have been inclined from the narrative in Judg. 19 to look for a site somewhat nearer to er-Rām.

There are several place-names compounded with Gibeah or Gibeath; 1-3 are represented as such in RV^{mg}.

1. GIBEAH HA-ARALOTH (גִּבְעָה אֲרָלוֹת).
2. Compound names. תְּקֵלֹת; βουνός τῶν ἀκροβυστιῶν), 'the hill of the foreskins,' RV^{mg} of Josh. 5 3 (J), between the Jordan and Jericho, connected with the report of the circumcision (cp GILGAL i.; § 1). The name suggests Aralu, a Babylonian name for the kingdom of the dead; a popular etymology arose when Aralu had been forgotten (Che.). For another view see Stade, ZATW, '86, p. 132 f. See also HELKATH, HAZZURIM.

2. GIBEAH OF PHINEHAS (גִּבְעָה פִּינְחָס; γαβααρ [B], γαβααθ [AL], φ[ε]υεες), a city (cp Jos. Ant. v. 1 29) in Mt. Ephraim where Aaron's son, Eleazar, was buried (Josh. 24 33). Possibly it is the same as GIBBETHON.

Perhaps the Geba (γῆβα) of Eus. and Jer. (OS² 248 3 130 5), which was 5 R. m. from Gophna (Jifna) on the road to Neapolis (Näblus), and, according to PEF Nom. 2 290, corresponds to Jibiā, NW. of Jifnā, and only 1 hr. from Tibneh (Iimnath-heres). It is of no importance that the tombs of Eleazar and Phinehas are shown at Auarta, situated in the plain of Makhna, SE. of Mt. Gerizim.

3. GIBEAH OF GOD (גִּבְעָה אֱלֹהִים; ὁ τὸν βουνὸν τοῦ θεοῦ 1 S. 10 5; but in v. 10 a simple 'Gibeah' [G^{BA} τὸν βουνόν, G^L τὸν βαμα βουνόν] occurs). The locality is defined as being 'where is the pillar of the Philistines' (see SAUL, § 2 n.), and, since this definition was thought necessary, it may be questioned whether Stenning (Hastings, DB 2 170 a) is right in identifying it with Gibeah of Saul. Prof. G. A. Smith (HG 250) considers it to be the modern Rāmallah (Ewald's Ramah), about 10 m. N. of Jerusalem. The names agree in meaning, and the situation of Rāmallah is quite consistent with regarding TABOR [q.v. ii.] in 1 S. 10 3 as a corruption of Beeroth (Bīreh) and with the identification of Gibeah of Saul with Tell el-Fül. Still, the mention of the 'pillar of the Philistines' is more favourable to the view that the Gibeah of God is identical with Geba (i.e., Jeba). We may suppose that Saul went straight across the hill-country from Beeroth ('Tabor' in MT) to Geba, and thence by Ramah (1 S. 10 13, see below) to Gibeah of Benjamin.

In 1 S. 10 13 'he came to the high place' should be 'he came to hā-rāmāh—i.e., to Ramah (er-Rām). G^{BA} has εἰς τὸν βουνόν, G^L εἰς τὸν βουνόν βαμα; cp v. 10. Either Saul's uncle dwelt there, or something has fallen out of the text between v. 13 and v. 14. This is the easiest emendation.

4. THE GIBEAH OF (THE) MOREH (Judg. 7 1). See MOREH.

5. THE GIBEAH OF (THE) HACHILAH (1 S. 23 19 26 1). See HACHILAH.

6. THE GIBEAH OF AMMAH (2 S. 2 24). The text is in great disorder.

Was there any 'wilderness of Gibeon'? and how was it that the pursuers got no farther than the district of Gibeon by sunset? Supposing some transposition and corruption to have taken place, an intelligible view of the situation can be produced. 'Gibeon' may be a corruption of גִּבְעוֹן, 'Zeboim,' and אַמְמָה, 'Ammah' of אַדְמוֹמִים, 'Adummim.' In 1 S. 13 18 (see H. P. Smith) we read of 'the hill which overhangs the valley of Zeboim.' The same hill may be referred to here under the name Adummim. The 'ascent of Adummim' [q.v.] is the ascent which leads up from Jericho to the Tal 'at ed-Dam; some overhanging hill may, however, have borne the same name. Read, therefore, וַיָּבֹאוּ אֶל־הַר־אֲדֻמִּים וַיִּשְׁכְּנוּ שָׁם וַיִּבְנוּ אֶת־הַבְּרִית־בֵּית־יְהוָה וַיִּבְנוּ אֶת־הַבְּרִית־בֵּית־יְהוָה וַיִּבְנוּ אֶת־הַבְּרִית־בֵּית־יְהוָה וַיִּבְנוּ אֶת־הַבְּרִית־בֵּית־יְהוָה (when they were come) to the hill of Adummim which fronts the valley of Zeboim towards the desert.²

² It will be noticed that the ה in גִּבְעָה here becomes ה and is attached to the word which probably underlies גִּבְעוֹן. We, and Bu. eliminate גִּבְעָה altogether, and suppose the גִּבְעָה to be a ditto-gram; they read ה for ה, and prefix it to הָהָה.

7. THE GIBEAH OF GAREB (Jer. 31 39). See GAREB ii.

8, 9, 10. Conjecturally, the Gibeah of Baal-perazim (see GIBEON, § 1), Gibeath-jarib or Gibeath-jearim (see KIRJATH-JEARIM, § 1); and Gibeath-Elohim (in Is. 10 32; see NOB). T. K. C.

GIBEATH (גִּבְעָתַיִם: ΓΑΒΑΑΘ [A], ΓΑΒΑΩΘ [L], Γ-(ΙΔΡΕΙΜ) [B]), Josh. 18 28. Usually identified with Gibeah of Saul, but perhaps rather a fragment of Gibeath-jearim[?]; see KIRJATH-JEARIM, § 1.

GIBEATH-HA-ARALOTH (גִּבְעַת הָאֲרָלוֹת), Josh. 5 3 RV^{mg}. See GIBEAH, § 2 (1); CIRCUMCISION, § 2.

GIBEATHITE (גִּבְעָתִי), 1 Ch. 12 3. See GIBEAH, § 1 (2).

GIBEON (גִּבְעוֹן, ΓΑΒΩΝ[N], BAL), a city of the Amorites (2 S. 21 2), or more definitely of the Hivites

1. History. (Josh. 9 3 f.). According to a redactor it was even 'greater than Ai' (Josh. 10 2); but we can estimate its importance better from the fact that it was the head of a tetrapolis or confederacy of four cities, to which Chephirah, Beeroth (not perhaps the Beeroth which is disguised under MT's 'Tabor' in 1 S. 10 3, and which is the modern Bireh, but a place to the SW. of Gibeon¹), and Kirjath-jearim also belonged (Josh. 9 17). The humorous story of the deception by which they escaped the fate of Jericho and Ai is well known. It is evidently the attempt of a later age to account at the same time for the long independence of Gibeon and for the use of the Gibeonites (גִּבְעוֹנִים; οἱ γαβων[ε]ῖται [BN*AL; Αγαβωνίτης N* once] for slave-service in the Solomonic temple. The story of the war of 'the five kings of the Amorites' against Gibeon in Josh. 10 1-5 is but the sequel of the story of the Gibeonite ruse, and is therefore both untraditional and unhistorical; this does not, however, necessarily involve the rejection of the at any rate traditional battle near Gibeon (Josh. 10 10-14); see BETHHORON, § 3. We next hear of the Gibeonites in the reign of Saul, though the event referred to, as most critics have held, is not mentioned in due chronological order (cp Stenning in Hastings' DB 2 170 b). Tradition told of a three years' famine in David's time, which was regarded as a punishment for Saul's having 'slain the Gibeonites' and 'thought to destroy them' (2 S. 21 1 f.). The motive of Saul is said to have been 'zeal for the b'ne Israel'; the continued occupation of cities and villages by the Gibeonites (cp 2 S. 21 5, end) was inconvenient for the Israelites. It has been pointed out elsewhere (see NOB) that the deed referred to was not improbably the massacre described at length in 1 S. 22 17-19. We cannot, however, suppose that the priests of the sanctuary of Gibeon ('Gibeon,' not 'Nob,' must be read in 1 S. 21 1 [2] 22 9 11 19) at the time of the massacre were Israelites. They must surely have been Gibeonites, and the fact that the Gibeonite priests aided and abetted David was probably the excuse which Saul urged for decimating the Gibeonite population.²

The 'pool of Gibeon' attained a melancholy notoriety through the event related in 2 S. 2 12-32 (but see HELKATH-HAZZURIM; in v. 24 ἔλ τοῦ βουνοῦ). It is mentioned again in the account of the violent conduct of Ishmael b. Nethaniah after he had assassinated the Jewish governor Gedaliah (Jer. 41 1 f.). Another act of blood-guiltiness was placed by tradition at the 'great stone which is in Gibeon' (2 S. 20 8-10; ἔλ τοῦ βουνοῦ); perhaps it was recorded in order to degrade the stone, which had been treated as sacred like the 'great stone' at Beth-shemesh (1 S. 6 14). The desecrating act was the murder of AMASA [g.v., 1] by Joab. A brighter memory was that of Yahwè's great deed 'in the plain (עֲקָק) by

Gibeon' (Is. 28 21), if the Gibeon referred to is really the well-known city of that name, and if Isaiah's words may be explained by 2 S. 5 25 (ἔ), where David is said to have routed the Philistines 'from Gibeon to the approach of Gezer' (so, too, 1 Ch. 14 16, where ἔ^m has γαβω). Gibeon, however, though more possible than Geba (see Stenning in Hastings' DB 2 171 a), is still too far from the Plain of Rephaim to be the starting-point of David's pursuit of the foe. Perhaps in all three passages we should read 'Gibeah' and suppose the hill-town of BAAL-PERAZIM [g.v.] to be meant.

We have already seen that there was an important sanctuary at Gibeon in the time of Saul—most probably a Canaanitish sanctuary. Early in the

2. The Sanctuary. reign of Solomon we meet with this sanctuary again, and this time it is undoubtedly Israelitish. One of the young king's first cares was to go to Gibeon to sacrifice, 'for there was the great high place' (1 K. 3 4); the antiquity of the notice is proved by the anxiety of the Chronicler to justify the action of Solomon by the assumed fact that the tent of meeting and the brazen altar were at Gibeon¹ (2 Ch. 13). It is certainly remarkable that the sanctuary of Gibeon should even without the ark (which was still in the 'city of David,' 1 K. 8 1) have been regarded as the right place for a newly made king to resort to for an oracle. But clearly without the spiritual aid of a great sacrificial feast Solomon could not have ventured on the solemn act of erecting a temple by which the ancient sanctuaries were to be overshadowed. Probably the sanctuary of Gibeon was chosen in preference to any other on account of its nearness to Jerusalem. Its central position made it 'the great high place,' and accordingly, Stade thinks, it is referred to as such in Dt. 33 12 (but see BENJAMIN, § 8).

There is little more to add. From Josh. 9 23 27 we infer that the Canaanites of Gibeon were made temple-slaves; cp 1 K.

3. Other notices. (=9 35-38) there may be a confusion of two statements, one referring to Gibeah (where the clan of Becher dwelt), the other to Gibeon. The father (or son?) of Gibeon may have been JEDIAEL (1), who was the brother of Becher. The father (or son?) of Gibeah would naturally be Becher (see 1 S. 9 1, and cp GIBEAH, § 1 2 n.). The 'sons' mentioned in 8 30 (=9 36) are Bichrites (cp KISH, 1). In Josh. 18 25 Gibeon is assigned to the tribe of Benjamin; in Josh. 21 17 to the Levites. The men of Gibeon took part in rebuilding the wall under Nehemiah (Neh. 3 7; ἔββα om., ἔλ γαβωνίτης, γαβωνεῖ), and in one form of the post-exilic list of 'the men of the people of Israel' the 'men of Gibeon' are mentioned (Neh. 7 25). Since, however, Gibeon is separated by several names from the three other members of the Gibeonite tetrapolis, and its nearest neighbours are Bethlehem and Netophah, the correctness of the reading 'Gibeon' may be doubted. Ezra 2 20 has instead 'Gibbar,' which is a little nearer to the (probably) true reading גִּבְתָר, Bether (see GIBBAR).

We can hardly hesitate to identify the ancient Gibeon with the modern village el-Jib. The ancient name is no doubt strangely mutilated; ²

4. Identification. but the biblical data and the statements of Josephus and the Onomasticon³ all point to the correctness of the theory. A mile north of Neby Samwil (see ΜΙΖΠΑΗ, 1), at the point where the road to the coast divides into two branches, rises a low, isolated hill, composed of horizontal strata of limestone, which in places form regular steps, or small terraces, from bottom to top. At other points, especially on the east, the hillside breaks down in rugged irregular precipices. Round the hill is spread out one of the richest upland plains in central Palestine—meadow-like in its smoothness and verdure, covered near the village with vineyards and olive groves; and sending out branches, like the rays of a star-fish, among the rocky acclivities that encircle it. Upon the broad summit one sees old ruins—notably one massive building which was probably a castle, and among the ruins the houses of the miserable hamlet. At the eastern base of the hill, beneath a cliff, is a fine fountain. The source is in a large chamber hewn out of the rock. Not far below it, among venerable olive trees, are the remains of an open reservoir or tank, into which the surplus waters flow—no doubt the 'pool' or 'great waters' of Gibeon (2 S. 2:13 Jer. 41:12).

¹ See CHRONICLES, § 7, n. 2. The same spirit which animated the Chronicler seems to have prompted the alteration of the הַבְּקָה into הַבְּיָמָה in the Heb. text of 1 K. 3 4 (see Benzinger).

² Analogy forbids us to suppose that Jib has come directly from Gih'on (Kampffmeyer, ZDPV 15 27).

The narrative is highly complicated, and traces of composite origin abound.³ The Hebrew text, too, contains many errors which must, if undetected, lead the student astray. Nowhere has criticism been more carefully and acutely applied than here; it is only in textual and historical criticism (especially in the former) that there is much still to be done. A fresh combination of textual, literary, and historical criticism, which owes much to predecessors, leads to the results given below. The degree of their probability varies considerably, owing to the large amount of success attained in the early fusion of the narratives. It is, however, scarcely open to doubt that Gideon (Gaddiel?) and Jerubbaal (Uribaal?) are two different heroes (the one belonging to W. Manasseh, the other either to Gad or to E. Manasseh) whose respective legends have been combined and expanded by successive narrators and editors.

of the Abiezrites as he was beating out wheat secretly in the wine-press, and bade him go with his trusty clansmen¹ against the Midianites. At once a divine impulse seized him; he sounded the war-horn; his clansmen joined him, and with them warriors of Manasseh and Ephraim. They marched early to Mount Gilboa, and took up their position on a projecting hill of that range, 'by (above) the spring of HAROD [q.v., 1], while the Midianites were encamped to the north of them, beneath Mount Gilboa, in the vale.' Towards daybreak, Gideon crept down with his armour-bearer Pu(r)ah (an Issacharite?)² to the hostile camp, and heard one Midianite relate to another a significant dream which he had had that night. On his return Gideon called his men to the attack. They raised the war-cry, 'For Yahwè and for Gideon,'³ and threw the Midianites into such confusion that they fled as far as the distant slopes of Abel-beth-maacah.⁴ The Israelites, however, hurried after them, and took the two princes of the Midianites,⁵ and brought their heads to Gideon. Thus Midian was subdued. And Gideon judged his people forty years. He had seventy sons, besides Abimelech, the son of his Canaanitish concubine.

The later insertions in this narrative are due partly to a desire to place the theophany above doubt, partly to a tendency of late editors to use the old narratives for edification (cp 7:2-8 with 1 S. 14:6b), partly to a patriotic wish that as many tribes as possible might be shown to have had a share in Gideon's exploit (in vi. 35 'Asher' is probably a corruption of 'Issachar'), and partly to a desire to provide a link between this narrative and that in ch. 8. With regard to the last-mentioned point, it will be found that in 7:22b the description of the direction of the flight of the Midianites, the text of which had become accidentally corrupted, was manipulated in such a way as to bring Gideon across the Jordan, ready to be enriched with the exploits which properly belong to Jerubbaal. The inserted passage, 8:1-3, stands by itself. It seems to be suggested by 12:1-3 and 2 S. 19:41, and is a consequence of the insertion of 7:24, in which the Ephraimites are said to have been summoned to cut off the fugitive Midianites. It should also be mentioned that 'Jerubbaal' in chap. 9 seems to have been substituted by the editor for Gideon (WI).

The Jerubbaal-story may have been somewhat as follows:—

[At Jazer in the land of Gad (?) there dwelt a man of the Gadite family of Uribaal, which name he himself

Israel, driving away their cattle, and plundering the fruits of the ground. And Jerubbaal, and ten of his household, went by night, and made a slaughter among the Midianites.⁷ To avenge this the Midianites came upon Jerubbaal's brethren in Beth-sur,⁸ their stronghold, and slew every one of them, whereupon they turned and went northward on their camels, plundering as they went, till] they came to Karkor,⁹ S. of Hamath. Jerubbaal, however, called his clan together, three hundred warriors, burning with zeal for Yahwè, and with the desire for vengeance. They took the 'road of

⁵ On the (probably) true name of the princes (or prince?) of Midian, see OREB (i.).

⁷ C. Niebuhr rightly observes that the early fortunes of Jerubbaal must be told in the passage underlying Judg. 6:25-32, if we could only recover it. Only a few words, perhaps, were legible to the later narrator to whom 6:25-32 is due.

Damascus,¹ to the E. of Jogbehah (Ajbehāt), and Nobah (Kanawāt),² passing by Salecah³ (or Salhad) and Penuel, at the SE. corner of the Haurān.⁴ Faint and hungry,⁵ Jerubbaal asked for bread for his band. The 'elders' or 'princes' (see GOVERNMENT, § 16) of both places, however, feared the wrath of the Midianites and refused the request. Both places (Penuel was probably the citadel of Salecah; cp v. 17 'tower') were threatened by Jerubbaal with punishment. And when he came to Karkor he divided his band into three parts (cp Gen. 14 15 1 S. 11 11 Job 1 17; cp 2 S. 18 2), and gave them empty jars with torches inside, and said, Do as I do. Then each company blew a blast on the horn,⁶ and the three hundred broke the jars (with a clash), and held fast the torches. And the Midianites were panic-stricken, and Yahwē set each man's sword against his neighbour. Jerubbaal caught the two kings of Midian,⁷ and returned. On his way he punished the rulers of Salecah and Penuel,⁸ and so announced himself as king of Gilead. Then came the turn of Zebah and Zalmunna, the kings of Midian, who confessed their slaughter of Jerubbaal's brethren,⁹ and underwent their doom. On their camels' necks were necklaces of golden crescents, which were the marks of their high dignity. These the conqueror took for himself [for the people had made him their king].¹⁰ Then Jerubbaal ben Joash went [to Jazer?]¹¹, and dwelt in his own house. And he made for himself [a royal sanctuary in Jazer with an altar and] an ephod, the ephod which he had made with the golden rings (earrings?) taken from the fallen Midianites.

The insertion in 8 22 f. reminds us of 1 S. 8 7 10 10 12 12 ff., Hos. 9 9 10 13 10 f., that in v. 27 expresses the view of later times that the use of the ephod was an act of infidelity to Yahwē.

The essential features of the above reconstruction are the distinction between the Gadite (or E. Manassite¹²) and the W. Manassite heroes (due to C. Niebuhr) and the critical emendation of the text in Judg. 8 4-21. It is possible that the original Gideon-story represented the hero as accompanied only by his three hundred clansmen, though, since the scene of Gideon's encounter with the Midianites is in the Great Plain, it is only natural to suppose that on his way thither Gideon gathered in fresh volunteers; possible, too, that the enrichment of the Jerubbaal-legend by the story of the jars and torches is erroneous, and that this story really belonged to a second version of the Gideon-story. The similarity of the stories not unnaturally led to their combination.

If Jerubbaal dwelt at Jazer, the similarity of this name to Abiezer would facilitate the combination of the legends. We might also assume that Jerubbaal belonged to the Gileadite clan of Abiezer; in 1 Ch. 7 18 Abiezer is a son of Hammolecheth, the sister of Gilead. It should also be noticed that ΓΑΜΜΟΛΕΧΕΤΗ, ⁷ See C. Niebuhr. We need not suppose 300 horns! The horn takes the place of the war-cry in the corresponding part of the Gideon-story.

⁸ See ЗЕВАХ AND ЗАЛМУНА. The chiefs are here called 'kings,' to heighten the glory of king Jerubbaal.

⁹ For וַיִּבְרָח (8 16 f.) read probably וַיִּבְרָח. There is some confusion in v. 16 (see Niebuhr).

¹⁰ וַיִּבְרָח means 'thy sons, O king.' So Niebuhr; cp Kittel, Hist. 2 81, n. 1.

¹² Something has clearly dropped out after וַיִּבְרָח in 8 29.

¹³ E. Manassite, according to Niebuhr.

like Zelophehad, is probably a corruption of Salecah (Salhad), the city which is so prominent in the story of Jerubbaal.

The religious interest of these stories in their combined and expanded form was very early felt (Is. 9 4 [3], 10 26¹). To the modern student their historical and archaeological interest must almost necessarily be greater. See, however, Elmslie's striking lecture, Expositor, 1892 a, 50-65.

Such a place-name is in the abstract possible, but there is no mention of it elsewhere; hence the guesses 'Gilead,' 'Gibeon.' The text has a strong appearance of corruptness.

GIER EAGLE. 1. RV VULTURE (rāhām רַחָמ, and rāhāmāh רַחָמָה) [see Dr. Dt., ad loc.]; the name is derived from the care it bestows on its young, cp *Di. The Neophron percnopterus feeds on offal and the vilest forms of refuse, but does good service to man as a scavenger. Its nests, of sticks and rubbish, are built on rocks, trees, or buildings, often in the suburbs of towns, and are not so inaccessible as is the case with many of its congeners. 'Whilst they are with the Arab [Arabs], says Doughty, 'they lie wheeling upon the wing all day, stooping and hovering at little height above the menzil [camp]' (Ar. Des. 1 393). Both in Arabia and in Palestine it is a migratory bird, returning from the S. in the spring, and is usually found in pairs. In Egypt the vulture was the sacred symbol of Nekhabit, the goddess of the South (Maspero, Dawn of Civ. 102).

The name Gilboa, which occurs in MT only in the life of Saul, but should most probably be restored in Jdg. 7.3 (Gideon), and possibly in 1 K. 1. The name. 20.27 (Benhadad, see below § 3 [c]), has no obvious meaning. The early guesses in the Onomasticon (OS 35.27, 180.53, 189.95) are valueless, and the modern explanation 'a bubbling fountain' (see Ges. Lex. (8)) is no better. Transposition, however, so often accounts for otherwise inexplicable words (including names) that we may conjecture the name Gilboa, or rather Haggilboa (with the article), to be a corruption (probably designed) of Gibeath Habbaal (גִּבְעַת הַבַּעַל), 'hill of the Baal'; cp KIRJATH-JEARIM, § 1. The corruption, if designed, was of course early; 6 knows only 'Gilboa,' and the same name was preserved in the time of Eusebius and Jerome (OS 247.8; 129.14) in that of the 'large village' called Gelbus (Gelbu = Gelboe) in the mountains distant 6 R. m. from Scythopolis. At the present day there is a small village called Jelbōn, SW. of that other village, called Fakū, which has given its name to the mountain range presently to be described, and is very naturally supposed to represent also the old name Gilboa.

What then does the geographical term 'Mount Gilboa' designate? Gilboa (or Haggilboa, 'the Gilboa'), if the name has been rightly

2. Geographical meaning. accounted for, belonged originally to one of the elevations in the Gilboa ridge, probably to the highest (Sheikh Burkân), not to the ridge itself. 'The mountain of Gilboa,' however, is a collective term for the entire mountain mass now known as Jebel Fakū, which 'may be best described as a horn-like projection from the hills bounding the plain upon the S., which first curves round towards the W. for more than three miles, and then runs towards the NW. for five miles further, straight out into the level ground like a peninsula. The greatest height is towards the E. [Sheikh Burkân, 1696 feet above the sea], where the curve merges in the straight line, and where the range looks down upon the valley of the Jordan and the Acropolis of Bethshan, as it starts abruptly from the plain three miles from the foot of the mountains. At the southern commencement of the curve is the village of Jelbōn. Three miles NW. of the highest peak, where the peninsula of hills is already well out into the plain, is a second peak, some 1400 feet in height, crowned by the tolerably prosperous-looking village of el-Mezār. Still further to the NW. are two much lower peaks, between which lies the miserable village of Nūris. NW. again from these peaks, for two miles or a little less, the range falls down into a broken and irregular tableland, narrowing and becoming lower as it goes down into the plain, and bounded by steep, but nowhere inaccessible, stony slopes. The ridge ends in three fingers, as they may be called—the two southern ones mere narrow spurs, the northern, which is the true termination of the ridge, somewhat above a mile in breadth. Across this blunt end of the whole peninsula runs the valley which separates it from the broad, flat mound, on which Jezreel was built' (Miller, Less than the Least of all Lands, 169 f. [188]).

The ridge of Gilboa, which is the southern boundary or rampart of the Vale of Jezreel, is of bleak and bare aspect, except on the S. side, where it is used as arable and pasture land. Probably, however, it was once wooded; one might fairly contend that when 2 S. 121 was written (see JASHER, BOOK OF, § 2) the ridge was not so conspicuously bare as it is at present. The poet's aim is not to account for an existing phenomenon; he feels too deeply for that. Gilboa has, at least in parts, its clothing of grass and trees; he would have Gilboa compelled to sympathise with the mourning Israelites.

We have next to ask, Where are the scenes of the two great events certainly connected with Mount Gilboa

3. The 'Gilboa' to be placed? The answer can best be given by quoting the two passages of Jdg. 7.1 and 1 S. 28.4, etc.

which describe the respective encampments of Gideon and Saul. (a) 'Gilboa and all the warlike force (הַיְהוּדָה) that was with him encamped by (or at) the fountain of Harod, while the camp of Midian was to the N. of them, beneath Mount Gilboa, in the Vale' (Jdg. 7.1, emended text; see HAROD, WELL OF, 1). This was where Gideon collected his force to meet the hordes from the other side of the Jordan. The expression 'by the fountain of Harod' is loose. Gideon's men were separated from the fountain by a steep and rugged slope; but they had the command of the fountain. It 'is on the plain, but so close beneath the hill, so encompassed by rocks, that a small detachment could secure it' (Miller, op. cit. 178). A reference to the fountain made it at once plain whereabouts Gideon's force was posted. To have encamped beside 'Ain Jālūd would have been unnatural for mountaineers like the Israelites.

(b) At a later time, we read, 'the Philistines gathered together all their battalions to Aphek, while the Israelites were encamped by the fountain of Harod which is in Jezreel' (1 S. 29.1, emended text; see HAROD, WELL OF, 2); or, as another account says, 'The Philistines mustered, and came to Shunem, and Saul mustered all Israel, and they encamped on Gilboa' (1 S. 28.4). We are not to infer that Aphek and Shunem were close together.¹ Aphek was in the N. of the plain of Sharon; the two statements quoted come from different hands. They are, however, easily reconcilable. The mustering at Aphek was swiftly followed by the arrival of the Philistines at Shunem; the Israelites expected this, and had no occasion to change their position. Soon, however, the Philistines must have found that they could not attack Saul's position from Shunem; the Nahr Jālūd has too deep a channel, and the ascent from the lakelet below (see HAROD) to the broken plateau above is too steep to permit a hostile attack on warriors drawn up above. An attack would be perfectly feasible, however, if the Philistines went up the far easier slopes and wādies to the S., which lead to open ground about the village of Nūris, and directly above the 'Ain Jālūd.² Thus there is a clear parallelism between the position of the Midianites and that of the Philistines, and between that of Gideon and that of Saul.

Dean Stanley has given a picturesque account of the battle of Gilboa (Jewish Church, 225 f.; cp Sinai and Pal. 345). According to him, the position occupied by Saul was 'on the rise of Mount Gilboa, hard by the "spring of Jezreel," the Israelites as usual keeping to the heights, whilst their enemies clung to the plain.' The objections to this, however, drawn from close observation of the ground, are very strong.³ The chariots of the Philistines could not have pursued the Israelites up that steep and rugged slope. The fighting between Saul and the Philistines must have occurred on the southern slopes of Gilboa.

(c) One more event may perhaps be assigned to this mountain-region—viz., the defeat of Benhadad, king of Syria, by Ahab.

RV, following the received text, states that 'at the return of the year Benhadad mustered the Syrians, and went up to Aphek, to fight against Israel. And the children of Israel were mustered, and were victualled, and went against them' (1 K. 20.26 f.). 'And were victualled,' however, must be wrong; we require, instead, a statement of the mustering-place of the Israelites. וְיָלְכוּ should perhaps be וְיָלְכוּ, 'in Gilboa'; the error was obviously produced by the following word וַיֵּלְכוּ ('and went'). This is confirmed by v. 306, where we read in RV that 'Benhadad fled, and came into the city, into an inner chamber,' a rendering which is violently extracted from an obviously corrupt text. Klo. reads וַיֵּלְכוּ עַל עַן תְּרוֹר בְּתוֹר בְּתוֹר, '... and hid himself by the fountain of Harod in Harod,' or וַיֵּלְכוּ עַל הַעַן בְּתוֹר, 'by the fountain in Harod.' The difficulty lies in the distance between Aphek in the N. of Sharon (see אֲפֵק, 3 (δ)), which is surely meant here (not el-'Afulah), and Mount Gilboa; but the textual suggestions are extremely plausible, and a mustering of the Philistines at the same Aphek preceded their final attack upon Saul by the southern slopes of Gilboa. Cp, however (for the whole subject of this article), SAUL. T. K. C.

¹ Prof. G. A. Smith formerly held that Aphek was somewhere near Jezreel (cp H. P. Smith, Sam. 244); now, however, he has come over to the view advocated by WRS (APHEK, 3 (b), supr. col. 192) that the Aphek in Sharon is that intended (PEFQ, 1895, p. 252).

² GASm. HG 403; cp Miller, Less than the Least of all Lands, 175, 180 f.

³ It is inaccurate, however, to represent Stanley as saying that the battle was 'on the plain' (Miller, 175; GASm. 403). See passages referred to above.

GILEAD (גִּלְעָד, and, with the article, הַגִּלְעָד; Γαλααδ [BAL]), a trans-Jordanic region frequently referred to.

1. Name. The name, which can be explained from the Arabic jal'ad, 'hard, rough,' is at first sight not very appropriate, the hills and dales of Gilead being full of natural beauty, and well adapted for cattle (cp Nu. 32:1) and for the flocks of goats which are still fed there (cp Cant. 4:1; and see HAIK, § 1). Upon the whole, Gilead is better provided with water and woodland than any part of W. Palestine. Hence Merrill (Hastings, DB 2:174 b) seems inclined to doubt the correctness of the explanation. The name 'hard, rough' is, however, at once seen to be appropriate when we study the geological formation of the country.

The base slopes of the mountain chain of Moab and Gilead consist of sandstone.

This is covered in part by the more recent white marls, which form the curious peaks of the foothills immediately above the Jordan valley; but reaches above them to an

2. Geological formation. elevation of 1000 ft. above the Mediterranean on the S., and forms the bed of the Buḡei' basin, farther E. and 1000 ft. higher. Above this lies the hard, impervious Dolomitic limestone, which appears in the rugged gray hills round the Jabbok, and in Jebel 'Ajlūn, rising on an average 1500 ft. above the sandstone, and forming the bed of the numerous springs. It also dips towards the Jordan valley; and the water from the surface of the plateau, sinking down to the surface of this formation, bursts out of the hill slopes on the W. in perennial brooks. It was from the ruggedness of this hard limestone that Gilead obtained its name. Above this again is the white chalk of the desert plateau, the same found in Samaria and Lower Galilee, with bands of flint or chert in contorted layers or strewn in pebbles on the surface. Where this formation is deep the country is bare and arid, supplied by cisterns and deep wells. Thus the plateau becomes desert, while the hill-slopes abound in streams and springs (Conder, in Smith, DB(2) 1:1191 a).

The plateau here spoken of is that extensive highland which extends eastward to the Euphrates, where nothing but desert shrubs will grow. On the edge of this region, and rising at

3. Hebrew usage. most 500 ft. above it, are the long mountain-ranges which from their geological formation deserve the name of Gilead. Rocky as they may be, the higher slopes are covered with pine-trees (Pinus carica, Don., a species resembling the Aleppo pine), and, as Conder says, mastic-bushes,² whilst lower down are beautiful woods of oak trees and carob trees, forming altogether, with the addition of numerous streams and springs, the most perfect sylvan scenery in Palestine. The 'wood of Rephaim' (so read for 'wood of Ephraim' in 2 S. 18:6) is still represented by the thick groves of the Jebel 'Ajlūn, with which the woods of es-Salt in S. Gilead alone can compete. Far below the Gilead range lies the Jordan Valley, which is reached by a very steep descent, and a natural division in the range is formed by the river Zerḳā (Jabbok). The Hebrew writers, whether they were conscious of the original meaning of Gilead or not, were well aware that the name had properly no narrow or merely local reference. They apply it, when they speak most deliberately, to the whole mountain range between the Yarmūk on the N. and the Arnon on the S., which was cut into two parts by the great trench of the Zerḳā or Jabbok (cp Dt. 3:12 Josh. 12:25 13:25). The two parts together are sometimes called 'all Gilead' (Dt. 3:10¹ 2 K. 10:33), and the general term Gilead is applied to those districts on the E. of the Jordan which were in Israelitish occupation (Nu. 32:29 Josh. 22:9 Judg. 10:8 20:1 2 S. 24:6 1 K. 4:19 Am. 1:3 13); but also to the northern, or to the southern part alone (see for the one, Dt. 2:36 3:15^f. Josh. 17:5, and for the other, Nu. 32:1 Josh. 13:25). The elasticity of the term is strikingly shown by the fact that in Dt. 34:1 1 Mac. 5:20^f. 'Gilead' even includes the region N. of the Jabbok.

We have seen that the term 'Gilead' belongs of right to a large mountainous district, not to a particular

4. Gen. 31 17-54. mountain. It would be a mistake to infer the contrary from the interesting composite narrative in Gen. 31 17-54. It is true that what is said of Jacob and Laban in v. 25² and of Jacob in v. 54³ implies that a particular mountain, known to the respective writers of these passages, was sometimes called in a special sense הַר הַגִּלְעָד, 'the mountain of (the) Gilead'; but this specialisation merely indicates that the mountain referred to was a conspicuous one in some part of the Gilead range. That the two narrators J and E meant the same part of the Gilead-range can hardly be maintained. They both differ from the original story (see GALEED, 1); they also differ from one another. When Jacob uttered the fine prayer in 32:9^f. (J) he must have been near some great ford of the Jordan. Probably he was at Succoth, not very far from the ford ed-Dāmieh, for the notice in Gen. 33:17 has surely been misplaced by the editor of JE, and in J's narrative stood before 32:4 [3].⁴ It is possible that the Jebel Ōsha', the highest point in the Jebel Jil'ād (N. of es-Salt, and N. of the Zerḳā) is J's Gilead mountain. E, however, who makes Jacob go, after parting with Laban, to MAHANAIM (q.v.), presumably localises the meeting of Jacob and Laban near some high point of the Jebel 'Ajlūn. One might think of the Jebel Kaḳkafa (3430 ft.) which is to the NE. of Süf and Jerash, close to the great pilgrim road from Damascus to Mecca; but Süf itself (2720 ft.) has great claims on our consideration. This is one of the sites where dolmens are to be found.⁵ It is probable that by the 'pillar' and the 'heap' of Gen. 31:45^f. the narrators meant some of those primitive stone monuments, which are specially abundant on the E. of the Jordan.

According to the theory here presented, there should also be such a monument on Jebel Ōsha'. All that we find is a shrine (perhaps 300 years old) containing a long, open trough, said to have been the tomb of Hosea, beside which the Bedouins kill sheep in honour of the prophet.⁶ The trough, however, may have been preceded by a cairn; sepulchral cairns are still common among the Arabs, and Abalom's cairn (2 S. 18:17) is familiar to readers of the OT. The narrative in Gen. is directed against the attempts of the Aramæans to possess themselves of Gilead; the standing-stone (maṣṣēbā) on E's mountain and the cairn on J's were represented by E and J respectively as having been erected, the former by Laban, the latter by Jacob, as sacred boundary-stones. The maṣṣēbā, by a slight distortion, was called 'the Miṣpah' to indicate that Yahwé would

³ Jacob sacrifices 'on the mountain'; v. 21 shows that some part of the Gilead range is meant. E is the writer.

⁵ Conder, Heth and Moab, 243^f.

⁶ Baed. Pal.(3) 163^f.; cp Conder, op. cit. 182. A large tree stands beside the shrine which is 'one out of the very few sacred domes E. of Jordan.'

'keep watch (and interpose) between' Laban and Jacob, when occasion for this arose' (v. 49). We may certainly infer from this that the place referred to by E was one of those called Mizpah. Possibly it was Ramath-ham-mispeh, which in Josh. 13:26² is described as the N. limit of the territory of Gad, and is elsewhere called ham-mispa (see MIZPAH, 2). The cairn also received a name; it was called Gal'ed—i.e., Heap of Witness, implying a playful etymology of the name Gilead.

There is yet another conceivable inference from this singular narrative (when explained as above), against which a caution may be desirable. It might be supposed that when E wrote, the territory known as Gilead began at the Jebel 'Ajlün. The truth is that the Jebel 'Ajlün is the representative of the whole land of Gilead. So at least it must appear to those who approach Gilead from Damascus, and see, looming up beyond the plain of Bashan, the summits of the Jebel 'Ajlün. On the other hand, to those who come from Moab, the natural representative of Gilead will be the first lofty range to the N. of the plateau of Heshbon—i.e., the Jebel Jil'ad. How this latter name fixed itself just here is an obscure problem: why is the Yahwist's Gilead mountain preferred to the Elohist's? Problems of this kind, however, are numerous and baffling. Why, for instance, is the highest mountain in this range—the Jebel Ōsha—named after the prophet Hosea? It is true, Hosea, according to the MT, speaks of a city of Gilead in 68 (cp 12:11), and has been thought to refer here to some locality in the Jebel Jil'ad (see, however, 2). Can this have been known, however, to those who first used the Arabic name? Surely Hosea has displaced Joshua. Who, then, preceded Joshua? The truth is hidden from us.

5. Specialization of Gilead.

It would seem as if this specialization of the term Gilead had already occurred by the time of Eusebius and Jerome (see 2); and it should also be noticed that 5 m. N. of es-Salt there is a ruin known as Jal'ud,³ perhaps the 'Gilead' of the Onomasticon. Not impossibly, too, another seemingly recent place-name preserves the memory of a name of Gilead, which, though but slightly attested, may be genuinely ancient. The place-name referred to is Gerasa (the famous city of the Decapolis of Peræa, now called Jerash. ⁴ According to Neubauer,⁵ the Midrash (Samuel, 13) affirms the identity of Gerash and Gilead; and Sir G. Grove has noticed that the Arabic version of Josh. 20:8 21:38 [36] gives Rāmat al-Jaraš for MT's 'Ramoth in Gilead,' and that the Jewish traveller Parchi (circa 1315 A.D.) also says, 'Gilead is at present Jerash.'⁶ That the name Gerasa is derived from the γέροντες, or veterans, of Alexander the Great is of course absurd. It reminds us so much of Girzites and Girgashites that one is tempted to suspect that a tribe called Girzim or Girshim (cp GIRGASHITES) may have dwelt in Gilead in pre-Israelitish times (cp 2 S. 29, where Ishbaal reigns 'over Gilead and over the Girshite'); see GIRZITES. Gerash, like Gilead, may have obtained a specialized reference to a town and a district later; hence Yāqūt speaks of 'the Jerash

² The two names next mentioned are Betonim (rather Botnim) and MAHANAIM [q.v.].

⁶ Zunz, quoted by Grove (Smith, *DB*¹ 2:1003). He also states that the Jews derived Gerash from Yegar-sahadutha (Gen. 31:47).

mountain district' (Jebel Jarash), as well as of the ruined city of that name.

If the name of Gerasa is rightly thus accounted for, it still remains to determine what ancient city, if any, once stood upon its site. It is difficult indeed to believe that the founders of that magnificent city, the ruins of which still fascinate us, placed it upon a site un consecrated by the sanctuaries of the past. Both Ramoth-Gilead and Mahanaim have been thought of; but we have reasons sufficient for accepting neither view. Just an hour W. of Jerash is the wretched but well-situated village of Reimūn (Ewald's Ramoth-Gilead), divided by a ridge from Sūf (Mizpah?). Turning to the W., in two hours the traveller comes to 'Ajlūn (Mahanaim?), 'nestling at the bifurcation of the valleys, in its gardens and vineyards,' with the great castle already spoken of in the neighbourhood; on either hand are the well-clothed heights of the Jebel 'Ajlūn. A descent, a climb, and again a descent bring us to the Wādy Yābis (a plausible claimant to the title of 'the brook Cherith,' were it not for the faultiness of the reading CHERITH [q.v.]), and to an isolated round-topped hill, strewn with ruins (ed-Deir)—but these not ancient—Robinson's site for Jabesh-Gilead. If we turn to the N. of the same Wādy, we come to Miryamīn, Merrill's site for the same famous city. About seven miles off is Pella (Fahl), which 'enjoys perhaps the finest climate, from an agricultural point of view, that can be found in Syria.'¹ The known history of Pella is a short one; but it may be noted here that, according to Eusebius (HE 3:5), the Jewish Christians fled, before the destruction of Jerusalem, to Pella.

And what shall one say of Irhid, the capital of the district of 'Ajlūn? Doubtless this was an ancient Arbela. Was it, then, the BETH-ARBEL of Hos. 10:14? Our answer will probably be in the negative; but the site is of strategic importance, and the name implies the antiquity of the place. Es-Salt, too,—at present the only capital of the Belkā, and the only important place in it—though not as strikingly placed as 'Ajlūn, must surely have been always a centre of population, and the lofty Jebel Ōsha to the north must always have been crowned by an important sanctuary, surely not, however, Penuel. Where the latter place was, it is not easy to say; SUCCOTH (1), however, is possibly the modern Tell Dēr 'Alla. With more confidence we can identify JOG-BEHAH with Jubeihāt, and the JABBOK with the 'blue' river, the Zerkā.²

A passing reference is all that can be given to the interesting genealogies of Gilead (Nu. 26:29-33 Josh.

17:1-3 1 Ch. 7:14-19); see MACHIR, ASRIEL, HEPHER (ii., 2), and especially references. ZELOPHEHAD. The last of these names occurs in a mutilated form as Jidlaph in Gen. 22:22; it is probably identical with Salecah, and as Milcah, the mother of Jidlaph, is a corruption of Salecah, we see how mechanically the genealogies were often filled up. Nor can we here gather up the fragmentary notices of the history of Gilead. The country was the eastern bulwark of Palestine, and was the first district to suffer from Syrian and Assyrian invasions. In sacred legend it is distinguished by the passage of Jacob and by the residence of JEPHTHAH [q.v.]. The names of Barzillai, David, Ishbaal, Ahab, Elijah (was he really a Tishbite?—see TISHBITE) also will readily occur to the reader as connected with Gilead. The clansmen of GAD, whose name is almost treated as synonymous with Gilead (e.g., Judg. 5:17 1 S. 13:7), had opportunity for learning resource and courage in the mountains and glens of the 'rugged' land. Cp GAD, § 2. PERRÆA.

2. A city, mentioned perhaps in Judg. 10:17 and (5A1) 12:7; also in Hos. 6:8 12:11 [12]. Ewald (on Hos. Ucc.) thinks of Mizpeh of Gilead (Judg. 11:29), which was the seat of an ancient sanctuary (Judg. 11:11 'Mizpah'). Buhl (Geogr. 262) thinks of Ramoth, or rather Ramath-Gilead; Hitzig of Jabesh-Gilead; Budde (on Judg. 10:17) of the site of the modern Jal'ud, N. of es-Salt (see 1), which may represent the 'Gilead' mentioned by Eusebius and Jerome (OS 241:42, 124:30). But 'Gilead' for 'Mizpeh of Gilead,' or the like, is hardly conceivable, and the passages quoted, except the first, prove to be corrupt.

In Judg. 10:17 'in Gilead' simply covers over the narrator's ignorance; 11:11 supplied 'Mizpah' as the place of encampment of the Israelites; that of the Ammonites could not be determined (cp Moore's note). In Judg. 12:7 the text is mutilated; read probably 'in his city, in Mizpah of Gilead.' In Hos. 6:8 12:11 [12] גִּלְגַּל should most probably be גִּלְגַּל (cp γαλιλαίος 12:11 [12] [Q?]) for γαλααδ (2A). No doubt Hosea might have referred to a second sanctuary in Gilead, and Ruben's restoration of 6:9 is geographically and historically plausible (cp Che. Exp., Jan. '97, p. 47 f.). But the sanctuaries of Bethel and Gilgal are much more likely to be referred to than the hypothetical sanctuaries of ADAM [q.v., i.] and 'Gilead.' For עָבַד in 2:7 read probably אָבַד בְּתַבְעֵן 'in Beth-aven,' and read 2:8 f. thus—'Gilgal is a city of those that work wickedness, a hill fortress of evildoers (בְּתַבְעֵן בְּרָעִים). And a company of traitors are her priests; the way of Yahwé they reject; they are eager to commit crimes' (אֶתְעֵבֵם הַשְּׂבִיעִים יְהוָה יִשְׁמָע הַבְּרִיִּים בְּתַבְעֵן עֵשָׂה וְהָקֵד). In 12:11 [12] אֵין וְלַעֲרֵי is a corruption of וְלַעֲרֵי וְאֵין; the prefixed אֵין is a dittographed אֵין (Grä.).

1. Name. Josh. 5:9 and MT of 12:23), the name of several localities in the Holy Land.

Usually renders גִּלְגַּל by the plural ṭā galgala [BAQFL], as in Josephus and r Macc. So in Josh. (except 12:23 14:6 [B], 15:7; see below, § 6), r S. (except 7:16 ṭā galgala [BA], ṭā galgala [L]; 15:33 galgal [BA]), 2 S. 2 K. Am. Hos. (except 9:15 galgal [BAQ], 12:12a [11a] galgal [BAQ]). The singular galgal occurs in Josh. 14:6 [B], 15:7 [AL], Judg. 2:1 3:19 r S. 15:33 (galgala [L]), Hos. 9:15 Mi. 6:5; galgal [BA] in Dt. 11:30 (but galgo. [F], σολγολ [L]). On Josh. 12:23 see below, § 6.

The name means literally 'the circle'—i.e., sacred circle of stones, the form now called 'cromlech' by archaeologists.¹ Except in Galilee, such circles are not found W. of Jordan, where they may have been destroyed from the time of Josiah's reformation onwards; but many ancient specimens are extant in E. Palestine, similar to those of Western Europe, and Arabs still construct stone circles round graves. For a picture of a gilgal see PEFQ, '82, p. 72; and for a plan, Survey of E. Pal. 11.

1. The first sanctuary and camp of Israel in W. Palestine. The earliest of the documents of which the

2. Joshua's Gilgal. Book of Joshua is composed (JE) relates that, after crossing Jordan, Joshua erected twelve stones which he had taken from the bed of the river on the W. bank 'in the Gilgal' (4:320), and they became (v. 21f., probably Dt.) a monument of the miraculous passage. This account agrees with the meaning of the name. The same document, however (with its unscientific habit of connecting place-names with events of ancient history), derives Gilgal from the reproach 'rolled away'—Gallōthī, 'I have rolled'—from Israel by Joshua when he re-instituted there the rite of CIRCUMCISION (q.v., § 2), that had been in abeyance during the wanderings in the wilderness (5:9). That the 'place' (מָקוֹם, probably meaning sacred place, 5:15) was already so called, and was a centre of Canaanite worship, is apparent both from the narrative quoted, and from Judg. 3:19 (galgal [BAL]), where for 'quarries' read perhaps 'graven images'; see QUARRIES. The Priestly Writer, who records the celebration of the passover at Gilgal (Josh. 5:10-12), describes the site as at 'the east end' of the territory 'of Jericho' (4:19).

In the parallel passage in Josephus (Ant. v. 14), Gilgal is given as 10 stadia, or a little over a mile from Jericho—i.e., not the OT Jericho at 'Ain es-Suljān, but the NT site on the W. el-Kelt. Eusebius and Jerome (OS 126:22 243:94) place Galgala or Golgol (γαλιλα) 'to the E. of ancient Jericho, "a desert spot" 2 R.m. from Jericho, "ab illius regionis mortalibus miro cultu habitus." Theodosius (De Situ Terræ Sanctæ 16, circa 530 A.D.), sets it at 1 R. m. from the city; and later Christian records from a little less than 1 m. to as much as 5. After the eighth century the name was lost till Robinson heard a rumour of it in 1838 (BR 2:287); and in 1865 Zschokke (Topog. der 11. Jordansauke, 28) heard 'Tell-Jeljul' applied to a low mound, a little more than a mile E. of modern Jericho, on the N. bank of the Kelt, with a heap of stones and remains of a wall. Conder (Tent Work, 203 f.) found the form Jiljūlyeh applied both to some small mounds and to a tank. An Arab graveyard suggests the traditional sanctity of the spot; and associated with it is a legend, derived from the fall of Jericho. There can be little doubt that, whether the name is due to a continuous tradition (which is probable, for Jos. Ant. v. 14) could hardly have hit on the site otherwise, or is a Christian revival of the fourth century, the neighbourhood, and perhaps the very site, is that of the ancient sanctuary and camp of Israel. It should be said that the modern name is not altogether beyond suspicion, Zschokke having asked for it, 'in various forms,' before it was given back to him by the natives (op. cit. 28). Clermont-Ganneau (Arch. Res. 2:37) was assured that the name Jiljūlyeh was 'only used by the Franks.' His excavations revealed nothing decisive, and he says 'the matter still seems to me extremely doubtful.'

The ark and the headquarters of the host remained here during Joshua's invasion of the hill-country, to which more than five roads opened conveniently from Gilgal, 96 106 f. 015 (om. B* A; galgala [B² c¹ m² L]) 43 (om. BA; galgala [L]); there is little reason for supplying another Gilgal for these passages (see below, § 5), some of which are perhaps mere glosses (14:6, Judg. 2:1 all JE or Dt.). The place of Gilgal in the reverence of the nation was secured for centuries. Even if it were not the sanctuary to which Samuel went yearly in circuit (1 S. 7:16 galgal [L], see below, § 4) it was certainly that to which he sent Saul before him (10:8 galgal [B]), at which Saul was anointed king (11:14 f.), offered the hasty sacrifices which estranged the prophet, brought to Yahwé the devoted spoil, the ḥērem (see BAN, § 2 f.) of the Amalekite campaign, and by his refusal to slaughter Agag lost his kingdom (15:12-35). (The narratives here are doublets: see W. R. Smith, OT/C² 135 f.; see SAMUEL ii.) Under Saul as under Joshua the religious attractions of Gilgal were supported by its military advantages. The Philistines had overrun the central range to the W.; there was no other place in the land at which Israel could be rallied to attack them; and Jordan and Gilead lay behind for a refuge (13:47). In the following reign Judah assembled at Gilgal to meet David when he came back over Jordan (2 S. 19:15 [16] 40 [41]) after his flight, and to escort him to the capital.

At the disruption of the kingdom, Gilgal fell with the rest of the Jordan valley to N. Israel; but we have

3. The famous sanctuary? now a problem to decide; whether the famous N. sanctuary of Gilgal was the Gilgal of this site by Jericho, or another Gilgal, which lay on the central range to the N. of Bethel, and was also a place sacred to Yahwé (see § 4), or still another which lay near Shechem (see § 5). Amos and Hosea, who frequently speak of the great national sanctuary, give us no hint as to where it lay:—Am. 4:4 'come to Bethel and transgress'—at Gilgal multiply transgression'; 5:5 'seek not Bethel, nor come to Gilgal, for Gilgal shall taste the gall of exile' (so one must clumsily render the prophet's play upon words haḡ-gilgāl gālāh yiglāh; Hos. 4:15 'come not to Gilgal and go not up to Beth-aven'; 9:15 'all their evil is in Gilgal, for there I hated them. . . I will drive them out of mine house'; 12:11 [12] 'in Gilgal they sacrifice bullocks' or 'to bullocks' or (as We.) 'to demons.'

Propos of this last verse it is interesting that the Christian fathers should have read 'Gilgal,' sometimes for 'Bethel,' sometimes for 'Dan,' as one of the two places where Jeroboam set up his golden calf (Cyril, Comm. in Hoseam, 5; [Pseud.-] Epiph. De Vit. Proph. 237; Chron. Pasc. 161).

Thus, then, we find Gilgal in the eighth century equal in national regard with Bethel; where the people zealously worship Yahwé, but do so under heathen fashion with impure rites that provoke his wrath. In an age passionately devoted to the sacred scenes of antiquity, such a kind of sanctuary might well be that ancient Gilgal (now belonging to N. Israel) at which, it was said, the ark had found its first rest in the land, circumcision had been restored, the first king had been anointed, and David himself had been reinstated in the affection of Judah. Beyond these general considerations, however, there is no proof to offer—unless it be found in the facts that the prophets never speak of going up to Gilgal as they do to Bethel, and that the Gilgal known to the writer of Micah 65 appears to be the Gilgal on Jordan. We turn now to the rival Gilgals in the bill-country of Ephraim.

2. As early as the time of Eusebius there were¹ certain who suspected a second Gilgal close to Bethel' (OS, s.v. γαλγαλα). This suspicion,

4. A Gilgal by Bethel? (1 S. 7:16)—Bethel, Gilgal, Mizpah—of which Bethel and Mizpah are both on the central range, and strengthened by the prophets' close association of Bethel and Gilgal, in regard to the latter of which, as we have seen, they never use the expression 'go down,' which would have been almost inevitable in the case of a site in the Jordan valley, is raised almost to the pitch of conviction by the narrative of Elijah's last journey (2 K. 2:1-8; v. 1 ερειχω [B*], γαλγαλα [B^{ab} mg. AL]). The order given is Gilgal, Bethel, Jericho (⊗^{B*} for Gilgal reads Jericho, but evidently by error; for variants of B have γαλγαλων), and it is said (v. 2) that from Gilgal Elijah and Elisha 'went down to Bethel.'² This implies a Gilgal on the central range, with at least an apparent descent on Bethel. Such an one has been found in Jiljilyeh, about 7 m. N. of Bethel, and 2½ m. W. of the present high road, between Bethel and Shechem and Samaria. It is now a large village on the summit of a commanding hill 24.1 feet above the sea. This is lower than Bethel, which is 2890 feet, but the hill is so bold and isolated that the phrase 'to go down to Bethel' is quite appropriate. The view is one of the grandest in Palestine, from the sea to the hills of Gilead and as far N. as Hermon itself (Robinson, who seems to have been the first traveller to visit it, BR 3:81; cp PEFM 2:290, map, sheet xiv.). This Gilgal, like Jericho, had its school of the prophets. That it was the same as the Gilgal of 2 K. 4:38 (γαλγαλα [BAL]), Elisha's residence, seems implied by the connection of the latter (v. 42) with BAAL-SHALISHA [g.v.], another Samaritan town, also on the western watershed, (see further Buhl, Geogr. 171; and cp GOURDS, WILD, ad fin.).

If all these facts be held to justify the existence of a sanctuary and prophetic centre at Jiljilyeh in Elisha's day, then a very strong presumption is established in favour of this being also the Gilgal famous in the time of Amos and Hosea. Moreover Jiljilyeh is not far from Shiloh [g.v.], and the very curious passage in (Pseudo-) Epiphanius quoted above (§ 3), which identifies Gilgal as the shrine of the golden calf, adds ἡ ἐν σηλων—i.e., Shiloh. It would go far to explain the disappearance from Israel's history of so ancient a sanctuary as Shiloh, if we could believe that its sanctity had been absorbed by that of the neighbouring Gilgal, which in such a case would have strengthened its claim to be the rival of Bethel. That, however, is only a guess; and the claims of this Samaritan Jiljilyeh are as inconclusive as those of the Jordan Gilgal. The case between them must still be regarded as open; nor is it confined to them. There is a third Gilgal which also has strong claims to be regarded as the popular Israelite sanctuary of the eighth century.

Dt. 11:30: [Ebal and Gerizim] . . . 'are they not beyond Jordan, to the west of the road of the sunset,

5. A Gilgal by Gerizim? in the land of the Canaanites, who dwell in the Arabah, over against Gilgal, beside the terebinth of Moreh?' As punctuated by the Massoretes the text means that it is Ebal and Gerizim that are opposite Gilgal. Taking the latter to be Gilgal by Jericho, certain Rabbis, followed by Eusebius, Jerome, and a constant Christian tradition, transferred Ebal and Gerizim to the hills immediately behind Jericho. Recent commentators have preferred to alter the punctuation, and taking 'over against Gilgal' as describing the home of the Canaanites in the Arabah, have thought to secure both good grammar and accurate geography (see Driver, ad loc.). Dillmann, however, preserving the Massoretic punctuation, supposed some Gilgal near Shechem; and his hypothesis has been justified by the discovery of a modern place named Julejil, on the plain of Makhna, 1 m. E. of the foot of Mt. Gerizim, 2½ m. SE. of Shechem and 1¼ m. SW. of Salim (PEFM 2:238). This suits the data of the passage. The terebinth of Moreh, 'the Revealer,' takes us back to Abraham, who built an altar beside it (Gen. 12:6). The place therefore was an ancient sanctuary, and further rendered sacred to Hebrew hearts by the worship of their great patriarch.

(The only difficulty in Dt. 11:30 is the clause 'who dwell in the Arabah.' It is very possible that this is a later insertion due to one who supposed that the Gilgal mentioned must be that in the Arabah by Jericho.)

If then there was a Gilgal near Gerizim, sanctified by the worship of the patriarchs (for Jacob had been here as well as Abraham, Gen. 33:18), and by the command of Moses to Israel to celebrate there their entry into the Promised Land, this Gilgal has equal claims with the two others we have already described, to be considered as the popular sanctuary of N. Israel in the ninth and eighth centuries.

These claims have been defended in detail by Schlatter (Zur Topog. u. Gesch. Palästinas, 246 ff.) and accepted by Buhl (Pal. 202 ff.). Schlatter makes out a most probable case; but his argument that the Makhna Julejil was also the Gilgal where Joshua placed the camp of Israel after the conquest of Ai (9:10-16; 4:3; 14:6 γαλγαλα [B]) is very doubtful, and his other, that it was the Gilgal of Saul's appointment to the kingdom (1 S. 10:8 ff.), is quite unsuccessful. Schlatter mistakes the Judæan Carmel for Mt. Carmel. [For another view of the difficult passage Dt. 11:30 see GERIZIM, § 2.]

(a) In the list of the Canaanite kings conquered by Israel we find a 'king of the nations at Gilgal' (Josh. 12:23

6. Other Gilgals. γαει τῆς γαλειλαίας [B], γαυμι τῆς γαλγαλα [L]). In harmony with ⊗'s reading some propose to read 'king of the nations of Galilee' (see GALILEE, § 1). The king, however, is mentioned between the kings of Dor (g.v., § 2) and Tirzah, and Eusebius and Jerome (OS) place a γαλγουλις 6 R. m. N. of Antipatris; and this is represented to-day either by Jiljilieh, 4 m., or Kilkilyeh, 6 m. NNE of Kal'at Râs-el-'Ain, a probable site of ANTIPATRIS (g.v., § 2).

(b) In Josh. 15:7 (P) the border of Judah is said to turn N. 'from the Oak of Achor to the Gilgal (γαλγαλα [AL], γαυαδ [B*], γα αυαδ [Bb]) which is over against the ascent of Adummim,' the present Tal 'at ed-Dam on the road from Jericho to Jerusalem. (In the parallel passage, Josh. 18:17 (P), גִּלְגָּל becomes גִּלְגָּלֹת, γαλιωθ [B], γαλλιαωθ—i.e., γη'ילג'ל [A] γαλιωθ [L]). This is surely the hitherto unidentified Beth-gilgal or [AV] House of Gilgal (גֵּיזְרִים הַיְבֵר; B^m A om., βηθ α'γαλγαλα [κc-a mg.], βαιθαλ [L]) which is given in Neh. 12:29 along with the fields of Geba and Azmaveth as being 'round about Jerusalem.' (So, independently, Che. [GALLIM, 2], who also reads 'Beth-gilgal' for Bath-gallim' in Is. 10:30.) If placed at the Tal 'at ed-Dam, Beth-gilgal would lie almost as far E. from the latter as Geba lies N.

(c) On the Gilgal or Galgala of 1 Macc. 9:2 see ARBELA. The data undoubtedly suit best the Gilgal on the Makhna Plain, not the Gilgal suggested in § 3 of that article.¹

GILOH (גִּלּוֹחַ), a town in the highlands of Judah, in the same group with Shamir (=Shaphir), Debir, and Eshtemoth (Josh. 15 51 γΑΝΝΑ [B], ΓΗΛΩΝ [A], ΛΑΝΟΥ [L]), according to MT of 2 S. 15 12 the home of Ahithophel (גִּלּוֹחַ מְשִׁירִי; EN ΠΟΛΕΙ ΑΓΥΘΟΥ ΕΙΣ [EN] ΓΩΛΑ [BA], ΕΚ ΤΗΣ ΠΟΛΕΩΣ ΑΓΥΘΟΥ ΤΗΣ ΜΕΤΑΛΛΑΔ [L]).

The gentilic is GILONITE, גִּלּוֹנִי; 2 S. 15 12 (θεκωνει [B], γιλωναιω [A], γελμωναιον [L]); 2 S. 23 34 (γελωνειτου [B], γελωνιτ. [A], γαλααδ [L])=1 Ch. 11 36 (PELONITE, גִּלּוֹנִי a corrupt reading; 1 φεδωνει [BM], φελλωνι [AL]).

Giloh is probably referred to by Micah in connection with Ophrah and Shaphir, though the paronomasia is disguised in MT (Micah 1 11). It seems to be represented by Jala, the name now attached to some ruins about 3 m. NW. of Halhül; the situation of Bêt Jälâ—a place NW. of Bethlehem—seems too far north.

The text of 2 S. 15 12 is corrupt, but not desperately so. 'While he offered the sacrifices, if it has any meaning at all, can only refer to the important sacrifices connected with Absalom's assumption of royalty at Hebron. Yet the position of the clause shows that it contains a statement respecting Ahithophel. The scribe must have wrongly deciphered his original. Read, with Klostermann, for בְּרָחֻוּ אֶל-תְּנִיפִים, בּוֹחֻוּ אֶת-הַבְּחִים, 'when he fled to the Ziphites' (see 1 S. 23 10). This awakens a suspicion that Giloh was not the real name of Ahithophel's home, which may have been rather a place not far to the SW. of Jälâ, viz. Keilah. It is by no means certain that the translator of \mathfrak{S} had before him גִּלּוֹחַ or גִּלּוֹחַ. He may have had קַעִילָה (Kē'ilah); and even if he had not, גִּלּוֹחַ is an easy phonetic corruption of קַעִילָה (see KEILAH). David was once in great straits at Keilah; the citizens were about to deliver him up to Saul, but he suspected them, and escaped in time (1 S. 23 8-13). Ahithophel may have warned David or Abiathar. With this clue, Klostermann thus reads the former part of this passage, 'Absalom had made a league (אֶת-בְּחִים) with Ahithophel the Keilathite (הַקַּעִילָיִת, or 'the Keilanite, הַקַּעִילָיִת), who made possible his escape (מִקַּעִילָה) from Keilah.' We thus understand David's habitual reliance on Ahithophel's counsel, and see how Ahithophel's son came to be one of David's 'thirty' (see ELIAM, 1).

The text of Micah 1 10 f. is also corrupt. It opens, 'In Gath tell it not,' which Nowack regards as an interpolation inserted from 2 S. 1 20, whilst G. A. Smith thinks that the words describe the doom in store for Philistia as well as for the Shephelah of Judah in which Micah's home lay (Twelve Proph. 1 383). In support of this G. A. Smith refers to the situation of Shaphir, the modern Sawafir, in the Philistine plain. It is not probable, however, that Micah extends his view beyond his own region, the fate of which alone evokes his sympathy. SAPHIR (q.v.) need not be Sawafir. There is one place known to us, and only one, the name of which suggests a paronomasia fit to form a parallel to 'In Bochim weep' (see BOCHIM), and that is Giloh. Read therefore, גִּלּוֹחַ מְשִׁירִי, 'in Giloh exult not.' Cp Che. JQR, July 1898.

GIRDLE. Originating perhaps not so much in notions other in W. Palestine which seems to repeat the ancient Gilgal is Jeljel, about ½ m. S. of Beisân (PEF Name Lists, 161). It is remarkable that the name has not yet been found E. of Jordan.

1 On the passage see Klo. Sam., ad loc., and cp ΑΗΤΙΘΟΡΗΛ, end.

of decency (Gen. 3 7) as in the necessity of protecting the loins from the extremes of temperature in tropical countries, the girdle forms one of the oldest and most serviceable of all articles of apparel. In Hebrew the commonest terms for 'girdle' are ēšōr and Hägōr.

1. Ēšōr, עֶשׂוֹר (šwñw, etc.), is exactly the Ar. izār, even the lengthened first vowel corresponding to the long form 'izār (Dozy, Dict. de l'it. 32) which seems to be not merely Egyptian, since Payne-Smith has izārā from Bar-Bahlül. The 'izār, now a large outer wrapper, was originally a loin-cloth or wrapper not covering the upper part of the body, wound round the loins (tied with a knot, Lane, s.v. p. 53) so as to be loosed if trodden on (Frey. Chr. Ar. 72 l. 7, and Einkl. in das Stud. etc. 298). This is the dress of the Saracens in Ammianus, and is retained in the 'ikrām. Mi'zar, now a pair of drawers, is not originally different, Ham. 81 and Dozy, op. cit. Bar 'Ali (Hoffm. 5842) explains Syr. mizrānē by mayāzār or tabābīn. The latter are the short drawers without legs worn by wrestlers or sailors. It is therefore an inner garment and so different from the hägōr (see below, 2). This suits all the passages of OT. From Is. 5 27 we learn that it was easily loosed (halla in Frey. Chr., l.c.), from Jer. 13 1 2 K. 18 that it might be either of linen (עֶשְׂוֹר) or of skin. Elijah's was of the latter material. Like the old Arabs, he wore but two garments, the 'izār and the addbreth 1 (Ar. ridā); see MANTLE.

The person who wears the 'izār has of course no shirt. So the prophet Isaiah (20 2) has only a waist-wrapper, and this explains Jeremiah's 'izār (Jer. 13 1). Hence it is that in Job 12 18 the king who is humiliated is represented as wearing the 'izār. In Ezek. 23 15 it is a peculiarity of the Chaldeans that they wear for girdle above their garments an 'izār, and this is seen on the monuments (Perrot-Chapiez, Art in Chald. etc., 1 fig. 14, 2 figs. 15 116). As the 'izār is next the skin, the phrase Is. 11 5 is intelligible, and so the Arabs say hawa minnī ma'kida l-izār, meaning 'he is my near neighbour' (Lane, s.v. ma'kid, Fr. Einkl., l.c.). Phrases like אֲנִי וְרֵעִי (1 S. 2 4) are simply 'are clothed with.' But in Job 38 3 40 7 Jer. 1 17 מְתוּנִים אֲנִי וְרֵעִי (like a man) is like shadda izāraku or mi'zaraku = shammara, 'tuck up the cloth so as to leave the legs bare,' Ham. 334, 383, n. It is probable, however, that a (short) 'izār was the dress of active life (sailor's tubbān is analogous), like the waist-cloth of the modern East and also of the warrior. In Ham. 334, l. 1 the warrior is mushammirūn . . . 'an shawāwū—leaves his sides bare—like Ammianus's Saracens, and cp Shanfara l. 62. החמור Ps. 98 1 simply = לְבָשׁ. But in Is. 8 9 it is Hithp. 'put on your 'izār' (which in that case is a warlike dress), or is it 'be a covering and support to one another' as in Arabic 'azara 'to back' (lit. 'cover'), and of herbage, ta'azara 'it grew thick and rank, the stalks supporting each other.' Ham. 657 l. 1 naššarū mu'azarūn = 'effective stout help.' See also Asās al-Balāgha. 2 From ēšōr 'waist-cloth' is distinguished:—

2. Hägōr, חֲגוֹר, חֲגוּרָה, hägōrāh (šwñw, περιζώμα), a belt or girdle worn round the waist outside the dress. In modern times it is usually a coloured shawl, or long piece of figured white muslin. The girdle of the poorer classes is of coarse material, often of leather, with clasps. This leathern girdle is also much used by the Arabs, and by persons of condition when equipped for a journey. It is sometimes ornamented with work in coloured worsted, or silk, or with metal studs, shells, beads, etc.

Such, probably, were the girdles worn by the ladies of post-exilic Jerusalem (Is. 8 24), and the eulogy of the 'virtuous woman' describes her (Prov. 31 24) as making a hägōr which Phœnician merchants did not disdain to buy (cp the šwñw χυρσὴν of Rev. 1 13 15 6). The warrior used a hägōr as a sword-belt (2 S. 20 8; on text see Comm.; 1 K. 2 5); cp חֲגוּרָה חֲגוּרָה 2 K. 3 21, and חֲגוּרָה חֲגוּרָה 7 Judg. 3 16 etc. That other objects also might be carried in it, is suggested by Dt. 23 13 [14] Ⓞ; cp Mt. 10 9 Mk. 6 81 (EV 'purse').

2 Elsewhere Robertson Smith sums up thus: 'The general impression produced by a survey of the usage of the word is that among the Hebrews the 'ēšōr ceased to be part of their ordinary dress pretty early, being superseded by the tunic [חֲגוּרָה, see TUNIC], but that it was used by warriors, by the meanest classes, by prophets and mourners, and that the word (or the cognate word) was also retained in proverbial phrases and similes, just as was the case with the Arabs' ('Notes on Hebrew Words', 1, JQR, 1892, p. 289 ff.). Cp also, on the 'ēšōr of Jeremiab, Che. Life and Times of Jer. 161 (88).

3. Mizab, מִצָּב, Ps. 109 19 (EV 'girdle'); מִצָּבָה, m'siāh, Job 12 21 (for מִצָּבָה = מִצָּבָה; AV 'strength,' mg. 'girdle,' RV 'belt').

Che. reads in Ps. אֲזוּר = כִּיּוּר (cp Lag. Uebers. 177), and in Job כִּיּוּרִים, 'greaves.' כִּיּוּר occurs in a doubly corrupt context in Is. 23 10 (AV 'strength,' AVmg. RV 'girdle'); 'girdle' for 'restraint' is intrinsically improbable. Du., Che. read חָזֵק, 'haven.'

4. Kiṣṣūrīm, קִיֻּסָּרִים (bands) of costly make, worn by women (Is. 3 20 ἐμπλόκιον, Jer. 23 2 ἀσηθόδεσμός). Jewish interpretations vary; Kimchi and Rashi render 'headband' (so AV; RV 'sashes'). The kiṣṣūrīm were richly studded with jewels and were the receptacle of the other ornaments worn by men and women.

5. The priestly 'abnēt, אֲבִנֵּת (Ex. 28 4 39 f. 39 29 Lev. 8 7 16 4; all P), was a sash rather than a girdle (זָוָה; balteus [Vg.]; see Lag. Ges. Abh. 39).² The 'abnēt was of great length, according to Rabbinic tradition 32 cubits long and 4 cubits wide. Josephus (Ant. iii. 7 2) says that the 'abnēt was four fingers broad, 'so loosely woven that you would think it was the skin of a serpent.'³ It is embroidered with flowers of scarlet and purple and blue and fine linen; but the warp is nothing but fine linen.' It was wound under the breast, twice round the body, was tied in an ample bow or loop, and the ends reached the ankles. It was thrown over the left shoulder while the priest was officiating. Driver-White (SBOT, 'Leviticus,' 70) summarily describe the 'abnēt as 'an embroidered loosely woven scarf.' The 'abnēt was the only garment in which an intermixture of wool and linen was permitted. The same word is applied to the sashes of high officers in Is. 22 21.

GIRGASHITE, GIRGASHITES (גִּרְגָּשִׁי); ο ΓΕΡΓΕΔΑΙΟΣ [BADEFL]; so Jos.; Judith 5 16 ΤΟΥΣ ΓΕΡΓΕΔΑΙΟΥΣ. AV GERGESITES, RV GIRGASHITES, a people of Canaan, Gen. 10 16 (gloss), 15 21 (gloss), Josh. 3 10 (D₂), 24 11 (D₂), Dt. 7 1 Neh. 9 8 (AV always 'Girgashites' except Gen. 10 16, where Girgasite; RV always 'Girgashite'). Another form of the name is very probably GIRZITES (גִּרְזִי), which has sometimes been corrupted into PERIZZITES (פְּרִי). In the Table of Peoples the Girgashites have, properly speaking, no place; it is to the Deuteronomist, who had archaeological tastes, that the resuscitation of the name is due. Apparently for a good reason he places it next on the list of peoples in Dt. 7 1 to that of the Hittites. Whence did he derive it? Probably from the Song of Deborah, where the slaughter of the Kadasoni, or, as he probably read, Kadeshi or Gadeshi, is spoken of (Judg. 5 21); the N. or Hittite Kadeshtes, see KADESH, 2. 1 [r] instead of 7 [d], and the repeated 7 [g] after the 7 [r] are ordinary errors of scribes.⁴ T. K. C.

² Jos. (Ant. iii. 7 2) transliterates αβαθ (Niese; al. αβανθ), and notes that the term in use in his day was εμλαυ (cp Targ. on Ex. 17 9), probably the Pers. himyān; see also NECKLAGE.

GIRZITES, THE (גִּרְזִי); and for the readings of Ⓞ and of EV see GERZITES, 1 S. 27 8 Kt. There seems to have been a widely extended pre-Israelitish tribe called Girzites or Girshites. In fact, wherever PERIZZITES [g.v.] or GIRGASHITES is read in the Hebrew text we should probably restore Girzites or Girshites.

It is doubtful whether 'Geshurites' or 'Girshites' is the correct reading in 1 S. 27 8 (see GESHUR, 2); but in 2 S. 2 9, instead of 'and over the Ashurites, and over Jezreel,' we should most probably read simply 'and over the Girzites' (גִּרְזִי), the rest being due to dittography (see Che. Crit. Bib.). Of the 'Girzites' there is another record in the name miscalled 'Mount Gerizim' (the mount of the Girzites), whilst the Girshites are also attested by עֲרָר (i.e., עֲרָר, see HIVITES, § 1 u.) in Is. 17 10, and by the two trans-Jordanic places called Gerasa (see GILEAD, § 6).

Another (probable) occurrence of the gentile Geraś has escaped notice—Boancrges, which seems to the present writer to have come from βανεγερος = בני גְרָסָה, 'sons of Gerasa.' That the phrase is both misread and misinterpreted need not disturb us; there are quite as great misinterpretations in Lk. 6 15 ('Simon, called Zelotes') and in Acts 4 36 (see BARNABAS). After misunderstanding it, Mk. wrongly ascribed the name to Jesus.

Parallel corruptions are perhaps καναλιος or καναλιτης for καναλιος or καναλιτης = קַנְיָה, 'a man of Cana' (but cp CANANÆAN), and ισκαριωτης for ιεριχωτης, 'a man of Jericho' (cp JUDAS ISCARIOT, § 1). Possibly, too (but see JAIRUS, first note) Timæus in Bartimæus may be from a place-name 'Timai' (see Nestle, Marg. 91). T. K. C.

GISPA, RV Gishpa (גִּשְׁפָּה), named after ZIHA as an overseer of NETHINIM in Ophel (Neh. 11 21 f.; ΓΕΦΦΑ [Nca mg. inf. L], om. BN* A). According to Ryssel his name is a corruption of HASUPHA (חַשְׁפָּה), which follows Ziha in the list in Ezra 2 43.

GITTAH-HEPHER (גִּתָּה הֶפְתֵּר), Josh. 19 13 AV, RV GATH-HEPHER (g.v.).

GITTAIM (גִּתַּיִם, ΓΕΘΘΑΙΜ [BADEL]); probably = Gittām, 'place of a wine-press'; on form of name see NAMES, § 107.

1. An unidentified town in the list of Benjaminite villages (Ezra ii., § 5 [7], § 15 [1] a), Neh. 11 33 (γεθθμ [Nca mg. inf.; om. BN* A]).

2. A town where the fugitive Beerothites were received as gērīm or protected strangers, apparently in the days of Saul (2 S. 4 3). For the key to this incidental notice see ISHBAAL (1). This Gittaim can hardly have been the Benjaminite town. The persecuted Beerothites would surely have fled to the territory of another tribe. There were probably several Gittaims as well as several Gaths. Thenius, Grove (Smith's DB), Klostermann, think the flight was towards Gath (γεθθαι [B], -θειμ [A]).

3. Gittaim is also probably the name of a town in or near Edom, Gen. 36 35 (ⓄADEL), 1 Ch. 1 46 (so ⓄB; ⓄA γεθθαμ, but ⓄL ευθ), where MT Ki. has ΑΒΙΤΗ (g.v.). Note that vineyards in Edom are referred to in Nu. 20 17.

4. By a manifest error Gittaim appears in Ⓞ 1 S. 14 33 where Saul's speech begins, not with the appropriate 'Ye transgress' (עֲבַדְתֶּם), but with the difficult ἐν γεθθαμ (ⓄBL), ⓄA γεθεμ, 'In Gittaim.' T. K. C.

GITTITE (גִּתִּיטֵי), 2 S. 6 10. See GATH, § 1.

(גִּתִּיטֵי הַלֵּל), ὑπὲρ τ. Ἀηρῶν = ὑπὲρ ἡ-ל [ⓄBNAR Syr. Symm.]; ἄρο [or, Ps. 81, in] torcularibus [J]; ἐπὶ τ. Ἀηρῶν, Aq. in Ps. 81 84 (Syr. Hex.), but in Ps. 8 ὑπὲρ τ. γεθθιδος (so also Theod. in Ps. 8), Ps. 8 81 (om. T.; ὕ. τ. ἀλλοαθησομένου), 84 (headings).

According to Wellhausen we have a twofold question to answer: (1) Is it a mode or key which is denoted by 'the Gittith'; and, (2) Does Gittith mean 'belonging to Gath,' or 'belonging to a wine-press'? The latter question must be answered first. No doubt the vintage festival had special songs of its own (one such may be alluded to in Is. 65 8), and Baethgen thinks the three psalms with the above heading appropriate for such an occasion. If this view of the appropriateness of the psalms be accepted, it becomes plausible to follow those old interpreters who read 'ou (=with) the (treading in the) wine-presses.' If it be rejected, there still remains the view that the temple music had borrowed a mode or key or (see Tg.) instrument from the city of Gath. Philistine influence on the temple music, however, is scarcely credible (see, however, Hitz., Del.), and in any case Gath had probably been destroyed before the exile.

No theory therefore is in possession of the field, and when we consider the frequent miswriting of these musical headings (see, e.g., HIGGAION, SHIGGAION, MAHALATH [ii.]), it is as natural as it is easy to read מנגינת-ל, 'with string-music.' נ before ג might easily be dropped; the next stage of development is obvious. Gesenius in 1839 (Thes., s.v.) had already given a kindred solution (נג for נגג; =נגג). The question relative to the mode or key called the Gittith disappears.

GLASS. 'The art of glass-making, unlike that of pottery, would appear not to have been discovered and practised by different nations independently, but to have spread gradually from a single centre.'¹ That the Phœnicians are not to be credited with this invention (Pliny, HN 36:265, etc.) is practically certain, since our oldest examples of glass proceed from the countries watered by the Nile, the Tigris, and the Euphrates. From Egypt we have a dusky green glass bead of the queen Hatasu (or rather Ha't-sepsut, see EGYPT, § 53), of the middle of the fifteenth century B.C., also a light green opaque jar of Thotmes III. (1500 B.C.),² and, ascending higher, an amulet with the name of Nuantef IV., of the eleventh dynasty (circa 2400 B.C.).² With this agrees the fact that the most ancient representations of glass-blowing belong probably to the Middle Empire, the alleged earlier cases being capable of a different explanation—viz., smelting (Erman, Anc. Eg. 459).

The Assyrians, too, were acquainted with the use of glass (ASSYRIA, § 13, cp n. ib.), and we have one of the most important specimens of their work in the unique transparent glass vase of the time of Sargon (722-705 B.C.).² The recent excavations in Nippur, however, appear to permit us to carry back the use of glass to a much earlier date.

According to Peters (Nippur, 2:134) 'badly broken inscribed axe-heads of a highly ornamental shape' of blue glass, coloured with cobalt (brought presumably from China) were found in mounds of the fourteenth century B.C.³ These and other glass objects found here had been run in moulds, not blown. A small glass bottle was found with the door-sockets of Lugal-kigub-nidudu (circa 4000 B.C.; op. cit. 160, 374); but, in general, the glass objects found at Nippur were of late date, and while glass fragments were very numerous in the later strata, there were few or none in the earlier.⁴ The above examples should no doubt be looked upon as exceptions, since 'the greater part of the glass found belonged to the post-Babylonian period' (op. cit. 373f.).

The use of glass among the Phœnicians begins at a later date.⁴ Their acquaintance with it was probably derived from the Egyptians and spread abroad by them in their trading expeditions. To them, also, are possibly due the many specimens of coloured beads found in many parts of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

The part played by the Phœnicians in spreading the knowledge of glass—as well as certain arts, etc.—may need some qualifying in the future (see TRADE AND COMMERCE). In Cyprus, at all events, it would appear that glass was a native production, rather than of Phœnician origin. The art itself was probably derived from Egypt (Ohnefalsch-Richter, Kypros, etc. 416). That Egypt exported glass is well known (cp, e.g., Martial, Ep. 21, 74).

³ In the same spot were found objects of Eubœan magnesite, implying regular intercourse with Greece.

From the treatment which glass received in the ancient world it is evident that in Egypt and Babylonia it was held to be a precious thing, a 2. Biblical references. fit offering for the gods. It would, therefore, be appropriate to find it mentioned along with precious jewels in the eulogy of wisdom, Job 28:17 (שֶׁבַע אֲבִיבִים, נְכוּנִים, √ 'clear' [transparency is not implied], AV CRYSTAL, RV 'Glass'; ὕαλος [BNAC]).

ὕαλος originally denoted any transparent stone or stone-like substance (e.g., Herod. 3:20). On the other hand, some vitreous ornament is undoubtedly referred to in ἀργήματά τε λίθινα χρυά (ib. 2:69).

In the case of the 'glassy sea' (θάλασσα γαλίση, Rev. 4:6 15:2), and the comparison of the golden streets of the heavenly city to pure 'glass' (ὕαλος, Rev. 21:18:21), the earlier meaning of ὕαλος perhaps holds good, although we are reminded of the Arabian legend that Solomon prepared in his palace a glass pavement which the queen of Sheba mistook for water (Qoran, Sur. 27).

A reference to glass-making has been found in Dt. 33:19 ('the hidden treasures of the sand');¹ but see ZEBULUN.

The colloquial use of 'glass' to denote a 'mirror of glass, or of any other material, is found in AV of (a) Is. 3:23 (יִיָּזֵן, διαφανη λακωνικα), see DRESS, § 1 (2); (b) 1 Cor. 13:12 Jas. 1:23 (ἔσπτηρον); see further LOOKING-GLASS, MIRROR.

GLAZING (χρῖσιμα [B^{NA}]), Ecclus. 38:30. See POTTERY.

GLEANING (גָּזַץ), Lev. 19:9. See AGRICULTURE, § 12.

GLEDE is EV's attempt to render the apparent Hebrew word גִּלְדֵי in Dt. 14:13 (גִּלְדֵי [BAFL]). The error of the scribe was corrected in the mg., and from the mg. found its way into the text before אֵימָתַיִם ('and the falcon'). That this view is correct is self-evident, even without the confirmation supplied by the || passage, Lev. 11:14. The word glead or gled (AS glida) is Old English for 'kite,' and has not yet entirely disappeared.

To represent the phenomena of the text we might render, 'And the bite [read 'kite' and the falcon'. Tristram (NHB) thinks that our translator means the Buzzard, and adds that there are three species of Buzzard in Palestine. T. K. C.

GNAT. ג. (ΚΩΝΩΨ [Ti. WH.]) Mentioned only once in the Bible (Mt. 23:24).

The gnats or mosquitoes are dipterous insects belonging to the family Culicidae. There are many species; they breed in swamps and still water, the first two stages, larval and pupal, being aquatic. The female alone inflicts the sting-like prick with its mouth-organs; the male insect does not leave the neighbourhood of the breeding-place.

RV's strain out a gnat is a return to the old reading of Tyndale, Cranmer, and the Geneva, AV's strain at being probably due to a misprint (see Whitney, Dict.). Reference is made in this proverb to the scrupulous care exercised by devout Jews (as also in the present day by Singhalese Buddhists) in conformity with Lev. 11:23 43 (cp Chullin, f. 67r). The comparison with the smallest and largest things finds analogy in the Talm.—e.g., Shabb. 77b, וְהִפִּיל עַל הַפִּיל אֵימָתַיִם, 'the fear of the gnat is on the elephant'; cp the Ar. proverb, 'he eats an elephant and is suffocated by a gnat.'

2. The word 'gnat' ('like gnats') occurs also in the RVmg. of Is. 51:6. It would be safer to read גָּזַץ (Weir, Che.), which elsewhere AV renders LICE [s.v.]; in SBOT (Heb.) 147, however, a bolder correction is suggested (see LOCUST, § 2 (4)). In the case of the plague in Ex. 8:16 [12]f., 'gnat' is possibly more correct. The σκνιψ (G's word in Ex. 1c.) is called by Suidas ζῷον κωνωπάδες. A. E. S.—S. A. C.

GNOSIS. In the second century, and also to some extent even in the third, the Church was engaged in a life-and-death struggle with the Gnostics.

1. Origin of term. By Gnostics we are to understand a certain class of Christians—of many different schools, bearing a great variety of names, and diffused all over the Hellenistic world—all having in common a certain speculative pretentiousness, all laying claim to a special knowledge (gnosis) in contrast to the mere faith of the masses, and all giving effect to their fantastic ideas about the origin of the world and the origin of evil in a peculiar ethic that offended the conscience of the Church. If we could assume Carpocrates and Cerinthus (circa 100 A.D.) to have been the earliest representatives of the tendency in question, and all the writings of the NT to have been composed within the apostolic age, biblical science as such would have no concern with the Gnostics; and it is in point of fact true that the name of Gnostic does not occur in the NT, nor is it mentioned in any extant writing earlier than 176 A.D.

However, 'they who make separations' (οἱ ἀποδι-ορίζοντες) referred to in the epistle of Jude (v. 19 RV) can only be taken as Gnostics of a libertinistic complexion; the emphasis laid in vv. 3 20 on the faith once for all delivered to the saints is best explained on this assumption, and still more, their ironical designation as 'natural' or 'animal' (RV^{mg} = ψυχικοί); plainly they were in the habit of calling themselves πνευματικοί, 'spiritual men,' as distinguished from the ordinary run of 'psychical' Christians who rested content with faith merely. So also in 2 Pet., only here the author points still more clearly at the Gnostics by his repeated references to the true knowledge (12 f. 5 f. 8 220 318). The polemic of the Johannine Epistles has a similar scope; if the substantive, gnosis, does not occur, the verb 'to know' is met with all the more frequently; 'we have known and believed' (1 Jn. 4:16) is intended to express the true knowledge that is in accord with faith as contradistinguished from the knowledge which sets it aside. When the Pastoral Epistles (1 Tim. 6:20) bluntly warn against the oppositions of the gnosis which is falsely so called, the adherents of which have erred, or 'missed the mark,' concerning the faith, it may perhaps be possible to doubt whether the reference is to the Gnostic Marcion, who wrote 'Antitheses' about 140 A.D., but not to deny reference to the Gnostics altogether. Finally, in the Apocalypse we have at least the reference, in the case of Thyatira (24), to the false teachers who claim to have 'known the depths of Satan,' a grim characteristic of Gnostic speculation.

To all the writings hitherto named as containing allusions to Gnosticism, it might perhaps be possible to attribute a date about the year 100 A.D. or even later, in which case the traditional account of the Gnostic movement as having arisen about the end of the first century would remain unshaken; on other grounds also the Pastoral Epistles have, in fact, been assigned to the second century. Yet we are none the less compelled by the NT to recognise certain gnosticising tendencies as existing within the apostolic church itself as well as certain extra-Christian and pre-Christian developments bearing a Gnostic character. In the Synoptic Gospels, it is true, the intellectual side of religion is but rarely and exceptionally brought forward: Lk. 11:52 (key of knowledge), Mt. 13:11 and parallels (the gift of understanding the mysteries of the kingdom), and Mt. 11:27 (the knowledge of the Father [and of the Son] reserved for the chosen ones only) are the leading passages. The Fourth Gospel, however, lays an emphasis, that on this account is all the more striking, upon the capacity to understand. Just as the decisive confession of faith in Christ is (6:69), 'we have believed and know that thou art the Holy one of God,' so elsewhere knowing and believing are interchangeable expressions with reference to the same objects, and the impression is left that knowing is higher than believing. Thus, for example, to 'those Jews who had believed' the promise is given (8:31 f.), 'If ye abide in my word . . . ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.' The Gnosticism of the Fourth Gospel is distinguished from the heretical gnosis only (1) by the contents of the gnosis to which it attaches so high a value—in this case identical with the contents of faith; and (2) by the closeness of the connection between knowledge and faith; here there is no such distinction as is elsewhere drawn between the disciples who only believe and the disciples who only know, as two separate classes.

Paul often uses the words for knowing (γινώσκειν, ἐπιγινώσκειν) in their most ordinary sense, as for example in Phil. 1:12 2:19 22 4:5 1 Cor. 14:37, and, inasmuch as he attributes to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews (Rom. 1:21 2:18) a knowledge of God—in contradiction, it is true, to 1 Cor. 1:21—he is obviously bound to assume in the case of every believer a knowledge of God, of Christ, of the Gospel as in Gal. 4:9 2 Cor. 8:9 13:5 Phil. 3:10 (here γινώσκειν θεόν, Χριστόν, etc.) or 2 Cor. 2:14 4:6 Phil. 3:8 Col. 1:9 f. (here γνώσις, ἐπι-γνώσις, and the corresponding genitives) without our being thereby entitled to ascribe to him a vein of gnosticism.

In 1 Cor. 13:9 12, however, he speaks of 'knowing' without mentioning any particular object, and the substantive γνώσις is, in the majority of cases, used absolutely; occasionally and exceptionally (e.g., Rom. 11:33) as an attribute of God, mentioned along with his wisdom, but elsewhere as a possession—highly to be prized—of the man who has become a believer.

As proving that knowledge is here sharply separated from faith it will not do to cite 1 Cor. 12:8 f., where we read that to one is given the word of knowledge and to another faith; for in this passage πίστις, faith, is used in a narrower sense than usual, whilst, according to 1 Cor. 12:8 13:8, gnosis is one of the charismata that are bestowed only on certain individuals, and 1 Cor. 8:7 [cp 8:10 f.] declares expressly that all have not knowledge. It is half ironically only that Paul (8:1) declares himself as accepting the proposition that 'we all have knowledge,' since in v. 2, with manifest allusion to the conceit of the Corinthians, he distinguishes between knowing as one ought to know and a gnosis that, in all essentials, is merely imagined. The circumstance also that in Gal. 4:9 (cp 1 Cor. 8:3) he speaks of it as the highest object of Christian effort that one should be known of God rather than that one should know God, is not to be understood as depreciating the high value he elsewhere attaches to gnosis, any more than 1 Cor. 13:8 f. 12 is to be so taken, where he speaks of all knowledge in the present aion as only in part, and promises that in the time of perfection it shall, as imperfect, be done away. For the same thing is said of speaking with tongues and of prophecy, and of them also, as well as of acquaintance with all possible knowledge, he says (13:1 f.) that they are of no profit to the man who has not love.

It cannot be by accident merely that, in Paul, gnosis is always met with as the precious possession of the members of the Christian community and never as belonging to unbelievers; it has its place, in fact, among the charismatic manifestations of the spirit of God, which this same spirit bestows on individuals for the benefit of all (1 Cor. 12:7-11), and as such ranks with prophecy and the gift of miracles; he who is endowed with knowledge—the 'gnostic,' as the expression would have been at a later date—belongs to the number of the πνευματικοί, the men of the spirit.

We might venture, after Paul, to define gnosis as the result of the instruction which a 'spiritual' man has received from the spirit of God in the things of the spirit down to the very depths of the Godhead (1 Cor. 2:8-16) in such a manner that, possessed of the God-given teaching, he finds everything dark in earth and heaven become clear to him and (if only 'through a glass,' in mere outline) he sees that which is true, where others see nothing, or only what is false. Paul himself belonged pre-eminently to the number of such gnostics (2 Cor. 11:6), and if that piece of 'knowledge' which, as we learn from 1 Cor. 8, he shared with many Corinthians—that idols are nothing, and that consequently, to speak strictly, there can be no such thing as meat offered to idols—is of a somewhat elementary character, we must nevertheless remain lost in admiration at the deeper passages in his epistles (e.g., Rom. 8 and 9-11), in which he expounds the divine plan of salvation—at his 'gnosis,' in fact. The deeper understanding of the scripture, which became possible to him as a Christian (as in Gal. 37 42 ff.), has the same origin. The gnosis of the individual becomes fruitful for the community only, of course, by the communication of it, whether orally or in writing; 1 Cor. 128 accordingly includes the word of knowledge in the list of the charismata; and it is almost certain that in 1 Cor. 146 the 'teaching' (διδασχῆ) means the communication of 'gnosis' (cp 1426), and therefore that the 'teachers' (1228) who take the third place, immediately after apostles and prophets, in the enumeration of those who possess the gifts of the spirit, are to be thought of as 'Gnostics.' Their sharp differentiation from the prophets is somewhat surprising; in many cases it cannot have been practically possible; but as Paul in 1 Cor. 146 gives to 'prophesying' the same position with reference to 'revelation' that he gives to 'teaching' with reference to 'knowledge,' he would seem to have distinguished the word of knowledge from prophecy much in the same way as the latter was distinguished from speaking with tongues; those exercising the last-named gift did so unconsciously, those who prophesied did so in at least enthusiastic exaltation, whilst those who gave the word of knowledge did so in full calm consciousness and with a view to convincing their hearers. Moreover, the contents of prophecy were derived from former revelation and extraordinary experiences, whilst the word of knowledge proceeded from the continuous instruction of the Holy Spirit, making use of the forms of human thought.

In 1 Cor. 128 Paul speaks of a word of wisdom alongside of a word of knowledge, and students have seldom failed to observe the close connection between the two; in fact, the 'teaching' of 14626 must include them both. The distinction between them has sometimes been formulated: thus: the essential feature of the word of wisdom is that it appeals to the understanding, whilst the character of gnosis essentially consists in intuition, in an illumination by the spirit of God, and in an immediate relation to this spirit (Weizsäcker, Apostolic Age, 2264). Wisdom (σοφία), however, of which Paul (apart from Col. and Eph., and apart from the fact that of course he does not deny it to be an attribute of God) almost always speaks in a tone of disfavour—the wisdom which, in his view, as the ideal of the Gentiles (1 Cor. 122), proceeds from the rulers of this present world—could never become for his theology a conception of importance comparable with that of gnosis; in 1 Cor. 26 ff., what he opposes to the false wisdom as being the divine wisdom which he proclaims is the contents of his own gnosis (v. 811), and only on polemical and rhetorical grounds is it that he speaks of wisdom, not gnosis (v. 6), as the subject of his discourses.

The unique passage in 1 Cor. 128 can hardly be taken as implying, on Paul's part, a deliberate co-ordination of wisdom and knowledge; probably all that he desired was to mention the gift of teaching as heading the list of the charismata, and this he could have done with perfect clearness by using the expression 'word of knowledge'; but, inasmuch as the Corinthians attached great importance to wisdom, and a section of them had even perhaps chosen to rank themselves among the followers of Apollon as being the man of wisdom, it occurred to Paul that he ought not to allow it to appear as if he did not recognise the 'word of wisdom' of (say) an Apollon as being a charisma also, as well as his own 'word of knowledge'; and if in 2 Cor. 116 he contrasts his 'rudeness' in respect of speech with his mastery in respect of knowledge, it becomes natural to take the 'word of wisdom' of 1 Cor. 128 as a kind of speech distinguished by correctness and brilliancy of form, as employing the resources of a finished education and training.

To sum up: Paul reckoned gnosis as among the highest gifts of grace belonging to the church of his day; its possessor was able to solve the riddles of time and eternity which remained insoluble to other believers; according to 1 Cor. 26 ff. he even held that such pieces of knowledge could be communicated only to such as were 'perfect,' to Christians who, in truth, deserved to be called spiritual men. These opinions Paul shares with the later Gnostics; it is easily intelligible why they all, and Marcion especially, felt closer affinities with him than with any of the other NT writers; what separates their gnosticism from his is the preponderance, to a greater or less degree, of heathen elements in their speculation, whilst his own confined itself to working out in a sympathetic, if speculative way, the fundamental ideas of the gospel. That Paul found such speculation indispensable is, however, no personal peculiarity of his; it was an element in his composition that he had derived from the atmosphere of his time; under its influence it was that he contributed to make Christianity, from being a religion, into a system of religious and metaphysical thought.

6. Summing up.

At the same time Paul's epistles, and especially Colossians, show that already at that early date he had to combat certain developments of the spirit that prided itself on knowledge. The false teachers of Colossæ (see COLLOSSIANS, § 6) become intelligible only if we take them as judaizers on the one hand, and gnosticians on the other, Christians who gave themselves up to fantastic dualistic speculation. A gnosticizing Judaism of this sort they must have imported with them from without; that is to say, gnosticism already existed in the apostolic age, and it was introduced into the Christian Church by the Jews. But neither had it its ultimate origin in Judaism; from the strong heathen element it contains we can see that it must have been imported from the heathen religious philosophy, undergoing manifold modification and accommodation in the process. Respect for gnosis is a pre-Christian, Hellenic phenomenon; Christianity was no more successful in withdrawing itself from the influence of this predominant tendency of the time than it was in the case of Judaism; but Paul at so early a date as that of his epistle to Colossæ already found, and made use of, the opportunity to draw the line beyond which gnosis could not be tolerated as a Christian basis, and succeeding generations of the Church only followed in his footsteps, though with increasing earnestness as the danger increased, when they carried on the struggle against 'Gnostics after the flesh.'

GOATH, Jer. 3139 RV; AV GOATH.

GOAT. To supplement the general introductory notes respecting large and small cattle among the Hebrews (given elsewhere; see CATTLE) some remarks upon the treatment of goats in particular are necessary.

There are several different breeds of the genus Capra in Palestine and adjacent countries; but it is not possible to distinguish each precisely by its original Hebrew name.

The generic Heb. term, common to all the Semitic family is (1) 'zr, זֵר (Ass. zusu, Ar. 'anz, Syr. 'ezzā); ⚔ usually renders aîg, also ἔριφος Gen. 279, etc.), which includes male and female (e.g., Gen. 159).

To denote the he-goat (so RV), four words are found: (2) 'attûd, אֲתוּד (Ass. attûdu, mentioned as a swift mountain animal), AV 'rams' in Gen. 311012. ⚔ tráγos; but krîós Gen. 311012, χίμαρος Ps. 5096615.

(3) sāphîr, סַפִּיר a late word (Ass. sapparu, Syr. šephrāyā), Dan. 856, and (Aram.) Ezza 835; ⚔ אֲתוּדָא Dan. 8512 Ch.

(5) tayis, טַיִשׁ, Gen. 30 35 32 14 [15], ⚓ τράγος.

The generic terms for the young animal are (6) gēdi, גֵּדִי (fem. Cant. 1 8f), ⚓ ἐρίφος, or, in conjunction with (1) above, גֵּדִי אוֹתֵנוֹיִם, s. S. 16 20 Gen. 27 9 16, etc.; and (7) seh, שֶׁה, used of both goats and sheep (Ex. 12 5 Dt. 14 4); cp CATTLE, § 2 (6), and see SHEEP.

The Hebrew terms refer generally to the domesticated goat, Capra hircus, which, it is probable, is descended mainly from the Persian wild goat, C. agagrus, though doubtless other strains are mingled in its ancestry. Of the various breeds in Palestine, the chief is the mamber, or Syrian goat, which attains a large size. It is remarkable for its long pendant ears, half as long again as the head, an allusion to which is perhaps found in Am. 3 12. The hair is long, black and silky. Both sexes are generally horned and have short beards. Another breed which is found in some parts of the North of Palestine is the mohair or Angora goat. It is generally white and has long silky hair.

The WILD GOAT (C. agagrus) extends through Asia Minor and Persia, and in Homer's time was abundant in Greece. It would be well-known to the Assyrians, although the species occasionally figured is doubtless (so Houghton) the Asiatic ibex—viz., the Capra sinaitica (colloquially called the beden). This animal occurs in the Sinaitic peninsula, in Palestine (but not N. of Lebanon), in Upper Egypt, and in Arabia Petraea. It is quite distinct from the ibex of other countries, being rather smaller than the Alpine species, and lighter in colour than any of its congeners. It is a shy animal, with a keen scent, and its coloration is so like that of the surrounding rocks, etc., that it is very difficult to see. It usually goes in small herds of eight or ten, and, when feeding, has a sentry on the look-out for enemies. The flesh is said to be excellent, the horns, which are much smaller in the female than in the male, are often used for knife handles, etc.

The generic Heb. term for the 'wild goat' is yā'il (only in pl., yā'ilim, יָעָלִים), to whose fondness for rocky heights allusion is made in s. S. 24 2 Ps. 104 18 (ἐλάφος), Job 39 1 (τραγέλαφος πέτρας). Like the GAZELLE, the 'wild' or (better) 'mountain' goat is used of a woman (דָּוִד הָעֵלָי Prov. 5 19, ⚓ BIBL πῶλος), and occurs as a personal name (see Jael). Another, probably more specific, term is 'ākkō, mentioned as a 'clean' animal in Dt. 14 5 (see CLEAN, § 7f.). The vss. vary between yā'il (so Targ. Pesh.), and τραγέλαφος (AFL, B om.), which is applied distinctively to the long-haired and bearded goat found in Arabia and on the Phasis.¹ We may probably identify the animal with the beden or Syrian ibex (cp above).

It is possible indeed that several of the terms may be mere appellatives, and when we find that the Hebrew 'ayyāl (Cervus, see HART) and 'ayil (Ovis Aries, see SHEEP) are virtually identical, it is natural to infer that the Semites did not always distinguish precisely between the Caprinae and the Cervidae and Antilopinae.

We cannot, therefore, state exactly what animals are meant by the Ass. arnu (cp ARAN, Syr. arnā), dašū (see PYGARG), dātānu, turāhu (Syr. tariā; cp TERAH), and burhu (cp Syr. burhā), although the probability is that a mountain-goat is referred to in each.

Goats form a large part of the wealth of a pastoral community. In hilly and poorly watered regions they are more abundant than the sheep.

3. Breeding. 'On the downs of Arabia where no shrubs are to be found, there are no goats. In the rich maritime plains their place is taken by horned cattle, for the luxuriant grasses are too succulent for their taste.'³ They flourish best in the southern wilderness (Edom), and in the hills from Hebron (s. S. 25 2) to the top of Lebanon, and beyond Jordan (Cant. 4 1 6 5 [cp GILEAD, § 1, HAIR, § 1], Gen. 30 33 f. 32 14 [15]). They have given their name to 'Ain-Jidy (see EN-GEDI), where they are said still to be found (Thomson, LB 603).

As a rule they are herded with the sheep.¹ The two flocks² keep apart, however, the sheep browsing on the short grass whilst the more agile and independent goat skips along nibbling at the young shoots of trees and shrubs. In this way great damage is done to seedling trees, and the goat is to a large extent responsible for the absence of trees in Palestine. When folded together at night, the goats and sheep gather separately, and round the well, while awaiting the filling of the trough, they instinctively classify themselves separately (Tristram, loc. cit.).

The tayis is mentioned in Pr. 30 31 as one of the things 'stately in march' (τράγος ἡγούμενος αἰμολίου [CBNAC]), an allusion, doubtless, to the he-goat's habit of leading the flock (cp 'attid' Jer. 50 8). Hence the latter term is applied to the leaders of the people (s. S. 14 9 Zech. 10 3; cp Jer. 51 40 || אֵילִים), and Ezekiel (Ezek. 37 17) contrasts the weak flock (the poor people) with their leaders, the rams and he-goats (the rich and powerful; cp Dan. 8 5). It is plain that there is no real affinity between this passage and Mt. 25 32 f. where the blessed are separated from the cursed 'as the shepherd divides the sheep from the kids' (ἐρίφια; RV^m kids). This language does not imply that kids are either less valuable or (see Post in Hastings' DB, 2 195 b) less mild and tractable than sheep.³ On the passage as a whole see SHEEP.

Herds of goats were a valuable possession in more ways than one (cp Prov. 27 26, and see CATTLE, § 8).

Their hair was woven (√m) by the women into curtains, tent coverings, etc. (Ex. 35 26 Nu. 31 20 etc., see TENT, § 3), and Paul's native country Cilicia, in particular, exported goats' hair for this purpose (see CILICIA, § 3). The skins might be used to cover the body (see below, and cp DRESS, § 8; Heb. 11 37 ἐν αἰγέλοις δέρμασιν), though, in later times, this would rather be the garb of an ascetic. More commonly they were used for bottles.⁴ Goats' flesh was, of course, eaten (see FOOD, § 15), and goats' milk (מִלְכַּבְּ הַיָּעָלִים Prov. 27 27) formed one of the main articles of diet (see MILK). Hence a gift or present frequently takes the form of a goat or kid (Judg. 15 1 s. S. 10 1 Gen. 38 17 Tob. 2 12), and, as at the present day, it is dressed and prepared for the guest by every generous host (Judg. 6 18 f. 13 15, cp Lk. 15 29).

The goat was one of the commonest sacrificial victims (Lev. 3 12 Gen. 15 9), and most frequently comes in

5. Religion, connection with the priestly ritual of the sin-offering. It was the animal selected on the great DAY OF ATONEMENT to bear away the sins of the people to AZAZEL. Cp SACRIFICE.

The following terms are found: עֵז (Nu. 15 27), שְׁעִיר עֵזִים (Nu. 15 27), שְׁעִיר Lev. 4 24, שְׁעִירֵי לֶחֶם Lev. 16 5 f., Nu. 7 16, fem. שְׁעִירָה Lev. 5 6, חֲתַמְתָּר שְׁעִירֵיִן Lev. 9 15 2 Ch. 29 23. Similarly in the Carthaginian ritual the עֵז and עֵזִים were used as offerings; cp CIS I. no. 165, ll. 79.

The so-called Satyrs (see SATYR) must also be referred to in passing. If we may conjecture that there were ancient Hebrew rites wherein worshippers appeared in goat-skins (see DRESS, § 8, ISAAC, § 4; and WRS Rel. Sem.(²), 467) the origin of these jinn-like objects of veneration becomes more obvious. It may well be that at some early period the goat was regarded in Canaan as a sacred animal (cp GAZELLE, HART). It was so venerated by certain communities in Egypt,¹ and to some extent among the Greeks.² We know, too, that it filled a prominent place in Babylonian astronomy.³

¹ תְּכֵלֵם denotes the fold of the goats (Ps. 50 9) as well as that of the sheep.

² The 'flocks of kids' (עֵזִים קַמְשֵׁיִם) in 1 K. 20 27 is a precarious rendering derived from ⚓ (ποιμνία αἰγῶν). Klostermann reads עֵזִים בְּקַמְשֵׁיִם (קַמְשֵׁיִם), 'on the bare height, after the manner of kids.'

GOATH, or better (RV) GOAH (גֹּאֵה), 'to Goah', one of the land-marks of the restored Jerusalem (Jer. 31.39†). Read גֹּאֵה הַיְּבֵל, 'to the Hill'—i.e., probably 'to the Hill of God,' the Mt. of Olives (see Is. 10.32, as emended under NOB). Grätz (MGH¹), 1883, p. 343 thinks of Gibeah of Saul; but that is too far off. In v. 38 the new wall is traced from the Tower of Hananeel on the NE. to the corner-gate on the NW.; in v. 39 from the NW. back to the NE. on the S. side, passing by GAREB (ii) (between the ravine of Hinnoom and the Valley of Rephaim) to the Mount of Olives.

Pesh. evidently read גֹּאֵה; cp גֹּאֵה גֹּאֵה, cod. 36 (Field). ḤḤAQ's rendering (καὶ περικυκλωθήσεται κύκλῳ ἐξ ἐκλεκτῶν λίθων) represents the last clause (גֹּאֵה גֹּאֵה), and seems to be a paraphrase of a reading גֹּאֵה (cp גֹּאֵה Syr.-Hex.) from גֹּאֵה (Aq.).

GOB (גֹּב, גֹּב—i.e., 'a cistern,' Ges.), if the reading be correct, is the name of the place where David's warriors had two encounters with the Philistines (see DAVID, § 7; ELHANAN, § 1), 2 S. 21.18 f.† In the || passage (1 Ch. 20.4 f.) the place is mentioned only once (v. 4), and is given as Gezer (so in 2 S.; Then., Ew., with Jos. Ant. vii. 122) which is plainly a corruption of גֹּב=גֹּב. The commentaries are just here very meagre; but we can hardly doubt that the true reading in 2 S. is either גֹּב, 'Gath' (so Grove, Grätz, Klo.), or (more probably) גֹּבֹת, REHOBOTH (q.v.). For the restoration of Gob in 2 S. 21.16 (We. and others) see ISHBI-BENOB.

All the three encounters mentioned in 2 S. 21.18-21 presumably occurred in the same neighbourhood; Ḥ in v. 18, and MT and Ḥ together in v. 20, besides the reference in v. 22 (?), support 'Gath.' Ges. naively remarks (Thes., s.v., גֹּב) that 'Gob' being little known, Ḥ substituted other names. The truth is that, though there probably in Talmudic times was a place called גֹּב, Kōb (now el-Kubāb, Bæd.⁽³⁾ 15),⁴ there never was any named 'Gob.' Either 'Gob' is a fusion of 'Gath' and 'Nob,' or it is a corruption of Rehoboth. The latter view seems preferable. The γαζεθ of Ḥ in v. 18 is a fusion of 'Gezer' (γαζεθ), and 'Gath' (γελθ). (Some Heb. MSS have גֹּב; so also the Soncino Bible [1488], etc.; v. 18, γωβ [Compl.]; γαζεθ [HP 246]; γαρζεθ [id. xi. 29 236, 242 etc.]; γελ [BA]; γαζεθ [L]; v. 19, γωβ [A], ροβ [B], ροβ [L]; Compl. nisi ωβ; cp HP). GOEL (גֹּאֵל). The idea expressed by the verb גֹּאֵל, gā'al, is to resume a claim or right, which has lapsed or been forfeited, to reclaim, re-vindicate, redeem, redimo (to 'buy back'); it is thus used in Lev. 25.25 ff. of the redemption of a field or house after it has been sold, in 25.47 ff. of the redemption of an Israelite who, through poverty, has been obliged to sell himself as a slave to a resident foreigner, and in 27.13 15 etc., of the redemption of something which has been vowed to Yahwè; in the first two of these connections, the subst. גֹּאֵל, gē'ullāh, is used similarly, 25.24 26 48 etc. In practice, however, a man was seldom able himself to 'redeem' a right which had lapsed, and thus, by ancient custom, the right (and the duty) of doing so devolved upon his family (cp 25.48 f.), and, in particular, upon that member of his family who was most nearly related to him. The consequence was that the term gō'el, properly redeemer, came to denote a man's kinsman, and especially his next-of-kin (Ḥ ἀγγιστεύς, ἀγγιστευτής, ὁ ἀγγιστεύων); see Lev. 25.25 Nu. 58 Ruth 2.20 3.9 12 4.1 3.6 8.14 1 K. 16.11 (Ḥ^{ml} om.), where it is rendered so (or similarly) in AV, RV (cp Ruth 3.13, where the verb 'to redeem' is rendered four times perform or do the part of a kinsman). What has been said is well illustrated by Jer. 32.7-9, where, Jeremiah's cousin Hanameel wishing to sell some property, the prophet is represented as possessing the right of redemption, which he proceeds to exercise; and by Ruth 3, where, when Naomi had determined to sell her husband's estate in Bethlehem, her nearest of kin, who has the right to redeem it (Ḥ ἀγγιστεία), expresses himself unable to do so, and the right devolves upon Boaz, her next nearest kinsman, who accordingly purchases the estate, and takes with it Ruth, Naomi's daughter-in-law, as his wife (3.12 4.4-10).

Ḥ^{ml}, gā'al, to be carefully distinguished from the late verb גִּלַּג, gē'el, 'to defile,' occurs chiefly in the later literature, though the antiquity of the ideas and usages of which it is the expression is sufficiently attested by 2 S. 14.11 1 K. 16.11. In the derived meaning 'to act as kinsman' (2 S. 14.11 1 K. 16.11, and esp. Ruth, and the legal codes of DHP) it is generally rendered by ἀγγιστεύω (-τευτής, etc.), whereas the other meanings 'to redeem, redemption, etc.' are expressed by λύματα (Gen. 48.16 and often [not always] in Is. 40.66), or, more frequently, by λυτρούμαι (λύτρωσις, etc.). On the use of גִּלַּג in the metaphorical sense of 'redemption' from trouble, exile, death, etc., see BDB s.v. no. 3 (p. 145); in Job 19.25 גִּלַּג, 'my vindicator' (RVmg.) is the vindicator of my innocence, whether (Di., Bu.) as against false accusations, or (Hi., Del., Che. Job and Sol. 288, Du.) as against an unjust death (see 2); on the distinction from גִּלַּג see Dr. on Dt. 7.8.

The principle of which these usages are the expression is the desire to keep the property—or, to speak more generally, the rights—of the family, intact; 2. The and the gō'el had-dām (גֹּאֵל דָּמַי), or 'avenger of blood,' of blood, is just the embodiment of a parallel application of the same principle. The gō'el had-dām is the man who vindicates the rights of one whose blood has been unjustly shed; by primitive usage the duty of doing this devolves upon the members of the family, or clan (as the case may be), of the murdered man (cp 2 S. 14.7: 'the whole family is risen against his handmaid, and they said, Deliver him that smote his brother,' etc.); and any one of them (as now in Arabia) may find himself called upon to discharge it; but naturally the responsibility is felt most strongly by the more immediate relatives, and one of these is the 'avenger of blood,' kar' ekoqhv.

The character is one that figures in many primitive or semi-primitive societies. In a completely civilised society the right of punishment for murder, or for other crimes, is assumed by the state: for the revenge which might be inflicted in haste or passion (Dt. 19.6) by one prompted by personal feeling, is substituted the judgment of a cool and impartial tribunal. In a primitive community, however, the case is different; what the manslayer has there to fear is not public prosecution, but the personal vengeance of the relatives of the slain man. Hebrew law is an intermediate stage. Already in the Book of the Covenant (Ex. 21.12-14) there is drawn the distinction (which is not yet found in Homer) between intentional and unintentional homicide, and the importance of the distinction is insisted on in all the Codes (Dt. 19.1-13 Nu. 35.9-34), where provisions are laid down to prevent homicide, as distinguished from murder, being visited by death. The gō'el, however, not the state, still executes justice on the murderer (2 S. 14.7 11 Dt. 19.12; and, in P, Nu. 35.19 21 27): on the other hand, his authority is limited: the altar of Yahwè in Ex., and the 'cities of refuge' in Dt. and P, are appointed as places at which the homicide may be secure from the vengeance of the gō'el; restrictions are placed in the way of his acting hastily or in passion (Dt. 19.3 6); according to Josh. 20.4 f. (D₂) the manslayer is to state his case before the elders of the city of refuge, and, if he has satisfied them (it is implied) of its truth, is to be taken under their protection; in Nu. 35.24 f. (P) the case between him and the avenger of blood is subject to the decision of the 'congregation'; and the murderer is to be put to death only on the evidence of more than one witness (Nu. 35³⁰; cp the general rule, Dt. 19¹⁵).

The practice of blood-revenge is widely diffused, especially among tribes in a relatively primitive stage of civilisation. It is essentially connected with the family, or clan; indeed, it is found only where a clan-system is fully developed and clan-sentiment strongly felt. Its aim is to maintain intact the honour and integrity of the clan; the feeling which prompts it is the esprit de corps of the clan. The duty is felt as a sacred one; in Australia, for example, for the nearest relative of a murdered man to refuse to avenge his death would be to repudiate a most sacred obligation, and at the same time to incur the taunts and derision of the entire clan. As has been said above, however, it is often a matter not simply between a particular relative of the murdered man and the murderer; the whole clan, on each side, is implicated, and a remorseless and protracted blood-feud between the two clans may be the consequence of a murder, until the penalty which custom demands has been exacted.

Wherever the practice of blood-revenge exists, the principle underlying it is the same; though naturally there are many differences in the details of its application, and many special usages and customs arise in connexion with it. The limits of the clan implicated vary,—sometimes it is the murderer's more immediate family, sometimes it includes his relations in a wider sense; in Arabia it is the group called the hany—i.e. the aggregate of kinsmen, living and moving from place to place together, and bearing the same name (WRS Kinship, 22-24, cp 36-39). Very often, again, a poivh or wergild is taken in compensation for a life (cp for instance Hom. Il. 18^{498 ff.}; Tac. Germ. 21; and, among the Saxons, Stubbs, Const. Hist. of Eng. 153 143 f. 157 161 f.); this was against Hebrew feeling, and is strictly prohibited—implicitly in Ex. 21¹² (JE) Lev. 24¹⁷ (H) and Dt. 19¹¹⁻¹³, explicitly in Nu. 35³¹⁻³³ (P).¹ Where a wergild is accepted, its amount varies amongst different peoples, and also in accordance with the rank, age, or sex of the murdered person. For other varieties of usage in connexion with the institution, it must suffice to refer to A. H. GOG and MAGOG. Magog (מָגוֹג; μαγωγ [BADEL]), in Gen. 10² = 1 Ch. 15 (μαρωα [A]), is a 'son' of Japhet. The name, which should be connected in some way with Gog, occurs also in Ezek. 396 (γγω [BQ], σε [A]), where Magog is spoken of as exposed to judgment (Gog, Meshech, and Tubal, v. 1), and in Ezek. 38² where we have 'Gog of the land of Magog,'² mentioned with Meshech and Tubal. Gog (גוֹג; γγω [BAQ])³ is to come from the remote part of the N. (38¹⁵ 39²). Meshech and Tubal (see TUBAL), as well as Gomer (386), also point northward. The order of the names would place Magog between Cappadocia and Media,—i.e., in Armenia, or some part of it.

The correctness of the Hebrew text has been doubted.⁴

¹ It was permitted only in the case of a man or woman being gored to death by an ox (Ex. 21^{28 ff.}).

³ ♂ has γγω also in Am. 7¹ (βρωχος ες γγω ὁ βασιλεύς), and in Nu. 24⁷ (see AGAC). [B* also has γγω for 'Og' in three places in Dt. (31 13 447). In Eccles. 48¹⁷ γγω [BC] (מים) may be a corruption of ἀγγών which appears in אֲגֹן.

Wi. connects Gog with the gentile name Gägaya, 'of the land of Gäg,' used in Am. Tab. 138 as a synonym for 'barbarian.' Others connect it with Ass. Gagu, ruler (hazān) of the land of Sahi, northward from Assyria, in the time of Asur-bāni-pal (Schr. KGF 159; KB 2 180 f.; Del. Par. 247; Tiele, Gesch. 362); less probably with Gyges, king of Lydia (Ass. Gugru), a contemporary of Asur-bāni-pal (E. Meyer, GA 1 558). The traditional identification with the Scythians (Jos., Jer.) is plausible, but without definite evidence (see further Dt. on Gen. 10², Lenorm. l.c.).

GOLAN (גֹּלָן; τὴν γαλαων [BAFL], in Ch. Γωλλαν), a town in Bashan in the territory of the half-tribe of Manasseh, only mentioned in Dt. 44³ Josh. 20⁸ (גֹּלָן Kt.; τὴν Γωλλαν [AL]) as a city of refuge, and in Josh. 21²⁷ (גֹּלָן Kt.; τὴν Γωλλαν [AL]) = 1 Ch. 6⁷¹ [56] (τὴν Γωλλαν [B]), as a Levitical city.

The site is uncertain. Golan was known to Josephus as γαυλάνη (Ant. xiii. 153; BJ i. 448); and Eusebius (OS 242) describes it as a 'large village in Batanaea' which gave its name to the surrounding district, Gaulanitis (cp Schürer, GI 1 226 354). Gaulanitis is frequently mentioned in Josephus (e.g., Ant. xvii. 81 xviii. 46) as part of the tetrarchy of Philip. The ancient name is still heard in the modern Jaulān—the name of an administrative district, bounded on the W. by the Jordan and the Sea of Galilee, on the S. by the Yarmūk or Sheri'at el-Menādīreh, on the E. by the Nahr el-'Allān, and on the N. by the declivities of Hermon and the Wādy el-'Ajām. Schumacher (Across the Jordan, 92) thinks that Golan may have been on the site of the present large village, Saḥem el-Jaulān, on the W. of Ḥaurān, 17 m. E. of the Sea of Galilee; the ruins here are extensive, and there is a tradition current among the inhabitants that the place had long ago been the 'capital of Jaulān,' and the seat of government. It is true, Saḥem el-Jaulān is about a mile to the E. of the present border of Jaulān; but we do not know that the ancient Gaulanitis was exactly co-extensive with the Jaulān of to-day. The grounds of the identification are, however, not such as to be conclusive.

The modern Jaulān in its western part (between the Jordan and the Rukkād) consists of a plateau rising gradually from a height of about 1000 feet above the sea in the S. to upwards of 3000 feet above it in the N. The whole region is volcanic; and the country is studded with the conical peaks of extinct volcanoes. The N. and middle tracts of this part of Jaulān are stony and wild, abounding in masses of lava which have been emitted from the volcanoes. The soil is of little use agriculturally; but it is valuable as pasture; wherever between the hard basaltic blocks there is a spot of earth, the most luxuriant grass springs up in winter and spring, affording fodder for the cattle of the Bedouin. Parts of the country are well covered with oaks and other trees; and there are indications that it was once even better wooded than it is now. The plateau is intersected by deep wādys, mostly running in a SW. direction into the Sea of Galilee. The SW. part of this plateau, in the angle formed by the Yarmūk and the Sea of Galilee is, on the other hand, stoneless; the lava-rock surface gradually disappears and in its place is a rich dark brown lava soil, such as prevails in Ḥaurān, of extreme fertility, on which wheat and barley flourish in large quantities. Timber is less abundant here than it is farther north. Eastern Jaulān (between the Rukkād and the 'Allān) is, in the N., covered with a number of volcanic mounds, so that the soil here scarcely repays cultivation; in the S., though the country is still basaltic, the land is richer and less stony, and it is accordingly more cultivated. Extensive ruins have been discovered in different parts of Jaulän, dating from Roman times and onwards, which show that it must once have been the home of a thriving population.

In 39¹ a similar emendation is required. מִנּוּן, in 38 and 39, should always be מִנְדוּן. In 39¹ וְאֵת־כִּלְיֵה־הַמְּגוֹן is a mere expansion of a miswritten מִנְדוּן. In 39¹¹ וְהַמְּגוֹן מִנּוּן, and in 39¹⁶ הַמְּגוֹן עַיִר may come from the Hebrew מִנְדוּן—i.e. Harmigdon. We now perhaps see from which source the Apocalypticist drew the name ARMAGEDDON [ג.ש.], and also where Armageddon was (see Ezek. 39¹¹). T. E. C.]

Jaulän has been described very fully, with maps, sketches, and particulars respecting ruined sites, etc., by G. Schumacher in The Jaulän and Across the Jordan, 1-20, 41-102 (the two last named passages dealing with Eastern Jaulän, between the Rukhäd and the 'Allän). S. R. D.

GOLATH-MAIM. Golath-maim or Gullath-maim, as also Golath (Gullath)-illith and Golath (Gullath)-tahthith (Josh. 15 19, ג' תַּחְתִּיתוֹת, ג' עֲלִיּוֹת, גִּלְתָּ מַיִם; Judg. 1 15 ג' עֲלִיּוֹת, ג' תַּחְתִּיתוֹת, ג' מַיִם; EV 'springs of water,' 'the upper springs,' 'the lower springs') are, according to Moore and Budde, proper names. See, however, KEILAH.

GOLD. The importance of gold in Semitic antiquity is suggested by the number of words for gold in OT Hebrew compared with biblical Greek. χρυσός and χρυσίον (the latter also = wrought gold [1 Pet. 3 3] and gold coin) are the only Greek words. Hence in Is. 13 12 Job 31 24 and Prov. 25 12, where a second word is wanted, ⚡ has to represent בתם by λίθος, λίθος πολυτελής, and σάρδιον πολυτελής. See also (d). The Hebrew terms are:

(a) זָהָב, zahab, Aram. דְּהָב, Ar. dhabab, perhaps 'the sparkling'; צָהָב. Note the phrases זָהָב מְנֻבָּן, 'refined gold' (1 K. 10 18), for which 2 Ch. 9 17 has זָהָב טָהוֹר, 'pure gold' (⚡ in each case χρυσίον δοκίμην; but Pesh. reads מְנֻבָּן 'gold from Ophir'), and זָהָב וְשֹׁהַב (χρυσά ἐλάτᾱ), 'beaten gold,' 1 K. 10 16 f. 2 Ch. 9 15 f. See also ὙΡΗΑΣ.

(b) הָרָיִם, hārāyis, Ass. hārāyis, Phoen. ἠρῖϋ (whence χρυσός, χρυσίον); in Hebrew, mostly poetical (Zech. 9 3 Ps. 68 13 [14] Prov. 3 14 8 10 19 16 10). We find it twice, however, in prose, according to necessary emendations of Gen. 2 11 f. and 23 15. Gen. 2 11 f. should run, '... the whole land of Havilah, where there is the hārāyis-gold, where there is the hipindu-stone, and the shoham' (malachite?); see OPHIR, § 1; ΟΝΥΧ; ΤΟΡΑΞ. The sudden transition to naive wording ('The gold of that land is good') conceals, in fact, a reference to a kind of gold designated hārāyis. In Gen. 23 16 hārāyis is concealed under assōdher (see KESITH). What, then, does hārāyis mean? Nöldeke (ZDMG, 1886, p. 728) and König (2 a 137) advocate the explanation 'yellowish'; so BDB, Ges.-Buhl. See Ps. 68 13 [14], כִּירְקֹק חֲרִיר, 'with yellowish [or, greenish] gold,' and cp BDB, s.v. יָדָה. Ps. 68 13 [14], however, is corrupt (read 'with the glory of gold'). חֲרִיר, hārāyis, possibly described gold in one of the stages of its production. 'The hard stone [quartz] was first made brittle by the action of fire, then hoed out with iron picks' (λατομικὰν σιδηρὰ καταπονοῖσι... ἡτυπιοῖ σιδηραῖς τῆν μαρμαρίζουσαν πέτραν κάπτουσι, Diod. Sic., 3 12).

(c) קֶתֶם, kéthem, possibly from כָּתַם, 'to cover' (so Ass., Ar.); same word in Sah; in Hebrew only, or mostly, poetical (Is. 33 12 Job 28 16 19 31 24 Prov. 25 12 [and perhaps Prov. 25 11, by emendation, see BASKETS, n. 1] Lam. 4 1 Dan. 10 5, but not Ps. 45 9 [10] Cant. 5 11, where the text is corrupt). One of the kinds of gold specified in Egyptian records [New Empire] is 'the good gold of Katm' (Erman). W. M. Müller gives the forms Kā-ti-ma and, more common, Ktmt (As. u. Eur. 76). Possibly קֶתֶם, kéthem (Kathim), also is the name of a gold-producing place, like Ophir; in Is. 13 12, as Duhm has seen, אופיר, ophir, is a gloss on קֶתֶם. Perhaps in Gen. 10 30 סְפֵרָה הַקָּדִים should be read קֶתֶם הַרְרִי, 'to Sophir' (i.e., OPHIR, q-w), to the mountains of Kethem.' Tg. recognises, at any rate, a special kind of gold.

(d) פָּז (Talm. פִּזְיָא; Tg. פִּזְיָא), faz, 'refined gold,' probably = פָּזָה (see above, a). Ps. 19 10 [11] 21 3 [4] Prov. 8 19, λίθος τιμιον; Ps. 119 127, τσαζιου; (see ΤΟΡΑΞ); Job 28 17 Cant. 5 15 [σκαυη, βάσευς], χρυσά[ς]; Is. 13 12 Lam. 4 2, χρυσίον; Cant. 5 11, και φας [BA], κεφα[ς] [N].

(e) אופיר, 'Ophir,' also could be used poetically for אופיר 'Ophir-gold' (Job 22 24 σσφερα, also Ps. 45 9 [10]: read [קֶתֶם]).²

(f) Similarly סֶגְדֹר, sēghōr (συνκλεισμός), or סֶגְדֹר (Hoffm.,

² Vg.'s renderings are peculiar. אופיר becomes (Job 28 16) inctis India coloribus (cp in colore, Jer., for ככתם, Dan. 10 5); Is. 13 12, mundo obrizo, where obrizo = Ophir = Ophir gold.

Bu., Duhm) is perhaps used for זָהָב קָטָן, Job 28 15, lit. 'gold closed up.' See the Comm. on 1 K. 6 20. Tg. זָהָב ס' ; Vg. aurum obrizum. Most probably = Ass. hūrāyis sakru, 'massive or solid gold' (Del. Ass. HWB 499 ḏ). It seems that we should read זָהָב 'gold' for אֲשֶׁר (EV 'gifts') in Ps. 72 10, and זָהָב for תַּהָרָה (EV 'a round goblet') in Cant. 7 3 [2] (QCR 11 404 [199]).

To these we must not add the phrase זָהָב טָהוֹר, Cant. 5 11, EV 'the most fine gold' (the bridegroom's hair), the text being corrupt.³

Besides the above there are other terms (Latin, etc.) of strange aspect, which may claim to be mentioned.

1. Does the phrase χρυσός ἀπυρος mean Ophir-gold? or gold-dust (Ass. epru, [a] masses of earth, [β] dust)? Scarcely; against the latter view see Wi. AT Unters. 146, n. 2. Nor is there much to be said for Sprenger's conjecture (Alle Geogr. von Arab. 56 f.) that both Ophir and ἀπυρος describe the reddish colour of the best kind of gold (Ophir, therefore, not originally a place-name).

2. ὀβρυσον, Lat. obrusa, no doubt means the test of fire applied to gold in a cupel; the gold which has passed this test is called aurum obrizum; cp Arah. ibrizūn, whence abrāza, cepit aurum purum. But what is the origin of ὀβρυσον?

At any rate, the words just mentioned have a real right to be. That is more than we can say of the Heb. זָהָב, beser, however, commonly explained as 'gold-ore.'³ It is suspicious, that זָהָב, 'ore,' was altogether unknown to the ancients. There is only one passage in which almost all moderns have found it, and only one more in which one or two have suspected its existence. In both passages the word taken to be זָהָב is surrounded by textual corruption, and there can hardly be a doubt that it is itself corrupt. The passages referred to are:

(a) Job 22 24 f. (עָרָף), AV 'gold'; RV 'thy treasure' [mg. Heb. 'ore']; AV בְּצַרְיָה, AV 'thy defence'; RV renders as gold. It is necessary here to give the context. Budde renders his somewhat emended text thus:—

'And (if thou) layest ore of gold in the dust,
And in the sand by the sea Ophir-gold,
So that the Almighty is thine ore of gold,
And his law is (as) silver unto thee.'

A reference to the Hebrew will show that l. 2 is in part happily emended. Still the gist of the passage seems to be misapprehended, and the כַּצֵּר of MT is not cleared up. Beer, too, while adopting Budde's reading in l. 2, confesses that the phraseology of v. 24 seems to him very strange. So also, however, is that of v. 25. Nor is Budde's emendation, 'his law,' תּוֹרָתוֹ for תּוֹרַתוֹ, plausible. Duhm hardly improves upon Budde. Probably we should read thus,—

And thou wilt heap up treasures as the dust,
And as the sand of the sea Ophir-gold,
And Shaddai will be thy diadem (נֹרָד),
And a crown of Ophir-gold (וכתר אופיר) unto thee.⁴

(β) Ps. 68 30 [31], מְתַרְפֵּס בְּיַד־כֶּתֶם, RV 'trampling under foot the pieces of silver.' For this Cheyne (Ps. 4) 393, doubtfully) and Nestle (JBL, '91, p. 151) have read 'כֶּתֶם כִּי' 'with (or for) pieces of silver ore'; but the extreme doubtfulness of כֶּתֶם in Joh makes it preferable to read 'בְּצֵר כִּי' 'with store of silver.' On the corrupt מְתַר see PΑTHROS. (Duhm is rather disappointing here.)

It does not, in fact, appear that the OT Hebrew has any expression for 'gold ore.' In the margin of Job 28 6 AV does indeed give 'gold ore.' However, this may only record the impression of the translators that זָהָב עֲפִירֹת would not be good Hebrew for 'dust of gold.' For the same reason probably RV gives in the margin 'and he winneth lumps of gold'; but the only safe rendering is that of Delitzsch, Dillmann, Hoffmann, 'and he hath gold-bearing earth.' Yet this cannot represent the poet's meaning. No miner is mentioned in the context, and, as Bateson Wright has seen, the parallelism requires עֲפִירֹתָ. Probably the verse should run thus,

Its stones are the place of silver,
Its clods are the mine of gold.⁵

Thus v. 6 corresponds (as it should) to v. 1. Cp SAPPHIRE.

¹ In Ezek. 27 15 אֲשֶׁר־כָּבֵד probably he סֶגְדֹרִי.
² Grätz (cp Bu.) would read כַּתָּר for כֶּתֶם; but the best reading seems to be כַּתָּרֵל, 'like Carmel' (see 7 6 [5], HAIR, 1). ⚡'s χρυσίον και φας in Cant. 5 11 represents בתם ופז (see ὙΡΗΑΣ). This became φσφας (Cod. 253 HP), φσφας (Cod. 300) = i.e., כֶּתֶם, אופיר (Lag. Mittheil. 281). Neither form of text, however, makes a good sense, and the connection of 5 11 a with 7 6 a b can scarcely be denied.
³ Abulwalid derives it from בְּצַר, 'to break off,' comparing Ar. ibrizūn (native gold, whether dust or nugget).
⁴ See Exph. T., 10 94 f. (Nov. '98).
⁵ קָטָן בְּפִי אֲמֹנֶה
לְזָהָב מוֹצֵא עֲפִירֹתָ.

The localities mentioned in the OT as sources of gold (Havilah, Ophir, Sheba) are all Arabian¹; Arabia was evidently the Eldorado of the Hebrews.

2. Sources

Now it is the gold of Ophir, now that of gold.

Sheba that rises before the mental eye; never, for some reason, that of Havilah. Midian, too, appears to have abounded in gold; the reference in Nu. 31 50-54 to the spoil of gold taken from the Midianites comes from a very late source (P), but reflects the traditional belief in the Midianitish gold; Gideon, too, is said in the legend to have won enormous spoil from the conquered Midianites (Judg. 8 24-27). According to Burton,² the 'land of Midian' was 'evidently worked, and in places well worked' in antiquity. There is just one allusion in the OT to the abundance of gold in Palestine in the pre-Israelitish period. Achan is said to have appropriated from the spoil of Jericho 200 shekels of silver and a 'tongue' of gold of 50 shekels weight (Josh. 7 21). One would like to know what the object called a 'tongue' really was. It was hardly a 'wedge' (Jos. Ant. 1. 5 10, māṣā; Vg. regula); both here and in Is. 13 12 ('golden wedge' for חתם) AV must be wrong; and even RV has been too conservative in its rendering of Josh. 1. c. Nor is there evidence for any object of use or ornament called from its shape a 'tongue' either in Hebrew or in Assyrian.³ It seems a reasonable, and it is certainly an easy, conjecture that חַשְׁמַל is a corruption of חַשְׁמַל, 'a cuirass' (see BREASTPLATE [1.]); the king of a city like Jericho may well have been supposed by the late Hebrew narrator to have possessed golden armour. Certainly the quantity of the precious metals demanded as tribute by Thotmes III. and Ram(ese)s III. could have been borne only by a very rich country (see Brugsch, Hist. of Egypt); the gold was no doubt brought to Palestine by trading caravans from Arabia. In the Israelitish period Solomon's golden shields were carried off to Egypt by Šošenḳ (Shishak). See 1 K. 14 25 f. Solomon's hunger for gold may indeed have been exaggerated by legend (cp Jos. Ant. viii. 7 3); but solid fact lies under the possible exaggeration (see OPHIR).

The Egyptians, however, were not confined to pillaging highly civilized Syria; they were in direct relations with gold-producing districts. At Hammāmāt (see Brugsch, Gesch. Aeg. 596) and at Gebel 'Allāki, near the country now occupied by the Ababdeh Arabs, and also at another place bearing the same name nearer the Red Sea, there were important gold-mines. An interesting account of the mines is given in Egyptian records (RP 875 f.; Brugsch, op. cit. 530; Erman, Anc. Eg. 463), and the 'earliest known map,' now in the Turin museum, represents the second of these mining districts, which was visited by Theodore Bent.⁴ The precious metal was for the most part found in veins of quartz (according to Hoffmann, the חַשְׁמַל of Job 28 9), and Diodorus (3 12) gives a description of the processes employed which throws light on some of the Hebrew terms and phrases relative to gold in the OT. First of all the hard stone was made brittle by fire; then it was broken up into small pieces which were ground to powder between two flat granite millstones. This powder was washed on inclined tables furnished with one or more cisterns, so that all the earthy matter might be separated [cp Job 28 1, חַשְׁמַל, 'where they

² The Land of Midian Revisited (79), 1 329. Burton's object was 'to ascertain the depth from W. to E. of the quartz-formation which had been worked by the ancients.' His exploration was stopped by the Bedouin.

³ Benzinger (HA, 190, n. 2) dismisses the rendering 'bar,' and supposes some tongue-shaped object to be meant. We can hardly acquiesce in this.

cleanse it'], flowing down the incline with the water. The particles of gold were then collected, and, together with a certain amount of lead, salt, etc., kept for five days and nights in closed earthen crucibles. By exposure to the heat they were formed into ingots which, having been extracted, were weighed and laid by for use. (On this description cp Bent, Through Mashonaland, 184; Southern Arabia, 325.) The commonest objects produced were rings (RP 2 26; Erman, 464), or 'thin bent strips of metal' (Maspero, Dawn of Civ., 324) which were used as a basis of exchange. As distinguished from gold rings, the gold imported by Ha't-sepsut from the land of Punt is called 'green' or 'fresh'; probably it was in ingots.¹ At a later time six kinds of gold are specified,—'mountain gold, good gold, gold of twice, gold of thrice, gold of the weight, and the good gold of Katm' (cp § 1 [c]). The wealth of Ram(ese)s III. (the Rampsinitus of Herodotus) must, to judge from the temple inscriptions, have been enormous. 'Gold in grains, in bags filled to the weight of 1000 pounds, from the mines of Amamu in the land of Kush, from Edfu, from Embos, and from Koptos, bars of silver, pyramids of blue and green stones,' etc. (Brugsch, Gesch. 596).

Gold (hurasu) was in equal request in Babylonia and Assyria, though AV's rendering in Is. 14 4 'golden city' (מְרִקְיָה) is as impossible as the reading which it represents. Gudea (the very ancient patesi of Lagaš) speaks (KB 3 a 37) of having received gold dust from Miluḫḫa (i. e., the Sinaitic peninsula). Nothing is said of gold coming from Miluḫḫa elsewhere; probably, however, it was not dug up in Sinai, but brought from Egypt.² The greater part of the Babylonian gold doubtless came from Arabia; but gold entered into the tribute of all the richer conquered peoples; Hezekiah, for instance, paid thirty talents of gold (2 K. 18 14; KAT⁽²⁾ 293).

That the art of the Goldsmith (חַשְׁמַל, Neh. 38 [BNA^{om.}] ΠΥΡΩΤΗΣ [L] 31 [C] transliterates),³² χαλκουργος [BNA cp Is. 41 7], χαλκογυρρος [L], Is. 40 19 466 Jer. 10 9 14 51 17 [AV in Jer. 'founder'], χργκογοος) was carried to as great a perfection in Nineveh and Babylon as in Egypt does not appear. Merodach-Baladan, the adversary of Sargon, had a canopy, a sceptre, and a bed of gold (Sarg. Ann. 339; cp Del. HWB 27), and gold was much used in architectural decoration. Still there was a Babylonian guild of goldsmiths whose patron was the god Ea. It may be noted here that in Gen. 4 20 ff. no mention is made of a founder of the goldsmith's art. Yet there must have been goldsmiths at Jerusalem, though a doubt exists whether 'goldsmiths' in Neh. 3 32 should not rather be 'money-changers' (Perles, Anal. 78). See METALS, and cp HANDICRAFTS.

For the Golden Calf, see CALF, GOLDEN.

The investigation of the sources of the gold elsewhere than in Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia, and Palestine does not concern us here. The accounts which Herodotus, Arrian, and Diodorus give of the treasures of the great cities of Asia show that gold-mines in widely separated regions were well-worked (see Smith's Dict. Class. Ant., s. v. 'Aurum'; G. F. Hill, Handbook of Greek and Roman Coins, 18-20). T. K. C.

GOLGOTHA (ΓΟΛΓΟΘΑ [Ti. WH]; Syr. ܩܘܠܓܘܬܗ), Mt. 27 33 Mk. 15 22 (ΓΟΛΓΟΘΑΝ [NB, etc.]) Jn. 19 17†. The name of a place outside of Jeru-

The Aramaic form of the name (st. emph. ܩܘܠܓܘܬܗ from ܩܘܠܓܘܬܗ; see Onk. Tg. on Ex. 16 16) corresponds to the Hebrew חַשְׁמַל, gulgoleth. In the Greek transliteration (except in Δ) the second γ of the original word has been dropped in order to facilitate pronunciation (cp Ar. jalgatun, and see Zahn, NT Einl. 120). Mt., Mk., and Jn. give its interpretation as $\kappa\rho\alpha\nu\acute{\iota}\omicron\nu$ τόπος, the place of a skull; Lk. gives the Greek name only—'to the place called Kranion' (23 33, ἐπὶ τὸν τόπον τὸν καλούμενον κρᾶνιον), RV 'The skull'—or, as it is rendered in AV and RVmg. after the Vg. (Calvaria), 'Calvary.' Eusebius mentions it as γ . κρᾶνιον (OS, 175 r1), γ . κρᾶνιον (189 r 202 63), and γ . κρᾶνιον τόπος (248 21); Jerome gives Golgotha calvaria (OS, 61 22) and G. locus Calvarie (130 25).

According to Jerome (Comment. ad Ephes. 5 14; Epist. 46), and Basil (in Canesii Thes. 1245) there was a tradition that the skull (whence the name) of Adam was preserved in this place; Epiphanius (contr. Har. 146), Ambrose (Epist. 71), and others speak of his burial at Golgotha (see Guthe, 'Grab [das heilige]' in PKL:⁽⁸⁾). Such a tradition only needs to be mentioned. The two explanations that have found most support are—(1) that it was so called because the place abounded in skulls (so Jer. Comm. ad Mt. 27 33; cp Jeremy Taylor's description 'Calvary . . . hill of death and dead bones, polluted and impure . . .'); (2) because for one or more reasons it resembled a skull (so Renan, Vie de Jésus, 429; Brandt, Die Evang. Gesch. 168; Meyer, Comm. on Mt. 486 f. [198], who compares the German use of 'Kopf', 'Scheitel', and 'Stirn').¹ To the former explanation serious objections have been raised (see Keim, Jesu von Naz. 3405). The latter suggestion is, therefore, preferred by most scholars.

Several examples occur in the OT of names suggested by the configuration of the ground (see NAMES, § 99). The existence of a small village situated on a hill-top in the neighbourhood of Tyre called el-Jameijniet ('the little skulls'; BR 3 56 58, PEFL 194) makes it probable that a similar name was in ancient times applied to any knoll which was thought to resemble a skull.

Whatever be the explanation of the name, the place intended must have been outside the city wall (so Jn.

2. Site. 19 20, 'nigh to the city' [cp Mt. 23 11 Heb. 13 12], and Jn. 19 41, 'near a tomb,' new tombs would be outside the city). Further, it was a prominent position (Mk. 15 40 Lk. 23 49) and near a road (Mt. 27 39 Mk. 15 29). These data, however, suit several positions.

The traditional site, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, has lately been proved to lie beyond the second wall (see JERUSALEM, § 32, ii.) which was the outside wall at the date of the Crucifixion; and several rock tombs have been found about it. It was near a road. It therefore may have been the site. The tradition in its favour, however, does not reach behind the fourth century; and the manner in which the site is said to have been indicated to the Emperor Constantine who removed a temple of Venus, that stood over the spot, and discovered the alleged tomb of Christ and therefore erected the Church of the Resurrection, does not prove that the sanctity of the place was anciently, or even at the time, publicly known (Eus. Vit. Const. 3 25). When we consider the extension of the city over the site, the operations in the siege of Titus, whose principal camps were on this N. side of the city, the devastation of Jerusalem under Hadrian, and the interval before the first attempts of Christians to identify the sites, we can see how precarious the tradition is. The one element of value in it is the statement of Eusebius that a temple of Venus had been erected on the site; if we may argue from the analogous case of the Temple site, on which a temple to Jove was raised, this temple of Venus is evidence that its site had been regarded by the Christians as sacred.²

That too, however, is precarious, and by no means strong enough to dispose of rival sites. Other sites for Golgotha have been suggested on several positions to the north of the city. One, first pointed out by Thenius in 1849, and adopted by General Gordon and Colonel Conder, has received recently a great deal of support. It is an eminence above the grotto of Jeremiah, outside the present wall not far from the Damascus gate. Besides suiting the general data of the gospels—it is near a road, stands high, and has tombs about it—its appearance agrees with Lk.'s rendering of the name; it has a strong resemblance to a skull; and there is a modern Jewish tradition that it was the place of stoning in ancient times. But neither are these things conclusive, and on the whole we must be content to believe that the scene of the greatest event in Jerusalem's history is still unknown. From this, of course, it also follows that the site of Stephen's martyrdom is uncertain.

² A résumé of the voluminous literature on the Holy Sepulchre and a discussion of the claims of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre to occupy the site of our Lord's tomb will be found in the article 'Sepulchre, the Holy,' by A. B. M'Grigor in the Ency. Brit.:⁽⁹⁾ This article notes that the existence in the rock on which the church is built of several ancient Jewish tombs may be used as an argument against the site, for Eusebius (Theophania, Lee's transl., p. 109) emphasises the fact that there was only one cave within it, but had there been many, the miracle of him who overthrew death should have been obscured.

GOLIATH (גִּלְיָתָא, Ginsb.; some editions גִּלְיָתָא [except in 1 Ch. 20 5], § 78; ΓΟΛΙΑΘ [BAL], also 1. Earlier story. ΓΟΛΙΑΔ [B]; in Pss. ΓΟΛΙΑΔ [BNR], ΓΟΛΙΑΘ [AT], ΓΟΛΙΑΘΟΣ [Jos.].

For the ending see ΔΗΥΖΑΤΗ. G-ly is probably a corruption of g-z-l.¹ Goliath is a pale reflection of those so-called 'throne-hearers (guzali) who ran over hill and dale at the Deluge (Bab. legend, l. 100), and who are rather—the Anunnaki, those 'ravaging' (גל) evil spirits whom Rammān, Nebo, etc., let loose at the Deluge; Jastrow (Rel. of Bab. and Ass. 500) renders guzali in the Deluge-story 'the destroyers.' It is a title which belongs only to divine beings (see Muss-Arnolt and cp Jensen, Kosm. 389); Achish is an analogous name, meaning 'one rushing forward' (from ASSYR. akāsu).

A Philistine giant, slain according to 1 S. 17 by David, but according to an older tradition (2 S. 21 19; in 2nd שׁוֹדוֹלִיָּא) by ELHANAN (g.v.). Some details—as for example that Goliath was of Gath, that he lived in the time of David, and that the staff of his spear was like a weaver's beam—are common to the two stories.

The older tradition adds, besides the real name of the slayer of the 'giant,' the statement (v. 22; cp 2nd) that Goliath, like his three fellows, was a descendant of the Rephaites (cp Josh. 11 22, where Anakim are said to have remained only in Philistia). It was, in fact, natural, so soon as the four tall Philistine champions had been magnified into giants, to account for their extraordinary stature by making them Rephaites. It is also noteworthy that in 2 S. 21 15-22 the Israelite warriors meet the gigantic Philistines or Rephaites without the least alarm, whereas in 1 S. 17 Goliath succeeds in paralysing the entire Israelite army.

It is certain, however, that this is not presented to us as the object of the giant's appearance. He is called

2. Later tradition. a champion (גִּבְרָתָא שִׁבְרָא, a man of the מִטְרָא אֶלְחִימוֹן; cp Jos. Ant. vi. 91, στὰς μετὰ τὸν παρατάξω), and in his speech he throws out a direct challenge to the warriors of Israel. The latter shrink back in cowardly dismay—an unaccountable falling back on the part of the comrades of Jonathan (cp 1 S. 14), which had to be asserted in order to make room for David. With fine poetic imaginativeness and (as we shall see) religious insight the conqueror provided for the giant in this later offshoot of tradition was no trained warrior (1 S. 16 18 belongs to the older story) but a shepherd boy.

In v. 56, indeed, he is called a 'stripling' (דָּלָה); but the same word is applied in 1 S. 20 22 to one who in v. 35 is described as a 'little boy' (or 'lad'), and the youthful age of David is sufficiently shown by the scorn expressed by Goliath at his yet unspooled complexion² (v. 42).

The young champion's plan was simple. He would have recourse to his sling—the weapon of the 'light-armed crowd' in the army of the Greeks before Troy.³

He would replenish his shepherd's scrip with some good smooth pebbles from the 'deep watercourse which like a ravine separates the armies' (see ELAN [ii.]). He would then trust to the keenness of his bright eyes and his lightness of foot. The winding up of the drama is described thus (v. 48). 'And it used to happen, when the Philistine set forward and came on to meet David, that David would haste and run to the battle array to meet the Philistine'—i.e., whenever Goliath tried to come to close quarters with David, David would run quickly to the front rank of the Israelites to meet his foe under this friendly cover, and when the giant halted for a moment David would run upon him from another side in order to aim at him before he could be protected by the great shield.⁴ At last David's opportunity came; Goliath's face was exposed. 'Then David put his hand in his bag, and took thence a stone, and slung it, and smote the Philistine in his forehead; and the stone sank into his forehead, and he fell upon his face to the earth' (v. 49). Though sorely wounded Goliath was not dead. So David 'ran and stood upon the Philistine,' triumphing over his foe, like Sanehat in a similar case in the old Egyptian story;¹ next he drew the giant's sword² from its sheath and cut off his head. Then the Philistines saw that the incredible had happened, and took to flight.

Why did the Philistines flee? Had they not still their well-appointed infantry and their war-chariots? Had they not still the memory of their former victories? A Greek poet would have said that a god impelled them behind with mighty hand, and struck terror into their souls; and indeed it was a religious dread that seized them. They were powerless to resist the fierce Israelites.³ Meantime, if the view suggested elsewhere (NOH) be correct, David took the head of the Philistine, and brought it to Saul; but he put his armour in the tent of Yahwê (v. 54).

must be a mistake (see JAVELIN, 5). The sword was afterwards given to David the fugitive by Ahimelech (1 S. 21 9 [20]; cp 22 10). The tradition said (apparently) that David had deposited it as hallowed spoil in the sanctuary of Nob (or Gibeon). The (reputed) weapons of ancient divine heroes have not infrequently been found in Babylonia,⁴ and a sword like that with which a mere shepherd boy had cut off a giant's head would have not less supernatural power than the fairy lance of Gilgameš. There may have been stories, in the fuller Odyssey of Hebrew tradition, in which this sword played a part. If so, it is obvious that they have been with good reason passed over.

The story of David, as edited in the Book of Samuel, is that of a man who fought the 'wars of Yahwê,' and was by his God delivered, and later ages clung with special affection to the story of Goliath, because of its latent religious significance (see Ecclus. 47 2-11, and cp title of Ps. 144 [148] in GENERT).⁵ From the first the idea that God alone gives strength to conquer must have been present to those who told this tale, and it is beyond reasonable doubt that a later writer of the post-Deuteronomic period inserted 1 S. 17 46 f., to bring the lesson of the tale into clearer view.⁶ It is only with an eye to this latent idea that the legend of Goliath can be retained by critically trained teachers and preachers. It has indeed been urged against this changed attitude that the story of Odysseus could be treated in the same way. So it could, provided that there was a genuine, however small, historical kernel in the story, and also that Odysseus held a prominent place in the period of preparation for the coming of Jesus Christ. Such was not the case; the story of Goliath may therefore remain unchanged in the repertory of the religious teacher. Nowhere else outside of the NT does the message of encouragement to the humble and exhortation to the weak in faith receive so affecting, so inspiring an expression. Such a message could not have been grafted even on the instructive life of David but for that process of idealisation, which is so characteristic of some Hebrew writers, but often so shocking to modern students.

² Robertson Smith and Klost. think there was a conflict of traditions, one stating that David (Saul's armour-bearer) drew his own sword to slay Goliath, the other that, having no sword, he used the giant's.

⁵ Τὸ Δαυὶδ, πρὸς τὸν Γολιάθ. On the title in Pesh. see STIPPAI. The Greek Psalter also rejoices in a Psalm of David ἐξέθεθεν τοῦ ἀριθμοῦ, composed ὅτε ἐμονομάχησε τῷ [πρὸς τὸν] Γολιάθ [-αθ] (cp v. 6 f.).

⁶ Verse 46 predicts the slaughter by David, but not only of Goliath, but also of the army of the Philistines; and announces as the consequence of this the universal recognition of the divinity of Yahwê (cp Ps. 18 47 [48] f. Is. 55 4; both passages late). In v. 47 the warriors of Israel are spoken of just as if they were an 'assembly' gathered together for religious instruction (2 Ch. 20 14-20 is closely parallel), and the lesson that Yahwê 'saveth not with sword and spear' is precisely that which was so dear to the psalmists of the Second Temple (Ps. 20 7 [8] 44 5 [6] f.). The second clause of v. 46 reminds us of Ps 79 2, while the phrase הַמַּלְחָמָה (הַמַּלְחָמָה) occurs elsewhere only in late writings (see Gen. 1 24 f. 30 9 2 10 Ezek. 29 5 32 4 34 28 Job 5 22 Ps. 79 2). So Che. Aids, 117; cp Bu. Ri. Sa. 214, who is more definite and satisfactory on this point than We. (Gesch. (4), 268; ET, 266).

GOPHER

The story of David and Goliath has taken the place of another narrative which described the call of the warrior David to the court, and his

5. MT and G. advancement in the army as the reward of his military talents (see DAVID, § 1). The narrative, however, whether we take the version given in MT or that in G, no longer preserves its original form. The former is too long, the latter too short. Robertson Smith, indeed (with whom F. H. Woods, Stud. Bibl. 129, agrees), is of opinion that G^B's text of 1 S. 17 1-18 5 should be followed. He thinks that whatever the Hebrew text has in addition has been interpolated from some lost history of David which gave quite a different turn to the story of Goliath (see OTJC² 120 ff. 431 ff.). When in 1892 Robertson Smith revised his fine volume of Lectures he had before him all the recent examinations of the Goliath-story which advocate a different view of G^B's text, and was not persuaded by the arguments of Wellhausen (who once held the same view as his own), Kamphausen, Stade, Budde, and Kittel. On the other hand, he has not himself persuaded Stade and Budde, who have expressed themselves anew since 1892, and the present writer, in view of the difficulties which beset Robertson Smith's and still more Klostermann's theory (cp Budde, Ri. Sa. 213 f.), sees no choice but to hold that if we put aside later insertions (such as v. 46 f., pointed out above), MT represents the one original story of David and Goliath. Some of Robertson Smith's observations are, indeed, not only acute but also correct; but the roughnesses in the text can be accounted for differently (see Che. Expos., '92 b, p. 156 f.; and cp Bu. SBOT; Kamphausen, 'Bemerkungen zur alttest. Textkritik,' in the Arbeiten d. Rhein. Wiss. Pred.-Vereins, 7 13 ff.). These differences among critics, however, are unimportant compared with the result on which there is no doubt whatever. The story of Goliath has poetical and religious truth, but not, except in a very minute kernel, the truth of history. Cp REHOBOOTH, TAMMUZ, GOPHER (גֹּפֶר) (גֹּפֶר, Gen. 6 14†), a very uncertain word, as it occurs only once and is unknown to the other Semitic dialects.

The ancient versions have various renderings; Θ ADEL $\epsilon\kappa$ ξύλων τετραγώνων ($\acute{\alpha}\sigma\eta\pi\tau\omega\nu$ and $\kappa\epsilon\delta\rho\iota\omega\nu$ being cited as alternatives of other interpreters), Vg. de lignis laevigatis, Pesh. 'of juniper wood,' and Targ. 'of cedar wood.'

1. Versions. Gopher is by some moderns taken to be the name of a tree; thus Celsius (1328*f.*) identifies it as the cypress, being misled by the likeness of names.¹ The word may be akin to גֹּפֶר 'bitumen'—itself according to Lag. (OS 295; but see BITUMEN) properly an Aramaic word, for which the Heb. equivalent is גֹּפֶר —and may also, according to the same scholar, be connected with גֹּפֶר , 'sulphur,' for which an Indo-European etymology is offered (see BRIMSTONE). The most plausible suggestion, therefore, is that of a fragrant resinous wood (so Di.); but the entire uncertainty of the word (see below) must be maintained with Lag. (Ucbvs. 218).

The ordinary philological means fail us in dealing with the word Gopher. It is natural therefore to have

2. Assyriology. recourse to Assyriology, which accounts (see DELUGE, § 13) for the mention of גֹּפֶר (EV 'pitch') in Gen. 614. Is it possible that גֹּפֶר , or some word which explains it, occurred in an early form of the Babylonian Deluge-story? If so, what can that word have been? Halévy and more recently Hommel (Hastings, DB 1214*b*) compare Bab.-Ass. gipāru; but this means 'reed,' 'canebrake' (Jensen, Kosmol. 170*f.*, 325*f.*; but not so Halévy), and would have been more suitable in a description of the 'ark' of Moses than in that of Noah. גֹּפֶר ('gopher-wood') should mean the timber of some tree used in shipbuilding when J₂'s Hebraised Babylonian authority (see DELUGE, § 10) took shape—most probably some kind of cedar.

The original Babylonian or Assyrian phrase probably ran—gušur (or gušūrē erini—i.e., beams of cedar; see the Ass. Lexx.). Overlooking (Išzeruni, the Hebrew translator mistook gušur for a tree-name, and so produced the phrase גֹּפֶר). Next, a scribe, who saw גֹּפֶר at the end of the verse, miswrote the second word גֹּפֶר (גֹּפֶר and גֹּפֶר confounded, as in גֹּפֶר Job 14.10 MT).

