EAGLE. The eagle of EV, the GREAT VULTURE of RV^{mg} (אֵרֹס; áerós), is identified by Tristram with Gyps fulvus, the Griffon, not a true Eagle but a member of the family Vulturidæ. Griffons are still very common in Palestine, which is about the centre of their area of distribution, whence they spread across Asia, around the Mediterranean area and through Northern Africa.¹ They are noble birds of large size, and form conspicuous objects in the landscape as towards evening they perch on the peaks of rocks or cliffs (Job 39 28 29), or when soaring. The comparison of invaders to a swooping vulture is often employed in the OT (cp Dt. 28 49 Job 9 26 Hab. 18 Jer. 48 40 etc.). They are carrion feeders and sight their food from afar. Their head and neck are bald, a fact which did not escape the notice of the prophet Micah (Mi. 1 16). They nest in colonies, some of which contain a hundred pairs of birds. They are said to be remarkably long-lived, probably attaining a century or more (allusions in Ps. 103 5 and perhaps [see 6] in Is. 40 31). The Himyarites had an idol nasr which was in the form of a Vulture (cp ZDMG 29 600), and the same worship among the Arabs is attested by the Syriac Doctrine of Addai (Phillips, 24).²

The Gr. áerós may be applied to vultures, and the Romans seem to have classed the eagle among the family Vulturidæ (see Pliny, HN 10 3 13 23). Is there any connection between áerós and אֵרֹס (see BIRD, § 1)? Possibly the bird found on the Assyrian sculptures (see the illustrations in Vigouroux, s.v. 'aigle') and on the Persian (Xen. Cyr. vii. 1 4) and Roman (Plin. HN 13 23) standards is meant to represent not the true eagle but a vulture. In Christian art the Egyptian phoenix appears as an eagle and becomes a symbol of the resurrection (see Wiedemann, Rel. of Anc. Egyptians, 193). In the fifth century A.D. the eagle became an emblem of John the evangelist (see Dict. of Chr. Antiqu., s.v. 'Evangelists'). A. E. S.—S. A. C.

EAGLE, GIER. See GIER EAGLE.

EANES (אֲנַנְיָהּ [BA]), 1 Esd. 9 21 = Ezra 10 21 MAASEIAH, ii, 11.

EARNEST (ἀρραβών), the warrant or security for the performance of a promise or for the ratification of an engagement, is used thrice in NT (2 Cor. 1 22 5 5 Eph. 1 13 f.), but always in a figurative sense of the gifts of the Holy Spirit bestowed upon the apostles and Christians generally, as a pledge that they should obtain far greater blessings in the future. See PLEDGE.

EARRING. For Judg. 8 24 Prov. 25 12 etc. (אָזְנוֹ, nozem) and Ezek. 16 12 etc. (אָזְנוֹ, agil) see RING, § 2, and for Prov. l.c. cp BASKET. For Is. 3 20 etc. (אָזְנוֹ, láhaš) see AMULETS, RING, § 2, and MAGIC, § 3 (3).

The tip of the ear (אָזְנוֹ, tenukká) was specially protected by sacred rites (see SBOT on Is. 66 17).

EARTH AND WORLD. The conception of 'universe' is usually expressed in OT by 'heaven and earth' (e.g., Gen. 1 1 2 1 14 19), though there is a still more complete expression: 'heaven above, earth beneath, and the water under the earth' (Ex. 20 4, cp Gen. 49 25). So in Assyrian elāti u šaplāti 'things above and things below,' or (Creation-tablet, i. 1 f.) 'the heaven above, the earth beneath,' to which l. 3 adds 'the ocean.' There is also (Is. 44 24; cp 45 7) a general term אֵרֶץ, 'everything' (πάῃτα), corresponding to Assyr. kullatu, gimru.

² Cp the Syriac name נַסְרַיָהּ ("nsr" gave), and see We. Heid. 20 (*Heid.*² 23), and WRS Ktn. 209, *Rel. Sem.*² 226, n. 3; ZDMG 40 186 [186].

'Earth' of EV represents three Hebrew words. (1) אֶרֶץ ('eres), properly the earth, including Shēōl; hence either the visible surface of our earth (Gen. 26, 1. The 'earth', and often) or the nether world (e.g., Ex. 15 12 Is. 14 12 29 4). (2) אֲדָמָה (ādāmāh), [i.] the soil which is tilled, Gen. 2 5 3 17 etc. [ii.] the ground, Gen. 1 25 6 20 etc. (3) אֶפְרַיִם ('aphār), properly earth as a material (Gen. 2 7), then the earth (Is. 2 19), then dust (Gen. 3 14), then the nether world (Job 17 16 Ps. 30 9 [10] etc.).

6 renders (but not universally) all three words by אֶרֶץ. Whilst the AV uses 'world' as a synonym for 'earth' both in OT and in NT, it is only in NT (see below, § 3) that it occurs in the sense of 'universe.'

2. The 'world.' The reason is that Jewish writers had adopted a much more convenient term than 'heaven and earth' to express an expanded conception of the 'universe.'

First, however, let us note the Heb. words rendered 'world.'

1. אֶרֶץ, hēled, Ps. 17 14 49 2 [1]. If the text is correct, we have here a singularly interesting transition from 'lifetime' to 'the world of living men'; for the primary sense of hēled (if the word exists at all) is 'life-time' (Ps. 39 6 [5], 89 48 [47], Job 11 17 and emended text of 10 20).¹ Unfortunately hēled in Ps. 17 14 is certainly corrupt. 'From men of the world whose portion is in life' is an expression both obscure in itself and unsuitable to the context. In Is. 38 11 hēled is read only by critical conjecture; the text has hēdel, which means neither 'world' nor anything else: there is no such word.² The true reading is doubtless tebēl 'world,' and so too we should read in Ps. 49 2 [1]. Hymn-writers do not generally select the rarest and most doubtful words. There is but one pure Hebrew word for 'world' (see 3).

2. אֶרֶץ, hēdel, Is. 38 11, on the assumption that 'cessation' (the supposed meaning) is equivalent to 'fleeting world.' Many critics, with some MSS, including Cod. Bab., read אֶרֶץ, hēled. See, however, no. 1.

3. אֶרֶץ, tebēl, 'mother-earth'?—a word of primitive mythological origin (Gunkel, Hommel), hence never occurring with the article. Once it is used in antithesis to midbār, 'desert' (Is. 14 17); but generally it is quite synonymous with 'eres, 'earth.' Thus in 1 S. 28 (RV)—

² Cp Ps. 39 5 [4], where EV has 'how frail I am,' but where the Hebrew has, not 'frail,' but 'ceasing' (Dr. Parallel Psalter). אֶרֶץ, hēdel, too, is probably not a real word.

EARTH AND WORLD

For the pillars of the earth are Yahwe's,
And he hath set the world upon them;

And Prov. 8 26 (RV),

While as yet he had not made the earth, nor the fields,
Nor the beginning of the dust of the world.¹

In Job 37 12 RV we have the strange expression 'the habitable world' ('AV' 'the world in the earth'), and in Prov. 8 31 RV 'his habitable earth' ('AV' 'the habitable part of his earth'). The phrases are the same, and are due to corruption of the text.² E impartially renders both אָרֶץ and לְבַב sometimes by η sometimes by η οικουμένη.

4. עֲלָם , 'olām, a difficult word, meaning (1) antiquity, (2) indefinite length of time. The etymology is doubtful. Most connect it with עַלַּי , 'to hide'; but probably עַל -ām is a noun-ending (so Barth). Compare Ass. ullu, 'remote,' in the phrase ullu ullā 'from of old'; ullānu 'far-off time,' i.e., 'past time' (Del. Ass. HWB 64 f.). For a less probable view, see Lag. Ubers. 115. Twice rendered 'world' in AV: Ps. 73 12, 'Behold these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world,' RV (better) 'and being alway at ease' (עֲלָם עֲלָם); Eccles. 3 11 (so also RV), 'Also he hath set the world in their heart' (עֲלָם , σύμπαντα τὸν αἰῶνα), a riddle which admits of more than one solution (see Che. Job and Solomon, 210). However, even if man is a microcosm we cannot expect to find this advanced idea in Ecclesiastes, and the occurrence of 'olām, 'world,' in Sirach is improbable. Hā'olām needs to be emended.³ We must give up the 'microcosm' and the 'desiderium æternitatis' and take in exchange an assurance that the 'travail' of the student of God's works is good: 'I have seen the travail which God has given to the sons of men to exercise themselves therewith. He has made everything beautiful in its time; also he has suggested all that travail (אֲרָבֵי-הַעֲלָם); E attests (בָּרַךְ) to the sons of men (read לְבַבֵּי אָדָם , not לְבַבֵּי מְבָלֵי).

By NT times the word 'olām must have received the new meaning 'world,' for αἰών = עֲלָם is used in this sense.

We can doubtless trace this new development to the rise (under Persian stimulus) of a belief in 'new heavens and a new earth' (see ESCHATOLOGY, § 88, and cp Che. Intr. Is. 370; OPs. 405), and the intercourse of educated Jews with Greek-speaking neighbours would confirm the usage. It is true the sense of 'time' is not entirely lost; but a new sense has been grafted on the old. 'This 'olām' is not merely 'this age'; but the earth which is the theatre of the events of 'this age,' and 'the coming 'olām' is not merely the great future period initiated by the Divine Advent, but the new earth which will be the theatre of the expected great events. Hence the author of Hebrews can even say (Heb. 1 2), 'By whom also he made the worlds' (κοῖτις αἰῶνας; Del. and Biesenthal אֲרָבֵי-הַעֲלָם), and again (Heb. 11 3), 'we understand that the worlds (οἱ αἰῶνες) have been framed by the word of God.' The phrase οἱ αἰῶνες means, not the ages of human history (as in Heb. 9 26, cp 1 Cor. 10 11), but the material worlds which make up the universe⁴ (πάντα, Heb. 1 2; τὸ βλεπόμενον, 11 3).

On the Jewish references to the two 'olāmim see Dalman, Die Worte Jesu (1898, pp. 121 ff.), where it is pointed out that the famous saying ascribed to Simeon the Righteous (circa 280 B.C.), respecting the three things on which 'the world' (עֲלָם) rests, cannot be authentic. Dalman also denies that Enoch 48 6 49 16 ff. 71 15, where the creation of 'the world' is referred to, belong to the original Book of the Similitudes. As to 71 15 there can be no question; chap. 71 is 'most certainly a later addition' (Charles). At any rate, 45 5 refers to the renovation

¹ The text needs emendation (see next note). Read probably, Ere he had made the land and the grass (וְהָעֵשְׂבָא)
And had clothed with green (אֲרָבֵי-הָאָרֶץ) the clods of mother-earth.

² See Che. JQR, Oct. 1897, pp. 16 f.

⁴ Note also that οικουμένη in Heb. 2 5 corresponds to αἰών in 6 5 (Dalman).

EARTH (FOUR QUARTERS)

of the heaven and the earth, on which see above. In 72 1 73 8 82 1 5 7, the conception of the created world no doubt occurs, and in 4 Ezra 'sæculum' (Syr. ܡܫܝܘܘܩ) occurs frequently. From the end of the first century A.D. onwards עֲלָם is used so often in the sense of 'world' that we cannot doubt its universality. It has even penetrated into the older Targums. Cp $\text{ὁ τοῦ κόσμου βασιλεὺς}$ (2 Macc. 7 9); $\text{ὁ κύριος τοῦ κόσμου}$ (2 Macc. 13 14); $\text{θεοπάτης πάσης τῆς κτίσεως}$ (3 Macc. 2 2). 'Lord of the world' occurs in Enoch 81 9; Ass. Mos. 1 11; Jubil. 25 23. These and similar appellations are never found in NT (Dalman, 142).

In the NT we find (a) η οικουμένη, (b) δ κόσμος, (c) κτίσις.

(a) η οἰκ. is the habitable globe (Mt. 24 14 Rom. 10 18 etc.); also the Roman Empire (Acts 17 6); also = αἰών (Heb. 2 5), see above (§ 3).

4. Terms for 'earth' and 'world' in NT. (b) δ κόσμος is the earth, or its inhabitants (e.g., Mt. 4 8 3 14, Mk. 10 15, Jn. 1 29); also the universe (τὸ ὅλον τούτου, Plat. Gorg. 408 A), as in $\text{ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου}$ (e.g., Mt. 13 35 [not in best MSS.], cp 24 21); also with ὄντος in 'this olām' (Jn. 1 12, opp. to ζωῆ αἰώνιος; so Jn. 18 36 1 Cor. 3 19, 5 10 and Eph. 2 2, where note the strange compound phrase κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου), δ κόσμος without ὄντος in 1 Jn. 2 15 ff. 3 17; and in the derived sense of 'worldlings' (cp the phrase, too probably incorrect, $\text{קְהָלֵי קְהָלֵי מַלְאָכִים}$ in Ps. 17 14). With ὄντος in Jn. 12 31 14 30 [not Tit.], 16 11; 1 Cor. 3 19; without ὄντος in Jn. 1 7 1 Cor. 1 21 and often. Hence the adjective κοσμικός; in Heb. 9 1, $\tauὸ$ θῆλον κοσμικόν as opposed to the heavenly antitype of the tabernacle; Tit. 2 12.

(c) κτίσις, the universe (cp Wisd. 5 17 19 6), Mk. 10 6 13 19; 2 Pet. 3 4 Col. 1 15 Rev. 3 14. In Heb. 9 11 'this κτίσις,' and in Gal. 6 15 2 Cor. 5 17, καὶ τῆς κτίσεως. The latter phrase, however, is applied morally and spiritually (cp Jn. 3 5 7 Rom. 6 4, and the phrase καὶ τῶν ἀνθρώπων . . . Eph. 2 15 4 24). In the sense of 'the coming olām' it does not occur in NT (but see Enoch 72 1 Jubil. 1 29; and cp Bar. 32 4 Ezra 7 75). We have the new heavens and the new earth, however, in 2 Pet. 3 13 Rev. 21 1; and if we had to render $\text{ἐν τῇ παλιγγενεσίᾳ}$ (Mt. 19 28) into Aramaic or Hebrew we should have to follow Pesh. which gives 'in the new world' (עַלְמָא). The Greek phrase quoted is, in Dalman's words, 'the property of the evangelist.' On 'the elements of the world' (thrice in NT) see ELEMENTS. T. K. C.

EARTH (FOUR QUARTERS). Like the Babylonians, the Hebrews divided the world (i.e., earth and heaven) into four parts. We find 1. Quadruple Divisions. πρόρυγες of the earth,' Is. 11 12 Ezek. 7 2, cp Job 37 3 38 13; and in Rev. 7 1 208, 'the four corners (γωνίαι) of the earth.' Probably, too, 'the four ends (πέρας) of the earth' could be said; cp Jer. 49 36, 'the four ends of the heaven.' The four quarters could be described also as 'the four winds' (as in Ass.): see Ezek. 37 9 (especially), Dan. 8 8 11 4 Zech. 2 6 [10] 1 Ch. 9 24 Mt. 24 31. Similarly, 'to all winds' means 'in all directions' (Jer. 49 32 Ezek. 5 10 12, etc.). The east was called 'the front' (קֶדֶם); the west, 'the back part' (אָחֳרַי); the south, 'the right' (יְמִין); Aq. Sym., δεξιάν [Ps. 89 13]; and the north, 'the left' (שְׂמֹאל). The N. is called also צִפּוֹן , which is perhaps to be compared with Ar. šaban (from šabawwan, east wind, E).² The S. is also רֵדוּם (root uncertain); the E. usually מִזְרָח , 'the (region of the) sun-rising,' and the W. either יָם , 'the sea,'³ or מַעְרָב , 'the (region of the) sunset'; sometimes also (e.g., 1 Ch. 9 24), improperly, בְּנֵי , strictly the 'dry' S. region of Palestine; see, further, GEOGRAPHY, § 2. We now turn to the application and associations of the several terms.

2. North and South. North and south are applied (a) to quarters of the heavens. So Job 26 7 (crit. emend.)—

1 Cp the Ass. phrase kippat samē iršitim, usually, 'the ends of heaven and earth' (Del. Ass. HWB, s.v. קִנְיָ). The ideogram SAG-GUL, however, elsewhere = sikkāru, 'bar' (Del.) or possibly 'hinge' (Stucken). Perhaps the Ass. phrase means 'the bars (or hinges) of heaven and earth' (Stucken, Astrabrythen, 138), and consequently the parallel Hebrew phrase 'the bars (or hinges) of earth.'

2 So Barth, Etym. Stud. 26; Kō. Lehrb. 2 128; but cp GEOGRAPHY, § 2. At any rate עַלַּי is 'to hide,' not 'to be hidden.' 'East' in Hebrew may mean NE. The interchange of צ and פ is, of course, no difficulty.

3 E nearly always renders D , θάλασσα , even where 'west' is meant.

EARTH (FOUR QUARTERS)

(Before him) who had stretched the north region (of the heavens) upon space,
Who has suspended the earth upon nothing.¹

The passage has been well explained (after Del.) by Davidson :² 'The northern region of the heavens, with its brilliant constellations, clustering round the pole, would naturally attract the eye, and seem to the beholder to be stretched out over the "empty place," —i.e., the vast void between earth and heaven.' See DEAD, § 2 (a) for an explanation of the context. The N. region of the heavens is the 'station' of Bēl.

Also Job 37₉ (crit. emend.),

From the chambers of the south (comes) the storm,
And from the north-star cold,
(When) by the breath of God ice is given,
And the wide waters are straitened.³

There is no 'south pole' in Babylonian astronomy corresponding to the north pole (cp Jensen, Kosmol. 25); but there is a region of Ea, and this is called in Job 'the south,' as the region of Bēl is called 'the north.' The constellations in the region ('path') of Ea are called 'the chambers of the south.'

EV has in v. 9₆, 'And cold out of the north.' 'North' = מִצְרִים, which Ges. Di. explain (after Kimhi) as 'the scattering'—a name for the north winds, which dispel clouds and bring cold. Not very natural. We evidently require a constellation. The Heb. māzārīm may perhaps be the Ass. (kakkab) mīšri. Read māzārītū; the corruption was caused by a reminiscence of māzārītū.⁴ The (kakkab) mīšri, which we provisionally translate, with Hommel, the 'north-star,' was associated with 'cold, hail (?) and snow' by the Babylonians (Jensen, Kosmol. 50). Vg. ab Arcturo; ἄστρον ἀρκτουριῶν (read ἀρκτουῶν).
On Ezek. 14 Eccles. 16, see WINDS.

N. and S. are applied (b) to quarters of the earth. Ps. 89₁₂, 'The north and the south, thou hast created them.' Here 'north and south' represent all the four quarters of the earth.

The N. was encompassed with awe for the Hebrew. (1) From the N. came the invaders of Palestine, and 'the north' is a symbolic term for Assyria (Zeph. 2₁₃), or Babylonia (Jer. 14 466 10 20 24 Ezek. 26₇ Judith 16₄). (2) Religious considerations added to the feeling of awe. In the mountainous north the people localised the 'mountain of Elōhim,' of which tradition spoke (Ezek. 14 Is. 14₁₃; some would add Ps. 48₂[3]); and since God dwelt there, a poet says that manifestations of God's glory came from the N. (Job 37₂₂, crit. emend.: see CONGREGATION, MOUNT OF, and cp BAAL-ZEPHON, 1). According to Ewald (Alterth. 59), this was the reason why sacrificial victims were to be slain 'before Yahwē' on the north side of the altar (Lev. 1₁₁). Yet, according to the older Israelitish view, which lasted into post-exilic times, the sacred mountain of Yahwē was not in the N. but in the S. The 'mountain of God' was Horeb (Ex. 3₁ 4₂₇, etc.); Yahwē's progress into Canaan was from Seir (Judg. 5₄ cp Dt. 33₂), or, as a late Psalmist says, from Teman (Hab. 3₃). See WINDS.

Of E. and W. less has to be said. East and west, in Mt. 8₁₁, represent all the four quarters of the earth, like 'north and south' in Ps. 89₁₂[13].
3. East and West. 'As far as the east is from the west' is a symbolic expression for an immense distance (Ps. 103₁₂). When all mankind unite in festivity, 'thou makest the outgoings of morning and evening to ring out their joy' (Ps. 65₈[9], Driver). The expression has been admired; but it is only the morning sun that 'goes forth.' The true reading, could we recover it, would probably be finer.⁵ The Babylonians believed that the celestial vault had two gates, one by which the sun 'went forth' in the morning, and another by which he 'came in in the evening. In the E. was the isle of the blessed, with Pār(?)-napišti, the hero of the Deluge-story; in the E., too, was the Hebrew paradise (Gen. 28). The W. had no such pleasing associations, for there was the entrance of the realm of the dead;¹ there, too, the great Lightgiver disappeared.

Still, a Psalmist in the full confidence of faith can declare (Ps. 139₉, crit. emend.),

If I lifted up the wings of the sun,²

And alighted at the utmost part of the west (lit. sea),

Even there thy hand would seize me,³

Thy right hand would grasp me.

He does not say (as MT and AV may suggest) 'would lead me to my own peace and happiness.' At any rate, it is much that he is not cut away from Yahwē's hand. He whom God grasps cannot go to destruction. T. K. C.

EARTHQUAKE (שֶׁמֶט, σεισμος, cυνσεισμος).

Syria and Palestine abound in volcanic appearances (cp PALESTINE). Between the river Jordan and Damascus lies a volcanic tract, and the entire country about the Dead Sea presents unmistakable tokens of volcanic action and of connected earthquake shocks vaster and grander than any that are known, or can be imagined, to have occurred in the historic period. At the same time, the numerous allusions in the Bible to phenomena resembling those of earthquakes show that the writers were deeply impressed by the recurrence of severe seismic shocks. Not improbably some of these were recorded in the lost royal annals.

i. Real or supposed historical earthquakes.—(a) 1 S. 14₁₅ 'And there was a terror in the camp, in the garrison, and among all the people, and the raiders also were terrified.'⁴

1. Real or supposed historical earthquakes. This was on account of Jonathan's exploit. Suddenly 'the earth quaked, whence there arose a supernatural terror.' Doubtful.

(b) Am. 1₁ prophecy of Amos, 'two years before the earthquake.' Doubtful. On this and on (c) see AMOS, § 4. Josephus (Ant. ix. 10₄) draws on his imagination. (c) Zech. 14₅ 'Ye shall fee as ye fled before the earthquake in the days of Uzziah king of Judah.' A post-exilic notice. (d) Am. 4₁₁ 'I have wrought an overthrow among you, as at the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah.' Historical. (e) Jos. Ant. xv. 5₂. In the seventh year of the reign of Herod, there was an earthquake in Judæa, 'such as had not happened at any other time, and brought great destruction upon the cattle in that country. About ten thousand men also perished by the fall of houses.' The calamity encouraged the Arabs to acts of aggression (see HEROD). For later catastrophes see Renan, L'Antechrist, 336.

ii. Unhistorical narratives.—(a) Gen. 19₂₅ 'and he overthrew those cities.' Possibly implying a primitive tradition of an earthquake. See, however, Dillmann and cp SODOM.

2. Unhistorical narratives. (b) The giving of the Law (Ex. 19₁₈). (c) Story of Korah (Nu. 16₃₁). (d) Elijah at Horeb (1 K. 19₁₁). It is the earthquake that the pious imagination constantly associates with a theophany. See ELIJAH, § 2. (e) The crucifixion. 'The earth quaked; and the rocks were rent; and the tombs were opened,' when Jesus 'yielded up his spirit' (Mt. 27_{51 f.}). Not in the other gospels. According to Mk., the cry which Jesus uttered when he gave up the ghost so impressed the Roman centurion that he exclaimed, 'Truly this was a Son of God' (Mk. 15₃₉ RVmg.). Mt., however, explains this confession as the result of fear at the earthquake and the accompanying phenomena. Similar portents are said to have marked the death of Julius Cæsar, revered as a demigod (Virg. Georg. 1.471 ff.) However, the evangelist may have thought not only of the divinity of Christ but also of the exceptional wickedness of those who put Christ to death. 'Shall not the land tremble for this, and every one mourn that dwelleth therein?' (Am. 8.8). (f) Paul and Silas at Philippi (Acts 16.26). The essence of the story is that Paul and Silas were praying with such earnestness that all in the prison could hear, and that an extraordinary answer to prayer was granted. No stress is laid on the earthquake.

The references in prophecy and poetry are imaginative in character and symbolise the dependence of the earth on its Creator: Judg. 5.4 Am. 8.8 Hos. 4.3 Is. 29.6 Ezek. 38.19 f. Joel 2.10 Nah. 1.5 Hab. 3.6 Zech. 14.4 Ps. 18.7 [8] 29.6 97.4 114.4 Rev. 6.12 8.5 11.13 16.18.

Jerome (on Is. 15) writes of an earthquake which, in the time of his childhood (circa 315 A.D.), destroyed Rabbath Moab or Areopolis (see AR). Mediæval writers also speak of earthquakes in Palestine, stating that they were not only formidable, but also frequent. That of 1202 (or 1204) was among the worst. Ba'albek, being so near the Lebanon and Antilibanus, has always suffered much from earthquakes; that of 1759 did great damage to the ruins. In 1834 an earthquake shook Jerusalem and injured the chapel of the Nativity at Bethlehem. The great earthquake of 1837 (Jan. 1) did little harm at Jerusalem, which was not near enough to the centre of disturbance. Safed and Tiberias, however, were nearly destroyed. Cp Tristram, Land of Israel, 581.

EAST, CHILDREN OF THE (עֲרֵבֵי הָאֶרֶץ; ΟΙ ΥΙΟΙ ΚΑΙΔΕΜ [BNAQ]) is a general term for the people, whether Bedawin or pastoral tribes, of the country E. (or NE., Gen. 29.1 ΔΝΑΤΟΛΩΝ [ADEL]) of Palestine, who were regarded by the Israelites as near relations, descended from Abraham by Hagar, Keturah, and other concubines (Gen. 25.6 אֲרָם הָאֶרֶץ; ΕΙΣ ΓΗΝ ΔΝΑΤΟΛΩΝ [ADEL]). For textual criticism see REKEM.

In Ezek. 25.4 (א[ע]ר[ב]י[מ]י) they appear to the E. of Ammon and Moab (cp Is. 11.14); in Jer. 49.28 they are mentioned with the Kedarites. In Judg. 8.10 (ἀλλοφύλων [B], υἱοὶ ἀνατολῶν [AL]) the phrase has a wider reference, including all the Bedouin (Moore), and in Job 13 (τῶν ἀφ' ἡλίου ἀνατολῶν [BNA]), 1 K. 4.30 [5.10] (πάντων ἀρχαίων ἀνθρώπων [BAL]) it seems to include the Edomites, for the Edomites of Teman were renowned for their wisdom. EBAL (עֵבֶל); plausibly connected with Bēl by Wi. GI 1.20 n. 2; Gray, Acad. 20th June 1896; ΓΑΙΒΗΛ [BADEL]; cp EBAL, MOUNT.

1. One of the sons of Shobal h. Seir the Horite; Gen. 36.23 1 Ch. 1.10 (γαβηλ [A], ουβαλ [L]).

2. A son of Joktan 1 Ch. 1.22 (where eleven MSS [Kenn.] and Pesh. read אֵבֶל; om. B. γεμια [A], ηβηλ [L], Jos. Ant. i. 6.4 ηβαλος; HEBAL). In Gen. 10.28 the name appears as OBAL (עֵבֶל, Sam. עֵבֶל, om. ADE; evaλ [MSS; see HP], γεβαλ [Compl., MSS], γαβαλ [L]; EBAL). Halévy connects with the local name Abil in Yemen (Msl. 86). Cp Glaser, Skizze, 2.426. The name may be a miswritten form of אֵבֶל, which follows (Che.).

EBAL, MOUNT (הַר עֵבֶל; ορος ΓΑΙΒΑΛ [BAFL]; Jos. Ant. v. 1.19 ΗΒΗΛΟΣ [v. 1 ΓΗΒΗΛΟΣ]; Ant. iv. 8.44 ΒΟΥΛΗ; MONS HEBAL). Possibly Ebal should be Ebel; -bel may be a divine name, '... of Bel.' The dedication of a mountain to Bēl in primitive times would not be surprising. Cp Ebal (above), Harbel (Num. 34.11, see RIBLAH). There is of course no connection between Ebal (1, above) ben Seir and Mount Ebal.

Ebal is a mountain 3077 ft. above the sea-level, which, with Gerizim (on the south), incloses the fertile valley in which Shechem lies. Both the mountains and the city were doubtless sacred from remote antiquity. There is an indication of this, so far as regards Ebal, in the direction respecting the solemn curse to be deposited there, ready to fall on the disobedient (Dt. 11.29 cp 27.13-26), and respecting the placing of the great stones inscribed with the (Deuteronomic) Law and the erection of an altar to Yahwē on the same mountain (Dt. 27.4-8). The latter passage is specially important. As Kuenen (Hes. 1.28) and Driver (Dt. 29.5) have pointed out, there was an injunction respecting a national sacrifice on Mt. Ebal¹ in the older work (JE) upon which the late Deuteronomic writer builds. The view that any disparagement to Ebal was intended by Dt. 11.29 is therefore in itself improbable, nor can it be said that the mountain is even now sterile to the degree which a popular prejudice demands.

Maundrell in 1697 observed that 'neither of the mountains has much to boast of as to their (its) pleasantness.' Corn grows on the southern slopes, and there are traces of a thorough system of irrigation in ancient times.² Mt. Ebal is 228 ft. higher than Mt. Gerizim, and commands a more extensive view, which is fully described by G. A. Smith (HG 119-123). Its position was thoroughly but not unnaturally misunderstood by Eus. and Jer. On this and other points, see GERIZIM. In the Pap. Anast. (Travels of an Egyptian in Syria, Palestine, etc.), Chabas and Goodwin render (i. 21.6) 'Where is the mountain of Ikama? who can master it?' (RP 1.2 111). This should rather be, 'Where is the mountain of Sakam(ā) or Shechem?'—i.e., either Ebal or Gerizim (As. u. Eur. 394). In the fourteenth century B.C. the latter names do not seem to have been widely known.

EBED (עֶבֶד, i.e., servant [of God], § 50; אΒΕΔ [AL]).

1. Father of Gaal (Judg. 9.26-41, ωβηλ [B] v. 31 αβελ [A], 35 σαβερ [A]) according to MT; hut see GAAL.

2. b. Jonathan of the B'ne ADIN in Ezra's caravan (see EZRA i. § 2; ii., § 15 [1] d) Ezra 8.6 (ωβηθ [B], ωβθ [A], [Αμιν] αδαθ [L]) = 1 Esd. 8.32 (ΟΒΕΘ, ουβην [B], ωβηθ [A], [Αμιν] αδαθ [L]).

EBED-MELECH (עֶבֶד־מֶלֶךְ, 'servant of the king' [i.e. God], § 41; occurs also in Phoen.; ΑΒΔΕΜΕΛΕΧ [BNAQ]). An Ethiopian eunuch at the court of Zedekiah, who obtained leave to draw up Jeremiah from the cistern into which he had been cast by the princes (Jer. 38.7 ff.). He was rewarded by a prophetic assurance that he would be preserved at the capture of Jerusalem (39.15 ff.).

Jewish legend reckons Ehed-melech among the nine (or, some say, the thirteen) who entered Paradise without passing through death (see Gaster in MGWJ, 1881, p. 413).

EBEN-EZER (אֶבֶן־עֶזֶר, 'the stone of help,' אΒΕΝ-εζεπ [BAL]).

1. The site of the battle in which the Philistines slew the sons of Eli and took the ark (1 S. 4.1 5.1, αβενεζεπ [A]; in 5.1, -ννηρ [B]). The battle seems to have been followed by the destruction of Shiloh (cp Jer. 7.12 14), and the subjugation of central Canaan by the invaders. This Eben-ezer was near Aphek, which lay in the northern part of the plain of Sharon.

2. The stone which Samuel set up between the Benjaminite Mizpah and Shen in commemoration of his victory over the Philistines (1 S. 7.12). This is quite a different part of the country from that in which (1) lay, and the two Eben-ezers cannot be made one without inventing a new Aphek. See APHEK, 3 (c). On the other hand there is no reason why more than one sacred stone should not have borne so appropriate a name as 'the stone of help';³ the story of 1 S. 7 comes from a document of no historical value, and is probably an aetiological legend giving an innocent explanation of what was really a rude stone idol. W. R. S.

EBER (עֵבֶר, εβερ [BADEL]). 1. That Eber is not an actual personage, but an ethnological abstraction, is shown elsewhere (see HEBREW LANGUAGE, § 1). He is in fact the eponym of all the Hebrew peoples—

'all the sons of Eber' (Gen. 10:21; εβωρ [E]). Genealogically he is the father of Peleg and Joktan, and the grandson of Arpachshad (i.e., the Hebrew peoples came from Chaldaea; see ARPHAXAD), Gen. 10:24 f. 1 Ch. 1:18 f. 24 f.; cp Gen. 11:13-16. The name is properly a geographical term = עבר הנָהָר, Ēber han-nāhār —i.e., 'the farther (?) bank of the river'—which appears in Ass. in the form ebir nāri (first indicated by Wi. GI 1:223, II. 1; cp Hommel, AHT 196, 255, 326),¹ and Hommel thinks, was originally applied by the Canaanites to the region on the W. bank of the Lower and the Middle Euphrates, including Uru (or Ur) and Borsippa. The designation Eberites or Hebrews would naturally still adhere to those tribes which came westwards into Canaan. According to this scholar, the name 'Eber' is also used once in the OT (viz., in Nu. 24:22-24; εββαλιος [BAFL], εβερ [EBA]) of Palestine and Syria with the exception of Ashur or S. Judah (see ASSHURIM). His arguments are, however, not very solid. It is not certain that ebir nāri in the inscription really denotes Palestine; Hommel shifts his ground in the course of his book (see AHT 196, 326); and after all it is not a Canaanitish inscription that he gives us. It is even more questionable whether Hommel can claim 1 K. 4:24 [54] as proving an early Israelitish use of 'Ēber han-nāhār' as an expression for Palestine. This passage, together with 1 K. 4:21 [51], seems to belong to a late idealistic editor, who lived at a time when 'Ēber han-nāhār' ('Abar nahrā), or, in old Persian, Arbāya, was the constant phrase for the region between the Euphrates and Gaza (see COELESYRIA, § 1).

Hommel's restoration of Nu. l.c. may be sought in his book (AHT 245 f.). He is not wrong in supposing that the text needs emendation; but in deference to an archaeological theory he has unfortunately neglected the most important recent suggestion—viz., that of D. H. Müller (see BALAAM, § 6)—which makes Nu. 24:23 f. an oracle on the kingdom of Šam'al (NE. of the gulf of Antioch). Starting from this, it will be plain that Assyria and Eber must be referred to in the little poem as the enemies of the N. Syrian kingdom.²

The sense of Eber has to be obtained from the context. It may mean either the region beyond the Euphrates, or that on this side the river, near Aleppo (Ass. Halvan). In defence of the rival theory (that of Hommel) it is urged that the phrase 'Ibr-naharān (עבר נהר) in 1 Minæan inscription means 'the region E. and N. of 'Ašur, practically therefore the trans-Jordanic country and Syria' (Glaser). Winckler, however (AOF 1:337 f.; GI 1:174, n. 2, and 192), thinks that the Minæan 'Eber han-nāhār was the land of Mušri (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b), which received a second name from the stream that formed its frontier, whilst Marquart (Fund. 75) is of opinion that 'Ibr-naharān can only be the Persian province, 'Abar nahrā (see above).

as well as ivory, and from 1 Ch. 29:2 that he was believed to have used it in the decoration of the temple. If our emendation of Is. 2:16 b is right (below, § 2 e), ebony was especially used at Jerusalem in the construction of thrones, for Isaiah appears to threaten destruction to 'thrones of ebony.' Possibly Solomon's famous throne (1 K. 10:18) was made of ivory inlaid with ebony. The passage that needs no emendation (below, § 2 a) occurs in Ezekiel's grand description of Tyrian commerce. Ebony, as well as ivory, was brought to Tyre by Dedanite, or possibly Rhodian, merchants (see DODANIM). The uses to which ebony was put by the Egyptians are well known. It was employed both for sacred and for secular purposes; shrines, palettes, and many objects of furniture were made of it. From the time of Ti (tomb at Saqqāra) to that of Ptolemy Philadelphus it finds frequent mention in the Egyptian records (Naville, Deir el-Bahari, 1:24 ['94]). The Babylonians and Assyrians too knew this wood, if Jensen (KB 3:37) is right in supposing that it is meant by the term ušu, which is applied to a precious kind of wood, derived by the patesi, or priest-king, Gudea, from Meluhha, or NW. Arabia.

There seems no reason to doubt, notwithstanding Sir Joseph Hooker's hesitation, that the 'ebony' of Ezek. is the heartwood of Diospyros Ebenum, a large tree of S. India and Ceylon, which has been exported from early times. It was no doubt one of the articles of Phœnician commerce through the Red Sea, like so many other products mentioned in OT.

We will now examine the biblical passages in which reference is perhaps made to ebony.

(a) Ezek. 27 15 was understood in very different ways by the ancients. G's ὀδύνας ἐλεφαντίνους indeed supports 'ק'; but

2. Biblical evidence. τοῖς εἰσπαγομένοις implies some word beginning with ל, and Pesh. reads the whole phrase קרנות שֶׁן וְלִבְנָה, 'horns of oil and frankincense.' Still the ordinary text and the ordinary rendering are probably correct; Smend, Cornill, and Bertholet are, on this point, agreed.

(b) The present text of 1 K. 10:22 cannot be correct. GBL only gives (as its rendering of MT's שְׁהָרִים וְתַפְּסִים וְתַבִּיטִים וְאִשׁוּן טַרְשִׁישִׁי וְכַסְפִּים וְזָהָבִים) (ἀρέα. [L])—i.e., it read the first word אִשׁוּן. This is probably older than the reading substituted for it in G^A; but although the Chronicler may have read אִשׁוּן שְׁהָרִים for אִשׁוּן שְׁהָרִים [see (c)], MT is probably nearer the true text. Only, following Ezek. 27 15, we should restore שְׁן וְתַבִּיטִים instead of MT's (הַ)תַּבִּיטִים. אִשׁוּן may in like manner have arisen out of an early scribe's correction of the text; he probably wrote קרנות. If so, we should read the whole phrase שְׁן וְתַבִּיטִים וְזָהָבִים וְכַסְפִּים, 'gold and silver, and horns of ivory and ebony.'

(c) In 1 Ch. 29:2 אִשׁוּן שְׁהָרִים, 'onyx-stones,' which does not come in very naturally in the list of David's building materials, should rather be אִשׁוּן וְתַבִּיטִים. Perhaps 2 Ch. 9:21 originally made the ships of Tarshish bring אִשׁוּן שְׁהָרִים, not שְׁהָרִים. See Che. Exp. T. 10:240 (Feb. '99).

(d) In Cant. 3:10, where EV has, absurdly, 'the midst thereof being paved with love,' we should certainly read 'its centre inlaid with ebony' (אִשׁוּן וְתַבִּיטִים). See LITTLER.

(e) In Is. 2:16 שְׁבִיטֵי הַחֲמָה cannot possibly be right. The whole verse should probably be read thus (SBOT, Addenda), וְעַל בְּלִיָּאֲרֵי הַשֵּׁן, and on all palaces of ivory,

וְעַל בְּלִיָּאֲרֵי הַבְּנִים, and on all thrones of ebony.

Cp Am. 3:15, and, on thrones of ebony, see above (§ 1). A similar emendation seems to be needed in Ps. 48:7 [8], where אִשׁוּן תְּרִשִׁישׁ should almost certainly be קַרְנֵי הַשֵּׁן. Cp. OPHIR.

Qōhéleth, EV 'Ecclesiastes or the Preacher' (Heb. קֹהֶלֶת, Qōhleth, ΕΚΚΛΗΣΙΑΣΤΗΣ [ΒΝΑC], Jerome, Concionator), is a word of rather uncertain

1. Name, etc. meaning, being the fem. participle (in the simple form) of a verb usually employed in the causative and signifying 'to gather together an assembly,' 'to possibly means 'he who addresses an assembly,' as English, 'the Preacher.' It was taken in this sense by the Greek translator and by Jerome. The name is applied to Solomon (11 12). The fem. form of the word has been variously explained. By some it is supposed that Qōhéleth is wisdom (which is fem.) personified; but, Qōhéleth is construed as a masc. (7 27 should be read 'amar haq-Qōhleth, as 128), and wisdom would hardly say 'I applied my heart to search out by wisdom' (1 13; cp 1 17 23). It is easier to suppose that the fem. is to be understood in a neuter sense, the subject which exercises the activity being generalised, that which addresses, with no reference to its actual gender (Ezra 2 55 57), the form having possibly an intensive sense, as in Arabic. The book is written in prose, though interspersed all through with poetical fragments, when the author's language becomes more condensed and elevated.

It is only in comparatively modern times that any real progress has been made in the interpretation of Ecclesiastes. The ancients were

2. Interpretation. too timid to allow the Preacher to speak his mind. Modern interpreters recognise a strong individuality in the book, and are more ready to accept its natural meaning, though a certain desire to tone down the thoughts of the Preacher is still discernible in some English works. One thing which has greatly contributed to the misunderstanding of the book and the character of the Preacher is the introduction of Solomon. To consider all those passages where the Preacher refers to himself as 'king in Jerusalem' and the like to be interpolations (with Bickell) may be unnecessary; but it is necessary to understand that, as in all later literature, Solomon is merely the ideal of wisdom and magnificence. It is in this character alone that he is introduced. Neither his idolatry nor his supposed licentiousness (the term shiddah, 2 8, RV concubines, is of uncertain meaning)¹ is alluded to; nor is his penitence. The conception of a Solomon in his old age, a sated and effete voluptuary, looking back in penitence upon a life of pleasure, and exclaiming Vanity! is wholly unlike the Preacher of the book. There is not a word of penitence in the book. The Preacher is anything but weary of life. He has the intensest desire for it and enjoyment of it (11 7), and the deepest horror of death and the decay of nature (12 2 ff.). Far from being outworn and exhausted, he complains throughout the book that the powers of man have no scope: he is cabined, cribbed, confined by a superior power on all sides of him. Neither his natural nor his moral being has free play. Indeed, in his consciousness of power the Preacher appears to demand a freedom for man nothing short of that promised in the words 'Ye shall be as God.'

Amid all the peculiarities of the book certain things are clear. 1. The book has a general idea running through

3. General character. it, and is no mere collection of fragments or of occasional thoughts. The connection of the reflections sometimes seems loose,—the author was not a literary artist,—but there is in his mind a general idea, which all his musings and examples illustrate.

2. From the name which the author assumes it is evident that he desires to play the part of an instructor. He has his fellow-men before him, and feels that he has a lesson to convey to them. True, there is a large personal element in the book—it is the author's confessions, and he takes his readers largely into his confidence;—but he is not solitary in his perplexities, and he has social and religious considerations which he desires to address to his contemporaries.

3. Further, the author is everywhere in earnest. He is not a mere clever dialectician playing intellectually with great problems or human interests, setting up opinions only to overturn them, or broaching theories only to reduce them ad absurdum. If he sometimes appears to speak on both sides of a question it is due to this, that the conditions and stations of human life—such as poverty or riches, servitude or ownership, royalty or the place of subjects—have two sides, and in his practical philosophy, which consists in inculcating a spirit of equanimity, he sometimes seeks to show the good that there is even in things evil, and on the other hand the drawbacks incident to those things which men covet most. He has also, perhaps, different moods. He is so overcome by the thought of the miseries that oppress human life that he thinks it better to die than to live, or best of all never to have lived; but at other times his mood brightens, and he counsels men to throw themselves into whatever activity offers itself to their hand and to pursue it with their might, and to seize whatever enjoyment is yielded by the labour or by its reward. The ground-tone of his mind is certainly sombre. He is oppressed by the intellectual and the practical limitations to which human life is subject. Man cannot understand either the world in which he lives or the work of God amid which he is set; neither can he by his efforts accomplish anything which is 1 permanent gain either to himself or to the world, nor break the fixed and inexorable order of all things, of which order he himself is part. His chain is very short, permitting only the narrowest range of work or of enjoyment, and all he knows is that this work and enjoyment is the portion which God has assigned to him. This is the fundamental idea of the book, repeated many times, and the author's position appears to remain the same throughout. Although his mood varies, his verdict or judgment is stable (128). There is no evidence of a struggle in his mind between faith and doubt, in which faith achieves a victory; much less are the apparent discrepancies of view in the book to be explained on the assumption that it contains the utterances of 'two voices,' one doubting and the other believing.

The book consists of what might be called the author's two philosophies, his theoretical philosophy and his practical. The theoretical principle is: All

4. Main principles. is vanity: what gain, result, is there to man in his labour or life? The practical principle is really all that is left possible by the theoretical one: Life has no gain; but God has given life to man, and he has to live it. Therefore, there is nothing better than that a man eat and drink and let himself enjoy good, for this is God's gift to him. Naturally there is a third thing. This enjoyment of good is the only sphere in which a man has a certain freedom: it partly depends upon himself and his own demeanour. Some principle to regulate his conduct and mind in life is therefore necessary. This regulating principle the Preacher calls wisdom. As a mental quality it is practical sagacity, insight into things and situations, enabling a man to act prudently; as a temper it is equanimity and moderation. These three ideas or conclusions had already been arrived at before the author sat down to write his book; they are constantly present to his own mind, and much of the obscurity of the book arises from his insisting upon them not separately but simultaneously.

Without circumlocution the Preacher states his fundamental idea: 'All is vanity: what gain is there to man in all the labour in which he labours under the sun?' In other words, 5. Theoretical philosophy. human life is without result. In this it is like the whole order of things, which goes on in an eternal round, accomplishing nothing. All things recur, and there is nothing new under the sun (1.1-11). Then, in chap. 1 f., he gives an account of the experiments which led to this conclusion. He inquired into 'all that is done under the sun,'—by which he means not merely the whole variety of human activity, but also all the events that happen to man in his life,—and he found that all was without result. He found, too, that the knowledge gained during the enquiry was equally resultless: 'In much wisdom is much grief' (1.12-18). Then he tried pleasure,—not as a sensualist, for his wisdom remained with him (2.3-9), but as an experimental philosopher,—and he found pleasure equally barren of result: 'I said of laughter, It is mad, and of mirth, What doeth it?' (2.2). Wisdom, indeed, carries a certain advantage with it; but it is no permanent gain to a man, 'for as the fool dieth, so dieth the wise man.' Therefore, there being no profit or permanent gain in life, howsoever it be lived, the practical conclusion is, Let yourself enjoy good (2.24).

Such is the author's meaning when he says that all is 'vanity.' It is not, as we are apt to suppose, that the world is unsatisfying and that the human soul craves something higher than the world can give. All is vanity because man is confined by a fixed determination of everything on all sides of him by God. All the events of human life are in the hand of God: man has no power over them more than he has over the wind (8.8). There is a time to be born, and a time to die; a time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to love and a time to hate. All is 'in the hand of God; whether it be love or hatred man knoweth it not—all is before them' (3.1-9 9.1). It is absurd to suppose that this means that there is a proper or suitable time for everything; it means that there is a time fixed by God for everything, a time, not when things should be done, but when they must be done. Even the injustice in the judgment seat and the oppressions against which men are helpless are ordinations of God. There may be a time for judging them—there is a time for everything;—but their object in God's hand is to bring home to man a true idea of what he is—that he is nothing and that God is all. Their object is to prove men and teach them to fear God, and that they may learn that they are but beasts; for one event happeneth to them and to the beasts: all go to one place, all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again (3.16-20)—'Who knoweth the spirit of man whether it goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast whether it goeth downward to the earth?' (3.21 RV). Obviously nothing

6. Practical philosophy. is left to man but to take what joy out of life is possible, for that is his portion (2.24 3.12-22 5.18-20 8.15 9.7-10 11.9 ff.). Even over this man has no power: it also is in the determination of God (7.13 f.). Power to enjoy life is the gift of God (2.24 f. 3.13 5.19); and, though it may generally be assumed that he desires men to have this enjoyment (9.7), there are instances where he denies them the gift (2.26 6.2-8). The Preacher is, of course, no sensualist. The 'good,' enjoyment of which he recommends, consists of the simple pleasures of life: eating and drinking, the consolations and supports of wedlock, the pleasure to be derived from activity in work or in business (9.7-10 11.1-6 9.10). How could the pleasures recommended be those of riot and excess when they are 'the gift of God,' the 'portion' he has given to man in the life which he spends as a shadow? It is just in these enjoyments that man comes nearest to God: he meets God in them, feels his favour, and knows that in them God is 'responding to the joy of his heart' (5.20). This is the old view of the Hebrew mind, which looked on prosperity and the blessings of life as in a sense sacramental, as the seal of God's favour. The Preacher is a God-fearing man (5.6 f. 8.12), a man of righteous life (8.13), thoughtful, and dwelling by preference on the serious side of life (7.1-6). He believes in God, and in a moral rule of God, who 'judges' the righteous and the wicked. No doubt this rule is incomprehensible and full of what seem moral anomalies. It appears arbitrary (2.26): under it all things happen alike to all, to the godly and to the ungodly (9.1-3): the race is not to the swift nor the battle to the strong (9.11): there be righteous men unto whom it happeneth according to the work of the wicked, and the contrary (8.14). Nevertheless, the Preacher will not abandon the general idea of such a moral rule (8.12 f.), though he laments that the delay and uncertainty of God's 'judgment' encourages men in their wickedness (8.11), and increases the evil and madness which are in their hearts (9.3); for, though God made man upright, man has sought out many inventions (7.29). Such anomalies in Providence, however, always drive the Preacher back to his practical counsel: 'Wherefore I commend mirth; for a man hath no better thing under the sun than to eat and drink and to be merry' (8.15).

Man is speculatively unable to comprehend the world (3.11 7.24 8.17), and practically helpless to obviate its evils; he is bound within an iron system which is unalterable. From a modern point of view it might be asked, Does the Preacher acknowledge the possibility of a progress of the individual mind within the bounds of the system which fetters him, of a culture or discipline within the limitations imposed on him by God? He does so in a certain sense. The evil of life, man's ignorance of what is to befall him, teaches him to fear God (3.14); and in his survey of the work that is done under the sun he acquires 'wisdom,' or, to use a common phrase, 'culture.' But the 'vanity,' the resultlessness

7. Death. of life, lies here: in that a man can neither retain these gains nor transmit them, and, after all, life is without profit. (1) Man cannot retain his gains, for death surprises him: the wise man dieth even as the fool, and there is no remembrance of either of them for ever (2.16; cp 2.17-23); in the grave there is no work, no knowledge, no wisdom (9.10): the dead know not anything, neither have they any more a reward (9.5). The Preacher strikes here the saddest note of his feeling. It is obvious that his complaint that life has no 'profit' because man cannot retain its gains is a complaint that man cannot retain himself—'What shall it profit a man if he gain the world and lose himself?' The Preacher's cry is for continuity of the individual life, that he may still carry with him the gains which his spirit has accumulated. He appears to be aware that immortality of the individual spirit is believed in by some; but either the ground-tone of his own mind is too sombre for him to accept the idea, or the evidence for it seems insufficient (3.19-21 9.1-6). His book is unintelligible if his belief formed part of his creed. Hence he has been called a 'sceptic.' The word is relative. All the OT saints, if they lived now, might be called sceptics. The belief in immortality was not until very late times an assured doctrine of the OT (cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 33). We observe it in the process of arising, as the necessary issue of two things—the living fellowship of man with God here, of which it is the continuance; and the anomalies of providence, of which it is the reconciliation. The Preacher is unable to reach it on either line.² (2) Further, life is without result

² The use of the word 'spirit' in the OT is obscure. (1) It means the 'breath,' the visible sign, of life. (2) It is what we call the 'principle of life.' Life and the continuance of life because the wise man cannot transmit the fruits of his labour or of his wisdom: the man that cometh after him may be a fool. The idea of an advance of the race through the accumulated gains contributed to it by individuals does not occur to the Preacher. The tide of personal life flows too strong in his heart to permit him to acquiesce in his own absorption into the race, even if the race had a great destiny before it. Of this, moreover, he sees no evidence. To his mind, in the mood in which we find him, mankind has neither a progress nor a goal. The analogy of nature oppresses him. Its monotonous daily round of sunrise and sunset, of veering winds and rushing streams, produces no result. The history of mankind is the same—one generation goeth and another generation cometh. The universe has no goal; God has no purpose, and mankind no destiny. This general scope of the Preacher's logic (howsoever his heart recoils from it) defines the sense in which he speaks of God's 'judgment.' He hardly has the idea of a general judgment, such as that of the 'day of the Lord' of the prophets, when God brings in his perfect kingdom and bestows eternal blessedness on his people. The Preacher's 'individualism,' common to him with all the writers of the Wisdom, makes this unlikely. Neither could he have spoken of the universe as a continuous flux without a point of attainment if he had thought of it as moving towards this great goal. The 'judgment' is to him merely part of the moral government of God, which he maintains, howsoever imperfectly he is able to perceive it.

We have seen already that besides his theoretical and his practical philosophy the Preacher had a regulative principle of conduct, which he called wisdom. Much of the book is devoted to showing the advantage of this principle. It teaches a man how to bear himself before God. Even in religion a man ought to be calm and meditative, and to restrain over-impulsiveness (5:1-7:76f.). So in regard to rulers: even if despotic and evil, a wise man will not act hastily, seeing that power is on the side of the ruler; nor will he rashly enter into plots or conspiracies. Discretion is the better part of valour. He who digs a pit may fall into it. Skill is better than force. If you have trees to fell, grind your axe rather than 'put to more strength' (8:1-9:10:11). And be not surprised if you are oppressed and plundered. Society, or at least government, is an organised oppression: those who oppress you are oppressed by those above them, and these again by their superiors, and so on to the top of the pyramid (5:8). Wisdom, however, perceives the 'vanity' of all this: for example, he that loveth money will not be satisfied with money, and he that increaseth his substance increaseth those who eat it (5:10-6:9). Wisdom, on the contrary, is as good as an inheritance, or better than that; for it preserves the life of him who has it (7:12); it supplements the defects of righteousness, and avoids 'the falsehood of extremes' (7:15-22); it is stronger than ten rulers in a city (7:19); and preserves men both from sentimental dreaming over the good old days and from over-anxious forecasting how their business ventures will turn out (11:1-6). There is much, however, that wisdom is not equal to even in human things (7:24), and no wisdom can find out the 'work of God' (8:17). Moreover, the wisdom of the poor man is neglected or forgotten (9:13-16), and a little folly is stronger than much wisdom, even as a dead fly will cause a pot of ointment to stink (10:1).

are the effect of a divine influence; the cessation of life is the withdrawal of this influence. The 'spirit' in this sense is nothing but an effect. All questions where this 'spirit' goes when 'taken away' by God are irrelevant. It goes nowhere: the 'taking away' of it is merely the cessation of the divine influence of which it is the effect. (3) It is the immaterial subject (not substance) in man, which lives. The boundary lines between (2) and (3) are confused. The passage 3:21 seems to incline to (3), though without firmness (5:19), whilst 12:7 probably goes back to (2), being on a line with Ps. 104:29f. Job 34:14. Cp, further, ESCHATOLOGY, § 19f., and SPIRIT.

Occasionally the author uses the term 'wisdom' in the sense of comprehension of the universe or work of God. For this man is altogether incompetent (cp Job 28).

The above analysis shows the Preacher's main ideas. The Preacher himself is more difficult to explain. The

9. The man. difference between him and earlier writers of 'the Wisdom' lies in his tone. To catch this truly would be to find the key to his book. The existence of the book is evidence of dissatisfaction, of a sense of want. The Preacher is driven to acknowledge that man is 'like a beast with lower pleasures': he could not have added 'with lower pains.' His book all through is a cry of pain—just that he has no portion but lower pleasures. His conclusions are in a way positivist; but his whole book is a protest against his conclusions—not against the truth of them, but against the fact that they should be true. Job flung himself against the moral iniquities of Providence; to the Preacher the 'crookedness' of things is universal. Job raged; the Preacher only moans and moralises. Job is an untamed eagle, dashing himself against the bars of his cage; the Preacher looks out with a lustreless eye on the glorious heavens, where, if he were free, he might soar. He knows it cannot be, and he ventures also to murmur some advice to men: Enjoy good; do not think (5:20). His admonitions to himself and others are quite sincere, not ironical; they are the human soul's efforts to anaesthetise itself—dull narcotics numbing pain. The Preacher's mood may be a complex thing: partly temperament, partly a mode of religion, and partly due to the wretched conditions of human life in his time. It was an evil time. Judges were corrupt, rulers despotic and debauched, the people oppressed; and society was disintegrated. It is unnecessary to have recourse to Greek OT religion.

10. A product of philosophy to explain the Preacher's ideas and feelings (cp HELLENISM, § 6, and see below, § 13). The practical 'wisdom' which he recommends may have a certain resemblance to the 'unperturbedness,' the 'mean,' and the 'nothing too much' of the philosophers; but both it and all other things in the Preacher are a natural development of the native Hebrew Wisdom. There is nothing in Ecclesiastes which is not already in Job and the older Wisdom. Indeed, one may say that the OT religion was bound to produce, at some time and in some cases, a phenomenon like the Preacher. The OT religion consists of two things: first, ideas about God; and, secondly, a living faith towards him and sense of fellowship with him. Without the latter the former brings little comfort to the human mind, even though certain fundamental beliefs—such as the personality of God and the moral being of man—be still retained. For, first, the fundamental principle of Hebrew religion that God is in all things that happen, whilst in times of prosperity and well-being it gave unspeakable joy to the pious mind, with a vivid sense of its fellowship in life with God, when the times were evil and articles of a creed had taken the place of an emotional piety, gave rise to a sense of impotency in the mind. Man felt environed on all sides by a fixed order which he could do nothing to ameliorate. God became a mere transcendent force outside of human life, pressing upon it and limiting it on every side. The different feeling which the same conception of God produced in the pious mind and in the reflective mind, respectively, will appear if Ps. 139 be compared with Ecclesiastes. It would be false to say that 'God' to the Preacher was nothing more than what the 'world' or 'nature,' or that which is outside a man, is to many minds now. His faith in a personal God is never shaken; atheism or materialism is not conceivable in an ancient Oriental mind. At the same time, his faith is no more suffused with the life-colours of an emotional confidence, and he could not have said with the Psalmist, 'Nevertheless I am continually with thee' (Ps. 73:23), nor with Job, 'I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that I shall see God' (19²⁵). Secondly, it was from 'piety,' the sense of fellowship with God, not from reflection, that all the great religious hopes in regard to man's future arose. They were projections, corollaries, of an emotional personal religion—such as the hope of immortality, the faith in a reign of righteousness, and the incoming of a kingdom of God upon the earth. When piety declined, and reflection took its place, these hopes of the future could not sustain themselves. They survived in the community, whose life was perennial; but the 'individualism' of the Preacher felt them slipping from its grasp.

The date of Ecclesiastes cannot be determined with certainty. It is later than Malachi, for the priest called in Malachi 'messenger of the Lord' (Mal.

11. Date. 27) is simply named 'the messenger' in 56. It is probably earlier than Ecclesiasticus (circa 200), for, though many of the coincidences usually cited have little relevancy, Ecclus. 186 seems certainly a reminiscence of Eccles. 314, and Ecclus. 4224 of Eccles. 714. The book may belong to the oppressive times of the later Persian rule, or it may be a product of the Greek period. Perhaps the language would rather suggest the later date (see next §). In the beginning of the book the experiments on life are represented as being made by Solomon; but this transparent disguise is speedily abandoned. Solomon is merely the ideal of one who has unbounded wisdom and unlimited resources with which to experiment on human life—a man whose verdict of 'vanity,' therefore, is infallible. In the Epilogue the Preacher is merely one of the wise (129). The state of society amid which the author lived has no resemblance to the state of society in the times of Solomon. There was corruption in the judgment seat (316), cruel oppression from which there was no redress (41 ff.), and a hierarchy of official plunderers one above another (58), with a system of espionage which made the most private speech dangerous (1020). The author had witnessed revolutionary changes in society and strange reversals of fortune—slaves riding on horses and princes walking on foot (104-7).

Such a time might be the late Persian period. It could not well be the early Greek period when the Jews enjoyed the beneficent rule of the early Ptolemies. It might, however, be the more advanced Greek period, when Palestine became the stake played for by Antioch and Alexandria, a time when the people suffered severe hardships, and when the upper classes, especially the religious leaders, were deeply demoralised and self-seeking. On the other hand, the book must be earlier than the uprising of the national spirit in the time of the Maccabees. Grätz indeed places the book in the time of Herod (8 B.C.); but the date is part of his theory of the book, which has no probability. The most probable date perhaps is the latter part of the third century B.C. (cp. however, Che. Jew. Rel. Life, ch. v.).

Both the language and the modes of religious thought in Ecclesiastes suggest that it is one of the latest books in the canon. The language has the peculiarities of such late books as

12. Language. Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah, and Esther. Indeed, it belongs to a much more degraded stage of Hebrew than either of those books exhibits; and in the forms of words, in the new senses in which older words are used, and in the many new words employed, it has many similarities to the Targums and Syriac, especially to the Mishna (circa 200 A. D.).

The characteristic forms of Hebrew syntax, such as the vav conversive have almost disappeared; constructions of classical Hebrew have given place to those of Aramaic; and in general the language has lost its old condensed character, and become analytic, with a multitude of new particles. Details may be seen in Driver's Introd., and in the commentaries of Delitzsch, Nowack, or Wright.

The ideas and the mode of religious thought in the 13. Ideas. book also bear witness to the lateness of its date. In the Preacher the religious spirit of Israel is seen to be completely exhausted. It can no more, as in Job and Ps. 49 and 73, use the problems of life in order to rise to lofty intuitions of its relation to God. It sinks back defeated, able only to offer a few practical rules for ordinary life. The idea of Tyler, who is followed by Plumptre, that the book is a blend of the Stoic and Epicurean philosophies, seems extraordinarily superficial, and is supported mainly by what appears misinterpretation of its language.

The passage 31 ff., 'there is a time to be born' (etc.), does not inculcate the doctrine of living 'conformably to nature, or teach that there is a fit time for doing everything'; it teaches that there is a necessary time, for the time of everything has been determined by God. Even the most astute opportunist would have difficulty in securing that he should be born and should die at the fitting time. Again, the passages 19 315 and many others certainly teach that there is nothing 'new' under the sun, no progress in nature or history, that things recur; but they teach nothing about recurrent 'cycles.' Determinism is, of course, a prevailing idea in the book. That, however, is just the fundamental idea of the Wisdom, or indeed of the Hebrew mind—that God is the causality in all things—with the inevitable development which time gave it. At first sight the phrase 'to do good' in the sense of 'to see good, to enjoy life (812), has a startling resemblance to the Gk. εὖ πάσχειν; but, after all, the senses of the two phrases are somewhat different, and there is no reason to suppose the Hebrew expression to be an imitation; though not occurring elsewhere, its opposite, 'to do badly' (i.e., be sad), is used in early literature (2 S. 1218, and perhaps Eccles. 51 (417 (511)), and possibly the phrase itself may be ancient. (H. Zirkel, Unters. üb. den Prediger, 1902, was the first to discover Graecisms in Ecclesiastes.)

There have been attempts to identify the 'old and foolish king' (413 ff.) and the city the siege of which was raised by 'the poor wise man' (913 ff.), and to verify the possible historical reference in the passage (104-7) about slaves on horseback and princes walking on foot, and in such passages as 810, with a view to fixing the date of the book more accurately; but nothing has resulted beyond conjectures more or less plausible.

The ingenious theory of Bickell that the apparent want of connection in many parts of Ecclesiastes is the 14. Integrity. result of an accident which befell the book at some early time, and threw the sheets into confusion, has little probability:¹ the want of connection complained of disappears in many cases before a more careful study of the author's line of thought. In a book such as Ecclesiastes, however,—the line of thought and (particularly) the tone of which diverge so greatly from the other OT writings—it was to be expected that there would be some interpolations: qualifications which the reader or scribe felt constrained to add to the author's somewhat strong statements. The probability that 119b is an addition rests not so much on the idea expressed as on its unnaturalness in the context; for the view of some that the passage means that God 'will bring into judgment' any one who neglects to enjoy the natural pleasures of life is too absurd. There is less objection to 317 (perhaps the last word of the verse should be read sām, 'hath appointed'). 810 12f. also are in some way corrupt. So, certainly, 121, 'Remember thy creator.' The words disturb the connection between 1110 and the rest of 121. The reading suggested by Grätz, 'Remember thy fountain' (= thy wife, Prov. 515-19), strikes a lower note than is heard anywhere in the book, and is to be rejected.

The Epilogue falls into two parts, 129-12 and 1213 f.; and it is questionable whether either part (especially the second) is original.² On the one hand, the book reaches its natural conclusion in 128, where the burden of it is restated: 'All is Vanity'; and, secondly, whilst in the rest of the book the author speaks in the first person, in vv. 9-12 he is spoken about. On the other hand, though the verses contain some peculiar expressions, their general style agrees with that of the rest of the book, and it is quite possible that the author, dropping his literary disguise of Solomon, might have added some account of himself in his actual character. The picture is certainly not just that which would have suggested itself to a mere reader of the book: it implies a fuller acquaintance with the author than could be got from his work. In vv. 13 f. the whole matter is said to be: 'Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole of man.' The last words may mean, This absorbs or should absorb man: all his powers should be directed toward this; or they may mean, This exhausts man: his powers reach no further—e.g., to understand the 'work of God' (Job 28). Verse 14, which says that God 'will bring every work into judgment,' attaches itself better to the first sense. The 'judgment' also seems a larger and more general one than that seen in God's ordinary moral rule of the world. Possibly, therefore, vv. 13 f. come from the same hand as 11.9b. If the verses be an addition, they are still comparatively early, for they are referred to in the disputes of the Jewish teachers over the canonicity of the book.

15. Canonicity. Ecclesiastes is not quoted in the NT, and even in the second century A.D. its right to a place in the collection of sacred books was a subject of controversy in the Jewish schools. The exact state of the dispute appears to be this: Practically the book had long been combined with the other 'sacred writings'; but voices which expressed doubt of the propriety of this combination continued to be heard. That this is the state of the case appears from the facts (1) that Ecclesiastes must be included in the twenty-four books of 4 Esdras, and in the twenty-two of Josephus, toward the end of the first century A.D.; and (2) that in the time of Herod the Great and of Gamaliel it is quoted as 'scripture' (Bab. Bathra, 3a, Shabb. 30b), whilst the objections to it continued to be heard 100-120 A.D. (Yad. 35). The school of Hillel held that it 'defiled the hands' (was canonical); that of Shammai rejected it. The former opinion finally prevailed. See CANON, § 55.

Club of Philadelphia, '94), pp. 242-278, holds that the contents have been deliberately disarranged, and that many glosses have intruded into the text; he gives a translation of the final section as restored by himself.

Kö. Einkl. ('93), 432 ff. and Leimdörfer (Das heil. Schriftwerk Kohelet, '92) ably plead for a date in the reign of Alexander Jannæus.

Siegfried (in HK, '93) also thinks that Eccles. is full of contradictions, indicating the work of at least five writers. A redactor attempted, with little success, to bring order out of chaos. He gave the superscription (11) and a concluding word (128); 120-19 is due to three epilogists. The date of the original book is placed soon after 200 B.C. The glossators may have gone on till nearly 100 B.C.; allusions to the Essenes (see, e.g., 92b) also point to this period. The kernel of the work may have been known to Ben-Sira (after 170 B.C.).

Che. Jew. Rel. Life ('98), 183-208, favours Grätz's hypothesis, and while admitting that the date of Ecclesiastes needs further examination, he finds no period which so fully illustrates the book as that of Herod the Great. He admits great disarrangement and interpolations.

It may be added that the text of Eccles. is in a bad state. There are still gleanings to be had in some of the most difficult passages, which may considerably affect the criticism of the book (see Critica Biblica, and cp KOHELETH). Bickell's emendations have hardly been appreciated enough. He has further done good service, not only by his suggestive rearrangement, but also by his attention to the poetical passages, e.g., no one has made so clear to the eye the most probable meaning of 11.10a and 12.1a (cp Che. Jew. Rel. Life, 192).

Wi.'s essay on 'Date and Author of Koheleth' (AOF (2) 143-159) gives a general sanction to Siegfried's analysis, and ascribes the kernel to ALCMUS [q.v.]. The 'old and foolish king' is Antiochus Epiphanes. The statement on p. 146 that the author must have been either one of the kings of the Herodian house or else one of the heretical high priests before the Hasmonæan dynasty is a valuable recognition of the period within which, as more and more critics think, the date of the original book must be placed.—T. Ecclesiasticus (abbrev. Ecclus.) is the usual Latin and English name of one of the deutero-canonical books of the OT (see AΠΟΚΡΥΦΑ, §§ 2 8). It is not probable that the author himself gave his book a title; later it is referred to under various names. In the

1. Title. Talmud it is cited simply by the name of the author, as 'Ben-Sira' (בן סירא), or by the formula 'the sages say' (though this last may point not immediately to our book, but to material from which it drew). Jerome (Pref. in Libr. Sal.) declares that he had seen a Hebrew copy entitled 'Parabolæ' (משלים), and this designation, natural and appropriate, is employed also by Saadia.¹

In the LXX the book is called 'Wisdom of Jesus, Son of Sirach' (Σοφία Ἰησοῦ υἱοῦ Σ[ε]ιράχ [ΝΑC]; B incorrectly Σ. Σ.; but in the subscription B agrees with ΝΑ. The title of the Prologue in C is σοφία τοῦ Σιραχ).

This form (found also in the Syriac Versions and in some MSS of the Vet. Lat.) was the one generally used by the Greek writers, as is expressly stated by Rufinus (Vers. Or. Hom. in Nu. xviii. 3). The title Σοφία occurs also in other combinations: in the honorary title 'All-virtuous Wisdom' (ἡ παναρετή Σοφία) given to the book in patristic writings (Jer. Pref. in Lib. Sal.), as also to Proverbs (Clem. Rom. 1 Cor. 57; Clem. Alex. i. 1085; Eus. HE iv. 22) and to Wisd. of Sol.² (Epiph. iii. 244); and in the more general designations 'Wisdom' (Or. In Matt. 134) and 'Wisdom of Solomon' (Cypr. Test. iii. 20).

With regard to the term כּוּמָה applied in the Talmud to the work of Ben-Sira it is uncertain whether it is used as a title; but it appears to have been employed as a descriptive term. Possibly it was an old Jewish designation, which was adopted by the Greek Christians as a title; in the case of the Book of Proverbs Hege-sippus (in Eus. HE 422) refers the term to unwritten Jewish traditions.

On the Talmudic use cp Blau (in REJ 35 21), who cites Jer. Sota, 24c: 'after the death of R. Eliezer der הַרְמָמָה כּוּמָה was buried (נוניו).' It seems probable that the expression כּוּמָה includes Ben-Sira.

Whilst the Greeks thus named the work from the nature of its material, the Latins preferred a title descriptive of its relation to the Church services. The term ἐκκλησιαστικὸς is used by the Greeks of the κανὼν of the Church (Clem. Alex. Str. 6 125), and generally of what was in accord with the Church. Adopted by the Latins, the term was employed by them in a like general way (pacem ecclesiasticam, Tert. De Pudicit. 22), and came to be used especially of books which, though not canonical, were regarded as edifying and proper to be read in the churches (Ruf. Comm. in Symb., § 38, Vers. Orig.

² Probably given first to Proverbs, and then to all the supposed Solomonic wisdom-books.

in Num. 183; Ath. Ep. Fest., sub fine). So high was the esteem in which our book was held that it was termed 'Ecclesiasticus,' the 'liber ecclesiasticus' par excellence (Cypr. Test. 21 31; Aug. De Doct. Chr. 213).

The name of the author is given variously.

The Hebrew text has, in 5027, 'Shim'on b. Yeshua' b. Eleazer b. Sira' (so also Saadia, ישיהו בן עזריאל, and in 5130 the same formula, and also 'Shim'on b. Y., called b. Sira'; B^{B} 5027 Ἰησοῦς υ. σειραχ (σειραχ [A], σειραχ [B]), ελεάζαρ [in other MSS -ρος or -pov]; Slav subscription: 'Yeshua' b. Shimeon, who is called Bar Asira' [in some MSS 'Sirak'], and in the title 'Barsira'; Swal, title: 'Y. b. Shim'on Asira,' and also 'Bar Asira'; Book of the Bee (Anecd. Oxon., Sem. Series i. 279): 'Shim'on b. Sira'; Talmud, 'Ben-Sira'.

In this medley of readings two things seem clear. The author's name proper was Yeshūa' (Jesus): so he is called by the Greek translator in his prologue; and his familiar surname was Ben-Sira, as all ancient authorities attest. The significance of the other names is less clear.

The Hebrew text and Saadia must be changed so as to read 'Yeshua' b. Shim'on' (cp Zunz, GF 106), and the whole name, as given by them, may then be accepted (so Harkavy, Stud. u. Mittheil. 5200; Blau in REJ 85 20, and Kautzsch). In that case we may suppose that B^{B} and S have abridged the genealogy, and that the form in the Book of the Bee is defective. This seems to be the most natural construction of the data. It is less probable that 'Shim'on' (Simon) and 'Eleazar' are scribal additions, the former made in order to connect the author with the famous high priest of that name (601),¹ the latter in order to connect him with the high priest (the brother and successor of Simon I.) to whom, according to the 'Letter of Aristeas,' Ptolemy Philadelphus sent his request for the translation of the Torah (Fritzsché). This sort of invention of a genealogy would be very bold, and would hardly be called for by Ben-Sira's position as a sage. Nor is it likely that 'Eleazar' is another name of Sira (Krauss, in JQR, Oct. 1893). It is simpler to suppose that Simon and Eleazar (the names are common) were men otherwise unknown—father and grandfather of the author.²

We may thus assume that the name of the author in the Greek Version, Yēshūa' Ben-Sira, rests on a good tradition. The origin and signification of the 'Ben-Sira' are not clear; and the most probable view is that it is a family name, though we know nothing of how it arose.

Blau (in REJ 85 20) refers to the family names Bēnē Hezīr (Chwolson, Corp. Inscr. Heb. 65) and Bēnē Hashmōnāi. Of 'Sira' nothing is known; and the word (apparently Aram.) may mean 'coat of mail' or 'thorn'; it does not occur elsewhere in this form as a proper name. The 'Asira' of Pesh. seems to be a scribal error (cp the 'Barsira' of the title in Slav). Krauss, however (in JQR, Oct. 1893), holds 'Sira' to be an abbreviation of an original 'Asira' = Heb. אסיר, 'bound,' which occurs in lists of priests (Ex. 624, 1 Ch. 317). This is possible (Krauss cites examples of similar abridgments); but the testimony of the primary Vss. is against it; and the Ar. Vs. (as Edersheim points out), which commonly follows Syr., has 'Jesū' b. Sirach.' The Gk. form, with final χ (or κ), is best explained as intended to show that the foreign word is indeclinable (see Dalm. Gram. 161, n. 6); cp ἀκεδαιμαχ = ἄσκη λρη (ACELDAMA, § 1).

The genealogies in 5027 5130 have only the authority of tradition—they are not from the hand of the author. He is described in 5027 in the Greek and Latin Vss. as a 'Jerusalemite,' a statement in itself not improbable—it is in keeping with the detailed description of the high-priestly ritual in 50; but since it is not found in the H. and S. it cannot be regarded as certain. One Gk. MS calls him a 'priest'; but this is merely a scribal error.

Instead of ἱεροσολυμειτης κ* has ἱερεὺς ο σολ. This error seems to have given rise to further unwarranted statements (see below). Cp the argument of Krauss in JQR, Oct. 1893.

As to Ben-Sira's life we have only the general conclusions which may be drawn from the nature of his thought and from a few references which he makes to his experiences. He seems to have been a Palestinian sage, a philosophical observer of life, an ardent Israelite and devoted lover of the Torah, but probably neither a priest³

² On the Eleazar b. Irai (Iri) from whom Saadia (ישיהו בן עזריאל, Hark. 178) quotes a saying which is attributed in the Talmud to Ben-Sira and is found in our Greek (321 f.), see Bacher, Agad. d. pal. Amor. 211 n. 5, C. and N., Eccles. 11, and Blau, in REJ 85 24. It seems likely that 'Irai' is a corruption of 'Sira' (see the full name in the Hebrew); the work cited by Saadia was possibly a different recension of Ben-Sira (Blau). But this Eleazar cannot be the Talmudic doctor Eleazar b. Pedat, who frequently cites Ben-Sira (Harkavy, Bacher).

³ Schür. (Hist. 5 25), referring to the erroneous statement of (Zunz, Nöldeke) nor a sōfēr (Fritzsché) (see SCRIBE), unless that term be understood in a very wide sense (see § 21). He had too wide a circle of interests to be easily identified with either of those classes, though he was in close relation with them both; and he may perhaps be best described as one who sympathised with that mode of thought which after his time developed into Sadduceism. He early devoted himself to the pursuit of wisdom, travelled much, was often exposed to danger, and sometimes near to death (341 f. 51), and his book was probably composed in his riper years.

Until quite recently the work was known to modern scholars only in scanty citations and in translations (Gk.,

3. Original language.

Lat., Syr., and versions derived from them). According to the Greek translator's preface, it was originally written in 'Hebrew,' a term which might mean either Hebrew proper or Aramaic. On this point the citations of Rabbinical writers (Pirke Aboth, Pirke of R. Nathan, etc.)—sometimes without acknowledgment, sometimes under the name of Ben-Sira, sometimes in Hebrew, sometimes in Aramaic or debased form—were not decisive, since it was not certain that they came from a Hebrew original; and even the quotations of Saadia (10th cent.), which are in classical Hebrew, were similarly open to suspicion. After this the traces of a Hebrew text of Ecclesiasticus become indistinct, and knowledge of such a book did not reach the Christian world (see Cowley and Neubauer's Ecclesiasticus). Still, that its language was Hebrew, not Aramaic, had been inferred by critics from certain obvious errors in the Greek Version—for example, 24 27, 'light' for 'Nile' (7א); 25 15, 'head' for 'poison' (7ש); 46 18, 'Tyrians' for 'enemies' (7צר); etc. It was thought probable, also, that, since the Palestinian vernacular of the time was Aramaic, and Hebrew was a learned language, the author's vocabulary, whilst based on the Hebrew Sacred Writings (with which he was familiar), would contain late-Hebrew and Aramaic words and expressions.

Under these circumstances it was natural that the discovery of a Hebrew text of part of the book should awaken keen interest. One leaf

4. Hebrew MSS.

(containing 39 15-40 7, with a hint of v. 8) was brought from the East to Cambridge by Mrs. Lewis,¹ and in a box of fragments acquired for the Bodleian Library (through Sayce) Cowley and Neubauer found nine leaves, apparently of the same MS (40 9-49 11); eleven² leaves (36 6-7 29a 11 34 6 12 2-16 26 of a second MS [A], 30 11-31 11 32 1bc-33 3 35 9-20 36 1-21 37 27-31 38 1-27 49 12-51 30 of the first MS [B]) were discovered by Schechter in the fragments brought by him from the Cairo genizah; and in matter recently acquired by the British Museum other fragments (of MS B) were found (31 12-31 36 22-37 26); these all together give the greater part of chaps. 3-7 12-16 30-32 35-51,—about one-half of the book.³

The texts discovered down to the end of 1899⁴ appear to belong to at least two different MSS, A and B.

Syncellus (Chron. ed. Dindorf, 1, 525) that Ben-Sira was high priest, remarks that it must have arisen from the fact that in the Chronicle of Eus. (ad Ol. 137 f.), which Syncellus used, Ben-Sira is mentioned (though only as the author of Sapientia) just after the high priest Simon II. Other untenable opinions are that he is the unworthy Jason (= Jesus, high priest 175-172 B.C.), or that he was a physician (inferred by Grotius from 38 1-15). See Wette, Spec. Einl. in d. deuterothokan. Büch., Edersheim.

² On the two leaves discovered later, see below, n. 4a.

b. About the same time I. Lévi discovered fragments of two MSS: (i.) apparently a third leaf of the MS just spoken of, Schechter's C (Lévi calls it D), containing 6 18-7 25 in a recension

The one, A (chaps. 3-16), is written without metrical division of lines, its marginal notes, corrections of obvious scribal errors, are few (only four, besides the insertion of an omitted verse), and its abbreviation of the divine name is triangular (יְיָ); the other, B (chaps. 30-51), is written stichometrically (except 46 17-20), part of it (to 45 8) has numerous glosses (among them four in Persian), and its abbreviation of the divine name is horizontal (יהוה). In A there is predominant agreement with the Syriac; in B (except in chaps. 50 f.) the agreements with the Greek against the Syriac are more numerous; in chap. 51, after v. 12 is inserted a hymn which is not found in the Vss.¹

The MSS (assigned by Cowley and Neubauer, and by Schechter, provisionally, to the 11th cent.), with the exception of a few passages, are very carelessly written, abounding in errors, not all of which are corrected.

The scribes appear to have been not very well acquainted with Hebrew; they sometimes make several futile attempts at the correction of particular words or expressions. In the glossed portion the annotator seems to have been a man whose vernacular was Persian; at 35 20 he notes in Persian the omission of a verse; at 40 22, where the margin gives a saying ascribed in the B. Talmud (Sanh. 100b) to Ben-Sira, he remarks that this was probably not in the original copy [of Ben-Sira]; and at the point where the glosses cease (45 8) he explains that this MS reached thus far. This last remark appears to mean that the MS which he was copying ended here; and in that case it is probable that the remainder (through chap. 51) belongs to another MS. With the supposition that the copyist or annotator lived where Arabic was spoken accords the fact that several Arabisms occur in the MS: זָהָל in the sense of 'create,' 31 13 (doublet), 31 33 (doublet), 38 1 39 25 40 1; perhaps אָרַח as 'honour,' 38 1; in 43 8d מַעֲרִי = מַעֲרִי 'presenting one's self,' is an explanation or correction of the word in the text, מַרְצָה; Hi. of אָרַח as 'shine,' 43 9 (marg.); perhaps in 42 11e a scribe understood מַרְצָה as Arabic 'lattice'. The MS has evidently not only suffered from the ordinary carelessness of copyists, but also passed through the hands of an ignorant Arabic-speaking man who freely inserted terms of his Arabic vocabulary.

If we omit Arabisms and other scribal faults, the diction of the text is that of a man who, while his vernacular is that of an incipient late-Hebrew, similar to that of Kōhéleth (Eccles.), is familiar with the greater part of the Hebrew OT, and freely quotes or imitates its language.² According to Bacher (JQR, 1897) and Schechter (op. cit. 28) the text exhibits post-Talmudical mosaic (paitanic) features, that is to say, a number of ready-made expressions and phrases borrowed from the OT. This, however, seems to be too strong a statement—the language of Ben-Sira rarely produces the impression of being artificial or lacking in spontaneity. Nor can it be said to contain midrashic elements (so Schechter, op. cit., 29 ff.), if by 'midrash' is meant the style of the Talmud.

As examples of mosaic work Bacher cites 45 11 (cp Is. 54 12) 46 9 (cp Dt. 23 29) 39 27 (cp Job 9 5) 47 20 (cp Gen. 49 4) 44 21 (cp Ps. 72 8) 48 2 (cp Lev. 26 26), etc.; Schechter, 4 28 (cp Ex. 14 14) 14 23 (cp Judg. 5 28) 35 15 (cp Lam. 1 2) 49 16 (cp Is. 41 13), etc. These are cases of adoption and adaptation; but they hardly deserve to be called mosaic work.

Schechter's instances of midrash are not convincing. The confession of intellectual or religious limitations in 3 18-24 is not necessarily an adaptation of Ps. 131 1 (in which the reference is political)—it may be based on Job 42 3; puns (6 17b a, 22 1) are common in OT: 15 9 (cp Ps. 38 1) and 47 22c (cp Ps. 145 20) are 'commonplace' inferences; in 16 7 the allusion (Gen. 6 1-4) is not to the 'sons of the Elohim' but to the 'Nephilim' (cp Ezek. 32 27); the lesson derived in 38 5 from Ex. 15 24 is very simple—there are many such interpretations in Wisd. of Sol., and so different from that in Camb. MS A: the text is abridged by the omission of 6 20-27 29-34 36 f. 7 35 6c-16 17-19 22; (ii.) a leaf of, apparently, a fourth MS (C Lévi), containing 36 24-38 1; it is thus parallel to most of the second Brit. Mus. fragment (of MS B) and the upper part of the following Camb. leaf (of B). It gives in its text some of the glosses on the margin of the Camb. B and has one verse (37 3) punctuated and accented.

Both Lévi's fragments are published (with facsimile of the new MS (ii.)) in REJ 40 1-30 [antedated Jan.-Mar. 1900].

c. Lastly, E. N. Adler discovered the two leaves of MS A missing between A₂ and A₃—viz., 7 29-12 1 (8 2 showing K₂ and K₃ and several ru, being supplied with vowels and accents): published (with facsimile) in JQR 12 466-480 (Ap. 1900).]

of the legend possibly alluded to in the obscure statement in 44 16; the borrowing, in 45 15c, of the expressions of Ps. 89 30 is not remarkable; that Samuel was a Nazirite (46 13c) is a natural inference from 1 S. 1 11—there is no need of the formal Rabbinical rule נזיר שוקל—and the simile in 47 2 (cp Ps. 89 20 Lev. 4 8) is equally natural for a man interested in the temple-ritual; text and translation of 47 10c are doubtful (the couplet is lacking in S.), and the comparison with the Talmudic legend (of David awaking at midnight, Ber. 3 b) is precarious; 49 1 may be based on Cant. 1 3 (so Schechter), or, what is equally probable, it may come from the same literary tendency that produced the simile in Canticles. The passages above cited may be taken to show the beginning of the mode of thought that later produced the Talmudic midrash. In this sense only can we adopt Schechter's conclusion: 'if he thought like a Rabbi he wrote like a Paitan.'¹

Over and above these characteristics of the Hebrew MSS the question has been raised whether the text is substantially the original Hebrew or only a translation, and both views are strenuously maintained by competent critics. Those who regard it as a translation refer it either (i.) to a Persian or (ii.) to a Syriac source.

5. Relation to Original.

i. The opinion that it is the rendering of a Persian version (which itself is held to have been derived from the Syriac and the Greek) is based partly on the presence of Persian glosses, partly on the supposition that certain doubtful or incorrect expressions result from the misunderstanding of Persian words; the hypothesis is that the Syriac version used was revised from the Greek, and this revised text was rendered from Persian into Hebrew by an unintelligent Persian Jew who knew neither Syriac nor Greek. This theory is incompatible with the known facts: the agreements (often literal) and the disagreements of the Hebrew with the primary Versions make it practically inconceivable that it could have arisen in the way described. The alleged explanations of obscure Hebrew expressions as misunderstandings of Persian terms must be regarded as accidental coincidences, or, possibly, as in some cases due to a Persian-speaking scribe. So far as the theory supposes a Syriac-Greek basis for the Persian version it falls in with the other view that the Hebrew is a translation of the Syriac, on which see below.

The argument for a Persian origin of the Hebrew is made by D. S. Margoliouth in his essay The origin of the 'original Hebrew' of Ecclesiasticus (1899). His points are not convincing. The Persian glosses merely show the hand of a Persian copyist or annotator, who was a critic, as appears from his remark on the addition at 40 22 (see above, § 4). The absurd or impossible Hebrew words cited by Margoliouth are scribal errors, and may be got rid of by emendation (e.g. 40 26c 16 43 6 17c 22 42 14 41 2 47 3 46 11); cp Smend and Kautzsch. Prof. Margoliouth does not distinguish between author and copyist; the latter may have used Arabic words (43 9 8d 4). The most striking case of apparent rendering from Persian is in 43 13, where G has 'snow' (Pers. برف) and H² 'lightning' (Pers. زرق)—obviously, says Margoliouth, H misunderstood the Persian; but the force of this argument is practically destroyed by Margoliouth's remark that Ⲙ is corrupt and should read 'storm,' which may represent an original Hebrew בָּרָק. Other such cases cited are forced (43 26 17c 22). Margoliouth adds (Exp. T., Nov. 1899) that the Cairene text cannot be genuine, since it was known to no mediæval author but Saadia;³ in reply König, Schechter, and Abrahams point out (Exp. T., Dec. 1899) that such ignorance of a book is no proof that it did not exist (e.g., Rashi seems not to have known the Jer. Talmud), and that Ben-Sira was probably used by the Synagogal hymnologists (paitanim).

ii. The apparent dependence of the Hebrew on the Syriac presents a more serious problem. There are certain cases in which the reading of H seems inexplicable except as a misunderstanding of S. The cases are few in chaps. 1-16 (which are written as prose), more numerous in 30-51 (written stichometrically). On the other hand H sometimes agrees with G against S, sometimes differs from both, sometimes appears to account for one or both. Further, in a considerable number of cases certain Greek MSS (especially ⲛ^{ca}, and No. 248 of Holmes and Parsons) agree with H (and often with S and L) against the Vatican Greek text. Add to this that not a few citations in the Talmud and in Saadia agree with H (sometimes against Θ and S), and it becomes probable that H represents a genuine Hebrew text of Ben-Sira, which, however, has been altered in some places so as to agree with the Syriac, and bristles, besides, with errors of copyists. The result is that many passages present perplexing problems, and the details of the history of the text have yet to be made out.

³ Even this he now questions (JQR 12 502-53 [Ap. 1900], 'The Sepher ha-Gality'). Cp Nöldeke in ZATW 20 81-94.

• The following are examples of passages in which H seems to follow S:—

31₁₃ עונו = 'pardon,' after S שבק (unless 'ע' be late Heb.); 31₁₅, H = Θ nearly (for אמת read עשתי) and doublet of 15a = S—to this last is attached the line = Θ S 16a with marginal variant nearly = S 16b; of 5 16 there is a doublet very corrupt. Margoliouth (Origin, etc., 15f.) cites 42 11c, where H אשנך 'lattice' may be a misunderstanding of S שנק (in Arab. = 'lattice'), and 43 2, H נח as misunderstanding of S כנח (but H may be merely a scribal error). Lévi (REJ, July 1899) regards the acrostic in chap. 51 as translated from S: v. 28 the unintelligible ארבים is a misunderstanding of S בני (v. 27), and is transposed so as to obscure the initial ψ v. 28, and v. 14 = S which is composed of lines belonging to two different couplets; there are doublets in which one verse = G, the other S (30 17 20, etc.); and in 30 20 H נאמן = 'faithful' (a sense here inapposite) is a reproduction of S מתימא = 'eunuch' (which the connection requires). Bickell (in HZ 11, 13 251-256 [1899]) takes the same view of the acrostic as Lévi, and further instances 12 11, where H נאך 'jealousy,' he holds, is a misunderstanding of S נאח 'has made black' (from κάλυψος).

These examples (to which others might be added) appear to show, not that H is a translation of S, but that it has passed through the hands of a man or of men (of some of whom Arabic was the vernacular) familiar with S, and in places has been conformed thereto in text or margin.

Where the three (HGS) agree, no conclusion as to priority can be drawn. Where only two agree, the third may be preferable, as in 6 22 where S 'fools' suits the connection better than HG 'many.' The numerous cases, however, in which H agrees, wholly or in part, with G against S indicate a Hebrew text independent of S: see, for example, 5 56a 74 12 10 18 14 10 17 16 2f. 17 16 6 32 3 15 39 16. It is possible in such cases to suppose a correction of H after G; but the hypothesis of emendations derived from both S and G is a complicated one. Moreover, in some passages H seems to be better than G and S: cp 46 10c 14 26f. 15 1 4 19 16 14.

On the inferences to be drawn from the still (March, 1900) unpublished fragments (see above col. 1166, n. 4), see SIRACH.

Of the ancient Versions the Greek and the Syriac are renderings of Hebrew texts, the Latin is a translation from the Greek.

6. Versions. Critical editions of the Greek and Syriac texts are still desiderata, though valuable remarks are made by Fritzsche, Edersheim, Lévi, Bacher, and others.

The Hebrew, soon after its composition, was translated into Greek by the author's grandson (see his prologue), who had gone to live in Egypt, and desired to make the work accessible to his Greek-speaking fellow-citizens. He was clearly a man of piety and good general culture, with a fair command of Hebrew and Greek—a consistent Jew, yet probably not unaffected by Greek influences. His translation is not seldom obscure from its literalness and compression; in the prologue his style is freer and more ambitious. His name and history are unknown.

By Epiphanius (l.c.) he is called 'Jesus,' and in a second prologue or preface, found in the Synop. Script. Sanct. of Pseudo-Athanasius (and in Cod. 248 and Comp. Polygl.), 'Jesus son of Sirach.' Neither Epiphanius nor the confessedly late second prologue (see Fritzsche's Comm.) can be considered authoritative on this point. The statement may be true, but is more probably a guess, or based on a misunderstanding of Ecclus. 50 27.

The Greek represents a faithful translation of the original; but its text is not in good condition, and in many cases it is hardly possible to do more than give a conjectural emendation. A similar remark applies to the Syriac, which likewise is based on the Hebrew, but may in some places have been influenced by the Greek.¹

¹ The book has been translated into Heb. by J. L. Ben-Zeeb (Breslau, 1798; Vienna, 1828) [by Joshua b. Sam. Hesel from German (Warsaw, 1842)], and by S. J. Fraenkel (Leipsic, '30); chap. 24 by Bishop Lowth (reproduced in Fritzsche's Comm.) and by Wessely; chap. 51 by Bi., and some verses by D. S. Margoliouth (Place of Ecclus. in Sem. Lit., Oxf., '90).

For an account of the MSS of G see Fritzsche, Edersheim, Hatch, Schlatter, Nestle (in *PRE*³), s.v. Bibelübersetzungen, and Kautzsch (below, § 26). All appear to go back to one archetypal text, for the displacement of chapters (see below) is found in all except No. 248, and this has probably been corrected. (a) The great uncials, B, \aleph , C, and partly A, though comparatively free from glosses, give an inferior text; (b) the better form is preserved in V (Cod. Venetus = No. 23 of Holmes and Parsons), in \aleph^{ca} , in part of A, and in certain cursives, of which the most remarkable are Nos. 248 (followed in Compl., Poly. and Eng. AV) and 253 (which agrees strikingly with SH), though these have many glosses. The history of these two subdivisions is obscure; the first (a) has been called Palestinian, the second (b) Alexandrian; but this is not certain.¹ With the second agree largely L and S. These Vss. then appear to represent a text earlier than that of the Greek uncials; and our Hebrew fragments, which so often accord with S, may have a history like that of the Greek cursives—they may represent an early text which has been greatly corrupted by glosses, though they have suffered more than the Greek from scribal miswriting. The Gk. glosses resemble those of Θ in Proverbs; they are expansions of the thought, or Hellenizing interpretations, or additions from current collections of gnomic sayings.

The Peshiṭta Syriac is now considered by scholars, with scarcely an exception, to be a translation from the Hebrew; see especially Edersheim. It is a generally faithful and intelligent rendering, not without misconceptions, expansions, condensations, and glosses, but on the whole simple and intelligible. In some cases (as in 43 2f.) it agrees curiously with the Greek; but it is a question whether in such cases S follows G or the two follow the same Hebrew.

The Vss. derived from Θ are valuable primarily for the establishment of the Gk. text, sometimes also for the Heb. For particular discussions (Old Lat., Copt., Eth., Hexapl. Syr., Arm.), and for Pesh. Syr. see Edersheim, Nestle, and Kautzsch.

In the body of the work there is only one mark of date: the list of great men (44-50) closes with the name

7. Date: Simon. of the high priest Simon, son of Onias, who, because he stands last and is described at great length and with great enthusiasm, may be supposed to have lived somewhere near the author's time. There were two high priests of this name: Simon I., son of Onias I. (circa B.C. 310-290), and Simon II., son of Onias II. (circa 218-198): lack of material makes it hard to determine from the name which of the two is here meant.

(a) Of the first, Josephus relates (Ant. xii. 2 5) that, on account of his piety and kindness, he was surnamed 'the Just'; the second (Ant. xii. 4 10f.) intervened in the quarrel of the sons of Tobias and the banished Hircanus, though it does not follow that he was friendly to the worse side of the party.²

(b) Another datum is found in the Mishna-tract Aboth, 1 2, in which it is said that Simon the Just was one of the last members (אחרונים)³ of the Great Synagogue; the Talmud, further, surrounds this Simon with a halo of legend. Though the 'Great Synagogue' is largely or wholly legendary (cp CANON, § 18), the high priest, Simon the Just, is doubtless a historical and important personage; but is he to be identified with Simon I. or with Simon II.? Josephus favours the former possibility; but the authority of Josephus on such a point is by no means unimpeachable. In the Talmudic tradition Simon seems to represent a turning-point in the national fortunes: after him, it is said, the signs of divine favour in the temple service began to fail; but this condition of things may be referred, not without probability, either to Simon I. (Edersheim) or to Simon II. (Derenbourg). In the list of bearers of the tradition in Aboth Simon is followed by Antigonus of Soko, and he by the two named Jose, who belonged in the second cent. B.C.; this would point clearly to Simon II. as 'the Just,' if the chronology of the tract could be relied on; this, however, is not the case—the Jewish chronology of the period is of the vaguest sort.⁴

(c) Further, in Ecclus. Simon is lauded for having repaired the temple and fortified it and the city; Derenbourg, referring to the letter of Antiochus the Great (Jos. Ant. xiii. 18 3) concerning the finishing of the temple, thinks that this identifies Ben-Sira's Simon with Simon II.; Edersheim answers that the city needed fortifying in the time of Simon I., but not under Simon II.; and Bois insists that, though the temple may have been finished under Simon II., it may none the less have been repaired under Simon I. Compare Halévy (Rev. Sem. July, '99) and Kautzsch.

(d) Halévy (l.c.) argues for Simon I. on the ground that a considerable time between author and translator is required in

order to account for the errors in the Greek text and for the fact that the translator had lost the tradition of the meaning of the Hebrew. This ground is not decisive. Whether in the translator's time the exegetical tradition had been lost cannot be determined till we have a correct Hebrew text; and the scribal errors of Θ are due to copyists after the translator's time. Further, on Halévy's own ground, an interval of fifty or sixty years would account for much.

(e) Finally, the connection of Ben-Sira's discourse may seem to point to the earlier high priest, for Simon (50) really follows on Nehemiah (49 13), the intervening verses interrupting the chronological order,¹ and we should then naturally think of Simon I.; but here, again, the Jewish conception of chronology makes the conclusion uncertain: the author may easily have passed on a century later.

Of these data the most that can be said is that they slightly favour the second Simon as the hero of Ben-Sira's chap. 50.

A more definite sign of date is found in the preface of the Greek translator, who says that he came to Egypt

8. Euergetes. ἐν τῷ ἐβήτητῳ βασιλείῳ. This, it is true, may mean either the thirty-eighth year of the life of the writer or the thirty-eighth regnal year of Euergetes; but there seems to be no reason why the translator should here give his own age, whilst the mention of the king's year (the common OT chronological datum) is natural.²

If this interpretation be adopted, the date of the translation is approximately given. Of the two Ptolemies called Euergetes, the first reigned only twenty-five years (247-222) and is thus excluded; the second, surnamed Ptolemy, reigned fifty-four years in all, partly as co-regent (170-145) and partly as sole king (145-116). It appears that in his thirty-eighth year, 132 B.C., the translator reached Egypt, and the translation was in that case made a few years later. The author's date may thence be fixed; for in the prologue the translator calls the author his πάππος, a term which is here most naturally taken in its ordinary sense of 'grandfather.'³ The composition of the book would thus fall in the first quarter of the second century—a date which agrees with that of the high priest Simon II.

This date is further favoured by indications (1) in the book itself: by the picture of national oppression given in

9. Internal evidence. 23 33 1-13 36 16-22 (EV 36 1-17) (up to the end of the third century the Jews enjoyed comparative quiet, and for the Maccabean period we should expect a more poignant tone of suffering); by the traces of Greek influence on the thought—as in the personifications of wisdom in chaps. 1 24—and by the acquaintance with Greek customs, as the having music at feasts, 35 3-6; (2) in the translation, by signs of acquaintance with the LXX version of the Torah, as in 17 17 (after the Greek of Dt. 32 8 f.), 44 16⁴ (Θ Gen. 5 24);⁵ and (3) in the translator's preface by the reference to three divisions or canons of the Hebrew Scriptures.⁶

² The Greek construction (absence of article before $\epsilon\tau\iota$) has been objected to as hard; but Hag. 1 2 1, Zech. 17 7 1, 1 Macc. 13 42 14 27 prove that it is possible (see note by Ezra Abbot in Amer. ed. of Smith's DB). For examples of this use of $\epsilon\tau\iota$ in inscriptions see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, 255 ff. [95].

⁶ This, of course, does not imply that the canons were completed in his time. The omission of the names of Ezra, Daniel, and Mordecai in the list of great men is to be noted. Daniel, if he had been known to the author, would certainly have been mentioned just before or after Ezekiel (49 8 f.); 49 12 f., near which we should expect the other two to appear, are not found in our Hebrew fragments, but the versions show no sign of a lost passage. If the three had been inadvertently omitted, they would probably have been added, as are Enoch, Joseph, Shem, Seth, and

(4) Another note of date might be drawn from the relation of Ecclus. to the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes; but to exhibit it clearly would require a detailed examination of those two books. The three appear, by their thought (Proverbs in its latest recension), to be the product of a well-advanced stage of Græco-Jewish culture.¹

The book was never admitted into the Jewish and Christian canons (CANON, §§ 39, 47). Among other

10. Fortunes of the book. reasons it is enough to mention that, unlike some other late books (Cant., Prov., Dan., Eccles.), it was not issued under the authority of a great national name: the schools accepted from Solomon what they would not accept from Joshua ben-Sira. The work, though not canonised, was highly esteemed, and is frequently cited in Talmud and Midrasb, sometimes by name, sometimes anonymously.² There are also many coincidences of thought between Ecclus. and the Talmud, which, however, do not necessarily show that the latter borrowed directly from the former. Further, not all the citations in the Talmud are now to be found in our text and versions of Ecclus.; these latter are perhaps incomplete, or perhaps Ben-Sira became a name to which anonymous proverbs were attached. Later he is cited by Nathan (9th cent.) and Saadia (10th cent.). There is a second collection, entitled 'The Alphabet of Ben-Sira,'³ apparently compiled late in the Talmudic period, in which, along with genuine material (cited in the Talmud), there are sayings that seem not to belong to Ben-Sira. The translation of some of his proverbs into Aramaic and the spurious additions to his work show the estimation in which he was held by his co-religionists.⁴ He was not less esteemed by the early Christians. It is not clear that he is cited in the NT;⁵ but he is frequently appealed to in post-biblical Christian writers, under a variety of names, or anonymously, and with different introductory formulas. Though his book was never formally recognised as canonical (it is found in no canonical list), it is quoted as 'scripture,' 'divine scripture,' 'prophetical,' and was appealed to in support of church doctrine.

The first example of its use is found in the Ep. of Barnabas, 19; cp Ecclus. 43 1. After this it is quoted by Clem. Alex., Orig., Cyr., August., Jer., Greg. Naz., Greg. Nyss., Chrys., Cyr. Alex., Joan. Damasc., Theophyl., Leo the Great, Greg. I., Alcuin, though not by Justin, Iren., or Eus. Athan. (Ep. Fest. 39) distinguishes it from the books called 'apocryphal,' and August. (Civ. Dei 17 20) declares that only the unlearned ascribed it to Solomon. Jer. seems to have been the first to draw the line sharply between it and the canonical books. Aelfric, Archbishop of Canterbury (see Westcott, Bible in the Church, 209), speaks of the book as read in the churches. By Luther and other Protestant writers of the sixteenth cent. it was treated with great respect.⁶

The book naturally divides itself, according to the subject-matter, into sections. Chap. 1 is a general

Adam, in 49 14-16. The natural inference is that our books of Daniel, Esther, and Ezra did not exist in Ben-Sira's time. Nöldeke (ZATW, 20 88 f.) would add to these Chron.

Cp, further, Dukes, Rabbin. Blumenlese, Geiger, Aboth (in his Nachgelass. Schrift., iv.). In his Secrets Charles cites passages in that work which appear to be taken from or based on Ecclus.; cp Ecclus. 12 with Secrets, 47 5; 24 with 51 3; 7 3 32 with 42 11 51 1; 14 19 with 65 11, etc.

introduction; 33 (361-17) is a prayer for Israel; 4215-5026 is a separate discourse (praise of great men);

11. Structure. 5027-29 is a colophon (probably by an editor); and 51 is an appended prayer and exhortation. In the body of the work new starting-points are indicated at 1624 [22] 241 and 3912, and there are further paragraphal divisions marked by the address 'my son' at 213 17 41 618 23 32, etc., besides the subdivisions obvious in the subject matter (see the headings in the Greek Version). Beyond this paragraphal and sectional arrangement it seems impossible to discover any plan in the book.¹ It consists, like Proverbs, of a mass of observations on life, put together in the interests not of logical order but of edification.

A curious arrangement of material is found in most Greek MSS (in all hitherto examined 12. Dislocation. on this point except No. 248 of Holmes and Parsons); the section 3316-3611 is placed after 3024.²

The right order is given in the Pesh., the Latin, the Armenian, and the G MS No. 248 (which is followed by Complut., as this last is followed in EV). The cause of the derangement was probably the displacement of rolls of the G MS from which most existing MSS are derived,³ or possibly of the Heb. MS from which the Gk. translation was made. Similar instances of displacement are mentioned by Fritzsche (Comm. 170) and Edersheim (Comm. 154).⁴ The Pesh. was made from an independent Heb. MS, which had the right order. The Latin may have been made from a G MS earlier than that from which our present G texts are derived; it may have been corrected after the Heb.; it may come from a corrected G text like that of No. 248.

As to the author's sources nothing very precise can be said. Whilst his own experience and observation probably furnished a great part of his material, it is possible that he drew also from books or from unpublished discourses of sages. There are not a few resemblances between him and Proverbs; but the most of these are best explained as independent treatment of common material. The same thing is true of the points of contact between Ecclesiasticus and Ecclesiastes.⁵ If our author quotes those two books, he apparently treats them as wisdom-books having no more authority than he himself claims. There was, no doubt, much that might be considered common property, which different moralists would use each in his own way: the maxim, for example, that the beginning (or root, or completion, or crown) of wisdom is the fear of God must have been an axiom in the teaching of the Palestinian sages. A comparison between Eccles. 24 and Prov. 8 shows how differently the two books treat the same general conception.

The traditional account, which represents the book as composed by one man, seems on the whole to be supported by the character of the contents. There are, indeed, differences of tone, as in various paragraphs

14. Unity. women (25 and 26), and on the happiness and misery of life (3916-35 and 4011-11), and in general there is a contrast between the geniality of some passages and the cynicism of others, and between the conceptions of wisdom, on the one hand as a universal divine influence, and on the other as common-sense shrewdness. The diversities, however, do not go beyond the bounds of a single experience, and in the book as a whole there is an evident unity of tone—the attitude toward God, life, wisdom, the Torah, is the same throughout.⁶ The authenticity of chap. 51 has

⁴ Tisch. retains the Greek order; Swete gives the Latin.

been questioned; but the case has not been made out.

There seems to be nothing out of keeping with the rest of the book, and, as to the insertion of a prayer, we may compare the one (very different in tone from this) in Wisd. Sol. (9). There is, indeed, a striking resemblance between Eccles. 5113-30 and Wisd. Sol. 71-14; but if there be imitation here, it is not clear that it is on the part of the passage in Ecclesiasticus.

The psalm (an imitation of Ps. 136) which is found in the Hebrew after v. 12, and does not appear in the Vss., may be doubtful. Schechter suggests that it was omitted in the Greek because the mention of the Zadokite priestly line was considered to be inappropriate under the Maccabees. This consideration, however, would not apply at all to the Syriac Vss., and the omission of a single couplet would have sufficed in the Greek.

How far the author's work has been added to by scribes and editors is a more difficult question. It is clear that the Hebrew and the versions 15. Integrity. have suffered in the process of transmission (see above, § 4). In various passages one or another of the texts shows additions or omissions; each case must be treated by itself. In general, as between a Greek conception in one text and a Jewish in another, the preference is to be given to the latter; though it is obvious that this rule must be applied carefully, so as not to prejudice the question of a Greek influence on the author. When the final text obtainable by MS. evidence has been reached, there will still remain the question whether this gives the author's thought accurately, or has itself been coloured by editors. By some the Greek translator is supposed to have made additions to his text in the interests of Jewish Alexandrian philosophy; others see evidence of Christian interpolation. The evidence for those conclusions is not distinct.

Alexandrian passages need not be additions of the translator, and of the cases cited by Edersheim (Comm. 23), 133 f. and 2431 are not non-Jewish, whilst to call 282 ('forgive and thou shalt be forgiven') a Christian addition on internal grounds is to prejudice the question. The evidence is stronger in the case of 4327 (אין רחל, כן פאן יסורג אבֿרֿוס) and 4416 (Enoch is called אֶחָא, ἠπόδειγμα μετριοφίας [ἐπιφροσύνης]), both omitted by Pesh. The first expression is Hellenising, and may be an addition by the author, or by a Hebrew scribe, or it may have been made first in Φ , and thence transferred to H; the second, something like a parallel to which is found in Philo (De fram. et pan., Mangey, 240 f., where 'Enoch' is explained to be true manhood, based on hope in God), may be Jewish (see Siegfried, Drummond, Bois), or may be a Hellenising expression of the author, or an allegorising remark by a scribe. (The expressions 'was found perfect' and 'knowledge' appear to be scribal additions.) After the omission of all probable additions, however, there remains enough to fix the author's relation to Greek thought (see below, § 24).

The book is arranged in short discourses or paragraphs, each of which consists in general of distichs or tetrastichs; the lines are mostly ternary (with three ictus) or quaternary, though in this respect there is considerable variety. The parallelism is less antithetic and looser, and the discourse more flowing than in Proverbs. Bickell (Zt. f. kath. Theol. 1882) regards 511-20 (in the Heb.) as forming an alphabetic psalm.¹ The attempt to discover metre in the work (Bickell, Margoliouth) must be pronounced unsuccessful.²

An irregular strophic arrangement results from the author's method of dividing his material by subjects (cp Prov. 1-9 22-29).³

Ecclesiasticus belongs to the category of Wisdom-literature (Hokma), which, in contrast with the prophetic, priestly, and legal points of view (for all of which the nation Israel is the centre), gives a uni-

² On metre in OT Heb. see the works of Ley, Bickell, Briggs, Gunkel, D. H. Müller, and the art. of Grimme in ZDMG, 60 4.

³ For an attempt to make out a regular division into groups of 50 or 100 couplets see Schlatter (below, § 26 a, i.).

Ecclesiasticus does not affect the general character of the book. The material is so varied and so loosely arranged that a table of contents would take more space than can here be given. It deals with all the ordinary social and religious duties (cp Che. Job and Sol. 190-193). The style is for the most part bright and vigorous, and not without a gleam of humour. The author shows wide acquaintance with men and things, and his advice is usually full of good sense. Without claiming for himself special inspiration, he speaks as an independent teacher of religion and morals, citing no external authority for what he says, but, like the sages in Proverbs, assuming its truth and obligation, and making his appeal to reason and conscience.

In accordance with the tone of the later Judaism, Ecclesiasticus regards God as the lord of the whole world of things and men, the absolute, righteous judge, the author of all conditions and changes of life (chaps. 16-18 33*f.*).

It has not the full conception of divine fatherhood; but it gives a description of divine forbearance toward men (18 10-13) which is identical in spirit with that of Ps. 103.

Concerning itself with the visible facts of life, Ecclesiasticus (like Prov.) takes little account of subordinate supernatural beings. Angels are not

19. Angels. mentioned in the Hebrew (not in 43 26), and in the Greek only in citations from the OT. In 38 14*a* the intercession that in Job 33 26 is ascribed to a heavenly being is ascribed to a physician. In 48 21 (a statement taken from 2 K. 19 35), in which the Gk (followed by Lat.) has ἀγγελος, the Heb. has כַּוָּנָה, 'plague,' and the Syr. ܕܘܫܐܢܐ, 'a heavy blow.' In another passage (17 17), quoted freely from Dt. 32 8 f. as in 31, the term 'ruler' (ἡγούμενον) seems to be substituted for 31 'angel' (κατὰ ἀριθμὸν ἀγγέλων) —here a divine (angelic?) bead of every nation except Israel, whose guardian is Yahwē. 'Spirits,' good or evil, are nowhere mentioned.¹ Whether there is mention of Satan is doubtful. In 21 27, where 31 has 'The ungodly, when he curses τὸν σατανᾶν, curses himself,' the context (see v. 28) and Syr. favour the sense, 'adversary,' or a reading, 'neighbour,' for σατανᾶν (and for 'ungodly' we should probably read 'fool'). Further, the author, if (as Cheyne thinks) he means Satan, seems to identify him with the man's own evil impulse, a conception foreign to the whole pre-Christian time³ as well as to the NT. In general, Ecclus. may be said to anticipate Sadduceeism in holding aloof from angels and demons, whose agency in actual life it does not recognise.

The central moral-religious idea of the book is wisdom, in the conception of which Ben-Sira is substantially at one with Proverbs. He treats sometimes

20. 'Wisdom.' the human attribute, sometimes the divine. As a quality of man it is theoretical knowledge of the right and ability to embody it in life. Nothing is said of the origin of this capacity (it is treated as an ultimate fact); but it is identified with the 'fear of God' (1 14, etc.)—that is, the wise life is directed according to the divine commandments, or, as it may perhaps be put, human wisdom comes from the communion between the mind of man and the mind of God. The unity of the divine and the human attributes (implicitly contained in the book) appears to involve the conception that the divine wisdom fills and controls all things, including man's mind, and thus manifests itself in human thought.

² The πνεύματα of 39 28 (Syr. ܠܘܫܐ, Heb. almost obliterated) are 'winds' (so Fritzsche); vv. 29 f. give, not the definition of the term 'spirits,' but a parallel list of natural agencies.

As a quality of God, wisdom is almost always personified. It is called eternal (1 1), universal (246), unsearchable (16), the formative creative power in the world (243), yet created (14 249) and established in the midst of Yahwē's people in Jerusalem (240 f.), where alone there was obedience to Yahwē's law.¹ This nationalistic conception of wisdom (involved, but not explicitly stated, in Proverbs) is noteworthy, but not unexpected: the pious Jews of that time could hardly fail to find the highest expression of the divine wisdom in the guidance of Israel through the Law. Ben-Sira's treatment of divine wisdom is personification (as in Prov. and Wisd. Sol.), not hypostatization. In one passage (243, 'I covered the earth as a mist') there appears to be an approach to this position²: wisdom is identified with the creative word, as Wisd. Sol. further identifies it with the Stoic Logos. Like Wisd., Sol., and Philo, however, Ben-Sira lacked a historical figure with which to identify his philosophical conception.

Greater prominence is given to the Law of Moses in our book than in Proverbs. It is glorified in the persons of Moses and Aaron (45 1-22) and

21. The Law. Simon (50 1-21). The author was by no means indifferent to the ritual of sacrifice and song. He dwells with enthusiasm on the details of the high priest's costly dress, on the offering³ and the singers; he counsels men to come with full hands to the altar (32[35] 1-11), though he adds a warning against attempting to bribe God with unrighteous gifts (v. 12). His philosophical view of life does not prevent his taking joyous part in the outward service of God, which he possibly regarded as being a symbol as well as a prescribed duty. He shows similar friendliness toward the scribes (38 24-34 39 1-11), who, in contrast with handicraftsmen, devote themselves to the study of the law, the prophets, and paræmiac sayings (a reference to parts of our book of Proverbs?), listen to the discourses of famous men (teachers in the legal schools), travel in foreign lands to find out good and evil among men, open their mouths in prayer, and ask forgiveness for their sins. This, the earliest extant description of the life of a sōfēr, gives a picture of wide activity, and shows that the law-students of that time did not confine themselves to Palestine. With such scribes, not hagglers over words and letters, but cultivated and liberal students of the earlier literature, our author would naturally find himself in hearty sympathy. As to the term 'law,' it appears that, when used of the Israelitish code, it may stand for all the Jewish sacred books; but it is sometimes employed for law in general, as in 35[32] 24 36 [33] 1-3.

The preceding citations show Ben-Sira's warm national feeling. This is expressed most distinctly in chap. 33[36], in which he bemoans the afflicted state of Israel, and prays that, in fulfilment of his promise, God would

22. Aspirations. gather all the tribes of Jacob and make the people possess its land as in times of old (cp 44 21 47 11 48 10). He looks for no special deliverer (not even in 44-50), and hopes only, in general accordance with the earlier prophets, for national quiet and prosperity.⁴ He is so much absorbed in this desire that he does not think of the conversion of foreign nations to the worship of Yahwē. We have no right to take him as the representative of the whole nation in this regard; but we may fairly suppose that he expresses a current opinion.⁵

² Ecclus. 24 3-6 is an imitation of Prov. 8 22 f., from which L here introduces additional matter. The 'mist' may be taken from Gen. 2 6, or it may be an independent figure.

³ The sin-offering is not mentioned.

Ben-Sira's scheme of life, like that of Proverbs, or Ecclesiastes, of the Law, and of the prophets, is confined to the present world. In 17^{22 f.} he repeats the sentiment of Is. 38 18 f. He speaks neither of the resurrection of the body¹ nor of the immortality of the soul (14 16 21 10 41 4, etc.). He belonged to the conservative priestly party (though probably not himself a priest) which adopted the social but not the religious ideas of Gentile neighbours. He retained the old Hebrew conception of Shēōl (see SHEOL), whilst the progressive portion of the nation (represented later by the book of Daniel) adopted or developed the idea of resurrection.

Ben-Sira's ethical scheme is that of the greater part of the OT (if we omit, that is, such passages as Jcr. 31 33 Ez. 36 26 Ps. 51). Sin is the transgression of the divine law; righteousness is conformity thereto. The moral life is considered in its external aspect as a mass of acts. Nothing is said of the inward life, of disposition of mind, of motives, ideals, aspirations, struggles. Those were, doubtless, not absent from the author's thought; but he does not regard them as practically important. What is important is the outcome: men are known by their fruits. Sin is accepted as a fact, which began historically with the first woman (the same view is given in 1 Tim. 2 14 in contrast with that of Rom. 5); but there is no attempt to explain its psychological origin. Conscience, freedom, and responsibility are assumed (15 11-17 and pass.). On the other hand (as throughout OT and NT), the absolute control of man by God is everywhere taken for granted, and in one place (33 13) distinctly affirmed. The motive for righteous living is the well-being it secures: the good man prospers, the bad man suffers, in this life. There is no reference to inward peace, consciousness of rectitude, and communion of soul with God. Ben-Sira's point of view (sometimes called hedonistic or utilitarian) is that of Proverbs and the OT generally. It is determined partly by the old Semitic external conception of life, partly by the absence of belief in ethical immortality (cp Wisd. Sol. 2-5). The old nationalism of the prophets it rejects in favour of a pronounced individualism: it does not recognise the well-being of humanity as an aim of life. The moral code of the book is that of the OT: it inculcates honesty, truthfulness, purity, sympathy, kindness²—all the virtues of the civilised society of that time. The limitations are either those of the time (national narrowness, 24³; treatment of slaves as chattels, 33 24-31) or those of all time (selfish prudence, 12 1-5). Pride is denounced (10 7 12 f.) as in Proverbs, and humility (3 18) and forgiveness (28 2) are enjoined. Almsgiving (as in Tob. 4 9-11 Dan. 4 27 [24] Mt. 6 1) is identified with righteousness—a conception that naturally arose when the care of the persecuted poor became the most pressing moral-religious duty;⁴—but this does not exclude in Ben-Sira the higher idea of righteousness. His treatment of social relations and duties is fuller than that of Proverbs. He lived in the midst of a highly developed civilisation, and is interested in all sides of life. He gives directions for the governing of the household, the training of wife, children, and servants, dealing with debtors and creditors, deportment in society (daily intercourse, feasts), bearing towards rulers and rich men—he recognises many distinctions and classes of men—he is familiar with the temptations of city-life, and praises agriculture. He gives special warnings against sexual licentiousness, against becoming security for other men's debts, against involving one's self in other people's affairs; in general he counsels an attitude of caution toward men, on the ground of personal

23. B. Ethical and social ideas.

³ 50 25 f. (though in HCS) is probably an interpolation.

⁴ So the position assigned to almsgiving by Mohammed was suggested by the conditions of the Arabian society of his time.

comfort (32 22 f.). On the same ground, he advises the observance of the social proprieties, such as a decent show of mourning for the dead, failure in which brings one into ill repute (38 16 f.). He is friendly to physicians—seems, indeed, to defend them against doubts and objections—and approves of music and the temperate use of wine. See especially chaps. 7 13 18 31 f. 38, and Seligmann, Deane, and Cheyne. He is generally acute, sometimes a little cynical, never pessimistic.

A real, though not very well defined, Greek influence is to be recognised in the book. The author does not accept the Greek philosophy (his thought is in the main of the practical unphilosophic Jewish type); but he is affected by general Greek culture. In this respect he stands between Proverbs and Wisd. Sol., but much nearer to the former than to the latter. Palestine was at this time (c. 180 B.C.) not without a Greek atmosphere, and Ben-Sira had travelled in Greek-speaking countries (cp Che.). The traces of Greek influence are found in certain general conceptions in his book. He does not, it is true, go so far as Wisd. Sol. and Pbilō; he does not allegorise, as they do, nor make so near an approach to hypostatization. His conception of human liberty and divine predetermination and his reference to Enoch (44 16), if it be genuine, are probably Jewish. We cannot adduce particular words and phrases in proof of Greek influence, for these may be scribal additions. The expression in 43 27, for example (הַלֵּל הוֹמָה, τὸ πᾶν ἔστω αὐτοῖς), found in the Heb. and the Gk., though not in the Syriac, might be regarded as of doubtful genuineness, and in general the possibility of editorial modification must be admitted. After we allow for such a possibility, however, there remain broad touches which cannot well be regarded as spurious, and which have a Greek tone. The most marked is the identification of virtue with knowledge (a point for the full treatment of which see WISDOM LITERATURE). This conception, though not without roots in the older thought, has here been developed under the stimulus of Greek philosophy, with, however, a marked Jewish colouring. There are, according to Ben-Sira, only two classes in society, wise men and fools. These are often identified with the righteous and the wicked; but the intellectual basis of men's natures and judgments is constantly insisted on. The divine law is recognised as the rule of action; but it is not different from the wise man's thought. Hence the importance attached to instruction, the one thing necessary for men being discipline in the art of right thinking; and all God's dealings with men may be viewed as divine training in the perception of moral truth. Similarly, the stress laid on moderation in action (32 1-24 31 f.) reminds us of the μὴδὲν ἄγαν of Kōhēleth and of the Greeks. In another direction we have the conception of wisdom in chap. 24 (nearly identical with that of Prov. 8), which contains the Greek ideas of the cosmos and the logos (cp ἐκόσμησεν, 16 27 42 21; in 42 21 Heb. has חָן).

ECLIPSE. It is possible that the words of Amos (89), 'To cause the sun to go down at noon, and to darken the earth while it is yet day,'¹

1. Historical eclipses, Am. 89 refer to a total eclipse of the sun on 15th June, 763 B.C. (see AMOS, § 4, ASSYRIA, § 19). Jer. 159?

If so, the prophet, in reproducing from memory the discourses which he had delivered in N. Israel, introduced a reference to a subsequent event, which seemed like the beginning of the 'end' spoken of in 82. Amos, who is so fond of references to contemporary circumstances, may very well have referred to this particular eclipse, which is also specially recorded by the Assyrians. Possibly, too, one of the details in Jer. 159 may be suggested by the famous solar 'eclipse of Thales' in 585 B.C. (Herod. 1.54 Pliny 2.4 25). I v. 66-9 may have been written (by whom we cannot venture to say) in the year after the fall of Jerusalem.

No other prophetic passages can safely be taken to relate to any particular eclipses. The phenomenon of an eclipse was a periodically recurring excitement to the unscientific mind,

2. Figurative language. and Am. 5 18 20 Mic. 3 8 Zeph. 1 15 Ezek. 30 18 32 7 f. Is. 13 10 24 23 Joel 2 10 37 3 15 Zech. 14 6 cannot with any probability be connected with historical eclipses. The language is conventional. It presupposes the phenomena of eclipses, but is merely symbolic, and such as naturally suggested itself in descriptions of judgments. Is. 388 (in a late report of a supposed prophecy of Isaiah) has been much misunderstood by Bosanquet. To his theory that the solar eclipse of 689 B.C. is referred to there are strong chronological as well as text-critical and exegetical objections (see Che. Intr. Isa. 227, and DIAL).

Almost all modern scholars have found a reference to the phenomena of eclipses in Job 3 8 31 13. Thus Davidson paraphrases 'the blackness of the day' (Job 3 5 AV; 'all that maketh black the day,' RV) 'eclipses, supernatural obscurations, and the like,' and remarks on v. 8 and 26 13 that 'there is an allusion to the popular mythology, according to which the darkening or eclipse of the sun and moon was caused by the serpent throwing its folds around them, and swallowing them up' (Job, 19 f.; similarly 185). Unfortunately the two most significant words in vv. 5 8 appear to be corrupt,¹ and the illustrative material derived from Babylonian mythology is inconsistent with the view that the Hebrews (like the Indians) believed in a cloud-dragon which seeks to swallow up the sun and moon. What we have before us, as Gunkel was the first to show fully, is one of the current applications of the myth of Tiamat. The text of Job 3 is a matter for critical discussion. See Dillmann and Budde (on the conservative side), and see further DRAGON, § 5, BEHEMOTH, § 2 f.

Most of the NT references (Mt. 24 29 Acts 2 20 Rev. 6 12 8 12) are sufficiently explained as the conventional

3. NT references. phraseology of prophetic writers. Nor would most persons hesitate to explain the 'darkness over the whole earth'² (or 'land,' Mk. 15 33 Mt. 27 45) as an addition to plain historical facts involuntarily made by men brought up on the prophetic Scriptures, and liable, too, to the innocent superstitions of the people. When Yahwè was sore displeased with his people, the prophets constantly described universal nature as awestruck, and poets like David had a similar sense of the sympathy of nature when great men died (2 S. 1 21). It is Lk., a non-Israelite, who involuntarily rationalises the poetic tradition of a sudden darkness over the earth at the Crucifixion. In Lk. 23 45 f. we read (in RV) according to the best form of the Greek text, 'A darkness came over the whole land [or earth] until the ninth hour, the sun's light failing' (τοῦ ἡλίου ἐκλείπειντος). No doubt the evangelist believed that a solar eclipse was the cause of this naively supposed phenomenon, though, according to his own narrative, Jesus died at the Passover season when, there being a full moon, a solar eclipse was impossible. Origen indeed ('Comm. in Matth., Opera, ed. Delarue, 392 f.) rejected the reading now adopted by the Revisers on this very ground, regarding it as a falsification of the text. Lauth (TSBA, 4 245) frankly admits that no ordinary eclipse can be meant, and thinks that the 'darkness' was probably caused by the extinction of the 'star' of the Magi. T. K. C.

ED (עַד, 'witness'), the name of an altar of the eastern tribes in EV of Josh. 22 34 (not in MT or G). The text being imperfect, and the choice of a name partly open, Dillmann would supply GALEED (q. v., 2).

It is at any rate impossible to identify the 'Witness Altar' with Karn Sartabeh,—(1) because this bold bluff is on the western side of the Jordan, and (2) because it is not certain whether any part of the story of the altar belongs to either of the great narrators J and E. See GALEED, 2.

tower built for the protection of the flocks against robbers (see EDER i., and cp CATTLE, § 6), and according to Jerome (OS 101¹⁹) was about 1 R. m. from Bethlehem. The same phrase is rendered in Mic. 48 'tower of the flock,' no actually existing tower being referred to. The description is symbolical. Either Jerusalem 'is in siege, standing alone in the land, like one of those solitary towers with folds round them' (GASm.; cp Is. 18), or, on the analogy of Is. 32¹⁴, we have before us a picture of the desolation of the already captured Jerusalem, which is no longer a city but a hill on whose slopes flocks may lie down. The latter view is preferable, even if, with G. A. Smith, we assign Mic. 48 to Micah as its author (see Che. Micah⁽¹⁾ [Camb. Bib.], 1882, p. 38; cp p. 33 f.). Micah has previously said, not 'Zion shall become like a tower of the flock, like a besieged city' (cp Is. l.c.), but 'Zion shall be ploughed as a field.'

In Ⓞ there is a similar variety of rendering. In Gen. 35¹⁶ (the notice is transferred thither from v. 21; see Di.) we have (ἰπῆκεῖνα) τοῦ πύργου γὰρ ἐδερ [BDL], . . . γὰρ ἐδερ [E]; in Mic. 48 πύργος ποιμανίου [BAQ].

1. Name. from an older form ādām, may possibly be rightly treated by Baethgen² as a variation of ādām 'mankind' (originally adam); similar terms have, in fact, often been used as national names. As applied to the nation, Edom always has a collective sense, the only exception being the somewhat late passage (Ps. 137⁷) in which the Edomites are called 'sons of Edom.' The resemblance between the national name Edom and the name of the god contained in עֲדוּמָה (traditionally read OBED-EDOM [g.v.], but of uncertain pronunciation) is probably an accident. On early traces of a name equivalent to Edom, see below, § 3.

The Edomites, according to the OT, were descendants of Esau, who is represented as identical with Edom, the eponym of the nation, just as Jacob is represented as identical with Israel. The story of the rival brothers Esau and Jacob symbolises the history of the peoples of Edom and Israel respectively, in their varying relations to each other (cp ESAU, § 2). In form it is purely legendary, and Esau, with whom we are here specially concerned, has been identified by Tiele (Vergleichen. Gesch. 447) and many others with the Phœnician mythic hero Usōos (Ὀσώως; Philo Bybl., ap. Eus. Præp. Ev. i. 107). The statements of Philo must, no doubt, be received with caution. His work, as far as we know it, is by no means purely Phœnician in origin, though he claims for it the authority of the ancient writer Sanchūniathōn. It is a medley of Phœnician and Hellenic myths, combined with theoretical interpretations and arbitrary fancies of his own. Nevertheless, it appears certain that Usōos was borrowed by Philo not from the OT but from Phœnician tradition, and several parallelisms in the story of Esau and in that of Usōos seem to the present writer to point to a common origin of the two legends.¹ In this case the original form of עֲדוּמָה or Usōos will probably have been עֲדוּמָה, Ōsāu (cp ESAU, § 1, HOSAH). Another suggestion has been made by W. M. Müller. He connects Esau with the desert-goddess Asiti, a Semitic name mentioned in two Egyptian inscriptions (As. u. Eur. 316 f.). It is, at all events, probable that Esau was originally a god whom the Edomites regarded as their ancestor; Israelite patriarchs, Abraham and Jacob, also seem to have been gods at a very early period (cp ABRAHAM, § 2, JACOB).

According to an Egyptian papyrus, some of the Šasu (a term nearly equivalent to 'Bedouins') belonging to (the land of) Aduma (i.e., Edom)² received permission, in the twelfth century B.C., to pasture their cattle in a district on the Egyptian frontier (see WMM As. u. Eur. 135)—precisely what happened in the case of the Israelites according to the tradition contained in the OT. About 1200 B.C. the Šasu of Sa'aira were defeated (ib. 136). Here Sa'aira is, of course, Seir³ (Heb. Se'ir); but whether the Edomites or some older inhabitants of those mountains are meant is uncertain. In any case, it is not permissible to infer (with WMM op. cit. 137) that the Edomites took possession of the district in question only a short time before the period of the Israelite kings: the list of Edomite kings (see § 4), with the names of places contained in it, bears witness to the contrary.

It is true that, according to Gen. 146 36²⁰ Dt. 2^{12 22}, the mountains of Seir were occupied, before the time of 1 In both stories we have a strife between two brothers. Usōos, like Esau, is a hunter; his brother is σαμμηροσίμος ὁ καὶ ὑψουράμιος, where the former name is obviously עֲדוּמָה עֲדוּמָה. The myth of the stone of Jacob (Gen. 28 12 17) may perhaps here be compared. The stone lies at the foot of the heavenly ladder, and may thus represent the 'gate' or entrance of heaven.

2 Name of Edom.—The equation Edom=(the land of) Udumu or Udumi (for Assyrian references see KAT⁽²⁾ 150=COT 1 136) is undisputed. But it is unwise, wherever a name resembling Edom occurs in the Assyrian or the Egyptian inscriptions, to insist on identifying the two names. In the Amarna tablets (15th cent. B.C.) we find a city in the 'land of Gar' called Udumu (Wi. 237 [L 64] 24). It would be bold, however, to speak of this city as the 'city of Edom' (so Sayce, Pat. Pal. 153; cp Wi. below), and to proceed to a further combination of both names with Adumu, the capital of mat Arabi, conquered by Sennacherib (see DUMAḤ, 1). Yāqūt, the Arabic geographer, knew of several places called Dūma, and it is probable that a similar name had several references in antiquity. Even in the famous passage, Pap. Anast. vi. 4 14, where a high official (temp. Merneptah II.) asks permission for the entrance into Egypt of tribes of Šasu (Bedouin) from the land of Aduma (Brugsch, GÄ 202; WMM As. u. Eur. 135, there is still a doubt as to the reference of Aduma (Wi. Gf. 189). More reason is there to question the identification proposed by Chabas, Brugsch, and Maspero of the land of Adim or Atuma (so read by these scholars in the story of Senuhyt; RP⁽²⁾ 2 11 f.) with the land of Edom. As E. Meyer (GÄ 182) and other good judges (including Maspero himself) now assure us, the right reading of the name is not Adim but Kdm (see КЕДМОН), and Prof. Sayce has, therefore, in Pat. Pal. 206, silently retracted what he said in his earlier attack on criticism (Crit. Mon. 203). Winckler (l.c.) thinks it not impossible that the Edomites may have derived their name from the region of the city of Udumu (he calls it here Adumu), where they may by degrees have formed settlements. This he illustrates by the often-quoted passage in the Harris Papyrus, where Rameses III. claims to have 'destroyed the Saira among the tribes of the Šasu' (Brugsch, 203; WMM 135 f.; cp 240). Here the name Saira is evidently later than the name (Mount) Seir. Winckler does not, however, adhere to his own suggestion, and thinks the two names Adumu and Udumu are more probably unconnected. It only needs to be added here that in 1879 Mr. Baker Greene brought the passage in the Anastasi Papyrus into connection with the settlement of Hebrew tribes, such as the Josephites and, as he thinks, the Kenites, in Egypt (Hebrew Migration, 37, 117, 199, 310); and that W. M. Müller considers that the Saira of the Harris Papyrus are a race distinct from the Edomites. According to this scholar, the Saira are the same as the Horites—the aboriginal inhabitants of the land of Seir. This involves bringing down the conquest of Seir by the Edomites much later than is consistent with Dt. 3 Nu. 20.—T. K. C.]

3 According to Zimmern (ZAG 251), Seir seems to occur in the Amarna tablets in the expression mat šeri.

1 In several places and in more than one MS Ἰουδαία and Ἰουδαία are confused in Ⓞ.

the Edomites, by 'the sons of Seir the Horite' or 'the Horites.' W. M. Müller (l.c.), however, rightly observes that the word Hōri—i.e., Troglodyte (cp Job 306)—is not properly the name of a nation, and serves only to express the idea entertained by later generations concerning their predecessors. In like manner, 'the sons of Seir' can scarcely be regarded as a national name, since Seir denotes nothing more than the mountain range in question. We must, however, suppose that among the Edomites, as among the Israelites, there survived remnants of older peoples; and the lists in Gen. 36 seem clearly to indicate that, after the analogy of what happened in Israel, the 'Horites' frequently mingled with the Edomites—just as, on the other hand, we find manifold traces of a mingling of Edomites and Horites with the neighbouring Israelite tribes (see Nöld. Unters. 178 f. and We. De gent. 29, 38 f.). It should be noticed, in particular, that remnants of the small nation known as Kenaz were to be found both among the Edomites and among the Israelites (see KENAZ). Similarly, a portion of the Amalekites was merged in the Edomite people (see AMALEK, § 4).

It is shown elsewhere (see ESAU, § 2) that the Israelites had a consciousness of their lateness as a people in comparison with the Edomites. The tradition, which was sound, illustrates the statements in Gen. 36 31-39. Even if the first four of the kings there enumerated are mythical (see Nöld. Unters. 87 n.), the last four are certainly historical. There is, however, a doubt whether they are arranged in strict chronological sequence, and whether all of them ruled over the whole nation (see BELA ii., 1). The other lists in the same chapter also are of great historical value, though the details are often obscure.¹ That inconsistencies occasionally appear is quite in accordance with what we should expect in lists drawn up at various times or under the influence of conflicting notions; for it would be a great mistake to suppose that the tribes and families were separated, by absolutely rigid limits, one from another. So far as we can judge, however, there is no reason to believe that the traditions embodied in the lists above mentioned are later than the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah. Of the localities enumerated in Gen. 36, either in the form of tribal names or as possessions of the various chieftains (see especially vv. 40-43), all those which can be identified are situated in the ancient territory of Edom, not in the region occupied by the Edomites after the fall of Judah. The antiquity of the title (אֲדוֹמִי, 'allūph, EV 'DUKE' [g.v.]) given to the Edomite princes in this chapter appears to the present writer to be proved by Ex. 15 15.

In the OT the territory of Edom (properly speaking) is Mount SEIR (g.v., 1). It is, of course, to be supposed,

5. Country (Mount Seir). however, that the Edomite country spread out both to the east and to the west of the mountains, and probably varied in dimensions at different periods. The sites of a very few Edomite towns can be determined with precision; the sites of others (for example, that of Teman—i.e., 'south,' 'southern place'—which is often mentioned, and appears also as a grandson of Edom) can be determined at least approximately. In general, however, the country of Edom is still very imperfectly known.

The name Seir, applied to the mountain-range, signifies 'hairy,' a meaning to which the narratives in Gen. allude on several occasions (Gen. 25 25 27 11 23). If we may judge by analogy, 'hairy' must here be equivalent to 'wooded,' or at least 'covered with brush-wood': in Arabia there are two distinct localities where we find a mountain called by the equivalent name al-Aṣ'ar, 'the hairy,' whilst a neighbouring mountain is known as al-Akra' or al-Ajrad 'the bare' (cp the mountain called Šar'in in Assyria).

At the present day the region of Seir is, for the most part, barren; but it contains some fruitful valleys, and in the country immediately to the E. of it are to be found districts covered with luxuriant vegetation, as both ancient and modern authorities attest (see Buhl, Edomiter, 15 f. ['93]). It is, therefore, hardly necessary to take the prophetic utterance on Edom in Gen. 27 39 (see ESAU, § 2) as anything other than a blessing—which is the most obvious interpretation. Nor is the benediction inconsistent with the fact (which agrees with the conditions of life to-day in some mountainous districts of Arabia) that the Edomites were largely dependent upon the chase for their sustenance.

According to Gen. 32 4 368, Esau took up his abode on Mount Seir. Hence it is that in one passage Jacob,

6. Edom and Israel: earlier times. when on his journey from Gilead to Shechem, passes southward over the Jabbok, although in reality he had nothing to do in that region and would gladly have avoided Esau; the story, however, requires that the two brothers should meet. See JABBOK, § 2.

What were the relations between the Israelites and the Edomites at the time of the Exodus is a matter about which the narratives of the Pentateuch leave us in doubt. According to one story, the Israelites marched straight through the Edomite territory (cp Nu. 33 37 f. 42 f.); according to a more detailed account, they avoided it altogether by performing a circuit to the south (cp WANDERINGS, § 13). It must be remembered, however, (1) that it is quite uncertain whether at that time the Edomites were already in possession of the country which they afterwards occupied, and (2) that the immigration of the Israelite tribes was probably not a single united movement, but a series of separate undertakings which followed different lines of march (see ISRAEL, § 7).

One of the ancient kings of Edom is said to have defeated the Midianites on the Moabite table-land (Gen. 36 35; see MIDIAN, and cp BELA ii., 1). Whether the brief mention of Saul's victory over the Edomites in 1 S. 14 47 is historical we cannot determine: the fact that his chief herdman was DOEG the Edomite (1 S. 21 7 [8] 22 [BA, ὁ σὺνδοῖς]; cp Ps. 52 2) does not, of course, imply any dominion of Israel over Edom. David, however, subdued the Edomites after a severe contest.

A short account of this war may be obtained by combining 2 S. 8 13 f. (where the text is in part very corrupt; cp 5) with 1 Ch. 18 11-13 and Ps. 60 2 (5 omits 'Edom'), to which we should add 1 K. 11 15 f.; but much still remains obscure. A great battle was fought in the Valley of Salt, by which probably meant the northern extremity of the vast barren lowland usually called the Arābah (cp Buhl, Edomiter, 20; but for another view see SALT, VALLEY OF). Joab, David's general, is said to have extirpated all the male Edomites in the course of six months. This is unquestionably a gross exaggeration, for had such been the case the nation could never have reappeared in history. There can be little doubt, however, that David's conquest gave rise to the deadly hatred afterwards manifested between Edom and Israel or at least between Edom and Judah. See DAVID, § 8 c.

A prince of the royal house contrived to escape to Egypt (on כַּרְיָם, cp HADAD i., 2), and his son GENUBATH (g.v.) regained the sovereignty of Edom after David's death (1 K. 11 14-22, to which last verse 5^{EL} rightly appends the second half of v. 25, with the reading Edom אֲרָם or אֲרָם instead of 'Aram' [אַרָם]). The statement that Solomon included Edomite women among his wives (1 K. 11 1) does not seem irreconcilable with the foregoing account; but the extensive traffic which he carried on with Ophir from the port of Elath (at the NE. extremity of the Red Sea) certainly implies that he was master of the intervening territory. We may suppose that the kingdom of Genubath included only a part of the Edomite country, or else that the new king recognised the king of Judah as his superior. In any case, the Edomite state cannot, at this time, have been really powerful: a few generations later we find the same seaport in the hands of Jehoshaphat king of Judah, and it is expressly stated that the Edomites were then without a king (1 K. 22 47 [48] f.).

7. Time of divided monarchy.

It would, therefore, seem that the narrative of the campaign undertaken by Jehoram and Jehoshaphat against Mesha king of Moab can scarcely be correct in representing a king of Edom as taking part in the expedition (2 K. 3). This story, as a whole, doubtless rests on genuine tradition; but it contains much that is fabulous (cp JEHORAM, § 3 f.). The utmost that can be conceded is that the 'king of Edom' was a prince subject to Judah. Moreover, the statement in 1 K. 22 47 [48] must be taken in connection with another, according to which the Edomites rebelled in the time of Jehoshaphat's son Joram and set up a king of their own. The attempt to subdue them afresh proved a failure. (The details of the narrative in 2 K. 8 20-22 = 2 Ch. 21 8-10 again present difficulties of interpretation.)

The Blessing upon Esau (Gen. 27 39 f.), at least in its present form, probably dates from this period of independence—Esau will serve Jacob [cp Gen. 25 23]—but the following words, presumably added somewhat later, state that if he makes an effort he will shake off the yoke. The narratives of Genesis assign the pre-eminence to Jacob, nor do they fail to recognise the enmity between the two brothers; but, at the same time, the character of Esau is treated with respect, and much stress is laid upon the final reconciliation. All this seems to represent the feeling of those who desired to see peace permanently established between the two peoples; or, possibly, the sentiments here expressed may proceed rather from subjects of the Ephraimite kingdom, to whom the dominion of Judah over Edom appeared a matter of no great importance. On the other hand, the Judahite prophets Joel and Amos—of whom the first is now usually regarded as post-exilic, whilst the second undoubtedly belongs to the period which we are at present considering—threaten the Edomites with a severe chastisement from God on account of their crimes against Israel (Joel 3 [4] 19 Am. 1 11 f.). The view that the latter passage is not really by Amos (see AMOS, § 9) does not commend itself to the present writer; but, with regard to Am. 9 11-15, which predicts, among other things, that Judah is to dispossess 'the remnant of Edom' (ἡμεῖς ἀνθρῶπων), it is plain that there is grave cause for doubt. This was the period of the war in which the hostile Moabites burned the bones of a certain king of Edom 'to lime' (Am. 2 1). There is reason to believe that a great trade in slaves was then carried on by the Edomites: we read of whole troops of exiles being delivered over to Edom by the inhabitants of Gaza and Tyre (see We. on Am. 16 9).

Amaziah king of Judah again subdued Edom and captured the town of Sela—i.e., 'Rock' (see AMAZIAH, 1, JOKTHEEL, 2). Buhl's denial of the equivalence of Sela and Petra is hardly justified (see PETRA). Whether this conquest was maintained—and, if so, by what means—through all the disturbances which soon afterwards arose in Judah we cannot say. In the reign of Ahaz, Rezin king of Damascus restored Elath to the Edomites (2 K. 16 6, where we should read 'Edom' [אֲדוֹמִים] and 'Edomites' [אֲדוֹמִיִּים] with ἡ): hence we may conclude that till then the men of Judah had been in possession not only of the town in question but also of the country to the N. of it, or at least of some route whereby it could be safely reached, a route which perhaps lay partly outside of the Edomite territory. The statement in 2 Ch. 28 17 seems to be a modified form of the tradition relating to those events. To the same (or possibly to a much earlier) period we may assign the ancient fragment which is found in Ps. 60 8-11 [10-13] (= Ps. 108 8-11 [10-13]), embedded among quite late pieces: here occur the scornful words, 'Over Edom will I cast my shoe' (see SHOES, § 4 [2]), and 'Who will lead me to Edom?'¹ Moreover, several of the discourses uttered by the prophets against Edom appear to date from about this time, after the nation had recovered its independence—e.g., the piece which (as Ew. pointed out) is partially reproduced by the post-exilic prophet OBADIAH (q.v., ii.), as well as by his predecessor Jeremiah (ch. 49 7-22). The details of the prophecy, however, are no longer intelligible. Similar utterances are found in Is. 11 14 Jer. 9 25 25 21 49 7-22 (cp Jer. 27 3). On the other hand, the author of Deuteronomy emphatically teaches that Israel has no right to the territory of Edom, and likewise recommends a friendly treatment of the kindred nation (Dt. 2 5-8 23 7 [8] f.).

8. Later days of monarchy.

¹ In the critical analysis of Ps. 60 the present writer agrees, in the main, with Ew., who assigns vv. 1-5 to (except 'will not

In the Assyrian inscriptions Kauš-malak king of Edom appears, together with his contemporary, Ahaz king of Judah, as a tributary of Tiglath-pileser III. (745-727 B.C.); see AB ii. 21. Similarly, Malik-ram king of Edom (ib. 291) paid tribute to Sennacherib (705-681 B.C.), and Kauš-gabr king of Edom, as well as Manasseh king of Judah, paid tribute to Esarhaddon (681-668 B.C.) and to Ašur-bāni-pal (668-626 B.C.): ib. 149 and 239; cp Del. Par. 295, Schr. KAT (2) 149 f.

sent envoys to Jerusalem to consult together (Jer. 27 3). After the destruction of their royal city, many Jews sought refuge in Edom (Jer. 40 11); but the Edomites, as was natural, hailed with delight the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah (Obad. 11-14 Lam. 4 21 Ps. 137 7). They seized the opportunity to occupy part of the territory of Judah (Ezek. 36 3), though perhaps another partial cause for the migration may be suggested (see NABATEANS). At a later period we find them in possession of S. Judæa, to which the special name of Idumæa was given; this term occurs as early as 312 B.C. (Diod. Sic. xix. 98, a passage based upon the contemporaneous testimony of Hieronymus of Kardis). Hebron, the ancient capital of the tribe of Judah, within an ordinary day's march of Jerusalem, became an Edomite city (1 Macc. 5 65 Jos. BJ iv. 9 7).¹ We can scarcely doubt that from the time of the Babylonian Exile the Edomites held this territory, which, though for the most part not very fertile, was preferable to their original home.

The exilic and the post-exilic prophets and poets of the Israelites, as we might have expected, denounce the Edomites in no measured terms (see Ezek. 25 12-14 35 14 36 3 Obad. Lam. 4 21 Is. 34 63 1-6 Ps. 137 7 Mal. 1 2-5). Similar were the sentiments of Jesus Ben-Sira (who wrote about the year 190 B.C.); in 50 26 the Cairo Hebrew fragment (see ECCLESIASTICUS, § 4) has יושבי שעיר;² we must suppose the author to have made use of an antiquated phrase no longer applicable to the Edomites of his own time. The author of the book of Daniel (167 or 166 B.C.)³ appears, on the contrary, to have been less unfriendly to Edom, as well as to Moab and Ammon, following in this the example of his predecessor, the Deuteronomist (see Dan. 11 41). There is, it may be remarked, no ground for the assumption that the Edomites had, during the intervening period, retired from S. Judæa and had afterwards taken possession of it a second time (see Buhl, Edomiter, 77). The list of places in Neh. 11 25-36 is, at any rate, not contemporary with Nehemiah, and if authentic in any sense must be borrowed from a pre-exilic source.⁴

Judas the Maccabee fought against the Edomites on the territory which had formerly belonged to the tribe of Judah (1 Macc. 5:365). They are mentioned as enemies in Ps. 83:7 [6], which was composed about this time. Cp Judith 7:8 18 of the same period.

At length Judah gained the victory over Edom. John Hyrcanus first wrested ADORA (q.v.) and MARESHAH (q.v.) out of the hands of the Edomites

10. End of Edom. (Jos. Ant. xiii. 9:1, BJ i. 26). About the end of the second century B.C. he compelled the whole Edomite nation, it is said, to adopt the practice of circumcision, and the Jewish Law (Ant. xiii. 9:1 xv. 7:9). Henceforth they were included among the Jews (ib., Strabo, 760). Idumæa is several times mentioned as a district belonging to Judæa (e.g., Jos. BJ iii. 3:5).

The conquest, however, did not prove a blessing to the Jews; for, in consequence of those events, it came about that the ill-starred family of Antipas, the dynasty of the Herods, whom we should no doubt regard, in accordance with the common opinion, as of Edomite origin (see Jos. Ant. xiv. 10:3, BJ i. 6:2; cp Mishna, Sotā, vii. 8), made themselves masters of Judæa and of all Palestine, and thus were enabled to plunge the Jews into great misfortune. The Edomites also had reason to regret their union with their former rivals. Considering themselves Jews in the fullest sense, the fierce and turbulent inhabitants of Idumæa (Jos. BJ iv. 4:1 5:1) eagerly joined in the rebellion against the Romans, and played a prominent part both in the intestine struggles and in the heroic but altogether hopeless resistance to the enemy (ib. iv. 4:7 8:1 9:5 f. v. 9:2 vi. 26 8:2). Thus Edom was laid waste with fire and sword, and the nation as such ceased to be. Even the fact that the Edomites had at length become Jews was soon completely forgotten by the exponents of Jewish tradition. The frequent denunciations of Edom in the OT caused the name to be remembered only as an object of hatred, and hence the Jews came at an early date to employ it as a term indicating Rome, the most abhorred of all their enemies. And yet many of the Jews, it would seem, must have had Edomite blood in their veins; for we may reasonably assume not only that the Edomites, after they had adopted Judaism, intermarried largely with their co-religionists, but also that those Edomites who survived the final catastrophe, whether in the condition of slaves or otherwise, were regarded as Jews both by themselves and by the outer world (cp CHUZA).

With respect to the habits and intellectual culture of the Edomites we possess scarcely any information. In spite of their ferocity, to which the 11. Civilisation. OT writings as well as the accounts of the closing struggle bear testimony, the Edomites, and especially Teman, appear, strangely enough, to have enjoyed a reputation for great wisdom (Obad. 8 = Jer. 49:7). It is not without reason that in the Book of Job the sage who occupies the foremost place among Job's friends is called Eliphaz of Teman, after two of the most important clans of Edom, Eliphaz being the first-born of Esau and Teman the first-born of Eliphaz. Perhaps Job himself also is to be regarded as an Edomite, since his country, the land of Uz (q.v.; see also JOB [BOOK], § 4), is mentioned in connection with Edom (Lam. 4:21 [§ omits Uz], cp Gen. 36:28). At all events, we may conclude that at a tolerably early period some portion at least of this people acquired a certain civilisation, as was the case with the later occupants of the same district, the NABATÆANS (q.v.). In all probability this was largely due to the fact that the trade route from Yemen to Palestine and Syria passed through the country in question.

Of the ancient religion of the Edomites nothing definite is known. Whatever legends they may have

12. Religion. possessed concerning their ancestors, Abraham, Sarah, and Esau, have wholly perished. Josephus (Ant. xv. 7:9) mentions Koze as an Edomite deity; the name has been identified with that of the Arabian god Kozah sacrificed to in the neighbourhood of Mecca, after whom the rainbow was called by the Arabs 'the bow of Kozah' (cp WRS, Kin. 296). Nothing more has been ascertained respecting him. Still less do we know about the god who figures in several Edomite proper names under the Assyrian form Kauš, in Kauš-malak and Kauš-gabr, and the Greek form Kos, in Kostobaros (Jos. Ant. xv. 7:9) and some other names, which, however, are not actually stated to be Edomite; the same god appears in the Nabatæan inscriptions at al-Hegri as קס קטתן, Kosvátavos (i.e., 'Kos has given') whilst in the Sinaitic inscriptions the name is spelt קס קטערך (i.e., 'Kos has helped'). Malik, 'king,' in the proper name Malikrani (see above, § 8), is a general title of Semitic deities. The heathen feast celebrated at Mamre near Hebron, at length suppressed by Constantine (see the interesting account in Sozom. HE24), was perhaps mainly of Edomite origin. It is even possible that on this soil, hallowed by patriarchal legend, there may have survived some rites which had been practised long before in ancient Israel, rites which might well seem heathenish both to the later Jews and to the Christians.

From the statement that the practice of circumcision was imposed upon the Edomites by John Hyrcanus (Jos. Ant. xiii. 9:1) it might be concluded that there was no such custom among them previously. This, however, is extremely improbable. The OT assumes that all descendants of Abraham were circumcised, and since, in later times at least, this practice was universal among the Arabs, we can hardly believe that the whole Edomite nation had abandoned it in the course of ages. Probably Josephus was here misled by a statement that the Edomites had adopted the religious customs of the Jews, and himself added, with his usual inaccuracy, the special reference to circumcision, which was considered the most important characteristic of Judaism. Or perhaps we are to understand that the Jewish rite of circumcision shortly after birth was substituted for the rite in use among the kindred peoples, namely circumcision shortly before puberty (cp CIRCUMCISION, § 4 f.), the former alone being recognised as real circumcision by the Jews.

How thoroughly the Edomites were at length transformed into Jews is shown, for example, by the fact that among the very few names which are mentioned as having been borne by Edomites in those times, that of Jacob (the brother and rival of Esau!) occurs twice (Jos. BJ iv. 9:6 v. 6:1 vi. 26 8:3). We find, moreover, the characteristically Jewish names, Simon (ib. v. 6:1 vi. 26), John (ib. v. 6:5), and Phinehas (ib. iv. 4:2).

The language of the ancient Edomites probably resembled that of Israel at least as closely as did the language of the Moabites. It is pos-

13. Language. sible that the discovery of some inscription may throw further light on the subject; at present our information is derived solely from a few proper names of persons and places. In the later period of their history the Edomites, like the Jews, doubtless spoke the Aramaic language, which was in common use throughout all Syria. T. N.

EDOS (Ἐδος [B]), 1 Esd. 9:35 RV, AV EDES.

EDREI (עֲדְרַי), deriv. uncertain; cp Arab. midhrā', land between desert and cultivated soil; also Aram. ערר to sow, as if analogous to יורעאל; cp Bedawi name below; εδραειν [B], -m [A], εδραι or εδ. [L].

(1) A chief city of Bashan, one of the residences of Og 'who dwelt at Ashtaroth and at Edrei' (Josh. 12:4 13:12 31; cp also Dt. 1:4, 'in Ashtaroth at Edrei,' where probably 'and' has fallen out). Along with Salcah, which lay far to the E., it is given as the frontier of Og's kingdom (Dt. 3:10). According to the deuteronomist, Israel reached it on the way to Bashan, and found Og and all his people planted there to meet them (Dt. 3:1 Nu. 21:33-35 Josh. 13:12); Og was defeated and slain. The town fell to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Josh. 13:31 P), but is not mentioned again. It appears to be the 'Otarā' of the Egyptian inscriptions (WMM As. u. Eur. 159).

Edrei was the Ἔδρα of Ptolemy, the Ἀδραα or Ἀδρα of Eusebius and Jerome, and the Adraha of the Peutinger Tables. The position to which it is assigned by all these (Ptolemy puts it due E. of Gadara, Eus. 24 or 25 R. m. from Bosra, and the Tab. Peut. 16 m. from Capitolias, the modern Beit-er-Rās) closely agrees with that of the modern 'Edra'āt ('Adri'āt, Der'āt, Der'ā, Der'ā; in the Bedawi dialect Asra'āt), about 22 m. NW. from Bosra, 6 m. SE. from el-Muzeirib, and 15 NE. of Beit-er-Rās. The site is strong, on the S. of the deep gorge that forms the S. boundary of the plain of Haurān, 6 m. E. from the present Hajj road. This agrees with the data given above, that it was a frontier town, and on the way into Bashan. The gorge winds, and, with a tributary ravine, isolates the present city on all sides but the S. The citadel is completely cut off, on a hill which projects into the gorge and may have held the whole ancient town. The ruins, probably from Roman times, cover a circuit of two miles.

The most prominent are those of a large reservoir, fed by the great aqueduct (Kanāt Fir'aun, Pharaoh's aqueduct) which runs from a small lake near Yābis in Haurān viā Edrei to Gadara, a distance as the crow flies of 40 m.; but the aqueduct winds. There is a building, 44 yards by 31, with a double colonnade, evidently the Christian cathedral of Bosra, but now a mosque. Some Greek inscriptions are given by Le Bas and Waddington: the present writer found another of the year 105 A.D. (HG 606, n. 2).

The most notable remains, however, are the caves beneath the citadel. They form a subterranean city, a labyrinth of streets with shops and houses, and a market place (Wetzstein, Reisebericht, 47 f.: cp Porter, Five Years in Damascus).

Wetzstein says, 'The present city, which, judging from its walls, must have been one of great extent, lies for the most part directly over the old subterranean city, and I believe that now, in case of a devastating war, the inhabitants would retire to the latter for safety.'

The OT makes no mention of so great a marvel, which probably dates, in its present elaborate form, from Greek times; but such refuges must have been always a feature of a land so swept by Arab raids.

It is puzzling that Edrei appears neither in the E. campaign of Judas the Maccabee (1 Macc. 5); nor is it in Pliny's list of the original DECAPOLIS (g.v.). However, it was early colonised by Greeks, and (on the evidence of a coin) De Saulcy dates its independence from as far back as 83 B.C. (Numism. de la Terre Sainte, 374 f.). After Pompey it belonged to the Roman province of Syria, and after Trajan to that of Arabia. Its inhabitants worshipped Astarte and the Nabataean god Dusara. Eus. and Jer., who describe it as a notable town of Arabia (OS 1184 213 37), place it in Baravaia. Its bishop sat at the Councils of Seleucia, Constantinople (381) and Chalcedon (451). The Crusaders who besieged it (Will. Tyr. 16 20) called it Adratum. Other authorities are: Porter, Five Years in Damascus, whose theory (1), 222 f.; (2), 271 f.), that Og's city is the modern Ezra or Zorawa on the W. limit of the Lejā, is unfounded; Schumacher, Across Jordan (136 ff.); Wright, Palmyra and Zenobia, 284 ff.; Merrill, East of Jordan, 349 ff.; A. G. Wright, PEFQ, '95, p. 72 ff.; cp. ZDMG 29 431 435.

2. An unidentified site, one of the fenced cities of Naphtali (Josh. 19 37: אסרפת [B], εδραει [A], ad. [L]). Conder suggests Ya'tir (PEF Mem. 1 203 205).

Systematic education among the Jews may be traced to the influence of Hellenism. The foundation of

1. Periods. Alexandria was an event as important for education as for the development and enrichment of Jewish thought. Consequently there are, properly, two periods in the history of Jewish education in biblical times, the first lasting to the end of the Persian rule, the second beginning with the Greek and continuing into the Roman. Within the first period there are two notable breaks, the one caused by the growth of commerce and luxury among the pre-exilic Israelites, the other by the rise of Judaism as a book-religion; within the second there is but one break, marked by the reported introduction of compulsory education by Simon ben-Shetach (חשן). We have so little definite knowledge, however, about the early part of the first period that we may conveniently group the facts which we can collect under three heads, viz.: (I.) down to the time of Ezra; (II.) from Ezra to Simon ben-Shetach; and (III.) from Simon ben-Shetach to the end of the Jewish State.

On oral instruction see below, §§ 3, 12, 20.

1. Before Ezra.—In primitive times education was purely a domestic and family concern (see FAMILY, § 13).

2. Earliest practice. The home was the only school and the parents the only teachers. The parental authority and claim to reverence forms part of the earliest legislation (Ex. 20 12, cp also 21 15 17 in the 'Book of the Covenant') and is reiterated in the later literature (Prov. 19 26 20 20 and often). In the purely agricultural stage it must have been a primary object with fathers to train up their children to share the labours of husbandry, or to carry on the skill in useful arts which had become hereditary in certain families. We may be sure, however, that even such instruction was given in a religious spirit. Among the Israelites, as among other early peoples, traditional methods of work were traced to a divine origin (cp AGRICULTURE, § 14). For this idea we may compare the parable of the ploughman, Is. 28 23 ff. (which, whatever be its date, is antique in feeling¹), and the evidently primitive stories in Genesis about the rise of civilisation (see CAINITES, § 3 ff.).

The religious sense, however, was no doubt specially cultivated in the minds of the children. The boys would in due time be initiated (קרי) in religious rites (cp Ex. 13 8 Dt. 49, etc.; see CATECHISE, and cp DEDICATE), and all children would be instructed by the mother in the primary moral, as distinguished from the ritual and institutional, elements in the old religion (e.g., reverence for elders, and the like). At a later time the mother is expressly mentioned as the giver of moral instruction (see below, § 5); this is clearly a survival of a more ancient custom. The ōmēn (אמן; RV 'nursing father') or παίδευγός (tutor) was also no doubt an instructor of the children under his charge² (see NURSE).

The introduction of commerce with its attendant luxury brought about great social changes by the time of the earliest prophets whose discourses are preserved to us. According to Isaiah grave social evils had arisen (WRS Proph. (1), 204; OTJC (2), 349 f.); but we may venture to assume that the high culture of which this prophet is himself an example was not unconnected with the inrushing of new ideas and habits caused by an increased knowledge of other peoples (see WRITING). A knowledge of books, it is true, is not now, and never has been, essential to culture in the East. 'The ideal of instruction is oral teaching, and the worthiest shrine of truths that must not die is the memory and heart of a faithful disciple,' and the term Torah, which ultimately came to be applied to the Written Law, was originally applied to an oral decision (OTJC (2) 299 ff.). Cp ISRAEL, § 61; LAW AND JUSTICE, § 1; LAW LITERATURE, PRIESTS.

Not much can be said here on the specialised training

² Cp the later identification παίδευγός (פדיון) = אמן = wisdom = Torah (Buxtf., 1698), which illustrates Gal. 3 24 (see Taylor, Pirke Abot (2), 173).

of certain persons, such as craftsmen, prophets, and priests (see HANDICRAFTS, PROPHETS, PRIESTS). It is enough to remark that prophets and priests were in a very true sense 'stays' (Is. 31) of the social structure, not only on account of the awe they inspired but also because of the teaching which they gave to their disciples and hearers.

It is well known that in Mishnic Hebrew the characteristic word for both 'to learn' and 'to teach' is שָׁנָה, šānāh, 'to repeat'; whilst מִשְׁנָה, mišnāh (prop. 'repetition') is 'instruction' (see further below, § 20). It is noticeable that in Bih. Hebrew שָׁנָה does not occur in this special sense. The biblical words are לָמַד, lāmadh, 'to learn' (Pi. 'to teach'); שָׁנַן, šānān, 'to inculcate'; הִרְדָּה, hārāh (√רדה), 'to instruct' (פורה); מֹדֵרֶה, 'teacher'; מְבַיֵּן, hēbbān (מבין), 'teacher'; מְבַיֵּן, hēbbān, 'teacher'; הִשְׁכִּיל, hiskil, also meaning 'to teach.' In this connexion the following quotation from the final tablet of the Babylonian epic of Creation (Reverse l. 22 f.) is interesting:—

Let them stand forth (?)—let the elder enlighten;
Let the wise, the learned, meditate together!
Let the father rehearse (šānā, šānānā=שָׁנָה), make the son apprehend!
Open he the ears of Shepherd and Flockmaster (i.e., the king).¹

The publication of the Book of Deuteronomy (621 B.C.) had far-reaching consequences for popular education.

4. Systematic moral instruction.

The public recognition by king and people of a written code of law 'which was intended to cover the whole life of a citizen, both on its religious and secular side' (C. G. Montefiore, Hibb. Lect. 188) involved a conception of life which was akin to, and prepared the way for, the later Judaism. Under its influence, some time in the seventh century, an attempt was perhaps made to enforce upon each Israelite 'the necessity of instilling right religion and morality into his children and household' (Che. Jew. Rel. Life, 130, citing Gen. 18 17-19 which probably belongs to this period). The exhortations in D to instruct children in the sacred history and law (49 6 7 20 11 19) point in the same direction, though the date of these passages may be later than 621 B.C., and the ideal which they set forth was not fully carried out till after the time of Ezra. There were also in the pre-exilic period some anticipations of the 'wisdom' ideas, first expressed by Isaiah (31 2), which later played so important a part in the development of the educational system (see further Che. op. cit. 130 f.).

II. From Ezra to Simon ben-Shetach (75 B.C.).—The period which extends from the fall of Jerusalem to the arrival of Ezra was a period of extraordinary activity, both moral and intellectual, in the choicest part of the Jewish people.

5. Second period: Ezra to 75 B.C.

The task which now developed on the nation was the inventorying of the spiritual property of Israel' (Cornill, Proph. Isr. 125). Hence quite naturally there arose a literary class, the SCRIBES (q.v.), who were not only students but also teachers of law and sacred literature, and may perhaps be connected with the growth of an institution closely identified at a later time with the educational movement—viz., the SYNAGOGUE² (q.v.). Henceforth the Jews became emphatically 'the people of the book.' The sacred writings became the spelling book, the community a school, religion an affair of teaching and learning. Piety and education were inseparable; whoever could not read was no true Jew (Wellhausen). Surely we may say that we are now assisting at the birth of a truly popular education, rooted and grounded in morality and religion. Even if the account of Ezra's introduction of the Law in Neh. 8 is not, as it stands, historical (see EZRA I., § 8), it may serve as a record of the beginnings on Palestinian soil of the synagogue, of which Ezra is the traditional founder. (Note the description of the reading and exposition of the Torah by Ezra and the Levite teachers, especially the phrase מְבַיֵּן, 'caused [the people] to understand.')

As to what constituted the new popular education, we may safely say that it led up to an accurate knowledge of the sacred history and the Law.

It may be regarded as highly probable also that however prominent was the part taken by the father² in the early religious instruction of the child, the mother, as in the earlier period (see above, § 2), and always, exercised an important influence.

'My son' (i.e., my disciple), says a wise man, 'keep the commandment of thy father, and forsake not the instruction (תורה) of thy mother' (Prov. 6 20; other passages speaking of the torah of the mother are 18 6 23; cp 31 1-9, which seems to be a poetical embodiment of such). A NT writer refers (2 Tim. 1 5) to the religious influence exercised on Timothy by his mother and grandmother.

Throughout, it is oral instruction that is presupposed (see esp. Dt. 6 7). No doubt reading, and in a less degree writing, became increasingly important and more widely diffused as time went on (see below, § 19).

The importance of the synagogue, from the educational point of view, lies in its character as a teaching institution. Schürer remarks (GJV 2 357 f. ET 4 53 f.), that 'the main object of the sabbath day assemblages in the synagogue was not public worship in its stricter sense—i.e., not devotion—but religious instruction, and this for an Israelite was, above all, instruction in the Law.' With this agrees the evidence both of Philo and of the NT. The former calls synagogues 'houses of instruction' in which 'the native philosophy' was studied and every kind of virtue taught (Vit. Mos. 3 27); whilst in the latter a characteristic word applied to the activities centred in the synagogue is δὴδασκαλεῖν (Mt. 4 23 and often).

6. The Synagogue.

The scribes (סופרים, sōphērīm—i.e., homines literatī) were, from the Maccabean times onward, 'the real teachers of the people,' and what complete sway they bore over the people's life may be seen from the NT. We must remember, indeed, that the scribes of the Herodian age were in some respects very unlike the earlier scribes; but the point in which the scribes of all ages agreed was their character as teachers.

'Teachers' and 'scholars' are proverbially opposed in 1 Ch. 25 8 b (cp DISCIPLE, § 1). 'Teachers of the people' (שֹׁפְרֵי עַם) —i.e., probably, scribes—are mentioned in Daniel (11 33 35 12 3), and a 'company of scribes' (συναγωγῆς γραμματέων) in 1 Macc. 7 12. For the references to the scribes in Ecclus. see next section.

7. The Scribes.

Were the 'scribes,' then, the only teachers? The wise men of Proverbs, who cultivated the art of teaching with so much enthusiasm and in Prov. 5 13 are actually called 'teachers' (לְמִידָּה, lēmīdā), were hardly 'scribes.' They were earnestly religious men, who, feeling that 'wisdom' was a practical thing, devoted their energy to instilling it into the minds of the young.

8. The 'Wise.'

The disciples are to them as their own children (Prov. 1 8 2 1 3 1 4 1, and often; cp Ps. 34 11 (12)); and the teaching which they impart is called 'the words of the wise' (דְּבַרֵי חֲכָמִים), Prov. 1 6 22 17 (cp 24 23), Eccles. 9 17 12 11; cp the Mishnic דְּבַרֵי חֲכָמִים, applied to the dicta of scribes of a former age.

These sages, no less than the scribes, seem to be regarded as a special guild (Prov. 16 13 14 22 17 24 23 Eccles. 12 11), though 'we are left almost entirely in the dark as to the formation and constitution of these societies, the extent and the methods of their investigation' (Kautzsch, Outline of Hist. of Lit. of OT 151; cp also BDB Lex., s.v. חָכָם). On the other hand, the guild of the 'wise' was already organised in pre-exilic times (see Che. Job and Solomon, 123, and elsewhere);

1 Neh. 7 7. The same phrase is rendered 'teachers' in Ezra 8 16 RV.
2 According to the later enactments, as soon as a child could speak (i.e., in his third year) he was to be instructed in the Torah by his father (Sukka, 42 a). In the Talmudic period the child did not attend the elementary school before his sixth year (Kēthūbōth, 50 a; see further below, § 18).

¹ Neh. 7 7. The same phrase is rendered 'teachers' in Ezra 8 16 RV.

in the later period their attitude to the Law, though by no means unsympathetic (see Che. Jew. Rel. Life, 138 f.), was hardly that which would characterise the disciples of Ezra.¹ On the whole it is best, perhaps, to suppose that the sōphērīm and the 'wise' formed two distinct but allied classes in the Persian and the early Greek periods, but that by the time of Ben-Sira the distinction had largely disappeared (so We. JG⁽¹⁾ 154, n. 1; sage and scribe are identified in Ecclus. 38²⁴ f.; cp 6³³ f. 9¹⁴ f. 14²⁰ f.).

Though distinct, however, the earlier sōphērīm cannot have been uninfluenced by the 'wise'; they may even sometimes have adopted their literary style (see Che. OPs. 348), and in any case were saved from the barren literalism which begins to characterise the scribes of the post-Maccabean age. For the victory of the Law which crowned the Maccabean struggle foreshadowed the close of the OT literature. Contrast, from a literary point of view, the Pharisaic Psalms of Solomon (written 63 B.C.?) with the canonical Psalms.

Whatever be the true view as to the mutual relation between 'scribes' and 'wise,' the latter played a great part in educational matters during the period under review. Some of the results of their pædagogic experience are enshrined in the Book of Proverbs. These can only be summed up briefly here.

The idea of life as a discipline (musār, מוסר, thirty times in Prov.) is fundamental in the book; 'God educates men and men educate each other' (Holtzmann, quoted in Driver, Introd.⁽⁶⁾ 404). The foundation of all instruction is emphasised in the precept 'The fear of Yahwē is the beginning—or the chief part (RVmg.)—of knowledge (17)'; the instructors of the child are his parents, reverence towards whom is again enforced (18 4 1-4 6 20 13 1 30 17).

The development of the child's character is to be studied (20 11), and the educational means employed are to be adjusted accordingly.

Among these means the use of the 'rod' is constantly recommended (13 24, 'he that spareth the rod hateth his son'; cp 23 13 f. 29 15 17); but the correction is not to be too strict (19 18 RV), and it is recognised that to an intelligent child a rebuke is of more avail than 'a hundred stripes' (17 10). The sovereign remedy, however, for expelling the innate 'foolishness' of children is the 'rod' (22 15). A 'fool' who does not prove amenable to this treatment seems to have been considered hopeless by the Jewish teachers (27 22, 'even if thou pound a fool in the midst of his fellows thou wilt not remove his foolishness from him' (crit. emend.); see Che. Jew. Rel. Life, 136). Cp Fool.

The importance of a good education is repeatedly emphasised. A well-educated child is a joy to his parents (10 1 23 24; cp 17 25). In wealthier families (cp Ecclus. 51 28) the child, if he aspired to 'wisdom,' would pass from the parents to professional teachers (5 13)—viz., the sages—who would inculcate the higher teaching current in the circles of the 'wise' (for an account of this see Che. Jew. Rel. Life, 135 f.).

The other great manual of pædagogic principles is the work of Ben-Sira (200-180 B.C.), who in spite of his date and cosmopolitan training seems to

10. Ecclus. have been comparatively uninfluenced by the surrounding Hellenism (for which see below, § 11). As is the case in Proverbs (on which his book is modelled) 'the wisdom of Joshua ben-Sira' or 'Ecclesiasticus' is an ethical manual. The same points are insisted upon as in the earlier book, sometimes with added emphasis.

Thus, e.g., the 'fear of the Lord' is not only 'the beginning of wisdom' (1 14), but also wisdom's fulness (1 16) and crown (1 18). Again, the old reverence for parents is enforced with unmistakable vigour (3 2-9 7 27 f. etc.). 'Wisdom' is to be sought after diligently (6 36: 'If thou seeest a man of understanding, get thee betimes unto him, and let thy foot wear out the steps of his doors.' Cp 8 8 f. 9 15, etc., and Aboth 1 4).

Though perhaps there are more direct references to organised religion (e.g., 7 29: 'Fear the Lord with all thy soul; and reverence his priests,' cp 24 23) than in Proverbs, the religious and ethical tone of Ecclesiasticus is distinctly lower. Of this the unbending severity recommended towards sons and daughters is an instance (7 23 f. 30 1-13). Among other points that call for mention here are the interesting reference to oral instruction (4 24 b: 'instruction by the word of the tongue'), and the disparagement of manual labour, as being inconsistent with the pursuit of knowledge, which 'cometh by opportunity of leisure' (38 24; with 38 25, however, 'how shall he become wise that holdeth the plough'? contrast 7 15). Among the subjects of his discourse is the etiquette of dining (31 16-21). The important references to the scribes have already been pointed out (§ 8).

The Greek period, which commenced with Alexander the Great's conquest of the Persian empire (332 B.C.) marks the rise of wholly new educational influences. The Palestinian Jews were, however, affected by this far less than their brethren abroad, especially those who became citizens of the new Greek city of Alexandria. Still the reflex influence of the Greek-Egyptian capital (not to speak of the Greek towns that began to grow up on Palestinian soil) must, for nearly a century and a half after 332, have been considerable even in Judæa. Slowly but surely Hellenic ideas penetrated to the centre of Judaism till the crisis that precipitated the Maccabean revolt was reached. In the reaction that followed, Hellenism was so far overcome that it ceased to be dangerous to the root-ideas of Judaism (see ISRAEL, §§ 68 f.).

There is good reason to suppose that during this critical time Greek educational methods found their way to Jerusalem. This may be inferred from the fact that just before the Maccabean rising there was there a gymnasium ephebeum (1 Macc. 1 14 f. 2 Macc. 4 9 12). Doubtless, too, the education afforded to his children by the notorious Joseph, son of Tobias (Jos. Ant. xii. 46), was of the Greek type. At a later time Herod also probably attended a school of similar character (see below, § 14). A good instance of the ultimate extent and limitations of Greek influence can be seen in the author of Ecclesiasticus, who wrote when Hellenising influence was at its highest in Judæa. In essentials he is untouched by it. Still his emphasising of leisure as the condition of wisdom (38 24) is distinctly Greek, no less than his comprehensive view of a wise man's culture (39 1-5).

To the questions as to practical details that suggest themselves only hesitating answers can be given. The 12. Practical details. scribes, doubtless, gave instruction in the synagogues; the Talmud speaks of the bells which were rung at the beginning of the lessons (Löw, Die Lebensalter, 287, 421 [75], quotes Shabb. 58 b). From Prov. 1 20 f. we might infer that the city-gates or the adjacent city-squares or 'broad places' on which the streets converged, were the places where the wise men awaited their disciples. Perhaps, however, it was in private houses that instruction, both by scribe and by sage, was most often given (cp Ecclus. 6 26 quoted above, § 10, and the other references there given). Regarding the methods employed there is greater uncertainty. Oral instruction (Ecclus. 4 24 b) and, probably, frequent repetition, would be in vogue. The use of acrostic (Ps. 119, etc.) and other mnemonic devices, such as *Athbash*¹ (cp Jer. 25 26 51 1) and the 'numerical' proverbs (Prov. 30 11-31, cp Aboth 5) also may be assigned to this period.² That reading was a widespread accomplishment at the beginning of the Maccabean age (167 B.C.) appears from 1 Macc. 1 57.

hand, who educated by custom, not by theoretic instruction (ἔθεσιν ἐπαίδευσον, οὐ λόγους), and, on the other, with that of the Athenians and the rest of the Greeks, who contented themselves with theoretic instruction, and neglected practice, he says: 'But our law-giver very carefully combined the two. For he neither left the practice of morals silent, nor the teaching of law unperformed' (c. Ap. 216 f. quoted by Schürer). The knowledge and practice of the Law thus set forth was to be the common possession of the whole nation, and the life-work of every Israelite. It began in early youth in the family circle, was carried (as we shall see) a stage further in the school, and continued in the synagogue, to which was also attached (for higher studies) the scribes' college (Beth ham-midrash; see § 21).¹

We have already seen that the necessity of (orally) instructing the children in the written Law was insisted upon comparatively early (see the exhortations in D enumerated above, § 4). This, as has been pointed out, would be, as a rule, the duty of the parents. From the great importance attached to the early education of children, however, even in Proverbs (e.g. 226)—and this would naturally be enhanced with the elaboration of scribal traditions—it was inevitable that some system of popular elementary education should be organised. When, then, was this effected? According to the Jerusalem Talmud (K'ēhūbōth, 811, p. 32b) it was the work of the famous scribe Simon ben-Shetach, the brother of Queen Alexandra (reigned 78-69 B.C.).

Simon's ordinance runs thus: 'That the children shall attend the elementary school' (שִׁירֵי הַתּוֹרָה וְהַלְכוֹת לְבֵית הַסֵּפֶר). It has been pointed out (e.g., by Kennedy, as cited, § 24) that the meaning of the regulation is not free from ambiguity. It 'may also be interpreted to mean that attendance on schools already existing was henceforth to be compulsory.'

In view of the fact that Simon's enactment is the second of three (apparently closely connected) marriage regulations added by him to the statute-book (see the passage in full in Derenbourg, Hist. 108), it is natural to suppose that it refers to attendance at existing schools rather than to the institution of such schools for the first time. The context certainly suggests that a hitherto neglected or half-performed duty was to be henceforth rigidly enforced. If, as is possible, for the higher (professional) teaching of the scribes, colleges (בתי המדרש; see below, § 21) had already come into existence, it is hard to suppose that preparatory schools for these had not been organised already, especially when it is remembered that schools of the Greek type had been established in Jerusalem for a long time (see above, § 14). It is quite in accordance, also, with the forward movement of the Pharisaic party in the reign of Alexandra that measures should have been taken for extending the scope of these schools, and thus more widely diffusing Pharisaic principles among the people (cp ISRAEL, § 80ff.). May it not, too, have been designed by means of them to check and counteract the more extreme forms of the surrounding Greek education? There seems, therefore, no good reason for rejecting the tradition respecting Simon's efforts on behalf of popular education, though Schürer dismisses the famous scribe's claims with unusual curtness. 'This Simon ben Shetach,' we are told, 'is quite a meeting-point for all kinds of myths' (GVV 2353 = ET 449). The same scholar following the tradition of the Babylonian Talmud (Bābā Bathrā 21a) ascribes the complete organisation of the elementary school to Joshua ben-Gamla (Gamaliel), who was high priest about 63-65 A.D.

² Heb. בֵּית הַסֵּפֶר, bēth hassēpher = 'House of the Book.' For other names see § 17 end.

The passage runs as follows: 'Truly may it be remembered to this man's credit! Joshua ben-Gamla is his name. If he had not lived, the Law would have been forgotten in Israel. For at first, he who had a father was taught the Law by him, he who had none did not learn the Law. . . . Afterwards it was ordained, that teachers of boys should be appointed in Jerusalem. . . . But (even this did not suffice, for) he who had a father was sent to school by him, he who had none did not go there. Then it was ordained that teachers should be appointed in every province, and that boys of the age of sixteen or seventeen should be sent to them. But he whose teacher was angry with him ran away, till Joshua ben-Gamla came, and enacted that teachers should be appointed in every province and in every town (בְּכָל מְדִינָה וּבְכָל עִיר וְעִיר), and children of six or seven years old brought to them.'

As the measures of Joshua obviously presuppose that there had been boys' schools for some time (Schürer, ibid.) the two traditions are not really inconsistent. It is not unreasonable to suppose that Simon's earlier efforts, especially as regards the provincial schools, had been attended with only partial success, owing to the political and religious troubles of the time. Certainly if Josephus's statement regarding Herod's attendance at school (Ant. xv. 105) be correct—though doubtless the school in question conformed to the Greek rather than to the Jewish type—we may fairly infer that sometime before 40 B.C. schools had been instituted, at any rate in the larger towns. That they existed in the time of Jesus, though not as a general and established institution, is admitted by Schürer. It is decidedly curious that the word 'school' should not occur before the NT, and in the NT only once—viz., of the lecture room of a Greek rhetorician at Ephesus (σχολή, Acts 19).¹ The explanation, probably, is that the school (in both its elementary and its higher forms) was so intimately associated with the synagogue that in ordinary speech the two were not distinguished. The term 'synagogue' included its schools.²

Thus it is said (Jalkūt Jes., § 257) that the synagogues in Jerusalem had each a Bēth Sēpher and a Bēth 'Almūd (i.e., the lower and the upper divisions of the school).

The statement that Jerusalem was destroyed because schools and school children ceased to be there (Shabbāth, 110), is obviously only a rhetorical way of emphasising the importance attached to the school in the Talmudic period; as also the similar one: 'Jerusalem was destroyed because the instructors were not respected' (ibid.). According to the Jalkūt Jes. (l.c.) Jerusalem, about the same period, possessed 480 schools!

There is no doubt that during the period under review either the synagogue proper (which was to be found in every Jewish town and village of any importance) or a room within its precincts was used for school purposes (the references are Bērākōth, 17a, with Rashi, Ta'anith, 23b, Kiddūshin, 30a).

The teacher's house also was sometimes requisitioned (hence the name בית ספר 'teacher's house'—i.e., school; Hamburger). Special buildings also were built as children's schools, but how early is quite uncertain. According to the Targum (Jerus. i. Gen. 33 17) the patriarch Jacob erected a college (בני מדרשא) in Succoth!

The classical passage for determining the gradations of the teaching profession is found in the Mishnic treatise Sōtā 9 15 (ed. Surenh. 3 308; 15. Teachers, the passage can be seen also in Buxtorf, Lex., ed. Fischer, 378 a).

It runs as follows: 'R. Eliezer the Great says: Since the destruction of the Temple the sages (חכמים) have begun to be like the scribes (סופרים), and the scribes like the master (of the school, מוֹרֵה), and the master like the uneducated.' It has been usual to identify the hazzān (master) of the school with the hazzān (minister) of the synagogue (מִן הַקְּטָנִים = umpéris 'minister,' Lk. 4 20). Thus Buxtorf (l.c.) renders the second clause of the above 'et scribæ sicut minister synagoge.' It has been pointed out, however, by the latest writer on the subject

¹ The 'schoolmaster' (μαθητὴς, Rom. 2 20) is however mentioned, as well as the 'tutor' (παιδαγωγός), and the 'teacher' (διδάσκαλος).

² Curiously enough in the Latin documents of the Middle Ages the synagogue was also termed Scola (school); J. Jacobs, Jewish Year Book, '96, p. 101. So also J. Simon (L'éducation chez les Juifs) who, speaking of the synagogue as it existed in France in the early Middle Ages, says: 'La synagogue était une école autant qu'un lieu de culte. La prière n'avait d'efficacité que si elle était accompagnée de l'étude.'

(Kennedy) that 'הַיָּת is a word of general application, meaning "overseer," "inspector," or the like; and its exact significance has to be decided by the context.¹ The context of the above passage, as also of the other Mishna passage usually cited in this connection (Shabbāth 13), in the absence of the qualifying word הַיָּת (synagogue), requires us to render 'overseer' or 'master (of the school)'. That the two offices were not identical further appears from the fact that, whereas the hazzān of the synagogue occupied a low position in the social scale (he was a kind of sexton, and his duties included such menial offices as the whipping of criminals [Makkōth 3 12]), the hazzān of the school, being a teacher, would share the social prestige attaching to the teaching profession.

The three grades of teachers, then, are sage and scribe (who taught in the scribes' college), and the elementary school teacher officially designated hazzān (the general term is מלמד or מלמדה alone). From the manner in which the three classes are connected in the above-cited passage Kennedy infers that the hazzān, no less than the scribe and the sage, belonged to the powerful guild of the scribes, called in the NT 'doctors of the law,' νομοδιδάσκαλοι.

This would help to explain the fact that 'doctors of the law' or teachers were, according to Lk. (5 17), to be found in 'every village (κώμη) of Galilee and Judaea.' Whilst every village would, with its synagogue, possess an elementary school, it is impossible to suppose that there were colleges for higher teaching in equally large numbers.

The extraordinary honour in which the teaching profession was held in this period is shown by the respectful form of address employed by the people. The usual formula was 'Rabbi' (רבי, rabbi, never a title in NT) 'my great one' = 'my master' (see further under RABBI). Rab gradually acquired the meaning 'teacher.' It is thus used in a saying attributed to Jeshūa ben-P'riachiah (2nd cent. a.c.): 'make unto thyself a Rab' (Abōth 16). In the Mishna Rab and Talmūd are master and scholar (see e.g., the passage cited below).

In the interview with Nicodemus, Jesus himself recognises the high distinction of the teacher's office (Jn. 3 10): 'Art thou the teacher (ὁ διδάσκαλος = חכם, the highest grade) in Israel?'