If this is correct, the timber used in the ark would be cedar-wood (erinu). Possibly, too, the substitution of 'box' (גֹּפֶר) for a 'ship' (elippu) arose from a confusion between erinu 'cedar' and erinnu (גֹּפֶר), 'box,' 'receptacle,' in the phrase gušur (gušūrē erini). GORGET (גֹּרְגֵת), 1 S. 176 AV^{mg}. See JAVELIN, 5.

GORGAS (ΓΟΡΓΑΣ [ANV], but ΚΟΡΓΙΑΣ A in 1 Macc. 45]), one of the Syrian generals sent by Lysias against Judas the Maccabee. It was his vain attempt to surprise Judas by a night attack that led to the great battle of EMMAUS [q.v., 1], in which the Syrian army was signally defeated (166-165 B.C.). After this, battle was offered to Gorgias, who declined it, and withdrew precipitately into Philistia (1 Macc. 41*f.*). About two years later, being governor of Idumæa, Gorgias was threatened by a small Jewish force under Joseph and Azarias at Jamnia, which he put to flight (1 Macc. 555*f.*). In the account of the first incident given in 2 Macc. 88*f.*, it is NICANOR [q.v., 1], not Gorgias, who is represented as being at the head of affairs; and in 2 Macc. 1232-37 the second incident, so unfortunate for the Jews, only receives passing notice (v. 34), whilst a fuller but somewhat confused account is given of the defeat and flight of Gorgias.

In 2 Macc. 1232 for 'Idumæa' (Ἰδουμαίας) we should probably, but not certainly, read 'Jamnia' (Ἰαμνιας), with Grotius (cp 1 Macc. 558 1540, and Jos. Ant. xii. 86), and in v. 36 for 'Esdris' we should perhaps read (with 44, 64, etc. of Θ) 'Gorgias' (see ESDRIS).

GORTYNA (ΓΟΡΤΥΝΑ [NV]- ΝΑΝ [A]; in classical writers ΓΟΡΤΥΝΑ or ΓΟΡΤΥΝ). The rival of Cnosus for supremacy in Crete (Strabo, 476, 478; Pol. 453*f.*). It lies in the fertile valley of the Lethæus, in the plain Messara, midway between the E. and W. extremities of the island. Its only biblical interest is connected with the presence of Jews (1 Macc. 1523) in the time of Ptolemy Physcon (139 B.C.). In that year, as a result of the successful embassy sent by Judas the Maccabee to Rome, the Senate dispatched a circular-letter in favour of the Jews to Gortyna, and to eighteen other autonomous cities and countries. We may perhaps connect their presence with the abortive attempt of Ptolemy Philopator to surround the extensive site of Gortyn with walls (222-205 B.C.).

The city was the Roman capital of the island. The site is now marked by the poor village of Agius Deka. Among its ruins are those of a church dedicated to Titus, the patron saint of Crete; it dates from the fourth or fifth century (cp Tit. 15). Gortyn lies ten or twelve miles from FAIR HAVENS (Strabo, 478), so that during the long delay there (Acts 279) it is possible that Paul visited the city. GOSHEN, but in Judith 19 AV GESEM (גֶּשֶׁם ; ΓΕΣΕΜ [B^{NA}L], ΓΕΣΕΝ [e.g., D, through later (Hexaplaric?)

1. Names and other data in OT. influence], rarely ΓΕΣΕΜ , ΓΕΣΣΕ etc.; Vg. Gessen, cp Jer. OS1254 Gesen [also Gesem, which agrees with Jer.'s etymology]), usually in the phrase 'the land of Goshen' (exc. Gen. 4628a 29), is in J and E the name of the part of Egypt inhabited by the b'ne Israel from Joseph to Moses. P uses instead the phrase 'land of Rameses,' Gen. 4711, and remarkably enough Θ in 4628 appends to καθ' ἡρώων πόλιν (= גֹּשֶׁן , 'to Goshen') the explanatory gloss εἰς γῆν ραμεσση . The two expressions are in Θ synonymous (see, however, JOSEPH ii., § 3). The problem is to determine the situation.

In 4634 Goshen is outside of Egypt and not inhabited by Egyptians; in v. 28 it is between Pharaoh's and Joseph's residence and Palestine; see also Ex. 1317 as to its situation on the frontier. It is (Gen. 476 11) 'the best of the land'—i.e., for a pastoral population; cp v. 6 (Pharaoh's cattle pasturing there). It must therefore have been unsuitable for agriculture—i.e., too far E. to be as regularly irrigated as most of Egypt. In Ex. 23*f.* a branch of the Nile flows through (?) it, and a royal residence is near or in it.

When we turn to Θ we get something more definite: 2. Greek district of 'Arabia.' In Gen. 4510 Goshen is called 'the land of Gesem of Arabia' (γῆ γέσεμ ἀραβίας). Unfortunately, 'Arabia' is ambiguous.

There was (1) a nome of Egypt called ἡ ἀραβία (in the Revenue Papyrus of Ptolemy II. always connected with the 'Bubastite nome'; see further Ptol. 4553; Strabo, 803; Pliny, 59), correctly identified by Brugsch with the 20th of Lower Egypt in the Egyptian lists;¹ but the Greeks (2) gave the name Arabia also to all the land E. of the Nile. The eastern part, indeed, was a distinct nome (see below) called Herōiopolis (possibly the Phagroriopolis² of Strabo [846] means 'Arabia'); but by the Greeks (3) the name Arabia was usually extended so as to include it and to reach to the Crocodile Lake (B. et-Timsāh).

The choice between the alternatives seems easy: Θ evidently means by Arabia a special district. It cannot well be the Arabian nome, however, as we should expect. On the contrary it must mean a more eastern part of the Arabian district; the Wādy et-Tumilāt and its western vicinity E. of Bubastus. This is the view of Gen. 4628*f.* (see begin. of art.), where Θ is still more definite. It takes Goshen to be a city, Herōiopolis (!). The discovery by Naville of this city = Tell el-Maskhūta = Pithom (= ETHAM [q.v.]), accordingly, has determined the centre of the region intended, and confirmed the general assumption of scholars. There is no evidence in the Egyptian inscriptions, however, that that region was ever called Goshen, a name which, as we shall now see, probably represents an Egyptian name for the western nome (next §, end).

GOSHEN

occupied by two Egyptian nomes, the western of which (the 20th, already referred to) was by the Greeks specifically called 'Arabia.' This was the earlier occupied. Its position is determined by the fact that it was called 'that of the god Sapd(u),'¹ whose chief temple² was in the city P-('house of')Sapd(u),³ a name which evidently has survived in the modern Saft (cp Brugsch, AZ 8116) el-Henneh, 5 or 6 m. E. of Bubastus. Naville⁴ has argued that this P-sapd(u) (Saft el-Henneh), another name for which may have been P-kos(?), is the Φακουσα, Phacusi(m), of the Tab. Peut., the Phaguse of Geogr. Rav., the 'village between Egypt and the Red Sea' of Steph. Byz., because Φακουσσα is called by Ptolemy (iv. 553) the capital of the Arabian nome, and Strabo states that at Φακουσσα the canal to the Red Sea branched off from the Nile.

The definition of the position of Φακουσα in the Tab. Peut. (36 R. m. from Pelusium), however, suits better the modern Fākūs, 16 m. N.E. of Saft el-Henneh, which had been supposed to be Phakusa by modern scholars. On the other hand, that the Greeks might repeatedly have confounded P-kosem (P-Sapd(u)) with a name like Pakes(?) (Fākūs) may be admitted.

However that may be, the identification of P-sapd(u) (Saft el-Henneh) and P-kos(em) is probable. The inscriptions dealing with sacred geography apply the phrase 'land of Sapdu' to a country 'Ksm(t) of the East'⁶ (Duem. Geogr. Inscr. 25). The shrine of Saft (publ. Naville), pl. 6, calls the gods of Saft 'gods of Ks',⁷ connecting especially Sapdu with this name Ks. Other texts combine Ksm with the nome of Sapdu, indicating by the orthography sometimes a district, sometimes a city. See § 4 on the earliest mention. In any case, it is clear that the name Ksm (Ks seems only an abbreviation or 'defective orthography') referred originally to the land immediately E. of Bubastus.

The question arises: Was the range of Ksm (= Goshen)⁸

¹ Sapd(u) is mentioned repeatedly as 'lord of the E. and of the Asiatics' (cp Naville, The Shrine of Saft el-Henneh, 5-13 ('88)). In his chief temple (see above) he had the name 'vanquisher of the Asiatics' (ḥrw nmtyrw), as being a god of Rougé (Duemichen, Naville), who finds in a coin-legend of the nomos Arabia ἑρρά κοῦ(α)ῖ, Sepit-Aḥšic (Jom).

² It was called 'the place of the nubs-tree' (sycomore? lotus tree?).

³ Mentioned by Asur-bāni-pal as Pisaptu or Saptu, 'at the gate of the East.'

extended to the newly colonised territory to the E. of Saft? This might have been done by the new settlers and the Palestinians. The sacred Egyptian lists, however, treat this eastern country (at least after 300 B.C.) as a distinct nomos, the eighth of Lower Egypt,¹ called 'Eastern. . .',² its capital being Tk(t), Tku(t), Tkō(t) (read Tukō?), which had the sacred name P-atum. (See SUCCOTH and PITHOM on the question whether these names are identical.)

The principal god was Atum of Heliopolis, dwelling in the temple 'seat (or bouse) of (the serpent) Kerh'—evidently this was the earlier local divinity. The canal flowing through the land was the Harma (Ḥalma),³ water, so called from the many crocodiles (helma in the language of the Hamitic Troglodytes)⁴ which have given its name also to the present Timsāh-lake. This lake had in ancient times the name *Sei-serk*⁵ 'Scorpion lake.'

The eighth nome belonged to the country called 'n⁶ ('aian? see Eant, Plin. HN 629, as name of the gulf of Suez), which included the desert between the gulf and Heliopolis (also the modern Mokattam-mountain opposite Memphis). This desert region was originally inhabited only by a few Semitic and some Troglodytic nomads; it was unfit for agriculture, the narrow valley alone being reached by the yearly inundations, and that irregularly. At a very remote time, indeed, the Egyptians had in the Wādy eṭ-Tumilāt, a strong fortification called the 'wall of the prince,' to guard (against the inroads of the nomads) the most vulnerable spot of the Egyptian frontier;⁷ but the colonisation of the eighth (eastern) nomos seems to have been due entirely to the great king Ram(es)es or Ra'messu II. (in the first twenty years of his reign), who must have improved the irrigation. The chief cities founded by him were:

Consequently the Semitic, or at least non-Egyptian origin of the name, proposed already by Semitic scholars, becomes very probable. The name seems to have been obsolete after 400 B.C., so that Ḥ's small inaccuracy in making Heropolis the capital becomes intelligible.

'The house of Ram(e)ses' with a royal residence and temples of Amon, Suteh, 'Astarte, and Buto,¹ evidently not very far E., and P-Atum = Pithom on the site, of modern Tell el-Mashūta. It is very questionable whether before Ram(e)ses II. there were in the eastern part of the valley any Egyptian settlements except the fortification mentioned above; at any rate, it fully deserved the name that it came to bear in later times—'land of Ram(e)ses' (this would hardly apply to the old western district). The position of the land colonised by Rameses was very advantageous. It possessed a healthy desert climate and was most fertile as long as the canal to the Crocodile Lake was kept in order.² The extension of the canal of Ram(e)ses³ to the Red Sea by Necho I. increased the commercial importance of the district. Quite recently, the repairing of the canal has trebled the population, now 12000, of this district, which forms a part of the modern province esh-Sharḳīye. Heroöpolis-Patum thus became an important place⁴ for the trade on the Red Sea, where also the Romans built a fortified camp.

Thus we see that Ḳesm-Goshen and 'land of Ram(e)ses' were with the Egyptians hardly identical.

5. The biblical The 'country of Ram(e)ses' could be only the eighth (eastern) nome. The and the Egyptian Goshen. application to that (eastern) district, of the (obsolete and rare) name Ḳesm (vocalise Ḳesm?) of the western (20th nome) has not yet been shown on the (later) Egyptian monuments.

The Hebrew story (Nu. 33 5*f.*) of the Israelites marching two days (Rameses to Succoth, Succoth to Etham) through the whole valley of Tumulit (instead of starting from its eastern end) might suggest to some a mistake of P, JE placing the country of the Israelites between Bubastus, Belbēs, and Tell Abū Isēmān (cp Naville). The probabilities, however, of such a theory are small; all sources seem to mean the same part of the country.

Probably Heroöpolis had, before the extension of the canal by Necho I., less importance, and the possibility that once also the eastern district had P-sapdu as capital and belonged to the district Ḳesm, is, therefore, not to be denied. It must be confessed that the geographical texts upon which we have to rely date from Ptolemaic times only. The division of the 'Arabian district' may have been different in earlier centuries.

Tradition has been exceptionally fortunate with the name Goshen;¹ Makrizi, in particular, identified Goshen with the region between Belbēs and the land of the Amalekites. The limitation of Goshen to Sadir, a village N.E. of Belbēs, by Sa'adia (and Abu-'a'id) is as strange as the limitation to Fosfāt (Old Cairo) by Bar Bahlūl. Modern scholars have, on the contrary, frequently extended Goshen too widely: Ebers, e.g., included in it the whole eastern delta between the Tanitic branch (cp Targ. Jer. which made Goshen 'the land of Pelusium'), Heliopolis, and the Bitter Lakes. We can afford to neglect certain hypotheses which date from the period before the decipherment of the hieroglyphics; for the situation erroneously assumed by Brugsch, see EXODUS, § 13.

'land' mentioned in Deuteronomistic portions of Joshua among other districts of S. Canaan. Josh. 10₄₁ (γῆν γ. [AFL]), 11₁₆ (γῆν γ. [BAFL]). It is strange to find the name of Goshen outside the limits of Goshen proper. Hommel (JHT 227*f.* 237; cp Exp. T. 815 [Oct. '96]), supposes that as the Israelites in Egypt multiplied, the area allotted to them was extended, and that the strip of country between Egypt and Judah, which still belonged to the Pharaoh, was regarded as an integral part of the land of Goshen. This is obviously a conservative hypothesis (see EXODUS i., § 2; MIZRAIM, § 2*b*). The text, however, may need criticism. That the MT sometimes misunderstands, or even fails to observe, geographical names, is plain; we have learned so much from Assyriology. Let us then suppose that Goshen is wrongly vocalised, and should be 𐤒𐤓𐤏 = 𐤒𐤓𐤏, and compare the name of the Galilæan town 𐤂𐤏𐤍 𐤓𐤏 ('fat soil'), the Gischala of Josephus. Other solutions are open; we may at any rate presume that this old Hebrew name had a Semitic origin, see 2.

As they now stand, Josh. 10₄₁ and 11₁₆ do not convey the same geographical picture. The words in 11₁₆, 'all the Negeb and all the land of Goshen (𐤒𐤓𐤏) and the Shēphēlah, suggest that 'the Goshen' lay between the Negeb or southern steppe region and the Shēphēlah or Lowlands. We might hold that it took in the SW. of the hill-country of Judah. In Josh. 10₄₁, where we read 'all the land of Goshen as far as Gibeon,' we may presume that some words have dropped out after 'Goshen.' Cp NEGEB, § 4.

2. A town in the SW. of the hill-country of Judah, mentioned with Debir, Anab, etc., Josh. 15 51 [P]. Probably an echo of the old name of a district in the same region (see 1). Cp Gesham. T. K. C.

² Neglect of the canal always led immediately to an encroachment of the desert upon the narrow cultivable area.

³ The canal was 50 cubits wide (according to Strabo; 100 ft. according to Pliny [6 165]; 50 yards according to traces near Balbēs) and 30 ft. deep (according to Pliny; 16-17 Engl. ft. according to modern traces).

⁴ The canal was repaired by Darius, Ptolemy II., Trajan—whence the name of the province Augustamnica from the Canalis Trajanus.

[The aim of the following article is to set forth with sufficient fulness the facts that have to be taken into account in formulating a theory of the genesis of the gospels, to record and criticise some of the more important theories that have been proposed, and to indicate if possible the present position of the question and the apparent trend of thought.

Its two parts, as will appear from the prefixed tabular exhibit of their contents, are partly independent, partly complementary. Roughly it may be said that the first

(§§ 1-107) is relatively full in its account of the contents of the gospels as a basis for considering their mutual relations, and in its survey of the external evidence as to origin. The second (§§ 108-158) aims mainly at giving an ordered account of the various questions bearing on (especially) the internal evidence that have been raised by scholars in the long course of the development of gospel criticism, and at attempting to find at least a provisional answer.]

A.—DESCRIPTIVE AND ANALYTICAL.

Of the Four canonical Gospels the first Three (differing from the Fourth) so often agree in subject, order, and language, that they are regarded as taking a 'common view' of the facts, and are hence called Synoptic.

A. INTERNAL EVIDENCE AS TO ORIGIN.

I. THE EARLIEST TRADITION.

Roughly it may be said that, of the Synoptists, Mk. exhibits the Acts and shorter Words of the Lord; Mt. a combination of the Acts with Discourses

1. Earliest Tradition. of the Lord, the latter often grouped together, as in the Sermon on the Mount; Lk. a second combination of Acts with Discourses, in which an attempt is made to arrange the Words and Discourses chronologically, assigning to each the circumstances that occasioned it. A comparison shows that Mt. and Lk., where Mk. is silent, often agree with one another. This doubly-attested account—for the most part confined to Discourses, where the agreement is sometimes verbatim—may be conveniently called 'the¹ Double Tradition.' Where Mk. steps in, the agreement between Mt. and Lk. is less close; and a study of what may be called 'the Triple Tradition,' i.e. the matter common to Mk., Mt., and Lk., shows that here Mt. and Lk., as a rule, contain nothing of importance in common, which is not found also in our Mk. (or rather in an ancient edition of our Mk., containing a few verbal corrections for clearness [see below, § 3]). This leads to the conclusion that, in the Triple Tradition, Mt. and Lk. borrowed (independently of each other) either from our Mk., or (more probably) from some document² embedded in our Mk.

Any other hypothesis requires only to be stated in order to appear untenable. For example: (1) that Mt. and Lk. should agree by accident, would be contrary to all literary experience; (2) if Mt. and Lk. borrowed from a common document containing Mk., or (3) differing in important respects from Mk., or (4) if Lk. borrowed from Mt., or Mt. from Lk., the two (i.e., Mt. and Lk.) would contain important similarities not found in Mk.; (5) if Mk. borrowed from Mt. and from Lk., he must have adapted his narrative so as to insert almost every phrase and word common to Mt. and Lk. in the passage before him—a hard task, even for a literary forger of these days, and an impossibility for such a writer as Mk.

The Fourth Gospel (henceforth called Jn.) does not contain the Synoptic 'repent,' 'repentance,' 'forgiveness,' 'faith,' 'baptism,' 'preach,' 'rebuke,' 'sinners,' 'publicans,' 'disease,' 'possessed with a devil,' 'cast out devils,' 'unclean,' 'leper,' 'leaven,' 'enemy,' 'hypocrisy,' 'divorce,' 'adultery,' 'woe,' 'rich,' 'riches,' 'mighty work,' 'parable.'³ Instead of 'faith (πίστις), Jn. uses 'have faith in (πιστεύω).'³ 'Faith,' in Jn., is 'abiding in Christ.' The Synoptists say that prayer will be granted, if we 'have faith': Jn. says (15 7), 'If ye abide in me, and my words abide in you, ask whatsoever ye will, and it shall be done unto you.' Except in narrating the Crucifixion, Jn. never mentions 'cross' or 'crucify,' but he represents Jesus as predicting his being 'uplifted' or 'glorified.' In Jn. the Synoptic 'child' rarely occurs; but the necessity of 'receiving the kingdom of God as little children' is expressed by him in the necessity (verbally different, but spiritually the same) of being 'born from above.'

Since the author of the Fourth Gospel must have

² The hypothesis of an Oral Tradition, as the sole origin of the similarities in the Synoptists, is contrary both to external and to internal evidence.
³ 'The kingdom of God,' or, 'of heaven,' occurs in Jn. twice, in the Synoptists more than eighty times.

known (Eus. iii. 247) the substance of the Three,¹ it is antecedently probable that, where the Synoptists differ, if Jn. favours one, he does so deliberately. Independently, therefore, of its intrinsic value, Jn. is important as being, in effect, the earliest commentary on the Synoptists.

II. THE TRIPLE TRADITION.

Here we have to consider: (i.) The edition of Mk. from which Mt. and Lk. borrowed; (ii.) Mk. in relation to Mt. and Lk.; (iii.) Jn. in relation to Mk., Mt., and Lk.

(i.) The Edition of Mk. from which Mt. and Lk. borrowed differs from Mk. itself merely in a few points indicating a tendency to correct Mk.'s style.

The most frequent changes are (a) to substitute ελεεν for λέγει,² and to insert pronouns, etc. for the sake of clearness. But there is often apparent (b) a tendency to substitute more definite, or classical, or appropriate words. For example, εχεισθαι and απόλλυσθαι are substituted for the single απόλλυσθαι (Mk. 2.22, applied to wine and wine-skins), κλίμη (or some other word) for the barbaric (Mk. 2.49 11 12) κράβατος, περιπάτετε for (Mk. 2.9) ὑπάγετε (to the paralytic), επιβάλλετε for the unheard of (Mk. 2.21) επιράττετε.³ Ambiguity is removed—e.g., by the following bracketed additions: Mk. 4 11 1 [to know] the mystery of God; (3 18) 'Andrew [his brother];' (4 4) ἐν τῷ σπείρειν [αὐτόν]. In Mk. 4 15, for 'them,' Mt. and Lk. substitute 'their heart.' (c) Sometimes there is condensation (e.g., [Mk. 4 10] οἱ περὶ αὐτὸν σὺν τοῖς δώδεκα [Mt.-Lk. οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτοῦ]); or an unusual word (e.g., [4 32] ἀναβαίνει [of a plant] is changed to a more usual one [πύξησι]); or a less reverential phrase (5 27) τοῦ ἡματίου to a more reverential one (τοῦ κρασπέδου τοῦ ἡματίου). In Mk. 10 25, τρημαλῖās is altered into τρήματος or τρητήματος, possibly because τρημαλίās means in ⊗ (four or five times)

Celsus apparently believes that there was first an original Gospel, of such a kind as to render it possible for enemies to make a charge of 'intoxication' (perhaps being in Hebrew and characterised by eastern metaphor and hyperbole), then, that there were three versions of this Gospel, then four, thus making an interval between the first three and the fourth, which he does not make between any of the first three. The word 'manifold' appears to refer to still later apocryphal Gospels.

'the cleft of a rock.' Once at least, our Mk. (9:50: ἀναλον γένηται) seems to have the newer tradition, Mt. and Lk. (μωρανθή) the older: but there the parallel Mt. is out of Mk.'s order, and is taken from the Sermon on the Mount, indicating that both Mt. and Lk. derive the saying, not from Mk. but from a different source, from which come the portions common to Mt. and Lk. above called 'The Double Tradition.'

An examination of the deviations from Mk. common to Mt. and Lk. in the Triple Tradition confirms the view that Mt. did not borrow from Lk., nor Lk. from Mt. Had either borrowed from the other, they would have agreed, at least occasionally, against Mk. in more important details.¹

(ii.) Mk. in relation to Mt. and Lk.—It is a remarkable fact that—whereas the later Evangelists, and other writers such as Barnabas and Justin, appeal largely to detailed fulfilments of prophecy—Mk. quotes no prophecies in his own person,² and gives no miraculous incidents peculiar to himself except (Mk. 8:25) an ancient and semi-poetical tradition of the healing of the blind. He makes no mention of Christ's birth or childhood, and gives no account of the resurrection.³

4. Primitive character of Mk.

Occasionally, Mk. repeats the same thing in the form of question and answer. This may sometimes be a mere peculiarity of style, e.g., 2:19 3:33 f.; but in many cases (1:32 4:22 [compared with 3:30] 20 4:15 5:15 12:44 etc.), he seems to have had before him two versions of one saying, and, in his 'anxiety to omit nothing,'⁴ to have inserted both. For amplifications in connection with unclean spirits, see 1:26 f. 44 3:7-12 9:14-27; for others, relating to the crowding of people round Jesus, the publicity of his work, and his desire for solitude, see 1:28 3:5-37 4:5 2:1-15 3:10-12 6:31 etc. (some paralleled in Lk., but not so fully or graphically). Mk. abounds with details as to the manner, look, and gestures of Jesus (see 3:5 7:31-37 8:22-26). In some of these, Aramaic words are given as his very utterances, e.g., 5:41 7:34 14:36. Sometimes Mk. gives names mentioned by no other writer (cp 3:17 8:10 10:46).

In some circumstances, Mk.'s elaboration of unimportant detail (and especially the introduction of names), instances of which abound in the Apocryphal Gospels, would indicate a late writer. But Mk. often emphasises and elaborates points omitted, or subordinated, by the other Evangelists, and likely to be omitted in later times, as not being interesting or edifying.

For example, Lk. and Jn. subordinate facts relating to the personal appearance, influence, and execution of John the Baptist. Now Acts 19:3 indicates that several years after Christ's death 'the baptism of John' was actually overshadowing the baptism of Christ among certain Christians. This being the case, it was natural for the later Evangelists to subordinate references to the Baptist. Lk., it is true, describes Jn.'s birth in detail; but the effect is to show that the son of Zachariah was destined from the womb to be nothing but a forerunner of the Messiah. Jn. effects the same object, in a different way, by recording the Baptist's confessions of Christ's pre-existence and sacrificial mission. It is characteristic of Mk.'s early date, as well as of his simplicity and freedom from controversial motive, that, whether aware or not of this danger of rivalry, he set down, just as he may have heard them, traditions about the Baptist, that must have interested the Galilean Church far more than the Churches of the Gentiles.

5. Rude Greek style.

Mk. uses many words expressly forbidden by Phrynichus, e.g., (5:23) εσχάτως έχει; (2:4 9:11 f.) κράβαττος; (11:15) κολυμβισταί; (5:41) κοράσιον; (14:65) ράπισμα; (10:25) ράφις. Just as the Apocryphal Constitutions improves the bad Greek of the Didache (Taylor's Didaché, 43), so Lk. always (and sometimes Mt.) corrects these inelegancies. Such words (which stand on quite a different footing from Jewish Greek, such as we find in

² The parenthesis in Mk. 1:2 is the only exception. This was probably an insertion in the original Gospel (see § 8).

³ For proof that Mk.'s Gospel terminates at 16:8, see WH on Mk. 16:9-20, which is there pronounced to be 'a narrative of Christ's appearances after the Resurrection,' found by 'a scribe or editor,' 'in some secondary record then surviving from a preceding generation': 'its authorship and its precise date must remain unknown; it is, however, apparently older than the time when the Canonical Gospels were generally received; for, though it has points of contact with them all, it contains no attempt to harmonise their various representations of the course of events.'

⁴ So Papias, quoted by Eus. (3:39): 'For he (Mk.) took great care about one matter, viz., to omit nothing of what he heard.'

Lk.'s Introduction) might naturally find their place in the dialect of the slaves and freedmen who formed the first congregations of the Church in Rome; but in the more prosperous days of the Church they would be corrected.

Again, a very early Evangelist, not having much experience of other written Gospels, and not knowing exactly what would most edify the Church, might naturally lay stress on vivid expressions and striking words, or reproduce anacolutha, which, though not objectionable in discourse, are unsuitable for written composition.

Many such words are inserted by Mk. and avoided by Mt. or Lk. or by both—e.g., (1:10) σχιζόμενος, (2:21) ἀγραφος, (1:38) κωμασάεις. For irregular constructions see 12:40, οἱ κατέσθοντες (altered by Lk.); 5:23 ἵνα ἐπιθῆς. Note also the curious change of construction from ἵνα to the infinitive in 9:15, as compared with 3:14, and the use of ὄτι, to ask a question (2:16 9:11 28). The Latinisms of Mk. are well known: see 9:27 4:15 15:39. Those in 12:14 15:16, and φραγγέλιον in 15:15, Mk. shares with Mt. Less noticed, but more noteworthy, are the uses of rare, poetic, or prophetic words (7:32 μογγάλλον, 8:23 ὄμματα, 25 τριλανγῶς), which may indicate a Christian psalm or hymn as the basis of Mk.'s tradition.¹

Mk. also contains 'stumbling-blocks' in the way of weak believers, omitted in later Gospels, and not likely to have been tolerated, except in a Gospel of extreme antiquity.

For example (6:5 f.), 'He was not able to do there any mighty work'; (1:32 34) all the sick are brought to Jesus, but he heals only many, whereas Mt. (8:16) says that he healed all, and Lk. (4:40) that he healed each one (ἐνὶ ἑκάστῳ); (3:20-21) his mother and brethren attempt to lay hands on him, on the ground that he was insane; (10:35) an ambitious petition is imputed to James and John, instead of, as Mt. to their mother; (15:44) Pilate 'marvels' at the speedy death of Jesus, which might have been used to support the view (still maintained by a few modern critics) that Jesus had not really died; Mk. omits (6:7) the statement that Jesus gave power (as Mt. 10:1 Lk. 9:1) to his apostles to heal diseases;² (8:24) he enumerates the different stages by which Jesus effected a cure, and describes the cure as, at first, only partial; (11:20) the fig-tree, instead of being withered up 'immediately' (as Mt. 21:19 παραχρήμα), is not observed to be withered till after the interval of a day.

(iii.) Jn. in Relation to the Triple Tradition.—(a) Instances from the first part of Mk.—The following comparisons will elucidate Jn.'s relation to the Triple Tradition. (It will be found that Jn. generally supports a combination of Mk. and Mt., and often Mk. alone, against Lk.; the exceptions being in those passages which describe the relation of John the Baptist to Christ. There Jn. goes beyond Lk.)

8. Jn. and Triple Tradition in Mk. 1-8.

Mk. 1:2 f., 'As it is written in Isaiah, etc.' If these prophecies, wrongly assigned to Isaiah, are not an early interpolation, they are the only ones quoted by the Evangelist in person. Mt. and Lk. assign one of these prophecies to Jesus; Jn. assigns both to the Baptist, so as to emphasise the willing subordination of the latter ('I am [but] the voice').

Mk. (16:7) mentions no suspicion among the Jews that the Baptist might be the Messiah. Lk. mentions (3:15) a silent 'questioning' (that does not elicit a direct denial). Jn. adds a public question (1:19), 'Who art thou?' followed by a public denial, 'I am not the Christ.'

Mk. 17: 'after me.' Rejected by Lk. (possibly as being liable to an interpretation derogatory to Jesus), but thrice repeated by Jn. (1:15 27 30) in such a context as to testify to Christ's precedence and pre-existence.

Mk. 18: 'shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit,' omitting 'and with fire,' which is added by Mt. and Lk. Jn. goes with Mk. (Jn. 1:33): 'He it is that baptizeth with the Holy Spirit.'

Mk. 19 mentions 'Jordan' in connection with the baptism of Jesus; Lk. does not (though he does afterwards in his preface to the Temptation). Jn. (1:28) does, with details of the place. (Note that Lk. never mentions the Synoptic 'beyond Jordan';

¹ It is beside the mark to reply that these words are used, occasionally, by classical prose writers. The point is, that ὄμμα occurs in NT only here and in a Mk.-like account of blind-healing in Mt. 20:34, whereas ὄφθαλμός occurs in NT about ninety times! In the canonical books of OT, ὄμμα occurs only in Proverbs. Τριλανγῶς occurs only here in NT, and only twice (apart from a leper's 'bright scab') in OT, and there in poetical passages. Μογγάλλος (practically non-occurrent in Greek literature, see Thayer) is found nowhere in the Bible, except in 45 of 1s. 35:6, and in Mk.'s account of the man who had (Mk. 7:32) 'an impediment in his speech.'

² It is omitted also in 3:15 (where D and Ss. add it).

Jn. has it thrice.) Lk. (3:22), in describing the descent of the Spirit, adds 'in a bodily shape.' Jn. implies that the descent of the Spirit was (1:33) a sign to the Baptist alone, and states that it permanently abode on Jesus. Thus he excludes 'bodily shape,—at all events in the ordinary sense. Lk. alone (1:36) had stated that the Baptist was connected with Jesus through family ties; Jn. represents the Baptist as saying (1:33), 'And I knew him not.'

Mk. 1:14 f. (possibly also Mt.) leaves room for an interval after the Temptation, in which the reader may place Christ's early teaching in Jerusalem before 'John was betrayed.' Lk. 4:14, omitting the mention of John, appears to leave no interval. Jn. repeatedly says, or implies, that the early teaching took place (3:24 f. 1:3) before the Baptist was imprisoned.

Mk. 2:17: 'I have not come to call the righteous, but the sinful.' Lk. adds 'to repentance.' Jn. never uses the word 'repentance.'

Mk. 3:21 puts into the mouths of Christ's household or friends the words (3:21), 'He is beside himself (ἐξῆσθη)'; Mt. and Lk. seem to transfer this to 'the multitudes.' They render it 'were astonished (ἐξίσταστο), or 'marvelled (θαυμάσασθαι)'. Jn. goes with Mk. in mentioning a charge of 'madness' (μαίεται), and connecting it with the charge of possession (10:20: 'He hath a devil and is mad'). Mk. 3:22-30 repeats the charge of the Pharisees, (a) in the form (3:22) 'He hath Beelzebub', and (3:30) 'He hath an unclean spirit', while adding (b) a milder form (3:22): 'In the prince of the devils he casteth out the devils.' Mt. and Lk. reject (a) and adopt (b), defining 'prince' by 'Beelzebub.' Jn. goes with Mk. (Jn. 10:20), 'He hath a devil.'

Mk. 4:26-29: the parable of the seed that springeth up, the sower 'knoweth not how', is omitted by Mt. and Lk. Jn. gives the essence of this in his description of the birth from the Spirit, as to which, we (38) 'know not whence it cometh and whither it goeth', apparently modelled on Eccles. 11:5 f.: 'As thou knowest not what is the way of the wind (τίς ἢ ὁδὸς τοῦ πνεύματος), nor how the bones grow in the womb of her that is with child, even so thou knowest not the work of God who doeth all. In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not which shall prosper, this or that.'²

Mk. 6:1-6: 'A prophet in his own country.' Lk. alone connects this proverb with a visit to Nazareth, in which the Nazarenes try to 'cast Jesus down a precipice'; Jn. (4:44) connects it with a visit in which the Galileans 'received' Jesus. Cp. NAZARETH.

Mk. 8:27-29. Here Lk., alone of the evangelists, represents Jesus as (9:18) 'praying (προσευχόμενον)', and he does the same in four other passages where Mk. and Mt. omit it. Jn. never uses the word προσεύχεται throughout his Gospel.

(β) Predictions of the Resurrection.—As to these Mk. and Lk. give us a choice between two difficulties.

(a) Mk. 9:10 (comp. also 9:32) says, that 'the disciples questioned among themselves what was the meaning of rising from the dead.' Yet what could be clearer? In

9. In predicting Lk., Christ's predictions of death and Resurrection, resurrection begin with fulness of detail, which diminishes as the Gospel proceeds; and the last prediction of death contains a statement that (9:45) 'it was as it were veiled from them.' (δ) Also, whereas Mk. 14:28 (and Mt.) contains the prediction, 'After I have been raised up, I will go before you to Galilee,' Lk. omits this; and subsequently, where Mk. (16:7) and Mt. repeat or refer to this promise, Lk. alters the words 'to Galilee' into 'while he was yet in Galilee.'

Jn.'s relation to (a) and (β) is as follows in (a') and (β').

(a') Jn. makes it obvious why the disciples could not understand Christ's predictions.

Take the following:—(2:19) 'Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up (ἐγερῶ)'; (3:14) 'The Son of man must be lifted up (ὀψοθῆναι)'; (12:23) 'The hour is come that the Son of man should be glorified'; (13:31) 'Now hath the Son of man been glorified (δοξασθῆναι)' and God hath been glorified in him, and God will glorify him in himself and will straightway glorify him.' Who was to conjecture that, when Jesus spoke of being 'lifted up from the earth,' he said this (12:33), 'signifying (σημαίνων)³ by what death he was (ἤμελλεν) to die' ? or that

² Similarly, in the Logia of Behnesa (see § 86), 'Raise the stone, cleave the tree,' Jesus—while mainly referring to the Baptist's doctrine about raising up stones as children to Abraham, and about cutting down the barren tree of Jewish formalism—may possibly have had in his mind Eccles. 10:9.

³ The aorist cannot be exactly expressed in English: 'hath been' is nearer to the meaning than 'was.'

⁴ 'Signifying'—i.e., representing under a figure or 'sign' (which no one understood at the time). In 21:18 the cross is 'signified' more clearly by the 'stretching out' of the 'hands'; but no

'glorify' meant 'glorifying' the Father, and hence the Son, by the supreme sacrifice on the Cross? No one can deny that these were what Jesus calls 'dark sayings (parvoimiai).' True, the disciples contradicted him: (16:29) 'Behold at this moment (vñv) speakest thou clearly and utterest no dark saying.' But they were wrong.

Jn. seems to say, therefore, not that Christ's teaching, though clear, was 'concealed' (Lk. 9:45) from the disciples supernaturally, but rather that it was necessarily altogether beyond them till the Spirit was given. Imbued with the popular belief that resurrection must imply resurrection in a fleshly form, visible to friends and enemies alike, how could they at present apprehend a spiritual resurrection, wherein the risen Christ must be shaped forth by the Spirit, and brought forth after sorrow like that of (16:21) 'the woman when she is in travail'?

Mk. and Mt. seem to have read into the utterances of Jesus details borrowed from subsequent facts or controversies. Towards these, Lk. and Jn. take different attitudes.

Lk., starting at first in accord with the Synoptic Tradition, gradually drops more and more of the definite predictions; and at last, when confronted with the words, 'After I am raised, I will go before you into Galilee,' omits the promise altogether. Jn., on the contrary, recognises that the predictions of Christ were of a general nature, though expressed in Scriptural types.

Jn. and Lk. differ also in their attitudes towards Scripture as 'proving' the Resurrection. Lk. represents the two travellers as blind to the risen Saviour, till he (24:27) 'interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself.' Jn. expressly says that the belief of the beloved disciple preceded the knowledge of the Scriptures: (20:8) 'And he saw and believed; for not even yet did they know the Scripture, how that he must needs rise from the dead.'

In the light of Jn., returning to Mk.'s statement that the disciples discussed together 'what the rising from the dead might mean,' we have only to substitute 'this' for 'the,' and it becomes intelligible. Every one knew what 'rising from the dead' meant. But they did not know the meaning of this kind of rising from the dead—i.e., what Christ said about his resurrection.

(β') The promise (Mk. 14:28 and Mt.), 'I will go before you to Galilee,' occurs in close connection with Peter's profession that he will not desert Jesus. Jn. has, in the same connection (14:2), 'I go to prepare a place for you.'

This leads us to look elsewhere for a confusion between 'Galilee' and 'place.' Comparing Mk. 1:28 with Lk. 4:37, we find that Lk. has, instead of 'The whole περίχωρος of Galilee,' the words 'every place of the περίχωρος' (so also in Lk. 7:17, πάση τῇ περιχώρῳ stands where we should expect πάση τῇ Γαλιλαίᾳ; so Chajes [Markus-studien, 13], who also independently offers the same theory [double meaning of γαλιλαίᾳ] to account for Lk. 4:37). In Mk. 3:7, Lk. omits 'Galilee.' The question, then, arises, whether the original may have been some word signifying 'region,' or 'place' which (1) Mk.-Mt. interpreted to mean 'Galilee,' (2) Jn. 'the place (of my Father)' or 'the (boly) place,' while (3) Lk. found the tradition so obscure that he omitted it altogether. Now the word γαλιλαίᾳ, a longer form of γαλιλαία ('Galilee'), is used to mean (Josh. 22:10 f.) 'region.' Again, Mt. 28:16, 'to Galilee, to the mountain where he appointed for them,' suggests two traditions, (1) 'Galilee,' (2) 'appointed mountain.'¹ Lastly, besides many passages (Acts 1:25; Ign. Magr. 5; Barn. 19:1; Clem. Rom. § 5, τὸν οὐρανοῦ ἵμενον τόπον, and also τὸν ἅγιον τόπον) where Jn.'s word τόπος is used, with an attribute, to mean 'place' (in the next world), Clem. Alex. (p. 978, παρὰ τῷ τόπῳ κατεχόντο), uses the word absolutely of 'Paradise.' All this leads to the inference (which is highly probable as regards 'Galilee,' and which further knowledge might render equally probable as regards 'place') that an expression, misunderstood by Mk. and Mt. as meaning 'Galilee,' and omitted by Lk. because he could not understand it at all, was understood by Jn. to mean 'my Father's place,' i.e., 'Paradise.' In any case, we have here a tradition of Mk. and Mt., rejected by Lk., but spiritualised by Jn. in such a way as to throw light on the different views taken by Lk. and Jn. of Christ's sayings about his resurrection.

one is said to have understood the 'stretching out,' and the context alone compels us to suppose that it was not understood. ¹ In 1 Sam. 20:20, where MSS of G have a corrupt reproduction of matῆrāh, Sym. has συνεταραμένον (τόπος) 'appointed place.' Also compare Mt. 28:10, 'Go tell my brethren to depart to Galilee,' with Jn. 20:17, 'Go to my brethren and say unto them, I ascend unto my Father.' Does not this indicate that what Mt. understood as meaning 'Galilee' or 'appointed mountain,' Jn. understood as meaning 'heaven'? This points to some original capable of being expressed by 'the place,' 'the holy place,' 'the (place) of the Father,' 'the Mountain,' 'the Holy Mountain.'

(γ) Deviations of Lk. from Mk. (or Mk.-Mt.) caused by obscurity, appear to be corrected, 10. In correcting or omissions supplied, by Jn., in Lk.'s deviations. the following instances:—

Mk. (11 7, ἐκάθισεν) and Mt. say that Jesus 'sat on the ass'; Lk. first confused ἐκάθισεν with ἐκάθισαν,¹ and then substituted for the latter the unambiguous ἐνεβίβασαν 'they put him thereon.' Jn. (12 14, ἐκάθισεν) goes with Mk. The Synoptists all mention 'garments,' placed on the ass and strewn in the road. But Mk. and Mt. mention also the 'strewing' of branches (Mt. κλάδους) —Mk., however, calling them σπυβάδας, a word that mostly means 'litter,' or 'grass and straw used for bedding, or for the stuffing of a mattress.' This Lk. omits. John inserts 'palm-branches' (without mentioning 'garments'), but in a different context: (12 13) 'They took (in their hands) the branches of the palm trees (τὰ βῆλα τῶν φοινίκων), and went forth to meet him.'²

Whether Jn. or Mk. was right, or whether both were right, is not now the question. The point is that where Lk. omits a tradition of Mk. possibly as being difficult, Jn. modifies it, or substitutes a kindred one.

Mk.'s (14 3-9) account of the anointing of Jesus by a woman is either omitted by Lk. (7 36-50), or placed much earlier and greatly modified, the woman being called 'a sinner,' and the host being described as 'Simon,' a 'Pharisee.' Mk. and Mt., however, call him 'Simon the leper,' and Jn. (12 1-7) suggests that the house belonged to Lazarus and his sisters. It is not impossible that the difference may be caused by some clerical error. Chajes, op. cit. 74 f., accounts for 'Simon the leper' by a confusion between ἁγιῶτος, 'the pious' = 'the Essene,' and ἁγιῶτος, 'the leper.' May there have been some further confusion between ἁγιῶτος and ἁγιῶτος 'Lazarus'? Jn. apparently guards the reader against supposing the woman to be a sinner, by telling us (11 1 f.) that it was Mary, the sister of Lazarus.³

(δ) The Passover and the Lord's Supper.—The Synoptists, and especially Lk., seem to represent the Crucifixion as occurring after, Jn. as occurring before, the Paschal meal. There are traces of a confusion in

11. In the Lk. between the Day of Preparation and the Day of Passover. It was one thing to over,' and another Lk. substitutes for the former. Also Mk. 14 17, ὀψίας γενομένης (which Mt. adjusts to a different context, and Lk. omits) indicates that Mk.'s original tradition may have agreed with Jn.'s view: for no one would have been abroad at, or after, sunset, when the Passover meal was to be eaten. Though Mk. and Mt., in parts, unquestionably sanction Lk.'s view, they do not express it so decidedly as Lk., and they contain slight traces of an older tradition, indicating that the Last Supper was on the Day of Preparation.

1. Mk. 14 18, 'One of you shall betray me, he that eateth (ἐσθίω) with me,' was perhaps a shock to some believers, as indicating that Judas partook of the bread. Mt. omits the italicised words, retaining Mk.'s more general phrase, 'while they were eating.' Lk. omits 'eating,' having simply, 'the hand of him that is to betray me is with me on the table.' Jn. (13 18) quotes Ps. 41 9, 'He that catcheth my bread . . .,' and specially mentions Judas as receiving the (13 26) 'sop' from Christ's own hands.

2. Mk. 14 20 (and Mt.), 'He that dipeth his hand in the dish with me' will be the traitor, is omitted by Lk. Jn. combines a modification of this with the foregoing; Jesus (13 26) 'dips the sop' and gives it to Judas.

3. Lk. differs from Mk. and Mt. in (1) mentioning the meal (apparently) as (22 8), 'the Passover'; (2) mentioning a 'cup' which Jesus (ib. 17) 'received' before the meal, and bade the disciples 'distribute to one another'; (3) inserting the words (ib. 19), 'Do this as a memorial of me'; (4) mentioning a second cup, that was (ib. 20), 'after supper'; (5) speaking of the cup as (ib. 20) 'the new covenant.'⁴ In all these points

³ Mk. says that Jesus said (14 6) ἀφετε αὐτήν, 'Let her alone.' A very slight change (= being often -au in MSS) would alter this to ἀφίγηται αὐτή—i.e., ἀφίγηται αὐτή, or ἀφίγηται αὐτή ('[her sins] are forgiven her, or 'she is forgiven'), which is like Lk. 7 48 has in the form ἀφίγηται.

Lk. amplifies and dignifies, while Jn. appears to subordinate, the circumstances of the Last Supper. What Jn. had to say about the feeding on the flesh and blood of the Saviour, he placed earlier, in the synagogue at Capernaum. There, Jesus insists, (6 33) 'the words (ῥήματα) that I have spoken to you are spirit and are life,' and, 'the flesh profiteth nothing.' Now he reiterates this doctrine (13 10), 'ye are clean (καθαροί), hut not all.' This, when compared with (15 3), 'ye are clean (καθαροί) because of the word that I have spoken unto you,' indicates that participating in the bread and wine and washing of feet was useless, except so far as it went with spiritual participation in 'the Word' himself. A climax of warning is attained by making Judas receive the devil when he receives the bread dipped in wine by the hand of Jesus.

4. Jn. avoids the ambiguous Synoptic word 'covenant,' 'will,' or 'testament (διαθήκη),' and makes it clear, throughout the final discourse, that he regards the Spirit as a gift (or legacy) that implies nothing of the nature of a bargain or compact.

5. Mk. 14 27 (and Mt.; but Lk. om.) 'All ye shall be caused to stumble; for it is written, I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep shall be scattered abroad,' was likely to cause a 'scandal'—as though God could 'smite' his son. This may be seen from Barnabas, who gives the prophecy thus: (5 11 f.) 'When they [i.e. the Jews] shall smite their own shepherd, then shall perish the sheep of the flock.' Jn., while retaining Christ's prediction that the disciples should be (16 32) 'scattered,' effectively destroys the 'scandal' by adding that, even when abandoned by them, he would not be abandoned by the Father (ib.), 'And yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me.'

(ε) The Passion.—The facts seem to be as follows:—

1. Mk. 14 42 and Mt. place the words, 'Arise, let us go' at the arrival of Judas. Lk. omits all that intervenes between (2)

12. In the Passion. Mk. 14 38 'Watch and pray . . . temptation, and (δ) Mk. 14 42 'Arise, let us go, having merely (22 46) 'Stand up and pray . . . temptation.' Now 'to stand (ἵστην) was

'nothing else than to pray' (Hor. Hebr. 2 142). But 'stand' might also mean 'watch,' cp Neh. 7 3. Lk. may have considered (δ) a duplicate of (α), taking the meaning to be 'stand fast and pray.' Jn. places the words 'Arise, let us go,' at the moment when Jesus feels the approach, not of Judas, but of (14 30 f.) 'the prince of the world, who has just taken possession of Judas.'

2. Lk. omits all mention of the 'binding' of Jesus. Yet early Christian writers (e.g. Melito) regarded it as a symbolical act, being performed in the case of the intended sacrifice of Isaac, the prototype of Christ (Gen. 22 9). Jn. inserts it (18 12), as does Mk. 15 1 (and Mt.).

3. Lk. speaks of (22 52) 'generals (στρατηγῶν) of the temple,' Jn. says (18 12), 'The chiliarch, and the officers of the Jews.' Lk. has, loosely, (3 2) 'Annas and Caiaphas' as 'high priests'; Jn. says that (18 13) Caiaphas was high priest, and Annas his father-in-law.

4. According to Mk. 14 55-60, false witnesses asserted that Jesus had declared that he would destroy the temple. Mt. alters 'would' into was able, and implies that, though what had been previously testified was false, this may have been true.¹ Lk. omits the whole. In his time the destruction of the temple by the Romans was accepted by Christians as a divine retaliation, which might be regarded as inflicted by Jesus himself, so that he might wish to avoid saying that the testimony was 'false.' Jn. says in effect, 'Some words about destroying "the temple" had been uttered by Jesus (2 19); but they referred to "the temple of his body." And the Jews were the "destroyers."'

5. Mk. 15 6 (and Mt.) says that it was the custom to release a malefactor at the feast. Lk. omits this. Jn. not only inserts it, but adds that Pilate himself (18 39) reminded the Jews of it.

6. Mk. 15 16-20 (and Mt.) mentions the (purple or scarlet) 'rohe,' and the 'crown of thorns.' Lk. omits these striking incidents—for what reason, it is difficult to say.² Jn. inserts both of them.

7. Mk. 14 65, alone of the Synoptists, mentions 'blows with the flat hand' (παρισσηα; in \mathfrak{S} , only in Is. 50 6). Jn. also mentions them 19 3 (and cp 18 22).

(ζ) Conclusion and Exceptions.—The instances above enumerated might be largely supplemented. The

13. Conclusion. conclusion from them is that—setting aside (1) descriptions of possession, and other subjects excluded from the Johannine province,³ (2) allusions to John the Baptist, (3) a few passages where Jn., accepting Lk.'s development, Mt. 13 17 Lk. 17 22). Also (3) and (4) and (5) may be interpolations (but more probably early additions, made in a later edition of the work) fr. m. 1 Cor. 11 23-25, or (more probably) from tradition.

² Barnabas (7) connects them with the scapegoat. Possibly this connection may have seemed to Lk. objectionable.

carries it a stage further, Jn. scarcely ever agrees with Lk., as against Mk., whilst he very frequently steps in to support, or explain by modifying, some obscure or harsh statement of Mk., omitted by Lk.

Two important exceptions demand mention:—

(a) Mk. 15²⁵, 'It was the third hour and they crucified him,' is omitted by Mt. and Lk., and con-
14. Exceptions. tradicted indirectly by Jn. 19¹⁴, 'It was about the *sixth*¹ hour' (when Pilate pronounced sentence). Mk. may have confused F ('sixth') with Γ ('third'). [In 1 Macc. 6³⁷ the impossible 'two and thirty' may be due to a similar confusion.] Or the sentence may be out of place and should come later, describing the death of Jesus as occurring when 'it was the third hour from the time when they crucified him.' How easily confusion might spring up, may be seen from the Acts of John (12), 'when he was hanged on the bush of the cross in the sixth hour of the day (ὥρα ἕκτης ἡμερῆς) darkness was over all the land.' First, ἕκτης, 'sixth,' might be mistaken for ἕκτος, 'from the' (or vice versa); then a numeral would have to be supplied. Or ἕκτος might be repeated (or dropped) before ἕκτης. In Mk. 15³³, D, which elsewhere gives ἕκτος in full, has an unusual symbol Γ.
 The conclusion is that Mk. seemed to Mt., Lk., and Jn. to be in error, and that Jn. corrected by insertion what Mt. and Lk. corrected by omission.

(b) Mk. 14³⁰, 'Before the cock crow twice thrice thou shalt deny me,' is given by Mt. and Lk. with the omission of 'twice.' This is remarkable, because 'twice' enhances the miraculousness of the prediction. May not Mk. be based on a Semitic original, which gave the saying thus, 'Before the cock crow, twice and thrice' (=repeatedly, see Job 33²⁹⁻⁴⁰)? Jn. (13³⁸) accepts Lk.'s modification of Mt., but with a slight variation—'the cock shall not crow, until such time as thou deny me thrice (ὡς ὃ ἀρῆσθαι με τρίς).'
 Here Jn. accepts, but improves on, the Synoptic correction of Mk., who, though perhaps literally correct, does not represent the spirit of what Jesus said.

III. DOUBLE TRADITIONS.

The Double Traditions include what is common to

(i.) Mk. and Mt., (ii.) Mk. and Lk., (iii.)
15. Double Mt. and Lk. The last of these is so much traditions: fuller than (i.) or (ii.) that it may be con-Mk.-Mt. veniently called 'The Double Tradition.'

(i.) Mk. and Mt., Jn. in relation to Mk. and Mt.—
 Much of this has been incidentally discussed above, under the head of the Triple Tradition: and what has been said there will explain why Lk. and Jn. omit Mk. 16² and 6²⁴⁻²⁹ (accounts of the Baptist), 9¹³ ('Elias is come already'), 15³⁴⁻³⁶ ('He calleth for Elias'),³ Lk.'s omission of a long and continuous section of Mk. (6⁴⁵⁻⁸²¹)—including (a), Christ's walking on the Sea, (b), the doctrine about 'things that defile,' and (c), about 'the children's crumbs,' (d), the feeding of the Four Thousand, (e), a comparison between this and the feeding of the Five Thousand, and (f), the dialogue (see § 39 n.) following the doctrine of 'leaven'—may indicate that Lk. knew this section as existing in a separate tradition, which, for some reason, he did not wish to include in his Gospel. Most of it may be said to belong to 'the Doctrine of Bread,' as taught in Galilee. Jn. also devotes a section of his Gospel to a 'doctrine of Bread' (but of quite a different kind from Mk.'s), concentrating attention on Christ as the Bread. Lk. also omits (Mk. 9⁴³⁻⁴⁷) 'the cutting off of hand and foot,' and (Mk. 10²⁻⁹) the discussion of the enactments of Moses concerning divorce—the former, perhaps, as being liable to literal interpretation, the latter, as being out of date. The ambitious petition (Mk. 10³⁵⁻⁴⁰) of the sons of Zebedee, Christ's rebuke (Mk. 8^{32 f.}) of Peter as Satan, and the quotation (Mk. 14²⁷), 'I will smite the shepherd,' Lk. may have omitted, as not tending to edification. In the discourse on 'the last day' Lk. omits a great deal that prevents attention from being concentrated on the destruction of Jerusalem as exactly fulfilling the predictions of Christ; but especially he omits (Mk. 13³²), 'of this hour the Son knoweth not.'

¹ Attempts have been made, but in vain (see Classical Review, 1894, p. 243), to prove that Jn.'s 'sixth hour' meant 6 A.M.

³ For the Withering of the Fig-Tree (Mk. 11 13-20) see § 13 n.

It must be added that, both in this Double Tradition and (to a less extent) in those parts of the Triple Tradition where Lk. makes omissions, Mk. and Mt. generally agree more closely than where Lk. intervenes. The phenomena point to a common document occasionally used by Mk. and Mt., and, where thus used, avoided by Lk. and also by Jn. The Walking on the Water is an exception to Jn.'s general omission. The Anointing of Jesus (since Lk. has a version of it) has been treated above as part of the Triple Tradition.¹

(ii.) Mk. and Lk.; Jn. in relation to Mk. and Lk. Mk.-Lk. is very brief. The larger portion of it relates

16. Mk.-Lk. to exorcism, Mk. 1 21-25 9³⁸⁻⁴⁰ (and note the close agreement between Mk. and Lk. as to the exorcism of the 'Legion,' a name omitted by Mt. in his account of it). There are also accounts of Jesus (Mk. 135-38 45) retiring to solitude, and of people flocking to him from (38) Tyre and Sidon. A section of some length attacks the Pharisees, as (Mk. 12 38-40) 'devourers of widows' houses,' and prepares the (Mk. 12³⁹=Mt. 23⁶) way for (Mk. 12⁴¹⁻⁴⁴) the story of the widow's mite. In the later portions of the Gospel, Lk. deviates from Mk. (as Mt. approximates to Mk.), returning to similarity in the Preparation for the Pass-over (Mk. 14 12-16), but from this point deviating more and more.

Lk.'s insertion of what may be called the 'widow-section,' is consistent with the prominence given by him to women and to poverty (see below, § 39).

(iii.) *Mt. and Lk.*² or, 'The Double Tradition'; (a)

17. The double the Acts of the Lord, (b) the Words of tradition: the Lord.

its 'Acts.' (a) The Acts of the Lord are confined to (a) the details of the Temptation and (β) the healing of the Centurion's servant.

(a) Mk. gives no detailed account of a Temptation, but just mentions it, adding (1 13) 'and the angels were ministering (δουλοῦν) to him'—i.e., apparently during the Temptation; Mt. says that, after the departure of the devil, 'angels approached and began to minister (προσηύθον και δουλοῦν) unto him'; Lk. mentions no 'angels.' Jn. omits all temptation of Jesus, but suggests (1 51) that 'angels were always ascending and descending on the Son of man,' and that, in course of time, the eyes of the disciples would be opened to discern them.

(b) As regards the healing, some assert that Jn. (4 46-53) does not refer to the event described by Mt. (8 5-13) and Lk. (7 1-9). But, if so, it can hardly be denied that he, knowing their account, was influenced by it in inserting in his Gospel another case of healing, resembling the former in being performed (1) at a distance, (2) on the child (apparently) of a foreigner, and (3) near Capernaum. Mt. and Lk. differ irreconcilably.³ Jn.,

¹ Space hardly admits mention of the possible reasons for Lk.'s several omissions. Some of these passages (e.g., the practical abrogation of the Levitical Law of meats in Mk. 7 24-30) may have seemed to him to point to a later period, such as that in Acts 10 9-16, where Christ abrogated the Law by a special utterance to Peter. Again, in the Doctrine of Bread, while (Mk. 7 28) 'crumbs' and (Mk. 8 15) 'leaven' are used spiritually, 'loaves' and (Mk. 8 14) 'one loaf' are used literally; and this mixture of the literal and metaphorical may have perplexed Lk., especially if he interpreted the miracle of the Fig-Tree metaphorically, and was in doubt as to the literal or metaphorical meaning of the Walking on the Water. Some passages he may also have omitted as duplicates, e.g., the Feeding of the Four Thousand. As regards 'leaven,' Lk.'s insertion (12 1) 'which is hypocrisy,' if authentic, is fatal to the authenticity of Mk. 8 17-20. Perhaps the original was simply 'Beware of leaven,' and the explanation, given after the misunderstanding, was 'Beware of the leaven of the Pharisees—i.e., hypocrisy.' The rest was evangelistic teaching ('How could Jesus mean real leaven and real bread when he could feed his flock with the leaven of heaven at his pleasure?') inserted first as a parenthesis (perhaps about the Son of man or the Son of God), and then transferred to the text in the first person. The variation of Mt. 16 9-12 from Mk. suggests that the words were not Christ's.

Jn. inserts the narrative of Jesus walking on the Sea, but adds expressions (6 16 21), borrowed from Ps. 107 23, 'go down to the sea' and (ib. 30) 'the haven where they would be,' which increase the symbolism of a story describing the helplessness of the Twelve, when, for a short time, they had left their master. Jn. omits the statement (Mk. and Mt.) that Jesus constrained the disciples to leave him.

² The passages referred to in this section will be found in Rushbrooke's Synopticon, arranged in Mt.'s order.

while correcting both Evangelists in some respects, and especially in tacitly (4⁴⁸) denying that Jesus ' marvelled,' corrects Lk. more particularly, by stating (1) that the man came to Jesus, (2) that Jesus pronounced a word, or promise, of healing, (3) that the child was healed ' in that hour,' and (4) by making it clear that the patient was not a servant but a son.¹ In the first three points, Jn. agrees with Mt.; in the fourth, he interprets Mt.; in all, he differs from Lk.

(b) The Words of the Lord are differently arranged by Mt. and Lk. Mt. groups sayings according to 18. Its ' Words,' their subject matter. Lk. avows in his preface (13) an intention to write ' in (chronological) order,' and he often supplies for a saying a framework indicating the causes and circumstances that called it forth. Sometimes, however, he is manifestly wrong in his chronological arrangement, e.g., when he places Christ's mourning over Jerusalem (13₃₄₋₃₅) early, and in Galilee, whereas Mt. (23₃₇₋₃₉) places it in the Temple at the close of Christ's teaching.²

The Lord's Prayer (Mt. 6₉₋₁₃ Lk. 11₂₋₄). It was perhaps on the principle of ' grouping ' that Mt. added to the shorter version of the Lord's Prayer the words, ' thy will be done, as in heaven so on earth, as having been in part used by Jesus on another occasion (Mt. 26₄₂).³ Mt.'s other addition, ' Deliver us from the evil one,' is not indeed recorded as having been used by Jesus elsewhere, but it resembles the prayer of Jesus for his disciples in Jn. 17₁₅: ' keep them from the evil one ' (and cp 2 Tim. 4₁₈). On Lk.'s changes, see LORD'S PRAYER; they adapt the prayer for daily use, and indicate that Lk. follows a later version of the prayer in his alterations, but an earlier version in his omissions.⁴

The exactly similar passages in the Double Tradition are for the most part of a prophetic or historical character. Some describe the relations between John the Baptist and Christ; another calls down woe on Chorazin; another, in language that reminds us of the thoughts, though not of the words of Jn., thanks God for revealing to babes what He has hidden from the wise and prudent; another pours forth lamentations over doomed Jerusalem. Others, such as, ' But know this, that if the Goodman,' etc., and ' Who then is the faithful and just steward,' etc., appear to have an ecclesiastical rather than an individual reference, at all events in their primary application. All these passages were especially fitted for reading in the services of the Church, and consequently more likely to have been soon committed to writing. On the other hand, those sayings which have most gone home to men's hearts and have been most on their lips, as being of individual application, seem to have been so early modified by oral tradition as to deviate from exact agreement. Such are, ' The mote and the beam'; ' Ask and it shall be given unto you'; ' Take no thought for the morrow'; ' Fear not them that kill the body'; ' Whosoever shall confess,' etc.; ' He that loveth father or mother more than me,' etc.; and note, above all, the differences in the Lord's Prayer. As Lk. approaches the later period of Christ's work, he deviates more and more both from Mt. and

from Mk., perhaps because there was a Judæan as well as a Galilean tradition of the life of Jesus, and Lk., towards the close of his history, depended mainly on the former.

The Parables, owing to their length and number (and perhaps their frequent repetition in varied shapes by Jesus himself, and by the apostles after 19. Its parables. the resurrection), would naturally contain more variations than are found in the shorter Words of the Lord. The parable of the Sower, coming first in order, and having appended to it a short discourse of Jesus (Mk. 4₁₁ f.) that might seem intended to explain the motive of the parabolic teaching,¹ might naturally find a place in the Triple Tradition. But this privilege was accorded to no other parable except that of the Vineyard, which partakes of the nature of prophecy.²

The longer discourses of the Double Tradition show traces of a Greek document, often in rhetorical and almost poetic style. Changes of words such as ἠθέλησαν for ἐπεθύμησαν, βασιλεία for δίκαιοι, ἐκλαύσατε for ἐκόψασθε, σιτομέτριον for τροφήν, ἀπίστων for ὑποκριτῶν, may indicate merely an attempt to render more exactly a word in the original; but such substitutions as (Lk. 13₂₇) ἀδικία for (Mt. 7₂₃) ἀνομία, and (Lk. 11₁₃) '[the] Holy Spirit' for (Mt. 7₁₁) ' good things,' may indicate doctrinal purpose. The original of Lk. 11₁₃ was perhaps (i) πᾶν ἀγαθόν (as Ja. 1₁₇), (ii) πᾶν ἀγαθόν, (iii) πᾶν ἅγιον (as in Ps. 143₁₀ ' thy spirit is good,' τὸ ἅγιον [Kc. a RT] ἁγιάθου). Lk. appears to have the older version when he retains (Lk. 14₂₆) ' hate his father,' Mt. (10₃₇) ' love more than me.'

Other variations indicate a corruption or various interpretation of a Greek original (not, of course, precluding a still earlier Hebrew³ one): e.g., Mt. 10₂₉ δύο στρονθία ἀσσαριῶν was probably in Lk.'s text στρονθία β. ασσαριῶν which he read as β. ασσαριῶν, i.e., ' for two farthings,' and then he added ε (' five') before στρονθία to complete the sense. Perhaps a desire to make straightforward sense, as well as some variation in the MS., may have led Lk. to substitute τὰ ἐνότια for τὸ ἐνός in Mt. 23₂₃₋₂₉ Lk. 11₃₇₋₅₂.⁴ This last passage exhibits Lk. as apparently misunderstanding a tradition more correctly given by Mt. In Mt. it is part of a late and public denunciation of the Pharisees in Jerusalem; in Lk. it is an early utterance, and in the house of a Pharisee, Christ's host. Probably the use of the singular (Mt. 23₂₆ ' Thou blind Pharisee '), together with the metaphor of the ' cup and platter,' caused Lk. to infer that the speech was delivered to a Pharisee, in whose house Jesus was dining. The use of (Lk. 11₃₉) ὁ κύριος (see below, § 38), makes it probable that Lk.'s is a late tradition. Other instances of Lk.'s alterations are his change of the original and Judæan (Mt. 23₃₄) σοφοὺς καὶ γραμματεῖς into the Christian (Lk. 11₄₉) ἀποστόλους. Lk. also omits the difficult (Mt. 23₃₄) στανῶσθε. In Mt. 23₃₄, Jesus is represented as saying, ' Wherefore, behold I send unto you prophets . . . and some of them shall ye slay and crucify,' etc.; in Lk. 11₄₉, ' Wherefore also the Wisdom of God said, I will send unto them prophets . . . and some of them shall they slay,' etc., omitting ' crucify.' Here Lk. seems to have preserved, at least in some respects, the original tradition, whereas Mt., interpreting ' the Wisdom of God ' (cp 1 Cor. 1₂₄ ' Christ the Wisdom of God ') to mean Jesus, substituted for it ' I.' Also Mt. retains an apparently erroneous tradition (23₃₅) which made ' Zachariah ' ' son of Barachiah'; Lk. omits the error.

In the ' parables of exclusion —e.g. the Wedding Feast, the Talents, and the Hundred Sheep—it may be said that Mt. lays more stress on the exclusion of those who might have been expected to be fit, Lk. on the inclusion of those who might have been expected to be unfit.

Thus, in the Wedding Feast, Lk. adds (14₁₅₋₂₄) the invitation of ' the poor, the maimed,' etc.; Mt. adds (22₁₋₁₄) the rejection ² Mk. 12₉ (also Mt. and Lk.) ' he will destroy the husbandmen—i.e., the Jewish nation. The parable of the Sower may also be said to predict the history of the Church, its successes and failures.

of a guest who has no wedding garment, and, in the Talents (25 30), the casting out of the 'unprofitable servant.' In Mt. 23 to 13 47 the inclusion of πομπή prepares for an ultimate exclusion. The conclusion of the Hundred Sheep is, in Mt. 18 12-14, 'It is not the will of my Father in heaven that one of these little ones should perish'; in Lk. 15 7, 'There shall be joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth.' The Single Traditions of Mt. and Lk., when examined, will be found severally to reveal the same tendency to dwell on exclusion and inclusion; and this will confirm the inference, in itself probable, that the hand of each Evangelist is apparent in the varying characteristics of the parables of the Double Tradition.

(iv.) Jn. in relation to 'The Double Tradition.' The Discourses in Jn. have almost for their sole subject the Father as revealed through the Son, and lie outside the province of the precepts, parables, and discourses of the Double Tradition. In the Synoptists, Jesus is a teacher of truth; in Jn., Truth itself.

The word 'light' (not used by Mk.) is employed by Mt. and Lk. (Mt. 5 16 6 23 Lk. 8 10 11 33 36) to signify the light given by the teachers of the Gospel, or else the conscience. The Disciples themselves are called by Mt. (5 14) 'the light of the world.' Jn. introduces Christ as saying (8 12) 'I am the Light of the World.' Again, Mt. 7 13 14 and Lk. 13 24 declare that the 'gate' is narrow; Jn. implies that it is not objectively narrow, but only to those who make it so, 2 being no other than (10 7) Christ himself, through whom the sheep (40 9) 'go in and go out,' and 'shall find pasture.' Mt. 7 23 speaks of sinners as being excluded by ἀνομία (breaking the law of Moses), Lk. 13 27 substitutes ἀδικία (breaking the law of justice); Jn., not in his Gospel but in his Epistle (1 Jn. 3 4, cp with 5 17), appears to refer to some controversy about these words when he pronounces that ἀμαρτία is ἀνομία in the true sense, and that all ἀδικία is ἀμαρτία.

Though Jn. never mentions 'praying' but always 'asking' or 'requesting,' he nevertheless introduces Jesus as uttering, in his last words (17 1-15), a kind of parallel to the Lord's Prayer, of such a nature as to imply that what the disciples were to pray to God for, as future, Jesus thanked God for, as past.

It is true that prayer and praise are combined, and the words are wholly different: for example (17 1) 'the hour is come' has no counterpart in the Lord's prayer. But (a) 'the hour,' in Jn., means (12 23-27) 'the hour of glorifying the Father through the Son,' that is to say, 'the hour of doing his will and establishing his kingdom'; so that, in essence, 'the hour is come' means 'Thy kingdom is already come.' So, too (6) (17 6), 'I have manifested thy name to the men whom thou hast given me' means, in effect, 'Thy name hath been hallowed.' (c) The prayer that, as the Son has glorified the Father on earth, so the Father may glorify the Son in heaven (17 5 παρά σεαυτῶ) with the glory which he 'had before the world was,' means, in effect, 'Thy will hath been done on earth; so may it now be done in heaven as it was from the beginning.' (d) Also, remembering that 'the words' of God are the 'bread' of man, we find in 17 8 ('the words thou gavest me I have given them') an equivalent to 'I have given them day by day their daily bread.' (e) The declaration (17 11-15) that he has kept all except the son of perdition 'in the name' given him by the Father, seems to mean 'I have prevented them hitherto from being led into temptation.' (f) Last comes the one prayer not yet realised (17 15), 'keep them safe from the evil one (ἐκ τοῦ πονηροῦ)' which seems to allude to the clause in Mt.'s version 'Deliver us from the evil one (ἀπὸ τοῦ πονηροῦ).'¹

Possibly there is also an allusion to Mt. 10 34 Lk. 12 51, 'I have not come to bring peace' (not as though denying the truth of Mt. and Lk., but as though supplementing what, by itself, would be a superficial statement), in Jn. 14 27 'Peace I leave with you, my peace I give unto you,' and (16 33) 'These things I have spoken . . . that in me ye may have peace.'

Jn.'s agreement with Lk. 14 26 'hateth . . . his own soul (or life),' against Mt. 10 37 'loveth more than me' (omitting 'soul'), in Jn. 12 25 'he that hateth his soul in this world,' indicates Jn.'s belief that Lk. has preserved the older tradition. But Jn.'s addition shows his sense of the obscurity of Lk., who did not make it clear that 'father,' 'mother,' and 'soul,' are to be 'hated' only so far as they are 'in this world'—i.e., instruments of temptation.

More conjectural must be the theory of an allusion to the Double Tradition in Jn. 19 30 κλίνειν τὴν κεφαλὴν, used of Jesus on the Cross. It is commonly rendered 'bowing' his head, but no authority is alleged for this.⁴ The expression is not found

³ Even in this last clause Jn. implies partial fulfilment already: 'They have been delivered': now let them be kept in a state of deliverance.

⁴ When Lk. means 'bowing,' he uses 24 5 κλίνειν τὰ πρόσωπα εἰς τὴν γῆν. And the word 'bow' is so common in the Bible in the LXX, and occurs in NT only in Mt. 8 20 Lk. 9 58, 'The Son of man hath not where to rest his head.' But there is pathos and power in the thought that the one place on earth where the Son of man 'rested his head' was the Cross, and the one moment was when he had accomplished the Father's will.

IV. INTRODUCTIONS (Mt. and Lk.).

(i.) The effect of prophecy in these is very manifest. The agreement of Mt. and Lk. in the introductions describing the birth and childhood of 21. Introductions: Jesus consists in little more than fragments from Is. 7 14, which, in the Hebrew, is, Mt. and Lk. 'A young woman shall conceive and bear a (or, the) son and shall call his name Immanuel,' but in G, 'The virgin (παῖς) shall be with child and bring forth a son, and thou (i.e., the husband) shall call his name Immanuel.' This was regarded as having been fulfilled, not by the birth of Isaiah's son recorded in Is. 8 3 f. (but cp IMMANUEL) but by the birth of the Messiah. In the earliest days of the Jewish Church of Christ, the Messiah would naturally be described in hymns and poetic imagery as the Son of the Virgin the Daughter of Sion. In Rev. 12 1-6 'the Man Child' is born of a woman 'clothed with the sun,' who evidently represents the spiritual Israel. Eusebius (HE v. I 45) quotes a very early letter from the church of Lyons where the 'Virgin Mother' means 'the Church,' and other instances are frequent.¹

(ii.) Philonian Traditions about every child of promise would tend in the same direction: (i. 131) 'the Lord begat Isaac; Isaac (i. 215) 'is to be thought not the result of generation but the shaping (πλάσμα) of the unbegotten.' The real husband of Leah is (i. 147) 'the Unnoticed (ὁ ἡσυχάζουμος),' though Jacob is the father of her children. Zipporah is found by Moses (i. 147) 'pregnant, (but) by no mortal.' Tamar is (i. 598-9) 'pregnant through divine seed.' Samuel is (i. 273) 'born of a human mother' who 'became pregnant after receiving divine seed.' Concerning the birth of Isaac, Philo says (i. 148): 'It is most fitting that God should converse, in a manner opposite to that of man, with a nature wonderful and unpolluted and pure.' If such language as this could be used by educated Jewish writers about the parentage of those who were merely inspired by God's Word, how much more would even stronger language be used about the origin of one who was regarded as being filled with the Word, or the Word himself!

(iii.) Justin and Irenæus confirm the view that prophecy has contributed to shape the belief in a miraculous conception. Justin admits that some did not accept it, but bases his dissent from them on (Tryph. 48) 'the proclamations made by the blessed prophets and taught by him (i.e., Christ).' Irenæus says that the Ebionites declared Jesus to have been the son of Joseph (iii. 21 1) 'following (κατακολουθήσαντες),' those who interpreted 'virgin' in Is. 7 14 as 'young woman (παῖς).' Prophecy will also explain the divergence between Mt. and Lk. Some, following the Hebrew, might say that the divine message came to Mary, the mother of the Lord, others (following G) might assert that the message came to Joseph, Mary's husband. Lk. has taken the former course, Mt. (though inconsistently) the latter. Prophecy also explains Mt.'s and Lk.'s attitude toward that the non-use of κλίνειν κεφαλὴν to represent it throughout G and NT makes it improbable that it would represent 'bowing' here.

the Messianic name 'Immanuel.' Jesus was not (any more than Isaiah's son) called by this name, and Lk. omits all reference to it. Mt. (or the author of Mt.'s Introduction),¹ though he represents Joseph as receiving the Annunciation, represents people in general as destined to give Jesus this name, and alters the prophecy accordingly (Mt. I.21-23), 'Thou shalt call his name Jesus . . . that it might be fulfilled They shall call his name Immanuel.'

(iv.) Divergence of Mt. and Lk.—For the rest, Mt. and Lk. altogether diverge. Both the genealogies of Jesus (according to all reasonable interpretation) trace his descent through Joseph, not through Mary,² and there survive even now traces of a dislocation between them and the Gospels in which they are incorporated.³ The Genealogies (for an account and analysis of which see GENEALOGIES ii.) appear to have denied, the Gospels certainly affirm, a Miraculous Conception.

(a) Mt. I. 16, in its present text, has 'I. δὲ ἐγέννησεν τὸν Ἰωσήφ τὸν ἀνδρα Μαρίας, ἐξ ἧς ἐγεννήθη Ἰησοῦς ὁ λεγόμενος Χριστός. But Ss. has 'J. begat Joseph; Joseph, to whom was espoused Mary the Virgin, begat Jesus, who is called the Christ.' 'Bogat' is also retained by a, b, Bobb. and S. Germanensis, even though they make 'Mary' the subject.⁴ This indicates that the original had simply (a) 'James begat Joseph, and Joseph begat Jesus.' Then, when the belief in the Miraculous Conception arose, various corrections were made, such as (b) 'to whom was espoused, or betrothed, Mary the Virgin,' or 'the husband of Mary,' to indicate that the 'begetting' was to be taken in a putative sense, or to refer the reader to what followed as a corrective of the formal genealogical statement. Then (c), 'Mary' was repeated as the subject of a new clause in the genealogy, but with the repetition of the now misplaced 'begat.' Then (d), some altered 'begat' into 'brought forth, others into 'from whom was begotten.'

(β) Lk. 3.23 (WH) has καὶ αὐτὸς ἦν Ἰησοῦς ἀρχόμενος ὡσεὶ ἑτῶν τριάκοντα, ὃν νῆος, ὡς ἐνομίζετο, Ἰωσήφ. But Ss has, 'And Jesus, when he was about thirty years old, as he was called the son of Joseph, son of Heli,' etc., which is not a complete sentence. D has ἦν δὲ Ἰησοῦς ὡς ἑτῶν τριάκοντα ἀρχόμενος ὡς ἐνομίζετο εἶναι νῆος Ἰωσήφ, etc., and just before, has (3.22) ἐγὼ σήμερον γεννήθηκα σε: but both Clem. Alex. (407) and Iren. (ii. 22.5) read ἐρχόμενος (for ἀρχόμενος), and interpret it as 'coming to baptism.' D may be interpreted to mean that Jesus, at the beginning of his thirtieth year, was (really), as he was supposed to be, the son of Joseph, but that, in the moment of baptism, he was begotten again by the Holy Spirit. Ss will have the same meaning if we insert 'was' as the missing verb, 'Jesus . . . [was], as he was called, the son of Joseph.'⁵ The Acta Pilati throw light on almost forgotten Jewish charges against Jesus that may have influenced some Evangelists, inducing them to lay stress on the fact that Jesus was really 'the son of Joseph,' or at all events that Mary, at the time of the birth of her first-born, was 'espoused to Joseph.'⁶

³ This is all the more important if the tradition recorded by Clem. Alex. is correctly interpreted to mean that 'those portions of the Gospels which consist of the genealogies were written first' (see below, § 80).

⁵ Ss, however, has above (not 'This day I have begotten thee,' but) (Lk. 3.22), 'Thou art my Son and my beloved.' But this may have been taken as equivalent to 'I have begotten thee to-day as my Son.' Codex b has 'quod videbatur et dicebatur esse filius Joseph'; a follows D.

⁶ In Acta P. (A and B) 2.3f., the 'elders of the Jews' say to Jesus, 'Thou art born of fornication,' (B, 'of sin'), to which other pious Jews reply (2) (A), 'we know that Joseph espoused (or betrothed) (ἐμπόνησεν) Mary, and that he is not born of fornication'; (2) (B), 'we know that Joseph received Mary his mother in the way of espousals, to guard her,' of which another version is (3), 'His mother Mary was given to Joseph for

As regards the childhood of Jesus, Mt. looks on Bethlehem (2.) as the predicted home of Joseph and Mary, and mentions their going to Nazareth as a thing unexpected and (2.23) a fulfilment of prophecy. He also mentions (as fulfilments of prophecy) a flight into, and return from, Egypt, and a massacre in Bethlehem. Neither of these is mentioned by Lk., and the latter is not mentioned by any historian.¹ But a typical meaning is also obvious in both Mt.'s narratives; Jesus is the vine of Israel 'brought out of Egypt.' He is the antitype of Moses, who was saved from the slaughter of the children under Pharaoh. Lk. treads the safer ground of private and personal narrative, except so far as he has given trouble to apologists by his statement about an enrolment that took place under Quirinius, which was the cause why Joseph and Mary left their home in Nazareth in order to be enrolled at Bethlehem, the home of their ancestors.² Instead of prophetic there is contemporary and typical testimony:—Anna, the prophetess of Asher, representing the extreme north; the aged Simeon representing the extreme south; and Elizabeth and Zachariah, of the tribe of Levi.

As regards the Baptist, while omitting some points that liken him to Elijah, Lk. inserts details showing that, from the first, John was foreordained to go before the Messiah, not really as Elijah, but (1.17) 'in the spirit and power of Elijah.'

(v.) Jn. in relation to the Introductions is apparently, but not really, negative. In his own person he makes no mention of Nazareth or Bethlehem. He takes us back to the cradle (Jn. 1.1) 'in the beginning,' as though heaven were the only true 'Bethlehem (House of [the] Bread [of life]).' The fervent faith of the first disciples defies past prophecies about Bethlehem, and present objections as to Nazareth and Joseph, by admitting the apparent historical fact to be fact, and yet believing (1.45 f.): 'We have found him of whom Moses in the law, and the prophets, did write, Jesus, the son of Joseph, the man of Nazareth.' When the objection is urged against (1.46) 'Nazareth,' faith in the personality of Jesus overwhelms the objector with the mystical reply (1.46), 'Come and see.'³ In Mt.

espousal, not in actual wedlock, but to guard (eis μνηστῆρας, οὐ γαμικῶν, ἀλλ' εἰς τήρησιν).' The first of these three versions defends Jesus against the Jewish charge, but surrenders the Miraculous Conception. The second is obscure. The third sacrifices the defence, but retains the miracle.

² Quirinius was governor of Syria, A.D. 6, ten years after this time. The most plausible explanation suggested is, perhaps, that Quirinius was twice governor of Syria; but there is no direct, and scarcely any indirect, evidence to justify the belief. There is also no proof that Mary's presence was obligatory. That Lk. invented such an 'enrolment' is impossible; but that he antedated it is highly probable. Making (or revising) a compilation toward the close of the 1st century, he might naturally consider that the 'enrolment' supplied an answer to the difficult question, 'How came the parents of Jesus to Bethlehem at the time of the birth?' See CHRONOLOGY, § 50 f.; also QUIRINIUS.

³ For the meaning of this Rabbinical formula, see Schöttg. and Hor. Hebr., ad loc., and Westst. (on Jn. 1.40) who quotes, among other illustrations, Rev. 6.1. It introduces the explanation of a mystery. Note also a similar contrast between personal belief and pedantic unbelief in 7.40 ff.: 'Some . . . when they heard these words, said, This is . . . the prophet . . . but some said, What, doth the Christ come out of Galilee? Hath not the Scripture said that the Christ cometh of the seed of David and from Bethlehem?' And compare the subordinate 'officers' (7.46, 'Never man so spake') with 'the chief priests and Pharisees' (7.52, 'Out of Galilee ariseth no prophet'). Westcott says, on Jn. 1.42, 'There is a tragic irony in the fact that the condition which the objectors ignorantly assumed to be unsatisfied, i.e. birth in Bethlehem, was actually satisfied.' But are we to believe that Jesus knew that the 'condition' was 'satisfied,' and yet left the objectors in their ignorance, so as to keep back from them the fulfilment of God's word, making himself responsible for the 'tragic' consequences? And in the face of such an objection, publicly and persistently made, is it credible that a conspiracy of silence should have been maintained by Christ's relations, friends, and neighbours? This, at all events, cannot be disputed, that Jn. represents the

it is the fulfilment of prophecy; in Lk. it is the testimony of visions and voices pointing to John as the messenger of the Messiah, and to the Messiah himself; in Jn. it is (14), 'the glory as of the only begotten of the Father'—that constitutes the true testimony to Christ.

V. THE CONCLUSIONS.

The conclusions (Mt. Lk. and Mk.-App.) in effect treat of Christ's resurrection. 24. 'The Conclusions': method. This the genuine Mk. does not describe, breaking off abruptly at (168), 'for they were afraid.'¹

i. The Evangelists select their evidence.—Mt. mentions two appearances. In the first, Christ appears to women who 'held his feet'; in the second, to the Eleven; but it is added that 'some doubted.' In Lk. Christ never appears to women. Indeed, Lk. almost excludes such an appearance by speaking of (2423) 'a vision of angels,' which the women are reported to have seen, without any mention of Christ's appearing to them. In this omission he resembles Paul, who enumerates several appearances to men but none to women.² Now, in giving a list of the 'appearances' on which he had laid stress, an apostle might write thus in a letter to his own converts. But Lk. writes as a historian, giving Theophilus evidence that he might know 'the exact truth.' Him, therefore, we might reasonably expect not to omit any important testimony, known to him, concerning Christ's resurrection. His omission, in itself, disposes of the theory that the differences of Lk. from Mt. arise from mere haste or carelessness of observation, like those with which we are familiar in a court of justice. Like a glacier-worn rock, Lk. exhibits the signs of attempts to smooth away points of objection. Not, of course, that he invents. But while adopting old traditions, he accepts adaptations suggested in the course of new controversies. He shows a desire to prove, improve, edify, reconcile, select—motives natural, but not adapted to elicit 'the exact truth.'

(ii.) The Period of Manifestations.—Even for the coolest and most judicial historian, the difficulty of reconciling and selecting must have been very great. Jn., though he mentions only three manifestations, implies (2030) that there were many more. Not improbably the period of appearances and voices was much longer than is commonly supposed.³ Mt. tells us, concerning the only manifestation that he records as made to the Eleven, that (2817) 'some doubted,' while disciples as believing in a 'Jesus of Nazareth,' whilst the unbelieving Pharisees demand a 'Jesus of Bethlehem.'

25. Duration of Manifestations. For the evidence of spuriousness (lately increased by the discovery of the Sinaitic Codex of the Syriac Gospels) see WH 2 (notes), pp. 29-31.

² The only evidence is Acts 13 δὲ ἡμερῶν τεσσαράκοντα, where D reads, in different order, τεσσεῖς ἡμ. without δὲ. In Hebrew 'days' sometimes means 'some, or several, days,' as in Gen. 404, 'They continued [for some] days (ἡμέρας) in ward.' By corruption, or tradition, M (i.e. 'forty') might easily be added to ΗΜΕΡΩΝ (or ΗΜΕΡῶ) before or after it; and the number would suit OT traditions about Israel, Moses, and Elijah. The Valentianists supposed Christ to have remained with his disciples eighteen months: Pistis Sophia, ch. 1 mentions eleven years. Lk. indicates that the disciples were to remain (Acts 14 f.) in Jerusalem till the descent of the Spirit, i.e., two or three days. Apollonius indicates (Eus. v. 18 14) 'from tradition, a period of twelve years': Clem. Alex. (764) says, 'In the Preaching of Peter, the Lord says to the disciples after the Resurrection, 'I have chosen you twelve disciples, judging you worthy of me . . . that those who disbelieve may hear and testify, not being able to say in excuse, "We did not hear"; but, just before, (762) 'Peter says that the Lord said to the apostles. . . . After twelve years go forth to the world, lest any should say, We did not hear. Perhaps there was a confusion between 'twelve years' and 'twelve (really eleven) apostles.' See below (§ 89), for the evidence that Barnabas and Jn. disagreed with Lk. as to the day of the Ascension.

others 'worshipped.' If other manifestations were of the same kind, different observers might record them differently. To testify to the resurrection was the special duty of an apostle, and such testimony was oral. The two earliest Gospels (even if we include Mk.-App. as genuine) contain very much less about the resurrection than the two latest. When at last the apostles passed away, and it became needful to write something about Christ's rising from the dead, and to add it to the already existing manuals of his teaching, the writers might find themselves forced to choose a few typical instances that seemed to them most 'according to the Scriptures,' and best adapted for edifying the Church. At first, they might be content (as Paul was) with bare enumerations; but, when the time came to fill in details, the narrators might supply them, partly from prose traditions, partly from the most ancient and popular of those hymns, which, as Pliny testifies, they sang to Christ as to a god, on the day on which they celebrated his resurrection, partly from the Scriptures on which the earliest witnesses for Christ's resurrection lay so emphatic a stress.

(iii.) Traces of poetic tradition.—In the more ancient traditions of Mk. and Mt., some details appear to arise from hymnal traditions.¹ Later accounts

26. Poetic tradition. indicate an intention to convey either (as Lk.) 'proofs' of a historical fact, or (as Jn.) 'signs' indicative of the real though spiritual converse held with the disciples by the risen Saviour.

(iv.) Discrepancies.—Mt.'s account appears to have been (in parts at all events) the earliest. The testimony of the soldiers to the Resurrection (where

27. Discrepancies. note the words (2815) 'to this day') was dropped in subsequent gospels, perhaps owing to the unlikelihood that Roman soldiers would risk their lives by a falsehood such as Mt. describes.²

Henceforth there was (Mk., Lk., Jn.) no 'guard'; the stone was not 'sealed'; there was no 'great earthquake'; an angel did not descend from heaven; the women came, not 'to look at the tomb' (for they had carefully 'looked at' it before (Mk.

² Later writers modify Mt.'s account so as to soften some of its improbabilities. Pseudo-Peter makes the soldiers tell the whole truth to Pilate, who (at the instance of the Jews) enjoins silence. In some MSS of Acta Pilati (A) the soldiers try to deny the truth, but are supernaturally forced to affirm it. The retention of Mt.'s story, with modifications, in apocryphal books of the second century that delighted in the picturesque, does not prove a late origin. Some have thought that Mt.'s tradition is proved to be late by the excess of 'prophetic gnosis' in it. But that, alone, is not a sure criterion. The difficulties presented by Mt.'s account of the 'dead bodies of saints arising,' and of the women 'grasping the feet of Jesus,' and the bald statement that 'some doubted,' all suggest early origin. The use of 'prophetic gnosis' depends in large measure not on the date but on the personal characteristics of the writer. For example, there is more in Mt. than in Jn. But the existence of 'stumbling-blocks' is a sure sign of an early date. In course of time, sceptics and enemies detected and exposed 'stumbling-blocks,' and subsequent evangelists adopted traditions that sprang up to remove or diminish them.

1:47 Lk. 23 55), but to 'bring spices' for the purpose of embalming the body. But when did the women buy them? When the Sabbath was 'quite passed (διαγενομένου)' says Mk. (16:1). Not so, says Lk. (23 56); they bought them first, and then 'rested on the Sabbath.' Again, what was the use of the 'spices' if the 'great stone' was in the way? Mk. gives no reply. Lk. obviates the objection by not asserting that the stone was 'great.' Pseudo-Peter, who has committed himself to a 'very huge stone,' replies, 'the women determined, if they could not enter, to leave the spices outside the door.' Jn. says in effect, 'The women brought no spices. The body had received this honour already from Nicodemus.' From this point, incompatibilities constitute almost the whole narrative. The women (1) came to the tomb (Mk. 16:2 (a) Mt., Lk., Jn.) very early, before dawn, or while it was yet dark, yet (Mk. 16:2 (b) after sunrise; (2) they said (Mk.) nothing to anyone, yet (Lk.) they told the Eleven everything; (3) they (Mk., Mt.), were to bid the Eleven go 'to Galilee,' yet (Lk.) they were merely to remind the Eleven of what Jesus had said 'in Galilee,' or (Jn.) they (or rather Mary) brought no message at all from angels, but subsequently a message from Jesus that he was on the point of 'ascending'; (4) they (Lk., and perhaps Mk.) entered the tomb, yet (Jn., prob. Mt.) they did not enter it; (5) the angel was (Mk., Mt.) one, yet (Lk. Jn.) two; (6) the angel (or angels) (Mt.) encouraged the women because they sought Jesus (Mt. 28 5): 'Do not ye² fear, for I know that ye seek Jesus,' and yet (Lk.) blamed them for so doing (Lk. 24 5: 'Why seek ye the living among the dead?'); (7) The Eleven (Mk., Mt.) were to go to Galilee to see Jesus, yet (Lk., Jn.) they saw him in Jerusalem, and were (Acts) not to depart from Jerusalem (apparently not having left it since the resurrection); (8) Peter (Lk. 24 12, v.l.⁴) looked into the tomb and then went home without entering, yet (Jn.) Peter entered the tomb; (9) Mary (Jn.) was not to touch Jesus because he had not yet ascended, yet (Mt.) the women held fast his feet though he had not yet ascended; (10) when the two disciples from Emmaus reported that the Lord had appeared to them, the Eleven (Mk.-App. 16 13) did not believe, yet (Lk.) they replied 'the Lord is risen indeed'; (11) the Lord (Mt. Jn.) appeared to the disciples in Galilee, yet (so far as we can judge from Lk. and Acts) no manifestations in Galilee could have occurred.

(v.) Lk.'s view ('proofs').—Lk. concentrates himself on the accumulation of (Acts 13) 'proofs,' by (1) rigidly defining the time when Jesus 'ascended and left his disciples,' (2) re-'proofs,' presenting Jesus as appearing merely in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, so as to omit all appearances in Galilee where 'some doubted,' (3) giving the impression that the women saw nothing but (24 23) 'a vision of angels,' (4) recording no apparition that was not attested by at least 'two [male] witnesses,' (5) introducing Jesus as eating⁵ in the presence of his disciples.

Yet even Lk. shows loopholes for detecting possible misunderstanding of metaphor. Compare, for example, Lk.'s narrative of the Lord's drawing near, and conversing with the two disciples on their way to Emmaus, with the Martyrdom of Polycarp (ii.) 'the Lord was standing near and conversing with them (παρεστῆς ὁ Κύριος ὡμίλει αὐτοῖς). In the latter, the 'standing near' is spiritual; and so may have been (originally) the 'drawing near,' and the 'conversing,' in the former.⁶

The difficulties that befell Lk. in his attempt to ascertain the facts may be illustrated by the probable explanation of his omission of the appearance of Christ to Peter. In reality, Peter was probably one of the two disciples journeying to Emmaus, as is repeatedly assumed by Origen. But Lk.'s tradition confused the story, by attributing to the Eleven the words really uttered by the two travellers. Lk. 24 33 f. should have run (as in D), the travellers 'found the Eleven and those with them, and said

² 'Ye' is emphatic. The soldiers might well be afraid, but the women were not to be afraid.

³ This is still more obvious in Pseudo-Peter, 'But if ye believe not, stoop and look.'

⁶ Also 24 31, 'their eyes were opened (διανοήθησαν)' may be a metaphor meaning that 'their eyes were opened to discern Christ in the Scriptures' (cp. Lk. 24 45, Acts 16 14, where it is used of opening the mind, or heart); and their 'constraining' the Lord's presence (παρεβιάσαντο) at the breaking of bread, reminds the reader of the implied precept to resort to 'violence' in prayer (Lk. 16 1, and cp. 18 1-5).

(lit. 'saying,' λέγοντες, not λέγοντας) 'the Lord is risen indeed and hath appeared to Simon.'¹ This is consistent with Mk.-App., who says of the two travellers, 'they went away and told it unto the rest (i.e., to the Eleven), neither believed they them.'

(vi.) The Manifestation to the Eleven (Mk.-App., Lk., Ignatius), occurring in Mk.-App. 29. 'The 'afterwards,' but in Lk. while the two travellers are telling their tale, is described by the latter as follows (24 39): 'See my hands and my feet that it is I myself: handle me and see (ψηλαφήσατέ με καὶ ἴδετε); for (ὅτι) a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me having. [And when he had said this, he shewed them his hands and his feet.] And while they still disbelieved for joy and wondered, he said unto them: Have ye anything to eat here (ἔσθιάδε)? And they gave him a piece of a broiled fish [and a honeycomb.] And he took it and did eat before them.' Cp Ignatius, Smyrn. 3: 'For I know and believe that he was in the flesh even after the resurrection; and when he came to Peter and his company (τοῖς περὶ Πέτρον), he said to them: "Take (λάβετε), handle me (ψηλαφήσατέ με) and see that (ἴδετε ὅτι)³ I am not a bodiless demon." And straightway they touched him and believed, being mixed with (κραθέντες) his flesh and his Spirit (or, v.l., blood).⁴ For this cause also they despised death, and were found superior to death. And after his resurrection he ate with them and drank with them as being in the flesh' (ὡς σαρκικός) although spiritually united with the Father.' The word λάβετε (as in Mk. 14 22 Mt. 26 26 λάβετε [φάγετε]) is grammatically, as well as traditionally, adapted to express a Eucharistic meaning,⁵ and the words, 'mixed

² WH regard the bracketed words as an insertion 'at a period when forms of the oral Gospel were still current.'

³ 'See that' is prob. the rendering of ἴδετε ὅτι here (so Lightf.), though in the corresponding passage in Lk. it means 'see, because.'

⁴ The best MSS are in favour of πνεύματι.

⁵ No instance has been alleged of the use of λάβετε in the sense of the middle, λάβεσθε, 'take hold of.'

There are several signs of early variations as to this tradition both in Ignatius and in Lk. The words 'and see that I am not a bodiless demon' dislocate the sentence, which begins with an appeal to touch, not to sight. We know from Origen (see Lightf. ad loc.) that these words were in the Preaching of Peter which he rejected, and we have reason to believe that they were not in the Gospel of the Hebrews, as known to him and Eusebius; Lightf. suggests that they were added in the recension of that Gospel known to Jerome. Cancelling them, we should have, as the original, in the Gospel of the Hebrews, 'Take me; and they straightway handled him and believed.' As regards Lk., Irenæus (iii. 14 3), when quoting passages from Lk. accepted by Marcion and Valentinus, omits this passage, though Tertullian inserts it as part of Marcion's Gospel. Possibly Irenæus considered that Marcion was quoting it from some apocryphal source (though Tertullian does not say so, but merely accuses Marcion of perverting the passage). Irenæus himself nowhere quotes this passage, but alludes to the assumption about 'spirits' expressed in it, in v. 23 'For the Spirit (τὸ γὰρ πνεῦμα) hath neither bones nor flesh.' Tertullian ((a) Marcion 4 43, (b) De Carne Christi 5) quotes the words twice, omitting the appeal to handling, and also omitting 'flesh.' Even in (a), the context shows that he is not quoting a mutilated text of Marcion's; but (b) makes it certain that the omission is Tertullian's own. He quotes thus, (a) 'See my hands and feet that it is I myself,' (b) 'See that it is I'; and in both cases adds, 'for a spirit hath not bones as ye see me having.' In the context of (b), he asserts that a spirit has 'flesh,' but has not 'bones,' 'hands,' and 'feet.' Marcion (according to Tertullian) interpreted the passage thus: (Marcion 4 43) 'A spirit hath not bones, as,' i.e. and so, 'ye see me having [no bones]': and he remarks that Marcion might as well have cancelled the passage as interpret it thus. [In (b) Clark has, by error, 'hath not flesh and bones' instead of 'hath not bones.'] A fragment of Hippolytus from Theodoret (Transl. Clark, p. 95) has: 'For He, having risen . . . when His disciples were in doubt, called Thomas to Him and said, "Reach hither; handle me, and see: for a Spirit hath not bones and flesh, as ye see me have."'

D (differing from d) has (Lk. 24 39) ψηλαφήσατε καὶ with his flesh and spirit (or blood),¹ implying a close union such as binds each member of the Church to Christ in the one Body or one Bread, may very well be a part of the tradition (or of some comment on it) from which Ignatius is quoting. If so, the original (though not the Ignatian) meaning may be correctly expressed by the Armenian paraphrastic version, 'they believed, who (or, and they) were participators of the Eucharist (lit. communicated), and who (?) feasted before on his body and blood.' In other words, the disciples not only received a vision and an utterance of the Lord, but also were made one with the body and spirit (or blood) of Christ and were raised above the fear of death by participating in the Eucharist and therein handling his flesh. These facts, being literalised in later narratives, may have given rise to the statements, made in good faith, that they had 'handled' Christ's 'body, or that Christ had given them his 'body' to 'handle.'

(vii.) The historical estimate of Lk.'s Tradition must be lowered, (1) by evidence of his other errors and misunderstandings given above, (2)

30. Historical estimate of Lk. by the variations in the corresponding tradition quoted by Ignatius and Tertullian, (3) by the fact that, about A.D. 110, Ignatius, bishop of Antioch (of which city Luke [Eus. 3.46] is said to have been a native), wishing to attest the reality of the bodily resurrection of Christ, quotes from an unknown authority a passage that omits all mention of 'eating,' and neither here nor elsewhere refers to the testimony of Lk. This certainly leads to the inference that Lk. had not, in the mind of Ignatius, that preponderant authority which a 'canonical' or even authoritative Gospel might be expected to have.¹

Lk.'s evidence must not be dismissed without a reference to Acts 14, συναζόμενος, which really meant 'assembling with,' but was probably interpreted by Lk. (as by patristic commentators, e.g. Clement, Epist. to James and Hom. 15.13) 'eating with,' cp Acts 10.41: 'Not to all the people, but to witnesses, to those foreordained by God, namely ourselves, who (σὺν ἑμοῖς) ate and drank with him after the resurrection from the dead.' This, when combined with Acts 14 Lk. 24.43 and Lk. 13.26 ('we have eaten and drunk in thy presence'; not in parallel Mt. 7.22) indicates a consistent interpretation of such a nature as (possibly) to convert metaphorical accounts of spiritual intercourse and revelation into literal accounts of historical 'proofs.'

(viii.) Jn.'s view (signs). In Jn., 'proof' is entirely subordinated to 'signs'—i.e., spiritual symbolism. The first manifestation of Jesus is to a woman, 31. Jn.'s who (20.16) does not recognise him till called 'signs,' by name. The Ascension is mentioned as impending and as (apparently) preliminary to being (20.17) 'touched.' In the second manifestation, Jesus conveys to 'the disciples' the Holy Spirit which (7.39) could not be conveyed till after the Ascension—a fact indicating that, in the interval between the two, Jesus had ascended. In a third (making the second to 'the disciples'), he offers himself to the 'handling' of the incredulous Thomas, and pronounces a blessing on those who have not seen yet have believed. In a fourth, (21.14 'the third' to 'the disciples'), he is in Galilee, directing the seven fishermen in their task of catching ἴδετε τὸ πνεῦμα οὐκ ἔχει καὶ σὰρκας καθὼς ἐμε βλέπετε ἕσθαι. Codex a has 'Handle me yourselves' (reading αὐτοὶ for αὐτός in what precedes). In Ss the passage, which has been (142) scraped with a knife, runs thus, 'Behold, see my hands and my feet, and feel and see that it is I; for a spirit . . . flesh and bones . . . as . . . see me . . . When . . . not . . . were. Again he said unto them, 'Have ye here anything to eat?' Codices a b d and Brix. omit 'me' after 'handle.'

The emphasis laid on 'bones' may have arisen from an allusion to Is. 66.14 (ⒺβναⒶⒶ): 'Your bones shall spring up.' 'Blood' was omitted, perhaps in accordance with a sense that it could not appeal either to sight or to touch. (Justin [Tryph. 75] indicates something specially non-human about the blood of Christ.)

the one hundred and fifty-three¹ fish in the net of the Church, and feeding them with the One Bread and the One Fish before they go forth to preach the Gospel to the world. Then, without definite demarcation of the period of manifestations and voices, the Gospel ends.

In all this, the difference between Jn. and Lk. is obvious. Take, for example, the first manifestation to the disciples. In

32. Contrast between 'signs' and 'proofs.' Jn., the disciples are not (Lk. 24.37) 'terrified and affrighted'; they have received the message from Mary in which Jesus calls them his 'brethren,' and when Jesus 'stood in the midst' of them,² they 'rejoice' as soon as they see 'the hands and the side.'³ They do not (as in Lk.) suppose Jesus to be a 'spirit' (or, as D., 'phantasm'); they require no appeal to sight or touch; nor does Jesus eat in their presence. The object of the first manifestation in Jn. is apparently not to prove the Resurrection but to convey the Spirit to the disciples. There is no explanation of prophecy; the Spirit is conveyed at once, not promised as a future gift. The appeal to touch comes afterwards. The incredulity of Thomas (absent on the first occasion) makes Jesus reproachfully suggest on a second occasion that the incredulous disciple may touch the wounds in his hands and side; but it is not indicated that Thomas does this. The words that follow suggest that it was not done: (20.29) 'Because thou hast seen thou hast believed': (it is not said, 'Because thou hast touched').⁴

The same spiritual (as distinct from Lk.'s logical) purpose pervaded Jn.'s sign of the 'seven'—who, if 'proof' and not a 'sign' had been intended, should have been 'the Eleven.'⁵ There is indeed some similarity between the words of Jesus in Jn. 21.5: 'Children, have ye any meat?' and those in Lk. (24.41): 'Have ye here anything to eat?' But how great a difference in reality! In the latter case the Messiah deigns to take food from the disciples in order to meet their (Lk. 24.38) 'reasonings'; in the former, the Saviour gives himself to the 'children' to strengthen them for the work of the Gospel.

² This 'standing in the midst,' however, is from prophetic gnosis: see Ps. 22.22, quoted by Heb. 2.11 f. and by Justin (Tryph. 106): also cp Lk. 24.36.

The rarity of ἐμφανῶν, which occurs in NT nowhere except in Jn. 20.22, suffices to make the reference to Gen. 27 certain. Philo also frequently quotes Gen. 27 (with ἐμφανῶν) to contrast the 'earthy' or 'first' man with the 'spiritual' or 'second' man. Not improbably Jn. also has in mind that Ignatian tradition which described the apostles as 'mixed with his flesh and his spirit.' (Careful analysis of all the passages where Ignatius combines 'flesh and spirit' and 'flesh and blood' makes it probable that 'spirit' (not 'blood') is the correct reading. At the same time, if both traditions were prevalent, Jn.'s first manifestation to the disciples would express the 'being mixed with his spirit,' and the second (that to Thomas) the 'being mixed with his blood'.)

In any case, Jn. takes this historically sacred word, traditionally associated with the creation of man, and represents it as dramatised in an act, in which the Logos remakes man in the Divine image, 'breathing into' him that Spirit of himself which (as Paul says, 1 Cor. 15.45) was not only 'living (ζῶν)' but also 'life-giving (ζωοποιῶν),' so as to enable the disciples to transmit life to others.

is a curious contrast between the personal and as it were private nature of Christ's last words': Paul. utterances in Jn. and the public or ecclesiastical utterances recorded by Lk., Mk.-App., and the last verses of Mt.

In Jn., 'Hither, break your fast,' 'Lovest thou me?' 'Feed my sheep,' 'If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?' In the Synoptists, either (Mk.-App.) the injunction to preach the Gospel, the prediction of condemnation for those who will not believe and be baptized, and the promise of signs such as the 'casting out of devils,' 'tongues,' 'lifting up serpents,'¹ drinking poison, etc., and healing the sick; or else (Mt.) 'baptizing them in the name of the Father and the Son and the Holy Spirit, teaching them to keep all things as many as I commanded you,' and a farewell in Galilee, with an assertion that Jesus possesses all power, and a promise that he will be always present with the disciples; or, lastly (Lk.), an 'opening' of the disciples' minds to understand the Scriptures, and a long statement that the Scriptures 'must needs have been thus fulfilled,' and that there must be the preaching of repentance in his name 'with a view to the remission of sins to all the nations—beginning from Jerusalem,'² and then a promise, and a warning that they must remain in the city till the promise is fulfilled:—concerning all which utterances we are warned by our knowledge of the various accounts of Christ's revelations to Paul that we must accept none of them as necessarily representing the actual words of Christ himself, though (in various degrees, and subject to various qualifications) they may be regarded as revelations to the Early Church, conveyed, during the period of manifestations, to this or that disciple, in the same way in which the vision and the voice were conveyed to Paul at his conversion.³

³ The Testimony of Paul, in any full discussion of the Resurrection, would come first and claim a detailed consideration. Here we can only observe on 1 Cor. 15:3-8 that (1), among the earliest traditions communicated to converts, was a doctrine (probably oral, παρέδωκα) on the Resurrection of Christ; (2) in this tradition, 'accordance with the Scriptures' played a prominent part; (3) the manifestations of Christ were described by the word 'appeared (ὤφθη), a word regularly denoting visions [the only instance in which it is used in NT of the appearance of a material body is Acts 7:26]; (4) Paul places first an appearance to Cephas, and last but one an appearance to James, neither of which is recorded in our canonical Gospels; (5) he excludes all appearances to women; (6) he places the appearance of Christ to himself on the same footing as those witnessed by the apostles; (7) he speaks of the risen body as 'a spiritual body' (on which, note that Clem. Alex. (970-972) says that every spirit has a 'body,' and that demons are called 'bodiless' only in comparison with the spirits that are destined to be saved), and as being (8) the same, in kind, for Christ, as for the faithful after death—i.e., as we should infer, not a tangible body. (9) The latest of Paul's speeches on his vision repeats, as from Jesus, a long discourse (Acts 26:14-18). It then continues (ib. 19) 'Whereupon . . . I was not disobedient unto the heavenly vision.' But Paul's earlier speech (22) assigns to Jesus merely a portion of this discourse, while another portion (mentioning 'a witness' and 'sins') occurs (22:15 f.) in the report of a speech of Ananias to Saul, and another (mentioning 'the Gentiles') is uttered by Jesus indeed, but on a much later occasion (22:18-21) when the apostle was in a 'trance.' On the other hand, in the earliest account of the vision, the mention of Saul's mission to 'the Gentiles' is made by Jesus (9:15) not to Saul, but to Ananias; and Jesus is represented as saying to Saul no more than occurs in 22.

These facts lead to the following general conclusions:—(a) Words recorded as having been uttered by Jesus may really have been heard in the course of a 'vision.' (b) Words recorded as uttered in a 'vision' may have been heard in the course of a 'trance.' (c) The alleged occasion of utterance may really be a confusion of two or even more occasions. (d) Some of the words may have proceeded not directly from Jesus, but indirectly, through an inspired speaker.

VI. SINGLE TRADITIONS.

(a) THE FIRST GOSPEL.—(i.) Doctrinal and other characteristics.—That Mt. was primarily intended for Jewish readers is suggested by the stress laid

34. Single tradition: Mt. on prophecy; the tracing of genealogy back to Abraham (not, as in Lk., to Adam; cp GENEALOGIES ii.); the Sermon on the Mount corresponding to the Law given on Mount Sinai; the contrast between what had been said 'of old time' and what the new Lawgiver prescribed; the word 'lawlessness' (altered in Lk. 13:27 to 'iniquity'), used by Mt. alone, and the strong condemnation of him who (Mt. 5:19) breaks, or teaches others to break, 'one of the least of the commandments.'¹

Mt.'s parables point less to the inclusion of the Gentiles than to the exclusion of unworthy Jews. He alone has the saying (22:14): 'Many are called but few chosen.' He seems to move amid a race of backsliders, among dogs and swine unworthy of the pearls of truth, among the tares sown by the enemy, among fishermen who must cast back again many of the fish caught in the net of the Gospel. 'The broad way' is mentioned by him alone, and the multitude of those that go thereby, and the guest without the wedding garment, and the foolish virgins, and the goats, and those who even 'cast out devils' in the name of the Lord and yet are rejected by him because they 'work lawlessness.' He alone introduces into the Lord's Prayer the words 'Deliver us from the evil (one).' Elsewhere he alone gives as a reason for not being distracted, 'sufficient for the day is the evil thereof.' The wavering or retrogression of many Jewish converts when the breach between Jews and Gentiles widened, about the time of the siege of Jerusalem, may well explain the emphasis laid by Mt. on backsliding; and the condemnation of 'lawlessness' might refer to Hellenising Jews who considered that the new law set them free from all restraint, and who, in casting aside every vestige of nationality, wished to cast aside morality as well. Yet Mt. prefers (12:33) even open and consistent wickedness to the sin of the 'hypocrites' whom his Gospel continually denounced (the word occurs in Mt. 13 times, in Mk. 1, in Lk. 3, in Jn. 9); and he dwells more than the rest on the blessings of the meek, the merciful, and the little ones whose angels behold the face of the Father.

Besides the fulfilments of prophecy or type mentioned in his Introduction, Mt. sees several others not mentioned in the Triple Tradition.

Some of these, e.g. that relating to the (21:2-5) 'ass and the colt,' (27:9) 'the potter's field,' (12:40) the 'three days and three nights in the belly of the whale' as representing the time of Christ's remaining in the tomb, and the (23:35) apparently inaccurate reference to Zachariah the son of Barachiah, contain such obvious difficulties that they may be regarded as evidences of early, not of late composition,² and the same applies to (2:23) 'He shall be called a Nazarene,' which is found in no existing book of prophecy. See NAZARETH.

Apart from his account of the Resurrection, few new miracles are introduced by Mt. Two of these consist of acts of healing. Two are connected with Peter, (1) Mt. 14:28-32, the walking on the water, (2) Mt. 17:24, the coin in the fish's mouth. As to these, the omission of the former by Mk. and Jn., who record what precedes and follows, points to the conclusion that it is a poetic symbolism of Peter's lapse and restoration. A metaphorical explanation probably applies also to the latter.³

³ See an extraordinary comment in Ephraem (p. 161) 'So when Simon . . . took his net and went to cast it into the sea, they also went with him' (cp Jn. 21:3, 'I go a-fishing. They say unto him, We also come with thee'). Also cp Philo (I 499) on 'the holy didrachm,' and Clem. Alex. (947), where he says that 'the fish' hints at (αἰνίττει) God-given food, and that the stater might admit 'other solutions not unknown (ὅτι ἀπονομύνας)'—which implies a tradition of symbolism on this incident. For other traces of Philonian symbolism in the Synoptic Gospels, cp Mt. 13:33 and Lk. 13:21 on the 'leaven' which a woman 'hid (ἐνέκρυπεν, ἐκρύψεν) in three measures (σάτα) of meal,' with (ii.) Evidence as to date.—When Mt. recorded the prediction that the apostles (10₂₃) would not 'accomplish the cities of Israel' until the Son of man had 'come,' must he not have assumed that, in some sense, he had 'come' already? If so, this will explain the difficult expression in 28₆₄, 'ye shall henceforth, or immediately (ἀπ' ἄρτι), see the Son of man, etc.'¹ It would seem that, as Jn. saw at least a primary fulfilment of Zech. 12₁₀ ('They shall look on him whom they pierced') in the moment when the spectators of the Cross gazed on the pierced side of Jesus, so Mt. regarded the 'coming of Christ with power' as commencing from the time of the sacrifice on the Cross, or of the Resurrection. But, whatever be the interpretation, the difficulty of this and some other passages leads to the belief that Mt. has in some cases preserved the earliest tradition. Other passages point to a very much later date—e.g., the name of the 'Field of Blood' borne (27₈) 'to this day,' the charge of stealing Christ's body repeated (28₁₅) 'to this day,' and the mention of 'the Jews' in the same passage as an alien race; also the recognition of (7₁₅) 'the false prophets' as a definite class to be avoided, and of (18₁₇) 'the church' as the arbiter in quarrels. Perhaps, too, when viewed in the light of the Didaché, the precepts (5₂₄) to be reconciled with a brother before 'bringing one's gift to the altar,' and (7₆) to avoid casting pearls before swine, indicate a time when the Eucharist had so long been celebrated in the Church as materially to influence the general traditions of the doctrine of Christ.

(iii.) Jn. in relation to Mt.'s Single Tradition.—Jn. often agrees with, but intensifies, the doctrine of Mt.

Mt.'s depreciation of (5₂₁₋₄₈) the teachers of old time is more strongly expressed in Jn.'s (10₈) 'thieves and robbers'; Mt.'s (11₃₀) 'easy yoke' is less strong than Jn.'s (8₃₁), which implies that Christ's service

36. Its relation to Jn. shall deliver from every yoke; Mt. 12₅₋₇ 'the priests profane the Sabbath' is not so clear as Jn. 7₂₂ 'on the Sabbath ye circumcise a man'; and Mt.'s (12₃₄, 28₃₃) 'offspring of vipers' and 'serpents' (Satan being 'the serpent') is less forcible than (Jn. 8₄₄) 'ye are of your father as the devil'. Mt., alone of the Synoptists, describes the Pharisees as (16₁₄) 'blind,' and mentions (15₁₃) 'the rooting up' of Pharisaism, and (16₂₇) the rewarding of men according to their works; and similar thoughts will be found in Jn. 9₃₉₋₄₁, 15₄₋₅, 5₂₉. In a very few cases Jn. appears to be tacitly correcting Mt.'s Single Tradition. Perhaps Mt.'s doctrine of 'little children' and the stress laid by him on 'meekness' appeared to Jn. liable to be perverted into a confession that Christianity was a religion of weakness and puerility.² At all events, though he alone of the Evangelists supports Mt. 21₅ in quoting Zech. 9₉ 'Behold thy king cometh, he omits 'meek (πραΐς)'³ on which the Rabbis (Schöttg. 2139, 171, etc.) laid emphasis; and, whereas Mt. immediately afterwards (21₁₅, f.) describes the testimony to Jesus as that of 'babes and children,' Jn. (12₄₂, f.) states that 'even of the rulers many believed on him.' In a few other passages (Mt. 28₂₂, 25, Jn. 13₂₄, f.; Mt. 26₅₂, Jn. 18₁₁), though partly correcting Mt., Jn. appears to be rather supporting him against omissions or statements of Mk. and Lk.

(b) THE THIRD GOSPEL.—(i.) Literary form.—(a) The Dedication of Lk.—The dedication (1₁₋₄) shows that we have passed into a new literary province. The Muratorian fragment

37. Single tradition: Lk. calls attention to the fact that the author writes 'in his own name,' a novelty among evangelists. He also dedicates his work to some one who, if not an imaginary 'God-beloved,'⁴ would appear to be

Philo (1₁₇₃) on 'the three measures (μέτρα) of the soul' that are to be 'kneaded' like cakes (ἐγκυβήτια) wherein the sacred doctrine 'must be hidden (κεκρυφθαι)'. After the destruction of the Temple, Vespasian compelled Jews in all parts of the Empire to pay the didrachm to the Roman Treasury. Among Christian Jews there may have arisen the question whether they, being no longer 'Jews,' were liable to pay it.

¹ Mk. 14₆₂ omits 'immediately.' Lk. 22₆₀ substitutes 'shall be' for 'ye shall see.' Cp also Mt. 16₂₈ 'till they see the Son of man coming in his kingdom,' Mk. 9₁ 'the kingdom of God having come,' Lk. 9₂₇ 'the kingdom of God.'

² Cp 1 Cor. 14₂₀ 'be not children (παιδία) in mind: howbeit in malice be ye babes, but in mind be men' (see also 1 Cor. 8₁, 13₁).

⁴ Cp Lightf. BE 197, 'Theophilus, if a real person and not a nom de guerre.' Theophilus, in itself, is not an unlikely a patron, a man of rank. The apostles—the (12) 'eye-witnesses and ministers of the word'—appear to have 'delivered' their testimony by oral tradition (παρέδοσαν) and to have passed away. To supply their places (1₁) 'many' had 'attempted to draw up a formal narrative (ἀνατάξασθαι διήγησιν)' concerning the matters fully established in the Church. These writers had clearly not been eye-witnesses, nor were they, in Lk.'s judgment, so successful as to make unnecessary any further attempts. Apparently they had failed in the three points in which he hopes to excel: they had not (1) 'traced everything up to its source (παρηκολουθηκότι ἄνωθεν πάντων), and this (2) 'accurately (ἀκριβῶς), and (3) they had not written 'in order (καθεξῆς).'

All this affords an interesting parallel to the description of the collection of the Mishna by R. Judah (Hor. Hebr. 1161). 'When he saw the captivity was (sic) prolonged, and the scholars to become faint-hearted, and the strength of wisdom and the cabala to fail, and the oral law to be much diminished—he gathered and scraped up together all the decrees, statutes, and sayings of the wise men.' For 'the captivity was prolonged,' substitute 'the Lord delayed his coming,' for 'sayings of wise men' substitute 'traditions (παράδοσεις) and narratives (διηγήσεις),' some of which were probably based on the Psalms of Israel and the hymns of the first generation of Christians—and we have the same phenomena introducing themselves. Catechumens were disturbed by the diversity of traditions; catechists and evangelists themselves found it hard to distinguish the genuine from the spurious; it was time to 'gather and scrape up together' the traditions—especially those upon the Resurrection and the Incarnation, and to do this with such exactness (ἀκριβῶς) that the catechist might 'know the certainty (ἀσφάλεια)' about the points of Christian faith.

(β) Linguistic characteristics.—As a corrector, in the Triple Tradition, Lk. has been shown above to be a linguistic purist, and his insertions

38. Its style. often indicate a love of sonorous and compound words (18₂₂, 17₃₃). But in his Introduction, when describing the days before the Nativity (as also when describing the first days of the church in Acts), the narrative takes an archaic and Hebraic turn.

The vocabulary of Lk. is largely borrowed from the LXX, and in particular from the Apocrypha—e.g., ἐπιβλεψόν, ἀποπασθέντων, ἐπιβάλλει (in the sense of 'belonging'), ἐπιστοιχισμός, the use of ὕμνος for God, σιγαμή, ἀντιβάλλειν, εὐθετος, περισπάσθαι, κείρος ἐπισκοπής, δοχὴ and λουστειλεῖ. Cp Lk.'s story of the rich fool (12₁₉) with Eccles. 11₁₈; Lk. 18₇ ('Though he bear long with them [μακροθυμεῖ] . . .') with Eccles. 22₂₂; Lk. 1₄₂ ('Blessed art thou among women') with Judith 13₁₈. Often there is an allusive use of LXX words. Cp Lk. 23₅₁ (about Joseph of Arimathea who had not 'consented to' the decision of the Pharisees) with Ex. 23₁, 'Thou shalt not consent quasi (συγκαταθήσῃ) the unjust'; Lk. 23₄₉ with Ps. 88₈ 'Thou hast put mine acquaintances (γνωστοίς) far from me'; and Lk. 20₂₀ ἐγκάθευτος with Job 19₁₂, 31₉; also Lk. 1₇ προβεβήκότες ἐν ταῖς ἡμέραις with Gen. 18₁₁ προβεβήκότες ἡμεραν. It is difficult to decide whether those portions of Lk. which approach the LXX in name for a Jew. And the omission of κράτιστε in Acts 1₁ might be explained on the ground that Lk. thinks it in bad taste to be-noble a young catechumen too much (just as Dion. Halic. Orat. Antig. [Reiske, 5 445] begins and ends [6 1128] a treatise with κράτιστε Ἄμμαϊε, but intersperses [719] τῷ φιλότατῳ and [722] βέλτιστε). To use the term obtrusively is characteristic of 'the obsequious man' in Theophr. Charact. 5, ἄνδρα κράτιστον εἰπών (Jebb, 'after a large display of respect').

κράτιστε certainly cannot refer to social qualities alone. This is proved (1) by Lk.'s use of the vocative in Acts 24₃, 26₂₅ (and cp 23₂₆); (2) by 2 Mac. 4₁₂, Jos. Ant. iv. 28 (in the latter, vocatively), where it is applied to 'young men of distinction or nobility,' and cp Lucian 2₇₂ Κρητῶν οἱ κράτιστοι, . . . οὐχὶ οἱ ἰδιωταὶ μόνον, ἀλλὰ καὶ οἱ βασιλικώτεροι καὶ πρωτεύειν ἀξιούντες. (3) Dion. Halic. seems (as quoted above) to distinguish between κράτιστε and βέλτιστε. (4) It seems highly probable that the author of the first part of the Epistle to Diognetus has Lk. in view when writing (§ 1) ἐπειδὴ ὥρα, κράτιστε Διογνήτη, where 'Diognetus' represents not a Christian, but an inquirer, and is probably a fictitious name. If so, this tends to show that he regarded Lk.'s 'Theophilus' as representing a typical catechumen, just as his own 'Diognetus' represented a typical inquirer. On the whole, the impression left by the use of the name is that it is typical of one who might be addressed in a twofold sense as (Hamlet, i. 5₃₈) 'thou noble youth.' Philo undertakes a treatise on the Creation (1₁) 'for the sake of the God-beloved (τοῦ Θεοφιλοῦ).' And does not Lk.'s (Acts 1₁) τὸν μὲν πρῶτον λόγον ἐπονομάσθη περὶ πάντων, ὃ Θεόφιλε, sound like an echo of Philo 2₄₄₄ ὃ μὲν πρότερος λόγος ἦν ἡμῖν, ὃ Θεόδοτε, περὶ τοῦ . . . ? Tatian speaks of (12) 'interpretations (of Scripture) which being published in writing make those who give heed to them greatly beloved of God (θεοφιλείς).'

rhythm and vocabulary are translations from Hebrew documents, or imitations, conscious or unconscious, of the hooks of the LXX. But the use of ὁ Κύριος,¹ 'the Lord'—in (7 r3) the raising of the widow's son at Nain, (10 1) the appointment of the Seventy, (11 39) the rebuke of the Pharisees, (12 42) the preface to the parable of the faithful and just steward, (13 r5) the healing of the daughter of Abraham hound by Satan, (17 5 f.) the parable of the sycamore tree, (18 6) the parable of the unjust judge, (19 8) the story of Zacchæus, (22 61) Christ's looking on Peter, and the verse (24 3) where it is said that 'they found not the body of the Lord Jesus'—confirms the theory (which is also supported by internal evidence) that these passages in Lk. are translations. Another test-word is Ἱερουσαλήμ. Lk. uses Ἱερουσαλήμ about twenty-six times, Ἱεροσόλυμα only three times (22 19 28 23 7). The latter form is sometimes used geographically by writers who use the former rhetorically or historically; but it is remarkable that in 22 2 and 41 the two forms should be used, apparently in the same sense, ἀγγέλον αὐτὸν εἰς Ἱερουσόλυμα and ἐπορεύοντο εἰς Ἱερουσαλήμ.² Cp JERUSALEM, § 1.

(ii.) Doctrinal Characteristics.—The key-note of Lk.'s doctrine is touched in the song of Zacharias over the

39. Its spirit. Baptist, and struck more clearly in the song of Simeon over the child Jesus; proclaiming, in the first case, redemption for (1 77) 'God's people,' in the second, for (2 31 f.) 'all the peoples, a light for revelation of the Gentiles.'

The implied (4 16-30) rejection of the Jews in favour of the Gentiles at the outset of Christ's public life in Nazareth is a chronological error; but it indicates the tendency of the Gospel. When (Mt. 6 32) 'the Gentiles' are condemned as seeking pleasures, Lk. is careful to add (12 30) 'the Gentiles of the world,' i.e., those who are spiritually Gentiles; and Lk.'s 'seventy' missionaries are emblematic of the Gospel to 'the nations.' Mk. makes no mention of the Samaritans; Mt. has merely (10 5) 'Go not into any city of the Samaritans'; but in Lk. the sons of Zebedee are rebuked for desiring to call down fire on a Samaritan village; a just Samaritan shames both priest and Levite; and a grateful Samaritan puts nine Jewish lepers to the blush. As for the law, it is valid as long as Jesus is a child or (2 51) 'subject to' his parents; but as soon as he has been baptized, it is regarded as (4 18 16 16) superseded because fulfilled.

Lk.'s Gospel is abundant in contrasts. It couples 'blessings' with (Lk. 6 24-26) 'woes.' It proclaims a conflict pending—between God and Satan, forgiveness and sin, self-renunciation and worldliness—which is to culminate in the triumph of mercy imparting to the Gentiles (24 47) a message of 'repentance and remission of sins.'

When Satan departs from Jesus, it is only (4 r3) 'for a time'; Satan binds a daughter of Abraham, is heheld by Jesus 'fallen from heaven,' enters into Judas, and demands the Twelve that he may 'sift' them. There is a sharp demarcation between rich and poor. It is 'the poor,' not (as Mt. 5 3) 'the poor in spirit,' that are 'blessed.' In Lk., Christ pronounces a woe upon them that are rich, rebukes the 'cumbered' Martha, exhorts the rich to entertain the poor, and dooms the rich fool to a sudden death, while Dives is consigned to unalterable torment. But, above all, Lk. contrasts 'repentance' with pride. If Lazarus is contrasted with Dives, the grateful Samaritan with the ungrateful Jewish lepers, the merciful Samaritan with the heartless priest and Levite, and the trivial anxieties of Martha with the simple devotion of Mary, much more does the publican find his foll in the Pharisee who prays by his side; the woman 'which was a sinner' and 'loved much,' in Simon the churlish host who loved little; the prodigal younger son in the envious elder son; and the penitent thief on the right in the impenitent thief on the left. All these stories, as well as that of Zacchæus, and the lost piece of silver, must have appealed with great force to many who applied to themselves the words of Ephes. 2 1: 'And you did he quicken when ye were dead through your trespasses and sins'; they magnify the power of forgiveness—contrasting the instantaneous and complete victories of faith (for the most part 'without works') with the inferior results of a long life of ordinary and prudent respectability.

² Another test-phrase is εἶπεν δέ, frequent in Genesis and the early part of Exodus, but rare or non-existent in later books. It does not occur in Mk. or Mt. In Jn. it occurs only (a) in the interpolated 8 11, the woman taken in adultery; (b) in 12 0 [where D transposes δέ, and Ss omits εἶπεν δέ ('Now Judas did not care'), the original probably being simply, 'Not that Judas cared']; (c) in 21 23 οὐκ εἶπεν δέ, where δέ is supported by M^{BC} and is perhaps genuine, meaning 'however.'

In Lk. (as also in Acts) it is frequent, mostly in his Single Tradition, but sometimes in the Double or Triple when he introduces words or arrangements of his own. In view of these facts, Mt. 12 47, bracketed by Tischendorf and placed by WH in marg., should be rejected as an interpolation.

'day by day,' both in the Lord's Prayer and in the precept to 'take up the cross,' indicates

40. Its aim. a purpose in the writer to produce a practical Gospel. Lk. seems to see, as the main obstacles to the Faith, not 'hypocrisies' nor Jewish backsliding, but the temptations of wealth and social position acting upon half-hearted converts; and his sayings about 'building the tower,' 'putting the hand to the plough,' 'renouncing all one's possessions,' and 'hating' father and mother, are pathetic indications of what must have been going on in the divided household of many a young 'Theophilus.' The important part played by 'devout women' in Acts prepares the reader for finding prominence assigned to them here. Lk. alone gives us the songs of Mary and of Elisabeth, and the testimony of Anna. The mother of the Lord (not Joseph) ponders in her heart the words of her Son, and her sufferings are made (2 35) the subject of prophecy; Lk. alone mentions the domestic anxieties of Martha and the devoted faith of her sister, the cure of the afflicted 'daughter of Abraham,' the woman who invoked a blessing upon the womb that bare Jesus, the story of her who 'loved much,' and the parable of the woman rejoicing over the lost piece of silver. Lot's wife is mentioned by him alone; nor do we find in any other Gospel the utterance of Jesus to the 'daughters of Jerusalem.' Mk. and Mt. concur with Lk. in pronouncing a blessing on the man who gives up father or mother or lands or houses for Christ's sake; but Lk. alone adds 'wife.'

Strangely incongruous with these sayings and with the great body of Synoptic doctrine, are the parables of the unjust steward, the unjust judge, and the friend persuaded by importunity. The moral of them appears to be 'Copy the world, only in an unworldly fashion.' Yet the thought, the style, and the language, make it difficult to believe that Jesus uttered these parables in their present shape; and the last two (as they stand) seem at variance with his command to remember that the Father knoweth what things we need before we ask for them. Everything points to the conclusion that we have here, and probably elsewhere in Lk., discourses, based indeed on Christ's doctrine but not containing his words or modelled after his methods and style. Else, why, in the parable of the Shepherd, do we find the dramatic element in Lk. 15 6 whilst it is absent in Mt. 18 13? and why do Lk.'s parables alone introduce the soliloquy—e.g., in the case of the rich fool, the prodigal son, the unjust steward, the unjust judge?

(iv.) Evidence as to date.—Lk., more clearly than Mk.-Mt., describes the fall of Jerusalem as the result

41. Its date. of a siege and capture. He also more definitely sets a term for all troubles. Lk. alone has the exhortation to (21 28) 'look up.' Omitting the remarkable saying of Mk. and Mt. that the Son himself knoweth not 'the hour,' he declares that the trampling down of Jerusalem will be only till 'the times of the Gentiles are fulfilled.' Then will come a time of 'distress'—not, however, now for Israel, but for the Gentiles—and amidst convulsions of nature the Son of man will come. In the hope of this coming, the disciples are to lift up their heads, remembering that, although some of them will be 'slain,' not a hair of their heads will be injured. The comparatively cheerful discourse on the Coming, combined with the joyful and triumphant tone of the Introduction, accords with the general tenor of Lk. when compared with Mt., and indicates as the author a Christian Gentile to whom (as to Barnabas) the fall of Jerusalem was an accepted and not unwelcome fact. Writing with recollection, but not under the present pressure, of persecution, when the Church was making rapid progress in the conversion, not only of the slaves, the poor, and the 'devout women,' but also of the higher and more educated classes in the Roman Empire, the Evangelist seems to be looking forward to the moment when 'the times of the Gentiles' would be 'fulfilled,' and the Son of man would suddenly 'come.' Such a date might be reasonably fixed at the close of Vespasian's or the beginning of Nerva's reign.¹ See ESCHATOLOGY, § 84 f.

¹ Acts 28 30 ('And he (Paul) abode two whole years [in Rome]') suggests, at first sight, that Acts—and, a fortiori, (Acts 15 11)

(v.) Supernatural Narratives peculiar to Lk., apart from the Introduction and the Conclusion, are: (1) the miraculous draught of fishes; (2) the raising of the widow's son at Nain; (3) the healing of the woman bound by Satan; (4) the cure of the dropsical man; (5) the appearance of the angel strengthening Jesus, and (6) the healing of the severed ear.¹

As regards (6), its omission by all the other Evangelists is, in itself, almost fatal to its authenticity, and it is probably to be explained as the result of a literary misunderstanding. There was probably some tradition—ambiguous or obscure, and omitted by Mk.—that Jesus said (a) 'let it (i.e. the sword) be restored to its place.' This was misunderstood by Lk. as meaning (b) 'let it (i.e. the ear) be restored.' He therefore substituted (b) for (a), and amplified his narrative in such words as to leave no ambiguity.²

(vi.) Lk.'s position historically.—We are led to the conclusion that, although Lk. attempted to write

43. Its relative trustworthiness. 'accurately' and 'in order,' yet he could not always succeed. When deciding between an earlier and a later date, between this and that place or occasion, between metaphor and literalism, between what Jesus himself said and what he said through his disciples, he had to be guided by evidence which sometimes led him right, but not always.

In regarding the story of the fig-tree as a metaphor, and the promise about treading on scorpions as a spiritual promise, and in placing the home of the infant Jesus at Nazareth, not at Bethlehem, he was probably right. The Feeding of the Four Thousand he may have rightly rejected as a duplicate of the tradition about the Five Thousand. But he himself seems to give in his Mission of the Seventy a duplicate of the Mission of the Twelve.³ His two-fold description of Jesus as mourning over Jerusalem, once (19.34) in Galilee, and once (19.41) near the city itself, seems an error of an inferential character (like his inference from the expressions 'cup' and 'platter,' that a certain discourse of Jesus was uttered at the table of a Pharisee).⁴ Again, Mk. and Mt. show traces of duplicate traditions concerning the insults offered to Jesus in the Passion; and these (combined with the Psalmist's predictions about Acts 4.22) 'The kings of the earth' may have led Lk. to adopt a tradition—not mentioned by the other Evangelists—that Herod joined with Pilate to persecute Christ. In the journey to Emmaus and the Manifestation to the Eleven, it has been shown (§ 28.f) that he seems to take metaphor for literal statement. Some textual ambiguity may have induced him to believe that the Nazarenes, instead of (as Mk. and Mt.) 'being caused to stumble in Jesus, tried to cause Jesus to fall' (down a precipice), and that the words uttered to the woman at the anointing⁵ were not 'Let her alone,' but 'Her sins are forgiven her.'

Lk.'s absolute omission of some genuine and valuable traditions—especially in connection with Christ's appearing to women after the Resurrection and with Christ's promise to go to 'Galilee'—though it may be in part extenuated on the ground of the need of selection, and in part almost justified on the ground of the obscurity of the original, nevertheless seriously diminishes the

⁴ Cp Lk.'s accounts of the two Missions (a) 9.3-5 (b) 10.1-12 with Mt.'s account of the single Mission (Mt. 10.7-15), and it will be found that (b) is almost entirely made up of that portion of Mt. which does not occur in (a).

value of his work. Every page of it shows signs of pains, literary labour, and good taste. It is by far the most beautiful, picturesque, and pathetic of all the Gospels, and probably the best adapted for making converts, especially among those who have to do with the life of the household. But, if bald bare facts are in question, it is probably the least authoritative of the Four.

Jn. often intervenes to describe facts mentioned by Mk.-Mt. and omitted by Lk. But, as regards facts mentioned by Lk. alone, Jn. is either silent or gives so different a version of them (as in the case of the Draught of Fishes) that many would fail to recognise an intention to describe the same event. On this point, see the next section.

(vii.) Jn. in relation to Lk.'s Single Tradition.—It is only where Lk. alters, or omits, some Synoptic

44. Its relation to Jn. Tradition, or where he attempts to describe the phenomena that followed the Resurrection, that Jn. (as a rule) steps in to correct Lk. The Fourth Gospel lies outside that large and beautiful province, peculiar to the Third, which deals with the welcome of repentant sinners; and some of the words most in use with Lk.—'repentance,' 'faith,' 'rich,' 'riches,' 'divorce,' 'publican,' and (in the words of Jesus) 'sinner'—are altogether absent from Jn.

Perhaps the only important point of doctrine in which Jn. may be thought tacitly to contradict the Single Tradition of Lk. is prayer, as to which Lk. encourages something approaching to importunity, while Jn. so far discourages it that he avoids the very use of the word, preferring 'ask' or 'request,' and everywhere implies that the essential thing is, not that the petitioner should be importunate, but that he should be 'in Christ,' in which case his petition must be granted.

Lk. aims at chronological order. Jn., while giving a new chronology, groups his history according to symbolical and spiritual principles. Lk. often removes from the old Tradition such words as Atticists might condemn; Jn. seems sometimes to prefer them,¹ and always uses a vocabulary simple even to monotony. Lk. writes what 'eye-witnesses' have 'delivered,' Jn. (not here dissenting, but indicating superiority) writes in the name of eye-witnesses concerning (Jn. 1.14) that which 'we have contemplated (ἐθεασάμεθα).'

So far, Jn. may be said to differ, without correcting; but on one or two points of Lk.'s Single Tradition he seems to write correctively. For example: Lk. 3.2 mentions 'Annas and Caiaphas' as 'high priests,' but Jn. 18.13 describes Annas as the father-in-law of the high-priest Caiaphas; Lk. 22.52 mentions 'generals of the temple,' but Jn. 18.12 'the chiliarch.' Lk., alone of the Synoptists, mentions Martha and Mary together. Mary, he says, was seated at Christ's feet; Martha was 'troubled' (θορυβᾶται, Lk. 10.41) 'about much serving.' Jn. does not contradict this; but he presents us with a different aspect of Martha. Mary, he says, was sitting at home with the Jews; Martha went to meet Jesus, and made a confession of faith in him, and induced Mary to come forth also to meet him.

In two or three instances, Jn. represents as an act what Lk. represents as a word. E.g., Lk. 22.27 ('I am in the midst of you as he that serveth') is parallel to Jn. 13.5, where Jesus 'serves'; Lk. 22.32 ('I have besought for thee') seems parallel to the prayer to the Father in Jn. 17.15 ('keep them from the evil one'). Perhaps we may add Lk. 23.46 ('I commend my spirit') and Jn. 19.30 ('he delivered up [παρέδωκε] his spirit').

(c) THE JOHANNINE GOSPEL.—The Fourth Gospel has been the subject of various (i.) hypotheses of authorship. The internal evidence for these (apart from direct statements) is derivable from (ii.) names, allusions, etc.; (iii.) style; (iv.) structure.

(i.) Hypotheses of authorship.—The Gospel states that (21.20-24) 'the disciple whom Jesus loved' is the witness and writer² of 'these things,' adding 'and we know that his witness is true.' A comparison of several other passages leads (by a process of elimination) to the inference that the author—writing perhaps with some co-operation or attestation of others—was John the son of Zebedee. But the belief that the apostle originated the Gospel is compatible with a conviction that he did not compose or write it in its present shape.

For example, the teaching of the aged apostle may have been taken up by a disciple or 'interpreter,' and may have been ultimately published by the latter, as Peter's is said to have been recorded and circulated by Mark (see below, § 65), Peter's 'interpreter.' If, as Irenaeus says, John the apostle wrote the Apocalypse about A.D. 96, the difference of style between that and the Gospel would necessitate a very long interval to admit even a possibility that he wrote the latter.¹ Suppose the apostle to have been ninety, or, say, only eighty-five, when he wrote the Apoc., and concede an interval of only ten years to allow him to learn a new kind of Greek, change his vocabulary, and adopt a new style, new thoughts, and a new tone, yet this brings us to 106 A.D. and the apostle to the age of a hundred or ninety-five. Is it probable that one so aged could retain powers of memory and expression sufficient for the mental construction, or even the literary expression, of a work in which, as will be shown, every word is weighed and every detail adapted to a spiritual purpose? The improbability is increased by the tradition (reported by Jerome) that towards the close of his life the venerable apostle had to be carried into the midst of the congregation and could do no more than repeat over and over again the injunction 'Love one another.'

If this was so, John's Gospel would nevertheless continue to be preached, probably by one or more of his 'elders,' preaching in his name, say from A.D. 98 to A.D. 110 or A.D. 115. Then it becomes easy to understand how the individuality of an 'interpreter' may have combined with the force of new circumstances—attacks from philosophers without, conflicts with incipient Docetism within—to mould the oral Johannine Gospel into its present shape, first without an appendix, and then, when the nominal author had passed away (say A.D. 108), with the additional chapter that, in effect, alludes (21-23) to his death. Who this 'Elder' or 'interpreter' may have been we cannot now discuss.² For the present it must suffice to point out that, as the Muratorian Fragment enrolls among the canonical books the Wisdom of Solomon, though admitting it to have been written not by Solomon but by Solomon's friends 'in his honour,' so a pupil and 'interpreter' of John, committing to writing a Johannine Gospel, might deem it a merit to ignore his own part in the composition, and to impute it as a whole to his master and teacher. The alternative was to do as Lk. had done: to use 'I' and 'me' in the preface, and to explain that the writer had received his doctrine from the apostle. That, however, was an innovation. The first two Gospels had given no signs of authorship. The Fourth Gospel differs from the Third in method, arrangement, and system, as well as in matters of fact and views of fact. Lk.'s novel precedent might even stimulate the Johannine 'interpreter' to merge his own authorship in that of the apostle, or, rather, in that of 'the disciple whom Jesus loved,' and whom he perhaps regards as a pattern and type of true discipleship.

Some of these points will be more fitly discussed under External Evidence. What has been said above is intended to guard the reader against assumptions fatal to unprejudiced criticism.

For example, it is commonly assumed (1) that the author must be an eye-witness or a forger; (2) that if he knows some things not known to the Synoptists he must know everything known to an apostle and must be an apostle; (3) that the minute details with which the narrative abounds are signs of an eye-witness with a taste for the picturesque, and of an ear-witness with a keen sense of the dramatic.³ On the contrary, (1) if the writer is a disciple regarding himself as the pen of a teacher, he is not to be regarded as a forger; (2) if the writer received from John the apostle some things not known to the Synoptists, it does not follow that he received everything, still less that he must himself be an apostle; (3) if, among a vast store of details of name and number (such as might naturally drop from the lips of a very old man in oral accounts of reminiscences) he selected those which lent themselves to a symbolical meaning, it does not follow that he was an eye-witness or ear-witness; and it may even be that he would have regarded picturesqueness as an impertinence approximating to profanity in one who was attempting to write a Gospel that should be a New Testament 'Scripture.'

(ii.) Evidence from Names, etc.—Here we consider (a) Names, (β) Numbers, and (γ) Quotations.⁴—(a) Names

² See JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE. If it was John the Elder—a contemporary who, as Eusebius (iii. 39) tells us, was confused with the apostle—the imputation of the Gospel to John the apostle might be more easily explained.

³ Some critics actually extend this last inference to the dialogue with the Samaritan woman at which no disciple was present!

⁴ In order to appreciate what follows, the reader must remember (1) that every name, number, detail, and even syllable in Scripture, was generally supposed in Rabbinical tradition to have some spiritual significance; (2) that this significance or symbolism was reduced to a system by the Alexandrian Jews (see Siegfried and Drummond on Philo); (3) that Jn. (as will be shown in foot-notes to this section) was familiar with the Philonian teaching.

of places in Jn. divide themselves into two classes: first, the well known; second, the obscure and contested. Concerning the names, former, Jn. may be shown to write mostly from biblical, or literary, not from local, knowledge. The latter he mentions only when they are adapted for symbolism.

For example: (1) that Jesus (8.20) 'spake in the Treasury' is an error (so far as we know) arising from a supposition that what held in the days of Nehemiah (10.37-39, and cp Neh. 13.5) held also in the time of Christ; ¹ that the temple was built in (2.20) 'forty and six years' was a false inference² from Ezra 1.1 about the second temple. (2) That Jesus (18.1) crossed the Kidron may very well have happened; but the fact appears to be introduced as a parallel to David, who similarly (2 S. 15.23) crossed the Kidron in mourning to return in triumph. (3) The mention of the cornfields of Sychar, or Shechem, far from implying an eye-witness, might have been made by any reader of Philo (1.471) familiar with Gen. 49.15. (4) Dialogues between a Samaritan and a Jew about 'this mountain' ('Gerizim' as compared with Mount Sion, existed among the Talmudists, and it was the custom to place the scene at the foot of the former near Shechem.³ SYCHAR (g.v.) appears to have been an opprobrious name for Shechem (see § 5.4, γ); it adapted itself to the dialogue on 'the living water.' (5) As for the alleged familiarity with Capernaum and its 'sea,' it reduces itself to this, that the writer knew Capernaum to be on the sea-shore, so that people would 'go down' to it, and knew that the sea was large enough to allow men to row—under stress of weather and not necessarily in a straight direction—for (6.19) 'twenty-five or thirty furlongs.'

Passing to 'obscure and contested' places, we find (6) in (8.23) 'Ænon near to Salim' (the var. loc. 'Salem' is cited) (i.e., Fountains near to Peace), a reference to the Baptist's purification by water as a preparation for the higher purification of Melchizedek, king of Salem (or Peace)—i.e., Christ. Cp SALIM. As for (7) the corrupt passage⁴ relating to Bethesda, Bethzatha, or Bethesda, the most probable supposition is that Jn. wished to describe some place of bathing or purification in Jerusalem, that the Jews themselves (Weist. ad loc.) called a bathing place by the Greek-derived name probaté ('sheep-pool'), and that a kindred name appeared to be applied to a pool in Jerusalem by Nehemiah.⁵ Lastly (8), the pool of Siloam, and its spiritual interpretation—which Jn. introduces in the healing of the man born blind, the type of the converted Gentile world—would be known to every reader of Is. 8.6.

(β) Numbers.—If the man at Bethesda represents sinful Israel, his 38 years of waiting might correspond to the 38 years that elapsed before Israel (Deut. 2.14) 'went over the Brook Zered.'⁶ The 153 fish, according to Philonian principles,⁷ would mean (as explained by Augustine) the Church as evolved from the Law and the Spirit. The 6 water-pots 'containing 2 or 3 firkins apiece' (after the Jews' manner of purifying) represent the inferior dispensation of the week-days—i.e., the Law—preparing

Further, how little security there is that names would be accurately preserved in passing from Hebrew to Greek (not to speak of the gulf dividing an oral tradition from Gospels written, say, A.D. 65-110) may be seen by comparing two books of Φ^B in the circumstances most favourable to accuracy, viz., where both translate the same Hebrew original by which errors might be corrected. Cp (a) 2 Ch. 35.15 with (b) 1 Esd. 18.15: (a) $\tau\epsilon\tau\alpha\theta\epsilon$ (b) $\text{Hor}\nu\alpha\omicron\varsigma$, v.8: (a) $\text{A}\mu\alpha\nu$, $\text{I}\delta\epsilon\theta\omega\mu$ (b) $\text{Zaxap}\alpha\varsigma$, $\text{E}\delta\delta\epsilon\iota\omega\upsilon\varsigma$, v.15. Similar discrepancies abound in 1 Esd. and 2 Esd. It was inevitable that variations in obscure Gospel names should abound at the beginning of the second century, leaving it open to the writer to choose that form which seemed most suitable.

² See the Classical Review, '94, pp. 89-93, and the Chronology of Eusebius (ii. 81). A pious Jew would regard Herod as repairing, not as 'building,' the temple. A historian would say, with Josephus (Ant. xv. 115), that Herod built his part of the temple 'in eight years.'

³ Hor. Hebr. on Jn. 4.20.

⁴ The RV rendering 'by the sheep (gate)' is unsupported by any instance of a similar ellipse in Greek literature, and is indirectly condemned by Eusebius and Jerome.

⁷ The Law=10 (the ten commandments); the Spirit (Rev. 1.4 3.1 etc.)=7. According to Philo (1.10), the fulfilment of any potentiality, say 3, is 1+2+3; the fulfilment of 4 is 1+2+3+4. The fulfilment of 10+7 (or 17) is 1+2+3 . . . +17, i.e., 153.—absurd of course to modern readers, but a systematic result of Philonian interpretation, and not thought absurd by Augustine.

the way for the perfect dispensation of the Sabbath—i.e., the Gospel—of which the wedding feast at Cana is a type. Peter (21.8) swims over 200 cubits,² a number that represents (Philo on Gen. 5.22) repentance. The 'five porches' in Bethesda represent the five senses of unredeemed humanity—i.e., the unregenerate passions—and so the 'five husbands' of the Woman of Samaria represent what Philo calls 'the five seducers,' who lead the soul from its union with God.

(γ) Quotations.—Quotations from OT (rare in the Gospel, and non-existent in the Epistle) are condensed and adapted to the context. Almost all

48. Its OT differ both from the Hebrew and from the quotations. LXX, even where these agree. For the most part, Jn. quotes the OT as illustrating fundamental tendencies or pointing to types.³

The words (10.34) 'I said ye are gods' are taken to indicate that all men who have received 'the Word of God' are in some sense divine. (8.17) 'The testimony of two men is true' means that in the spiritual world, as in the material, experience is the test of truth; so that he who can produce the results he aims at is proved to be—so far as the province of the action extends—in the region of truth, having the testimony of 'two' (himself and God, or himself and Nature). From first to last this Gospel abounds in allusions to the OT and is permeated with Jewish tradition, but the author seems to have shared in the growing dissatisfaction felt by Jews with the LXX at the beginning of the second century, and to have been largely influenced by Christian traditions of free quotation.⁴

(iii.) Style.—The Fourth Gospel abounds in iteration—sometimes (α) double, sometimes (β) triple, sometimes (γ) of the same statement expressed positively and negatively—quite different from anything in the Synoptists.

(1.20) 'He confessed, and (γ) denied not, but (α) confessed'; (3.20) 'everyone that doeth ill . . . cometh not to the light but he that doeth the truth (γ) cometh to the light'; (10.7.9) 'I am the door of the sheep. . . I am (α) the door.' (α) In the Baptist's testimony, and at the beginning of the Gospel, the iteration (with or without slight variation) is often twofold—e.g., 1.31.33; 'I knew him not' (twice), and cp 3.3; 4.23 f. 6.39 f. 6.35.48 etc. (β) But not infrequently—with the aid of question and answer, or other slight variations, which have a meaning besides breaking the sense of monotony—the effect of a threefold iteration is produced, as when Jesus is predicting his Resurrection (16.16-19), where the words 'A little while and ye shall see me,' are repeated thrice, and 'a little while' seven times. So the words of Mk. and Mt. ('cometh after me'—rejected by Lk.—are converted by Jn. (1.15.27.30) into a triple testimony from the Baptist to the pre-existence of Christ.

Westcott rightly calls attention to the triple repetition of 'these things' in 12.16, where the allusion is to an unconscious fulfilment of prophecy; but in fact the Gospel abounds with such instances (3.7.6.54.57.8.55.10.15-18.16.13.34 f.; and sometimes the repetition refers not to words but to acts). Thrice did Jesus (7.28.37.12.44) 'cry aloud (ἐκράξεν)': thrice (6.5.11.41.17.1) raise his eyes to heaven, and always as a prelude to some sublime mystery of act or utterance. The writer implies that Jesus manifested himself to the disciples after the Resurrection by many signs; but he selects three, and, of the last, he says (21.14) 'This is now the third time . . .'

Numerical groupings, in threes, fives, sevens, etc., are frequent

¹ For this mention of 6, in connection with 2 and 3, cp Philo 2.231: 'The number 6 . . . composed of 2 x 3, having the odd as male, and the even as female, whence originate those things which are according to the fixed laws of nature . . . What the number 6 generated, that the number 7 exhibited in full perfection.'

in the Talmudists; and something similar has been indicated

50. Jn. a repetition rather than grouping. Now Jn. differs 'witness' from the Synoptists (and shows some resemblance to the Apocalypse) in being from first to last a 'witness,' whether from the Evangelist, or the Baptist, or the Son, or the Father; and it expressly distinguishes between (3.12) 'earthly things' and 'heavenly things,' to both of which Christ 'bears witness.' Hence we are led to ask whether Jn.'s twofold iteration may not be a kind of verbal image of the principle that 'The testimony of two men is true' (referring to the earthly witness of the Son attested by the co-operation of the Father). Again, the occurrence of threefold iteration in references to the Resurrection and other mysteries, recalls the mention (in the Epistle) of the 'Three that bear witness on earth,' (1 Jn. 5.7 f.) 'the Spirit, and the Water, and the Blood,' which three 'make up the one.' Here the witness, though 'on earth,' yet testifies to a 'heavenly' mystery, namely, to the essence and redeeming powers of Christ. Thus, once more, we are led to ask whether this juxtaposition of twofold and threefold iteration may be neither accident nor tautological blemish, but the result, partly of a style formed in the schools of Jewish thought, partly of a deliberate purpose to direct the spiritual reader to distinguish between the things of earth and those of heaven. And the question is almost changed into an affirmative inference, when we find Philo commenting on the distinction (1.284 f.) between the Lord's speaking 'once' or 'twice,' and declaring—in allusion to Deut. 19.15 ('two witnesses or three')—that (1.243) 'A holy matter is proved by three witnesses.'¹

Probably, also, the combination of positive and negative was based on principles of Midrash.²

It may be objected that such a style would be highly artificial, whereas Jn.'s style is simplicity itself. But, in the first place, what might seem

51. Its artificial for us might be a second ambiguities. nature for those bred amid Jewish and Alexandrian traditions of the interpretation of the OT; and, in the second, though Jn.'s words are as simple as those of Tennyson's In Memoriam, his style is not simple.

There are more ambiguities in Jn. than in all the rest of the Gospels put together,³ so that sometimes it might almost seem as if he intended to leave his readers to choose between several possible meanings, or even to decide, according to their impressions, whether the Evangelist or some other is speaking. Moreover he abounds in subtle variations—impossible to render in English, and wholly wanting in the Synoptists—between Greek words such as: (21.15 sq.) φίλῳ and ἀγαπῶ ('Simon, . . .')

This distinction between the heavenly and the earthly, represented by threefold and twofold rhythms, is perceptible at the very outset (1.1 f.), where the three clauses about the Logos, followed by their summary in one clause—suggesting the Three 'heavenly' Witnesses, who are One—are followed by the account of the 'man, named John,' of whom it is twice said that he (1.7 f.) 'came to bear witness of the light.'

³ The first chapter alone suffices to prove this (1.35.9.15.16.50). Especially difficult is it to decide whether his verbs are used affirmatively, interrogatively, or imperatively (5.39.12.19.14.1.15.18.27.16.31.20.29); and his ὄντ' may often mean 'that' or 'because' (3.21.5.28.7.52 etc.).

lovest [ἀγαπᾷς] thou me?' followed by 'Simon, . . . art thou my friend [φίλῆς]?' and (ib.) οἶδα καὶ γινώσκω ('Thou knowest [οἶδας] that I am thy friend [φίλῶν]' followed by 'Thou knowest [οἶδας] all things, thou understandest [γινώσκεις] that I am thy friend [φίλῶν]'). Similar distinctions are drawn between the meanings of ποιῶ and πράσσω, between θεωρεῖν, διέσθαι, ἰδεῖν and βλέπειν, and between the aorist, and present, and subjunctive.¹ All these are natural in an Alexandrian Jew familiar with Philonian philosophy and so long habituated to Greek as to be able to play on its words and utilise to the utmost its minute differences of grammatical expression.

(iv.) Structure.—(a) The Gospel, as a whole.—The Fourth Gospel (Westc. on Jn. 12r) 'begins and closes with a sacred week.' The 'week' has to be deduced from a careful reading of the context. But this is a characteristic of the Gospel, distinguishing it from the Apocalypse. In the latter, symbolism is on the surface; in the former, latent. The word 'seven' occurs about fifty-five times in the Apocalypse (e.g., 'seven spirits,' 'stars,' 'angels,' 'vials,' etc.); in the Gospel never. None the less, as might be expected in a work that opens with the words 'in the beginning,' so as to suggest a parallel with the seven days of Creation and Rest, the thought of the perfect 'seven pervades all Jn.'s highest revelations of the divine glory.²

There are seven miracles or 'signs.' There is a sevenfold witness (West. xiv.) of (1) the Father, (2) the Son, (3) the Son's works, (4) Scripture, (5) the Forerunner, (6) the Spirit, (7) the Disciples. In the final discourse—a Deuteronomy in which Jesus reviews his 'testimony,' the clause ταῦτα λελάληκα ὑμῖν (which occurs nowhere else in the Gospels) is repeated seven times. So is the noun 'love' (which the Epistle mentions as the very Name of God).³ Lastly, the sacred words, I AM, used (85) absolutely to represent the eternal being of the Son, are combined with seven predicates, to represent seven revelations: (1) the Bread, (2) the Light, (3) the Door, (4) the Good Shepherd, (5) the Resurrection and the Life, (6) the Way, the Truth, and the Life, and (7) the true Vine.

(b) The Details.—(1) The Prologue is based on ancient traditions, describing ⁴ Wisdom as having taken part with God from the beginning in the creation, and predicting the accomplishment of God's 'truth and grace,' and the 'tabernacled' of his glory among men.⁵ These traditions Jn. concentrates on Christ. Only, instead of calling him Wisdom, he prefers the term Word,⁶ more commonly used in the OT.

(2) The Synoptists begin their Gospels by saying in effect (Mk.) 'The beginning of the Gospel of Jesus Christ . . . was John' (ἔγενετο Ἰωάννης), or by tracing the descent of Jesus to (Mt.) Abraham, or (Lk.) Adam. Jn. goes farther back, saying that the Word 'was (ἦν) in the beginning, and . . . was God,' and that the 'man' John merely (Westc. on Jn. 16) 'arose, or came into existence (ἐγένετο).' He then turns to nature and history. 'What has been (γέγονεν) in the world,' he says, 'was (ἦν) Life, and the Life was (ἦν) the Light of men.'¹ Alluding to the name by which the Jews called the Messiah (the Coner, ὁ ἐρχόμενος), Jn. tells us that the Light has been ever from the beginning (19) 'coming' to the world, but that at last, as the Psalmist had predicted, the Word 'tabernacled' among men, and they beheld his 'glory.' But what 'glory'? Not that of material splendour, but that of 'grace and truth.'² These words introduce a parallelism with the OT.³ The same Logos who has given light and life to men has also given 'grace' and 'truth' to Israel; (17) 'The Law was given through Moses, the grace (thereof) and the truth (thereof) were through Jesus Christ.'⁴ See TRUTH.

Having prepared us by a parenthesis (14, 'the glory as of an only-begotten') to conceive of an 'only-begotten,' and of a 'glory' in the unity of divine love, exceeding all Hebraic notions of the splendour of prophetic signs or visions, and all Hellenic notions of wisdom, he now concludes by saying that it is not (as Job had said) God who has 'declared' Wisdom, it is (18) the Only-begotten in the bosom of the Father who has 'declared (ἐξηγήσατο) God.'

(2) The Bridgroom.—This section contains the Doctrine of Water: 1st, the Water of the Law superseded by the Wine of the Gospel; 2nd, the Water of Purification 'from water' above; 3rd, the Water of Life that quenches the soul's thirst. The three scenes of these subsections are severally Galilee, Jerusalem, and Samaria.

(a) Galilee. After a period of (129 35 43 21) six days comes the wedding-feast at Cana,⁵ where Jesus, the unacknowledged Bridgroom of the Church, after first doing justice to the 'purification of the Jews,' bids his ministers draw forth from the well⁶ the water which the Governor of the Feast pronounces the best wine.⁷

(b) Jerusalem. The next act of the Bridgroom

² Ps. 85 9-11, after mentioning 'glory,' 'tabernacle,' 'mercy' or 'grace,' and 'truth,' goes on to personify these virtues and to describe Truth as 'rising up' from the earth, and Righteousness as 'looking down' from heaven. This enables us to understand the spiritual meaning of (Jn. 1 51) 'the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of man.' They are 'grace and truth,' 'peace and righteousness,' looking down from heaven and rising up from earth. Thus was fulfilled the promise implied in (Gen. 28 12) the vision of Bethel when Jacob rested on the stone which was afterwards 'anointed (χριστός), the type (Just. Tryph. 86) of Christ. Probably δόξα ὡς (for δόξα ὡς) should be read with the Valentines (Iren. 185), cp Orig. Cels. 6 68, where the context necessitates δόξα, though the text has been conformed to T.R.

⁵ Origen takes Cana(h) to mean 'purchased possessions'; but it might mean (ἰσπ) 'jealous' or 'zealous,' a word applied only to Yahwè as the husband of Israel. The meaning 'zeal' or 'jealousy' suits the context, and also (2 17), 'The zeal of thine house,' etc.

and the Life was (ἦν) the Light of men.'¹ Alluding to the name by which the Jews called the Messiah (the Coner, ὁ ἐρχόμενος), Jn. tells us that the Light has been ever from the beginning (19) 'coming' to the world, but that at last, as the Psalmist had predicted, the Word 'tabernacled' among men, and they beheld his 'glory.' But what 'glory'? Not that of material splendour, but that of 'grace and truth.'² These words introduce a parallelism with the OT.³ The same Logos who has given light and life to men has also given 'grace' and 'truth' to Israel; (17) 'The Law was given through Moses, the grace (thereof) and the truth (thereof) were through Jesus Christ.'⁴ See TRUTH.

Having prepared us by a parenthesis (14, 'the glory as of an only-begotten') to conceive of an 'only-begotten,' and of a 'glory' in the unity of divine love, exceeding all Hebraic notions of the splendour of prophetic signs or visions, and all Hellenic notions of wisdom, he now concludes by saying that it is not (as Job had said) God who has 'declared' Wisdom, it is (18) the Only-begotten in the bosom of the Father who has 'declared (ἐξηγήσατο) God.'

(2) The Bridgroom.—This section contains the Doctrine of Water: 1st, the Water of the Law superseded by the Wine of the Gospel; 2nd, the Water of Purification 'from water' above; 3rd, the Water of Life that quenches the soul's thirst. The three scenes of these subsections are severally Galilee, Jerusalem, and Samaria.

(a) Galilee. After a period of (129 35 43 21) six days comes the wedding-feast at Cana,⁵ where Jesus, the unacknowledged Bridgroom of the Church, after first doing justice to the 'purification of the Jews,' bids his ministers draw forth from the well⁶ the water which the Governor of the Feast pronounces the best wine.⁷

(b) Jerusalem. The next act of the Bridgroom

² Ps. 85 9-11, after mentioning 'glory,' 'tabernacle,' 'mercy' or 'grace,' and 'truth,' goes on to personify these virtues and to describe Truth as 'rising up' from the earth, and Righteousness as 'looking down' from heaven. This enables us to understand the spiritual meaning of (Jn. 1 51) 'the angels of God ascending and descending on the Son of man.' They are 'grace and truth,' 'peace and righteousness,' looking down from heaven and rising up from earth. Thus was fulfilled the promise implied in (Gen. 28 12) the vision of Bethel when Jacob rested on the stone which was afterwards 'anointed (χριστός), the type (Just. Tryph. 86) of Christ. Probably δόξα ὡς (for δόξα ὡς) should be read with the Valentines (Iren. 185), cp Orig. Cels. 6 68, where the context necessitates δόξα, though the text has been conformed to T.R.

⁵ Origen takes Cana(h) to mean 'purchased possessions'; but it might mean (ἰσπ) 'jealous' or 'zealous,' a word applied only to Yahwè as the husband of Israel. The meaning 'zeal' or 'jealousy' suits the context, and also (2 17), 'The zeal of thine house,' etc.

is to attempt to win back and purify the unfaithful daughter of Jerusalem, typified by the temple. The Synoptists, from the human standpoint, describe the temple as 'a den of robbers'; Jn. 2:16, as a 'place of merchandise (ἐμπορίον).'

Herein Jn. seems to be following the prophets, who called Tyre (Ez. 27:3 Is. 23:17) 'a place of merchandise (ἐμπορίον) of the nations—i.e., as the Hebrew in the latter passage expresses it, she 'played the harlot.' To Jn. the greedy 'merchandise' of the priestly monopolists in the temple appeared a kind of 'idolatry' (cp. Col. 3:5)—i.e., unfaithfulness to the Bridegroom—and he represents Jesus as devoured by 'jealousy (ζήλος)' for the House of God—i.e., for the true Church (his bride and his body)—and as predicting that, even though men might destroy it, it should be raised up in 'three days.'

Closely connected with this attempt to purify Jerusalem (Ezek. 10:15-25), 'the harlot,' comes the mention of a new birth by 'water and the Spirit.'¹ It is introduced as a doctrine of 'earthly things—i.e., as a rudimentary one—and inculcating it Jn. seems to be assuming baptism with water, and insisting on baptism with the Spirit also. The full purification, which requires 'blood' (1 Jn. 5:8 'the Spirit and the water and the blood') is yet to come; but it is faintly suggested by the (24) 'hour,' and (3:14) 'the (brazen) serpent.'²

(γ) Samaria.³ From unfaithful Jerusalem the Bridegroom passes to unfaithful Samaria (the woman with the 'five husbands'). She, too, like the House of Jacob of old (Jer. 2:13-25), had played the harlot 'with many husbands,' and had gone to the waters of Shihor⁴ to slake her thirst, having forsaken the Lord, 'the fountain of living waters.'

The dialogue takes place near Jacob's well. In Philo, the 'well' and the 'fountain' represent different stages of knowledge. The well of Agar represents a lower stage than that of Rebecca; Rebecca (1:249-55) supplies the camels from the 'well,' but the servant from the 'fountain,' because the latter is (1:255) the holy word. The highest and best well of all is the Father of all, the Fountain of life, ever-flowing (ἀεὶ ῥοῦν).⁵ In Jn. we find a place called (4:5) Sychar or 'drunkenness,' probably an opprobrious name for Shechem (see § 46 a), alluding to (Is. 28:7) 'the drunkenness of Ephraim,' but in any case suited to the moral of the dialogue. It is (4:5) 'near the place that Jacob gave to Joseph his son.' This is explained by Philo. Shechem ('shoulder') has two meanings; in connection with Gen. 49:15, where 'a certain athlete' becomes a 'husbandman,' it indicates 'labour'; but when it is mentioned as given to Joseph, it means (1:92) 'the bodily things which are the objects of the senses.' Jesus (Jn. 4:6), 'wearing of his journey, sat thus at the well.' So Philo (1:89 f.) says that Moses 'sat at the well'—not in a cowardly retreat, but 'like an athlete recovering breath' for a new attack—an interesting parallel to the position of Jesus before his attack on Samaritan unbelief. It was (4:6) 'about the sixth hour'—the hour described by Philo (on Gen. 18:1) as fittest for the revelation of divine truth. The woman of Samaria, coming to draw water from Jacob's well, received the rebuke from Jesus (4:8), 'Thou hast had five husbands, and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband.' Philo says (on Gen. 3:6) that woman is symbolically 'the sense (συναίσθησις), and (1:131) 'There are two husbands of the senses, one lawful, one a seducer'; but he proceeds to say that 'the seducer' acts through the five senses; he also (1:563) connects 'having many husbands' (cp. Jer. 2:23, πολυανδρία) with 'having many gods,' and speaks of (1:609) those 'enamoured of many gods,' who know not the one Husband, namely God.⁶

³ The statement, that (Westc. Jn. p. ix) 'there can be no question as to the individuality of the discourse with the woman of Samaria,' is perfectly true, if 'individuality' means unity of style and purpose. It is practically certain, however, that the dialogue did not actually occur in the exact words recorded by Jn. For (1) no disciple (4:8) was present; and, even if we assume that the Evangelist received an account of the dialogue from Jesus himself, (2) both Jesus and the Woman of Samaria talk in Johannine style. The same applies to the dialogue with Nicodemus.

⁴ I.e., 'the Nile.'

⁶ What is the sixth husband (Jn. 4:18), 'he whom thou now hast'? Philo speaks (2:6) of the 'six powers' of turbulence, namely, 'the five senses and uttered speech,' of which the last 'prates with unbridled mouth of countless things that should not

The woman (Jn. 4:28) 'left her water-pot (ὕδριον) and departed' to carry news of the Messiah. Philo differs here, but in such a way as to show that the 'water-pot' is not a mere picturesque detail. He says that Rebecca (1:252) did not, like Agar, need the ἀσκάς, leather skin—i.e., the body—to hold the water, but only the ὕδρια, 'water-pot,' which is a symbol of a heart that can hold the supreme draught. Jn.'s view may be that, as Rebecca needed not the ἀσκάς, so the woman of Samaria, who had risen a stage higher, needed not the ὕδρια, having received the indwelling spring of living water.

The seed of the Gospel having been sown in Shechem, the associations of the place are changed. It is connected no longer with Jacob but with Jesus (or with Jacob in his higher stage, as a type of Jesus); no longer with 'the things of the senses,' but with 'the Husbandman.'¹ Jesus bids the disciples 'lift up their eyes' to look on the fields 'white already' with the results of his husbandry. Immediately the harvest begins. The Samaritans come from the city. Some of them had believed in Jesus (4:39) on the testimony of the woman. But Philo says that it is characteristic of a false god to exist only 'by report and convention, and the report moreover of a woman' (1:258; ἀκοή, καὶ τῆ νομιζέσθαι, καὶ ἀκοῆ μῆτροι γυναικός). Here it is added that afterwards the Samaritans (4:42) believed 'no longer owing to the speaking (λαλιάν) of the woman,' but owing to the 'ῥῆσις (λόγον)' of Christ.

Jesus returns to Galilee and Cana. Thus the cycle of the Bridegroom ends in the place where it began, making way for the doctrine of Bread.

(3) The Bread of Life.²—The healing of the sick man at Bethesda on the Sabbath, which represents the healing of Israel—not unaccompanied with

55. The Bread of Life. (5:14) warning that the work might be undone—is followed by a statement³ that the Son does nothing but what he sees the Father do. Hence, when he 'lifts his eyes'⁴ before the eucharistic sign of the giving of the bread, we are prepared to hear that what he gives, the Father is really giving. It is the bread from heaven.

By placing the giving of Christ's flesh and blood early in the Gospel, and by introducing, much later, the one commandment of love, fulfilled by Christ on the Cross, Jn. gives the impression of a desire to discourage materialistic views of the Eucharist: (6:63) 'The spirit it is that giveth life, the flesh profiteth nothing; the words that I have spoken unto you, they are spirit and they are life.'⁵

(4) The Light.—The doctrine of Light, though enunciated in the Prologue, and touched on (apparently

56. The Light. 3:19-21, is not definitely set forth by Jesus till near the middle of the Gospel (8:12), 'I am the light of the world.'

This revelation is described as being followed by a more active hostility in the enemies who now (8:37-44) seek to destroy him, revealing themselves as the children of the Destroyer. The depth of darkness (8:48: 'thou hast a devil') draws out the fullest light: (8:58 'Before Abraham was, I AM'). Then, upon be uttered.' If Jn. wrote in part with a view to contemporary heresies, he might very well include that of Simon Magus, who is said in Acts (8:11) to have held the Samaritans at a very early period bound in his enchantments. Justin Martyr testifies to his influence in Samaria in the first half of the second century. More probably, however, it means, primarily, religious pride and ambition (leading to hatred of truth and moral goodness), Rev. 13:5 'a mouth speaking great things,' which some might identify with Simon Magus.

³ Philo says that (1:414) the First-born imitates the Father's ways 'looking to his archetypal patterns.'

⁵ Words—but words received into the heart—not acts, nor miracles, are the climax of Christ's life among his Disciples before the crucifixion. He washes their feet; but Judas, like the rest, is washed, and Judas is also expressly said by Jn. (not by the Synoptists) to have received 'the sop.' Neither act makes them (13:11) 'all clean.' They are 'clean' (15:3) 'because of the word' that he has spoken and they have received; Judas is not 'clean' because he has not received it.

an attempt to stone Jesus, he 'was hidden (ἐκρύβη),¹ and went forth from the temple.' This and a second (12 36) eclipse are 'two witnesses' against 'the darkness' that will not (1 5) 'apprehend the light.'

Next comes the healing of the Gentile world, typified by the man who was blind from his birth.

As Naaman was sent to Jordan, so the blind man is sent to (9 7) the Pool of Siloam, which represents (Is. 8 6 f.) the worship of the true God as distinct from the worship of false gods (see also Is. 7 3 22 9 11 36 2; Hor. Hebr. 1 365, 3 292). The Judaizing inference that the Gentile world must be purified by Jewish waters—i.e., by the Law—is obviated by the statement—probably implying the supersession of the Law by (Gen. 49 10) 'Shiloh'—that Siloam means 'sent.'² This sign is altogether different from the healing of the man at Bethesda (Israel), who is never said to believe, and who is threatened with penalty in case of relapse. The Gentile world (9 38) 'believes,' so that this sign includes the creation of spiritual, as well as material, light.

The section terminates with a denunciation of the 'abiding' sin of 'the blind' who profess to lead others and who say 'we see.'³

(5) The Life.—The mention of the 'blind leaders' leads to the mention of the ideal Leader who 'knows'

57. The Life. (i.e. loves) all that are his, and that, too, individually (10 3 φανεῖ κατ' ἑνός), so that they are drawn towards him as the Good Shepherd who does not drive, but leads.⁴

All the shepherds and deliverers of the world that 'came' before the Logos are described as (10 8) 'thieves and robbers,'⁵

Are there not two meanings: (1) one for spiritual readers (2) another for superficial? In (1), the meaning is that Christ was hidden from the souls of his enemies, in (2), that he was hidden from their bodily eyes by divine intervention. The former is spiritual, but gives us no clear explanation of the way in which Jesus escaped. The latter is definitely miraculous, but not necessarily spiritual. Jn. seems to leave it to his readers to choose. Perhaps he is here (as often) expressing dramatically what Lk. expresses non-dramatically (Lk. 19 42 ἐκρύβη 'but now they are hid from thine eyes'). (The meaning 'hid himself,' grammatically possible, is, from a Johannine standpoint, impossible.)

² Probably Jn. (as Grotius suggested) identified Siloam with the Shiloh of Gen. 49 10; cp SHILOH.

⁴ The true Shepherd and the true Husbandman (or Vine-dresser) are connected by Philo (1 300-305) in a discourse about the husbandry, or tendance, of the soul. He distinguishes between the mere tiller of the ground (who is [ib. 301] a 'hireling') and the real husbandman (who prunes, or encourages growth, as the case may require). So (ib. 304) the 'shepherd' is distinguished from the mere 'keeper.' Poets, he says (ib. 306), call kings the shepherds of their people, but the title is rightly reserved for 'the wise.' The difference between Philo and Jn. is that the former makes no mention of 'laying down life for the sheep.'

A Hebrew original may have caused confusion between 'before (in time),' 'before (in estimation),' and 'in the place of.' Cp Ex. 20 3 'before me' (mg., 'beside me') πλὴν, Job 3 24 4 19 'before' (mg., 'like'). Or an original Gr. tradition, δόξαν ἐχόντες ἄρχειν πρὸ ἐμοῦ (cp Mk. 10 42 δοκοῦντες ἄρχειν with parall.) might mean 'before me,' or 'above me.' Cp Justin, 1 Apol. 12 (ἄρχοντες πρὸ τῆς ἀληθείας δόξαν τιμῶντες). Since Christ is 'the Truth, πρὸ τῆς ἀληθείας in Justin may represent a traditional version of the πρὸ ἐμοῦ in Jn. Many authorities omit πρὸ ἐμοῦ owing to the perversion of the words by heretics. Justin may have adopted a new interpretation of them.

Tatian (12 and 14), gives the name of 'robbers' to 'demons,' and adds (18) 'the admirable Justus has rightly denounced them as "robbers".' Either he did not remember it in the Gospel, or he did not, at the time of writing, recognise the because they did not understand that ruling implies serving and even dying. The Shepherd (10 11) 'layeth down his life for the sheep' (10 17) 'in order that it may be received again.' In other words, the Resurrection, or attainment of life through death, is a law of the spiritual world, a part of the Father's will. Thus Jn. anticipates the objection that, if the Shepherd dies in conflict with 'the wolf,' the wolf is victorious.

Later, the law is restated as the law of the Harvest: (12 24) 'Except it (the grain) die, it abideth alone, but if it perish it bringeth forth much fruit;' meantime, Jesus says (10 18) that he has power to take up his life as well as to lay it down, and these words naturally prepare us for a 'sign' of this particular 'power.' Such a sign is afforded by the Resurrection of Lazarus.

(6) The Raising of the Dead.—That marvellous cures (and, not improbably, revivifications) were wrought by the earliest Christians is indicated by the Pauline Epistles, by indirect Talmudic testimony, and by early Christian traditions. There are signs, however, of very early exaggeration arising from misunderstood metaphor.

For example, Apollonius (Eus. v. 18 14) alleges (170 A.D.) that John in Ephesus raised a dead man. How, we ask, did this escape earlier writers—Papias, for example, who records such an act of Philip, but not of John? The answer is to be found in Clem. Alex. (96c), where the apostle, questioning an Elder about a young convert, receives the answer 'He is dead.' 'What death?' 'He has died to God.' The apostle reconverts the youth, who becomes 'a trophy of resurrection.' Similarly, whereas the churches of Gaul speak of reconverted apostates as (Eus. v. 1 45) 'the dead brought to life' by the prayers of martyrs, Irenæus (ii. 81 2) says that, ere now, in the brotherhood, 'owing to sore need,' many have been raised by the prayers of the Church, and this, literally; and it seems highly probable that he has confused some metaphorical tradition.¹ The question arises, how early did such misunderstandings occur? 'The wicked,' says a Jewish tradition,² 'though living, are termed dead.' 'Let the dead,' says our Lord, 'bury their dead.' In Christ's commission to the Twelve, Mt. (10 8) alone has 'raise the dead,' and afterwards (11 5) 'the dead are raised.' Yet Mt. describes Jesus himself as revivifying no one except the daughter of Jairus, concerning whom Mt. has written (9 24) 'she is not dead but sleepeth.' See JAIRUS. It is probable that Mt. has here given the actual words of Jesus, or the closest approximation to them; they were perhaps omitted by Mk. Lk. owing to their being first literalised and then regarded as difficult or erroneous. Lk. as well as Mk. records, it is true, (7 22) 'the dead are raised'; but he meets the possible objection, 'No dead have been raised,' by inserting the raising of a widow's son (7 11-17) immediately before. Including Jairus's daughter, he might now plead that the raising of two persons justified the plural 'are.' But—besides the suspicion attaching to the absence of this narrative not only from Mk. but also from the parallel Mt. which closely agrees with Lk.—the story suggests a misunderstanding of metaphor. In 2 Esd. 9 43 ff. there is a vision of a woman (Sion) sorrowing for the death of her 'only son' (the City or Temple). Christians would assert that Christ (Jn. 2 19) 'raised up the Temple,' or, in the language of Christian psalms and hymns, that he 'raised up the only son of the sorrowing widow.'³ Thus the possible influence of symbolism combines with other causes⁴ to oblige us to reject as non-historical Lk.'s account of the raising of the widow's son. See NAIN.

Gospel as authoritative. The saying has affinities to the Greek notion that the only lawful kingdom is that of the wise man (see Philo 2 38).

³ So Lam. 1 1 'How doth the city sit solitary that was full of people! How is she become as a widow!'

(7) Reserving the historical question for special treatment (see LAZARUS) it may be said here that: in spite of Martha's inferential statement in 1139 of Lazarus, the words of Jesus at the tomb (1141), 'Father, I thank thee that thou hearest me,' imply that the 'hearing' was already past, and the life of Lazarus was in effect already granted to his prayers. We must, however, suppose that the narrative—though possibly based on one or more of Christ's actual works—is mainly allegorical. The great negative reason is the silence of the Synoptists¹ about Christ's greatest miracle, which was, according to Jn., the chief cause of both (a) the applause that greeted his entry into Jerusalem, and (b) the resolution of the priests to slay him.²

The positive reasons are: (1) Jn., adopting Philonian traditions of style and expression, and writing on the lines of the OT, might naturally subordinate the literal to the symbolical. For example, Philo calls the creation of Eve from Adam's rib (170) 'mythical (μυθῶδες)'. If such was Jn.'s view, he might well think himself justified in composing a single symbolical story that might sum up a hundred floating traditions about Christ's revivifying acts in such a form as to point to him as the Consoler of Israel, and the Resurrection and the Life of the world. (2) The name of Lazarus suggests symbolism. Another form of it is Eliezer, who is, in Philo (I 481), the type of a being 'liable to dissolution and (indeed) a corpse,' but 'held together and kindled into life (ζωορροεῖται) by the providence of God.' (3) Lk. and Jn. alone mention Martha and her sister Mary. They appear to differ in their views of the sisters; possibly they differ as to the brother Lazarus.³ Some early writers took Lk.'s Lazarus to be a real person;⁴ and it is easy to see that traditions about the Lazarus of Lk. may have prepared the way for the Lazarus of Jn. 'Jesus,' it might be said, 'raised many from the dead; but concerning one, Lazarus by name, he said (Lk. 1031): "If they believe not Moses and the prophets, neither will they believe though one rise from the dead." The next step would be to say that this prediction was fulfilled: "Lazarus was raised from the dead; yet the Jews did not believe."⁵

(8) The Preparation for the Sacrifice.—We pass to the beginning of (121) the week before the Passover.

The anointing of Christ (121-8) is a kind of preparation of the lamb for the sacrifice, and the coming of the 'Greeks' to the New Temple is hailed by Jesus as a sign that (1223) 'the hour' of 'glory' has arrived. The Voice from heaven, which the Synoptists place at the Baptism (where Jn. omits it), and also at the Transfiguration, is mentioned (1228) here alone in this Gospel,⁶ as ratifying the act of Jesus coffin, (2) 'the dead man sat up,' (3) 'he began to speak,' (4) Jesus 'gave him to his mother.' Similar details are found in (5) 2 K. 1321 and 1 K. 1722 f., which describe miracles of revivification performed by Elisha and Elijah.

² This has never been explained. Some have suggested that the Synoptists kept silence to screen Lazarus. But how could they hope to 'screen' one who was known to all Jerusalem, not to speak of the multitude of pilgrims?

⁶ Jn. takes pains to show that the Voice was not, in the popular and modern sense of the term, 'objective.' A 'multitude'

when he puts, and answers negatively, the question 'What shall I say? (Shall I say), save me from this hour?' By this act, he virtually fulfills the Law of Sacrifice, or the Law of the Harvest, which he has (1224) just enunciated. If (Hor. Hebr. ad loc.) 'the prince of this world' is, in Jewish Tradition, the prince of the 'seventy' nations of the Gentiles, there is peculiar point in the words that follow the introduction of the 'Greeks': (1231) 'Now is the judgment of this world, now shall the prince of this world¹ be cast out; and I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.' But as before (859), with this second manifestation of light comes (1236) a second and final eclipse (ἐκρίβη).

The unstable ὄχλος or 'multitude' of the Jews is now mentioned for the last time, quitting the stage as the devout Gentile world enters; and its last words are (1234): 'Who is this Son of man?'

(9) The Deuteronomy.—The public doctrine of Jesus ends when he 'cries aloud' for the third time (see above, § 49), saying that his Charge. word will judge the world and that (1250) his word is the word of the Father.

We are now transported to a higher sphere, to the inner teaching of Christ, the revision and summary of his doctrine, the giving of the One commandment, the promise of the Paraclete, and the prayer to the Father.

It is a Deuteronomy, full of mystical allusions in which a numerical symbolism—sometimes veiled, sometimes manifest, as in the seven times repeated refrain 'These things have I spoken unto you'—is prevalent throughout. As Abraham (Gen. 184) washed the feet of the Three Persons and gave them food, so now the Son, or Messiah (Schöttg. 261 f.), repays the debt to Abraham's children. The Talmudists, speaking in the spirit of the prophets, describe (Schöttg. 2370) the 'mansions and habitations' of God as coming to man, and Philo speaks of the Divine word and Powers (i. 249 158) 'making their home in,' and 'sharing their table with,' the devout soul, and of (i. 643) God himself as 'walking in' the souls of the perfectly purified. So Jn. teaches that the Father and the Son will (1423) 'make' their 'mansion' in the heart of the faithful.² As Philo, agreeing with the Talmudists, warns us that (1457) 'place (τόπος)' does not mean a region filled with matter, but God himself, the refuge of the Universe, so Jn., by his context, teaches us that the (142) 'place (τόπος)' which Jesus will 'prepare' for his disciples is a home in the bosom of the Father.

All these allusive iterations of ancient traditions, and all the lines of various doctrine, converge towards Christ in his threefold character of (146) 'the way, the truth, and the life.'

First, in the doctrine of the Way, the disciples are taught to pray in his name—a clause seven times repeated.³ Then the 'Truth,' or the 'Spirit of Truth,' introduced before, becomes the predominant element, leading to the threefold (168) conviction of the Spirit.⁴ The two sections of the Way (or Son) and the Truth (or Spirit) terminate with a prediction of victory because the Father is with the Son; so that the latter has, in effect, already (1623) 'conquered the world.' Last comes the doctrine of the Father himself (the Life), called (171) 'Father,' (ὁ, 11) 'holy Father,' and finally (ὁ, 25) 'just,' or 'righteous' Father. Here 'my name' ceases and 'thy name' is introduced. Finally—with repeated references to the Church as being (1726 710, etc.) 'that which' or 'those whom' the Father hath 'given' to the Son—the Last Words terminate in an outpouring of the Son's devotion to the 'righteous Father,' wherein his 'name' is, in effect, revealed as 'love': (1726) 'I have made known unto them thy name, and will make it known, that the love wherewith thou lovedst me may be in them, and I in them.' was present. Those who heard anything did not hear the true thing. They heard 'thunder' or 'an angel.' See Grätz, 2341, for the decline of the authority of the Bath-Kol.

(10) The Passion (see above, § 12).—Space can be found here for only one or two points, not only peculiar to Jn. but essential to his purpose. They are connected with Christ's last utterances on the Cross, and with what followed them.

62. Passion. To Jn. but essential to his purpose. They are connected with Christ's last utterances on the Cross, and with what followed them.

1. The words 'Eli, Eli, etc.' recorded by Mk. and Mt., are said to have been misunderstood by bystanders at the time. Lk. omits them, and even Mk. and Mt. are at variance in the context.¹ In the corresponding passage Jn. has simply 'I thirst.'

Of course the first impulse is to take this, as the bystanders took it, in a purely literal meaning, and to say that it has no connection with Mk. and Mt. But in the Fourth Gospel the words 'bread,' 'water,' 'food,' 'eat,' 'drink,' 'feed,' and 'thirst' are hardly ever used by Jesus in the literal sense; e.g., when the disciples bring him food he replies that (4:34) his meat is to do the will of the Father and accomplish his work. This suggests that in Christ's last utterance the same spiritual standard must be maintained, so that, in effect, it was the expression of a 'thirst' for that final accomplishment of God's will which would enable him to say 'it is finished,' and then to break down the barrier of the flesh and to enter into unfettered communion with the Father (cp Ps. 63:1).

What Mk. and Mt. express in the form of (apparent) complaint, and what Lk. entirely omits (perhaps because of its difficulty), Jn. appears to express in the form of the highest spiritual aspiration. Not that he excludes the physical meaning, but (as always throughout the Gospel) he includes a spiritual meaning—that the Son of God, who is in the bosom of the Father, endured for our sakes to feel, for a brief space, as if, in a certain sense, he were not there, so that he 'thirsted' for the presence of God.

2. The spontaneousness of Christ's death was not clearly expressed by the two earliest traditions.² Lk. inserts, as uttered by Jesus, the first half of the quotation that, to this day, terminates a pious Jew's confession on his death-bed (Ps. 31:5). Yet even this was liable to the Jewish objection that it implied, as the utterer, not a Redeemer, but one in need of redemption. No such objection applied to the tradition preserved by 1 Pet. 2:23 (παρεδίδου, perhaps 'gave himself up as a sacrifice'; cp Gal. 2:20 Eph. 5:2). This word Jn. adopts. But he represents Jesus not as saying this, but as doing it: (19:30) 'he gave up his spirit.' See above, § 20.

3. The rending of the veil is omitted by Jn., partly perhaps because, in his view (1) Christ's body is the Temple, and the 'veil' is his flesh, so that the piercing of his side by the soldier's spear constituted the true and essential 'rending of the veil,' but partly because (2) Jn. may have considered the Synoptic tradition erroneous.

Jn.'s tradition here explains many difficulties. Death under crucifixion did not generally ensue till after two or three days; Mk. (15:44) mentions Pilate's 'surprise' (omitted by Mt.-Lk.) at the speedy death of Jesus. Unbelievers, explaining Christ's resurrection as a fraud, might say, 'Pilate might well be "surprised," for death could not happen so soon.' Jn. steps in to say that it did happen, and to spiritualise the circumstances. The 'crurifragium' (see Cross, § 6), was performed, he says, on the two criminals; but this infiction (which would have violated the ordinance about the Paschal Lamb [Ex. 12:46]) was averted from Jesus by his death, and the death was attested by the piercing of his side; and thus two Scriptures were fulfilled.

It is more probable that the Synoptic account of 'the rending of the veil' should have sprung from a misunderstanding of the 'piercing of the side' than vice versa. In the earliest days of the Church, when it became customary to speak of Christ's flesh as 'the veil' (Heb. 10:19*f.*), it would be natural to describe the piercing of his body as the 'rending of the veil.' It is said (Joel's Religionsblicke, 7) that the Jews believed the veil of the Temple to have been literally rent, shortly before the capture of the City. This may have helped to literalise the veil-tradition. Christians would say to Jews, 'What you speak of, did not happen in the siege, or at least it did not happen only then; the veil was rent when our Lord was crucified by you.' Also, against the Synoptists, there is this consideration, that the 'rending of the veil,' if it had occurred, would probably have been kept a secret by the priests (who alone would know of it), and, if it was ever revealed by any of them, would probably be revealed by zealous converts apt to make exaggerations and find coincidences.

² The word φωνήν, in Mk.'s (15:37) ἄφεις φωνήν μεγάλην ἐξέπνευσεν (where MSS might have φωνή μεγάλην), seems to have been, in the corrected edition used by Mt.-Lk., φωνή μεγάλην. Mt. (27:50) retained ἄφεις (in the form ἀφῆκεν), but with τὸ πνεῦμα (from Mk.'s ἐξέπνευσεν) as object. This expresses somewhat more of voluntariness. Lk. (23:46) goes farther. Retaining ἐξέπνευσεν in the sense of 'breathing his last,' he adds an expression of trust on the part of Jesus.

4. The piercing of Christ's side takes us to the central thought of the Fourth Gospel and the Epistle, namely, the love of God revealed in the Blood of Christ the Paschal Lamb.

The Epistle to the Hebrews (9:10) recognises that the old way to God was through (Lev. 14:6) 'blood,' 'water,' 'scarlet wool,' and 'hyssop,' but asserts that the new way was (Heb. 10:19*f.*) simply 'by the blood of Jesus.' The Epistle of Barnabas (11:1-8), however, will not give up the old Levitical elements: it even adds the Levitical 'wood,' which it discerns in the Cross (ξύλον), and, though not without difficulty, it brings in the notion of 'water' by speaking of the Cross (ξύλον) as a 'tree,' past which flows the purifying stream of baptism. In the Gospels, the 'scarlet cloak' represents the 'scarlet wool,' and the cross the 'wood'; but the 'blood' that came from the mere piercing of the hands, or perhaps the hands and feet,¹ might well seem insufficient to express the purifying blood of the Lamb; and there was nothing at all to indicate the 'water.' An early tradition inserted in Lk. (22:44) endeavoured to supply the 'blood of sprinkling' by relating how 'drops as of blood' streamed from Jesus in his agony; but still there was no mention of 'water.' Yet not only did the Levitical requirements mention 'running water,' but Zech. 13:1 predicted the opening of a 'fountain' against sin and uncleanness for Israel.² It is in the piercing of Christ's side that Jn. sees a revelation of the opening of this purifying 'fountain.' This completes the three-fold sacrifice that Christ had made for men: (1) the invisible sacrifice of the breath, or spirit; (2) the human soul, visibly represented by the 'blood'; (3) the human body, visibly represented by water.³

Physically, that these details should have been seen by the eye of a disciple kept probably at some distance from the cross by a crowd of hostile spectators and soldiers, must be, if not impossible, at least disputable. But, whatever physical facts may have been seen, the essence of the narrative is a spiritual fact. A revelation is vouchsafed to the beloved disciple. His eyes are opened to discern the Fountain of Life.⁴ It may have

³ This symbolism seems to be in accordance with Philo's (1653) describing 'ashes and water' as 'the origin of man's generation (γενέσεως αἰ ἀρχαί)'; and (2521) the purification of the body with water as preparatory for the purification of the soul with blood. But Jn. may be also alluding to the 'mixed cup' of the Eucharist, which contained wine mixed with water. Irenæus says that (5:1-3) the Ebionites (who denied Christ's divine nature and used water alone in the Eucharist) 'not receiving the combination of God and man into their soul,' rejected the 'mixing of the heavenly wine,' and did not 'receive God into their mingling (non recipients Deum ad commistionem suam)': in other words he declares their rejection of the divine nature in Christ to be analogous to their rejection of the wine in the Eucharist. According to this view, the wine in the Eucharist, and the blood of Christ on the cross, would represent Christ's divine nature. But whatever reference Jn. may have had to Ebionitism, or to a rising Docetism that rejected Christ's human nature, it seems probable that his main object is to bear witness for the Church to Christ's human nature as being completely real—in body and soul as well as spirit. Applied to the Eucharist, the Johannine view would recognise the body in the bread, the soul and spirit in the water and blood.

⁴ Cp Ps. 36:9: 'With thee is the fountain of life: in thy light shall we see light'—a passage closely connected with a key-passage in the Gospel (14): 'The life was the light of men,' and cp Rev. 21:6: 'I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely.' Also cp Rev. 22:1: 'a river of water of life . . . proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb.' It was a saying, older than the Fourth Gospel, that (Barn. 85) 'The kingdom of Jesus is on the tree' (or Cross, ἐπὶ ξύλου; cp Justin, 1 Apol. 41, Tryph. 73, 'The Lord hath reigned from the tree'). So, in Jn., the Cross—being the place where Christ is 'lifted up' and where God is 'glorified'—is 'the throne of God.' In Barn. 11 as in Rev. 22:2 (imitating the pastoral picture of Ezek. 47:7 sq.), the Cross is also 'the tree (ξύλον) of life' whose leaves will heal the nations, and it is planted by the side of the river of living water. But there were varieties been given to some one to see literally the piercing of the side and to hand down to the church of Ephesus a historical fact obscured in previous traditions. But the spiritual meaning of the act is not to be regarded or criticised from the materialistic or historical standpoint.¹ The whole of the context is spiritual in thought and mystically symbolical in expression. First there is a threefold mention of 'accomplishment.' Then, as there were seven 'signs' wrought by Christ during his life, so now there are, perhaps, seven 'accomplishments' of OT type or prophecy that accompany, or follow, his death.² In the last of these, the most striking of all (prospective as well as retrospective, pointing backward to prophecy but also forward to the conversion of the Gentiles, to the christianising of the Roman Empire, and to the metamorphosis of blind persecution into awe-struck adoration), the soldiers of 'this world,' coming to 'break the bones' of the Paschal Lamb, are not only diverted from their purpose, but as it were forced to 'look on him whom they pierced.'

Thus, amid mysticism and symbolism,³ as it began, ends the Johannine life of Christ. Viewed as history, it must be dispassionately analysed so as to separate, as far

B. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE.

The External Evidence as to the authorship and authority of the Gospels consists of I. Statements, II. Quotations.

I. STATEMENTS.

Written Gospels are neither mentioned nor implied in the NT Epistles, nor in that of Clemens Romanus, nor, probably, in that of Barnabas, nor in the Didaché.

i. THE THIRD GOSPEL.—Lk. 1:1-4 implies (a) that 'many' Gospels were current, and perhaps (b) that their diversity was calculated to obscure

64. State-ments of Lk. (ib. 14) 'the certainty concerning the things wherein' the Christian catechumen was instructed; (c) that whereas the apostles 'delivered (παρέδσαν) these—i.e., taught them orally—

'many' 'drew up a narrative'—i.e., wrote. This points to a time when the apostles had passed away, leaving the ground open to the historians. Lk.'s qualification was, not that he had consulted an apostle and obtained his imprimatur, but that he had (13) 'traced the course of all things accurately from the first.' The particular defects implied in existing 'narratives' are, that they were not 'accurate,' and not in 'chronological order.'

ii. Papias, a bishop of Phrygian Hierapolis in the of tradition, and Barnabas himself quotes a saying that suggested the thought of the Cross as a Vine from which the juice, or blood, is dropping: (Barn. 12) 'When a tree shall bow down and rise up, and when blood shall drop from a tree.'

This view is developed in the later Johannine vision. The water and the blood flow from the Cross, or rather from Christ on the Cross. See Rev. 22:17.

¹ It may be objected that the author lays stress upon 'seeing' (19:35: 'He that hath seen hath borne witness'). The very stress, however, indicates that 'seeing' has a spiritual significance, as in (14:9) 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father,' (14:4) 'we beheld his glory'; and elsewhere in Jn. Space does not allow the exposition of the Philonian and Johannine uses of expressions relating to sight and vision, which would demonstrate this conclusion. But it may be assumed that, whenever verbs of the senses are used by Jn. with emphasis, they are always used primarily in a spiritual significance. 'Handling' in 1 Jn. 1:1 is no exception to this invariable rule; see above (on the 'handling' in Ignatius), § 29.

² (1) The 'thirst,' (2) 'hyssop,' (3) 'vinegar,' (4) the 'bone not broken,' (5) the 'looking' on him whom they 'pierced,' are all definitely mentioned in the OT, and (6) the 'delivering of the spirit' may be regarded as a fulfilment of Ps. 31:5; but there is no verbal allusion either to Zech. 13:1, or to Ps. 22:14. We cannot therefore assert that 'seven' is here in the author's mind. But the structure of the whole Gospel makes it probable.

³ (19:35): '(1) And he that hath seen hath borne witness (2) and his (αὐτοῦ) witness is true (3) and he (ἐκεῖνος) knoweth that he saith true.' On the assumption (so Westcott and Alford) that ἐκεῖνος is the usual substitute for a repeated αὐτός, the sentence is strangely tautological. But may not Jn. intend ἐκεῖνος to mean Christ? The passage is the keynote to the Epistle, and in the Epistle (see Westc. on 1 Jn. 2:6) ἐκεῖνος is always used of Christ' (cp especially 1 Jn. 3:16, 4:17). It is characteristic of Jn. that he should use the pronoun so that a superficial reader should render it in one way and a spiritual reader in another. In any case, the threefold form of the attestation appears deliberately adapted to the context describing the Three Witnesses.

as possible, fact from not-fact. No criticism, however, ought to prevent us from recognising its historical value in correcting impressions derived from the Synoptic Gospels, and the epic power and dramatic irony with which it brings on the stage the characters and classes whereby the will of God is being continuously fulfilled, so that we find ourselves learning from Pilate to 'behold the man,' and discerning with Caiaphas that 'it is expedient that one man should die and not that the whole people should perish.' It often raises us above details of which the certitude will probably never be ascertained, into a region where we apprehend the nature and existence of a Word of Life, essentially the same in heaven and on earth, human yet divine, the incarnation of the concord of the spiritual universe. Yet, while no Gospel soars so high, none stands more firmly, more practically, below first half of the second century, wrote five books of 'Exposition(s) of the Lord's Logia.'¹

(a) His Exposition was probably a 'setting forth' of the Logia, though it might include 'interpretation' as well.² By 'Logia (oracles),' he meant the Words (possibly also including the Acts) of Christ as being 'oracularly applicable to the guidance of man. This title was already in use to denote, in their oracular aspect, the Scriptures of the OT, and Papias here transfers it to what he regards as the 'oracles' of Christ.³

65. The 'Exposition' of Papias.

The ἐξηγηταὶ of oracles in Lucian (ii. 255) deal with both ἐξήγησις ('setting forth'), and διάλυσις ('solution'); the pantomime makes his meaning so clear as to need (ib. ii. 301) μηδενὸς ἐξηγητοῦ, 'no one to set it forth in words.' In Aristotle's Rhetor. ad Alex. (30, 31) ἐξήγησις is perhaps a short version of facts, as compared with διήγησις, a long narrative. Apollo is called by Plato πάτριος ἐξηγητής, the setter forth of the will of Zeus, not because he explained, but because he set forth the Oracles, or Logia, of Zeus. In course of time, however, both among Christians and among Greeks, no new 'oracles' were forthcoming. Then the exegetes had to confine himself to explaining the old oracles; and so, by degrees, exegesis and exegetic assumed their modern meaning, which also prevailed in the days of Eusebius. This explains why the Alexandrine scribe altered ἐξήγησις into διήγησις in Judg. 7:15.

³ It cannot be denied that a collection of the Lord's Logia might contain nothing but his words, like the Oxyrhynchus papyrus. It is true that Philo applies the term Logion even to a historical statement in the Pentateuch (e.g., Phi. 1:53 quoting Deut. 10:9; Phi. 1:55 quoting Gen. 4:15). But in the passage where (2:163 f.) he speaks of 'all things written in the sacred books' as 'oracles (χρησμοί),' he proceeds to say that they were 'oracularly delivered through' Moses, and then divides them into three classes according as they are uttered (1) in the person of God, (2) by question and answer, (3) in the person of Moses, under inspiration and control from God. This separates them, it would seem, from historical statements made by the historians themselves, in the books of Kings, Chronicles, Esther, etc. In the LXX the regular meaning of Λογία is the Words of the Lord, regarded either as commandments to be observed (e.g., Dt. 33:9 Ps. 119:67 [sing.] 158) or as sure promises of deliverance (e.g., Ps. 127 18:31 105:19 Prov. 80:5). In NT the 'living oracles' (Acts 7:38) are those delivered from Mount Sinai, apparently referred to in Rom. 3:2; and in the only two other instances (Heb. 5:12 & Pet. 4:11) it means the moral precepts, or Law, of Christ. In the only two instances given in Otto's index to Justin, it means (1 Apol. 32) OT 'prophecy', or (Tryph. 17-18) prophetic denunciation of woe (where the Lord's Logia against the Pharisees are coupled with the prophetic Logia of OT). Eusebius perhaps expresses his view of the meaning of Logia (as signifying mainly discourses), when he says that (Eus. HE iii. 24 5) Matthew and John were the only apostles that left memorials of the Lord's διαρροαί, a word that in sing. sometimes meant 'life' (Epiet. ii. 36 29), but in pl. 'discourses' (Epiet. iii. 24 5; etc.). Although the term Logia might include actions, in special circumstances, it is extremely doubtful whether Papias would have given the name, for example, to Mk. 6:14, 'And King Herod heard it, for his name had become known; and he said, John the Baptist is risen from the dead, etc.' We must therefore be content to be uncertain how far, if at all, Papias embodied history in his 'setting forth' of the Logia, as distinct from the 'interpretations' and traditions which he may have added to them.

Papias calls them Κυριακά, rather than Κυρίων, for obvious reasons. Κύριος is distinguished from ὁ Κύριος, in that the former often means 'God', whilst the latter means 'the Lord (Jesus)'. Λογίον Κυρίου (ἐξηγήσεως) might have meant 'Oracles of God'—i.e., the OT (as in Iren. Pref. 1). Τῶν Λογίων τοῦ Κυρίου ἔ. would be clear, but lengthy. Κυριακός, being applied to the Lord's Day as distinct from the Sabbath, was exactly the fit word to distinguish the oracles of the Law of Christ from the oracles of the Law of Moses.

Ἐμνημόνευεν may mean 'remembered.' But it may also mean 'mentioned.' In deciding the meaning, the usage of Papias elsewhere will be our best guide here. In § 68 below, Papias uses it twice; and there Lightfoot (SR 143) renders it first 'remember' and then 'relate.' That the same word should be used in two consecutive sentences to mean quite different things is, in itself, highly improbable; still more when Papias might have used μνημόσιν for 'remember.' The meaning 'repeat', 'teach from memory', which is absolutely necessary in the second, is highly probable also in the first. When a convert had been taught the Logia, his business was (Heb. 5:12) to 'repeat' them to others. Hence, in § 63, Papias contrasts himself, as 'learning well and teaching (μνημονεύω) well' the traditions of 'the Elders', with the heretics who 'taught (μνημονεύω) alien commandments' and not those of the Lord. So Iren. i. 18 1 of the Valentinians teaching their dogma of the Logia (μνημονεύω with gen.). Eusebius (iii. 24 12) describes the decad (μνημονεύω with gen.) μνημονεύοντες (with accus.), co-ordinately with Jn. as παραδόχους. It may be urged that, in the LXX, μνημονεύω means 'call to mind' (e.g. Exod. 13:2, the deliverance of the Passover) and 'commemorating.' The two words are the active and causative forms of the same Hebrew verb (רָמַח), and Ⓞ renders both ('remember' and 'make mention') by the Greek μνησθήσομαι and ἐμνήσθη in Ps. 77 11. 1 Macc. 12 11 speaks of 'remembering' friends in prayers, sacrifices, etc. (cp 2 Macc. 10 6), and 2 Macc. 9 21 (Tisch.). 'I would have remembered your good will,' means, 'I would have acknowledged or recorded it by some act.' Similarly, in NT, Gal. 2 10, 'remember the poor' means, 'remember them in act.' So Heb. 13 7, 'remember them that had the rule over you, which spake unto you the word of God', would, by itself, imply what actually follows, 'imitate their faith.' So the Ephesians are bidden to (Acts 20 31 35) 'call to mind' Paul's life among them, and also 'the words of the Lord Jesus.' Col. 4 8, 'remember my bonds' (following Col. 4 3, 'praying for us that God may open unto us a door for the word, to speak the mystery of Christ, for which I am also in bonds'), probably includes, or means, as in 1 Macc. 12 11, and as in later Christian writers, 'remember my bonds (in your prayers).' (For the connection between 'praying' and 'remembering', see 1 Thess. 1 3.) In Mt. 16 9, μνημονεῦτε τοὺς is probably a corruption of Mk. 8 16 μνημονεῦτε ὅτι τοὺς. So far, in NT, with this exception, μν. takes the gen. or ὅτι: but in 1 Thess. 2 9 μνημονεῦτε γὰρ τὸν κόπον ἡμῶν (best taken imperatively), the meaning is, perhaps, 'remind one another of' (implying 'mention'), and, in any case, 2 Tim. 2 8 μνημονεῦτε Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν, following 2 2 ('the things which thou hast heard, commit to faithful men, who will be able to teach others'), and preceding 2 14 ('of these things put them in remembrance'), almost certainly means 'make mention of, or teach, Jesus Christ.' We see, therefore, in the Pauline Epistles, a commencement of the later tendency to pass from the active to the causative meaning of the Hebrew רָמַח (μνησθαι, μνησθαι, ποιέσθαι, διηγήσθαι, μνημονεύω), from mere 'remembering' to some practical way of remembering—e.g., in prayer, doctrine, preaching.

The ambiguity of the word has probably caused Clem. Alex. (following, but misunderstanding and modifying, Papias) to describe Mark as (Eus. HE vi. 14 6) 'remembering (μνημονεύων) Peter's words.' Iren. iii. 9 3 τὸν Λίνου Παύλος ἐμνήσθηται (μνησθῆναι) must mean 'Paul makes mention of Linus.' Justin, Tryph. 117 ἐμνήσθηται seems to mean 'a commemoration is made.'

οὔτε παρηκολούθησεν αὐτῷ, ὕστερον δέ, ὡς ἔφη, Πέτρῳ, ὅς πρὸς τὰς χρείας ἐποίητο τὰς διδασκαλίας, ἀλλ' οὐχ ὡς περ συντάξιν τῶν κυριακῶν ποιούμενος λόγων (v. γ. λογίων), ὥστε οὐδὲν ἤμαρ¹ Μάρκος, οὕτως ἓνα γράψας ἔσπευ ἀπομνημόνευεν,² ἐνὸς γὰρ ἐποίησάτο πρόνοιαν, τοῦ μνηθῆναι ἢ ἤκουσε παραλείπειν, ἢ ψεύσασθαι τι ἐν αὐτοῖς. ταῦτα μὲν οὖν ἰστορήται τῷ Παπῆ περι τοῦ Μάρκου. περι δὲ τοῦ Ματθαίου ταῦτ' εἴρηται.³ "Ματθαῖος μὲν οὖν Ἑβραῖοι

In the light of what follows—about the contrast between (1) Peter, who 'adapted his discourses to the needs of the occasion, making no classified collection of the Lord's Logia', and (2) Matthew, who 'compiled the Logia'—he seems to mean that Peter neither confined himself to the Logia, nor attempted to group or classify them (as Matthew in the Sermon on the Mount), but taught all that related to Christ's life, 'whether spoken or done'—i.e., without distinguishing between his words and his deeds.

² ἀπομνημόνευεν appears to be used by Papias as an emphatic form of ἐμνήμονεν (used above in the sense 'repeat, or teach from memory') and to mean 'repeat exactly from memory.' Cp another passage, generally admitted to be from Papias, in Iren. v. 33 3, 'As the Elders who saw John, the disciple of the Lord, repeated from memory (Lat. meminerunt)', where there can be little doubt that the Latin points to a Greek original ἀπομνημόνευον or ἐμνήμονεν. And a precisely parallel use occurs in the description given by Irenæus himself of the way in which Polycarp, the pupil of John and of the apostles (Eus. HE v. 20 6), used not only to 'relate (ἀπήγγελλε)' his intercourse with them, but also 'to repeat exactly from memory (ἀπομνημόνευε) their words.' Justin goes a step further and apparently takes ἀπομνημόνευεν to mean something distinct from teaching. Influenced by his belief that the ἀπομνημονεύματα were not about the apostles but from the apostles, he appeals to those who (1 Apol. 33) 'having recorded (ἀπομνημονεύσαντες) all that concerned our Saviour Jesus Christ, have taught (ἐδίδαξαν) it.' And subsequent passages show that he meant 'recorded in writing.' There is no doubt that he was in error. But his error strengthens the evidence that ἀπομνημονεύειν in Papias means something more than 'remember.' In Lucian, 28, ἓνα ἀπομνημονεύσαι means 'relate exactly, or in detail, some special instances'; (ib. 3 621) it is contrasted with 'disorderly (ἀτάκτως)' speech, and seems to mean 'repeating what one has thought out'; (ib. 3 419) it describes one who not only knew the exact facts but also 'repeated from memory (or? registered in memory) the exact words (ἀκριβῶς εἰδέναι τὰ γεγενημένα καὶ τοὺς λόγους αὐτοῦ ἀπομνημονεύσαι).' So Strabo 8 30, ἀπομνημονεύουσι τοῦ Φειδίου, introducing one of the sculptor's sayings.

As, therefore, Irenæus describes Polycarp, one of John's disciples, as 'repeating exactly from memory' John's doctrine about (Eus. HE v. 20 6) 'the mighty works (δυνάμεις)' and 'teaching (διδασκαλίαν)' of the Lord, so Papias appears to be describing Mark, Peter's 'interpreter', first as 'repeating from memory (ἐμνήμονεν)', and then as 'repeating exactly from memory (ἀπομνημόνευεν)' the doctrine of Peter about Christ's discourses or actions, and as afterwards committing to writing what he (Mark) had thus 'repeated.'

Lightfoot translates ἀπομνημόνευεν here (SR 163) 'remembered.' And the word has this meaning in a few phrases such as 'bear a grudge against', etc. But (1) there is no notion here of 'grudge'; (2) the general usage, and (3) the context, favour the meaning 'recount'; (4) besides the above-mentioned passage from Irenæus, and (5) that from Justin (meaning apparently 'record', but at all events something more than 'remember'), there is also (6) Justin's frequent appeal to ἀπομνημονεύματα as 'written records.' These considerations, together with the kindred use of μνημονεύω above mentioned, are conclusive in favour of the decision that ἀπομνημονεύειν here means 'recount' or 'repeat from memory.' There is a considerable probability that the word was in regular use to denote the Memoirs or Anecdotes about the apostles, first 'repeated' by their immediate interpreters or pupils; then committed to writing by some of them in the form of Gospels; and lastly accepted by Justin as Memoirs written by the apostles about Christ. Yet he seems to have retained the old title. As Xenophon's Ἀπομνημονεύματα Σωκράτους mean 'Memoirs of—i.e., about—Socrates', so Ἀπομνημονεύματα Ἀποστόλων would naturally mean 'Memoirs about the apostles, and about Christ's teaching through them. Justin appears to retain an old title but to give it a wrong interpretation.

(c) The system of Eusebius.—In order to appreciate the negative as well as the positive value of the evidence of Papias, we must briefly consider the purpose of Eusebius, who has preserved it.

Eusebius promises (HE iii. 33) to record (1) the quotations of ecclesiastical writers from 'disputed books,'

66. Method of Eusebius.

(2) 'what they have said about the canonical Scriptures and theuncanonical as well (τίνα τε περὶ τῶν ἐνδιαθῆκων καὶ ὁμολογουμένων γραφῶν καὶ ὅσα περὶ τῶν μὴ τοιούτων αὐτοῖς εἰρηται).' His promise to include the latter we have reason to believe that he faithfully keeps. But he gives no extracts from Papias about Lk. and Jn. It may be reasonably inferred that Papias was silent about them. The silence may have proceeded from either of two causes: (1) Jn. and Lk. may not have been recognised by Papias as on an equality with Mk. and Mt.; (2) though recognising them as authoritative, Papias may have had nothing to say about them.

(d) The silence of Papias on Lk. and of Papias. Jn.—The latter of the alternatives just mentioned is highly improbable.

Papias dwells on the defect of 'order, or arrangement (τάξεω),' in Mk., who, he says, never even contemplated an 'orderly treatise (σύνταξις) of the Logia. Now Lk. avowed it as one of his objects to write 'in (chronological) order (καθ' ἑξῆς), and Lk.'s 'order' differs not only from that of Mt., but also from that of Jn. It is hard to believe, then, that Papias would 'have nothing to say' about Lk., if he recognised Lk. Again, as regards Jn., would not Papias have naturally added what the Muratorian Fragment says—that this work of order was corrected by Jn. who wrote 'in order (per ordinem)'? The Muratorian Fragment, Clement of Alexandria, and the anonymous tradition preserved by Eusebius (iii. 24 11) all have something of great importance to tell us about the original authorship of the 'spiritual' Gospel of John the disciple of the Lord; and what they say testifies to the interest taken in its origin by those ecclesiastical writers who were among the first to recognise it as apostolical. Is it likely that Papias, if he acknowledged it to be the work of the last of the apostles, knew nothing about it that he deemed worth saying?!

These considerations point to the conclusion that Lk. and Jn. were not recognised by Papias as on a level with Mk. and Mt.²

If Papias did not recognise Lk. and Jn. as authoritative, it would seem likely that Jn.—though probably (Eus. HE iii. 24 7) it had been for some time taught orally, and though traditions from it may have been in use in Proconsular Asia—was not yet circulated in writing, or, if circulated, not yet acknowledged as apostolical, when Papias wrote his Exposition. Consequently the date of the Exposition becomes of great importance.

(e) The Date of Papias's Exposition.—There is no evidence of importance bearing on it beyond Eus. HE iii. 39 1-4 f.

Τοῦ δὲ Παπῖα συγγράμματα πέντε τὸν ἀριθμὸν φέρεται, ἃ καὶ ἐπιγράφεται, Λογίων κυριακῶν ἐξηγήσεως, τοῦτων καὶ Εἰρηγαῖος ὡς μόνων αὐτῷ γραφέντων μνημονεύει, ἑξὲς πως λέγων. 'τὰ πάντα δὲ καὶ Παπῖας ὁ Ἰωάννου μὲν ἀκουστής, Πολυκάρπου δὲ ἐταίρος mere variety? Or as indicating a shorter statement? or as implying any doubt? In Eus. HE ii. 15 2, φασι and ιστορία probably denote distinctions of historical certainty (see below, § 80).

¹ Lightfoot, who assumes that Papias must have said something about Jn., thinks it probable that (SR 207) the Muratorian writer borrowed from Papias 'his contrast between the secondary evidence of Mk. and the primary evidence of Jn.' But, in that case, how is it that Eusebius—who was bound to record whatever was said by ecclesiastical writers about canonical books—whilst inserting what was said by later writers, omits what was said by the earliest of all?

² This might be regarded as almost certain but for one consideration. Eusebius has a contempt for Papias. Forced by his antiquity to devote a great deal of space to him, he does it with terms of disparagement, and (iii. 39 14-17, bis) 'confining himself to what is indispensable (ἀναγκαῖως).' Want of space, and contempt for his author, may have induced him to break the promise he made just before, and to omit what Papias may have said about Lk. and Jn., reserving it till he came to later ecclesiastical writers who borrowed from Papias. This is highly improbable. Eusebius is a most careful and conscientious writer. Though, for example, on one occasion he gives in his own words a tradition about Mk. at an early period in his history, and adds (2 15) 'Clement has quoted this story, and . . . Papias attests it,' this does not prevent him from giving the testimony of Papias in full, in its chronological order.

69. Not a hearer of John.

I. Was Papias 'a hearer of John'?

—Was Eusebius right in denying, or Irenæus in asserting, that Papias was 'a hearer of John'?

Here, and in what follows, we must distinguish the statements of Eusebius from his inferences. The former are almost always accurate; the latter are sometimes erroneous (though by giving us the grounds for them he enables us to avoid error⁵). Even the inferences of Eusebius are probably more trustworthy here than the statements of Irenæus.⁶ Now Eusebius rejects the definite statement of the latter that Papias was a 'hearer of John,' on the ground that Papias himself makes no such claim in his preface, where he naturally, and almost inevitably, would have made it, if he could. He gives us the preface to speak for itself. He adds facts and extracts from the work of Papias, the whole of which was apparently before him. These convey no indication that Papias 'heard' John. That Irenæus—influenced by the natural tendency of early Christian controversialists to exaggerate the continuity of Christian tradition, and by the fact that Papias lived in Polycarp's time and reported what John said—hastily declared Papias to be 'a hearer of John,' is more probable than that Eusebius, subsequently reviewing all the evidence, was mistaken in denying it.

The probable conclusion is that Papias was not a 'hearer of John.

2 and 3. Was Papias 'a hearer of Arision and of John the elder'? And were they 'disciples of the Lord'?

2. Eusebius affirms that Papias did hear them, and he gives his reasons thus (iii. 39 7): 'He (Papias) confesses that he has received the words of the apostles on the one hand from those who had followed

70. Nor of Arision and John the Elder.

(παρηκολουθηκότων) them; but of Arision and of the Elder John he says he was himself a hearer.' The context indicates that Eusebius is drawing this inference merely from the 'distinction'⁷ that Papias makes between the past and the present,— 'What (τι) Andrew, etc., said (εἶπεν), and the things that (ἃ τε) Arision and the Elder John say (λέγουσι)'—as though the two last were still living, so that Papias had probably consulted them; and the historian's habitual conscientiousness leads him (recognising perhaps the slightness of his grounds) to qualify his inference in the following sentence—'At all events (γούν), making frequent mention of them by name in his treatise, he sets down their traditions.' He does not add 'and Papias states that he received them from their own lips,' and he appears to have no evidence beyond what he himself puts before us. But the change of tense from 'said' to 'say' is

⁴ These bracketed words are perhaps to be omitted. See § 70 (3) below.

⁵ E.g., he says that Luke had (Eus. iii. 46) 'diligently followed the rest of the apostles (besides Paul), but shows the source of his error by quoting Lk. 1 3, taking πάσας ας μασε. He also (cp. iii. 4 6 with iii. 36 1) takes Lk.'s ὑπὲρταῖς τὸν λόγον (the word) to mean ὑ. τοῦ Κυρίου (the Word). These are such errors as the most honest and impartial historian might make.

⁷ Eus. iii. 39 5: διαστρέλας τὸν λόγον.

(Lightf. SR 150 n.) 'probably for the sake of variety,¹ so that nothing can be inferred from it; and the mere fact that Papias 'sets down their traditions' and 'mentions their names,' by no means proves that he obtained his information from them, and not from 'those who had followed them.'

We conclude that (a) Papias is not proved to have been, and that (b) (so far as we can judge from Eusebius's production of inadequate, and omission of adequate, evidence) he probably was not, a 'hearer' of Aristion and John the Elder.

3. Again, the words 'disciples of the Lord' can hardly have followed 'Aristion, etc.,' in the text used by Eusebius. For he regards Aristion as living at the time when Papias wrote. But that 'disciples of the Lord' should be living when Papias was making his investigations (Lightfoot, SR 150 n.) would involve 'a chronological difficulty.'

This Eusebius would probably have felt, especially as he apparently regards Papias as born too late to have been a 'hearer of John.'² Moreover, if Papias was a bearer of any 'disciple of the Lord,' this would contradict the spirit of Eusebius's inference that Papias drew his information about the apostles merely from their 'pupils.' Aristion and the Elder John, if 'disciples of the Lord,' could not be called 'pupils of the apostles.' This internal evidence that Eusebius did not find the words 'disciples, etc.' after 'Aristion, etc.' is confirmed by (1) their absence from the Armenian version, (2) the omission of it in several Greek MSS, and of τοῦ κυρίου by Rufinus, (3) the extreme harshness of (a) 'Elders,' (b) 'disciples of the Lord,' (c) the repetition of 'disciples of the Lord,' as though they were three classes,³ and (4) the ease with which the words can be explained as an interpolation.

71. Papias's Elders. 4. Papias's 'Elders.'—It remains to consider who are 'the Elders' from whom Papias obtained his information.

There is no evidence to show that apostles were called 'Elders.' Yet Papias's words—seeming to amount to this, 'If pupils of the Elders came, I used to ask about the words of the Elders, viz. Andrew, Peter, etc.'—appear, at first sight, to identify 'apostles' with 'the Elders.'

The truth appears to be that, in the days of Papias, the latter title was given to the generation of Elders ordained by the 'disciples of the Lord.' The next generation of Elders was not yet called 'the Elders,' but rather the 'pupils of (or those who had followed) the Elders.' The object of Papias was to get back to the teaching of the disciples of the Lord, whether through (1) 'the Elders' or (2) 'their pupils.' If, for example, Papias met (1) an Elder appointed by John the apostle, or (2) a 'pupil' of such an Elder, in either case his question would be, 'What said John?'

The most probable conclusions, then, are that (1) Papias was not a hearer of John; (2 and 3) whether he was, or was not, a hearer of Aristion and the Elder John, the two latter were not 'disciples of the Lord'; (4) the Elders from whom he obtained his information were not apostles but Elders appointed by John or other apostles; and he supplemented this by information obtained from their followers and successors.

5. Papias's list of the apostles.—Why does Papias specially mention, as the disciples about whose sayings he made investigations, Andrew, Peter, 72. His list of apostles Philip, Thomas, James, John, Matthew? and why in this order? An answer is suggested by the context in the extract quoted above (§ 71).

¹ Note that in the same sentence τί is varied with ἄ. So Eusebius (quoted above, § 66) varies τίνα with δὲνα, where there is but a shade of difference in meaning.

³ See Expositor, 4th ser. 3 245. Papias probably wrote 'the disciples of the Lord . . . and Aristion and John their disciples.' 'Their,' αὐτῶν (in οἱ μαθηταὶ αὐτῶν, i.e. αὐτῶν), was changed into 'his (αὐτοῦ)' and αὐτοῦ replaced by τοῦ κυρίου. (For the frequency of αὐτοῦ, τοῦτου, etc., confused with αὐτῶν, τούτων, see Otto on Justin, Τρηφ. 106, p. 356.) Prof. W. B. Bacon has suggested that οἱ τοῦτις was corrupted into οἱ του κῆ before the time of Eusebius. This is very likely; cp Judg. 4 24 των υἱων B, but Α κῆ (i.e., κυρίου) υἱων.

'Most people,' says Papias, took pleasure in 'voluminous (τὰ πολλά) falsehoods'; and he was driven to conclude that he would gain more profit from the living voice of tradition derived from 'the disciples of the Lord' than from 'the books' that attracted popular attention. In 'the books' he may have included Gnostic treatises, such as that of Basilides; but we must not exclude Christian apocrypha and 'disputed' books, and various versions of authoritative books.

For example, though Matthew had made a compilation of the Logia, it was variously 'interpreted'; and this affords a very good reason for the desire of Papias to ascertain 'what Matthew said,' in order to throw light on what Matthew wrote or was supposed to have written. Again, the Epistle of James mentioned by Eusebius (iii. 25) not as spurious but as 'disputed,' was probably current in the days of Papias; and we can understand that its existence may well have caused him to add his name to the apostolic list. Between 'Matthew' and 'James' come 'John,' in whose name a gospel (preached perhaps in his behalf at Ephesus during his last years) may have been recently circulated as a tradition in writing; and this would account not only for the inclusion of John's name, but also for its position between that of James and Matthew. Apocryphal works were early current in the names of (Eus. iii. 25) Andrew, Peter (whom Papias himself mentions as the originator of Mk.), and Thomas (as well as John and Matthias). The inclusion of Philip (whose apocryphal Acts Eusebius does not mention) may be explained by his having resided in Hierapolis, where Papias was bishop. As regards Aristion, Eusebius (iii. 39 14) informs us that Papias inserted some of Aristion's accounts (διηγήσεις) of the words of the Lord (τῶν τοῦ κυρίου λόγων), and there is some slight evidence (Exph., 1893 8, p. 245) for regarding him as the author of Mk.-App. At all events, the fact that he wrote 'accounts (διηγήσεις) of words of the Lord—presumably not found in Mk. or Mt., or else why should Eusebius mention their insertion?—would make it desirable to ascertain what Aristion was in the habit of 'saying.' Lastly, the two disputed Epistles of John (the Second and Third) are written by 'the Elder,' and may have been naturally attributed to the Elder John. And Papias, who (Eus. iii. 39 17) 'makes quotations' from the First Epistle of John, may on this as well as on other accounts have made the traditions of John the Elder a special subject of investigation.

Thus, though there may be, and probably are, other local causes, unknown to us, for Papias's selection and arrangement,³ the drift of evidence, external and internal, indicates, as one important cause, the uncertainty arising from spurious Christian literature, and the special importance of ascertaining what had been

² κέχρηται μαρτυρίας. We are not to infer that Papias mentioned John, or any one, as the author. Had he done so, Eusebius would probably have said, as he does of Irenæus (Eus. v. 8 7), 'He also makes mention of the First Epistle of John, introducing a good many quotations from it, and likewise from the First of Peter.' From (1) this contrast, and (2) the early custom of quoting without names, we may reasonably infer that Papias did not mention 'John's Epistle.' It is shown elsewhere (see JOHN, EPISTLES OF) that some so-called quotations from the First Epistle are probably mere quotations from floating Johannine traditions.

Why does Eusebius—who was not bound to tell us of quotations from canonical books—take up space by telling us that Papias quoted from (iii. 39 17) 'the First Epistle of John'? The answer is to be found partly (1) in the completion of Eusebius's sentence ('and from that of Peter likewise'), partly (2) in the similar statement about (v. 8 7) Irenæus. It is simply a quiet way of saying, 'You see Papias and Irenæus do not quote from the Second and Third Epistles of John, nor from the Second Epistle of Peter.' These were 'disputed works' and Eusebius is tacitly bringing against them 'the argument from silence.'

said by those disciples of the Lord who were reported, truly or falsely, to have left writings also.

6. Papias's relation to Polycarp.—On this point, Eusebius affords the following indirect evidence.

He first (iii. 36 1-2) mentions Polycarp as 'the scholar (διδάσκαλος) of the apostles'—appointed to the bishopric of Smyrna 'by the eye-witnesses and ministers of the Lord'—in whose time flourished Papias (he, too, bishop of Hierapolis) and the world-famed (ὁ παρὰ πλείστοις εἰσέτι νῦν διαβόητος) Ignatius, second in succession to Peter in the bishopric of Antioch.¹ Then he (ib. 4-15) describes the Epistles of Ignatius and Polycarp. Next he mentions (ib. 37 1) Quadratus and the daughters of Philip as being among those who 'occupied the first rank in the succession to the apostles,' adding that he has confined his mention of these to (ib. 37 4) such as have left extant records of apostolic teaching. Then, after (iii. 38 f.) going back to Clement of Rome to protest against spurious works attributed to him, he continues, 'Now I have (already) mentioned the works of Ignatius and Polycarp; of Papias five books are extant'; and he deals with Papias and his works in detail, denying that he was a 'hearer' of the apostles, which is equivalent to denying that he was one of those 'in the first rank in the succession to the apostles.' Some time after this (iv. 14 f.) comes Polycarp's visit to Rome and martyrdom. All this harmonises with the supposition that Papias was so much younger than Ignatius and Polycarp, that he could not be reckoned in their 'rank of succession,' but that Eusebius was obliged to insert his name with theirs on account of the importance of his 'extant records,' which he compiled before the death of the aged Polycarp. His habit of speaking (in his Exposition) in the name of 'the Elders that have seen John' may have led Irenæus to the erroneous inference that Papias was 'a hearer of John and companion of Polycarp.'

(f) Summary of the Evidence relating to Papias.—Reviewing the evidence, we are led to the following negative and positive conclusions.

74. Conclusions about Papias. Papias was not a 'hearer of John,' nor a 'companion of Polycarp,' nor did he 'hear any' disciple of the Lord. He was not in the same 'rank of succession' as Quadratus and Philip's daughters. The daughters dwelt in Papias's native city and died (Lightfoot, SR 150) about 100-110 A.D. Papias records a narrative handed down by them but not (apparently) as coming to him from them. These facts suggest for Papias's birth a date about 85 A.D. When he reached early manhood (105 A.D.) the last of the apostles, if still living, was probably incapacitated by old age for teaching. The Johannine Gospel, though preached orally at Ephesus, was not yet published. Being probably (Lightf. SR 153) of Pagan origin, and (Eus. iii. 39 12) given to literalise Jewish metaphor, Papias may have been perplexed by a comparison of Hebrew with Greek 'interpretations' of Christian traditions. He found current the Commandments (Eus. iii. 39 3) 'given from the Lord to the Faith'; but he desired to add to these from the doctrine of the apostles, as repeated by the Elders whom they had appointed, and by the successors of those Elders. He also mentions (1) the teaching of the apostle Peter, first 'repeated,' and then 'written,' by his 'interpreter' Mark, including the Acts as well as the Words of Jesus, and making no attempt at classifying 'the Lord's Oracles';² (2) a compilation by the apostle Matthew, in Hebrew, of 'the Lord's Oracles' certainly including Christ's discourses and probably giving some account of Christ's life. But this, instead of being circulated in Greek (as Peter's teaching had been) by one authoritative 'interpreter,' had received many 'interpretations.'³ About Lk. or Jn. (or any other Gospel) Papias is silent, and we conclude that he knew neither, or ranked neither with Mk. or Mt. But the date at which he was investigating and writing (about 115-130 A.D.) and his quotations from 1 Jn. (which was certainly written by the same hand as the Gospel) combine to make it probable that Jn. must have been known to him, at least in parts, as a tradition. We are led to conclude that he was writing at the time when Jn. was attaining, but had not yet attained, recognition as an apostolic Gospel.¹

There were also current (as Lk. tells us), 'many narratives' of Christ's life, and (as Papias says) many diffuse writings, possibly including Gnostic gospels, and so called Apostolic Acts, Revelations, and Epistles. These appear to have prejudiced Papias against 'books,' and to have inclined him to go back as near as possible to the fountain-head. His attitude is so well described by the following words of Irenæus that we can imagine Papias himself using them: (Iren. v. 20 1 f.) 'All these (heretics) are of much later date than the bishops to whom the apostles committed the churches Those who desert the teaching of the Church impugn the knowledge of the holy Elders.' To these 'bishops,' then, or 'holy Elders'—i.e., to the Elders appointed by the apostles—Papias made it his first object to go. But we learn from Clement of Rome (ch. 44) that, as early as 95 A.D., some of 'the Elders appointed by the apostles,' and even some of those '(appointed) in the next generation (μεταξί) by men of note,' had died. It is improbable that John, during his last years of disability, appointed any Elders; and it is reasonable to suppose that by A.D. 125-35 most of the Johannine Elders would have passed away. Hence, though Papias did his best to obtain information from them, he was glad to glean what he could from the next generation ('those who had followed them'), his question to an Elder's pupil always being, 'What said John (or this or that Disciple of the Lord) by whom the Elder (whom you "followed") was appointed?' In particular, having regard to the apocryphal literature circulated in the names of Andrew, Peter, Thomas, to the traditions current in Hierapolis about Philip, and to the better attested but disputed literature circulated in the names of James and John, to the great diversity of the 'interpretations' of the Logia compiled by Matthew, and to the objections brought against Peter's teaching as recorded by Mark—he made these Disciples of the Lord the special object of his investigations. It is, of course, possible, that Jn. may have been acknowledged as canonical in other churches before it was acknowledged supposition that illustrates the early and familiar recognition of an 'interpreter' as a natural companion of an apostle. In the (Eus. iii. 39 3) 'interpretations' that Papias inserted in his Exposition, he may have included his own or other Greek versions as well as explanations, of the Logia. From Acts 8 31 (ὁδηγήσει) and from Ign. Phil. 6 (εἰὰν δέ τις ἰουδαϊσμὸν ἐρμηνεύῃ) we see how large a part of apostolic and presbyterian teaching would consist of 'interpretations' of OT in a Christian sense, and these might sometimes be 'interpreted' from the Hebrew. Soon, however, the word would be confined to 'interpreting'—i.e., explaining, obscurities in the Greek Logia. For the word thus used, see Orig. Cels. iii. 58, and quotations from Irenæus given above, § 65 n.

¹ The hesitation of Papias to accept Jn. may have been all the greater because (if we accept the theory that Irenæus in his fifth book is quoting Papias in support of Millennialism) he appears to have accepted the Apocalypse as John's on the authority of (Iren. v. 30 1) 'those who saw John face to face,' and to have habitually appealed to John in support of (ib. 33 3 f.) very materialistic views of the Millennium. A historian who believed (with Irenæus) that the Apocalypse was written by the aged apostle about 96 A.D. might well hesitate to receive a work published, as coming from the same pen, a few years afterwards, yet differing from the former in language so completely as almost to be in another dialect, and also absolutely differing from Mk. and from the 'interpreters of Mt.' in its representation of the Words of the Lord.

The teaching (Iren. v. 83 3 f.) about the vines each with 10,000 branches, etc., ascribed to the Lord by the elders who saw John according to Papias, helps us to understand how even Papias (σφόδρα μικρὸς τὸν νοῦν, Eus.) might feel unable to believe that the expositor of this teaching was the author of the Fourth Gospel.

² If we may judge from the order of the extracts, Papias placed Mk. before Mt. This is slightly confirmed by the fact that in the former extract Papias uses the longer title κυριακά λόγια, in the latter, the shorter λόγια—a natural abbreviation when one repeats a title a second time.

³ The 'interpreter' (Hor. Hebr. on Mt. 10 27, and Wetstein on 1 Cor. 14 27) was the recognised attendant of the reader and teacher in the Jewish schools. When a Jewish apostle (e.g., the author of the Apocalypse, which is composed in most barbarous Greek) preached, or wrote, to Greek congregations, an 'interpreter' may often have been in request. We have seen that Mark was called the 'interpreter' of Peter. It was an early belief (Eus. iii. 38) that Luke or Clement of Rome 'interpreted' the Epistle to the Hebrews from Paul's Hebrew into Greek—a in Hierapolis;¹ but, so far as Papias guides us, we are led to the conclusion that, in 115-130 A.D., Lk. and Jn. were not yet acknowledged as on a level with Mk. and Mt., by the first Christian historian who gives us any account of the Gospels.

iii. JUSTIN MARTYR.—Justin Martyr (Lightfoot, BE

75. Justin. 87, 145-49 A.D.), whilst quoting the Gospels under various titles, makes some incidental but very important statements about their composition.

(a) Justin's titles of the Gospels are adapted to his readers. In the Apology, addressed to Gentiles, he generally uses the term, 'Memoirs of the Apostles';² but in the Dialogue with the Jew, Trypho, he gradually subordinates 'Memoirs,' and at last resorts to the Jewish authoritative form, 'it is written.'³

Like Lk. and Jn. (and perhaps Papias), though in a less degree, he avoids the term 'Gospels.' In the Dialogue, it is Trypho, not Justin, who first introduces it (Tryph. 10, 'the so-called Gospel, τὸ λεγόμενον ε.'). Justin, replying, calls it (ib. 18) the 'teaching given (διδάχθηνα) by our Saviour.' In 1 Apol. he does not use the word till toward the close, and then seemingly as a concession to popular language (66), 'Memoirs . . . which are [commonly] called (καλεῖται) Gospels.' The Memoirs (apart from 'Gospels') he generally quotes for the facts of Christ's life; but sayings are also quoted from them, twice from Mt., and twice from Lk. (One of the latter [Tryph. 103] agrees with D.) Christ's words, when introduced by 'he said,' almost always agree with Mt.; they are called (Tryph. 100) λόγοι,⁴ when Jesus is predicting his sufferings, but (ib. 18) λόγια⁵ when denunciatory and when coupled with prophetic utterances, 'Teachings (διδάγματα) from Christ himself' (1 Apol. 14) refer to chastity and Christian love, and are from Mt. and Lk.; 1 Apol. 53 speaks of Gentiles, 'men of every race, persuaded by the Teaching (διδάχης) that came from his apostles.' This quotation (as well as Tryph. 18 and 10, cp also 35) indicates moral precepts, such as are in the Didaché and the Logia of Behnesa. But 1 Apol. 33, quoting Lk. with a clause from Mt., and describing the authors of the Memoirs as having 'taught' the Annunciation, and 1 Apol. 66, stating that those who are to receive the Eucharist must first accept 'what is taught by us,' indicate a catechetical 'teaching' of facts, different from the Didaché. Moreover, in 2 Apol. 28 10, 'what Christ taught' or Christ's 'Teachings (διδάγματα)' refer partly to his predictions, partly to the punishment of the wicked in fire. Crescens is charged with (ib. 3) not having 'read' them, so that they must have been a book, or part of one.

(b) Indications of Lk. as a recent Gospel.—In a few instances Justin appeals, as it were, beyond

76. His Lk., the Memoirs, to those who composed them; or else he introduces a personal quasi-protost of authenticity, 'I assert, 'I have learned,' etc.

(i.) 1 Apol. 33, 'As those who recorded (ἀπομνημονεύσαντες) all things about our Saviour Jesus Christ have taught,' introduces Lk.'s Annunciation to the Virgin (with a clause taken from Mt.); (ii.) 1 Apol. 66, 'For the apostles, in the Memoirs (μεμνημένοις) by them, which are called Gospels, delivered (παρέδωκαν) that Jesus had thus ordained 6 to them, introduces, in a condensed form, Lk.'s version of the Institution of the Eucharist, including the words, 'Do this in remembrance of me,' not found in Mk. or Mt., and regarded by WH as an interpolation from 1 Cor. 11:25; (iii.) Tryph. 88, 'Both (καὶ) fire was kindled (ἀνιψθη)? in the Jordan . . . , and . . . that

² These he regards, not as Memoirs about the apostles and their doctrine, but as Memoirs about Christ composed by the apostles (1 Apol. 33, ὡς οἱ ἀπομνημονεύσαντες πάντα τὰ περὶ τοῦ Σωτήρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰδίδαν). See note above, § 65.

³ Cp Mt. 11:27, quoted in 1 Apol. 63 ('Jesus . . . himself said') with Mt. 11:27 in Tryph. 100 ('it is written in the Gospel that he said'). Whenever 'writing' is mentioned, the passage quoted is in Mt. (which Justin may prefer to quote as being the Gospel best known to the Jew Trypho).

⁶ ἐντέταλθαι, middle; cp Tryph. 21 and 40, ἐντέταλται ὁ θεός.

⁷ The rhythm demands ἀνιψθαι. Ephraem (43) comments

the Holy Spirit as a dove hovered on him has been written by his apostles (the apostles I mean), of this our Christ (ἐγραψαν οἱ ἀπόστολοι αὐτοῦ τούτου τοῦ Χριστοῦ ἡμῶν), if the text were correct, would exhibit Justin stating a non-canonical event (the 'fire') as a fact on his own authority; and the canonical event as on the authority of the 'apostles';¹ (iv.) Tryph. 103, 'For in the Memoirs which I assert to have been composed (συντεράχθαι) by his apostles and by those who followed (παρὰκολουθησάντων) them,' introduces 'it is written that sweat, as it were drops, streamed down from him while praying—a passage found in some MSS of Lk. 22:44, but bracketed by WH as not genuine² (and found in no other Gospel);' (v.) Tryph. 105, 'As we have learned through the Memoirs,' accompanies the words, 'becoming a man through the Virgin' (from Lk., combined with Mt.), and is followed by (vi.) Tryph. 105, 'as also from the Memoirs we have learned this, too,' introducing an utterance of Christ on the Cross peculiar to Lk. 23:46.

All these passages reveal Justin as quoting with a special emphasis Lk.⁴—or a later version of Lk., including interpolated passages—as though protesting that Lk. is on a level with the Memoirs, and was composed by apostles.

(c) The origin of Justin's view of the Memoirs.—We have seen (col. 1814, n. 1) that, in Papias, παρακολουθεῖν is the regular word for a 'pupil and successor.'

77. His use of 'memoirs.' Now Eusebius (iii. 4:6) misunderstands (Lk. 1:3) παρακολουθηκῆναι πᾶσιν as meaning that Luke had been a 'pupil of all (the apostles),' and Justin might do the same. This enables us to answer the question, How (in Justin's opinion) was Luke taught the Miraculous Conception? Justin's view is that Christ (1 Apol. 67 and cp Acts 1:3), after his resurrection, 'appeared to his apostles and disciples and taught them' everything relating to himself (Acts 1:3 to 'the Kingdom of God').⁵ This 'teaching' would, therefore, apply (1 Apol. 33) to the Nativity and other mysteries, as well as to moral precepts, and Luke, as being 'a pupil of all the apostles,' would receive it. As regards the form of transmission, Justin begins with an ambiguous expression (1 Apol. 33), ἀπεμνημόνευσαν, which may mean (1) 'remembered,' or (2) 'repeated from memory.' Adopting the latter meaning, he uses it, not (as Papias did) of the successors of the apostles, but of the apostles themselves. Then he gradually inclines, and finally commits himself, to the theory that this 'repetition' was not oral merely, but also in writing. Hence he allows himself to say 'the apostles wrote,' on the 'fire' as part of the story. Both here and in Tryph. 103 Justin has, 'This day have I begotten thee' (as D in Lk. 3:22), indicating that he had a text differing from ours, which may very well have included the 'fire' as 'written by the apostles,' equally with the 'dove.' The reading, 'this day, etc., is now found only in some versions of Lk., but in Tryph. 103 Justin follows Mt.'s (not Lk.'s) order in the Temptation.

In (ii.) γερόμενα and παρέδωκαν left a loop-hole for supposing that the apostles might not have written ἀπομνημονεύματα, but simply taught them. But here Justin commits himself to the statement that they 'wrote.'

² συντεράχθαι (see that and kindred words used by Justin [1 Apol. 26 63, 2 Apol. 15] to mean 'the composition of a book') represents the very act disclaimed by Papias for Peter and Mark (οὐχ ὡς σύνταξιν). Remembering that this 'assertion' of Justin's is preceded (a few lines before) by 'the Memoirs written by the apostles' (mentioning the words, 'This day have I begotten thee,' found now only in a v.l. of Lk.), we are led to infer that he is protesting against the statement of Papias or against similar statements made by others. Justin says, in effect, 'The apostles did write regular books,' and then half corrects himself: 'Or, at all events, they and their pupils wrote them.'

³ The interpolated Lk. has 'drops of blood.'

⁴ 'Lk.' of course means 'the third Gospel as we have it.' The author need not be, and probably is not, 'the beloved physician,' the companion of Paul. The author of the Preface of the Gospel may have revised, re-edited, or re-written it, and may be a different person from the Pauline Luke.

though he uses but one strictly apostolic Gospel (that of Mt.). Having these views about the apostolic consensus of the Memoirs, and having a preference for Lk.'s record of the Nativity and the Passion, Justin may naturally have recoiled from Jn., as being a new work, breaking this consensus both in style and thought, and especially unfavourable to the authority of Lk.¹

iv. MURATORIAN FRAGMENT.—The Muratorian Fragment (about 170 A.D.) begins thus—

78. Muratorian fragment. quibus tamen interfuit et ita posuit. Tertium Evangelii librum secundum Lucanum. . . . The six words apparently referring to Mk. (on which supposition there is nothing extant about Mt.) appear to mean that Mark was present at only some of Peter's discourses.² Luke's disadvantages are dwelt on: it was not till 'after the Ascension' that Paul took him as a companion; he 'compiled in his own name, on [his own] judgment, ex opinione';³ he 'had not seen the Lord in the flesh'; he [set down facts] 'as far as he could ascertain them.' On the other hand, the Fourth Gospel was written by John, '(one) of the disciples,'⁴ at the exhortation of his 'fellow-disciples and his bishops.' After a three days' fast 'it was revealed to Andrew, ii. 14): 'To James the Just and John and Peter was the Gnosis delivered (παρέδωκε) by the Lord after the Resurrection. These delivered it to the rest of the apostles, and the rest to the Seventy.'

The passage is either tediously lengthy, or it distinguishes between what Christ said and what he did. 'He said that he changed Peter's name'; this is in Mt. 16 17-19 and nowhere else. 'It is written in the Memoirs (that he changed the name)'; this is in the triple tradition (Mk. 3 16 Mt. 10 2 Lk. 6 14). This distinction would indicate that Justin was here quoting the Memoirs of Peter (our Mk.) in support of the Logia of Mt. (a view somewhat confirmed by the fact that, when Justin introduces quotations with '(Jesus) says,' he quotes from Mt.).

² This would indicate that Mark wrote after Peter's death. Otherwise Peter could have supplied him with the substance of the discourses at which the latter was not present. Papias also implies that Mark could not correct what he had written by reference to Peter. Irenæus says (iii. 12) that Mark wrote after the 'decease (ἐξόδου)' of Peter (but see § 79).

(one) of the apostles, that, whilst all revised,¹ John should write all things in his own name.'

The writer admits that 'different catholic truths (varia principia) are taught' in the Four Gospels; but he protests that there is 'one Catholic Spirit' (unus ac principalis spiritus) dictating the facts of the Nativity, Passion, Resurrection, intercourse of the Lord with the disciples, and the two Advents: 'What wonder then if John so persistently (constanter) sets forth each point in his Epistle,² saying with reference to himself, "What we have seen with our eyes and heard with (our) ears and our hands have handled, these things we have written?" For thus he professes himself to be not only a seer but also a hearer,⁴ nay and a writer (too), of all the wonderful works of the Lord in order (per ordinem). In these words the writer meets objections probably urged against the Fourth Gospel. Though differing in facts and style from the Synoptists, it was pervaded, he says, by the same 'one Catholic Spirit.' Though written 'in the name' of John, it had been revised and attested by the Disciples and Elders at Ephesus, and this in consequence of a special revelation, so that it might be said to come direct from Christ, and to represent, even better than the earliest Gospels, his exact teaching.

This theory of special inspiration was well calculated to facilitate the diffusion of a Gospel that seemed to supply just those things that were wanting in the Synoptists:—a certainty not to be found in the 'various interpretations' of Mt., a fulness of doctrine to which Mk. did not pretend, and—in contrast with Lk.—the authority of a disciple, an eye-witness, and ear-witness, who also wrote 'in order.'⁵

v. IRENÆUS (about 185 A.D.) emphasizes the unity of the Gospel as coming (iii. 12) from inspired

79. Irenæus. apostles (who first preached it and then 'handed it down (tradiderunt) to us in Scriptures'), but touches also on the subject of distinctive authorship. He omits the various 'interpretations' of Mt. mentioned by Papias, and the disadvantages of Lk. mentioned by the Muratorian writer. Mark is 'the disciple and interpreter of Peter'; Luke 'the companion (ἀκόλουθος) of Paul'—thus he implies that their gospels were, in effect, apostolic.

He places Mt. before Mk. as the Muratorian Fragment appears to have done. Jn. is placed after Lk., thus: 'Afterwards John, the disciple of the Lord, who also lay on his breast, he too published the Gospel (καὶ αὐτὸς ἐξέδωκε τὸ ε.) while living in Ephesus of Asia.' Elsewhere (iii. 112) he says that John directed his Gospel against Cerinthus and the Nicolaitans. Matthew, he says (iii. 12), published his Gospel in Hebrew 'while Peter and Paul in Rome were preaching and founding the Church'—after their 'decease (or departure, ἐξόδου but Lat. excessum = 'death'), Mark (is known to have) handed down (per παρέδωκε) in writing what Peter was in the habit of preaching (κηρυσσόμενα); Luke 'set down (κατέθετο) in a book what Paul was in the habit of preaching (κηρυσσόμενον).'⁶

² Our writer has in view Ezek. 1 5-12, the 'four living creatures' (i.e., the Gospels) dominated by one world-wide or catholic (principalis) 'spirit.' Irenæus develops this, but hardly improves it; as there are (Iren. iii. 118) 'four zones' and 'four world-wide winds (principales spiritus, καθολικά πνεύματα, capable of meaning "catholic spirits"), so there must be four Gospels corresponding to the lion (John), ox (Luke), man (Matthew), eagle (Mark), in Rev. 4 7. Irenæus seems to have felt bound to keep the order of Rev. and yet to place John first; but the result is so strained that Jerome carried posterity with him in assigning the eagle to John and the lion to Mark.

³ Epistulis suis—used of a single letter (see Lightf. SR 190), a very free quotation from 1 Jn. 1 3.

⁶ There is no early testimony to any simultaneous presence of the two apostles in Rome except at the time of their martyrdom (see Eus. ii. 258, quoting Dionysius of Corinth, εἰς τὴν Ἰταλίαν ὁμοσε διδάξαντες ἐμαρτύρησαν κατὰ τὸν αὐτὸν καιρὸν). This

vi. CLEMENT.—Clement of Alexandria (circa 195 A.D.) gives (Eus. vi. 145-7) a tradition of the earliest 80. Clement. elders (τῶν ἀνεκθεν πρεσβυτέρων) that those portions of the Gospels which contain the genealogies (τῶν εὐαγγελίων τὰ περιέχοντα τὰς γενεαλογίας) were written first.¹

Clement adds a tradition about Mk., apparently on the authority of the same Elders, viz., that after Peter had publicly preached the word in Rome and uttered (ἐξελπόντος) the Gospel in the spirit (πνεύματι), his numerous hearers besought Mark to write out what the apostle had said; and that Peter, 'coming to the knowledge (ἐπιγνόντα) . . . of this, neither hindered nor stimulated him.'

Eusebius, however, earlier in his history, gives two other traditions about Mk., and appears to connect one or both of them with Clement. First he states in his own person, as a fact (ii. 151), that (a) Mk. originated from the request (as above described) of Peter's hearers. Then he adds (b) (ib. 2), 'But they say (φασί) that the apostle, learning the accomplishment (γνώστα τὸ πρᾶχθέν) from a revelation of the Spirit, was pleased with their zeal and sanctioned the work for reading in (lit. for) the churches.—Clement in the sixth book of his Outlines has quoted the [? full] history (τὴν ἱστορίαν), and his account is confirmed also by the Bishop of Hierapolis called Papias—and further, that Peter . . . Now (b) is not in Clement's or Papias's account and differs from the spirit of both. Perhaps Eusebius, while distinguishing fact from doubtful tradition ('they say'), has inserted a parenthesis, corrective of the latter, to the effect that Clement has given 'the [full and true] history,' and that Clement's view (namely, that Peter was merely the origin, but not the suggester, supervisor, or authoriser of the work) was supported in substance by Papias. If so, Eusebius, instead of committing himself to the view that Peter 'ratified' Mk., prepares the reader for finding it contradicted later.²

Concerning Jn. Clement says that (Eus. vi. 157) 'John, last of all, reflecting that the earthly aspect (τὰ σωματικά) had been set forth in the Gospels, at the instigation of his pupils (γρωρίμων), by a special impulse of the spirit (πνεύματι θεοφορηθέντα), composed a spiritual gospel.'³

vii. SUMMARY OF THE EVIDENCE AS TO MK. AND MT. 4.—Papias apologises for Mark ('he was not in fault').⁵ The Muratorian Fragment

81. Summary: appears to be apologetic ('he was present only at some discourses'). Both imply that Peter was dead when Mark wrote, so that the latter could not have the apostle's supervision. Irenæus, though stating that Mark wrote after Peter's 'departure' (which probably meant 'death'), gives no indication that he did not adequately represent the apostle; and it is doubtful whether he did not misinterpret the word 'departure.' Clement says that Peter lived to know what had been done by Mark, yet so far retains the apologetic as to add that Peter neither hindered nor incited the composition. Another tradition (apparently later) says that Peter was informed by the Spirit of the accomplishment of the book, and authorised favours the rendering 'decease' for ἐξέθον, which has this meaning in Philo 2 388 Lk. 9.31 2 Pet. 1.15 Eus. v. 136 (Letter of the Gallic Churches).

Yet the inference from Acts 28.30 (referred to in Iren. iii. 14.1) would be that (Acts 11) 'the former treatise'—i.e., Lk.—was composed while Paul was living. Perhaps Irenæus may be setting down an old tradition correctly which he and subsequent writers—taking ἐξέθον to mean 'departure (from Rome)'—interpreted incorrectly.

¹ περιέχειν, in its literary sense, means (not 'include' but) 'contain as their substance,' 'have as their contents': Diod. Sic. 14 τῶν γὰρ βιβλῶν ἡμῖν ἐξ αἰ πρώται περιέχουσι τὰς πρὸ τῶν Τρωϊκῶν πράξεις καὶ μυθολογίας (i.e., 'have as their contents'); cp. Eus. iii. 24.13. The common phrase περιέχειν τὸν τρόπον τούτου, οὕτως, etc. (1 Macc. 15.2 2 Macc. 11.16 22) means 'was in substance as follows.' Cp. Hippol. 10.32 βιβλῶ περιεχοῦσθι "Περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντὸς οὐσίας," (my) book having as its contents, or entitled, "On the essence of the All." Hence, περιοχὴ meant a 'section', and the meaning here is, 'the sections that have the genealogies as their contents.' To place Lk. before Mk. would be inconsistent with all early tradition. See § 22.

it for public use. Lastly Origen, unsurpassed by early Christian writers for honesty and intellect, says (Eus. vi. 25.4-5) 'from tradition' that Mark wrote as Peter suggested (ὡς π. ὑφηγήσατο αὐτῷ).¹ The investigation may stop here. Later writers have no further evidence, and can but exemplify the tendency of tradition, even among honest and able men, to exaggerate or to minimise, in the supposed interests of a good cause.

viii. SUMMARY OF THE EVIDENCE AS TO LK. AND JN.—(1) Papias (115-130 A.D.), recognising Mk. and 82. Summary: Mt. as apostolic (but defective), did not thus recognise Lk. or Jn., though Lk. and Jn. traditions bearing on Jn. were probably known to him. (2) Justin Martyr (150 A.D.), regarding the Synoptic Gospels as Memoirs written by the apostles from the teaching of Christ, and showing a preference for Lk. (in an interpolated form), affords no trace of a recognition of a Gospel like Jn. outside the stream of the Memoirs.² (3) The Muratorian fragment (? 170 A.D.), welcoming the Fourth Gospel as supplying the deficiencies of the Three, meets any objection that might be raised against its divergence from the Synoptists (a) by an account of a special revelation to Andrew, in accordance with which this Gospel was written in a kind of joint authorship, though in John's name, and (b) by a protest that the Four Gospels are animated by One Spirit. (4) Irenæus has no trace of the theory of revision or joint authorship of Jn. He compares the 'four Gospels' with the 'four winds' or the 'four living creatures' of prophecy, as being divinely ordained in number. (5) Clement makes no mention of a 'revelation' to Andrew or to any other of John's friends, but says that John himself received a 'divine impulse' to write the Gospel.³ From the time of Irenæus the Gospel met with almost universal acceptance.⁴

⁴ An important exception has been recently brought to light. See Rendel Harris, Hermas in Arcadia, Cambridge, 1896, pp. 43-57. Eusebius gives extracts from a Dialogue against Proclus (a Montanist) written by Gaius (ii. 25.6 'an orthodox writer [ἀνὴρ ἐκκλησιαστικός], vi. 20.3 'of very great learning [λογωπύτου]), who wrote during the bishopric of Zephyrinus (211-217 A.D.), and whom passages from his writings indicate as resident in or near Rome. In one of these extracts, Gaius attacks (iii. 28.1-2) the notion of an earthly reign of Christ after the Resurrection, as well as the notion of 'pleasures' and 'wedding festivities' in Jerusalem, all of which he attributes to Cerinthus. Such an attack, even if it assailed the Johannine Apocalypse, would probably commend him to Eusebius. Now Ebed-Jesu, at the beginning of the fourteenth century, recorded that Hippolytus wrote a treatise called 'Heads against Gaius,' and Dionysius Bar Salibi quotes from this treatise (along with replies from Hippolytus) objections raised by Gaius not only to the Apocalypse, but also to the Fourth Gospel. An inscription on the chair of Hippolytus (222 A.D.) shows that this bishop had before that date written a treatise 'In defence of the Gospel according to John and the Apocalypse,' and it is argued with great force that this treatise, or an epitome of it, was the 'Heads against Gaius.'

Eusebius, when mentioning (HE vi. 22) the works of Hippolytus (seven or eight in number) that had come into his hands, does not include the 'Defence of the Gospel of John, and the Apocalypse'; and it is possible that his 'Heads against Gaius' attacked some other work of Gaius unknown to Eusebius, not the Dialogue against Proclus. But the fact seems proved—a fact so strange that learned critics have described it as 'impossible'—that a writer of the Roman Church, described by Eusebius as 'learned' and 'orthodox,' attacked the Fourth Gospel at the beginning of the third century. The almost complete suppression of his book and of his literary existence—so complete that Bishop Lightfoot, till recently, maintained that he was a fictitious character in the Dialogue against Proclus, which (he affirmed) was written by Hippolytus—shows how difficult it is for modern critics to realise that at, and shortly

i. PAUL.—Paul quotes nothing that is found in our Gospels (Lk. 22, part of 19 and 20 being set aside as an interpolation) except the saying about 83. Quotations in Paul. (1 Tim. 5:18) the 'labourer worthy of his hire' (cp Mt. 10:10 'food,' Lk. 10:7 'hire'). But this is also found in the Didaché, 13:1 ('food').

Other sayings of Paul are akin to sayings in the Didaché: (a) Rom. 12:9-16 'Abhor that which is evil (τὸ πονηρὸν), cleave to (κολλώμενοι) that which is good (τὸ ἀγαθόν) . . . Minding not lofty things (ὕψηλά), suffering yourselves to be carried away with the humble (ταπεινοί)'; Did. 3:1-9 'Flee from all evil (πονηροῦ) and from all likeness of it. . . Thy soul shall not cleave (κολληθήσεται) to the lofty (ὕ.) but thou shalt be conversant with the just and humble (τ.), where parts of the original might apparently refer either to things or to persons'; (b) 2 Thess. 3:10 'If any will not work, neither let him eat,' Did. 12:3 ' . . . let him work and [on these terms] let him eat.'

Paul and Did. probably used an antecedent tradition. Rom. 12:21 'Be not overcome by evil,' closely resembles Pseudo-Clement's (Hom. 13:12) 'Let not evil overcome us'; but the latter could not have borrowed from Paul, whom he bitterly attacks.

ii. JAMES.—The Epistle of James, which is of uncertain date, is permeated with doctrine similar to that

84. In James. It contains more and closer parallels, however, to the Didaché and Barnabas.³

The passage that is closest to Mt. is that which forbids swearing by earth, heaven, or any other oath (Mt. 5:34-37 James 5:12); but Mt. says 'Let your speech be "Yea, yea," James (RV) says 'Let your "yea" be "yea." The meanings are quite different. The former means 'Say "yea" and nothing more than "yea,"' the latter, 'Let your "yea" of speech be also a "yea" of action.' In the latter form it is (Weets. and Hor. Hebr. ad loc.) a common Rabbinical precept (apparently alluded to in 2 Cor. 1:17). As it is also thus quoted by Justin and Clem. Alex., it was probably found in some versions of Mt., and therefore the Epistle may be quoting from Mt. But it cannot be regarded as proved. In its denunciations of 'the rich,' the Epistle resembles Lk. 6:24, but not so as to indicate borrowing.

iii. APPARENT QUOTATIONS.—Passages apparently quoted from the Gospels, in the Epistles of Paul and James, have been shown above (§ 83 f.) to be found in sources other, and probably earlier, than the Gospels.

85. Apparent quotations.

There were probably many manuals of Christ's moral teaching (of which the Sermon on the Mount is one) as well as of his predictions concerning the last day; probably, too, collections of OT prophecies bearing on the Messianic, and perhaps accounts of the Passion showing how these prophecies were fulfilled. These, together with the 'narratives' of his life mentioned by Lk. 1:1, and the various interpretations of Mt.'s Logia mentioned by Papias, necessarily left their impress on the earliest Christian writers even after the Four Gospels were recognised as canonical, and still more before that time. Hence, it is unsafe to infer (without further consideration of circumstances) that 'Barnabas quoted Mt.' or 'Clem. Alex. quoted Clem. Rom.' or 'Justin quoted Jn. because of similarity,' or even identity, in the quotations. For example, it has recently been inferred that the Vision of Hermas must be later than is usually supposed, because it (Vis. iv. 2:4) quoted Dan. 6:22 from the version of Theodot. (180 A.D.). But Heb. 11:32 appears to quote the same version. Moreover, Rev. 9:20 12:7 13:7, etc., resemble Theodot.'s version. It appears, therefore, that Theodot. incorporated in his version an earlier one, used by the authors of Heb. and Rev. (see Dict. of Christ. Biogr., s.v. 'Theodotus,' and Rendel Harris's Hermas in Arcadia, 25).

iv. LOGIA OF OXYRHYNCHUS.—The Logia of

after, the first appearance of the Fourth Gospel, it may have been regarded with suspicion by orthodox, educated, and conservative Christians, such as Justin in the middle of the second century, and Galus at the beginning of the third.

1 ἀπὸ παντὸς ὁμοίου αὐτοῦ, a saying found in the Talmud (Taylor, Teaching of Twelve Apost. 24). Cp 1 Thess. 5:22, ἀπὸ παντὸς εἶδους πονηροῦ ἀπέχεσθε.

2 Clem. Rom. § 46, goes with the Didaché: 'It is written, Cleave (κολλᾶσθε) to them that are holy,' followed by a quotation from Ps. 132:7, which he misunderstands, as if it described the influence of companionship for good or evil. So Clem. Alex. 677, only reversing the order; he also (ib.) quotes Barnabas 'One should cleave with (κολλᾶσθαι μετὰ) them that fear the Lord.'

3 E.g. the use of (a) δίδυχος, (b) ἐμφυτος, (c) προσωποληψία, (d) Isaac offered on the altar; cp with (a) Did. 4:7 5:1, Barn. 13:7 11, (b) Barn. 1:2 9:9, (c) Did. 4:3, (d) Barn. 7:3 (Heb. 11:17 om. 'altar').

Behnesa (Oxyrhynchus fragment) are an example of such a 'manual' as has been described above. They are a fragment of what seems to have been a very ancient edition of a 'Sermon on the Mount.' The extreme antiquity of the MS (probably not later than 200 A.D.) and the frequent allusions to it (or to doctrine similar to it) in Clem. Alex.¹ combine to show the antiquity of the subject matter. But a still stronger proof is found in the nature of two of the sayings. Justin, when using such a phrase as 'Sabbatise the sabbath,' avoids the danger of literalism by saying (Tryph. 12) 'the true sabbath,' 'the sabbath of God,' etc.; and Clem. Alex. is even more cautious. Ignatius (Magn. 9) bids his readers not 'sabbatise' but 'live in accordance with the Lord's Day.' No one, therefore, but Jesus (who did not shrink from utterances seemingly inconsistent) appears likely to have originated such a saying. The same argument applies to the last words in the same Logion ('Unless . . . ye shall not see the Father'). The phrase 'see God' is in Mt.'s Sermon; but 'see the Father' occurs only in Jn. 14:9, 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father,' a rebuke to Philip's expectation of a materialistic and future 'seeing the Father.' These and many other considerations indicate that the Logia are genuine sayings of Jesus, ignored or suppressed because of the 'dangerous' tendency of some of them, and the obscurity of others.

The Logia testify to the antiquity of (a) passages in the Sermon on the Mount, (b) the proverb about 'a prophet in his own country' (favouring Lk.'s versions of these sayings). They also show traces of Johannine thought.² They use a Hebraism ('the sons of men') found only in Mk. 3:28, and apparently corrupted in the later Gospels. Another Hebraism is probably latent in the phrase 'fast (accus.) the world (τὸν κόσμον)'—i.e., 'fast during the [present] age' (the Hebrew for 'world' and 'age' being the same). The meaning is, 'fast as to the six days of the flesh: sabbatise the sabbath of the spirit.'³

v. CLEMENT.—Clement of Rome (about 95 A.D.) has (a) (13) a passage (resembling Mk. 4:24 11:25 Mt. 5:7 6:14 7:2 12 Lk. 6:36-38 31) which, when compared with Polycarp (Phil. 2) and Clem. Alex. (476), shows pretty conclusively that these writers had in mind some other tradition than that of the Synoptists.

The subject is kindness and mercy. Clem. Rom., besides throwing the Synoptic tradition into a terse antithetical form, adds ὡς χρηστεύσθε, οὕτως χρηστευθήσεται ὑμῖν. The word χρηστεύειν occurs nowhere in NT except in 1 Cor. 13:4. Here, and in the context (14), Clem. Rom. uses it thrice, and also (13; see Lightf.) misquotes under Pauline influence. This points to his use of some Pauline tradition of Christ's teaching about kindness and mercy. The Didaché explains the reason. It has misunderstood the word 'kindness' in the narrow Jewish sense of 'almsgiving,' so that, instead of 'Blessed are the merciful for they shall obtain mercy,' it has (15) 'Blessed is he that giveth according to the commandment, for he is exempt (from punishment at the Day of Judgment).' Against such a Judaising version the broad Pauline χρηστεύειν would express a useful protest.⁴ The saying is introduced with a preface ('Remembering

1 Dr. J. B. Mayor pointed out that Clem. Alex. (556) has τὸν κόσμον ἡστυεύοντες (not alleged as yet from any other Greek author). For similarities of thought, cp Clem. Alex. 992, 876, 878, 810-811, 770, 323, 789-790, 214, 374, 466, 64-65, 883, 466.

2 It is characteristic of Jesus to use sayings that are literally inconsistent. Hence (a) 'seeing the Father' is Johannine, in spite of, or because of, Jn. 14:9. So also is (b) 'thirst,' used absolutely of spiritual thirst (see Jn. 4:13-15 6:35 7:37 19:28, and the beautiful saying imputed to Jesus [Resch, Aggr. 129] by Origen, 'I thirsted for them that thirst'). Add (c) Jesus describing himself as (Jn. passim) 'coming to,' 'being in,' etc., 'the world' (Log. 'I stood in the midst of the world'); (d) the impossibility that the true disciple can ever be 'alone' (Jn. 16:32); (e) the impediment presented by 'knowledge (γνώσκοντας) to the art of spiritual healing' (Jn. 7:27).

3 Log. 11:27-29, 'raise the stone . . . cleave the tree,' appears to mean that any single disciple—while doing his Master's work by 'raising up stones'—to be children of Abraham, and by cutting down and 'cleaving' the barren tree of Pharisaean conventional Law that 'cumbered the ground'—would have his Master with him (cp Jer. 18:10 'I am with thee . . . I have set . . . thee to pluck up, and to break down, . . . and to build and to plant'). If so, it is parallel to the doctrine of the Baptist recorded by Mt. 3:10 Lk. 3:9 about the stones and the tree (see Amer. Journ. of Theol. vol. II, no. 1 [198]).

4 Cp Eph. 4:32, γίνεσθε δεῖς ἀλλήλους χρηστοί. Rom. 11:22 (ἐπι δεῖς θεοῦ χρηστοί, ἐπὶ ἐπιείκεια τῆς χρηστότητι) is equivalent to χρηστεύειν καὶ χρηστευθήσεται σοι. Clem. Alex. quotes this the words of the Lord Jesus which he spake') similar to that in Acts 20 35, which is prefixed to a saying not found in any Gospel. This confirms the view that Clemens is referring to a Pauline manual of the Words of the Lord.

(b) Elsewhere Clem. Rom. (46)—in the same chapter in which he quotes 'cleave to the holy,' and is followed by Clem. Alex., both apparently quoting from some version of the Lord's Words—combines Mk. 9 42 14 21 and parall. Mt.; and again Clem. Alex. (56f) agrees with him. Clem. Rom. has 'Remember the words of Jesus our Lord, how he said, Woe unto that man. It were well for him if he had not (ού) been born, rather than that he should cause to stumble one of my elect. It were better for him that a mill-stone were put round him and that he were sunk in the sea, than that he should pervert (διαστρέψαι) one of my elect.' Clem. Alex. (56f) has the same, substituting μή for ού, and 'saith (φησίν) the Lord' for 'remember . . . saith.' The reduplication of statement has a Hebraic sound, and it is probable (both because of Clem. Rom.'s preface, and because of the apparent borrowing from Logia in the same chapter) that the two authors are here, as above, quoting independently, from an ancient tradition of the Words of the Lord.¹

(c) Clem. Rom. 15 condenses Is. 29 13 similarly to Mk. 7 6 Mt. 15 8, omitting the bracketed words in the following quotation from the LXX: [ἐγγίξτε μοι] ὁ λαὸς οὗτος ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν τοῖς χεῖρεσιν αὐτῶν τιμῶσίν με (Clem. με τιμᾷ, omitting αὐτῶν), ἣ δὲ καρδία αὐτῶν πόρρω ἄπχει (Clem. ἀπεστίν) ἀπ' ἐμοῦ. The bracketed words interfere with the antithesis, and Justin omits them (allusively) in Tryph. 27 and 80 (χεῖρεσιν ὁμολογούοντας τὸν θεόν, ὡς αὐτὸς κέκραγεν ὁ θεὸς τὴν δὲ καρδίαν πόρρω ἔχειν [sic] ἀπ' αὐτοῦ). Yet in Tryph. 78 he quotes the passage quite differently, omitting ἐν τῷ στόματι αὐτοῦ καὶ ἐν with ἌQ of Q, but taking ἐγγίξτε μοι ὁ λα. οὐ. as a separate sentence, so that the latter part preserves the antithesis. These facts, and the remarkable variations in the text of the LXX and in that of Mk.-Mt., indicate that Clem. Rom. may be here quoting from some Christian manual of prophecy used also by other authors. Clem. Alex., who frequently quotes it, is said by Lightf. (Clem. Rom. 15) to 'follow' Clem. Rom. But this is not likely. For, in the only passage where he resembles Clem. Rom., Clem. Alex. (46f) has ἔστιν, Clem. Rom. ἀπεστίν. Now ἐστίν is the reading of D in Mt. 15 8 (adopted by Clem. Alex. also in 14 3). Probably, therefore, Clem. Alex. is following Mt. 15 8 (or some ancient version of it). Clem. Alex. has elsewhere (206) ψαλλοῦσα for τιμῶσα, and similarly D has ἀγαπᾷ for τιμᾷ in Mk. 7 6. Also Clem. Alex. has elsewhere (577) ὁ ἔρεπος λαός. The facts are conclusive negatively. The passage does not prove that Clem. Rom. is quoting from Mk.-Mt.

No further quotations of importance are alleged. The conclusion is, that (1) Clem. Rom. is certainly not proved to have quoted from our Gospels; (2) in (a) and (b) he is probably quoting from Logia not now extant; (3) in (c) he may be quoting from our Gospels, but quite as probably from a Manual (or some Oral Tradition) of prophecy in Christian use.

vi. DIDACHE.—The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (? 80-110 A.D.) is a composite document. The earlier part (1-6), consisting of the Doctrine of the Two Ways, inculcates precepts of the Lord, without appeal to his 'words,' or 'Gospel'; the latter part appeals to both. The 'Gospel' meant is probably Mt. The addition of a doxology to the Lord's prayer, and the mention of (141) the Lord's Day,² indicate for the latter portion a date toward, or after, the close of the first century. There is no indication that Lk. was known to the writer, apart from supplements or correc-passage twice: once (954), embodying in his own remarks (without indicating quotation) a free condensation of Mt. 7 1 f. Lk. 6 33; once (476), with the preface 'saith (φησίν) the Lord,' quoting almost exactly as Clem. Rom. The variation may indicate that, in the latter instance, he is borrowing from some earlier tradition from which Clem. Rom. also borrowed (as above, in the saying about 'cleaving to them that are holy'). Similarly Clem. Alex. when he asserts (377) that the Scripture says, 'My son, be not a liar, for lying leadeth to theft,' is probably not giving the name of 'Scripture' to Hermas (Mand. 8), 'They therefore who lie . . . have defiled the commandment of the Lord and become defrauders of him,' but is quoting (what Hermas is trying to spiritualise) Did. 3 5, 'My child, be not a liar, since lying leadeth to theft,' or some book on which Did. 3 5 is based.

tions of Mt. in the Two Ways.¹ So far as this little book is concerned, the 'Gospel' to which it refers might consist of a version of the Sermon on the Mount and the Precepts to the Twelve. On the Second Advent, the writer mentions (166-8) 'the Signs of the Truth' with such apparent independence of Mt. as to make it doubtful whether, in the context, the resemblances to Mt. indicate quotations from Mt.

Of all the promises or blessings in Mt. 5 3-11, the earlier part of the Didaché inserts only two. Did. 3 7, 'Be meek, since the meek shall inherit the earth,' is based (as Mt. 5 5 is) on Ps. 37 11. Did. 1 5, 'Blessed is he that giveth in accordance with the commandment,' refers to 'the commandment' which the writer has just quoted (Mt. 5 42 Lk. 6 30), 'Give to every one that asketh thee, and ask not again.' But the Hebrew for 'give alms' is often represented by ἐλεεῖν, and 'alms' by ἐλεημοσύνη (cp A.T.M.S), so that 'blessed is he that giveth' might be, in NT Greek, μακάριοι οἱ ἐλεούσους (or ἐλεημοῦσας as in Mt. 5 7). It should be noted that Lk. omits both these passages.²

vii. BARNABAS.—The Epistle of Barnabas; assigned by Lightfoot (BE 91) to 70-79 A.D., but by others placed later.

(1) Alleged Synoptic Quotations in Barnabas.—(a) This Epistle is alleged to quote Mt. 22 14 as Scripture (Barn. 4 14): 'Let us give heed and Synoptists. . . many called but few chosen.'

The application of the title 'Scripture' to NT before the end of the first century, if here intended, would be unique. But there are several reasons for doubting the intention. (1) In other allusions to Synoptic tradition, the author does not quote as from 'Scripture.' (2) He twice quotes Enoch, either as (16 5) 'Scripture,' or with 'it is written' (4 3): 'The last stumbling-block hath drawn nigh, concerning which it is written, as Enoch³ saith, "For to this end hath the Lord cut short the times . . ." Now (3) these two passages agree with the one under discussion in treating of the 'last days,' on which subject 'Enoch' was an authority. Also, (4) in the last-mentioned passage, whereas he might have quoted Mk. 13 20 Mt. 24 22 (if known to him as canonical) about the 'cutting short of the times,' he not only quotes Enoch instead and treats it as 'Scripture,' but also (5) appears to add words not now extant in Enoch ('For to this end,' etc.). (6) The book of Enoch, as we have it, is a composite work, and is likely to have existed in many forms. (7) If it originated for NT (or, at all events, anticipated) the phrases 'Mammon of unrighteousness,' 'Gehenna,' 'the New Jerusalem,' 'the Son of Man sitting on the throne of his glory,' 'it had been good for him if he had not been born,'⁴ it is a very natural supposition that it may have contained the saying in question.

These considerations make it fairly probable that the author is either quoting the words from a version of Enoch, or confusing some tradition of the Words of Christ with a version of Enoch, and make either of these suppositions very much more probable than that he is quoting from Mt. as 'Scripture.'

(b) and (c) In Barn. 5 9 Christ is said to have chosen as his apostles 'men exceeding in lawlessness (ἀνομιωτέροις) beyond all sin, that he might show that he came not to call (the) righteous but sinners.' There is nothing to show quotation, but the words may come from Mk. 2 17 (or Mt. 9 13, Lk. inserts 'to repentance') or from some document, or tradition, used by Mk. (c) Among several quotations from unknown (7 4 11 9 12 1) 'prophets'—Barn. refers to the New Creation of man thus (6 13): 'The Lord saith,

³ The Latin substitutes 'Daniel' for 'Enoch' and takes the words, 'for to this,' etc., as coming from Barnabas.

⁴ See Charles (Enoch, pp. 47-49), who traces its influence in almost every book of NT, and conspicuously in Heb. 4 13 (Enoch 9 5, 'All things are naked and open in thy sight, and thou seest all things and nothing can hide itself from thee'), which some suppose to have been written by Barnabas. It has also influenced Irenæus, Justin, and other early writers. The tradition of Papias about the vine with 10,000 branches comes, directly or indirectly, from Enoch 10 19.

Behold I make the last as the first.' This may possibly be akin to the Synoptic (Mk. 10:31 and Mt.-Lk.) 'The last shall be first'; cp Mt. 20:14, 'I will give unto this last even as unto thee.'

(d) In 7:11 and 11:11 the author probably, but not certainly, assigns to Jesus words not in our Gospels. He (15:9) regards the Ascension as taking place on the day of the Resurrection.¹

(2) Anticipations of Jn. in Barnabas.—The special points of interest in this epistle are that (1) it was written

90. Barnabas and John.

(Lightf. BE 91) 'before the Fourth Gospel'; (2) the latter resembles it in many points:—(a) (Barn. 11:11-12:5) the juxtaposition of 'baptism' and the 'brazen serpent,' and the parallel between the serpent and Christ; (b) (6:6) the application of Ps. 22:18 to the casting lots over Christ's vesture; (c) (7:9) the 'piercing (κατακερτήσας)' of Christ; (d) (11:1) the connection between the Cross and Water, followed by a connection between the Cross and Blood; (e) (11:11) 'Whosoever shall eat of these shall live for ever.' This means, 'Whosoever,' saith he, 'shall hear these things when they are spoken and shall believe, shall live for ever.'³ It will be seen below (§ 101) that many of the so-called 'imitations of Jn. by Justin' might be called, less inaccurately, 'imitations of Barnabas.'

viii. SIMON MAGUS.—The Great 'Apophesis' of Simon Magus (Lightf. BE 105, 'probably composed somewhere about the close of the first century, perhaps 91. Simon Magus. before the Gospel of John was written, or at least circulated) twice uses the phrase (Hippol. 6:12:14) 'remain alone in potentiality (μένειν τῇ δυνάμει μόνον),' and once (ib. 16) 'but if a tree abide alone (ἐάν δὲ μείνῃ δένδρον μόνον)' to denote, as in Jn. 12:24, that which remains barren and which will perish with the world because it is not made fruitful by being 'likened to the (divine) image' of the Spirit.⁴ Simon's doctrine of three divine beings (ib. 17) 'there are three that stand,' his allegorising of the Pentateuch in connection with the regeneration of man, the general tone of his materialism, and the wide scope of his influence, make it probable that Jn. had Simon in view when he composed his Gospel.

ix. IGNATIUS.—Ignatius (before 110 A.D.) mentions a 'Gospel'—which he compares with 'the Law' and 'the Prophets' in such a way as to indicate that it was written—Philad. 5, 8, 9, Smyrn. 5, 7. He quotes short sentences found in Mt. (once [Eph. 16] a phrase peculiar to Mk. 9:43). He never quotes Lk.⁵

³ Cp. Jn. 5:24 f. 6:51 6:3, 'He that heareth my word (λόγον) and believeth in him that sent me hath eternal life,' 'If any man shall eat of this bread, he shall live for ever,' 'the words (ῥήματα) that I have spoken unto you are spirit and are life.'

The similarity is striking; still it would be a mistake to say 'Jn. borrowed from Barnabas.' Barnabas, borrowing from Ezekiel, has previously been alluding (11:9) to 'the prophet' who calls the land of Jacob (Ezek. 20:6) 'praised' (Ἐ κηρίον, var. δυναρή, Hebr. 'glory'), continuing as follows (11:10), 'Next (εἶτα) what saith he?' and there was a river winding from the right, and there went up from it fair trees, and whoso shall eat thereof shall live for ever.' The italicised words are not in Ezekiel; but they were (doubtless) in the writer's version of Ezekiel, or in some Christian Manual of prophecy containing Christianized extracts from Ezek. 47:1-12, from which also comes probably Rev. 22:1 f. ('a river of water of life,' etc.).

The tradition, then, was common to the Church at the close of the first century, and Jn. may be quite independent of Barnabas. The latter generally regards the Cross as a 'tree,' and the crucified Jesus as the fruit of the tree (cp Lightf. on Ignat. Smyrn. 1) planted by the side of the baptismal stream. The former regards the 'fountain for sin and uncleanness' as flowing out of Jesus himself, but out of Jesus on the Cross, his 'throne' to which he is 'lifted up.'

⁵ Lightf.'s index contains several Ignatian 'resemblances' to Lk. One of these is Rom. 7 ('pleasures of this life') resembling

The Gospel (Philad. 9, Smyrn. 7) is said to contain the Passion or Resurrection and also (Philad. 5, 9) the 'flesh' and 'personal presence (παρουσία)' of Jesus—i.e., it brings Christ before us as in the flesh. But when he speaks of the Incarnation, Ignatius does not appeal to the Gospel, but speaks in his own name; describing, for example, (Eph. 19) the 'star in the east' in language incompatible with any sober acceptance of Mt.'s account, and actually saying, almost in the language of Simon Magus, that the Logos (Magn. 8) 'came forth from Silence'—a dangerous expression, hardly possible for any one who devoutly accepted the Fourth Gospel.²

The Ignatian passages commonly alleged to prove that Ignatius recognised Jn. as a Gospel simply prove that he knew the substance of some traditions incorporated in Jn. (a) Philad. 7, 'The Spirit . . . knoweth whence it cometh and whither it goeth, and convicteth the things that are secret, is closer in thought (though not in word) to Jn. 8:14 than to Jn. 38. It is a tradition from Gen. 1:68, quoted by Philo 1:576 (and Quaest. Gen.), 'Conviction therefore, speaking to the soul, saith unto her, "Whence comest thou and where goest thou?"' Ignatius is closer to Philo than to Jn. (b) Philad. 9, 'the door of the Father,' may be traced to Clem. Rom. 48 and back to Ps. 118:19 f., it being a natural tradition that the 'gate of righteousness' is 'the gate in Christ,' and that this leads to 'life' and to 'the Father.'³ Lastly, such variations as (c) Rom. 7 'bread of God' (only once in Jn.), (d) Eph. 17:19, etc. 'prince of this age,' and (e) Magn. 5 'His living (τὸ ζῆν) is not in us'—instead of the familiar 'bread of life,' 'prince of this world,' 'His life is not in us'—would be almost impossible, if the Fourth Gospel were familiar to the author as a gospel, but quite natural if he had a recent acquaintance with the substance of it as a recent doctrine.

The conclusions are that Ignatius (1) recognised Mt. and probably Mk. as a written gospel, but (2) did not recognise Lk. or Jn. The latter is confirmed by the fact that (§§ 29, 30) in order to demonstrate the reality of the Resurrection, he appeals, not to Lk. or Jn., but to an apocryphal tradition. The 'gospel' of Ignatius does not appear to have contained Mt.'s account of the Incarnation as we have it. The deficiency in Mt.'s account of the Resurrection he supplies from apocryphal sources.⁴ Though he does not acknowledge Jn. as a gospel, he accepts a rudimentary Logos-doctrine, and has an acquaintance (but not a familiarity) with Johanne thought.

x. POLYCARP.—Polycarp (110 A.D.; see § 87) has sayings similar to those in the Sermon on the Mount (Phil. 2), and to the words of the Lord in Mk. 14:38 Mt. 26:41 (Phil. 7).

The former may be from a version of the Didaché, but the latter indicates that, like Ignatius, he knew the 'gospel' of Mk. and Mt. (a) His omission (Phil. 2) of the words 'in the spirit,' in quoting Mt. 5:3, 'poor in the spirit,' resembles Lk. 6:20, but may only indicate that Polycarp and Lk. herein agreed in adopting the same version or interpretation of the Logia. (b) (Phil. 7) 'Every one that confesseth not that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is Antichrist,' resembles 1 Jn. 4:3, 'every spirit that confesseth not Jesus is not of God; and this is the [spirit] of the Antichrist'; but it much more resembles 2 Jn. 7 'they that confess not that

Lk. 8:14 ('pleasures of life'). But the phrase had been made popular by Euripides (Hippol. 383) εἰσὶν ἡδοναὶ πολλαὶ βίου. Of the two marked as 'quotations,' one (Eph. 14) 'the tree is manifest from its fruit' is more like Mt. 12:33 ('From the fruit the tree is known') than like Lk. 6:44 ('Each tree is known from its own fruit'); the other (Smyrn. 3) 'Take, handle me, and see that I am not a bodiless demon' has been shown to be not from Lk. (see § 29 f.).

⁴ Smyrn. 2 (saying that Christ 'raised himself up') seems incongruous with Mt.'s account of the descent of an angel to roll away the stone, but agrees better with Pseudo-Peter, who says (9) that 'the stone rolled away of itself' implying, perhaps, that Christ caused it to roll away and arose by his own power (so that the angels descended merely to carry him up to heaven). The more orthodox account is that of Paul, and 1 Pet. 1:21 quoted by Polycarp, Phil. 2, 'believing on him who raised our Lord Jesus Christ from the dead.'

Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh. This is the deceiver and the Antichrist.' Now 2 Jn. is a 'disputed' Epistle, so that if Eusebius believed it to be a quotation, he would be bound to call attention to it.¹ But he makes no mention of it, though he tells us that Polycarp (iv. 14g) quoted 1 Pet. It is probable, therefore, that he regarded the words, not as a quotation, but as a mere use of Johannine traditions in vogue during the conflict against Docetism.²

The conclusion, so far as any can be drawn from so short a letter, is, that Polycarp knew Mk. and Mt. but not Lk. or Jn., though he used a Johannine tradition embodied in 'a disputed epistle.'

xi. PAPIAS.—Papias (120-30 A.D.) is probably (Lightf. BE 67) recorded by Irenæus (v. 3612) to have

94. Papias. Preserved a tradition of a saying of the Lord, 'In the region (ἐν τοῖς) of my Father there are many abiding-places (μοῦδοί).' Cp Jn. 142 'In my Father's house (οἰκία) are many abiding-places.'

The context indicates that Papias had one meaning and Jn. another. Papias (taking the word as used by Pausanias x. 317 'encampment,' 'halting-place') means 'there are many stages on the journey upwards'—viz. the New Jerusalem, Paradise, and Heaven. This explains why Papias has 'in the region,' while Jn. has 'in the house.' Μοῦδοί means 'stages' in the Petrine Apocalypse and in Clem. Alex. (pp. 1000, 1003, 579 J., 545, 794), who also (p. 797) speaks of the τρεῖς μοῦδοί 'hinted at (ἀντιστοιχεῖται)' by 'the three numbers in the Gospel.' The 'three numbers' are explained by Papias as the 'thirty,' 'sixty,' and 'hundred' of the Parable of the Sower.

The conclusion is that Papias is not quoting and misinterpreting Jn., but quoting, and interpreting in accordance with tradition, a Logion (illustrating the Synoptic Parable of the Sower) of which Jn. gives a different version.⁴ And this leads to the inference that, if Papias had Jn. in his mind, he did not recognise it as an apostolic gospel.

xii. DIOGNETUS.—The Epistle to Diognetus, in its former portion (Lightf. 117-47 A.D.), while accepting a Logos-doctrine, accepts it (ch. 7) in a non-Johannine form (see Lightf. on Col. 1:16); but phrases in ch. 6:10 indicate a familiarity, if not with Jn. as a gospel, at all events with Johannine doctrine and method of expression.

95. Epistle to Diognetus. The latter portion (Lightf. 180-210 A.D.), short though it is, yet contains (ch. 11) an apparent allusion to Jn. 10:29 ('Now speakest thou clearly ἠραρυσθαί'), which makes it highly probable that the author had read Jn. The late date, however, makes this testimony of little importance.

xiii. HERMAS.—The Shepherd of Hermas (114-156 A.D.) contains no traces of recognised authoritative Johannine thought. The alleged similarities of language

96. Hermas. may generally be traced to common tradition based on OT—e.g., (Sim. 9:12) the Rock and the Gate, (ib.) the Son a Fellow-counsellor with the Father in creation (cp Eccles. 24:9 with Is. 9:6); (Sim. 5:6) 'showed them the paths of life' (cp Ps 16:11). Mand. 3 has no connection with 1 Jn. 2:27. The Logos-doctrine (cp Sim. 0:1 'That Spirit is the Son of God,' and see Sim. 5:6) is so strikingly unlike that of Jn. that the writer would seem either not to know Jn., or to reject it as non-authoritative.⁵

² Besides the instances above-mentioned, Lightf.'s Index mentions, as a 'resemblance' to Jn., Phil. 12 'that your fruit may be manifest among all.' Jn. 15:16 has 'that your fruit may remain,' but 1 Tim. 4:15 has 'that thy progress may be manifest to all,' and the notions of 'fruit' and 'progress' are both Pauline (cp Rom. 6:22 'your fruit').

xiv. BASILIDES.—Basilides (117-138 A.D.) is frequently alleged to have quoted from Jn.; but (owing to the difficulty of distinguishing between quotations 97. Basilides. from Basilides and quotations from his followers, and the fact that Hippolytus and Clem. Alex. differ from Irenæus in their expositions of his doctrine) the only ground for the allegations is in an extract (Clem. Alex. 599 f., expressly quoting the 23rd book of his Exegetica) which teaches that all suffering proves the sufferer to have sinned. Against this doctrine—not by any means peculiar to Basilides—Jn. protests when it states that (93) the man who was born blind was not born so because he had sinned. With that protest before him, Basilides could hardly have accepted Jn., in its entirety, as authoritative.

So far as it goes, then, the evidence indicates that Basilides did not accept Jn. as an authoritative gospel.

xv. MARCION.—Marcion is mentioned by Justin Martyr (150 A.D.), after the two very early

98. Marcion. heretics Simon Magus and Menander, as 'even now teaching' and as having gained followers 'in every race.'

This implies that Marcionism had been flourishing for several years, and points to 125-135 A.D. as the date for Marcion's gospel. Rejecting the OT and the God therein assumed, he was forced, if he adopted any of the four gospels, to make many changes and omissions—e.g., in 'I have not come to destroy the law but to fulfil' he transposes 'fulfil' and 'destroy.' His gospel is shown by extracts to agree largely with Lk., but to omit many passages peculiar to Lk. He did not call it by Lk.'s name, and may have regarded it as but one of many 'interpretations' of the Logia of Mt., more authoritative than most, and better adapted than our Mt. to express his anti-Jewish views. The omissions and alterations that he would have had to make in Jn. are trifling as compared with those which he was forced to introduce into Lk., and Marcion's alleged Pauline predilections hardly afford a satisfactory reason for his not selecting Jn.

The conclusion is that, in 125-135 A.D., Lk. had come into prominence as a recognised gospel in Marcion's region, but that Jn. was not yet equally prominent.

xvi. VALENTINUS.—Valentinus (141-156 A.D.) is assumed by Tertullian (De Præscr. 38) to use our gospels. Irenæus says that his followers freely used the Fourth.

99. Valentinus. Hippolytus (63) gives, as from Valentinus himself, a quotation from Jn. 10:8 'All that are come before me are thieves and robbers.' But Tatian has thrice a somewhat similar allusion (calling it on one occasion a saying of 'the most excellent Justin') (chaps. 12, 14, 18), referring to 'demons' who have been 'robbers of deity' and have 'taken men captive.' As has been shown above (§ 57 n.), it is probably the Synoptic tradition about the contrast between the ideal ruler and the ruler of this world, thrown into a Johannine form, which found its way into Christian tradition before Jn. was generally recognised as authoritative.

xvii. SUMMARY OF THE EVIDENCE BEFORE JUSTIN.—Thus, up to the middle of the second century, though 100. Summary. there are traces of Johannine thought and tradition, and immature approximations to the Johannine Logos-doctrine, yet in some writers (e.g., Barnabas and Simon) we find rather what Jn. develops, or what Jn. attacks, than anything that imitates Jn., and in others (e.g., Polycarp, Ignatius, and Papias) mere war-cries of the time, or phrases of a Logos-doctrine still in flux, or apocalyptic traditions of which Jn. gives a more spiritual and perhaps a truer version. There is nothing to prove, or even suggest, that Jn. was 'recognised as a gospel.' Many of these writers, however, are known to us by extracts so short and slight that inference from them is very unsafe; it is otherwise with the writer next to be considered.

xviii. JUSTIN.—Justin Martyr (145-9 A.D.) has been found above (§ 75 ff.) (1) quoting freely from Mt. and Lk.;

101. Justin. (2) sometimes appearing to use a harmony of the two; (3) adopting Lk. by preference as to the Miraculous Conception and the Passion; (4) quoting (apparent) interpolations in Lk.; and (5) showing a disposition to maintain the claims of Lk. as a new but authoritative version of the Memoirs of the apostles. The instances given (§§ 75-77) to prove these conclusions will suffice to show Justin's attitude toward the Synoptists. It remains to consider his attitude toward Jn. as deducible from alleged quotations, or types, borrowed from it; abstentions from quotation; agreements, or disagreements, with Jn.'s doctrine or statement.

(1) Minor apparent Johannine quotations.

(a) Tryph. 123, 'We are called and are the true children of God,' is alleged (Lightf. BE 88) to be from Jn. 1.12, and 1 Jn. 3.1 f. 'that we should be called the children of God, and (so) we are.' Both Justin and Jn. are alluding, partly (1) to Jewish tradition about God's 'calling' Isaac to birth and thereby causing him to 'be' (Gen. 21.2 'In Isaac shall thy seed be called,' Rom. 4.17 'calleth the things that are not [τὰ μὴ ὄντα] as though they were [ὡς ὄντα]'); partly (2) to the tradition that Isaac was 'called' from the dead (Heb. 11.19 'that God was able to raise [him] from the dead,' to be compared with Josephus's comment on the sacrifice of Isaac [Ant. 1.182] 'that God was able to bring men into abundance of the things that are not (τὰν οὐκ ὄντων), and to take away the things that are'); partly (3) to Philonian traditions about God's creative 'call' (Philo 2.367 'He calleth the things that are not [τὰ μὴ ὄντα] so that they are [εἰς τὸ εἶναι]': cp Philo 2.176); and partly (4) to a Stoic phrase 'I am and I am called' (Philo 1.337), Epict. Ench. 15 'they both were (ἦσαν) and were called (ἐλέγοντο) divine' (cp ib. ii. 1644 'Heracles was believed to be the son of Zeus and he was [so]'). So, here, Justin first shows that God was to (Jer. 31.27 and Is. 19.24 f.) 'raise up a seed' to Israel; then asserts that he 'called' this people Israel and declared it his inheritance; lastly, in answer to Trypho's 'Are you (ἡμεῖς) Israel?' he replies, 'We both are called and are the children of God.' (b) Apol. 6 'reason and truth' is an allusion not to Jn. 4.24, 'spirit and truth,' but to what Justin has just said about the temper of Socrates 'in true reason, i.e., reasonableness,' and is a play on the word Logos. (c) Tryph. 17, 'the only spotless and righteous [one], sent [as] light from God to man,' implies a recognition of Christ as (Is. 42.6-7 Lk. 2.32; Enoch 49.4) 'a light to lighten,' not only 'the Gentiles,' but the world; and an allusion to Jewish traditions (Schöttg. 2.113.226) based on Ps. 43.3 'Send out thy light and thy truth.' (d) 1 Apol. 60 ('If ye . . . believe, ye shall be saved'), treating of the brazen serpent, differs so much from Num. 21.7-9 ('that every one that is bitten, when he seeth it, shall live') that it is urged (Lightf. BE 87) that the writer had in his mind Jn. 3.14 f. ('that whosoever believeth may in him have eternal life'). But Barn. (12.7 'let him hope and believe . . . and immediately he shall be saved') differs even more from Num. Justin is closer to Barnabas than to Jn., and appears to be condensing the former or some kindred tradition.³ (e) Justin accuses the Jews of cancelling (Tryph. 73) 'He shall reign from the tree' in Ps. 96.10; and some might infer that he borrowed this thought from Jn., who regards the Cross as a throne on which Jesus is 'lifted up' or 'exalted.' But see Barn. 8.5: 'the reign of Jesus on the tree.'

The close and numerous resemblances between Barnabas and Justin in respect of prophecies and types prove that Justin followed either Barnabas or some tradition used by Barnabas, and go some way towards proving that, if he knew Jn., he preferred Barnabas.

(2) 'Except ye be begotten again.'⁴—1 Apol. 61, 'For in the name of God, the Father and Lord of the Universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, they then receive the washing with water. For indeed Christ said, Except ye be begotten again ye shall not (οὐ μὴ) enter into the kingdom of the heavens. Now that it is absolutely impossible for those once born to re-enter the wombs of those that bare them is evident to all.' Cp Jn. 3.3 f. 'Except a man be begotten from above,⁵ he cannot see the kingdom of God. Nicodemus saith unto

¹ The antithesis was naturally common after the persecutions of Nero. It may be illustrated by Mt. 22.14 'Many are called but few chosen,' but also by Epict. ii. 9.20 'When we see a man trimming, we are wont to say, "He is not a Jew, but pretends." But when he takes on himself the condition and the imbued and chosen (τὸ τοῦ θεβαμμένου καὶ ἡρημένου—i.e., the "elect"), then he is indeed, besides being called (καὶ ἔστι τῷ ὄντι καὶ καλεῖται), a Jew': where 'is . . . and is called' seems parallel to Justin's 'is called and is.'

⁴ Ἀναγεννηθεῖτε: this verb does not occur in NT except in 1 Pet. 1.3.23 (RV) 'begat again.'

him, How can a man be begotten when he is old? Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be begotten? Jesus answered Except a man be begotten of water and (the) Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God.'

Justin is here meeting heathen misrepresentations of the two sacraments, by showing that they are based on Christ's command and on reason, and that the heathen themselves have imitated them. As to the Eucharist, he gives (1) Christ's Words of Institution; (2) the Pagan imitation. As to baptism, since he gives the Pagan imitation later (62.64), he is (presumably) giving here what he regards as the words of Institution (for he gives no others).¹ That they are derived from Jn. is improbable for many reasons. (1) Justin's tradition is thrown into the form of an indirect precept ('thou shalt be baptized or thou shalt not enter'); Jn.'s is a statement of a law. (2) Justin omits the two elements mentioned in the full form of the Johannine utterance—viz., 'water' and 'spirit.' (3) Justin, though familiar with the use of ἀνωθεν to mean 'from above,' and though he once actually uses ἀνωθεν γεννάσθαι, here has ἀναγεννάσθαι.² (4) That Justin agrees with Jn. in connecting the doctrine of regeneration with words about the impossibility of re-entering the womb, is not indeed an accidental coincidence, any more than the somewhat similar connection in an utterance of Simon Magus (Hippol. 6.14), 'How, then, and in what manner, doth God shape men (in the new birth)?' to which Simon replies, 'Admit that Paradise is the womb, and that this is true the Scripture will teach thee, afterwards entering into minute materialistic details about 'the womb.' It is a connection so natural in controversy that it is easy to understand that it became a commonplace in Christian doctrine.³

(3) Other alleged quotations.—(a) Tryph. 105, 'That this [man] was [the] only-begotten of the Father of the Universe (μονογεγῆς γὰρ ὅτι ἦν τῷ πατρὶ τῶν ὄλων ὄντος), having become from him in a special way Word and Power (ἰδίως ἐξ αὐτοῦ λόγος καὶ δύναμις γεγενῆμένος), and afterwards becoming man through the Virgin (καὶ ὄστερον ἀνθρώπος διὰ τῆς παρθένου γεγέννητος), as we have learned from the Memoirs, I have shown above.' Lightfoot (BE 88), omitting the italicised words, infers that Justin refers to Jn. as a part of the Memoirs for the proof of the 'special' antemundane birth. But the words he omits indicate that Justin refers to Tryph. 100, where he 'shows' this from the Memoirs, as an inference from Peter's confession. This resort to the Memoirs to prove what they cannot prove, but Jn. could prove, indicates that Justin did not regard Jn. as authoritative; (b) Justin, against Marcion, is said⁴ to have

(331.19.11) and from Philo 1.482.263.443.498 (and cp Menander in Eus. 3.26 and Simon Magus in Hippol. 6.18), and from Epict. i.133 (τῆς αὐτῆς ἀνωθεν καταβολῆς [σπέρματος]), is irresistibly in favour of the rendering 'from above.' 'Ἀνωθεν may mean 'again,' but only where the context clearly points to that meaning, as it does in Artemidorus (see Grimm's Lexicon), who says that a man who dreams of being born over again (ἀνωθεν) will have a son, because having a son is, as it were, a second birth.

Justin himself never uses the word to mean 'again,' but (1) 'from above,' of the Incarnation, (Tryph. 64) ἀνωθεὶ προελθόντα καὶ ἀνθρώπων ἐν ἀνθρώποις γεγενεμένον, and also probably (against Maranus) Tryph. 63 ἀνωθεν καὶ διὰ γαστρὸς ἀνθρωπίαις ὁ θεὸς . . . γεννάσθαι (?) αὐτὸν ἐμμελεν: (2) with κηρύσσειν or προεπιπεῖν, Tryph. 24, 99 'from of old.' If Justin were here quoting Jn., he would be altering a phrase that he himself uses.

written (Iren. iv. 62), 'I should not have believed . . . but the only-begotten Son came to us. . .'. This Lightfoot (BE 89) asserts to be based on Jn. 1:18. But, besides the objection that many authorities, as W & H, read in Jn. 1:18 'God' for 'Son', this assertion assumes that Jn. must have invented this application of 'only-begotten', whereas in fact it followed naturally from the Logos-passage in Wisd. 1:22 describing the Wisdom of God as containing a Spirit 'only-begotten', and might be suggested by Ps. 22:20, 'Deliver my soul from the sword, mine only-begotten from the power of the dog.' Now in the Apologies and Dialogue Justin (so far as Otto's Index shows) never uses the word 'only-begotten' except in Tryph. 105, referred to above (a), where he supported it by Ps. 22, and professed to have 'previously shown' it, the 'showing' being really a futile inference from the Memoirs. All this, so far from indicating a borrowing from Jn., proves that, if Justin knew Jn., he refused to base any statement on it; (c) Tryph. 88 has simply the Synoptic tradition of the Baptist, developed as in Acts 13:25¹ (with a tradition of Justin's own, καθεζόμενος, twice repeated in connection with the Baptist elsewhere, and with εβόα adapted from Is.); and Tryph. 57, as to the Manna, instead of alluding to Jn. 6:31, is a quotation from Ps. 78:25 with an allusion to Ps. 78:19 (cp 1 Cor. 10:3 and also Wisd. 16:20), representing a stage of tradition earlier than Jn.; (d) Tryph. 69, 'those who were from birth and according to the flesh defective [in vision] (μηροίς)', is alleged by some² to refer to the healing of the man 'blind from birth', mentioned only by Jn. (9:1-34). But Justin speaks of these people in the plural, Jn. 9:32 states that the healing was unique, unheard of 'from the beginning of the world.' Justin was probably quoting from some tradition earlier than Jn.; but in any case this instance tends to show that, if he knew Jn., he did not regard it as authoritative.³

Other alleged quotations, if examined, might be shown, even more conspicuously than those treated above, to fail to prove that Justin recognised Jn. as an authoritative gospel.

(4) Abstentions from Quotation.—It is generally recognised that the Synoptists do not teach, whereas Jn.

and Justin do teach, Christ's pre-existence, the feeding on Christ's 'flesh and blood' ignoring Jn.

(as expressed in those precise words), the application of the term 'only-begotten' to Christ, and the Logos-doctrine. When, therefore, we find Justin either not appealing to any authority in behalf of these doctrines, or appealing to pointless passages in the Synoptists instead of pointed passages in Jn., it is a legitimate inference that Justin did not recognise Jn. as on a level with the Synoptists.⁴

(a) 1 Apol. 66, 'We have been taught that the food . . . is both the flesh and the blood of that Jesus who was made flesh.' In support of this, instead of quoting Jn. 6:54, along with the Synoptic words of Institution, Justin quotes the interpolated Lk. 22:19; (b) Tryph. 105, 'only-begotten' (see § 101 3 (a)); (c) Tryph. 48, the belief in Christ's pre-existence is based on what is short before 'but the only-begotten'; (2) the part omitted by Eusebius contains words common in Irenæus, but not in Justin, and (3) has two allusions to Paul's Epistles (to which Justin never alludes); (4) elsewhere Justin never uses 'only-begotten' apart from prophecy that justifies it. On the other hand, Justin might quote, to a Christian, authorities that he would not quote to a Jew, to whom everything needed to be proved. (In the words omitted by Eusebius [. . . nos plasmavit . . . venit ad nos . . . firma est mea ad eum fides . . . utraque Deo nobis præbente]) the intrusion of the sing. ['mea'] would be strange, whether Justin or Irenæus were the writer; but ἡμῶ πιστις may have been misread as ἡ μου πιστις). On the whole, the words are probably not Justin's.

⁴ On this point 1 Apol. 46 is a key-passage, 'We were taught that Christ is the First-born of God, and we indicated above that he is the Word wherein every race of men participated.' The doctrine of the First-born is authoritative 'teaching,' the Logos doctrine is the 'indication' of the writer. On the rare occasions when Justin asserts (Tryph. 105) that he has 'shown' that Johannine doctrine is in the Memoirs, his 'showing,' when analysed, amounts to (Tryph. 100) 'we have inferred (νενοήκαμεν), supported by references to OT

'proclaimed by the blessed prophets and taught by him (Christ). On this Westcott (Jn. Introd. lxxiv) says that the Synoptists 'do not anywhere declare his pre-existence,' apparently inferring that Justin must have Jn. in mind, though he never quotes Jn. But the italicised words (cp 2 Apol. 8 to) simply indicate the general continuity between what Christ taught as the Logos, through the prophets, and what he taught as Jesus in the flesh. When Justin 'shows' the pre-existence of Christ from a particular passage, it is from the Memoirs, but in a most unsatisfactory manner (see last footnote). (d) Tryph. 86 says that 'the rod' in OT is a type of the Cross, and that Moses, 'by means of this, saw water that gushed from the rock'—i.e., from Christ—and (ib. 103) applies to Christ Ps. 22:14, 'poured out like water.' These words seem absolutely to demand some reference to that stream (if he knew of it) which the author of the Fourth Gospel alone records himself to have 'seen' flowing from Christ on the Cross. Yet Justin (ib. 103), instead of quoting Jn., quotes the interpolated Lk. 22:44, omitting Lk.'s mention of 'blood,'¹ so that the quotation accords with the Psalmist's 'poured out like water.' (e) Tryph. 97 follows Barnabas (66) in applying part of Ps. 22:18 to the 'casting of lots' for Christ's garments. But Justin goes farther, by quoting the whole verse, which mentions 'dividing' as well. Jn. also quotes the whole verse, but goes farther still, seeing in it two distinct and symbolical acts. It is highly improbable that, if Justin had known, as apostolic, this warrant for a twofold fulfilment of prophecy, he would have omitted to refer to it. But he neither refers to it, nor even recognises two acts.² (f) Tryph. 110 says that the Vine is God's people, planted and pruned for its good by Christ, without reference to Jn. 15:1f., where Christ describes himself as pruning the Church that the fruitful branches may bring forth more fruit. (g) 1 Apol. 63, 'The Jews are justly charged . . . by Christ himself, with knowing neither the Father nor the Son.' This ought to refer to such 'charges' as Jn. 8:19, 'Ye neither know me nor my Father.' Yet Justin quotes for it nothing but an ancient version of Mt. 11:27 Lk. 10:22 ('No one knoweth [ἐγνώ, but γινώσκει or ἐπίγιν in Mt. and Lk.] the Father, save the Son; nor the Son, save the Father, and those to whom the Son will reveal [him]), which is merely a general statement of the conditions of revelation. (h) Tryph. 40, 'The well-known lamb (πρόβατον) that was commanded to be roasted whole (ὅλον) was a type of the Cross.' Jn. alone describes the providential interposition by which 'not a bone was broken' of Christ, the Paschal lamb. Yet Justin, instead of referring to this, refers to the roasting of the two lambs on two spits, one across the other, which typified the Cross!

(5) Inconsistencies with Jn. mostly concern Justin's views of the origin of Christ, and the

103. Justin Logos-doctrine; but they also affect at variance his views of God, and of theology with Jn. generally.

Justin's view is that (2 Apol. 6) God has no 'name'; Jn.'s is that the Son came to declare the Father's 'name' and to keep them in that 'name.' The notion of a Trinity in a Unity of will, or love, is absent from Justin. Generally Justin shrinks from the phrase 'begotten of God.' According to him it is the Logos, or the Son, who 'begets' (Tryph. 138) 'the new race' or (ib. 63) the Church, his 'daughter' (cp Tryph. 138, also 135, ἡμεῖς ἐκ τῆς κοιλίας τοῦ Χριστοῦ λατομήθεντες).⁴ Elsewhere he allows himself to say that God has begotten from himself (Tryph. 61) a kind of Logos-power (λογικὴν τινα δύναμιν).⁵ Yet when he speaks of the Father as begetting the Son, he always inserts (ib.) 'by his will,'⁶ or (ib. 100) 'coming forth by the power and counsel' of God, or, speaking of the birth of Jesus (ib. 63), he uses the middle γενῆσθαι, 'cause to be begotten.' In his

² It may be replied that Justin, understanding the nature of Hebrew poetry, perceived that only one action was intended; but Tryph. 53 accepts the 'coll' and 'ass' of Mt. 21:2 though rejected by the other Evangelists. The real explanation is that Jn. represents a later and more developed tradition than that adopted by Justin.

³ RV, 'No one knoweth the Son save the Father,' but quoted as above by Justin again (Tryph. 100), and by Clem. Alex., Origen, and Tertullian.

⁵ If λογική means 'containing Logos, δύναμις λογική means 'a Power containing Logos.' What is this 'Power'? Surely 'Thought' (Ἔννοια). Hence Justin implies that the Father begot 'Thought' (Ἔννοια) as the Arché, or Beginning, and that in this Arché, or Beginning, there was Logos. But this is formal Valentinianism. If Justin had recognised Jn.'s Logos-doctrine as inspired, would it not have protected him from thus laying himself open to the charge of adopting what he himself considered heretical doctrine?

⁶ Cp Jn. 1:13, 'were begotten of God,' where Irenæus and other authorities insert 'ex voluntate Dei' and apply it not to believers but to Christ. Tertullian (De Carn. Chr. 19) accuses anxiety to emphasise the supremacy and ineffability of the Father, he speaks of one (meaning the Logos) who is (Tryph. 56) 'a different (ἕτερος, not ἄλλος) God and Lord, under the Maker of the universe'; (1 Apol. 32, and similarly 2 Apol. 13) 'The first Power, next to the Father of all.' This conveys the notion that the Logos is but one of many subordinate Powers. Also, the multiplicity of names given to the Logos (Tryph. 56 fr 100, etc.)—Son, Wisdom, Angel, Day, East, Sword, etc.—suggests Philo's (1427) 'many-named' Logos rather than that of Jn.; and when Justin quotes Dan. 7.13, to lay stress on the 'as' in 'as Son of Man', and tells us that Christ was only (Tryph. 76) φαινόμενον καὶ γενόμενον ἄνθρωπον, the word φαινόμενον seems anti-Johannine, and bordering on Docetism.

(6) Summary of the evidence about Justin.—It appears, then, that (1) when Justin seems to be alluding to Jn., he is really alluding to O.T. or Barnabas, 104. Justin: or some Christian tradition different from summary. Jn. and often earlier than Jn.; (2) when Justin teaches what is practically the doctrine of the Fourth Gospel, he supports it, not by what can easily be found in the Fourth, but by what can hardly, with any show of reason, be found in the Three; (3) as regards Logos-doctrine, his views are alien from Jn. These three distinct lines of evidence converge to the conclusion that Justin either did not know Jn., or, as is more probable, knew it but regarded it with suspicion, partly because it contradicted Lk., his favourite Gospel, partly because it was beginning to be freely used by his enemies the Valentinians. (4) It may also be fairly added that literary evidence may have weighed with him. He seldom or never quotes (as many early Christian writers do) *from apocryphal works.*¹ The title he gives to the Gospels ('Memoirs of the Apostles') shows the value he set on what seemed to him the very words of Christ noted down by the apostles. Accepting the Apocalypse as the work of (Tryph. 81) the apostle John, he may naturally have rejected the claim of the Gospel to proceed from the same author. This may account for a good many otherwise strange phenomena in Justin's writings. He could not help accepting much of the Johannine doctrine, but he expressed it, as far as possible, in non-Johannine language; and, where he could, he went back to earlier tradition for it, such as he found, for example, in the Epistle of Barnabas.

xix. TATIAN.—Tatian gives evidence (150-80 A.D.) of special value because, being a pupil of the recently deceased Justin who does not quote Jn., he wrote an Apology which apparently does quote Jn., or Johannine tradition; and, later, after he had become an Encratite heretic, he composed a Harmony of the Four Gospels, thereby accepting the Fourth as on a level with the Three. His Apology may throw light on the date, and perhaps on the reasons, of acceptance.

The alleged (Lightf. BE 90) quotations in the Apology are the following: (a) (Apol. 4) 'God is a spirit, not one that interpenetrates matter (ὁ δὲ θεὸς οὐ διήκον διὰ τῆς ὕλης).' This is simply a negation of the Stoical dictum (Clem. Alex. 105. His Apology. 699) that God is 'a spirit,' but 'one that interpenetrates all being (διήκειν διὰ πάσης τῆς οὐσίας)' (and cp Orig. Cels. 6.17); (b) (Apol. 13) 'And this, you see, is the meaning of the saying (τὸ εἰρημένον) "The darkness comprehended (καταλαβέει) not the light"; for the soul did not itself preserve (ἔσωσεν) the spirit, but was preserved (ἐσωθή) by it, and the light comprehended (κατέλαβεν) the darkness.' It is doubtful whether Jn.—who says that (1 Jn. 1.5) 'God is light and in him the Valentinians of substituting 'were begotten' for 'was begotten.'

The fact appears to be that, whereas preceding writers had laid stress on being 'born again', Jn. laid stress on the nature of this second birth, describing it as (1.13) 'from God,' (3.3) 'from above.' Many took offence at this, as suggesting that man's second birth is of the same nature as Christ's incarnation (which indeed may have been Jn.'s meaning). Therefore, in the first passage where Jn. states the doctrine (re-stated in the Epistle too often to be changed), some ventured to change it. Cp Ja. 1.18, 'By an act of will (βουλῆς) he brought us forth.' This explains the general mistranslation of (3.3) 'from above,' as though it must mean 'again.'

is no darkness'—would accept the latter half of this antithesis. Paul's saying that Christ (Phil. 3.12) 'comprehends,' or 'catches (for its good),' the human soul is very different from saying that the light 'comprehends' the darkness.¹ Also the use of εἰρημένον²—which applies to any saying, and not specially to Scripture—combines with the naturalness of such a 'saying' in Christian controversy to make it probable that Tatian is quoting a common tradition, and not Jn.; (c) (Apol. 19) 'Renounce demons and follow the only God. All things [are] by him (πάντα ὑπ' αὐτοῦ, i.e. the Father), and without him hath not been made (γένονεν) anything'; cp Jn. (1.3), 'All things were made (ἐγένετο) through him (i.e. the Logos), and without him was not made (ἐγένετο) anything.' The two sayings are quite distinct in meaning; but the verbal likeness makes it certain that Tatian must have known Jn., though he has either misinterpreted it or altered it (possibly to avoid polytheistic inferences).

(a) Traces of Jn. as a recent 'interpretation.' Though the Apology teems with subtleties (alien from Jn.) about matter and the Logos, and shows no recognition of the Johannine view of the spiritual unity of the Father and the Son, yet the above-mentioned allusions or quotations—occurring as they do in a very short treatise that contains hardly a single allusion to the Synoptists—indicate that Tatian attached considerable importance to a new method of stating the Christian case, such as he found in Johannine tradition or writing. Such passages as (Apol. 5) 'God was in the beginning; but the beginning, we have received by tradition (παρελήθαμεν), is a Logos-power (λόγου δύναμις),' indicate what may almost be called an attempt to improve on Jn.'s 'the Word was in the beginning,' so that we can hardly call them recognitions of Jn. as an authoritative gospel. And the following passage points perhaps in the same direction. Supporting his theory that evil springs from the inferior of 'two kinds of spirits,' Tatian says (Apol. 2), 'These things it is possible to understand in detail for one who does not in empty conceit reject (ἀπορροπακίζοντι) those most divine interpretations which, in course of time, having been published in writing (read διὰ γραφῆς ἐξενεγκόμεναι for δ. γ. ἀελλεγκόμεναι), have made those who give heed be called an attempt to God (θεοφιλέεις).' Now the only passage in NT that definitely and fully recognises Tatian's 'two kinds of spirits'—bidding the reader 'not believe every spirit,' giving him a test by which he may 'know the spirit of God' and discern 'the spirit of truth and the spirit of error'—is 1 Jn. 4.1-6. It seems probable, then, that Tatian is here referring to the Johannine Epistle and Gospel, which are obviously connected and are generally supposed to have been published together.