In later times this was carried to an even greater extent. Thus R. Eliezer (2nd cent. A.D.) says: 'Let the honour of thy disciple (Talmid) be dear unto thee as the honour of thine associate and the honour of thine associate as the fear of thy master (Rab); and the fear of thy master as the fear of Heaven' (Abōth 4 12). The honour to be paid to a teacher even exceeded that due to parents (Hērāyōth 13 a). [See further on this subject the notes in C. Taylor, Abōth(²) 71, or Spiers, School System of the Talmud, 16 f. (98).]

17. Qualifications, etc.

The later rules regarding the personal qualifications and competency of the teacher are elaborate (see Spiers, op. cit. 13 f.).

For our purpose little can be quoted. According to a saying ascribed to Hillel, piety and learning go together; and an even temper is essential to a teacher (Abōth 2 5). So according to 1 Tim. 3 2 2 Tim. 2 24 Tit. 1 7 an ἐπίσκοπος should be διδακτικός and not ὀργίλος (Taylor op. cit. 31). The former of Hillel's maxims may be illustrated also from Abōth de Rabbi Nāthān, ii.: 'Woe to him who is occupied with the Torah and has no fear of God.' According to a dictum ascribed to R. Eliezer an unmarried man was not permitted to teach in the schools (כי לא ילמד סופרים אשה לו אשה) Mishna, Kiddūshin 4 13. A woman also was ineligible (ibid.).

According to the rule of the profession all the work of the scribes, both educational and judicial, was to be gratuitous.² 'Make not them (the words of Torah) a crown to glory in; nor an axe to live by' (Abōth 4 5b), well expresses the principle. In practice its observance was difficult—perhaps possible only in the case of judicial work (cp Mishna, Blēkhōrōth 4 6). It is impossible to suppose that the elementary school teachers in the provinces can have laboured without fee or reward.

Paul (1 Cor. 9 3-18 etc.) certainly claimed the right of maintenance from those to whom he preached, though he preferred to live by practising his trade. Similarly the teachers of the Law

² 'So the modern teachers at the great Cairo "university" [el-Azhar]. (Che. Job and Sol. 124.)

—especially, perhaps, some of the rich doctors in Jerusalem—may have sometimes taught gratuitously. This, however, can hardly have been the rule, though the rabbis, like Paul, had usually learned and practised a trade. The combination of study with a handicraft is strongly enforced (Abōth 2 2: 'Excellent is Torah study together with worldly business, for the practice of them both puts iniquity out of remembrance.' Contrast Ecclus. 38 25 f.: 'How shall he become wise that holdeth the plough,' etc.). See HANDICRAFTS.

In the Aramaic of the period מִסְתָּר (= Heb. סוֹפֵר 'scribe') probably already means 'teacher,' since בית מִסְתָּר (i.e., 'house of the teacher') is one of the early names of the elementary school. Cp also 1 Ch. 25 8 Targ. Another—apparently a general and later—name for school is מִסְכּוּלָא = σχολή. The supposed mention of 'schools' in Sōph 9 9 (Surenh. 8 291) rests upon a mistake. The passage states that since the time of Jose (? 140-130 B.C.) the מִסְכּוּלָא ceased; but מִסְכּוּלָא here can hardly mean 'schools.' See Schürer, GVV(²) 2, § 25 n. 135 [= ET 4 357 n. 135], (³) § 25, iv. n. 16.

(a) Entrance-age and previous training.—As to entrance-age the available evidence is unfortunately of too late a date to be of much value for our purpose. The passage usually cited here forms an appendix to Abōth (5 21), and belongs to the post-Talmudic period (Schürer). It runs as follows:—'At five years old, Scripture (מִקְרָא); at ten, Mishna; at thirteen, the commandments; at fifteen, Talmud; at eighteen, the bridal, etc.' The universal Talmudic rule is expressed in the advice of Rab (Abbā Arēkā, begin. 3rd cent. A.D.) to the elementary schoolmaster: 'Do not receive a boy into school before his sixth year' (Kēthābōth 50 a).

A certain amount of instruction had, however, been given in the earlier period by the father, from whom the child would learn to repeat the first verse of the Shēmā (Dt. 6 4), and other short sentences of Scripture (Bābā Bathrā 21 a, Sukkā 42 a). Though the Law was not in the strict sense binding upon children they were accustomed to its requirements from an early age.

Thus, according to the Mishna, the elders were to enjoin upon children sabbath observance (Shabbāth 16 6); one or two years before the legal age fasting preparatory to the requirements of the Day of Atonement was to be begun (Yōmā 8 4). Children were bound to the usual prayer (an earlier form of the Shēmōneh 'Esrēh), and to grace at table (בִּרְכַת הַתּוֹבִין, Bērākhoth 3 3).

The utilisation of certain rites, within the domestic circle, for educating the child's religious consciousness is already a feature of the pentateuchal precepts (Ex. 12 26 f. 138, passover; cp. Dt. 6 20, Josh. 4 6).¹ This was also extended to public worship. Boys had to be present at the tenderest age in the Temple at the chief festivals (Chag. 1 1)²; a boy 'who no longer needs his mother' must observe the feast of tabernacles (Sukkā 2 8). At the first signs of puberty (Niddā 6 11) the young Israelite was bound to the strict observance of the Law, and henceforth was (what in the later period was called) a Bar-misvah (בַּר מִסְוָה, i.e., subject to [son of] legal requirements [the commands]).

As knowledge of the Law was the chief thing, and as great importance was attached to the public reading of it in the synagogue—a privilege which was open to any competent Israelite (cp Lk. 4 16 f.)—it follows that reading was one of the principal subjects of instruction in the elementary school (cp Acts 15 21). Writing also was taught.

With this agrees the testimony of Josephus, who says: 'He (Moses) commanded to instruct children in the elements of knowledge (γράμματα = the elements of knowledge, reading and writing),³ to teach them to walk according to the laws, and to know the deeds of their forefathers' (c. Ap. 1 12; for other passages see Schürer, op. cit. 2 357 [ET 4 47 f.]).

It must be remembered, however, that writing, being a much more difficult art than reading, would be less widely diffused.

¹ The questioning by the child, only in an expanded form, is still a feature of the Passover rite. Cp The Revised Hagada, ed. A. A. Green, 27.

² It may be inferred from Lk. 2 42 that those who dwelt at a distance from Jerusalem would not take part in the pilgrimages till their twelfth year.

³ In Jn. 7 15 γράμματα means (sacred) book learning (especially as pursued by the scribes; cp γράμματεὺς) rather than the elements of learning. Cp Acts 26 24.

The 'swift writer' of the Psalmist (סופר מהיר, Ps. 45 1 [2]) no doubt belonged to a learned class. In the period of the Mishna also, the 'writers' evidently formed a special guild, something like that of the 'scrivers' of the Middle Ages (cp Shabbāth 12 where 'the writer' [קַלָּמָרִית = libellarius] 'with his reed' [קַלָּמָרִית = kálamos] is mentioned. Such a statement, therefore, as that during the Bar-Kokhba revolt the cry of the school youth in Bethar was: 'If the enemy comes against us we will go up against them with these writing stylls in order to poke out their eyes' (Giffin 60 a), must be read critically.

Probably the elements of arithmetic also were taught in the elementary school.

See Ginsburg in Kitto, Bibl. Cyc., art. 'Education,' and note that a knowledge of the arithmetical method of exegesis called gematria (גמטריא = gematria) is presupposed on the part of his readers by the writer of Rev. 13 17 f. See NUMBERS.

As the name House of the Book implies, the one text-book of the schools was the sacred writings; and this to a Jew meant—and means—above all else the Pentateuch, which has always enjoyed a primacy of honour in the Jewish canon. That the rest of the OT also was read and studied is shown (to take an instance) by the large use made of the prophetic literature and of the Psalms, for popular purposes, in the pages of the NT.

Not improbably instruction in the Law at this period (as later) commenced with Leviticus, acquaintance with which would be important to every Jew when the Temple sacrifices were actually offered. When these had ceased the reason given for beginning with Leviticus was a fanciful one ('Sacrifices are pure, and children are pure [from sins]; let the pure be occupied with that which is pure' Midrāsh Rabbā).

Great care was evidently taken that the texts used—at any rate of the Pentateuch—should be as accurate as possible (cp Mt. 5 18, Pēsāchim, 112 a; and note that the LXX conforms to the received Hebrew text in the Pentateuch more strictly than elsewhere). This care would extend, too, to the reading aloud of the Sacred Books, accuracy of pronunciation, etc., being insisted on; the books themselves were, of course, read (as in the public services) in the original 'sacred tongue' (Hebrew), though the language of everyday life in Palestine was already Aramaic, which was employed (in the synagogues) in interpreting the sections of Scripture there read (see TEXT).

Though it is evident from the statements of Josephus (Ant. xx. 11 a) that the systematic study of foreign languages formed no part of a Palestinian Jew's regular education, the fact that, during this period, the population of Palestine outside Judæa was without exception of a mixed character, consisting of Jews, Syrians, and Greeks intermingled, whilst Jerusalem itself was constantly being visited by foreign-speaking Jews and proselytes (cp Acts 25 ff.), who even had their own synagogues in the Holy City (Acts 69), makes it practically certain that Greek at least cannot have been altogether unfamiliar to the (Aramaic-speaking) Judæans (cp HELLENISM, § 3).

For the abounding indications of indirect Greek influence on Jewish life of the NT and earlier period see Schürer, 226 f. (ET 329 f.). On the question discussed above, his conclusion is, 'it is probable that a slight acquaintance with Greek was pretty widely diffused, and that the more educated classes used it without difficulty.' It should be noted that the inscription on the cross was written in Hebrew, Latin, and Greek (Jn. 19 19 f.). According to tradition (Sanh. 17 a) a knowledge of Greek was essential in order to qualify for membership of the sanhedrin. Possibly Hebrew with an admixture of Greek words (cp the language of the Mishna) was still spoken in learned circles. To illustrate the later estimation of Greek two quotations must suffice: 'What need,' says Rabbi (i.e., Judah the Holy, Compiler of the Mishna, 2nd cent. A.D.), 'has one in Palestine to learn Syriac (i.e., Aramaic, the language of the country)? One should learn either Hebrew or Greek' (Sāhā 49 a). 'The Torah may be translated only into Greek, because only by Greek can it be adequately rendered' (Jerus. Megillah 18).

Both the extent and the limits of Greek influence on ¹ The reader substitutes for a word another the sum of the numerical values of whose letters is the same. Thus 666—Cæsar Νερω (קסר נריון).

Palestinian Jewish life can be very well illustrated by the Jewish view of games, gymnastics, etc. (see HELLENISM, § 5). It is well known that the erection of a gymnasium in Jerusalem by the Hellenisers in the Maccabean period called forth the indignant protest of the strict party (see above, § 11). This continued to be the attitude of legal Judaism, even Josephus denouncing the theatre and amphitheatre as un-Jewish (Ant. xv. 81). In time, however, even the most pious modified this rigid puritanism, and tales are actually told of the gymnastic skill of famous Rabbis (e.g., Simon ben-Gamaliel, Sukkā, 58 a). The bath, originally a Greek institution, became entirely naturalized, and was given a Hebrew name (בִּתְּוּן). We even find a Talmudic precept enjoining every father to teach his son swimming (Kiddūshin, 29 a).

The characteristic method both of teaching and of learning was constant repetition. Hence 20. Methods of Study, etc. שנה prop. to repeat, comes to mean both to teach and to learn (see above, § 3).

The following dictum is ascribed to R. Akiba (2nd cent. A.D.): 'The teacher should strive to make the lesson agreeable to the pupils by clear reasons, as well as by frequent repetitions, until they thoroughly understand the matter and are able to recite it with great fluency' (Erūbin 54 b). The pupil was to repeat the lesson aloud: 'Open thy mouth that the subject of thy study may abide with thee and live' (Erūbin, 54 a).

Oral instruction is often referred to in NT—e.g., in Rom. 2 18; cp Lk. 14 (cp CATECHISE). In Jerome's time (4th cent. A.D.) Jewish children in Palestine had to learn by heart the alphabet in the regular and the reverse order. He reproaches the Pharisees with always repeating, never reflecting.

Jerome notes the remarkable powers of memory thus developed: 'In childhood they acquire the complete vocabulary of their language, and learn to recite all the generations from Adam to Zerubbabel with as much accuracy and facility, as if they were simply giving their names' (see S. Krauss in JQR 6231 f., where the ref. are given). The 'endless genealogies' of 1 Tim. 14 may be a further illustration (but see GENEALOGIES 1, § 4, second note). Repetition with fellow scholars is recommended (Ta'ānith 7 a). In teaching, mechanical devices for assisting the memory were used (memoria technica: cp Mishna, Shēkālīm v., and elsewhere, and Buxt. Lex. [ed. Fischer, 677 b], s.v. נְסִיחָן).

The idiosyncrasy of the pupil was to be considered (Prov. 226, Ābōdā Zārā 19 a). Instruction was to be methodical and given with a high sense of responsibility (Pēsāchim 3 a, and Ābōth 3 11).

Regarding school discipline the later rules are elaborate. Perhaps the following may be mentioned. Partiality on the part of the teacher was to be avoided (Ta'ānith 24 a). Punctuality is insisted upon (Kēhūbōth 111 b). Punishments were mild, the Rabbinical rules in this respect showing a marked advance on the ideas of Ben-Sira. Thus reliance in the case of older scholars who proved refractory was placed in the chastening effect of the public opinion of class-fellows (Bābā Bathrā 21 a). In the case of young children, when punishment was necessary it was to be administered with a strap (ibid.).

The pedagogic ideal of the period was realised in R. Eliezer—a preceptor of R. Akiba—who is compared to 'a plastered cistern that loseth not a drop' (Ābōth 28 b).

That the usual position of the scholar was on the ground, facing the teacher, appears from Acts 22 3 (παρὰ τοὺς πόδας Γαμαλιήλ).

Cp Lk. 246 10 39, and the saying ascribed to R. Jose: 'Let thy house be a meeting-place for the wise; and powder thyself in the dust of their feet' (Ābōth 14). Benches (ספסלים = subsellia) were a later innovation (Bērahōth, 28 a). In some cases it would be convenient for teacher or taught to stand (Acts 13 16 Mt. 13 2); but this was not the rule. These remarks largely apply to the scribal college.

Besides the elementary school there were also colleges for higher training, where those who were to devote themselves to the study of the Law (both

21. Scribes' Colleges. written and oral) attended בית המדרש, Bēth ham-midrāsh, 'house of study'; another name is בית הדין, Megillā 28 a). These, too, were usually attached (at any rate when the system had been developed) to the synagogues. No doubt they grew out of assemblies in private houses (cp Ābōth 14 cited above), which probably still continued to be used in some cases for this purpose. In Jerusalem the temple (i.e., the colonnades or some other space of the outer court) was often so utilised (Lk. 246 Mt. 2123 etc.). Thus the famous scribes and 'doctors of the law' taught, their instruction being chiefly catechetical—a method which has left its impress upon the style of the Mishna. Questions, asked and answered by teacher and disciple alike, counter-questions, parables, debates, allegories, riddles, stories—such were the methods employed. They throw an interesting light on NT forms of teaching.

Tbus (for instance) the Rabbinic parables, like those of the NT, are commonly introduced by some such formula as 'To what is the matter like?' (למה ד). The fuller consideration of these and other points (e.g., the extent of the studies pursued in the Beth Hamidrash) belongs to the article SCRIBES (q.v.).

What has been said above applies exclusively to boys. For the education of girls no public provision was made.

22. Education of Girls.

From birth to marriage they remained under the mother's care. With their brothers they would learn those simple lessons in morality and religion which a mother knows so well how to instil. Special care would, of course, be given to their training in the domestic arts; but the higher studies (both sacred and secular) were considered to be outside a woman's sphere. Reading, however, and perhaps writing, were taught to girls, and they were made familiar with the written, but not the oral, Law. Strangely enough, too, they were apparently encouraged to acquire a foreign language, especially Greek (J. P'āh 2b). That great importance was attached to girls' education from an early period appears from Ecclus. 7 24 f., 26 10 f., 42 9 f.

Above all, the ideal of Jewish womanhood was that of the virtuous (or capable) wife, actively engaged in the management of her household, and in the moral and religious training of her children (Prov. 31 10-29).

It must not be supposed that the system of education sketched above was the only one to be found in Palestine during the period. As has already

23. Conclusion. been pointed out, there were doubtless Jewish as well as Greek-speaking centres within the Holy Land where schools of the Greek type flourished. Among the Jewish communities abroad, too, which doubtless possessed schools with their synagogues, Greek influence would be especially felt. Still, in all Jewish centres the dominant note was the same. Education was almost exclusively religious. Its foundation was the text of Scripture, and its highest aim to train up its disciples in the fear of God which is based upon a detailed knowledge of the Law. The noble precept 'Train up a child in the way he should go, and even when he is old he will not depart from it' (Prov. 22 6) is re-echoed, in more prosaic language, in the Talmud: 'If we do not keep our children to religion while they are young, we shall certainly not be able to do so in later years' (Yōmā 82 a). The means by which this could be accomplished—as the Jewish teachers were the first to perceive—was a system of definite religious training in the schools.

In thus endowing its children with a possession which lived in intellect, conscience, and heart, Judaism entrenched itself within an impregnable stronghold. For it is undoubtedly the love of sacred study, instilled in school and synagogue, that has saved the Jewish race from extinction. The beautiful saying, attributed to R. Judah the Holy: 'The world exists only by the breath of school-children,' has its justification—at any rate as regards the Jewish world—in the later history of the Jewish people.

EGG (הַיָּצִי), Deut. 226; see FOWLS, § 4, SCORPION.

EGLAH (הַיָּצִי), 'young cow,' § 68; אַרְלֵא [AL]; in 2 S. אַרְלֵא [B], -פֶּאֶס [A]; in 1 Ch. אַלֵּא [B], אַרְ. [L]; אַרְלֵא [Jos.]. Mother of David's son ITHREAM (q.v.), 2 S. 35 1 Ch. 33. It is doubtful whether 'wife of David' in 2 S. 35 is correct or not. 'David' might be a scribe's error for some other name; Abigail (v. 3) is called 'wife of Nabal' (her first husband). So Wellhausen, Driver, Budde. According to a late exegetical tradition, however (see Jer. Quæst. Hebr. on 2 S. 35 623, and Lag. Proph. Chald. p. xviii.), Eglah was Michal, daughter of Saul, David's first wife. This view is also that of Thenius and Klostermann, and is plausible. To stop short here, however, would be impossible. No early writer would have written Eglah meaning Michal. The most probable explanation is suggested by 2 Ch. 11 18. עֲגֵלָה is a corruption of אֲבִיחַיִל, 'Abihail,' the name given to the mother of JERIMOTH (q.v.), or rather Ithream, ben David, in 2 Ch. 12. We now understand ע's reading אַרְלֵא (אַרְלֵא?) in 2 S. 35, and can do justice to the late Jewish tradition respecting Eglah. For almost certainly מיכָל ('Michal') also is a corruption of אֲבִיחַיִל, 'Abihail.' See ITHREAM, MICHAL. T. K. C.

EGLAIM (עֵגְלַיִם), probably 'place of ~ reservoir'?—or a softened form of עֵגְלַיִם? on form of name see NAMES, § 107—אֲבִיחַיִל [B], -אַל[ע]יִם [NAQ], GALLIM, a town of Moab (Is. 15 8), mentioned together with BEER-ELIM in such a way as to suggest that it lay on the S. frontier. Beer-elim, however, should rather be read 'in Elealeh' (close to the N. frontier). Eglaim must therefore have been on the S. border, and Eusebius and Jerome identify it with אַרְלֵא (Agallim), a village 8 R. m. S. from Areopolis (OS, 228 61 98 10). T. K. C.

EGLATH-SHELISHIYAH (הַיָּצִי שְׁלִישִׁיָּהּ), mentioned in the RV of the prophecy against Moab, Is. 15 5 (ΔΑΜΑΛΙΟΙ . . . ΤΡΙΕΤΗΣ [BNAQT]) Jer. 48 34 (ΑΓΓΕΛΙΑΝ ΚΑΛΑΚΕΙΑ [B], om. N*, Δ. ΕΙΣ ΚΑΛΙΚΑ [N^c], -ΛΙΑ [AQ], ΚΑΛΙΚΙΑ [A], ΚΑΛΑΚΙΑ [Q]). The rendering adopted by Graf and others 'the third Eglath' implies that there were three places of this name near together. Whether such a title as 'the third Eglath' is probable in a poem the reader may judge. Duhm and Marti take the words to be an insertion from Jer. 12; Cheyne, however (see LUHITH), supposes עֲגֵלָה שְׁלִישִׁיָּהּ to be a corruption of עֲגֵלָה עֲגֵלָה, 'the ascent of EGLAIM [q.v.], 'cancelling as a dittogram 'the ascent of LUHITH [q.v.]. According to the rendering of AV and of RV^{ms}. ('an heifer of three years') the crying of Moab is compared to a thwarted heifer, one which in its third year is on the point of being broken in; others regard 'heifer' as a meta-phorical description of Zoar (cp Hos. 10 11); but one expects עִגְלוֹן עִגְלוֹן, cp Gen. 15 9.¹

EGLON (עִגְלוֹן, § 77; cp EGLAH, EGLAIM, עִגְלוֹן [BAL]), the king of Moab, who oppressed Israel for eighteen years. He was finally killed by the Benjamite EHUD [q.v., i. (1)], who at the head of his tribesmen destroyed all the Moabites W. of Jordan (Judg. 3 12-30). That Moab was aided by Ammon and Amalek is probably an exaggeration due to D; cp Bu. Ri. Sa. 99. From the fact that Eglon seized Jericho (v. 13) it is often assumed (cp e.g., Jos.) that this was the scene of his assassination. This, however, does not agree with the finale, and since Gilgal lies between Jericho and the fords of Moab, we must assume from vv. 18 f. 26 that his residence was E. of Gilgal, most probably in Moab. See JUDGES, §§ 6, 16 (beg.); SEIRATH.

EGLON (עִגְלוֹן; ¹⁴Ⓤ¹⁴ commonly ΟΔΟΛΛΑΜ; ¹⁵Ⓤ¹⁵ in Josh. 10 36 12 12 15 39, ΕΓΛΩΝ), a town in the Shēphēlah of Judah, mentioned with Lachish and Bozkath (Josh. 15 39 ΙΔΕΔΔΛΕΔ [BA]). Debir, its king, joined the league against Joshua which was headed by ADONIZEDEK

EGYPT

[q.v.], and perished with the other kings (Josh. 10 1-37 [v. 5 ὁδολλαχ (A); v. 36 BA om.]; cp 12 12 αιλαν [B], εγλων [F], -μ [A]). That Adullam takes its place in Ⓤ of Josh. 10 is plainly a mistake, which has led Eusebius and Jerome astray (OS 253 45 118 21). The name of Eglon survives in that of Kh. 'Ajlan,¹ 16 m. NE. of Gaza, and 2 m. N. of Tell el-Hesy (LACHISH). On this site, however, there is very little extent of artificial soil, very little pottery, and what there is shows Roman age.² On the other hand, there is a tell, 3 1/2 m. S. of Tell el-Hesy, the site of which Petrie considers only second in importance to that of Tell el-Hesy, and, though he has not explored it, he pronounces it to be the ancient Eglon. So far as can be seen on the surface, Tell Nejileh (so it is called) is of the same age as Tell el-Hesy, though it may have been ruined earlier (PEFQ, '90, p. 162). Unluckily, however, it is wholly covered with an Arab cemetery (Flinders Petrie PEFQ, '90, p. 226). Tell 'Ajlan may represent the ruins of a later town, built after the overthrow of the ancient city; this is a suggestion which may or may not be confirmed by excavation. T. K. C.

Philological studies very quickly become antiquated owing to the rapid progress of the young science. So far, none of the popular books on Egypt in relation to the Bible can be recommended (this is true of Brugsch, Steininschrift und Bibelwort, 1891). Ebers, Aeg. u. die Bücher Moses, 1868 (antiquated), was never completed. An Egyptological counterpart to KAT is promised. Here only a selection from the immense mass of literature can be made, preference often being given to the less highly specialised works, and those written in English or translated into it.

chief temple (see ΝΟΡΗ).² On the Semitic name³ see MIZRAIM, § 1. Poetical names in the OT are Rahab and 'land of Ham' (see RAHAB, HAM, i.).

The Egyptians themselves called their country Kēmet,⁴ Coptic ΚΗΜΕ or ΧΗΜΕ⁵ (Northern Coptic ΚΗΜΙ)—i.e., 'the black country'—from its black soil of Nile mud, in contrast with the surrounding deserts, the dešret or 'red country'. This etymology is given correctly by Plutarch (De Iside 33, χημια = μελάγγειος; see also 'Ερμοχόμιος, Steph. Byz., by the side of μελάμβωλος). Poetic names were, e.g., (P-to-mer, 'the land of inundation' (Steph. Byz. Πτιμυρις, equal to Δέλτα), in later time Beket (perhaps 'land of the baket shrub'). The most common designation was, however, simply 'the two countries', touï,⁶ referring to the division of Egypt into S. and N. country (see below, § 43).

would rather fix the frontier at about $32^{\circ} 32'$ (the site of ancient Pelusium). It is not correct to include in Egypt the large deserts of stone and sand lying on both sides, or even the N. parts of the Sinaitic peninsula—regions of more than 1,000,000 sq. m., which are wandered over by only a few foreign nomads. Egypt is, strictly, only the country using Nile water, N. of Syenè (Asuân), as it was correctly defined even by Herodotus (2:18). If we reckon only cultivable ground (Nile Valley and Delta), Egypt has an area of not much more than 13,000 square miles.¹

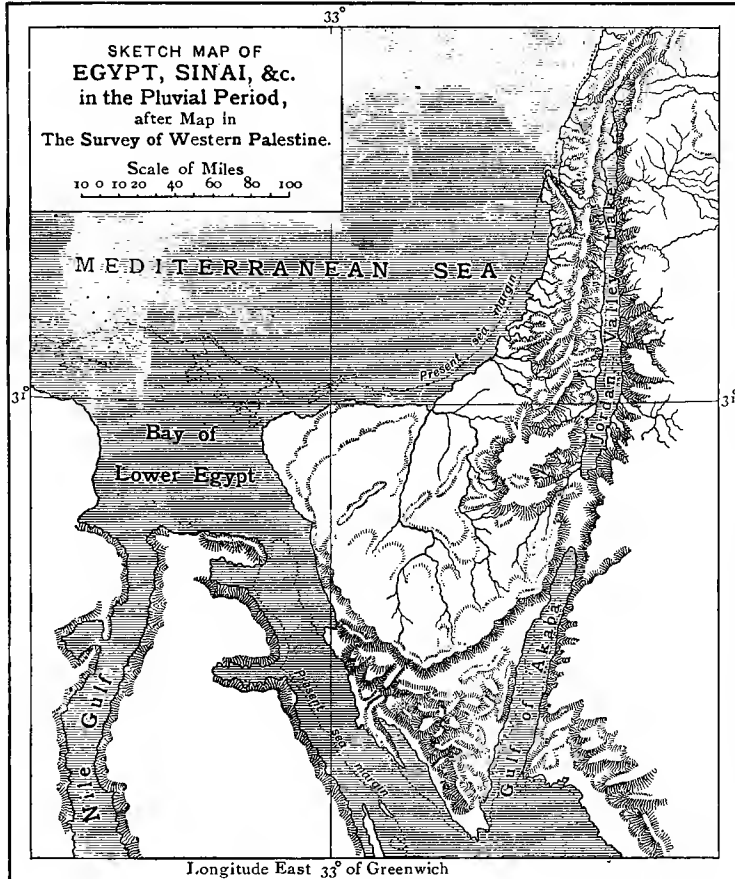

The extent of land really under cultivation changes continually. Under the bad government of the Mamlûks in 1797, it

Nile, is correct (see the accompanying sketch-map: fig. 1); but it is an exaggeration to place this process within historic time.¹ As far as our historical knowledge goes, the country has always been the same; the yearly deposits have raised the bed of the Nile slightly. (On exaggerations of the fact that the river had formerly a greater volume of water than now, see below, § 7, note.)

The fact that the level, e.g., of ancient Alexandria is now below that of the sea is to be ascribed to a sinking of the sandy north coast. The Burtus and Menzaleh Lakes are indeed, in part, recent formations, caused by the influx of the sea, although the Edku and Maryût (Mareotis) lakes are old, and ancient inscriptions speak continually of the 'swamp-lands,' n-adhâru, Nabû (Herod.) Neôur (Ptol.) in the N. Strabo knows the Balâh lakes.

The substratum of the Northern Nile valley and the characteristic stone of the tableland of the Libyan (Western)² desert is limestone in different formations; the material of the great pyramids is tertiary nummulitic limestone. The valley is shut in by limestone crags, about 300 ft. in height, which sometimes come very near to the river. Above Edfu, the sandstone formation that prevails through Nubia begins, forming also the first natural frontier of Egypt, the mountain-bar at Silsilah. This quartzite stone furnished the excellent material used for most of the ancient temples. The first cataract at Asuân is the result of the river being crossed by a bar of red granite, syenite, and other rock, from which the famous obelisks were taken. The Eastern (Arabian) desert is of varying formation, full of mountains which rise in part to a height of over 6000 ft. (The highest point is Jebel Ghârib.) See geological map (no. 3) facing col. 1207 f.

These mountains furnished the rich material for the finer sculptures of the ancient Egyptians—diomite (near Hammâmât), dark red porphyry (Jebel Dokhân, 6900 ft.), black granite, alabaster (near Asyût), and basalt. Emeralds (Jebel Zabâra) and gold (Wâdy 'Allâkî) also were found there, but few useful metals (there were some iron and insignificant copper mines in Nubia). In antiquity, therefore, metals were imported. Other was estimated at 5469 sq. m.; recently, over 11,000 were assumed as cultivable, of which 9460 were really in cultivation. The census of 1887 gave 20,842 sq. kil. (12,943 sq. m.) as arable, of which Upper Egypt (some parts of Nubia even being included) has the smaller half. In antiquity, the amount was certainly not more, probably less.

The surrounding deserts make access to Egypt difficult, and explain its somewhat isolated history. The shape of the country may be likened to that of a fan with a long handle. The handle, Upper Egypt, from Memphis to Syenè, is a narrow valley, averaging 12 m. in width (near Thebes, only $2\frac{1}{2}$ -4 m.).

The view of ancient writers that Egypt north of Memphis, the so-called Delta (from its form, like an inverted Gr. Δ), was originally a gulf of the sea and was filled in by the deposits of the minerals, such as salt, alum, natron (this from the Naṣrūn valley S. of Alexandria), come more from the Libyan desert.

The Oases (oûdais, Egyptian wāh, modern Arabic

4. Oases. wāh, meaning unknown) of the Libyan desert are depressions in this barren tableland where the water can come to the surface and create vegetation. See maps after cols. 1240 and 1208.

Their present names (from N. to S.) are: (1) Siwah (Oasis of Amon; perhaps also called sekhēt amu, 'date-field'; but this is quite doubtful), very far to the west; (2) Bahriye, the small oasis; (3) Farafra (To-ehē, 'cowland'); (4) Dakhēia (Zesses); (5) The Great Oasis, now called 'the exterior oasis,' el-Khār(i)geh (anciently Heb, Hibis, or the Southern Oasis).

In ancient times these islands in the desert belonged politically to Egypt (from Dyn. 18?); but their inhabitants were Libyans and became Egyptianised only later. The population of the remote oasis of Amon, however, although it adopted the Egyptian cult of Amon, remained purely Libyan, and has retained to the present day the Libyan (Berber) language.

The population of these five oases is, at present, about 58,000. The Fa(i)yūm also (see below, § 50) is really an oasis. On the Wādī Tūmilāt, see GOSHEN I.; on the Fa(i)yūm, below, § 50.

The climate is extremely hot, but has great changes, especially during the night. The ancient Egyptians

5. Climate. prayed that after death, as in life, they might have the 'cool north wind,' considering this the greatest comfort. This wind blows in summer for six months. On the other hand, at intervals during the fifty days preceding the summer solstice, there blows a terrible hot wind, now called Ḥamsīn (i.e., 'fifty'), full of sand from the Western desert. At most other times, proximity to the deserts renders the air very dry and salubrious. The yearly inundation has dangers which explain why so frequently, from the time of Moses onwards, the plague has found a home in Egypt (Am. 4.10). Eye diseases caused by the abundant dust were, and are, very common.

The Nile, the only river of Egypt, seems to have its present name (Gk. Νεῖλος) from the Semitic nāhal (נָחַל), 'stream,' this designation (nehel*)¹ being probably due to the Phœnicians.

The Egyptians called it Ḥāpi (ωφι, of uncertain etymology),² in poetry uīru ('the great one'); but in the vernacular language it was simply 'the river' yetor (later—after 2000 B.C.—pronounced ye-or, yo'or), or else 'the great river' ye(t)er-o, ya'r-o, Coptic ειερο. Of the last two expressions the former became in Hebrew נָחַר, whilst the second, according to the N. Egyptian pronunciation (ⲓⲁⲣⲟ), is found in the Assyrian Yaru ā, 'Nile.' On the Heb. name Shihor, and on the phrase 'the river of Egypt,' see SHIHOR, and EGYPT, RIVER OF.

This river is the second longest in the world³ (its source now being assumed at 3° S. lat.; for the whole course of the river see map 2, on opposite page), although not so majestic and voluminous (1300 ft. wide at Thebes, 2600 at Asyūt) as some shorter rivers. It forms the principal characteristic of Egypt, 'the gift of the Nile' (Herod.). The Egyptians believed that it sprang from four sources at the twelfth gate of the nether-world, at a place described in ch. 146 of the Book of the Dead, and that it came to light at the two whirlpools of the first cataract, the so-called Kerti (κρῶφι and μῶφι, Herod.). Even in the latest times, when they knew the course of the river beyond Khartūm,⁴ their theology still held that primitive view.

The Nile divides N. of Memphis. Of the seven branches, however, which once formed the Delta (see large map after col. 1240), only two⁵ are really

² Later theology combined it with the Apis (Ḥapi) hull. He was allowed to drink only from wells, not from the Nile.

³ Perthes, Taschen-Atlas, statistical tables.

⁴ But hardly the source from the 'mountain of the moon,' known in Roman times.

⁵ Viz., the first and the third, counting from the west—continued, however, in their lower portions, in the channels of the second and the fourth respectively. The latter, the Bolhinitic left, the rest being more or less dried up. A branch (now called Bahr-Yūsuf),¹ losing itself in the Libyan desert, forms the oasis of the Fa(i)yūm in Middle Egypt.

The annual inundation is produced by the spring rains in the Abyssinian highlands and the melting of the mountain snow, which cause an immense increase of the Eastern or Blue Nile (now el-Bahr el-Azrak, from its turbid water), whilst the principal stream, the White Nile (el-Bahr el Abyad, from its clearness), has a more steady volume of water. In Egypt the increase is felt in June; July brings rapid swelling of the reddening turbid stream; the slow subsidence of the waters begins in October. During winter, the stagnant water remaining on the fields dries up, and the Nile mud, originally the dust washed from the Abyssinian mountains, settles upon the soil, acting as a valuable fertilizer. Thus in course of innumerable years the sand or stone of the valley has been covered with from 30 to over 40 feet of black soil. This shows, usually, an astonishing fertility: Egypt looks like one great garden (Gen. 13.10); but a 'small Nile'—i.e., an insufficient inundation—has always brought years of dearth.² Even a 'great Nile,'³ however, cannot cover the whole valley and reach all fields. Dykes have to be built, and canals dug, in order that the water may be distributed. A good government has to give great care to such public constructions, the neglect of which will make the desert reconquer vast regions. Higher fields always had to be watered by (primitive) machinery, such as the contrivance called at present shādūf. (On Dt. 11.10 see below, col. 1225, n. 10.)

After all, Egypt had much more regular harvests than Palestine and Syria, where the only irrigation, by rain, very often failed. The abundant inundation of Egypt was proverbial among the Hebrews: cp Am. 8.8, and, as some think, Is. 59.19 b (SBOT). We repeatedly find Egypt's Asiatic neighbours depending upon its abundance of grain. The Egyptians knew quite well that their country owed its existence entirely to the good god Nile, whom they represented as a fat androgynous blue or green figure.⁴ Being nearly (but not completely) rainless, Egypt depends upon the Nile not only for the irrigation of its fields, but also for its drinking-water (which is very palatable, and was kept cool, then as now, in porous vessels). The OT prophets know no worse way of threatening Egypt with complete ruin than using the symbolical expression, 'The Nile will be dried up.' The river was also the chief highway of the country.

The flora⁵ was poor in species. Ancient Egypt had not such a cosmopolitan vegetation as the modern.

8. Flora. Forests were quite unknown. Besides fruit-trees—viz., the date-, dōm- (now only above Asyūt) and argūn-palm, fig, sycamore, nabak (Zizyphus Spina Christi, the so-called Lotus-tree), and pomegranand the Bucolic mouths, are said to have been artificial canals (?). The Bucolic of Herodotus (2.17) is called Phatitic—or rather Pathmetic (thus Ptol. and Pomp. Mela)—i.e., the Northern (pa-to mhit)—by other writers.

³ Of the so-called Nilometers—wells with measures marked for use in official estimates of the rise—that of Philæ remains from antiquity.

ate¹—only a few tamarisks (osef [L], cp תמר), willows, and, especially, various kinds of acacias (sonset ω ONTE; cp נשף, Egyptian loan-word; see SHITTAFI) grew. Timber had mostly to be imported from Nubia and Syria. As principal fuel, dung was used, as now. The vine was always cultivated; but the national beverage was a kind of beer. The chief cereals were barley (yot), most important of all, wheat (suo), and the African millet or sorghum, now called dūra (bo'det). Cp Ex. 9:31 f. 'flax, barley, wheat, spelt' (this perhaps for dūra?). The principal food-stuffs of the modern inhabitants, leguminous plants—viz., lentils (Egyptian aršan), and beans (Egyptian pūl), perhaps also peas (Coptic $\delta\rho\omega$), lupines, and chick-peas—have Semitic names, and were declared unclean by the priests even in Roman times; but among the peasants they had already become popular as early as the 14th century B.C. Of vegetables, onions, leeks, and garlic were as much in demand then as now; there were also radishes, melons, gourds, cucumbers, bāmia (Hibiscus esculentus; resembles American okra), melūhiya (Corchorus olitorius; 'a mucilaginous vegetable [somewhat] resembling spinach'), etc. (Cp the lamentation of the Israelites over the lost delicacies of Egypt, Nu. 11:5.) Of oily plants, sesame and olives were not very popular, olive oil being mostly imported from Asia. Unguents were taken from several balsam-shrubs, especially the baket; for cooking and burning, castor oil (see GOURD) was most commonly in use, as now among the Chinese. The cultivation of flax was very extensive; whether cotton also was grown is quite doubtful.

Wild vegetation grew only in the many marshes—the common reed (see REED, FLAG), the papyrus (see PAPYRUS), and the beautiful blue or white lotus-flower (sof [L] ω ON, from which Hebrew פוש; see LILY). The papyrus and the lotus-flower are now found only in the Sūdān.² All these wild plants were utilised—even the lotus, the seed of which was eaten. The papyrus,³ in particular, was of the greatest importance for ancient Egypt, furnishing the material, not only for writing on, but also for making ropes, mats, sandals, baskets, and small ships (cp Ex. 2:3; Is. 18:2; Job 9:26). The desert vegetation consists mostly of a few thorny shrubs.

Of domestic animals, the ass, an African animal, was used more as a beast of burden than for riding. Horses

9. Zoology.⁴ (sesmet,⁵ later htor), introduced by the Hyksos after 1800 B.C., for chariots of war and of pleasure, were never very common, pasture being scarce; but their race was good. Cp Dt. 17:16 r K. 10:28 f. (but see MIZRAIM, § 2; HORSE, § 3). The biblical passages which speak of the camel in Egypt (Gen. 12:16 Ex. 9:3) seem to need criticism, for this unclean animal was, to all appearance, foreign to ancient Egypt and became a domestic animal only after the Christian era (see CAMEL, § 2). Cattle, of a hump-backed race, were more common than now; likewise goats; but sheep (es'ou, Sem. word, נב, Arab. šā') were rare. Swine (rire), the most unclean of animals, 'offensive to the Sun-god,' seem to have been kept, in biblical times, only in the nomos of Eileithya (now el-Kāb), perhaps because of Nubian elements in the population. In the earliest period they seem to have been more generally bred. The dog was held in esteem. Strong greyhounds for hunting were imported from the southern

¹ That this tree, at least, was an importation from Syria in historic times is shown by the name (herman—i.e., η δ). The perseæ (šaubet; Coptic, šouelbe), Mimusops Schimperii, after Schweinfurth and other trees may have had a similar history.

² Whether the Eragrostis abyssinica, a species of grain, called tef in Abyssinia, the poisonous 'oshar (Calotropis procera), and other plants of modern times were known is uncertain, but probable, as they are African plants.

³ 'Pa- β -yoor, 'the (plant) of the river.' Cp Bondi, in ZÄ 30:64 [92].

countries. The cat became a domestic animal first in Egypt (but rather late), perhaps by the side of the weasel and ichneumon.¹

Noblemen undertook hunting expeditions into the desert where most wild animals of Africa were found. The various antelopes of the steppe (especially the gazelle, the oryx,² the ibex,³ etc.), were caught and then domesticated, or, at least, fattened at home. It is not certain whether the hare was eaten.

Of wild animals the jackal, the fox, the hyæna, and the ichneumon reached Egypt; in the earliest times also (but only occasionally) the lion, the lynx, and the leopard. The tusks of the elephant and of the rhinoceros (both called *Yēbu*⁴) were only imported from Nubia—Yēb(u), 'Elephantinè' (i.e., 'ivory place'), on the first cataract, being the emporium for this important trade. The Nile was infested by malicious hippopotamuses⁵ and crocodiles, both now extinct. That the name Bēhēmōth (Job 40:15) is by no means a Hebraised Egyptian word, as has frequently been asserted, may be noted in passing (so, independently, BEHEMOTH, § 1).

The marshes were covered with innumerable birds in winter—especially wild geese, cranes, fishing birds (such as the pelican,⁶ the ibis,⁷ and others), and smaller birds of passage from Europe. The pursuit of these was both a favourite sport and a useful occupation; they were fattened at home, but (with the exception of the pigeon) not domesticated. The domestic fowl became known, it would seem, only in Greek times—Diod. (1:74) and Pliny (10:54) describe hatching-ovens as in common use in their day. Of rapacious birds, the bald-headed vulture⁸ was most common. Bats in immense numbers filled the mountain clefts.

Many kinds of fish (as also the soft tortoise, trionyx) were obtained from the Nile, and were incredibly cheap—cp ω ON, 'for nothing' (Nu. 11:5; cp Is. 19:8)—but they are not praised by modern travellers. Some—e.g., the oxryhynchus⁹ (i.e., 'sharp-nouted'), and the *na'*¹⁰ (a silurus)—were unclean. The later theology, at least in Æthiopia, tried (though without success) to declare all fish unclean.¹¹ Air-dried fish were much eaten.

Multitudes of frogs, lice, flies, scorpions, and locusts remind us of the 'ten plagues.' Of poisonous serpents, the uræus (ar'at)¹² enjoyed special veneration (see SERPENT, § 3).

Owing to the fertility of the country, it has always been very thickly peopled: the present population

10. People. amounts to six millions—i.e., it exceeds even that of Belgium in density (cp § 2). The ancient writers who speak of 30,000 towns (!), and seven (or even seven and a half: Jos. BJ ii. 16:4) millions of people, somewhat exaggerate.

The race of the ancient Egyptians, who called themselves rōmet,—i.e., 'men'—is admirably determined in the Table of Nations (Gen. 10:6), where they are classified with the Hamites—i.e., the light-coloured Africans. They were consequently relations (1) of the Libyans (see LUBIM, LEHABIM), extending from the Senegal to the Oasis of Siwah, at present interrupted by many Arab immigrants; (2) of the Cushites (in linguistic, not in biblical, sense), who now extend from the desert of Upper Egypt to the equator, comprising (a) the Bisharin and Hadendoa, (b) the Afar (Danakil), and Saho on the coast of Abyssinia, (c) the Agāū tribes of Abyssinia (Bogos or Bilin, Khamir, Quara), in the S. called Siddama (Kafa, Kullo, etc.), and (d) the Somali and Galla.

Anthropologically, the Egyptians seem to have been more closely akin to the Cushites—who all show a slight admixture of Negro blood, received at a very remote date—than to the purely white Libyans. They were

'bearer'), became the simple f; Δ kay, 'high ground' (representing a declivity), became the letter k, p; and so on. By such letters (from 24 to 26; Plutarch, 25), all inflections, and many words, were written. (On the treatment of the vowels see above, § 122.)

As an additional safeguard a syllabic sign, such as 𓆎 kn mentioned above, is commonly followed (sometimes preceded) by an alphabetic sign (in this case an) for the sake of clearness (thus 𓆎 kn + n). This is the so-called phonetic complement.

The last element of the system consists of what are called determinatives, the method of employing which will appear from the following examples:—Thus, e.g., 𓆎 means 'to write.'

Followed by the determinative 'man,' thus 𓆎 𓆎 , it means writer—i.e., 'scribe.' If we place after it a 'book,' 𓆎 , thus 𓆎 𓆎 , it means writing—i.e., 'book' (both words from a stem ss, ssj, 𓆎 , but differently vocalised). Again 𓆎 𓆎 , i.e., an elephant + a piece of skin (where the second sign, the determinative, could also be omitted), means 'elephant' (yēbu); but in 𓆎 𓆎 the sign of a city indicates that Yēbu, the city (Elephantine), is meant. Similarly 𓆎 marks the end of every man's name, 𓆎 that of a woman's name; words for small plants receive 𓆎 at the end, trees 𓆎 , and so on. This is a great help to the reader, and compensates somewhat for the absence of vowels.

Thus a very perfect system was formed whereby, by the employment of several thousand signs (of which, however, only a few hundred were in common use), anything whatever might be expressed—a complicated system, it is true, but not so complicated and ambiguous as, e.g., the later Babylonian cuneiform writing. The accomplishments of reading and writing were not rare.¹

The hieroglyphs, or sculptured writing-signs, were admirably suited for monumental and ornamental purposes; but when used for writing books upon papyrus, they had to be abridged and adapted to the pen, exactly as our written letters differ from the printed forms. (i.) Thus the picture of a lion 𓆎 (rw),²

¹ Such papyri of non-magic character as are found in the tombs are mostly old copy-books used by the deceased in their schoolboy days. The mention of women bringing the meals for their sons to the school proves that the poor also aspired to the advantages of education.

² This word may be taken as an illustration of the old con-became in cursive writing 𓆎 , the man 𓆎 , a, and so on. This is called Hieratic writing—so called as being, like the hieroglyphic, a sacred script, though not, like it, designed for monumental use. (ii.) In course of time was developed, by the progress of abridgment, a regular shorthand, called by the Greeks Demotic or popular, because in their time it was the style of writing used in daily life.¹ It is also called epistolographic, or letter-style (Egyptian shay-en-shay). In this script the lion becomes 𓆎 or 𓆎 . The illustration (fig. 2) gives three letter signs and two word signs: in hieroglyphs, in five forms of hieratic, and in demotic.

All cursive writing runs from right to left (like Heb. etc.), hieroglyphics in both directions (though never boustrophedon); but originally both ran mostly from top to bottom, like the oldest Babylonian and like Chinese. The opinion² that the Semitic (Phoenician) letters were derived from the hieratic script has become very popular, but is in every way improbable. The latest hieroglyphic inscription is one at Esneh, giving the name of the Roman emperor Decius (250 A.D.); the latest demotic text is one at Philæ, dated 453 A.D. If the earliest translations of the Christian Scriptures into Coptic—i.e., Egyptian in its latest form—were made, as is usually assumed, about 200 A.D.,³ there should be a continuous tradition. As a living language, Coptic died out about 1500 A.D.; at present only a very few, even of the Coptic priests, possess any understanding of the Coptic liturgic service. Coptic is written with Greek letters and six demotic signs (𓆎 f, 𓆎 h, 𓆎 h, 𓆎 aj, 𓆎 gj [a palatal sound of doubtful value, later pronounced like z or r], 𓆎 i).⁴

The knowledge of the earlier systems of writing was completely lost,⁵ after the whole country was subjected to Christianity. The key to the decipherment of the hieroglyphic and demotic was at last recovered by F. Champollion⁶ in 1822, by the help of the Rosetta stone with its trilingual inscription (a decree of Ptolemy V. Epiphanes in Egyptian [in hieroglyphic and demotic characters] and in Greek; found in 1799, now in the Brit. Mus.). Thus the decipherment was indirectly a consequence of Napoleon's expedition to Egypt in 1798.

The chief writing material of ancient Egypt was papyrus, a kind of paper made from papyrus stalks, which were sliced, beaten, and pasted together. Its colour was brown or yellowish brown. The chief defect was its brittleness; nevertheless, the writing was often washed off and the papyrus used again. Both sides could be written on. Red ink marked divisions and corrections, as in mediæval MSS. Books were in roll form. (Among the Hebrews the same writing material was in common use: cp Jer. 36:23.) Documents of great importance were written on leather, drafts mostly on potsherds (ostraca).

The religion⁷ of Ancient Egypt, always retaining so many remnants of barbarous primitive times, stands in striking contrast to the high civilisation of that country. Originally it was not very different from the low animism or nection between Hamitic and Semitic (cp § 11); it is prehistoric in Egyptian and may have sounded lavv(?). Cp Hamitic lubāk (Saho and Afar), libāk (Somali), with Semitic labu 'lion' (which migrated back to Egypt as $\Lambda\text{B}\text{O}\text{I}$), Heb. לָבַיַן .

³ See, however, TEXT, §§ 36, 38, where a later date (circa 300) is argued for.

⁴ Dialects preserve the ancient 𓆎 as 𓆎 .

⁵ The few traditions about the hieroglyphics found in Greek writers (especially Horapollo, Hieroglyphica) are now recognised as being all more or less correct; but for the decipherment they were in various respects insufficient.

⁶ The attempts of Th. Young (1819), which came near finding the key, but nevertheless missed it, have been well estimated by Le Page Renouf, PSBA 19:188 [96].

⁷ Le Page Renouf, Lect. on the Origin and Growth of Religion [82]; Wiedemann, Die Rel. der alten Aegypter (90, fetishism of the negro races. Every locality had its own spirit haunting it.

Such a demon appeared here as a jackal, there as a lion, bird, frog, or snake, or in a tree or a rock. We can understand why, in the lakes of the Fa(t)ūm and in the whirlpool of the first cataract at Elephantine, a crocodile was the local deity (Sobk and Hnumu); why the god Anup(u), leading the dead to Hades, originally (it would seem) in the Memphitic (?) necropolis, was the black jackal of the desert; and so on. We cannot easily understand, however, why, at Busiris, a wooden fetish of strange form,¹ the Dad, signified the highest local god, and why at a later date a he-goat represented there the 'soul(?) of the Dedi' (Bi-n-dēd[ī], Μεῖδης—'Dedi' meaning 'inhabitant of the Dad'), or why the earliest symbol of Osiris was a wine(?)-skin on a pole² (which caused the Greeks to identify this dead god with their joyful Bacchus), and so on.

Originally, sun, moon, and stars were considered to be divine; but, with the exception of the sun-god Rē,³ the local gods had more temples and enjoyed more worship and sacrifices. At Memphis, the chief god was Ptah,⁴ styled by his own priests the 'master-artisan,' and, therefore, the creator, who with his hammer opened the chaotic egg-shaped world; but even the western suburb of the city belonged to a different god, Sokari, a hawk sitting in a sledge shaped like a ship.⁵ Thus the gods were almost innumerable in the earliest times. Their forms (human, animal, or mixed), colours (Neith is green, Amon blue, and so on), symbols, etc., are of perplexing variety.

Fortunately, the superior splendour of the deities in the large cities, with their great temples, led to the worship of the tutelary gods of the villages and small towns being more and more abandoned. Am(m)on,⁶ e.g., the god of the later capital Thebes (called NO-AMON [q.v.], 'Amon's city,' in the OT), thus became the official god, and so the highest in the whole kingdom, circa 1600 B.C. (sacred animal the ram). The Egyptians themselves, indeed, seem to have been puzzled by their endless pantheon. They tried to reduce it by identifying minor divinities with great and popular ones, treating them as one being under different appearances—e.g., the lion-headed Sobmet (wrongly called Sehet or Paht)⁷ of Leontopolis and the cat of Bubastus were identified, the one being explained as the warlike, the other as the benevolent, form. Very old is the system of uniting several local gods into a family, usually as father, mother, and child (in Thebes, e.g., the solar Amon and Nnut, and the lunar Honsu). Subsequently, out of such triads, circles—especially of nine divinities (enneads)—were formed, and whole genealogies elaborated.

Even in prehistoric times, the progress of thought showed itself in the tendency to make forces of nature, especially solar divinities, out of the old meaningless fetishes; but these attempts did not lead to a reasonable, complete system.

To enumerate some of the earliest results: Osiris⁸ of Abydos becomes, as the setting sun, the god of the lower world, king and judge of the dead. In this function he is assisted by the Moon-god Thout (Dhouth), an ibis or an ibis-headed god⁹—originally god of Hermopolis—who becomes a god of wisdom and writing. Anubis¹ assists, leading the dead to Osiris, like Hermes Psychopompos. Osiris himself (son of the goddess Nut) had been sent down to the dark region—i.e., murdered—by his wicked brother Sēt, Σηθ (Typhon in Greek), the local god of N. Ombos,² who is figured as a poorly-sculptured ass (?).³ This malicious god, who eventually (though only very late) became a kind of Satan, was explained as god of thunder and clouds (therefore identified with the cloud (?)-serpent Apop), in the latest period also as the sea or the desert—i.e., all nature hostile to man. He is punished by Hor(us)⁴ (of Edfu), the young son of Isis (HCE),⁵ the wife of Osiris (worshipped especially at Philæ, often identified with Sothis, the Dog-star, who reunites the body of Osiris (the sun), hewn in pieces (the stars) by Sēt. The form of the myth which makes Isis go to Phœnicia in search of Osiris' body, carried to Byblus by the Nile and the Ocean, is evidently quite late, identifying her with Beltis-Astarte. She educates Hor, hiding herself from Sēt and his seventy-two followers (later explained as the seventy-two hottest days) in the Delta-marshes. Her sister Nephthys⁶ (Nebt-hōt) is the wife of Sēt and the mother of Anubis (by Osiris).

1 On vocalisation, see below, § 40 n. 2 The 'Tomb of Osiris,' discovered near Abydos in 1898, is an ancient royal tomb. According to some scholars, Osiris is mentioned as ꜥꜣꜥꜣ (read * ꜥꜣꜥꜣ) in Is. 10.4, and Apis as ꜥꜣꜥꜣ in Jer. 46.15. On these readings see notes in Heb. edition of SBOT. Cp also AHRA, PHINEHAS, ASSIR, APIS, HUR, HARNEPHER, and NAMES, § 68.

3 He must have played a most important part in prehistoric times. The sceptre which all divinities hold in their hands and red-haired men were despised as 'typhonie.'

4 The heaven is, besides, frequently represented as a cow, because the abyss on which the earth in its chaotic state floated was the cow Meht-wéret.

It was this circle of divinities that gained most popularity and became known even outside of Egypt. Possibly it is simply by accident (?) that we possess only fragments of the myths that grew up, representing those connected with the Osirian circle; the rest of the gods might not look quite so lifeless if we knew the mythology referring to them.

We can see under what difficulties Egyptian theology laboured. Not only had it to admit that in the morning the sun was called *Hepre*⁷ (a beetle rolling its egg across the heavens), later Hor (a deity of whom there are seven forms), at noon Re,⁸—both Hor and Re being hawks and evidently representing the sun flying across the heavens,—and in the evening Atum (at Heliopolis, where he was represented in human form sailing in a ship across the heavenly ocean);—but it had also to acknowledge that other solar divinities were appearances of the same being.

Some were cosmical gods—

Nun (Nōw) or Nuu is the abyss from whom all gods and things came—chaos. The earth is the god Seb (or Gēb?) the heaven or celestial ocean bows herself over him as a goddess,⁹ Nut; their child is the sun (= Osiris). The space between them is the god Su (Sow, Σως), a lion. His companion, Tefnut, represents, perhaps, the celestial moisture.

Other gods assume other special functions—

On Thout (Dhouth, moon) and Ptah as protectors of scribes and scholars and of artisans and builders, see above (§§124, 13). Imhotep of Memphis was the god of physicians. Ithyphallic Min¹¹ became a harvest deity, like the serpent Remute(t), and as god of Coptos, the master of the Troglodytes in the Nubian desert, just as Neit of Saïs¹² ruled over the Libyans. The cow Hat-hor (i.e., abode of the Sun-god)¹³ became mistress of love and joy, but showed her solar nature in ruling all Eastern countries. Warlike gods were Onkur of This, Montu of Hermonthis, and above all, the malicious Sēt, whose worship was abandoned more and more after 1000 B.C. (see above [first small type passage in this section]). This distribution of functions, however, is so contradictory that nowhere does an intelligent system result.

The sacred animals belonged to two categories—

Some, such as the black bull called Apis¹⁴ (Hapi) at Memphis, that called Mnēvis at Heliopolis, and the crocodile Sobk (Σουχος), were considered miraculous incarnations of the local god (pure fetishism); but at other places every cat was sacred (as at Bubastus),¹⁵ or every lotos-fish (as at Letopolis), and so forth (totemism?). So, while the crocodile was worshipped at some places (e.g., Ombos), it was sometimes persecuted from a sense of religious duty, even in a neighbouring city (as, e.g., at Edfu).

14 On a probable OT ref. to Apis see above, col. 1215, n. 8. Hence the large cat cemetery near the modern Zaḳāzīk (now commercially exploited for manure).

The great mass of the people never advanced beyond the traditional worship of the local idol (the 'town god') or sacred animal. Among the priests,

15. Pantheism. the most advanced thinkers came, it is true, to the result that all gods are only different forms of the same divine energy,—a conclusion which, however, did not lead them to monotheism, as might have been expected, but to a kind of pantheism. Such advanced thought remained, of course, the property of a few educated persons, though it was not treated as a mystery. Other rationalists followed somewhat euhemeristic lines, treating all gods as deified pharaohs of the earliest period. On early traces of the deluge- and the paradise-traditions, see DELUGE, PARADISE; of borrowing from Asia there is here no question.

In the sphere of cosmogony no reasoned system was ever developed: besides Ptah, the potter Hnum(u) of Elephantine,¹ as well as other gods, claimed to have been creator. Nowhere can any uniform dogma be found (cp CREATION, § 8).

It is interesting that, after 1600, the Egyptians had a strong tendency to increase their already end-

16. Foreign cults. less pantheon by adding foreign divinities, especially gods of a warlike character.²

We find the god Suteh³ of the Hittites (not of the Hyksos; see § 52) so popular as almost to displace Sét. The Semitic god Rašpu ('lightning,' רָשְׁפּוּ), the goddesses 'Anät, 'Astart ('Anät), Kadesh ('the holy one,' קֶדֶשׁ), Beltis of Byblus-Gebal, 'Asit, Adöm, etc. were recognised. Ba'al and Astarte had their temples at Thebes and Memphis. Whether the strangely figured *Bes*⁴ was a foreign (Babylonian? Arabian?) divinity is doubtful. This protector against wild animals and serpents, and patron of dancing, music, and the cosmetic art, bad at least a much earlier cult.⁵

If we find various accounts of the creation of the world and of man, various explanations of the daily course of the sun, etc., we need not wonder that the belief in life after death⁶ was never reduced to a dogma.

According to the opinion of later times, the dead went down to the dark lower world (Amentet, 'Αμύνθης—i. e., the west), passed obstacles of every kind, opened many closed gates, and satisfied various guardians of monstrous form by the use of magic formulas previously placed in the coffins for this purpose. Finally the dead man reached the great judgment hall (wesbet) of Osiris, into which he was introduced by Anubis. His moral life was tested in a cross-examination by the forty-two monstrous judges (the answers denying the forty-two cardinal sins⁷ were ready prepared in his magic book), and by the weighing of his heart in the balance of Me'it, the goddess of justice.⁸ Those who were declared to be wicked were sent to a hell full of flames, and were tortured by evil spirits (some seem to have supposed that they assumed the form of unclean animals). The good were admitted to 'the fields of Aaru (or Yaaru?) plants,' where they sowed and reaped on fields irrigated by the Nile of Hades. Small figures of slaves, or rather substitutes for the dead, made of porcelain or other material, were placed in the coffin to assist the deceased in this peasant life. Originally it may have been only persons belonging to the highest classes who claimed to ascend to heaven upon the ladder of the Sun-god, and to become companions of the sun during his daily voyage over the heavenly ocean; but, later, this was anticipated for every one who should be 'found pure.'

³ But Hat-hor has nothing to do with 'Astar; nor has the (Nubian?) deity 'Anuket anything to do with 'Onka, as Semitists have sometimes asserted.

⁵ Murder, adultery, slander, theft, fraud, robbery of the dead, sacrilege, etc.

Every deceased person was even expected to become Osiris himself, and is addressed as 'Osiris So-and-So.' The dead were allowed to visit the earth occasionally—not at night but in the day-time—assuming the form of different animals.¹ At night they returned to their tombs, or to the lower world,—places which are rarely distinguished in a clear way.

Various conflicting doctrines are intermingled—e.g., the belief that the souls of the departed are the stars or dwell in the stars (which are by others explained as the dispersed members of the slain Sun-god Osiris: see above, § 14), that all shadows² must live in darkness and misery in the nether-world, persecuted by evil spirits, so that it is best for the dead person to become, by witchcraft, one of these evil monsters himself, and that the soul, in the form of a half-human bird³ (bai), lives in or near the grave, hungry, and dependent entirely upon the offerings of food and drink deposited at the tomb. Sometimes the oases of the Western desert are identified with the fields of the dead. The Egyptian priests never put themselves to any trouble to harmonise these and other contradictory traditions; they contented themselves rather with providing that magic formulæ and prayers adapted to each of them were made and collected. On these collections, see below, § 20.

The care bestowed upon the worship of the dead is very remarkable. The huge pyramids of the most

18. Worship of the dead. ancient kings, the detached tombs of their officials (now called by Egyptianologists maštābas—an Arabic word), the interior of which was covered with sculptures, and the long rock-galleries, especially at Thebes, testify that the Egyptians devoted greater zeal than any other nation on earth to the abodes and the memory of their dead, and to the sustenance of their souls by sacrifices. This care is shown also in the practice of embalming;⁴ cp EMBALMING.

Originally only the nobles were able to pay for mummification, with its costly spices (and natron) and its skilful wrapping in layers of linen, by which means some mummies have survived 4000 years without great change. Later, however, cheaper methods, such as dipping the body into hot asphalt, made the custom almost universal. The 'forty days of embalming' (Gen. 50 3) after removal of the intestines (which were then placed in the four jars, erroneously called canopes, representing often four tutelary demons) and the brain, and the 'seventy days of lamenting,' are usual. The face was frequently gilt; the wrapped body was put in one or two cases of wood or cartonnage, of human form, more or less painted and ornamented; wealthy people enclosed these, again, in large stone sarcophagi.

All this seems to point to a primitive belief that the soul would live only as long as the body existed, though this is indeed nowhere expressly stated. Later, the reason was given that the soul liked to be near the body, and would sometimes even return into it or into a statue of the dead. The distinction between the soul (bai), the shadow (paibet), and the double (ka) which always accompanies a man in life and seems to receive the soul after death, was by no means clear even to Egyptian dogmatists, and is quite obscure for us.

The tombs had annexed to them a chapel for offering to the statue of the ka,⁵ which stood in an adjoining small, dark room, the latter connected with the chapel by a small window or hole in order to let the smell of incense, etc., penetrate to the soul in the statue.

Besides real offerings, pictures of food were given; these had the advantage of durability, and were, by the help of magic, as efficacious as real bread and meat. Often a basin of water before the tomb furnished drink for the soul, and trees were planted round it, 'that the soul might sit under their shady branches.' The sarcophagus was deposited in a pit, which was filled up with stones and sand (except in the case of rock tombs, already safe enough). The poor were, of course, less luxuriously housed. They were massed in simple pits leased by undertakers. All tombs were situated in the desert, the arable land being much too scarce and costly.

Whilst it can hardly be proved that the religious ideas of the Egyptians ever influenced the belief of the Hebrews

19. Ritual. (the so-called 'golden calves' [see CALF, § 2] were certainly no imitation of the Apis cult, all kinds of animals being sacred at one place or another in Egypt), it cannot well be denied that the ritual laws and laws of purity of the Hebrews often seem to follow the analogy of the later Egyptian customs. The priests had to observe scrupulous cleanliness, to shave all hair (hence their bald heads, imitated in the Roman tonsure), to wear only linen, and to abstain from all unclean food, this being very much the same as among the Hebrews.¹ See above (§ 9) on the uncleanness (especially) of the swine.

¹ This was misunderstood by the Greeks. A migration of souls in the Indian sense was unknown to the Egyptians.

Some parts of every animal (the head?) were forbidden. Eggs were not to be eaten. Contact with dead bodies defiled, notwithstanding the cult of the dead. Embalmers, therefore, were unclean. Circumcision, for which, as for all ritual purposes, only stone knives were to be used (cp Josh. 5.2), was general for both sexes from time immemorial (see CIRCUMCISION). The method of killing and offering animals, the burning of incense (upon bronze censers of ladle form?), the ablutions, and many other ritualistic details, were similar to those practised among the Israelites. Human sacrifices occurred in the earlier times (see ISAAC); later, cakes in human form seem to have been substituted.

The priests, called 'the pure,'³ u'êb(u), formed a well-organised hierarchy in four (later five) classes (φουλαί), with many degrees, from the common priest to the high-priest ruling over the principal temple of the nomos or over the temples of several nomes.⁴ The priestly career seems to have been open, theoretically, to every boy of Egyptian descent who studied the canon of sacred books (forty-two, according to Greek tradition) in the temple-school; whether this was the case in practice we do not know. The highest dignities at least were more or less in the hands of certain families of the aristocracy.⁵ Women were not admitted to the regular priesthood. Priestesses appear later only under the title of 'singers' of the divinity. They formed the choirs.

The religious literature was not so rich as the masses of manuscripts from the tombs might lead one to suppose.

20. Religious literature.

The catalogue of the library of a large temple at Edfu enumerates only thirty-six books, mostly ritualistic. The earliest texts would be the old books from which come the inscriptions (of about 3000 lines) in five pyramids belonging to dynasties 5 and 6 (see below, § 46) which were opened in 1881. More than any other religious texts, they bear a magical character. After 2000 B.C. another large collection came into use, the 'Book of going out in daytime,' now commonly called the 'Book of the dead.'⁶ This is not a theological compendium, 'the Bible of the Ancient Egyptians,' as it has been very unsuitably designated. It contains mostly magic formulae, often of a very nonsensical character, for the protection and guidance of the dead in the lower world, and the confusion of doctrines of which we spoke above. Thousands of copies—some over a hundred feet long and with very elaborate pictures, and others brief extracts, giving one or two of the chapters—are among the chief attractions of our museums of antiquities.⁷

¹ These laws were less scrupulously observed in earlier times. See above (§ 9 n.) on the restrictions with regard to fish. Those offering sacrifices had to abstain also from game, evidently because it was not properly bled.

⁶ De Rougé incorrectly called it 'le rituel funéraire.'

The Book of respiration (Say n sosen), the book May my name flourish, and the Book of passing through eternity,¹ are shorter imitations. The large Book of that which is in the nether-world (ami-duat, Lanzone ['79]?)—a very fanciful and mysterious book, more of pictures than of texts, which ornaments many sarcophagi—still awaits a critical edition (abridg. version, Jéquier).

The scientific side of theology is represented by a fragment of a commentary (Berlin); other commentaries, consisting of symbolical expositions, form part of the Book of the Dead (ch. 17). Sacred geography was a favourite study (Pap. of Tanis and of Lake Moeris).³ Rituals—such as that for burial (ed. Schiaparelli, '82), that for embalming (Maspero), and that for the cult of Amon and Mut (Berlin)—are found, and many hymns in praise of gods or temples. They are of little originality.⁴ On contemplative and speculative religion not one line has been preserved, and certainly there was not much of it. The priests were too content with the old traditions.

The didactic literature bears a practical character and is entirely secular. 'The Exhortations of Any' (Pap.

21. Didactic literature. Bulak 4, transl. by Chabas in l'Égyptologie; also by Amélineau in La Morale Égypte.) are a really beautiful collection of moral rules. Small demotic ethical papyri have been published by Pierret and Revillout.⁵

The Praise of Scholastic Studies (Pap. Sallier 2, Anast. 7)⁶ is full of sarcastic humour, but too prosy for modern taste; the 'Papyrus Prisse' (Chabas, Virey, partly Griffith; see World's Best Lit. 5327) is of stilted obscurity. All these works belong to the classical period of the Middle Empire.

Several later imitations of the Praise of Scholastic Studies were frequently used as copying exercises for schoolboys, in order to instil love of study. For the rest, the many school-books contain exercises of rhetorical aim. The 'Story of the Eloquent Peasant' (Griffith ib.), and 'The Man tired of Life' (Erman ['96]) belong to this category.

We see from inscriptions and other representations that the Egyptians had a tolerable knowledge of

22. Science. astronomy—the high priest of Heliopolis was called the 'chief astronomer.' We owe to them our modern (Julian) calendar; but they themselves used in common life a year of twelve months (of thirty days each) and five epagomenæ, or additional days (without any intercalation). The astronomical year, called Sothic because marked by the 'rising' of Sothis (Sirius), was known, but not in popular use.⁷

Ptolemy III. found a reform of the calendar to be an urgent need. His attempt to effect it, however, in 238 B.C., proved a failure. Much superstition in regard to these matters is discernible; cp the Calendar of lucky and unlucky days (transl. Chabas, '70). The hours were determined by observing the position of the celestial bodies with the instrument figured below.⁸ No scientific astronomical work has come down to us; but we have a mathematical handbook (London, ed. Eisenlohr) which shows that the Egyptians were not so far advanced in mathematics as, e.g., the Babylonians.⁹ High admiration of Egyptian medicine was shown throughout the ancient world, and even mediæval medicine is full of Egyptian elements.¹⁰ The medical papyri (Berlin ed. Brugsch; unpublished MSS or Berlin and London; treatises on female diseases and veterinary art in Griffith's Kahun papyri; above all, the great papyrus Ebers at Leipsic, written about 1600 B.C.) show, however, little practical knowledge, and a surprising ignorance of anatomy, as against an abundance of superstition and silly sorcery.¹

(This English work gives translations of almost the whole literature of Egypt; but in the first series these are often of very questionable character. The second series shows improvement in this respect. Excellent translations by Griffith of a large part of the Egyptian literature have just appeared in The World's Best Literature [1897], p. 5225 ff. [the hymn in question, p. 5309].

⁸ Arithmetical fragments also in Griffith's Kahun papyri.

There are a good many books of magic (with many religious and some medical elements)—partly lawful magic (cp. e.g., Chabas, Le pap. Magique 23. Magic. Harris, '57), partly forbidden witchcraft (Leyden). The latter was threatened with capital punishment (cp pap. Lee). Thus we see that the country of Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim. 3 8) was the true home of all kinds of magic (Is. 19 3). It would be quite wrong, however, to ascribe the miracles performed by the pharaoh's magicians (Ex. 7, etc.) to anything else than jugglery (see SERPENT, § 32), for there was far less knowledge of natural science in Egypt than, e.g., in Greece.

Even historiography was not highly developed. There were chronicles of single reigns—a panegyric specimen has been preserved in the great papyrus Harris I., referring to Ramses III. (about the largest papyrus in existence; ed. Birch); on the lists of kings see below, § 41; but no larger works of scientific character were in the hands of Manetho when he undertook to compose a history of Egypt for the Greeks (see below, § 41). The poverty of his material forced him to use even popular novels as sources. Nor was grammar ever studied in a scientific way, or textual criticism applied to the sacred writings. All literary works were, accordingly, more exposed to corruption than they were in any other country of antiquity.

If we find all ancient nations filled with boundless admiration for Egyptian science,² we can account for this only by the mysterious difficulty of all Egyptian writing, into the secrets of which a foreigner could rarely penetrate. In fact, the Babylonians as well as the Greeks were far superior to the Egyptians in everything that required serious thinking. What Egypt produced, however, in the way of literature designed to amuse and entertain is worthy of our highest admiration. The number of fanciful tales, very similar to those of the Arabian Nights, and of historical novels (with much imagination and little true history) is considerable,³ and some—e.g., that of 'The Doomed Prince' (a papyrus in London)—are of charming form. Moreover, in their popular poetry, especially in their love songs, the Egyptians come much nearer to our taste than do most oriental peoples.⁴ Many hymns in praise of kings and their deeds have survived. The only attempt at an epic, however, is the song, inscribed upon so many temple walls, commemorating the battle of Kadesh, won by Ramses II.; for modern taste it lacks vigour and is too long. The other eulogies do not come up to it.

A satirical poem on bad minstrels,¹ and a collection of stories on animals, embodying Æsopic fables (which seems to show that these fables originated, possibly, in Egypt), are to be found only in demotic copies. All poetry followed the parallelism of members (like Hebrew poetry) and certain rude rhythms (counting only words with full accent, and disregarding the number of syllables); it sometimes observed alliteration, but never rhyme. Much more may be expected from recent finds.

Of the music connected with this poetry we cannot say much. All oriental instruments were known—the simple monochord,² the large harp,³ the flute, the tambourine, etc. Clapping of hands and shaking of the sistrum (σίστρον, a metal rattle)⁴ accompanied the simple tunes. The professional musicians were mostly blind men. See Music.

The government was the most absolute monarchy known to antiquity. The despotic power of the king was greatest in dynasties 4 to 5 and 18 to 20 (also 26)—the periods of complete centralisation. On the decentralising tendencies of the counts or nomarchs (hereditary under weaker dynasties), and on the changing royal residences etc., see below, § 41 ff. The most influential officer of the kingdom, the administrator of the whole empire, or grand-vizier, was the er-pa-ti. The fa-ti had the general administration of justice.

Among the titles of courtiers that of 'Fan-bearer at the left of the king' carried with it the greatest honour. After dynasty 18 the 'cup-bearers (wabe, uba) of the king, although often only foreign slaves, became as influential as the Mamlûks of the Middle Ages, because they were charged with the most confidential commissions. The titles of the court and of the officials of the royal palace, harem, stable, kitchen, brewery, etc., are just as abundant as the offices for the administration of the country and its counties (e.g., royal scribes, inspectors of the granaries, clerks of the soldiers, scribe of the nomos, etc.). Most of these scribes were at the same time priests. The king generally gave audiences from a balcony of the palace.

Of the laws we do not know much. We have sufficient material in the shape of legal documents only in demotic papyri from dynasty 26 downwards.⁵ These documents are based upon the code of laws given or collected by the great legislator Bocchoris (about 730 B.C.; see below, § 65). Former institutions are less known.⁶ We find (only after 2000 B.C.) the remarkable institution of the jury,⁷ a committee of officers and priests—i.e., educated men—appointed by the government for every day to sit in judgment. They were paid by the litigants. On criminal law⁸ we possess acts relating to spoiliations of tombs, to conspiracy against the king, and to forbidden sorcery. Criminals were examined by means of torture and blows. The rod was used as much as the kurbaj is at present. Bastinado (up to 100 strokes) upon hands and feet, cutting off the nose and the ears, deportation to frontier places (Rhincolūra, e.g.,—see EGYPT, RIVER OF, § 1—had its name from the exiles with 'mutilated noses'), to the oases, or to the gold mines in the glowing Nubian desert, and impalement ('hanged,' EV of Gen. 40:22 is incorrect), were the punishments. In the case of persons of higher rank suicide was allowed to take the place of capital punishment.

In civil law, we are struck with the fact that woman was on a perfect equality with man and occupied a higher position than she did in almost any other country of the ancient world. For example, a married woman could hold property of her own, and might lend from it to her husband upon good security, such as his house.

In marriage, the greatest divergence from later Hebrew custom was in sister-marriage, which in Egypt was as common as marrying the cousin is among the Semites. The majority had their sisters as wives; there seem to have been no forbidden degrees of relationship. Polygamy was permitted, but occurred rarely. Marriage was usually concluded on the basis of a financial agreement, such high indemnities being fixed for the wife in case of divorce or polygamy that expelling her without the most serious reasons should have become impossible. A wife with such legal security was called 'mistress of the house, and well distinguished from the concubine (called 'sister'). Nobles maintained secluded harems in the Asiatic manner; but the 'wife' always enjoyed as much liberty inside and outside of the house as our women, as is shown by the story of Potiphar's wife.¹ Veiling the face was unknown. Adultery was followed by capital punishment for both offenders (contrast Gen. 39:20, J).

It will be seen, especially from our review of the literature, that the prevalent views with regard to the

30. Character. national character of the Egyptians are erroneous. They were quite religious (i.e., superstitious) according to the views of such superstitious nations as the Greeks and the Romans. Far from being contemplative, however, they were rather superficial—not only in religion, but also in science, literature, etc.—and more inclined to the gay side of things. We nowhere find deep thinking, everywhere full enjoyment of life. Their art is full of humour; even the walls of their 'eternal abodes' or tombs are partly covered with drinking and playing scenes and with jokes for inscriptions. Their morality was rather lax. Drunkenness seems to have been not rare. To judge by the many complaints, the great host of officers in the service of the king or the temples were even more corrupt than the bureaucracy of other oriental states. Speaking generally, neither bravery nor honesty seems to have been a national virtue.¹

Even in the cult of the dead strange contradictions are visible. Paupers, of whom there were many, broke into most of the tombs of the wealthy soon after burial, and no military protection could prevent even the royal tombs from being ransacked. Even the educated, who expected to be examined by Osiris if they ever disturbed the rest of any dead person, would often appropriate for their own mummies the property, tomb, or equipment of a deceased person who was unprotected. Foundations of real estate for the support of the dead—i.e., for furnishing the sacrifices—never lasted long.

The best part of the population, undoubtedly, was to be found, not in the haughty 'scribes' and priests (ideas for the most part coinciding), but in the peasants. These were just as simple in their habits, just as laborious, just as poor, and just as patient under their continual oppression, as the modern jellāhin. Most of them were serfs—of the king, or of temples, or of landowners. Their worst oppression was the hard taskwork described in Ex. 1. Serfs were branded with the owner's name. The cities held a large proletariat—the free 'working men.'²

It was formerly assumed that there were castes. This is, however, a mistake. The sons of the many priests would naturally acquire more easily than

31. Classes. others the learning which distinguished their fathers. The eldest son, too, of a soldier inherited, with the field of his father, which was a fief from the government, also the duty of serving as μάχιμος—i.e., soldier, or policeman. The tombstones, however, frequently represent families of whom one member was a soldier, another a priest, another an artisan, and so on. If, in the time of Herodotus,³ the shepherds were despised and did not intermarry with the rest of the people, the explanation lies in their unclean foreign descent ('Amē, 'Asiatic,' was synonymous with 'shepherd'; cp Gen. 43:32). Swineherds had a still lower position. The same may hold good of the sailors, merchants, and interpreters of foreign origin; at that time, too, the soldiers were mostly descendants of foreigners (Libyans).

Formerly, when foreign elements in the country were few, the distinctions just referred to were less marked;

32. Army. only the soldiers always had a strong foreign element. The Egyptians were not warlike, and, even in the earliest times, they employed by preference mercenaries.

The first to be employed were negroes and brown Africans (the name of the Mazy archers from the Red Sea became synonymous with 'police'); after 1500 B.C. Syrians and Europeans; after 1200 B.C., in increasing numbers, Libyans (Mašawaša, etc.), who became the privileged mercenaries, and rebelled continually against the competition of Carians and Greeks after 650 B.C. (cp the mixed armies of Egypt, Jer. 469 Ezek. 27 10, etc.). The charioteers,¹ however, were mostly Egyptians.² Besides small fiefs of ground, the native soldiers seem to have received at least their maintenance during active service. The mercenaries had agricultural holdings also as part of their pay. Horses and equipment were lent by the government. The officers passed through a training school (saḥabu, Semitic?) as youths.

The national weapons were bow, throwing-stick³ (only before 1600), war-axe, club,⁴ scythe-formed sword,⁵ short spear (rarely javelin), and straight sword.⁶ Apart from the shield,⁷ not much armour (coats-of-mail—of leather, or thick linen, sometimes with metal scales) was used, except in the case of the charioteers. In sieges, the testudo and the battering-ram of the ancients appear, but none of the complicated war-machines used by the Assyrians. The soldiers marched to the sound of long hand-drums and at trumpet-signals. They were divided into regiments, each with its own standard, usually a god or divine symbol upon

Lack of personal courage made the sea-trade of the Egyptians also very insignificant.

The import of olive oil (from Palestine), wine (from Phœnicia), beer (Asia Minor), wood, metal, wool, etc., and the export of grain (usually monopolised by the government), linen, papyrus, small works of art in glass, porcelain, metal, and ivory, were mostly in the hands of the Phœnicians. Naval expeditions on the Red Sea for incense were rare, owing (partly) to the great scarcity of wood in Egypt and on the desert coast of the Red Sea, where the ships had to be constructed.

FIG. 5.—Syrian princes on Lebanon felling trees for Sethos I. After Rosellini.

Not till Persian times did the important commercial position of Egypt—as forming the connecting link between the Red and the Mediterranean Seas, and between Europe, Asia, and Africa—begin to be realised.

The majority of the people always had agricultural occupations. Originally, the holdings of the priests (and soldiers) were exempt from the heavy taxation of one-fifth (Gen. 47 20 f.; see JOSEPH II., § 9); later this immunity was interfered with because it withdrew too much from the income of the government. In agriculture, the most primitive implements were always used, such as wooden hoes,⁸ and ploughs⁹ drawn by oxen or by men. Such simple appliances presupposed the softening of the ground by the yearly inundation. The irrigation of the higher fields was likewise effected with simple machinery.¹ Harvesting (in March—with some growths two harvests are possible), treading out the grain by cattle (rarely threshing with the threshing-wain, ḳḳw), winnowing, etc., were carried out very much in the same way as in Palestine (cp also AGRICULTURE, §§ 2-10). On the granaries² see PITHOM.

The industries were highly developed. The renowned Egyptian linen (the best kinds being called ḳḳw, βύσσανος—and 35. Industries. ḳḳw, Egyptian ses; see LINEN) was manufactured especially by the poor bondsmen of the temples, shut up at certain times in an athu or 'workhouse' for weaving. The temples drew a large portion of their income from this linen manufacture. Cp Is. 199 (and 1. 10, where read ḳḳw with ḳ, see SBOT, ad loc.), Pr. 7 16 Ezek. 27 7. In pottery only the more common ware was made. Glass seems to have been not a Phœnician but an Egyptian invention (cp PHœNICIA, GLASS, § 1). The so-called Egyptian porcelain or glazed pottery (faience), mostly green or blue, in imitation of the two most precious stones (malachite and lapis lazuli), furnished the material for small figures, amulets (especially in the form of scarabs—beetles that were supposed to bring good luck), and other ornaments, which found their way, through the Phœnicians, westwards even to Spain. The products of the goldsmiths, who also employed enamel very skilfully, are admirable; the ivory-carvings were renowned. In general, the smaller articles (utensils, ornaments, etc.) display the best taste; all minute ornamentation was the delight of the Egyptians.

The art³ of Egypt exercised a most powerful influence upon all surrounding countries, especially upon Phœnicia,

36. Art. where an imitation of the Egyptian style became the national art. Solomon's temple was in Egyptian style. The Egyptian ornaments, derived from the plants and flowers of the country, especially the lotus and papyrus, penetrated the whole ancient world. The paintings⁴ (preserved mostly as wall decoration) have a very childish appearance, from their lack of perspective and of shading;⁵ but they possess the merit of great faithfulness—e.g., in all representations of animals, foreign nations, etc. (compare Fig. 3). The decorative sculptures (rarely in relief, mostly incised or in a sunk relief, always painted) exhibit the same odd principles of perspective, in accordance with which, e.g., the face was always represented in profile, but the eye as though seen from the front, the shoulders from the front, the legs in profile, and so on. This was not awkwardness, but a principle traditionally handed down from the childhood of art; and we can still observe how some sculptors struggled against this strait-jacket. In spite of this disadvantage, some artists of the earliest times (dyns. 4-6) drew scenes full of vivacity and of delicate execution, much superior to the similar Assyrio-Babylonian and archaic Greek sculptures (which all had, by the way, similar perspective). Later, art became more and more conventionalised. The superiority of the earliest period appears also in the statues. The realism of some of the earliest portraits was never again attained. As early as 1600 B.C. the portraits began to lose in vigour and to betray a suspicious similarity one to another. The New Empire, in marked contrast with the Middle Empire (dyn. 12), looked more to quantity than to quality. After dynasty 26, art sank to a very low level. (On the realism of the 'Reformation period,' and the archaic renaissance in dynasty 26, see below, § 67.) Of course, the statues (almost invariably painted) have only a few conventional positions. The technical ventionalised), and betray that their origin is to be sought in ancient wooden constructions.¹ The sloping walls show that originally Nile mud was another material in general use for all kinds of buildings. The arch was known from the earliest times (dyn. 6?), but was rarely used for stone structures. The elliptic arch was preferred in the case of buildings of brick. The foundations of temples, threatened by infiltration of ground water, were laid on thick layers of sand.

Some characteristic features of temple architecture may be mentioned.

A pair of obelisks² stood at the entrance (the surface often gilt, the pyramidal top frequently of metal: their religious—probably solar—meaning was forgotten; but they remind us of the massébas of the Semites; cp Is. 19 19 Jer. 43 13³); galleries of sphinxes⁴—the symbol of wisdom—and of similar sacred beings led to the gate which was crowned by the symbol of the winged disk;⁵ broad 'pylons'⁶ resembling fortress-walls protected the entrance on either side.

The largest existing temple, that of Karnak, was originally only a modest building of dynasty 12. Every great king added a new court or a hall, and the entrance pylons finally came to stand in the interior of the complex. Many temples had a similar growth. The divinity, however, dwelt not in these courts or halls, but in a small dark chapel in the centre, where it usually sat in a sacred boat. Sacred lakes near the temples were frequent.

The principal temple ruins are at Karnak, Luxor, Kurna, Medinet Häbü (all included in ancient Thebes), Abydos, Edfu, Esneh, Omhos, Philæ; in Nubia at Dakhla, Kalāshsh, Bē el-Wālī, Dendūr, Gēf Hūsēn, Dakkeh, Sebta, Amāda, Aht-Simbel, Soleb. Jebel-Barkal (Napata) and Merōē are imitations by Ethiopian kings.

Secular architecture was much lighter, the only materials used being wood, and Nile mud mixed with stubble (Ex. 5 11) made into sun-dried bricks. The many royal palaces have on this account all disappeared, although some of their sumptuous ornamentations (mosaics and glazed tiles) have remained.

Wealthy subjects had the same kind of house (with an open court in the centre) that we still find in the modern East; the poor dwelt in mere clay huts, such as those occupied by the modern fellāhīn.

The tombs had an architecture of their own. Where possible, they were long galleries hewn in the rock (especially at Thebes). The pyramid⁷ was the characteristic form of royal tombs from dyn. 3 to dyn. 12, and was frequently imitated by private persons on a smaller scale, and in brick instead of stone.

The question has very often been asked how the Egyptians erected edifices of such stupendous size, and monolithic monuments⁸ that would tax the skill even of our age of improved mechanical appliances. It would be very wrong to ascribe these achievements to the use of complicated machinery. Everything was done in the simplest possible way, by an unlimited command of perfection, however, was always great (see Fig. 6), and it was for a long time a mystery how diorite and basalt could have been cut and polished with copper, bronze, and flint instruments. It seems that for the hardest work diamond or corundum cutters were used (see DIAMOND, § 1). (On the excellent material available for sculptors, see above, § 3.) It may be mentioned here that in daily life flint instruments were, for reasons of economy, used long after 2000 B.C. The stone and the bronze ages, therefore, coincided, and touched upon the iron age (iron prevailing after 1000 B.C., copper preceding the bronze).¹

The architecture is well known for its massiveness. This was relieved by the abundance of ornaments upon walls and pillars, and by the polychromy.

That the ornamentation was originally derived from the forms of certain plants is seen especially in the ornamental columns² with capitals.³ They represent the lotus-flower both in full bloom and in bud, bundles of papyrus, and palm-trees (often strongly con-

¹ Bronze was called hesmen, a word connected with ἕσμη (Brugsch), which may be an Egyptian loan-word (cp METALS).

² After the manner of the caryatides of Greek art, figures of Osiris are frequently used; but these always lean against a pillar.

The head of Hathor (with cow's ears) (perhaps originally an ox-skull) as a capital for columns is the only other ancient instance of the human form being employed in architecture.

¹ This can be said also of the famous fluted columns of Beni-Hasan, which remind one strongly of the Doric column.

⁴ Female sphinxes (representing queens) are rare.

human forces; and we have to admire far more the energy than the engineering skill. Pictures show how immense monolithic monuments were moved over wooden rollers, smaller stones on a sledge (see Fig. 8).

The influence of Egyptian civilisation upon Syria appears strongly in its metrology. For example, the Egyptian 38. Measures. ōpe[ʃ]—i.e., 'measure') and the liquid measure Hin (Egyptian hain(u), 'pot') were adopted by the Hebrews. The weight system (1 deben—i.e., 90-96 grammes or $\frac{1}{4}$ lb.—had 10 kidet of 1.40 grains) was decimal, in opposition to the Babylonian sexagesimal system. The cubits, however,—the large or royal cubit of 0.525 metres (about 20 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches), and the small cubit of 0.450 metres (about 17 $\frac{3}{4}$ inches), which existed side by side (subdivisions being the span, palm, finger, etc.)—are said to be borrowed from Babylonia (?). The subject is very complicated, and some measures—such as the largest measure of area, the σχοῖνος (said to contain 12,000 cubits?)—present great difficulties.

On the other hand, it is certain that in Egypt a form of money very similar to our present coin was used—rings or thick wire in spiral form (deben)¹ originally of copper, later also of gold, finally of silver. This metal, 'white gold,'² not being found in Africa, had originally higher value than gold, but after 1600 B.C. it became more frequent, and soon was the common standard of money.

The manners and customs of Ancient Egypt,³ which the Greeks found to be in as direct opposition as possible to their own, were less different from those of the settled Semites. The Egyptians prided themselves on their great cleanliness (cp Gen. 41 14). They shaved their faces and clipped their hair (the priests shaved it off), wearing artificial beards⁴ (at least at religious ceremonies) and wigs. Indeed, the chief decoration of the upper classes consisted of wigs of enormous size. Garments were made not, as with the Semites, of wool, but mostly of cleanly white linen.

¹  ² This is what the hieroglyphic expression means. It would seem that 'electron,' gold with an admixture of silver, called weseni (the initial is doubtful, the connection with ἀσημος improbable) also had higher value than gold.

³ On this and most of the preceding subjects see Erman, Egyptian Life (ET 1894). The admirable pioneer work of Wilkinson, Manners and Customs ('36), is, in its text at least, completely antiquated; as also is the second edition, by Birch ('78). Very concise, and (in part) very readable, is Brugsch, Die Ägyptologie ('81); but he is too much averse from Erman's critical division of periods. It would be out of place here to attempt to trace the various developments of Egyptian manners during 3000 years; the biblical period (1600 to 500 B.C.) is what chiefly concerns us.

The shape of garments constantly varied, according to fashion; but we can observe that in the earliest times men were satisfied with simple raiment, a short skirt being sufficient even for noblemen. Later, these wore several suits, one over another, skilfully plaited. The fanciful and archaic dress of the king, with his manifold double and triple symbolical crowns,¹ would require a chapter for itself. Dignitaries were distinguished by their staves,² also by the flagellum,³ the signet-ring,⁴ and the necklace.⁵

For men and women alike the commonest adornment was the wearing of ornaments of precious metal, or at least flowers,⁶ round the neck. Such collars of gold were the principal decoration given by the king as a reward to faithful officers or brave soldiers. Princes and some priests had their hair tied in a tress⁷ on one side of the head. Painting of the eyelids, which in Syria was reserved for women (z K. 930), was practised by both sexes. A black stripe, formed by the so-called stibium (see PAINT), outlined the eyes above, a green stripe below.⁸ Unguents for the hair and body played a great part. Sandals (especially of papyrus) were common; shoes were rare. At night, the African head-rest⁹ was used (originally in order not to disarrange the artificial head-dress), and the face covered.

The Egyptians were just as ceremonious as other Orientals. The common mode of salutation was by dropping the arms;¹⁰ prostration ('kissing the ground') marked highest respect; in prayer the hands were lifted up.¹¹

Of their amusements the following may be mentioned:—fowling (with the snare, or with the boomerang or throwing-stick), fishing, and various games, such as that called mora by the modern Italians, and a kind of checkers, of which they were so fond that they sought to secure it by magic for the souls of the dead. Dancing was left chiefly to women, for the delight of spectators.

Although religion declared all foreigners unclean, the Egyptians were not hostile to foreign associations and influences. In dynasties 18-20, indeed, imitation of Asiatic manners became such a fashion that the educated had to a large extent Semitic names and spoke a mixture of Egyptian and Canaanitish. A strong reaction, however, seems to have set in especially after 800 B.C.

The names used by the Ancient Egyptians¹² were less poetic than those of the civilised Semites. Simple names, such as 'little' (šery)—sometimes

40. Names. even 'dwarf' (nm, d[n]rg)—'fair face,' 'big headed' (šišoy), 'cross-eyed' (komen), prevail, especially in the earlier period. 'I wished,' 'I saw,' 'he cried,' etc. refer to circumstances of birth, etc. 'Maternal uncle' (sen-mau[et], 'mother's brother') is not uncommon (see KINSHIP). Some names are intended for good omens or to express parental pride:—hou nofer, 'the good day'; nefer- (or was-šau, 'good (or prosperous) circumstances'; uscrtesen, 'their wealth' (i.e., of the parents); 'mother's ornament' (bes-n-mawet), 'the land in joy' (ta-m-rešout), 'gold in Heliopolis', 'gold on the way', 'coming in peace' (or 'luck', y-m-hotep). Names of animals of all sorts are used: not only 'lion,' 'monkey,' 'dog,' 'frog' (krur), 'tadpole' (hefenu), etc., but also names of unclean animals: 'mouse' (pin) and 'pig' (rivet) are favourite girls' names.

Comical names, such as we should have expected a superstitious nation to dread as ill-omened, are met with. Thus, e.g. (Liebl. 1784), an unfortunate infant retained for life the designation 'offal-swallower' (m-brud). The Egyptians evidently attached less importance to the name than was usual with other nations. The many senseless syllables—mere babblings, such as Ay, Ata, Teye—which can be explained only as pet names (like the English Bob, Tom, and Dick)—confirm this.

Names with a religious signification were, of course, quite frequent. They praise a god (Ptah is beautiful, powerful, etc.)—e.g., Set-naħi(e) 'S. (is?) strong,' Amon-em-ħē't, 'Amon in the first place,' extols a local god over the others. 'Beloved by' or 'loving' a god (mer [vulgar, mev, mi]-Amun,¹ me(r)-en(e)-Ptah), 'Amon is satisfied' (Amen-hotep), etc., are common; even 'dog of Horus' occurs. Sobk-em-sauf, 'the god S. (stands) behind him,' and the like, boast of divine protection. The 'sons' and 'daughters' of all possible gods are very common; but of 'brothers' of a god only two or three doubtful examples are known. Ameny, Setoy, 'of Amon, of Set,' ns(i)-Bi-n-āde, 'belonging to Mendes,' and the thankful p-ed-Amun, whom 'Amon gave,' belong to the same category. 'Amon in (his) ship, in (his) festival' (cp Har-em-hebe, of Horus), and in (his) rising, may be intended as comparisons. In 'Isis in the marshes' and 'Horus in the lake' we have examples of mythological allusions—Ra-mes-su ('Παμεσσος'), 'the sun begot him,' Dhut(i)-mose, 'the god Thout born' (i.e., incarnate), say a good deal. Very remarkable is the late usage of employing the name of the divinity itself—e.g., Isis, Hor (not Osiris, which would be too ill-omened), Har-pe-ħrad (H. the child), Har-si-ēse (H. the son of Isis), ħons(u)—deities of the Osirian circle and the goddess of love Hat-ħor, (paraphrased in 'mistress of Byblos'; cp § 14) being, in particular, very common.²

The more complicated names were introduced, for the most part, by the kings (e.g., Nefer-ke-rē, 'fine is the double of the Sun,' etc.), who, from dynasty 5 onwards, always had two names; these and the various regular titles and surnames were imitated or exaggerated by loyal subjects. Loyalty is frequently expressed by names such as 'King X. is satisfied, well, powerful,' which were regarded as specially suitable for holders of office. Sometimes these names are as long as Babylonian names. Of foreign names, Semitic formations were quite popular from dynasty 18 onwards (see § 39), Libyan names even before dynasty 22; later we meet with Ethiopic and other names.

In treating the history³ of Egypt, we find the greatest difficulty⁴ in the chronology. The Egyptians

² In the earliest examples, however, the possessive ending -y may be supplied. This could be suppressed in writing, as was the case in the earliest Hebrew orthography.

³ Maspero's huge History of the Ancient Orient (three volumes, 1895 to 1909) is perhaps best up to date, and specially valuable for its ample references; but its system of transliteration of names will be found confusing. Petrie's History of Egypt, still [1900] incomplete, is a very useful collection of material and the best available work in English. An English Meyer, however,—i.e., a readable history—by the side of the English Wiedemann (Petrie), is still a desideratum.

⁴ Another great difficulty is the transcription of names. The reader must bear in mind that Egyptian was written (like primitive Hebrew, only still more 'defectively') without vowels. It is full of abbreviations; letters (especially liquid consonants) are often suppressed; and some confusion of r and l, etc., is had no eras, but reckoned by the years of their kings.

For practical use long lists of kings had to be kept. The only list preserved of History. (at Turin) is very fragmentary, and the extracts from Manētho (Μανέθων; Μανέθως in Euseb.), a priest of Sebennytos,¹ about 270 B.C., the only Egyptian historian in the Greek language, have come down in a greatly corrupted state.² Besides, even in their original state, both sources (especially Manētho) seem to have been far from the attainment of absolute correctness. For convenience sake, we retain Manētho's reckoning of thirty-one dynasties (down to the Ptolemies), although his dynasties are not always correctly divided, and his chronological data cannot be safely used without a searching criticism. The attempts to use astrological dates—e.g., the fixed or Sothis year (see CHRONOLOGY, § 19)—have been, so far, not very successful.³

Champollion placed the beginning of dynasty I in 5867 B.C., Boeckh in 5702, Mariette in 5004; Petrie has placed it in 4777; Lepsius brought it down to 3892; and some have tried to bring it down much lower than 3000 B.C.

An accurate chronology for Egypt is possible, accordingly, only after 700 B.C. (CHRONOLOGY, § 20). Approximate dates can be given—thanks to the synchronism afforded by the Amāna tablets—back to about 1600 (ib., § 22). Thus far, there is no hope that the gaps in the Hyksos period and the preceding allowed. The Coptic forms are our greatest help towards recovering the pronunciation; but they frequently differ from the ancient language as much as might be expected after a development of 3000 years. Hence the greatest confusion reigns in Egyptological literature, some names being current in as many as a dozen forms. Every change of philological theory brings about a change of transliteration, and those who see the trouble which this causes are returning, as much as possible, to the Greek transliterations, where there are such, of Herodotus, Manētho, etc. Where, as often, there are none, this way of escaping the difficulties of wild guessing at the pronunciation fails. [How a different theory, which has the same object, works out, may be seen from Petrie's History already referred to.] The present writer has tried to be as conservative of customary forms as possible.

dynasties (13 and 14) will ever be filled up so as to allow similar certainty for the earliest times, although, e.g., dynasty 12 is fairly well known now [but see col. 1237, n. 3]. Modern writers have therefore, for the most part, given up trying to form complete chronological systems. The material at command is insufficient. At present the efforts of scholars are directed to finding minimum approximate dates.

Apart from the division into thirty-one dynasties (down to Alexander, according to Manétho), Egyptian history is commonly divided into three great periods: i. the Ancient Empire (Memphitic), dynasties 1-6; dynasties 7-10 may already be reckoned to ii. the Middle Empire: dynasties 11-13 (Theban period); the New Empire, from dynasty 17-18 to the end (Theban, Bubastide, Saitic, etc. periods).

The earliest history (before King Menes; see below) is filled by Egyptian tradition thus: first with the successive reigns on earth of the various gods (on the chronology the Egyptians, of course, disagreed very greatly), and then for 13,400 years with those of the Semsu-Hor, 'followers of (the Sun-god) Horus'—an expression absolutely equivalent to 'ancestors' (Manétho renders it awkwardly by πέρωνες or ἡρώες). Egyptologists are agreed that most probably this long period of kings too obscure to be enumerated, was the time during which Egypt was still divided, and that the first historic king was the ruler who united the two kingdoms; but see below on MENES, § 44.

The Egyptian traditions are unanimous that originally there were two kingdoms. The first was that of 'the 43. Prehistoric. Southern Land,' to-rēs(i), ἡτοῦ, with the twin cities Nehbet (Eileithyia, now El-Kāb) and Nehen (Hieraconpolis, opposite Eileithyia) for capital, and a king styled s(u)ṣṣni, who wore the white crown.¹ It had as emblem a kind of rush.² The second kingdom, whose rulers³ wore the red crown,⁴ and resided in Buto (anciently Pe), was to-emhyt(i), 'the Northern Land,' which had as its emblem the lotus(?)⁵ plant.⁶ Even the Roman emperors were still styled 'king of the Upper and the Lower country,'⁷ and were represented as such with the two crowns combined.⁸ It is unlikely, however, that any monument yet discovered goes back to the period of the separate kingdoms.

Still older is the division of Egypt into forty-two vouvoi or counties (thirty-six to forty-seven in Roman times after many changes), twenty-one of Upper and twenty-one of Lower Egypt. Each nomos had its own god (and totem?) and its own capital, and kept its distinct frontiers, its coat of arms, etc. down to very recent times. We may see in these counties, accordingly, traces of prehistoric kingdoms or tribes.

The beginnings of Egyptian civilisation reach back to this remote period. On the other hand, some barbarous survivals from it may be found in the later religion (see above, § 13), as also, among other things, in the decoration of the king, who always wore a leather appendage fastened to his short skirt⁹ (the whole reminding one of a lion's skin with tail). The recent attempts, especially those of Hommel, to prove the proto-Babylonian ('Sumerian') origin of the whole primeval culture of Egypt, imply, at least, great exaggerations. Some Semitic (not Sumerian) elements of culture seem to be noticeable in prehistoric times, and one or another trace of indirect Babylonian influence (through the Semites) might be admitted; but all these influences are very insignificant in comparison with the elements of native origin. Thus the general conception of pictographic writing might perhaps be borrowed from the Euphrates valley; but not a single sign taken from the Babylonian system can be found. Egyptian writing bears a thoroughly African stamp, no less than Egyptian art, manners, etc.

Recent investigations have revealed many traces of the earliest population—that of about the time of the first historical dynasty.¹ The Egyptians

44. First Dynasties. were more pastoral than later; their food, their burial customs, and so forth were still barbarous.² Already, however, they possessed the art of writing (greatly differing in detail, indeed, from the later system), and, at least at the courts of the kings, most arts were practised (though not as highly developed as in dyn. 3). It is still an open question whether the tomb (not the burning-place) of the first historical king Meny (Menes of the Greeks) has recently been discovered at Nakādeh,³ near the old city of Nubt (or Nebut, the same name as Ombos), the abode of the god Sēt (cp § 15; fig. 9 shows a tablet found at the same place bearing in archaic writing the word mn).⁴ Tombs of eight kings (of about dyn. 1) have been excavated near Abydos (at Umm el-Ga'ab) and the names of several other kings found there.⁵ We see now why Manétho said that dynasty 1 proceeded from This (Egyptian Tini, modern Girgeh?), near Abydos. That would explain the superiority of Upper Egypt over the northern country, perhaps also the spread of the Osiris-worship of Abydos over all Egypt. As regards the unification of Egypt see § 42, although it may be that the later

⁴ The word mn seems (so Wiedemann) to designate the tomb, not the king.

⁵ Amélineau, Fouilles d'Abydos ('96 ff.); more exhaustively, '99. Quibell's finds at Hieraconpolis, 1900, Petrie, Royal Tombs. An accurate arrangement and chronological determination of the earliest names of kings is not yet possible; neither can their names be transliterated with certainty.

Egyptian scholars, in beginning history with Menēs, acted arbitrarily or on unknown grounds, omitting those of Menēs' predecessors whom they were unable to classify. It is not impossible that some of the ancient kings of This precede him. On the tradition that Menēs built Memphis, and on the great sphinx near that city, cp MEMPHIS.

Of dynasty 2 (six to nine kings) we knew before only that the temple and worship of the kings Sendy (Sethenes in Manētho) and Per-eb-sen are mentioned perhaps a century later.

From dynasty 3 (nine kings) we have on monuments (hardly contemporary) the cult of Neb-ka or Nebkau-rē. King Zoser built the remarkable stepped (i.e., unfinished) pyramid at Saqqārah. (The pyramid as a form of royal tomb does not seem to have been known in dynasties 1 and 2.) His name has been found engraved upon the mountains of the Sinaitic peninsula. We may conclude that the copper-mines of the Sinaitic desert, from which the Egyptians drew almost all the copper so necessary for tools in the copper age, were already in the hands even of more ancient pharaohs. Later, various stories were carried back to the kings of the first three dynasties; sacred books were reported to have been written by them, or found by, or under, them; but all these traditions seem to be apocryphal.

The lists of kings drawn up in the fourteenth century B. C., upon which we have to rely for many names, are mere selections (not trustworthy even for the succession of the names). The whole period of dynasties 1 to 3, therefore, probably included at least 600 years (779, Manētho), possibly double that time. Thus Menēs might be placed near 4000 B. C.

Dynasty 4 lies in the full light of history (soon after 3000 B. C.?). King Snefru(i), who founded it, seems to have been a great ruler. Later

45. 4th Dyn. stories report that he had to fight with Asiatic tribes attacking Egypt near Memphis, where already earlier pharaohs had to build a large fortification, 'the king's wall,' against raids through Goshen. Some places founded there by Snefru(i) confirm the essentially historical character of these reports. At Wādy Maghārah in the Sinaitic peninsula, he opened a new mine for copper and greenstone (malachite, which the Egyptians held in strange esteem). His tomb is the irregular pyramid of Meidūm.

The next kings, the Cheops, Chephren, and Mycerinus of Herodotus (Hufu(i), Hāf-rē', and Men-ka(u)-rē' of the monuments), are the builders of the three largest pyramids at Gizeh, stupendous works which were never surpassed (see MEMPHIS). Evidently the strength of Egypt was overtaxed by these gigantic constructions, for the pyramids of all subsequent kings (Ra'-ded-f., *Šepses-ka-f.*¹ etc.) show a considerable falling-off.

Dynasty 5 is called Elephantine by Manētho. This would indicate that the warlike Nubians, already employed as mercenaries in that early

46. 5th Dyn. time, acquired sufficient influence to establish their leaders as kings.² This dynasty (nine to eleven kings, reigning about 150 years) marks the zenith of Egyptian art (see above, § 36). The last king, Unas (Wenys; Onnos, Manētho), built the earliest of the five pyramids at Saqqārah which have preserved in the inscriptions on the walls of their burial chambers so valuable a collection of religious and magical texts (see above, § 20), texts dating in part from prehistoric times, and already in dynasty 5 not all perfectly intelligible.³

Unas has left, in the so-called Maštabat-el-Far'aun (Pharaoh's bench), near Saqqārah, the basis of one of those strange colossal monuments of half-pyramidal character¹ which were erected by many of the kings of that time. Their purpose is obscure; we only know that they were, like the obelisks, for the cult of the Sun-god.

Dynasty 6 (five kings, about 140 years, beginning with Tety or Atoty) had powerful rulers, especially Pepy

47. 6th Dyn. (read Apopy?) I., a great builder, the founder of Memphis proper. He waged war, not only with the 'sand-dwelling' nomads of the Sinaitic desert, but also in Palestine, which he seems to have been the first (?) to claim as tributary territory.² The kingdom, however, was more and more decentralised, and at the end of dynasty 6 went to pieces. It must be mentioned that under Pepy (Apopy) II. Nefer-ka-rē' (reigning, according to the best traditions, ninety-four years, perhaps the longest reign in the world's history) we find records of a great commercial expedition, a nomarch of Elephantinē being sent by the king to the Sūdān near Kharṭūm to obtain one of the dwarfs from the woods of Central Africa 'for the sacred dances.'³

Most kings of dynasties 3-6 (Manētho calls dynasty 2 as well as dynasty 1 Thinitic, dynasties 3, 4, and 6 Memphitic) had their residences near Memphis, though not at the same place; many kings built 'their city' afresh, a work rendered easy by the light material employed.

The practice was for each king to build his pyramid west of his own city, in the desert; it is this alone, in fact, that enables us to guess the site of the city. Gradually Memphis proper became the permanent capital.

Dynasties 7 to 11 form an obscure period (only about twenty-five kings known, many more lost), full of the 48. Dyns. 7-11. struggles of the Nomarchs, the princes of the small counties.

Dynasties 7 and 8 are called Memphitic, 9 and 10 came from Heracleopolis in Middle Egypt (see HANES). These Heracleopolitans had unceasing wars with rival kings in Thebes, whom they seem never to have completely subdued. Manētho mentions only one great king among the Heracleopolitan kings, Achthoes (Egyptian, Hty; pronounce Eḥtoy), whom he describes as cruel—i.e., a powerful warrior.

Finally, the Theban rulers from whom the eleventh dynasty descended gained the superiority.

Almost all these kings, whose number is doubtful (Petrie nine, others five or six) had the name Antef or that of Mentuhotep. Of the last king of this dynasty, S'anḥ-ka-rē', we know that he sent an expedition through the desert east of Koptos to build a ship on the Red Sea and to sail to Punt for incense. Such expeditions to Punt (the Abyssinian and Somali coast of our days) occur under several kings of the next (twelfth) dynasty: the earliest mentioned is one under Assa (Yssy) of dynasty 5.

The new line, of seven kings, was founded by Amen-em-ḥet I., who subdued the rebel nomarchs after hard

49. 12th Dyn. fighting. One of the classic books, 'the instructions of Amenemḥet' (i.e., instructions how to rule),⁴ professes to have been written by him when, tired of reigning, he abdicated after escaping a conspiracy against his life. His son Usertesen (Wesertesen) I. erected the temple of which the obelisk of Heliopolis is the only trace. He was buried in the pyramid of Lisht. Usertesen II., who succeeded Amenemḥet II., built the pyramid of Illahūn. His workers inhabited the city on the spot now called Kahun, where Petrie found valuable antiquities.⁵

Usertesen II. seems to have begun to favour the part of Egypt now called Fa(i)lyūm—i.e., 'the lake,' in antiquity 50. Fa(i)lyūm. to-šei, 'the lake-country'—the Arsinoite nome of the Ptolemies. This is a depression in the Libyan desert into which the branch of the Nile now called Baḥr-Yūsuf flows, forming a lake, now called Birket-Ḳarūn, and irrigating one of the most fruitful parts of Egypt (properly an oasis; see above, § 4). The Nile had been flowing into this depression even in prehistoric times;¹ but some improvements must have been made in irrigation by the kings of dynasty 12, especially by Amenemhēt III., who succeeded Userseten III. At least he is the king Moeris to whom Herodotus erroneously ascribed even the digging (!) of 'Lake Moeris' (thirty-five miles long even now, much more in antiquity); his 'two pyramids' (i.e., large bases), with colossal statues of 'king Moeris,' were discovered by Petrie near Biahmu.² The pyramid of Amenemhēt III. stands at Hawāra, where only insignificant remains betray the site of the labyrinth built by the same king. The classical writers describe it as a gigantic structure equal to the pyramids of Gizeh. Amenemhēt II., and a queen Sebk-nofru (or -nefrou) close this dynasty (194 years, beginning about 2100 B.C.),³ which the Egyptians, not without justice, considered as the greatest of all. The land was flourishing, art well developed, and literature in its golden age,—at least according to Egyptian taste. Most of the works used as classics in the schools were written while this dynasty reigned (see above, § 21). Many temples and public constructions were erected. Conquests were made in Nubia (not in Syria; ⁴ only the old copper mines near Sinai were used). All kings were active in subduing Wawat (N. of Nubia) and Kōsh (Cush of the Bible, in the S.) for the sake of the gold mines of that country; Userseten III. finally fixed his frontier south of the second cataract and fortified it by two large fortresses (now called Semneh and Kummeh) on the two banks of the Nile.

For the student of the OT the most interesting monument of this period is the famous wall-painting of Beni Hasan (part of it given in colours in Riehm, HWB(2) which was formerly explained as representing the immigration of Abraham or Jacob (cp JOSEPH II., § 8). The inscriptions that accompany the painting inform us, however, that a caravan of 37 Asiatics from the desert-country came, not as immigrants, but as traders⁵ with metallic eye-paint (mesdemet; cp § 39), evidently from the copper mines near Sinai. The chief, Ab-sa(y) (i.e., ABISHAI?), presents two ibexes to his customer, the nomarch. In Middle Egypt such direct commercial relations seem to have been less frequent than in the north. The illustration of the costumes of the age of Hebrew immigration is most valuable (observe the weapons, the war-axe, the boomerang—an elaborate one, as the sign of the chief—the travelling shoes, the lyre, etc.).

Dynasties 13 and 14 again show the consequences of decentralisation—anarchy, wars of nomarchs competing for the crown, some kings ruling only a few months, altogether at least 140 princes, 14th Dyns. many evidently contemporaneous. The names of many kings, which imitate the names of dynasty 12, or at least point to the Faiyūm and its god Sobk (such names as Sebk-sauf, Sebk-hotep), show that they claimed descent from dynasty 12. Dynasty 14 is said to have come from Xoïs, in the W. Delta, and perhaps shows us Libyan elements penetrating into Egypt.

At the height of this confusion (about 1800 B.C.?) came the foreign invasion of the so-called Hyksos (or Hykussos?), who overrun Egypt easily.

52. Hyksos. Much has been conjectured as to the origin of these mysterious strangers; but nothing certain

can be stated. It seems that they were not Semites (the etymology Hyk[u]-sos, 'shepherd-kings,' is probably not from Manētho himself), but Mitanni, Hittites, or similar intruders from Eastern Asia Minor, who conquered Syria and then Egypt.¹ The Hyksos kings Ḥeyān, etc. (seven mutilated names in Manētho) ruled over all Egypt and northwards as far as N. Mesopotamia. Later, they permitted Upper Egypt to have its own viceroys of Egyptian blood. These viceroys of Thebes (dynasty 17, three to five kings) finally threw off the yoke of the Hyksos Apopy II. The kings Skenenrē (III.?) and Ka-mes (or -mose) died (the former, it would seem, in battle) during the long war; finally Amosis I. ('Ah- or Y'ah-mose) took the last stronghold of the foreigners, their large fortress Avapis (Ḥa[ḫ]ua ret), on the eastern frontier S. of Pelusium, somewhat after 1600 B.C. (Mahler-Petrie, 1583).

The duration of the Hyksos period is very uncertain; it seems necessary to abandon Manētho's corrupted traditions (500 to 800 years in three dynasties) and to estimate it at about 200 years(?).² The foreigners are said to have worshipped their own(?) war-god;³ in all other respects they were soon Egyptianised. The immigration of Israel has been assumed by patristic writers and many modern scholars (partly on very feeble grounds) to have occurred during their rule (under an Ἀπωφίς).

Amosis I. (see above), the founder of dynasty 18, begins the New Empire, a period in which Egypt shows her power as a conquering nation.

53. 18th Dyn. The warlike spirit had been aroused by the long war of independence; an army had been created; and the country was thoroughly centralised (the hereditary monarchs having given place to royal officers). All energy turned outwards, especially towards Asia. Amosis pursued the Hyksos, and conquered Palestine and Phoenicia. Amenophis I. (Amenhotep, circa 1570 B.C.; Mahler-Petrie, 1562) occupied Nubia again, at least to the third cataract. This king and his mother Nofret-ari (or -ere) became, later, divine protectors of a part of the necropolis of Thebes, and are, therefore, frequently painted black as divinities of the nether-world. Thutmōsis I. (Dhut[ī]-mose; the transliteration Thothmes found in many books is not correct), circa 1560 B.C., completed the conquest of Nubia and penetrated into Syria as far as to the Euphrates. We may, however, doubt whether he gained lasting results in the North. Even during his lifetime, the princess Ḥat-sepsut (or Sepseswet, but not Hatasu, as was formerly read) or Ma'karē came into power, and, after his death, she reigned, recognising her co-regents Thutmōsis II. and III.⁴ at best as puppets.

After her death Thutmōsis III., in fierce hatred, tried to blot out her memory. Many monuments show her as a male king (with beard, etc.), a fact which has been explained perhaps too seriously. Formerly Egyptologists concluded that she had an unusually strong and active mind; she may have been only an instrument in the hands of a court-party. She built the magnificent temple of Amon at ed-Dēr el-Bahri, commemorating in it, as one of the greatest events, the sending of several ships to the 'divine country,' the frankincense coast of Punt (cp § 48).

² If we adopt the recently proposed date for the 12th dynasty (§ 50 n.) we can assign the Hyksos only about 200 years, or even less, beginning about 1680 B.C.

³ We have, however, no evidence that they tried to force this cult as a monotheism upon the Egyptians. The later tradition, that their god had the Hittite name Sutek, seems erroneous: he was nothing but the Egyptian form of Set worshipped in Auaris.

⁴ The succession and relationship of these three regents have recently been much disputed. According to some, they were all children of Thutmōsis I., and Ḥat-sepsut, the legal heiress to the crown, was married to Thutmōsis III. More probably she was the wife of Thutmōsis II. and the aunt of his son (by a concubine), Thutmōsis III.

Thutmosis III. (who reigned alone from about 1515 B.C. [Mahler, 1480], his official 23rd year) was, of the pharaohs, the greatest warrior. He defeated an alliance of the Syrians at Megiddo and made Syria as far as the Amenophis (Amen-hotep) III. (1450?) is remarkable for the love shown by him everywhere to his fair wife Teye, a (Libyan?) woman not of royal blood. The great find of Tell el-'Amarna, an archive of cuneiform tablets¹ containing despatches from princes of N. Syria, Assyria, Babylonia, Cyprus (Alašia), and from Amenhotep's vassal-kings in Jerusalem, Megiddo, etc., gives us a wonderful insight into his diplomatic relations, and into his marriages—e.g., with two princesses of Mitanni (Osroëne, capital probably Harrân)—but also shows a growing neglect of his Syrian provinces, which fell to pieces under his successor. Amenophis III. built a large temple, before which were erected the famous colossal statues one of which became the 'singing image of Memnon' of the Greeks.

As we may conclude even from his portraits (figs. 10 and 11), Amenophis II. (1415² B.C.) was no ordinary man. Being dissatisfied with the confused religion of Egypt, he had the amazing boldness to introduce the worship of the sun-disk as the only god,³ persecuting especially the worship of Amon, whose name he tried to have erased from all monuments where it occurred. He changed his own name, in consequence, into Aḥu-n-aten (or Yeb(u)-n-aten), 'splendour (or spirit) of the sun-disk.' This great religious reform was accompanied by a revolt against the traditional conventionalism in art, which was supplanted by a bold and ugly realism. The change in religious literature is not less remarkable. The hymns now composed in praise of the Sun-god are the best productions of Egyptian religious literature. Amenophis even gave up his palaces at Amon's city of Thebes, and built a new capital (at the modern el-'Amarna in Middle Egypt), called 'horizon of the sun-disk. All these changes met with much resistance, and hardly had he died (about 1397) when all the results of his life-work were lost. His successor, Ay, had to return to the old traditions; the temples of the sun-disk and the monuments of the heretical king were razed to the foundations, and Egyptian religion became more than ever mummified.

Amenhotep IV.'s son-in-law Smenḥ. (others read S'a') ka-ri', the former priest ('divine father,' a low rank) Ay, and Tuet-anh-anun did not reign long in this turbulent time; Har-em-hebi (1380 B.C.?), formerly general and governor, established peace and a firm government. To the delight of the priests, he completed the religious reaction.

With Ramses (Ra'messu) I. we begin dynasty 19 (about 1355; Petrie, 1327). Sethos I. (often called

57. Dyn. 19. Seti, Egyptian Setoy, 1350 B.C.), like his father, did not reign very long; but he was active as a builder (Abydos, Thebes) and in foreign politics. He drove nomadic tribes (remining one of the Midianites and Amalekites of the OT) away from S. Palestine, and tried to regain Middle Syria. The Hittites (Ḥeta of the

² This approximate date, serving as a basis for our chronology of dynasties 18 and 19, is inferred from the Babylonian synchronism (see CHRONOLOGY, § 22). Burnaburiaš II. and Amenhotep IV. seem to have come to the throne about the same time. Assyriologists must obtain a better agreement on Burnaburiaš II. and his predecessor Kadašman-Bel. From an exclusively Egyptological standpoint, the present writer would determine about 1380 (Petrie, 1383) as the minimum date. 1415 may be a trifle too high, but not much. Wi.'s date for Burnaburiaš (1456 B.C.) seems decidedly too high; likewise Rost's date (Mit. Vorderas. Ges. 2 228), 1438.

Egyptians, (Hatte of the Assyrians) from E. Asia Minor (Cappadocia) had conquered N. Syria,—beginning in the reign of Amenophis IV. when Egypt was too weak to resist them. Their influence reached even to Palestine, and Sethos became entangled with them in a war, waged in the Lebanon region south of Kadesh. This war was taken up more energetically by his son Ram(ese)s II. (Sesostris, circa 1340-1273 B. C.; see figs. 6, 12, and 4). He reconquered Phoenicia as far as Beirut in his second year, and in his fifth attacked the most important city of central Syria—Kadesh 'in the Amorite country' (i.e., near the N. end of the Lebanon, on the Orontes). His victory there over the Hittite force of war-chariots became (greatly exaggerated) the subject of many pictures and inscriptions (on the epic, see above, § 25), because the king was (against his will) personally engaged in the fight. The war went on, however, till his twenty-first year, and Egypt was not always victorious—otherwise all Palestine would not have revolted. Ramses had to take the strong mountain-cities of Galilee (year 8), to punish the territory of Ephraim and Dan, and even to storm Askaluna (Askelon) and Gezer in the S. The treaty of peace (engraved upon a silver plate and preserved in a copy) was, however, favourable, leaving Palestine (inscriptions of Ramses have lately been found east of the Jordan)¹ and half of Phoenicia to Egypt. Ramses married a daughter of Hetsar the 'great king' of the Hittites. The rest of his long reign (sixty-seven years altogether) was peaceful. The conquests from Scythia to India, therefore, ascribed to him (Sesostris) by the Greeks, are pure fiction—a mere inference from his many buildings.

FIG. 13.—Mummy of Ramses II. After a photograph.

As a builder (temples of Luxor, the Ramesseum, Abydos, etc.) Ramses surpassed all other pharaohs, although the amazing multitude of monuments bearing his name is largely due to his erasure of the names of the ancient builders and usurpation of their works. Nubia also, which as far as Ben-Naga, S. of Khartūm, had long before his time become an Egyptian province, was favoured with many constructions—e.g., the huge rock-temple at Abū-Simbel (see fig. 7). The special favour of this great king, however, was directed towards 'the land of Rameses' or Goshen (see GOSHEN, i. § 4). This desert-valley, which was formerly reached only very irregularly by the Nile, he rendered fruitful by a canal, colonised it (with Syrians, too, and among them the 'Apuri, frequently alleged to have been Hebrews), and built several cities in it, including a royal residence, the city of Rameses. Thus he would seem to be, according to Ex. 11, the pharaoh of the oppression; and his son Menephtes (Me[r]neptah, see fig. 13; about 1273 B.C.) has, thus far, been generally assumed to be the pharaoh of the Exodus.

The recent discovery of Meneptah's inscriptions mentioning Israel as defeated, and evidently dwelling

59. Israel. in Palestine, makes this view very questionable. It is the opinion of the present writer that any chronological system of the Exodus must, at least, sacrifice Ex. 11 (Pithom and Raameses), which might be a gloss, and other details. Attempts to discover the name of Moses (the alleged 'Mesu') in the time of Ramses II. have failed. There are indications that the Israelitish nation

FIG. 14.—Head of Meneptah, from —e.g., ASHER (q.v., § 1)—were resident in or, at least, some tribes Palestine at the beginning of dynasty 19, perhaps earlier (cp ISRAEL, § 2). It must be left to future excavations to determine how far the biblical accounts need a critical revision, and whether the Exodus can be referred to earlier periods.¹ That the Hittite of the Amarna tablets (under Amenophis III. and IV., see above, § 55*f.*) are identical with the immigrating Hebrews does not, however, seem to be satisfactorily proved (cp ISRAEL, § 3).

Me(r)neptah had for long to fight hard both with Libyans, who plundered the western part of the Delta,

60. Meneptah, and with pirates who ravaged the coasts of Egypt and Syria. Finally these pirates from Asia Minor (Šakaruša and Luku—i.e., Lycians) and Europe (Šardena, Akai-waša and Tur(u)ša—i.e., Sardinians, Achæans, and Etruscans),² joined the Libyans and marched against Memphis, in sight of which they met with a crushing defeat.³

The reigns of kings Sethos II., Amen-messe, Meneptah II. or Siptah were short and inglorious. One of them is called a Syrian usurper, which points to his being a royal officer who had originally been a Syrian slave or mercenary. Perhaps the reference is to Meneptah II., who became king by marrying queen T-usoret. After 'years of anarchy,' dynasty 20 united the country again, under King Setnath(e) and his son Ram(ese)s III.

Ram(ese)s III. (somewhat before 1200 B.C.) cleared the Western Delta of the Libyans, who had settled there. Several attacks were repelled, the Syrian provinces maintained, and the territory of the Amorites and of petty Hittite kings N. of Palestine ravaged.

61. Ramses III., etc. (The great kingdom of the Hittites had broken up.) He fought also against the piratical Pulaste or Phiiistines who had settled in Palestine⁴ (in the territory of the Avvim, Dt. 223), and ravaged Phoenicia as well as the Egyptian coasts.

Ramses III. sought to imitate also the architectural achievements of Ramses II. during his reign of thirty-two years; but his buildings (especially Medinet Habu in Western Thebes) cannot be compared with those of his predecessor. The kings who followed—Ram(ese)s IV.-XII., the so-called Ramesides—were short-lived and weak rulers (they ruled hardly over eighty years).

The Egyptian possessions in Syria were lost. For 400 or 500 years, with small intermissions, Palestine had been tributary to the pharaohs, and Egyptian garrisons had occupied several fortified cities (e.g.,

² The תוריס of Gen. 102 (read תוריס, Tur-). They are nowhere else mentioned in M.T. [Perhaps, however, the name originally stood also in Ezek. 382 391. See ROSH, I.]

⁴ See now AVG., 1900, i.

Zaratuna; see ZARETHAN). It must not, however, be assumed that this loose relation influenced the inhabitants of Palestine in any considerable measure. The Egyptians did not often interfere in the continual feuds of the many petty kings. For evidence of this and the unsafe character of the land, see the Amarna letters.

A fact of importance for the Exodus question is that the 'Apuri, for whom a connection with the Hebrews (עברי = עברי) has so often been claimed, still appear in great numbers in Egypt under these kings. Under Ram(e)ses III. they inhabited whole towns near Heliopolis—i. e., at the western opening of Goshen. The last word on this question has, evidently, still to be said, and it is not safe to decide either for or against the Hebrew records.

In this period, the paupers of Thebes began systematically to plunder the royal tombs, as is shown by many documents referring to spoiliations and the measures taken to repress them.

The weakness of the later kings was largely due to the fact that the temples had amassed an unreasonable amount of property by bequests—the high priest of Amon possessed such a large part of the country, owing chiefly to the liberality of Ram(e)ses III., that he surpassed the pharaoh in wealth.¹ This led finally to the deposition of Ram(e)ses XII. by the high priest Herihor (about 1100 B.C. or somewhat later), who himself assumed the crown.²

62. Dyn. 21. Herihor, however, was not able to maintain it; and king Smendes (Nes-bi-n-dedi) of Tanis (Zoan, Egyptian Ša'nē) founded a new dynasty, the twenty-first (seven kings, some 130 years), about 1090 B.C. These princes were prudent enough to give the important office of the Theban high priest to their own sons. Nevertheless, the Tanitic dynasty was not strong.

By these kings, all that remained of the mummies of the kings of dynasties 18-20 were finally hidden in the hole near Dér-el-bahri where they were discovered in 1881—so powerless were they to protect the royal necropolis. To their prudence we thus owe the preservation of the bodies of Ram(e)ses II. and III., Tutmosis III., etc.³

After the time of Ramses III. the immigration of Libyans began again, and Libyan mercenary troops had now become so numerous that the 'generals of the Mašawaša' (a Libyan tribe) came next to the king in power. About 950, one family of Libyan officers had become so influential (also by intermarriage with the high priests of Memphis) that they could venture to put one of themselves upon the throne, 63. Šošenk I. Šošenk I. This pharaoh, the contemporary of Solomon and his son (see SHISHAK), who reigned at least twenty-one years, was more energetic, and again exercised influence upon Syria. He seems to have assisted Israel against the Philistines, who evidently still raided the Egyptian coasts (see 1 K. 9:16 and cp DAVID, § 7); possibly he was the pharaoh (it was hardly his predecessor P-sū-hā-m-nē or Psusennes II.) who gave his 'daughter' to Solomon as wife (see, however, GEZER, § 1). A less friendly attitude is shown in 1 K. 11:18 (but see HADAD I, 3; TAHPENES); and after the division of Solomon's empire he made an expedition against both Judah and Israel (perhaps to secure the throne to Jeroboam?), an expedition recorded in 1 K. 14:25 and on the monuments of Karnak (see the extract given in Fig. 14). Cp SHISHAK.

It is very doubtful whether the other kings of the 64. Dyn. 22. Lihyan, or twenty-second, dynasty (from Bubastus?) retained a hold on Palestine.

They bear for the most part Libyan names—Šošenk (the name of four kings altogether), Osorkon (Wasarken, two or three kings), Tikelō (or ḫ?i) (Greek Takelothis: two kings), Pemy (one king)—and the whole dynasty seems to have reigned (nominally) about 200 years. On the Zerah of Chronicles cp ZERAH, 5.

They first mark a tolerably quiet period of Egyptian history; but about 800 B.C. their dominion began to become weak. The generals commanding the large garrisons of Libyan soldiers in the great cities assumed the rôle of the ancient nomarchs or counts, and the pharaoh had little power over them.

14 Ša'an(a)kē (TAANACH), 15 Šanemā (SHUNEM), 16 Biti-šanra, 17 Ruḥabā (REHOB), 18 Hapurumā (HAPHARAIM), 19 Ad(e)rumam(?), 20 . . . , 21 Šawad(i), 22 Mahan(a)ma, 23 K(e)ba'ana (GIBEON), 24 Biti-hwarun (BETHHORON), 25 Kad'raat Karḫ(e)m (KIRIATHAIM), 26 A(i)ylun, 27 Mak(e)dō (MEGIDDO), 28 Adir(u), 29 Yud-h(a)maruk (Yad-ham-melek?; see SHISHAK), 30 . . . , 31 Ḥu-ā-n(e)-m.

This weakness of the kingdom caused the Ethiopians to attack Egypt. Ethiopia (q.v.) had been an Egyptian province down to the beginning

65. Ethiopian Supremacy. of dynasty 21. Since that time, owing to the struggle between the secular rulers and the high priests of Thebes, it had become an independent kingdom. The kings of Napata were able to take possession of Thebes. Middle and Lower Egypt were, nominally, under the dominion of dynasty 23, the successors, or rather the contemporaries, of the last members of the twenty-second (Bubastid)² dynasty. Really the country was divided among about twenty petty rulers of Libyan descent. About 750(?) B.C. the Ethiopian king P(i)anhy tried to subdue them. He met with little resistance from the nominal ruler, Osorkon III. of Bubastus; but the prince Tefnaht(e) of Sais, who had already subjugated central Egypt, was a formidable enemy. He submitted nominally to the Ethiopian, after the latter had taken Memphis; but the Delta remained in his hands, and Tefnaht(e)'s son Bok-en-renf (Bocchoris of the Greeks) was able to extend his power again southwards. Bocchoris left the reputation of having been a great legislator (cp above, § 28). The new Saitic Dynasty 24 (consisting, in Manētho, only of Bocchoris), however, was shortlived. The Ethiopian king Šabako, the son of Kešta, invaded 667. Šabako, the country N. of Thebes, and took Bocchoris prisoner (according to one tradition he had him burned alive) about 706(?). Now, for the first time, the Palestinians and Phoenicians, who observed the approaching Assyrian colossus with growing anxiety, saw in the new dynasty of Egypt (25th) a power equal to the Assyrian, to which they could appeal for help.¹ On the ambassadors sent by Hoshea (to the governor of Lower Egypt), and on the governor Seve, who appeared in Syria to assist king Hanno (Hanunu) of Gaza, but was defeated at Raphia, S. of Gaza (ISRAEL, § 34, SARGON), see, however, SO.² About 696 Šabako³ seems to have been followed by Sabatako (the Sebichos of Manētho?), who in 691 was

667. Taharkō. supplanted by the usurper T(a)harkō (see TIRHAKAH) in Napata. At first the new king was compelled to be passive as far as northern affairs were concerned. This was the time of the revolt of the Philistines and of Hezekiah from Assyria (702); see ISRAEL, § 34. Whether the kings of Mušri who came in 701 to save Ekron from the Assyrians and met with a complete defeat at Altauḳū (Eltekeh) were Ethiopian vassals from the Delta (or Arabs?) is again doubtful. On the plague in Sennacherib's army, by which, according to K. 19 35, Jerusalem, and consequently also Egypt, were saved, and on the distorted Egyptian tradition in Herodotus (2.141), see HEZEKIAH, § 2. The tranquillity of Egypt, however, was soon to be disturbed. In 671 or 670 B.C., after Taharkō had instigated the Phoenicians (Ba'al of Tyre) to a new but fruitless revolt, the Assyrian king Esarhaddon marched against Egypt; in his passage through the arid desert west of the 'brook of Egypt,' which always formed Egypt's best protection, he was supplied with water by the Arabs. It seems that an earlier attack upon Egypt (in 673) had failed. Now, however, the Assyrians had a complete success. Taharkō was driven into Nubia; Memphis was stormed; and Egypt was parcelled out among twenty kings, descendants of those Libyan nobles whom we have already met (§ 63 f.). Among them Necho (Nikū) of Saïs, of the family of the princes forming the twenty-fourth dynasty, again stood first. Thus Manētho dates the twenty-sixth dynasty even from his grandfather Stephinates (= Tefnahte; see § 65). Taharkō invaded Egypt again about 669 or 668 (see TIRHAKAH), and his nephew and successor Tan(u)tamon (in cuneiform writing Tandamani, not Urdamani) in 667;⁴ but the Assyrians on both occasions maintained the Delta, quelled revolts of the Egyptians in Saïs, Mendes, and Tanis, and finally drove the Cushites back to Nubia. The reason was that the Ethiopian kingdom alone, with its scanty population, was unable to raise armies equal to those of Assyria, as it had always been powerless against united Egypt.

Necho's son Psa(m)etik (Psammetichus)⁵ began his reign (663) as a vassal of the Assyrian king Ašur-bānī-pal. It may have been about 660 67. Psametik. (but this is uncertain) that he felt strong enough to renounce his allegiance. Assyria was, in fact, sinking. The rival kings, the Dodec-

³ The chronology is not clear in every detail. (Cp W. MYG, 1891, p. 28, and CHRONOLOGY, § 21).

archs of Herodotus, had, of course, been previously subjugated by him, with the help (it would seem) of Carian troops, sent to him, perhaps, by Gyges of Lydia.¹ He strengthened unmilitary Egypt by introducing a great quantity of Greek and Carian mercenaries. The terrible Cimmerian invasion was warded off by bribes and presents (about 620?).

The new (26th) dynasty is a period remarkable for the revival of art (largely following archaistic tendencies) and architecture. In general, this last period of Egyptian independence seems to have been flourishing. The days of Egypt as a conquering power, were, however, past. Nekau or Nekō II. (the Pharaoh-Necho of 688. Necho II. 2 K. 23 29), who succeeded Psammetik in 609, tried to profit by the distress of the Assyrian empire during the ravages of the northern barbarians (see ASSYRIA, § 34). It was easy for Necho to occupy Syria as far as the Euphrates in 608. On his victories over king Josiah² (and the Assyrian governors), and on the taxation which followed the victory, see JOSIAH I, § 2 f.; JEHOIAKIM. The Egyptian conquest, however, lasted only to 604. Defeated at Carchemish by Nebuchadrezzar, the Egyptians were driven back for good (2 K. 24 7), and had no better policy than that of first instigating the Syrians to rebel, and then letting them suffer through Egypt's remissness.

The most important construction undertaken by Necho was his digging the canal (completed: not, as Herodotus believed, abandoned) through Goshen to the Red Sea, partly on the track of the canal which Ramses II. had led from the Nile only to the Bitter Lakes. In connection with this, he sent Phoenician ships to circumnavigate Africa. He was followed by his less energetic son Psa(m)etik II. 594-588 B.C. Whether the second or the first Psammetik led an expedition against the weak Ethiopian kingdom is uncertain (Greek inscriptions at Abū Simbel).³

Apries (Uah-eb-rē'), 588-569, took the last active steps to check the Babylonians, by aiding the Tyrians and Jews in their resistance to Nebuchadrezzar 69. Apries. (cp BABYLONIA, § 66). An interruption 588-569. was thus caused in the siege of Jerusalem (Jer. 37 5). The revolt against GEDALIAH (q.v., I) also must have been instigated from Egypt, whither so many Jews fled. From a fragment of his records it would appear that Nebuchadrezzar was still at war with the Egyptians in his thirty-seventh year (568-567). Whether he attacked Egypt herself is not quite certain;⁴ at any rate, the expectation of the prophets that he would punish faithless and insolent Egypt was not fulfilled in the measure expected. Defeated and humbled everywhere, Egypt maintained her independence. One more reign has to be chronicled, and then follows the catastrophe. Amasis II. ('Ahmose),

who dethroned Apries¹ in 569, was a man of low birth, who obtained the crown through a rising of the native warriors against the Greek mercenaries. Amasis placed restrictions both on the mercenaries and on Greek commerce, but very prudently left Naucrâtis to the Greek merchants as a port and settlement. He closed a prosperous reign in 526, and was succeeded by his son Psammetîk III., who did not reign one full year.

In 525, after the battle of Pelusium, Cambyses conquered Egypt. Apart from the (possibly unhistorical) cruelties of Cambyses, the treatment of

70. Persians. the province of Egypt by the Persians was at first not unfair. In particular, Darius I. (521-486) built temples (the largest in the S. Oasis, which he—or Cambyses?—seems to have conquered); he repaired Necho's canal to the Red Sea, in order to make Egypt more accessible. Under Xerxes (see AHASUERUS, 1) the Libyan class of warriors, led by Khab(b)ash, rebelled for the first time in 487, and drove the Persians from Egypt. They could not, however, long hold out against Xerxes; the country was again reduced to submission. A new revolution was set on foot (460-450) by Inarus, a Libyan of Marea (near Alexandria), who was aided by the Athenians. A more successful rebellion was that of Amyrtaeus in 404, which made Egypt independent down to 342. This period was filled not only with hard fighting against the Persians (Artaxerxes II. Mnemon [405-362] and III. [362-338]), who continually tried to win Egypt back, but also with internal discord. Three dynasties (28-30; from Tanis, Mendes, and Sebennytus), and at least nine kings, of whom only Nectanebus I. (better -nebis; Egyptian Nehit-har-heb) and Nectanebus II. (Nehite-nebf) are remarkable, are mentioned. The Greek soldiers constantly made their influence felt, and showed their bad faith during these troublous times. Because of the incapacity of Nectanebus II.² (360-343), Artaxerxes III. Ochus (362-338) conquered Egypt again, and punished her cruelly. It is not surprising

71. Greeks. that the destroyer of the Persian Empire, Alexander (336-323), was welcomed in 332. Egypt (332 B.C.) as a deliverer. The history of Egypt after Ptolemy I. the son of Lagus had in 305 become a king instead of a Macedonian governor or satrapan—i.e., 'satrap' (as he is styled in an Egyptian inscription of 314 B.C.)—belongs to that of the Hellenistic world. Under the Macedonian kings or Ptolemies,³ the Egyptians were perhaps less oppressed than they were under the later Persians; but as a class they were always treated as inferior in legal position to Macedonians and Greeks. They were never, therefore, completely Hellenised. They were also severely taxed. The great contrast between the native people and the foreign rulers—who, for the most part, did not condescend even to learn the language of their subjects, and from Alexandria, their Hellenic capital, followed anything but an Egyptian policy—was but little mitigated during the rule of this last dynasty. Hence the various revolts.

The great revolution of the native soldier-class against Ptolemies IV. and V. deserves special mention. It lasted twenty years (206-186) and, for the last time, placed nominal kings of Egyptian speech on the throne of the ancient pharaohs. Those who held their ground the longest ruled in the Thebaid. This revolution was quenched in torrents of blood in 186 B.C. As a punishment for assistance sent by the Ethiopians to the rebels, the N. of Nubia was occupied. Previously, the kingdom of Meroë (Napata was abandoned as capital some time before) had been on good terms with the Ptolemies; economically weak, it naturally fell under Egyptian influence.

Ptolemy II. caused a marvellous development of the trade on the Red Sea, exploring and colonising the African coasts. The growing commercial importance

72. Jews. of Egypt increased the immigration of Jews and Samaritans. They gathered especially at Alexandria and on the Eastern frontier, in the ancient Goshen.¹ Under Ptolemy VI. they even built at Leontopolis a great Jewish temple (see DISPERSION, § 8). In Alexandria they became strongly Hellenised: hence the Alexandrian version of the Scriptures; hence too the gnostic tendencies in Judaism. See ALEXANDRIA, § 2; DISPERSION, §§ 7, 15 f.; HELLENISM, § 10; TEXT.

The Ptolemies possessed Palestine from 320 down to 198 B.C., when Ptolemy V. Epiphanes lost it to Antiochus III., the Great, of Syria. Already his father had defended it against the Syrians with difficulty, and had kept it only by winning the battle of Raphia (216 B.C.), whilst Ptolemy III. Euergetes had been able to conquer the whole Syrian empire for a short time in 238.

The succession is as follows:—Ptolemy I. Soter (323-284), Ptolemy II. Philadelphus (so called because, after the Egyptian custom, he married his own sister Arsinoë), 73. Ptolemies. to whom the exploration of Eastern Africa was due (285-247). Ptolemy III. Euergetes, the husband of the famous Berenike (a princess of Cyrene), the conqueror among the Ptolemies (247-222). Ptolemy IV. Philopator (222-205) waged war with Antiochus the Great. It was under this dissolute, cruel, and incompetent ruler that the great revolution began. Ptolemy V. Epiphanes came to the throne at the age of five, in 205, under the tutelage of the dissolute Agathocles. After the murder of his guardian by the Alexandrian mob, other generals held the post.² The Asiatic provinces were all lost, although Ptolemy retained their revenue by marrying Cleopatra, the daughter of Antiochus III., the Great, of Syria. After subjugating the rebellious Egyptians, Ptolemy became more and more dissolute; he was poisoned while preparing war against the Syrians. Ptolemy VII.³ Philometor (181-146) was a nobler personality, but unfortunate. Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, of Syria, took him captive at Pelusium, and would have conquered Egypt had it not been for the brusque intervention of the Romans (171). Ptolemy Philometor had to accept as co-regent his younger brother (Euergetes, ironically called Kakergetes or Physcon), by whom he was exiled in 163; the Romans, however, brought him back. The ambitious Euergetes became the ruler of Cyrene. After the death of his brother Philometor (killed while intervening in the struggles of Syrian princes) and after the short reign of Ptolemy VIII. Neos Philopator, the restless Euergetes came back to Egypt as king. In 130, however, he was expelled, and his wife Cleopatra (widow and sister of Philometor) assumed the supreme power. In 127 Euergetes (Ptol. IX.) returned from Cyprus. After his death (117) ensued a long period of ceaseless struggle, which strengthened the influence of Rome. Ptolemy X. Soter II. ruled from 117-81, his brother Ptol. XI. Alexander I. (against him) 106-88, Ptol. XII. Alexander II. 81-80, Ptol. XIII. Neos Dionysos (or Auletes) 80-51. The history of all these rulers is complicated and repulsive. The famous Cleopatra ruled first with her brother Ptol. XIV. under the guardianship of the Roman senate; expelled by Ptolemy in 48, she was brought back by Caesar in 47. Her younger brother Ptol. XV., co-regent 47-45, was murdered by her, and Ptol. XVI. Caesarion, her son by Caesar, became her nominal co-regent. For ten years (41-31) she captivated the Roman triumvir Antony, and thus maintained her kingdom as a typical Ptolemaic ruler, not less able than wicked.

74. Rome. The sea-fight at Actium and Cleopatra's tragic death brought Egypt's independence to an end. It now became a Roman province under prefects (σπαρταγιοί), and its history⁴ is devoid of interest, till the Arab conquest in 640 A.D. (preceded by a Persian conquest in 619-629). Many, but insignificant, rebellions (one as early as 30-29 B.C.), chiefly directed against the excessive taxation, could be enumerated. On the popularity of Egyptian religion in Western countries, see § 14.

On the introduction and progress of Christianity, and on the Egyptian or Coptic versions of the Bible, see TEXT. In 62 Annianus was bishop of Alexandria (Mark was the legendary first bishop). The last remnants of heathenism were suppressed by Justinian (527-565) on the island of Philæ, where the rapacious Ethiopian barbarians (the Blemmyans and Nobates) had maintained the worship of Isis. ² The alleged guardianship of the Roman senate does not seem to be a historical fact.

³ Here Ptolemy Eupator is inserted as sixth king in official documents. He does not seem to have reigned.

EGYPT, RIVER OF. The 'Wādy (or 'Torrent') of Mizraim' (מִצְרַיִם הַנְּחָל); AV RIVER, or [Is. 27 12]

1. Identification. STREAM OF EGYPT; RV BROOK OF EGYPT; but both versions of (נחל) are misleading), or simply 'the Wādy' (הַנְּחָל), with 7° of direction; AV RIVER; RV BROOK), Ezek. 47 19 48 28 (see RV, and cp Toy, 'Ezekiel,' SBOT), is frequently mentioned as marking the boundary of Canaan towards the SW.

See Josh. 15 4 [P] φαράγγος αἰγύπτου [BAL]; 15 47 χειμάρρου αἰγ. [BAL]; Nu. 34 5 [P] -ρρον αἰγ. [A], -ρρον αἰγ. [BFL]; 1 K. 8 65 ἕως ποταμοῦ αἰγ. [BA], ἕ. ὄριον ποτ. αἰγ. [L]; 2 K. 24 7 ἀπὸ τοῦ χειμάρρου [BAL]; 2 Ch. 7 8 εἰς χ. αἰγ. [BAL]; Is. 27 12 ἕως ρινοκοροῦρα [BNAQF].

The identification suggested by G¹ in the last-cited passage and adopted by Saadiah in his version of Isaiah is manifestly correct. The Wady of Egypt is not the Wādy Ghassa (the 'torrens Ægypti' of William of Tyre, and perhaps Milton's 'stream that parts Egypt from Syrian ground') but the Wādy el-Arish, which with its deep water-course (only filled after heavy rains) starts from about the centre of the Sinaitic peninsula (near the Jebel et-Tih), and after running N. and NW, finally reaches the sea at the Egyptian fort and town of el-Arish. Here, in late classical times, was an emporium of Nabatæan traffic, to which the name Rhinocorura or Rhinocolura was given. Here, too, travellers halted on the route from Gaza to Pelusium. Titus rested here on his way to Jerusalem (Jos. B/iv. 11 5) and as late as the fourteenth century A. D. the place was much visited by travellers (Ibn Batūta). Owing to the fact that as the boundary of Egypt and Canaan we find in two OT passages (Josh. 13 3 1 Ch. 13 5; see SHIHOR OF EGYPT) an arm of the Nile (the Pelusiac), and in a third passage (Gen. 15 18) the 'river (נהר) of Egypt' (which surely must mean the Wādy el-Arish), some (following Abulfeda, Descr. Æg., ed. Michaelis, 1776, p. 34, no. 68)² have supposed that the Wādy el-Arish was taken for an intermittent channel of the Nile (cp Jer. on Am. 6 1; Reland, Pal. 285 f. 969 ff.). Niebuhr the traveller, on the other hand, seeks the Torrent of Egypt in the largest of three small streams that run into the Mediterranean from the large lake (baheire) which, he says, extended from Damietta eastwards towards Gaza (Descr. de l'Arabie, 360 ff.). All this speculation is needless. If a stream in the neighbourhood of el-Arish is referred to, it can only be the wild torrent-stream that in December suddenly covers the banks of the Wādy el-Arish with verdure (cp Haynes, Palmer Search-expedition, 262), which could never have been confounded with a channel of the Nile (so also Ebers). As for the expression 'the river of Mizraim' (נהר מִצְרַיִם) in Gen. 15 18, either the original reading was נְחָל 'wady, torrent' (Lagarde, Ball), which was altered into נְהַר, 'river (of),' by an idealistic editor, who placed the SW. boundary of Canaan at the Nile, or else, if Winckler's inference³ from a Minæan inscription (Hal. 535) is correct, נַחַר was applied in N. Arabia and its Palestinian neighbourhood to the Wādy el-Arish, which historically at any rate was not undeserving of the name. The latter view seems preferable. It seems to derive support from Gen. 36 37 Nu. 22 5 when emended (see REHOBOTH, PETHOR).

We have still to account for the name ('The Wādy [or Torrent] of Mizraim'). The ordinary explanation makes it equivalent to 'the wādy which in later Jewish times is certain; but does it correctly represent the original meaning of that phrase? This question cannot be answered without considering the Assyriological data. That the nahal Mušur of inscriptions of Sargon and Esarhaddon¹ means, not the Egyptian wādy, but the wādy which runs through the N. Arabian land of Mušri, seems to us beyond doubt, unless, indeed, it can be shown that the extended use of the term Mušri or Mušur had gone out in that king's time. To assert this, however, would be entirely contrary to the evidence. 'Mizraim' should rather be 'Mizrim'. The land of Mušri or Mušur in N. Arabia was repeatedly referred to by the OT writers; but the references were misunderstood by the later scribes. See MIZRAIM, § 2 (δ).

a. b. GERA [g.v.], a Benjamite, the champion of Israel against Moab (Judg. 3 12-30; אַוַּד [superscr. v] Ba^b in 3 30 41). The story is thoroughly archaic in tone, and is a popular tradition (so Moore, Bu.). It tells how Ehud, with a sword concealed under his garment, came bearing tribute to Eglon, king of Moab, at his residence E. of the Jordan, and sought a private audience. Being left-handed he was able to get hold of his sword without exciting the king's suspicions. In this way he quickly wrought Israel's vengeance, and made good his escape. Fleeting by way of Gilgal and the pillars there (see QUARRIES) he called the Israelites to arms and, by seizing the Jordan fords, cut off the retreat of the Moabites on the W. of the river, and slew them every one. See EGLON.

The historicity of the narrative was questioned in 1869 by Nö. (Untersuch. 179), mainly on the ground that both Ehud and Gera are clan-names (cp 2, below). More recently, Wi. (Gesch. 1 158) has drawn attention to the improbability of a Benjamite having been tribute-bearer for Ephraim, and points out that there is little to support the existence of Benjamin before the time of Saul. But the mention of Ehud's origin is due, it would seem, to R_D (so Moore, SBOT), and may very probably be a later trait. That the kernel of the story itself is not homogeneous has been shown by Wi. (Altest. Unt. 55 ff.); a satisfactory analysis has yet to be made. Cp BENJAMIN, § 4. 2. b. Bilhan, in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (g.v. § 9 ii. a) 1 Ch. 7 10 (אַוּב [BL], אַוּבֵי [A], z'hur [Pesh.]).

EHUD (הוּדָה, אַוַּד [BL], אַוַּד [A]; Abihud [Pesh.]), in genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch. 8 6†). Gen. 46 2 has EHI, on which see AHIRAM, and BENJAMIN, § 9, i. The name is doubtless the same as אֲחִיהוּר (see above).

EKER (עֲקֵר), the pointing is uncertain; Pesh. reads o in the first syllable; אַקֹּר [BA], אַקֹּר [L], ben Ram, a Jerahmeelite (1 Ch. 2 27).

EKREBEL (עֲרַבְבֵּל [B]), Judith 7 18†. See AKRA-BATTINE (end).

EKRON (עֲקֵרֹן; אַקְקָרֹן [BAL]; so Jos. also אַקְקָרֹן; these [cp the Assyri.] suggest the pronunciation עֲקֵרֹן, Akkārōn).

The gentilic is Ekronite (עֲקֵרֹנִי): Josh. 13 3 (אַקְקָרֹן[עֲקֵרֹן] [BAL]), 1 Sam. 5 10 (אַקְקָרֹן[עֲקֵרֹן] [BAL]; see below, § 2).

Ekron, the most northerly of the five cities of the Philistines, was first identified by Robinson with the modern 'Ākīr, in 31°51.5' N. lat., 4½ m. E.

1. Site. from Yebnā (JABNEEL, 1) and 9 m. from the sea; in a pass which breaks the low hills that form the northern boundary of the Philistine plain (PEF map, Sh. xvi.). Its position, inland, and not on the trunk, but on a branch, of the great line of traffic northwards, is probably the explanation of the fact that its name is found in the early Egyptian records of conquest and travel only once (*Lists of Thotmes III. RP*², 550) as Aqar. Not 25 m. from Jerusalem as the crow flies, it lay nearer Israel than did any of its sister towns; but, though it was assigned to Judah, 'with its towns and villages from Ekron to the sea' (Josh. 15.45 f. [P]), and again to Dan (ib. 19.43 [P]), we find (ib. 13.2 [D], but probably from older sources)] 'all the regions of the Philistines as far as the north border of Ekron which is counted to the Canaanite' specified as part of the 'much land' that still remained to be possessed after the conquest, and this last representation best accords with all the known facts.

Like her sisters Ekron possessed, along with a market, the shrine and oracle of a deity—BAALZEBUB (q.v.).

2. History. 2 K. 12. In 1 S. 5.10 6.12 f. 16 it is said that from Ekron the ark was returned to the Israelites by the level road up the Vale of Sorek to Beth-shemesh, not 12 m. distant. ^{BL}, however, in this passage reads Ασκαλων in each case for Ekron (cp 6.17 and see Dr., H. P. Sm., ad loc.). Padi, king of Ekron, remained aloof from the general revolt of Philistia in 704 B.C. against Sennacherib, whose prism-inscription gives the name as Am-kar-ru-na. Padi's subjects delivered him to Hezekiah; but Sennacherib in 701 restored him to his throne. The next notices of the town are by Esar-haddon (*KAT*², 164) and Ašur-bāni-pal (Del., Par. 289); and the next (apart from the general history of Philistia, Jer. 25.20 Zeph. 2.4) not till 1 Macc. 10.89 (cp Jos. Ant. xiii. 4.), where it is said to have been given in 147 B.C. by King Alexander Balas to Jonathan the Maccabee for services against Apollonius the general of Demetrius II., an incident supposed by some, but on insufficient grounds, to be referred to in Zech. 9.5-7 (see, however, ZECHARIAH, BOOK OF).

After the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans Jews settled in Ekron. See OS (91.6 218.57) where it is spoken of as a large ('grandis', μεγίστη) village between Azotus and Jamnia, Jerome adding that some identified Accaron with Turris Stratonis (Caesarea). In 1100 A.D. King Baldwin marched from Jerusalem to Ascalon by Ashdod 'inter quam et Jamniam, quae super mare sita est, Accaron dimisimus' (Fulch. Carnot, 23, in Gest. Dei 404, quoted by Robinson; cp Brocardus, 10.186; Marin. Sanit. 165).

When visited by the present writer in 1891 Akir was a small but thriving village. It lies in a slight hollow by a well; Petrie doubts whether the ancient city can have been of much size (PEFQ, 90, p. 245). Built of mud, like most of the towns on the plain, it contains hardly any ancient remains (Robinson and PEFM 2.408). The plain about it is fertile but only partially cultivated; the railway from Jaffa to Jerusalem passes to the north. G. A. S.

The connection between Hezekiah and Ekron has long attracted the attention of students. Sennacherib, whose reference to Padi, king of Ekron,

3. Hezekiah and Ekron. has been already mentioned, states in the same inscription that as a punishment for Hezekiah's revolt he cut off parts of his territory and gave them to certain Philistine kings, one of whom was the king of Ekron. This statement has been taken by M'Curdy to refer to certain towns and villages originally Philistine which Uzziyah had taken from the Philistines (as the Chronicler probably means to assert in 2 Ch. 28.6), which Ahaz had lost (2 Ch. 28.18) and which, as we may infer from 2 K. 18.8 were retaken by Hezekiah. The earlier statement respecting the surrender of Padi implies, according to the same scholar, that Hezekiah was recognised by the people of Ekron as their suzerain (Expos., 1891 b, 389 f.). So much at least appears to be highly probable,—that in the early part of the reign of Hezekiah the king of Ekron was a vassal of the king of Judah, and that he regained his independence only through the humiliation inflicted on Hezekiah by Sennacherib. Hezekiah, however, might console himself by the reflection that Ekron had been captured by the Assyrians and Jerusalem had not.

In the reigns of Esarhaddon and Ašur-bāni-pal we hear of a king of Ekron called Ikausu (with which WMI compares the name Achish), or Ikasamsu, who paid tribute to the great king (COT 2.41 KB 2.149 240). Soon after this a Hebrew prophet declares that Ekron 'shall be rooted up,' suggesting an etymology natural from an Israelite point of view, names being taken as prophetic of the fortunes of their bearers. The modern name 'Akir suggests the far more probable meaning 'sterile' (so Guthe; cp Ar. 'akara, Heb. 'ākār). The dreary nature of the plain close to Ekron may serve to account for the name. G. A. S., § 1 f.; T. K. C., § 3.

6. Father of SHIMEI [3] (1 K. 4.18 אֱלָה RV ELA). His name should be restored in 2 S. 23.11 in place of the MT reading אֱלָה (see AGEH), and possibly also in v. 33 for Shammah. Cp the ingenious discussion in Marq. (Fund. 20 f.).

ELAH, VALLEY OF (אֱלָה הַבְּרִית), 'Valley of the Terebinth,' cp ^{BL}, the scene of the combat between David and Goliath (1 S. 17.2), and of the rout of the Philistines (21.9 [10]).

^{BL}'s readings are: in 1 S. 17.2, εν τη κοιλαδι αυτου! [BA], της δρυος ουτου και ουτου [L], κ. της δρυος [Aq. Theod.]; in v. 19 εν τη κ. της δρυος [AL, om. B]; in 21.9 [10] κ. ηλα [BAL].

Assuming that 'in Ephes-dammim' and 'in the valley of Elah' mean the same thing, we have the names Socoh and Azekah (51) to guide us in determining the locality, also the implied fact that the valley ran westward. No doubt the valley meant is the Wady es-Sant, one of the landmarks of the country, which begins near Hebron, runs northward as far as Shuweikeh, and thence westward by Gath and Ashdod, to the sea, joining the N. Sukerér. On the positions of the opposed armies, see EPHESDAMMIM. According to W. Miller,² who has made a special study of the country, the valley of Elah, or 'of the terebinth,' is the gentle ascent with a watercourse which leads up from a break in the line of heights to Bêt Nettif (nearly opposite Shuweikeh, but more eastward). 'In the valley beneath barley is already ripening. The torrent is nearly dried up (see EPHESDAMMIM), its bed is strewn with smooth white pebbles, and the red sides of the bed are in places so steep that you might call it a valley "within a valley." It is this torrent-bed which the narrator, with perfect knowledge of the country, refers to under the name of the ravine; "the ravine" (אֱלָה), he says, "was between them."³ The suggestion for the explanation of אֱלָה is due to Conder (PEFQ, '75, 193). Some of his other identifications are hardly correct (see EPHES-DAMMIM, SHAARAIM, 1); but he has here thrown great light on the narrative. See also GASm. HG 226 ff.

One advantage in Miller's theory of the valley of Elah (see above) is that it offers a simple explanation of the twofold name of the valley which was the seat of war. A very fine specimen of the date-tree (terebinth) grows on the slope leading up to Bêt Netfîr. It is conceivable that the name of the great valley as a whole was, even in antiquity, 'valley of the acacias' (sant = acacia, or rather mimosa). Wellhausen supposes the Wady es-Sanî to be meant by the Valley of Shittim in Joel 3[4]18. It is a pity that we can hardly explain רְמִים רְמִים as a corruption of רְמִים. See EPHES-DAMMIM. T. ELAM (עֲלַם; ΔΙΛΑΜ [BNADQL]). Geographically, the name describes the great plain E. of the lower

1. Geography. Tigris and N. of the Persian Gulf, together with the mountain districts which enclose it on the N. and E., and to which the Hebrew name Elam and the Assyrian *Elamtu*¹ (note fem. ending) refer. It is nearly equivalent to the Susiana and Elymais of the Greeks, and the mod. Khūzistān. The native kings of this country called themselves lords of Anšan (or Anzan); so late a king as Cyrus still calls himself king of Anšan. This name was originally borne by a city, the conquest of which by Gudea, 'vicegerent' (patess) of Lagas, between 3500 and 3000 B.C., is recorded in an inscription (KB 339); it afterwards designated a district in Elam (see CYRUS, § 1). Leaving the geography of this region, which has been fully treated from cuneiform sources by Fried. Delitzsch (Par. 320-329), we pass to the references to Elam in the OT.

The earliest of these is that in Is. 226 (ελαμ[ε]ται [BANQ]), where Elam and Kir are mentioned together as entrusted with the duty of hockkading

2. Biblical references. Jerusalem. The difficulty in this passage is that the Elamites were never loyal subjects of the Assyrians, and are never mentioned in the inscriptions as serving in an Assyrian army, but often as allies of the Babylonians (Del., Par. 237; Che. Intr. Is. 133; cp Proph. Is. 132 f.). Interpolation has been suspected; but this is not the only admissible theory (see 'Isaiah', SBOT). The next certainly dated passage is Ezek. 3224 (ελαμ [Q]), where 'Elam and all her multitude' are mentioned in a grand description of the inhabitants of Shēōl. The fate of Elam preoccupied more than one of the prophets; 'all the kings of Elam' are referred to in Jer. 2525 (om. *N*A) immediately before 'all the kings of Media,' and a special prophecy against Elam is given in Jer. 4934-39 (v. 36 ελαμ [*N]); but we cannot with any certainty ascribe these to Jeremiah (see JEREMIAH, BOOK OF). In Is. 212 (ελαμ[ε]ται [BANQ]), late exilic Elam is named with Media as the destroyer of Babylon, and a plausible emendation introduces Elam ('go up, O Elam') into a passage of similar purport in Jer. 5021 (late). In Dan. 82 (αιλαμ [BAQG Theod.], ελυμαιδι [87]) Shushan is referred to as in Elam, though in Ezra 49 (ηλαμαιοι [BA], αιλαμται [L]) it is seemingly distinguished from it; and according to Is. 1111 (αιλαμ[ε]των [BA], ελαμ. [NQ], late), Esth. 9613 (Shushan) Acts 29 (ελαμείται [Ti. WH]), Jewish exiles resided in Elam in the post-exilic period.

We come lastly to Gen. 1022 [P] (αλαδ [E]), where Elam is mentioned immediately before Asshur as a 'son' of Shem. How is this to be accounted for? Not by the supposition that the Elamites were Semitic (as we now use the word) either in language or in physical type, or that at least a primitive Semitic population was settled in the lower parts of Elam. Not by referring to the early conquest of Babylonia by the Elamites; this might account for the description of Babylonia as a 'son of' Japheth, but not for the case before us: nor yet by the fact that a Kassite dynasty ruled in Babylonia in 1726-1159 B.C. — a reference which would only be in point if P were pre-exilic; but rather by the undoubted fact that Elam was repeatedly chastised by the Assyrians, and that parts of it were annexed by Sargon (KB 273). P was enough of a historian to know this; he may indeed have inferred it from Is. 226. The view of De Goeje (Tb. T., '70, p. 251) that Elam in Gen. 1022 is the Persian Empire is therefore to be rejected. As De Goeje himself remarks, it is strange that, if Elam has this meaning, Media should be a son of Japheth (v. 2). It is true, however, that the prominence of Elam in the Persian empire explains the precedence which it has among the sons of Shem, and the insertion of Lud (i.e., probably Lydia) after Arphaxad may receive a similar explanation (see LUD, 1).

The history of Elam is closely interwoven with that of primitive Babylonia, and subsequently with that of the Assyrian, the Babylonian, and the Persian empires. See ARIOCH, 3; AŠUR-BĀNI-PAL, § 6; BABYLONIA, § 42 ff.; CHEDORLAOMER, CYRUS, NANEĀ, PERSIA, SHUSHAN. T. K. C.

ELAM (עֲלַם, ΗΛΑΜ [BA], ΔΙΛ. [L]).

1. The b'ne Elam were a family, 1254 in number, in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA ii, § 9, § 8c), Ezra 27 (αλαμ [B], αιλ. [AL]) = Neh. 712 (ελαμ [K], αιλ. [BAL]) = 1 Esd. 512 (ωλαμος [B]). In a passage from the 'memoirs of Ezra' (Ezra 727-834; see EZRA i, § 2; ii, § 15 [1] d) is given as seventy, Ezra 87 (ηλα [B]) = 1 Esd. 833 (ααμ [B], αλ. [A]). One of the best known members of this clan was SHECANIAH (g.v., 4), Ezra 102 (αλιγ, kib. b. but ελιγ, kre.; ισραηλ [L] in || 1 Esd. 892 'Israel' ισραηλ [BAL]) occurs instead of 'Elam'. Various members are mentioned in the list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i, § 5, end), Ezra 1026 = 1 Esd. 927 (ηλα [B]); and the clan was represented among the signatories to the covenant (see EZRA i, § 7), Neh. 2014 [15].

The name 'Elam' for a Jewish family or temple-guild is highly improbable. There is abundant evidence that names containing the root-letters על were Benjamite. One of these is עלמתי (Alemeth) which may have been written 'עלמי'. If the mark of abbreviation were overlooked it would be natural to insert ו after ע. Alemeth is identical with Almon, the name of a priestly city in Benjamin (Josh. 2118 P). Notice also the occurrence of the name in 3 below.

2. The children of the 'other Elam' (היהם עלים) in Ezra 231 = Neh. 734 (Ezra, ηλαμαρ [BA], Neh. ηλαμααρ [BA]; [υιοι] αιλαμ έτερον [L]) are unmentioned in || 1 Esd. 5, and seem to have arisen from a needless repetition of v. 7; the numbers are identical (cp Be.-Ry. 18).

Elath or Eloth (i.e., great trees, perhaps date-palms?) is probably but a later designation of EL-PARAN (see PARAN)—i.e., Elath which lies on the desert of Paran. It was situated on the N.E. arm of the Red Sea, in the Aelanitic Gulf (which has derived its name from the place itself), and was close to EZION-GEBER (q.v.).

According to Pliny v. 11 12) it was situated 10 m. E. of Petra and 150 m. S.E. of Gaza. The region has always been famous for its date-palms (cp Strabo, 16776); and Mukaddasi Ibn el-Bennā (1000 A.D.) in his geography says that Walla (Elath) is 'the harbour of Palestine and the granary of Hīgāz—rich in palms and fishes' (cp ZDPV 7 171, and Wetzstein in Del. Hoh. u. Koh. 168). Owing to its commanding situation and central position the possession of Elath has in all ages been fiercely contested. According to Hommel (AHT 195), the ancient town and port Mair mentioned upon old Bab. contract-tablets, which gave its name to sbips and textile fabrics, is the same as Elath.

Apart from its occurrence under the form EL-PARAN (see PARAN) (Gen. 146), it is mentioned as one of the last stages of the Israelites (Dt. 28; see WANDERINGS, §§ 4, 11, 13). It is mentioned also in 1 K. 9 26 2 Ch. 8 17, in order to mark the position of EZION-GEBER (q.v.). It passed through various vicissitudes. It was repaired by Azariah (2 K. 14 22; see UZZIAH, 1), but was at a later time recovered by Edom (2 K. 16 6: with Klostermann cancel 'Rezin' and read 'Edom for 'Aram,' and 'Edomites' [kr.] for 'Aramites' [kt.]; but cp EDOM, § 8). Jerome and Eusebius state that Elath (Ailath, αιλανι) in their time was a place of commercial importance, and the seat of a Roman legion (OS⁽²⁾ 8 125 210 75). It was renowned for its trading with India (Theod. Quest. in Jerem. 100 49; Procop. Bell. Pers. 1 19).

Elath was the residence of a Christian bishop and of a Jewish colony. After suffering at the hands of Saladin it dwindled away. Abulfeda (1300) knows of it only as a place deserted save for a castle which was built to protect the pilgrims who journeyed along by Elath between Cairo and Mecca on the road made by Ahmad ibn-Tūlūn, who reigned in Egypt in the latter half of the ninth century.¹ It is known now as 'Akāba ('decivity'). Little is left of the former 'gate of Arabia' but some heaps of ruins, and the castle, which is still occupied by a few soldiers.²

EL-BETHEL (אֵל־בֵּית־אֵל, 'the god of Bethel'), the name given by Jacob to the sacred spot at Luz where he had built an altar (Gen. 35 7). ⁶ADEL, Vg., Pesh. read simply 'Bethel'; but this is against Gen. 28 19. Perhaps we should read El-berith ('covenant-God'), or El-berith-Israel, 'Israel's covenant-God'.

² According to Jos. (Ant. viii. 6 4, λαβους, ix. 12 1, ηλαθους, ed. Niese), Elath in former times was called Berenice. The ordinary editions, it will be noticed, refer this remark to Ezion-geber, which is less suitable.

(Kue. Hex. 247 f.). The names Eldad and Medad (which perhaps do not belong to the original narrative) were probably selected from a store of old traditional names for the sake of assonance (cp Bera, Birsha; Jabal, Jubal, etc.). It is not at all certain that the names are almost identical. See APOCRYPHA, § 23.

In its present form the prominent feature of the story is that these two men (alone of the seventy elders) for some unknown reason remained behind, and prophesied without going into the tent. Moses' answer shows clearly that the real point is that prophecy is not to be restricted to the few. In v. 26 the words וְיָצְאוּ הַמְּדָדִים וְיָצְאוּ הָאֵלְדָדִים are probably a gloss.¹ A late scribe took exception to the idea that the power of prophecy could be given to anyone outside the seventy elect, and so inserted the gloss with the above effect. The inclusion of Eldad and Medad among 'those that were written down' does not seem, therefore, to belong to the original form of the story.

ELEALEH (עֵלְאֵלֶה, and עֵלְאֵלֶיָהּ Nu. 32 37, 'God is high'; ελεαλη [BNA]), a Moabite town always associated with Heshbon (Is. 15 4 16 9, ελλαησεν [Bab AQ cp Sw. ad loc.]; Jer. 48 34 om. BN, ελεαλη [AQ]), and assigned in Nu. 32 37 to the Reubenites. Eusebius (OS⁽²⁾ 253 33) places it 1 R. m. N. from Heshbon.

Probably Elealeh should be restored for the questionable עֵלְאֵלֶיָהּ in Is. 15 8. To invent a place-name Erelayim (Perles, Marti) is imprudent. It is quite true, however, that the initial א ought to be the preposition.

Elealeh seems to be the modern el-'Al ('the lofty'), an isolated hill, with ruins, $\frac{1}{2}$ hr. NNE. of Heshbon. See SEP 1 16-19; Tristr. Moab, 339 f.; Bäd.⁽²⁾ 174.

ELEASA, RV Elasa (ελλασα [A], ελ-[NV]; ⁶אֵלְאָסָא), Elesa [It.], Laisa [Vg.], an unknown locality in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem, where Judas the Maccabee encamped before the encounter which resulted in his defeat and death (1 Macc. 9 5). Josephus (Ant. xii. 11 1) places Judas's camp in Berzetho (the readings vary: βερθη, βερθηθω, βερ. and βερ.); but this may be in error for the Syrian camp which (1 Macc. 9 4) was at BEREIA [1] (Syr. Birath). A suggested identification is Kh. Il'asā between the Beth-horons (PEFM 3 115). Reland, however, suggests ADASA (q.v.).

Both Eleazar and Eliezer are very common names, especially in post-exilic times and in lists of priests; with regard to the authenticity of the latter see EZRA i. §§ 1, 2, 5 end; ii. §§ 15 (1) d. 13 g.

1. The third son of Aaron and Elisheba (Ex. 6 23 [P]) is mentioned often in P, but only twice in JE, according to Driver—viz., in Dt. 10 6 and Josh. 24 33.² What we learn of him is to this effect. He discharged priestly functions together with Aaron and his brothers Nadab, Abihu, and Ithamar (Ex. 28 1), and after the two elder brothers had died childless Ithamar and he were left to carry on the duties alone (Nu. 3 4), Eleazar himself becoming the 'prince of the princes of the Levites' and superintending those that had the charge of looking after the sanctuary (Nu. 3 32; cp 16 37 ff. [17 2 ff.] 19 3 f.). His special duty with respect to the

² From Dt. 10 6 Di. and Dr. infer that JE, as well as P, knows of Aaron as a priest, and of Eleazar as Aaron's successor. Robertson Smith, however, holds (OTJC⁽²⁾, 405, n. 2) that Dt things necessary for the sanctuary and its service is detailed in Nu. 4.16. Shortly before Aaron's death he was invested on Mt. Hor with his father's garments of authority (Nu. 20.25 ff.; cp Dt. 10.6 [D]). He now appears as Moses' coadjutor, taking the place of Aaron; together they took the census of the people (Nu. 26.63), and divided the spoil of the Midianites (Nu. 31.12 ff.). It was to them that the daughters of Zelophehad came to sue for an inheritance (Nu. 27.1 ff.), and the b'ne Reuben and b'ne Gad for a pasture-land for their flocks (Nu. 32.2 ff.).¹ The charge was given to Joshua in the presence of Eleazar, who was 'to inquire for him by the judgment of Urim before Yahwé' (Nu. 27.18 ff.); just as his son Phinehas is said to have done, previous to the assault on Gibeah (Judg. 20.28).² Henceforth in the accounts of the dividing of the land etc. Eleazar is mentioned before Joshua (Nu. 32.28 34.17 Josh. 14.17 19.51 21.1).³ At his death he was buried at Gibeah of Phinehas (Josh. 24.33 [E]), which had been given to his son in Mt. Ephraim. He married 'one of the daughters of Putiel' (Ex. 6.25), and the priesthood is said to have remained in his family till the time of Eli, and again from Zadok till the time of the Maccabees—statements which need a strictly critical examination. See ZADOK, 1.

2. Son of Abinadab, temp. Samuel. According to a comparatively late story the ark was deposited for twenty years in the house of Abinadab at Kirjath-jearim under the guardianship of his son Eleazar (1 S. 7.1 ff.). Eleazar in this 'idealisation' of history is intended as a contrast to that other son of Abinadab (Uzza) who proved wanting in the reverence essential to a minister of the ark (2 S. 6.36). His name is probably meant to suggest this contrast. Observe that Eleazar was specially 'sanctified' for his functions. See ARK, § 5.

3. b. Dodo the Ahohite (1 Ch. 11.12), or b. Dodai b. Ahohi (2 S. 23.9; but see AHOHITE [2]), one of David's 'three' heroes. His great exploit (which was in the valley of 'Rephaim': see PAS-DAMMIM) is recorded in 2 S. 23.9 ff. (E^b, however, has ελεαζαρ) and 1 Ch. 11.13 ff. In both passages the text has to be emended; but there is much difference among critics (cp Klo., Marq. Fund. 16, and H. P. Smith). The name of Eleazar does not appear in 1 Ch. 27.4, though we expect to find him, not Dodai, in high command in David's army. Compare, however, DODAI, and note that an Eliezer b. Dodavahu occurs in 2 Ch. 20.37. See ELIEZER (3).

4. A Merarite: 1 Ch. 23.21 f. (ελεαζαρ v. 21 [A]) 24.28.

5. 1 Esd. 8.43 = Ezra 8.16, ELIEZER [10].

6. In Ezra 8.33 an Eleazar, son of Phinehas, is mentioned as superintending the weighing out of gold and silver in the temple: 1 Esd. 8.63 and (om. BN^aA, but ελεαζαρ N^c.a mg. L) Neh. 13.42.

7. A priest in the list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA 1, § 5 end), 1 Esd. 9.19 (ελεαζαρ [BA]) = Ezra 10.18, ELIEZER (7).

8. An Israelite (i.e., a layman), son of Parosh: Ezra 10.25 1 Esd. 9.26.

9. The fourth son of Mattathias (1 Macc. 2.5), who bore the surname Avaran (cp AURANUS).⁴ According to 2 Macc. 8.23 ff.

10. 66 (the words after 'Moserah') is plainly a late and unauthorised gloss; he refers to v. 8, where the institution of the Levitical priesthood is assigned to a later stage of the wanderings. It is of ELIEZER that the older tradition speaks, as a son, however, not of Aaron, but (together with Gershom) of Moses. In fact, in JE, Moses has the prior claim to the priestly office, and in J Aaron originally is not mentioned at all. In the genealogies of P even, one main branch of the tribe of Levi is still called Gershom, and another important member is called Mushi—i.e., the Mosäite (see We. Prosl. 138 f., ET 142 f.).

² Judg. 20 in its present form is post-exilic, and vv. 27^b, 28a are no doubt glosses (see Moore, Judges, 434; Kue. Einkl. § 20, n. 10).

³ All in P; in JE on the contrary Josua is always represented as acting alone; cp 14.6 17.14 etc.

his brother Judas appointed him to read aloud the sacred book, and with a variation of his own name as watchword ('the Help of God') he led the first band of the army against Nicanor and completely defeated him; in 2 Macc. 13.15 this is credited to Judas himself. In the fight near Beth-zacharias against Antiochus Eupator (163 B.C.) Eleazar nobly sacrificed his life (see 1 Macc. 6.43).

10. A learned scribe, who at the age of ninety years suffered torture and martyrdom at the hands of Antiochus Epiphanes, 2 Macc. 6.18-31 (ελεαζαρος [VA]). He was designated by the early Christian fathers 'proto-martyr of the old covenant,' 'foundation of martyrdom' (Chrys. Hom. 3 in Macc. et al.).

The narrative in 3 Macc. 6 has apparently borrowed the name Eleazar from this scribe. See APOCALYPTIC, § 66.

ELEMENTS (στοιχεῖα; elementa). Στοιχεῖον, from στοιχος, 'a row,' 'a line,' 'a rank,' means literally what belongs to a row or line, a member of a series, a part of an organism. This fundamental meaning gives the key to the exceedingly interesting history of the word from its use in Plato down to Modern Greek. All the special senses in which it is employed, whether 'usual' or 'occasional'—some of them very remarkable—can be carried back to this, though between the meanings 'one of a row' and 'demon' is a long way. It conduces to clearness if we keep in mind its three special concrete applications.

(a) It denotes a 'letter,' as one of the series of letters constituting a word or even a syllable—i.e., not a written sign (γράμμα) but a speech-sound (Plato, Def. 414 E: στοιχεῖον φωνῆς φωνῆ ἀσύνθετος: similarly Arist. Poet. 20). Thus, for example, the letter ρ is τὸ βῶ τὸ στοιχεῖον (Plat. Crat. 426 D), the alphabet is τὰ στοιχεῖα, and 'alphabetical' is κατὰ στοιχεῖον.

This concrete meaning explains the metonymy by which the plural is so frequently used to denote the beginnings, rudiments, or 'elements' of a science or art—the ABC as we say; cp the by-name Abecedarians given to a group of Anabaptists at the Reformation, and see the Oxford Engl. Dict., s.v. It is enough to recall the title of Euclid's work (στοιχεῖα) on the Elements of Geometry. Many other examples are to be found in the Lexicons.

In this sense the word is met with only once in the Bible, 'ye have need again that some one teach you the rudiments of the first principles of the oracles of God (τὰ στοιχεῖα τῆς ἀρχῆς τῶν λογίων τοῦ Θεοῦ),' Heb. 5.12, where the words τῆς ἀρχῆς intensify the idea, 'the beginnings of the elements.'²

(b) Shadow of the sundial (e.g., Aristoph. Eccl. 652: ὅταν ᾖ δεκάπουν τὸ στοιχεῖον, 'when the shadow measures ten feet'). The shadow is here doubtless thought of as a line which hour by hour grows longer or shorter and by degrees marks the progress of the day. Στοιχεῖον, properly speaking, is a fraction of this line, and then by synecdoche becomes the line itself. This meaning is not met with in the Bible.

(c) 'Groundstuff,' 'element,' as constituent part of an organism. In this sense it was not used (so ancient for ελεαζαρος αραρ; E^b corrects to αραρ. The meaning is doubtful. Some connect with ἡρῖ 'be white' and refer it to Eleazar's white complexion; others understand it to mean 'beast-sticker'; see Stanley, Jewish Church, 331 f.

tradition has it) before Plato; but from his time onward it became a current meaning. The early philosophers assumed sometimes one, sometimes more than one, primary constituent element of the universe. Empedocles reckoned four—fire, water, earth, and air. Many citations from non-biblical writers will be found in the Lexicons; and Philo and Josephus also use the word in this sense. In the Greek Bible the following examples occur:—Wisd. 7.17, 'For he himself gave me an unerring knowledge of the things that are; to know the constitution of the world and the operation of the elements (συστασιν κόσμου καὶ ἐνέργειαν στοιχείων)'; 19.18, 'the elements changing their order one with another (δὲ αὐτῶν γὰρ τὰ στοιχεῖα μεταρροζόμενα)'; 4 Macc. 12.13 '[the tongues of men] of like passions with yourself, and composed of the same elements' (τοὺς ὁμοιοπαθεῖς καὶ ἐκ τῶν αὐτῶν γεγονότας στοιχείων); cp 2 Macc. 7.22, 'the first elements [στοιχείωσιν] of each one of you'; and, according to most exegetes, 2 Pet. 3.10, 'the day of the Lord will come as a thief; in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise (στοιχεῖα δὲ καυσούμενα λυθῆσεται [AKL, etc., λυθῆσονται]), and the earth and the works that are therein shall be burned up'; also v. 12, 'the day of God by reason of which the heavens being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat' (δὲ ἡν οὐρανὸν πυρὸν μνομι λυθῆσονται καὶ στοιχεῖα καυσούμενα τήσεται). The rendering 'elements' here gives an excellent sense, and it would be mere pedantry to ask why the elements are named along with the heavens and the earth; the writer's purpose is to depict the last day in the boldest colours, and he seeks to heighten the effect of his picture by bringing in the στοιχεῖα. At the same time the interpretation which takes the word here to refer to demonic life-spirits (see below, 2) is entitled to attention. Though the sense of 'rudiments' or 'beginnings,' alluded to above, is hardly to be traced to this last concrete application of the word, the very usual metonymic sense of 'fundamental condition,' 'thesis,' 'principle,' 'rule'—of which there is no example in the Bible—is doubtless to be taken from this meaning. On the other hand, the biblical passages receive much light from another part of the history of the word: the concrete sense in which in late Greek the word στοιχεῖα is specialised to mean the planets (as being the 'elements' and so to say 'supports' of the heavens)¹ and, more widely, the stars.²

Now every element has its god;³ so also every star. In the Orphic Hymns the personified ether is called the 'noblest element,' στοιχεῖον ἀριστον (54), Hephaestus is called the 'perfect element,' στοιχεῖον ἀμειψές (65.4), in the great Paris magic-papyrus v. 1303 the moon-goddess is the 'immortal element,' στοιχεῖον ἀθάρατον, and in the so-called 'nymph of the world,' the Κόρη κόσμου of Hermes Trismegistus (ap. Stob. Ecl. i. 385.12 ff.), the στοιχεῖα come as gods before the supreme god, and make their complaint of the arrogance of men.⁴ Conceptions such as these perhaps owe their origin to eastern influences; but at any rate they have their analogues in the Jewish idea that all things—as, for example, fire, wind, clouds, stars—have their proper angels or spirits,⁵ a thought which is operative in primitive Christian literature also; see Rev. 7.1 (four angels standing at the four corners of the earth, holding the four winds of the earth), 14.18 (another angel . . . which hath power over fire), 16.5 (the angel of the waters; cp Jn. 5.4), 19.17 (an angel standing in the sun). It is from these notions probably that we ought to explain the peculiar meaning of στοιχεῖον, in which it stands, by synecdoche, for 'divine being,' 'spirit,' 'demon,' 'genius.' At what period this use first arose is obscure; but doubtless it is comparatively old. Our main examples¹ are found in the Testamentum Salomonis (see APOCRYPHA, § 14), which in its present form bears evidence of Christian editing, and by F. A. Bornemann is attributed to the time of Lactantius.²

Seven female spirits (πνεύματα) come to Solomon, and, questioned, reply: 'We are some of the thirty-three genii of the ruler of the underworld . . . and our stars are in heaven . . . and we are invoked as goddesses' (ἡμεῖς ἐσμέν ἐκ τῶν τριάκοντα τριῶν στοιχείων τοῦ κοσμοκράτορος τοῦ σκότους . . . καὶ τὰ ἀστρά ἡμῶν ἐν οὐρανῷ εἰσιν . . . καὶ ὡς θεαὶ καλοῦμεθα; Fleck,³ 120. f.). Afterwards come six and thirty spirits (πνεύματα) to Solomon, and, questioned, make answer: 'We are the thirty-six genii, the rulers of this underworld, . . . since the Lord God has given thee power over every spirit, in the air, upon the earth and below the earth, therefore we also like the rest of the spirits stand before thee' (ἡμεῖς ἐσμέν τὰ τριάκοντα ἐξ στοιχείων οἱ κοσμοκράτορες τοῦ σκότους τούτου . . . ἐπειδὴ κύριος ὁ θεὸς ἔδωκε σοὶ τὴν ἐξουσίαν ἐπὶ παντός πνεύματος ἀέριου τε καὶ ἐπιγείου καὶ καταχθονίου, εἰς τοῦτο καὶ ἡμεῖς παριστάμεθα ἐνώπιόν σου ὡς τὰ λοιπὰ πνεύματα). The first calls himself the 'first decan of the zodiac circle' (πρῶτος δεκανὸς τοῦ ζωδιακοῦ κύκλου; Fleck, 129. f.). Plainly stoicheion here is absolutely synonymous with 'god' and 'spirit,' and we are here dealing, in part, with star-gods. Further, the usage of writers of the Byzantine period has to be noticed. Sophocles (Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine periods, memorial edition, 1888, p. 1012) gives under στοιχεῖον 'genius,' 'the spirit guarding a particular place or person,' also 'talisman,' Theoph. Cont. 379.14, Leo Gram. 287, Anon. Byz. 1209 C. Cp the same Lexicon also, σ.σ.σ. στοιχειολάτρης, στοιχειῶν ('to perform talismanic operations upon anything'), στοιχειωματικός ('talismanic'), στοιχειώσεις ('the performing of talismanic operations upon anything'), and στοιχειωτικός ('talismanic'). Most instructive of all, however, is the usage of modern popular Greek. The ordinary name by which the local tutelary spirits are designated in modern Greece is στοιχειῶν (τό)—i.e., στοιχεῖον, 'element.'⁴ Skarlatos, Λεξικόν . . ., gives the meaning κατοικίδια δαίμονια ἢ φαντάσματα (ιδ.). All sorts of στοιχεῖα occur; the στοιχειῶν of the threshing-floor, the rock, the river, the bridge, and so on (ιδ. 187-9); στοιχειωμένος may mean 'one under the protection of a στοιχειῶν' (ιδ. 196). This employment of the word for 'tutelary spirit' is a specialisation of the more general meaning of 'spirit,' and speaks for the relative antiquity of the latter use; in the ideas and vocabulary of the common people, as Jacob Grimm among others has shown, the conception of a remote antiquity will often be found to survive.

Here then is the historical line of progression from the original meaning of the word to that of tutelary spirit: member of a series, element, elemental deity, deity (demon, spirit), tutelary deity.

In Gal. 4.3, where Paul says: ' . . . so we also, when we were children, were held in bondage under the elements of the world' (ὑπὸ τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου), and in v. 9, where he says, 'But now that ye have come to know God, . . . how turn ye back again to the weak and beggarly elements (ἐπὶ τὰ ἀσθενῆ καὶ πτωχὰ στοιχεῖα) whereunto ye desire to be in bondage over again,' στοιχεῖα is taken by most interpreters as meaning 'rudiments' (so RV) in the sense indicated above (1 a); Paul is supposed to mean the crude first beginnings of religion in those who belong to the κόσμος. Others, however, start from the meaning given in § 1 c and take Paul to be speaking of the elements of the world, 'world' being here taken in its well-known ethical sense; kosmos is the central idea; 'under the elements of the world' (ὑπὸ τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου)

This last interpretation is certainly open to the objection that in v. 9, only στοιχεῖα are mentioned, whereas if κόσμος had been the main idea, we should have expected the shortened phrase to run ὑπὸ τῶν . . . κόσμων and not ὑπὸ τῶν . . . στοιχεῖα. The first interpretation also, however, is not free from difficulty. In v. 3 it is the law, in one sense or another, that is being spoken of: this is shown by the context (cp especially v. 5: ὑπὸ νόμου); but in v. 9 the topic is the gods of the Gentile Galatians. It is not easy to understand how Paul can here be speaking of the law as 'rudiments' after he had so shortly before been referring to it (3.24) as a 'tutor' (παιδαγωγός) and likening it (4.2) to 'guardians and stewards' (ἐπίτροποι and οἰκονόμοι); nor is it easy to see how he can say of 'rudiments' that they are ἀσθενή και πτωχά; 'a weak and beggarly ABC' is not a very happy phrase. Further, the whole context in both places points less to conceptions of material objects than to personal beings; see especially v. 9.

In view of these difficulties, there is much to be said for the interpretation which takes the word in the other sense (see § 1c, end) of 'spirit,' 'demon.' Paul, in this view, is speaking of cosmic spiritual beings, and by them he understands, in v. 3 the angels by whom, according to 3.19, the law was 'ordained,' and in v. 9 the heathen deities whom the Galatians had formerly served. Jewish bondage to the law, as being bondage to angels, and Gentile service of strange gods as being bondage to demons, are alike slavery to the powers of the world (die kosmischen Mächte). This interpretation, the essence of which consists in taking στοιχεῖα as meaning personal powers (persönliche Mächte) has been upheld with a large variety of modifications by Hilgenfeld,¹ A. Ritschl,² Holsten,³ Klöpffer,⁴ Spitta,⁵ Everling,⁶ A. Dieterich,⁷ whose allusion to 'all the modern theological commentators' seems hardly called for.

It may fairly be conjectured that the phrase the 'elements of the world' (στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου) is a technical expression which does not owe its origin to Paul. That it was a current one seems to be indicated also by the turn of phrase in the Testamentum Salomonis 'the elements, the rulers' (τὰ στοιχεῖα οἱ κοσμοκράτορες), or 'the elements of the ruler' (τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κοσμοκράτορος).

In Col. 2.8, 20, also, this last interpretation seems preferable to the rendering 'elements of the world' or 'rudiments of the world.' The context is in both places similar to that in Gal. 4.3. By the στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, which he brings into sharp contrast with Christ, Paul intends in one sense or another the law; but he mentions, instead of the law, the personal cosmic powers standing behind the law, the angels; whom indeed, he goes on expressly to name in Col. 2.15 as the 'principalities and the powers' (τὰς ἀρχὰς και τὰς ἐξουσίας). We thus obtain a surprising light upon the much-disputed passage in Col. 2.18, where mention is made of a 'worship of angels' (θρησκεία τῶν ἀγγέλων): by the 'angel service' of the Colossians he means their 'law service' (cp Gal. 3.19); all the learned discussions about one particular kind of angel worship or another now become superfluous.

That in 2 Pet. 3.10, 12 the rendering 'elements' is an adequate one has already been shown (§ 1c). Yet it is not impossible that personal powers might be meant here also, as Spitta⁸ and Kühn⁹ suppose. The main objection—that the expressions 'dissolve' and 'melt' (λυθῆσεται, τήκεται) could hardly be used of personal spirits—is well met by Spitta, by a reference to the Test. xii. Patr., Levi, 4 (ed. Sinker, 140), where, in a similar way, in the description of the judgment day, it is said 'the whole creation being agitated and the invisible spirits melting' (και πάσης κτίσεως κλονουμένης και τῶν ἀόρατων πνευμάτων τηκομένων).

ELEPH (הַאֵלֶפֶת, Hā-eleph, i. e., 'the thousand,' Josh. 18.28) is supposed to be a Benjamite town, and, according to Conder and Henderson, is the modern Liftā; see, however, NEPHTHOAI.

Ⲙ reads και σήλαφ [A], κ. σελαελαφ [L], to which apparently corresponds I's σεληκαι (variants from H-P are σθαλελεφ σηλαεμ, σελαλακ, σεφαλεθ κελα ελεφ); Pesh. has ܡܪܝܩܝܢܐ, perhaps punctuating as ܡܪܝܩܝܢܐ 'a chieftain'?

Before 'identifying,' it would have been well to examine the text. The two names before 'Jebus' in Ⲙ are και σεληκαι και θαρηλα—i. e. וצלע ותראה; και is a duplication of και; σελη corresponds to זלע. Zela and Taralah therefore answer in Ⲙ to Zelah and Ha-eleph in MT. Ha-eleph (which is an impossible name) must be a corruption of Tar'alah or rather (see TARALAH) of Irpeel (אִרְפֵּל); הַאֵלֶפֶת comes straight from אֵלֶפֶת. T. K. C.

ELEPHANT (ελεφάνς). The word 'elephant' occurs, outside the Apocrypha, only in the AVMS of Job 40.15 for BEHEMOTH [g. v. § 1] and in the 1. Early AVMS of 1 K. 10.22 2 Ch. 9.21 ('elephant's teeth') for IVORY [g. v.]. It is an elephant of the Indian species that appears on the Black Obelisk (see below); but the African elephant also was no doubt known.

The two species, Elephas indicus (maximus) and E. africanus, together with such fossil forms as the Mammoth (name probably from Behemoth),¹ the Mastodon, and others, constitute the Mammalian order Proboscidea. The Indian elephant is now found, in a state of nature, in India, Burma, the Malay Peninsula, Assam, Cochin China, Ceylon, and Sumatra, frequenting the wooded districts; its African congener lives throughout Africa south of the Sahara desert, but is retreating before the approach of civilised man. In Pleistocene times it spread as far north as Europe.

The Indian species has been domesticated since prehistoric times and is still largely used in the service of man. The male alone as a rule has tusks. The African elephant is, in the male, larger than the Indian, the ear-flaps and the eyes are larger and the forehead more convex, there are two finger-like processes on the trunk instead of one, and the pattern on the teeth is different; both sexes have tusks. In temper this species is usually fiercer and the animal is undoubtedly more powerful and active than its Indian relative.

It is certain that elephants were known to the old inhabitants of Egypt and Assyria, by whom they were sometimes hunted for the sake of their ivory and their hides (KB 139, Tiglath-pileser 1; As. u. Eur. 263, Thotmes III.; Houghton, TSEA 8.123 ff.). There is an elephant among the animals figured on the Black Obelisk² of Shalmaneser II. (858-824). Of course there may have been more than one elephant in the tribute from the land of Muṣri; but one was enough for the purpose of representation.

Elephants in warfare first appear among the Persians. Darius at Arbela (331 B.C.) employed 15 of them.

They were often used by the Seleucids.

2. Use in warfare frequent mention of them being made in the Maccabean wars (cp 1 Macc. 3.34 6.30 8.6 11.56 2 Macc. 11.4 13.15 etc.). These elephants, ¹ The b may have become m through Slavonic influence.

² The term used for 'elephant' in Shalm. Obel. Epigr. III. is baziati. The word alaph also occurs, but in the sense of 'ox' not 'elephant' (Wi. KB 1151). Houghton suggests the wild buffalo. Cp IVORY.

ELEUTHEROPOLIS

some of which carried towers (1 Macc. 6:37 f.), were almost certainly of the Indian species. Special mention is made of the Indian driver (δ Ἰνδός, 1 Macc. ib.). The war elephants were placed under the care of a special officer (2 Macc. 14:12). In classical times the African species was tamed by the Egyptians and took part both in the Carthaginian wars and in the Roman shows. Since in recent times the natives of Africa have not shown sufficient ability to tame this somewhat restive animal it has been suggested that the Carthaginians imported their animals from the East;¹ but there is little reason to doubt that the true E. africanus was employed in the Punic wars and even accompanied Hannibal's army across the Alps. The presence of African elephants in modern menageries proves that this species is capable of domestication and education in the hands of competent trainers. The elephant rarely breeds in captivity.

ELEUTHEROPOLIS (ελεϋθεροπολις, 'free city,' with play on double meaning of עִיר חָפְזָה, 'Horites' and

1. History. 'free men'? cp Ber. rabba, 42), the name bestowed about A.D. 200 by the emperor Septimius Severus on Betogabra, now Beit Jibrin, an important place in Judæa, mentioned already (see BEN-HESED, § 2). How central it was appears from the fact that Eusebius in the Onom. often reckons the distances of other towns with reference to it. It was in fact the capital of a large province during the fourth and the fifth centuries of our era. It was also an episcopal city of Palestina Prima (Notitiæ Ecclesiasticæ, 6). In the Talmudic period it had a large Jewish population, and produced some eminent Rabbins.

The Talmudic name is Beth-gubrin (Neub. Geog. 122 ff.). The 'Doctrine of Addai' (3rd cent. A.D.) expressly refers to Eleutheropolis as called Bêtgubrin in the Aramaic tongue (Nestle, PEFQ. '79, p. 138; see ELKOSHITE, 3). The name Betogabra (Βαιτογαβρα) is given to it by Ptolemy (v. 166). It also appears in the Peutinger Tables as Betogubri, and we can hardly be wrong in correcting, in Niese's text of Jos. B./iv. 8.1, Βητοαβρι into Βητογαβρι. Whether the name alludes to prehistoric 'giants,' is beyond our knowledge.

For some centuries the Græco-Roman name supplanted the older designation; but when, 150 years after the Saracenic conquest, the city was destroyed, the latter revived (Reland, Pal. 222, 227; Gesta Dei per Francos, 1044).

On this site, which they called 'Gibelin' (a corruption of Ar. Beth-Igebrim), the Crusaders in the twelfth century built a castle. After the battle of Hattin (1187 A.D.), it fell for a time into the hands of Saladin. Retaken by Richard of England, it was finally captured by Bibars, and remained in possession of the Saracens until its destruction in the sixteenth century; ruins of it still remain (see Porter, Syria and Pal., 236 f.).

The site of Eleutheropolis, in spite of the minute definitions of early writers, passed so completely out of mind that Robinson had to discover it. All the early statements point to Beit Jibrin, which is now a large village, N. of Mer'ash, situated in a little nook or glen in the side of a long green valley. Near it begin the famous caverns, to the excavation of which the limestone of the adjoining ridges was very favourable. We may not follow the Midrash which ascribes their origin to the HORITES [q.v.]; but the antiquity of their use can hardly be doubted.

2. Site. Jerome already noticed their wide extent (Comm. in Obad. 1), in which indeed they rival the catacombs of Rome and Malta. They have been explored by Robinson, and more fully by Porter, who compares them to 'subterranean villages.'

Eleutheropolis, or Beth-gubrin, stands in close historical connection with MARESHAH (q.v.). G. A. Smith has put this in a very forcible way (H. 233). If from the first to the sixteenth centuries Beit Jibrin (= Eleutheropolis) has been prominent, and Maresah forgotten, we may infer that the population moved under compulsion from the one site to the other. On the caves spoken of above, besides Robinson and Porter, compare Lucien Gautier (Souvenir de la Terre-Sainte, 63-67). He is of opinion that such caves have been in use for different purposes at many periods. Elsewhere a reference to them has been traced in a corrupt name in 1 K. 4:10, in the original text of which Maresah may have been designated Beth-Horim (see BEN-HESED, § 2).

ELHANAN (אֵלְחָנָן 'El is gracious,' § 28; cp Baalhanan and Palm. כְּלִיחָן, בְּלִיחָן, בְּעִלְיָחָן; ελεαναν

1. In Sam. [BA], ελλαναν [L]; Jos. εφαν [var. νεφαν]). (1) The slayer of Goliath; one of David's warriors (ben-Jair). The MT of 2 S. 21:19 reads (RV), 'And there was again war with the Philistines at Gob; and Elhanan the son of Jair the Bethlehemite slew Goliath the Gittite, the staff of whose spear was like a weaver's beam.' The document to which the passage belongs (2 S. 21:15-22, and 23:8-39) is an extract from an ancient Israelite 'roll of honour,' and deserves more credit than the later story which ascribes the slaying of Goliath to the youthful David.

It is scarcely necessary to criticise the theory of Sayce (Mod. Rev. 5:169 ff.), which is a development of Böttcher's, that David and Elhanan are the same person (cp Solomon—Jedidiah). This is in fact precritical in its origin. The Targ. on 2 S. 21:19 states that Elhanan was 'David the son of Jesse, who wove the curtains (cp Jaare-oregim) of the sanctuary'; cp also the Targ. on 1 Ch. 20:5 (ελλαν [B]).

We have next to remark that definite information as to the time when Elhanan slew Goliath is wanting; in fact the meagreness of tradition as to the details of the Philistine war has excited a very natural surprise (see DAVID, § 7). All that is certain is that David was no longer in the prime of life, for an exploit similar to that of Elhanan was performed by the king's nephew Jonathan (2 S. 21:21), and in another episode of the same struggle David's warriors vowed that he should no longer encounter the risk of a single combat (v. 17).

The place where Elhanan fought is mentioned; but the reading is uncertain. MT says that it was at GOB (q.v.); but the first of the three combats related (v. 18) was possibly, and the third certainly (v. 20), at Gath. We may feel sure that Gob in v. 19 is a false reading.

The name of Elhanan's father also is slightly uncertain. In 2 S. 23:24 1 Ch. 11:26 we read of 'Elhanan ben-Dodo, of Bethlehem.' It is true, this Elhanan is sometimes (e.g. in BDB; but not in SS) distinguished from the slayer of Goliath; but the grounds do not seem to be conclusive. DODO is certainly a personal, JAIR (q.v., ii.) may be a clan-name. It is tempting to suppose that the circumstance that, according to one tradition, Elhanan's father bore the name DODO (i.), facilitated the transference of Elhanan's exploit to the youthful David.

The description of three out of the four single combats related in 2 S. 21:15-22 recurs in nearly the same form in 1 Ch. 20:4-8. It is to this version (see

2. In Ch. v. 5) that we are indebted for a correction of the impossible name Jaare-oregim in 2 S. 21:19; the name should undoubtedly be read Jair (i.e. not עַיִר but עַיִר). The surprising appendage oregim (i.e. 'weavers') is an accidental repetition of the closing word of the verse. The statement of Chronicles that Elhanan 'slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath' need give us no trouble. The words לַחְמֵי (Lahmi the brother of) have been introduced by the Chronicler to harmonise this passage with the story of David and Goliath.¹ At the same time the Chronicler omitted the statement that Elhanan was a Bethlehemite (beth-hallahmi). Naturally enough; for from the latter part of this designation he obtained the name which he affixed to Elhanan's giant. He would not however deny that the giant had some connection with Goliath and so he (or his authority) made Lahmi Goliath's brother. All this is to be regarded not as conscious deprivation of the text, but as a supposed restoration of what must have been the historical fact. The only way to avoid this conclusion would be to assume that Lahmi was derived from the names of the gods Labanu, Luḥmu, mentioned at the beginning of the Babylonian epic of creation (Jensen, Kosmologie, 268, 274; cp *RP*², 1133), already brought into connection (not unplausibly)¹ with the name Bethlehem by Tomkins (PEFQ, 1885, p. 112). For other discussions of this subject see Ewald, Hist. 370; Stade, Gesch. 1228; Köhler, Bibl. Gesch. ii. 1294; Che. Aids to Criticism, 10 11 125. Compare Driver, TBS, 272; Budde and Kittel in SBOT. See also GOLIATH.

² One of David's 'thirty' heroes; mentioned second on the list (ben Dodo); 2 S. 23 24 1 Ch. 11 26. Perhaps the same as no. 1 above. It is very improbable that David had two warriors of equal rank, both named Elhanan, and both Bethlehemit. Compare the case of SIBBECHAI (the slayer of Saph), also given in the list of the 'thirty'; cp Jos. Ant. vii. 122. T. K. C.

ELI (אֵלִי, 'high', § 49; cp Palm. אֵלִי, and Nab. אֵלִי, 'El is high,' and the numerous Sab. names com-

1. History. pounded with אֵלִי [cp Ges.⁽¹¹⁾ ad loc.]; the un-Hebraic character of the names Eli, Hophni, and Phinehas may be remarked; ΗΛΕΙ [BAL], but ΗΛΕΙ, 1 S. 19 [A], 4 11 [A* vid], and ΛΕΥΕΙ, 14 3 [BA], priest of Yahweh at the temple of Shiloh, the sanctuary of the ark, and at the same time judge over Israel—an unusual combination of offices, which must have been won by signal services to the nation in his earlier years, though in the account preserved to us he appears in the weakness of extreme old age, unable to control the petulance and rapacity of his sons, Hophni and Phinehas (1 S. 1-4 14 3 1 K. 2 27). While the central authority was thus weakened, the Philistines advanced against Israel, and gained a complete victory in the great battle of EBENEZER [g. v., 1], where the ark was taken, and Hophni and Phinehas slain. On hearing the news Eli fell from his seat and died. According to MT he was ninety-eight years old, and had judged Israel for forty years (1 S. 4 15 18). 5 gives but twenty years in v. 18, and seems not to have read v. 15, which is either a gloss or the addition of a redactor (cp SBOT, ad loc.).

After these events the sanctuary of Shiloh appears to have been destroyed by the Philistines (cp Jer. 7, and see SHILOH), and the descendants of Eli with the whole of their clan or 'father's house' subsequently appear as settled at NOB (1 S. 21 1 [2], 22 1 ff., cp 14 3). The massacre of the clan by Saul, with the subsequent deposition of the survivor Abiathar from the priestly office (1 K. 2 27), is referred to in a prophetic passage of deuteronomic origin, such as might (the narrator thought) have been uttered in the days of Eli (1 S. 2 27 ff. 3 11 ff.; see Bu. SBOT).

Now Zadok (from whom the later high priests claimed descent), who appears in 1 Ch. 6 12 [5 38] as the lineal descendant of Aaron through Eleazar and

2. The Phinehas, was not of the house of Eli (1 K. 2 27-35); and in 1 Ch. 24 Ahimelech, son of Abiathar, is reckoned to the sons of Ithamar, the younger branch of the house of Aaron. Hence the traditional view that in the person of Eli the high-priesthood was temporarily diverted from the line of Eleazar and Phinehas into that of Ithamar (cp Jos. Ant. v. 11 5 viii. 13, and for the fancies of the Rabbins on the cause of this diversion, Selden, De Succ. in Pontif., lib. i. cap. 2). This view, however, is at direct variance with the passage in 1 S. 2 which represents Eli's 'father's house' or clan as the original priestly family, and predicts the destruction or degradation to an inferior position of the whole of this 'father's house,' not merely the direct descendants of Eli. Ahimelech, moreover, who is the only link to connect Eli with Ithamar, is an ambiguous personage, whose name has arisen from a textual corruption (see ABIATHAR, end), and it is evident that the priestly genealogy in 1 Ch. 5 f. merely endeavours to show that the sons of Zadok derived their origin in an unbroken line of descent from Aaron. The book of Chronicles wholly ignores the priesthood of Eli.

[So much at any rate is indisputable—that in the pre-regal period the family of Eli discharged priestly functions at the sanctuary of Shiloh. That it had a levitical connection is implied in the name of Phinehas borne by one of Eli's sons (HOPHNI is only a variation of this), and also in 1 S. 2 27-36. Eli's sons, however, do not appear to have entered into the original tradition; they are only introduced in the interests of later theory. That Eli belonged to the family of Moses is at any rate not impossible. The explanation of HOPHNI as an outgrowth of PHINEHAS leads to the suggestion that for אֵלִי, 'Eli,' we should perhaps read אֵלִיעֶזֶר, 'Eliezer' = אֵלִיעֶזֶר, 'Eleazar.' Eleazar and Eliezer are both Levite names, though the former is the ordinary name of the father of Phinehas.] See further LEVITES, PRIEST, ZADOK, § 2 ff. As HELI (1) Eli comes into the genealogy of Ezra (2 Esd. 1 1).

ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI, and Eloi, Eloi, Lama Sabachthani. The last words of Jesus (= Ps. 22 1 [2]) according to Mt. 27 46, Mk. 15 34;¹ followed by a translation, 'My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me.' Evang. Fet., however, gives (ch. 5), ['And the Lord cried out, saying] My power, my power, thou hast forsaken me' (ἡ δύναμις μου, ἡ δύναμις, κατέλειψάς με),² which is quite different. The number of various readings of the text of Mt. and Mk. is surprisingly large.

As to the word for 'my God,' in both Mt. and Mk. WH give ελωι; Treg. prefers ηλι, in Mt., ελωι in Mk.; Ti. and Zahn prefer ηλει in Mt., ελωι in Mk. For the verb all agree in adopting σαβαχθανει (Zahn ηυ, an unimportant variation).

Epiphanius (Haer. 69 68) remarks on Mt. 27 46 that the words ηλι ηλι were spoken by Jesus in Hebrew, the rest of the passage in Syrian.

Lagarde, too (GGA, '82, 329), referred to this passage as proving the systematic correction to which even our oldest MSS had been subjected. Certainly ελωι (or, more completely Aramaic, ελαϊ, or αλαϊ) is what we should have expected; but in citing a passage like this it was not unnatural to use the well-known Hebrew term אֵלִי 'Eli.

Dalman, who holds this 'word from the cross' to be historical, thinks that Jesus most probably used the Hebrew form ('עֲלִי), just because it is a little less obvious.

The variation ζαφθανει³ in D Lat. both in Mt. and in Mk. is very singular. σαβαχθανει is good Aramaic = אֵלִיעֶזֶר. ζαφθανει, or rather αζαφθανει, is a Hebrew substitute for the Aramaic verb, due to one who wished to make the whole passage a quotation from the Hebrew. The original reading αζαφθανει was presumably altered into ζαφθανει = אֵלִיעֶזֶר (rendered ὡνεϊδισάς με in cod. D., Mk. 15 34) by scribes who only understood Syriac. See Chase, Syrio-Lat. Text of the Gospels, 107, JTh.S. 1278, and Exp. T. 11 334 f. T. K. C.

ELIAM (עֲלִיָּאֲמִ, § 46, 'God is kinsman'; cp AMMIEL and Phoen. עֲלִיָּאֲמִ [CIS 11, no. 147, l. 16]; εδλιαβ [BAL]).

1. b. Ahithophel the Gilonite (see GILON); one of David's heroes; 2 S. 23 34 (ουελιαφ [A], ο θαλαμ [L]) = 1 Ch. 11 36 (where 'Eliam the son of' is omitted before 'Ahijah the Pelonite,' itself a corrupt reading; see ANITHOPHEL, end), and perhaps the same as 2 (below).

2. Father of Bathsheba (2 S. 11 3; called in 1 Ch. 8 5 AMMIEL, αμμηλ [BA], ηλα [L]). See ANITHOPHEL.

3. Possibly to be restored for ANIAM (q.v.).

ELIAONIAS (εδλιαωνιας [A]), 1 Esd. 8 31 = Ezra 8 4, ELIEHOENAI, 2.

ELIAS (ηλειας), Mt. 11 14 AV, RV ELIJAH (q.v.).

ELIASAPH (עֲלִיָּאֲשָׁף, 'God increases [i.e., the family], §§ 27, 44; ελ[ε]ι[α]σ[α]φ [BAFL]).

1. A descendant of Zerubbabel; 1 Ch. 3 24 (ασειβ [B], ελιασ. [L]).

2. Eponym of one of the priestly courses; 1 Ch. 24 12 (ελιαβει [B]).

3. High priest in list of wall-builders (see NEHEMIAH, § 1 f., EZRA, ii. §§ 16 [1], 15 d), Neh. 3 1 (ελ(ε)ισουβ [BNA]); 3 20 f. (βηθ-ελ(ε)ισουβ [B], -αλεισου and -αλισουβ [N], -ελει ασσουβ and -ελιασουβ [A] αλ- [L] mentioned in pedigree of Jaddua (see EZRA, ii. § 6 d), 13 10 (ελιασβ [N]). In Neh. 10 he is not mentioned among the signatories to the covenant.

4, 5, and 6. A singer, Ezra 10 24 (ελ(ε)ισαφ [BNA]) = 1 Esd. 9 24, AV ELEAZURUS, RV Eliasibus (ελιασεβος [B], -βος [A]); one of the b'ne Zattu, Ezra 10 27 (ελ(ε)ισουβ [BA], ελισου [N]) = 1 Esd. 9 28 ELISIMUS, RV Eliasimus (ελ(ε)ιασε(ε)μιος [BA]); and one of the B'ne Bani, Ezra 10 36 (ελ(ε)ιασεφ [B]) = 1 Esd. 9 34, ENASIBUS (ενασ(ε)λιος [BA], χελιασουβ [L]); all in list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA 1, § 5, end).

ELIASIS (εδλιασει [BA]), 1 Esd. 9 34 = Ezra 10 37, JAASAU.

ELIATHAH (עֲלִיָּאֲתָה, in 1 Ch. 25 27 עֲלִיָּאֲתָה; § 35; cp, however, HEMAN; ΗΛΙΘΑ [L]).

A 'son of Heman,' the name of the twentieth of the classes of temple singers, 1 Ch. 25 4 (ηλιαθαθ [B], ελιαθα [A]), also v. 27 (αιμαθα [B], ειαθ [A]; Pesh. ܐܝܬܐ, i.e., Eliab; Jerome, Quæst., Eliba); but see HEMAN.

ELIDAD (עֲלִידָד, § 28; εδδαδ [BAFL]). 1 Benjaminite prince, Nu. 34 21, † P). The name seems traditional (cp ELDAD); its meaning is disputed. Some connect it, like BILDAD and BEDAD, with the divine name Dad (= Ramman); thus it would mean 'Dad is (the clan's) god': the name Dad-ilu is borne by a king of the land of Kaska (Schr. COT 1 244 f.; Del. Pav. 298). However, Elidad may also mean 'God has loved'; cp Sab. ܠܗܝܕܐ, D. H. Müller, ZDMG, 1883, p. 15; and see NAMES, § 28. Incidentally this avoids the apparent incongruity of giving a heathen name to an Israelite; but heathen names such as Elidad, Hur, Ash-hur, Ash-bel (?), may have been borne by men who knew nothing of the heathen gods whose names entered into their own, or who at any rate did not worship them (cp MORDECAI, 1). Gray's explanation (HPN, 61) 'a kinsman (uncle) is God' seems less probable; see DOD [NAMES WITH]. T. K. C.

ELIEHOENAI (so RV; עֲלִיָּהוּעֲנַי; also written עֲלִיָּאֲעֲנַי; the spelling in MT may be intended to emphasise a particular view of the meaning of the name; for the [probably] true name see ELIOENAI).

1. AV ELIOENAI (εδλιοναι [B], -οναι [A], -οναι [L]). A Korahite Levite, one of the doorkeepers of the sanctuary, 1 Ch. 26 3.

2. AV ELIEHOENAI (εδλιανα [BL], -ιααν. [A]), one of the b'ne Pahath-Moab in Ezra's caravan (see EZRA 1, § 2; ii., § 15 [1] d); Ezra 8 4 = 1 Esd. 8 31, ELIOENIAS (εδλιαωνιας [B], -αων. [A], εδλιανα [L]). Compare ELIOENAI.

ELIEL (עֲלִיָּהוּ, ελ[ε]ι[η]λ [BAL]); a man's name somewhat frequent in Chronicles, but not found elsewhere in the OT. It means 'My God is El,' § 38; or, perhaps, 'El is God.' In 1 Ch. 6 34 [19] Eliel is substituted for Elihu (= 'He [Yahwē] is God'). Both names are virtually identical with Elijah ('Yahwē is God,' or, 'my God'). Compare the royal name Iluma-ilu, 'Ilu is god,' where the second ilu takes the place of this king's special deity (KB 384, Hommel, AHT 129 f.).

1. 'The Mahavite' [q.v.] (עֲלִיָּהוּ); λ[ε]ι[η]λ [BN], εδληλ [A], εηλ [L], one of David's warriors (1 Ch. 11 46), and

2. Another of David's warriors (δαληηλ [B], αληηλ [A]), 1 Ch. 11 47. † See DAVID, § 11 a, ii.

ELIEZER (עֲלִיעֶזֶר), 'God of help,' or 'God (or, 'my God') is a helper'; see ELEAZAR; ελ[ε]ιεζερ [BANL.].

1. Abraham's chief slave and steward (Gen. 15:2). The clause in which he is referred to is a piece of E's work and perhaps originally followed v. 3a (Bu.). It states that Abram's most trusted servant, in lieu of a son, would inherit his property (cp 1 Ch. 2:34 f.). It should be noticed, however, that the other narrator (J) does not give the name Eliezer (see 21:2), and the text is evidently in some disorder. The most probable way of emending seems to be to read יָעוֹב וְהָיָה וְשָׂרָא וְיָעוֹב 'and my tent-dwelling will be deserted' (see Che. Ezr. T., 11:47 [Oct. '99]).

Kalisch thought that the full name of the steward was Dammesek Eliezer, and RV implies the same thing. Grammatically the rendering 'is Dammesek Eliezer' (ἔστω, οὐδὲν Δαμυσεὸς Ἐλιεζέρ) is no doubt inevitable; but how absurd it is! The text, therefore, must be incorrect. The words עֲלִיעֶזֶר אֲבִי, 'be (or it) is Dammesek,' are taken by some to be an intrusive marginal gloss on the word עֲלִיעֶזֶר which the glossator misunderstood (although it is difficult to see how he would have construed יהוה אֲבִי). So, long ago, Hitzig and Tuch; unfortunately the existence of a word עֲלִיעֶזֶר (or עֲלִיעֶזֶר) 'possession' is extremely doubtful. Ball's rendering 'and he who will possess my house is a Damascene—Eliezer,' is not much more plausible than that of Hitzig. See Ezr. T., 1:2. T. K. C.

2. Second son of Moses and Zipporah (Ex. 2:22), so called because 'the God of my father was my help' (18:4). The Chronicler assigns him an only son Rehobiah (1 Ch. 23:15 17 26:25 f.). See ELEAZAR (1), ...

3. A prophet, b. Dodavah of Mareshah, temp. Jehoshaphat: 2 Ch. 20:37 (ελειαδα [B]). Gray (HPN 232) suggests that the name may have been derived from a good historical record; but the prophets of Chronicles are often of such doubtful historicity that the suggestion seems hazardous. Was not the name more probably suggested by 'Elezar b. Dodai (or Dodo)' in 2 S. 23:9 1 Ch. 11:12? See ELEAZAR (3).

- 4. A Reubenite 'prince' (1 Ch. 27:16).
- 5. A Benjamite (BENJAMIN, § 9, ii. α), 1 Ch. 7:8.
- 6. A Levite (1 Ch. 15:24).
- 7, 8, and 9. A priest, Ezra 10:18 = 1 Esd. 9:19, ELEAZAR [7] (ελεαζαρος [BA]); a Levite, Ezra 10:23 (ελεαζαρ [N]) = 1 Esd. 9:23 JONAS [2] (ωνιας [B], ωνας [A]); and an Israelite, b. Harim: Ezra 10:31 = 1 Esd. 9:32 ELIONAS [2] (ελιωνας [B], ωνας [A]), in list of those with foreign wives (see EZRA i., § 5 end).
- 10. Head of family, temp. Ezra (see EZRA i., § 2; ii., § 15 [1] d), Ezra 8:16 (ελεαζαρ [BA]) = 1 Esd. 8:43, ELEAZAR [5] (-πος).
- 11. Son of Jorim, in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk. 3:29 ελεαζαρ [Ti. WH]). See GENEALOGIES ii., § 3.

ELIHOENAI (עִינַיִלָּנַיִ), Ezra 8:4 AV, RV ELIEHOENAI (2).

ELIHOREPH (עֲלִיהוֹרֶפֶת); ελιαφ [B], εναρεφ [A], ελιαβ [L]; true name perhaps Elihaph [cp Ἐ], i.e., 'God is Haph' [= Apis, see APIS], of which Elihoreph may be an alteration on religious grounds; cp Ahi-shahar, from Ahi-hur? so Marquart), one of Solomon's 'scribes,' son of Shisha (1 K. 4:3). The text of v. 1-20, however, is in much disorder, and v. 3 needs emendation. v. 2 promises a list of 'princes.' The first prince (v. 2) is Azariah, son of the priest Zadok. The next should be 'Elihoreph' (Elihaph?) and Ahijah sons of Shavsha the secretary' (Klost.). See SHAVSHA. T. K. C.

ELIHU (עֲלִיחֻ), 'God is He [Yahwè]; ελιογ [AL], in Job -c [BNAc].

1. One of the interlocutors of the Book of Job (q.v., § 9).

1 The final N is omitted in 1 Ch. 26:7 (Kt.), 27:18 (Kt.), and once or twice in Job.

ELIJAH

2. b. Tohu, in the genealogy of Samuel (1 S. 1: ηλειου [B], ελι [L]). Samuel's pedigree, however, is composite (see JEROHAM [1], TOHU), and Elihu of the clan of Tahan (so, for Tohu; cp EPHRAIM i., § 12) corresponds to ELKANAH [q.v., 1] of the clan of Jerahmeel (so for Jeroham). In 1 Ch. 6:27 [12] Elihu is called ELIAB (q.v., 4) and in 1 Ch. 6:34 [19] Eliel (q.v., 6); whilst conversely ELIAB (q.v., 3), David's eldest brother, seems to be called Elihu in 1 Ch. 27:18, where Ἐβαλ reads Eliab. Perhaps some early divine name has been excised (in various ways) by editors; the name, e.g., may have been Elimelech (cp REGEM-MELECH beside RAAMIAH), and it is probable that this, rather than Elkanah, was the true name of Samuel's father. So Marq. Fund. 12 f.

3. A Manassite, one of David's warriors; 1 Ch. 12:20 [21] (ελιμουθ [BN], ελιουθ [A]). See DAVID, § 11, a, iii.
 4. A porter of the temple, 1 Ch. 26:7 (ενοιου [B]).

ELIJAH, in Mt. 11:14 AV, ELIAS (Ἰησοῦς [sixty-three times], § 38, or, as in 2 K. 1:3 4 8 12 and in Mal. 3:23 (45), Ἰησοῦς; i.e., 'Yahwè is God,' cp Joel; ηλ[ε]ιαc [BAL, Ti. WH]) was among the greatest and most original of the Hebrew prophets; indeed it is in him that Hebrew prophecy first appears as a great spiritual and ethical power, deeply affecting the destiny and religious character of the nation. He lived and worked under Ahab (circa 875-853), contending with heroic courage for Yahwè as the sole god of Israel, and refusing to make any terms with plans favoured at the royal court for uniting the worship of the national god with that of the Tyrian Baal. Thus he vindicated the true character of the religion of Israel, and is not unworthy of a place by the side of Moses. We shall be better able to appreciate his position, however, when we have examined the legendary narratives in which his history is enshrined.

1. In 1 K. 17-19 we have a varied and singularly vivid account of his conflict with the foreign Baal-worship. It is from the hand of one who

1. Date of was a subject of the northern kingdom, 1 K. 17-19, and must therefore have written before the conquest of Samaria in 722 B.C. Otherwise in mentioning Beer-sheba (19:3) he would scarcely have taken the pains to tell his readers that it belonged to Judah, or at least would not have expressed himself in that way. Again the type of his religious thought is clearly older than that of Hosea or even Amos. Not only does he speak, or make his hero speak, with reverence of Yahwè's altars in N. Israel (19:10), but, in spite of abundant occasion, he makes no protest against that worship of Yahwè under the accepted symbol of an ox, which provoked Hosea's bitter scorn. Accordingly, we may acquiesce in Kuenen's suggestion (Ond. i. 225) that he may have flourished in the ninth century, within a generation or two at furthest from the lifetime of Elijah. Only we must allow time for the creative work of popular fancy and the rise of partial misconception as to the points at issue in the deadly struggle.

The narrative has been mutilated at the beginning, and hence the abruptness with which the prophet appears on the scene: otherwise we might have attributed to dramatic art the sudden introduction, adapted as it is to the meteor-like character which Elijah's appearances preserve throughout. The story must have begun with some account of the quarrel and its origin in Ahab's religious innovations; but the editor of the Book of Kings had already given an account of Ahab's defection (16:29-34) in his own way and naturally refrained from explaining the matter over again in the words of the older document which he used. Hence Elijah of Tishbeh in Gilead (Ἐβαλ 17:1; but cp JABESH [i.]) is brought at once before us as if we were already familiar with him and with his cause.¹ He confronts the king with a message from Yahwé 'before whom he stands' in constant service. No rain or dew is to fall for 'these years' save at the prophet's will or declaration. Straightway the scene changes to a lonely wady called Cherith (?) (so most; but see CHERITH). Here, in or near the wild and pastoral land of his birth, Elijah is shielded for a time from the famine which followed the drought. Ravens, forgetting their natural voracity, bring him bread and flesh morning and evening. Thus his supply of food was constant and beyond the needs of life in the East, where flesh is eaten only on festal occasions. In time, however, the stream of water fails, and Elijah at the bidding of his God passes beyond Yahwé's land to Zarephath, a Phœnician city to the S. of Sidon (but here again the name and situation of Elijah's place of refuge is disputable: see ZAREPHATH). At the gate of the city, where markets were held and remnants might be strewed about, a widow, who worshipped Yahwé¹ (1 K. 17 12-24), was gathering sticks. Water she gives at the prophet's request, but being asked for bread, protests that she has but a handful of meal and a little oil, with which she is about to prepare for her son and herself the last food they will ever eat. Finally, however, she does the prophet's bidding and is rewarded by the fulfilment of his promise that neither meal nor oil shall fail while the drought lasts. Nay, when her son dies, not of famine but of natural sickness, the 'man of God' bending over the corpse brings back by his prayer the life which had fled.

Elijah returns to Israel at the divine command and meets the prefect of the palace, Obadiah. This courtier, who 'feared Yahwé' and had saved the lives of a hundred prophets from the fury of Ahab's queen, was engaged like his royal master in seeking fodder for Ahab's horses and mules. He falls down in reverence before the prophet, but refuses to consent to let Ahab know where Elijah is, till the prophet has sworn that he will keep his trust, instead of suffering himself, after his work is finished, to be carried away by the spirit of Yahwé and thus leave Obadiah to bear the brunt of Ahab's disappointment. 'Is it thou,' says Ahab, 'thou troubler of Israel?' 'I have not troubled Israel,' is the fearless answer, 'but thou and thy father's house, in that ye have forsaken Yahwé and thou hast followed the Baalim.' Thereupon Elijah, the solitary champion of Yahwé, challenges the 450 prophets of Baal ('the 400 prophets of the Asherah' have been added by an interpolator in 18 19 and in the ^{CS} text of v. 22) to a memorable contest (see CARMEL, § 3; DANCING, § 5). One bullock is to be laid on the wood for Baal, another for Yahwé, and the god who without human aid kindles the fire of his sacrifice is to be 'the God'—i.e., the sole recognised God of Israel. In vain Baal's prophets invoke him with wild dances and cries, and gash themselves with knives to appease the burning fury of the sun-god, while Elijah mocks their pains. Then they desist and at Elijah's prayer the lightning of Yahwé consumes the victim on his altar and 'licks up' the water which had been poured over and round the altar to enhance the marvel. Baal's prophets are slain by the Kishon, and now that the heart of the people is 'turned back,' the rain will come.

Already the prophet listens in spirit to its welcome splash. As yet in spirit only. He crouches down on Carmel with his face between his knees, and his servant, sent to look seawards from the highest point, returns six times, and can but report that 'there is nothing.' The seventh time he sees a cloud 'as small as a man's hand.' Soon the heavens are black, the king drives at full speed to Jezreel, fleeing before the terror of the storm. Borne by Yahwé's hand, Elijah runs on foot the whole whole description must be read thus, 'Elijah the Jabeshite, of Jabesh in Gilead' (Klost.). The latter is the more probable view. In either case, the second part of the description seems to be a gloss.]

distance of something like 16 m., but, true to his Bedouin instincts, refrains from entering the city.

The momentary triumph at Carmel does but fan the persecuting zeal of Jezebel; and Elijah sets out for Horeb, as if Yahwé had forsaken his land and withdrawn to his ancient dwelling-place. In the wilderness beyond Beersheba (see MIZRAIM, § 26), weary and desperate, he sits down under one of the retem bushes (the retem is a species of broom; see JUNIPER) common in that region and prays for death. The angel of Yahwé, however, bids him rise and eat. He finds at his head a cruse of water and a cake baked on the coals, and in the strength of that he travels for forty days and nights to Horeb, the mountain of God. (If the text is right¹ the narrator is remarkably vague here, for the distance between the southern boundary of Palestine and the Sinaitic peninsula is only about 50 geographical m., and the earlier view of Horeb made it not very far from the S. border of Canaan.) Here on the sacred mount, when hurricane, earthquake, and lightning have cooled the air, Elijah in the rustling of a gentle breeze discerns Yahwé's presence. He had believed that the cause which he had held dearer than life was lost, and that he had better cease the unavailing struggle and die. Not so. He is to anoint new kings and inaugurate new dynasties for Damascus and Samaria. He is to anoint Elisha as his own successor. Each of these changes is to hasten the calamity which bangs over Israel, and only the 7000 who have not bowed the knee to Baal are to escape. Here, as at the beginning, the narrative fails us a second time. We do indeed learn how Elijah calls Elisha to the prophetic office; but in the text of the Book of Kings as it has come down to us, Elisha takes no part in the deeds of violence which brought Hazael and Jehu to the throne. On the early and very striking story of Elijah's ascent (2 K. 2) see ELISHA, § 3; and on the true scene of the legendary narrative in 1 K. 17 1-7 8-24 19 4-18, see CHERITH, ZAREPHATH, JUNIPER.

2. Little need be said concerning the prediction of Ahaziah's death when he consulted Baal-zëbbûb of Ekron in his sickness, and the fire from heaven which consumed two companies of soldiers sent to arrest the prophet. The story (2 K. 12-17) with its perverse supernaturalism and sanguinary spirit may safely be assigned to a period when the true notion of prophecy had grown confused and dim. The portrait of Elijah with his robe of goat's or camel's hair and his leathern girdle is, perhaps, the solitary fragment of genuine tradition which it contains. Very different in value and in date is the striking history of Naboth's judicial murder in 1 K. 21 1-18 20 (to be compared with and partially corrected by 2 K. 9 25 f.). Naboth, probably on religious grounds, refused to sell his ancestral vineyard at the king's desire. He was condemned, on a false charge of treason against the god and the king of Israel, by the elders of his city; for the kingly power in Israel was no Oriental despotism, and the authority of the city sheiks, who had replaced the sheiks of the tribes, had to be respected (cp GOVERNMENT, § 24). Death was the penalty, and it fell, according to the custom of the time, not only on himself but also on his family. There was a judgment, however, higher than that of the earthly court. In after-days Jehu remembered how he heard the divine sentence pronounced against the unrighteous king: 'I have seen yesterday the blood of Naboth and his sons—it is the oracle of Yahwé—and I will requite thee on this plat.'

3. Such in brief outline are the early legends of the prophet's life, but we have still to estimate the residuum of authentic history and through the mist of tradition to see the prophet as he was. We must not charge

Ahab with conscious apostasy from Yahwè. He had great merits as well as great faults. He was a chivalrous and patriotic king, and in the very names which he gave to his children he professed his allegiance to the god of his people. Nor can we believe that even Jezebel seriously endeavoured to exterminate Yahwè's prophets. Some four hundred of them gathered round her husband at the muster for his last and fatal campaign (1 K. 226), and the success of Jehu's revolution proves that only a very small minority of Israelites could have devoted themselves to the foreign worship. Ahab, however, did build a temple of Baal in his capital. No doubt it seemed to him the natural and fitting acknowledgment and consecration of the alliance between Israel and Tyre. Elijah would brook no such amalgam of worships radically diverse. He was not indeed a monotheist after the fashion of the later prophets. To him Yahwè was the sole god of Israel, in whose land Yahwè was all or nothing. No wonder then that he looked on the drought as a sign of Yahwè's anger. Here by the way we are on firm ground. The fact of the drought is attested independently by Menander of Ephesus (ap. Jos. Ant. viii. 132), according to whom, however, it lasted only one year and was stayed by a procession of Phœnician priests (cp HISTORICAL LIT., § 5).

Elijah's devotion to Yahwè was something infinitely higher than mere patriotic attachment to hereditary religion. To him Yahwè and Baal represented two principles—viz., worship of national righteousness and the sensual worship of nature. Again, the 'sons of the prophets,' like bands of dervishes, stirred the enthusiasm of the people, and encouraged them to believe that Yahwè must fight for Israel. Elijah, in the best and earliest accounts, stands alone or with a single disciple. He saw Yahwè's work not so much in national victory as in national calamity. He was able to believe that Hazeel, the scourge of Israel, had been raised to power by Yahwè himself. Thus he opened a new era in the religion of Israel. Malachi speaks of him, 323 [45], as the minister of judgment and purification within Israel, the herald of 'Yahwè's great and terrible day.' Jesus beheld the spirit of Elijah revived in the stern and solitary Baptist, and on 'the holy mount' Moses and Elijah, representing the law and the prophets, bore conjoint testimony to the transfigured Christ. For the closing scene of Elijah's life, see ELISHA, § 3.

A few words, supplementary to the article KINGS (§ 8), may be added on recent criticism of the Elijah-

4. The Elijah-narratives. The late character of the narrative in 2 K. 12-17^a is generally admitted; but Kautzsch in his essay on the Book of Kings in Ersch and Gruber (Allgem. Encyk.) attributes the rest of the biography to one writer. On the other hand Wellhausen and Kuenen separate 1 K. 17-19 21, where the prophet stands alone, from 2 K. 21-18 (which, however, Kuenen observes, can hardly be much later than 1 K. 17-19) where, instead of being a wanderer, he has a home with Elisha at Gilgal, and where, too, he is associated with 'the sons of the prophets.' Further, Kuenen separates 1 K. 17-19, where Elijah contends against Baal-worship, from 21 where the contest turns upon a judicial murder without so much as a passing allusion to foreign idolatry. The reason is far from cogent, and there is a similarity of language between 17 17 and 21 1, 18 1 and 21 17 (cp Benzinger, p. 106). In St. Kr., 1892, Rösche has endeavoured to show (cp Stade, GVV⁽¹⁾ 1522, n.) that all the narratives are post-exilic, a theory which in the face of the reasons given above seems absolutely untenable (cp KINGS, § 8; König, Einleitung, 266).

[In Moslem traditions Elijah is identified with the mythical personage el-Hadîr—i.e., the evergreen or youthful prophet (for fables see Weiland, Legenden, 177) who has become the guardian of the seas, but was at an earlier time spoken of as dwelling 'at the confluence of two seas (rivers?),' as the guide of the Israelites at the Exodus (equivalent therefore to the pillar of fire and cloud). Originally he was probably the rescued hero of the Deluge-story. See DELUGE, § 15 (col. 1062), and cp Clermont-Ganneau, Rev. arch. 32:388 ff.]

The monographs on Elijah are mostly out of date. His life and character are given from a critical point of view in the recent Histories of Israel by Stade (vol. i.), Kittel 5. Literature. (vol. ii.), and Wellhausen; also in Smend's AT Kelig. (152 ff.⁽²⁾); 175 ff.). See also Cheyne's Hallowing of Criticism ('88), and Gunkel's article on Elijah, Preuss. Jahrb. 98, pp. 18-51. ELIKA (עֲלִיקָא; probably corrupt). In the first of the two lists of David's 'thirty' we find (2 S. 23 25 MT) 'Elika the Harodite (rather, Aradite).' This item is absent from Ⓞ^{BL} (but Ⓞ^A gives ενακα), and from the list in 1 Ch. 11. Hence Driver (note on 2 S. 23 39) would omit it, thus making the number of David's minor heroes exactly thirty, but reducing the total of the heroes (including in this the five major ones) to thirty-five. The total given in v. 39 may be due to a late editor. Marquart (Fund. 19) agrees, regarding 'Elika the Harodite' as an (incorrect) gloss on v. 33^b. Wellhausen and Budde, however, retain 'Elika the Harodite,' remarking that the framer of the list likes, when he can, to couple two warriors from the same district. (Arad and Beth-palet, however, may very well be combined.) Another name, it is true, is still wanting to produce a total of thirty-seven. See ELIPHELET, 2, and cp DAVID, § 11 a, i. T. K. C.

ELIM (עֵלִים; אליעם [BAL]; Elim; Ex. 15 27, Nu. 33 9), the second station of the Israelites after crossing the sea, where there were twelve fountains and seventy palms (the term 'Elim' covers palm-trees; see ELATH). 1. A son of David born to him in Jerusalem (2 S. 5 16 i Ch. 38 14 7). According to 2 S., David had eleven sons born to him in Jerusalem; but by a textual error (which occurs also in ^B of S.) this number is increased to thirteen, by the addition of NOGAH and another Eliphelet: i Ch. 36 14 5 (לְיִפְחָלֵט, ELPÁLET [AV], ELPELET [RV]). The latter is omitted by Bertheau, Thenius, and Wellhausen (Gesch. (4), 216, ET ib.).

2. One of David's 'thirty' (2 S. 23 34; in i Ch. 11 35 the name is given by error without the last letter: MT Eliphah, לְיִפְחָלֵט). The name of his father is variously given as Ahasbai (2 S. in MT) and as Ur (i Ch. in MT); see DAVID, § 11 (a) i. f.

Both forms, however, are evidently corrupt; and to recover the original name we must not (with We.) omit 'the son of' before 'the Maachathite.' בן and בת, חב and חיה were easily confounded; the words which now follow אבסבאי, 'Abasbai,' in MT should probably be read (according to Klo.) חַבְשָׁיִם חַבְשָׁיִם, 'a man of Beth-maachah.' And, if Klo. is right in supplying HEPHER (ii., x) before the gentile noun, we can hardly doubt that he is right also in regarding חַבְשָׁיִם בן (EV 'son of Ahasbai') as a corruption of a gentile noun formed similarly to חַבְשָׁיִם חַבְשָׁיִם. If so, the original list ran thus, 'Eliphelet, a man of Beth—; Hopher, a man of Beth-maachah.' The number thirty-seven in 2 S. 23 39 is thus accounted for (Che.). The 'Ur' of i Ch. might be a corrupt fragment of the lost place-name. For a more tentative view see Driver, Sam., 284, and for a bolder but very ingenious view Marquart, Fund. 22. The versions are equally obscure (2 S. 23 34; αλεϊφάλεθ [B], οφελλι [L]; i Ch. 11 35, ελφασ [BN], ελιφάλα [A], -φασε [L]).

his prophetic work, and for about half a century the 'father' and guide of the northern kingdom in its struggle for national life and independence. We have in the books of Kings a considerable collection of anecdotes illustrating his history. We cannot be surprised that much of this material from which we have to construct our view of the manner of man he was, bears clear marks of its legendary nature. In this respect the traditions about Elisha do not differ from those about his master (cp HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 5). Unfortunately, however, in the case of Elisha it is much harder to recover the kernel of literal fact, and we miss the clear and bold lines in which the portrait of the true Elijah stands out on the canvas. The difference springs from the vastly superior originality of Elijah. The ideas which came straight to the master's heart were taught to the disciple by outward word and example. He learnt as others might learn. Moreover, he sympathised more than Elijah had done with the natural thoughts and desires of his countrymen, and was much more on a level with them. For these reasons there is great difficulty in distinguishing the genuine history of Elisha from the overgrowth of popular imagination.

Reference is made elsewhere (see KINGS, BOOKS OF, § 8) to the disorder and chronological confusion

2. Disorder of the Anecdotes. which characterise the bundle of anecdotes on Elisha's life. It may be well to add a few details.

In 2 K. 5 the story of Naaman's cure implies that the relations between the Aramean and the Israelite kingdoms were ostensibly peaceable. Then, without any explanation of the change, we are introduced in 6 8-23 to the very midst of the warfare between the nations. In the closing verse of this section we are told that the Arameans made no further invasion of Israelite territory, whereupon in 6 24 we find the Aramean king besieging Samaria. In 5 26 f. Gēbāzi, Elisha's servant, is said to have been struck with life-long leprosy, which, however, does not offer any obstacle to his familiar intercourse with the king in 8 1-6.

There is no unity therefore in the stories as a whole, though some of them are, no doubt, connected with each other (so 8 16 48-37 38-41 42-44. See also KINGS, § 8). Further, it is uncertain whether the editor made his selection on any definite principle, for the assertion that he has related twelve and only twelve miracles of Elisha cannot be maintained save on an arbitrary method of reckoning. In any case he failed to understand Elisha's connection with contemporary events. By placing all the anecdotes, with one exception, before Jehu's revolt, he has reduced the greater part of Elisha's public life to a mere blank. Yet how energetic and fruitful in result that life was, we learn with unimpeachable evidence from the exclamation of the king who stood by the aged prophet's death-bed (2 K. 13 14).

Nevertheless the stories, despite their legendary character, are early in date. They belong to the literature of the Northern Kingdom and to the eighth century B.C. Thus, even when they cannot claim to be treated as sober history, they are of great value for the light they throw on the manners and beliefs which prevailed at the time when they were written; and sometimes at least we are justified in the confidence that we have before us fragments of tradition which will bear the test of criticism.

Elisha was the son of Shaphat and belonged to ABEL-MEHOLOH (q.v.): it was there that Elijah found him.

3. Elisha's call. The meeting occurred some time after Elijah's return from Horeb; for the route from Horeb to Damascus (i K. 19 15) would not lead through Abhel-meholah, and the word 'thence' in v. 19 must refer to some place mentioned in a section of the narrative which stood between vv. 18 and 19, but has been omitted by the editor. Elisha had twelve pair of oxen ploughing in the field before him, and was himself driving the twelfth pair. This implies that he was a man of substance, and far (therefore) from the common temptation to 'prophecy for a piece of bread' (Am.

7¹²). Still, when Elijah threw his mantle upon him, he was ready to leave all and only asked leave to bid his parents farewell. The leave was given, hut with the added warning to remember the sacred service to which he was now bound by the fact that Elijah had thrown his mantle over him (for this seems to be the meaning of the obscure words in 1 K. 19²⁰). Returning, Elisha slew the oxen, kindled a fire with the wood of the plough, and made a sacrificial meal for the people about him. From that time forth he was known as Elijah's disciple, as one who had 'poured water on his hands' (2 K. 3¹¹). His call had come mediately, through Elijah, not immediately from Yahwē. So also by Elijah's instrumentality he was perfected for the graver and more independent duties which awaited him when his master was gone.

He is said to have followed his master, when his end was near, from Gilgal in the centre of Palestine¹ to the sanctuary of Bethel and thence to Jericho. Elijah smites the Jordan with his mantle and the two comrades cross dry-shod. 'Ask what I shall do for thee,' says Elijah, 'before I am taken from thee.' The disciple indulges no idle hope of becoming a second Elijah; but he would receive 'a double portion' of his master's spirit—i.e., the portion of the first-born, comparing himself with other 'sons of the prophets,' not with his and their mighty father. Even that is a 'hard thing' to ask; but he is to gain this pre-eminence if he is enabled to behold the parting form, as it is borne upward in the storm and lightning. He sees the wondrous ascent; he gazes on his 'father' till he vanishes in the height, and rends his clothes in grief for his bereavement. Then he lifts the mantle which had fallen from the ascending prophet's shoulders, smites the river with it and divides the waters in the strength of Elijah's God. Other members of the prophetic guild seek anxiously for their lost leader in hill and dale. Elisha has the calm assurance that Elijah is gone and that he is the heir.

The ascension of Elijah introduces a group of miracles.

One miracle is stern and cruel; he curses the youths at Bethel who mock him, and forty-two of them are devoured by two she-hears (2²³⁻²⁵). Another has at least a penal character; Gehāzi is struck with life-long leprosy for his covetousness (5^{20 ff.}). The rest are deeds of beneficence.

Elisha heals with salt the waters of Jericho (2¹⁹⁻²²), makes poisonous gourds (see COURDS [WILD]) wholesome by sprinkling meal upon them in time of famine (4³⁸⁻⁴¹), multiplies bread to feed a hundred guests (4⁴²⁻⁴⁴) and oil to save the poor widow of a prophet from the creditor who would have seized her sons for debt and made them slaves (4¹⁻⁷); he brings the borrowed axe up from the river-bed and makes it swim on the water (6¹⁻⁷). With exquisite tact he enters into the sorrows of the Shunamite woman who had given him hospitable entertainment, and restores the life of the son whose very birth had been a token of the prophet's power and gratitude (4⁸⁻³⁷). He cleanses the leprosy of NAAMAN (9^{v.}) the Aramæan statesman (chap. 5); and even after he has been laid in the grave the touch of his bones restores a dead man to life (13^{20 ff.}).

It may be noted that these miracles are in part connected with the prophetic colonies, that they are modelled to some extent on the wonders ascribed to Elijah (cp 2 K. 2¹⁴ with v. 8; 2 K. 4^{1 ff.} with 1 K. 17^{14 ff.}; 2 K. 4^{32 ff.} with 1 K. 17^{17 ff.}; 2 K. 8^{10 ff.} with 14), and that so far as they embody the spirit of active love, they contribute a Christ-like element (which is missed, however, in Ecclus. 48¹²⁻¹⁴) to the ideal of prophecy.

Though both Elisha and his master were wonder-workers and champions of Yahwē's exclusive worship,

6. Political influence. Elisha's career presents points of marked contrast to that of Elijah. Instead of appearing and disappearing like a meteor flash, Elisha could be found readily enough by the people who consulted him in the leisure of New Moons and Sabhaths (2 K. 4²³), or by princes who sought him in person (2 K. 3¹² 6³³). The strife with Baal was over and Elisha exercised decisive power in court and camp.

Thus, Elisha accompanied the combined armies of Israel, Judah and Edom, then a vassal state under Judah, in an expedition against Moab, and saved them from perishing of thirst.

¹ 2 K. 2¹. We have assumed that the Gilgal here intended is Jūjūlla SW. of Shiloh. See further, GILGAL, § 4. If we identify Elisha's Gilgal with the famous sanctuary by the Jordan, then we must suppose that there is some confusion in the text, and make Elisha start from his home in Samaria. Robertson Smith (KINGS, BOOKS OF, in EB) held this to be the original intention of the narrator (see v. 25).

The story is historical in substance (cp JEHORAM, § 3^f). The allied army marched round the Dead Sea and crossing the Nahal hā-Arābim (see ARABAH II.) attacked Moab from the S. This was just the course which would suggest itself. Moab, as we now know from Meshā's altar-stone, had recovered and fortified cities on the N., the Arnon presented an obstacle to invasion from that quarter, and the Aramæans farther N. still might have cut off all possibility of retreat. 'Dig trenches on trenches in this valley, said the prophet, a rational method of reaching the water which filters through the sand to the rock beneath, and one which still gives its name to the Wādī el-Ahsā at the S. end of the Dead Sea (see W. R. Smith, OTJC² 147). We may perhaps doubt whether the Moabites really mistook the water under the sun for blood shed in the quarrel of the allies among themselves, though Stade (GVI 1 536) sees no reason to question the truth of even this feature in the narrative.

For his political influence, however, Elisha paid a heavy penalty. He felt, and was sometimes worsted by, the temptation to use means which his predecessor would surely have disdained. We may, indeed, on considering the relations between Samaria and Damascus, question the representation in 8⁷⁻¹⁵ that he was largely responsible for the murder of Ben-hadad by Hazael; but he certainly was a prime mover in the revolt by which the crafty and murderous Jehu, a man with no character for religion (note especially 10¹⁸), seized the throne of Israel (see JEHU). He bore a nobler part under other kings of Jehu's line.

If we follow Kuenen's plausible conjecture (Onderzoek, 12, § 25, n. 12, but see JEHORAM, § 2), it was in the time of Jehoahaz that the Aramæans besieged Samaria, till the famine within the walls made women devour their children, and the king, despairing of help from Yahwē and attributing the evil to Elisha's supernatural power, sought the prophet's life. Elisha, we are told, with a confidence like that of Isaiah, predicted victory and plenty. His prophecy was fulfilled; the Aramæans, terrified by a rumour that their own land was invaded (see JEHORAM, § 2), fled and left their supplies behind.

There came a turn in the tide. The Aramæans, struggling for life against Rammān-nirari III., could no longer hope to subjugate Israel; and Elisha, now stricken in years, saw in spirit the dawn of a brighter day.

It is said that on his death-bed he bade king Joash stand by the open window and shoot an arrow eastward. The prophet laid his own aged hands on the hands of the young king, and cried, as the arrow sped; 'An arrow of Yahwē's victory; yea, an arrow of victory over Aram.' Moreover he told the king to strike the ground with the arrows and when he did so declared it was the sign of three battles to be won, chiding him, however, because he did not double the strokes and so double his success against the foe.

Well might Joash lament over Elisha: 'My father, my father! Israel's chariots and horsemen (art thou)! His guiding and animating spirit had been worth many a troop to his people. Here lay Elisha's strength and here also its limitations. No new idea came to the hirth through him. He was a faithful disciple, a true patriot, a man of loving heart. He worked for Israel, scarcely through Israel for the world; and it is not, perhaps, by mere accident that in the NT he is mentioned only once (Lk. 4²⁷).

All the modern histories of Israel—especially those of Stade, Kittel, and Wellhausen—treat of Elisha; Smend, AT Relig., also may be consulted. W. E. A.

ELISHAH (עֲלִישָׁה; ελ[ε]ϊσα [BADEL], in Ⓞ of Gen. 10⁴, ελισσα), a son of Javan, occurs elsewhere only in the combination 'N'N, Ezek. 27⁷, 'coast-lands of Elishah' (νησων ελ[ε]ϊσα [BAQ]), whence violet and purple stuffs were brought to Tyre. The two most plausible identifications are that with S. Italy and Sicily, where were Greek colonies (Kiepert, Lag., Di., Kau.; cp TIRAS, end), and that with Carthage or, more widely, the N. African coast (Schulthess, Stade, E. Meyer [GA, 1282]). Both regions were famous for the purple dye (cp PURPLE). The latter is favoured by the name; Elissa, princess of Tyre, was the legendary founder of Carthage, which was perhaps originally called Elissa. On the other side Dillmann quotes the gloss in Syncellus, 'Elissa, whence the Sicelots' (ἐλισσά ἐξ οὗ σκελετοί; Eus. Chron. Armen. 213); but this seems to tell against the identification of Elishah and Sicily.

Dillmann urges that Carthage, being a Phœnician colony, would not be represented as descended from Japheth; but this would have as much force against Tarshish or Tartessus (cp TIRAS). It may be granted, however, that 'קִיִּים, 'coast-lands of Elisbah,' would be perhaps more natural of S. Italy and Sicily; Tg. on Ezek. 277 indeed explains this phrase by 'the province of Italy.' A decision is difficult; but perhaps Carthage has the more in its favour. F. B.

She is also styled 'sister of NAHSHON,' and 'Nahshon b. Amminadab' in P is the well-known chief of Judah in the desert march. P hardly derived the Aaronids from a Judahite mother. 'Sister of Nahshon' is, therefore, most probably a gloss (R_p) which has arisen from a confusion of Elisheba's father with the Judahite. It was, possibly, to avoid this confusion that the writer of 1 Ch. 6 22 [7] mentions a son of Kohath (Aaron's grandfather) named Amminadab, whose place, however, is elsewhere taken by Izhar (cp ib. 28). The tribal connection of Aaron's wife, therefore, is as obscure as that of the wife of his famous son ELEAZAR (q.v., 1).

The name Elisheba may well be pre-exilic (see Gray, HPN, 206), and with regard to the difficult question of the origin of Levitical names it may be pointed out that in this case a name of parallel formation is borne by a devout follower of Yahwè, the wife of the priest Jehoiada of Judah. See JEHOSEBA.

ELISHUA (עִישָׁוָה, 'God is a help,' § 28; cp Elisha; ελισογε [L]), 'a son of David' (q.v., § 11 d (β)) (2 S. 5 15, ελ[ε]ϊσογς [BA]; 1 Ch. 145, εκταε [B], ελισαγ [A]). In 1 Ch. 36 for ELISHAMA (q.v., 3) Elishua should be restored (so ש^b ελεισα).

ELISIMUS, RV ELIASIMUS (ελ[ε]ϊσιμ[ε]ϊμοc [BA]), 1 Esd. 9 28 = AV Ezra 10 27 ELIASIB, 5.

ELIU (הַלֵּיוֹף [BNA], הַלֵּיוֹף [B^c], i.e., הַלֵּיוֹף, ELIHU), a forefather of Judith (Judith 8 1).

ELIUD (ελιουδ [Ti. WH], i.e., הַלֵּיוֹד, 'God [or 'my God'] is glorious'; cp Ammihud, Abihud), sixth from Zerubbabel in the ancestry of Joseph (Mt. 1 14). See GENEALOGIES ii., § 2 (c).

ELIZAPHAN (עִישָׁפָן, i.e., 'God [or, my God] shelters'; cp Elzaphan; ελ[ε]ϊσαφθαν [BAL]).

1. A Kohathite prince, according to Nu. 3 30 P; but in 1 Ch. 158 his name is co-ordinated with that of Kohath (ελισαφαρ [B]). He is also named in 2 Ch. 29 13. See GENEALOGIES i., § 7 (i).
2. A grandson of ZEBULUN, Nu. 34 25 P. See PARNACH.

ELIZUR (הַלֵּיזֹר, 'God [or my God] is a rock,'

ELKOSHITE

§ 29; cp ZURIEL, PEDAHZUR; ελ[ε]ϊκογρ [BAL]), a Reubenite prince (Nu. 1 5 2 10 7 30 35 10 18†). See ZUR, NAMES WITH.

ELKANAH (הַקָּנָה, 'God hath created (him)' or 'God hath bought him,' § 36; ελκανα [BAL]).

1. The father of the prophet Samuel (1 S. 1 1). He was the son of Jerahmeel (see JEROHAM [1]) according to one form of the genealogy of Samuel; but the name of Samuel's father is also traditionally given (it would seem) as Elibu or rather (see ELIHU, 2) Elimelech.

2. Eponym of one of the three divisions of the Korahite Levites (Ex. 6 24; see KORAH [3]), the others being ASSIR (1) and ABIASAPH. In 1 Ch. 6 the genealogy of the sons of Korah is given in two forms, both differing from that of Exodus, and Samuel's father is represented as a descendant of the Korahite Elkanah. This may mean either that the descendants of Samuel were actually incorporated after the exile in the Korahite guild under the name of sons of Elkanah, and that an older Elkanah, son of Korah, was inserted to give symmetry to the genealogical tree, or simply that the Korahite guild of Elkanah was led by its name to claim kinship with the prophet Samuel and incorporate his ancestors in its genealogy. See GENEALOGIES i., § 7 (iii).

3. A Levite: 1 Ch. 9 16 (ηλκανα [B]).
4. One of David's warriors, 1 Ch. 12 6 (ηλκανα [BAL]). See DAVID, § 11 (a).
5. A Levitical door-keeper for the ark: 1 Ch. 15 23 (ηλκανα [BNA]).
6. A Judahite noble: 2 Ch. 28 7 (ελκανα [B]). W. R. S.

ELKIAH (ελκεια [BNA]; AV ELCLIA—i.e., Hilkiah), an ancestor of Judith (Judith 8 1).

ELKOSHITE, THE (הַקָּשִׁיטִי, Ginsb., with most MSS and editions; עִישָׁקִישִׁי, Baer, with the small MS Massora; עִישָׁקִישִׁי and עִישָׁקִישִׁי also are found in MSS; ελκεκαιοc [BNAQ]), a gentile noun, derived from Elkosh, the name of the town to which the prophet Nahum belonged (Nah. 1 1).

According to Peiser [ZATW, 7 349 ('97)], the word contains the name of the deity, עִישָׁקִישִׁי [cp KISH], which he finds likewise in the name Kūshaiah [1 Ch. 15 17], and in Prov. 30 31 (he reads עִישָׁקִישִׁי for עִישָׁקִישִׁי).

Three sites have been proposed.

a. There is an el-Kūš not far from the left bank of the Tigris, two days' journey N. of the ancient Nineveh, where the grave of the prophet Nahum is pointed out. According to Friedrich Delitzsch and A. Jeremias,¹ this is the place referred to in Nah. 1 1. This theory involves the assumption that Nahum belonged to the 'ten tribes' and was horn in exile, and has been thought to be favoured by the prophet's (presumed) accurate knowledge of local details respecting Nineveh. On the one hand, however, the N. Israelitish exiles were not settled in Assyria proper (2 K. 17 6 18 11), and we find no trace in Nahum of any hope of a return home such as an exile would certainly have expressed somewhere (cp Kue., Ond. (2) ii., § 75, n. 4); and, on the other, quite enough was known of Assyria in Palestine in the time of Nahum to enable a prophet of such power to sketch the picture that we have in chap. 2. We must rather suppose that it was at a later day that the graves of the two prophets who prophesied against Nineveh were sought in the neighbourhood of that city. Whilst a resting-place for Jonah was found in Nineveh itself (Nebi Yunus), the village called el-Kūš seemed, in view of Nah. 1 1, to be appropriate for the grave of Nahum. That there was a village there, however, in the seventh century B.C. cannot be shown. The earliest reference to it, according to Jeremias, is in the eighth century A.D.; nor is the grave mentioned before the sixteenth.

b. A ruined site in Galilee, Elcese, was shown to Jrome as the birthplace of the prophet, and is attested, with slight variations, as Ελκεσε also by the Greek fathers. As *ελκεσαιο*s is also the form of the name in Nah. 1: (ελκαισεου [N*], -κεσεου [N^{c.b}]) it is possible that שְׁרָיָה was a collateral form by the side of שְׁרָיָה (Kue.), or, rather, that the name of Nahum's birthplace was שְׁרָיָה, not שְׁרָיָה. Indeed, since the scriptio plena is in no case binding, שְׁרָיָה might itself be read שְׁרָיָה and derived from שְׁרָיָה. In this case the name would have nothing to do with the deity שר. If, then, the tradition reported by Jerome be correct, we must suppose that Nahum, assuming that he lived in the seventh century (see NAHUM, § 2), was born in Galilee amongst the Israelites left there in 722, and then, as the book itself refers us to Judæa, removed thither at a later date (cp further CAPERNAUM, §§ 1, 5).

c Against the statement of Jerome, however, is to be set that of the Vita Prophetarum of Pseudo-Epiphanius. The text of the latter is indeed unfortunately very unsettled, and in its common form the ελκεσε of Nahum is located E. of the Jordan. Nestle, however, has made it very probable that Ἰορδάνου εἰς is due to a corruption of the text, and that the genuine text says that Elkese lay 'beyond Betogabra' (= ELEFTHEROPOLIS, the mod. Bêt Jibrin) in the tribe of Simeon (ZDPV 1 222 ff. [78]; transl. in PEFQ, 1879, pp. 136-138; cp Marg. u. Mut. 226 f., 43 ff. [93]). Beyond question a place in Judah would be much more in harmony with the age and contents of the book (cp We. Kl. Proph. 155 [9], 158), who asserts that Nahum was 'at all events a Judæan from Judah', and it should likewise be considered that all similar names of places point to the S.—viz., שְׁרָיָה, יְרֵמְיָה, רְחֵמְיָה to the kingdom of Judah; הַשְׁרָיָה to the S. part of the trans-Jordanic district. Certainty is, however, unattainable. K. B.

ELLASAR (עֲלָסָר, ελλασαρ [D], εελλ. [A], ελα. [L], עלסר, Ponti [gen.]), the land or city and district ruled over by ARIOCH (Gen. 14:1). It was natural to think, with Ménant and others, of Ašur, the old capital of Assyria, and its territory. Ellasar might very well be a Hebrew transliteration of the Assyrian alu Ašur (city of Ašur); Assyrian (not Babylonian) š (ś) is represented in Hebrew by s (š). Most scholars, however, have rightly adopted Sir H. Rawlinson's view that Ellasar means Larsa or Larsam, the ancient Babylonian city of the sun-god, the ruins of which are still to be seen at Senkereh (cp BABYLONIA, § 3), because the name (Arioch) of the king is identified with Eri-aku, son of Kudur-mabuk, and vassal-king of Larsa. This, no doubt, requires one to assume either a slip on the part of the writer or a corruption of the text; but, since the narrator speaks of allies or vassals of the Elamitic over-king Chedorlaomer, it is clear that he must mean, not Ašur, but Larsa. See Del. Par. 224, and, on the historical value of the account, CHEDORLAOMER, § 4 f. C. P. T.

ELM, a misleading rendering of עֵלִים in Hos. 4:13 AV, for TEREBINTH [q.v.]. Palestine is too warm for elms.

ELMODAM or better RV Elmadam (ελμοδαμ [Ti. WH]), six generations above Zerubbabel in the genealogy of Joseph (Lk. 3:28).

Fesh. (cp Arm.) gives Elmodad; cp ALMODAD (Gen. 10:26), a poor early conjecture. Read Elmatham—i.e., Elnathan (see 2 K. 24:8); d and th were confounded, see G's readings of ELZABAD. Cp GENEALOGIES ii., § 3.

ELNAAM (עֵלְנָאָם, 'God is graciousness,' § 38, cp Phoen. עֵלְנָאָם, CIS 1 no. 383) in David's army list (1 Ch.

11:46; ελλαδαν [B], -δαν [N^{vid.}], ελναδαν [A], θαν. [L]. Cp JOSHAVIAH, and see DAVID, § 11 (a) ii.

ELNATHAN (עֵלְנָתָן, 'God has given,' §§ 24, 27, ελναθαν [BAQ^{mf.}]).

1. Grandfather (on the maternal side) of Jehoiachin; designated, 'Elnathan of Jerusalem'; 2 K. 24:8 (ελλα-ναθαμ [B], -μαθαμ [A], -ναθαν [L]). Most probably the same as Elnathan b. Achbor, Jer. 36:12 ([C] 44:12], ωναθαν [B], ν. [AQ*]), who was sent by Jehoiakim to fetch Uriah out of Egypt, Jer. 26:22-24 ([33:22-24], om. B), and is mentioned again in connection with the burning of Jeremiah's roll (36:25 ναθαν [A]).

2. Three men of this name are mentioned in Ezra 8:16. Two were 'chief men' (רָאשֵׁי הָעָם) and the third, one of the רִבְרִיבֵי אוֹרְתוֹת or 'teachers,' RV (αδωναιμ, ελαθαν, εα. [BA], ελιν., ελν. [L, who gives only two]). In 1 Esd. 8:44 there are only two names, ALNATHAN, RV ELNATHAN (ενααταρ [B]), and EUNATAN, a misprint which is corrected in the RV ENNATAN (ενααταρ).

ELOHIM (עֱלֹהִים), see NAMES, § 114 f.

ELOI (ελωι), Mk. 15:34. See ELI, ELI.

ELON (עֵלֹן, i.e., '[sacred] oak,' § 69; cp ALLON).

1. One of the cities assigned to Dan in Josh. 19:43, where it is mentioned along with Shaalabbin, Aijalon, Timnah, and Ekron. (C has אלון [B], על. [A], אל. [L], but C^t עלון for 'Aijalon' in v. 42—a case of transposition.) The site has not been identified; but it is obviously to be looked for in or near the Valley of Sorek (W. Sarar). The same Elon is referred to in 1 K. 4:9 (crit. emend.), where it follows Shaalabim and Bethshemesh. See ELON-BETH-HANAN (where C's readings are given).

2. See AIJALON, 2; and cp below, ELON ii., 1 f.

ELON (עֵלֹן, Gin. Ba.; αλλων [BAL]). 1. A son, that is, family or clan, of ZEBULUN: Gen. 46:14 (ασρων [B]) = Nu. 26:26 (αλων [L]); perhaps the same as

2. One of the six 'minor' judges, most of whose names 'appear to be those of clans rather than of individuals' (Moore, Judges, xxviii.). Judg. 12:11 f. (Gin. עלון, Ba. עלון, αλων [BL], -ν [A]; Ahialon).

Elon is really the heros eponymos of Aijalon (or rather Elon; see AIJALON, 2), in the land of Zebulun. The gentilic is Elonite, עֵלֹנִי; Nu. 26:26 (αλλων[ε]ι [BAF], *αλων*ι [L]).

3. (עֵלֹן, Gin. Bā.; properly a place-name; see NAMES, § 69), a Hittite, father of BASHEMATH (1), one of Esau's foreign wives: Gen. 26:34 (αλων [AL], -δωμ [D]), called father of ADAM, 2: Gen. 36:2 (ελωμ [N], αδωμ [D], -λων [E], -μ [L]). See BASHEMATH, 1, BEERI, 1.

ELON-BETH-HANAN (עֵלֹן בֵּית־חָנָן; but some MSS have בן for בית, and others prefix י; ελωμ εωσ βηθλαμαν [B], αλωμ εωσ βηθαναν [A], αλωμ εωσ βαιθναδαν [L]). A name, or rather names, at the end of the description of Solomon's second prefecture (1 K. 4:9). C is probably right in reading '... and Elon as far as B.' (cp v. 12, end). Elon is probably the first ELON (i., 1) mentioned above, though it is also possible to read Aijalon. 'Beth-hanan,' if a frontier town is meant, can hardly be right; some well-known name is wanted.

Possibly we should, with Klostermann, read BETH-HORON, an important place, marked out by nature for a frontier-town. Conder's suggestion of Beit Anan (Socin, Bet Enan, a village 8½ m. from Jerusalem, on the road to Jinnin (PEFM, 3:16), Beit Hanin, 2 h. NE. of Gaza (BR 2:371), may be mentioned.

ELOTH (עֵלוֹת), 1 K. 9:26 2 Ch. 8:17. See ELATH.

ELPAAL (עֵלְפָאָל, § 31; αλφααδ. ελααδ [B], αλφαα. -λ., ελφ. [A], ελειφ. [L]), a name in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 9 ii. β); 1 Ch. 8:11 f. 18. See JQR 11 102 ff., § 1. Cp EPHLAL.

ELTEKE or ELTEKEH (אֶלְתֵּקֶה or אֶלְתֵּקֶה), Assy. Al-ta-ku-u, εΛΘΕΚΩ [A]), a town of the Judæan lowland, mentioned with Ekron and Timnah, in the book of Joshua (19:44, ἀλλὰθα [B], εΛΘΕΚΕΙΝ [L]), was (21:23 εΛΚΩΘΑΙΜ [B], εΛΘΕΚΑ [L]) a Levitical city in the inheritance of Dan. It was taken and destroyed by Sennacherib on his way to Timnah and Ekron after his defeat of the Egyptian forces that had come to the help of the Ekronites (see his 'prism' inscription, Schrader, *KAT*², 171 f., 289, 292 [ET, 159 f., 282, 285]). The army overthrown by Sennacherib probably consisted of Jews as well as Ekronites and Egyptians, and a likely spot for them to unite and take their stand would be up the Wady Sarār (Vale of Sorek) on the high road between Ekron and Jerusalem, at the foot of the hills—a position which equally suits the data in Joshua. Sennacherib might reach it from the coast and the neighbourhood of Joppa (where he was previously), by the vale of Aijalon and the easy pass from the latter to the Vale of Sorek. No trace of the name, however, has been discovered here or elsewhere. Khirbet Lezkā, 7 m. SW. of Ekron and near the great N. road (PEF map, Sh. xvi.; see map to JUDÆA) suits the data of Sennacherib's inscription, but seems incompatible with those of Joshua. Beit Likia in Aijalon (Conder) is too far N. (cp Guthe, Zukunftsbild d. Jesaja, 48). See CHRONOLOGY, § 21.

G. A. S.

ELTEKON (אֶלְתֵּקֹן: θεκογμ [B], εΛΘΕΚΕΝ [AL]), a town in the hill-country of Judah (Josh. 15:59), mentioned in a small group of six along with Halhul (Halhūl), Beth-zur (Burj Sūr) and Gedor (Jedūr). The site is therefore to be sought, most probably, somewhere on or near the route from Hebron to Jerusalem. The reading θεκογμ of \mathfrak{C}^b suggests that the element $\kappa\eta$ in this name was sometimes taken to represent the definite article (cp ELTOLAD). Some have thought of this Eltekon as the site of Sennacherib's victory of Altaku, and indeed, in spite of what Schrader says (*KAT*², 171 f.), the spelling of the latter is nearer Eltekon than Eltekeh; but the geographical reasons he gives in favour of Eltekeh are well grounded. See ELTEKE.

ELTOLAD (אֶלְתֹּלַד), one of the cities of Judah in the Negeb near the border of Edom (Josh. 15:30, εΛΘΩΔΔ [A], -ωλαδ [L], εΛΒΩΝΔΔΔ [B]), but in Josh. 19:4 (εΛΘΟΥΔΔΔ [A], -λαδ [L], -λα [B]) assigned to Simeon. In 1 Ch. 4:29 the name is TOLAD (תּוֹלַד; θωλαδ [A], θουλαειμ [B], θολαθ [L]), the prefixed Arabic article $\kappa\eta$ being omitted (so at least Kön. 2:47, but apparently not Ges.-K. § 35 m; cp ELTEKON, above).

ELUL (אֱלֻל, εΛΟΥΛ [B^{NA}vid]; in Assy. Ululu; see Schr. KAT 380, and cp אֱלֻל in Palm. [de Vogüé, Syr. Cent. no. 79]) occurs in Neh. 6:15 (εΛΟΥΔ [B], ΔΛΟΥΛ [L]) and 1 Macc. 14:27 (εΛΟΥΛ [VA], om. \aleph) as the name of a MONTH (q.v., § 5).

ELUZAI (אֱלֻזַי, i.e., 'God is my refuge?' § 29; אזאי [B], εΛΙΩΖΙ [A], εΛΙΕΖΕΡ [L]), one of David's warriors, 1 Ch. 12:57. See DAVID, § 11 (a) iii.

ELYMAIS (εΛ[λ]ΥΜΑΙΣ [B]). 1. In 1 Macc. 6:1 f. AV has, 'king Antiochus, travelling through the high countries, heard say that Elymais in the country of Persia was a city greatly renowned for riches, silver, and gold, and that there was in it a very rich temple,' etc. (cp NANEA). RV, however, reads, 'that in

Elymais in Persia there was a city,' etc. AV follows TR; RV represents ἐν Ἐλυμαῖδι ἐν τῇ Περσίδι; \mathfrak{C}^b reads ἐν ἐλυμαῖς (ἐλυμαῖς [A]) ἐν τῇ περσί. Whether RV is justified in adopting this text seems doubtful; ἐν before ἐλυμαῖς may be the correction of a scribe who knew that there was no city bearing the name of Elymais. Polybius (31:11), it is true, states that the temple on which Antiochus had designs was in Elymais; but 2 Macc. 9:2 places it at Persepolis, which was not in Elymais, but in Persia proper.

G. Hoffmann (Auszüge aus Syr. Akten Pers. Märtyrer, 132 f.), quoting a passage τὸ τῆς Ἀπρέμειδος ἱερὸν τὰ Ἀζαρα, assumes that Ἀζαρα is the city referred to, and identifies Ἀζαρα with the Ar. Āzar, which is in Khūstān, S.E. of Susa, one day's journey on the road from Rām-bormuz to el-Ahwāz (cp al-Mukaddasī, ed. de Goeje, 419:13). Possibly, however, the real name was one which admitted of being mutilated and corrupted so as to produce אֶלְיָמַיִם. Grätz (MGW), 1883, p. 241 ff.) seeks a clue in the obscure passage Dan. 11:45; but it seems hazardous to assume that אֶלְיָמַיִם (EV 'his palace,' which does not suit אֶלְיָמַיִם 'the tents of') is equivalent to Ἀπφάδα, the name of an Elamite city in Ptolemy, for Grätz himself holds that the rest of the clause is deeply corrupt. Compare, however, Vg. and Aq. in Dan. 1:2; both take אֶלְיָמַיִם to be a proper name.

'Elymais' recurs in Tob. 2:10, where RV^{mg} certainly adopts the correct reading. For the statement that ACHIACHARUS went to Elymais (ἐἰς τὴν Ἐλ(λ)υμαῖδα [BNA]—possibly ἐἰς γῆν 'E.) support has been found in the semi-apocryphal Romance which bears his name (Rendel Harris, Story of Ahiqar, lii.). Dillon, however, ingeniously suggests that the name has arisen from the underground cell—the original narrative had some derivative of $\kappa\eta\lambda\gamma$ —in which Ahiqar hides himself from the wrath of Sennacherib and Nādan (Contemp. Review, March 1898). It is to be noted that the allusion to Achiacharus has little bearing upon Tobit—at least in its present form (see TOBIT).

1. One of David's warriors; 1 Ch. 12:12 (ελαζερ [B], probably only a scribe's error, ελεζαβαδ [A], ελσαβαδ [L]). See DAVID, § 11 (a) iii.

2. b. Shemaiah, a Korahite door-keeper, 1 Ch. 26:7 (εληζαβαθ [B]; ελζαβαδ [A]; εε. [L]).

EMBALMING. The Egyptian belief in the continued existence after death of the human Ka (see EGYPT, § 18) seems to be of very great antiquity. To make this existence happy precautions of every kind were taken; food and drink were placed in the grave that the Ka might not starve; his favourite movables in like manner were buried with him; but above all the body had to be preserved so that the Ka could resume possession at pleasure. Hence the very ancient practice of embalming.

A minute description of the methods employed in his own time is given by Herodotus (286 ff.); with this may be compared the account of Diodorus Siculus (19:1). According to Herodotus embalming was the business of a special guild. He distinguishes three methods.

1 Read 'and Elzabab and his brothers' with \mathfrak{C} and some Heb. MSS (Ki.).

1. In the costliest of the three the brain was withdrawn through the nose with an iron hook and the cavity filled with spices. Then an incision was made in the abdomen on the left side with an 'Ethiopic stone' (flint knife), the bowels removed and washed with palm wine, the cavity filled with myrrh, cassia, and other drugs, and the opening sewed up. Next the body was kept for seventy days in natron (according to modern analysis, sub-carbonate of soda), then finally washed and skilfully swathed in long strips of byssus smeared with gum. The mummy was usually enclosed in a sort of case which showed the outlines of the body, and lastly in a wooden coffin of human shape, occasionally also in a stone sarcophagus.

2. The second method was simpler, and correspondingly cheaper. Cedar oil was introduced into the body and removed after it had decomposed the viscera; the body was then laid in natron, which, according to Herodotus, wholly consumed the flesh, leaving nothing but the skin and bones.

3. The third and cheapest method substituted for the cedar oil of the second some less expensive material.

Broadly speaking, the statements of Herodotus are confirmed by what we learn from Egyptian sources and from examination of the mummies themselves.¹ Extant mummies, however, exhibit more methods of embalming than the three just described. In particular those of the New Empire show a marked advance in the art, as compared with those of the Old. According to Erman, however (Egypt, 315), accurate details as to this are still wanting. One of the main innovations was in the treatment of the viscera. In the New Empire these were removed; the heart was replaced by a stone scarabæus (the scarabæus, as a peculiarly mysterious and holy creature, was supposed likely to be of essential use to the dead). The heart, lungs, liver, and other remaining viscera were set aside in four vases, usually (from an old misunderstanding) called Canopic. Each vase was under the protection of a special dæmon—all four dæmons being sons of Osiris—and the lid of each took the form of the head of that dæmon: man, jackal, hawk, cynocephalus. The special function of the dæmon was to ward off hunger.

This custom of embalming was specifically Egyptian. The Hebrews did not practise it. It is only as being an Egyptian custom that the narrator speaks of it as applied in the cases of Jacob and Joseph (Gen. 50:2 f. [J₂], 50:26 [E]). With his statement that the embalming lasted forty days (50:3) may be compared that of Diodorus (1:91) which makes it at least thirty days. Ordinarily, however, it seems to have taken seventy days. There is a statement of Josephus (Ant. xiv. 74), referring to a later period—a statement which stands by itself—that the body of Aristobulus was embalmed with honey so as to allow of its being afterwards removed to Jerusalem.

EMBROIDERY. RV's substitute for the 'needle-work' of AV in Judg. 5:30 Ps. 45:14 [15] (רִמְמָה 'brodered work'), and virtually in Ex. 26:36 27:16 28:39 36:37 38:18

1. Hebrew terms. 39:29 (רִמְמָה). EV gives 'brodered work' in Ezek. 16:10 13 (רִמְמָה), 'their brodered garments' in 26:16 (רִמְמָה). The Heb. word (rimmah) is used metaphorically in Ezek. 17:3 (feathers of an eagle) and 1 Ch. 29:2 (ornamental stones, or mosaic work). The cognates of רִמְמָה are Eth. reḥem, Ar. raḥama 'to embroider,' also 'to write' ('to make points'), with which the Targ. רִמְמָה 'coloured spots,' and the Syr. tarḥemāthā 'red pimples,' may be compared, from which it seems to follow that the first step towards embroidery was making points, or little strokes; diversity of hue would be sought for in the next stage. In its usual specialised sense of needlework-ornamentation of woven fragments, Ar. raḥama has passed into

Italian (ricamare) and Spanish (recamar). ὄ has ποικιλία, ἡ ποικιλία τοῦ ραβιδευτοῦ, ἔργον ποικιλτοῦ, ποικίλος. In Ex. 28:4 AV has 'a brodered coat' for רִמְמָה חֵטָה; RV 'a coat of chequer work.' See TUNIC, and observe that, though in Ps. 45:15 [14] רִמְמָה (RV 'in, or upon, brodered work') is plainly corrupt, the reference to brocade-work in v. 14 [13] is unquestioned (see Che. Ps. (2)).

Embroidery was regarded by the Romans as peculiarly a Phrygian art¹ (vestis Phrygia; opus Phrygium).

2. Home of the art. Pliny (8:48) even states that embroidery was invented by the Phrygians. More probably the Phrygians derived the art indirectly from Babylonia.

According to Perrot and Chipiez (Art in Chaldaea and Assyria, 2:363) the Chaldæans first set the example of wearing richly embroidered stuffs, 'as we know from the most ancient cylinders, from the Telloh (Tell Loh?) monuments, and from the stele of Marduk-nadin-aḥi.' Should this statement be correct, it practically decides the question as to the origin of the art of embroidery. The Latin expression for an embroidering-needle (acus Babylonia) would seem to point in the same direction.

It is true, the ancient Babylonian cylinder-seals hardly supply any confirmation of the statement of historians. In the magnificent records of De Sarzec's excavations, however, there is (pl. I. bis, fig. 1a) a representation of a standing figure clothed in a garment covered with diagonal lines which form lozenges. In this we may most probably see an example of exceedingly early embroidery (3000 or 4000 B.C.), which would naturally assume a very simple form. Our next important example is that of Marduk-nadin-aḥi (about 1120 B.C.), in which the robe of the king is very elaborately wrought. The finest specimens of all, however, are the designs on the robe of the Assyrian king Ašur-nasir-apli (885 B.C.), which are most interesting and instructive with regard to this subject. The sculptures representing him show that his dress was embroidered with most varied designs, representing men, deities, and animals, as well as the king himself performing ceremonies before the sacred tree, etc. The borders and ornaments (generally floral, the chief subject being the sacred tree) are extremely good (see Layard, Monuments of Nineveh, and Perrot and Chipiez, Chaldaea, figs. 253-259, and text).

In the inscriptions we cannot at present say with certainty that either needlework or woven embroidery is spoken of. Garments and woven stuffs are indeed referred to; we even have lists of garments; but the precise signification of the words employed is often obscure. Very possibly, however, the phrases (subatu) ša ina ašagi barru and (subatu) ša ina kunsilli barru refer not to garments 'torn with thorns,' or other objects of that kind, but to cloth 'ornamented' or 'embroidered with a thorn' (? needle) and 'with a shuttle (?)' respectively.

Egyptian embroidery is known only through late specimens; but from these we can safely infer the production of similar fabrics in earlier times. Herodotus (3:17) mentions that Amasis (570 B.C.) sent to the Athena (Minerva) of Lindos a linen corslet inwoven with figures and embroidered with gold and cotton; and Ezekiel (27:7), addressing Tyre, says 'Of embroidered byssus from Egypt was thy sail.' Lucan (10:141-143) speaks of Egyptian embroidery. The thread is called Sidonian, the silk is from the Seres, the needle is Egyptian (Nilotis).

In Greece the invention of the art was ascribed to Athena; hence the offerings of foreign work of this kind to her temple (see above). Embroidery with the needle cannot be shown to be mentioned in the Homeric poems. Almost always the terms used are those applicable to weaving (Il. 3:125 ff. 22:440 f.; Od. 19:225 ff.).

To the value set on embroidery in ancient Palestine Judg. 5₃₀ supplies an eloquent testimony; it is presumably Babylonian work that the poet refers to. At any rate, Achan's mantle was Babylonian (Josh. 7 21 24). In the account of Hezekiah's tribute (Taylor cylinder, 334 ff.), there is no mention of embroidered garments; but, though we may perhaps assume that the veil of the temple (see below) was not Jewish work, it is probable (especially if P is late) that the art of embroidery was practised in Judæa. The account of the process of preparing the gold thread for the embroiderer, in Ex. 39 3, deserves notice. 'And they beat out the plates of gold, so that he could cut them into wires, to work these into the blue, and the purple, and the scarlet, and the fine linen, the work of an artist.' In this passage the word צֹבֵן, hōšēb (EV 'cunning workman') takes the place of צֹבֵן, rōšēm (EV 'embroiderer'); another similar but perhaps higher class of work may be meant.

According to the Talmudists רִקְמָה or embroidery, was when the design was attached to the stuff by being sewn on, and visible, therefore, on one side only, and the work of the צֹבֵן was that in which the design was worked in by the loom, appearing on both sides.¹ The correctness of this, however, may be doubted, for the statement that the צֹבֵן worked golden threads and also cherubim into the fabric (Ex. 26 1 31 38 35), implies that he, too, was a needle-worker (cherubim being probably much too difficult for a loom-worker at that period), and moreover an 'artist,' not only on account of the more complicated nature of the work he executed, but also because he worked from new and much more varied designs than the רִקְמָה.

Josephus (Ant. xii. 5 4 BJ v. 5 4) speaks of the wonderful veils both of the first and of the second (Herod's) temple. Clermont-Ganneau has suggested² that the veil of the first, which Antiochus Epiphanes certainly took away, was the curtain of the sanctuary of Olympia, of Assyrian workmanship, dyed with Phœnician purple, and given by Antiochus. Josephus's description of the highly artistic veil in Herod's temple, sets us wondering where it was made. He calls it a Babylonian curtain. It is doubtful whether any but priests' families remained on the site of ancient Babylon; but of course the art of embroidery may have been practised in other cities of Babylonia.

EMEK-KEZIZ. AV 'The valley of Keziz' (עֵמֶק כְּזִיז) יִצְחָק: ἀμεκακεϊς [B] -κκα. [A]. εμ. [L]), an unidentified city in the territory of Benjamin (Josh. 18 21), enumerated among BETH-HOGLAH and BETH-ARABAH, z. The name Kēzīs sounds like the word Kēsās, another name of the W. Hasāseh, between Tekoa and En-gedi (see Ziz); but this Wady could not belong to Benjamin. If Ⓢ^B is right in reading Beth-abarah in Josh. l.c., we may conjecturally identify Emeke-keziz with the broad and deep Wady en-Nawā'imeh, NW. of the modern Jericho, which Robinson explored on his way from Jericho to Bethel. The place intended was possibly near the springs of 'Ain ed-Dūk (see Docuz).

T. K. C.

EMERALD (σμαραγδός, smaragdus)³ represents in Ⓢ^B (see, however, PRECIOUS STONES) the Heb. בִּרְקָה bārēketh (Ex. 28 17 39 10) or בִּרְקָה, bārēkath (Ezek. 28 13).

1. Name. It is also the rendering of RV^{mg}; EV, wrongly, has CARBUNCLE. Targg. and Pesh. retain the Heb. word: בִּרְקָה [Jerus. Jon.], בִּרְקָה [Onk.], בִּרְקָה [Pesh.]. The Gk. name, which occurs also without the initial letter, seems to be the same as the Hebrew; but the ultimate origin of the word is unknown. The Semitic root barak, 'to lighten,' readily suggests itself; but ep Sans. marakata, marakta. In Arabic two varieties of emerald are distinguished, sabarjad and zumurrud.

³ Whence emerald, through (presumably) smaragdus.

The emerald is classed mineralogically with the beryl (see BERYL), from which, however, it differs in having a fine green colour, attributed to the presence in it of chromium sesquioxide; it also never presents the internal striae often seen in the beryl.¹

2. Description. It occurs in six-sided prismatic crystals of the hexagonal system, the edges of which not unfrequently show various modifications. The emerald is transparent or translucent, and has a vitreous, rarely resinous lustre. It was highly valued by the ancients (see Pliny, NH 37 5). Various virtues were ascribed to it; it was said to be good for the eyes, to colour water green, to assist women in childbirth, and to drive away evil spirits; in the East it is still credited with talismanic and medicinal properties.

Besides being mentioned in Ezek. 28 13 as one of the precious stones with which the king of Tyre was decked, and in Ex. 28 17 39 10 as among the gems

3. Biblical References. and in the high priest's breastplate, the emerald is alluded to in Tobit 13 16 Judith 10 21 Eccus. 326 Rev. 4 3 (σμαραγδίνος, of the rainbow), and Rev. 21 19.

z. In Ex. 28 18 39 11 Ezek. 27 16 28 13,† EV has 'emerald' for נֶפֶשׁ, nōphek, but RV^{mg} renders 'carbuncle.' The resemblance between the letters of Heb. nōphek and Egypt. m/fk(t), or, as commonly written, māfkat, may be urged in favour of 'emerald' as at any rate a better rendering of nōphek than 'carbuncle.' The Egyptian word represents, according to WMM, a green stone, not however the emerald, but malachite. It is not less plausible to identify nōphek and māfkat with the lupakku-stones in the Amarna Tablets (202, 16), sent by the prince of Ashkelon to the king of Egypt. In S. Philistia, where the roads from Sinai terminated, it would be easy to obtain māfkat from the Egyptian mines. If we follow Ⓢ^B in Ezek. 27 16 and read 'Edom' (אֲדָמָה) for MT's 'Aram' (אַרָמָה), it will appear that nōphek as well as other precious stones came from Edom. This too is quite consistent with the equation nōphek = māfkat (so WMM, OLZ, Feb. 1899, p. 39 ff.). Maspero, however, interprets māfkat as 'turquoise.'

EMERODS.² RV 'tumours,' except in Dt. 28 27; but see mg. (אֲפַלְמִים, 'afālim; Ⓢ^{BAL} Η ΕΔΡΑ, ΔΙ ΕΔΡΑΙ: in 1 S. 56 εΙC ΤΑC ΕΔΡΑC [A] ΝΑΥC [B]; both renderings combined in L), mentioned with other diseases in Dt. 28 27 [EV] and in the account of the affliction of the Philistines (1 S. 56 9 12 64 f. 11 17). According to the ordinary view, 'afālim became at length a vulgar word, and Kṛē therefore substitutes the more seemly word תַּחְרִים, tēhōrim, which is also to be found in the late insertions 1 S. 6 11 6 17-18a (see Budde, Sam. SBOT). Since, however, tēhōrim is no euphemism at all,³ and analogous Kṛē readings (see HUSKS) have been argued to be corrupt, it has been proposed to read for the improbable and unpleasant word תַּחְרִים, רַחֲמִים (= שְׁחִינִים, 'ulcers'). Kṛē is therefore not a euphemism but a gloss (Che.).

The reading tēhōrim must, it is true, have been an early one, for it seems to be implied in the εἰσραί of Ⓢ^B , not, however in Ps. 78 66, where a small corruption has obscured the true sense.⁴ Tradition has in fact radically misunderstood the meaning of 'afālim, which (like the gloss rēthāhīm) must be a descriptive term for the disease, and probably means 'tumours' (so RV; cp 'āphēl, 'hill'). This suits the (almost certainly correct) reading, אֲפַלְמִים, of the verb in 1 S. 5 9 6 (for MT's אֲפַלְמִים).⁵ According to the emended text the passage runs thus—'and he smote the men of the city, both small and great, and tumours broke out upon them.'⁶

That hæmorrhoidal swellings in ano are referred to is rendered possible by the usage of the Ar. 'afā (see Ges.

² 'Emerods' is found only in AV. The nearest approach to the form is 'emeraudes,' Mid. Eng. in the Promptorium Parvulorum of 1440, which is nearly the same as old Fr. 'emeroides—i.e., hæmorrhoids (or piles).

³ See BDB and Ges.-Buhl, s.v. תַּחְרִים.

⁴ For אֲפַלְמִים read אֲפַלְמִים, 'And made his foemen turn back.' Retreating and ignominy are constantly connected in the Psalms (e.g., 6 10 111).

⁵ Cp Ex. 9 9 f.; פ and ק, ח and ת were confounded (Che.).

Thes.), and by the case of the alleged punishment of the Athenians for dishonour done to Dionysos (schol. ad Aristoph. Acharn. 243). The sense of 'plague-boil' (RV's second rend., Dt. 28²⁷ mg.) is favoured—not indeed by the (imaginary) symbolism of the mouse—but by the statement of the rapid spread of the disease among the Philistines. The most decisive passage is 1 S. 5¹², 'And the sick (הַמְּצֹרִים, Klo.) that died not were smitten with the tumours, and the cry of the city went up to heaven';—i.e., as soon as the ark reached Ekron there came on the whole population a plague which killed some at once, while the rest were afflicted with painful tumours, so that a cry of mourning and of pain resounded through the city. 'Plague-boils' in the technical sense of the expression, however, occur only in the groins, the armpits, and the sides of the neck; tēhorim therefore cannot be so rendered. Plainly a thorough treatment of the text is a necessary preliminary to a consistent and natural explanation of the narrative in 1 S. 5. As the text of 1 S. 6^{4 f.} 17^{f.} now stands, 'golden tumours,' as well as 'golden mice,' were sent by the Philistines as a votive offering to Yahwē. H. P. Smith however thinks that the original narrative mentioned only 'golden tumours,' the mice wherever they appear being the result of late redactional insertion. This view is certainly preferable to that of Hitzig, who thought that the only golden objects sent were symbols of the pestilence which had devastated the Philistine cities (Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron) in the form of mice, a theory which, being so widely accepted, ought to be correct, but is unfortunately indefensible. The idea of 'golden tumours' is very strange, however. Votive offerings, both in ancient and in modern times, represent not the disease from which the sick man has suffered but the part of the body affected. 'Indeed it could hardly be otherwise; for most morbid conditions do not admit of plastic representation so as to be distinguishable by untrained eyes.' So Dr. C. Creighton, who proposes to interpret ḏfālim in 1 S. 6^{4 f.} and tēhorim in v. 17 of the anatomical part of the body affected, and to make the disease dysentery; but it is plain from ח that the narrative in 1 S. 5^{f.} has been interpolated, and it would seem that not only 1 S. 6^{17 18a} but also the references to 'golden tumours' in vv. 4^{f.} must be late insertions.¹ כִּי וְעַלֵּי and וְעַלֵּי are not very unlike; out of a false reading a false statement may have developed.

Schwally (ZATW 18 135 [98]) compares Ar. 'ayyim, 'serpent,' as if 'serpent-spirits' were meant (cp ADAM AND EVE, col. 61, n. 3); but the text is more probably corrupt. The parallel names all admit of simple explanations. T. K. C.

1. A city in the 'plain,' at the base of the mountains of Judæa, near which was the scene of the defeat of Gorgias at the hands of Judas, 164 B.C. (1 Macc. 3⁴⁰, εμμα[σ]υ[ν] [ANV]; 57, εμμαουμ [A], -s [N], εμμαους [V]; 43, εμμαουμ [AN^{c.a.c.b.}], γαμμαουμ [N*], εμμ. [V]). It was among the strongholds afterwards fortified by Bacchides (ib. 9⁵⁰ εμμαους [N*], εμμαουμ [N^{c.a.} V], εμμ.

2. The Emmaus of Lk. 24¹³ (referred to, but unnamed, in Mk. 16¹²), a 'village' (κώμη), 60 (N and some others read 160) stadia from Jerusalem. The identification has found supporters in modern times (notably Robinson LBR 147 ff.), but is unlikely. Emmaus was too important a city to be called κώμη; and, not to mention other reasons, the supposition that the disciples accomplished so long a journey (for no specific purpose) is at variance with the narrative. It is very evident that the reading 160 is an intentional alteration to harmonise with the tradition shared by Eusebius and Jerome. Emmaus is to be sought for in the immediate neighbourhood of Jerusalem, and it is agreed that it can be no other than the Emmaus of Josephus (BJ vii. 66) 30 (so Niese; others read 60) stadia from Jerusalem, which Vespasian colonised by assigning to it 800 discharged veterans. Now about 34-35 stadia to the NW. of Jerusalem lies Kulōniyeh, a little village, which derives its name, it would appear, from 'colonia' and reminds us of the 800 veterans above.¹ In close proximity is the ruined Bēt Mizzā, probably the Benjamite מִצְאָה of Josh. 18²⁶, which according to the Gēmāra on Sukh. 4⁵ was also a 'colonia' (see MOZAH). The close resemblance between the names מִצְאָה (Bēt Mizzā) and Emmaus is sufficiently striking, and since it is almost the required distance from Jerusalem, there can be little doubt as to the identity of Kulōniyeh and the Emmaus of Josephus. The further identification of Kulōniyeh and the Emmaus of Lk. becomes equally probable, and is accepted by most moderns (Hi., Caspari, Buhl, Pal. 186, Schultz, *PRE*² 11769 771, Wolff in Riehm HWB, Wilson in Smith's *DB*²); see also Sepp, Jer. u. d. heil. Land, 154-73.²

By those who adopt the less accredited distance of 60 stadia, several sites have been proposed for Emmaus. (a) Conder (HB 326 f., PEFM 336 ff.) finds it in the name el-Khamasa (according to him = Emmaus), SW. of Bitir (see BETHUR i.); the antiquity of the place is vouched for by the existence of rock-hewn tombs. El-Khamasa, however, is 72 stadia from Jerusalem direct, and the distance is even greater by road. (b) el-Kubēbeh about 64 stadia from Jerusalem, W. of Neby Samwil. Further support for this is claimed in the tradition (which, however, is not older than the 14th cent.) associating this place with Christ's appearance (cp Baed.² 16, 115, and esp. Zschokke, D. neutest. Emmaus [65]). (c) Kariet el-'Enab (or Abū Gōsh), to the S. of el-Kubēbeh, about 66 stadia from Jerusalem (cp Williams, *Dict. Gk. and Rom. treat the word as an appellative, 'an open place.' Enaim, however, is obviously a place; it lay between Adullam and Timnah, and is the Enam (עֵנַם; ηναίμ [AL], μαίανει [B]) named in Josh. 15³⁴ in the first group of towns in the lowland of Judah. The fuller form of the name in Gen. and Josh. is probably Tappuah of Enaim (or, of Enam); see TAPPUAH, 1, and ΝΕΡΗΤΟΑΗ. The Talmud mentions a place called Kefar Enaim (Pesik. Rab. 23), and here and elsewhere distinctly states that Enaim is a place-name, on the authority of Rab (Sota, 10a). Conder's identification with Kh. ENDOR (דֹּר עֵן [Josh. 1 S.], דֹּרָר עֵן [Ps.], ΔΕΝΔΩΡ [BNARTL]; Euseb. J. εὐδωρον Jos.). (a) Endor appears in Josh. 17¹¹ (MT) among those Manassite towns within the territory of Issachar from which the Manassites were unable to expel the Canaanite inhabitants; but it is not mentioned in \mathfrak{S}^B (unless εδωρ [Ba^bmg.] is a trace of the name) nor in the || Judg. 1²⁷, and has evidently slipped into MT through the similarity of the name to that of Dor (cp Bennett, SBOT, Josh., ad loc.).

(b) Saul's visit to the witch of Endor before the battle of Gilboa is related in 1 S. 28⁵⁻²⁵ (αελδωρ [B], νηδωρ [A]). Although the name Endor was recognised in the fourth century A.D. as attaching to a large village 4 R. m. S. of Tabor (OS 259⁷⁰; 226²⁵), and though this fourth-century name still lingers at Endür, a miserable village on the N. slope of the Nabi Dahī, the question arises whether the narrator of 1 S. 28⁷⁻²⁵ did not mean a village called En-harod, close to the fountain spoken of in Judg. 7¹. The true order of events in these narratives probably is: (1) the Philistines muster their troops at Aphek (in Sharon), and Achish promises to take David with him, while Saul musters at 'En Hāröd (28⁷ ff. 29¹); (2) Israel encamps in the plain of Jezreel, and the Philistines send David away, etc. (29²⁻¹¹); (3) the Philistines penetrate as far as Shunem (28⁴); (4) Saul seeks an oracle and finds it by night at Endör (28³⁻²⁵; so Budde). Note that in 1 S. 28⁵ it is said that Saul's heart 'trembled exceedingly' (וַיִּרְדֵּר; cp Hāröd); how naturally after this, if our conjecture is right, comes the speech of the servants of Saul in v. 7 respecting the wise woman at the Well of Trembling (En-Harod)! Almost certainly 'En-dor' in 1 S. 28⁷ should be emended as proposed.

(c) In Ps. 83¹⁰ [11], 'they perished at Endor' does not accord with the mention of Sisera and Jabin. 'At Endor' (אֶת־דֹּר) is obviously corrupt. The context requires 'without survivors,' and we should probably read דֹּרָר־וְאֵין־נִשְׁאָרִים: ש and נ are liable to be confounded (Che. Ps.⁽²⁾). Grätz's conjecture 'at the fountain of Harod' (דֹּרָר־וְאֵין־נִשְׁאָרִים), adopted by Winckler and Wellhausen, only removes a part of the difficulty. It is suggestive, however. Formerly Grätz read 'En-dor' for 'En-harod' in Judg. 7¹, and \mathfrak{S}^B 's 'Endor' in 1 S. 29¹ may come from 'En-harod' (see HAROD, WELL OF, 2).

The village of Endür (not 'Endür') is 7 or 8 m. from the slopes of Gilboa, partly over difficult ground' (Grove-Wilson). Nor is it quite beyond question that there was a place called Endor in pre-exilic times. There may perfectly well have been two spots called En-harod. The fourth-century village of Endor may have owed its name to a corruption of the text of 1 Samuel.

The meaning of דֹּרָר is by no means perspicuous, and the confusion of דֹּרָר and דֹּרָר was easy. At any rate we need not speculate as to whether one of the caves in the calcareous cliff on the slope of which Endür stands, was the scene of the visit of the unhappy Saul to the wise woman (so J. L. Porter, in Kitto's Bib. Cyc. s.v. 'Endor'). What 'Harod' really means is uncertain (cp HARODITE). Perhaps we should read Adör (דֹּרָר), from which דֹּרָר [cp 'Dor'] would come even more easily than from דֹּרָר. T. K. C.

EN-EGLAIM (עֵינֵי עֵגְלַיִם), 'fountain of Eglaim' = Eglam, —i.e., 'calf-place' on form of name, see NAMES, §§ 101, 104, 107; ΕΝΑΓΓΑΛΕΙΜ [BA], ΔΙΝΑΓΓΑΔΕΙΜ [Q]; ENCALLIM], one of the two points between which fishing in the former 'Salt Sea' was to be carried on when Ezekiel's vision was fulfilled (Ezek. 47¹⁰). Since the vision relates to the land W. of the Jordan, and the other point mentioned is En-gedi, we naturally look for En-eglam near the influx of the Jordan into the Dead Sea. At present, the salt water and the fresh intermingle some way above the mouth of the river, and fish that are carried down are thrown up dead on the beach (cp DEAD SEA, § 4). It will therefore be in the spirit of the vision if, with Tristram (Bible Places, p. 93) we identify En-eglam with 'Ain Hajleh about 1 hr. from the N. shore of the Dead Sea, which is regarded by the Bedouins as the best fountain in the Ghôr. It is hardly too bold to emend the text and read for Eglaim, Hoglah (הֹגְלָה); see BETH-HOGLAH. T. K. C.

EN-GANNIM (עֵינֵי גַנִּים), —i.e., 'fountain of gardens,' § 101.

1. A city in the first group of towns in the lowland of Judah (Josh. 15³⁴ ἀδιαθαίμ [A], if we follow the Hebrew order; but this really represents עֵינֵי גַנִּים of v. 36; ηγοννεμ [L], \mathfrak{S}^B apparently λουθωθ, unless this form represents Tappuah); according to Clermont-Ganneau, the modern Umm Jina, W. of Beth-shemesh. Jerome and Eusebius (OS 121²⁶, Engannim; 259⁶⁶, Ηνγαννιμ) say 'now a village near Bethel.'

2. A Levitical town of Issachar (Josh. 19²¹, ἰεων και τομμαν [B], ηγγαννιμ [A], ιαγαννεμ [L]; 21²⁹, πηγῆν γραμμάτων [BAL],¹ πηγῆν γαννιμ [Aq. Sm. Th.]). The parallel passage in 1 Ch. 6⁷³ [58] has ANEM (אָנֵם, אָנֵם [A], אֵינֵם [L], B om. v.) which seems to be a mere corruption (Be., Ki.). There is mentioned in Egyptian texts a place called King (WMM As. u. Eur. 174), which Budde (differing from Müller) would identify with En-gannim (see HEBER, 1). In Am. Tab. 164^{17 21}, we find a district called Gina. En-gannim is the Γινάη, Γήμα, or Γινάτα of Josephus (BJ iii, 34 and elsewhere), on the frontier of Galilee, and, though no ruins of the ancient place are still left, we can hardly doubt that it is the modern Jenin.² This is a large and picturesque village 17 m. N. from Shechem, at the entrance of a valley which opens into the plain of Esdraelon. The slopes at the foot of which it lies are covered with plantations of olive trees and fig trees, and the houses of the village are surrounded with gardens fenced by hedges of cactus. A few palm trees add to the charm of the place. The secret of this luxuriance is a spring, or rather torrent, which rises in the hills behind the village and sends its waters in many rivulets to fertilise the gardens and meadows, and at last disappears in the undulating plain of Esdraelon. The name of the place was therefore well chosen, and the author of the ancient song (Cant. 4.12-15) might almost have been thinking of En-gannim when he made the newly-married husband liken his fair young wife to a 'garden' and a 'fountain of gardens' (עֵץ וְצִיּוֹן). The historical associations of Jenin are scanty. It is hardly probable that the 'fountain in Jezreel' referred to in 1 S. 29.1 is the great fountain of En-gannim, 'Jezreel' being intended for the whole district (GASm. HG, 402); see HAROD, 2; but most scholars (not, however, Conder) agree in identifying BETH-HAGGAN (g.v.), in the direction of which Ahaziah fled from Jehu, with Jenin, and therefore with En-gannim. Josephus (Ant. xx. 6.1 BJ ii. 12.3) describes a fatal dispute between the Galilæan pilgrims to Jerusalem and the Samaritans which took place at Γωάη, 'a village of the Samaritans', and thereby illustrates the unfriendly reception accorded to Jesus in just such a village (Lk. 9.52 f.). T. K. C.

EN-GEDI (עֵדִי) [so also outside pause, Ezek. 47.10 for עֵדִי 'E].—i.e., 'fountain of the kid', §§ 101, 104; ENΓΑΔΔΙ[ε] [BNAC]), the modern 'Ain Jidi' (overlooking the western shore of the Dead Sea), 680 ft. below sea-level, and 612 ft. above that of the lake. 'The beautiful fountain bursts forth at once a fine stream upon a narrow terrace or shelf of the mountain.' It was, and is, a spot of rich vegetation in a severely desolate wilderness. Its vineyards and henna flowers are referred to in Cant. 1.14, whilst an allusion to its palm-trees is preserved in its alternative name, HAZAZON-TAMAR (g.v.) in Gen. 14.7 2 Ch. 20.2, and also in Ecclus. 24.14 ('I was exalted like a palm tree in Engaddi').¹ Hazazon may be connected with the modern Wādī Ḥaṣāṣeh, up which runs one of the main roads from Engedi to the interior (cp 2 Ch. 20.16, and see ZIZ, ASCENT OF). Engedi was one of the scenes of the wanderings of David (1 S. 23.29 [24.1] γαδδὲ [L]). The cave which plays a part in this narrative is described as being not at Engedi, but somewhere in the wilderness. In the oasis itself the present writer found only insignificant caves; but Tristram mentions in the neighbourhood 'a fairy grotto of vast size.' The 'strongholds' which David and his men inhabited must have lain about the fountain; the narrow shelf could be easily made impregnable, and it is here that most of the ruins are scattered. Solomon appears to have fortified Engedi; for the MT of 1 K. 9.18 reads 'Tamar' [Kt.] (not Tadmor [Kr.]) 'in the wilderness in the land (?)' (cp Josh. 15.61 f. ἀκαθῆς [B], ἠγγαδδὲ [A], ἀγγαδδὲ [L], 'in the wilderness'. En-gedi'). It was worthy of fortification, for it commands one of the roads from the Dead Sea Valley to the interior of Judah, and by it the Edomite invasion of Judah seems to have been made in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch. 20, εγγαδὲ [B], εγγαδδὲ [L]). It is mentioned once, if not thrice, in Ezekiel's vision of the renovated land (Ezek. 47.10, εγγαδ-εῖν [B], εγγαδδ. [A], αυγαδαιμ [Q]; see TAMAR, i.). Josephus praises its fertility, especially its palms and balsam (Ant. ix. 1.2), and says it was the centre of a toparchy under the Romans (BJ iii. 3.5); but Pliny omits it in his list of the toparchies (HN 5.14.70). To Pliny it was known as Engadda, a place supplied with palm-groves and a centre of the Essenes (HN 5.15 [17]). It is mentioned by Ptolemy (v. 168). In the fourth century, according to Eusebius and Jerome, it was still 'a very large village, whence opobalsamum was obtained' OS 119.15 254.67) 'and with vines' (Epit. Paulæ, xii.).

During the Crusades there were vineyards held by a convent under Hebron (Rey, Colonies Franques en Syrie, 384), and to these times probably belong most of the ruins. The site was recovered by Robinson in 1838; it is held and cultivated by the Rushaideh Arabs; but there are now neither palms nor vines. The great staircase—for no other name adequately expresses the steepness of the ascent from the spring to the plateau—is hard for beasts of burden, and the camel-drivers who bring salt from Jebel Usdum prefer to go farther N. before turning up to Jerusalem.

The identifications with the mod. Kefr Adhān, to the W. of Jenin (Conder), or with 'Ain Judeide, on the E. side of Mt. Gilboa (Kn.), assume the accuracy of MT. For 'spring of Haddah'¹ we should perhaps read 'Spring of Harod' (חָרֵד for חַדָּה), the most probable site of which, Ain Jalūd, is nearly 10 m. NNE. from Jenin. See HAROD. S. A. C.

ENOCH (חֵנֹךְ) עֵנוֹךְ, ΕΝΩΧ [ADEL and Ti. WH], HENOCH). The name of the best-known Enoch seems to be distinct from the names of 2 and 3. It has probably a Babylonian origin (see CAINITES, § 6), though to a Hebrew ear it suggested the meanings of 'dedication' and 'instruction'.²

1. A hero or patriarch mentioned in Gen. 4.17 f. [L ενωσ in both vs.] 5.18 19.21-24 (1 Ch. 1.3); also in Ezekiel (emended text), in the Apocrypha, and in the

NT. It is shown elsewhere (see CAINITES, § 6, NOAH) that Enoch played a great part in a legend of which fragments alone remain. Confirmations of this view will be supplied presently.

The Genesis-passages need no further comment; but the restoration of Enoch in passages of Ezekiel is too interesting to be passed over. In

1. Biblical references. MT of Ezek. 14¹⁴ 20, Noah, Daniel, and Job appear as proverbial for their righteousness, and in Ezek. 28³ the prince of Tyre is said, poetically, to be wiser, and to have more insight into secrets, than Daniel. This strikes one as strange. The personage referred to should be a hero of legend, and would most naturally be of the same cycle as Noah. The name Daniel, however, is not at all suggestive of this. The type is not ancient, in spite of the occurrence of Daniel in 1 Ch. 3¹ as the name of a son of David (the reading is corrupt, see DANIEL i. 4). It is extremely probable that the name was introduced into Ezekiel by a mistake similar to that which has been conjectured in Gen. 22² (see ISAAC, § 2; MORIAH). The name is spelt not דָּנִיֵּאל but דָּנְיָאֵל; this must surely be a misreading of דָּנְיָאֵל—i. e., Ḥanāk (Enoch). This acute suggestion is due to Halévy (REJ 14²⁰ f.). It is supported by the discovery of the true text of Ecclus. 44¹⁴ (see below), and supplies fresh material for the criticism of Daniel and Job, and the exegesis of Ezekiel (cp Expositor, July 1897, p. 23).

We pass now to the NT passages. The notice in the genealogy in Lk. 3³⁷, and the description of Enoch as the 'seventh from Adam' in Jude 14, need not detain us. Note, however, that the description in Jude is borrowed from Enoch 60⁸, and is followed by a quotation (v. 14 f.) from Enoch 19 5 4 27 2. Heb. 11 5 mentions Enoch's 'translation' (μετετέθη; translatatus est), and refers to Gen. 5 22 24 in ḤADEL'S rendering εὐηρέστησε τῷ Θεῷ as by implication a testimony to Enoch's faith, 'for without faith it is impossible to please [God]'. The translation of Enoch is also twice mentioned by Sirach (Ecclus. 44 16 ἡβ[ε]λ[η], μετετέθη; 49 14 ἀνελήμφθη [A μετετέθη] ἀπὸ τῆς γῆς; cp ḤADEL, 2 K. 2 10 ἀναλαμβανόμενον = ἡβ[ε]λ, v. 11 ἀνελήμφθη = ἡβ[ε]λ, also Mk. 16 19 etc.). Ecclus. 49 14 merely extols the unique destiny of Enoch; but 44 16, after stating that he was 'taken,' adds the notable phrase ἡβ[ε]λ ἡβ[ε]λ. The Syriac version omits the whole verse, the Greek instead of 'an example of knowledge' gives ὑπόδειγμα μετανοίας 'an example of repentance,' as if ἡβ[ε]λ ἡβ[ε]λ (cp Heb. 4 11, ὑπόδειγμα ἀπειθείας). Nöldeke suggests reading ἐνοχίαστικός for μετανοίας (see also ECCLESIASTICUS, § 7 (e), n.); but the Greek translator may have drawn the same uncritical inference from Gen. 5 22 ('Enoch walked with God after he begat Methuselah') which was drawn by some of the later Rabbis¹ (see the sayings quoted in Ber. Rabba, 25; Wünsche, 112 f.), and seems to have arisen out of hostility to the Book of Enoch. ἡβ[ε]λ, however, seems to mean 'wisdom' (Prov. 17 27); the writer must surely have heard the tradition of Enoch's wisdom alluded to (as has been shown) in Ezek. 28³, and largely developed by subsequent writers.

We have thus found that the later belief in Enoch's wisdom is traceable in Ecclesiasticus and even in Ezekiel. The 'Secrets of Enoch' (a phrase used as the

2. Later belief. Phœnicia. That the later belief is not a mere accretion on the older Enoch-story will be plain to those who recognise the solar origin of the original hero; a child of the 'all-seeing' sun must be wise as well as pious. At the same time speculative inferences must be largely responsible for the details of the later beliefs.

To this subject we now address ourselves. It was the belief of the later Jews, adopted by Christians and Mohammedans (Eus. Prap. Ev. 9 17; d'Herbelot, Or. Bibl. 1 624 f.), that Enoch invented writing, arithmetic, and astronomy. The Book of Jubilees says, 'He was the first among men who learned writing and knowledge and wisdom, and who wrote down the signs of heaven according to the order of the months in a book. And he was with the angels of God these six jubilees of years, and they showed him everything on earth and in the heavens. And he was taken from among the children of men, and we conducted him into the Garden of Eden in majesty and honour' (Chap. 4, Charles's transl.). Very similar statements are made in Enoch (note the phrase 'scribe of righteousness,' 124); probably the writers of both books drew from, and amplified, a still living tradition (see CAINITES, §§ 2, 6). It will be noticed that Enoch's translation, according to Jubilees (cp Enoch 70 1 608; cp Charles's note), is to Paradise. This reminds us of the story of Pār(?)-nāpīštim (DELUGE, § 2). The Palestinian Targum, however, says that Enoch 'ascended to the firmament.' This agrees with the story of the hero Etana, who was carried to the heaven of Anu by an eagle (ETHAN, 1). The Targum also states that Enoch's name was called 'Metatron, the great writer.' Now the Metatron,¹ as the divine secretary, sits in God's inner chamber, where, according to Enoch 14 14 f., not even Enoch can presume to enter. Enoch, then, grew in honour as time went on. Mohammed, too, declares of Idris (the 'instructed') that he was 'a confessor, a prophet,' and that God 'raised him to a lofty place' (Koran, Sur. 19 57).

The early Church was not behindhand in its respect for the patriarch. It regarded him, for instance, as one of the two witnesses² of whom such great things are said in Rev. 11, who finally 'went up to heaven in the cloud.' That some share in the accomplishment of God's purposes should be allotted to those who had left the earth long ago without tasting death, seemed natural. The other 'witness' was Elijah, and in Enoch 70 1 the 'translation of Enoch is described in terms suggested by 2 K. 2 11. In fact, the same idea underlies the traditions of the disappearance of both personages (cp Che. OPr. 383). Why Noah, who was equal in piety to Enoch, was not also said to have been translated, is a problem on which criticism has been able to throw some light (see CAINITES, § 6; NOAH). On the composite Book of Enoch, see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 18 f.

2. The third son of Midian, Gen. 25 4 (EV 'Hanoch'), 1 Ch. 133 (AV 'Hanoah,' RV 'Hanoah').

ENOS, or rather (so RV) Enosh (עֲנוֹשׁ, 'man'; ΕΝΩC [BADEL]). Son of Seth, and grandson of Adam (Gen. 4 26 5 7 9-11 1 Ch. 1 1 Lk. 3 38†). 'It was he who began to call on the name of Yahwè' (Ḥ, Vg., B. Jub.; so We., reading עֲנוֹשׁ הוֹ—i. e., Enos introduced forms of worship.

He is thus represented as the first and greatest of founders, worthy to be the father of a city-builder (see CAINITES, § 3). This tradition cannot, however, be very ancient. Early myths always ascribe forms of worship to the teaching of a god; cp the statement (see CAINITES, § 3) that Marduk erected the temples, and the epithet given to the Moon-god, mukin nindabē, 'appointer of sacrifices' (4 R. 9 33; see Del. Ass. HWB, s. v. 'nindabū'). Enos, therefore (a name that is merely a synonym of Adam, 'man'), which Hommel traces to the Amelon (= Bab. amil, 'man') of Bērössus, must have been substituted for some other name. On the original position of Gen. 4 25 f. see CAINITES, § 12.

The MT reading, הָרִמּוֹן, is 'possibly' (Di.), if not certainly, to be rendered 'Then was profaned', the object being to avoid contradiction of the statement in Ex. 6 3 (P). Such a phrase, however, as הָרִמּוֹן with וַיִּשְׁפָּךְ is unparalleled in the Genesis narratives. הָרִמּוֹן, 'began', occurs again in 9 20 10 8, where, if it is true, according to R. Simon (Ber. rabba 28), it has the sense of profanation. The alteration of הָרִמּוֹן into הָרִמּוֹן involved a disparagement of Enos similar to that inflicted upon ENOCH (§ 1, end) and NOAH (i., end) in certain circles. According to an Aggada, in the time of this patriarch, and in that of Cain, the sea flooded a great tract of land (Ber. rabba, as above). The same extraordinary view of הָרִמּוֹן is implied in Tg. Onk. and Jon. and is adopted by Rashi.

EN-RIMMON (רִמְמוֹן) § 95, 'fountain of Rimmon' —i.e., the god Ramman [see RIMMON i.]; רִמְמוֹן [BAL], mentioned in a list of Judahite villages (EZRA ii. § 5 [θ]. § 15 [1] a), Neh. 11 29 (רִמְמוֹן [N^{ca} (mg.)], BA omit), but also referred to in Josh. 15 32 (Ain and Rimmon; ερωμαωθ [B]. ΔΙΝ ΚΑΙ ΡΕΜΜΩΝ [L]), 19 7 (ερεμμαωθ [B]. ΔΙΝ ΚΑΙ ΡΕΜΜΩΘ [A]) and 1 Ch. 4 32 (Ain, Rimmon, enr. [L]), Zech. 14 10 ('from Geba to Rimmon, south of Jerusalem'). En-rimmon is the Ἐρεμωθων or Eremmon of Eusebius and Jerome (OS 256 92; 120 6), described by them as a 'very large village' 16 m. S. from Eleutheropolis. It is usually identified with modern Umm er-rumāmin, 9 m. N. of Beersheba. Zech. 14 10, however, suggests that it lay farther to the S. Elsewhere (HAZAR-ADAR) it is suggested that Azmon, a place on the extreme S. of Judah (Nu. 34 4 f. Josh. 15 4) is a corruption of En-rimmon, and that this is represented by the once highly cultivated el-'Aujeh in the Wādy Hanein, called by Arab tradition a 'valley of gardens' (E. H. Palmer).

EN-ROGEL (רֹגֵל) § 101; ΠΗΓΗ ΡΩΓΗΛ [BAL], H P. [B in 1 K. 19], Η ΠΗΓΗ ΤΟΥ Ρ. [L in 2 S. 1 K.], a famous land-mark near Jerusalem. It was the hiding-place of David's spies, Jonathan and Ahimaaz (2 S. 17 17), and lay close to the stone ZOHELETH where Adonijah held a sacrificial feast when he attempted to assert his claims to the throne (1 K. 19). In later times it was one of the boundary marks between Judah and Benjamin (Josh. 15 7 18 16). The obviously sacred character of the spring (cp also GIHON [1], 1 K. 138) suggests that it is the same as the Dragon Well of Neh. 2 13 (cp DRAGON, § 4 g; but see ZOHELETH). There can be little doubt of its antiquity, and it may well have been a sacred place in pre-Israelite times. The meaning of the name and its identification are uncertain.

The interpretation 'Fuller's Well' does not bear the mark of antiquity, and is rightly omitted in Gen. (3); רֹגֵל, 'fuller,' is nowhere else found in biblical Hebrew (see FULLER, ROGELIM). It is probable that, like Zohēleth, the original name had some sacred or mythic significance.

Two identifications of the place have met with considerable favour: (1) the Virgin's fountain ('Ain Sitti Maryam), now 'Ain Umm ed-Deraj, 'the only real spring close to Jerusalem,' exactly opposite to which lies ez-Zehwēleh, perhaps Zohēleth (Clemont-Ganneau, PEFQ 1869-70, p. 253); and (2) Bir-Eyyūb, otherwise known as the Well of Nehemiah, at the junction of the W. er-Rabābi and Kedron (Robinson, BR (2) 1 332). Against (2) (which has found recent support in H. P. Smith, Sam., and Benz., Kings) it is urged that Bir-Eyyūb is a well, not a spring,¹ that it lies too far from ez-Zehwēleh, that it is in full view of the city, and does not suit the context of 2 S. 17 17, and that its antiquity is uncertain. The chief points in favour of (1) (which Baed.⁹) identifies with GIHON [1]) are: its antiquity (cp CONDUIITS, § 4) and the evidence of Jos. (Ant. vii. 14 4), who places the well in the royal gardens.² Other arguments based upon the fact that in later times the well was used by fullers are necessarily precarious. S. A. C.

² The identification of En-rogel with ερωγη (Ant. ix. 10 4; see Grove, Smith's DB (2)) seems difficult; it is reading is substantially the same in all MSS (see Niese), and appears to be based upon ἀνορρήγγυμι which follows.

ENROLMENT (ἀπογραφῆ, Lk. 22 Acts 5 37, AV 'taxing'; 'to be enrolled' (ἀπογραφῆς ἕνεκα; Lk. 21 35, AV 'taxed'; Heb. 12 23, AV 'written'; cp 3 Macc. 4 15). See QUIRINUS, TAXATION.

RV has 'enrolled' also in 1 Tim. 5 9 (καταλόγου, AV 'taken into the number') and in 2 Tim. 2 4, στρατολόγη ('enrolled him as a soldier, AV 'chosen him to be a soldier').

EN-SHEMESH (שֶׁמֶשׁ) § 95, 'fountain of the sun,'¹ §§ 9, 15; Josh. 15 7 [ΠΗΓΗ ΗΛΙΟΥ [BAL]; 18 17 ΠΗΓΗΝ ΒΑΙΘΟΔΑΜΥΣ [B], Π. ΟΔΜΕ [A], [ΠΗΓΗΝ ΟΔΜΕΣ [L]], on the border of Benjamin, between EN-ROGEL and ADUMMIM. The favourite identification with the modern 'Ain el-Hōd or 'Apostles' shrine'² near Bethany is questioned by Baed.⁹ 149, who seems to prefer the tradition which identifies the Well of the Sun and the Dragon's Well with 'Ain Sitti Maryam (see EN-ROGEL). Van Kasteren, however (ZDPV 13 116; see also Buhl, Pal. 98), would find En-shemesh in 'Ain er-Rawābī in an offshoot of the Wādy of the same name, situated on the ancient road to Jericho.

ENSIGNS AND STANDARDS. Two questions have to be considered here: (1) how are the Hebrew terms to be rendered, and (2) what inferences are to be drawn from the historical passages containing these terms?

(a) דגל, nēs (σημεῖον, σύσσημον; also σημαία and σημειωσις [BAL etc.]).

In Is. 52 6 11 10 (Θ ἀρχεῖν) 12 18 3 30 17 31 9 (text corrupt; see SBO 7) דגל is rendered by EV 'ensign,' but in Jer. 4 6 (Θ φύγετε) 21 (Θ φύγετε) 50 2 51 12 27 'standard.' AV also gives the latter in Is. 49 22 62 10, and RV in Nu. 21 8 f. 'Banner' is adopted by AV in Is. 18 2 (RV 'ensign') and by EV in Ps. 60 4 [6] (see below), also by EVmg. in Ex. 17 15 (Θ καταφυγή). In Nu. 21 8 f. AV gives 'pole,' RV 'standard.'

'Banner,' being still in common use, seems the best rendering for דגל except in Nu. 21 8 f., where 'pole' is more natural. 'Banner' is required also in Ex. 17 15 f., where Moses is said to have named an altar Yahwē-Nissi, 'Yahwè is my banner' (see JEHOUAH-NISSI), and to have broken into this piece of song:—

Yea, (lifting up) the hand towards Yahwè's banner,
(I swear that) Yahwè will give battle to Amalek everlastingly.

Here, too, we must not pass over four disputed passages in which AV (and in some cases RV) assumes the existence of a denom. verb from דגל, viz., (a) Ps. 60 4 [6] ('a banner . . . that it may be displayed'); (β) Is. 10 18 (דגל, EV 'standard-bearer,' RVmg. 'sick man'; (γ) Is. 59 19 ('lift up a standard,' so RVmg.; but RV '[which] . . . driveth,' AVmg. 'put to flight'); (δ) Zech. 9 16 ('lifted up as an ensign,' but RV 'lifted up on high,' RVmg. 'glittering'). All these four passages must be regarded as corrupt. (a) Ps. 60 4 [6] should probably be read thus, 'Thou hast given a cup [of judgment] to thy worshippers that they may be frenzied because of the bow' (ללהחול); cp Jer. 25 16. In compensation Ps. 116 13 becomes, 'I will raise the banner (דגל for סוּב) of victory.' (β) Is. 10 18 דגל (Θ φύγετων) should apparently be קוצים, 'a thorn-bush.' (γ) Is. 59 19, בן דגל should probably be בן נשמה (Klo., Che.), 'when Yahwè's breath blows upon it.' (δ) The text of Zech. 9 15 f. needs some rearrangement (see Che. JQR 10 582). 'Stones of a diadem lifting themselves up over his land' is nonsense. In מְתַנְתְּנִים probably ס should be ש. Glittering stones, used as amulets (see PRECIOUS STONES), are meant.

(θ) דגל, dēgel, is rendered by EV 'banner' in Cant. 24, (Θ ταξάρε), by 'standard' in Nu. 1 52 22, etc. (all P; τάγμα [BAFL]). EV also finds a denom. verb from דגל in Ps. 20 5 [6] Cant. 5 10 6 4 10. Gray thinks (JQR 11 92 ff.)

² The name dates from the fifteenth century. It is the last well on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho before the dry desert is reached, and it is therefore assumed that the apostles must have drunk from it on their journey.

that the context of all the passages in Nu. is fully satisfied by the meaning 'company,' whilst in some of them the sense 'standard' is plainly unsuitable. The sense of 'company,' however, is even more difficult to justify than that of 'banner.'¹ לַבַּיִת in Nu. 1 2 10 is probably a corruption of נַדְוֵי, 'troop' or 'band'; the sense of the word in 1 Ch. 7 4 2 Ch. 26 11 is strikingly parallel. No other course is open, for all the other passages adduced for the sense of 'banner' are, with the possible exception of those in Numbers, corrupt. This applies not only to Cant. 2 4, but also to the passages in which a denom. verb is assumed (⊕ τερταγμέναι, Cant. 6 4 10). For an examination of these passages see Che. JQR 11 232-236.

In Cant. 2 4 read, 'Bring me (so ⊕) into the garden-house (בְּגִדְיִי בָּ); I am sick from love. Stay me, etc.' As to Ps. 20 5 [6], it is safe to say that 'to set up banners in the name of Yahwè' is an unnatural phrase (read בְּנִי, 'we exult'). The bridegroom in Canticles (6 10 etc.) is not 'marked out by a banner above ten thousand' (RVmg.); he may perhaps be called 'one looked up to, admired'; but more probably he was described in the original text as בְּלִילִי 'perfect (in beauty).' The bride on her side is not called 'terrible as bannered [hosts],' but 'awe-inspiring as towers'; so at least a scribe, but not the poet himself, wrote. The corruption was a very early one. The scribe, seeking to make sense of half-effaced letters which he misread בְּמִצְדָּה, 'terrible,' bethought him of the figure in 8 10, and inserted בְּמִצְדָּה as towers.

(c) אֵלֶּה, 'idol,' is rendered 'ensign' by EV in Nu. 2 2 (σημεία or σημάλα [BAF], σημασία [L]), Ps. 74 4 (σημείον [B^ab mg. inf. NRT]). In the latter passage the 'ensigns' have been supposed to be military standards with heathen emblems upon them,² which reminds us of a similar theory respecting the 'abomination of desolation' in Mt. 24 15. The context of the passage in Ps., however, is very corrupt.³

Of all the above passages there are only two which are at once old and free from corruption—viz., Ex. 17 15 f. Nu. 21 8 f.

2. Historical interpretation. The latter passage was probably such as was commonly used for signals to collect the Israelites when scattered; the banner in the former was a pole with some kind of (coloured?) cloth⁴ upon it to attract attention.

Other terms which might be used for 'banner' were לָבֵן, lāben (Is. 30 17), and מַסְעֵלָה, mas'ēth (Jer. 6 1, RV 'signal'). That לָבֵן also was so used in early times is more than can be stated safely, nor can we tell what distinction there may have been between ēth and nēs.⁵ Tg. Jerus. (pseudo-Jon.) tells us that the standards were of silk of three colours, and had pictured upon them a lion, a stag, a young man, or a cerastes respectively. History to the writer of this Targum was not essentially different from poetry. T. K. C.

Banners are frequently found on the Egyptian and the Assyrian monuments. Apart from the royal banner, each battalion or even each company in

3. Parallels. Egypt had its own particular emblem, which took the form of a monarch's name, a sacred boat, an animal, or some symbol the meaning of which is more or less doubtful.⁶ The standard was borne aloft upon a spear or staff, and carried by an officer who wore as an emblem two lions (to symbolise courage)

³ For an adopted restoration, see Che. Ps. (2).

⁴ In Is. 33 23 EV rightly renders בָּ as 'sail'; a coloured, decorated sail is meant (Ezek. 27 7).

⁵ Mr. S. A. Cook suggests that the מִצְדָּה in Nu. 2 2 may refer to clan-marks (cp CUTTINGS, § 6).

and two other devices apparently representing flies. The standard of the Heta-fortress of Dapuru which figures in a representation of a siege consists of a shield upon a pole pierced with arrows (see EGYPT, fig. 4, col. 1223). Reference is made elsewhere (ISRAEL, § 90) to the courtesy with which the Roman procurators, in deference to Jewish prejudice, removed from the ensigns (σημαίαι) the 'effigies' (προτομαί) of the emperor. It was not the ensigns themselves but the presence of the additional προτομαί that was the cause of the Jewish sedition against Pilate (cp Jos. Ant. xviii. 3 1, Bf ii. 9 2 f.). EN-TAPPUAH (ΠῆβῆΨ; ΠΗΓΗΝ ΘΑΦΘΩΘ [B*], etc.), Josh. 17 7. See TAPPUAH, 2.

EPZENETUS (ΕΠΑΙΝΕΤΟΣ [Ti. WH]), 'my beloved, the first-fruits of Asia' unto Christ, as he is described in the salutation sent to him in Rom. 16 5, appears to have been Paul's first convert in Ephesus, as Stephanas and his household were in Corinth (1 Cor. 16 15). From his not being designated 'kinsman' it has been inferred that he was a Gentile. The name is of not uncommon occurrence in the East; cp CIG, 2953 (Ephesus), 3903 (Phrygia). For the bearing which this name has upon the criticism of the epistle, see ROMANS, §§ 4, 10. Cp COLOSSIANS, § 4.

In the lists of 'the seventy disciples' by the Pseudo-Dorotheus and Pseudo-Hippolytus (see DISCIPLE, § 3), Epāzetus figures as Bishop of Carthage or Carthagina (Καρθαγίνης, Cartaginīs). In the Greek Church he is commemorated with Crescens, Silas, and Andronicus on 30th July.

EPAPHRAS (ΕΠΑΦΡΑΣ [Ti. WH]), an abbreviated form of EPAPHRODITUS [q.v.], a faithful 'minister' (διάκονος), and 'bond-servant' (δοῦλος) of Christ (Col. 1 7 4 12), founder of the church at COLOSSE [q.v., § 2], and teacher in the neighbouring towns of Laodicea and Hierapolis (see § 4 13). Epaphras visited Paul in his captivity, and it is probable that the outbreak of false teaching in the Colossian church may have led him to seek Paul's aid with the result that the epistle to the COLOSSIANS (see § 5, f.) was written. Did Epaphras share Paul's imprisonment during the writing of the epistle, or does 'fellow-prisoner' (ὁ συναχμάλωτος; Phil. 23) refer to merely a spiritual captivity? Cp the term 'fellow-soldier' (art. EPAPHRODITUS) below, and see Milligan in Hastings' DB.

EPAPHRODITUS (ΕΠΑΦΡΟΔΙΤΟΣ [Ti. WH]), 'charming' (ἀπόστολος, see APOSTLE, §§ 1 1., 3) of the Philippians, visited Paul during his imprisonment at Rome and remained with him—to the detriment of his health (Phil. 2 25 ff. 4 18). Paul's estimate of him is summed up in the eulogy 'my brother and fellow-worker and fellow-soldier' (ἀδελφόν καὶ συνεργόν καὶ συνστρατιώτην μου; 2 25). On his return Epaphroditus no doubt took with him the epistle to the PHILIPPIANS, the grave warnings of which (3 2) may have been due to the report he had brought (cp EPAPHRAS). It is by no means necessary to identify Epaphras and Epaphroditus: indeed, though they have several features in common (note, e.g., 'fellow-soldier' and 'fellow-prisoner') these are far outweighed by the points of difference. Epaphroditus is a common name in the Roman period.³

Hex. 𐤒𐤍𐤏), according to MT, a man of Netophah, whose sons were among the adherents of Gedaliah (Jer. 40 8†). In the parallel text, 2 K. 25 23, וּבְנֵי עִפְיָה is not found. Apparently 'sons of . . . (עִפְיָה)' is a corruption of a duplication of the following word 'Netophathite,' הַנְּטוֹפָתִי (Cbe.); note the warning Pāsēk which precedes. The Netophathite meant is SERAIAH (q.v., 3).

EPHER (עִפְרָה, 'gazelle,' § 68, cp EPHRON; אֶפְרַיִם [BADEL].

1. A Midianite clan, Gen. 25 4 (אֶפְרַיִם [L]); 1 Ch. 1 33 (אֶפְרַיִם [BA], γο. [L]). Knobel and Delitzsch compare the Banu Gifār of the stem of Kināna in Hījāz; but if HANOCH (q.v., 1) has been rightly identified, Epher may very possibly be the modern 'Ofr, which is near Hanākiya, between the Tihāma mountain range and Abān (so Wetzstein; see Di.). Glaser (Skizze, 2 449), however, prefers to connect the name with the Apparu of the inscriptions of Ašur-bāni-pal (KB 2 223). From its mention in connection with Judah, E. Manasseh, and Reuben (see below), it is possible that various layers of the tribe of Epher were incorporated with the Israelites at a later time (cp Nöld. in Schenkel, BL 4 218. See MIDIAN).

2. h. Eṭṭah, of JUDAH, 1 Ch. 4 17 (γαφερ [A], εφερ [L]); cp EPHRON 1., 3.

EPHES-DAMMIM (עִפְרַיִם דַּמִּיִּם; ΕΦΕΡΜΕΜ [B], ΑΦΕΣΔΟΜΜΕΙΝ [A], ΑΦΕΣ[ΔΑ]ΜΕΙΝ [L]; عِفْرَايِمْ دَمِيمِ [Pesb.]; ΕΝ ΠΕΡΑΤΙ ΔΟΜΕΙΜ [Aq.], in fnidus dommim [Vg.]; cp OS 35 11, 96 23, 226 18), or, if ephes be taken to mean 'end [of]', Dammim is, according to MT, the name of a spot where the Philistines encamped, between SOCOB 1, and AZEKAH (1 S. 17 1). By Van de Velde (who is followed in Riehm's HWB) it is identified with Damin, on the N. side of the Wādy es-Sant, E. of the Roman road to Bēt Nettif; but a different name for this ruin was obtained in the Ordnance Survey, and the name Damin, if it occurs at all, seems to belong to a site nearer the high hills. Conder (PEFQ, 1875, p. 193), on the other hand, finds an echo of the name in Bēt Fased ('a place of bleeding'), which is close to Socob (Shuweikeh) on the SE. This will not do for the site of the encampment—for the reason given in Che. Aids, 85, 11. 1—but Conder's view is not that Bēt Fased represents the site (Buhl, Geogr. 90, n. 92), but that it is an echo of a name of the great valley of Elah (see ELAH, VALLEY OF) which arose out of the sanguinary conflicts that frequently occurred there. This is too fanciful a conjecture. We must, it would seem, either regard 'in Ephes-dammim' in 1 S. 17 1 as (on the analogy of PASDAMMIM) a corruption of עִפְרַיִם בְּקַרְקַר 'in the valley of Rephaim' (or Ephraim; see REPHAIM), or else take -dammim to be a corruption of some proper name, ephes being in this case also a corruption of עִפְרָה, 'valley.' The latter view is less probable, but hardly impossible.

The Philistines appear to have encamped on the southern, and the Israelites on the northern side of the valley of Elah (see Che. Aids, 85), and, considering how often the same valley has more than one name, we may conjecture that the site of the Philistine encampment was described as 'in the valley of X' = 'in the valley of Elah' (or, 'terebinth-valley'). In 1 S. 17 2 some point in the valley of Elah is mentioned as the site of the encampment of the Israelites; but 'in the valley of Elah' would not improbably be inserted by the redactor from v. 19, which verse seems to have come from another version of the tradition (see Klo.).

The present writer, who prefers the former of the alternatives suggested above, supposes (1) that 'in the valley of Rephaim' (or Ephraim) is a discrepant statement of the scene of the fight with Goliath, and (2) that it is the correct statement. Others may have an insuperable objection to this, and for their benefit another suggestion is made. It is not inconceivable that 'Valley of the Terebinth' (תְּרֵבִינִית) was the name of that part of the valley in which David won his victory, whilst a larger section of the valley was called 'Valley of the red-brown [lands]'; cp 'the ascent of the red-brown [hills],' Josh. 15 7; red-brown in each case is אֶרֶץ רְדִימִים. 'Large patches of it (the ploughed land in the valley of Elah) were of a deep red colour, exceptional, and therefore remarkable' (Miller, The Least of all Lands, 125). From אֶרֶץ רְדִימִים is an easy step. H. P. Smith is hardly decisive enough in his rejection of Lagarde's אֶרֶץ רְדִימִים. The torrent was of course dried up, and no longer a landmark. See ELAH, VALLEY OF. T. K. C.

EPHESIANS. See COLOSSIANS AND EPHESIANS.

EPHESUS (εφεσος [Ti. WH]; gent. Ἐφεσίου, EPHESIAN) lay on the left bank of the Cayster (mod.

Kuchuk Mendere, Little Mæander), about 6 m. from the sea, nearly opposite the island

1. Early history. of Samos. Long before the Ionian immigration the port at the mouth of the river had attracted settlers, who are called Carians (Paus. vii. 2 6), but were probably the Hittites whose centre of power lay at Pteria in Cappadocia; see HITTITES, § 11 f. To the E. of Mt. Koresos, in the plain between the isolated height of Prion (or Pion) and the eminence at the foot of which the modern village stands, there arose a shrine of the many-breasted Nature-goddess identified by the Greeks with their own Artemis (see DIANA). The population lived, in the primitive Anatolian fashion, in village groups (κώμαι) round the shrine, on land belonging to it wholly or in part, completely dominated by the priests. With the coming of the Ionians, who, after long conflict, established themselves on the spur of Mt. Koresos now shown as the place of Paul's prison (ancient Athenæum), began an obstinate struggle between the Oriental hierarchy and Hellenic political ideas, which were based upon the conception of the city (πόλις). The early struggles of the immigrants with the armed priestesses perhaps gave rise to the Greek Amazon-legends. Even after actual hostilities had ceased, and the two communities had agreed to live side by side, this dualism continued to be the key to Ephesian history. The power of the priestly community remained co-ordinate with, or only partially

2. Govern-ment. subordinate to, that of the civic authorities; the city and the temple continued to be formally distinct centres of life and government (cp Curtius, Beitr. z. Gesch. u. Top. Kleinasiens, 14). The situation of the shrine, near one of the oldest ports of Asia Minor, at the very gateway of the East (Strabo, 663) brought the worship into contact with allied Semitic cults. These and similar influences gave the Ephesian worship that œcumenic character which was its greatest boast (Acts 19 27; Paus. iv. 31 8; Hicks, Inscr. Brit. Mus. 482, see Ramsay, Class. Rev. 1893, p. 78 f.). Even apart from the existence of the hieron, the greatness of Ephesus was assured; for, admirably placed as were all the Ionic cities (Herod. 1 142), none were so fortunate as Ephesus, lying as she did midway between the Hermos on the N. (at the mouth of which was Smyrna) and the Mæander on the S. (port, Miletus). On the downfall of Smyrna, before the Lydians, about 585 B. C., and the ruin of Phokaia and Miletus by the Persians in 494 B. C., she inherited the trade of the Hermos and Mæander valleys. The port had always suffered from the alluvium of the Cayster, and its ultimate destruction from that cause had been rendered inevitable by an unfortunate engineering scheme of Attalus II. Philadelphus, about a century and a half before Strabo wrote; yet in Strabo's time and in that of Paul the city was the greatest emporium of Asia (Str. 641, ἐμπόριον ὄσα μέγιστον τῶν κατὰ τὴν Ἀσίαν τὴν ἐντὸς τοῦ Ταύρου; reflected in Rev. 1811-14). Shortly after Paul's visit the proconsul Barea Soranus tried to dredge the port (61 A.D.; Tac. Ann. 1623). Its commercial relations are illustrated by the fact that even the minium (μίνιτος) of Cappadocia was shipped from Ephesus, not from Sinope (Str. 540), and by the travels of Paul himself (Acts 1819-21 191; cp 1824). Ephesus was the centre of Roman administration in Asia. The narrative in Acts reveals an intimate acquaintance with the special features of its position. As the Province of Asia was senatorial (Str. 840), the governor is rightly called proconsul.¹ Being a free city, Ephesus had assemblies and magistrates, senate (βουλὴ), and popular assembly (ἐκκλησία) of its own; but orderliness in the exercise of civic functions was jealously demanded by the imperial system (Acts 1940; cp Bull. Corr. Hell., 1883, p. 506). The theatre, which was probably the usual place of meeting for the assembly,² is still visible. Owing to the decay of popular government under the empire, the 'public clerk' (γραμματεὺς τοῦ δήμου) became the most important of the three 'recorders', and the picture in Acts of the 'town-clerk's' consciousness of responsibility, and his influence with the mob is true to the inscriptions (e.g., CIG 2994, 2966, etc.). From its devotion to Artemis the city appropriated the title 'Neokoros' (Acts 1935: νεωκόρος, lit. 'temple-sweeper'), and, as the town-clerk said, its right to the title was notorious.

The word Neokoros was 'an old religious term adopted and developed in the imperial cultus, —i.e., under the empire the title Neokoros, or Neokoros of the Emperors, was conferred by the Senate's decree at Rome, and was coincident with the erection of a temple and the establishment of games in honour of an Emperor. When a second temple and periodical games were, by leave of the Senate, established, in honour of a later Emperor, the city became δις νεωκόρος ('twice Neokoros'), and even τρις Ν. ('thrice Neokoros') in inscriptions and on coins. Hence under the empire not only Ephesus but also Laodicea and other Asiatic cities boasted the title. See Rams. Hist. Phryg. 158; Büchner, de Neocoria.

Naturally Ephesus was the head of a conventus, —i.e., it was an assize town (Plin. 527, 'Ephesus vero, alterum lumen Asiae, remotiores conveniunt'); hence in Acts 1938 'the courts are open' (cp Jos. Ant. xiv. 1021, Strabo, 629). From its position as the metropolis of Roman Asia Ephesus was naturally a meeting-point of the great roads.

On the one side a road crossing Mt. Tmolos ran north-eastwards to Sardis, and so into Galatia (cp GALATIA). More important was that which ran southwards into the Mæander valley. Ephesus was, therefore, the western terminus of the 'back-bone of the Roman road system'—the great trade route to the Euphrates by way of Laodicea and Colossæ (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM 49), and the 'sea-end of the road along which most of the criminals sent to Rome from the province of Asia would be led' (Rams. Ch. in R. Emp. 378); hence Ignatius, writing to the church there, says, 'ye are a high road of them that are on their way to die unto God' (Eph. 12, πάροδος ἔστε τῶν εἰς Θεὸν ἀναχωρούντων; cp Rev. 176).

It was, in part, by the route just described, that Paul on his Third journey reached Ephesus from the interior, avoiding, however, the towns of the Lycus valley by taking the more northerly horse-path over the Duz-bel pass, by way of Seiblia (Acts 191, διελθόντα τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη. See Rams. Ch. in R. Emp. 94). True to his principle, Paul went to the centre of Roman life; and along the great lines of communication, without his personal intervention, his message spread eastwards into the Lycus valley (see COLOSSE, HIERAPOLIS, LAODICEA). All the 'seven churches'¹ of Rev. 1-3 were probably founded at this period, for all were great trade centres and in communication with Ephesus. The labours of subordinates were largely responsible for their foundation, perhaps in all cases, though it is only in one group that evidence is forthcoming (Col. 17 412-17). The position of Ephesus as the metropolis of Asia is clearly reflected in her primacy in the list (Rev. 111 21). In this way, 'all they which dwell in Asia heard the word . . . both Jews and Greeks' (Acts 1910).

Jews we should expect to find in great numbers at Ephesus. As early as 44 B. C., Dolabella in his consulship had granted them toleration for their rites and Sabbath observance, and safe conduct in their pilgrimage to Jerusalem (Jos. Ant. xiv. 1012); they must then have been a rich community to have been able to buy these favours. Their privileges were confirmed by the city (ibid., 1025), and subsequently by Augustus (id., xvi. 627). To them, as usual (cp ACTS, § 4), was Paul's first message on both visits (Acts 1819 198); but the good-will with which he had been welcomed on his first appearance (Acts 1820) cooled, and he was compelled at last to take Christianity. his teaching from the synagogue to the philosophical 'school of one Tyrannus' (Acts 199, διαλεγόμενος ἐν τῇ σχολῇ Τιράννου—'from the fifth to the tenth hour' added by D—i.e., after the usual teaching hours; cp Bull. Corr. Hell., 1887, p. 400; Rams. Expos. March, 1893, p. 223).

Soon Paul came into collision with the beliefs and practices peculiar to the place in a twofold manner.

Ephesus was a centre of the magical arts of the East. It is significant that the earliest Ephesian document extant deals with the rules of augury (6th cent. B. C.; Inscr. Brit. Mus. 678). The so-called 'Ephesian letters' ('Ἐφέσια γράμματα) were mystic symbols engraved upon the statue of the goddess (Eustath. Od. 14); they were inscribed upon tablets of terra-cotta or other material, and used as amulets (Athen. 12548, ἐν σκυταρίοις ῥαπτῶσι φέρων Ἐφεσῖα γράμματα καλά). When pronounced they were regarded as powerful charms, especially effective in cases of possession by evil spirits (cp Plut. Symph. vii. 54: οἱ μάγοι, τοὺς δαιμονιζομένους κελύουσι τὰ Ἐφέσια γράμματα καταλέγειν καὶ ὀνομάζειν). The study of these symbols was an elaborate pseudo-science.

The miracles ascribed to Paul were therefore clearly designed to meet the circumstances; they were 'special' (Acts 1911: οὐ τὰς τυχοῦσας)—the expulsion of diseases and of evil spirits by means of 'handkerchiefs or aprons' (σουδάρια ἢ σιμικληθία) which are, possibly, to be connected with Paul's own daily labour for his living (1 Cor. 412: κοπιῶμεν ἐργαζόμενοι ταῖς ἰδίαις χερσίν; 1 Thess. 29). Especially was his power brought into comparison with that claimed by the Jewish exorcists (see EXORCISTS), as previously in Paphos (Acts 1367); although in the story of the sons of Sceva and the burning of the treatises on magic there are considerable difficulties—the writer is here rather a picker-up of current gossip, like Herodotus, than a real historian' (Rams. St. Paul. 273).

In the second place, the new teaching came into collision with the popular worship. Even before the great outbreak, fierce opposition must have been encountered from the populace (1 Cor. 1532: ἐθηριομάχησα, 'I fought with beasts'—a word which contains a mixture of Roman and Greek ideas: the Platonic comparison of the mob to a beast, Rep. 493, and the death of criminals in the circus; cp 1 Cor. 49: ὁ θεὸς ἡμᾶς τοὺς ἀποστόλους ἐσχάτους ἀπέδειξεν, ὡς ἐπιθανάτους, and v. 13). In the conviction that 'a great door and effectual' was opened in the province, in spite of there being 'many adversaries' (1 Cor.

168 f.), the apostle had resolved to remain at Ephesus until Pentecost (of 57 A.D. probably). The great festival of the goddess occurred in the month Artemision (CIG, 2954)=Mar.-Apr.; but whether it must be brought into connection with the riot or not is uncertain. The opposition did not originate with the priests, but was organised by the associated tradesmen engaged in the manufacture of 'shrines' (ναοί), led by Demetrius who was one of the chief employers of labour (Acts 19 24; see DIANA, § 2). Such trade-guilds (ἐργα, ἐργασίαι) were common in Asia Minor.¹ It is clear, however, that the riot was badly organised (see Acts 19 32).

The watchword, 'Great is Artemis' (Μεγάλη ἡ Ἀρτέμις) raised by the workmen, diverted the excitement of the populace, and the demonstration became anti-Jewish (v. 34) rather than directly and especially anti-Christian. The nationality of Gaius and Aristarchus (Macedonians, AV; Aristarchus alone Macedonian according to some few MSS, Gaius in that case being the Gaius of Derbe of Acts 20 4; cp GAIUS, 2) would tend in the same direction so long as Paul remained invisible (v. 30), as, apart from the Romans, the Jews formed the only conspicuous foreign element in the city, and one notoriously hostile to the popular cult. The solicitude of 'certain Asiarchs' (v. 31; cp Euseb. HE 4 15; see ASIARCH) for the apostle is significant, as they were the heads of the politico-religious organisation of the province in the cult of Rome and the Emperor; whence we must infer that neither the imperial policy nor the feeling of the educated classes was opposed to the new teaching as yet. The town-clerk's speech is virtually an apologia for the Christians. It is true that a very different view has been suggested (Hicks, Expos. June 1890; cp Rams. Expos. July 1890), in which Demetrius the silversmith is identified with the Demetrius named as President of the Board of Neopoioi ('temple-wardens,' Inscr. Brit. Mus. 578). Hicks supposes that the priests persuaded the Board to organise the riot, and that the honour voted in the inscription to Demetrius and his colleagues was in recognition of their services in the cause of the goddess. Apart from the doubt attaching to the restoration Ν[εοποιοί], and to the date of the decree, the theory does not show why the priests acted by intermediaries who were civil not religious magistrates; nor how trade interests were affected—i.e., it involves the assumption that the author of Acts misconceived the situation, and in recasting his authority altered νεοποιός Ἀρτέμιδος into ποιῶν ναοὺς ἀργυροῦς Ἀρτέμιδος. Further, in order to explain the difference between the friendly attitude of the Asiarchs and the supposed hostility of the priests, it is necessary to assume that the Asiarchs represented a different point of view from that of the native hierarchy. There is no evidence that they represented the point of view of the Roman governors, and probably they had themselves previously held priesthoods of local cults before becoming Asiarchs: they represented the view of the upper classes generally, one which prevailed outside Jewish circles wherever Paul preached (for complete discussion, see Rams. Ch. in Rom. Emp. 112 f.).

The short visit during the voyage from Corinth to Caesarea at the close of the Second journey, and the two and a half years' labour there during the Third journey, together with the interview with the Ephesian elders at Miletus on the return voyage (Acts 20 17), form the only record of Paul's personal contact with Ephesus, unless we admit the inferences drawn from the Pastoral Epistles.²

Phil. 22 ('prepare me also a lodging'; cp Phil. 2 24) expresses an expectation of visiting Colossae, which inevitably implied a visit to Ephesus. 1 Tim. 1 3 implies that this intention was realised, and perhaps there are hints also of a fourth visit: some reconstruct the fragmentary picture of these years so as to give even a fifth or a sixth visit (Conybeare and Howson 2 547 f.) before the final departure for Nicopolis by way of Miletus and Corinth (2 Tim. 4 20).

On the destruction of Jerusalem the surviving apostles and leading members of the church found refuge in Asia, and for a time Ephesus became virtually the centre of the Christian world. 5. Post-Christian times. ANDREW and PHILIP, with Aristion and JOHN the Elder, had their abode here; in this circle Polycarp passed his youth.

The modern name of Ephesus (Ἀγασαλή) is a corruption of Ἄγιος Θεόλογος (Ἅγιος Θεολόγος), the town being named in Byzantine times from the great Church of St. John the Divine, built by Justinian on the site of an earlier edifice: its ruins are visible on the height above the modern village (cp Procop. de Aed. 5 1; Rams. Hist. Geogr. AM, 110). This church became the centre of a town, Ephesus itself being gradually abandoned. The plain has thus reverted to its original condition, the miserable remnant of the population now occupying the site of the sanctuary of Artemis founded by the prehistoric settlers, whilst the site of the Greek and Roman Ephesus is a desert (Rev. 2 5).

EPHIAL (Ἐπιῶν, meaning ?), a Jerahmeelite name, 1 Ch. 2 37. The MT is virtually supported by Ἐ (αφαμῆλ, -ῆδ [B], οφλαδ [A]—Δ, M from Α), but the name was perhaps originally theophorous. READ, therefore, Ἐπιῶν, an abbreviated form of Ἐπιφῆλῆν (see EPHIPELET), or, more probably, Ἐπιφῆλ (cp Ἐλφαελ). See ELPAAL, and cp Ἐ's readings there cited. S. A. C.

EPHOD (Ἐπίδης, Ἐπίδης; in Pent. Ἐπιφωμικ, Vg. superhumerales; in Judg. and 1 S. εφογδ, εφωδ, ephod; in 2 S. 6 14 1 Ch. 15 27 στολη, but εφογδ [L] in 1 Ch.; Hos. 3 4 יערתיא [BAQ]), a Hebrew word (ephod) which the English translators have taken over as a technical term. The word is used in the historical books in two meanings, the connection between which is not clear.

The boy Samuel ministered before Yahwè, 'girt with a linen ephod' (בגד פשתן גיר, 1 S. 2 18); in the same

1. As a garment. when he brought the ark up to Jerusalem, danced before Yahwè with all his might (2 S. 6 14; in 1 Ch. 15 27 the words are a gloss). It was long the accepted opinion that the linen ephod was the common vestment of the priests; but in 1 S. 22 18 'linen' (bad) is a gloss (see *Ἐ, as also Ἐ in 1 S. 2 18), and the other passages usually alleged in support of the theory speak of bearing or carrying the ephod, not of wearing it (see below, § 2). This ephod was manifestly a scanty garment, for Michal taunts David with indecently exposing himself like any low fellow. It was probably not a short tunic, as is generally thought, but a loin-cloth (περίζωμα) about the waist; Samuel's tunic (χιτών) is mentioned separately, and the verb rendered 'gird' (גיר) is used in Hebrew not of belting in an outer garment, but only of binding something (girdle, sword-belt, loin-cloth) about the loins; additional support is given to this view by the shape of the high priest's ephod (see below, § 3). David's assumption of this meagre garb on an occasion of high religious ceremony may perhaps have been a return to a primitive costume which antiquity had rendered sacred, as the pilgrims to Mecca are un-Pauline in language and in theological position, nor can they be fitted into a chronology of the life of Paul. See Jülicher (op. cit., § 13), and cp PASTORAL EPISTLES.—ED.]

to-day must wear the simple loin-cloth ('isār; see GIRDLE, 1), which was once the common dress of the Arabs.

The ephod was used in divining or consulting Yahwè. Of this there is frequent mention in the history of Saul and David (1 S. 14:18 bis [6]:¹ cp v. 3 23:6 30:7; see also Hos. 3:4).

2. The ephod-oracle. From the passages in 1 S. it appears that the ephod was carried by the priest (14:18 6, cp 23:6); to carry the ephod is the distinction of the priesthood (22:8 6), one of its chief prerogatives (2:28). When Saul or David wishes to consult Yahwè, the priest brings the ephod to him; he puts an interrogatory which can be answered categorically (14:37 23:10-12 30:8), or a simple alternative, or a series of alternatives narrowing the question by successive exclusion (14:36-42, cp 10:20-22). The priest manipulated the ephod in some way; Saul breaks off a consultation by ordering the priest to take his hand away (14:19). The response, as we should surmise from the form of the interrogatory, was given by lot; in 14:41 f. (6, cp 18) the lot is cast with two objects, named respectively Urim and Thummim (see URIM). That the ephod was part of the apparatus of divination may be inferred also from its frequent association with the TERAPHIM [q.v.] (Judg. 17 f. Hos. 3:4; cp Ezek. 21:21 [26] Zech. 10:2).

The passages in Samuel, whilst leaving no doubt concerning the use of the ephod, throw little light upon its nature. They show, however, that it was not a part of the priests' apparel; it was carried, not worn (אָנָשׁ never means 'wear' a garment; cp also 23:6, 'in his hand'), and brought (הָבִינִי, 'bring near') to the person who desired to consult the oracle. Other passages seem to lead to a more positive conclusion. At Nob the sword of Goliath, which had been deposited in the temple as a trophy, was kept wrapped up in a mantle 'behind the ephod,' which must, therefore, be imagined as standing free (1 S. 21:9 [10]).² In Judg. 17 f. ephod and teraphim in one version of the story are parallel to pesel and massékâh (idol) in the other. It is natural, though not necessary, to suppose that the ephod was something of the same kind, and the association of ephod with teraphim elsewhere (Hos. 3:4) is thought to confirm this view. Gideon's ephod (made of 1700 shekels of gold) set up (1 S. 5:2 2 S. 6:17 [of the ark]; cp ἰδῶν at Ophrah, where, according to the deuteronomic editor, it became the object of idolatrous worship Judg. 8:27), was plainly an idol, or, more precisely, an agalma, of some kind. Many scholars infer that the ephod in Judg. 8:27 17 f. and 1 S. 21:9 was an image of Yahwè;³ and some think that a similar image is meant in all the places cited above where the ephod is used in divining.⁴ We should then imagine a portable idol before which the lots were cast. See below, §§ 3 (end), 4.

In P the ephod is one of the ceremonial vestments of the high priest enumerated in Ex. 28:4. The pattern for the ephod is given in 28:6 ff.; the fabrication is recorded in 39:2 ff. (= 6 36:9 ff.), the investiture of Aaron in 29:5 Lev. 8:7. The description is not altogether clear; nor do the accounts of those who had (probably) seen the high priest in his robes afford much additional light.⁵

¹ MT (so 6A) substitutes the ark (אָרֶן), as in 1 K. 2:26. See ARK, col. 305, n.

² It is possible, however, that ephod has here been substituted for another word (perhaps āron, 'ark'), for reasons similar to those which led 6 to omit the words altogether (they have been introduced in many codd. from Theodotion).

³ See Moore, Judges, 381.

Braun (De vestitu sacerdotum, 1698, p. 462 ff.), whom most scholars since his day have followed, held that the ephod consisted of two pieces, one covering the front of the body to a little below the waist, the other the back; two shoulder straps (כתְּמִים) ran up from the front piece on either side of the breastplate, and were attached to the back by clasps on the shoulders; a band, woven in one piece with the front of the ephod, passed around the body under the arms and secured the whole.

Others conceive of the ephod as an outer garment covering the body from the arm-pits to the hips, firmly bound on by its girdle, and supported by straps over the shoulders, something like a waistcoat with a square opening in front for the insertion of the breastplate.¹ This view is incompatible with the descriptions in Exodus, especially with the directions for the making and the use of the band (28:8 27:29 5); against Braun's theory it must be noted that nothing is said in the text about a back piece, nor is there anything to suggest that the ephod was made in two parts; 28:8 again seems to exclude such a construction.

As far as we can now understand the description, the high priest's ephod appears to have been a kind of apron, tied around the waist by a band or girth (חֶבֶט = חֶבֶט, cingulum); from the corners of the apron two broad shoulder-straps (כתְּמִים) were carried up to the shoulders, and there fastened (to the robe, צַמְעִי) by two brooches set with onyx stones.² The oracle-pouch (חֶשֶׁן מִשְׁפָּט, EV 'breastplate of judgment'; cp BREAST-PLATE ii. col. 607) was permanently attached by its corners to the shoulder-straps, filling the space between them, and on its lower border meeting the upper edge of the ephod proper. The high priest's ephod may then be regarded as a ceremonial survival of the primitive loin-cloth (ephod bad; see above, § 1) worn by Samuel and David,³ precisely as a Christian bishop at one time wore—as the Pope does still—over his alb a succinctorium with its zona, the two ends falling at his left side.⁴

The fact that the apparatus of the high-priestly oracle, the חֶשֶׁן מִשְׁפָּט, with the sacred lots, was permanently attached to the ephod recalls the use of the ephod by the priests of Saul and David in divining (see URIM); and the most natural explanation is that it also is a survival. This is, of course, impossible if the ephod in Samuel was an image (see above, § 2); but the latter conjecture is not so certainly established that the evidence of P may not be put into the scales against it.⁵

Various hypotheses have been proposed to connect the different meanings and uses of ephod in the OT.

4. Attempted explanations. It is possible that the primitive ephod—a corner of which was the earliest pocket—was used as a receptacle for the lots, from which they were drawn, or into which they were cast (see Prov. 16:33); and that when it was no longer a common piece of raiment it was perpetuated in this sacred use, not worn, but carried by the priest; the ephod and oracle-pouch of the high priest would then preserve this ancient association. The ephod of Gideon—perhaps also the ephod in the temple at Nob—was, however, an agalma of an entirely different character; what relation there may be between the ephod-garment and the ephod-idol, it is not easy to imagine.⁶ In both cases we must admit the possibility

⁴ See Marriott, Vestiarium Christianum, 153, 165 f.; that the original use of the succinctorium was not forgotten, see Innocent III., De sacro altaris mysterio, lib. 1, c. 52.

⁶ For the etymological explanation by J. D. Michaelis, see below; cp also Smend, AT Rel.gesch. 41 n.

that ephōd has supplanted 1 more offensive word, possibly elōhim; cp the substitution of ārōn, 'ark,' for ephōd in 1 S. 14:18 1 K. 2:26. See ARK, § 6, n. 1.

The etymology of ephōd is obscure; the verb אָפַד (Ex. 29:5 Lev. 8:7) is generally regarded as denominative. Lagarde's derivation from a root אָפַד is formally unimpeachable; but his explanation, 'garment of approach to God,' is inadmissible (Ubers. 178). J. D. Michaelis conjectured that Gideon's ephod-idol was so called because it had a 'coating' אָפַד, cp Ex. 28:39:2) of gold over a wooden core (cp Is. 30:22).¹ This theory has been widely accepted, and extended to the whole class of supposed oracular ephod-idols; but the combination is very doubtful. Even in Isaiah it is quite possible that an actual garment may be meant.

EPHATHA (εφθαθα [Ti. WH]), an Aramaism used by Jesus according to Mk. 7:34f. It is glossed by διανοχθητι, and is properly the passive (Ethpe'el or Ethpa'al—opinions differ) of אָפַת, 'to open.'

The assimilation of the n before p can be paralleled in later Aramaic; but it would perhaps be simpler to suppose that the older reading was (correctly) εφθαθα. See Kau, Gram. 10, Dalm. Gram. 202, 222.

People (§ 5 f.)	P's statistics (§§ 10-12)

Ephraim (אֶפְרַיִם; § 100; on meaning of name see below, § 2; εφραϊμ, occasionally εφθ. or εμ;² on gentilic Ephraimite, Ephrathite see below, §§ 1 [end], 5 i.), the common designation in Hosea (originally oftener than now) of the northern kingdom of Israel. This usage was not confined, however, to northern writers. It occurs also in Isaiah and Jeremiah³ and in post-exilic prophets and poets.⁴ There is no evidence that the name was used by other nations. The Moabites called the northern kingdom 'Israel' (M. l. 5); the Assyrians called it Bit Humri (cp OMRI), or Israel (cp Ahabbu Sir'ilai). Nor does 'Ephraim' in this sense occur in the earlier historical books.⁵ The explanation probably is that it was not a correct, formal style. An orator may speak of 'England'; a diplomatist must say 'Great Britain.'

The form of the name suggests that it is really geographical (cp the many place-names ending in aim [NAMES, § 107], and, for the prefixed Ḥ, such names as Ahab, Achshaph; cp also Achzib).

The form of the name suggests that it is really geographical (cp the many place-names ending in aim [NAMES, § 107], and, for the prefixed Ḥ, such names as Ahab, Achshaph; cp also Achzib).

² The following forms occur in Josephus: for the eponym εφραϊμ; for the tribe εφραϊμ; variants εφραθς, -αδθ, -αθη, -αθη, -αθη, -αθη, -αθη.
³ Ezekiel is uncertain.
⁴ Cp Eccles. 47:21, 'out of Ephraim a kingdom of violence (מְלָכּוּת מִן אֶפְרַיִם); and v. 23).
⁵ Statistics as to the occurrence of the name may now be found conveniently collected in W. Staerk, Studien, 184-86.
⁷ The late passage, Judg. 10:9, cannot be considered an exception. The phrase is artificial, modelled after others. עַבְדֵי

Against the view that Ephraim is the name of a district the absence of such a place-name from the Egyptian records is of no significance. They mention, on the whole, towns rather than districts. Nor need we consider seriously the suggestion (Niebuhr, Gesch. 1:251) that there may be in Egypt a trace of Ephraim as the name of a people—viz. in the '(A)pury, repeatedly discussed in relation to Israel (the 'Hebrews'; cp HEBREW, § 1), since Chabas called attention to them, in 1862 (Mélanges Égypt. 42 ff.).¹ The objections to such a view—initial 'ain for 'aleph² and certain facts about the '(A)pury—are obvious (so, strongly, WMM).

The occurrence in a document of Egyptian 'ain³ for initial Semitic 'aleph, is not indeed impossible, as is proved by the singular case of the similar name Achshaph (see above);⁴ but that must be regarded simply as a blunder of the scribe who wrote the papyrus (WMM As. u. Eur. 173). The name (A)pury occurs too often for there to be any uncertainty about its spelling and it is always with 'ain.⁵

Phonetically, therefore, the equation is indefensible. Nor is there in favour of it any positive argument. We find '(A)pury in the time of Ramses II. (cp EGYP, § 58) in the (eastern) borders of Egypt where a persistent tradition says that Joseph, which, as we shall see, is practically equivalent to Ephraim, was settled (cp JOSEPH i.); but '(A)pury are mentioned as early as the thirteenth and as late as the twentieth dynasty,⁶ and there is nothing to suggest their being connected with a special movement towards Canaan.

It is most probable, therefore, that 'Ephraim is strictly the name of the central highlands of W. Palestine. The people took the name of the tract in which they dwelt, just as their neighbours towards the S. were called 'men of the south,' 'sons of the south' (see BENJAMIN, § 1). Ephraim would thus be simply the country of Joseph; called his son, as Gilead is called the son of Machir. It is just possible that Machir, too, was at one time used in a wider sense, more nearly equal to Joseph; J's story says (Gen. 37:28 b; cp 45:4) that it was because Joseph was sold (יִמְכְרוּ אֶת יוֹסֵף) that he was found living in Egypt (מִכְרִי, Machir = 'sold').⁷ When Joseph was regarded as consisting definitely of three collections of clans—Machir (Manasseh), Ephraim, and Benjamin—the main body retained the name Ephraim.

The gentile occurs seldom (Judg. 12:5 1 S. 11 1 K. 11:26) in MT, and the text is doubtful (see below, § 5, i.). Analogy would lead us to expect Ephrite (אֶפְרַיִם; cp מְצֻרִים מִצֻּרֵי אֶפְרַיִם; but the form used is Ephrathite (אֶפְרַתִּית), as if from a noun Ephrah. 'Ephraimite' (Josh. 16:10 [AV] Judg. 12:4 6 [AV], v. 5 [EV]) is an invention of EV. 'Ephrathite' in Judg. 12:5 is probably genuine (εφραθιτης [B], εκ του εφραμα [AL]) in the sense of 'belonging to Mount Ephraim.'

i. From the days of Hosea (13:15, יִפְרַיִם) and the Blessings of Jacob (Gen. 49) and of Moses (Dt. 33) men have seen in the name Ephraim a fitting designation for the central district of Palestine,⁸ 'fair and open,' fertile and well-watered; and modern scholars (e.g., We., Abriss d. Gesch. 5) regard the name as originally a Hebrew omits 'house of.' The Chronicler speaks of the 'sons of Ephraim' (בְּנֵי אֶפְרַיִם), 2 Ch. 28:12.

2. Meaning of name. Palestine, 'fair and open,' fertile and well-watered; and modern scholars (e.g., We., Abriss d. Gesch. 5) regard the name as originally a Hebrew omits 'house of.' The Chronicler speaks of the 'sons of Ephraim' (בְּנֵי אֶפְרַיִם), 2 Ch. 28:12.

² Another phonetic objection, that medial פ is normally represented by f not p (so WMM, As. u. Eur. 93), is not decisive. P also appears, for example, Bai-ti-ju-pa-ṭā=פַּרְסִי (pap. Anast. i. 223).

³ Brugsch compared the Midianite 'Epher, עֶפְרַיִם (ZÄ 76, p. 71).

⁷ The place of the incident of the sale in the life of Joseph is referred to elsewhere. See JOSEPH ii. § 3.

appellative meaning 'fertile tract.'¹ Formally this is plausible (see above, § 1), and, as we shall see (§ 3*f.*), such a name is fitting—it would be eminently fitting on the lips of Hebrew immigrants from the Steppes. The Arabs called the beautiful plain of Damascus² the gūta, and this has become a proper name (el-Ghūta). Compare the (very different) name given to the parched tract S. of Judah (see NEGEB). Other possible explanations, however, should not be overlooked.

ii. If אֶפְרַיִם means 'earth,'³ Gesenius in connecting 'Ephraim' with אֶרֶץ may have been wrong only in interpreting the termination aim as a dual ending, and 'Ephraim' may have meant 'the loamy tract.' The Assyrian epru may be אֶרֶץ, not אֶפְרַיִם.

iii. A slightly different explanation would be reached if we followed the hint of the Mishnic Hebrew אֶפְרַיִם (Buxt. אֶפְרַיִם); cp Bēšā 57: 'Domestic animals (בְּיָחִיּוֹת) are such as pass the night in the city (בְּעִיר), pastoral animals (בְּמִדְבָּרִיּוֹת) are such as pass the night in the open (בְּמִדְבָּר);' also Pešikta 86: '[Exod. 34 24] teaches that thy cow may pasture in the open (בְּמִדְבָּר).' If this sense for אֶפְרַיִם was old, 'Ephraim' might mean the country where the earlier settlers in Palestine had not yet built (many) cities (cp below, § 7 ii.). אֶפְרַיִם, אֶפְרַיִם in the Talmud means 'meadow.'

On the other hand, the interpretation of geographical names is proverbially precarious (cp CANAAN, § 6, ARAM, § 1); we must take into consideration the possibility that the name Ephraim as it has reached us may owe its precise form in part to popular etymology such as, it is thought, has turned (conversely) Château vert into Shotover (hill).

Ephraim is generally called 'Mount Ephraim'⁴ (אֶרֶץ)—i.e., 'mountainous-country' of Ephraim.

3. Character and extent. This was no mere form of speech. From the plain of Megiddo to Beersheba is a great mountainous mass, ninety miles in length, called 'the mountain.' 'Mountain of Ephraim' will mean that part of this great mountain mass which lies within the (fertile) tract called Ephraim—viz. the northern part. It is impossible not to see that Ephraim differs from the less fertile tract that extends down to Beersheba. The change is patent. It is more difficult, however, to say where it occurs (see, further, end of this §). In fact, there is not really a definite physical line of section, any more than there was a stable political boundary. It has been suggested elsewhere (BENJAMIN, § 1*f.*) that this made easier the formation of an intermediate canton called 'the southern [Ephraim]'—i.e., Benjamin. The OT nowhere defines the extent of Ephraim. It is likely that there was always a certain vagueness about its southern limits. There can be little doubt, however, that it included Benjamin (see BENJAMIN, § 1). All that follows the word 'even' in Judg. 19 16 is probably an interpolation (to magnify the wickedness of the Benjamites?; so Bu. ad loc.). The northern boundary is clearer. When Josephus tells us (Ant. v. 122 [83]) that Ephraim reached (from Bethel) to 'the great plain' (τὸ μέγα πεδῖον) he may mean the plain not of Megiddo but of the Makhneh (see below, § 4); but he is speaking of the seat of the smaller Ephraim tribe. The general character of the OT references and the cities assigned to Mt. Ephraim (see below, § 13) make it probable that it reached to the plain of Megiddo.

The only serious argument against it is the rather obscure passage Josh. 17 14-18 (on the text of which see Che. Crit. Bib.,

² Cheyne has conjectured that the plain below Jerusalem similarly received the name 'Ephraim,' corrupted by transposition of letters into REPHEIM [q.v.]. Bethléhem (or a place near it), only two or three miles distant, seems to have been called Ephraim.

³ So Barth, Etym. Stud. 20*f.*, comparing Ar. gubār, which, however, means 'dust'; also (v. 43) Bu. (2).

⁴ Twice 'mount Israel,' Josh. 11 16 21 [D]; on Ezekiel's frequent 'mountains of Israel' (יְהוּדָה), see HIGH PLACE, § 2.

⁵ Looked at from the sea, indeed, or from across the Jordan, it 'presents the aspect,' as G. A. Smith says, 'of a single mountain massif.'

and cp REPHEIM). The house of Joseph, complaining that Mt. Ephraim is too small for them, are told to clear for themselves a settlement in the wood in the land of the Rephaim and the Perizzites. It has been supposed that this refers to the northern part of the western highlands from Shechem to Jenin (so Stade, Steurnagel, van Kasteren, MDPI' 95, p. 28*f.*); but it is more likely that the passage is to be connected with the story of Josephite colonies settling E. of the Jordan (cp JAIR, etc.; REPHEIM (WOOD)); so Bu. RiSa, 34 ff. 87; KHC ad loc., Buhl, Fal. 121 n. 265). See MACHIR, MANASSEH, and, on the relation of Ephraim to other tribes, below, § 5.

The places expressly said to be in Mount Ephraim are: in the south, Ramath(aim), perhaps Bēt Rīmā (see RAMATHAIM), Zuph, and Timnath-heres (Josh. 19 50 24 30 Judg. 29), perhaps et-Tibnah (see TIMNATH-HERES); in the centre, Shechem (Josh. 20 7 21 21 1 K. 12 25 1 Ch. 6 67 [52]); in the N., SHAMIR [q.v.; Judg. 10 1]; also the hills ZEMARAIM, S. of Bethel (2 Ch. 13 4), and GAASH, near Timnath-heres (Judg. 29, etc.).

The Ephraim highlands differ from those of Judah in several respects.¹ In Judah we have a compact and fairly regular tableland deeply cut by steep defiles, bounded on the E. by the precipices that overlook the depths of the Dead Sea, and separated on the W. from the maritime plain by the isolated 'lowland district' of the Shēphēlah (see JUDAH). In Ephraim this gives place to a confused complex of heights communicating on the E. by great valleys with the Jordan plain, and letting itself down by steps on the W. directly on to the plain of Sharon, cut across the middle by a great cleft (see below, § 4, end) and elsewhere by deep valleys, and enclosing here and there upland plains surrounded by hills.

The change in the western border occurs about Wādī Malāka, directly west of Bethel; the change in the character of the surface not till the Bethel plateau ends (some 5 or 6 m. farther N.) at the base of the highest peak of Ephraim—on which the ruins of Tell-'Ašūr probably mark the site of BAAL-HAZOR—whose waters running east through the W. Sāmiya and west through the W. en-Nimr and the W. Dēr Ballūṭ empty themselves into the Jordan and the Mediterranean by the two 'Aujas.

Geographically, as well as historically, the heart and centre of the land is Shechem. 'Embosomed in a

4. Plains, wādys, etc. forest of fruit gardens' in a fair vale sheltered by the heights of Ebal and Gerizim, it sends out its roads, like arteries, over the whole land, distributing the impulse of its contact with foreign culture.