This would fit in with a good many facts. The word 'interpretations' was applied by Papias to the various 'versions' of Matthew's Logia. Mark was called Peter's 'interpreter,' so that Mk. itself might be called an 'interpretation' of apostolic tradition. There is evidence to show that the Johannine Gospel was long preached orally before being published; and Tatian's words seem to hint at a deferred publication ('in course of time having been published in writing'). If it was 'interpreted' by an Elder of Ephesus, such as John the Elder, it might be known to Tatian as an 'interpretation.' Also, the clause about 'rejecting' implies that some had rejected, or were disposed to reject, the work in question—and this with contempt. Justin may not have gone so far as this. Tatian's respect for (18) 'the admirable Justin' is quite consistent with the hypothesis that he already dissented from his former master's cautious avoidance of Jn., especially if Tatian himself did not as yet rank it with the Synoptists.

(b) The Diatessaron gives us little help beyond the assurance that, when it was composed, Tatian ranked Jn. with the Synoptists. As handed down

107. Diatesaron. in Arabic, it differs, both in text and in arrangement, from the text commented on by Ephraem; and both of these differ from the text commented on by Aphraates.³

² In NT εἰρημένον is not used to introduce Scripture, except when (Lk. 2.24 Acts 2.16 13.40) accompanied by some qualifying phrase—e.g., 'in the Law,' 'in the Prophets,' etc. When not thus qualified, it must be rendered 'said,' 'spoken,' etc. (cp Rom. 4.18 [RV], 'according to that which had been spoken'—i.e., to Abraham—not 'according to that which hath been said' in Scripture).

This indicates—what of itself is highly probable—that at a very early period the Diatessaron was revised in the interests of orthodoxy, so as to leave few traces of the author's Encratite and other heretical tendencies.¹ What may be the correct inferences from Theodore's account of Tatian's excisions and of 'the mischief of the composition,' and what ought to be inferred from Eusebius's (HE iv. 29 6) (probably) contemptuous statement about the work, are questions that do not affect Tatian's recognition of Jn. All agree that before the end of his life—i.e., about 170-180 A.D.—he recognised the Four Gospels as being of special authority, although his notions of authority may not have prevented him from handling them with considerable freedom.

As regards the date of recognition, Tatian's Diatessaron adds

B.—HISTORICAL AND SYNTHETICAL.

What remains of the present article will be devoted to a brief statement and discussion of the principal hypotheses which have been at various times put forward as tentative solutions of the Synoptical problem. On the fourth gospel see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE.

I. TENDENCY IN THE SYNOPTISTS.

The question of tendency deserves the first place, for the more tendency can be seen to have been at work in the composition of the Synoptic gospels, the less room is left for the action of merely literary influences and the like. Now, tendencies of one kind or another in the Synoptists are conceded even by the most conservative scholars. Thus they find that Mt. wrote for Jewish Christians, or for Jews,² to prove to them from the OT the Messiahship of Jesus; this appears from Mt.'s numerous OT quotations, often even prefaced with the words, 'that it might be fulfilled which was spoken' (ὅτι πληρωθῆν τὸ ῥηθὲν: 1 22 etc.). Jerusalem is spoken of as simply 'the holy city' (4 5 27 53). Much space is given to the polemic against the Pharisees and Scribes. The contrast to Mt. presented by Lk. is striking. Here many speeches, which according to Mt. were directed against the Pharisees, are addressed to the nation in general (Lk. 11 15 f. 29 63 39 as against Mt. 12 24 38 15 12-14 7 15-20). In Lk. 3 7 (contrast with Mt. 3 7) we have the (surely impossible) story that the Baptist addressed the masses who desired to receive his baptism as a generation of vipers (§ 127 a, a). The fact, too, that Lk. 3 34-38 carries the genealogy of Jesus back to Adam points to the conclusion that, in writing, he has Gentile Christians, or Gentiles, in his mind.

The same inference can be made for Mk., who is at pains to explain Jewish words or customs (7 3 f. 11 34 3 17 5 41 15 42) and by frequently using Latin words (5 9 6 27 7 4 15 30) and forms of expression (3 6 5 23 14 65 15 15) and even explaining Greek by Latin phrases (12 42 15 16) shows that he was addressing readers who spoke Latin. Again, from the relatively small number of discourses of Jesus reported by Mk. we may perhaps conclude that he attaches less importance to the teaching than to the person of Jesus. It is the person that he desires to glorify.

Further, each evangelist in his own way is influenced by, and seeks by his narrative to serve, the apologetic interest. To meet particular objections, such as those preserved by Celsus (cp Mt. 28 15 b), we find, for example, an assertion so questionable as that of Mt. 27 62-66 (the watching and sealing of the tomb, of which the other evangelists know nothing), or that of the bribing of the watchers (Mt. 28 11-15—a charge which, if actually made and believed, would certainly have involved their death; cp Acts 12 19). Once more, little to our knowledge, for by the time of its composition (about 180 A.D.), Irenæus regarded 'four gospels' as no less essentially four than the 'four zones of the earth,' so that in Gaul the Fourth Gospel must have been recognised much earlier. But the importance of Tatian's testimony, following on Justin's, is that the two appear to fix the turning-point in sceptical criticism—the teacher favouring Lk. but rejecting Jn., whilst his pupil at first apparently took up Jn. as a 'divine interpretation' specially adapted for a philosophic appeal to the Greeks, and before long placed it in a Harmony of the Four Gospels.

Once more,

² In particular (see § 130 a), for Greek-speaking Jews. It ought to be added, however, that Gentile Christians also were interested, or at least capable of being interested, in the evidences of Christianity derived from the OT prophecies.

From this date investigation is rendered needless by the practically unanimous acceptance of the canonical Gospels. E. A. A.

tendency appears also in another direction, the political—in the desire to make the Roman authority as little responsible as possible for the death of Jesus (Mk. 15 1-14 Mt. 27 1-23 and very specially Mt. 27 24; most strongly of all in Lk. 23 1-23, where Pilate even invokes the judgment of Herod, vv. 6-16—certainly an unhistorical touch of which there is no hint in Mk. or Mt. (cp § 43; ACTS, § 5, 1).

The very widely accepted view, that Lk. is of a specifically Pauline character, can be maintained only in a very limited sense.

109. Pauline character of Lk. (a) The mission to the Gentiles is brought into very distinct prominence by the evangelist (2 31 f.), not only in his own narrative but also in reporting the words of Jesus.

By Jesus, partly in express utterances (2 47), partly in the choosing and sending forth of the seventy (10 1), whose number corresponds to that of the heathen nations enumerated in Gen. 10, partly in his interest in the Samaritans, who were not regarded by the Jews as compatriots and who in the Third Gospel are, to all appearance, the representatives of the Gentiles. The word 'stranger' (RVmg. 'alien'; ἀλλογενής), used to designate the cleansed Samaritan leper (Lk. 17 18), is the terminus technicus used for all Gentiles in the well-known inscription marking the limits in the temple precincts which non-Jews were prohibited from passing, under penalty of death.¹ Lk. has no parallels to Mt. 7 6 (pearls before swine), 10 5 f. ('Go not into any way of the Gentiles'), 10 23 15 24 ('not sent but unto . . . house of Israel'). In Lk. 6 32 ('even sinners love those that love them') the persons spoken of with depreciation are not, as in || Mt. 5 46 f., publicans and heathens, but sinners. In Lk. 5 1-11 (call of Peter) the mission to the Gentiles is hardly mistakable (§ 32, last footnote): the other boat which is summoned (5 7) to aid Peter in landing the multitude of fish, is that of Paul and his companions, whilst James and John (according to 5 10) figure as the comrades of Peter, and the astonishment and apprehension they share with him (5 8 f.), signify that until now they had not grasped the divine command of an extended mission. That they nevertheless took part in the mission to the Gentiles at the divine command (5 5, 'at thy word'; cp 2 47 'repentance . . . in his name unto all the nations') is in entire agreement with the representation in Acts 10 (see ACTS, § 4).

(b) The reverse side is seen in the rejection of the Jewish nation, in great measure, or indeed, if the words be taken literally, altogether.

Cp 13 23-30 ('few saved? . . . Strive to enter . . . last . . . first and first . . . last'), 13 6-9 ('cut it down'), where the Jewish nation is intended by the fig-tree (see § 43), 4 16-30 (Nazareth synagogue).² The rejection of Jesus in his native city means that he met with no recognition in his native land, the word 'native place' (πατρίς) being ambiguous. The mention of mighty works wrought in Capernaum (4 23), where, according to Lk., Jesus had not yet been (he reaches it for the first time in 4 31), makes it evident that the narrative has purposely been given the earlier place by the narrator, though not in agreement with his sources, as a sort of programme expressive of the relation of Jesus to the Jews as a whole (§§ 39, 127 a, γ).

In an entire group of parables the whole point lies in the rejection of the Jews and the call of the Gentiles to salvation.

Thus the Gentiles are indicated by the third class of those invited to the royal supper—those compelled to come in from the highways and hedges (14 15-24; cp § 112 δ). Again, Mt.'s (25

² Exceptions such as 13 16 19 9 ('daughter' or 'son' of Abraham), 1 33 ('reign over house of Jacob for ever'), 5 4 ('holpen Israel his servant'), 7 7 ('salvation unto his people'), 2 32 b ('glory of thy people Israel'), 3 8 ('redemption of Jerusalem'), which doubtless come from the author's sources, do not invalidate the above observation—all the less because they agree with what has already been observed under ACTS, § 4.

14:30) purely ethical parable of the talents receives, in Lk. 19 12 ('far country, 'receive kingdom'), 14 ('citizens hated him'), 27 ('these mine enemies, 'slay them'), additions which give it a wholly different complexion. Here, the nobleman who goes into a far country and whose people, for declining his rule, are in the end put to death, was suggested by the well-known story of Archelaus, son of Herod the Great (see HEROD, § 8); but in the intended application of the parable the nobleman is Jesus himself and the 'far' country into which he travels is the region of the Gentiles; cp the similar use of 'far' (μακρὰν) in 15 13 ('prodigal'), Acts 239 ('promise to all . . . afar off'), 22 21 ('send thee [Paul] far hence unto Gentiles'), Eph. 2 13 ('once were far off'), 17 (same). Even Lazarus, who in Lk. 16 19-26 comes into consideration only as poor and as suffering, must, in the addition in zv. 27-31, be regarded as representing the Gentiles, the rich man and his brethren being characterised in the words 'they have Moses and the prophets' as representing the Jews. Cp also § 114.

(c) Against the work-righteousness of the Mosaic law we have the saying about the unprofitable servant (17 7-10), and the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican (189-14), with regard to which, however, there is no reason to doubt that it was spoken by Jesus.

(d) In 18 14 we have a specifically Pauline expression—the designation of the Publican as 'justified' (θεδικαιωμένος); another in 8 12 'lest they believe and be saved' (ἵνα μὴ πιστεύσαντες σωθῶσιν: cp 1 Cor. 1 21 'to save them that believe'); also 188 the claim that when Christ should return he would be entitled to find faith (τήν πίστιν) on the earth; lastly the formula, 'thy faith has saved thee' (ἡ πίστις σου σέσωκέν σε): 7 50 (woman in Simon's house), 17 19 (Samaritan leper), 8 48 (woman with issue), 18 42 (blind beggar).¹ The same formula, however, occurs also in Mk. 5 34 (woman with issue), 10 52 (Bartimæus), Mt. 9 22 (woman with issue). It is therefore not specifically peculiar to Lk.; and moreover a careful survey of all the passages cited does not show that Lk. has appropriated any specific doctrine of Paul, but only that he has made his own in all their generality the gains of the great apostle's lifework—freedom from the law, and the assurance that salvation is open to all.

The same conclusion is reached by examination of another parable—which also certainly was spoken by Jesus—that of the Prodigal Son who is taken back into favour by the father without anything being said of any sacrifice on his behalf such as Paul would certainly have regarded as necessary. The woman who was a sinner (Lk. 7 47 50) is saved not by reason of her faith alone but quite as much by reason of her love—just as Abraham and Rahab are in 1 Clem. Rom. 10 7, 12 1.

Over against what has just been pointed out we must set those ideas which Lk. has in common with what is usually called the Ebionitic side of primitive Christianity.² (a) The poor are blessed because of their poverty, the rich condemned because of their riches (Lk. 6 20-25 'Blessed . . . Woe unto . . .'; 16 25 f., rich man and Lazarus; cp Jas. 1 9, let brother of low degree glory, 2 5 God . . . choose poor, 5 6 ye have killed . . . the righteous one; Clem. Hom. 15 9 'possessions are in all cases sin; loss of them in any way is a taking away of sins'; πᾶσι τὰ κτήματα ἀμαρτήματα· ἡ τοῦτων ὄψως ποτὲ στέργησις ἀμαρτιῶν ἔστιν ἀφαιρέσις). (b) Beneficence wins salvation (Lk. 11 41, give for alms . . . all things are clean [but see § 130 d]; 6 35, do good and lend; 16 9, make friends by mammon; cp Ecclus. 3 30, alms an atonement; Tob. 12 8 f., 2 Clem. Rom. 16 4, Clem. Ep. ad Jacobum, 9; beneficence the ground of salvation, ἐντροπία τῆς σωτηρίας αἰτίας). (c) God is to be stormed by earnest importunate prayer (11 8, 'because of importunity'; 18 1-8, judge and widow). Such thoughts, however, do not run through the entire texture of Lk.; they are confined to definite portions, among which the parable of the Unjust Steward, the Rich Man and Lazarus, the Importunate Friend and the Unjust Judge, may be specially mentioned (§ 40, end). Indeed, the writer does not seem to have accepted them in their full extent, for by his appendix to the Rich Man and Lazarus (16 27-31 question of sending warning) he has given the parable quite another meaning (§ 109 b); similarly in the case of the Unjust Steward by the appendix 16 10-14 (little and much, one's own and another's) (§ 128 d); and even in the last parable mentioned above, attention is directed from the Judge's unrighteousness by the addition of 18 8 b ('faith on earth?').¹

² It is necessary here to give a note of warning against the usage of the Tübingen school, which simply made Ebionitism identical with uncompromising Judaism.

In Lk. great care is taken to warn readers against expecting the coming of the kingdom as imminent

(21 9, end not immediately; 12, 'before all these things'; 24 f., until times of Gentiles fulfilled; 17 20 f., 'not with observation'; 19 11, 'parable because supposed kingdom immediately'). The 'straightway' (εὐθέως) preserved in Mt. 24 29 has disappeared in Lk. (21 25); so also (21 23 f.) the statement in Mt. 24 22 that the days preceding the end shall be shortened for the elect's sake, and (22 69) the announcement of the speedy (ἀπ' ἄρτι) appearance of the Son of Man coming on the clouds of heaven (Mt. 26 64). The idea in Lk. (21 24 f.) that the premonitory signs of the end cannot appear 'until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled' rests upon the belief of Paul that before Christ's parusia the gospel must first be preached to all nations (Rom. 11 11 25 31). See, more fully, § 153.

(a) Just as in Lk. Ebionitic and Pauline ideas are found in juxtaposition and contrast, so in Mt. are universalism and Jewish particularism (15 24, lost sheep of Israel; 19 28, twelve thrones; 10 5 f., not into way of Gentiles; 23, cities of Israel, as against 8 11 f., from east and west; 21 28-22 16, two sons; wicked husbandmen; royal marriage; 28 19, teach all nations; 24 14, preached in whole world [οἰκουμένην]; 26 13, whosoever preached in whole world, legal conservatism² and freedom from the law (5 17-20, not destroy but fulfil; 23 2 f., what they bid you do; 24 20, pray flight not on a Sabbath;—as against 5 32 198, divorce; 5 34, swear not; 39, resist not; 9 16 f., new patch, new wine; 12 7 f., Son of Man lord of Sabbath).

(b) On further investigation, it is manifest, in the case of two parables especially, that the rejection of the Jews and the call of the Gentiles to salvation was introduced only as an after-thought.

In the case of the royal supper, those first invited, after rejecting the invitation and slaying the messengers, are conquered in war and their city burnt (Mt. 22 6 f.); but in the original form of the parable their place was in the king's own city. After the military expedition the preparations for the supper remain just as they had been (22 4 8). 'The others' (οἱ ἄλλοι) too in 22 6 has a strange look coming after 22 5 ('they went their ways'). The insertion points unmistakably to the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 A.D. as a punishment for the slaying of Jesus and his apostles, and serves to indicate the whole nation of the Jews as signified by those first invited. Had this been the original intention of the parable, it would not be easy to understand why Lk. (14 16-24) should have enumerated three classes of invited persons of whom of course only the third can signify the Gentiles. But conversely it would be equally incomprehensible how Mt. could have reduced the number of the classes to two had three classes been already mentioned in the original form of the parable as in Lk. Since there the heathen are the third class, if Mt. omitted that class he was obliged to transfer the explanation to the second class, which he could do only by inserting

226*f.* The two forms of the parable are in no case independent of each other, for of the three excuses of the first invited two agree very closely in Mt. and Lk. We must therefore assume that the parable in its original form—in which we can, without any difficulty, attribute it to Jesus—distinguished only two classes of invited guests, as is now done in Mt., but that these were intended to denote, not the Jews as a whole and the Gentiles as a whole, as in Mt., but the esteemed and despised classes respectively, among the Jews themselves, as in Lk. Each of the two evangelists, therefore, has judged it necessary to bring some reference to the Gentile world into the words of Jesus which, as originally uttered, did not look beyond the Jewish nation, but each has carried out his object in a quite independent manner (§ 19, end).

With regard to the parable of the wicked husbandmen we are expressly told in Mt. 21 45, as well as in Mk. 12 12 and Lk. 20 19, that the hearers understood it as referring to the chief priests and Pharisees. Clearly, therefore, it is a later addition when Mt. (21 43) tells us that the Kingdom of God shall be given to a nation bringing forth the fruits thereof—that is, to the Gentiles. Moreover, had it been genuine, this verse would have found its appropriate place before, not after, 21 42 ('Did ye never read . . .?'). On the other hand, Mt. 20 1-16 has been left unchanged. The fact that here five classes of labourers in the vineyard are distinguished is enough to show that the reference cannot be to the Jews as a whole on the one side and to the Gentiles on the other. The distinction of two classes within the Jewish nation without any reference to the Gentiles, which has been shown above to have originally underlain the parable of the royal wedding, has been expressly preserved in the parable of the Two Brothers (Mt. 21 28-32), as also in that of the Pharisee and the Publican in Lk. (18 9-14).

(c) In two places in Mt. some critics have even detected a polemic against the apostle Paul.

(a) In 5 19, Whosoever shall break and teach shall be called the least (Paul having called himself in 1 Cor. 15 9 the least of the apostles, ελάχιστος τῶν ἀποστόλων); (β) in 13 28 (the 'enemy,' ἐχθρὸς ἀνθρώπου, who sows tares among the wheat).

'Enemy' (ἐχθρός, with or without ἀνθρώπου) is, in the Pseudo-Clementine Recognitions and Homilies, a constant designation for Simon Magus, by whom is meant Paul (see SIMON: MAGUS). Perhaps Paul himself in Gal. 4 16 ('am I become your enemy?') is already alluding to the term 'enemy' (ἐχθρός) as having been applied to him by his Judaistic opponents. At the same time, however, it must not be overlooked that the First Evangelist himself does not share this view of the 'enemy' (ἐχθρὸς ἀνθρώπου): according to him (18 35) the enemy is the devil; it is only the author of the evangelist's source, therefore, that can have been following an anti-Pauline tendency here (cp § 128 c). As for Mt. 5 18*f.* ('till heaven and earth pass . . . shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven') it is almost universally recognised that these verses interrupt the connection and it therefore remains a possibility that they were not written by the author of the gospel but placed on the margin by a later hand (see § 128 e).

(d) As regards the remaining legal and Jewish particularist passages in Mt. (see above, u, δ), on the other hand, it is not probable that they were first introduced after those of a universalistic character.

They are neither so few as to admit of being regarded merely as isolated and mutually independent interpolations, nor yet so numerous as to compel us to regard them as arising from a systematic redaction. True, it must be conceded that 10 5*f.* (not into way of Gentiles), 23 ('cities of Israel'), also 23 2 32 ('. . . Moses' seat, all . . . bid you, do), and (with special facility) 'neither on a Sabbath' (μηδὲ σαββάτω) in 24 20 admit of removal without injury to the connection; but not 15 24 ('unto lost sheep'), 26 (children's bread), or 19 28 (twelve thrones). But precisely the 'neither on a Sabbath' (μηδὲ σαββάτω) is quite certainly original if it comes from the 'little Apocalypse' (§ 124*b*). As for the substance, we can more easily refer back to Jesus those utterances in which salvation is restricted to Israel. So far as the principles of Jesus are concerned they most assuredly contain within themselves no such limitation. Purity of heart, compassionateness, the childlike spirit, can be shown by the Gentile as by the Jew. The outlook of Jesus, however, seems still to have directed itself but little towards the Gentiles. He felt himself to be primarily a child of his own people, and even as regards these the task he had in hand was a gigantic one. Mt. 15 24 (lost sheep) 26 (children's bread) as his first word to the Canaanitish woman (not as his last) is by no means incredible. He may very well have actually bidden his disciples restrict their preaching to the Jews (10 5*f.* 23) on account of the nearness of the end of the world. Mt. 19 28 (twelve thrones) also is perhaps only a somewhat modified form of one of his own utterances, even if assuredly it was not spoken by way of answer to so mercenary a question as that of 19 27 ('what shall we have?'). In the mouth of Jesus perhaps the most difficult saying to understand will be the expression of friendliness to the Pharisees in Mt. 23 2 32 (Moses' seat), to which the words of 16 12 ('heware of the doctrine of the Pharisees'), 23 4 (heavy burdens), 11 29*f.* ('my yoke is easy') are so directly contrary.

* 5 20 ('For I say . . . except your righteousness') would serve as giving the grounds (γάρ) for 5 18*f.* (one jot or one tittle) only if the Pharisees were open to the charge of denying validity to the minor precepts of the law. On the other hand, 5 20 would serve admirably as a ground for 5 17 (not to destroy but to fulfil) if by the word 'fulfil' (πληρῶσαι) Jesus wished to give to the law a fuller and more perfect meaning, far beyond the mere letter. Were 5 18*f.* actually the ground (γάρ) for 5 17, the meaning of 'fulfil' (πληρῶσαι) could only be that Jesus desired in his actions to follow the law down to its minutest details, and enjoyed the same in others also. But this disagrees not only with 5 20 but also with 5 21-48 ('Ye have heard'); Mk. 2 27*f.* ('Sabbath for man'); 7 1-23 (washing, corban); 10 1-12 (divorce), etc.—in a word, contradicts the whole attitude of Jesus towards the Mosaic law.

See, however, in general, § 129 e. At all events it is necessary to assume that the last redactor (who was friendly to the Gentiles)—in other words, the canonical Mt.—dealt much more gently with his particularistic source than Lk. did with his.

(e) In spite of the 'straightway' (εὐθέως) of 24 29 Mt. is not altogether exempt from the tendency we have already seen in Lk. to postpone the date of the parusia; cp 24 48 (my lord tarrieth), 25 5 (the bridegroom tarries), 25 19 (after a long time).

Of the three Synoptics Mk. is characterised least by definite tendencies. The traces of Paulinism which some 113. Special tendencies have found in Mk. are of the slightest. For example, 1 15 ('time is fulfilled' . . . 'believe in gospel'; Gal. in Mk. 4 4, 'fulness of time'; 3 26, 'sons through faith'), 9 39*b* (1 Cor. 12 3), 10 44 (1 Cor. 9 19) are reminiscences of Paul; but they are not Pauline ideas.

The mission to the Gentiles finds its place in 13 10 ('gospel . . . unto all nations'), 14 9 ('whosoever the gospel') ; cp also 'all the nations' (πᾶσι τοῖς ἔθνεσι) in 11 17 (house of prayer for all the nations), unless indeed this be merely a filling out of the citation from the LXX. Some aversion to Jewish particularism may be seen in the toning down of the answer of Jesus to the woman of Canaan (7 27, 'children first' inserted) as compared with the form in Mt. 15 26. Mk. also, like the others, seeks to postpone the date of the parusia. Instead of the 'straightway' (εὐθέως) of Mt. (24 29) he has (13 24) 'in those days,' and in 9 1 he does not, like Mt. (16 28), say there be some standing here that shall 'see the Son of Man coming in his Kingdom,' but only that they shall 'see the Kingdom of God come with power.'

On the whole, then, it would seem that such tendencies as have been spoken of manifest themselves only in a

114. Conclusion as to tendency. a few parts of the three gospels. A special warning must be given against seeking to find too confidently any such tendencies in the way in which the original apostles are mentioned whether as implying praise or blame.

It would be in accordance with the general character of Lk. if some aversion to the original apostles were held to underlie the censure of James and John for their proposal to call down fire from heaven upon the inhospitable Samaritan village (Lk. 9 54*f.*); and it would be in accordance with the opposite character of Mt. if it made no mention of the hardness of heart with which the original apostles are charged in Mk. 6 52 8 17*f.* But Mt. is precisely the one gospel which chronicles Peter's faint-heartedness on the water, and Mt. as well as Mk. has the speech in which Jesus addresses him as 'Satan' (Mt. 14 28-31 16 22*f.* Mk. 8 32*f.*). On the other side, it is precisely in Lk. (22 32) that we find the passage which, along with Mt. 16 18*f.*, could be inscribed in golden letters on the Church of St. Peter in Rome.

In another matter (should we be inclined to see here any 'tendency' at all)—the enhancement of the miracles of Jesus in number and character—all the evangelists have a share (§ 137).

Thus, most of the tendencies we have discussed are followed, not in the interest of a party, but in that of the church which was ever more and more approximating catholicism in character. But, further, the tendencies affect only a limited portion of the gospel material, and by far the larger part of this material does not admit of explanation by their means. In the sections referred to there are but two instances in which it has been claimed by the present writer that ideas have been clothed in narrative dress—those of Peter's draught of fishes and of the tares among the wheat; the other places in which this can be alleged are but few (§ 1.42, and CLEOPAS), and even in these cases the symbolical meaning borne by the narrative arises almost always from an originally figurative manner of speaking being mistakenly understood as literal expression of a fact, not from deliberate and conscious invention for purposes of edification.

II. ATTEMPTS TO SOLVE THE SYNOPTICAL PROBLEM BY LITERARY CRITICISM.

In considering the attempts to solve the Synoptical problem by literary criticism we begin most conveniently with what, in appearance at least, is the simplest hypothesis: that of a primitive tradition gospel handed down solely by oral tradition. By continual narrating of the gospel history, it is held, there came at last to be formed a fixed type of narrative, in Aramaic. Upon this each evangelist drew directly without any acquaintance with the written work of any other.

(a) This hypothesis is an asylum ignorantiae. It spares the critic all necessity for an answer to the question wherefore it was that one evangelist wrote in this manner and another in that—although the question presses for, and very often admits, a solution. If the Synoptical oral narrative was really so firmly fixed as to secure verbatim repetition of entire verses in three authors writing independently of one another, then the variations between the three become all the more mysterious, or else all the more manifestly due to tendency. Think only of the variations in the Lord's Prayer, in the words of institution of the Eucharist, in the accounts of the resurrection of Jesus. The coincidence appears, however, not only in the discourses of Jesus, where it would, comparatively speaking, be intelligible, but also in narrative, in quite indifferent turns of expression in which the same writers often also diverge very widely.

The doubly augmented form of the verb (ἀπεκατεστάθη) in Mt. 12.13 = Mk. 3.5 = Lk. 6.10 cannot indeed be adduced as an example, for the double augment is met with also not only in Mk. 8.25 (ἀπεκατέστη) but often elsewhere outside the NT in the case of this verb (Winer¹, § 12, 7). But compare, for example, how Mt. 27.12, in the hearing before Pilate, and Lk. 23.9 (who here has no parallel), in the hearing before Herod, uses the middle aorist—met with in Mk. 14.61 in the hearing before the Synedrium but very rarely elsewhere in the NT—'he answered nothing' (ὁδὲν ἀπεκρίνατο), though immediately afterwards (Mt. 27.14) we have the passive (ὁὐκ ἀπεκρίθη), Mk. also in the parallel passage (15.5) having this form; or the 'Lord, Lord' (κύριε κύριε) in the vocative of Lk. 6.46, retained from Mt. 7.21 (or his source), though in Lk.'s modified form of the sentence 'why call ye me' (τί δὲ με καλεῖτε) only the accusative (κύριον) would be appropriate. In one pair of parallels (Mt. 26.61 = Mk. 14.58) the words of Jesus are reported as being to the effect that he would build the (new) temple 'in the course of three days' (διὰ τριῶν ἡμερῶν); in another (Mt. 27.40 = Mk. 15.29) 'in three days' (ἐν τρισὶν ἡμέραις or τριῶν ἡμερῶν). Mk. 11.15 (cleansing the temple) coincides in the first half word for word with Lk. 19.45, in the second, almost word for word with Mt. 21.12. Further examples are given abundantly in Hawkins, Horae Synopticae, 42-52 (99), or Wilke, Der Urevangelist, 483-505 (38). How far this agreement goes, in the discourses of Jesus, can be observed, for example, in Mt. 8.9 f. = Lk. 3.9 f.; Mt. 6.24 = Lk. 16.13; Mt. 7.35-7 = Lk. 6.41 f. 11.9; Mt. 8.20 = Lk. 9.58; Mt. 9.37 = Lk. 10.2; Mt. 11.4-6 = Lk. 7.22 f.; Mt. 11.21-23a 25 f. = Lk. 10.13-15 21 f.; Mt. 12.41 f. = Lk. 11.31 f. 1 or, for instances of coincidence between the three evangelists, Mt. 23.6 7a = Mk. 12.38b 39 = Lk. 11.43 20 46; Mt. 24.19 = Mk. 13.17 = Lk. 21.23; Mt. 24.34 f. = Mk. 13.30 f. = Lk. 21.32 f. Between Mt. and Mk. this close agreement is met with elsewhere mainly in the OT quotations (e.g., Mt. 158 f. 4 = Mk. 7.6 f. 10; Mt. 19.46 = Mk. 10.6-9) and in the narrative of the Passion (e.g., Mt. 28.24-30 = Mk. 14.21 26 28); of agreement between Mk. and Lk. Mt. 24.30 32 = Lk. 4.34 f. may be taken as examples. Instances of deliberate divergence in the midst of the closest verbal agreement can be pointed out in Lk. 11.20 (cast out devils) as against Mt. 12.28, or in Lk. 11.13 (to give good gifts) as against Mt. 7.11 (§ 120 c). The artificiality and improbability which are seen to be necessarily inherent in the hypothesis under discussion as soon as one tries to apply it in detail, come very clearly to light in Arthur Wright's The Composition of the Four Gospels (90), A Synopsis of the Gospels in Greek ('96), The Gospel according to St. Luke (1900). Veit, the most recent German advocate of the hypothesis (Die Synoptischen Parallelen, '97), has even found himself driven to the assumption that Jesus communicated his teaching to his disciples catechetically, in the form of continually repeated question and answer, as was the custom with the Rabbis.

(b) To many this hypothesis commends itself as an asylum orthodoxiae. It dispenses with the necessity of assuming that original documents from which our gospels had been drawn—writings of eye-witnesses—have perished; also with the necessity of supposing that evangelists had deliberately—in other words, with tendency—altered the written text of their predecessors that lay before them. But such advantages are only apparent, not real; the variations are present, and they do not admit of explanation as due to mere accident.

(c) Nevertheless, inadequate though the unaided hypothesis be as a complete explanation of the phenomena displayed by our present gospels—and of course we have been here dealing with it in its purity and as unassisted by any other assumption—it is at the same time equally certain that it contains an essential element of truth. Unquestionably the formation of a gospel narrative was oral in its beginning. The opposite theory that a creative writer freely composed the entire material without any previous oral currency (Bruno Bauer, Volkmar) may be regarded as no longer in the field. But, further, the propagation of the gospel story by oral tradition continued to be carried on for a considerable time even after the first written documents had taken shape, and thus was capable of exerting an influence even upon gospels of a comparatively late date (§ 119b, end).

The next hypothesis to rely upon very simple means is that the evangelist who wrote second in order made

116. Borrowing use of the work of the first; and the hypothesis. third used the work of one or both of his predecessors. To grasp this hypothesis in its purity we must put aside all idea of any other written sources than the canonical, and must keep out of account as far as possible the idea of any oral sources.¹

Of the six imaginable orders, two—viz., Lk., Mt., Mk., and Lk., Mk., Mt.—have long been abandoned. A third—Mt., Lk., Mk.²—may also be regarded as no longer in the field. It relied specially on the observation that Mk. often makes use of two expressions for the same thing, for which in the parallel passages only one is found in Mt. and the other in Lk. But this phenomenon admits equally well of another possible explanation—that the diffuseness observable in Mk. (§ 4) gave Mt. and Lk. opportunity for condensation.³ (Cp Hawkins, 110-113, also 100-105; Wernle, 23 f. 151-154; Woods in Stud. Bibl. et Eccles. 2.66 f.).

Three orders still continue to be seriously argued for: Mt. Mk. Lk.; Mk. Mt. Lk.; Mk. Lk. Mt. In spite of the fact that every assertion, no matter how evident, as to the priority of one evangelist and the posteriority of another in any given passage will be found to have been turned the other way round by quite a number of scholars of repute,⁴ we nevertheless hope to gain a large measure of assent for the following propositions:—

² The hypothesis of Griesbach,—also called the combination-hypothesis, but not happily, for evidently Mk. or Lk., if either had been the third to write, could also have combined the data supplied by his two predecessors.

³ In the passage most frequently cited (Mk. 1.32) it was even necessary, after 'at even,' to add, 'when the sun did set,' for according to Mk. it was the Sabbath day and before sunset it would have been unlawful to bring any sick. Yet Lk. (4.40) could omit the first of the two clauses without loss, and Mt. (8.16), as with him the events did not occur on the Sabbath, could drop the second.

(a) A very strong argument for the priority of Mk. is the fact that, with the exception of some thirty verses, his entire material reappears both in Mt. and in Lk., or at least in one or other of them, and that too—what is even more important—in both, or at least in one, in the same order as in Mk. The absence of the thirty verses admits of a satisfactory explanation (§ 118, n.), whilst on the other hand the absence from Mk. of so much matter contained in Mt. and Lk. would be unaccountable. For details as to this, and especially also for the explanation of the marked divergencies in the order of Mt. 8-12, we refer the reader to Woods, 63-78 and Wernle, 127-130.

For one example, see § 128*g*:—Mt. 13 34*f*. (speaking in parables) comes before Mt. 13 44-52 (treasure, pearls, etc.) instead of after it.

To Mk. 6 45-8 26 there is no parallel in Lk. In § 15 above, this section of Mk. is derived from a separate tradition which he did not wish to include in his gospel.¹ Reasons for the omission in Lk. are in fact conceivable; for example, the discussion of the ceremonial law in 7 1-23 (washing, corban, etc.), it may have been thought, had little interest for Gentile Christian readers, or in the narrative of the Canaanitish woman Jesus may have seemed too Jewish; in other sections the omission is less easily explained. Others have accordingly conjectured that in the copy of Mk. which lay before Lk., 6 45-8 26 were accidentally wanting. This suggestion cannot be set aside by showing that in Lk. 11 38 (Jesus not first washed) 12 1 (beware of heaven) we have echoes of Mk. 7 2 (disciples' unwashed hands) 8 15 (beware of heaven), for Lk. may have derived these from other sources. The most important point is that at Lk. 9 18 (Whom do the multitude say that I am?), where after omission of Mk. 6 45-8 26, Lk. again begins to follow Mk., he gives an introduction which embodies distinct reminiscences of the beginning of the portion omitted, 6 45-47 (praying alone, etc.: καὶ αὐτὸν προσευχόμενον, κατὰ μόνας). If, therefore, the section of Mk. was wanting in Lk.'s copy, that copy must at least have contained Mk.'s three first verses, or the single words just cited must at least have been still legible in it. Through the immediate sequence of Peter's confession (Mk. 8 27-30=Lk. 9 18-21) on the feeding of the five thousand (Mk. 6 31-44=Lk. 9 10-17) it has also come about that Lk. transfers the scene of the confession to the locality of the feeding, that is, to Bethsaida (so according to Lk. 9 10; somewhat otherwise, Mk. 6 45), instead of placing it at Caesarea Philippi (Mk. 8 27; cp § 135).

(b) Mt. is secondary to Mk.

In Mt. 14 5 Herod wishes to put the Baptist to death, and is restrained only by fear of the people; in Mk. 6 19*f*., on the contrary, it is Herodias who wishes the death of John, whilst Herod hears him gladly. With this it agrees that in Mk. 6 26 Herod is sorry because he is bound by his oath to order the execution. But the same sorrow is ascribed to him also in Mt. 14 9. In Mk. 6 29 the Baptist is buried by his disciples; in Mk. 6 30 the disciples of Jesus return from their missionary journey and report the miracles they have wrought. The connection of the two verses is quite casual, the account of the Baptist's end being episcopal. But in Mt. 14 12 it is the disciples of John who not only bury their master but also bring their report to Jesus—the report, namely, of this burial. The report by the disciples of Jesus of their own return would, in fact, come in too late here, as they were sent out as early as 10 5 and their presence with Jesus again has been already presupposed in 12 1; but in 14 12 Mt. would not have had the least occasion to mention a report by the disciples of John to Jesus had it not been that the report of Jesus' own disciples had been mentioned in Mk. 6 30.

In Mk. 10 17*f*. the answer of Jesus to the question, 'Good Master, what shall I do that I may inherit eternal life?' is 'Why callest thou me good? None is good, save God only.' In Mt. 19 16*f*. the question runs: 'Master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?' and the first part of the answer corresponds: 'Why askest thou me concerning that which is good?' Very inappropriate, then, is the second part: 'One (masc.) there is who is the good (ὁ ἀγαθός).' Had not Mt. here had before him such a text as that of Mk. and Lk. he would certainly, following his own line of thought, have proceeded 'one (neut.) is the good (τὸ ἀγαθόν),' all the more because the immediate continuation also (vz. 17-19), the exhortation to keep the commandments, would have suited so admirably. The question of Mt. 19 3 contains the words 'for every cause' (κατὰ πάσαν αἰτίαν) merely because Mt. wishes to introduce 'fornication' (πορνεία) as an exception (vz. 9). But in this form the question would have had no 'temptation' in it, for an authority so great as Rabbi Schammai had already laid down restrictions on the freedom of divorce. On the 'were amazed' (ἐξίστασθαι) of Mt. 12 23 as coming from the 'is beside himself' (ἐξέστη) of Mk. 3 21, see § 8, middle, and Acts, § 17 i. On the first journey of Jesus into foreign parts, see § 112 a, n.; cp further § 137 a, § 140 a, b, and § 145 e, h; also Wernle, 130-178.

(c) Lk.'s secondary character in relation to Mk. is shown with extraordinary frequency, especially in the stylistic changes he makes while retaining individual words. Let a single example suffice.

According to Mk. 4 19 'the lusts of other things enter into the man and choke the word of God. This 'entering in' (εἰσπορεύμεναι) does not suit the figure for the explanation of which it is used—the figure, namely, of thorns choking the good seed. Lk. (8 14) accordingly avoids the expression 'entering in,' yet does not fail to bring in the word ('going,' πορεύμενοι), using it now, however, of men who in their walk (RV 'as they go on their way') are choked by cares and riches and lusts as if by thorns. The participle had in fact laid such hold on his memory as he read his model, that it came at once to his pen though in a new connection. Many other examples will be found in Wernle, 3-40; Krenkel, Josephus u. Lucas, 35-49 (94). One can also make use of the collections in Hawkins, 53-61, though he himself prefers to infer from them 'oral transmission.' But in order to furnish also from Lk. an instance of a materially important and clearly intended, if not quite deliberate, distortion of an expression in his source into a very different meaning, as has already been done in the case of Mt. (19 16*f*., 12 23; see above, b), and will be done in that of Mk. (3 28 f.; see below, d), we point to his procedure with the word 'Galilee' (Lk. 24 6 'when he was yet in Galilee,' as compared with Mk. 16 7 'goeth before you into Galilee' = Mt. 28 7; see § 9, beginning).

(d) While the preceding paragraphs seem to speak for the order Mk. Mt. Lk. (or Mk. Lk. Mt.) we must nevertheless go on also to say that Mk. is secondary to Mt. On Mk. 7 27*a* (children first), 13 24 ('in those days after that tribulation'), 9 1 (some not taste of death), see above, § 113.

In the parable of the wicked husbandmen Mk. mentions, on each occasion, only one messenger as having been sent, but finally, 12 5, in a quite unnecessary and even disturbing manner says that there were yet many others (in agreement with Mt. 21 35). Mt. says (12 32) that blasphemy against the son of man shall be forgiven, and only that against the Holy Spirit shall not be forgiven, and, immediately before (vz. 31), that every sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven to men, but the blasphemy against the Spirit shall not be forgiven. In place of these two sentences Mk. has only one (3 28 f.); all their sins shall be forgiven unto the sons of men, and their blasphemies; only not those against the Holy Spirit. Thus he has retained the word 'Son of Man,' but made it plural and thereby set aside the sense which seemed offensive from the point of view of a worshipper of Jesus, viz., that blasphemy against Jesus can be forgiven.¹ Cp, further, the examples in § 119.

If what has just been advanced is correct, it shows that the borrowing-hypothesis, unless with the assistance of other assumptions, is unworkable, if only for the reason that it is compelled in one and the same breath to say contrary things as to the relative priority of Mt. and Mk. Nevertheless it is impossible to doubt that the evangelists did borrow from one another; the only question is whether here it is only our present gospels, or not also other written sources, that have been made use of. For this reason we have hitherto refrained from expressing ourselves to the effect that Mt. (or Lk.) was dependent on Mk. (or vice versa), contenting ourselves with saying that the one was secondary to the other; we are thus led to consideration of the hypothesis of a written source or sources.

(e) Before passing from the borrowing-hypothesis, however, it will be well to illustrate by a definite example the various linguistic changes to which reference has been made in the preceding paragraphs (a to d). We select for this purpose the parable of the Sower and the interpretation it receives. The circumstantiality and diffuseness of Mk. appear in 41 (the thrice repeated 'sea' [θάλασσα], and the pleonasm 'by the sea, on the land'), in 42 ('he taught them . . . and said unto them in his teaching'), 45*f*. (the repeated 'and' [καί]—four times—and 'because it had not'—twice), 47 ('and it yielded no fruit'), 48 ('others are they that are sown among thorns; these are they that . . .'); an infelicitous manner of expression is in v. 15 'these are they where.' It is Lk. who has done most to smooth Mk. and turn it into idiomatic Greek.

For Mk.'s paratactic sentences Lk. substitutes participial constructions (Lk. 86-8=Mk. 46-4) or a gen. abs. (Lk. 84=Mk. 41); also he substitutes better Greek words (Lk. 88 ἀγαθόν, ἐκτονταπλασίονα instead of Mk. 48 καλόν, ἐν ἑκατόν; Lk. 812 διάβολος for σατανάς of Mk. 415; Lk. 812α δέχονται for λαμβάνουσιν of Mk. 416; Lk. 813δ ἀφίστανται for σκανδαλίζονται of Mk. 417; Lk. 814 οὐ τελεσφοροῦσιν for ἄκαρπος γίνεται of Mk. 419; Lk. 815 καρδία καλή και ἀγαθή is additional). In Lk. 814 he drops the Hebraism [cares] 'of the world' (τοῦ αἰῶνος); he uses prepositional phrases in Lk. 84 'of every city' (οἱ κατὰ πόλιν) and 'by a parable' (διὰ παραβολῆς), and in Lk. 813 inserts the relative clause 'which, when they have heard' (οἱ ὅταν . . .) immediately after the antecedent 'Those upon the rock' (οἱ δὲ ἐπὶ τὴν πέτραν) instead of at the end of its sentence as in Mk. 4 16. Lk.'s dependence upon Mk. is shown by the 'good ground' (καλὴ γῆ) of Lk. 815=Mk. 420 notwithstanding the substitution of a different adjective (ἀγαθῆ) in Lk. 88=Mk. 48 (καλή), similarly by his 'into' (εἰς)=Mk. 47 (418 'on to', ἐπὶ), and his 'are choked' (συμπνίγονται) in Lk. 814=Mk. 419 'choke' (συμπνίγουσιν) in spite of the 'amid' (ἐν μέσῳ) for Mk.'s 'into' (εἰς) and substitution of a different verb for 'choke' (ἀπνίξαι for Mk.'s συμπνίξαι) in Lk. 87=Mk. 47. In v. 12*b* Lk. reverts to the construction of Mk. (415*b*) which he had avoided in 12*a* (=Mk. 415*a*). He is not felicitous in his substitution of 'rock' (86) for 'stony ground' (Mk. 45), for on the bare rock nothing can grow at all.

Mt. (131-23) also smooths and Græcizes.

Mt. (v. 2) omits the second 'sea' (θάλασσα) of Mk. 41 and in place of the third adopts a turn of expression with 'beach' (αἰγιαλός). In v. 6 he makes use of the gen. abs., in v. 21 substitutes other connectives (δὲ for καί and for ἔτρα). The Hebraistic 'make fruit' (καρπὸν ποιεῖν; cp Gen. 111) he alters to 'give fruit' (καρπὸν δίδόναι). At the same time Mt. 1323 shows his dependence on Mk. by retaining 'make' (ποιεῖν) alongside of 'produce fruit' (καρποφορεῖν) and in 1322 (just as Lk. 814) two of Mk.'s turns of expression (εἰς of Mk. 47 and συμπνίγειν as in Mk. 47 19), or in v. 2*b* the sing. 'crowd' (ὄχλος, cp Mk. 41), although immediately before he has used his favourite form 'crowds' (ὄχλοι). That Jesus was sitting Mt. has already presupposed (v. 1), and he has therefore to repeat the expression in v. 2 from Mk. 41 after Jesus has entered the boat. In v. 19 Mt. has an infelicitous alteration to the effect that by the first sowing are intended those who do not understand the word, whereas we should think rather of those who easily allow themselves to be again robbed of it.

Though, from what has been said, Mk. appears to have lain before both Mt. and Lk. it is not possible to assign to him the priority at all points.

Mk.'s 'hearken' before 'behold' in 43 is superfluous and disturbing; in 45 Mk. (and with him Mt. 135) introduces an amplification of the description which has the effect of preparing for the explanation of the parable; it is absent in Lk. (86). The OT expression 'birds of the heaven' which all three evangelists give in the parable of the mustard seed (Mk. 432 Mt. 1332 Lk. 1319) has in the present case been preserved only by Lk. (85) as also the 'make fruit' (ποιεῖν καρπὸν) of 88.

(f) On the relation of dependence as between Mt. and Lk. see § 127. If the contention at the close of § 120 is correct, the borrowing-hypothesis when taken without regard to the limitations demanded by Simons (§ 127*b*) leads to insuperable contradictions here also as in the question of the interdependence of Mk. and Mt.

The hypothesis—especially associated with the name of Eichhorn (from 1794)—of one Aramaic gospel, in which Lessing as far back as 1778 conjecturally recognised the 'Gospel of the original Hebrews,' is in many points open to the same objections as that of an oral original, only with the difference that it explains the agreements in our gospels better, their divergences in the same proportion worse. Even the further assumption of various translations into Greek with addition of new material at each translation is far from supplying the needed explanation of the divergences, for it is not by any means the literary form alone that differs; the matter also, even the representation of the same matter, varies widely. The same thing has to be said of the hypothesis recently put forth anew by Resch (Die Logia Jesu, '98), who has even sought to restore to their presumed original Hebrew (not Aramaic) form the sayings of Jesus, along with a great number of narratives, including a history of the passion, the resurrection, and the ascension of Jesus (thus even going beyond B. Weiss, see § 126*c*, end), and moreover maintains that this original gospel was already known to Paul. The hypothesis of an original written gospel contains a kernel of truth, only in so far as it is certainly undeniable that some one writer must have gone before the others in committing to writing the gospel tradition. But the fact of his having been first did not by any means necessarily secure for him exclusive, or even preponderating, influence over those who came after him; his production may have been promptly followed by equally important writings from other pens.

A special form of the hypothesis of an original written gospel is that set forth above in §§ 314, according to which the Triple Tradition was written in very curt and often ambiguous form, somewhat after the manner of a discussion on the Mishna or of a modern telegram, and was variously expanded and supplemented by the several evangelists.

The agreement of Mt. and Lk. against Mk., if the two former were not acquainted with each other, leads to the hypothesis that each of them had before him a Mk. in one and the same form though different from that which we now possess; this was used both by Mt. and Lk. whilst the canonical Mk. diverges from it. The superior age of the form of Mk. postulated by this hypothesis would gain in probability if the canonical Mk. were found to be secondary to Mt. and Lk. (see §§ 116*d*, e, 119; for the other view see § 3, and, with reference to it, what is said in § 126*a*). Hawkins (Hor. Syn. App. B) reckons some 240 instances of agreement of Mt. and Lk. against Mk. Each individual case may be unimportant and might in other circumstances admit of the explanation that Lk. of his own proper motion chose the same alteration of the canonical text of Mk. as Mt. had; but their large number forbids such an explanation here.

As for the extent of the original Mk. now conjectured, the difficulty with which the hypothesis can be made to work is increased if with Beyschlag we suppose it to have been nearly equal to the canonical Mk.; in particular, it then becomes difficult to understand why a new book differing so little from the old should have been produced at all. If, again, the original book is held (so Holtzmann) to have been longer than the canonical Mk. it becomes possible to assign to it a considerable number of paragraphs (now preserved to us only in Mt. and Lk.) not so easily explained as derived from Mt.'s and Lk.'s other sources (§ 122). If finally we think of the original Mk. (so Weizsäcker) as shorter, then the additions of canonical Mk. that can be pointed to are merely the verses (some thirty or so) peculiar to him, together with such individual expressions as have no parallels either in Mt. or in Lk.

117. The original written Gospel.

These individual expressions are partly for the sake of more graphic description (17 bowing down, κύψας; 143 'she brake the cruse'; see also 141 23f. 1023f. 1543; and the like), partly they give greater precision by giving names (214 317 10 46 15 21 40 161) or numbers (513 637 145; cp on the whole of this head Hawkins, 93-103; Wernle, 45-47, 215f.). They do not give one the impression, however, of being interpolations of later date than the rest of the work, and they can more easily be supposed to have been dropped by the writers who came after Mk. as hardly interesting enough (Wernle, 23f., 157f.) or fitted to cause offence (so for example 64 320f.—that Jesus had no honour among his own kin and in his own house, and that they even said, 'He is beside himself,' see § 131). The entire verses, or narratives, on the other hand, which are peculiar to Mk. are much too inconsiderable to make it likely that a new book should have been judged necessary for their incorporation; here too their omission by Mt. and Lk. admits of some explanation—or it is possible to find traces of them in Mt. and Lk.¹

If the original Mk. is conceived of as having been materially shorter than the canonical Mk., the point at which this comes into consideration is when the origin of the latter rather than when that of Mt. and Lk. is being discussed, for we have no means of determining with precision the extent of the supposed original Mk. Particularly unpromising of any useful result must be any attempt (such as that made, for example, by Scholten) to construct an original Mk. that shall be devoid of miracle. If Jesus did anything that seemed to men wonderful it would naturally be reported as in the fullest sense miraculous on the very day on which it occurred. In Acts 20:7-12 the eye-witness—that he was an eye-witness is not doubted—relates that Eutychus was taken up dead, though he also knows and tells us that Paul had said the young man's life was still in him.

If Lk. was acquainted with Mt., or Mt. with Lk., the need for postulating an original Mk. which has been spoken of in the preceding section seems to disappear; and in point of fact Holtzmann when he accepted Lk.'s acquaintance with Mt.

119. Secondary character of canonical Mk.

(Jahrbb. PT., '78, 553f.; Theol. Lt.-Zg., '78, 553) seemed for a time to abandon the hypothesis of an original Mk.

(a) The hypothesis nevertheless continues to be recommended by a number of secondary traits in canonical Mk. which do not indeed, like those mentioned in § 116*d*, prove dependence of Mk. on Mt. or on Lk. but still render it inconceivable that the canonical Mk. could have been the work which served Mt. or Lk. as a source. Of course there come into consideration here those places also in which Mt. and Lk. show no agreement against Mk.

To this category belong such additions as 'made with hands' (χειροποίητος) and 'made without hands' (ἀχειροποίητος) (Mk. 1453 || Mt. 2661; not in Lk.), as also the sense-disturbing parenthesis (Mk. 912 || Mt. 1711; not in Lk.), 'And how is it written . . . set at nought?' (καὶ πῶς γέγραπται . . . ἐβουθευθή), the remark, based on Roman Law (Mk. 1012 after v. 11 =Mt. 199; Lk. omit), that the woman also can put away her husband, and (12 || Mt. 33 Lk. 34) the quotation from Malachi wrongly attributed to Isaiah. Conversely in 1462 the 'henceforth' (ἀπ' ἄρτι), which Mt. (2664) has, is omitted. 727*a* (children first); 91 (some standing by); 1324 (in those days after that tribulation, see § 113) have been recast; and in 1462 'I am' (ἐγώ εἰμι) is an elucidation of the obscure 'thou sayest' (σοῦ εἶπας) of Mt. 2664. In 421f. the sayings about the lamp and about the hidden thing which must be brought to light are, by the introduction of 'in order that' (ἵνα), adapted to the object for which they are here intended,—namely, to say that if one happens to have found out the meaning of any parable he is not to keep his discovery a secret; but this application of the two sayings is certainly not the original one (see § 134). In Mk. 316, when the statement that Jesus appointed the twelve is repeated, the designation of Simon as the first apostle is omitted, only his being surnamed Peter is mentioned. In 1042 the expression 'they which are accounted to rule' (οἱ δοκῶντες ἀρχεῖν)—instead of the simple 'rulers' (οἱ ἀρχόντες) of Mt. 2025—is a mitigating reflection of the same kind as is frequently met with also in Lk. (the closest parallel in Lk. 818, 'that which he thinketh he hath'). In Mk. 1234 the statement that 'no man after that durst ask him any question' is introduced at a quite inappropriate point (namely, immediately after the commendation of the discreet scribe); it is met with in its right place in Mt. 2246 immediately after the discomfiture of the Pharisees by the telling answers of Jesus to their 'tempting' questions. In Mk. 1125, we find 'the father who is in heaven' (ὁ πατήρ ὁ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς), the only instance in Mk. of an expression which is characteristic in Mt. Cp also 950 (§ 3).

(b) It is open to us, no doubt, to try to account for these secondary passages by assuming that after the canonical Mk. had been used by Mt. and Lk. it was altered by copyists.

The additions in Mk. 1458 ('made with[out] hands') do not, in point of fact, reappear in 1529 ('railed at him, saying'); Mk. 912*b* ('how is it written, etc.') falls into place after 913 ('Elijah is come') and perhaps was originally a marginal note on this verse by an early reader. 12 (quot. from Mal.) or even 12f. (v. 3 from Is.) have often before now been thought to have been prefixed at a later date—especially 12, since only v. 3 comes from Isaiah while v. 2 on the contrary comes from Mal. 31 and moreover coincides verbatim, in spite of original Heb. and LXX, with Mt. 1110=Lk. 727 (§ 4, n. 1). Should we be prepared to go further and agree to treat as the work of a later hand everything that could by any possibility be so explained, we should regard also the end of Mk. 125 ('and many others, beating some, and killing some,' discussed in § 116*d*), and the mention of the sisters of Jesus in 332 (against v. 31, 33), as having been introduced by an old reader (332, in anticipation of v. 35 'whosoever shall do, etc.').; so also 112 ('whereon no man ever yet sat') and even 1113 ('for it was not the season of figs'; see § 137*b, β*). 'And the gospel's' in 835 1029 may also be an addition; the words 'for my sake' make it superfluous. On the other hand, after 'prophecy' (προφήτευσαι) in Mk. 1465, the words which Mt. (2668) and Lk. (2264) agree in giving, 'who is he that smote thee,' may have dropped out (§ 3, n. 2); so perhaps also 'to know' (γινῶσθαι) after 'is given' in Mk. 411; it is found both in Mt. (1311) and in Lk. (810). Cp Hawkins, 122. 'Henceforth' (ἀπ' ἄρτι), on the other hand, can have come into Mt. 2664 from divergent oral tradition, the existence of which alongside of written sources must always be taken into account, especially when dealing with such important utterances of Jesus (§ 115*c*).

(c) On the other hand, there are many places to which this explanation (later alteration of canonical Mk.) does not admit of being applied.

727*a* ('children first'), 91 (some standing by), 1324 (in those days after that tribulation), 421f. (lamp), 1042 (accounted to rule) are much too well conceived to allow of our resolving them into marginal glosses; so also Mk. 830 ('because they said') (§ 116*d*, n.) and the weakening of the statement in 144 as compared with Mt. 268 (that 'some,' but not 'the disciples,' complained of the waste of the ointment). That the cock crowed twice at Peter's denial of Jesus is stated not only in 1430 but also in v. 68 and 72; and even if the statement must be traced to a misunderstanding (as in § 14), the misunderstanding must be imputed to the author, not to a glossator who would hardly be so very careful as to insert his note in three separate places. We should not be justified in setting down Mk. 948-50 (fire not quenched; salted with fire; salt is good) as a later addition simply because in this passage sayings are strung together without any inward connection with each other; for the same phenomenon can be observed elsewhere in the gospels (§ 133*c*).

(d) It avails little to seek to find in Codex D and the allied MSS an older text of Mk. as compared with which the present Mk. has been corrupted by transcribers.

In the first place, D but rarely presents different readings in those places where Mt. and Lk. offer a better text than canonical Mk. Moreover, when, for example, in Mk. 411 D has the 'to know' (γινῶσθαι), the absence of which was noted above, this may be due quite as well to insertion from Mt. or Lk., or even to anticipation of the 'how shall ye know?' (γινώσθε) of 413. In D there are manifold traces of a very independent mind. For this reason we cannot be perfectly confident that D's reading in 16, 'John was clothed in a camel's skin' (δέρριν καμήλου), is the original one, although the expression in canonical Mk. is difficult: 'John was clothed with camel's hair.' The 'camel's skin' may be a deliberate rectification of the text quite as well as that adopted in Mt. 34, 'he had his raiment of camel's hair.' For the same reason it would not be safe to lay stress on the fact that for Mk. 227f. D has only these words: 'But I say unto you, the Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath,' or that Mk. 935*b* (if any man would be first) is altogether absent (cp § 128 L1).

(a) From the statement of Papias given above in § 65, Schlieirmacher in 1832 first drew the inference that the apostle Matthew had made in Aramaic a collection only of the sayings of Jesus. Whether this is what Papias really meant is questionable, for undoubtedly he was acquainted with the canonical Mt. and had every occasion to express himself with regard to this book as well as with regard to Mk. If he was speaking of Mt., then he was as much in error as to its original language as he was as to its author (see § 149); this, however, is conceivable enough. That by his logia Papias intended the whole gospel of Mt., although this contains not discourses merely but narratives as well, is not by any means impossible (see § 65, u. 3). In Greek, logia, it is true, means only things said (Acts 7:38, the angel which spake; Rom. 3:2 'oracles,' etc.); but if Papias took the word as a translation of Heb. dibhrē (דִּבְרֵי)—which he may readily have done, on his assumption of a Semitic original—then for him it meant 'events' in general.¹

(b) The actual state of the case in Mt. and Lk., however, furnishes justification for the hypothesis to which scholars have been led by the words of Papias, even though perhaps only by a false interpretation of them. A great number, especially of the sayings of Jesus which are absent from Mk., are found in Mt. and Lk. in such a way that they must be assumed to have come from a common source. If these passages were found in absolute agreement in both gospels it would be possible to believe that Lk. had taken them over from Mt., or Mt. from Lk.; but in addition to close general agreement the passages exhibit quite characteristic divergences.

(c) In point of fact the controverted question as to whether it is Mt. or Lk. who has preserved them in their more original form must be answered by saying that in many cases it is the one, in many other cases the other.

Secondary in Lk., for example, are: 12:4 as against Mt. 10:28 (be not afraid of them which kill the body), 11:13 as against Mt. 7:11 (prayer for the Holy Spirit), Lk. 11:42 as against Mt. 23:23 (the generalisation 'every herb,' πάν λαχανον), or, 11:44, the misunderstanding that the Pharisees are like sepulchres because they 'appear not,' and not because, as in Mt. 23:27*f.*, they are outwardly beautiful but inwardly noisome. In Lk. 6:27-36 = Mt. 5:38-48 Lk. makes love of one's enemy the chief consideration and introduces it accordingly at the beginning in v. 27. He betrays his dependence, however, by repeating it in v. 35 because in the parallel passage, Mt. 5:44 (or in Mt.'s source), it is met with in that position. Cp further, § 127*a.* On the other hand Lk.'s representation in 13:26 (we did eat and drink) fits better with the Jewish conditions in which Jesus lived than does Mt. 7:22 (Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy?). In Lk. 20:21 the Hebraistic expression 'respect the person' (λαμβάνειν πρόσωπον: lit. 'accept the face') is retained, whilst in Mk. 12:14 = Mt. 22:16 the phrase is changed. On Lk. 8:6 (other fell on the rock) see § 116*c*, end, on 11:29, § 140*a.* In the Lord's Prayer the text of Mt. where Lk. has parallels is distinctly the more original; on the other hand, the clauses which are not found in Lk. may have been introduced afterwards (see § 18 and the maxim in § 145*c*; also LORD'S PRAYER).

A similar conclusion—the existence of a source used in common by Mt. and Lk. but different from Mk.—is indicated by the doublets, that is to say the utterances which either Mt. or Lk., or both, give, in two separate places.²

(a) In the majority of cases it can be observed that in Mt. the one doublet has a parallel in Mk. and the other in Lk. In these cases it is almost invariably found that in the parallel with Mk. not only the occasion but also the text is in agreement with Mk., and in the parallel with Lk. occasion and text are in agreement with Lk. Similarly, Lk., wherever there is a doublet, is found to agree in the one case with Mk. and in the other with Mt. If it must be conceded that in many cases the agreement of text is not very manifest, this is easily accounted for by the consideration that the evangelist (Mt. or Lk.) in writing the text the second time would naturally recall the previous occasion on which it had been given.¹ The passages, however, in which the observation made above holds good are many enough.² To account for them without the theory of two sources would, even apart from these special agreements, be extraordinarily difficult,—indeed possible only where an epigrammatic saying fits not only the place assigned to it in what is assumed to be the one and only source, but also the other situation into which the evangelist without following any source will have placed it.

² In Mk. there are only two passages that can be called doublets—0:35 ('if any man would be first') and 10:43*f.* ('who-soever would become great') on which see § 128 [7]; for 9:1 ('there be some here') and 13:10 ('gospel first preached') can hardly be so classed. For doublets cp Hawkins 64-87, Wernle 111-113 (in neither is the enumeration complete).

In some places indeed this would seem to be what we must suppose to have actually happened, as we are unable to point to two different sources. So Lk. 14:11 = 18:14 ('be who exalteth himself shall be abased'); or the quotation from Hos. 6:6 (mercy not sacrifice) in Mt. 9:13 = 12:7 (which, moreover, is not very appropriate in either case). It must be with deliberate intention that the preaching with which, according to Mk. 1:15 (the time; repent) = Mt. 4:17, Jesus began his ministry is in Mt. 3:2 already assigned to the Baptist; or the binding and loosing (§ 136) to Peter. On the other hand, the answer 'I know you not' which follows the invocation 'Lord, Lord' in Mt. 7:22*f.* (many will say) and 25:11*f.* (five virgins) is associated with a different narrative in the two cases and cannot therefore, properly, be regarded as an independent doublet; so also with the threatening with fire (§ 122 = 13:30).

But, in other cases, such a repetition of a saying, on the part of an evangelist, without authority for it in some source in each case, is all the more improbable because Lk. often, and frequently also Mt. (see, e.g., § 128 [7*f.* g.], or the omission of Mk. 8:38 = Lk. 9:26 after Mt. 16:26 on account of Mt. 10:33), avoids introducing for the second time a saying previously given, even when the parallel has it, and thus a doublet might have been expected as in the cases adduced at the beginning of this section.

Were this not so, we should expect that Lk., having before him ex hypothesi the same sources as Mt., would in every case, or nearly every case, have had a doublet wherever Mt. had one; and vice versa. As a matter of fact only three or four sayings are doublets in Mt. as well as in Lk.; on the other hand, although the derivation of a passage from the logia is not always free from doubt, we are entitled to reckon that Lk. has seven doublets peculiar to himself, and Mt. twice as many.

(b) We are led to the same inference—that two sources were employed—by those passages common to the three Gospels in which Mt. and Lk. have in common certain little insertions not to be found in Mk.; as, for example, Mt. 18:6*f.* (millstone) = Lk. 17:1*f.* as compared with Mk. 9:42, or Mt. 3:11*f.* (baptize with water) = Lk. 3:16*f.* as compared with Mk. 1:7*f.*, at the close of which passage both even have in common the words 'and with fire' (καὶ πυρὶ). Another very manifest transition from one source to another is seen in the parable of the mustard seed. This is given in the form of a narrative only in Lk. 13:18*f.*; in Mk. 4:30-32, on the other hand, in the form of a general statement. Now, Mt. 13:31*f.* has in

² E.g. Mt. 13:12 (whosoever hath) = Mk. 4:25 (with Lk. 8:18*b*); Mt. 25:20 (unto every one that hath) = Lk. 19:26, or Mt. 19:9 = Mk. 10:11; Mt. 5:32 (divorce) = Lk. 16:18, or Mt. 19:30 = Mk. 10:31; Mk. 20:16 (last, first) = Lk. 18:30, or Mt. 21:21 = Mk. 11:23; Mt. 17:20 (faith as mustard seed) = Lk. 17:6, or Mt. 21:22 = Mk. 11:24; Mt. 7:7*f.* (ask) = Lk. 11:9*f.*, or Lk. 8:17 = Mk. 4:22; Lk. 12:2 (covered up, revealed) = Mt. 10:26, or Lk. 9:26 = Mk. 8:38; Lk. 12:9 (denieth, denied) = Mt. 10:33, or Lk. 9:23 = Mk. 8:34 = Mt. 16:24; Lk. 14:27 (bear cross) = Mt. 10:38.

the one half narrative, in the other general statement.

In short, the so-called theory of two sources,—that is of the employment by Mt. and Lk. of Mk. (or original Mk.) on the one hand, and of the logia on the other—ranks among those results of gospel criticism which have met with most general acceptance.

If the original Mk. was more extensive than the canonical, possibly it contained things which, on another assumption, Mt. and Lk. might be supposed to have taken from the logia. In particular this has been asserted of the centurion of Capernaum (Mt. 8.5-13 = Lk. 7.1-10), of the detailed account of the temptation (Mt. 4.1-11 = Lk. 4.1-13), and also of the Baptist's message (Mt. 11.2-19 = Lk. 7.18-35), the logia being held to have been merely a collection of discourses. At present it is almost universally conceded that in any such collection the occasions of the discourses included must also have been stated in narrative form. This once granted, it is no longer possible to deny that, in certain circumstances, even narratives of some length may have been admitted, if only they led up to some definite utterance of Jesus. B. Weiss (§§ 125*d*, 126*c*), and, after him, Resch (§ 117), have even carried this thesis so far as to maintain that the logia formed a complete gospel with approximately as many narratives as discourses.

A definite separation of the portions derived from the logia might be expected to result from linguistic investigation. B. Weiss has in point of fact sought with great care to determine the linguistic character of the logia; but his argument is exposed to an unavoidable source of error, namely this, that the vocabulary of the logia can be held to have been definitely determined only when we have already, conjecturally, assigned certain definite passages to this source. In so far as this provisional assignment has been at fault, the resultant vocabulary will also have to be modified. Such a vocabulary can never be accepted otherwise than conditionally—for this reason, besides the reasons indicated above, that it would be necessary first to determine whether it is Mt. or Lk. that has preserved the logia most faithfully. The task, moreover, is rendered doubly difficult, by the fact that Mt. and Lk. by no means adopt their sources without modification; they alter freely and follow their own manner of speaking instead of that of their source, or allow themselves to be influenced by Mk. even in pieces borrowed from the logia; and vice versa.

It is specially interesting to notice that Titius, a disciple of B. Weiss, expressly acknowledges the unprovableness of his master's hypothesis as a whole. He calls it 'an equation with many unknown quantities.' Nevertheless he thinks he can prove it 'quite irrefragably' if it be restricted to the discourses. This has the appearance of sounder method, for greater unanimity prevails as to the extent of the discourses which belonged to the logia (Wernle, 91 187). At the same time, even when this restriction has been made, the difficulties that have been urged hold good, and all the more so since Titius at the outset assigns too large an extent to the logia and also, what is more serious, in his verbal statistics makes a number of assumptions of a kind that are quite usual but also quite unjustifiable. It was therefore an exceedingly bold step when (amongst others) B. Weiss (Das Marcus-evangelium, 1872), Wendt (Die Lehre Jesu, First Part, 1886), Resch (Die Logia Jesu, 1898) and Blair (Apostolic Gospel, 1896) printed the logia, or a source similar to them, verbatim. Hawkins (88-92) came to the conclusion that by linguistic methods no trustworthy separation of the logia-portsions could be made. See further § 126*c*.

(a) The divergences between Mt. and Lk. in the passages common to the two but not shared by Mk.

§ 120*b*) are often so great that it becomes a question whether both have been drawing from one and the same source. If it be assumed that they were, then one or other of them, or both, must have treated the source with a drastic freedom that does not accord well with the verbal fidelity to their source elsewhere shown by them (§ 115*a*). It is the Ebionitic passages, chiefly, that come into consideration here. According to § 110, Lk. derived them from some source. Now, this source must have had many matters in common with the logia; e.g., pre-eminently, the beatitudes,¹ as also Lk. 6.35*b* (lend, hoping for nothing again); 11.41 ('give for alms'); 12.33 ('sell . . . and give alms'). In § 110 it has further been shown to be probable that it was not Lk. himself who was enamoured of Ebionitic ideas. All the more must they already have found a place in the edition of the logia which he had before him.

(b) The hypothesis of a special source for Lk. must not, however, be stretched to the extent of assuming that everything Lk. has from the logia had come to him only in Ebionitic form. Much of his logia material is free from all Ebionitic tendency, yet it is not likely that the Ebionitic editor who often imported his ideas into the text so strongly would have left other passages wholly untouched. Slight traces of an Ebionitic colouring perhaps can be detected in Lk. 14.33*a* ('whosoever renounceth not all'), 21*f*. (bring in the poor) (cp 13; bid the poor), 6.36 ('merciful,' οικτιρμονες); 18.22 ('sell all,' πάντα); 19.8 (half of my goods). But that Lk. had access to, and made use of, the unrevised logia also can hardly be denied.

(c) All the more pressingly are we confronted with the question whether the Ebionitic source of Lk. contained also those passages which are peculiar to Lk. This is at once probable as regards the parables enumerated in § 110. In fact, for the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, at least in its Ebionitic shape (i.e., 16.19-26 without the appendix v. 27-31; see § 109*b*), it is possible to conjecture an original form of a purely ethical nature which characterised the Rich Man as godless and Lazarus as pious, and thus had a place (along with the beatitudes) among the logia, and may have come from the mouth of Jesus. On the other hand, such pieces as the parable of the Prodigal Son (15.11-32), of the Pharisee and the Publican (18.9-14), of the unprofitable servants (17.7-10), on account of their wholly different theological complexion, cannot possibly be attributed to the same Ebionitic source. For this reason alone, if for no other, it becomes impossible to suppose that Lk. had a special source for his account of the journey of Jesus through Samaria (9.51-18.14); this narrative, too, has some things in common with Mk., others with Mt. We are thus led to the conclusion, so far as Lk. is concerned, that he had various other sources besides Mk. (or original Mk.)—a conclusion that is, moreover, in harmony with his own preface.

(a) Short Narratives.—Going much beyond the results embodied in the foregoing section (§ 123), Schleiermacher, as early as 1817, assumed

124. Minor Sources. a series of quite short notes on detailed events which, founding (incorrectly) on Lk. 11 (see § 153, n. 2), he called 'narratives' (διηγήσεις). On the analogy of OT criticism this might be called the 'fragment-hypothesis.'² That our present gospels should have been directly compiled from such fragmentary sources, as Schleiermacher supposed, is not conceivable, when the degree in which they coincide in matter and arrangement is considered (§ 116*a*). As subsidiary sources, however, or as steps in the transition from merely oral tradition to consecutive written narrative, ¹ The two forms in which these are found admit of explanation most easily if we assume that 'in spirit' (τῷ πνεύματι; Mt. 5.3) and 'righteousness' (τῆν δικαιοσύνην; Mt. 5.6) were originally absent. The Ebionitic source—and, with it, Lk.—has in this case preserved the tenor of the words with the greater fidelity; but Mt., by his insertions, has better preserved the religious and ethical meaning in which unquestionably Jesus spoke the words—perhaps also by the addition of unambiguously moral utterances such as 5.8*f*. (pure in heart, peacemakers) which with equal certainty can be attributed to Jesus, and 5.4.7 (mourn, merciful). Both these are wanting in Lk., although they are capable of being used in an Ebionitic sense if he had chosen to take 'meek' (πραεῖς) in the sense of Ps. 37.9 11.22.29, and 'merciful' (ἐλεήμονες) in that of Lk. 11.41.

the possibility of such brief notes can by no means be disregarded (see § 129 d). Still, to show that they existed is by no means easy.

(b) The 'little Apocalypse'.—Nevertheless, the belief is continually gaining ground that into Mt. 24, into Mk. 13, and (only with greater alterations) into Lk. 21 a work often called the 'Little Apocalypse' has been introduced.

The evidence of this is found in the first instance in the want of connection.

'These things' (taúta) in Mt. 24 33 (= Mk. 13 29 = Lk. 21 31), coming as the phrase does after v. 31, must refer to the end of the world; yet originally it must have meant the premonitory signs of the approaching end, for it is said that when the beholders see all 'these things', then they are to know that the end is 'nigh'. Therefore Mt. 24 32 f. (= Mk. 13 28 f. = Lk. 21 29-31) is not in its proper place here. On the other hand, Mt. 24 34 comes appropriately enough after 24 31. Mt. 24 29 (= Mk. 13 24), speaking as it does of a 'tribulation,' does not come in well after the discourse about false Messiahs and false prophets in Mt. 24 23-28 (= Mk. 13 21-23)—the parallel to which in Lk. is actually found in another chapter (17 23 f.)—but would be appropriate after Mt. 24 15-22 (= Mk. 13 14-20 = Lk. 21 20-24), where the connection is excellent. Mt. 24 9-14 (= Mk. 13 9b-13 = Lk. 21 12-19) occurs also in Mt. 10 17-22, in a form which, as suiting Jewish circumstances better (10 17, 'in their synagogues they will scourge you'), must be regarded as the more original; it is to be regarded as out of place in chap. 24. On the other hand, 'the abomination of desolation,' Mt. 24 15 (= Mk. 13 14), comes fittingly after vv. 6-8 (= Mk. 13 7-9a = Lk. 21 9-11). As for v. 5 (= Mk. 13 6 = Lk. 21 8b), it belongs, so far as its substance at least is concerned, to the passage, vv. 23-28, which we have already seen is out of place here. Vv. 1 f. (= Mk. 13 1 f. = Lk. 21 5 f.) do not fit well with v. 15 (= Mk. 13 14) where only a desecration, not a destruction, of the temple is thought of (otherwise in Lk. 21 20—'when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed'—on which see § 153). Regarded as a unity, accordingly, the passage would consist of Mt. 24 6-8 15-22 29-31 34 = Mk. 13 7-9a 14-20 24-27 30. As a discourse of Jesus it is prefaced by v. 3b (= Mk. 13 4 = Lk. 21 7)—an introduction which anticipates v. 30—and if it will by v. 4 (= Mk. 13 5 = Lk. 21 8a), and it is brought to a close in v. 35 (= Mk. 13 31 = Lk. 21 33).

In contents, however, the passage is quite alien from Jesus' teaching as recorded elsewhere, whilst on the other hand it is closely related to other apocalypses. It will, accordingly, not be unsafe to assume that an apocalypse which originally had a separate existence has here been put into the mouth of Jesus and mixed up with utterances that actually came from him. The most appropriate occasion for a prophecy concerning an abomination about to be set up in the temple (24 15) would be the expressed intention of the emperor Caligula—which in 40 A.D. threw the whole Jewish world into the greatest excitement—to cause a statue of himself to be erected there.¹ The origin of this apocalypse will best be placed somewhere between this date and the destruction of Jerusalem, which is not yet presupposed in Mt. 24 15. Whether it was composed by a Jew or by a Christian is an unimportant question (see, however, § 145 [f]).

(c) Anonymous Gospels.—Of other minor sources that have been conjectured mention may here be made of the so-called anonymous gospel found by Scholten² in Mt. 37-10 12 43-11a 85-10 13 19-22 927-34 112-19,—in other words, in the main, the passages mentioned at the beginning of § 122,—and of the book which is held to be cited by Lk. (11 49) under the title of 'Wisdom' (σοφία, §§ 19 150).

(d) Buddhistic sources.—Seydel (Evangelium von Jesu, 1882; Buddhallegende, '84; (2), '97) has not actually attempted to draw up a gospel derived from Buddhistic material; but the parallels he has adduced from the life of Buddha are in many places very striking, at least so far as the story of the childhood of Jesus is concerned,³ and his proof that the Buddhistic sources are older than the Christian must be regarded as irrefragable.¹

(2 22-24) or yet by the other passages Nu. 8 46 18 15 Ex. 22 29.

The Synoptical Problem is so complicated that but few students, if any, will now be found who believe a solution possible by means of any one of the hypotheses described above without other aids. The need for combining several of them is felt more and more. Most frequently, we find the borrowing-hypothesis combined with the sources-hypothesis in one form or another, and, over and above, an oral tradition prior to all written sources assumed. Instead of attempted detailed accounts, we subjoin graphic representations of some combinations which are not too complicated and which bring into characteristic prominence the variety that exists among the leading hypotheses.

125. Combinations of hypotheses.

(a) Hilgenfeld combines with the borrowing-hypothesis the further assumption of a written original gospel in two successive stages, Hebrew and Greek (so also Holsten, only with omission of the first stage).

(b) The simplest form of the two-source-hypothesis was argued for by Weiss in 1838; in 1856, however, he assumed an original Mk. along with a logia.

(c) An original Mk. alongside of the logia was postulated as a source (a) in simple form by Holtzmann down to 1878. The borrowing-hypothesis in its purest state—the theory, namely, that one canonical gospel had been used in the preparation of the other—was thus superseded (§ 118).

(β) As a more complicated form we single out that of Lipsius (as described by Feine, JPT. '85, p. 1 f.). In addition to Holtzmann's scheme he assumed a borrowing from canonical Mk. by Lk., and also an Ebionitic redaction of the logia (§ 123).

(d) B. Weiss reverts almost to the hypothesis of an original gospel. He postulates for the logia (which he therefore prefers to call the 'Apostolical source'), as many narratives as discourses (§§ 122, 126 c).

(e) Simons essentially simplified the theory of two sources by postulating (what all the hypotheses hitherto enumerated had avoided doing) a borrowing by Lk. from Mt. (§ 127).

(f) Holtzmann from 1878 combined this last with the hypothesis of an original Mk. (§ 119 a).

(g) The latest form of the two-source-theory is that propounded by Wernle. Whether Mt. and Lk. severally

§ 148). Our present Mk. is different from that used by Mt. and Lk. but only by corruption of the text, not by editing.

It is the agreement between Mt. and Lk. as compared with Mk. that tries any hypothesis most severely, and it is with reference to this point that all the most important modifications in the various theories have been made. We proceed to test the leading hypotheses by its means—always on the presupposition that neither Mt. was acquainted with Lk., nor Lk. with Mt.

(a) The hypothesis of an original Mk. is in a general way very well fitted to explain the agreement in question in so far as canonical Mk. is secondary to Mt. and Lk. But if, on the other hand, our Mk. has elements of greater originality, as we have seen to be the case with many of his exact details, then one will feel inclined, in accordance with § 3, to suppose that it was a younger copy of Mk. that Mt. and Lk. had access to. In actual fact, however, sometimes the one condition holds good, sometimes the other. It is in this textual question, over and above the question already (§ 118) spoken of as to its extent, that the difficulty of the original-Mk.-hypothesis in its present form lies.

(b) If certain passages which are found in Mk. occurred also in the logia, then Mt. and Lk. may have derived their representation, in so far as it differs from Mk., from the logia, provided that the logia was unknown to Mk. That there were passages common to Mk. (an original Mk. is not required when we approach the question as we do here) and the logia is at least shown by the doublets, and is by no means excluded even where there are no doublets (see § 121 b and Wernle, 208 f.). One, however, can hardly help thinking that the great degree of verbal coincidence which nevertheless is seen between Mk. on the one hand and Mt. and Lk. on the other comes from oral tradition. Thus a very high degree of confidence in the fixity of the oral narrative type (§ 115) is required, and this marks one of the extreme limits to which such hypotheses can be carried without losing themselves in what wholly eludes investigation. But, moreover, the logia must be conceived of as a complete gospel if we are to suppose that it contained all the sections in which Mt. and Lk. are in agreement against Mk. Hawkins (pp. 172-176) reckons that out of 58 sections which almost in their whole extent are common to the three evangelists there are only 7 where Mt. and Lk. are not in agreement against Mk., and in 21 of the remaining 51 he finds agreements which are particularly marked and by no possibility admit of explanation as being due to chance.

(c) According to B. Weiss not only Mt. and Lk. but also Mk. made use of the logia; Mk., over and above, drew upon the oral communications of Peter and was again in his turn used by Mt. and Lk. This hypothesis has the advantage of accounting for the secondary passages of Mk. as due to a more faithful reproduction of the logia by Mt. and Lk., and the fresher colours of Mk. as due to the reminiscences of Peter. It still remains surprising, doubtless, that Mt. and Lk. should have omitted so many of these vivid touches if they lay before them in Mk. The supposition that they did not regard Mk. as of equal importance with the logia is not in itself inherently impossible; but it does not carry us far, for they elsewhere take a great deal from Mk. Still more remarkable is it that Mk. should have omitted so much from the logia. The suggested explanation that in writing down the reminiscences of Peter he regarded the logia as only of secondary value is, in view of the number of passages which according to Weiss he took from them, still more improbable almost than that already mentioned.

As regards the coincidences between Mt. and Lk. against Mk., a very simple explanation seems to be found for them in the hypothesis of Weiss, viz. that Mt. and Lk. drew upon the logia with greater fidelity than Mk. did. This, however, can of course be claimed by Weiss only for those sections which he actually derives from the logia. Yet for one portion of the sections in which such coincidences occur (see above, b) he finds himself compelled by his principles to regard Mk., not the logia, as the source of Mt. and Lk. In this way, of the 240 coincidences enumerated by Hawkins, some 50—no inconsiderable number—remain unaccounted for. Nor can we overlook the improbability that the logia, as conceived of by Weiss, should have contained, as he himself confesses, no account of the passion.

In so far as the various hypotheses referred to in the preceding section are found to be insufficient, in the same degree are we compelled to admit that Lk. must have been acquainted with Mt. (or vice versa).

(a) Each of the two assumptions—partly without any thorough investigation and partly under the influence of a 'tendency' criticism—long found support; but the second (§ 157, A i. c) has at present few to uphold it. The other has for the first time been taken up in a thorough-going manner with use of literary critical methods by Simons (§ 125 e).

We begin with arguments of minor weight. (a) Out of the selection of specially strong evidences in support of it given in Hawkins (174 f.) we have already (§ 119 b) pointed out that Mt. 18 11 Lk. 8 10 (as against Mk. 4 11) and Mt. 26 68 Lk. 22 64 (as against Mk. 14 65) admit of another explanation. Similarly, the 'Bethphage and Bethany' of Lk. 19 29 may be sufficiently explained by assuming that originally only the first word stood in the text (as in Mt. 21 1) or only the second (as in Mk. 11 1), and that it was a copyist who, of his own proper motion, introduced the name he found lacking. Possibly we ought to trace to the source of Mt., rather than to the canonical Mt., such material divergences as we find in Mt. 21 17 Lk. 21 37 (that Jesus spent the night outside of Jerusalem, a statement not found in Mk. 11 19); in Mt. 21 23 Lk. 20 1 (that Jesus taught in the temple, as against Mk. 11 27 'he was walking in the temple'); in Mt. 26 50 Lk. 22 48 (that Jesus spoke to the betrayer in the garden—a statement not found in Mk. 14 45); in Mt. 28 8 Lk. 24 9 (that the women reported to the disciples the angel's message, whereas according to Mk. 16 8 they said nothing to any one; on this last point, however, see § 138 e). Similarly, the representation, the impossibility of which has already been referred to in § 108 (by which the Baptist is made to address the penitent crowds flocking to his baptism as a generation of vipers) is either due to an infelicitous juxtaposition of Mt. 3 5 (where it is said that the multitudes went out to him) and Mt. 3 7 (where the words in question are addressed to the Pharisees and Sadducees); or it may be due to use of Mt.'s source. Lk. appears to be dependent at once on Mk. and on Mt. (or Mt.'s source) when, in 4 2-13, he represents the temptation in the wilderness both as happening during the forty days (as in Mk. 1 13), and also as happening after their expiry (as in Mt. 4 2-11).

(b) Greater importance belongs to the verbal agreements. In Mt. 9 17 Lk. 9 37 'spilled' (ἐκχείσθαι) is used of the wine, 'perish' (ἀπόλλυσθαι) only of the bottles; in Mk. 22 'crish'

(ἀπόλυσαι) is used of both. In Mt. 9.20 Lk. 8.44 the woman touches the hem of the garment of Jesus, in Mk. 5.27 simply the garment. In Mt. 14.1 Lk. 9.7 Herod Antipas is correctly called tetrarch, in Mk. 6.14 22.25-27 and also in Mt. 14.9 inexactly 'king' (βασιλεύς). Mt. 19.29 Lk. 18.30 have 'manyfold' (πολλαπλασίονα), Mk. 10.30 'a hundredfold' (εκατονταπλασίονα). In Mt. 26.75 Lk. 22.62 it is said of Peter 'he went out and wept bitterly' (ἐξελθὼν ἔβω ἔκλαισεν πικρῶς); in Mk. 14.72 'he began to weep' (ἐπιβαλὼν ἔκλαιεν). In Mt. 27.59 f. Lk. 23.53 it is said of Joseph of Arimathea 'he wrapped it in a linen cloth . . . and laid' (ἐνετύλιξεν αὐτὸ σινδῶν . . . καὶ ἔθηκεν), in Mk. 15.46 'he wound him in a linen cloth . . . and laid' (ἐνετύλιξεν τῆ σινδῶν καὶ κατέθηκεν; ? WH ἔθηκεν). Mt. 28.1 Lk. 23.54 have, as against Mk. 16.2, 'it began to dawn' (ἐπιφώσκειν)—though, indeed, in a different connection. In Mt. 28.3 Lk. 24.4, as against Mk. 16.5, the countenance of the angel, or the apparel of the two angels, is compared to lightning. In Mt. 14.13 Lk. 9.10 f., as against Mk. 6.32 f., we find not only 'he departed' (ἀνεχώρησεν or ὑπεχώρησεν) instead of 'they went away' (ἀπῆλθον), but also 'the multitude accompanied him' (οἱ ὄχλοι . . . ἠκολούθησαν αὐτῷ) instead of 'many outwent them' (πολλοὶ . . . προῆλθον αὐτούς).

A material divergence from Mk., but at the same time an approach to coincidence of expression, is seen in Lk. 22.70, where the answer of Jesus to the high priest is given in this form: 'Ye say that I am. The first two words are a paraphrase of the 'thou hast said' (σὺ εἶπας) of Mt. 26.64; the remainder of the sentence is a repetition of the paraphrase in Mk. (8.119 a). For another material divergence from Mk. see Lk. 11.17 = Mt. 12.25 as against Mk. 3.23 (Jesus knowing the thoughts of his enemies).

(γ) Specially important are cases in which a casual expression of Mt. is laid hold of. So, for example, in Lk. 9.34 ('while he said these things') as compared with Mt. 17.5 ('while he was yet speaking'), and as against Mk. 9.7. Similarly, Lk. (4.16-30) was able to find a justification for his erroneous statement, that Jesus had come forward in the synagogue at Nazareth at the very beginning of his public activity (cp §§ 39, 109 b), in Mt. 4.13, where it is said that Jesus before coming to Capernaum left Nazareth (in Lk. 4.31 he comes to Capernaum from Nazareth). The scribe's question as to the greatest of the commandments is described not by Mk. (12.28) but only by Mt. (22.35) as having been asked for the purpose of 'tempting' Jesus. According to Lk. 10.25 the questioner asks what he must do to inherit eternal life. Nevertheless he too is represented as having sought to 'tempt' Jesus. Lk. 16.17 would be specially convincing on the present point if here a sentence had been taken over from the latest hand of Mt. (5.18). But the original text of Lk. probably said the opposite (see § 128 e). On the other hand, we really have a sentence by the latest hand in Mt. 7.28 with which Lk. 7.1 betrays connection, for with the formula, 'When Jesus had ended all these words,' Mt. concludes his great speech-compositions not only here, but also in four other places (11.1 13.53 19.1 26.1). Moreover, Lk. also shares with Mt. the statement that the multitude heard the preceding discourse, though this is contradicted by the introduction to it in Lk. 6.20 as well as in Mt. 5.1. Mk. says in 12.18 correctly, 'There came unto him Sadducees, οἰσῦνες λέγουσιν, who [as is well known] say that there is no resurrection'; Mt. 22.23 infelicitously reproduces this as 'there came unto him Sadducees saying (λέγοντες) that, etc. Lk. 20.27 seeks to improve this: 'There came to him certain of the Sadducees, they which say (οἱ ἀντιλέγοντες) that there is no resurrection, and they asked him, saying.' The participle ought to have been in the genitive (τῶν ἀντιλέγοντων). In the nom. (οἱ ἀντιλέγοντες) we seem to have an echo of Mt.'s 'saying' (λέγοντες). Lk. rightly inserts the article missing in Mt. The reference, however, must be to the Sadducees, not to 'certain' (τινές). The formula, 'while he was saying these things' (see above, Lk. 9.34), is met with also in Lk. 11.37, where Jacobsen would derive it from Mt. 12.46 as also he would derive the statement in Lk. 12.1, 'When the myriads of the multitude were gathered together inasmuch that they trode one upon another' (which indeed does not fit well with what immediately follows: 'he began to say to his disciples') from Mt. 13.2. Jacobsen¹ considers that when he wrote these passages Lk. had reached, in taking what he has taken from Mt., exactly the neighbourhood of the two Mt. passages just cited (12.46 13.2). This, however, cannot be made evident.

(δ) On general grounds, on the other hand, the dependence of Lk. on Mt. (and, equally so, the converse) is very improbable. In each of the two evangelists much material is absent which the other has, while yet no possible reason can be assigned for the omission. Nay, more, the representations given in the two are often in violent contradiction. Even agreements in the order, in so far as not coming from Mk., almost always can be accounted for as derived from a second source—the logia. Simons has, therefore, in agreement with Holtzmann, put forward his hypothesis only in the form that Lk. regarded Mt. as a subsidiary source merely, perhaps, in fact, only knew it by frequent hearing, without giving to it any commanding importance. This is in very deed quite conceivable, if only he knew the logia, and was in a position to observe how freely Mt. had dealt with that material.

(c) Soltau sought to improve the hypothesis of Lk.'s dependence on Mt. by the assumption that it was with the penultimate form of Mt. that Lk. was acquainted. That Mt. 1 f. was still absent from Mt. when Lk. used it is an old conjecture. The pieces from the middle of the gospel which Soltau reserves for the canonical Mt. are of very opposite character (to it he reckons even the highly legalistic saying in 5.18 f. and the strongly anti-Judaistic one in 22.6 f.) and are attributed by him to very various motives. This indicates a great difficulty in his hypothesis. Nevertheless the suggestion is always worth considering that O.T. citations of the latest hand which are added to prove the Messiahship of Jesus (§ 108), and perhaps some other portions besides, did not yet lie before Lk. That there is no reason to shrink from a hypothesis of this kind, see § 129.

Let us now proceed to consider whether the possible origin from still earlier written sources of those con-
128. Sources of secutive books which were the last to precede our present gospels can be raised above the level of mere conjecture. This of course can be done, if at all, only at a few points. To show that it has not unfrequently been affirmed, even though no very thoroughgoing consequences were drawn from the affirmation, we shall begin by giving three examples well known in the literature of the subject.

(a) Johannes Weiss (on Lk. 5.17, in Meyer's Commentar) says that the exemplar of Mk. used by Lk. underwent, after it had been so made use of, another revision, which we have in our Mk., and that it had been previously made use of by Mt. before passing into the hands of Lk. Here and in the following paragraphs (a-g) let A, B, and C be necessarily different hands, and Aa, Ab, Ac, on the other hand, be such portions as may perhaps be due to one and the same hand but perhaps also proceed from different hands; similarly also with Ba, Bb, Bc, etc.; then the view of Weiss can be stated as follows. A is a written source on the healing of the paralytic without mention of the circumstance that he was let down through the roof. This source was drawn upon, on the one hand by Mt., on the other by B, who introduced the new circumstance just mentioned. B was drawn upon, on the one hand, by Lk., on the other by Mk. It is in this way that at the same time Johannes Weiss explains also how Mt. and Lk. coincide in many details as against Mk. B thus takes the position which original Mk. has in the usual nomenclature, not however—and this is the important point—being the oldest writing, but being itself in turn dependent on a source. For our own part we cannot regard this view as being sufficiently firmly based, since it has been shown in § 116 b that it is Mt. who has greatly curtailed the narrative of the death of Herod; it is therefore conceivable also that in the passage before us he should have left out the detail about the roof also, his interest being merely in the miracle itself as proving the Messiahship of Jesus, not in any special detail of it such as this (cp Hawkins 127-129; and also Wernle, 156 f. for similar passages).

(b) Woods, 86-88, assumes for the narrative of the Mission of the disciples two sources,—one (which we shall call A) relating to that of the twelve, the other (B) to that of the seventy.¹ Mk. 6.7-11 and Lk. 9.1-5 drew only from A. A and B were both drawn upon by a third document (C) which was used in Lk. 10.1-12 as the sole source, but in Mt. 10.1-16 along with A. It will create no difficulties if we recognise in A an original Mk. (according to Woods 'the Marcan tradition'), in B the logia. Whilst, however, such critics as Bernard Weiss and Holtzmann are agreed that Mt. and Lk. 10 were drawn direct from the logia (as Lk. 9 was from Mk., or original Mk.), Woods has found it necessary to interpolate an intermediate stage (C) in which both these sources were already fused. One might even feel inclined to go a step further. Lk. in 10.7 f. would certainly not have given the injunction to 'eat such things as are set before you,' first in speaking of a house, and then in speaking of a city, unless the one form had come from one source, the other from another. It happens, however, that neither of the two forms is found either in Mk. or in Lk. 9. Lk. 10, therefore, apart from the Mk. source (A), which is made use of, for example, in 10.1 (ἀνά δύο, 'two and two'), would seem to have had two other sources.

In any case Woods' observation is correct, that Mt. has fused together all the sources that can be discovered in Mk. or in Lk. Whilst passing over the rest of Lk. 10.8, Mt. introduces the 'city' into 10.11 at the place where Mk. 6 to and Lk. 9.4 speak of the 'house'; the 'bouse' he introduces into 10.12 in the parallel to Lk. 10.5 which is absent from Mk. and Lk. 9. In 10.9 Mt. has 'silver' (ἀργύριον) with Lk. 9.3 (ἀργύριον), and also 'brass' (χαλκόν) as well (with Mk. 6.8). Similarly, with Mk. and Lk. 9 he has 'twelve' in 10.1, though he had not hitherto given the number of the twelve and has to enumerate them for the first time in 10.2-4. The injunction laid on the missionaries in 10.9 to 'acquire' (κτῆσασθε) no money is to be explained from 10.8 as meaning that they are forbidden to take any reward for their teaching or healing on their journey ('freely ye have received, freely give'), whereas in 10.10 ('no scrip for the way, μη τιπραν εἰς ὁδόν) we are to interpret it as a prohibition against taking anything with them when they set out from home (as in Mk. 6.8=Lk. 9.3).

(c) Loman (Th. T., '69, pp. 577-585) traces back to one original parable those of the Tares in the Wheat in Mt. 13.24-30 and of the Seed growing secretly in Mk. 4.26-29. However different they may be apparently, he urges, and however possible it might be to show that even such words in which they agree as 'man,' 'spring up,' 'fruit,' 'blade,' 'corn,' 'harvest' (ἄνθρωπος, βλαστάν, καρπός, χόρτος, σίτος, θερισμός) belonged to two quite distinct parables, a common original form is betrayed by the word 'sleep' (καθεύδεν). Mk. would never have introduced any touch so self-evident as that of the man sleeping and rising night and day had there not lain before him something in which the sleep was spoken of. By the addition that the man awoke again daily the original meaning of the sleep is obscured.

If the two parables cannot be supposed to be of independent origin, it is at the same time only with great violence that we could derive Mk.'s from Mt. or Mt.'s from Mk. Mt.'s lacks the quality of a true original in so far as it is not an incident of ordinary life that any one should sow tares in another's field—and the other parables of Jesus are conspicuously taken from affairs of every day. Mk.'s lacks the character of an original in so far as its fundamental idea—that the kingdom of God comes to its realization without the intervention of God or of the Messiah (in other words, the precept of laissez aller, laissez faire) is quite a modern one, directly inconsistent with the conceptions of Jesus as disclosed elsewhere in the gospels.

Loman therefore supposes that Mt. 13.24-26 alone stood in a source A: after the seed had been sown, the tares grew up with it and the servants asked their master whence these came. The answer he takes from Mk. 4.28, but in the form: 'the earth brings forth the tares of itself.' With this the parable ended. That such a saying would be eminently appropriate in the mouth of Jesus he proves very aptly by Mt. 15.19 (out of the heart proceed evil thoughts).

An anti-Pauline form of the parable, however, B_a, took Paul as the sower of the false doctrine which was supposed to be denoted by the tares. It therefore introduced Mt. 13.25 saying that the enemy (on this designation for Paul see § 112c) had sown the tares, and it also, for the conclusion of the parable in A, substituted Mt. 13.28a—the master's answer that the tares were sown by the enemy. B_b then added Mt. 13.28b-30—signifying that nevertheless no attempt should be made to extirpate the false doctrine of Paulinism, that it should be left to the Final Judgment. The polemic against Paul here is thus milder than that of Paul against his Judaistic adversaries in 2 Cor. 11.13-15; Gal. 1.8f., 5.12. Canonical Mk., further, was acquainted with A and B_a. In order to avoid the anti-Pauline meaning of B_a he left out the whole figure of the enemy (ἐχθρός) and consequently also the tares. He had therefore to take the answer of the master from A, not however of course in the form that the tares sprang up of themselves, but in the form that it was the good seed that did so. This last very modern idea accordingly did not find expression here out of the independent conviction of an ancient author, but arose from the difficulty in which Mk. found himself. The sleep of the master lost its original significance when the daily waking was added. From 4.29 it is clear that Mk. had also B_b before him, for he speaks of the harvest. Canonical Mt. expressly says in the interpretation of the parable attributed to Jesus (13.39) that the enemy is the devil. Either, therefore, he no longer perceives the anti-Pauline tendency of B_a, or like Mk. he deliberately seeks to avoid it, though he takes a quite different way to do so. There remains a possibility that he may have understood the Pauline doctrine to be meant by the false teaching introduced by the devil; but it is equally possible that he was thinking of some form of heresy.

This hypothesis of Loman combines with a literary criticism which has for its object the elucidation of the mutual relations of the various texts, also a tendency-criticism which postulates an anti-Pauline tendency in B_a. Even should one be unable to adopt the latter criticism, it is not necessary on that account to reject the former; it is open to any one to suppose that the 'enemy' (ἐχθρός ἄνθρωπος) may have been at the outset some form (as already indicated) of heresy.

(d) To the three examples given above we purpose to add a few others which, so far as we are aware, have not been previously employed in this connection.

In Lk. 16.1-9 the Unjust Steward is commended. He accordingly must be intended in the commendatory clause (v. 10a) which follows—'He that is faithful in a very little is faithful also in much'—not in the words of censure (v. 10b) 'he that is unrighteous in a very little is unrighteous also in much.' And yet in 16.8 he is called 'the unrighteous steward.' In 16.11 we read further 'If ye then (οὐν) have not been faithful in the unrighteous mammon' and so forth. By the 'very little' in which one is to show fidelity we must accordingly understand Mammon. Where then are we to look for the steward's fidelity as regards Mammon? According to the parable, in this—that he gave it away. Unfaithfulness accordingly would manifest itself if one were to keep Mammon to oneself. The steward, however, did not keep Mammon to himself and yet was called 'unrighteous' (which of course is not to be distinguished from 'unfaithful'). We see accordingly that the terminology in 16.10-12 is in direct opposition to that of the parable itself. Further, the contrast in the parable is not in the least between fidelity and its opposite. What the steward is commended for is his cleverness; the opposite to this would be want of cleverness. Thus vv. 10-12 are an appendix to the parable by another hand. Taken by themselves their meaning would be simply an exhortation to fidelity in money matters. Here, however, they are brought into connection with the parable of the steward, whose relation to Mammon is represented as one of fidelity. Their fundamental idea accordingly is just as exactly Ebionitic as that of the parable itself. Thus two Ebionitic hands can be distinguished, and distinct from both is that of Lk. himself who has added yet another transformation of the meaning,—in v. 14f., where he declares the parable to have been directed against the Pharisees and their covetousness.

(e) According to § 112 b d we may take it that the final redaction of Mt. was made in a sense that was friendly to the Gentiles and thus attached no value to compliance with the precepts of the Mosaic law. Unless then Mt. 5.18f. be a marginal gloss (see § 112 c), it must have been introduced not by the last, but by the penultimate hand, and its context comes from a source of an antepenultimate hand.

5.18 itself rests upon Mt. 24.34f. or the source in which this originally stood. The close of 5.18, 'till all things be accomplished,' does not amalgamate easily with the beginning of the verse, 'Till heaven and earth pass away [one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass away].' Moreover, it is difficult to see why the law should cease to have validity the moment it is fulfilled in its entirety. But the closing sentence in 24.34 is perfectly intelligible: 'This generation shall not pass away till all these things be accomplished.' 'All these things' means here the premonitory signs of the end. 24.35 proceeds: 'Heaven and earth shall pass away; but my words shall not pass away.' Marcion has the same thought in his redaction of Lk. 10.17: 'It is easier that heaven and earth should pass away than that one tittle should fall from my words.' For this, canonical Lk. has 'than for one tittle of the law to fall.' But this can hardly have been what Lk. intended to say, for this verse stands between two verses which accentuate with the greatest possible emphasis the abolition of the law. The conjecture of Lipsius therefore is very attractive—that Lk. wrote 'than for one tittle of my law to fall' (ἢ τοῦ νόμου μου μίαν κεραίαν πεσεῖν). Here, on account of his antipathy to the idea of law, Marcion substituted (but without altering the sense) 'words' for 'law' (ἢ τῶν λόγων μου μίαν κεραίαν πεσεῖν). But a very old transcriber of Lk. took the word 'my' (μου) for a wrong repetition of the second syllable of 'law' (νόμου); he therefore omitted it and thereby changed the meaning of the sentence to its opposite. This nomistic meaning is reproduced in Mt. 5.18f.

One sees how many the intermediate steps must have been before these two verses could have received their present form. Still, as already said, 5.18f. may possibly be a marginal gloss.

(f) In Mk. 9.33-42 and parallels (Mt. 18.1-6 Lk. 9.46-50), very diverse things are brought into combination. First, the account of the disciples disputing with one another as to precedence (9.33f.), then the story of Jesus placing a little child in their midst with the exhortation to receive such in his name (9.36f.); next, the exhortation (9.38-40) not to forbid other miracle-workers; further, the promise (9.41) that even a cup of water given to a follower of Christ shall by no means lose its reward; and lastly (9.42), the threatening against those who cause any of the little ones that believe in Christ to stumble.

The dispute about precedence is answered according to Mk. (v. 35) by the saying of Jesus, 'If any man would be first, he shall be last of all, and minister of all.' This is not found in Lk. except in the place (22 26) where it occurs as a parallel to Mk. 10 43^f. Besides giving it in the same parallel to Mk. 10 43^f. (Mt. 20 26^f), Mt. has it again, only in a quite different place (23 11); and yet neither Mt. nor Lk. would have omitted it in the parallel to our present passage, Mk. 9 35, had they found it there. For indeed it is very appropriate to the matter, whilst the mention of the child by no means serves to settle the dispute, for the child is not brought forward as an example of humility but as a person to be 'received,' and not for the sake of his attributes as a child but for the sake of the 'Name of Christ.' Mt. felt this want of connection, and in order to represent the child as an example he says in v. 1 that the disciples did not discuss the question among themselves but referred it to Jesus, who answered by placing the little child in their midst. Between this act and the exhortation based upon it he inserts further his third verse, 'Except ye be converted and become as little children ye shall in no wise enter the kingdom of heaven.' This he borrows from Mk. 10 15, as is made unmistakably clear by the fact that in the parallel to this passage, viz., in Mt. 19 13-15, he omits it, so as to avoid a doublet. Mt. 18 3 is also in substance a very fitting settlement of the dispute between the disciples, and would not have been passed over by Lk. had it lain before him. The exhortation to receive such a child is in Mt. 18 5 in the same degree inappropriate to the context. Mt. therefore interpolates between the two distinct thoughts his fourth verse: 'Whosoever shall humble himself like this little child, the same shall be greatest in the kingdom of heaven.' But even this insertion does not fill the hiatus between v. 3 and v. 5.

The exhortation in Mt. 18 5 to receive the little child is immediately followed (v. 6) by the antithesis, 'But whoso shall cause one of these little ones to stumble.' This fits well enough, on the assumption that children are intended by the 'little ones.' In Mk. and Lk., however, the two thoughts are separated very unnaturally by the account of the miracle-worker 'who followeth not with us,' and in Mk., too (9 41), by the promise of a reward for the cup of cold water—a promise which Mt. (10 42) gives in a quite different connection, and there, moreover, using the expression 'these little ones,' by whom, however, he understands (differently from 18 6) grown-up persons of low estate. To this promise there is appended in Mk. 9 42 the threatening against him who shall cause one of these little ones to stumble, quite fittingly—only, however, on the assumption that by 'these little ones' we are to understand grown-up people of low estate, not children, as in Mt.

Let us now endeavour to trace, generically, the origin and growth of this remarkably complicated passage. In a source A were combined only those two parts which are common to all three gospels—to wit, the statement of the dispute among the disciples and of the placing of a child in the midst with the exhortation to receive him. But no connection between them had been as yet established. This (primitive) form is found with least alteration in Lk. 9 46-48a; in Mk. it is represented by 9 33^f. 36^f, in Mt. by 18 1^f. 5. Ba added to it the promise of reward for the cup of water to a disciple (Mk. 9 41). Bb further added the threatening against him who shall cause a little one to stumble (Mk. 9 42).¹ C interpolated the story of the miracle-worker who followed not with the disciples. Its distinctive character forbids the obvious course of assigning it to Bc. Now, in Mk., only 9 38 39 2 40 answers to the form of the story in Lk. 9 49^f. The form of the whole pericope which arose through addition of this piece (without Mk. 9 39^b), thus takes the place which in the usual nomenclature is given to original Mk. But on this occasion 'original Mk.' has had not one literary predecessor merely, but two, or, should Ba be separated from Bb, three; and these write not, it is to be noted, independently of each other; the one was continually making use of the other.

Canonical Mt. rests upon A+B (or at least Bb, but surely also Ba: see last footnote). Mt. then, as stated above, changed the introduction in v. 1, and added his own v. 3^f., so as to bring into mutual connection the dispute about precedence and the precept about receiving the child. Mt.'s v. 6, through its direct contiguity with v. 5 (instead of with 10 42 which here ought to have been repeated as parallel to Mk. 9 41), underwent a change of meaning, to the effect that children, not grown-up persons, were meant. Lk. rests on A+C. He added 9 48^b, 'he that is least among you all, the same is great.' This does not, indeed, come in appropriately after the precept about receiving a child; it would have found a place with greater fitness before this precept and after the statement of the disciples' dispute, in other words between v. 47a and v. 47b—i.e., at the very point where Mk. v. 35 introduces the same thought. Mk. rests upon A+Bb+C. He adds on the one hand his v. 30^b, which Lk. would certainly not have passed over had he known it, and on the other hand his v. 35, containing so excellent a settlement of the precedence-dispute. Neither Mt. nor Lk. was acquainted with the verse or (as already said) they would not have omitted it or introduced something like it at a later place, as in Lk. v. 48^b.

It is certainly worthy of notice that Mk., by the insertion of v. 35, has produced the only doublet which he has (§ 121 a, n. 1). The circumstance that Jesus calls the disciples to him in v. 35 whilst in v. 33^f. he has already been questioning them, points also to the conclusion that the passage is composed from various pieces.

(g) The successive contents of Mk. 4 1-34 and parallels (Mt. 13 1-35; Lk. 8 4-18) cannot possibly have been set down in any one gospel in their present order at one writing. Let us examine them. After the parable of the Sower, Jesus is alone with his disciples (Mk. 4 10 = Mt. 13 10 = Lk. 8 9); so also when he explains the parable (vv. 13-20 = Mt. 13 18-23 = Lk. 8 11-15). Nor is any hint given of his again addressing himself to the people; yet we read in Mk. 4 33^f. that he spoke openly to the people in parables (so also Mt. 13 34), and that he gave his explanations to the disciples in private. There is ground, therefore, for supposing that in one source, A, there stood an uninterrupted series of parables, viz., all those which have parallels in Mt. (Mk. 4 1-9 26-29 30-32—in an older form as regards 26-29; see above, c); also the conclusion v. 33^f. Ba, on the strength of the concluding statement that when they were alone Jesus expounded all things to his disciples, introduced Mk. 4 10 13 14-20;¹ Bb the verses 21-25 to the effect that one ought not to keep back knowledge once gained of the meaning of a parable, but ought to spread it freely. C introduced 4 11^f. These verses to the effect that the parables were intended to conceal the meaning they contained from the people are in contradiction alike to v. 33^f. and to vv. 21-25, and are, moreover, impossible in the mouth of Jesus. What pleasure could he have had in his teaching if he had to believe his God-given task to be that of hiding from the people the truths of salvation? It is, therefore, utterly futile to make out forced connection between Mk. 4 10 and Mk. 4 11^f., by interpreting to the effect that Jesus, when asked as to the meaning of the parables, in the first place, said, by way of introduction to his answer, that to the disciples it was given to apprehend the meaning, and then went on to tell them what it was. Moreover, Mk. 4 13 does not fit in with this connection. The verse is clearly a question in which Jesus expresses his astonishment at the small understanding of the disciples: 'How? you do not understand this parable; how then shall you know all the parables?' This astonishment again is out of place if Jesus in v. 11 f. has found nothing to be surprised at in the circumstance that the disciples needed to have the meaning first of all imparted to them. The question is appropriate, therefore, only as a direct reply to v. 10, and furnishes a very good occasion for Jesus to decide to give them the interpretation (cp. further, § 129 b, n.). Here also, as under (f), C takes the position which elsewhere is appropriate to original Mk., and here also there are two or three antecedent literary stages. D inserted the parable of the leaven (Mt. 1333 = Lk. 1320 f.).

¹ In Mk. 4 10 the disciples ask concerning 'the parables.' The plural carries us back to what is said in Mk. 4 2 that Jesus spoke several. The sense, therefore, can very well be that which Lk. (8 9) expresses more clearly though with reference to one parable only: they asked about the meaning of these parables. Were it the intention of Mk. to say like Mt. (13 10) that they asked about the purpose of the parables, then we must suppose that only Lk. has rightly preserved the thought of the source Ba.

Each of the three canonical gospels then rests upon A + Ba + Bb + C;¹ Mt., too, upon D. Mk. did not change the extent of vv. 10-13 (perhaps it was he who left out the γρῶναι from v. 11; cp. RV with AV), on the other hand he gave to vv. 21 f. a form which suits the application here made of the saying better than does that of Mt. and Lk. (see § 119 a). Mt. and Lk., on the other hand, in order to be able to retain from C, Mk. 411 f., deleted the surprised question of Jesus in Mk. 413 (from Ba), because it was inappropriate after this insertion.

Moreover, Mt. has also so altered the question of the disciples (who in Mk. 410 and Lk. 89 ask as to the meaning of the parable) as to make it suit the answer which was first brought in from C: 'to you it is given to understand the parables, but to the multitude it is not given.' It now runs in Mt. (1310): 'Why speakest thou to them in parables?' But such a form of the question cannot have been the original one—for this reason, if for no other, that according to it, Jesus would have had no occasion to expound the parable to the disciples. Further, Mt. has in 1312 introduced a saying which in Bb at first came after the interpretation of the first parable. We further see that he must have found difficulty in the assertion that the purpose (ἔνα, Mk. 412) of the parables was to conceal the meaning they contained. He substitutes therefore: 'For this cause do I speak to them in parables because (ὅτι) they see not and hear not.' He thus puts in the foreground the defective understanding of the multitude as a fact with which Jesus must reckon. By what follows, however (v. 14 f.), taken from Isaiah, he gives it clearly to be seen that he had before him an exemplar in which their not being understood was alleged as the purpose of the parables (see the '1cst perchance,' ἡ ποτε, in 1315). Finally perhaps it was Mt. himself who added the interpretation of the parable of the Tares (not immediately after the parable, but at the end of the whole section that is parallel to Mk. 41-34; cp. § 116 a), and also the other parables 1336-52; possibly also v. 35.

Still it is also permissible to suppose that only Mk. 41-933 f. stood in A, but this makes little change in our construction as a whole; it only becomes necessary in that case to postulate that Bc added Mk. 426-32.

On the other hand, the mutual relation of sources can become still somewhat more complicated if Loman's hypothesis regarding vv. 26-29 (see above, c) be combined with what has just been elaborated about Mk. 41-34. Yet it is possible to do this without multiplying the number of sources. We therefore refrain from introducing the hypothesis in question, all the more because it might, as being of the nature of tendency-criticism, call forth special objections.

(k) Finally, it has to be pointed out that even the doublets might be used to give probability to the composite character of the logia. In § 121 a they have been employed to show that Mt. and Lk. alike draw from two sources. For the most part these were, on the one hand Mk. (or original Mk.), and on the other the logia. Only, it happens by no means infrequently that both places in which Mt. has the same saying are generally traced to the logia. What would seem to follow for this would be that the writer of the logia himself made use of two sources. Now, we are not inclined to carry back Mt. 716=20 to two sources from which the logia drew, but prefer to regard the repetition as an express and deliberate accentuation of the statement upon which stress is here laid. But we do in all seriousness adduce Mt. 1015=1124 ('more tolerable for Sodom'), 717=1233 (the tree and its fruits), as well as the utterances of John which are also afterwards put into the mouth of Jesus (37=2333, 'ye offspring of vipers, how shall ye escape'; 310=719, 'every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire').

¹ As regards Bb—i.e., Mk. 421-25—it is possible to suppose that Lk. (818) may have omitted v. 24b because he already had it in 638, and that Mt. may have omitted all these verses because he also had them all elsewhere in one place or another (515 1026 726 33)—the last, in particular, in the very pericope with which we are now dealing (1312).

What has been said above as to sources of sources has far-reaching consequences.

(a) If it holds good even partially, then most of the hypotheses hitherto put forward as to the origin of the

129. Inferences for gospel-criticism. gospels can no longer be maintained. For, in that case, in original Mk., or the logia, or whatever be the name given to the sources immediately preceding our canonical gospels, we are no longer dealing with the earliest written compositions each produced by a writer working independently without written sources, and the canonical authors were not dependent (as used to be supposed) on these writers alone, but had at their disposal also the sources of these sources. It is no longer possible to control them in every detail, to ask what exemplar they had and why they made this, that, or the other change. On the other hand, the thesis that an ancient-seeming saying if it occurs in a writing that can be shown to be relatively young can have no claim to an early origin, must be wholly given up.

(b) The first impression one derives from the new situation thus created is, that by it the solution of the synoptical problem which appeared after so much toil to have been brought so near, seems suddenly removed again to an immeasurable distance. For science, however, it is not altogether amiss if from time to time it is compelled to dispense with the lights it had previously considered clear enough, and to accustom itself to a new investigation of its objects in the dark. Possibly it may then find that it has got rid of certain false appearances under which things had formerly been viewed. In this particular instance, it finds itself no longer under compulsion to assign a given passage to no other source than either to the logia, or to original Mk., or to some other of the few sources with which it had hitherto been accustomed to deal. The great danger of any hypothesis lies in this, that it sets up a number of quite general propositions on the basis of a limited number of observations, and then has to find these propositions justified, come what may.¹

(c) On the other hand, signs have for some considerable time not been wanting that scholars were on the way to recognition of the new situation just described. It is not only Scholten and Wittichen who have postulated a tolerably complicated genealogy for the gospels, with Proto-, Deutero-, Tritio-Mk., and the like; even those critics also who are confident in the adequacy of the usual hypotheses are often found reckoning with the possibility—or even probability—that writings like original Mk., or the logia, whether in the course of transcription, or at the hands of individual owners, may have received additions or alterations whenever any one believed himself to be acquainted with a better tradition upon any point. The possibility is taken into account, in like manner, that canonical Mk. in particular does not lie before us in the form in which it lay before those who came immediately after him; possible corruptions of the text,¹ glosses and the like, have to be considered. Another element in the reckoning is that already our oldest MSS of the gospels having latent in them many examples of transference from the text of one gospel into that of another, examples similar to those which we can quite distinctly observe in many instances when the TR is confronted with these same witnesses.

It may be that an older form of Mk., or of original Mk., or of the logia, whose differences from our present gospels are so limited in range and so little intended, can hardly, strictly speaking, deserve the name of a special source, the general contents and arrangement being so much alike; yet the effect, in its bearing on the character of the text in its details, is precisely the same as if we actually were to assume such a source. For in particular cases it is not possible for us to rely upon a text as lying before us or as capable of being more or less easily reconstructed, and so to judge of the changes that have been made by the canonical evangelists; we have to reckon with an immense range of possibilities and thus security of judgment is lost.

Lastly, scholars are also beginning to remember that the evangelists did not need to draw their material from books alone, but that from youth up they were acquainted with it from oral narration and could easily commit it to writing precisely in this form in either case—whether they had it before them in no written form, or whether they had it in different written form. In this matter again we are beginning to be on our guard against the error of supposing that in the synoptical problem we have to reckon merely with given quantities, or with such as can be easily ascertained.

(d) From the point just reached to the recognition of sources of sources differing not only in text but also in extent, order, and tendency is always, it is true, a real step. Yet the distinction is after all but a fluid one. By mere additions it is possible to give a writing a tendency, which without these does not exist in it (§§ 109 b, 110, 112). It is essentially by the introduction of additional touches that, as we have seen in § 128 a-g, the highly-complicated production, the disentanglement of which now causes so much difficulty, was produced out of a simple combination of related, or at least not mutually inconsistent, pericopes. And each intermediate stage in the process at one time had currency as a gospel writing and served as a basis for further developments. But if this consideration is taken seriously, it becomes increasingly impossible to hold—what any one occupying the standpoint of c would wish to hold in spite of every concession to the actual state of the facts—namely, that the man to whom, whether by tradition or by the voice of some scholar, the authorship of the latest recognisable form of such a pre-canonical writing is ascribed, can also be regarded as the author of the earliest of these forms. Of the man who has made such manifest changes in the few places that still allow us to follow him in the process, it will be only safe to assume that he treated other passages also in the same way, only that we no longer have the means of detecting it. In that case, however, and still more certainly where there is individual 'tendency,' his writing must be regarded as a new work in so far as in this class of literature 'newness' can be spoken of at all; it cannot be treated as merely another form of its predecessor. From this point of view we shall be able to give its full force to Lk.'s prologue, according to which many authors had already undertaken in an independent way to draw up in writing (this is the force of the expression ἀνατάξασθαι, cp § 153, u. 2) an account of the life of Jesus. But Schleiermacher's view of the 'narratives' (διηγήσεις) (§ 124 a) also in this way comes to its rights; for doubtless there must have been quite short notes also as well as narratives of a more comprehensive character (§§ 37, 64, 85), and yet these also can have had their influence on the subsequent form of individual pericopes. The reconstruction of original Mk. and of the logia, of their arrangement and even of their very words—to which so much acuteness has been devoted—loses greatly in interest as soon as these writings are regarded, not as the earliest, but only as intermediate steps. In the same measure does one gain insight into the difficulty of the problem, and the lesson of caution in dealing with it. For further reasons for the view here taken of the situation see §§ 148 f., 153.

(e) On the other hand, however, certain difficulties become easier to deal with. We can now, for example, offer an explanation of the passage in Mt. 23 2 3a, so friendly to the Pharisees, and of all the Jewish-particularistic passages in § 112 a, d, which it is impossible to ascribe to Jesus, and also even, whatever the intermediate stages may have been, of the legalistic Mt. 5 18 f. (§ 128 e); they are attributable to a Judaistic redaction which the logia underwent before they were made use of, and (according to § 112 b) altered to an opposite sense, by Mt. The character of the original logia becomes in this way more uniform and more in accordance with the free attitude of Jesus towards the law, and one can understand better how it was that this attitude of his was successfully transmitted, whereas all record of it might very easily have dropped out of sight had the first transmitter already been so Judaistically minded.

By way of appendix the question of latc so keenly discussed—viz., as to the influence which the undeniable

130. Semitic original. fact that Jesus spoke Aramaic may have had upon the formation of the gospels—may here be appropriately considered.

(a) If Papias was right in his assertion regarding Mt. (see § 65), this influence would have been very great. But our gospels were from the first written in Greek—even the genealogy in Mt. 1 1-17,¹ as well as that in Lk. 3 23-38, which contains (v. 36) the name of CAINAN (γ. v. 2), met with only in the LXX. In fact, even in what we find reason for tracing back to the logia, the quotations are, at least in a quite preponderating number of cases, taken from the LXX (cp especially 4 4 where the original in Dt. 8 3 supplies no basis for ῥήματα). It is precisely the author of canonical Mt. who oftenest gives the quotations from the Hebrew (Hawkins, 123-127), and who could not have given such quotations as, e.g., 2 15 23 8 17 27 9 f. after the LXX at all; but the allegation that his book is a translation from a Semitic original breaks down on the fact that it also nevertheless follows the LXX, and that, too, exactly in passages which would not have been available had the Hebrew original been followed.

Only the mistranslation 'virgin' (παρθένος, cp MARY [MOTHER OF JESUS]) made it possible to adduce (in Mt. 1 22 f.) Is. 7 14; only the omission of the second member to 'in the desert' (ἐν τῇ ἐρήμῳ) in the Hebrew parallelism in Is. 40 3 (Ⓞ) made it possible to bring these words, in Mt. 3 3, into relation with what precedes instead of with what follows, and thus to find in the words a prediction of one crying in the wilderness, though in Isaiah the crier is of course not in the wilderness, where no one could have heard him, but in the midst of the exiled Israelites in Babylon. In Ps. 8 3 it is only the LXX that speaks of 'praise' in the sense in which Mt. 21 16 finds it here. Further 'Hosanna' (ὡσαννά) in 21 9 with the dative is regarded as a cry of devotion—'Praise,' 'Vivat'—which is not reconcilable with the true understanding of the original passage (see HOSANNA; cp Dalman, Worte Jesu, 1 180-182).

(b) The language of Mk. Hebraizes still more strongly than does that of Mt. Nevertheless, the combinations of Allen (Expos., 1900, 1 436-443) do not prove that the evangelist wrote Aramaic, but only that he wrote a kind of Jewish Greek that he had derived from a reading of the LXX. Lk. also has Hebraisms, not only in chaps. 1 f. but elsewhere as well, and not only where he is dependent on Mk. or Mt. but also where he had no exemplar before him (as, for example, often) and it came to pass, καὶ ἐγένετο; see Hawkins, 30), and yet no one holds Lk.'s writing to be a translation of a Semitic original. Is. 40 3 (Mk. 1 3) could not possibly be cited in an Aramaic writing (see above, a).

¹ See Allen, Expos. T., 99, pp. 135-137. Against his further assertion that the genealogy was constructed by the author of the entire Gospel, see, however, MARY (MOTHER OF JESUS).

Just as little can the very small number of variants—partly Lucan in character—in D and old Latin translations, which Blass (Phil. of Gospels, '98, pp. 190-218) does not regard as traceable to transcribers, be held to show that the entire gospel of Mk. was written in Aramaic and translated into Greek in different ways, or even—as Blass formulates the hypothesis—that Luke, the companion of Paul, himself before he wrote the third gospel, revised and published a bad Greek translation of the Aramaic Mk., on which account it was that afterwards he omitted much of it from his own book, not wishing to exceed the ordinary limits of a papyrus roll. Elsewhere (see ACTS, § 17) it has been shown with what independence the text has been dealt with in D and its allied MSS. Least of all can Blass's hypothesis seek support in the contention that Lk. shows little verbal coincidence with Mk. This fact (so far as it is a fact) can of course be sufficiently explained by the linguistic character of Mk., which Lk. regarded as admitting of improvement. Whether Mk.'s linguistic imperfections are due to translation from the Aramaic is a quite separate question. Finally, there are no grounds for the conjecture of Blass that the Aramaic original document dealing with the earliest history of the church in Jerusalem, which is held to have been used by Lk. in Acts 1-12 (on this point, see ACTS, § 17 [n.], col. 56) was written by Mark, and that he will on this account have written the gospel also in Aramaic—notwithstanding that, according to Papias, he was Peter's interpreter and that he has so many Latin words (§ 108).

(c) A written source still older than the logia or Mk. (or original Mk.; see § 148, end) may have been written in Aramaic. A writing in Hebrew (§ 117) is not wholly impossible but certainly quite improbable. There seems to have been a Hebrew original in the case of the Psalms of Solomon (see APOCALYPTIC, § 83). But here the ruling pattern may have been that of the OT psalms, and perhaps also in Pompey's time Hebrew was somewhat more generally in use than it came to be 100 years afterwards. It is not very helpful to suggest that people would have been naturally inclined to treat of the sacred subjects of the gospel history in the sacred language. The masses did not understand Hebrew (see ARAMAIC, § 5), and yet gospel writings, unless they were to miss the purpose for which they were written, had to be adapted to the intelligence even of the least instructed.

(d) The gain from recourse to the theory of such an original is in the first place this, that certain Greek expressions will then admit of explanation as being errors of translation. Once made, such errors could very well pass on without change from one Greek writing to a second and to a third. But it will be at once obvious that such an explanation can have importance only in regard to particular passages, not in regard to the origin of the gospels as complete books.

Nor even for this purpose is it necessary to aim at retranslation of whole sentences, a process which will always offer room for new error; all that will be required will be that we should discover the individual words or expressions from which the error can possibly have arisen.¹ As an instance we may point to Wellhausen's $\eta\gamma$ (Lk. 11 41), which may equally as well mean 'purify' as 'give alms,' $\delta\acute{\alpha}\tau\epsilon\ \epsilon\lambda\eta\mu\sigma\acute{\iota}\nu\eta\upsilon$; the sense will then be the same as in Lk. 11 39, and in the parallel Mt. 23 25 f., and thus the character given to the passage in § 110 will be changed.

(e) Another advantage will be that the consideration of an Aramaic or Hebrew original will aid in determining as to the meaning and use of important or difficult words and ideas in the NT. A very familiar example occurs in the $\eta\eta\eta$ which Jerome found in the gospel of the Hebrews for $\epsilon\pi\iota\theta\acute{\upsilon}\sigma\iota\sigma$ in Mt. 6 11, and which is assuredly right (see Winer⁽⁸⁾, § 16, 3 b; and cp LORD'S PRAYER). But it must be said that the recent recourse had to Aramaic in this field of research has already had some very infelicitous results.

Thus Lietzmann,² Wellhausen,³ and others assert that Jesus used the word 'son of Man' only in the sense of 'man' generally (cp § 116 d, n.), but did not apply it to himself in that of 'Messiah'; in this last sense, they maintain, it was only taken by the evangelists from the Apocalyptic literature, and so came to be introduced into the gospel history.¹ But Dalman in his turn (p. 159) disputes the genuineness of the words 'not the son but only the Father' (Mk. 13 32; cp Mt. 24 36), on the ground that in the time of Jesus these expressions were not customary without additions such as 'my [son],' 'of God,' 'my [Father]'. As if the meaning they express could not possibly, nevertheless, have come from Jesus, and only the form of expression be due to the later use assumed by Dalman (cp § 139).

III. CREDIBILITY OF THE SYNOPTICS.

The investigation of the mutual relationships between the synoptic gospels has in itself a scientific interest and can therefore be carried on with interest even by the student for whom the credibility of the gospels is a matter of comparative indifference. Still, in the end the answer to this question is the goal of every research in this field. The question is often, however, still handled quite unscientifically. Thus, many still think themselves entitled to accept as historically true everything written in the gospels which cannot be shown by explicit testimony to be false. Others pay deference at least to the opinion that a narrative gains in credibility if found in all three gospels (as if in such a case all were not drawing from one source); and with very few exceptions all critics fall into the very grave error of immediately accepting a thing as true as soon as they have found themselves able to trace it to a 'source.'

Once we have freed ourselves from the dominion of such fallacies it cannot but seem unfortunate that the decision as to the credibility of the gospel narratives should be made to depend upon the determination of a problem so difficult and perhaps insoluble as the synoptical is. It would accordingly be a very important gain if we could find some means of making it in some measure at least independent of this. Such means have already been hinted at above (§§ 27, n. 1, and 34, n. 2).

The examination of the credibility must from the beginning be set about from two opposite points of view. On the one hand, we must set on one side everything which for any reason arising either from the substance or from considerations of literary criticism has to be regarded as doubtful or as wrong; on the other hand, one must make search for all such data, as from the nature of their contents cannot possibly on any account be regarded as inventions.

When a profane historian finds before him a historical document which testifies to the worship of a hero unknown to other sources, he attaches first and foremost importance to those features which cannot be deduced merely from the fact of this worship, and he does so on the simple and sufficient ground that they would not be found in this source unless the author had met with them as fixed data of tradition. The same fundamental principle may safely be applied in the case of the gospels, for they also are all of them written by worshippers of Jesus. We now have accordingly the advantage—which cannot be appreciated too highly—of being in a position to recognise something as being worthy of belief even without being able to say, or even being called on to inquire, whether it comes from original Mk., from logia, from oral tradition, or from any other quarter that may be alleged. The relative priority becomes a matter of indifference, because the absolute priority—that is, the origin in real tradition—is certain. In such points the question as to credibility becomes independent of the synoptical question. Here the clearest cases are those in which only one evangelist, or two, have data of this class, and the second, or third, or both, are found to have taken occasion to alter these in the interests of the reverence due to Jesus.

If we discover any such points—even if only a few—

they guarantee not only their own contents, but also much more. For in that case one may also hold as credible all else which agrees in character with these, and is in other respects not open to suspicion. Indeed the thoroughly disinterested historian must recognise it as his duty to investigate the grounds for this so great reverence for himself which Jesus was able to call forth; and he will then, first and foremost, find himself led to recognise as true the two great facts that Jesus had compassion for the multitude and that he preached with power, not as the scribes (Mt. 9:36 7:29). Let us, then, proceed to test in the two ways indicated some of the leading points in the synoptic gospels.

The chronological framework must be classed among the most untrustworthy elements in the gospels. Not only are the data often quite vague—a defect for which we could not blame the evangelists if they had no precise information; often also it is impossible to have any confidence, when Mt. so frequently says 'then' (τότε), 'on that day' (ἐν ἐκείνῃ τῇ ἡμέρᾳ), or the like, or when Mk. says 'straightway' (εὐθύς), that the event really followed on what immediately precedes it in the narrative. Were we to take the evangelists literally, an enormous number of events would have to be compressed within the limits of certain days (e.g., Mt. 12:15-13:52), and there would be only a very moderate number of days of the public ministry of Jesus with regard to which any events are recorded at all. Of the six time-determinations in Lk. 3:1 f.—manifestly brought together with great care—only the first three can be regarded as free from exception. Philip ruled over Trachonitis and other territories, but only over a small portion of Ituræa. The office of high priest was never filled by two persons at the same time; it is Caiaphas who ought to have been named, whilst Annas held the office from 6 to 15 A. D. On LYSANIAS see that article. The statement about the census of Quirinius in 2:1 f. is quite erroneous (see CHRONOLOGY, § 59 f., QUIRINIUS, also above, § 22, last footnote). But the data are often even in direct contradiction to each other. In Mt. 8-12 especially, matters stand in a quite different chronological connection from that which they have in Mk. and Lk. (§ 116 a). Or the mother and brethren of Jesus come, in Mk. 3:31 and Mt. 12:46, after the discourse about Beelzebub, in Lk. 8:19 after the great parable-discourse (see further § 18, begin.).

The case is no better with the order of the narratives. (a) A large number of sayings of Jesus have been placed together by Mt. in five longer discourses which on each occasion he closes with the formula referred to in § 127 (a, γ).

Among these are included, for example, a series of seven woes upon the Pharisees, 23:13-36, a series of seven parables, 13:1-52, and a series of six theses in correction of the law (5:21-48; § 34, n. 1; Hawkins, 131-135). Lk. has arranged in two similar large groups—the so-called small and large interpolations, 6:20-8:3 and 9:51-18:14—material partly the same as, and partly different from, that of Mt.

The greater interpolation—the narrative of what is known as the Samaritan journey—can make no claim to historicity. In the midst of it we find (10:1 and 17) the mission of the seventy and their return, (18:31) the warning against the plots of Herod Antipas, who ruled over Galilee only, not Samaria, (14:1) a feast in the house of a Pharisee, who can hardly have lived in Samaria, and (17:11) the statement that Jesus was on the borders of Galilee and Samaria, which yet he had already passed (9:51) in his journey to Jerusalem.

(b) But even outside of these compiled discourses the order of narration is often such as to suggest the suspicion that it has been determined by the nature of the contents. The rubbing of the ears of corn and the healing of the man with the withered hand (Mk. 2:23-36) are related the one immediately after the other, only because both occurrences showed Jesus in conflict with the law of the Sabbath. Or are we to believe that the two or three men—the whole number recorded in the gospels (Mt. 8:19-22 Lk. 9:57-62)—who asked of Jesus to be admitted to the number of his disciples, all presented themselves at one and the same moment—viz., when he was about to take ship across the Sea of Galilee, or, according to Lk., at one and the same point in the journey through Samaria? Compare, further, the wholly different order in which the events in Mt. 8-12 (§ 116 a) are given as compared with Mk. and Lk., with the result that (e.g.) the choice of the apostles comes to be placed immediately before their sending-out (10:2-4), and the series of miracles before the arrival of the messengers from the Baptist (§ 137 a).

(c) In many cases it is not so much for the sake of the order, but simply for the sake of a word, that certain sayings of Jesus are brought into contiguity with others; thus, Mk. 9:42-48 are brought together only by the idea of 'stumbling-block' (σκανδαλίζειν), vv. 48 and 49a only by that of fire, vv. 49b and 50 only by that of salt, Lk. 11:33-36 only by that of light, 13:24 f. only by that of the door. But what is said with regard to these things is in each case quite different, and he does no honour to Jesus who believes himself in duty bound to prove that the Master gave forth in one breath utterances so utterly disconnected.

(d) In other places there is manifest lack of clear appreciation of the situation. The prohibition—which certainly comes from Jesus himself and is no mere invention of the evangelists—against making known a deed of healing wrought by him, a prohibition still found in Mt. 8:4 9:30, would be utterly futile if, previously (4:23 f.) and simultaneously (9:35), Jesus had healed whole crowds of sick persons. In 12:16 the prohibition is laid even upon a great multitude of persons healed at one and the same time. But we find the same thing also in the parallel Mk. 3:12 and even in 1:34=Lk. 4:41; and here also follows the same prohibition laid upon individuals (Mk. 1:44=Lk. 5:14 Mk. 8:26).

(e) In Mk. one is very willingly disposed to recognise an appropriate arrangement of the events of the public ministry of Jesus as a whole. It is certainly the fact that his first chapter gives the impression that the public activity of Jesus may actually have begun in the manner here related. But so far as the rest of the gospel is concerned, little confidence can be placed even in Mk.'s order. In saying this, we lay no stress on the assertion of Papias (see § 65) that he set down the deeds and words of Jesus without order; for Papias may very well have been judging of that order with Mt. as his standard. Nor can we accept the view of B. Weiss, that Mk. intended by his frequent use of the imperfect to convey that he is narrating not individual deeds of Jesus but only the sort of things that he was in the habit of doing, as for example in 4:2¹. The whole sum, however, of separate events in Galilee (miracles, discourses, and the like) has so comparatively little that is characteristic, and their order—for a writer who wrote only for the glorification of Jesus and not for a laboriously exact account of his biography—was of so comparatively little importance, that it would not be safe for us to rely on them with any confidence whatever. In one point Mk. has a superiority over Mt. and Lk.; in 7:24-31 he records a journey of Jesus to Tyre and Sidon, in other words, a long distance abroad. So also the journey to Cæsarea Philippi recorded by him (8:27) in common with Mt. (16:13) signifies for him a noteworthy epoch in the public life of Jesus (§ 135). See further § 145 g.

The alleged situations in which the recorded utterances of Jesus were spoken can by no means be implicitly accepted. Was the Lord's Prayer given in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt. 6:9-13), or at the special request of the disciples (Lk. 11:1-4)? Did Jesus deliver the Sermon on the Mount to his disciples (Mt. 5:1

* As against this view of B. Weiss see Feine, JPT, '87, pp. 45-57, 77; '88, pp. 405 f.; Holtzmann, ibid., '78, pp. 168-171, with Weiss's reply, pp. 583-585.

Lk. 620), or was it heard by the multitudes (Mt. 728 Lk. 71)? For a whole series of utterances of Jesus Lk. has assigned occasions of which Mk. and Mt. know nothing (e.g., 918 1129 37f. 1241 1323 1415 25 151f. 175 37 1911). Even where an utterance of Jesus recurs more than once in the gospels—and we may be certain that he repeated himself much oftener than is recorded (§ 145 a)—they yet afford us not the slightest guarantee that the repetition took place precisely at the point at which they place it.

The saying about the light under a bushel is found in three different connections. In Mk. 421 and Lk. 816 the light is the interpretation of the parables Jesus had spoken (see § 119 a)—manifestly a very special application of a thought of very much wider scope. In Lk. 1133 the saying comes after the sentence which affirms that in the person of Jesus a greater than Jonah is present; here, then, the light can only be Jesus himself. In this connection, however, it is impossible to carry through the most obvious meaning of the saying that one ought not to put the light under a bushel. Moreover we find in 1134 a saying added only on account of the verbal suggestion (§ 133 c)—that the light of the body is the eye. Once more, then, it is not likely that the saying belongs to this place. In Mt. 514-16 two different representations are combined; the disciples are exhorted to let their light shine, the city set on the hill on the other hand shines of itself. By the light the disciples are here meant, but the opening words, 'ye are the light of the world,' can easily have been framed on the model of the preceding sentence, 'ye are the salt of the earth,' and that, too, for the first time by Mt., for the two sentences can hardly have stood together in one source since in Mk. and in Lk. they are given in two quite distinct places. Thus in no one passage have we any security that we are in possession of the original connection of the saying, and it would be just as conceivable that it may have been spoken by Jesus when one of his followers, concerned about his safety, had besought him, as Peter on one occasion (Mt. 1622) did, to spare himself and not expose himself to danger—in fact very much as in Jn. 94f., only without the specifically Johannine meaning of the word. See, further, Hawkins, 129-131; Wernle, 210f.

In the case of an eye-witness the recollection of an event associates itself readily with that of a definite 135. Places and persons. Lk. 918 Peter's confession is not made at Caesarea Philippi; indeed, the evangelist knows nothing about a journey thither at all (§ 116 a, end). The leper was cleansed according to Mt. 81f. after Jesus had finished his Sermon on the Mount, but according to Lk. (512) a considerable time before that, when Jesus was 'in one of the cities,' similarly as in Mk. 140.

On the return from his first journey abroad (to Tyre and Sidon) Jesus, according to Mk. 721, arrives at the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, according to Mt. 1529 (if we are to take the most obvious meaning of the words), at the western. After the feeding of the 4000 both evangelists agree in saying that he crossed the lake; but according to Mk. 810 the crossing is to the west shore, according to Mt. 1529 it is to the east. Then follows a new crossing, after which the apprehension about want of bread arises in Mk. 813f. on the eastern shore, in Mt. 165 on the western. The two routes coalesce according to Mk. 827 Mt. 1613 only when Caesarea is reached—unless we are to assume that Mt., in what precedes, means the same localities as Mk. and has only expressed himself misleadingly (cp § 112 a).

As for persons—neither the names of the women at the cross (see CLOPAS, § 2) nor even the names of the twelve disciples (Mt. 102-4 Mk. 316-19 Lk. 614-16) are given in two places alike (see APOSTLE). On the divergence between Mt. 99 on the one hand and Mk. 214 and Lk. 527 on the other, see LEVI and MATTHEW.

Several of the reported sayings of Jesus clearly bear the impress of a time which he did not live to see. The

136. Conditions belonging to a later time. precept about taking up one's cross and following Jesus (Mt. 1038 1624) is certainly not to be explained by pointing out that the sight of condemned persons carrying their crosses to the place of execution was a familiar one; for in that spectacle the most important element of all was wanting—that of innocence. The words in question cannot have taken their present shape till after the death of Jesus. Exhortations as to how to behave in times of persecution (Mk. 139-13) he can hardly have found it necessary to give so curly, for, however numerous his followers may have been, he formed in his lifetime no definite community outside the bonds of the Jewish religion, and still less a church. It was therefore also in the lifetime of Jesus hardly possible that his followers should be expelled from the synagogue in the manner spoken of in Lk. 622, and still less so that they should be expelled on account of the name of 'Christian' (see CHRISTIAN, § 1). The graduated order of procedure against an erring brother (Mt. 1815-17) is much more easily explained when transplanted to a later time. In the mouth of Jesus it is, at all events, intelligible only if by ecclesia (ἐκκλησία) we understand not the Christian but the Jewish local community. But also the authority conferred in the verse immediately following (1818), 'Whatsoever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever ye shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven,' could never have been given by Jesus either to the apostles or, what the context leaves open, to his followers in general, still less to Peter to whom it is limited in 1619 (cp BINDING AND LOOSING). Still more 1618 is open to serious question, quite apart from other reasons, on account of the word ecclesia, and because the verse is wanting in Tatian's Diatessaron. Into the discourse on the occasion of the mission of the disciples special precepts have been introduced, of a sort which can only owe their origin to later missionary practice taught by painful experience (e.g., Mt. 1011 13). The baptismal precept to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit (Mt. 2819) is questionable, not only because, according to the older accounts, the risen Jesus was only seen, not heard (§ 138 d), but also because, according to the NT throughout, baptism was only in the name of Jesus (Rom. 63 Gal. 327 Acts 238 816 1048 195 1 Cor. 611 13; even in Hermas also; Vis. iii. 73). The Trinitarian formula is met with first in Justin (Apol. 161) and in the Didachè (71). So also, if Jesus had enjoined the mission to the Gentiles on the original apostles, as is stated in Mt. 2819, it would be a practical impossibility to understand, how they, or their followers, could have withstood Paul so hotly upon this very point.

It would clearly be wrong, in an investigation such as the present, to start from any such postulate or axiom

137. The miracle-narratives. as that 'miracles' are impossible. At the same time, on the other hand, some doubt as to the accuracy of the accounts cannot fail to arise in the mind even of the stoutest believer in miracles when he observes such points as the following:—(a) How contradictory they are. In Mk. 13234 all the sick were brought to Jesus and he healed some; in || Mt. 816 they brought many and he healed all; in || Lk. 440 they brought all and he healed all, as also in Mt. 424. In Mk. 37f. 10 a great multitude followed him and he healed many; in || Mt. 1215 many followed and he healed all. According to this view of the evangelist must have been that he was followed exclusively by sick persons. According to what is said in § 133 d not only the early date but the historicity altogether of those healings en masse must be held to be doubtful.

Before the feeding of the 5000, in Mk. (634) Jesus teaches the multitude; in Mt. (1414) he heals their sick; in Lk. (911) he does both. At the beginning of his journey to Jerusalem, according to Mk. (101), Jesus teaches the multitude; according to Mt. (192) he heals them. According to Lk. (721) Jesus heals a number of sick—possessed and blind—in the presence of the messengers of the Baptist, and immediately before this he raises the widow's son at Nain (711-17); Mt. knows nothing of this, and Mk. as little (the message of the Baptist is wholly wanting in Mk.). But on the other hand Mt. records as before this date not only the healing of a leper (81-4) and of a paralytic (91-8), as does Mk. 140-212=Lk. 512-26, but also the raising of the daughter of Jairus (918-26), and the healing of two blind men (927-31), and of a dumb man possessed with a devil (κωφός: 932-34)—healings which in Lk. are all brought in as having been wrought after the message of the Baptist

(840-56 1835-43 1114-16). Thus each of the two evangelists secured that the messengers of the Baptist should be able to hear of miracles of most various kinds as wrought by Jesus (Mt. 115=Lk. 722);¹ but each has done so in a different way. After the cleansing of the temple, Jesus, according to Mt. (2114), heals blind and lame there; of this Mk. and Lk. know nothing. Similarly in 2852 f. he alone reports the resurrection of many dead persons on the death of Jesus. On the other hand, Mt. (2617-20) describes the preparation of the Passover meal without presupposing any supernatural knowledge on the part of Jesus as is done in Mk. (1412-17) and Lk. (227-14). Lk. alone knows not only of the miracles reported in 711-17 21, but also of the healing of the woman with the spirit of infirmity, of the man with the dropsy, of the ten lepers, and of the high priest's servant's ear, as also of the fact of Peter's miraculous draft (1310-17 141-6 1711-19 22 50 f. 51-11). In the last two cases the silence of Mt. and Mk. is all the more significant as they give a quite precise account of the very occurrences in the midst of which a miracle, according to Lk., was wrought, and in Gethsemane all the apostles, and at the call of Peter at least he and some others, were present (Mk. 1447=Mt. 2651-54; Mk. 116-20=Mt. 418-22; cp § 32, n. 5, § 42). Only Mk., again, knows of the healing of a blind man in two successive stages, by application of spittle and by laying on of hands (822-26). Instead of the one man, deaf and with an impediment in his speech, who is healed by Jesus in Mk. (732-37) by the same means, in ||Mt. 1530 f. a whole multitude of lame, blind, and dumb are healed. At Gerasa Mk. (52) and Lk. (827) make mention of one demoniac, Mt. (828) of two, and that too (v. 29) with clear divergence from || Mk. 57=Lk. 828, and dependence on the words of the demoniac in the synagogue at Capernaum (Mk. 124=Lk. 434), all mention of which has been wholly omitted by Mt. At Jericho Mk. (1046) mentions one blind man as Jesus was leaving the city, Lk. 1835 one as he was entering, Mt. 2029 f. two as he was leaving. The man who in Lk. 1114 is dumb is also blind in Mt. 1222.² According to Mk. 523 the daughter of Jairus is at the point of death, according to Lk. 842 she is a-dying; in Mt. 918 the father's statement runs, 'my daughter is even now dead,' whilst in Mk. 535 and Lk. 849 this announcement is brought to Jesus only after the healing of the woman with the issue of blood which has been wrought in the interval. To the number 5000 as well as to the 4000 of those who were miraculously fed Mt. adds in each case (1421 1538) 'besides women and children.' In Mk. 1120 the fig tree is found to be withered away on the morning after the curse has been pronounced; according to Mt. 2119 it withered away immediately. Whilst in Mk. 110 f. it is Jesus who sees the heaven opened and the spirit descending and hears the voice, so that one is able, if so disposed, to take the whole passage as describing an inward mental experience, with regard to which the disciples had derived their knowledge from himself alone, Mt. 316 f. represents the opening of the heavens as an objective occurrence and gives the voice in the third person and thus not as for the hearing of Jesus alone, whilst according to Lk. 321 f. the Spirit even descends 'in bodily shape.' As for the narratives of the nativity and childhood see MARY (MOTHER OF JESUS) and NATIVITY. We pass over the numerous other minor differences in the accounts of miracles in the gospels, in order to touch upon:—

(b) Two cases in which even one strongly predisposed

to believe in miracles would find it difficult to accept a narrative of this kind on account of the time to which it is assigned. (a) Lk. 2344 f. expressly, and Mk. 1533 Mt. 2745 also to all appearance, allege an eclipse of the sun, a celestial phenomenon which, however, is possible only at the period of New Moon—i. e., shortly before the 1st of Nisan—and cannot happen on the 15th or 14th of a month. To save for the narrative some relic of credibility the suggestion has even been made that it is in fact an eclipse of the moon that is recorded. But in offering this explanation it was forgotten, not only that at midday such an occurrence would not produce darkness, but also that the shadow of the earth falling upon the moon is visible only from the side of the earth that is turned away from the sun, in other words, during the night, not in the middle of the day from 12 to 3.

(β) As for the fig tree (Mk. 1112-14 20-25 Mt. 2118-22), it is certainly the fact that its fruits begin to form before the leaves unfold—approximately about Easter-tide. But at this early stage they are still exceedingly small and quite uneatable. The first ripe figs are gathered in the end of June, most of the rest in August, and some not till so late as February. Some do not reach their development at all in the year of their formation, but only in the following spring. Fruits of this last-named class might therefore have been found by Jesus on the tree; but they are in no sense a characteristic mark of a good tree; the characteristic of such a tree is its young freshly-produced figs. But with figs of this last kind Jesus could not have satisfied his hunger; the narrative would have been possible at any time from June to February; but, placed at Easter, it is not so; and yet it belongs so definitely to the Easter season that it would be indeed a bold thing to say that it is true in itself but wrongly dated. The only really pertinent remark is that of Mk. (1113): it was not the season of figs. This is so contrary, however, to the whole of the rest of the narrative that Scholten thought himself justified in setting it down as a marginal note by a foreign hand (§ 119 b). Thus, even where there is not the slightest shadow of aversion to miracles as such, there is nothing to surprise us when these two narratives are declared to be unhistorical. See FIG TREE.

(c) Taken as a whole the facts brought forward in the immediately preceding paragraphs show only too clearly with what lack of concern for historical precision the evangelists write. The conclusion is inevitable that even the one evangelist whose story in any particular case involves less of the supernatural than that of the others, is still very far from being entitled on that account to claim implicit acceptance of his narrative. Just in the same degree in which those who came after him have gone beyond him, it is easily conceivable that he himself may have gone beyond those who went before him.

With reference to the resurrection of Jesus (a) the most credible statement in the Synoptics is that of Mt.

138. The Resurrection of Jesus.

(and Mk.) that the first appearances were in Galilee. The appearance in Jerusalem to the two women (Mt. 289 f.) is almost universally given up—not only because of the silence of all the other accounts, but also because in it Jesus only repeats the direction which the women had already received through the angel. If the disciples had seen Jesus in Jerusalem as Lk. states, it would be absolutely incomprehensible how Mk. and Mt. came to require them to repair to Galilee before they could receive a manifestation of Jesus. The converse on the other hand is very easy to understand; Lk. found it inconceivable that the disciples who, according to him, were still in Jerusalem, should have been unable to see Jesus until they went to Galilee. In actual fact the disciples had already dispersed at Gethsemane (Mk. 1450 Mt. 2656); this Lk. very significantly omits. Even Peter, after he had perceived, when he denied his Master, the dangers he incurred, will hardly have exposed himself to these, gratuitously, any longer. At the cross only women, not disciples, were present. Whither these last had betaken themselves we are not told. But it is not difficult to conjecture that they had gone to their native Galilee. The angelic command, therefore, that they should make this their rendezvous, may reasonably be taken as a veiled indication that they had already gone thither. The presupposition made both by Mk. and by Mt. that they were still in Jerusalem on the day of the resurrection is accordingly erroneous. It was this error of theirs that led Lk. to his still more erroneous inversion of the actual state of the facts.

(b) The second element in the synoptics that may be accepted with confidence is the statement that it was Peter who received the first manifestation of his risen master. All the more surprising is it that it is only Lk. who tells us so, and that only in passing (24 34). It is the chief point in the statement of Paul, 1 Cor. 15 1-11. This passage must be regarded as the earliest account of the appearances of the risen Jesus; unquestionably it goes back to the communications made by Peter during the fifteen days' visit of Paul, three years after the conversion of the latter (Gal. 1 8).

(c) Not only is it a mark of inadequacy in the gospels that they have nothing to say about the greater number of the manifestations here recorded; it also becomes necessary to withhold belief from what they actually do relate in addition. Paul would certainly not have left it out had he known it; the duty of bringing forward all the available evidence in support of the truth of the resurrection of Jesus as against the Corinthian doubters was of the most stringent kind.

(d) Thus, on the one hand, the statements that Jesus was touched, and that he ate (Lk. 24 39-43), are seen to be incredible. But these are precisely the statements which make it possible to understand why the evangelists should pass over the mere appearing of Jesus ($\omega\phi\theta\eta$) to which the statements of Paul are confined, inasmuch as they believed they could offer proofs of a more palpable character.

In criticism it was a great error to believe that by the expression 'was seen' ($\omega\phi\theta\eta$) Paul was characterizing the appearances as unreal. It is indeed true that in the NT this expression with one exception (Acts 7 26) is applied to visions; but, unless he be a thoroughly modern person well versed in philosophy and science, the visionary is under a psychological necessity to regard as real the things which he sees in vision even though he distinguishes between them and the objects of ordinary sight. The only thing that would prevent him from doing so would be if the vision offered that which according to his ideas was utterly impossible. But in the case before us this is far from being so. In the NT the resurrection of a man—e.g., of the Baptist or of Elijah—is supposed to be thoroughly possible (Mk. 6 14-16 = Mt. 14 2 = Lk. 9 7 f. Mk. 9 11 Mt. 17 10 11 14).

What the expression 'was seen' ($\omega\phi\theta\eta$) proves is, accordingly, rather this—that in no description of any appearances of the risen Lord did Paul perceive anything by which they were distinguished from his own, received at Damascus. With reference to this he uses the same expression; he therefore characterizes it as a 'vision' ($\delta\pi\tau\alpha\sigma\iota\alpha$), and, as he still distinguishes from this the 'revelation' ($\alpha\pi\kappa\alpha\lambda\upsilon\psi\iota\varsigma$) in 2 Cor. 12 1, we shall have to take the word literally and interpret it as denoting seeing, not hearing.

(e) The statements as to the empty sepulchre are to be rejected; Paul is silent regarding them, and his silence is very strongly reinforced by Mk. 168 which says the women told no one anything of what they had seen. This failure to carry out the angel's bidding is quite unthinkable, and one readily understands why Mt. and Lk. should say the opposite, though this is probably the most violent change they have anywhere made on their exemplar. (The word 'fear,' $\phi\acute{\upsilon}\beta\omicron\varsigma$, in Mt. 288 shows that he had before him the 'were afraid,' $\epsilon\phi\omicron\beta\omicron\upsilon\omicron\tau\omicron$, of Mk.) The statement of Mk. is intelligible only if we take him to mean that the whole statement as to the empty sepulchre is now being promulgated for the first time by the publication of his gospel. He cannot intend to say that the women held their peace for a short time only, for the general belief is that Jesus appeared very soon after his resurrection, and every delay on the part of the women would have put back the time at which the disciples could arrive in Galilee and behold the promised appearing of the Lord. If Mk. is understood in the sense we have indicated, then in him we have a virtual admission, veiled indeed, yet clear, that all statements as to the empty sepulchre were innovations of a later time.

(f) Nor, as against this, will it avail to urge the inherent likelihood that the sepulchre must without fail have been visited.

Here the assumption is that forthwith on the resurrection day the tidings of the empty sepulchre became known in Jerusalem. But this supposition has been shown to be groundless. Yet even had the tidings been brought forthwith to the Christians in Jerusalem, and even if they had thereupon at once visited the sepulchre, their evidence would not have proved more than did that of the women. Only an examination by opponents could have claimed greater weight. But it is hardly likely that the tidings reached their ears forthwith. Yet, even had this happened and the sepulchre been found empty, the fact would have been capable of being explained by them as due to a removal of the body. The (unhistorical) statement of Mt. as to setting a watch over the sepulchre (§ 108) had in fact just this very purpose in view—to exclude the possibility of any such removal. But after the visit of the women the watch was not continued even in Mt. Further it has to be borne in mind that according to Jewish belief a body did not remain recognisable for more than three days (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, § 20 2). Had a body, therefore, really been found, it would no longer have been possible to identify it as the body of Jesus.

This comes yet more strongly into view if we picture to ourselves the order of events in the way in which, in all probability, they actually happened. The first belief in the resurrection of Jesus arose through the appearances in Galilee on the third day after his death, or later. The disciples believed in them and therefore felt themselves under no necessity to assure themselves by examination of the sepulchre. Even if the tidings of the Galilean appearances had been brought to Jerusalem forthwith, not even so would they have given occasion for such an examination. It was unnecessary: the followers of Jesus believed them without further evidence; his enemies laughed them to scorn. One knew that the emptiness of the sepulchre after so long a time could prove anything just as little as could the production of a no longer identifiable body. It is unnecessary to enter more fully into the almost incredible variations in the accounts of what happened at the sepulchre, after what has already been said (see, for enumeration, § 27).

(g) The conclusion of Mk. (169-20) is admittedly not genuine (see W. and H., Appendix, and above, § 4, n. 7). Still less can the shorter conclusion printed by W. and H. lay claim to genuineness. Should it be found that the longer, in accordance with an Armenian superscription found by Conybeare (Expos., '93 6, pp. 241-254), was written by the presbyter Aristion—the name in the inscription is Ariston,—then a very unfavourable light would be shed upon this 'disciple of the Lord,' as Papias calls him. Almost the entire section is a compilation, partly even from the fourth gospel and Acts. At the same time the words 'for they were afraid' ($\epsilon\phi\omicron\beta\omicron\upsilon\omicron\tau\omicron$ γάρ, 168) cannot have been the close intended by the author, especially seeing that appearances in Galilee are announced (167). The suggestion that the author was interrupted as he was finishing is a mere makeshift. It cannot be urged in support of it that in Mt. and Lk. no traces of the conjectured genuine conclusion of Mk. are to be found. We could not be sure whether at least Mt. has not drawn from it, especially as he coincides entirely with Mk. 166 f. But deliberate divergence from the (supposed) conclusion of Mk. would also be very intelligible, for Mt. and Lk. have already, as against Mk. 168, said the opposite of what lay before them in their exemplar. The fact that the last leaf of a book is always the most liable to get lost can suffice to explain how the close of Mk. should have disappeared without leaving any trace. Yet a deliberate removal of it is also conceivable,—if it did not answer the demands which had already come to be set up in the time of Mt. and Lk. Nothing can be conjectured with any certainty, except that it described an appearance of Jesus to the disciples. The fact that Peter is also individually named in 167 may perhaps be held to indicate that the conclusion contained also an appearance to Peter alone.