1. Northwestwards the W. esh-Sha'ir winds past the open end of the Samaria plain down to Sharon.

From the plain of Samaria, whose island city-fortress the sagacity of Omri made for centuries the capital, one gets by the valley up to near Yāsīd and then down the W. Abu Kaslān, or by a road over the saddle of Bēyāzīṭ, into the upland plains of Fandakūmiyeh and Marj el-Garaḡ, and on to Sahl 'Arrābeh, Dothan, and the plain of Megiddo.

2. The E. end of the vale of Shechem is the plain of 'Askar.

If one turns to the left, the steep, rugged gorge of W. Bēdān (with its precipitous cliffs, surmounted by Ebal on the left and by Neby Belān on the right) takes one down northwards to the great crumpled basin which collects the waters of the W. Fāri'a, the main avenue of access from Gilead² by the ford of ed-Dāmiēh, less than 20 m. off.

W. Fāri'a turns off to the right (SE). Straight on (NE.) past 'Ain Fāri'a is the road to Beisān in the Jordan plain, passing by the large village of Tubās (identified by some with THEBEZ, q.v.), which lies (10 m. from Nāblus) looking down the W. Bukē', by Teyāšīr (identified by some with ASHER [q.v., ii. 1]) in a secluded and fertile open valley near the head of the W. Mālīh and by Kh. Izbīk (BEZEK), and through the W. Khashneh, with its hills thickly clothed with wild olives.

On the left all along the road is the watershed, with the heights of Tallūzā (1940 ft., a village on a knoll commanding a fine view of W. Fāri'a), the 'barren rounded top' of Rās el-'Akra (2230 ft.), and Rās Izbīk (2404 ft.), which rises 1400 ft. above Teyāšīr.

3. Straight in front of the E. exit from Shechem the plain

² Note that it is just opposite the W. Zerḡā, that great cleft in the Gilead plateau.

of 'Askar connects with the plain of Sälüm leading on to Ta'nä (TAANATH-SHILOH) at the head of W. el-Keräd, which leads through the steep W. Ifjim down to the Jordan.

4. On the right the plain of 'Askar (see SYCHAR) leads S. into the plain of Rûjib and the plain of Makhneh, the route to the S. passing on across ridges and valleys through the deep plain of Lubhan, round the heights of Sinjil—leaving up on the left, shut in between high bare mountains, the ancient temple-city of Shiloh (near it the open plain of Merj el-'Id)—on through the W. el-Jib, under the heights of Tell 'Aşûr (E. of which is the enclosed plain of Merj Sia), up to the plateau of Bêfin (Bethel) and el-Bîreh, and so on to Jerusalem and the south.

5. West of the line just described, leading south from the plain of 'Askar, a maze of valleys gradually simplifies itself into the great arterial wādys that lead down to the maritime plain and finally unite in the lower course of the 'Aujā.

These are the W. Kānah, the W. Deir Ballût, and the W. Malākeh: the Deir Ballût, with its two [or three] great converging branches (the straight W. Ish'ar beginning in a little plain south of the village of Akraha upon the main watershed, and the deep W. en-Nimr); the W. Malākeh, with its deep head valleys beginning below el-Bîreh. South of the W. Malākeh is the W. Selmān, the country drained by which is enclosed in the great sweep of the W. Sar'ir, which, beginning just below el-Bîreh, describes a semicircle and enters the sea as N. Rûbin due W. of er-Ramleh.

6. South of Gerizim the watershed lies east of the traveller's route. Just as, north of the W. Fāri'a, we have seen, there runs along the watershed a succession of valleys or plains, so from the S. foot of et-Tawānik (2847) the Jehir 'Akrabah runs S. as far as Mejdel-beni-Fādel (2146), overlooked by Yānūn (JANOAH) in the northern part, and by the modern village of 'Akrabeh (2045) about midway. Then, however, the system becomes more complex, till at Tell 'Aşûr we reach the Bethel plateau.

7. The district of the open valley of Fandaqūmiye and the enclosed plain Marj el-Garak is, we saw, partly separated from the Samaria valley by the Bayāzid range. Farther north are the plains of Dothan, 'Arrābeh, and the W. Selhab. If the W. Fāri'a was the route of the invasions from the east (Nomads, Aramæans, Assyrians), the upland plain of Dothan was the great route across from Sharon to the east end of the plain of Megiddo. There were other routes (W. 'Āra, etc.) farther NW. By these routes the armies of Egypt and the other great states passed and repassed for centuries and centuries. The low hill-land beyond the plain of Dothan culminates in the height of Sheikh Iskander, north of which the W. 'Āra divides it from the still lower hill-land called Bilād Rūha which stretches across to W. el-Milh, beyond which rises the range of CARMEL [q.v.].

Mt. Ephraim is thus divided across the middle (by the great valleys that continue the vale of Shechem) into a northern and a southern half. The northern of these again is divided by the great line of plains and valleys that reaches from the Jordan plain near Gilboa southwestwards to the Makhneh. The NW. quarter is remarkable for its plains; the NE. for its series of parallel valleys (especially the great W. Fāri'a) running down SE. to the Ghôr. In the southern half the SW. is remarkable for its maze of wādys (note the long straight W. Ish'ar that runs down thirteen miles without a bend SW. from 'Akrabeh) coagulating at the base of Tell 'Aşûr and below el-Bîreh, and its great valleys converging into the 'Aujā; the SE. for its heights, plains, and plateaus, and the series of deep rugged wādys (note in particular the deep W. el-'Aujah leading up to Tell 'Aşûr and the W. Kelt-Suwēnit leading up to the Benjamin plateau) that furrow its eastern declivity.

Such is Ephraim; a land well watered and fertile, a land of valleys, plains, and heights, a land open to the commerce, the culture, and the armies of the world.

i. Relation to Manasseh.—Not all the Ephraim district, however, was regarded as belonging to the Ephraim tribe; part was peopled by men of Machir-Manasseh (see MANASSEH). Their towns were apparently chiefly in the N. A writer of disputed date tried to delimit a northern portion to be assigned to Manasseh (see below, § 11); but from the fragments of another account (ib.) it would seem that there was in reality no geographical boundary. The whole highland country was Ephraim; certain towns were specially Manassite. The fact that in the whole OT there is scarcely a case of a man being called an Ephraimite suggests that Ephraim was hardly ever a tribe name in the ordinary sense: the leading men were men of Ephraim unless they were otherwise described.

The two cases occurring in the MT are those of (a) Jeroboam and (b) Elkanah the 'father' of Samuel. Both are doubtful.

(a) Jeroboam is called 'an Ephraimite' (εφραθιτῆς [BAL]) in 1 K. 11:26 (= MT); but in 2 K. 12:28 = 2 K. 12:24b, in the other recension of the story (see KINGS, § 3), he is only 'a man of Mount Ephraim' (ἐξ ὄρους Εφραϊμ [BL]).

(b) The 'genealogy' of Samuel (1 S. 1) is corrupt (see ELIHU, 2; ELKANAH, 1). 2S follows MT (υἱοῦ Σουρ Εφραθαίος); but 2SBL read Ephraim (υἱοῦ Σωφ ἐξ ὄρους Εφραϊμ [L]; ἐν Ναρεθ Εφραϊμ = 'א הניצח, i.e., 'א הניצח, 'son of Zuph of Ephraim' [B]).

The mutual relations of the branches of Joseph are somewhat perplexing (see MANASSEH, and cp JOSEPH i.).

J, E, and P appear to agree in representing Ephraim as the younger (Gen. 48:18 [J], 41:51 [E], Josh. 17:1 [P]); but whilst J and E lay stress on the preeminence attributed by Jacob-Israel to the younger (Gen. 48:14 10b [J], v. 20b [E]), P usually speaks of Manasseh and Ephraim.²

The significance of the distinctions just referred to has been explained in various ways.

It has been supposed that in the seniority of Manasseh lay a reference to early attempts at monarchy (GIDEON, JEPHTHAH, ABIMELECH); whilst in the blessing of Ephraim lay a reference to the undisputed preeminence of the monarchy established by Jeroboam I. Of this latter reference there can be no doubt. The meaning of the seniority of Manasseh is not so certain, especially when we bear in mind how in Israelitish legend preference of the younger is almost universal. Jacobs has acutely argued that this preference is simply a survival of the forgotten custom of junior birthright, which the later legend-moulders misunderstood.

There is a rather obscure allusion in Is. 9:21 [20] to discord between Ephraim and Manasseh. The reference may be to conflict between rival factions in the last years of the northern kingdom. Legend told of rivalries also in the pre-historic period (see JEPHTHAH, GIDEON).

The currents that stirred the troubled waters of Samarian politics cannot now be fully traced: Shallum and Pekah may have been Gileadites (see JABESH, 2; ARGOB, 2), Menahem was perhaps a Gadite³ (see GAD, § 10). The family of Jehu may have belonged to Ephraim (see, however, ISSACHAR, § 4).⁴

ii. Relation to Joseph.—If there is some difference of usage in regard to the order of the tribes Ephraim and Manasseh, there is agreement as to their being brothers. Still there is at times a tendency to regard them as a single tribe (see JOSEPH i.). The question therefore arises whether their distinctness was on the increase or on the decrease. Did they unite to form Joseph, or did Joseph split up into Ephraim and Manasseh (for a similar question see BENJAMIN, § 1 f.)?

In the 'Blessing' of Jacob as we find it in our Genesis, Ephraim and Manasseh do not appear;⁵ they are represented by Joseph. There is indeed a play on the name Ephraim (v. 22);⁶ but as there is no reference to Manasseh, Ephraim might be not part but the whole of Joseph. This may be so. On the other hand the Song of Deborah already recognises two tribes; Ephraim

² Sometimes, however, P gives the other order. See, especially, Gen. 48:5. See, more fully, MANASSEH.

³ Baasha was an Issacharite; Tibni may have been a Naphtalite (see GINATH). It was, according to Cheyne, against the Ephraimite city of Tappuah that Menahem took such cruel vengeance (see TIPHSAR). It has been conjectured that Omri also was of Issachar (Guthe, GVZ, 138). Cp ISSACHAR, § 4.

⁴ It is to be noted that in this family the name Jeroboam recurs.

⁵ The same is true of the 'Blessing' of Moses (Dt. 33). V. 17b is a gloss.

and Machir seem (already) to be found side by side W. of the Jordan.¹

Whether the designation of Benjamin as a brother, and of Ephraim and Manasseh as sons of Joseph implies a popular belief that when Benjamin definitely separated from Joseph, Manasseh was not yet distinguished clearly from Ephraim we cannot say; nor yet whether such a belief, if it existed, was based on any real tradition (cp MANASSEH).

The general result is: on the whole, Joseph was in early times equated with Ephraim, which included Machir-Manasseh and Benjamin (cp above, § 3; JOSEPH i.). On the other hand, it must not be forgotten that 'Joseph' was doubtless originally a group of clans.

There seems to have been much speculation as to how Ephraim came to be settled where he was. The great sanctuaries would have their legends. 6. Legends about their Settlement. At GILGAL [g.v.] in the plain of Jericho which, though not in the highlands, belonged to N. Israel, priests may have told how a great Ephraimitish hero, after erecting their sacred circle of stones (Josh. 4 20, E) and leading the immigrant clans from Gilead against JERICHO and other places, had camped for long by their sanctuary (Josh. 10 15=43: G om.; perhaps late), and how there Yahwê had instructed the tribes to what part of the highlands they were to ascend to find a home (Judg. 1 r). Up on the plateau, at the royal sanctuary of Bethel, it was told how their fathers had effected an entrance into the city (Judg. 1 25), and how the mound that now stood two miles off in the direction of Jericho had once been a royal Canaanite city, till their fathers, with much difficulty, had stormed it and made it the 'heap' it now was (Josh. 8 28). At the great natural centre of the land, home of many stocks, conflicting stories were told of quiet settlements, of treaties, of treacherous attacks, of a legal purchase (cp DINAH, § 3), of a great assembly gathered to hear the last admonition of the veteran Ephraimite leader (Josh. 24), and how he had set up the great stone under the terebinth (v. 26). Shiloh, too, must have had its settlement stories to tell, especially how the great Ephraimite shrine (see ARK) had been there; but these stories have perished (for a possible trace of a late story see MELCHIZEDEK, § 3). When its temple was lying in ruins there was written (in circles of students who had never seen Shiloh) a book which explained that after Israel had conquered the whole of Canaan, they were assembled there by the successors of Moses and Aaron to set up a wonderful sacred tent and to distribute by lot the holy land (Josh. 18 1 14 r). Timmath-heres boasted that it was the resting-place of the great leader of Ephraim (see below). Shechem even claimed that near at hand were buried the bones of the great eponym of the house of Joseph (Josh. 24 32, E).

The legendary history was carried back still farther. Joseph, though he entered by way of Gilead, came from Egypt, where Ephraim and Manasseh were born.² In fact they were really Egyptian; but Jacob-Israel had adopted them (Gen. 48 E).³ Even before that, Joseph had been at Shechem and Dothan (JOSEPH i. § 3). Jacob-Israel had founded the royal sanctuary at Bethel (Gen. 35 14 [J], and 28 18 [E]), and reared the sacred pillar at Shechem 4 (Gen. 35 20 [E]), and Abraham had built altars at Shechem (Gen. 12 7 [J]), and at Bethel (v. 8 [J]).

It is pretty clear that Ephraim had forgotten how he came there. Some seem to have thought that before the Israelites known to history settled in Ephraim there were others, who eventually moved southward (see SIMEON, LEVI, DINAH, JUDAH). It was remembered that there had been more Danites on the western slopes of Ephraim than there were in later times (DAN, § 2 ff.). It is unlikely that it was believed that there had been a

² This, however, may be merely an incident in the story, unavoidable since Joseph, the hero, never left Egypt.

³ Cp Bertholet, Stellung, 50.

⁴ On 'Jacob's well' see SYCHAR.

settlement of Amalekites.¹ On the other hand, it has been suggested that there may be a trace of an ancient tribe in the neighbourhood of Shechem (see GIRZITE). The evidence for the preponderating Canaanite element in Shechem has been referred to already. The ancient Canaanite city of Gezer, once an Egyptian fortress, which, we are told, became Israelite in the days of Solomon, was hardly in Mt. Ephraim; but it belonged to Ephraim (see GEZER). Issachar may have been represented on Mt. Ephraim's NE. slopes (see ISSACHAR, § 8). There were late Israelitish writers who thought that Asher, too, had its claims, and it has recently been suggested that there may really be traces of an early stay of people of Asher south of Carmel (see ASHER, § 3). Timmath-heres is said to have been settled by Joshua (see JOSHUA i.). Of a clan of this name in historic times we have no evidence, and the same is true of RAHAB [g.v.]. On the extraordinarily meagre Ephraimite 'genealogy' in Chronicles and on its points of contact with other tribes, see below (§ 12).

The extra-biblical hints are vague in the extreme and difficult to turn to account.

7. Extra-biblical data. i. The long list of places conquered by Thotmes III. probably contains some towns in central Ephraim.

Flinders Petrie (Hist. Egypt 2 323-332) proposes a considerable number of identifications, including, e.g., Shechem and several places near it; Yereh, Teyasir, and Râba in the NE; and not a few places in the SW, from W. Dêr Ballût southwards.

When the land of Haru was added to the Egyptian Empire it can hardly have sufficed to seize the towns on the margin: Y-ra-ḏa (?), Mi-k-ti-ra (Mejdel Yâba? so WMM), Gezer (Ḳa-ḏi-ru, 104). Even if we could identify with certainty, however, many names of towns, we should still know nothing about the people who occupied them. Special interest and importance, however, attaches to two unidentified sites which, it would seem, must be in Ephraim—the much-discussed 'Jacob-el' and 'Joseph-el.' The reading 'Jacob' may be treated as fairly sure; but that of 'Joseph' is questionable (see JOSEPH i. § 1). For the interpretation of these names we must be content to wait for more light (see, for a suggestion, JACOB, § 1). We may hope, however, that they have something to tell us of the origin of Ephraim.

ii. As the report of the early expedition of Amen-hotep II. contains nothing that casts light on our present problems,² our next data belong to the time of Amen-hotep IV. Unfortunately, though the Amarna correspondence tells us a good deal about the fortified towns in Palestine³ and their conflicts, it sheds little light on the central highlands. Knudtzon's proposal to read mi-Sa-ak-mi for Winckler's mât-su la-a(?)-mi in letter 185, l. 10, however, brings the Habiri into connection with 'the land of Shechem'⁴ in a very interesting way.⁵ Moreover, we must remember that the tablets rescued from destruction are only some of those that were found at Tell el-Amarna. Those that were allowed to perish may have referred to other Ephraimite places. If, however, there really were few (if any) Egyptian fortresses in that tract,

² We have no details of Syrian expeditions of Thotmes IV. Amen-hotep III. was engaged in other concerns.

³ Ashkelon, Bit-Ninib (see IR-HERES), Ajjalon, Zorah, Ginti (see GATH), Gezer, perhaps Beth-shean (see Knudtzon, Beitr. z. Assyr. 4 111), Megiddo.

the Habiri might be already settling there without our hearing of them.¹

iii. The contests of Seti I. were in S. Phœnicia and Galilee. When we again get a glimpse of Palestine in the time of Ram(ese)s II. it is once more the border towns that are named: Heres, Luz, Ša-nin-ša-na.²

iv. To Ram(ese)s' successor we owe what is perhaps the most interesting statement of all. 'Israel,' says Merenptah, is devastated; and 'Israel,' it is to be noted, is not a place but a people. If we assume that the people referred to were settled in Ephraim, nothing very definite can be urged against the assumption—or for it³ (cp ISRAEL, § 7; EGYPT, § 59).

The cities mentioned in Ram(ese)s III.'s list seem to be Amorite, north of Galilee (As. u. Eur. 227).

Until hieroglyphic or cuneiform (or Hittite) records shed some more light on the scene, accordingly, we must remain without definite information as to the early history of Ephraim. It is clear, however, that the girdle of Canaanite cities was of remote antiquity and practically certain that there were already towns up in the highlands—Shechem, perhaps Luz, and others. The population was no doubt mixed; Habiri, although we have no certain mention of them, may have immigrated there also.

The earliest incontestable fact that Ephraim remembered was the great fight with Sisera;⁴ but they may have known no more about who he was

than we do (see SISERA). What part Ephraim played in the great conflict, the condition of the text in Judg. 5:14 does not enable us to say with certainty.⁵ Perhaps we should read: 'Out of Ephraim they went down into the plain.' It is not likely that Ephraim supplied the leader (see DEBORAH).

It was not only along its northern border that Ephraim was exposed to attack. The open valleys and easy fords,⁶ which, when circumstances favoured, united it with Gilead, exposed it to the inroads⁷ of the still nomadic peoples of the east. Stories were told at OPHRAH [q.v.] and elsewhere of heroic fights (see GIDEON), and of spirited colonies sent out (see MANASSEH). PIRATHON⁸ and SHAMIR, an unidentified place in Mount Ephraim, seem to have boasted that they had produced heroes in the time of old (see ABDON, TOLA). The Shechemites even told of how they came, for a time, to have a tyrannos, and how they got rid of him again (ABIMELECH, 2).

Of greatest historical importance was the life-and-death struggle with hated non-Semitic rivals (see PHILISTINES). North Ephraim claimed a share in the glory of the struggle of those dark days; but when the cloud lifts the ¹ C. Niebuhr also suggests that the Habiri were already settled in Mt. Ephraim (Der alte Orient 160).

9. Transition.

² The pap. Anast. I., however, appears to mention again 'the mountain of Shechem' (As. u. Eur. 394, note to pp. 172-175).

³ It has even been suggested that Yi-si-ra-al may be not really Israel at all (see JEZREEL I. § 1). On the other hand Marquart (loc.) inclines to explain the name as referring to the Leah-tribes, supposed to be still resident in central Palestine (see JUDAH).

⁵ J. Marquart (Fund. 6 [196]), following Winckler (AOF 1:93) reads, כני אפרים שרו בעמק

'Out of Ephraim they descended into the plain
Out of Machir went down leaders.'

So also Budde, KHC ad loc. P. Ruben (JQR 10:550*f.*) reads

... כני אפרים אשר עמק ח'רי פנינתם בעמקיהם

⁸ Even if the view advocated in the article PIRATHON be adopted, Abdon may perhaps be claimed for Mt. Ephraim. Abdon is Benjaminite.

hegemony is passing to Benjamin. If the monarchy thus involved a loss to N. Ephraim, there was also a gain; Gilead and Ephraim were bound together more closely (on earlier relations see JEPHTHAH, §§ 3, 5 [end]; GAD, § 2; MACHIR). Indeed when the disaster of Gilboa laid Israel once more at the feet of the Philistines, the connection with Gilead was found to be very valuable (see ISHBAAL, 1). How, exactly, Ephraim was brought under the sway of the state that was rising beyond the belt of Canaanite cities to the S., is not very clear (see DAVID, § 6, ISHBAAL, 1, ABNER, ISRAEL, § 16*f.*). The skill and energy of David must have been great. It is difficult to believe, however, that he effected in Ephraim all that has been attributed to him by Winckler. Still the change must have been profound. How far there may have been an influx of people from the S. we cannot tell. Others besides Absalom (2 S. 13:23) may have acquired possessions in Mt. Ephraim. Although we must on general grounds assume that there were dialectical differences, chiefly in pronunciation, between the various Hebrew-speaking, as between other, communities—peculiarities of the Shibboleth type are universal—they cannot have had any effect on freedom of intercourse. The fixing of the capital at Jerusalem was most politic. It was perhaps in a belt hitherto unclaimed, scarcely ten miles from Bethel. Ephraim might regard it and the other Canaanite cities annexed as a gain in territory. The fairs at the great Ephraimite sanctuaries would now be open to people from Mt. Judah and the Negeb in a way that would hardly have been possible before. Ephraimite legend became enriched. Abraham, e.g., it came to be said, had built an altar at Shechem (Gen. 12:7 [J]) and at Bethel (v. 8 [J]).

Many interesting questions arise.

When did the general interweaving of legends take place? How was it possible to deposit the great Ephraimite shrine in Jerusalem? (see ARK). How did Ephraim act in the Absalom rebellion and in that of Sheba? How was Solomon's 'overseer of the whole house of Joseph' related to his prefect of Ephraim? The former, of course, had his official residence at the natural centre of the land, Shechem. The latter, whether or not he was a son of Zadok and of Beth-horon (see BEN-HUR), may have resided nearer Jerusalem (see also below, § 12).

The final schism cannot have taken anyone by surprise (JEROBOAM, § 1; SOLOMON, § 2; ISRAEL, § 28). The old royal city of Shechem

10. Monarchy. was naturally the scene of the negotiations and the first seat of the monarchy of Ephraim.¹ The links between Gilead and Ephraim, geographical and historical, were too close to be severed now. The kingdom of Ephraim included Gilead. That is to say, Gilead, if it befriended David (against Judah? see MAHANAIM), would not go out of its way to help his sons. For two eventful centuries Ephraim maintained a real or nominal independence. How it subordinated Judah, contended with Aram, allied itself with Phœnicia, was distracted by constant dynastic changes and yet reached a high level of civilization and produced a wonderful literature, is told elsewhere.

Shechem, indeed, centre of the land though it was, was not able to maintain itself as the capital. It may not have been quite suitable from a military point of view. It had to yield to Tirzah (an important but somewhat tantalising place-name, see TIRZAH) and then to Samaria, which was well able to stand even a regular siege. In historical times the great sanctuaries were Bethel and Gilgal. See also GIBEON, SHILOH. That any attempt was made to centralise religious festivals at one sanctuary in Ephraim there is no evidence.

A. Duff, however, has propounded² the interesting theory that such a project had been conceived,—that indeed the kernel of the book of Deuteronomy originated in Ephraim, and that the (now) unnamed sanctuary meant in it was originally that of Shechem (see now Theol. of OT, 2:25 39 n., 50 n., 59*f.*).

² In a paper read before the Society of Historical Theology, Oxford (96).

However that may be, there must have been other great thinkers besides Hosea. Ephraim produced a DECALOGUE and a longer code (see EXODUS ii. § 3), and must have had otherwise a share in the development of that mass of ritualistic prescription which was ultimately codified in Judah (see LAW LITERATURE). If it had its Elis,¹ Samuels, and Elishas, whom legend loved to glorify, we must not forget the men of name unknown whose only memorial is their work: the work of its story-tellers, annalists, poets, and other representatives of social or religious movements, whose achievements are dealt with elsewhere. We probably under-estimate rather than over-estimate the debt of Judah to Ephraim.²

See HISTORICAL LITERATURE; POETICAL LITERATURE; ELISHA; ELIJAH; PROPHET; IDOLATRY.

The accessibility to the outer world, however, to which Ephraim owed its rapid advance, occasioned also its fall. In the struggle with Aram, it lost much; and when Aram was swamped in the advancing tide of Assyrian conquest another great turning-point in Ephraim's history was at hand. How, precisely, it was affected by the Assyrian conquest, how it fared when the Semitic Empire passed to Persia, what befel it during the long struggles between Ptolemy and Seleucid, Seleucid and Maccabae, Palestinian and Roman, will be discussed elsewhere (see SAMARIA, and cp ISRAEL).

On the late notion of a Messiah called 'Ephraim,'³ or 'son of Ephraim,'⁴ or 'son of Joseph,' etc., alongside of the 'son of David' (מֶשִׁיחַ בֶּן דָּוִד) see Hamburger, KE, artt. 'Messias-leiden' and 'Messias Sohn Joseph'; cp MESSIAH; JOSEPH (husband of Mary).

Great difficulty in the way of a true knowledge of the history of Ephraim is occasioned by its rivalry with Judah. This has distorted the

11. P's boundary. perspective, broken the outlines, and tinged the colour, of the picture that has reached us. A. Bernstein tried to show how Ephraimite patriotism might account for many points in the patriarch stories. It is certain that Ephraim has suffered at the hands of the writers of Judah. The account of the occupation of the Ephraim highlands in Joshua is surprisingly meagre. All that lies N. of Bethel is passed over in silence (cp JOSHUA ii. § 9). The indications of the boundary of Ephraim as they appear in the post-exilic book are very incomplete and only partly intelligible. The critical analysis is still disputed. Great confusion prevails, and the text is bad. Apparently the southern border is represented as reaching from the Jordan at Jericho up to Bethel (Bēl'in), to Ataroth Addar ('Aṭirā?; see ARCHITES, ATAROTH, 2), down westwards to the territory of the Japhletite (PALTĪ) and of the BETH-HORONS (Bēt 'Ūr), and on to GEZER (Tell Gezer) and the sea. The northern boundary is given eastwards and westwards from [the plain of] MICHMETHATH (el-Makhna?). Eastward it reaches to TAANATH-SHILOH (Tā'na), on to JANOHAN (K'h. Yānān), Ataroth (unidentified), NAARATH ('Ain Sāmīeh?), Jericho and the Jordan; westwards it proceeds from 'Asher of the Michmethath' (see ASHER ii.) east of Shechem southwards to EN-TAPPUAH, and the course of the KANAH (W. Kānah?), and on to the sea (177-9). One of the writers who have contributed to the account just sketched, however, is aware that this representation is somewhat arbitrary (cp above, § 5, i.), and so he proposes (Josh. 169) to give a list of Ephraimite cities beyond the Manassite border. Some editor has unfortunately removed the list. The list of Ephraimite cities, too, that E must have given has been removed.

P's 'genealogy' of Ephraim is not only very meagre

² A. Duff throws out the suggestion that Nahum may have been of northern descent (op. cit. 236 46).
³ מֶשִׁיחַ בֶּן עֲפְרַיִם. See the statements in Pesikta Rabbathi (ed. Friedmann, 161 b).
⁴ Targ. Jon. on Ex. 40 11.

(cp above, § 11) but also somewhat obscure. We have it in two forms: ¹ in Nu. 2635 f and, 12. Genealogies. as reproduced by the Chronicler, in 1 Ch. 720-25.

A study of the variants in G and Pesh. and of the repetitions (noticed by A. C. Hervey)² in MT, leads to the following hypothetical results (reached independently of Hervey; see further JQR vol. 13, Oct. [1900]).

Bered (v. 20) should be deleted as a corruption of BECHER [v. 21], which has strayed hither from the genealogy of Benjamin. Zahad is simply a duplicate of Bered, and Ezer of Elead. The middle letter (sh) of Resheph (v. 25) belongs really to the next name, Telah. What is left—Reph—is a duplicate of Rephab (see below). Thus emended the list stands

- 1. (v. 20) Shuthelah, Tahath, Eleadah.
- 2,3 (v. 21) Tahath, Shuthelah, Elead (or Ezer).
- 3. (v. 25) Shuthelah, Tahan, Ladan.

We have thus simply a triplet written thrice. The third name may be really Eleadah or (so Pesh. in v. 21) Eleazer: Azariah, Klostermann has suggested, may have been the name of Solomon's prefect over Ephraim, perhaps of Beth-boron (cp BEN-HUR); see below, and above, § 9 (end).

The middle name appears here and elsewhere (in the genealogy of Samuel; and in that of Reuel the Midianite) in many forms: Tahath, Tohu, Tahan, Nahath. The last may be what the Chronicler wrote; note the story of the Ephraimites who descended against Gath (תָּהַת 'descend').

The triplet is followed by an appendix—the 'prince' of Ephraim and its great hero.

The Ephraimite clans mentioned in the historical books are few: Nahath or Tahath, Zuph (in one genealogy of Samuel; the first also a 'son of Reuel'; Gen. 36 13 17), Nebat (cp JEROBAM i.). On the story in Gen. 21 b-23 see BERIAH, 2 f.

Between the recurring triplets and the genealogical appendix there is a list of towns: the Beth-horons (see above, § 11) and . . . and Hephher (?), founded perhaps by Eleazar.⁴ In the blank, MT has Uzen-sheerah. Perhaps we should read Ir-serah (cp G^L) or Ir-heres. The degree of probability of the suggestions in § 12 varies. Several seem almost certain.

To the 'genealogical' list are appended two geographical lists: v. 28, a pentad of Ephraimite border towns mentioned in Joshua, with the addition

13. Town Lists. of Ai; and v. 29, a pentad of towns which Manasseh was unable to occupy (= Josh. 17 11 = Judg. 127).

Of other towns that must have been in Ephraim we find mention of MIGRON (Makrān), GIBEAH of Phinehas (Jibā), GIBBEATH-HA-ARALOTH, BAAL-HAZOR. Ramah (er-Rām) was fortified by Baasha against Judah. It has been suggested that Jericho was fortified by Jehu against the Aramæans (JEHU, § 3).

Many of the most famous Ephraimite sanctuaries were in the part of Ephraim that was called BENJAMIN (v. 21, § 6); but the holy mountains EBAL, GERIZIM, and CARMEL must always have had a high place in the regard of Israel. Ramah (Beit-Rimā), Shiloh, Shechem, Ophrah, Timnah-heres, and Samaria must all have had important sanctuaries. We perhaps learn incidentally of the destruction of some unnamed Ephraimite sanctuary in the story of the founding of Dan. H. W. H.

EPHRAIM (עֲפְרַיִם, §§ 100, 107; εφραϊμ [BA], ΓΟΦΡ. [L]), a city near Baal-Hazor (see HAZOR, 2), mentioned in the story of Absalom (2 S. 13 23; see Dr. TBS, ad loc.). Possibly the name should be 'Ephraim, with 'ain for aleph (עֲפֵיִים);⁵ cp G^L, and the place identified with Ephron in 2 Ch. 13 19 (see EPHRON, i. 1). So, cautiously, Buhl (p. 177), who also thinks the same city may be meant (1) in 1 Macc. 11 34 (where the governments of APHEREMA [v. 21], Lydda, and Ramathem are said to have been added to Judæa from Samaria); (2) in Jn. 11 54 (where Jesus is said to have 'withdrawn to the country near the wilderness, to a city called Ephraim' [εφραϊμ, all editors, but NL, Vet. Lat., Vg., Memph. εφραμ]); and (3) in Jos. B/iv. 99

² The Genealogies of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, 361-364 [53].

³ G^L gives the names in line 2 in the same order as in 1 and 3.

⁴ For בֵּיתוֹ שְׂרָאָה וְבֵיתוֹ אֶשֶׁר הָיָה read perhaps בֵּיתוֹ אֶשֶׁר הָיָה or rather בֵּיתוֹ אֶשֶׁר הָיָה.

EPHRAIM, GATE OF

(Bethel and 'Eφραϊμ, two 'small cities' taken by Vespasian).

A village called Efrem is defined by Jerome (OS 947) as being 5 R. m. E. of Bethel; Eus. (222 40) writes the name εφραϊμ (?). We also hear (118 30) of an Eφραϊμ, 20 R. m. N. of Olla. This position agrees well with that of the modern εφραϊμ, which occupies a splendid (and no doubt ancient) site crowning a conical hill on a high ridge 4 m. NE. of Bethel (BR 2 121 427). See OPHRAH.

These identifications, however, are by no means all certain. The site of Baal-hazor, and therefore also of Ephraim in 2 S. l.c., cannot be said to be fixed. Indeed, the reading may perhaps be questioned (for analogies see MAHANAIM); Grätz would read 'in the valley (בְּעֵמֶק) of Rephaim.' The 'city' in Jn. 11 54 also is very doubtful (for different views see Keim, Jesus von Nazara, 37, n. 2). It is even possible that the Greek text is corrupt, and that εφραϊμ arose out of an indistinctly written εφραϊμ.¹ By this hypothesis we can reconnect Jn. with the Synoptic tradition. Keim's remarks (Jesus von Nazara, 37) may be compared with those of Ewald in Gesch. Christus, 416. The 'round-about journey' of which Ewald speaks may be avoided by the view here proposed. There is nothing in the context of Jn. 11 54 to favour the view that the evangelist is at all influenced by Lk.'s statement (9 52 f.) that Jesus took the route by Samaria to Jerusalem. Cp JERICHO. T. K. C.

EPHRAIM, GATE OF (עֶפְרַיִם), 2 K. 14 13 Neh. 8 16. See JERUSALEM.

EPHRAIM, WOOD OF; or (RV) FOREST OF (עֵשׂר עֶפְרַיִם). The scene of the battle between 'the people of Israel' and the 'servants of David' (2 S. 18 6 f.). For 'Ephraim' (εφραϊμ [BA]) ע has μααϊναι 'Mahanaim,' which Klostermann adopts. Certainly it is not very probable that Ephraim should have given its name to 'a wood or jungle on the eastern side' (GASn. HG 335); the reference to Judg. 12 4 implies a doubtful view of that passage (see Moore, ad loc.). 'Mahanaim,' however, has the appearance of an attempt at correction. More probably the original reading was רֶפְחַיִם, 'Rephaim.' Where should we more naturally expect to find this name? The converse error has been pointed out in Is. 17 5 (SBOT, 'Isaiah,' Heb. 195). 'Jungle' (so H. P. Smith) seems hardly the best word (cp Tristram's and Oliphant's descriptions of the forest of Ajlūn). The site cannot be determined without a study of the whole narrative. See MAHANAIM. T. K. C.

EPHRATH (עֶפְרַת), Gen. 48 7†) or Ephrathah (עֶפְרַתָּה, AV Ephrathah; εφραθθα [E^BNAL]).

1. The place near which Rachel died and was buried is called in MT Ephrath (Gen. 35 16 19 48 7); but we should probably read Beeroth (בְּאֵרֹת). See RACHEL, § 2; JOSEPH i. § 3.

2. Another name of BETHLEHEM [g.v., § 3], or perhaps rather a name of the district of Bethlehem, Ps. 132 6 (εφραθα [A] -ρα [R^{vid}]), Mic. 5 1 Ru. 4 11 Josh. 15 59 (only ε, εφραθα [BAL]); ethnic Ephrathite (עֶפְרַתִּי, εφραθαιος [BAL]), Ru. 1 2 1 S. 17 12 (εφραθαι. ον [A]). In Ps. l.c. and Mic. l.c. the reading is uncertain. On 1 S. 1 1 1 K. 11 26 Judg. 12 5, see EPHRAIM i. § 5, i.

3. 'Wife' of Caleb, 1 Ch. 2 19 (εφραθ [BL], φραθ [A]) 24 (see CALEB-EPHRATHAH) 50 4. The passages reflect the post-exilic age, when the Calebites had migrated from the Negeb of Judah to the districts surrounding Jerusalem. Was Ephrath a clan-name? See CALEB, § 3.

¹ The phrase 'the Jews' in Jn. 11 54, as usually in the Fourth Gospel (so Plummer, St. John, 72), means 'the opponents of Jesus among the Jews' (cp Jew). The people of Jericho seem to have been to a large extent friendly to Jesus, and were therefore in so far 'Israelites indeed,' rather than 'Jews.' Strabo, too (162), speaks of the mixed population of Jericho, like that of Galilee and Samaria.

EPICUREANS

EPHRON (עֶפְרֹן, Kt.; עֶפְרֹן, Kr.; εφρων [BAL]).

1. One of the places won by Abijah, king of Judah, from Jeroboam, king of Israel (2 Ch. 13 19 RV, AV EPHRAIM). Since the ending -aim or -ain sometimes interchanges with -on, and since Ephron or Ephraim (RV^{mg}) was near Bethel, some critics identify it with the city of Ephraim (although Ephraim in MT begins with א not ע; see EPHRAIM ii.).

2. Ephron (εφρων [ANV]); cp the Manassite EPHER, 3), a city on the E. of Jordan, between Carnaim and Scythopolis, attacked and destroyed by Judas the Maccabee in his expedition to Gilead (1 Macc. 5 46-53 2 Macc. 12 27 f.; cp Jos. Ant. xii. 85) is probably the γεφρούς or γεφρούν (cp γεφυρούν, 2 Macc. 12 13) of Polybius (v. 70 12). We are told that it lay in a narrow pass which it dominated in such a manner that the Jews 'must needs pass through the midst of it.' This description will not suit Kal'at er-Rabad with which Seetzen identified it, but agrees perfectly with the watch-tower called Kaṣr Wādy el-Ghafr, which completely commands the road at a certain point of the deep Wādy el-Ghafr (W. of Irbid, towards the Wādy el-'Arab), on which see Schumacher, Northern Ajlūn, pp. 179, 181. So first Buhl, Geog. p. 256; Topogr. d. NO Jordanlandes, 17 f. See CAMON, GEPHYRON.

3. MOUNT EPHRON (עֶפְרֹן הַר; εφρων [BAL]), a district on the northern frontier of Judah (Josh. 15 9) between Nephtoah and Kirjath-jearim (cp the Judahite name EPHER, 2). If the latter places are Liftā and Karyat el-Enab respectively, Mt. Ephron should be the range of hills on the W. side of the Wādy Bēt-Hanīnā, opposite Liftā, which is on the E. side (see, however, NEPHTOAH). Conder, however, thinks (in accordance with his identifications of Nephtoah and Kirjath-jearim) of the ridge W. of Bethlehem, and (in Hastings' DB) does not even mention any rival view.

According to MT the district in question had 'cities.' ער is supported by ער [επί κάμπος όρους έφρ.] and apparently by ער^A [όρους έφρ.]; but ער may be a ditogram of ער (Che.); ע^B does not express 'cities.' Two other (probable) mentions of 'mount Ephron' should be noticed. One is in Josh. 15 10 (see JEARIM, MOUNT); the other is Judg. 12 15 (see PIRATHON).

EPHRON (עֶפְרֹן, 'young gazelle'? see EPHER; §§ 68, 77; εφρων [BADEFL]), b. Zohar, a Hittite, the seller of the cave of Machpelah, Gen. 23 8 ff. 25 9 49 29 f. [P]. As to the question in what sense, or with how much justice, he is called a Hittite, see HITTITES, § 1 f.

EPICUREANS (οι επικουρισιοι [Ti. WH]), Acts 17 18. What opinions the Epicureans really held do not now concern us, but only what faithful Jews or Jewish Christians believed them to hold. This is how Josephus describes the Epicureans, — 'who cast providence out of life, and deny that God takes care of human affairs, and hold that the universe is not directed with a view to the continuance of the whole by the blessed and incorruptible Being, but that it is carried along automatically and heedlessly' (Ant. x. 117). Some, both in ancient and in modern times, have thought that the system, thus ungenitly characterized, is referred to in ECCLESIASTES [g.v., § 13]. Jerome remarks (on Eccles. 9 7-9), 'Et hæc, inquit aliquis, loquatur Epicurus, et Aristippus et Cyrenaici et cæteræ pecudes Philosophorum. Ego autem, mecum diligenter retractans, invenio,'¹ etc. According to Jerome, then, the author of Ecclesiastes only mentions the ideas of these 'brutish' philosophers in order to refute them. In later times certainly the leaders of Judaism could find no more reproachful designation for an apostate than the name אפיקורוס Ephikuros. The author of Ecclesiastes, however, is not a sufficiently fervent Jew to justify us in assuming that he would altogether reject Epicurean ideas, if they came before him. A fervent Christian, like Paul, doubtless did reject them, if he ever came into contact with them. Did he, then, encounter these ideas?

EPILEPTIC

From Acts 17:18 (if the narrative is historical) we only learn that certain Epicurean and Stoic philosophers met with him (συνέβαλλον αὐτῷ)¹—observe in passing the precedence given to the Epicureans. There is nothing in the sequel to suggest that he held any conferences with them; the speech beginning 'Men of Athens' ('Ἄνδρες Ἀθηναῖοι') is plainly not intended for them. It looks as if the reference to the philosophers were merely a touch suggested by the writer's imagination, which he did not permit to exercise any influence on the following narrative. That Paul had examined and rejected Epicureanism elsewhere, is probable enough. See ATHENS, § 2, HELLENISM, § 9. T. K. C.

EPISTOLARY LITERATURE

'Letters' and 'Epistles' (§§ 1-3). Letters (§ 6 f.).
Extra-biblical (§ 4). Epistles (§ 8 f.).
OT terms (§ 5). Literature (§ 10).

For the understanding of any document a knowledge of its true character and object is essential. Thus, for example, if Egyptian exploration brings to light a papyrus fragment containing a negotiation between a Roman emperor and an Alexandrian gymnasiarch,² we cannot understand or appreciate it accurately until we know the general character of the writing to which it presumably belonged. If it is a fragment from the record of an actual negotiation in which a Roman emperor took part, it becomes a historical document of first importance; if it is merely a scrap from a work by a writer of fiction, it falls into a wholly different category.

The NT contains a large number of writings which are usually referred to as 'Epistles.' The designation seems so plain and self-evident that to many scholars it has suggested no problem at all. A problem, nevertheless, there is, of great literary and historical interest, underlying this seemingly simple word. We cannot go far in the study of the history of literature before we become aware that alongside of the real 'letter,' which in its essential nature is non-literary, there is a product of art, the literary letter, which may for convenience be called the epistle. The problem is in each case to determine the category to which such writings belong: are they all 'letters'? or are they all 'epistles'? or are both classes represented? First, let us realise the distinction more clearly.

The function of the letter is to maintain intercourse, in writing, between persons who are separated by distance.

Essentially intimate, individual, and personal, the letter is intended exclusively for the eyes of the person (or persons) to whom it is addressed, not for publication. It is non-literary, as a lease, a will, a day-book are non-literary. It differs in no essential particular from a spoken conversation; it might be called an anticipation of telephonic communication. It concerns no one but the writer and the correspondent to whom it is addressed. So far as others are concerned, it is supposed to be secret and sacred.

As with life itself, its contents are infinitely varied. The form also exhibits endless variety, although many forms have specialised themselves in the course of the ages and are not unfrequently met with in civilisations widely separated and seemingly quite independent of each other. Neither contents nor form, however, are the determining factors in deciding whether a given writing is to be considered a letter or not. Equally immaterial is it whether the document be written on clay or on stone, on papyrus or on parchment, on wax or on palm-leaves, on scented note-paper or on an international post-card; whether it be couched in the conventional forms of the period; whether it be written by a prophet or by a beggar; all such considerations leave its special character unaffected.¹ The one essential matter is the purpose it is intended to serve—frank intercourse between distant persons. Every letter, however short and poor, will from its very nature be a fragment of the vie intime of mankind. The non-literary, personal, intimate character of the letter must constantly be borne in mind.

² Cp Grenfell and Hunt, The Oxyrhynchus Papyri, pt. i., p. 62 ff., no. xxxiii. verso [98], with Deissmann's observations in TLZ 23 602 ff. (98).

EPISTOLARY LITERATURE

There is a sharp distinction between the letter as thus understood and the 'literary' letter which we find it convenient to designate by the more technical word 'epistle.' The epistle is a literary form, an expression of the artistic faculty, just as are the drama, the dialogue, the oration. All that it has in common with the letter is its form; in other respects they differ so widely that we might almost resort to paradox and say that the epistle is the exact opposite of the letter. The matter of the epistle is destined for publicity. If the letter is always more or less private and confidential the epistle is meant for the market-place: every one may and ought to read it; the larger the number of the readers, the more completely has it fulfilled its purpose. All that in the letter—address and so forth—is of primary importance, becomes in the epistle ornamental detail, merely added to maintain the illusion of this particular literary form. A real letter is seldom wholly intelligible to us until we know to whom it is addressed and the special circumstances for which it was written. To the understanding of most epistles this is by no means essential. The epistle differs from the letter as the historical play differs from a chapter of actual history, as the carefully composed funeral oration in honour of a king differs from the stammering words of comfort a father speaks to his motherless child, as the Platonic dialogue differs from the unrestrained confidential talk of friend with friend—in a word, as art differs from nature. The one is a product of literary art, the other is a bit of life.

Of course intermediate forms will occur; such as the professed letter, in which the writer is no longer unrestrained, free from self-consciousness in which with some latent feeling that he is a great man, he has the public eye in view and coquettes with the publicity which his words may perhaps attain. Such letters are no letters, and with their artificiality and insincerity exemplify exactly what real letters should never be.

A great variety alike of letters and of epistles has come down to us from antiquity. The survival of a letter is, strictly speaking, non-normal and exceptional. The true letter is from its very nature ephemeral—ephemeral as the hand which wrote it or the eye for which it was meant. It is to piety or to chance that we owe the preservation of such letters. The practice of collecting the written remains of great men after their death is indeed an old one.

In Greek literature, the earliest instance of publication of such a collection is held to be that of the letters of Aristotle (ob. 322 B.C.), which was made soon after his death. Whether the still extant *Letters of Aristotle*² contain any fragments of the genuine collection is indeed a question. On the other hand the letters of Isocrates (ob. 338 B.C.) which have come down³ to us are probably genuine in part; and we have also genuine letters of Epicurus (ob. 270 B.C.), among them the fragment of a perfectly charming little note to his child,⁴ worthy to be compared with Luther's letter to his little boy Hänschen.⁵ Among the Romans it will be enough to refer to the multitude of letters of Cicero (ob. 43 B.C.) of which four collections, brought together and published after his death, have come down to us.

As compared with such letters of famous men a value in some respects still greater attaches to the numerous letters of obscure men and women, dating from the third century B.C. to the eighth A.D., which have become known to us through recent papyrus finds in Egypt.¹ They have, to begin with, the inestimable advantage that the originals themselves have reached us. Nor is this all. The writers had absolutely no thought of publication, so we may take it that their self-portraiture is wholly unconscious and sincere. The light they throw upon the essence and the form of the letter in ancient times² is important, and is of value in the investigation of the letters found in the OT or the NT.

That ancient epistles have survived in large numbers is not surprising. The literary epistle is not intended to be ephemeral. From the outset it is published in several copies and so has less chance of disappearing than the private letter. The epistle, moreover, is a comparatively easy form of literary effort. It is subject to no severe laws of style or strict rules of prosody; all that the essay needs is to be fitted with the requisite formulæ of the letter and to be provided with an address. Any dabbler could write an epistle, and thus the epistle became one of the favourite forms of literature, and remains so even at the present day.

Among ancient 'Epistolographers' we have, for example, Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Plutarch in Greek, and L. Annaeus Seneca and the younger Pliny in Roman, literature, not to speak of the poetical epistles of a Lucilius, a Horace, or an Ovid.

Specially common was the epistle in the literature of magic and religion.

Another fact of literary history requires notice here: the rise of pseudonymous epistolography. In the early period of the empire, especially, epistles under names other than those of the real authors were written in great numbers, not by impostors, but by unknown literati who for various honest reasons did not care to give their own names.³ They wrote 'Epistles' of Plato and Demosthenes, Aristotle and Alexander, Cicero and Brutus; it would be perverse to brand offhand as frauds such products of a certainly not very original literary activity. Absolute forgeries undoubtedly there were; but it is equally certain that the majority of the 'pseudonymous' epistles of antiquity are products of a widely spread, and in itself inoffensive, literary custom.⁴

We now come to the question whether the biblical 'epistles' admit of being separated into the two distinct classes just mentioned.

The immense masses of cuneiform writing which have recently been brought to light abundantly show that

5. OT terms. epistolary correspondence was extensively practised by the people using that script from very early times. It is not surprising, therefore, to find frequent mention of letters in the OT.

The Hebrew terms so rendered are (1): סֵפֶר, sēpher, 2 S. 11 14 2 K. 5 5 Jer. 29 1; in Is. 37 14 30 1, where MT gives סֵפֶרִים, the text is corrupt (see SBOT, 'Isaiah,' Heb.); 'letters' = סֵפֶרִים sēphārim, 1 K. 21 8 Esth. 1 22, etc.

(2) סֵפֶרֶת, silgām, Esth. 1 20 (see Meyer, Entst. 23); in Bibl. Aram. Ezra 4 17 5 7 Dan. 4 14 [17], etc.

(3) מִשְׁלֹחִין, mislōwān, Ezra 4 7 7 11 (see Meyer, op. cit. 22); in Bibl. Aram. Ezra 4 18, etc.

(4) אִגְרֵת, 'iggrēth, Neh. 2 7 Esth. 9 26, etc. (see Meyer, op. cit. 22); in Bibl. Aram. אִגְרֵת, Ezra 4 8 11 56.

¹ A selection of such papyrus-letters will be found in Deissmann, Bib.-stud., 209-216.

² There is thus a promise of good results in the theme proposed for its prize essay by the Heidelberg Faculty of Philosophy in 1898-99: 'On the basis of a chronological survey of the Greek private letters which have been brought to light in recent papyrus finds, to characterise and set forth historically the forms of the Greek epistolary style.'

³ Cp Deissmann, Bib.-stud. 199 ff.

⁴ A well-known modern instance is that of the famous 'Letters of Junius.'

The Ass. terms for 'letter' are duppu (tablet; cp Syr. dappā), whence dupšarru (Heb. דַּפְשָׁר, 'scribe,' and egirtu (cp no. 4 above). In Am. Tab. 50 rev. 30 šupāru 'message' or 'missive' is virtually duppu 'letter' (rev. 17). This suggests that sēpher (see 7) may be a loan-word; cp SCRIBE. In Θ , besides ἐπιστολή, we find βιβλίον (2 S. 11 14), βιβλος (Jer. 29 1), ρήσις (Ezra 6 7), διάταγμα (Ezra 7 11), φορολόγος (Ezra 4 18), and γράμμα; cp Acts 28 21 (pl.).

Special interest attaches to the cases in which the actual text of the letters is professedly given, as in

6. OT letters. 2 S. 11 15 (David's letter to Joab about Uriah), 1 K. 21 9 ff. (Jezebel to the elders about Naboth), 2 K. 5 5 ff. (king of Aram to king of Israel), 2 K. 10 2 ff. 6 (Jehu to the authorities of Samaria).

On the letter of Jeremiah in Jer. 29, see JEREMIAH ii.; on that of Elijah in 2 Chr. 21 12-15, see JEHORAM, 2; on the official letters in Ezra 4 9 ff. 17 ff. 5 7 ff., see EZRA, ii., § 6; and on the letter of Nebuchadrezzar in Dan. 4, see DANIEL ii.

Many instances occur also in the apocryphal and pseudepigraphic books of the OT, especially in Maccabees. In the last-named books in particular, we find, exactly as in Greek and Roman literature,¹ letters, mostly official, embodied word for word in the historical narrative. It would be wrong to cast doubt on the genuineness of such insertions on this ground alone. In many cases, it is true, they are in all likelihood spurious (cp MACCABEES, FIRST, § 10); but in some instances we are constrained to accept them. The decision must rest in each case on internal evidence alone.

Turning now to the NT, we find in Acts two letters which, like those in Maccabees, are introduced

7. NT letters. into a professedly historical narrative: the letter of the apostles and elders to the Gentile Christian brethren in Antioch, Syria, and Cilicia (15 23-29), and that of Claudius Lysias to Felix (23 26-30). The question of their genuineness must be decided by the same rules of criticism as apply to the cases mentioned in the preceding section (see, for example, COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 16 f.). In both cases the documents, at any rate, claim to be true letters.

Turning next to the other writings which frankly bear the designation epistolæ in the NT, we must again bear in mind the distinction already established between 'letters' and 'epistles.' It is accordingly not enough if we are able merely to establish the existence of a group of epistolæ; the question as to their definite character remains. The answer must be supplied in each case by the writing itself. In some cases not much reading between the lines is necessary for this; and even in those cases where the answer is not quite obvious, it is, for the most part, possible to arrive at something more than a mere non liquet.

(a) To begin with, the Epistle to PHILEMON stands out unmistakably as a letter, and it is as a self-revelation of the great apostle that it possesses a unique value for all time. If (as seems very probable) Rom. 16 is to be taken as being in reality a separate letter, addressed by Paul to Ephesus, it also is an unmistakable example of that class of writing.

(b) PHILIPPIANS also is a true letter; it becomes intelligible only when referred to a perfectly definite and unique epistolary situation. The same remark applies to THESSALONIANS, GALATIANS, COLOSSIANS (and EPHESIANS). They are indeed more didactic and general than those previously mentioned; but they too are missives occasioned by perfectly definite needs of the Pauline churches, not fugitive pieces composed for Christendom at large, or even for publicity in a still larger sense of the word. To the same class in like manner belong the first and the second extant epistles to the CORINTHIANS. What is it in fact that makes 2 Corinthians everywhere so difficult? It is that it is throughout a true letter, full of allusions to which we, for the most part, have not the key. Paul wrote it with all his personality; in deep emotion and thankfulness, and yet full of reforming passion, of irony, and of stinging frankness. 1 Corinthians is quieter in tone; but it too is a real letter, being in part, at least, an answer to one from the Church of Corinth.¹

(c) In the case of ROMANS, one might perhaps at first hesitate to pronounce. Its character as a letter is undeniably much less conspicuously marked, much less palpable, than in the case of 2 Corinthians. Still, neither is it an epistle written for the public, nor for Christendom at large, designed to set forth in compendious form the apostle's dogmatic and ethical system. In it Paul has a definite object—to prepare the way for his visit to the church in Rome; such is his aim in writing, and it is that of an individual letter-writer. He does not yet know the church to which he writes, and he himself is known to it only by hearsay. The letter, therefore, from the nature of the case, cannot be so full of personal detail as those he wrote to communities with which he had long been familiar, such as Corinth and Philippi. Our first impression of Romans, perhaps, may be that it is an epistle; but this judgment will not stand scrutiny.

We need not hesitate longer then, to lay down the broad thesis that all the Pauline epistles hitherto enumerated (the genuineness of none of them is doubted by the present writer) are real letters.² Paul is a true letter-writer, not an 'epistolographer.' Nor yet is he a man of letters. His letters became literary products only after the piety of the churches had made a collection of them and had multiplied copies indefinitely till they had become accessible to all Christendom. At a later date still they became Holy Scripture when they were received into the 'New' Testament, then in process of formation. As an integral part of the New Testament they have exercised a literary influence that is incalculable. All these later vicissitudes, however, cannot alter their original and essential character. Paul, who with ardent longings expected the coming of the Lord, and with it the final judgment and the life of the coming age—Paul, who reckoned the future of this present world, not by millennia or centuries, but by a few short years, had not the faintest surmise of the part his letters were destined to play in the providential ordering of the world. It is precisely in this untrammelled freedom that the chief value of his letters consists; their absolute trustworthiness and supremely authoritative character as historical records, are guaranteed thereby. The letters of Paul are the (alas, only too fragmentary) remains of what would have been the immediate records of his mission. Each one of them is a piece of his biography; in many passages we feel that the writer has dipped his pen in his own heart's blood.

(d) Two other real letters in the NT remain to be mentioned—the SECOND and the THIRD EPISTLE OF JOHN.³ Of 3 John we may say with Wilamowitz-Moellendorf, 'It was a quite private note, and must have been preserved from the papers of Gaius as a relic of the great presbyter.' 2 John does not present so many of the features of a letter in detail; but it also has a particular object in view just as a letter has, even if we do not find ourselves able to say with complete confidence who the 'lady' addressed may have been—whether a church or some distinguished individual Christian. That the letter was addressed to the Church at large seems hardly admissible. Both writings are in point of form interesting, as in many respects clearly exhibiting the ancient epistolary style of their period.

No instance of an epistle is met with in the canonical books of the OT; but we have several in the Apocrypha and the Pseudepigrapha. i. The most instructive example is undoubtedly the (Greek) Epistle of Jeremiah, appended to Lamentations (so in 6).¹

8. Apocryphal Epistles. or to Baruch (in Vg. as Baruch 6). This short composition, which certainly was originally written in Greek,² contains a warning against idolatry, which is held up to scorn and refuted by every kind of argument. A comparison of this epistle with the genuine letter of Jeremiah (Jer. 29) to the Jews in Babylon furnishes an excellent illustration of the difference between a letter and an epistle.

In the Greek epistle we observe that the address is adventitious, and that 'Jeremiah' has been chosen as a covering name merely at the pleasure of the undoubtedly Alexandrian author. This by no means constitutes a 'forgery'; the author is simply availing himself of a generally current literary artifice. His intention is to put his co-religionists on their guard against idolatry and he therefore makes Jeremiah the speaker. Five hundred years after the lifetime of Jeremiah³ it could not occur to any one to suppose that the writer was seeking to represent himself as editor of a newly discovered writing of the ancient prophet.

ii. Another epistle in the category now under consideration is the (Greek) Epistle of Aristeas, which contains the well-known legend as to the origin of the LXX version; it also was the work of an Alexandrian of the time of the Ptolemies.⁴ iii. The Epistle of Baruch to the nine and a half tribes in exile (appended to the Apocalypse of Baruch) also ought to be mentioned here—unless indeed we are to regard it (which is quite possible) as a Christian writing.⁵ iv. Finally, that epistolography was a favourite form of literary activity with Grecian Jews is shown perhaps by the 28th 'Epistle of Diogenes,'⁶ and by some of the epistles that pass current under the name of Heraclitus.⁷

We can define certain writings in the NT as epistles with just as great security as we have been able to call

9. NT Epistles. the writings of Paul real letters. Most clearly of all do the so-called 'catholic' epistles of JAMES, PETER, and JUDE belong to this category.

That they cannot be real letters is evident from the outset by their addresses; a letter to the 'twelve tribes scattered abroad' could not be forwarded as a letter. The author of the epistle of James writes after the manner of the Epistle of Baruch (see above, § 8, iii.) addressed 'to the nine and a half tribes, which were across the Euphrates.' In both cases it is an ideal 'catholic' circle of readers that the authors have in view; each dispatched his επιστολή not, as we may presume Paul to have dispatched the letter to the Philippians, in a single copy, but in many.

The Epistle of James is essentially a piece of literature, an occasional writing intended for all Christendom—an epistle. In accord with this are its entire contents: nothing of that detail of unique situations which meets us in the letters of Paul; nothing but purely general questions such as, for the most part, might be still conceivable in the ecclesiastical problems of the present day. So with the Epistles of Peter and Jude. They too bear purely ideal addresses; all that they have of the nature of a letter is the form.

At this point we find ourselves standing at the very beginning of Christian literature in the strict sense of that word. The problem of the 'genuineness' of these epistles becomes from this point of view much less important than it would undoubtedly be on the assumption of their being letters. In them the personality of the writer falls entirely into the background. It is a great cause that addresses itself to us, not a clearly distinguishable personality as in the letters of Paul.

Whether we know with certainty the name of the author of each of these epistles is of no decisive importance for our understanding of them. In this connection it deserves to be noticed that the longest of all the NT epistles, that to the Hebrews, has come down to us without any name at all, and even its address has disappeared. Indeed, were it not for the word ἐπέστειλα ('I have written a letter') in 13²² and a few slight touches of epistolary detail in 13^{23 f.}, it would never occur to us to call the writing an epistle at all. It might equally well be a discourse or an essay; its own designation of itself is λόγος τῆς παρακλήσεως ('a word of exhortation,' 13²²); all that seems epistolary in its character is manifestly only ornament, and the essential nature of the whole is not changed though part of the ornament may have fallen away.

The so-called First Epistle of JOHN has none of the specific character of an epistle, and still less is it a letter. Though classified among the epistles it would be more appropriately described as a religious tract in which a series of religious meditations designed for publicity are somewhat loosely strung together.

The so-called pastoral epistles to TIMOTHY and TITUS are in their present form certainly epistles. It is probable, however, as already indicated (above, col. 1327, u. 2), that some portions of them are derived from genuine letters of Paul. As we now have them they are manifestly designed to lay down principles of law for the Church in process of consolidation, and thus they mark the beginnings of a literature of ecclesiastical law.

To speak strictly, the APOCALYPSE of John also is an epistle; the address and salutation are obvious in 1⁴, and 22²¹ constitutes a fitting close for an epistle. This epistle in turn contains at the beginning seven smaller missives addressed to seven churches of Asia—Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, Laodicea. These also are no real letters such as we might suppose to have been actually sent to each of the churches named and to have been afterwards brought together into a single collection. On the contrary, they are all of them constructed with great art on a uniform plan, and are intended to be read and laid to heart by all the churches, not only by that named in the address of each. They seem to the present writer to represent a somewhat different kind of epistle from any we have been considering. Their writer has definite ends in view as regards each of the individual churches; but he wishes at the same time to produce an effect in the Christian world as a whole, or at any rate on that of Asia. In spite of the intimate character they formally possess, they serve a public literary purpose, and therefore ought to be classed among the epistles, rather than among the letters, of ancient Christianity.

In judging the numerous epistolæ which have been handed down in the Christian church outside of, or later in date than, the NT canon, it is equally necessary to settle in each case the question whether the writing ought to be classed as an epistle or a letter; but this investigation lies beyond the limits of the present work.

2. A name in the genealogy of Joseph (Lk. 3²⁸; ἠρ [Ti. WH]); see GENEALOGIES II. § 3.

ERAN (עֲרָן, § 77), the Eranites (עֲרָנִיָּם), an Ephraimite clan, in the one case individualised, in the other regarded as a tribal group, Nu. 26³⁶. The name reminds us of the Judahite ER (see above); but in the parallel Ephraimite list, 1 Ch. 7²⁰⁻²⁷, it is ELADAH (הַעֲרָדָה, v. 20), of which another form is LADAN (הַעֲרָדָה, v. 26).

Probably the list in Nu. 26 originally had neither 'Ērān nor El'ādāh, but La'dān, and we should read עֲרָן and עֲרָנִיָּה. See further, EPHRAIM, § 12.

The initial ה in עֲרָן may have been mistaken for a preposition, just as in 1 Ch. 28⁷⁻⁹, עֲרָן has εδαν for עֲרָן throughout. The 7 is vouched for by Sam. Pesh. עֲרָן, and also by עֲרָן (εδεν, δ εδεν[ε]) [BAFL], cp Gen. 46²⁰ (εδעμ [AD], -ωμ [L]; om. MT).

Ladan is doubtless shortened from Elad(d)an (הַעֲרָדָה; cp עֲרָנִיָּה). S. A. C.

ERASTUS (εραστός [Ti. WH]), 'the treasurer (οἰκονομός) of the city [of Corinth]'¹ (Rom. 16²³; cp 2 Tim. 4²⁰), is probably mentioned as one of those that 'ministered' to Paul (Acts 19²²) and as having been sent by him with Timothy from Ephesus on some errand into Macedonia. This combination of passages, however, is plausible only if Rom. 16 was originally a letter to the church of Ephesus.

ERECH (עֲרַךְ, אֲרַח [ADEL], ARACH, classical Ὀρχη, Ass. Arku, Uruk) is named in Gen. 10¹⁰ as one of the four cities originally founded by Nimrod in Babylonia. The explorations of Loftus (Travels in Chaldea and Susiana, 162 ff.) established its site at the mod. Warka, halfway between Hilla and Korna. The enormous mounds and ruins scattered over an area six miles in circuit testified to a large population in ancient times; but the discoveries did little to restore the history of the city. The earliest inscriptions recovered were those of Dungi, Ur-Bau, and Gudea, kings of Ur (which lay 30 m. SW.). The next in date were those of Singašid and another, kings of Erech as an independent state. Erech was then capital of the kingdom of Aninanu. The later kings of Babylon (Merodach-baladan) also left traces of their buildings and restorations. Many commercial documents of all periods down to 200 B. C. attest the continuous prosperity of the city. As if to make up for the lack of historical documents furnished by the site itself, we have perpetual reference to the place in the Assyrian and Babylonian literature. No place had a greater hold on the affection and imagination of the literati. The author of the Creation Tablets (non-Semitic version) ascribes its foundation to the god Marduk. It is the theatre of the Gilgameš or Nimrod epic (see DELUGE, § 2). Its poetical names (3 R. 41¹⁵ ff.) show how often it was the theme of story and legend. Some of them—e.g., the 'enclosure' (suburu), 'the seven districts'—seem justified by its ruins. Surrounded completely by a wall, intersected by many canals, flanked by two large streams, and probably then, as now, almost inaccessible for most of the year, it was a secure refuge. Later in its history—perhaps in Assyrian times, certainly in the Parthian period—it became a sort of national necropolis.

The city deity was the goddess Nanā, whose statue had such strange vicissitudes (see NANEĀ). During her absence a goddess, Ištar, whose temple was Ē-ulmaš, seems to have taken her place. Continual reference is made to Uruk even by Assyrian kings (KB i. and ii., passim). Their correspondence (Harper, ABL. passim), when fully published, will throw much light on the city life of Uruk during the Sargonid period. At present it would be premature to attempt to write its municipal history. C. H. W. J.

1. Early History. 'Ašur has given a brother'), son and successor of Sennacherib on the throne of Assyria (2 K. 1937; Is. 3738, ἈσΟΡΔΑΝ [O], ΝΑΧ, [N^QQ^m], ἈCOP. [N^cQ^{*}]). His brother Ašur-nādin-šum, who had been made king of Babylon by Sennacherib, was carried away captive after a reign of six years by Hallušu king of Elam 694 B.C. (KB 2278). Ardi-Bēlit was then regarded as crown-prince (mār karri) in Nineveh, as appears from a contract tablet dated Sept.-Oct. 694 B.C. For another son, Ašur-munik, Sennacherib built a palace in the suburbs of Nineveh (see ADAMMELECH, 2). The so-called 'Will of Sennacherib' (3 R. 16, No. 3) records some rich gifts to Esarhaddon and the wish that his name should be changed to Ašur-edil-ukin-apla (Ašur-the-hero has established the son). In the Hebrew notice of Sennacherib's murder, two sons of Sennacherib, named ADAMMELECH (2, q. v.) and SHAREZER (1, q. v.), are referred to, occasioning a historical difficulty, which is dealt with elsewhere. The expressions of the Babylonian Chronicle have led some to think that Esarhaddon himself was the parricide² (Edwards, The Witness of Assyria, 149). It is certainly singular that in no inscription set up in Assyria (yet published) does Esarhaddon refer to the event. On the stele found at Samalla, however, he distinctly calls himself the 'avenger of the father who begat him' (mutir gimilli abi aliđišu).³ Sennacherib died on the 20th of Tebētu, B.C. 682, and Esarhaddon was crowned on the 28th of Adar, B.C. 682-1.

The chief sources for the history of Esarhaddon's reign are his cylinders (KB 2120 ff.). The opening paragraph of the broken prism (KB 2141 f.) has usually been taken to refer to his struggle with his brother for the throne. It is a very fragmentary account, as remarkable for its gaps and omissions as for its information. From it we learn that, presumably early in his reign, Esarhaddon, who was evidently away from Nineveh, was called to face a formidable foe. He could not take all his troops with him. The march was made 'hastily and under difficulty' in the winter-month of Šabātu. His enemy met him at Hanirabbat and was signally defeated. That it was a fight for the throne is clear from the fact that the enemy said of their leader, 'This is our king.'

On a more or less plausible combination of this account with the biblical data it has been asserted that Esarhaddon was in command of an expedition to Armenia. The time of year is against this supposition. Hanirabbat was near Malatya, and therefore a great distance from both Nineveh and Armenia (see map in KB 2 and in vol. 1. of this work between cols. 352 and 353). If Esarhaddon had left the bulk of his forces behind on the confines of Armenia it is not easy to see how the rebels could have escaped thither. Winckler (GBA 259) argues better that Esarhaddon was in Babylon at the time of his father's death.⁴ The Babylonian Chronicle states that on the 2nd of Adar the revolt in Nineveh was at an end. This gives six weeks for Esarhaddon's receipt of the news and march to Nineveh. On his arrival the regicides and their party must have retreated and, doubtless with reinforcements, he pursued them at once. They made their stand at Hanirabbat, and on their defeat escaped to Armenia. Esarhaddon seems then to have returned to Nineveh and ascended the throne on the 28th of Adar (682-1 B.C.), about eight months after the murder of his father.

Esarhaddon's residence in Babylon before his accession may account for his friendly treatment of the fallen capital. He made good the damage caused by SENNACHERIB [q. v.], brought back the gods, and reoccupied the city. During the reign of Merodach-baladan Chaldean supporters of that king had dispossessed the native Babylonians; after Babylon had been rendered helpless, the Chaldeans continued to encroach. Esarhaddon expelled the Chaldeans from the neighbourhood of Babylon and Borsippa, and crippled their power.

This policy of restoration extended to Erech. At Nineveh too, the king built a great palace (cp Layard, Nin. and Bab. 634); also palaces at Kalaḥ and Tarbisī, the last for his son Ašur-bāni-pal (1 R. 48, Nos. 4 and 5; KB 2150; cp Lay. op. cit. 19). Throughout Assyria and Mesopotamia he rebuilt some thirty temples.

It was perhaps due to this antiquarian taste, so strongly developed in his son Ašur-bāni-pal, that Esarhaddon, first of the Sargonids, lays claim to ancient royal lineage. He calls himself the descendant of Bēl-bani, son of Adasi, king of Assyria, and offspring of Ašur (KB 2120, n. 1).

As a fighting king Esarhaddon was not behind any of his race. At the very beginning of his reign he was threatened by the Gimirrai (see GOMER, 1). His oft-mentioned requests to the sun-god Šamaš (Knutzton, Gebete, 72-264) mention his fears of Kastarit of Karkassi, Mamiti-arsu the Mede, the Mannai (see MINNI), and other branches or forerunners of the great Manda horde. The peril culminated in an actual invasion of Assyria by the Gimirrai, who were, however, defeated before the fourth year of this reign (KB 2282). The next year was a busy one. An expedition penetrated the Arabian desert, conquering eight rulers in the districts of Bazū and Ḥazū (cp BUZ, 1; HAZO). Sidon having revolted was taken and destroyed, a new city Kar-Esarhaddon being built to overshadow it. The king of Sidon, Abdi-Milkuti, and Sanduarri a Cilician prince who had sided with him, were captured and beheaded.

Following up this success, the Assyrian king received the submission of all Syria and Palestine. Of the vassal kings who then paid him homage Esarhaddon has left us a very important list (KB 2148). Among them are Baal king of Tyre, and MANASSEH [q. v.], king of the city of Judah. The terms of the agreement between Esarhaddon and Baal king of Tyre are recorded on the tablet K. 3500 from which Hommel gives some extracts (AHT 196; the full text is now given by Winckler, AOF 210). These events occurred in 677-6 B.C. The Chronicler also tells us of a colonisation of Samaria by Esarhaddon, Ezra 42 (Ἀσραεθων [B], -ραδδων [A], ναχορδαν [L]); but the accuracy of this statement has been questioned (see SAMARIA, SAMARITANS). Being now in full possession of the route to Egypt, Esarhaddon made a reconnaissance of it in 675 B.C. He returned next year to the attack. In 672 B.C. he lost his queen and seems to have remained a year or more at home. In 670 B.C., leaving the government in the hands of his mother,¹ he departed for a supreme struggle with Egypt, in which he was completely victorious (see EGYPT, § 66). As a 'hard lord' he ruled over the Egyptians,² garrisoning some cities with Assyrian troops, and in others installing native dependent rulers. He returned home by way of Samalla, where he set up the stele mentioned above.

Esarhaddon was not allowed to rest long. A revolt broke out in Egypt, and he set out to repress it. However, he never saw Egypt again. On the way he fell ill and died; it was on Araḥsamna (November; see MONTH, §§ 3 5) the 10th, 669 B.C. (not, as usually stated, 668). He divided his kingdom, giving Ašur-bāni-pal Assyria and the Empire, but making Šamaš-šum-ukin king of Babylon under him. A third son, Ašur-mukin-palāa, was raised to the high-priesthood; the youngest, Ašur-edil-šamē-u-eršitim, was made priest of Sin at Harran. Another son, Sin-iddin-aplu, seems to have died before his father. We find the names of a daughter, Šerūa-ētirat, and a sister, Matti.

The name of Esarhaddon's mother is best read Nakia,

which is rendered in Assyrian by Zakutu, and seems to be Hebrew, 'the pure one.' She survived her son, and on his death issued a proclamation to the Empire, demanding its allegiance to the princes Ašur-bāni-pal and Samaš-šum-ukin.¹

C. H. W. J.

ESAU (אֶשָׂו; ΗΣΑΥ [BAL]).

1. A popular etymology, which may, however, be correct, is suggested in Gen. 2525 (J): 'And the first came out tawny, all over like a hairy mantle; and his name was called Esau.'

1. Name.

As Budde (Urgesch. 217, n. 2, incorrectly reported by Di.) has pointed out, 'tawny' (אֶשָׂו, admōni)² cannot have been the original word. Budde's own conjecture, however (that it displaced some rare word meaning 'hairy') is not probable. It may have arisen out of תאומים, 'twins', which intruded from the margin where it stood as a correction of תאומים (v. 24). Miswritten as תאומים, it would be easily changed into אֶשָׂו (as וְיָ and נָ are frequently confounded); cp v. 30.

We must assume a root אָשָׂה, 'to have thick hair,'³ and regard אָשָׂה the shaggy, as the equivalent of Seir 'the hairy' (אֶשָׂו = אֶשָׂו, Gen. 27 11), which appears to have been regarded by J as a synonym for hunter (Gen. 2525, cp v. 27). In this, as in the former case, J really appears to have hit upon a sound interpretation. It seems impossible to show that the mountain district of Seir (whether E. or even W. of the Arābāh) was 'hairy' in the sense of 'wooded,' nor would the sense 'wooded' accord with the gloomy oracle of Isaac. The probability is that Esau and Seir are names of a hunter-god;⁴ and though the hero Usōos in Philo of Byblus (Eus. Praep. Ev. i. 107) may conceivably be simply the personification of Ušū (Palætyrus),⁵ it seems more probable, since his brother Samemrmos is a divine hero of culture, that Usōos represents a hunter-god,⁶ after whom the city of Ušū was named. Certainly Philo of Byblus describes Usōos as entering into conflict with wild beasts, though also as the first who ventured on the sea (as if a personification of Old Tyre). However this may be, Esau never displaced Edom as the Hebrew name for the people of Mount Seir. The phrase 'sons of Esau' is found only in late writers (Dt. 24 Obad. 18); 'Esau the father of Edom' (Gen. 36 943) also is late (see Holzinger's analysis).

The early traditions on Esau are given in Gen. 2521-34 27 1-45 31 1-22 33 1-17; these belong to JE.

2. Traditions.

The editor has done his best to cull the finest parts from both J and E. At the beginning he depends solely on J, unless we may assume with Dillmann and Bacon (Genesis, 152) that the admōni ('tawny') of Gen. 2525 (see above) was taken by the editor from E, who, however, surely knew and had to account for the name Esau. The foreshadowing which JE gives of the differences of national fortunes (cp Mal. 12f.) and national character in the story of the two tribal ancestors is most effective. That

² This verse gives J's explanation of the name Edom. 'Let me quickly eat some of that ēdom, for I am faint; therefore his name was called ēdom. For אֶדוֹם אֶדוֹם read אֶדוֹם אֶדוֹם; cp Ar. idām, 'a by-dish, as vegetables, etc.' So T. D. Anderson, with the assent of Dillmann.

⁵ See HOSAH, and cp note in ZATW, 1897, p. 189. The present article, including the above view, is of older date than that note. The writer has since found that the identification of Ušū belongs to Prášek, and that Halévy has already connected Usōos and Ušū, though in conjunction with the improbable theory that Ušū = the אֶשָׂו of the Talmud, which he identifies with Umm el 'Awamid (see HAMMON, 1). Enough remains to justify the writer's claim to have advanced the investigation by a new suggestion.

the two brothers strove in the womb is a purely etymological myth (see JACOB, § 1); Edom is an independent people when tradition first brings it into contact with Israel. That the older people was gradually eclipsed by the younger, however, and that nevertheless the older people at length achieved its liberation, are facts which agree exactly with the legend. How naturally, too, and with what regard to primitive sentiment, that legend (cp ISAAC, § 5) is told! Of conscious purpose on the narrator's part there is not a trace. It seems as if by a kind of fate the course of future history were prescribed by the forefathers, who in their blessings and cursings discharged divine functions.¹

That writers like J and E, who have infused so much of the pure prophetic religion into the traditional material, should not be without traces of primitive superstition, will startle only those who are fettered by an abstract supernaturalism. J and E unhesitatingly believe that by his blessing or his curse a father may determine the fate of his children; at any rate the forefathers of Israel could do this. These writers certainly mean us to regard the oracles in Gen. 2728f. and 30f. (which are imaginative reproductions of what Isaac would be likely to have said) as creating history. The latter oracle has often been misunderstood. It should run thus, 'Surely, far from fruitful ground shall be thy dwelling, and untouched by the dew of the heaven above; by thy sword shalt thou live, and thou shalt serve thy brother; but when thou shalt revolt, thou shalt shake off his yoke from thy neck.' For another view of the blessing (shared by Vg. and AV) see EDOM, § 5.

Most readers sympathise more with Esau than with Jacob. This may perhaps be to some extent in accordance with the wishes of the narrators. Surely J and E must have condemned the fraud practised by Jacob at his mother's bidding upon his aged father. Whether they would have condemned Jacob's shiftiness (apart from the special circumstances) as immoral, may, however, be doubted. The later prophets, it is true, denounce shiftiness in no measured terms;² but the contemporaries of J and E were not so far from the old nomadic period, and not so open to new moral ideas, as to do the same (see Che. Aids, 35). To them the quiet, cautious, calculating character of Jacob seemed to be more praiseworthy than the careless, unassuming, good-natured, passionate character of Esau; Jacob, they said, 'was a blameless⁴ man (אָם), dwelling in tents' (Gen. 2527 [J]). What P thought of these stories does not appear; he confines his attention to Esau's marriages (Gen. 2634 f. [cp 27 46 (R)], 286-9), and to geographical and statistical information respecting the Edomites (chap. 36; but how much is P's, is uncertain).

The author of the Epistle to the Hebrews presents Esau as the type of a 'profane' person, on the ground that he sacrificed his birthright 'for one mess of food' (Heb. 12 16). He addresses Hebrews who were tempted to barter their privileges in the church for the external satisfactions of the temple services. As a matter of fact, however, it is only J who makes Esau willingly resign his birthright; E apparently knows only the second of the two accounts of the loss of the πρωτοτόκια. It is obvious that J despises Esau for his conduct (see 25 34 in the Hebrew). To him Esau represents Edom. To the later Jews Esau becomes the symbol of the heathen world (see a striking Haggada in Weber, Jüd. Theol. 401).

2. 1. Esd. 5 29 (אָשָׂו [BA]). See ZIHA, 1. T. K. C.

¹ See BLESSINGS AND CURSINGS. Robertson Smith points out that Jacob, when seeking the paternal benediction, wears the skins of sacrificial animals. His father is a quasi-divine being. So the priests in Egypt wore the skins of sacred animals (cp LEOPARD), and several examples of this can be indicated within the Semitic field (Rel. Sem. [2] 437; cp 467). The antique flavour of the narrative in Genesis now becomes much more perceptible. (Sayce has already connected the dress of Jacob with the 'robe of goat's skin, the sacred dress of the Babylonian priests,' Hibb. Lect. '87, p. 285). See DRESS, § 8.

² For the impossible Hebrew read תָּחַר, of which another corruption is תָּחַר ('Book of Jubilees,' JQR 6 734). It may be added that תָּחַר in Hos. 12 1, תָּחַר in Jer. 23 1, and תָּחַר in Ps. 55 3 are also demonstrably due to corruption.

⁴ Or, harmless (innocent of acts of violence). It was said of Esau, 'By thy sword shalt thou live.' אָם may have begun to acquire a specialized sense in popular use. In Job 9 22 אָם and אָשָׂו are opposed.

A. HEBREW OLD TESTAMENT.

In studying a great religion the inquirer naturally seeks to trace an organic connection between its central conceptions and the most remote portions of its system. He expects to find a certain degree of logical coherence between all its parts. In dealing with such religions as Christianity, Mohammedanism, or Buddhism, his expectations are not disappointed. In these religions the eschatology or teaching on the final condition of man and of the world follows in the main from the fundamental doctrines. The early religion of Israel, however, must not be approached with such an expectation. There is an organic connection between its theology and that portion of its eschatology which deals with the nation as a whole; but this connection does not extend to the eschatology concerning the individual.

I. THE INDIVIDUAL.—The ideas about the future life which prevailed in the earliest times and were current indeed in some degree down to the second century B.C., were in many respects common to Israel and to some other Semitic nations. They were not the outcome of any revelation. They were survivals. With these antique elements advancing thought was at strife centuries before it succeeded in completely expelling them and in furnishing in their stead a doctrine of the future life in harmony with its own character. Such a doctrine, though foreshadowed in the earlier literature, was not definitely taught till the fourth century B.C.

The antique elements belong in all probability to the system of belief and practice known as ancestor worship.

2. Ancestor worship. At first this phase of religion dominated to a great degree the life of the Israelite. The religion of Yahwé, however, as it developed, engaged with it in irreconcilable strife. Still, for several centuries, many of those primitive tenets and usages were left unaffected. Early Yahwism had no distinctive eschatology regarding the problem of the individual; it concerned itself only with the nation. The individual, accordingly, was left to his hereditary beliefs, which, as we have said, were connected with ancestor worship.¹

In this system the departed were not regarded as in a full sense dead. They shared in all the vicissitudes of their posterity, and possessed superhuman powers to benefit or injure. With a view to propitiating these powers the living offered sacrifices. The vitality of the dead was thus preserved, and their honour in the next world upheld. A man made sacrifice naturally only to his own ancestors; these with their living descendants formed one family.

That such beliefs prevailed in Israel is shown by customs observed with regard to the dead.² The mourning usages have a religious, not merely a psychological significance. They indicate reverence for the dead and a confession of dependence upon them.

1. The mourner girt himself with sackcloth (2 S. 331 1 K. 2031 Is. 324 153 2212 Jer. 626), or laid it on his loins (Gen. 3734 Jer. 4837). This practice expresses submission to a superior; it is thus that the servants of Benhadad go forth from Aphek to Ahab (1 K. 2031 f.).

2. The mourner put off his shoes (2 S. 1530 Ezek. 2417). This is explained by the removal of the shoes required in approaching holy places (Ex. 35 f. Josh. 515).

3. Mourners cut off the hair (Is. 2212 Jer. 729 Am. 810 Mic. 116 Ezek. 7182731), or the beard (Jer. 415), or both (Is. 152 Jer. 4837); and made baldness between the eyes (Dt. 141 f.). The hair was designed as an offering to the dead (see CUTTINGS OF THE FLESH, § 3, and SACRIFICE). These rites are condemned as idolatrous in Dt. 141 f.; but they are mentioned by the prophets of the eighth century without any consciousness of their impropriety (cp Am. 810 Mic. 116 Is. 152 2212). They appear still to have been the universal custom (Jer. 415).

4. Mourners made cuttings in their flesh for the dead. Such incisions were regarded as making 'an enduring covenant with the dead' (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 322 f.). They were made by the priests of Baal (1 K. 1828). They were forbidden by the Hebrew law (Dt. 141 Lev. 1928) on the same grounds as in the case of 3.

² See Stade, GVI 1387 ff.; Schwally, op. cit. 9-16.

5. The covering of the beard by the mourners (2 S. 15 30 Esth. 6 12 Jer. 14 3) is probably to be regarded as a substitute for cutting off the hair; similarly the covering of the beard represents its removal (Ezek. 24 17). This practice expresses reverence for the dead. The same custom was observed by the worshipper in approaching God (cp the case of Elijah at Horeb), and is universal in the synagogue and the mosque at the present day.

6. The mourner offered sacrifices to the dead (Ezek. 24 17 22 2 Cb. 16 14 21 19). They are probably implied in Is. 8 19 19 3; for when a man wished to consult the dead, he would naturally present an offering. Their object is clear from Dt. 26 14 Jer. 18 7; it was to give sustenance to the dead and to win their favour. In later times they came to be regarded as mere funeral feasts. This had not come about in the second century B.C., however; for sacrifices to the dead appear to be commended in Eccles. 7 33 ('For a dead man withhold not a gift' [ἐπι νεκρῶ μὴ ἀποκαλύψης χάριον]) and in Tob. 4 17 ('Pour out thy bread on the burial of the just'), though they are derided in Eccles. 30 18 f. Ep. Jer. 31 f. Wisd. 14 15 19 3 Or. Sibyl. 8 382 ff. In Jubilees 22 17 they are referred to as prevailing among the Gentiles.

The tērāphim mentioned in Gen. 35 were household gods.¹ They are called 'strange gods,' and their worship is regarded as incompatible with that of Yahwè. Their sacred character appears from their being buried under a sacred tree, the terebinth. An earlier mention is in Gen. 31 19 30-35, where Rachel steals the tērāphim of her father. In Ex. 21 2-6 we have another passage attesting their worship. According to this section there was in private houses a god close to the door, to which the slave who desired enrolment in his master's family had to be brought. Originally this meant admission to the family cult with all its obligations and privileges (see statement of Eliezer's position below, § 5). Later the tērāphim, which were of human form (1 S. 19 13), were regarded as images of Yahwè (cp Judg. 17 5, and 18 17 ff.; see also 1 S. 19 13-16); for it is difficult to believe that David, the champion of the religion of Yahwè, would have worshipped the tērāphim in their original character as household gods. In Hos. 3 4 and Zech. 10 2, however, they seem to retain their original character as images of ancestors (cp TERAPHIM).

4. By the worship of Tērāphim.

In Dt. 15 12-18 the rite of initiation mentioned in Ex. 21 is, by the omission of the term 'god,' robbed of all its primitive religious significance, and given a wholly secular character.

It is ancestor worship that explains the importance of male offspring. The honour and wellbeing of the dead depended on the worship rendered and the sacrifices offered by their male descendants. Even in the after life, therefore, men could be punished by the destruction of their posterity (Ex. 20 5 34 7 Nu. 14 18 Dt. 5 9); for the sacrifices then ceased to be made.² If a man failed to have male offspring, the difficulty could be surmounted by adoption. The adopted man passed from his own clan to that of his adopted father, and thereby took upon himself all the obligations attaching to the latter. Even a slave could be so adopted (see FAMILY, § 2). Eliezer is regarded as Abraham's heir in default of male issue (Gen. 15 2 f.). It is to be presumed that he had already been adopted into the family cult. The right of inheritance is thus derived in principle from ancestor worship; only the son and heir could fulfil its rites (see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 18). Illegitimate sons, therefore, could not inherit (Stade, GIV 1 391); their mother had not been admitted by marriage into the cult (cp Judg. 11 2).

5. By importance of male offspring.

In Nu. 36 the law has already undergone a change. A daughter is allowed to inherit if she has married a man belonging to her father's family or tribe. In Athens, on the other hand, the property descended to the next male heir; but he was obliged to marry the daughter of the deceased (Stade, ib.).

¹ On Stade's and Schwally's identification of the tērāphim with an ancestor image (accepted by Budde on Judg. 17 5, Holzinger on Gen. 31 19, Nowack on Hos. 3 4, etc.), see TERAPHIM.

² On the same principle a man destroyed his enemy and all his sons with the object of depriving him of respect and worship in the lower world.

It is thus clear that the living and the dead formed one family, and the departed participated in all the vicissitudes of their living descendants. Rachel in her grave shared in the troubles of her children in northern Israel (Jer. 31 15).

The necessity of a son who should perform the family ancestor worship gave birth to the levirate law. A man must marry the childless widow of his deceased brother. Where the deceased had no brother, the duty fell on the nearest male relation. The firstborn son of such a marriage was registered as the son of the deceased, who was thus scoured the respect and the sacrifices which could be rendered only by a son legitimately begotten or adopted. This law appears to be assumed as in force in Gen. 38 26; but its significance is forgotten in Dt. 25 5-10. According to old Israelitish views, Tamar fulfilled a duty of piety towards her dead husband (Stade 1 394); similarly Ruth. Even the daughters of Lot may have had the same end in view.

6. By levirate law and nature of clan.

The fact that, even in David's time, the clan constituted a sacramentally united corporation (1 S. 20 29) points back to an earlier worship of ancestors.

The customs just considered (§§ 3-6) regulate the conduct of the living. We have now to consider more directly the beliefs regarding the dead themselves, their place of abode and the nature of their existence there. These beliefs are no less essentially connected with ancestor worship; but they had a much more extended lease of life. Long after the practices we have described had become unintelligible or sunk into complete abeyance, the beliefs flourished in the high places of Judaism; they claimed the adherence of no small portion of the priesthood down to the destruction of the temple by Titus.

7. Beliefs about the dead.

As in the religions of Greece and Rome, burial was held to be indispensable to the comfort of the departed. It was hardly ever withheld. Criminals who were hanged (Dt. 21 2 f.) or stoned (Josh. 7 24-26), and suicides (Jos. Bell. Jud. iii. 8 5), were accorded burial; as were even the most hostile of foes (Ezek. 39 12).

8. Importance of burial.

Of the calamities that could befall a man the lack of burial was one of the most grievous.

Such was the sentence of punishment pronounced on Jezebel (2 K. 9 10). It was the fate that awaited the enemies of Yahwè (Jer. 25 33). Even the materialistic writer of Ecclesiastes (6 3), if the text is correct, regards such a misfortune as outweighing a whole lifetime of material blessings.¹

This horror at the thought of being unburied cannot be explained in the same way as in the religions of Greece and Rome, where it involved exclusion from Hades: according to Hebrew views all without exception descended to Shēōl. It may be explained on two grounds. (1) In earlier times unless the dead had received burial no sacrifice could be offered to them. The grave, in ancestor worship, was in some measure the temple. (2) In later times, when such conceptions were forgotten, to be deprived of burial entailed a lasting dishonour and subjected the dead in Shēōl to unending reproach (Ezek. 28 10 32 21).

Not simply burial, however, but also burial in the family grave, was the desire of every Israelite. Hence the frequent statement that a man was gathered to his fathers (Gen. 15 15 Judg. 2 10) or to his people (Gen. 49 29-33 Nu. 27 13). The departed must be introduced into the society of his ancestors. In the earliest times the abode of this society was conceived to be the family grave or its immediate neighbourhood. Everyone wished to be buried with his father and mother

(2 S. 17²³ 19³⁷ [38]). Jacob and Joseph are said to have directed that their bodies should be carried back to Canaan to be buried in the family grave (Gen. 47³⁰ 50²⁵ Ex. 13¹⁹). This was originally in the house. It was there, e.g., that Samuel was buried (1 S. 25¹); similarly Joab (1 K. 2³⁴). As no family stood in isolation, however, but was closely united with others, and as these together made up the clan or tribe, and these tribes in due time were consolidated into the nation, a new conception arose; all the graves of the tribe or nation were regarded as united in one. It was this new conception that received the designation of Shēōl.

In all probability, therefore, the Hebrew Shēōl was originally conceived as a combination of the graves of the clan or nation, and thus as its final abode. In due course this conception was naturally extended till it embraced the departed of all nations, and became the final abode of all mankind. It has already reached this stage in Ezek. 32 Is. 14 Job 30²³. Strictly regarded, the conceptions of an abode of the dead in the grave and of one in Shēōl are mutually exclusive. Being popular notions, however, they do not admit of scientific definition, and their characteristics are treated at times as interchangeable. The family grave, with its associations of ancestor worship, is of course the older conception. As burial in the family grave enabled a man to join the circle of his ancestors, so burial with honour was a condition of his attaining an honourable place in Shēōl—i.e., joining his people there. Otherwise he is thrust into the lowest and outermost parts of the pit (Ezek. 32²³). When, however, Shēōl is said to have distinct divisions (Prov. 7²⁷), the statement may be merely poetical.

Regarding the condition of the dead in Shēōl (on which see below, §§ 15-18) it will here be sufficient to point out two main characteristics.

(a) In early times (and down to the fourth century B.C. there was little change!) Shēōl was quite independent of Yahwè and outside the sphere of his rule.

Yahwè was originally the god of the tribe or nation, and his sway for long after the settlement in Canaan was conceived to extend, not to the whole upper world, much less to the lower (Shēōl), but only to his own people and land. The persistence of this conception of Shēōl for several centuries side by side with the monotheistic conception of Yahwè as creator and ruler of the world is, for the Western mind, hard to understand, the conceptions being mutually exclusive. It is clear, however, that Israel believed that when a man died he was removed from the jurisdiction of Yahwè (Ps. 88⁵ [6] 31²² [23]), and relations between them ceased (Is. 38¹⁸).

(b) As independent of Yahwè, Shēōl knew nothing of the moral distinctions that prevailed on earth.

According to the OT death means an end of the earthly life, not the cessation of all existence: the person still subsists. As the nature of this

12. 'Soul,' continued existence depends on the OT 'blood,' theory of man's composite personality, it will be necessary at this point to make a study of that theory. In its most primitive form it regards man as consisting of two elements, 'soul' (nephesh) and 'body' (bāšār). What was thought of the body does not concern us here (see, however, § 18).

Regarding the soul we may note four points.

1. The soul is identified with the blood.

As the shedding of blood caused death, the 'soul' was conceived to be in the blood (Lev. 17^{11 a}), or it was actually identified with it (Dt. 12²³ Gen. 9^{4 f.}). Hence men avoided eating blood; they offered it to God. Hence, too, blood unjustly spilt on the earth—the 'soul'—cried to heaven for vengeance (Gen. 4¹⁰).

Again, since the 'soul' was the blood and the central seat of the blood was the heart, the heart was regarded as the organ of thought. A man without intelligence was a 'heartless man' (Hos. 7¹¹); when a man thought, he was said to 'speak in his heart.' Thought is not ascribed directly to the 'soul,' however, though a certain limited intelligence is.

2. To the 'soul' are attributed not only purely animal functions such as hunger (Prov. 10³), thirst

13. Feeling. (Prov. 25²⁵), sexual desire (Jer. 2²⁴), but also psychical affections such as love (Is. 42¹), joy (Ps. 86⁴), fear (Is. 15⁴), trust (Ps. 57^{1 [2]}), hate (Is. 1¹⁴), contempt (Ezek. 36⁵).¹ To it are ascribed also wish and desire (Gen. 23⁸ 2 K. 9¹⁵ 1 Ch. 28⁹), and likewise, but very rarely, memory (Lam. 3²⁰ Dt. 4⁹) and knowledge (Ps. 139¹⁴). As the seat of feeling and desire (and, in a limited degree, of intelligence) it becomes an expression for the individual conscious life. Thus 'my soul' (נַפְשִׁי) means 'I,' 'thy soul' means 'thou,' etc. (Hos. 9⁴ Ps. 32³ [3] 72³ [3] 11¹).

So 'many souls' means so many 'persons' (Gen. 46¹⁸ Ex. 15). This designation of the personality by 'soul' (nephesh) shows how meagre a conception of personality prevailed in Israel. רֹמִי ('my spirit') was never so used in the OT.

3. The soul leaves the body in death (Gen. 35¹⁸ 1 K. 17²¹ 2 S. 19 Jn. 4³), not necessarily immediately,

14. Soul but (apparently) at least on the appearance of corruption. In certain cases, after outward death the soul was regarded as still in some sense either in or near the body; a dead person was called a nephesh (Lev. 19²⁸ 21¹ 22⁴ Nu. 9⁶ 7¹⁰ Hag. 2¹³) or a dead nephesh (נַפְשׁוֹת; Nu. 66 Lev. 21¹¹).

4. The soul therefore also dies. Its death, however, is not absolute. Moreover, we must note the

15. Its condition prevalence in Israel of two inconsistent views—a fact (not hitherto fully brought to light)² that has forced its recognition on the present writer in the course of the present study—(a) an older view, which attributes to the departed a certain degree of knowledge and power in reference to the living and their affairs; (b) a later view, which denies this.³

(a) According to the older view the departed possessed a certain degree of self-consciousness and the power of speech and movement (Is. 14); a large iii.); acquaintance with the affairs of their living descendants and a keen interest in their fortunes—this Rachel mourns from her grave for her captive children (Jer. 31¹⁵);—ability to forecast the future (whence they were consulted about it by the living; 1 S. 28¹³⁻²⁰ [where observe that the dead person invoked is called Elōhīm] Is. 8¹⁹ 29⁴); whence the practice of incubation⁴ (Is. 65⁴). As we have already seen that the departed were believed to have the power of helping or injuring their descendants (see § 2), we need only observe here that it follows from Is. 63¹⁶ that Abraham and Israel were conceived as protectors (see Cheyne and Duhm, etc., in loc.).

The relations and customs of earth were reproduced in Shēōl.

The prophet was distinguished by his mantle (1 S. 28¹⁴), kings by their crowns and thrones (Is. 14), the uncircumcised by his foreskin (Ezek. 32). Each nation preserved its individuality and no doubt its national garb and customs (Ezek. 32). Those slain with the sword bore for ever the tokens of a violent death (Ezek. 32²⁵), as likewise those who died from grief (Gen. 42³⁸). Indeed the departed were regarded as possessing exactly the same features as marked them at the moment of death. We can appreciate, accordingly, the terrible significance of David's

¹ These are so essentially affections of the 'soul' that they are hardly ever attributed to the 'spirit' (רוּחַ); yet see § 19.
² Only Stade appears to have apprehended the fact, and that but partially—as far as we may judge from his published works.

³ It follows logically from the doctrine of man's nature, unknown in pre-prophetic times, which is set forth in Gen. 2⁷; see below, § 16.

departing counsel to Solomon touching Joab; 'Let not his hoar head go down to She'ol in peace' (1 K. 26).

In many respects the view just sketched is identical with that which underlies ancestor worship. This worship had withdrawn entirely into the background before the prophetic period; but, as we have said (§ 7), many of its presuppositions maintained themselves in the popular belief till late in the post-exilic period. The most significant fact to observe is the comparatively large measure of life, movement, knowledge, and power attributed to the departed in She'ol. How important this is becomes obvious when the earlier view is contrasted with the later and antagonistic view.

(b) The later view follows logically from the account in Gen. 24b-3, according to which it was when animated by the 'spirit' that the material form

17. Later view became a living 'soul': the life of the 'soul' is due to the presence of the 'spirit,' death ensues on its removal.¹ Death, however, even here does not imply annihilation, though it logically should imply it: the 'soul' still subsists in some sense. The subsistence, however, is purely shadowy and negative: all the faculties are suspended.

She'ol, the abode of the shades, is thus almost a synonym for abandon or destruction (Job 26 6 Prov. 15 11). In opposition to the older view that in She'ol there is a certain degree of life, movement, and remembrance, the later view teaches that it is the land of forgetfulness (Ps. 88 12), of silence (Ps. 94 17 115 17), of destruction (Job 26 6 28 22); in opposition to the belief that the dead return to counsel the living, the later teaches that the dead cannot return (Job 7 9 14 12); in opposition to the belief that they are acquainted with the affairs of their living descendants, the later teaches that they no longer know what befalls on earth (Job 14 21); in opposition to the belief in their superhuman knowledge of the future—as the 'knowing ones'—the later teaches that all knowledge has forsaken them (Eccles. 9 5) that they have neither device nor knowledge nor wisdom (Eccles. 9 10). Whereas the older view permitted their being invoked as 'Elohim,' the later view regards them as 'dead ones' (מתים) (Is. 26 14 Ps. 88 10 [11]).² See DEAD, § 2.

Finally the relations of the upper world appear to be reproduced, if at all, more faintly; the inhabitants of She'ol, king and slave, oppressor and oppressed, good and bad, are all buried in a profound sleep (Job 3 14-19). All existence seems to be at an end.

Thus we read in Ps. 39 13, 'O spare me, that I may recover strength, before I go hence, and be no more'; and in Job 14 7 10, 'There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again—but—man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?'³

5. Though in death the 'soul' leaves the body and departs, the departed in She'ol are never designated simply 'souls.'⁴ The early Israelites were

18. Shadowy body. metaphysically unable to conceive the body without psychological functions, or the soul without a certain corporeity. The departed were conceived, accordingly, as possessing not only a soul but also a shadowy body. This appears in the use of the term 'shades' (רֶפְהַיִּים), which was current in all ages (see REPHAIM i.). Elohim, the title by which in earlier times the shades were addressed, passed out of use. In later times, when such a doctrine of man's being as that underlying Gen. 24b-3, became current,

² The term 'shades' רֶפְהַיִּים (used also in the Phœnician religion) was applied to the departed in both systems; but possibly with a difference (contrast Is. 14 9 26 14 19 with Ps. 88 10 [11] Prov. 2 18 9 18 etc., where it is synonymous with the dead).

³ It will be observed that the currency of the later view is attested by the second Isaiah, by Ezekiel, Job, and Ecclesiastes. In these books the teaching in Gen. 24b-3 has reached its logical consequence. That teaching is implied in Is. 42 5 Ezek. 37 9 ff. Job 27 38 4, Eccles. 12 7 'the spirit shall return to God who gave it' (yet it is doubtful if this verse belongs to the text; cp 32).

the epithet 'dead ones' was employed. To designate 'the dead' simply 'souls' without any qualification would hardly have been possible; according to the later view, souls in She'ol were bereft of all their natural psychical functions.

The Hebrew writers speak, however, of a 'spirit' as well as of נ 'soul,' and we must consider briefly the relation of the terms to each other.

19. Spirit: Originally they were synonyms meaning 'breath' or 'wind.' The primitive conception was arrived at by observation.

earlier view: When the breath—i.e., the nēphesh or rūāh—left the body, the body died. The nēphesh or rūāh was, therefore, regarded as the principle of life. As Stade has remarked (GVV⁽⁹⁾ 1419), rūāh probably designated specially the stronger and stormier emotions: the custom of personifying the psychical affections generally as nēphesh, once introduced, led to the practice of naming the stronger expressions of this personification rūāh. Thus anger is an affection of the rūāh (Judg. 8 3, see below). So long as a man was wholly master of his powers, he possessed his rūāh; but when he became lost in amazement (1 K. 10 5) or despair (Josh. 2 11), or when he fainted (1 S. 30 12 Judg. 15 19), his rūāh left him. On his reviving it returned (Gen. 45 27).

In keeping with this view of the 'spirit' (rūāh) it is said to be the subject of trouble (Gen. 41 8), anguish (Job 7 11), grief (Gen. 26 35 Is. 54 6), contrition (Ps. 51 17 [19] Is. 66 2), heaviness (Is. 61 3). It is the seat of energetic volition and action—the 'haughty spirit' (Prov. 16 18), the 'lowly spirit' (29 23), the impetuous spirit (Prov. 14 29), etc.

As its departure entails a paralysis of voluntary power (see above) the rūāh expresses the impulse of the will (Ex. 35 21). The purposes of man are '... of the rūāh' מַעֲלֵוֹת רִיחַ (Ezek. 11 5); the false prophets follow their own 'spirit,' rather than that of Yahwē (Ezek. 13 3); God 'tries' men's 'spirits' (Prov. 16 2). 'Rūāh' seems also to express character,—the result of will—in Nu. 14 24, 'Caleb . . . had another "spirit" with him.' By this development in the application of the term rūāh it has become the seat of man's highest spiritual functions.

To sum up: 'soul' and 'spirit' are at this early stage identical in essence and origin; the distinction is one of function.

(b) This primitive view was in part superseded by a later doctrine (later from the point of view of the genesis of ideas), taught in Gen. 24b-3.¹

The most complete story of the creation of man² represents that Yahwē Elohim formed man of earth from the ground, and blew into his nostrils 'breath' (nēshāmā) of

20. Spirit: life (נְשָׁמַת חַיִּים) so that man became a living later view: 'soul' (nēphesh), Gen. 2 7. The nēshāmā of man a 2 7 is called rūāh (רוּחַ חַיִּים) in 6 17 7 15. There are therefore in man three elements: trichotomy. 'soul' (nēphesh), 'body' (bāsar), and 'spirit' or rūāh (רוּחַ), which last, in the later theory, is simply that which gives life to the 'soul.'³ This 'spirit' of life (רוּחַ חַיִּים) is in the lower creation as well (Gen. 6 17 7 15 22 Ps. 104 30), and by virtue of it they too become living 'souls.'

According to the story worked up by a late priestly writer (Gen. 1 24) the brute creation is only indirectly the product of divine creation; whereas man is so directly. Angels, however, are never, either in the canonical or in the apocryphal books, said to have 'souls,' though occasionally the term is used in regard to God: he swears by his 'soul' (Am. 6 8; cp Is. 42 1 Lev. 26 11 30 cp below, § 63). In the account of the relation of 'soul' to 'body' and 'spirit,' in Gen. 2 f. the 'spirit' has become quite distinct from the 'soul' in essence and origin. It is the divine element in man. According to the older view the difference was one of function, hardly of essence, certainly not of origin. Now 'spirit' is the life-giving power in the body. When it enters the material form the man becomes a living soul. Without rūāḥ there is no life (Hab. 2 19). In death the 'soul,' robbed of every vital function, descends into Shēōl and practically ceases to exist. The 'spirit' (rūāḥ) never dies; it merely leaves the body and returns to God who gave it (P's. 146 4 Eccles. 12 7).¹ Of this view the logical result is the scepticism of Ecclesiastes and of the Sadducees.

¹ [Into the historical relation of this doctrine to the Hebrew conceptions of CREATION (q.v.) we cannot here enter at length. It cannot be denied that the statement in Gen. 2 7 is of early origin. That remains a fact, even if the narrative in Gen. 2 4b-3 has passed through more than one literary phase. Critics are of opinion, however, that the myth of creation utilized for didactic purposes in that narrative was not very widely spread among the Israelites, and that the religious ideas attached to the myth but slowly became operative in the popular mind.]

We have found that the Israelite derived from the circle of ideas underlying ancestor worship his views as to the nature of 'soul' and 'spirit,' and of Shēōl and the condition of the departed there. On these questions no light was thrown for many centuries by anything distinctive of the religion of Yahwē, which had originally no eschatology of its own relating to the individual. Looking back, however, on the far-off days of the origins of the religion of Yahwē, we can see that the beliefs connected with ancestor worship were doomed to extinction by their inconsistency with that religion, though centuries had to elapse before the doom was fully accomplished.

The preparation for a higher doctrine of the future life was made essentially when a new value came to be set on the individual. The early 22. No individual retribution.

Israelite was not alarmed by the prosperity of the wicked man or the calamities of the righteous: Yahwē was supposed to concern himself only with the well-being of the people as a whole, not with that of its individual members. It seemed natural and reasonable that he should visit the virtues and vices of the fathers on the children (Ex. 20 5 Lev. 20 5 Josh. 7 24 1 S. 3 13), of an individual on his community or tribe (Gen. 12 17 20 18 Ex. 12 29). Indeed, in postponing the punishment of the sinner till after death and allowing it to fall on his son,² Yahwē showed his mercy (1 K. 11 22 21 29).

Towards the close of the kingdom of Judah, the popular sentiment expressed itself in the proverb, 'The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge' (Jer. 31 29). Explicitly this denied the responsibility of the people for the overthrow of the nation—a view that naturally paralysed all personal effort after righteousness and made men the victims of despair. Implicitly it expressed, not a humble submission to the divine judgments, but rather an arraignment of the divine method of government.

In opposition to this popular statement Jeremiah answered as follows:—'In those days they shall no more say, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge; but every one shall die for his own iniquity' (Jer. 31 29 f.). At an earlier date the same prophet had delivered a divine oracle of a very different import, 'I will cause them to be tossed to and fro among all the kingdoms of the earth, because of Manasseh the son of Hezekiah' (Jer. 15 4). The new departure in his teaching recorded in the later passage is to be explained by the 'new covenant' described in Jer. 31 31-34 (see COVENANT, § 6 (v.)). Jeremiah foresaw a new relation between Yahwē and his worshippers—a relation determined by two great facts: man's incapacity to reform himself, and God's repugnance to any but a spiritual worship (see JEREMIAH I., § 4).

Jeremiah's idea was further developed by Ezekiel. Every soul is God's and is in direct and immediate relation to him (Ezek. 18 4). If the individual is faithful in this relation, he is unaffected by his own past (18 21-28), or by the sins or the righteousness of his fathers (18 20 21 30). Righteousness raises him above the sweep of the dooms that befall the sinful individual or the sinful nation.¹ Since the achievement of this righteousness is possible for him, he possesses moral freedom, and his destiny is the shaping of his own will (18 30 f.). There is, therefore, a strictly individual retribution, and the outward lot of the individual is exactly proportioned to his moral deserts.

This doctrine rooted itself firmly in the national consciousness. It is taught and applied in detail in those great popular handbooks, the Psalter and the Book of Proverbs. Though the righteous may have many afflictions, Yahwē delivers him out of them all; all his bones are kept, not one of them is broken; but evil slays the wicked (Ps. 34 18 [19] f., see also 37 28 etc.). The righteous and the wicked are to be recompensed on earth (Prov. 11 31). Life is the outcome of righteousness; death, of wickedness (Prov. 22 1 f. 10 2 11 19 15 24 f. 19 16 etc.).

Such a doctrine was, naturally, a continual stumbling-block to the righteous when trouble came. Doubts as to its truth were freely expressed, notably in the Psalms. Nor was it to the sufferer alone that this difficult view was an impediment. The doctrine of an adequate retribution in this life blocked the way that led to a true solution of the problem of prosperity and adversity. Indeed it denied the existence of any problem to solve; the righteous as such could not suffer. As long as this was regarded as the orthodox doctrine, the doctrine of a future life could not emerge, and progress was impossible.

It was only some of the elements in Ezekiel's teaching that were sanctioned by subsequent religious thought; others were opposed. It is his undying merit that he asserted the independent worth of the individual; but he fell into two errors. He taught (a) that the individual suffers not for the sins of his fathers, but for his own, and (b) that the individual's experiences are in perfect keeping with his deserts. In other words, sin and suffering, righteousness and wellbeing are, according to Ezekiel, always connected; the outward lot of the individual is God's judgment in concrete form.²

Now as regards a, the experience of the nation must have run counter to this statement. It was evident that the elements in a man's lot which lie outside the sphere of his volition are shaped for better or for worse in accordance with the merits or demerits of his father and people. The older view accordingly continues to be attested in Jewish literature (see Ps. 109 13 Eccles. 23 25 40 15 41 6, and especially Dan. 9 7 f., Judith 7 28, Tob. 3 3, Ass. Mos. 3 5, Baruch 1 18-21 2 26 3 8, Apoc. Bar. 77 3 4 10): it is freely acknowledged that men are punished for the sins of their fathers and brethren.

Ezekiel's second error (b), that the individual's experience agrees with his deserts, is the corollary of a. It gave birth to a long controversy, of which two notable memorials have come down to us in Job and Ecclesiastes. Eccles. is much the later; but we will for convenience sake deal with it first.

Against the statement (b) that the experience of the individual is in perfect keeping with his deserts, the writer of Ecclesiastes enters a decided negative. He declares, in fact, that there is no retribution at all.³

He asserts that sometimes evil prolongs a man's days, and righteousness curtails them (7 15); that the destinies of the wise man and of the fool (2 14), of the righteous and the wicked (9 2) are identical; that the wicked attain to the honour of burial, whilst this is often denied to the righteous (8 10). If any one

¹ That there is an inconsistency between Ezek. 9 3-6 and 21 3 f. cannot, however, be denied.

² Both a and b seemed to Ezekiel to follow logically from God's righteousness, and rightly, if there was no retribution beyond the grave.

14 12-20). Righteousness raises him above the sweep of the dooms that befall the sinful individual or the sinful nation.¹ Since the achievement of this righteousness is possible for him, he possesses moral freedom, and his destiny is the shaping of his own will (18 30 f.). complains of the shallowness of Ecclesiastes,¹ is not Ezekiel on the opposite side equally shallow?

In the book of Job the principal elements of Ezekiel's teaching reappear. The doctrines of man's individual 27. Of Job. worth and of a strictly individual retribution, however, are shown to be really irreconcilable (see JOB, BOOK OF, §§ 5-8). Conscious in the highest degree of his own worth and rectitude, Job claims that God should deal with him in accordance with his deserts. Like his contemporaries his belief is (for Job and the author of the dialogues may be identified) that every event that befalls a man reflects God's disposition towards him; misfortune betokens God's anger, prosperity his favour. This belief, however, is not confirmed by the fortunes of other men (21:1-15), and, with the added insight derived from a sad personal experience, Job concludes that, as the world is governed, righteousness may even be awarded the meed of wickedness. Faith, in order to be sure of its own reality, claims its attestation by the outward judgments of God, and Job's faith receives no such attestation. Still it does not entirely give way; from the God of circumstance, of outer providence, Job appeals to the God of faith (by Job, as we have said, we mean the author).

The fact that Job does not seek to solve the problem by taking into his argument the idea of a future life, shows that this idea or belief had not yet won acceptance among the religious thinkers of Israel. The main views and conclusions of Job, however, point in that direction. The emphasis laid on man's individual worth, with his consequent claims upon a righteous God—claims which are during life entirely unsatisfied—should lead to the conclusion that at some future time all these wrongs will be righted by the God of faith. Such a conclusion, however, is never explicitly drawn.

The poem of Job cannot be said to teach the doctrine of a future life. Still, the idea seems for a moment to have gleamed on Job's mind, and the fancy expressed in 14:13f. became the accepted doctrine of later times. If the Hebrew text of 19:25-29 is sound, perhaps there also Sheôl is conceived as only an intermediate place. At any rate Job declares in this great passage that God will appear for his vindication, and that at some time after his death he will enjoy the divine vision face to face. It is not indeed stated that this vision will endure beyond the moment of Job's justification by God. Nevertheless the importance of the spiritual advance here made cannot be exaggerated. The soul is no longer regarded as cut off from God and shorn of all its powers by death, but as still capable of the highest spiritual activities though without the body. A belief in the continuance of this higher life is certainly in the line of many of Job's reasonings. On the other hand, if Job had not merely wished but also been convinced that this idea was sound, would it have been possible for him to ignore such an all-important conviction throughout the rest of the book? There are likewise textual difficulties, which recent critics have considered to justify a very radical treatment of the text.

The words rendered in RV 'And after my skin hath been thus destroyed, yet from my flesh shall I see God,'² are specially doubted. RVmg. gives two alternative marginal renderings for the first part of this passage, and for 'from my flesh' suggests the widely different rendering 'without my flesh,' which is that generally adopted by those scholars who adhere to MT. Cp Dillmann ad loc., and, on the other side, JOB, § 6.

[Siegfried (Job, SBOT, Heb.) looks upon v. 25f. as 'a later gloss, in which the resurrection of the just is regarded as a possibility, contrary to the opinion put forth in the Book of Job with regard to Sheôl (ib. 3 etc.).' The result, however, is not satisfactory. Siegfried appeals to Φ ; but we have a right to suspect theological glosses in the Alexandrian Jewish version.

Something different must have stood where our present v. 25f. stands, and it is the work of the textual critic to trace its relics. See also Budde, ad loc., and Che.'s criticism, Expos., 1897a, p. 410f.]

In spite of this criticism it is true to say that this great poem suggests the doctrine of a future life. Later students may or may not have found it in 1:13-15 19:25-29; but in any case the rest of the book presents the antinomies of the present so forcibly that thinkers who assimilated its contents could not avoid taking up a definite attitude towards the 'higher theology.' Some made a venture of faith, and postulated the doctrine of a future life; others, like the writer of Ecclesiastes, made the 'great refusal' and fell back on unbelief and materialism. We have arrived at the parting of the ways.¹

It remains to consider whether there is evidence of a belief in the immortality of the individual in the Psalter.

29. In the Psalms. It is unfortunate that the text of this book should be so far from accurate as (from textual criticism) it appears to be. The psalms that chiefly have to be considered are 16, 17, 49, and 73. Here we find one of the most recent critics receding from his original conclusion (in favour of the existence of the hope of immortality), on the ground that 'a searching textual revision' is adverse to it. As regards the first two, at any rate, of the psalms just referred to, the evidence, even if we assume the trustworthiness of all that the unemended text contains, is inadequate to prove the point.

In Ps. 16 there is nothing that necessarily relates to an individual future life. The psalm appears to express the fears and hopes, not of the individual, but of the community.

30. In Pss. In Ps. 17 likewise the Psalmist speaks not as an individual (cp the plurals, v. 7, 11), but as the mouthpiece of the Jewish people, who are to Yahweh as the apple of the eye (v. 8); in fear of a foreign invader (v. 9-13) the Psalmist prays for help. This being so, however, instead of 'I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness,' we should expect some reference to God's help. In any case the context does not admit of a reference to a future life.²

In Ps. 49 the present text admits of two interpretations. In v. 14 [15]f. the speaker announces speedy destruction for the

31. In Ps. 49. wicked but complete redemption from death for himself; but who is the speaker? Does the 'I' here denote the Psalmist as a representative pious Israelite, or the righteous community? In favour of the collective meaning it is argued that those for whom the Psalmist speaks are the righteous poor who are oppressed by the wicked rich; that v. 10 [11] states that 'all die, alike the wise man (i.e., the righteous) and the fool'; and that when the individual is undoubtedly intended (v. 16 [17]) he is addressed as 'thou.' The escape from death is therefore, on this interpretation, that of the righteous community.³ On the other hand, it seems to be in favour of a reference to immortality that, as Cheyne has pointed out, Sheôl appears in v. 14 [15] as a place of punishment for the wicked rich.⁴ As such it could never become the abode of the righteous. It is reasonable therefore to expect that the speaker should somewhere state his own consciousness (as a representative pious Israelite) of exemption from this fate. This seems to give us the key to the words, 'Surely my soul God will set free; for from the hand of Sheôl will he take me.'⁵

We must, therefore, lay stress on the naturalness

² So Smend, ZATW 8 95 [188]; Che. Jew. Rel. Life. 240f.

³ So Smend, Schwally, and now Cheyne.

of our own interpretation, that there is in Ps. 49 a reference to immortality, an interpretation which is in fact that maintained, with fulness of argument, by Cheyne himself in his Origin of the Psalter.

In Ps. 73, as in Ps. 49, the wicked enjoy prosperity; but they are speedily to meet with unexpected retribution

32. In Ps. 73. (18-20). As for the righteous, their highest good and blessedness consist in communion with God. In comparison with God the whole world is to them as nothing (22-25). He is their portion. Despite deadly perils they can safely trust in him (25), and all the more assuredly that he destroys the wicked (27). A new thought, however, emerges in v. 24. God, we are told, 'will guide the righteous with his counsel, and afterwards take him to (or, with) glory.'¹ In the latter phrase, if we may acquiesce in the received text, there must be a reference to the story of Enoch (Gen. 5:24), which was very popular in post-exilic times (see ENOCH, 1), and the whole passage is an assertion of individual immortality (so Delitzsch, Davidson, Baethgen, and originally Cheyne), for the text would be unfairly treated if we restricted the reference to this present life. On grounds which he has not yet fully stated, but which, from the note of Wellhausen on the passage,² we may assume to be partly grammatical, Cheyne now regards v. 24 b as corrupt, and reads, 'And wilt make known to me the path of glory.'³ Assuming, however, with König⁴ that the grammatical difficulties can be overcome, can we show that the new thought of which we have spoken is thoroughly consistent with what follows?⁵ To the present writer no incongruity is visible. He would venture to rest his case on the impassioned words of v. 25a, which prove that the speaker felt assured of the continuance of his union with God not only on earth but also in heaven. For themselves the righteous make no claim to material prosperity either here or hereafter; they look for and indeed possess something far higher. As a corollary of the truth of the justice of God, however, they do expect retribution for the wicked, both here (vv. 18-21 27) and (apparently) hereafter (v. 19 f.).

We have now done with the question of individual immortality so far as it is dealt with in the OT. In

33. Result as to individual immortality. Job it emerges merely as an aspiration. Only in Pss. 49 and 73 (if our interpretation is valid) does it rise to the stage of conviction. The evidence, therefore, in favour of an origin not later than 400 B.C. is far from strong. Even were it wholly wanting, however, we should be obliged, by the logical necessities of thought, to postulate the doctrine. The doctrine of an individual immortality of the righteous, and the doctrine of the Messianic kingdom are presupposed as the chief factors of the complex doctrine of the Resurrection which was developed towards the close of the fourth century or at latest early in the third century. With the evolution of this resurrection hope, however, the entire doctrine of individual immortality falls absolutely into the background, and is not again attested, till the growing dualism of the times leads to the disintegration of the resurrection hope into its original elements about 100 B.C. (see § 64). Indeed, never in Palestinian Judaism down to the Christian era did the doctrine of a merely individual immortality appeal to any but a few isolated thinkers. The faithful looked forward to a blessed future only as members of a holy people, as citizens of a righteous kingdom that should embrace their brethren.

logical ideas that concern the nation as a whole we can

34. Eschatology regarding the nation. hardly venture to go beyond the facts and hopes contained in the prophecies. In the main these cluster at the outset round the familiar conception of 'the day of Yahwè.'

The day of Yahwè in itself, however, constitutes not the blessed future, but only the divine act of judgment which inaugurates it. Hence the eschatology of the nation centres in the future national blessedness introduced by the day of Yahwè.

This future was variously conceived. According to the popular conception down to the eighth century, it was merely a period of material and unbroken prosperity which the nation should enjoy through Yahwè's overthrow of Israel's national foes. This conception gave place, however, in the eighth century, to the prophetic doctrine of the coming kingdom, for the realisation of which two factors, and only two, were indispensable. This kingdom was to be a community of Israelites first and chiefly, and in the next place a community in which God's will should be fulfilled. Whether this kingdom was constituted under monarchical, hierarchical, or purely theocratic forms was in itself a matter of indifference. Since the Messiah formed no organic part of the conception, he was sometimes conceived as present at its head, sometimes as absent. How far the eighth century prophets foretold this kingdom is still an unsettled question. As regards the day of Yahwè there is no such critical difficulty. Our study of the eschatology of the nation will begin with this unquestioned element in Israel's expectations. It is with a development of some complexity that we shall have to deal—a complexity most marked in exilic and post-exilic times, where, as we have seen, the individual no less than the nation began to maintain his claims to righteous treatment. Ezekiel's attempt to satisfy these claims will demand our attention afterwards. Some centuries later what he had essayed to do was achieved in a true synthesis of the eschatologies relating to the nation and to the individual respectively (see § 49).

The day of Yahwè concerns the people as a whole, not the individual. It is essentially the day on which

35. Day of Yahwè; popular idea. Yahwè manifests himself in victory over his foes. Amongst the Hebrews, as sometimes among the Arabs, 'day' had the definite signification of 'day of battle (e.g., Is. 9:3 [4] 'the day of Midian'; see WRS Prophets(2), 397). The belief in this 'day' was older than any written prophecy. In the time of Amos it was a popular expectation. Unethical and nationalistic, it was adopted by the prophets and transformed into a conception of thoroughly ethical and universal significance. It assumed the following forms.

(i.) Popular conception; a judgment on Israel's enemies. This conception originated, no doubt, in the old limited view of Yahwè as merely the national god of Israel. We can distinguish two stages.

(a) In its earlier form it was held by the contemporaries of Amos (8th century B.C.). The relation of Yahwè to Israel in their minds was not ethical; to a large extent it was national (Am. 3:2). Israel's duty was to worship Yahwè and Yahwè's was to protect Israel. As the Israelites were punctual in the performance of ceremonial duties (4:5 5:21 f.), they not only confidently looked forward to, but also earnestly prayed for, 'the day of Yahwè' as the time of his vindication of them against their enemies.¹ Not so, says the prophet. It is a day in which, not the claims of Israel, but the righteousness of Yahwè, will be vindicated against wrong-doing whether in Israel or in its enemies.

(b) The primitive conception of the day of Yahwè

36. Revived by Nah. Hab. was revived by Nahum and Habakkuk: there was to be a judgment of Israel's enemies—i.e., the Gentiles

¹ This belief that Yahwè must save his people survived, despite the prophets, till the captivity of Judah in 586 B.C.

(650-600 B.C.). It was the bitterness and resentment engendered by the sufferings of the Israelites at the hands of their oppressors that led to this revival. The grounds, however, on which the expectation of the intervention of Yahwè was based were somewhat different. According to the primitive view Yahwè was bound to intervene on behalf of his people because of the natural affinities between them. According to Nahum and Habakkuk,¹ the affinities are ethical. In fact, such was the self-righteousness generated by Josiah's reforms that neither Nahum nor Habakkuk makes any mention of Israel's sin. In this they represent their people, who felt themselves, in contrast with the wickedness of the Gentiles, relatively righteous (see Hab. 1.13). Hence the impending judgment will strike not righteous Israel, but the godless Gentiles. Here we have the beginnings of the thought that Israel is right, regarded as over against the world—the beginning, for in Nahum and Habakkuk this view is applied only to a single nation, not, as in later times, to all Gentiles. The later usage of designating the Gentiles absolutely as the godless (גוֹיִם) and Judah as the righteous (צַדִּיקִים) is only the legitimate fruit of Habakkuk's example. Cp Is. 26.10 Pss. 9.5 [6] 16 [17].f. 10.2-4 58.10 [11] 68.2 [3].f. 125.3. In most subsequent representations of the future the destruction of the Gentiles stands as a central thought.

(ii.) Prophetic pre-exilic conception.—The prophetic conception also passed through several stages.

(a) A day of judgment directed mainly against Israel. For Amos, as we have seen, the day of Yahwè² is the

37. Early prophetic ideas. day in which Yahwè intervenes to vindicate himself and his righteous purposes. It appears in this prophet only in its darker side (cp 5.18). Other nations will feel it in proportion to their unrighteousness; but unrighteous Israel, being specially related to Yahwè, will experience the severest judgments (3.2). Hosea is of one mind with Amos.³ He does not use the phrase 'the day of Yahwè'; but he describes in awful terms the irreversibility of the judgment (Hos. 13.12-14 [11-13]). (AMOS, § 18.f., HOSEA, § 7.f.).

(b) Mainly against Judah.—In Isaiah⁴ and Micah the day of Yahwè receives a new application; it is directed against Judah. Not that warnings of judgment against Israel are neglected (Isa. etc. 26.21 81-4 98 [7].f. 176-11 281-4). The prophet takes all the chief surrounding nations within his range; but he does so only in relation to the judgment on his own people. Although he declares that Yahwè's purpose of 'breaking Assyria' concerns all the nations (14.25.f.), there is no evidence to show that he arrived at the conception of a universal or world judgment. In 3.13, where there appears to be a reference to it, the text is corrupt.⁵ The idea of its universality seems to be given in 21.1-21; but the language is poetical.

Isaiah had now and then gleams of hope, and at all times believed in a remnant, however minute. In 1.24-26 he even anticipates a second and happier Jewish state. Micah, on the other hand, as far as the evidence goes, was persistently hopeless. Jerusalem was to become a ruin, and the temple-hill like 'a height

² This day of Yahwè, in its double character as a day of punishment and a day of blessing, is also spoken of as 'that day' (Is. 17.7 30.23 28.5 29.18 Hos. 2.18 Mic. 2.4 4.6 5.10 [9] Zech. 9.16 14.4.69), 'that time' (Jer. 8.11 33.15 50.4 Zeph. 3.19.f. Joel 3[4] 1), 'the day' (Ezek. 7.10 Mic. 3.6), 'the time' (Ezek. 7.12).

³ On the interpolated passages, see AMOS, § 8.f., HOSEA, § 4. The present article builds on the critical results of the article ISAIHAH [the book]; see also ISAIHAH [the prophet]. Hence the following passages which deal with the Messianic age and the Messiah are rejected as interpolations (they are assigned to the exilic or post-exilic period by Cheyne; generally also by Duhm, Hackmann, Marti, and Volz); Is. 2.2-4 4.2-6 7.14-16 9.1-7 [8.23-26] 11.16.5 19.18-25 25.6-9 28.16 29.17-24 35.1-10. crowned with brushwood' (Mic. 3.12; see Nowack). Cp ISAIHAH i., MICAH ii.

(c) Against the whole world—resulting in a survival of a righteous remnant of Israel, the Messianic kingdom.

39. Later; In the prophets with whom we have dealt (except Nah. and Hab.) the judgment of the Zeph. Gentiles is never conceived independently of the judgment on Israel or Judah. In Zephaniah for the first time it appears to be universal. It deals with the whole earth, including the brute creation (1.2.f.); with Jerusalem (1.8-13); with Philistia, Ethiopia, and Assyria (2.1-6);¹ with all nations (3.8); with all the inhabitants of the earth (1.18). There is, however, a certain inconsistency in the picture. The instruments of judgment are a mysterious people, called 'the guests' of Yahwè (1.7; probably the Scythians), who do not themselves come within the scope of the judgment.

The conception is thus wanting in definiteness and clearness. Zephaniah moves in the footsteps of Isaiah in the account of the impending judgment; but whereas, in Isaiah, judgment on Israel and the nations stands in inner connection with the prophet's conception of the divine character and purposes, in Zephaniah it is without definite aim;² its various constituents appear to represent eschatological expectations already current, while its wide sweep shows the operation of the prevailing monotheism. One point in the description is that, in order that Yahwè's anger may destroy them, the nations are to be assembled (3.2). We meet with this idea here for the first time.

Later prophets make it very prominent (Ezek. 38.f. Is. 45.20 68.6 66.16 34.1-3 Zech. 12.3.f. 14.2.f.); earlier prophets are wont to mention definite and present foes (e.g., the Assyrians in Is. 17.12.f.). In later prophets, the scene of this judgment on the Gentiles is Jerusalem (Zech. 14.2 12.1-8; Joel 3 [4] 2 Is. 66.15). A small righteous remnant will be left in Israel (3.11-14).

(iii.) Exilic conception; judgment of Israel, man by man, and of the Gentiles collectively; restoration of a new Israel in the Messianic kingdom and destruction of Gentiles.³ The individualising of religion in Jeremiah and

40. At the Exile. Ezekiel (see above, § 23.f.) was the precondition of the restoration of Israel after the fall of Jerusalem. According to Ezekiel, in God's visitations only the wicked in Israel should be destroyed. When a new Israel was thus created, Yahwè would further intervene to vindicate his honour and his sole sovereignty over the world, Israel should be restored to its own land, and the Gentiles be destroyed.

A synthesis of the eschatologies of the nation and the individual was in this way attempted wholly within the sphere of this life. We are thus entering on a new period in the development of eschatological thought. Israel is already in exile or on the eve of exile; but Yahwè's thoughts are thoughts of peace, not of evil (Jer. 29.11): the exile will be temporary. The day of Yahwè assumes a favourable aspect almost unrecognised in pre-exilic prophecy. Israel shall be converted and brought back to its own land and an everlasting Messianic kingdom established. This kingdom will be ruled over by Yahwè or by his servant the Messiah, who is apparently mentioned here for the first time.

³ This is true only of Ezekiel. There is nothing in the genuine Jeremiah about the destruction of the Gentiles as a whole, and there is probably in 16.19 (but not in 3.17) a genuine prophecy of the ultimate conversion of the nations. See also 4.2 12.15. Only the impenitent Gentiles will be destroyed (12.17). Jeremiah and Ezekiel are here fundamentally at issue. It is their agreement on other points that led to their joint treatment here.

Although the judgment of Israel is not strictly individualistic in Jeremiah as it is in Ezekiel, we shall give the eschatological views of the two together; they can hardly be considered apart; Ezekiel's are built on Jeremiah's. In Jeremiah¹ the day of Yahwè is directed

41. In Jerem. miah. first and chiefly against Judah—the enemy will come upon it from the north (111-16); the city and temple shall be destroyed (376-10)—although account is taken also of other nations (2515-24; cp 118). There is, however, a hopeful outlook; Israel shall be restored (237 f. 245 f.). The restoration is to be preceded by repentance (313 19-25), and accompanied by a change of heart (3133 f.). Restored to its own land, Israel shall receive from Yahwè a king, a righteous Branch of the house of David, who shall deal wisely and execute judgment and justice (235 f.).²

The individualism appearing in Jeremiah is developed in Ezekiel to an extreme degree. Judgment on Israel shall proceed individually (only on the Gentiles is it to be collective). Yahwè will give Israel a new heart (1117-21 3625-32) and restore Israel and Judah to their own land, where, in the Messianic kingdom (1722-24), they shall be ruled by the Messiah (2127), by one 'king, namely 'David'³ (3423-31 3721-28). As for the Gentiles, referred to as Gog, they shall be stirred up to march against Jerusalem and shall there be destroyed (38). On the surviving Gentiles no gleam of divine compassion shall ever light.⁴ Monotheism has become a barren dogma. Particularism and Jewish hatred of the Gentiles are allowed free scope.

(iv.) Universalistic Conception of the Kingdom (550-275 B.C.); redemption and earthly Messianic blessedness for Israel and thus for the Gentiles.⁵

43. Second Isaiah. We are now to consider (a) the second Isaiah and (b) later writers.

(a) According to the second Isaiah (Is. 40-48) and his expander (Is. 49-55) there is in store for Israel not punishment but mercy.

Already she has received double for all her sins (402). Cyrus shall overthrow Babylon (4125 4314 45-47 4814 f.), and the exiles shall return (403-5 432-7 4820-22 498). Jerusalem shall be gloriously rebuilt (5411 f.), and its inhabitants become (like the prophetic writer, 504) disciples of the divine teacher (5413). Never more shall it be assailed (4924-26 548-10 54-17).

Further, the salvation of Israel does not end in itself. The author of the Songs of the Servant⁶ reaches the great conception of Israel as the Servant of Yahwè (423 f. 491-6 504-9 5213-5312), through whom all nations shall come to know the true religion. In these writers the legitimate consequences of monotheism in relation to the Gentiles are accepted.

(b) A somewhat similar representation of the future appears in the post-exilic passage Mic. 41-3 (= Is. 22-4) and the later additions in Jer. 317 f.,

44. Other later writers. according to which all nations, laying aside wars and enmities, are to be converted and to form under Yahwè one great spiritual empire with Jerusalem as its centre.⁷

² On this passage, as well as on other late Messianic prophecies, see Che. Jew. Rel. Life, Lect. iii. Cp also MESSIAH.

³ The Messiah is not conceived here as an individual but as a series of successive kings; cp 458 4616.

⁵ See Che. Jew. Rel. Life, lect. iii. and vi.

⁶ A like conception is probably at the base of the post-exilic Is. 119=Hab. 214 (both editorial additions?), which declare that the earth shall be filled with the true religion.

⁷ See ISAIAH ii., § 5, and cp Che. Jew. Rel. Life, lect. iii.

The same thought¹ is set forth in the Psalms.

See 2227-31 [28-32] 867 and note the fine expressions 'thou confidence of all the ends of the earth'² (655 [6]), and 'to thee doth all flesh come' as to one who hears prayer (652[3]).³ In Ps. 87 we have a noble conception which sums up in itself all the noblest thought of the past in this direction. Jerusalem is to be the mother city of all nations, 'the metropolis of an ideally Catholic Church' (Che.). Whole nations shall enter the Jewish Church (874). So shall also individuals (v. 5).

Only two more passages, Is. 1916-25 and Mal. 111 call for attention; but these are beyond measure remarkable. In Is. 1916-25 (275 B.C.; Che.) the hopes of Ps. 87 reappear but are far surpassed in universality. Jerusalem, though the source of spiritual blessedness to Egypt and Assyria (Syria), is neither nationally nor spiritually paramount; rather do these nations form a spiritual and national confederacy in which Israel holds not the first but the third place.

The widest universalism of all, however, is found in Mal. 111, where in regard to the surrounding nations the prophet declares 'From the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same my name is great among the Gentiles; and in every place incense is offered unto my name, and a pure offering. Here, as most critics recognise, we have a testimony to the working of the one divine spirit in non-Jewish religions (cp MALACHI, § 3). Similar universalism had already, it appears, been expressed by Zoroastrianism.⁴

(v.) Narrow Nationalistic Conception of the Kingdom (about 520 to 300 B.C.); deliverance and Messianic

45. Nationalistic Conception. blessedness for Israel: (a) ministry or bondage, or (b) destruction (partial or complete) for the Gentiles.⁵—Concurrently with the large-hearted universalism

(of the post-exilic writers) just described, there were narrow one-sided views, which held more or less closely to the particularism that originated with Ezekiel. Such were the views most widely current in Judaism. According to these the future world, the Messianic age, belonged to Israel—to Judah and Israel reunited (Hos. 35 Mic. 532)⁶ post-exilic)—under the Messianic descendant of David (Is. 91-6 [823-95] 111-8 Mic. 52-4 [1-3]; all exilic or later); the Gentiles had either no share at all, or only a subordinate share as dependents or servants of Israel. Their destiny was subjection or destruction—generally the latter, always so in the case of those that had been hostile to Israel.

(a) The Gentiles are to escort the returning Israelites to Jerusalem and become their servants and handmaids, Is. 141-37 (cp 6612-20). They shall build up the city walls (6010), bow and be subject to Israel, 6014 (or perih. 6012), becoming Israel's herdsmen and ploughmen and winers (615).⁸

(b) Still more frequently what is predicted for the Gentiles is destruction. In 34 f. (450-430 B.C.; Che.) there is described a universal judgment in which all of them are thus involved (341-3).⁹ In the fifth-century fragment 5915b-20 those hostile to Yahwè and Israel¹⁰ are singled out, whilst those that fear the name of Yahwè are spared 5918 f. 6616 19 f. (6616 18b-22 belong to the age of Nehemiah and Ezra);¹¹ but in another

² Cp also 256 in the small apocalypse in Is. 24 25 6-8 26 20 f. 27 112 f. This Che. assigns to the fourth century, Duhamel to the second. The later date would help to explain the very advanced eschatology appearing in 2421-23, which speaks of a preliminary judgment and then after a long interval of the final judgment. On the latter judgment follows the theocratic kingdom (2423).

³ On the expectation of proselytes see also Is. 141 25 6 65 36 and cp STRANGERS, PROSELYTE.

⁷ Cheyne regards these verses as alien to 132-142z.

⁸ These passages are post-exilic; 60 and 61 about 432 B.C. (Che.).

¹¹ Cp the world-judgment in the fourth-century apocalypse in Is. 24 25 6-8, where, after the judgment (2418-23), the surviving fragment of the same date (63 1-6), which closely resembles the preceding passage in subject and phraseology, only destruction is announced for all.

In Haggai and Zechariah, where the establishment of the Messianic kingdom is expected on the completion of the temple¹ (Zech. 8 15), to be rebuilt by the Messiah,² a pre-condition is the destruction of the Gentile powers. We have, thus, a further development of that opposition between the kingdom of God and the world-kingsdom which appears in Ezekiel and is presented in its sharpest features in Daniel. See, e.g., Zech. 1 19-21 [2 2-4] 6 1-8, Hag. 2 21 f.

In Joel (4th Cent.; cp JOEL, § 4) the enemies of Judah who are not present foes but the nations generally, 46. In Joel, etc. are to be gathered together in order to be annihilated (3 [4] 1-6). Even the place of judgment is mentioned—the valley of Jehoshaphat, the choice being obviously determined by the etymological meaning of the name. Yahwè will sit in judgment (3 [4] 12) and all the Gentiles shall be destroyed. This is a nearer approximation to the idea of a final world-judgment than there is elsewhere in the OT save in Dan. 7 9 f. Still the judgment is one-sided. The 'day of Yahwè' does not, as in the pre-exilic and some exilic prophets and the exceptional post-exilic Mal. 3 2-5 4 1-3 5 [3 19-21 23], morally sift Israel; it serves to justify Israel (2 25-27 3 16 f.) against the world (cp the interpolation in the Second Isaiah, —i.e., 45 25). See JOEL, § 6.

With Joel and his successors prophecy is beginning to change into apocalypse. The forecasts do not, as a rule, stand in a living relation with the present; frequently they are the results of literary reflection on earlier prophecies. This lack of organic relation with the present, such as we find in the earlier prophets, is specially clear in Joel's 'day of Yahwè.'

According to the late post-exilic fragment Zech. 12 1-136,³ all the Gentiles while making an attack on Jerusalem shall be destroyed before it (12 3 f. 9), whereas in the still later fragment, chap. 14, it is only the hostile nations that are to be annihilated (Zech. 14 12 f.), the remnant being converted to Judaism and led to attend the yearly feast of Tabernacles (Zech. 14 7 16-21). This fragment is peculiar also in postponing divine intervention till Jerusalem is in the hands of the Gentiles (14 f.).

In the apocalypse of Daniel there is a great advance on the eschatological ideas of its predecessors. When 47. In Daniel. 12 1 in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes) the Ancient of Days will intervene; his tribunal shall be set up (7 9); the powers of this world shall be overthrown (7 11 f.), and everlasting dominion given to his holy ones (7 14 22 27). These will destroy all rival powers (2 44), and become lords of all the surviving nations (7 14). To the contrasted fates of the faithful and the unfaithful in Israel who have deceased (12 1-3) we shall return (§ 59).

In defiance of historical sequence we have reserved to the last the consideration of the composite chapters

48. In Is. 65 f. Is. 65 f. They call for special treatment because they seem to present a new development as regards the scene of the Messianic kingdom—there are to be new heavens and a new earth.⁴

Gentiles shall be admitted to the worship of Yahwè 25 6. It is very remarkable that in 24 21 f. we read of an intermediate place of punishment. The judgment, therefore, appears to be conceived as consisting of two distinct acts. The clause 25 8a declaring the annihilation of death appears to be an interpolation. It is against the general drift of the content, and wholly alien to the thought-development of the period.

1 For Yahwè the temple is indispensable as his dwelling-place. This thought is apocalyptic. It is not through moral reformation but through divine intervention that the kingdom is to be introduced.

2 After the example of Jer. 23 5 33 15 Zechariah names him 'the Branch' (6 12 3 8 f.). He identifies him with Zerubbabel (cp Hag. 2 6-9 23).

3 See ZECARIAH ii., § 3 f.

4 Cp Che. O.P.s. 404 f.

We must not be misled by appearances, however. When, in chap. 65, Jerusalem is to be especially blessed—it is to be transformed into a blessing (65 18)—the reference is apparently not to a New Jerusalem. It is the same material Jerusalem as before, but supernaturally blessed; men still build houses and plant vineyards (65 21 f.), sinners are still found (65 20),¹ and death still prevails. 65 17, therefore, where the creation of new heavens and a new earth is proclaimed, seems out of place. In the Messianic times here foreshadowed men live to a patriarchal age, and the animal world, as in an earlier prophecy (11 6-9), loses its ferocity and shares in the prevailing peace and blessedness (65 25). In 66 6-16 18 6 f. we have a fragmentary apocalypse (see Che. Intr. Is. 374-385) which describes the judgment of the hostile nations (66 16 18 6 f.).

Those of the Gentiles who escape are to go to the more distant peoples and declare the divine glory (66 19). Thereupon the latter are to go up to Jerusalem, escorting the returning exiles.

This apocalypse concludes with a remarkable reference to the new heavens and the new earth, which is all but unintelligible. Does the new creation take place at the beginning of the Messianic kingdom? or at its close? By neither supposition can we overcome the inherent difficulties of the text. If the new creation is to be taken literally, it can only be supposed to be carried out at the close of the Messianic kingdom; but this kingdom has apparently no close. Either, then, the expression is used loosely and vaguely, or—the present writer inclines to this view—66 22 is a later intrusion.²

III. SYNTHESIS. —Concurrently with the establishment if the Messianic hope in the national consciousness (see § 34) the claims of the individual had,

49. Synthesis. § 34) as we have seen, pressed themselves irresistibly on the notice of religious thinkers—so irresistibly in fact that no representation of the future which failed to render them adequate satisfaction could hope for ultimate acceptance. The two questions naturally came to be regarded as essentially related. The righteous individual and the righteous nation must be blessed together—or rather the righteous man must ultimately be recompensed, not with a solitary immortality in heaven or elsewhere but with a blessed resurrection life with his brethren in the coming Messianic kingdom. If, as we have seen, the doctrine of an individual immortality failed to establish itself in the OT, the grounds of such a failure were not far to seek, and the very objections against the belief in a blessed immortality of the righteous man apart from the righteous community are actual arguments in favour of the resurrection of the righteous to a share in the Messianic kingdom.

The doctrine of a resurrection is clearly enunciated in two passages of great interest, (a) as a spiritual conception in Is. 26 1-19, and (b) as a mechanical conception in

50. Resurrection in Is. 26 Dan. 12. (a) Is. 26 1-19 forms an independent writing composed, according to

Dan. 12. Cheyne, about 334 B.C. The writer, who speaks in the name of the people, looks forward to the setting up of the kingdom, with a strong city, whose walls and bulwarks are salvation, and whose gates will be entered by 'the righteous nation' (26 1 f.); and since the nation is but few, the righteous dead shall rise and share the blessedness of the regenerate nation (26 19). This notable verse should, with Duhm and Cheyne, be read as follows:—'Thy dead men (Israel) shall arise: the inhabitants of the dust shall

² Is. 51 16 and 60 19 can hardly be quoted in support of 65 17 66 22, for in the last two passages the language is obviously meant to be literal, whereas in the former it is metaphorical.

A synthesis of these two eschatologies, of the individual and of the nation, was attempted by Ezekiel wholly within the sphere of this life. The reconciliation, however, was achieved only through a misconception and misrepresentation of the facts of the problem. Still this doctrine of retribution gave such general satisfaction that the need of a theory that would do justice to the facts of the problem was not experienced save by isolated thinkers till the close of the fourth century B.C.

awake¹ and shout for joy;² for a dew of lights is thy dew, and the earth shall bring to life the shades.³

This positive belief in the resurrection of the righteous did not win its way into acceptance, however, till over a century later. Still, that it gained some currency and underwent some development in the interval is obvious from the next and only remaining passage which attests it in the OT.

(b) In Dan. 12² (168 B. C.), which seems to be based on Is. 26¹⁹,⁴ there is an extension of the statement. The resurrection here is not only of the righteous but also of the wicked,⁵ who are to rise in order to receive their due reward—shame and everlasting contempt.⁶ The resurrection moreover ushers in the Messianic kingdom (12¹). This spiritual form of the resurrection doctrine is the genuine product of Jewish inspiration; for all its factors are indigenous to Jewish thought.

Between the rise of the doctrine enunciated in Is. 26 and Dan. 12 a considerable period must have elapsed, sufficiently long to account for the loss of the original significance of the resurrection as a restoration, in the next world, of the life of communion with God which had been broken off by death. During this interval the spiritual doctrine passed into a lifeless dogma. In Is. 26 it was the sole prerogative of the righteous Israelite, now it is extended to the pre-eminently good and the pre-eminently bad in Israel. Without any consciousness of impropriety the writer of Daniel can speak of the resurrection of the wicked. Thus severed from the spiritual root from which it grew the resurrection is transformed into a sort of eschatological property, a device by means of which the members of the nation are presented before God to receive their final award. The doctrine must therefore have been familiar to the Jews for several generations before Daniel.

B. APOCRYPHAL AND APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE (200 B.C.—100 A.D.)

Before entering on the further development of Jewish eschatology, it will be helpful to sum up shortly the results arrived at by the writers whom we

51. Review. have already considered. We find in them an eschatology that to a large extent takes its character from the conception of Yāhwē. As long as his jurisdiction was conceived as limited to this life, there could be no such eschatology with reference to the individual. When at last, however, Israel reached real monotheism, the way was prepared for the moralisation of the future no less than of the present. The exile contributed to this development by making possible a truer conception of the individual. The individual, not the nation, became the religious unit. Step by step through the slow processes of the religious life, the

² יָחַי וְיִשְׂרָאֵל וְיִשְׂרָאֵל וְיִשְׂרָאֵל they read יִשְׂרָאֵל וְיִשְׂרָאֵל and instead of יִשְׂרָאֵל וְיִשְׂרָאֵל.

³ See Che. Intr. Is. 158, and cp OPs. 403f.

⁴ Cp 'the inhabitants of the dust shall awake' and 'many that sleep in the land of dust shall awake.'

religious thinkers of Israel were led to a moral conception of the future life and to the certainty of their share therein. These beliefs were reached, not through deductions of reason, as in Greece, but through spiritual crises deep as the human personality and wide as human life.

[At this point a caution must be offered to the student. The study of the religious content of eschatological ideas is to some extent distinct from that of its form, nor can either religious or literary criticism (to the latter of which special attention is given here)

enable us to dispense with the help of the comparative historical study of the religious ideas of those peoples which came most into contact with the Jewish. Some excellent introductions to 'Biblical Theology' are based, consciously or unconsciously, on the principle that the movement of religious thought in Israel was completely independent of external stimulus. There can be no greater mistake. Students of Jewish religion can no longer avoid acquainting themselves with Babylonio-Assyrian, Egyptian, Zoroastrian, and Greek religion, and using any further collateral information that they can get.¹ The abundance of fresh literary material for the study of eschatology as it took form in Jewish minds is our excuse for not, in this article, bringing Jewish eschatology into relation to other eschatologies, more especially Babylonian and Persian. The article would have become disproportionately long if we had adopted the course which is theoretically the only right one. It must also be remembered that the 'spiritual crises' referred to above were conditioned by crises in the history of the nation. We are far from denying that 'the spirit' as well as the wind, 'breatheth where it listeth.' Even the spirit of revelation, however, cannot work on unprepared minds. Jewish eschatology therefore can be fully sketched only on a canvas larger than is here at our disposal, and this article must be supplemented by reference to a group of other articles, including especially ANTICHRIST and PERSIA (the part dealing with religion). On the narrative in Gen. 24⁶⁻³ which influenced directly or indirectly so many later writers, reference should be made, for the mythic form of the ideas, to CREATION, § 20 (c).—ED.]

In the writings (Apocryphal, Apocalyptic, etc.) that we are now to consider, the eschatological ideas of the later prophets are reproduced and further developed. We shall find it convenient 53. Outline of Method. to deal with this literature in three chronological periods; I. 200-100 (§§ 51-63), II. 100-1 B.C. (§§ 64-70), III. 1-100 A.D. (§§ 71-81). In treating each of these periods, after (a) a general account of its thought and (b) an account of the various works it produced, we shall show in detail (c) the development of certain special conceptions—viz. (1) Soul and spirit, (2) Judgment, (3) Places of abode for the departed, (4) Resurrection, (5) Messianic kingdom, Messiah, Gentiles.

Unlike the rest of the apocalyptic and apocryphal books, Ecclus. and Tobit, instead of reproducing and developing the ideas we have just summarised, represent the older and more conservative views. As lying off the main path of religious development and witnessing to still surviving primitive elements in Judaism, we shall consider them together at the outset.

In Ecclus. the problem of retribution takes a peculiar form. On the one hand it is purely conservative. All retribution without exception is confined to this life: there is 'no inquisition of life' in Shēōl (414). On the other hand it supplements Ezekiel's theory of exact individual retribution with the older view which he attacked, and seeks to cover its obvious defects with the doctrine of the solidarity of the family.

A man's conduct must receive its recompense in this life (see especially 210 f. and cp 23-9 9 12 12a f. also 1126). Obviously, however, all men do not meet with their deserts. Hence a man's sins are visited through the evil remembrance of his name and in the misfortunes of his children after him (1128 2824-25 4015 415-6). Similarly the posterity of the righteous is blessed (447-15). Shēōl is the abode of the shades and the region of death (912 14 12 16 414 485), where is no delight (1416), no praise of God (1717-28); man is plunged in an eternal sleep (4019 2211 3017 3823).² As regards the future of the nation, the writer looks forward to the Messianic kingdom of which Elijah is to be the forerunner (4810), when Israel shall be delivered from evil (5023 f.), the scattered tribes restored (3813-15 AV 3011), the heathen nations duly punished (3222-24—AV 3518 f.). This kingdom of Israel will last for ever (3725 [so Gk. and Eth. but wanting in Syr.]) 4413 [so Gk. and Eth.; Heb. and Syr. read 'memorial' instead of 'seed'].

The eschatology of Tobit is very slight. Like the earlier books, it entertains high hopes for the Jewish people. Jerusalem and the temple shall be rebuilt with gold and precious stones, the scattered tribes shall be restored, and the heathen, forsaking their idols, shall worship the God of Israel (1310-18 144-6). Shēōl is taken in the traditional sense 'eternal place,' ὁ αἰώνιος τόπος, 36. As in Job and in Ecclesiastes, Hades (cp 310 132) is a place where existence is practically at an end.

Sarah, the daughter of Raguel, prays: 'Command my spirit to be taken from me, that I may . . . become earth . . . and go to the everlasting place' (36). This description is accounted for by the writer's acceptance of the later doctrine of the spirit (§ 17).

We now pass to the writings of the Hāsids or Assideans, a small but important body of zealous Jews, first referred to as a religious organisation

57. Assideans. referred to as a religious organisation in Eth. En. 906 (see note in Charles's ed.). Its rise may be placed at about 200 B.C.³ The Hāsids first appear as the champions of the law against the Hellenizing Sadducees; but they were still more the representatives of advanced forms of doctrine about the Messianic kingdom and the resurrection. The arrangement we shall adopt has been explained already (§ 53).

¹ In 2110 thoughts of the penal character of Shēōl do not seem to be quite absent.

² The reference to Gehenna in 717 (ἐκδίκησις ἀσθενῶν πῦρ καὶ σκόληξ) is probably corrupt (om. Syr. Eth. [best MSS]). The Hebrew has רמה אנוש חקת אנוש.

corded in history that much of the eschatological thought of this century was built up. In order to encourage the faithful, various religious thinkers consolidated and developed into more or less consistent theodicies the scattered statements and intimations of an eschatological nature in the OT. In these theodicies there is no vagueness or doubt as to the ultimate destinies of the righteous and the wicked. Faith rests in the reasonable axiom that the essential distinctions between these classes must one day be realised outwardly. The certainty of judgment on the advent of the Messianic kingdom, accordingly, is preached in the most emphatic tones, and the doctrine is taught that at death men enter immediately in Shēōl on a state of bliss or woe which is but the prelude of their final destiny. The righteous, both living and dead, shall be recompensed to the full in the eternal Messianic kingdom established on earth with its centre at Jerusalem. Within the sphere of Judaism it is in this second century B.C. that the eschatologies of the individual and of the nation attain their most complete synthesis (cp below, § 82). The firm lines in which these eschatological hopes are delineated mark the great advance achieved in this period by religious thought.

(b) The theodicies of the several writers.—Eth. En. 1-36 has been described in detail elsewhere (see APOCALYPTIC, § 27). With regard to Daniel, 1-36; Daniel. as the right point of view for studying it has been given elsewhere (DANIEL ii.), and we have already noticed its main eschatological conceptions (above, § 47), we need only observe that in it, as in Eth. En. 1-36, the Messianic kingdom is eternal, its scene is the earth, and all the Gentiles are subject (714). There is no Messiah. Those Jews who are 'found written in the book' [of life] shall be 'delivered' during the period of the Messianic woes. At the resurrection only those Jews who are pre-eminently righteous and wicked shall rise from the 'land of dust'² (i.e., Shēōl) to receive their deserts: the righteous to inherit 'aeonian life,' the wicked to be cast into Gehenna³ (122). For the pre-eminently righteous in Israel, therefore, Shēōl has become an intermediate abode, though for the Gentiles it continues to be final. The risen body seems to possess its natural appetites (as in Eth. En. 1-36). The Messianic kingdom of which the righteous are members is one that bears sway over peoples.

The writer of Daniel makes a very special use of the belief in angelic patrons of nations, of which another application will be found in the almost contemporaneous work to which we turn next—viz., Eth. En. 83-90.

The author of Ethiopic Enoch 83-90, which was written a few years later than Eth. En. 1-36 (on which see APOCALYPTIC, § 27), was a Hāsīd and a supporter of the Maccabean movement. His eschatology is developed at greater length than that of the Daniel apocalypse, to which in many respects it is so closely allied. The belief in angelic patrons of nations is common, as we have seen, to both writings; but our author applies it in a peculiar way.

691-723). The kings of the earth shall be at peace with one another (3755-759).

In the later section of this book the forecast is somewhat different. Though in the earlier part, as we have seen above, it was the Messiah that conducted the war against the hostile nations, in this it is the prophets of God. Thus God will establish a universal kingdom over all mankind, with Jerusalem as centre (3767-771), and the prophets of God shall lay down the sword and become judges and kings of the earth (3781 f.), and men shall bring offerings to the temple from all parts of the earth (3772 f.).

² We assume that the reading עֲפָרָה אֲדָמָה is correct. For this description of Shēōl cp Job 17 16, Ps. 22 15, with Cheyne's note referring to a similar Assyrian phrase. If this interpretation is correct, Shēōl, though it has become a temporary abode for the righteous, still retains its traditional character.

³ Cp Che. OPs. 406.

The undue severities that have befallen Israel are not from God's hand; they are the doing of the seventy shepherds (i.e., angels) into whose care God had committed Israel (89.59) for the destruction of its faithless members. These angels have not wronged Israel with impunity, however; for judgment is at hand. When their oppression is at its worst there shall be formed a righteous league (i.e., the Häsīdīm; 90.6), out of one of the families of which shall come forth Judas the Maccabee (90.7-16), who shall war victoriously against all the enemies of Israel.

While the struggle is still raging, God will intervene in person.

The earth shall swallow the adversaries of the righteous (90.18). The wicked shepherds and the fallen watchers shall then be cast into an abyss of fire (i.e., Tartarus; 90.20-25), and the blinded sheep—i.e., the apostate (Jews)—into Gehenna (90.20). Whether the apostate Jews already dead are to be transferred from Shēōl does not appear.

Then God himself will set up the new Jerusalem (90.28 f.). The surviving Gentiles shall be converted and serve Israel (90.30), the dispersion be brought back, and the righteous Israelites be raised to take part in the kingdom (90.33). When all is accomplished, the Messiah, whose rôle is a passive one, shall appear (90.37), and all shall be transformed into his likeness.

Until a critical edition of the XII. Patriarchs is published, that composite work cannot be quoted as an authority. It belongs to very different periods. It contains apocalyptic sections

61. Test. that appear to belong to the second century B.C.; but the body of the work seems to have been written about the beginning of the Christian era.

xii. Patr. There are, moreover, numerous (Christian) interpolations. Many of the apocalyptic sections appear to have constituted originally a defence of the warlike Maccabean high priests of the latter half of the second century B.C., whilst others¹ seem to attack the later chiefs of that family, in the last century B.C.

It is hardly possible to interpret otherwise such a statement regarding Levi as that in Reub. 6 ad fin.: 'He shall die for us in wars visible and invisible'; cp Sim. 5.

Whilst one or more of these sections may be of an earlier date, many of them may belong to the last century B.C. Since, however, their eschatological thought in some respects belongs to the second century B.C., we shall for the sake of convenience deal with it here, though in no case shall we build upon it as a foundation.²

Levi has been chosen by God to rule all the Gentiles with supreme sovereignty (Reub. 6). The Messiah of the tribe of Levi, who will appear at the close of the seventh jubilee, will possess an eternal priesthood³ (Levi 18; apoc. sections of Levi = 2.5 8 10 14-18). This will endure till God comes and restores Jerusalem and dwells in Israel (Levi 6). This Messiah will judge as a king; he will bind Beliar, open the gates of Paradise and give his saints to eat of the tree of life (Levi 18 cp Eth. En. 25.4-6). To the Messianic kingdom on earth, all the righteous patriarchs shall rise (Sim. 6.4 2eb. 10 Jud. 25). Then the spirits of deceit shall be trodden under foot (Sim. 6 2eb. 9) and Beliar destroyed (Levi 18 Jud. 25). There shall be only one people and one tongue (Jud. 25). The surviving Gentiles are in all cases to be converted, save in Sim. 6 where they are doomed to annihilation. According to Benj. 10 there is to be a resurrection, first of the OT heroes and patriarchs, and next of the righteous and of the wicked. Thereupon is to follow judgment, first of Israel and then of the Gentiles. It is doubtful whether we are to regard this resurrection as embracing Israel only or all mankind.

The designation of Michael in Dan. 6 (cp Lev. 5 Judith 25) as 'a mediator between God and man' is noteworthy.

It may be permitted in conclusion to refer to the book of Judith. The words in which the Gentile enemies of Israel are threatened (16.17)

62. Judith. obviously refer to Gehenna, and remind us of the very late appendix to Is. 66 (v. 23 f.), which however refers to unfaithful Jews. The view of Gehenna as the final abode of the Gentiles is not again attested till the first century of the Christian era (in Ass.

² In the references here made we shall use the better readings of the Armenian Version.

³ Sometimes a Messiah of the tribe of Judah is spoken of. There is nothing against the Jewish origin of such passages; but others which combine the two ideas are Christian.

Mos. 10.10 4 Ezra 7.36). In so far, the date (circa 63 B.C.) given elsewhere for this book (see JUDITH, § 5) seems preferable to the earlier one advocated by Schürer.

(c) Development of special conceptions in second century B.C. 1. Soul and Spirit.—The later view of the 'spirit'

63. Special conceptions. (see § 20) as the divine breath of life probably underlies Ecclus. 38.23 Bar. 2.17 ('the dead also who are in Hades, whose spirit is taken from their bodies'); see also Tob. 36¹ Judith 10.13. Elsewhere in the second century we can trace only the older Semitic view (above, § 19), according to which 'soul' and 'spirit' are practically identical. The apocalyptic use, however, diverges from the more primitive; what is predicated of 'soul' can be predicated also of 'spirit'. In Daniel indeed we always find, not 'soul' but 'spirit', even where 'soul' could have been used with perfect propriety.²

In Enoch 1-36 the inhabitants of Shēōl are spoken of as 'souls' in 22.3 (cp 9.3), but generally as 'spirits' (22.5-7 9 11-13). We even find the strange expression 'spirits of the souls of the dead'³ (9.10). Here also, therefore, 'soul' and 'spirit' are practically identical. Fallen angels and demons are always spoken of as 'spirits' (the former in 13.6 15.4 6.7, the latter in 15.9 11 16.1). Indeed 'soul' is never in Jewish literature used of angels, fallen or otherwise (cp above, § 20).

2. Judgment.—The judgment, which is preliminary and final, involves all men living and dead, the faithless angelic rulers, and the impure angels. It will be on the advent of the Messianic kingdom. These points mark the development of the second century B.C. upon the past. There is the further development that the judgment is sometimes (?) conceived as setting in, immediately after death, in an intermediate abode of the soul. In Eth. En. 1-36 there is a preliminary judgment on the angels who married the daughters of men, and likewise on all men who were alive at the deluge (10.1-12). The final judgment before the advent of the Messiah's kingdom will involve the impure angels (10.12 f.), the demons who have hitherto gone unpunished (16.1), and all Israel with the exception of a certain class of sinners. In Daniel there is a preliminary judgment of the sword executed by the saints (2.44 7.22), as well as the final world-judgment (7.9 11 f.), which will introduce the Messianic kingdom by God himself. There is no mention of judgment of angels; but judgment of the angelic patrons of Persia and Greece may be assumed. In Eth. En. 83-90 there is the first world-judgment of the deluge (89), the judgment of the sword executed under Judas the Maccabee (90.19 16), and the final judgment on the impure angels and on the faithless angelic patrons (90.20-25). The last serves to introduce the Messianic kingdom on the present earth.

3. Places of abode for the departed.—i. Shēōl. Shēōl undergoes complete transformation in the second century B.C. and becomes an intermediate place of moral retribution for the righteous and the wicked. (The traditional sense probably survives in Dan. 12.2, but not in Eth. En. 22.) All the dead who die before the final judgment have to go to Shēōl. It has four divisions; two for the righteous and two for the wicked. From three of them there is a resurrection to final judgment; but from the fourth, where are the wicked who met with violent death, there is no rising. Shēōl has in this last case become hell.

ii. Paradise. In the second century only two men, Enoch and Elijah, were conceived as having been

¹ How thoroughly life was identified with the presence of the spirit appears from this verse: 'Command my spirit to be taken from me, that I may be released, and become earth.'

² In Dan. 7.15 it has generally been thought that the spirit is spoken of as enclosed in the 'sheath' (רִמְוֶה) of the body; but we should no doubt, with Buhl and Marti, read רִמְוֶה בְּיָדָי 'because of this.' ³ ³⁸⁷ which gives ἐν σώματι, and Vg., imply רִמְוֶה בְּיָדָי.

³ In these references the Gizeh Greek text has been followed. In the Ethiopic text the term 'soul' is used instead of 'spirit' in 22.3 9 11 f., but corruptly.

admitted to Paradise on leaving this world (Eth. En. 87.3 f. 89.52).¹ The cause is manifest. See ENOCH, I. iii. Gehenna. Gehenna is definitely conceived in Dan. 12.2 Eth. En. 27.1 f. and 90.26 f. (?) as the final, not the immediate, abode of apostates in the next world.

iv. The abyss of fire.² This is the final place of punishment for the faithless angelic rulers and for the impure angels (Eth. En. 18.11-19.21 90.21-25). In Eth. En. 18.11-16 21.1-6 the fiery abyss for the impure angels is distinguished from another fiery abyss mentioned in 21.7-10. This latter may be for the faithless angelic rulers.

4. Resurrection.—In Eth. En. 83-90 (see 90.33) there is a resurrection only of the righteous; in Dan. 12.2 f., of those who are righteous and wicked in a pre-eminent degree; and in Eth. En. 22 of the righteous and of such of the wicked as had not met with retribution in life. Thus in Eth. En. 83-90 the older and spiritual form of the doctrine is preserved. In all cases the righteous rise to participate in the Messianic kingdom.

5. Messianic kingdom.—In Dan. and Eth. En. 1-36 the scene of the Messianic kingdom is the earth. In Eth. En. 83-90 its centre is to be, not the earthly Jerusalem, but the new Jerusalem brought down from heaven. This is the first trace in the second century B.C. of a sense of the unfitnes of the present world for Messianic glory. The kingdom is to be eternal. Its members are to enjoy a life of patriarchal length (Eth. En. 5.9 25.6), or to live for ever (90.33). In Dan. 12.2 f. the point is left doubtful. Besides the Messiah in Sibyll. Or. 3.652-654 there is no mention of the Messiah in the second century B.C. except in Eth. En. 83-90 (see 90.37), where, however, his introduction seems due merely to literary reminiscence.

6. Gentiles.—According to Eth. En. 10.21, all the Gentiles are to become righteous and worship God. Only the hostile Gentiles are to be destroyed (Dan. 2.244 7.11 f. Eth. En. 90.9-16 18). The rest will be converted (?) and serve Israel (Dan. 7.14 Eth. En. 90.30).

(a) General eschatological development.—A great gulf divides the eschatology of the last century B.C. as a whole from that of its predecessor. The hope of an eternal Messianic kingdom on the present earth is all but universally abandoned.³ The earth as it is, is manifestly regarded as wholly unfit for the manifestation of the kingdom. The dualism which had begun to assert itself in the preceding century is therefore now the preponderating dogma. This new attitude compels writers to advance to new conceptions concerning the kingdom.

(i.) Some boldly declare (Eth. En. 91-104), or else imply (Pss. Sol. 1-16 2 Macc. [?]), that the Messianic kingdom is only temporary, and that the goal of the risen righteous is not this transitory kingdom but heaven itself. In the thoughts of these writers the belief in a personal immortality has disassociated itself from the doctrine of the Messianic kingdom, and the synthesis of the two eschatologies achieved in the preceding century (see § 58) *is anew resolved into its elements.*⁴ This is a natural consequence, as we have said, of the growing dualism of the times.

⁴ On the synthesis effected in the NT, see § 82; in the exceptional anticipation of this in Eth. En. 27-70, see § 66.

ESCHATOLOGY

(ii.) Quite another line of thought, however, was possible. The present earth could not, it is true, be regarded as the scene of an eternal Messianic kingdom; but a renewed and transformed earth could. The scene of the eternal Messianic kingdom would be such a new earth, and a new heaven, and to share in this eternal kingdom the righteous should rise (Eth. En. 37-70). Here the idea of a new heaven and a new earth, which appeared illogically in Is. 65 f. (§ 48), is applied with reasonable consistency.

It is further to be observed that writers of the former class (i.) anticipated a resurrection only of the righteous, a resurrection of the spirit not of the body (Eth. En. 91-104 Pss. Sol.); but writers of the latter class (ii.) looked forward to a resurrection of all Israel (Eth. En. 37-70) at the close of the temporary, and the beginning of the eternal, Messianic kingdom. In 2 Macc., which diverges in some respects from both classes, a bodily resurrection of the righteous, and possibly of all Israel, is expected.

Again, in contradistinction to the preceding century there is now developed a vigorous, indeed a unique, doctrine of the Messiah, the doctrine of the supernatural Son of Man (Eth. En. 37-70).

Finally, the present sufferings of Israel at the hands of the Gentiles are explained as disciplinary (2 Macc. 6.12-17 cp Jud. 8.27 Wisd. 12.22).

Israel is chastened for its sins lest they should come to a head; but the Gentiles are allowed to fill up the cup of their iniquity (cp Gen. 15.16 Dan. 8.23 9.26).

(b) Eschatologies of the several writers.—We have said that the eschatology of the last century B.C. introduces us into a world of new conceptions (§ 70).

65. Eth. En. 91-104. Whilst in the writings of the preceding century the resurrection and the final judgment were the prelude to an everlasting Messianic kingdom, in Ethiopic Enoch 91-104 they are adjoined to the close. The Messianic kingdom is thus, for the first time, conceived as temporary. It is therefore no longer the goal of the hopes of the righteous. Their soul finds its satisfaction only in a blessed immortality in heaven. The author acknowledges that the wicked seem to sin with impunity; but he believes that this is not so in truth; their evil deeds are recorded every day (104.7), and they will suffer endless retribution in Shēōl (99.11), a place of darkness and flame (for Shēōl is here conceived as hell), from which there is no escape (98.3 10 103.7 f.).

In the eighth week, the Messianic kingdom (but without a Messiah) shall be established, and the righteous shall slay the wicked with the sword (91.12 95.7 96.1 98.12 99.4). To this kingdom the righteous who have departed this life shall not rise. At its close, in the tenth week, shall be held the final judgment; the former heaven and earth shall be destroyed, and a new heaven created (91.14-16). The righteous dead, who have hitherto been guarded by angels (100.5), in a department of Shēōl (? cp 4 Ezra 4.41), shall be raised, 91.10 92.3 (not, however, in the body, but as spirits; 103.3 f.), and the portals of heaven shall be opened to them (104.2); they shall joy as the angels (104.4), becoming companions of the heavenly host (104.6), and shining as the stars for ever (104.2).

The interest of the author of Eth. En. 37-70 is in the sphere of the moral and spiritual. This is manifest even in his usual name for God, 'the

66. Eth. En. 37-70 and 1 Macc. Lord of Spirits,' and in the peculiar turn that he gives to the trisagion in 39.12 1 Macc. 'Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of spirits: he filleth the earth with spirits.'

His views are strongly apocalyptic and follow closely in the wake of Daniel. Unlike the writer of chaps. 91-104 (§ 65), however, he clings fast to a future kingdom of (righteous) Israel, destined to endure for ever, to which the righteous shall rise. The righteous individual will thus find his consummation in the righteous community.

In addition to the eschatological details given elsewhere (APOCALYPTIC, § 30) we should observe the following points:—The Son of Man is to judge all angels, unfallen and fallen (61.8 55.4), and men—righteous and sinners (62.2 f.), kings and mighty (62.3-11 63.1-4 11). The Messiah is for the first time represented as a supernatural being, Judge of men and angels. The fallen angels are to be cast into a fiery furnace (546), the kings and the mighty to be tortured in Gehenna by the angel of punishment (58 3-5 54 1 f.), and the remaining sinners and godless to be driven from the face of the earth (38 3 41 2 45 6); the Son of Man shall slay them by the word of his mouth (62 2). Heaven and earth shall be transformed (45 4 f.), the righteous shall have their mansions therein (89 6 41 2), and live in the light of eternal life (58 3). The elect one shall dwell amongst them (44 4), and they shall eat and lie down and rise up with him for ever (62 14). They shall be clad in garments of life (62 15 f.), and become angels in heaven (51 4); and they shall seek after light and find righteousness (58 3 f.), and grow in knowledge and righteousness (58 5).

1 Macc. is quite without eschatological teaching, if we except the writer's expectation of a prophet in 446 14 41.¹

In considering the Psalms of Solomon the eschatological system of the last two psalms (17 f.), which differs in many important respects from that of Pss. 1-16, may be taken first.

i. The eschatology of Ps. Sol. 17 f. is marked by a singular want of originality.

There is hardly a statement relative to the hopes of Israel that could not be explained as a literary reminiscence. Where these psalms are at all original their influence is distinctly hurtful; the proof that the popular aspirations with which they connect the Messiah were injurious to the best interests of the nation was 'written in fire and blood' (see MESSIAH).

The following is the account of the Messiah (who is specifically so called in 17 36 186 8).

He is to be descended from David (17 23), a righteous king (17 35), pure from sin (17 41). He will gather the dispersed tribes together and make Jerusalem holy as in the days of old. No Gentile shall be suffered to sojourn there, nor any one that knows wickedness. The ungodly nations he shall destroy with the word of his mouth (17 27 cp 17 39 41). The remaining Gentiles shall become subject to him (17 31 f.); he will have mercy on all the nations that come before him in fear (17 38). They shall come from the ends of the world to see his glory, and bring their sons as gifts to Zion (17 34).

The Messianic kingdom is apparently of temporary duration. There is no hint of the rising of the righteous who have died; only the surviving righteous are to share in it (cp 17 50). We might infer the transitory nature of the Messianic kingdom from the fact that the Messiah is a single person, not a series of kings. The duration of his kingdom is to be regarded as contemporaneous with that of its ruler.

ii. In Pss. Sol. 1-16 there is hardly a single reference to the future kingdom and none to the Messiah. Since, however, they paint in glowing colours the restoration of the tribes (8 34 11 3-8), they look for a Messianic kingdom—at all events a period of prosperity, when God's help should be enjoyed (7 9). Beyond prophesying vengeance on the hostile nations and on sinners, however, the psalmists do not dwell on this coming time. For them the real recompense of the righteous is not bound up with an earthly kingdom. The righteous rise, not to any kingdom of temporal prosperity, but to eternal life (3 16 13 9); they inherit life in gladness (14 6), and live in the righteousness of their God (15 15). There seems to be no resurrection of the body. As for the wicked, 'their inheritance is Hades (here=hell), and darkness and destruction' (14 6 cp 15 11), whither they go immediately on dying (16 2). The eschatology of Pss. 1-16 thus agrees in nearly every point with that of Eth. En. 91-104 (§ 65).²

In Sibylline Oracles 31-62, written before 31 B.C. (see APOCALYPTIC, § 85), God's kingdom is expected and the advent of a holy king who shall sway the sceptre of every land³ (3 49). This Messianic king is to reign 'for all the ages' (3 50). These words must not be pressed, however; for, a few lines later, a universal judgment on all men is foretold (3 53-56 60 f.). For a similar limitation cp Apoc. Bar. 40 3 73 1.

ESCHATOLOGY

There is in 2 Macc. only one direct reference to a Messianic kingdom: the youngest of the seven brethren

69. 2 Macc. prays that 'God may speedily be gracious to the nation' (7 37). The hope of it is implied, however, in the expectation of the restoration of the tribes (2 18). The righteous will in the body to share in the kingdom where they will renew the common life with their brethren (7 29). The kingdom is to be eternal; for God has established his people for ever (14 15). There is certainly no hint of a Messiah. Thus the eschatology is really that of the second century B.C. (§ 58 f.).

Since the Messianic kingdom here implied is to be of a material character and therefore presumably on earth—for the righteous rise to an eternal life (7 9 36), in a body constituted as the present earthly body (7 11 22 f. 14 46)—we may reasonably infer that the eternal kingdom thus expected was to be upon the present earth, as in Eth. En. 83-90 (§ 60). Thus the eschatology of this book belongs really to the second century B.C. as the epitomizer claims.

On the other hand the doctrine of retribution, present and future, plays a significant rôle. Present retribution follows sin, for Israel and for the Gentiles. In the case of Israel its purpose is corrective; but in that of the Gentiles it is vindictive (6 13 f.). To enforce his doctrine the writer reconstructs history, and corrects the imperfect assignment of destiny to the heathen oppressors, Epiphanes (7 17 9 5-12) and Nicanor (15 32-35), and to the Hellenising Jews, Jason (5 7-10) and Menelaus (13 8).

Even the martyrs confess their sufferings to be due to sin (7 18 33 37), and pray that their sufferings may 'stay the wrath of the Almighty' (7 38). Immediate retribution is a token of God's goodness (6 13). Our present concern, however, is mainly with retribution beyond the grave. The righteous and the wicked in Israel enter after death the intermediate state (Hades) (6 23), where they have a foretaste of their final doom (6 26), which takes effect after the resurrection. There is to be a resurrection of the righteous (7 9 11 14 23 29 36), perhaps even of all Jews (12 43 f.), but not of the Gentiles. These remain in Shēōl. Possibly its torments are referred to in 7 17. When the heathen die they enter at once on their eternal doom (7 14).

(c) Development of special conceptions in the last century B.C. . . Soul and Spirit.—As in the preceding century, so also in this, the doctrine of soul and spirit follows, almost without exception, the older Senitic view (above, § 19). The exceptions are in 2 Macc. 7 22 f.

In v. 22 the mother of the seven martyred brethren declares: 'I did not give you spirit and life' (ῥῆ πνεῦμα καὶ τὴν ζωὴν). Here, as in Gen. 2 4 b-3 (above, § 20), the πνεῦμα is the life-giving principle of which the ζωὴ is the product. The same phrase recurs in v. 23 and in 14 46. The withdrawal of this spirit, however, does not lead to unconsciousness in Shēōl; the departed are still conscious (6 26). The writer is, thus, inconsistent; for the ordinary dichotomy of soul and body is found in 6 30 7 37 14 38 15 30.

In all the remaining literature of this century there is only a dichotomy—either spirit¹ and body, or soul and body. Some writers use one of these pairs, some use both; in none is the spirit conceived as in Gen. 2 4 b-3.

In the oldest writing of the century the departed in Shēōl are spoken of as 'spirits' (Eth. En. 98 10 108 3 4 8) or as 'souls' (102 5 11 108 7). On the other hand, in the Stimulantes and the Pss. Sol. (nearly contemporaneous works), the term 'spirit' is not used of man at all, only 'soul'; see Eth. En. 45 3 68 10, Pss. Sol. passim, but particularly 9 7 and 9 9 where the highest spiritual functions are ascribed to the 'soul'. Finally in the Noachic interpolations (see APOCALYPTIC, § 24) only the term 'spirit' is used of man (cp 41 8 60 4 67 8 f. 71 1), and likewise in the Essenic appendix to this book, where we read of 'the spirits of the wicked' (108 36) and 'of the righteous' (ov. 7 9 11).

2. Judgment.—The judgment is final and involves all rational beings, human and angelic. It will be either at the advent of the Messianic kingdom, or (and this is the common view) at its close.

It is only in Eth. En. 37-70 that it is regarded as introducing the Messianic kingdom, and here it differs from the conception which prevailed in the second century, in that it utters in the Messianic kingdom, not on the present earth, but in a new heaven and a new earth.

The main difference, however, between the judgment in the eschatologies of the last century and in those of the second is that all (?) other writers of the last century, except Eth. En.

37-70, conceived it as forming the close of the temporary Messianic kingdom (so clearly in Eth. En. 91-104 and Pss. Sol. 1-16, probably also in Ps. Sol. 17 f. and 2 Macc.; see above, §§ 65-67). There is, however, in Eth. En. 91 12 95 7 96 1 98 12, etc., a preliminary judgment of the sword which (as in Dan. 2.44) is executed by the saints. In Ps. Sol. 17 f. this Messianic judgment is executed forensically by the Messiah.

3. Places of abode of the departed.—i. Paradise. Paradise, which in the preceding century had been regarded as the abode of only two men (§ 63 [3] ii.), has come to be regarded as the intermediate abode of all the righteous and elect; Eth. En. 61 12 70 2 ff. (Noachic Fragment, 608). In the Similitudes the righteous pass from Paradise to the Messianic kingdom.

ii. Heaven. For the first time in apocalyptic literature heaven becomes, after the final judgment, the abode of the righteous as spirits (Eth. En. 104 2 4 103 3 f.).

iii. Shēōl. There is a considerable variety in the views entertained about Shēōl; but most of them have been met with earlier.

(a) It is the intermediate abode of the departed whence all Israel (?) rises to judgment (Eth. En. 51 i).¹

In 2 Macc. this is the only sense (§ 23). It is noteworthy that the writer regards a moral change as possible in Shēōl (see 12.42-45). According to Eth. En. 100 5 the souls of the righteous are preserved in a special part of Shēōl (? cp 4 Ezra 4.41).

(b) Shēōl is Hell.

Eth. En. 63 10 56 8 99 11 103 7 and always in Pss. Sol. [14 6 15 11 16 2]. Note how in Pss. Sol. Shēōl is associated with fire and darkness; it has drawn to itself attributes of Gehenna. In the Similitudes Shēōl is an intermediate abode for all that die before the advent of the Messianic kingdom (51 i). The wicked that are living on its advent shall be cast into Shēōl; but Shēōl then becomes a final abode of fire (63 10).

(c) Shēōl is Gehenna in the interpolated passage, Eth. En. 56 8.

iv. Gehenna. Two new developments of this idea appear in the last century B.C.

(a) The first is referred to in Eth. En. 48 9 54 1 f. 62 12 f. According to the prevailing view of the second century B.C., Gehenna was to be the final abode of Jewish apostates whose sufferings were to form an ever present spectacle to the righteous; but in the Similitudes (37-70) Gehenna is specially designed for kings and the mighty, and it is forthwith to vanish for ever with its victims from the sight of the righteous. This latter idea is due to the fact that in the Similitudes there were to be, after the judgment, new heavens and a new earth.

(b) The second development is attested in Eth. En. 91-104, where Gehenna is a place only of spiritual punishment, whereas hitherto it had been a place of spiritual and also of corporal punishment; in 98 3 we read of 'spirits' being 'cast into the furnace of fire' (cp also 108 8). In this writer Shēōl and Gehenna have become equivalent terms (see 99 11 103 7, also 100 9). The same conception is found in the Essene writing Eth. En. 108 6.

v. Burning furnace. In Eth. En. 54 6 (cp 18 11-16 21 1-6) the final abode of the fallen angels is a burning furnace.

4. Resurrection.—The views of the last century B.C. on the resurrection show a great development on those of the preceding century. In Eth. En. 91-104 (§ 65) and the Pss. Sol. (§ 67) the resurrection is still only spiritual; but 2 Macc. puts forward a very definite resurrection of the body (7 11 14 46), as does also Eth. En. 37-70. Only, the body is a garment of light (62 15 f.), and those who possess it are angelic (51 4). Similarly Eth. En. 91-104 and Pss. Sol. agree in representing the resurrection as involving only the righteous, and Eth. En. 37-70 and 2 Macc. (?) in extending it to all Israel.

5. (a) Messianic Kingdom. See § 64.

(b) Messiah.—In the preceding century the Messianic hope was practically non-existent. Under Judas and Simon the need of a Messiah was hardly felt. In the first half of the last century B.C. it was very different. Subject to ruthless oppressions, the righteous were in sore need of help. As their princes were the leaders in this oppression, the pious were forced to look for aid to God. The bold and original thinker to whom we owe the Similitudes conceived the Messiah as the supernatural Son of Man, who should enjoy universal dominion and execute judgment on men and angels (cp MESSIAH, SON OF MAN). Other religious thinkers, returning afresh to the study of the earlier literature, revived (as in Pss. Sol.) the expectation of the prophetic Messiah, sprung from the house and lineage of David (17 23). See above (§ 67); also APOCALYPTIC, § 32. These very divergent conceptions took such a firm hold of the national consciousness that henceforth the Messiah becomes generally, but not universally, the chief figure in the Messianic kingdom.

6. Gentiles.—The favourable view of the second century B.C., as to the future of the Gentiles, has all but disappeared. In Eth. En. 37-70 annihilation appears to await them. In Ps. Sol. 17 32 they are to be spared to serve Israel in the temporary Messianic kingdom. This may have been the view of the other writers of this century who looked forward to a merely temporary Messianic kingdom.

(a) General eschatological development.—The growth of dualism which was so vigorous in the last century B.C. now attains its final development. The Messianic kingdom is not to be everlasting; in one work it is to last 1000 years (see below, § 75); in some writings it is even wholly despaired of (Apoc. Bar. 13 2 4, Salathiel Apoc. [§ 79, e], 4 Macc.). According to another work some of the saints will rise to share in it ('the first resurrection'). The breach between the eschatologies of the individual and of the nation which had begun to appear in the last century B.C. (§ 64) has been widened, and the differences of the two eschatologies have been developed to their utmost limits. The nation has no blessed future at all, or, at best, one of only temporary duration. This, however, is a matter with which the individual has no essential concern. His interest centres round his own soul and his own lot in the after-life. The great thought of the divine kingdom has been surrendered in despair.

The transcendent view of the risen righteous which was sometimes entertained in the preceding century (§ 65) becomes more generally prevalent. The resurrection involves the 'spirit' alone (Jubilees, Ass. Mos., Philo, Wisd., 4 Macc.); or, the righteous are to rise vested with the glory of God (Slav. En.), or with their former body, which is forthwith to be transformed and made like that of the angels (Apoc. Bar., 4 Esdras; see also the Pharisaic doctrine in Jos. BJ 8 14).

Several writers reveal a new development in regard to the resurrection of the 'spirit.' Instead of being preceded by a stay in Shēōl till after the final judgment, the entrance of the righteous spirit on a blessed immortality is to follow on death immediately. This view, however, is held only by Alexandrian writers (Philo, Wisdom 3 1-4 4 2 7 10, etc., 4 Macc.) or by the Essenes (see Jos. BJ 28 11, cp ESSENES, § 7). The only exception is Jubilees (see chap. 23). The older view survives in the first century A.D. in Ass. Moses 10 9, in Slav. En. and (partly) in Eth. En. 108.

Finally, the scope of the resurrection, which in the past

was limited to Israel, is extended in some books to all mankind (Apoc. Bar. 31.2 4 Ezra 7.32 37). For the Gentiles, however, this is but a sorry boon. They are raised only to be condemned for ever with a condemnation severer than that which they had endured before.¹

(b) Eschatologies of the several writers.—In the Book of Jubilees there is not much eschatological thought. Levi is given a special blessing; from him are to proceed 'princes and judges and chiefs' (31.15). From Judah there seems to be expected a Messiah.

Isaac blesses Judah thus: 'Be thou a prince—thou and one of thy sons over the sons of Jacob . . . in thee shall there be the help of Jacob, etc. (31.18 f.). There is a detailed description of the Messianic woes (23.13 19 22). These will be followed by an invasion of Palestine by the Gentiles (23.23 f.). Then Israel will 'begin to study the laws, and repent (23.26). As the nation becomes faithful, human life will gradually be lengthened till it approaches one thousand years (23.27; cp 23.28). This period is the 'great day of peace' (25.10). Whether the blessings granted to the Gentiles through Israel (18.16 20 10 27 23), however, are to be referred to the Messianic age, is doubtful. Finally, when the righteous die, their spirits will enter into a blessed immortality (23.31). 'And their bones shall rest in the earth and their spirits shall have much joy, and they shall know that it is the Lord who executes judgment,' etc.

The 'day of the great judgment' (23.11) seems to follow on the close of the Messianic kingdom.

Mastema and the demons subject to him shall be judged (10.8). On the restriction of the resurrection to the spirit (23.31), see above (§ 71. a). The question arises, Where do the spirits of the righteous who die before the final judgment go? It cannot be to Shēol, for Shēol is ordinarily conceived in this book as 'the place of condemnation' into which are cast eaters of blood and idolaters (7.29 22.22). It must be either, as in the Similitudes, to an intermediate abode of the righteous, such as Paradise, or else to heaven. All Palestinian Jewish tradition favours an intermediate abode.

The Assumption of Moses (7-29 A.D.) is closely allied to Jubilees in many respects. Whereas Jubilees, however, is a manifesto in favour of the priesthood, the Assumption, proceeding from a Pharisaic quietist, contains a bitter attack on them (7).

The preparation for the advent of the theocratic or Messianic kingdom will be a period of repentance (1.18). 1750 years after the death of Moses (10.12) God will intervene in behalf of Israel (10.7) and the ten tribes shall return. There is no Messiah; 'the eternal God alone . . . will punish the Gentiles' (10.7). In this respect the Assumption differs from Jubilees. The idealisation of Moses leaves no room for a Messiah. During the temporary Messianic kingdom Israel shall destroy its national enemies (10.8), and finally be exalted to heaven (10.9), whence it shall see its enemies in Gehenna (10.10).

It is noteworthy that the conception of Gehenna, which was originally the specific place of punishment for apostate Jews, is here extended, so that it becomes the final abode of the wicked generally. Finally, there seems to be no resurrection of the body, only of the spirit.

Philo.—We shall only touch on the main points of the eschatology of Philo. He looked

74. Philo. forward to the return of the tribes from 25 B.C.-50 A.D. captivity, to the establishment of a Messianic kingdom of temporal prosperity, and even to a Messiah.

The loci classici on this subject are De Execrat. 8 f. (ed. Mang. 2.435 f.) and De Proem. et Poen. 15-20 (ed. Mang. 2.421-428). The former passage foretells the restoration of a converted Israel to the Holy Land. The latter describes the Messianic kingdom. The Messiah is a man of war—ἐξελύσεται γὰρ ἄνθρωπος, φησὶν ὁ χρημῶς (Nu. 24.17), καταστραταρχῶν καὶ πολεμῶν ἔθνη.

The inclusion of the Messiah and the Messianic kingdom, though really foreign to his system, in Philo's eschatology, is strong evidence as to the prevalence of these expectations even in Hellenistic Judaism. Apparently Philo did not look forward to a general and final judgment. All enter after death into their final abode. The punishment of the wicked is everlasting (De Cherub. 1); even the wicked Jews are committed to Tartarus (De Execrat. 6). As matter is incurably evil, there can be no resurrection of the body. Our present life in the body is death, for the body is the sepulchre of the soul (Quod Deus immut. 32); our σῶμα is our σῆμα (Leg. Alleg. 1.33).

According to the Slavonic Enoch¹ (1-50 A.D.), as the earth was created in six days, its history will be accomplished in 6000 years; and as the six days of creation were followed by one of rest, so the 6000 years of the world's history will be followed by a rest of 1000 years—the Millennium or Messianic kingdom. Here for the first time the Messianic kingdom is limited to 1000 years (whence the later Christian view of the Millennium), at the expiration of which time will pass into eternity (32.2-33.2), and then will be the final judgment.

That event is variously called 'the day of judgment' (39.1 51.3), 'the great day of the Lord' (18.6), 'the great judgment' (52.15 58.5 66.7), 'the day of the great judgment' (50.4), 'the eternal judgment' (7.1), 'the great judgment for ever' (60.4), 'the terrible judgment' (48.8), 'the immeasurable judgment' (40.12).

Before the final judgment the souls of the departed are in intermediate places.

The rebellious angels awaiting judgment in torment are confined to the second heaven (7.1-3). The fallen lustful angels are kept in durance under the earth (18.7). Satan, hurled down from heaven, has as his habitation the air (29.4 f.). For the souls of men, which were created before the creation of the world (23.5), future places of abode have been separately prepared (49.2 58.5). The context of 58.5 appears to imply that they are the intermediate place for human souls. In 32.1 Adam is sent to this receptacle of souls on his death, and is transferred from it to paradise in the third heaven after the great judgment (42.5). Even the souls of beasts are preserved till the final judgment in order to testify against the ill-usage of men (58.5.6).

The righteous shall escape the final judgment and enter paradise as their eternal inheritance (8.9 42.3 5 61.3 65.10). The wicked are cast into hell in the third heaven where their torment will be for everlasting (10.40.12 41.2 42.1 f. 61.3). There is apparently no resurrection of the body—the righteous are clothed with the garments of God's glory (22.8; cp Eth. En. 62.16 108.12). The seventh heaven is the final abode of Enoch (55.2 67.2); but this is an exception.

In the Alexandrian 'Wisdom of Solomon' there is no Messiah; but there is to be a theocratic kingdom, in

76. Wisdom. which the surviving righteous shall judge the nations (3.7 8), forensically (cp 1 Cor. 6.2), not by the sword. Here is a mark of progress. The body does not rise again; it is a mere burden taken up for a time by the pre-existent soul (cp Slav. En.). It is the soul that is immortal (3.1-4 etc.). The wicked shall be 'destroyed' (4.19), though not annihilated (4.19 5.1). The true judgment of the individual sets in at death (4.10 14). For further details see WISDOM OF SOLOMON, § 17.

4 Maccabees is a philosophical treatise on the supremacy of reason.² The writer adopts, as far as possible, the tenets of stoicism. He teaches the

77. 4 Macc. eternal existence of all souls, good and bad, but no resurrection of the body. The good shall enjoy eternal blessedness in heaven³ (98.15.2 17.5); but the wicked shall be tormented in fire for ever (9.10 15 12.12).

On the composite Book of Baruch see BARUCH ii., and cp APOCRYPHA, § 6, i. Here we only note that 78. Baruch and Apoc. of Baruch. in 2.17 Hades still possesses its OT connotation. The Apocalypse of Baruch also (50-80 A.D.) is a composite work (APOCALYPTIC, § 10 f.); for a summary of contents see ib. § 8),⁴ the six or more independent constituents of which may, when treated from the standpoint of their eschatology, be ranged in three classes.

i. The Messiah Apocalypses A₁, A₂, A₃ (27-30.1, 36-40, 53-74). This part differs from the rest of the book in being written before 70 A.D. and in teaching the doctrine of a personal Messiah. In A_1 , however, his rôle is a passive one, whereas in A_2 and A_3 he is a warrior who slays the enemies of Israel with his own hand. In all three apocalypses the Messiah-kingdom is of temporary duration.

In A_2 the Messiah's 'princiate will stand "for ever" until the world of corruption is at an end' (40 3); in A_3 his reign is described as 'the consummation of that which is corruptible and the beginning of that which is incorruptible' (74 2). During it there will be no sorrow nor anguish nor untimely death (73 2f.). The animal world will change its nature and minister unto man (73 6). In A_2 and A_3 the kingdom is inaugurated with the judgment of the sword (39 7-40 2, 72 2-6). The Gentiles that have ruled or oppressed Israel shall be destroyed; but those that have not done so shall be spared in order to be subject to Israel (72 2-6).

The final judgment and the resurrection follow on the close of these kingdoms.

ii. In B_1 (1-9 1 43-44 7 45-46 6 77-82 86 f.) the writer (who is optimistic) looks forward (6 9) to Jerusalem's being rebuilt (after it has been destroyed by angels) lest the enemy should boast (7 1), to the restoration of the exiles (77 6 78 7), and to a Messianic kingdom (15 46 6 77 12); but he does not expect a Messiah. Little consideration is shown for the Gentiles (82 2-7).

iii. In B_2 (13-25 30 2-35 41 f. 44 8-15 47-52 75 f. 83), written after 70 A. D., the writer has relinquished all expectation of national restoration and all hope for the present corruptible world. He is mainly concerned with theological problems and the question of the incorruptible world that is to be.

The world shall be renewed (82 6): from being transitory (48 50 85 10) it shall become undying (51 3) and everlasting (48 50); from being a world of corruption (21 19 81 5; cp 40 3 74 2) it shall become incorruptible and invisible (51 8 44 12). Full of world-despair, the writer looks for no Messiah or Messianic kingdom, but only for the last day when he will testify against the Gentile oppressors of Israel (13 3).

In the meantime, as men die they enter in some degree on their reward in $Shêôl$, the intermediate abode of the departed (23 5 48 16 52 2; cp 56 6), in which there are already certain degrees of happiness or torment.

For the wicked $Shêôl$ is an abode of pain (80 5 86 11), still not to be compared with their torments after the final judgment. The righteous are preserved in certain 'chambers' or 'treasuries' in $Shêôl$ (4 Ezra 4 41), where they enjoy rest and peace, guarded by angels (Eth. En. 100 5; 4 Ezra 7 15).

At the final judgment the righteous issue forth to receive their everlasting reward (80 2).

As regards the resurrection B_2 teaches as follows:—

In answer to the question, 'Wilt thou perchance change these things [i.e., man's material body] which have been in the world, as also the world?' (49 3), he shows in chap. 50 that the dead shall be raised with bodies absolutely unchanged, with a view to their recognition by those who knew them. This completed, the bodies of the righteous shall be transformed, with a view to an unending spiritual existence (51 1 3 7-9). They shall be made like the angels and equal to the stars, and changed from beauty into loveliness, and from light into the splendour of glory (51 10); they shall even surpass the angels (51 12).

The Pauline teaching in 1 Cor. 15 35-50 is thus in some respects a developed and more spiritual expression of ideas already current in Judaism.

In B_3 (chap. 85) there is the same despair of a national restoration as in B_2 , and only spiritual blessedness is looked for in the world of incorruption (85 4f.).

In dealing with 4 Esd. we shall adopt provisionally some of the critical results attained by Kabisch (cp ESDRAS [FOURTH]). Of the five independent writings which he discovers in it, two were written before 70 A. D. and three after.

i. The two former he designates respectively an Ezra Apocalypse and a Son of Man Vision.

a. The Ezra Apocalypse consists of 4 52-5 13 34 6 13-25 7 26-44 8 63-9 12 and is largely eschatological.

The signs of the last times are recounted at great length (5 1-12 6 21 f. 9 1-3 6), the destruction of Rome (6 3), and the advent of the Messiah the Son of God (5 6 7 26). Certain saints shall accompany the Messiah (7 28)¹—here we seem to have the idea of a first resurrection of the saints to the temporary Messianic kingdom, the general resurrection taking place at its close (7 31 f.)—and all the faithful who have survived the troubles that preceded the kingdom shall rejoice together with the Messiah 400 years.¹ Then the Messiah and all men shall die (7 29), and in the course of seven days the world shall return to its primeval silence, even as in the course of seven days it was created (7 30). Then the next world shall awake, the corruptible perish (7 31), all mankind be raised from the dead (7 32) and appear at the last judgment (7 33), and Paradise (the final abode of the righteous) and Gehenna be revealed (7 36). The judgment shall last seven years (7 43).

¹ The same idea is probably to be found in 13 52.

b. The Son of Man Vision (chap. 13) was composed probably before 70 A. D.

Many signs are to precede the advent of the Messiah (13 32), who will appear in the clouds of heaven (13 3 32). The nations, 'a multitude without number,' shall assemble from the four winds of heaven to attack him (13 5 34); but the Messiah will destroy them—not with spear or weapon of war (13 9 28), but 'by a flood of fire out of his mouth and a flaming breath out of his lips' (13 10 27), and 'by the law which is like fire' (13 38 49). The 'new Jerusalem' shall be set up (13 36). The Messiah shall restore the ten tribes (13 40 47) and preserve the residue of God's people that are in Palestine (13 48).

ii. The other three constituents of 4 Esd. were composed between 70 and 100 A. D.

c. The Eagle Vision (10 60-12 35). Here is predicted (12 33) the destruction of Rome through the agency of the Davidic Messiah (12 32; so Vv. except Lat.), who will save the remnant of God's people in Palestine, and fill them with joy to the end, the day of judgment (12 34).

d. An Ezra Fragment (14 1-17 18 27 36-47). Ezra is to be translated and to live with the Messiah till the twelve times are ended (14 9). Ten and a half have elapsed already (14 11). Great woes have befallen; but the worst are yet to come (14 16 f.). Does 14 9 imply that when 'the times are ended' there will be a Messianic kingdom like that in the Ezra Apocalypse discussed above (a)? This is not improbable if we compare 14 9 with 7 28. The parts of chap. 14 under consideration, therefore, may belong to that apocalypse.

e. The Apocalypse of Salathiel (3 1-31 4 1-51 5 13 6-10 6 30-7 25 7 45-8 62 9 13-10 57 12 40-48 14 28-35). The world is nearly at an end (4 44-50). As it was created, so it is to be judged, by God alone (5 56 6 6). Very few shall be saved (7 47-51 8 2 f.). Judgment and all things relating to it were prepared before the creation (7 70). It will come when the number of the righteous is completed (4 36); the sins of earth will not retard it (4 39-42). In the meantime, retribution sets in immediately after death (7 69 75 80 86 95 14 35). The souls of the righteous, who are allowed seven days to see what will befall them (7 100 f.), are guarded by angels in 'chambers' (7 75 85 95 121) till the final judgment, when glory and transfiguration await them (7 95 97). The souls of the wicked in torment roam to and fro in seven 'ways' (vias) which answer to the seven 'ways' of joy for the righteous (7 80-87 93). After the judgment their torments become still more grievous (7 84), and intercession, permissible now (7 106-111), can no longer be allowed (7 102-105), all things being then finally determined (7 113-115). This world now ends, and the next (7 113), which will be a new creation (7 75), begins. It is the time of the great reward of the righteous, who shall be bright as stars (7 97); yea, even brighter (7 125), for they shall shine as the sun, and be immortal (7 97). Paradise shall be their final abode (7 123).

The teaching of this book is closely allied to that of Apoc. Bar. B_2 .

Josephus, a Pharisee, gives a fairly trustworthy Pharisaic eschatology in Ant. xviii. 1 3 (cp SCRIBES).²

80. Josephus, The account in BJ iii. 8 5 is in a high degree misleading. In reality, Josephus 37-101 A. D. believed in an intermediate state for the righteous, and (see Ant. iv. 6 5) in a future Messianic age.³

(c) Development of special conceptions in first century

A. D. i. Soul and Spirit.—There is hardly a trace of what we have called 81. Special conceptions. (§ 20) the later doctrine of the soul and the spirit in the Jewish literature of the first century A. D.⁴

² A treatment of this passage of Josephus, with regard to its eschatological contents will be found also in Cheyne's OPs. 416 ff. 445 ff.

³ It is Josephus the courtier who speaks in BJ vi. 5 4.

⁴ In Baruch 1-3 8, which belongs in eschatological character to the OT, this teaching appears, and the term 'spirit' is used in its later sense in 2 17. The dead that are in Hades whose spirit is taken from their bodies.' Still in 3 1 'spirit' and 'soul' are treated as synonymous according to the popular and older view. This part of Baruch may belong to the second or the last century B. C.

In Jubilees 23³¹ the departed are spoken of as 'spirits.' So likewise in Ass. Mos. (see Origen, In Jos. homil. 21). On the other hand Slav. En. speaks only of 'souls'; see 23 5 58 5. Again, whereas Apoc. Bar. uses in reference to the departed only the term 'soul'—cp 30 3 4 (51 15)—the sister work 4 Esd. uses both 'soul' (7 75 93 99 f.) and 'spirit' (7 78 80).

The author of Wisdom was clearly influenced by Gen. 2 4b-3; but his psychology is independent, and more nearly agrees with the popular dichotomy (14 8 19 f. 9 15). In the next life the soul constitutes the entire personality (31); 'spirit' is clearly a synonym (cp 15 8 and 15 16; also 16 14). There is, therefore, no trichotomy in 15 11. The difference between 'an active soul' (ψυχὴν ἐνεργούσαν) and 'a vital spirit' (πνεῦμα ζωτικόν) lies not in the substantives but in the epithets.¹ The soul here is not the result of the inbreathing of the divine breath into the body but an independent entity, synonymous with the spirit derived directly from God.

2. Judgment.—This century witnesses but little change in the current beliefs on this head. There is to be a preliminary judgment in all cases where a Messianic kingdom is expected (in Jub., Ass. Mos., Wisdom, and all the different constituents of Apoc. Bar. and 4 Esdras save B₂ and B₃ of the former and the Apoc. Salathiel of the latter). The final judgment is to be executed on men and angels (Jub., Slav. En. and Apoc. Bar.) at the close of the Messianic kingdom, or, where no such kingdom is expected, at the close of the age (Apoc. Bar., B₂ B₃), or when the number of the righteous is completed (4 Esdras, Apoc. Sal.). In 2 Macc. and Philo, however, no final judgment is spoken of. Each soul apparently enters at death on its final destiny. In this last respect alone is there a definite divergence from the beliefs of the last century B.C.

3. Places of abode of the departed.—There are many; but they have, for the most part, their roots in the past.

i. Heaven (or Paradise). The final abode of the righteous (Jub. 23³¹, Ass. Mos. 10 9, Apoc. Bar. 51).

ii. Paradise. (a) The final abode of the righteous (Slav. En. 8 f. 42 3 5 etc.; 4 Ezra 7 36 123). (b) The intermediate abode of the righteous (Jub. ?).

iii. Shēōl or Hades. (a) The abode of all departed souls till the final judgment (Apoc. Bar. 23 5 48 16 52 2; 4 Ezra 4 41; Josephus (see above)). Shēōl thus conceived, however, had two divisions—a place of pain for the wicked (Apoc. Bar. 30 5 36 11), and a place of rest and blessedness for the righteous (cp 4 Ezra 4 41).² This was called the 'treasuries' (cp Apoc. Bar. 30 2; 4 Ezra 7 75 85 95). (b) Hell (Jub. 7 29 22 22; 4 Ezra 8 53).

iv. Gehenna. This is now generally conceived as the final place of punishment for all the wicked, not for apostate Jews as heretofore (Ass. Mos. 10 10; 4 Ezra 7 36). It seems to be referred to in Wisdom (cp 4 19). In Slav. En. it is in the third heaven (cp 10 40 12 41 2).³

4. Resurrection.—(a) Resurrection of the saints to the Messianic kingdom. This is apparently the teaching of 4 Esdras 7 28. (b) General resurrection. According to all the authorities of this century as enumerated above (except Apoc. Bar. and 4 Esdras), there is to be a resurrection of the righteous alone. In B₂ of Apoc. Bar. (30 2-5 50 f.) and in the Ezra Apoc. in 4 Esd. (7 32-37) the resurrection involves all men. A resurrection or an immortality only of the soul is found in Jubilees, Ass. Mos., Philo, Wisdom and 4 Macc.

5. (a) Messianic kingdom.—See above (§ 71).

(b) Messiah.—We remarked above (§ 70 5) that from about 50 B.C. the Messianic hope rooted itself so firmly that henceforth the Messiah became, on the whole, the central figure in the theocratic kingdom. It may startle some to find that only five of the books we have dealt with express this hope (cp MESSIAH). The explanation, however, is not far to seek. Against the secularisation of the hope of the Messiah, favoured (see APOCALYPTIC, § 85) by the Psalms of Solomon, an emphatic protest was raised by a strong body of Pharisees, Quietists like the ancient Hāsids (above, § 57), who felt it to be their sole duty to observe the law, leaving it to God to intervene and defend them. This standpoint is represented by Ass. Mos., and later by the Salathiel Apoc. in 4 Esdras. Among the Jews of the dispersion, too, this view naturally gained large acceptance. Hence we find no hint of the ideas it protested against in the Slav. En., the Book of Wisdom, and 4 Macc. This opposition to the hope of the Messiah from the severely legal wing of Pharisaism at length gave way, however, and in Apoc. Bar. 53-74 (i.e., A₂) we have literary evidence of the fusion of early Rabbinitism and the popular Messianic expectation. How widespread was the hope of the Messiah in the first century of the Christian era may be seen not only from Jubilees (?), Philo, Josephus and the various independent writings in the Apoc. Bar. and 4 Esdras, but also from the NT and the notice taken of this expectation in Tacitus (Hist. 5 13) and Suetonius (Vesp. 4).

Since in all cases only a transitory Messianic kingdom is expected in this century, the Messiah's reign is naturally conceived as likewise transitory.

The Messiah is to be of the tribe of Judah (Jub. 31 18 f., 4 Esd. 12 32). According to Apoc. Bar. 27-30 1 and 4 Esd. 7 28 (i.e., Ezra Apoc., see above § 79, a) he is to play a passive part. In the former passage he is to appear at the close of the Messianic woes; in the latter, at the time of the first resurrection. He is not usually passive, however; in Apoc. Bar. 36-40 58-70 and 4 Esd. 10 60-12 35 he is a warrior who slays his enemies with the sword. Other writers, more loftily, substitute for a sword the invisible word of his mouth (4 Esd. 18 10; cp Ps. Sol. 17).

6. Gentiles.—In most works written before the fall of Jerusalem only the hostile nations are destroyed (see e.g., Apoc. Bar. 40 1 f. 72 4-6); but in later works (see 4 Esd. 13) this fate is suffered by all Gentiles. In no case have they any hope of a future life. They descend for ever either into Shēōl or into Gehenna. If, anywhere, they are represented as having part in the resurrection, it is only that they may be committed to severer and never-ending torment (4 Esd. 7 36-38).

C. NEW TESTAMENT

In entering the field of the NT we find at once a distinguishing peculiarity. The ideas inherited from the 82. NT writers, past are not in a state of constant flux in which each idea in turn appeals for acceptance, and enjoys through the system which it generates a brief career. The ideas are subordinated to the central force of the Christian movement.

In the next place we have to note that the teaching of Christ and of Christianity at last furnished a synthesis of the eschatologies of the race and the individual.

The true Messianic kingdom begun on earth is to be consummated in heaven; it is not temporary but eternal; it is not limited to one people, but embraces the righteous of all nations and of all times. It forms a divine society¹ in which the position and significance of each member is determined by his endowments and his blessedness conditioned by the blessedness of the whole. Religious individualism becomes an impossibility. The individual can have no part in the kingdom except through a living relation to its head; but this relation cannot be maintained and developed save through life in and for the brethren, and so closely is the individual life bound to that of the brethren that no soul can reach its consummation apart.

Of the large body of Jewish ideas retained in the system of Christianity thought many undergo a partial or complete transformation, and it is important at the outset to place this relation in a clear light. We cannot expect Christianity to be free from inherited conceptions of a mechanical and highly unethical character,² when we remember that in the Hebrew religion there were for centuries large survivals of primitive Semitic religion.

² Among those in Christianity which historical criticism compels us to assign to this class are the generally accepted doctrine of Hades, and the doctrine of eternal damnation.

Nor can we be surprised to find ideas which belong to different stages of development, not only in the NT as a whole, but also in the mind of the same NT writer. The fundamental teaching of Jesus, assimilated (it may be) more by one writer than by another, could not all at once transform the body of inherited eschatological ideas. The development of Paul will, if our results are correct, supply an instructive commentary on this axiomatic truth.

In what follows we shall deal first (§§ 83-101) with the books and groups of books in the order that will best bring to light the eschatological development. We shall then (§ 102 f.), as before, deal with the development of special conceptions.

1. THE BOOKS AND GROUPS OF BOOKS.—I. The eschatology of the Synoptic Gospels deals with the consummation of the kingdom of God. This kingdom is represented under two aspects, now as present, now as future; now as inward and spiritual, now as external and manifest.

83. The Synoptic Gospels. This kingdom is represented under two aspects, now as present, now as future; now as inward and spiritual, now as external and manifest.

Thus in Mt. 6:33 7:13 11:12 12:28 21:31 Lk. 17:21 it is already present, whereas in Mt. 6:10 8:11 26:29 Mk. 9:1 Lk. 9:27 13:28 f. 14:15 it is expressly conceived as still to be realised.

The two views are organically related, and are combined in a well-known saying of Jesus (Mk. 10:15), which declares that entrance into the kingdom as it shall be is dependent on a man's right attitude to the kingdom as it now is.

We shall deal next with the three great events which are to bring about the consummation of the kingdom: (a) the parusia (§ 84 f.), (b) the final judgment (§ 86), and (c) the resurrection (§ 87).

84. The parusia at hand. The parusia¹ or second advent introduces the consummation of the divine kingdom founded by the Messiah. It is certainly to take place at the 'close of the age' (συντέλεια τοῦ αἰῶνος), Mt. 13:39 f. 49:24 28:20. When we seek a more precise definition of time, however, we find in the Gospels two apparently conflicting accounts.

(i.) The parusia is within the current generation and preceded by certain signs. This was very natural, because in the OT the foundation and the consummation of the kingdom are closely connected. Hence Jesus declared that 'this generation' (ἡ γενεὰ αὕτη) should not 'pass away' till the prophetic description had been realised (Mt. 24:34). The description referred to (see Mt. 24 and Mk. 13; Lk. 21:5-35) is no doubt full; but these chapters appear to be derived in part from Jesus and in part from a Judaistic source. They identify two distinct occurrences, the destruction of Jerusalem and the end of the world.²

This is sometimes explained by the well-known theory of prophetic perspective (see ΠΡΟΦΗΤΕΥ); but the explanation is unsatisfactory. Illusions of the bodily eye are gradually corrected by experience until at last they cease to mislead; but it is not so with prophecy as regards either the prophet or those who accept his prophecy: both are deceived. That Jesus did expect to return during the existing generation (Mt. 10:23 16:27 f. Mk. 9:1 Lk. 9:26 f.) is proved beyond question by the universal hopes of the apostolic age. To speak of error in this regard, however, is to misconceive the essence of prophecy. So far as relates to fulfilment, it is always conditioned by the course of human development. OT prophecy and Jesus' own inner consciousness as God's Messiah pointed to the immediate consummation of the kingdom; but there was still possibility that it might be long delayed (Mt. 24:48 Lk. 12:45, also Mk. 13:35 Lk. 12:38 Mt. 25:5), and he expressly declared that the day and the hour of his return was known only to God (Mk. 13:32). This determination God had withheld from him because it was dependent not on the divine will alone but also on the course of human development. He could indicate, however, the 'signs of his coming', such as the appearance of many false Messiahs (Mt. 24:5 Mk. 13:22), 'deceived' by whom the nation would finally arise in arms against Rome, complete the national guilt, and entail on themselves destruction (see also ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION) (Mt. 23:36). These things would be as certainly prophetic as the growing greenness of the fig-tree (Mt. 24:32). The return of the Son of Man to judgment would be imminent (24:29-31). It should be noted, however, that documents from two very different sources appear to be combined here. See note 2 below.

² Among attempts to analyse the chapters that of Wendt (Die Lehre Jesu, 10-21) deserves attention. He traces Mt. 24:1-5 23:25 9-13 32 f. 36-42 (i.e., Mk. 13:1-6 21-23 9-13 28 f. 32-37) to Jesus, and the rest of this chapter to a Jewish Christian apocalypse written before 70 A.D. Cp also ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION. The present writer is of opinion that the solution of the difficulty must be found in some such theory as that of Wendt, which is a modification of that of Colani (Jésus Christ et les Croyanances Messianiques de son Temps, p. 201 f. [1864]). According to the Jewish apocalypse just referred to, the parusia was to be heralded by unmistakable signs, but this view is irreconcilable with another which teaches that the parusia will take the world by surprise (Mk. 13:33-36 Mt. 24:42-44 Lk. 12:35-40). This latter doctrine goes back undoubtedly to Jesus; the former is derived from traditional Judaism.

The same expectation is attested in Mt. 10:23, where Jesus declares to his disciples that they will not have gone through the cities of Israel before the coming of the Son of Man, and likewise in Mt. 16:27 f. Mk. 8:38 9:1 Lk. 9:26 f., where it is said that some shall not taste of death before that time. It must be abundantly clear from the evidence that the expectation of the nearness of the end formed a real factor in Jesus' views of the future. There are, on the other hand, many passages which just as clearly present us with a different forecast of the future, and this view demands as careful attention.

(ii.) The parusia will not take place till the process of human development has run its course, and the Gospel has been preached to Jew and Gentile.

The kingdom must spread extensively and intensively: extensively, till its final expansion is out of all proportion to its original smallness (cp the parable of the 85. At the end. mustard seed); intensively, till it transforms and regenerates the life of the nation, or rather of the world (cp the parable of the leaven, Mt. 13:31-33). This process has its parallel in the gradual growth of a grain of corn; the ripe fruit is the sign for harvest (Mk. 4:26 f.). The preaching of the Gospel too must extend to the non-Israelites (Mt. 23:7). To the Jews, who were on their last trial, it would appeal in vain (Lk. 13:34 f.). In the coming days the kingdom of God should be taken from them and given to others who would bear appropriate fruits (Mk. 12:9 Mt. 21:41 43 Lk. 20:16); their city should be destroyed (Mt. 22:7), the 'times of the nations' should come in (Lk. 21:24 only), and the glad tidings of the kingdom should be carried to all nations before the end should come (Mk. 13:10 and Mt. 24:14 [cp 24:5] Mt. 28:19).

This representation of the future obviously presupposes a long period of development. No less than that of the near parusia, it goes back to Jesus. The contingency that the more sanguine view, which is derived from OT prophecy, might not be realised, is acknowledged in Mt. 24:48 Lk. 12:45,² also in Mk. 13:35 where the possibility of an indefinitely long night of history preceding the final advent is clearly contemplated. It is hardly possible to avoid the conclusion that discourses relating to different events and from absolutely different sources are confused together in Mk. 13=Mt. 24=Lk. 21 (see § 84, n.).

¹ It is possible, as Weiss (Marcus-ev., 417) thinks, that the original form of this statement is to be found in Mt. 10:18 and that its present form is due to Mk.

² Beyschlag (NT Theology, ET 1 197 f.) points out that the words 'of that day or that hour knoweth no man, etc.' (Mk. 13:32 Mt. 24:36) cannot be reconciled with the words that precede them, 'This generation shall not pass away, till all these things be accomplished.' Accordingly he refers the latter to the destruction of Jerusalem (cp Mt. 23:36) and the former to the final judgment of the world. An interesting discussion of these chapters is given by Briggs (Messiah of the Gospels, 132-165). Weiffenbach (Wiedererkundigung der Jesu, 1873), like Colani, Pfeiderer, and Keim, seeks to show that in Mk. 13 (=Mt. 24=Lk. 21) there is a Jewish-Christian apocalypse interwoven with the genuine words of Jesus. This apocalypse consisted of three parts—(1) Mk. 13:7 f. giving the beginning of woes, (2) Mk. 13:14-20 giving the tribulation, (3) Mk. 13:24-27 giving the parusia. Wendt's modification of this theory has been referred to already. He and other scholars think that this is the oracle referred to by Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. iii. 5). It is impossible to treat seriously the statement of Weiss (NT Theology, 1 148) that there is no contradiction between Mk. 13:32 and 13:30 because 'the time of the current generation presented a very considerable margin for the determining of the day and hour.' This would be tantamount to saying, 'It will be within the next thirty or forty years; but I am not acquainted with the exact day or hour.'

b. The parusia was to be likewise the 'day of judgment' (Mt. 10 15 11 22 24 12 36), also called 'that day' (Mt. 7 22 24 36 Lk. 6 23 10 12 21 34).

Christ himself will be judge;¹ for all things have been delivered by the Father into his hand (Mt. 11 27). All nations shall be gathered before him (Mt. 25 32). He will reward every man according to his works (Mt. 13 41-43 49 f. 16 27 22 11-14).

86. The judgment. Amongst the judged appear his own servants (Lk. 19 22 f. Mt. 25 14-30), the Israelites (Mt. 19 28), the 'nations' (Mt. 25 32), not only the contemporaries of Jesus, but also all the nations of the past, Nineveh, the Queen of Sheba (Mt. 12 41 f. Lk. 11 31 f.), Sodom and Gomorrah (Mt. 11 20 24). The demons probably are judged at the same time (Mt. 8 29).

c. The kingdom is consummated, 'comes with power' (Mk. 9 1), on the advent of Christ. The elect are gathered in from the four winds (Mt. 24 31), and now, after being, we must assume, spiritually transformed, enter on their eternal inheritance (Mt. 25 34), equivalent to eternal life (Mk. 10 17). The kingdom, therefore, is of a heavenly, not of an earthly character: the present heaven and earth shall pass away on its coming (Mt. 5 18 24 35). The righteous rise to share in it; but only the righteous: the resurrection is only to life. Those who share in it are 'as angels in heaven' (Mt. 22 30 Mk. 12 25), 'are equal to the angels and sons of God, being sons of the resurrection' (Lk. 20 36). Only those, therefore, attain to the resurrection who 'are accounted worthy to attain to that world, and the resurrection from the dead' (Lk. 20 35). Elsewhere the third evangelist speaks of 'the resurrection of the just' (14 14). The entire context of Mt. 22 23-33 (= Mk. 12 18-27 Lk. 20 27-40) points clearly to the conclusion that the resurrection is conceived as springing from life in God. In such communion man is brought to the perfection to which he was destined. The righteous thus in an especial sense become 'sons of God,' inasmuch as they are 'sons of the resurrection' (Lk. 20 36).

In the resurrection, therefore, the wicked have no part. It has been said by some scholars that there must be a resurrection of all men in the body because all must appear at the final judgment; but the final judgment and the resurrection have no necessary connection.

In Jubilees there is a final judgment but no resurrection of the body, and in Eth. En. 91-104 there is a final judgment, but a resurrection only of the spirits of the righteous (91 10 92 3 103 3-4). The fact that demons and other disembodied spirits (Mt. 8 29) are conceived as falling under the last judgment is further evidence in the same direction.

As the righteous are raised to the perfected kingdom of God, the wicked, on the other hand, are cast down into Gehenna (Mt. 5 29 f. 10 28 Mk. 9 43 45 47 f.). The fire spoken of in this connection (Mt. 5 22) is not to be conceived sensuously; it is a vivid symbol of the terrible wrath of God. The place or state of punishment is also described as 'the outer darkness' (Mt. 8 12), the place of those who are excluded from the light of the kingdom. The torment appears to be a torment of the soul or disembodied spirit. See above, § 70 (3 iv.).

Though in conformity with Jewish tradition the punishment is generally conceived in the Gospels as everlasting, there are not wanting passages which appear to fix a finite and limited punishment for certain offenders, and hence recognise the possibility of moral change in the intermediate state.

Thus some are to be beaten with few, others with many stripes (Lk. 12 46-48). It is not possible to conceive eternal torment under the figure of a few stripes. Again, with regard only to one sin it is said that 'neither in this world (aiōn) nor in that which is to come' can it be forgiven (Mt. 12 32). Such a statement would be not only meaningless, but also in the highest degree misleading, if forgiveness in the next life were regarded as a thing impossible. It may not be amiss to find signs of a belief in the possibility of moral improvement after death in the rich man in Hades who appeals to Abraham on behalf of his five brethren slain on earth (Lk. 16 27-31).

¹ In the parables sometimes God himself is judge (Mt. 18 32 20 8 22 11 Lk. 18 7), sometimes the Messiah (Mt. 13 30 24 50 25 12 19).

2. In considering the Apocalypse, the whole of which (see APOCALYPSE) is eschatological, our attention must be confined to a few of its characteristic doctrines, the obvious meaning of which is independent of the various conflicting methods of interpretation that have been applied to the book. The book is remarkable for the large survivals of traditional Judaism which it attests. Its main object appears to be to encourage the persecuted church to face martyrdom. With this purpose its editor draws freely on current Jewish eschatology, some elements of which we shall notice in the sequel. We shall deal with its teaching under four heads.

88. The Apocalypse. (a) Parusia and Messianic judgment.—Every visitation of the churches, every divine judgment in regard to them is regarded as a spiritual advent of the Messiah (2 5 16 3 20); but this invisible coming ends in a final advent, visible to all. Its date is not revealed; but it is close at hand (3 11 22 12 20).

At Messiah's coming all families of men shall wail (1 7). In chap. 14 his coming is in the clouds of heaven, and the judgment appears under various symbolical figures. Thus he reaps the great harvest with a sharp sickle (14 14-16); he reaps the winepress of the wrath of God (14 17-20; cp 19 15). The judgment of the great day—'the great day of God' (16 14)—is presented under the image of illimitable slaughter, before the beginning of which the birds of prey are summoned to feast on the bodies and blood of men (19 17-19 21 cp 14 20). At ARMAGEDDON (g.v.) ANTICHRIST¹ [g.v.] and his allies are annihilated (16 16), the beast and the false prophet are cast into the lake of fire (19 20), and all their followers slain with the sword (19 21).

(b) First Resurrection, Millennium, uprising and destruction of Gog and Magog (cp GOG).

With the overthrow of the earthly powers, Satan—the old dragon, the old serpent—is stripped of all his might, and cast in chains into the abyss where he is imprisoned for a thousand years² (20 1-3). Thereupon ensues the Millennium,³ when the martyrs⁴ (and the martyrs only) are raised in the first resurrection and become priests of God (cp Is. 61 6) and Christ, and reign with Christ personally on earth for a thousand years (20 4-6) with Jerusalem as the centre of the kingdom. At the close of this period Satan is loosed, and the nations Gog and Magog—the idea is, with certain changes, derived from Ezek. 38 2 39 16 (see Gog)—are set up to make a last assault on the kingdom of Christ. In this attack they are destroyed by God himself, who sends down fire from heaven (20 9). The devil is then (as in the fully developed Zoroastrian belief) finally cast into the lake of fire (20 10).

(c) General resurrection and judgment.—These follow the Millennium, the destruction of the heathen powers, and the final overthrow of Satan.

Contemporaneously the present heaven and earth pass away (20 11; cp 21 1). God is judge; but in some respects the Messiah also (22 12; cp also 6 16 f.). All are judged according to their works, which stand revealed in the heavenly books (20 12). The wicked are cast into the lake of fire (21 8; see also 19 20 20 10). So likewise are Death and Hades⁵ (20 14). This is the second death⁶ (20 14 21 8). (See also 2 11 20 6.)

¹ Observe that, whereas in the Johannine epistles Antichrist denotes the false teachers and prophets, in the Apocalypse it designates Rome. In 2 Thess., on the other hand, Rome is a beneficent power which hinders the manifestation of Antichrist.

⁴ This idea also is mainly Jewish. In Is. 26 19 the reference may perhaps be to the bodies of Jews who had died for their religion in the troublous times of Artaxerxes (so Che. Intr. Is. 158; Isaiah, SBOT, ad loc.). In 4 Ezra 7 28 the saints who accompany the Messiah on his advent probably include the martyrs. In Rev. 20 4 it is said with reference to these saints, '(I saw) the souls of them that had been beheaded.'

⁵ Hades seems to be the intermediate abode of the wicked only; for it is always combined with death (see 1 18 6 8 20 13 f.). The souls of the martyrs have as their intermediate abode the place beneath the altar (6 9-11). The rest of the righteous were probably conceived as in Paradise or in the Treasuries of the righteous (see 4 Ezra).

⁶ The second death is the death of the soul, as the first is the death of the body. It is the endless torment, not the annihilation, of the wicked that is here meant. The expression is a familiar Rabbinic one; see Tg. Jer. on Dt. 33 6. The occupation of the martyred souls in the intermediate state reminds one

(d) Final consummation of the righteous.—The scene of this consummation is the new world—the new heaven and the new earth (21 1 5), the heavenly Jerusalem (21 10-21).¹

The ideal kingdom of God becomes actual. The city needs no temple; God and Christ (the Lamb) dwell in it (21 22). The citizens dwell in perfect fellowship with God (22 4), and are as kings unto God (22 5). The Messiah does not resign his mediatorial functions as in the Pauline eschatology. See 7 17 21 22 f.).

3. 2 Peter and Jude.—2 Peter is closely related to Jude—in fact presupposes it.

Like Jude, 2 Peter recounts various temporal judgments which the author treats as warnings to the godless of his own day. Thus he adduces the condemnation of the fallen 89. 2 Peter. angels to TARTARUS [q.v.] (where they were to be reserved till the judgment) (2 4), the Deluge (2 5 6), the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah (2 6). These, however, were but preliminary acts of judgment. The final 'day of judgment' (2 9 3 7) is impending. Meantime the unrighteous are kept under punishment (κολαζομένους)—i.e., in Hades (2 9). The ultimate doom of the wicked false teachers and their followers will be destruction (ἀπόλεια, 3 7); it is coming speedily upon them (2 3); they have brought it on themselves (2 1); they shall assuredly be destroyed (2 12). At the final judgment the world as it is shall perish by fire (3 7 10), as formerly by water (2 5 6), and new heavens and a new earth shall arise (3 12 f.). All this, however, shall not be till Christ's parusia (1 16 3 4 12). The last days are already come (3 4), and the parusia is postponed only through the longsuffering of God with a view to the repentance of the faithless (3 9), and their salvation (3 12). By holy living and godliness Christians could prevent any further postponement of the parusia (3 12). With the parusia the eternal kingdom of Christ (1 11) begins in the new heavens and the new earth, wherein the perfect life of righteousness shall be realised (3 13).

In Jude, the divine judgments in the history of the past are but types of the final judgment (e.g., Israelites in the desert, Sodom, Korah, and the 90. Jude. angels who were guilty of unnatural crime).

'Everlasting bonds under darkness' (v. 6), 'punishment of eternal fire' (v. 7), are the terms employed for the preliminary punishments of sinners. The 'judgment of the great day' (v. 6) is described in the well-known quotation from the patriarch Enoch. The extension of it to the angels is found also in 2 Pet. and in 1 Cor. 6 2; but for at least 300 years it had already been an accepted doctrine of Judaism. At this final judgment with which Jude menaces the godless libertines of his own day the faithful will obtain eternal life, through the mercy of Christ (v. 21).

4. James.—James is a production of primitive Jewish Christianity in which Christ's religion is conceived as the fulfilment of the perfect law, promise

91. James. nence being given to the doctrine of recompense.

Hence, whilst the fulfilment of the law under testing afflictions (πειρασμοί) led to a recompense of blessing (1 12 5 11), failure for those who are subjects of 'the perfect law, the law of liberty,' entails an aggravated punishment (2 12; cp 1 25). None, however, can fulfil the law perfectly (3 2), and so claim 'the crown of life' as their reward. Men who need forgiveness now (5 15) must need a merciful judge hereafter. By the law of recompense only the merciful will find God to be such (2 13; cp Ps. 18 25).

Moreover the judgment is close at hand. It is a day of slaughter for the godless rich (5 5). The advent of the Messiah who will judge the world is close at hand (5 8 f.). He alone can save or destroy (4 12). As faithful endurance receives life (1 12), so the issue of sin is death (1 15). A fire will consume the wicked, 5 3 (does this mean Gehenna?). Nor is it only to a death of the body that they will be delivered; it is a death of the soul (5 20). The faithful will enter into the promised kingdom (2 5).

5. There is a large eschatological element in Hebrews. The final judgment ('the day') is nigh at hand (10 25).

92. Hebrews. It is introduced by the final shaking of heaven and earth (12 26 compared with 12 25 29) and by the parusia. God is judge (10 30 f.), the judge of all (12 23). The second coming of Christ is coincident with this judgment; but he does not judge (9 27 f. 10 37).

Retribution is reserved unto this judgment (10 30), which will be terrible (10 31) and inevitable (12 25). The righteous expect Christ to appear not for judgment but for salvation (9 28). Their recompense is to be in heaven (6 19 f.), where they have an

of the departed spirits in Eth. En. 91-104: their whole prayer is for the destruction of their persecutors.

1 Quite inconsistently with the idea of a new heaven and a new earth the writer represents Gentile nations as dwelling outside the gates; cp 22 15.

ESCHATOLOGY

eternal inheritance (9 15), a better country (11 16), a city which is to come (18 14), whose builder and maker is God (11 9 f.). Then the present visible world (11 3), which is already growing old (1 10-12), will be removed, and the kingdom which cannot be shaken will remain (12 26-28). Into this new world the righteous will pass through the resurrection. There is apparently to be a resurrection of the righteous only.¹ This follows from 11 35: 'that they might obtain a better resurrection.' These words, which refer to the Maccabean martyrs (2 Macc. 7), set the resurrection in contrast with a merely temporary deliverance from death, and represent it as a prize to be striven for, not as the common lot of all. The blessedness of the righteous is described as a participation in the glory of God (2 10) and in the divine vision (12 14).

As regards the wicked, their doom is 'destruction' (10 39). This is something far worse than mere bodily death (9 27). It is represented as a consuming fire (10 27 12 29; cp 6 8). The destiny of the wicked² seems to be annihilation.

6. The sources for the Johannine eschatology are the

93. The Fourth Gospel and the epistles. The Johannine Apocalypse (§§ 14-17) springs from a different author, and belongs to a different school of eschatological thought.

Though these writings do not present us with any fresh teaching about hades and hell, their author furnishes us with principles which in themselves necessitate a transformation of the inherited views regarding the immediate and the final abodes of the departed. Thus when he teaches that God so loved the world as to give his only son to redeem it (Jn. 3 16), that 'God is love' (1 Jn. 4 8), that he is light, and in him is no darkness at all, hades, which is wholly under his sway, must surely be a place where moral growth is possible. The conception of a final eternal abode of the damned seems to find no place in a cosmos ruled by such a God as this writer conceives.

Whilst in a certain sense in the Johannine teaching the kingdom has already come, the Christ is already present, the faithful already risen, and the judgment already in fulfilment, we have to deal here not with these present aspects, but with their future consummation.

The salient points of the Johannine eschatology may be shortly put as follows. (a) The parusia is close at hand. (b) It ushers in the resurrection of the dead and the final judgment. (c) Thereupon believers enter into the perfect life of heavenly blessedness and through the vision of God are transformed into his likeness.

(a) The parusia is foretold in Jn. 14 3, where Jesus promises that he will return from heaven and take the disciples unto himself that they may be with him where he is—i.e., in heaven.³

That 14 2 f. cannot be interpreted of his coming to receive his disciples individually on death is shown by 21 22. According to the NT writers death translates believers to Christ (2 Cor. 5 8 Phil. 1 23 Acts 7 59); he is nowhere said to come and fetch them. This parusia is at hand; for some of his disciples are expected to survive till it appears (21 22), though Peter must first be martyred (21 18 f.). Even in extreme old age the apostle still hopes to witness it together with his disciples, whom he exhorts to abide in Christ that they may not be ashamed before him at his coming (1 Jn. 2 28). The close approach of the parusia is likewise shown by the appearance of false prophets and teachers who deny the fundamental truths of Christianity. In these the Antichrist manifests himself. Such a manifestation must precede the parusia (1 Jn. 2 18 22 4 1 3). Hence this is the 'last hour' (1 Jn. 2 18).

1 In 6 2 we have set forth the alternatives awaiting all men—on the one hand resurrection for the righteous, on the other eternal judgment (κρίμα αἰώνιον) for the wicked.

2 In the above the traditional views of scholars have in the main been followed; but this has not been done without some hesitation. The eschatology might be differently construed. Judgment sets in immediately after death in the case of each individual (9 27). In 6 2 11 35, as in Pss. Sol. and elsewhere, the resurrection may be not only confined to the righteous but also confined to the spirits of the righteous. Observe that God is spoken of as 'the Father of spirits' (12 9). An Alexandrian origin for the epistle would favour this view. The expression 'spirits of just men made perfect' (12 23) points in the same direction; for if the perfection meant is moral, these spirits must have already reached their consummation. If they have reached their consummation as spirits, however, the writer (as an Alexandrian) seems to teach only a spiritual resurrection. The chief obstacle in the way of this interpretation is the meaning of the words 'to perfect' and 'perfection.' See Weiss, Bib. Theol. of NT 123.

3 In a spiritual sense Christ has come already (1 Jn. 5 12): 'he that hath the Son hath the life.'

(b) On the last day Jesus himself, as the resurrection and the life (Jn. 11 25), raises his own to the resurrection-life (6 39 f. 44 54 11 25), a life that believers indeed already possess (6 24 f. 8 51; cp 3 15 f.). Resurrection of all the dead is taught in 6 28 f.

It is clear, however, from the leading thoughts of the Fourth Gospel that a resurrection of the wicked—i.e., 'a resurrection of judgment'—can be nothing more than a deliverance of the wicked to eternal death at the last day. 5 28 f. which teach a general resurrection of the dead are most probably interpolated (see Wendt, Lehre Jesu, 1 249-251; Charles, Doctrine of a Future Life, 370-372). In the Fourth Gospel the resurrection is synonymous with life. Hence in some form the resurrection life follows immediately on death, though its perfect consummation cannot be attained till the final consummation of all things. It is Jesus also who executes the final judgment. This is the result of his unique mediatorial significance. The Father judgeth no man but has committed all judgment to the Son (6 22 27).² In a certain sense believers do not incur judgment (3 18 3 24); but this judgment is that which is present and subjective,³ and in this respect the world is judged already (3 18 12 31). The final result of this daily secret judgment must however one day become manifest; believers must appear at the final judgment. They shall, however, have boldness there (1 Jn. 2 28 4 17). A man's attitude to Christ determines now, and will determine finally, his relation to God and his destiny (1 Jn. 3 18 f. 9 39).

(c) The final consummation is one of heavenly blessedness.

After the resurrection and the final judgment the present world shall pass away (1 Jn. 2 17), and Christ will take his own to heaven (Jn. 14 2 f.); for they are to be with him where he is (12 26 17 24). Eternal life is then truly consummated. Begun essentially on earth, it is now realised in its fullness and perfected. The faithful now obtain their 'full reward' (2 Jn. 8). As 'children of God' they shall, through enjoyment of the divine vision, be transformed into the divine likeness (1 Jn. 3 2 f.).

7. Acts 3 12-26 may be accepted provisionally as representing the teaching of Peter (cp, however, ACTS, § 14); nor do we see any reason at all for hesitating to receive 1 Peter as fully Petrine (cp, however, PETER [EPISTLES], § 5). The passage in Acts is, at any rate, of great historical value as embodying a highly Judaistic view, and as showing how much in this view had eventually to yield in the Christian church to distinctively Christian principles. The speech ascribed to Peter anticipates that the kingdom of God will be realised in the forms of the Jewish theocracy (cp Acts 16), and that the non-Israelites will participate in its blessings only through conversion to Judaism (3 26). Hence also Jesus is conceived, not as the world-Messiah, but as the predestined Messiah of the Jews, 3 20 (τὸν προκεχειρισμένον ὑμῖν Χριστὸν Ἰησοῦν). We now see clearly what the much-tortured phrase 'the times of the restoration (ἀποκατάστασις) of all things in 3 21 cannot be. It has nothing to do with such a speculative question as the ultimate and universal destiny of man. Acts 10, if it proves anything, proves this—that Peter was unacquainted with the destination of the Gospel to the Gentiles. 'The restoration' must mean either the renewal of the world, or else, much more probably, the moral regeneration of Israel (see Mal. 4 6, and Jesus' application of the passage in Mt. 17 11).

Jewish hearers are urged to repent that they may be forgiven, and so hasten the parusia. The parusia and 'the seasons of refreshing' (3 19) are connected. Either the ἀποκατάστασις is preparatory to the parusia or else it is synonymous with 'the seasons of refreshing,' and if so it would appear to belong to an earthly Messianic kingdom.⁴

² In 8 50 there is a reference to God as executing judgment; but in 5 22 it is said that the Father judgeth no man. Wendt (Teaching of Jesus, 2 305 f.) rejects as interpolations in an original Johannine source 5 28 f. as well as portions of 6 39 f. 44 54, and 12 48 relating to the Messianic judgment.

³ The judgment besides being future and objective is also present and subjective. It is no arbitrary process, but the working out of an absolute law, whereby the unbelieving world is self-condemned. Cp 3 17-19 5 24 12 47 f.

⁴ The phrase καιροὶ ἀναψύξεως is hardly intelligible on any other theory; but the word ἀνάψυξις should probably here be

In 1 Peter, as in Acts 3, believing Israelites still form the real substance of the Christian church; but—here

95. 1 Peter. note the step in advance—this church embraces all who come to believe in Christ, non-Israelites equally with Israelites, in this world or the next (3 19 4 6). Further, it is not an earthly consummation of the theocracy, but one reserved in heaven, that is looked for (1 4). The goal, then, of the Christian hope is this 'salvation ready to be revealed at the last time' (1 5), which salvation or consummation is initiated by the revelation of Jesus Christ and the judgment of the world. Though God is declared in general terms to be the judge (1 17 2 23), this final judgment is expressly assigned to Christ (4 5). Still the 'end of all things' is near (4 7), for judgment has already begun with the 'house of God'—i.e., the church of believing Israel (4 17).

Persecution is sifting the true from the false members of the Church. Such afflictions, however, will last but 'a little while' (1 6 5 10). Then Christ will be revealed (1 7 5 4), to judge both the living and the dead (4 5), both the righteous and the wicked (4 17 f.?). The approved disciples will share with their lord in 'eternal glory' (5 10), they will 'receive the crown of glory' (5 4), and live such a life as that of God (4 6).

The question of chief importance in the Petrine eschatology has still to be discussed. It centres in the two difficult passages which describe 96. 'Spirits in the preaching to the spirits in prison,' etc. (3 19-21), and the preaching of the gospel to the dead (4 5 f.).¹ The interpretations are multitudinous. The majority attribute a false sense to the phrase 'the spirits in prison.' This phrase can be interpreted only in two ways. The spirits in question are either those of men in Shēōl, or the fallen angels mentioned in 2 Pet. 2 4 Jude 6. In the next place the words 'in prison' denote the local condition of the spirits at the time of preaching. Hence, according to the text, Christ 'in the spirit' (i.e., between his death and his resurrection) preached the gospel of redemption (for so only can we render ἐκήρυξεν) to human or angelic spirits in the underworld.

With the more exact determination of the objects of this mission we are not here concerned; for, however it be decided, we have here a clear statement that, in the case of certain individuals human or angelic, the scope of redemption is not limited to this life.

We have now to deal with 4 5 f., . . . who will have to give account to him that is ready to judge the living and the dead. For with this purpose was the gospel preached to the dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh (body), but live according to God in the spirit.' The doctrine we found stated above in 3 19-21 is here substantiated, as being part of the larger truth now enunciated. Christ is ready to judge the living and the dead—the latter no less than the former; for even to the dead was the gospel preached² in order that though they were judged in the body they might live the life of God in the spirit. Thus it is taught that when the last judgment takes place the evangelium will already have been preached to all. As to how far this preaching of redemption succeeds, there is no hint in the Petrine teaching.

rendered 'rest' or 'relief'; for it is ὄρα rendering of רחוק in Ex. 8 15. If it is taken so, it finds a perfect parallel in 2 Thess. 1 7 where Paul uses ἀνάψυξις in the same connection. This 'rest' is promised also in Asc. Is. 4 15.

² The tense of ἐκήρυξεν creates no difficulty here. This preaching is regarded as a completed act in the past, because, as 4 7 declares, 'the end of all things is at hand.' Even if this were not so, the acrostic can be used of a continuous practice (cp 1 Cor. 9 20 Jas. 2 6).

These passages in 1 Peter are of extreme value. They attest the achievement of the final stage in the moralisation of Shēōl. The first step in this moralisation was taken early in the second century B.C., when it was transformed into a place of moral distinctions (§ 3 [3]) having been originally one of merely social or national distinctions (§§ 10-18). This moralisation, however, was very inadequately carried out. According to the Judaistic conception souls in Shēōl were conceived as insusceptible of ethical progress. What they were on entering Shēōl, that they continued to be till the final judgment. From the standpoint of a true theism can we avoid pronouncing this conception mechanical and unethical? It precludes moral change in moral beings who are under the rule of a perfectly moral being.

8. In the writings of Paul we find no single eschatological system. His ideas in this respect were in a state of development. He began with an expectation of the future inherited largely from traditional Judaism; but under the influence of great fundamental Christian conceptions he parted gradually from this and entered on a process of development in the course of which the heterogeneous elements were silently dropped.

Four stages are marked out. Even in the last Paul does not seem to have attained finality, though he was still working towards it. It is permissible, therefore, for his readers to develop his thoughts in symmetrical completeness and carry to its conclusion his chain of reasoning.

The various stages are attested by (i.) 1 and 2 Thess. (§ 98); (ii.) 1 Cor. (§ 99); (iii.) 2 Cor. and Rom. (§ 100); (iv.) Phil., Col., Eph. (§ 101).

(i.) The Epistles to the Thessalonians (on the criticism and contents of which cp THESSALONIANS) present us with the earliest form of the Pauline teaching

98. 1 and 2 Thess. and eschatology. They constitute, in fact, the Pauline apocalypse. In this apocalypse the salient points are (a) the great apostasy and the antichrist; (b) the parusia and final judgment; (c) the resurrection and blessed consummation of the faithful. In his teaching on these questions Paul appeals to the authority of Christ. What he puts before his readers in 1 Thess. 4:15-17 is derived from the Lord (see v. 15). There is, however, a fixity and rigidity in the teaching of the apostle which is not to be found in that of Jesus.

(a) The apostasy and the antichrist.—Paul starts from the fundamental thought of Jewish apocalyptic. When the forces of good and evil in the world have reached their limit of development, God will intervene. There will therefore be nothing sudden, nothing unethical in this. The conditions of the crisis are moral, and those who, morally speaking, can, and those who cannot be saved, will be distinguished gradually and surely. The day of the Lord cannot come till the antichrist (a figure found only in the early Paulinism) and the ἀποστασία have become facts.

The antichrist is described as 'the man of sin, the son of perdition, whose coming is according to the working of Satan'—or, as is also said, 'with all unrighteous (untruthful) deceit for those who are perishing' (2 Thess. 2:39 f.). The ἀνομία which 'already works' (2 Thess. 2:7) must reach its climax in a person—in the antichrist whose manifestation or parusia (2 Thess. 2:9) is the Satanic counterfeit of the true Messiah's. This person is also described as the antithesis of every known divine form, because he places his throne in the temple in Jerusalem, 'setting himself forth as God' (2 Thess. 2:4). Now, the time of the end is come; the Lord will at once descend and 'slay him with the breath of his mouth, and consume him with the manifestation of his parusia' (2 Thess. 2:8).

Whence antichrist was to proceed—whether from Judaism or heathenism¹—it is difficult to determine.

¹ See ANTICHRIST. Weiss (Theol. of NT, ET 1305-311) maintains the Jewish origin of antichrist. He argues that an apostasy, in strictness, was impossible in heathenism. The real obstacle to the spread of the teaching of Christ lay in fanatical Jews, the 'unreasonable and evil men' of 2 Thess. 3:2 (cp also 1 Thess. 2:18), who having mostly remained 'unbelieving' (Acts 18:6 2 Thess. 1:8), had always pursued Paul with persecution

That the apostle did not conceive him as proceeding from Rome is clear; for ὁ κατέχων is none other than Rome¹ (see ANTICHRIST, § 7).

(b) Parusia and final judgment.—We have seen when Christ's parusia (1 Thess. 3:13 2 Thess. 2:1) is to come. The precise day is uncertain: it 'comes as a thief in the night' (1 Thess. 5:2; cp Mt. 24:43); but the apostle expects it in his own time (1 Thess. 4:15 17).

With what vividness and emphasis he must have preached the impending advent of Christ is clear from 1 Thess. 5:1-3, as well as from 2 Thess., where he has to quiet an excitement almost bordering on fanaticism. When Christ descends from heaven (1 Thess. 1:10 4:16 2 Thess. 1:7), angels will accompany him as his ministers (2 Thess. 1:7), and his glory will then first be fully revealed.

The parusia is likewise the day of judgment, as the designations applied to it show. It is beyond doubt meant by the phrases the 'day of the Lord,' 'the day,' 'that day' (1 Thess. 5:2 2 Thess. 1:10). This judgment deals with antichrist and all the wicked, whether Jews or Gentiles, whether simply careless or actively hostile. The doom of the wicked is 'eternal destruction' (ὀλεθρὸς αἰώνιος, 2 Thess. 1:9, cp 1 Thess. 5:3; cp ἀπώλεια, 2 Thess. 2:10).

We see here the intolerance of the inherited eschatology. Later it is not the consummation of human evil but the triumph of Christianity that ushers in the fulness of the times and the advent of Christ. To the apostle's maturer mind God so shapes the varying destinies of Jew and Gentile 'that he may extend his mercy unto all' (Rom. 11:32).

(c) The resurrection and the blessed consummation of the faithful.—There was an apprehension among Paul's young converts that those who died before the parusia would fail to share in its blessedness. Hence the apostle refers them to a special statement of Christ on this subject (1 Thess. 4:15). The dead in Christ are to rise first (1 Thess. 4:16; but the teaching on this point is not quite clear),² by which is meant a contrast, not between a first and a second resurrection, but rather between two classes of the righteous who share in the resurrection. The first are those who have died before the parusia; the second, those who survive to meet it. Both are 'caught up to meet the Lord in the air.' Thus the elect are gathered together to Christ (2 Thess. 2:1; cp Mt. 24:31). There is no reference to a resurrection of the wicked in these two epistles.³ It is and calumny (Acts 9:23 f. 29 13:45) and stirred up the heathen against him (13:50 14:2 5:19 17:5 13). These men, who had slain Christ and the prophets, were now the relentless persecutors of his Church. When we further observe that the false Messiah or antichrist regards the temple at Jerusalem as the dwelling-place of God (2 Thess. 2:4), the Jewish origin of the antichristian principle seems in a very high degree probable. Sabatier, The Apostle Paul (ET 119-121), however, is now less confident than formerly of the correctness of this view. His present opinion reminds us somewhat of Beyschlag's (NT Theology, ET 257 f.).

² According to 1 Thess. 3:13 the dead are to accompany Christ at his parusia—that is if we take ἄγγελοι here as 'the faithful' (usage suggests this) and not as 'the angels.' 2 Thess. 1:7 speaks of angels, but purely as agents of the divine judgment. That we are to understand 1 Thess. 3:13 of men, not of angels, is clear from 1 Thess. 4:14. According to 3:13 4:14, therefore, the resurrection of the faithful dead is coincident with the advent; but according to 4:16 it is subsequent to the advent.

³ Indeed there could not be a resurrection of the wicked according to Paul's views (see § 99 [2]). The statement attributed to Paul in Acts 24:15 that there shall be a resurrection both of the just and of the unjust cannot therefore be regarded as an accurate report. To share in the resurrection according to the all but universal teaching of the NT writers is the privilege only of those who are spiritually one with Christ and draw their life from the Holy Spirit. There are two passages—Jn. 5:28 f. and Rev. 20:12—that attest the opposite view; but the latter is hardly here admissible as evidence of distinctively Christian doctrine, and the former contradicts the entire drift of the Fourth Gospel in this respect. In all Jewish books that teach a resurrection of the wicked, the resurrection is conceived not as a result of spiritual oneness with God but merely as an eschatological arrangement for the furtherance of divine justice or some other divine end.

to be inferred that after the resurrection the world, from which the righteous have been removed, is given over to destruction, whilst, for the righteous, there is now the final boon of 'being for ever with the Lord' (1 Thess. 4.17). Christ's people, who are organically connected with him, will be raised even as he (1 Thess. 4.14), and therefore not to an earthly life, but to the obtaining of the glory of our Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Thess. 2.14) in the completed kingdom of God (1 Thess. 2.12 2 Thess. 1.5).

(ii.) The second stage in the development of the Pauline eschatology is to be found in 1 Corinthians.

99. 1 Cor. In many respects the teaching of this epistle is in harmony with that of the epistles to the Thessalonians; but it is without antichrist. Other divergencies will appear in the sequel. Three subjects are prominent: (a) the parusia and the final judgment; (b) the resurrection; and (c) the consummation of the blessed.

(a) The parusia and final judgment.—Paul looks forward to the parusia of Christ¹ (1 Cor. 4.5 11.26 15.51 16.22), which will be preceded by severe trials (7.26 28).² The interval preceding the parusia will be shortened in order that the faithful may keep themselves free from the entanglements of this life (7.29, cp Mt. 24.22). This second coming will immediately manifest Christ's glory and bring the world to a close (17.1, cp 2 Cor. 1.13.14). With it is connected the final judgment, at which the judge will be Christ (4.4.1).³

That the second coming is conceived as one of judgment is seen also in the designations elsewhere applied to it ('the day of our Lord Jesus Christ', 18; 'the day', 3.13; 'the day of the Lord', 5.5). From the above facts it follows that Paul did not expect the intervention of a millennial period between the parusia and the final judgment, as some have inferred from 1 Cor. 15.22-24. According to this passage every power hostile to God in the world is stripped of its influence by the time of the parusia. With the resurrection which ensues thereupon is involved the destruction of the last enemy, death (15.26). Thus the parusia, accompanied by the final judgment and the resurrection, marks the end of the present age and the beginning of the new. The angels are to be judged; but their judges are the righteous (1 Cor. 6.3; see, on Bk. of Wisd., above, § 76).

(b) The resurrection.—The resurrection of man is connected organically with that of Christ. As God has raised up Christ, so also he will raise us (1 Cor. 6.14, cp 2 Cor. 4.14).

The doctrine of man's resurrection had been denied by certain members of the church of Corinth, who did not question the resurrection of Jesus. To these the apostle rejoined that both were indissolubly united and stood or fell together. The ground of man's resurrection-hope was his living fellowship with Christ (15.22). The relation manifestly in each case is the same. As it cannot be natural and genealogical it must of necessity be ethical and spiritual. Furthermore, from the position of the words (ἐν τῇ Ἀδὰμ πάντες ἀποθνήσκουσιν) the 'in Adam' must be connected with 'all.' Hence it is equivalent to 'all who are in Adam.' Similarly 'all in Christ' = all who are in Christ.⁴ Thus the verse means: 'as all who are ethically in fellowship with Adam die, so all who are spiritually in fellowship with Christ shall be made alive.' This being made spiritually alive⁵ (ζωοποιεῖσθαι) involves the 'being raised' (cp Rom. 8.11). There can be no resurrection but in Christ.

That the righteous alone are raised we shall be forced to conclude also from Paul's teaching on the origin of the resurrection body in 15.35-49.

In answer to the question how the dead are raised, Paul rejoins: 'thou wilst one, that which thou sowest is not brought to life, except it die' (15.36). That is, a man's own experience should overturn the objection that is raised. The death of the seed consists in the decomposition of its material wrappings. By this process the living principle within it is set ¹ So also in Phil. 3.20.1, yet he had always before him the possibility of meeting death. This is perhaps the case in 1 Cor. 15.31.1.

² This is the nearest approach to the terrible picture of the future troubles in Thess.

³ As in Thessalonians (see above, § 98). This doctrine appears also in 2 Cor. 5.10 'the judgment seat of Christ.' The judgment is also spoken of as the judgment of God (Rom. 14.10). Cp also Rom. 2.5.13 6.14.12. In Rom. 2.16 the two views are reconciled; God will judge the world through Jesus Christ.

⁴ For similar constructions see 15.18 1 Thess. 4.16.

free and seizes hold of the matter around it wherewith it forms for itself a new body.¹ In like manner the resurrection is effected through death itself. What appears as the obstacle is actually the means. The spirit of man must free itself from the body which contains it before it fashions for itself a body that is incorruptible.

We are next instructed as to the glorious nature of the resurrection body (15.42-44). The sowing here cannot mean the burying of the body in the grave: such a meaning of 'sow' (σπείρειν) is wholly unattested: it is rather the placing the vital principle or spirit in its material environment here on earth, where the spirit of man, like a seed, gathers and fashions its body from the materials around it. The life of man in this world from its first appearance to the obsequies that attest its departing is analogous to the sowing of the seed in the earth.

That this is Paul's meaning will become clearer if we consider the opposing members in the various contrasts drawn in 15.42-44. Thus, it is sown in corruption (15.42). This description is no doubt applicable to the interment of the body; but the first members of the following antithesis are quite inapplicable. The phrase 'in corruption' is especially Pauline in reference to the present life of man. This life is in 'the bondage of corruption' (Rom. 8.21), and the living body is undergoing corruption (2 Cor. 4.16). Furthermore 'flesh and blood,' the constituents of the present living body, are declared in 1 Cor. 15.50 to be 'corruption.' 'In disbonour' denotes the miseries of this earthly life, which we experience in this 'body of our humiliation' (Phil. 3.21). 'Weakness' is another fitting description of the body as an agent of the spirit—'the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak.'² See also 1 Cor. 2.3.1, 2 Cor. 12.9.1, for the contrast 'weakness and 'power' as here. To apply such a term as weakness to the dead body would be absurd. Finally, this present body is psychical as an organ of the psychè or 'soul,' just as the risen or spiritual body is an organ of the 'spirit.' Thus as the psychical body is corruptible, and clothed with humiliation and weakness, the spiritual body will enjoy incorruptibility, honour, and power. Hence between the bodies there is no exact continuity. The existence of the one depends on the death of the other. Nevertheless there is some essential likeness between them. The essential likeness proceeds from the fact that they are successive expressions of the same personality, though in different spheres. It is the same individual vital principle that organises both.

From this description of the resurrection body, it is obvious that only the righteous can share in the resurrection.

We have dealt with the characteristics of the risen body and its relation to the present body. The question now arises, When does this resurrection of the body occur? In conformity with the universal Jewish tradition Paul makes it to follow on the parusia. Such a time-determination, however, fails to establish an organic connection with the doctrine of the risen body stated above.

Unless our interpretation of that doctrine is wholly wrong, its entire trend points not to a period externally determined and at some possibly remote age, but to the hour of departure of the individual believer. The analogy of the seed points in this direction. Seeing that with the corruption of the material husk the vital principle is set free to form a new body or expression of itself, the analogy urged by Paul ought to lead to the inference that with the death of the present body the energies of the human spirit are set free to organise from its new environment a spiritual body—a body adapted to that environment. Thus in a certain sense the resurrection of the faithful would follow immediately on death, and not be adjourned to the parusia. Of this variance between his living and growing thought and his inherited view, Paul does not seem conscious in 1 Cor.

In 2 Cor. we shall find that he has become conscious of the inherent inconsistencies in his former view, which he is deserting in favour of the doctrine of a resurrection of the righteous following immediately on death.

(c) The final consummation.—With the resurrection of the righteous dead and the transfiguration of the righteous living, death is finally overcome (1 Cor. 15.26 51-54). The end has come (15.24 18), when the Son 'will surrender to God, to the Father, the kingdom' which he has ruled since his exaltation. The resurrection¹ of the righteous dead will take place in a moment, at the last trump (1552).

Then will follow the transfiguration of the righteous living, when the corruptible shall put on incorruption and the mortal immortality (1553), and the institution of the perfected kingdom of God² in a new and glorious world that has taken the place of the present, which is already passing away (1 Cor. 7.31). That which is perfect has then come (1310), and the blessed, in immediate communion, see God face to face (1312).

In this perfected kingdom God has become 'all in all' (1528). This statement is limited to the blessed. It does not apply to the powers in 1525 28. These have been reduced to unwilling obedience.

(iii.) In 2 Corinthians and Romans we arrive at the third stage in the development of the Pauline eschatology. The development is apparent mainly in a change of view as to the time of the resurrection and in enlarged conceptions as to the universal spread and comprehensiveness of Christ's kingdom on earth. We shall range our evidence under four heads.

(a) Parusia and judgment.—The parusia is 'the day of our Lord Jesus Christ' (2 Cor. 1.14; cp Phil. 1.6 to 2.16). The judge will be Christ (2 Cor. 5.10)—likewise God (Rom. 14.10; see col. 1383, n. 3). All men must appear before the judgment seat (Rom. 14.10, cp 12). The judgment will proceed according to works (Rom. 2.6); for if faith is operative it can be only in the sphere of works.

The purpose of the mission of Christ is 'that the righteous demands of the law might be fulfilled in us who live according to the spirit, not the flesh' (Rom. 8.4). We are what we make ourselves. Destiny is related to character as harvest to seed-time (Gal. 6.7f.). Every man bears in his character his own reward and his own punishment (2 Cor. 5.10). Hence, since character is the creation of will, arises the all-importance of the principle that rules the will. Retribution, present and future, follows in the line of a man's works (2 Cor. 11.15).³

(b) Universal spread of Christ's kingdom on earth.—Between the writing of 1 and 2 Thessalonians and that of Romans we have to place a great crisis of thought. In the earlier epistles, as we have seen, Paul looks forward to a great apostasy and the revelation of the 'man of sin' as the immediate precursor of the parusia. In Rom. 11, on the other hand, he proclaims the inner and progressive transformation of mankind through the Gospel; the conversion of the entire Jewish and non-Jewish worlds is the immediate prelude of the advent of Christ.

The 'unbelieving' Jews of to-day are indeed as 'vessels of wrath' (9.22), hastening to destruction. This temporary destruction of the race, however, has brought about the 'completion (πλήρωμα) of the nations,' and when the 'nations' have entered Christ's kingdom, then 'all Israel shall be saved' (11.25f.). God has thus shaped the history of both Jew and Gentile 'in order that he might have mercy upon all' (Rom. 11.32).

(c) The resurrection—the immediate sequel of departure from this life.—We have discovered in the earlier epistles certain inconsistencies in regard to the time of the resurrection. Although Paul formally adjourns this event to the parusia, his teaching with regard to the resurrection body is implicitly at variance with such a belief (§ 99, b). By the time when he wrote the second of the epistles to Corinth he had come to a conscious breach with the older view. The main evidence for this is found in 2 Cor. 5.1-8 (where a specially careful translation is required; see e.g., Weizsäcker's). In v. 4 Paul declares his wish to live till the parusia in order that he may escape the dissolution of the earthly body and be transformed alive. In other verses he faces the possibility of death, and comforts himself and his readers with the prospect before them. When we die we have (ἐρχομεν)—we come into possession of—an immortal body in heaven.

¹ Since the resurrection is possible only through living fellowship with Christ, there can be no resurrection of the wicked.

³ The retributive character of the judgment is expressed in still sharper terms in the later epistles (see Col. 3.25 Eph. 6.8).

That this is a real, not an ideal possession to be realised at the parusia, follows from the date assigned for our becoming possessed of it. Ideally, the faithful receive their immortal bodies at the time of their election (Rom. 8.29); actually, Paul now declares, at death. This idea of the future body being a divine gift in no way contradicts the teaching in 1 Cor. 15.35-49; it forms its complement and completion. We have already seen (§ 99, col. 1384, n.) that whereas, regarded from our usual standpoint, the new body is the result of a secret vital process, regarded from Paul's standpoint it may be called a divine gift. Similarly the glorified body is, in one aspect, the result of the action of the human spirit itself divinely quickened, in another an independent gift of God.

In 1 Cor. 15.35-49 the view that the resurrection follows immediately on the death of the faithful is implied; in 2 Cor. 5.1-8 it is categorically stated.

Of Paul's change of view we naturally expect to find further evidence in his references to the experiences of the faithful at the parusia, and such surely we find in Rom. 8.19: 'the earnest longing of the created world waiteth for the revelation of the sons of God.' At the second coming, just as there will be a revelation of Christ (1 Cor. 1.7 2 Thess. 1.7)—that is, a manifestation of the glory he already possesses—so there will be a manifestation of the glory already possessed by the faithful.

Thus Paul speaks no longer of a resurrection of the faithful to glory at the parusia, but of a manifestation of the glory they already possess. Glory (δόξα) is to be their clothing. In Col. 3.4 the manifestation of Christ and that of his people at his parusia are expressly connected.

(iv.) In Philippians, Colossians, and Ephesians¹ we have the final stage in the development of the Pauline eschatology, that which deals with the

101. Phil., Col., and Eph. cosmic significance of Christ. In the earlier epistles, whilst the creation of the world was effected through the Son (1 Cor. 8.6), its consummation was to be realised in the Father, when the Son had resigned to him his mediatorial kingdom (1 Cor. 15.24-28). In these epistles not only is the Son the creative agent and the principle of cohesion (συνέστηκεν, Col. 1.17) and unity in the cosmos; he is also the end to which it moves (εἰς αὐτόν, Col. 1.16), the head in which it is to be summed up (Eph. 1.10).

From the above Christology follow two conclusions.

(a) The everlasting duration of the kingdom of Christ. Whereas, according to 1 Cor. 15.28, God alone is 'all in all' in the final consummation, in the epistles we are now dealing with Christ also is conceived as 'all in all' (Eph. 1.23 Col. 3.11). Thus the goal of the universe is no longer, as in 1 Cor. 15.24-28, the completed kingdom of God in which God is 'all in all,' in contrast to the mediatorial kingdom of Christ; it is the 'kingdom of Christ and God' (Eph. 5.5).

(b) The extension of Christ's redemption to the world of spiritual beings. Since all things, in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible (whether thrones or dominions or principalities or powers), were created by Christ (Col. 1.16), and were (according to the same passage) to find their consummation in him (εἰς αὐτόν ἐκτίσται), they must come within the sphere of his mediatorial activity; they must ultimately be summed up in him as their head (ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι τὰ πάντα ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, Eph. 1.10). Hence, in the world of spiritual beings, since some have sinned or apostatised, they too must share in the atonement of the cross of Christ, and so obtain reconciliation² (Col. 1.20), and join in the universal worship of the Son (Phil. 2.10).

How successful this ministry of reconciliation in the spiritual world is, Paul does not inform us, nor yet whether it will embrace the entire world, and therefore the angels of Satan. Since, however, all things must be reconciled and summed up in Christ, there can be no room finally in the universe for a wicked being whether human or angelic. Thus the Pauline eschatology points³ obviously in its ultimate issues either to the final redemption of all created personal beings or to the destruction of the finally impenitent.

² 'Reconciliation' necessarily presupposes previous enmity; cp Eph. 2.16 and Sanday on Rom. 8.38.

II. DEVELOPMENT OF SPECIAL CONCEPTIONS.—It is the conceptions 'soul' and 'spirit' that chiefly need consideration here.

102. Special conceptions:

Soul and Spirit.

1. Outside the Pauline Epistles.—The meaning attached to the conceptions 'soul' and 'spirit' throughout the NT, except in the Pauline epistles, is in the main that which prevailed among the people.

(a) The Soul.—The 'soul' is conceived as the bearer both of the bodily-sensuous life and of the higher spiritual life.

(i.) In the former capacity the 'soul' is sustained by food (Mt. 6 25), is capable of sensuous impressions (Mk. 14 34), of suffering (1 Pet. 4), of sensuality (1 Pet. 2 11, 2 Pet. 2 14). It is from this conception of the soul that the adjective ψυχικός, EV 'sensual' derives its bad signification in James 3 15, Jude 19. If the blood is shed the soul departs (Mt. 23 35, Mk. 14 24 Acts 22 20); ψυχήν = 'to die' (Acts 5 5, 10 12 23). Further, as in the OT, the 'soul' is identified with the personality: so many souls = so many persons (Acts 2 41, 7 14, 27, 37, 1 Pet. 3 20).

(ii.) As in the Judaism of this time, the 'soul' is the seat also of the higher spiritual life: it is the subject of anxiety (Jn. 10 24), of grief (Mt. 26 38, Mk. 14 34, Lk. 2 35), of trouble (Jn. 12 27), of pleasure (Lk. 12 19, Heb. 10 38), of love (Mt. 22 37), of hate (Acts 14 2), in a spiritual sense it can become stronger (Acts 14 22), or suffer exhaustion (Heb. 12 3), can be subverted by heresy (Acts 15 24), protected (1 Pet. 4 19, Heb. 13 17), cleansed (1 Pet. 1 22). As the bearer of the personality, it survives death (Mt. 10 39), and passes first to an intermediate abode of the departed, to Hades (Acts 2 27, Lk. 16 23), or to Abraham's bosom (Lk. 16 23), or Paradise (Lk. 23 43). The departed are called 'souls' in Rev. 6 9, 20 4.

(b) The Spirit.—In the case of the 'spirit,' as in that of the 'soul,' we find—with possibly two or three exceptions—no fresh developments; only the acknowledged and popular conceptions of Judaism. The 'spirit' is the higher side of the soul.

Like the soul the 'spirit' is the subject of grief (Mk. 8 12), of trouble (Jn. 13 21), of joy (Lk. 1 46, 10 21), of indignation (Jn. 11 33, Acts 17 16), of zeal (Acts 18 25), of meekness (1 Pet. 3 4). It is the seat of purpose and volition (Acts 19 21, 20 22). Again, as with the soul, if the spirit departs, death ensues (Mt. 27 50, Lk. 23 46, Acts 7 59); the body apart from it is dead (James 2 26); but if it returns, so does life (Lk. 8 55). Thus ἐκπνεῖν in Mk. 15 37, 39, Lk. 23 46 is synonymous with ἐψύχειν.

The 'spirit' which so departs exists independently as the bearer of the personality. Hence, though the same or similar diction is found in the OT and in a few of the later books, the idea conveyed in either case is absolutely different. The NT usage is that of the current Judaism.¹ In the next life the departed are called 'spirits' (1 Pet. 3 19, 46, Heb. 12 23) as elsewhere they are called 'souls.'

The 'spirit' is the seat also of the higher spiritual life, and forms the antithesis of the flesh (σάρξ) Mk. 14 38.² Thus growth in the 'spirit' is set over against growth in the body (Lk. 18 24). The 'spirit' which God has placed in man 'longs' for man's salvation (Jas. 4 5). It discerns that which is not manifest to the senses (Mk. 28). In these cases we have approaches to the Pauline use. Thus in the NT there is no trichotomy except in the Pauline epistles—if such a term as trichotomy can be rightly used at all of the Pauline psychology. The only doubtful passage is Heb. 4 12.

2. In the Pauline Epistles.—Paul breaks with the entire traditional use of the terms 'soul' and 'body' and gives them a connotation in keeping with his theological system. He appears to teach a trichotomy in 1 Thess. 5 23; but the enumeration 'spirit, soul, and body' is no real expression of Pauline anthropology. At times indeed he describes man popularly as a synthesis of 'spirit and flesh' (Col. 2 5), 'spirit and body' (1 Cor. 5 3). It is to be observed, however, that he never uses the quite as popular expression 'soul and body'; his view of the 'soul' precluded its employment.

¹ According to Gen. 2 4b-3 the spirit is a breath of life from God, which on death returns to God the fount of life (Eccl. 12 7). As such it has no individual or personal existence. In Rev. 11 11, 13 15 the idea of Gen. 2 4b-3 is reproduced.

² In Mt. 10 28 man is described as a synthesis of body and soul.

With him the 'soul' is the vital principle of the flesh¹ (σάρξ), and is never conceived, as it is in all the other NT writers, as the bearer of the higher spiritual life. It has thus a very low connotation. The 'soulish' man (ψυχικός άνθρωπος, 1 Cor. 2 14) is incapable of receiving the things of the 'spirit.'

The Pauline doctrine of the 'spirit' is difficult. Only a brief treatment of the subject can be given here. The term spirit has, in the Pauline epistles, three distinct applications. The spiritual side of man may be regarded as (a) the intellectual and moral part of man; (b) the immaterial personality which survives death; (c) the immaterial part of man's nature which is capable of direct communion with the 'Spirit' of God—not, however, this faculty as it exists in itself, but as it is recreated by God.

In order to express (a) Paul has recourse both to Hellenistic and to Palestinian Judaism. From the former he borrows the phrase 'the inner man' (ὁ ἔσω ἄνθρωπος, Rom. 7 22). From the same source he adopts the term 'mind' (νοῦς, Rom. 7 23, 25), which belongs to 'the inner man' and signifies the higher nature of man as man. In the same sense he borrows from Palestinian Judaism the term 'spirit.' Thus we have the ordinary synthesis 'spirit and body' (1 Cor. 5 3), 'spirit and flesh' (Col. 2 5).² Compare also 1 Cor. 2 11, 2 Cor. 7 13. Now this higher side of man's nature may fall under the power of the flesh. Hence 'the mind' may become 'corrupt' (Rom. 1 28), 'the spirit' may be 'defiled' (2 Cor. 7 1).

To express (b) the immaterial personality which survives death Paul uses the term 'spirit' in 1 Cor. 5 5.

In the third sense (c) the term 'spirit' has a distinctively Pauline use. In this sense the 'spirit' is no longer synonymous with the 'mind' as in (a), but is its suzerain. They are clearly distinguished in 1 Cor. 14 14, f. The renewed spirit is 'our spirit,' and lives in communion with the Spirit of God (Rom. 8 16). By virtue of it man becomes spiritual (1 Cor. 2 15, 3 1), and 'a new creation' (Gal. 3 15), as opposed to the psychical creation in Gen. 2 4b-3.³ 'The mind' or 'the inner man' remains in the Christian as the sphere of human judgment (Rom. 14 5).⁴

Thus the Pauline psychology stands apart from that of the OT and the rest of the NT.

Judgment.—This has been dealt with separately under the different books.

Places of abode of the departed.—1. Paradise is (a) the abode of the blessed in Shēōl (Lk. 23 43, Acts 2 31).

(b) A division of the third heaven—being likewise an intermediate abode of the righteous (2 Cor. 12 4). (c) Apparently a final abode of the righteous (Rev. 2 7).

2. Hades is (a) an intermediate abode of the departed containing two divisions, for the righteous (= 'Abraham's bosom') and for the wicked respectively (Lk. 16 23); (b) an intermediate abode of the wicked only (?) (Rev. 1 18, 6 8, 20 13, f.); and (c) an intermediate abode of further moral probation (1 Pet. 3 19, 4 6; see § 96).

3. Tartarus is the intermediate place of punishment for the fallen angels (2 Pet. 2 4).

² Peculiar instances of the Pauline use of the 'spirit' are to be found in 2 Cor. 2 13, where we find the same feeling ascribed to it as to the 'flesh' in 7 5. In Phil. 1 27 there seems to be little difference between the 'spirit' and the 'soul.'

³ Cp 1 Cor. 15 46.

⁴ Observe that the 'spirit' of the Christian is expressly contrasted with the 'mind' (νοῦς) in 1 Cor. 14 14, f.

4. Gehenna is the final place of punishment for the wicked.

In Lk. 12.5 the punishment is clearly a punishment of the soul; the body is first destroyed on earth: 'Fear him who after he has killed has power to cast into Gehenna.' The passage has in Mt. 10.28 a different form: 'Fear him who is able to destroy both soul and body in Gehenna'; but Lk. 12.5 seems to be more original. Mt. 5.29 f. does not necessarily imply a punishment of the body: since 'eye' and 'hand' mean certain desires, the phrase 'the whole body' also must be symbolical.

From the above considerations Gehenna appears to be a place not of corporal but of spiritual punishment.

ESDRAELON, or, rather, as RV, Esdrelon, or Esrelon,¹ a place 'nigh unto Dotæa [Dothan], which is over against the great ridge² of Judæa' (Judith 39), and 'over against' which was Cyamon³ (73 RV). Esrelon is the Græcised form of 'Jezreel,' the name of the well-known city at the E. end of the great central plain of Palestine. In modern books 'Esdraelon' is sometimes used for the 'plain of Esdraelon,' a phrase which is not exactly accurate (see JEZREEL i., § 2), but can hardly now be set aside.

The phrases 'the great plain' (τὸ μέγα πεδῖον E., Judith 18; τὸ πεδῖον τὸ μέγα, 1 Macc. 12 49) and 'the great plain of E.' occur in the Apocrypha for the region called elsewhere 'the bih'ā of Megiddo' (מִגְדּוֹ מִבְּקָע, 2 Ch. 35 22; מִגְדּוֹ בְּ, Zech. 12 11). A bih'ā (from bq 'to cleave') is a level tract surrounded by hills (see VALE, 2); the term accurately describes this central plain, which is like a great gap 'cleft asunder' among the hills.

Esdraelon (now called Merj ibn 'Amir, or 'meadow of the son of 'Amir') is, in form, triangular; the base on the east extending fifteen miles, from Jenin to Tabor; one side, formed by the hills of Galilee, is 12 m. long, and the other, formed by the mountains of Samaria, 18 m. The apex is a narrow pass opening into the plain of Acre. (On the five gateways of Esdraelon, see GASm. HG 390 f.). This broad plain has for centuries attracted, as if by a spell, both nomad tribes and civilized hosts, who have coveted the rich lands of Palestine. See GALILEE (map of Galilee and Esdraelon).

Three eloquent pages are devoted by G. A. Smith⁴ to the historic scenes of Esdraelon, with the object of conveying, not so much the dry historic facts, as the impression which this pageant of embattled hosts is fitted to produce. To the biblical student, however, two memories dwarf all the others.

It was in this plain that Barak won his famous victory (Judg. 4 f.); here, too, that Josiah received his mortal wound (2 K. 23 29). Whether the apocalyptic seer expected the kings of the earth to assemble in the latter days on the mountains of Megiddo, is a difficult problem. See ARMAGEDDON. Let it be also noticed that one whose conquests were moral, not material, was no stranger to Esdraelon; the 'city called NAIN' (Lk. 7 11) was situated to the NE. of the great plain.

Esdraelon lies 250 feet below the sea-level, and is extremely fertile. The rich, coarse grass gives a pleasing aspect to the plain in spring-time, and yet the land is for the most part untouched by husbandry. What it might yield under better agricultural conditions is shown by the tall stalks of grain which spring up wherever corn is cultivated (W. Ewing, in Hastings, DB 1757 b.).

The only important stream is the Kishon, the southern affluents of which come from near Jenin, whilst the northern branch rises near el-Mezra'a, SW of Mt. Tabor (cp 'the torrent-course of Kishon,' Judg. 4 13). This drains the Great Plain, and falls into the sea at Haifa. There are numerous springs on the NE and W. The most noteworthy is that of Jenin (see EN-GANNIM, 2).

Among the places on the borders of the plain were Jokneam (the CYAMON of Judith 73), Megiddo, En-gannim, Jezreel (the city of Ahab), Shuneni, Nain, and Endor (the last three on the slopes of the Little Hermon). No important town was situated on the plain itself. Cp PALESTINE.

ESDRAS, FOURTH BOOK OF (or Second Book of). This important apocalypse is included in the Apocrypha of the EV. For this reason it is better known, by name at least, to the English-reading public than any similar book; although it is not now, and never has been, read in church. The Roman Church does not regard it as Scripture; but it is printed as an appendix to the authorised edition of the Vulgate, along with 1 Esdras (= 3 Esdras) and the Prayer of Manasses.

Probably the Greek text bore some such name as 'Ἀποκάλυψις Ἐσδρα (Westcott), Ἐσδρας ὁ προφήτης (Hilgenfeld) or Βίβλος Ἐσδρα τοῦ προφήτου.

1. Name. In almost all the versions in which we have Language. it a number forms part of the title, in order Versions. that it may be distinguished from the canonical Ezra or from the Greek form of that book known to us as 1 Esdras. These numbers range from 'First' to 'Fourth' Book. The title 'Second Book' is found only in some late Latin MSS, and in the Genevan Bible, whence the AV took it. It is now commonly referred to as 4 Esdras.

All the versions of the book are derived from a Greek text which has been lost. Of late years the view has begun to find favour (e.g. with Wellhausen, Gunkel, and Charles) that the original text was in Hebrew. We have the following versions:—(1) Latin: from this the EV is made. (2) Syriac: extant only in the great Peshitta MS in the Ambrosian Library at Milan. (3) Arabic: two independent versions from the Greek (Ar.⁽¹⁾ Ar.⁽²⁾). (4) Ethiopic. (5) Armenian: perhaps made from the Syriac.

Latin translations of nos. 2-5 (except Ar.⁽²⁾) are given in Hilgenfeld's Messias Judæorum, Leipsic, 1869. Ar.⁽²⁾ was edited separately by Gildemeister in 1877. (See APOCRYPHA, § 22 [13].) Hilgenfeld has made a retranslation into Greek (in Mess. Jud.) which is of great value.

The fullest form of the book is given in the Latin version, which alone contains four additional chapters

2. Contents. (1 f. 15 f.) which formed no part of the original work. They may be treated separately. The real apocalypse thus consists of chapters 3-14 of the book found in our Apocrypha. The general complexion and arrangement remind the reader of the apocalyptic portion of Daniel, to which indeed reference is made in 12 11. The apocalypse falls into seven sections containing separate revelations or visions.

First Vision: 3 1-5 13. In the thirtieth year of the spoiling of the city, Esdras, 'who is also Salathiel,' is disturbed by the thought of the desolation of Sion and the prosperity of Babylon. In a long prayer he reminds God of his special choosing of Israel, and of their present misery, and asks where is the justice of this dealing? The angel Uriel is sent to him and sets forth the unsearchableness of God's ways and the inability of man to judge them. Esdras asks how much time remains before the filling up of the number of the righteous. A vision shews him that a very short time remains. He asks, and is told, what will be the signs of the end.

Second Vision: 5 14-6 34. In a kind of interlude (5 14-19), Phaltiel the chief of the people comes to reproach Esdras for forsaking his flock. Esdras after fasting seven days (as Uriel had bidden him) addresses God again on his dealings with Israel. Uriel consoles him with thoughts which are very much like those of the First Vision: the weakness of man's judgment, the nearness of the end, and the signs of its approach.

Third Vision: 635-925. A fast of seven days is followed by an address of the seer to God, and a return of Uriel. This time the main discussion is on the fewness of the saved, and the main revelation is a long description of the final judgment and the future state of the righteous and the wicked.¹ The intercession of Esdras for the human race is carried on at great length, and he is promised further visions after a period of seven days.

Fourth Vision: 926-1059. The interval is spent in the 'plain of Ardat' (see ARDATH), and after it Esdras as usual pleads with God. He sees a mourning woman, who tells him how she has lost her only son. He tries to comfort her by reminding her of the greater desolation of Sion. When he has ended, she suddenly becomes transfigured and vanishes, and in the place where she was he beholds a city. Uriel now comes to him and explains that this woman represented Sion; and further visions are promised.

Fifth Vision: 111-1239. Two nights afterwards, Esdras dreams of a monstrous eagle with three heads, twelve wings, and certain supplementary winglets. This creature is rebuked and destroyed by a lion. The eagle is explained to be the fourth kingdom seen by Daniel, and the lion is the Messiah. Esdras is hidden to wait seven days more.

Sixth Vision: 1240-1858. In a second interlude (1240-57) the people come en masse and beg Esdras to return. He sends them away. He sees a vision of a wondrous man who first annihilates all his enemies and then welcomes to himself a peaceful multitude. The man is the Messiah. In the peaceful multitude whom he receives we recognise the 'Lost Ten Tribes,' whose history is shortly given. Esdras is commanded to wait three days more.

Seventh Vision: 141-48. After the three days Esdras, sitting under an oak (Abraham's oak is no doubt meant), is addressed out of a bush by the voice of God, which warns him that he is shortly to be translated from the earth, and that the end is near. He pleads for the people who are left without teacher or law. God bids him procure writing materials and five scribes (who are named), and bid the people not approach for forty days. Next day he receives a wonderful drink in a cup, and thereafter he dictates continuously for forty days. Thus are written ninety-four books, of which seventy are to be hidden and twenty-four (i.e., the Books of the Hebrew canon) published. According to the Oriental Versions Esdras is then 'taken up' or translated.

In the Latin Version the words describing the 'translation' of Esdras have been cut out because two other chapters (15 f.) have been added (see above).

In the episode just described Ezra appears as the second Moses; like the lawgiver he is addressed by God out of a bush, like him he writes the law, and like him he disappears in a mysterious manner from among men. On this famous legend of the restoration of the law by Ezra see, further, CANON, §§ 14, 17.

In considering the origin of Fourth Esdras the chief passage that comes into question is the Fifth or Eagle Vision. That Rome is represented by particular persons are signified by the various heads, wings, and feathers it is much harder to say. The vision has been held by several critics either to be wholly an interpolation (an untenable view) or to have been altered in order to make it fit in with the events of later times. On the whole, the theory that the heads stand for Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian has been most widely accepted. It is also generally held that the destruction of Jerusalem, to which such constant reference is made, can be none other than that by Titus in 70 A.D., though Hilgenfeld pleads strongly for a date nearer 30 B.C. On the whole, a majority of critics are in favour of placing the book between 81 and 96 A.D.

The book is possibly quoted in the Epistle of Barnabas (end of 1st cent.), certainly by Clement of Alexandria and by Hippolytus (περὶ τοῦ παντός). In Latin, perhaps by Cyprian, and very copiously by Ambrose.

A theory that Fourth Esdras is a composite work, made out of several earlier apocalypses, has been set forth with great ingenuity by R. Kabisch (Das 4te Buch Esra auf seine Quellen untersucht, Göttingen, '89). He postulates

4. Integrity of chaps. 3-14. five documents ranging in date from 20 B.C. to 100 A.D., and a redactor of 120 A.D.: see Charles (Apoc. of Baruch, pp. xxxix.-xli.; ESCHATOLOGY, § 79), who has carried the analysis still farther. Dillmann has advanced the proposition that the Eagle Vision has been manipulated by a Christian editor. His hypothesis has found more support than Kabisch's; but neither can yet be regarded as proved.

The additions in the Latin versions (1 f. 15 f.) are translated from a Greek original; but they have no connection with the original book of Esdras.

(a) Chaps. 1 f. are Christian. Their principal topic is the rejection of the Jewish people in favour of Gentile Christians. They probably date from the second century, and seem to be connected with the apocalypse of Zephaniah (APOCRYPHA, § 21), of which we have fragments in Coptic.

The only Greek quotation from them as yet known is in the Acts of St. Silvester. It is from 234 f. that the name Requiem (requiem æternitatis dabit vobis . . . lux perpetua lucebit vobis) as applied to the Office for the Dead is derived. The Latin text is preserved in two forms, of which the best is that contained in a group of Spanish MSS.

(b) Chaps. 15 f. are Jewish. They consist of a long monotonous invective against sinners, with predictions of wars and tribulations modelled principally on the prophecies of Jeremiah. They refer probably to the conquests of Sapor I., and the rebellion of Zenobia and Odenathus (242-273 A.D.). See CARMANIANS. The first certain quotation is in the works of Ambrose. Gildas, the first of British writers, quotes from them copiously.

The Fourth Book of Esdras (3-14) is one of the most interesting of all apocalypses. Unsuccessful as its attempted solutions of the problems of life are, it is marked by a noble confidence in God's justice. The writer shows himself in his best light when he addresses God and dwells upon his power and mercy. The thought which is present to him throughout in this connection is well put in 847. 'Thou lackest much before thou canst love my creature more than I.' On the other hand it is impossible to deny that the book is exceedingly prolix in form and exclusive in spirit, and that the apocalyptic portion, the Eagle Vision and the like, are tedious and obscure, not possessing in any way the imaginative power of the Johannine Apocalypse.

The general complexion of the book so nearly resembles the Apocalypse of Baruch, that an identity of authorship has been asserted; though it is allowed that as a whole Baruch is somewhat later than Esdras (see APOCALYPTIC, § 13 ff.).

The relation of 4 Esdras to Christianity is a principal point of interest. Its Messianic ideas (see MESSIAH) are highly developed; and its eschatology has much in common with conceptions early current in the church (see ESCHATOLOGY, § 79). Hilgenfeld has collected a number of passages which, on his hypothesis of the date, are quotations of 4 Esdras by NT writers; but the greater part of them do not suffice to show anything like a literary connection. One passage, however (435 f.), so closely resembles Rev. 69 f. that we must suppose either a borrowing by Esdras from the Johannine Apocalypse or the use of a common source.

between Judas the Maccabee and GORGAS (2 Macc. 12:36 RV). It is natural to think that [oi] περι τον εσδριν at the beginning of the long sentence corresponds to [oi] περι τον γοργιαν at the end, and to change εσδριν into γοργιαν. This is in fact the reading of Ald. and of some MSS, followed by AV, and, even if only a copyist's conjecture, is possibly correct.

ESEBON (εσεβων [NA]), Judith 5:15 AV, RV HESHBON (q.v.).

ESEK (εσεκ; G translates: ΔΔΙΚΙΑ [ADEL], CYKOPANTIA [Aq.]), the name of one of the contested wells in the story of ISAAC, q.v., § 5, and Abimelech, Gen. 26:20.

1. A wady near Hebron, so called from the unrivalled fruit of its vineyards, Nu. 13:23 25:32; Dt. 1:24† (φάραγξ βότρυς [BAFL]). NW. of HEBRON (q.v.) is a wady called Bēt Iskähil (Baed. 137), if the name may be trusted. But we can hardly expect to find such a name preserved (Conder does not recognise it). The vine still flourishes there (see HEBRON i., § 3, and cp Thomson, LB [94], 596 f.). Cp, however, NEGEB, § 7.

2. The brother of ANER (1) and MAMRE, Abram's Amorite allies (Gen. 14:13 24; in 24 εσκολ [A]). Note that in v. 24 Eschol is placed first by G (cp Jos. Ant. i. 102) but second in MT.

ESHEAN, RV better ESHAN (εσαν [AL], COMA [B]), a site in the hill country of Judah, to the S. or SW. of Hebron (Josh. 15:52). Perhaps a corruption of Beer-sheba (cp G^B, and IR-NAHASH).

ESHEK (εσεκ), a name in a genealogy of BENJAMIN (q.v., § 9, ii. β) (1 Ch. 8:39†; αχλ [B], εεαλεκ [A], αεκε [L]). See JQR 11:110 112 f., §§ 9, 12.

The ethnic Eshtaolites (εσθαολιται), 1 Ch. 2:53, RV Eshtaolites; υιοι εσθαου [B], οι εσθαωλαιοι [A], ο εσθαολι [L]) presupposes a form Eshtāul (see Kō, Lehrgeb. 2:1, § 131 β).

A town in the lowland of Judah, Josh. 15:33 (αεταωλ [B]). . . . θα. [L], εεθαολι [A]), or more strictly in the northern hill-country immediately under the Judean plateau (cp GASm. HG, 218 f.). It stands first in the first group of cities, and is followed by ZORAH (q.v.), with which indeed it is usually mentioned. In Josh. 19:41 it is Danite; cp Judg. 13:25 18:2 11, and see SAMSON, § 1.¹ Eusebius and Jerome describe it as εσθαολ of the tribe of Dan, 10 R. m. N. of Eleutheropolis towards Nicopolis (OS 255 87 119 32), and distinguish from it an ασθαωλ of the tribe of Judah (OS 220 99 92 26), between Ashdod and Ascalon, which was called in their time ασθω (asto). The former description agrees accurately with the position of the small village of Eshū, which, Guérin says, was, according to tradition, originally called Eshū'al or Eshthū'al (Jude, 212-14). The latter statement needs confirmation.

Eshū' is 878 feet above sea-level, and 2½ m. NE. from Zorah (Ṣar'a) in the W. Ṣarār. It has some Roman remains. Eshū'al, without the characteristic t of Eshtaol, would be like es-Semū' for ESHTEMOA (q.v.). T. K. C.

ESHTEMOA (εσθεμοα; εθεμω [A]; Josh. 21:14 1 S. 30:28 1 Ch. 4:17 19 6:42 [57]) or Eshtemoh (εσθεμοα, Josh. 15:50).

G's readings are: Josh. 15:50, εσκαμαν [B], αθεμω [L]; Josh. 21:14, τεμα [B], εσθεμω [L]; 1 S. 30:28, εσθεμω [B], εσθεμα [A], νοθωμ [L]; 1 Ch. 4:17, εσθαμω [B], -θευ. [A], εσθαμα [L]; 1 Ch. 4:19, εσθαμω [B], εσθεμω [A], εσθαμα [L]; 1 Ch. 6:57 [42], εσθαμα [BA, ? om. L].

A city in the bill-country of Judah (Josh. 15:50), Levitical according to the priestly theory (Josh. 21:14 [P]), now es-Semū', a large village W. of Ma'in, W. by S. of Yuttā, and about 9 m. in a direct line W. by S. of Hebron. It is 'situated on a low bill with broad valleys round about, not susceptible of much tillage, but full of flocks and herds all in fine order' (Rob. BR 2626). In several places there are remains of walls built of very large bevelled stones, marking it as the site of an important and very ancient town (cp Guérin, Judée, 3173). The ruins of its castle are most likely of Saracenic or Turkish origin. The place is mentioned as a 'very large village' by Eusebius and Jerome (OS 254 70 93 16).

ESHTON (εστων), scarcely 'effeminate' 2 [BDB doubtfully]; αεαθων [BA, but om. B, v. 12], εεε. [L], b. Mehir, a Calibbite (1 Ch. 4:11 f.).

Most probably a corruption of εσθεμω, Eshtemoh, another form of the name εσθεμω, ESHTEMOH (see above). Cp IR-NAHASH.

ESLI (εελει [Ti. WH]), father of Naum, in the genealogy of Joseph (Lk. 3:25). See GENEALOGIES ii. § 3.

ESORA, RV ÆSORA (αεσωρα [BN^{c-a}], αρασογρια [N^{*}], αεσωρα, -ραα [N^{c-a}], εσωρα [Sy.]) is mentioned between CHOBA and the Valley of SALEM in connection with the preparations of the Jews against Holofernes (Judith 4:4†). Tell 'Ašūr, NE. of Bethel (see HAZOR, 2) lies perhaps too much to the S.; a more probable identification would be 'Ašīreh, a little to the N. of Shechem (PEF Map). On the strength of the reading ασοραω, found in some MSS, Zöckler has suggested εσωρη, the plain of Sharon.

ESSENES. It has been customary to follow Josephus in regarding the Essenes as forming a third

1. Meagre Jewish party, the Pharisees and the Sadducees being the other two; so far as we know, however, they were not a party in any sense, but a Jewish brotherhood, a kind of monastic order.³

Our only authorities who speak of them from personal knowledge are the Roman Pliny (HN 5 17), and (with greater detail) his Jewish contemporary Josephus (BJ ii. 8-2:13; Ant. xviii. 15), who, in the second passage cited, plainly depends on the most important witness of all, the Alexandrian Philo, who flourished

² For the form cp ESHTEMOA, ESHTAOL (so-called Ifta'al forms), or εσθεμω, εσθεμω. See NAMES, § 107, end.

some fifty years earlier. Philo discourses of the Essenes in two passages; in his Quod omnis probus liber, 12 f., and in a no longer extant Apology from which all that is important in Euseb. Præp. Ev. viii. ii. is doubtless derived.

They are nowhere mentioned, either in the Bible or in Rabbinical literature. It may safely be taken for granted that their origin does not go further back than the second century B.C. Josephus first mentions them (Ant. xiii. 59) in Maccabean times; the earliest incident in connection with which an Essene is spoken of by name belongs to the year 105 B.C. In the second century A.D. they disappear from history, though J. B. Lightfoot's attractive conjecture makes it probable that certain later Christian sects in the East, such as the Sampsæans, were somehow connected with Essenism.

The derivation of the name is obscure; most probably it means 'the pious.'¹ Philo estimates their number at 4000. They are not met with outside Palestine; the Egyptian Therapeutæ, described by Philo in his De Vita Contemplativa, are certainly not to be regarded as merely an Alexandrian variety of Essenes. The 'Essenes' who—so many interpreters infer from the Pauline epistles—were to be found in Colossæ and Rome, can be much more simply explained if it is remembered that certain tendencies and views, strongly represented in Essenism, were characteristic of the whole religion of that time and hence make their appearance in many directions in a great variety of shades and combinations.

What most struck the outside observer in the Essenes was the strictness of their organisation and their thoroughgoing asceticism. In villages and towns—as, for example, in Jerusalem—they settled around a central house of their order, in which they followed their religious observances together, of which one was the common meal. There was no such thing as private property; whatever any one earned by rigorously regulated labour in the field or at a handicraft came into the common purse, out of which the common expenses were defrayed and doles of charity—not confined to members of the order—could be dispensed. Elected 'stewards' managed the funds and took the general oversight of affairs; the proper preparation of foods had to be attended to by priests. A three years' novitiate was necessary before admission to the order; the entrant was pledged by oaths of the most solemn kind to obedience and reticence.

All that we have described, however, constituted a means to an end—the attainment of holiness. This was sought in the highest possible purity; abstinence from all sexual intercourse, exclusion of women, countless washings, avoidance even of that degree of impurity which resulted to members of the brotherhood from contact with a novice, and elaborate scrupulosity in reference to all bodily secretions and excretions were prescribed. Every object of sense (das Sinnliche) they held to be ungodly, and yet, on the other hand, every sin they regarded as a transgression of nature's law. In their view of nature the soul of man formed no part of the present world, in which falsehood, egoism, greed and lust bear sway. When a man has freed himself betimes from these evil inclinations, his soul will at death pass into a bright paradise in the farthest west; the souls of the wicked, on the other hand, fall into a dark and dreary abode of never-ending punishment. As the Essenes lived entirely for the life hereafter, their interest largely centred in the attempt to penetrate the secrets of the future in every detail; angelology and eschatology, doubtless, formed the main themes of their esoteric writings; as foretellers of the future they were held in high repute, and when Josephus tells to their credit that they had investigated to good purpose, in the interests of medicine, the healing virtues of roots and stones, we may be sure that this was done by them, not with a view to the good of the body, but as a special department of their apocalyptic gnosis.

The relation of Essenism to the religion of the OT seems difficult to determine. Hitherto scholars have reached no unanimity on the subject.

5. Relation to Judaism. On the one hand, some—notably Ritschl and Lucius—regard it as a purely internal development of Judaism, Lucius in particular calling attention to its close kinship with Pharisaism. Others, on the other hand, find it impossible to explain it except by assuming the introduction into Judaism of foreign elements from Parseeism, Buddhism, or Greek Philosophy—the Orphic-Pythagorean in particular. M. Friedländer,¹ in fact, sees in Essenism the fruit of an anti-Pharisaic movement, a reaction against the post-Maccabean anti-Hellenic Judaism of Palestine. Exaggeration in either direction is to be guarded against.

Beyond question the Essenes represented a purely Jewish piety.

The members were recruited from Jews alone, nowhere were the law and the lawgiver held in higher reverence than with them; their Sabbath observance and their rites of purification had their origin in an ultra-Pharisaic legalism, and if they repudiated bloody sacrifice, they did not on that account sever their connection with the temple; probably their action was determined by an allegorising interpretation of the laws relating to animal sacrifice.² The foreign element in their system cannot have been conspicuous when they so powerfully impressed a Pharisaic contemporary like Josephus. In their ascetic practices and prescriptions, as well as in their sincerity and hospitality, it was possible for the best people in Israel to see simply a fulfilment of what the law indeed points to, but does not venture to impose on every one as obligatory. Details, such as their worship of the sun,³ are not handed down with sufficient clearness to warrant us in drawing deductions relating to the history of religion; their communistic ideal, carrying with it the prohibition of marriage and of slave-holding, could quite well have been set up by Jews without external suggestion.

philosophy,¹ the form which the religion of the Greek world at that time was so ready to take; and if the kinship is admitted at one point it becomes natural and easy to regard a dualistic—and thus thoroughly anti-Jewish—view of the world as having powerfully influenced both their ethics and their religious principles. Essenism may have been a gradual development, much that was foreign may have come into it in course of time, and the Hellenistic colouring may here and there be due simply to our informants; Pliny may possibly not have been wrong when he represents 'dissatisfaction with life' (vita paenitentia) as having been the principle which had brought and kept them together; this dissatisfaction with life, or rather enmity to the world, is as un-Jewish as it is un-Christian. Essenism, then, may be described as having been a religious growth within the Judaism of the last century B. C. which arose under the influence of certain tendencies and ideas that lay outside of Judaism, or, perhaps rather, at an early date admitted such influences. This is why Essenism disappeared; of Judaism the only form capable of retaining life was Pharisaism; no mediating forms were able to survive the catastrophe which overthrew the popular religion.

[In spite of the favour with which the theory of Pythagorean influence has been received, some scholars

7. Traces of Zoroastrianism. doubt whether it is correct. The fact that Josephus compares the Essenian mode of life with the Pythagorean is, at any rate, not in its favour; Josephus had an object in throwing a Greek colouring over the views of Jewish 'sects.' Besides, neo-Pythagoreanism has itself too foreign an air to be fitly appealed to as the source of any Oriental system. There is much in Josephus's account of the Essenes which can be explained either from native Jewish or from Oriental (Zoroastrian) ideas. He says, for instance, that the Essenes, or rather some of them, neglect marriage (BJ ii. 82; cp 13). There is no occasion to ascribe this to Pythagorean influence; it is a part of the asceticism which naturally sprang from the belief in secret communications from the Deity (see Enoch 832, and cp 1 Cor. 75). Nor is it at all necessary to explain the Essenian doctrine of the soul from neo-Pythagoreanism. Lightfoot (Colossians) and Hilgenfeld (Die Ketzergeschichte des Urchristenthums) have done well to suggest the possibility of Zoroastrian influences. Lightfoot's remarks deserve special attention, even though he ascribes to Essenism some things (e.g., sun-worship) which can hardly have belonged to it.² The truth probably is that the Essenian doctrine of the soul (if Josephus may be trusted) combined two elements—a Babylonian and a Persian—both Hebraized.

The happy island is a part of the tradition of the Assyrio-Babylonian poets. The description of Hades, on the other hand, is distinctly Zoroastrian, and so too is the second description in Josephus of the lot of good souls according to Essenism. 'We have, in fact, in the first sentence of Jos. BJ ii. 811 a reflexion of the Zoroastrian view respecting the fravashis, those "guardian angels" which were so linked to men as to form virtually a part of human nature, and which were practically indistinguishable from souls' (Che. O.Ps. 420; see the whole passage for a full examination of the affinities between Essenism and Zoroastrianism).

Essenism, therefore, if at all correctly described by Josephus, is not a purely Jewish product, and yet need not be ascribed in any degree to neo-Pythagorean influence. Persian and Babylonian influence, on the other hand, may reasonably be admitted. Unless we go further in critical audacity than Lucius,³ and reject the accounts of Essenism in our text of Josephus as spurious, we can hardly venture to maintain that Essenism is of purely indigenous origin. From a conservative text-critical point of view, Lightfoot is right against Fränkel. Ohle,¹ however, repairs the omission of Lucius; he leaves nothing to Josephus but a few scattered notices of a very simple Essenism, which may be sufficiently explained as an exaggeration of Pharisaism. It must be confessed that Ohle's result would be historically convenient. In particular, it would explain why there is no reference to such a remarkable organization as that of the Essenes of Josephus, either in the Gospels or in the Talmud. It is more probable, however, that the text of Josephus has not, so far as the beliefs of the Essenes are concerned, been interpolated; that, at any rate in the main, Josephus's account of the Essenes is based on facts. Oriental influences were, so to speak, in the air, and it is not probable that the belief in the resurrection was the only great debt which Jewish religionists owed to Zoroastrians.—T. K. C.]

We sometimes find John the Baptist, and even Jesus and his disciples, claimed for Essenism. Jesus, however, little concerned as he was about ceremonial observances, the Sabbath, and the like, who ate and drank with sinners, may have been quite as well a Pharisee as an Essene, and if Philo (Quod omnis probus liber, 13) is able to affirm so emphatically as he does that, in spite of the variety of rulers who governed Palestine, the Essenes never came into conflict with any of them, but, on the contrary, were held in high regard by all, the movement associated with the name of John, ending as it did so tragically, cannot be regarded as a chapter from the history of the order of the Essenes. It is only among the number of those who prepared the way for the new world-religion that we can reckon these Jewish monastic brotherhoods. They not only placed love to God, to goodness, and to man, as articles in their programme, but also sought with wonderful energy according to their lights to realise them in their life. This was the very reason of their disappearance—Christianity dissolved them, reconciling Judaism and Hellenism in a form of knowledge and ethics that was accessible to all, not to a few aristocrats merely.

The literature is immense. More immediately important are: J. B. Lightfoot, Epistles to Colossians and to Philemon (2), 82-98, 349-419 ('76); Zeller, Die Phil. der Griechen, iii. 2277-338 ('81); E. Schürer, GV 1 (3), § 30; Wellhausen, JG (3) ('97), ch.

The Book of Esther (אֶסְתֵּר, 'Istār, see below, § 6; עֶסְתֵּר [BNAL], אֵסְתֵּר. [A in 211]) relates how, in the time of the Persian king Ahasuerus, the Jews were doomed to destruction in consequence of the intrigues of Haman, how they were delivered by the Jewish queen Esther and her uncle Mordecai, how they avenged themselves by a massacre of their enemies, and finally how the Feast of Purim was instituted among the Jews in order to perpetuate the memory of the aforesaid events.

The book opens with the phrase אֵת, 'And it came to pass,' thereby claiming to be a continuation of the historical books of the OT. The precise

1. Impossibility of story. dates and the numerous proper names give the narrative an air of historical accuracy, and at the close we actually find a reference made to 'the chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia.' Unfortunately all these pretensions to veracity are belied by the nature of the contents:

the story is, in fact, a tissue of improbabilities and impossibilities.

It is now generally admitted that in Esther, as also in Ezra 46 and Dan. 91, Ahasuerus (אֲחַשְׁוֵרֶשׁ, Akhashwērōsh) must be identical with the king who is called Kshayarsha in the Persian inscriptions, אֲחַשְׁוֵרֶשׁ, in an Aramaic inscription from Egypt, and Ξέρξης by the Greeks (see AHASUERUS). In former days it was usual to identify Esther with Amāstris (or, in the Ionic form, Amēstris), who was the wife of Xerxes at the very time when Esther, according to 216, became the queen of Ahasuerus (i.e. in December 479 B.C. or January 478 B.C.). It is true that the coarseness and cruelty of Amāstris (see Herod. 711.4 9 110 ff.) answer in some measure to the vindictive character of Esther; but, not to mention the difficulty of explaining the disappearance of the syllable Am, Amāstris was the daughter of a Persian grandee, not a Jewess (see Herod. 76r and Ktesias excerpted by Photius [Bekker] 386).

One of the main points in the narrative, namely the decree for the massacre of all the Jews in the Persian Empire on a day fixed eleven months beforehand, would alone suffice to invalidate the historical character of the book.

Still more extravagant is the contrary edict, issued by the king soon afterwards, whereby the Jews are authorized to butcher, on the same day, vast numbers of their fellow-subjects. Nor is it possible to believe in the two days' slaughter which the king sanctions in his own capital. What meaning can we attach to the solemn decree that every man is to be master in his own house and speak the language of his own nation?

Further, notwithstanding the dates which he gives us, the author had in reality no notion of chronology.

He represents Mordecai as having been transported to Babylon with king Jeconiah—i.e., in the year 597 B.C.—and as becoming prime minister in the 12th year of Xerxes—i.e., in 474 B.C. That Xerxes had already returned to Susa by the tenth month of the seventh year of his reign (i.e., by December 479 B.C. or January 478 B.C.), when Esther became his consort (216), is not altogether impossible; if such were the case, he must have quitted Sardis after the battle of Mykale (early in the autumn of 479 B.C.) and marched to Susa without delay. However, the author of Esther betrays no knowledge of the fact that the king had visited Greece in the interval.

Further, it is contrary to all that we know of those times for an Achaemenian sovereign to choose a Jewess for his queen, an Amalekite (Haman) and afterwards a Jew for his chief minister,—measures which would never have been tolerated by the proud aristocracy of Persia.

It is still harder to believe that royal edicts were issued in the language and writing of each one of the numerous peoples who inhabited the empire (122 312). That Mordecai is able to communicate freely with his niece in the harem must be pronounced altogether contrary to the usage of Oriental courts. On the other hand the queen is represented as unable to send even a message to her husband, in order that the writer may have an opportunity of magnifying the courage of his heroine; such restrictions, it is needless to say, there can never have been in reality. A similar attempt to exalt the character of Esther appears in the fact that her petition on behalf of the Jews is brought forward not at the first banquet but at the second, although Mordecai, who had meanwhile become prime minister, might naturally have intervened for the purpose. Mordecai, while openly professing to be a Jew, forbids his niece to reveal her origin, for no reason except that the plot of the book requires it. Yet those who observed Mordecai's communications with Esther could not fail, one might think, to have some suspicion of her nationality. It is not often that an Oriental minister has been so wretchedly served by his spies as was the case with Haman, who never discovered the near relationship between Mordecai and the queen.

The fabulous character of the work shows itself likewise in a fondness for pomp and high figures. Note for example the feast of 180 days, supplemented by another of seven days (147), the twelve months which the maidens spend in adorning and perfuming themselves before they enter the king's presence, the 127 provinces of the Empire (an idea suggested rather by the smaller provinces of the Hellenistic period than by the great satrapies of the Achaemenidæ), the gallows 50 cubits in height, the ten sons of Haman, the 10,000 talents (39).²

There is something fantastic, but not altogether unskilful, in the touch whereby Mordecai and Haman, as has long ago been observed, are made to inherit an ancient feud, the former being a member of the family of king Saul, the latter a descendant of Agag, king of Amalek (see AGAGITE). However, though some of the details are undoubtedly effective, the book, as a whole, cannot be pronounced a well-written romance. As a work of art it is inferior even to the Book of Judith, which, like Esther, contains a profusion of dates and names.

That the Book of Esther cannot be regarded as a genuine historical work is avowed even by many adherents of ecclesiastical tradition.

2. No historical kernel.

Since, however, the most essential parts of the story, namely the deliverance of the Jews from complete extermination and their murderous reprisals by means of the Jewish queen and the Jewish minister, are altogether unhistorical, it is impossible to treat the book as an embellished version of some real event—a 'historical romance' like the Persian tale of Bahrām Chōbin and the novels of Scott or Manzoni—and we are forced to the conclusion that the whole narrative is fictitious.

This would still be the case even if it were discovered (a thing scarcely probable) that a few historical facts are interwoven with the story. For it is obvious that the mere name of the king of the Persians and Medes, and similar details, must not be taken to prove a historical foundation, or we might pronounce many of the stories in the Arabian Nights to be founded on fact simply because the Caliph Hārūn and other historical persons are mentioned in them.

Nor would those who believe in the authenticity of the book greatly strengthen their cause if they could which appear in the story were really current among the Persians, since even in the Hellenistic period a native of Palestine or of any other country inhabited by Jews might without difficulty have collected a large number of Persian names. As a matter of fact, however, most of the names in Esther do not by any means present the appearance of genuine Persian formations.

This has been made only clearer by Oppert's recent attempt to explain many of them from Persian.¹ In spite of the great liberties with respect to the sounds allowed himself by this ingenious decipherer, he finds in Esther scarcely one of the Persian names known to us—which are by no means few—and from these the names which he professes to have discovered differ, for the most part, very essentially. Moreover, when, to cite one example, he interprets מְדוּכָן as equivalent to Wahuman (the modern Persian Bahman) he fails to consider that the practice of naming human beings after 12edhs—a class of heavenly spirits to which Wahuman belongs—did not arise till several centuries after the fall of the Achaemenian Empire.

Nor is it legitimate to suppose that the names in Esther have suffered to any great extent through errors of transcription, for the Hebrew (as contrasted with the Greek) text of this book is on the whole well preserved, and hence there is a reasonable presumption that the forms of the names have been accurately transmitted.

It may be added that several of the subordinate persons are mentioned more than once and that the spelling, in such cases, remains constant or undergoes merely some insignificant change—proof that there has been no artificial assimilation of the forms. Thus we find חַרְבוֹנָה 110 and חַרְבוֹנָה 79 (HARBONA); מְדוּכָן 114 21 and מְדוּכָן 116 Kt. (MEMUCAN); בְּנוֹת וְהָרִשׁ 221 and בְּנוֹת וְהָרִשׁ 62 (BIGTHAN, TERESH); חַגַּי 23 and חַגַּי 28 15 (HEGAI); הַחַךְ 45 f. 9 f. (HATHACH); הֵשֶׁת 510 14 613 (ZERESH). In the lists of seven names (110 14) and in the list of ten (97 9) some of the forms are suspiciously like one another. This, however, is probably due not to the copyist but to the author, who exercised no great care in the invention of the names.²

It is certain that everyone would long ago have rejected the book as unhistorical but for its position in the Jewish and therefore in the Christian canon. Under no other circumstances could the moral tone of the work have escaped general condemnation. It has been well remarked by A. H. Niemeyer, a theologian of Halle, that the most respectable character in the book is Vashti, the queen, who declines to exhibit her charms before the crowd of revelers.¹ Esther, it is true, risks her life on behalf of her people; but the vindictive ferocity which both she and Mordecai display excites our aversion.

² [On these names see Marq. Fund. 68-73. After noticing the connection between Esther and Daniel he reduces the seven princes in Esther 14 to three (as in Dan. 63)—viz., (a) Carshena, (b) Sarsathai (?) (in Shethar, Tarshish), and (c) Manisara (in Meres, Marsena).]

The craving for vengeance—natural enough in a people surrounded by enemies and exposed to cruel oppression—pervades the whole work, as it pervades the so-called Third Book of the Maccabees (cp MACCABEES, THIRD, § 2), which appears to have been written in imitation of Esther. Whilst other books of the OT, including even Judith, ascribe the deliverance of Israel to God, everything in Esther is done by men.

It was long ago observed that this book, though canonical, contains no mention of God. The omission is certainly not intentional. It is due to the coarse and worldly spirit of the author. The only reference to religion is the mention of fasting (4:16 9:31).

Moreover, it cannot be accidental that 'Israel,' the ideal name of the nation, is never employed—we read only of 'the Jews.' The author dwells with peculiar pleasure on the worldly splendour of his heroes, and he seems quite unconscious of the miserable character of the king. It is a curious fact that in this book, afterwards so highly esteemed, the word בַּנְשֻׁטָה, 'banquet,' occurs no less than twenty times.²

Mordecai's refusal to prostrate himself before Haman may possibly appear to Europeans a proof of manly self-respect; but among the Hebrews prostration implied no degradation, and had long been customary not only in the presence of sovereigns, but also in the presence of ordinary men (see SALUTATIONS). The behaviour of Mordecai is therefore mere wanton insolence, and accordingly Jewish interpreters, as well as some early Christian authorities, have spent much labour in the attempt to devise a justification for it (cp also § 10 a).

In the Book of Esther the Persian empire is treated as a thing of the past, already invested with a halo of romance. The writer must therefore

5. Date and authorship. have lived some considerable time after Alexander the Great, not earlier than the third, probably in the second, century before Christ. The book presupposes moreover that the Jews had long been 'scattered abroad and dispersed' among the nations (38); this idea of a 'dispersion' (διασπορά) points to the time when large Jewish settlements were to be found within the domain of Greek civilisation (see DISPERSION, § 12 f.). The same period is indicated by the passage about the conversion of vast multitudes to Judaism (9:27), for such a conception would have been impossible even in a romance, until Jewish proselytes had become numerous. The most important point, however, is that the Gentile hatred towards the Jews of the dispersion in consequence of their religious and social exclusiveness—a hatred which the Jews fully reciprocated—was especially a product of the Hellenistic period; this mutual enmity, which is not to be confounded with the older feud between the Palestinian Jews and the neighbouring peoples, forms in Esther the basis of the whole narrative. Whether it be necessary on this account to place the composition of the book later than the time of Antiochus Epiphanes is a question which we may leave open.

The language of the work also favours a late date. The fact that it contains many Aramaic words, several of which were borrowed by the Aramaeans from the Persians, might be compatible with a somewhat earlier origin; but the whole nature of the style, which is characterised by a certain lack of ease, seems to show that the author spoke and thought in Aramaic, and had learned Hebrew merely as a literary language.

If, for example, we compare his diction with the pure and simple Hebrew style of the Book of Ruth, the enormous difference cannot fail to strike us, and is such as to suggest that these writings must be separated by an interval of three centuries or more.

The author of Esther was, of course, acquainted with the older sacred literature. In particular, as has been shown by L. A. Rosenthal (ZATW 15 278 ff. [95]),

² Exactly as often as it happens to occur in all the other books of the OT put together—if we exclude five passages where it signifies 'drink.'

he made use of the story of Joseph who, like Haman, was chief minister of an ancient empire, and borrowed from it not only many isolated expressions but sometimes even half a sentence.

From the fact that Mordecai and Esther are of the family of Saul, who was not a favourite with the later Jews, we may perhaps infer that the author belonged to the tribe of Benjamin; a member of the tribe of Judah would have been more inclined to represent his hero and heroine as descendants of David.

It has long ago been recognised that the purpose of the book is to encourage the observance of the feast

6. Purpose. of Purim among the Jews. The fabulous narrative is merely a means to this end; since the end was attained and the story was, at the same time, extremely flattering to the national vanity, the Book of Esther, in the capacity of ἡ ἱερὰ λόγος authorising the feast in question, found a place in the Jewish canon.

In reality the origin of the feast is not explained by the book and remains altogether obscure. That it was primitively not a Jewish feast is shown by the name Purim (פּוּרִים), a word unknown in Hebrew. Unfortunately the meaning is a matter of conjecture.

According to Esther 3:7 pur signifies 'lot,' in favour of which interpretation it may be urged that, considered as an element in the story, it is of no importance whatever. No such word, however, with the meaning required, has yet been found in any of the languages from which the name is likely to have been borrowed; nor has any other explanation been offered that is at all satisfactory. With respect to this point even the investigations of Lagarde have led to no definite result¹ (see PURIM).

On the other hand Prof. Jensen's essay 'Elamitische Eigennamen'² seems to throw some light upon the story of Esther. This ingenious scholar clearly proves that Hamman (or Humman, not to mention other variations of spelling) was the principal deity of the Elamites, in whose capital (Susa) the scene of the Book of Esther is laid, and that Marduk occupied a similar position among the deities of Babylon. As the Elamite Hamman is represented by Haman, the Babylonian Marduk is represented by Mordecai, a name unquestionably derived from Marduk. In Ezra 2:2 (= Neh. 7:7) we find the name actually borne by a Babylonian Jew.³ In close contrast with the god Marduk stood the great goddess Istar, who was worshipped by other Semitic peoples under the name of Ahtar, Attar or Astart, and is often identified with Aphrodite. The later Babylonian form Ashtarā, (with the Aramaic termination) was used by the Syrians and Mandaites as a synonym of Aphrodite or of the planet Venus; here we have the exact counterpart of Ashtar, Esther.⁴ HADASSAH, the other name of Esther (2:7), which is mentioned quite incidentally and therefore seems to be no mere invention of the writer, corresponds to the older Babylonian form Hadašatu, signifying 'myrtle' and also 'bride,' as Jensen has shown. Since another word for 'bride' is commonly used as the title of another Babylonian goddess, we may hazard the conjecture that Istar was also called Hadašatu. Furthermore Vashti is an Elamite deity, probably a goddess. Thus Vashti and Haman on the one side, Mordecai and Esther-Hadassah on the other, represent, it would seem,

² WZKM 6 47 f., 209 f. The writer of the present article has moreover made use of some private information from Prof. Jensen, but wishes to state explicitly that he has himself no independent knowledge of the cuneiform inscriptions.

³ The Greek form, Mardocheus (Μαρδοχαιός), probably comes nearer to the original pronunciation than the Massoretic מָרְדֳּכָי or מָרְדֳּכָי. See MORDECAI.

⁴ In the Thousand and One Nights the famous Shahrazād—a Jewess according to Mas'udi—is, according to De Goeje (EB) 23 316 f., no other than Esther.

the antagonism between the gods of Elam and the gods of Babylon.

Whether Jensen be justified in identifying Haman's wife Zeresh (זרש) with Kiriša, who appears in connection with Hamman and is presumably his female partner, seems open to doubt; the difference of the initial consonants would not be easy to explain. It should be remembered, however, that Zeresh is, after all, only a subordinate figure. The other names mentioned above agree so closely that the resemblances can hardly be accidental.

It is therefore possible that we here have to do with a feast whereby the Babylonians commemorated a victory gained by their gods over the gods of their neighbours the Elamites, against whom they had so often waged war.¹ The Jewish feast of Purim is an annual merrymaking of a wholly secular kind, and it is known that there were similar feasts among the Babylonians. That the Jews in Babylonia should have adopted a festival of this sort cannot be deemed improbable, since in modern Germany, to cite an analogous case, many Jews celebrate Christmas after the manner of their Christian fellow-countrymen, in so far at least as it is a secular institution. It is true that hitherto no Babylonian feast coinciding, like Purim, with the full moon of the twelfth month has been discovered; but our knowledge of the Babylonian feasts is derived from documents of an earlier period. Possibly the calendar may have undergone some change by the time when the Jewish feast of Purim was established. Or it may be that the Jews intentionally shifted the date of the festival which they had borrowed from the heathen (see PURIM). We may hope that future discoveries will throw further light upon this obscure subject.²

Hitherto we have treated the book as a literary unity. Certain scholars however—e.g., Bertheau and Ryssel—hold that the two epistles in the last chapter 8. Unity. but one, as well as the verses connected with them (that is to say, 9²⁰⁻²⁸ 29-32) are additions by a later hand. This view the writer of the present article is unable to accept.

The former piece contains, it is true, a short recapitulation of the story; but this is sufficiently explained by the author's desire to inculcate the observance of Purim in the strongest terms possible; a later scribe would have had no object to serve by the repetition. Nor is it likely that an interpolator would have contented himself, in 9²⁶, with an implicit allusion to 3⁷. Similarly in 9²⁵ the phrase בָּרַבָּה, 'when she came'—for no other interpretation is possible—seems natural enough, if the author of the book is referring to his heroine; but another writer would, surely, in this case, have written the name. Had these two pieces been originally independent of the book the name Purim would surely not have occurred in them (see 22. 26 31 7); that it does occur must appear decisive. When isolated from the context, the pieces in question become meaningless, and to suppose that they are borrowed from another Book of Esther verges on the extravagant. In vocabulary and style they so closely resemble the rest of the book that the insignificant deviations which occur (e.g., in 7. 28) must be ascribed to a difference in the subject matter. The mode of expression is doubtless somewhat awkward; but the same may be said of the strange verse, 3⁷, which is nevertheless indispensable and forms, so to speak, the nucleus of the whole work.

As early as the year 114 B.C. the Book of Esther reached Egypt in a Greek translation. This fact is attested by the concluding sentence in the 9. Greek version. best MSS of the Greek text; nor have we any reason to doubt the truth of the statement, as has been done for example by B. Jacob.³ It is impossible to see for what purpose such a story could have been invented.

The chief objection brought forward by Jacob, namely that the passage above mentioned represents the translation as having come from Jerusalem, has no real force; it is indeed said to have been made at Jerusalem; but the name of the translator (Αυτίμαχος Προμακεάτου) at once suggests an Egyptian Jew. That the translator was an Egyptian Jew has been elaborately proved by Jacob himself, though his arguments are not all equally conclusive.

² Cp Br. Meissner in ZDMG 50 296 ff. Hāmān the chief, the father of the gods worshipped by the heathen of Harrān on the 27th of the month Tammūz (Fihrist, 323, 41) has hardly any connection with the Haman of Esther.

³ Das Buch Esther bei den LXX. (Giessen, '90), p. 43 ff. (= ZATW 10 279 ff.).

The Greek text is found in two forms which we shall here call A and B (the β and α respectively of Lagarde); they diverge considerably from one another, but the text of B [α] is, as a rule, derived from that of A [β], the changes being due to careless and arbitrary copyists.

Only in a few cases does B [α] appear to have preserved older readings than the existing MSS of A [β]. Here, as in other books of Θ , we occasionally find corrections, in accordance with the Hebrew text, which were introduced by scribes at an early period, e.g., Ἀραξίτης (B) from אֲרַאֲשִׁית, instead of the doubtless inexact Ἀραξίτης of the translator, and Οὐαστί (B) from וַאֲשֵׁרָה, instead of Ἀαστί.

The tendency, so common at the present day, to overestimate the importance of Θ for purposes of textual criticism is nowhere more to be deprecated than in the Book of Esther. It may be doubted whether even in a single passage of the book the Greek MSS enable us to emend the Hebrew text, which, as has been mentioned above, is singularly well preserved.

A very small number of such passages might perhaps be adduced, if the Greek translation had come down to us in its original form; but, as a matter of fact, the text underwent early and extensive corruption, so that now it is possibly worse than that of any other canonical book in the OT.

Of great importance are the additions. They fall into two classes—(a) Hebraistic pieces, intended to

10. Its ad- supply the lack of religious sentiment (a ditions. lack which must have been felt at an early period; cp above, § 4) or to explain difficulties—e.g., Mordecai's refusal to prostrate himself before Haman.

Thus we read, in glaring contrast to the original sense of the book, that Esther consented with great reluctance to become the wife of the uncircumcised king. To this class belong the following pieces—the prayer of Mordecai (3¹), the prayer of Esther (4), the expansion of the first interview between Esther and the king (5), the dream of Mordecai (1) and its interpretation (7). All this may once have been in Hebrew; but the hypothesis is not probable.

(b) Pieces written in the Greek rhetorical style—viz., the two epistles of the king (2 and 6).

Here it is stated, among other things, that Haman was a Macedonian and desired to transfer the supremacy from the Persians to the Macedonians (6¹³; cp 6⁹). From this passage the term 'Macedonians' has found its way into other parts of the book; the allusion doubtless is to the bitter enmity which there was between the Jews and their Graeco-Macedonian neighbours, especially at Alexandria.

In addition to these, we find a few shorter interpolations.

The form of the book which lay before Josephus (about 90 A. D.) was mainly identical with A [β]; but it

11. Josephus's contained a few older readings, some text. of which may be traced in B [α]. All the longer interpolations except two were known to Josephus.

Had he been acquainted with the two which refer to Mordecai's dream he would have had little difficulty in adapting them to the taste of his educated readers. However, it would not, of course, be legitimate to conclude from their absence from the text used by Josephus that the two pieces were necessarily lacking in all other MSS of the same period. Moreover there are in Josephus's account some small additional details. A few of these he may himself have invented, in order to point the moral of the story; but since there is at least one (relating to Esther 2²²; cp Ant. xi. 64 [Niese, § 207]) which does not appear in our texts of the LXX., and yet can scarcely have originated with him, we may infer, with tolerable certainty, that the copy of Esther used by Josephus contained some passages which are found in no extant Greek MS.

All these materials Josephus treats with his usual freedom, softening down or omitting whatever was calculated to give offence to educated Greeks and Romans.

Such arbitrary transformations were quite in keeping with the unhistorical character of the book. Very

12. Additions similar tendencies showed themselves among those Jews who spoke Semitic in Targums. dialects; but as the original text of

Esther was here preserved from alteration by reason of the place which it occupied in the sacred canon, the additions and embellishments were confined to the Aramaic translation, or else formed matter for separate works. The additions to the original and literal Targum sometimes refer to the same subjects that are treated in the additions to the Greek text, though neither work has borrowed anything from the other. Some of these pieces are of considerable interest, and they are all very characteristic of Rabbinical Judaism.

Not infrequently the interpolations violate our notions of good taste and contain much that is at variance with the original book. There are moreover lengthy digressions which have no real connection with the subject.

In the so-called Second Targum such digressions are especially common, but they occur in the First also.

The two Targums sometimes differ substantially from one another in matters of detail (thus בְּמִוֶּכֶךְ 116, is, according to the one, the wicked Haman, according to the other, the wise Daniel, which latter view appears also in the Talmud, Meg. 12*b*); but they have very much in common. The relation between them cannot be accurately determined until more is known of the MSS, which are said to offer great variations of text. Some interesting embellishments of the story of Esther, similar to those in the Targums and sometimes exactly agreeing with them, are to be found in Bab. Talm. Meg. 10*ff.*¹

The reception of the Book of Esther into the canon occasioned so much discussion that a few words may be allowed on the subject in addition to what has been said under CANON (§ 45*f.*). So late as the second century after Christ a distinguished teacher, Rabbi Samuel, pronounced Esther apocryphal (Meg. 7*a*). These theoretical objections had no practical effect; indeed among the mass of the Jews the story of the Jewish queen and the Jewish prime minister has always enjoyed a special reputation for sanctity. With respect to Greek-speaking Christians it may be mentioned that Melito of Sardis, for example, does not reckon Esther among the canonical books (see Eus. HE 426). The Latin Church, since the time of Jerome, has rejected at least the later additions. The majority of the Syrian Christians went further still. Jacob of Edessa (about 700 A.D.) treats Esther as apocryphal (Wright, Catalogue of Syr. MSS in the Brit. Mus., 598*b*). The lists drawn up by the Syrian Monophysites do not include it in the canon; but we have no right to infer that the book was never read or used by the Christians of Syria. Aphraates (about 350 A.D.) regards it as an authority, and it is also found in ancient MSS, such as the famous Codex Ambrosianus (edited by Ceriani), which, however, includes several other books universally reckoned uncanonical.

The Nestorians alone appear to have had, down to modern times, no knowledge of the book whatsoever. (Luther formed a very just opinion of the Book of Esther; but whilst freely expressing his disapproval of it he retained it in the canon. Since that time it has been regarded as canonical by Protestant as well as Roman Catholic nations.) ETAM עֲתָם אֵיטָן [BA]-מ [L].

1. A town of Judah, mentioned by the Chronicler (2 Ch. 116; אֵיטָן [A] אַפָּאן [B*]) as one of the cities of defence built by Rehoboam. In the order of enumeration it is placed between Bethlehem and Tekoa. It also occurs in Ⓞ of Josh. 1559a (אֵיטָן [A]; cp Di. in loc.) with Tekoa, Ephrath or Bethlehem, and Phagor (mod. Fāghūr between Bethlehem and Hebron). According to Josephus (Ant. viii. 73) it was at Etam (ἠθαμ), two schoeni from Jerusalem, that Solomon had his well-watered gardens (cp BATH-RABBIM). This points to the neighbourhood of the modern village of Arfās, half-an-hour S. from Bethlehem, where on the south side of the Wādy Artās there are some ruins. The lowest of the so-called Pools of Solomon, not far off, is fed from a source that is still known as 'Ain 'Aṭān. See CONDUITS, § 3; ETAM ii.

2. A Simeonite town, grouped with Αἶν (g. v., 1), Rimmon, Tochen, and Ashan (1 Ch. 43a), which Conder would identify with Khirbet 'Aitūn, 8 or 9 m. S. of Bēt Jibrin. But is the name עֲתָם correct? It is not given in Josh. 197, and is probably a corruption of ~ partly effaced רִמְמֹן; if so, En Rimmon, which follows, is an unintentional dittogram, inserted by a corrector (Che.). (Pesh. in Ch. gives חֲסִים סִמְסִים) Bertheau takes a different view (see ETHER).

3. Etam is again mentioned in an obscure genealogy in 1 Ch. 43 (αἵταμ [A], ἠτ. [L]); the name Jezreel alone is familiar) where post-exilic families living around the Judæan Etam (see above, 1) are apparently referred to.

For the MT אֵלֶּה אֲנִי עֲתָם (στοὺς πατέρες ἡταμ [L]) various emendations have been proposed: (a) to read אֲנִי instead of אֵלֶּה (after ⓄBA), (b) to read אֲנִי בני (so RV), or (c) to restore אֵלֶּה אֲנִי בני חור (see Ki. SBOT). A simpler reading is אֵלֶּה עֲתָם; see SHELAR, 1. S. A. C.

ETAM, ROCK OF (סֵלֶע עֲיָטָם, ΗΤΑΜ [BA],¹ Ⓞ. [L], ΔΙΤΑΝ [Jos. Ant. v. 88]). It was 'in the fissure of the rock of Etam' that Samson is said to have dwelt after burning the fields of the Philistines (Judg. 15811). The place was evidently in Judah, and was farther from the Philistine border than Lehi (v. 9). Since there was a Judahite town of the same name (see ETAM, 1) it is reasonable to suppose (with Stanley, Guérin, Wilson, etc.) that the narrator located Samson's rock there. It does not follow that more precipitous cliffs may not be found elsewhere. We have no right to begin with selecting the most striking rock, and then to identify this rock with Etam.

It is not likely that there were two Judahite places called Etam. We therefore reject the claims of the great rock near 'Artūf known as the 'Arāk Isma'in (in a wādy which is the upper continuation of the Wādy es-Sarār), though the physical conditions perfectly fit the requirements of the story (PEFQ, April 1896, pp. 162-164; Schick, ZDPV, 1887, pp. 131*ff.*). 'The cave is approached by descending through a crack or fissure in the very edge of the cliffs overhanging the chasm of Wādy Isma'in. The crack is scarcely wide enough to allow one person, to squeeze through at a time. It leads down to the topmost of a long series of rudimentary steps, or small artificial foot-ledges, cut in the face of the cliff, and descending to a narrow rock terrace running along the front of the cave, and between it and the fragments of massive wall (belonging to an ancient Christian cenobium). So writes Hanauer (PEFQ, April 1896, p. 163), who in October 1885 guided Schick, the well-known architect, to the spot. Such descriptions help us to understand how legends like that before us grew up.

See also Hanauer (PEFQ, Jan. 1886, p. 25), and especially Schick, ZDPV, 1887, p. 131*ff.* Against Conder's identification of Etam with Beit 'Aṭān (cp Baed. (²) 161) see Wilson, Smith's DB(²) 11004, and Schick, op. cit. Cp LEHI. T. K. C.

ETERNAL, ETERNITY. For the abstract term 'eternity' there is no word either in OT Hebrew or in NT Greek.² Four times, however, the word occurs in AV; and thrice in RV.

(a) 1 S. 1529, 'Also the eternity (עֲוֶן) of Israel will not lie' (AVmg.). The rendering of EV is 'strength'; on the renderings of the Vss. see Driver's note. EV suggests

1. OT 'victory,' to which RVmg. adds 'glory.' The References. Tg. suggests that the text is corrupt (see Che. JQR, April 1899).

(b) Is. 5715, 'the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity' (EV after Ⓞ [δ κατωκίων τὸν αἰῶνα] Vg.); עַלְיֹן. This vaguely grand idea lies outside the biblical conceptions. Most scholars (including Del. Di.) prefer 'that dwelleth for ever'—i.e., who is not subject to change (cp Ps. 10227).

(c) Jer. 1010, 'he is the living God, king of eternity' (AVmg.); עֲלֵיֶן (Theodot. βασιλεὺς αἰώνιος). Here the true sense is 'an everlasting king' (EV). Jer. 101-16 is a post-exilic insertion; the belief in the eternity of God's kingdom was the foundation of the belief in the eternity of the people of Israel.

² In MH there are two terms worthy of mention:—עֲוֶן-עוֹלָם and עֲוֶן-עוֹלָם (e.g., עֲוֶן-עוֹלָם, the eternity of the world, a philosophical tenet rejected by the Jewish teachers).

(d) Mi. 5:2 [1], 'whose goings forth have been from of old, from the days of eternity' (AVmg.; cp ἡμερῶν αἰώνος; מִיָּמֵי עוֹלָם. RV substitutes in the mg., 'from ancient days'; both AV and RV give 'from everlasting' in the text. The old interpreters connected this with the 'eternal generation of the Son'; Keil, while rejecting this view, still sought to maintain the essentials of orthodox tradition, and found a reference to the pre-existence of Christ and the revelations of Christ to primitive men. Historical sense compels us to assent to RVmg.

(e) Is. 9:6 [5] 'Father of Eternity' (RVmg.; עַרְבֵי יָמִים. In the text RV (like AV) has 'Everlasting Father.' (Να.α πατήρ τοῦ μέλλοντος αἰῶνος, Sym. πατήρ αἰῶνος, Aq. πατήρ ἐῖρι). If this is correct, it must mean not 'possessor of the quality of everlastingness' (an un-Hebraic use of the term 'father'), but 'one who cares perpetually for his people, like a father' (cp Is. 22:21). The reading may, however, be incorrect (cp FATHER, and see SBT Is. 210; Heb. text, notes, 89, 195).

(f) Eccles. 3:11, 'he hath set eternity in their heart' (RVmg.). On this rendering, which is hardly natural, see EARTH i. § 2 (4).

Though, however, there is no abstract word for eternity, the conception of the endlessness of God and of persons or objects protected by him is not wanting. Earlier generations did not dwell on the thought; the catastrophe of the exile forced men to ponder upon it; they found it not only a source of comfort but also the basis of an eschatology. From the far-off past to the far-off future (הַיָּמִים עַד-עוֹלָם Ps. 90:2; cp. 11:13 [14]), Yahwé was their God. So Dt. 33:27 (אֱלֹהֵי יָמֵינוּ 'the ancient God'; in the || line, עוֹלָם וְרַעַת עוֹלָם 'everlasting arms'; cp Dr. in loc.). So too Is. 40:28, עוֹלָם אֱלֹהֵינוּ 'an everlasting God'—an instructive passage, because it shows how concrete the Jewish conception of eternity was,—'He faints not, neither is weary.' Eternity meant the most intense life. Hence later, 'life' and 'eternal life' came, in the mouth of Jesus, to be synonymous (see e.g., Mt. 19:16 f.). Thus, having Yahwé as a shepherd, the faithful community could look forward to a perpetual duration for itself; 'this God is our God for ever and ever' (Ps. 48:14), to which, unfortunately enough, NT gives as a || line, 'he will be our guide unto death' (עַד-מוֹת).² Or, to put it in another form, God's loving-kindness (the bond between him and his people) would never fail (Ps. 106:1 and often).

It is a poetical extravagance, however, when the mountains and hills are called 'everlasting' (Gen. 49:26 where עַד הָרִים should be עַד הַרְרֵי [Di. etc.] || נִבְרָעוּ עוֹלָם; so Dt. 33:15, Hab. 3:6. Is. 54:10 assures us that 'the mountains may depart, and the hills be removed' (cp Ps. 46:2 [3]). So in Ps. 89:28 [29] f. Yahwé's covenant with David, and in Eccles. 45:15 his covenant with Aaron are said to be 'for ever,' and also 'as lasting' as the days of heaven.³ It was no secret, however, that the heavens would pass away (Is. 34:4 51:6, Ps. 102:26 [27]). It is only God whose years can absolutely 'have no end' (Ps. 102:27 [28]).

Thus we get two Heb. terms for endless duration: (a) עוֹלָם [ל] and (b) עַד [ל]. The two terms are combined in עַד-עוֹלָם עַד-עוֹלָם (Is. 45:17), 'to ages of continuance' = 'world without end' (EV). To these we must add

(c) נָצַח and (d) יָמִים אֲדָמָה. (a) עוֹלָם, 'age,' can be used in a limited sense, as when a slave who refuses to leave his master is said to become his servant 'for ever,' עוֹלָם, εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα or when a loyal subject says to the king, 'Let my lord live for ever.'⁴ So, in strongly emotional passages, לעולם 'for ever,'

¹ In Gen. 21:33 (J₂) we read that in Beersheba Abraham invoked Yahwé as עוֹלָם אֱלֹהִים (Θεὸς αἰῶνος, EV 'the Everlasting God'). If the text is right, this should mean 'the ancient God' (Bä., von Gall) and the writer will imply a reproach to some of his contemporaries (cp Dt. 29:26 [25] 32:17). 'Everlasting God' is inappropriate here. Most probably, however עוֹלָם ὄλαμ should be עוֹלָם, ἔλυσσ (Gen. 14:18-20)—i.e., 'Most High.' So Renan. [A similar emendation, עֲלִיּוֹן פְּתָחַי 'gates of the Most High, may be suggested for Ps. 247:9. The phrase 'everlasting (or, eternal) God', however, is certainly right in Is. 40:28 (עוֹלָם אֱלֹהֵינוּ, θεὸς αἰῶνος), and Rom. 16:26 (τοῦ αἰῶνίου θεοῦ, unique in NT)].

² See ALAMOTH.

³ Ἔ, however, has simply εἰς τοῦ αἰῶνος. Perhaps we should read עוֹלָם-עַד.

⁴ Probably, however, such a phrase includes a reference to the dynasty of the king. Not impossibly, too, it implies a popular belief that kings were privileged after death to join the company can be used of a state of things which may some day be altered (e.g., Is. 32:14 f.; cp 42:14, where RV renders עוֹלָם 'long time').

(c) נָצַח or נָצַחָה, too, need not mean 'for ever.' We can sometimes render 'uninterruptedly,' as when the psalmist, expostulating with Yahwé, says, 'How long wilt thou forget me (נָצַח) uninterruptedly?' (Ps. 131:2).

(d) יָמִים אֲדָמָה 'length of days,' is of course ambiguous. In Ps. 21:4 [5] 31:16 the context shows that 'everlasting life' is really meant; whether for the pious community or for the pious individual, is a question for exegesis. So in Ps. 23:6 the 'dwelling in the house of Yahwé' spoken of is an endless one; where would he the happiness if death or the 'foot of pride' (Ps. 36:11) could one day work a sad change?

(e) לְיָדֵי רַדְיָה 'for successive generations or ages,' || עוֹלָם (Ps. 89:1 [2] 4 [5] 102:12 [13] 146:10 etc.).

In the NT we have αἰῶνος (often), with which εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα and εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας are to be grouped,¹ and twice (Rom. 1:20 Jude 6) αἰδίος. RV prefers 'eternal' to 'everlasting' for αἰῶνος; for αἰδίος (AV 'eternal' in Rom., 'everlasting' in Jude) it gives 'everlasting.' This arises from a sense that ζωὴ αἰῶνος in the NT is or may be more than 'endless life.' עוֹלָם וְרַעַת עוֹלָם 'everlasting life' (Dan. 12:2 ἔ ζωὴ αἰῶνος), comes to mean 'life of (the Messianic) age,' and includes all Messianic blessings (so e.g., Jn. 3:15; cp vv. 35). The later Jewish literature preferred the expression 'the life of the coming age' because of its clear-cut distinction between the הַיָּמִים—i.e., the present dispensation—and the אֲבָלָה עוֹלָם—i.e., the Messianic 'age' (cp Mk. 10:30 Lk. 18:30, Heb. 2:5 6:5). See ESCHATOLOGY, § 82 ff., also EARTH i. § 3.

Among the notable phrases of NT are κόλασις αἰῶνος Mt. 25:46, RV 'eternal punishment'; ὀλεθρος αἰῶνος, 2 Thess. 1:9, RV 'eternal destruction'; and διὰ πνεύματος αἰῶνίου, Heb. 9:14, RV 'through the eternal Spirit.' On the first two compare ESCHATOLOGY, § 98. The phrase πνεῦμα αἰῶνίου has to be taken in connection with the preceding phrase (v. 12) αἰωνία λύτρωσις. The high priest could, according to the Law, obtain for the Jewish people only a temporary 'redemption,' for the bulls and goats whose blood he offered had but a temporary life; but Christ 'entered in once for all by means of his own blood,' and his life is not temporary, but eternal, or, which is the same thing, his 'spirit'—his רִיחַ—is unlimited by time, is eternal. For Christ 'has been made (high priest) according to the power of an indissoluble life,' κατὰ δύναμιν ζωῆς ἀκατάλυτου (Heb. 7:16).

Thus the word commonly used for 'eternal' in NT means (1) endless (2) Messianic. In the Fourth Gospel and in the First Epistle of John, however, we find a noteworthy development in the sense of αἰῶνος. The word seems there to refuse to be limited by time-conditions altogether. ζωὴ αἰῶνιος is represented, sometimes indeed as future (Jn. 6:27 12:25 4:14 36), but more generally as already present (Jn. 17:3 and other passages; cp 11:26 f. 85:1). This is akin to the view expressed in the Epistle to the Hebrews, according to which the δυνάμεις μέλλοντος αἰῶνος may be 'tasted' even now (Heb. 6:5). 'Eternal life,' thus viewed, is indeed ἡ ὄντως ζωὴ 'the life which is [life] indeed' (1 Tim. 6:19 RV). It is one of the most noteworthy faults of TR that it substitutes for this fine reading the ordinary term αἰῶνιος, 'everlasting,' 'eternal.'

of the divine ones (בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים, lit. 'sons of Elohim'). Our knowledge of the popular Israelitish beliefs is too slight to permit us ever to dogmatize about them. The influence of the neighbouring nations must, however, have tended to the production of a belief in the quasi-divinity of kings.

¹ Note also the deeply felt expression εἰς πάσας τὰς γενεὰς τοῦ αἰῶνος τῶν αἰῶνων (Eph. 3:21). See RVmg.

Βουθαμ [cod. 58 in v. 6]; in Nu. 33^b BAL om., but BabAF read avroí (see below).

The second station of the Israelites at the Exodus, situated at the 'end (ἄσπ) of the wilderness' (Ex. 13²⁰ Nu. 33⁶). Thus it was the last city on properly Egyptian ground, and therefore (being also near the straight road to Philistia; Ex. 13¹⁷) to be sought at the E. end of the Wady Tūmilāt and near the (Northern?) shore of the Crocodile (Timsāh) Lake. There is no proof whatever of the various identifications with Bīr Abū-Rūk (Schleiden), Bīr Maktal (Ebers; spelled Bīr Maḥdal, in Bæd.), Bīr Suēs (Hengstenberg), places which are, besides, all situated in the désert, partly E. of the Red Sea. Why Daphnæ-Tahpanhes (Brugsch), cannot be Etham, is shown elsewhere (EXODUS i. § 13). The name 𐤀𐤏𐤍 reminds us strongly of 𐤀𐤏𐤍 (see PITHOM), and if we follow G's text in Num. [* = 𐤀𐤏𐤍]¹ the identity is very plausible (Sharpe, Wellh.). If Pithom is the same as modern Tell el-Masḥūta, it was indeed the last city of Goshen, which has, at the E., room only for a few villages and fortifications (about 10 miles to Lake Timsāh).² This identification therefore is highly probable. Otherwise, we might suppose a neighbouring place called after the same local god, Atim, Ethim.³ The name of this place might also have been abridged. This, however, is less probable, and unnecessary. Other Egyptological explanations cannot be upheld.⁴ See EXODUS i. § 10 f., GOSHEN i. § 2, SUCCOTH, PITHOM.

ETHAN (יְתָנַי; 'lasting, strong'; אֵיΘΑΜ [BL], אֵיΘΑΝ [A]).

1. An Ezrahite, whose wisdom was excelled by Solomon's, 1 K. 4³¹ [511] (γαίθαν [BA], 4²⁷; so also in G^u of Jer. 50 (27) 44). The true reading of the passage, which of course determines the explanation, is considered elsewhere (see MAHOL, HEMAN). G^u, which calls Ethan τὸν ζαρείτην (G^u εἰρανητήρη, cp Pss. 88 f.), very possibly considered him to be an Edomite (cp Job 42^{17c}, G^uNC), Edom being renowned for its wise men (Jer. 49⁷). To the Chronicler, however, this view was unacceptable. Ethan (and not only he, but also the wise men who in 1 K. 4³¹ [511] are mentioned with him) must be of an Israelitish stock. The question of his age, too, must be cleared up. Hence in 1 Ch. 26 not only Zimri (or Zabdi), but also Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Dara are sons of Zerach, the son of Judah. Thus 1 K. 4³¹ [511] receives a thoroughly new interpretation. To this Judahite Ethan it is possible—possible but hardly probable—that the author of the heading of

⁴ The comparison with Egyptian htmu (closing) 'fortress, fort', from the root which in Coptic becomes šōtem 'to shut', is quite impossible. Anast. v. 20¹ mentions a 'fortress' (htmu) near T(u)-ku (cp preceding note); but no city with this name can be found. We are equally precluded from comparing the Coptic šōm, 'to close'; with the article this would be h-šōm, 'the closing'. Naville (Pithom, 28 ff.) compares the name A-duma of the 'Bedawi-tribes' mentioned in Anast. vi. 4¹⁴, in which all recent writers have rightly seen the name Edom. The dental forbids the identification with Etham. (The alleged name Adima reads Kad-ma; see KEDEMAH.) Besides, Etham must be an Egyptian place,—not several journeys E. in the wilderness.

P. 89 (αιθαν [BN], αιμαν [R], αιθαυ [T]), ascribed the composition of that psalm. It is much more natural to assume that he meant the eponym of the post-exilic Ethan-guild of temple-singers (see 2).

Jastrow (Beit. z. Ass. 3, Heft 2; cp Rel. Bab. and Ass. 519) identifies the Ethan of 1 K. 4³¹ [511] with the mythic Babylonian Etana (the hero with whom the mythic eagle allied itself, and who took flight for heaven clinging to the eagle's breast, but fell to earth with the eagle and died—unlike the Elijah of the noble Hebrew legend).¹ He assumes this largely on the ground that the names of Ethan's companions in 1 K. 4³¹ [511]—viz., Heman, Calcol, and Darda—appear to be non-Hebraic, and suspects that Babylonian references may also be found to these three names. It is a part of this theory that Etana, like Ethan, means 'strong.' Etana is not, however, renowned for his wisdom, and 'Ethan' in 1 K. l.c. may be due to corruption (see MAHOL).

2. (αιθαυ [N in 1 Ch. 15¹⁷], αιθαν [B in 1 Ch. 15¹⁷ 19, and N in 1 Ch. 15¹⁹]), son of Kishi or KUSHAIHAH (g.v.), the head of one of the 'families' which had the hereditary office of temple musicians and singers (1 Ch. 6⁴⁴ [29] 15¹⁷ 19) also called JEDUTHUN (g.v.). In appearance this is an altogether different Ethan from the preceding; but the appearance is illusory. From a critical inspection of the narratives the truth appears to be this. On a re-organisation of the guilds of singers in late post-exilic times the authorities of the temple looked out for nominal founders of those guilds belonging to Davidic and Solomonic times. One older name—that of ASAPH (g.v., 3)—was retained; to this two fresh ones—viz. Heman and Ethan (or Jeduthun)—were added. These names were derived from 1 K. 4³¹ [511].

A threefold assumption was made: (1) that the persons so called were Israelites, (2) that they were singers, and (3) that they were contemporaries of David. As to (1), 1 K. 4³¹ has no doubt the meaning of 'native' (Lev. 16²⁹), and in the headings of Pss. 88 and 89 ^BNART renders 'Ezrahite' by ισραηλ[ε]ίτης (cp G^u of 1 K. 4²⁷). As to (2), if Solomon sang to perfection, Heman and Ethan who vied with him, it seemed, have been eminent singers. As to (3), a possible interpretation of 1 K. l.c., no doubt favours the view that all three were contemporaries. We have seen already that it was one great object of the circle to which the Chronicler belonged to make the past a reflection of the present.

A little earlier it would have sufficed to make Heman and Ethan Israelites. In post-Nehemiah times it was thought a matter of course that these two great singers should have been Levites. Hence Ethan is placed by the Chronicler among the Merarite Levites (1 Ch. 6⁴⁴). The one psalm,² however (89), which is ascribed to Ethan (or to the guild named after him) describes him simply as 'the Ezrahite.' Either this is a slip of the memory, or the old name was still regarded as the highest title (see 1). See GENEALOGIES i. § 7.

3. Son of ZIMMAH and father of Adaiah in the second genealogy of ASAPH, 3 1 Ch. 6⁴² [27] (αιθαν [B], συρ [A], ηθαυ [L]). In the first genealogy the name is JOAH (3). It is noticeable that in the second pedigree a certain ETHNI (g.v.) b. Zerach is mentioned. This gives a new view of the relation between Ethan and Asaph. As Wellhausen remarks, the same elements are mentioned again and again in these chapters of Chronicles in different connections; consistency would have been too great a hindrance to the idealism of the writer (Prolog.⁽⁴⁾, 220 f.).

According to Josephus (c. Ap. 1¹⁸; quoting Menander), Eithobal (Εἰθώβαλος), a priest of Astarte, placed himself on the throne of Tyre by murder, 50 or 60 years after the time of Eἰρωμος or HIRAM (g.v., 1).

² G^u ascribes Ps. 88 [87] also to Ethan (αιθαυ).

With the same writer (Ant. viii. 13a) we may safely identify this king with the Ethbaal of 1 K.

'Sidonians' is used in the wider sense for 'Phœnicians.' The name also occurs on the Taylor-cylinder as Tuba'lu (king of Sidon), KB 291; cp M'Curdy, Hist., Mon. 2 276. See PHœNICIA.

ETHER (אֶתֶר), a place in the Negeb of Judah, mentioned between Libnah and Ashan (Josh. 15 42, אֶתֶר [B, see below], אֶתֶר [AL]), but also assigned to Simeon (197, אֶתֶר [B], אֶתֶר [A], אֶתֶר [L]). It is evidently the Athach to which, according to MT of 1 S. 30 30, David sent a part of the spoil of Ziklag, and אֶתֶר actually reads אֶתֶר = אֶתֶר in Josh. 15.

In Josh. 19 7, however, אֶתֶר, like MT, supports 'Ether.' In || list of Simeonite villages in 1 Ch. 4 32 Bertheau is of opinion that Ether (which he prefers to Athach) is represented by Etam. This, however, is probably a mistake (see ETAM 1, 2). Ether is a corruption of Athach, which is most certainly represented in 1 Ch. (l.c.) by Tochen, and Etam can be accounted for otherwise.

Possibly both Athach and Tochen are corruptions of a third word—Anaboth. See ANAB, ATHACH.

ETHIOPIA in EV is the equivalent of אֶתְיוֹפְיָה, representing the Αἰθιοπία or Αἰθιοπες (originally 'burnt,' i.e., 'dusky-faced ones') of Θ, and the Æthiopia of Vg.; as rendering the name of the son of Ham

1. Form of name. (Gen. 10 6-8 1 Ch. 18-10), אֶתְיוֹפְיָה is always transliterated (CUSH; χους, χουθ [E Gen. 10 7], Chus); אֶתְיוֹפְיָה, 'Ethiopian,' Jer. 18 23, etc., RV 'Cushite' in Nu. 12 1 (Θ Αἰθιοπία), etc.; see CUSH 1, § 2, CUSHI, 3. The Hebrew name is found also in Ass. Kāsu;¹ in Persian trilingual inscriptions, Bab. Kāsu is rendered by Pers. Kāsiyā, 'the Cushites.' The Semites, evidently, borrowed the name from Egypt. There the earliest form is in dyn. 12, Kāsi (like אֶתְיוֹפְיָה)²; later the defective orthography Kāsi,³ is common, but even the Coptic form Ε600ϩ, Ε6Ωϩ (Boh. Ε6Ωϩ), written ḥsi in Demotic and later hieroglyphics (mekouis in Gk. transliteration as proper name), 'Ethiopian,' betrays the middle consonant by the euphonic Aleph protheticum, pointing to Ḥsi (ḥ). The Semitic form comes from a late vulgar pronunciation Aḥsi, which omits the middle radical.⁴

In the time of dynasty 12 the name Kush seems to have designated a tribe occupying southern Nubia.

2. Meaning of name in Egypt. As far as we can determine the territory of the tribe in question,⁵ it began somewhat N. of the second cataract. About 1500, the annals of Thotmes III. still retain the traditional distinction of N. and S. Nubia as Wawat (a name not much known after 1000 B.C.) and Kāsi; but Kāsi, the larger part of the country, then commonly gives its name to Nubia in general.

Later, Ḥsi, 'Kushite,' completely displaced the earlier term nēḥēsi (i.e., Eastern-African, including Hamites as well as Negroes, although used by preference of the most characteristic African race—i.e., the Negro—exactly as the Gk. Αἰθιοπία).

The Hebrew writers too knew that Kush was the country S. of Egypt (Judith 10), beginning at SYENE

3. In Palestine. [q. v.], or, more exactly, above the island of Philæ. How far S. it extended in the vast regions on the White and the Blue Nile, they knew of course as little as the Egyptians. Whilst the Greeks, however (e.g., Homer), had the most erroneous ideas on the position and extent of Ethiopia (sometimes they extended it as far as India!), the Palestinians, like the Egyptians, clearly distinguished Kush from the African coasts of the Red Sea (Punt or PUT, q. v.). The list of provinces of Darius I. even distinguished Kuš, Pūt, and the Mašiya tribes (Egyptian Mazoy) named between these two. Kush, therefore, must be limited to the Nile valley and not be identified geographically with the vague Greek term Αἰθιοπία.⁶

[The meaning of 'beyond the rivers of Cush' (Is. 18 1 Zeph. 3 10) is not altogether clear. Both passages appear to be very late; they cannot be used as authorities for the geographical views of Isaiah and Zephaniah. In Zeph., l.c., we must render אֶתְיוֹפְיָה, 'from beyond,' implying that the region beyond the streams of Cush was one of the most distant points from which the dispersed Jews would be restored to Palestine. We cannot, however, say that Cush is always distinctly represented as one of the remotest countries. It is mentioned quite naturally in connection with Egypt in Ps. 68 31 [32] Is. 20 3 5 Ezek. 30 4 Nah. 3 9. (Whether Ps. 87 4 Is. 43 3 4 14 may be added, is matter for inquiry.) Great caution is necessary in discussing the references to Cush (see CUSH 1, § 2, CUSHAN, CUSHI, 3). More than one ethnic name seems to have been written אֶתְיוֹפְיָה; hence the distressing confusions which have arisen. On the difficult prophecy in which the Ethiopian Cushites appear to be described (Is. 18) there is difference of opinion; cp Che. SBOT (Isaiah, Heb.), who recognises the corruptness of the text and seeks to correct it; see also CUSH 1, § 2].

The Egyptians knew the country in earliest times under the name Ḥnt, 'the South' (also Ḥnst?), using

4. History. Wawat originally of a central district. It was not exactly tributary;¹ but the pharaohs sent trading expeditions thither—e.g., one with 300 asses of burden to Ama(m), near, or S. of, Khartūm (EGYPT, § 47). They derived much of their timber for large ships from the forests of central or S. Nubia, or even had the ships built on the spot with the assistance of the Nubian chiefs. In war-time these chiefs furnished thousands of archers to the pharaoh. This barbarous Negro country, therefore, seems to have been completely under Egyptian influence. Its conquest was undertaken by the kings of dyn. 12 (EGYPT, § 50). The Kāsi people, now first mentioned, seem to have been more warlike than the tribes of the N. (Wawat), so that Useratesen III. had to fix his strongly fortified frontier at Semneh (about 21' 32' N. lat.). Though apparently independent during the Hyksos period, Nubia was again made subject after 1600 B.C. by 'Ahmose (Ahmes) I. and his successors, and remained so down to about 1100 B.C. The southernmost traces of an Egyptian military post have been found at Ben Naga (Nakā), near the sixth cataract (see EGYPT, after col. 1208, map no. 1); and slave-hunting expeditions may have extended even more to the S. The Nile valley seems to have been content to remain tributary without giving Egypt trouble. The many wars in 'vile Nubia' (Kāsi) were probably merely slave-hunting expeditions in the S., or punitive raids upon the rapacious desert-tribes (the Anti or Trog(1)odytes³ in the N., the Mazoy (or Mašoy) near Sennār (see above)). The banks of the Nile, therefore, were covered not only with military forts but also with temples and Egyptian colonies. Although the Egyptian elements were absorbed without leaving many traces in the language or the racial type, the country became to a certain extent civilized. The government was in the hands of a viceroy (residing 'at the holy mountain' in kings of Egypt or of Napata-Kōš. The general Greek expression (rendered Ἰεθίοπειροι) was limited to Abyssinia by the scholars of Aksum, a limitation that has caused very great confusion in modern literature.

² Mariette's results, however, in his Listes Géographiques, rest on absurd identifications of the names recorded by Thutmōsis III.

³ 'Trogodytes' seems better attested than 'Troglodytes.'

Napata)¹ who had the title 'royal son of Koš.'² The tribute and products of the country were chiefly gold (rarely, wrought gold), precious red stones, ostrich feathers, leopard skins, cattle, live monkeys, ivory, ebony, some incense, etc. (cp Herod. 3 97 114).

We find Nubia an independent kingdom in dyn. 22. It seems that the high-priestly family at Thebes when yielding to the power of the Tanitic pharaohs (EGYPT, § 61 f.) had fled to the southern provinces and there founded an independent state.

Napata. Every affair of state was directed by oracles of Amon; even the king was elected from certain royal descendants in a way very similar to that described in 1 S. 10 19, and if the priests were dissatisfied with the king, they simply communicated to him an oracle that he should leave the throne (or even commit suicide).³ The priesthood seems to have enjoyed a wealth quite disproportionate to the resources of the country. No wonder that the discontented Egyptian priests of later times, described pious Ethiopia to the Greeks (especially Herodotus) as the most ideal of lands, where people lived in unexcelled orthodoxy, and, consequently, in Utopian wealth and power. This new kingdom does not seem to have extended very far up the White Nile; its frontiers in N. Kordofan and Sennar are unknown; the nomadic desert-tribes between the Nile and the Red Sea could not be tractable subjects. Thus it does not seem to have included much outside of the narrow Nile valley from Philæ to Khartûm, which is a poor country, not admitting of much agriculture. With such meagre resources, Kush could never hold its own against united Egypt. The unfavourable political conditions of Egypt however, allowed the king of Koš to occupy S. Egypt with Thebes soon after 800 B.C., and king P'anhy could even attempt to subjugate the rest of the disunited counties, about 750 (see EGYPT, § 65; on the more successful conquest by Šabakō, on Šabatako [or Sebichos?] and T(a)harkō [see TIRHAKAH, ib., § 66 a). Nah. 39 refers to this period; Jer. 46 9 Ezek. 30 4 (385, very strange) refer to Ethiopian mercenaries in Egypt rather than to the past period of the 25th dynasty. ZERAH (5) and So (qq.v.) do not belong here. The strange anomaly of Nubia as a great empire, which even tried to stop the progress of Assyria in Asia, did not last very long. For the Ethiopians to hold even Egypt was too hard a task. The last attempt to regain it was made by Tantamen¹ in 667. He tells us in a long inscription how, encouraged by a dream, he easily conquered Egypt to Memphis; but he does not tell of his subsequent defeat. The ascendancy of dyn. 26 shut the Ethiopians out completely.

On several cases of unfriendly contact with the Ethiopians under Psametik (I. and II.?) and Apries, see EGYPT, §§ 67-69. The kings Atirunras, Asparuta (circa 600 B.C.) and several named P'anhy are mentioned. One surnamed Arura was dethroned by Harsiöt(ef); these two kings and their successor Nastasen(n), who records great victories over the southern peoples, reigned about 400. During the whole Persian period the kingdom of Kush was tributary to the Persian kings (cp Esth. 1: 8 f.), having been subjugated by Cambyses in 524. The Ptolemies also had at least a strong influence in Napata.² Under Ptolemy IV.³ king Erkamem (Ἐργαμένης) had the courage to refuse the abdication demanded of him by the priests, and broke the power of the clergy by a great slaughter in Napata.

The southern residence Meroë (Eth. originally Berua; cp mod. Begeraue?) came more into prominence from the time of Ergamenes 5b. Meroë as capital. (who was not, however, the founder). On the loss of the Dodekaschœnus district (ending at Prubs or Hierasycaminus)⁴ to Ptolemy glyphic inscriptions, become indescribably barbarous) and in power. An attack on Egypt¹ by the one-eyed queen Kandake (see CANDACE) caused her defeat by C. Petronius in 24 B.C., the Roman occupation of the Dodecaschœnus, and the destruction of Napata. This shattered the weak empire, and although Nero's spies exaggerated in reporting that Merôë was in ruins (some later buildings are found there), only a shadowy remnant of the old kingdom seems to have subsisted on the Blue Nile.

It may be mentioned that the Egyptians figured the inhabitants of Kush as negroes—among them a minority of reddish-brown (i.e., Hamitic?) tribes. The settled Cushites of Nubia. The independent period seem to have been rather pure negroes² (contrast Gen. 10 6), most probably akin (but not all directly) to the modern Nubā (not to the Hamitic Bedja or Bedja), who speak a language of the Nilotic³ type. The population of the southern part may have been somewhat different. Certainty as to this depends on the decipherment of some inscriptions in as yet unknown characters,⁴ and representing evidently the vernacular language in opposition to the Egyptian writing of the priests. The Romans, after Augustus, speak only of the independent tribes of the Nubæ or Nobades on the Nile, the rapacious Blemmyes and Megabari in the East. They gave much trouble to the Romans, who had to subsidise the Nobadians. Beginning with the latter, they were converted to Christianity only in the sixth century. In the district around the ruins of Merôë arose the Christian kingdom of Aloa.⁵ This and the Nobadian kingdom held their own against the Mohammedans down to the Middle Ages.

If AV is right in taking the final letter in תחזק as radical, we might with Halévy (As., 6th ser., § 552) render 'Athé is lord' (cp the deity Athé in ATARGATIS); but the form of the Hebrew name is open to suspicion (cp 5). The תחזק in תחזק may be due to the neighbourhood of נתחזק. Most probably we should read תחזק 'city (of), following 5^{BA}; perhaps too תחזק, 'magistrate,' should rather be תחזק,—i.e., Kaziz, an old divine name.⁶ The same name may be probably found in Hīrata-Kazaī (or Kasai) mentioned by Ašur-bāni-pal in his celebrated campaign into Arabia; see Gottheil, JBL 17 210 f. I. Accounts of Institution.—Two distinct narratives of the institution of the Lord's Supper or Holy Eucharist are found in the Synoptic Gospels. 1. Institution: We may take first the account given Mk. and Mt. by Mk., setting beside it the modified reproduction of it in Mt.

Mk. 14 22.	Mt. 26 26.
And as they were eating	Now as they were eating,
He took bread, blessed	Jesus took bread and blessed and brake and gave to	and brake and giving to them and said:	the disciples said:
Take:	Take, eat:
this is my body.	this is my body.
And taking a cup he gave	And taking a cup he gave thanks	thanks
and gave to them;	and gave to them, and they all drank of it:	saying:
and he said to them:	Drink ye all of it:
This is my blood of the	for this is my blood of the covenant, which is shed on	covenant which for many is behalf of many.	shed for remission of sins.

The insertion of the command 'eat,' after 'take,' is probably due to a desire to lessen the abruptness. The change of the statement 'they all drank of it' into the command 'Drink ye all of it' is parallel with this. Both changes may be due to liturgical use, as also the addition of 'for remission of sins.'

2. Lk. and Paul. We may next compare the narrative of Lk., setting it side by side with that of Paul.

Lk. 22 17.	1 Cor. 11 23.
And he received a cup and gave thanks and said:
Take this and divide it among yourselves; for I say unto you, I will not drink from now of the fruit of the vine, until the kingdom of God come.
And he took bread and gave	He took bread and gave thanks and brake and gave	thanks and brake and to them saying:	said:
This is my body	This is my body
[[which is given on your behalf:	which (is) on your behalf:
do this unto my remembrance.	do this unto my remembrance.
Also the cup likewise after	Likewise also the cup after supper, saying:	supper, saying:
This cup (is) the new covenant	This cup is the new covenant in my blood, (this) which on	in my blood;
your behalf is shed]].
	do this, as oft as ye drink (it), unto my remembrance.

The words in double brackets are regarded by Westcott and Hort as no part of the original text of Lk. They are termed by them a 'western non-interpolation,' as having been interpolated into all texts except the western. They are absent from Codex Bezae and several old Latin MSS (α, β, γ, δ, ι); others (ε, ς), as well as the Old Syriac (cu sinu), show a dislocation of the passage which points to original omission. Internal evidence supports the omission. The words spoken over the second cup contain an awkward juxtaposition of words from 1 Cor. with words from Mk. (τὸ ποτήριον . . . ἐν τῷ αἵματι μου, τὸ ὑπερ ὧν ἐχθροῦμενοι); it is difficult to ascribe this to so careful a writer as Lk. The interpolation of these clauses into all Greek MSS (except D) is doubtless due to harmonistic tendencies, and was perhaps facilitated by liturgical usage (cp the harmony in the English Prayer Book of words from the three Gospels and 1 Cor.).

A remarkable accession of evidence has come to us from the Teaching of the Apostles; for there the order is the same as in the shorter text of Lk. ('first, concerning the cup' chap. 9). The cup is mentioned before the bread in 1 Cor. 10:16; but we cannot lay stress on this in face of Paul's formal statement in 11:25.

We must accordingly regard the accounts in Lk. and in 1 Cor. as wholly independent of each other. We have thus three lines of tradition: (1) that of Mk.; (2) that of Paul, in which the words both for the bread and for the cup are somewhat varied, and the command is added: 'Do this in remembrance of me'; (3) that of Lk., in which the blessing of the cup comes first, with variations in the words spoken, whereas for the bread the words (apart from the omission of 'Take') are the same as in Mk.

The Fourth Gospel does not record the institution of the Eucharist; but its chronology of the Passion differs from that of the Synoptic Gospels in a point which has an important bearing upon the Last Supper. In this Gospel the death of Jesus synchronises with the killing of the paschal lamb 'towards evening' on the fourteenth day of Nisan: so that the Last Supper falls on the day before the Passover. According to Mk. (= Mt. Lk.) it was 'on the first day of unleavened bread, when they sacrificed the Passover' (14:12) that Jesus sent two disciples to make preparation for the paschal meal; and, 'when evening was come,' he sat down with the twelve. With regard to this discrepancy we may perhaps be content, for the purpose of the present discussion, to accept the position defended by writers so divergent as Westcott (Introd. to Gosp., 340 ff.) and Spitta (Zur Gesch. u. Litt. des Urchrist. 1:210 ff. [93]), and regard the Last Supper as taking place on the day before the Passover (cp CHRONOLOGY, § 54 ff.). We have early evidence to show that the Eucharist was soon regarded as a commemoration of the redemption effected by the death of Christ (1 Cor. 11:26), and that Christ himself was spoken of as the Christian's paschal lamb (1 Cor. 5:7). Such interpretations may have led to the actual identification of the Last Supper with the paschal meal, and so have affected the chronological notices of the Passion. But it is hard to feel confidence in an explanation which sets aside the chronological statement of the Synoptic Gospels for that of the Fourth Gospel only.

II. Significance.—In view of this uncertainty, and for other reasons, our conception of the original institution must not be dominated by the consideration of the elaborate ceremonial of the Passover celebration. Such a consideration belongs rather to the subsequent development of the Eucharist as a Christian rite. Here we must confine ourselves to the simpler formulæ which are known to have accompanied the ordinary Jewish meals. Thus at the present day (Daily Prayer Book, with transl. by C. Singer, 287 [91]) the following blessing is said over the bread: 'Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the Universe, who bringest forth Bread from the earth,' and before drinking wine: 'Blessed art Thou, . . . who createst the fruit of the vine.' It is probable that such words as these are implied in the statements 'He took bread and blessed,' and 'He took the cup and gave thanks.'

4. Thanksgiving at a meal.

This supposition is confirmed by the earliest extant formulæ of the Christian Eucharist. In the Teaching of the Apostles (chap. 9 f.) we find certain thanksgivings, which are clearly of earlier date than the manual in which they are embodied. Two of these are respectively 'concerning the cup' and 'concerning the broken bread'; the third is to be said at the conclusion of the meal. Their language suggests that they are Christian adaptations of Jewish graces; and it is worthy of note that they survived as Christian graces, after the Eucharist had ceased to be a meal, and had become a distinct act of worship with an elaborate liturgy in which these primitive formulæ have left but scanty traces (Ps. Athan. de virg. 12-14).

We see then that the Eucharist had, in its earliest form, an element in common with the ordinary Jewish meal, which was sanctified by thanksgivings uttered over the bread and over the cup. This element is expressly recognised in all the narratives of the institution. The chief point of distinction is that here these acts of thanksgiving came, not at the beginning of the meal, but during its progress and at its close; and that they were accompanied by utterances prompted by the unique circumstances of the Last Supper.

If we take merely those portions of the words of institution which are certainly common to two or more of the three lines of tradition, we see that, whereas the bread is interpreted simply as the body of Christ with no further explanation, the cup is directly explained of the 'covenant' made by Christ's death. The words of institution, even apart from premonitory warnings, in themselves pointed to death—'my body . . . my blood'; and the more clearly, in that the blood of a covenant was not life-blood flowing in the veins of the living, but life-blood shed in sacrificial death. If the first utterance, then, signified: At this moment of parting I give you in the fullest sense myself; the second further signified: My blood is being shed to unite you in a covenant with God.

The second utterance as it stands in Mk. (τοῦτό ἐστιν 5. Idea of TO ΔΙΑΜΑ ΜΟΥ ΤΗΣ ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗΣ) clearly recalls the 'covenant' recorded in Ex. covenant. 24:8:

'Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it on the people, and said: Behold the blood of the covenant (ἰδοὺ τὸ αἷμα τῆς διαθήκης), which the Lord hath covenanted with you concerning all these words' (cp Heb. 9:20 10:29). Therefore, just as in Mt. 16:18 Jesus emphatically adapts to his own use a familiar term—'I will build my Ecclesia' (see CHURCH, § 2)—so here, in reference to the Mosaic covenant on Mount Sinai, not in reference to the Passover in Egypt, he declares: 'This is my blood of the covenant.'

Accordingly we are justified in accepting the words in Mk. as more nearly original than those in 1 Cor. ('This is the new covenant in my blood'). The Pauline phrase introduces the word 'new' into the place already filled by the emphatic pronoun 'my,' the 'new covenant' being perhaps an interpretation necessary for Gentile Christians.

The symbolism of eating and drinking is accordingly combined with the symbolism of a covenant made by sacrificial blood-shedding. Thus are brought into combination two characteristics of the Messianic idea: the feast of the Messianic kingdom, and the sacrificial death of the Messiah himself. The feast appears in many passages of OT prophecy; and there is reason to think that it had received a spiritual, not merely a literal, interpretation; even as the manna and the water in the wilderness were regarded as symbols of the Messiah. Moreover, the popular conception of the Messianic kingdom included a marvellously fruitful vine and an extraordinary abundance of corn (cp Fragm. of Papias in Iren. v. 33, which rests on earlier Jewish tradition; see Apoc. of Baruch, 29, ed. Charles, 54). If then, at the moment, the death of Jesus was beyond the comprehension of the disciples in spite of his frequent references to it, yet there may have been a side of his strange action and utterances which appealed to them then,—the conception, namely, of the Messianic feast, in which they should spiritually feed upon the Messiah himself, the spiritual corn and the spiritual vine. It is certain, at any rate, that Jesus added in reference to the cup an allusion to his drinking the new wine of the kingdom of God. The Teaching of the Apostles embodies a similar thought in the significant expression in which it gives thanks for 'the holy vine of David' (chap. 9).

6. Messianic reference.

Whatever conception these acts and words conveyed to the disciples at the time, the events of the following days may have helped them to see in them the gift of a personal union with their Lord at the very moment of parting, and the gift of a union with his sacrifice of himself.

That the acts and words are capable of yet further interpretations must have been part of the intention with which they were spoken; for had their meaning ended here, they would have been spoken otherwise, so as to exclude the possibility of interminable disputations. As it is, the very diversity of their interpretation in the history of the Church seems to be a token that they were so framed as to wait for a fuller comprehension. Something of that comprehension is found in Paul; something too in John.

Paul, in this as in so many other instances, arrived at his interpretation through the exigencies of his special mission. His task of welding into one the Jewish and Gentile elements led him to develop the conception of the corporate unity of all Christians. Food has ever been the token of unity—the bond of equal intercourse. Refusal to take food together is the symbol of exclusiveness and caste distinction. The Jew could not, by the later Pharisaic ordinances, eat with the Gentile. If Christ were for Jew and Gentile alike, the Eucharist, the feast of the new and all-inclusive 'covenant,' must be the common meal of Jew and Gentile. This in itself must have given it to Paul a special significance.

Again, to Paul with his doctrine of the one man—the one body with many members—a new vista of thought lies open. The one body is the whole Christ: 'so also is the Christ' (1 Cor. 12:12): 'we are members of his body' (Eph. 5:30). Now the word of the Eucharist was: 'This is my body' (not 'This is my flesh'). Thus the Eucharist was the sacrament of corporate unity in Christ. The single loaf, broken into fragments and distributed among the faithful, was the pledge and the means of their intimate union: 'We are one body: for we all partake of the one loaf' (1 Cor. 10:17).