The foregoing sections may have sometimes seemed to raise a doubt whether any credible elements were to be found in the gospels at all; all the more emphatically therefore must stress be laid on the existence of passages of the kind indicated in § 131. Reference has already been made to Mk. 1017 f. ('Why callest thou me good? none is good save God only'), as also to Mt. 1231 f. (that blasphemy against the son of man can be forgiven),¹ and to Mk. 321 (that his relations held him to be beside himself; cp § 116 b d). To these, two others may now be added: Mk. 1332 ('of that day and of that hour knoweth no one, not even the angels in heaven, neither the Son but the Father'); the words 'neither the Son' (οὐδὲ ὁ υἱός) are absent from Mt. in many MSS and the whole verse from Lk.; cp § 130 e; and Mk. 1534 Mt. 2746 ('My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?'—an utterance which Lk. has wholly omitted).

These five passages, along with the four which will be spoken of in § 140, might be called the foundation-pillars for a truly scientific life of Jesus. Should the idea suggest itself that they have been sought out with partial intent, as proofs of the human as against the divine character of Jesus, the fact at all events cannot be set aside that they exist in the Bible and demand our attention. In reality, however, they prove not only that in the person of Jesus we have to do with a completely human being, and that the divine is to be sought in him only in the form in which it is capable of being found in a man; they also prove that he really did exist, and that the gospels contain at least some absolutely trustworthy facts concerning him. If passages of this kind were wholly wanting in them it would be impossible to prove to a sceptic that any historical value whatever was to be assigned to the gospels; he would be in a position to declare the picture of Jesus contained in them to be purely a work of phantasy, and could remove the person of Jesus from the field of history,—all the more when the meagreness of the historical testimony regarding him, whether in canonical writings outside of the gospels, or in profane writers such as Josephus, Tacitus, Suetonius, and Pliny, is considered.

(a) According to Mk. 812 Jesus emphatically declined to work a 'sign' (σημεῖον) before the eyes of his contemporaries; 'there shall no sign be given unto this generation.' In Mt. 1239 164 and Lk. 1129 this saying is given in the enlarged form, 'there shall no sign be given to this generation but the sign of Jonah (the prophet).' Unless here the meaning intended be the exact contrary of what is said in Mk., the 'sign of Jonah' cannot be really a 'sign,' but rather the opposite of one.

To illustrate how, notwithstanding, it was possible for Jesus to express himself so, let us put an imaginary, parallel case. A conqueror, without receiving any provocation, invades a country. Its inhabitants send an embassy to ask of him what justification he can show for his aggression. He gives the answer: You ask me what I can allege in justification? I shall give you no other justification than that which my sword gives. The situation in the gospel is quite similar.

The one thing which Jesus has hitherto done, and, if he refuses to work signs (σημεῖα), the one thing which he can continue to do, is to preach. The main activity of Jonah also in like manner consisted in preaching. By the sign of Jonah accordingly is meant the opposite of a sign—viz., preaching like that of Jonah. This is shown also by the immediate sequel: 'the men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah.' Next follows the example of the Queen of Sheba who came to hear the preaching of Solomon (Mt. 1241 f. = Lk. 1131 f.).

It is only in Mt. (1240) that this good connection is broken by the interpretation that the sign of Jonah means his three days' sojourn in the belly of the whale, and that by this is signified the three days' sojourn of Jesus in the heart of the earth. But even apart from its breaking the connection, this verse, which rests only on misunderstanding of the ambiguous utterance in Lk. 1130, is quite unsuitable; for a 'sign' of course makes its impression only when it can be seen. The people of Nineveh could not observe the emergence of Jonah from the place of his sojourn, nor indeed is it even stated that he told them of it; all that is said is that he preached to them.

(b) According to Mk. 65 f. Jesus was able to do no mighty work (save healing a few sick folk) in Nazareth and marvelled at the unbelief of its people. This then is the reason why he was unable. Mt. 1358 is a manifest weakening of this: 'he did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief.'

(c) In Mk. 814-21 the disciples, in the crossing of the Lake, which has been touched on in § 135, are represented as having forgotten to take bread with them. Jesus says: 'Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees and of Herod' (in Mt. 166: 'of the Pharisees and Sadducees'). This exhortation the disciples take as a reproach on them for their forgetfulness. But Jesus rebukes them for their little understanding, and reminds them of the feeding of the 5000 and of the 4000. The conclusion is given fully only by Mt. (1611 f.), but unquestionably in the sense of Mk., 'How is it that ye do not perceive that I spake not to you concerning bread? then understood they how that he bade them beware of the teaching of the Pharisees and Sadducees.' Both evangelists have previously related the feeding of the 5000 and the 4000 as facts. If Jesus reminds them of this, the consequence must of course be that they should think of material loaves as being what they are to beware of. In reality, however, the deduction is quite the opposite. This is possible only on one assumption—if the feeding of the 5000 and the 4000 was not a historical occurrence, but a parable having this as its point that the bread with which one man in the wilderness was able to feed a vast multitude signifies the teaching with which he satisfied their souls. On this view the closing statement of the narrative first finds its full explanation; more bread remains over than was present at the beginning; truth is not consumed when it is communicated to others, but only serves to awaken in them ever new thoughts and an ever-growing power to satisfy in their turn the spiritual hunger of others. It is exceedingly surprising, yet at the same time evidence of a reproduction of earlier materials, that Mk. and Mt. should give the present narrative at all—a narrative which in their understanding of the miracle of the feeding is so meaningless.

Mt. has made some attempt, albeit a somewhat feeble one, to bring the two narratives into harmony. With him Jesus (168) reproaches the disciples for their little faith. Similarly Mk. at an earlier place (652), the wording of which recalls that of the present passage, alludes to the miracle of the loaves and implies that the disciples ought to have learned from it implicit faith in the supernatural power of Jesus even in the storm. All the more important is it to notice that in the passage of Mk. now before us (814-21) Jesus blames them, in the only fitting (and therefore the only original) way, for their little understanding; and Mt. by taking up this reproach in 16911 shows that the other, that of unbelief, is not the original one.

(d) In Mt. 115 Lk. 722 Jesus sends an answer to the Baptist that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, and the poor have the gospel preached to them. As has been shown above (§ 137 a), both evangelists have seen to it that all the miracles mentioned have taken place, either at an earlier date, or before the eyes of the Baptist's messengers. All the more remarkable therefore is it that the list should close with what is not a miracle at all. It would be impossible to counteract the preceding enumeration more effectually than by the simple insertion of this final clause. The evangelists therefore cannot have added it of their own proper motion. Neither could Jesus have neutralised the force of his own words—if we assume miracles to be intended—in such an extraordinary way. On the other hand the clause in question fits admirably, if Jesus was speaking not of the physically but of the spiritually blind, lame, leprous, deaf, dead. This is the meaning, too, which these words actually have in the OT passages, Is. 35 5 f. 61 1, which lie at the root of this, and it also fits very well the continuation in Mt. 11 6 Lk. 7 23, which reads, 'Blessed is he who is not offended in me' (i.e., in my unpretentious simplicity). Here, therefore, we have a case, as remarkable as it is assured, in which a saying of Jesus, though completely misunderstood, has been—in its essence at least—incorporated with verbal accuracy in the gospels.

Jesus, then, declined to work signs (σημεῖα), and that, too, on principle. Mk. 8 12 (and parallels) is not a

141. Inference as to 'signs.' saying of a kind that he could have uttered one day and broken the next ; moreover he expressly says that no sign should be given to 'this [whole] generation,' because as a whole it was wicked and rebellious against God. Now, the word σημεῖον does not denote any kind of wonder, but only a wonder of the kind which serves the end of showing the power of him who works it—as, in the present case, the Messiahship of Jesus. But, so far as the reported miracles of Jesus have this end, they are, if this saying of his is to be accepted, no longer to be taken to be credible ; either they never happened at all or (at least), if historical, they were not miraculous.

This applies very conspicuously to the withering of the fig-tree. Apart from the motive mentioned in § 137 δ, β, this particular miracle is rejected by many theologians on the ground that such a deed, having no manifest saving purpose, appears to them unworthy of his character. The same principle will apply also at least to the stilling of the storm and the walking upon the water, and likewise to the stater in the fish's mouth, even though, strangely enough, it is not expressly said anywhere that this miracle was actually carried out.

(a) As for the feeding of the 5000 and the 4000, so also for the withering of the fig-tree, we still possess a clue to the way in which the narrative arose out of a parable. The narrative in question is not found in Lk., and this is, doubtless correctly, explained from the supposition that Lk. considered his parable (136-9) of the fig-tree—or rather the unspoken sequel to the parable, that the tree had at last to be cut down after all—as identical with the narrative. By the fig-tree, in this view, was meant the nation of Israel, and that which we have seen to be impossible if the story is taken as a relation of actual fact (§ 137 δ, β) becomes very effective as soon as the symbolical interpretation is adopted. At the close of his ministry, at his last passover festival, Jesus utters his curse upon the nation that has borne no fruit.

Figurative forms of expression, which could give rise to the story of the feeding, are also to be found in Mt. 5 6 : 'blessed are they that hunger,¹ for they shall be filled,' and the verse which in Mk. (634) stands before the miraculous narrative, to the effect that Jesus taught the multitude, embodies in reality the substance of that narrative. For Peter's draught of fishes, cp Mk. 1 17 and Mt. 13 47-50.

It is not difficult to conjecture expressions made use of by Jesus out of which the narrative of the walking on the water and the stilling of the tempest could be framed, somewhat after the analogy of Mk. 11 22-24 and Lk. 17 6 : 'if ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, then shall ye be able to command the storm and it will obey, and ye shall be able to walk unharmed upon the troubled sea (of life).' Indeed even the words which actually stand in the passages last cited might have given occasion to the formation of miraculous narratives. 'If ye shall say in faith to this mountain, Be thou cast into the sea, or to the sycomore tree, Be thou transplanted into the sea, so shall it be done.' But literalism of this sort even in those days had its limits.

(δ) The same explanation is capable of being applied also where deeds or words attributed to Jesus himself are not concerned. It is very easily conceivable that a preacher on the death of Jesus may have said, purely figuratively, that then was the veil of the temple rent in twain (Mk. 15 38 = Mt. 27 51 = Lk. 23 45). What he meant to say was that by the death of Jesus the ancient separation between God and his people was done away. By a misunderstanding, this saying could easily be taken up as statement of a literal physical fact. So also, if another preacher said, using figurative language, that at the death of Jesus the graves had opened (Mt. 27 52), or that darkness (of sorrow) had spread over all the earth (Mk. 15 33 = Mt. 27 45 = Lk. 23 44). Cp also § 26, ii.

(a) In the present connection we need not do more than allude very briefly to what by Strauss was regarded 143. Influence of OT passages. as almost the only source of origin for such miraculous narratives as had no real foundation in fact—namely, passages of the OT. These may very well have contributed to the shaping of such narratives, even though we do not assume that they originated them. For the raisings of the dead cp 1 K. 17 17-24 2 K. 4 17-37 ; for the multiplication of the loaves and fishes, cp Ex. 16 1-18 Nu. 11 4-9 2 K. 4 42-44 ; for the walking upon the water Ps 77 20 [19] Is. 43 16 Job 9 8 ; for the stilling of the storm, Ps. 107 23-32 ; for the healing of the withered hand 1 K. 13 6 ; for the healing of the dumb man, Wisd. 10 21.

(δ) Apart from the miracles, there is one OT passage which has very clearly influenced the form of the gospel narrative in Mt. 21 7. It is impossible to deny Mt.'s representation here to be that Jesus rode into Jerusalem upon two asses. Even if one chooses to interpret the words as meaning that he sat upon the garments and not upon the animals the sense is substantially the same, for the garments were laid upon the asses. The misunderstanding rests only upon a too literal interpretation of the prophecy in Zech. 9 9, which is not shared by Mk. and Lk. So also the number thirty (unmentioned in Mk. 14 11 Lk. 22 5) given to the sum received by Judas, as also the casting away of the money into the temple (Mt. 26 15 27 5), would seem to come not from tradition but from the passage in Zechariah (11 12 f.) expressly cited in Mt. 27 9 f. Upon Bethlehem, as the birthplace of Jesus, the virgin birth, the Magi, the flight into Egypt, the massacre of the innocents, see MARY [MOTHER OF JESUS] and NATIVITY.

According to Mk. 6 5 f. (see § 140 δ) we are to understand that Jesus healed where he found faith. This

144. Miracles of healing. power is so strongly attested throughout the first and second centuries that, in view of the spiritual greatness of Jesus and the imposing character of his personality, it would be indeed difficult to deny it to him. Even the Pharisees do not deny his miracles of healing, though they trace them to a compact with Beelzebub (Mk. 3 22 Mt. 9 34 12 24 Lk. 11 15). According to Mt. 12 27 = Lk. 11 19 the disciples of the Pharisees also wrought such miracles ; the man who followed not with the disciples of Jesus cast out devils (Mk. 9 38-40 = Lk. 9 49 f.) ; the same is said of those whom in Mt. 7 22 f. Jesus rejects in his final judgment. Paul asserts that a like power was possessed by himself (2 Cor. 12 12 Rom. 15 19), and by other Christians (1 Cor. 12 8-11 28) ; Justin mentions castings-out of devils (1 Apol. 26 Dial. 30, 35, 39, 76, 85) ; so also Tertullian

(Apol. 23), Irenæus (231 f. Eus. HE 57), and Quadratus (Eus. HE iv. 32).¹

That Jesus demanded faith is frequently stated (Mk. 923 f. Mt. 928), as also that he was approached with faith (Mk. 25 = Mt. 92 = Lk. 520; Mt. 810 = Lk. 79; Mt. 1527 f. = Mk. 728 f.; see § 109 d), and that he prayed.

Many of the accounts contain particulars that could hardly have been introduced at will merely for effect. Thus in Mk. 57-10 the devil does not leave the demoniac of Gerasa at the first adjuration; Jesus must first, just like a modern alienist, enter with the man into a conversation in which he elicits from him what his hallucinations are. In Mk. 914-29 all the symptoms shown by the boy, except the falling into the fire, can be paralleled from the descriptions of epilepsy in ancient medical writers (Krenkel, Beitr. zur Aufhellung der Gesch. u. d. Briefe d. Paulus, '90, pp. 50-63).

Of course we must endeavour to ascertain how many, and still more what sorts of cures were effected by Jesus. It is quite permissible for us to regard as historical only those of the class which even at the present day physicians are able to effect by psychical methods,—as, more especially, cures of mental maladies. It is highly significant that, in a discourse of Peter (Acts 1038), the whole activity of Jesus is summed up in this that he went about doing good and healing all those that were oppressed of the devil. By this expression only demoniacs are intended. Cp also Lk. 1332. It is not at all difficult to understand how the contemporaries of Jesus, after seeing some wonderful deed or deeds wrought by him which they regarded as miracles, should have credited him with every other kind of miraculous power without distinguishing, as the modern mind does, between those maladies which are amenable to psychical influences and those which are not. It is also necessary to bear in mind that the cure may often have been only temporary. If there was a relapse, people did not infer any deficiency in the miraculous efficacy of the healer; they accounted for it simply by the return of the demon who had been cast out. On this point Mt. 1243-45 is very characteristic. Perhaps also Lk. 82 may be cited in this connection, if the seven devils were cast out of Mary Magdalene not simultaneously but on separate occasions.

Most obscure of all are the two accounts, found only in Mk. (72-35 822-26), according to which Jesus made use of saliva to effect a cure. Precisely in these two cases it is extraordinarily difficult to believe in a cure whether by this or by psychical methods.

(a) Even if the public ministry of Jesus had lasted for a few months only, he must have uttered a thousandfold more than all that has been recorded in the gospels. His longest discourse would, if delivered in the form in which it has come down to us, not have taken more than some five minutes in the delivery. However self-evident, this has been constantly overlooked by the critics. They are constantly assuming that we possess the several words of Jesus that have been reported approximately in the same fullness with which they were spoken. For the parables perhaps (apart, of course, from the manipulations pointed out above, in §§ 109 b, 112 b, 128 c d) this may be to a certain extent true. Of other utterances, we have traced in Mt. 115 = Lk. 722 and Mk. 814-21 = Mt. 165-12 (§ 140 c d) one or two which must have been preserved almost verbatim. In what remains, however, it can hardly be sufficiently emphasised that we possess only an excessively meagre précis of what Jesus said, namely, only so much as not only made an immediate impression when first heard, but also continued to survive the ordeal of frequent repetition (for much of it possessed too little interest for those who had not been actual ear-witnesses). In this process not only was an extraordinary number of utterances completely lost; but a large number of the sayings of Jesus now received for the first time that consecutive and pointed form which made them seem worthy of further repetition. Without doubt Jesus must very often have repeated himself; but what he assuredly often repeated in many variations has been preserved to us only in a single form. One may perhaps venture to compare the process with that of a photographer who prints from many negatives of the same individual on the same paper. There is produced in this way an 'average' likeness which when viewed from some distance seems satisfactory enough, but when it is more closely viewed the vagueness of its contours is at once discovered.

(b) The context in which we now find the sayings of Jesus must never (from what has been said in § 134) be taken as a trustworthy guide in determining what the original meaning may have been. In every case the context tells us only what the evangelists, or their predecessors, found it to mean; indeed in many cases it is impossible to believe that even for them the place where they introduce the saying is intended to convey any hint as to the meaning. A source like the logia laid naturally very little stress upon this point. The greater number of the utterances of Jesus are like erratic blocks. All that one sees with perfect clearness is that they do not originally belong to the place where they are now found. What their original position was is unknown. The observer has to rest satisfied if in spite of its removal to a new site the real nature and quality of the stone can be made out; and this is happily very often the case.

On the other hand, a wholly mistaken line is taken when, for example, the attempt is made to base consequences on any such assumption as that Jesus was apt to give forth parables or sayings in pairs. The parable of the leaven which in Mt. 1331-33 and Lk. 1318-21 immediately follows on that of the mustard-seed is still wanting in Mk. 430-32. In Lk.'s source as well as in Mk.'s the sayings about the salt and about the light were still separate (not connected as we now see them in Mt. 513-16). Equally futile are discussions as to the order in which Jesus may have spoken the beatitudes. If any one were to try to repeat the beatitudes after hearing them once he would not be sure of retaining the original order. We cannot expect more of those who heard Jesus. In the Sermon on the Mount not only is it needless to ask whether it was heard by the disciples alone or by the multitude as well (§ 134); it is equally needless to ask whether it was intended for the one or for the other. It is a conglomerate. Little of what is found in Mt. 57 recurs in Lk. 620-49. On Mt. 513-16 see § 134, on 517-48 see § 145 g. In chap. 6 f. a really good connection is found only within each of the following groups:—61-6 with 16-18; 625-34; 71-5; 77-11; not between these groups reciprocally, nor yet between them and the other sayings contained in these chapters. Nay, there is not the least ground for supposing, because they are three in number, that Jesus enumerated immediately in succession those things in which according to Mt. 01-6 16-18 hypocrisy is to be avoided, quite apart from the fact that the enumeration is disturbed and broken by vv. 7-15.

(c) Words of such pre-eminent importance as the Lord's Prayer or the words of institution of the Eucharist, or the description of a scene so unforgettable as that in which the sign is given by which the betrayer is made known (Mk. 1418-20; Mt. 2621-23; Lk. 2221) are given in a very conflicting manner. Of the words uttered on the cross, Mk. and Mt. have only one, which in turn is omitted by Lk., who, however, gives three others. In this last case, however, one may be sure that Mk. and Mt. are in the right (§ 139); and to the three previous ones one may safely apply the maxim that additions are more likely than omissions; omissions would in fact be difficult to account for (§ 120 c). Mk. 1422-24 accordingly, with omission of 'take' (λάβετε), may be regarded as the relatively (not absolutely) oldest form of the words of institution of the Eucharist. (Against the deletion of Lk. 2219b 20 see Schmiedel in Hand-Commentar on 1 Cor. 1134.)

(d) While in the case of the Eucharistic words only Lk. is dependent on Paul, Mt. and still more Mk. avoiding his novelties, Paul in 1 Cor. 710 f., as against all the synoptists, exhibits the earlier form of the prohibition of divorce. This we infer from the fact that it is he who gives the strictest form of the prohibition. Subsequent relaxations in view of the difficulty in working the severer form, are intelligible, increases of stringency are not; especially would these be unintelligible in the case of Paul, who actually finds himself constrained (1 Cor. 7 15) on his own responsibility to introduce a relaxation of the law. Even the Epistle of James, although it already omits (5 12) Jerusalem as an object by which one can swear (§ 150), gives an older form of the precept against swearing than is found in Mt. 5 37; namely, Let your yea be a (simple) yea, and your nay a (simple) nay.

(e) As for the substance of the sayings of Jesus, it has already been pointed out in §§ 109 b, 111, 112 b, 136 how little credence we can attach to the historicity of the sayings attributed to Jesus about the call of the Gentiles, the baptismal formula, the later conditions of the primitive church, and the postponement of his parusia. Here it may be added that in Mk. 14 9 a saying which certainly was originally the closing remark of a preacher on the anointing at Bethany is given as a word of Jesus. In Mt. (26 63) it is still further altered by the addition: 'Whosoever this gospel shall be preached, that also which this woman hath done shall be spoken of.' As regards a passage of such great importance as Mk. 10 45 = Mt. 20 28 ('to give his life a ransom for many'), judgment can be given only in accordance with the following considerations. It can be accepted as genuine if Jesus spoke of his life as a ransom in no other sense than that in which he did so at the last supper—i.e., as an offering not for sin but for the immunity of his followers, after the manner of the Passover lamb in Egypt, or for ratification of their covenant with God as in Gen. 15 10 17 Jer. 34 18 Ex. 24 1-8, and if he did so at a date not too long before his death. Otherwise the doubt will have to be expressed, that the sentence comes from the Pauline theology. In any case it is noteworthy that it is absent from || Lk. 22 27.

That Jesus had in view the possibility of his death some considerable time before it came upon him is not unlikely. But the very precise predictions of it with their various details are open to the suspicion that they took shape at a later date in accordance with the facts of history, and least of all is it credible that Jesus should have put forth such a prediction directly after Peter's confession Mk. 8 31 Mt. 16 21 Lk. 16 22. This confession must have been one of the supreme moments in the joyous consciousness of Jesus—the discovery that he was finding recognition as the Messiah and was winning his battle. Suffering and death are the very opposite of all that is looked for in the Jewish Messiah, and of what Jesus at that moment could have looked forward to for himself.

(f) From the eschatological discourses disappears everything specifically apocalyptic concerning the signs of his parusia, if the separation of the 'little Apocalypse' as made in § 124 b is correct. This does not, however, by any means imply the elimination of all eschatological utterances whatsoever. On the contrary, there still remain to be attributed to Jesus the words in Mt. 16 27 f. 26 29 64 (ultimately also 10 23 19 28 f.; see § 112 d) in which he prophesies his return with the clouds of heaven, and the like. This is in fact quite intelligible, and even necessary, if he held himself to be the Messiah; in such a case it would have been impossible for him to believe that God would allow him and his work to go to ruin through the persecutions of his enemies. The failure of these prophecies to come to fulfilment ought in no case to lead to any attempt to make out that they were not uttered by Jesus, or to interpret them in such a sense as eases their inconsistency with the facts to disappear. As has been shown in §§ 111, 112 e, 113, the evangelists found that much trouble was required in order to tone down this inconsistency; they had not the least occasion, therefore, to invent such predictions or to heighten them; the prophecies must have lain before them as quite fixed elements of tradition.

Another question is whether Jesus foretold the destruction of the temple as in Mk. 13 2 Mt. 24 2 Lk. 21 6. If the 'little Apocalypse' (Mk. 13 14 Mt. 24 15) or Rev. 11 1 f. 13 is from a Christian hand the answer can hardly be affirmative, for a Christian writer could hardly have presumed the continued existence of the temple in contradiction to Jesus' own prophecy. Both these pieces, however, may be Jewish; and Jesus could have foreseen the destruction of Jerusalem even without supernatural knowledge. In no case, however, ought we to lay weight on the circumstance that he connects it with the end of the world, for this arises from the fusion of the (certainly vacillating) tradition regarding his own words with the 'little Apocalypse' (§ 124 b). Therefore, also, we must refuse to entertain the conjecture that in reality he prophesied the destruction of Jerusalem only, and that his alleged prediction of the end of the world rests on a misunderstanding of the disciples. According to the same mode of reasoning, he cannot have prophesied his resurrection alone without adding a prediction of his second coming from heaven; for this, according to the general and most ancient belief, which makes no mention of an ascension also (1 Cor. 15 4-12 Rom. 8 34 Eph. 1 20 5 f. Acts 2 32-35 Heb. 1 3 10 12 12 2 [18 20 Rev. 1 18] 1 Pet. 3 19 22 Eph. 4 9 f.), carried him direct to heaven; but there was quite as general a belief that as Messiah his work of setting up the kingdom of God upon earth required his presence here.

Of all these predictions it is possible to deny that they were uttered by him only if it be at the same time denied that he held himself to be the Messiah. But in that case it will be impossible to explain how the disciples, who had been thrown into the utmost depths of despondency by his death, nevertheless came to be able to believe in his resurrection. Those theologians who go so far as to remove all the utterances of Jesus to the effect that he was the Messiah, hardly continue to hold that the belief in his resurrection rests on anything more real than the visions of the disciples which arose out of their subjective mental condition. All psychology, however, affirms that visions arise only when that which is seen in the concrete has previously taken firm and living hold on the soul of the visionary. The belief is therefore inevitable that the disciples had already, in the lifetime of Jesus, held him to be the Messiah. They could not, however, have done so without acquainting him with this belief of theirs; and if he had denied it, it is impossible to understand how their respect for his authentic declaration should have permitted them to go on believing the opposite. As regards the date of his second coming, the statements in Mt. 16 28 (that it would be before the then living generation had passed away) and in 26 64 (that it would be immediately, ἀπ' ἄρτι) have a like claim to probability. Whatever he may have said as to this, it is most certain that he also declared that 'none knoweth of that day or of that hour' (Mk. 13 32 Mt. 24 36).

(g) It would be quite out of place to look in the gospels for direct statements as to any development in Jesus during the period of his public activity. The latest date at which reverence for him would have allowed a conception of anything of the kind to be assigned is that of his temptation (Mt. 4 1-11 Lk. 4 1-13) before his ministry began. It could only be from unconscious touches of theirs that we could be led to conjecture any development later than this. Yet such a conjecture we may venture to make, for example, as regards Jesus' freedom of attitude towards the Mosaic law. What he says in Mt. 5 21 f. about murder, or in 5 27 f. about adultery, may be easy enough to reconcile with his declaration that he is not come to destroy the law (5 17); but the case is otherwise with the sayings immediately following, upon divorce (5 31 f. 19 1-9), upon swearing (5 33-37), upon retaliation (5 38-42), upon love of one's enemy (5 43-48), as also upon the laws about foods (Mk. 7 1-23 = Mt. 15 1-20), and about the Sabbath (Mk. 2 23-36 and parallels). If the first-mentioned conservative saying (5 17) is to be held genuine, we must assign it to the first period of the public activity of Jesus. It is in fact quite credible that Jesus, who unquestionably was a pious Jew, at first saw in the Mosaic law the unalterable will of his Father, and regarded the errors of the Pharisees as consisting only in a too external apprehension of it. But it is equally intelligible that in the course of his controversy with them he should have become convinced how many precepts the law in point of fact embodied which were antagonistic to the spirit of religion as it had revealed itself to him. It was one of his greatest achievements that he sacrificed the letter of the law to this and not this to the letter of the law; but we may be sure that it cost him many a hard struggle.

(h) Another point in regard to which we may venture to conjecture some development in Jesus during his public life is his Messiahship. As late as on the occasion of Peter's confession we find him commanding his disciples to keep this a secret (Mk. 8₃₀ Mt. 16₃₀ Lk. 9₂₁). With this it agrees that in Mk., before this date, he applies the designation 'Son of Man' to himself only twice¹ (2₁₀ 28). In Mt., on the contrary, he does so very often, and, besides, the significance of Peter's confession is completely destroyed by 14₃₃, where already all the apostles have been made to declare him to be the Son of God. In Mt., accordingly, this trace of development in Jesus' thinking is obliterated.

(i) It is when the purely religious-ethical utterances of Jesus come under consideration that we are most advantageously placed. Here especially applies the maxim laid down in § 131 (end) that we may accept as credible everything that harmonises with the idea of Jesus which has been derived from what we have called the 'foundation pillars' (§ 139 f.) and is not otherwise open to fatal objection. Even though such utterances may have been liable to Ebionitic heightening, and already, as showing traces of this, cannot lay claim to literal accuracy—even though they may have been unconsciously modified into accord with conditions of the Christian community that arose only at a later date—even though they may have undergone some distortion of their meaning through transference to a connection that does not belong to them—the spirit which speaks in them is quite unmistakable. Here we have a wide field of the wholly credible in which to expatiate, and it would be of unmixed advantage for theology were it to concentrate its strength upon the examination of these sayings, and not attach so much importance to the minute investigation of the other less important details of the gospel history.

IV. AUTHORS AND DATES OF THE GOSPELS AND THEIR MOST IMPORTANT SOURCES.

Evangelion means originally (and still continues to do so in 2 S. 4₁₀) the reward given for a piece of good news, in late classical Greek the good news itself, for which the LXX has the fem. 146. Title of the gospels. (εὐαγγέλια) in 2 S. 18₂₀ 27. For religious tidings we have the verb (εὐαγγελίζεσθαι) in Is. 61₁, cited in Lk. 4₁₈. The NT has the substantive also in this sense. It was a serious error on Origen's part when (ap. Eus. HE vi. 256) he took the Gospel of Lk. to be meant where Paul speaks of 'my Gospel' (Rom. 2₁₆ 2 Tim. 28). In the Didache 15₄ also, evangelion still signifies the substance of the gospel history without reference to the book in which it was written; so too in 8₂, 'the Lord says in his gospel'; so too in Irenæus when he describes the gospel as fourfold (iii. 11₁₁ [8]); so too even in the Muratorian fragment (l. 2: evangelii liber). But here we already find also (l. 17) evangeliorum libri; similarly Justin (§ 76) speaks of the 'memorabilia of the apostles which are called gospels,' and Claudius Apollinaris says in the Chron. Pasch. στασιάζειν δοκεῖ τὰ εὐαγγέλια (cp JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, §§ 42, 54), 'the gospels seem to contradict one another.' Thus it was not till the middle of the second century that the word came to signify a book, and, even after that, till the end of the second century, it continued to bear its original meaning as well. The titles 'Gospel according to Matthew,' 'to Mark,' etc., accordingly do not, linguistically considered, mean 'the written Gospel of Matthew,' etc.; still less, however, 'written Gospel based on communications by Matthew,' as if the very titles conveyed that Matthew, Mark, and the others were not the authors, but only the guarantors for the contents of the books. The inscription means simply 'Gospel history in the form in which Matthew put it into writing.' In Mk. 1₁ the expression 'the Gospel of Jesus Christ' seems already to designate 1 book; but at the same time it teaches us that the writer of these words cannot have set down as title to the whole book the words 'Gospel according to Mark' (εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μάρκον). Thus also in Mt. and Lk. etc. the titles (εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μ., κατὰ Λ.) do not come from the authors. In fact the writings bore no superscription at all.¹ Every one who possessed any book of this sort will have called it 'the gospel' (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον), just as in the case of Marcion the gospel of Lk. which he caused to be used in his congregations was called simply 'gospel' (εὐαγγέλιον). The additions with 'according to' (κατὰ) became necessary at a later date when people began to possess several such books either separately or bound together in one volume. If, therefore, it should prove not to be the case that our gospels were severally written by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, the statements that they were do not arise from falsification on the part of the actual authors, but only from error on the part of the church fathers, such as Papias or the person upon whom he relied.

Besides the statements of Papias (§ 65), at most those only of the church fathers of the close of the second and 147. Statements of the church fathers. referred to in §§ 75-82 can come into consideration here. Howsmall, however, is the confidence that can be placed in the authors of these will at once be evident when it is remembered that Irenæus (and similarly Tertullian, adv. Marc. 42) declares Luke to have committed to writing the Gospel preached by Paul. The details of the life of Jesus had so little interest for Paul that, for example, in 2 Cor. 8₉ in order to induce the Corinthians to contribute liberally to the collection for the poor in Palestine he is able to adduce no other feature in Jesus as a pattern than the fact of his having become man. As his explicit declarations in 2 Cor. 5₁₆ 1 Cor. 1₂₃ Gal. 3₁ tell us, he preached extremely little to his congregations about the earthly life of Jesus. The whole attribution to Paul of the gospel of Lk., which, according to Origen, the apostle even refers to in Rom. 2₁₆ as 'my Gospel' (§ 146), is only an expedient which the church fathers adopted to enable them to assign a quasi-apostolic origin to the work of one who was not himself an apostle.

For this reason suspicion attaches also to the statement that the gospel of Mk. rested upon communications of Peter (§ 148), especially as it is accompanied with an elaborate apology for Mark's undertaking.

The statements of the church fathers, moreover, are not in the least consistent among themselves. According to Irenæus, Matthew wrote his gospel while Peter and Paul were preaching in Rome—thus somewhere in the sixties,—while according to a tradition in Eusebius (HE iii. 246) he wrote it before his departure from Palestine into foreign parts, that is to say, much earlier. Again, according to Irenæus, Mark wrote after the death of Peter and Paul, while according to Clement of Alexandria, Peter lived to see the completion of Mark's gospel. Nay, more,—the two statements as to Peter's attitude to this gospel which Eusebius (HE ii. 15₂ and vi. 146 f.) takes from Clement (§ 80) are in conflict with each other, quite apart from the question whether Clement did not also regard the Gospels that had genealogies as older than those which had not. In short, all that can be said to be certain is this, that it is vain to look to the church fathers for trustworthy information on the subject of the origin of the gospels.

¹ Βίβλος γενέσεως in Mt. 1₁ could, at a subsequent date, be regarded as such after the analogy of Gen. 2₄; after that of Gen. 5₁ it originally referred only to the genealogy of Jesus, Mt. 1₁-17.

According to Papias (see § 65), and also his authority, the second gospel was written by MARK (q. v.). Mark 148. Author of Mk.

There is also an inclination to identify him with the young man who left his garment in the hands of his pursuers in the garden of Gethsemane (Mk. 14^{51 f.}). This conjecture, however, has no value, of course, in the way of proof either that the young man was Mark, or that he was the author of the second gospel; he need only be one of the chief vouchers for its contents. In what Papias says the important point is not so much the statement that Mark wrote the gospel as the further statement that Peter supplied its contents orally. If the student interprets the narratives of the feeding of the five thousand and of the four thousand, of the stilling of the storm, of the walking upon the water, of the withering of the fig-tree, and so forth, in the manner that has been indicated in preceding sections of this article (§§ 137, 140-143), then the supposition that the gospel is essentially a repetition of oral communications by Peter, will at once fall to the ground. But even apart from this, the compass of the entire work is far too short.

It is hardly felicitous to say in reply to this that Mk. repeats so few of the words of Jesus because he was aware that the others were already known through the logia (§ 125*f.*). Why, in that case, then, does he fill some seven of his sixteen chapters with these? As for what Mk. tells us about Peter personally, it certainly is true that the statements concerning him in which Mt. is richer than Mk. (his walking upon the water, 14²⁸⁻³³; the promise given him, 16¹⁷⁻¹⁹; the stater in the fish's mouth, 17²⁴⁻²⁷) can make no claim to historicity. But the statements in which, e. g., Wernle (p. 197) recognises the leading position of Peter (he finds it necessary to add also 'and of the sons of Zebedee'), are found with trifling exceptions in Mt. and Lk. also. Only Mk. 1³⁶ 13³ 16⁷ are wanting in both the others; Mk. 3¹⁶ 5³⁷ is wanting also in Mt. only, and Mk. 14³³ 37 in Lk. only. Peter's leading position in the gospel, in any case corresponds to the actuality. But precisely for this reason the statements regarding it are all the less conclusively shown to be derived from Peter personally.

Whether it was original Mk. that arose in the manner described by Papias will be differently judged according to the various opinions that are held regarding that writing. No answer to a question of this sort, however, can be of any real service to gospel criticism, for we no longer possess original Mk. Should Mark have written in Aramaic then he cannot be held to have been the author of canonical Mk., which is certainly not a translation (see § 130*δ*), nor yet, in view of the LXX quotations which have passed over into all three gospels, can he be held to have been the author of original Mk., but only to have been the author of the source from which the last-named writer drew.

The employment of various sources (amongst others, of Mk., or original Mk.), the characteristic difference of the 149. Author of Mt. and the logia.

135), the incredibilities of the contents (§§ 108, 137), the introduction of later conditions (§ 136), as also the artificial arrangement (§ 133*a*), and so forth, have long since led to the conclusion that for the authorship of the First Gospel the apostle Matthew must be given up.

All the more strenuously is the effort made to preserve for Matthew the authorship of the logia. From the contents it is clear that one must assign to the logia many things which no ear-witness can have heard from the mouth of Jesus. This is the case even if only discourses (for examples, see § 136 and also § 150) are sought in the logia, or if it is assumed that the legalistic and Jewish-particularistic passages were first introduced in the course of a revision (§ 129*e*). If one derives most of the narratives also from the logia, the considerations against their apostolic origin already adduced in § 148 became still more cogent. That the apostle Matthew should have been the author of a still older writing is not excluded. On this supposition the statement of Papias—that he wrote in Aramaic—becomes also possible, which cannot be said of the logia according to § 130*a*. But there remains this difficulty, that according to the prologue of Lk. no eye-witnesses of the life of Jesus took pen in hand—none at least appear to have produced any writing which Lk. would have called a 'narrative' (διήγησις) (§ 153, n. 2).

In Mt. 5^{21 f.} the Jewish judicial procedure is still presupposed; in 5^{23 f.} the sacrificial system; and in 150. Date of logia.

5³⁵ Jerusalem is referred to as still a city while in Jas. 5¹² the swearing by Jerusalem is significantly omitted; it was certainly no longer in existence then. While it is not practicable to prove by means of these passages that Mt. was composed before 70 A. D. (see § 151), they strongly tend to establish that earlier date for the logia.

Mt. 23³⁵ is in the highest degree remarkable. Zachariah the son of Berechiah is the well-known prophet of the OT, who did not suffer martyrdom. But, according to 2 Ch. 24^{20 f.}, Zachariah the son of Jehoiada did so suffer. This was about 750 B. C., so that he certainly cannot be called the last martyr, and least of all can he be so called merely because Chronicles is the last book in the OT. From Josephus (J/ iv. 5. 4, § 343) we learn that in the year 68 A. D. Zachariah the son of Baruch (Niese; Βαρεῖς, Βαρουχου, Βαρισκαίου) was put to death ἐν μέσῳ τῶ ἱερῷ. The conjecture is a very obvious one that the author had this event in his mind. If it be correct, the date of composition will have to be placed considerably later than 68 A. D., as the writer could not, very shortly after this event, easily have confounded this Zachariah with some other who had lived before, or in, the time of Jesus. It must not be overlooked, however, that according to || Lk. 11 49-51 the source of this narrative is the Sophia of God, that is to say, according to the most probable conjecture, a book distinct from the logia which either bore on its title the words 'Wisdom of God' or introduced the Wisdom of God as speaking. It is doubtful therefore whether the passage is to be assigned to the logia.

For the earliest instance in which a passage is quoted which now is to be found in our canonical Mt. (Epistle of Barnabas) see § 89. It is not permissible to infer a date earlier than 70 A. D. either from the 'straightway' (εὐθέως) which Mt. 24²⁹ has retained from the 'little Apocalypse' (see §§ 111, 124*δ*) or from the other indicia adduced in § 150. In Mt. 22⁷ the destruction of Jerusalem is clearly presupposed as already past (see § 112*δ*). The church-conditions also, as well as the postponement of the parusia (see §§ 136, 112*e*), point to a later date. It is not practicable to separate these passages as later interpolations, and thus gain for the Gospel as a whole the earlier date. They are much too numerous, and many of them—as, for example, precisely 226*f.*—much too closely implicated with a tendency which pervades the entire work (§ 112*ab*). On the other hand, it is quite open to us to regard some of them as interpolations: for example, 16¹⁷⁻¹⁹, or the baptismal formula 28¹⁹, or the appearance of Jesus to the women 28^{9 f.}, or also chaps. 1*f.* Substantially, these are the leading passages on account of which many are disposed to bring down the date of the entire gospel as late as to 130 A. D. The fact that it was used, as well as Mk. and Lk., by the author of the Fourth Gospel would not forbid this late date (see JOHN, SON OF ZEBEDEE, §§ 49-52). Probably, however, its main contents must have been in existence at an earlier period if they were known to Lk. (§§ 127, 153), and even the most of chaps. 1*f.* is presupposed to have been in existence if it can be shown that in 119 A. D. a final addition was introduced into it. This has been suggested as regards the story of the Magi: a Syriac writing, ascribed to Eusebius of Cæsarea, which was published by William Wright in the Journal of Sacred Literature, 1866, pp. 117*ff.* and discussed by Nestle¹ and Hilgenfeld in ZWT, 93, 1, pp. 435-438, and '95, pp. 447-451, makes the statement, which can hardly have been invented, that this narrative, committed to writing in the interior of Persia, was in

151. Date of canonical Mt.

119 A.D., during the episcopate of Xystus of Rome, made search for, discovered, and written in the language of those who were interested in it (that is to say, in Greek).

As regards canonical Mk. we possess a datum for fixing its date only if we assume it to have been the

152. Date of canonical Mk. book that was used by Mt. and Lk. If we find ourselves unable to do this it is open to us to suppose that it may have received its final form later than Mt. and Lk. It is not, however, justifiable to find a proof of this in the fact that in 1r it designates the public appearance of the Baptist as the beginning of the gospel of Jesus. Some scholars have detected here a silent polemic against those gospels which begin with the narratives relating to the nativity of Jesus. The significant avoidance of the 'straightway' (εὐθέως) of Mt. 24.29 in Mk. 13.24 (§ 113) certainly points clearly to the period after the destruction of Jerusalem. On Mk. 16.9-20, see § 138 g.

If Luke, the companion of Paul, cannot have been the author of Acts (see ACTS, §§ 9 15), neither can he have been the author of the Third Gospel.

153. Author and date of Lk. That both works are from the same pen may be regarded as quite certain. The weightiest evidences of the employment of Josephus by Lk. are seen in Acts (see ACTS, § 16); yet tolerably many are found in the gospel also. In that case the year 100 A.D. will be the superior, and somewhere about 110 A.D. the inferior, limit of the date of its composition, since there must have been a considerable interval between the production of the gospel and that of Acts. The very precise description of the destruction of Jerusalem in Lk. 19.43 f. 21.11 20-24 is in full accord with history and, in language, with Josephus. It cannot exactly be pronounced absolutely impossible that it should nevertheless have been written before 70 A.D., for a lively imagination acquainted with the localities could hardly have presented them very differently. Only, the prediction of the 'little Apocalypse' (§ 124 b) which is still rightly interpreted in Mt. and Mk. in accordance with Daniel (see DANIEL, ii.) as referring to the setting up of a foreign image in the temple has been made by Lk., wrongly yet very skillfully, in accordance with the expression ἐρημωσις,¹ to refer to the destruction of Jerusalem (21.20). Upon this event, he says, will follow (v. 24) the times of the Gentiles (§ 111) during which Jerusalem is to be trodden under foot. Not till after these times are the signs in heaven to appear and the Son of Man to come with clouds (vv. 25-27), and not till this point does he promise to the followers of Christ their redemption and the coming of the Kingdom of God (vv. 28 31). Had Lk. written before the destruction of Jerusalem we might have expected him to have thought of this event as connected with the second coming of Jesus. That instead of this he should represent the judgment day (v. 22) and the beginning of the kingdom of God as being separated by so long an interval is, as compared with all prophecy and apocalyptic, something quite new and admits of only one explanation—that the destruction of Jerusalem could at the time of writing be no longer regarded as a recent event.

In his prologue Lk. distinguishes himself not only from the eye-witnesses of the life of Jesus but also from the many who before him had written comprehensive gospels,² and from the number of these, he again seems to exclude the eye-witnesses.

² The verb ἀνατάξασθαι (EV 'set forth in order') denotes (both in itself, and because, by the words 'also to me' [καμοί], Lk. applies it also to his own performance) the composition of a com-

Lk. makes a quite clear division: the eye-witnesses have handed down (παρέδοσαν), and that by word of mouth, otherwise no purpose would have been served by adding to 'eye-witnesses' (αὐτόπται) the further predicate 'ministers of the word' (ὑπηρέται τοῦ λόγου); others have composed gospel writings; and Lk. seeks to excel these last by accurate research (or by taking up the narrative from an earlier point) and by correct arrangement. That he himself had direct intercourse with eye-witnesses is therefore not very probable, and it is not at all expressed by the word (12), 'they delivered them unto us which from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word,' for immediately before he speaks of 'the things which have been fulfilled among us,' a phrase by which he obviously cannot mean himself and his contemporaries, but only Christendom generally; similarly therefore in v. 2. Cp §§ 37 64.

The discussion of the dates of the gospel yields, it will be seen, but few definite results. We have deliberately refrained from making use of certain arguments which could be more or less easily applied otherwise. All the more would we emphasise the proposition, that our uncertainty on the chronological question by no means carries with it any uncertainty in the judgment we are to form of the gospels themselves. The chronological question is in this instance a very subordinate one. Indeed, even if our gospels could be shown to have been written from 50 A.D. onwards, or even earlier, we should not be under any necessity to withdraw our conclusions as to their contents; we should, on the contrary, only have to say that the indubitable transformation in the original tradition had taken place much more rapidly than one might have been ready to suppose. The credibility of the gospel history cannot be established by an earlier dating of the gospels themselves in any higher degree than that in which it has already been shown to exist, especially as we know that even in the lifetime of Jesus miracles of every sort were attributed to him in the most confident manner. But as the transformation has departed so far from the genuine tradition, it is only in the interest of a better understanding and of a more reasonable appreciation of the process that one should claim for its working out a considerable period of time.

154. Conclusion. By way of appendix a few words must be said here on the question, postponed from AΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ (§ 26, 1) this place, as to whether the gospel of the Hebrews is to be reckoned among the sources of the synoptics. According to the church fathers this gospel was the Hebrew or Aramaic form of canonical Mt. If this were correct, it would not have been necessary for Jerome to make a separate translation of it. According to Nicholson (The Gospel according to the Hebrews, '79) it was a later Hebrew edition of the gospel of Mt., issued after the Greek had already been published by Matthew himself. Since Lessing's time (§ 117) it has often been regarded—especially in the Tübingen school—as one of the sources, or even as the most ancient, or even as the only, source of our synoptics. Handmann, again (Hebräer-evangelium in Texte u. Untersuch. 5.3, '88), identifies it with the logia. That it may have been, in some older form, one of the sources of the Synoptics cannot be contradicted; but neither can it be proved, for we no longer possess the older form. Among the fragments preserved to us there are only a few which are not open to challenge on the score of their late date. Many on the other hand are unquestionably late legends; e.g., James, the brother of Jesus, swore at the last supper (where according to our evangelists he cannot even have been present) to eat nothing till he should have beheld Jesus after his resurrection; Jesus accordingly appeared in the first instance to him, brought bread, broke it, and gave it to him. Or, again, at the death of Jesus the superliminare or lintel of the temple was broken. Or, Jesus is reported to have said: 'even now has my mother, the Holy Spirit, seized me by one of my hairs and borne me to the great mountain Tabor and more of the like.

It is almost universally conceded that the fragments of the so-called gospel of the Ebionites can claim antiquity in a much less degree still than can the gospel of the Hebrews to which it is related.

(a) Other uncanonical gospel-fragments.—The so-called logia of Jesus found at Oxyrhynchus, first published by Grenfell and Hunt.

These contain, besides an (almost) verbatim repetition of Lk. 6.42, sentences which go far beyond the Johannine theology, and have absolutely nothing analogous to them in the canonical gospels. It would be

156. Other uncanonical gospel fragments. a great error to see in them a portion of the logia of Mt. But the hypothesis also that they are excerpts from the gospel of the Egyptians, has its strongest support only in the fact that according to accounts this gospel itself was of an equally mixed character. Moreover, the identification cannot be made out, were it only for this reason—that we cannot know whether these seven or eight sayings were excerpted wholly from one book, or whether they were compiled from a variety of sources. For, in fact, the principle on which such a heterogeneous variety of sayings has been brought together is quite obscure to us (cp § 86).

(b) Jacoby (Ein neues Evangelienfragment, 1900) has published a Coptic fragment which, amongst other things, touches upon the scene in Gethsemane.

In character this is the same mixture of Synoptic and Johannine or even supra-Johannine ideas as has been observed in the Oxyrhynchus logia. Its derivation from the gospel of the Egyptians is just as questionable as is that of those logia. If then we read in it—what, according to the connection, it can hardly be doubted, notwithstanding the fragmentary character of the piece, we ought to read—that Jesus used the words, 'The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak,' with reference to himself and not with reference to the disciples, and if we should feel inclined to regard this as the more original application,¹ we must not do so merely on account of the source in which we find it.

(c) The case is quite similar with the gospel according to Peter (see PETER).

(d) The fragment, first published by Bickell in the Ztschr. f. Kath. Theol., 1885, pp. 498-504, which has been dealt with by (amongst others) Harnack (Texte u. Untersuch. 54, pp. 481-497) and Resch (ib. 102; pp. 28-34, 322-327).

This fragment contains in a somewhat divergent form the prediction of Jesus that all his disciples would be offended in him and that Peter would deny him, mentioning also that the cock crowed twice; it agrees most strongly with Mk. 14.26-30 but also with Mt. 26.31 by the words 'in this night,' since these words in Mk. do not occur in v. 27 but only in v. 30. That we have here before us a pre-canonical form of the text cannot be proved with certainty from the divergences in individual words. A stronger argument is supplied by the fact that in the present fragment v. 28 of Mk. (= v. 32 of Mt.) is wanting—a verse which has long been recognised as disturbing the connection: 'After I am risen again I will go before you into Galilee.' At the same time, we must not forget that it may have been omitted precisely for this reason, if we are dealing with a free excerpt. Neither does this fragment, then, supply us with an irrefragable proof for the existence of written sources for our gospels.

(e) The so-called dicta Jesu agrapha, that is to say, sayings of his which are not met with in the gospels, have been collected with great care by Resch in Texte u. Untersuch. 54, 89.

Resch's judgment of these, his readiness to recognise genuine sayings of Jesus preserved even in the latest church fathers, and his employment of these for his Hebrew original gospel (§ 117) have, however, met with very just criticism in the same series (142) at the hands of Ropes (Die Sprache Jesu, die in den kanonischen Evangelien nicht überliefert sind, 96). At the same time Ropes himself in accepting so many as fourteen sayings as probably genuine has perhaps gone too far. A somewhat richer selection, but without pronouncing any judgment as to their genuineness, is given by Nestle in Novi Testamenti supplementum, '96, pp. 89-92, where, besides a collation of Codex D, the extra-canonical fragments as a whole will be found very conveniently brought together.

GOTHOLIAS (γοθολίαι [BA], -ονίαι [L]), 1 Esd. 8₃₃ = Ezra 8₇, ATHALIAH, 3.

GOTHONIEL (γοθονίαι [BA], -ονίαι [L]), 1 Esd. 8₃₃ = Ezra 8₇, ATHALIAH, 3. The name is identical with OTHNIEL (וֹתְנִיֵּל).

GOURD (קִרְבִּי; ΚΟΛΟΚΥΝΘΑ [BAQ²]; Jon. 4₆, -NTH [AQ* bis]; 7, -NTAN [A]; 9, -NTH [AQ²]; 10, -NTHC [AQ*†]), rather, as AV^{mg}, 'palm-crist,' RV^{mg}, 'Palma Christi'—i.e. the castor-oil tree, Ricinus communis, L.

The rendering 'gourd' is that of G and Pesh.; Sym. and Vg. render 'ivy'; but Jerome's remarks in his commentary (quoted Ges. Theo. 1214) point to the ricinus. Aq. and Theod. transliterate.

The Hebrew word (קִרְבִּי) seems to be identical with, or derived from klki, which, according to Herod. 2₉₄ Plin. 15₇, was the Egyptian name of the castor-oil plant, the κροτόν or κρότων of the Greeks. This plant, which 'in France, Germany, and the south of England, is an annual herb of noble foliage, growing to a height of 4 or 5 feet,' becomes 'in the Azores, and the warmer Mediterranean countries, as Algeria, Egypt, Greece, and the Riviera, . . . a small tree, 10 to 15 feet high' (Flück. and Hanb.⁽²⁾ 567). Its rapid growth (de C. Orig. 341) and the effective shade given by its large leaves, support its identification with the κρότων.

On the other hand, in favour of the rendering 'gourd' or the like, a statement of Kazwini (2₃₀₉) may be noted (see also JONAH, BOOK OF, § 5).

Speaking of Mōsul, Kazwini describes the custom of making tents of reeds (on the shores of the Tigris, in which the inhabitants pass the summer nights, when the water is becoming low. As soon as the earth, where the tents are, has become dry enough, they sow gourds, which quickly spring up and climb round the tents (G. Jacob, Allarabische Parallelen, 17 f.).

EV^{mg}. proposes 'gourds' for קִרְבִּי in 1 K. 6₁₈ (BL om.; ἐναστῆσεις [A]); it should also stand for β in 7₂₄ (ἐπιστηρίγματα [BAL], om. in clause β) (EV 'knops,' in the former verse they have mg. 'gourds'). The word is commonly explained 'gourd-shaped ornaments'; but though the form of the colocynth (see next article) would suggest a graceful decoration, there is too much uncertainty about the text (see Klo.) to permit us to acquiesce in this explanation. Cp TEMPLE and SEA (BRAZEN). N. M.

GOURDS, WILD (קִרְבִּי עֵץ; ΤΟΛΥΠΗ ΔΡΥΙΑ [BL]; om. ΔΡΥΙΑ¹ [A]), 2 K. 4₃₉†. EV agrees with the ancient versions and tradition. The kindred Ar. fukki denotes the 'colocynth'² (Dozy); and although the etymological connection with the root qrb, which has the sense of splitting or bursting, is not quite clear, it may be explained by the tendency of the ripe fruit to split when touched, or even of its own accord (see below).³

The fruit intended may be (1) the 'colocynth' or 'bitter apple'; the fruit of Citrullus Colocynthis, Schrad., 'a slender scabrous plant with a perennial root, native of warm and dry regions in the Old World, over which it has an extensive area.' Its fruit is 'a gourd of the size and shape of an orange, having a smooth, marbled-green surface.' The pulp of which it consists 'is nearly inodorous, but has an intensely bitter taste' (Flück. and Hanb.⁽²⁾ 295). (2) The 'squirting cucumber,' yielded by Ecballium elaterium, A. Rich., a plant which is common throughout the Mediterranean region and was known to the ancients as the 'wild cucumber.'⁴ It has a peculiarity which might be connected with the etymology of pakku'ah:—'the fruit when ripe separates suddenly from the stalk, and at the same moment the seeds and juice are forcibly expelled from the aperture left by the detached peduncle.' Tristram (Smith's DB⁽²⁾, s.v.; NHB, 451) thinks that the details in 2 K. 4₃₉

² Its more ordinary meaning, however, is 'mushrooms.'

³ Others explain it by reference to medicinal effects. So Riehm, HWB⁽²⁾.

⁴ A kindred species was named by Linnæus Cucumis prophetarum.

point clearly to the colocynth. 'The squirting cucumber is not so bitter, nor does it bear the same resemblance to the good fruit.' It is also common everywhere and should have been at once recognised. One who came to Gilgal from another part, however, might mistake the colocynth for the wholesome globe cucumber, because it only grows on barren sands like those near Gilgal and round the Dead Sea. But was the Gilgal of the narrative the famous one near Jericho? Buhl thinks otherwise (see GILGAL, § 4).

At any rate, the fact that the plant on which the pakku'oh grew is described as a 'wild vine' is against the identification with (3) Momordica elaterium, which is 'a coarse, hispid, fleshy, decumbent plant without tendrils' (Flück. and Hanb.⁽²⁾ 292).

Both (1) and (2) are extremely bitter; and the fact that the taste instantly suggested poison (2 K. 4₄₀) is another example of the close association of the ideas of bitterness and poison in the Hebrew mind (cp GALL).

Until the institution of the monarchy the B'ne Israel represented the stage of political organisation that we are

1. Israel's nomadic origin. This type of constitution is not peculiar to Israel. It is to be found amongst the most diverse peoples at a certain stage of civilisation. The OT records, however, belong for the most part to a much later age, and supply us only with an imperfect and even (in many points) misleading picture of the real nature of the old tribal life. Hence in trying to ascertain what the actual conditions really were, we are compelled to turn to what we know of such life amongst other peoples, especially the pre-Islamic Arabs and the modern Bedouins. We must suppose that similar conditions at one time prevailed amongst the Hebrews. The justification of this inference lies in the essential identity of the external conditions that called forth the tribal organisation amongst the ancient Hebrews and Arabs and have held the Bedouins to this very day at this stage of political development, namely, the nomadic life of the steppes.

Hebrew, like Arabic tradition, in the form it has reached us, has reduced the mutual relations of the tribes to a fixed system in genealogical theory, common to the Hebrews and the Arabs, that the tribe is an expanded family. See GENEALOGIES i., § 2.

This conception has a certain amount of foundation in fact. The bond that holds together the family or the clan is not any form of political organisation; it is the feeling of consanguinity. For the ancient Semite, blood-relationship was the only basis on which a stable society and absolutely binding duties could rest.

This appears most clearly in the fact that alliances with strangers, and obligations towards them, did not acquire inviolability till the lacking blood-relationship had been artificially produced (see KINSHIP, § 1).

We must not, however, follow the old genealogists and at once infer from this feeling of blood-relationship,

2. Theory of genealogists. Such systems rest on the theory, common to the Hebrews and the Arabs, that the tribe is an expanded family. See GENEALOGIES i., § 2.

3. Early idea of kinship. Not to speak of the numerous traces which indicate that amongst the Hebrews, as amongst the Arabs, descent was in the earliest times reckoned not from the father but from the mother (matriarchate; see KINSHIP, § 4), it is clear enough that the feeling of community of blood was not quite the same thing with the ancient Semites as sense of relationship is with us. The latter varies according to the degree of nearness; in the case of the Semite, on the other hand, community of blood knew, theoretically at least, no such thing as degree. A man who belonged to a given kindred group was connected equally with all its members, irrespective of degree of relationship (see KINSHIP, § 2). Moreover, this blood-kinship can be artificially brought about by blood-covenant between persons belonging originally to alien groups.

This representation must not, however, be pressed too far. In practice, at least in historical times, it is the narrower circle of closer kindred that has been most intimately bound together by unity of blood.

Within the larger tribes the several families and clans frequently constituted closely united groups, carrying on blood-feuds amongst each other—a proof how naturally the feeling of unity of blood became weaker in the larger groups. Robertson Smith cites cases (Kin. 159) that show how the feeling of kinship bound together families of alien stock. We may adduce also the line in the Hawāsa (367): 'Ally thyself with whom thou wilt in peace, yet know: In war must every man be foe who is not kin.' Amongst the Hebrews, moreover, the blood-feud, as we meet it in the OT, was confined to the limits of the family—i.e. the nearest relatives.

In this emergence of relationship by descent, indeed, Robertson Smith sees the decay of the ancient tribal system (Kin. 52, 57, 160). He regards it as the first appearance of a new principle, quite foreign to the original tribal organisation.

We must leave this an open question. We cannot here enter into the problem how the Semitic families and clans were constituted in the earliest times before the various Semitic peoples separated from each other. It is indeed a question that in our opinion cannot yet be answered with certainty.

Although kinship by descent through the father played in historical times a great part, the records show that even then there were also other factors in the formation of the tribes.

4. Aggregation of families, etc.

The Hebrew tribes, like the larger Arabian tribes, were not simple but composite, comprising several kindred groups.

These groups are commonly called in the OT mišpāhōth (מִשְׁפָּחָה) 'clans,' though an older designation, which at a later time fell into disuse, seems to have been hai (הַי), the commonest term in Arabic. (Cp Kin. 39 f.; Nöld. ZDMG 40 176; 1 S. 1818 according to We. TBS p. iii, and Dr. TBS 119; 2 S. 23 13; also preserved according to Nöld., l.c., in יְהוּדָה וְיִזְרְעֵל; see HAVVOTH-JAIR.)

We must indeed admit the possibility with Nöldcke (ZDMG 40 158 [86]), that in the case of these 'clans' the families that formed the nucleus were often really descended from a common ancestor whose name they bore. Even in this case, however, it remains true that the family did not grow simply by the natural process of marriage and birth.

It grew also by accession from without. Slaves were acquired; freedmen remained as clients of the family of their master; individual strangers, cut loose for some reason or other from their own clan, sought refuge in the family; poor and weak families attached themselves for the same reason to the more powerful. These all reckoned themselves as belonging to the family of their adoption and bore its name.

In order to understand this process one must realise how, amid the endless feuds of the desert, it was only the man or the family supported by a powerful group of kinsmen, ready to avenge an injury, that was safe. This insecurity also made necessary a certain amount of cohesion. The individual was no doubt at liberty in time of peace to sever himself from his clan; but as he went farther away from it his security proportionally diminished, unless he obtained admission as a sojourner in some other clan. Thus it is the dwelling together and roaming together, rather than the common descent, that is the characteristic feature of these 'kindred groups.' 'The Hai is the community of people that live and travel together' (Nöld. ZDMG 40 176; WRS Kin. 38).

The same process is repeated in the formation of tribes. The instinct of self-preservation drives the clans into closer association. It is plain that here also local contiguity must have been an important factor in forming tribes; clans that were in the habit of meeting on adjoining pasture lands and at common wells were by that very circumstance bound together by a certain community of interests (cp ISRAEL, § 8).

5. New tribes.

It is not the case, as is frequently supposed, that the Bedouin tribes roam at large over the entire Arabian wilderness; on the contrary, now, just as in ancient times, each one has its own definite territory with the pasture lands and wells belonging to it, and the proprietary rights of the tribe over such territory are jealously guarded against the encroachments of other tribes.

Many other causes contribute to the formation of a tribe, and produce a constantly shifting result; new tribes arise, old ones disappear. Mutual jealousy and feuds, migrations, the disuniting influences of war, and other circumstances, may result in the separation of a clan from the main body. This almost necessarily happens as soon as a tribe has become very strong or extended itself over a wide area. Should a subordinate tribe in these circumstances succeed in asserting itself without becoming incorporated with a foreign tribe,—should it, for example, have grown by attaching other clans to itself,—it then, in course of time, forms a new tribe which assumes a new tribal name (after that of a prominent family, one of its leaders, or the like). Legend next comes in, and soon gives it a patriarch, the original bearer of the name, and the connection of the new tribe with the old also finds some expression here, the heros eponymus of the tribe being brought into some sort of relationship (usually that of a son) with the patriarch of the older tribe.

In other cases tribes have arisen out of alliances that originally were only of a temporary character. In the

6. Alliances. tribal history of Arabia, such federations (called hilf) play a prominent part (Goldziher, Muh. Stud. 16 ff.). Sections of a larger tribe enter into closer relations with one another or with outside clans; whole tribes form treaties with one another, and sometimes even these federated groups in turn form connections with other similar groups. Such alliances do not arise out of considerations of kinship; they are determined by the daily exigencies of offence and defence, and, in particular, by the necessity felt by the weaker of seeking support from the stronger, the instinct of groups, weak in themselves, to attain the strength that comes of union.

In many cases the alliances are formed for particular and definite ends, as for example for the sake of a common blood-revenge. Their formation is often inaugurated in a very solemn way,—as with sacrifices, oaths, and the special ceremonies connected with blood-brotherhood (see KINSHIP, § 1). Sometimes they are quickly dissolved again after their immediate object has been gained; but sometimes also the temporary becomes a permanent relationship; the component parts become completely fused, and the group naturally takes a new collective name by which the old and proper names of the individual elements are often driven completely into the background. Thus the formation of new tribes is a process that is related on the other side to the seeming or real decay of old ones.

Clearly, the process is capable of taking place in a very great variety of ways, and it would be quite a mistake to try to explain them all in accordance with a single scheme.

7. Terminology. In the continual process of modification it cannot surprise us to find in Hebrew (as we do in Arabic) tradition that the most contradictory statements are made as to the relation of the clans to the great tribes.

Finally, it results from what has been said that the words 'tribe' and 'clan' (subordinate tribe) are used only relatively; they express nothing as to size.

A tribe may, if numbers be regarded, fall below the strength of a clan, and yet at the same time, if it remains independent, it will continue to bear the designation of tribe. Thus in the OT Dan is at one time spoken of as a tribe (דָּן, Sēbhet) at another as a clan (דָּנָי, mišpāhah); cp, e.g., Josh. 19 40 Judg. 18 11 ff. In Arabic phraseology the change in the use of the words is much more strongly marked (cp Nöld. ZDMG 40 175 ff.); in Hebrew tradition the relative persistency with which either word is used is a result of the arbitrary limitation of the application of the word דָּנָי to twelve (or thirteen)¹ tribes.

For a full comprehension of the tribal system it must further be observed that these social unities (family, clan, tribe) are at the same time religious unities. Not only among the Semites, but also among the Greeks and Romans, it was their common worship that marked the clans and beld them together. This is not the place to discuss the many (still disputed) questions as to the nature and character of the tribal gods among the Semites. However these questions may be decided, there remains the fact that 'the original religious society was the kindred group, and all the duties of kinship were part of religion' (WRS Rel. Sem. 47). Community of blood between man and man derives its absolutely uniting character precisely from this, that it is at the same time a real community with the divinity.

The tribal god stands in just the same relationship of blood-community with his worshippers, the members of the clan. Every sacrifice seals anew this mystic oneness of the members with each other and with the deity.

Where a person of alien blood is received by blood-covenant (see above, §§ 2, 6, and cp KINSHIP, § 1) into clan-fellowship, he is at the same time by the covenant-sacrifice received into blood-fellowship with the deity. Every violation of the duties of blood-community thus becomes a crime against the deity.¹

The tribal constitution is excellently adapted for the steppe and for nomads. Its importance here lies in

9. Flexibility. this, that, on the one hand, it allows the necessary freedom of movement to the individual and the smaller aggregates (family and kindred), whilst at the same time it creates a certain natural social unity which satisfies the demands and necessities of the nomadic life. In the wilderness no great tasks present themselves, such as demand the strength of a whole people. What the individual, and the group of kinsmen, require, in this state of universal war, is some protection for life; and this is guaranteed by belonging to a clan. For blood-revenge and mutual help in war are the most sacred duties of those who are united by community of blood. Conversely, the individual who has been expelled from his tribe is a wanderer and a vagabond so long as he has failed to gain admission to some other clan. It is this that gives its power to tribal custom and law, a power from which none can shake himself free. On the other hand the freedom of the individual and of the separate clans is tolerably unrestricted in times of peace. The organisation of the tribe exists only for purposes of war and of migration; it is only in these conditions that the sheikh has any say and any command; in times of peace his authority is purely a moral one: it reaches just so far as the influence he has been able to acquire by his personal qualities can carry it. He can only advise, not command. In a dispute he can, doubtless, give a decision; but he has no power to execute his judgment if those affected by it refuse to submit to it; he can neither declare war nor conclude peace, neither pitch the camp nor break it up, until the leading men of the tribe have been consulted.² In a tribe of those related by blood all the individual members are 'brothers,' and thus on a footing of equality; there is no such thing as permanent authority or subjection, for even the Roman patria potestas was unknown among the Semites. The freedom of individuals and of clans reaches so far that in time of peace they can separate from the main camp without any ceremony and go their own way, if only they have strength enough to give the feeling of security. It is in this, as Goldziher (Muh. Stud. 168) and Wellhausen (JG 24 f.) have rightly pointed out, that the moral importance of the tribal constitution lies. In proportion as the feeling of kinship becomes weaker when set against the wider tribal bonds, in the enjoyment of such freedom, its place is taken by that public spirit which acts freely and is capable of making sacrifices for the public good. Fidelity to covenant obligations extending beyond the narrow bounds of kin is reckoned by the Arabs among the higher virtues.

It is in the way we have indicated that we must picture to ourselves the condition of the Israelite tribes before their migration into Palestine. With them, too, family and clan were originally a community of worship, held together by common ancestral cults. Many of the old and famous sanctuaries appear to have owed their position as such to their being regarded as the burial places of heroes. There was a sacred stone at the tomb of Rachel (Gen. 35²⁰); Ahraham, Isaac, and Jacob were buried at Hebron (Gen. 25⁹ 35²⁹ 50¹³), Joseph in Shechem (Josh. 24³² Dt. 11³⁰), Miriam at Kadesh-barnea (Nu. 20¹), and Deborah under the sacred tree of Bethel, Gen. 35⁸ (see the several articles).

Within historical times we have one recorded instance of clan worship—none the less convincing that it is the only one—in 1 S. 20⁵ ff., where David excuses his absence from Saul's table at 11. Traces of clan cults. new moon on the ground that his clan are celebrating their yearly festival at this season—an excuse which is regarded as perfectly adequate. In like manner we may take clan worship to be presupposed in the question with which the Danites seek to induce Micah the Levite to accompany them; 'is it better for thee to be priest unto the house of one man, or to be priest unto a tribe and a family in Israel?' (Judg. 18¹⁹).

How far the tribes, which afterwards constituted the people Israel, had already been welded into one before the settlement is a more difficult question.

12. Uniting of tribes. That they were firmly knit together as a people and felt themselves to be so, as is assumed in the OT tradition, is refuted by the simple fact that even after the immigration, during the so-called period of the Judges, such a people, with an ordered government and the like, did not exist (cp ISRAEL, § 7).

It is now universally recognised that the Judges were not rulers of the whole people but only heroes of particular tribes. Neither does the manner in which the immigration took place—gradually, by tribes and clans—show any evidence of a unified organisation.

All this by no means excludes, however, as Winckler (GI 14 ff. 21 ff.) and others suppose, every sort of connection between the immigrating tribes. On the contrary, the analogy of the Arab tribal history makes it in every way possible and probable that those tribes which had a point of contact and common meeting-place at the oasis of Kadesh (see KADESH, 1) may, on one occasion or another, have entered into a solemn covenant, after the manner referred to above as practised by the Arabs (cp COVENANT, § 4). The covenant-sacrifice in Ex. 24¹ ff. exactly recalls the ceremonies elsewhere practised on such occasions. The adoption, by the tribes, of a common worship, the service of Yahwé, gave to the alliance an enduring character still more than solemn oath and sacrifice had done; and the common name, B'ne Israel, assumed by all (perhaps after the name of the strongest of the contracting tribes), was the outward expression of the firmness of the bond. Such a confederation was loose enough to allow of the independent advance of the individual tribes and clans, in the process of the settlement as we now read of it in the sources before us; but just on this account it was firm or elastic enough to survive the various changes within the separate tribes and the reconstructions and readjustments of their mutual relations, which were the inevitable results of the settlement in the territory to the W. of Jordan (see below). What was necessary for its continuance under the altered conditions was not a rigid unity or a strong executive authority, but something quite different, namely, that the common worship of Yahwé, as the god of the B'ne Israel, should already have taken a hold that was deep enough. The Song of Deborah plainly shows that their common worship was the sole bond of unity in those times, but also that it was sufficiently strong; the war of the confederate tribes is a war of Yahwè, and whoever fails to come to their help, in so doing has failed to come to the help of Yahwè (Judg. 5 23). Winckler (GI 134) will have it that the reference to Yahwè in the song ought to be deleted as a later addition. Even so, however, the song bears witness to the subsistence of a confederation of Israelite tribes, to which even the tribes eastward of Jordan belonged. Such a confederation cannot possibly have arisen for the first time after the settlement, for the territories E. and W. of Jordan have no common interests of such a kind as would lead to a junction; on the contrary, the maintenance of intimate relations was always a matter of difficulty, owing to the nature of the respective territories, as is shown by their history. On the other hand, no bond between the eastern and the western tribes, entered into before the settlement, could have survived all the vicissitudes of such a time otherwise than by the intervention of some factor which stood supreme above the divergent political interests. Such a factor was supplied by the common religion. Even, therefore, if their common worship of Yahwè did not manifestly appear in our present sources as being the uniting bond of the confederation, we should still have to postulate such a community of religion in order to explain the continued subsistence of the Israelite tribal union. Hebrew tradition is, therefore, justified in regarding (as it does) the union of the tribes with one another, and their acceptance of the religion of Yahwè as coincident facts, and as both of them having been accomplished by the instrumentality of one and the same person—MOSES (q. v.).

What were the tribes that originally joined in this covenant can only be matter of conjecture. No historical validity can be claimed for the conventional statement of the genealogists, according to which Israel was, from the first, composed of twelve tribes, a number which never afterwards varied (cp GENEALOGIES i., § 5, ISRAEL, § 2). It is possible that, originally, different genealogies may have been kept at different sanctuaries; the present form apparently being, as Stade has pointed out (GI 145 f.), the result of compromise. An ancient tribal list has come down to us in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5), where Ephraim, Machir, Zebulun, Issachar, Reuben, Gilead, Dan, Asher, Naphtali are enumerated. To this list may be added Simeon and Levi (see below). The Kenites also seem to have been an old tribe that had disappeared at an early period (Judg. 1 16 5 24; see KENITES); on the other hand, Judah (and Benjamin), also absent from the Song of Deborah, may have come into existence at a later date. It seems very doubtful whether, from the circumstance that Naphtali, Gad, and Asher figure in the genealogy as sons of concubines, we are entitled to infer that these tribes did not come into the confederation till after the sons of Leah and Benjamin (We. IIG 16). With regard to the tribe of Joseph a further conjecture may perhaps be permissible; if the view that the ark (see ARK, § 10) was originally the sanctuary of Joseph-Ephraim be correct, we may venture to infer that in the federation this tribe, from the first, had in some sense a leading part.

The settlement in Palestine at once brought with it, as a necessary consequence, a series of far-reaching changes in the condition of the tribes.

14. Their diverse fortunes.

Simeon and Levi disappeared from their number; it is probable that they became disintegrated in the course of the struggles of the occupation, and that the fragments that remained were re-ceived into other tribes (cp Gen. 49 5 f., and see SIMEON, LEVI, DIMAH). The case of REUBEN seems to have been similar; in ancient times one of the most powerful of all the tribes (cp Gen. 49 3 f.), it seems to have steadily lost ground. At an early date Eglon of Moab figures as ruler of the Reubenite territory (Judg. 3 2 f.); the list of towns in Nu. 32 34 f. exhibits this same territory largely curtailed, and entirely surrounded by the tribe of Gad; and in the inscription of Mesha the Gadites alone are spoken of as having been masters in these regions.

On the other hand, new formations have to be noted. Perhaps it was only after the settlement that Joseph split up into the two branches of Ephraim and Manasseh (cp Josh. 17 14 f.; but see also above). The case of Gilead may also have been similar (Judg. 5 17 25 f.); its place is subsequently taken invariably by Gad and Eastern Manasseh. Judah, which has not yet come into prominence in the Song of Deborah, first became a great tribe in the reign of David—in all probability, as the result of the coalescence of several minor tribes in the south, such as the Calebites (Nu. 32 12 Josh. 14 6 14), the Kenites (1 S. 27 10; cp Nu. 10 29 f. Judg. 1 16), the Jerahmeelites (1 S. 27 10), and the absorption of the sedentary Canaanite population (Gen. 38). Doubtless, also, the transference of individual clans from one tribe to another, must have been of frequent occurrence. This has already been suggested above, with reference to the surviving portions of Simeon and Levi, and another example is presented by the Kenite clan of Jael, which figures in the Song of Deborah as an isolated fragment in the north (Judg. 5 24; cp 4 17). See the articles on the tribes and clans named.

The most important consequence of the settlement, though it did not manifest itself so immediately, was the complete dissolution of the entire tribal constitution. The form under which the unions of tribes and clans were maintained—the fiction, namely, of a common descent—was kept up, it is true, for a long time, one might almost say, indeed, permanently; but its contents and its significance underwent essential change; once settled on the soil of Palestine the clans and tribes became metamorphosed into local communities and territorial unions (cp ISRAEL, § 8).

15. Tribal displaced by local ties.

It is an inevitable process wherever nomad tribes take to a settled life. Nöldeke adduces instructive examples from the Arabian tribal history (ZDMG 40 183); Caliph Omar found it needful to exhort his Arabs to hold by their genealogies and not to do like the peasants of Irāk, whose answer to the question, 'From whom comest thou?' was 'From such and such a village.' In like manner it was said of the people of Khorāsān: 'Their villages are their genealogies.' What happened in the case of the Israelites was precisely similar.

Families living together in the same place united to form a clan, held together by community of interests. Thus it is that in so many instances place-names and clan-names are identical. Here little question was made as to descent; Canaanite clans were quite readily received into Hebrew clans and genealogies (cp Gen. 38 Judg. 1 27 f. etc.).

With this may be compared the observation of Burckhardt (Nöld. ZDMG 40 183) that all Arabs of the Nejd, settled in Baghdād, belonged to the tribe of 'Okail, whatever their descent might have been. Under such circumstances, even if the old formulas applicable to the clan and the family were transferred to the new local communities, in other words, if the families living in the same locality continued to express the fact of their belonging to one another by alleging descent from a common ancestor, this none the less meant, substantially, the transition from a tribal to a civil constitution.

In the Canaanite communities which had formed themselves around a city as the central point, we already find a species of nobility who were designated by the peasants as maria, 'our lords' (Pietschmann, Gesch. d. Phön. 198).

In the towns, which in process of time peacefully threw open their gates to the Israelites, we may suppose these nobles to have retained their rank and to have shared it with the more prominent Israelite families. The heads of these leading families (not, as under the tribal constitution, the heads of all the clans) constituted the 'lords' or 'elders' of the city (sārim, bē'ālim, zēkēnim; Judg. 8 14). It would seem also that from the first, the villages adjoining the cities stood to these in a relation of subordination. In the old sources frequent mention is made of 'the cities and their villages,' or of 'the cities and their daughters' (Nu. 21 25 32 Josh. 17 11); similarly, a city is occasionally spoken of as a 'mother in Israel' (2 S. 20 19). Even if we must not think of these 'elders' as having, from the first, constituted an organised magistracy, yet the development advanced naturally in that direction; it was necessarily involved in the settlement that the rule of the heads of the communities should tend more and more to organise itself on an assumed basis of legal authority (Ex. 22 28 [27]). In respect of jurisdiction, in particular, the local community had a direct interest in seeing that the judicial findings of its heads were given effect to.

GOVERNMENT

The tribes also gradually came to acquire mainly a territorial significance, just as the clans had done. After

17. Territorial divisions: Tyranni. its union with Caleb and the other tribes of the S. (see above, § 14), Judah was no longer a tribe to be placed in the same category with one of the large Bedouin tribes; it was also a geographical idea—a primitive state, capable of embracing elements of the most diverse kind as long as they were geographically connected.

For an interesting proof of this, see the parenthetic note in 2 S. 42*f.* on the words 'a Beerothite of the children of Benjamin.'¹ Cp also the Deuteronomic phrase 'in all thy gates' (Dt. 16 18), which is parallel to 'throughout thy tribes,' and the use of tribal names as geographical terms—Ephraim, Gilead (in Judg. 10*f.* the two are interchanged), Judah, Gad (2 S. 24 5), etc.

In this process the tribes lost the character they had possessed as communities of blood involving strict obligations. When the separate clans of a tribe settled in separate localities and became amalgamated with the native population, they lost their mutual interdependence. Each had its own interests and went its own way, regardless of the weal or woe of the other. The nature of the country facilitated this parting; and it was further assisted by the circumstance that, even in the time of the monarchy, Canaanite settlements, still maintained themselves sporadically throughout Israelite territory. Henceforth it required unusual firmness and energy to stir even a single tribe, and still more a number of tribes, to concerted movement. The territorial character which the 'tribes' had now assumed shows that the patriarchal leadership of the elders was no longer sufficient; the new circumstances demanded the tyrannis (so to speak) of petty 'kings' such as there had already been among the Canaanites. The so-called 'judges' mark the transition stage. These were, in the first instance, clan chiefs; but some of them (among whom JEPHTHAH and GIDEON [q. v.] still live in the fragments of tradition) succeeded in becoming tribal kings. Israel was now, perhaps, in a fair way to fall asunder into petty 'kingdoms.'

How this fate was averted and from what causes the transitional period issued in a united kingdom and a

18. The monarchy. united people, is told elsewhere (see ISRAEL, § 10 f.). The practical transformation of the tribes into unions of communities, linked together by identity of local interests, however, did not remove the danger arising from excessive tribal feeling and consequent tribal rivalry. The proof of this is found in grave internal complications in the early regal period. David had good cause for devising some means of neutralizing this danger, and such a means he found in the creation of a very small permanent force (see DAVID, § 11 [a]). Hence, whilst Saul in time of peace was little more than a tribal chief, David, with the aid of his body-guard (gibborim), retained his supremacy even when no danger threatened the land. Saul's simple way of life gave place to an imposing establishment at Jerusalem, and a series of officials supported the king. With a view to regulating the military service and the collection of the revenue, a census of the citizens was taken even in David's time (2 S. 24 1 f.), whilst Solomon, as a further step in advance, divided the whole land into administrative districts, over each of which he set an officer called nissāb (נָסַב; 1 K. 4 7 f.). A division of the northern kingdom into mēdīnōth (מְדִינֹת, 'administrative circuits') is mentioned also in the time of Ahab (1 K. 20 14 f.). It is a noteworthy fact that in the arrangement of his districts Solomon purposely ignored the ancient tribal distinctions (see § 19 and Benzinger on 1 K. 4 7 f.).

The most essential duty of the ruler was then, and ever continued to be, the administration of justice; David,

19. Royal prerogatives. the pattern king, was pre-eminent in this (see DAVID, § 11 f.). In fact, in this age, it was self-evident that the king must be supreme judge. A case was naturally decided by the man who had the power to enforce his decision. Thus the second main element of the power of the old zēkēnim (זִקְנִים) of the clans was taken from them, when every one could go directly or appeal against them to the king (2 S. 15 2 1 K. 3 16 Dt. 17 9, where מַשְׁפָּט, šophēt = 'ruler'—i. e. 'king'). What these lost the officers of the king gained, for they also obtained a share in his jurisdiction and dispensed justice in his name.

¹ See BEEROTH, ISHBAAL, 1, and cp Nöld. ZDMG ('86) 40 183.

According to the notions of the age, it was also self-evident that the king was the priest of highest rank, who represented his people before their God.

Saul and David sacrificed in person (1 S. 14 33 f.; 2 S. 6 13), as indeed at that time every Israelite was at liberty to do. David wore the ephod bad, the priest's gown; it was as priests that David and Solomon blessed the people at great festal gatherings (2 S. 6 18 1 K. 8 14), and it was as Pontifex Maximus that the king was anointed.

Still, on the whole, the priestly character was not as prominent in Israelite kings as, e.g., in Babylonian and Egyptian; they discharged their priestly functions for the most part through the intervention of their officers, the ordinary priests; for such were the priests at the royal sanctuaries (2 S. 20 23 f.).

These priests were appointed and removed by the king at pleasure (2 S. 8 17 1 K. 2 26, etc.); they held office by royal appointment, not by hereditary right. For the royal citadel it was an indispensable requisite that it should contain a sanctuary. It was as such that Solomon built the temple; and, even as late as Ahaz, the king made free with it as private property.

Any other information that we have regarding administrative affairs has to do for the most part with the collection of the revenue, the 20. Fiscal institutions. most important work of oriental princes.

Nothing is told us of Saul in this connection; for the maintenance of his simple establishment on his paternal estate there was needed, in addition to the produce of his own land and the customary share of any war booty, nothing but the voluntary gifts of his subjects who came to do homage or to seek justice and protection (cp 1 S. 16 20).

Under David the forced labour became the special care of an officer of rank, and probably taxation in general was then regulated (2 S. 20 24).

We can hardly be mistaken in connecting the census of 2 S. 24 1 f. with this control of the public works, which is explicitly said to have been the chief object of Solomon's division of the land into districts (1 K. 4 7 f., cp 4 27 [6 7]). If Judah was really exempted from this burden, this was a very significant concession; but the text is corrupt, and Stade (GV 1 300) conjectures that Judah was perhaps mentioned as a thirteenth district (but see Benz. on 1 K. 4 7 f.).

These taxes and forced labours were felt by the people to be an oppressive innovation (1 K. 12 4). As they were the occasion of the secession of the Northern Kingdom, we must suppose that they were there dispensed with at first. For the same reason we can hardly assign a much earlier date to the institution of the king's tithe mentioned in 1 S. 8 15 17 (to which 1 S. 17 25 may also refer) than that of the document, the 'law of the king,' in which it is mentioned. Unfortunately we are told practically nothing of regular taxes, although such were doubtless exacted.

A land tax seems to have been unknown, as Wellhausen rightly concludes from the mention of the introduction of such a tax in Egypt (IJG 86). A property tax is mentioned only once, and then as an exceptional imposition (2 K. 23 35). In such cases of extremity the kings of Judah had recourse to the temple treasures, which they always regarded as lying at their disposal. They also drew an income from crown lands, which they probably rented to trusty subjects (1 S. 8 12). What is thus attested for Judah (Ezek. 45 7 f.), we may assume for Israel as well. 'The king's mowings' (Am. 7 1) probably refer to a contribution in kind from the first mowings in spring intended for the war horses, for the support of which the king was responsible (1 K. 18 5; cp Syr. Röm. Rechtsbuch, ed. Bruns u. Sachau, 121). Certain commodities were, in Solomon's time, a royal monopoly (chariots and horses 1 K. 10 28 f.), and a duty was levied on passing caravans (1 K. 10 15); in certain cases the property of an executed man seems to have been confiscated by the king (1 K. 21 1 f.).

21. Officers. Not much fuller is our information about the royal officers (šārīm, שָׂרִים). The commander-in-chief of the army (šar 'al haššābā, הַצָּבָא (שַׂר עַל הַצָּבָא) and the captain of the royal bodyguard, the gibbōrim, occupied probably the most influential positions. The maskir (מוֹכִיר; EV RECORDER) stands first amongst holders of administrative offices. He is not, as has often been supposed, a state historian, but, as the title shows (מוֹכִיר=one who brings to mind), a kind of chief counsellor and state orator, the Grand Vizier of modern oriental states. By his side was the Secretary of State (sōphēr, סוֹפֵר), charged with the duty of conducting the king's correspondence with foreign princes (see SCRIBE). The chief superintendent of works (at least in Judah; see above) and the priest of highest rank, as already stated, were also high officials in attendance on the king (2 S. 20₂₃ ff.). Later we hear occasionally of a master of the palace (or of the household, מוֹכֵר עַל הַבַּיִת, אֲשֶׁר 'al habbayith, 1 K. 46 2 K. 18:18 Is. 22:15), who, from Is. l.c., appears to have been also called כְּבֵן (sōkhēn, see MINISTER [CHIEF]). Finally we come upon the designation king's servant (עֲבָד הַמֶּלֶךְ) as the title of a high dignitary (2 K. 22:12, also on seals), most plausibly explained by Stade (G VI 1650) as the principal eunuch. Strange to say this official, so high in rank in modern oriental courts, is nowhere mentioned (unless this be he), although in a harem like Solomon's he can hardly have been lacking.

Of other officers of inferior rank, the prefects of the provinces have been mentioned already. Of court officials proper we meet with a cup-bearer (masšēh, מַשְׁכֵּה, 1 K. 10:5), a master of the robes (2 K. 10:22), and others. Chronicles speaks of twelve stewards of the royal treasury under David (1 Ch. 27:25 ff.). Probably among the court servants were also the chamberlains (sārīšim, סָרִישִׁים, 1 K. 22:9 2 K. 8:6 9:32, etc.), an expression which we find later as the designation of the overseer of the harem at the Persian court (Esth. 2:3 4:4 ff.). As such a sārīš is elsewhere called a captain (2 K. 25:19, cp Gen. 37:35 39:1) we can hardly regard the sārīšim in the earlier times as eunuchs. See EUNUCH.

The stage of civilization that had been reached placed great power in the hands of these officers; for in the still quite undeveloped political relations of the time, no attempt was made, except in the case of the chief ministers mentioned above, to define the spheres of the several departments.

In particular there does not yet appear to have been any distinction drawn between administrative and judicial functions, or military and civil authority. The resident officer of state, wherever there was such, combined in his own person, in proportion to the authority committed to him, the functions of commander of the forces, administrator of the province, collector of taxes, and also, and above all, judge (see above, § 18).

The impression left by the description of this bureaucracy given us by the prophets is by no means flattering. It exhibits all through the radical vices characteristic of the oriental official in all ages; towards superiors, the unscrupulous tool of the royal pleasure (cp e.g., 1 K. 12:10 ff. 2 S. 11:14 ff.); towards inferiors, the overbearing, reckless tyrant.

No longer bound to their subjects by the ties of clanship, the governors took advantage of them for their own interests. Venality and partiality in particular characterised high and low alike; all that distinguished the former, the Abners, Joabs, and Jehus, from officers of lower grade, was that their intrigues and violence were on a grander scale.

It was the will of the people that gave Saul and David their authority. Still this does not warrant us

22. The throne. Judah or in Israel, elective. Its hereditary character was really bound up, so to speak, with the royal dignity.

Thus even a Jerubbaal could secure his authority sufficiently to bequeath it to his sons. That Saul never dreamed of any successor but his son Jonathan, may be the kernel of truth in 1 S. 20:30 ff. When the men of Judah set up David against Ishbaal, the rest of Israel regarded it as a revolt against the legitimate heir—a revolt to be suppressed by force of arms (cp e.g., 2 S. 2:10 ff.). Two sons of David, Absalom and Adonijah, successively posed as his successors (2 S. 15:1 ff. 1 K. 1:5 ff.). Solomon, too, reached the throne simply by the will of his father, the people having no say in the plot to set him on the throne. Accordingly the election of Jeroboam by the northern tribes was virtually a fresh revolt against the legitimate dynasty, though it must be admitted that Ephraim and Benjamin had never thoroughly accepted the line of David as legitimate; 'we have no part in David, no inheritance in the son of Jesse'—such had been the rallying cry also on an earlier occasion (2 S. 20:1 ff.); see BENJAMIN, § 7. In the many later revolutions, of which North Israel was the scene, the people had no voice; on the contrary, they retained throughout a passive, not to say an apathetic attitude.

Still, there lay in the popular will an important limitation of the power of the sovereign. One might imagine on reading the so-called 'law of the kingdom' (1 S. 8:10 ff.) that the kings of Israel as a whole were the greatest despots,—men whose power was at the service of every whim and fancy. This picture, however, conformably to the whole tendency of the narrator, who had little fondness for the monarchy, is overdrawn and painted in colours too dark. In reality the state of affairs was quite otherwise. If there is one impression that remains with us more than another it is that the power of the kings lay rather in their personality, and depended on their success in war and their personal weight. Powerful men like David, Solomon, or Jeroboam could allow themselves many liberties that men like Rehoboam could not venture on.

23. Popular voice. Law or constitution defining the mutual rights of king and people there was none (the 'law of the kingdom,' Dt. 17:14-20 is a later growth). Thus in the forms of government in the kingdom of Israel we meet with a singular blending of despotism with elements of democracy.

Saul could massacre the priests of Nob, David could appropriate the wife of Uriah, Solomon could drain the very blood of the nation, Ahab could bring about the judicial murder of Naboth, Jehu and Athaliah could make havoc amongst dangerous adherents of the reigning house; yet these kings had themselves to learn that their caprices were limited by the popular will.

The people did not, like other oriental nations, put up with the atrocities of their rulers as something inevitable. Jehu's massacre was long regarded with universal detestation. The imperiousness with which the public conscience could speak is seen in Nathan's famous reproof of David, and in the action of men like Elijah and Elisha, who spoke for the people as well as for Yahwè (see ISRAEL, § 33 ff., and cp PROPHET).

Disregard for this on the part of Solomon, Ahab, and Athaliah cost them their throne. Nor must we fail to observe how it was that the Deuteronomic Code was rendered a universally binding law-book; not by royal decree, but by a compact between king and people, did a law come into existence. In all else law and right, even for the king, was determined by custom and usage.

In such circumstances local authority must have been to a great extent left to itself. Outside of the royal city, 24. Local authority. over which was set a royal governor (1 K. 22:26), the village communities were probably independent of the government, so far as their own affairs were concerned. In the Northern Kingdom the revolutionary changes of dynasty hindered the sovereign from becoming dangerously predominant over the local authorities and the ancient nobility, as was somewhat the case in the smaller kingdom of Judah. See 1 K. 21.

This local independence is still acknowledged by the Deuteronomic code (Dt. 16:12), although it tries to restrict it (Dt. 17:8 ff. 19:17; cp LAW AND JUSTICE, § 8 ff.). Even in affairs of state, though probably only in exceptional cases, the 'elders of the people'—i.e. the local magistrates—had their voice (1 K. 20:7 2 K. 23:1).

In the Persian period the Jewish territory became a district (mēdināh, מְדִינָה, Neh. 7:6 Ezra 2:1) of the trans-

25. Persian period: Euphratic province (Ezra 5:3 1 Macc. 3:32, etc.), which was the province westward of the Euphrates. For a time it had a governor of its own governors. (pehā, פְּהָא [see GOVERNOR, 1]; תִּרְשָׁתָא [see TIRSHATHA]), who was placed under the ruler of his province (see ISRAEL, §§ 50 ff., 64). This arrangement, however, seems to have been terminated comparatively soon.

Nehemiah, it is true, ranks himself with former governors (Neh. 5:15 ff.); but the narrative of his doings, taken as a whole, rather suggests that he was sent as a high commissioner with dictatorial powers. Thus we do not hear of a substitute or successor being appointed when he leaves Jerusalem (cp We. I/G⁽²⁾ 164, (3) 168). This is confirmed by the letter of Rehum to Artaxerxes in Ezra 4:8-23 (see v. 12 ff.).

GOVERNMENT

For the rest, the central Persian authority seems to have left the Jews a considerable amount of freedom with respect to their internal affairs. That it should concern itself about such matters as the building of the temple or of the walls was a matter of course; but apart from these instances we hear next to nothing about any intervention of theirs. Of course, the payment of the tribute and the enrichment of the officials had to be seen after; but on the whole there was much internal liberty, which, indeed, was involved in the freedom of worship granted to the Jews. In the time of Ezra we find law and police in the hands of the national authority (cp Ezra 10¹⁴).

The history of ZERUBBABEL (q.v.) is obscure. He is represented as the secular head of the community with 26. Local organisation. Joshua (see JESHUA, 5) as spiritual head by his side. Yet strangely enough we find in Ezra 2₂=Neh. 7₇ (= 1 Esd. 5₈, προηγούμενοι) a list of twelve 'heads' as the chiefs of the community, at whose head stand Zerubbabel and Joshua, presumably as primi inter pares. We also hear of the 'elders of the Jews' (Ezra 5₅ 6₇ 10₈, etc.), of certain 'rulers' or 'deputies' (so RV, סגנים) in Neh. 2:16 4₈ [14], etc., and of 'princes of the people' who dwell at Jerusalem (Neh. 11:1). Are these names then perhaps synonymous? If not, what are the mutual relations of the officers whom they severally denote?¹

We shall not go far wrong if we recognise in the twelve 'heads' the chiefs of the leading families (cp Ezra 4₃), a proof of the tenacious life of the tribal organisation.² At the head of the clans were the nāṣē hā-ābōth (ראשי האבות, Ezra 1₅ 2:68 Neh. 7:70, etc.); over all were the twelve men already mentioned. The number twelve was of course suggested by that of the tribes; indeed the Priestly Writer speaks of twelve 'princes of the tribes' (Num. 7). It is not necessary, however, that this number should have been permanent. We may plausibly suppose that the 'princes' (including the 'heads') were the beginning of the later gerusia (below, § 27). From Neh. 5:7 we may infer that the plutocratic principle had much to do with their appointment. Most important of all, the priests did not yet belong to the gerusia; they are always sharply distinguished from the ruling magistrates, the heads of the people (cp e.g., Neh. 9:38-10:27 [10:1-28]).

This was soon changed, and not least in consequence of the measures of Ezra and Nehemiah, little as they themselves left for Eliashib or any other high priest to do (cp Neh. 13:4 ff.). The tendency of the law brought by Ezra from Babylon was to exalt the spiritual over the secular power. In this law, which corresponded in the main with the so-called Priestly Code (on this point cp LAW LITERATURE; ISRAEL, § 59; CANON, § 23 f.; EZRA I, § 8); the community was provided with a constitution. It is true, Ezra and his adherents had considerable difficulty in getting their theory of the law accepted. The theory was briefly this. The high priest was supreme head, alike in the spiritual and in the secular sphere. To him were transferred all the powers of the king, in so far as they were at all compatible with the Law. Not even such an unassuming place as Ezekiel assigned to a king remained. Far below the high priest in rank stood the 'princes,' the chiefs of the twelve tribes—i.e., in reality, the men who had had in their hands the administration of affairs. The numerous priestly families constituted a sort of spiritual nobility surrounding the high priest. What the law required was probably not after all very new. That the influence of the priests, even if they had not a seat in the gerusia, was really great, appears from Zech. 6:10 ff.

² Even during the Exile the 'elders' or heads of clans directed the affairs of the settlements; we find them seeking oracular advice of Ezekiel (Ezek. 8:1 14:1 20:1 ff.; cp Jer. 29:1).

GOVERNMENT

How long it was before the theories of the Priestly Code were translated into practice we do not know. Our information regarding the internal development and the foreign relations of the community in the second half of the Persian period is unfortunately very meagre.

That the abolition of the provincial governorship (see above, § 24) meant a great increase of power for the high priest, is rightly emphasized by Wellhausen; Nehemiah's provision for the regular payment of the taxes to the priests furnished the needful material basis for their claim to power. The quarrel of the brothers Johanan and Joshua about the high-priesthood and the interference of the Persian governor Bagoses (Jos. Ant. xi. 7:1) presuppose an important position for the high priest.

By the beginning of the Grecian period, at latest, the law had become a reality. Neither the Ptolemies

28. Greek period. nor the Seleucids had a governor of their own in Jerusalem, and generally speaking these Hellenistic sovereigns left a large amount of freedom to the communes. Thus in the Jewish capital, as elsewhere, the national assembly seems to have enjoyed fairly extensive powers. Its organisation had probably undergone no essential change from what it had formerly been; the gerusia continued as before an aristocratic senate. This of itself is sufficient proof that we have not here to do with a new institution, a creation of the Grecian period; for the new communities of Hellenistic times had, as a rule, democratic institutions. There is no good ground for doubting the connection between this senate and the genuine Semitic institution of a 'council of the elders' which survived in the Persian period. It is merely a casual circumstance that the gerusia—under this name—does not happen to be mentioned until the reign of Antiochus the Great (223-187 B.C.). Whether or how far Grecian influences may have co-operated in the development of this gerusia out of the college of elders (so Schürer, GVV 2:144 f.) we have no means of deciding, as we possess no sufficient information as to the manner in which the assembly of elders as a ruling body was organised towards the end of the Persian period. The ordinary traditional designation of 'elders,' πρεσβύτεροι, is applied also without qualification during this period to the gerusia (cp 1 Macc. 12:6 with 14:20, etc.). Long before this, of course, the word had ceased to mean the heads of clans; by elders were intended simply the more distinguished men, the élite of the people. Alongside of the secular nobility, the priesthood also seems from an early date to have obtained a place in this assembly (cp 2 Ch. 19:8).

During the Greek period it is the high priest who is at the head of the gerusia and thus of the entire community. The Ptolemies first, and afterwards the Seleucids, recognised him as ethnarch. On him lay the duty of seeing that the tribute for the community was paid to the court at Alexandria; and in order to do this he had the right of levying a tax in Judæa (Jos. Ant. xii. 4:1 ff.). We have an evidence of the importance of the position of high priest in the internecine strife with reference to the office which was the prelude to the Maccabean revolt (2 Macc. 4:1 ff. Jos. Ant. xii. 5:1 ff.). On account of its importance Ptolemies and Seleucids alike claimed the right of appointment to it and removal from it.

The rise of the Hasmonæans meant, strictly, no constitutional change, only a change of persons. During 29. Hasmonæans. the continuance of the war strictly so-called the commanders, the Maccabees, exercised, of course, a sort of dictatorship. In 2 Macc., it is true, mention is made of the gerusia also, alongside of Judas (1 to 444 1127); but on internal grounds more reliance must be placed on the representation given in 1 Macc., where besides Judas no governing body is mentioned save the people themselves (459 516 820 10 2546 11 30 33 42). On the other hand, in the period of peace after the victory at Beth-zacharias, Demetrius at once restored the old order of things—Alcimus being high priest, with 'elders'—(1 Macc. 633), and in like manner after the definitive peace had been negotiated it was again rehabilitated in its entirety, with the single exception that the office was now bestowed not on the legitimate heir but on Jonathan, who legally was disqualified for it (1 Macc. 1127). This, of course, meant for the priests of Jerusalem a great diminution of power and influence, especially since the old aristocratic party which had been friendly to the Greeks had now to retire into the background altogether; and, in the gerusia also, had to make room for the partisans of the Hasmonæans. The institution of the gerusia, as such, however, continued alongside of the Hasmonæan high-priests and princes (Jonathan I.: see 1 Macc. 1123 126 35; Simon I.: see 1 Macc. 1336 142028).

The Jews became entirely independent of Syria under John Hyrcanus (135-105). Hyrcanus himself, however, remained as before, the people's high priest. On the other hand, of course, he was not unconscious of his dignity as prince, and he put his name upon the coinage. His son and successor Aristobulus (105-104) actually took the royal title, continuing, however, to retain that of high priest on the coinage. Alexander Jannæus (104-78) was the first to call himself king on the coinage. Here again, however, the assumption of the kingly title meant no constitutional change; it was only the fitting expression of the fact that from the first the Hasmonæans had subordinated the spiritual side of their office—their high priesthood—to the exercise of their political authority as ethnarchs.

The gerusia, therefore, continued, at least in form, under the kings. At how early a date the name of synedrium—which subsequently seems to have been the usual one—arose, is unknown. Possibly the expression hēber (הבר) upon the Hasmonæan coins refers to this body. At this period it would of course be out of the question to look for any sharply defined jurisdiction as possessed by such a court. Under strong rulers like Hyrcanus and Jannæus its power can hardly have been great; of Alexandra, on the other hand, who on account of her sex had to hand over the high-priesthood and the presidency of the council to her son Hyrcanus, Josephus remarks that 'she held the kingship in name, but the Pharisees had the power' (Ant. xiii. 162). It is probable that it was through her that the Pharisees had gained admission to the gerusia alongside of the Sadducean nobles and the priests.

Pompey brought the Hasmonæan rule to an end in 63 B.C. In other respects he found no change necessary

30. Romans. in the forms of the internal administration of the country. He appointed Hyrcanus II. to the high-priesthood, and at the same time invested him with 'the government of the nation' (Jos. Ant. xx. 103: τὴν προστασίαν τοῦ ἔθνους). The proconsul Gabinius (57-55) on the other hand, withdrew this political dignity from the high priest, dividing the Jewish territory into five jurisdictions—Jerusalem, Jericho, Gazara, Amathus, Sepphoris. By the expressions used by Josephus (σύνδοσι, συνέδρια) we are doubtless to understand independent districts each under the synedrium of the chief city (Jos. B./i. 85). By this measure the political importance of the Jerusalem authorities was virtually destroyed.

This condition of things, however, was of brief duration. Caesar (in 47 B.C.) again made the high priest ethnarch; nominally and constitutionally the gerusia shared the government with him. The jurisdiction of the gerusia appears to have included even Galilee; at least we read that Herod was summoned before the synedrium on account of misdeeds committed there (Jos. Ant. xiv. 93-5). In point of fact, however, as is shown by the course of this very prosecution against Herod, the synedrium had come to be a helpless tool in the hand of the ruler, who at this time was Antipater. Herod accordingly began his own reign by purging the synedrium of his own opponents, forty-five of its members being executed at his command (Jos. Ant. xiv. 94, compared with xv. 12). Though doubtless replenished with nominees of his own, the council henceforward played no part of importance during his reign (cp e.g., Ant. xv. 62). The high priests also, whom he appointed and deposed at pleasure, were entirely his creatures.

The territory of Herod was divided at his death. Archelaus received Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, with the title of ethnarch; but after a short term of years he was deposed (6 A.D.) and his ethnarchy made a Roman province under a procurator (ἐπιτροπος; in NT ἡγεμῶν, Mt. 272 etc.) of equestrian rank. The procurator of Judæa was subordinate in rank to the governor of Syria, and the latter could in special cases of need interfere with him (see Mommsen, Röm. Gesch., 5509, u.). In all other respects the procurator of Judæa had military command and jurisdiction; in other words, was independent in his province.

In other matters the Romans allowed the Jews a considerable degree of internal freedom and self-government. Josephus is not very wide of the truth when he describes the new constitution as aristocratic, as distinguished from the monarchical despotical rule of a Herod (Ant. xx. 101). The synedrium enjoyed greater power than ever before. The Roman procurator was the court of review; the synedrium was the governing body, and, more particularly, no longer had to share its powers as formerly with its president, the high priest.

After the high-priestly office ceased to be held for life, and hereditary high priests had come to be appointed and deposed in rapid succession, first by Herod and then by the Romans, their political power diminished greatly, and they no longer held a paramount position even within the priestly college, although formerly the high priest could still be regarded as holding 'the government of the nation' (Ant. 2010). Next in rank to the reigning high priest stood those who had previously held the office. In the NT and in Josephus these 'high priests' figure as properly speaking the leaders of the high council (cp e.g., Mt. 2659 2741 and parallels).

As a second class within the same body we find the 'scribes' or professional 'lawyers' (Mt. 2018 2115 2741 and parallels; see SCRIBES, § 2).

The other members, belonging to neither of these two groups, are called simply 'elders' (πρεσβύτεροι; see passages already cited); or the word 'councillor' (βουλευτής) is occasionally employed (Mk. 1543; but cp JOSEPH OF ARIMATHÆA, § 4). To this body as a whole, besides synedrium, we find the names presbyterium (Lk. 2266 Acts 225), gerusia (Acts 521), and boulē (Jos. B./i. 156 xi. 162) applied. In the Mishna the supreme court is called bēth din hag-gādōl, or by the Hebraised Greek name of סנהדרין (sanhedrin). See ISRAEL, § 81.

The number of members of the supreme court of Jerusalem is in the Mishna (Sanh. 16) given at 71—a tradition that is not inherently improbable. As for the mode of replenishing its numbers—popular election is excluded alike by the history of its origin, and by its aristocratic character.

Whether the original custom which gave the right of membership to particular families was retained also during the Grecian period is unknown; for the Roman it is at least very questionable. During this last period we find the political authorities (e.g., Alexandra, Herod, the Romans) introducing into the supreme court persons acceptable to themselves at their pleasure. The Mishna knows only of co-optation (Sanh. 44).

The jurisdiction of the synedrium, so far as its moral influence was concerned, extended over all Jewish communities everywhere; its decrees were regarded as binding by all orthodox Jews even beyond the con-finer of Judæa (cp Acts 9:2). Regarded as a high court of the state, however, its jurisdiction and authority, after the division of the land on the death of Herod, were confined to Judæa proper, the province ruled by the procurator. In point of fact its range was very wide. It was at once the supreme administrative council and the supreme court of justice. As administrative council, its functions included in particular that of levying taxes. The Roman practice was to cause the taxes to be levied by the senates of the towns. In accordance with this, the syndrium of Jerusalem also (see Jos. B./ii. 17:1) was responsible for the taxes of the whole of Judæa. The actual collection, on the other hand, was farmed out to private speculators. As a court of justice the syndrium had civil as well as criminal jurisdiction, in which it was governed by the Jewish law (cp Acts 4:5 ff. 5:21 ff.); it had its own police, and could make arrests of its own accord (Mt. 26:47 ff., etc.). Its full freedom was restricted in one point only: it was not allowed to carry out capital sentences; these required the confirmation of the procurator and had also to be carried out by him, as is clearly shown by the whole narrative of the trial and death of Jesus (note in particular, the express declaration in Jn. 18:31). The stoning of Stephen must therefore be held to have been illegal. Roman citizens were of course exempt from Jewish jurisdiction (Acts 25:10 ff.). In like manner the procurator had the right to intervene at any moment or to transfer a process to his own judgment seat; but these were exceptions from the stated order of things.

The division of Judæa into toparchies—eleven, according to Josephus (B./iii. 35), ten, according to Pliny (HN 5:70)—most probably dates from the Roman period. Unfortunately we are told nothing as to the origin or object of this division. We may venture to guess that in all likelihood it had something to do with the system of taxation. No conjecture even can be hazarded as to whether these administrative divisions were judiciary circuits also.

The great syndrium in Jerusalem was also the municipal council. In close analogy with this, the various communities throughout the country had also their local syndria (συνέδριον, Mt. 10:17 Mk. 13:9 Mt. 5:22; βουλή, Jos. B./ii. 14:1, etc.; πρεσβύτεροι, Lk. 7:3). This also, as shown above, was an ancient institution among the Jews. As in earlier times so also now these local courts exercised judicial functions. According to what Josephus tells us (Ant. iv. 8:14 B./ii. 20:5) the membership of one of these provincial courts required to be not less than seven; in larger centres they seem to have had twenty-three members. As for jurisdiction—even grave criminal cases came before them (Mt. 5:21 f.). In relation to them the great syndrium was not a court of appeal; but recourse was had to it when the judges of the local courts could not agree (Jos. Ant. iv. 8:14; Sanh. 11:2).

GOVERNOR. This word is used widely in the EV to denote any title of rank or superiority. Neither EV nor G is always consistent, and the words referred to below are sometimes differently rendered. On the methods of organization among the Hebrews cp the preceding article (§§ 15 ff.), and see ARMY, §§ 2, 4; DAVID, § 11; ISRAEL, § 64.

1. Peḥhāh, פַּחָה (cp Ass. pihā, to tax or govern, bēl pāhāti, governor or satrap). It is not quite clear what kind of officer we are to understand by Solomon's 'governors of the land' (מְשֹׁרְתֵי הָאָרֶץ, 1 K. 10:15 2 Ch. 9:14 [סַרְטָרָאִים]), or by Ben-hadad's 'governors,' as distinguished from 'kings' (1 K. 20:24 [סַרְטָרָאִים]). In the latter case the title is manifestly expressive of military rank. In like manner it is used by KAUSHAKEH [q.v.] in 2 K. 18:24 Is. 30:9 (סַרְטָרָאִים) in the sense of 'general.' In Jeremiab (51:23 28:57 [הַגְּמָוִלִים]), Ezekiel (23:6, 23), Daniel (3:2 [רֹמְסֵי]) and Esther (3:12 8:9 9:3 [אַבְדָּרְנֵי]) 'deputies' (1), however, a civil administrative officer of high rank is intended. Palestine, while under Persian dominion, was under the jurisdiction of such officers, called עֲבָרֵי הַנָּהָר, 'governors beyond the river' [Euphrates] (Ezra 8:36 Neh. 2:79 Neh. 3:7 [ἐπαρχος πέραν τοῦ ποταμοῦ]); see GOVERNMENT, § 25. The title 'governor of Judah' was borne by Zerubbabel (Hagg. 1:14 2:21) and also by Nehemiah (Neh. 5:14 f. 18 [allusion to the 'bread of the governor']; cp Mal. 1:8, ἡγομέμενος] 12:26 f.).

2. Tiršāthā, תִּרְשָׁתָהּ, Ezra 2:63 EVmg., etc. See TIRSHATHA.

3. Sāgān, סָגָן, Dan. 3:2, etc. See DEPUTY, 1 4. Nāgid, נָגִיד, 5. nāsi, נָשִׂיב, and 6. sar, שָׂר, see PRINCE. 7. Pāhād, פַּחָד, see OVERSEER. 8. Aluph, אֲלֹפֶה, see DUKE, 1.

9. Sallit, שָׁלִיט (from שָׁלַט, Heb., Aram., Ass., 'to rule, have power,' cp Ar. sullān), the word used by J in Gen. 42:6 (ἀρχων [ADEFL]) to denote Joseph's position as the Pharaoh's steward of the palace and grand vizier. In Dan. 2:15 f. ('captain,' ἀρχων) it denotes military rank (see ARIUCH, 2), and it is used more or less vaguely in Dan. 5:29, etc. (Daniel, third 'ruler' EV), Eccles. 7:19 ('ten rulers [KV, AV 'mighty men'] in a city,' ἑξοστιάσων).

10. Hōhēk, חֹהֵק, EV 'governor,' Judg. 5:9 (τὰ διαταραγμένα [AL]), used poetically in a somewhat vague sense; cp פָּקֵד, 'governor,' in Judg. 5:14, ἐξῆρουνῶντες [BAL]), usually rendered 'law-giver' (Gen. 49:10 Dt. 33:21 Is. 10:1 33:22).

11. Mōšēl, מֹשֶׁל, Jer 30:21 (ἀρχων); usually 'ruler,' in a general sense. Cp RULER. 12. Haddāberayyā, הַדְּבַרְיָה, Dan. 3:24 AVmg.; see COUNSELLOR, 3. Six Greek words come under consideration.

13. ēparchos (cp 1, above), 2 Macc. 4:27 RV (AV 'ruler'); see SOSTRATUS. 14. ἡγομέμενος, Mt. 2:6 (quoting Mi. 5:1 [2], שָׂר, אֲרָחוֹ). See 11, above. 15. ἡγεμών, the title given in MT to the Roman procurators (Pilate, Mt. 27:2, etc.; Felix, Acts 23:24, etc.; Festus, Acts 26:30); see ISRAEL, § 90. 16. ἐθνάρχης, 1 Macc. 14:47, etc.; see DAMASCUS, § 13, ETHNARCH. 17. GOZAN (גּוֹזָן; in Ki. ΓΩΖΑΝ [BA]; in Ch. χωζαρ [B], ΓΩΖΑ [A]; ΓΟΙΖΑΝ [L]; Ki.; Ch.), one of the districts to which Israelites were deported by the king of Assyria (2 K. 17:6 ΓΩΖΑΡ B] 18:11 Ch. 5:26), also mentioned (with Haran, Rezeph, and the B'ne-Eden of Telassar) in a letter of Sennacherib to Hezekiah, according to 2 K. 19:12 (= Is. 37:12). It is no doubt the Assyrian Guzanu, the Γαυζανίτις of Ptolemy (v. 183 f.), mentioned in 2 R. 53:43a between Tušhan and Našibina (Nisibis). This province was ruled by a governor who sometimes had the honour to give his name to the year as limū (eponym). It rebelled in 809 B.C., and again in 759, but was finally subdued in 758. Its chief stream was the HĀBOR [q.v.], now the Hābūr, on the banks of which the exiles were settled. (See Del. Par. 184, and cp Schr. KB 2:275, 326; KGF 1:67, n., 310, 352 f.; also HĀBOR, HALAH, HARA.)

[In 2 K. 17:6 and 18:11 G, and in 17:6 GBA read ποταμοῖς Γ., 'rivers of Gozan.' The former is universally represented as G's reading. This may be so, but is not proved by the evidence. ποταμοῖς may very well be a scribe's conjecture. There is hardly occasion to inquire, with Winckler (AT Unters. 108) and W. M. Müller (Hastings, DB 2:285 δ), which rivers may be meant.—T. K. C.] C. P. T.

GRABA, RV Aggaba (ἀΓΓΑΒΑ [Babmg. AL]), 1 Esd. 5:29 = Ezra 2:45, HAGABAH.

GRAFTING (ΕΝΚΕΝΤΡΙΖΕΙΝ [Ti. WH]), Rom. 11:17. See OLIVE.

GRAPE. Blossom, early berry, sour and ripe fruit, all find mention in the OT.

1. תְּבֵנִי, tēvāh (ἀνθος), blossom, Is. 18:5†; cp Gen. 40:10.

2. נֵץ, niṣṣāh (βλαστός [Gen.], ἀνθος [Is.]), properly the blossom, but perhaps also the cluster of tiny berries which

1 Mentioned along with נַדָּב, see DEPUTY.

becomes visible as soon as the blossom is over (Gen. 40 10 Is. 18 5). In Job 15 33 the בָּקָר or 'sour grape' is parallel to the זָפָה of the olive.

3. סְמַדָּר, sēmādār (κυπρίδουσι, -σαι, κυπριάσις, but οὐρανῶθι [Sym.]), the fragrant vine-blossom, the appearance of which was a sign of spring, Cant. 2 13 15 7 13. The impossible reading שְׁמֵדָר in Is. 18 5 (late; see ISAIAH II., § 9 (4)), should be emended סְמַדָּר (see Che. SBOT, 'Isaiah,' 121 198 f.); read 'withered are the vine-blossoms of Heshbon' (important for the flavour of the wine [see WINE]); similarly Dt. 32 32 Hab. 3 17. סְמַדָּר is a late Aramaising word. In the Syriac lexicon of Bar Bahilul οὐρανῶθι is always rendered by סְמַדָּר, cp Is. 17 11; Pesh. Tg., gives 'סְמַדָּר' (Is. 18 5), but the text of Tg. seems in disorder. Derenbourg (ZATW 5 301 f. 6 98 f.) takes both נָנָה and 'סְמַדָּר to be the earliest unripe berries on the vine. Whilst, however, this sense seems to be required by Is. 18 5, the passages in Cant. do not recommend it for 'סְמַדָּר. On the whole question, cp Duval, REF 14 277 f. Derenbourg's exposition of Is. 18 5 seems rather forced; but the facts adduced by him leave no doubt as to the proper sense of 'סְמַדָּר. See further WINE.

4. בִּדְסֵר, bōser (δυσφαξ), the unripe grape which sets the teeth on edge, Is. 18 5 Job 15 33 Jer. 31 20 f. Ezek. 18 2 f. Verjuice pressed out from wild grapes is a strong acid.

5. זָבֵן, zābāh (σταφυλή), Gen 40 11 Is. 5 2 etc., the usual term for grape, found also in Aram., Arab., and Ass. Hence perhaps ἀμπέλος (Lag. Mitth. 2 356). σταφ. in Mt. 7 16 Lk. 6 44 Rev. 14 18.

6. בָּרְשִׁים, bōrēšim (ἀκαθαί, cp Mt. 7 16; labrusca), the wretched grapes produced by the wild vine, Is. 5 2 4.

7. עֲשָׂבִי, 'eshbōl (θόρυπος), the cluster of ripe grapes, often; e.g., Gen. 40 10 Cant. 7 7 [8] f. and Hab. 3 17 (crit. emend.: see n. 1 below). In NT θόρυπος in Rev. 14 18 f.

8. הַרְצָנִים, harzannim (EV 'kernels') mentioned with זָג, zāg (EV 'husk') Nu. 6 41. Ὁ ἀπὸ στεμφύλλων εὖος γιγάρτου—i.e., whether pressed grapes or grape-stone(s). Tg., Talm. agree with EV; but it is very possible that this traditional view is of purely arbitrary origin. Rabbinic opinion was not agreed as to whether 'רָצָן meant the exterior and רְצָנִים (plur.) the interior of grape-berries or vice versa (Naz. 6 2 34b). The supposed connection of רָצָן, 'grape skin,' with רָצָן or רָצָן, 'to be clear' (Ges. Thes.), is not very plausible; perhaps we should read רָצָנִים (Gen. 40 10 Joel 1 7). רָצָן may perhaps be connected with רָצָן, 'to be sharp (to the taste),' and mean 'sour grape.' The phrase used in Nu. 6 3 ('from the grape-vine,' not 'from the grapes') favours this view of the passage. Render therefore in Nu. Lc., 'he may eat nothing that is produced by the grape-vine, whether young (sour) grapes or tendrils' (the edible tops of the tendrils are meant, even if we read רָצָן; see Dillm.). See רָצָן then is a synonym of בָּקָר. This result receives some support from a probable emendation of the text of Is. 18 4 (which, as it stands, is not very satisfactory)—

Thus has Yahwè said to me: I will be still and look out like the vine-dresser, For the appearance of the fresh growths and for the coming up of the young grapes. For before the young grapes, when the blossom is over, and the small berries begin to ripen into sour grapes, He will cut off the tendrils with knives, and the spreading branches he will clear away.

The chief changes are רָצָנִים, בְּכַנְוִי, and כְּפָרְסִי for רָצָן, קָצֵר, and קָצֵר. See further Che. SBOT 196 f. T. K. C.

GRASS. (1) הַצִּיר, hāšir (√צר, signifying greenness; cp Ar. ḥašira 'to be green'; χόρτος [βοτάνη twice]): 1 K. 18 5 2 K. 19 26 Job 8 12 (EV 'herb') Prov. 27 25 (EV 'hay') Is. 15 6 (AV 'hay') and frequently; also Nu. 11 5 where it is translated LEEKS [g.w.].

2. דֵּשֶׁה, dēše' (cp √שׂה, 'to sprout luxuriantly'; cp Che. on Ps. 23 2) Jer. 14 5 (cp 6) Prov. 27 25 Job 38 27 Is. 66 14 RV 'tender grass.' In Jer. 50 11 קָצֵר, 'heifer at grass' (RVmg.; cp 6 Vg.) is rightly rendered by RV 'heifer that treadeth out [the corn].'

3. דֶּחֶה, deche (Dan. 4 15 [12] 23 [20]), Aramaic for no. 2.
4. and 5. גָּרְאֵל, gārāl, and עֵשֶׂב, 'ēšeb. See HERBS, 1 and 2.
6. χόρτος Mt. 6 30 Mk. 6 39 etc.

1 In Dt. 6 has ἡ ἀληματὶς αὐτῶν ἐκ γομόρρας; read סְמַדָּר, 'their vine-blossom is from Gomorrah.' So Symm. in Is. ἀληματῶν. In Hab. read לא אשכל עֵשֶׂב, 'and (though) the vine-blossom produces no grape-cluster.' 'Twice,' says (Ges. Lex. II. 13), 'this plur. noun (שְׂמֹרֶת) has a sing. verb.' The sing. verb should have awakened a suspicion of the faultiness of the text. [This article supplements the note in SBOT, which was condensed from want of space, and meets Marti's criticism in his commentary.]

GRECIANS

GRASSHOPPER, AV, sometimes RV (אָרְבֵּה, אָרְבֵּב and אָרְבֵּב; Lev. 11 22 Nah. 3 17); see LOCUST, § 2, nos. 1, 4, 8.

It is impossible to identify the species of insect referred to. The English word grasshopper is loosely applied to members of the true Orthopteran families, Acridiidae and Locustidae, and as a rule to the smaller and non-migratory species.

In the famous description of old age in Eccl. 12 occurs the enigmatical expression: 'and the grasshopper shall be a burden' (וְהָיָה הָאָרְבֵּב הַקָּטָן כְּמַשָּׂא), or rather, as in RVmg., 'shall drag [drags] itself along.'

GRATE (מְרִבֵּר), Ex. 27 4 etc. See NETWORK.

GRAVE. See TOMB; HADES.

GRAY [HAIRS] (שֵׁיבָה), Gen. 42 38 44 29. See COLOURS, § 9 (a).

GREAT OWL is AV's unhappy rendering of:

- 1. רַחֵם, rāhīm (Lev. 11 18f) or רַחֵמָה, rāhāmāh (Dt. 14 17f). See GIER-EAGLE, 1.
2. חִפְפֹּז, hīppōz (ἐχίνος: Is. 34 15f), RV probably correctly ARROWSNAKE (serpens iaculus). See SERPENT, § 1 (8).

GREAT SEA, Nu. 34 6 f., cp GEOGRAPHY, § 4, and see MEDITERRANEAN.

GREAVES (כִּצְחֹת), as if sing. in stat. constr.; but almost certainly ὧ's κνημιόλιον—i.e., מְצִחָה, is right; note רַגְלָיו, 'his feet'), mentioned in the account of GOLIATH [g.v.], 1 S. 17 6f. These greaves probably consisted of plates of bronze (נְחָן) which covered the lower portion of the legs. The annexed figures of Assyrian combatants may illustrate the kind of defensive armour that was used, protecting the lower portion of the leg both in the front and at the back. There is no evidence that greaves were used among the ancient Egyptians. See SHOES. O. C. W.

GRECIANS, a word occurring four times in EV and three in AV of Macc.

1 On Joel 3 [4] 6, where the mg. and RV render literally 'sons of the Grecians' (בְּנֵי הַיְּוֹנִים; τ. υί. τ. ἑλληνῶν [BNAQ]) see JAVAN, HELLENISM, § 1 f. In 1 Macc. 6 2, 2 Macc. 4 15, RV reads 'Greeks'; in 1 Macc. 8 9, 'they of Greece.'

2. In Acts 9 29 'Grecians' means Greek-speaking Jews (Grecian Jews) [RV], HELLENISTS [RVmg.], Ἑλληνισ-τάς [Ti. WH])—as it is paraphrased in Pesh.—as distinguished from non-Jewish Greeks ("Ἕλληνες [Ti. WH], Rom. 1:14) on the one hand, and Palestinian Jews ("Ἑβραίων [Ti. WH], Phil. 3:5) on the other. In Acts 6:1 the Hellenists spoken of are Christian. The distinction, however, has not always been understood or observed by copyists and translators.

In Acts 11:20 the better reading is 'Greeks' [RV text], Ἕλληνας [Ti. WH, Blass, following N^cAD¹]—i.e., non-Jews. In Jn. 12:20 Acts 17:4, 'Greeks' are proselytes to Judaism (cp HELLENISM, § 2, PROSELYTE).

GREEN. For (1) יָרֵק, yirāk (2 Ki. 19:26 etc.) see COLOURS, § 11; for (2) לַח, lah (Gen. 30:37 etc.); (3) רַעֲנָן, ra'anān (Dt. 12:2 etc.), and (4) רֶטֶב, rāṭab (Job 8:16 etc.) see COLOURS, § 17. Greenish (רַקֵּק, rāqāq) Lev. 13:49-51; see COLOURS, § 11. Greenness (רֶחֶל, rehel) Job 8:12; see COLOURS, § 17. GREETINGS (ἀσπασμοί), Mt. 23:7. See SALUTATIONS.

GREYHOUND (רְיוֹר קְרוֹנִים), 'well girt [or, 'well-knit'] in the loins,' RVmg.,² one of the four things mentioned in Prov. 30:31 EV as of stately motion, the lion, the he-goat, and the king (going to battle?) being the other three. Whether the poet meant the greyhound (Kim., Gr., Ven., Luth., Ew., Bö., De.), is another matter.

The revisers of AV felt uncertain, and placed 'war-horse' (so Bochart, Wildeboer?) in the margin, with what they conceived to be the literal meaning of the Hebrew phrase (see above); the eagle (Ibn Ezra) and even the S. African zebra have also been thought of (Ludolf, Simonis).

The rendering 'cock' is advocated elsewhere; but the rendering in EV would be not less suitable if only it could be justified (see COCK). On this hypothesis something good would for once be said of a dog (see DOG, § 1). The large Persian greyhound is used in the desert for hunting the GAZELLE (q.v.); as of 'noble kind,' it is allowed to lie down in the nomad booth (Doughty, Ar. Des. 1:327-327). Tristram states that this dog is known in modern Palestine (NHB 80).

[192]), the eighth of the minor prophets, about whom, in the absence of authentic traditions, legend has much to say.

In Bel and the Dragon Habakkuk is commanded to carry a meal to Daniel in the lions' den, for which purpose an angel seizes him by the hair and carries him to Babylon and back; and the same story is told, but more picturesquely, in the different Lives of the Prophets, which have reached us in a great variety of languages and forms. Here he is represented as a Simeonite, born at Beth-zachariah, and dying two years before the end of the Babylonian exile.¹ In the heading of the Codex Chisianus (see DANIEL, § 16) Habakkuk is a son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi. No historical value attaches to any of these notices: their sole link of connection with the biblical book is the mention of the Chaldeans (Hab. 16) by which the prophet's place in history is approximately indicated.

The book is divided by the new heading of 31 into two independent sections which demand separate treatment. The first two chapters are the prophet Habakkuk saw.' The very first word, which had already been ridiculed for its ambiguity by Jeremiah (23 33-40) and strictly prohibited, is proof that the heading is due to a late editor (see ISAIAH ii., § 9). It need not surprise us therefore to find many traces of editorial intervention within the book itself.

2. First section: headed: 'The oracle (אֲמַרְתָּ) which chap. 1 f.

I. Chaps. 1 f., as we now have them, may be analysed somewhat as follows:—

1-2 4 sounds like a Psalm, or rather a Lamentation: the prophet complains to Yahwè that he is left to cry in vain for help against the oppression and tyranny of the wicked, from which law and justice are suffering.

1 5-11. Yahwè speaks without any introductory formula (such as 'And Yahwè said'). He is about to raise up the warlike Chaldeans, who will achieve complete success.

1 12-17. Again without an introductory formula, the prophet addresses Yahwè once more. He cannot understand how the God of Israel, himself holy and just, can look on while the sinner destroys the man who is better than himself, how the wicked is allowed to take men and peoples like fish with hook and net, and then to pay divine honours to these instruments of his wealth and greatness.

2 1: 'I stand upon my watch tower,' etc. The prophet awaits the answer of Yahwè to his complaint.

2 2-4: 'Then Yahwè answered me,' etc. The prophet is hidden write and set up where all may read them the joyous tidings that help is coming in due time, and that the just who waits patiently shall live by his faith.

2 5 ff. Over the violent one who had made the nations his prey, these nations shall utter a taunting song, which is comprised in five sections from v. 6 onward, each beginning with אֲחִי or 'woe' (sv. 68-8 9-11 12-14 15-17 18-20—in the last section the אֲחִי is at the beginning of v. 19).

2 1. The taunting song just referred to stands apart as a separate section within the first two chapters of the book, although it is in connection with the preceding prophecy. We have therefore now to discuss 1 2-2 4.

The question we have to consider is, to whom does this prophecy (1 2-2 4) relate? or, rather, to whom is

3. Chap. 1 2-2 4. salvation promised, to whom destruction threatened? Until quite recently it was universally held that the latter were the Chaldeans and the former the people subject to them, especially Israel.

The ground for this belief was that in 1 14 ff. 2 5 ff. the crafty and violent wrongdoer is altogether described as an imperial or world-power, and the sufferers as an aggregate of nations; and since the only such power named is the Chaldean (1 6), it was assumed that the prophecy was directed against this.

It is now, however, coming to be recognised that the matter is by no means so simple. Scholars cannot shut their eyes to the fact that in 1 6 the nation of the Chaldeans appears, not as the object of a divine judgment, but as its instrument.

It is Yahwè who will raise the Chaldeans up (אֲרִי־אֲרִי); the promise of victory is for them, the threatening is for others. Later, the relation of Yahwè to the hostile power is reversed; but in the text as we now have it this change does not come out clearly, and there is confusion in consequence.¹

The present position of the question may here be briefly stated. The element of truth in the theories of earlier scholars has of late been rediscovered by several independent workers, notably Giesebrecht² and Wellhausen.³ The present writer also, with equal independence of predecessors, pointed out (St. Kr., 1893, p. 383 ff.) that 1 4 and 1 12 should be brought together, to which he added the entirely new theory that 1 5-11 is not an independent earlier prophecy but an integral part of the same prophecy removed from its original place, and that this prophecy is a threatening addressed not to Chaldea but to Assyria. It has, in fact, been overlooked that the prophecy, if it contains a threatening against a world-power, must be speaking not of one world-power only, but of two—i.e., not only of the oppressor but also of the destroyer of that oppressor.

Why not, indeed? He who 'alone doeth great wonders' both can and does avail himself of secondary causes. The prophets are well aware of this, and Habakkuk himself, in his threatenings, gives clear expression to this truth (2 3). If, then, the prophecy were directed against the Chaldeans, we should have expected to find Cyrus as in II. Isaiah, the Medes as in Is. 13 17, or Elam and the Medes as in Is. 21 2 (cp also Jer. 51 27 ff.), mentioned by name as the instruments of Yahwè's justice,¹ or at the very least the announcement made that a warlike people should appear, even if no name were given. Instead of this, the power which is to cause the fall of the oppressor is not even referred to in the divine response given in 2.2-4; indeed, it is extremely doubtful whether the fall itself is spoken of in the obscure words of 2.4a.²

Now for our hoped-for solution. We have detached 1.5-11 from its surroundings, and must study it in and for itself. It describes how Yahwè,

4. 1.5-11 against Assyria, who speaks in the first person, calls up a warrior people that he may give it an unheard-of victory; by the 'for' (וְ) in the beginning of v. 6 this word of Yahwè is linked to another that must have preceded it. A divine word of such deep import will exactly correspond to the prophet's anxiety in 2.1. The divine response waited for begins indeed in 2.2, but after v. 4 we find an unaccountable hiatus. Now, is it not obvious that the passage we have already isolated fills the hiatus, that it calls by its name the mighty warrior nation which is the destined conqueror of the oppressor? It will be objected: we cannot suppose that the Chaldeans are to abolish themselves? Of course not; but we have seen that the theory which identifies them with that oppressor rests only on 1.6. If now the Chaldean power in 1.6 is referred to, not as the oppressor but as the oppressor's conqueror, then the oppressor himself is the power which was vanquished by the Chaldeans, in other words Assyria: that is, the prophecy is directed not (as used to be thought) against the Chaldeans but against the Assyrians.

The view just indicated is supported by other weighty considerations.

1. The exceedingly vivid picture of the oppressor in 1.14 f. 2.5 does not suit the Chaldeans, whilst it fits the Assyrians, the Romans of the East, perfectly.

Not all at once, but by numerous separate efforts spread over three centuries, not merely by force of arms, but (as the angling metaphor suggests) by policy and craft, were so many petty principalities and more than one important kingdom swept into the hands of these robbers (cp Is. 10.5-11 13 f.). The Chaldean, on the other hand, far from being the unrelenting, persistent, grasping amasser of wealth, was simply the smiling heir. His conquest of Babylon threw the empire of the Euphrates and Tigris, like ripe fruit, into his hands, and his victory at Carchemish over the pharaoh Necho did the same with Western Asia: within a very few years—within twenty, if we reckon from the accession of Nabopolassar in Babylon—all had been accomplished. This does not correspond well with Habakkuk's figure.

2. Even if it were granted, however, that ultimately perhaps the Chaldean ascendancy did come to partake of the character described, Judah at all events had no time allowed her to experience it.

The conquest of Nineveh brought relief rather than oppression to the whole of Western Asia; and even after the battle of Carchemish about 605 B.C. Judah would have had little to suffer at the hands of the Chaldeans had not Jehoiakim's senseless renunciation of his vassalage in 602 provoked their wrath. Between that date and 597 at latest the prophecy might conceivably have been directed against the Chaldeans; not later, because we find in it no trace of the hard fate of Jerusalem and Jehoiakim. This short interval is hardly long enough, however, to account for such a picture as we have in 1.14 ff., and, moreover, within these years a prophecy of the fall of the Chaldean power would certainly have been most premature.

3. The strong personification of the enemy in the image of the fisher, as in 1.15 and elsewhere, is worthy of attention.

It is very appropriate in the case of the Assyrians, who are always designated by the singular Assûr; and a splendid instance of a similar kind had already been supplied by Is. 10.5 ff. (see especially v. 14). It does not fit in with the plural Kasdim nearly so well, and we notice that in 1.6 we at once meet with the apposition, 'the people,' etc., a phrase which controls the entire description down to v. 10.

¹ M. Lauterburg (Theol. Z. aus d. Schweiz, 1896, p. 74 ff.) draws this inference. He reads in 1.6 'Persians' for 'Chaldeans,' and, accordingly, dates the whole book from the exile, including ch. 3, which could, he thinks, in this way be ascribed to the same hand.

Such is the only solution that meets the conditions of the problem. The argument is necessarily simple; no long historical discussion is required. The change of date involved is at most twenty-eight years, perhaps considerably less.¹ The counter-hypothesis offered by Rothstein, however carefully elaborated, labours under insuperable difficulties.²

We may therefore proceed to show how the theory adopted illuminates the whole prophecy.

That the 'law' in 1.4 is that of Deuteronomy needs no showing. The 'righteousness' claimed here and in 1.13 is the will for good produced by this law, the promulgation of which was accompanied by such high hopes. The weight of the long-continued Assyrian suzerainty, however, has crushed all effort (1.2-4). The righteous people feels itself worthy of freedom, and cannot comprehend how it is that Yahwè can passively watch the violence done (1.12-17). After uttering this complaint the prophet is commanded to write legibly upon a tablet that deliverance is coming but must be waited for with patience (2.1-4). Yahwè is about to send the Chaldeans, a warlike people which will subvert everything (1.6-10). Then the might of the Assyrian will be at an end and disappear without leaving a trace (1.11 2.5). Thus far the exposition (given by Yahwè himself) of the inscription in 2.3 f.³

This view of 1.2-2.5 has been variously received by scholars.

Accepted without qualification by Cornill (Eint. (3) (4) [196]), and rejected by Davidson (Nah. Hab. and Zeph. [196]) and Nowack (Kl. Proph. [197]), it was again accepted by GASm. (Twelve Proph. 2 [198]) and again rejected by Driver (Hastings, DB 2, [199]). The objections are stated in detail by Davidson; for the other side reference may be made to GASm.

One point put forward by Davidson in his Appendix (137 f.) demands special notice. He lays stress on the fact that according to the recently discovered inscriptions 'those who accomplished the final destruction of Nineveh were the Medes alone, the Babylonians having no part in it.' He concludes 'that this course of events can hardly be said to give any additional plausibility to the interpretation of Habakkuk advocated by Prof. Budde.' It is difficult, however, on the other hand, to see how this 'course of events' could militate against the interpretation in question.

If the Chaldeans took no personal part in the final destruction of Nineveh, they at least were in alliance with the Medes who did, and they contributed all they could to the overthrow of the Assyrian Empire. Even if this had not been the case, it is still conceivable that the prophet might by anticipation have erroneously assigned this part to them. If in point of fact, however—as Winckler had conjectured and the inscriptions now confirm—the Chaldeans held back from the final destruction of Nineveh and left the task to their allies simply because they shrank from the wrath of the gods of Nineveh, the fact remains that they were morally the authors of the overthrow as well as the others, and the prediction of the prophet according to the interpretation in question was completely realised.

Those who reject this interpretation are themselves divided into two camps. Nowack follows Giesebrecht

* The death of Ašur-bāni-pal in 626 B.C., and the commencement of Nabopolassar's reign over Babylon in 625, constitute for our hypothesis the superior limit; the inferior is to be sought in the battle of Megiddo in 609 and the fall of Nineveh in 608.

² See his article on Hab. 1 and 2, St. Kr., 1894, p. 51 ff. Like the present writer he transposes 1.6-10 so as to stand after 2.5a; but he infers from 1.2-4 (v. 5 an editorial insertion) that the entire prophecy was originally directed against the goddess in Judah, particularly King Jehoiakim, who was to be punished by the Chaldeans. This prophecy (1.2-4 1.2a 1.3 2.1-5a 1.6-10 1.4 [read וְיִשְׁרָאֵל] 1.5a), originally delivered about 605 B.C., was, he thinks, revised during the Exile, so as to make it an oracle against Babylon. Against this view compare the present writer's article, Expos. May, '95, 372 ff.

and Wellhausen in simply removing 15-11, as being an older prophecy, from its present position and making v. 12 follow immediately on v. 4. Davidson and Driver, on the other hand, in spite of all the difficulties which they themselves acknowledge, prefer to retain the section in its present order, and thus essentially follow the view of H. Oort (Th. T., '91, pp. 357 ff.): 12-4 speaks only of the internal corruption of Judah, vv. 5-11 threaten this corruption with punishment through the instrumentality of the Chaldeans.

On this assumption the prophet loses his way, and his threatening comes to be directed against the Chaldeans. This sudden change of front is attributed to the personal peculiarity of the prophet. Only, Driver is inclined to assign 12-11 (not, as Giesebrecht, Wellhausen, Nowack, 15-11) to a date considerably earlier than that of the following sections.

B. The new section begins with 26, not with 25.

Certainly 26 establishes a close connection with 25 by the words 'Verily they all of them (i.e., 'all peoples,' with which v. 5 closes) will take up a parable and a taunting proverb against them and will say' (read וְיִשְׁמְרוּ). This introduction, like similar ones elsewhere, as for example in Is. 14 3 f., presupposes that the enemy has already fallen. Only then is there any occasion to take up a 'māshāl' against the enemy. What we read in the following passage (26b-20), however, does not fit into the situation. The evil that befalls the enemy there lies wholly in the future, and is throughout expressed in the future tense (cp. וְיָבִיט , 7 f. 11 13 16 f.). Rothstein accordingly has rightly deleted the introductory clause, v. 6a down to וְיִשְׁמְרוּ , as an editorial addition. In reality it is only the prophet himself (not the nations) who again takes up speech, after Yahweh has spoken, cataloguing the oppressor's sins with ever-recurring woes, and threatening him with punishment from God.

These things being so, we have in the first instance to suppose that the enemy in 26b-20 is the same as the enemy in the opening section of the book—in other words, the Assyrian. The strong personification cannot mislead us here; it corresponds exactly with what we have already read about the Assyrian in 1 13 ff. 25. On the other hand, the added introduction, v. 6a, leads us to anticipate editorial additions also in the body of the section.

As such may be pointed out (1) 2 12-14. Verse 12 is taken from Mic. 3 10, v. 13 is brought in as a Divine word (point, with וְיִשְׁמְרוּ , 7 f.) from Jer. 51 58 and v. 14 from Is. 11 9. In substance the entire passage is in harmony with the thought and feeling of the post-exilic community, but has little to do with Habakkuk's time. (2) vv. 18-20. For it is wasting time to charge a heathen king with his idolatry when Judah's one desire is to be rid of his tyranny. The passage recalls the manner of II Isaiah. Further, v. 18 stands before its proper 'woe' in v. 19. These verses must be transposed; probably v. 18 is a later amplification, wrongly brought in from the margin. Verse 20 may have had its origin in Mic. 1 2 and Zeph. 1 7. It closes the passage not unfittingly, but perhaps was intended at the same time to prepare for the theophany in chap. 3.

The remaining three woes have all a beauty of their own and are strikingly characteristic. The first (2 6b-8) declaims against the plundering of the nations; the second (vv. 9-11) against the buildings for display or defence carried out at the cost of violence and forced labour; the third (vv. 15-17) against the ravishment of lands and peoples (v. 15 to be taken figuratively), in particular by the stripping of the forests and hunting-grounds of Western Asia. That all this admirably fits the case of Assyria is certain.¹

The text, it is true, is very corrupt (see Wellhausen's suggestions). Perhaps it was the mutilation of the text that gave opportunity for the drastic revision we now have before us.²

To sum up: in chaps. 1 and 2 the Assyrians, whose vassals the kings of Judah have continuously been since the time of Ahaz, are threatened with the overthrow of their empire by the Chaldeans. These Chaldeans, not to be confounded with the Babylonians, are a new and rising people whose seat is on the seaboard to the S. of Babylonia: once already in the seventh century they were a menace to the Assyrian empire for a time (2 K. 20); the danger was again in sight from the time when the Chaldean Nabopolassar secured for himself the throne of Babylon (625).¹ In 16-10 the prophet describes them as a people beginning to be known by hearsay, and the surmise of earlier scholars is no doubt correct, that the Scythian irruption (from about 630 onwards), of which the prophet himself had personal experience, supplied him, in part at least, with colouring for his picture. The time is more precisely determined by 14 as subsequent to Josiah's reformation in 621, but also (with equal certainty) prior to the death of that king in 609, so that, halving the difference, we may take 615 or (by preference) a slightly earlier time to be the date of composition. At that time the people of Judah was conscious of righteousness: indeed, even later, men saw in the destruction of Jerusalem and the exile the punishment, not of their own sins, but of those of king Manasseh (2 K. 24 3 Jer. 15 4), or of their fathers (Jer. 31 29 Ezek. 18 2). As the solitary expression of this mental attitude to be found among all the prophetic writings that have come down to us, the book of Habakkuk possesses peculiar value, and takes a high place among our sources for the history of the period.

The oracle, then, expected from the Chaldeans freedom and prosperity for Judah. The actual result was quite different: they were the instruments of Judah's overthrow. Of course, the responsibility for this must primarily be attributed to the bad policy of the kings of Judah and to the fanaticism of the patriotic party. Apart from these causes the prophecy of Habakkuk had every likelihood of being fulfilled. Jeremiah too could venture to promise the continuance of the kingdom if only it could decide to yield to the Chaldeans.

We can easily understand that in the exilic or the post-exilic period a prophecy which had been so sadly falsified could not escape alteration.

7. Successors and Predecessors. By displacement of the passage in which good fortune was promised to the Chaldeans (now 16-10), and by other editorial changes, including perhaps removal of the name of Asshur, the prophecy was so transformed as to be capable of being interpreted of the fall of the Chaldeans. These alterations hardly belong to the exilic period, which produced its own oracles against Babylon and the Chaldeans. They are rather to be assigned to the great period of editorial activity—the fifth, perhaps, or the fourth century.

From a literary point of view, the original work of Habakkuk in its main features is plainly dependent on the great prophet of the preceding century, Isaiah. The picture of the Assyrian tyrants in 1 13-17 recalls Is. 10 5 ff., the announcement of the Chaldeans in 16-10 suggests that of the Assyrians in Is. 5 26 ff., and the three woes of 2 6b-17 the 'seven' woes of Is. 5 8-23 10 1-4. At the same time it is true that, as Rothstein has been at special pains to show, Habakkuk has also in details a very close affinity with his contemporary Jeremiah. One must not be in a hurry to infer that he copies Jeremiah: almost everywhere the facts of the case are explained by identity of period and circumstances. When all has been said, Habakkuk is entitled to be regarded as a well-marked prophetic and poetical personality: the remains of his work which have reached us are among the finest examples of prophetic literature, and have served as models to later writers, particularly to the authors of Is. 13 21 1-10. Unfortunately the text is not in good preservation, and cannot always be quite satisfactorily restored.

II. The concluding section of the book has words at its opening and at its close which mark it out as a psalmus extra canonem¹ and give it the full apparatus of a poem fitted to be used in public worship. The only singularity is the division of the descriptive words into a superscription and a subscription: read 'A prayer of the prophet Habakkuk after Shigyōnōth (?)' and 'By the chief musician, with stringed instruments' respectively. Clearly, what is here the subscription must originally have come before v. 1.

Adopting Wellhausen's suggestion, שְׁנוּתָהּ וְנוֹתָהּ, we may restore the superscription thus לְמִנְחָה בְּנוֹתָהּ חֲלֵלָה לְמִנְחָה לְיְהוֹכָיִם הַגָּבִיחַ (to the chief musician, on stringed instruments: a prayer of the prophet Habakkuk).² [See, however, SHIGGAION.]

In any case the words prove, as Kuenen rightly perceived, and as Cheyne (OPs. 156 f.) has well shown, that the piece, before it had its proper position assigned to it, belonged to one of the collections of psalms that were in use in the worship of the temple. Perhaps the only reason for its exclusion from the Psalms as we now possess them was that the editors of the prophetic canon had already appropriated it. They did so because it bore Habakkuk's name, just as in Ps. 146 147 148, which in the original text bear no author's name, are attributed to Haggai and Zechariah. (See PSALMS.)

To Stade belongs the credit of having first shown (ZATW 4 157 f.) that the authorship of Habakkuk is on internal grounds impossible; but it is to Wellhausen that we owe the complete elucidation of this obscure composition (Kl. Proph. 166, (3) 170 f.). As he well remarks: 'It is the community that is the speaker. Awe-struck, it remembers that first great deed of Yahwē to which it owed as it were its existence, and yet it prays, Renew thy work in the midst of the years. The long-since founded theocracy has fallen into ruin, and a new foundation is desired. The child has become gray-haired, and "in the midst of his years" a new birth is sought for the sake of a happy final result, even though it will not take place without bitter pangs.'³ In the description of the theophany which follows—extending from 3₃ to almost the end of the poem—the colours are derived exclusively from the deliverance from Egypt, as can be seen with sufficient clearness from vs. 3 7 8 ff. (cp, however, MIZRAIM). With this description of the deliverance wrought for the fathers that of the new deliverance now prayed for and expected becomes for the poet so blended that in remembering the one he seems to behold the approach of the other. Wellhausen leaves open the possibility that this may not always have been the case, and that the proper close of the poem has been lost, since vs. 17-19 cannot be the genuine one. This is possible, but by no means certain. Verse 17, which certainly seems strange, may give some fresh touches to the picture of the fate

9. Authorship of psalm.

1 It alone shares with the Psalms the following peculiarities: the use of the word Seiah (vs. 3 9 13; in the Psalms seventy-one times); the expression לְמִנְחָה ('to' or 'by' 'the chief musician' v. 19; in the Psalms fifty-five times); the immediately following expression שְׁנוּתָהּ וְנוֹתָהּ ('with' or 'on' 'stringed instruments'; so to be read, see below), used in v. 19 and in Pss. 4 6 54 67 76; the word תְּפִלָּה, 'prayer,' used to designate a poetical piece (v. 1: Pss. 17 86 90 102 142; cp also Pss. 72 20, according to which all Psalms admit of being called 'prayers'); the use of the l auctoris in v. 1 (as also after תְּפִלָּה in Pss. 17 86 90 102); the word עֲוֹנוֹתָי (in plu.), if it be genuine (Pss. 7; see SHIGGAION).

2 It would be eccentric to argue from MT's בְּנוֹתָיָהּ that Habakkuk was a Levite and temple chorister: yet, probably enough, the inscription of Bel and the Dragon (cp above) presupposes this inference.

3 Wellhausen has put the case above so brilliantly that Oort's defence of the traditional view falls to the ground. To set aside the liturgical notes in 3₁ and 19₆ as editorial additions, and account for the obscurity and want of order in chap. 3 from the idiosyncrasy of Habakkuk, as in chaps. 1 and 2, is certainly inadequate.

of the hostile people; but vs. 18 f. present not only a very appropriate contrast to this, but also a thoroughly typical psalm-epilogue (see Pss. 135 [6] f. 26 11 f. 528 [10] f. 59 16 [17] f. 75 10 [9] f.), and no sure inference can be drawn from the borrowing of v. 19a from Ps. 18 32 [33] f.

Elsewhere also (as could easily be shown) the poem frequently recalls the psalms, and particularly the latest psalms. If we want a quite infallible indication of post-exilic date, we have it in the special application of the phrase 'Yahwē's anointed' (v. 13)—i. e., in the transference of the kingly title to the kingless but consecrated people (We. rightly refers here to Ps. 288 [שְׁמוֹנָה עֶשְׂרִים] 849 [10] 89 38 [39] 51 [52] 105 15, also to Dan. 7 27). The very late divine name 'Ēlōāh' (v. 3) is also a decisive proof of the late date of the Psalm of Habakkuk (see PSALMS).¹

The poetical value of the composition is not slight; but it suffers greatly from corruptions of the text (especially in vs. 9-11 13 f.), in correcting which Wellhausen has rendered excellent service. [See also HORN, MIZRAIM, ON [ii.], VILLAGE, 6, and cp Ruben, JQR 11 451 ff. ('99), who rejects vs. 2, 17-19 as later additions, and arranges the genuine psalm in three stanzas of nine lines each, with 'corresponso,' according to the theory of D. H. Müller.]

It was the Habor of the Assyrians (a name which it still retains), the Chabōras of classic writers (αβωρρας [Strab.], αβουρας [Isidore of Charax], αβωρα [Zosimus], χαβωρας [Ptol.]). It is a tributary of the EUPHRATES [q. v.], which it enters about 36° N. lat.

of David twice (1 S. 23:19, 26:1f.). Oq the former passage, see HORESH. It relates how the men of ZIPIH [g.v., 2] told Saul that David had found hiding-places 'in Hörsäh, in the hill of Hächiläh, which is on the S. of the Jeshimon.' In the latter passage, however, the same persons describe the same hill as being 'in front of the Jeshimon'—i.e., where the desert begins. The second definition alone is correct.

In 1 S. 23:19 'on the south of the Jeshimon' is an error introduced from v. 24 (where the wilderness of Maonis is referred to; see HORESH). Further references to the name are presupposed by 1 S. 23:14f., 19:26f. In 23:14, where MT merely gives הרה 'in the mountain,' MSS of 1 S. give a combination of readings, including εἰς ὄρος τὸ ἀρχαῖος and ἐν τῇ γῆ τῇ ἀρχαῖος; ἀρχαῖος corresponds to ארץ ארץ. Possibly for ἀρχαῖος we should read ἀμαυρόν, and so forth. So also in Mic. 4:8 for ἀρχαῖος read ἀμαυρόν (= ארץ). Bentley's suggestion of ἐν ἀμαυρόν τόπων for ἐν ἀρχαῖος τόπων in 2 Pet. 1:19 seems indispensable. On ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ (v. 14) see HORESH.

Conder ventures to find a trace of the name Hachilah in the Zahret el K'älä, a ridge which runs down from the plateau of Zif towards the desert of En-gedi. The name is, however, by no means certain. In 1 S. 23:28 we meet with the name חמלה (EV Hammahlekoth). 1 S.'s חמלה in 26:1 favours a reading חמלה, which would be miswritten for חמלה, the name found in 23:28. A hill with rocky clefts seems to be intended.

The Onom. (OS 263; 120:15) confounds Hachilah with KEBLAH. Glaser, not very plausibly, reads 'Hachilah' for 'Havilah' in 1 S. 15:7 [see TELEM i.]. T. K. C.

HACHMONI. Jehiel, tutor of David's sons, is called 'the son of Hachmoni' in EV of 1 Ch. 27:32 (חַכְמוֹן בֶּן אֲחִימֵן [B]). -מַנְי [A].

ΔΑΧΜΟΝΙ [L].

Jehiel is either an imaginary personage, whose description is borrowed from the Jashoam of 1 Ch. 11:11 (see HACHMONITE, THE), or, as Marquart (Fund. 16) supposes, Jehiel is a substitute for Ishhaal, which is explained as יִשְׁחָאֵל = יִשְׁחָאֵל. Certainly David's sons had a lion-hearted tutor, on the second hypothesis, for Ishhaal and Jashoam are identical. T. K. C.

HACHMONITE, THE. In 1 Ch. 11:11 JASHOBEAM (g.v., 1) is called יִשְׁחָאֵל בֶּן אֲחִימֵן (ΔΑΧΜΟΝΙ[ε] [BA]). -מַנְי [N]. ΘΕΚΕΜΙΝΑ [L]), RV 'the son of a Hachmonite' (AV quite incorrectly, 'an Hachmonite'). It has been pointed out (see TAHCHEMONITE) that the true description of Jashoam, or rather, Ishhaal, is most probably 'a man of Beth-cerem.'

This should also be substituted for 'the son of a Hachmonite' in 1 Ch. 11:11, and 'the son of Hachmoni' in 1 Ch. 27:32. T. K. C.

HADAD (הַדָּד, § 57; אַדְדָּא [BADEL]); a Canaanitic and, some think, Aramaean name of the storm-god, who was known also as Rammän, Bir, and Dadda; cp Winckler, AT Forsch. 69, Schr. KGF, 371-395, 538; KAT 200-206, 454; Tiele, BAG 525; Hilprecht, Assyriaca, 76-78; Baethgen, Beitr. 67. The first-mentioned of the four gods of the N. Syrian kingdom of Ya'di is Hadad [Zenjirli inscr.]. These references also illustrate the name BEN-HADAD.

1. b. Bedad, fourth king of Edom; Gen. 36:35f. (v. 36 אַדָּא [E]), 1 Ch. 1:46f. See BELA ii., 1.

2. Eighth (?) king of Edom, 1 Ch. 1:50 (a. υἱὸς βαρὰδ [BL; om. υἱ. β. A], v. 51 אַדָּא [B]); miswritten HADAR (g.v.). Gen. 36:39. See BELA ii., 1. The name of his city was PA'U [g.v.] or Pa'i. Probably, however, there is a considerable error in the text.

Pa'u is almost certainly corrupted from Pe'or, and this very probably from Bē'or, an alternative reading to Achbor in 1 Ch. 1:49. 'Son of Achbor,' or 'Son of Bē'or,' however, does not belong to BAAL-HANAN (g.v., 1), who is really this Hadad's father. Thus the name of Hadad's city is not really given; there was a lacuna in the text.

He married a N. Arabian—a Misrite or Musrite, named MEHETABEL (g.v., 1) who is also mis-described in the received text. Most probably he lost his life in the massacre referred to in 1 K. 11:15f. The cause of the massacre is unrecorded; probably it was a retaliation. Cp DAVID, § 8 (c), EDOM, § 6.

HADAD-RIMMON

3. (In 1 K. 11:17 דָּדָר; אֲדַר [BAL].) According to the MT, which presents many difficulties, Hadad was a royal prince of Edom who escaped with some 'Edomites,' servants of his father, when Joab massacred 'every male in Edom,' by an obscurely indicated route to Misraim or Egypt (1 K. 11:14-22; but 'Misraim' should rather be 'Misrim'; see below). There he was welcomed, and received the sister of the queen Tahpenes as his wife. By her he had a son GENUBATH (g.v.). On the death of David he returned home, and became 'an adversary to Solomon' (cp v. 25). According to the parallel narrative of the marriage of Jeroboam in L.'s text of 1 K. 12:36 Lag.; 12:24e Swete), which is evidently copied from a narrative of the marriage of Hadad, the name of the 'Egyptian' princess referred to in 1 K. 11:19 was Ano (Klo. reads מַנְחָה, Ahnoth).

This reading (Ano), though accepted by Klo., Wi., Benz., Ki. as genuine, is merely a corruption of אַחֵת, 'sister (of)'; TAHPENES (g.v.) is also certainly corrupt. Indeed, textual criticism is much needed in this narrative. It was not to 'Misraim' (Egypt) but to 'Misrim' (the N. Arabian Musri) that Hadad and his Mizrite followers fled, and he went there because MEHETABEL (g.v., 1), his mother, was a Misrite. This N. Arabian land appears, both at this time and later, to have had a keen interest in the affairs of Palestine (see MIZRAIM, § 2 l). In what the 'mischief' which Hadad did to Israel on his return consisted, we are not informed (see EDOM, § 6). See Winckler, AT Unters. 1:6; Benzinger, in KCH; Ki. in HK; Che. JQR 11:557-566 (90). Winckler's attempted analysis of the Hadad narrative, though it has given a healthy stimulus to critics, was not preceded by a sufficiently thorough examination of the text. T. K. C.