The sin of the Corinthian church lay specially in their scrambling over the Supper of the Lord, each making it 'his own' supper, and not waiting for others: note in 1 Cor. 11:20 f. the contrast between 'the Lord's' (κυριακόν) and 'his own' (ἰδίον). They wholly failed to grasp the truth of the one body: thus, in a real sense (even if this does not exhaust the meaning of the words), 'not discerning the body.'

That to Paul the body is at one moment the Church, and at the next the Christ, is no contradiction in his thought, but rather a kind of refusal to distinguish; the Church and Christ are to him 'not twain, but one' (cp. Eph. 5:31 f.). Augustine is truly Pauline when he says of the Eucharist, 'Be what you see, and receive what you are' (Serm. ad Infantēs, 272).

Paul's conception comes out strikingly in the sequence of verses in 1 Cor. 10:16 f.: 'The loaf which we break, is it not the communion (or fellowship) of the body of Christ? For one loaf, one body, we the many are: for we all of us partake of the one loaf.' That is his practical comment on 'This is my body.'

When we turn to the Fourth Gospel, the much-debated question arises whether the sixth chapter has any direct reference to the Eucharist, either by way of anticipation on the part of Jesus himself, or in the reflective exhibition of his teaching by the writer.

9. Of the Fourth Gospel. The absence of all mention of the institution of Christian baptism or of the Eucharist stands side by side with the emphasis laid in the third chapter on the absolute necessity of a new birth by water and the Spirit, and in the sixth on the absolute necessity of feeding on the flesh and blood of Christ. In each case the answer to the enquiry, How can this be? is a simple reassertion of the necessity without any explanation to guide the inquirer: and in each case words are spoken of the ascension of Christ into heaven, and of the need of faith if these things are to be grasped at all.

We may securely say that the two discourses deal with the same spiritual things as underlie respectively baptism and the Eucharist: and we cannot doubt that the evangelist's own interpretation of the two sacraments must have followed the lines laid down in these discourses. This being so, the controversy above referred to sinks to a position of secondary importance.

We may take it, then, that to the evangelist the special signification of the Eucharist lay in the intimate union with Christ himself, which we have already seen to be involved in the words—and particularly in the first word—of the institution. The saying 'I am the bread of life' is the converse of the saying 'This (i.e., this bread) is my body.' In each case the meaning is: You shall feed upon myself: you shall enter into a union, which is nothing less than identification, with me.

If Paul is, as always, impressed with the corporate aspect of truth, the Fourth Gospel is concerned with the mystical union of the individual with his Lord: 'He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood dwelleth in me, and I in him' (Jn. 6:56).

To Paul 'This is my body' is almost inseparable from the thought 'His body are we.' In Paul's narrative 'This is my blood of the covenant' appears as 'This cup is the new covenant in my blood.' The thought of the new people of God is each time uppermost in his mind. He finds its unity in the body: he finds it again in the new and universal 'covenant.'

In the Fourth Gospel the interpretation of the Eucharist is the same as if its words had actually run: 'This is my flesh,' 'This is my blood.' The flesh and blood are the full life; their communication is the communication of eternal life (Jn. 6:54 f.).

Paul is practical and sees truth in his effort after corporate unity. The Fourth Gospel is contemplative: the writer is interpreting a past of half a century ago, which yet to him is an eternal present; but he is thereby in a sense isolated.

The two sides of truth are not opposed but complementary—the mysticism of the individual and the mysticism of the corporate life. They both alike find their full expression and realisation in the sacrament of the body and blood of the Lord.

The Church of the post-apostolic age shows strangely little indication in its dogmatic teachings of the influence of the peculiar conceptions of Pauline or of Johannine teaching. This is

11. Other early writers: true generally, and the history of the Clement. doctrine of the Eucharist presents no exception. The words of the institution, constantly repeated as they probably were, formed the only comment on the significance of the sacrament. There was no attempt to explain them: they were as simple as words could be—'This is my body,' 'This is my blood.' They were the formula which expressed the fact: no metaphysical questioning arose; no need was felt of a philosophy of explanation.

Paul's special position as the uniter of Jew and Gentile had ceased to need justification or even assertion. The Church—so far as its literature has survived to us—was a Church of Gentile Christians. Jews indeed formed a part of it, but an insignificant part, not destined to influence directly its future development. John's special position was necessarily peculiar to himself: there could be none after him who had 'seen and handled' as he had. A new age had begun, with its own situations and exigencies: and it was not an age which called forth developments of Christian philosophy.

The Epistle of Clement does not employ the Eucharist, as Paul had employed it, as the starting-point of an argument for unity. The spiritual significance of the Eucharist is not emphasised; but the way is being prepared for its becoming the central act of Christian worship, and so comparable with the sacrifices of Judaism. It is regarded as 'the offering of the gifts' of the Church (chap. 44), and it is surrounded already, it would seem, with liturgical accompaniments of prayer and praise (chap. 59 f.).

In the Didachè the Eucharistic formulæ (chap. 9 f.) differ in thought and phraseology from anything else in the book: their colour is probably

12. Didachè. derived mainly from Jewish ritual, though their language is in several points Johannine. The three thanksgivings are addressed to the Father: the only reference to Christ is in the phrases 'through Jesus thy servant' (thrice), 'through thy servant,' and

'through Jesus Christ.' It is noteworthy that none of these names occur in the rest of the book, where Christ is always (except in the baptismal formula) spoken of as 'the Lord,'—a title reserved in the thanksgivings for the Father.

Thus, negatively, there is no expression of any feeding on Christ: there is not even a mention of 'body,' or 'flesh,' or 'blood.' There is no sense of the Eucharist as a means of corporate unity. The future union of the now scattered ecclesia is prayed for with an allusion to the gathering together of the scattered particles of wheat into one loaf. This is a conception radically different from Paul's teaching of the unity of believers as partakers of the one loaf.

Positively, we note the prominence of the idea of thanksgiving: its subject-matter being 'that which has been made known through Jesus Christ'—viz., the vine of David, life, knowledge, faith, immortality. The nearest thing to any positive blessing in the Eucharist itself is in the clause: 'Food and drink thou hast given to men . . . and to us thou hast granted spiritual food and drink and life eternal through thy servant.' From this we may perhaps conclude that the Eucharistic elements were already regarded as spiritually nourishing and so producing immortality.

It is convenient to notice at this point the view of the Eucharist which belongs to the later period of the composition of the Didachè itself. The Eucharist is that 'holy thing' which may not be given to 'the dogs'—i.e., the unbaptized (chap. 9).

Confession of sins and a forgiving spirit are essential preliminaries, 'that your sacrifice may be pure,' 'that your sacrifice be not defiled'; 'for it is that which was spoken of by the Lord: In every place and time to offer to me a pure sacrifice' (chap. 4). Though the word 'sacrifice' is thus used, however, there is no exposition of a sacrificial view of the Eucharist—no indication that the 'elements' were regarded as forming a sacrificial offering, or that the Eucharist was in any way connected with the sacrifice of Christ. Indeed this last conception would be wholly foreign to the atmosphere of the Didachè. Yet the language both of this book and of Clement's epistle was preparing the way for an interpretation of the Eucharist in the light of the sacrificial worship of the Old Testament.

The Epistles of Ignatius emphasise the Godhead and the manhood of Christ in face of a docetism which practically denied the latter. Thus

13. Ignatius. Ignatius' whole view of life is sacramental: everywhere he finds the spiritual in closest conjunction with the material. We are accordingly prepared to find in him a mystical exposition of the Eucharist.

The second main stress of his teaching is laid on the threefold order of the ministry. As the Eucharist is the central function of the bishop's ministration, it stands out as the symbol and means of the Church's unity.

Thus we find in Ignatius something of the Johannine and something of the Pauline conception of the meaning of the Eucharist. In each case, however, there are serious limitations: Ignatius grasps only so much as the needs of his time make him feel the want of.

Taking first the thought of the Church's unity, we have in Philad. 4 'Be ye careful therefore to observe one Eucharist: for there is one flesh of our Lord Jesus Christ, and one cup for the unity of his blood: one altar precinct, as there is one bishop together with the presbytery and the deacons.' We miss here the Pauline conception of union through partaking of the broken pieces of a single loaf. The centre of unity is the one Eucharistic service of the one bishop with his presbyters and deacons, making the one altar precinct. The connection of the bishop with the Eucharist is elsewhere strongly emphasised: e.g., Smyrn. 8: 'Let that be accounted a valid (βεβαία) Eucharist, which takes place under the bishop, or him to whom he may give commission,' etc.

The mystical meaning of the Eucharist comes out in such a passage as Smyrn. 7: 'They abstain from Eucharist (or thanksgiving) and prayer, because they allow not that the Eucharist is the flesh of our Saviour Jesus Christ, (that flesh) which suffered for our sins, which the Father raised up. They therefore that ginsay the gift of God die in their disputings.' The thought of the Eucharist as counteracting death comes out still more plainly in Ephes. 20: 'Breaking one bread, which is the medicine of immortality, a preventive remedy that we should not die, but live in Jesus Christ for ever.' In Rom. 7 we read: 'I desire the bread of God (cp Ephes. 5), which is the flesh of Jesus Christ . . . and as drink I desire his blood, which is love incorruptible.' In Trall. 8: 'in faith, which is the flesh of the Lord, and in love, which is the blood of Jesus Christ.' These last two passages are characteristic of the manner in which Ignatius keeps interchanging abstract and concrete ideas.

The parallel with Jn. comes out especially in the terms 'the bread of God' and 'the flesh (not the body) and blood'; but the 'life eternal' of Jn. is here limited to immortality.

III. Early usage.—In the first description of the believers after Pentecost we are told that 'they sted-

14. Earliest practice. . . . fastly continued in the teaching of the apostles and the fellowship, the breaking of bread, and the prayers' (Acts 2 42).

Here 'the breaking of bread' is a part of the expression of 'the fellowship' which characterised the new society. Immediately afterwards (v. 46) we read: 'day by day, continuing steadfastly with one accord in the temple, and breaking bread house by house (or 'at home,' κατ' οίκον).' The numbers were already so large as to make a single united Eucharistic supper out of the question. It is probable that in these earliest days every meal at which Christians met would be hallowed by Eucharistic acts; and we can scarcely doubt that such would be the case with the daily common meal by which the Church supplied the needs of her poorer members (Acts 6 1; on this subject see COMMUNITY OF GOODS, § 5). It may be right to distinguish, however, between the Eucharistic acts which lent a sacredness to such common meals, and the formal Eucharists for which the Church assembled at stated times.

Of the more formal Eucharists we have an example in Acts 20 7 at Troas, where the Christians 'came together on the first day of the week to break bread.' Their Eucharist was preceded by a long discourse from Paul and followed by yet more speaking 'until the dawn' (v. 11), as the apostle was bidding farewell to the church. In 1 Cor. 11 17 ff. we have again the Eucharist proper—'when ye come together ἐν ἐκκλησίᾳ,' i.e., solemnly assembled as the Church. The fault of the Corinthian Eucharist was, as we have seen (§ 8), that each made it 'his own supper' (τὸ ἴδιον δείπνον) rather than 'the Lord's Supper' (κυριακὸν δείπνον), by greedily scrambling for more than his share. Paul does not suggest any change in the method by which the Eucharist is attached to a public meal; he only calls for orderliness. Yet the possibility of such abuses must have led the way to change, even if other elements had not soon begun to work in this direction (see below, § 17).

The Corinthian Eucharist had parallels on its social side in the Greek world. Guilds and burial clubs had

15. Greek parallels. . . . their stated suppers; and the wealthier townsmen found many occasions of inviting their poorer neighbours to a feast, as, for example, at the time of a funeral and on fixed days after the death. From such public entertainments Christians were debarred by reason of their connection with idolatrous worship; but it is likely that the Christians themselves in a Greek city would have similar suppers on somewhat similar occasions; and the wealthier members of the Church would thus entertain the poorer from time to time. Such suppers, though not Eucharists in the strict sense, would be accompanied by eucharistic acts.

Hence would appear to have originated the Agapæ, or charity suppers, which are not always distinguishable

16. Agapæ. . . . from Eucharists. They are referred to in Jude 12 (cp 2 Pet. 2 13); and some light is thrown upon the reference by the custom, mentioned in the Didachè (chap. 11), of allowing the prophets 'to order a table' (ὀρίσειν τράπεζαν)—a custom sometimes misused for selfish ends.

In Ignatius, Smyrn. 8, it is forbidden 'to baptize or to hold an agapæ (ἀγάπην ποιῆν) apart from the bishop.' It does not follow from this passage that agapæ and Eucharist were with Ignatius convertible terms; if the agapæ required the presence or sanction of the bishop, a fortiori this was true of the Eucharist.

It is commonly said that the separation of the Eucharist from the agapè, or (if they were already separated) the discontinuance of the latter, was made, in Bithynia at any rate, in consequence of an edict of Trajan forbidding clubs; but Pliny's letter to Trajan (Ep. 96) does not bear this out.

The renegades who described to him what their practice as Christians had been, had not merely desisted from attendance at the Christian common meal; they had abandoned the faith altogether. The faithful, on the other hand, had desisted from nothing, as far as we know; there is no proof that they had abandoned the later meeting and retained the earlier. Accordingly this correspondence throws no light on the relation between the Eucharist and the agapè.

The causes which tended to separate the Eucharist from a common meal were mainly four.

(a) The increase of numbers made the common supper more and more difficult in itself, and less and less suitable for the solemn celebration of the united Eucharist.

(b) Disorders, such as those at Corinth, were always liable to recur where a large number of persons partook freely of food and drink. The ordinances made at a later time (see the Canons of Hippolytus; ed. Achelis, pp. 105-111) for the quiet conduct of the agapè show that there were dangers of this sort to be guarded against.

(c) The liturgical accompaniments of the Eucharist underwent a great expansion. Even in the time of Clement of Rome (circa 96 A.D.) we find an elaborated intercession and a long form of thanksgiving in use.

(d) As the symbol of the Church's unity the Eucharist became restricted to occasions when the bishop or his deputy was present to celebrate it. In this, and in every way, it increased in formal solemnity, and became less compatible with a common meal.

These causes were doubtless at work with varying extents in different localities; in one place the issue would be reached more quickly than in another.

It is noteworthy that Clement's epistle makes no mention at all of the supper; and the next notice that we have of a Roman Eucharist clearly leaves no place for it. This is Justin Martyr's full description (Apol. 165-67), which shows a ritual already developed and containing all the main elements of the later use.

If we seek the grounds of the liturgical development of the Eucharist, we must begin from the mention of 'the covenant,' which, as we have

18. Liturgical development. seen, is found in both the Synoptic and the Pauline narratives of the institution. Here we have at once a link with the sacrificial ideas of Judaism. Although it is to the 'covenant' of Ex. 24, not to the Passover, that reference in the first instance is made, the Passover associations also probably attached themselves to the Eucharist at a very early date. Moreover, before the first century had closed, a Roman writer could speak of the Christian ministers as 'offering the gifts' (Clem. Ep. 44), and the passage of Malachi about the 'pure sacrifice' was soon interpreted of the Eucharist (Did. 14; Just. Dial. 28, 41; Iren., Tert., Clem. Alex.). Paul had received as a tradition coming ultimately from Christ himself the command, 'Do this in remembrance of me,' and had declared that in the Eucharist Christians 'showed forth the death of the Lord.'

Thus the conception of a solemn remembrance of Christ's death held a foremost place in the earliest times, and the interpretation of that death as sacrificial gave a second sacrificial aspect to the Eucharist. The word 'remembrance' (ἀνάμνησις) was afterwards interpreted in a ritual sense of 'memorial' in view of certain passages in which it was so used in the LXX.

It was a natural consequence that, when the Jewish ritual system was annulled at the destruction of the temple, a Christian ritual was developed with the Eucharist as its centre.

The agapæ, on the other hand, lost more and more their semi-eucharistic character. They became in some places occasions of unseemly riot or mere excuses for wealthy banqueting; and Clement of Alexandria, at the close of the second century, is already indignant that so lofty a name should be given to them, and complains that 'Charity has fallen from heaven into the soups' (Pæd. ii. 15).

Thus the original institution underwent a twofold development, according as the liturgical or the social character of it came to predominate. In the one case, the supper itself disappeared, or was but symbolically represented by the consumption of small portions of bread and wine; the spiritual significance was emphasised, and the Eucharist became the centre of the Church's worship. In the other case, the supper was everything, and the eucharistic acts which accompanied it were little more than graces before and after meat; the spiritual significance had passed elsewhere, and, though under favourable conditions the agapè still had its value and lingered long, it had no principle of vitality left, and its place was filled in time by more appropriate methods of charitable assistance.

EUERGETES (εὐεργετης, 'benefactor'; cp Lk. 22:25). In the Prologue to Ecclesiasticus reference is made by this title (originally conferred by states on special benefactors) to one of the Egyptian Ptolemies (see EGYPT, § 73). Of the two Ptolemies who bore it—viz., Ptolemy III. (247-222 B.C.), more commonly known as Euergetes, and Ptolemy VII.—it is the latter who is meant (ECCLESIASTICUS, § 8). Ptolemy VII., Euergetes II., more commonly called Physcon (φύσκων), began to reign jointly with his elder brother (Ptolemy VI., Philometor) in 170 B.C., became sole king in 146 B.C., and died in 117 B.C. In spite of the attempt of Willrich (Juden u. Griechen) to prove that Physcon was a friend of the Jews, it appears that this king's attitude towards them was consistently inimical, not on any religious grounds, but from political motives, because of the support they had given to Cleopatra. To his reign belongs probably the main part of the Sibylline Oracles; see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, § 94. For the well-known story of the elephants (Jos. c. Ap. 25), which the author of 3 Macc. places in the reign of Ptolemy IV., Philopator, see MACCABEES, THIRD, § 5.

EUMENES (εὐμένης [ANV] 'well-disposed'). Eumenes II., son of Attalus I., and king of Pergamos (197-158 B.C.), allied with the Romans during their war with ANTIOCHUS (q. v., 1), in recognition of which they added to his territory all that was taken from the Syrians. The statement in 1 Macc. 8:8 that Eumenes received 'India, Media, Lydia, and the goodliest of their (the Seleucidæan) countries' is clearly inaccurate.¹ Apart from the improbability of the mention of Lydia by the side of India and Media, neither India nor Media ever belonged to the Seleucidæ or to the Romans. Both Livy (37:55) and Strabo (xiii. 42 [624]) agree that the territory added to Eumenes extended only to the Taurus, and the latter especially notes that previous to this accession there had not been under the power of Pergamos 'many places which reached to the sea at the Elaïtic and the Adramytenæ Gulfs' (πολλὰ χωρία μέχρι τῆς θαλάττης τῆς κατὰ τὸν Ἐλαίτην κόλπον καὶ τὸν Ἀδραμυττηνόν). Hence it is probable that 'Media' is an error for 'Mysia' (Michaelis), and 'India' for 'Ionia' (Grotius²). For the life of Eumenes see Smith's Dict. Class. Biog.

EUNATAN, a misprint in AV for ENNATAN of RV (ΕΝΝΑΤΑΝ[B-A]) 1 Esd. 8:44 = Ezra 8:16, ELNATHAN, 2.

² This is more probable than the suggested identification with the Paphlagonian Eneiti (cp also Hom. Il. 2:352). By the writer of 1 Macc. 8:8 'India' may have been possibly conceived in as limited a sense as 'Asia' in v. 6.

EUNICE (ΕΥΝΙΚΗ [Ti. WH]), the mother of Timothy (2 Tim. 1.5), 'a Jewess who believed' (Acts 16.1). See TIMOTHY.

EUNUCH (ΕΥΝΟΥΧΟΣ, ΕΥΝΟΥΧΙΣ [Gen. 37.36, Is. 39.7], ΕΥΝΟΥΧΟΣ [usually]; in NT ΕΥΝΟΥΧΟΣ in Mt. 19.12, Acts 8.27 ff.; also the verb ΕΥΝΟΥΧΙΖΩ, Mt 19.12). That eunuchs were much employed in Oriental courts, is well known; Babylonian and Persian history is full of examples of their political influence (cp Herod. viii. 105). We have no positive evidence, however, that the kings of Israel and Judah employed eunuchs. The reference in the law in Dt. 23.1 [2] is to those who, for a religious purpose, had voluntarily undergone mutilation (WRS ap. Dr. Deut. ad loc.). Still it is a mistake to suppose that the Hebrew word saris was used both of eunuchs and of persons not emasculated. It has been overlooked that ancient Hebrew possessed two distinct words סַרִּיס—one meaning 'eunuch,' the other (more frequent in OT) meaning 'captain' or 'high officer.' For the former the usual etymology suffices (see Ges.-Buhl); the latter is the Ass. ša-ris (see RAB-SARIS). Another form of the second סַרִּיס seems to be שַׂרִּיפִּי, šārīpī, the still current explanation of which (see CHARIOT, § 10, sup. 730) is open to objection (see Di. on Ex. 14.7).

By a piece of remarkable good fortune we have in 2 K. 9.32 positive proof that the equation סַרִּיס = שַׂרִּיפִּי is correct. The closing words of this verse are, properly, הַשָּׂרִיפִּי שֵׁנִי (Θεὸς δύο εὐνοῦχοι αὐτῆς; Θεὸς δύο εὐνοῦχοι).—i.e., 'two of her captains.' To הַשָּׂרִיפִּי there was a marginal gloss סַרִּיסִי which in course of time intruded into the text, the consequence of which was that שַׂרִּיפִּי became corrupted into שַׂרִּיפִּי, and so the text came to be rendered (as in EV) 'two or three eunuchs' (nearly so Klo.).

In Jer. 29.2 'eunuchs' (EV) should rather be 'officers' (i.e. 'court officers'). So EV, probably correctly, in Gen. 37.36 39.17 1 S. 8.15 1 K. 22.9 2 K. 8.6 24.12 25.25 19.1 Ch. 28.1 2 Ch. 18.8 [mg. 'eunuch']. In one passage [2 K. 25.19] such an 'officer' holds a high military post. (See GOVERNMENT, § 21.) In two other passages (Gen. 37.36, 39.1) he is married. In 2 K. 18.17 EV leaves RAB-SARIS [g.v.] untranslated.

The Herods, however, no doubt had eunuchs in their courts (Jos. Ant. xv. 7.4; xvi. 8.1), and this suggested Jesus' reference in Mt. 19.12.² He gives the expression 'eunuch' a symbolical turn, and says that those who have entirely devoted themselves to the interests of the kingdom of heaven cannot satisfy the claims of married life. Perhaps, as Keim thinks, he refers to himself and to John the Baptist. See Clem. Alex. Ped. iii. 4; Strom. iii. 1. T. K. C.

EUODIA (ΕΥΘΥΔΙΑ [Ti. WH]) and SYNTYCHE (ΣΥΝΤΥΧΗ [Ti. WH]), two women in the Philippian church specially saluted by Paul (Phil. 4.2). In the early days of Christianity at Philippi these women had struggled, likeathletes, side by side with Paul (συνήθλησαν μοι), and on this ground he appeals to a certain Synzygus (EV 'yoke-fellow'—i.e., fellow-labourer) to help them, but in what way is not stated. From the exhortation 'to be of the same mind in the Lord' it has been conjectured (Schwegler, Nachapost. Zeitalter, 229f. 134f.) that the women may have represented two parties inclining to the Jewish and to the Gentile type of Christianity respectively, whilst the 'yoke-fellow' is supposed to be the apostle Peter. The name Euodia, however, at any rate, is justified by Euodios, the name of the first bishop of Antioch (cp Eus. HE, 3.22; Ap. Const. 7.46). AV Euodias erroneously derives euodlan (in the acc.) from the masc. euodias. See Zahn, Einleit. 1.396f. and cp PHILIPPIANS.

EUPHRATES (ΕΥΦΡΑΤΗΣ [BADEFL], Ass. Purattu. For derivations see Del. Par. 169f.) This, by far the greatest river of Western Asia, rises in the Armenian mountains. It has there two chief sources, one at Domli, NE. of Erzeroum, the other close to Mt. Ararat. Both branches trend W. or SW. till they unite at Kebben Maden, where they form a river 120 yards wide. Thence a south course takes the river towards the Mediterranean till the Amanus range and Lebanon bar the way and the stream follows a SE. course to the Persian Gulf. It is this portion, from Hit to the Gulf, about 1000 miles through a low, flat, alluvial plain, that is the historical river.

Its whole course is about 1780 miles, for 1200 miles navigable for small vessels. Below its junction with the Hābūr, still 700 miles from its mouth, it attains a width of 400 yards, but gradually decreases to about 120 at its mouth. Its depth is only 18 feet by the Hābūr and still less at its mouth. It was always depleted by canals, now it loses itself in marshes.

In May the melting of the snows in Armenia causes the yearly inundation. In the time of Nebuchadrezzar, and to a less extent before, this flood was skilfully applied to purposes of irrigation. The amount of traffic was always considerable, the river forming a main artery of commerce from the Gulf to the Mediterranean (Herod. 1.185). The boats were of wicker, coated with bitumen. Trade was brisk between all the cities on the route, and the ships took names from their ports (see a list of them in 2 R. 46, No. 1, cols. v. and vi., and duplicates in Bezold's Catalogue of Kouyunjik Collection B.M. sub. K. 4338a). Ships from Mair, Ašūr, Ur, Dilmun (an island down the Gulf), Makan, Meluhha, etc. are named.

The Euphrates is first named (Gen. 2.14) as one of the four rivers of Eden (see PARADISE). The promise of dominion from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates (Gen. 15.18) defines the ideal boundaries of the Israelite power (2 S. 8.3 1 Ch. 18.3 1 K. 4.21 [5.1]). According to 1 Ch. 5.9 the tribe of Reuben actually extended itself to the Euphrates before the time of Saul, there meeting the Hagarites whom Tiglath-pileser III. names as in that quarter (AZ ii. 10.10),—a still greater idealisation of history, according to critics.

Whatever passages there may have been across the Euphrates in its upper course, it is clear that the great route by which the armies of Assyria came into Syria and beyond to Palestine and on to Egypt must have been commanded by the strong city CARCHEMISH. Till that fell no permanent hold was possible on the west. The army of Necho there met the forces of Nebuchadrezzar in the time of JOSIAH [1]. The exiled Jews became very familiar with the river, and there are frequent references to it in the political and prophetic books. At the mouth of the river on its left bank lay the country of CHALDEA (g.v.), inhabited by a Semitic race carefully distinguished from Assyrians, Babylonians, Arabs, and Arameans. Their land was known properly as the 'sea-land' (see MERATHAIM). Above it was BABYLONIA; then comes ASSYRIA (g.v.).

In Assyrian times the Euphrates did not join the Tigris, and Sennacherib, when pursuing Merodach Baladan and his followers, made a long sea voyage after sailing out of the mouth of the Tigris before he reached their seat. The growth of the delta at the mouths of the Euphrates and Tigris seems to have early excited remark. Pliny (NH 6.31) states that Charax (mod. Mohammerah) was built by Alexander the Great 10 stadia from the sea; and that in the days of Juba II. it was 50, and in his own time 120 from the coast. Loftus estimated that since the beginning of our era the rate of growth was about a mile in 70 years. The very ancient city of Eridu (mod. Abu Shahrein) was originally a seaport. This process of silting up of course gave rise to extensive salt marshes, called Marratu in the inscriptions (see MERATHAIM).

The tributaries of the Euphrates were (1) the Arzania which joined the E. branch before the river left the mountains; (2) the small stream which ran in from the west below Tul-Barsip (mod. Berejik); (3) the Balih, Βάλιχα, Βάληχα, Belias of the ancients (mod. Belikh), that came direct S. from Harrān into the Euphrates here flowing E.; (4) by far the most important, the Hābūr, mod. K'hābūr (see HARBOR), which has several ramifications on its upper course. (See map in KB ii. and compare map after col. 352 of the present work.)

EUPHRATES (Πῤῥᾶ; ΕΥΦΡΑΤΗΣ [BAQ]). According to Jer. 13:4-7 RV Jeremiah was directed to take his inner garment (Πῤῥᾶ, 'ἔσθρ = Ar. 'isār, 'waist-wrapper,' Lane; see GIRDLE, 1),¹ and hide it 'by Euphrates' (Perāth), in a 'hole of the rock.' There are three difficulties in this view of the narrative. (1) The common prefix 'the river' is wanting; (2) the shores of the Euphrates are not rocky; and (3) it is most improbable that Jeremiah went (and went twice) from Jerusalem to the Euphrates.

The third difficulty is the least; the narrative might be only based on a vision (cp Jer. 1:11-13). The other two difficulties appear insurmountable. Bochart suggested reading Ephrāth for Perāth, Ephrāth being another name for Bethlehem (so Che. Jer. 1:33 [85-'85]; Ball, Jer. 284 [190]). The landscape of Bethlehem suits, and the play on Ephrāth, as if the name proper of Perāth (Euphrates and the Exile) is in the Hebrew manner. There is, however, a better solution.

The right course is with Marti (ZDPV 3:11), Cheyne (Life and Times of Jer. [88] 161), and Birch (PEFQ '80, p. 236) to alter one vowel point, and read Πῤῥᾶ 'to Parah.' The prophet means, however, not the town of that name (see PARAH), but (probably) some point in the wild and rocky Wādy Fāra (3 m. NE. of Anātā or Anathoth), near the abundant spring called the 'Ain Fāra.

EUPOLEMUS (ΕΥΠΟΛΕΜΟΣ [ANV]), b. John, b. Accos (and of priestly descent, see HAKKOZ, 3), one of the envoys of Judas the Maccabee to Rome (1 Macc. 8:17; cp 2 Macc. 4:11). He is possibly to be identified with the Hellenistic writer of that name (author of the fragment on David and Solomon in Eus. PE 9:30-34) quoted by Alex. Polyhist. See Schür. Hist. § 33, iii. 2.

EUROCLYDON, RV Euraquilo (ΕΥΡΟΚΛΥΔΩΝ [TR 61], ΕΥΡΑΚΛΩΝ [NAB* Treg. Ti. WH]; ΕΥΡΥΚΛΥΔΩΝ [B²]), the name of a typhoon or hurricane (Acts 27:14). 'The crew and the passengers thought themselves out of their trouble, when all at once one of those hurricanes from the E., which the sailors of the Mediterranean call Euraquilon, fell upon the island [Crete]. The Gregalia of the Levantines is this very word, just as Egripou has been produced from Euripus' (Renan, St. Paul, 551, and n. 1). These words sum up in a nutshell the general conclusion of scholars. Renan adopts the reading εὐρακίλων, and the very plausible view of Conybeare and Howson that the narrator uses a name given to the wind by the sailors (St. Paul, 2:402 n.), supporting this view by the usage of Levantine sailors at the present day (Gregalia is their word).

If we accept this theory we cannot be surprised at the large number of variants (see Tregelles); the form εὐρακίλων was not in common use, and so was easily corrupted into εὐρακιδων, εὐρακιδων, εὐρακιδων, εὐρακιδων, εὐρακιδων, while Vg. substitutes the form which, on the analogy of Euronotus and Euroauster, was to have been expected—viz., Euroaquilo. The earlier Eng. versions (Wyc., Tyn., Cran., Gen.) considerably translate 'North-east'; the Rhemish Version (1582) and the AV (1611) prefer to reproduce the reading of their respective Gk. texts, Euroaquilo and Euroclydon. 'East by north' would be a more exact rendering of εὐρακίλων or Euroaquilo. That this was in fact the wind appears from the account of the effects of the storm.

As to the meaning of TR's reading εὐροκλυδων, scholars have been divided, some rendering 'Eurus fluctus excitans,' others 'fluctus Euro excitatus.' To adopt the second view involves of course the rejection of the reading as unsuitable.

B²'s reading εὐρακιδων, '(a wind) raising a broad surge,' is obviously too vague. We do not want a second merely de-

EUTYCHUS (ΕΥΤΥΧΟΣ [Ti. WH], 'fortunate'), the young man of Troas, whose story is told in Acts 20:5-12.

EVANGELIST. The designation given to Philip, 'one of the seven,' with whom Paul stayed in Caesarea (Acts 21:8).

The Gk. word 'evangelist' (εὐαγγελιστής) is formed from 'evangelize' (εὐαγγελίζεσθαι)—a favourite word in Lk.'s writings (although εὐαγγέλιον occurs only in Acts 15:7, speech of Peter; 20:24, speech of Paul), which he uses five times in connection with the work of Philip and others immediately after the death of Stephen, when the Gospel began to spread beyond the limits of Judaism (Acts 8:4, 12:25, 35:40). From this we see plainly what the function of an evangelist was in the earliest time.

The evangelist was the man who brought the first news of the Gospel message. Timothy was charged by Paul not to neglect this duty: 'Do the work of an evangelist' (2 Tim. 4:5). In Eph. 4:11 evangelists are spoken of after apostles and prophets, but before shepherds and teachers, as among the gifts of the ascended Christ to his Church; but we must not conclude from this that the term evangelist, any more than that of shepherd, was the stereotyped title of an official class. The word denotes function rather than office.

It is noticeable that the word is not found in the Apostolic Fathers, nor in the Didachè; in the latter the function in question appears to be discharged by apostles. In the time of Eusebius the word is still used in its earliest sense, and without reference to a particular office or class (e.g., Eus. HE iii. 37:2, and of Pantænus v. 10:2 f.); but already another use was current, according to which an evangelist was the writer of a 'Gospel' in the sense of a narrative of the life of Christ: e.g., in Hippolytus, Julius Africanus, and Origen.

Apart from a few contract-tablets (see KB 4:200 ff.), no inscriptions of his reign have as yet been brought to light. One of his earliest acts was the liberation of Jehoiachin in the thirty-seventh year of his captivity, 2 K. 25:27 (εὐειλαμαρδαχ [A], εὐιλαμαρδαχ [L]) = Jer. 52:31 (ουλαιμαδαχαρ [B], -ραχ [Q], -λεδαμαχαρ [N]). EXACT, EXACTOR, EXACTION.

(1) 'Exactor' is the usual Vg. rendering of the Heb. part. עָצַר, נָשָׂה (√ עָצַר, cp Ass. naḡāṣū, 'to overpower'). It is found also in Is. 60 17 EV (RVmg. 'taskmaster,' Ⓞ ἐπίσκοπος), Job 39 7. AVmg. (EV 'driver'; φορολόγος), Dan. 11 20 RV (AV 'raiser of taxes'; τίστων [δόξαν βασιλείας, cod. 87] πράσων [δ. βασιλείας BAQ]), Zech. 98 10 4 RVmg. and RV (AV 'oppressor,' ἐξελαιώνω). In Ex. 37, etc., נָשָׂה is rendered 'taskmaster' (ἐργολόγος), in Is. 3 12 9 4 [3] 14 2 4 (πράκτωρ, ἀπαιτών [ἀπειθῶν ἡσ-α], κυριεύσας, ἀπαιτῶν) EV has 'oppressor,' in Job 3 18 AV 'oppressor,' RV 'taskmaster' (φορολόγος, as in 39 7). See TASKWORK, TAXATION.

(2) For נָשָׂה, geriṣṣith, Ezek. 45 9f, EV 'exaction,' EVmg. has, better, 'Heb. expulsions,' i.e., evictions. Ⓞ has καταδυναστείαν.

EXCOMMUNICATION. This Latin word of late origin (it is not found in the Vulgate) is conveniently used

1. Meaning to denote (temporary or permanent) exclusion from the ecclesiastical community as in Gospels. distinguished from civil penalties of an analogous character. It need hardly be said that the later procedure of church excommunication developed out of NT germs, though Roman theologians give expositions of fundamental biblical passages which are not always critically sound. It is equally obvious that the NT germs of later usages stand in close relation to the practice of excommunication among the Jews in the time of Christ. It is to this Jewish practice that reference is made in Lk. 6 22, where from the use of three distinct terms (ἀφορίσσω, ἀνεδίασω, ἐκβάλλωσιν τὸ ὄνομα) some have found a reference to as many different grades of excommunication,¹ but where really (see Weiss) only one is intended, viz., exclusion from religious and social intercourse; see Jn. 9 22 12 42 16 2 (ἀποσυνάγωγος) and cp SYNAGOGUE. In Mt. 18 15-17, too, only one kind of ban is presupposed; its application, however, is to be preceded first by a gentler, then by a graver admonition, which reminds us forcibly of the similar procedure customary among the later Jews (see Arākhin, 16 b; Mishna, Meššoth, 1 10).

It is noteworthy that this passage stands just before the much-discussed passage on BINDING AND LOOSING (v. 18). We can, however, more easily imagine Jesus actually uttering v. 18 than v. 15-17, which seem plainly to represent the later practice of Jewish Christians. 'Let him be to thee as the ἰθυικός (RV the Gentile) and the publican' are the words which describe the punishment of the convicted sinner. Here there is a possibility that the sense of the original saying has been missed. In the Palestinian Aramaic the term used would be אַנְיָן, which may no doubt be rendered 'Gentiles,' but only because Gentiles were misbelievers; the word really means 'heretics' or 'infidels' (cp Levy's and Jastrow's Lexx.; Schürer, TLZ '99, col. 168 ff.).

Passing to the undoubtedly Pauline epistles we find most probably two recorded instances of church discipline. In 1 Cor. 5 3-5 we read that Paul had resolved, as representing Christ's spirit, to give over a certain offender against morality 'to Satan' (alluding apparently to Job 26)² in the presence of the assembled church, he himself being spiritually present among them. Physical death he expects to be the consequence of this act (cp 1 Cor. 11 30); but the object is the good of the offender, 'that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord.' In 2 Cor. 2 6-11, it has been customary to suppose that exclusion from church privileges was all that the offender

2. In Pauline Epp. Christ's spirit, to give over a certain offender against morality 'to Satan' (alluding apparently to Job 26)² in the presence of the assembled church, he himself being spiritually present among them. Physical death he expects to be the consequence of this act (cp 1 Cor. 11 30); but the object is the good of the offender, 'that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord.' In 2 Cor. 2 6-11, it has been customary to suppose that exclusion from church privileges was all that the offender actually suffered, and that this was not permanent. Weizsäcker's exposition of the circumstances,¹ however, makes it extremely probable that an entirely different case is referred to, and that the offence was of a totally different order. The Church had at first sympathised with the offender, who had in some way injured the apostle; but in consequence of a letter from Paul the majority resolved to rebuke the offender. It was no doubt some question of party intrigues against the apostle. There is no reason to think that the expression ἀνάθεμα μαραθα (1 Cor. 16 22) is a formula of excommunication as was supposed by Calvin and other reformers (the words were held to be synonyms, like ἀββᾶ ὁ πατήρ).

The view need not be discussed. It is contradicted by the prayer at the end of chap. 10 of the Didachè:—
 Ἐθέλω χάρις καὶ παραδέτω ὁ κόσμος ὄφθους.
 Ὅσωνα τῷ νιῷ Δαβὶδ.
 Εἰ τις ἅγιος, ἐρχέσθω· εἰ τις οὐκ ἔστι, μετανοεῖτω.
 Μαραθα. Ἄμην.
 Still no doubt the prayer for the Lord's parousia did suggest to the apostle a thought of vengeance. To refuse to love the Lord Jesus made a man 'anathema'; when the Lord came, this sentence would be executed.

The Gk. ἀνάθεμα (anathema) is not to be taken as suggesting excommunication (this would be importing later ideas [see Suicer, Thes., s.v.]; observe that in Gal. 1 8 it is an angel that is spoken of). The same remark applies to Rom. 9 3 1 Cor. 12 3. Ἀνάθεμα is synonymous with κατὰ and ἐπικατάρατος.

In the Pastoral Epistles the rules of exclusion from fellowship have become more precise, and the offences punished by it are no longer merely moral. Again we hear of offenders 'delivered to Satan' (1 Tim. 1 20); but it is that they may be taught not to blaspheme (cp 2 Tim. 3 2 2 Pet. 2 10-18). The rights of a presbyter are defined; an accusation against him is not to be received, unless there be two or three witnesses; but there is to be public reproof of all who sin (1 Tim. 5 19 f.). In Tit. 3 10 a man that is 'heretical' (see HERESY, § 2) is to be avoided (παραιροῦ); so render in 2 Tim. 2 23; cp RV 2 Macc. 2 31, but only after 'a first and second admonition.' That the αἰρέσεις or factions referred to had a theological colouring, is clear from 2 Jn. 10, and that they might even be dangerous appears from 3 Jn. 9 f., where Diotrophes 'who affects pre-eminence' (ὁ φιλοπρωτεύων) is said not to admit the writer to fellowship; fit punishment is threatened for him. T. K. C.

EXECUTIONER. The OT has no special word to denote the person who executes the sentence of capital punishment. The words rendered 'executioner' in EV refer more naturally to (royal) bodyguards.

1. מַשְׂרֵת ḥabāh (from בָּהַב, Ass. ḥabāhu, 'to slaughter'), is in 1 S. 9 23 f. rendered 'cook'; cp COOKING, § 1). In Gen. 37 36 39 1 40 3 f. 41 10 12, the מַשְׂרֵתֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ of the Pharaoh, and in 2 K. 25 8 ff. Jer. 39 9 ff., the מַשְׂרֵתֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ of Nebuchadrezzar is in EV 'captain of the guard.' So also מַשְׂרֵתֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ (Arioch) in Dan. 2 14 (EVmg. 'chief of the executioners,' except in Jer. 'chief marshal'); cp WRS, OT/C 262, n. 1. Ⓞ in these passages has ἀρχιμάγειρος, ἀρχιδιομοφύλαξ, ἀρχιδιοσώτης.
 2. קָרִי, Kāri, 2 K. 11 4 19f, RVmg. See CARITES.
 3. σπεκουλάτωρ (Lat. speculator or spiculator, a pikeman, halberdier), Mk. 6 27 RV 'soldier of the guard.' The word is found also in late Hebrew.

only a section of the Israelites (the Rachel-tribes) sojourned in the land of Egypt, and made its Exodus from it, or (b) that the true land of מִצְרַיִם from which the Israelitish Exodus occurred, was not Egypt (Misraim) at all, but a N. Arabian land called Muṣur or Muṣri (so Wl.; see MIZRAIM, § 2 b), it would still, on account of the generations that have fed their inner life upon it, be a thrilling tale which tells of the hardened heart of the Pharaoh, of the escape of the Hebrew bondmen, of the passage of the Red Sea, of the purifying trials in the wilderness. In this article we shall call the former (a) the conservative, the latter (b) the advanced hypothesis. Cp ISRAEL, § 2 f. The conservative hypothesis is at present that most favoured by biblical critics. There is thought to be an antecedent probability that the Israelites, as well as other Hebrews, found temporary admission into the NE. of the Egyptian territory. They would, of course, come from Canaan. That there were Israelites in that country at an early date we now know from the 'Israel-stele' discovered in 1896 by Flinders Petrie. It may have been in Merneptah's time, or it may have been even earlier, that the catastrophe poetically described by the Egyptian king occurred, when 'the people of Isiraal was laid waste,' so that their 'crops were not,' and so that, various cities of Canaan also having been punished, Haru (Palestine) became 'a widow'—i.e., helpless—'for Egypt.'¹ The names 'Ishpal' and 'Yakbal' (Y'-k-a-p'-a-ra and Y'-k-b'-ā-rā²) in the name-list of Thotmes III. (nos. 78, 102) also appear to some critics to show that before that king's reign tribes having these names (which certainly look like Joseph-el and Jacob-el) had lived in Palestine, and given their own names to localities. It is conceivable that these Israelites, Josephites, or Jacobites, or some portion of them, being nomads, had sought admission into Egypt under pressure of famine, and had sojourned there, and had been treated at length with severity by the Pharaoh, though the statement respecting Pithom and Raamses (Ex. 117b) is not without difficulty. It must be admitted, however, that references to Merneptah's stele and to the names 'Ishpal' and 'Yakbal' can be made only with much reserve. The phrase 'the people of Isiraal' is very difficult (one would like to be able to read 'Joseph-el' or 'Jezreel'), and the meaning of 'Ishpal' and 'Yakbal' is by no means free from doubt (see JOSEPH i. and ii., § 1; and JACOB, § 1).

According to Stade ('Die Entsteh. des Volkes Israel,' Akad. Reden und Abhandlungen, [99], 97-122) it is likely that the Hebrew tribes had sought pasture for their flocks to the S. of the Wady Tūmilāt, and that so a part of them had come under the power of the Egyptian authorities; likely too that the Israelites had cause to complain of a misuse of this power. The Egyptian authorities may, of course, have imposed a corvée upon them. The part of the Hebrew tribes which remained free from Egyptian oppression probably wandered as far as the true Sinai (E. of the Elanitic Gulf), and these Sinaitic nomads formed a confederacy under the protection of the god of Sinai; the liberated Israelites joined them at Kadesh. To the Kadesh tradition (see KADESH i. § 3) Stade attaches great importance.

3. Stade's theory.

In the OLZ (May, June, July, '99), Winckler criticises this view as mere theological rationalism. The charge might equally well be brought against C. Niebuhr, who is no theologian. Experience, however, has again and again proved that popular traditions are sometimes more truthful than critics had supposed. 'Rationalistic' conjecture is not out of place in the polemagona of history, and here it has the advantage of keeping the student in some degree of sympathy with the Israelitish writers and the Jewish readers of the narrative of the Exodus.

Winckler's theory mentioned above in § 1 has an additional claim to consideration from the fact that the

4. Winckler and Beke.

Englishman Dr. C. T. Beke, in his Origines Biblicæ, vol. i., maintained as long ago as 1834 that the Misraim of the Hebrew tradition of the Exodus was not Egypt, but some district lying to the N. of the Sinaitic peninsula. He also held that the Red Sea crossed by the Israelites was the Gulf of 'Akaba, and that Horeb or Sinai lay to the NE. of the head of that Gulf. His work did not escape the notice of Ewald, but failed to exert any deep influence. Winckler's kindred theory, proposed in 1893, was formed in complete independence of Dr. Beke. To accept it, as it stands, is hardly possible; but a modification of it, which will suit the requirements of biblical criticism, lies close at hand.¹ The existing evidence (which cannot here be discussed) leads to the conclusion that the N. Arabian Muṣur coincided with or included the district of Kadesh, and this is just the district which forms the scene of some of the most important patriarchal legends, though later scribes disguised Miṣrim (Muṣur) as Misraim (Egypt), or even fell into deeper error still (see KADESH i. § 1; MIZRAIM, § 2 (b); cp MORIAH). We cannot avoid the impression that there were Israelitish tribes in the N. Arabian Muṣur who were never in the Muṣur of Egypt. What were the relations between the Rachel-tribes in Egypt and the Israelites in Muṣur, and any other kindred associations that there may have been elsewhere, we are at present unable to say definitely. We do, however, seem to see that an Egypt-tradition and a Muṣri-tradition have been fused together.

T. K. C.

We now turn to consider certain suggestive points in JE's account of the Exodus. There is a remarkable

5. JE's account.

parallelism between JE's narrative of the journey from the Red Sea to Sinai (Ex. 1522-1827), and the continuation of the march from Sinai to Kadesh (Nu. 1029-20). The visit of JETHRO (q. v.) and the appointment of the judges to lighten the labours of Moses were probably once placed later (by E) in connection with the legislation at Horeb. The defeat of Amalek in Ex. 17 has geographical difficulties, and the account seems to be based upon Nu. 1440 ff., where it is obviously more original (see Bacon, Trip. Trad. 93). Similarly the gift of Manna (Ex. 16) and the striking of the rock at the waters of Meribah (ib. 17) are probably connected, in the one case, with Massah (between Taberah and Kibroth-hattaavah), and, in the other, with Kadesh (see MANNA, § 3; MASSAH AND MERIBAH). In every instance the episodes bear the appearance of having been inserted from later stages of the journey where they more naturally belong. Ex. 1522-27 is the only old fragment remaining, and here the covenant, after a journey of three days, reminds us of the 'three days' journey' in the request to Pharaoh (Ex. 318 53), and finds a parallel in the three days' journey in Nu. 1033.² The oldest account of the journey from the Red Sea to Sinai is thus reduced to a minimum.

Passing over the Decalogue and Covenant at Sinai we resume JE at chaps. 24, 32-34. Now the episode of the golden calf 'cannot well be older than the reign of Hezekiah, and points indeed to a date later than 722' (Addis); it may with considerable probability be ascribed to E₂ (cp EXODUS ii., § 3 [viii.]). There was therefore no need in the old narrative for any renewal of the covenant, or for the intercession of Moses in 33 f.

That chap. 33 f. is composite is generally admitted, and it remains to consider the fragments that are left after the omission of those passages which are necessarily of an editorial nature. It is highly probable that we have here the traces of an old theophany and law-giving of greater antiquity than the theophany and law-giving at Sinai-Horeb (3 ff. 20 ff.), the scene of which was not Sinai, but Kadesh (see KADESH i. § 2). Fortunately this old tradition is not quite a torso. Although we can find no narrative of which it may be the continuation (see above, § 5 end), it seems possible to trace it further step by step to Hormah and Beer (i.e., Beer-sheba, or Beer-lahai-roi?), and finally (in Judg. 16) to the 'city of palm-trees' (cp the S. Judæan name Tamar); see KADESH i. § 3. Details of this journey are missing,¹ with the exception, perhaps, of the oldest features in Nu. 16, where the revolt against the authority of Moses (v. 13) presupposes a very early stage in the journey of the Israelites. It at once suggests itself that this tradition is of Calebite origin (cp EXODUS [BOOK], § 3 [v.]), and this is borne out by (a) the prominence ascribed to Caleb in the oldest passages of Nu. 13 f., and (b) the close relationship which, as the genealogies reveal, subsisted between Judah, Caleb, the Kenites, etc.—one tradition (a late one, it is true) actually connects Moses' family with Caleb (see MIRIAM, 2). We seem to have, therefore, distinct traces of a Calebite wandering from Kadesh northwards into Judah, the commencement, perhaps, of that northerly migration which took place in the time of David, and was continued, still later, in exilic times (see CALEB, § 3 f.).² The evidence, however (see KADESH i. § 1), leads to the conclusion that the limits of Mušri and the district of Kadesh coincided.³ The Calebite tradition, therefore, knew of an 'Exodus' from the land of Mušri. S. A. C.

Reference has often been made by writers to Mantho's narrative of the expulsion of the lepers under a priest of 7. Mantho. Heliopolis called Osarsiph (cp. Jos. c. Ap. 126 f.). The critical value of this narrative, however, is very slight. The reserve expressed by Kittel (Hist. 126 f.) is judicious; the present writer prefers to leave Mantho's story entirely on one side.

Not only is it manifestly influenced by the Jewish narrative, but it seems to imply an absurd confusion between Moses and the reforming Egyptian king commonly known as Khuen-aten⁴ (Amenhotep IV.). As Meyer has pointed out, the name Me(r)neptah can never have become Ἀμενωφίς (the name mentioned in Josephus), and since the king called Amenophis by Mantho (Jos.) does really correspond superficially, in a religious respect, to Amenhotep IV., it seems arbitrary to prefer the [A]μενωφίς of Julius Africanus and Syncellus.⁵

It was not unnatural for Naville⁶ to hope that the view which places the Exodus under Me(r)neptah had been made approximately certain by his excavations. He has in fact shown that Rameses II., Šešonk I., and Osorkon II. have all left their names at Tell el-Mashūta, the true site of Pithom. The language of Me(r)neptah's inscription referred to above cannot, however, without a rather violent hypothesis, be reconciled with Naville's view. Lieblein is of opinion⁷ that the biblical narrative of the Exodus and the events connected with it was redacted in the time of Rameses II. when Egyptian influences predominated in Syria, and that the Exodus really took place under Amenhotep III. This indeed cannot be granted; but it is at any rate possible that the Hebrew tradition of the Exodus underwent a profound modification at that period, and even that in its original form the Mišrim referred to meant, not Egypt (מִצְרַיִם), but the N. Arabian land of Mušr or Mušri. All that the Egyptian monuments discovered and studied by Naville prove is that the biblical narrative in its present form comes from a writer who had good archæological information. In the second part of this article an independent attempt will be made to trace the route assigned to the B'nē Israel on their departure from Egypt to keep a festival to Yahwē in the wilderness (Ex. 7 16 8 1 [7 26] 10 9; cp 12 35).

The literature is immense. Besides the Histories of Israel by Stade, Klostermann, Kittel, C. Niebuhr, and Wellhausen, see especially Ebers, Durch Gosen zum Sinai ('Der 9. Historical Aufbruch' and 'Der Auszug der Hebräer'); Maspero, Struggle of the Nations, 444 (he retains his opinion that the years following the reign of Seti I. offered favourable conditions for the Israelites to break away from their servitude, if the 'Israel' of Me(r)neptah's description represents a tribe left behind in Canaan, after the majority of the Israelites had emigrated to Egypt; otherwise the Israel of Me(r)neptah will be the 'bondmen' who had escaped from Egypt in Me(r)neptah's reign); Petrie, 'Egypt and Israel,' *Contemp. Thanks to the progress of Egyptology, we now know something of the topography of GOSHEN (q.v.), although it is not yet easy to harmonise our 10. Supposed knowledge with the biblical data. starting-point. The route, however, to the S., near the sea, remains hopelessly obscure. The OT narratives, unfortunately, presuppose that all geographical names are familiar to the reader. True, the eastern regions of N. Egypt must always have been well known to natives of Palestine; the geographical statements of the narratives must therefore be expected to be trustworthy. However, as the narratives now stand—a mosaic of passages from various sources—they give evidence of the confusion which inevitably arose in the process of weaving the passages together.

The Israelites began their march at (the city of) Ram[e]ses (Ex. 12 37), which seems to mean the capital of Goshen where there was then a royal residence. Of the site of this RAMESSES (q.v.) we know nothing. The ruins of the modern Tell Abū Islēmān at the western entrance to the valley of Tūmilāt would be the most suitable starting-point, since this has to be sought in the W. of Goshen. Succoth is mentioned as the first halting place (Ex. 12 37 13 20 Nu. 33 5 f.); it seems to be the Egyptian Tuku. Whether Tuku signifies a city near P-atum, or a region near it, or the city P-atum itself, is a difficult question. If we could take Succoth as the name of the tract of land round Pithom which the Israelites would enter on the second day, or as that of a place in the neighbourhood of that Egyptian colony, the reference to it would cause no difficulty; but the inscriptions on the sacred geography of Egypt dating from Ptolemaic times seem to identify Tuku and P-atum altogether. Now, Tuku certainly was situated where Naville excavated at Tell el-Mashūta. If this be so, we must suspect a misunderstanding of the original source or sources, which would seem to have given Succoth and Pithom-Etham as names of the same place—we say Pithom-Etham because PITHOM (q.v.) is probably identical with the station called ETHAM (q.v.), which was 'at the edge of the wilderness' (Ex. 13:20)—i. e., at the E. end of Goshen. The distance from the entrance of Goshen to TUKU or P-atum would be 26 m. (following the present line of railway). An average march of 13 m. a day would be all that could be assumed of a host hampered with much cattle. All highways run directly E. along the canal of Goshen.

Afterwards, God 'led the people about' (13:18) and 'they turned (back)' to encamp 'before Pihahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-Zephon' (14:2). Here the difficulties increase. The sites of Migdol (certainly not the large fortress so called in the N.E. of the Delta) and BAAL-ZEPHON (q. v., 2) are quite unknown. As to Pihahiroth, we may venture to guess that, being near the 'Sea,' it may correspond to the Serapiu of the Itinerarium Antonini,—apparently the only city in that region (apart from the later Arsinoë and Clysmā). All identifications, however, depend upon the locality of the passage through the 'sea.' A southerly direction is implied by the 'turning'; but how far S. the locality is to be sought we have no means of determining, since it is not stated that the encampment 'by the sea' marked a day's journey.

1. Shall we, with most commentators, place the passage near the present Suez

12. Sea-passage at Suez? (better Suweis [es Suweis]), where the gulf is only two-thirds of a mile wide?¹ Those who do so usually lay great stress on the fact that the straits are shallow, and are passable (it is said) at a very low tide, especially when there is also a N. wind. Certainly this would permit a 'rational' explanation of the passage. It is doubtful, however, whether such arguments can be used.² Josephus gives us no help. In his time all conception of the situation of Goshen had been lost.

Hence to explain how the Israelites could 'reach the Red Sea in three days,' he made them march through Letopolis-Babylon (Aut. ii. 15 x)—i. e., round the S. side of the Jebel Mokattam, the mountain on which the citadel of Cairo is built, on the most direct road to Suez through the Wādī et-Tih and through the Muntūla pass. Nothing could be more at variance with the biblical data, especially as the 'turning back' to the 'edge of the wilderness,' and other details, are overlooked. Yet several scholars (Lengerke, Kutschreit, von Raumer, Shaw) have followed Josephus.

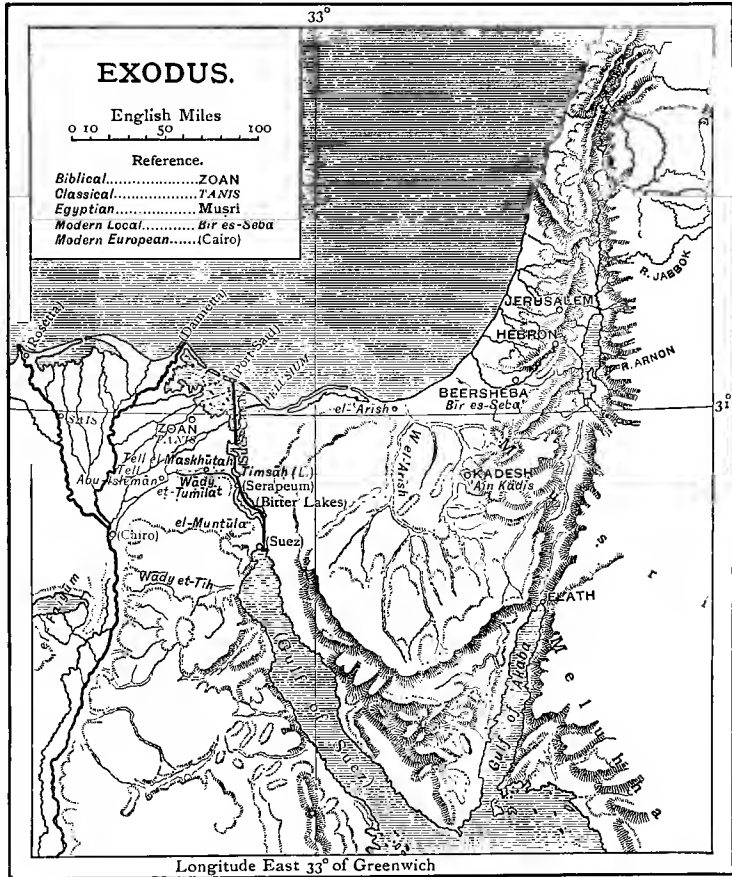

2. Another view has been strongly urged by Schleiden (Die Landenge von Suēs, '58) and Brugsch (L'Exode et les monum. Égypt., '75). Both make

13. Or the Serbonis? Mediterranean. Brugsch places Goshen too far N. and leads the Israelites from Tanis-Zoan (i. e., Rameses, he believes, for which equation he appeals to Ps. 78:12 43) to Daphnæ (= Etham = Hetam, according to him). Pihahiroth he explains (translating as the Peshitta¹ and perhaps also the Targum did) as the 'mouth of the depths' (βάραθρα)—i. e., of the Sirbonian bog. Migdol he identifies with the Migdol mentioned in Jer. and Ezek., which was 12 R. m. S. from Pelusium according to the itineraries, and Baal-zephon with the temple of Zeus Kasios on the Casius promontory, so that the Israelites would have passed through the bog to the dunes N. of the Sirbonis. (So, before Brugsch, Schleiden, who, however, placed Succoth and Etham correctly.) This theory is wholly destitute of any solid basis; the expression הַיָּם הַרְבִּי, 'Reedy Sea,' occurs too often for the RED SEA (q. v.) to admit a new application to the Sirbonis.² The modern discoveries which have determined the position of Goshen, decide against it.

3. Recently, another view has begun to make way—the view, namely, that the passage through the sea is to be sought for nearer to the eastern end of Goshen.

14. Or midway? Du Bois Aymé, Stickel, and Knobel, in a rationalising interest, thought of a point between the Bitter Lakes and the Gulf of Suez. They assumed that this sandy tract dried up quite recently, and that, in the time of Moses, it must have been very shallow, in parts even marshy. Dillmann and others admit a similar shallow connection between the Crocodile (Timsāh) Lake and the Bitter Lakes. Naville (followed by Strack) assumed the Timsāh lake itself.

¹ Later he tried to find in the name an Egyptian word ḥraut, 'depths'; but there is no such word.

² The expression 'desert of Shur,' Ex. 15:22 (E), is very vague and cannot be used as an argument either for the N. direction of the march or for the identification of ETHAM with the frontier fortress Shur in the extreme NE.

All these modifications of the same theory are built upon the view that the ancient condition of the isthmus of Suez was very different from the present.

15. Early physical geography.

There is no doubt among geologists that the Red Sea once extended not only to the Crocodile Lake but even to the Balāh Lake, so that the Red Sea and the Mediterranean were completely connected (see map, cols. 1437 f.). There is no evidence, however, that this state of matters continued down to historic times. The Egyptian inscriptions dating from the time of the Pyramids speak of the 'Great Black Water' (kem-uēr¹) in connection with the fortifications at the E. end of Goshen,²—i.e., it seems to have reached as far as the present Crocodile Lake. In dyn. XII. this 'Great Black Water' is spoken of as an undrinkable (i.e., salt) 'lake' (šēz), so that there cannot have been a connected gulf. Under Ptolemy II. Philadelphus, the inscription of Pithom (ed. Naville) speaks of the 'Great Black Lake' and the 'Scorpion Lake' near Pithom as connected with and as connected with the Red Sea by the canal of Ptolemy II., which, evidently, was a mere restoration of the canal of Necho (EGYPT, § 68) and Darius. The extant traces of this latter canal and the monuments of Darius along it (see GOSHEN, map) seem to show that about 500 B.C. the extent of the various lakes was not very different from what it is now (so Lepsius), and that the Timsāh Lake was separated (under the name 'Scorpion Lake' according to the Pithom stele, etc.) from the larger salt lake in the S. The passage of Strabo (804) proves the existence of several 'bitter lakes,'—i.e., confirms the view that there was no connection with the Red Sea.³ Consequently, other passages stating that it was at Heroönpolis that the Arabian Gulf began (Strabo, 836, ἐν μυχῷ τοῦ Ἀραβικοῦ κόλπου) seem to be based upon the artificial connections through which this harbour became accessible (cp Strabo, 769).⁴

The possibility, indeed, that at an earlier period, such as the time of Rameses II., the lakes covered a larger area, or that they were even all connected with one another, is not to be denied. As we have already seen, however, the one 'Great Black Water' mentioned circa 3000 B.C., had long ceased to be a part of the Arabian Gulf. Naville then supposes the camp of the Israelites to have been at Pe-kerhet (?),⁵ or the place called in the Itineraries Serapiu, which he seeks at the modern Gebel Maryam near the S. end of the Timsāh Lake opposite Šeih-Hanā'idik (Naville's Baal-Zephon). He places Migdol at the ruins, W. of the railway station, mis-

³ Linant and Naville (26) claimed that these must have been mere ponds, different from the present lakes which were too large to be made 'sweet' by the canal. Strabo's vague statement, however, is not to be pressed too literally. He speaks of several 'lakes'; at present also there are two different basins. Pliny (6 165) calls them amaros fontes(1) but describes them as navigable.

called 'Serapeum' by French engineers. All this is problematical; but undoubtedly it would hardly be natural for the biblical narrative to pass over in complete silence the lake shutting off Goshen from the E. and interrupting the march of the Israelites. This theory of Naville would allow the 'turning aside' of the march, though on a very limited scale. It would be more rationalising than any other theory, inasmuch as the Crocodile Lake, which is 5 to 6 miles wide in the N. near the modern Bir Nefishe, is in the S., on the spot fixed upon by Naville, not more (in parts) than ¼ of a mile wide. It was only a marsh before the Suez Canal changed its character, and it must always have been marshy, because the Nile reached it only irregularly. Whilst the salt-water of the other lakes does not allow the growth of reeds, the brackish water of this is covered with them, so that the name 'sea of reeds' would be quite appropriate.¹

After all, the probabilities seem most in favour of the Lake Timsāh, although it would certainly rob the place of passage of all sea character. It is most reasonable to look for all the localities of

16. Lake Timsāh. the Exodus on or near Egyptian ground, and in the same narrow district in or near the valley of Tūmilāt; but as long as the last three geographical names of the biblical narrative cannot be determined with certainty, this remains hypothetical.

The second book of the Pentateuch, which narrates the deliverance of Israel from Egypt, appropriately bears in the Greek Bible the title Exodus

1. Name and Contents. (ἐξοδος)² or more fully 'Exodos from Egypt' (ἐξοδος αἰγυπτου; see Ex. 19 1 ^{BAFL});³ This passed over into the old Latin, and through the Vulgate into our own version. In Hebrew the book is commonly designated by its opening words, וַיִּצְרַח מִצְרַיִם,⁴ or more briefly פְּתַח; sometimes it is cited simply by number, שֵׁשׁ עֶשְׂרֵים (Sōdā, 36 b.).

The Book of Genesis closes with the death of Joseph at an advanced age; Exodus continues the history from the same point (Ex. 16 7 ff.). The grandsons of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 50 23) are contemporaries of Moses, the great grandson (Ex. 6 16 ff.), or grandson (Ex. 21 Nu. 26 59), of Levi. But though no great interval of time is supposed to elapse between the death of Joseph and the beginning of the oppression,⁵ the character of the history undergoes a complete change. The twelve sons of Jacob with their children who went down into Egypt ('seventy souls') have so increased in numbers as to be a cause of alarm to the Egyptians; the narrative, which throughout Genesis preserves the form of a family chronicle,⁶ now at once becomes the history of a people.

The contents of Exodus may be briefly summarised as follows:—The oppression, the youth and call of Moses, 1-7; the Egyptian plagues, 7:8-12; the escape of Israel from Egypt, 13:15-21; the way through the desert to Sinai, 15:22-18; the covenant, with its fundamental laws, 19:24; directions for the construction of the tabernacle and the consecration of the priests, 25:81; the sin of the golden calf, renewal of the broken tables of the Law, 32:34; the making of the tabernacle and its furniture, 35-40. The book ends with the entrance of the glory of Yahwè, the visible manifestation of his presence, into the dwelling place which had been prepared for him (40:34-38).

The sources and the method of combination remain 2. Sources: P. substantially the same as in Genesis (q.v., § 2*f.*). Here also the Priestly stratum is easily recognised and separated.

To it belong:¹ Ex. 1 1-5 7* 13 14* 223aβ-25 6 2-12 (13-30) 7 1-13 19 20aa 21b 22 8 5-7 15a*^b 16-19 (8 1-3 11a*^b 12-15) 9 8-12 (11 9*f.* Rp), 12 1-20 28 37* 40*f.* 43-51 13 1 2 20 14 1 2 4* 8 9* 15* 16-18 21aa 6 22*f.* 26 27* 28* 29 16 1-3 6*f.* (8) 9-13a 16-24 (in the main), 31-36 17 1a 19 1 2a 24 15* 16-18aa 25 1-81 18a 34 29-35 35-40.

The characteristics of P appear throughout (see GENESIS, § 2*f.*).

The narrative begins, by way of recapitulation,² with a list of the sons of Israel who went down into Egypt (1 1-5); in 6 14-25 a long genealogy is introduced to exhibit the lineage of Moses and Aaron (cp 26*f.*).³ A very brief account of the oppression (1 7 13 14 223aβ-25) is followed by the call of Moses (in Egypt), the revelation of the name Yahwè (6 2-12), and the appointment of Aaron to be Moses' prophet (7 1-7). The wonders wrought before Pharaoh by Aaron at Moses' command (P in 7-9) assume the form of a trial of skill with the native magicians, who at first are able to do the same things by their arts, but in the end are completely defeated. The announcement of the last stroke, the death of the first-born, gives occasion to introduce directions for the observance of the Passover (12 1-13), to which are attached the ritual for the annual celebration of the Feast of Unleavened Bread (14-20), supplementary regulations for the annual Passover (43-51), and the law requiring the consecration of the first-born (13 1*f.). This is a good example of the method of the author, who always endeavours to connect the legislation with some occasion or circumstance in the history;⁴ so that, in its primitive form and intention, P was not a 'Priests' Code,' but a history of the origin of the sacred institutions of Israel. The beginning of the migration (12 37) leads to a chronological digression on the length of the sojourn in Egypt (40*f.*).⁵ The march to the shores of the Red Sea is next narrated (13 20 14 1*f.*), and the miraculous deliverance there, the Israelites passing safely between walls of water on either hand, whilst the Egyptians pursuing them are overwhelmed (P in 14). Of the journey from the sea to Sinai we are told nothing except the names of the halting-places (16 1 17 1 19 1*f.*).⁶

Arrived at Sinai, Moses ascends the mountain (24 15-18), where the plans for the tabernacle and its furnishings, and the ritual for the consecration of priests, are revealed to him (25-31 17). He returns to the people, collects the necessary materials, and constructs the tabernacle in exact accordance with the specifications given him (34 29-40).⁷

In combining P with the other sources, R does not appear to have omitted anything of consequence from this narrative, though he was constrained to make some transpositions.⁸ We observe here, as in Genesis, the disposition to reduce to a skeleton the narrative of ordinary events (the migration, e.g., to a list of stations), and to enlarge upon everything connected with religion and the religious institutions (see 12*f.* 25*f.* 35*ff.*). Here also the existence of other and fuller historical ¹ In this table, as in the corresponding one in Genesis, the additions of Rp are not in general distinguished from P. An asterisk indicates contamination or redactional changes. Nöldeke's analysis, Unters. z. Kritik des AT's 35*ff.* ('69), has been modified by subsequent critics (esp. Di., Jül., and Kue.) only in minor particulars.

² Cp Gen. 5 1*f.* 6 10 11 27 Nu. 3 2-4 etc.

⁴ So in Genesis, the Sabbath, the Noachian injunctions, circumcision.

⁶ P's account of the murmuring of the people and the giving of the manna, which now stands in chap. 16, must originally have had a later place in the narrative, since it supposes the existence of the tabernacle (10 34). See MANNA, § 3.

⁷ These chapters have been much expanded by later hands; see below, § 5.

narratives is to be inferred from the epitomes of P (see GENESIS, § 2*f.*). The dependence of P upon these narratives is especially manifest in the account of the plagues, and of the crossing of the Red Sea.

The prophetic history which remains after the elimination of P is made up of the same two main strands, J and E, that criticism discovers in

3. JE. Genesis (see GENESIS, § 4*ff.*). The analysis, however, is more difficult in Exodus than in the patriarchal stories.

The use of the divine names loses much of its value as a criterion, since after Ex. 3 13-15 the name Yahwè is employed—though not uniformly—in E as well as in J; clues derived from the narrative deny us their guidance in the Laws; whilst other evidences of origin are often lacking. It is clear also that the author who united J and E (R_{JE}), not only fused his sources much more completely than the last redactor of the Hexateuch (Rp), but also otherwise treated his material with a freer hand; this is peculiarly evident in Ex. 4*ff.* In Exodus, moreover, the work of later editors of the Deuteronomistic school is more frequently to be recognised or suspected.

An exhaustive analysis which would assign every clause or verse to its author, leaving no insoluble remainders, is impossible. The utmost that we can expect to accomplish is to distinguish the main features of the parallel narratives; and even in regard to these great uncertainty often remains.²

i. Earlier Chapters.—In 1-3, E is the chief source (J in 1 6 8-12 215-22 3 7*f.* 16-18—the last two passages transposed and much amplified by R_{JE}, who also added 3 19*f.*).³ Ch. 4 1-16 is by most critics regarded as substantially from J (13b-16 R_{JE}). To J belong also 4 19-20a 24-26, which probably followed 2 23a (E in 18 and perhaps other verses; R_{JE} in 27-31). Ch. 5-6 1 is in the main from J (manifest duplication in 5 1-5).

ii. The 'Plagues.'—a. (J). In the history of the plagues also J is the principal source; in the plagues of frogs (8 1-4 8-15a [7 26-29 8 4-11*a*]), of insects (8 20-32 [16-28]), and of murrain (9 1-7), there is no contamination; in the turning of the Nile to blood (7 14-24), the hail and tempest (9 13-35), and the plague of locusts (10 1-20), E's version of the story has been united with that of J; the plague of darkness alone (10 21-23) is entirely from E.

In J's representation, Yahwè bids Moses⁴ go to the Pharaoh, and demand in his name that Israel be allowed to go to worship him in the desert; if the king refuses, Moses is to announce that at a certain time (the next day, 9 5 18 10 13; cp 8 22) Yahwè will send a specified plague.⁵ When this comes to pass, the Pharaoh sends for Moses and begs him to intercede with his God; but as soon as the scourge is removed his faculty returns—ויכבר לך פתעה is the standing phrase—and he refuses to let Israel go.⁶ The plagues fall upon the Egyptians only; Yahwè does not suffer any evil to come near the Israelites, who dwell apart in the land of Goshen (8 22 9 4 6 26).

β. (E). Compared with J, whose narrative is preserved in relative completeness,—doubtless because it was the fuller and more vivid,—the remains of E in these chapters are fragmentary. In E, the plagues are not merely announced by Moses and on the following day brought to pass by Yahwè, but are wrought on the spot, under the eyes of the Pharaoh and his court, ³ In J the call of Moses probably followed his return to Egypt.

⁴ Aaron, who accompanies Moses but neither says nor does anything, was introduced by R_{JE} from E.

⁵ The interview takes place in the palace; the meeting on the banks of the Nile comes from E.

by Moses with his wonderful rod (7^{20b} 9²³ 10¹² 13^a 21^f).¹ This difference leads to striking confusion where the two sources are combined, as in 7¹⁴ ff. 9²² ff. (cp 18), and especially in 10¹² 13^a by the side of 13^b. E thinks of the Israelites, not as occupying a district apart, but as dwelling in the midst of Egyptian neighbours (3²¹ 10²³ 11² f. 12³⁵ f.).

iii. The Firstborn.—The slaughter of the firstborn of the Egyptians is made the occasion, as in P, for the introduction of directions for the observance of the Passover (12²¹⁻²⁷), the Feast of Unleavened Bread (13³⁻¹⁰), and the dedication of the firstborn (13¹¹⁻¹⁶). These laws, though strongly deuteronomistic in conception and expression, seem to be based upon J. It may be conjectured that the same hand which amplified the prescriptions transposed to this place laws which in J stood in a different connection (Budde). If this hypothesis be correct, J will have had in his account of the last plague only the command to the Israelites to mark their houses with the blood of a sheep or goat, that they might be passed over by the destroyer (12²¹⁻²³).² The death of the Egyptian firstborn, and the vehemence with which king and people now urge the Israelites to hasten their departure, are described in the words of J (12²⁹⁻³⁴ 38 f.); of E is preserved only 12³⁵ f., the last words of 37, then 13¹⁷⁻¹⁹.

iv. Crossing the Sea.—In the account of the miraculous deliverance of Israel at the Red Sea, the beginning of the narrative is from J (14⁵ f. 10-14; R_{JE} in 13^{aa} b), who characteristically represents the passage as made possible by a strong east wind driving out the water (14²¹ from וַיִּזְרַח). In the last watch of the night Yahwé looks down upon the Egyptians and makes their chariot wheels stick; seeing that God is fighting against them, they turn to flee (24 f.), but perish in the midst of the sea (27^b 28^b). In E, on the contrary, whose version is followed by P, Moses with his rod divides the waters of the sea, which stand as a wall on either hand. The angel of God takes his station in the rear to protect the Israelites from their pursuers. When they have crossed in safety, Moses stretches out his rod and the waters elose over the Egyptians (16* 19a, perhaps part of 20). The song of Miriam (15²⁰) also is from E.³

v. To the Mount.—In JE as in P, Moses leads the people from the shores of the sea to the Mount of God (SINAI, q. v.), where Yahwé gives them laws and makes a covenant with them. In the composite narrative, however, there are traces of a different representation, according to which the Israelites went directly to Kadesh on the south of Palestine (15^{22-25a}).⁴

In 17²⁻⁷ we find them already at Meribah, that is KADESH (q. v., 1, § 2).⁵ Amalek also (17⁸ ff.) is to be sought in the region of Kadesh rather than among the mountains of the Sinaitic peninsula (Nu. 14⁴³ 45 1 S. 15 30). Perhaps we may recognise in this a more primitive form of Judean (or Calabite) tradition; our oldest written sources, as is very clearly to be seen in Genesis, unite materials of diverse origin, whose discrepant or conflicting representations they harmonise only superficially, if at all.⁶ See EXODUS I, § 6.

It is not certain that J or E related anything which occurred between the crossing of the sea and the arrival at Sinai; a redactor has filled this gap with doublets from a later point in the history (see EXODUS I, § 5; cp the miracle at Meribah in 17² ff. with Nu. 20¹ ff.; the appointment of judges in 18 with Nu. 11¹⁶ ff.).⁷ We may

² Observe that no directions are given for the eating of a paschal meal; and contrast this with the very detailed directions for the use of the blood.

⁵ Horeb, 17⁶, is a gloss; but see MASSAH AND MERIBAH.

⁶ Kuenen doubts whether any part of the narrative of events at Sinai is derived from J (Hex. § 8, and n. 18).

ascribe to J, 15^{22-25a} 17¹ (the last words), 24, 5 and 6 in part, 7; to E the rest of 17²⁻⁷ 8-13 18 (with editorial additions, but not contamination from the other source).

vi. *At Sinai.*¹—JE's account of the giving of the law at Sinai and the events connected with it fills Ex. 19^{2b-24} (except a few verses in 24), 31^{18b-34} 28. In consequence of repeated and complicated redaction, these chapters present to criticism problems of extreme difficulty, for which we can hardly expect to find a complete solution.² In 19 the impressive prelude to the legislation, 3⁶⁻⁸, is from the hand of an editor;³ 3^a 9-19, though not free from editorial amplification and perhaps contamination, are in the main from E; while 20-22 25 belong to the parallel narrative of J (23 f. is a harmonistic addition by R_{JE}).⁴

vii. J's Legislation.—The sequel of J's account is to be found, not in 21-24,⁵ but, with most recent critics, in 34.⁶ This chapter stands in a very unsuitable place; after 32³⁴ 33¹⁻³ (the peremptory command in both J and E to leave the Mount of God) nothing is in place but the actual departure from Horeb which both sources narrate in Nu. 10. Least of all do we expect fresh legislation such as is found in 34. On other grounds also it is certain that the present position of the chapter is due to one of the later redactors of the Hexateuch (see below, § 4). In its original connection in J, the giving of the law was probably followed immediately by the command to take up the march to the promised land (32^{34a}); Moses beseeches Yahwé to accompany his people in person (33^{12a} 34^{9a} 33^{15b} 16)⁷ and his request is granted; thereupon Moses seeks a guide through the desert (Nu. 10²⁹ ff.), and they set out.⁸

viii. E's Legislation.—E's narrative in 19 (3^a 9-19 in the main) is also preliminary to the revelation of God's law; the solemn ratification of the Law is described in 24³⁻⁸. As we have found the legislation of J elsewhere, it is natural to infer that 20-23 as a whole is the corresponding legislation of E,⁹ and this inference seems to be confirmed by the fact that various indications of affinity with E are discovered throughout these chapters (see below, § 4). Closer examination shows, however, that the problem is much more complicated than at first appears. Ex. 20-23 contains two distinct bodies of laws: the Decalogue (20¹⁻¹⁷), and the so-called Covenant Book (21-23). These are not incompatible. We can readily conceive that the revelation of the fundamental precepts of religion and morals in the Ten Commandments should be followed by a more minute regulation of the civil, social, and religious life of Israel such as we find in 21-23; in the history of the law-giving, however, no connection is established between them.¹⁰ Chap. 21 is without any antecedents in 20. Chap. 20 18-26 is composed of very disparate elements: 18-21 belong to the Decalogue narrative, but should probably stand before the Decalogue, immediately following 19 19;¹¹ 24-26 is a fragment relating to the regulation of the cultus, and, from whatever source it may have come, has nothing to do either with the Decalogue which precedes or with the civil and penal code which follows; 22 23—superfluous after 4—seem to be from the hand of an editor; in all these verses there is no reference to the Covenant Book, or to any further legislation. In 24 the continuation of the Decalogue narrative (12-14) and the ratification of the Covenant Book (3-8) stand side by side without any attempt to connect them.¹ In the subsequent narrative of JE (32-34) there is no mention of the laws of 21-23 or of the covenant of 243-8. Finally, Dt.—even in its later strata—knows no law given to Israel at Horeb except the Decalogue, which alone it recognises as the basis of the covenant (5 61 f.; cp 4 10-14 97-105); while Josh. 24 (E) makes no reference to any earlier covenant or law. The inference that the Covenant Book did not originally form part of E's history of the transactions at Horeb seems inevitable.²

There remains, then, the Decalogue and that strand of the following narrative which depends upon it, viz., 20 18-21 (connecting with 19 19) 1-17 24 12-14 18* 31 18*; the lapse into the idolatry of the golden calf, and its consequences, 32 1-6³ 15-20 (21-24 7) 30-33 (perhaps partly secondary). Yahwé then in anger orders Israel to leave the holy mountain, and declares that he will not go with them (33 1a 3b 4-6*). That this was the form in which E was current at the end of the seventh century, B.C., and in the first half of the sixth, is proved by Deuteronomy. As has been already observed, D knows no law given to Israel at Horeb but the Decalogue. The author of the comparatively late interpolation, Dt. 9 8-17 (18-20) 21 10 10 f. (the story of the golden calf and the broken tables of the law), read Ex. 24 12-14 28 31 18 32 7 ff. (34 28 7)—that is, E with the additions of R_{JE}—substantially as we do.

ix. More Primitive Version.—There are, however, in E fragmentary remains of another, it would seem more primitive, representation. The most remarkable of these is 33 7-11, which tells us how Moses took a tent, which he called the Meeting Tent (i.e., the appointed place to meet God), and set it up outside the camp at some distance. To this tent Moses repaired from time to time, and God spoke to him there out of the column of cloud which descended at its door. Thither others also resorted to consult the oracle. Joshua, Moses' youthful assistant, remained constantly in the tent, as its keeper. In the narrative from which these verses are taken they must have been preceded by a description of the making of this simple tent, which was omitted by R_P when he put in its place the great tabernacle of P; Dt. 10 35 still shows us where the passage stood. In the same connection, doubtless, stood an account of the making of the ark, to shelter which the tent was required (cp Nu. 10 33-36 14 44 [E], Dt. 10 35); this also R_P was constrained to omit in favour of P's Ark of the Testimony (Ex. 25 10 ff. 27 1 ff.). The directions for the construction of the altar of rude stones or earth, 20 24-26, to which Dt. 27 6 f. perhaps belongs, seem to be derived from the same source. These fragments suffice to show that E once contained a fuller account of the origin of the Israelite sacra, and laws regulating religious worship; and it may safely be assumed that these things had in the narrative a place befitting their importance. That so little of this now remains is to be attributed in part, as we have seen, to its displacement by P in the final redaction of the Hexateuch; but it is a not improbable hypothesis that it had been in considerable part supplanted at an earlier date by the Decalogue and the cognate narrative (the golden calf, etc.), which in this case must be regarded as a secondary stratum in E (E₂). To this question we shall return below (§ 4).

i. Ceremonial Decalogue.—Ex. 34 10-28 contains, as we have seen, the legislation of J. Its injunctions are 4. Laws in JE.¹ exclusively religious: it forbids the worship of any other deity and the making of molten idols; commands the observance of the three annual feasts and of the Sabbath, the sacrifice of firstlings and the offering of first fruits; and prohibits certain rites which were probably associated with other cults. These laws are set forth as the terms of the covenant which Yahwé makes with Moses as the representative of Israel, and as such they are committed to writing by Moses (10 27 f.). Ch. 34 10-26 thus presents itself as a counterpart to the 'Book of the Covenant' (24 7) which is contained in 21-23. In 34 28, however, we read that Moses remained forty days with Yahwé on the mountain, 'and he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten words.'² From this it would seem that the commandments in 14-26 constituted J's decalogue, an older counterpart to the Ten Commandments in Ex. 20 1-17 Dt. 5 6-21³ (see DECALOGUE). Upon this theory, 34 1 f. contains J's account of the origin of the two tables of the law; 1 b, and the words 'like the first' in 1 a and 4 a, which represent these tables as designed to take the place of the tables which Moses had broken (32 19), are harmonistic additions by the redactor who introduced 34 in this place. Kuenen, on the other hand, contends that 14 28 b had originally nothing to do with 10-27; they formed part of E's narrative, and the ten words are no other than E's decalogue (20 1-17).⁴ Whatever view be taken of the relation of 28 to 27, the phrase 'the ten words,' which collides with the preceding 'the words of the covenant,' seems to be a gloss, introduced under the influence of the deuteronomistic theory that the covenant was made upon the Decalogue alone (cp esp. Dt. 4 13).⁵ If this be the case, there is no direct evidence that the laws in 34 10-26 were originally just ten in number. It may be suspected that the words 'upon the tables' which connect 28 with 1-4 are also secondary, and that the original sequel of 27 was closely similar to 24 4a 7 f., if, indeed, it be not contained in those verses (Valeton). On the other hand, 34 4 b, 'taking in his hand two tables of stone' (שני לוחות אבנים), seems to be original; and it is perhaps on the whole more probable that the commandments of J also were inscribed on stone. Whether this is the oldest representation, and whether in the oldest Judæan tradition the commandments were given at Sinai or at some other place—perhaps at Kadesh—are questions to which no certain answer can be given.⁶

ii. Character and origin.—The laws in Ex. 34 10-28 are certainly older than the setting which represents them as the terms of a covenant made by Yahwé with Moses at Sinai; and are the earliest attempt with which we are acquainted to embody in a series of brief injunctions formulated as divine commands the essential observances of the religion of Yahwé. We may safely assume that this collection of sacred laws was made at a Judæan sanctuary, and that it represents the ancient usage of the region. The age of the collection can only be inferred from its contents.

The three annual feasts which occupy the central place in the cultus are agricultural festivals,⁷ and presume a people which has passed over to a settled life, to whom tillage is a chief concern. On the other hand, the idea of religion to which such laws as those that forbid the seething of a kid in its mother's milk, or the keeping of part of a sacrifice till the next morning, appear fundamental, is very primitive.⁸ A still stronger indication of the antiquity of this legislation is the fact that the demands of Yahwé all have reference to the way in which he is to be worshipped. Religion seems to be as yet untouched by the prophetic movement whose burden was that what God demands is not worship but righteousness.

⁷ The Sabbath also is an institution of a settled people.

In the strongest contrast to the fundamental revelation of Yahwé's will in J is the decalogue of Ex. 20¹⁻¹⁷. On the Deuteronomistic elements in this document and on its relation to Ex. 34^{10 ff.}, see DECALOGUE, § 2. The narrative in Ex. 32 (golden calf) is inseparable from it, and is aimed at the religion of the kingdom of Israel; the repudiation of its idolatrous cult which we find in Hosea is carried back to Horeb. This narrative, therefore, also belongs to the prophetic edition of E (E₂). The Decalogue seems to have supplanted the law given at Horeb in E₁. We may safely assume that this law was similar in character to that of J in 34^{10 ff.}; and it is not improbable that fragments of it are preserved in 23^{14 ff.} Whether it constituted a decalogue must remain uncertain.¹

iii. Chapters 21-23.—A law-book of a different character is contained in 21-23.² By its superscription it is a collection of mišpāṭim, that is 'judgments, judicial decisions, or norms'; and accordingly we find in 21^{2-22¹⁷} various titles of civil and penal law; viz., slavery and manumission (21²⁻¹¹), homicide (12-21), torts (22-36 22^{5 ff.}), theft, burglary, etc. (22¹⁻⁴), the liability of a borrower or bailee (7-15), seduction (16 ff.).³ In those titles which remain intact the laws are methodically arranged and formulated: first the general rule is given, then the particular cases which may arise under it, e.g.—

When (וְ) thou buyest a Hebrew slave, he shall serve six years, and in the seventh he shall go free, without ransom. If (וְ) he was single when he came into his master's possession he shall go free alone. If he was married, his wife shall go with him. If his master gives him a wife and she bear him children, the woman and the children belong to the master; the slave shall go free alone; etc. (21^{2 ff.}; cp also 28^{15 ff.}).

This book of mišpāṭim (מִשְׁפָּטִים) has unfortunately not been completely preserved; some of the paragraphs are much mutilated, whilst other titles which we have every reason to believe were once contained in it are wanting altogether. Additions also have been made to it, which are recognised by their departure from the systematic form of the original work, in part also by the different nature of their contents. The character of this little code indicates considerable progress in civilization and in jurisprudence. It may be compared with the Laws of the Twelve Tables, and especially with the legislation of Solon (Plutarch, Solon), to which it is probably not much anterior in time.⁴

Chap. 23, which contains only moral precepts and religious ordinances, is not covered by the title mišpāṭim in 21. Most scholars are of the opinion that 23, together with the kindred verses in the latter part of 22, originally constituted a distinct part of the Covenant Book, which, like the laws in 34 and the decalogue in 20, was entitled simply The Words (d'barim);⁵ cp also 19⁶. In 24³⁻⁸, in the ratification of the law, we read that Moses recited to the people 'all the Words of Yahwé (d'barim) and all the Judgments (mišpāṭim'); the two together (fas and jus) cover the whole field of the divine law. It is not quite certain, however, that 24³ is the conclusion of 21-23; if 20¹⁸⁻²¹ originally preceded 20¹⁻¹⁷, as is now generally believed, 24³ would naturally refer to the promulgation of the decalogue (the Words of Yahwé); 'and all the mišpāṭim' would then be a redactional addition.⁶ The question whether 21-23 was originally one collection of laws under the two heads, Civil and Penal (mišpāṭim), and Moral and Religious (d'barim), can therefore be decided only on internal grounds. In 23¹⁴⁻¹⁹ we find a group of laws relating to worship and religious festivals which are in the main verbally identical with those of J in 34; cp especially 23¹⁵⁻¹⁹ with 34¹⁸⁻²⁶. Closer examination shows that they are in situ in 34, and were brought over thence into 23 by a redactor.¹ This redactor, it must be supposed, having incorporated the substance of J's legislation in 23, omitted 34 from his compilation; its restoration is to be ascribed to a later editor.² In 23²⁰⁻³³, which is as a whole the composition of a redactor, remains of an older text are preserved in 28-31 (cp Jos. 24¹² Dt. 7²⁰⁻²²); and the same source perhaps underlies 20-22 25 26. In 22^{18-23¹³} we can recognise diverse elements: first, a few civil and penal laws, which differ from the mišpāṭim by their categorical form³—e.g., 22¹⁸, 'Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live,' 19, 'Whosoever is guilty of bestiality shall be put to death,' etc. Second, a collection of moral injunctions, which from their nature cannot have the sanctions of human law (22²⁰⁻²⁴ 23¹⁻³ 4 f. 6 f. 8 9). Some of these resemble in form and content the second table of the decalogue; others are manifestly akin to the deuteronomistic legislation. Finally, interspersed with these are religious ordinances (22²⁹ f. 31 [?] 23¹⁰⁻¹³). The different character of these laws, and still more the disorder in which they are, points to compilation; the prominence of precepts of charity, and the deuteronomistic motives and phraseology, indicate that the recension, if not the compilation itself, dates from the seventh century.

These facts make it very doubtful whether the author of the mišpāṭim in 21-22¹⁷ is also the author of a corresponding collection of moral and religious precepts (d'barim) which form the basis of 22^{17-23³³}. A more probable hypothesis is that 21-23 is the result of a process of accretion: to what was originally a hand-book of civil and penal laws was added, first, perhaps from E's Horeb legislation, the main stock of 22^{18-23¹³}; then (probably by the same editor who added the parenthetic close) 23¹⁴⁻¹⁹, from 34^{14 ff.} (J).

Many attempts have been made to reconstruct the Covenant Book, eliminating interpolations, restoring by more or less extensive transpositions the order of the d'barim and the mišpāṭim, and even supplying some of the gaps by comparison with Ex. 34 and Dt. 4. In this work of restoration several scholars have sought a formal regulative in the supposition that the laws were originally grouped in homologous decads and pentads.⁴ This theory finds some support in certain paragraphs of the mišpāṭim; but the results hitherto attained by this method are not less widely divergent than those reached without such a criterion.

iv. Ratification.—Chap. 24³⁻⁸ is the ratification by solemn covenant (see COVENANT, § 6 [ii.]) of the legislation in 21-23,⁵ which on this account is often called the Covenant Book. By most critics these verses, with the Covenant Book itself, are ascribed to E. They appear, however, to be composite; 7³ may have belonged to the decalogue narrative in its original form (see above, iii.); in 4 the altar at the foot of the mountain and the twelve maššēbōth seem to be doublets; the maššēbōth and perhaps the young men of Israel who act as sacrificers may be derived from the oldest stratum of E (akin to 33⁷⁻¹¹), in which, it may be surmised, these stones rather than a book were the monument of the adoption of the religion of Yahwé at Horeb (cp Jos. 24^{26 ff.}); while 4^{7 8} seems to be a later representation more nearly parallel to 31²⁷ with its original sequel, and may be attributed to a later recension of E as the close of its Covenant Book, or to R_{JE}. As a whole, 24³⁻⁸ seems to be meant to follow 21-23, and to be the work of the editor who incorporated J's commandments from 34, and gave these chapters their present form. Ch. 24^{1 f.} 9-11 are derived from a very ancient source; there seems to be no decisive reason why this may not be E₁.¹

v. Origin of Covenant Book.—The language of the Covenant Book shows some affinity to E; and most recent critics think that it was incorporated in that work.² It cannot, however, have occupied in E its present position as a law given at Horeb (see above, § 3. viii.). Kuenen conjectured that it was originally the law given by Moses just before the crossing of the Jordan; it filled in E the place which Dt. has in the present Pentateuch; and when supplanted by Dt. was removed by an editor (R_D) to this earlier point in the history of the legislation.³

If the view of the composition of these chapters taken above be correct, the problem assumes a somewhat different form: it would be the simplest hypothesis, that the redactor who inserted the Covenant Book here was also its compiler; and the question for the critic would be, what were the sources from which this redactor drew his materials. For 23^{14 f.} this question is already answered; for the mišpātīm we may hazard the surmise that in E they constituted a book of instructions for judges, which stood in immediate connection with 18;⁴ for other parts of 22^{18 f.} 23 it is probable that the original Horeb legislation of E (E₁) which was supplanted by the Decalogue, has been laid under contribution; in particular, it may be inferred that the group of laws noticed above (which in substance and form resemble the second table of the decalogue) are of this origin. Traces of this parallel legislation may perhaps also be discovered in 23^{14 f.}, where the text of J sometimes shows signs of contamination (Budde, ZATW 11^{218 f.}).

In § 2 above, P was separated as a whole from JE. The more closely P is examined, however, the more plainly it appears that it is not the work of a single author.⁶ It is rather to be compared to a stratum, the deposit of a considerable period, in which distinct layers are to be seen. This is nowhere more evident than in chaps. 25-31 35-40. Ex. 25-31¹⁷ contain the plans for the tabernacle and its furnishings, and directions for the consecration of priests; 34²⁹⁻⁴⁰ Lev. 8 f. relate, in almost the same words, the carrying out of these instructions. Such repetition is not found elsewhere, even in P, and would of itself lead us to suspect that the mechanical conformation of the execution to the command was the work of an editor rather than of the author. Critical investigation not only fully confirms this surmise, but also proves that even 25-31 is not all from one hand, or of one age.

i. Chaps. 25-31.—Chaps. 25-29³⁷ belong, with inconsiderable exceptions,⁷ to the main stem of P; 29⁴³⁻⁴⁶ is a formal close. Chaps. 30 f. contain a series of paragraphs supplementary to 25-29 and demonstrably of later date.

The first of these paragraphs gives directions for making an altar of incense (30¹⁻¹⁰). If the author of 25-29 had provided for such an altar, it would have been introduced with the other furniture of the Holy Place in 25, and must have been mentioned in 26³¹⁻³⁷;¹ furthermore, the altar described in 27^{1 f.} must then have been in some way distinguished from the altar of incense, and could not be spoken of simply as the altar. This internal evidence is confirmed by the fact that in the ritual laws of P there is a stratum which ignores or excludes the altar of incense; this is the case even in the liturgy for the day of atonement (Lev. 16; cp also Ezek. 41²²⁻⁴⁴), and in certain rituals for the sin-offering (Ex. 29¹ Lev. 8 f.; see also 10^{16 f.} Nu. 16 f.).² The incense altar thus becomes an important criterion in the further analysis of P.

In a similar way and with equal conclusiveness it is shown that the half-shekel poll-tax (30¹¹⁻¹⁶),³ the anointing oil and unction of all the priests (22-33), the bronze laver (17-21), and the formula for compounding the incense (34-38), are secondary. Chap. 31¹⁻¹¹ presupposes the parts of 30 which are proved not to be original, and falls with them.

The injunction to observe the Sabbath (31¹²⁻¹⁷) seems to be introduced here to teach that even sacred labours, such as the building of the tabernacle, do not suspend the Sabbath law—a kind of reflection which itself suggests a late date. The language is not altogether like that of P, and has some suggestions of H; the editor who inserted the paragraph here may have made use of a law which he found in another connection.

ii. Chaps. 35-40.—In the account of the making of the tabernacle in 35-40, the paragraphs in 30 f. which we have recognised as later additions are all included, and are inserted in their natural and proper connection, —the altar of incense with the other furniture of the Holy Place (37²⁵⁻²⁸), the laver with the great altar in the court (38^{8 f.}), etc. Chaps. 35-40 are, therefore, not older than 30 f. Other indications make it probable that the whole detailed account of the construction of the tabernacle in exact accordance with the plans in 25 f. is a still later addition to the original text of P. Chaps. 35-40 were not translated into Greek by the same hand as the rest of the book; and material differences in content—the altar of incense, e.g., is still lacking in G—and order⁴ seem to prove that the final recension of these chapters was not yet completed when the Alexandrian Version was made. In its original form P probably related very briefly that Moses did in all respects as God had bidden him.

The historian tells us in his introduction (15¹) that the ode preserved in chap. 15 was sung by the Israelites on the shores of the Red Sea; and until recent times it has been believed without question that Moses was its author. The poem celebrates, however, not only the destruction of the pharaoh's hosts in the sea (2-12), but also the safe guidance of Israel to the land of Canaan (13-18);⁶ 17^b—which there is no formal reason for regarding as an interpolation—speaks of the building of the temple (cp also 13^b). It is evident, therefore, that the poem was composed after Israel was established in Palestine. Some critics (Ew., H. Schultz, Di., Riehm) ascribe it to the age of David and Solomon, or even to the period of the Judges; but the linguistic evidence, which is what is chiefly relied on as a proof of antiquity (see especially Di.), is far from decisive. It is possible with greater probability to draw from it an opposite conclusion.⁷ The other evidence is all against so early a date. The prose narrative in 14 is not dependent on 15, but the converse. The ode has no resemblance to the really old poems in the historical books (e.g., Judg. 5 2 S. I Nu. 21). Its affinities are with Is. 12 and a group of historical psalms (78 105 106 114 77¹¹⁻²⁰ 118), and there seems to be no reason for regarding it as older than these.¹ Some scholars think that the poem in its present form is the amplification of an older brief, and probably genuine, song of Moses, which may be preserved in 15:16-3;² others, with greater probability, regard it as the development of the motive suggested in v. 21.³

It has been thought by many that the song was found in an old collection of poetry,—perhaps the 'Book of the WARS OF YAHWE' (7. v.),—and was incorporated by E in his history (Schr., Di., Ki., etc.). The latter hypothesis can hardly be accepted; E's song at the crossing of the sea is v. 20 f.; 1-18 is a rival composition. The references to Jerusalem and the temple are also against the supposition that the poem was included in E. More probably it was inserted by R₁₂ or a later editor. It is possible that it was taken from a poetical collection; but equally possible that it was written for its present position (Jülicher).

EXORCISTS (εξορκιστῆς) were found by Paul at Ephesus (Acts 19 13 f.).

εξορκίζω in Ⓞ renders שָׁבַע twice (Gen. 24, EV 'make to swear,' Vg. adjurare; 1 K. 22 16, EV 'adjure,' Vg. adjurare) and שָׁח once (AL) (Judg. 17 2, AV 'cursedst,' RV 'didst utter a curse,' RVmg. 'didst utter an adjuration').

The practice of casting out demons by spells is of remote antiquity. It was common both in and after the time of Jesus Christ, who undoubtedly cast out demons himself. There was this strong distinction, however, between the procedure of Jesus and that of his contemporaries that, whereas the latter were careful to use the names of supernatural beings to gain their end with the demons, Jesus 'cast out the spirits with a word,' 'by the spirit of God,' 'by the finger of God'; how he suffered in consequence, is told in the synoptic gospels. In Mt. 108 Mk. 3 15 6 7 13 Lk. 9 1 Mk. 16 17 it is further said that both before and after his resurrection he gave authority to his disciples to cast out demons, and in Mk. 16 17 (the address previous to his ascension) the great deeds which he prophesies are ascribed to the power of his name (ἐν τῷ ὀνόματι μου). If Jesus Christ made it a condition of successful exorcism that it should be performed 'in his name,' he certainly did not mean the recitation of the name of Jesus as a spell. This however, was the procedure of the 'sons' or disciples¹ of a certain Jew of high rank at Ephesus (see SCEVA) according to the narrative in Acts 19 13, who tried the plan (ἐπεχέλησαν) of using this potent name (cp Eph. 1 21) as a spell in preference to the strings of names of gods and demigods and angels which were common in exorcisms both in Asia Minor and elsewhere. What they are reported to have said was simple enough, and contrasts very favourably with the ordinary medley in Jewish and even sometimes Christian exorcising formulæ. It was this, 'I adjure you (ὀρκίζω, not ὀρκίζομεν) by Jesus whom Paul preaches.' Demons probably did not often address the exorcists in the tone adopted by the demon on this occasion. 'Jesus I recognise' (γινώσκω), he said, 'and Paul I know (ἐπίσταμαι); but who are ye?'

¹ We. Prol. (4) 359 n.; Che. O.Ps. 31; Co. Eint. (3, 4) 61.

² Ew., Di., Del., etc. Dr. thinks that the greater part of the song is Mosaic, the expansion being limited to the closing verses.

³ Otmaw, De Wette, Co., Wildeboer, Che., Ki.

The passage stands in connection with a reference to certain miracles wrought by or through Paul which hardly come up to our expectations (see 2 Cor. 12 12). The narrative rightly assumes that Paul did perform wonderful deeds, but certainly imagines wrong ones; it is only 'accidental fancy's guardian sheath'² of a belief in Paul's thaumaturgic powers (cp Acts 5 15). This juxtaposition is unfavourable to the historical accuracy of the account of the Jewish exorcists. Still, even if unhistorical, this account enables us to realise better the historical situation. Gal. 5 20 and indirectly 2 Tim. 3 13 show how prevalent magic was among the populations evangelised by Christ's disciples, and the whole paragraph, Acts 19 13-20, gives a vivid, even if partly imaginary, picture of this. The works of Justin Martyr further illustrate what we may call the two contending types of exorcism. Unfortunately there is not much difference between these types. Justin (Apol. 2 45) says that 'by the name of Jesus Christ who was crucified under Pontius Pilate' demons who resist all other exorcism are cast out. He does not deny that a Jew may perhaps successfully exorcise a demon in the name of the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob (κατὰ τοῦ θεοῦ Ἀβρ. κ.τ.λ.; Dial. 3 11 c.); but he says that Jewish exorcists as a class had sunk to the level of the superstitious exorcists of the heathen (Apol. 2 45 B), and the stories in Josephus (Ant. viii. 25 and Bf. vii. 63) seem to confirm this statement.

Josephus asserts that king Solomon left behind an account of the various forms of exorcism, and in connection with this relates the strange story of Eleazar's cure of certain demoniacs in the presence of Vespasian; he also says wonderful things respecting the herb Baaras. A book called the 'Testament of Solomon,' full of marvellous demonology, still exists; see M. R. James's paper in Guardian, 15th March 1899.

It was an age of universal credulity; but the influence of the life of Jesus Christ tended to preserve the early Christians from the worst failings of their Jewish neighbours. Origen expressly says that not a few plain Christians (ἰδιώται), without any acquaintance with magical formulæ, by prayer alone and simple adjurations (μὴν ἐν ἡψὶ καὶ ὀρκώσεων ἀπλουστέρας) had proved the power of Christ over the demons (c. Cels.

¹ The epithet περιεργόμενοι 'strolling' (Jews), suggests that they were little better than travelling mountebanks.

EYE. Dark, fiery eyes have always been to orientals an essential part of feminine beauty. An Arabian poet likens the glance of a beautiful woman to lightning from a heavy rain-cloud (Hamāsa, 558). Leah is less attractive than Rachel (Gen. 29:17), because she has 'lustreless eyes' (so Kautsch; EV 'tender'; רַבּוּחַ rabbūḥ; ἀσθενείς). In Canticles, the eyes of bride and bridegroom alike are compared to doves (4:5 12; on 1:15 see Budde). The iris with the pupil is the dove; the 'water-brooks' spoken of in 5:12 (where the figure is developed) are the whites of the eyes. The doves which the poet has in his mind are probably rock-pigeons (cp Cant. 2:14); these are gray or blue with black bands. The lover considers his passion the effect of the bright eyes of his beloved (Cant. 4:9); compare the Arabian poem already referred to, where it is said that if an armed man met such a glance as the poet has met he would be wounded mortally as by an arrow.

The power of an 'evil eye' is not directly referred to. The 'evil eye' (ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρός) of Mk. 7:22 (cp Mt. 20:15) means no doubt either niggardliness, or envy, or (cp Ps. 35:19) malicious joy at the misfortunes of another, or lustfulness (cp Mt. 5:28). The 'ogling' women in Is. 3:16 (מַסַּקְּרוֹת masakkerōth) certainly had evil eyes. So, too, when Saul 'eyed' David, it was not in order consciously to exert a baleful influence on the favourite of the people; it was the involuntary expression of his jealousy and ill-will. The use of amulets (לְהַשִּׁימַם leḥāššim), it is true, can hardly be doubted, and one of the chief objects of an amulet was to guard the wearer against an 'evil eye.' It was not, however, one of the aims of the biblical writers to contribute to Hebrew archaeology, and they and the editors of their works perhaps shrank from too much reference to popular superstitions. In Ecclus. 14:8-10 (RV) we have a full description of the 'evil eye,' in the sense of jealousy and ill-will, —

Evil is he that envieth with his eye,¹
Turning away the face, and despising the souls [of men].
A covetous man's eye is not satisfied with his portion;
And wicked injustice drieth up his soul.
An evil eye is grudging of bread,
And he is miserly at his table.

According to Hatch,² 'evil eye' should rather be 'grudging eye,' and this is his striking rendering of Mt. 6:22 f. —

The lamp of the body is the eye.
If therefore thine eye be liberal,
Thy whole body shall be full of light,
But if thine eye be grudging,
Thy whole body shall be full of darkness.

The rendering 'liberal' for ἀγαθός is in accordance with EV's rendering of Prov. 22:9 'He that hath a bountiful eye (עַיִן טוֹבָה ayin ṭobah) shall be blessed'; but, as we have seen, it is not necessary to restrict the reference of an 'evil eye' to niggardliness. That fine passage, Mt. 6:22 f., is quite independent of the passages which precede and follow it; indeed the Sermon on the Mount cannot critically be said to form a rhetorical or literary whole. The 'evil eye' is really the 'harmful eye,' and the passage is a warning against a spirit of self-absorption, unkindness, harmfulness. We also read of 'eyes full of adultery' (2 Pet. 2:14) and of 'lofty'—i.e., proud—eyes (Ps. 181:1 Prov. 6:17 30:13).

Painting the eyes, or rather the eyelids, is several times referred to. Jezebel 'painted her eyes' (lit. 'set her eyes in paint') in order to receive Jehu in full state (2 K. 9:30); AV unfortunately substitutes 'face.' The effect is strikingly described by Jeremiah: 'Though thou enlargeth (Heb. 'rendest') thine eyes with paint' (Jer. 4:30 RV). Ezekiel, too, represents this as a part of the full feminine toilette (Ezek. 23:40); cp PAINT.

Prov. 6:25, however, 'Let her not take thee with her eyelids,' probably refers to a winking with the eyes to attract the attention.

'Eyelids' and 'eyes' can in fact be used synonymously. The expression 'Eyelids of the dawn' (if 'dawn' should not rather be read 'sun'¹) in Job 39:41:10 [18] is surely only a poetical variation of 'eyes of the dawn'; and in Prov. 4:25 'let thine eyelids look straight before thee' is plainly synonymous with 'let thine eyes look right on.' We cannot, however, quite so easily account for these words of Ps. 114:

Yahwè is in his holy palace; Yahwè's throne is in heaven;
His eyes behold, his eyelids try, the sons of men.

It is improbable that even the 'eyes' could be said to 'try' the moral state of men; still less could the 'eyelids' be said to do so. We must therefore look closely into the text, which may not have been accurately transmitted. It is only a slight improvement to read in L. 2 with Baethgen,

His eyes behold [the world];² his eyelids try the sons of men; for the difficulty connected with the word 'eyelids' still remains, nor has even Duhm grappled with it. After a consideration of all the points involved, we decide to read thus: עֵינָיו נִרְכַּח הַצִּפְתָּה הַחַיִּיתָה כִּנֵּי אֲבוֹתָא—i.e., 'his eyes watch the crushed, they view the race of the poor.'

In the later literature the 'eye' or 'eyes' of God become the symbol of his providence and judicial watchfulness (Ps. 33:18 Prov. 15:3 Ezra 5:5). The same emblem suggests the beautiful words of Ps. 121:4 'Behold the keeper of Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps,' side by side with which we may put the words of Dt. 32:10 'He guarded him [Israel] as the apple of his eye' (כַּאֲפֵל עֵינָיו); the 'apple of the eye' being regarded as the most precious of possessions [see also Ps. 17:8 Prov. 7:2]). T. K. C.

EYE, DISEASES OF THE. Egyptian, Greek, and Brahmanical medical writings show the chief eye-diseases to have been ophthalmia (including all chronic effects to the lids, tear-ducts, etc., under the name of trachoma), cataract, and glaucoma.

There are niceties of diagnosis (e.g., ripe and unripe cataract), as well as various treatments. Jewish references are, as usual, meagre. The Bab. Talmud (Shabbāth, 108b-109a) treats sore eyes by applying wine, or fasting saliva (not on the Sabbath, unless to complete a cure begun the day before).

The biblical references are to the protection of the blind (Lev. 19:14 Dt. 27:18), or to persons or companies (Dt. 28:28 f.) struck blind as a punishment (cp Herod. 2:11), or to cures of blindness. The strict criticism of ancient references by Hirschberg (Geschichtl. Reise eines Augenarztes, Leips. 1890) warns us against measuring the ancient prevalence of ophthalmia (trachoma) by its present extent, which is enormous in Egypt, and considerable in other N. African countries and in Syria.

In Syria, Pruner (Krank. des Orients, 1847) found it most prevalent in all the coast towns, but also in Antioch and at Homs and Baalbek. In Jerusalem there is now a charity specially for ophthalmic cases. See further P. J. Baldensperger, PERQ, Apr. '99, p. 154.

The Jewish case most fully narrated is that of Tobit. The texts (especially Jerome's in Vulg.) differ so widely as to leave no doubt of variations and accretions in the telling of a folk tale. They agree that the malady was whiteness, λεύκωμα (albugo), leucoma being the third ancient degree of opacities of the cornea, of which the lesser were macula and nubecula.

It had lasted four years, according to most texts, seven in another, eight in another; Tobit is said to have been fifty-eight when it began. The cause assigned, droppings of a bird, when he was asleep out of doors, is merely a picturesque explanation of the whiteness; ophthalmia is the common cause. The leucomata are dwelt upon pathetically as an affliction incurred in doing a pious deed; actual or total blindness may be implied in Tobit's stumbling (11 ro), but is not expressly mentioned in all texts.

² Inserting עֵינָיו; ⚡, Theodoret, and Syr. Hex. have εἰς τὴν οἰκουμένην; the common text of ⚡, however, gives εἰς τὸν πένητα, i.e., נִרְכַּח, which in 9:10 10:18 74:2 is worn down into עֵי. See Che. Ps.(2) ad loc.; Duhm's criticism is tentative and unsatisfactory.

Opacities of the cornea interfere with vision in proportion to their central position opposite the pupil, their extent, density, kind of margins, presence in one or both eyes, etc. The whiteness is that of new scar-tissue, which is not homogeneous with the transparent tissue of the natural structure.

Saemisch ('Krankh. der Cornea,' Handb. 4 306) says that it is not rare to find a very slow spontaneous clearing of recent corneal opacities, especially in children, but that all applications to dispel the opacity of old scars are useless; Beer, of Vienna (1847), claimed many good results in treating white flecks as distinguished from true scars.

There is a treatment which might pass popularly as an actual cure, especially in the many cases where the vision is only impaired—viz., to darken the white spots by a pigment so that they are no longer seen (as a blemish) against the black of the pupil or the coloured iris. The modern method is to tattoo the spot or spots with Indian ink. Hirsch (Gesch. der Augenheilk. 276) has found in Galen a treatment having the same object, viz., producing by a heated probe an eschar of the surface, rubbing in powder of oak-galls, and applying a weak solution of copper salt; the copper ink so made on the spot would sink into the white tissue and render it permanently dark. Tobit's cure was probably of the nature of pigmentation. See TOBIT.

The text does not claim a miracle, Raphael's aid being given through ordinary means; a radical cure by the medicinal action of gall (or anything else) is out of the question (Saemisch); and the actual removal or exfoliation of the white tissue, which the text may seem to claim, would only have resulted in leaving other white scars behind.

From a fish of the Tigris, perhaps a sturgeon, the heart, the liver (not in all texts), and the gall are to be taken and preserved (65: θῆς ἀσφαλῶς); it is probable, from the subsequent use of the two former to make a smoke with aromatics added, that they had been calcined to charcoal (616 82); the gall would keep only as evaporated and dried to a resinous mass, in which state it will keep for years.¹ The gall of a fresh-water fish (sturgeon) differs from ox-gall in having its bile-acid nearly all taurocholic and its alkaline base soda. Whilst Raphael is sent to cure both Tobit and his future daughter-in-law, and the materials for both cures are taken from the same fish, the gall alone is for the one, and the smoke of the heart and liver (probably calcined) for the other. The collocation of the text is so far suggestive, however, that one may read into it the omitted detail, viz., that the charcoal had been used with the gall to make a permanent pigment, as Indian ink may be made, and that the 'cure' had been of the same kind as that which is now effected by tattooing, the pigment having been applied either in that way or as in Galen's copper ink. (The καὶ δηχθεῖς διατρίψει, 'being pricked therewith, he shall rub,' of 118 may imply either needle puncture or a preliminary eschar.) It is said that fish-gall has been used in Persia in modern times to 'cure' corneal opacities (Bissell in Lange, ad loc.); but the folk-lore is again fragmentary, and the scientific explanation wanting.

The other cases of blindness cured are miraculous (Jn. 9:1 Mk. 8:22 Mt. 9:27, and the case or cases at Jericho in the Synoptics). In the first

3. In Gospels. two use is made of saliva, in the third there is only the touch of the hand, in the fourth only the word spoken (in two accounts). The use of fasting saliva (which is the more alkaline) for sore eyes occurs in all folk-lore, ancient and modern.

¹ Ox-gall is so prepared for the use of water-colour artists, its effect being to make an emulsion of the carbon particles of lead pencil and fix them in the tissue of the paper. The emulsifying effect of adding ox-gall to lamp black in water is easily shown in a watchglass, a serviceable sepia being produced. There is also a physiological experiment which shows that ox-gall added to oil causes it to soak through a moist animal membrane.

In the case at Alexandria given by Tacitus (Hist. 4 81), Vespasian took the precaution to learn from his physicians whether the man who solicited the exercise of imperial virtue were actually a curable subject.

In the circumstantially narrated case of Jn. 9:1, the man was born blind. Strictly, that should mean some congenital defect of structure in the eyes, of which the varieties are many; but one who had suffered from ophthalmia at birth, and had retained the more or less serious effects of it, would be classed also as born blind.

The bodily infirmity of Paul, referred to by himself in Gal. 4:13-15, is best explained as an acute attack of

4. Paul? ophthalmia. We may safely follow Weizsäcker (Ap. Zeit. iii., 2, § 1) in assuming that he would not have written, 'ye would have dug out your own eyes to give to me,' had not his infirmity been of the eyes.¹ The compliment to the Galatians, that they 'neither set at naught nor abhorred my bodily trial' (πειρασμὸν, which is commonly used for a temptation or volitional trial), implies some malady at once externally shown, and repulsive in its nature. Ophthalmia might well be repulsive—the eyes red, swollen, and rendering a whitish filmy matter, the tears overflowing, the eyelids blinking from the intolerance of light, and the face contorted by spasms of pain in the eyeballs and in the forehead and temples. All the while it is unattended by general fever (Pruner, l.c.). The medical diagnosis involves a point of grammar,—the use of διὰ in δι' ἀσθένειαν τῆς σαρκός. In poetry (see the Lexicons) it is used for duration—e.g., διὰ νύκτα—and if it were allowable to give διὰ this sense in NT the text of Gal. 4:13 would have the intelligible meaning 'right through bodily infirmity I preached etc.' which would also be in keeping with the apostle's known zeal. The diagnosis of an acute attack of ophthalmia, throughout which he had preached (as it was not impossible to do), would enable us to assume some permanent after-effect (trachoma), such as would explain the references to his 'weak' or contemptible 'presence,' and perhaps his inability to recognise the high priest (Acts 23:5). It is singular also that the σκόλοψ τῆ σαρκί of 2 Cor. 12:7 is the same word that is used of eyes as tormented, in Nu. 33:55 Ⓞ—σκόλοπες ἐν τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς.

Here Buzi possibly points for the origin of the prophet's family to some district near N. Arabia, or to the region of Gad (see BUZ).¹ His priestly character comes out clearly enough in his book; he was, in fact, a member of that Zadokite clan which toward the close of the seventh century was on the point of getting complete control of the worship of Yahwè in Palestine (see ZADOK, 1); his whole tone is that of a man who belonged to the governing sacerdotal body.

The prophet's youth was probably spent in the temple at Jerusalem, where his education would consist chiefly in training in the ritual and moral law and in the history of his people; whether the priestly youth then received specific literary training, we do not know. The two chief educational influences of his time were doubtless the cultus-centralisation of Josiah (see ISRAEL, §§ 37 ff.) and the teaching of Jeremiah; Josiah's reform must have heightened the esprit de corps of the Jerusalem priestly college, and have paved the way for the complete organisation of the temple-ministers, the new law-book (contained in Deuteronomy) furnishing the starting-point for detailed codification; Jeremiah's teaching suggested broad prophetic views of the ethical-religious condition and needs of the nation. Ezekiel's writings show how greatly he was influenced by his older contemporary.

His home career was cut short in the year 597 by the Chaldean capture of Jerusalem and deportation of a large number of the people to Babylonia. In the account in Kings (2 K. 24:10-16) it is said that with king Jehoiachin and his household all the princes, warriors, and craftsmen were carried to Babylon. This statement cannot be taken literally, since it appears, from the book of Jeremiah, that a considerable number of princes and fighting men were in Jerusalem in Zedekiah's time; but no doubt the deportation included many of the best people (Jer. 52:28; cp ISRAEL, § 41). There is no mention, either in Kings or in the book of Ezekiel, of priests among the exiles. The omission may be accidental; Ezekiel at any rate was among those carried away. This appears from the fact that he dates his prophecies from the deportation of Jehoiachin (everywhere except in 11) and that he calls it 'our captivity' (33:21). Possibly he was singled out by Nebuchadrezzar as a chief man among the priests, or as the representative of a prominent priestly family, though he was certainly neither 'chief priest' nor 'second priest' (cp 2 K. 25:18).

Ezekiel's age when he left Judæa can only be guessed at. His call to the prophetic office came in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity (1:2), 592 B. C., when he was possibly about thirty years old.² In this case his birth-year would be approximately 622; he may, however, have been older.

The 'thirtieth year' of 1:1, given by him as the date of his prophetic call, cannot, as the text stands, refer to his age (Origen); that would be expressed in Hebrew differently (see Kings, passim). Nor was it the custom of the prophets or their editors to give the writer's age (see the prophetic books, passim); the epoch is always a political or a national one—the accession of a king, or an earthquake (Am. 1:1), or there is simply mention of the kings under whom the prophet prophesied. In Ezek. 1:1, then, the epoch is in all probability political or in some way national. The only event in Israel's history of this date (622) is the introduction of the moral and ritual reform (Deuteronomy) by Josiah (2 K. 22). This is adopted by Ewald and Jerome. There is no reason, however, to suppose that it was a generally recognised epoch. Still less is there ground for taking the Jubilee year as the starting-point (see CHRONOLOGY, § 1, end); it was, as far as we know, never so used except for land-transactions. For other explanations see Carpov, Introd. The supposition of a Babylonian reckoning (Scaliger) is in itself not unnatural if we consider Ezekiel's fondness for Babylonian ideas and customs, and the fact that the Jews after a while adopted the Babylonian names of months (see MONTH, § 3). No appropriate Babylonian date, however, has yet been found; the era of Nabopolassar, if it be a real era, begins according to the Canon of Ptolemy in 625, not thirty but thirty-three years before 592. It is possible that the number thirty in Ezek. 1:1 is a very early corruption of 'five,' or, conceivably, the alteration of a scribe who wished to bring Ezekiel's forty (40) into accord with Jeremiah's seventy (Jer. 25:11), and therefore makes the prophet's writing begin in the thirtieth year of the captivity (see Duhn, Bertholet).¹ Cp CHRONOLOGY, § 1, col. 774 f.

² Josephus (Ant. x. 73) says that he was a boy when he was carried away; but this is either a guess, or an unsupported tradition.

We must leave the question unsettled till the Babylonian history and the Hebrew text have been cleared up. However this point may be decided, we may regard it as reasonably certain that the prophet's active career extended from the fifth to the twenty-seventh year of Jehoiachin's captivity (29:17), 592-570 B. C.

Ezekiel's life in Babylonia appears to have been outwardly quiet and comfortable. The captives were

3. Life. settled at Tel-abtib on the river Kebar, not far from the city of Babylon (see CHIEBAR, TEL-ABIB). They formed a separate community, had their elders (8:1), engaged in agriculture (Jer. 29:5-7), and were probably left undisturbed on condition of paying a tax to the Babylonian government (cp Wildeboer, Letterkunde, 206). Ezekiel was married, and had his own house (8:1); the death of his wife was made the occasion of a symbolical act of warning to the people (24:15-24); there seems no reason to doubt the reality of the procedure.

After his call as prophet his life was spent in the endeavour to open the eyes of the exiles to the significance of current events, to make them see what the captivity meant, and to what a future they were destined. He had to struggle against the moral and religious levity of the mass of the people (33:30-32), the torpor and idolatry even of the principal men (14:1-5), and the evil influence of the morally blind prophets and prophetesses (13). He was respected by the people as a predictor, and perhaps admired as an orator; but the moral side of his teaching was not generally comprehended (8:1; 14:1; 33:32). There was, however, a sympathetic kernel (20:33-38).

In his last years, when Jerusalem had been destroyed and the popular excitement of struggle and hope had given place to the quiet of acknowledged defeat, Ezekiel gave himself up to contemplation of the new organisation of the nation, to whose speedy return to its land he ardently looked forward (chaps. 40-48). This is the only indication of development of thought in his prophetic career; he began as denouncer, he ended as consoler and organiser of his people. The turning-point in his work was the destruction of Jerusalem; the worst accomplished, he set himself to build up. This general unity of thought may suggest that he was already a mature man when he began his prophetic work. When and how he died we do not know.²

Ezekiel is a particularly interesting and important figure in the history of the OT religion, for the reason

4. Historical place. that he represents the transition from the prophetic to the priestly period. Both a prophet and a priest, he sympathised with, and did justice to, both tendencies of thought. In this respect he differs from Jeremiah, who, though a priest, felt little interest in the ritual. Ezekiel, as prophet, was alive to the dependence of the people on the immediate word of God, to the necessity, that is, of a constant living contact between the mind of God and the mind of man; but, as priest, he also saw that the people had reached a stage which demanded a more precise formulation of the law of worship. He lived on the verge of a great religious revolution—the abolition, namely, of idolatry, and the establishment of the sole worship of Yahwè in Israel. The religious leaders of Josiah's time, both priests and prophets, had with true insight insisted on the necessity of centralising the worship at Jerusalem in order to destroy the corrupt local cults. Ezekiel carries on the fight for ethical monotheism, not only by denouncing the worship of other gods than Yahwè as the source of the national misfortunes, but also, more effectively, by furthering that strict organisation of the cultus which alone could train the people to the purer worship of the one God of Israel.

It would perhaps be going too far to say that Ezekiel saw the full historical significance of the principles which he maintained, or that he was wholly uninfluenced by desire to increase the importance and power of his order; but it is fair to assume that, as a man of genius, he saw both the evil of his time and its remedy. He thus paved the way for the next great movement of Israelitish society. He was the last of the prophets—prophetism accomplished its work in securing substantially the victory of monotheism. The writers who are massed under the name of the Second Isaiah are seers rather than prophets, and the post-exilic prophetic books are only the last strains of an expiring impulse, without the spontaneity and power of their predecessors, and largely dominated by the priestly spirit. Ezekiel is both true prophet and true priest, and harmonises the two vocations; in insisting on the ritual he does not cease to be a preacher of righteousness, and he thus enables us to see that the priestly period is not antagonistic to, but only the continuation of, the prophetic period.

Ezekiel seems to have been a bold, determined man, well fitted to deal with the humours of an obstinate people (34-11), showing no tenderness for his nation (his only exhibition of tender feeling is on the occasion of his wife's death, 2416), vigorous and strong in word and deed (326 141-3 2120[25] and the play on his name in 38 f.), lacking in fineness and discrimination. His favourite designation of himself as 'son of man' (21 and passim) is intended to mark his sense of his own insignificance in the presence of the divine majesty, and, because he regarded himself as simply the mouthpiece of God, he was unflinching before men. He seems, however, to have been profoundly discouraged at the outset; for six years he did not speak in public, and at a later time he interpreted his silence as the result of a divine command (326).

Ezekiel's literary style resembles his character—it is rich and vigorous, but lacking in simplicity and grace; he produces striking effects by the heaping up of particulars (16 20 23 27 29 etc.) and is especially powerful in denunciation (26 31 f. etc.). His imagination is impetuous and titanic, but unchastened. There is great variety in the form of his presentation: he abounds in vision, parable, and allegory, has some of the finest examples of the Hebrew ḥinnā ('lamentation,' see LAMENTATION), and is fond of geographical detail. He has preserved several mythic figures. Some of his discourses certainly were written, not pronounced (325). They all give evidence of careful literary composition; in him the old prophetic oratory is rapidly disappearing.

Ezekiel shows a marked friendliness toward Babylonia. He is the staunch advocate of Nebuchadrezzar (notwithstanding the king's idolatry) against Israel, Egypt, and Tyre. He borrows imagery (the cherub) from Babylonian architecture, and literary (and probably geographical) material from Babylonian books or men. It is not unlikely that his great scheme of temple-organisation was influenced by what he saw around him in Babylonia, and he possibly began the adoption of a part of the Babylonian material which is now found in Gen. 1-11.

Ezekiel's prophecies have come down to us in a relatively good state of preservation. They contain scribes' errors and expansions, and were probably revised by the prophet in his later years; but there is no good reason to doubt that the book is from his pen. On this point no important doubts were expressed before the present century.¹

1. Authorship and date.

Zunz (Gottesd. Vortr. 1832; ZDMG. 1873) places the work in the Persian period (in the 5th century B.C.) on the ground of the non-mention of Ezekiel by Jeremiah, its non-prophetic specific predictions (Zedekiah [12 12 f.], Zerubbabel [17 22 ff.]), the improbability of a prophet's drawing up a new constitution (40-48) soon after the destruction of the temple, the existence of material belonging to the post-exilic period (treatment of angels, 9 f.; mention of the late non-Jewish personages Noah, Daniel, Job; use of the name 'Persia'), imitation of Jeremiah, employment of the era of the exile, linguistic resemblances to Job and later books, use of Pentateuch words, and Aramaisms.²

These and similar considerations are by no means decisive. The nature of Hebrew prophetic and historical writing makes the silence of Jeremiah intelligible (Jeremiah himself is not mentioned in Kings), and Ezekiel was perhaps little known in Jerusalem in Jeremiah's time; the reference to Zedekiah's blindness is not dated and may have been inserted in the revision, and Zerubbabel is not mentioned; only before the Second Temple could such a constitution as Ezekiel's have been drawn up; the angels in chap. 9 (if the personages in v. 2 be so considered) act much as those of Zechariah sixty years later; Noah, Daniel, and Job were doubtless old-Israelitish heroes of tradition; the name 'Persia' may have been known in Babylonia in Nebuchadrezzar's time, though it is doubtful whether Ezekiel's Paras is our Persia (see PARAS); and the vocabulary of the book of Ezekiel does not differ from that of Jeremiah more than the different surroundings of the two men may naturally account for.³ The Aramaisms are probably due to later scribes. On the other hand, the general tone of the book is different from that of the post-exilic prophets and particularly from that of Daniel—it has nothing in common with them but an incipient apocalypse: Israel is struggling with idolatry, is to be chastised and purified, is in definite historical relations with certain nations. The religious and political situations are the same in Ezekiel as in Jeremiah.

Some peculiarities of form and expression in the book are most easily explained by the supposition that the prophet in his last years revised his discourses, making alterations and additions suggested by subsequent events.

It is distinctly stated that the section 29 17-20 is such an addition. It is not impossible that the whole of the first part

2. Supposed revision.

¹ On the Talmudic tradition (Bab. Bathr. 14 b) that 'the men of the Great Synagogue wrote Ezekiel' (where 'wrote' may hint at editorial work by later scholars), see CANON, § 19 f.

² Zunz's arguments are repeated, with additions, by others. Seinecke (GVV, 1876) fixes the date of the book at 164 B.C. on the ground of imitation of Daniel ('Son of man'), and from the 430 (300+40) of Ezek. 4, which he reckons onward from 594 (5th year of the captivity of Jehoiachin). The 390 of MT is, however, to be corrected, after Φ , to 190. Geiger (Urschr. p. 23, and Nachgelass. Schr. 283) adopts Zunz's conclusions. M. Vernes (Du prétend. polyth. des Hébr.), exaggerating the arguments of Reuss, regards our book as a collection of fragments edited about 200 B.C. E. Havet (La modernité des proph.) identifies Gog with the Parthians, 40 B.C., and thinks that chaps. 40-48 were composed at the time when Herod conceived the plan of reconstructing the temple. Chaps. 38 f. are assigned by Wi. (NOF 2 160 ff.) to B.C. 334-333, and 27 9b-25a is considered by Manchot (JPT 14 423 ff.) and Bertholet (Hesek. to be an interpolation.

(chaps. 1-24, which precedes the fall of the city) is coloured by the (later acquired) knowledge of the capture of Jerusalem, though the general announcements of impending destruction (chaps. 4-7, 12 etc.) may be simply proofs of the prophet's wise reading of the signs of the times. Specific predictions, as in 12 13 24 2, may be regarded as later insertions.

The unity of style may suggest a complete final revision.

The section above referred to, 20¹ 17-20 (which recognises error in the preceding prediction, 20¹²), shows, however, that the prophet was not greatly concerned to remove discrepancies from his text (Cornill), else he would have erased 20¹². How much of the earlier matter (chaps. 1-24) was spoken or written, it is difficult to say. The prophet declares that he was dumb from his call till the reception of the news of the capture of the city (32 6 f. 33 22), yet he is also said to speak to the captives (11 25 21 5 [20 49] 33 30 f.). The 'dumbness' may mean that he did not address the people in public, but confined himself to conversation or discourse in his own house.

Ezekiel may have written notes of his discourses and afterwards expanded them. It is not necessary to suppose that he was very highly esteemed before the fall of the city; with his greater fame and authority in his later years would come the occasion of careful literary revision. There seems no necessity to suppose that he really composed the book at the end of his life (Reuss, Kuenen). Whether the dates given to the various groups of predictions are trustworthy is disputed (Kuenen).

Some of the inscriptions in MT are clearly scribes' errors. Kuenen observes that chap. 17 cannot belong to the sixth year of Zedekiah (such is the date given in 8 r) since Zedekiah had not then revolted, and that the reference to Egypt is not borne out by Jer. 27 3. This remark is pertinent if the date given at 8 r be held to reach to the next mention of date (20 1); and if the date does not go on, then chap. 17 and other sections must be regarded as undated. Kuenen would take the inscriptions as merely a setting inserted long afterwards by the prophet.

It is perhaps better to say that they represent a real chronology, but have suffered from scribal and other errors.

Most of Ezekiel's visions seem to be without the definite psychological basis which may be recognised in such experiences as those of Amos 7 1-8.

3. The visions. The pictures given in chaps. 1 8-10 40-48 are too elaborate for a moment of ecstasy—they are, in their present form, the product of careful study and composition, based on Is. 6, on the prophet's knowledge of the Jerusalem temple, and on Babylonian monuments. Ezekiel in these cases used the vision as a mere literary form. For this reason doubt must attach also to the psychological reality of the vision of dry bones (chap. 37), though this falls more nearly in the region of possibility. It seems impossible to decide whether all the symbolical actions described by him were really performed. Some (12 1-7, going into exile, and 24 18, behaviour on the death of his wife) are simple enough for performance; that of 4 1-8 (siege of Jerusalem) presents serious difficulties (see the commentaries).¹

The MT is in bad condition. It is full of scribes' changes and additions, and is in some places unintelligible.

4. Text. Examples are chap. 1 (which must be compared with and corrected by 10) 4 5 9 (300 for 190) 7 1-4, doublet of 7 5-9, 12 1-10 13 20 19 21 8-17 24 1-13 26 17 f. 27 28 11-16 32 17-32 33 11-16 40-48 and many other passages.

For the correction of the text the most important instrument is G, which, though itself abounding in errors, often offers or suggests the true reading. The Pesh. and Vg. are of less use, and the Targum is almost worthless for text-criticism. The other versions (Copt., Ethiop., Arab.) have some value for the establishment of the Greek and Syriac texts. For an excellent account of the versions see Cornill, Ezekiel.

One reason for the thoroughgoing revision which late Hebrew scribes made of the text of this book is probably to be found in the boldness of Ezekiel's expressions, which, it was felt, needed to be toned down or explained; and there is, in addition, the general tendency of scribes to modify a much-read book in accordance with the ideas of their own times. The corruption of the text, however, while it obscures certain passages, does not affect the general thought of the book.

The book of Ezekiel was no doubt canonised along with the other prophetic books (see Ecclus. 498 and cp the

5. Admission to Canon. prologue) when the second canon was made up (probably in the 3rd century B.C.; see CANON, §§ 39 ff.), and its canonical authority has since been generally recognised by Jews and Christians. It is not directly quoted in the NT, but its imagery and its picture of the future are in part adopted in the Apocalypse (Rev. 4 2 f. 6 f. 208 21 12 f. 16 22 1 f.). It did not, however, in early times entirely escape suspicion.

When in the first century of our era the necessity of fixing the canon led to a severe examination of the traditionally sacred books, the attention of Jewish scholars was directed to the obscurity and apparent mysteriousness of Ezekiel's opening¹ and closing sections (chap. 1, called markābā 'the chariot,' and 40-48), and these, as we learn from Jerome (Pref. letter to his Comm. on Ezek.), it was forbidden the Jewish youth to read till they reached the age of thirty years. More serious difficulty was occasioned by the discrepancies between Ezekiel's ritual scheme (chaps. 40-48) and that of the Pentateuch (Ménach. 45 a); but these were satisfactorily explained, it is said (Shab. 13 b Haag. 13 a), by a certain Hananiah, who appears to have lived in the first half of the first century of our era.

Doubtless it was felt that difficulties of the kind just mentioned must not be allowed to set aside the strong evidence for Ezekiel's prophetic authority.²

Ezekiel shows many points of contact with Jeremiah. This is probably in part the result of identity of sur-

6. Dependence on Jeremiah. roundings and education; but there seems also to be direct dependence.

Ezekiel may well have been a hearer of Jeremiah in his youth, and have seen his writings or heard of his discourses after the deportation to Babylonia. He has in fact expanded certain of Jeremiah's texts; possibly, however, the two prophets borrowed from a common source.

Contents of the book.—The central thought of the book is that Jerusalem (which at this time substantially

7. Politics and ethics. comprised the nation in Judaea) was hopelessly bad and doomed to destruction, and that the future of the people lay with the exiles in Babylon. This view (which was held by Jeremiah also) had a double basis, political and moral-religious. Politically, the two great prophets held that it was insane folly to oppose Babylon, and, in fact, it may seem to us absurd in a city like Jerusalem to defy the conqueror of Western Asia. A similar position was taken by the party which, in the siege by Titus, counselled submission to the Romans; and the conduct of Jeremiah in this regard was not different from that of Josephus. The princes of Ezekiel's time took the same position as the Zealots of the Roman siege. In both cases the war-party denounced the advocates of submission as traitors: Jeremiah suffered for his opinion, Ezekiel was too far off to be assailed,—more precisely, it does not appear from his book that the exiles took sides with one or the other party. At this distance of time it is hard to judge of the situation. The war-sentiment may have been really patriotic, and, considering the strength of Jerusalem (it had successfully resisted Sennacherib, 2 K. 19 36), not necessarily mad, and it may be doubted whether the prophet is justified (17 16) in regarding Zedekiah as a traitor.

As to the moral and religious side, there was, no doubt, ground for the dark picture of the city drawn by the prophets, though it is not to be inferred that Jerusalem was worse than other cities. From Amos downwards the prophets had held that the idolatry and the moral depravity of the people must all down punishment from the righteous God of Israel. In Ezekiel's time a catastrophe was plainly imminent—it was looked on as the retributive dispensation of Yahwè. In that ease, the withdrawal of a part of the people, their safe establishment in the conqueror's land, was to be regarded as an act of mercy—from this saved remnant would come the renewed nation whose future was held to be guaranteed by the promise of Yahwè. Such is Ezekiel's position. Yet in the morally dull body of exiles around him he found much to condemn, and he therefore expected a sifting of this mass before the return to Canaan (20^{37 f.}). Apart from this particular view his aim is the establishment of moral and religious purity in the nation.

² The statement of Josephus (Ant. x. 5 1) that Ezekiel wrote two books may be based on a division of the present work into parts (1-39 and 40-48, or 25-32 may have been a separate book), or may possibly refer to an apocryphal work. The citations in Clem. Al. (Ped. 1 10) and Tertullian (De Carne Christi) point perhaps to an apocryphal Ezekiel-book, or to some collection of the sayings of the prophets. See Fabric. Pseudep.; Carpov, Introd.; Wildeboer, Letterkunde.

The book may be divided into two parts: the body of prophetic discourses (1-39), and the new constitution (40-48); or into the minatory (1-32) and the consolatory (33-48).

If we omit chaps. 40-48 the discourses fall into three divisions: (i.) those delivered up to the beginning of the siege (1-24); (ii.) those directed against foreign nations, apparently while the siege was going on (25-32); and (iii.) the consolatory pictures of the future (33-39).

i. The first of these groups is (a few sentences excepted) wholly minatory. We have first, as general introduction, the history of the prophet's call (1-3). There is a magnificent theophany.

Yahwè appears seated on a celestial chariot-throne, which is supported and moved by four creatures, each with four wings and four faces (man, lion, ox, eagle), the whole surrounded by a rainbow-like brightness; the composite creatures (called cherubs in chap. 10), probably partly of Babylonian origin or suggested by Babylonian forms (a survival of primitive beast-worship) here symbolise the completeness of the divine attributes; the whole appearance sets forth the majesty of Yahwè, and its presence in Babylonia is intended to indicate that the God of Israel had now taken up his abode in Babylonia with the exiles.

From the mouth of God the prophet receives his commission to act as moral and religious guide of the people.

His message is symbolised by a book-roll which he is ordered to eat (2.1-3.21); and, in view of the moral dullness of the exiles (cp Is. 6.7.10), he is further commanded to be dumb, that is, not to address the people orally (3.22-27) till permission shall be given him to speak (see 24.27 33.22); his discourses were to be written, but not delivered.¹

His prophetic work begins with a series of symbolical actions (4.1-5.4), in which are dramatically represented the siege of the city, the famine, and the destruction or dispersion of its inhabitants; in the following discourse against Jerusalem (5.5-17) this threat is stated and explained in literal terms. Similar punishment is predicted (6) for the mountains of Israel, with special reference to the rural idolatry, and a passionate denunciation (7) closes with the declaration that Yahwè will abandon the land to its enemies.

At this point the discourses are interrupted by a theophanic vision the object of which is to set forth clearly the fact that Yahwè no longer dwelt in his temple at Jerusalem, but had withdrawn himself so that it might be given over to destruction.

First comes (8) a striking picture (in vision) of the idolatrous cults of Jerusalem, including the worship of the image of jealousy (see IDOL., §§ 1(c), 5), of Adonis (see TANMUTZ), and of the sun, this last cult being probably of Assyrian origin (in 7. 17, instead of 'they put the branch to their nose' read 'they are a stench in my nostrils'); then follows the vision of the smiting of the city (9); the prophet, or perhaps a scribe, here pauses (10) in order to identify the creatures of chap. 1 with cherubs (the text of the chapter is corrupt and difficult), the purpose being to point out that the divine presence of the vision was identical with that of the inner shrine of the temple; and the vision closes (11) with a denunciation of the war-party in the city (zv. 1-13) and a promise of restoration to the exiles (zv. 14-25).

With chap. 12 the minatory predictions are resumed.

The prophet represents in symbols the exile of the people and the king (zv. 1-16), and the famine of the siege (zv. 17-20), and adds the assurance that the fulfilment of the threat is near at hand (zv. 21-28). Next comes a denunciation (13) of the prophets and prophetesses who divined for pay without regard to moral-religious principle, speaking false words of comfort to the people. To certain elders of Israel the prophet declares that idolaters and deceived prophets (men deceived by Yahwè himself) shall be destroyed (cp Dt. 13.1-5 [2-6]); and that good men in an evil land shall save only themselves by their righteousness (14)—that is, there is no hope for Jerusalem. After comparing Jerusalem to a worthless wild vine (15), the prophet in an elaborate and striking allegory (16), an historical review, describes the city as an unfaithful wife, worse than Samaria and Sodom, yet ultimately to be united with them in the fear of Yahwè; the crime of Sodom is said to be pride. This city, which he here in imagination exhumes, seems to represent for him the southern region, which had natural connections with Judah. He adds a denunciation of what he calls the treachery of king Zedekiah in turning from Babylon to Egypt, and appends a promise of national restoration (17). In connection with this promise, in order that the exiles may not be deceived by false expectations, he declares, against the popular notion of the moral solidarity of the family, that they shall be judged individually, each man standing or falling for himself (18; cp Jer. 31.29 f. Dt. 24.16). A couple of laments follow (19), one for kings Jehoahaz and Jehoiachin, the other for the nation, after which comes a remarkable review of the national history (Heb. 20, EV 20.1-44), the prophet making the charge that from the beginning Israel had been rebellious (a different view in Hos. 2.17 [15] Jer. 2.2).¹ As the end approaches, his words become fiercer: a prediction of the desolation of Judah and Jerusalem (Heb. 21.1-12, EV 20.45-21.7), a dithyrambic (textually corrupt) ode of the avenging sword (Heb. 21.13-22, EV 21.8-17), a description of the march of the king of Babylon to Jerusalem, and the overthrow of Zedekiah (Heb. 21.23-32, EV 21.18-27), with an appended prediction of the destruction of the Ammonites who had gloried over Israel (Heb. 21.33-37, EV 21.28-32), and a detailed indictment of Jerusalem for her moral and religious crimes (22), the ethical and ritual being cursorily mingled. A second elaborate allegory (23) describes the religious debauchery of Samaria and Jerusalem; the careers of the two cities are represented as parallel, only Jerusalem is said to have excelled her sister in evil (a proof that the prophet saw no great difference between the religious constitutions of the northern and southern kingdoms). Finally he announces (24) that the king of Babylon has begun the siege of Jerusalem, and sings a song of vengeance on the city; at this juncture his wife dies, and he is commanded, as a sign, to make no mourning for her—so shall the people's terrible punishment crush them into deadness of feeling.

Here comes a pause. The prophet is waiting for the news of the fall of the city, and 10. Chaps. 25-32: in this interval is placed the second Foreign nations. group.

ii. The prophecies against foreign nations (25-32).

Whether these were all (except 29.17-20) uttered at this time (as the prefixed dates declare), or were merely here massed for convenience of arrangement, we have no means of determining (see Kuenen, Onderz. (2) ii., § 62). We may compare the arrangements of similar prophecies in Isa. and Jer. (MT and 6); it is perhaps intended to represent the humiliation of foreign nations as a natural antecedent to the exaltation of Israel (cp 35).

First to be dealt with are the Palestinian peoples—Ammonites, Moabites, Edomites, Philistines—(25, in v. 8 omit 'and Seir'). The charge against them is purely political—hostility to Israel—and they are all threatened with destruction. The prophet speaks not from an ethical but from a simply national point of view, there being no reason to suppose that these peoples were morally inferior to the Babylonians or the Israelites.

11. Tyre. Next comes one of the most splendid passages of the Old Testament, the prophecy against Tyre (26.1-28.19), consisting of several discourses.

The ground of Ezekiel's fierce hatred of the great city is not clear—hardly commercial rivalry, as 26.2 has been understood to say, for Jerusalem had no great commercial ambition. A partial explanation is perhaps given in Jer. 27.1-11, in which Tyre, along with other powers, appears as trying to entice Zedekiah into a revolt against Babylon—a heinous crime in the eyes of both Jeremiah and Ezekiel.

The point of view of these prophets was a twofold one; on the one hand, they thought submission to Babylon the condition of peace for Judah (Jer. 27 11); but, on the other hand, they held the destruction of the existing Judæan régime to be necessary for the national future of prosperity—and revolt was the necessary antecedent to this destruction. How they harmonised these two points of view does not appear.

A more general explanation of Ezekiel's position is that he regarded the rich and splendid Tyre as embodying an anti-Yahwistic cult and an anti-Israelitish civilisation, dangerously seductive for Judah; a central prophetic principle was the untainted development of the native civilisation. We should naturally suppose that Babylon would be thought equally dangerous. It was not so. Babylon is only honoured and defended, and the reason of this is that every other consideration was swallowed up in the conviction that Nebuchadrezzar was the only hope of deliverance from the present evil. A few years later (Is. 47 1) the circumstances changed, and with them the tone of the prophets toward Babylon.

Ezekiel first describes the siege and capture of Tyre (26; cp 29 17-20), introducing an exquisite little hinnu or lament (v. 17 f.). On this follows the historically valuable description of the Tyrian commerce (27), the text of which is unfortunately in very bad condition.¹ Turning to the prince of Tyre (28), the prophet first taunts him for his inordinate pride, and predicts for him a shameful death (28 1-10), then represents him as having dwelt in the divine garden of Eden, under the protection of the cherub (so the Heb. text must be corrected), whence he was expelled for his pride. We apparently have here the Babylonian Eden-story, out of which that of Gen. 2 f. was shaped by monotheistic transformation (see CHERUB, § 2). A prediction of destruction against Sidon is added, with a word of promise to Israel (28 20-26).

The next section (29-32) is devoted to Egypt, which, like Tyre, was an anti-Yahwistic power (opposed by the 12. Egypt. prophets from Hosea onwards) and an enemy of Babylon. The coming desolation of the land is described, with promise of partial restoration, yet so that it should never again be a powerful kingdom (29 1-16),—a prediction which was literally fulfilled; and it is added that Egypt should compensate Nebuchadrezzar for his ill-success with Tyre (29 17-20), which he may have captured (on this point we have not certain information), but certainly did not spoil (for early explanations see Jos. Ant. x. 11 1, Cont. Ap. 1 21, and Jerome on this passage of Ezekiel). Here again the prophet interjects a word of hope for his people (29 21).

The picture of desolation is repeated in the next discourse (30) with interesting geographical details. The king is then represented (31) as a noble tree destined to be felled (in v. 3, read: 'behold, there was a cedar in Lebanon,' etc.), and as the Nile monster at whose death darkness shall cover the land (32 1-16; but see DRAGON, §§ 1 4). Finally, in an eloquent discourse (32 17-32) the Pharaoh is brought down to Shēōl, where he lies among the outcasts, those who had not received burial rites.

Turning now to Israel, after having announced

13. Chaps. the destruction of external enemies, 33-39. the prophet proceeds to give a new picture.

iii. The new subject is the future restoration; the occasion is the reception of the news of the fall of the city (33).

First comes a repetition of Ezekiel's commission as watchman (33 1-9 = 3 17-21) and of the principle of individual retribution (v. 10-20 = 18); this latter is for the encouragement of the exiles who were oppressed by the fear that they were doomed to destruction on account of their sins (v. 10), against which the prophet declares (looking to the return) that repentance will save them. When the news comes from the city, he points out the moral necessity of the desolation of the land, and deplors the levity of the exiles.

The first consolatory discourse (34) denounces under the figure of a flock the negligence and rapacity of the Judean leaders, and promises the people safe abode in a fruitful land united under a king of the Davidic dynasty (this was the natural expectation of the time, though the circumstances of the return made it impossible). The national feeling of the time comes out curiously in the appended announcement of the desolation of Edom (35)—the destruction of Israel's hostile and hated neighbour was held to be an essential feature of the restoration.

Next is promised a blessing on the soil (36)—the land should suffer no more under the evil renown of famine—Yahwè for his own sake would restore them; for their unfaithfulness to him (worship of other gods) he had scattered them, and had thus lost honour among the nations, being seemingly unable to provide for his own people—now he would show his power, his name should be accordingly revered among the nations, and he would give his people a new spirit of obedience which should save them from idolatrous defection.

The prophet goes on (37) to depict the national restoration under the figure of revived dry bones (v. 1-14), and the everlasting union of the two branches of the nation, Judah and Ephraim, by the uniting of two pieces of wood into one piece (v. 15-28).

The concluding discourse (38 f.) is a semi-apocalyptic picture of invasion and victory. At that time (circa 580) the Scythians had overrun north-western Asia, and an invasion of the Mediterranean coast might seem certain—this the prophet regarded as the last trial of Israel, ushering in the era of unclouded prosperity.¹ Ezekiel first describes (38) the mustering of the forces of Gog (by command of Yahwè, v. 4-8, according to the correct translation), their attack on Israel (v. 9-17), and their overthrow (v. 18-23), whereby Yahwè's power should be made known to many peoples. The defeat is then described in detail (39); the land should be filled with their weapons and corpses, their dead should all be buried in the valley of 'Abārim, in the mountains of Moab, E. of the Dead Sea (v. 11, emended text), the event should be a lesson to the nations, and for Israel there should be no more captivity.

iv. The last series of discourses (40-48) belongs to the picture of restoration; but by its character it separates itself from the rest of the book. It is the 14. Chaps. constitution of the reconstructed state, the 40-48. temple service being the central feature.

Ezekiel spends no time on the political and moral sides of the national life—these both were fixed by tradition; he is concerned with the ordering of the public rites of religion, in which he sees possibilities of reform, his special point being to destroy the old royal control of the cultus, and make temple and temple-ministers absolutely independent.

He gives first a plan of the new temple (40-42), apparently a reproduction of the temple of Solomon (1 K. 6 f. 2 Ch. 3 f.), with the details of which he, as priest, would be familiar; the text is, unfortunately, very corrupt. The vision of the Kebar bere reappears (43 1-9), the glory of Yahwè fills the temple (v. 1-5), returning after having abandoned the old temple (8-10); and the royal practice of building sepulchres by the temple (natural when this was a royal chapel) is forbidden (43 6-9). The divinely given form of the temple and its service is declared to be the essence of public religion (v. 10-12), and the altar and its consecrated offerings are described (v. 13-27). After mentioning the peculiar use of the eastern outer gate (44 1-3) the prophet announces that the idolatrous priests of the rural shrines are degraded to the rank of subordinate non-sacerdotal ministers (henceforth known distinctively as 'Levites'),² and gives the law of the priests' proper (v. 4-21). A sacred territory is then marked off (45 1-5) in the middle of the land, 25,000 by 20,000 cubits (about 7½ by 6 miles or 12 by 10 kilometres) for temple, priests, and Levites; south of this is the city (about 1½ miles or 2½ kilometres square, with territory on the E. and the W.), and on the E. and W. sides the domain of the prince. Various prescriptions follow: the obligations to be furnished by the people to the prince, and by him to the temple (45 9-17), the offering for cleansing the sanctuary (v. 18-20), and for the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles (v. 21-25), the function of the prince in the public service (46 1-15; in v. 13 f. read 'he' for 'thou'), the prince's control of his own property (reference to the débris or Jubilee-law) (v. 16-18), places for boiling and baking, the offerings (v. 19-24). Further, the blot on the land, the sterility of the Dead Sea, is to be removed; the prophet (47 1-12) sees a stream issue from the eastern front of the temple; it runs into the sea, whose waters are then healed and abound in fish (only certain marshes remain for the production of salt); on the banks of the river grow fruit-bearing trees. There is nothing in the text to indicate that this was not intended in the literal sense. The boundaries of the land are then given (47 13-21), agreeing in general with Nu. 34 2-12 (cp Josh. 15-19); the Jordan forms part of the eastern boundary. It is added that resident foreigners (of course, worshippers of Yahwè) are to have a share in the land (47 22 f.); this is an advance in liberality and in social organisation. The last chapter (48) gives the territories of the several tribes in parallel slips, seven on the N. and five on the S. of the central reserved territory (vv. 1-29), and the measurements and gates of the city (vv. 30-35), the sacred name of which is to be Yahwè Sammah, 'Yahwè is there' (cp Jer. 23 6 33 10).

Moral and religious position.—Ezekiel's writings state the principal ethical and religious problems and ideas of his time. His own opinions we may suppose to have been those of the most advanced priestly circle, though it may not always be possible to distinguish his individual views from the current opinion.

Ezekiel's ethical code is that of the prophets—of high character as far as regards the relations between Israelites, or, we may probably say, between individuals (of whatever nationalities). All the main social duties are insisted on in 18 and 22. As to foreign nations, the prophetic code says nothing of duties toward them—the social relations of the time had not created an international code. Ezekiel regards all nations hostile to Israel as morally bad and to be hated and given over to destruction. That his standard of judgment is not ethical, but political, is shown by the fact that he denounces Egypt and favours Babylon, the only difference between the two kingdoms being in their different relations to Israel.

It seems remarkable that the prophet shows no recognition of the greatness of the Egyptian and Phœnician civilisations. Another defect of his ethical scheme is his mingling of the moral and the ritual, as in 18 11-13 (where read 'has eaten [flesh] with the blood'), 22 6-12, in which the 'contempt of sacred things' probably means a violation of the ritual law, and the 'humbling of an unclean woman' is purely a matter of ritual. In 22 10 f. reference is made to certain marriages—namely with the wife of one's father, and with one's half-sister—which formerly legal (2 S. 16 22 Gen. 20 12), had been condemned by the advancing moral feeling in Ezekiel's time (cp Lev. 20 11 17). These things were wrong as violations of existing law; but we demand a clear distinction between them and purely moral offences.

On the other hand the prophet's sharp exposition of individual responsibility (18) is an advance on the older view which held men responsible for the sins of their fathers or their social chiefs. This principle did not originate with Ezekiel: it is found in Dt. 24 16 and Jer. 31 29 f.; but he elaborates it distinctly, and no doubt did much to give it currency. It must be added that he seems to give it a special application to the exiles, on whom he wished (on the eve, he supposed, of departure from Babylon) to impress the necessity of individual preparedness; nevertheless his words contain the universal principle. See ESCHATOLOGY, § 24 f.

As regards purity of religious conceptions Ezekiel occupies a position midway between the old Israelitism and the later Judaism or the

16. Idea of God. New Testament. With his higher prophetic thought are mingled survivals of the old ideas, and this admixture gives a curiously varied and picturesque character to his writing. In this respect he appears to fall below Amos, Isaiah, and Jeremiah—a result for which his priestly training was doubtless in part responsible. His conception of God is in the main that of all the prophets. He is practically monotheistic; he recognises no deity but the God of Israel, though from the paucity of his statements on this point (see, e.g., chap. 8) it is impossible to say whether he regarded other deities as having a real existence; it is perhaps significant that in such passages as 34 29 36 15 21 39 21, in which demonstration of Yahwè's power to other peoples is spoken of, nothing is said of their gods. It seems probable that his opinion was that of Jer. 2 11, that these gods were 'not gods.'

Though Ezekiel has no definite formula of absolute divine omnipresence, omniscience, and omnipotence, Yahwè is for him practically unlimited in place, time, knowledge, and power, the universal lord and judge, fashioning the fortunes of all men and peoples, using, and putting up and down whom he will. This seemingly universal conception is held along with the old tribal idea that the deity is attached to a definite place; Yahwè, however, abandons for a time his doomed temple

(1 28 10 19) and goes to Babylonia to remain till the new untainted temple shall be built (43 7). Yahwè is specifically the God of Israel, and has no friendly relations with other nations (34 30); he dwells in the land of Israel (37 26 f.), and particularly in the temple (10), of his sole proprietorship of which he is jealous (43 7 f.).

The coexistence in Ezekiel's mind of these unharmonious ideas is explained by the historical development; it was only gradually that Israel purified its religious conceptions, and Ezekiel's theology contains the germ of the later more spiritual view. The prophet probably thought of Yahwè as having definite human form (1 26); this pure physical anthropomorphism was an advance on the earlier theriomorphism (as in Egypt and Babylon) and formed the transition to the higher conception.

The ethical character ascribed by Ezekiel to Yahwè also shows diverse elements. In his relations with

17. Yahwè's character. Israel Yahwè is represented as inflexibly just, and as basing his judgments on moral grounds—he punishes his own people for their sins. This is the prophetic view which, though not confined to Israel, was most clearly announced by the Israelitish thinkers (Am. 3 2), and by them made a part of the world's religious thought. On the other hand, the Yahwè of Ezekiel lays great stress on ritual. In his dealings with other nations he has not risen entirely above the level of the old national god who cares only for his own people; his treatment of Egypt, Tyre, and the other peoples is not morally discriminating. The curious statement of 20 25 f., that he gave Israel evil, deadly, and polluting laws, is apparently intended to account for the presence, in the earlier legislation, of prescriptions (as that of Ex. 13 12) to which objection was taken in the prophet's time; these, says Ezekiel (in accordance with his conception of the divine absoluteness), were given by Yahwè as punishment for the people's disobedience (cp Mt. 19 8). Ezekiel (differing in this respect from Hosea and Jeremiah) does not ascribe to Yahwè tenderness. He generally represents him as animated against Israel and Jerusalem by fierce anger (see especially ehaps. 5 and 20). Still, he says of him (18 32) that he has no pleasure in inflicting death, but desires that sinners turn and live; that is, he desires his people's good (34), but is angry at and rigorously punishes defection. A primitive feature in Ezekiel's portraiture of Yahwè's character is the desire for renown which he ascribes to him (35 9 36 22 f. 38 23 etc.): Yahwè acts 'for his name's sake,' that is, that his name (himself) may be revered by the nations.

In this representation there is a well-developed conception of divine absoluteness—it is not for man but for himself that God acts (cp. the similar, yet discrepant, statements in Dt. 9 4-6 7 7 f.); and there is also the germ of a great moral and religious idea—the conviction that the truth of the worship of Yahwè will be the salvation of the nations; but in the prophet's mind this idea is obscured by excessive nationalism, the desire to exalt the national deity above all other deities, and so the nation above all other nations; he expresses no hope for the moral-religious reform of foreign peoples. In short, his conception of God has noble features dimmed by narrow national and low anthropomorphic elements.

He makes no mention of angels (unless the persons who are introduced in 9 2 are so to be regarded), of serāphim, or of evil spirits; but the non-mention is probably accidental.

18. Other beings. The 'spirit' which enters into him (2) and lifts him up (3 12 14 8 3 11 24) is (as in Judg. 14 19 1 K. 22 21 2 K. 2 16) a member of the heavenly court, sent by God to do certain things beyond ordinary human power; in 39 29 its function is to implant a new disposition in the mind (and here the expression 'pour out' indicates the beginning of a transition to the sense of 'influence' for the term 'spirit'). The cherub, to which Ezekiel several times refers, is of course no angel, but a figure of mythic origin, derived directly or indirectly from Babylonia. On the different representations of the cherub see CHERUB.

Ezekiel has the old-Israelitish view of the nature and destiny of man. He regards him as a free agent,

19. Man. capable of changing from bad to good, or from good to bad (18); of the conditions which may determine a man to be good or bad he says nothing, except that it is open to any one to consider the outcome of his ways (18:28). Shēōl, the world of the dead (see 26:20 31:14-17 32:17-32), is still without any trace of local division between the good and the bad (cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 10 f.); nor can it be said that any reference is made to the resurrection of the body, the description in 37:1-14 being figurative of the restoration of the nation to national life (so, explicitly, v. 11). Man, according to the prophet, works out his destiny and finds his happiness or unhappiness in this world; here God distributes rewards and punishments, awarding to nations prosperity or adversity, and inflicting on the wicked man the greatest calamity, premature death (18). Righteousness and sin are obedience and disobedience to the divine law, moral and ritual. Of the inward life, struggle against sin, love to God, the prophet says nothing (on 36:26 see below); it is the outward side that is considered. The chief reason for this is that the nation, not individual man, was the religious unit of the prophets (as of antiquity in general), and for the nation there could be only the external test of goodness. Salvation was thus, both for the nation and for the individual, deliverance from the outward ills of life, and endowment with all things good. It includes forgiveness of sins, and its condition is obedience to the law. For obedience there is needed a disposition or determination of mind. Israel, having been rebellious, must have implanted in it a new purpose and will, a 'new heart,' a 'heart of flesh' (36:26), yielding, sensitive to the divine will. Yahwē himself will do this. The same thing the prophet expresses by saying (36:27) that Yahwē will put within the nation his spirit, a new spirit (v. 26), the reference being to the idea expressed in Gen. 2:7 that man's vital breath is breathed into him by God (cp § 18, above). 'Heart' and 'spirit' are in the OT sometimes practically identical; each expresses the whole inward being (cp ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 12 19 f.). The prophet thus declares that Israel's inward nature shall be transformed in the respect that it shall hereafter have the will to obey. Though he has in mind directly only the statement of the fact that Israel will cease to be disobedient and become obedient (of which statement a natural Heb. form is that of 36:26 f.), yet in his conception of transformation (as in Jer. 31:33) we must see the germ of the NT idea of regeneration.

Ezekiel's representation of the future of Israel does not differ substantially from that of his predecessors.

20. Future of Israel. He expects the nation to be restored in peace to its own land, in which (after the struggle with Gog) it shall dwell for ever in prosperity under its kings. He says nothing of an individual human deliverer, there having been apparently at that time no prominent political figure either among the exiles or at home. He expects not an absolute theocracy but a royal government which shall respect and support the temple. A decided advance over earlier prophetic representations of the future is the more definite formulation of the idea of moral regeneration mentioned in the preceding paragraph. The hope for the union of Ephraim and Judah into one kingdom under a Davidic king (37:15-28) was a natural one at the time—the northern kingdom had long ceased to have a political existence; the fulfilment of this hope was made impossible by political conditions which the prophet could not foresee, since in his day Persia had not yet come to the front. The 'messianic' expectation proper did not arise till after his time. On his new constitution for the future kingdom see below, § 24.

Place in the history of the ritual.—The development of the sacrificial ritual which had been going on from the beginning of the national history received a special impulse toward the end of the seventh century. This was, in the first place, the result of that general growth in culture which is, as a rule, attended by growth in organisation. Israel, with its high religious endowment,

21. Interest in ritual. naturally advanced slowly and surely in the ordering of its outward religious life, as Rome did in the establishment of political principles. There were, besides, two facts, one internal, one external, that probably helped on the movement in the generation preceding Ezekiel's active life. The first of these was that the practical triumph of monotheism gave the leading men leisure to turn their attention more fully to the needs of the national worship; and some of these were accordingly not slow to take advantage of the favourable disposition of the young king Josiah, and to set on foot an attempt at centralisation. The other fact was the closer social contact with Assyria during the seventh century. Judah was an Assyrian vassal kingdom, the relation between the two powers was a peaceful one, and the less advanced in general culture would naturally borrow from the more advanced, especially as the Assyrians were Semites, and the Judeans felt nearer to them than to such a country as Egypt. Manasseh and his party adopted astral worship from Assyria (2 K. 21:3 23:5), and the Yahwē-worship, while protesting against these innovations, might get from their suzerain kingdom valuable suggestions for the better regulation of worship. Ezekiel belonged to the circle most interested in this movement, and from his writings we may form an idea of the changes which were proposed in his time; these, we may assume, represent not only his individual opinions, but also the views of his circle.

The first efforts of the reform party were directed toward the suppression of the rural shrines; its programme is embodied in Dt. 12:26—

22. Centralisation. work which doubtless represents the ideas of the leading men of the year 621. The next step would naturally be the further organisation of the sacrificial cultus, a point on which D has very little to say (18:1-8). Its provisions were probably known to and accepted by Ezekiel; the book may have been regarded as an authoritative but not a final statement of sacred law, and it forms the starting-point for the work of the succeeding generation. Little seems to have been done in the interval between the year 621 and the destruction of the city in 586; the energies of Jerusalem were absorbed by the political situation, and the leading prophet, Jeremiah, was not interested in the ritual (Jer. 7:22). It was in the quiet of the exile that the development of the ritual was carried on; to this work Ezekiel seems to have devoted himself in the last years of his life. Cp LAW LITERATURE.

The book of Ezekiel stands between Deuteronomy (=D) and the final priestly legislation (23. Ezekiel and other works on ritual. Lev. 1:16 27 Nu. Ex. 25-31 35-40 = P), and is in nearest relation with Lev. 17-26 (Law of Holiness = H).¹

With 18:20 of this last section (which is composite and of various dates) he agrees in the general conception of the position of the priest, the special sanctity of the sabbath (Ezek. 20:12 Lev. 19:30) and the marriage law (Ezek. 22:10 f. Lev. 18:15 19:20 11:17 f. cp Dt. 23:1 [23:30]). On the other hand the subsections Lev. 17:21-26 in their recognition of priests as Aaronides (21:7), in their greater elaboration of the ceremonies of the feasts (23), and in their development of the jubilee (25), appear to be later than Ezekiel; the earlier parts of H are probably contemporaneous with him, but they were added to in succeeding times.

The more particular relation between D, Ezek., and H is as follows:—

- i. Levites.—In D (18:1-8) all Levites are priests, in Ezek. (44:15) only Zadokites are priests, in H (21:1) only Aaronides.
- ii. Priests.—As to their general conduct, all the provisions of Ezek. (44:17-27) are found in H (Lev. 21:22 4:16) except the prohibition of woollen clothes and wine, and the command to act as judges, and H has many details not found in Ezek. D has nothing on this point except (17:9) the recognition of Levites as judges (an old institution). As to their support, D (18:1-4) is substantially reproduced in Ezek. (44.29 f.), but the latter adds a large gift of land for priests and Levites (45.48); this land-provision is peculiar to Ezek., but in Nu. 35.1-8 forty-eight cities are assigned to the whole tribe of Levi, and of these thirteen (Josh. 21.4) were for the priests; Ezek.'s proposed arrangement proved, in fact, to be impracticable. H alone mentions the high priest (21.10).

iii. Offerings.—D has no details. The offerings are of the same kind as in Ezek. and H, except that the latter does not mention the ḥōm ('guilt-offering,' 2 K. 12.16 [17]); neither has the elaborate sin-offering of Lev. 16. H is more detailed than Ezek. in the description (22.17-28) of sacrificial animals.

iv. Feasts.—D (16) has the three great festivals—Passover, Weeks, Booths—without sacrificial details; Ezek. (45.21-25) mentions only the first and the third of these, but with details of the materials (the omission of the feast of weeks is no doubt due to an oversight), and adds a special ceremony of purification of the sanctuary on the first day of the first and the seventh months (45.18-20, according to the Gk. text). H (23) gives, besides the three, the ceremony of the sheaf of first-fruits, the feast of trumpets, and the day of atonement (the ritual details are given more fully in Nu. 28 f.).

The impression made by comparison of Ezekiel and H is that the latter represents in general a more advanced ritualistic stage; but the differences between them are not so great as to require us to suppose that they are separated by a great interval of time. The main point is that Ezekiel expands the Deuteronomic scheme by a more precise formulation of the ritual.

The function assigned to the prince (peculiar to Ezekiel and never carried out; see PRINCE, 2) is to be noted. The omission of mention of furniture (ark and cherubs) in the most holy place is strange, especially as the cherub and the palm tree are introduced as ornaments; the omission is perhaps due to scribal error. Cp 1 K. 6.23-29, and the omission of the bronze altar in 1 K. 7 f.

Though the scheme given in 40-48 is put in the form of a vision, its minuteness of detail shows that the prophet had in mind a plan of organisation to be actually carried out on the return of the people to their land. It is all to be taken literally, even 47.1-12 for there is no exegetical ground for making a distinction between this section and the rest. The plan is an admirable one. Without encroaching on the proper functions of the state, it secures the absolute independence of the temple. The ministers of the sanctuary are to have their own lands and houses and revenues assured them by organic law; the prince is a servant of the temple, subordinate in this sphere to the priests; it is a genuine separation of Church and State, a provision which for that time was a necessity, if public religion was to have free course. The temple, the dwelling-place of Yahwè, is the centre of the national life (cp Hag. 27 Zech. 1.16 Mal. 3.1); the people are to be morally and ritually righteous, but the full conception of ritual sanctity (as in Zech. 14.2 f.) is not expressed. The other features of the scheme are less important.

The prophet reproduces the details of the temple of Solomon with a fidelity which shows not only that he attached great importance to the visible centre of worship, but also that he had closely studied its architecture and its service. It is hardly possible to restore the temple completely after his indications; but there is enough to show that the whole structure, including the enclosure, was pleasing and possibly imposing (see TEMPLE). The physical changes in the land expected by the prophet (47; cp Zech. 14.4-10 Is. 65.17-25 11.6-9) are not essential to his religious plan.

It is sometimes said that the measurements of the temple (42.15-20) and of the sacred territory (45.1) are geographically impossible, and that the prophet thus means to indicate that his scheme is an ideal one. The difficulty disappears when (with 6) we read 'cubit' instead of 'reed' in 42.15-20, and in accordance with this, supply 'cubit' in 45.1-6. The temple-enclosure will then be about 250 yards (or 225 metres) square, and might easily stand on the top of the hill, and the whole central reserved district (including the land of the priests and of the Levites and the territory of the city) will be about 7½ miles (or 12 kilometres) square. The physical changes described in 47 are not greater than those contemplated elsewhere in OT, and were not unnatural according to the ideas which prevailed in Ezekiel's time.

EZEL (עֶזֶל [with art.]), a name which has intruded itself by a misunderstanding into the narrative of David's parting from Jonathan, 1 S. 20.19 (Vg., Luther, EV). 6B presents the unintelligible word Ergab (παρὰ τὸ ἐργαβ ἐκέينو), which reappears as Argab in v. 41 (Δ ἀνέστη ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀργαβ); MT in v. 19 has הַכָּבֵן, and in v. 41 נֶבֶן.²

Evidently הַכָּבֵן, הַמָּוֶל, and נֶבֶן are all wrong. Not less evidently the true reading (instead of הַמָּוֶל, EV 'Ezel') is preserved by 6B. Hence Wellhausen and most critics restore הַמָּוֶל in v. 19 and הַמָּוֶל in v. 41; but there is no word מָוֶן (see below).

עֶזֶל, 'argab, has been held to mean 'cairn' (WRS, OTJC [8], 81, and most critics) or 'heap of earth' (Kittel in Kau. HS, Dr. Satz. 132, and Deut. 48). The latter sense is the more defensible, though it is scarcely appropriate. The existence of the word, however, is undemonstrated. It is true, the word εργαβ occurs again in 1 S. 6.11 15 [B], where, however, it is a corruption of αργαζ [A], Βαργαζ [L], which is simply a gloss from the margin, (see COFFER), and in 1 K. 4.13 [A], where it represents עֶזֶל.²

Almost certainly the true reading is הַמָּוֶל—i.e., the juniper-tree. Render vv. 19 f., '... and thou shalt sit down beside yonder juniper-tree; and I will choose (אָרַבָה) the three rocks as a mark to shoot at.' Cp HEATH.

γ. γαβελος [Jos. Ant. viii. 64]. It has been suggested, however, that the true name was Nēšib-ēdōm—i.e., 'Column of (the god) Edom.' See JEHOSEPHAT, 1.¹ One of the last stations where the Israelites encamped (Nu. 3335 f., γασσιων γ. [B*], -εσι. γ. [Bab. A] [P₂], Dt. 28 [D]); see WANDERINGS, § 12 f. It was here that Solomon made a ship (or a navy of ships) to fetch gold from Ophir (1 K. 926, εμαεσειων γ. [B], γεσιων γ. [L], cp 2 Ch. 817 γεσιων γ. [L]); and at a later time Jehoshaphat made Tarshish-ships (cp our 'Indiamen'), which were broken up by a storm (1 K. 2248; ασειων γ. [A]=1628 f in B [γασσιων γ.] and L [γε. γ.]; 2 Ch. 2036 εργασιων [=εν γ. γ.] [A], ενγεσιων γ. [L], see JEHOSEPHAT, 1). To judge by 1 K. 929 Ezion-geber must have been situated near (NW) to ELATH; its precise situation is unknown, but on the supposition that the mud-flats which now form the lower end of the Wādy el-'Arabah were once covered by the sea, it is identified by Robinson with 'Ain el-Ghudyān, a valley with brackish water some 15 m. N. of the present extremity of the gulf (see Dr. Deut. 35 f.). Others would place it in the small bay N. of the mouth of the Wādy Marākh, opposite to which at a short distance from the land is the islet of el-Ḳūrēya. The identification of Ezion-geber with the modern Dahab proposed by Wellsted (ii. eh. 9153) rests on the old legends common among the Sinaitic monks. This place is situated too far N., and its name ('gold'), which may have given rise to the legends, arose probably from the shining appearance of the place, rather than from any legends of gold-laden transport-ships from Ophir.

Ezion-geber soon seems to have lost its importance and to have given way to Elath. In 1 K. 929 its position has to be defined by means of the latter place, whilst in 2 K. 1422 166 it is unmentioned.

According to Jer. and Eus. Ezion-geber (Asion-geber, ασιων-γαβερ) is said to have been called Essia, ασια (OS 97 21 1257 22744 241 53). At a much later time the Egyptian historian Maḳrīzī (15th cent.) mentions as hearsay that in early times hard by Aila (Elath) was a great and important town called 'Ašyūn; but whether his information was based on biblical sources or arose from an independent source, cannot be said. At the present day it has totally disappeared. (Cp Burckhardt, 831, Buhl, Gesch. d. Edomiter, 39 f.) See ELATH.

² The author of this article stands between the extreme negative criticism of Torrey in his Compos. and Hist. Value of Ezra-Neh., and the much more conservative criticism of E. Meyer in his Entstehung des Judenthums. For a fuller statement of the author's criticism and its results see his Het Herstel van Israel (which has been translated into German) and the articles referred to below (EZRA ii., § 18). Meyer's work is a very thorough and instructive historical and archaeological study; but it is not as keen in its criticism as could be wished. Torrey, on the other hand, is sometimes almost hypercritical. He thinks that the older documents incorporated by the Chronicler are of much less extent than has generally been supposed, and denies the historical character of all the supposed official documents inserted in our Book of Ezra. He regards the story of Ezra as the best exemplification of the qualities of the Chronicler as a writer of fiction and of his mistaken idea of the history of Israel. Marquart's essay (Fund. 28-68) on the organisation of the Jewish community after the so-called Exile is learned and acute; it should be read in combination with Meyer's work which it preceded. Che., in Jewish Religious Life after the Exile ('98), adopts a view approaching that of Koster, but much affected by more recent critics, e.g., Marquart, Torrey, Wellhausen, and Meyer. Winckler's

7-10 Neh. 8-10), lived as a Jewish exile in Babylon in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimānus, and was a younger contemporary of Nehemiah. Of his antecedents otherwise nothing certain is known.

We are told indeed in Ezra 7:1-5 that Ezra belonged to the high-priestly order (in 1 Esd. 940 49 he is even called high priest); but no credit deserves to be given to the statement, which is taken from the fictitious genealogy in 1 Ch. 6:3-15 [529-41] (see EZRA ii., § 14), and makes Ezra a son of Seraiah, the priest who, according to 2 K. 25:18-21, was put to death by Nebuchadrezzar in 586. If we accept the date given in Ezra 7:7 f. (see § 2), Seraiah died almost 130 years before Ezra arrived in Jerusalem, and therefore, of course, cannot have been his father. The statement, moreover, is plainly not derived from Ezra's own memoirs, which would hardly have passed over his immediate ancestors in silence; it comes from the hand of the redactor. There is even some reason for questioning whether Ezra was a priest at all. He is called 'priest' or 'the priest, the scribe' only in those places which have been worked over by the redactor (Ezra 7:11 f. 21; 10:10 16; Neh. 8:2 9, and cp Neh. 12:26); Ezra himself sometimes refers to 'our priests' (Ezra 9:7; Neh. 9:32 34), in a way that implies he did not reckon himself as belonging to the number. Cp GENEALOGIES i., § 7 (iv.).

After the thirty-third year of Artaxerxes¹ (Neh. 136; see EZRA-NEHEMIAH, § 16) Ezra set out from Babylon for Jerusalem with a band of 1496 men in favour and liberality of Artaxerxes that he was able to undertake this expedition, for which it is not unlikely that Nehemiah during his stay at the court of the Persian king (to which reference is made in Neh. 136) had paved the way (see EZRA-NEHEMIAH, § 3). According to Ezra 7:11-26, which purports to give the words of the firman, Artaxerxes not only permitted all the exiles without exception to return, if so minded, to the land of Judah, but also, along with his 'counsellors,' supplied them on a generous scale with the means of purchasing animals and otherwise providing for the temple sacrifices; it would also appear that Ezra was authorized to draw upon the royal exchequer to a considerable amount for further necessities of the temple worship. Moreover, the king freed all those employed in the service of the temple from all taxes (see EZRA-NEHEMIAH, § 3, n.), and gave Ezra full powers to order everything in Judæa and Jerusalem in accordance with the law of God which he carried with him; even the Jews outside of Palestine were made subject to the jurisdiction of the authorities at Jerusalem, on whom an almost unlimited power of punishment was conferred. This representation, however, is obviously a highly exaggerated one, and the firman of Artaxerxes unquestionably spurious, for he speaks there as if he were a believing Jew, recognising Yahwè as the God of heaven,² holding himself bound to care for his service, and in ease of remissness holding himself and his posterity liable to the consequences (see further EZRA-NEHEMIAH, § 3).

2. Expedition to Jerusalem: (Ezra 8:1-14 = 1 Esdras 8:28-40, where the number amounts to 1690), besides women and children. It was by the Chronicler's account.

It is only in passages which have been worked over by the redactor that we find any mention of this firman or of the copies made from it by the king's officials (cp Ezra 8:36); all that Ezra himself tells us is that the king and his nobles gave gold and vessels for the temple, and that God inclined the heart of the sovereign in his favour (Ezra 7:27 f.; 8:25); he also believes that had he chosen he could have obtained a safe-conduct for his articles on the time of the restoration of Judah, and on the reform of Nehemiah (APF 2210-236, cp 241-244), attach too much weight to disputable corrections of names of Persian kings. See also GOVERNMENT, § 28 ff.; ISRAEL, §§ 50-64.]

hand from Artaxerxes; but this he had refrained from doing because he had expressed so unreservedly his confidence in the help of his God.

Again, it seems doubtful whether, as the redactor represents (Ezra 7¹⁰), the object of Ezra's expedition was to establish in Israel the law of 3. Its real aim. Yahwē, and whether he thus arrived in Jerusalem with the law of his God already in his hand (Ezra 7¹⁴). From his own words we gather rather that his aim was, by bringing back its exiles, to restore Israel and re-establish the twelve tribes once more in the land of their fathers: the company he brings with him consists, in addition to one Davidic and two priestly families, of twelve clans; the gifts received are entrusted to twelve priests and twelve Levites; the number of sacrificial victims offered by the exiles on their arrival in Jerusalem is twelve of each kind or a multiple of twelve (if, at least, following 1 Esd. 8⁶⁶, we read 72 for 77 in Ezra 8³⁵). The aim he had in the whole expedition was to bring back the twelve tribes to their fatherland and to restore the temple to its pristine glory.

By the banks of the AHAVA [q.v.] which flowed past a town of the same name, Ezra assembled his company.

After three days' stay, discovering that he 4. Journey. had no Levites with him, he sent messengers to a certain IDDO [i.] at Casiphia, apparently an influential compatriot, from whom some Levites and NETHINIM [q.v.] were obtained. Prayer was then offered, with fasting, for a successful journey, the temple vessels which accompanied the expedition were handed over to the charge of certain priests and Levites, and on the 12th of the first month the company set out on its journey. If we are rightly informed by the redactor (Ezra 7⁹) that Ezra left Babylon on the first of the same month, and if by the three days of 8¹⁵ we are to understand the first three of the month, the enlistment of the Levites thus involved a delay of only nine days. The journey, probably at first in a NW. direction along the Euphrates towards Thapsacus or Carchemish, and then SW. down the valley of the Orontes, occupied more than 3½ months; on the first of the fifth month, we are told, Jerusalem was reached, and there, after an interval of three days, the silver, the gold, and the vessels were handed over to a commission of priests and Levites in the temple, and thank-offerings made.

Not long after his arrival Ezra heard of the serious 'defilement' which the Jewish population of Palestine,

5. Mixed marriages. by mixed marriages [a trouble to which most scholars have also found a reference in Mal. 2¹¹; see, however, MALACHI, § 2*b*. What actually happened may, or may not, be correctly represented in the extracts from Ezra's memoirs (Ezra 9^{f.}); this is a matter which calls for keen criticism. It is possible that some admirer of Ezra wrote in Ezra's name. Or, as Volz suggests, we may distinguish between an original Ezra-document and a drastic recension of the same by the Chronicler, especially in the 'I' section. He notices that 1 Esd. 8¹⁻⁷ betrays the work of two hands; also 9^{39 ff.}; even the original Ezra-document can have been of but slight historical value, since it was mainly an imitation of the memoirs of Nehemiah. Cp also Che. Jew. Rel. Life, 58 f., who agrees with Torrey that the story in Ezra 9^{f.} is full of improbability, and that the ascription of Ezra 9 to Ezra does not make it more plausible. According to the story, for which we need not hold Ezra himself responsible,] Ezra's distress on learning this was such that he rent his clothes, tore his hair and beard, and sat for hours as one astonished on the plateau in front of the temple, until the time of the evening sacrifice. He then rose up, and renewing the outward expressions of his grief poured out his heart in a passionate confession of guilt.

Meanwhile 'a very great congregation of men, women, and children' (10¹) had been gathering around Ezra. A certain SHECHANIAH (4), recognising the guilt that had been incurred, urged Ezra to take measures to extirpate the evil, assuring him of the support of all right-thinking persons. Ezra lays all present under an oath to stand by him, and then passes the night in fasting and humiliation in the chamber of Johanan, Eliashib's son or grandson¹ (cp Neh. 12^{10 f.} 23). Undoubtedly this branch of the high-priestly family was favourably disposed to Ezra's schemes, and Ezra was able by its help to get an assembly of the whole people of Judah and Benjamin summoned to Jerusalem.

Three days after, on the 30th of Kislev, probably in the same year as Ezra's arrival, the assembly met. The outcome was, from Ezra's point of view, hardly satisfactory; the proposal that all mixed marriages should be dissolved and the alien wives sent away, though not unsupported, provoked strong opposition (see Ezra 10¹⁵ RV). This and the violent rain which prevented any prolonged meeting—they were assembled on the plateau eastward of the temple, in front of the Water-gate—caused the assembly to break up without determining on more than the appointment of an authoritative commission of inquiry. Their task, begun on the first of the tenth month, was completed on the first day of the following year; and the list of persons implicated, drawn up by them, still lies before us in Ezra 10¹⁸⁻⁴³. No further progress, however, was made.

We read indeed that, in cases where the offenders belonged to the high-priestly family, promises to send their foreign wives away were made; but that these promises were fulfilled is nowhere said. As for the other offenders, it is not so much as alleged that either by word or deed any concession whatever was made to Ezra's demand. The narrative ends (Ezra 10⁴⁴) with the statement: 'These all had married foreign wives'; followed by some words now unintelligible. Ezra's own memoirs doubtless went on to tell the sequel, which the redactor—probably from a desire to conceal the failure of the measures taken by Ezra—afterwards struck out, and in place of which, for the same reason, the author of 1 Esd. 9³⁶ substituted the clause: 'and they sent them together with their children away.'²

The impossibility of cleansing the people at large from their defilement in this fashion once apparent, it

6. Formation of congregation. became necessary to try some other method. If the old Israel refused to be reformed, then the like-minded with Ezra must unite themselves in a new society and so restore the true Israel. This scheme offered some prospect of success, for it had the support of the powerful Nehemiah, and the high-priestly functions were, in consequence of Nehemiah's radical reforms (Neh. 13^{28 f.}), in friendly hands. In these circumstances it was that, at the call and under the leadership of Nehemiah, certain Israelites met in solemn assembly to separate themselves from the heathen and all their heathen connections, and so to form the true Israel, henceforth to be known as 'the congregation' (Neh. 9^{f.} 13¹⁻³).³ See ASSEMBLY.

They met in a spirit of the deepest contrition; fasting and with earth sprinkled on their heads, they stood and confessed their sins and the iniquity of their fathers and joined in the humble prayer made by Ezra (Ezra 9⁶), in which Yahwē's favour shown to the fathers is celebrated, and Israel's guilt (by which that favour had been constantly forfeited) is acknowledged, and the downfall of the nation is recognised to be a righteous chastisement of Yahwē, but at the same time prayer is made that the chastisement may now come to an end.

Hereupon Nehemiah and the heads of clans drew up a sealed document containing a vow of fidelity to

7. Covenant. Yahwē, to which the rest of the people gave their adhesion by oath and imprecations.

¹ [Or had Eliashib both a son and a grandson named Johanan? See JOHANAN (2).]

³ [In the list of names, Neh. 10²⁻²⁸, which though old in origin has been modified and expanded by the editor, we find names of families and of individuals side by side (see Smend, Die Listen der BB. Esr. u. Neh. 13; Koster, Het Herstel, 78, n.).]

tion. The undertaking was to observe 'the law of Yahwè' (as contained in the Book of the Covenant [Ex. 21-23; see EXODUS II., § 3] and Deuteronomy) along with the following special pledges: not to allow their children to intermarry with foreigners; not to trade with 'the peoples of the land' on the sabbath day; to let the land lie fallow every seventh year; not to exact payment of debts; and to contribute yearly a third of a shekel for the support of the temple worship. Regulations were fixed for the supply of wood for the altar; promise was made to bring the first fruits of field and orchard and the best of all that was produced from these as well as the firstlings, to the temple to be handed over to the priests; the tithe was to be paid to the Levites, who in turn had again to hand over a tenth to the priests. On such terms the 'congregation,' now freed from all foreign contamination and filled with zeal for the service of their God, could confidently rely on the divine help henceforward.¹

On yet one other occasion do we find Ezra coming forward publicly alongside of Nehemiah²—at the bringing in of a new law (Neh. 8). Already

8. Priestly law. at the assembly in which Israel was rehabilitated, the people, besides engaging themselves to an observance of the law of Yahwè, had pledged themselves to a variety of matters on which the written law was silent or prescribed otherwise. There was a sense that in the new circumstances the needs of Israel were not sufficiently met by the old law, and that a new one was required. This law was given to the congregation by Ezra and Nehemiah.

It was on the first of Tishri (v. 2; cp v. 13 ff.)—the year is not known—that Ezra, in a great gathering held on the plateau before the Water Gate, first brought forward the Book of the Law. Standing on a wooden pulpit high above his hearers he unrolled the book, the whole congregation meanwhile reverently rising to their feet, and proceeded to read aloud from it from daylight till noon. The congregation, signifying with its loud amen its acceptance of what was being read as the word of Yahwè, was deeply moved. If this was the law of Yahwè which had been given to Moses, how great had been their shortcomings in fulfilling the divine will! However, Nehemiah and Ezra (so our Hebrew text states) comforted the people: this was in truth a joyous day, the people ought to hold festival and give presents one to another. Thus the day was turned to a feast. The new law, the so-called priestly law-book that constitutes an important part of our present Hexateuch, became henceforth, along with the older laws, the sacred writing which regulated the life of every Israelite (see CANON, § 23 f.). [Torrey's criticism of the narrative, however, is very forcible. It looks very much like an imitation of the account of the introduction of the older law-book under Josiah. It also appears intrinsically improbable. A new scripture differing so widely as this from the older law-book could not, it would seem, have been at once accepted. Only a small kernel of fact can safely be admitted. Cp Jew. Rel. Life, 56-58.] The first feast celebrated in accordance with its enactments after its promulgation—and within the same month—was the feast of tabernacles (vv. 13-18; see FEASTS, § 11); since the days of Joshua the son of Nun, never had the Israelites so observed it. Where and by whom this law was written we do not know.

[The firman of Ezra, indeed, i.e., virtually] the redactor informs us that Ezra came from Babylon with the law of his God in his hand (Ezra 7:14); but it is in the highest degree improbable that our present law was committed to writing so early, for in the assembly of Neh. 9:2 the congregation is still bound only to the older law, and moreover our present law contains precepts respecting the worship and servants of the temple, which certainly must have been written by some one acquainted with the temple service and with the actual circumstances in Judæa. That Ezra indeed had a large share in its compilation is very likely, and so it is not without reason that by the redactor of Ezra-Nehemiah, he is constantly called 'the scribe.'¹ (Ezra 7:11 f. 21; Neh. 8:9, 12:26). But Jewish tradition—as we learn from 2 Uzd., a writing belonging to the close of the first Christian century—goes much further than this, and tells us that, not merely the entire law, which had perished in the destruction of Jerusalem in 586, but the contents of all the twenty-four books of the OT, were anew or for the first time revealed to Ezra, and thus that the whole of the sacred Canon of the Jews is in the last instance due to him (see CANON, § 17).

2. One of the priests who came with Zerubbabel out of Babylon (Neh. 12:2; עֹדְרָא [BN], עֹדְרָא [L]) and after whom (v. 13) one of the priestly clans was named. In the list (10:2) AZARIAH (q.v., 4) takes the place of Ezra. See EZRA II., § 8 (e).

The books of Ezra and Nehemiah in the Jewish Canon were originally one (cp CANON, §§ 10 [2], 13).

They still are one in \mathfrak{C} , where they bear the name of 2 Esd. or επεις [A], whilst what is called 1 Esd. contains, in addition to our present Book of Ezra (with numerous variations, especially in the arrangement of the latter portion), the last two chapters of

1. One Book; the text. Chronicles, Neh. 7:73-8:12, and a legend about Zerubbabel at the court of Darius. In the Latin, Ezra is called 1 Esdras; Nehemiah, 2 Esdras, and also Nehemiah. In the Christian Church, Ezra and Nehemiah gradually came to be treated as two books. The Jews followed the Christians in this, so that now they appear as separate books in the Hebrew printed text also.

In conformity with the old tradition they will here be treated as one book, as not only are they drawn from the same sources, but they have also been compiled by the same redactor (cp HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 11 ff.).

[On the text of 1 Esdras, which rests on a recension of the Hebrew superior in some points to MT, see also EZRA, GREEK, § 6.

There is an admirable conspectus and critical discussion of the textual phenomena of the Hebrew text and the versions by Klostermann, in PRE⁽³⁾ 5:501 ff.; but there is still scope for an analytic treatment of the same material. The present work, too, offers not a few contributions to the correction of the text, especially in proper names; 1 Esd. has been found helpful (see, e.g., BILSHAN). Guthe's treatment of Ezra and Nehemiah, in SBOT, is perhaps too cautious; but so far as it goes it is excellent, and not least in its critical use of the versions and of 1 Esdras. A good specimen of the emendations due to these helps is to be found in Ezra 10:6, where וַיֵּשְׁבֵם ('and went') should be וַיִּשְׁכְּבֵם ('and lodged'); so Pesh., and 1 Esd. 9:2.]

Ezra, so named from the man who, from chap. 7 onwards, is its leading figure, naturally falls into two main divisions. The first, 1-6 (4:8-6:18

2. Contents of Ezra. being in Aramaic), deals with the fortunes of the Jews in Palestine from the first year of Cyrus as king of Babylon down to the sixth year of Darius Hystaspis (538-515).

The contents are: the return of the exiles in consequence of the edict of Cyrus (1); a list (apparently) of those who thus returned (2; but see § 7); the setting up of the altar of burnt offering and the restoration of the daily services (3:1-6); the preparation for and the beginning of the rebuilding of the temple (3:7-13); the opposition of the Samaritans in consequence of the refusal of the Jews to allow them a share in this work (4:1-5); repeated complaints raised against the Jews on account of the rebuilding of the walls (4:6-23); the stoppage of the building of the temple (4:24); the rebuilding, begun in the second year of Darius, and completed in his sixth (5:1-6:18); the celebration of the feast of the passover (6:19-22).

The second division of the book, 7-10 (7¹²⁻²⁶ being in Aramaic), which transports us to the seventh year of Artaxerxes, describes the return of Ezra and his fellow-exiles to Jerusalem (7^{f.}), and the measures taken by him with reference to mixed marriages (9^{f.}).

The book called after Nehemiah relates the origin of that Jewish courtier's mission to Jerusalem as governor, with the object of restoring the walls, and describes the measures which he took, in spite of Sanballat, to accomplish this.

Chaps. 1-6 include an inserted list of the builders (3¹⁻³²); also the episode of the governor's dealings with the hard-hearted usurers (5). Next are described the final efforts of Sanballat and his friends to ruin Nehemiah (chap. 6), also some special administrative measures of the latter; another copy is given of the important list in Ezra 2. This concludes Part I. (chaps. 1-7).

Next follows an account of the reading of the law and the celebration of the feast of Tabernacles (8), and of the great assembly for Israel's dedication of itself to Yahweh (9^{f.}); a short account of the increase of the population of Jerusalem (11^{f.}); a list of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, Judah, and Benjamin (11³⁻¹⁹ 21-24 25-36); lists of heads of priestly and Levitical families dating from various periods (12¹⁻²⁶); an account of the dedication of the wall (12²⁷⁻⁴³) and of the appointment of guardians of the temple chambers (12⁴⁴⁻⁴⁷); and a brief statement about the expulsion of strangers from Israel (13¹⁻³). The book closes with an account of Nehemiah's second visit to Jerusalem and of his reforms (13⁴⁻³¹).

We see from the fact that the opening verses of Ezra (Ezra 1^{1-3a}) are attached to Chronicles (2 Ch. 36^{22 f.})

4. Authorship. that our Ezra is the immediate sequel to Chronicles, and had already been written when the last-named book was composed. In fact, whenever the contents of our Ezra and Nehemiah are not taken from earlier sources, the style and habits of thought are those of the Chronicler, who must be regarded as the compiler of our Ezra and Nehemiah. That this writer used a variety of documents in producing his work is manifest. Here and there he reproduced his authorities verbatim; but he also often used great freedom of treatment, and did not scruple to expand or abridge, to alter or transpose.

The most important of the authorities used by the compiler are two works which, after their authors, we

5. Memoirs. may call the Memoirs of Ezra and of Nehemiah, respectively: (a) from the first is taken Ezra 7²⁷⁻⁸ 34⁹; from the second, Neh. 1¹⁻⁷ 5a 13⁴⁻³¹; in which passages Ezra and Nehemiah are themselves the speakers, the compiler having only here and there made slight alterations. (b) There are other passages from the same memoirs; but in them the first person is almost wholly absent, and they have been considerably modified by the Chronicler.

To this class belong Ezra 7¹⁻²⁶ 8^{35 f.} 10 [between Ezra 10⁹ and 10 we should perhaps insert Neh. 13^{1 f.} 14], founded on the Memoirs of Ezra; and Neh. 11^{1 f.} (20), also 3¹⁻¹⁹ 21²⁴ [cp 7⁵] 11²⁵⁻³⁶ 12²⁷⁻⁴³ 44⁴⁷ 13¹⁻³ (?), founded [unless 11²⁵⁻³⁶ be an addition of the Chronicler]³ on those of Nehemiah.

(c) Neh. 7⁶⁻¹⁰ 39 also, in its original form, was part of the memoirs; but we cannot make out whether it is derived from those of Ezra or from those of Nehemiah.

[It is doubtful whether the passages assigned directly or indirectly to the memoirs of Ezra can really claim the authority of Ezra. That authentic utterances of Ezra are to be found in them may be allowed (see, e.g., Ezra 7^{27 f.}); but the passages in which Ezra appears to speak in the first person contain some statements too improbable for us to assign them without compunction to the great scribe himself. It is allowed that a redactor had to do with the passages in which 'the first person is almost wholly absent'; the same concession must almost certainly be made with regard to the passages in which Ezra himself appears to be the speaker. Even the royal firman in Ezra 7¹¹⁻²⁶ cannot be authentic.

³ [Neh. 11²⁵⁻³⁶ should perhaps never be referred to without an expression of reserve. The tendency of the most thorough recent criticism is to regard this passage as an insertion of the Chronicler, and not as an authentic statement of the territory occupied after the so-called Return by the 'sons of Judah' and the 'sons of Benjamin'.]

Meyer himself admits (p. 65) that the firman lacks the Persian colouring which appears to characterise the other supposed official documents, and proves that, if fictions, they are not unskilful fictions; a strict criticism of the contents shows that the firman too is of Jewish origin. Meyer's answer (p. 64) is altogether inadequate. That the Persian court was favourable to the maintenance of the religions of subject races, at any rate of such religions as that of Yahweh, is recognised; the missions of Sheshbazzar and Nehemiah, in so far as they had religious objects, are perfectly in accordance with Persian policy. But for the violent interference with the religion of the people of Judah, and even as the supposed firman says, of the people of the province W. of the Euphrates in general, there is no parallel—certainly that adduced by Meyer³ (p. 71) is no parallel at all. Meyer thinks that the Persian court simply adopted the terms of the petition laid before it by Ezra in the name of the Babylonian Jewry; but it could not have acceded to a petition for which there was no precedent, nor could the Babylonian Jewry have been so unwise as to ask leave for something that was unattainable. The firman declares 'that Ezra the priest and scribe is sent by the king and his counsellors to institute an inquiry into Judæan religion on the basis of the law which is in his hand. It even empowers Ezra to appoint magistrates and judges to judge the people of the province W. of the Euphrates in accordance with this law, and should there be any who presume to disobey, or refuse to be taught, a strict sentence is to be passed upon them, ranging from simple imprisonment to confiscation of goods, banishment, and death.'⁴ As a matter of fact, Ezra is not reported to have attempted to carry out this firman, which is evidently the work of a partisan of Ezra with but slight historical sense. The one thing which is credible in the firman is that the Persian court was willing to grant freedom from taxes to the Jewish priests, a parallel for which is supplied by the rescript of Darius I. to the Persian official Gadatas at Magnesia (on the river Mæander).⁴ What the real object for which Ezra desired the royal permission was, has been pointed out elsewhere (see EZRA, § 3); it was by no means what the supposed firman represents. It is not permissible, therefore, to say that the pious exclamation of Ezra in Ezra 7²⁷ proves that the firman must have been inserted by Ezra in his memoirs; the point to which it refers is only incidentally mentioned in the firman, and is not that for which Ezra is specially sent by the king and his 'seven counsellors.' In fact, to carry silver and gold to Jerusalem to beautify the temple, required no firman at all (Zech. 6^{10 f.}).

Those who can bring themselves to hold that, in spite of the objections raised, the firman must be genuine, might do well to identify the Artaxerxes who was the patron of Nehemiah and Ezra with Artaxerxes II. Mnemon (404-359), simply because this king did not scruple to force the acceptance of religious innovations on his own people, so that he might conceivably have permitted Ezra to use force in introducing his law-book at Jerusalem. It would, however, be the resource of despair. The objections which, if space permitted, could be raised to this proposal of Marq. (Fund. 37), are weighty, and, it seems, insuperable. Kusters, Wellhausen, and Meyer are probably right in identifying the Artaxerxes of Nehemiah and Ezra with Artaxerxes I., and a political motive for that king's generosity to the Jews can be divined (see Jew. Rel. Life, 38 f.). The view assumed by most on the basis of Ezra 7¹¹⁻²⁶ seems to the present writer historically inconceivable, and a warning to the student was necessary.]

The Memoirs of Ezra and of Nehemiah are not the only documents to which our author is indebted.

(a) For example, he has used an account of the building of the temple in the reign of Darius (Ezra 5:1-6:15). This is made up out of two accounts (a and β) as is at once apparent (1) from its inconsecutiveness: in 6:6-12 (a) we find the close of a letter of Darius (the beginning is wanting), given as the sequel of a decree of Cyrus contained in 6:3-5 (β); (2) from its contradictions: according to 5:2 (a) it is Zerubbabel and Jeshua who begin to build the temple, whereas, according to 5:16 (β), the foundations had already been laid by Sheshbazzar in the time of Cyrus; according to 6:11 f. the decree of Cyrus which is sought for at Babylon is found at Achmetha (Ecbatana), without any notice of the search being abandoned at the one place and resumed at the other.

¹ [Marq., it is true, would read לְעַמּוֹ 'thy people' for לְעַמְּוֹ 'the people' in Ezra 7²⁵.]

We are unable, however, to separate the two portions with certainty, chiefly because only parts of each of the two accounts have been taken. We may perhaps say that 5:1-10 6:1 f. (in part), and 6:15 belong to the one (a), and 5:11-17 6:1 f. (in part), and 3:5 to the other (β). Probably the Chronicler had the story before him already in its composite form.

[Against Kosters' attempt to separate the report of the satrap Tattenai (Uštanni?)¹ into two parts derived from different sources, see Wellhausen, GNV, '95, p. 176; Meyer, Entst. 42, u. 4. It is not probable, however, that the document has reached us in its original form.

The answer of the Jewish elders in Ezra 5:11 f. is plainly fictitious; so also the last clause of the imprecation which concludes the answer of Darius appears to be either a Jewish addition, or altered in a Jewish spirit from the original passage, which may have referred to Ahura-mazda. The statement, however, that Tattenai complained to the great king of the attempt to rebuild the temple, and at the same time referred to the mission of Sheshbazzar is probable enough, and the mention of the discovery at Ecbatana of the roll (i.e., the cuneiform tablet) containing the decree of Cyrus, which, as Meyer plausibly supposes, entered into the answer of Darius,² is self-evidently authentic.]

(b) Again, in Neh. 12:1-26 we have a list of heads of priestly and levitical families dating, it would appear, from the time of the high priest Jaddua, a contemporary of Alexander the Great, originally compiled as a supplement to the register which we find in Neh. 11:3-36.

[It might perhaps be better to modify this statement thus: 'Neh. 12:1-21 may have been intended as a supplement to the register in 11:1-24.' On the passage see Meyer, Entst. 103. It is plain at a glance that אֲהִיָּהּ has come into 12:22 by error from v. 23 (it is a synonym of לָוִי בְּנֵי לָוִי), and that 1 before כְּהֹנִים should be cancelled. Winkler's attempted explanation (AOF 2221) recognises this, but is too devoid of plausibility to be considered here.]

(c) The author may have made use of a written source also in Ezra 4:6-23. For Ezra 1:3 4:1-5:24 6:16-22, it does not appear that he consulted other writings.

[On Ezra 3:1-4:5 see Driver, Intr. (6), 547 f.]

Such portions of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah as have been simply transferred from the memoirs, have

7. Historicity: great historical value; but the redactor's own contributions are largely inventions.³ Particularly is this true of what he tells about the return of the exiles, the foundation of the temple, and the suspension of the work in the reign of Cyrus (Ezra 1:3-4:5 24). At least, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah, who lived when the temple was being built under Darius, know of no other founding of the temple than that which took place in their own time (Hag. 2:19 [18]), and presuppose no return from exile;⁴ according to them the time of chastisement is still present, and that of redemption is

² [Meyer (Entst. 47) thus restores the opening of the royal rescript: 'King Darius to the satrap Sisines (Tattenai), etc. The decree of Cyrus has been found in a roll in the treasury of Ecbatana, and therein is the following record.']

³ [Cp col. 1473, note 2.]

⁴ [At any rate no considerable band of exiles can have returned—none that was able materially to influence the Jewish community; so much must be inferred from Hag. and Zech.; cp Chet. *Intr. all in the future (see Zech. 1:2 f. 12:26 f. 6:9-15 8:7 f.); above all, a prophecy of Zechariah (6:15) spoken to encourage the Jews to accept certain gifts from Babylon, to the effect that Jews from a distance would take part in the building of the temple, shows that up till then no band of exiles had returned or taken a part in the restoration of the sanctuary.

Our faith in the historicity of the return in the time of Cyrus is shaken by the testimony of 1st Esdras. In that book we have, in the remarkable pericope 3:1-56, an account of the return of the exiles and the rebuilding of the temple (4:42-56) that is in irreconcilable conflict with the representation of Ezra 1. At least we are told in 1 Esd. that not Cyrus but Darius sent Zerubbabel with the returning exiles and restored the temple vessels which Cyrus had already set apart to be handed over, when he made the vow to destroy Babylon. Is it conceivable that this representation has grown out of that of Ezra 1? that the writer of 1 Esd. 4 transferred the original restoration of Israel by Cyrus, the deliverer mentioned in Yahuw's name by Deutero-Isaiah, to Darius who is nowhere mentioned in any prophecy? that if the return and the restoration of the temple vessels had really taken place under Cyrus, a later writer should have transformed this into a mere promise and intention on the part of Cyrus, afterwards fulfilled by his successor Darius? This is inconceivable. Ezra 1 evidently contains a form of the tradition later than 1 Esd. 4:42-56, and its account is therefore not to be accepted. Cp EZRA, GREEK, § 6.

Nor does either of the two narratives of which Ezra 5:1-6:15 is made up, presuppose a return of exiles in the time of Cyrus. Both representations of the temple rebuilding vary from that given by the redactor. According to the one (a), a beginning with this was made not in Cyrus's reign but in that of Darius (5:2); according to the other (β), Cyrus was well disposed to the undertaking, and, with a view to it, sent to Judæa, not indeed Jewish exiles, but an official of high rank, Sheshbazzar,¹ of course to co-operate in the work with the Jews in Palestine—a work which was carried on without interruption until Darius's time, 5:14-16 [β]: neither account has a single word about returning exiles.

Nor does the list of those who returned, which we find in Ezra 2 (Neh. 7:6-73), prove anything for the

8. The great list: credibility of the Chronicler's way of representing matters. Originally Ezra 2 = Neh. 7 = it had no reference to the time of 1 Esd. 5.

Cyrus. In its present form it certainly has, as is evident (1) from the place which has been assigned to it, (2) from v. 2, where Zerubbabel and Jeshua are enumerated among the twelve leaders of the Jews, and (3) from v. 68 f., which carries us back to the period before the restoration of the temple.

To take the last-mentioned point first: (a) a comparison with Neh. 7:70-72 [Bä. 69-71] shows that the narrative here originally related, not to gifts for the building of the temple, but to gifts to the treasury out of which 'the work'—i.e., the temple-service—was defrayed; whilst, that the representation in Ezra 2:68 f. according to which 'the work' is taken to mean the building of the temple is incorrect, is further evident from the fact that the gifts consisted in part of priests' garments, which could of course come into requisition for the establishment and maintenance of public worship, but not for a re-building of the temple. Above all, (b) the number of those who, according to this list, returned to Judæa (v. 64) presents great difficulty. It is much larger than the total number of Jews who, according to 2 K. 24:14 f. Jer. 52:28 f., were carried into captivity in 597, 586, and 581. If, in addition to this, we bear in mind that, according to Ezra 7 f. (cp the Book of

1 [That Sheshbazzar was a Persian official may be admitted. By nationality, however, he was a Jew; and we may infer this from the phrase in Ezra 1:8 לְיֹהֵדָה הַלְגִּיטִימָא, 'the (legitimate) Judean prince' (based perhaps on an earlier document), and from the statement in the genealogy of the Davidites that among the sons of Jechoniah was SHENAZZAR (1 Ch. 3:18 RV), whose name in MT seems to be a corruption of the Babylonian name of which another corrupt form is SHESHBAZZAR [q.v.]. That the Jewish nāsi 'prince' (if the term may be accepted as genuine) went up to Jerusalem unattended, is not to be supposed. Cp Jew. Rel. Life, 6; ISRAEL, § 51.]

Esther), a large number of the Jewish exiles remained behind in Babylonia, the figures in the list in question cannot be accepted as representing returning families. Moreover (c) the list includes names not only of outstanding families (vv. 3-19 30 ff.) but also (vv. 20-28 33 ff.) of common people (contrast 2 K. 24¹⁵ 25¹²), and (d) these last consist, according to v. 16, of returned exiles who have recently settled again in the homes of their ancestors; which cannot have been the case.

We can, indeed, if need be, suppose that the exiles had preserved the memory of the places from which their ancestors had been taken and that, in the land of their exile, community of origin constituted a bond of union among those who had formerly belonged to the same town or village; but we can hardly suppose that they all were able to settle again in the places from which they had sprung. During their absence aliens had established themselves in Judæa, and in the case of many towns the earlier population must have remained behind in Babylonia; one locality would therefore, if things were as the author supposes, have received too great a population, whilst another was insufficiently supplied. Circumstances must thus have compelled many to take up their abode elsewhere than in their ancient homes.

If then v. 16 gives an inaccurate representation of the character of the citizens, the conjecture at once arises that the statement is to be ascribed to a redactor, and that the original list dealt with the population of the places mentioned as a whole, not exclusively with those who returned.

Lastly (e), let us take the second of the three points mentioned above (beginning of § 8). It would seem that the list of the twelve leaders (Neh. 77; in EZRA 22 only eleven are named) is by no means free from suspicion,¹ partly on account of the names Nehemiah and Azariah (so Neh. 77; Seraiah in Ezra 22) of which the second, especially in Hebrew, closely resembles that of Ezra, with which indeed it is confused (cp Neh. 121—Seraiah, Jeremiah, Ezra—with Neh. 102—Seraiah, Azariah, Jeremiah), and partly also because it names Zerubbabel and Jeshua as leaders of the return, which they are not [if MT may be trusted] in the writings of their contemporaries Haggai and Zechariah,² who nevertheless frequently refer to them; the writer of 1 Esd. 31-56 knows them as leaders of the return in the time of Darius.

There can be no doubt, therefore, that this list at one time possessed a character quite different from that in which it here comes before us.

9. Its original meaning. Perhaps it was originally a complete register of the clans and citizens constituting the restored Israel—the 'congregation' the origin of which is related in Neh. 9*f.* The compiler of Ezra-Nehemiah subsequently, by placing it immediately after Ezra I, by the interpolation of v. 16 2, and by v. 68 f., made it serve as a list of the exiles who returned in the reign of Cyrus. [On this list see also below, § 15 1 (a).]

The account, in Ezra 1 31-45 24, of the return from the captivity, of the laying of the foundation of the temple, and of the arrest laid on the work of rebuilding by the hostility of the Samaritans, is thus unhistorical.

Equally unhistorical is the narrative according to which a beginning had already been made with the restoration of the walls of Jerusalem long before Nehemiah's time (Ezra 46-23).

10. The city walls. This narrative includes letters from Persian officials to Xerxes (485-466) and Artaxerxes (465-424), reporting that the Jews were rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem; also 1 letter from Artaxerxes giving orders for the stoppage of the work. The unhistorical character of the passage appears from the following considerations.

¹ [Whether Prof. Kusters would have adhered to this view, may be doubted. To Meyer (Entst. 193) the names have a credible appearance. In this we must agree with him, though he too hastily adds that Zerubbabel and Jeshua are the only leaders of whom we have any definite knowledge. It has been shown elsewhere (BILSHAN, REGEMMELECH, TIRSHATHA) that of three of the 'heads' we possess definite information. On the 'heads' cp GOVERNMENT, § 25; Jew. Rel. Life, 6, 10, 16.]

(a) It comes in between the account of the hostility to the building of the temple shown by the Samaritans (41-5) and the statement that the work was accordingly suspended until the second year (519) of Darius (Ezra 424); as if this suspension of the temple building had been the consequence of the letter of Artaxerxes about the building of the wall. The passage thus cannot, at all events, originally, have belonged to the place where we now find it; perhaps the redactor transferred it here in order to signify to the reader that the building of the temple had been interrupted by accusations similar to those which, under Xerxes and Artaxerxes, had interfered with the building of the wall.

(b) Quite apart from its connection, it is not in itself probable that the story is historical. Nehemiah's account of the restoration of the wall (Neh. 1-6) does not leave the impression that any others before him had already addressed themselves to this work.

Is it likely that the enemies of the Jews, who were bold enough to set themselves against the royal governor Nehemiah, even when addressing himself to the work with the express permission of the king, would at an earlier period have hesitated, until they had received in writing the orders of the king, to interfere with the Jews when these were addressing themselves to the work of building without permission?

Further (c) [even after certain errors in the text have been removed] the letters themselves bear internal marks of non-originality. [The question is no doubt a complicated one. We may admit that the facts presupposed by the letters are not always incorrect; or again that in one case or another there may be a genuine kernel; or again that the letters are in some respects skilfully composed; but that they are genuine in their present form, and can be used without criticism for historical purposes, must unhesitatingly be denied. Notice that Rehum's letter of complaint (Ezra 48-16) is addressed immediately to the king of Persia, passing over the satrap of the province through whom it ought to have been sent. This points to the period when Syria was under the rule of the Ptolemies or the Seleucidæ, and was divided into small administrative districts (Marq.), and it is difficult (see below) not to trace the later antagonism of Jews and Samaritans in the prominence given to the alien population of Samaria. Notice further that] Artaxerxes states in his answer (vv. 17-22) that an examination of royal records showed that there had been mighty kings of Jerusalem who had ruled over all the lands to the W. of the Euphrates and received toll, tribute, and custom. This is a manifest reference to David and Solomon [as Winckler (AOF 2231) has also, since Kusters' death, pointed out], and betrays the hand of a Jewish writer. It cannot be shown that Assyria or Babylon ever had relations with these kings of Israel or with their dominions; a complete silence respecting them is preserved in the inscriptions. [In spite of the particularity of the statement, 'written in Assyrian (i.e., in cuneiform) and interpreted in Aramaic' (Ezra 47, emended text), the document is certainly fictitious. The motive of the fiction was probably to show that Nehemiah's rebuilding of the walls was no arbitrary innovation, the same work having been taken in hand before the reign of Darius, and only hindered by the malice of the Samaritans, whose opposition to the Jews the redactor antedates. That the writer confounds Cambyses with Artaxerxes² (cp Jos. Ant. xi. 2126) need not surprise us; he may have thought of Darius II. or Darius III. who did succeed an Artaxerxes.³]

² [אֶשְׂרָיִם, Ahasuerus, in Ezra 46, is probably a scribe's error for אֶרְיָיִם, Artaxerxes; vv. 6 and 7 should be fused. For Bishlam, Mithredath and Tabul, we should, as Marq. (62) suggests, read Rehum and Samai (see SHALMAI).]

³ [So Marq., 61. Klo. PRE³) 5516, thinks that Ezra 46-6 18

The redactor's view of the fortunes of Israel in the time of Cyrus rendered it necessary that he should here and there introduce alterations even into the documents taken over by him. We have already seen how this has been done in Ezra 2. Something similar happened with Neh. 12¹²⁻²⁶, where priests of the time of Darius and the high priest Joiakim (v. 12²⁶), and Levites of the time of Nehemiah and Ezra (vv. 22-26), are named as patriarchal heads of priestly and levitical houses; by prefixing vv. 1-11 he carried the list back to the time of Cyrus.

According to Neh. 9^{f.}, after Ezra and his exiles had come to know that the people of Judæa had intermarried with aliens, the true Israel separated itself from 'the peoples of the land' and so had constituted itself into 'the congregation.' According to the redactor, who had made a separation and formation of a congregation take place already soon after the return of the exiles in the time of Cyrus (Ezra 6²¹), the alien marriages of which Ezra complained could only have reference to the congregation already thus separated. He therefore introduced into Ezra 9^{f.} certain corrections, with the effect of making it appear that the contaminating alliances which Ezra met with in Jewish territory had occurred in the case of certain exiles who had united themselves into a 'congregation' (9 10 6 8 12 14). The narrative itself (Neh. 9^{f.}) which described the formation of the congregation in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah he has thus failed to appreciate in its true significance, and he partly mutilates it by removing a portion (Neh. 13¹⁻³), partly makes it almost unintelligible by placing it in a connection to which it does not belong (after Neh. 8) and by making interpolations (e.g. 9 3^{f.}) which obscure the scope of the narrative.

Other more or less considerable corrections, made by the compiler in the passages he took over, were due to his conviction that, throughout the entire period with which he was dealing, not only the regulations affecting priests and Levites (which according to 1 Ch.

23-26 had been established by David), but also the prescriptions of the law, which according to Neh. 8 had been introduced by Ezra, were valid. The last-named law (what is now known as the Priestly law) he regarded as dating from the time of Moses, so that apparently he did not regard Neh. 8 as describing the introduction of a new law—which in fact it was.

Consequently in the portions composed by himself the redactor represents everything as happening in accordance with the law and the ordinances of David; (a) the feasts are observed (Ezra 3 4^{f.} 6 19^{f.}) in accordance with Ex. 12 6 Lev. 23 5^{f.} 33-43 Nu. 28 12-38; (b) the priests have trumpets (Ezra 3 10) in accordance with Nu. 10 1-10; the Levitical years of service (Ezra 3 8) are those which, according to 1 Ch. 23 24 27, had been fixed by David; (c) the Levites have the oversight of the building of the temple (Ezra 3 8^{f.}) in accordance with 1 Ch. 23 4; (d) the singers are Levites (Ezra 3 10^{f.}) as enjoined in 1 Ch. 25 5-25, though they are not so, as yet, in Ezra 2 40^{f.}; (e) priests and Levites are divided into classes (Ezra 6 18) as laid down in 1 Ch. 24. For the same reason he introduced corrections into the narratives he took over. (f) In Neh. 8^{f.} he is a great apology for the Judæan community by a person officially competent for the task, whose name in Aramaic was Tabe'l, and had the sanction (תְּבַל) of the Persian governor Mithredath. The cause of the apology was the accusation brought by Rebum which Tab'el prefixes to his work. This accounts, he thinks, not only for the singular תְּבַל, and the sing. suffix in תְּבַלְתָּ, but also for the 'suggestive' chronological statements 'until the reign of Darius' (45), 'at the beginning of his [Ahasuerus] reign' (46), etc. Kautzsch too (Abriss, 109) takes a very favourable view of 4 8-6 18: the compiler has good information but inserts 4 6-23 out of chronological order. Evidently Kautzsch has been moved by Meyer's somewhat excessive expression of his confidence in his own historical results, and perceives that earlier critics laid too much stress on one class of evidence to the neglect of other important phenomena to which Meyer seems (unduly) to limit the term 'historical.'

has inserted some verses which not a little confuse the course of the narrative (8 46 7^{f.} 11 9 3-5) because he thought it impossible to dispense with the services of the Levites as interpreters of the law and leaders of the congregation in the ceremonies described. (g) In Neh. 12 27-43 the account of the dedication of the wall is exceedingly confused, because the redactor missed, in the description of the feast which lay before him, things which he thought he ought to have found, and thus regarded corrections and interpolations as necessary; he made the singers Levites, provided them with the musical instruments of David (v. 36), supplied the priests with trumpets (vv. 35 41), and inserted lists of names, so that even Judah and Benjamin, in the original narrative designating the people, became priestly names (v. 34). See BENJAMIN, § 5.

14. Other adjustments. Elsewhere he has made corrections in the accounts given in the older narratives for other reasons.

(a) Ezra's genealogy (Ezra 7 1-5) he has conformed to 1 Ch. 6 3-14 [5 29-40] so as thereby to make his hero a member of the high-priestly family (cp also EZRA 1, § 1); (b) the account of the measures taken by Ezra against the mixed marriages he has so modified and altered in Ezra 10 that we cannot make out what the result of the attempt was; probably he intended to disguise its failure as much as possible. Cp EZRA, § 5.

Above all, the author has allowed himself great freedom in the arrangement of the materials at his disposal. At least, the events cannot all have followed each other in the order in which he describes them.

15. Dislocation of materials. 1. During the interval between the completion (Neh. 6 15) and the dedication of the walls (12 27^{f.}) it is impossible that all the things which stand in his account can have taken place.

(a) The list of those who returned occupies, neither in Ezra nor in Nehemiah (Neh. 7 6-73), the place to which it rightly belongs; after 7 1-5a what we should expect to find would be some particulars regarding the population of Jerusalem, but for this we look in vain in the list here introduced, though the case is different with the list in Neh. 11, which probably once occupied this place. (b) Inasmuch as the law, the introduction of which is described in Neh. 8, was the so-called Priestly law of the Hexateuch, its introduction must have occurred after the assembly of Neh. 9^{f.}, for here the people, besides pledging themselves to fidelity to the law (10 30 [29]), bound themselves to observe certain precepts (vv. 36-40 [35-39]) which are found for the most part in the Priestly law; had these been integral parts of the law which the people had just sworn to obey, there would have been no reason for special vows of observance in the case of these particular precepts.² Further, (c) that all that is related in Neh. 8-10 must have taken place after what we read in Neh. 13 4-31. At all events, the enactment of the congregation in Neh. 10 38-40 [37-39], that the Levites shall themselves collect the tithes and then bring the tenth part of these to the temple treasury for the priests, transports us to a period when the method by which, according to Neh. 13 10-13, Nehemiah proposed to secure the Levites in their revenues was regarded as insufficient.

Finally, (d) the redactor has erroneously made the narrative regarding Ezra (Ezra 7-10) anterior to that regarding Nehemiah. Whilst Ezra and a considerable band of exiles have, according to the narrative in its present form, already returned to the land of their fathers, there is not in Neh. 1 1-7 5 13 4-31 a single hint of these or of any earlier return, and among the names of those who took part in the building of the wall (Neh. 3) we seek in vain for those of Ezra's companions (Ezra 8 2-14).

2. Another strange thing is that after Ezra had already demanded separation from, and dismissal of, the alien wives (Ezra 10 3 11 19), Nehemiah should have rested content with a much smaller concession—with an undertaking, namely, that neither the men themselves nor their children should in future contract mixed marriages (Neh. 13 23-25).

3. Further, in the narrative of Ezra's arrival and first measures in Jerusalem we meet with at least one circumstance which transports us to Nehemiah's latest period; namely, that Ezra, shortly after his arrival at Jerusalem, takes up his quarters with a son of the high priest Eliashib (Ezra 10 6 cp Neh. 12 10^{f.} 22); as Eliashib was still high priest in the thirty-second year of Artaxerxes (Neh. 13 6), it is improbable that a son of his should already have been a prominent personage in the seventh year of that monarch, which according to Ezra 7 7^{f.} was the date of Ezra's coming. What is related must thus have occurred most probably after Eliashib's death, and certainly after the events of Neh. 13 4-31. When the redactor reversed the original order 'Nehemiah-Ezra,' which is still met with in Neh. 12 26, he also moved back the date of Ezra's coming and then further inserted the name of Ezra at least once, in a rather inappropriate place, in the account of the building of the wall (Neh. 12 36).

The order in which the events related in the books now before us actually occurred was probably the following.

1. After the temple had been rebuilt (519-515) by

1 See HEXATEUCH, § 29^{f.}, HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 9.

2 [See further the pages devoted to this subject in Koster's Het Herstel.]

Jews who had been left behind in Judah and Jerusalem (Ezra 5:1-6:15) Nehemiah came to Jerusalem in 445 and rebuilt and consecrated the city wall (Neh. 1:1-7:5 12:27-43).

2. On a second visit, in 433, on his return from a journey to court, he came forward as an ecclesiastical reformer (Neh. 13:4-31).

3. Not long afterwards, the date in Ezra 7:7 being incorrect, Ezra arrived in Jerusalem with his band of exiles and, perceiving that his compatriots had been intermarrying with their heathen neighbours, endeavoured, but in vain, to dissolve the mixed marriages (Ezra 7:10).¹

4. Upon this, under the joint leadership of Nehemiah and Ezra, was held the great assembly at which the Jews separated themselves from the people of the nations, and thus 'the congregation' was constituted (Neh. 9: f. 13:1-3).

5. Into the congregation thus formed, the new law was shortly afterwards introduced (Neh. 8).

The reason that induced our author to invent a return of exiles in the time of Cyrus and to give to the events of Nehemiah's and Ezra's time a different order from that which he found in his sources, was perhaps this.

17. Motives for alterations.

(a) According to his view (2 Ch. 36:20) all Israel had been carried into captivity, no Israelites at all having been left behind in Palestine. Israel's restoration, which began with the rebuilding of the temple, thus became possible only with the return of the exiles. This must accordingly have already occurred before the time of Darius. When, then, in one of his sources (Ezra 5:13-16) our author came across a tradition (apparently resting on Is. 44:28-45:8) which ascribed the founding of the temple to Cyrus, he supposed that the return of the exiles also had occurred under that king.

(b) Just as the temple had been rebuilt and a beginning made with the restoration of Israel by those who returned in the reign of Cyrus, so in like manner, according to our author, the honour of rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem, the second great step in the restoration of Israel, fell to the lot of the exiles who returned with Ezra. In this view he placed Ezra 7-10 before the account of the restoration of the wall by Nehemiah, and gave as the date of Ezra's arrival the seventh year of Artaxerxes; and more than this, in Ezra 4:6-23 he gives it to be clearly understood that already before Nehemiah's time a beginning had been made with the rebuilding of the walls by the people of Ezra's company. Thus the restoration of Israel had been begun by returned exiles, and by returned exiles also had it been brought to a successful issue.

(c) The author's reason for placing Neh. 9: f. after Neh. 8 is obvious. In the last-named chapter he saw no introduction of a new law-book—all laws were by his time laws of Moses,—but the reading of the old law which had for centuries possessed validity for Israel, though often transgressed; as, then, Neh. 9: f. spoke of an assembly at which those present came under obligation to observe the law, this must have been preceded by the public reading of the law. That this was the engagement he had in view appears not obscurely in the verses (Neh. 9:3 f.) interpolated by him, by which he makes the people's pledge of fidelity to the law to be preceded by a public reading by the Levites, and so makes the assembly of chap. 9: f. become in a certain sense a continuation of that of chap. 8.

EZRA, THE GREEK. The Greek, the Latin (before Jerome's time), the Syriac, and the English Bible from 1560 onwards, designate the book as

1. Name. Esd. A, or 1 Esd. (the canonical books Ezra-Neh. being in Θ Esd. B), either because its narrator begins at a chronologically earlier date than does the Hebrew, or because it is not a mere translation into Greek like Esd. B, but a free redaction made at a date earlier than Esd. B.

The Latin Bibles, since the time of Jerome, have called it 3 Esd. (2 Esd. being Nehemiah); in a Florentine MS (cp Pitra, Anal. sac. 2:635) it is called 3 Paralip.; others again cite it as 2 Esd. (Ezra-Nehemiah being regarded as one book); cp Isidor, Or. 6:2. In ΘA it bears, like the other book of the same name, the inscription (e) $\epsilon\epsilon\pi\alpha\varsigma$ (= Ezra יֵזְרָאֵל ; but Nestle, Margin, 29, conjectures $\epsilon\epsilon\pi\alpha\varsigma$ α $\epsilon\epsilon\pi\epsilon\upsilon\varsigma$, $\epsilon\epsilon\pi\alpha\varsigma$ β $\epsilon\epsilon\pi\epsilon\upsilon\varsigma$ to have been the oldest superscriptions); and the subscription $\epsilon\epsilon\pi\alpha\varsigma$ α (ΘBA); perhaps also the name Pastor, used by Jerome in Prolog. Gal., refers to our book.¹

Modern writers call the book the apocryphal Ezra; the Greek Ezra would be better (see APOCRYPHA, § 4, ii.).

The best tradition of the text is given in codd. B and A; the book has dropped out from \aleph ; the recension of Lucian is peculiar.

There is a double Latin translation—an older (of which Sabatier in Bibl. Sacr. Latinae versiones antiquae, 1751, gives two versions, one of them from cod. Colbertinus,

2. MSS and Versions. 3703), and a later (admitted into the Vg.), of which the intention was to improve the older Latin translation and make it more intelligible. See also the fragment of a third Latin translation in Lagarde (Septuag. Studien, 2, 92). The Peshitta does not contain the book; on the other hand, it is found in the Syro-Hexaplar of Paul of Tella (616 A.D.; see Walton, Sacr. Polygl., 1657), doubtless from a strongly corrected Greek text; there is also an Ethiopic version (Dillm. Bibl. Ver. Est. Ethiopica, 5, 94), and an Armenian (this last, worthless critically, is to be found in Holmes, Sergii Maceu codd. Armeni).

3. Contents. The contents of the book are as follows:—

- Chap. 1 (= 2 Ch. 35:36:1-21). Josiah's passover, his death, and his successors down to the destruction of Jerusalem.
- 2:1-14 (= 2 Ch. 36:22 f. Ezra 1:1-11). The so-called edict of Cyrus.
- 2:16-30 [15-26]² (= Ezra 4:7-24). The building of the temple (wall) interrupted by Samaritans in time of Artaxerxes.
- 3:5-3. Triumph of the Jewish youth in the contest between the pages-in-waiting before Darius. Leave for the return to Jerusalem given.
- 5:4-5. Beginning of a list of those who returned under Joshua and Zerubbabel.
- 5:7-73 [70] (= Ezra 2:1-4 5:24 Neh. 7:6-73). List of those who returned with Zerubbabel. Labours on the temple. Their suspension under Cyrus until the time of Darius.
- 6:1-7:9 (= Ezra 5:1-6:18). Application by Sisinnus the governor to Darius with reference to the building of the temple. Darius gives permission to build. Completion of the work by Zerubbabel in the sixth year of Darius.
- 7:10-15 (= Ezra 6:19-22). Celebration of the completion of the temple.
- 8:1-9:55 (= Ezra 7:10 Neh. 7:73-8:12). Ezra's work; the return of the exiles. The struggle against mixed marriages. The reading of the law.

¹ [It is a question, however, whether Ezra's arrival should not rather be placed between Nehemiah's first and second visits to Jerusalem. See NEHEMIAH, § 5.]

² The verses in brackets refer to the Greek text.

Thus, apart from the section 31-53 with the account of the pages' competition, which is peculiar to the Greek Ezra, the contents of the book are a doublet of the Hebrew Ezra, with portions of Chronicles and Nehemiah. The opening is very abrupt ('And Josiah held the passover'); cp 125, where the last scene in Josiah's life is introduced not less abruptly. The present conclusion, too, is mutilated; originally, we may suppose, the narrative went beyond Neh. 812, perhaps coming as far down as to Neh. 818 or 1039. Any considerable departure from the Hebrew Ezra is found only in the position of 216-30 and in the fact that 937 ff. (=Neh. 773 ff.) comes immediately after 936 (=Ezra 1044).

Josephus in his Antiquities follows 1 Esd. (the Greek Ezra). The whole arrangement of his narrative, the 4. Josephus. story of the pages' competition, the agreement of many of his names with the Greek against the Hebrew Ezra, all abundantly show that this was the book he had before him, not the Hebrew or its Greek rendering in Esd. B. The only question is as to what parts Josephus copied from our 1 Esd.

What is related in chap. 1 Josephus takes up in Ant. x. 45 ff., though there, so far as we can judge, he seems to depend more on the MT of Ch. or rather on the LXX of Ch. On the other hand, he begins Ant. xi. 11 with our 1 Esd. 21-15 [14] and continues to use it throughout down to Ant. xi. 55. After 1 Esd. 212 [11] he introduces from chap. 6 an edict of CYRUS to SISINNES and SARBASANES; and after 715 he introduces an account of intrigues of the Samaritans which is wanting in the present Greek text. From chap. 8 onwards there are many shortenings; the story ends with 955, but mention is added of the feast of tabernacles (cp Neh. 813-18), the return of the people to their inheritance, and the death of Ezra.

Certain variations from the text make it evident that Josephus used not only a Greek text similar to that which now lies before us, but also the source upon which it is based; cp, for example, Ant. xi. 44 with 1 Esd. 64, and the more skilful phrasing of Ant. xi. 32 with 1 Esd. 33 ff.

The facts (1) that in the best MISS (BA) the Greek Ezra stands beside the canonical books of Ezra and Neh.; (2) that Josephus uses the Greek Ezra, not the Hebrew; (3) that the Greek and the Latin fathers frequently quote from it, especially from the portion that is peculiar to it—chap. 3 f. (cp Pohlmann)¹—lead to the conclusion that originally the same value was attached to 1 Esd. as to the Hebrew Ezra.

Augustine, for example, sees in the praise of truth in chap. 4 a prophecy of Christ, and in one of his lists of canonical books (De doctr. Christ. 28) enumerates two books of Ezra, of which our 1 Esd. was certainly one.

The Church's unfavourable judgment on 1 Esd. is due to Jerome, whose firm attachment to the Hebrew OT led him to refrain, in the first instance, from translating this and the other Apocrypha, remarking in his preface to Ezra: "nec quemquam moveat quod unus a nobis editus liber est; nec apocryphorum tertii et quarti sonitus delectetur; quia et apud Hebræos Esdræ Nehemiæque sermones in unum volumen coarctantur." This became a ruling decision for the Church, and the Tridentine edition of the Vg. prints 1 Esd., as it prints the Apocalypse of Ezra (4 Esd.) and the Prayer of Manasse, after the NT, in a small-type appendix, "quippe qui a nonnullis sanctis Patribus interdum citantur et in aliquibus Bibliis latinis . . . (not in Greek, we are to infer) reperiantur." The Protestant Church followed in the same course. Karstadt (De canonicis scripturis lib., 1520) places the book among the 'plane apocryphi'; Luther translated neither 1 Esd. nor 2 [4] Esd. 'since they contain absolutely nothing which one could not much more easily find in Esop or in even more trivial books' (Erlangen ed. 68 103 f.).

In the EV 1 Esd. heads the list of the Apocrypha.

Formerly 1 Esd. used to be regarded as a free handling of Εσδρας β, the LXX version of the canonical Ezra (so Keil, Bissell, and others; see on the other side, Nestle, Marg. 23 ff.). Of more critical views, three have to be mentioned. (a) Some (e.g., Trendelenburg and Fritzsche) consider it to have been taken directly from the Hebrew. (b) Others (e.g., Ewald, Hist. 5165; Thackeray in Hastings, DB) assume a no longer extant Greek version of the canonical Ch.-Ezra-Neh. from which were taken, in the first instance, the present Greek Ezra as a free redaction, and afterwards the more scrupulously careful rendering of LXX. (c) Sir H. H. Howorth (Acad.; see § 13) sees in 1 Esd. the original and genuine LXX translation, the present LXX text of Εσδρας β being perhaps that of Theodotion (cp the case of Daniel); in the present case, however, both versions found admission alongside of each other into the Greek canon). This would explain how it came about that our book, as being of greater age, took the place of precedence as Εσδρας α in the MSS of our present LXX. That it came closer to the original than Εσδρας β would seem to be supported by the fact that it is used by Josephus, as also by the better condition, from a text-critical point of view, of many passages when compared with Εσδρας β (see Thackeray, Hastings' DB 1760). What strikes the present writer as of primary importance to the discussion is the observation that the text of 1 Esd. is of very unequal value and of varying degrees of excellence when compared with the various parts of the parallel Hebrew.

Chap. 1 is quite manifestly inferior to 2 Ch. 35 f.; cp, for example, 1510 f. 25 [23] (Pharaoh), 126 [28] 34 [32] (Jechoniah), 135 [33] (Israel), 13843 [36 41] (Jehoiakim), 156 [53]. On the other hand, the text of chap. 6 is good—perhaps still better than in the parallel Ezra 51 ff.; e.g., observe the names in 63, the form of the superscription of the letter in 67, the omission of 'the Great God' of Ezra 58 in 68, the mention of the names in 627; according to 629 f. the royal treasury makes merely a grant of the sacrifices to be offered for the life of the king, in Ezra 68 f. it is a grant of all the temple expenses. In 216-30 [15-26] the relative value of the two texts is not so clear; the superscription and exordium of the letter, as also the names, come down to us better in 1 Esd.; on the other hand, the rest of the passage shows many misunderstandings.

This varying quality of the text excludes the supposition that the Greek version can have been produced aus einem Guss. It thus becomes necessary to treat it as a compilation and to analyse it as such into its component parts:—

1. Ch. 31-53, relating to the pages' competition, is an independent piece of narrative that is also found standing by itself in a MS of the Vg. (Berger, Hist. de la Vulgate, 93, p. 94, n. 5). To all appearance this piece is itself also a composite production, the praise of truth being an addition. The whole seems to have been originally written in Greek, and shows affinity with the epistle of Aristes (Ew. Hist. 5165); the writer appears to have knowledge of the court history of Persia (429 ff.). The hero of the story (ὁ νεανίσκος, 458) was not originally Zerubbabel.

2. 61-715 216-30a [15-26a]. Fragment of an Aramaic historical writing (the parallel portions of Ezra are written in Aramaic). It is worthy of notice that Jos. Ant. xi. 49 introduces immediately after our 715 an expansion in which Samaritan intrigues are described. This leads to the inference that something of the same kind must have fallen out between 6 and 215-26. The Greek translation of this Aramaic fragment here goes back perhaps to a better text recension than we have in the case of the canonical Ezra.

3. Ch. 8 f. is from the Ezra document (=Ezra 7-10 Neh. 773 81 ff.). What the present writer thinks of that document is expressed elsewhere (see EZRA, § 5); he now speaks only of the text of the Greek Ezra, which here seems to rest upon a different Hebrew text from MT; observe the designation of Ezra as ἱερεὺς καὶ ἀναγνώστης τοῦ νόμου (part from 3225 [A] where he is γραμματεὺς as in the Chroniker) as compared with the יהוה קצין ספר דברי קצין of MT; the connection of 937 ff. with 936; the name Theras (841); and the like.

4. 21-15 57-73 72-4 6-15. Sections taken from the Chroniker.

5. Ch. 1 is a defective, and in many places, incorrect translation of the Hebrew of 2 Ch. 35 f., Esd. B having been at the same time before the translator. Of this, as well as of the hurried manner of this translator, we have a specially instructive illustration in 123 [21] f., which has been condensed from 2 Ch. 35 19a-19d G (notice also the confusion in v. 24).

Our book, then, we may venture to suppose, arose somewhat as follows:—

(a) In the first place an Egyptian Jew combined the story of 31-53 with the Aramaic fragment 61-715 . . . 216-30a which he translated into Greek. He made the story refer to Zerubbabel (413 56), and after 53 interpolated a section which has reached us only in a mutilated form (some words have also fallen out before Zerubbabel in v. 5). It contained originally the names (the names, be it observed; not the numbers) of the heads of families of the returning exiles, especially of their leaders.

(b) Next, a later writer, whose readers were acquainted with the first collection or composition (a), just spoken of, addressed himself, with the entire work of the Chronicler before him, to the task of translating that portion of Ch. which we now know as the book of Ezra.

He began with 2:1-15, and in order to explain Zerubbabel's petition to Darius for the restoration of the temple (notwithstanding the edict of Cyrus), transferred 2:16-30 from its later position in the book to its present place, the result being that what had originally followed 7:15 was lost; in the further course of his translating he introduced into his work, from the Chronicler, all that he did not already find in his original. Finally chap. 1 came to be prefixed; perhaps it owes its position here to a mere oversight (similar to that which has placed 2 Ch. 30:22 f. at the end of Ch.)—possibly remaining attached to 1 Esd. when that book was transferred from its connection in a (bad) Greek translation of Ch.-Ezra-Neh., to find admission into the present Greek canon.

The purpose of the book has been estimated variously, and indeed, in the case of so complex a compilation, is difficult to determine. The subscription

7. Purpose. of Vetus Itala—'de Templi Restitutione'—is appropriate enough; in point of fact, the various restorations of the Jewish worship and religious organisation under Josiah, Zerubbabel, and Ezra are substantially the theme of the book. The political interest is in the background; the rebuilding of the wall becomes a rebuilding of the temple; the restitution of the sacred vessels, the cleansing of the congregation, the regulation of the religious festivals figure as the main things. The book, accordingly, in its present form, bears throughout the impress of the religious and ecclesiastical temper which characterised the Jewish people of the late post-exilic period; and this becomes all the clearer by comparison with the history we find in Josephus. Perhaps the Greek-reading public for whom the work was published included others besides Jews. Note the remarks in 8:3-9:39 and compare also 2:3 (ὁ κύριος τοῦ Ἰσραὴλ, κύριος ὁ ὑψιστος; also 9:46); the same thing is suggested by the good Greek style, which is much superior to that of Esd. B. At the same time we are hardly inclined to think that the book, either as a whole or in any of its parts, was designed to influence any Gentile power in favour of the Jews.¹ It is enough to suppose a purely historical intention—that the book is designed to set forth, for the benefit of readers who have received a Grecian education, the restoration of the post-exilic Jewish community.

(Cp Bertholdt, Einkl. 3:1011 (12^a-19), in whose view the purpose was to compile from older works a history of the temple from the time when its regular services ceased down to its rebuilding and the re-establishment of the ritual.)

As we now have it, the book is full of repetitions, errors, and inconsistencies. The repeated narratives of

8. Historical Value. opposition offered to the building of the temple (2:16 f., 5:66-73, 6) cannot all of them be historical; 5:66-73 leaves the impression of being an imitation of pure fiction; 2:16 f. dealt originally with the building of the wall but was made by the compiler to refer to the building of the temple; ch. 6 on the other hand speaks from the outset of the building of the temple. The list of positive errors would be long.

Take as examples 1:25 [23] (Pharaoh for Pharaoh-Necho), 1:34 [32] (Jechoniah for Joahaz), 1:35 [33] (Israel), 1:52 [49] (βασιλεὺς); 2:16 [15] (עזרא as a name); 5:40 (Nehemiah and Atharates), 5:73 [70] (two years until the reign of Darius), 7:4 (Artaxerxes); 7:15 (King of the Assyrians); 9:40-49 (Ezra a high priest); 9:49 (Atharates as a proper name).

Of these errors some are to be charged to the Chronicler, others to the latest compiler. Finally, the chronological scheme is quite wrong. Artaxerxes is placed before Darius (but contrast 7:4 ^{BA}); Zerubbabel returns, according to the connection in ch. 5, under Darius (cp EZRA-NEHEMIAH, § 7); but, according to the original scheme of 5:7 f., which also reappears in vv. 7:1-73, under Cyrus. Thus the narrative actually proceeds backwards; 2:15-26 happens under Artaxerxes, 3:1 f. under Darius, 5:7 f. under Cyrus. Manifest were the attempts to introduce order into this chaos. Josephus makes out the Artaxerxes of 2:16 to be Cambyses, represents Zerubbabel as having returned to the court of Darius after having come up to Jerusalem in the reign of Cyrus, adds Darius to Cyrus in 5:71 and makes the special point of the complaint of Sisinnus to be that the temple buildings were assuming too large dimensions. Howorth (Acad. 17 f.) seeks to remedy matters by substituting Darius Nothus (423-404) for Darius Hystaspis. The view of the origin of the book set forth in the preceding paragraphs adequately explains the contradictions: the compiler, as we have seen, introduced between 2:15 [14] and 3:1, the incident of the interruption of the building of the temple (the wall) under Artaxerxes in order to supply a motive for Zerubbabel's petition to Darius; and, the story of 3:1 f. having once broken the true historical connection, it became necessary to transfer to Darius's time events which in the document before the compiler were brought into the reign of Cyrus (5:7-73).

It is our duty as critics to distinguish between the historical value of the original elements and that of the present compilation. As it stands, the compilation bears the impress of the genuine Jewish spirit, which, without any feeling for history, writes stories for the honour and glory of Judaism, and regards the kings of the alien world-power purely as instruments for bringing to realisation the greatness of Israel. On the other hand, in the opinion of the present writer, the Aramaic source of ch. 6 is entitled to be regarded as historical;¹ also what we read in 2:16 f. of the interruption of the building of the wall, even if we cannot be sure under whose reign it occurred. Chap. 3:1 f., however, have of course no similar claim to our respect. Cp EZRA-NEHEMIAH.

In praise of the text of 1 Esd. as an aid to the student of the MT, enough has been said elsewhere (EZRA-NEHEMIAH, § 1).

9. Value for literary criticism. It is of its usefulness for literary criticism that we have to speak here, supplementing the article already referred to. The question to be raised is this, How did Neh. 1:1-7:72 come to be interpolated between Ezra 10:44 and Neh. 7:73 (or conversely Neh. 7:73-10:39, which plainly belongs to the Ezra-document, between Neh. 7:72 and 11) whilst yet, in 1 Esd., 9:37 (= Neh. 7:73) follows 9:36 (= Ezra 10:44)? It should be borne in mind that 1 Esd. 9:37 is plainly out of place in its present position, and that 9:37 f. corresponds exactly to 5:46 f. (Neh. 7:73 f. to Ezra 2:70 f.). To supplement EZRA-NEHEMIAH (§§ 8, 15), we may suggest that what happened may have been somewhat like this.

The lists as well as the accounts of the contributions to the building and of the settlement are in their original place in Ezra 2 (= 1 Esd. 5) perhaps taken from a source that lay before the Chronicler; Neh. 7:5 suggested to the Chronicler the idea of bringing forward the lists again, and accordingly he introduces them at 7:6 along with 7:70-73 = Ezra 2:68-70. Further, the original Nehemiah-document (see EZRA II., § 6) contained an account of the popular assembly in Jerusalem (75), of which traces still survive in 1 Esd. 9:49 (Atharates [see TIRSHATHA] the speaker!) 9:51 f. 54; but the Chronicler had before him only fragments of this, and accordingly he substituted, from the Ezra-document, the account of the assembly for the reading of the law, worked over by himself and prefaced with the words יָצַע הַחֹדֶשׁ הַזֶּה בְּיַד עֲזָרָה (1 Esd. 9:51).

Thus the narrative came to disappear from its original place in the Ezra-document (let us say, before Ezra 9:1 = 1 Esd. 8:68). Everything else (Neh. 8:13-10:39) is embellishment by the Chronicler and is to some extent parallel with Ezra 8:35-10:44 (= 1 Esd. 8:65-9:36). Later still Ezra 8:1 (= 1 Esd. 5:47), which has nothing to do with its present connection, was introduced from Neh. 7:73b, 8:1, in order to bring Ezra 2:68 and Neh. 7:70 f. into complete correspondence with each other. When, finally, 1 Esd. came to be translated in agreement with the work of the Chronicler and translated (see above, § 6, end), the translator added after 1 Esd. 9:36 from Neh. 8 everything relating to Ezra that he found in that work.

The style of the book is genuinely Greek; fluent and easy, it betrays none of ⁶'s slavish dependence on the Hebrew. Perhaps the elegance of its Greek was one of the reasons Josephus had for using 1 Esd.

Eichhorn (Eintl. 346, [95]) detects in its style a likeness to the style of Symmachus; Gwynn (Dict. Chr. Biogr., s.v. 'Theodotion', 977) calls attention to its similarity to that of Daniel in Θ , which suggests (cp Thackeray, Hastings' DB, 761) that both 1 Esd. and Dan. (LXX) may be renderings by the same hand. Sometimes the translator finds himself unable to make anything of his Aramaic original; see, for example, $\Theta 4$ (καὶ τὰλλα πάντα), 220 b 24, and so forth.

As regards the date of the compilation all that can be said is that the book in its present form, or perhaps still without ch. 1, was already in the hands of Josephus (100 A.D.). The affinities between 1 Esd. 31 ff. and Esther 11-13, as also between 1 Esd. and Dan. (LXX), give our nearest indications for any approximate determination of date.

The view of Lupton (Comm. 11-14) that the book was designed to prepare the way for the building of the temple of Onias for the Jews of Alexandria (170 B.C.) is insufficiently supported.

The place of composition of the book, or of its constituent portions, is not known. There is at present a disposition to assume an Egyptian authorship (cp Lupton, 10 ff.).

The mention of εις την θάλασσαν πλεῖν καὶ ποταμούς in 423, and the use of the expression Ευρία (or κόλιη Συρία) καὶ Φοινίκη for $\eta\eta\eta\eta\eta\eta$ may be noticed (cp CELESYRIA).

The most important point to be considered is whether 3 f. betokens contact with the religious philosophy of Alexandria. Such a contact certainly is disclosed in the praise of truth.

See especially the personification in 438-40, where we read that while all else perishes, Truth lives and conquers for evermore. With her there is no partiality in accepting of persons; all else is unrighteous, but in her and her judgments there is never any wrong; and all men who do well like her works. Hers is the strength and the sovereignty and the power and the majesty of all ages (Mt. 613 RVmg.).

Even granting the Alexandrian origin of this section, however, especially if it be only a later addition, we are still very largely in ignorance of the origin of the work as a whole.

Dähne¹ points to the use of $\delta \psi\psi\sigma\tau\omicron\varsigma$ as a Divine name—a feature by which 1 Esd. (23 6 31 [30] 8 19 21 9 46) is distinguished from the Hebrew—as an example of its Hellenistic habit of thought. FAIR-HAVENS (Acts 27:8: εις τόπον τινὰ καλούμενον Καλοῦς Λιμένας [Ti. WH]), at some point on the S. shore of Crete near Lasea. Paul's ship was detained here for some time, owing apparently to continued NW winds. Precisely according with this is the situation of the small port still known as the Fair Havens ('ς τοῦς Καλοῦς Λιμένωνας), two hours W. of C. Leonda. It is open to the east but protected from SW. winds by two rocky islets. The coast projects W. in C. Lithinos or C. Matala (anc. Lissen or Lisses; Λισσὴν, Str. 479), and then bends N. for many miles. The vessel would therefore be compelled to wait at Καλοῦς Λιμένες for a change of wind to enable her to get round the point. This small anchorage, however, might well be regarded as not 'commodious to winter in.' Hence the attempt to work to Phenice. Paul himself was averse from taking the risks of a passage across the Gulf of Messara, and the event proved that his caution was sound (v. 10, where τὸν πλοῦν signifies, not the entire voyage, but the crossing from Fair Havens to Phenice).

FAITH. (a) 'Faith' (LXX and NT ΠΙΣΤΙΣ) in the sense of 'good faith' or 'faithfulness' occurs in the EV of Dt. 32:20 (יְמוּנָה , 'emūn) Mt. 23:23 Rom. 1. Explanation of the term. 33 Gal. 5:22 (RV 'faithfulness') 1 Tim. 1:5 19 27 2 Tim. 2:22 3:10 4:7 Tit. 2:10 (EV 'fidelity') Rev. 2:19 13:10. We must not add

Hab. 2:4, because the translators have here evidently been influenced by the Pauline use of the words (see below, § 4). Nor need we deny that in some of these passages faithfulness to God is included; all that has to be emphasised is that 'faithfulness' (cp TRUTH) is used as a general term without exclusive reference either to God or to man as its object. So, too, in Ecclus. 46:15, ἐν πίστει αὐτοῦ means 'by his honesty,' or 'by his veracity'; the Hebrew text no doubt had בְּאֵמֶת , though the א alone is now legible in the Oxford fragment.

(b) Of the term 'faith' with exclusive reference to God—i.e., trust or belief, 'the subjective condition of salvation' (H. Schultz; cp 1 Pet. 1:5), no example can be cited from the OT. The famous passage, Hab. 2:4, should probably be rendered 'but the righteous—by his faithfulness will he remain alive.' There is nothing in the context to prove that יְמוּנָה , 'emūnāh, here means faithful performance of promises made to God; elsewhere the test of righteousness is the faithful performance of moral duties towards fellow-Israelites or fellow-men (see Jer. 5:2). Delitzsch, who, in deference to tradition, retains the rendering, 'by his faith will he live,' fully admits that יְמוּנָה has a passive, not an active, sense, and that the form has nothing to do with יְמוּנָה , hē'emin, 'to believe.'

It is true, however, that Jewish and Christian tradition favour the active sense. The Gk. Vss. render by πίστις—the LXX strangely ἐκ πίστεως μου;¹ Moses and David Kimḥi gloss אמתה by אמתתך, hiffāḥōn, 'trust.'

In fact, there is no word equivalent to 'faith' in the active sense in biblical Hebrew: Talmudic Hebrew has אמתתך (from אמת=אמתת, 'to believe') and אמתתך. On the other hand, אמתתך, 'to believe,' followed by ביהוה (literally 'in Yahwē') is of frequent occurrence. A notable passage is Gen. 15.6,² where EV gives, 'and he believed in the LORD; and he [Yahwē] counted it to him for righteousness.' The idiom rendered 'he believed in' (אמתתך) is a very striking one; the belief intended is, not merely a crediting of a testimony concerning a person or a thing (this would be expressed by אמתתך), but a laying firm hold morally on a person or a thing, without the help of any intermediate agency (cp the phrase, 'to cleave to Yahwē,' דבק ב', Dt. 10.20 11.22, etc.). Abraham has a sure confidence in God that, in spite of natural conditions, he will give him a son as an heir, and Yahwē reckons this as righteousness, because the first obligation of the truly righteous man is to trust God.

This relation of trust to righteousness is specially Deuteronic; trust or belief is obedience; both אמתתך and אמתתך are found (see Dt. 9.23 1.32).

Though, however, the phrase, 'to believe (in) God,' occurs only once in the story of Abraham, the idea of the phrase pervades the narrative. Abraham is the hero of faith (see Heb. 11.8-12, and ABRAHAM, § 2). It is this that made his life so precious to pious Jews, for faith, they knew, was the quality which alone could preserve them as a people, and of faith they had a perfect example in Abraham (cp Gal. 3.9), whose spirit, unlike that of his descendants (Ps. 78.8), was 'constant' or 'steadfast' towards God. The idea must surely have been derived from some great religious teacher; was it perhaps Isaiah? Such is Duhm's opinion. According to him, the supreme importance of believing in God was first expressed by Isaiah in his interview with Ahaz, when he said, 'If ye take not hold [of God], ye shall not keep hold [of your life];' אִלֵּי דָם אֱמַתְךָ לֹא תִהְיֶה כִּי לֹא תִהְיֶה (Is. 7.9). Again, in 2 Ch. 20.20 the Chronicler puts these deeply-felt words into the mouth of King Jehoshaphat, 'Hear me, O Judah, and ye inhabitants of Jerusalem; take hold of Yahwē your God,³ so shall ye keep hold (of your life); take hold of his prophets, so shall ye prosper.' The Psalmists, too, use the phrase, though not very frequently (Ps. 78.22-32 106.12-24 119.66), and it so happens that the only passage of the Psalter quoted by Paul to illustrate the importance of faith (πίστις) is Ps. 116.10, of which he adopts C's version, ἐπίστευσα διὸ ἐλάλησα, which cannot represent the right text.⁴

The Second Gospel surprises us by the statement that the first sermons of Jesus contained the exhortation,

2. Its use by the Synoptists. believe in (πιστεύετε ἐν) the Gospel (Mk. 1.15). The phrase πιστεύετε ἐν (בְּיְהוָה) is unique in the NT.

Jn. 3.15 Eph. 1.13 have indeed been referred to as containing it; but the reference implies an interpretation which is certainly not to be preferred (see RV). In Gal. 3.26, however, and in 1 Tim. 3.13 we have the phrase [ἡ] πίστις [ἡ] ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, 'faith in Christ Jesus.'

Possibly 'in (ἐν) the gospel' was not in Mk.'s original source; this writer often introduces superfluous words from an excessive striving after clearness.

¹ Bishop Lightfoot (Galatians (2), 154) conjectures that the translator may have meant this to be understood, 'by faith in me'; but surely אמתתך most naturally means, 'by my fidelity to my promise' (cp Ps. 89.33 [34] L), and ἐκ πίστεως μου can certainly mean this. Lightfoot himself quotes Rom. 3.3, τὴν πίστιν τοῦ Θεοῦ.

² Usually assigned to J or J₂ (but see Holz. Einh. 95).

⁴ It is true, MT is as corrupt as the text presupposed by C (see Che. Ps. (2)).

'Repent and believe' would be quite sufficient (for the absolute use of πιστεύετε, see Mk. 9.42 15.32 Lk. 8.12.) Certainly the statement in Mk. 1.15 may be well founded so far as 'believe' is concerned. It is credible that Jesus used the words 'believe,' 'faith,' very early in his ministry, and that he quickly drew the eyes of men upon himself, without having occasion to use the words 'Believe in me.' He spoke 'as one having authority' (Mt. 7.29 Mk. 1.22), and such an one produces faith in himself without having occasion to ask for it. In the Sermon on the Mount (Mt. 6.30) we meet with the phrase δειλόπιστοι, 'men of little faith,' which is not classical Greek; it is equivalent to the Talmudic phrase אמתתך אמתתך, 'small in faith.' After the 'rebuke' of the wind and the waves Jesus said (Mk. 4.40 tells us), 'Why are ye fearful? have ye not yet faith?' Again, in the narrative of the healing of the centurion's servant we read of Jesus expressing surprise at the centurion's faith, which exceeded any faith that he had as yet found among Israelites (Mt. 8.10). The scarcity of 'faith' in his native district was such that he 'did not many mighty works there' (Mt. 13.58), and to his own disciples he had to give the exhortation, 'Have faith in God' (ἐχετε πίστιν Θεοῦ), Mk. 11.22, whilst they on their side had to ask for help against unbelief (Mk. 9.24; cp Lk. 17.5)—i.e., for his efficacious intercessory prayers (Lk. 22.32). This all-important possession—what is it?

'Di', buon Cristiano, fatti manifesto;
Fede che è?

It is not an intellectual assent and consent to dogmatic decrees; it needs not 'proofs physic and metaphysic,' nor phraseological suggestions 'rained'² throughout the Scriptures. It is the assent and consent of the human personality—the recognition 'with heart, and mind, and soul, and strength' of the truth that God is not only 'King of Israel,' and therefore of each Israelite, but also de jure sovereign of the world which he made, and that anything necessary for the establishment of his sovereignty de facto over the world and its inhabitants will be granted to those of the true Israel who ask it. Not only if the opposition of heathen rulers require signs and wonders in order that it may be quelled ('Be thou removed, O mountain'), but if it be necessary for the production in any individual of a filial feeling towards God, the sickness which oppresses, or the physical danger which threatens that individual will be removed, if he ask for this in 'faith.' For himself, Jesus demands unconditional trust; for God, he requires undoubting belief or 'faith.'

The distinction is not an idle one. In the Psalms, 'trust' is the characteristic attitude of the soul towards God. When, however, the Son had come, some new phrase, or at any rate some old phrase which could be invested with a new dignity, seemed to be required to express the joyous and undoubting confidence which Jesus sought to cultivate in his disciples; that phrase was 'faith.' For himself, as we have seen, he asked not faith, but trust; the distinction can, however, best be expressed in German, 'One has Vertrauen on God, Zutrauen to Jesus' (Holtzmann). Jesus is one 'greater than the prophets'; in teaching his disciples how to pray, he implies that though they are his brethren, he is in a fuller sense 'Son of God' than they are. They must therefore trust him, see with his eyes, hear with his ears; then they will believe in God as he does, and be able to do the wonderful things which he himself, in the service of the kingdom, is enabled to do.

In the Fourth Gospel the noun (πίστις: eight times in Mt., five in Mk., eleven in Lk.,) does not occur once. The verb (πιστεύω) occurs ninety-nine times, and might therefore be expected to convey a prominent idea of the evangelist. Such, however, cannot be said to be the case. 'To know God' is, in this Gospel, a

3. In the much deeper and fuller idea than 'to believe in (πιστ. εἰς) God,' or 'in the Son.' 'The best spiritual blessings can be had now; Gospel. 'belief' in the God who will shortly redeem

Israel gives place to joyous, personal communion with the God who has redeemed his own from the power of evil by manifesting himself to them; such persons 'know' God. 'Believing' is no doubt a necessary pre-requisite of knowledge. Those who do not believe have had their sentence already (ἤδη κέκριται, Jn. 3:18), because they do not receive the testimony of Jesus. If there are those who cannot believe—i.e., who have no spiritual susceptibility—it is because a demoniacal power ('the prince of this world') has blinded them (Jn. 12:39 f.), or because they are entirely absorbed in giving and receiving honour as members of a close corporation, the existence of which is imperilled by the claims of Jesus (Jn. 5:44). Cp Gnosis, § 2. TRUTH.

Paul's conception of faith needs to be considered in connection with his own inward personal history, and in 4. In other NT combination with his conception of writings. RIGHTEOUSNESS [g.v.]. The 'faith' of the Epistle of James is also excluded from consideration here, because it is neither clear nor homogeneous. So much, however, may be suggested, that the view of the intention of Jas. 2:14-26 sometimes put forward—viz., that the author is controverting a prevalent misuse of Paul's doctrine of faith—is possible only if the work belongs to the post-apostolic age¹ (cp JAMES, EPISTLE OF).

The idea of faith in the Epistle to the Hebrews is not open to the same objection. It is neither mystical nor metaphysical; but it satisfies the fundamental requirements of spiritual religion. 'Faith' is obedience, just as unbelief is equivalent to disobedience (Heb. 3:18 f.); hence, 'without faith it is impossible to please God' (Heb. 11:6). It is brightened, however, by a strong tinge of hope (cp Ecclus. 49:10, *ἐν πίστει ἐλπίδος*²); faith, like hope (Heb. 6:19), is an anchor of the soul; it enables a man to move about while on earth as if already in the heavenly Jerusalem (Heb. 12:22). Hence the heavenly-minded writer of the great eulogy of faith in this epistle (Heb. 11:1-12:2) defines it as 'the firm expectation (ὑπόστασις) of things hoped for, the conviction (ἔλεγχος) of things not seen': Dante's 'syllogisms' (Parad. 24:94) are not needed here. It is true, however, that in the Pastoral Epistles and in Jude³ we find traces of a nascent conception of faith which ultimately took full form in the theology of the old Catholic Church.

[The present article is introductory. Affinity, whether by marriage (this is the special sense in which the word occurs in EV of 1 K. 3:1 2 Ch. 18:1 Ezra 9:14) or by blood, and the terms expressing relationship, will be considered under KINSHIP. The range of subjects covered by the word 'family' is too large to be treated in a single article.]

The importance of the family in ancient Israel is apparent from the nature of the social conditions then prevailing, which are discussed with some detail elsewhere (see GOVERNMENT, § 3 f.). Other factors no doubt there were in the tribal constitution of the oldest period with which the OT deals; but none of them played a larger part than the family. Indeed, the clan and the tribe were regarded by the Hebrews themselves simply as extensions of the family, which thus had a special prominence given to it. By it, right and wrong are determined; it makes law, administers justice (see LAW AND JUSTICE, §§ 1, 8), and maintains divine worship (see below, § 2). All public affairs are, up to a certain point, family matters; they are regulated by the 'elders,' the heads of families and clans. This condition of things continued long after the settlement in Canaan.

The importance of the family in ancient Israel was partly due, further, to the fact that in those days it was a society of worship. What has to be

2. Place in religion. said of the tribe (see GOVERNMENT, § 8) holds good also of the family, and of the family in the first instance,—viz., that community of worship is the bond which keeps the family and the clan together.

The same thing was true of various Indo-Germanic peoples, notably the Greeks and the Romans. There too the family was the oldest society of worship. The house-father was in primitive times the priest who had charge of the relations between the members of the household and the god. The right of sacrificing, in particular, was his alone. This is clearly shown in the case of the Israelite house-father, in the Passover ritual (Ex. 12:13 f.). The transference of the designation 'father' to the priest in this connection is also worth noting. Accordingly, within historical time in Israel we still find clans celebrating special sacrificial feasts of their own, feasts that had an important place in the social scheme. The members of the family were under the strictest obligation to assemble at the family sanctuary (1 S. 20:29)—an obligation which clearly points to an original family cultus (see FEASTS, § 1). The same family character shows itself in the social position of the slave. He is a member of the family; but he becomes so (and shows that he is so) by joining in the family worship. Eliezer prays to 'the god of his master' (Gen. 24:12). Foreign slaves are received into the religious fellowship of the house by the rite of circumcision—an ancient custom, although no direct precept relating to it that has come down is of earlier date than P (see CIRCUMCISION, § 3). Lastly, reference may be made to all the indications from various sources which make it probable that, until well within historical times, ancestor-worship was practised, and that this worship may therefore be regarded as representing one of the earlier intermediate stages of Israelitic religion. Ancestor-worship, it need hardly be said, is a family worship. How profound was the influence of this family character of religion upon the family life will appear from the details which have been preserved. See further ESCHATOLOGY, § 2 f.

The family takes its character from the position of woman. As to this nothing could be more instructive

3. Marriage. than the form of speech in which the husband is called bā'al, the wife hē'ālāh: the man is the owner, the woman the chattel. Such at least was the custom as far back as our sources carry us (see, however, KINSHIP, § 8). In accordance with the classification of Robertson Smith, this type of marriage and family is therefore usually spoken of now as bā'al marriage. The married woman is completely under the power of her husband; and the husband has over her a proprietary right. Precisely similar is the form of marriage that chiefly prevailed in old Arabia. The husband acquires his property by purchase. The môhâr paid by the ancient Hebrews, as by the ancient Arabs, and by the Syrian fellâhin of the present day, on betrothal, is simply the purchase-money paid to the former proprietor—the father or guardian (cp MARRIAGE, § 1). With the payment of this purchase-money the marriage becomes legally valid, and all rights over the bride pass to the purchaser.

This is seen most clearly in the terms of the law relating to the seduction of a betrothed virgin, that is, one who has already been purchased by her future husband. The compensation to be paid was fixed exactly on the same scale as for a married woman (Dt. 22 23 f.); looked at from the present point of view, it made no difference whether the marriage had been consummated or not; the violation of the rights of private property was equally great in both cases.

Originally, as Robertson Smith (Kin., 72 ff.) rightly observes, such a bâ'al marriage must have been a marriage by capture. Before a daughter of the tribe could be sold into such slavery, the slavery of woman must have become fixed as a firmly rooted usage in virtue of the established fact that ordinarily wives were obtained by plunder from abroad or as captives in war. Such women were of course, in the strictest sense, the property of the husband, the slaves of their master. We know that down to Mohammed's time marriage by capture was extremely prevalent; and, as was only to be expected, we have clear traces that it was not unknown in ancient Israel. In this way, we are told, the Benjamites who had escaped extermination were provided with wives (Judg. 21). Here (the date of the narrative is immaterial) capture in war (v. 10 ff.) stands alongside of capture (in peace) at the annual harvest festival at Shiloh (v. 19 ff.; cp DANCE, § 6). It is safe to infer that at the festival in question there survived ancient customs which owed their existence to a reminiscence of marriage by capture in the strict sense of the word. Such customs belong to the same category as those found among the Arabs, which plainly are designed, after the wife has ceased to be captured really, to represent the practice figuratively (see MARRIAGE, § 3). D, moreover (Dt. 21 10 ff.), has special regulations (whatever we may choose to make of them) as to the manner of entering into a valid marriage with a prisoner of war—regulations which certainly have relation to an ancient custom. By the fact of becoming the lawful married wife of her master, the captive woman passes into the ranks of the free women (as far as it is possible for any woman to be free; see § 4); she is no longer liable to be sold as a slave by her master; if he divorces her she becomes free. The rule of old Arabia was precisely similar. Obviously, however, a certain stigma attached to marriage by capture as soon as it had been supplanted in general usage by marriage (by purchase) with a tribeswoman. Laban reproaches Jacob for his stealthy flight on the ground that he had carried off his daughters with him as if they had been captives taken in war (Gen. 31 26).

Though the wife at marriage passes into the power of her husband, her position is not otherwise changed—at least for the worse—and accordingly she feels no degradation. The unmarried woman in the house of her parents, also is under tutelage; she is the property of her father or guardian. Amongst the Arabs, for example, her guardian can make her his wife or marry her to his son without having to pay any môhâr. In like manner, to take another instance, two fathers can exchange daughters as wives for their sons.

The seduction of an unbetrothed virgin is from this point of view regarded as an injury to property, and, very significantly, is dealt with by the law in that connection only. A virgin is valued at a higher figure than a widow or a divorcée. The seducer has to pay to the father, as compensation, the amount of môhâr which the father would otherwise have been entitled to at her marriage (Ex. 22 15 16). The father, however, is under no compulsion to give the girl in marriage to the seducer; otherwise the way to force a marriage would be only too plain.

FAMILY

Such an encroachment on his rights he is entitled to resist; so also in old Arabia.

Whilst thus treated as a valuable chattel, woman was not originally at all regarded from the point of view of working efficiency. The ancient Semites never appraised her so low. Women were looked upon rather as potential mothers, destined to give the tribe the most priceless of all gifts—namely, sons. On the number of its spears depended in those primitive times the whole power and dignity of clan and tribe. Therefore it was that the tribe did not willingly allow its women to pass by marriage into another tribe so as to enrich it with children. Later, indeed, when a sedentary life had been adopted, views changed and at the present time what the fellâhin grudge is the working efficiency which by marriage is transferred from their own to another family.

The onesidedness of the marriage relation comes into prominence especially at three points:

5. Special points.

(a) where there is polygamy, (b) where there is divorce, and (c) where there is inheritance.

(a) In a condition of society where the husband is regarded as owner of the wife, naturally no limit is set to his powers of acquisition. He can own as many wives as his means allow him to purchase and maintain. He can also acquire secondary wives and make his female slaves his concubines at his pleasure. In this there is felt to be so little of reproach to the first legal wife that instances are not wanting in which she herself promotes the arrangement (as in the cases of Sarah, Leah, and Rachel). The great antiquity of this custom (and thus also of the patriarchal system, see KINSHIP, § 9) is shown by the fact that the word (נָשִׂים) for a secondary wife is common to all the Semitic languages (see ADVERSARY).

On the other hand the wife is very zealously guarded. Though she is by no means shut up as in the Islam of to-day, the custom of veiling—which doubtless originated in the circle of ideas that have been considering—is very ancient (Gen. 24 65 29 25). Adultery is punished with death, and if the husband has suspicions he can subject his wife to the ordeal of jealousy (Nu. 5 11-30; see JEALOUSY, ORDEAL OF). Under such conditions the only case in which the husband can be guilty of adultery is when he seduces the wife of another man. Cp MARRIAGE, § 4.

(b) The right of divorce is equally onesided in favour of the man. It is always in his power to forgo his rights of property and to send his wife back to her home, if only he is prepared at the same time to send back the môhâr. The wife, on the other hand, has no means of obtaining a separation from her husband, or of forcing a divorce.

(c) Neither the unmarried nor the married woman is capable of inheriting. In bâ'al marriages and under the patriarchal system the tendency to limit women's power of ownership and inheritance is easily intelligible. What belongs to the woman goes out of the family at her marriage. Thus in Israel daughters had no right of inheriting along with sons (see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 18), and women's right of property was confined to what they had received as a gift; the wife of good position retains at her marriage (for example) the right to the female slaves who have been given to her as her personal attendants on leaving her father's house (Gen. 16 2 6 30 4 9). Even these, however, in the last resort, rank as part of the husband's property disposable by inheritance. Numerous indications tend to show that in ancient Israel when a man died his womenkind passed to the heir in the same way as the rest of his property (cp MARRIAGE, § 8).

Strictly, however, this right of property over the wife is not a right over her person: it is a right to enjoy her society and have children by her. The husband cannot, for example, sell his wife (though he can sell his children) into slavery (Ex. 21 7). He cannot sell even the concubine whom he has bought as a slave, or gained as a prize of war. Thus, even from a purely legal point of view, the position of a woman who has become a wife of any sort differs from that of a mere slave. There are other aspects also in which she is by no means absolutely without resource against her husband; she can always fall back on her blood-relations, who are ever ready—as they are also under obligation—to support her whenever she has just cause for complaint. Her position is, therefore, in the last resort, essentially dependent on the dignity and influence of her own family. This being so, it is easily intelligible why men were unwilling to let their daughters pass into the possession of a foreign tribe or (later) to a distant home, where they would, to a great extent, lose the protecting influence of their kin. Conversely, we meet in Arabian literature, on occasion, the exhortation not to marry too near one's own camp if one wishes to avoid the continual interference of one's wife's relations (We. GGN 437, '93).

It would be a great mistake, then, to draw immediate conclusions as to the personal relations of the wife to her husband and household from the mere facts of her legal position.

6. Real position. In the lower classes of society, no doubt, the lot of a wife may well have been hard on the whole, inasmuch as (just as among the bedouin and fellāhīn of to-day) upon her fell a very large share indeed of the most arduous labours of the domestic establishment—water-carrying, corn-grinding, baking and the like—besides, as far as circumstances allowed, field labour and the task of tending the flocks and herds. That she owed the master of the house unconditional obedience hardly needs to be said. This, however, held good of her sons as well. If we can draw any conclusion from what we read of the wives of the patriarchs we cannot regard the Hebrew wife as having been unduly subordinate and dependent.

According to custom and right she was entitled to claim her wifely dues, her food and clothing, and general good treatment. Cases of cruelty to wives may be presumed to have occurred no oftener, if no seldomer, than they have always occurred in East and West alike. Women of rank and wealth, who could have personal attendants of their own, had a much easier lot. It need hardly be added that the amount of influence the wife possessed in the household would always depend upon her own character and her attractions for her husband. As a consequence of the comparatively large amount of freedom enjoyed by the Hebrew girl, she never as a wife became the (intellectually and morally) stunted creature which is now the prevalent type of woman in Mohammedan towns.

In the OT stories we are continually meeting with women of energy, capable of wielding great influence in household affairs and of taking independent action, worthy to be commended for their ability no less than for their beauty (Gen. 16.5 ff. 27.13 ff. 42 ff. Judg. 4.4 ff. 17 ff. 166 ff. 1 S. 25.14 ff. etc.). See, also, MARRIAGE, § 4.

Though the legal status of the wife remained unchanged, it is evident that her actual position improved as time went on. More and more did she cease to be regarded as a mere chattel. The original meaning of the mōhār was gradually lost sight of. In Gen. 31.15 the narrator (E) makes it a matter of reproach against Laban that he had sold his daughters and entirely devoured the price received. The story of the creation in J (Gen. 2.18) gives the woman a far higher place in relation to man—that of a 'helper, matching him,' as one part of a whole matches another (עֵזֶר כְּנֶגְדוֹ). A no less lofty conception of the marriage relation finds expression in the prophets who represent the relation of Yahwē to his people under this figure. If, in the songs of Canticles, the beauty and love of women are represented with frank sensuousness and in glowing colours, this is supplemented in Proverbs by the praise of the virtuous wife which reveals a lofty ideal of the sex. It may always of course remain a question how far such theoretical reflections had penetrated into the consciousness of the people or practically affected the position of women in everyday life.

To have a numerous progeny was the desire of every one in ancient Israel. 'Give me children, or I die' was

7. Desire of offspring. the heart's cry of the wife (Gen. 30.1); 'be thou the mother of countless thousands' summed up the good wishes of parents over a departing daughter (Gen. 24.60). Barrenness was a dire misfortune, nay, a divine judgment (1 S. 1.5 ff.); for it was not until she had become mother of a son that the wife attained her full dignity in the household (1 S. 16 ff.; cp Gen. 16.4 30.1 ff.). Still worse was it for the husband to have no son; his house was threatened with extinction. In the last analysis the dread of childlessness had its root in ancestor worship; the man who is childless will have no one to pay the needful dues to his manes after his death (cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 5 ff.). This was often the true reason why a second wife or a concubine was taken, and it was the essential consideration in levirate marriages (see MARRIAGE, § 8, ESCHATOLOGY, § 6).

It is remarkable in this connection that we have absolutely no instance of resort to the means that would appear to us the most obvious—the adoption of a child from without; in Gen. 48 and parallel cases it is a son of the house-father, not an outsider, who is spoken of (see below, § 14). The inheritance in the last resort fell to the slave, who had already been participator in the family worship, rather than to the mere outsider (Gen. 15.3).

The desire was, in the first instance, for sons. By them alone is the family continued; daughters marry and go elsewhere. Sons alone, not daughters, keep up the family worship; sons alone belong to the hāhāl (see SYNAGOGUE), the aggregate of persons capable of bearing arms. The preference accorded to sons shows itself above all in the fact that they alone can inherit (see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 18). In all this we are dealing with views not specifically Israelite; they are fully shared by the ancient Arabs. A much lower value was set on daughters; but it was not forgotten that a mōhār could be demanded for them at their marriage, and nowhere in the OT is there any trace of the contempt for girls which characterises so many nations past and present.

Amongst the ancient Arabs female infanticide seems to have been not very uncommon, the motives being not merely desire to be rid of the trouble of rearing female children, but also resentment against the disgrace of having become father of a daughter (We. GGN, 1893, p. 458). No such practice, as far as our records go, was known among the Hebrews.

Any distinction between legitimate and illegitimate children in the modern sense of these words was unknown.

8. Legitimacy. Legitimacy depended, of course, on fatherhood, and amongst the Hebrews, as amongst the Arabs, the claims of the man will originally have rested not on the presumption of his paternity but on the fact that the mother was his property. Similarly, the children of the slave of the mistress belong to the mistress and are reckoned as hers, inasmuch as their mother belongs to her (Gen. 16.1 ff. 30.1 ff.). At all events, wherever the paternity is certain all children are legitimate, those of the secondary as much as of the principal wife; all are children of the paterfamilias, and all, therefore, are capable of inheriting (Gen. 21.10).

Even Jephthah, though (as son of a harlot) illegitimate in the strictest sense of the word, was brought up in his father's house along with the children born in wedlock, and if these afterwards drove him away it was a case of might against right (Judg. 11.1 ff., cp v. 7). No doubt the right to inherit may not, in such a case, have been exactly the same as in the case of sons of a principal wife—in this respect much seems to have depended on the father's goodwill, and a definitely fixed usage cannot be discovered—but this does not alter the fact that the legitimacy of the children did not depend on the form of the marriage.

In Ex. 1.15 ff. we read of the ease with which, according to Shiphrah and Puah, the Hebrew women delivered themselves. Nevertheless the office of the 9. Birth; recognition. midwife must have been an ancient one (Gen. 35.17 38.28 Ex. 1.15 ff.). Stade has tried to make out (ZATW 6.143 ff. [186]) that among the Hebrews the wife brought forth 'on the knees' of her husband; but this is hardly likely.

In Gen. 30.3 it is proposed that the handmaid bear 'upon the knees' of her mistress so that the child may come to be regarded as the mistress's own. In this case it is easy to see how the practice arose, and how the very expression became a synonym for adoption. Custom and expression alike can have arisen only under the matriarchal system where a woman adopted, in other words, received into her kindred and clan, a child of really alien birth. The transference of the expression to denote adoption by the father represents, therefore, at best, only a secondary sense. Moreover, it is far from certain that the phrase has this meaning at all, or that the symbolical action of placing the child upon the knees at adoption on the father's part was actually used. There is no mention of it at the adoption of Ephraim and Manasseh (Gen. 48), and in Gen. 50:23 the expression is very doubtful (see Holzinger, Comm. ad loc.).

From Job 3:12 all we can infer is that at that time the mother brought forth upon the knees of another person. This need not, however, have been the father; it may have been the midwife or some other female friend. In Jeremiah's time (Jer. 20:15), at the birth of a child, the father was not present. Some interpreters have found in the passage already cited from Job an instance of a symbolical act analogous to that in use among the ancient Romans, whereby the father by raising the child from the ground signified that he recognised it and wished it to live; but if so it would be a reminiscence of an earlier custom of infanticide of which we have in the whole OT no further evidence even in the case of female children, not to speak of males (see above).

The newly-born infant was bathed, salted, and swaddled (Ezek. 16:4). The use of salt in this connection seems to have been somewhat widely

10. Infancy. diffused in the ancient East, and it is still kept up to the present day. The fellāḥin consider that it strengthens the child (ZDPV 463). This, we may be certain, was not the original reason for the custom; doubtless it had a religious significance. The mother usually suckled her own children (Gen. 21:7; 1 S. 1:21 f.; 1 K. 3:21 etc.), resort being had to a nurse (מְנַמֵּן) only in exceptional cases (Gen. 24:59; 35:8), though afterwards this seems to have become the practice more and more among the wealthier classes (2 S. 4:4? 2 K. 11:2, cp Ex. 2:9). Weaning was late. At present the child in Palestine is kept at the breast for two or three years, and the case was nearly the same in antiquity (cp 2 Macc. 7:27; the Rabbins give two years). The weaning was made the occasion for a family festival, with sacrifices and joyous feasting (Gen. 21:8; 1 S. 1:24).

The birth of the child made the mother unclean. This idea was shared by practically all the nations of antiquity, and is held still by all nations

11. Ceremonial uncleanliness. living in a state of nature; we must not, therefore, in seeking to explain it, appeal to religious and ethical conceptions peculiar to the Hebrews or even to later Israel—as, for example, to the notion that the sexual life from first to last was sinful, defiling alike to body and soul. Just as little should we be justified in regarding the whole arrangement as 'a primitive quarantine, the first step towards a public hygiene' (Ploss, Das Kind in Brauch u. Sitte der Völker, 161). More probably the original idea was that the sickness of childbirth, like any other sickness, lay under the influence of certain demons, or that this, like other events in the sexual life, was under the protection of a special spirit (see Sta. GVV 1483 f.). The consciousness of any such origin of the practice had, needless to say, become entirely obliterated before historical times.

The priestly law (Lev. 12) distinguished two degrees of uncleanliness, the first lasting (in the case of a boy) seven days, or (in that of a girl) fourteen days; the second lasting for other thirty-three days in the first case and sixty-six in the second—thus making total periods of forty and eighty days respectively. Only after the expiration of the term of uncleanliness could the offering of purification be made. Though we have no evidence of such a graduation of periods for the older time, it is possible that the totals of forty and eighty days may go back to very ancient custom. Amongst the Greeks also the woman was usually held to be unclean for forty days, and according to Zoroaster she had to live in a separate place for forty days and only after the lapse of another forty days might she resume the society of her husband. Among the ancient Arabs also the woman had to live for some time in a separate tent, and according to Islam she is unclean for forty days. That the uncleanliness arising from childbirth lasts longer in the case of a girl than in that of a boy is also a widely diffused belief. The Greeks, for example, held pregnancy in the first case to be more troublesome and birth more painful; the purification after birth had to last only thirty days in case of a boy, but forty-two in that of a girl (Hippocr. De nat. pueri, ed. Kühn, 1392). See CLEAN, § 14.

On circumcision and the naming of the child see CIRCUMCISION, § 1; NAME.

Growing children were kept in the most rigorous subjection to their parents. Good morals forbade the 12. Parental authority. father to kill his child; but otherwise his power over it was almost absolute. He could sell his daughters into marriage, and even into slavery, though not to foreigners (Ex. 21:7 f.). Disobedience to parents, or cursing them, was punishable with death (Ex. 21:15; 17; cp for the later time Lev. 20:9; Prov. 20:20; Mt. 15:4). Custom gave to the father the broad general right to put to death the worthless dissipated prodigal or heedless son, or the daughter who had gone astray (cp Gen. 38:24). As the legal system developed, the father's right of personally punishing was transferred to the regular courts; but in substance this changed nothing; on the complaint of the father the court would pronounce sentence of death. No limit of age at which the father's full power came to an end is ever mentioned. In practice, no doubt, it would terminate generally as soon as the son came to be independent and to have a house of his own.

The children's upbringing was, in the first years of their life, the duty of the mother. Boys and girls re-

13. Education. mained together in the harem (Prov. 31:1). The girl continued there till her marriage; but boys comparatively soon passed under the superintendence and guidance of the father, or in the wealthier families were handed over to special guardians (Nu. 11:12; Is. 49:23; 2 K. 10:15; 1 Ch. 27:32, and perhaps 2 S. 1:25). Attention would of course be paid to their initiation into the worship handed down from their ancestors (Ex. 13:8; Dt. 4:9 ff. etc.). Hardly less important was their practical instruction in the cultivation of the field and the vineyard, in the tending of cattle, or in the exercise of their father's trade. The wealthier classes also learned to read and write, arts which in Isaiah's time (probably even earlier) were, it would seem, fairly widely diffused (Is. 10:19; 8:1, cp Judg. 8:14). Of schools no mention is made in the OT; it was not till a much later date that education was systematized (see Jos. Ant. xv. 105, and cp EDUCATION). I. B.

[We have now to refer to the act by which the privilege of virtual sonship was conferred on one who was not a

14. Adoption. son by birth (cp above, § 7). Three cases of informal adoption may plausibly be said to occur in the OT. One is the adoption of Moses by Pharaoh's daughter (Ex. 2:10); a second, that of GENUBATH (גִּזְבַּת) by an Egyptian or rather N. Arabian princess (1 Ki. 11:20); a third, that of Esther by Mordecai her father's nephew (Esth. 2:7, 17). The first two, however, appear to be survivals of the matriarchal system among the Semites (Ex. 2:1-10 comes to us from a Semitic writer), and the third exhibits the influence of non-Semitic surroundings on a post-exilic Hebrew writer.

In the Pauline epistles we meet five times with the technical legal term νόθεος (Gal. 4:5; Rom. 8:15; 23; 9:4; Eph. 1:5). Here, too, except in Eph. 1:5, we notice the influence of non-Semitic social usages—usages which in Galatians are probably of the Greek type, in Romans of the Roman type, while in Ephesians (see below) 'adoption' seems to be used merely as a symbolic term, specially intelligible to Greek but by no means obscure to Jewish readers. Archaeologically, therefore, the passages in Galatians and Romans are the more interesting, but to rest in their archaeological aspects (on this subject see GALATIA, § 21) would show strange blindness to their highest significance. The writer of Galatians and Romans knows that 'all things are [his]', and scruples not to use law as an illustration of the highest truth. To faithful Christians he says that the 'spirit of adoption' is possessed already

(Rom. 8:15), but the 'inheritance' is 'according to promise' (Gal. 3:29), and till the promise is fulfilled perfect happiness is impossible. Hence 'adoption' itself can be described as something for which we 'wait'; it will be enjoyed when the 'body,' and with it the entire sympathising creation (i.e., the whole world apart from man), is 'delivered from the bondage of corruption' (Rom. 8:23). Thus the 'spirit of adoption' resembles the 'spirit of bondage' in so far as it refers to the future, but differs from it in so far as its characteristic is, not fear, but sure confidence in God's fatherly attitude towards us (Rom. 8:15). Those who are 'under the law' are not properly 'sons,' but 'servants' (Gal. 4:7*f.*). It is true that in the context of this very passage (Gal. 4:1-3) men in this position are likened to children under age; but children under age are virtually servants, and so may in some sense be 'redeemed.' The use of this term 'redeem' (ἐξαγοράσῃ) in Gal. 4:5 (cp 3:13) has been illustrated by the Roman practice in adoption, which was virtually a sale by the natural father, and a buying out by the new father. Apart, however, from the question whether the Greek or the Roman type of adoption is implied, we must not press the preposition, considering the late Greek tendency to use verbs compounded with prepositions without increase of meaning.¹ The last passage (Eph. 1:5) is remarkable because 'adoption' there appears to be closely akin to moral and spiritual likeness to God; cp Jn. 1:12, where those who 'receive' (i.e., believe on) the eternal word (i.e., virtually Jesus Christ) are said to have 'authority' (ἐξουσίαν) given them 'to become sons of God.' The next verse explains that such persons have been 'begotten' (RVmg.), not in the natural way, but 'of God.' The 'adoption' which is in the writer's mind, though he does not use the term, is a recognition by God of a certain spiritual character in those who have 'received' Christ, and this must also be the idea of viobētia in Eph. 1:5.

We are a long way here from the viobētia of Rom. 9:4, where the 'adoption' is that referred to in Ex. 4:22, Hos. 11:1, etc. Still the insistence of Hosea on the moral conditions of Israel's sonship (cp LOVINGKINDNESS) shows that the 'adoption' of Israel intended by the OT writers is really a recognition of a degree of likeness to God in the Israelitish people. We are also still separated by a considerable interval from the ecclesiastical use of viobētia recorded by Suicer (s.v.). Hesychius, says this writer, defines the term thus, ὄραν τις θεῶν νῖον λαμβάνει, καὶ τὸ ἄγιον βῆπτισμα. Photius, too (Ep. 97, ad Basilium Macedonem), makes a strong appeal to Basilus in the name of their old friendship and various other still more sacred things, last among which is 'the bond by which the adoption of the fair boy (ἡ τοῦ καλοῦ παιδὸς viobētia) bound us together.' The reference is to a child of Basilus whose sponsor Photius had been. viobētia has become a synonym for baptism, for which we have a parallel in the phrase 'the laver of regeneration' in Tit. 3:5 (RVmg.).

FASTING,² FASTS. Fasting (צוֹם, sūm; later

² The fact that violent emotions such as anger, jealousy, or grief find one of their natural and appropriate expressions in abstinence from food (r S. 1:7 20 34 r K. 21:4*f.*) need not be further dwelt on here. The present article deals with fasting in its religious aspects.

צוֹם, innāh n'phōš, see below, § 5), to the Hebrews,

1. Duration of fasts. meant, as amongst other Orientals it still means, total abstinence from meat and drink. Such abstinence lasted as a rule from sunrise to sunset, when it ended in a meal (cp e.g., Judg. 20:26 r S. 14:24 2 S. 1:12 3:35). When 7 fast of more days than one is spoken of (r S. 31:13 'seven days' fast') the expression is to be understood in the sense that meat and drink were taken each day after sundown just as at present in the Mohammedan fast of Ramaḍān. If, as in Esther 4:16, a prolonged fast extending over a specified number of days and nights is spoken of, this is to be regarded as exceptional. The weakened form of fasting which consists in abstinence from certain kinds of food and drink appears only as a development of later Judaism. Of Daniel we are told (Dan. 10:2*f.*) that he drank no wine, ate no flesh or dainty food, and abstained from anointing himself. It is a fast of this sort that we are to suppose in the case of Judith (Judith 8:6; see below, § 6).

2. Original meaning. On the object of fasting the only express utterance of the OT occurs in 2 S. 12:22:

'While the child was yet alive, I fasted and wept, for methought, Who knows whether Yahwē will not have compassion upon me, that the child may live? But now he is dead, why should I fast? Can I bring him back again?'

David is here said to have fasted in order to raise Yahwē's pity, and so make him inclined to listen to his prayer (see below, § 3).

We may well doubt, however, whether we have here the original meaning of the act of fasting. For we could not thus explain how fasting became one of the most prevalent and widely diffused of mourning customs; the passage merely suggests the uselessness of fasting as an element of mourning for the dead. It was well, therefore, to try another explanation, and that of Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem.(2) 434) seems likely to be correct. This scholar points out that sacrifice, being essentially a sacrificial meal, needed to be carefully prepared for; this preparation was obtained by fasting.

In addition to numerous parallels for such a preparation, he notices the fact that abstinence, though in another direction, was certainly a preparative for eating of the consecrated bread and sacrificial food (r S. 21:5 [6]f.). This is of much weight. We must, it is true, concede that fasting is nowhere mentioned as one of the details of preparation for a sacrifice, or 'sanctifying oneself' for a festal celebration. Rather is it represented everywhere as a religious act of independent value. This, however, proves nothing against the possibility of such an origin of fasting; it only shows that even in the earliest historical period the Hebrews had already lost this custom of fasting before sacrifice. And yet perhaps there may be a trace of the view of fasting which is here advocated in the reports in Exodus (34:28 [J]; cp Dt. 9:9) that Moses on Mount Sinai neither ate nor drank for forty days and after that received from God the tables of the law. Daniel, too, received his revelations after a long fast (Dan. 9:3 10:2*f.*).

The cases of Moses and Daniel prove that fasting was a means by which man was brought into such a condition that it was possible for God to have communion with him. Perhaps also a similar thought underlies and has had an influence on the report that Elijah passed forty days and forty nights in Horeb without meat or drink (cp also the fasting of Jesus, Mt. 4:2). Fasting in mourning for the dead is sufficiently explained in the same way; the funeral meal is in its origin not different from a sacrificial meal, except in the fact that the offering is in the former case made, not to Yahwē but to the deceased.

Fasting in sign of mourning finds express mention in the OT only twice; the men of Jabesh fast for Saul seven days (r S. 31:13 r Ch. 10:12), and David and his people fast for Saul and Jonathan on the day of the arrival of the news of their death (2 S. 1:12). 2 S. 12:21, however, warrants the conclusion that fasting in mourning was a pretty general custom; David's courtiers wonder that the king ceases to fast after the death of his child, since, in their view—i.e., according to ordinary custom—that was the very time when he ought to have fasted.

The explanation of the origin of fasting now given comes nowhere clearly to light in the OT; no consciousness of it remained, at least when the narratives came to be written. The custom itself, however, survived like so many other mourning usages (such as rending of the garments) as a universally prevalent expression of sorrow.

3. New significance. Fasting, therefore, is frequently mentioned in this connection (2 S. 111 f. 335 1216 20 K. 21 27 Is. 58 5 Joel 2 12 f. Jonah 3 5 ff. Ezra 10 6 Neh. 9 1 Dan. 9 3 Esther 4 3 1 Macc. 8 47 Judith 4 13 86; cp MOURNING CUSTOMS).

As we have seen already, fasting gradually came to have a significance that raised it above all other mourning customs, being considered as a specially efficacious means of influencing the deity—a pain which man brought upon himself and which must awaken the divine pity. Thus it falls into the same category as sacrifice proper, which also in process of time came to be regarded as a surrender of property—a gift made to God (Jer. 14 12). The suppliant fasted in order to give special emphasis to his prayer. Of course it is always some impending or actually present calamity which is the occasion of the act; there can be no fasting in times of prosperity, least of all on festivals (Judith 86). How deeply rooted was this conception of the purpose of fasting can be seen from 2 S. 12 16 ff., where David is represented as holding fasting to be useless except where it reinforces a prayer; or from Is. 58 3 (post-exilic), where the people think that they have just cause for complaint because Yahwé pays no heed to their fasting.

In practice, of course, there were all kinds of occasions for fasting, and these remained the same, though the frequency of fasting varied (see below).

(a) Private.—Like David (2 S. 12 16 ff.), the pious Israelite fasted when his friends were sick (Ps. 85 13). Ahab fasted, and not in vain, when Elijah predicted his downfall (1 K. 21 27 ff.); Nehemiah bewails with fasting the sad condition of the Jews in Jerusalem (Neh. 14); Ezra and his companions, before their journey to Palestine, fast in order to secure the divine protection (Ezra 8 21), and Esther does the same before her perilous visit to the king (Esth. 4 16).

(b) Public.—In cases of public danger or disaster, such as a plague of locusts (Joel 1 13 f.), or a reverse in war (Judg. 20 26 2 Ch. 20 3 1 Macc. 3 47), the entire community or people fasted. It is true, the passages cited are all post-exilic; but such passages as 1 K. 21 9 ff. Is. 1 13 b (Ⓞ), Jer. 36 6 ff. show that public fasts were known also in the older period (see below).

The idea of exciting the compassion of Yahwé by such self-mortification had at first, as we might expect, a very realistic form. The deity, it was

5. Spiritual conception. thought, could not bear to look on while his servant had such acute suffering; he became a fellow-sufferer and was moved to compassion. With the spiritualising of the conception of God there came a gradual refinement of this idea. Fasting was no longer a self-inflicted chastisement, but a humbling of oneself before God; thus the act assumed a spiritual complexion.

When this change of view came about, we know not; a notable saying in one of the Elijah-narratives marks it as already complete. 'Seest thou,' says Yahwé to Elijah, 'how Ahab has humbled himself before me? Because he has humbled himself before me, I will not bring the disaster in his days,' etc. (1 K. 21 29; cp also Dt. 8 3). In this connection a heightened interest attaches to the remark that the ancient expression צום, sûm, after the exile is pushed into the background by another, not known to have been used in pre-exilic times עָנָה, 'innâh nephes, 'to humble, or mortify oneself' (e.g., Lev. 16 29 31 Nu. 29 7 Is. 58 3 5, and often, and, with the addition of עָנָה ba'ssûm, Ps. 85 13). The derivative עָנָה, ta'ânith, is a very frequent word for fasting in the post-biblical literature.

All this makes it easy to understand the close relation of fasting and penitence. Great calamities were always regarded as manifestations of the divine anger, and supplication for their removal involved as a matter of course the penitent confession of guilt. In particular, general and public fasts must early have assumed the character of days of penitence.

This seems to be the only satisfactory explanation of 1 K. 21 9 ff., and may be safely assumed for the fast days of Jeremiah's time (Jer. 36 6). Fasting is expressly associated with a confession of sin in the following passages (post-exilic):—1 S. 7 6

¹ [According to Che. Ps. (2), ad loc., עָנָה is an interpolation suggested possibly by 69 10 [11].]

FASTING FASTS

Neh. 9 1 Joel 2 12 ff.; similarly the great day of atonement is at the same time a fast day (Lev. 16 29 31).

It was in the period immediately before the exile that fasting began to acquire special importance. It was

6. Later development. one of the expedients to which the Jewish people resorted for averting the dreaded calamity; the opinion that it had any intrinsic value is combated by Jeremiah (Jer. 14 12). The popular estimation of it went on increasing during and after the exile. This may be ascribed, partly at least, to a feeling of the need of religious exercises to take the place of the suspended temple services. The post-exilic differs from the pre-exilic period not only in the increased frequency of fasting, but still more in the adoption of this usage as one of those universally practised religious exercises which needed no extraordinary or specially definite occasion. This deprives fasting of much of its religious value. It becomes simply, at least in the eyes of the multitude, a meritorious work. Against this view the later prophets struggled (Is. 58 3 ff. Zech. 7 5 f.); but in vain. The picture of Judith (8 4 ff.) fasting every day 'except the eves of the sabbaths, and the sabbaths, and the eves of the new moons, and the new moons, and the feasts and joyful days of the house of Israel' shows us the ideal of piety prevalent in the later period. Fasting and prayer now becomes a constant combination of words (Judith 4 9 11 Tobit 12 8 Ecclus. 3 4 26 Lk. 2 37). The special days of the week devoted to public or private fasting were the second and the fifth (Monday and Thursday); very pious persons fasted on these days all the year through (Lk. 18 12; Ta'ânith, 12a). It was forbidden to fast on Sabbaths, new moons, and feast days (also on the eves; see Judith 8 6, as above). Two degrees of fasting were distinguished. The less stringent form required abstinence from food and drink between sunrise and sunset; in the stricter, the fast lasted twenty-four hours, and abstinence from washing, anointing, sleep, and work, were added.

Public fasting too became much more frequent in post-exilic times. During the exile had arisen the custom of observing four yearly fast-days to commemorate the calamities of Jerusalem. That of the fourth month had reference to the capture of the city by the Chaldeans (Jer. 52 6 f.), that of the fifth to the destruction of the city and temple (Jer. 52 12 f.), that of the seventh to the murder of Gedaliah (Jer. 41 1 ff.), that of the tenth to the commencement of the siege (Jer. 52 4). These fast-days were not taken into the law, and disappeared after the time of Zechariah. They were revived after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans; according to Dalman, however (PRE⁽³⁾ 7 16 f.), in Palestine only the ninth of the fifth month (Ab) was observed in commemoration of the destruction of Jerusalem first by the Chaldeans and afterwards by the Romans, both of which events, according to Josephus (BJ vi. 5 8), happened on the same day of the year. In Babylonia the other three anniversaries also were permanent public fast days. The law itself enjoins rigorous fasting for the great day of atonement only (see ATONEMENT, DAY OF). On the (very late) fast of the thirteenth of Adar, which professed to commemorate the counsel of Haman that all the Jews should be put to death, see PURIM.

Over and above these regular public fasts it was competent for the community at any time of trouble or distress to enjoin a fast. Special public fasts of this kind were very common. Among such occasions one of the most frequent was the failure of the autumn rains. If by new moon of Chisleu no rain had fallen, three fast days were held; if the drought still continued, the fasts were renewed and intensified.

FAT (חֵלֶב), Ex. 29¹³. See FOOD, § 10, LIVER, SACRIFICE.

FATE. See FORTUNE AND DESTINY.

FATHER (אָב, etymology unknown; ΠΑΤΗΡ). We shall treat this subject here only in so far as it can be treated independently of 'sonship' (see SON). The following are special uses of the term 'father':

- (1) A title of respect, 1 S. 24¹¹ (David calls Saul 'my father').
- (2) A near or distant ancestor, e.g., Gen. 28¹³ (Abraham the 'father' of Jacob); Dt. 26⁵ and Is. 43²⁷ (the patriarch Jacob); Mt. 39 Jn. 8⁵⁶ (Abraham); Lk. 1³² (David). So especially in the plural: Ex. 3¹³ 1 K. 8²¹ Mt. 23³⁰ Jn. 4²⁰ 6³¹ 1 Cor. 10¹. Cp WRS Kin. 117f.

Usage naturally permitted the same word to be used of the ancestors of a tribe and of those of an individual, for the tribe was viewed as an organism (see GENEALOGIES i, § 2; GOVERNMENT, § 2). For 'father's' or 'fathers' house' (בֵּית אָב, בֵּית אֲבוֹת, בית אב), cp FAMILY, § 2.

- (3) The reputed founder of a city, Gen. 33¹⁹ 1 Ch. 25¹¹ 4⁴ etc.; or (4) of a guild or class of men, Gen. 4²⁰ 7¹.
- (5) An honorific title of priests, Judg. 17¹⁰; or (6) prophets, 2 K. 2¹² 5¹³ 6²¹ 13¹⁴ 1¹ or (7) teachers, Mt. 23⁹ (cp in later times, Abba Shaul, Abba Eleazar).
- (8) An official title of the chief administrator or vizier, Gen. 45^{8,2} perhaps also Is. 22²¹ (Duhm); cp 5: addition to Esth. 3¹³, and the commentators on 1 Macc. 11³².

In Is. 9⁵ [6] אֲבִי עַד (see ABIHUD) we should perhaps read אֲבִי הוֹר, 'glorious father' (i.e., governor), parallel to אֲבִיר יִשְׂרָאֵל, 'prosperous prince'; but אֲבִיר 'Mighty one (of Israel)' is much better (for details see Che. in Crit. Bib.). The difficulties of all the ordinary explanations of אֲבִי may be seen from the commentaries (e.g., Del. and Duhm).

- (9) Applied to Yahwè as the creator or producer of the people of Israel, of mankind in general, and of all natural phenomena, Dt. 32⁶ Is. 63¹⁶ 64⁸ [7] Mal. 2¹⁰ Job 38²⁸. Tg. renders Is. 63¹⁶ 64⁷ paraphrastically, 'thou whose compassion for us is as great as that of a father for children.'

Note also the use of ὁ πατήρ, 'the Father,' as a title of God in Acts 17 (ὁ πατήρ alone), Mt. 11²⁷ 24³⁶ 28¹⁹ and || passages, where ὁ πατήρ and ὁ υἱός occur together; ὁ πατήρ = ABBA [q.v.]. On the other NT phrases, 'my Father,' 'your Father,' sometimes with the addition of 'who is in heaven,' also 'our Father who is in heaven,' and on the whole conception of 'the heavenly Father,' see Dalman, Die Worte Jesu, 1 150-162.

FATHOM (οργυρία; Acts 27²⁸). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Nor was there any sharp line of demarcation, as there is amongst modern nations, between social and religious life; religious observances formed one department of social duty. A close bond of union and of intercourse, originally conceived as physical, connected the members of a clan with their god. If the clan was celebrating a joyful festival, their god must participate in it. For the Israelitish nomads in particular, no festival was complete without the eating of meat, whilst the slaughtering of an animal for food was always at the same time a sacrifice. On the other hand, a sacrifice in the most ancient periods had, as a rule, the character of a public feast. The deity stood in direct relation not so much to the individual man as to the clan or tribe as a whole. Accordingly, sacrifice was originally an affair of the clan.

Sacrifices offered by a private individual were the exception, and even in later times they betray something of the character of a public feast, inasmuch as the members of the same tribe were always welcome as guests. Even a private offering was not complete without guests, and the surplus of sacrificial flesh was not sold but distributed with an open hand' (WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 264).

We find only a few traces in the OT of regularly recurring feasts celebrated by the Hebrews in their nomadic state before the immigration into

2. In the nomadic stage.

The three great annual feasts, so important at a later date,—Maṣṣôth, Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles,—are the festivals of an agricultural people, which were first adopted by the Hebrews in Canaan. On the other hand, one portion of the Feast of Maṣṣôth—the Passover—goes back to the nomadic life of the Hebrews. Even Jewish tradition has preserved the correct view, that the foundation of the Passover is earlier than the Exodus—that even before Moses the Hebraic pastoral tribes were accustomed to celebrate a spring festival with offerings from their herds (Ex. 7¹⁶ 10²⁴ f., etc.). This is confirmed by the fact that the ancient Arabians also observed a similar festival in the spring. The old Hebrew feast, however, like that of the Arabians, had not the same meaning as the later Passover, which represented the offering of the tribute due to the deity from the herd. The peculiar ritual of the Passover points more particularly to the view that the feast, like all sacrifices, was originally intended, by means of the sacramental acts of eating the sacrificial meat and partaking of the blood of the victim, to strengthen the union of the members of the tribe both with each other and with the deity. In this way they thought to insure themselves against every harm and danger. Besides the feast of Passover, the festival of the New Moon also appears to go back to a period before the conquest of Canaan: it was originally simply astronomical and quite unconnected with agriculture. Its wide prevalence among the Semites, its great importance, and above all, its connection with the ancient family sacrifices (1 S. 20⁵ f.), speak for its high antiquity. The Sabbath, on the other hand, may very probably have had its origin in agriculture. A third feast, which the Hebrews may have brought over with them from their nomadic life, is the feast of sheep-shearing (1 S. 25² 2 S. 13²³; cp Gen. 38¹²). See further, PASSOVER, PENTECOST, SABBATH, TABERNACLES.

The introduction of the worship of Yahwè among all the Hebrew tribes, so far as we can judge from the

3. After oldest sources, appears to have altered the character of these feasts only in so far that they were now all celebrated in honour of the common God Yahwè, and no longer of the several tribal deities. Very important, on the other hand, were the alterations in these, as in other departments of religion, brought about by the settlement in the land of Canaan. Those feasts which were connected with pastoral life immediately fell very decidedly into the background.

The feast of sheep-shearing, for example, was important only for those districts of the country in which the nature of the land made cattle-breeding play an important part—e.g., in the S. of Canaan. There it retained its position as a local feast down to the time of the kings (1 S. 25 2 S. 13 23); but as early as the oldest legislation it was no longer reckoned as one of the universal feasts. The same thing seems to have happened in the case of the Passover. This feast also fell very decidedly into the background and was subordinated to the countryman's spring-festival, the offering of the first-fruits of the harvest; and in the earliest legislation relating to feasts it is not counted as an independent feast at all (in Ex. 34 25 the name ḥésah is a later insertion). Probably in particular districts, where there was little cattle-breeding, it fell out of observance entirely (cp 2 K. 23 21 ff.). Where it was celebrated it coalesced more and more with the feast of the beginning of harvest, as might easily happen, since both harvests fell approximately about the same time. Lastly, the feast of the New Moon retained its high position among feasts in popular usage (1 S. 20 4 ff. Am. 8 5 Hos. 2 13 [11] Is. 1 13); but this feast also is entirely, and, it appears, purposely ignored in the legislation.

When the Israelites became settled, the old feasts were displaced by a new cycle closely connected with

4. Become agricultural.

In the spring 'when the sickle is first put to the corn' (Dt. 16 9), the first-fruits of the new crop were offered at the feast of 'unleavened bread' (ḥag ham-masšōth, חַג הַמַּצּוֹת). Seven weeks later the 'feast of weeks' or 'harvest-feast' (חַג שִׁבְעָתַי, ḥag šābū'ōth or חַג הַקָּטִיר, ḥag ḥak-kāšīr: Ex. 34 22 23 16) marked the end of the harvest. Between these two feasts was contained a great seven-weeks' harvest-festival (Is. 9 2 [3]). The end of the cycle of feasts in the autumn was marked by the feast of Tabernacles, termed in the old legislation 'the feast of ingathering at the year's end' (חַג הַאֲסִיֵּף, ḥag ḥā'āsiṣḥ: Ex. 34 22 23 16). In the old law of feasts all three stood side by side as of equal authority and importance, all requiring a visit to the sanctuary. This can hardly have been the case in practice. At all events the historical books only testify to the autumn feast (Judg. 9 27 1 S. 11 ff. 1 K. 12 32 6 38). It is called merely 'the feast' or 'the feast of Yahwè' (חַג, ḥag, or חַג יְהוָה, ḥag Yahwè: 1 K. 8 2 12 32 Judg. 21 19 Lev. 23 39 41 Ezek. 45 25 Neh. 8 14 Zech. 14 16 ff.). Its pre-eminence over the other feasts is easily intelligible: it was the concluding festival of thanksgiving for the whole of the harvest. The spring feasts, however, also came into existence fairly early, alongside of the Feast of Tabernacles, as is proved by the law and also by Isaiah (9 2 29 1 etc.). The other feasts, as Wellhausen remarks (ProL.⁽⁴⁾ 94), were celebrated only in local circles, at home and not at the famous sanctuaries.

The harvest feasts were connected with the land of Canaan. Nothing exhibits more clearly than this fact the natural foundation of the ancient religious beliefs and observances of Israel. These feasts were connected, not with historical acts of deliverance by Yahwè, but with the products of the earth, which were Yahwè's gifts. Hence it clearly follows that they cannot have had their origin with a nomadic people of the desert, but must have sprung up in the country itself. We shall not be wrong in assuming that they were originally Canaanite feasts, which in common with so many other portions of the Israelitish worship of Baal were subsequently transferred to Yahwè.

There is direct evidence for the Canaanite origin of the autumn feast: every autumn the citizens of Shechem celebrated their feast of ḥillūlim (Judg. 9 27). The rites of this festival were in themselves neither gentle nor Israelitish: they only became one or the other when they were connected with a definite deity. The Canaanites regarded their god as lord of the country and the dispenser of its fruits, and accordingly gave him the tribute due therefrom. For the Israelites, Yahwè was the 'Baal' of Canaan, to whom they owed their country and all that it contained; accordingly they kept the feasts in his honour.

The attitude of mind which dominated these agricultural festivals has thus already been indicated: the feast gifts and sacrifices were the tribute owed and paid to the lord of the country. Robertson Smith (Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 111 ff. 244 458 ff.) has conclusively proved that this was not the genuine Semitic conception of sacrifices and feasts. Nevertheless it was a conception that was continually coming more and more into prominence. Even the old legislation extended the demand for tribute to the increase of the flock, and required that the first-born of cattle should be sacrificed on the eighth day after birth (Ex. 34 19 22 29). Further, after this conception had once become prominent, the Passover also was conformed to it, although its peculiar ritual was entirely contrary thereto. In Ex. 11 and 12 the narrative of JE is based on the conception that Yahwè took the first-born of men and cattle among the Egyptians as a compensation, because Pharaoh had not allowed the Israelites to sacrifice the firstlings of their cattle due to Yahwè. Hence the conception of a tribute from the herd had already found its way into the feast in ancient times, and this modification of the old feast may have considerably aided its coalescence with the feast of Maššōth. The firstlings of the flock corresponded to the first-fruits of the field; the essence or foundation of either feast was now the same. Still it must be noticed, in contrast with the law in Deuteronomy, that the amount of the gifts was left to the freewill of the giver. Tithe was first required in Deuteronomy (cp TAXATION); before that nothing was specifically required except the firstborn. Further, in contrast to the festal ordinance of the Priestly Code, in ancient times and down to Deuteronomy the offerings and tributes coincide with each other. Nothing is said of any other offerings at the feasts except those which consisted of the tribute.

5. Viewed as tribute.

Corresponding to this natural foundation of the whole religion, an entirely cheerful tone characterises all the feasts. 'Thou shalt rejoice before

6. Their joyousness.

Yahwè' is continually repeated in D. The main feature of the festivals was unquestionably the joyous sacrificial meal; that this was not always particularly solemn is proved by Eli's suspicion about Hannah (1 S. 1 14 cp Am. 28 Is. 28 7 ff.). Dancing and processions also formed a not unimportant part of the festival, as is indicated by the name חַג (ḥag) (see DANCE, §§ 3, 5 ff.). At the autumn feast in the vineyards of Shiloh the young maidens performed choral dances (Judg. 21 19 ff.). Nowhere else is it more clearly seen that the key-note of the piety of the earlier Israelites was a feeling of joyful security. The ancient Israelite was contented with his God, and knew that his God was contented with him. This was attested to him by the gifts of the field and of the flock, by the prosperity of the community. On the other hand, the misfortune of a single individual could not come into account when compared with the wellbeing of the community as a whole. Thus there could not have been any permanent feeling of a need for atonement—apart from exceptional manifestations of divine wrath in the shape of drought, pestilence, or other national calamities; much less could there have been room for regular festivals of atonement.

The important part played by the feasts in the religion of ancient Israel is best seen from the representations of

7. Place in religious life.

Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah. These prophets give the impression that the entire religious observances of the nation were contained in these feasts. Special cases apart, the individual Israelite saved up his offering for these feasts (1 S. 13 21), 'satisfying the religious feelings in the interval by vows to be discharged when the festal season came round' (Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 254). Were the feasts allowed to drop, the whole of the divine worship would fall with them; this it is that gives the prophetic threat of exile its sting (Hos. 2 13 [11] ff. 9 1-6 Is. 32 9 ff.). On this account a high estimate must also be set upon the influence of these feasts on the religious and national development of the people. Such feasts were continually reviving not only the religious life but also, and at the same time, the national feeling. If the pilgrims from the different tribes coming in this way from far and near to a famous sanctuary found themselves united in common festal rejoicings and common thanksgivings to Yahwè, these meetings must have continually given fresh strength to the feeling of unity, which in Israel rested mainly on the basis of the common religion. The feasts brought home to each man's consciousness the fact that all Israel owed the produce of its land to one God. Besides this, various kinds of business and of trade no doubt attached themselves to these feasts (Dt. 33:18 ff.), as was the case among the ancient Arabians. On the other hand it is most important to observe—and this makes a substantial difference between the early feasts and those of the period after the Exile—that in ancient times there is no one vast and united festal community that offers its common sacrifices, but the separate sacrificial communities, households and families, unite for the sacrificial meal (cp 1 S. 1).

The three great annual festivals were not the only feasts of the ancient Israelites. Even the old law of feasts (Ex. 23:12) recognised the Sabbath as a day of rest from the busy toil of the working days, and also as a day of glad and joyful festivity (cp Hos. 2:13 [11] 2 K. 4:23 etc.). It has already been mentioned that the feast of the New Moon was celebrated universally, the passover and the feast of sheep-shearing in particular districts. A merely local importance also attached to the feast which the daughters of Israel celebrated in memory of Jephthah's ill-fated daughter (Judg. 11:40), a festival the original significance of which is obscure (see JEPHTHAH, § 6). The local cults up and down the country may have shown many instances of similar feasts celebrated in memory of some historical or legendary event.

The introduction of Deuteronomy as the law of the state in the time of Josiah gave the impulse to a complete transformation of the ancient feasts. The author of D himself, it is true, neither intended nor was conscious of any such revolution. His injunction to celebrate all feasts in Jerusalem is designed to effect an alteration only in form, leaving the substance of the feasts untouched. Apart from this one requirement, D's attitude towards the ancient religious customs is throughout conservative. Like the old law of feasts, it ignores the new moon, and leaves the Sabbath what it had been hitherto, a day of rejoicing and gladness. Nor does it interfere with the three great feasts, at which all had to appear before Yahwè. Their connection with agriculture remains undisturbed, except in the case of the feast of Passover (see below). On account of this connection also, no alteration was made in the manner of determining the dates of the feasts (Dt. 16:9-13) which had hitherto prevailed, though this was really demanded by their centralisation. The feast of weeks and the autumn feast continued to be as before the cheerful festivals, at which men ate and drank and made merry before Yahwè (Dt. 12:18 14:26 16:11-14 26:11). The celebration of the feast consisted, as hitherto, solely in the offering up of the first-fruits of the earth and the firstlings of the flock. D goes beyond the old legislation in fixing the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles to last for seven days, and Pentecost for one day: this however is hardly to be considered as an innovation, but rather as fixing the custom that had developed itself in the course of time.

Nor is there any real innovation in the fact that D employs fresh names; besides Massôth it uses the designation Pésach (פֶּסַח, Pésach, Dt. 16:1 ff. 16); for the autumn feast it employs the designation hag hassukhôth, חַג הַסּוּכּוֹת, 'feast of tabernacles' (Dt. 16:13 ff.). The latter is to be traced simply to the old custom (Is. 18) of living out in the gardens and vineyards in huts made of boughs during the vintage and olive-gathering. In the spring feast, however, we meet for the first time, at all events in D, the completed combination of the Passover and Massôth (16:1), but in all probability it had already by degrees become fully established as a religious custom (see above, § 5). The connection of this feast with the Exodus also, the most important alteration in D (see below), finds at least some countenance in the old tradition (Ex. 12:34-39) according to which the Israelites at their exodus had no time to provide themselves with provisions for the journey, but were obliged to take away the dough unleavened and to make themselves cakes of it. On the other hand, the loss of the ritual peculiar to the passover appears to be an innovation (Dt. 16:1 ff.); this it is to be explained as a necessary consequence of its being celebrated no longer at home but in the temple at Jerusalem.

Although D thus spared the ancient religious customs in as far as this could be done consistently with its fundamental idea of the centralization of religious observances, it was eventually inevitable that this centralization should carry with it a train of consequences which the author of Deuteronomy had never thought of. The immediate result of the transference of the cultus to Jerusalem was the detachment of the feast from its natural basis. The common celebration of the feast on one day, which certainly was not originally required to be the same every year, severed its close connection with the harvest, since the latter in the various districts, differing so widely in climate, could not have been fixed in advance for one particular date. The ancient interpretation of the feast was gradually lost sight of by explanations (already begun in D) from historical events (above, § 9). 'History is not, like the harvest, an experience of the separate households, but rather an experience of the nation as a whole' (We. Proz. (4) 101). Further, if the feasts lost their individual character in this way, and gradually became days of commemoration of events in the religious history of the nation, there was no longer any reason for their retaining any peculiar ritual. The characteristic sacrifice of the firstlings, which moreover became impossible at the central sanctuary (as is already recognised in Dt. 14:24-26), came to be unnecessary, and could give place to the regular sacrificial service. With all this, and particularly with the decay of the old festival customs, disappeared also the old feeling in connection with them.

To celebrate a feast at the beginning and the end of harvest at home in the narrow circle of a sacrificial society, and there to eat the first-fruits before Yahwè, was a very different thing from the head of the family's taking with him to Jerusalem the proper tribute in money or in kind, there to deliver it at the temple, or to barter it for the things necessary for a sacrificial meal—a proceeding that has to be permitted as early as D (Dt. 14:24-26). In Jerusalem a sacrificial meal properly so called was no longer possible; only in the rarest cases could the pilgrim to a feast at Jerusalem have around him there his family, his relatives, and his friends, and all who formed the small religious society at home and at the sanctuaries scattered over the country (1 S. 1). He himself was completely lost in the vast national assembly of persons otherwise strangers to him. Thus the joyous character of the ancient nature-festival gave place to the seriousness suitable to days of commemoration of epochs in the religious history of the people, and nothing further prevented the attitude of mind that later dominated the whole divine service—penitent consciousness of sin—from making its way into the feast also.

The legislation in P boldly carried out these consequences to their last results. The feasts were unalterably fixed by month and day (Lev. 23:5 ff. Nu. 28:1 ff.). The new moon, as all the feasts were thus regulated by reference to it, acquired a new importance, and was itself also accordingly adopted into the cycle of feasts (Nu. 28:11 ff.). The Sabbath rest, from being recreation after labour, became inactivity pure and simple, and thus from being a pleasure became an ascetic service (Ex. 16:27 ff. 31:12 ff. etc., see SABBATH). The Exile more than anything else contributed to the increase of its importance; after the sacrificial service had fallen out of use, the Sabbath and circumcision remained the two sole 'signs of the covenant' (Ex. 31:13 cp Neh. 10:30 ff.). A further extension of the sabbatical scheme led to the institution of the sabbatical year and of the year of Jubilee, which must be held to have been purely theoretical developments of the idea of the Sabbath, quite incapable of realisation in practice. The transformation of nature-festivals into festivals of religious history had not yet been achieved in the case of the feast of Pentecost, which therefore, on this account, was treated as more or less of secondary importance; only one day was given to it, whilst the Passover and the feast of Tabernacles had eight (Lev. 23:16 ff. Nu. 28:26 ff.). The feast of Tabernacles was now interpreted as commemorating the fact that the Israelites dwelt in tents in the wilderness; there was no longer any word about the first-fruits of the harvest (Lev. 23³³ ff. 39 ff. Num. 29¹²). In the case of the Passover this tendency actually went so far that the festival came to be not merely the echo of a divine act of deliverance, but itself such an act; it was now explained as instituted before the Exodus in order that Yahweh might spare the firstborn of the Israelites, not because he had spared them (Ex. 12¹⁻²⁰). Finally, two new feast-days of purely ecclesiastical significance were introduced: the ecclesiastical new year and the feast of atonement on the 1st and 10th days respectively of the 7th month, that is, immediately before the feast of Tabernacles. That these feasts, of so wholly different a character, should have been placed on a level with the others shows in a striking manner how completely the meaning of the old feasts had faded out of memory.

It is easy to understand that the transformation of these haggim (dances) into feasts of atonement was never completely carried out, and therefore for the new and altered time a special feast of atonement came to be required. None the less the ritual of the several feasts betrays that all alike were reduced to the condition of purely ecclesiastical services. Only the Passover must, in accordance with its new interpretation, have the ancient rite of the sprinkling with blood restored to it (Ex. 12¹ ff.), however ill-suited to the new conditions. The ritual of the other feasts was perfectly uniform: a wearisome monotony of countless burnt-offerings and sin-offerings combined with Sabbath rest and vast gatherings at the sanctuary (Nu. 28^{f.}). Besides, these offerings are not, as formerly, voluntary gifts, but legally fixed dues paid by the community at large in which the individual has no direct share, but which are efficacious, ex opere operato, as acts of the priest, for the benefit of the whole.

So far as the old feasts had any further development at all in the later times after the Exile, this took place

12. Further modifications. absolutely on the lines laid down by P. This is particularly obvious in the case of the Sabbath and of the feast of Pentecost. The idea of the Sabbath embodied in P became ever more predominant, and led to a number of statutory regulations, which prescribed down to the minutest detail what was to be done and what left undone on the Sabbath. Moreover, just as P had already transferred the idea of the Sabbath to the other feasts also, so strict Sabbath rest came more and more to be an essential part of all festivals. The feast of Pentecost became—after the destruction of Jerusalem and of the temple—a feast of commemoration of the giving of the law on Sinai, thus completing the process of transformation of the nature-feasts that has been already indicated. In other respects the work of later Judaism was in the main confined to minute elaboration of the ritual of the feasts. In this respect alone did the law still admit (and require) any supplement. The rise of a double celebration of the principal feast-days (with the exception of the day of ATONEMENT) among the Jews of the Diaspora, is characteristic of the spirit of legality that governed their celebration. Owing to the manner in which the new moon was fixed by direct observation (see NEW MOON), it was not possible to give the Jews of the Diaspora due notice beforehand of the dates of the feasts which were determined by it. On this account they celebrated the more important feasts twice over, in order that on one at all events of the two days the feast might be celebrated in common by all. The feast of the NEW YEAR (q.v.) could come to be celebrated twice over even in Jerusalem itself. In the case of Purim it might happen in the intercalary years that it had to be repeated in the second month Adar (Meg. 14; cp PURIM). There could be no clearer proof of the importance now set upon the exact date of the celebration.

To these ancient feasts, in the Maccabean period and later, were added the following 13. New festivals of the Maccabean period. new feasts: (1) the feast of Purim in commemoration of the abortive machinations of Haman against the Jews of the Persian empire (Esth. 9²³⁻³²; see PURIM, and cp ESTHER, § 7); (2) the feast of the Dedication of the Temple (1 Macc. 4⁵⁹ Jo. 10²²), in commemoration of the reconsecration of the temple by Judas the Maccabee (see DEDICATION, FEAST OF); (3) the feast of Nicanor (1 Macc. 7⁴⁹ 2 Macc. 15³⁶), celebrated on the 13th of Adar to commemorate the victory of Judas the Maccabee over NICANOR (q.v., 1) at Beth-horon in 161 B.C. This feast was still kept in the time of Josephus (-Ant. xii. 105); later it passed completely into oblivion and the fast of Esther (תענית אסתר) was transposed to its day (see PURIM). (4) The feast of the Capture of the Citadel (1 Macc. 13⁵⁰⁻⁵²), instituted by Simon the Maccabee in memory of the recovery of the Akra, the Syrian citadel in Jerusalem, on the 23rd of Iyyar, 171 Sel. era (= May 142 B.C.). This feast is not mentioned by Josephus; apparently it had already been forgotten. (cp silence of Meg. Ta'anith). (5) The feast of the Wood-Bringing (ה' ט'ן עולפ'ור'ן ע'ור'ה', Jos. BJ ii. 176), according to Josephus celebrated on the 14th of Lōos (= the Jewish Ab: cp BJ ii. 177). The date of its origin is unknown.

As early as Nehemiah are recorded regulations in reference to the deliveries of wood to be made by 'the houses of our fathers' for the altar of burnt-offering (Neh. 10³⁴ 13³¹). In the Mishna nine days in the year are appointed for these deliveries of wood; the chief day was the 15th of Ab, on which the priests and Levites brought their wood; this seems to have given that day in some degree the character of a feast (Ta'anith 45; see Schür. GI' (2) 2208^(b) 200^{f.} [ET 3252], and cp CANTICLES, § 8).

(6) To the period subsequent to the destruction of Jerusalem belongs the reintroduction of two fast days. Of the four fast days which were observed during the Exile and immediately after it (Zech. 7³⁵ 8¹⁹), destruction of those of the fourth and fifth months acquired a new meaning; on the 17th of the fourth month the city was stormed by the Romans under Titus: in the fifth month, on the 10th day, according to Josephus (BJ vi. 45), or on the 9th, according to the Talmud, the Romans destroyed the temple. Both days were observed; at a much later date the feast of the Rejoicing of the Law with feasting and mourning.

(7) Lastly, there was instituted a 'feast of rejoicing for the Law' (ת'ן ש'מ'ח ת'ן, hag sim'ith hatt'orah). It was celebrated on the 23rd of Tishri, immediately after the eight days of the feast of Tabernacles. It is on the Sabbath after the feast of Tabernacles that the reading in the synagogue of the fifty-four great parashim into which the Pentateuch is divided, begins. As for the antiquity of the feast, all that can be said is that the present cycle of parashim was already an institution of very old standing in the first half of the eighth century (cp Zunz, Gottesdienstl. Vortr., 37).

FELIX (ΦΗΛΙΞ [Ti. WH]). Antonius Felix, of the court of Claudius, probably, like his brother Pallas, a freedman of Antonia (the mother of Claudius), succeeded Cumanus as procurator of Palestine (52-60 A.D.);¹ see ISRAEL, § 99. His whole career eminently befitted his origin and is thus tersely summed up by Tacitus (Hist. 59): per omnem saevitiam ac libidinem jus regium servili ingenio exercuit. It is a striking illustration of the importance of freedmen at the court of Claudius that besides obtaining the procuratorship he was actually thrice married into royal families.² His tenure of office was marked by interminable revolts and dissensions. The disturbances of the Zealots had been followed by the excesses of the Sicarii (see ZEALOT). Religious fanatics 'not so impure in their deeds but more wicked in their intentions,' fired by Messianic hopes and expectations, were ruthlessly put to the sword. Of such was the Egyptian prophet of Acts 21:38 (see Jos. B.J. ii. 135, Ant. xx. 86). The latter period of his procuratorship was marked by two prominent events at CÆSAREA (g.v., 1). Paul, who had been accused of defiling the temple (Acts 21:28), and of preaching the resurrection from the dead (ib. 22:3 ff.; cp 23:6b 24:21), was sent hither for safety's sake by CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, and was accused in the presence of Felix (Acts 24). One hesitates to estimate the character of Felix from account of the trial: v. 22a is notably difficult, and it is not easy to decide whether the procurator already knew something of the teaching of Jesus, or whether he recognised the inner significance of Paul's speech. It is probable that to Felix Paul was no more than one of the many fanatics who had arisen in the past years, and it agrees with the general tendency of Acts to infer that the writer's aim was to indicate the neutral attitude of Rome to the new faith (cp ACTS, § 5).

¹ On the dates see CHRONOLOGY, § 66. According to Tacitus (Ann. 12⁵⁴) Felix had been administering Samaria and Judaea whilst Cumanus was procurator of Galilee; see on this the literature cited by Schür. Hist. 2173, n. 14.

² Of his two wives who are known to us, one was a granddaughter of Mark Antony and Cleopatra; the other, Drusilla, was the daughter of Agrippa I. (see HERODIAN FAMILY, 10).

At Caesarea, again, a conflict arose between the Jewish and the Syrian inhabitants respecting equality of civic privileges. Felix interposed on behalf of the latter and silenced the Jews by military force. Deputations were sent to Rome, one demanding a speedy settlement of the question, the other, from the Jews, denouncing the conduct of the procurator. Felix was recalled and his place taken by FESTUS [g.v.]. Through the influence of Pallas, Felix escaped punishment, and the Syrian party, [by bribing Nero's secretary Beryllus,¹ ensured the annulling of the privileges of the Jews of Caesarea. FERRET. The Heb. ânâbâh, אַנְבָּה (Targ. אַנְבָּה; cp Pesh. ânâphâ), thus translated in Lev. 11:30f AV, is in RV rendered 'gecko,' and from the context it certainly looks as if some kind of lizard were intended. BABLE, however, has μυγαλιή (a shrew mouse, Sorex). The Rabbinical writers regard the animal as the hedgehog; but the latter is commonly taken to be the equivalent of the kippôdh (see BITTERN, § 1).

Six species of Gecko are described from Palestine, of which the Egyptian species Ptyodactylus lobatus is perhaps the most abundant. The peculiar conformation of their feet by means of which they are able to walk on walls and ceilings is well known. Geckos are commonly but erroneously regarded as poisonous. They are nocturnal in habit, concealing themselves during the day; and when more than one species lives in or around a house they keep separate and apart from one another. They utter curious clicking sounds, from which perhaps they derive their name. Cp LIZARD. A. E. S.

'Closing festival' (ἑξόδιον) is the rendering of RVmg. for פֶּסַח, isârah (see ASSEMBLY, 1) in Lev. 23:36 Nu. 29:35 Neh. 8:18 (feast of tabernacles), Dt. 16:8 (the passover), 2 Ch. 7:9 (dedication of temple). FESTUS (ΦΙΣΤΟΣ [Ti. WH]). Porcius Festus succeeded FELIX as procurator of Palestine (60-62 A.D.). Since Josephus remarks on the contrast between him and his successor Albinus, we may assume that there were no great blots on his character. Paul, who had been left in prison at Cæsarea, was brought to judgment first before Festus, and then before Agrippa and Festus, and only on his appeal to Cæsar was sent to Italy (Acts 25 f.); see PAUL. The conflict, also at Cæsarea, between the Jews and the Syrians, had been settled in favour of the latter (see FELIX), and the hostile feeling thereby excited among the Jews was destined to play an important part in the disasters which began a few years later. The disturbed state of the popular mind still continued, and is reflected in the frequent troubles with the Sicarii (see ZEALOT). The only remaining incident of importance during the procuratorship of Festus concerns the quarrel between Agrippa II. and the priests of Jerusalem; see HERODIAN FAMILY, 8.

The transition to 'country' was easy, because the ancestors of the Hebrews and Assyrians came from a mountainous country. FIG TREE (Dt. 88 Judg. 9 ro f. 1 K. 425 [55], etc.) and FIG (Nu. 1323 205 etc.) are both denoted by the same Heb. word ḥināh, חִנְיָה (pl.

1. Derivation חִנְיָה), whereas Greek distinguishes them as κυκη and κυκον. According to Lagarde (Mittheil. 158-75), the Semitic name for the fig tree means properly the tree near which another is planted or to which another is joined.¹

Lagarde contends that the tree's oldest Semitic name was tin, and, discussing its modification into Heb. ḥināh, Aram. tittā, and Arab. tin, he argues that the initial t is the same as the preformative of 3 s. f. imperf., and hence that a derivation from a root חִנְיָה is probable. This root occurs frequently as a verb in Arabic with the meaning 'it is time,' 'the time has come'; and probably the original sense was that of 'bringing near' or 'joining.'

The name is explained by the practice of planting wild fig trees by the side of the cultivated trees, or of placing branches of the wild fig in flower upon the trees—a practice described by Aristotle (HA 532), Pliny (HN xv. 1979), and others, and called by the Greeks ἐπινασμός and by the Latins caprificatio. The wild fig, which does not itself produce an edible fruit, is useful as harbouring hymenopterous insects which migrate to the cultivated tree and enter the receptacles within the figs. The object is to carry the pollen to the female flowers; but the irritation produced by the gall-insects in attempting to deposit their eggs in them hastens the maturity of the fruit. Linnæus rightly held that the fig has two sexes, the male being the 'caprifig' or wild fig, while the female is the cultivated fig.

This view was opposed by Miquel (who held the two plants to be different species), and by Gasparrini (who made them different genera). Graf zu Solms-Laubach maintained that the 'caprifig' was the wild stock from which the cultivated fig had developed. Fritz Müller reasserted the opinion of Linnæus, and Solms-Laubach made a journey to Java to re-examine the question in the genus Ficus generally, and as a result gave his adhesion to the Linnæan view. The 'caprifig' produces in its receptacles 'gallflowers'—i.e., female flowers which have become the nidus of the insects. Certainly, from early times the Hebrews seem to have known the process of artificial stimulation as applied to figs (Am. 7 14, see below).

Dioecious plants occasionally revert functionally; possibly we have an instance of this in the barren fig-tree (Lk. xiii. 6-9). There is reason to think that the normal 'fruit-bearing' fig may sometimes revert to the caprifig condition. In that case its 'figs' would not swell but would drop off early and (apparently) immature. Any one visiting such a tree would be disappointed (see, however, below, § 5).²

Lagarde maintains, moreover, that the name is not one of those which from the first belonged to all the Semitic languages—in other words, that the fig was probably unknown to the home. Semites in their original home. The same conclusion had, on quite different grounds, been reached by Guidi (Della sede primitiva dei popoli Semitici, 35*f.*), and is generally accepted.³

On somewhat doubtful philological grounds, Lagarde argues that the name was borrowed alike by Heb., Aram., and classical Arab. from the dialect of the clan Bahrā, who had their original home in S.E. Arabia. However, as Halévy shows (Mélanges, 200), almost equally good reasons could be given for holding the word to be originally Hebrew or Aramaic. Although it must be admitted that Lagarde's argument is weakened by baseless philological assumptions,⁴ his etymology has fair probability, and if accepted throws an interesting light on the great antiquity of the art of fig cultivation.

The original home of the fig is said by De Candolle (Orig., 238) to have been the Southern Mediterranean shore, westwards from Syria. Thence the fig spread northwards and eastwards. Like the vine and olive, it must have been long an inhabitant of Palestine; we see this especially in such early references as Judg. 9 10

¹ Tin having the same relation to חִנְיָה as חִנְיָה has to חִנְיָה (though this latter etymology is doubtful).

² The point is elaborately discussed in the Gardener's Chronicle for July 7, 1883 (p. 22*f.*) by W. B. Hemsley, F.R.S.

³ Guidi holds that Arabic probably borrowed the word from Aramaic.

Mic. 44. At the present day it is found wild in all parts of the country (Tristram, NHB 351).

Guidi (Della sede, 35) cites a passage from an Arabic poet in which, as in the parable of Jotham (Judg. 9), the olive, the fig, and the vine as typical of

3. Culture. cultivated trees are opposed to the bramble. The fact that these three can be traced so far back in Hebrew literature is interesting for the history of fruit culture; and it is specially significant that the old phrase for possession of a country was that 'every man should sit under his own vine and fig-tree.' The medicinal use of the דבילה, dēbhēlāh, or cake of figs, as a poultice (Is. 3821 2 K. 207) is known both to classical (Pliny, HN xxiii. 7 122) and to Arabic writers (Di. ad loc.).

The meaning of the expression בָּלוֹס שְׁקִימִים, balōs šeqīmim, in Amos (7 14) is still uncertain. The verb בָּלוֹס does not occur elsewhere in Hebrew or in any other Semitic language (᠘ κλιών, Aq. ἐπευών, Sym. ἔχων, Theod. χαράσσων); but balas is a common name of the fig in Arabic and Æthiopic and is held by Lagarde (Mittheil., l.c.) to be the oldest Semitic name for the fruit, though even he thinks it may have been originally borrowed, perhaps from an Indian source. This being so, the reference is most probably to the cultivation of sycamore figs (the fruit of Ficus Sycomoros) by incisions made in the immature fruit. See also SYCOMORE.

The early unripe fruits which first appear on the fig tree in spring are in Cant. 2 13 denoted by פִּגְגִּים, paggim, where פִּגְגִּים has δρόσους, a word which occurs once in the NT (Rev. 8 13). Fijj in Ar. may denote any kind of immature fruit; Syr. paggā or paggā (see ΒΕΡΥΛΗΡΑΓΕ) is the unripe fig. So δρόσους is explained by Hesychius as τὸ μὴ μετασκευασμένον σίκκον. On the other hand, the early ripe fig, which was (and is) highly esteemed on account both of its peculiarly fine flavour and of its early appearance, is denoted by בִּכְבִּירָה, bikkirāh (Is. 28 4 Jer. 24 2 Hos. 9 10 Mic. 7 14).

The use of 'fig leaves' to make 'aprons' in Gen. 3 7 has given rise to unnecessary difficulty, on the ground 4. Gen. 3 7. of the softness of the leaves and the difficulty of sewing them together into a continuous covering. Lagarde, who justly remarks that the mention of fig leaves must have been an element in the original form of the story,² has discovered for them an allegorical and religious meaning which would (as Dillmann remarks) have done honour to Philo. Celsius, Gesenius, Knobel, and others suppose that the banana or Musa is referred to, as this plant is called a fig by the natives of Malabar; it is urged that its leaves, which may be ten feet long, would provide an effective covering. It is quite inadmissible, however, to suppose that the Hebrew narrator had a Malayan plant in his mind; the banana was not known to the Egyptians, and its introduction into India (whence it was known to the Greeks and Arabs) was more recent (cp De Candolle, l.c. 245). Though later this plant became somehow associated with the Eden narrative (witness Linnæus's name for it, Musa paradistaca) there is no ground for supposing that מַנְהַר could have its meaning extended to cover a plant totally different from the fig. Probably the use of fig leaves seemed natural because these are among the largest to be found on any Palestinian tree. N. M.—W. T. T.-D.

The NT references to the fig tree are of great interest. When Jesus, according to the Fourth Gospel, speaks of having seen Nathanael 'under the fig tree' 5. NT. (Jn. 1 48 50), it is natural to think, in the first instance, of some prominent fig tree such as those which in Palestine often overshadow the wells beside which travellers halt, e.g., 'Ain et-Tin, by Khān Mīnyeh (see, however, NATHANAEL). No tree is so widely spread in Syria and Palestine as the fig tree. Hence we cannot be surprised that on two recorded occasions Jesus drew a parable from it—(a) Mt. 24:32-35 Mk. 13:28-32 Lk. 21:29-33; (b) Lk. 13:6-9. The letter of these parables is clear; the briefest reference to it is sufficient. (a) The fig tree is one of the first trees to shoot, though the time of its coming into leaf varies according to the situation, and when the leaves appear there must already be immature fruit, and summer cannot be far off. (b) A fig tree that had borne no fruit for three years would seem to its owner (destitute of the practical knowledge of a gardener) to be useless, or even worse than useless. He would therefore at once cut it down, unless his gardener could persuade him that cultural treatment would be likely to restore the tree to normal fruit-bearing. The application of the parables is equally unmistakable. The first has reference to the speedy advent of the Messiah in glory; the second to the danger of destruction for the Jewish people.

A great difficulty, however, remains, and we must be careful to meet it in an unprejudiced spirit. There is a well-known story (Mt. 21:17-22 Mk. 11:12-14 20-23) placed immediately after the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, which irresistibly reminds us of the second of these parables. Is the association of ideas purely accidental, or does it point to some misunderstanding on the part of Mt. and Mk.? The improbabilities of the story are obvious, and cannot be explained away. Jesus, being hungry, came to a fig tree near Bethany, just before the passover, before the season for figs had come, and finding only leaves, cursed the tree, which immediately (παράχρημα) withered away (Mt.), or at any rate was seen to be withered on the following morning (Mk.). With this act, Jesus, according to the evangelists, connected an exhortation to the disciples to have faith in God, since even mountains (a proverbial expression) may be moved by prayer.

One inaccuracy in the report is too plain to be overlooked. Any exhortation which Jesus may have connected with this action must have related to the fate of the Jewish people, of which the fig tree is an image (Joel 1:7); the saying on faith is indeed genuine, but has received a wrong setting. Passing to the story itself, we cannot help being surprised at the curse ascribed to Jesus, for which there is no parallel in his life, and which, if interpreted symbolically, is diametrically opposed to the statement in Mt. 21:41 Mk. 12:9.¹ This is the first difficulty. The second may be best expressed in the words of Augustine, 'Quid arbor fecerat fructum non afferendo? Quae culpa arboris infecunditas?'² What was the offence of the fig tree? Was it the not having preserved one or two figs from the last season? Or was it the not having produced one or two precocious figs before the time? Neither alternative appears reasonable, nor is it at all natural to suppose—as a last expedient—that what Jesus required was green, unripe fruit.³ Surely there is a better explanation, and a slight acquaintance with human nature will show how reasonable it is. Parables and history are easily confounded, so that even Sir Philip Sidney speaks with mild surprise of theologians of his time who denied the historicity of the parable of the good Samaritan. In just the same way some early Christian must have misunderstood the parable preserved in Lk. 13:6-9, and transformed it into a narrative of an act of Jesus, giving the circumstances a somewhat different form in order to bring the story as near as possible to the death of Jesus, but forgetting (see below) that the passover season was not the time for figs.

It is a confirmation of this view that neither Mt. nor Mk. gives the parable in question, though they do record a parable of a vineyard (Mt. 21:33-46 Mk. 12:1-12) which is similar in its tendency, though it does not represent the vineyard as destroyed. It may be added that by giving up this difficult story we can the better appreciate the husbandman's loving intercession for the symbolic fig tree in the parable. It is not merely the accuracy of a detail in a narrative—it is the consistency of the character of the Saviour himself—that is in question.

² Serm. 98:3 (Trench, Miracles, 445 n.).

The chapter on the withering of the fruitless fig tree in Trench's Miracles may still be read with profit for its subtlety and the abundance of its exegetical information. We learn there that D. Heinsius proposed to read (Mk. 11:13) ὅ γάρ ἦν καρπὸς σίκαλον, 'for where he was [in Judaea] it was the season of figs.' Trench also refers to the reading (adopted by TI and WH) ὁ γάρ καρπὸς οὐκ ἦν σίκαλον (instead of ὁ γάρ ἦν καρπὸς σίκαλον), which, though very well attested, is not probable. The truth probably is that the words are a comment of an early reader which has made its way into the text (so first Toup).

Berōš, which once (Cant. 1:17) occurs in an Aramaised form as חֲרִי, is also found in Assyrian (hurāšū) and Syriac (ḥerōšā).

1. Name. and has probably passed through Phœnician into Greek as βράβυ, and into Latin as bratius.

The ancient interpretations are very varied. Thus Ḥ has κατάριστος six times; πύνη or πυκνίσιος five times; κέβρος or κέβριος, ἀρεκυθός [A] or ἀρεκύνθιος, and πίτυς, each twice; and thrice an indeterminate rendering. Pesh. also is not altogether consistent, but generally renders sharwatānā—i.e., 'cypress'; whereas in Vg. the rendering abies greatly preponderates. Again, some Jewish authorities, as Maimonides and Kimhi, are quoted in favour of the 'box' (Cels. 1:78 f.). See Box TREE.

The OT references show that the ḥerōš was a characteristic forest tree of large stature and spreading boughs (2 K. 19:23 Ezek. 31:8), evergreen

2. OT references. (Hos. 14:8 [9]), a chief element in the 'glory of Lebanon' (Is. 60:13; cp 41:19 55:13), and specially associated with the cedar (Ps. 104:17 Is. 14:8 Zech. 11:2). Its timber ranked with that of the cedar as the best that could be employed in the building of houses and of ships (1 K. 5:8 10 [22 24] 6:15 34 9:11 Cant. 1:17 Ezek. 27:5).

Clearly then ḥerōš is one of the large conifers—probably either (1) the cypress, or (2) the fir or pine.

3. Identifications. (1) The meaning 'cypress' has been accepted by most modern authorities, and might be regarded as established, were it proved that the equivalent in Phœnician meant the cypress. This is assumed, however, rather than proved in most cases—e.g. in the argument of Baudissin (Stud. 2:192-198; cp Hal. Ill. Crit. 30).

Even if it be granted that the representation on Phœnician coins and other monuments can be identified as the cypress and distinguished from other conifers (which in some cases Baudissin allows to be doubtful), the association of the tree with any particular deity such as the βραβυθ or the βραβυ of Philo Byblius is evidently precarious (cp Rel. Sem. (9) 206 f.), and still more so is the inference that these Phœnician names denote the cypress. The identification is possibly better supported (Ges. Theol.) by the fact that in Gk. βράβυ (Diosc. 1:104) and in Lat. bratius (Pl. HN xii. 17:78 xxiv. 11:102) denoted the savin (Juniperus).

perus Sabina, L.), of which one sort, according to Pliny, resembles a cypress; but even this is not much to build on. Moreover, whilst the ancients are known to have highly prized cypress wood for its durability and its usefulness in building houses and ships (Blümmner, Technol. bei Griechen u. Römern, 2257 ff.), almost equal praise is bestowed by them on the fir and pine in these respects (ib. 283 ff.).

(2) More decisive arguments in favour of the fir are those adduced by Robertson Smith (Proph.⁽²⁾ 413 f.).

(1) Ebusus, the modern Iviza, is, according to the coins, עִבּוּסָא, and what this means appears from the Gk. Ἐβουσαί (see Schröder, Phön. Spr. 99). (2) The berös is, according to the OT, the characteristic tree of Lebanon along with the cedar. Now the cypress is (at any rate at present) not indigenous on Lebanon, but a species of Abies is very characteristic of these mountains, and to judge from its present frequency, must have always been a prominent feature in the forests.

Doubt may indeed remain whether ბერი is a fir or a pine,¹ since, as Tristram tells us (NHB 353), the Aleppo pine is one of the most characteristic trees of Lower Lebanon, whilst Pinus maritima occurs occasionally on the coast and in the sandy plains.

In some passages the occurrence of עִבּוּסָא may be due to transcriptional error; in others it should possibly be restored.

(1) In 2 S. 65 we have the strange phrase 'playing before Yahwè on all kinds of fir wood, and on harps, etc.' The parallel passage, however ('with all their might, and with songs, and with harps,' 1 Ch. 18 8), supplies a better

4. Doubtful passages. reading (most after We., so Θ ἐν ἰσχυρί). (2) The phrase עִבּוּסָא הַרְיָנוֹת in the battle-picture of Nah. 2 3[4] will hardly bear to be rendered 'the spears are shaken terribly' (RV). Θ has of ἰππεὶς θορυβηθῆσονται = הַרְיָנוֹת הַפָּרָשִׁים (Che.), though We. keeps the ἀπ. Ἀεγ. הרעלו, and renders the clause 'the horses prance.' (3) In Ps. 72 16, for עִבּוּסָא הַרְיָנוֹת, בְּרִישׁ הַרְיָנוֹת, 'on the top of the mountains shall it (the corn?) make a rushing noise,' Che. (Ps.⁽²⁾) reads בְּרִישׁ הַרְיָנוֹת יִשְׁרַע, 'like the pine of the mountains let it (justice) strike root.'

FIRE (עֵשׂ, אֵשׁ, אֵשׁ; אֵשׁ). No material phenomenon seemed to primitive man to be so plainly divine as fire

1. OT (cp Tylor, Prim. Cult. 225 f.).
(a) There was a flaming sword at the conceptions. gate of Paradise (see CHERUB, § 7), and in the storm, flashes of divine fire 'fire of God,' 2 K. 1 12 Job 1 16 still lightened the world, betokening the passage of the divinity (Hab. 3 11 Ps. 77 18 [19]). It was also believed that in the olden time no human hand lighted the sacrificial flame, but fire from a well-pleased God (see Judg. 6 21 1 K. 18 24 38, and cp SACRIFICE).

(b) Not only, then, did fire become an essential element in the ritual (see INCENSE, §§ 1, 8, SACRIFICE, and cp ALTAR), and in imaginative descriptions of theophanies (see BUSH, § 2; THEOPHANY, § 5), but also a conception of God's nature was derived, partly at least, from the characteristics of fire. 'Yahwè is a devouring fire' to those who provoke him (see Dt. 4 24 9 3 32 22 Is. 30 27 Mt. 3 11 Heb. 12 29); he is a cheering light to those who obey him (Ps. 46 [7] 27 1 Is. 25). These two manifold aspects of God's nature are combined in Is. 10 17, 'The light of Israel shall be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame.'

(c) From the parallelism of the two expressions 'light' and 'Holy One' we see that the appearance of 'fire' or 'light' is the outward manifestation of the divine 'holiness' (cp CLEAN, § 1). To those who are not 'holy' the sense of God's nearness must be oppressive. When he approaches for judgment, such persons (who have hitherto been practically atheists) realise what he is, and exclaim, 'Who can dwell safely in the neighbourhood of the avenging God?'

Such at least is the usual interpretation of that remarkable passage Is. 33 14. Prof. Skinner, for instance, remarks, 'The word "dwell" means strictly "sojourn as a protected guest," and is the same as that used in Ps. 15 1.'

No one, however, has been able to make the phrase אֵשׁ אֵשׁ אֵשׁ, 'Who shall sojourn to us devouring fire' (so it is literally) appear quite natural as Hebrew. The whole passage is so striking that even a faint gleam of fresh light may be welcome. In accordance with the newer style of textual criticism, which recognises the imperfections of MT more fully than used to be possible, we should most probably (with SBOT 'Isa.' Heb., 196) restore the original text thus,

'Who will rebuke for us (לְנוֹ) יִנְקֵר (יְיָ) the devouring fire?
'Who will rebuke for us the everlasting burnings?'

To rebuke is to 'curb, quell,' or (when used of God) to 'annihilate' by an angry word; cp Ps. 106 9, 'He rebuked the Red Sea, and it dried up.'

Another difficulty, however, remains; and glad as one would be to recommend some explanation with confidence, it is not possible to do so. There are two current explanations.

(1) Comparing the description of the bush which burned and yet was not consumed (Ex. 3 2), some critics understand 'everlasting' as equivalent to 'divine,' divine fire being necessarily eternal. This is plausible,¹ and with a different context would be admissible. Here, however, we require a word which speaks for itself without exegetical subtlety. Besides, if 'rebuke' is right, 'divine' must of course be wrong.

(2) 'Everlasting' might, it is said, mean 'continual.' This view, however, seems to confound עוֹלָם 'blām with נצח נצח (see ETERNAL), and is rightly rejected by Kittel in his revision of Dillmann's commentary. Perhaps we should correct עוֹלָם into אֲמִים 'peoples.' It is no ordinary siege of Jerusalem that Is. 33 presupposes, but a judgment upon the nations which will assemble (the later prophets say) to besiege Jerusalem at the close of the present age. Hence in 2. 12 we read, 'And the peoples will become burned to lime: like thorns cut off, which are kindled with fire.' Where this fire comes from we learn from a neighbouring prophecy: it comes from Yahwè, 'who has a fire in Zion, and a furnace² in Jerusalem' (31 9). It is not the usual word for 'fire'; the word אֵשׁ was, according to some critics,³ selected to suggest Ariel ('Altar-hearth'), the name given by Isaiah to Jerusalem in 29 1; see ARIEL, 2. 'The fire is evidently that of the altar, not, however, of the visible but of the invisible altar, which Isaiah knows from his vision (chap. 6) to be really existent in the sanctuary' (SBOT 'Isa.' 154).

Fire, however, was not merely a destroying agent.

(a) In the hand of a refiner it separated the pure metal from the dross—a type of God's purifying judgments. It is said indeed once that the effect was not produced in the case of Israel; affliction brought no noble elements into view:—

'Surely, I have refined thee, but without gain of silver; I have tried thee in the furnace in vain' (Is. 48 10, SBOT).

However, the writer of these words is hardly the Prophet of Consolation; they appear to be an interpolation. The true Second Isaiah is an optimist, as the First Isaiah himself was when he wrote the words, 'I will smelt out in the furnace⁵ thy dross' (Is. 1 25), and as Malachi was, when he said, 'He is like a refiner's fire' (Mal. 3 2), and another late prophet who declares, 'I (Yahwè) will bring the third part through the fire . . . they shall call on my name, and I will hear them' (Zech. 13 9).

(b) Of the purgatorial fire there is no trace in the Bible; an appeal was made at the Council of Florence (1439 A.D.) to 1 Cor. 3 15, 'he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire'; but the fire mentioned is the same as that in 2. 13, which is plainly the fire of destruction. As in 1 Pet. 3 20 it is said that 'few persons were saved (passing) through the water' (δὲ ὕδατος), so the unwise builder referred to will escape through the midst of the fire, safe himself, though with the loss of his work.⁶

On the unquenchable Gehenna (out of which the notion of a purgatorial fire grew among the later Jews), see ESCHATOLOGY, §§ 10 63 3 70 3 (also iii. f.).

Two special laws respecting the use of fire may be mentioned. (1) According to Ex. 35₃, not even the work of lighting a fire was permissible on the Sabbath—a prohibition which agrees with the statement in Ex. 16₂₃ that the manna in the wilderness might not be baked on the Sabbath. It is difficult to believe that this ascetic injunction which made household arrangements so difficult, was of early origin; in fact, critical analysis assigns it to P. (See Jos. B/ii.89, and cp SABBATH.) (2) Another special law impressed on herdmen the necessity of caution in the use of fire. If a fire, starting among thorns which were troublesome and had to be consumed (Is. 33_{12d}), should spread to another man's cornfield or orchard and damage it, restitution was to be made by the man who kindled the fire (Ex. 226 [5]; cp Judg. 9₁₅ 15₅)—a most useful law in such a country as Palestine where the summers are so hot. In consequence of the material employed in the construction of houses no law was needed with regard to conflagrations in cities (see HOUSE, § 1).

FIRSTBORN, FIRSTLING, etc. That the first-fruits of the body—particularly the male—possessed an intrinsic sanctity was a belief which the ancient Hebrews shared with other divisions of the Semitic stock. The firstborn male enjoyed privileges of which he was not to be deprived (Dt. 21₁₆), and to barter away his birthright (בְּכֹרֶת, bēkōrah, Gen. 25_{23 f}), or to be deprived of it (1 Ch. 5₁), was deemed a disgrace; see LAW AND JUSTICE, § 18. 'Firstborn' (πρωτότοκος) thus becomes an honourable title applied to Israel (Ex. 4₂₂) and Ephraim (Jer. 31₉), and, through the Jewish interpretation of Ps. 89₂₇ [28], designates also the Messiah (Heb. 16 Col. 1₁₅ Rom. 8₂₉). This character of the male firstborn finds analogies in the treatment of firstlings among a nomadic folk, and of the first-fruits of the field among a community which is essentially agricultural. The Hebrews, however, as we find them in the OT, had passed from the nomad to the agricultural state with the inevitable result that observances, primarily distinct, were inextricably fused together. See SACRIFICE, TITHES.

It is noteworthy that the Sem. bākar ('to break forth'), is not confined to the animal world, but can include the first-fruits of trees or of the produce of the field. Thus, besides bēkōr (Ass. bukra, Syr. būkrā), used of individuals (Gen. 25₁₃ etc.) and animals (Ex. 11₅),¹ is found bihkārān, בכָּרִים, firstlings in general (Ex. 23₁₆), and bihkārān, בכֹּרֶת, specifically the 'early fig' (Mic. 7₁ etc., see FIG, § 3). A similar root-meaning is possessed by the Heb. peter, פֶּטֶר ('to cleave,' cp Ass. paṭāru), 'firstling,' or, fully, peter rehem, פֶּטֶר רֶחֶם (δραμοίον μητρου), which is limited to man and beast (Ex. 18₂ 12_f. 15₃₄ 19 Nu. 8₁₂ 8₁₅ Ezek. 20₂₆). Finally, rēšith, רֵאשִׁית (the first or best, ἀπαρχή) does not exclude the firstborn male (Gen. 49₃, בכְּוִרִי אֶלֶף אֲוִי, but is commonly applied to grain, fruit, etc. (Ex. 23₁₉ 34₂₆ Dt. 26₂ 10).

Not only were the first-fruits as acceptable an offering as the firstlings, but when (in exceptional cases) a human victim was required it was a firstborn that was preferred (2 K. 3₂₇). Just as the fruit of a new orchard remained 'uncircumcised' for three years (Lev. 19_{23 f}., see FRUIT, § 2), and was dedicated to Yahwē before it could be eaten with impunity, so the firstlings possessed a specific character until they had been sanctified. Similarly we find that the eighth day after birth is set apart for the dedication of the firstling, and is at the same time a turning-point in the life of the firstborn. In the case of the firstborn the evidence is shrouded in obscurity. Certain features, however, deserve consideration. It appears that the laws regulating the redemption of the firstling (see SACRIFICE) find an analogy in the redemption of the firstborn, which P, in some way, connects with the consecration of the Levites. It would certainly be rash to infer that at one time the Hebrews habitually sacrificed their firstborn sons, although the valuable testimony of Mic. 6₇ shows that in Manasseh's time the offering of the firstborn for the sin of the father was not a novelty in the worship of Yahwē.¹

Although the association of the offering of the firstborn with the PASSOVER is probably a late development (see EXODUS, § 3 iii.; FEASTS, § 2) certain features merit attention. Here the law (Ex. 13₁₂ 22₂₈ [29]) unambiguously assigns the פֶּטֶר הָרֶמֶס, whether of man or beast, to Yahwē,² but commands that the firstborn of man shall be redeemed (Ex. 13₁₃ 15₆ 34₂₀ Nu. 18_{15 f}). The fact that in P the redemption is made by the Levites makes it probable that in later times the dedication was understood to be for the temple-service (cp Smend, AT Rel.-gesch. (2) 282, u. 3). This is also the view of later Judaism (Targ. on Ex. 24₅, Mish. Zebach. 14₄), but is scarcely ancient.

No doubt, strictly, the offering of the firstborn to Yahwē was at one time considered to be as binding as the offering of firstlings and first-fruits, and, indeed, the evidence goes to show that in exceptional cases the offering was actually made. However, just as the first-fruits were offered as a part of the whole, it is conceivable that originally the rite of circumcision was instituted upon the same principle to typify the offering of the firstborn.³ That in later times the rite was extended to all males, and was looked upon as a tribal mark (see CIRCUMCISION, § 5), does not preclude this theory.

See WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 458 f., and cp TAXATION AND TRIBUTE. S. A. C.

FISH. Of freshwater fish from the Holy Land Tristram enumerates forty-three species, only eight of which are common to the more westerly

1. Species. Mediterranean rivers and lakes. Of the thirty-six species found in the Jordan and its system, but one (Blennius lupulus) is found in the ordinary Mediterranean freshwater fauna; two occur in the Nile, seven in the Tigris, Euphrates, and adjacent rivers, ten in other parts of Syria, and sixteen are peculiar to the basin of the Jordan. It thus appears, as Tristram points out, that the fish fauna is very isolated; it shows affinities, however, to that of the Ethiopian zoo-geographical region, and probably dates from a geological time when the Jordan and the rivers of NE. Africa belonged to the same system.

A few of the more interesting forms may be mentioned. The blenny (Blennius)—two species—and four species of gray mullet (Mugil) are found in the inland lakes and rivers. B. zarus being very abundant in the Sea of Galilee, which is unusually well stocked with fish. The members of the family Chromidae are very many and are characteristic of this inland water. Chromis tiberialis is peculiar to the basin of the Jordan and very abundant. Numbers of this fish are carried down by the river and perish in the salt waters of the Dead Sea, thus affording food to the numerous fish-eating birds which congregate along the shores. In the larger expanses of water these fishes collect together in enormous shoals, and are captured by the fishermen in thousands, often bursting the nets by their weight. Other species of the same genus are also peculiar to the district but are less abundant. C. niloticus occurs in the Jordan basin and in the Nile, as does Hemichromis sacra, and these two genera are confined to the fresh waters of Palestine and Africa. When fish take any care of their eggs and young it is almost always the male that performs these functions; in the species C. simonis and H. sacra, and possibly in others, the male takes the ova into his mouth and they develop in large cheek pouches which swell to such an extent that the fish is unable to close its mouth. Even when hatched the young fry remain in the buccal cavity of their parent or amongst his gills until they are about four inches long.

¹ Cp especially Ezek. 20₂₆. For human sacrifices generally see 2 K. 16₃ 17₁₇ 21₆ 28₁₀ Jer. 7₃₁ Ezek. 16_{20 f}. 23₃₇, and cp ISAAC, JEREPHTAH.

² According to Ex. 18₂ (P) the firstborn is 'taboo' to Yahwē (the verb is h'iddē, cp CLEAN, § 1); note also the remarkable use of חֲכִירִי in v. 12, compared with Ezek. 20₂₆.

Another remarkable fish described by Canon Tristram, Clarias macracanthus, is found in muddy bottoms in the Lakes of Gennesaret and Huleh and in the Upper Nile. Members of this species are in the habit of migrating up the small and dwindling streams to deposit their eggs in the upper pools, and in their course often have to traverse stretches where the water is insufficient to cover them or is absent altogether. They are able to live at least two days out of water,—a fact which may be correlated with the existence of an accessory branchial organ which stretches from the second and the fourth gill arch and is received into a cavity behind the gills. When out of water the fish makes a squeaking or hissing sound. Its flesh is considered excellent.

Four species of Cyprinodon are found in the marshes and salt springs of Palestine; they are small fish capable of living at high temperatures (up to 91° F.) and in very concentrated saline pools. The waters of the Dead Sea, however, are fatal to them, probably because some salts are present which are injurious to life, as they live freely in water of equal density but of different composition. The males are very much smaller than the females, in fact are perhaps the smallest fishes known.

Anguilla vulgaris, the common European eel (it also occurs in N. America), is abundant in the Lake of Antioch and in some rivers, but Canon Tristram did not find it in the Jordan; it reaches a length of 4½ feet and is much appreciated as an article of food.

The remaining twenty-three species of fish found in Palestine belong to the Cyprinidæ or Carp family. A few may be mentioned. Capoeta damascina is common in the Jordan, which carries them down to the Dead Sea where they perish in large numbers. C. fratercula is a sacred fish to the Mohammedans of N. Africa. Its flesh is said to be excellent. Barbus canis (Barbel) is the most abundant of the many fish in the Sea of Galilee. Tristram speaks of having seen 'thousands of these fishes in the Jordan, when an army of locusts has been attempting to cross the river, standing almost upright in the stream with their heads partially out of the water, and their mouths wide open, devouring the locusts with inconceivable rapidity.' B. bedonii is confined to the Sea of Galilee, and rare. B. longiceps is peculiar to the same lake but extends into the Jordan. It is abundant. Several species of the genera Leuciscus (White fish), Alburnus (Bleak), and of Nemachilus (Loach) occur in the lakes and rivers, and many of them form articles of diet.

In Hebrew aquatic animals are comprehensively defined by the expression in Gen. 1:21:—'every living creature that creeps (הַחַיָּוִי) and with which

2. Hebrew terms. the waters swarm' (וְהַיָּם). The usual term, however, for 'fish' is dāgh, dāghāh (דָּג, דָּגָה), cp also דָּגִים, Gen. 9:2; דָּגַת הַיָּם, ib. 1:26:28, from which is derived the denominative דָּגָה*, 'to fish' (Jer. 16:16), and possibly דָּגָה, to multiply (Gen. 48:16). Strange to say, neither the OT nor the NT furnishes us with the specific name of a single fish. There are, however, many references to fishing.

3. Fishing. The art of fishing (דָּוָה, Am. 4:2) was pursued all the world over in three different ways.

1. The first and historically the oldest method was spearing, of which a full description is given by Wilkinson (Anc. Eg., ed. Birch [178], 2:120f.).

'The bident was a spear with two barbed points which was either thrust at the fish with one or both hands as they passed by or was darted to a short distance, a long line fastened to it preventing its being lost and serving to secure the fish when struck. . . . Sometimes a common spear was used for the purpose' (2:121). At other times the spear was furnished with feathers, like an arrow (as in the illustration, op. cit. 2:107). In most cases, however, it resembled the modern harpoon, and in hippopotamus-hunting was even furnished with a reel (see illustration, 2:122f.). This is the instrument mentioned in Job 41:7 [40:31] as דָּוָה לְדָגִים, 'fish-harpoon' (EV 'fish spears').

According to Tristram (NHB 292) 'the fish spear is much used in the smaller streams and the northern rivers of the Lebanon.'

2. A second mode of fishing was by means of a line and hook, with or without a rod (the latter probably Mt. 17:27), of which many illustrations have been preserved on the monuments of Egypt and Assyria. These ancient anglers (cp דָּוָה, Is. 19:8) used bait—never, so far as is known, the fly. That angling was familiar to the Hebrews is evident from its frequent use as a telling metaphor in the OT. The line (לִּיָּה) is mentioned only in Job 41: [40:25]. The Hook (g.v.) receives various names.

3. Professional fishermen, however, had at all times recourse to nets. The Egyptian nets were made of threads prepared from flax,¹ and were of various kinds—all explained and illustrated by Wilkinson (see 1:292f., 2:117f.). Most or all of these were, no doubt, employed by the fishermen of Phœnicia and Palestine. Of the many Hebrew words for 'net' the most usual, rešeth (רֶשֶׁת), is confined in the OT to the hunter's and the fowler's nets (see FOWL, § 8); but this is probably an accident. It is most probably the best equivalent of the general term δικτυον, rete (Mt. 4:20 Lk. 5:4 ff. Jn. 21:6 ff.), applicable to a net of any description.

On the other hand, two special varieties of fishing nets are found in the NT certainly, and in the OT very probably.

(a) The one is the hand-net or casting-net (ἀμφίβληστρον), still used on the Phœnician coast and on the sea of Galilee (ZDPI, 1886, p. 102).

The net is in shape like the top of a tent, with a long cord fastened to the apex. This is tied to the arm, and the net so folded that, when it is thrown (cp βάλλοντες, Mt. 4:18), it expands to its utmost circumference, around which are strung beads of lead to make it drop suddenly to the bottom. Now . . . he spies his game. . . . Away goes the net, expanding as it flies, and its leaded circumference strikes the bottom ere the silly fish knows that its meshes have closed around him. By the aid of his cord the fisherman leisurely draws up the net, and the fish with it' (Thomson, LB 402). Cp Wetstein's description in Delitzsch, Ein Tag in Kafarnaum, 146f.

This net corresponded to the funda of the Romans (for classical references see Smith's Dict. Ant., 'Rete'). Twenty-eight large fish were caught with a small hand-net at a single cast near Tiberias in 1884 (ZDPI, l.c.).

(b) The second net mentioned (σαγήνη) is the large drag, draw-net, or seine (from Lat. sagena). See an excellent representation of the drag-net at work in Wilkinson (1:291, also in Erman, op. cit., 238, 401).

It was similar in form and construction to the drag still in use, 'with wooden floats on the upper, and leads on the lower side,' and was worked in precisely the same way.² The net of the parable in Mt. 13:47 ff. was of this sort. With the two nets just described, it has been usual to identify the ἄμφίβληστρον, 'net' and the סַבְבֵּתָה—in Is. 19:8 pointed סַבְבֵּתָה—ἄμφίβληστρον, EV 'drag,' of Hab. 1:15 ff.; see NET, 3. The basket or reed trap (see Klunzinger, Upper Egypt, 307), in the Mishna אֶרְבַּן (Kelim, 12:2 28 5), and the stake-net (Tristram, op. cit. 292) are not mentioned in OT or NT.

The most favourable time for fishing was the night (before sunrise and after sunset, according to Aristotle); this illustrates Lk. 5:5 and Jn. 21:3.

4. Fishermen. On returning to land, the fishermen collected the marketable fish into baskets (Mt. 13:48), washed (Lk. 5:2) and mended their nets (Mt. 4:21 Mk. 1:19), and spread them out on the shore to dry (Ezek. 26:5 14 47:10, וְשָׂפוּ הַרְמִים, 'a place for the spreading of nets'). Fishermen seem to have formed a partnership among themselves either for some temporary purpose, or on a more permanent basis as a guild. Thus we read in the OT of the partners (חֲבֵרִים), bands of fishermen, Job 41:6 [40:30], and in the NT we are told that James and John were partners (κοινωνοί) with Simon (Lk. 5:10; in v. 7 they or others are called μέτοχοι).

² Pieces of the ancient Egyptian drag-nets may be seen in the British and Berlin Museums.

The wealthy Egyptian under the Pharaohs, like the wealthy Roman of a later day, had a piscina or fish-pond attached to his residence, where fish were fed for the table and where the owner was wont to amuse himself by angling or spearing the fish (Wilkinson, 2115, with illustration; Erman, Ancient Egypt, 196, 239). The name by which these fish-ponds are known in the Talmud (בִּיבְרָיָא, בִּיבְרָיָא, βιβράριον, vivarium) shows the late date at which the institution became known to the Jews.

It is true, AV (but not RV) speaks of 'ponds for fish' (מְנַיִם, Is 19 10) and of 'fish-pools' (Cant. 7 4 [5]); on the former error see Del. on Is. l.c.; on the latter BATH-RABBIM. In Job 41 2 [40 26] the question 'canst thou put a bulrush (וְיָנִיחַ, RV 'rope') into (leviathan's) nose?' is sufficiently explained by the ordinary procedure of anglers in carrying their fish (Wilk. 2 118). The crocodile, as Budde explains,¹ is no small fish which can be slung upon a rush.

With regard to the sources of the fish supply, Egypt has in all periods of its history been noted for the fish that abound in its waters.

6. Supply of fish. Fish was the cheapest of all foods, and it was always the great desire of the poor that the price of corn should be as low as that of fish (Erman, op. cit. 239). Compare the complaint of Israel (Nu. 11 5), 'we remember the fish, which we ate in Egypt for nought (חִנָּם).' In the so-called 'Blessing of Moses' (on the date of which see DEUTERONOMY, § 26) we seem to have a reference to the fishing industry on the coast of the Mediterranean carried on by Zebulun and Issachar² (Dt 33 18 f.). At a later period we find that a considerable trade in fish—no doubt cured, not fresh (see below)—was carried on by Tyrian merchants with Jerusalem (Neh. 13 16). There must have been a fish-market, which may have dated even from pre-exilic times, in the northern part of the city. It gave its name to a neighbouring gate (Neh. 3 3 f.); see JERUSALEM.

In the time of Jesus there were still thriving fisheries from the Dog river to the Bay of Acre,—to carry coals to Newcastle' is in later Hebrew 'to

7. Fish as food in NT times. take fish to Acco,—but more especially by the Sea of Galilee (cp Mk. 8 5 f. Lk. 9 13 ff. Jn. 21 9). Much of the fish caught on the lake must have been used in a fresh state by the thriving populations on its western and northern shores; but at the period in question there was also a large export trade in cured or salted fish. From this industry the town of Taricheæ (ταριχέαι, salting-places) received its name. The process of curing by cutting open the fish, removing the viscera, salting thoroughly, and exposing to the sun, was much in vogue in ancient Egypt (see illustration in Wilkinson, 2 118, and cp Herod. 2 92). The fishes of the two well-known miracles were in all probability of this sort, fish cured in the way indicated (τάριχοι, Herod. 9 120, Heb. קִלְיִים—opp. יִבְרָיָא, Nedarim, 6 4—or וְיָנִיחַ וְיָנִיחַ), already half-cooked in the sun, being in great demand for ἐπισιτισμός or provisions for the journey (Lk. 9 12 ff.). Cured fish was also imported from Egypt (where there were several places named Ταριχέαι), and from Spain. Thus in Mish. Makhshtirin, 6 3, mention is made of 'Egyptian fish that comes in baskets (or barrels?)' and of the Spanish colias (קוליים, κολίας) or tunny (cp Shabb. 22 4).¹

¹ [Budde's view of Leviathan has been controverted (see BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN, § 3). His interpretation of מְנַיִם in Job 41 2 [40 26] differs from that of Duhm, who renders (cp RV) 'Canst thou lay a rush (i.e., a rope of rushes) to his nose?' Gunkel (Schöpfung, 49), however, is afraid that leviathan would soon bite through such a rope, and thinks that Theod. (κρίκον), Vg. (circulum), and Tg. (אֲוִנְקֵלָה) presuppose a different reading. Che., agreeing with this, would read וְיָנִיחַ (|| וְיָנִיחַ); 1 and 1, 1 and 1, confounded. This would give a perfect parallelism, 'a ring in his nose,' his jaw with a hook.' So too Beer.]

Fish preserved in brine (מְרִיירִים, murice) was also an important article of commerce (Aboda Zarā, 26, Ned. 6 4), especially the fish called in the Talmud מְרִיירִים, which some identify with the tunny, others with the anchovy or the sardine (Herzfeld, op. cit. 105 f., and note on p. 305 f.). Other preparations from fish were מְרִיירִים, often mentioned along with מְרִיירִים, and מְרִיירִים, which was kept in a pot (Babā bath. 1 4 4); but their precise nature is unknown.

Fresh fish was prepared for the table in a variety of ways. One passage of the Talmud (Ned. 20 6) mentions four methods: it may be eaten pickled (see above), roasted, baked, or boiled. The most common of these methods was probably roasting or grilling. The ancient Egyptians roasted their fish by means of a spit through the tail (Erman, 189). The fish might also be laid directly on the charcoal (Jn. 21 9). Fish was also boiled (Ned. 6 4), and might be eaten with eggs atop (מְרִיירִים וְיָנִיחַ, Bēṣā, 2 1). Compare the riddle, from Mō'ed Kāṭōn, 11 a, cited by Hamburger (vol. 1, 'Fisch').