HADAD-RIMMON (הַדָּד רִמְמוֹן; ΡΩΜΟΝΟC [BNAQT]; حَدَاد رَمْمون; Adadremmon), according to the usual interpretation of Zech. 12:11, a place in the plain of Megiddo (מִגְדּוֹ) where a great views. lamentation had taken place; it is further held that the occasion of the mourning was the death of JOSIAH (g.v., 1) on the battlefield near Megiddo.

This view dates from Jerome, who states (Comm. in Zach.) that Adadremmon is a village near Jezreel now called Maximianopolis. The latter place was an important station between Caesarea and Jezreel, and von Raumer has, with probability, identified it with Legcon or Legio, the ancient MEGIDDO (g.v.).

What authority (if any) Jerome had for his assertion, we know not; at any rate, we cannot connect Maximianopolis-Adadremmon with the modern village Rummäneh (so Van de Velde, Baudissin), for to this theory there is a geographical objection (see Buhl, 209), and any place with a pomegranate tree might be called Rimmon (whence Rummäneh). Apart from this, however, the traditional theory labours under these difficulties—that the state mourning for Josiah cannot have been elsewhere than in Jerusalem (2 K. 23:29 f.), and that Megiddo is מִגְדּוֹ, not מִגְדּוֹ.

The Targ. mentions the Josiah-theory only in the second place, and combines with it another, according to which Hadad-rimmon, son of Tab-rimmon, was the slayer of Ahab, king of Israel, so that the phrase of the prophetic writer of Zech. 12:11 really means 'the mourning for Ahab ben Omri.'

Baudissin (Stud. zur Sem. Rel.-gesch. 1:320) gives a new form to the Josiah-theory, explaining the disputed phrase, 'as the mourning for the battle of Hadad-rimmon.' This is surely unnatural; nor can it be proved that there ever was such a place as Hadad-rimmon.

Hitzig and Movers see a reference to the mourning for the mythic Adonis (g.v.) mortally wounded by a boar (Macroh. 121); 'women weeping for Tammuz' are referred to in Ezek. 8:14; 'the only one' (קַיִד), Zech. 12:10 may also, it is held,¹ refer to Adonis. The obvious objection is that RIMMON (g.v., i.) is certainly the Assyrian Storm-god Rammān. Even if the pomegranate tree was sacred to Tammuz, it is hazardous to suppose that Tammuz was called Rimmon.

There is need of a new theory which shall unite the elements of truth in earlier theories, and justify itself from some new source. The mourning for the only one' and 'the mourning of Hadad-rimmon' are parallel; the referenc is to the mourning for TAMMUZ (g.v.). The original reading, however, was not Hadad-rimmon. חַבְדָּר read simply Rimmon (רִמּוֹן). What then is the mythological name nearest to Rimmon that can stand in such a connection? The answer is, Either Migdon, or some name out of which Migdon is corrupted.

Jensen has conjectured that μαγεδων in the apocalyptic αρμαγεδων (see ARMAGEDDON) may be identical with μυγαδων in υεσσυμυγαδων, the name of a god of the underworld, corresponding to ερεσχιναλ, the Babylonian Persephone;² and it has elsewhere been shown (see GOG) that 'Gog' and 'Magog' in Ezek. 38:39 are both corruptions of Migdon. Still, the Greek μυγαδων and the Hebrew Migdon do not seem to be identical. Υεσσυμυγαδων is probably Eshmun-Adon (Eshmun and Adonis were identified in Cyprus); if so, μυγαδων comes from μυναδων. But מִגְדוֹן, Migdon, given by MT in Zech. 12:11, is most probably a corruption of [מגדון]—i.e., Tammuz-Adon. This is suggested by the only possible emendation of the corrupt word בְּכַתֵּק in Zech. 12:11, and of the equally corrupt word בְּחָךְ in Is. 66:17 (see TAMMUZ), viz. בְּכַתוֹ. The women who wept for the 'חַיִּיר, or for 'Tammuz-Lord', are naturally referred to in a prophecy so much influenced by Ezekiel. On the other hand, whereas Ezekiel takes Tammuz as a symbol of the power opposed to God (cp Belial, if this comes from Belli, the name of the sister of Tammuz, and goddess of the underworld, see BELIAL), the author of Zech. 12:11-13 merely refers to the mourning for Tammuz as an image of the mourning of the house of David and the inhabitants of Jerusalem for some great offence committed by them in the past. Render, 'In that day there shall be a great mourning in Jerusalem as the mourning of the women who weep for Tammuz-adon.'

'Hadadrimmon' may be neglected; apparently it owes its origin to a scribe's error. By a common accident מְגִדוֹן became מְדוֹן; then a too clever scribe converted מְדוֹן into מְרוֹן, and glossed Rimmon by Hadad (Hadad and Rammān or Rimmon were in fact identified). Thus the plausible reading Hadad-Rimmon grew up, and the door was opened to Jerome's misapprehension. Possibly 'Armagedon' in Rev. 16:16 (AV) is due to the conflation of two readings, 'Magedon' and 'Adarremman' (αδαρρεμμαν, for Hadadrimmon). For a parallel to the combination of מְרוֹן and מְגִדוֹן, two rival readings in Zech. 12:11, see MIGRON. T. K. C.

HADASHAH (הַדָּשָׁה)—i.e., 'new [town]'; ΔΔΑΔΑΝ [B], -ΔΑ [A], -ΔΑ [L]), a town in the lowland of Judah, named between Zenan and Migdal-gad (Josh. 15:37†).

According to the Mishna ('Eruḇin, 56) it was the smallest place in Judah. Sayce (Pat. Pal. 165, 236) finds this name in the lists of Rameses II. and III.; but see W. M. Müller's remark (Is. u. Eur. 166 top). It is to be distinguished from ADASA (g.v.). T. K. C.

HADASSAH (הַדָּסָה, § 69, 'myrtle'; cp ΜΥΡΤΙΔΑ, ΜΥΡΡΙΝΗ; but see MYRTLE), the Jewish name of ESTHER (g.v., § 7) in Esth. 2:7 (om. Ḥ^{BAL}).

HADRACH

HADATTAH (הַדַּתָּה), Josh. 15:25. See HAZOR-HADATTAH.

HADES (ἍΔΗΣ). 1. The word occurs ten times in RV of NT (AV 'hell') for the nether world (but 'unto Hades' in Mt. 11:23 is metaphorical); in 1 Cor. 15:55 [not Ti. WH], Rev. 6:8, and 20:13; this nether world is personified, like Shēōl in Hos. 13:14. In Mt. 16:18 it is represented as a city with gates like Shēōl in Ps. 9:13 [14] (see GATE).

2. Hades is Ḥ's common rendering of she'ol, שְׁאוֹל (see SHEOL). But also employed to render other expressions; (a) Is. 14:19 (אֲבְנֵי בָרָה), 38:18 (וְיִרְיִיבֹרָה); see PIT; (b) Is. 28:15 Prov. 14:12 16:25 (חַיִּים), Joh 3:22 (חַיִּים); see DEAD, THE, § 2; (c) Ps. 94:17 115:17 (רְיֹבָה) (see SILENCE); (d) Job 38:17 (צַלְמוֹת); see SHADOW OF DEATH. On the Hebrew equivalent, see SHEOL, and (on the whole subject) ESCHATOLOGY (see index under 'Shēōl').

HADID (הַדִּיד; אֲדִידֵי [AL]; cp the corrupt CALAMOLALUS of 1 Esd. 5:22). Our notices of Hadid are all post-exilic. Its people, along with those of Ono and Lod (Lydda), are included in the list (see EZRA ii., § 9, § 8c) of 'children of the province,' Ezra 2:33 (אֲרָוֶשׁ [B])=Neh. 7:37 (אדיא [B^N]), and according to Neh. 11:34*f.* (אדωδ [N^ca mg. inf. L]; B^N*A om. passage), these were among the places in Judæa that were inhabited by Benjamites.

The list of Benjamite towns, however, in Josh. 18 mentions none of them, though, according to the Mishna (Arākhin, 96), Hadid and Ono were fortified as early as the time of Joshua, and 1 Ch. 8:12 asserts that Ono and Lod, with the towns thereof, were 'built' by Shemed a descendant of Benjamin.

Hadid, or, in its Greek form, ADIDA in the Sphēhlah, (אֲדִידֵי [NA]), but also 'over against the plain' (ἐν ἀδῖδοις [A], αδεινοῖς [N*], αδειδ. [N^c-a], αδιμοῖς [V], κατὰ πρὸς ὄπισθεν τοῦ πεδίου) was at any rate fortified and 'made strong with gates and bars' by Simon the Maccabee (1 Macc. 12:38 13:13; cp GASM. HG 202).

As Αδῖδα or Αδῖδα it is also referred to by Josephus, from whom (B^J iv. 9:1) we learn that it commanded the road from the coast to Jerusalem.

Jerome (Onom. 931) describes Aditha as near Diospolis (Lydda) in an easterly direction. This enables us with considerable probability to identify it with the modern el-Hadithe, about half an hour eastward from Lydda, and since Thotmes III. in his Karnak list refers to Hadid among other southern cities as Ḥuditi (no. 76), it is probable that the modern form correctly represents the ancient name. Cp WMM As. u. Eur. 159, 165. T. K. C.

HADLAI (הַדְּלָי), an Ephraimite, father of Amasa, 2 Ch. 28:12 (χουδα [B], αδα [A], αδα [L]).

HADORAM (הַדֹּרָם), 'the beloved of the High One' ? Baeth. Beitr. 67, u. 6. Possibly for הַדְּרָם. Hilprecht ['98] mentions a Jewish name Addu-ramu [see ADONIRAM]. Cp Sayce, RP (2) 470 ['90].¹ For another view see Hommel, Exp. T. 10:329 [Ap. '99]; אדוראμ [L]).

1. A son of Joktan (Gen. 10:27; αδωρα [AE], -μ [L]; 1 Ch. 1:21; om. B, αδουραμ [A]). The name is obscure. D. H. Müller (Burg. u. Schlösser, 1360*f.*) and Glaser (Skizze, 2426*f.* 435) compare Dauram near Šan'a (which is identified with UZAL [g.v.] in Yemen. The name seems to appear in Sabzean as הַדְּרָם [CIS iv. 11]).

2. Son of Toi (see TOU); 1 Ch. 18:10 (αδουραμ [B], -ραμ [M], δουραμ [A]). The same form should be restored (with Ew., We., Bu., HPSim.) for JORAM in 2 S. 8:10, where Ḥ has αδουραμ [BAL] [Josephus has ἀδωραμος] = הַדְּרָם (on which form cp IDDO ii.). Sayce's remark on the name 'Joram' (Early Hist. Heb. 423) will hardly be accepted.

3. 2 Ch. 10:18, see ADONIRAM.

HADRACH (הַדְּרַח, אֲדַרַח [BN; -K, AQ]=Shadrach), a region of Syria, mentioned by an archaism in Zech. 9:1 (late; see ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF, § 6).

'A word has Yahweh sent into Hadrach, and upon Damascus does it light; for Yahweh's are the people of Aram, as well as all the tribes of Israel.'²

² Insert שְׁלַח after הַדְּרַח (Is. 9:7 [8]), and, with Ball, read אֲרָם אֶם (Am. 1:5). See JQR 10:581 ('98).

1932

In Rabbinic times, the name was explained on the same principles as ABRECH as 'sharp-tender,' a compound name of the Messiah. The view did not satisfy every one, however, and R. José, whose mother was from Damascus, identified Hadrach with a locality near that city, bearing the same name.¹ This evidence stood alone till the name Ḥatarika was found in the Assyrian inscriptions sometimes beside Damascus, sometimes beside Zoba, Zemar, and Arka. In the list of eponyms, three expeditions to the land or city of Hadrach are recorded in 772, 765, and 755 (COT 2190 ff.; cp Del. Par. 279)—and in Tiglath-pileser III.'s account of his war with 'Az(s?)riyāhu Jaudai' (see UZZIAH) the city of Ḥatarika is mentioned as tributary to Assyria (KB 227).

Lately the name Hadrach has been detected in a corrupt word in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5:21; see KADESH, 2). Hadrach seems to have formed part of the Hittite country, and furnished men to Siserā's army. Certainly too חדרך should be restored in Ezek. 47:15 for the impossible חדרך. See HETHLON.

HAGAB (חגב, § 68, 'grasshopper'; cp HAGABA, HAGABAH; אגב [BAL]), a family of NETHINIM (g.v.), in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii. § 9); Ezra 2:46 = Neh. 7:48 (גבא [N], om. NIT ^Q EV) = 1 Esd. 5:30† (AGABA AV, ACCABA RV; אקאבא [B], גאבא [A]). The same name is borne by a NT prophet (AGABUS; Acts 11:28 21:10).

HAGABAH (חגבה, § 68; 'grasshopper,' Ezra [Aram.] or Hagaba (חגבה, Neh.), a family of NETHINIM (g.v.) in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii. § 9); Ezra 2:45 (אגבא [BAL]) = Neh. 7:48 (אגבא [BNL]; אגבא [A]) = 1 Esd. 5:29 (GABA, RV AGGABA, אגבא [B^ab m^g.A], אגבא [L]).

HAGAR, and Hagrites or Hagarenes (חגרה, ² חגריה, חגריה; אגרה [BADEQL]; οι αγραρηνοι [BTL]). Hagar is introduced to us in Gen. 16:1 [J] as an Egyptian slave of Sarah, a description which is repeated by P in v. 3. All the three narrators (J, E, and P) agree that she bore Ishmael to Abraham, and it is plain that the story of her flight or expulsion symbolically expresses the separation of the Ishmaelites from the Israelites.³

1. Hagar in Hexateuch. E, and P) agree that she bore Ishmael to Abraham, and it is plain that the story of her flight or expulsion symbolically expresses the separation of the Ishmaelites from the Israelites.³

We have two parallel versions (Gen. 16:2 4-7 11-14 [J] 21:8-21 [E]) of this story and of the oracle respecting Ishmael given at a well in the desert (see BEER-LAHAI-ROI); these have been harmonised by means of an interpolated passage (16:8-10) in which Hagar is commanded to return to her mistress. The interpolator, however, does not express the intention of the original tradition; probably J made Hagar give birth to Ishmael at Beer-lahai-roi (We. CH⁽²⁾ 21 f.). That Hagar appears as a slave-woman is a necessary consequence of the theory on which the Hebrew myth is based, the notion being that Ishmael was of inferior origin. (On the geographical details of these narratives, cp ISHMAEL, § 1, MIZRAIM, § 2 [δ].)

Like Ishmael and his twelve sons, Hagar is no doubt the personification of a tribe or district. In several passages of the OT we read of a nomadic people called the Hagrites. In Saul's days the tribe of Reuben waged a successful war against them, seized their tents and took possession of their territory throughout all the land to the E. of Gilead (1 Ch. 5:10 RV Hagrites, AV Hagarites; τοὺς παροίκους [BA]). This campaign is perhaps identical with that described in vv. 18-22 (v. 19 οὐ ἀγαράτοι [A], v. 20 ἀγεράτοι [B], ἀγορ. [A]) of the same chapter, which refer to victories gained by the tribes beyond Jordan over the Hagrites and other foes (Jetur, Naphish, and Nodab). The numbers, it is true, are here enormously exaggerated, and the whole story is moulded in accordance with the religious conceptions of the later Jews; but observe that the principal booty consists of camels; the people in question must therefore be nomads. In 1 Ch. 27:31 (ὁ γαδारी [L], ὁ γαπερίτης [B], ὁ ἀγαρίτης [A]), a Hagrite (RV; AV 'Hagerite') figures as chief overseer of David's flocks; but Hagri ('a Hagrite') in 1 Ch. 11:38 is an incorrect reading (see HAGRI). Ps. 83:6 [γ] (οὐ ἀγαρηνοὶ [B*²NAR], οὐ ἀγαρηνοὶ [B^bT]) (Maccabean) mentions the Hagrites (EV Hagarenes) among the enemies of Israel.

Moreover Eratosthenes (cited by Strabo, 767) classes the Ἀγραῖοι with the Nabateans and the Chauloteans, placing them to the E. of Petra. Dionysius (Perieg. 956), who refers to the Ἀγρεῖς in connection with the Nabateans and the Chaulasians, seems to have derived his information from Eratosthenes. Ptol. (6:18), presumably following some ancient authority, couples the Ἀγραῖοι with the Βοραναῖοι, —i.e., the inhabitants of Bashan, a district which, at least during certain periods, was occupied by Israelites. These statements are all in harmony.

The Hagrites, we must suppose, were a pastoral people who wandered hither and thither in the Syrian desert to the E. of the Israelites. What is the precise ethnographical relationship denoted by the portrayal of Hagar as the mother of Ishmael remains altogether obscure, like so many other genealogical affinities between the mythical ancestors of tribes.¹

The Agreei of Pliny, 6:28 (§ 154), have no connection with the Hagrites, but dwelt, on the contrary, in Yemen; the occurrence of the name in another passage (ib. § 161) depends on a hazardous conjecture.

In later times the term 'Hagarenes' was applied by Christians to Muslims, and from the name of Hagar the Syrians even formed the verb ahagar or ethaggar, 'to become a Muslim,' as well as the noun Maherāyā, 'a Muslim,' whence are derived the late Greek words μαχαρίτης, μαχαρίσιμός, μαχαρίζειν; but all this is based simply on the OT, the name of the bondswoman being attached, by way of insult, to her supposed descendants.

T. N.

A word must be added regarding the use made of the story of Hagar by Paul (Gal. 4:24-26). The apostle neither affirms nor denies the historical character of the narrative; his sole interest is in its esoteric meaning. To this he attaches the greatest weight, as it enables him, in accordance with Rabbinical methods, to prove the temporariness of the Jewish religion. Hagar and Ishmael, Sarah and Isaac are therefore allegoric (ἀλληγοροῦμενα); the Sinaitic 'covenant' corresponds to Hagar, the Christian to Sarah (contrast Philo's explanation: Drummond, Philo Judaeus, 2243 ff.). As Hagar was a bondswoman, so too is the present Jerusalem; as Sarah was free, so also is 'Jerusalem which is above.' Let the Galatian Christians, who belong to this Jerusalem, refuse to be forced under the Sinaitic covenant, lest they fall under the doom of Hagar and her son.

The sense of the passage has been obscured by the gloss, pointed out by Bentley and others,² τὸ δὲ Ἀγαρ Σίνα ὄρος ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ Ἀραβίᾳ (WH; 'Now this Hagar is Mt. Sinai in Arabia'); the following words συντοιχεῖ δὲ are really the continuation of ἦτις ἐστὶν Ἀγαρ (v. 24); probably, however, we should read, not συντοιχεῖ δὲ, but συντοιχοῦσα (D*²FG; pr. ἡ FG; qui conjunctus est, Vg, Vctn.). What does the gloss mean? Some (cp the comment of Chrys.) assume that hajar, 'a stone,' was a name given to Mt. Sinai by the Arabs whom Paul had met. The order of the words τὸ δὲ Ἀγαρ Σίνα ὄρος (instead of ὄρος Σίνα, as in v. 24), however, favours the view that Ἀγαρ is a later addition to the gloss, and there is strong MS authority (NCFG) for the omission of Ἀγαρ. The recognition of this makes the gloss more intelligible. (RV adopts the reading τὸ γάρ, but γάρ is evidently an alteration to improve the sense.)

T. N. § 1 f.; T. K. C. § 3.

¹ The only reference to the Hagrites ('sons of Hagar') in the Apocrypha is in Baruch 3:23, where they are mentioned together with Teman, and described as those 'who seek after wisdom.'

HAGGAI

HAGGAI or [in 1 Esd.] AGGEUS, AGGÆUS (חַגַּי; Ἀγγαῖος [BNAQI¹];¹ perhaps 'born on the feast day,' § 72; unless -ai is substituted for -yah

1. The name [cp MATTEAI, ZACCAI]. In this case Haggai = either Hag-iah, 'feast of Yahwè' [Olsh. § 277 b], or, by contraction, Hagariah, 'Yahwè hath girded' [We. in Bleek's Eintl.⁽⁴⁾ 434]. Hilprecht has found the Jewish name Haggai on a tablet of fifth century B.C. from Nippur, PEFO Jan. '98, p. 55). A contemporary of Zechariah, with whom he was associated in his prophetic ministry (Ezra 5:1-2 Esd. 6:1-3).

His book contains four short prophecies delivered between the first day of the sixth month and the twenty-fourth day of the ninth month—that is, between September and December—of the second year of 'Darius the king'—i.e., of Darius Hystaspis (521-485 B.C.). From the language of the prophet in chap. 2:3 we may perhaps infer with Ewald that Haggai was one of those who had seen the temple 'in its former glory,' and that his prophetic work began in extreme old age. This supposition agrees well with the shortness of the period covered by his book, and with the fact that Zechariah, who began to prophesy in the same autumn, afterwards appears as the leading prophet in Jerusalem (Zech. 7:1-4). Whether he was ever in Babylonia or whether he had been continuously in Jerusalem (cp 'her [Jerusalem's] prophets,' Lam. 2:9), we are not told, nor can we venture to trust the later traditions respecting him (in the Vita Prophetarum ascribed to Epiphanius, and copied by Dorotheus and by Hesychius of Jerusalem).² His name occurs in the titles of certain psalms in LXX (Pss. 112 [R] 145-148 149 [R]) and other versions; but no inference can be drawn from this. These titles vary in the MSS, and Eusebius did not find them in the Hexaplar \mathfrak{G} .³ They have no critical value.

(a) In his first prophecy (1:1-11) Haggai rebukes the people for leaving the temple unbuilt while they themselves dwell in panelled houses. The prevalent famine and distress are 'because of Yahwè's house that lies waste, while the Jews are zealous (enough) for their own houses.'⁴ Let them build the house, and Yahwè will take pleasure in it and glorify himself' (i.e., accept the honour paid to him). The rebuke took effect, and the people began to work at the temple under the leadership of Zerubbabel the governor and Joshua the high priest (1:12-15).⁵

2. The four prophecies.

(b) In a second prophecy (2:1-9), delivered in the following month, Haggai forbids the people to be disheartened by the apparent meanness of the new temple. The silver and

¹ In Hag. 1:1 \mathfrak{G} ¹⁸ has ἀγγεος, a reading adopted by \mathfrak{G} ¹⁸ in every passage.

² See the double recension in Nestle, Marg. (Haggai, pp. 26 ff.). Epiphanius says that Haggai came up from Babylon while still young, prophesied of the return of the people, saw (in part) the building of the temple, and on his death received an honoured burial near the priests. The fuller recension adds, καὶ αὐτὸς ἐψάλλεν ἐκεῖ πρῶτος ἀλληλουῖα· ὃ ἐρμηνεύεται αἰνέσωμεν τῷ ζῶντι θεῷ ἀμην (sic). It closes with the words, διὸ λέγομεν ἀλληλουῖα, ὃ ἐστὶν ὕμνος Ἀγγαίου καὶ Ζαχαρίου.

³ On this subject cp Köhler, Ueissag. Haggai's, 32; Wright, Zech. and his prophecies, Introd. xix. f.; B. Jacob, ZATW 16 290 [96]; and see note on Ps. 145:1 in Field's Hexapla.

gold are the Lord's. Soon 'he will shake all nations, and the choicest things (point תְּבוֹרֹת) of all nations will come' (i.e., will be brought) to adorn his house. Its glory will be greater than that of the former temple, and in this place Yahwè will give peace. Here \mathfrak{G} adds, καὶ ἐτίμηθη ψυχῆς εἰς περιποίησιν παντὶ τῷ κτίσονται τοῦ ἀναστήσασθαι τὸν ναὸν τοῦτον, which Wellhausen cleverly reproduces in Hebrew so as to give the sense, 'and rest of soul, to repair all the foundation, to raise this temple.' Probably the passage really belongs to Haggai, and was omitted by a later scribe in deference to the narrative of the Chronicler (so Now.).

(c) A third prophecy (2:10-19) contains a promise, enforced by a figure drawn from the traditional theory of holiness, that God will remove famine and bless the land from the day of the foundation of the temple onwards. 2:17 is inserted in an incorrect form from Am. 4:9 (We.).

(d) Finally, in 2:20-23 (unnecessarily doubted by Böhme) a special prophecy is addressed to Zerubbabel, who is not indeed expressly called a son of David, but receives a promise which is hardly intelligible unless he were one. 'I will shake the heavens and the earth,' is the terrifying exordium; 'I will overthrow the throne of kingdoms, and destroy the strength of the kingdoms of the heathen.' But fear not, O Zerubbabel, for 'in that day, I will make thee as a signet' (thus reversing the doom of Zerubbabel's grandfather, Jeconiah, in Jer. 22:24), 'for I have chosen thee.' To what high dignity Zerubbabel is called, we are not expressly told; but, comparing Zech. 6:12/6, we cannot doubt that he is to become the Messianic king. See ZERUBABEL.

(e) What induced Haggai (and Zechariah) to come forward in the second year of Darius with the exhortation to rebuild the temple and the promise of kingship to Zerubbabel?

3. Difficulties.

Why had they waited sixteen years before stirring up the people to restore the sanctuary? And why did they address their promises to Zerubbabel rather than to his predecessor? The answer is that a startling historical event had opened their eyes to the will and purpose of Yahwè. Just after the accession of Darius to the throne of Persia, revolts broke out in different parts of Eastern Asia. In Babylon, two pretenders successively assumed the favourite name of Nebuchadrezzar, and even where there was no rebellion the hope of the recovery of independence must have revived.¹ Can we doubt that such hopes were awakened in Judah? Must not Yahwè's prophets have heard in these events the rumbling of the chariot-wheels of the Most High? Of a surety, the Messianic era was at hand, and the temple must be quickly prepared to receive the Great King.

(f) Another question forces itself upon the mind. What is the cause of the indifference of the Jews to the desolate condition of their sanctuary? The restoration of the temple and its worship was the necessary expression of the faith that the service of Yahwè was the true national vocation of Israel. How was it that, so soon after 527 B.C., the people of Jerusalem so completely forgot their ideal calling as the nation of the true God? Our surprise would be diminished if Haggai made any allusion to a party of stricter adherents of the Law and more zealous worshippers of Yahwè. Allusions of this kind, however, which are not wanting in the post-exilic Palestinian portions of Is. 40-66, are not to be found in this book. Some scholars think that the only natural explanation is that no considerable body of exiles had as yet returned, and that those who had arrived (in the train of Sheshbazzar?) belonged to the more secular-minded portion of the Babylonian community. The people whom Haggai addresses in 2:3 as having, some of them, seen the first temple, are in fact (it is thought) almost entirely Jews who had never been to Babylon.

(g) A third question may arise—how is it that Haggai makes no direct reference to moral duties? In this respect he falls below Zechariah. The reason may possibly be that the notes of his prophecies are incomplete. We need not therefore believe that the only command of Yahwè the neglect of which he regrets is the erection of a house for Yahwè's dwelling-place. It remains true, however, that both Haggai and Zechariah give precedence to a duty which to us must appear a secondary one. Both stood on the threshold of a new age, and though they performed the task of the moment successfully they had not the varied gifts which the creation of a new people demanded. See ZECHARIAH, § 2.

The style of Haggai is truly described by Kirkpatrick (Sm. DB⁽²⁾ 1265) as tame and prosaic. Evidently the notes of his discourses have not been touched up by a more literary writer; his repetitions have not been pruned. Telling passages, however, are not altogether wanting (see 169 216), and the frequent interrogations give life to the addresses.

Among older books, the learned commentary of Marckius may be specially mentioned, nor must we omit Rosenmüller's still useful Scholia. Köhler's comm. ('60) is elaborate and valuable. Reinke's work ('68) gives the views of a scholarly Roman Catholic. It is hardly needful to mention Pusey, Wellh., GASm., Dods, and the books of introduction. Duhm's Theol. des Propheten ('75), however, should be added to the student's list for a historical view of the place of Haggai as a prophet, and Koster's Het herstel van Israel (pp. 19-24) for a suggestive treatment of the question, Were there returned exiles among the people addressed by Haggai and Zechariah? HAGIA (אַרְרַיִם [BA]), 1 Esd. 5:34 AV=Ezra 2:57, HATTIL [g.v.].

HAGRI, AV Haggeri (הַגְּרִי, 'a Hagrite'; אַרְרַיִם [B^a], ἀγαρη [A], ἀγηρι [L]), an incorrect reading for 'the Gadite,' הַגְּרִי, in 1 Ch. 11:38†, where 'Mibhar son of Hagri' should rather be '... of Zobah, Bani the Gadite' as in 2 S. 23:36 (see Dr. ad loc.).

HAI (הַי), Gen. 13:3 AV; RV AI (g.v., 1).

HAIL (הַרְדֵּי, cp Ar. barada, to be [become] cold; χαλαζα; אֲבָלִים¹ [Ezek. 13:113 (λιθογυς) πετροβολογυς.—i.e., אֲבָלִים? 38:22 χαλαζα]). Hailstones were devoutly regarded as proofs of God's might (Ecclus. 43:15 and Ⓢ); he kept them in his 'store chambers' (Job 38:22, cp SNOW); they served as his weapons (Josh. 10:11, cp Ecclus. 46:5 *f.*² Wisd. 5:22). Naturally, therefore, hail forms a feature in descriptions of judgment (e.g., Is. 28:17 [not Ⓢ] 30:30 32:19 Ezek. 13:113 33:22), and once in a description of a theophany (Ps. 18:12[13]), where, as often elsewhere, it is coupled with fire (lightning); cp Ps. 78:48 (see below) 105:32 148:8 Ecclus. 39:29 Rev. 8:7 cp 11:19.

² Read 'answered him with hail and flint-stones' (see Heb. text).

Hail is also mentioned with 'voices (thunder) in Ex. 9:23 28 f. 33 f., and in Ps. 148:8 is not far off from 'storm wind.' This too is perfectly natural. The most destructive hailstones are those which accompany a tornado or a violent thunderstorm. Perhaps we may assume such a combination for the great overthrow of the Canaanite kings at Beth-horon (Josh. 10:11; cp Judg. 5:20), when more died by the hailstones than by the sword of Israel. Hail frequently accompanies the thunderstorms of winter and spring in Palestine¹ (GASm. HG 64). Certainly such a combination is presupposed in the two, or strictly speaking, three, notices of the plague of hail in Egypt (Ex. 9:13-35 Ps. 78:47^b), to which we now turn. The former, which is the only original one, is 'conflate'—i.e., it has been produced by the fusion of two distinct accounts,² one of which does not know of a plague of locusts, and makes the crops to be destroyed by the hail, while the other says nothing of a plague of murrain, and makes the hailstones fall upon man and beast. Hence the cattle, though destroyed in Ex. 9:6, are still presupposed in 9:22. The poetic version of the plagues in Ps. 78 devotes one distich to the locusts, and two to the hail, if MT is correct. Sym., however, reads 'pestilence,' 'murrain,' where MT gives הַרְדֵּי 'hail' in v. 48a. This is most probably correct.³ If so, the psalmist transposes the plague of hail and the plague of murrain.

It is remarkable that he says nothing of the destruction of human life caused by the hail; also that (if the text is correct) he uses the very unusual word הָרַג ('to kill') in speaking of the destruction of the vines, and, as a parallel to 'hail,' in v. 47, an otherwise unknown and perfectly inexplicable word (הַרְדֵּי, EV 'frost'; mg. 'great hailstones'; Ⓢ παχύνη, 'rime'; Aq. κρυος; but Sym. σάληξ, 'worm'; and Tg. בְּרוּבָא, 'locust,' as if reading הַרְדֵּי). Both these words appear to be corrupt. Adopting the most probable emendations we obtain this quatrain:

He wasted their vines with hail,
And their fig-trees with hot coals;
He gave their cattle over to the murrain,
And their flocks to burning sickness.⁴

The narrative represents the hailstorm as occurring at the end of January (Ex. 9:31), a month during which hailstorms may very well occur. In summer they are rare; according to Pruner (Di.-Rys. Ex. Lev. 98) in twelve summers hail only fell thrice, and then not very much. Prof. Macalister (Hastings' DB 2:281) mentions stones which fell in a brief hail-shower in Egypt on 13th Aug. 1832, which weighed several ounces. In Rev. 16:21 we read of hailstones of the weight of a talent—i.e., about two cubic feet in bulk. This is the weight ascribed to the stones cast at the Jews by the Romans at the siege of Jerusalem (Jos. BJ v. 63). T. K. C.

HAIR (שָׂרָף; θριξ). The question of the origin of the Israelitish race and the variations of the Israelitish type is too uncertain to be referred to in this connection. We can therefore only state, with regard to the colour of the hair, that in Canticles, which represents the conventionalised type of a Jew and a Jewess in the country districts in the

latter part of the OT period, the hair that receives poetic eulogy is black. Neglecting the opening words of Cant. 5 11, which describe the head of the bridegroom as 'the most fine gold'—an unintelligible and doubtless corrupt phrase,¹ we find in the next line that 'his locks are bushy, and black as a raven.' Elsewhere no doubt the hair of the bride is said to be 'like purple' (Cant. 7 5 [6]), and with a little ingenuity this might be plausibly explained (see Del. ad loc.), if we could venture to believe that the passage was correctly read in the received text. We must take care, however, not to commit such an offence against the ideal bride as to make her red-haired.² In Cant. 4 1 (6 5) the song-writer says, 'Thy hair is like a flock of goats, that lie along the side of Gilead'; it is plain that the goats of Palestine could by no caprice of language be called purple. Thus in post-exilic times the Jews considered dark hair as beautiful. Clear evidence of a similar estimate in pre-exilic times is wanting. We may reasonably assume, however, that David's hair was dark, for it is represented in Michal's stratagem by a net of goat's hair (1 S. 19 13), and when the youthful David is called אֶרְכָּנִי (1 S. 16 12 17 42), this means, not that he was red-haired³ like Esau (אֶרְכָּנִי שֵׁעָר, Gen. 25 25), but that he had not yet become browned by exposure to the sun. Kitto⁴ thinks that Eccles. 12 5 contains a reference to the striking contrast in a mixed assembly between the snow-white head of an old man and the jet black heads of the younger men.

There is certainly no better explanation to propose for אֶרְכָּנִי (cp ALMOND); but the reading is uncertain, and the object of the little פֶּגֶם to which the phrase belongs is disputed.

It would accord well with the ordinary view if the same writer used the expression 'black hair'⁵ as a synonym for 'youth' (Eccles. 11 10); but no stress can safely be laid upon this. Kitto's remark is at any rate illustrative of Prov. 16 31 20 29 (cp 2 Macc. 6 23), where 'gray hairs' (שֵׁיבֵרָה) are represented as the ornament of old men, no doubt because the wicked were supposed not to reach old age. It must have shocked Jewish sentiment (cp Mt. 5 36) when Herod (if the story is true) dyed his hair black, to conceal his advanced age (Jos. Ant. xvi. 81). Of wigs we hear nothing in the Bible, though such toilet articles were common in ancient Egypt (Erman, Anc. Eg. 219-223).

Quite incidentally the prophet Ezekiel (8 3) shows us how well rooted the bushy locks of the Israelites were (cp LOCKS). This native vigour is one of the presuppositions of the story of Samson. 'Beguile him,' said the Philistine princes to Delilah, 'and see how it comes that he is so strong' (Judg. 16 5); and Samson replies at last, 'If I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man' (v. 17). It is true, Samson's strength was held to be due to his consecrated character; but this is not the whole of the secret. His hair was the symbol of that natural strength which the Nazirite vow placed under the divine protection.

The true origin of Samson's hair is a matter of conjecture. It is probable enough that the hair of the 'solar one' (שֶׁשֶׁשׁוֹן) originally meant the rays of the sun. In Job 39 41 18 [10] the eyelids or eyelashes of the dawn (or rather, of the sun; see LUCIFER) were the rays of the sun⁶ (see Schubertens, Comm. in Jobum, 161).

Hence too in Ps. 68 21 [22], if MT is correct, we read—

³ So Kitto (Bib. Cycl.), Sayce (Races of the OT 74). Then, Klo. The מַי which follows אֶרְכָּנִי is not a corruption of אֶרְכָּנִי, 'hair' (Klo.'s view), but a prematurely written אֶרְכָּנִים.

⁴ Kitto, Bib. Cycl., art. 'Hair.' The passage gives striking expression to the still prevalent view.

⁵ אֶרְכָּנִים is so explained by Del. and Wildeboer following Targ. and Rab. interpretation.

⁶ For more distant parallels (Greek, Latin, American) see Goldziher, Heb. Mythology, 137. See especially Wilken, 'De Simonsage,' De Gids, 2303 ('88).

Yea, God smites asunder the head of his foes,
The hairy crown that stalks on in his sins.¹

He who placed his long hair and his corresponding physical strength at the service of his sins challenged God to interpose and crush him. Hair and strength are here once more related. To a Jew it must therefore have seemed a striking paradoxical expression, when, in the picture of an anthropomorphic God, it was said, 'The hair of his head was like pure wool' (Dan. 7 9). The colour indicated that he was 'ancient in days'; but the 'fiery stream' which was 'before him' proved that his white hair was no symbol of weakness. Compare Rev. 1 14.

On the Nazirite vow see NAZIRITE. Analogous to it is the consecration of their hair by warriors, supposed to be referred to in the words פָּקַעַע פְּקָרָהוּ (Judg. 5 2), which Robertson Smith rendered,² 'for that flowing locks were worn in Israel.'³ We must not suppose, however, that Israelites, in time of peace, wore their hair short. To be sure, there were barbers (Ezek. 5 1; see BEARD); but the popular sentiment or superstition about hair justifies us in assuming that an Israelite's hair was only trimmed, especially in front, not cut close; and it is not probable that the author of 2 S. 14 25-27 would have wished to make us laugh at Absalom's vanity. Cp, however, ABSALOM.

That Absalom employed the barber only once a year is told us in order to explain how it was that his hair (and also his strength?) was so abundant. Probably it is not a whit more historical than the story in Josephus (Ant. viii. 7 3) of the 'horse guards' of Solomon, who had gold dust sprinkled every day on their long hair. The writer may be of the post-exilic age (Bu.); certainly his sole aim is to glorify Absalom.

On the other hand, to express contempt for a man, it was enough to call him a 'bald head' (2 K. 2 23; cp Is. 3 17 24), and the object of plucking out (Ezra 9 3) and shaving (Job 1 20) or disfiguring the hair of the head by throwing dust upon it (Job 2 12), and extending similar treatment to the beard, was to express the mourner's sense that he was cut off from all the pleasures and honours of ordinary life. See MOURNING CUSTOMS.

In this connection we may refer to a limitation placed by P on the high priest. He was neither to rend his clothes as a mourner, nor to let the hair of his head go loose (Lev. 21 10, cp 106). His hair was at all times to be tended in such a way as to enhance the popular respect for so exalted a personage. Ezekiel, too, gives this precept to the priests, 'They shall not shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only poll their heads' (Ezek. 44 20). They were to strike the mean between the practice of the Nazirites (Nu. 6 5) and the heathenish asceticism referred to in Lev. 19 27 21 5 Dt. 14 1 Am. 8 10 (see CUTTINGS, § 3).

That long hair was admired in women, is plain from Canticles (see above, § 1). One might almost infer from Jer. 7 29 that scissors were hardly applied to women's hair (on Dt. 21 12 see Driver's note), for the word rendered

'hair' (נֶזֶר) is the same which is applied elsewhere to the inviolable hair of the Nazirite (נִזְרִי). Certainly, as Kamphausen remarks, the goats, with whose black hair the hair of the ideal bride is compared (Cant. 4 1 6 5), were not shorn goats. Of the 'artful curls' (Is. 3 24, SBOT) of the ladies of Jerusalem in Isaiah's

² J. S. Black, Judges, 39 ('92).

³ Probably, however, v. 2 and v. 9 are duplicates (Marq., Ruben), and v. 9 should be used to correct v. 2. In this case the 'long hair' disappears, and, if Cheyne's emendation (JQR, July '99) be adopted, the verse will run: 'Bless Yahwé, O ye marshals of Israel, who displayed (such) zeal among the people.' וְיָרֵם לָנוּ בְּיַמֵּינוּ וּפְקָרָהוּ בְּיַמֵּינוּ (which was in fact inserted at the end of v. 2 as a correction).

time, we have no information. The Talmud, however, presents us with a word for the women's hair-dresser (קִשְׁטָר, cp MARY MAGDALENE), and the verb from which it comes means 'to plait.' Judith, one remembers, 'braided her hair' (διέταξε [διέταξε, N] τὰς τριχάς, 103) before entering the camp of Holofernes; and NT writers dissuade strongly from using πλέγματα (1 Tim. 29) and ἐμπλοκή τριχῶν (1 Pet. 33), and from adorning the hair with pearls and jewels. On 1 Cor. 11.4-15 see VEIL.

Illustrations from the Egyptian monuments are, as far as men's hair is concerned, of less importance than those from the Assyrian. Great pains were taken by Assyrians of high rank in the arrangement of their hair. As we see from the monuments, it was carefully combed down and parted into several braids or plaits, and was allowed to spread out upon the neck in a mass of curls. This, together with the similar use of braids or plaits among the Arabs,¹ illustrates the seven braids (mahléphôth, מַחֲלָפֹת) of Samson's hair mentioned in Judg. 16.13-19. Cp BEARD.

HAJEHUDIJAH (הַיְהוּדִיָּה), 1 Ch. 4.18 RV^{ms}; AV JEHUDIJAH (q.v.).

HAKKATAN (חַקְטָן), 'the small one,' § 66; אַק[כ]אַ-טָאן [BAL], father of JOHANAN (15) of the b'ne Azgad, a family in Ezra's caravan (see EZRA i., § 2; ii., § 15 [1] d), Ezra 8.12 = 1 Esd. 8.38f RV^{ms}, but AV ACATAN; RV AKATAN.

HAKUPHA (חַקּוּפָּה), 'crooked' (?); אַח[ע]יפּאָ [BA], a family of NETHINIM in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 9), Ezra 2.51 (אַפּוּפָּה [B], אָכוּפּאָ [AL]) = Neh. 7.53 (אַפּוּפָּה [B], om. HALAH (חַלָּה); אַח[א]אֶ [BA], ελλὰε [L]; in 2 K. 17.6 18.11 HALA; in 1 Ch. 5.26 חַלָּח [B], חַלָּא [A], אַח[א]אֶ [L], LAHELA; Pesh. always ܠܗܠܐ, a city or district, mentioned with Habor, the river of Gozan, and the 'cities (?) of Media', as one of the places colonised with Israelites from Samaria (2 K. 17.6 18.11; cp 1 Ch. 5.26). Schrader (KGF 167, n.; COT 1.268) combines it with a city called Halaḥhu mentioned in a geographical list (2 R. 53.36 ff.) between Arrapachitis and Rešeph, and Winckler (AOF 292) gives references (K. 109.22 etc.) for a land called Halaḥhu connected obscurely with Harrān. ^QPAL in 2 K. 17.6 and ^QL in 2 K. 18.11 treat Halah as one of the rivers of Gozan; but see GOZAN (end).

HALAK, MOUNT (חַלָּה הַהָרָה); א[א]ח[א]אֶ [AFL]. 'The smooth (or bare) mountain that goeth up to Seir' (i.e., in this passage, to the mountain district W. of the 'Arāba, bounded on the N. by the Wādī el-Marreh, the Wādī Madarah, and the Wādī el-Fikreh), is opposed as the limit of Canaan (or, more precisely, of Joshua's conquests) in the S. to Baal-gad, 'under Mt. Hermon,' in the N., Josh. 11.17 (אַחַעַל [B]), 12.7

(χέλα [B]), ἀλοκ [AL]). Elsewhere the S. frontier of Judah towards Edom is the 'ascent of AKRABBIM' (q.v.), which is the long winding pass on the route from Petra to Hebron fitly called the Nahb es-Safā, or Pass of the Bare Rock. This pass indeed could hardly be said to 'go up to Seir'; but not very far to the SW., in a wādy of the same name (the continuation of the Wel-Fikreh), stands the Jebel Madarah—a conical limestone hill or mountain, which no one descending to Edom could fail to notice, rising in isolation 'like a lofty citadel' (Rob. BR 2.589; Palmer, Desert of Exodus, 415, 418). This has been identified by Trumbull with Mt. Hor (see HOR, MOUNT, 1); it is at any rate safer to regard it as the 'bare mountain that goeth up to Seir.'

HALHUL (חַלְחֻל), perhaps 'full of hollows'; cp HOLON; ἀλογα [B], -γα [A], -γε [L], in the hill-country of Judah, grouped with Beth-zur and Gedor (Josh. 15.58); Jerome (OS 119.7) speaks of a village Alula near Hebron. No doubt it is the mod. Halhul, about 4 m. N. of Hebron, a village beautifully situated between Beit Šūr (BETH-ZUR) and Beit 'Aintūn (BETH-ANOTH); Jedūr (GEDOR, 1) lies to the N.

A village Alurus, where an Idumean army assembled, is mentioned in Josephus (B iv. 96); it is plausible to identify this name with Halhul (Buhl, Geogr. 158). The CHELLUS of Judith 19, however, lies elsewhere.

HALI (חַלִּי), if the text is right, an unidentified city of Asher; Josh. 19.25f (ἀλεφ [B], οολεϊ [A], ἀχει [L]).

Corruption, however, is not infrequent in these place-names, and we may possibly read (חַלְחֻל) cp ^QB; see HELBAH. To connect Hali with Alia (Guérin, Gal. 2.62; cp Buhl, 231) is hardly plausible.

HALICARNASSUS (Ἀλικαρνασσός [ANV]; mod. Budrun), a Carian city, on S. shore of the promontory which, with that of Cnidus to the S., encloses the Ceramic gulf, the mouth of which is occupied by the island of Cos. It is celebrated as the birthplace of Herodotus and the seat of Mausolus (inscr. and coins, Maussollos) whose tomb, built by his widow Artemisia, who was also his sister, was one of the seven wonders of the world (Strabo, 656). The town is mentioned incidentally in 1 Macc. 15.23 (referring to 139 B.C.) as containing a Jewish colony, like all the cities on this coast. The coinage seems to indicate that Halicarnassus did not share in the trade with Egypt in the fifth century B.C. to any great extent.

From Jos. Ant. xiv. 10.23 we learn that a decree of the city, passed under Roman influence (46 B.C.?), guaranteed that the Jews of Halicarnassus should be allowed, in addition to other privileges, 'to make their proseuchæ at the seaside, according to the customs of their forefathers' (τὰς προσηυχὰς ποιῆσθαι πρὸς τῇ θαλάττῃ κατὰ τὸ πάτριον ἔθος), which illustrates Acts 16.13 'without the gate by a river side, where we supposed there was a place of prayer' (ἐξὼ τῆς πόλεως παρὰ ποταμὸν ὅθ' ἐνομίζετο προσηυχῆ [ἐνομίζομεν προσηυχῆν WH] εἶναι, sc. at Philippi).

The town never recovered from its siege and capture by Alexander (334 B.C.). It was rebuilt in the third century B.C. Cicero, writing to his brother in 60 B.C., calls it 'diruta ac pæne deserta' (Ad Q. Fr. i. 1.25); but he is magnifying his brother's services towards the town during his governorship in the previous year.

See Newton, Hist. of Discov. at Hal., etc.; Travels and Discoveries in the Levant (views and plans). Fragments of the Mausoleum are in the British Museum. On the form of the name see Ramsay, Hist. Geogr. of A.M., 405.

HALLEL (חַלְלֵל), a Mishnic Hebrew derivative from חַלְלֵל, hillel, 'to praise,' is a term in synagogal liturgy, (1) for Pss. 113-118, specifically called חַלְלֵל הַמְצִיָּרִי, hallel hamisri, 'the Egyptian Hallel,' and recited during the Paschal meal on the night of the Passover, and also on eighteen other festal days of the year (Ta'ânith, 28b); and (2) for Ps. 136 (according to some Pss. 120-136 or 135.4-136; Pes. 118 a; Sôphêrim, 182), called חַלְלֵל הַגְּדוֹל, hallel haggādôl, 'the great Hallel.'

Rabban Gamaliel's words (M. Pēsāhim, 105) suggest that the reciting of the Hallel originated in the desire to

1. Origin and extent. amplify the passover celebration by rendering of special praise for Israel's deliverance from Egypt (hence its name 'the Egyptian Hallel'); and that the custom was in his time (Gamaliel was the teacher of Paul¹) only just in its inception. Some years later the extent of the Hallel was still in dispute; the school of Shammai favoured Ps. 113; the school of Hillel, Pss. 113 and 114 (Pes., ibid.). It should be observed that the connection in which the passage cited is found in the present arrangement of the Mishna suggests that this difference of opinion relates only to what became, by later additions, the first part of the Hallel. The compilation of the Mishna, however, is over a century later, and the injunction to close with a blessing for the deliverance indicates that here at some time was the end. During the first half of the second century the Hallel received considerable additions, and it probably reached then its present proportions. R. Tarphon and R. Akiba² (110-135 A.D.) supplied it with the closing blessing; after this, the second part, Pss. 115-118, was added, to be recited after the pouring out of the fourth cup; later, to this also was added a closing blessing, which was made to cover the entire song (M. Pes. 106). The Mishna no longer gives us the form of this blessing; it does not seem to have been determined at the time of its compilation. According to the Gēmāra (Pes. 118 b), R. Jehuda and R. Johanan (130-160 A.D., cp Strack, Einkl. in d. Talm. 83 f.) suggested different forms.

The opinion of Samuel (died 254 A.D.; cp Strack, 88) that the prophets among them instituted it in Israel to the end that they should recite the Hallel when they were threatened with persecution, to avert it, and when delivered, in thanksgiving, indicates a twofold tendency, first, to extend the reciting of the Hallel to other occasions, leading to its incorporation into the liturgy of other festivals, and second, to regard it as a custom which was followed in Israel as far back as the time of Moses (Pes. 117 a). R. Jehuda's statement (M. Pes. 57) that the Hallel was recited in the temple during the slaughtering of the passover sacrifices, is evidently only a similar piece of ideal history.

Allusions to the Exodus and appropriate national sentiment determined the selection of the Psalms that were to constitute the liturgical thanksgiving for the passover; the great Hallel, on the other hand, was to serve the wider purpose of a general thanksgiving. R. Johanan says it is called the great Hallel because (alluding to Ps. 136²⁵) the Holy One sits in heaven, and thence deals out food to all his creatures (Pes. 118 a). With this sentiment accords its use in thanksgiving for the blessing of rain (Ta'ān. 19 a).

We may now attempt to answer the question of the relation of the Hallel to the hymn referred to in the phrase 'when they had sung a hymn' (ὑμνήσαντες) in Mt. 26³⁰ and Mk. 14²⁶. The answer commonly given is that the hymn was the Hallel, and the statement is followed by a description of the Hallel in its most developed form; but in tracing its history it has appeared that there is no evidence that the Hallel was in the time of Christ more than in its inceptive stage, consisting of Ps. 113, or at the most also of Ps. 114.

HALLELUJAH (הלל יהוה),³ v.l. הלל יהוה; once הלל יהוה [Ps. 104³⁵; v.l. הלל יהוה], 'praise Jah'), or (as [ΑΛΛΗΛΟΥΙΑ] and Vg. always, and AV in Tobit and in Rev.) ALLELUIA, a Jewish doxological formula, which obtained an Aramaic colouring, and under the form αλληλουια was adopted (like Osanna—see HOSANNA) by the Gentile Christian congregations; cp Tob. 13:8 Rev. 19:3-4. In 3 Macc. 7:13, ἐπιφωνήσαντες τὸ αλληλουια, we find it treated as a substantive. Its original use was to summon the congregation to join the cantor in reciting a psalm, or in responding by a united acclamation of praise. This view assumes that it was in use only in the liturgy of the synagogue, not in the temple, where a choir of Levites sang the appointed psalms. It seems to have been originally inserted (in collections of psalms for synagogue use) at the beginning of psalms, and here we still find it, both in MT and in \mathfrak{S} , in Pss. 106 111-113 135 146-150, and in \mathfrak{S} also in 104 [105] 106 [107] 113 [114-115] 114 [116-9] 115 [116 10-19] 116-118 [117-119] 135 [136] 147 [147 12-20]. The fashion seems, however, to have varied. In Ps. 104 105 115-117, the MT gives 'Hallelujah' at the end of each psalm, and in the MT of Pss. 135 and 146-150, as well as in \mathfrak{S} of Ps. 150, the doxology occurs both at the beginning and at the end of a psalm. Two apparent inaccuracies of \mathfrak{S} may also be mentioned; it includes Ps. 119, which is a purely didactic psalm, among the Hallelujah psalms, and excludes from their number Pss. 103-104, which certainly ought to have been Hallelujah psalms (or rather a Hallelujah psalm in two parts) if we can judge on this point from the contents. As to the characteristics of this class of psalms (to which the HALLEL psalms belong), see the commentaries, and cp PSALMS, BOOK OF.

HALOHESH, RV Hallohesh (חללוהש), see below, ΔΑΛΩΗΣ [AL]), a name occurring twice in post-exilic lists.

1. Father of Shallum in the list of wall builders (see ΝΕΜΕΜΙΑΗ, § 1 f.; EZRA ii., §§ 16 [1], 15 d), Neh. 3 12 (ηλεια [BN]).

2. Signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7; Neh. 10 24 [25] (αλωης [BN], αδω [A]).

According to Meyer (Ent. 143; cp 157), an appellative, '(the family) of magicians' (cp NAMES, § 70); but the number of miswritten names in EZRA-Neh. suggests caution. That both COL-HOZEH (q.v.) and Hallohesh are miswritten appears certain; the name which underlies both words seems to be חללוהש, Hal-Silli. See SHILHI. T. K. C.

HAM (חם; חָאם [BAL]), according to P, second son of Noah (Gen. 5:32, χᾱφ [A], as in 6:10 7:13), and ancestor of the peoples of the south, especially Cush, Mizraim, Put, and Canaan (Gen. 10:6 f. 20). J₂ also gives him the second place among the brothers, and though in Gen. 9:24 he appears as Noah's 'youngest' or rather (see JAPHETH) 'younger son,' this arises from a manipulation of the text of J₁. Originally it was Canaan who was so designated, and also Canaan who was represented as having treated his father Noah with irreverence; 'Ham, father of,' in v. 22, is a redactional insertion (see SBOT).

The origin and meaning of the name are disputed. In Pss. 105^{23 27} 106²² we read of the 'land of Ham,' where Ham clearly means 'Egypt,' just as 'stock of Jesse' in Is. 11:1 = 'stock of David.' It was natural, therefore, to connect Ham with the old native name of Egypt, keme or chemi, 'black,' with reference to the black colour of the Egyptian soil (see EGYPT, § 1)—a connection supported by Ebers (Ägypten, 155) but disputed by Lepsius (PRE, s.v. 'Ägypten'), who would explain the name as a general term for the 'hot' south (חם, 'hot,' Josh. 9:12). Probably Lepsius lays too much stress on the difference of vocalisation between chemi and cham. Since cham had a meaning in Hebrew, and chēm had not, the Hebrews might have substituted the one form for the other. Lefebure¹ at any rate is unconvinced by Lepsius.

Still, the (probable) analogy of Shem suggests another explanation. Ham, which seems originally to have meant the land and people of Canaan, may be a shortening of such a form as Ḥammu-rābi, the name of an early Babylonian king (see AMRAPHEL); cp Zur for Zuriel (?). Possibly there was an early tradition (of which Gen. 14 may give us a late modification) that Hammu-rābi conquered Canaan, and the name חמור may thus have become known to an early narrator, who wanted a symbol for Canaan, and explained the name, on the analogy of ABIRAM (g.v.), 'the (divine) kinsman is a great one.'¹ Glaser's identification² of Ham with 'Amū, the Egyptian name for the Bedouin races of the Semitic countries adjoining Egypt, appears less plausible. In 1 Ch. 140 the phrase 'from Ham' (חמך) ⊕ ἐκ τῶν ὠνών χαμ; but Pesh. reads חמך) is very improbable; for there was neither a place nor a tribe called Ham. Read [חמך] [חמך], and see MEUNIM.

T. K. C.

HAM (חם; 7 MSS of Sam. חם; ep Jer. Quaest.), the land of the ZUZIM (g.v.), Gen. 145. Since the Zuzim seem to be the same as the ZAVZUMMIM, 'Ham' must be a corruption either of Ammon (if we read חם; ח and y confounded) or of Rabba or Rabbath (so Ball). Cp Dt. 220.

⊕ (ἄμα αὐτοῖς [AEL]), Pesh., Vg. express חמך, 'among (or with) them'; Tg. Onk. and Jerus. give חמך. T. K. C.

HAMAN (חמן), a name of Elamite origin; see ESTHER, § 7; ἈΜΑΝ [BNAL], but ἈΝΑΜ, ΜΑΝ [A, Esth. 3:17 (16:17)], called ANAN in (Apoc.) Esth. 107, etc.; son of ADMATHA or HAMMEDATHA [g.v.]; one of the chief characters in Esther, where he appears as the inveterate enemy of the Jews (Esth. 3:1 ff. etc., Apoc. Esth. 126). He is accordingly represented as an AGAGITE [g.v.] (so Jos. Ant. xi. 65, and Targg. call him an 'Amalekite') or Macedonian (see ESTHER, § 1). The first Targum (with much probability) identifies with him the important but otherwise obscure MEMUCAN [g.v.]. On the fate of Haman see HANGING [i.], and on the combination of Haman with one of two mythological dragons, see DRAGON, § 3.

HAMATH (חמת), 'enclosed or guarded place' [WRS Rel. Sem. 150]; חמאθ [BAL]; other common forms in the uncial MSS. are ἈΜΑΘ or ΕΜΑΘ, a royal city of the Hittites on the Orontes, to the territory of which the boundary of Israel is said to have reached under David, Solomon, and Jeroboam II. (2 S. 89 1 K. 865, ἈΜΑΘ [A], 2 K. 1425, ΕΜΑΘ [BA], ΕΜΑΘ [L], cp Nu. 13:22 [21], ΕΦΛΑΘ [B], ε.αθ [F] 348). The Chronicler states that Solomon built store-cities in (the land of) Hamath (2 Ch. 84); but this stands in connection with the statement (based on a misunderstanding) that he also built 'Tadmor in the desert.' The Table of Nations (Gen. 10:18) mentions 'the Hamathite' (חמתית; ὁ αμαθι [AEL]) in the last place among the eleven descendants of Canaan; but vv. 16-18a are due to R. The bulk of the population of Hamath was certainly Semitic (note the Semitic names of the kings in the time of Tiglath-pileser III.). See HITTITES, § 11 ff.

The fall of Hamath deeply impressed the people of Judah. 'Is not Hamath as Arpad?' asks the Assyrian king in Isaiah's prophecy (Is. 10:9; not ⊕). A similar question (suggested by Is. 10:9) is put into the mouth of the Rab-shakeh (2 K. 18:34=Is. 36:19, αμαρ [N*], αμαρ [AG], σεμαρ [Q]) and the king of Assyria (2 K. 19:13, μαθ [B], αθαμα [A]=Is. 37:13, αμαρ [NAQ*], αμαρ [Q²]). Balaam, too, if a recent critical conjecture may be accepted, becomes the mouthpiece of Jewish consternation at the downfall of so ancient a state as Hamath.³ According to tradition, some of the colonists transported by 'the king of Assyria to the land of N. Israel were Hamathites (2 K. 17:24, 30), and it is further stated that the men of Hamath made images of ASHIMA. The problem of the origin of this name can no longer be called unsolved. The other divine names in 2 K. 17:30 f. being Assyrian (see special articles), Ashima, or better Ashimath (see ⊕ [BAL]), must be Assyrian too. Tasmitu, the consort of Nebo, is not great enough. The original name was אשחר = אשחר, Ishtar.¹ Ishtar was the second of the five planetary deities, four of whom are mentioned besides in 2 K. 17:30 f. The notice in 2 K. 17:24, 30, however, needs a close examination. To understand it is one thing; to accept it as quite historical is another. Hamath and Avva (or rather Gaza, אַוּוּ) have no right of existence in this passage, the context of which requires well-known Babylonian cities. No Assyrian king would ever have placed Hamathite colonists in Sanaria; the object of such transferences of populations was to remove restless elements to a distance from their home.² The cause of the insertion of the wrong names can easily be surmised (see SEPHARVAIM). Almost equally improbable is it that a prophetic writer, in a list of the countries from which Israelitish captives should, by a mighty divine act, be brought back, would write 'and from Elam, and from Shinar, and from Hamath, and from the isles of the sea' (Is. 11:11). Not improbably חמת, 'Hamath,' should be חתים, 'Kittim' (Cyprus);³ ⊕ reads otherwise (see 'Isaiah,' SBOT [Heb.]).

To assume with Millar (Hastings, DBI 166) that, 'as Hamath was occupied by the Hittites' the name (Ashima) may very possibly be Hittite, is opposed to the facts suggested above, and mentioned by Jensen (Hittiter u. Armenier, 164). Below is given a list of the divine names in 2 K. 17:30 f. with their probable identifications:—

Succoth-benoth = Sakkuth-Kaiwān (Ninib) = Saturn
Nergal = Mars
Ashima = Ishtar = Venus
Nibhaz (Nibhan) = Marduk = Jupiter
Adrammelech = " " Anammelech = " "
Tartak or Tartah = the lance-star = Antares.

The references to Hamath in Ezek. 47:16 f. have not come down to us quite accurately. In v. 16 חמת should go with חמת, ZEDAD (g.v.) being an interpolation, and in v. 17 חמת, 'and the region of Hamath,' is a gloss (Cornill). [The names in ⊕ the first time are corrupt; later in v. 16 there occurs חמת [B]; in v. 17 B omits Hamath.] T. K. C.

HAMITAL (חמתל), 2 K. 24:18 RVME, EV HAMUTAL.

HAMMATH (חמת)—i.e., 'hot spring'), one of the fenced cities of Naphtali (Josh. 19:35; ὠμαθα [ΔΑΚΕΘ] [B], ἈΜΑΘ [L], ἈΜΜΑΘ [L]), probably = HAMMOTH-DOR (חמת דור) = ΝΕΜΜΑΘ [B], ΕΜΑΘΔΩΡ [A], ἈΜΑΘΔΩΡ [L]), reckoned among the Levitical cities in Naphtali (Josh. 21:32, P), and called in the parallel passage, 1 Ch. 6:76 [61], HAMMON [2] (חמת) [BL], -ων [A]). It is perhaps to be connected with el-Hammeh, the hot springs to the S. of Tiberias. Josephus (Ant. xviii. 23; B. iv. 13) calls it Emmaus (cp EMMAUS). Wilson took the temperature of seven distinct springs, three of which have been enclosed (Recovery of Jerus. 362). Cp GASmith, HG 450.

HAMMEAH (חמת), Neh. 3:1, RV, AV MEAH, in 'Tower of Hammeah' (חמת) is evidently a corruption of הַמְדַתָּה (see p. 3), which in turn is a corruption of הַמְדַתָּה, 'the Old (city)'. See COLLEGE, HASSENAAH, HULDAH, and cp HANANEEL. T. K. C.

HAMMEDATHA (הַמְדַתָּה); Ἀμαδαθαύ [BNL], ἀμαθαδου [A], the father of Haman (cp the name μαδατας in Xenophon, Cyr. v. 3 41; and see Be-Ryssh.), Esth. 3 1 (ἀμαθαδου [A]), v. 10 om. BNAL 8 5 (only in Nca mg. as above) 9 10 (ἀμαθαδου [A*]) 2 4 (ἀμαθαδου [A*]). His name appears as AMA-DATHIUS in 1 2 11 (ἀμαδαθου [B*vid, see Swete], ναμαναδ. [Bb]) and 18 10 17 RV, where AV AMADATHA (ἀμαθου [A] in v. 10, om. L^B in v. 17).

HAMMELECH (הַמְלֶאךָה) appears in AV and RV^{mg.} as the name of the fathers of JERAHMEEL and MALCHIJAH, 2 (Jer. 36 26 38 6). In RV and AV^{mg.} each of these persons is called 'the king's son' (so 5). Probably, however, is הַמְלֶאךָה a corruption of an imperfectly written יהרמל, Jerahmeel. Men of Jerahmeelite origin would naturally be called 'sons of JERAHMEEL' (g.v.). Cp JOASH 1., 4. T. K. C.

HAMMELZAR (הַמְלָצָר), Dan. 1 11, RV^{mg.}, AV MELZAR (g.v.).

HAMMER is not always an accurate rendering of the word in MT.

1. מַכְרֶבֶת, makkrābāh, (שֹׁפָרָה, malleus, but in Is. 44 12 τέρετρον) a tool used by the stone mason (1 K. 6 7), the smith (Is. 44 12; MT has plur., 5 sing.), and the woodcarver (Jer. 10 4). The word (מַכְרֶבֶת) is also applied to the (wooden) mallet with which tents were driven (Judg. 4 21). It was therefore smaller than the paliss (no. 3, below).

2. הַמְלִיטָה, ḥalmūth 'ἀνιμίτις, σφύραν κοπιώντων [B; really Ἀλ.?, ἀποτομας κατακόπων [A], ἡ κατακοπτῶν [L]; Vg. malleos fabricorum, a name given to the implement with which Jael slew Sisera (Judg. 5 26). The phrase is, however, highly suspicious (see Moore). Che. emends מַכְרֶבֶת, 'a flint of the rock.' Cp Dt. 32 13; and see JAEL.

3. שֹׁפָרָה, paliss, שֹׁפָרָה (πέλυσ in Jer. 23 29), malleus, a heavy tool used in image-making and in quarrying (Is. 41 7 Jer. 23 29). Nebuchadrezzar is called by this term (Jer. 50 23), which gives no support to the explanation of 'Maccabæus' as 'Hammerer' (see MACCABEES 1., § 1).

4. From מַכְרֶבֶת in Ps. 74 6 a noun מַכְרֶבֶת, ḥalaphrah, λαενηπίριον, ascia, has been inferred; but in the light of the Tg. we should doubtless emend to מַכְרֶבֶת, 'two-edged' (Herz), and render, not 'with axes and hammers,' but 'with two-edged axes.'

5. שֹׁפָרָה, Ecclus. 38 28 (blacksmith's hammer).

HAMMIPHKAD (הַמְפִּיכָד), Neh. 3 31, RV, AV MIPHKAD, in 'the gate of Hammiphkad'; cp Ezek. 43 21, 'the appointed place' (miphkad) of the temple (following 5, τῷ ἀποκεχωρισμένῳ).

The sense, however, is not good; and perhaps 'the burning-place (mohēd) of the temple' (König, Lehrschr. 2 a, 93 n.). The gate would be that which adjoined the 'burning-place.' See JERUSALEM, § 24.

HAMMOLEKETH, or (RV) HAMMOLECHETH (הַמְלֶאכֶת), as if 'she who reigns,' sister of MACHIR; 1 Ch. 7 18† (H Μαλεχθ [BA], μελαχθ [L]; REGINA [Vg.]).

Close by we find ZELOPHEHAD, GILEAD (g.v. 1, § 8), ISHOD (see, however, the article), MALILAH, each of which is a corruption of Salekah or Šalhad. The older view that Hammolecheth is a divine title requires too much confidence in MT; we should have expected Beth-Milcah (cp Gray, HPN 116); but Milcah itself is a corruption of Salekah (see MILCAH, 2).

HAMMON (הַמְוֵן), 'glowing,' perhaps a divine title, cp Baal-Hamman—i.e., the Baal of the solar glow; but see [2]).

1. A place on the border of Asher, apparently near the sea, Josh. 19 28 (εμεμων [B], αμων [AL]). Identified by Robinson with the ruins at the head of the W. Hāmūl, which he saw from the high hill of Belāt (see RAMAH [6]), and believed to bear the name of Hāmūl. Since, however, the existence of a locality of that name is very doubtful (see Guérin, Galilée, 2147), it would be better to connect Hammon with 'Ain Hāmūl, near the point where the wādy reaches the sea, and where there are the remains of an ancient fortress. This Dillmann admits as a possibility.

HAMU OR HAMI, NAMES WITH

But the fortress was certainly in connection with a town, the striking ruins of which still exist, now called Umm el-Amūd (or 'Awāmūd). It was there that Renan found an inscription dedicated to El (= Baal) Hamman (see Baethg. Beitr. 27; also G. Hoffmann, Ueber einige phön. Inschr. 21 f. ['89]). These ruins are possibly on the site of the ancient Hammon (Guérin, l.c.).

2. A Levitical city in Naphtali, 1 Ch. 6 76 [61] (χμμωθ [BL], υ [A]). Probably identical with HAMMATH (i.), Josh. 19 35, and HAMMOTH-DOR, Josh. 21 32. The name in this case has reference to hot springs. T. K. C.

HAMMOTH DOR (הַמֹּת דֹר), Josh. 21 32. See HAMMATH (i.).

HAMMUEL (הַמּוֹאֵל, § 46), 1 Ch. 4 26, RV, a mistake of MT for HAMUEL [AV] (g.v.).

HAMONAH (הַמּוֹנָה), Ezek. 39 16 ΠΟΛΥΑΝΔΡΙΟΝ ' [BAQΓ], and Hamon-Gog (הַמּוֹנִי גּוֹג), 'Gog's multitude,' Ezek. 39 11 15, τὸ ΠΟΛΥΑΝ. ΤΟΥ ΓΩΓ [BAQΓ]. The latter is the name which, in Ezekiel's prophecy, is given to the valley, or rather ravine (יַב; see VALE, 3), where GOG [g.v.] and his multitude are buried, and which is more precisely described as 'a ravine of (the mountains of) the Abarim, east of the (Dead) Sea.' This is intelligible. But what is to be said of HAMONAH? Is there really to be a city with this name? So AV and RV lead us to suppose; and Tg. may have found an allusion to the city of Bethshean, deriving its name Scythopolis from the Scythian invasion in the 7th cent. B. C. Gog, however, as has been pointed out elsewhere, is a corrupt fragment of Mig(a)don, a title of the enemy of God derived from Babylonia; Hamon-Gog is either a corruption of the same name, or perhaps of Har-mig(a)don (ARMAGEDDON). We may then continue והמר ממדין 'and Mig(a)don shall disappear from the land,' after which read 'and the land shall become clean' (so 5, Co.). T. K. C.

HAMOR (הַמּוֹר), 'ass,' § 68; ἑμμορ [ADEL], the 'father of SHECHEM' [g.v.], Gen. 33 19 34 Josh. 24 32 Judg. 9 28 Acts 7 16 (AV EMMOR) etc. There is a current view that Hamor is the name of a 'totem-clan.' In the abstract there is no objection to a belief in early 'totem clans,' as stated by Gray (HPN, 115). It is more probable, however, that Hamor in 34 2 is analogous to בני חת, 'sons of Heth' (= Hittites), and simply means 'Hamorite'; חת, which follows, should perhaps be read חתני, 'Hamorite,' and be regarded as a gloss (see, however, Hivites, § 2). In this case 'Hamorite' probably = 'Amorite'; in fact Gen. 48 22 (E) represents Shechem as won from האמרי, 'the Amorite.' The Assyri. name of the kingdom of Damascus (mūt ša-imērvē-šū) has similarly been derived from imērv 'ass'; but the real name was probably related to 'Amorite' (cp Del. Par. 280 f.). The Assyrians made a pun on the name. T. K. C.

HAMRAN (הַמְרָן), 1 Ch. 1 41 RV = Gen. 36 26, HEMDAN.

HAMU OR HAMI, NAMES WITH. This group of Hebrew names is small; it may perhaps comprise only HAMUEL (g.v.) and one other (see HAMUTAL; but cp HEMDAN). Renan (REJ 5175), Wellhausen (De Gent. 22, n. 1), and Hommel (AHT 322) derive these and similar Semitic names (e.g., חמקותר in Himyaritic) from ḥamā, 'to protect.' That such a root was used in forming proper names seems clear (see JAHNAI); but the analogy of the names compounded with Abi-, Aḥi-, etc. is in favour of taking Hamu as a term of kindred.

That חת means 'father-in-law,' חמות 'mother-in-law,' is certain; the instances may be few, but they range

1 This word represents the Heb. חַמַּי in Jer. 23 19 26 as also in Ezek. 39 11 a; cp 2 Macc. 9 4 14 4 Macc. 15 20.

from early documents in Gen. and Sam. to a possibly late passage of Micah (76) and the late book of Ruth. The cognate Ass. word imu (emu) also means 'father-in-law'¹; Winckler's definition, 'the head of a family from which a man gets a wife,' illustrates the anticipative use of the term in two of the letters of Dušratta to Amen-hotep III. (Am. Tab. 173, 182). Like similar words (e.g., חתן), its precise usage varied in different Semitic languages. Thus in biblical Hebrew it seems to denote a woman's, in Ass. a man's father-in-law. We cannot be certain, however, that even in ancient Hebrew it was never used in a wider sense, as e.g., it sometimes is in Arabic, and as חתן and חתן certainly are in Hebrew. Thus perhaps all the men of a group might be called ah by the husband and ham by the wife, or vice versa, and so Hamu-el might be practically synonymous with Ahi-el, or, for that matter, with Abi-el (see ABI, NAMES WITH).

HAMUEL, RV Hammuel (חַמּוּאֵל), § 46, om. B, ΔΜΟΥΗΛ [AL], a Simeonite (1 Ch. 4 26). The form with double m (MT and RV) was explained 'æstus Dei' by Ges., but should no doubt be read, as in AV and 6, Hamuel² (חַמּוּאֵל) as in the case of HAMUL (see below). The meaning will then be, 'The head of my kindred is God.' See HAMU, NAMES IN.

HAMUL (חַמּוּל—i.e., חַמּוּל or חַמּוּל, possibly a corruption of חַמּוּאֵל; see above, HAMUEL; but the name חַמּוּל has been found on an Israelite seal, which makes Gesenius's interpretation 'clementiam expertus,' just possible [cp GAMUL]; see also We. De Gent. 22; and cp Ki. on 1 Ch. 25; more probably, however, like MAHOL, the name is a corruption of JERAHMEEL [g.v. § 4]; Hezron, Hamul's brother, appears in 1 Ch. 29 as Jerahmeel's father), a grandson of Judah³ (Gen. 46 12, εμουηλ [ADL], ; 1 Ch. 25, εμουηλ [BA], αμ. [L] ; Nu. 26 21, εμουηλ [B], εμουηλ [AFL], , whence arises the patronymic Hamulite (חַמּוּלִי, Nu. 1 c.; εμουηλι [B], εμουηλι [AL], εμ. 4 [F]).

HAMUTAL (חַמּוּטָל) Kt. חַמּוּטָל, 'my husband's father is the dew' [see NAMES, § 46]; but the second element in the name is very suspicious [see ABITAL]; read rather HAMUTUB, 'the head of my kindred (= my God) is goodness'; ΔΜΙΤΑΛ [ALQ], the mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, 2 K. 23 31 (ΔΜΕΙΤΑΙ [B]), 24 18 (ΜΙΤΑΤ [B], ΔΜΙΤΑΘ [A]), Jer. 52 1 (ΔΜ[Ε]ΙΤΑΔΔ [BNA]) and in 6^{BAL} of 2 Ch. 36 2a (ΔΒΕΙΤΑΛ [B]).

HANAMEEL, or (RV) Hanamel (חַנַּמְאֵל), 'God is kind' [see below]; ΔΝΑΜΕΗΛ [BNAQ], b. Shallum, a cousin of Jeremiah, from whom, in the first part of the siege of Jerusalem, Jeremiah purchased, for seventeenshekels, a property at Anathoth, thus demonstrating his faith, victorious over doubts, in the ultimate restoration of Israel (Jer. 32 [6 39] 7-12, cp 44). The account is evidently authentic, though it received its present shape only after the fall of Jerusalem (see Giesebrecht). The details of the purchase are interesting. The deed of purchase was subscribed and sealed (with clay; see CLAY), and together with a second unsealed copy was deposited in an earthen vessel, which may have been like the earthen jars which contain the Babylonian contract-tablets.

² The altered form may be a mistake under the influence of Amiel, or an intentional alteration.
³ Names common to Judah and Simeon occur not unfrequently: see GENEALOGIES i., §§ 5, 7 [v.].
⁴ The 6 forms with initial ε seem to have arisen from a ditto-graphy; και εμουηλ is for και εμουηλ. [Jos. (Ant. ii. 7 4) has εμουρος, also the form εμουρος (see Niese).]

HAND

The name much exercised the old interpreters. 'Grace of God,' 'Grace of God's people' (or 'of circumcision'), are the explanations given in OS 182 25 (cp 186 20), and the former appears as a note on the name in 64 106 of v. 7. We should probably read חַנּוּאֵל = חַנּוּאֵל, 'God is pity.' HANNIEL [g.v.] occurs twice. Gray's remark (HFN, 307, n. 2) goes too far. The support of the versions could only prove the comparative antiquity of the reading חַנּוּאֵל. 2 is very frequently miswritten for י.

HANAN (חַנָּן), § 50, an abbreviated name; cp EL-HANAN, HANANIAH; ΔΝΑΝ [BNAI].

1. A name occurring twice (v. 23 and v. 38, avnan [L]=944) in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (g.v., § 9, ii. 6) in 1 Ch. 8.
2. b. MAACAII (g.v., ii. 9), one of David's heroes (1 Ch. 11 43, avnan [N]).
3. The b'ne Hanan, a post-exilic family of the NETHINIM in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii., § 9, Ezra 2 46=Neh. 7 49 (in latter, yavav [N])=1 Esd. 5 30, ANAN, 2).
4. A Levite, present at the reading of the Law under Ezra (Neh. 8 7 om. BA = 1 Esd. 9 48, avnas [B], avanas [AL], ANANIAS, 5); probably the signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7) Neh. 10 10 [11] (om. B, avav [N], avav [L]).
5. The name borne by two signatories to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7), Neh. 10 22 [23] avani [L], 10 26 [27] avav [BA], ava [N], avav [L]).
6. b. Zaccur, a keeper of the storehouses, appointed by Nehemiah, Neh. 13 13 (avav [N], avav [L]).
7. The sons of Hanan b. IGDALIAH (g.v.), were a family which had a chamber in the temple (Jer. 39 4 . . . viōn iōvan viōv avani [BAQ], avav vi. avav [N], avav [N], but N omits viōv iōvōliōv).

HANANEEL, AV, RV Hananel (חַנַּנְאֵל), in 'Tower of Hananeel,' Neh. 3 1 12 39 Jer. 31 38 Zech. 14 10; see JERUSALEM, § 24.

In Neb., both times, the tower of Hananeel is coupled with that of HAMMEAH (g.v.). When we consider that HAMMEAH is probably a corruption of hayēsānah 'the old (city),' it seems very possible that the name of the 'tower of the old (city)' was Hananeel. Observe in this connection that in Neh. 12 39 6^B does not recognise 'the town of Hammeah.'

HANANI (חַנַּנִּי), § 52, shortened from חַנַּנְיָאֵל, see HANANIAH; ΔΝΑΝ[Ε] [BNAI].

1. Father of the prophet JEMU (g.v., 2), 1 K. 16 1 (in v. 7 avas [Ba mg.], avava [A]), 2 Ch. 16 7 (avamei [B]), 19 2 20 34).
2. A temple musician, a son of Heman (1 Ch. 25 4 [om. B] 25 avanas [B]; L has avani in both verses which points to a form חַנַּנְיָאֵל).
3. One of the b'ne IMMER (g.v., ii. 1) among the sons of the priests in the list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i., § 5 end), Ezra 10 20 (avava [A]-5 [L])=1 Esd. 9 21 ANANIAS [2] (avanas [BAL]).
4. One of the 'brethren' of NEHEMIAH (Neh. 1 2, avav [L], avaveis [N];? avav εἰς as in L, 7 2, avava [BNAI]).
5. A priest in the procession at the dedication of the wall (see EZRA ii., § 13 g), Neh. 12 36 (avanas [L], avani [N], avav [N], om. BN*A).

HANANIAH (חַנַּנְיָהּ), חַנַּנְיָהּ—i.e., 'Yahwè is gracious,' §§ 28, 52, 84; ΔΝΑΝΙΑ(Σ) [BNAQTL, 87].

1. One of Daniel's companions, also called Shadrach (Dan. 1 6 etc). See DANIEL, § 14.
2. Son of Azzur; a prophet who opposed Jeremiah (Jer. 28 1 f.).
3. Ancestor of the captain of the guard who arrested Jeremiah (Jer. 37 13).
4. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch. 3 19 21).
5. b. Shashak in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (g.v., § 9, ii. 6), 1 Ch. 8 24.
6. One of the fourteen 'sons of Heman' (1 Ch. 25 4 23).
7. One of the Bene Bebai in the list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i., § 5 end); Ezra 10 28 (avava [B], avava [N*], avava [N mg.])=1 Esd. 9 20, ANANIAS, 3.
8. An apothecary in list of wall-builders (see NEHEMIAH, § 1 f. EZRA ii., §§ 16 [1], 15 d), Neh. 3 8. Perhaps the same person is intended in Neh. 3 30 (same list).
9. Neh. 3 30. See no. 8.
10. Governor of the castle, under Nehemiah, who describes him as 'a faithful man,' and one 'who feared God above many' (Neh. 7 2). Cp nos. 11, 13.
11. Signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7); Neh. 10 23 [24], evav [L]; perhaps the same as no. 10.
12. Head of a priestly house in the days of Joiakim (see EZRA ii., §§ 6 b, 11), Jeshua's successor (Neh. 12 12; BN* om.).
13. A priest in the procession at the dedication of the wall (Neh. 12 41 [om. BN*A]); perhaps the same as no. 10.

HAND (יָד, χεῖρ). Many of the uses of the hand in Hebrew phraseology are too plain to need special explanation. There are some, however, which are not devoid of strangeness, and some of the passages in which 'hand' occurs, need brief consideration from the point of view of textual criticism. Not that mere critical puzzles are worth mentioning here, but when exegesis is distinctly affected by textual criticism, it would seem to be a fault of method not to refer to this.

Yād, יָד, the hand, sometimes with reference solely to the wrist (Gen. 24 22, etc.) or finger, sometimes including even the arm (סָרְוֹי', אַרְמוֹת, אֶרְמוֹת), is to be kept distinct from kaph, כַּף, the palm of the hand (or the sole of the foot, paw, etc., cp Lev. 11 27). The hollowed hand is the šō'āl, שְׂעָל (1 K. 20 10, etc.), or hāḥphen, חֲפֵן (Prov. 30 4, etc.). For parts of the hand the Hebrew terms are esbō'āh, אַצְבָּעָה, finger² (Ex. 31 18, etc.), bōhen, בֶּהֶן, thumb (Judg. 16, etc.), šōfen, שֹׁפֵן, little finger (1 K. 12 10), and šippōren, שִׁפְפֹרֶן, nail.³ The span of the hand is šōphah, שֹׁפָה (Ex. 25 25, etc., cp 1 K. 7 26), used as a unit of measurement (cp the similar use of 'finger' in Jer. 52 21); see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES. It should be noted that the full phrase for right hand is yad yāmin, יָד יְמִין (e.g., Ps. 73 25); yāmin, יְמִין is properly 'right side.' 'Left-handed' is expressed by 'ittēr [yad yāmin] אִתְיָר, Judg. 3 15 20 16.

a. In two important passages (1 S. 15 12 Is. 56 5) RV^{mg} records the fact that where English idiom requires 'monument,' or 'memorial,' the Hebrew has 'hand' (יָד). 'Saul came to Carmel, and, behold, he set him up a monument'; this trophy of Saul the Hebrew text calls a 'hand.' The reading, however, is not free from doubt.⁴ At any rate, this use of 'hand' is certainly found in 2 S. 18 18 (Absalom's 'monument') and in Is. 56 5 (the 'memorial' promised to God-fearing eunuchs). On many Phœnician votive steles an outstretched hand is represented, probably to symbolize the action which accompanied the vow.⁵ The monuments referred to in the OT passages may be regarded as votive steles.

b. Similarly Abram, when he makes a vow, lifts up his hand (Gen. 14 14; cp Dt. 32 40 2 K. 10 15 Ezek. 17 18; and especially, according to the usual interpretation, Ex. 17 16, Prov. 11 21).

Ex. 17 16 forms part of an account of the defeat of the Amalekites, when Yahweh declared that he would utterly blot out the Amalekites. The Hebrew has, 'And he said, That a hand to the throne (?) of Jah, war hath Yahweh against Amalek from generation to generation (?). For the first part of this RV gives, 'And he said, The Lord hath sworn.' Those who are less tied to the MT than the Revisers were, will admit that the text is hardly translatable, and needs emendation (see JEHOVAH-NISSI). Prov. 11 21 is also commonly said to refer to the custom of lifting up the hand for an oath. As an alternative to the faulty rendering of AV we find in RV^{mg}, 'My hand upon it! Heb., Hand to hand.' There is, however, no parallel for a proverb constructed as RV^{mg} supposes Prov. 11 21 to be, and we should almost certainly read, not, 'My hand upon it; the evil man shall not go scot free,' but, 'The malignant witness⁶ shall not go scot free.'

No doubts need be raised against that well-known passage, Ps. 144 8, 'Their right hand is a right hand of falsehood'; yāmin in Arabic has the double meaning of 'right hand' and 'oath.' Cp 2 K. 10 15 (see JONADAB, 3); Gal. 2 9, 'the right hands of fellowship.'

c. Claspings hands was the sign of a completed bargain; see Job 17 3 Prov. 6 1.

RV, however, goes too far when it gives in Is. 26, 'and they strike hands [in bargains] with the children of strangers.' The present Hebrew text is hardly translatable, and no suggested rendering is thoroughly suitable to the context. Most probably we should read, 'And with the secret arts of the Harranians they practise enchantments' (see HARAN 1).⁷

d. In Ex. 28 41 29 9, Lev. 21 10 (all P), we find the strange idiom, 'to fill the hand' (יָד לְמַלֵּא) for 'to consecrate as priest.'⁸ In Judg. 17 5, however, it simply ² With יָד = toes, 2 S. 21 20.

³ With יָד = 'to pare the nails,' Dt. 21 12 f. On the custom here referred to, see WRS, Ariu. 178. Bibl. Aram. ܕܢܝܢ 'Dan. 4 30 [33].

⁶ יָד לְמַלֵּא (cp Prov. 19 28), represented in MIT by יָד לְמַלֵּא.

⁸ Note the Syr. cognate šamlāyā 'ordination.'

means 'to bestow the office of priest,' which is near the original sense. Halévy has pointed out (REJ, Oct.-Dec. 1890, p. 209) that it is exactly parallel to an Assyrian phrase for the transmission of authority; Delitzsch (Ass. HVB 409b) gives this as kātā mullā, 'to fill the hand' = 'to invest with an office.' There is therefore no need to suppose either that the objects with which the hand was filled were pieces of a sacrificial offering (Di., Baudissin), or that a sum of money was placed in it (Vatke, Welh.); it is the office itself which is given.

Nor can we say, with most scholars, that Ezek. 43 16, where the phrase seems to be applied to the reconsecration of the altar, shows how completely the consciousness of its original meaning has faded away. For וְכָלֵא וְיָרִי (Kr., 6) seems to be a corruption of וְכָלֵא וְיָרִי, words which appear in MT (but with וְכָלֵא) at the head of v. 27, but are lacking in 6. Obviously there are two rival readings, and וְכָלֵא וְיָרִי is the worse of the two. Cp, however, Nowack, HA 2 120 f.; Addis, Doc. Hex. 2 263 n.; Dr.-White, SBOT, Lev. Eng., 71.

HANDICRAFTS. To attempt a complete account of all the handicrafts practised by the Hebrews, in the light of the Talmud and the evidences of the monuments, would mean a history of their civilisation and culture, and would lie far outside the limits of this article. It must suffice, therefore, here to give a brief summary of the various occupations to which reference is made in the Bible, and to indicate any additional features which seem to be of general interest.

1. Leaving on one side all workers in metal, whether coppersmiths (1 K. 7 14 2 Tim. 4 14), ironsmiths (Is. 44 12), gold- or silversmiths (Judg. 17 4 Is. 40 19 Mal. 3 2 f.),¹ we may start with two allied crafts—viz. those of workers in wood and workers in stone.

The common term is שֹׁרֵט, šārāš (for harrāš; 6 usually šārāš), √ to cut, used generally of an artisan (e.g. 2 K. 22 6 24 14 Jer. 24 1 29 2), or, more definitely, of a carpenter

1. Terms. (Jer. 30 3 Is. 41 7), or metal-worker (Hos. 13 2); in 1 S. 13 19 (שֹׁרֵטֵי הַבַּיִת) the reference is, as the context shows, to armourers. Usually, however, the term is qualified by addition of the material—viz. (1) אֶבֶן, h, worker in stone, 2 S. 5 11 (r. lithon), 1 Ch. 22 15 (σκαδοδύμος λίθων, λατόμος λίθων), Ex. 28 11 (λιθοουργός τέχνης), (2) יָעוּץ, h, worker in wood, 2 S. 5 11 2 K. 12 11 [12] 1 Ch. 22 15 (r. [יוֹעֵץ] ξύλων), (3) נְחָשֵׁת, h, worker in bronze, 1 K. 7 14 (r. χαλκοῦ), 2 Ch. 24 12 (χαλκεὺς χαλκοῦ), (4) בַּרְזֶלִי, h, worker in iron, 2 Ch. 24 12 (χαλκεὺς σιδήρου). From the same root comes שֹׁרֵטֶת, šārōšet, 'work' (naturally more specific than מְלָאכָה, mēlākāh), defined, as above, by the addition of כֶּן or יָעוּץ (Ex. 31 5).

Words used to express the idea of carving, cutting, or hewing are: חָצַב (to hew out of the living rock), 1 Ch. 22 15 (τεχνίτης), 2 Ch. 2 18 [17] (with שֹׁרֵט, λατόμος), to be kept distinct from חָטַב ('to cut or gather wood'), Dt. 19 5 29 11 [10], etc.; and קָקַץ (stone), Is. 22 16, as opposed to חָקַץ (wood), 1 K. 6 35. Common to both crafts are כָּרַת, Dt. 19 5 1 K. 5 6 [20] Is. 14 8 (wood), Mesha inscr. l. 25 (stone), and בָּקַעַ, Gen. 22 3 (wood), Hos. 13 2 Ps. 78 15 Job 28 10 Eccles. 10 9 (stone). חָקַץ (to judge from the use of חָקַץ in Siloam inscr. l. 1) is used only of stone; חָקַץ, on the other hand, of wood (Is. 10 34, cp חָקַץ, chap. 17 6 24 13).

2. The work of the carpenter belongs to the earliest efforts of man to provide himself with the ordinary conveniences and simple comforts of life.

2. Workers in wood. His work ranges from the fashioning of the rude tent furniture to veneering, inlaying, and carvings in wood (מִכְלֵא'וֹת, מְכַלְעוֹת, e.g. of cedar, 1 K. 6 18; olive, ib. 32; fir, ib. v. 34 f.; pittūhīm, פִּתּוּחִים, 1 K. 6 29); see BED, EBONY, IVORY. Cp also SHIP.

The implements used would be primarily of the simplest description. (The modern Bedouin for example fashions a hammer by taking a fragment of hard red granite and bringing it into the required shape by chipping it with another stone.) The precise meaning of some of the terms is uncertain, and the mention of hēb (sword) in Ex. 20²⁵ to denote an implement is significant. Naturally growth of culture went side by side with the invention of more elaborate and delicate tools. As we should expect from the analogies of folklore, implements of stone or wood were long preferred for certain purposes to those of iron (cp Ex. 20²⁵); but the tradition that in the building of Solomon's temple no 'tool of iron' was heard (1 K. 6⁷) is hardly genuine (see IRON, § 2).

The tools comprised various kinds of AXE, HAMMER, SAW, measuring-line (קו, Is. 44¹³), chisel or carving-tool (פָּתָחָה, pl. Is. 44¹³, EV 'planes'), the stylus or graver (פָּרָץ, see PENCIL), and an instrument for making circles (so apparently פְּתוּחָה). Some of these tools, of course, were used by workers in stone.

From Is. 44¹³ ff. Wisd. 13¹⁰ ff. we gain interesting particulars regarding some of the details of carpentry. The artificer takes care to choose a sound tree, one that will not rot, avoiding the crooked and knotted pieces, or, may be, 'planteth an ash tree' for the purpose. Having made his choice he saws, hews, or cuts it into beams.¹ The wood is then ready to be shaped into a slab (לוח), board (פָּתָחָה), plank (צָלַע), stave (בָּר), etc.

3. The art of working in stone goes back to the earliest ages. In its rudest forms it is exemplified in the primitive rock-cut altars, aqueducts, wine-vats, cisterns, and conduits still to be seen in Palestine. Of a less primitive character are the rough-hewn stones, varying in workmanship, used as landmarks (Jer. 31²¹), gravestones (2 K. 23¹⁷), inscriptional steles,² etc. Finally, the art in its most cultivated and advanced form is seen in the manufacture of stone vases, etc. (see ALABASTER); sculpture, on the other hand, does not seem to have been practised by the Hebrews, although the prohibition in Ex. 20⁴ is sufficiently wide to indicate that this particular branch of art was not unknown.

3. Workers in stone.

4. One of the most interesting features connected with the craft of stone-cutting in general is the faculty which the ancients possessed of dealing with huge masses of stone (in the form of foundation-blocks, obelisks, or statues). The hugest of the stones of Stonehenge is quite put in the shade by such specimens of Egyptian workmanship as Cleopatra's Needle (186 tons), and the obelisk of Hatshepsut at Karnak (circa 374 tons), and—to go beyond Egypt—by the largest of the stones in the outer wall of the Temple Hill at Jerusalem (some of which measure 25 × 12 × 8 ft.), or by some of the stones in the ruins of Baalbek, three of which are about 13 ft. in height, probably as much in thickness, and no less than from 62 to 64 ft. in length. 'The greatest marvel is that they have been raised to the top of a substruction already 23 ft. high.'³ One is enabled to see from the extant quarries of red granite at Syene the way in which the stone was cut away from the mother-rock before removal. Thence it was conveyed upon sledges and rollers or upon rafts and floats, which were drawn by men or cattle (sometimes both) to the required spot. Brute strength—with a total disregard of human life—aided by such simple mechanical expedients as levers was the sole motive power employed.⁴

5. Turning now to the builders (בָּנִים, olkoðmou), we note that in the construction of walls both wood and stone were used (Ezra 5⁸ 6³; cp Herod. 1 179, Rawl. ad loc.). The specialised term for wall-builders is בָּנֵי הַיָּדִים

⁴ See Wilk. Anc. Eg. 2302 ff., and for the interesting description upon the bas-relief in the Deir el-Bahri temple, see F. L. Griffith in Eg. Expl. Fund Report for '95-'96, p. 6 ff.

(2 K. 12¹² [13]) קָרִי אֲבָן קִיר (2 S. 5¹¹). Houses were made of bricks or clay; but hewn-stone was not uncommon (cp below, 6), especially in the case of houses of the better class and such buildings as the פְּלִשְׁתִּין, מְרִיקִין, בְּרִמָּה, etc., which (like the names they bear) were of foreign introduction. Joisting is referred to in 2 Ch. 34¹¹ (סִתְּרָה). Naturally some knowledge of measuring and the drawing of plans (cp תְּבִנָּה, 1 Ch. 28¹¹ f., etc.) was required.

6. Here mention may be made of the plasterers (חִיִּים, táhim, Ezek. 13¹¹, see MORTAR, 3), and the white-washer (MḤ סִייר, cp kovidas, Mt. 23²⁷ Acts 23³) who carried a brush with jointed handles (Shabb. 47a).

For the terms used to express the 'cutting' of stone see above (§ 1); the 'quarrying' is called קָטַץ (1 K. 5 18 [31] Eccles. 10⁹). Stones which have been thus treated are styled (1) אֲבָן מְקַצָּץ, 2 K. 12 12 [13] 22⁶ (ἀβὼν λατομητός), 2 Ch. 34¹¹ (λ. τεράπεδος), (2) אֲבָן מְקַצָּץ, 1 K. 5 17 [31] (λ. ἀτελεστήτους), 1 Ch. 22² (λ. ξυστούς), 1 K. 7 9 11 6 36 (μέτρον ἀτελεστήτων), Am. 5 11 (ξυστούς, or ξυστούς); used for altars, Ezek. 40 42 (λίθιναι λελαξευμέναι); cp the prohibition Ex. 20 25 (תְּהַקֵּי); also in buildings, Is. 9 10 [9]. (3) אֲבָן מְקַצָּץ used in building, Ezra 5 8 6 4, the same word in Palm. is used of an inscriptional stele.

Special tools which would be needed in addition to those mentioned above are the plumb-line (מִזְרָן, Am. 7⁷), or plummet-weight (מִשְׁקֶלֶת), Is. 28 17 2 K. 21 13), and the measuring-rod (מִזְרָן אוֹתוֹת הַיָּדִים, Ezek. 40 3). For the mechanical methods employed by the Egyptians, see especially F. Petrie, Pyramids and Temples of Gizeh, 173 212 ff.

7. On the art of setting and engraving jewels (Ex. 28⁹ ff., etc.), see PRECIOUS STONES.

8. Workers in clay and earth. Their trade ranged from the building of houses to the manufacture of household utensils, and pottery of the finest

4. Other trades. POTTERY). GLASS [g.v.] was known to the Hebrews; but the glazier is first mentioned in the Mishna (ונן).

9. For the tanning and preparation of skins see BOTTLE, § 1; LEATHER.

10. For the various kinds of cloths, wearing apparel, etc., see DRESS and the related articles, and for their manufacture, see EMBROIDERY, LINEN, TENT, WEAVING, WOOL. In connection with this trade mention must be made of the FULLER and the dyer (Mish. צַנַע; see generally COLOURS).

11. Considerable attention was paid to the body. The use of perfumes and perfumed unguents necessitated the 'apothecaries' and 'confectionaries' (in AV); see INCENSE, OIL, SPICES. Barbers were an indispensable class (see BEARD, HAIR). The bath-man (MḤ בָּלֵן), and the מְרַר (Phœn.), who scraped the skin with a strigil, first appear at a late date.

12. Finally must be enumerated the most domestic of all arts—that of cooking; see BAKING, BREAD, COOKING, FISH, FOOD.

Among dwellers in the desert whose wants are few, and who derive food and clothing from their herds, a

5. General remarks. The women do more than their share of the work, and owing to inter-tribal co-operation outside aid is rarely needed. Doughty, however, speaks of a tribe of nomads who travelled as cheese-sellers (Ar. Des. 2208 f.), and in the case of metal-workers it is not improbable that there were nomad craftsmen, the ancestors of the şany and solubby of to-day.¹

It is among a settled population living in towns and villages that need for special craftsmen arises. Outside help was needed by Solomon in the building of the temple (1 K. 5 6 [20], see GEBAL i.), and the intercourse thus established (not necessarily for the first time) was not without its influence on the religious history of Israel (Neh. 13:16 20 f., cp HORSE, § 3).

With the increase of trade special places for the transaction of business sprang up. The 'shop' (חנות) is first mentioned in MH (on the text of Jer. 37:16 see CELLS); the Gk. [ματισπώλια] (παντοπωλία) occurs only in a Palmyrene inscription. The usual custom, no doubt, was to carry on business out of doors, in the streets (מגזן, see especially 1 K. 20:34), and, as is still so frequently the case, special localities would be set apart for certain trades. Hawkers and pedlars, however, were not unknown. Bābā Bathra 22a mentions the itinerant vendors of perfumes who visited cities to sell toilet requisites to women, and the Tadmor fiscal inscription of 137 A.D. imposes a tax on all peripatetic dealers in old clothes (כנוריא ד'הספין . . . כנוריא . . . || Gk. ματισπώλια μεταβόλοι πωλ[ού]ντες ἐν τῇ πόλει).

In Alexandria there were streets reserved for the goldsmiths, silversmiths, coppersmiths, etc. (Succah, 51b), similarly in Damascus (cp Baed. Pal. (3) 343; see also JERUSALEM). On the 'valley of craftsmen or sorcerers' (1 Ch. 4:14), see GE-HARASHIM.

The classification by trade and the formation of guilds doubtless arose at an early date (cp EPHESUS, col. 1305, n. 1). Guilds of goldsmiths and perfumers are mentioned in Neh. 38,¹ possibly also temple-masons in POCHERETH-HAZZEBAIM.

If so the family was a hereditary guild, similar to the later families of Garmu and Abtinus who tenaciously retained the secret of baking the shew-bread and preparing the holy incense in their respective families (Yoma 3:11). Guilds of potters and weavers seem to be referred to in 1 Ch. 4:21. A בַּיִת הַכֹּסֶמֶת of the coppersmiths is mentioned in Shabb. 11b, and a קִינִיָּא ד' תַּנְּמָא (smiths' guild) in a Palmyrene inscription of the third century A.D. It was possibly as a sign of membership that each artisan used to wear something distinctive of his calling; the scribe, a pen in his ear; the wool-carder, a woollen thread; the tailor (אייך), a needle in front of his dress, etc.

No encroachment of trade was allowed (Mass. 24a), and to avoid competition two butchers would agree together not to kill on the same day (Bābā Bathra, 9a; see ib. 89a). Each baker adopted a particular shape of loaf to distinguish his workmanship from that of others.

All labour was looked upon as honourable. Exceptions were few. The sailor, herdsman, driver of asses or camels, and barber were regarded with disfavour. The tanner was obliged to carry on his evil-smelling craft outside the precincts of the city (Bābā Bathra 25a, incidentally confirmed by Acts 10:32), and the low esteem in which his calling was held was only exceeded by that of the skinner of carcases (Pēsāch. 113a). The trades closed to the high priest were those of the weaver, fuller, perfumer, barber, tanner, leech, and bath-man. Apart from this the practice of some trade or other was recommended to all. 'Great is work, for it honours the worker' (Nedar. 46b). To neglect to teach one's son some handicraft was tantamount to bringing him up to robbery (Kidd. 29a). Not all trades, as we have seen, were estimated alike. Bērākh. (63a) advises every man to teach his son a clean and light employment, such as, for example, tailoring, because the stitches form neat, straight lines like the furrows of the field. Many Rabbins, renowned in their day, were not ashamed to earn their living by the labour of their hands; R. Johanan as a sandal-maker, Hillel as a wood-cutter, R. Jehudah as a baker, R. Simon as an embroiderer—and many other instances could be given.² It is quite exceptional, therefore, when Ben-Sira elevates the literary profession far above all trades, and refuses to concede the possibility of the artisan's acquiring wisdom (Ecclus. 38:28 ff.). HANDS, LAYING ON OF. The same English phrase 'to lay hands upon' is used in the AV to render two distinct Greek phrases—viz. χεῖρας ἐπιβάλλειν, to lay hands on with violence, and χεῖρας ἐπιτίθειν, to lay hands on to convey some gift. With the latter phrase corresponds the ἐπιθεῖς χεῖρων of Heb. 6:2 1 Tim. 4:14 2 Tim. 1:6. From it, again, must be distinguished the verb χειροτονεῖν (Acts 14:23), which properly signifies simply 'to appoint,' so, e.g., in the Didaché, chap. 15, 'Appoint for yourselves (χειροτονήσατε ἑαυτοῖς) bishops and deacons': though at a later period χειροτονία is regularly used as a synonym of χειροθεσία.

In the OT we find 'laying on of hands' practised (a) by privileged individuals, of their own free will, and (b) by religious officers as a legal act. In the NT we find (c) Jesus and the apostles using it at their pleasure in acts of healing or in benedictions; we also find it (d) as an ecclesiastical rite. In all cases we must suppose the laying on of hands to be accompanied by words. If the words partake of the nature of a spell, the laying on of hands must also be said to have a magical character; our judgment on the one act conditions our judgment on the other (see BLESSINGS AND CURSINGS). For an instance of (a) see Gen. 48:17 ff.; for instances of (b) Ex. 29:10 15 Lev. 14:32 44 8:13 f. 22 15:24 29:33 16:21 (see AZAZEL, § 1) 24:14 Nu. 8:10 12 27:18 20:2 Dt. 13:17 7; cp also Ecclus. 50:20. See SACRIFICE.

The later Jewish šmikhā is the lineal descendant of this OT rite; but by the fifth century A.D., the symbolic act of imposition of hands had entirely disappeared from the Jewish ordination of religious teachers. (See Schürer's note GJV (3) 2:199 [GJV (2) 2:152 ET 3:177]; and article 'Ordinirung' in Hamburger, K.E., Abt. 2:822 ff.)

For instances of (c) see Lk. 4:40 (the parallels in Mt. and Mk. are silent), Mk. 8:23 [16:18] 10:16 (blessing children) Acts 9:17 28:8. The several passages in Acts, however, need separate consideration. In Acts 8:16 f. we read that Peter and John, after prayer, laid their hands on those who had been baptized by Philip in Samaria, and they (for the first time) received the Holy Spirit. That the action was in no degree magical is shown by the incident related in Acts 10:44. Similarly in Acts 19:6 Paul lays his hands on disciples of John the Baptist (see JOHN, DISCIPLES OF).

Instances of (d) occur in Acts 6:6 (imposition of hands on the Seven), 13:3 (Barnabas and Saul), 1 Tim. 4:14 5:22 2 Tim. 1:6. It is everywhere apparent that only certain privileged persons are able so to perform the rite of imposition of hands that the χάρισμα of office may be communicated, and it is this communication of a χάρισμα which constitutes investiture of office.

Once more the non-magical character of the rite is manifest. In 1 Tim. 4:14 the imposition of the hands of the presbytery is in close connection with prophetic utterances (cp 1 Tim. 1:18). In 2 Tim. 1:6 the description is condensed into 'the gift (χάρις) of God which is in thee through the laying on of my (Paul's) hands.'

The meaning of 1 Tim. 5:22 is not quite plain. 'Lay hands suddenly (or, hastily) on no man' might refer to the appointment of church officers; but the following words, 'and be not partaker with other men's sins,' hardly seems favourable to this. The laying on of hands was afterwards employed in the reception of catechumens and in the restoration of offenders. The ἐπιθεῖς χεῖρων of Heb. 6:2 is closely connected with 'baptisms';¹ but we are unable to define the precise meaning. See SPIRITUAL GIFTS.

HANDWASHING. See WASHINGS, MEALS, § 5.

HANES (חָנַס; on the versions see n. 2), a place in Egypt (Is. 30:4 to which v. 5 belongs). MT is generally rendered thus: 'For though² his princes are in Zoan,

² If MT of v. 4 f. is correct, כִּי חָנַס must be taken as concessive ('for though . . .'). 'His princes' cannot mean 'Judah's princes,' for Pharaoh has just been spoken of (see Di. Jes. (6) ed. Kittel). חָנַס differs in several points from MT. It presupposes חָנַס יִשְׂרָאֵל, מִלְּאֵיכָי שִׂירֵי, מִלְּאֵיכָי יִשְׂרָאֵל; חָנַס יִשְׂרָאֵל is unrepresented. So far as חָנַס is concerned, we cannot pronounce חָנַס יִשְׂרָאֵל's text an improvement. See, however, no. 3. Jerome keeps Hanes, but guesses badly at 'ultimam juxta and his messengers go as far as Hanes, none wins aught but disappointment, etc. (so SBOT, 'Isaiah')—i.e., however far the rule of the Pharaoh may extend, none who has anything to ask of him fails to be disappointed (Di., Duhm, Che.). If this is correct, Hanes must have been at some distance from the royal residence, so that the Pharaoh communicated with it by messengers or envoys. Our first object will be to illustrate by Egyptology what the critics pronounce the most probable view of the Hebrew text; we therefore disregard at present the different interpretation of EV.

1. We may well be cautious in seeking to identify Hanes, considering the failure of Ⓢ to recognise any Egyptian name resembling it. But we may at any rate reject the view put forward by Dümichen, who identifies both Hanes and the Assyrian Hinin(!) with Ⓢ with Ⓢ , the capital of a district Ⓢ with a sanctuary Ht- hntt ('house of the nurse'?). Dümichen held this city to be Daphnæ, and Daphnæ to be Heracleopolis parva, but without any other reason than the analogy of this alleged 'Henes' to the southern Hnēs (wrongly read Henen-suten by Dümichen). Unfortunately, the reading Henes is a guess of the highest improbability. Naville (Ahnas el-Medineh, 4) admits it to be doubtful, and prefers to emphasise the fact that in Ašur-bāni-pal's account of his war with Tarku (Tirhakah) Hīninšī occurs among the names of cities all of which belong to the Delta. It is clear, however, that this circumstance will not justify us in accepting Dümichen's identification. It can only suggest that Ašur-bāni-pal's Hīninšu was probably a city in the Delta, which is, in fact, all that Naville contends for.

2. We have next to consider the view prevalent among scholars from Vitringa's time—a view that is at any rate in harmony with the generally accepted interpretation of Is. 304. This identifies Hanes with Heracleopolis (magna), a city of Middle Egypt, W. of the Nile, near the place where the Bahr Yūsuf branches off into the Faiyūm. The spot is now called Henassiyé or Henassiyet-el-Medineh, 12 mm. W. of Beni Suēf; on the unproductive excavations there see Naville, Ahnas el Medineh (11th Memoir of EEF, '94). Earlier Arab writers called it Ahnās,¹ the Copts Hnēs (or Ehnēs); the ancient hieroglyphic name was Hat (i.e., 'house,' cp Ⓢ), Henen-suten (or seten?) (i.e., 'abode of the royal youth').² This name seems to have been shortened to Hne(n)s(e) in the vulgar pronunciation (cp Ass. Hininšī?).

The city was the capital of the twentieth nome (or county) of Upper Egypt, which formed an island surrounded by the main Nile and the present Bahr Yūsuf (? Ptol. 125, Strabo, 789, 809, 812), or at least by a similar branch of the Nile (called Menhi in Coptic writers). The chief god was Haršaf(y), 'Αρσαφής—i.e., 'Horus the valiant' (cp Plut. De Is. 37), whence the Greek name of the city (the ram-headed Hnumu being identified with Heracles), or according to an earlier etymology 'the one on his lake' (vocalize hri-šweif); but most likely the name (Hr-šfy) meant originally only 'the ram-headed.' The sacred animal was the ichneumon. The city and its chief temple played a great part in Egyptian theology, and deep cosmogonic symbolism was found in the ceremonies of the great local festivals of 'hoeing the ground,' of 'lifting the heaven,' etc. The story which in Egyptian mythology takes the place of the Deluge-story (see DELUGE, § 15) represents the destruction of mankind as having begun here.¹ Politically, the city took the highest rank under the ninth and tenth dynasties (Heracleopolitan), and again we find it important in the eighth and seventh centuries. The Ethiopian P'anhy (commonly miscalled Pianchi) mentions the ruler (nomarch) of Heracleopolis as the chief adversary of the powerful prince of Saïs (EGYPT, § 65). The Assyrian king Ašur-bāni-pal speaks of a ruler of Hininšī (= Heracleopolis?) whom he called Nahki (but see above). Herodotus (2.137) knows something of a blind king Anysis (!) who in the island-city 'Αυσίς (= Ahnēs) held out against the Ethiopian invasion for fifty years (a confusion of some historical and mythological facts).

Æthiops et Blemmyes Ægypti civitatem. Saad. renders בְּרֹמֶס; cp his rendering of Lehabim in Gen. 10 13 (לְהָבִים). But this is Eg. Pemdje, Pemdje; Greek Πέμπτη or 'Οξύρυγχος.

3. But is the text on which recent critics have worked correct? It is very difficult to think so. Grütz (Emendationes, '92) and Cheyne (JQR July '98) have independently suggested תחננת as an emendation of חנש; 'Zoan' and 'Tahpanhes' are very naturally combined.

Ⓢ at any rate is wrong, thinks the latter; חננת would be possible (cp the Coptic name Ehnēs); but the appearance of rs. 4 and 5, both in MT and in Ⓢ , suggests that more than one letter may have fallen out of the text. חנש כל הבראש also appears to him wrong. There is a קרש חנש (see Ginsburg); but this is artificial. Krochmal, Grätz, and Cheyne read כלם הביאו שי שרים, 'they all bring presents.' שרים מלאכים (so Ⓢ) and שייו מלאכיו removes all the ground for dispute between EV and the recent critics; Cheyne's חנש may also be right, unless the corruption is more deeply seated. Verses 5 and 6 thus become parallel, and within rs. 5 itself the parallelism between 'Zoan' and 'Tahpanhes' is as perfect as it could be (see TAH-PAN-HES). Cp Ruben, JQR 11.448 f. '991.

HANGING. The Hebrew terms employed to denote deaths of this or of a like nature require to be carefully distinguished.

1. In the cases of Ahithophel (2 S. 17.23) and Judas Iscariot (Mt. 27.5) death by strangulation (חנק, hānaq; ἀπαγχέσθαι) is a mode of suicide. Another reference has been found in Job 7.5, where, after describing some of his distressing symptoms, Job says, according to RV,

So that my soul chooseth strangling,
And death rather than (these) my bones.

It is very improbable, however, that a righteous man like Job should be thus represented, and either the 'strangling' must be one of the well-known symptoms of leprosy, or, much more probably, the word rendered 'strangling' (חנק) ; so *Aq. ἀγχόνη*² is corrupt. It is at any rate certain that there is a reference to suicide by strangling in Tob. 3.10, and to a violent death caused thus in Tob. 2.3, also in Jos. Ant. xvi. 11.7 (two sons of Herod στραγγάλη κτείνονται).

In later times, according to the Talmud, this form of death was the ordinary mode of execution (Sanh. 11.1; cp 7.3); some form of the garrotte such as is still used in executions in Spain and elsewhere, is intended by the expression.

2. The word rendered 'hanging' in EV (חָלַף, tālāh, חָלַף, tālā; κρεμάζειν, kreḡmān, kreḡmānōnai, in Esth. 7.9 στανουόν; suspendere [appendere, affigere] in patibulo [ligno, cruce], or super stipes, or super trabem, or cruci) seems invariably to mean some form of impalement or crucifixion.

(a) It has been doubted whether the references in Esther (חָלַף על חָלַף 5.14 6.4 7.9f. 8.7 9.13f. 25) refer to impalement or to crucifixion (after death). It is true, impalement (ἀνασκολοπιζειν, Herod. 1.128) would have been the correct punishment to specify,³ the scene of the story being laid in Persia (cp Schr. KAT(2) 378, 615); but we must not expect minute accuracy (see ESTHER, § 1 f.). Further, the description in 514 seems inconsistent with impalement. Both here, and in the other passages referred to, EV has 'gallows,' but in 223 'hanged on a tree' as elsewhere. At any rate, the impalement of the living body seems to be meant in Ezra 611, RV 'let a beam (γκ) be pulled out from his house, and let him be lifted up (ἤρθη) and fastened (ἀκράτη) thereon' (ἘΒΑ ὀρθωμένος πληγήσεται [παγήσεται, A], ἐπ' αὐτοῦ, ἘΛ ὀρθώθησεται καὶ παγήσεται).

² The whole verse seems to need careful restoration. See Che. Exp. T., May '99, 381 b.

We may compare the Ass. phrase ina zakibi usakif; zakipu is the ordinary word for 'pale, cross'; cp Aram. ܘܫܘܦ 'cross' (same verb in Heb. in Ps. 145 14 146 8).

(b) Beyond all doubt it is the impalement or gibbeting of the offender (or part of the offender) after death, for propitiation to God or warning to man, that is meant in Dt. 2122 f.¹ (see below), Josh. 829 (king of Ai) 1026 f. (the five kings), and 2 S. 412 (Rechab and Baanah's hands and feet; so Klo.). Probably also in Gen. 4019 22 4113 (cp Ebers, Ägypten, 334, and EGYPT, § 28). Similarly Nicanor's head and shoulder (2 Macc. 1535), Holofernes' head (Judith 141), and the princes hanged up by their [enemies'] hand (Lam. 5 12).

3. Closely allied to the usage of (b) is that which apparently underlies another word (γρ), which is taken by EV (after Symm. and Pesh.) to mean hanging.

It occurs in MT only in Nu. 254 (where Ḥ has παραδειγματίσαι) and in 2 S. 2169 13 (where Ḥ has ἐξηλάζειν, Ḥ in v. 6 ἐξήλασώμεθα; Vg. cruci figere; cp v. 14 ḤΒΑ ἡλίαςει, Vg. affigere). Probably, however, the same verb ought to be read also in 1 S. 31 10 (so, after Lag. Prov. p. iv, Dr., Bu., Löhr).

The etymology is difficult. WRS, Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 419, thought of precipitation, and reminds us of the many cases in which precipitation from a rock was a mode of execution;² but this hardly suits the context. Dillmann on Nu. 254 takes the meaning to be to expose with dislocated limbs. This seems to have been the meaning attached by Ḥ (cp παραδειγματίσω in Heb. 66). In all cases the reference is to a solemn presentation of the dead body with piacular intent—in the sun (Nu. 254), before Yahwē (2 S. 216 Nu. 254 2 S. 219)—on the 'mountain' of Gibeon or the walls of Bethshan, until the falling rain showed that the divine wrath had been appeased.

4. In spite of the fact that crucifixion was not a Jewish punishment, we find Paul in Gal. 313 expressly asserting that the death of Christ made him 'a curse' on the ground that 'every one who hangs on a stake (EV a tree, ξύλον, γγ) is cursed' (Dt. 2123, quoted freely from Ḥ). In Acts 530 1039 (cp 1 Pet. 224) is found the very same Hebraistic phrase for crucifixion, together with the ascription of the responsibility of the act to the Jews. Evidently those who wrote thus considered crucifixion to have a piacular character, and the only wonder is that Paul could have represented an innocent person as attracting to himself the divine punishment by an act which was a judicial error. It should be observed, however, that Paul qualifies the term ἐπικατάρατος by the preceding expression γενόμενος ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν κατάρα, 'being made a curse for us.' It is true, κατάρα 'curse' may have been suggested by the Heb. נִקְּבָה, which corresponds to ἐπικατάρατος in Paul's free quotation from Dt. (Ḥ has κεκατηραμένος ὑπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ). Bearing in mind, however, the parallel abstract term ἀμαρτία in 2 Cor. 521 ('made him to be sin for us,' ὑπὲρ ἡμῶν ἀμαρτίαν), we cannot help supposing that there is another more important reason for the choice of the term κατάρα. 'Christ was not personally accursed, but only came to stand in the place of such an one before God, inasmuch as he suffered the accursed death as a vicarious expiatory sacrifice' (Pfeiderer, Paulinism, 199). He was therefore a 'curse,' but not 'cursed' in the same sense as any justly condemned criminal would have been. Paul's object being to overthrow the legal religion by terms derived from the law, we cannot hold that this minute distinction is a mere quibble. He deliberately avoids Ḥ's expression as liable to misinterpretation. Cp Holtzmann, Neutest. Theol. 2105 ff. See also Lightfoot's note, Galatians⁽²⁾, 150 ff.

Gauls τοὺς κακουροὺς ἀνασκοποῦνται τοῖς θεοῖς, and Strabo (198), speaking of the Druids, says καὶ ἄλλα δὲ ἀνθρωποθυσιῶν εἶδη λέγεται· καὶ γὰρ κατετόξευον τινὰς καὶ ἀνεσταύρουσιν ἐν τοῖς ἱεροῖς.

HANNATHON (ܗܢܗܛܢ; ἄνωθ [B], ἐνναθωθ [A], ἄνα. [L]), a city on the N. border of Zebulun (Josh. 19 14). Perhaps for Anathon = Beth-anath? Ḥ's reading (cp ḤL αναθων, 1 Ch. 78, for Anathoth) favours this view. There was a Beth-Anath in Zebulun, and not far off a Kart-Anat or Kirjath-Anath (WMM As. u. Eur. 195). In Am. Tab. 11 17 19632 we find a city called Ḥin(n)atūni in Kinabhi; but Ḥ in Assyrian sometimes represents y, e.g., Ḥazitu = 'Azzah (Gaza).

HAPPIZZEZ, AV APHSES (חַפִּיזֵז; ἀφῆσι [B], -cch [A], -ccēi [L]), the name of the eighteenth priestly course (1 Ch. 24 15), corrupted probably from PASHHUR [g. v.].
 חַפִּיזֵז became, by accidental transposition of letters, חַפִּיזֵז, and this became חַפִּיזֵז, and ח, ה, ו, and ה being confounded. The corruption of חַפִּיזֵז into חַפִּיזֵז [see DANCE, § 4 (4)] is partly analogous.

HABA (חַבָּה), mentioned with Halah and Habor as a place where Israelitish exiles were settled by Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch. 5 26; om. חַבָּה; ἈΡΡΑΝ—i. e., חַבָּה [L]). From a comparison of 2 K. 17 6 it is clear that חַבָּה is a mutilated form of some longer phrase. Most critics think that it represents the עֲרֵי כְּרִי ('cities of Media') or perhaps rather הַרֵי כְּרִי ('mountains of Media'), or נְהַרֵי כְּרִי ('river of Media').¹ It is possible, however, that the original document had some name of a place such as Ḥarḥar, a city and region on the border of Media, near Ellip, conquered by Sargon, and colonised by him with captives from other countries (KB 2 61).

It is noteworthy that among the families of Nethinim mentioned in the great list in Ezra 2 Neh. 7 and 1 Esd. 5, occur the b'ne Ḥarhur (Harḥar). Out of חַבָּה עִיר כְּרִי, 'and in Ḥarḥar, a city of Media,' all the various readings of MT and חַבָּה may have arisen. (חַבָּה, in 2 K. 17 6, has καὶ οὐκ ᾔσθησαν, where οὐκ is not = חַבָּה, but is corrupt. חַבָּה ἐν οὐρανοῖς [= οὐρανοῖς; see Mal. 1 3] ᾔσθησαν, which is a conjectural correction.)

HARADAH (חַרְדָּה); ἡραδαῖος [BAF], -ad [L]), a stage in the wandering in the wilderness (Nu. 33 24 f.). See WANDERINGS, § 11 f.

HARAN (חַרָּן; ἡραρῶν [BADEQ²L]), or, as we shall here call it, for distinction from the Haran properly so-called, ḤARRĀN (CHARRAN, Acts 7 2 4 AV), is, in P, the place where Terah and his family halted in their migration from Ur Casdim and where Terah died (Gen. 11 31 f. 12 4 5); whilst J represents it as the birthplace of Abraham (Gen. 12 r 24 47; cp 27 43 28 10 29 4, ἡραρῶν [E]), and gives it the name of the 'city of Nahor' (Gen. 24 10). J also describes it as the home of LABAN (g. v.), and introduces it as such into the story of Isaac and Jacob; he places it in ARAM-NAHARAIM. There are, however, great difficulties² in this view, and it is not improbable that חַרָּן in Gen. is miswritten for חַרְרִין, Ḥauran; not Ḥarran, but the chief city of Ḥauran was the home of the Laban clan (see NAHOR). At any rate there is no doubt that Ḥarran is mentioned in 2 K. 19 12 (see below); reference is made (|| Is. 37 12, ἡραρῶν [A²]) there to its conquest by the Assyrians, and in Ezek. 27 23 (ἡραρῶν [BQ]) to its commercial intercourse with Tyre. Nor can any one fail to see the certainty of the restoration חַרְרִינִים in Is. 26 which (if we adopt also two other appropriate corrections)³ produces this complete picture,

For they are full of diviners from the east,
 And of soothsayers like the Philistines,
 And with the secret arts of the Harranians they practise enchantments.

Ḥarran, Ar. Ḥarrān, is situated about nine hours' journey from Edessa, on the small stream called Jullāb, at the point where the road from Damascus joined the great highway from Nineveh to Carchemish and Arpad. The commercial and strategical importance of its position may account for its name (Ass. ḥarrānu, 'road').⁴

¹ At any rate the phrase, whatever it may have been, was first omitted and then restored in the wrong place.
³ חַרְרִינִים for חַרְרִינִים (see Ex. 7 11) and חַרְרִינִים for חַרְרִינִים. The latter is due to Krochmal. Cp HAND.
⁴ Winckler, however, questions the connection between the words.

HARAN

The site was first explored by a party detached from the Euphrates expedition, and the disinterment of a fragment of an Assyrian lion at Ḥarrān preceded the discoveries of Layard in Assyria proper. No inscriptions have yet been brought from Ḥarrān itself; but the Assyrian and Babylonian texts throw some light on its history. The 'country of Ḥarrān' is mentioned in the Prism inscription of Tiglath-pileser I. (KB 1 39), and in another inscription believed to be of not later date (3 R 4 r 1. 19 f.). In 5 R 64 Nabūna'id, the most scrupulously religious of the later kings of Babylon, relates that he rebuilt the temple of Sin (the moon-god) at Ḥarrān on the foundation-stone of Ašur-bāni-pal, who discovered the foundation-stone of Shalmaneser (11.), son of Ašur-našir-pal. The cultus of this deity had its chief home and perhaps its origin at Ḥarrān; ašib ḥarrāni ('inhabiter of Ḥarrān') is a title of Sin under Ašur-bāni-pal (1 R 8, no. 2, l. 13), and Nabūna'id tells us that Sin had had his dwelling-place at Ḥarrān from remote days (PSBA, 1883, p. 7).

Hence it has been fancifully conjectured that Terah may have halted at Ḥarrān because the moon-god had attracted his special reverence at Ur (Uru). So Tomkins (Life of Abraham), Hommel (AHT 73).

Sargon II. also mentions Ḥarrān. He states that he restored its privileges (as well as those of Ašur) 'which had long been forgotten' (KB 2 53, cp 41); it would seem therefore that Ḥarrān had taken part in the rebellion of Ašur in the year of the great solar eclipse 763. Ašur-bāni-pal, who had been crowned in Ḥarrān with the crown of Sin, was not less friendly to this sacred city. He rebuilt its temple (see above), and raised his younger brother to the rank of high priest of Sin. During the invasion of the Ummanmanda (i. e., here, the Medes; see CYRUS, § 2) much damage was done to Ḥarrān and its temple.

An inscription of Nabū-na'id discovered by Scheil gives a second account of that king's restoration of the temple of Sin fifty-four years after its destruction (see Messerschmidt, MVG, 1896, and cp the cylinder inscription described at length by Del. Catwer Bib. Lex. (2), s. v. 'Haran').

The conquest of Ḥarrān mentioned in 2 K. 19 12 evidently stands in connection with the restoration of privileges spoken of by Sargon II. When the rebellion of Ašur and Ḥarrān was suppressed, these places were doubtless deprived of their ancient rights.¹

It only remains to be mentioned that at Carrhæ (= Ḥarrān) Crassus was defeated and slain by the Parthians (53 B.C.), and the emperor Caracalla murdered at the instigation of Macrinus (217 A.D.). The place long continued to be a centre of idolatry, and especially of moon-worship. Its principal temple remained in the hands of the heathen Ḥarranians till the eleventh century A.D., and was finally destroyed by the Mongols in the thirteenth.

The commercial importance of Ḥarrān in the sixth century B.C. is attested not only by Ezek. 27 23, but also later by Pliny, who enumerates among its specialities a certain odoriferous gum (HN 12 40). Josephus (Ant. xx. 2 2), too, speaks of its plentiful production of amomum. (There are also in it, he adds, the remains of Noah's ark.)

HARAN (חַרָּן; ἡραρῶν [AL in 1 Ch.]). 1. Brother of Abraham, and (P adds) father of Lot (Gen. 11 28 f. [J]; 26 f. 31 [P]; ἈΡΡΑ [A], -N [ADEL]). According to MT (v. 29) his daughters were MITCAH (1) and ISCAH. Wellhausen thinks that Haran was originally Ḥarrān (Prolog., ET, 313), and Yāqūt, the Arabian geographer, mentions the opinion that Ḥarrān was named after

HARAN

Haran, Abraham's brother (2231, ap. Mez, Harrân, 24). If Milcah=Salecah (of which MT's Iscah must be another corruption) all becomes plain. The city of Salecah might equally well be called the wife and the daughter of Hauran. J, doubtless, reconciled these statements (which lay before him in a corrupt form) by inventing a Haran (הָרָן). That P understood the Terahites who had sojourned in Harran on their way from 'Ur-kasdim' (?) to Canaan, is, of course, not to be questioned.

HARAN (הָרָן); cp Sab. pr. u. הָרָן; DHM Epig. Denk. 56), the name of a Calebite family, 1 Ch. 24:6 (ἈΡΡΑΝ [BA], ἈΡΡΩΝ [L]).

HARARITE, THE (הַרְרִי). BDB Lex., doubtfully 'mountain-dweller'; ο ἀραρχ[ε]ι [L], an unknown ethnic applied to certain of David's heroes.

1 Shammah b. Agee, 2 S. 23:11 (הַרְרִי, ὁ ἀρουχαιος [BA]; more probably an ARCHITE (q.v.); see SHAMMAH, 3.

2. Shammah, 2 S. 23:32a (ὁ ἀρωδετης [BA])=1 Ch. 11:34 (ὁ ἀραχει [B*], ἀραφ[ε]ι [D*], ἀρωι [L]), properly the same as (1) above, see SHAMMAH (4).

3. Ahiam b. Sharar, 2 S. 23:36b (הַרְרִי [Bā. for common אָרָר]; RV ARARITE; σαραουρετης [B], ἀραρ. [A], ἀρηριμα [L], where we may read with Marq. (Fund. 21) Ahiam b. SHARAR (q.v.) the 'Aradite' (הַרְרִי) or 'Adorite' (הַרְרִי); cp ARAD.

HARBONA (הַרְבֹּנָה); ἑάρρα καὶ ἑωραζη [B*], om. L^a, ὄαρε βωδ [A], or as in Esth. 7:9 Harbonah (הַרְבֹּנָה); βουγθαδαν [B*], -θαδ [N*] -Γαζαν [N^c], αγαθας [L^a], a chamberlain of Ahasuerus (Esth. 1:10).

In Jos. Ant. xi. 6:11 the name appears as σαβουναδας, σαβουναδης, and the latter stands for βαβουναδης (so for βαραζη above, read παβουναδης)—i.e., הַרְבֹּנָה, a name on the analogy of μωροβουναδης, etc.; see SHETHAR-BOZANAI. So Marq. (Fund. 71).

HARE (הָרֵה); ἄρυτιος [BAFL] [vs. 5 and 6 in ḤB^{AF} Lev. having apparently changed places], Lev. 11:6 Dt. 14:7. The hare is included amongst the unclean animals, on the ground that it chews the cud and does not part the hoof; cp CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, § 8. The idea that it chews the cud is an error, probably to be accounted for by the peculiar and constant twitching of the hare's upper lip when feeding, which, to a superficial observer, has somewhat the appearance of the motion of the jaws when the cud is being chewed by ruminants. Five species of hare (Lepus) have been described by Tristram from Palestine, where, he states, they are highly esteemed by the Arabs as food. The rabbit, L. caniculus, is not found in the Holy Land. Cp CONEY.

HAREL (הָרֵל), Ezek. 43:15 EV^{mg}. See ARIEL, n. 6, and ALTAR, § 4.

HAREPH (הָרֵף), 'sharp'; § 57, cp HARIPH, a Calebite, was the father of BETH-GADER [q.v.] (1 Ch. 25:1 ארפי [A], -EIM [B], ארפמ [L]).

HARETH (RV Hereth), THE FOREST OF (הָרֵת), apparently the place to which David went after leaving Mizpeh of Moab, 1 S. 22:5 (ἐν πολει ἀρεικ [B], . . . ἀριχ [L], ἐν τῇ π. ἀριαθ [A], ἀριχ [Jos. Ant. vi. 124]). Conder (PEFQ, 1876, p. 44) adopts עיר, 'city,' instead of יער, 'forest,' and finds Hareth (Hereth?) in the hill-village of Khârās, near the valley of Elah. We should most probably read עירֵיהֶם (from עִירָה)—i.e., עיר and הָרָה are two fragments of מערת. Adullam was David's refuge. See HOESH. T. K. C.

HARHAIH (הַרְהַיָּה), so the best edd., others read הַרְהַיָּה (הַרְהַיָּה), see Baer, Ginsb., ad loc.; BNA [ed. Sw.] om., ἀραχιοϋ [Tisch.]; cp H-P], Βαρ. [L], ἄραχ [Pesh.], ἈΡΑΛΙ [Vg.], the name given to the father of UZZIEL, 6 (Neh. 38). Its genuineness is doubtful; the MT עויאל בן־הרהה צרים can scarcely be defended (in spite of Be.-Rys.), and after the analogy of בן־הרהה (ib.) we should read simply בן־הרהה צרים.

The origin of the intrusive הרהה may perhaps be explained. Its close similarity to the equally unnecessary ורהה in 2. 20 (BNA om.) suggests that 2. 20 originally stood opposite one another in parallel columns, and that a marginal note has found its way into both passages, suffering corruption in the process. The note in question was הרהה ('to the mount'), a gloss upon הרהה (the turning of the wall) in 2. 19b.1 It still survives in 2. 19b, where eis τὸ ὄρος is inserted bodily between ὄρισω and αὐτοῦ (=19b, 7. 20a), and has been transplanted, but not yet corrupted, in the Vg. reading of 2. 20 ('post eum in monte edificavit'). A somewhat similar fate (according to We. TBS 151) has befallen another marginal note in 2 S. 1:6b 17a (cp We, Dr. ad loc.); see Exp. T. 10:280 (Mar. '99). S. A. C.

HARHAS (הַרְחָשׁ), ancestor of SHALLUM (2), 2 K. 22:14 (ἀρῃαδ [B*], ἀρῃαδ [B^b cetera], ἀραδ [A], ἀδρα [L])=2 Ch. 34:22 HASRAH (q.v.).

HARHUR (הַרְחֹרֹר), § 74, 'fever' (?], or, rather, a place-name [see HARA]; ἄροϋρ [BA], ἀροϋαρ [L]), family of NETHINIM in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii., § 9, Ezra 2:51)=Neh. 7:53 (ἀροϋμ [BA])=1 Esd. 5:31 ASSUR, RV ASUR (ἀροϋρ [BA]).

HARLOT (הַרְלוֹת), ῥωνή, πορνή; ἑδδὲχάη, 'one consecrated' [cp CLEAN, § 1], ἱερόδουλος, cp Ass. ḫadīstū; πόρνη [Gen. Dt.], τετελεσμέναι [Hos.], 'those initiated,' cp the masc. form ῥησ, AV 'sodomite,' πορνείων [Dt.], ἐνδιηλαγμένους [1 K. 22:46 (47) A], τελεταί 'sacred rites or mysteries' [=שִׁטְרֵי מִיכַדָּי, 1 K. 15:12, ἔλ στήλας], καθοσίμ [B], καθοσίμ [A], 12 K. 23:7, συμπλοκή [ḤAL 1 K. 16:28], cp ἐταίρα [Judg. 11:2]).

The difference between the Græco-Roman and the early Israelitish (and indeed Semitic) conceptions of marriage must be borne in mind when we consider the prevalence of harlotry attested by the OT documents. The Semitic conception is closely bound up with the idea that a dead man who has no children will miss something in Shēōl through not receiving that kind of worship which ancestors in early times appear to have received (cp Stade, GVI², 390 ff.). The object of marriage thus regarded is not the obtaining of legitimate heirs; a son of a ῥωνή, like Jephthah, is brought up in his father's house with the legitimate children (Judg. 11 2), and can even under certain circumstances succeed to the throne (Judg. 9 18; cp KINSHIP, § 6). Social and religious progress (cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 5 f.) necessarily led to the rise of a higher conception of marriage (cp Gen. 2 24); but in countries where the reproductive forces of nature were deified—in short, where the worship of the Babylonian goddess Ištar had been introduced—harlotry became so deeply rooted that it taxed all the energy of the Hebrew prophets of the eighth century and their adherents to overcome or at least to restrain it. For there is sufficient evidence that the worship of Ištar was 'saturated' with this shocking practice (see Jeremias, Isdubar-Nimrod, 59 f.; Jastrow, Rel. Bab. and Ass. 485), and at the local shrines of N. Israel (see Hos. 4 14) the worship of Yahwè was deeply affected by Canaanitish practices derived ultimately from Babylonia. Even in Judah the consecrated harlotry of both sexes was not unknown (see 1 K. 15 12 22 46¹ [47]); but we must not be too prompt to draw historical inferences from 1 K. 14 24 (σύνδεσμος [BAL]), vv. 21-24 being a redactional insertion, nor must we infer from passages like Ezek. 16 15-34 23 5 ff. that licentious religious rites were universally prevalent in the closing years of the Southern Kingdom.² In the original text of Am. 4 3 there was probably a distinct reference to the temple-prostitutes in Assyria (see HARMON).

This religious prostitution was prohibited in the Deuteronomic code (Dt. 23 17 [18] f.), and the Levitical legislation (Lev. 20 23) represents Canaanitish abominations as the chief reason why the Canaanites were exterminated. Lev. 21 7 (old?) forbids a priest to take a harlot to wife, Lev. 21 9 directs that the daughter of any priest who 'profanes herself by playing the harlot' shall be burned.

In the Wisdom Literature there is no trustworthy reference to the religious prostitutes.

In Job 36 14, where RV gives, 'And their life (perisheth) among the unclean' (mg. 'sodomites'), the usual explanation is so far-fetched, and affords so poor a parallelism, that emendation of the text is indispensable.³

Ordinary harlots are, however, referred to, and comparatively high ground is taken in the Prologue to the Book of Proverbs⁴ (Prov. 2 16-19 5-7) in dealing with their immorality. Harlotry had become a social evil of a new sort, and had to be encountered by new arguments. Paul, as might be expected, reaches the highest point of Christian insight (1 Cor. 6 13-19), and our first Gospel contains the interesting notice (Mt. 21 31 f.) that the harlots, equally with the publicans, listened to John the Baptist whilst the hierarchical leaders turned a deaf ear to his call. This circumstance is not indeed referred to in the accounts of John the Baptist's ministry; but it is possible that the 'publicans' are mentioned there as representatives of the most degraded classes.

On the singular term 'dog,' Dt. 23 18 [19], see DOG, § 3 (end), IDOLATRY, § 6, and cp Dr. Deut. 264. Halévy's attempt

(REJ 9 [84], 186) to show that Ass. kađištu (קַדִּישָׁה) can mean the legitimate wife, and that Herodotus (1 195) misunderstood and misrepresented a perfectly innocent matrimonial custom, has not met with acceptance.

The text is undoubtedly corrupt. Probably we should read יהוֹשֻׁפְתָּא בְּקִרְשֵׁיהֶּם, 'and ye shall be ravished among the temple-prostitutes'—i.e., ye shall be devoted as spoil of war to the goddess Ištar (see Crit. Bib.) Cp HARMLOT.

Ⓞ's εἰς τὸ ὄρος τὸ ρομμαν [B]; ρεμμαν [AQ*], supposes an unlikely reference to Rimmon; Ἴγ.'s 'beyond the mountains of Armenia' (cp Sym.) postulates too early an acquaintance with Armenia. Theodot. has τὸ ὑψηλὸν ὄρος. Heilprin (Historical Poetry of the Hebrews, 2 75 [80]) and König (Lehrgeb. 2 459, n. 5) suggest a reference to Mt. Hermon; cp Ⓞ [Qmg.] ἑρμωνα. Hitzig and Steiner see a reference to the heathen sanctuary of Hadad-rimmon. Zech. 12 11, however, is most obscure, and HADAD-RIMMON [g.v.] is itself corrupt. So much, at least, these critics have seen more clearly than most, that some extremely pointed expressions must have closed the prophecy.

HAROD, THE WELL OF (עַיִן הַרְדֵּי), 'the fountain of trembling' [?], cp ח. 8; ΠΗΓΗΝ Ἀραδ [B], ΤΗΝ ΗΝ ΗΑΕΡ [A], ΤΗΝ ΗΝ Ἀρωδ [L.], Judg. 7 1, and perhaps originally 1 S. 28 7 29 1 1 K. 20 30. The fountain 'above' which Jerubbaal encamped.

1. Judg. 7 1.—If Moore is right in referring this passage to a different stratum of tradition from Ⓞ₃₃ (which makes the Midianites encamp in the vale of Jezreel), we shall have to conjecture that 'En Hārōd is the name of some fountain near Shechem. Certainly the two other passages in which MOREH [g.v.] is mentioned, localise the name near Shechem, and Ophrah, the home of Gideon, was probably not far from that town; but (a) the word Moreh = 'soothsayer' was, of course, not confined to Shechem, and (b) Moore's view of the origin of Judg. 7 1 is not quite satisfactory. It is safest to hold with Budde that 7 1 is the continuation of Ⓞ₃₃ (cp MOREH, HILL OF), so that the Well of Harod must be sought in the vale of Jezreel; and since there are only three wells or fountains which can come into consideration—viz., the 'Ain el-Meiyyeh, which is at the foot of the hill of Jezreel, the 'Ain Tuba'un, which is out upon the plain, and the 'Ain Jālūd, close under Gilboa—and since a position by the first or second of these would have exposed Gideon to the attack of the Midianites, G. A. Smith (HG 397 f.) appears to be right in assenting to the plausible traditional view that the third is the fountain referred to. Its waters well out at the NE. end of Mt. Gilboa from under a sort of cavern in the wall of conglomerate rock, and spread out into a limpid pool or lakelet 40 or 50 ft. in diameter (BR 3 168). From this pool and from the 'Ain Tuba'un (the Tubania of mediaeval writers), which is some little way off, the Nahr Jālūd flows down past Bethshan into the Jordan. With its unusually deep bed and its soft banks it formed a natural ditch in front of the position which both Gideon and Saul appear to have taken up on the plateau of Gilboa, and rendered it possible for those encamped on the plateau to hold the lakelet below against an enemy on the plain. See GILBOA, § 3 (b).

It is true, Budde (who denies that 'En Hārōd is 'Ain Jālūd) objects that the Nabi Dahi (with which the 'hill of Moreh', Judg. 7:1 [MT], is generally identified) is too imposing an eminence to be called a 'hill, בְּנֵי, but (1) loftier heights than the Nabi Dahi (e.g., probably the Tell el-Fūl, i.e., Gibeah of Benjamin) can be called בְּנֵי, and (2) the text of Judg. 7:1 is evidently in disorder. It may, in fact, be regarded as certain that originally v. 1b harmonised with v. 8b; there must also (as Budde allows) be some omission in v. 1a. The omitted words probably are 'and passed on to Mt. Gilboa'¹ (which were afterwards transferred with an alteration to v. 3); and the description of the position of the Midianitish camp in v. 1b should most probably run thus, 'and the camp of Midian was to the N. of them, beneath Mt. Gilboa, in the vale.'² Cp GILBOA, § 3, MOREH, HILL OF. We can thus dispense with the hypothesis of Schwarz and Grove that 'Gilead' (v. 3, MT) was the name of the NW. part of Gilboa, and that there is a trace of this in the name 'Ain Jālūd.

2. 1 S. 29:1.—It has usually been held (e.g., by Robinson, Stanley, and W. Miller) that 'the fountain which is in Jezreel' (so MT), beside which Saul's army encamped, is the 'Ain Jālūd. The expression, however, will hardly bear this interpretation. 'The fountain in Jezreel,' par excellence, can only be the fountain below Zer'in now called 'Ain el-Meyiteh ('the dead fountain'). This shows the necessity of basing biblical geography on a revised Hebrew text. A word must have fallen out of the text, and this word must be חָרַר. For MT's בְּעֵין we must therefore read חָרַר. This view is supported by $\text{A}^B \text{ } \epsilon\nu \text{ } \alpha\epsilon\delta\omega\rho$ and $\text{A}^A \text{ } \epsilon\nu \text{ } \alpha\epsilon\delta\omega\rho$ —i.e., חָרַר בְּעֵין (Klo.). The 'Ain Jālūd (= 'En Hārōd) is, in fact, little more than a mile from the E. of the foot of the hill of Jezreel, and could therefore fairly be described as being 'in [the district of] Jezreel.' It was on the plateau above this that Saul's army was posted, unless MT is very far wrong indeed (see SAUL).

3. 1 S. 28:7.—Did Saul really go 7 or 8 m. to visit the so-called 'witch of Endor'? It is shown elsewhere (ENDOR), with as near an approach to certainty as is possible, that Endor is an error for 'En Hārōd. The wise woman lived at only ten minutes' distance from the Israelite camp. See ENDOR (b), but cp SAUL.

4. 1 K. 20:30.—Did Benhadad attempt to hide himself 'in an inner chamber'? Does חָרַר בְּחָדָר really mean this? Perhaps we should read 'by the fountain in Harod.' See GILBOA, § 3 (c). T. K. C.

HARODITE (חָרָדִית, ῥογδαίος [B], ἀρογδαίος [A], ἄδαρ [L], 2 S. 23:25a), a designation applied to Shammah, one of David's heroes; in v. 25b Elika is also called a Harodite; but v. 25b is probably an interpolation (see ELIKA). The situation of Shammah's native place depends somewhat on that of the home of his fellow on the list, for the names are given in couples. If we omit Elika, the companion of Shammah is Helez the Paltite. BETH-PALET [g.v.] was in the far south of Judah, which forbids us to connect 'Harodite' with En-harod (H. P. Sm.), and suggests

1. וְעָבַר אֶל־יָדָיו הַנְּלָבֵעַ. For attempts to explain v. 3 with the minimum of change in the text, or even with no change at all, see Moore's commentary and the article 'Gilead, Mt. in Hastings, DB 2 176a (Dr.). To the present writer it seems useless to 'heal the hurt' of the text 'lightly'. The view maintained by him is that an editor transferred the words to v. 3 to form part of the address to the 'fearful and trembling,' but with an alteration. The text now stands חָרַר הַנְּלָבֵעַ; but צַפַּר ('to plait') cannot mean 'to turn aside' (Ges.-Buhl); there has been both corruption and editorial manipulation. An earlier reading was almost certainly וְעָבַר אֶל־יָדָיו הַנְּלָבֵעַ, 'and let him pass on from Mt. Gilboa.' What the editor did was to alter חָרַר into בְּחָדָר, to adapt the words which he transferred to their new position. The emendation 'Gilboa' for 'Gilead' is adopted from Clericus (1708) by Hitzig, Bertheau, Grätz, Reuss, Driver, etc.; but it is not sufficient alone.

2. For מְנַבֵּעַ הַמְּבוּרָה, 'from the hill of the soothsayer,' read וְנִלְבַּע לְהַר הַנְּלָבֵעַ, 'beneath Mt. Gilboa.' מְנַבֵּעַ is composed of the first two letters of מְנַחֵם and three of the letters of הַנְּלָבֵעַ. וְנִלְבַּע comes from נָלַע, and לְהַר from וְהָרָה.

reading עָרְרִי for חָרְרִי (ע and ח are often confounded). Shammah then becomes a man of ARAD (g.v., 1). So, in the main, Marquart (Fund. 19), who identifies this Shammah with one of David's brothers. Cp DAVID, § 1, u. z. T. K. C.

HAROEH (חָרוֹחַ), Shobal 'the father of Kirjath-jearim' had sons: 'Haroech, half of the Menuhoth'; 1 Ch. 2:52 (וְהָרֵאָה חֹצֵי הַמְּנוּחֹת; αὐὸ εἰσεῖρα μὲν οὐαὶω [B], ἀραα εἰσε ἀμμαναυθ [A, om. L]). For הָרֵאָה we should read רֵאִיָה. See REAIAH, 1; cp also MANAHETHITES.

HARORITE (חָרוּרִית), so 1 Ch. 11:27 for HARODITE [g.v.]. See SHAMMAH, 5.

HAROSHETH OF THE GENTILES (חָרוּשֶׁת הַגּוֹיִם; ἀρεϊωθ [ἄων εἰσῶνθ] [B], ἀρεϊωθ. ἀρεϊωθ. ἀργμοϋ [ἄ.ε.] [A], ἀχρηωθ. ἀρεϊωθ. ἀργμοϋ [ἄ.ε.] [L]), the place of residence of Sisera, a powerful king (see Cooke, Hist. and Song of Deb. 4), whose oppression roused six Israelitish tribes to common hostile action against him (Judg. 4:2 13 16f.). It has been identified by Thomson (with the assent of Conder, G. A. Smith, G. A. Cooke, Socin, Buhl)¹ with mod. el-Hārithiyeh, on the right bank of the lower Kishon, NW. of Megiddo. This is 'an enormous double mound,' 'situated just below the point where the Kishon in one of its turns beats against the rocky base of Carmel, leaving no room even for a footpath. A castle there effectually commands the pass up the vale of the Kishon into Esdraelon, and such a castle there was on this immense double tell of Harothieh [Hārithiyeh]. It is still covered with the remains of old walls and buildings' (Thomson, LB 437). The situation is well adapted for an oppressive chieftain, and is not to be rejected on the ground of the remoteness of Jabin's city of Hazor, for Sisera was no mere 'captain of the host.' The place-name, however, does not occur in the Amarna tablets, and textual criticism favours the view (first suggested by the names Shamgar and Sisera) that Sisera was a Hittite king. If this is correct, his place of residence must have been Kadesh on the Orontes; in fact, recent textual criticism of Judg. 5 reveals to us the Kadeshites and Hadrachites fighting against Israel under Sisera. More precisely, the Hittite city KADESH [g.v., 2] bears a fuller name in the true text of the Song of Deborah—viz., Kadshon or Kidshon.

Now, looking at חָרוּשֶׁת, we notice that two of its letters recur in קְרִשְׁוֹן, for ק and ר resemble each other so closely in all the alphabets as to be often hardly distinguishable. Moreover ק, נ, and פ are sometimes confounded through phonetic similarity, while the corruption of ון (the final forms of letters but slowly established themselves) into ו is easy.

The conclusion we reach is that the otherwise unknown 'Harosheth of the nations' should rather be 'Kidshon of the nations.' It was so called to distinguish it from places of the same name in Canaan. This view is substantially that of Marquart (Fund. 3) and Ruben (JQR 10:554); but these scholars did not remark the existence of the termination -on appended to the fundamental element Kadsh. Whether the corrupt name TAHTIM-HODSHI [g.v.] may be compared, is doubtful. T. K. C.

HARSITH

HARSITH, in 'The gate Harsith' (Kr. הַרְסִית, 'שַׁרְ הַרְסִית, but Kt. הַרְסִית (ח), Jer. 19:2 RV, AV 'THE EAST GATE' (as if from הרס, 'soun,' cp mg.), RV^m: 'the gate of potsherds.'

Although G's χαρα(ε)θ favours Kre, this may be merely due to an early corruption or conjecture. Harsith cannot easily be explained. Most scholars (see BDB) render as RV^m:g, but the ending -ith constitutes a difficulty; Hitzig renders Scherbenenthum, König (2:205 [a]) Scherbenet, but improbably. Read perhaps הרסות ה; the Dung-gate seems to be meant. See HINNON, VALLEY OF, § 4 (2), JERUSALEM, § 24, col. 21:3.

HART, HIND (אֵילַן, חַלְדַּיִם; ελαφος [BNAQRTFL]). The animal intended is probably the fallow-deer (Cervus dama, L.), which is still to be found in the neighbourhood of Sidon (Tristram); see ROE, 4. As the name Aijalon shows, the ayyal must have been found in very ancient times far to the S. of this, and Dt. 12:15:22 15:22 proves that it was quite common game. It was regularly supplied to Solomon's table, according to 1 K. 4:23 [5:3]. In Dt. 14:5 it is enumerated among the clean animals. Hebrew poets delight to refer to it. Its slender but powerful build, the swiftness and sureness of its motions, suggested a pleasing comparison for warriors or for the victorious people of Israel (2 S. 22:34 = Ps. 18:33 [34] Hab. 3:19, eis sunteleian [BNAQ]), and in Gen. 49:21 στελεχος [BADFL], if MT is correct, Naphtali is likened to a nimble hind, with reference to the swiftness of its heroes (see, however, below). The horns (a figure for rays of the rising sun?) of the ayyal have been thought (wrongly) to be referred to in the title of Ps. 22 (see RV^m:g); but cp AJJELETH-SHAHAR. Its languishing condition when deprived of pasture is referred to in Lam. 1:6 (κρῖ [BNAQ]); its disregard of its young under these circumstances in Jer. 14:8; its eager panting for water in Ps. 42:1 [2].¹ An image of feminine grace and affectionateness is derived from the elegance and the gentle gaze of the hind (Prov. 5:19; cp Cant. 2:7 3:5 [ev (raï)s] εχχουσεσιν του ἀγροῦ (BANC in both verses)); and a lover may be likened to a young hart, Cant. 2:17 8:14 (עֵפֶר הַחַלְדִּים).

Two passages remain which have to be taken together, Job 39:1-4 and Ps. 29:9. In the former passage the ease with which the hinds bring forth appears as one of the wonders of creation; in the latter, a phrase used in Job 39:1 of the travailing of the hinds is employed, but with a causative sense, of the effect of thunderclaps in hastening the parturition of hinds. It must be admitted, however, that the reference to the accelerated pangs of the hinds is not quite what we should expect in this grand storm-piece, nor does it suit the parallel line. יערות, 'forests,' seems to require us to point אֵילֹת, 'terebinths' (so Lowth, Grätz, Thrupp, Che.); the suspicious-looking יחולל should rather be יָרַק, 'shakes' (Che.²). On the analogy of the former emendation some (Bochart, Lowth, Ew., Olsh., Di., etc.) would point אֵילֹת, 'terebinths,' in Gen. 49:21 instead of אֵילֹת, 'hind.' See NAPHTALI.

3. One who with his brethren 'men of valour,' 1700 in number, was overseer in Israel 'beyond Jordan westward' (1 Ch. 26:30); see HEBRON ii., 1.
4. A musician, a 'son of Jeduthun' (1 Ch. 25:3 and 19 אֵרִיא [B]).
5. A Levite, son of Kemuel (i.e., Kadmiel?; 1 Ch. 27:17), perhaps the same as 3.

7. A Levite in Ezra's caravan (see EZRA i. § 2, ii. § 15 [1] d), Ezra 8:19 (ασεβ[ε]ια [BA], ασαβια [L]), 1 Esd. 8:48 ASEBIA, RV ASEBIAS (om. The name also appears among the Levites in Zerubbabel's band (see EZRA ii., §§ 6 8, 11) Neh. 12:24 (αβια [BN^a]).
8. 'Ruler of half the district of Keilah,' mentioned in list of wall-builders (see NEHEMIAH, § 1: f, EZRA ii., §§ 16 [1], 15 d), Neh. 3:17.
9. Head of the house of Hilkiah (see EZRA ii., §§ 6 8, 11), Neh. 12:21 (N.c.a.mg. inf., om. BN^a A).

HASHABNAH (הַשְּׁבִיָּה), § 32, probably to be read הַשְּׁבִיָּה—i.e., Hashabni-jah; see HASHABNIAH), signatory to the covenant (see EZRA i., § 7) Neh. 10:25 [26] (εσάβανα [BNA], αςβ. [L]).

HASHABNIAH, RV Hashabneiah (הַשְּׁבִיָּה), or perhaps, if the text is right, as suggested in § 32, הַשְּׁבִיָּה—i.e., Hāshabni-iah, 'Yahwè has taken thought of me'), a Levite; 1 Ch. 9:5 (BNA om. אָסֶאָבִיא(צ) or σραβιας [L, the order of the names is different]); the name also of the father of HATTUSH (2); Neh. 3:10 (אָסֶבֶאֱנַמ [B*], -נַעַמ [B^{ab} vid.]), -נַעַמ [N], -אָנִיא [A], אָסֶבֶאֱנִיא [L]). The נ, however, seems due to a scribe who thought of שְׁבִיָּה. Names of the type 'Hashabniah' are generally corrupt. Probably Hashabiah is right. T. K. C.

HASHBADANA, RV Hashbaddanah (הַשְּׁבִיָּה), probably, if original [see below], a corruption of הַשְּׁבִיָּה, Hashabni-jah; § 32), one of those (probably Levites; so KOSTERS, Herstel, 88) present¹ at the reading of the law under Ezra; Neh. 8:4 (om. B, אָסֶבֶאֱנַמ [N.c.a.mg. dextr.], -בָּאָמָא [A], אָבֶאֱנַמ [L]; 1 Esd. 9:44 (LOTHASUBUS + NABARIAS: λωθασυχθουσ + αδβαρ[ε]ιας [BA], ACCOM ΚΑΙ ΑΥΦΑΔΑΝΑΤ [L]). Their number is doubtful.

According to L. (in both Neh. and 1 Esd.) there were seven standing on each side of Ezra; according to Neh. MT, 6 on his right, and 7 on his left; according to Neh. NA, 6 and 7 [N.c.a.A] respectively; Neh. B, 6 and 4; 1 Esd. BA and RV, 7 and 6; 1 Esd. AV, 7 and 5.

The MT seems to have suffered somewhat from the 11th name onwards; the last two names lack the connective 'and,' and the preceding name is surely corrupt. Hashbaddanah may in fact have arisen, the first half (חֲשֵׁב) from a repetition of the preceding Hashum (חָשָׁם), and the second (בַּדָּנָה) from a repetition of the following חַרְוִיָּה. The corruption has taken another course in 1 Esd., חֲשֵׁב becoming חָשָׁם (L), Lothasubus, and חַרְוִיָּה becoming חַרְוִיָּה וְנַבָּרִיָּה, Nabarias. We thus lose, no doubt, the two heptads desiderated by KOSTERS (Herstel, 88; so also De-Ryssel, Guthe), but we get twelve names, corresponding to the tribes. See HASHUM. S. A. C.

1. Current explanations. large numbers (3930 in Neh. 7 38; 3630 in Ezra 2 35; 3330 [A] or 3301 [B] in 1 Esd. 5 23) with Zerubbabel, and rebuilt the fish-gate at Jerusalem (Neh. 3 3). This is the first stage in the quest of the true meaning of the phrase b' nē hassēnāāh or b' nē snāāh. But where is there a city with a name like Senaah? The Magdalsenna of Eusebius and Jerome (OS 2928 150 22), 8 or 7 R. m. N. of Jericho, is surely not what is meant. (b) Schlatter (*Zur Topogr. u. Gesch. (c) Hence a third view: Senaah, or rather Hassenaah (with the art.), may be wrongly vocalised. In 1 Ch. 9 7 Neh. 11 9 we meet with a 'son of Hassenuah' (in Ch. saana [B], asaana [A], saana [L]; asana [Vg.]; in Neh. AV SENUAH; asana [BNA], asenna [L], senna [Vg.]); cp ΗΟΔΑΝΙΑΗ, 2. That 1 Ch. 9 7-9 contains material derived from a post-exilic list, has long been recognised.² Ed. Meyer, therefore,³ does not hesitate to regard Hassennah (misread Hassenaah) as a post-exilic designation, and to explain it from post-exilic circumstances. Among those who returned with Zerubbabel, or, perhaps rather,⁴ who after Ezra's arrival formed the kāhāl or 'congregation' of true or genuine Israelites, there must have been many who had no landed possessions. HATITA may have described such as 'children of the slighted wife' (חֲטִיטָה = חֲטִיטָה 'hated,' 'slighted'; see Dt. 21 15 f., Is. 60 15).

This theory is ingenious, and might provisionally serve us. But it has perhaps a family likeness to the explanations one finds in the Midrash, and to the edifying vocalisations of names in the Chronicler. Is not 'Praise-Yahwè, the son of the slighted' an unnatural combination?

The key to the mystery must be sought elsewhere. It is to be found in the problematical term MISHNEH

2. New theory. [q.v.], the current explanation of which is purely hypothetical. An examination of the passages in which this word occurs with reference to Jerusalem suggests that underneath it lies the term חֲטִיטָה, 'the old city'—i. e., the city which existed before Hezekiah built 'the other wall without' (2 Ch. 32 5; see JERUSALEM, § 23). Hassenaah (חֲשֻׁמָּה) or Hassenuah (חֲשֻׁמָּה) and Senaah (חֲשֻׁמָּה) are probably corruptions of חֲטִיטָה, 'the old city'—the city which is referred to under that title in three or rather four passages in which MT gives חֲטִיטָה (RV, conjecturally, 'the second quarter'). The 3000, or more, people mentioned in Ezra 2 35 Neh. 7 38 at the end of the list of town populations are the 'sons' or people of the 'old city,' or quarter, of Jerusalem. Now we understand the relative largeness of the number. T. K. C.

HAURAN (חֲרָן), ἄυραν[ε]ιτις [BAQ]; in v. 18 ὠρανιτις [A], ἠωρανειτις [B], a region mentioned in connection with the ideal eastern border of Canaan in Ezek. 47:16-18f. Of Hazar-enan (see HAZAR-HATTICON) we learn that it was on the border of Hauran (v. 16), and more particularly that it was on the border between the territories of Hauran and Damascus (v. 18; see Co.'s text of Ezekiel). Furrer (ZDPV 8:27ff.; cp Grove, Smith's DB) places Hauran far away in the N. at Hawwārin, between Saadad and Karyatēn (Baed. (3) 405); but it is a false assumption of his that Hauran is described as N. of Damascus; it is the S. region that Ezekiel mentions first (cp v. 16 f., first Damascus, then Hamath).

Nor is it safe to work upon an incorrect text. Verse 18 should be emended with Cornill so as to run thus, 'And the east side; from Hazar-enan which lies on the border between Hauran and Damascus, the Jordan forms the border between Gilead and the land of Israel as far as the east sea, unto Tamar; that is, the east side.'

If we adopt Cornill's emendation it becomes clear that Hauran is the district which still bears this name, with the addition of GOLAN (q.v.) which (the) Haurān adjoins. The name is also found in the Assyrian inscriptions (Hamranu = Havranu, KB 284; Havrina, KB 2216), and in the Mishna (Rōsh hashānah, 2:4).

Elsewhere it has been suggested that J, and presumably also E, misunderstood the stories respecting the patriarchs which lay, written, before them, and misread 'Haran' and (in Gen. 24:10) 'Nahor' for 'Hauran.' The 'city of Nahor,' or rather 'of Hauran,' will be some important place (Ashtaroth?) in the district between Damascus and Gilead called Hauran. Possibly too 'Aram-naharaim' (EV 'Mesopotamia') in Gen. 24:10 was misread by J for Aram-Hauran. See HARAN, NAHOR.

3. ἁμὴν Acts 27:8, 12.

It is doubtful, in view of the clearness of the Assyrian usage, whether חַוּן can really mean 'haven'; improbable too that this particular word would have been used in Ps. 107. Cheyne (Ps. (3)), on these grounds, emends the text of v. 30 reading חֵיק, 'for a beach of ships' (cp Gen. 49:13); חַן was written twice over, and the first חַן corrupted into חַוּן. In Is. 23:10 Duhm and Cheyne read חַן for חַוּן; but we are not obliged to render חַן 'haven.'

The same name is given to a region bordered by the river Pishon (Gen. 2:11 J); but where the Pishon was, interpreters are by no means agreed (see PARADISE). Twice again (if not thrice, for Cornill restores the name in Ezek. 27:22, 'Havilah, Sheba, and Raamah'), we find mention of Havilah. In Gen. 25:18 [J] the limits of the Ishmaelites are 'from Havilah unto Shur,' and a similar phrase describes the region within which the Amalekites were defeated, 1 S. 15:7 (but here the text is disputed; see TELEM). The combination of all the data is difficult, and many critics have been led to distinguish several Havilahs. It would seem, however, that only absolute necessity would justify this, and it is perhaps safest to hold that Havilah is always the same region—of which sometimes one part, sometimes another, is specially referred to. Del. (Par. 12 ff. 57 ff.), E. Meyer (Gesch. d. Alt. 1:224), identify with the NE. part of the Syrian desert; Glaser (Skizze, 2:323 ff.), with Central and NE. Arabia. See GOLD, ONYX, TOPAZ.

Attempts to find an African Havilah (Αβαλίται, etc.) are therefore unnecessary, especially since the only other son of Cush in Gen. 10:7 who can be probably identified points to Arabia (viz. Raamah). It appears that P regarded all (non-Ishmaelite) Arabian tribes as connected with Africa. F. B.

HAVVOTH-JAIR, AV, less correctly, HAVOTH-JAIR (חַבְוֹת יַאִיר, επαγλεις ιαειρ [BAFL]; in Ch. κωμαι σαειρ [B*], κ. ιαειρ [B^a b], κ. ιαειρ [A], αωθη ιαειρ [L]; Auothair, Jer. [OS², 89:14]). This was the name of certain towns (which arose out of tent-villages¹) on the E. side of Gilead. An early tradition respecting them is given by JE in Nu. 32:39-41 f. (v. 40 is an interpolation); v. 41 επαυλεις ιαηρ [A]).

Bu. thinks that this passage originally stood after Josh. 17:14-18 (Ri. Sz. 37); but surely the colonisation described in it belongs to a later period (see Judg. 10:3 ff.). A geographical difficulty is caused by Dt. 3:14 (αυωθ ιαειρ [BAFL]) and Josh. 18:30 (κωμαι ιαειρ [BAL]), which localise the Havvoth-jair in Bashan instead of in Gilead. Apparently the writers identify them with the sixty fortresses (Dt. 3:4 1 K. 4:13) in the former region—a mistake into which only late writers could have fallen. (Even) Bashan (חַבְוֹת יַאִיר) in Dt. 3:13 is evidently a redactional interpolation, and the reference to Havvoth-jair (EV 'the towns of Jair') in 1 K. 4:13 (om. BL., αυωθ ιαειρ [A]) has been interpolated from Nu. 32:41. In the post-exilic passage 1 Ch. 2:23 (om. Pesh.) Geshur and Aram are said to have taken sixty cities (including twenty-three belonging to Jair). Such is the account generally given of the matter; but a closer inspection of the text of various passages referring to Gilead (where 'Gilead' should probably be 'Salhad') leads to a more favourable view of the writers who localise the Havvoth-jair in Bashan, and to a comprehension of the otherwise dark passage, 1 Ch. 2:23, respecting the conquest of the Havvoth-jair by Geshur and Aram. HAWK (חֹסֶה, nēs, ιεραξ [BNAFL]; ACCIPITER), mentioned only in Lev. 11:16 (om. A), Dt. 14:15 (AF in v. 14), as one of the unclean birds, and in Job 39:26 (see below).

By the hawk no well-defined zoological species is meant; the term may be used of any of the smaller diurnal birds of prey. These are common in Palestine, the commonest being perhaps the kestrel (Tinnunculus alaudarius) and the lesser kestrel (T. cenchris). Both were protected in Egypt as sacred birds. The hawk (in Eg. dhk) was especially the sacred bird of Horus (the sun god) and it is the characteristic feature of solar deities in Egypt that they are hawk-headed. The association of the hawk with the sun is found outside Egypt. The Neo-Platonists connect the two, and in Od. 15:525 the hawk is called 'the swift messenger of Phœbus.' Such was their sanctity among the Egyptians, that they were kept in sacred groves in various places along the Nile, and when dead their bodies were embalmed.

In Job 39:26 the nēs is described as stretching out its wings and flying to the south. This applies to the migratory habits of many of the smaller kinds, such as the lesser kestrel, which migrates to central and southern Africa for the winter (cp Thomson, LB 3:26).

HAZAEI (חֲזַאִי, 2 K. 8 8, etc., or חֲזַאִי, 2 K. 8 9, etc., 'God sees', § 32; ἈΖΑΗ [BAQL]; Ass. Haza'lu). Successor of BENHADAD I. (q.v.) as king of Syria. Two great prophetic biographies referred to him. In 1 K. 19 15 Elijah is sent from Horeb to Damascus¹ to anoint Hazael king over Syria; in v. 17 f. Hazael's victories over Israel are represented as the divine vengeance upon Baal-worshippers. In 2 K. 8 7-15, however, we read that 'Elisha came to Damascus,' that he described the cruelties which Hazael would practise on the Israelites, and that when Hazael shrank in affected humility from the prospect (see DOG, § 3), he answered, 'Yahwè has showed me that thou shalt be king over Syria.' It would seem that two different accounts were current, and that the redactor combined portions of each. Historically, it is not important to determine whether either or neither of these accounts is correct. What is important is the light which 2 K. 8 7-15 throws on the road which Hazael took to the throne. There is no reason to doubt the accuracy of this narrative as far as Hazael is concerned, and the natural impression of the reader is that it was not the sick king, but Hazael who 'took the coverlet' (RV), and dipped it in water, and spread it on his face, so that he died.' The opposite view is no doubt reconcilable with the letter of the narrative.² Probably the redactor has produced this indistinctness by the omission of some words, to make it more difficult to accuse Elisha of complicity in the deed. Who Hazael was, we are not told; but the expressions used by him in v. 13 seem to preclude the idea that he was the legitimate heir of Ben-hadad. He met the allied forces of Jehoram of Israel and Ahaziah of Judah at RAMOTH-GILEAD (2 K. 8 28 f.; 9 14 f.), and gained important successes against Jehu which are referred to elsewhere (DAMASCUS, § 8). So great indeed was the stress of the affliction of Israel that it was not till the reign of Joash b. Jehoahaz, that the losses inflicted upon Israel by the Syrians were repaired. In the time of Amos the barbarities of Hazael were still fresh in the minds of men (Am. 1 3 f.). Hazael also came into conflict with SHALMANESER II. (q.v.). Twice (842 and 839 B.C.) the Assyrian king says that he marched against him and defeated him. Shalmaneser does not, however, appear to have gained any permanent advantage, and he troubled Aram of Damascus no more. Thus Hazael was at liberty to extend his dominion, and this accounts for the notices in 2 K. 10 32 12 18 [17] 13 22 of his successes against Jehu and Jehoahaz of Israel and Jehoash of Judah. HAZAR-ADDAR (חֲזַר אַדָּר, Ἐπὶ ἀγλίου ἀρὰδ [BAL]), a place on the S. border of Judah, Nu. 34 4 †. In the passage, Josh. 15 3, it is called אַדָּר, Addar (AV ADAR); but probably the HEZRON [q.v. i.] which occurs close by is a corruption of אַדָּר (so Ges.-Buhl). Probably, too, adopting necessary emendations, the geographical statement in both passages is that the S. border of Judah went round by the S. of KADESH-BARNEA ('Ain Kādīs) and up to Hazar-jerahmeel (near 'Ain Muwaileh), and then passed along Azmon (Jebel Helal and Jebel Yelek), and so to the torrent of Mišrīm (the Wādy el-'Arīš). Thus the frontier line went southward from 'Ain Kādīs as far, perhaps, as the edge of the Tih plateau, and then made a circuit to the Jerahmeelite settlement near the sacred fountain (see BEER-LAHAI-ROI, JERAHMEEL), and to el-'Aujeh (EN-RIMMON), where Palmer noticed strongly-embanked terraces which must once have been planted with fruit-trees, and thence by the Wādy el-Abyad into the Wādy el-'Arīš. A less probable view is learnedly set forth by Wetzstein in Del. Gen. (4), 586-590.

The two texts can hardly both be correct: some corruption must be assumed. One emendation is suggested above. Azmon (עֲצָמוֹן) should probably be En-rimmon (עֵינֵי־רִמְמוֹן); ין became י, and ך fell out. It remains to read יִרְמָלָהּ for יִרְמָלָהּ and for הַרְקָקָה (the latter occurs in Josh. 15 3). (רָמָלָהּ represents יִרְמָלָהּ more nearly complete; it comes from רָמָלָהּ by ordinary corruption and transposition.) T. K. C.

HAZAR-ENAN (חֲזַר עֵינַן, 'village (enclosure) of springs'—the second element is not Hebrew but Aramaic; in Ezek. ἀγλῆς τοῦ αἰνᾶ(ν) [BAQ], in Nu. ἀρσεναιμ [B v. 9], -N [B v. 10], -CERN. [B¹ v. 9], ἀρσενᾶ[ε]ιν [AFL v. 9, and B¹ v. 10]), is the extreme E. point of the ideal N. boundary of Canaan in Ezek. 47 17 (where it is עֵינַן עֲצָמוֹן, Hazar-Enon), 48 1 (ἀγλῆς τοῦ αἰνᾶμ [B], Δ. Τ. Αἰνᾶμ [Q]), and also in Nu. 34 9 (cp v. 10), a passage which belongs to the priestly narrative and depends on Ezekiel. Probably Hazar-enon ought also to be substituted for HAZAR-HATTICON (q.v.) in Ezek. 47 16. Its position is unknown; but, from the passages in Ezekiel where the territory of Damascus seems to be placed on the N. side of the border and excluded from Canaan, the conjectures which place it at Karyatēn or some other point N. of Damascus appear to be illegitimate.

Identifications must be precarious, whatever view be taken of the ideal northern frontier. Van Kasteren (Rev. bib., 30 7 [95]) thinks of el-Hādār, to the E. of Bānīās, near the road to Damascus. As Buhl points out, however (Geog. 67 240), the name would be still more appropriate for Bānīs itself (Bānīs not being the ancient Baal-gad). This may be only a plausible conjecture; but it acquires importance from its complete consistency with the description of the E. border in Nu. 34 10-12; cp Ezek. 47 18 and HAURAN. W. R. S.—T. K. C.

HAZAR-GADDAH (חֲזַר גַּדָּה, § 105; צרעי [B?], ἀρσενᾶδδᾶ [A], ἀσάρ. [L]), a place on the Edomite border of Judah (Josh. 15 27). Eusebius and Jerome (OS 245 35; 127 28) identify 'Gadda' with a village in the extreme parts of the Daroma, overhanging the Dead Sea. More than one site agrees with this description (see Buhl, Geog. 185); but most probably Eusebius and Jerome are mistaken, and the village Hazar-gaddah lies nearer to Beer-sheba than to the Dead Sea. Cp the name Migdal-gad, and see HAZOR, 1 (end). T. K. C.

HAZAR-HATTICON, RV HAZER-HATTICON (חֲזַר חֲתִיכֹן—i.e., 'the middle village'; ἀγλῆ τοῦ σαγνᾶν [B], εγνᾶν καὶ τοῦ εγνᾶν [A], om. ἀγλῆ [Q*], ἀγλαὶ τοῦ θιχῶν [Q^mε]), on the ideal N. frontier of Canaan (Ezek. 47 16).

It is probable, both on external grounds and on the evidence of Ⓞ, that we should read Hazar-enon (עֵינַן עֲצָמוֹן) (so Sm., Co.). Van Kasteren's attempted identification (Rev. Bibl., '95, p. 30) is therefore needless. See HAZAR-ENAN.

HAZAR-SHUAL (הַצֵּר שְׁוֹאֵל, § 105), a city, on the extreme southern border of Judah, assigned to Simeon: Josh. 15 28 (χολασεωλα [BL], ασαρσουλα [A]); Josh. 19 3 (αρωλα [B], σερσουλα [A], ασαρσουλα [L]); 1 Ch. 4 28 (εσηρεουλαβ [B], εσερσουλα [A], ασερσουθ [L]); Neh. 11 27 (om. BM* A, εσερσουλα [K: a 105], ασερσουλα [L]).

It is very probably identical with the אֲשֵׁרֶל, ASAREEL of 1 Ch. 4 16, and εσελω, the brother of 'Ir-nahash' (Beer-sheba), § 1 Ch. 4 12. Conder identifies with the ruin Sa'weh, on a hill E. of Beersheba. But the name is almost certainly a Hebraised form of Ar. siyāl, a kind of acacia tree, which grows in Arabia (see Doughty, Ar. Des. 291). Cp SHITTAH-TREE. T. K. C.

HAZAR-SUSAH (הַצֵּר סוּסָה), Josh. 19 54; καθρυσειν [B], ασερκοσιμ [A], α[κα]ρκοσιμ [L]), also called HAZAR-SUSIM (⊕ in Josh.; and MT. 1 Ch. 4 31†, סוּסִים "⊕; ΗΜΙCΥCΕCΟΡΑΜ¹ [B*], ΗΜΙCΥCΩC ΟΡΑΜ [B^{ab}], ΗΜΙCΥΕΩCΙΜ [A ΗΜΙCΥ points to a reading 'σπ], ασερκοσιμ [L], where a Simeonite village. The name apparently means 'station of a mare.' But this is an early editor's guess, not a record of Solomon's importation of horses (cp MARCABOTHA). Possibly a corruption of חָצֵר עֲזִיז, Haṣer 'aziz, 'strong enclosure.' Kephar 'Aziz was a place in the province of Idumæa where R. Ishmael, a contemporary of R. 'Akiba, resided (Neub. Geogr. 117). T. K. C.

HAZAZON-TAMAR, RV, AV HAZEZON-TAMAR (הַצֵּר תְּמָרָה [in Ch. הַצֵּר תְּמָרָה], § 103; ἀδακαν θαμαρ [BAL], in Ch. ἀκαμ θαμαρα [B], ἀνακαν θαμαρ [A]; ASAZONTHAMAR), mentioned as inhabited by Amorites, and as conquered by Chedorlaomer, together with the region of the Amalekites, after he had come to Kadesh, Gen. 14 7. In 2 Ch. 20 2 it is identified with En-gedi, which was probably suggested by the meaning of Tamar (date-palm), En-gedi having been famous for its palms. But the situation of En-gedi does not suit. Hence Knobel thought of the important site called Thamaro or Thamarā, and identified by some with Kurnub, NE. of 'Ain Kadis (see TAMAR); but palms, we may be sure, have never grown at Kurnub. There must be a corruption in the text, which in so ill-preserved a narrative need not surprise us. Probably we should read for '(the Amorites that dwelt) in Hazazon-tamar' '(the Amorites that dwelt) in the land of Misrim, 'בְּאֶרֶץ מִצְרַיִם.²

In truth, it is difficult to see how the N. Arabian land of Misri (see MIZRAIM, § 26) could have been passed over. The neighbourhood of Kadesh and Jerahmeel are probably thought of. In 1 Ch. 20 2 the note 'that is, En-gedi' may fairly be taken as a gloss, and 'Hazazon-tamar' be explained as a conventional expression for the country S. of Judæa, derived from Gen. 14 7 in its already corrupt form. T. K. C.

HAZEL (הַיֵּל, Gen. 30 37†). This very interesting tree-name (hus) is wrongly rendered.

Note (1) that the scene of the narrative in Gen. 30 31-43 is laid in Haran, whereas the hazel-tree is said not to grow in this region, and (2) that this tree is also not known in S. Palestine, to which the author of the narrative (J) belongs.

The fact that in Syr. and Ar. the cognate word means 'almond-tree,' strongly favours RV's rendering ALMOND (q.v.), which is also given by Vg. (amygdalinas) and is not inconsistent with the καρπύνη of Ⓞ^{REL}, κάρνον being a general term. הַיֵּל may be a foreign word; the proper Heb. term for 'almond' is חֲטָיִת. See Löw, no. 319; Celsius, 1253f.

HAZELELPONI, RV Hazzelponi (הַצֵּלְפֹּנִי); ἐχληεββων [B], ἐχλληελεφων [A], ἀελαδφωνει [L]), sister of JEZREEL, ISHMA, and IDBASH [q.v.] (1 Ch. 4 3).

One of the oldest names in Chronicles, mentioned in connection with (the Judahite) Jezreel, Etam, and (probably) Hur b. Jidah (1 Ch. 4 3). Olshausen (Lehrb. d. hebr. Spr. 618) explains, 'Give shade, thou who lookest upon me'; Curtis (in Hastings, DB 2 128 a) 'the Zelelponites.' Neither view commends itself. פְּנוֹי (poni) is a duplication of פְּנוּי (penui) in פְּנוּיָהּ (Penuel) which follows: לַלְלָהּ is miswritten for לַחֲלָהּ, Halasel, the true original of חֲלָהּ BEZALEEL [q.v.]. Possibly Halasel is the full name of חֲלָהּ Halusa (better known to us as ZIKLAG). The name would correspond to Jerahmeel (see REHOBOTH, JERAHMEEL). T. K. C.

HAZER-HATTICON, or 'the middle Hazer' (הַצֵּר הַתְּיָכִין), Ezek. 47 16 RV, AV HAZAR-HATTICON [q.v.].

HAZERIM (הַצֵּרִים, ἀχαλωθ [B], ἀχωρωθ [AFL]), AV's mistake, derived from Ⓞ, for 'villages' (so RV Dt. 2 23). See AVVIM.

HAZEROTH (הַצֵּרוֹת; ἀχωρωθ [BAFL]); in Dt. 1 1 translated ἀγλων [BAFL]), an unknown locality mentioned in Nu. 11 35 12 16 33 17 f. Dt. 1 1. See WANDERING, § 7.

HAZEZON-TAMAR (הַצֵּר תְּמָרָה) Gen. 14 7 AV, RV HAZAZON-TAMAR.

HAZIEL (הַצֵּיֶל, § 32 prob. = JAHAZIEL [q.v.], 'El sees'; εἰσιμα [B], ἀζιηλ [AL]), a Gershonite Levite, temp. David (1 Ch. 23 9).

HAZO (הַצֵּוֹ, ἀζαγ [ADL]), Nahor's fifth son (Gen. 22 22). The name resembles Ass. Ḫazū (= הַצֵּוֹ), which was a mountain region of volcanic conical hills (so Fr. Del.) in N. Arabia (KZ 2 131). See BUZ.

HAZOR (הַצֵּוֹר; ἀσωρ [BAFL]; ASOR), like HEZRON (q.v.), is a name corresponding, probably, not to the Ar. ḥisār ('fort') but to ḥazira ('sheep-fold,' cp CATTLE, § 6 n. 5), an enclosure of thorny branches or of stone. The name Hazor or Hazar occurs frequently as a place-name in the pastoral Negeb, the region of the 'Hezronites'—nomads who dwelt within such enclosures (cp HEZRON). The phrase 'the kingdoms of Hazor' (Jer. 49 28 30 33; ἡ αὐλή [BNAQ]) is a collective term for the region of the settled Arabs in the S. or E. of Palestine (cp Jer. 26 34 Is. 42 11); cp the Ar. ḥāḍīr used (in the plur.) of the settled Arabs living in towns and villages as contrasted with the purely nomad Arabs (cp Rob. BR 1 305 and Doughty, Ar. Des. 1 274).

1. The Hazor of king JABIN (q.v.) lay near the waters of Merom, not far from Kadesh (Jos. 11 and Ⓞ^B ασου, Ⓞ^L ασσωρ) 12 19 Judg. 4 2 17 1 S. 12 9; ασωρ, -pos Jos. Ant. v. 5 1 xiii. 5 6 f.). Its identification is doubtful. Wilson and Guérin think of the Tell Harreh, SE. of Kedesh, where there are extensive ruins. Conder and others prefer Jebel Ḥāḍīreh ('Mt. of the sheep-fold'; cp the plain Merj-Ḥāḍīreh), a little to the W. of Dēshūn, about three quarters of an hour S. from Kedesh (cp Baed. 2 262). On the whole, Robinson's identification with the Tell Khureibeh, 1680 ft. above sea-level, 2½ m. S. from Kedesh, seems the most suitable; but no ruins have as yet been discovered there.

As ḥudara (הֻדָּרָה) it seems to be mentioned on the old Egyptian lists of Thotmes and the papyrus Anastasi (WMM As. u. Eur. 173), and its importance in the fourteenth century is perhaps revealed by the Amarna Tablets, where the king of Ḥasūra or Ḥazura is mentioned several times; it had smaller dependent towns, and its king is mentioned with the king of Sidon (from which Petrie infers that a Hazor 11 m. SE. of Tyre is meant).¹

In Jos. 19 36 (P) Hazor appears as a 'fenced' city and is allotted to Naphtali. Its inhabitants were carried off by Tiglath-pileser (2 K. 15 29). It is mentioned in 1 Macc. 1167 (AV NASOR, νασωρ [VA], ασωρ [N]) and is the ASER, RV ASHER, of Tob. 12 (ασηρ [BA] ασσηρ [N]).

Whether the Hazor fortified by Solomon was really the northern one seems doubtful (1 K. 9 15 om. BL. εσερ [A]; in 10 23, ασσωρ [B], -δ [L], om. A; HESER [Vg.]). Although followed by Megiddo its mention with Gezer and localities in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem does not inspire confidence, and both Jer. and Eus. (*OS*² 97 10, assure; 227 34 ασσωρ) actually locate it in Judah. This position seems more natural, and in G's addition to 1 K. 2 (35 i ασσωρ [BA], ασουδ [L]) Hazor and the other places are followed immediately by Beth-horon and Baalath. Which Hazor is meant, however, is uncertain. Jer. and Eus. speak of a Judæan Aser (*OS*² 92 19 220 93) between Ashkelon and Ashdod; and an Asor on the borders of the former is by them (erroneously?) identified with HAZOR-HADATTAH. Perhaps Solomon's Hazor is the same as no. 3 below. Megiddo seems to be a corruption¹ of MIGDAL-GAD [g.v.], unless for 'Hazor, Megiddo,' we should read HAZAR-GADDAH [g.v.]²

2. A locality in Benjamin mentioned between Ananiah (Beit Hanina?) and Ramah (Neh. 11 33 נאחאנג. inf. L, om. BN^aA). One might plausibly identify it with the ruins of Hazzûr near Beit Hanina (PEFM iii. 8 114). The mention of Zeboim, however, between Hadid and Neballat (v. 34) makes it possible that Hazor may mean BAAL-HAZOR (נְצוּר בַעַל 2 S. 13 23 βαυλασωρ [B], βελλα. [A], βασελλ. [L]), which in its turn is defined as being 'beside EPHRAIM' [g.v., ii.]. This is Tell 'Asûr—a hill 1 hour NE. from Bethel (which place is mentioned in Neh. 11 31)—and lies ENE. of Jifnâ (i.e. OPHNI); cp Buhl, Pal. 177. See ESORA.

3. A town in the Negeb of Judah mentioned between Keshed and Ithnan (Josh. 15 23 ασορ [ωγαιν] [B], ασωρ [L.], om. A); Buhl (l.c. 182) identifies with Hudêre, E. from Hebron and NE. from Ma'in. Cp below.

4. Another Hazor, alternatively called קְרִיּוֹת הַצְּרוּרִים (KERIOTH-HEZOR, RV; AV read as two) is enumerated in the same group (Josh. 15 25 πόλεις ασερων [B], πόλεις -μ [A], πόλεις εσρωμ [L]) and is identified by Buhl with mod. Karyatên S. of Ma'in, the place whence Judas perhaps derived his designation 'Iscariot' (but see JUDAS).

The modern form of Hazor survives in the Negeb in the forms Hadira, a mount S. of Karnub, and a well, el-Hudêrâ, in et-Tih (cp Rob. BR 1223). See HAZOR-HADATTAH. S. A. C.

HAZOR-HADATTAH (סו RV; הַצְּרוּר הַדַּתָּה, i.e. [Aram.] 'New Hazor,' אסור תהן דאיןנה [L; om. BA], ASOR NOFA [Vg.]), a place on the Edomite border of Judah (Josh. 15 25).

'An Aramaic adjective, however, in this region is so strange that the reading must be questioned' (Di.). הדַתָּה is probably a miswritten form of קְרִיּוֹת which follows; Hadattah should be omitted. AV gives, 'And Hazor, Hadattah.' Eus. and Jer. (OS 217 31 90 8) place this Hazor too far N., viz., on the borders of Ashkelon, towards the E. See HAZOR, 1. T. K. C.

HAZZELEPONI (הַצֵּלְפוֹנִי), 1 Ch. 4 3 RV. AV HAZELEPONI.

HEAD is the equivalent in OT of שָׂרָף, śāf, and in Aram. parts of Dan. of שָׂרָף, śāf, and in NT of κεφαλή. In 1 Ch. 10 10 EV also gives 'head' for גּוֹלְיָת, gulgôleth. This passage furnishes a good starting-point for our survey of some of the ideas connected by the Hebrews with the head. גּוֹלְיָת (gulgôleth) does not really mean 'bead.' The Chronicler misunderstood 1 S. 31 10.

The first part of the verse, relative to Saul's armour, is a parenthesis, and probably a gloss, but seemed to the Chronicler to be the beginning of a statement respecting the trophies carried off by the Philistines. If this view was correct there was no choice but to emend גּוֹלְיָת 'his body' into גּוֹלְיָת 'his skull,' in spite of the fact that, according to usage, it was not merely the skull, but the whole head of an enemy, that was the victor's trophy.

A critical translation of Chronicles would therefore have to render, in 1 Ch. 10 10, 'and they stuck up his skull in the house of Dagon.' Why the head was chosen as a trophy (Judg. 7 25 1 S. 17 54 57 31 9 2 S. 4 7 20 21 f. 2 K. 10 6 ff.) may at first seem to need no investigation; was not the severed head a convincing proof of death? It may have become no more than this when the grim narrative in 2 K. 10 6 ff. was written. When, however, we read of the Australians that one of the trophies which they carry home after killing an enemy is the kidney fat, and that this is kept by the assassin to lubricate himself, because he thinks that thus he acquires the strength of his victim,¹ we begin to suspect that there is something more than we at first supposed in the custom of decapitating a dead enemy. What is it, then? It is the idea that the head is a special seat of life (which accounts for the phrase 'to swear by the head,' Mt. 5 36). Hence among the Iranians the head of a victim was dedicated to Haoma, in order that the life, represented by the head, might return to its divine giver. That was not indeed the usage of the Egyptians or of the Hebrews. Yet both peoples had a reverence for the head. 'There are twenty-two vessels in the head which draw the spirits into it, and send them thence to all parts of the body,' is the assertion of the Ebers Papyrus (Maspero, Daun of Civ. 216), and shows what the feeling of the Egyptians was.

It is true Herodotus (2 39, quoted by WRS, Rel. Sem. (2) 379) states that the head of a sacrificial victim was not offered on the altar, but sold to Greek traders, or thrown into the Nile; but this is opposed to the clear evidence of the Egyptian monuments.²

The Hebrews, too, doubtless offered the head, among the other chief parts of the body, upon the altar, and there is considerable improbability (see DOVE'S DUNG, col. 1130) in the statement in the MT of 2 K. 6 25 that heads of asses were eaten during a great famine in Samaria,—first, because ass's flesh was forbidden food, and next, because the dried head of any animal being used by the Semites as an amulet, it was not natural for them to eat the head.³ (The eating of the head of the paschal lamb was an exception.) It is also probable that there is a sense of the sacredness of the head in the statement of 1 S. 17 54 and 1 Ch. 10 10 respecting the head of Goliath and the skull of Saul respectively. In the former passage the MT tells us that David took the head of the Philistine and brought it to Jerusalem (ירושלם), but this anachronism is probably an error of the scribes (Che. Exp. T. 10 522 [199]); the true reading is to 'Saul' (לְשׂאוֹ). Saul who had not stirred from his place could not regard the head of Goliath as a trophy; but he may have valued it greatly as a supernatural guardian or amulet. And so in 1 Ch. 10 10 even the Chronicler feels that the skull (representing the head) of Saul may well have been affixed as a sacred object to the wall of a Philistine temple. Possibly we may connect his statement with the view certainly held in Talmudic times that a mummified human head (têraphim) or even a human skull ('ôb), could give the knowledge of the future.⁴

Among the various idioms in which the head finds a place a few may be mentioned.

(1) To 'lift up the head,' when spoken of another, most naturally means 'to raise to honour' (see e.g. Gen. 40 13 2 K. 25 27). In Gen. 40 19, however, it means 'to take off the head' as a punishment. It is one of those plays on words in which Hebrew writers delight.

(2) Yahwè 'will take away thy master from thy head' (2 K. 2 3 5 EV) alludes to the customary position of pupils at the feet of their teacher (cp Acts 22 3).

¹ In 1 K. 9 15 (10 23) the readings are μαγδω [A], μαδιαν [B] (cp medam, *OS*² 140 34), μαγεδω [L]; in 2 35 μαγαω [B], -δω [AL].

² A possible connection with MAKKEDAH may also be suggested.

HEADBAND

(3) 'They shoot out the lip, they shake the head' (Ps. 22 7 [8]) may strike us as a strange combination of phrases. With the Hebrews, however, shaking the head is a sign of mockery (cp Ps. 44 14 [15], 2 K. 19 21), though it may also be a gesture of sympathy (Job 16 4).

(4) 'Thou shalt heap coals of fire on his head' (Prov. 25 22) would most naturally mean, 'Thou shalt take vengeance upon him by destroying him' (1 Gen. 19 24, Ps. 11 6 [7]). Of course, this does not suit the context, nor can חתך mean anything but 'fetch,' or 'carry away.' Hence the text must be out of order. Read, 'for (so) thou wilt quench coals of fire' (i.e. evil passions, Ecclus. 8 10). Certainly the reference to the head can be well spared; the ethical gain is considerable.

In a Zend scripture we read, after an exhortation to charity on the ground that the Law begs for charity in the person of thy brethren who beg for bread, 'Ever will that bread be burning coal upon thy head' (Vistasp Yast, 36, in [Oxford] Zendavesta, part II, by Darmesteter, 338). The 'burning coal on the head' seems to be a figurative expression for the vengeance imprecated on him who refuses the bread of alms. If so, it suggests what the MT of Prov. 25 22a ought to mean. On the phrase 'to cover the head,' etc. (in mourning), see MOURNING.

HEART (לֵב or לֶב), on the distribution of which respectively in OT writings see Briggs, Kohut Memorial Studies, 94-105 ('97); Καρδιά. There are some interesting varieties in the biblical use of the term 'heart.' Primarily the heart is the seat and principle of vitality, for 'the life of the flesh is in the blood' (Lev. 17 11), and the receptacle of the blood is the heart.

Hence the expressions, 'let your heart live' (Ps. 22 26 [27]); 'it reaches to thy heart' (Jer. 4 18; cp v. 10 'to the soul'); 'the whole heart is faint' (Is. 1 5).

'Heart' and 'flesh' (שָׂרָף) combined designate the whole inner and outer man (as in Ass. šēru and libbu); see Ps. 16 9 73 26 (cp ESCHATOLOGY); and for 'heart' in the sense of 'inner man' note the phrase so frequent in Dt. (e.g., 4 29), 'with all the heart and with all the soul.'

More special meanings are the following:—

(a) The seat of the appetites, emotions, and passions; see, e.g., Ps. 104 15 Dt. 19 6 1 K. 8 38 Is. 30 29.

(b) Mind, intellect, purpose, memory; so 'men of heart' = 'men of understanding,' Job 34 10 34; 'all the wickedness which thine heart (= thy mind) is privy to,' 1 K. 2 44 EV; 'wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart,' 1 K. 4 29 EV; 'it is in his heart (i.e. purpose) to destroy,' Is. 10 7; 'the heart (purpose) of Pharaoh was changed,' Ex. 14 5; 'David laid up these words in his heart,' i.e. in his memory, 1 S. 21 12 (cp Lk. 2 19 51). So Ps. 31 12 [13], 'a dead man out of heart' would mean 'a dead man, forgotten,' if the Hebrew text were correct.

(c) Conscience, conscience, character. So Prov. 14 10 (a fine passage even in EV; but 'intermeddled with its joy' strikes a false note, for even a stranger feels some sympathy with simple human joys), where read—

A heart that feels its deep vexation
Cannot intermingle with the joy of a stranger.⁴

Hitzig would give the sense of 'consciousness' to the word 'heart' in the well-known phrase 'a clean heart,' Ps. 51 10 [12]. He supports this by a reference to Prov. 22 11a; a clear consciousness—i.e., a joyous temper—would then be the boon sought for by the speaker. But the reference is not tenable, for in the passage referred to enables us to restore an all-important word which has been lost—viz., 'Yahwē.' A human king may be partial to joyous-hearted subjects, but Yahwē loves those whose conscience, or moral character, is spotless; ἀγαπᾷ κείρους ὁσίας καρδίας.

As to Ps. 51 10 [12], the true sense of this religiously

² כִּי נָחַל־אִשׁ אֶתָּה תִּבְנֶה.

³ Lazarus (Ethik d. Judenthums [98], 231) notes that Talm. לבא has a narrower reference than the biblical לב, and designates the inward disposition as distinguished from external acts.

⁴ In δ read, with Chajes, בְּשִׂמְחָה יוֹד לֹא יִתְעַר. Deep sorrow incapacitates a man for sympathy with the joys of others. Frankenberg reads דַּוָּן (ἔσθ' ἔσθ' ἔσθ') for רַךְ; but the result is not simple enough for a proverb.

important passage is shown by Ezek. 11 19 f. 18 31 36 26 f., where 'a new heart,' or 'a heart of flesh,' is the organ of that new life which Israel is to lead in the ideal age. A 'clean heart' is therefore 'a pure conscience and character.' The consciousness of being free from guilt had often been possessed by the early Israelites temporarily as a consequence of the due performance of ritual forms; but the future Israelites would possess it permanently, because they would have a moral organ which would guard them against displeasing their righteous and holy God.

Such a 'clean heart' is otherwise described as a 'steadfast spirit' (RVmg.; cp Ps. 78 37, EV 'a right spirit') by which the Psalmist must mean 'a steady impulse towards all that is good.' For the sense of 'conscience' see also Job 27 6, EV 'my heart doth not reproach me' (?), and especially 1 K. 8 38 where EV's rendering, 'every man the plague of his own heart,' should rather be 'every man a stroke in (lit. of) his own conscience.' The idea is that God not only strikes the body or the possessions of a sinner, but forcibly touches his heart, or conscience, with conviction of sin (see Klo., Ki.).

In the books admitted into the Heb. canon (for the Apocrypha cp Wisd. 7 11 Ecclus. 42 18 [N]) ὁ has the proper Greek term for conscience, συνείδησις, only once—viz. in Ecclus. 10 20, where the Hebrew text has the late word כִּרְעָה.¹ It is, however, common in NT, though it occurs only once in the Gospels (Jn. 8 9 in a disputed section). For the sense of 'character,' see also Jer. 12 3, 'Thou hast tried my heart'; Ps. 7 9 [10] 1 Thess. 2 4.

Here we find ourselves on the line of progress to NT religion. The Pauline epistles give the heart a central position in the moral nature of man. It has the power of immediate perception of the spiritual truths revealed by God's spirit. God, we are told, has shone in the hearts of Christians to give the light of the knowledge of the divine glory (2 Cor. 4 6); we even meet with the strange expression 'the eyes of your heart' (Eph. 1 18). Here the 'heart' is in fact almost a Hebraistic synonym for that 'reason' or 'understanding' (νοῦς or διάνοια) which is the responsive element in man to the divine spirit (cp Gnosis, § 5). The germ of this representation, however, is to be found in the teaching of Jesus. 'Happy are the pure in heart, for they will see God' (Mt. 5 8). Indeed, the entire Sermon on the Mount impresses the necessity of keeping the 'heart' pure and in constant contact with God and with heavenly things as the condition of pure morality. This again is but the clearer expression of the OT view that it is affinity of character that brings a man near to God; and that the moral and spiritual life which produces character is seated in the innermost part of man—i.e., in his 'heart.'

HEARTH. For (1) חֹרָף, ah (εἰς ἄρα; arula), Jer. 36 22 f.; (2) חֹרֶף, hō'ēf, Zech. 12 6 RV 'pan (of fire)' (δαλός, caminum); (3) חֹרֶף, mō'ēd, Ps. 102 3 [4] (φρούγιον, cremum, i.e., dry wood), RV 'firebrand'; plur. חֹרְפֵי, mō'ēdē, Is. 33 14, EV 'burnings,' see COAL, § 3.

Lev. 6 9 [2] is difficult (see below); RV 'on the hearth,' RVmg. 'on its firewood'; neither is right. The small ṭ proceeds from an ancient corrector (cp the small ṇ in Is. 44 14) and (as in Is. l.c.) is conjectural. Read עַל־הַחֹרֶף, 'on the fire' (see 4); the letters חֹרֶף were accidentally misarranged as חֹרְפֵף, and a corrector changed ṭ into ṇ (suggested by SS).

4. חֹרֶף, yā'hūd, Is. 30 14 f. (ἔσθ' ἔσθ' ἔσθ', al. [see Field] καυσότρα, incendium); 'the fire burning on the hearth.'

On the 'hearth of God,' Is. 29 1 (RVmg.), see ALTAR, ARIEL; on the 'cakes upon the hearth' of Gen. 18 6 see BREAD, § 2 (a); on the 'heartstones' of Ezek. 40 43 (AVmg.) see HOOK, 7.

HEATH. RVmg. 'tamarisk' ('ar'ār, עֲרָר, ἄγραμιό-μυρική, Jer. 17 6 48 6 f.). The Heb. word may be connected with עָרַד, signifying nakedness, and so point to the stunted appearance of the plant (see below).

¹ כִּרְעָה, however, in Ecclus., l.c., is probably corrupt; Perles reads בְּכִרְעָה, 'on thy couch.'

² The same form occurs as an adj. = 'naked' in Ps. 102 17 [18]; but cp Che. Ps. (2)

HEATHEN

The form 'ārār, אַרְרָר, in Jer. 48— for which אַרְרָר read אַרְרָר (implied in ὄνος ἄργιος)—is most naturally explained as a 'broken plural' of 'ar'ar' (Hitz. Jes. 201, Lag. Sem. 130); Bart's view of it as a sing. adjectival form (NB 160) is less likely. 'Tamarisk' is the rendering of אַרְרָר in Jer. 17:6 (ἀργιωμαρῖκη [BNAQ]), of Aq. in Jer. 17:6 (in 486 μωρῖκη) and of Vg.; Tg. has in the former place אַרְרָר = σκόλυμος, 'edible thistle', but in the other takes 'ārār to be a proper name (so Sym. aprop); Pesh. simply renders by 'root' in both places.

The plant intended is almost certainly a juniper, as that is the meaning of Ar. 'ar'ar, and the most likely sort is, according to Tristram (NHB 358), the Juniperus Sabina L., or Savin. This tree abounds on the rocks above Petra, where as Robinson (BR 2506) says, it grows to the height of 10 or 15 feet, and hangs upon the rocks even to the summit of the cliffs and needles.

'Its gloomy stunted appearance, with its scale-like leaves pressed close to its gnarled stem, and cropped close by the wild goats, gives great force to the contrast suggested by the prophet.' Tristram adds, 'There is no true heath in Palestine S. of the Lower Lebanon.' Hooker states that this particular plant is still called 'ar'ar by the Arabs. See also AROR.

[The 'ar'ar, or juniper, has been found in 1 S. 20:19 f. 41, (crit. emend.), where David is said to have sat down beside a juniper tree, while Jonathan shot arrows at three prominent rocks near. The passage gains in picturesqueness. זרעֵים זרעֵים in v. 20 should be זרעֵים; זרעֵים was originally זרעֵים, and intended as a correction of זרעֵים; see Che. Crit. Bib. and cp EZEL.]

N. M.

HEATHEN (דְּלֵי; εΘΝΗ). The rendering is plainly wrong in AV of Lev. 25:44 26:45, but is admissible when gōyim or ἔθνη is used of nations whose religion is neither Jewish, nor Jewish-Christian, nor Christian, with consciousness of this fact.

Cp Sanderson (1627), 'Abimelech, an heathen-man, who had not the knowledge of the true God of heaven to direct him'; Caxton, Pref. to Malory's Arthur (1485), 'in al places crysten and hethen.' Possibly the Gothic original of 'heathen' may be traced to Armenian hetanos, an adaptation of Gk. ἔθνος, though the stem-vowel seems to have been assimilated to Gothic haiþi 'heath' (Murray, New Eng. Dict.). See GENTILE, § 2.

HEAVEN. On the various Hebrew conceptions of a heaven as the abode of supernatural beings and (later) of the risen dead, see ESCHATOLOGY, and cp EARTH AND WORLD, EARTH [FOUR QUARTERS], PARADISE.

The usual Hebrew term is שָׁמַיִם (plur., not dual; ἠὲ οὐρανός), but 'heaven' is used also by AV to render שָׁמַיִם Ps. 77:18 [19] (RV, whirlwind,' see WINDS), and שָׁמַיִם Ps. 89:6 [7] 37 [38] (RV 'sky'). In the NT hesides οὐρανός and ἐπουράνιος the only feature which calls for remark is the reference to a belief in a plurality of heavens (τά ἐπουράνια, Eph. 1:3 2:6 3:10, etc.), probably due to Persian influence; see especially Charles, Secrets of Enoch, xxx-xxvii.

HEAVENLY BODIES (στοιχεῖα). 2 Pet. 3:10 12 RVm⁶. See ELEMENTS, § 2.

HEBER (הֶבֶר, but הֶבֶר in Nu. 26:45; χἀβερ [BAL]; see NAMES, § 70).

1. The husband of JAEL (q. v.) and head of a Kenite sept which separated from the main body of the tribe (see KENITES), and in the course of its nomadic wanderings went as far north as a certain sacred tree near Kedesh (see ZAANAIM, THE PLAIN OF); Judg. 4:11 (ὁ πλῆσιον [B]) 17:21. In Judg. 5:24 (χαλεβ [A]) he has been introduced by a glossator. WMM (As. u. Eur. 174, cp 193) connects קַיִ with Kina, mentioned in the Pap. Anastasi, and apparently situated E. of Megiddo (see Jensen, Z. A. 10:355 f., and cp AMALEK). Thus there is an apparent coincidence between Heber of Kina, and the eponym of the neighbouring tribe of Asher (see 2 below). See ENGANNIM, JETHRO.

2. The eponym of an Asherite clan; Gen. 46:17 (P) (χῶσβωρ [A], -βωλ [D], -βωρ [L]); Nu. 26:45 (χῶσβερ [BAFL]); and 1 Ch.

HEBREW LANGUAGE.² The name Hebrew (Lat. Hebræus; Gr. ἑβραῖος) is a transcription of ḥbrāyā, the Aramaic equivalent of the original OT

1. Name Hebrew. word עִבְרִי, ibrī, pl. 'ibrim, which is the proper gentile name of the people who also bore the collective name of Israel or Children of Israel (B'nê Israel). The name of Israel with its sacred associations in the patriarchal history is that by which the OT writers prefer to designate their nation; and this circumstance, combined with the fact that the term Hebrews is frequently employed where foreigners are introduced as speaking or spoken to (e.g., Ex. 26:1 S. 46:9 Gen. 40:15 Ex. 3:18), has led to the conjecture that the name of Hebrews (men from the other side, scil. of the Euphrates) was originally given to the descendants of Abraham by their Canaanite neighbours, and continued to be the usual designation of the Israelites among foreigners, just as the Magyars are known to other Europeans as Hungarians (foreigners), as we call the High-Dutch Germans (warriors), or as the Greeks gave the name of Phœnicians to the people that called themselves Canaanites.³ A closer view of the case, does not confirm this conjecture.

[Stade's theory, however,—that the Israelites were called Hebrews, after their passage of the Jordan, in contradistinction to the other West-Jordanic peoples, though connected with a historical theory not borne out by the (later) Israelite tradition—is still maintained by its author, Akad. Reden, '99, p. 110. As to the Habiri of Am. Tab. Wi. (Kohut Memorial Studies, 604 ff., cp Cl. 1:18 ff.) defends the view that the people so-called are nomads from the other side of the Jordan, such as the Suti or pre-Aramaic Bedawins of the Syrian desert. These nomads were the earlier 'Hebrews.' But cp Hommel, AHT, 230 ff., 258 ff.] Nor has the word Hebrew been hitherto found in the early monuments of other Eastern nations [unless indeed the Habiri of the Am. Tab., who give such trouble to Abd-hiba of Jerusalem, may be identified with the Hebrews—a theory which in its newer form deserves consideration]. The identification proposed by Chabas which finds the Hebrews in the hieroglyphic Apuria is more than doubtful,⁴ whereas the name of Israel appears on the stone of Meshu, king of Moab (l. 7) and perhaps has been deciphered on Assyrian monuments.⁵ [On the occurrence of this name in an old Egyptian inscription, see EXODUS I., §§ 2, 9.]

The form 'ibrī is, in the language of Semitic grammarians, a relative noun, presupposing the word 'Eber as the name of the tribe, place, or common ancestor, from whom the Hebrews are designated. See EBER.

Accordingly we find Eber as a nation side by side with Assyria in the obscure poetical passage Nu. 24:24, and Eber as ancestor of the Hebrews in the genealogical lists of Gen. 10 f. Here we must distinguish two records.⁶ According to Gen. 11 (and Gen. 10:24) Eber is the great-grandson of Shem through Arphaxad, and the ancestor of Terah through Peleg, Reu, Serug, and Nahor. These are not to be taken as the names of individual men. Several of them are designations of places or districts near the upper waters of the Euphrates and the Tigris, and among other circumstances the place at the head of the series assigned to the district of Arrapachitis (see, however, ARPHAXAD), through which a migration from Ararat to the lands occupied by the Semites in historical times would first pass, suggests the probability that the genealogy is not even meant to exhibit a table of ethnological affinities, but rather presents a geographical sketch of the supposed early movements of the Hebrews, who are personified under the name of Eber. If this is so, we can hardly venture to assert (with some scholars) that the author of the list (the Priestly Writer) extended the name of Hebrews to all descendants of Terah.¹

The case is different with another (doubtless older) record of which a fragment seems to be preserved in Gen. 10 21 25-30. Here there is no intermediate link between Shem and Eber. Sons of Shem and sons of Eber appear to be co-extensive ideas, and to the latter are reckoned not only the descendants of Peleg (Aramæans, Israelites, Ishmaelite Arabs, etc.), but also the South Arabian tribes of Joktan.

As to the etymological origin of the name of Hebrews we have an early statement in Gen. 14 13, where אַדְלַר renders 'Abram the Hebrew' [see Di.] by ὁ περάτης, 'the crosser.'²

Grammatically more accurate, while resting on the same etymology, is the rendering of Aquila, ὁ περάτης, 'the man from the other side' of the Euphrates, which is the explanation of Jewish tradition (Ber. K., and Rashi); cp Ew. Gr.⁽³⁾ 1 407 f. (ET, 1 284).

Steiner, however, takes 'eber in the Arabic sense of a river bank, and makes the Hebrews 'dwellers in a land of rivers' (Bib. Lex. 2613). This goes well with Peleg (watercourse), as in Arabia we have the district Falag, so named because it is furrowed by waters (Sprenger, Geog. Arab. 234). Cp EBER.

By the Hebrew language we understand the ancient tongue of the Hebrews in Canaan—the language in which the OT is composed, with the exception of the Aramaic passages (Jer. 10 11 Ezra 4 8-6 18 7 12-26 Dan. 2 4-7 28). We do not find, however, that this language was called Hebrew by those who spoke it. It is the lip—i.e. speech—of Canaan (Is. 19 18), or, as spoken in southern Palestine, יהודית, Jewish (2 K. 18 26 || Is. 36 11 Neh. 13 24). The later Jews call it the holy tongue (שׁוֹן הַקֹּדֶשׁ) in contrast to the profane Aramaic dialect (commonly though improperly enough called Syro-Chaldaic) which long before the time of Christ had superseded the old language as the vernacular of the Jews. This change had already taken place at the time when the expression 'in Hebrew' (ἐβραϊστί) first occurs (Prologue to Sirach); and both in the Apocrypha and in the NT the ambiguous term, naming the language after those who used it, often denotes the contemporary vernacular, not the obsolete idiom of the OT. The other sense, however, was admissible (e.g., Rev. 9 11, and so frequently in Josephus), and naturally became the prevalent one among Christian writers who had little occasion to speak of anything but the OT Hebrew.³ See ARAMAIC LANGUAGE.

2. Name 'Hebrew language.'

Hebrew is a language of the group which, since Eichhorn, has generally been known as Semitic, the affinities of the several members of which are so close that they may fairly be compared with a sub-group of the Indo-Germanic family—for example, with the Teutonic languages. The fundamental unity of the Semitic vocabulary is easily observed from the absence of compounds (except in proper names) and from the fact that almost all words are derived from their roots in definite patterns (measures) as regular as those of grammatical inflection. The roots regularly consist of three consonants (seldom four or five), the accompanying vowels having no radical value, but shifting according to grammatical rules to express various embodiments of the root idea. The triliteral roots are substantially common to the whole Semitic group, subject to certain consonantal permutations, of which the most important are strikingly analogous to those laid down by Grimm for the Teutonic languages. There are in Arabic four aspirated dentals, which in Hebrew and Assyrian are regularly represented by sibilants, as follows:— Arabic dh = Hebrew-Assyrian š; Ar. dh = Heb.-Ass. z; Ar. ẓ = Heb.-Ass. š; Ar. ḏ = Heb.-Ass. š.

In most of the Aramaic dialects the first three of these sounds are represented by t, d, and f respectively, while the fourth is usually changed into the guttural sound y. But it would appear from recent discoveries that in very ancient times some at least of the Aramaic dialects approximated to the Hebrew and Assyrian as regards the treatment of the first three sounds, and changed the fourth into p (cp ARAMAIC, § 2, beginning, and see below, § 6).¹

Derivation from the roots and inflection proceed partly by the reduplication of root letters and the addition of certain preformatives and affirmatives (more rarely by the insertion of formative consonants in the body of the root), partly by modifications of the vowels with which the radicals are pronounced. In its origin almost every root expresses something that can be grasped by the senses.

The mechanism by which words are formed from the root is adapted to present sensible notions in a variety of nuances and in all possible embodiments and connections, so that there are regular forms to express in a single word the intensity, the repetition, the production of the root idea—the place, the instrument, the time of its occurrence, and so forth. Thus the expression of intellectual ideas is necessarily metaphorical, almost every word being capable of a material sense, or at least conveying the distinct suggestion of some sensible notion. For example, the names of passions depict their physiological expression; 'to confer honour' means also 'to make heavy,' and so on.

4. Their inflection.

The same concrete character, the same inadequacy to convey purely abstract thoughts without a substratum appealing to the senses, appears in the grammatical structure of the Semitic tongues. This is to be seen, for example, in the absence of the neuter gender, in the extreme paucity of particles, in the scanty provision for the subordination of propositions, which deprives the Semitic style of all involved periods and reduces it to a succession of short sentences linked by the simple copula and.

The fundamental element of these languages is the noun, and in the fundamental type of sentence the predicate is a noun set down without any copula and therefore without distinction of past, present, or future time. The finite verb is developed from nominal forms (participial or infinitive), and is equally without distinction of time. Instead of tenses we find two forms, the perfect and the imperfect, which are used according as the speaker contemplates the verbal action as a thing complete or as conditional, imperfect, or in process.

It lies in the nature of this distinction that the imperfect alone has moods. In their later stages the languages seek to supply the lack of tenses by circumlocutions with a substantive verb and participles.

Other notable features (common to the Semitic tongues) are the use of appended suffixes to denote the possessive pronouns with a substantive, or the accusative of a personal pronoun with a verb, and the expression of the genitive relation by what is called construction or annexation, the governing noun being placed immediately before the genitive, and, if possible, slightly shortened in pronunciation so that the two words may run together as one idea.

A characteristic of the later stages of the languages is the resolution of this relation into a prepositional clause.

These and other peculiarities are sufficient to establish the original unity of the group, and entitle us to postulate an original language from which all the Semitic dialects have sprung.

Of the relation of this language to other linguistic stems, especially to the Indo-Germanic on the E. and the North-African languages on the W., we cannot yet speak with certainty; but it appears that the present system of triliteral roots has grown out of an earlier biliteral system which, so far as it can be reconstructed, must form the basis of scientific inquiry into the ultimate affinities of the Semitic group.²

¹ The Terahites, according to other testimonies, are Aramæans (Gen. 22 20 f.; Dt. 26 5); but the Priestly Writer, who cannot be pre-exilic, makes Aram a separate offshoot of Shem, having nothing to do with Eber (Gen. 10 22 f.).

³ The term 'Hebrew language' seems to have originated with the Greeks or Hellenists. Philo, however, calls the language of the OT Chaldaee (De Vita Moysis, 25 f.; cp Jerome on Dan. 1). On the use of the expression 'Hebrew language' in the Talmud, see Berliner, Beiträge zur heb. Gr. 5 (Berlin, '79).

Before the rise of comparative philology it was a

5. Age of Hebrew. familiar opinion that Hebrew was the original speech of mankind.

Taken from the Jews, and as already expressed in the Palestinian Targum on Gen. 11.1, this opinion drew its main support from etymologies and other data in the earlier chapters of Genesis, which, however, were as plausibly turned by Syriac writers in favour of their own tongue.¹

Till recent times many excellent scholars (including Ewald) claimed for Hebrew the greatest relative antiquity among Semitic tongues. It is now, however, generally recognised that in grammatical structure the Arabic, shut up within its native deserts till the epoch of Islam, preserved much more of the original Semitic forms than either Hebrew or Aramaic.

In its richer vocalisation, in the possession of distinct case endings,² in the use for feminine nouns of the affirmative t, which in the northern dialect has passed through h (originally audible as in Egyptian Arabic) into a mere vowel, in the more extensive range of passive and modal forms, and in other refinements of inflection, Arabic represents no later development, but the original wealth and primitive subtlety of Semitic speech, as appears not only from fragmentary survivals in the other dialects, but also from an examination of the process of decay which has brought the spoken Arabic of the present day into a grammatical condition closely parallel to the OT Hebrew.

Whilst Arabic is in many respects the elder brother, it is not the parent of Hebrew or Aramaic. Each member of the group had an independent development from a stage prior to any existing language, though it would seem that Hebrew did not branch off from Aramaic so soon as from Arabic, whilst in its later stages it came under direct Aramaic influence.

[On the relation which Hebrew bears to the other Semitic languages, see Wright, Comp. Gram.; Driver, Tenses (App. iii.); and Nöldeke's art. 'Semitic Languages' in EB⁽⁹⁾, published separately in German, with some additions (Die sem. Sprachen, '87; (2), '99).]

The Hebrew spoken by the Israelites in Canaan was separated only by very minor differences (like those of our provincial dialects) from the speech of neighbouring tribes. We know this so far as the Moabite language is concerned from the stone of Mesha; and the indications furnished by proper names, as well as the acknowledged affinity of Israel with these tribes, make the same thing probable in the case of Ammon and Edom. More remarkable is the fact that the Phœnicians and Canaanites, with whom the Israelites acknowledged no brotherhood, spoke a language which, at least as written, differs but little from biblical Hebrew. This observation has been used in support of the very old idea that the Hebrews originally spoke Aramaic, and changed their language in Canaan. An exacter study of the Phœnician inscriptions, however, shows differences from Hebrew which suffice to constitute a distinct dialect, and combine with other indications to favour the view that the descendants of Abraham brought their Hebrew idiom with them. In this connection it is important to observe that the old Assyrian, which preceded Aramaic in regions with which the book of Genesis connects the origins of Abraham, is

² That the case endings in classical Arabic are survivals of a very ancient system of inflection can hardly be doubted. It does not necessarily follow, however, that in the primitive Semitic language these terminations were used for precisely the same purposes as in Arabic. Moreover, the three Arabic case-endings commonly called by European scholars the nominative, genitive, and accusative, do not by any means correspond exactly, as regards their usage, to the respective cases in the Indo-European languages; that is to say, the Arabic language sometimes employs the accusative where we should, on logical grounds, have expected the nominative and vice versa. These apparent anomalies are probably relics of a time when the use of the case-endings was determined by principles which differed, to a considerable extent, from those known to the Arabic grammarians.

in many respects closely akin to Hebrew.¹ [Certain inscriptions, moreover, recently discovered at Zenjirli, in the extreme N. of Syria, are written in a dialect which exhibits many striking points of resemblance to Hebrew, although it would seem, on the whole, to belong to the Aramaic branch.²]

As the origin of Hebrew is lost in the obscurity that hangs over the early movements of the Semitic tribes, so we know very little of the changes which the language underwent in Canaan. The existence of local differences of speech is proved by Judg. 126;³ but the attempt to make out in the OT records a Northern and a Judean dialect, or even besides these a third dialect for the Simeonites of the extreme S.⁴ has led to no certain results. In general it may be said that the OT text supplies inadequate data for studying the history of the language. Semitic writing, especially a purely consonantal text such as the OT originally was, gives an imperfect picture of the very grammatical and phonetic details most likely to vary dialectically or in course of time.

The later punctuation (including the notation of vowels; see below, § 9, and WRITING) and even many things in the present consonantal text, represent the formal pronunciation of the Synagogue as it took shape after Hebrew became a dead language—for even Φ has often a more primitive pronunciation of proper names (cp NAMES, § 5/). This modern system being applied to all parts of the OT alike, many archaisms were obliterated or disguised, and the earlier and later writings present in the received text a grammatical uniformity which is certainly not original. It is true that occasional consonantal forms inconsistent with the accompanying vowels have survived—especially in the books least read by the Jews—and appear in the light of comparative grammar as indications of more primitive forms. These sporadic survivals show that the correction of obsolete forms was not carried through with perfect consistency; but it is never safe to argue as if we possessed the original form of the texts (cp WRITING).

The chief historical changes in the Hebrew language which we can still trace are due to Aramaic influence.

7. Hebrew yields to Aramaic.

The Northern Israelites were in immediate contact with Aramaean populations and some Aramaic loan-words were used, at least in Northern Israel, from a very early date. At the time of Hezekiah Aramaic seems to have been the usual language of diplomacy spoken by the statesmen of Judah and Assyria alike (2 K. 1826). After the fall of Samaria the Hebrew population of Northern Israel was partly deported, their place being taken by new colonists, most of whom probably had Aramaic as their mother-tongue. It is not therefore surprising that even in the language of Judæa increasing signs of Aramaic influence appear before the Exile.⁵ The fall of the Jewish kingdom accelerated the decay of Hebrew as a spoken language. Not indeed that those of the people who were transported forgot their own tongue in their new home, as older scholars supposed on the basis of Jewish tradition: the exilic and post-exilic prophets do not write in a lifeless tongue. Hebrew was still the language of Jerusalem in the time of Nehemiah (13 24) in the middle of the fifth century B.C.⁶ After the fall of Jerusalem, however, the petty Jewish people were in daily intercourse with a surrounding Aramaean population, and the Aramaic tongue, which was the official language of the western provinces of the Persian empire, began to take rank as the recognised medium of polite intercourse and letters even among the tribes of Arabic blood—the Nabateans—whose inscriptions in the Haurān are written in Aramaic. Thus Hebrew as a spoken language gradually yielded to its more powerful neighbour, and the style of the latest OT writers is not only full of Aramaic words and forms but also largely coloured with Aramaic idioms, whilst their Hebrew has lost the force and freedom of a living tongue (Ecclesiastes, Esther, some Psalms, Daniel). The Chronicler no longer thoroughly understood the Old Hebrew sources from which he worked, while for the latest part of his history he used a Jewish Aramaic document, part of which he incorporated in the book of Ezra. Long before the time of Christ Hebrew was the exclusive property of scholars.

About 200 B.C., Jesus the son of Sirach (Ben Sirā), a Palestinian Jew, composed in Hebrew the famous treatise known in the West as Ecclesiasticus. A large portion of the original text has recently come to light, unfortunately in a mutilated condition. Though Ben Sirā uses a considerable number of late words, mostly borrowed from the Aramaic, the general character of his Hebrew style is decidedly purer and more classical than that of some parts of the OT (e.g., Ecclesiastes), and it is specially to be noted that the recovered fragments, as far as is known at present, contain not a single word derived from the Greek. See ECCLESIASTICUS.

Several other books of the Apocrypha appear to be translated from Hebrew originals—Judith, 1 Macc.—the last according to the express testimony of Jerome. It is certain that the Hebrew OT canon contains elements as late as the epoch of national revival under the Maccabees (Daniel, certain Psalms), for Hebrew was the language of religion as well as of scholarship. As for the scholars, they affected not only to write but also to speak in Hebrew; but they could not resist the influence of the Aramaic vernacular, and indeed made no attempt to imitate the classical models of the OT, which neither furnished the necessary terminology for the new ideas with which they operated, nor offered in its forms and constructions a suitable vehicle for their favourite processes of legal dialectic. Thus was developed a new scholastic Hebrew, 'the language of the wise' (לשון חכמים), preserving some genuine old Hebrew words which happen not to be found in the OT, and supplying some new necessities of expression by legitimate developments of germs that lay in the classical idiom, but thoroughly interpenetrated with foreign elements, and as little fit for higher literary purposes as the Latin of the mediæval schoolmen. The chief monument of this dialect is the body of traditional law called the Mishna, which is formed of materials of various dates, but was collected in its present form about the close of the second century A.D. (see LAW LITERATURE).

[A remarkable feature in the Hebrew of the Mishna is the large use made of Greek and even of Latin words.

That these words were actually current among the Jews of the period and are not mere literary embellishments (as is sometimes the case with Greek words used by Syriac authors) appears from the fact that they often present themselves in strangely distorted forms—the result of popular mispronunciation.]

The doctors of the subsequent period still retained some fluency in the use of Hebrew; but the mass of their teaching preserved in the Gemāra is Aramaic.¹

The language of the Mishna has been described by Geiger, Lehr- und Lesbuch zur Sprache der Mischnah (Breslau, '45); L. Dukes, Die Sprache der Mischna (Esslingen, '46) and Zur rabbinischen Sprachkunde (Vienna, '51); J. H. Weiss, Mishpat L'shōn ham-Mishna (Vienna, '67).

During the Talmudic period nothing was done for the grammatical study of the old language; but there was a traditional pronunciation for the synagogue, and a traditional interpretation of the sacred text. The earliest monument of Jewish interpretation is the Septuagint; but the final form of traditional exegesis is embodied in the Targums or Aramaic paraphrases, especially in the more literal Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, which are often cited by the Talmudic doctors. Many things in the language of the OT were already obscure, and the meaning of words was discussed in the schools, sometimes by the aid of legitimate analogies from living dialects,¹ but more often by fantastic etymological devices such as the Notarikon, or use of analogies from shorthand.

The invention and application of means for preserving the traditional text and indicating the traditional pronunciation are spoken of elsewhere (see WRITING, TEXT).

The old traditional scholarship declined, however, till the tenth century, when a revival of Hebrew study under the influence of Mohammedan learning took place among the Arabic-speaking Jews (Saadia of the Fayyūm, Menahem ben Sarug, etc.).² Then, early in the eleventh century, came the acknowledged fathers of mediæval Jewish philology,—the grammarian Judah surnamed Ḥayyūg, discoverer of the system of trilateral roots,³ and the lexicographer Abulwalīd Merwān ibn Ganāh (Rabbi Jonah), who made excellent use of Arabic analogies as well as of the traditional material.⁴

A succession of able scholars continued their work, of whom the most famous are Abraham ben Meir of Toledo, surnamed Ibn Ezra—also written Aben Ezra—(1092-1167), a man of great originality and freedom of view; Solomon Isaaki of Troyes, called Rashi (i.e., R[ab]bēnu Sh[elōmōh] Y[isḥāki]) and sometimes by error Jarchi—i.e., of Lunel (לִּנֵּל 'luna')—(died 1105), whose writings are a storehouse of traditional lore; and David Kimḥi of Narbonne, called Radak (circa 1200), whose commentaries, grammar, and lexicon exercised an enormous and lasting influence. Our own authorised version bears the stamp of Kimḥi on every page.

In the later Middle Ages Jewish learning was cramped by a narrow Talmudical orthodoxy; but a succession of scholars held their ground till Elias Levita and others of his age transmitted the torch to the Christian universities.

HEBREWS (EPISTLE). The NT writing usually known under the name of the Epistle to the Hebrews,

1. Title. or, less correctly, as the Epistle of Paul the apostle to the Hebrews, bears in the oldest MSS no other title than the words ΠΡΟΣ ΕΒΡΑΙΟΥΣ [so Ti. WH, etc.]. 'To the Hebrews.' This brief heading embraces the whole information as to the origin of the epistle on which Christian tradition is unanimous. Everything else—the authorship, the address, the date—was unknown or disputed in the early church, and continues to form matter of dispute in the present day. As far back as the latter part of the second century, however, the destination of the epistle 'to the Hebrews' [though it cannot be proved for Rome at so early a date] was acknowledged alike in Alexandria, where it was ascribed to Paul, and in Carthage, where it passed by the name of Barnabas; and there is no indication that it ever circulated under another title. At the same time we must not suppose, as has sometimes been supposed, that the author prefixed these words to his original manuscript. The title says no more than that the readers addressed were Christians of Jewish extraction, and this would be no sufficient address for an epistolary writing (1322) directed to a definite circle of readers, a local church or group of churches to whose history repeated reference is made, and with which the author had personal relations (1319, 23). The original address, which according to custom must have stood on the outside of the folded letter, was probably never copied, and the universal prevalence of the present title, which tells no more than can be gathered (as a hypothesis) from the epistle itself, seems to indicate that when the book first passed from local into general circulation its history had already been forgotten.

With this it agrees that the early Roman church,—where the epistle was known about the end of the first century, and where indeed the first traces of the use of it occur (Clement, and Shepherd of Hermas)—had nothing to contribute to the question of authorship and origin except the negative opinion that the book is not by Paul.

Caius and the Muratorian fragment reckon but thirteen epistles of Paul; Hippolytus (like his master Irenæus of Lyons) knew our book and declared that it was not Pauline.

The earliest positive traditions of authorship to which we can point belong to Africa and Egypt, where, as we have already seen, divergent views were current by the end of the second century. 1. The African tradition preserved by Tertullian (De Pudicitia, 20), but certainly not invented by him, ascribes the epistle to Barnabas.

Direct apostolic authority is not therefore claimed for it; but it has the weight due to one who 'learned from and taught with the apostles,' and we are told that it had more currency among the churches than 'that apocryphal shepherd of the adulterers' (the Shepherd of Hermas). This tradition of the African church holds a singularly isolated position. Later writers appear to know it only from Tertullian, and it soon became obsolete, to be revived for a moment after the Reformation by the Scottish theologian Cameron, and then again in our own century by the German critics, among whom at present it is the favourite view [see below, §§ 4, 11].

2. Very different is the history of the Egyptian tradition, which can be traced back as far as a teacher of the Alexandrian Clement, presumably Pantænus (Euseb. Hist. Eccl. 614).

This 'blessed presbyter,' as Clement calls him, sought to explain why Paul did not name himself as usual at the head of the epistle, and found the reason in the modesty of the author, who, in addressing the Hebrews, was going beyond his commission as apostle to the Gentiles. Clement himself takes it for granted that an epistle to the Hebrews must have been written in Hebrew, and supposes that Luke translated it for the Greeks.

Thus far there is no sign that the Pauline authorship was ever questioned in Alexandria, and from the time of Origen the opinion that Paul wrote the epistle became more and more prevalent in the East.

Origen rests on the same tradition, which he refers to 'the ancient men'; but he knows that the tradition is not common to all churches. He feels that the language is un-Pauline, though the admirable thoughts are not second to those of the unquestioned apostolic writings. Thus he is led to the view that the ideas were orally set forth by Paul, but that the language, arrangement, and some features of the exposition are the work of a disciple. According to some, this disciple was Clement of Rome; others [Clement and his school] named Luke; but the truth, says Origen, is known to God alone (Eus. Op. 25, cp 338). It is not surprising that these limitations of the tradition had less influence than the broad fact that Origen accepted the book as of Pauline authority.

In the West this view was still far from established in the fourth century; but it gained ground steadily, and, indeed, the necessity for revising the received view could not be questioned when men began to look at the facts of the case.

Even those who, like Jerome and Augustine, knew the variations of tradition, were unwilling to press an opposite view; and in the fifth century the Pauline authorship was accepted at Rome, and practically throughout Christendom, not to be again disputed till the revival of letters and the rise of a more critical spirit.

It was Erasmus who indicated the imminent change of opinion.

Erasmus brings out with great force the vacillation of tradition and the dissimilarity of the epistle from the style and thoughts of Paul in his concluding annotation on the book. He ventures the conjecture, based on a passage of his favourite Jerome, that Clement of Rome was the real author. Luther (who suggests Apollonius) and Calvin (who thinks of Luke or Clement) followed with the decisive argument that Paul, who lays such stress on the fact that his gospel was not taught to him by man but was by direct revelation (Gal. 111f.), could not have written Heb. 23f. where the author classes himself among those who received the message of salvation from the personal disciples of the Lord on the evidence of the miracles which confirmed their word.

The force of tradition seemed already broken; but the wave of reaction which so soon overwhelmed the freer tendencies of the first reformers, brought back the old view. Protestant orthodoxy again accepted Paul as the author, and dissentient voices were seldom heard till the revival of free biblical criticism in the eighteenth century. As criticism strengthened its arguments, theologians began to learn that the denial of tradition involves no danger to faith, and at the present moment, scarcely any sound scholar will be found to accept Paul as the direct author of the epistle, though such a modified view as was suggested by Origen still claims adherents among the lovers of compromise with tradition.

The arguments against the Alexandrian tradition are in fact conclusive.

It is probably unfair to hamper that tradition with Clement's notion that the book is a translation from the Hebrew. This monstrous hypothesis received its reductio ad absurdum in the attempt of J. H. R. Biesenthal to reconstruct the Hebrew text (Das Trostsprechen des Apostels Paulus an die Hebräer, kritisch wiederhergestellt, etc., '78). Just as little, however, can the Greek be from Paul's pen.

The un-Pauline character of the style, alike in the words used and in the structure of the sentences, strikes every scholar as it struck Origen and Erasmus.

The type of thought is quite unique. The theological ideas are cast in a different mould; and the leading conception of the high-priesthood of Christ, which is no mere occasional thought but a central point in the author's conception of Christianity, finds its nearest analogy not in the Pauline epistles but in John 1719. The Old Testament is cited after the Alexandrian translation more exactly and exclusively than is the custom of Paul, and that even where the Hebrew original is divergent. Nor is this an accidental circumstance. There is every appearance that the author was a Hellenist whose learning did not embrace a knowledge of the Hebrew text, and who derived his metaphysical and allegorical method from the Alexandrian rather than the Palestinian schools.¹

The force of these arguments can be brought out only by the accumulation of a multitude of details too tedious for this place; but the evidence from the few personal indications contained in the epistle is easily grasped and not less powerful.

The argument from 23f., which appeared decisive to Luther and Calvin, has been referred to already (§ 2). Again, we read in 1319 that the writer is absent from the church which he addresses, but hopes to be speedily restored to them. This expression is not to be understood as implying that the epistle was written in prison, for 1323 shows that the author is master of his own movements.²

The plain sense is that the author's home is with the church addressed, but that he is at present absent, and begs their prayers for a speedy return. The external authority of the Alexandrian tradition can have no weight against such difficulties. If that tradition was original and continuous, the long ignorance of the Roman church and the opposite tradition of Africa are inexplicable. No tradition, however, was more likely to arise in circles where the epistle was valued and its origin forgotten. In spite of its divergences from the standard of Pauline authorship, the book has manifest Pauline affinities, and can hardly have originated beyond the Pauline circle, to which it is referred, not only by the author's friendship with Timothy (13²³), but also by many unquestionable echoes of the Pauline theology, and even by distinct allusions to passages in Paul's epistles.¹

Carpov's Sacra Exercitationes in Ep. ad Heb. ex Philone Alexandrino (Helmstadt, 1750). [Von Soden (Handcomm. 4) gives additional instances of dependence on Philo, and proves the literary influence also of the Wisdom of Solomon; cp Plumpré in Expositor, 1st ser. vol. i. ('74).]

² In 1034 the true reading is not 'of me in my bonds,' but 'on them that were in bonds' (οἱς δεσμίους συνελθῆναι). The false reading, which was that of Clement of Alexandria, is probably connected with the tradition that Paul was the author.

In an uncritical age these features might easily suggest Paul as the author of a book which [doubtless, because its Pauline origin was universally believed in Alexandria] took its place in MSS immediately after the recognised epistles of that apostle, and contained nothing in its title to distinguish it from the preceding books with similar headings, 'To the Romans,' 'To the Corinthians,' and the like.² A similar history, as Zahn has pointed out, attaches to the so-called second epistle of Clement to the Corinthians.

When we see that the tradition which names Paul as author does not possess an authentic historical basis, we are necessarily carried on to deny historical authority to the subsidiary conjectures or suggestions. traditions which speak of Luke and Clement of Rome.

The history of the Alexandrian tradition shows that these names were brought in merely to lessen the difficulties attaching to the view that Paul wrote the book exactly as we have it.

The name of Luke seems to be a conjecture of the Alexandrian Clement, for it has no place in the tradition received from his master.

Origen attaches no importance to either name. Some had mentioned one, and some the other; God alone knows the truth. We have no reason to think more highly of these suggestions than Origen did. Indeed, no Protestant scholar now proposes the name of Clement, whose extant epistle to the Corinthians shows his familiarity with the epistle to the Hebrews, and at the same time excludes the idea that he composed it. The name of Luke has still partisans—Deltzsch carefully collected linguistic parallels between our epistle and the Lucan writings (Comm. 57; E.T. 68-70). The arguments of Deltzsch are generally met with the objection that our author must have been a born Jew, which from his standpoint and culture is in the highest degree probable, though not perhaps absolutely certain. In any case we cannot suppose that Luke wrote the epistle on Paul's commission, or that the work is substantially the apostle's; for such a theory takes no account of the strongly-marked individuality of the book in thought and method as well as expression.

The theory that Luke was the independent author of the epistle (Grotius and others) has no right to appeal to antiquity, and must stand entirely on the very inadequate grounds of internal probability afforded by language and style.

If Alexandria fail us, can we suppose that Africa preserved the original tradition? This is a difficult question. The intrinsic objections to authorship by Barnabas are not important.

The so-called 'Epistle of Barnabas' was not written by our author; but then it is admittedly not by Barnabas. The superior elegance of the style of our epistle as compared with that of Paul is not inconsistent with Acts 14¹²; nor is there, as we shall see presently, any real force in the once favourite objection that the ordinances of the temple are described with less accuracy than might be looked for in Barnabas, a Levite and one who had resided in Jerusalem (see below, § 8). On the other hand, it is hard to believe that the correct account of the authorship of our book was preserved only in Africa, and in a tradition so isolated that Tertullian seems to be its only independent witness. How could Africa know this thing and Rome be ignorant? Zahn, who is the latest exponent of the Barnabas hypothesis, argues that in the West, where the so-called epistle of Barnabas was long unknown, there was nothing to suggest the idea of Barnabas as an author; that the true tradition might perish the more readily in other parts of the church after the name of Barnabas had been falsely attached to another epistle dealing with the typology of the ceremonial law; and finally, that the false epistle of Barnabas, which was first so named in Alexandria, may there have carried off the true title of the epistle to the Hebrews after the latter was ascribed to Paul. That is not plausible, and it is more likely that an epistle which calls itself λόγος παρακλήσεως (Heb. 13²²) was ascribed to the υἱὸς παρακλήσεως (Acts 4³⁶) in the same way as Ps. 127 was ascribed to Solomon, 'the beloved of the Lord' (2 Sam. 12²⁴), from the allusion in 127², than that this coincidence of expression affords a confirmation of the Barnabas hypothesis.

¹ An unambiguous proof that our author had read the epistle to the Romans seems to lie in 10³⁰. This is the one OT citation of the epistle which does not follow the LXX (Dt. 32³⁵); but it is word for word from Rom. 12¹⁹. [The proof is not, however, conclusive. Dependence on Romans cannot be shown elsewhere in the epistle, and this particular citation is found exactly as it is in Onkelos.] Further signs of dependence on Romans and Corinthians (which require sifting) have been collected by Holtzmann (Einl. 332); see also Hilgenfeld's Zt. 94^f.

² The place of the epistle in MSS varies. The order of EV is that of the Latin Church, the oldest Greek codices placing it before the pastoral epistles. The Latin order, which expresses the original uncertainty of the Pauline tradition, was formerly current even in the East.

In short, the whole tradition as to the epistle is too uncertain to offer much support to any theory of authorship, and if the name of Barnabas is to be accepted, it must stand mainly on internal evidence. See further below, § 11.

5. Original readers:¹ Being thus thrown back on what the epistle itself can tell us, we must look at the first readers, with whom, as we have already seen, the author stood in very close relations.

Until comparatively recently there was a general agreement among scholars that the church addressed was composed of Hebrews, or Christians of Jewish birth. We are not, however, entitled to take this simply on the authority of the title, which is hardly more than a reflection of the impression produced on an early copyist—an impression the justice of which is now seen to be more than doubtful. It is plain, indeed, that the writer is at one with his readers in approaching all Christian truth through the OT.

He and they alike are accustomed to regard Christianity as a continuous development of Judaism, in which the benefits of Christ's death belong to the ancient people of God and supply the shortcomings of the old dispensation (4⁹ 9¹⁵ 13¹²). With all the weight that is laid on the superiority of Christianity, the religion of finality, over Mosaism, the dispensation which brought nothing to its goal, the sphere of the two dispensations is throughout treated as identical.

This, however, is no less the position of Paul and of Acts. Not only Jews by birth, but Gentiles also, are reckoned as belonging to the people of God, children of Abraham, heirs of the promise, as soon as they become believers in Christ.

The OT is the hook of this the true people of God; it is the original record of the promises which have been fulfilled to it in Christ; and the institutions of the Old Covenant equally with the histories of the ancient people are types for Christian times.

The difference between Paul and the author of our epistle is only one of temperament. With respect to the two stages, Paul brings into bolder prominence the differences, the incompatibilities, which render compromise impossible, and compel a man either to abide in the one or to make the decisive forward step to the other. Our author, on the other hand, lays stress rather on their common features, with the object of pointing out the advance they show from the imperfect to the perfect. Moreover, as an Alexandrian, he is bolder in the freedom, rendered possible by the allegorising method, with which he adapts OT prescriptions to NT times. In the same degree in which our author comes behind Paul in originality and force of character does he rely in a more academic and thoroughgoing manner on the absolute and supreme authority of the OT for Gentile Christians also.

The whole tendency of the epistle, however, is against the theory that it was originally addressed to Jewish Christians. That the readers were in

6. Not Jewish Christian. no danger of relapsing into participation in the Jewish sacrifices, that the tenor of the epistle in like manner forbids the assumption that they had consistently followed the ceremonial observances that had their centre in the temple ritual, has been shown conclusively by the original author of the present article. Nowhere is any warning raised against taking part in the worship of the temple, against the retention of circumcision, or against separation from those who are not Jews. Nor could any such warning be necessary in the case of readers who so plainly were at one with the author of the epistle with regard to the Alexandrian allegorizing methods. Robertson Smith concedes that at least their ritualism seems to have been rather theoretical than practical, and goes on to say—and with truth—that among men of this type (of the Hellenistic Diaspora and of such a habit of thought as enabled them readily to sympathise with the typological method of our author) there was no great danger of a relapse into practical ceremonialism. They would rather be akin to the school of Judaism characterised by Philo (De Migr. Abr. 16, ed. Mangey, 1450), who neglected the observance of the ceremonial laws because they took them as symbols of ideal things.

Over and above all this, however, we learn quite clearly from the admonitions of the letter itself, what were the dangers that threatened its readers.

Its theoretical expositions constantly end in exhortations to hold fast to the end their confession, their confidence, the firm convictions with which they had begun their Christian life, to draw near with boldness to the throne of grace in full assurance of faith, to serve God acceptably, earnestly to seek an entrance into rest, and so forth. On the usual assumption that the readers were Jewish Christians who were in danger of going back to Judaism, these are precisely the objects which they would have hoped to realise by taking this step. The exhortations expressed in such terms as these would not have been appropriate to their case.

Still more does this hold good of the negative precepts of the epistle. Assuming that they had thoughts of returning to Judaism, how could they have felt themselves touched by a warning not to depart from the living God (3 12), not to reject 'him that is from heaven' (τὸν ἀπ' οὐρανοῦ, 12 25), not to despise so great salvation (2 3), not to sin willingly (10 26), not to tread under foot the Son of God, not to reckon the blood of the covenant an unholy thing, not to do despite to the spirit of grace (10 29)? How could they be expostulated with as if their proposed action proceeded from ἀπειθεία (3 18 4 11), or from an evil heart of unbelief (3 12), or as if they were being hardened in the deceitfulness of sin (3 13), or in danger from regard to outward show, and from clinging sin (12 1)? How could the OT (Dt. 29 18 [17]) figure of the root of bitterness (12 15), or, still more, that of Esau (12 16), appeal to them?

Such expressions as these can refer only to an open apostasy from Christianity out of very unworthy motives, and if applied to a proposed return to Judaism on religious motives working upon a pious but unenlightened conscience would be harsh, unreasonable, and tactless. The reproaches would seem so unjust to the person addressed as to lose all their force.

Further, the remonstrance in 6 1 f. would even be absolutely meaningless, for the points there named are for the most part positions that are common to Jews and Christians, and none of them touches upon what is distinctive of Christianity as contrasted with Judaism.

Nowhere does our author speak a word of warning against participation in heathen sacrifices. As causes of the apostasy that is feared, no prominence is given nor indeed is any mention made of any inclination to legalism. Indeed it was the exact opposite of this that was the temptation of the Israelites in the wilderness with whom the readers are compared (3 1-4 13). Apart from the references to moral infirmity in 12 13, the only positive fault that the author mentions in connection with the lesson drawn from his doctrine to use with diligence the specifically Christian way of access to God (10 19 f.) is a disposition to neglect the privileges of social worship (10 25). This, again, is plainly connected, not with an inclination to return to the synagogue, but with a relaxation of the zeal and patience of the first days of their Christian profession (6 4 f. 10 32 f. 12 1 f.), associated with a less firm hold than they once had of the essentials of Christian faith, a less clear vision of the heavenly hope of their calling (3 12 4 11 5 12).

The writer fears lest his readers fall away not merely from the higher standpoint of Christianity into Judaising practices, but from all faith in God and judgment and immortality (3 12 6 1 f.).

What, in fact, threatens to alienate the readers of the epistle from Christianity is the character of the outward circumstances in which they are placed. In this their case resembles that of Israel in the wilderness. This comes clearly into view in the second part of the epistle, in which the theological arguments are practically applied.

At the very outset of this second part (10 32-34) we learn that the readers have been passing through sore persecutions. How long these have lasted is not said; but the present attitude of the readers is different from what it had been. Once they had kept steadfast; but now their endurance threatens to give way; they are in danger of casting away their confidence. In chap. 11 they are pointed to the examples of a faith that triumphed over every obstacle, and exhorted to a similar conflict, even unto blood, inasmuch as Jesus has gone before them as the beginner and ender of faith (12 1 f.). The writer grants that their circumstances are such as may well make hands listless and knees feeble and souls weary and faint (12 3 12 f. 6 12); but the proper course is to take all this as παίδεια (12 4-11), to remember the persecuted and imprisoned with true fellow-feeling (13 3), to find strength in recalling the memory of their departed teachers (13 7), to go forth ἐξω τῆς παρεμβολῆς—i. e., in the allegorising style of the epistle, to quit the world (see below)—with Jesus, hearing his reproach (13 13).

Now it is quite true that troubles of the kind indicated might very well tend to tempt back to Judaism those who, originally Jews, had experienced on account of their Christianity persecution that contrasted with the religious freedom they had enjoyed as Jews. In that case, however, their Jewish character would certainly have appeared otherwise also—which, as we have seen, is not the case—or the theoretical ground-work on which the hortatory part proceeds must have aimed at depreciating the Jewish religion and bringing it into irreconcilable antithesis to the Christian. This is certainly not the tenor of chaps. 1-10. On the contrary, the close connection of Christianity with the old Covenant, and the high significance of the latter, is elaborated in every way; it is so at the very outset (1 1), and again in 2 2 3 2-6 and elsewhere.

The argument in chaps. 7-10 is not intended to prove the abrogation of the law; it assumes it and proceeds upon it as an acknowledged fact. The elaborate description of the OT sacrificial system in 8 1-5 9 1-10 10 1-3 is at no point accompanied with a warning against participation in it. The author draws conclusions as to the glory of the new covenant from the significant ordinances of the old, which are regarded as shadows of the other; but his argumentation has not for its aim the desire to detach the readers from Judaism any more than has Philo's manner of proving from the OT the truth of his philosophy and ethics, which he regards as constituting its kernel.

The author knows no better way to prove the truth of Christianity than simply by showing that it is in every respect the complete fulfilment of all that was prefigured and promised in the OT, the record of the pre-Christian revelation of God.

This manner of using the OT in argument must not, however, be held to imply on the part of the readers a previous acquaintance with the OT, such as would have been possible only in the case of Jews. A similar line of argument is addressed in Gal. 3 f. 2 Cor. 3 10 f. to the Pauline, and admittedly Gentile, Christian communities of Galatia and Corinth; Philo also, addressing pagan readers, takes all his proofs from the OT.

The view that those originally addressed in the epistle were Jewish Christians, although supported by the ancient tradition implied in its superscription, must thus be given up. With this, the difficult problem of finding a local habitation for such a community disappears.

The following are the hypotheses as to the place of abode of the readers of the epistle that have been offered.

7. At Jerusalem? 1. To some writers the emphatic 'all' in 13 24, the admonitions in 10 25 13 17, have suggested the possibility that the Hebrews addressed were but part, a somewhat discontented part, of a larger community in which Gentile elements had a considerable place. This appears a strained conclusion (Phil. 4 21 1 Thes. 5 26), distinctly contrary to the general tone of the epistle, which moves altogether outside of the antithesis between Jewish and Gentile Christianity. We must think not of a party but of a church, and such a church can be sought only in Palestine, or in one of the great centres of the Jewish dispersion.

That the epistle was addressed to Palestine, or more specifically to Jerusalem, has been a prevalent opinion from the time of Clement of Alexandria, mainly because it was assumed that the word Hebrews must naturally mean Jews whose mother-tongue was Aramaic. The term has this restricted sense, however, only when put in contrast to Hellenists. In itself, according to ordinary usage, it simply denotes Jews by race, and in Christian writings especially Jewish Christians.

There are several things in the epistle that seem to exclude Palestine, and above all Jerusalem. The Hellenistic culture of the writer and the language in which he writes furnish one argument. Then the most marked proof of Christian love and zeal in the church addressed was that they had ever been assiduous in ministering to the saints (610). This expression may conceivably have a general sense (1 Cor. 1615?); but it is far more likely that it has the specific meaning which it generally bears in the NT—viz., the collection of alms for the church in Jerusalem.

At any rate it was clearly understood in the first age of Christianity that the Judæan church took alms and did not give them, receiving in temporal things an acknowledgment for the spiritual things they had imparted (Rom. 1527). In fact, the great weight laid in the epistles of Paul on this—the only manifestation of the catholicity of the church then possible (Gal. 210)—alone explains the emphasis with which our author cites this one proof of Christian feeling.

Again, the expressions in 23 already referred to imply that the readers did not include in their number direct disciples of Jesus, but had been brought to Christ by the words and miracles of apostolic missionaries now dead (137).

This conversion, as it appears from 1032, was a thing of precise date immediately followed by persecution (note the aorists φωτισθέντες—ὑπεμείνατε). Accordingly we cannot suppose those addressed to represent a second generation in the Palestinian Church; we are referred to some part of the Diaspora.

Against these difficulties—which have led some of the defenders of the Palestinian address, as Grimm (who, in Hilgenfeld's Zeitschr., '70, proposes Jamnia) and Moulton (New Testament Commentary for English Readers, vol. iii., '79), to give up Jerusalem altogether, whilst others, as Riehm, suppose that the Hellenists of Jerusalem (Acts 61) are primarily addressed [and B. Weiss thinks of the epistle as having been a circular to Palestine generally]—it is commonly urged that the readers are exposed to peculiar danger from the persecutions and solicitations of unbelieving Jews, that they are in danger of relapsing into participation in the Jewish sacrifices, or even that they appear to have never ceased to follow the ceremonial observances that had their centre in the temple ritual.

The capital argument for this is drawn from 1313, where the exhortation to go forth to Jesus without the camp is taken as an injunction to renounce fellowship with the synagogue and with the ceremonies and ritual of Judaism. This exegesis, however, rests on a false view of the context, which does not include v. 9, and expresses by a figure that Christians (as the priests of the new covenant) have no temporal advantage to expect by their participation in the sacrifice of Christ, but must be content to share his reproach, renouncing this earthly country for the heavenly kingdom (cp 1116 25-27 with 1314 Phil. 320).

Altogether, this view of the situation of the first readers of the epistle appears distorted or exaggerated.

It is obvious that our Hebrews were familiar with the law, and had a high regard for the ordinances of temple worship. In particular it appears that they had not fully understood how the mediatorial functions of the OT were superseded by the mediatorship of Christ. Their ritualism, however, seems to have been rather theoretical than practical. Had they been actually entangled in the daily practice of superseded ordinances, the author, whose insight into the true worth of these ordinances is clear, and whose personal relations to the Pauline circle are obvious, could hardly have been so nearly one of themselves as appears in 1319, and at any rate could not have failed to give an express precept on the subject. On the contrary, he is in thorough sympathy with the type of doctrine on which their church was formed (137); the easy way in which he touches on the 'meats and drinks and divers washings' of Judaism seems to show that on this head he could count on carrying his readers along with him; and 139 hardly refers to sacrifices or to Levitical laws of clean and unclean, but rather to some such form of asceticism (cp 54) as is spoken of in Rom. 14 [or, still more probably, to the question discussed in 1 Cor. 8-10, about the eating of meat that has been offered to idols].

Nowhere does our author speak a warning against participation in sacrifices; nowhere does he touch on the burning questions that divided the Pharisaic Christians of Jerusalem from the converts of Paul.

2. This accordingly has led other critics to think of one or other of the centres of the Diaspora. Hofmann

8. Alexandria. suggests Antioch; Ewald,¹ Ravenna; but Rome and Alexandria are the places for and against which most has been said. One argument for Alexandria on which great stress has been laid must certainly be dismissed. Wieseler (Untersuchung über den Hebräerbrief, 2 [61]), combining the arguments against a Palestinian address with the impression, which we have seen to be without sufficient foundation, that the readers lived in the neighbourhood of a Jewish temple, seeks them among the Egyptian Jews who frequented the schismatical temple of Leontopolis. See HERES, CITY OF.

Wieseler tries to show that in his description of the temple and the functions of the high priests our author diverges from the Judæan pattern and follows peculiarities of the Egyptian temple. This argument, however, rests on a series of improbable assumptions. The supposed peculiarities of Onias's temple are proved by arbitrary exegesis from passages of Philo, who apparently never thought of that temple at all. Nor can it be shown that it had ever such a reputation as to play the part which Wieseler assigns to it.

Moreover, our author's supposed ignorance of the Jerusalem ritual is not made out.

In the true text of 1011 the high priest is not mentioned, and in 727 the phrase καθ' ἡμέραν does not mean 'daily,' but 'on every appointed day,' that is, ever again and again.

It is more difficult to understand why in 94 the golden θυμιατήριον, that is, the censer or incense-altar,—for the usage of the word does not determine which is meant,—is assigned to the Holy of Holies. A passage from the almost contemporary Apocalypse of Baruch (67, see ed. Charles, p. 168), however, to which Harnack has directed attention (St. Kr., 76, p. 572f.), similarly connects the censer with the Holy of Holies, and seems to show that our author here proceeds on a current opinion and has not simply made a slip.²

For Alexandria no further arguments can be adduced. The use in chap. 11 of 2 Macc., an Egyptian Apocryphon [and of the Book of Wisdom, perhaps also of Philo's writings], and the general sympathy of the argument with Alexandrian thought, can at best be adduced as proving something with regard to the writer, but not with regard to the readers. Against Alexandria, on the other hand, is the whole history of the epistle. It was in Rome that it first became known; in Alexandria, when evidence of its presence there becomes forthcoming during the last third of the second century, men have ceased to be aware that Paul is not its author. If, however, the original recipients of the epistle were not Jewish Christians (above, § 5f.) there is no need to think of Alexandria, which presented itself to men's minds only in the search for a place where a community of Jewish Christians might be conceived to have existed.

Among Continental scholars the disposition at present is to favour the Roman address.

It is true that as long as the Jewish character of the addressees is maintained there is a great deal to be said against regarding Rome as their home.

9. Probably Rome. In that case one must, to begin with, assume that, even in the post-Pauline period, either the Roman church consisted mainly of believers who had been born Jews (which even for the Pauline period is justly called in question by the most recent investigators), or that, assuming the Roman church to have been a mixed one, the letter was originally directed to a Jewish section of the Roman Christians. This is not quite plausible, especially since we find in the epistle no trace of the division of parties alluded to by Paul in his epistle from Rome to the Pbilippians.

As soon, however, as the Gentile character of the addressees is conceded, everything else fits admirably with the assumption that the epistle was directed to

² The Syriac word in Baruch is Pirmā. To the passages cited by Harnack to establish for this word the sense of censer, not incense altar, may be added Bar Ali, ed. Hoffmann, No. 2578; Barhebr. Chron. Eccl. 507; Ezek. 811 (Pesh. and Syr. Hex.).

Rome, where it was read as early as in the days of Clem. Rom. The salutation by 'those of Italy' (οἱ ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰταλίας: 13²⁴) permits the inference that not only the entourage of the writer, but also the readers, had some relations with Italy. As the writer, as well as 'those of Italy,' is away from his own home, it is not too much to infer that both are in the same case—that both the writer and those who join in the salutation have their home in Italy. The Roman church had, as presupposed of the readers here, received the gospel through intermediary persons. From the beginning also it had had to suffer persecution. The atrocities of Nero had been confined to Rome. Chap. 13⁷ could apply very specially to Peter and Paul. If it be thought that the same episode is referred to in 10³³, the word θεατριζόμενοι ('made a gazing-stock') would be intended to be taken literally. 1 Cor. 4⁹, however, leaves room also for a less literal meaning. There is much to be said for the view that there were two persecutions, in the midst of the second of which the readers at present are, although as yet there has been no actual shedding of blood (cp Von Soden, Hebr. vi.).

On this assumption we should have to think, if Rome be the place, of the reign of Domitian (others suggest that of Trajan). The many coincidences between our epistle and that to the Romans are explained most easily in this way. That Hippolytus no longer has any knowledge about the author of the letter is no objection to the view at present being set forth. The address of the epistle was doubtless lost soon after it had been received. It would not take long for the name of the writer also to drop into oblivion, especially when the church was passing through such troublous times. It is impossible to tell whether the writer's hope of one day revisiting the afflicted church was ever realised.

It has generally been argued that the epistle to the Hebrews, which describes the temple services in the

10. Date. present tense, must necessarily have been written before they ceased to be performed. It has been shown in the most conclusive manner, however, from the similar use of the present tense in Rabbinical writers as well as in Josephus and elsewhere, that this argument goes for nothing—especially as our Alexandrian theologian is dealing, not with external facts, but with truths which continue valid whether the temple be standing or not—and the most recent writers, since Holtzmann's discussion of the subject in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexikon, 2623 f., generally admit that the epistle may have been written after the fall of the temple. If this be so it can hardly be questioned that the most natural view of the apostle's argument, as it comes to a point in such passages as 8¹³ 9⁹, is that the disappearance of the obsolete ritual of the old covenant is no blow to Christian faith, because in Christ ascended into glory the Church possesses in heavenly verity all that the old ritual presented in mere earthly symbol. It was the ruin of the Jewish state and worship that compelled Christianity to find what is offered in our epistle—a theory of the disappearance of the old dispensation in the new.

For attempts to determine the date of the epistle more precisely, see the close of the preceding section.

The author shows himself fully aware of the intellectual movements of the Christianity of his time

11. Literary and theological character. (so far as these are known to us). He is acquainted with the theology, and with some of the letters, of Paul; he shares Paul's view that the followers of Christ are the people of God, the true successors of the people Israel, but freed from all the external ordinances imposed upon the latter in the OT. Within the Christian community he recognises no distinction between Jew and Gentile. The whole problem as to these distinctions has for him disappeared. In seeking to arrive at an intelligent view of the Christian redemption, and at a right appreciation of the relation of the New Covenant to the Old, from which it proceeded and in which it passed through its initial stages, he follows a path entirely his own, and shows himself to be an original thinker in no way dependent on Paul. 1 Peter, Ephesians, and the writings of 'Luke' show closer affinities with his epistle. Their authors seem all to have been influenced by him; or at least they move in the same sphere—a region of thought which he alone, however, has systematically surveyed and is able to set forth with classical exactness. The movement of primitive Christianity which finds its highest expression in the Fourth Gospel and 1 John is only the ripest fruit of a growth to the maturing of which his way of looking at things contributed most, next to Paul. The epistle of Clement of Rome shows his dominating influence no less, though in a much more mechanical way; the one is the shadow of the other.

The author is the most 'cultured' of all the primitive Christian writers, with the possible exception of 'Luke.' He has a rich vocabulary at his command, and uses it with great skill. His epistle is full of rhetoric, and has the character of an urgent address more than of a letter. Cp EPISTOLARY LITERATURE.

The epistle is constructed in accordance with the rules of the later Greek rhetoric: 11-4¹³, προοίμιον πρὸς εὐνοίαν with statement of the πρόθεσις; 4¹⁴-6²⁰, διήγησις πρὸς πιθανότητα; 7¹-10¹⁸, ἀπόδειξις πρὸς πειθῶ; 10¹⁹-13²¹ ἐπιλόγιος, deducing the practical conclusions and pressing them home.

The writer is master of the Greek OT, down to minute details, and has thoughtfully and intelligently considered the Jewish ritual system. He is acquainted with Hellenistic literature (Wisdom of Solomon; cp § 3, n. 1) and, whether as a diligent disciple or as an independent intellectual kinsman of Philo, understands the Alexandrian method of spiritualising literal facts and appreciating their significance. His main interest, however, is in religion, not in mere speculation, although in immediacy of experience and in spiritual depth he cannot compare with Paul.

Although we may not know his name, we have what is better, a piece of spiritual self-portraiture by his own hand—one of the most precious possessions of Christendom, a picture full of character, clearly and finely drawn. Perhaps the eye of Luther was not mistaken in reading the signature as that of Apollos; all that we know of Apollos—his origin, his individuality, his relation to Paul—admirably agrees with the self-portraiture of this anonymous writer.

This Apollos—or whoever he may be—was the leader of those Alexandrian thinkers whose vocation it was to present Christianity in such a form as would admit of its being appropriated by the ancient world of culture, but who at the same time, as the process went on, exceeding their vocation, so involved the simple religious kernel in speculations that interest was more and more concentrated on this until at last—must it be said?—the kernel was lost sight of and disappeared. For this last result, however, Apollos cannot be held responsible; on the contrary, in universal history he has the noble distinction of having been the first to lead Alexandria to Bethlehem.

A full account of the older literature will be found in Delitzsch's Commentary; and in the great work of Bleek (Der Brief an die Hebräer erläutert durch Einleitung, Uebersetzung, und fortlaufenden

12. Literature. Commentar: Abt. I., Versuch einer vollständigen Einleitung, Berlin, '28; Abt. II., Uebersetzung und Commentar, '36, '40, which has formed the basis for all subsequent work on the epistle, and is an indispensable storehouse of material for the student. Bleek's ultimate views on the exposition of the book may be gathered from the briefer posthumous work edited by Windrath (Elberfeld, '68). To the recent commentaries cited in the course of the article may be added those of Ebrard ('50; ET, Edinburgh, '53); Tholuck⁽⁸⁾ ('50, ET, Edinburgh, '42); Lünemann⁽⁸⁾ (Göttingen, '67); H. Kurtz (Mitau, '69); B. Weiss in Meyer's Comm.; Westcott⁽²⁾ ('92); A. B. Davidson ('82). For the doctrine of the epistle the most elaborate work is Riehm's very useful Lehrbegriff des Hebräerbriefs (Ludwigsburg, '58-'59); with which, in addition to the general works on NT theology by Weiss, Reuss, Beyschlag, Stevens, and others, the reader may compare Ritschl's Entstehung der Altkatholischen Kirche (2), 159 f. (Bonn, '57), Pfeiderer's Paulinismus, chap. 9 (Leipzig, '73, '90), Urchristentum (Berlin, (2), '87), and (for the latest advocate of Barnabas) Ayles, Destination, Date, and Authorship of the Ep. to the Hebrews (99). An excellent summary of the present state of the critical questions bearing on the epistle is given by Zahn in the art. 'Hebräerbrief' in PRE (8). W. R. S.—H. v. S.

[Harnack ('Probabilia ü. die Adresse u. den Verfasser des H.-briefs', ZNTW 116 f. [1900]) accepts the results of Zahn (Eint. 2110 ff.) as decisive, viz. that the epistle was addressed to a small circle of Christians (a Hausgemeinde) within a large and complex Christian community—the Roman—and most ingeniously argues that the author of the epistle was Prisca, the wife of Aquila. See PRISCA.]

HEBRON (הַבְּרִית, 'league' [BDB], χεβρων [BAL]), one of the oldest and most important cities of S. Judah, supposed to have been founded seven years before Tanis (Nu. 13.22, see ZOLAN),¹ is the mod. el-Halil (see below), situated about midway between Beer-sheba and Jerusalem.

Little is known of the history of Hebron. According to Josh. 15.13 f. it was taken by CALEB [q.v., § 2], who overthrew its three chieftains AHIMAN (1),

1. History. SHESHAN, and TALMAI [1] (see ANAKIM), and changed its name from Kirjath-arba (קִרְיַת אַרְבָּה) to Hebron. This move may probably form part of the 'Calebite' migration from Kadesh in Muṣri to the N., fragmentary notices of which may be discovered in JE (see EXODUS i., § 6; KADESH i., § 3).² Since other clans besides Caleb shared in this move (see JERAHMEEL, KENITES), one is tempted to conjecture that the new name of Kirjath-arba was derived from the confederation of these allies.

On this view the immigrants were of Misrite origin, a supposition which may illuminate some obscure details in the patriarchal legends which centre around Hebron (see MIZRAIM, § 2b). If, too, our interpretation of the genealogy in 1 Ch. 2.34 ff. be correct (see JARHA, SHESHAN), we actually possess a record of a marriage alliance with older inhabitants of the district.

Earlier than this we can scarcely ascend. The identification of Hebron with the Khiber in the lists of Rameses III., suggested by Sayce (RPE 6.32.39, HCM 333, cp 336 f.), is most improbable (cp Moore, Judg. 24 n.), nor are we obliged to connect the name with the Habiri of the Am. Tab., who overran Canaan in the fourteenth century B.C. On the other hand, it is just possible that Kirjath-'Arba' (the earlier name of Hebron) is no other than the Rubate mentioned in the same records.³

Under David Hebron attained considerable prominence. He had already been on friendly terms with its inhabitants (cp 1 S. 30.31), and on his departure from ZIKLAG he made it his royal city and the base of his operations against Jerusalem (2 S. 21.3; see DAVID, § 6). Here he is said to have reigned for seven years, his position being rendered secure by alliances with the surrounding districts (cp DAVID, § 11, col. 1032). The conquest and occupation of Jerusalem gave the opportunity for those who had chafed under David's rule to revolt. Absalom, who had spent some time at the court of his grandfather Talmi⁴ in GESHUR (q.v., 2), made Hebron his centre, and was supported by such prominent S. Judean officers as Ahithophel (cp GILOH) and Amasa. The result of the rebellion is well known, and when—at a later time—another revolt occurred, the whole of this district supported the king (2 S. 20.2; see SHEBA [ii., 1]).⁵

Hebron was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch. 11.10), and ¹ Josephus says (BJ iv. 9.7) that it was founded before Memphis and was 2300 years old.

² Cp Caleb's expedition to Hebron in the oldest account of the story of the spies (Nu. 13); see Bacon, Trip. Trad. Ex. 177 f. Hebron appears, appropriately enough, in the Calebite genealogical lists (1 Ch. 2.42).

³ So Hommel, AHT 231, n. 3; see, however, REHOBOTH. The view that the name Kirjath-arba ('city-four') is derived from the circumstance that four patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Adam) were buried here, or that the town was divided into four quarters—as was formerly the case with the mod. el-Halil (ZDMG 12.487; Baed. (3) 135 speaks of seven quarters)—may be mentioned here.

⁴ The name is identical with that of one of the 'sons of Anak' expelled from Hebron.

⁵ The view adopted above rests upon the belief (a) that 2 S. 13-20 had been heavily redacted; (b) that the rebellion of remained Jewish (cp Neh. 11.25) until it was seized by the Edomites in their movement northwards (see EDOM, § 9). It was recovered again by Judas the Maccabee (1 Macc. 5.65 Jos. Ant. xii. 86). During the great war it was taken by Simon Giorides, but was recaptured and burnt by Cerealis, an officer of Vespasian (Jos. BJ iv. 9.79).

A place of such importance could not be without its traditions, and in the patriarchal representations we

2. Traditions. find it closely connected with the figure of ABRAHAM (q.v., 4 [1.]). His son, however (see ISAAC, § 5, end), belongs rather to the more southerly district, and though the 'vale of Hebron' (עֵקֶב הַבְּרִית) is once associated with Jacob (Gen. 37.14), it is probable that either the text is corrupt (see JOSEPH, ii., § 3, where 'Beeroth' is proposed; cp also EPHRATH, 1), or else 'Hebron' has been inserted by a harmonising redactor.¹ Nor does the cycle of Samson-legends contain any perfectly safe reference to Hebron, for in Judg. 16.3 we should very possibly read SHARUHEN [q.v.]. But what better expression of Hebron's primæval sanctity could there be than Abraham's altar (Gen. 13.18, J), or than the cave of MACHEPELAH [q.v.] where Abraham and Isaac² were said to have been buried; or than the ancient 'oaks' (rather 'oak') connected with the name of MAMRE? Accordingly we find Hebron recognised in the time of David as pre-eminently the holy city of Judah³ (2 S. 5.3 15.7).

Hebron gave its name to a family of Levites (see next art., and cp GENEALOGIES i., § 7 [v.]), and P makes it a city of refuge (Josh. 21.13), and assigns it to the b'ne Aaron (1 Ch. 6.55 [40]). Later generalising tradition believed that Caleb's conquest of Hebron⁴ was due to the initiative of Joshua (Josh. 15.13), or inconsistently made its capture part of a great S. Palestinian campaign in which Joshua took the leading part (Josh. 10.17); see JOSHUA.

From the time of Josephus onwards the traditional tombs of the patriarchs formed the great attraction of Hebron, and the name 'Castle of Abraham'

3. Modern town. from being applied to these structures by an easy transition was applied to the city itself till in the time of the crusades the names of 'Hebron' and 'Castle of Abraham' were used interchangeably. Hence since Abraham is known among the Mohammedans as Halil Allah, 'the friend of God', their name for Hebron is 'the town of the friend of God,' or briefly el-Halil.

The modern town lies low down on the sloping sides of a narrow valley, to the W. of which on the hill Rumeideh lay the ancient Hebron. Still farther to the W. is the traditional 'oak of Abraham' (see MAMRE). To the E. of the hill is the Ain Sara, the probable scene of the murder of Abner (see SIRAH, WELL OF). The environs are very fertile. Vineyards and plantations of fruit-trees, chiefly olive-trees, cover the valleys and arable grounds, and it has therefore been customary to seek for ESHCOL [q.v., 1] in the neighbourhood (for another view see NEGEB). The chief antiquities of the place consist of ruins of ancient walls on the hill Rumeideh, two large reservoirs (Birket el-Kazzazin and B. es-Sultân)—the latter of which has been identified with the pool mentioned in 2 S. 4.12—and the famous Harâm which, tradition states, encloses the grave of Machpelah. On the sites of Hebron see PEFQ, '81, pp. 266-271, and on the contents, etc., of the Harâm see Conder, PEFQ, '82, p. 197=Survey of W. Pal., Memoirs, § 333 f.; cp Tentwork, 2 79-86. S. A. C.

The name is probably Persian; Rödiger compares Ἡγίας, the name of a courtier of Xerxes (Ctesias, Pers. 24).

Marq. Fund. 71, however, noticing that in 2³ Esth. L^a has γαγαιου and in ib. 8 βουγαίος, identifies the name with BIGVAI [q.v.].

In v. 14 (Γαι [BNC^aL^β], Γαιος [N*], Γε [A]), SHAASH-GAZ (שֹׁשַׁנְזַג, susagazi [Vg.], sangaisgīr [Pesh.]), the keeper of the concubines (שְׁמֵרַת הַנְּשִׂים), would appear to be a different personage, although עֶבְרוֹן reads γαι[os], thus identifying him with Hegai.

HELAM (הֵלַם); in v. 17 הֵלַם, κλεμ [B]; αλλαμ [BA] of which χαλαμακ [B], χαλαδαμα [L], inserted in v. 16 after τοῦ ποταμοῦ, are misplaced variants,² a place 'beyond the river' (i.e., W. of the Euphrates), near which the Syrians under Hadadezer are said to have been defeated by David (2 S. 10^{16 f.}); χαλαδαμα [L]; probably Aleppo, the Ḥalman of the Assyrian inscriptions. ☉ seems to have read the name in Ezek. 47¹⁶ (η[ε]λαμ [BAQ]), and assuming this to be correct we might infer that Helam lay between the territory of Damascus and that of Hamath, probably not far from SIBRAIM [q.v.], which is mentioned just before. This may have been the view of the translator of ☉ in Ezekiel; but it would be hasty to assume its correctness. The place associated with the traditional defeat of the Syrians (see DAVID, § 8 δ) must have been some famous and ancient city. Such a place was Aleppo, which is mentioned in Egyptian records between 2000 and 1000 B.C., and by Shalmaneser II. (860-824 B.C.), to whom it surrendered without a siege, whereupon Shalmaneser sacrificed to Dadda the god of Ḥalman. (So G. Hoffm., Phön. Inschr. 39; Sayce, *Crit. HELBAH (הֶלְבָּה, 'fat'; cp AHLAB; χεβδα [B], χεβδιαν¹ [A], ελβα [L]), a Canaanite town within the nominal territory of Asher (Judg. 13^r, and Josh. 19²⁵ emended text, see HALI). Schrader (KAT, ad loc.; cp KB 290^{f.}) and Delitzsch (Par. 284) compare the Maḥalliba of the Prism inscription of Sennacherib, and, with Moore, we cannot doubt that they are right. Maḥalliba is a Phœnician town mentioned with Sidon, Bit-zitti, Sarpitu, Ušu, Akzibi, and Akko, and, to judge from the order of the names, must have lain between Sarpitu (Zarephath) and Ušu (see HOSAH). If we may assume that AHLAB (q.v.) and Helbah are variations of the same name, this Assyrian inscription gives us reason to think that Helbah is nearer the correct form than Ahlab. T. K. C.

HELBON (הֶלְבֹּן, χεβων [BQ], χεβρων [A]), the wine of which is noticed by Ezekiel (27¹⁸) as one of the articles exported from Damascus to Tyre, is surely the present Ḥalbūn 13 m. NNW. of Damascus in the E. offshoots of Antilibanus. Ḥalbūn, whose antiquity is indicated by the Greek inscriptions found in it, lies at the top of the fertile wādy of the same name, the upper end of which not only bears the marks of ancient vineyard terraces, but also still has the vine as its staple produce, and is famed for producing the best grapes in the country (Porter, Five Years in Damascus, 1 323^{f.}). An inscription of Nebuchadrezzar (IR. 65, cp JAVAN, § 1 g) speaks of the dedication of wine from '(the country of) Ḥi-i-bu-nim' and another Assyrian list of wines (II. R. 44) includes the wine of Ḥil-bu-nu.

Strabo (15 735) describes the Syrian wine from Halubōn, οἶνον ἐκ Συρίας τὸν Χαλυβώνιον as drunk in the court of Persia. The Χαλυβών of Ptol. v. 16 17 is hardly the same place (see COT 2 121). Cp further ZDPV 8 37, Del. Par. 28^r, Waddington, Inscr. 25, 526. G. A. S.

2. A Babylonian Jew, temp. Zerubbabel (Zech. 6¹⁴, τοῖς ὑπομόνουσιν [BNAQT]), miswritten for HELDAI; cp HELDAI, 2.

HELEPH (הֶלֶף), ΜΟΟΛΑΜ [B], μελεφ [A], μεελεφ [L], a place-name (?) in Naphtali (Josh. 19^{33†}). הלף, however, does not look much like a place-name; hence Ⓞ regards ה as part of the name. The text is corrupt, and Ⓞ suggests the (probable) remedy. הלף (Ⓞ^B read חלף) has arisen out of a dittograph חלףחלף, the letters of which were transposed, and partly corrupted. 'From Heleph' should therefore be omitted, and the derivation of ALPHÆUS (q.v.) from 'the place-name Heleph' abandoned. T. K. C.

HELIODORUS (ἡλιόδωρος [VA]; but in 37 ἡλιόδωρος [V*], and so Ⓞ^B in v. 8, 13, and 5¹⁸). The chancellor (ὁ ἐπί τῶν πραγμάτων) of Seleucus IV., Philopator, whom he murdered, and hoped in vain to succeed (App. Syr. 45; cp Liv. 41²⁴); 2 Macc. 3¹⁻⁴¹. The picturesque story of the horse with the terrible rider dashing into the temple precinct, and trampling the sacrilegious officer of the Syrian king under foot, is well known; Dante in poetry (Purgat. 20¹¹³) and Raphael on the walls of the Vatican have given it fresh life. According to the author of the so-called 4 Macc., who turns the story to account for edification, it was APOLLONIUS (q.v., 1) who attempted to plunder the Jewish temple.

The story may have a historical kernel; Jason of Cyprus was often well informed (see MACCABEES, SECOND, § 3). We know that the priests of Delphi, when their treasures were threatened by Xerxes, knew how to protect them (Herod. 8^{37 ff.}); cp also the story in Paus. 10²³.

That Heliodorus was the 'chancellor' (RV; see 2 Macc. 10¹¹ 13² 3 Macc. 7¹; and cp 1 Macc. 3³² 2 Macc. 3⁷ 13²³; similarly Polyb., Jos.) and not the 'treasurer' (AV χηρμάτων with Cod. 19, etc., for πραγμάτων) is shown by an inscription in which Heliodorus, son of Æschylus, of Antioch, the σύντροφος (or intimate friend, cp MANAEN) of King Seleucus Philopator, is described as ἐπί τῶν πραγμάτων τεταγμένον.

There is also another inscription referring to the same Heliodorus, who is, according to Homolle and Deissmann, the Heliodorus of the Jewish story. If so, Heliodorus deserved a better fate than to be immortalised as a robber of temples. Let us leave the name of the author of the attempted outrage uncertain. See Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 171-75 ('95).

HELKATH (הֶלְקָתָה, 'portion'?) Josh. 19²⁵, ελεκεθ [B], χελκαθ [A], ελ. [L]; or הלקה, ib. 21³¹, χελκαθ [B], θελκαθ [A], χαλ. [L]), once, by a textual error, ΗΥΚΟΚ (הלקה, 1 Ch. 86^o [75], ΙΚΑΚ [B], ΙΑΚ. [A*], ΔΚΩΚ [L]), an unidentified Asherite locality.¹ The name, if correct, is virtually identical with the forms hakarū, hukrua, etc. ('district'), which occur no fewer than eight times in Shishak's list (WMM As. u. Eur. 170 f.).

It is to be noted that Josh. 19²⁵ is the oldest of the three passages cited (Addis), and that it does not describe a boundary, but consists only of a list of towns.² Most probably it should be emended thus: 'And the territory of their inheritance (הַיְרֵחָה) חֶלְקָה, as in v. 41) was Helbah (see HALI), etc.,' unless indeed we suppose the name to be incomplete (cp HELKATH-HAZZURIM). P in Josh. 21³¹ may have had the text before him in a corrupt form. That the Asherite list (19^{24 ff.}) is composite and fragmentary is shown by Addis (Doc. Hex., 1230; cp REHOB II, 2).

S. A. C.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM (הֶלְקָתָה חַזְזוּרִים, ΜΕΡΙΣΤΩΝ ΕΠΙΒΟΥΛΩΝ [BAL]), the scene of the encounter between the men of Joab and Abner (2 S. 2¹⁶). Whatever its meaning may be, Budde (Riv. Sa. 240) and Löhr (Sam. 129, n. 1) plausibly see in v. 14-16 a typical etymologising explanation of a name which has become corrupt and enigmatical. Observe further that the skirmish has no obvious bearing upon the rest of the chapter, since Joab's words in v. 27 refer not hither (as RV^{mg.} suggests), but to v. 26 (cp Driver, ad loc.). It would be unreasonable to assume that Abner's invitation (v. 14) was the sole cause of the fight; a battle would surely have ensued between the contending parties under any circumstances. Moreover, as Budde has observed, v. 17 follows immediately upon v. 13 a, and therefore it is quite possible that the original scene of the skirmish was neither at Gibeon, nor even in its neighbourhood. 'Which is in Gibeon' (וְהָיָה בְּשָׂרָא) (=16 b) may well be a gloss; a later writer knew, of course, that Gibeon was not destitute of pools (see Jer. 41^{12 b}).

With regard to the name, most moderns follow Schleusner, and read הַיְרֵחָה 'n (after Ⓞ, cp Dr., ad loc.). Against this, however, see H. P. Smith, who (with Thienus) points out 'there is no question of plotters or liars-in-wait, but of determined enemies' (cp ἐπιβουλος for γῆ, Est. 7⁶ [nc. a mg.]). It is also possible to read הַיְרֵחָה 'n 'field of the reapers'; or חַזְזוּרִים 'field of the men of Hazor' (or 'nomads'? see HAZOR).³ But in ch. 2 we may plausibly distinguish (a) a fragmentary account of a battle against Abner and all Israel, the scene of which is Gibeon (12, 13 a . . . 17, 28 ff.), and (b) a narrative wherein Abner is supported by Benjamites only (13 b-16, 18-24; cp. 25a, 29a, 31).⁴ Now in (b), v. 24 finds Abner at the hill of Adummim, before the valley of Zeboim (on text, see GIBEAH, § 2[6]). It is therefore conceivable that the 'field of blades' (retaining the MT; cp RV^{mg.}) is connected with Josh. 5^{2 f.},⁵ and that it lay in the neighbourhood of the Gibeah-hā'āra'loth (see GIBEAH, § 21). If so, the vanquished followers of Abner fled from Gilgal along by the ascent of Adummim to their homes in Benjamin. S. A. C.

HELKIAS (χελκιαετασ [BAL]), 1 Esd. 18=2 Ch. 358, HILKIAH.

HELL, an unfortunate and misleading rendering of the Heb. šē'el (שֶׁ'עַל, -on etym. cp Jastrow, Bab.-Ass. Rel. 560; Ⓞ ἄδης cp HADES), for which the RV (partially)⁶ and Amer. Vers. (wholly) substitute SHEOL. In the NT 'hell' renders (1) ἄδης (Mt. 11²³ etc.); (2) the derivative of τάρταρος (2 Pet. 2^{4†} RV^{mg.} TARTARUS), and (3) γένενα (Mt. 5²² etc., see GEHENNA, HINNOM). HELLENISM. The writer of the article GENTILES closes with a reference to the epoch-making declaration of Paul that in Christ 'there is neither Jew nor Greek'

³ v. 16a may imply a reading חֶלְקָה. With respect to the first suggestion above it may be noticed that if חֶלְקָה is Ass. and Aram. rather than Heb., the use of הלקה itself is equally noteworthy (see FIELD, 3).

(Gal. 3:28). How this distinction of 'Jew and Greek' arose, he has himself partly indicated; how far it is an absolute one, has to be considered in the present article.

References to the Greeks are not wholly wanting in the OT. Thus JAVAN (q.v.) is the Heb. term for the Ionians and Greeks generally; in Zechariah and Daniel it even stands for the Græco-Macedonian world-empire.

In Is. 9:12 [11] Ἑβραῖοι speaks of the Syrians of the East and the Greeks of the West as destroyers of Israel; but in the original it is Aram and the Philistines—a fact that shows that the translator lived in the days of the Diadoché when the Greeks were the chief danger for the Jewish people. The μάχαιρα ἑλληνική, too, of Jer. 26(46) 16 27 (50) 16, is due to a misunderstanding of the Hebrew, which is naturally to be ascribed to a period when the thought of the sword of the Greeks was often present to the Jews.

Of the OT Apocrypha, the books of the Maccabees manifest intimate acquaintance with the Greeks.

Thus 1 Macc. begins with the statement that Alexander the Macedonian defeated Darius and reigned over Greece in his stead, while the Macedonian empire is in 1 Macc. 1:10 called βασιλεία Ἑλληνῶν; armies raised by the Syrian king are called Greek in 2 Macc. 13:2, and by Greek cities in 2 Macc. 6:8 are meant Macedonian colonies. With Greece proper, however, the Jews were not unacquainted. We find references to Athenians and Spartans in 2 Macc. 6:1 9:15 1 Macc. 12:14, and a long list of Greek cities in 1 Macc. 15:23; nay, according to 1 Macc. 12:6, Jonathan the Hasmonean greets the Spartans, whose alliance he seeks against the Syrians, as brothers.

The name 'Greeks,' however, now acquires a special sense in the mouth of Jews: the inhabitants of a city

2. Secondary application of name. are distinguished in 2 Macc. 4:36 into Jews and Greeks (cp 11:2 3 Macc. 3:38); Greek is equivalent to anti-Jewish, heathen (2 Macc. 4:10 15 6:9 11 24); and in 2 Macc. 4:13 Hellenism is parallel to ἀλλοφυλισμός (RV 'alien religion'), as summing up all that a Jew could attain only by abandoning the principles of his fathers (2 Macc. 6:24 4 Macc. 18:5).

Hellenism thus no longer denotes what is characteristic of the Greek people or makes use of their language, but what represents heathen as opposed to Jewish religion and morals, and promotes heathen error. The idolatry that confronted the Jews of Palestine and more than ever those of the Diaspora was now always in Greek forms; for the Greek kingdoms of the Diadochi included almost the whole world, and, at least in the cities, had with wonderful rapidity secured for Greek civilisation as well as for the Greek language an unquestioned supremacy; and heathenism was a danger to Israel only in so far as there lay behind it Greek civil power and Greek life. Hence it is natural that it soon became customary, even for those who themselves spoke Greek, to oppose anything as hurtful if only it was Greek, and to identify Greek with anti-Jewish.

In the NT we see completed the development by which 'Greeks' ('Ἕλληνες) was substituted for 'gentiles,' Ἄλλοφύλοι, and mankind was divided, from the most important, the religious, point of view, into Jews and Greeks. The original meaning of the word, however, is not yet quite forgotten.

Ἑλληνιστί, ἐν τῇ ἑλληνικῇ (Acts 21:37 Jn. 19:20 Rev. 9:11, cp. the interpolation in Lk. 23:38) mean simply 'in the Greek language'; and Acts 20:2 makes Paul journey from Macedonia into Greece, thus using 'Greece' in the older sense, whilst Luke himself is no less at home in these matters than the apostle of the Gentiles. When too in Rom. 1:14 Paul calls himself a debtor to Greeks and barbarians, to wise and foolish, he is following a classical usage; and even in Col. 3:11 where to Greek and Jew are added barbarian and Scythian, we seem to have an echo of the same usage (see BARBARIAN).

In Col. 3:11, however, alongside of the antithesis of Greek and Jew, we have that of uncircumcised and Jew, and so we find, almost everywhere in Paul, 'Greek' used as a name for uncircumcised, no doubt representing a terminology already prevailing in the Jewish world.

Even Titus, though a Christian, is reckoned to the Greeks as being uncircumcised (Gal. 2:3, cp. Rom. 1:16 2:10 10:12 1 Cor. 12:12 13). Quite similar is the usage in Acts where the most characteristic passages are 16:13 17:4 18:4; and, as by 'Greek women' in Berea (17:12) we are to understand heathens, so also in the story of the Syrophenician (Mk. 7:26).

Thus in the NT the distinction between 'Jews and Greeks' is used in exactly the same sense as the Jewish distinction between 'heathen and Israelites,' as 'nations' (ἔθνη) and chosen people (λαός) respectively. Cp Wisd. 15:14 f., and many passages in the NT (e.g., Mt. 10:5 Mk.

10:33 Lk. 21:24 Acts 26:23 Rom. 3:29 1 Tim. 3:16 Rev. 16:19). The adjective ἔθνικός, 'heathen' (Mt. 18:17 3 Jn. 7), and Paul's phrase 'live as do the nations' (ἐθνικῶς ζῆτε [Gal. 2:14]), are used to describe a life regardless of the prescriptions of the Jewish law. It is significant, however, for the standpoint of Paul that he uses both 'nations' (ἔθνη) and Greeks ('Ἕλληνες) even of Christians, if they are of heathen origin.

The same man who in 1 Cor. 5:1 treats the ἔθνη as a community separated from his readers by a great gulf, and reminds them in 1 Cor. 12:2 of the time when they ἦν ἐθνη, writes, e.g., to the Roman church, 'I speak to you that are Gentiles' (Rom. 11:13, cp. Gal. 2:12 14 Eph. 3:1). The same man who divides mankind (1 Cor. 10:32) into the three classes, Jews, Greeks, and Christians (church of God), divides the called (1 Cor. 1:24) into Jews and Greeks, an apparent inconsistency that is to be explained in his case only by the fact that for him circumcision and uncircumcision, Jew and Greek, had really ceased to exist alongside of the 'new creature' (Gal. 3:28 5:6 6:15), and it was only by a sort of accommodation to the imperfect conditions of the present that such distinctions could any longer be regarded.

The Fourth Gospel occupies an exceptional position; it never once mentions the ἔθνη, and five times applies the term ἔθνος to the Jews. Thrice indeed it mentions the Ἕλληνες; but in one passage (12:20) they are men who had gone up to the feast of passover at Jerusalem, and in the other (7:35 vs.) not only are they the supposed objects of Jesus' teaching, but in the beginning of the verse 'the Diaspora of the Greeks' are the goal of a tour to be made by him. It is therefore most probable that in this gospel Ἕλληνες are Greek-speaking Jews living in Greek cities, called elsewhere Hellenists (cp Acts 6:1). In Acts 9:29 11:20 also Ἕλληνες is a variant for Hellenists.

That to almost all the writers of the Hebrew OT Greek was an unknown language, will hardly be

3. Jews' acquaintance with Greek language. questioned by any one. Daniel is the only book that has adopted one or two Greek words in Aramaic form (3:5 7:10 15; see DANIEL ii., § 11). Even the parts of the OT that are later than

Daniel were still in some cases (such as 1 Macc. Eccus. and Psalms of Sol.) written in Hebrew; though to secure a wider circulation they had, like the already canonised books, to be translated into Greek.

Greek, however, was certainly the common language of the men who wrote 2, 3, and 4 Macc. and Wisd. of Sol. The Jews settled outside of Palestine lost almost completely their original tongue, and used Greek even in religious worship; and the Hellenistic literature that sprang up between 250 B.C. and 100 A.D., which had its most famous representatives in Philo and Josephus, and was in no sense confined to Alexandria and its neighbourhood, is Greek in language, only with a Semitic flavour. (See HISTORICAL LIT., §§ 20 22). Indeed, had not a reaction against the Hellenising tendency begun after the catastrophe of 70 A.D., Hebrew would then perhaps have succumbed to Greek even in Palestine and amongst its theologians. To suppose, however (as, e.g., G. B. Winer supposes, because of Mk. 7:24 Jn. 7:35 12:20), that Jesus used the Greek language is quite out of the question, although as a Galilean, belonging to a province where language was very much mixed, he must have understood some Greek words, and in particular must have been able, like other Palestinians, to read Greek inscriptions on coins (Mt. 22:20 f.). The earliest notes on his history may have been in the Aramaic dialect that he himself used; but none of our four gospels is a translation from Aramaic. Although they make use in part of such translations, they have all been written from the first in Greek, and the author of the Third gospel, as of Acts, may have been a born Greek who knew no Hebrew. The epistles of NT are one and all originally Greek. Biesenthal (Das Trostschreiben des Ap. Paulus an die Hebräer, '76) stands alone in recent times in venturing to deny this in the case of the eminently smoothly written epistle to the Hebrews (cp HEBREWS, § 11). Even the Apocalypse, notwithstanding the abundance of its Hebraistic defects of style, cannot have had a Hebrew original.

The necessary consequence of the employment of the Greek language was that the influence of the Greek spirit and of Greek forms of thought made itself felt. Even parts of the Greek version of the OT marked by gross literalism of rendering do not fail to betray this influence. How much more plainly must it reveal itself in the originally Greek writings of Jewish or Christian origin! Involuntarily the Jews appropriated from the rich vocabulary of the Greek language expressions for conceptions that would always have lain beyond the scope of Hebrew.

There is, e.g., no Hebrew word corresponding to φιλοσοφία, φιλοστοργία and most of the compounds of φίλος; or for σπερμολόγος and δόκιμος; or for ἀθανασία and ἀθάρατία (see IMMORTALITY).

On the other hand, old Greek expressions acquire new significations corresponding to Jewish conceptions such as δικαιοσύνη and πίστις.

This linguistic change, the most important stage of which is reached in Paul, begins with the oldest parts of the LXX (cp J. Freudenthal, Die Fl. Josephus beigelegte Schrift über die Herrschaft der Vernunft (4 Macc.) 26 f. [69]; E. Hatch, Essays in Biblical Greek, '80; A. Deissmann, 'Beitr. z. Sprachgesch. der griechischen Bibel' in Bibelstudien, 55-168 [95]).

The increasing prevalence of the Greek language may be conveniently seen in the abundance of Greek proper names even amongst Jews of Palestine.

In Maccabæan times sprang up the custom of giving Hebrew names a Greek form, Eliakim, e.g., becoming Alkimus (see ALKIMUS, and NAMES, § 86); then we find combinations of a Greek and a Hebrew name as in Saul-Paul; and then, as in the case of at least two of the original apostles, Philip and Andrew, we have pure Greek names. That so authoritative a court as the chief council at Jerusalem was for the Jews, could from about 130 B.C. bear the official name of συνέδριον, only at a later day hebraised into Sanhedrin, is specially significant for the hold that the Greek language had acquired even at the headquarters of Hebrew life.

The spread of the Greek language brought with it a spread of Greek civilization; nay, the latter sometimes led the way. In the OT Apocrypha,

5. Greek civilization. but more fully in the NT, we have abundant evidence how dependent life in all phases was on Greek custom and Greek institutions.

Greek coins such as the talent, mina, and drachma superseded the old Hebrew; even Roman coins like the as, the quadrans, and the denarius meet us in Hellenised forms. Nor is it otherwise in the case of measures of length and capacity, and this also already in the LXX; the chronological system of their Greek neighbours also exerted its influence on the Jews. The latter were well acquainted, too, with the military affairs of the Greeks: mention is made of rams (κρίδες) (2 Macc. 12 15 Ps. Sol. 2 1, alongside of 'engines of war') and spearmen—even δουρφορία (2 Macc. 3 28)—and chiliarchs are not yet displaced by Roman institutions accommodated to Greek usage, such as στέραι for cohort (Acts 10 1 21 31 27 1; cp 2 Macc. 8 23 12 20 22 Judith 14 11). In accordance with Greek tastes we find inns conducted by an inn-keeper (Lk. 10 34 f.), here and there over the country; Greek luxury has invented the side-board of Simon (κυλικίον i.g. κυλλικίον, 1 Macc. 15 32) and the mosquito-net of Holofernes (κωνώτιον, Judith 16 10); and even the humble handkerchief σουδάριον (e.g. Lk. 19 20) reached Palestine through the Greeks. 2 Macc. 4 12 shows how in clothing, too, Greek usage, such as the wearing of broad-brimmed hats (πέτασος), was contending with long-established custom (see CAP). The tympanon, both as musical instrument (Judith 3 7, cp Ex. 15 20 5) and as instrument of torture (2 Macc. 6 19), was of Greek origin, as was the well-known cymbal of 1 Cor. 13 1.

In the description of forcible attempts at Hellenising under Epiphanes (2 Macc. 4; cp 1 Macc. 1 14 4 Macc. 4 20), great indignation is expressed at the founding of a gymnasium and an ephebeion within the holy city (cp CAP). Here the priests betook themselves to dancing in the palæstra and to throwing the discus (see DISCUS), practices almost as abominable in the eyes of the writer as taking part in the Dionysos festival (2 Macc. 6 7) or the games at Tyre, when a sacrifice was offered to Heracles. The NT writers, however, do not show the same sensitiveness. Rev. 7 9 describes the saints in figurative language borrowed from the prize fights of the Greeks, and so Paul is not unwilling to connect Christian ideas with the proceedings on the race-course or in the circus, and to draw his illustrations from such sources.

Nowhere else can he have become acquainted with the prize-runners and boxers whom in 1 Cor. 9 24-27 he sets as patterns for his readers; and the figurative description of the Christian life as a race or a contest, is a special favourite with him (e.g. Gal. 2 25 7 Phil. 1 30 2 16), in which respect later writers have followed his example (Heb. 12 1 2 Tim. 2 5 4 7 1 Tim. 4 10 6 12). Even the sanguinary spectacles of the amphitheatre are so familiar to him that he calls an unusually violent encounter with an Ephesian mob a θηρωμαχείον (1 Cor. 15 32).¹ According to Acts 19 29-31 he was even willing to enter the Ephesian theatre, although to be sure not for artistic gratification. In 1 Cor. 4 9 he declares that his fate has made him a spectacle (θέατρον) for angels and men (cp Heb. 10 33); and in 4 Macc. 6 17 we have the word δράμα similarly used.

There must be deep reasons for the fact that at the very time when Pharisaism was so passionately combating the popular amusements of the Greeks, and when it hardly forgave even its patron Agrippa I. his theatre-building in Berytus, Paul the Christian, brought up in Tarsus and labouring among Greeks, speaks of those amusements, when occasion offers, quite ingenuously as something morally inoffensive. At least it was nowhere necessary in the NT to sound any warning of danger threatening in that direction.

Much more important than all this is the question that remains. What did the Jewish or the Christian writings appropriate from Greek thought?

6. Greek thought in OT. How far have the literature, philosophy, and religion of the Greeks influenced those of the OT or the NT? In the Hebrew parts of the OT this influence must certainly not be rated very high. Only in the case of Κόθελεθ (Eccles.) is the question important.

Cornill, e.g., regards it as certain (Einl. § 42) that the mind of this author, who could but imperfectly combine radical pessimism with his ancestral religious faith, became, as it were, simply intoxicated under the stimulation of Hellenic thought. Wellhausen is more guarded in confining himself (JG(1) 196 n.; (2), 230 n.; (3), 237 n.) to 'undefined and general influences' that may have reached the Preacher from Greek philosophy.

In reality we can no more prove any direct acquaintance on his part with, say, the system of Heraclitus or with Epicureanism (cp Tyler, Plumtree, Pfeleiderer), than with Greek literature generally. Whatever may seem to have a Hellenic ring in his thought or his allusions, such as the individualistic idea of the soul of man, may very well belong to the age in which he lived (cp ECCLESIASTES, § 10).

In the LXX, including the Apocrypha, traces of Greek philosophy are more frequent; but as a rule they are not of such a kind that we should venture to explain them in any other way than in the case of Ecclesiastes. The tendency of the LXX to avoid anthropomorphic expressions (e.g., 'see the salvation of God' for 'see Yahwè,' Is. 38 11; cp Ex. 24 10), the use of the divine name 'existing one' (Jer. 14 13 39 [32] 17; 2 cp Ex. 3 14 5), the mention of the sons of the Titans² and giants (Judith 16 6 [8], the way in which a divine power is spoken of as encompassing the holy place, and God as its ἐπόπτης and βοηθός (2 Macc. 3 38 f.)—such features betray the influence of the philosophic and religious ideas of Hellenism. Anything, however, like real acquaintance with these founded on actual study, we have no right to affirm.

Wisd. Sol. and 4 Macc. are an exception. In the latter this appears in the very opening words.

Notwithstanding that 4 Macc. sings the praises of an imperturbability peculiarly Jewish, the familiarity of the writer with Greek philosophy is everywhere apparent. He knows the Greek cardinal virtues, he makes use of the Stoic phrase 'to live in ἀταραξία' (3 20, μετὰ ἀταραξίας), he actually quotes from a Greek Stoic writer (7 22; see the work of Freudenthal cited above, § 4).

³ The Titans appear also in 5 of 2 S. 5 18 22.

HELLENISM

It is in Wisd. Sol., however, that the Hellenistic colouring becomes most prominent when we compare it with Ecclus. In fact Wisd. Sol. aims at effecting a reconciliation between Greek philosophy and the religious spirit represented in the OT. Just as its conception of the deity and the supplementary conceptions of Wisdom and Logos, almost counting as personifications mediating between God and the world, show Platonic influences; so are its ethics and psychology set forth under the forms of the popular philosophy of the age.

According to 87 wisdom teaches the four cardinal virtues; in place of a creation out of nothing we have the assumption of an original substance; the body is viewed as a prison for the soul, the latter as pre-existent and immortal, life a trust from God—all ideas derived from Hellenism.

Before turning our attention to the NT we must lay emphasis upon the fact that this absorption of Hellenic elements by Jewish thought, even in Palestine, reaches much further than can be shown from writings that could in any sense be called biblical, and that much in the NT and early Christianity can be explained only on this supposition. Those Jews who, from the third century B.C., thought to diffuse Jewish piety by means of Greek verses, whether attributed to Orpheus or to the Sibyl (see APOCALYPTIC, § 86 ff.), or to Hystaspes, combined with prose writers like Philo, to break a way for the freeing of Jewish life and thought from its exclusiveness, and so helped to bring about the conditions necessary for its more complete reformation. The ideas of Satan and demons, of the kingdom of heaven and of the world, of hell and the life of the blest, which lie ready made in the NT, if they naturally rested on a thoroughly Jewish basis, were not without contributions from Greek theology (cp ESCHATOLOGY, and the several articles). So Essenism can be understood only when regarded as a blending of Jewish and Greek ideas (cp ESSENES), and the gnosis of the later Jews, older than Christianity though it was, even surrendered to Hellenism. Accordingly the possibility must, to begin with, be kept in view, that NT writers have been influenced by ideas originating in such ways.

At the present time, however, there is more danger of overestimating than of underestimating the Hellenistic elements in later Judaism and the earliest stages of Christianity. Books, for example, like Winckler's Der Stoicismus eine Wurzel des Christenthums ('78), or M. Friedländer's Zur Entstehungsgeschichte des Christenthums ('94), generalise from certain perfectly just observations in this direction in a most unguarded manner; not a single idea derived from a Greek source can be attributed to Jesus, and it may almost be regarded as the strongest evidence of the trustworthiness of the Synoptic account of him that, in respect of their contents, they too know of no approach to Hellenism. Such parallels to the Synoptic speeches of Jesus as have been hunted out in Greek—or Latin—writers are accidental consonances.

Still more un-Hellenic in both subject and spirit is the Apocalypse of John; yet it is not improbable that the mysterious figure of the dragon pursuing a woman with child (ch. 12) is to be traced ultimately to the Greek myth of the Pythic dragon and the pregnant Leto (see A. Dieterich, Abraxas, 119 f. ['91]).

In the case of Paul, contact with the Greek world unquestionably goes deeper. Socrates the church historian (circa 440) felt justified (316) in crediting the apostle with a knowledge of numerous sayings of the Greek classical writers, relying in so doing on Acts 17:28 1 Cor. 15:33 Tit. 1:12. The metrical form of the passages in question is indeed enough to show that they are drawn from the poetical literature of the Greeks, and as a matter of fact Acts 17:28 has been found in Aratus and the Stoic Cleanthes, Tit. 1:12 in Epimenides and Callimachus, 1 Cor. 15:33 in

HELLENISM

Menander and Euripides. If, however, the Pastoral Epistles are the work of an unknown writer about 100 A.D., Tit. 1:12 proves nothing regarding the culture of Paul; whilst Acts 17 is in no sense a stenographic report of a speech of Paul in Athens; it is the historian that puts it in the mouth of his hero; and that this writer is a Greek of no mean culture, whose memory could have supplied him with still other quotations of like nature, is already clear on other grounds. Hence there remains only 1 Cor. 15:33. Here, however, there is no introductory formula, and it is at least doubtful whether Paul in using the verse knew whence it came; it is not by such means that an acquaintance of Paul with Greek literature can be established. If, according to Acts 17:18 f., Paul discussed in Athens with Epicureans and Stoics, this does not prove that he had read their writings. When, e.g., Ramsay (St. Paul, the Traveller and the Roman Citizen, 237 ff. ['95]) treats the account in Acts 17, of how Paul at Athens forthwith adopted the Socratic method of free discussion in the Agora, and became for the time an Athenian, as evidence that Paul had, at least in part, the same 'education' as those Athenians, this may be too rash a conclusion; what we really have here is the author of Acts showing his own knowledge, his own 'education,' and his own fine historical feeling.

Those go too far on the other side, however, who, like Hausrath (Der Apostel Paulus, 11 ff. ['72]), would deny Paul any influence from the Greek learning that surrounded him at Tarsus from his youth up. We know only that writing presented difficulties for him, not simply or particularly writing in Greek. The absence of real quotations from Greek authors in what he has written, shows not, 'that, apart from the Apocrypha, Paul had never had a Greek book in his hand,' but simply that Christ had become to him all in all, and that he would allow nothing but words of God a place in his heart and on his lips. He may very well have been trained in the Greek schools even if his style 'has little grace to show'; few Jewish Greeks, even when their Greek 'school education' is beyond question (Philo, Josephus), can surpass him in grace or even in power over the language. The fact itself that Paul was acquainted with the OT in the Greek translation of the LXX, and knew much of this version by heart, counts for something here; and the very probable points of contact between him and Philo (e.g., Col. 1:15 f.) permit us to conclude that he had made himself acquainted also with other books written in Greek; he must have had a vernacular knowledge of both Greek and Aramaic, and received both a Jewish and a Greek education.

How far this education, which he certainly after his conversion did not care to extend, wrought as a leaven in the formulation of that magnificent system of thought by which he sought to fuse together Judaism and the Gospel, it is hard to say. His universalism, his cosmopolitanism, his doctrine of freedom, notwithstanding cognate ideas and expressions in Greek literature, need not have been derived thence, or at least may have been only suggested there; they are the outcome of his struggle to effect an adjustment between what he inherited and what he himself experienced.

If, e.g., he mentions and correctly uses allegories and types drawn from names (1 Cor. 10:6 11 Gal. 4:24), although this was a plant that flourished on Greek soil, it was not there that he made its acquaintance, but in his Jewish schools of theology. Other features of resemblance between his ideas and those of Greek philosophers may have reached him through the same channel.

In the main, however, Paul is original, and cannot be understood on any other supposition. The ascetic, unworldly character of his ethic corresponds to the temper of the age he lived in; so also the proneness to the mysterious, and the high estimate of knowledge, and of the intellectual element in religion, is common to him with his whole environment. Hence there remain, as representing the direct influence of Hellenism on his theology, only minor secondary features. The denonination, however, of the good as τὸ καλόν (Rom. 7:18; 2 Cor. 13:7 Gal. 4:18 6:9 1 Thess. 5:21), the emphasis laid on virtue (ἀρετή; Phil. 4:8), the classification of man as pneumatic, psychic, and sarctic, the glorification of the Stoic moderation (αὐτάρκεια; Phil. 4:11); such features are no accidental points of contact between Paul and Greek thought; and the appeal to 'nature itself' and its teachings (1 Cor. 11:14; ep the frequent 'against nature,' or 'according to nature') has a specifically Greek sound. Notwithstanding all this, however, we are never able to detect any traces of direct borrowing from Greek literature. Paul may have acquired what he had through intercourse with Greeks or even through the medium of the Alexandrian religious philosophy (cp, e.g., Lightfoot, 'St. Paul's preparation for the ministry,' in Biblical Essays, 199 ff. [93]; Hicks, 'St. Paul and Hellenism,' in Studia Biblica et Eccles. 4:1-14 [96]).

Nor is there anything essentially different in the case of the NT books that stand closely related to Paul.

10. Remaining parts of NT. We feel that we have moved more out of a Hebrew into a Greek atmosphere in the Pastoral Epistles, in Hebrews—which is beyond doubt dependent both in form and in contents on the Alexandrians (e.g., 1:3 13:14)—and in the Catholic Epistles, the Epistle of James, even if, with Spitta, we should class it with the Jewish writings, must have had for its author a man with a Greek education. It was a born Greek that wrote Acts. If his Hellenic character does not find very marked expression it is merely due to the nature of his work; no pure Jew would have uttered the almost pantheistic-sounding sentence, 'in God we live and move and have our being' (17:28). In the Fourth Gospel, finally, the influence of Greek philosophy is incontestable. Not only is the Logos, which plays so important a part in the prologue (1:1-18), of Greek origin; the gnosticising tendency of John, his enthusiasm for 'the truth' (without genitive), his dualism (God and the world almost treated as absolute antithesis), his predilection for abstractions, compel us to regard the author, Jew by birth as he certainly was, as strongly under the influence of Hellenic ideas. Here again, however, we must leave open the possibility that these Greek elements reached him through the Jewish Alexandrian philosophy; just as little can his Logos theory have originated independently of Philo, as the figure of the Paraclete in chaps. 14-16 (see J. Réville, La doctrine du Logos dans le quatrième Évangile, Paris, '81). Cp JOHN [SON OF ZEBEDEE], § 31.

We must conclude with the following guarded thesis. There is in the circle of ideas in the NT, in addition to

11. Result. what is new, and what is taken over from Judaism, much that is Greek; but whether this is adopted directly from the Greek or borrowed from the Alexandrians, who indeed aimed at a complete fusion of Hellenism and Judaism, is, in the most important cases, not to be determined; and primitive Christianity as a whole stands considerably nearer to the Hebrew world than to the Greek.

HELMET (כֶּבֶט, קֶבֶט, or כֶּבֶת, קֶבֶת). The pronunciation with initial k is sustained by the Aramaic form of the word Kūbā'a. We may perhaps compare the word kubā'ath, 'cup,' Ass. Kabū'tu, Ar. kub'at. Kūba' occurs in 1 S. 17:38 and Ezek. 28:24 (? see G and Cornill), whereas we find כֶּבֶט in 1 S. 17:5 and 59:17 Jer. 46:4 Ezek. 27:10 2 Ch. 26:14. G's equivalent is περικεφαλαία, a designation which is not found in the classical period, but is not infrequent in Polybius.

Helmets made of bronze were worn by distinguished men and leaders in war (as Goliath and David, 1 S. 17:5 38); but we can infer from Jer. 46:4 and 2 Ch. 26:14 that helmets—probably of leather or felt—were worn also by the ordinary warrior. It is impossible to determine the precise material or form, yet it is probable that the helmet of the common Israelite soldier consisted simply of a solid cap adorned perhaps with horse-hair tassels as well as with a prolonged flap or cheek-piece to cover the side of the face or ears. Max Müller (As. u. Eur. 302 ff. 325 ff. 361 ff. 375-378 380 f. 384) gives copious illustrations of the various forms of helmets and caps worn by the Bedouin, Syrian, and Hittite warriors. The Hittite head-gear was mostly a round and flat covering with prolongations at the side and at the back of the head, sometimes surmounted by a tassel. Frequently there is a band tied behind the ear and back of the head and passing round the forehead in front of the cap (see the figures in As. u. Eur. pp. 232, 323); the LXX therefore was guided probably by a right instinct in selecting the term περικεφαλαία as the most apt term to designate a kind of head-gear which covered not only the head but also a portion of the cheek and neck. Probably the kings and nobles, in order to distinguish their persons as leaders, wore a taller covering made of bronze like that of the Egyptian monarchs. Among the Hittites, however, the head-covering of the leaders was often considerably broader at the top than at the base. See As. u. Eur. p. 361.

On the other hand, the helmet worn by the Assyrians and Babylonians was loftier than that which was in vogue among the Syrians and Hittites and was pointed at the summit. There was also a side piece for the protection of the ears (see illustrations, s.v. GRAVES), resembling the φάλαρα, flaps or cheek-pieces (παρὰ-γυαθίδες), of the ancient Greeks.

The Cypriote helmet figured in Warre-Cornish's Concise Dict. of Greek and Roman Antiqq., p. 79, fig. 158, presents a close analogy. For the different forms of Greek helmet the reader is referred to the article 'Arms and Armour' in that work. The Greek helmet presented varieties and complications of detail, as well as adornment in the form of crests, altogether unknown among the plainer and more modest accoutrements of Egypt and Western Asia.

The helmet, like the coat of mail, is metaphorically employed by the writer of Is. 59:17, the helmet designating salvation, an image which is borrowed by Paul (Eph. 6:17 1 Thess. 5:8). Cp TURBAN. o. c. w.

HEMAN (חֶמָן, חֶמָן [BADEL]), b. Seir the Horite (Gen. 36:22), called in 1 Ch. 1:39 HOMAM (חֹמָם, חֶמָן [L]). Probably with ח (cp Vg. HEMAN in Gen.) we should read HEMAN (see below).

HEMAN (חֶמָן, חֶמָן [BAL]), one of the three sons of MAHOL [g.v.] who were renowned for their wisdom, 1 K. 4:31 [5:11] (αιμαν [B], ημαν [A]). The name appears again in 1 Ch. 26 (αιμοναν [B]) among the sons of the Judahite Zerah. The same legendary personage, however, is intended; the clan of Zerah was Edomite before it became Judahite (see Gen. 36:13 17). Possibly (as S. A. Cook suggests) the name 'Heman' may be identified with the Edomite HEMAM (חֶמָם), more probably, however, HEMAN and ETHAN, 2, are both corrupt forms of חֶמָן, TEMAN, one of the oldest districts of Edom, sometimes used poetically as a synonym for Edom. The whole force of the passage (1 K. 4:31) depends on this. See MAHOL.

In post-exilic times Heman, like Ethan, gives his name to one of the guilds of singers (see PSALMS). According to the Chronicler he took part in the dedication of the temple (2 Ch. 5:12, RV; cp 1 Ch. 16:4 f. 25:6 [αιμαρει B]). A levitical genealogy is produced for him; he becomes the grandson of Samuel, and traces his origin to Kohath, son of LEVI (see GENEALOGIES i., § 7 ii. a, iii. c). In this connection it may be remarked that Samuel himself is represented in 1 S. 11 as grandson of Jeroham, a shortened form of JERAHMEEL (g.v., § 3; cp JEROHAM, 1). The double heading of Ps. 88 assigns that psalm first to the sons of Korah and then to Heman (א.θ.α.μ [A]) the Ezrahite. Heman was indeed, according to 1 Ch. 26, a Zarhite (= Ezrahite); but this made him of the tribe of Judah; as a singer he was a Korahite. There is thus a confusion of two representations implied in this heading.

In 1 Ch. 25 4 f. (α.μ.α.ν.ε. [B] once in v. 4) a little section, full of difficulty, is devoted to Heman. He is called the 'king's seer' (just like his ancestor Samuel, but also like Asaph and Jeduthun), and is said to have had fourteen sons and three daughters.¹ The difficulty lies in the words which follow 'the king's seer,' and in the closing names in the list of Heman's sons. These are as follows:—Giddalti, Romamti-ezer, Joshbekashah, Mallothi, Hothir, Mahazioth (י.ש.ב.ק.ש.ה., י.ח.ת.י., י.מ.ז.י.ו.ת., י.מ.ל.ו.ת.י., י.ח.ת.י., י.ה.ו.ת.י.). Ewald² long ago suggested that these names might be so rendered as to form, in combination, a poetical couplet,—'I have given great and majestic help, 'I have spoken in abundance oracles.' One word (י.ש.ב.ק.ש.ה.) he omitted; later scholars have sought to repair his omission by rendering 'to him that sat in distress' (see also NAMES, § 23). The theory was plausible as long as it was supposed that the Chronicler was in the habit of framing uncommon names in the interest of edification. Now, however, that the evidence for this supposition is beginning to break down elsewhere,³ we are bound to be more strict in criticising Ewald's suggestion. It is safe to maintain not only that the rendering is extremely unnatural, but that the clause produced by combining the last four names is execrable Hebrew. This objection cannot be raised against the reading proposed by Kau.⁴ In lieu of 'Hananiah, Hanani, Eliathah,' viz., 'ה.נ.נ.י. ה.נ.נ.י. ה.נ.נ.י. א.ל.י. א.ת.ה.' 'Have pity upon me, O Yahweh, have pity upon me; thou art my God'; still we must ask, How comes such a passage to be introduced just here, even as a marginal note? 'Eliathah' is no doubt an impossible name; but is there no better theory to account for it?

Certainly there is a better one. Joshbekashah (י.ש.ב.ק.ש.ה.) and Mahazioth (מ.ח.ז.י.ו.ת.) are corruptions of the same word, and Mallothi (מ.ל.ו.ת.י.) and Hothir (י.ח.ת.י.) are corrupt fragments of it. Again and again we find different corruptions of the same word side by side, and this is the case here; or rather, there are two words in construction, viz., ב.נ.י. ק.ו.ח. As for Giddalti and Romamti-ezer, the former is miswritten for Gedaliah (ג.ד.ל.י.ה.), the latter for a dittographed Jerimoth (י.ר.י.מ.ו.ת.) and Azar'el (א.ז.ר.א.ל.), a variant to Uzziel in v. 18. Gedaliah was introduced as a correction of the corrupt Eliathah (א.ל.י.א.ת.ה.). 'Hanani' is really a dittographed Hananiah, and is to be omitted. In v. 5 להרים קרן ('to lift up the horn') is miswritten for להפטר בהקני, 'to praise his compassion.' 'All these'—viz., Bukkiah, Mattaniah, Uzziel, Shebuel (Samuel), Jerimoth (Jeroham), Hanani, Gedaliah—were the sons of Heman, the king's seer (who prophesied) with words of God to praise his compassion. God gave to Heman seven (ש.ב.ע.ת.) sons and three daughters.⁵ The seven sons are called, quite correctly, 'sons of Korah' (Joshbekashah, etc.), i.e., members of the Korahite guild. This is a sign that the Chronicler draws here from a Midrashic source (cp 2 Ch. 20 19, and WRS *OZC*², 205, n. 2). T. K. C.

HEMATH, RV Hammath (ח.מ.ת.), μεχμαθ [B], α.μ.α.θ [A], ε.μ.α.θ [L], 'the father of the house of Rechab' (1 Ch. 2 55†). Elsewhere Jonadab is the 'father of the Rechabites, and if any one can dispute this title with him it is Hobab, 'the father-in-law of Moses.'

The Chronicler must have known of Hobab; and if so he must mean Hobab. The easiest solution of the problem is to suppose that ח.מ.ת. is a fragment of ח.ת.ן. ט.ש.ה., 'father-in-law of Moses,' and to see in this an allusion to the phrase in Judg. 1 16. See HOBAB, JONADAB, 2, and on the Kenite connection see RECHABITES, KENITES. In Θ, 1 Ch. 4 12, the ἀνδρες ἠραβ [BL] (MT 'Rechab') appear among the Calebites (pointed out by Meyer, Enl. 147), which seems to agree with the notice in 1 Ch. 2 55. T. K. C.

HENA (ח.נ.א.), an imaginary name which, through a scribe's error, has found its way into the Rabshakeh's message to Hezekiah (2 K. 19 13, ΑΝΕC [B], ΔΙΝΔ [A], -ΔΓ [L]; Is. 37 13, ΑΝΔΓ [BN*OT], ΑΝΔΒ [N^c], ΑΝΔ [A], ΑΝΔC [Q*], ΑΝΔΕ [Q*mg.]).¹ The text stands thus, 'Where is . . . the king of Sepharvaim, of Hena, and Ivvah?' (RV). Underlying this is a witty editorial suggestion that the existence of cities called ח.נ.א. and ח.נ.ב. respectively has passed out of mind (cp Ps. 96 [7]), for ח.נ.א. clearly means 'he has driven away and overturned' (so Tg., Sym.). To look out for names resembling Hena and Ivvah is waste of time. The context further makes it plain that only one city was mentioned. Either ח.נ.א. or ח.נ.ב. must therefore be omitted, and a comparison of 2 K. 17 24 shows that ח.נ.ב. is the superfluous word. Probably ח.נ.א. was miswritten for ח.נ.ב. or rather (see AVVA) ח.נ.ב., 'Gaza.' T. K. C.

HENADAD (ח.נ.ד.ד.), ΗΝΑΔΑΔ [BNA, note confusions of Δ Δ and λ below]). A Levitical name (see below), the peculiarity of which requires notice. The name may be corrupt, and, if so, an easy emendation would be ח.נ.ב. Jonadab, a not unnatural name for a Levite.² Baethgen, however (Beitr. 68, n. 4) and BDB explain as ח.נ.ד.ד., 'favour of Hadad' (so also § 42), cp Ph. *ח.נ.ד.ד.*³ The bearer of the name is a Levite, mentioned as the father of BINNUI [g.v., 3] in list of wall-builders (see NEHEMIAH, § 1 f., EZRA ii., §§ 16 [1], 15d), Neh. 3 18 (ח.נ.ד.ד. α.λ.α.τ. [BN], ναβαδ [L]), v. 24 (ח.נ.ד.δ.β [L]), also as a signatory to the covenant (EZRA i., § 7), Neh. 10 9 [10] (ח.נ.ד.δ.β [B*N]), -α.β [Bb. vid.], ח.נ.ד.δ.α.τ. [A], ח.נ.ד.δ.β [L]). The name occurs once again in the difficult passage Ezra 3 9, on which see Ryle, Camb. Bible, ad loc. (ח.נ.ד.δ [B], ח.נ.ד.δ.β [L]).

In Ezra 3 9 it is best, perhaps, instead of ח.נ.ד.ד. to read ח.נ.ב. *ח.נ.ד.ד.*⁴; the corruption would arise through a misunderstanding of the name Bani (as in Ezra 2 40, etc.), helped by the preceding ח.נ.ד.ד.. As regards Henadad, it is clear that the concluding words are out of place (cp 1 Esd. 5 57 [58], and see MADIABUN), and supported by Neh. 10 9 [10] it may be suggested that ח.נ.ד.ד. was a marginal gloss to Bani which, on being taken into the text, was rounded off by the addition of the words ח.נ.ד.ד. ח.נ.ד.ד. ח.נ.ד.ד. S. passage is plainly corrupt; see ELIPHELET, 2.

2. (οφερ [BAFL]). The founder, or eponym, of a Gileadite clan, who is variously described as the son (Josh. 17:2, JE, οφερ [L]) and as the great-grandson of Manasseh (Nu. 26:32 f. [G 36 f.] 27:1, P). The clan itself is called the Hephherites (הֶפְתָּרִים, ὁ ὄφερ[ε] [BAFL]; Nu. 26:32) or 'sons of Hephher' (Josh. 17:2).

1. The mother of King Manasseh, 2 K. 21:1 (οψεβα [B], αφ.

Hephzibah may be a deliberate distortion of the name Hephzibai, 'delight of baal' (i.e., either of Baal, or of a husband). The Chronicler (2 Ch. 33:1) passes over Manasseh's mother.

2. The symbolical name of restored Zion, Is. 62:4 (θέλημα ἐμὸν [BNAQ]); cp γῆ θελήθη Mal. 3:12). Here, too, the reading חֶפְצִיבָּה seems preferable; Yahwē is the baal or 'husband' who 'delights' in his bride Zion (v. 5; see SBOY).

HERALD appears three times in NT (RVmg.) as the rendering of κηρυξ, for which EV has 'preacher' (1 Ti. 2:7, 2 Ti. 1:11, 2 Pet. 2:5). κηρύσσω means simply 'to proclaim'; see, e.g., Jon. 3:5 (G), Mt. 3:1. See MINISTRY.

In G κηρυξ represents the מְרִיבָּה EV, 'herald,' of Dan. 3:4.
On the probable philological connection of מְרִיבָּה (Dan. 5:29
Aph.; 'made proclamation') with κηρύσσειν (G 87 ἐδούκεν ἄνοιαν), see Bevan on Dan. 5:29; Kau., Gramm. des bibl.

Gen. 41:43 (see ABRECH), Ecclus. 20:15, 4 Macc. 6:4.

HERBS. A rendering of various Hebrew terms.

1. יָרֵב, yārib, 'that which is green,' 'a garden of herbs,' Dt. 11:10, 1 K. 21:2. A dinner (AV, Che., cp Ass. arāhu, 'to eat'; RVmg. 'portion' of herbs) Prov. 15:17.

2. עֵשֶׂב, 'ésēb, 'herbage,' including grasses and cereals, Gen.
1:11, etc.

3 and 4. דָּשֵׁה, dēše, and חֶסֶר, ḥāsir. See GRASS.

5 and 6. אֶרֶב, 'orēb (MH ארובת) 2 K. 4:39 (ἀρωθ [BAL], herbas agrestes). Elisha had just 'come down' to Gilgal in time of famine and sent a man to gather 'orēth, 'herbs' or vegetables for a pottage. The Talmud (1 omā, 18 b) explains
'orēth by the word gargar (גרנין), which means 'colewort' (cruc.). Royle (Kitto's Bib. Cyc., s.v. 'Orth'), indeed, insists that the 'orēth must have been the fruit of some plant for which the so-called 'wild gourds' (EV) might have been mistaken.
This, however, is not at all clear. The man spoken of in the story need not have confined himself to colewort. If he found a cucumber, or what he thought to be such, he would not reject
it. See GOURDS, WILD.

In Is. 26:19 אורח ליל (αυρα [BNAQT]; ros lucis; EV 'dew of herbs'), if correct, means 'dew of lights' (RVmg. 'dew of light'). See DEW, § 2 b. But G suggests אֶרְבָּתִים, 'their healing' (see LIGHT). And in Is. 18:4 AV's rendering of אורח-על-יאר (as על-יאר) 'upon herbs' (ὡς φῶς καύματος μεσημβρίας [BNAQT]; meridiana lux), is generally abandoned; RV gives 'in sunshine.'
But the text probably needs emendation (see VINE).

7. βοτάνη = דָּשֵׁה, dēše, עֵשֶׂב, 'ésēb, in G; 'grass'; Heb. 6:7.
8. λάχανα = דָּק, yārāk, and דָּק, yerek, in G; 'herbs,' Mt.

HERES, THE ASCENT OF Greek name for the Tyrian Melkarth¹ (מֶלְכָרֶת, i.e., מלך קר, king of the city), whence the Greek Melikertes (see Roscher, Lex., s.v.). See BAAL, § 6, HELLENISM,

HERD (הֶרֶד), Ex. 10:9; Herdsman (רֹעֵה), Gen. 13:7.
See CATTLE, §§ 2a, 6.

HERES, CITY OF, EVmg., or, CITY OF DESTRUCTION, EV; עִיר הַהָרְסָה; so MT, Pesh.); or, CITY OF THE SUN, EV second margin עִיר הַהָרְסָה; so Symm., Vg., Talm., Mēnāhōth 1:10 a, Saad.,² and some Heb. MSS), or, 'city of righteousness' עִיר הַצְדָקָה [?], πολιτεία ἀρετῆς [BNAQT]; ἀρετῆς Aq., Theod., may be either הָרָסָה or הָרָסָה (הָרָסָה). The name which was to be given at a future day to one of five cities in Egypt, where Hebrew would be spoken and the Jewish religion practised (Is.
19:18).

Opinion is much divided as to the reading of the name, and as to the date of the section to which the clause containing the name belongs. Some critics (Dillmann, Guthe) even hold that the clause is a later addition to the section; this, however, seems an unnecessary refinement of criticism, suggested by a wish to push the date of the rest of the chapter as high up as possible.
Considering that there is nothing in vs. 18-25 that is decidedly favourable, and much that is adverse, to the authorship of Isaiah, and that the section only becomes fully intelligible in the light of the history of the Greek period, it is best to interpret v. 17 b as the translation of a fact of history into the language of prophecy. The meaning of the verse seems to be that early in the Greek period there were to be in Egypt colonies of Jewish worshippers of Yahwē, among whom the 'language of Canaan' was not exchanged for Greek, and that one of them would be settled in the city of Heres, or (shall we say?) of Hēres. Probably Hēres, not Heres, is the right reading; it is Heliopolis, the city of the Sun-god, that is meant—the city which before the foundation of Alexandria was perhaps best known to the Jews (see ON). The rare word הָרָסָה is preferred to עִיר הַצְדָקָה (contrast Jeremiah's procedure, if 'Beth-shemesh' in Jer. 43:13 is correct). The reading Heres (i.e., destruction) is no doubt an intentional alteration of Hēres (a few MSS even read הָרָסָה = anathema), just as Timnath-heres (Judg. 2:9) is altered into Timnath-serah in Josh. 19:50, 24:30.

G's reading 'city of Zedek' (i.e., 'city of righteousness'), though it is defended by Geiger [Urschr. 79], Bredenk., Guthe, and half accepted by Dillmann, is very improbable, and may seem to have arisen out of a desire for a distinct prediction of the temple of Onias at Leontopolis (see Jos. Ant. xiii. 3:1). צֶדֶק will then mean 'legal correctness' (cp וְכִי צֶדֶק Ps. 51:21); the Oneion was not at first regarded with dislike in Palestine. But G's ἀσέδ [ασε, ἀ-ε] suggests the possibility that -εα is a later addition to ἀσέδ, which perhaps arose through transposition of letters; ασέδ in fact suggests חֶסֶד חֶסֶד הָרָסָה. On the critical questions, see further Che. Intr. Is. p. xxvi 102 f., Kittel's revision of Dillmann's Isaiā (98), and Marti's commentary. To recapitulate fantastic theories which have small claim on consideration would lead the reader away from the main point (on which cp HIGH PLACE, § 9, n.). T. K. C.

HERES, THE ASCENT OF. So RV, in Judg. 8:13, to define the road which Gideon took in returning to Sucoth from the battlefield. RV partly follows certain versions, which read הָרָסָה הָרָסָה for הָרָסָה הָרָסָה (MT). This, however, is not enough; we do not expect a place-name here. הָרָסָה (Symm., Theod.)
would be a slight improvement.

Most probably, however, the true reading is הָרָסָה
'he devoted the host to destruction,'—originally a marginal correction of הָרָסָה הָרָסָה (v. 12, end). הָרָסָה is in fact a weak expression (cp Jos. Ant. v. 65, δειψθερε). For the form of the correction cp 1 K. 53 [423], where the last two words are a correction of a preceding word, see FOWL, FATTED.

Θ's readings are επανωθεν (της παραρυσθως) Apes [B, omitting an accidental repetition], απο αναβασως apes [AL]. Αq. had απο αναβ. του δρυμου (reading הקרשק, Symm. . . . του ορου, Theod. . . . ορου) (see Field with his quotation from Jerome in the note), Vg. ante solis ortum, Tg. קרשק קרשק קרשק, 'before sunrise.'

HERES, MOUNT (הר-הרים). Mentioned with Aijalon and Shaalvim as still occupied by the Amorites, Judg. 134f. Almost certainly הר is a scribe's error for הרעי, so that we should read Ir-heres=IR-SHEMESH. Budde in his commentary overlooks this, but makes the valuable suggestion that Ir-heres, Har-heres (?), and BETH-SHEMESH [g.v., 1] may all be identified with 'Bit-Ninib in the district of Jerusalem' (Am. Tab. 183 14f.). If this be so Θ^B may be right and we can connect Heres with 'the gate Harsith' of Jer. 19.2. We may even go further and suggest as a possibility that הרם was originally vocalised differently and was a Hebrewised form of Uraš, a synonym of the Ass. god Ninib (worshipped at Bit-Ninib), who is primarily the fierce morning sun (see Jensen, Kosmol. 458).

ΘAL (εν τω δρει) του μωραινωνος = ברת-הרים (an anacronism, see MYRTLE); cod. 58 του δρυμωνος (mg. τω δστρακωδει) = ברת-הרים; cp Moore. Θ^B reads τω δστρακωδει (חרם = חרם). Conder mentions the ruins of Ibn Harith in the vale of Aijalon. Cp TIMNATH-HERES. T. K. C.

HERESH (הרש; παρθιηλ [B], απεσ [A], απησ [L]), an Asaphite Levite; 1 Ch. 915f.

The name has no ם prefixed to it; Vg. therefore gives 'carpentarius' (הרש), most improbably. A comparison of Neh. 11 17 (crit. emend.) shows that הרש ונהל (not found in the list in Neh.) should be הרש הנהלה, 'the leader in the song of praise.' The words should have stood after 'Mattaniah . . . son of Asaph.'

HERESY, HERETIC, SECT. 'Heresy' and 'sect' in EV both represent ἀίρεσις.

For 'heresy' in AV see Acts 24 14; for 'heresies,' 1 Cor. 11 19 Gal. 5 20 2 Pet. 2 1. For 'sects,' see Acts 5 17 15 5 24 5 26 5 28 22 and mg. of 1 Cor. 11 19. RV, however, gives 'a sect' in Acts 24 14 (mg. 'heresy'); 'factions' in 1 Cor. 11 19 mg.; 'parties' in Gal. 5 20 mg.; 'sects' in 2 Pet. 2 1 mg. Both AV and RV give 'heretical' for ἀίρεσις in Tit. 3 10; RV mg. 'factious.'

We shall treat ἀίρεσις (heresy) and ἀίρετικός (heretical) here, from a phraseological and exegetical point of view; see further HELLENISM, § 6f.

1. Biblical use ἀίρεσις occurs several times in the OT of ἀίρεσις. LXX (see, e.g., Lev. 22 18 1 Macc. 8 30); ἀίρετικός neither in the LXX nor in classical writers (but see Suicer). In the OT ἀίρεσις means 'free choice'; but in classical literature it has also, in pre-Christian times, the more specialised sense of 'freely chosen opinion.' Thus ἀίρεσις Ἀκαδημαϊκή is equivalent to 'the Platonic philosophy'—i.e., Platonism. Only a short step was needed to designate the holders—in the aggregate—of such an opinion also as a ἀίρεσις, though, of course, without any flavour of censure, merely in the sense of a school or party. It is in this sense of the word that Josephus (. Int. xiii. 59, § 171) describes the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and the Essenes as the three ἀίρεσις of the Jews since the Maccabean period, 'who had different opinions concerning human actions.' Following the same usage, Acts 5 17 speaks of the ἀίρεσις of the Sadducees and 15 5 (26 5) of that of the Pharisees, whilst in 24 5 14 28 22 the word is employed to denote the followers of Christ—this last, it is true, only in the mouths of unbelieving Jews. Wherever in the first century of Christianity, whether in Jerusalem or in Rome, Jewish believers in the Messiah made their appearance, and rallied to their freely chosen ideal with a zeal and a claim of separateness recalling in some respects the manner of the Essenes, they would necessarily appear to their fellow-Jews in the light of a new ἀίρεσις. The accent of superciliousness which we note when Paul's accusers at Caesarea speak of him as a leader of the ἀίρεσις of the Nazarenes does not lie on the word ἀίρεσις but on the genitive τῶν Ναζωραίων, 'of the Nazarenes,' the deluded followers of the false Messiah from despised Galilee (see NAZARETH). If, on the other hand, Paul in Acts 24 14¹ in his answer to Tertullus substitutes the word ὁδός, 'way,' 'doctrine,' 'religion,' for ἀίρεσις, it is not because the latter word is in itself a name of reproach, but because he regards himself as representing, not a new ἀίρεσις—and, therefore, at best, only a portion of the people of God—but the nation of Israel as a whole in so far as it can claim this name.

In the genuine Pauline epistles the word ἀίρεσις is met with twice: in Gal. 5 20, where in the list of the 'works of the flesh' it is enumerated between διχοστασίαι ('divisions') and φθόνοι ('envyings'), and in 1 Cor. 11 19, where it is used as synonymous with σχίσματα. The new religion inscribed on its banner the motto 'All ye are one in Christ Jesus,' and accordingly regarded with the liveliest aversion any breaking-up into narrower circles, and every tendency to give prominence to individual opinions of the school. This spirit had already asserted itself to such an extent that the ἀίρεσις or divergent views, the existence of which to a Greek philosopher would probably have betokened a fresh and vigorous intellectual life, were deprecated as manifestations of grave and most disquieting import. It is only in a tone of bitter irony that the apostle (1 Cor. 11 19) says 'there must needs be ἀίρεσις (or factions)' among the Corinthians, 'in order that they who are approved among them may be made manifest.' Here he has in view only those factions turning on personal questions which were so specially conspicuous in the church life of Corinth—not false doctrines or the formation of sects occasioned by these.² For these there is as yet no word with the force of a terminus technicus, otherwise Paul, who (especially in Galatia and in Colossæ) had a hard enough battle to fight against false teachers, would assuredly have made use of it somewhere in that connection. To him ἀίρεσις is hateful just as schism (σχίσμα) and faction (διχοστασία) are—in other words, only as interfering with that oneness amongst the members which is so essential to the existence of Christianity.

In the post-apostolic age, as early as the time of Ignatius and Justin, as a result of the catholic tendencies of the period, the word ἀίρεσις became the terminus technicus for heresy or 'heresy'—for all doctrine that departs from the true faith, as well as for the company of the maintainers of such doctrine. Those who held to the church found it impossible to think of such departures as having their origin in anything but arbitrary self-will, the church being by revelation in possession of the entire truth attainable in the present æon. Hence Tertullian's definition (De præscr. hæv. 6), 'adulteræ doctrinæ, hæreses dictæ Græca voce ex interpretatione electionis qua quis sive ad instituendas sive ad suscipiendas eas utitur.' The word has already reached this stage in 2 Pet. 2 1 where there is a prediction of false teachers who shall bring in ἀίρεσις ἀπωλείας—'destructive heresies' (RV)—by reason of which the way of truth (cp Acts 24 14) shall be evil spoken of. Whether ἀίρεσις be taken here in the sense of 'separations or in that of 'sects or (better—note παρεισάγειν) of 'incorrect doctrines' they are, in the mind of this writer, ipso facto and as such, something abominable, a work of falsehood; and the additional word ἀπωλείας is simply the expression of his belief that hell, or everlasting destruction (RVmg. 'sects of perdition') is their destined end. In like manner also Tit. 3:10 enjoins that a factious man (ἀπειρηκός άνθρωπος) is to be shunned if a repeated effort to bring him to a better state of mind has failed; in that case he is an irreclaimable sinner, self-condemned; cp EXCOMMUNICATION. This employment of an adjective ἀπειρηκός shows merely (cp ἀπεισιώτρα, Just. Dial. c. Tryph. 80) how firmly, even at that early date, the idea of all that is ungodly and against the church had attached itself to the word αἵρεσις; an idea which, further heightened by the distinction drawn between heresy and schism, remains to this day inseparably bound up with it in ecclesiastical phraseology.

On the New Heb. term מְרִינִים (merimim), the origin and exact references of which are disputed, but which many (e.g., Schechter, Studies in Judaism [96], 420) render 'heretics,' see H. Kraus, Begriff und Form der Härese nach Talmud u. Midrasch (96); Friedländer, Der vorchristliche jüd. Monotheismus (98); Schürer, GVV and TLZ, 24:167 ff. (99).

HERETH (הֵרֶתְהָ) I S. 22:5 RV, AV HARETH (q.v.).

HERMAS (Ἑρμας [Ti. WH], an abbreviated name) is one of five—Hermes being another—who 'with the brethren that are with them' are saluted in Rom. 16:14 (cp ROMANS, §§ 4, 10). They seem to have been heads of Christian households, or perhaps class-leaders of some sort.

The names Hermas and Hermes occur twice in inscriptions belonging to the province of Asia (the former in CIG 2:2826, the latter in CIG 2:2747 2825). In the lists of the seventy apostles by the Pseudo-Dorotheus and Pseudo-Hippolytus, Hermas figures as bishop of Philippi. No one any longer supposes that he was the author of the Shepherd of Hermas, the date of which is about 140 A.D., though from Origen (in Ep. ad Rom.) onwards church-writers have expressed this view, and accordingly have given that allegorical work a place among the writings of the apostolical fathers or immediate disciples of the apostles. Against this view see Dict. Chr. Biog., and Lipsius' Hermas, Bib. Lex. 3:20 ff.

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς [Ti. WH]) is one of five who are mentioned together in Rom. 16:14 (cp ROMANS, §§ 4, 10).

The name is of frequent occurrence among slaves, especially members of the imperial household of the first century. In Pseudo-Dorotheus and Pseudo-Hippolytus Hermes is called bishop of Dalmatia. Cp HERMAS.

HERMOGENES (Ἑρμογένης [Ti. WH]) is mentioned in 2 Tim. 1:15 f., 'All that are in Asia turned away from me, of whom are Phygelus and Hermogenes.' Nothing is really known of him, though the 'list of the seventy disciples of our Lord' by the Pseudo-Dorotheus of Tyre (Chr. Pasch., Bonn ed. 2:121) makes him bishop of Megara, while in the apocryphal Acts of Paul and Thecla he appears (with Demas) as a hypocritical fellow-traveller of Paul.

A certain Hermogenes, a magician, figures largely along with his disciple Philetus in the Apocryphal Passio Jacobi Majoris; the names are obviously borrowed from 2 Tim. 1:15 2:17, and the story is a commonplace narrative of magical wonders (see Lipsius, Apocr. Aß-Gesch. 3:201 ff.).

HERMON (הַרְמֹן), 'belonging to, or connected with, a sanctuary,' ἑρμωνίων [BAFL], the great mountain-buttress of Antilibanus; cp SENIR, SIRION, STON.

'Mount Hermon' (הַר הַרְמֹן) occurs in Dt. 38 f. (ερμων [B¹] in v. 9) Josh. 11:17 12:5 13:5 11 1 Ch. 5:23 (|| 'Baal-hermon and Senir'); 'Hermon' alone in Josh. 11:3 (הַרְמֹן [B¹]).

1. References. ερμων [B¹], Ps. 89:12 [13] (ερμων [B], 1833, Cant. 4:8 (ερμων [B] ερμων[ε]μ [BMART])) (where 'Senir' and 'Hermon' are combined). In Judg. 3:3 we find 'Mount Baal-hermon'; but comparing Josh. 11:17 (where 'Baal-gad in the valley of the Lebanon at the foot of Mt. Hermon' appears as the N. boundary of Israel), Budde rightly reads 'the Hittites that dwell from Baal-gad which is at the foot of Mt. Hermon to the approach to Hamath' (cp also Josh. 12:7). As the ideal N. boundary of Israel Mt. Hermon appears again in Dt. 3:8 (cp Josh. 12:5).

The poetical references to Hermon are not very many; and those which apparently occur need careful testing. Ps. 42:6 [7] ('the Hermons' RV, AV HERMONITES) is considered under MIZAN, HILL OF; Ps. 89:12 [13] under TABOR (i.); Ps. 133:3 under DEW, § 2 (d); Cant. 4:8 under AMANA, 1, and CANTICLES, § 15 (d). In the first two of these passages 'Hermonim' and 'Hermon' are not genuine.

That Ezekiel (27:5) should prefer the name 'Senir' to that of 'Hermon' is remarkable; but we must remember that the OT passages in which 'Hermon' occurs do not (unless Judg. 3:3 be an exception) represent at all an early period.

In the NT 'Hermon' is not mentioned; but neither is Lebanon; and 'Gerizim' is only referred to in John 4:20 f. as 'this mountain.' It would be delightful to think that Hermon was the 'high mountain' of the Transfiguration-scene; but though, as Stanley (SP 399) remarks, 'high upon its southern slopes there must be many a point where the disciples could be taken "apart by themselves,"' and Keim (Jesu von Naz. 2:585) sees no difficulty in supposing that the narrator thought of one of the spurs of Hermon, good reason has been urged by Weiss for placing the scene in Christ's usual haunts in the NW. of the Sea of Galilee (Leben Jesu, 2:331 f.).

We have still to notice a strange reference to Hermon in the Book of Enoch (66), where the wicked angels are

2. Sanctity. said to have descended in the days of Jared ('descent') on the summit of Mt. Hermon, and to have called it Hermon, because of the oaths which they had sworn upon it. This is a proof of the persistent sacredness of Mt. Hermon, and reminds us of the statement of Philo of Byblus that the giants were named after the mountains of Syria—Casion (Mt. Casius), Libanus, Antilibanus (Hermon) and Βραθυ=ברוש (?). A notable temple on the summit is referred to by Eusebius and Jerome (OS 217:39; 90:21) as the seat of pagan worship, and recent exploration has confirmed this statement. Not only have the ruins of many Roman temples been discovered round the base and sides of the mountain, but also on its highest crag there are the traces of an open-air sanctuary, and close by on the plateau is an underground chamber, hewn in the rock, perhaps a Mithraeum.¹

Mount Hermon has in fact three craggy summits, which rise out of a plateau; hence it is usual to explain the plural noun 'Hermonim' in

3. Description. Ps. 42:6 [7]. 'Mount,' which is a Hebraistic expression, means in this phrase a range of mountains, stretching from SW. to NE., and separated from Antilibanus by a ravine in the N. Its modern names are Jebel es-Schib, 'the mountain of the (white-haired) old man,' and Jebel eth-Thelji, 'the snow mountain.' The latter agrees with the appellation found in the Targum (הַר הַלְנוּ), and is specially suitable, Hermon being widely visible in Palestine. It is rare for the snow to disappear entirely, and hence, as a rule, snow from Hermon is still, as in Jerome's time (note on Prov. 25:13), used for cooling drinks in the hot weather.

Hermon is 9166 feet above the sea-level. As one approaches it from the S., it seems to swell up like a vast dome; but it is also visible in the Jordan Valley nearly as far south as Jericho. The lower part of the mountain, says Conder,² consists of Nubian sandstone, which appears also in the Lebanon. The upper part is 'a very rugged and barren dome of hard grey fossiliferous dolomitic limestone.' Snow and frost combined have produced 'a sort of shingle which covers the higher slopes between the rocks and pinnacles of the mountain side.' Conder and Tristram give pleasing descriptions of the vegetation on the lower slopes; both the fauna and the flora present a remarkable contrast to those of the Jordan Valley, at the foot of the mountain. On the N. and the W. slopes are vineyards and orchards, which, however, are liable to visits from Syrian bears. On the S., the main source of the Jordan bursts from its cavern (see CAESAREA, § 7). The oak and the poplar are the chief trees on the lower slopes; higher up, the Aleppo pine is conspicuous. Nor must we forget the famous 'dew of Hermon.' So abundant is the moisture of the night-mist on Hermon that those who encamp there during a summer night will find their tent as completely saturated as if heavy rain had fallen (cp Dew, § 1). T. K. C.

HEROD (FAMILY OF). The ancestor of the Herodian family was Antipater, whom Alexander Jannæus (104-78 B.C.) had made governor of Idumæa (στρατηγὸς ἅλης τῆς Ἰδουμαίας, Jos. Ant. xiv. 13). The accounts of his origin are contradictory.

Nicolas of Damascus represented him as belonging to the stock of Jews (ἐκ τῶν πρώτων Ἰουδαίων) who returned from Babylon (Jos. l.c.); but because Nicolas was Herod's minister and apologist Josephus rejects his testimony. His own belief is that Antipater was an Idumæan of honourable family (πρωτεύων τῶ ἔθνους; BJ i. 62; cp Ant. xiv. 81).

The Idumæans had been subjugated by John Hyrcanus in 128 B.C., and compelled to embrace Judaism.

In course of time they came to regard themselves as Jews (Jos. Ant. xiii. 91); though they were sometimes reminded that they were only 'half-Jews' (Id. xiv. 152, Ἡρώδης . . . ἰδιώτη ὄντι καὶ Ἰδουμαίω, τινεσσὶν ἡμιουδαίω. On the other hand, when it was convenient, Herod was claimed as a Jew; Ant. xx. 87, τὸ γένος Ἰουδαίων).

The stories of the servile and Philistine origin of the family, spread abroad by Jewish, and perhaps also Christian, foes, are to be rejected (e.g., Just. Mart. Dial. 52, Ἡρώδην Ἀσκαλωνίτην; Jul. Afr. in Eus. HE i. 711; see Schür, Hist. 1314 n.). The occurrence of an Antipater of Ascalon on a tombstone in Athens (CIG 1115), and of a Herod of Ascalon on one at Puteoli (CIG 101746), is interpreted in favour of origin from that town by Stark (Gaza, 535 f.).

1a. Antipater (the younger).—The history of the family begins with Antipater's son, himself also called Antipater, or Antipas—a diminutive form, perhaps used to avoid ambiguity during his father's lifetime (so Wilcken, in Pauly's Realencyc., s.v. 'Antipatros,' no. 17). Antipater the younger, who may perhaps have succeeded to his father's governorship,¹ threw himself devotedly into the cause of Hyrcanus II. in his struggle against the usurpation of the crown and high-priesthood by his brother Aristobolus II. in 69 B.C.

This struggle, in which Antipater enlisted the arms of the Arabian (Nabataean) king ARĪTAS (Hāritha), ultimately cost the Jews their independence. The bold and vigorous character of Aristobolus augured, in fact, a resumption of the national policy of the Hasmonæan house, with which the Sadduceean nobles were in sympathy. The accession of Queen Alexandra (78-69 B.C.) had marked the abandonment of this policy, and the adoption of the Pharisaic² abnegation of political development. (On this conflict of ideals between the two sects, see ISRAEL, § 82 f.; Momms, Hist. of Rome, ET 4132; Id. Prov. of R. Emp. 2161.) The Pharisees attempted to attain their objects under the merely nominal rule of the weak Hyrcanus, and it was among them, as well as among the legitimist Sadducees, that Antipater found support (Jos. Ant. xiv. 13).

It is unnecessary to tell at length the story of the overthrow of the Maccabee state, effected by Pompeius as a part of his policy for the organization of Syria.

The gates of Jerusalem were opened to the legions of Pompeius by the party of Hyrcanus; but the national party seized the temple-rock and bravely defended it for three months (Ant. xiv. 42 f.). This was in the autumn of 63 B.C. The final result of the struggle was the curtailment of Jewish territory. In conformity with the general policy of Rome in the East, of basing rule upon the (Greek)³ urban communities, Pompeius 'liberated' from the Jewish rule all the coast towns from Raphia to Dora, and all the non-Jewish towns of the Peraea together with Scythopolis and Samaria. To all these communal freedom was restored, whilst in other respects they were under the rule of the governor of the newly-constituted province of Syria.

¹ Jos. Ant. xiv. 13, however, calls him merely φίλος τῆς Ἰουδαίας. Hence Momms. Prov. of R. Emp. 2174 n., wrongly says, 'Antipater began his career as governor of Idumæa': unless we suppose the 'governorship' to have been merely a vague commission of superintendence attached to the hereditary chieftainship.

The purely Jewish portion of the Hasmonæan kingdom was left under Hyrcanus, who was recognised as high priest, but had neither the title nor the powers of a king (Jos. Ant. xx. 104). The whole country was made tributary, paying its taxes through the governor of Syria (Id. Ant. xiv. 44; BJ i. 76).

It is clear that as a civil governor Hyrcanus was a complete failure, succumbing, as he did, before the first attack of Alexander, son of Aristobolus. Gabinius therefore deprived him of all his secular powers, and divided the whole country (i.e., Judæa, Samaria, Galilee, and Peræa) into five independent districts.

These districts (σύνοδοι, συνέθρια) were administered by governing colleges with an aristocratic organisation (Jos. BJ i. 85, ἀσμένως δὲ τῆς ἐξ ἑνὸς ἐπικρατείας ἐλευθερωθέντες, τὸ λοιπὸν ἀριστοκρατικῶν διοικούντων). This was in 57 B.C. The two following years were also marked by abortive attempts on the part of Aristobolus or his son to recover the lost crown (see on the position of parties at this time, Wellh. Prohl., ET, 527 f.).

The position of Antipater at this period is described by Josephus (Ant. xiv. 81).

Josephus calls Antipater 'governor of the Jews' (τῶν Ἰουδαίων ἐπιμελητής); so also Strabo, quoted by Josephus (ibid. 3). This office was probably in the main concerned with finance, for the five districts above mentioned must have been connected, not with the administration of law merely, but also with the arrangements for collecting the taxes. In any case Antipater was an officer, not of Hyrcanus, whose power was at this time purely ecclesiastical, but of the Roman governor of Syria. The degree to which this was evident in practice depended entirely upon the attitude of Antipater towards Hyrcanus, and it was easy for him to act as though he were merely his first minister. Probably he owed this position to Gabinius, who in 55 B.C. 'settled the affairs of Jerusalem according to the wishes of Antipater' (Jos. Ant. xiv. 64).

It is, therefore, an inversion of the facts when Josephus assigns to the initiative of Hyrcanus the services of Antipater to Cæsar in Egypt in 48-7 B.C. (Ant. xiv. 81, ἐξ ἐντολῆς Ἰερρανοῦ). There was, in fact, no alternative open, once Pompeius had fallen. An additional reason for this policy was that in 49 B.C. Cæsar had attempted to use the defeated rival of Hyrcanus against the Pompeian party in Syria. The plan was frustrated by the poisoning of Aristobolus even before he left Rome, and by the execution of his son Alexander at Antioch by the proconsul of Syria, Q. Metellus Scipio, the father-in-law of Pompeius. Antigonos, the second son of Aristobolus, still lived and had strong claims on Cæsar's gratitude. The personal services of Antipater, however, carried the day; he fought bravely and successfully for Cæsar at Pelusium and in the Delta. Hyrcanus was consequently confirmed in his high-priestly office and appointed hereditary 'ethnarch' of the Jews—i.e., he was reinstated in the political authority of which he had been deprived by Gabinius. Antipater was made procurator (ἐπίτροπος: not the procuratorship of the imperial period, but an office delegated, in theory, by Hyrcanus; cp Momms. Prov. of R. Emp. 2174 n.). In addition, he was granted Roman citizenship, and freedom from taxation (immunitas: Jos. Ant. xiv. 83; BJ i. 95).

The real control of the country was in the hands of Antipater (Jos. Ant. xiv. 93; BJ i. 105 f.), who strengthened his position by appointing Phasael and Herod (two of his sons by Cypros, an Arabian; Ant. xiv. 73) governors (στρατηγοί)—the former in Jerusalem and the south, the latter in Galilee (Ant. xiv. 92). This is the first occasion on which we hear of Herod. He was at this time, according to Josephus (l.c.; cp BJ i. 104, κομιδῆ νέων), only fifteen years old. Probably we should read 'twenty-five,' for Herod was about seventy at the time of his death (BJ i. 331; see Schür. Hist. 1383 n.).

Once again before his end Antipater had an opportunity of displaying that sagacity in choosing sides, to which he owed his success.

In 46 B.C., Cæcilius Bassus, a member of the Pompeian party, caused Sextus Cæsar, the governor of Syria, to be assassinated, and made himself master of Syria. He was besieged in Apameia by the Caesarians under C. Antistius Vetus, who was assisted by troops sent by Antipater (Jos. Ant. xiv. 11 i; Dio Cass. 47 27). The new governor, L. Statius Murcus, obtained no advantage over Bassus and the siege continued without result, when the assassination of Caesar, and the arrival in Syria of Gaius Cassius Longinus, one of his murderers, changed the aspect of affairs. Both besiegers and besieged went over to Cassius, and the republican party was, for a time at least, dominant in the East. The de facto rulers of Palestine, Antipater and Herod, displayed their zeal for the party in raising the 700 talents demanded as the Jewish contribution to the republican war-chest (44 B.C.).

HEROD, FAMILY OF

In the following year, after the withdrawal of Cassius, Antipater fell a victim to poison administered at the instigation of a certain Malichos.

The object of the conspiracy is not clear. Was Malichos a leader of the Pharisaic section anxious for a reinstatement of the old theocratic government under Hyrcanus (so Matthews, Hist. of NT Times in Palestine, 106; cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 11 3, τὴν τοῦτον ῥεσθητὴν ἀσφάλειαν Ὑρκανοῦ τῆς ἀρχῆς εἶναι νομίζων); or was he prompted merely by ambition (so Schlir. Hist. 1 386; cp Jos. BJ i. 11 3, σπείων ἀνελεῖν Ἀντιπατρον τὸν ἐμπόδιον αὐτοῦ τοῖς ἰδουμαίσι, and ibid. 7)? Or, thirdly, was he a patriot who saw in the civil war an opportunity of getting rid of Roman dominion altogether; including both Antipater and (if necessary) Hyrcanus, who were its representatives (cp Jos. BJ i. 11 8, end)? Lastly, was Hyrcanus himself possibly privy to the murder of Antipater?

1b. *Herod the Great.*¹—The services rendered by Herod to the cause of Cassius were rewarded by his appointment as stratēgos of Coele-Syria

3. Herod the Great. (Jos. BJ i. 11 4); it was typical of the man that he should have held this position originally under the Caesarian governor, Sextus Cæsar (id. Ant. xiv. 9 5). Already in Galilee he had given proof of his energy and ability, and at the same time of his thorough enmity to anti-Roman sentiments, by his capture and execution of Ezekias, a noted brigand chief or patriot, who for long had harassed the Syrian border (Jos. BJ i. 10 5). It was not long, however, before (41 B.C., the year in which Antigonos, son of Aristobulus II., was defeated by Herod) Herod performed another volte-face, the defeat of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi having thrown all the East into the power of Antonius.

Partly by reason of the friendship which there had been between Antonius and Antipater in the days of Cahinius, partly also no doubt by reason of the remarkable similarity in character between the Roman and the Idumæan, Herod had no difficulty in securing the thorough support of Antonius. Deputation after deputation from the Sadduceean party (Jos. Ant. xiv. 12 2 f.) appeared before Antonius with accusations against Phasaël and Herod; but in vain. Hyrcanus himself was fain to admit the ability of the accused.

Antonius was only consulting the interests of peace and good government in declaring both Phasaël and Herod tetrarchs (Ant. xiv. 13 1).

In the following year (40 B.C.) Herod experienced the strangest vicissitudes of fortune. The Parthians were induced by Antigonos to espouse his cause.

They passed from Syria into Judæa, where the legitimists (i.e., the aristocrats, in the main Sadducees) rallied round Antigonos, who, seeing that Hyrcanus was bound hand and foot to the hated Idumæans, was now the real representative of the Hasmonæan line. Hyrcanus and Phasaël incautiously put themselves in the power of their enemies. The ears of Hyrcanus were cut off in order to make it impossible for him ever again to hold the high-priesthood (Jos. Ant. xiv. 13 10). Phasaël, happy in his knowledge that he had an avenger in his brother who was free, dashed out his own brains.

Herod himself, too crafty to be deceived by the Parthians, had made his escape eastwards with his mother Cypros, his sister Salome, and Mariamme, to whom he was betrothed; Mariamme was also accompanied by her mother, Alexandra. These Herod deposited for safety in the strong castle of Masada by the Dead Sea (Ant. xiv. 13 9). He himself made his way with difficulty to Alexandria, and at length arrived at Rome, where he was welcomed both by Antonius and by Octavian. Within a week he was declared king of Judæa by the Senate; his restoration indeed was to the interest of the Romans, seeing that Antigonos had allied himself with the Parthian enemy.

P. Ventidius, the legate of Antonius in Syria, succeeded in expelling the Parthians from Syria and Palestine (Dio Cass. 48 41); but neither he nor his subordinate Silo gave Herod real help in regaining Jerusalem.

Herod was in fact compelled to rest content for this year (39 B.C.) with the seizure of Joppa, the raising of the blockade of Masada, and the extermination of the robbers (i.e., patriots) of Galilee in their almost inaccessible caverns of Arbela (ibid., in the Wady el-Hamam, see ARBELA, § 1). Next year he joined Antonius, then besieging Antiochus, king of Commagene, in Samosata, probably with the object of securing more effectual assistance. At Daphne (Antioch), on his homeward journey, he received news of the defection of Galilee, and the complete defeat and death of his brother Joseph at the hands of Antigonos.

It was not until the following year that the fall of Samosata enabled Antonius to reinforce Herod before Jerusalem with the bulk of his army under C. Sosius, the new governor of Syria (37 B.C.). Herod chose this moment for the celebration of his marriage with Mariamme, to whom he had been betrothed for the past five years (Ant. xiv. 15 14). The ceremony took place at Samaria.¹ This central district of Palestine remained loyal to Herod throughout these troublous years, and a large part of his forces was recruited therefrom.

After a three months' siege Antigonos surrendered, and was carried in chains to Antioch, where, by Herod's wish, Antonius had him beheaded²—the first king, we are told, to be so dealt with by the Romans (Jos. Ant. xv. 1 2; Plut. Ant. 36). This was the end of the Hasmonæan dynasty, and from this year dates Herod's reign (37 B.C.).

Herod's reign is generally divided into three periods—

(1) 37-25 B.C., in which his power was consolidated;

4. Herod (2) 25-13 B.C., the period of prosperity;

as king. (3) 13-4 B.C., the period of domestic troubles.

i. The consolidation of Herod's power (37-25 B.C.).—

During the early years of his reign Herod had to contend with several enemies.

It is true that the immediate execution of forty-five of the most wealthy and prominent of the Sanhedrin—i.e., of the Sadducean aristocracy, which favoured Antigonos (Jos. Ant. xiv. 9 4, πάντας ἀπέκρεεν τοῖς ἐν τῷ συνέδριῳ; cp id. Ant. xv. 1 2, τοῖς πρώτοις ἐκ τῆς αἰρέσεως Ἀντιγόνου)—broke the active resistance of the rival house, whilst the confiscation of their property filled the new king's coffers.

With the Pharisaic party resistance was of a more passive nature; but the leaders of even the more moderate section, Pollio and Samaeas,³ in advising the surrender of Jerusalem, could only speak of his dominion as a judgment of God, to which the people must submit. Opposition on the part of the surviving members of the Hasmonæan house never ceased; its mainspring was Alexandra, Herod's mother-in-law, who found an ally in Cleopatra of Egypt. The enmity of Cleopatra was possibly due simply to pique (BJ i. 14 2, end). Hyrcanus, who had been set at liberty, and was held in great honour by the Babylonian Jews, was invited by Herod to return to Jerusalem, and, on his arrival, was treated with all respect by the king.⁴

As Hyrcanus could no longer hold the high-priesthood (Lev. 21 16 f.), Ananel, an obscure Babylonian Jew of priestly family, was selected for the post, which he occupied for a time; but the machinations of Alexandra soon compelled Herod to depose him in favour of Aristobulus (III.), son of Alexandra (35 B.C.). The acclamations of the populace, when the young Hasmonæan prince (he was only seventeen years of age) officiated at the Feast of Tabernacles, warned Herod that he had escaped one danger only to incur a greater.

Shortly afterwards Aristobulus was drowned by Herod's orders in the bath at Jericho.

Cleopatra constituted a real danger for Herod during the first six years of his reign, owing to her boundless rapacity and her strange influence over Antonius. In 34 B.C. she induced Antonius to bestow upon her the whole of Phœnicia (with the exception of Tyre and ¹ Mariamme was Herod's second wife. His first wife was Doris (Jos. Ant. xiv. 12 1; BJ i. 12 3 22 1). By her he had one son, Antipater.

² Dio Cass. 49 22 says that he was crucified.

Sidon), part of the Arabian territory (for the revenue of which Herod was held responsible), and the valuable district of Jericho (which Herod was compelled to take in lease from the queen, for 200 talents yearly; BJ i. 185). Loyalty, combined with prudence, enabled the harassed king to resist the fascinations of the Egyptian enchantress when she passed through Judæa (Ant. xv. 42).

When the Roman Senate declared war against Antonius and Cleopatra, it was Herod's good fortune not to be compelled to champion the failing cause. In obedience to the wishes of Cleopatra herself, he was engaged in a war with the Arabian king Malchus for no nobler cause than the queen's arrears of tribute. On the news of Octavian's victory at Actium (2nd Sept. 31 B.C.), he passed over at once to the victorious side (Jos. Ant. xv. 67; Dio Cass. 517). He did not venture to appear before Octavian until he had removed the aged Hyrcanus on a feeble charge of conspiracy with Malchus the Arabian (Ant. xv. 63). The interview upon which his fate depended took place at Rhodes.

Herod accurately gauged the character of Octavian, and frankly confessing his past loyalty to Antonius, left it to Octavian to say whether he should serve him as faithfully. It should not be forgotten that Herod and Octavian were no strangers to each other, and that no one was better able to estimate the necessities of Herod's position during the past few years than Octavian; probably Herod was in less danger than is sometimes imagined.

The result was that Octavian confirmed Herod's royal title; and, after the suicide of Antonius and Cleopatra, restored to him all the territory of which the queen had deprived him, together with the cities of Gadara, Hippos, Samaria, Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and Strato's Tower. The 400 Celts who had formed Cleopatra's guard were also given to him (BJ i. 203). These external successes were counterbalanced by domestic troubles.

These troubles had their origin in the eternal breach between Mariamne and her mother on the one side, and Herod's own mother and sister on the other. The contempt of the Hasmonæans was returned with hatred by the Idumæan Salome. The machinations of the latter bore fruit when in a paroxysm of anger and jealousy Herod ordered Mariamne to execution. Renewed conspiracy soon brought her vile mother also to her doom (28 B.C.).

The extermination of the Hasmonæan family was completed by the execution of Costobar, Salome's second husband.

Salome's first husband Joseph had been put to death in 34 B.C. Costobar, as governor of Idumæa, had given asylum to the sons of Baba, a scion of the rival house; these also were executed, and thus the last male representatives of the Hasmonæan line were swept from Herod's path (25 B.C.).

ii. The period of Herod's prosperity, 25-13 B.C.—Secure at last from external and internal foes, Herod was free for the next twelve years to carry out his programme of development. 'He was governing for the Romans a part of the empire, and he was bound to spread western customs and language and civilisation among his subjects, and fit them for their position in the Roman world. Above all, the prime requirement was that he must maintain peace and order; the Romans knew well that no civilising process could go on, so long as disorder and disturbance and insecurity remained in the country. Herod's duty was to keep the peace and naturalise the Græco-Roman civilisation in Palestine' (Rams. IVas Christ born at Bethlehem p. 174).

The great buildings were the most obvious fruit of this period.

Strato's Tower was entirely rebuilt (BJ i. 215 f.), and furnished with a splendid harbour (see CÆSAREA, § 7). Samaria, also, was rebuilt and renamed Sebastê (Strabo, p. 760). Both these cities contained a temple of Augustus, and Herod showed his zeal for the empire by similar foundations in other cities, outside the limits of Judæa (Jos. Ant. xv. 95). Connected with this was the establishment of games, celebrated every fourth year, in honour of the Emperor (Ant. 165 τ, τὸν ἀγῶνα Καίσαρος κατὰ τετραετηρίδα . . . ἀγεῖν, at Cæsarea; cp id. Ant. xv. 81; also at Jerusalem, ibid.).¹ With this went, of course, the erection of the necessary buildings (theatre, amphitheatre, and hippodrome at Jerusalem, Ant. xv. 81; BJ ii. 31; the same at Jericho, Ant. xvii. 635; BJ

i. 338; at Cæsarea, Ant. xv. 96). The games were necessarily after the Greek model. Even in the time of the Maccabees Hellenism in this form had infected Jerusalem (I Macc. 14): see HELLENISM.

The defensive system of the country was highly developed, by the erection of new fortresses, or the rebuilding of dismantled Hasmonæan strongholds. Some of these fortresses were destined to give the Romans much trouble in the great war (BJ vii. 64, vii. 82 f.). They were designed by Herod for the suppression of brigandage (a standing evil) and the defence of the frontier against the roving tribes of the desert (Ant. xvi. 92). So successful was he in fulfilling this primary requirement, that in 23 B.C. Augustus put under his administration the districts of Trachonitis, Auranitis, and Batanæa, inhabited by nomad robber-tribes, which the neighbouring tetrarch Zenodorus had failed to keep in order (BJ i. 204; cp Strabo 756, καταλυθέντων πῦρ τῶν περὶ Ἰηρόδωρον ληστῶν). In 20 B.C., on the death of Zenodorus, Herod was given his tetrarchy, the regions of Ulatha and Panias (Ant. xv. 103; cp Dio Cass. 549); and he obtained permission to appoint his brother Pheroras tetrarch of Peræa. On Herod's work cp Momms, Prov. of Rom. Emp. 2182.

Much might be said of Herod's munificence both to his own subjects and far beyond the limits of his kingdom.

The Syrian Antioch (Jos. Ant. xvi. 53), the cities of Chios and Rhodes, the new foundation of Augustus, Nicopolis in Epirus, and many others, experienced Herod's liberality. The Athenians and Lacedæmonians counted him among their benefactors (BJ i. 2111; cp CIA iii. 1550). The ancient festival at Olympia recovered something of its old glory through his munificence (Ant. xvi. 53). At home, in 20 B.C., he remitted one-third of the taxes (Ant. xv. 104), and in 14 B.C. one-fourth (Ant. xvi. 25). In 25 B.C. he had converted into coin even his own plate in order to relieve the sufferers from famine by importing corn from Egypt (Ant. xv. 91 f.).

The greatest benefit of all, however, in the eyes of Jews must have been his restoration of the Temple, a work which was carried out with the nicest regard for the religious scruples of the nation (Ant. xv. 116). Begun in 20 B.C., it was not entirely finished until the time of the Procurator Albinus (62-64 A.D.), a few years before its total destruction (cp Jn. 220). Its beauty and magnificence were proverbial (cp Mt. 24: Mk. 13: Lk. 215).

iii. Period of domestic troubles, 13-4 B.C.—The last nine years of Herod's life were marked in a special degree by domestic miseries. Of his ten wives (enumerated in Jos. Ant. xvii. 13; BJ i. 284), the first, Doris (col. 2026 n. 1), had been repudiated, along with her son Antipater (BJ i. 221). By his marriage with Mariamne Herod had hoped to give his position a certain legitimacy.

Mariamne's mother, Alexandra, was the daughter of Hyrcanus II., whilst her father, Alexander, was a son of Aristobolus II. (brother of Hyrcanus); consequently Mariamne represented the direct line of the Hasmonæan (Maccabæan) family.

The political intrigues of Mariamne's mother, and the mutual enmity of Mariamne and Herod's mother (Cypros) and sister (Salome), effectually frustrated these hopes. Of the three sons borne to Herod by Mariamne, the youngest died in Rome (BJ i. 222); but Alexander and Aristobolus were fated to die on the gibbet at that very Sebastê which, thirty years before, had seen Herod's marriage with their mother.

Salome had in the second tragedy also a large share, notwithstanding the fact that Berenice, the wife of Aristobolus,¹ was her own daughter (by Costobar, see above, i. end). The recall of the banished Antipater, son of Doris, brought a more deadly intriguer upon the scene (14 B.C.; BJ i. 231). Under the combined attack of Antipater and Salome, the two sons of Mariamne incurred the suspicions of the king. The reconciliation effected by Augustus himself (Ant. xvi. 45; in 12 B.C.) at Aquileia, and two years later by Archelaus, the Cappadocian king (Ant. xvi. 86), had no long continuance. The elements of discord and intrigue were reinforced by the arrival at Herod's court of the Lacedæmonian adventurer Eurykles (BJ i. 261 f.). The brothers were again accused of treason, and Augustus gave leave to Herod to deal with them as he saw fit. They were tried at Berytus before C. Sertius Saturninus, the governor of Syria (B/i i. 272), and condemned to death. The execution took place at Sebastē (7 B.C.).

Antipater, whose life, says Josephus, was a 'mystery of iniquity' (B/i i. 241), next plotted with Pherōras to remove the king by poison. Herod's days, indeed, were already numbered, as he was afflicted with a painful and loathsome disease (B/i i. 335). He lived long enough, however, to summon the arch-plotter from Italy, and to bring him to trial before Quinctilius Varus, then governor of Syria, and finally to receive the emperor's permission for his execution (B/i i. 337).¹

Herod is said to have contemplated the wholesale massacre of the chief men of Judæa, in the hippodrome of Jericho, in order that his funeral might be accompanied by the genuine lamentations of the people; but Salome released them during his last days (Ant. xvii. 65). We may reasonably doubt whether Jewish tradition has not intensified the colours in which the closing scenes of the hated king's life are painted (Ant. xvii. 81).

Herod died in 4 B.C., five days after the execution of Antipater. 'There is probably no royal house of any age in which bloody feuds raged in an equal degree between parents and children, between husbands and wives, and between brothers and sisters' (Momms. Prov. of Rom. Emp. 2180).

We cannot here discuss the question whether Herod is rightly called 'the Great'.² Certainly it is not easy to be strictly fair towards him; but so much must be clear, that, judged by the standard of material benefits conferred, few princes have less reason to shrink from the test. In addition to the benefits of his rule at home, there were gains for the Jews of the Dispersion in Asia Minor. By his personal influence with Agrippa, he obtained safety for their Temple contributions, exemption from military service, and other privileges (Jos. Ant. xvi. 64*f.*). In estimating these services, Herod's position in the imperial system must be remembered.

Herod was only one of a large number of 'allied kings' (reges socii), whose use even of the royal title was dependent on the goodwill of the emperor, and their exercise of royal authority no less so.³ In the most favourable case, their sovereign rights were strictly limited within the boundaries of their own land, so that a foreign policy was impossible. The right of coining money was limited; and as, of the Herodian line, only copper coins are known, we must correct the impression of Herod's importance derived from many of the statements of Josephus. The fact that no tribute was imposed, at least upon Judæa, made all the more imperative Herod's obligations in respect of frontier defence and internal good government.

The connection of Herod the Great with the NT is slight. Both Mt. (21) and Lk. (21) agree that the birth of Jesus took place during his reign; but the additional information given by Lk. as to the date has caused serious difficulties (see CHRONOLOGY, § 57*ff.*). On the narrative of the Massacre of the Innocents, see NATIVITY.

Herod made several wills. As a rex socius, indeed, he could not bequeath his kingdom without the consent of Rome. It had been, therefore, a distinct mark of favour that, on his visit to Rome to accuse Alexander and Aristobólus, he had been given leave by Augustus to dispose of his kingdom as he saw fit (Ant. xvi. 45): apparently it was only on the express command of the emperor that he refrained then from abdication.

² Josephus, in fact, uses the title only once (Ant. xviii. 54, 'Ἡρώδης τῷ μεγάλῳ θυγατρὲς ἐκ Μαρίας . . . γίνονται δύο. Further on we have 'Ἡρώδης Ἡρώδου τοῦ μεγάλου παιδί). Comparison with the expression 'Ἐλκίας ὁ μέγας in Ant. xviii. 84 has suggested that Jos. meant by the title μέγας merely 'elder', marking him as head of the dynasty. Similarly it is in this sense that it is applied to Agrippa I. (Ant. xvii. 22, 'Ἀγρίππας . . . ὁ μέγας καὶ ὁ παῖς αὐτοῦ καὶ ὁμῶνυμος); but Agrippa claimed the title in the other sense (cp his coins with the legend βασιλεὺς μέγας 'Ἀγρίππας). It is therefore not impossible that Jos. deliberately abstained from giving the title, even though it was popularly in use with reference to the first Herod. The verdict that 'he was still only a common man' (Hitzig, quoted by Schür. Hist. 1467) scarcely does justice to one who for thirty-four years combated the combined hatred of Hasmoneans and Pharisees, and extended his frontier to the widest limit ever dreamed of by Solomon.

³ Cp Jos. Ant. xv. 67, where Herod recognises that he has his kingdom δόσει Καίσαρος καὶ δόγματι Ῥωμαίων.

On his return to Jerusalem he announced to the people, assembled in the temple, that his sons should succeed him—first Antipater, and then Alexander and Aristobólus. The first formal testament did, in fact, designate Antipater as heir; but, as the sons of Mariamme were then dead, Herod, the son of the high priest's daughter, was to succeed in the event of Antipater's dying before the king (Ant. xvii. 32). After Antipater's disgrace a second will was made, bequeathing the kingdom to his youngest son Antipas (Ant. xvii. 61). This was in its turn revoked by a will drawn up in his last hours, by which he divided his realm among three of his sons: Archelaus, to whom he left Judæa, with the title of king; Antipas, to whom he gave Galilee and Peræa, with the title of tetrarch; and Philip, to whom he gave the NE districts, also with the title of tetrarch (Ant. xvii. 81).

2. Herod Antipas.—('Ἡρώδης (-ῶδ. [WH]) ὁ τετραρχῆς [Ti. WH], Mt. 14 i Lk. 3 i 19 97 Acts 13 i; incorrectly called 'king' in Mk. 6 14, ὁ βασιλεὺς

7. Antipas. 'Ἡρώδης (-ῶδ. [WH]) [Ti. WH] (so also in Mt. 14 9, ὁ βασιλεὺς); cp Mk. 6 22 f. Sometimes called simply Herod (Acts 4 27); as often by Josephus, who also calls him Antipas ('Ἀντιπίπας, an abbreviated form of 'Ἀντιπατρος).

Son of Herod the Great by the Samaritan Malthacē, consequently full brother of Archelaus (Jos. Ant. xvii. 13). By Herod's last will he received the prosperous regions of Galilee and Peræa, with the title of tetrarch.¹ The confederation of independent Græco-Roman communities called the Decapolis lay between the two parts of his territory which brought in an annual revenue of two hundred talents (Ant. xvii. 114). He had the characteristically Herodian passion for building. In Galilee he rebuilt Sepphoris (Ant. xviii. 21), and in Peræa Betharamphtha (see BETH-HARAN); and after 26 A.D. he created the splendid capital named by him TIBERIAS [g.v.]. Little is told us of the course of his long reign (4 B.C.—39 A.D.). We may believe that he was a successful ruler and administrator; but the diplomacy which distinguished Herod the Great became something far less admirable in Antipas, as we may see from the contemptuous expression used of the tetrarch by Jesus in Lk. 13 32, 'Go ye, and tell that fox.'

Perhaps, however, this utterance should be restricted to the particular occasion that called it forth and should not be regarded as an epitome of the tetrarch's character; nevertheless we have an illustration of this trait in the story told by Josephus (Ant. xviii. 45) of his out-manœuvring Vitellius in forwarding the report of the treaty with the Parthian king Artabanus to Tiberius. Antipas certainly did not inherit his father's qualities as a leader in war.

Perhaps it was consciousness of his weakness in this respect that prompted Antipas to seek the hand of the daughter of the Arabian king Aretas; or he may have been urged to the alliance by Augustus, in obedience to the principle enunciated with reference to the intermarriage of reges socii by Suetonius (Aug. 48).

The connection with Herodias, wife of his half-brother Herod (son of the second Mariamme), gained Antipas his notoriety in evangelic tradition. The flight of the daughter of Aretas to her father involved him ultimately in hostilities with the Arabians, in which the tetrarch was severely defeated—a divine punishment in the eyes of many, for his murder of John the Baptist (Ant. xviii. 52). There was apparently no need for Antipas to divorce his first wife in order to marry Herodias; but Herodias perhaps refused to tolerate a possible rival (Ant. xviii. 51; cp Ant. xvii. 12).²

The story of the connection of JOHN THE BAPTIST [g.v.] with the court of Antipas need not be repeated here. Later, the Pharisees warn Jesus that the tetrarch seeks his life (Lk. 13 31). On the phrase 'the leaven of Herod' (Mk. 8 15) see HERODIANS. Again in the closing scene in the life of Jesus we meet with Antipas. Pilate, we are told by Lk. (23 7 f.), sent Jesus to the tetrarch 'as soon as he knew that he belonged unto Herod's jurisdiction.'

² According to the Mishna, Sanh. 24, eighteen wives were allowed to the king (see authorities quoted by Schür. Hist. 1455 n.).

The death of his firm friend Tiberius, and the accession of Gaius (Caligula), in 37 A.D., led to the fall of Antipas.

The advancement of Agrippa I. to the position of king over Philip's old tetrarchy by the new emperor was galling to his sister Herodias; and against his better judgment Antipas was prevailed upon by her to go to Rome to sue for the royal title. The interview with Gaius took place at Baiae. Agrippa meanwhile had sent on his freedman Fortunatus with a document accusing Antipas of having been in treasonable correspondence, not only with Seianus (who had been executed in 31 A.D.), but also with the Parthian king Artabanus. Antipas could not, in fact, deny that his magazines contained a great accumulation of arms (probably in view of his war with the Arabians).

The deposition and banishment of Antipas, however, were in all probability due as much to the caprice of the mad emperor as to real suspicions of disloyalty.

His place of banishment was Lugdunum (Lyons) in Gaul (Jos. Ant. xviii. 7 2); according to B/i ii. 96, he died in Spain,¹ and it has been suggested that his place of exile was actually Lugdunum Convenarum, at the northern foot of the Pyrenees, near the sources of the Garonne; but this will not save the statement of Josephus. A confused remark of Dio Cassius (59 2) seems to imply that he was put to death by Caligula.

3. Herod Archelaus.—('Ἀρχέλαος [Ti. WH]: Mt. 22 2†). Son of Herod the Great by Malthacē, and

8. Archelaus. elder brother of Antipas (B/i i. 33 7). Antipas actually put in a claim for the crown against him before Augustus, on the ground that he had been himself named sole heir in the will drawn up when Herod was under the influence of the accusations made by Antipater against Archelaus and Philip (see § 6). The majority of the people, under the influence of the orthodox (the Pharisees), seized the opportunity afforded by Herod's death to attempt to re-establish the sacerdotal government under the Roman protectorate. Herod was scarcely buried before the masses in Jerusalem gathered with the demand for the deposition of the high-priest nominated by him, and for the ejection of foreigners from the city, where the Passover was just about to be celebrated. Archelaus was under the necessity of sending his troops among the rioters. A deputation of fifty persons was sent to Rome requesting the abolition of the monarchy. To Rome also went Archelaus claiming the kingdom—a journey which probably suggested the framework of the parable in Lk. 19 12 f. Augustus practically confirmed Herod's last will, and assigned to Archelaus Judæa proper, with Samaria and Idumæa, including the cities of Caesarea, Samaria, Joppa, and Jerusalem; but the royal title was withheld, at least until he should have shown that he deserved it (Jos. Ant. xvii. 11 4, B/i ii. 6 3). The city of Gaza was excepted from this arrangement, and attached to the province of Syria.

The proper title of Archelaus was ethnarch. Mt. 22 uses the inaccurate expression βασιλευς (and so Jos. Ant. xviii. 4 3 ὁ ἐπικρατασθεὶς αὐτῷ βασιλεὺς 'Archelaus vidē ōn). The troops indeed had saluted him as king on Herod's death (Ant. xvii. 8 2); but he refused to accept the title until it should be confirmed by Augustus (B/i ii. 1 1). Probably in popular speech it was given as a matter of courtesy. The coins with ΗΡΩΔΟΥ ΕΘΝΑΡΧΟΥ must be his, for no other member of the family bore the title; and, like Antipas, he used the family name of Herod (so Dio Cass. 55 27 calls him Ἡρώδης ὁ Παλαιστίνος. Josephus never calls him Herod.)

Of the details of the administration of Archelaus we know nothing, nor apparently did Josephus. He indeed says that his rule was violent and tyrannical (cp B/i ii. 7 3, and Ant. xvii. 13 2, where he is charged with ὀμότης and τυραννίς). The description in the parable is apt—Lk. 19 21 (ἄθροπος αὐστηρός), and hence we can the better understand the statement in Mt. 2 2 respecting Joseph's fear to go to Judæa. Apparently Archelaus did not take the pains to handle gently the religious prejudices of his subjects.

Not only did he depose and set up high-priests at his pleasure,¹ but he also took to wife Glaphyra, the daughter of the Cappadocian king Archelaus (probably between 1 B.C. and 4 A.D.). Glaphyra had been wife of Alexander, half-brother of Archelaus, who was executed in 7 B.C. (see § 4, iii.). Her second husband was Juba, king of Mauretania, who was indeed still living when she married Archelaus. Moreover, she had had children by Alexander, and for this reason marriage with her was unlawful.

After nine years of rule the chief men of Judæa and Samaria invoked the interference of the emperor, and Archelaus was banished to Vienna (Vienne) in Gaul (Ant. xvii. 13 2; cp Dio Cass. 55 27).²

It is to Archelaus that Strabo (765) refers when he says that a son of Herod was living, at the time of his writing, among the Allobroges, for Vienna was their capital town. If the statement of Jerome (OS 101 11)³ that Archelaus' grave was near Bethlehem is trustworthy (cp RACHEL), he must have returned to Palestine to die.

The territory of Archelaus was taken under the immediate rule of Rome, and received a governor of its own of the equestrian order (ἐπιτροπος, procurator, see ISRAEL, § 90); but it was under the general supervision of the imperial legate of Syria (on the status of Judæa at this time, see Momms. Prov. of R. Emp. 2 185, n.). Forthwith, of course, the obligation to Roman tribute fell upon the territory thus erected into a province (hence, in Judæa, Jesus was brought face to face with the whole question of the compatibility or otherwise of Judaism with the imperial claims: cp Mt. 22 15 ff. Mk. 12 13 ff. Lk. 20 20 ff.).

4. Herod Philip.—[Ἡρώδης, Jos.; Φίλιππος, Mk. 6 17; see below.] Son of Herod the Great by Mariamme, daughter of Simon (son of Boethos),⁴ whom

9. Herod (Philip?). Herod made high priest (about 24 B.C.). In spite of Mk. 6 17 (see below), we cannot hold that he ever really bore the name Philip; the confusion, which is doubtless primitive, arose from the fact that the son-in-law of Herodias was called Philip (see CLOPAS, § 2). Herod's first will arranged that Philip should succeed in the event of Antipater's dying before coming to the throne (see § 6); but Philip was disinherited owing to his mother's share in Antipater's intrigues (Ant. xvii. 4 2, B/i i. 30 7). 'Philip' lived and died, therefore, in a private station, apparently in Rome (Ant. xviii. 5 1); for it seems to have been in Rome that his half-brother Antipas saw Herodias. It is indeed only in connection with his wife Herodias, sister of Agrippa I., that the name of this Herod occurs in the NT.

In Mk. 6 17 all MSS read 'his brother Philip's wife' (τὴν γυναῖκα Φιλίππου τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ αὐτοῦ), from which it would appear that this Herod also bore the name Philip. When, however, we find that Josephus knows only the name Herod for him (cp Ant. xvii. 1 3, ἡ θυγάτηρ τοῦ ἀρχιερέως, ἐξ ἧς ὄη καὶ ὀμώνυμος αὐτῷ παῖς γενόμενος), and that another son of Herod the Great also certainly bore the name Philip (see § 11), suspicion is aroused, and this is confirmed when we find that 'of Philip' is omitted in Mt. 14 3 by D and some Lat. MSS (followed by Zahn, Eint. 2 309), whilst in Lk. 3 19 it is omitted by NBD. That Lk. does not give the name is highly significant. An appeal to the fact that several sons of Herod the Great bore the name Herod cannot save the credit of Mt. and Mk. in this particular; for Herod was a family and a dynastic title.⁵ The coexistence in the family of the names Antipas and Antipater is also no argument, for they are in fact different names.

5. Herodias.—(Ἡρωδίας [Ti.], -ῶδ. [WH]: Mt.

² ὅ τε Ἡρώδης ὁ Παλαιστίνος, αἰτίαν τινὰ ὑπὸ τῶν ἀδελφῶν λαβὼν, ὑπὲρ τὰς Ἄλλειες ὑπερῶρισθη, καὶ τὸ μέρος τῆς ἀρχῆς αὐτοῦ ἐδημοσιώθη.

³ Sed et propter eandem Bethleem regis quondam Judææ Archelai tumulus ostenditur.

⁴ So Jos. Ant. xv. 9 3. In other places Boethos is the name of her father. The family belonged originally to Alexandria.

143-12 Mk. 6:17-29 (Lk. 3:19). Daughter of Aristobulus (Herod's second son by Mariamme, 10. Herodias, granddaughter of Hyrcanus). Her mother was Bernice (Berenice), daughter of Salome, Herod's sister. Herod of Chalcis (see § 12), Agrippa I., and the younger Aristobulus, were therefore full brothers of Herodias. According to Josephus (Ant. xviii. 54) she was wife first of her half-uncle Herod (see preceding section), who is erroneously supposed to have been also called Philip. The issue of this marriage was the famous Salome who danced before Herod Antipas, and thus became the instrument of her mother's vengeance upon the Baptist. Herodias deserted her first husband in order to marry his half-brother Antipas, thus transgressing the law (cp Lev. 18:16 Dt. 25:5).

In Mk. 6:22 the reading 'his daughter Herodias' (τῆς θυγατρὸς αὐτοῦ Ἡροδίας) (WH) is that of \aleph BDL Δ . This would make the girl daughter of Antipas and Herodias, bearing her mother's name. Certainly the expression applied to her in the same verse (κορᾶσιον) is in favour of this: conversely, if the ordinary reading which designates the dancer as Salome is accepted, we must admit a great disparity in age between her and her first husband Philip the tetrarch, if she is rightly called κορᾶσιον about 28 A.D.; for Philip died in 34 A.D., at the age of sixty, or thereabouts. As the protest of John the Baptist in reference to the marriage by no means compels us to assume that the union was recent, it is scarcely possible to maintain that a daughter by it must have been too young to dance at a banquet. In our ignorance of the chronology of the reign of Antipas a solution is not to be had; though it is always possible by means of assumptions to create a scheme that fits in with the received reading (cp Schür. Hist. 2:28 n., and authorities there quoted).

It would scarcely be just to ascribe the action of Herodias solely to ambition; it was rather a case of real and intense affection. It is true that it was Herodias who goaded her husband, in spite of his desire for quiet and in spite of his misgivings (Ant. xviii. 72), to undertake the fatal journey to Rome; but she made what amends she could by refusing to accept exemption from the sentence of exile pronounced upon her husband by the emperor. See above, § 7.

6. Philip.—(Φίλιππος, Lk. 3:1, Φιλίππου δὲ τετραρχούντος τῆς Ἰουδαίας καὶ Τραχωνιτιδος χώρας [Ti. WH].) Son of Herod the Great by

11. Philip. Cleopatra, a woman of Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xvii. 13, Κλεοπάτρα Ἰερουσαλήμης).¹ He was left in charge of Jerusalem and Judæa when Archelaus hastened to Rome to secure his inheritance, but subsequently appeared in Rome in support of his brother's claims (B. J. ii. 61). By the decision of Augustus in accordance with the terms of Herod's last will (see § 6), Philip succeeded to a tetrarchy consisting of Batanæa, Auranitis, Gaulonitis, Trachonitis, and the district of Pania (which last is, apparently, what Lk. 3:1 calls 'the Ituræan region,' though not indeed the whole of it). Cp ITURÆA. This list is obtained by combining the different statements in Josephus (Ant. xvii. 8:11 4 xviii. 46, B. J. ii. 63). Thus Philip's territory embraced the poorest parts of his father's kingdom—those lying E. and N.E. of the sea of Galilee as far as Mt. Hermon: the annual revenue from it was estimated at one hundred talents.² The population was mixed, but was mostly Syrian and Greek—i. e., it was predominantly pagan.

Hence Philip's coins bear the image of Augustus or Tiberius, contrasting in this respect with those of Herod the Great (which have neither name nor image of the emperor) and those of Antipas (some of which bear the emperor's name, without his image). In addition, all the coins of Philip bear the image of a temple (the splendid temple of Augustus built by Herod the Great near the Grotto of Pan—τὸ Πάνειον—at the source of the Jordan: cp Jos. Ant. xv. 10:3, B. J. i. 21:3).

Having been brought up, like all Herod's sons, at Rome, Philip's sympathies were entirely Roman. Owing to the non-Jewish character of his territory his Hellenistic and Roman policy was more successful than was the ease with his brothers. Of the events of his thirty-seven years of rule (4 B.C.—34 A.D.) we know indeed nothing beyond the summary given by Josephus.

His rule was marked by moderation and quiet, and his whole life was spent in his own territory. His progresses were attended by a few chosen friends, and the seat on which he sat to give judgment always followed him; so that when any one, who wanted his assistance, met him he made no delay, but set down the tribunal wherever he might be, and heard the case (Ant. xviii. 46).

Philip seems to have had scientific leanings, judging from the story told of his supposed discovery and proof that the sources of the Jordan were really connected by a subterranean passage with the circular lake called Phiale (Φιάλη, Birket Ram?), 120 stades from Cæsarea (B. J. iii. 10:7).

Apart from his evident administrative ability, Philip retained only one quality of his race—the passion for building. Early in his rule he rebuilt Pania (Πανίας, Πανεύς), at the head-waters of the Jordan, and named it Cæsarea; he also created the city of Julia, formerly the village of Bethsaida. See CÆSAREA, § 7 ff.; BETHSAIDA, § 1. He was only once married—to Salome, the daughter of Herodias—and died without issue. After his death his territory was attached to the province of Syria, retaining, however, the right of separate administration of its finances (Ant. xviii. 46). Gaius on his accession (37 A.D.) gave it to Agrippa I. with the title of king.

7. Herod Agrippa I.—(Ἡρώδης [Ti.], -ῶδ. [WH], Acts; Ἀγρίππας, Josephus and Coins).

Son of Aristobulus (Herod the Great's son by Mariamme I.) and Bernice (daughter of Salome, 12. Herod Agrippa I. Herod the Great's sister: Jos. Ant. xviii. 54). He was called after his grandfather's friend Agrippa (see § 4).

Shortly before the death of Herod the Great, Agrippa and his mother were sent to Rome, where they were befriended by Antonia, widow of the elder Drusus (brother of the emperor Tiberius). Agrippa and the younger Drusus (the emperor's son) became fast friends; but when Drusus died, in 23 A.D., Agrippa found himself obliged to leave Rome with nothing but the memory of his debts and extravagances. He retired to Malatha, a stronghold in Idumæa, and meditated suicide; but his wife Cypros¹ appealed to his sister Herodias, with the result that Antipas gave him a pension and the office of Agoranomos (controller of the market) at Tiberias. Before very long there was a quarrel, and Agrippa resumed his career as adventurer. For a time he was with the Roman governor Flaccus in Antioch; but ultimately he arrived again in Italy (36 A.D.), after running the gauntlet of his creditors (Ant. xviii. 63). He attached himself to Gaius the grandson of Antonia. An incautiously uttered wish for the speedy accession of Gaius (Caligula) was overheard and reported to the old emperor, and Agrippa lay in prison during the last six months of Tiberius.

Caligula, on his accession (37 A.D.) at once set Agrippa free, and bestowed upon him what had been the tetrarchy of his half-uncle Philip, together with that of Lysanias (viz., ABILENE [q. v.] Lk. 3:1; cp Dio Cass. 59:8), with the title of king (cp Acts 12:1) and the right to wear the diadem; he also presented him with a golden chain equal in weight to his iron fetters (Ant. xviii. 6:10). The Senate conferred upon him the honorary rank of prætor (Philo, in Flacc. § 6). Three years later he obtained the forfeited tetrarchy of Herod Antipas (Ant. xviii. 7:2). He adroitly used his influence with the emperor to induce him to abandon his mad design of erecting a statue of himself in the temple at Jerusalem (Ant. xviii. 8:7).² Agrippa was in Rome when Gaius fell by the dagger of Chærea (Jan. 41 A.D.), and by his coolness at a critical moment contributed largely to securing the empire for Claudius (Ant. xix. 4:1 f.). In return for this service he received Judæa and Samaria, being also confirmed in his previous possessions; he also obtained consular rank (Ant.

² Apparently this abandonment was only temporary: a peremptory decree was finally sent, and the crisis was averted only by the emperor's assassination. The account given by Josephus of the manner of Agrippa's intervention differs from that given by Philo, Leg. ad Caium, § 55 f., and seems worked up on conventional lines—this romantic apocryphal element is very conspicuous in the whole account of Agrippa's life.

xix. 51; Bt ii. 115; Dio Cass. 608, τιμὰς ὑπατικὰς ἔνειμε). These grants were confirmed by solemnities in the Forum (cp Suet. Claud. 25). For his brother Herod he obtained the grant of the kingdom of Chalcis in Lebanon. In part also at least his influence must be seen in the edicts published by Claudius in favour of the Jews throughout the empire, freeing them from those public obligations which were incompatible with their religious convictions. In putting under Agrippa the whole extent of territory ruled by his grandfather, 'it was certainly the design of Claudius to resume the system followed at the time of Herod the Great and to obviate the dangers of the immediate contact between the Romans and the Jews' (Mommsen, Prov. of R. Emp. 220c).

Now began the second period in Agrippa's life, in which the spendthrift adventurer appears as a model of Pharisaic piety. He began his three years of actual rule with significant acts—the dedication in the temple of the golden chain received from Gaius, the offering of sacrifices in all their details, and the payment of the charges of a great number of Nazirites (cp Acts 21.24). 'He loved to live continually in Jerusalem, and strictly observed the laws of his country, keeping himself in perfect purity, and not allowing a single day to pass over his head without its sacrifice' (Jos. Ant. xix. 73; so in the Talmud, if the references are not in part to the younger Agrippa). His appeal to Petronius, governor of Syria, in the matter of an outrage against Judaism in the Phœnician town of Dora was based on general grounds of policy and national self-respect, and need not be traced specially to his correct attitude with regard to Pharisaism. It was undoubtedly a consequence of this attitude that, though of a mild disposition (Ant. xix. 73), he began a persecution of the Christians (Acts 12.1). James the great was sacrificed, and Peter escaped only by a miracle.

Agrippa's action against the Christians is supposed by some to have been due to the famine over 'all the world' (Acts 11.23), a generalisation which cannot be entirely defended by the assidua sterilitates that marked the reign of Claudius (Suet. Claud. 18), or the enumeration of the occasions mentioned by other authors (in Rome, at the beginning of his reign, Dio Cass. 60.11; in Greece, in his eighth or ninth year, Ens. Chr. 2.152; in Rome, in his eleventh year, Tac. Ann. 12.43. Cp Zahn, Einl. 2.415). Just as little can we defend the words βοῦβρωσις . . . κόσμον ἐπέσχετο πάντα of the inscr. of Apollonia in Galatia referring to famine in Asia Minor in 57 A.D. (IG 3973; Rams. Stud. Oxon. IV., 96, p. 52f.). The exaggeration is natural. It is indeed true that often subsequently public calamities were the signal for persecution (cp Blass, Act. Apost. l.c.); but the famine referred to in the prophecy of Agabus occurred in 45-46 A.D. (cp Rams. Paul the Traveller, pp. 49, 68), after the death of Agrippa. Nevertheless the latest date that will fit the prophecy is 41 A.D., if not earlier. Such a prophecy might well be regarded outside the Christian circle as a threat.

The outspoken Jewish sympathies of the king cost him the affection of the towns that adhered to the Romans, and of the troops organised in Roman fashion: at any rate the report of his death was received with outrageous jubilation on the part of the troops in Caesarea on the coast (Καίσαρῆς καὶ Σεβαστηῖοί, Jos. Ant. xix. 9.1 xx. 8.7).

The striking incident recorded in the Mishna (Sotâ, 78) is to be referred to this Agrippa rather than to Agrippa II. When at the Feast of Tabernacles (consequently in 41 A.D.) he read, according to custom, the Book of Deuteronomy, he burst into tears, at the passage 'Thou mayest not set a stranger over thee, which is not thy brother' (Dt. 17.15): but the people cried out, 'Be not grieved, Agrippa! Thou art our brother!'¹

The question as to how far Agrippa was sincere in all this is difficult.

It must be remembered that Agrippa was not only a vassal king (see § 4), but a Roman citizen, belonging by adoption to the Gens Julia (cp the inscr. quoted under BENEFICENCE, and Schür. Hist. 2.162 n.), so that he owed concessions to the imperial system that were not in strictness compatible with his position as a Jewish monarch. This fact must have been recognised by the strictest Jew (always excepting the fanatical Zealots), who must perceive have tacitly consented to the king's playing on behalf of the nation two contradictory parts. It is true, the difficulty with which he had to grapple was only the standing problem of his house. As compared with his grandfather, however, he had this advantage—that rival claims were silenced; or rather in his own person he combined those of both Hasmonæans and Herodians. At the same time, his long residence in Rome, where he had been in closest contact with the mainspring of the imperial machinery, had given him an insight into the possibilities of his rule far superior to that possessed by any other member of the family. Two episodes of his reign show clearly that he grasped these possibilities. On the N. of Jerusalem he began the building of a wall which, if completed, would have rendered the city impregnable to direct assault. It was stopped by the emperor on the report of C. Vibius Marsus, who, as governor of Syria, had the duty of watching the imperial interests in the protected states in his neighbourhood (Jos. Ant. xix. 72; cp Tac. Hist. 5.12). Of still greater significance was the conference of vassal princes of Rome assembled by Agrippa at Tiberias, viz. Antiochus of Commagene, Sampsiceranus of Emesa, Cotys of Armenia Minor, Polemon of Pontus, and Herod of Chalcis. This was rudely broken up by Marsus himself (Ant. xix. 81).

The skill with which Agrippa brought into alliance with himself the Pharisaic element, which, alike in its moderate and in its extreme forms, constituted the backbone of the nation, with the intention of finding therein a basis for a really national policy, proves him to have possessed statesmanlike qualities even superior to those of Herod the Great. His premature death prevented the realisation of his schemes; but it is at least doubtful whether we shall not be right in holding that the glory of the Herodian rule reached its real culmination in Agrippa's reign.

Of Agrippa's death we have two accounts.

According to Josephus, he went to Caesarea in order to celebrate games in honour of the emperor (Ant. xix. 82, ὕπερ τῆς ἐκείνου σωτηρίας—which can only refer to the safe return of Claudius from his victorious British expedition; spring of 44 A.D.; cp Dio Cass. 60.23; Suet. Claud. 17). The leading men of the kingdom were there gathered (Acts 12.20 mentions particularly a deputation from Tyre and Sidon, introduced by 'Blastus, the king's chamberlain'). On the second day of the festival, as he entered the theatre clad in a robe of silver tissue gleaming in the sun, Agrippa was saluted by his courtiers as more than mortal. The shouts of θεός and εὐμενῆς εἶπες, as if to a divine being, remind us of Acts 12.22, 'a god's voice and not man's' (θεοῦ φωνὴ καὶ οὐκ ἀνθρώπου). Shortly afterwards, looking upwards, the king spied an owl sitting over his head on one of the ropes, and recognised it as the messenger of doom¹ (alluding to the omen which, during his early imprisonment, portended his good fortune, Ant. xviii. 67). He was seized at that instant with severe pains, and in five days he was dead. Though more detailed, this account agrees substantially with that in the NT.

It has been suggested, however, that the two narratives are actually connected with each other, and that the intermediate stage is marked by the rendering of the story in Eusebius (HE 2.10), in which the owl of Josephus appears as an angel. The narrative of Acts is not without its apocryphal features.

Note especially the expression 'he was eaten of worms' (v. 23, γενόμενος σκαληκόβρωτος). For this there is no warrant in Josephus, who describes perhaps an attack of peritonitis (cp διακάρδιον ἔσχεν ὀδύνην, ἄβρου δ' αὐτῆς τοῦ κοιλίας προσέφθυσεν ἀλγυμα μετὰ σφοδρότητος ἀρξάμενον). To be eaten of worms was the conventional ending of tyrants and monumental criminals (e.g., Pheretima, queen of Cyrene, Herod. 4.205; Sulla the Dictator, Plut., who gives other instances; Antiochus Epiphanes, 2 Macc. 9.9, but not in 1 Macc. 6.8; the end of Herod the Great is evidently regarded as very similar). In this way tradition, Christian and pagan, took its revenge.

8. Herod Agrippa II.—(Ἀγρίππας ὁ βασιλεὺς [Ti. WH], Acts 25.13; βασιλ. Ἀγρ., 262. Ἀγρ. ὁ

13. Herod Agrippa II. simply, or ὁ βασιλ. Ἀγρ. in Jos. His full name, Marcus Julius Agrippa, is found on coins and inscriptions, see reff. in Schür. Hist. 2.191 n.).

Son of Agrippa I. and Cypros. He was only seventeen years old at the time of his father's death, and Claudius, though personally inclined to the contrary, was advised not to allow him to succeed to his father's kingdom (Ant. xix. 9.1).

Consequently, the whole of Palestine came under the direct rule of Rome, and was administered by procurators under the supervision of the governor of Syria (cp Marq. Rom. Staatsv. [2], 1411 n.). 'The Claudian government had here, as elsewhere, lighted on the right course, but had not the energy to carry it out irrespective of accessory considerations' (Momms. Prov. of Rom. Emp. 2201). The death of the elder Agrippa, in fact, had as its consequence the final absorption of all Palestine west of the Jordan (with the exception of certain parts of Galilee subsequently given to his son) within the circle of directly-governed territory (Tac. Hist. 59).

Agrippa II. resided in Rome, where he was able to use his influence with some effect on behalf of the Jews (Ant. xx. 1263). His uncle, Herod of Chalcis, had been invested by Claudius with the superintendence of the temple and the sacred treasury, together with the right of nominating the high priest (Ant. xx. 13); on his death in 48 A.D. these privileges were transferred to Agrippa II.¹ Agrippa also received his uncle's kingdom of Chalcis (50 A.D.: Bj ii. 121). Four years later he surrendered this, and received in return what had been the tetrarchy of Philip (viz. Batanava, Gaulonitis, and Trachonitis), with Abila, which had been the tetrarchy of Lysanias (Bj ii. 128). This was in 53 A.D. This realm was further enlarged by Nero, who conferred upon him the cities and territories of Tiberias and Tarichee on the sea of Galilee, and the city of Julias with fourteen surrounding villages (Bj ii. 132; Ant. xx. 84). This accession of territory was made probably in 56 A.D. (see Schür. Hist. 2194 n.).

Agrippa gratified his hereditary passion for building by the improvement of his capital Cæsarea (Philippi), which he named Neronias (see his coins), and by adding to the magnificence of the Roman colony of Berytus (Ant. xx. 94). In all other directions his hands were tied, and the history of the previous few years must have convinced him that it was no longer possible for a Jewish king to play any independent part. It is probable that his general policy should be ascribed to astuteness rather than to 'indolence and general feebleness' (Schür. Hist. 2196). By training he was far more a Roman than a Jew.² Occasionally, indeed, he yielded to the claims of his Jewish descent (see, however, col. 754, top); but as a rule he was utterly indifferent to the religious interests of his time and country, and the subtleties of the scribes can only have amused him.

(See Grätz, 'Agrippa II. und der Zustand Judæa's nach dem Untergang Jerusalems,' MGH 7 80 481-489 [1871].)

In Acts 25 13-26 32 we have an interesting account of an appearance of Paul before the Jewish king and the Roman governor Festus at Cæsarea. The utterance of Agrippa in 26 28 has been well explained by B. Weiss (Ap.-gesch., in 'Texte u. Untersuch. zur Gesch. der altchrist. Lit.' ix. 34). In accordance with what we know of Agrippa's character, it must be viewed as a virtual repudiation of that belief in the prophets which was attributed to him by Paul. 'King Agrippa! believest thou the prophets,' Paul had said; 'I know that thou believest' (v. 27). The gently ironical rejoinder amounts to this: 'on slight grounds you would make me a believer in your assertion that the Messiah has come.' (For another view see CHRISTIAN, NAME OF, col. 754, u. 1).

Agrippa did all in his power to restrain his countrymen from going to war with Rome and rushing on destruction (Bj ii. 164); and he steadfastly maintained his own loyalty to Rome, even after his Galilæan cities joined the revolutionary party. There was no other course to pursue. The catastrophe was inevitable; and the last of the Herods could not help witnessing, and to some extent aiding it. For a time he was at Rome; but on his return to Palestine he went to the camp of Titus, where he remained until the end of the war. Probably he was present at the magnificent games with which Titus celebrated at Cæsarea (Philippi) his conquest of Jerusalem (Bj vii. 2). On the conclusion of the war Agrippa's dominions were extended in a northerly direction. In 75 A.D. he went to Rome, and was raised to the rank of prætor (Dio Cass. 66 15). We know that he corresponded with Josephus about the latter's History of the Jewish War, which he praised for its accuracy (Jos. Vit. 65; c. Ap. 19). He appears to have died in Trajan's third year (100 A.D.). He left no descendants; perhaps, indeed, he was never married. His domains were incorporated in the province of Syria.

9. Berenice.—(Βερνίκη [Ti. WH]: the Macedonian form of Φερηνίκη.) The oldest of the three daughters of Agrippa I. (Jos. Ant. xix.

14. Berenice 91). She was betrothed to Marcus, son of Alexander the Alabarch; but he died before the marriage took place (Ant. xix. 51). About 41 A.D., being then about thirteen years old, Berenice became the second wife of her uncle Herod of Chalcis,¹ by whom she had two sons, Bernicianus and Hircanus (Bj ii. 116). When Herod died in 48 A.D. Berenice joined her brother in Rome, and black stories were circulated as to their relationship.² With the object of giving these rumours the lie, Berenice at length,³ by means of her wealth, induced Polemon II., king of Cilicia, to be circumcised and to marry her; but she soon deserted him (δὲ ἀκολασίαν, ὡς ἔφασαν, Jos. xx. 73) and returned to Agrippa. She accompanied him on his visit to Festus, as above related (see § 13. Acts 25 23, μετὰ πολλῆς φαντασίας, 'with great pomp,' refers especially to her, as is clear from the order of the words). She is next heard of in Jerusalem, fulfilling a 'vow of a Nazirite' (cp Nu. 6 1 f.). That she inherited the personal courage which distinguished her family was shown by her brave attempt, at the risk of her life, to stay the massacre ordered by Florus, the last and worst of the procurators of Judæa (Bj ii. 151). Her sympathy was not allowed to blind her to the prudent course; but, like her brother, she was an ardent supporter of the Roman cause, and of the Flavian dynasty in particular (Tac. Hist. 281). She was, in fact, a Jewish Cleopatra ('on a small scale,' Momms. Prov. of Rom. Emp. 2219), and Titus, as early apparently as 67 A.D., had fallen a victim to her charms; his return to Judæa from Corinth in order to concert measures with his father on the downfall of Galba was ascribed by gossip to his passion (Tac. Hist. 22, 'accensum desiderio Berenices reginæ'). The intimacy was renewed in Rome in 75 A.D. Berenice lived on the Palatine with him as his wife (Dio Cass. 66 15, πάντα ἤδη ὡς καὶ γυνὴ αὐτοῦ οὖσα ἐπόλει), and it was said that Titus had promised to make her his consort (Suet. Tit. 7). He was, however, too shrewd to endanger his popularity by opposition to the public feeling, and insisted upon her departure from the capital. After Vespasian's death she returned; but Titus took no notice at all of her—she had played for an empire, and lost.⁴

To these notices of her life we can only add the inscription found in Athens (CIG 361 = C. I. 31 no. 536): 'Ἡ βουλή ἡ ἐξ Ἀρείου πάγου καὶ ἡ βουλή τῶν ἄλλων καὶ ὁ δήμος Ἰουλίαν Βερηνίκη βασιλισσάν μεγάλην, Ἰουλίαν Ἀγρίππας βασιλέως θυγατέρα καὶ μεγάλην βασιλικὴν ἐνεργετὴν τῆς πόλεως ἐκγόνοι.

10. Drusilla (Δρουσίλλα [Ti. WH], Acts 24 24. A diminutive form, from Drusus; like Priscilla, Acts 18 2).

The youngest of the three daughters of 15. Drusilla. Agrippa I.,⁵ born about 38 A.D. (Jos.

¹ His first wife was Mariamme, a granddaughter of Herod the Great; by her he had one son, Aristobolus (Ant. xviii. 54).

HEROD, FAMILY OF

Ant. xix. 91). She was betrothed by her father to Epiphanes, son of Antiochus, king of Commagene; but he refused to be circumcised, and the marriage did not take place. After Agrippa II. received his kingdom from Claudius, he gave his sister in marriage to Azizus, king of Emesa, on condition of his accepting circumcision. Antonius Felix, brother of the emperor's powerful freedman Pallas, was captivated by her beauty,¹ and employed as his agent in seducing her affections one Simon,² a Cypriote, who had the reputation of being a magician (some would identify him with Simon Magus of Acts 89). Partly in order to escape the persecutions of her sister Berenice, who was jealous of her beauty, Drusilla deserted her husband and became the third wife of Felix, who was then procurator of Judæa (for his character, see Tac. Hist. 59; Ann. 1254; Suet. Claud. 28, 'trium reginarum maritus'). This was in 53 A.D. It is not always realised that Drusilla can only have been about sixteen years old at the time.

In Acts 2424 we read how Felix 'with his wife Drusilla, which was a Jewess' (so AV; τῇ ἰδίᾳ γυναίκει, WH; RV, 'with D., his wife'; marg: 'his own wife'; ἰδίᾳ is omitted by all uncial MSS, except BC₂), heard Paul 'concerning the faith in Christ' (in 58 A.D.). Drusilla would naturally be interested (like her brother Agrippa later, Acts 2522) to hear some account of what professed to be the fulfilment of Jewish prophecy. According to some authorities for the western text, indeed, the interview took place at her special request (so restored in v. 24 by Blass, Act. Apost. ed. phil. 1895, i.e., ἤρώτα ἰδεῖν τὸν Π. καὶ ἀκοῦσαι τὸν λόγον. βουλόμενος οὖν τὸ ἱκανὸν ποιεῖν αὐτῇ, κ.τ.λ.; and in

v. 27 the western text has τὸν δὲ Π. εἶασεν ἐν τῆρσίαι διὰ Δροῦσιλλαν—we must then suppose Drusilla to have been actuated by a spirit of revenge, like Herodias in the very similar case of John the Baptist).

Drusilla bore to Felix a son, called Agrippa, who perished in the great eruption of Vesuvius (in the reign of Titus), by which Pompeii and Herculaneum were destroyed (Jos. Ant. xx. 72, ὁ νεανίας οὗτος σὺν τῇ γυναίκεϊ . . . ἠφανίσθη; some take this to mean 'along with Drusilla,' but more probably it signifies his own wife).

The authority for the history of the whole Herodian family is Josephus; isolated references only are found in other writers.

16. Authorities. Of modern books dealing with the history we need only mention Schürer's great work, Geschichte des Jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi; the second edition of which is accessible in an English translation (6 vols.). Two vols. of a new edition in German have appeared (2, 3, '98). Farrar's Herods is a popular account written without sympathy or historical insight. The various 'Histories of NT Times,' both English and foreign, deal with the family, deriving their facts from Schürer. The evidence of the coins will be found in Madden's Coins of the Jews.

Appended is a genealogy of the Herodian family. Names printed in heavy type are those of members of the family mentioned in the NT. All

HERODIANS

HERODIANS (Ἡρωδιανοὶ [Ti.]; -ρωδ- [WH]). The Herodians were the adherents of the dynasty of Herod, who made common cause with the Pharisees against Jesus, as they had previously done against John the Baptist (Lk. 1331). Jesus, on his side, did not spare denunciation of his opponents, in whom he recognised in different forms the same corrupting power, the same 'leaven' of wickedness. 'Beware,' he said (Mk. 815), 'of the leaven of the Pharisees and of the leaven of Herod' (we may disregard the slightly supported reading τῶν Ἡρωδιανῶν).

In Mt. 1612 'leaven' is explained to mean 'teaching' (διδασχῆ). The early evangelic tradition, however, seems not to have been unanimous as to the meaning of 'leaven'; in Lk. 121 the 'leaven of the Pharisees' is interpreted as 'hypocrisy.' We may venture then to give the phrase 'the leaven of Herod' its natural explanation; it means the vital spirit of the kingdom of Herod, just as the 'leaven' of the parable in Mt. 1333 Lk. 1321, means the vital spirit of the kingdom of heaven. Cp GOSPELS, § 140(c).

At the time when the question respecting the tribute money was put to Jesus (Mt. 2217 Mk. 1214)—a question in putting which the 'Herodians' as well as the Pharisees were concerned—Judæa was not under any member of the Herodian family, but under a Roman procurator. Still, the Herodian spirit lived on. It was not true, as the Herodians pretended, that they scrupled about paying tribute to Cæsar; what they longed for was the re-establishment of the Herodian kingdom in spite of its subjection to Rome, as representing that union of Hellenism and Judaism which seemed to enable Jews to 'make the best of both worlds.' Such a re-establishment, however, was hindered by the preachers of Messianism, and the friends of Herodianism recognised Jesus as one of these. So these 'spies,' as they are called (Lk. 2020), put the insidious question to him, 'Is it lawful to give tribute unto Cæsar, or not,' simply 'that they might catch him in talk,' and accuse him to the governor.

The Herodians are referred to again in Mk. 36. Early in the Galilæan ministry of Jesus they are said to have joined the Pharisees in plotting his destruction. This, however, is evidently a mistake. In the country of the tetrach Antipas there could not be a party called 'Herodians.' If Greek-speaking Jews in Galilee ever used the term Ἡρωδιανοί, they could only mean by it 'members of the household of Herod,' a meaning which, to be sure, is not unsupported in modern times, but is unsuitable in Mk. 1213, and is not favoured by the phraseology of Josephus.¹

It is remarkable that in Mt. 166 the place of the 'Herodians' is taken by the Sadducees. No stress, however, can be laid upon this; there is no evidence that there was a faction of the Sadducees which was devoted to the interests of the Herodian family. It was more natural to the evangelist to speak of the Pharisees and the Sadducees; he had no thought of suggesting that the Sadducees and the Herodians had any points in common. Still less can the Pharisees and the Herodians have had any real sympathy. There is in Jos. Ant. xvii. 34 a story that the Pharisees predicted the fall of Herod and his house and the accession of his brother Pheroras to the throne of Israel; this is rightly rejected by Wellhausen (JIG³ 337 n.). Just as little could they have attached their hopes for the future to Herod or to any Herodian prince. Yet as early a writer as Tertullian (De præscript. adv. hæret., Append.) speaks of those who 'Christum Herodem esse dixerunt,' and as modern a writer as Renan (Vie de Jésus, 226) supposes the Boethosian section of the Sadducees to be intended by the Herodians of the evangelists. Hitzig too (GII 559) apparently agrees with Tertullian. These views and a similar theory of Ewald (GVI 4532 547) no longer find any support.

HERODIAS (Ἡρωδιάς), Mt. 146, etc. See HEROD, § 10.

HERODION (Ἡρωδίων [Ti. WH]) is saluted in Rom. 1611 as 'my kinsman,' an expression which suggests that he was of Jewish origin (cp ROMANS, §§ 4, 10). The name would indicate the freedman of some prince of the dynasty of Herod. Weizsäcker (Apost. Age, 1397 399) suggests that he may have worked for Christ within the household of Narcissus mentioned just afterwards (cp APOLLES).

In the list of the Pseudo-Dorotheus, Herodion figures as bishop of Patras. According to the ὑπόμνημα of Peter and Paul by the Pseudo-Symeon Metaphrastes he was so consecrated by Peter, and he and Olympos were both beheaded at Rome at the time when Peter was crucified there. He is commemorated in the Greek Menaia on 8th April.

HERON (Ἡρῶν), an unclean bird (Lev. 1119 Dt. 1418†; χαρᾶδριος [BAFL]), for which RV^{mg} suggests 'ibis' as an alternative rendering (Onk. 𐤇𐤃𐤍). According to the Lexicons 'anāphāh is of quite uncertain meaning; Lidd. and Scott translate Ἡ's χαρᾶδριος the 'stone-curlew' or thick-kneed bustard, Edicnemus crepitans; but even if this be correct one hesitates to identify this bird with the 'anāphāh. Unless the word 'anāphāh is misplaced, we may with some confidence infer from the proximity of Ἡρῶν, 'stork,' that it means the order of herons (note 'after its kind'). At least seven species of heron are common in Palestine.

Both the Common and the Purple Herons (Ardea cinerea and A. purpurea), the Egrets (A. alba and A. garzetta), and the Squacco Heron (A. ralloides), as well as the Buff-backed, may often be seen fishing by the Sea of Galilee, and of the Buff-backed Heron (A. bubulcus), often called the White Ibis, 'immense flocks live and breed in the impenetrable swamps of the Huleh' (Tristram NHB 241 f.).

It is this class of birds which is presumably meant by the Ass. anbatu, with which the Lexicons (after Friedr. Del.) naturally compare 'anāphāh. The Ibis, both white and black, is common in the swamps of the Egyptian Delta, and may in the winter be seen anywhere in the basin of the Upper Nile. The Egyptians held it sacred to Thoth. Ibis, however, is too definite a rendering.

HESHBON (חֶשְׁבֹן; ΕΣΕΒΩΝ [BNAQ]; heshbon), a town of Moab, often mentioned in the Hexateuch (JE, D, and P); in Is. 154 168 f. Jer. 482 34 45 493; in Cant. 74[5] (MT, G, but see BATH-RABBIM); and in Judith 515 (εσεβων [ε]σας [B], εσεβων [NA]). Heshbon (ησεβων, εσεβων) and the 'Hesebonitis' (εσεβωνιτις, εσεβ. σεβ.) are named repeatedly also in Josephus (Ant. xii. 411 xiii. 154 xv. 85, BJ ii. 181 iii. 33) and εσεβων or Esebon is defined in OS 117 29 ff. 253 24 ff. as being the contemporary εσβους or Esbus, 'a notable city of Arabia in the mountains facing Jericho, 20 R. m. from the Jordan.' It is the modern Heshbān, which is finely situated on the edge of the W. Heshbān at a height of 600 feet above the 'Ain Heshbān, and close to the watershed from which the W. Habis drains southwards into the Zerkā Ma'in. The ruins, chiefly Roman, are mainly on two hills, 2930 and 2954 feet above sea level; Mt. Nebo, 5 miles to the SW, is considerably lower (2643 ft.). There are remains of a castle and of a temple, and on the east, at the base of the castle hill, a great reservoir, now ruinous and dry. 'It is a difficult thing,' remarks Post (PEFO, '88, p. 190), 'for the imagination to restore to the reservoir the beauty which made the fishpond of Heshbon, a suitable simile for the eyes of Solomon's bride' (Cant. 74[5]). There are, of course, plenty of pools near the 'Ain Heshbān (see Tristram, Land of Moab, 340). The text, however, is open to suspicion; see BATH-RABBIM.

The 'way of Hethlon' is one of a series of landmarks by which Ezekiel (47¹⁵ 48¹) defines the ideal north boundary of Canaan. In Nu. 34^{7 ff.} (post-exilic), where the boundary is on the whole the same, Hethlon does not appear. In Ezekiel it seems to lie between the point where the border leaves the Mediterranean and that at which it strikes the Hamathite frontier. If, as seems possible, Ezekiel (like Josh. 13⁵) contemplates the inclusion in Canaan of Phœnicia as far N. as Gebal and of all Lebanon, the 'way of Hethlon' may be identical with the route from the coast up the Eleutheros (Nahr el-Kebir) round the northern slopes of Lebanon to Emesa (Hims) and Riblah. In that case we may consider Furrer's proposal (ZDPV 8²⁷) to identify Hethlon with the village of Heitela, N. of Tripoli, between Nahr el-Kebir and Nahr Akkâr (Robinson, BR 4⁵⁷⁶).

The scholar who warned us so pointedly against dwelling too much on possibly casual resemblances of names would not have been sorry for an excuse to abandon this hazardous conjecture (for another, see van Kasteren, Rev. bibl., '95, p. 24; cp Hommel, in Hastings' DB 2³⁶³). As Halévy (Journ. As., Jan.-Feb. '99) has seen, וְהָרֵךְ וְהָרֵךְ, the words preceding חתלון in Ezek. 47¹⁵ and 48¹ respectively, should be הַרְרֵךְ (see HADRACH). It follows that חתלון ('Hethlon') is a corruption of הַתְּחֵרֵן; a verb is almost, if not quite, necessary. For the reason of the choice of this verb, see HOR, MOUNT, z. W. R. S.—T. K. C.

The name Pentateuch, found already in Tertullian and Origen, corresponds to the Jewish חמשה חומשי התורה (the five-fifths of the Torah, or Law); the several books were named by the Jews from their initial words, though, at least, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy had also titles resembling those we use—viz., 'Priests' Torah' (תורת כהנים), 'The Fifth containing the enumeration of the people, the mustering,' חמש הפקודים (ἀμμεσφεκωλειωμ, Origen, in Eus. HE 6²⁵), and 'Duplicate of the Torah' (משנה תורה). The Pentateuch, together with Joshua, Judges, and Ruth, with which it is usually united in Greek MSS, makes up the Octateuch; the Pentateuch and Joshua together have recently been named the Hexateuch. The date of the division of the Torah into five books cannot be made out; it is probably older than the Septuagint translation. See CANON, § 23^{ff.}

A. EARLIEST CRITICISM.

At an early date, doubts suggested themselves as to the Mosaic authorship; but it was not till the seventeenth century that these became so strong that they could not be suppressed.²

It was observed that Moses does not speak of himself in the first person, but that some other writer speaks of him in the third,—a writer, too, who lived long after. The expression of Gen. 12⁶, 'the Canaanite was then in the land,' is spoken to readers who had long forgotten that a different nation from Israel had once occupied the Holy Land; the words of Gen. 36³¹, 'these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel,' have no prophetic aspect; they point to an author who wrote under the Hebrew monarchy. Again, the 'book of the wars of Yahwè' (Nu. 21¹⁴) cannot possibly be cited by Moses himself, as it contains a record of his own deeds; and, when Dt. 34¹⁰ (cp Nu. 12) says that 'there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses,' the writer is necessarily one who looked back to Moses through a long series of later prophets.

At the same time attention was drawn to a variety of contradictions, inequalities, transpositions, and repetitions of events in the Pentateuch, such as excluded the idea that the whole came from a single pen. Thus Peyrerius remarked that Gen. 20 and 26 stand in an impossible chronological context; and on the incongruity of Gen. 1 and 2, which he pressed very strongly, he rested his hypothesis of the Preadamites. Such observations could not but grievously shake the persuasion that Moses was the author of the Pentateuch, whilst at the same time they directed criticism to a less negative task—viz., the analysis of the Pentateuch. For this, indeed, the seventeenth century did not effect anything considerable; but at least two conclusions came out with sufficient clearness. The first of these was the self-contained character of Deuteronomy, which in those days there was a disposition to regard as the oldest book of the Pentateuch, and that with the best claims to authenticity. In the second place the Pentateuchal laws and the Pentateuchal history were sharply distinguished; the chief difficulties were felt to lie in the narrative, and there seemed to be less reason for questioning the Mosaic authorship of the laws.

Spinoza's bold conjecture that in their present form not only the Pentateuch but also the other historical

2. Astruc. books of the OT were composed by Ezra ran far ahead of the laborious investigation of details necessary to solve the previous question of the composition of the Pentateuch. Jean Astruc has the merit of opening the true path of this investigation. He recognised in Genesis two main sources, between which he divided the whole materials of the book, with some few exceptions, and these sources he distinguished by the mark that the one used for God the name Elōhim (Gen. 1⁵; cp Ex. 6³) and the other the name Yahwè (Gen. 2-4).¹ Astruc's hypothesis, fortified by the observation of other linguistic differences which regularly accompanied the variation in the names of

But it would manifestly have been out of place to attempt to give under any one of these headings a connected history of the long march of Pentateuch-criticism from its earliest beginnings down to the period when the 'Graf-Wellhausen' hypothesis may be held to have met with the general acceptance of scholars,—a march with the stages of which it is nevertheless important that every serious student should be familiar. The following authoritative survey of its course, originally made in the *Ency. God, was introduced into Germany by Eichhorn (Einl. in d. AT), and proved there the fruitful and just point of departure for all further inquiry. At first, indeed, it was with but uncertain steps that critics advanced from the analysis of Genesis to that of the other books, where the simple criterion of the alternation of the divine names was no longer available.

3. Fragment hypothesis. In the hands of the Scotsman Geddes and the German Vater the Pentateuch resolved itself into an agglomeration of longer and shorter fragments, between which no threads of continuous connection could be traced¹ ('Fragment-hypothesis'). The Fragment-hypothesis was mainly supported by arguments drawn from the middle books of the Pentateuch, and as limited to these it long found wide support. Even De Wette started from it in his investigations; but this was really an inconsistency, for his fundamental idea was to show throughout all parts of the Pentateuch traces of certain common tendencies, and even of one deliberate plan; nor was he far from recognizing the close relation between the Elohist of Genesis and the legislation of the middle books.

De Wette's chief concern, however, was not with the literary but with the historical criticism of the Pentateuch, and in the latter he made an epoch.

In his Dissertatio Critica of 1805 (Opusc. Theol. 149-168) he placed the composition of Deuteronomy in the time of King Josiah (arguing from a comparison of 2 K. 22 f. with Dt. 12), and pronounced it to be the most recent stratum of the Pentateuch, not, as had previously been supposed, the oldest.

4. Historical criticism (De Wette). In his Kritischer Versuch über die Glaubwürdigkeit der Bücher der Chronik (1806) he showed that the laws of Moses are unknown to the post-Mosaic history; this he did by instituting a close comparison of Samuel and Kings with Chronicles, from which it appeared that the variations of the latter are to be explained not by the use of other sources, but solely by the desire of the Jewish scribes to shape the history in conformity with the law, and to give the law that place in history which, to their surprise, had not been conceded to it by the older historical books.

Finally, in his Kritik der Mosesischen Geschichte (1807), De Wette attacked the method then prevalent in Germany of eliminating all miracles and prophecies from the Bible by explaining them away, and then rationalizing what remained into a dry prosaic pragmatism. De Wette refuses to find any history in the Pentateuch; all is legend and poetry. The Pentateuch is an authority not for the history of the time it deals with, but only for the time in which it was written; it is, he says, the conditions of this much later time which the author idealizes and throws back into the past, whether in the form of narrative or of law.

De Wette's brilliant début, which made his reputation for the rest of his life,² exercised a powerful influence on his contemporaries. For several decennia, all who were open to critical ideas at all stood under his influence.

Gramberg, Leo, and Von Bohlen wrote under this influence; Gesenius in Halle, the greatest Hebraist then living, taught under it; nay, Vatke and George were guided by De Wette's ideas and started from the ground that he had conquered, although they advanced beyond him to a much more definite and better established position, and were also diametrically opposed to him in one most important point, of which we shall have more to say presently.³

Meantime a reaction was rising which sought to direct criticism towards positive rather than negative results. The chief representatives of this positive criticism, which now took up a distinct attitude of opposition to the negative criticism of De Wette, were Bleek, Ewald, Movers, and Hitzig. By giving up certain parts of the Pentateuch, especially Deuteronomy, they thought themselves able to vindicate certain other parts as beyond doubt genuinely Mosaic, just in the same way as they threw over the Davidic authorship of certain psalms in order to strengthen the claim of others to bear his name. The procedure by which particular ancient hymns or laws were sifted out from the Psalter or the Pentateuch was arbitrary; but up to a certain point the reaction was in the right.

De Wette and his followers had really gone too far in applying the same measure to all parts of the Pentateuch, and had been satisfied with a very inadequate insight into its composition and the relation of its parts. Historical criticism had hurried on too fast, and literary criticism had now to overtake it. De Wette himself felt the necessity for this, and from the year 1817 onwards—the year of the first edition of his Einleitung—he took an active and useful part in the solution of the problems of Pentateuchal analysis.

The Fragment-hypothesis was now superseded; the connection of the Elohist of Genesis with the legislation of the middle books was clearly

6. Supplement hypothesis. recognized, and the book of Joshua was included as the conclusion of the Pentateuch. The closely-knit connection and regular structure of the narrative of the Elohist impressed the critics; it seemed to supply the skeleton which had been clothed with flesh and blood by the Yahwist, in whose contributions there was no such obvious conformity to a plan. From all this it was naturally concluded that the Elohist had written the Grundschrift or primary narrative, which lay before the Yahwist and was supplemented by him ('Supplement-hypothesis').¹

This view remained dominant till Hupfeld in 1853 published his Die Quellen der Genesis und die Art ihrer Zusammensetzung. Hupfeld denied

7. Hupfeld. that the Yahwist followed the context of the Elohist narrative, merely supplementing it by additions of his own. He pointed out that such Elohist passages in Genesis as clearly have undergone a Yahwistic redaction (e.g., chaps. 20-22) belong to an Elohist different from the author of Gen. 1. Thus he distinguished three independent sources in Genesis; and he assumed further, somewhat rashly, that no one of them had anything to do with the others till a fourth and later writer wove them all together into a single whole. This assumption was corrected by Nöldeke,

8. Nöldeke. who showed that the second Elohist is preserved only in extracts embodied in the Yahwistic book, that the Yahwist and 'second' Elohist form one whole and the Grundschrift another, and that thus, in spite of Hupfeld's discovery, the Pentateuch (Deuteronomy being excluded) was still to be regarded as made up of two great layers. Nöldeke² has also the honour of having been the first to trace in detail how the Elohist Grundschrift runs through the whole Hexateuch, and of having described with masterly hand the peculiar and inflexible type of its ideas and language. In this task he was aided by the valuable material collected in Knobel's commentaries.³

The work of synthesis, however, did not hold even pace with the critical analysis; indeed, the true scope of the problem was not as yet realized.

9. Synthesis. As regards the narrative matter it was forgotten that, after the Yahwistic (i.e., JE's), the Deuteronomic, and the priestly versions of the history had been happily disentangled from one another, it was necessary to examine the mutual relations of the three, to consider them as marking so many stages of a historical tradition, which had passed through its successive phases under the action of living causes, and the growth of which could and must be traced and historically explained. Still greater faults of omission characterized the critical treatment of the legal parts of the Pentateuch. Bleek,⁴ the oracle in all such matters of the German school of 'Vermittlungstheologen' (the theologians who tried to mediate between orthodoxy and criticism alike in doctrine and in history), never looked beyond the historical framework of the priestly laws, altogether shutting his eyes to their substance. He never thought of instituting an exact comparison between them and the Deuteronomic law, still less of examining their relation to the historical and prophetic books, with which, in truth, as appears from his Introduction, he had only a very superficial acquaintance. Ewald, on the other hand, whose views as to the Priestly Code were cognate to those of Bleek, undoubtedly had an intimate acquaintance with Hebrew antiquity, and understood the prophets as no one else did. But he too neglected the task of a careful comparison between the different strata of the Pentateuchal legislation, and the equally necessary task of determining how the several laws agreed with or differed from such definite data for the history of religion as could be collected from the historical and prophetic books. He had therefore no fixed measure to apply to the criticism of the laws, though his conception of the history suffered little, and his conception of prophecy still less, from the fact that in shaping them he left the law practically out of sight, or only called it in from time to time in an irregular and rather unnatural way.

Meanwhile, two Hegelian writers, starting from the original position of De Wette, and moving on lines apart from the beaten track of criticism, had actually effected the solution of the most important problem in the whole sphere of OT study. Vatke (on whom see Cheyne's book already mentioned) and George have the honour of being the first by whom the question of the historical sequence of the several stages of the law was attacked on a sound method, with full mastery over the available evidence, and with a clear insight into the far-reaching scope of the problem. Their works made no permanent impression, however, and were neglected even by Reuss, although this scholar had fallen at the same time upon quite similar ideas, which he did not venture to publish.

The following propositions were formulated by Reuss in 1833 (or, as he elsewhere gives the date, in 1834), though they were not published till 1879. 1. L'élément historique du 11. Reuss. Pentateuque peut et doit être examiné à part et ne pas être confondu avec l'élément légal. 2. L'un et l'autre ont pu exister sans rédaction écrite. La mention, chez d'anciens écrivains, de certaines traditions patriarcales ou mosaïques, ne prouve pas l'existence du Pentateuque, et une nation peut avoir un droit coutumier sans code écrit. 3. Les traditions nationales des Israélites remontent plus haut que les lois du Pentateuque et la rédaction des premières est antérieure à celle des secondes. 4. L'intérêt principal de l'historien doit porter sur la date des lois, parce que sur ce terrain il a plus de chance d'arriver à des résultats certains. Il faut en conséquence procéder à l'interrogatoire des témoins. 5. L'histoire racontée dans les livres des Juges et de Samuel, et même en partie celle comprise dans les livres des Rois, est en contradiction avec des lois dites mosaïques; donc celles-ci étaient inconnues à l'époque de la rédaction de ces livres, à plus forte raison elles n'ont pas existé dans les temps qui y sont décrits. 6. Les prophètes du 8^e et du 7^e siècle ne savent rien du code mosaïque. 7. Jérémie est le premier prophète qui connaisse une loi écrite et ses citations rapportent au Deutéronome. 8. Le Deutéronome (45-28 68) est le livre que les prêtres prétendaient avoir trouvé dans le temple, du temps du roi Josias. Ce code est la partie la plus ancienne de la législation (rédigée) comprise dans le Pentateuque. 9. L'histoire des Israélites, en tant qu'il s'agit du développement national déterminé par des lois écrites, se divisera en deux périodes, avant et après Josias. 10. Ezéchiel est antérieur à la rédaction du code rituel et des lois qui ont définitivement organisé la hiérarchie. 11. Le livre de Josué n'est pas, tant s'en faut, la partie la plus récente de l'ouvrage entier. 12. Le rédacteur du Pentateuque se distingue clairement de l'ancien prophète Moïse. (L'histoire sainte et la loi, 237. [Paris, '79].)

The new ideas lay dormant for thirty years when they were revived through a pupil of Reuss, K. H.

12. Attempts Graf. He too was deemed at first to offer an easy victory to the weapons of 'critical analysis,' which found many vulnerable points in the original statement of his views. For, while Graf placed the legislation of the middle books very late, holding it to have been framed after the great captivity, he at first still held fast to the doctrine of the great antiquity of the so-called Elohist of Genesis (in the sense which that term bore before Hupfeld's discovery), thus violently rending the Priestly Code in twain, and separating its members by an interval of half a millennium. This he was compelled to do, because, for Genesis at least, he still adhered to the supplement hypothesis, according to which the Yahwist worked on the basis laid by the (priestly) Elohist. Here, however, he was tying himself by bonds which had been already loosed by Hupfeld; and, as literary criticism actually stood, it could show no reason for holding that the Yahwist was necessarily later than the Elohist. In the end, therefore, literary criticism offered itself as Graf's auxiliary. Following a hint of Kuenen's, he embraced the proffered alliance, gave up the violent attempt to divide the Priestly Code, and proceeded without further obstacle to extend to the historical part of that code as found in Genesis those conclusions which he had already established for its main or legislative part. Graf himself did not live to see the victory of his cause. The task of developing and enforcing his hypothesis was left to others, primarily to the great Leyden critic, A. Kuenen.¹

B. GRAF-WELLHAUSEN HYPOTHESIS.

The characteristic feature in the hypothesis of Graf is that the Priestly Code is placed later than Deuteronomy, so that the order is no longer Priestly Code, Yahwist (JE), Deuteronomy, but Jehovist (JE), Deuteronomy, Priestly Code. The method of inquiry has been already indicated; the three strata of the Pentateuch are compared with one another, and at the same time the investigator seeks to place them in their proper relation to the successive phases of Hebrew history as these are known to us from other and undisputed evidence. The process may be shortened if it be taken as agreed that the date of Deuteronomy is known from 2 K. 22 (see DEUTERONOMY, §§ 2 ff.); for this gives us at starting a fixed point, to which the less certain points can be referred.

The method can be applied alike to the historical and to the legal parts of the three strata of the Hexateuch. For JE gives legislative matter in Ex. 20-23, 34, and Deuteronomy and the Priestly Code embrace historical matters; moreover, we always find that the legal standpoint of each author influences his presentation of the history, and vice versa. The most important point, however, is the comparison of the laws, especially of the laws about worship, with the statements in the historical and prophetic books.

1. The principal law-book embodied in JE, the so-called Book of the Covenant, takes it for granted in Ex. 20-24-26 that altars are many, not one. Here

14. Laws: there is no idea of attaching value to the retention of a single place for the altar; First period: earth and rough stones are to be found everywhere, and an altar of these materials falls into ruins as easily as it is built. Again a choice of materials is given, presumably for the construction of different altars, and Yahwé proposes to come to his worshippers and bless them, not in the place where he causes his name to be celebrated, but at every such place. The law adopted in JE therefore agrees with the customary usage of the earlier period of Hebrew history; and so too does the narrative, according to which the patriarchs wherever they reside erect altars, set up cippi (massëböth), plant trees, and dig wells.

The places of which these acts of the patriarchs are related are not fortuitous, they are the same places as were afterwards famous shrines. This is why the narrator speaks of them; his interest in the sites is not antiquarian; it is due to the practical importance they held in the worship of his own day. The altar which Abraham built at Shechem is the same on which sacrifices still continued to be offered; Jacob's anointed stone at Bethel was still anointed, and tithes were still offered at it in fulfilment of vows, in the writer's own generation.

The things which a later generation deemed offensive and heathenish—high places, masseboth, sacred trees, and wells—all appear here as consecrated by patriarchal precedent, and the narrative can be understood only as a picture of what occurred daily in the first century (or thereabout) after the division of the kingdoms, thrown back into the past and clothed with ancient authority.

2. The Deuteronomic legislation begins (Deut. 12), just like the Book of the Covenant, with a law for the

15. Second period: D. place of worship. Now, however, there is a complete change; Yahwè is to be worshipped only in Jerusalem. The new law-book is never weary of repeating this command and developing its consequences in every direction. All this is directed against current usage, against 'what we are accustomed to do at this day'; the law is polemical and aims at reformation. This law therefore belongs to the second period of the history, the time when the party of reform in Jerusalem was attacking the high places.

When we read, then, that King Josiah was moved to destroy the local sanctuaries by the discovery of a law-book, this book, if we assume it to be preserved in the Pentateuch, can be none other than the legislative part of Deuteronomy in a shorter form (see further, DEUTERONOMY).

3. In the Priestly Code all worship depends on the tabernacle, and would fall to nothing apart from it.

16. Third period: P. The tabernacle is simply a means of putting the law of unity of worship in a historical form; it is the only legitimate sanctuary; there is no other spot where God dwells and shows himself, no other where man can approach God and seek his face with sacrifice and gifts. But, while Deuteronomy demands, the Priestly Code presupposes, the limitation of worship to one sanctuary. This principle is tacitly assumed as the basis of everything else, but is never asserted in so many words; the principle, it appears, is now no novelty; it can be taken for granted. Hence we conclude that the Priestly Code builds on the realization of the object aimed at in Deuteronomy, and therefore belongs to the post-exilic period, when this object had been fully secured.

An institution which in its origin must necessarily have had a negative significance as an instrument in the hands of polemical reformers is here taken to have been from the first the only intelligible and legitimate form of worship. It is so taken because established customs always appear to be natural and to need no reason for their existence.

The abolition of the local shrines in favour of Jerusalem necessarily involved the deposition of the 17. Priesthood: in Dt. provincial priesthood in favour of the sons of Zadok in the temple of Solomon.

The law of Deuteronomy tries to avoid this consequence by conceding the privilege of offering sacrifices at Jerusalem to the Levites from other places; Levites in Deuteronomy is the general name for priests whose right to officiate is hereditary. This privilege, however, was never realized, no doubt because the sons of Zadok opposed it. The latter, therefore, were now the only real priests, and the priests of the high places lost their office with the destruction of their altars; for the loss of their sacrificial dues they received a sort of eleemosynary compensation from their aristocratic brethren (2 K. 23⁹). The displacing of the provincial priests, though practically almost inevitable, went against the law of Deuteronomy; but an argument to justify it was

18. In Ezekiel. supplied by Ezekiel (Ezek. 44). The other Levites, he says, forfeited their priesthood by abusing it in the service of the high places; and for this they shall be degraded to be mere servants of the Levites of Jerusalem, who have not been guilty of the offence of doing sacrifice in provincial shrines, and thus alone deserve to remain priests. If we start from Deuteronomy, where all Levites have equal priestly rights, this argument and ordinance are plain enough; but it is utterly impossible to understand them if the Priestly Code is taken as already existing. Ezekiel views the priesthood as originally the right of all Levites, whilst by the Priestly Code a Levite who claims this right is guilty of baseless and wicked presumption, such as once cost the lives of all the company of Korah. On the other hand, the position of the Levites, which Ezekiel qualifies as a punishment and a degradation, appears to the Code as the natural position, which their ancestors from father to son had held from the first. The distinction between priest and Levite, which Ezekiel introduces expressly as an innovation, and which elsewhere in the OT is known only to the author of Chronicles, is, according to the Code, a Mosaic institution fixed and settled from the beginning. Ezekiel's ideas and aims are entirely in the same direction as the Priestly Code, and yet he plainly does not know the Code itself. This can only mean that in his day there was no such Code, and that his ordinances formed one of the steps that prepared the way for it.

The Priestly Code gives us a hierarchy fully developed, such as we find after the exile. Aaron 19. P. stands above his sons as the sons of Aaron stand above the Levites.

He has not only the highest place, but a place quite unique, like that of the Roman pontiff; his sons minister under his superintendence (Nu. 84); he himself is the only priest with full rights; as such he wears the Urim and Thummim, and the golden ephod; and none but he can enter the holy of holies and offer incense there.

Before the Exile there were, of course, differences of rank among the priests; but the chief priest was only primus inter pares; even Ezekiel knows no high priest in the sense of the Priestly Code.

The Urim and Thummim were the insignia of the Levites in general (Deut. 33⁸), and the linen ephod was worn by them all, whilst the golden ephod was not a garment, but a metal-plated image, such as the greater sanctuaries used to possess (Judg. 8²⁷, Is. 30²²). Moreover, down to the Exile the temple at Jerusalem was the king's chapel, and the priests were his servants; even Ezekiel, who in most points aims at securing the independence of the priests, gives the prince a weighty part in matters of worship, for it is he who receives the dues of the people, and in return defrays the sacrificial service. In the Priestly Code, on the other hand, the dues are paid direct to the sanctuary, the ritual service has full autonomy, and it has its own head, who holds his place by divine right.

Nay, the high priest represents more than the church's independence of the state; he exercises sovereignty over Israel.

Though sceptre and sword are lacking to the high priest, his spiritual dignity makes him the head of the theocracy. He alone is the responsible representative of the commonwealth; the names of the twelve tribes are written on his shoulders and his breast. An offence on his part inculcates the whole people and demands the same expiation as a national sin, whilst the sin-offerings prescribed for the princes mark them out as mere private persons compared with him. His death makes an epoch; the fugitive manslayer is amnestied, not on the death of the king, but on the death of the high priest. On investiture the high priest receives a kingly unction (whence his name, 'the anointed priest'); he wears the diadem and tiara of a monarch, and is clad in royal purple, the most unpriestly dress possible. When now we find that the head of the national worship is as such, and merely as such—for no political powers accompany the high-priesthood—also the head of the nation, this can only mean that the nation is one which has been deprived of its civil autonomy, that it no longer enjoys political existence, but survives merely as a church.

In truth the Priestly Code never contemplates Israel as a nation, but only as a religious community, the whole life of which is summed up in the service of the sanctuary. The community is that of the second temple, the Jewish hierarchy under that foreign dominion which alone made such an hierarchy possible.

The pattern of the so-called Mosaic theocracy, which does not suit the conditions of any earlier age, and of which Hebrew prophecy knows nothing, even in its ideal descriptions of the commonwealth of Israel as it ought to be, fits post-exilic Judaism to a nicety, and was never an actual thing till then. After the Exile the Jews were deprived by their foreign rulers of all the functions of public political life; they were thus able, indeed compelled, to devote their whole energies to sacred things, in which full freedom was left them. The temple became the one centre of national life, and the prince of the temple head of the spiritual commonwealth, while, at the same time, the administration of the few political affairs which were still left to the Jews themselves, fell into his hands as a matter of course, because the nation had no other chief.

20. Sacred dues in P. The material basis of the hierarchy was supplied by the sacred dues.

In the Priestly Code the priests receive all sin-offerings and guilt-offerings, the greater part of the cereal accompaniments of sacrifices, the skin of the burnt-offering, the breast and shoulder of thank-offerings. Further, they receive the male firstlings and the tithes of cattle, as also the firstfruits and tithes of the fruits of the land. Yet with all this they are not even obliged to support at their own cost the stated services and offerings of the temple, which are provided for by a poll-tax. The poll-tax is not ordained in the main body of the Code; but such a tax, of the amount of one-third of a shekel, began to be paid in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 10:32[33]), and in a novel of the law (Ex. 30:15) it is demanded at the higher rate of half a shekel per head. That these exorbitant taxes were paid to or claimed by the priests in the wilderness, or during the anarchy of the period of the judges, is inconceivable. Nor in the period of the kingship is it conceivable that the priests laid claim to contributions much in excess of what the king himself received from his subjects; certainly no such claim would have been supported by the royal authority. In 1 S. 8:15 the tithes appear as paid to the king, and are viewed as an oppressive exaction, yet they form but a single element in the multiplicity of dues which the priests claim under the Priestly Code. Above all, the fundamental principles of the system of priestly dues in the Code are absolutely irreconcilable with the fact that, as long as Solomon's temple stood, the king had the power to dispose of its revenues as he pleased.

The sacred taxes are the financial expression of the hierocratic system; they accord with the condition of the Jews after the exile, and under the second temple they were actually paid according to the Code, or with only minor departures from its provisions.

In pre-exilic times the sacred gifts were paid not to the priests but to Yahwè; they had no resemblance to

21. Before the Exile. taxes, and their religious meaning, which in the later system is hardly recognizable, was quite plainly marked. They were in fact identical with the great public festival offerings which the offerers consumed in solemn sacrificial meals before Yahwè, that is, at the sanctuary. The change of these offerings into a kind of tax was connected with an entire transformation of the old character of Israel's worship, which resulted from its centralization at Jerusalem. In the old days the public worship of the nation consisted essentially in the celebration of the

22. Early religious feasts. yearly feasts; that this was so can be plainly seen from the prophets—from Amos, but especially from Hosea.

Accordingly the laws of worship are confined to this one point in JE, and even in Deuteronomy. After the Exile the festival observances became much less important than the tâmid, the regular daily and weekly offerings and services; and so we find it in the Priestly Code. Apart from this, the feasts (especially the paschal feast) underwent a qualitative change, which claims special attention (see FEASTS, § 9 ff.).

The conclusions reached by comparing the successive strata of the laws are confirmed by a comparison of the

23. The Narratives. several stages of the historical tradition embodied in the Pentateuch. The several threads of narrative which run side by side in the Pentateuch are so distinct in point of form that critics were long disposed to assume that in point of substance also they are independent narratives, without mutual relation. This, however, is highly improbable on general considerations, and is seen to be quite impossible when regard is paid to the close correspondence of the several sources in regard to the arrangement of the historical matter they contain. It is because the arrangement is so similar in all the narratives that it was possible to weave them together into one book; and besides this we find a close agreement in many notable points of detail. Here, too, analysis does not exhaust the task of the critic; a subsequent synthesis is required. When he has separated out the individual documents the critic has still to examine their mutual relations, to comprehend them as phases in a living process, and in this way to trace the gradual development of the Hebrew historical tradition. In the present article, however, we cannot say anything of the way in which the Deuteronomist views the Hebrew history (see HISTORICAL LIT., § 7), nor shall we attempt to characterize the differences between J and E (see GENESIS, § 4 ff.), but limit ourselves to a general comparison between the narrative of JE and that of the Priestly Code.

Bleek and his school viewed it as a great merit of the latter narrative that it strictly observes the difference

24. JE and P narratives contrasted. between various ages, mixes nothing Mosaic with the patriarchal period, and in the Mosaic history never forgets that the scene lies in the wilderness of wandering. They also took it as a mark of fidelity to authentic sources that the Code contains so many dry lists, such a mass of unimportant numbers and names, such exact technical descriptions of details which could have no interest for posterity. Against this view Colenso¹ proved that just those parts of the Hexateuch which contain the most precise details, and so have the air of authentic documents, are least consistent with the laws of possibility.

Colenso, when he wrote, had no thought of the several sources of the Hexateuch; but this only makes it the more remarkable that his criticisms mainly affect the Priestly Code. Nöldeke followed Colenso with clearer insight, and determined the character and value of the priestly narrative by tracing all through it an artificial construction and a fictitious character.

The supposed marks of historical accuracy and dependence on authentic records are quite out of place in such a narrative as that of the Pentateuch, the substance of which is not historical but legendary. This legendary character is always manifest both in the form and in the substance of the narrative of the Yahwist (JE); his stories of the patriarchs and of Moses are just such as might have been gathered from popular tradition.

In JE the general plan of the history is still quite loose; the individual stories are the important thing, and they have a truly living individuality. They have always a local connection, and we can still often see what motives lie at the root of them. But even when we do not understand these legends they lose none of their charm; for they breathe a sweet poetic fragrance, and in them heaven and earth are magically blended into one.

The Priestly Code, on the other hand, dwells as little as possible on the details of the several stories; the pearls are stripped off in order that the thread on which they were strung may be properly seen.

Love and hate and all the passions, angels, miracles, and theophanies, local and historical allusions, disappear; the old narrative shrivels into a sort of genealogical scheme,—a bare scaffolding to support a pragmatic construction of the connection and progress of the sacred history. In legendary narrative, on the other hand, connection is a very secondary matter; indeed it is only brought in when the several legends are collected and written down. When, therefore, the Priestly Code makes the connection the chief thing, it is clear that it has lost all touch of the original sources and starting-points of the legends. It draws therefore, not from oral tradition, but from books; its dry excerpts can have no other source than a tradition already fixed in writing. In point of fact it simply draws on the Yahwistic narrative. The order in which that narrative disposed the popular legends is here made the essential thing; the arrangement, which in the Yahwist (JE) was still quite subordinate to the details, is here brought into the foreground; the old order of events is strictly adhered to, but is so emphasized as to become the one important thing in the history. Obviously it was the intention of the priestly narrator to give by this treatment the historical quintessence of his materials freed of all superfluous additions. At the same time, he has used all means to dress up the old naïve traditions into a learned history. Sorely against its real character, he forces it into a chronological system, which he carries through without a break from Adam to Joshua. Whenever he can he patches the story with things that have the air of authoritative documents. Finally, he rationalises the history after the standard of his own religious ideas and general culture; above all, he shapes it so that it forms a framework, and at the same time a gradual preparation for the Mosaic law. With the spirit of the legend, in which the Yahwist (JE) still lives, he has nothing in common, and so he forces it into conformity with a point of view entirely different from its own.

The middle position which the legal part of Deuteronomy holds between JE and the Priestly Code is also characteristic of the Deuteronomic narrative, which is founded throughout on JE, but from time to time shows a certain leaning to the points of view characteristic of the priestly narrator. The order of the several parts of the Hexateuch to which we have been led by all these arguments is confirmed by an examination of the other historical books and the books of Chronicles. The original sources of the books of Judges, Samuel, and Kings stand on the same platform with JE; the editing they received in the Exile presupposes Deuteronomy; and the latest construction of the history as contained in Chronicles rests on the Priestly Code. This is admitted (see HISTORICAL LIT., § 7); the conclusion to be drawn is obvious.

We have now indicated the chief lines on which criticism must proceed in determining the order of the sources of the Hexateuch, and the age of the Priestly Code in particular—though, of course, it has not been possible at all to exhaust the argument. The objections that have been taken to Graf's hypothesis partly rest on misunderstanding. It is asked, for example, what is left for Moses if he were not the author of the Torah.

Moses may have been the founder of the Torah, though the Pentateuchal legislation was codified almost a thousand years later; for the Torah was originally not a written law, but the oral decisions of the priests at the sanctuary—case-law, in short, by which they decided all manner of questions and controversies that were brought before their tribunal (cp LAW AND JUSTICE, §§ 14); their Torah was the instruction to others that came from their lips, not at all a written document in their hands guaranteeing their own status, and instructing themselves how to proceed in the sacrificial ritual. Questions of clean and unclean belonged to the Torah, because these were matters on which the laity required to be directed; but, generally, the ritual, so far as it consisted in ceremonies performed by the priests themselves, was no part of the Torah. Whilst, however, it was only at a late date that the ritual appeared as Torah as it does in the Priestly Code, its usages and traditions are exceedingly ancient, going back, in fact, to pre-Mosaic and heathenish times.

It is absurd to speak as if Graf's hypothesis meant that the whole ritual is the invention of the Priestly Code, first put into practice after the exile.

All that is affirmed by the advocates of that hypothesis is that in earlier times the ritual was not the substructure of a hierarchy, that there was in fact no hierarchy before the exile, that Yahwe's sovereignty was an ideal thing, not visibly embodied in an organization of the commonwealth under the forms of a specifically spiritual power. The theocracy was the state; the old Israelites regarded their civil constitution as a divine miracle. The later Jews assumed the existence of the state as a natural thing that required no explanation, and built the theocracy over it as a special divine institution.

There are, however, some more serious objections taken to the Grafian hypothesis. It is, indeed, simply a 28. Deuteronomic redaction. misstatement of facts to say that the language of the Priestly Code forbids us to date it so late as post-exilic times. On the other hand, a real difficulty lies in the fact that, whilst the priestly redaction extends to Deuteronomy (Dt. 13), it is also true that the Deuteronomic redaction extends to the Priestly Code (Josh. 20).

The way out of this dilemma is to be found by recognizing that the so-called Deuteronomic redaction was not a single and final act, that the characteristic phrases of Deuteronomy became household words to subsequent generations, and were still current and found application centuries after the time of Josiah. (See further, HISTORICAL LIT., § 7). Thus, for example, the traces of Deuteronomic redaction in Josh. 20 are still lacking in the Septuagint; the text, we see, was retouched at a very late date indeed (cp JOSHUA, § 18; Bennett SBOT 'Heb.', notes).

Of the other objections taken to the Grafian hypothesis only one need be mentioned here—viz., that the Persians are not named in the list of nations in Gen. 10.

This is certainly hard to understand if the passage was written in the Persian period; but the difficulty is not insuperable. The Persians, for example, may have been held to be included in the mention of the Elamites, and this also would give the list the archaic air which the priestly writer affects.

At any rate, a residuum of minute difficulties not yet thoroughly explained cannot outweigh the decisive arguments that support the view that the Priestly Code originated in and after the Exile. Kuenen observes with justice that 'it is absolutely necessary to start with the plain and unambiguous facts, and to allow them to guide our judgment on questionable points. The study of details is not superfluous in laying down the main lines of the critical construction; but, as soon as our studies have supplied us with some really fixed points, further progress must proceed from them, and we must first gain a general view of the whole field instead of always working away at details, and then coming out with a rounded theory which lacks nothing but a foundation.'

Finally, it is a pure petitio principii, nothing more, to say that the post-exilic age was not equal to the task of producing a work like the Priestly Code.

The position of the Jews after the Exile made it imperative on them to reorganize themselves in conformity with the entire change in their situation. Now the Priestly Code is all that we should expect to find in a constitution for the Jews after the Exile. It meets the new requirements as completely as it fails to satisfy the conditions which a law-book older than the Exile would have had to satisfy. After the final destruction of the kingdom by Nebuchadrezzar, they found in the ritual and personnel of the temple at Jerusalem the elements out of which a new commonwealth could be built, in conformity with the circumstances and needs of the time. The community of Judæa raised itself from the dust by holding on to its ruined sanctuary. The old usages and ordinances were reshaped in detail; but as a whole they were not replaced by new creations; the novelty lay in their being worked into a system and applied as a means to organize the 'remnant' of Israel. This was the origin of the sacred constitution of Judaism. Religion in old Israel had been a faith which gave its support to the natural ordinances of human society; it was now set forth in external and visible form as a special institution, within an artificial sphere peculiar to itself, which rose far above the level of common life.

The necessary presupposition of this kind of theocracy is service to a foreign empire, and so the theocracy is essentially the same thing as hierocracy. Its finished picture is drawn in the Priestly Code, the product of the labours of learned priests during the Exile. When the temple was destroyed and the ritual interrupted, the old practices were written down that they might not be lost. Thus in the Exile the ritual became matter of teaching, of Torah; the first who took this step, a step prescribed by the circumstances of the time, was the priest and prophet Ezekiel (see EZEKIEL i. § 4, ii. § 21 f.). In the last part of his book Ezekiel began the literary record of the customary ritual of the temple; other priests followed in his footsteps (Lev. 17-26); and so there arose during the captivity a school of men who wrote down and systematized what they had formerly practised. When the temple was restored this theocratic zeal still went on and produced further ritual developments, in action and reaction with the actual practice of the new temple; the final result of the long-continued process was the Priestly Code.

[The student who has read and assimilated the foregoing sketch will be qualified to estimate the progress which has been made since the lonely Jewish thinker of Amsterdam (Baruch Spinoza) propounded his doubts on Genesis, and since Jean Astruc, professor of medicine but also student of the Pentateuch, opened the 'true path' of critical investigation. Now, however, we are in a different position from that at which Kuenen had arrived when he revrote his Onderzoek and Wellhausen when he wrote his illuminative Prolegomena. The criticism of the Hexateuch is approaching a fresh turning-point, and the students of to-day need to be warned that new methods will be necessary to carry the discussion of critical problems nearer to definite solutions. A purely literary criticism has had its day, and biblical archaeology and the comparative study of social customs have forced us to undertake a more searching examination of the contents of the Hexateuch, which is leading to a complication of critical problems not before dreamed of. With the problems we hope that we are catching a glimpse of the new methods to be applied in their solutions. These new methods will best be learned by observing the practice of the critical workers. Budde's Die biblische Urgeschichte (Gen. 1-125) untersucht is not a recent book (it appeared in 1883); but a student of method may learn much from it. With more complete satisfaction, however, we may mention Stade's admirable essays on 'Cain's Sign,' on the 'Tower of Babel,' and on the 'Torah of the Sacrifice of Jealousy,' now reprinted in his Akademische Reden und Abhandlungen (1899). The introduction to the Hexateuch by Steuernagel will, it may be hoped, furnish many fruitful hints; but the present writer looks forward with higher hopes to Gunkel's expected commentary on Genesis. From many articles of the present work the student will be able to gather how the present writer views the task that lies before us in Genesis, and by what means we should attempt to accomplish it. Gunkel will doubtless do much more, and for Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers the student will be in safe hands if he begins under the tuition of Baentsch. To Deuteronomy and Joshua reference is made below.

To say more just now about the road which the students of to-day will have to traverse would be unwise. It would be tantamount to doing the work superficially which in a longer or shorter time the investigators of to-day—both those who have worked their way out of purely literary criticism and those who have the advantage of beginning their journey at the point now reached by critics—may modestly but confidently hope to accomplish. Let our last word be this: Hexateuch criticism is passing into a new phase. This phase is largely due to archaeology and the comparative study of social customs, but in part also to the further developments of Hebrew philology and textual criticism. Let the student therefore devote the utmost pains to the critical study of Biblical archaeology, and of the Hebrew texts, for without a better knowledge of what the texts really contain and of the circumstances in which these texts arose no secure step in advance can be taken by Hexateuch criticism.

A word, too, may be said on the present position of the study of that part of the Hexateuch which relates to the laws. The immense labour bestowed on the adaptation of the old Hebrew laws is becoming more and more manifest. The Oxford *Hexateuch*¹ indicates the nature of some of the newer problems which are at present engaging the attention of workers, especially in the department of the legal literature. Together with Holzinger's (German) Introduction to the Hexateuch it can be confidently recommended to all thorough students. It is gratifying to know that defenders of religious truth (even in the Roman church²) are finding out that criticism of the 'Books of Moses' is no enemy to religion. In fact, the wonderful ways by which God led the people of Israel towards the light of life may be studied in that strangely composite work, the Hexateuch, with as much benefit to edification as in the Psalms or the prophecies, and recent works on the religion of Israel (e.g., vol. ii. of Duff's *Old Testament Theology*³) do not neglect to use the main results in pictures both of the popular and of the higher religion of Israel. The bibliographies to be found at the end of the articles on the books of the Hexateuch are so carefully selected that not much more need be said. A really satisfactory history of the religion of Israel still has to be written, and when we have reached the fresh starting-point for which we are looking, this much desired hook will be written. T. 1. King of Judah (? 720-691; cp CHRONOLOGY, § 36). Of the reign of this king little is known with certainty. He certainly ascended the throne at a youthful age. M'Curdy¹

1. His policy. makes him only fifteen at his accession; he was, by general admission, certainly under twenty-five (the age given by the Redactor in 2 K. 18:2 [cp KINGS, § 4]), we may even confidently say, under twenty. Elsewhere (see ISAIAH I., § 6) reason has been given for supposing that Hezekiah may have been early influenced by the preaching of Isaiah, and unlike his father have responded to the prophet's demand for 'faith.' The kings of Judah, however, did not possess absolute power, and Hezekiah's action was in the main dictated by the political party which happened to be predominant among the nobles. His personal relation to Isaiah was therefore of comparatively slight significance, and it is but a conjecture that the (probable) dismissal of SHEBNA (q.v.) and the alarm produced by the Assyrian invasion led to something in the nature of a reform which consisted partly in the requirement of a higher standard of morality from the judges (Is. 1:17 23 315) and partly in the abolition of certain idolatrous objects at Jerusalem, such as the brazen serpent (2 K. 18:4). A much larger measure of iconoclasm is ascribed to Hezekiah in 2 K. 18:4-7, where the compiler of Kings (to whom the passage in its present form is due) assigns the reformation to one of the first years of Hezekiah's reign (cp v. 22 and 2 Ch. 29:3).

The language, however, which the compiler uses is so strongly suggestive of the influence of Deuteronomy (reign of Josiah) that we cannot venture to take it as strictly historical. There is no sound evidence that Isaiah attacked either the Massēbāhs or the Ashbāhs, much less the Bāmōth or high places.² The destruction of these objects seems a detail transferred to Hezekiah's times from those of Josiah, to which it properly belongs.

hooks show that the origin of Deuteronomy is one of the problems which need a more thorough investigation. Steuernagel's Joshua may also be recommended.

¹ Hist. Proph. Mon. 2250. This implies dating Hezekiah's accession in 720 or 719. Similarly Wi. and C. Niebuhr (720) assume that Merodach-baladan's embassy (2 K. 20:12-19=Is. 39) was sent on Hezekiah's accession, which took place (ex hyp.) not long after his own (cp Schr. COT 225). M'Curdy's assumptions are different, and need testing. Most scholars, with We., prefer 715. The question is not settled. On the doubtful statement 'in the fourteenth year' (2 K. 18:13=Is. 36:1) see Di. Jes. 313; Duhm, Jes. 235; Kau. in Kampb. Chronologie, 94; Che. Intr. Is. 217 f.; and cp CHRONOLOGY, § 36, and Dr. Isaiah(²), 13 f.

² Is. 17:7 f. is an interpolation. See Stade, ZATW 8:13, who is scarcely answered by König, Hauptprobleme, 70. Steuernagel's answer to Sta., We., and Smend is not critical enough (Ent. des deut. Gesetzes, 100 [96]). Hezekiah's supposed edict for a reformation remains as improbable as before, and should not be mixed up with a discussion of the 'original Deuteronomy.'

HEZEKIAH

The removal and destruction of the brazen serpent is not to be explained away.¹ That Hezekiah did away with this much misunderstood object (see NEHUSHTAN) is credible, and this may even be the whole historical kernel of the story of the reform of the cultus, which the Chronicler (after his fashion) has still further elaborated (2 Ch. 29-31).

(a) Philistine campaign.—It is less doubtful to what period Hezekiah's successful campaign against the Philistines is to be referred (2 K. 188). According to Stade (GVV 1624) and Kittel (Hist. 2371), the account is to be taken in connection with Sennacherib's statement that he deprived Hezekiah of certain cities, as a punishment for his rebellion, and attached them to the territories of three Philistine kings (KB 294 f.). Hezekiah, it is suggested by these critics, may not have submitted tamely to this, and may even have enlarged his own territory at the expense of the Philistines after Sennacherib's departure. This is too arbitrary a view. The cities which Sennacherib wrested from Hezekiah are probably cities which Hezekiah had previously taken from the Philistines.

(b) Assyrian campaign.—The other events of Hezekiah's reign, so far as we know them, are treated elsewhere (see ISAIAH i. § 5 f.; MERODACH-BALADAN; SENNACHERIB; EGYPT, § 66; ISRAEL, § 34). To supplement these notices, it is only necessary to point out here: (1) that a thorough criticism of 2 K. 1813-1937 (=Is. 36 f.) in connection with the Assyrian annals raises the character of Hezekiah considerably; he was a true hero, who, unlike the cowardly Luli of Sidon, stuck to the post of duty, and only gave way when all hope had fled, and Jerusalem was 'like a booth in a vineyard or a lodge in a cucumber-field' (Is. 18); and (2) that great caution must be used in reconstructing the history of Jewish religion on the basis of the imperfectly-known facts of the close of the Assyrian invasion.

Much that has been assigned to Isaiah's pen belongs to a later age, and presupposes a glorification of Isaiah which that great prophet and lover of truth would certainly have deprecated. The circumstances under which Jerusalem was liberated from the blockading Assyrian force were not such as to promote a spiritual religion such as Isaiah would have approved. It is by no means certain that Sennacherib retired in consequence of a pestilence in his army; the evidence is as unsatisfactory as possible, and the story may have been developed out of the words of Isaiah in 1714, 'At eventide behold terror! before morning he is no more! This is the portion of those that spoil us; and the lot of those who rob us.'

If Sennacherib's army had been almost destroyed, is it likely that Hezekiah would have sent a special envoy with tribute to Nineveh (KB 296 f.)? It is much more probable that the inability of Sennacherib to meet Taharka was due to the receipt of bad news from Babylon. In the failure of historical information, nothing was more natural, especially in the light of Isaianic prophecies (supposed to have been literally fulfilled), than to postulate a plague as the cause of his retreat. See SENNACHERIB.

To quote on the other side the story of the priest-king Sēthōs (Herod. 2141) is extremely unsafe, considering Herodotus's ill-fortune in the matter of popular Egyptian stories, and the mythological connections of the detail of the field-mice gnawing the quivers of the invaders.²

The only doubt is whether there may not have been a second invasion of Sennacherib, which may perhaps have been abruptly terminated by a pestilence.

On one point, however, it is safe to adhere still to the older critical view. The fact that Jerusalem escaped being taken when all the other fortified cities fell before the Assyrians, and, as Sennacherib states, 200,150 Judæans were led into captivity, must have enhanced the prestige of the temple (cp ISRAEL, § 34; DEUTERONOMY, § 13). The religious reaction under Manasseh would rather promote than hinder this. The misinterpretation of Is. 2816¹ may have begun very early.

² Hommel's statement (Gesch. des alten Morgenlandes, 142 [95]), 'A plague (or, as Herodotus symbolically expresses himself, a 'swarm of field-mice') fell upon the Assyrian host so that Sennacherib had to return (with no results to show) to Nineveh,' and M'Curdy's in Hist. Proph. Mon. 2298 f., 428, seem to need modification. It has not been proved that mice were a symbol of plague-boils. In 1 S. 5 f. the plague and the mice are two distinct punishments. On the mythological affinities of the field-mice of Sēthōs, see A. Lang, Custom and Myth, 111-114. See EMERODS, MOUSE.

That Hezekiah composed a song in the style of the Psalms, is a priori most improbable. The song in Is.

38 is, both on general and on linguistic and phraseological grounds, of post-exilic origin (see ISAIAH ii., § 15). Nor can we venture to accept the statement in Prov. 251 that 'Hezekiah's men' collected the proverbs contained in Prov. 25-29 (cp PROVERBS). Hezekiah has hardly earned the title of the 'Pisistratus of Judah.' On the reign of Hezekiah see especially Stade, GVV 1603-624; and cp ISRAEL, § 33 f. T. K. C.

4. An ancestor of Zephaniah the prophet (Zeph. 11 AV HIZKIAH, ἑζεκιου [BNAQ]). Since the genealogy is traced back so far, it has been supposed that he must have been some renowned person, perhaps the king. It is probably accidental that no other prophet's genealogy is carried above the grandfather. No reference is made in Kings to a brother of Manasseh named Amariah; but the chronology is not opposed to the hypothesis which is regarded as probable by Kuenen (ii., § 78, n. 1, cp also Keil, Hi., Steiner). Ibn Ezra also accepts; but Abarbanel rejects it. See Gray, Exp., July 1900, pp. 76 ff.

HEZION (הֶזְיוֹן; ἄζαηα [AL], ἄζειον [B]), an Aramæan king, father of Tab-rimmon, and grandfather of Benhadad I. (1 K. 1518). The name, however, is plainly corrupt.

Winckler (AT Unters. 60 ff.) restores הַזְיוֹן, Hazael, in accordance with ᄒAL. Others (e.g., Ew., Hist. 324, n. 5, The. and Klo.) prefer הֶזְיוֹן, Hezron, of which they take הֶזְיוֹן, Rezon, in 1123 to be another form, having this view upon 1 K. 1123 (ερωσμου [B], -ω[1], om. A); but ερωσμου points rather either to הֶזְיוֹן, Hezron, or to הֶזְיוֹן (cp REZON). Probably Wi. is right.

HIDDAI

1. b. Perez b. Judah (Gen. 46¹², אַרְרָמ [A], -v [D]; Nu. 26²¹, אַרְרָמ [BFL], אַרְרָמ [A]; Ruth 4^{18 f.}, אַרְרָמ [B, and A in v. 19], אַרְרָמ [L]; 1 Ch. 2⁵, אַרְרָמ [B*], אַרְרָמ [B^{a1}b¹mg.]; 4¹ אַרְרָמ [B], אַרְרָמ [L]; Mt. 23¹ Lk. 3³³, אַרְרָמ AV ESKOM; Hezronite הֶזְרוֹנִי, Nu. 16²¹, אַרְרָמ[ע] [BAFL]. This relationship is late and is a modification of the older scheme which appears in 1 Ch. 29. Here Hezron (אֶסְרָרֹן [B*], אַרְרָמ [B^{ab}]) is the 'father' of the two clans Jerahmeel¹ and Chelubai (= Caleb), and in this connection his name is probably as symbolical as those of Caleb's wives (see AZUBAH, 1), since 'Hezronites' seems to mean 'the inhabitants of אֶרְצֵי-נֹמָד—nomad encampments'—so WRS J. Phil. 9⁹¹ (see HAZOR). Caleb and Jerahmeel in David's time inhabited the weg of Judah (cp. e.g., 1 S. 30²⁹), and it was not until later times that they migrated northwards. Hence it is natural that upon their subsequent adoption into the tribe of Judah, they should be genealogically represented as the offspring of the tribal eponym by making their father a son of PEREZ [q.v.]. The genealogical fragment 1 Ch. 2¹⁸⁻²⁴ which connects Hezron with Gilead, etc., may represent post-exilic relations, or perhaps simply implies that Gilead had a nomadic origin (v. 18 21 24 f. אֶסְרָרֹן [B], אַרְרָמ [A], -v [L and A in v. 25]); cp 1 Ch. 5¹⁰. HIDDAI (הִדַּי; אַדְדָּאִי [B*], אַדְרוֹי [B^{ab}], אַתְתָּאִי [A], אַדְדָּאִי [L]), one of David's thirty: 2 S. 23³⁰= 1 Ch. 11³², HURAI (q.v.).

HIDDEKEL (הִדְקֵל; טִיגְרִיס [AEL in Gen.], טִיגְרִיס [G 87 in Dan.], טִיגְרִיס אַדְדֶּקֶל [Theod. in Dan.]; but אַדְדֶּקֶל A with טַי—i.e., Symmachus—written above it); אַדְדָּאִי, הִדְקֵל; Ass. Diklat (?), Bab. Diglat, the river of Eden 'which goeth eastward to Assyria' of Gen. 2¹⁴, 'the great river' of Dan. 10⁴, is undoubtedly the TIGRIS. The name of this river, in the pre-Semitic writing of Babylonia, was MAŠ-TIG-GAR, a group of signs, which in this connection denoted an idea whose audible expression was Idigna or Idignu. As applied to the river, it was regarded by the Babylonian scribes as denoting the river they called Diglat. This form of the name is clearly preserved in the Greek of Pliny, NH 6¹²⁷, διγλιτω, Aramaic Deqlat, Arabic Diglat and دیگلاب (Jos. Ant. i. 13).

The suggestion has been made that Diglat is formed from Idigna, by dropping the initial vowel (for which many parallels can be produced), and adding the Semitic feminine (F. Delitzsch, Parad. 171). The Hebrew and modern Arabic have not this t. The former substitutes for the g; the closely related k, a change which may also be indicated in the Assyrian, if that really was Diklat. The presence of the initial Hi, in the Hebrew, has been accounted for by the prefixing of the Hebrew article to a form beginning with I. This scarcely accounts for the h, without further explanation. The Samaritan, however, has הִדְקֵל. The modern Arabic follows the local form Digleh. That the sign MAŠ had among its phonetic values Hi, Hi, i, is a legitimate suggestion, but has no support. It denoted, among other ideas, 'the bank of a river,' and as such was read Ahi. Thus Ahtiggar, or with a change of r to l, for which many parallels could be found, Ahtiggat, Hidiḳal, is a natural progression.

The same group of signs, however, not only denoted the river Tigris, but, with the same pronunciation, was translated by the Babylonian scribes as uagā, 'a district,' nadbaku, 'a gully or wady,' and finally was an ideogram for the verb ābu, 'to flow,' which furnished the names of the two Zabs, tributaries of this river. Thus, if Tiggar was the early pronunciation of this group of signs it may have been a pre-Semitic name that perhaps clung to the upper reaches of the stream, where the Medo-Persian invaders first became acquainted with the river. At any rate, it seems more than coincidence that the Old Persian name should be Tigrā, a feminine form. The existence of a similar Old Persian word tighri (the Zend tighri) for 'arrow'¹ may perhaps help the change.

It must be borne in mind, however, that the other ancient writing of the name was HAL-HALA, the cuneiform signs of which are very suggestive of four 'arrows' following one another; and yet, on the other hand, probably represent an old pictorial indication of 'running water.' At the same time, the Babylonians translated these signs by garāru, 'to flow,' when used otherwise than as the name of the river. Another old name for this river, or some part of it, was the Ammu. At bottom we may suppose the old writing MAŠ-(Ahi)-TIG-GAR to have been also phonetic and either directly, or by way of suggestion, the parent of Hiddēkel, Diglat, and Tigris.

HIEL (הִיֵּל, if the letter ה is correct, perhaps for הִיֵּלֵי, 'El lives,' § 35; אֶחְיֵיָהּ [BA], אֶחְיֵיָהּ [Pesh.]; unless on account of H and Pesh., הִיֵּלֵי may be considered to be for הִיֵּלֵי, cp Bāthg. Beitr. 156, and אֶחְיֵיָהּ for אֶחְיֵיָהּ on an inscription from Safā [see AHAB]), the Bethelite² (בֵּית-הַיֵּלֵי), who in the days of Ahab 'built' (i.e., fortified?) Jericho, and who 'laid the foundation thereof at the cost of (the life of) Abiram (אֶבִירָם) his firstborn, and set up the gates thereof at the cost of (the life of) Segub (סֶגֻב) his youngest, according to the word of Yahwē which he spoke by Joshua the son of Nun' (1 K. 16³⁴). Several interesting questions arise out of this passage: (1) as to the name and period of the 'builder' of Jericho (§ 2); (2) as to the manner in which he lost his two sons (§ 3); and (3) as to the relation of the passage to Josh. 6²⁶ (Joshua's curse on the 'builder' of Jericho) (§ 1). Let us take the last of these first.

Comparing the two passages, we find that the phraseological evidence favours the view that the passage in Josh. is the later (see Kit. Hist. 2²¹³, n. 1). It is also probable that 1 K. 16³⁴ (which is not found in to Josh. 6²⁶, G^L) was introduced from some other context; the closing words would naturally be inserted later, to provide a point of contact with Josh. 6²⁶. In G^{BAL} the fulfilment is narrated in Josh. (אָזָו [B*], אָזָו [B^amg.], אָזָו [AL]).

Next, as to the person intended. The notice is very obscure; what has a Bethelite to do with the building or refortification of Jericho? According