Although the use of fish as an article of diet is allowed by the Noachic covenant (Gen. 9 2 P), limitations are put upon it in Deuteronomy and

8. Clean and unclean fish. Leviticus. 'All that have fins (מְרִיירִים) and scales (מְשַׁקֵּמִים) ye may eat; but of those that have not fins and scales ye may eat none; they are unclean (טָמֵא) unto you' (Dt. 14 9 f.; cp Lev. 11 9-12, where the forbidden fish are styled קִקְקָה, 'an abomination'). By this provision no distinction is made between salt-water and fresh-water fish—in the seas and in the rivers' (Lev. 11 9)—provided the necessary criteria are present. Excluded, on the other hand, are all scaleless fishes, such as the important group of the siluridæ or sheat-fish—the flesh of which is said to be 'excellent eating, firm and rich like an eel's' (Tristram, FFP, 170, 173)—skates, lampreys, and, of course, eels, and every variety of shellfish.² Similarly the author of the epistle to Barnabas (chap. 10) mentions as forbidden the σμύρανα (lamprey), πολύπος and σπηρία; and Jer. Epist. 1 51, Quæst. 10, besides the Sepia adds the Loligo (a kind of cuttle), Murena, and Anguilla (eel). The fundamental requisite of fins and scales specified in the Law was somewhat simplified in later times. Thus in Mish. Khull. 3 7 end, we read: 'Rabbi Yehuda says, 'At least two scales and one fin.' Experience, however, having proved that all fish with scales have also fins, it was permitted to use as food part of a fish on which only scales were visible (Nidda, 51 6).³

Analogies for the prohibition of certain fish are met with elsewhere. The distinction between fishes with and without scales was made in Egypt and

9. Ichthyolatry. survived in certain rites of early Rome (cp Pliny, HN xxiii. 2 10). In Egypt the oxyrhynchus, phagrus (eel), and lepidotus were not only forbidden in certain districts (Plut. de Isid. 18), but were actually looked upon as sacred. Similarly Hyginus (Astr. 2 41) states that the Syrians look upon fish as holy, and abstain from eating them (ib. 2 30); and according to Xenophon (Anab. i. 4 9) the fish in the Chalus near Aleppo were regarded as gods. Ichthyolatry was associated especially with the cult of Derceto (see ATARGATIS), who, in spite of the euhemeristic attempts of later legends, seems to have been partly a fish goddess. In a pool at the temple at Hierapolis were sacred fish which wore ornaments of gold (cp Lucian, Dea Syr. 45), like the eels of Zeus at Labraunda in Caria. Another pool at Ascalon contained fish sacred to Atargatis, which were daily fed, but never eaten, since it was believed that any one who ate of them (the sprat and anchovy are especially mentioned, Selden, de Dis Syr. 23) would be afflicted with ulcers. On the other hand, Mnaseas (ap. Athen. 837) states that fish was daily cooked and eaten by the priests of the goddess, the idea doubtless being to bring deity and servant into closer relationship. In connection with this it is interesting to notice that a practical identification of deity, servant, and fish, takes place in the representations on Assyrian cylinders where the priest, clothed in a large fish-skin, stands before the fish which is laid upon an altar (cp Menant, Glyptique, 253). Examples of the sacred character of the fish could be easily multiplied. Mummified fishes have been found in Egypt (Budge, Mummy, 357). The Egyptian abu and anf are mythological fishes which accompanied the boat of the sun, and similar mythical fish perhaps survive in the stories of JONAH and TOBIT (gg.v.).¹ Nor are traces of ichthyolatry wanting at the present day. Sacred fish are still to be found in consecrated fountains in Syria (Thomson, LB 547), the most important being at the mosques of Tripolis and Edessa (Sachau, Reise, 197).

² The distinction made (Mt. 13 48) between good and bad (σαμπά) fish proceeds on different lines, the 'bad' fish including not merely the legally unclean, but also those for which, from their size and condition, or from the prevailing taste in these matters, there was no demand in the market.

The origin of ichthyolatry must be sought in a primitive state of totemism. The Egyptian Oxyrhynchites, and the nomes and cities of Oxyrhynchus, as well as those of Phagroriopolis and Latopolis, derive their names clearly from the sacred Egyptian fishes (cp Wilk. 3340 ff.).

The penalty for eating a sprat or anchovy mentioned above (§ 9) finds analogy in Samoa where the cuttle-fish clan avoid eating the cuttle-fish, in the belief that if they did so one of the species would grow in the stomach and cause death (Frazer, Totemism, 18). The dressing of the worshipper in a fish-skin is in accordance with the habits of all totemistic clans. A member will assimilate himself to his totem by disguising himself so as to resemble it.²

That a fish believed to be unwholesome was forthwith invested with a sacred character so as to prevent, in the most effectual method possible, its use as food, will not account for the prohibition of such fish as eels, lampreys, and others. Such a theory completely reverses the facts, since the evidence above adduced shows that it is the sanctity of the fish (which may have arisen from its being a totem, or else from its association with a deity) that makes it prohibited, and thus accounts for the (apparently) arbitrary taboo upon various fishes.

In Israel nothing is said of sacrificial fish (see CLEAN, § 11); but that certain fish were sacred among them can hardly be denied. That Dagon was a fish-god is doubtful (see DAGON), and the name of Joshua's father admits of another explanation than 'fish' (see NUN).³ Still the law in Dt. 4:18 (cp also Ex. 20:4 and see DECALOGUE) against the making of images of fish shows how prevalent the custom must have been. Such a cult, however, would not be likely to spring up among desert-people or nomads; it was doubtless of Canaanite origin and adopted by the Israelite immigrants.

Finally may be noticed the frequent occurrence of the fish in early Christian inscriptions; whatever may have been the true meaning of its introduction, it was always popular from the accidental circumstance that the word ἰχθύς is composed of the initial letters of the words Ἰησοῦς χριστός θεοῦ υἱός σωτήρ; see APOCALYPTIC, § 911; and cp Hans Achelis, Das Symbol des Fisches u. d. Fischdenkmäler d. römischen Katakomben ('88).

² Numerous examples of this custom will be found in Frazer, op. cit. 26 ff.; see generally CUTTINGS, § 6.

FITCHES. 1. This word in Is. 28:25-27 stands for késah, כֶּסֶחַ (ΜΕΛΑΝΘΙΟΝ [Ἐβναοῖ]); gith. RVmg., however, prefers 'black cummin' (Nigella sativa, L.), the seeds of which, like those of cummin, are used in the East, as they anciently were used by the Greeks and Romans, as condiments, not only in sauces, but also in bread. The cognate noun in Arabic is ħazħ, and the verb ħazaha means 'to use as a savoury in food.'

2. In Ezek. 4:9, AV gives 'fitches' for כֶּסֶמִים, kussēmīm, pl. of kussēmeth, כֶּסֶמֶת (Ἐ δλυρα, Aq. Sym. ζέα). 'SPELT,' however, is RV's rendering, which is preferable (Triticum Spelta, L.).¹ The same Heb. word occurs in Ex. 9:32 (δλυρα [Aq. Sym. ζέα]) and Is. 28:25, where AV has 'RIE,' RV 'spelt.'

The verbs כָּסַם (Ezek. 44:20) and its congener כָּרַסַם (Ps. 80:13[14]) each occur once in OT in the sense of 'crop' or 'shear'; the grain may have its name from its comparative smoothness as compared with other kinds (Ges.). Whatever be its origin, kussēmeth is certainly to be distinguished (Löw, 104 ff., Fleischer in Levy, NHWB, 2450) from Arab. karsana, 'vetch'—a word probably of Indo-Europ. origin, and still the name of the vetch in Palestine (ZDPV 9:11)—with which Lagarde (GA 59, Arm. St. 2367) and Wetstein (Del. Isa.(2) 707) have confounded it. This latter word answers in meaning to Syr. ܟܘܣܡܐ, whereas כֶּסֶמֶת answers to ܟܘܣܡܐ. Jewish tradition even so late as Maimonides correctly distinguished the two words (Löw, 105).

In Ex. 9:32 spelt is mentioned along with wheat as a later crop than flax and barley. See EGYPT, § 8. In Ezek. 4:9 it appears with wheat, barley, beans, lentils, and millet, as a constituent in the symbolic bread which the prophet was commanded to bake. In Is. 28:25 the husbandman is described as sowing spelt in the border round wheat and barley.

De Candolle (Orig., 291), following Vilmorin, classifies together three species of Triticum—viz., T. Spelta, L., T. dicoccum, Schrank, and T. monococcum, L.—as having the common peculiarity that when ripe they are tightly held in their sheath, which has to be removed by a special operation. He is against the identification of kussēmeth with T. Spelta (ib. 292), which was a plant of temperate countries. T. dicoccum he regards as an ancient cultivated race of T. Spelta (ib. 293). T. monococcum was a plant of Asia Minor; Schliemann found at Issarlik a grain which Wittmack identified as T. monococcum, var. flavescens; he says—'que j'aurais pris d'abord pour un petit Triticum durum ou dicoccum' (Journ. de la Soc. Nat. d'Hort. de France [97] 157). כֶּסֶמֶת may then well have been T. monococcum. N. M.—W. T. 1.-D.

FLAG. Two Hebrew words call for consideration:

1. סֹפְהַ, soph (Ex. 2:3 Is. 19:6 Jon. 2:5 [6]) is in EV rendered 'flags' in Ex. and Is., and 'weeds' in Jon.; ἄλος (Aq. πανυριών) in Ex. and πάνυρος in Is.; in Jon. ἄλος (Aq. ἐσθρά) have wrongly connected the word with סֹפְהַ, soph, 'end.' Vg. has the renderings carecum (Ex. 2:3), papyrus (ib. 5), iuncus (Is.), pelagus (Jon.). According to W. M. Müller (As. u. Eur. 102) and Steindorff (in Beitr. z. Ass. 1603) סֹפְהַ = Eg. šwfi; Müller, however, thinks that it is more probably a Semitic word borrowed by Egyptian than the converse. It is sufficiently general to denote both the freshwater reed-growths along the Nile banks and the sea plants 'wrapped about the head' of one cast into 'the deep, in the heart of the seas.' On סֹפְהַ as a proper name, see RED SEA.

2. אֶרֶב, arēb (ἀρεῖ, ἀρεῖ: Gen. 41:2 18; βούρουρον: Job 8:11) is rendered by AV 'meadow' in Gen. and 'flag' in Job; RV has 'reed-grass' in the former and 'flag' (with mg. 'reed-grass') in the latter. The word is Egyptian and derived from a root denoting greenness; the Egyptian noun was specially applied to the reed-meadows on the banks of the Nile (Ebers, Äg. und die Bücher Mos. 338 ff.; Wiedemann, Sammlung, 16). Ἀρεῖ also occurs in the Greek of Is. 19:7 and Eccles. 40:16. In the former place ῥὸ ἀρεῖ ῥὸ ἁλωρῶν renders אֶרֶב, arēb (prob. 'open meadows'), in the latter the newly discovered Heb. text has, corruptly, קררמות, axes. Following the Syr., Cowley and Neub. would read קררמות, 'reed-stalks' (see Lévi's note, and cp Löw, Aram. Pfl.-namen, 202). This has suggested an emendation of

² He says, however, that this classification is 'plus agricole que botanique.'

the difficult passage, Ps. 35 14, where in the letters כמקרה Che. (Ps. 35) detects כמקרה in the parallel clause he finds חמ in the mutilated form חמ. The whole verse becomes—

Like bulrushes by the river's bank, | so did I bend the head
Like reeds by the streams, | (so) bowed down I went along.

For 'flag' in the sense of 'standard,' see ENSIGNS. N. M.

FLAGON. 1. 'Flagon' (Fr. flacon), or large bottle, occurs five times in AV, viz., 2 S. 6 19 1 Ch. 10 3 Is. 22 24 Hos. 3 1 Cant. 2 5. RV, however, substitutes 'cask (or casks) of raisins' or (in Cant.) 'raisins,' except in Is. 22 24, where it retains 'all the vessels of flagons.' RV's rendering 'cask of raisins' (for חשני) is, however, probably not less incorrect than 'flagon'; the passages with חשני appear to need critical emendation (see FRUIT, § 5). In Is. 22 24 the 'flagons' of EV corresponds to חשני, nebhālim; earthenware bottles are meant. (See BOTTLE, § 2 [2], and cp POTTERY.)

2. In two places RV has introduced 'flagons,' contrary to AV, viz., Ex. 25 29 37 16 (AV 'covers'; σπονθηρία [BAFL]). This sense is confirmed by the cognate dialects (see Ges.-Buhl, s.v.; and Di. in loc.), also by G, and by Nu. 4 7 (RV 'cups,' AV 'covers'), where the same vessels are expressly termed חשני—i.e., libation-flagons. For representations of these or similar flagons on Jewish coins of the first and second revolts, see Madden, Coins of the Jews, 198 ff.

FLAX (חֲפָזִים ¹ pešeth, or חֲפָזִים pištah, pl. חֲפָזִים pištīm). The Hebrew word rendered 'flax' in Ex. 9 3 1 Josh. 2 6 Judg. 15 14 Prov. 31 13 Is. 19 9 42 3 (quoted Mt. 12 20, with linon) Ezek. 40 3 Hos. 2 5 9 [7 11] is translated 'linen' in Lev. 13 47 f. 52 59 Dt. 22 11 Jer. 13 1 Ezek. 44 17 f., and 'tow' (RV 'flax') in Is. 43 17.

It has generally linon but once, λινοκαλάμη (Josh. 2 6), once στισπινον (Judg. 15 14), and twice στισπινόνος [etc.] (Lev. 13 47 59). In Ezek. 40 3 it reads οικοδομωμ, in Hos. δδονα.

Ex. 9 31 mentions the growing plant as budding or flowering (see BOLLED) at the time that barley comes into ear (cp Wilkinson, Anc. Eg. 2 398); but in most places the reference is to a finished product, flax (Linum usitatissimum, L.) or linen, which is often coupled or contrasted with wool; in Is. 42 3 43 17 Mt. 12 20 the use of flaxen wicks for lighting is probably alluded to.

The cultivation of flax in Egypt is referred to in Is. 19 9, 'those that dress combed flax' (חֲפָזִים חֲפָזִים)—an expression which is illustrated by the two combs for parting and cleansing the fibres of the flax referred to by Wilkinson (op. cit. 2 174). The phrase חֲפָזִים חֲפָזִים pištē hā'zē, in Josh. 2 6 has by some been taken to mean cotton (sc. 'tree flax'), but is obviously 'flax in stalk,' as opposed to 'flax that has been beaten'; thus λινοκαλάμη.

De Candolle (Orig. 95 ff.) maintains that of the two best distinguishable species of flax, the annual (Linum usitatissimum) had its original home in Asia, while the perennial (L. angustifolium) was that which first grew in Europe. The former, however, he thinks, reached Europe from Mesopotamia and Persia at a very early prehistoric period, and was, almost certainly, the flax cultivated by the Egyptians.

See also LINEN; and on the use of flax for nets, see FISH, § 3. N. M.

FLEA (חֲפָזִים; ψαλλος). In 1 S. 24 14 [15] 26 20, according to Smith's BD (s.v. 'Flea'), 'David, addressing Saul, compares himself to [the flea], as the most insignificant and contemptible of living things.' The statement is incredible, and the reports of travellers among the Bedouin do but make it more so. For these insects (Pulex irritans, Linn.) swarm in the dust of caves. That David should refer to hunting 'a single flea' is absurd. Did he wish to preach resignation to king Saul? The question suggests itself whether the text is correct. Considering that the Flea-clan turns out to be imaginary (see PAROSH), we may well doubt it.

An explanation lies close at hand. For חֲפָזִים pešeth we should read חֲפָזִים pešeth, 'wild ass of the desert'; cp Job 24 5, and especially Gen. 16 12 (where ארם pešeth should be ארם pešeth [Grätz]). David asks if Saul has come out to chase a wild pariah dog (see Doc, § 3) or a still wilder desert-ass. In 1 S. 26 20 the reference to the 'flea' is due to a misreading; ἄβα has ψυχὴν μου, ψῆψ (see Dr. ad loc.). The word 'fleas' (plur.) occurs in RVmg. of Ex. 8 16 for חֲפָזִים. See LICE. T. K. C.

FLESH. i. OT usage.—The Hebrew bāsār (בָּשָׂר) ¹ in the most literal sense signifies flesh as distinct from the outer skin (Lev. 9 11), the living flesh of human beings (Lev. 13 10) and of brutes (Gen. 41 3), as well as the dead flesh in the one case (Gen. 16 8) and in the other (Gen. 40 19). Hence by a natural extension of meaning 'flesh' is used for the whole body (Lev. 14 9 and so frequently in P; but cp also 1 K. 21 27). Further, although the Hebrews from ancient times distinguished between flesh and soul (שֵׁפֶט) they did not at first draw any sharp line of demarcation between the two; much less were they conscious of painful contrast between the flesh in its weakness and sinfulness on the one hand, and the eternal, holy God upon the other. Naturally, therefore, 'flesh' is employed to signify not only the whole body, but also the whole man as a personal being; at least in Neh. 5 5 Job 21 6 Ps. 63 2 we appear to meet with the survival of this usage.

It is also used of the male aidōta (Ezek. 16 26 28 20 Lev. 15 2 16 4). Again, marriage is said to make the man and woman 'one flesh.' Kinsfolk, and even compatriots, have the same 'bone and flesh' (Gen. 29 14 37 27 1 S. 5 1 19 13 f.), and it is of the bond of common lineage in Israel that the later Isaiah is thinking when he exhorts his countrymen (Is. 58 7) not 'to hide themselves from their own flesh.' Indeed, 'flesh,' like the Arabic basarim, becomes a synonym for mankind (Ps. 65 3 Jer. 12 12), or may include all creatures that live and feel (so P in Gen. 7 15 etc.).

Next, 'flesh' is regarded as united in the case of the living man with soul, so that the whole man consists of flesh and soul (Ps. 16 9 63 2), though in one passage—where, however, both text and meaning are uncertain—the book of Job (14 22) apparently ascribes some dull feeling even to the flesh separated by death from the soul. The flesh, moreover, and especially the heart, is the receptacle of the spirit (Gen. 6 3) which is the principle of physical and spiritual life, or in a more special sense the endowment of Yahwē's chosen servants in the Messianic age of all Israel (Joel 3 1). Therefore when Yahwē recalls his people from their disobedience, he begins, according to Ezekiel (11 19 36 26), by giving them a heart of flesh—i.e., one which is human and susceptible—instead of a heart of stone—i.e., one which is hard and inhuman.

Lastly, in the prophetic writings, man as flesh is contrasted with God as spirit. This opposition first

2. As a synonym appears in Isaiah (31 3, written, as of 'mankind,' to the Egyptian alliance; see ISAIAS i., § 14): 'The Egyptians are men and not God, and their horses are flesh and not spirit; and Yahwē will stretch out his hand, so that the helper shall stumble and the helped fall, and both of them perish together.'

In this passage, the nearest approach to a dogmatic conception of God in the prophetic writings, God is represented as the absolute spirit, who exists without dependence on creatures, unaffected by national disaster. All else is flesh; the same God who gives them breath at his will withdraws it. The heathen gods are simply ignored, and it is apparent that the Divine Spirit must in the end conquer that which is mere flesh. Like thoughts recur in subsequent literature. 'Cursed is the man,' says Jeremiah (17 5), 'who trusts in human beings and makes flesh his arm, while his heart withdraws from Yahwē.' All flesh, according to Zechariah (11 17), is to be hushed into silence before Yahwē in his temple. Job asks if God has 'eyes of flesh' (10 4)—i.e., whether he is really ignorant and impatient like short-sighted and short-lived men. So, on the contrary, God is said in Ps. 78³⁹ to remember that his people 'are but flesh'—i.e., weak and fleeting. Here we reach the threshold of the NT idea of σάρξ. The theological use of this word is confined to Paul's employment of it to denote the seat of sin in man. Outside of this, it is used in a merely popular sense to designate the material part of man in its various contrasts with the spirit (see ESCHATOLOGY, § 102). W. E. A.

ii. NT usage.—Paul's use, however, becomes part of a system of theological thought which is carried through the subject of sin and redemption (instances are so frequent and familiar as scarcely to need citation: the most obvious are Rom. 7⁵ 18 25; 8⁶-13; Gal. 5¹³-24). This system, therefore, must be briefly described.

In the first place, since the seat of sin is in the flesh, the punishment of sin is mainly, not wholly, physical death. The final redemption of man, of which the spirit is only the pledge, is therefore the restoration of the body (Rom. 8¹⁰ f. 23). Moreover, since sin has its seat in the flesh, the resurrection is not only a re-creation of the body, but a change from a body of sin and death to one fitted for the higher spiritual part of man, and incorruptible (1 Cor. 15⁴²-49).

This localising, not only of sin, but also of the punishment of sin, in the body, explains how it is that, in the apostle's thought, redemption is through Christ's death and resurrection. As long as both punishment and cure were thought of as purely spiritual these physical means of the cure in the apostle's thought were inexplicable. It is incongruous to make Christ's physical death in some way take the place of man's spiritual death, or Christ's resurrection effect man's spiritual resurrection (Rom. 5¹⁰). If, however, physical death is the main element in punishment, then the physical death of Christ can take the place of that of the sinner; and if resurrection is essentially corporeal, the physical resurrection of Jesus may become its appropriate cause.

Again, the placing of sin in the flesh, in the body and its members, makes it superficial, not identified with the essential man, which is in subjection to the law of God.

It is not the ego, the human personality, that sins, but sin, seated in the man as an alien principle, penetrating only the flesh, not the spirit of the man (Rom. 7¹⁴-25). At the same time, since sin dwells in the flesh, and the flesh is resolved into the body and the members, which are the executive parts, it is sin that gets itself done in spite of the protest of the inner man (ib.).

This does not mean, of course, that it is not the man himself that sins, but that it is the man dominated, not by his inner real self, but by an alien principle of sin, in a way external to himself. The remedy is to be found in the first place in the displacement of sin as the dominant principle in the man, by the spirit. The apostle represents the dominion of sin as amounting to a law to which the man is subject, but from which he is freed by the law of the spirit of life. Sin is dispossessed, not of power, but of supreme power in the very flesh which has been its stronghold (Rom. 8¹-10).

This, however, is not all. If it were, there would be a state of strife incompatible with the apostle's idea of

4. Resurrection of the body. To be sure, sin is no longer the dominating principle even in the flesh: it is met and overcome by the stronger spirit. However, it is there still, and keeps up its fight against the spirit (Gal. 5¹⁶-26); the flesh being the part of man which is vulnerable to sin, the final act of redemption must be the deliverance of the man from the flesh itself. This occurs, accordingly, at the resurrection, when the body of another sort, another material, fitted for the higher part of the man, is substituted for this body of flesh (1 Cor. 15⁴²-49). An analysis of the statement will show that the flesh of which this is said is simply the flesh itself in its primary meaning.

In the first place, the resolution of the flesh into body and members, which we find commonly in Paul, is enough to show this, unless we find rebutting testimony (Rom. 7⁵ 23 f.). Then the apostle's account of the way in which his good will is frustrated points to the same conclusion. He himself wills the good, but does not find any way to bring it to pass; because the members, which accomplish things, have within them a principle of evil instead of good (Rom. 7¹⁴-25). The final remedy for this state of things is the redemption of the body. The pledge of this is the spirit, which helps the situation as long as the flesh complicates it; but the final cure is the change of material of the body into something befitting the spirit instead of clogging it (Rom. 8²³). This it is that achieves for man at last the condition of sonship.

We must now seek the rationale of this theory of sin. In the present state of this question, it is enough to say that it is probably not the Greek

5. Rationale of Paul's theory. dualism, which affirms evil of matter as such.

(1) The Jewish philosophy which mediates between Judaism and Hellenism is Alexandrian, and Paul was not an Alexandrian (cp HELLENISM, § 9). He says of himself that he was excessively zealous for the ancestral traditions. That is to say, he was a Pharisee; and Pharisaism and Alexandrianism do not coalesce: they are opposites (Gal. 1¹⁴ Phil. 3⁵).

(2) The apostle's doctrine of the resurrection of the body involves for it a change of material, not the substitution of a body that is immaterial.

When Paul says that the resurrection body is spiritual, he is not speaking of its material (if one may speak of 'spiritual material') but of its adaptation. The contrast is with the psychical body, the psyché being the lower spiritual part of man; not of course the material of the present body, but its inhabitant. In the same way, the pneuma, which is the higher spiritual part, would be, not the material of the future body, but its spiritual principle. In 2 Cor. 5¹¹-8, the apostle expresses a dread of the disembodied state—what he calls its 'nakedness'—a dread that is repugnant to the essential spirit of Alexandrianism, which regards the body as a clog to the spirit, not as a covering for its shivering nakedness.

(3) Finally, Paul deprecates Greek wisdom or philosophy, speaking of it as worldly and opposed to the foolishness of the cross (1 Cor. 1¹⁷-31).

This, again, can scarcely refer to anything else than Alexandrianism: that Jewish adaptation of Platonism is the only form of Greek thought familiar to the Jews. When a Pharisaic Jew, Paul, in a controversy with an Alexandrian Jew, Apollos, speaks in this way of Greek wisdom, the reference is plain. This applies generally to the attempt to make Paul cover the Alexandrian as well as the Jewish tracts of thought in traditional Paulinism.

The apostle shared, however, the depreciation of the body common to all races, which is due to its actual seductions and misdemeanours. The grosser and more obvious sins have there not only their seat but also their occasion. It is the side of man which is vulnerable; not actually evil, but susceptible to appetites which run easily to evil (Gal. 5¹⁹-21 24). Then, not only is it the seat of the most obvious sins, but also in it are located the most apparent and obtrusive results of sin. The mind reacts within itself, and the moral nature in its own sphere, and in these cases the reactions of transgression are subtle; but in the case of physical transgression they are visible. This is sufficient to account for Paul's use, which is not singular except as its peculiarities are emphasised by their place in the system he has wrought out.

FLINT. So much of Palestine consists of cretaceous strata that we are not surprised to find flint often referred to. The terms used for it are:—

1. שֵׁר, šôr (Ex. 4²⁵ [שֵׁרֹב], Job. 5² f. [שֵׁרֹב אֲכֹרֹמוֹס], Job 22²⁴ [שֵׁרֹב], Ps. 89⁴⁴ [43], where MT's שֵׁרֹב is corrupt [שֵׁרֹב הַרְבֵּיבֵיטָו]; see Che. ad loc.], Ezek. 3⁹ [שֵׁרֹב]). In Is. 5²⁸ read שֵׁרֹב for שֵׁרֹב [שֵׁרֹבֵיטָו שֵׁרֹב]. Plainly generic=rock, stone. On Job. 5² see KNIFE.

2. שֵׁרֹבֵיטָו, šallāniš (אֲכֹרֹמוֹס, שֵׁרֹב. שֵׁרֹב. On Tg. see ADAMANT, § 4), flint, and, with שֵׁרֹב, rocky flint and flinty rock (Dt. 8¹⁵, quoted in Wisd. 11⁴¹ Dt. 32¹³ Job 28⁹ Ps. 104⁸ Is. 50⁷). Emblem of hardness or unfruitfulness; hence the marvel of 'oil' or 'water' from the flinty rock (see OIL). Also of moral steadfastness (Is. 50⁷ Ezek. 3⁹). Cp also HAMMER, 2.

šallāniš is etymologically identical with Ass. šallāniš or šallāniš, the hardest and costliest of precious stones, the name of which probably underlies a corrupt Hebrew name of a precious stone (see TARSHISH, STONE OF). See Del. Prol. 86, and cp FLOWERS. Four Hebrew words for 'flower' or 'blossom' correspond to the single Greek word ἄθος (taking the LXX for our guide). The NT therefore could not (even if the love of flowers were more perceptible in it than it is) be expected to do justice to the floral beauty of the landscape of Palestine in spring (Cant. 2:12). It is true, the neighbourhood of Jerusalem has not a rich flora. Still, all the hills of Judah have bright though small spring-flowers; nor, since Isaiah (17:11 18:5 see SBOT) refers to it, must the vine-blossom (see GRAPE) be forgotten. Samaria was probably better favoured (cp Is. 28:1). Two of the most beautiful of the flowers of Palestine compete for the honour of being referred to by Jesus in his saying on the lilies (see LILY). The tulip, poppy, hyacinth, cyclamen, asphodel, star of Bethlehem, crocus, and mallow may also be mentioned among the many attractive flowers. Wild roses and wild jasmine also perfume the air in some parts. Lebanon and the deserts have floral beauties of their own. Delitzsch, though he had never been in Palestine, fully realised this variety in the flora of that country (Iris, 18). That flowers should be an emblem of evanescence is natural (Job 14:2 Ps. 103:15 Is. 40:6 Jas. 1:10).

1. פְּרָחַי, férah, Ex. 2:31 f. (Ἐ κρίνον) Is. 18:5 (AV 'bud,' RV 'blossom,' i.e. of the vine), expresses an early stage of inflorescence. Cp ALMOND, CANDLESTICK, § 2.

2. מִן שִׁישׁ, šišāh, Nu. 17:8 [23] Is. 28:14 40:6 Job 14:2 etc. Root-meaning 'to glitter'; cp MIFRE, § 3 f.

FLY. Two Hebrew words are rendered 'fly'.

1. זְבֻבָּה, zēbūb (μύια, musca), cp Ass. zumbu [see LICE, end]. Every one knows the divine name Baalzebub, according to some so called as being a god who averts flies (cp the fly-god Myiodes in Plin. xxix. 6:34); see, however, BAAL-ZEBUB. Elsewhere the word only occurs in Is. 7:18 Eccles. 10:1. In Isaiah 'fly' and 'bee' (the Assyrians) are parallel; the fly is an apt emblem of the dwellers in the Nile valley where noxious insects abound. Can the fly intended be identified? Perhaps, at least if Delitzsch and Cheyne (in Proph. Is.) are right in connecting the מְצַלְצֵל כְּנָפָיו (Del. 'land of the whirring of wings') of Is. 18:1 with the tsetse-fly. The tsetse-fly (Glossina morsitans) is the most dreaded insect of S. and Central Africa; it was described by the traveller Bruce as long ago as 1790.

This fly acts as a carrier of disease. It conveys a blood parasite from one animal to another and the parasite causes the disease or death of most cattle. We know of no evidence that this disease ever visited Egypt.

We might also think of the seroot fly of Upper Egypt and Nubia, which is apparently a species of Panzeria

FOOD

(Tabanidæ), and allied to our horse-flies. This insect is about the size of a wasp, with an orange-coloured body striped with black and white. Its very powerful mouth-organs inflict a painful wound from which blood flows freely, and in which other flies attempt to lay their eggs. During the rainy season in Upper Egypt, Nubia, etc., it is a plague both to man and to beast. At any rate, the seroot may be taken as exemplifying the category to which the dreaded insects referred to belong.

The obscure and rather lengthy proverb about 'dead flies' in Eccles. 10:1 (EV) is well emended by Siegfried, 'A poisonous fly brings corruption to the perfumer's ointment; (so) a little folly destroys the worth of wisdom.' Ἐ (θανατοῦσαι) at any rate supports the sense of 'deadly' or 'poisonous,' though like MT it has 'flies' (plur.). Flies in Egypt and Syria are indeed pernicious. They propagate diseases such as ophthalmia, and transmit some of the parasites which live in blood, etc.

2. עֶרֶב, 'arōb (κυνόμυια), the name of the insect or insects of the plague of Egypt (Ex. 8:21 [17] f. Ps. 78:45 105:31, EV swarms of flies). It is impossible to specify what particular insect is intended.

The rendering 'dog-flies' (Ἐ, Ge. Kn.) implies a derivation from עָרַב, 'to suck.' These flies have a reputation for their voracity. The rival rendering 'swarms' (cp RV) suggests a connection with עָרַב, 'to mix.' So Pesh. سحابة; other early interpretations (see Ges. Thes.) need not be cited.

FOOD

A historical treatment of the food of the Hebrews would eventually shape itself into a history of their social and economic progress from the condition of nomads in prehistoric times, through centuries of agricultural and pastoral life in Canaan, to the latest days of Jewish independence, when the choicest products of neighbouring countries found a ready market in the cities of Palestine. It suits our present purpose better, however, to treat the subject of food in Old and New Testament times with reference to the natural kingdom to which the various food-stuffs belong. Of the three familiar divisions, the vegetable kingdom (§§ 1-7) supplied the inhabitants of Palestine, as it still supplies the peoples of Eastern lands, with all but an insignificant proportion of the ordinary daily food. To this day the Syrian fellāhin are practically vegetarians, tasting meat (§§ 8-16) only on the occasion of some religious or social festival. (On the price of food see § 17.)

A. VEGETABLE KINGDOM.

1. Cereals.—In every period of Hebrew history the most important food-stuffs were those classed by Hebrew writers under the general name dāgān (דָּגָן), corn, which comprised the grains of a number of common cereals.

1. In the Mishna treatise Challa 2 (cp Pēsāch, 2:5), who takes a vow to abstain from dāgān has to abstain only from the following five kinds: wheat, barley, spelt (פּוֹתְקִים), 'fox-ears' (שְׂפֵלֶת שְׂטֵל), and šiphōn (שִׁפּוֹן), of which only the first three are mentioned in the OT.³

² This treatise deals with the various contents of the kneading-trough, subject or not subject to the dough dues (חֲלֵה); see Nu. 15:20 f., and cp BAKEMEATS, § 2), as they may be called, which for the ordinary housewife amounted to one twenty-fourth, for professional bakers one forty-eighth of the whole.

³ For the two remaining grains see below, § 3, and cp the list in Ezek. 4:9.

The most highly esteemed of these cereals, universally used by rich and poor, was wheat.

(a) Wheat, ḥiṭṭāh (חֶמֶת, more often חֶמֶתִּים), appears in the OT as a food-stuff under various forms. The most primitive custom—the only method practised in Rome, tradition says, till the days of Numa (see 'Cibaria' in Daremberg and Saglio's Dict. des Antiq. 1142 b)—was to pluck the ears (m'lilāh, 'ābīb) when filled but not fully ripe, to remove the husk by simply rubbing the ears in the hand, and to eat the still juicy kernel.

This the Hebrews were allowed to do in passing through a field of standing corn (Dt. 23 25 [26]). It was disallowed on the Sabbath, however (Mt. 12:1 Mk. 2:23 Lk. 6:1), inasmuch as plucking and rubbing were legally regarded as special forms of reaping and winnowing (cp Shab. 7:2). Ears, whether of wheat or of barley, eaten in this way seem to have been known as karmel (כַּרְמֵל, RV 'fresh ears'; Lev. 23 14 2 K. 4 42).²

The same 'fresh ears,' crushed in a mortar or otherwise, produced the gēres karmel, of Lev. 23 16 (RV 'bruised corn of the fresh ear'). Much more common was the method of roasting the ears, before they had hardened, on an iron plate or pan.

This parched corn (קָלִי—more fully קָלִי קָלִי, Lev. 23 14; קָלִי alone Josh. 5 11) is repeatedly mentioned in the OT as an article of diet common among all classes of the people (Lev. 23 14 1 S. 17 17 25 18 2 S. 17 28 Ruth 2 14), and is largely eaten at the present day in the East (cp Rob. BR 2 394 [41]; ZDPV 9 3). This mode of rendering the grains of the cereals more palatable everywhere preceded the use of the mortar and pestle by which the grains were crushed, just as the latter method preceded, and was eventually superseded by, the hand-mill or quern (see MILL). On the main use of wheat in the Hebrew food-supply see, further, BAKEMEATS, BREAD.

Among the modern Syrians the favourite mode of cooking wheat is as follows:—

The grain is boiled after it has been thoroughly cleaned (hence OT קָלִי, see CORN, 3) by the female members of the family (see Ḥ, 2 S. 4 6, and cp SBOT) and freed from the impurities unre-moved by the process of winnowing; it is then spread on the housetop to dry (cp 2 S. 17 19), after which it is ground and boiled to a thick paste. A similar dish seems to be intended by the obscure 'ārisāh, עֵרִיסָה (Nu. 15 20 f. Neh. 10 37 [38] Ezek. 44 30). EV renders 'dough' (Ḥ φύραμα in Nu., σῖτος in Neh., om. in Ezek.; other authorities 'kneading-trough'), but 'ārisāh is more probably to be identified with the Talmudic 'arsān, a porridge or paste, made from the meal of barley or wheat (see mod. Lexx. and especially Lag. GGN, 1889, p. 301). Wheat, sodden and crushed as above described, the modern burgul, added to mutton which has been pounded to shreds with a pestle and mortar, forms kibbeh, the national dish of Syria (see COOKING, 8 3). The modern smid, the finest of the wheat meal, got by bolting the ordinary flour (kemah, קֶמַח, RV 'meal') with a fine sieve (cp Pirkē Aboth, 5 15), corresponds to the Hebrew sāleth (סֶלֶת; Ḥ σαλεύματα; RV 'fine flour'). A poetical designation of this fine flour is 'the kidney fat of wheat' (Dt. 32 14 Ps. 81 16 [17] 147 14).³ Its price was, at one period, twice that of barley (2 K. 7 1 16 18). The distinction between these two kinds of Syrian flour (kemah and sāleth) was familiar to the Egyptians of the New Empire, who made soldiers' bread from the former, and princes' bread from the latter (Erman, Anc. Egypt, 188).

(b) The second place among the food grains of the Hebrews was occupied by barley. A brief summary of what is more fully stated elsewhere (see

2. Barley. BARLEY will suffice. In the list of foods offered to David and his friends (2 S. 17 28) we find wheat and barley not only in the grain but also ground and parched (קָלִי, קֶמַח). Commonly, however, barley, like wheat, was consumed in the form of bread (Judg. 7 13 2 K. 1 42 Ezek. 4 9 12); it formed the bread of the peasantry, and the low esteem in which it was held seems to be the ground for the sole instance of the admission of barley meal among the sacred offerings (Nu. 5 15 ff.). In NT times barley bread was still in use (Jn. 6 9 13, and Mishna passim), and it is common among the Bedouin of N. Arabia now.

¹ In AV Nu. 18 12 and Jer. 31 12 the rendering 'wheat' is too special for קָלִי, RV 'corn,' but Amer. Revision 'grain' (so always for קָלִי).

² AV bere, 'full ears of corn in the husk thereof' (כֶּבֶד קָלִי); RV, with the best authorities, 'fresh ears of corn in his sack.'

³ Also probably in the original text of Eccles. 39 26 (Bacher in JQR, July 1897).

(c) The third of the cereals mentioned above as included under corn (dūgān) in Mishnic times (Challā, 3. Spelt, etc. 12 Pésach. 25) is kussemeth (כִּסְמֶת); hardly 'rie,' as AV except in Ezek. 49). See FITCHES. From Ezekiel (49, plur. AV 'fitches') we learn that it was, at least occasionally, employed by his countrymen to make bread. In the Mishna it is repeatedly mentioned with wheat and barley.

The two remaining cereals are not mentioned in the OT.

(d) The šibboleth šū'āl (lit. 'fox's ear') has been identified by the Jewish scholars (Rashi, etc.) with oats; by Löw (129) with the ægilops, a grass closely allied to wheat (cp Post, Flora of Syria, etc., 899).

(e) The šiphān is probably a species of oats (the Avena barbata of Post, 871, which by the Arabs is called šēifān). From the frequent mention in the Mishna, both (d and e) must have been cultivated and used as food by the Jews of Palestine in the first and second centuries of our era.

ii. In the Mishna treatise (Challā, 14, cp Shebi'ith 27) cited above (§ 1, beginning), mention is made of four food-stuffs that were not subject to the dough dues. Three of them may be identified with certainty as the rice plant, millet, and sesame. (a) Rice, 'orez (אֹרֵז ḥpuzā), was introduced into Palestine in the Greek period (see Hehn, Kulturpfl. (6) 485 ff.). (β) Millet, dōhan (דוֹחַן, Ar. duhn; see MILLET), is mentioned in Ezekiel's list (49), where Ḥ has κέγγαρος, by which Ḥ (EQ^מ) also represents the obscure and perhaps corrupt מִלֵּךְ of 1s. 28 25. (γ) Sesame is still largely cultivated in Syria, mainly for the oil-producing quality of its seeds (see OIL). The seeds are used also like caraway seeds in western lands, sprinkled on the housewife's bread, and even mixed with sugar and flour of rice, to produce a species of confection. (δ) The remaining plant of the four may be the familiar dura of the Syrian plains (cp Löw, pp. 101-3), which in the present day supplies the black bread of the peasant. Mixed with wheat flour, it is said to keep longer soft (ZDPV 9 8). It is not mentioned in the OT or NT.¹

11. Other vegetable products. (a) The pulse family.—We pass now to another important group of food-

4. Leguminosæ. stuffs, the Leguminosæ or pulse family. It is somewhat remarkable that out of the many hundreds of species belonging to the natural order Leguminosæ which are found at the present day in Syria (see Post, op. cit. 208-299) only two are mentioned in the OT or the NT, (1) the lentil, and (2) the bean. Still, we may be sure that the pulse plants in all periods furnished an important part of the Hebrews' diet. If EV rightly renders וְחֵיטִי, zēr'im, and וְרַעְיָנִים, zēr'inim (Dan. 1 12 16), the diet preferred by Daniel and his companions was confined to PULSE [q.v.]. Probably, however, 'herbs' (as RV^מ) is a more accurate rendering; the context suggests a contrast between vegetable food-products generally, and the sacrificial and therefore unclean meat (flesh) from the royal kitchen. Various designations of the products we are now to consider occur in the OT, the most precise being the general term yārāk (יָרַק, in the Mishna יָרֵק [Ab. Zar. 38]); thus יָרֵק גַּרְדֵּן (AV 'garden of herbs') is the equivalent of our vegetable or kitchen garden (Dt. 11 10 1 K. 21 2; יָרֵק יָרַק, 'a vegetable diet,' Prov. 15 17). Like Daniel, Judas Maccabæus and his associates are said to have lived on a vegetable diet (תָּרַח חֲסֵדֵי חֲסֵדֵי חֲסֵדֵי, 2 Macc. 5 27; cp 4 Esd. 9 26 12 51). For the same reason—the avoidance of food ceremonially unclean—Josephus and his fellow-deputies lived at Rome on figs and nuts (Vit. 3).

¹ In the Aramaic inscription of Panamu from Zenjirli (Z. 6) occur the names שוּרָה (ק), שוּרָה (ק), Is. 28 25), עֵרֶה יִטְמֵה. Sachau in his edition of the inscription proposes to identify שוּרָה with the modern grain called dura. So also Dr. Authority and Archaeol. 132. See, however, Che. 'Isa. (Heb. SBOT 99).

Regarding the antiquity of the pulse group of foods and its importance among the peoples of Eastern and classical countries—with the curious exception, noted by Plutarch (Is. §§ 5, 8), of the Egyptian priests¹—we may refer to Hehn's great work (Kulturpfl. u. Hausth.⁽⁶⁾ 208 ff. [194]).

1. The first place in the group may be assigned to lentils, 'adāšim (אֲדָשִׁים). The staple diet of the Egyptian pyramid-builders, according to Strabo (xvii. 134; cp Wilkinson, 224), lentils were cooked by the Hebrews from the earliest times to the latest (see LENTILES).² Now, as in Ezekiel's time (49), they are sometimes ground and mixed with wheat flour to make bread; but they are 'more generally used as a pottage or cooked as the Spaniards cook haricot beans, stewed with oil and flavoured with red pepper' (Tristram, NHB 462).

2. The bean, ḥōl (חֹל), occurs only in 2 S. 17:28, and as one of the numerous ingredients of Ezekiel's bread (49). Several different species of bean were cultivated in Palestine for consumption in the first two centuries of our era. For example, in chap. I alone of the Mishna treatise K'il' dim, at least four varieties are mentioned; among these is the Egyptian bean, at present one of the most extensively cultivated leguminous plants of Syria. Next, indeed, to the preparations of wheat we may place the bean in its various forms (fūl, lūbiyah, etc.) as the most useful food-stuff in the Syria and Egypt of to-day (cp ZDPV 94, Landberg, Proverbes et Dictions, etc. 250). Either the pods are boiled and eaten entire, like our French beans, or the seeds alone are eaten after being roasted, or are boiled to a thick soup. Bean meal, painfully ground in the handmill, is sometimes mixed with wheat flour and baked into bread. Landberg (op. cit. 77-88) gives various native recipes for favourite Syrian dishes in which lentils and beans are the main ingredients.

3. Another popular food is the chick-pea (Cicer arietinum, Arab. hummus), known in early Talmudic times as חֲמִצְתִּים³ (Pēah 3, etc.). It is cooked in the same manner as the bean. Roasted, the hummus furnishes an esteemed delicacy, called ḥūdāni.⁴

4. Here, too, may be mentioned the vetch (Vicia ervilia), the modern hirsennek, which is sometimes identified with the kussimeth of Is. 28:25 (RV and SBOT 'spelt'; see § 3 [c]). It is now, as doubtless it was formerly, grown as fodder; only in times of scarcity, according to Pliny, was it used as food by man.

(β) The gourd family.—The principal members of the gourd family (Cucurbitaceae) have at all times been prized as food in the East. Next to the

5. Cucurbitaceae. fish of the Delta, the Hebrews looked back with regret to Egypt's 'cucumbers and melons' (Nu. 11:5; see CUCUMBER, MELON). At the present day bread and melons or cucumbers form the main food of the poorest class in the large cities, from Constantinople to Damascus and Cairo, for months together. The cucumber (Mish. קָשָׁה; Nu. 11:5 קָשָׁה) is largely consumed in the raw state, but also prepared with vinegar as a salad. Equally popular at all times was the water-melon, ābhattīdāh (אֲבַחְתִּידָה; plur. Nu. 11:5), the modern batikh, now cultivated by the acre in certain parts of the East, besides which we frequently find in the Mishna the sugar-melon (קִילִיפִיטוֹן, μηλοπέπων), which came to the Jews, as its name shows, from the Greeks. The seeds of the melon are roasted and eaten like those of the chick-pea. Various gourds are included under the חֲמִצְתִּים of the Mishna, among them perhaps the favourite kūsa or vegetable-marrow.⁵ A popular modern dish is prepared by removing the seeds of the kūsa and stuffing with rice, minced mutton, and other ingredients. For the 'wild gourds' of 2 K. 4:39 see GOURDS, WILD. Post (Flora, 324), with some older authorities, suggests that 'the colocython may be intended by the gall [שָׂאָה] in Dt. 29:18 [17] Ps. 69:21, etc.' See GALL, 1.

³ Vg. inserts it at the end of 2 S. 17:28 for the intrusive קָלִי (see Bu. in SBOT).

⁴ In the streets of Damascus this delicacy is thus praised by its vendors: 'Tattooed, warm and soft! Make a night of it, O Barmecide!' (Wetzstein, 'Der Markt in Damaskus,' ZDMG 11:519).

(γ) Leeks, etc.—Conspicuous among the vegetables enjoyed by Israel in Egypt were 'the leeks, the onions, and the garlic' (Nu. 11:5), all three familiar members of the genus Allium.

6. The genus Allium. Marcus Aurelius's description of the garlic-smelling Jews (foetentium Judaeorum) whom he met in Palestine has often been quoted (Amm. Marcell. xvii. 55). The leek, hāsīr (חֲסִיר, Nu. 11:5; in the Mishna generally חֲרִישָׁה), was at all times highly esteemed in Egypt (cp Pliny's 'laudatissimus porrus in Aegypto,' 19:33) and Syria. ONIONS, bēḥālīm (בְּחָלִים), and garlic, šūm (שִׁימ), Herodotus was told (2:125), held a chief place among the food supplied to the builders of the pyramids, and their universal cultivation in later times is attested by contemporary monuments. All three species were usually eaten raw as a relish (δύρον) to bread, occasionally as now, no doubt, roasted or boiled with meat to form a stew (cp Palmer, Desert of the Exodus, 1:84). In Syria onions are also preserved like cucumbers (ZDPV 9:14). For a more ambitious treatment of the onion, see Landberg, op. cit. 77-79.

In times of famine, no doubt, recourse was also had to other and less familiar herbs. Such was the plant (חֲלוֹהַ, mallūah, AV 'mallows,' RV 'salt-wort'; see MALLOWS) mentioned in Job 30:4.¹ Though this plant, from its etymology, is more likely to be the saltwort than the mallow, it is true that, according to Conder, the mallow—in Syria khubbeizi (so called from its fruit resembling in shape the native bread, khubs; cp Löw, 360)—is eaten in time of scarcity 'cooked in sour milk or oil' (Tentwork, 3:17). Cp, further, HUSKS.

This probably exhausts the greens (קָרִי) mentioned by name in the OT as articles of food.² A glance, however, at any of the Mishna treatises dealing with the legal requirements as to the sowing, tithing, etc., of the fruits of the soil, shows that those above enumerated are but a fraction of the plants cultivated for food in Palestine in the first century A.D. Here we can mention only a few of the commoner greens, such as lettuce (חֲרִית), various species of chicory and endive (עֲלִילֵשׁ), which furnished the main ingredients of the bitter herbs (חֲרִיטִים, Ex. 12:8) at the Passover,—as is shown by the list in Pēsāch. 26—the lupine, still known by its Græco-Hebrew name turnus (תּוּרְנוֹס, θήρυς), expressly stated to have been a food of the poor (Shabb. 18:1); the kolhas (קוֹלְחָס, colocasia), still extensively cultivated as food (Post, op. cit. 829), and the lūf (לוֹף), both members of the Arum family, and used, with mustard and lupine together, to form a pickle (see Löw, 240): the turnip (לְפִת, modern lūf), the radish (רָדִישׁ), the cabbage (כְּרִית), and the asparagus (אֲשַׁפְרָגוֹס).

Most of the vegetables we have discussed were not only used in the fresh state (חֲלִי)—or in some cases dried (גִּבְיָה)—but also laid in vinegar or in brine and used as pickles. Such preserved vegetables were called בְּבִשָּׁה (שְׁחֵבִיתִית, 9:5) or בְּבוֹשִׁים (Pēsāch. 26).

Of the remaining contributions of the vegetable kingdom to the Hebrew kitchen and table, the fruits are

7. Condiments. of sufficient importance to claim an article for themselves (see FRUIT), leaving only the various condiments for brief mention here. (For fuller treatment of these see the separate articles.)³ Hehn (op. cit. 205) has rightly emphasized the fact that 'before pepper was discovered or came into general use, seeds like cummin, black cummin, Nigella sativa, the coriander, koplavrov, etc., naturally played a more important rôle in the cookery of antiquity. Of these, the first which meets us in the OT is the coriander (רִבְּזִי, Ex. 16:31; Nu. 11:7; κόριον; also Ex. 16:14), to the greyish-white seeds of which the manna is compared. Under the name of רִבְּזִי the coriander was cultivated in later times both for its seed and for its leaves (Ma'asêr, 45); the seeds are still very largely used 'as a spice to mix with bread in the East, as well as to give an aromatic flavour to sweetmeats' (Tristram, NHB, 440). Black cummin (so RV^{mg} for חֶמֶן; ἄνιθον) occurs in Is. 28:25. Its black seeds are still used in Syria to sprinkle over bread. In the NT mint, anise, cummin, and rue are associated with Jesus' denunciation of the Pharisees. Of these cummin—the 'fastidius cumminum amicissimum' of Pliny—was held in the highest esteem by the classical peoples. Like salt it was used proverbially as a symbol of friendship; the phrase, ὁ περὶ ἄνα καὶ κύμινον, is synonymous with 'confidential friends' (Plutarch, quoted by Hehn). The textual variation of ἄνιθον in Is. 28:27, 'and the cummin shall be eaten with bread,' is interesting in the light of Pliny's observation that cummin seeds were so used by the Alexandrians of his day (1947). The anise of Mt. 23:23 is undoubtedly the Anethum graveolens or 'dill' (so RV^{mg}; Mish. שבט, modern shibith). The tithe was levied on the seeds, leaves, and capsules (רִבְּזִי וְרִבְּזִי) of this plant (Ma'asêr, 45)—i.e., 'when its seeds are collected, or when its leaves are used as vegetable, or when its pods are eaten' (Jastrow, Dict., s.v. רִבְּזִי). Its use as a condiment is attested by Ḳṣin, 34. According to the Mishna (Shêbi'ith, 91) no tithe was levied on the rue (רִבְּזִי, πῦργανον, Lk. 11:42), which seems to show that the form given to Jesus' words by the first ('Jewish') evangelist (Mt. 23:22) is the more accurate of the two. To the category of condiments must also be reckoned the mustard (σινάπι, תרד), which, according to a recent authority (see 'Condimenta' in Daremb. and Saglio), does not appear to have been used in the form with which we are familiar; rather the leaves 'were cut up and mixed with the dish to be seasoned' (Athen. 9:36 a). We have already found that the mustard leaf was used in making pickles. The best mustard, according to Pliny (1954), came from Egypt, the ἡγεῖρα of Kil'aim, 15.

¹ On this verse as a whole see Budde, and in opposition to the current explanations of ps. 4:6, see JUNPER.

² RVmg. introduces the purslain into Job 6:6; but see PURSLAIN.

³ Salt, the prince of condiments, belongs elsewhere, and must, in any case, receive special notice (SALT).

Ginger (Zingiber officinale) does not seem to have been known in Palestine within our period (for קָמָח, Ḳṣin, 35, which Jost reads קָמָח and renders 'ginger,' see SPICE); pepper (פֶּפֶר), on the other hand, had found its way into common use during the Roman period. The esteem in which this familiar condiment was held at a later date is shown by the Talmudic saying, 'As the world cannot exist without salt and pepper, neither can it exist without the Bible, the Mishna, and the Talmud' (Low, 318). Pepper, carried in the mouth, is mentioned along with a grain of salt (חֶמֶן וְכֶמֶן), apparently as a cure for toothache (Shabb, 65). It was ground in a metal hand-mill (Bēzā, 25), and was used not only to season the ordinary table food, but also as a spice in the concoction of mead (יַיִן מְעִיב, οὐνόμελι; see WINE AND STRONG DRINK).

B. ANIMAL KINGDOM.

Whilst the Hebrews were free to make full and unrestricted use of the products of the vegetable kingdom, they were limited as regards the animal kingdom by various restrictions, most of restrictions them, in principle and origin at least, traceable to very early times.

(a) The most important was that by which the members of the animal kingdom were ranged under the two categories of 'clean' and 'unclean,' those under the former, the so-called 'clean' animals, alone being available as food. For the origin and significance of this distinction, as well as for parallels among other ancient peoples, see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, FISH, and SACRIFICE. For our present purpose, the following summary will suffice. Of Mammals the locus classicus Dt. 14:3 ff. names ten species as clean: viz., 'the ox, the sheep and the goat, the hart, and the gazelle, and the roebuck, and the wild goat, and the pygarg, and the antelope, and the chamois' (so the RV; on the identifications see the separate articles); whilst the camel, the hare, the rock-badger (EV CONEY [g.v.]), and the swine, are similarly named as unclean.¹ As regards birds the enumeration proceeds by the method of exclusion (Lev. 11:13 ff.; Dt. 14:11 ff.), various birds, chiefly birds of prey—among them the bat—being specified as forbidden or taboo (to adopt the current scientific term), in Hebrew technically šēḳes (שֶׁקֶס, a detestation, object of abhorrence [see ABOMINATION, 2]; Dt. 7:26 Lev. 7:21 11:10 ff., etc.). Of fishes only those having both scales and fins were regarded as clean (FISH, § 8 ff.), whilst, from the invertebrates, a few species of the locust family alone are admitted as food.

(b) Of equal antiquity, probably, is the prohibition as food (taboo) of the blood of the clean, warm-blooded, animals (hence not of the blood of fish).

9. Prohibition of blood. This taboo holds a foremost place in the Hebrew dietary legislation (cp Dt. 12:16 23 25 15:23 Lev. 17:10 ff. [H] Gen. 9:4 Lev. 3:17 7:26 f. [P], etc.), whilst its antiquity is historically attested at a period much earlier than the promulgation of any of the codes now referred to (see 1 S. 14:32-34). The discussion of the idea or ideas ultimately underlying this prohibition—one by no means confined to the Hebrews—belongs elsewhere (see SACRIFICE). In the above passages of the OT the prohibition is mainly based on the ground that the blood was the seat of the 'soul' or népheš (נֶפֶשׁ, properly the vital, sentient principle; cp ESCHATOLOGY, § 12). It was therefore too sacred for ordinary use, and was to be reserved for, and restored to God, the author of all life. In early times among the Hebrews, when as yet 'all slaughter was sacrifice,' this dedication of the blood was a matter of course; but when, on the suppression of the local sanctuaries, as the result of the Deuteronomic legislation, it became necessary to authorise slaughter for domestic purposes elsewhere than at the sanctuary, it was expressly enacted that the blood of the animal slaughtered should be allowed to flow away (Dt. 12:15 ff.; see Dr. in loc. and cp OT/C⁹, 249 ff.). The same held good of the 'beast or fowl' taken in the chase; the hunter 'shall even pour out the blood thereof and cover it with dust' (Lev. 17:13). To this abstention from blood the Hebrews have at all times remained faithful (cp Mohammed's prohibition: Kuran, Sura 2:167). Only on an occasion such as that in the time of Saul referred to above (1 S. 14:32 ff.; cp the interesting addition of the Old Lat. and the Vulg. in Judith 11:12, 'to lay hands upon their cattle to drink their blood'), and in a period of great religious declension, did they imitate their neighbours the Philistines (Zech. 9:7) and 'eat with the blood' (Ezek. 33:25). The attitude of the early Christian Church and of the later Jews to this part of the dietary laws will be referred to later.

Another restriction, closely associated in P with that now discussed, had to do with the intestinal fat of the

10. Prohibition of intestinal fat. three sacrificial species, the ox, sheep, and goat (Ex. 29:13 22 Lev. 3:3 ff. 7:22 ff. cp Jos. Ant. iii. 9:2 f.), to which was added 'the fat tail' (חֵטֵא, alyáh, Ex. 29:22 Lev. 3:9 RV) of the sheep of the country (see SHEEP).² Deuteronomy is silent with regard to this taboo; but its antiquity is vouched for by the incidents of 1 S. 215 ff. The prohibition, it should be observed, has reference only to the זֶבֶחַ הַלֵּבֶב, 'the fat of the omentum and the organs that lie in or near it' (Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾, 379f. which see for probable reason of this abstinence; ¹ cp SACRIFICE), and not to the fatty deposits (probably the שֵׁמֶן קִשְׁטוֹת or 'tit-bits' of Neh. 8 10) in other parts of the animal, about which there was no restriction. It is important also, in view of later usage, to note that this abstinence from the fat of the intestines applies only to the case of an ox, sheep, or goat offered in sacrifice. The inference is that if any of these were slaughtered privately the 'fat' might be eaten; in any case the prohibition does not extend to the fat of non-sacrificial animals (game, etc.), provided these are 'clean' and duly slaughtered. On the other hand the 'fat' of animals coming under the two categories of Nēbhēlāh and Tērēphāh (see next paragraph) might be used for any domestic purpose other than that of food (Lev. 7 24). The eating of the 'fat', as of the blood, entailed the death penalty (Lev. 7 25; for details see treatise Ḳērithoth, especially chap. 3; for blood, chap. 5).

¹ On the question whether the Israelites in time of famine ever ate ass's flesh (2 K. 6:25), see HUSKS.

² The custom of fitting this tail in extreme cases to a small wheeled cart, which has often been ridiculed, is referred to in the Mishna; see Shabbath, 54, and cp Herod. 3:113.

Of more importance is the taboo placed by the Pentateuchal legislation on two kinds of meat known 11. Prohibition technically as (a) Nēbhēlāh (נְבֵלָה, Lev. 7 24 17 15 22 8 Dt. 14 21; cp Ezek. 4 14 44 31) and (b) Tērēphāh (תֵּרֵפָה, Ex. 22 31 [30] Lev. 7 24 17 15 22 8; cp Ezek.

l.c.). In view of the extensive development of later Jewish jurisprudence with regard to these two categories of forbidden meat, it is essential to understand clearly the original significance of the terms.

(a) The first, Nēbhēlāh, denotes the dead body of a person (1 K. 13 24 ff.) or the carcase of an animal; in its technical sense it means the flesh of an animal that has succumbed to an organic disease and died a natural death. In this sense it is opposed to the carcase of an animal that has been properly slaughtered and the blood drawn off.²

(b) The second, Tērēphāh, as its etymology shows, denotes an animal that has died through being torn (תָּרַח, Gen. 31 39) by wild beasts, in other words 'torn flesh'.³ Of these, Tērēphāh was forbidden even by the earliest code (Ex. 22 31 [30]), which requires that it shall be cast 'unto the dogs'; the prevalence of this custom near the time of Jesus is confirmed by the lines of the Pseudo-Phocylides (148 f., λείχανα λείπε κύνιν θηρών ἀπὸ θήρας ἔδονται). Nēbhēlāh appears first in the legislation of D (Dt. 14 21), which allows it to be given away to the 'stranger' or to be sold to the foreigner. By the later regulations of P (H), however, its use is forbidden to native-born Israelite and stranger alike (Lev. 17 15).

With the increasing attention to the requirements of the Levitical legislation in matters of ceremonial purity that marked the later pre-Christian period, and the ever-growing eagerness of the Scribes to 'make a fence round the Torah' (Ābōth, 1 1), the two termini technici under discussion gradually assumed other significations widely different from those originally belonging to them. Hence we may assume that in NT times they already possess the significance assigned to them respectively by the authoritative definition of the Mishna.

² Cp ἄσθημα throughout; Vg. cadaver morticini; EV 'that which dieth of itself.'

³ Cp ἄσθημα; EV 'that which is torn of beasts.'

have this other definition: 'every animal in similar circumstances that cannot live is Tērēphāh.'

By means of this casuistry the original prohibition of the flesh of an animal dying of itself has now been transferred to the flesh of one not slaughtered according to rabbinic prescription. In the present work it would be out of place to enter into the minutiae of the Jewish laws of Sēhiḥāh or ritual slaughter, even were this, for an outsider, possible. One other reference to the Mishna, however, may be permitted, because of its bearing on an important passage of the NT. In the same treatise (Chullin, 1 2) we read, 'Any one may slaughter and at any time and with any instrument except a harvest-sickle, a saw, etc., because these strangle'—i.e., they do not make the clean incision required for the proper slaughter. We have here the explanation of the 'things strangled' (τὰ πικτόδ), from which, we are told, the first Gentile Christians were advised to abstain (Acts 15 20 29 21 25; see COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM). They were to abstain not only 'from blood,' that is from meat killed by any method other than that of blood-letting (see [δ] above), but also from the flesh of animals from which the blood had been drawn in any way other than that sanctioned by the Jewish authorities of the time.¹

A word must suffice for a last limitation implied, not formally enjoined, in the oldest legislation. The 12. Of heathen's Hebrews, on the ground of Ex. 34 15, in later times at least, consistently food.

abstained from meat that had formed part of an offering to a foreign deity, or might be even suspected of such an origin. We have seen (above, § 4) how Daniel, Judas the Maccabee, Josephus, and their respective companions preferred a modest vegetable diet to the risk of defilement by heathen food. On the recommendation of this form of abstinence attributed to the Council of Jerusalem (Acts, l.c.) by which the eating of 'meats offered to idols' and of blood is classed with 'fornication,' precisely as in an earlier age the eating of the blood is ranked in the same category with murder and idolatry (Ezek. 33 25), see COUNCIL ii., § 11.

Having examined in detail the restrictions which the Hebrew dietary laws placed on the use of animal foods, we proceed to another interesting taboo.

At the close of the early narrative (J) of Jacob's experience at Penuel, the redactor (R_{JE}) has added, 13. The hip-sinew.

'Therefore the children of Israel eat not of the הֵקֶן הַיָּד (RV 'the sinew of the hip, AV 'the sinew that shrank'; cp ἄσθημα, τὸ νεῦρον δ' ἐν ἄρκῳ) which is upon the hollow of the thigh unto this day' (Gen. 32 32 [33]). We have here the first reference to a popular taboo of (evidently) great antiquity, which, strangely enough, has not found a place in the dietary legislation of the Pentateuch. The sinew in question is the great muscle of the leg known to anatomists as the nervus ischiadicus. Whatever may have been the original significance of the abstinence here referred to (cp Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 380), it is given by the writer as use and wont merely. It must soon afterwards have been raised to a formal prohibition.

The Greek translators appear to have so regarded it, rendering the narrative tense of the original by οὐ μὴ φάγωσιν, 'are by no means to eat' (cp Lk. 1 15, οὐ μὴ πίη, 'shall by no means drink'). The next witness is Josephus, who, after informing us that Jacob himself abstained from the flesh of this muscle, adds, 'and for this sake it is taboo for us' (οὐδ' ἡμῖν ἐδώδιμον, Ant. i. 20 2). This is confirmed by the Mishnic legislation, by which the nervus ischiadicus 'of domestic animals and wild animals, of the right leg and the left leg' is formally forbidden (Chullin, 71) and the minimum punishment of forty stripes decreed for the transgressor (ib. 3).

This taboo is still faithfully observed by orthodox Jews. For the important dietary law against seething the kid in its mother's milk (Ex. 23 19, etc.), see COOKING, § 8; MAGIC, § 2.

From this study of the more important laws by which the use of animal food generally was regulated in OT and NT times, we proceed to review in detail the evidence of the OT regarding the individual animals. We have adverted to the fact that the enjoyment of animal food was much less frequent among the Hebrews than among ourselves, more especially in the more primitive times when meat was available only on the occasion of a sacrifice. Such occasions might be offered not only by the recurring family and tribal festivals (בָּזֶכֶת קִשְׁתָּהָרָה, 1 S. 20 29; cp 13 f. 21), but also by the arrival of an honoured guest (Gen. 18 1 ff., and often), or by some event of more than usual significance (1 K. 19 21). Only at the tables of royalty and of the great nobles, we may suppose, was meat a daily luxury (1 K. 4 23 [53] Am. 6 4; cp Neh. 5 18). In the Greek period and onwards, however, the standard of living rose with the growth of commerce; indeed the table of a wealthy Jew of the first century would astonish us by the variety and elegance of its dishes.

14. Cattle as food.

The source of the ordinary meat supply was at all periods the domestic animals—cattle (בָּקָרָה), sheep, and goats. The minimum age at which any of these species was available for sacrifice, and therefore for food, was eight days (Lev. 22 27). Sacrificial meat, if not previously consumed, had to be destroyed on the third day at latest (Lev. 7 16 f. 196 f.),—probably because in the warm climate of Syria decomposition sets in rapidly. The dam and her offspring must not be killed on the same day (Lev. 22 28; cp the similar humanitarian legislation of Dt. 22 6 f.). From this passage and others (e.g., 1 S. 16 2) we see that the cow, as well as the ox, was eaten by the Hebrews, whilst their neighbours the Egyptians and the Phoenicians 'would as soon have eaten human flesh as that of the cow' (Rel. Sem.⁽¹⁾ 280).

The animals slaughtered might be taken directly from the herd (Gen. 18 7)—these are the בָּקָרָה רֵעִי (βόες νομάδες), 'oxen from the pasture,' of 1 K. 4 23 [53]—but the custom of specially fattening them for the table also was in vogue (Prov. 15 17). These 'fattlings' were known as מִשְׁמַת, מִשְׁמַתִּי (2 S. 6 13 1 K. 1 9 etc.), or מִשְׁמַתִּי, מִשְׁמַתִּי (1 K. 4 23 [53] Ezek. 34 20 Zech. 11 16). A more expressive term is derived from the fact that the creatures were tied up (רָבַק) and doubtless fed with special fattening stuffs, as was the case with the oxen and geese of Egypt (Erman, Egypt, 438, 444); this term is עֲנִילֵי חֲבִיבָה (Jer. 46 21—Gr. 26 21, μύσχος στυνρός = the 'fatted calf' of Lk. 15 23, and the στυνρός of Mt. 22 4—1 S. 28 24 Am. 6 4 Mal. 4 2 [3 20]).¹ The method of slaughtering by the table probably differed little from that practised by the Egyptians as illustrated by Wilkinson (op. cit. 226 f.). The throat of the animal was cut in such a manner as completely to sever the great arteries and veins of the neck, in order that the blood might flow as freely as possible (see § 9). The choicest portions (see 1 S. 9 24), and those probably first removed (cp Wilkinson, l.c.), were the right hind-quarter (שֵׁן, κωλέα, AV 'shoulder,' RV 'thigh'), and the 'shin' or upper portion of the right fore-leg (רֵגֶל, ζέρω α, Dt. 18 3 Nu. 6 19 [P]; cp Ezek. 24 4), both of which, in the case of sacrificial victims, were the perquisites of the priests (Lev. 7 32 f.).

¹ The MT of 1 S. 15 9, הַשְּׁמַתִּים (AVmg. 'of the second sort'), is explained in Jewish tradition by an alleged popular belief that the young of the second hearing are superior to the firstlings. Modern editors, however, read הַשְּׁמַתִּים, 'the fat ones' (cp Ezek. 34 16).

The goat and (especially) the kid were held in more esteem in former times in Syria (Gen. 27 9 Judg. 6 19

15. Of sheep and goats.

13 15 19 1 S. 16 20 etc.) than at present, when mutton is the principal animal food. Yet the variety of lambs known as כָּרִים, kārim, is mentioned with special honour (Dt. 32 14 1 S. 15 9 Am. 6 4). Both Syrians and Arabs now set great store by the fat tail of the native sheep, 'a swagging foot-lap wide' (Doughty, Ar. Des. 1502), which was no doubt equally relished by the Hebrews. If the sheep was offered in sacrifice, however, the tail, as we learned above (§ 10 beg.), was consumed on the altar. The ancient Egyptians, on the other hand, had a decided prejudice against mutton (see Wilkinson, op. cit., 1878, 230, with Birch's note). At the present day the goat is prized chiefly for its milk. The flesh of the kid is said to be 'tender and delicate, especially when boiled in milk' (Van Lennep); but this favourite Arab dish (see especially Thomson, LB, 94 f.) was forbidden to the Hebrews (see COOKING, § 8 end). A special article will be devoted to MILK and its preparations, butter, cheese, etc.

The daily supply of meat for Solomon's table included, we are told, besides 'ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred sheep, harts, and gazelles, and roehucks, and fatted fowl' (1 K. 4 23 [53]), for which see VENISON and FOWL respectively. The category 'fowl' included at least the following:—pigeons, turtle-doves, quails, perhaps also geese—the national food-bird of Egypt—and in later times the domestic fowl and the sparrow. For the prominent place occupied by FISH in the Hebrew food supply, and for the methods of catching and cooking them, as also for the preparation of the LOCUST and the use of HONEY, see the separate articles. For EGGS see FOWL, § 4.

Of the tabooed or unclean animals by far the most important is the pig. The Jews' abhorrence of swine's flesh, which is mentioned by many of the classical writers (see references in 'Cibaria,' animals. Daremberg and Saglio, 1159 a, u. 537), more than anything else brought them into contempt with their heathen neighbours.¹ The martyrs of 2 Macc. 6 18 ff. preferred death to eating the loathsome food. It is apparently inconsistent with this feeling that swine's flesh was eaten sacramentally, though doubtless in secret, when Is. 65 4 and 66 17 were written. See SWINE, and on the mystic eating of 'mice' see MOUSE. It was not, however, an obscure religious tradition, but the pressure of famine that led to the eating of the unheard-of foods mentioned in 2 K. 6 25 29.²

A few observations regarding the price of provisions, more particularly in the NT period, would form an appropriate close to this article. Unfortun-nately the data at command—incidental statements, for the most part, in OT and NT, in Josephus and the Mishna—are so conflicting, not to dwell on the uncertainty as to the measures and moneys that, beyond a few relative values, no certain results can be secured. Thus all we may safely infer from 2 K. 7 1 16 is that when the siege of Samaria was raised, the price of flour stood to that of barley in the ratio of 2 : 1. The ratio of wheat to barley at a later period was 3 : 1 (Rev. 6 6). Similarly, from M'énachōth, 138 we gather that the relative values of ox, calf, ram, and lamb were 100, 20, 8, and 4 denarii. Josephus, again, supplies some details, which are difficult to reconcile, regarding the price of oil in his day (Vit. 13, BJ ii. 21 2), whilst the familiar words of Jesus have made the cheapness of sparrows proverbial (Mt. 10 29 Lk. 12 6).³

FOOL, FOLLY. The antithesis of wisdom and folly is characteristic of the late ethical or humanistic movement. Of the numerous words rendered 'fool' in EV it ought to be noticed that for two of them 'fool' is not an exact equivalent. Take especially (1) נָבָל, nābhāl, which, as Driver (on Dt. 22:21 i S. 25:25) agrees, ought not to be translated 'fool'; for an examination of passages see Cheyne (Psalms⁽²⁾), on Ps. 141. The case is analogous to that of mcn of Bclial, a phrase which is generally taken as equivalent to 'unprincipled, good-for-nothing men,' but which really expresses reckless wickedness (see BELIAL).

נָבָל and נְבִיחַ are in fact synonymous, as Abigail's speech in 1 S. 25:25 shows. The origin and meaning of נְבִיחַ are treated elsewhere (see NABAL); here, therefore, we need only caution the reader against rendering נְבִיחַ, 'fool,' though this interpretation is as old as אֲפֹרֹת (Driver, Dt. 2:56); he is a dangerously bad man, violent, destructive, or—a rendering which suits well in Ps. 141 (53 r [2]) 39 s [g] 74 r 22—an 'impious' man. See also Dt. 32:6 (מְרֹסָה), 21 (אַשְׁמֶרֶת), 1 S. 25:25 2 S. 3:33 13:13 Is. 32:5 f. (מְרֹסָה), Jer. 17:11 Ezek. 13:3 (om.) Prov. 17:7 21 30:22 Job 2:10 30:8 (but נָבָל, Prov. 30:32, is corrupt).¹ The denom. verb נָבַל means 'to treat as a נָבָל is treated' (Nah. 3:6 Mic. 7:6 Jer. 14:21 Dt. 32:15).² The noun נָבָל also expresses the same disregard of moral and religious law, the same nihilism we might almost call it (see NABAL on derivation); it is used, e.g., in speaking of sexual offences (Dt. 22:21 Judg. 20:6 [וְנָבָל], 2 S. 13:12 Job 42:8 Is. 9:17 [16]).

(2) The other word misrendered 'fools,' 'foolish,' is הוֹלִים, hōllim (Ps. 5:5 [6] 73:3 75:5). RV better, 'the arrogant'; but the 'mad' or 'raging ones' (see 1 S. 21:13 [14]) can also be defended (see on the respective renderings, BDB, s.v. הָלָה, and Che.⁽²⁾ on Ps. 5:6).

Certainly הוֹלִים and הוֹלִלִים in Eccles. mean neither arrogance, nor mere folly, but madness (see EV), and in Job 12:17 הוֹלִיל 'he deprives of reason.'

The other terms generally (as in EV) rendered 'fool,' 'folly,' 'foolishness,' do not imply more than an inveterate moral and religious insensibility, which issues in disorderly actions (cp Ch. Jew. Rel. Life. 1:36).

(3) סָכַל, sakil (root idea, fatness or thickness), often in Prov. and Eccles., thrice in Ps.; K'sil, the constellation, may be connected (but cp STARS, § 3; ORION). See especially Prov. 26:1 3:1; also Ps. 49 11 [10] 92 [6] 94 s [||] 'brute' Prov. 8:5 (|| פְּתָאִים, 'simple'). The verb סָכַל in Jer. 10:8 (|| בְּעָרָה; late passage).

(4) סָכַח, sakhāl (root idea, stopped up? cp סָכַר with Ass. sakku, 'deaf'—i.e., stopped up; see Del. Ass. HWB), Jer. 4:22 5:21 Eccles. 2:19 17 etc., whence סָכַחִית in Eccles. only (syn. הוֹלִלִים, קְטִילִים (2 S. 24:10) and הוֹלִלִים (1 S. 26:21), 'to play the fool'; סָכַח, 'to befool,' Is. 44:25; סָכַח, 'folly,' Eccles. 10:6, and, by emendation, 7:25⁹ (MT סָכַח).

(5) עֲוִיל, 'evil' (same root idea as in סָכַח), often in Prov.; also Hos. 9:7 (קָשָׁע) Jer. 4:22 Is. 19:11, but not Ps. 107:17 (see We., Che.); probably too עֲוִיל in Job 5:3,⁴ and עֲוִילִים in Is. 85:8 should be עוֹלִים; עֲוִילִים = עוֹלִים; the noun is עוֹלָה, 'folly,' Prov. 5:23.⁵

(6) עָצָר, bē'ar (prop. 'hrtutishness'), Ps. 49:10 [11] 73:22 92:6 [7] (|| בְּסִיל), Prov. 12:1 30:2.

(7) פֶּתַח, pēthā'im, Prov. 9:6, but elsewhere 'the simple' (prop. 'the open'), and so uniformly RV.
 (8) נָפַל, nāphāl (prop. 'insipid'), Lam. 2:14, and נָפַלָה, Job 1:22 (AV 'foolishly'; RV 'with foolishness'), 24:12; both these passages are corrupt.¹

On the idea involved in this group of ethical terms, cp ECCLESIASTICUS, § 23; WISDOM LITERATURE.
 Passing to the NT, we find in EV 'fool' for (9) ἀνόητος Lk. 24:25, cp ἀνοία 2 Tim. 8:9, (10) ἀσοφοί Eph. 5:15 (RV 'unwise'), (11) ἀσύνετος Rom. 1:21 (RV 'senseless'), (12) παραφρονῶν 2 Cor. 11:23 (cp RV); (13) ἀφρων, a strong term, 1 Cor. 15:36 2 Cor. 11:16 19 12:6 11; cp ἀφροσύνη 2 Cor. 11:1; and finally (14) μωρός Mt. 7:26 23:17 (μωροὶ καὶ τυφλοὶ) 19 (Ti. WH om.) 25:2 ff. 1 Cor. 8:18 4:10 etc.; cp μωρολογία Eph. 5:4 (between αἰσχρότης and εὐτραπέλεια; cp Col. 8:8), 'unifying discourse'; μωραίνω Rom. 1:22 (in a different sense Mt. 5:13 etc.). μωρός (Vg. fatue) Mt. 5:22 also belongs here; it is not, as Alford supposed, the Heb. מוֹרֶה, mōrah. In Mishnic Heb. מוֹרָא, מוֹרַח, מוֹרָה represent μωρός, μωρῆ; 'Never call any one mōrah, that is, fool,' says a certain king, in entrusting his son to a pedagogue (Pesik. Šim'i'u, 118). We cannot indeed prove that the word was already common in the time of Jesus; but such colloquial expressions would become naturalised first. (On the exegesis of Mt. 5:22, see RACA.) See, further, HYPOCRISY.

FORD, the equivalent of מַעְבְּרָה, ma'ābhar, מַעְבְּרָה, ma'ābharāh (generally διαβαδίκις) in EV of Gen. 32:22 [23] Josh. 2:7 Judg. 3:28 Is. 16:2, also in RV of 2 S. 15:28 17:16 (CP ἀραβαθ) and in Kau. HS (with which We., Dr., H. P. Sm. agree) of מַעְבְּרָה, 'ābharāh, in 2 S. 19:18 [19].

The last three passages are of great interest; they come into the narrative of David's flight and subsequent return from Absalom. In all, the text needs some emendation. In 15:28 and 17:16 neither AV's 'the plain [plains] of the wilderness' (= כְּר.) nor RV's 'the fords of the wilderness' (= Kt.) is a natural phrase. Read probably בית המדבר 'the house of the wilderness' (a local name like Beth-arabah). In 19:18 f. read הָתֵּיפוּ לַפְּנֵי הַמֶּלֶךְ (בית המלך) 'the closing words (except בית המלך) are dittographed in v. 16 (end); לְהַעֲבִיר (v. 19) is written three times over, and each time incorrectly; probably the closing words of v. 16 originally stood in the margin as a correction. Render 'And they relieved one another (in going) before the king to escort the household of the king across the Jordan.' The ford was presumably the well-known one not far from Gilgal (2 S. 19:15 [16]); cp JORDAN, §§ 2, 7.

The phrase רָנַח לְפָנֵי (CP προτρέχειν) is used of one who 'runs before' a chariot (1 S. 8:11 2 S. 15:1 [παρatreχέω]; see CHARIOT, § 10), or of a member of the royal body-guard (1 K. 15 [παρatreχέω]; see ARMY, § 4). In 1 Macc. 16:21 the Gk. equivalent is used of a messenger (see RUNNERS). ἄβλα[†] in Nu. 13:21 gives πρόδρομοι bē'arim (see FRUIT, § 4 [2]).

¹ In Job 1:22 תִּפְלָה should probably be הוֹתָרָה cp Is. 32:6 (Che.); on 24:12 see Budde and Duhm. As a compensation תִּפְלָה, Job 4:18, should probably be תִּפְלָה (so Huft.; but cp Dillm.).

FOREST

HAROSHETH; cp Ass. hursu, 'mountain,' NH חרש = Aram. חרש, 'wood, thicket.' The readings in 2 Ch. 27 4 Is. 17 9 Ezek. 31 3, however, are all probably corrupt. In 2 Ch. read פרוה, 'level country' (see PERIZZITES); in Is. probably הגרשית, 'the Girshite' (see GIRZITES); in Ezek 31 3 חרש פלג (ס⁸ om.; EV 'with a shadowing shroud') should be חרש פלג, 'a shadowing fir tree' (a variant to חרש פלג). חן 1 S. 23 15 ff., see HOESH.

2. פָּרְדֵּס, pardēs, parádeisos, Neh. 2 8 (RV מִגְּמֵס 'park'), Eccles. 2 5 (AV 'orchard,' RV 'park'), Cant. 4 13 (EV 'orchard,' RV מִגְּמֵס 'a paradise'). A rare and late word, see GARDEN.

3. יַעַר, yā'ar, δρυμὸς; Ass. āru, Aram. יַעַר; usually rendered 'forest, occasionally 'wood'; √יער, to be rugged, difficult.

Some of the many references to forests, bushes, and thickets are mentioned here, partly because EV has not always preserved the colouring of the original.

(a) The phrase 'the forest in Arabia' (Is. 21 13, in RV; ἢ ἐν τῷ δρυμῷ ἑσπερίας) is infelicitous; probably 'thickets in the desert country' would be a better rendering (see Del. ad loc., and cp SBOT). The thorns and stunted trees and shrubs of the desert are to supply the only shelter for the fugitives. Cp Aram. יַעַר.

(b) For 'forest of Carmel,' 2 K. 19 23 Is. 37 24, read with RV 'the forest of its fruitful field'—i.e., paraphrasing (with SBOT '13a.'), 'where its rich woods are thickest (ἢ εἰς ὑψος μέρους τοῦ δρυμῶς).

(c) In Jer. 5 6 'A lion out of the forest shall slay them,' and 12 8 'mine heritage is (become) unto me as a lion in the forest,' are slightly misleading. It is the tangled jungle on the banks of the Jordan that is meant (see Tristram, NH 118); יַעַר is often not 'forest' but 'thickets.'

(d) The 'forest in the midst of Carmel' (Mic. 7 14 RV; AV 'the wood' . . .) is due to an exegetical error. The Jews cannot have described their ideal hope in such terms as RV presents (cp Keil). To live in a forest would mean being constantly surrounded with the greatest hindrances to comfort. It is a picture not of future happiness but of present misery. Faithful Israel which is now (in post-exilic times) condemned to make shift with the wildest and least productive parts of Palestine will in the great coming day occupy Bashan and Gilead as before. The heathen will have been cast out, and Palestine will be the Holy Land (so Wellh., Nowack).

(e) Part of the royal palace built by Solomon at Jerusalem, and used as an armoury, was called the 'house of the forest of Lebanon' (1 K. 7 2 f. 10 17-21 2 Ch. 9 16-20). Entering it, one seemed to be in the midst of the cedar-groves of Lebanon. The house had 'four rows of cedar pillars, with cedar beams upon the pillars, and it was covered with cedar above upon the beams.' Hence, in all probability, its name.

(f) In Jer. 4 29 (EV) we read of 'thickets' so dense and large that the population of a city could take refuge in them from an invader. This view of the text implies perhaps too high an estimate of the woodland in S. Palestine. Ewald seems to be right in reading 'the whole land' (ἢ πάσα [ἡ] χώρα) for 'the whole city,' and Gk. in substituting 'into the caves' (ἰνὸς τῶν σπηλαίων) for 'into the thickets' (ἰνὸς τῶν ἄνθρακων).² For a similar mistake see 1 S. 13 6, where EV, following MT, says that the Hebrews fled before the Philistines into 'caves and thickets,' but 'thickets' (ἰνὸς τῶν ἄνθρακων) should be 'holes' (ἰνὸς τῶν ὀρυθίων). See Bu. SBOT, ad loc.

(g) In Zech. 11 2 AV's 'forest of the vintage' is most enigmatical. Vineyards and Bashan can hardly have been mentioned together. RV substitutes 'strong forest.' The Revisers, however, are sensible of the difficulty of the phrase, and retain the mg. 'defenced forest' (ἢ δρυμὸς ὁ σὺμφυτος, saltus munitus). Probably the true reading is 'the forest shall come down by the axe' (i.e., Kt. הרצור and Kt. הרצור are both wrong; read בְּרִצְרָע with Che. (Exp. T., March 1899); cp Duhm's emendation of בְּרִצְרָע in Is. 10 33.

(h) For 'forest of Ephraim,' see EPHRAIM, WOOD OF.

(i) For 'forest of Hareth,' see HARETH.

Possibly some writers have exaggerated the woodland in ancient Palestine. The country was too well peopled for thick forests, except in the mountains and in parts of the Plain of Sharon. There is only one solitary grove of cedars on Lebanon; but fir trees are still abundant. Forests of oak may be seen in Gilead, and park-like woods in Bashan. In Carmel and in the N. and E. of

FORTRESS

Sharon oaks are abundant, and even elsewhere one still meets with a solitary oak or terebinth of huge dimensions, as at Hebron, valley of Elah, Shiloh, and Dan. Cp PALESTINE, § 15; CARMEL, § 2; LEBANON, SHARON. T. K. C.

FORKS, the EV reading of שְׁלֵשׁ קַלְשֵׁן in 1 S. 13 21, taken apparently as meaning 'three-pronged'; but the text is certainly corrupt. Between אֶחָדִים one expects פְּשִׁלִּים (Ps. 74 6)—i.e., 'hatchets.' The word was written twice and twice corrupted. See AXE. T. K. C.

FORNICATION (תְּנַיִת, Ezek. 16 29; πορνεία, Mt. 5 32). See MARRIAGE, § 4; also COUNCIL OF JERUSALEM, § 11.

FORTRESS meant as a general rule a town surrounded by a defensive wall (חֻקְיָה); cp CITY, VILLAGE.

The Hebrew terms are: חֻקְיָה, mišgār, 'fortress' (Is. 17 3 25 12 Dan. 11 39 AV), 'strong hold' (Nu. 13 19 2 K. 8 12 Jer. 48 18 EV Dan. 11 39 RV); עִיר מְצֻרָה, ir mēṣār, 'strong city' (Ps. 60 9 [11] EV); עִיר מְצֻרָה, ir mēṣār, 'fenced city' (Nu. 32 17 Josh. 10 20 19 35 1 S. 6 13 EV). There also occur, ḥiryah, ḥiryah, 'a defenced city' (Is. 25 2 EV), and ḥiryah, ḥiryah, 'a well fenced city' (Dan. 11 15 EV).

Defensive walls, at an early stage in the history of Canaanite civilisation, consisted of great unhewn stone blocks; specimens of these may, it has

Saulcy's Journey round the Dead Sea. It is not easy to say whether the walled towns or fortresses that confronted the Israelites when they entered Canaan were of this primitive character; it is possible that some at least may have had walls of hewn stone analogous to those depicted on Assyrian and Egyptian monuments. Babylonian influence had already been long prevalent in Palestine when the Amarna letters were written by the prefects of the Canaanite towns to the Egyptian Pharaoh (1400 B.C.); we should therefore have a right to assume that such places as Byblus (Gebal), of which Rib Adda was governor, as well as Zemar (Šumur), Ashdod, Jerusalem (Urusalim), and Lachish, were provided with fortifications of a more finished character.

This assumption has been thoroughly justified by the excavations conducted by Bliss at Lachish (Tell el-Hesi) which have brought to light a cuneiform document contemporaneous (as the contents clearly prove) with the Amarna despatches.

The LACHISH of this period had crude brick walls 9 or 10 ft. in thickness; the words ascribed by J to the Israelite spies were therefore justified: the cities of the southland were 'fenced and very great' (Nu. 13 28 f.; cp Dt. 1 28 Nu. 32 36 Josh. 19 29 35). Fortresses such as Lachish the nomadic Hebrews could hardly take by storm, not possessing the arms and engines of war requisite for the purpose. Consequently they must have remained encamped in open spots, and when pressed by overwhelming numbers or disciplined troops must have betaken themselves to caves and hollows in the rocks, as we find they did (1 S. 13 6) when they were confronted by the better-equipped Philistines. It was only by an act of supreme daring, and probably with great loss of life, that such a stronghold as Jerusalem, the citadel of which was Zion (צִיּוֹן אֲרָמֹן), was captured by David (2 S. 5 6 f.).

The reigns of David and Solomon marked an onward step in Hebrew civilization. From 2 S. 5 11 (cp 1 K.

2. Of the Hebrews. 5 1 [15] 7 13-51) we should infer that the fortifications erected around Milo (2 S. 5 9 1 K. 3 1 9 15 11 27) were built by Phœnician—most probably Tyrian—workmen. For many generations the Phœnicians had the reputation of being the most skilful craftsmen in the world. Compare Herodotus' tribute of admiration to their skill in the construction of the canal near Mount Athos (Herod. 7 23). During the regal period the Hebrews became thoroughly grounded in the arts of Canaanite civilization.¹ Whilst the fortifications of Gezer, Beth-horon, Baalath, Hazor, and Megiddo were probably erected by Solomon with the aid of foreign (especially Phœnician) labour (cp 1 K. 9 15 17 f.), we may assume that the fortresses erected in the Southern Kingdom by Asa—viz., Geba and Mizpah (1 K. 15 21 f.)—to resist Northern aggressions were built by the Hebrews themselves, and the same thing might perhaps be said of Shechem and Peniel which Jeroboam fortified (1 K. 12 25).

It would seem that Moab in the time of king Mesha likewise was dominated by this advancing civilization; we may infer this from the ruins of Rabhath Moab which exhibit floral forms of ornamentation like those of the sacred plant of Assyria.²

The most notable fortress in the Northern Kingdom was Samaria, built by one of its greatest kings, Omri, whose name the Assyrians attached, as we learn from the annals of Tiglath-pileser and Sargon (Schrader, KB 2 32 42), to the Northern Kingdom (bit Ḥumri[a]). This renowned fortress withstood all the assaults of the Assyrian armies—equipped (as we know they were) with engineering appliances, battering rams, and towers—for upwards of two years (724-722).

Among the fortified towns of the Southern Kingdom, Jerusalem occupied the most prominent place from a very early period (so the Amarna despatches would lead us to conclude).¹ It is essentially a mountain city and stands on the southern extremity of a spur or plateau enclosed by two ravines, Kedron and Hinnom. A third ravine joins the Kedron at the pool of Siloam to the SE. NW. between the Tyropœon and Hinnom valleys is the steep hill of Zion (see Perrot and Chipiez). This fortress, strong by nature, was regarded by the Egyptians as forming with Samaria and Ashdod important strategical outposts against Assyrian aggression. That Sargon and Sennacherib regarded them in the same light is obvious.

During the strong military rule of Azariah (Uzziah), Judah was well provided with fortresses. The statements in 2 Ch. 26 6 9 are sustained by the Taylor-cylinder recording Sennacherib's invasion of Palestine in 701 B.C. In col. 3 13 we read that forty-six of these fortified towns (maḥāzai dānuūti [bitu] durāni) were reduced by Sennacherib's officers. From line 22 we learn that the fortified city of Jerusalem was provided (as we might expect) with a gateway which was probably of massive masonry. Egress from this was barred, as we gather from this passage, by the intrenchments which enclosed the beleaguered town.² These strong gateways were furnished with doors of great strength provided with bolts of iron and bronze (1 K. 4 13; cp Dt. 3 5 33 25). Occasionally the gates may have been plated with bronze, as were the gates of Balawāt erected by Shalmaneser II. (cp Is. 45 2). Shalmaneser's plates contained representations of his military expeditions.³

It must be confessed that the lack of monumental records and figures having direct reference to Palestine renders it impossible to give as vivid 3. Assyrian representations and precise details respecting its fortresses as could be desired. We can only derive illustrative materials from the copious stores of graphic Assyrian representations furnished by its monumental portrayals and the ruins of Khorsabad and Nineveh. The illustration, fig. 2 (next page), taken from the reliefs belonging to the reign of Tiglath-pileser III. (745-727) preserved in the British Museum, represents the general type of fortification of the towns of Western Asia.

It is hardly possible to accept the high figures given by Herodotus in his description of the walls of Babylon (1 178 f.).

Still, they may not have been so far in excess as we might imagine. Herodotus' measurements (178 ad fin.), 200 royal cubits for the height and 50 for the breadth—i.e., over 380 ft. for the former and over 80 ft. for the latter, are probably excessive; but Layard excavated one of the chief gates of ancient Nineveh, and according to the scale of his plan the walls were about 110 ft. thick. Probably, however, the strength of the walls at special points (and especially near the gateways) was exceptional. The Nineveh gateway was built by Sennacherib. Two pairs of winged bulls were placed by it—one pair looking toward the city and the other facing the exterior.

The extraordinary thickness and solidity of the walls were doubtless designed to neutralise the effect of the battering rams.

The fortified town erected by Sargon, Dūr Šarrukīn or Sargon's town, was considerably smaller than Nineveh. It stood upon a parallelogram, two sides of which measured 1950 yards, whilst the other two measured 1870 yards. As there was no proper akropolis, the king's palace with its massive gates and dominating towers formed a quasi-citadel into which the inhabitants could fly for refuge when the outer walls were captured or a breach was made through them. Perrot and Chipiez in their description of this interesting fortress give the following details:—

'The parapets of the towers were corbelled out from their walls and pierced with loopholes, as we can gather from the reliefs. Each doorway was flanked by a pair of towers, the wall between them being only wide enough for the entrance. We have no trace of a ditch, though it might easily have been supplied by the two mountain streams that flow past the mound.¹ There were two gates to each of the faces SE., SW., and NE. (see fig. 3).

FIG. 2.—Fortress of Askuttu. From a slab in the British Museum.

Owing to the massive thickness of the walls in the more important fortresses, such as Nineveh, their summit would afford ample room for a large number of defenders. According to Place (Ninive, 165; 211), throughout the circumference of the enceinte the curtain was strengthened by rectangular flanking towers separated by intervals of 90 feet or double the front of a tower.

FIG. 3.—Assyrian fortress. From a slab in the British Museum.

From the scale of the figures in the sculptures we conclude that the head of the towers averages one-fourth or one-fifth the height of the curtain. Place gives to the towers a total height of 105 feet² to the top of their crenellations.

² This is nearly the same height as that assigned by Xenophon (Anab. iii. 47) to the walls of Larissa (the Assyrian Resen

FORTRESS

From ancient Egypt we have a useful store of illustrative material. One of the most valuable is the fortress of Semneh in Nubia, belonging to the time of the Middle Empire, erected by Useratesen III., blockading the right bank of the river. Large portions of it remain. It is an 'immense brick building with many projecting corners and irregular ground plan, and is surrounded on the outside by a wall.'

In this case an interesting point is to be noted—viz., the change in direction in the line of slope of the outer wall made with the view of rendering the planting of scaling ladders more difficult. This may be noted also in a representation of a fortress of the same period in a tomb at Beni Hasan (Erman, Anc. Eg. 526).

From very early times Egypt possessed a regular system of fortification. The shape of the fortress was quadrangular. Wilkinson gives the following description:—

The walls were 'of crude brick 15 ft. thick and often 50 ft. high with square towers at intervals along each face, generally of the same height as the walls . . . Sometimes the whole was doubled by an outer casing, leaving a space between the two filled in here and there by a solid buttress, which strengthened and united them and prevented any one passing freely round the inner wall when the outer one was broken through. The towers like the rest of the walls consisted of a rampart and parapet, which last was crowned by the usual round-headed battlements . . . The fortress was usually square with one or occasionally two entrances: but generally with one and a sally-port, or a water-gate if near the river . . . One great principle in the large fortresses was to have a long wall on the side most exposed to attack, projecting from 70 to 100 ft. at right angles from and at the same height as the main wall, upon which the besieged were enabled to run out and sweep the faces or curtain by what we should call 'a flanking fire.' In order to keep the enemy as far from the main wall as possible, it was raised on a broad terrace or basement, or had an outer low wall of circumvallation parallel to the main wall at a distance of from 13 to 20 feet.'¹

That many of the details in the above descriptions hold good of the Palestinian fortresses during the royal period is undoubtedly true. Both Babylonian and Egyptian civilization exercised considerable influence in Canaan from very early times. The impress of the Babylonian, however, was deeper and more permanent.² We should, therefore, expect to find a closer approximation to the Babylonian-Assyrian model. Thus the Migdal or TOWER [q. v.] was a characteristic feature of Palestine from the earliest times. There were small, simple towers, and there were others of great size, solid and durable, such as would serve as landmarks and give their names to places (see MIGDAL-EL, MIGDAL-GAD). These erections in some cases go back as far as the fifteenth century B.C. at least. Compare (alu or maḥasū) Magdali in the Amarna despatches,³ the determinative clearly showing that it was the name of a place (in one case Migdol on the NE Egyptian frontier). Moreover, we have frequent references to strong doors or gates in Canaanite fortified towns (Judg. 162 f. 1 S. 237 2 S. 1824 33 [19 i] 2 Ch. 146 [7] Neh. 28 336 1 Macc. 1333 1539). From 2 S. 1824 we gather a few picturesque details. The gateway of the town had an inner and also an outer gate, and the king was sitting near Nimrūd). Xenophon's measurements are: height 100 ft., thickness 25 ft., stone foundation (κρηπίς) 20 ft. in height, the circuit of the walls 2 parasangs (or about 6½ m.); the walls themselves were built of clay bricks. In the case of Mespila, described by him in § 107, the dimensions are considerably greater.

5. Palestinian copies.

between the two in the shade. There was a porter to the gate and a watchman on the roof above the gateway, who announced to the king the approach of messengers.

With these fortified gates we may compare hit hillāni (places of windows, see LATTICE, § 2 [2])—the name given by the Assyrians to the two towers in front of the city gate, connected by an open porch with two pillars or sphinxes, which they adopted from Syrian models in the time of Tiglath-pileser III. On the hit-hillāni, the ruins of which have been found at Zenzirli, see Ausgrabungen in Senjirli, Heft II., 1898, and Rost's review, ÖLZ 1 197 ff.

In front of the main wall there was frequently a lower rampart (לח, hēl), or glacis called in Syriac bar šārā and in Greek περιτειχος or προτειχισμα (Is. 26 1 2 S. 20 15 1 K. 21 23 [?]). Moreover, battlements were erected on the walls (מגדל, pinnōth, 2 Ch. 26 15 Zeph. 1 16; מִגְדָּלוֹת, ḡmāšōth, Is. 54 12 [AV 'windows,' RV 'pinnacles']). Of course, migdālīm (see TOWER), rendered πύργου in 1 Macc. 5 65 Judith 13, formed a characteristic feature of Hebrew (as they did of other) fortified towns in Western Asia (Ezek. 26 4 27 11). Ezek. 27 11 and Cant. 4 4 (cp ARMOURY) may perhaps suggest that it was customary to affix shields (מגן, šāḡim) to the walls for greater protection against the missiles of the enemy. On the methods by which fortresses were stormed, see SIEGE. o. c. w.

FORTUNATUS (ΦΟΡΤΟΥΝΑΤΟΣ [Tl.WH]), a member of the Corinthian Church. Along with Stephanus and Achaicus he brought news of the Corinthians to Paul at Ephesus which gladdened and refreshed him (1 Cor. 16 17 f.). See CORINTHIANS, §§ 3, 13.

FORTUNE (𐤔𐤓; ΤΟ ΔΑΙΜΟΝΙΟΝ [BA]. Ο ΔΑΙΜΩΝ [NQ]; fortuna), and DESTINY (מַזְלָה הַטְּוֹכָה [BNAQ]; super eam; Pesh. unites the two as gaddē, 'the fortunes'). Two deities (Gad and Mēni) worshipped by Jews who had 'forsaken Yahwē and forgotten his holy mountain' (Is. 65 11 f.). Obviously, though both are male deities, they form a pair, and if Gad be early Canaanitish, Mēni can hardly be a late variation of an important Nabatean god Manōt (= the Arabian Manāt, Koran, 53 19-23).

The antiquity of the worship of Gad is shown by the names BAAL-GAD, MIGDAL-GAD, the one localised in the far north, the other in the territory of Judah; less certainly by the exclamation of Leah (Gen. 30 11 J), for 𐤔𐤓 in 𐤔𐤓 𐤔𐤓 or 𐤔𐤓 𐤔𐤓 is perhaps more naturally taken as an appellative (so the same word often in Syriac [Baethg.]) than as a divine name (see, however, Ball in SBOT). The tribal name GAD is also probably a borrowed divine name. Of the prevalence of the cultus of Gad or Tychē in Syria in later times there are abundant proofs (see Mordtmann, ZDMG 31 99-101; Noldeke, ib. 52 474, 478 f.; Baethg. Beitr. 77 f.), nor can we doubt that it was part of the primitive Aramaean worship. Of the Syrian cultus of Mēni we have only the evidence of some Aramaeo-Persian coins of the Achaemenidæ (Ges. Thes., 'Addenda,' 97 b); but if there was really a Babylonian god Manu,² we may assume that it was not less ancient than that of Gad.

It has often been held that Gad and Mēni are the planetary gods, Jupiter and Venus. This view is supported from Arabic usage, in which Jupiter is called 'the great fortune,' and Venus 'the little fortune,' but lacks further confirmation. There were no doubt several varieties of Gad or Fortune (and consequently of Mēni or Destiny). Thus in early times there was one at a well-known point of the Hermon range (Baal-gad), and a Christian writer (Jacob of Serīg) tells us that in his time many mountain-tops were crowned with temples of Fortune (Mordtmann). Moreover, there was also the domestic Fortune or good genius.

In Ber. Rabba, par. 71, Leah's joyful cry is explained, 'The Fortune of the house—the Fortune of the world—is come,' and in Ned. 56 a, Sanh. 20 a מְנַיִן מְנַיִן means the couch of state reserved for the Luck of the house, and covered doubtless with fowls in his honour (cp Ball's note on Bel and the Dragon, v. 3). This refers to the fourth and fifth centuries A.D.; but we may assume that the same custom was in vogue in the fifth century B.C. when Is. 65 was written.

The people accused of worshipping Gad and Mēni are most probably the half-Jews commonly called Samaritans and those in the Jewish community who sympathised with them (see Duhm's Jesaja; Che. Intr. Isa. 364 ff.). To emend מְנַיִן (Mēni) into נַנַי (Nani or Nanai; see NANEIA) with Lagarde (Ges. Abhandl. 16), is arbitrary (see v. 12). T. K. C.

FOUNDATIONS (מוֹסְדוֹת, mōsdōth, מוֹסְדֵי, mōsdē-dim, etc., ΘΕΜΕΛΙΟΙ).

(a) Of the earth: 2 S. 22 16 (|| Ps. 18 15 [16]), Ps. 24 2 etc. Mic. 6 2 Is. 13 13 etc. Job 38 4 Ecclus. 10 16 16 19. (Cp passage from legend of Istar on the ocean-foundations of the earth; Karppe, Journ. Asiat. 9 101.) a and b (see below) are practically synonymous. This usage may be connected with the primitive Babylonian idea of the earth as a huge mountain.

(b) Of the mountains: Ps. 18 7 [8] (|| 2 S. 22 8 wrongly 'of heaven'), Dt. 32 22 Job 18 4 (ΘΡΟΝΟΣ ὄρη [ΘΑ ἢ γῆ] ἐκ θεμελίων: see Duhm).

(c) Of the temple: 1 K. 6 1 f. 7 9 Ezra 8 10. See TEMPLE.

(d) Of Jerusalem: Ps. 87 1 (or less probably of the temple, Aq. Jer. Bā. 3), Is. 14 32 etc.

(e) Of the wall of the new Jerusalem: Rev. 21 19.

Laying the foundation of a new building was a sacred rite; how else could the presence and favour of the divinity be secured? Hence a foundation-stone was to be goodly and valuable. This is set forth with great fulness in the later Babylonian inscriptions. Together with the stone, we are told that gold, silver, and stones of the mountains and the sea were deposited (KB 3 b, p. 5); a cylinder (temenu) containing a written record of the foundation was also indispensable. The most interesting account is that given by Nabu-nahid (Nabonidus), the last of the kings of Babylon (556-538 B.C.). After a long search for the foundation-stone of the ancient temple of Istar of Agadē built by Sargon I. (3800 B.C.), he found it (KB 3 b, p. 87). Such discoveries were common; they gave confidence to later builders who knew that a spot once sacred was always sacred, and that the divine power did not love changed altars. The foundation-stone might in fact be called an altar, as the primitive rite of laying the foundation in blood (see HIEL, § 3) sufficiently shows. According to Hilprecht, the cylinders and deposits in primitive Babylonia were at first placed under the threshold, and afterwards under the four corners of the building.¹ There is therefore a close connection between the sacredness of the threshold-stone and that of the corner-stone; and one remembers that 'corner-stone' and 'foundation-stone' are synonymous terms in the Hebrew Scriptures (see CORNER-STONE).

We can now understand better why the foundation-stones of Solomon's temple and of the wall of the New Jerusalem are so carefully described. Also the reference in Is. 54 11 Rev. 21 19 to precious stones, and the description of Yahwē's self-manifestation in Zion as a 'precious foundation corner-stone' (Is. 28 16). It is noteworthy that the Israelites avoided such fantastic titles for their temple as 'foundation-stone of heaven and earth' (E-temen-an-ki), borne by one of the Babylonian zikkurrats (Jastrow, Bab. and Ass. 639).

Attention was drawn long ago to a curious use of θεμέλιον in 1 Tim. 6 19. Men do not 'lay up a good foundation.' Clericus suggested κειμήλιον, which must surely be right. In the Epistle to Hero attributed to Ignatius, we read τὰς παρόνους φυλάττετε ὡς Χριστοῦ κειμήλια. A common word among church writers. 'Laying up a fair jewel' is a natural expression. T. K. C.

FOWL (AND FOWLING). Under this head it is proposed to group those members of the family Aves 1. Edible. (Birds) which are mentioned in the OT or the NT as used for food (§§ 1-5), and to add some observations on the methods then in vogue of catching the wild (§§ 7-12) and of rearing the domestic fowl (§ 5f.).

1. Food.—'Of all clean birds ye may eat' (Dt. 14 11, see CLEAN AND UNCLEAN, § 9, and FOOD, § 8). The Pentateuchal legislation contains no list of the birds allowed as food; it gives, instead, two lists, practically identical, of the species tabooed (Lev. 11 13-19 Dt. 14 11-18), prominent among which are the birds of prey (טְרֵפָה, Gen. 15 11). Of the birds that remain, 'clean' and available for food, the first place belongs to the Columbidae or pigeon family, comprising the turtle-dove and the pigeon (as to the originally sacrosanct character of which see DOVE, SACRIFICE). The various species of PARTRIDGE (אֲרֵז) were hunted for the same purpose (1 S. 26 20; cp Ecclus. 11 30, for which see below). The use of the nearly allied QUAIL (תְּרִיז), we may be sure, was not confined to the period of the desert wanderings (Ex. 16 13¹ Nu. 11 31, cp Ps. 78 27 [26] 105 40). In NT times, and doubtless for long before, the SPARROW (q.v.) was caught and sold at an exceedingly low price (Mt. 10 29 ff. Lk. 12 6 ff.).

In 1 K. 4 23 [5 2] the list of provisions furnished daily for Solomon's table closes with בְּרֵבִים אֲבוֹטִים (δραβίθων

2. Domestic fowl. [ἐκλεκτὰ] ἐκλεκτῶν σιτευτῶν [B^A], δρ. ἐκ. καλ νομάθων [L], aves alliles, whence our EV 'fatted fowl'; cp Kimchi's 'capons'), a phrase of uncertain meaning, and not free from critical suspicion (see FOWL, FATTED). If the reading is correct are we to take the phrase as including various species of food-birds, or as denoting only a particular species? In the latter case, the identification of the bird with the goose (so Targ. Jer.) has perhaps most in its favour. The goose (אֵז) was certainly a common domestic bird in NT times, since it is several times mentioned in the Mishna with poultry and house-pigeons (Shabb. 24 3 Chull. 12 1). Like the duck, of which also mention is made in the Talmud, the goose, from the nature of its food, can scarcely have been a popular food-bird with the more punctilious of the Jews. It was quite otherwise with the ancient Egyptians; the flesh of the goose has been called their 'national dish.'

The introduction of the domestic fowl into Palestine can hardly be dated beyond the Persian period, even should the ancients be right (see COCK) in identifying the obscure תְּרִיז of Prov. 30 31 with the cock (Ⓔ Aq. Theod. ἀλέκτωρ; but cp COCK). By the first century, at all events, fowls had long been domesticated (see below, § 4). The touching words in Mt. 23 37 need no quoting; cp 2 Esd. 1 30.

We have no express indication of the favourite methods of cooking fowls. Both roasting and stewing

3. Method of cooking. were doubtless in vogue among the Hebrews as among the Egyptians. Among the latter the goose was either roasted on a primitive spit 'stuck through the beak and neck of the bird' (Erman, Egypt, 189), or stewed in a pan, as portrayed on the monuments (see Wilk. Anc. Eg. 235). Roasting probably remained the popular mode of cooking the smaller birds such as sparrows, which at the present day are roasted on skewers, like the gobbots of meat called keháb (see COOKING, § 6).

The eggs (בִּצְיֵי) of several of the birds named above, in particular those of the domestic fowl, entered largely

4. Eggs. into the diet of the Hebrews. The egg of the ostrich (Job 39 14) which 'dressed with samn and flour in a pan savoured as a well-tasting omelette' (Doughty, Arab. Des. 1 132) is much relished by the Arabs of to-day; but beyond the fact that a portion of a shell was found by Bliss in the mound of Tell-el-Hesi (Lachish) there seems to be no evidence that it was so used in Palestine. For the strict Jews, the egg, like the flesh, was doubtless taboo (תְּרֵפֶה). This objection did not apply to the eggs of the partridge, which also are eagerly collected for food by the Arabs; Jer. 17 11 may point to a similar custom among the Hebrews (cp PARTRIDGE). The eggs most in use (Lk. 11 12) were, as among ourselves, those of the domestic fowl (תְּרִיזֵי). Job, according to Bickell, Budde, and Duham who have revived the traditional interpretation, draws (Job 6 6) from the white of an egg a figure to express the strange unreasonableness of his affliction; Dillmann, however,¹ prefers the rendering, 'Is there any taste in the juice of purslain' (or some other plant)? [The text needs emendation; see PURSLAIN.]

1 The so-called Targum of Jonathan has converted the modest quails into pheasants (תְּרִיזֵי, φασיאνοί) ! Cp Targ. Ps. 105 40.

There are frequent references in the Mishna—one of the treatises of which bears the name Bēṣā (egg²)—to the use of eggs as food and to various methods of cooking them. They might be boiled (Shabb. 9 5), or broken and fried (מְרִיט, ib. 1 10), or mixed up with oil and fried in a saucepan (אֲרֵזִית, ib. 8 5). A favourite dish (Bēṣā, 2 1) consisted of eggs (perhaps poached) spread upon fish.³

The law of D—from motives purely humanitarian or partly humanitarian and partly utilitarian—required that when the eggs were taken from under a wild bird the mother should not be interfered with (Dt. 22 6 f.).

II. Supply.—The requisite supply of fowls, in the wider sense of the word, was obtained (a) by the complete or partial domestication of pigeons 5. Domestic pigeons. and poultry on the one hand, and, on the other hand, (b) by the skill of the fowler, amateur or professional.

(a) The partial domestication of the pigeon was already accomplished when Is. 60 8 was written, where the reference in the 'windows' spoken of is clearly to the lattice-like apertures (אֲרֵזִית) of the dove-cote (see LATTICE, § 2). The fowls (צִפְרִית) prepared for Nehemiah's table were probably pigeons and the smaller species of edible birds (Neh. 5 18; cp Ps. 84 3 [4] and Tob. 2 10).

The usual name of the pigeon-house in later times was שֻׁקֵּץ (Shabb. 24 3, Báb bath. 16 and often). Another name was תּוֹרֵן (lit. 'tower'), which suggests the pigeon-towers, so common in certain parts of the East at the present day. The Jews, it would seem, recognised a distinction between the semi-domesticated pigeon, which had its home in the dove-cote or pigeon-house, and the more completely domesticated house-pigeon.

The house-pigeons were called הַרְרִיתִים after Herod, who is said to have introduced them into Judæa. It was permitted on the Sabbath to provide them (along with the geese and poultry) with water, whilst less completely domesticated pigeons, like the bees, were supposed to be able to find water for themselves (Shabb. 24 3). These Herodian pigeons evidently shared the living-room with the family, as is very often the case in the present day, and had their nests in the house (Chull. 12 1).

The art of fattening artificially the goose and other birds used for food was widely practised in ancient

6. Fattening. Egypt. 'The birds were fattened in the same way as the cattle; the fattening bolus was pushed down the throat of the goose in spite of its struggles' (Erman, Egypt, 442). The process here described was not unknown to the Jews, as we see from Shabb. 24 3.

It was forbidden on the Sabbath, however, to feed the poultry in this way. Water might be poured over their bran (מִיֵּי), but kneading or mixing was forbidden, and the animals were to be allowed to feed in the ordinary way (ibid., cp for Passover time Pēṣāh. 2 7).

Hens then as now had the habit of laying outside their proper houses (Chull. 12 1).

The Talmudic precept (Bāba Kammā, 7 7) that poultry may not be reared in Jerusalem 'on account of the holy things' (or 'on account of the sanctuary') must be regarded as a pious dream in view of the express and repeated testimony of the NT. It is just possible, however, that the accompanying prohibition

¹ 'The white of an egg was hardly familiar to the ancient Hebrews, who did not keep fowls' (Di.).

² For the curious discussion to which this treatise owes its name see Delitzsch, Jesus und Hillel, 22 ff.

³ On a hen's egg as a pretended unit of the Hebrew measure of capacity, see Nowack, HA 1 206.

'nor by priests throughout the land of Israel because of (possible) uncleanness' (ibid.) may have been observed by the more scrupulous of the priesthood.

(b) For the supply of the non-domesticated birds, the Jews, like every other ancient people, were dependent on the art of fowling. The wide popularity of fowling may be inferred from the number and variety of the metaphors borrowed from it.

7. Fowling. The psalmists liken the evil machinations of enemies to the fowler's snare (cp Ps. 140₅ [6] 141₉ f. etc.), and the author of Job (e.g., in 187 f.) describes the end of the wicked in metaphors borrowed from fowling and the chase. Indeed, Jesus himself emphasizes the suddenness of his parousia by a simile drawn from the same source (Lk. 21₃₄ f.; see below, § 10).

With regard to the fowler's equipment, the bow and the sling (שֶׁלֶט) — the latter especially in such capable hands as those of the left-handed Benjamites (Judg. 20:16) — at once suggest themselves as possible weapons; but according to Wilkinson the Egyptian fowler used them but seldom.¹

The most effective, however, of all the fowler's apparatus was the NET (שֶׁטֶר, Prov. 17 Hos. 7₁₂ and

8. Nets. often). Fowling nets are of four kinds: the flight-net, which is hung up in a perpendicular position to intercept the birds in their flight; the drag-net (well-known to poachers), which is dragged across the ground where the birds are resting, — Ezekiel probably refers to this species of net (12:13 17:20 32:3); the bag-net, which is hung loosely between two poles, and is still in use in Syria ('The birds alarmed by a lantern held in front of their roosting places at once fall into it'; Tristram, NHB 163); and the most elaborate, and, to judge from the Egyptian practice, the most popular form of fowler's net, the clap-net.

The clap-net was in daily use for securing the geese and other wild-fowl frequenting the marshes of the Delta, and was 'from 10 to 12 ft. long, and about 5 ft. wide.' It was closed at the right moment by means of a rope pulled vigorously, at a signal from the fowler, by four or five attendants (for further details and life-like illustrations see Wilk. 2109 ff., Erman, 236 ff.). The modern reversible horizontal fowler's net, of which a minute and lucid description with detailed illustration will be found in Payne-Gallwey's The Fowler in Ireland, does not differ in principle from the ancient Egyptian, and presumably the Palestinian, clap-net.

The art of trapping birds was doubtless practised by the ancestors of the Hebrews long before the latter entered Caanan. In historic times we

9. Snares: find a variety of traps and snares (cp especially Ps. 140₅ Job 188-10); but two stand out as the trapper's special companions, the mōkēš (מֹקֵשׁ) and the paḥ (פַּח). It is usual to describe the mōkēš as the trigger (the σκάνδαλον or σκανδάληθρον [not in G] of the Greek) on which the bait was placed and by which the spring of the paḥ was released (see Hoffmann, ZA TW 3:101).

This view, however, is dependent on the MT of Amos 3:5_a, which is here inferior to G (i.e., P in 5_a is an intrusion from 5_b). Scarcely less dubious, in the present writer's opinion, is the view adopted in BDB (cp also Driver, Joel and Amos, 158) that mōkēš originally signifies 'bait.'

A careful examination of the biblical data in the light of the practice of fowling among primitive peoples leads to the view that mōkēš is the Hebrew name for the noose or snare known to bird-catchers, young and old, all the world over.

It is thus synonymous with כֶּלֶךְ, kēleḥ (cord) in Ps. 140₅ [6] which may have been used for larger birds — with the מַלְפָּאָה of Mish. Kēlim, 23₅ (see Levy, Lex. s.v.), and with the בַּשֵּׁל of Bāba Ḳammā, 77. The last was clearly a snare by which pigeons were caught, although it could not be set within 30 stadia of an inhabited place, and, according to the Talmud, was made of hair from the tails of horses and cows (Levy, op. cit.).

¹ The use of the sling was almost confined to gardeners and peasants, who thus frightened the birds from the vineyards and fields (Ant. Eg. 1:381). The favourite weapon of the Egyptian sportsman was the throw-stick, a species of boomerang (ib. 2:103).

The paḥ, on the other hand, we take to be a general name for any form of bird-trap.

It need not, therefore, be identified (so Driver, as above) with the special form of trap so frequently depicted on the Egyptian monuments, and explained and illustrated by Wilkinson and Erman.

The most widely distributed form of bird-trap is probably that in which the native elasticity of a twig is utilized (naturally with almost infinite variety of detail) to draw a noose tight round the legs or head of the unwary bird. The free end of the twig, to which the noose is attached, is bent down till it reaches the ground or some other suitable support, to which it is held fast by varying devices. The touch of the bird releases the twig, which rebounds, carrying with it noose and bird through the air. Some such springe was in Amos' mind when he asked: 'Does a bird fall to the ground when there is no snare (set) for him? Does a springe fly up from the ground and take nothing at all?' (35). A still simpler form of trap is also in universal use, and receives in the Mishna the name of קֶלֶב or clap-board.

It consists of a sloping board resting on two or more slender supports, the adjusting of which suits the verb (קֶלֶב וְהַצִּיבֵהוּ) in the difficult verse, Jer. 5:26. When the bird, in search of the bait spread beneath, touches the supports, the board falls and maims or kills the bird (cp the Arab boys' method of trapping partridges in Doughty, Ar. Des. 1:433). Since the success of such an instrument depends on the almost instantaneous fall of the clap-board, the aptness of Jesus' words: 'that day [shall] come upon you suddenly as a snare' (Lk. 21:34) is at once apparent.¹ Other forms of trap, such as the basket-trap, with its funnel-shaped entrance precluding egress, and the trap-cage, in which the bird on alighting frees a spring and shuts itself in, can only be mentioned, as there is no reference to them in OT or NT. We find, however, a solitary reference to the crate (see CAGE) in which the fowler collected the birds which he had netted, trapped, or snared (Jer. 5:27). G in Am. 8:1 f. has ἀγγος lξευτοῦ (fowler's cage?) instead of 'a basket of summer fruit.'

The fowlers of the ancient world early learned the value of decoy birds. It would be out of place here

11. Decoy birds. to enlarge on their use as valuable auxiliaries to the methods of fowling already explained. In the Syria of to-day 'larks, linnets, pigeons, quails, and especially partridges' are employed as decoys (see for details Tristram, NHB 163 f.). The only mention in the older Jewish literature of this mode of fowling is in Ecclesiasticus: 'As a decoy partridge in a cage, so is the heart of a proud man' (11:30 RV).

No fowler's equipment, however, can have been complete without the universal bird-lime (Mishna רֶבֶק ḏēbek).

12. Bird-lime. It was probably made from the cactus or the fig. Pliny gives a recipe for making it from the berries of the mistletoe (HN 16:94). The Jewish fowler smeared with his lime the end of a long rod (מַקְשָׁה), and with this he cautiously approached the birds as they rested, touching them with the point of the rod, to which, of course, they adhered (Shabb. 84).

It only remains to add that by the Jewish Law the fowler, no less than the hunter, when he had brought down a bird that was intended for food, was required to 'pour out the blood thereof and cover it with dust' (Lev. 17:13 f.).

FOX. The Hebrew term šū'al שֹׁאֵל seems to include both 'fox' and 'jackal.'

Hence some writers think that Samson's šū'ālim (Judg. 15.4) may have been jackals, for 300 šū'ālim are said to have been caught by Samson, and this is thought not to accord with zoology (see below). It has also been remarked that jackals may have abounded in Samson's country, for Hasselquist (Voyages and Travels, 1766, p. 119) found 'the little eastern fox jackal in large numbers, near Jaffa. Even Hitzig is not averse to this view, and he accordingly interprets the words of Ps. 44.19 [20] ('that thou hast sore broken us in the place of jackals, RV) as referring to the neighbourhood of Jamnia—not far from Samson's country—where Joseph and Azarias were defeated early in the Maccabean period (1 Macc. 5.56-62). Such rationalistic arguments are quite needless.

If the story in Judg. 15 is a legend, we need not consider the respective claims of the fox and the jackal, and unless any one can prove that Philistia had been laid waste and been given up to jackals, it is useless to argue from Ps. 44.19 [20] that the event referred to is the real occasion of that psalm. Presumably this passage, like so many others, is corrupt.¹ At any rate, in Ps. 63.10 [11] 'jackals' (RV^{ms}) is clearly more correct than 'foxes' (EV), for it is characteristic of the jackal to be ever on the watch for the bodies of the dead. In Neh. 4.3 [3.35] Lam. 5.18, and, according to Cheyne (Ps.⁽²⁾), Ps. 74.14 δ (emended text²), the jackal appears to be referred to. Foxes (ἀλώπηξ), however, are certainly meant in Mt. 8.20 Lk. 9.58 13.32.

There are, according to Tristram, two species of fox inhabiting Palestine: Canis niloticus (the Egyptian fox) and C. flavescens. The former is common in the central and southern regions; the latter is found in the wooded districts round Galilee and in the N. The C. flavescens, however, is regarded by some authorities (e.g., Blandford, Fauna of Brit. Ind.; Mammalia, '88) as simply a local variety of the common fox, C. vulpes, from which it differs in coloration.

The fox, unlike many other species of Canidae, is solitary, and does not associate in packs, which is a point to be considered by translators and commentators (see above). Foxes excavate holes in the ground (Mt. 8.20), in which they live and bring up their litter (usually from four to six) of young. Frequently they take possession of the burrow of some other animal, such as a badger, and thus save themselves the trouble of digging. They are omnivorous. Their fondness for grapes is proverbial (Cant. 2.15), and, when crowded out by the more powerful jackal, they are confined to a vegetable diet. They usually lie concealed during the day; but as evening comes on they make their appearance, and are everywhere to be seen prowling amongst the ruins.

FRANKINCENSE (לְבָנָה); ΛΙΒΑΝΟC, ΛΙΒΑΝΩ-ΤΟC;³ rendered 'frankincense' Ex. 30.34 Lev. 2.1f. 15.f. 5.11 6.15 [3] 24.7 Nu. 5.15 1 Ch. 9.29 Neh. 13.59 Cant. 3.6 4.6⁴ 14 Mt. 2.11 Rev. 18.13, rendered 'incense' [RV 'frankincense'] Is. 43.23 60.6 66.3 Jer. 6.20 17.26 41.5† is a fragrant gum-resin, technically called olibanum (N. Lat., apparently from Ar. al-lubān), which is yielded by trees belonging to certain species of the genus

'For thou hast made us to dwell in dark places,
'And enveloped us in gloom (of Deathland).'

See, however, Duhm, AHC ad loc., who thinks that the 'place of jackals' may be a phrase for the wilderness, and compares 1 Macc. 9.33.62. This, however, does not suit the parallelism.

² Bā. admits that the jackal is referred to, but supposes an obscure allusive term to be used.

³ 'Hast given him for food to a people—dwellers in the wilderness.'

Duhm omits לעֵם לְצִיִּים. Read rather, for לעֵם לְצִיִּים (Che.). Cp BEHEMOTH AND LEVIATHAN, § 2f.

⁴ The latter only twice in ⚔ (1 Ch. 9.29 [BNA]; 3 Macc. 5.2); λίβανος is the word in Mt. 2.11 Rev. 18.13.

Boswellia.¹ These are now met with chiefly in Somaliland about Cape Guardafui; but the most famous growth in ancient times was in the central district of Ḥaḍramaut in S. Arabia. The Heb. k'hōnāh, which denotes whiteness, appropriately refers to the form of milky exudation in which the gum issues from the tree; the same word is found in Arabic (lubān) and has passed into Greek.

Of the two forms in Greek, Lagarde (Mitt. 2.357) holds that λίβανος = a supposed Hebrew לְבָנָה lebhān, and λίβανός = לְבָנָה lebhānōth; he infers that the word had its origin in Hebrew rather than in any of the cognate languages; but it seems more likely that the name arose in the dialect of a people who were acquainted with the tree itself.

Pliny's interesting account of the manner in which the gum is obtained from the tree (12.14) may be compared with the following modern description of the operation as carried out in the Somali country.²

'About the end of February or beginning of March, the Bedouins visit all the trees in succession and make a deep incision in each, peeling off a narrow strip of bark for about five inches below the wound. This is left for a month, when a fresh incision is made in the same place, but deeper. A third month elapses and the operation is again repeated, after which the gum is supposed to have attained a proper degree of consistency. The mountain sides are immediately covered with parties of men and boys, who scrape off the large clear globules into a basket, whilst the inferior quality that has run down the tree is packed separately.'

This mention of two kinds differing in quality reminds us that the frankincense employed in making the holy incense and in connection with the shewbread was a specially 'pure' kind—לְבָנָה יָבֵהּ (k'hōnāh sakkāh).

Wellhausen (Proz.⁽³⁾ 65) and Nowack (HA 2.247) point out the comparative lateness of all the passages where frankincense is mentioned in OT. Still the Egyptians at an early period imported fragrant resins—and among them probably myrrh and frankincense—from the land of 'Punt,'—i.e. (as most scholars agree), Somaliland. Thus in some of the paintings of Deir al-Bahri (see Memoir, Egypt Exploration Fund), trees of the sort that yields these gums are portrayed as being brought to Egypt about the seventeenth century B.C.

In the developed Levitical ritual, frankincense appears with stacte, onycha, and galbanum, as a constituent of the holy incense (Ex. 30.34), and is also placed upon the shewbread (Lev. 24.7), but is oftenest mentioned as an accompaniment of the מִנְחָה, minhāh, or cereal offering (Lev. 2 etc.), with which also it is repeatedly associated in the language of the prophets (Is. 43.23 66.3 Jer. 17.26 41.5). The offering of which it forms a part, and in one place (Lev. 24.7) the frankincense itself, is called an אֲזָכָרָה, askārāh (EV 'memorial,' but the root idea may be that of fragrance; see SACRIFICE). The S. Arabian origin of the frankincense known to the Hebrews is indicated in Is. 60.6 Jer. 6.20. Naturally frankincense and myrrh are often mentioned together (Cant. 3.6 4.6 Mt. 2.11 etc.). Cp MYRRH. N. M.

FRIEND (רֵעֵה; ἑταῖρος), a title applied to Ahuzzath, a courtier of Abimelech, Gen. 26.26 (רֵעֵה || שָׂר צִבְיָה; ἑταῖρος); to Hushai the Archite (constantly), 2 S. 15.37 16.16 (רֵעֵה), 1 Ch. 27.33 (רֵעֵה); ΦΙΛΟC; but see HUSHAI); and to Zabud ben Nathan, 1 K. 4.5 (רֵעֵה), who was also probably called סֵכֵן, 'chief minister' or 'administrator' (see MINISTER, CHIEF).

In Gen. 26.26 (and elsewhere) רֵעֵה should probably be רֵעֵה, 'kinsman.' The title 'friend' often occurs in 1 and 2 Macc.—e.g., 1 Macc. 2.18 'so shalt thou and thy house be in the number of the king's Friends' (cp 2 Macc. 7.24). This is a bribe held out to Mattathias. 2 Macc. 10.65: 'And the king gave him honour, and entered him among his Chief Friends' (καὶ ἐποίησεν φίλον); Jonathan is referred to. It was a title in use at the courts of the Ptolemies and the Seleucidæ (cp Polyb. xxxi. 3.7); ⚔ thought of it in rendering מַלְאָכִים, 'princes', by φίλοι, 'friends' (Esth. 13 218 69; cp 1 Esd. 8 28). It must not be considered a novelty. Diodorus (16 50) speaks of the 'friends' of Artaxerxes; from Persia the title was adopted by Alexander. A similar title was also in use at the court of the old Egyptian kings, where there were several grades of Friends (Maspero, RP⁽²⁾ 18).

The title may have lingered on traditionally in Palestine from the long-past Egyptian rule; at any rate, there were kings of countries adjoining Judah who must have adopted this court-title before David. The name was not merely honorific; the friends of David and Solomon were those whom ties of race or of personal gratitude had made absolutely devoted to the king; hence the surprise of Absalom in 2 S. 16¹⁷ (see HUSHAI). T. K. C.

FRINGES, the EV rendering of מַלְאָכִים, g'dilim (ΣΤΡΕΠΤΑ [BAFL], funicula [Vg. adding in fimbriis]). According to D, they were to be worn by every Israelite upon the four borders (kinniph, קַנִּיף, ΚΡΑΠΤΕΔΟΝ) of the garment as a distinctive mark (Dt. 22¹²). The RVmg. 'twisted threads' is probably better (cp Dr. ad loc., Bab. gidlu, 'a string' [e.g., of onions]); the word is used in 1 K. 7 17† of festoons of chain-work upon the capitals of columns. Corresponding to this is the law in Nu. 15^{37 ff.} (P, or perhaps in particular H [Dr.]) which goes more into detail over the nature and object of these appendages.

This law enacts that מַלְאָכִים (מַצֵּצ, Sam. מַצֵּצִים, EV 'fringes' RVmg. tassels, κράσπεδα, fimbriae) are to be worn upon the borders (קַנִּיף, περὶ γωνία RVmg. 'corners') and that upon the קַנִּיף (מַצֵּצ, κράσπε. τὸν περ.) is to be set a blue cord.¹ There can be little doubt that here again in spite of the RVmg. is preferable, and that מַצֵּצִים, mişith (in Ezek. 8 3† 'lock' of hair) is to be connected with מַצֵּצ, a 'flower' (Is. 40 6 etc.).²

The Jewish tallith (טלית) of later times, an oblong cloth with a hole in the middle for the head, and its tassel at each corner, is well known.³ Its excessive size led to Christ's rebuke (Mt. 23 5); but the form of the forerunner of the tallith in post-exilic and pre-exilic times must remain uncertain.

Jehu's tribute-bearers, portrayed upon the black obelisk of Shalmaneser II. (860-824 B.C.), wear a garment with a sort of fringed border (see illust. Moore, SBOT, 'Judges,' ET 58) similar to those depicted in Assyria (cp Perrot-Chippiez, Art. in Chald. 2 221, fig. 118); and fringed borders were not unknown in Egypt (see Wilk. Anc. Eg. 2 174 f., 323 and 324, figs. 1 7 9),⁴ and W. Asia (see WMM As. u. Eur. 341 [Champ. 191]). The early existence of tassels is nevertheless vouched for by representations found upon the ruins at Persepolis (see Riehm, HWB 1 898), and by the pictures of Asiatic tributaries depicted upon the tomb of Rekhmara (see As. u. Eur. 297 [Leps. Denkm. 116], 299 [Leps. Denkm. 136]; and more fully Wilk. 1, pl. ii. 8). It is interesting to observe that these tassels (in some cases numbering five) are coloured blue.

The origin of the custom of wearing such appendages is not clear. That originally, like the frontlets, the fringes had a sacred significance, is not improbable; Robertson Smith acutely finds an analogy in the goat-skins (agides) fringed with thongs worn by Libyan women. He also compares the old Ar. rahf or hauf, a girdle or short kilt of skin slashed into thongs, worn by some women and also by worshippers at the Kaaba (Rel. Sem.⁽²⁾ 437). See DRESS, § 7, and cp TUNIC.

The tallith is usually made of wool or silk, with a striped border. Many Jews also wear under their clothes an oblong scarf of wool, with an opening for the head. The scarf hangs over back and breast, and fringes are added at its four corners' (hence the name of the garment אַרְבַּע בְּנוֹתֵי הַפִּינְגֵרִים).

FROG (צְבָרָה; ΒΑΤΡΑΧΟΣ). Frogs are mentioned as one of the plagues of Egypt (Ex. 7 27 [8 2] ff. etc.), and in Rev. 16 13 workers of false miracles are virtually likened to frogs.

Various species of Anurous Amphibians are found both in Egypt and in Palestine; we can hardly venture to single out the Rana esculenta, or edible frog, as that referred to in the Bible.

FRONTLETS (טֹפְטוֹת; ἈΔΑΛΕΥΤΟΝ [BAFL], ἈΔΑΛΕΥΤΑ [L] in Dt. in allusion apparently to their being firmly bound). In Dt. 6 8 f. (cp 11 18) it is commanded: 'thou shalt bind [these my words] for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes, and thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates.' The corresponding expressions in Ex. 13 9 (וְזָכָרְךָ), 16 (טֹפְטוֹת), a passage closely related to Deuteronomy, are plainly metaphorical; but in the present instance the context (writing upon the door-posts and gates) makes it quite clear that by טֹפְטוֹת, frontlets, certain external sacred signs are intended (see CUTTINGS, § 7). In the last resort the origin of these 'frontlets' (as of קוֹנוֹת, the boxes fastened on the doors) is to be sought in the use of amulets which prevailed among the old Israelites as a matter of course, and, as it could not be wholly done away with, was in this way turned to holier purposes.

In later Judaism also, frontlets were employed as amulets (see below). The Jewish interpreters, accordingly, are not far wrong when they find the use of phylacteries of some kind already alluded to in Prov. 8 3 6 2†; in any case we must at least suppose a literal binding of words of the law round the neck to be meant. On the other hand, however, Ezek. 24 17 (רִמְסֵי) is to be understood as referring to a head-tire or TURBAN (g.v.), and not, as the rabbins held, to prayer-bands (cp Jer. on Ezek. 24 17, Rosenm. on Ex. 13 16). The Karaites, however, explain the passages in Dt. figuratively; as also do the older Christian interpreters (Jer., Lyra, Calvin, Grotius), and, among the moderns, Hengstenberg, Knobel, and others.

We do not know when out of the law in Dt. first arose the standing practice in accordance with which every one at morning and evening prayer (except on Sabbaths and festivals) was required to wear the two prayer-bands known in the Talmud as תְּפִלִּין and in Greek as φυλακτήρια (Mt. 23 5). In the form in which it still prevails the custom cannot be traced further back than to the first century B.C. These tēphillin consist of two leather satchels or capsules each fastened to a band. The one band (רֶדֶת תְּפִלָּה שֶׁל יָד) is fastened by the worshipper round his left arm so as to bring the satchel towards his heart; the arm after receiving the tēphillah is again covered with the sleeve. The other band (שֶׁפֶלֶא תְּפִלָּה שֶׁל רֶגֶל) is so fastened round the head as to bring the satchel into position between the eyebrows. The satchel of the head-tēphillah is divided into four compartments in which severally are placed four strips of parchment containing certain words of the law (Ex. 13 1-10 11-16 Dt. 4 9 11 13-21).

The satchel of the arm-tēphillah is simple, containing a single parchment slip on which the same passages are written. Jesus censures it in the Pharisees, as characteristic of their tendency to dwell on the external acts of worship and to vain display of piety, that they 'made broad their phylacteries' (Mt. 23 5)—that is, that they wore the satchels larger and the bands broader than was customary.

The rabbins hold the tēphillin in special sanctity and place them, in their reverence, almost on a level with the sacred writings (Yad. 8 3); like these, they may be rescued from a fire on the Sabbath day (Shabb. 16 1). They are holier than the frontal of the high priest's מִצְרֵה (g.v.), inasmuch as this last contains the name יְהוָה only once, whilst on the tēphillin in the aggregate it occurs twenty-three times. They are held to be highly effectual in protecting against demons; whence their name φυλακτήρια (amulets; see Targ. Cant. 8 3). They are sworn by, by touching them. God himself, in the Talmudic view, wears tēphillin, swearing by them when he swears by his holy arm. Such being the sacredness attached to phylacteries, it is easy to understand why their production and application should have become matter of minute and elaborate prescription down to the minutest detail. They ought to be so arranged as to represent the divine name Shaddai (יהוה); the head-satchel contains, upon two little pieces of wood, a three-cornered and a four-cornered ψ ; the loop of the head-band is so arranged upon the neck as to figure a γ ; the loop of the arm-band represents ν .

Only male Israelites of thirteen years old and upwards may wear phylacteries; women, lepers, mourners, and unclean persons of every kind are forbidden to do so. In putting them on and taking them off they ought to be kissed.

FRUIT TREES, FRUIT. From the settlement in Palestine onwards fruit was an element of the first importance in the dietary of the Hebrews. That this is true of the later days of the monarchy is sufficiently evident from the injunction of the Dt. code requiring the trees in the orchards of a besieged city to be spared¹ (Dt. 20 19), which so strikingly contrasts with the unscrupulous procedure of an earlier age (2 K. 3 19 25). The most convincing evidence, however, of the large place filled by fruit in the social and religious economy of Judaism is supplied by the rules so painfully elaborated in numerous Talmudic treatises for the use, under religious sanction, of the fruits of the field and of the tree (see references below, passim).

Canaan was, from early times, distinguished as 'a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig trees and pomegranates; a land of oil olives and honey' (Dt. 8 8). To the fruit trees here specified Joel adds the palm tree and the

1. Lists of fruit trees. More extensive lists are found in later Jewish literature—as, e.g., in the Mishna treatises Pē'ē (1 5) and Ma'āsēroth (1 2 f.).

Ma'āsēroth mentions, as subject to tithes, figs, grapes (two varieties), sumach (? see below, § 14), sycamine berries, pomegranates, dates, peaches, nuts, almonds, carob beans, pears (two varieties), quinces, and medlars; these, as in all probability in use in Palestine in NT times, will be briefly noticed here, along with some others, such as the tappūāh, the sycamore fig, and the citron. A still more extended list of fruit trees is given in the so-called 'Alphabet of Ben Sira' (11th cent.; cp Schür. Hist. 5 28, CJPI (3) 3 161). Ben Sira, in reply to a test question put by Nebuchadrezzar as to the number of trees in the royal garden, replies, 'There are thirty varieties: ten bear fruit which is entirely edible, ten fruit of which only the inner portion may be eaten, and ten fruit of which only the outer portion may be eaten.'²

Before we proceed to inquire into the use of the individual fruits, let us notice the law regulating the

2. Legislation.³ date from which the owner of an orchard might enjoy its produce. By the legislation of H (Lev. 19 23 ff.), all food trees (ψ and γ) or fruit trees (ψ and γ); so always in P) were to be allowed three years to come to maturity. The fruit during that period was technically said to be 'uncircumcised'; hence the title of the treatise 'Orlah' (ψ , 'foreskin'), comprising the later Talmudic legislation on this subject. The fruit of the fourth year⁴ was to be exclusively reserved as an offering to God, and only from the fifth year onwards was the owner free to employ the fruit for his own use (Lev. 19 23-25; cp Dt. 20 6).

The first place among the fruit trees of Palestine must be given to the vine (for varieties, mode of cultivation, etc., see VINE). Although the greater

3. The vine. part of the produce of the vineyards was made into wine (see WINE), whence wine was spoken of as 'the fruit of the vine' par excellence (Mt. 26 29 and parallels; ψ of contemporary Hebrew, Mish. Ber. 6 1), grapes were as much relished as among ourselves. They appear as an article of commerce alongside of wine in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 13 15).

In the Mishna (Midd. 9 11) it is said of wine that 'some is red (ψ) and some is black (ψ).' The dark red grapes suggested the phrase 'blood of the grape' for wine¹ (Gen. 49 11 Dt. 32 14 Ecclus. 39 26 50 15), and comparisons like those in Is. 63 2 f. Rev. 14 20 etc.

The pure juice of the grape also is once described as 'the blood of grapes' (1 Macc. 6 34). The bunches or clusters of grapes (see GRAPE) were gathered in baskets (see BASKET) to be carried to the wine-press or to market (so too in Egypt; Wilk. Anc. Eg. [78] 1 379 ff.). Under certain restrictions, passers-by could help themselves from their neighbour's vineyard (Dt. 23 24 [25])—a privilege afterwards extended to other fruits (Ma'āsēroth. 2 7); fallen grapes were the perquisite of the poor and of the resident alien (Lev. 19 10). The Pharaoh is represented as drinking the juice of the grape pressed by hand into the cup (Gen. 40 11). To squeeze the grape for this purpose, even to drink the juice that flowed out of itself, was forbidden on the Sabbath (Shabb. 22 1). This 'liquor of grapes' (Nu. 6 3 RV) was forbidden—as were also grapes themselves—to those under the Nazirite vow (Nu. 6 1 ff.). The Mosaic legislation is in this point more drastic than the Mohammedan, which allows the use of the grape whilst forbidding wine (Koran, 2 216 5 92).

At the present day in Syria large quantities of grape juice are hoiled down to make grape syrup or grape honey (Ar. dibs = ψ , dībāš), the sapa and defrutum of Pliny (NH 14 11). This seems to be referred to in such passages as Gen. 43 11 Ezek. 27 17 (see HONEY, § 1 [3]).

In addition to the grape in its natural state, the Hebrews from early times made large use of raisins

4. Dried grapes. (simmiqim, ψ , σταφίδες), the 'dried grapes' of Nu. 6 3.

The freshly gathered grapes were laid out, precisely as at the present day (see Van Lenep, Bible Lands, etc., 111), to be dried by the hot sun. The flat house-top or other suitable spot (ψ , see Levy, NHWB, s.v.) was spread with leaves (Mish. Tōharōth, 10 4 f.), on which the grapes were dried in clusters. It is possible that, as at the present day, they were previously dipped in a strong lye (cp the elaborate processes mentioned by Pliny, NH 14).

In the form of raisins, the grapes were more convenient for transport, and hence, as we might expect, we find raisins appreciated by travellers and soldiers on the march (1 Ch. 12 40). Thus Abigail brought 'an hundred clusters of raisins' to David and his men (1 S. 25 18, cp 30 12), and the servant of Mephibosheth the same number (2 S. 16 1) with 'an hundred of summer fruits' (ψ , for which see below, § 10).

Raisins are now exported in considerable quantities from Es-Salt, Damascus, and other parts of Syria (ZDPI 11 174). In ancient and in modern times we find an inferior sort of wine prepared from raisins (see WINE AND STRONG DRINK).

Among the accompaniments of Baal worship Hosea (3 1) mentions ψ (ψ πέμματα μετὰ σταφίδος)

5. Fruit cakes. [ψ]; Vg. vinacia warum). 'Āšīšāh' (without ψ , 'grapes') occurs also in 2 S. 6 19 (|| 1 Ch. 16 3), Cant. 2 5 and Is. 16 7; RV everywhere renders it 'cake (or cakes) of raisins,' or 'raisins'

¹ Cp, however, WRS Rel. Sem. (2) 230.

² The word (cp Ezek. 26 5 47 10) corresponds to the Arab. mīšāh. One such 'spreading place' stood in the midst of the vineyards of et-Tā'if (Kazwini, 2 64, quoted by Jacob, Altarabisches Beduinenleben, 97). In modern Arabic safaḥa is 'to spread out figs or grapes.'

FRUIT TREES, FRUIT

(Cant. 25; mg. 'cakes of raisins'), or 'raisin-cakes' (Is. 167; mg. 'foundations'). Let us [first] try to explain the word on the assumption that MT is correct.

1. Robertson Smith (MS note on Hos. 31) would identify the āššāh with the later חֲבִיט, hābīṣ, which was a confection of flour, honey (חֲבִיט), and oil. 'A cake baked with grape honey' would be almost, if not quite, the same as the חֲבִיט. Most scholars, however, since Gesenius, have explained it 'a cake of pressed raisins' like the albhelim or 'fig cakes' (see below, § 7). Perhaps a better explanation is 'a cake of flour kneaded with grapes (or with grape juice, which would ferment in the process of baking).' This suits the reference in Cant. 25, where a restorative is clearly meant. Such grape cakes would correspond to the cakes still used at festivals in Cyprus ('Isa. SBOT 170). The following are the grounds of this explanation:—

(a) The Greek translators, in all cases probably, understood a cake of mixed ingredients. Thus we find λάγανον ἀπὸ ἴγγανου, a 'girdle cake' (ΘΒΑΛ 2 S. 619), and ἀμορ(ε)ίτης ΘΒΝΑ (1 Ch. 163; ΘΛ λάγανον ἴγγανου), a cake made of ἀμόρα, which Athenæus and Hesychius define as 'fine flour baked with honey' (μειλίττωμα).¹ (b) The Mishna speaks of עִשְׂמֵי, which the Gemara explains as lentils cooked with honey (see Levy, op. cit.). (c) Tg. Ps.-Jon. uses the Aramaic form to render עִשְׂמֵי (Exod. 1631), which was clearly a species of sweet cake or confection. (d) Offerings of sweet cakes are common to many ancient cults (see the commentators on Jer. 7 18 44 19, and cp QUEEN OF HEAVEN). (e) The Jews of a late time were familiar with the practice of mixing dough with the juice of various fruits (פִּירוֹת), an expression frequent in the Mishna, which acted as leaven (Tērūmōth, 51 ff.; Challah, 22).

2. [No adequate philological justification, however, having been found for āššāh, 'cake,' it is legitimate to regard the word as probably corrupt.

In 2 S. 619 1 Ch. 163 the degree of probability is very great (the corruptness of עִשְׂמֵי just before is undeniable, and it is not much less in the other places. The emendations called for in the several passages are plain. David presents each Israelite with 'a cake of bread, a piece of flesh (חֶמֶד), and a sāh of lentils' (עִשְׂמֵי); cp the Mishna passage above cited (1 [6]). The bride (Cant. 25) asks to be 'stayed' or 'refreshed' with lilies (חֲבִיט), not with 'raisin-cakes.' Evidently something which grows in the garden is meant, and the context points to 'lilies' (ll tappūhim—i.e., 'quinces,' see APPLE, § 2 [4]). The Moabites in the elegy (Is. 167) mourn, not for the raisin-cakes, but, as the context shows, for the 'fruit harvest' (פִּירוֹת) of Kir-hareseth; and the Israelites (Hos. 3 1) who 'look to other gods' would hardly be said to 'love cakes of raisins,'—'Ashērīm and Ḥammanīm' are the right words (—i.e., עִשְׂמֵי, not עִשְׂמֵי). The emendation of Hos. 3 1 is due to Grätz (cp Is. 178 279). These are instructive specimens of necessary emendation. The lexicon loses one word (חֲבִיט); but the exegesis of five passages gains. A reference to the use of 'sweet cakes made of pressed grapes and flour' (SBOT 'Isa.' 170, after Ohnefalsch-Richter) at festivals does not by any means prove the correctness of the disputed words. Such cakes would probably have been called עִשְׂמֵי, or possibly חֲבִיט; such a word as חֲבִיט, 'cake,' lacks philological justification.—T. K. C.]

Next to the vine, among the fruit-bearing trees, stands the fig tree, 'the sister of the vine,' as a Greek poet

6. Fig tree. has called it (συκὴν μέλαιναν, ἀμπέλου κασιγνήτην: Hipponax, quoted by Hehn, Kulturpfl. u. Hausti. (6) 94). These two are repeatedly named together in the OT (see FIG, which see also for varieties raised, time of ripening, etc.). As an article of diet, indeed, figs must have been even more prominent than grapes, the range of their season being greater, although Josephus declares that about the Sea of Galilee figs and grapes alike were procurable for ten months of the year (B. J. iii. 108). The place of the fig among the staple articles of food in NT times is well shown by the fact that, in the case of a fire on the Sabbath day, only three necessities of life were to be rescued, viz., a basket of loaves, a cake of dried figs, and a jar of wine (Shabb. 163; cp FRONTLETS, end).

¹ The reading ἐν αὐροίς (BNAČ) of Cant. 25 is probably a corruption of ἀμώραίς. In Isaiah all the Greek versions are at a loss.

The unripe figs (חֲבִיט, pl. חֲבִיטִים Cant. 213; δλυσθοι [BNAČ]; NT only Rev. 613; but see BETHPHAGE) were of course not edible; but as soon as they began to take on colour, they might, like half-ripe grapes, be eaten with bread (Shēbi. 47 f.). The early fig (חֲבִיט, bikkūrah), which appears on last year's wood, was clearly a choice delicacy, as we see from Is. 284, where the prophet speaks of the 'firstripe fig, which when he that looketh upon it seeth, while it is yet in his hand he eateth it up' (RV), and from the comparison in Jer. 242, 'very good figs, like the figs that are first ripe' (חֲבִיטִים הַקְּבִירֹת); cp Mic. 7 1 Hos. 910). When ripe the early figs were easily shaken from the tree (Nah. 312). The ordinary summer fig (חֲבִיט, enāh, LXX and NT σῦκον—the tree is συκή) was a favourite in all periods of Hebrew history. The Hebrews at Kadesh missed the figs, vines, and pomegranates of Egypt (Nu. 205); the 'sweetness' and 'good fruit' of the fig were appreciated in the rough days of the Judges (Judg. 911); references abound in the prophets, whilst figs appear with grapes and wine in the markets of Jerusalem (Neh. 1315) after the exile. In the first two centuries of our era—the period covered by the NT and the Mishna—figs were still one of the first articles of diet (see, for the Gospels, Lk. 136 f. Mt. 7 16 21 19 f. Mk. 11 13 f. etc., and the Mishna passim). Jewish prisoners at Rome in the time of Josephus lived on figs and nuts (Jos. 1. 1. 3).

Of the varieties of figs mentioned in the Mishna two are specially interesting, the so-called dark (חֲבִיטִים) and pale (חֲבִיטִים) figs (Tērūmōth, 479). These—more correctly dark purple and green—were, according to Hehn (op. cit. 96), the favourite varieties of ancient times, corresponding to the neri and bianchi of the present day. 'The latter (he adds) are the sweeter and therefore better adapted for drying; the former, of greater acidity, are eaten fresh.'

Figs dried in the same manner as raisins were termed gērōgrōth (sing. חֲבִיטִים, see Levy, NHWB, s. v., with Fleischer's note, 436 f.).

7. Dried figs. As ισχάδες and caricæ they were certainly the most extensively used of all fruits' (Daremberg et Saglio, Dict. d. Antig., s. v. 'Cibaria,' 1150 b) among the Greeks and Romans. They were not less popular among the Jews, to judge from their frequent recurrence in the Mishna.

Although, as it happens, they are not mentioned in OT or NT, we do find mentioned an equally popular mode of preserving figs by pressing them into a cake (חֲבִיט, albhelah, παλάθη), which was allowed to harden and was thus easily transported. This method of treating figs was known in Egypt from very early times (Maspero, Dawn of Civilisation, 66). Two hundred fig-cakes formed part of Abigail's present to David (1 S. 25 18; cp 30 12), and, as we should expect, they formed part of a soldier's rations (1 Ch. 12 40). One such fig-cake Judith took with her to the camp of Holofernes (Judith 10 5, EV 'lumps of figs').

When round in shape the fig-cake was termed עִנְוִל (Mishna frequently), also עִנְוִל עִנְוִל (Shēbi. 12); when square חֲבִיטִים (see Tērūm. 48), from the name of the brick-shaped mould (cp 2 S. 12 31; Kr. Nah. 3 14). From the Mishna we learn further that the albhelah or fig-cake was so hard as to require to be cut with an axe (Shabb. 17 2).

A slice cut off (חֲבִיט, in late Hebrew, חֲבִיטָה) was given to a sick 'Egyptian' (see MIZRAIM, § 2 b) by David's men (1 S. 30 12).

One interesting use of the fig (although scarcely falling under the head of food) remains to be mentioned—viz., the medicinal. Pliny has much to say regarding the medicinal properties of the fig (H. V. 2363 f.), and in the OT we find Isaiah prescribing a lump or cake of figs (חֲבִיטִים חֲבִיטִים, παλάθη [ἐκ] σῦκων) as a poultice for Hezekiah's boil (Is. 38 21 = 2 K. 20 7).

Next of kin, though not in importance, to the fig (Ficus carica) is the fruit of the sycomore or fig-mulberry

8. Sycomore. (Ficus sycomorus). For the nomenclature in Hebrew and Greek, and for the process by which the fruit is rendered edible, see SYCOMORE (for illustrations of fruit and fruit instruments see Henslow, The Plants of the Bible, 89).

FRUIT TREES, FRUIT

The fruit of the sycamore was formerly held in high esteem by the Egyptians. Hence its use in the service of the altar (see Wilkinson, Anc. Eg., 78, 349, illustration, and especially Ohnefalsch-Richter, Kypros, pl. 71). At the present day, on the other hand, 'it is only the poorest, as well as children and dogs, that eat the sycamore figs' (Henslow, op. cit. 91). By the Jews the tree was, like the carob tree, valued more for its wood than for its figs (see the proof from the Talmud quoted by Anderlind in his essay on the fruit trees of modern Syria, ZDPV 11 100), which are said to be 'insipid or woody' to the taste.

The allied sycamine (Morus nigra, Lk. 176; see SYCAMINE) is still cultivated everywhere for its delicious berries (Post, Flora, 729; ZDPV 118: f.) under the name of tūt shāmi (Heb. תות, Ma'āsēr. 12). Their juice is of a bright blood-red colour, the αἶμα μόρων (EV 'mulberries') of 1 Macc. 6:34, by the sight of which the elephants of Antiochus were provoked to fight.

Returning to the more important fruit trees, we meet first with the olive (תאנא, see OLIVE for details of culture, etc.), the chief economic value of which is indicated by the fuller name it sometimes receives in the OT, the oil olive (תאנא, Dt. 88; cp 2 K. 18:32). See OIL. From the earliest times to the present day the 'olive berries' (Jas. 3:12, AV for ἐλαίαι) were beyond all doubt an important article of diet, although, singularly enough, there is no biblical reference to their use.¹ The fruit was plucked by the hand—the method recommended by Roman writers on arboriculture (cp Pliny, HN 15:3)—from the lower branches at least (תאנא, hence תאנא, the olive harvest, Chall. 39), or the branches were shaken or beaten (תאנא, Dt. 24:20 Is. 27:12), probably with a long wand (cp Pliny, 'harundine levi ictu'), care being taken not to injure the tree. Hence the 'beating of the olive trees' (תאנא, nōkeph sāyith, Is. 17:6 24:13) became synonymous with 'olive harvest.'

The Mishna distinguishes between olives of three sorts according to their destination (Térim. 18: f.)—viz., olives destined for the oil-press, olives for preserving, and olives for eating (cp 2:6, תאנא ותאנא ותאנא). The last-named must always have been the exception. The poor man would no doubt be glad to have the berry, even in its natural state, to eat with his morsel of bread, or dipped in salt (Ma'āsēr. 4:3). Such were probably the dry olives (תאנא) of Teb. Yōm 36. The usual way, however, as in all countries, and in all periods, was to lay the olives to soak in brine (תאנא, Mišwā'ōsh, 7:2). For this purpose, at the present day, the brine is formed by adding salt to water till an egg can float on it (Anderlind, ZDPV 11:72). The olives are left for a period of twenty to thirty days (according to the native authority quoted by Landberg, Prov. et Dict. etc. 16), at the end of which time they are soft and palatable.

Another method, also still practised in Palestine, was first to crush the olives (תאנא, Ter. 10:7 Ma'āsēr. 4:1, and often in Mishna; for the term cp Dt. 23:2[1]), then to place them in a jar and preserve by the addition of salt.² The berries seem to have been occasionally pickled—the technical term for which is תאנא—with the leaves ('Ušs. 2:5). From these and many other passages in the Mishna we are well entitled to affirm that the use of olives as a relish to the poor man's bread, and as a table requisite for the rich, was as universal among the Hebrews as among the other peoples of antiquity.

The same remark holds good of the fruit of the palm tree. Judæa, according to the testimony of classical

10. Palm tree. writers (Horace, Pliny, Tacitus), was famous in the ancient world for its palm trees and its dates, yet, if we were to argue from the silence of the Bible, we should have to maintain that dates were never seen on a Jewish table. The word does not occur in EV, except once in the margin of AV as a mistaken alternative for honey (2 Ch. 31:5).

¹ In every passage of the OT where תאנא signifies the fruit of the olive (as, e.g., Mic. 6:15) the reference is to its oil-producing properties.

² See Buxtorf's Lex. s.v. for the later Hebrew termini technici for the gathering of the chief kinds of fruit.

³ For further details of present-day methods, see the references given above to Landberg and Anderlind.

Ⓞ^{BA} also in one passage (2 S. 16:1 f.) gives φοίνικες, dates, as the rendering of תאנא, usually rendered 'summer fruit' generally. Joel, however, ranks the palm with the vine and the fig among the fruit-trees of the land (1:12).¹ In this, as in similar cases, the later testimony of the Mishna must be admitted as throwing light on the habits and tastes of preceding centuries, although the abundance of other fruit prevented the date from assuming the same unique place in the dietary of the Hebrews as it had in that of the ancient Egyptians (Wilk. op. cit. 1:398 f.), and still has in that of the Bedouin of modern Arabia, who live for weeks at a time on dates and milk.

Still it is significant that in one passage of the Mishna three varieties of dates are mentioned as forbidden to be sold to the heathen, one of them the famous Nicolaus date, so named by Augustus after the friend of Herod, Nicolaus of Damascus, who, on the occasion of a visit to Rome, had presented the emperor with dates of this choice species (cp Pliny, HN 13:9). Pliny also connects with Palestine two other varieties, the Caryote and the Chydaoi (ibid.).

Dates (תאנא, תאנא; also תאנא, from which it has been proposed to derive date through δάκτυλος), like figs, were eaten either in their fresh state,² or dried in clusters (Teb. Yōm 36), or pressed in the form of cakes. To secure the fruit it is necessary to climb the tree and let down the clusters by a rope (see the description of the date-gathering at Teima in Doughty, Ar. Des. 1:557 f.; cp Plin. 13:7). The dates were dried on the housetop, or on some other exposed flat surface such as the threshing-floor (Fleischer in Levy, op. cit. i. 437 b), the better sorts being used for dessert (cp Xen. Anab. ii. 3:15). According to Doughty, dates eaten alone as a meal are 'overheating and inwardly fretting' (op. cit. 1:148). Pressed date-cakes of great antiquity have been found in Egypt (see illustration, Wilk. 2:43), and they are still the most convenient form for export and for travellers. It has even been suggested that תאנא should be rendered 'date-cakes' in 2 S. 16:1 f. (Nowack, HA 1:113).

The oriental practice of eating the sweet, juicy crown or 'cabbage' of the growing palm (τὸν ἐνκέφαλον τοῦ φοίνικος) is known to us from Xenophon (Anab. ii. 3:16), who was also aware that it meant the destruction of the tree. It was also known to the later Jews (Mishna, 'Ušs. 3:7), whose rabbis were much exercised as to whether the 'cabbage' (הדר, הדרא, תאנא, תאנא) should be classed as fruit or as vegetable (Löw, 1:16 f.). On the much-esteemed date-syrup see HONEY, § 1 (3). Dates were also one of the principal fruits from which wine and vinegar were prepared (see WINE).

The pomegranate (תאנא, ῥόα; for description of fruit see POMEGRANATE) remains to complete the choicest productions of Canaan (Dt. 88). The 11. Pomegranate. tree is represented in the tombs of Egypt (illustration therefrom, Wilkinson, op. cit. 1:376), and the Hebrews are said to have there enjoyed its fruit (Nu. 20:5). The pomegranate might be eaten in its natural state (cp Cant. 4:3: 'thy temples are like a piece [תאנא, perhaps 'slice'; but see Wetzstein in Del. Comm. in loc. of a pomegranate'), or it might be first cut up and dried in the sun (Ma'āsēr. 16; see תאנא in Levy and the Tosephta quoted in Surenhusius in loc.; another interpretation [Maimonides] explains the word as the seeds of the pomegranate; so also Löw, 363). The somewhat acid juice of the pomegranate mixed with water is a favourite cooling drink in the East. A species of 'sweet wine' (תאנא, νῆμα ῥόων [BNA]) also was prepared from this fruit (Cant. 8:2); Pliny calls it 'rhoites' (HN 14:19).

With the pomegranate is associated, in Joel's list of fruit-trees (1:12), the much-debated תאנא (תאנא), which is not improbably used somewhat loosely in the

² For the special Hebrew names for the various kinds of dates (e.g., תאנא, the fresh ripe date, תאנא, the dried date), see Löw, op. cit. 1:22-4.

FRUIT TREES, FRUIT

OT to include the apple, quince, pomegranate, etc. (but cp APPLE).¹ As a fruit the

12. Apple, quince, pear, apricot, citron, etc. tappūh is spoken of as sweet to the taste (Cant. 23), as of a pleasant smell (78), and as a favourite restorative (25, 'comfort me with apples'). It was one of the commonest fruits in NT times (see Mishna passim). Besides its ordinary table use, the juice was used to mix and leaven dough (Terum. 102). Cider or apple-wine (תַּבְּיָן) was a favourite drink (Nid. 69 Tērām. 112 f.). The quince (Cydonia vulgaris), which many authorities since Celsius have identified with the tappūh of the Bible, was named תַּבְּיָן by the later Jews. It can scarcely have been eaten raw, like the apple, but only when made into a preserve. That it was so treated we know from an attempted etymology of the word in Talm. Jer. (see Levy, s.v., and Löw, 144). The name χρυσόμηλον for the quince (see Pliny, 1510) suggests the 'golden apples' of the Hesperides (quinces according to Hehn), and the 'apples of gold in baskets of silver' of Prov. 2511 (RV).² In several Talmudic lists of fruit trees, the quince follows the pear (Pirus communis, תַּבְּיָן), many varieties of which were known to the ancients, and are still grown in the orchards of Syria (Post, Flora, 309). This fact notwithstanding, the Greek translators were mistaken in identifying the baca tree (תַּבְּיָן; see MULBERRY TREE) with the pear tree (δῆλιος, 1 Ch. 1414 [B^{CA}]), a mistake repeated in Vg. both in this passage and in 2 S. 523 f. (so also Aq. in v. 23; but Aq. Symm. in v. 24 φουρρησις). Pliny has much to say of the methods in vogue in his day for preserving apples and pears; both of these were sometimes boiled with wine and water to make a preserve to be eaten with bread (pulmentarii vicem), 'a preparation never made of any other fruit with the exception of quinces' (NH 1517; cp 'Cibaria' in Dar. and Saglio, op. cit.).³

The introduction of the citron (Citrus medica cedra, תַּבְּיָן), as of various other Eastern fruits, was one of the many results of Alexander's conquest of the East (see Hehn and Candolle, op. cit.).

Our earliest witnesses to its cultivation among the Jews are perhaps the copper coins usually assigned to Simon the Maccabee (circa 138 B.C.), on which an ethrāg (citron) figures either alone or with other accompaniments of the solemn procession at the feast of Tabernacles (see TABERNACLES). In view of the uncertainty as to the real date of these coins, all the more importance attaches to the incident related by Josephus from the reign of Alexander Jannæus (104-78 B.C.). His angry subjects are said to have pelted him with their citrons (επιρῖους, Ant. xiii. 185). The fruit is too sour ever to have been in request, except as a preserve. At the present day the pulp is never eaten in any shape (Post). From the Mishna (Mē'il. 64) we learn that a citron or a pomegranate might be bought for a ḡērūyah (the NT λεπτόν), an infinitesimal coin of which probably twenty to twenty-four were the equivalent of an English penny.

² Cheyne thinks the passage corrupt, but believes that the true reading can be recovered (JBL 1899, pt. ii.; cp BASKETS). Assuming the phrase 'apples of gold'—i.e., 'apples bright as gold'—to be correct, we must, at any rate, reject the claims of the orange to be the fruit referred to, since the orange did not reach Syria from India by way of Arabia till the middle ages. See especially Hehn, op. cit., with the evidence of Mas'ūdi, 430 f.; De Cand. Orig. 184; Willeboer (in HK, 1897) has overlooked this.

Many fruits of less importance were no doubt as popular as at the present day, such as the fruit of the Christ-thorn (Zizyphus spina-Christi), which is eaten fresh or dried, with sour milk (Tristram), the service tree (Sorbus domestica), medlar (Mespilus germanica), hawthorn (Crataegus)—for references to which in later literature see Löw, op. cit.—not omitting the humble bramble! (Rubus). The nutritious properties of the bramble berries (תַּבְּיָן, Toseft. Tēr. 114, the μόρα ἀπὸ τοῦ βάρου of Hippocrates; cp Lk. 644) are not overlooked by the encyclopædic Pliny, HN 2473).

A very early list of 'the choice fruits' of the land of Canaan closes with 'nuts and almonds' (Gen. 4311 [J])

13. Nuts and almonds. תַּבְּיָן וְתַבְּיָן; 6 has τεπέβυθον τεπέ[ε]-μυθον καὶ κάρυα [ADEFL] probably

'berries of the Pistacia Terebinthus [so Hehn] and walnuts'. The bolnim of the original are now generally identified, since Bochart, with the nuts of the Pistacia vera, which are still, both fresh and roasted, a delicacy among all ranks in the East (cp Wetz. ZDMG 11 520). The 'garden of nuts' (תַּבְּיָן) on the other hand, of which we read in Canticles (611), produced not pistachio nuts but walnuts.

These it was forbidden to crack (עָצָה) with a hammer on the sabbath (Shabb. 172); nor was a merchant allowed to give such delicacies as parched corn and nuts to children 'because he might accustom them to come to him' (Baba Mēs. 412). Acorns and walnut shells were children's playthings (K'il. 1715). It has already been mentioned that certain Jewish prisoners at Rome lived on figs and walnuts (καρύους) to avoid pollution from eating heathen food (Jos. Vit. 3). An excellent oil was (Shabb. 22), and still is, manufactured from the green nuts.

Of the almond we may say that the OT references (Gen. 4311 Jer. 111 Nu. 178 [23] Eccles. 125) form successive links in a chronological chain of evidence for the familiarity of the Hebrews with this favourite fruit till we reach the writings of the Mishna.

Here we find two varieties distinguished, the bitter almonds and the sweet (Ma'āsēr. 14). Classical writers recommend that the sweet should be roasted, while 'bitter almonds in the whole of antiquity were supposed to prevent drunkenness if eaten before drinking' ('Cibaria', op. cit. 1155 b). The modern Syrians use almonds extensively, not only as a dessert fruit but also in the preparation of a great variety of toothsome confections (see Landberg, Prov. et. Dict. etc. 123-126, for a list of modern confections into most of which almonds and nuts enter).

The Carob or locust tree is said to be indigenous in Palestine, and yet we have in the Bible but a single tree, however, is frequently named in the Mishna. As food trees to which the law of the 'corner' (תַּבְּיָן, ḡērūyah; see Lev. 199 f.) applies we find enumerated the Og-tree (תַּבְּיָן, see below), carob trees, walnut trees, almond trees, vines, pomegranates, olives, and palms' (Pē'ah 14 f.). The carob tree was also among the trees whose fruit had to be tithed (Ma'āsēr. 13), and was accepted and presumably eaten by the priests as part of the 'heave-offering' (Tērām. 114). Although we further hear of the pods being preserved in wine (Shēbi. 17), which points to their fairly general use as an article of diet, their great abundance and consequent cheapness made them a special food of the poor. It is only those of the cultivated species that are edible by man.

14. The Carob. incidental mention of its fruit (Lk. 1516; see, however, HUSKS). The carob

The Og-tree above mentioned is the sumach (Rhus coraria), still common in Syria, not, as some have thought, the cornel, whose habitat is too far to the N. (cp Post, Flora, 377 f.). The red (Ma'āsēr. 12) berries of the sumach are said to make an excellent acid drink. By the Jews they were probably used chiefly as a condiment (cp ḡōns ḡ ētī rā ḡyā, Dioscor. 1147) like the berries of the myrtle (תַּבְּיָן). These, we learn from Pliny (1535), were largely employed as a seasoning before the introduction of pepper (cp FOOD, § 7). Myrtle berries are still a favourite delicacy of Syrian ladies (Wetz. ZDMG 11 480 524). A similar purpose was served by the CAPER BERRY (אֲבִינָה, Eccles. 12:5 RV), the young berries of which are still used as a condiment in Syria. On the dūdāim see MANDRAKES.

FULLER (מְכַבֵּס, lit. 'treader'¹ [ΠΛΥΝΩΝ, ΒΝΑΩΓ] Mal. 3:2; ΓΝΑΦΕΥC Mk. 9:3). In the preparation of woven woollen materials there are two processes, both of which are now termed 'fulling' (from the Low Lat. fullare); probably at one time a common operation sufficed for both. The primary sense is to cleanse or bleach, and this is undoubtedly the sense in Mk. 9:3. The secondary is to mill or felt the wool together in such a way as to minimise shrinkage in the finished article. This is done by heating or stamping the woven fabric in hot water. Cp LYE, NITRE, SOAP.

The Fuller's field (שַׂדֵּה הַכֹּבֵס, ἀγρός τ. γναφῆως [BAL], ager fullonis) is mentioned only in defining the locality of the conduit of the upper pool. Its exact position is obscure. Stade (GV 1 592 f.) suggests that it lay to the SE. of Jerusalem. From Is. 36:2 (= 2 K. 18:17) it would appear to have been situated on the road to Lachish, whereas in Is. 7:3 a N. or NW. position is looked for. At all events it must have been near the wall (36:11); see JERUSALEM. The 'fuller's monument' (τὸ τοῦ γναφῆως μνημα) with which it has been associated, lay near the NE. corner of the third wall (Jos. BJ v. 42).

It is perhaps an objection to the usual rendering of the name that elsewhere the Piel form of כָּבַס is regularly met with, the Kal particip. כֹּבֵס finding its only analogy in the Punic כַּבַּס washer(man). For another supposed resort of fullers, see EN-ROGEL.

FURLONG (σταδίων), Mt. 14:24, etc. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

FURNACE. Of the words enumerated below, nos. 1-4 are names for smelting furnaces, though no. 3, if a genuine word, rather means 'crucible.' All except no. 3 are rendering by κάμινος, which is also used in Ecclus. 38:28 Rev. 1:15 of the smelting furnace, and in Ecclus. 27:5 and 38:30 of that of the potter.² Κάμινος 'furnace' in Mt. 13:42 50 is a symbolic term for Gehenna, which was imagined as a fiery furnace, on the ground that, according to Is. 31:9, God had 'a furnace in Jerusalem' ('Erubin 19 a), cp TOPHET; ESCHATOLOGY, § 70, 3[v]. In Dan. 3 a 'fiery furnace' is mentioned as used for the punishment of great offenders, and 'roasting in the fire' is the anticipated punishment of two Jews in the Babylonian period (Jer. 29:21-23). That this was a Babylonian practice is undeniable (see, e.g., Smith, Hist. of Assurbanipal, 163; cp AHAB, 2). It has also been reported as found in Persia down to the seventeenth century (Chardin).

¹ 'Fuller' comes ultimately from Lat. fullo. The true Eng. term is 'walker' (also in Germ.), for which cp Wyclif, Mk. 9:3: 'a fullere or walkere of cloth.'

² For the Egyptian potter's furnace see illustration in Wilk. Anc. Eg. 2 to 8.

1. אֵשׁ קִיר, kibšān, אֵשׁ קִיר, to subdue; κάμινος [καμιναια] furnax; Gen. 19:28 Ex. 9:8 10 19 18. See METALLURGY, and cp POTTERY; NIBSHAN. Allusions to the smelting furnace or brick-kiln (κάμινος) are found also in Ecclus. 2:5 22 24 27 5 31 26 38 28 30 43 4; see also Wisd. 3:6 (χωνευτήριον).

2. כּוּר, kūr, derivation uncertain; κάμινος, furnax; Dt. 4:20 1 K 8:51 [here χωνευτήριον], Prov. 17:3 27:21 [here πύρωσις], Is. 48:10 ('the furnace of affliction' [עֲנִי]; text doubtful), Jer. 11:4 Ezek. 22:18 (⊗ om.) 20 22; also Ecclus. 43:4 (Heb. difficult). כּוּר is also to be read, perhaps, in Is. 1:25 (כּוּר: לֹוֹת; Lowth, etc.)

3. אֵילִי, āilī; δοκιμῖον; Tg. כּוּרָא; Ps. 12:7 [6]. The older critics think that אֵילִי may possibly mean 'crucible'; ⊗ gives δοκιμῖον in Prov. 27:21 for עֲנִי. The phrase, however, in which אֵילִי occurs is plainly corrupt. It becomes in Che. Ps. (2), 'in the toils of the wicked'; if this is so, the phrase must have got in from the margin, where it was placed by a corrector, with reference to v. 6 [7]. See SILVER.

4. אֲתִינ, attün, probably an ancient loan-word; Ass. atānu, utānu (see Del. Ass. HWB 158 b; Muss-Arn. 131 b); cp Syr. Ar. Ethiop.; κάμινος, furnax; Dan. 3:6 11 15 17 19-21 23 26. See METALLURGY.

5. תַּנּוּר, tannūr, Ass. tinnuru (Del. Ass. HWB 711 b); κλίβανος, clibanus; rendered 'furnace' in Gen. 15:17 and Is. 31:9; also in the expression 'tower of the furnaces' in Neh. 3:11 12 38 [ναθουρεμ (BN), θανουρεμ (AL), θενουριμ (N^{c-a}) θανουρεμ (L in 12 38)].

The last term (tannūr) is much more frequently rendered 'oven.' Tannūr is in fact the special term for a baking-oven. In Mal. 4:1 [3:19] Ps.

2. The tannūr. 21:9 [10] RV has sought to give dignity to the figure by changing 'oven' into 'furnace.' This is done quite needlessly, even in Ps. 21:9 [10], where one is glad to hope that the emended text which makes 'thorns of the wilderness' the objects burned in the tannūr, not human beings, may be right.¹ In Is. 31:9 EV's rendering 'furnace,' though more dignified, is less accurate than 'oven.' The passage is probably not Isaiah's work (see Che. Intr. Is. 204), and is based on Gen. 15:17, where the divine appearance is likened to a smoking oven and a flaming torch. The oven intended is the ordinary baker's oven, for a description of which see BREAD, § 2 (c). Such ovens have been found at Tell el-Hesi, with sides baked hard, showing use (Bliss, A Mound of Many Cities, 114 f.). Modern Syrians still use the same primitive kind of oven.

From the phrase 'the tower of furnaces' (Neh. 3:11 12 38) it has been supposed that a number of public furnaces stood together near one of the towers of Jerusalem. It is possible, however (נִי or נָי are often confounded with כָּ), that 'tower of the palm trees' (Che.); even now 'several fine and ancient [palm-] trees still wave among the buildings of Jerusalem within the walls' (Tristram, NHB 383). Cp also Neh. 8:15 Jn. 12:13.

GAAL (גַּאֵל, 'dung-beetle'?—§ 68; cp Ar. ju'al [Wellh.]; גַּאֵלָאָד [BA; A has also גַּאֵלָאָד constantly, and once in v. 36 גַּאֵל]; גַּאֵלָאָד [L]; 1. Nationality. Jos. ΓΥΑΛΗΣ, and other forms, an early demagogue with a striking story (Judg. 9:26-41). To understand the rôle he played we must seek to determine the vexed question whether he was an Israelite or a Canaanite. Those who adopt the view that he was an Israelite appeal (1) to the name of his father (Judg. 9:26), (2) to the speech assigned to him in Judg. 9:28 (γαὰδ [BA]).

1. It is true, Gaal is described in MT as 'son of Ebed'; but in Q^B he appears as υἱὸς Ἰωβηλ, and Kuenen (Oud. 1:19 n. 5), Stade (GI 1:194), Budde (Ri. 1:17), Kittel (Gesch. 2:77),¹ and W. R. Smith (Th. T. 1886, p. 197) identify this 'Jobel' with 'Jobaal' (יֹבְעָל), a possible Israelitish name meaning 'Yahwè is Baal.' According to these scholars 'Jobaal' is the correct name of Gaal's father, which was altered contemptuously into 'Ehed' (slave) out of repugnance to the divine name 'Baal' (cp Ishhosheth for Ishhaal). This theory, however, though widely accepted of late, is certainly erroneous; I^2 Ἰωβηλ, as Moore has abundantly proved, is simply עֹבֵד (Obed), a synonym of עֶבֶר (Ehed), and Obed or Ehed is a shortened theophorous name—i.e., the second and omitted part of the name which began with Obed or Ebed was that of a god.

2. As to Judg. 9:28, it is no doubt a difficult passage, but so much is clear that Robertson Smith's view of it as 'a Hebrew declaration of revolt against the king of Shechem (9:6), who for three years has by the aid of his mercenaries tyrannised over Israel (9:22),' is opposed to the context. Unless (with this scholar) we transfer v. 28 f. elsewhere (viz. to a place after v. 22), it is undeniable that Gaal identifies himself with the Shechemites, and appeals to their pride of race against the half-Israelite king Abimelech, who maintains himself on the throne (as appears from 9:53) by Israelitish warriors. A demagogue who talks thus cannot possibly be an Israelite.

It is almost equally important to recognise that the account of the doings of Gaal in vv. 26-29 stands in no connection with v. 22 (23-25). It is not

2. Story. the organised brigandage set on foot by the Shechemites that tempts Gaal (as We. represents) to place himself and his kinsmen at the service of the Shechemites. The sequel of vv. 22 (23)-25 is to be sought in vv. 42-45, whilst in vv. 26-41 we have an independent, parallel account of the hostilities between Abimelech and the Shechemites which issued in the victory of the former. It is a writer symbolized by J who has preserved the tradition of Gaal's short-lived greatness; the other account may be assigned to E (Moore, Bu.). The occasion which the newly-arrived Gaal seized to make his fortune was the annual vintage-festival (v. 27a), or, as another report says, a solemn sacrificial meal³ in the 'house of their god' (see BAAL-BERITH). The temper of the people was already hostile to Abimelech. After cleverly stirring up race-prejudices⁴ he came boldly to the point and proposed himself as the leader of a Shechemite revolt (9:28 f.). This part of the narrative is an admirable specimen of the traditional Hebrew folk-stories. The festival scene has been justly praised by Robertson Smith (l.c.); but the scene between Gaal and Zebul (vv. 36-38) is hardly less striking. For the issue of Gaal's attempt, see ABIMELECH, 2.

Hothenberg (TLZ, 1891, p. 371), Moore, and Budde (commentary differs from Ri. 1:17) adopt the form Obed, which is found in some MSS (30, 56; cp 63 [שׁוֹבֵד]), and (see above) is probably Q^B 's true reading. GABBAL, SALLAI (גַּבְבַּל סַּלַּי), the name (in spite of the comma after Gabhai) of a Benjamite clan among the inhabitants of Jerusalem (see EZRA ii., § 5 [2] § 15 [1] a), Neh. 11:8 (γῆβη σῆλαι [B], γῆβει σ. [A], γῆβεις ῆλαι [K; ? γῆβει σῆλαι, so HR Conc.], εἰσβου σῆλαι [L]). In 1 Ch. 9:8 the corresponding name is Ἰβνηαι (יִבְנֵי), no doubt the more authentic reading of Gabhai. It is conjectured that SALLAI came into the text from the margin, where SALLU (ז. γ) had been written to explain the word יִבְנֵי ('and after him').

GABBATHA (ΓΑΒΒΑΘΑ [Ti. WH]), the 'Hebrew' equivalent of λιθορρωτος in Jn. 19:13 is the Greek transcription of the Aram. ܓܒܒܬܐ (emph. st. of ܓܒܬܐ 'height, back, ridge'; cp Kautzsch, Aram. Gram. 8 ii. 2, 10).¹

A similar Heb. word ܓܒܬܐ is doubtless to be read instead of the difficult ܓܒܬܐ 'height' in Ezek. 41:8 (so Davidson, Kautzsch, Bertholet; cp RV 'basement'), see PAVEMENT.

GABBE (ΓΑΒΒΗC [A]), 1 Esd. 5:20 RV, AV Gabdes = Ezra 2:26 GEBA.

GABRIAS (ΓΑΒΡ[Ε]ΙΔ [BA] ΓΑΒΡΕΙ [N]—i.e., גַּבְרִיָּהּ 'man of Yahwè'), brother of Gabael [2], Tob. 1:14 4:20.

GABRIEL (גַּבְרִיֵּל)—i.e., man of God, ΓΑΒΡΗΗΛ [87 and BAQI Theod.; Ti. WH]) is the name of the angel who was sent to Daniel to explain the vision of the ram and the he-goat, and to communicate the prediction of the Seventy Weeks (Dan. 8:16 9:21). He was also employed to announce the birth of John the Baptist to Zechariah, and that of the Messiah to the Virgin Mary (Lk. 1:19 26). Both Jewish and Christian writers generally speak of him as an archangel—a habit which is readily accounted for when Lk. 1:19 is compared with Rev. 8:2, and also with Tobit 12:15. In Enoch (see Charles, Enoch, notes on chap. 40) he is spoken of as one of the archangels; his task is that of intercession, and he is set over 'all the powers.'

His name frequently occurs in the Jewish literature of the later post-biblical period. Thus, according to Targ. Ps.-Jon., the man who showed the way to Joseph (Gen. 37:15) was no other than Gabriel in human form; and in Dt. 34:6 it is affirmed that he, along with Michael, Uriel, Jophiel, Jephphiah, and the Metatron, buried the body of Moses. In the Targum on 2 Ch. 32:21 he is named as the angel who destroyed the host of Sennacherib; and in similar writings of a still later period he is spoken of as the spirit who presides over fire, thunder, the ripening of the fruits of the earth, and similar processes. See ANGEL, § 4, n.

GAD

Name and race (§§ 1-3).
 Non-biblical data (§ 4).
 Land (§ 5*f*).
 Struggles (§§ 7-9).
 Character (§ 10).
 Settlement stories (§ 11).
 Towns and boundaries (§ 12).
 Genealogies (§ 13).

Gad (גָּד, גַּד)¹ was a name borne by inhabitants of eastern Palestine. In 1 S. 137, indeed, we read

1. Name. of the 'land of Gad' (אֶרֶץ גָּד); but neither this nor the phrase 'men of Gad' in the inscription of Mesha (line 10) need imply that Gad is a geographical name like Ephraim.

'Land of Gad,' if the text is sound,² is most naturally explained on the analogy of 'land of Naphtali' (1 K. 1520), 'the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali' (Is. 91 [823]),³ and the recurrent 'land of Israel' (2 K. 52, etc.), just as 'land of Atrath' in the inscription of Mesha (l.c.), doubtless means the land controlled by Atrath, which 'the king of Israel had [re]built for himself.'

Similarly the phrase 'men of Gad' (בְּנֵי גָד; see below), although it might no doubt be interpreted on the analogy of 'men of [the town] SRN,' and 'men of [the town] MHRTh' (lines 13*f*), and of 'men of Jabesh' (1 S. 119), may be explained just as well otherwise.

We might compare 'people of Chemosh' (עַם כְּמוֹשׁ) and 'his sons' (Nu. 2129 [Jer. 4846]) and suppose that Moah was, in the 9th century, still conscious that 'Gad' was abbreviated from some such phrase as 'sons of Gad'⁴ (cp ISSACHAR, §§ 3, 6, and see below). It is more probable, however, that we should follow the analogy of the frequent OT expression 'men of Israel'⁵ (1 S. 136 etc.).

Gad is therefore, probably, a people, not a district. The name of the district may have been Gilead, with which Gad is sometimes confused (see next paragraph, and col. 1580 note 4, and cp GILEAD).

EV speaks once (2 S. 245) of a wādy (נַחַל); AV 'river,' RV 'valley' of Gad; but 𐤂𐤏𐤋 confirms Wellhausen's restoration: '... in the midst of the wādy to Gad [𐤂𐤏𐤋 'the Gadite'] . . . The only question is whether 'Gad' does not represent an original 'Gilead' (cp v. 62).

Popular etymology as usual supplied the name Gad with several explanations. According to one version, it contained a reference to bands of freebooters: in the 'blessing' of Jacob, as we have it (Gen. 4919),

Gad—raiders [גַּדָּדִים] raid [גַּדְדִּנְנִי] him
 But he raids [גַּדְדִּנְנִי] their rear,⁶ the people might think of the bands of Jephthah. According to another version the accession of Gad to the ranks of the Leah tribes was a piece of 'good fortune' (Gen. 3011, J).

So RV rightly, following 𐤂𐤏𐤋 (έν τῷ γᾶδ). Holzinger wisely rejects Ball's theory that we should render 'by the help of [the god] Gad'; although the tribal name is no doubt in fact dependent on the divine name (see below); it was, probably, the possibility of this reading that led MT, Targum Onkelos, Aq. (גַּדְדֵּן הַ צְּוֹרִים), Symm. (גַּדְדֵּן הַ צְּוֹרִים) and Peshiṭta to read 𐤂𐤏𐤋 'with has come,'⁸ for 𐤂 'with.'

The fact is, Gad bears the same relation to Gaddiel (Nu. 1310) that Dan does to Daniel. Alongside of Gaddiel, we find the abbreviated form Gaddi (as a Manasseite, in the same list of 'spies'; v. 11), and, strange to say, the still more abbreviated form Gad (next art.).⁹ The gentilic would naturally be גַּדִּי, 'Gaddite.' The Massoretic form גַּדִּי, EV Gadite, is doubtless a late euphemistic device (cp above). 𐤂 has preserved the correct form [גַּדְדֵּן] [BNAF]; but גַּד Deut. 315 [B*AF], 1 Ch. 513 [B], 128 [A].

1 For the gentilic see below (§ 1).

2 'Gad' and 'Gilead' may be merely variants, the original having been simply 'the land of Gilead.'

3 On 'land of Benjamin' see BENJAMIN, § 1.

4 On 'land of Benjamin' see BENJAMIN, § 1.

5 On 'land of Benjamin' see BENJAMIN, § 1.

6 Compare the parallel phrase 'men of Judah' in 2 S. 1917 and other early passages (also in the post-exilic insertion 1 S. 118*b*). See Moore on Judg. 714.

7 C. J. Ball, PSBA 17171 (195).

8 𐤂𐤏𐤋 probably differs only apparently: ἐπιτῶν γᾶδ καὶ is doubtless a miswritten ἐν τῷ γᾶδ καὶ, not a rendering (as Holzinger thinks) of בְּנֵי גָד.

9 Ber. rabb. sect. 71 explains: בְּנֵי גָד לְנוֹר מִשְׁחֵתוֹן שֶׁל אֱלִיָּהוּ, which, it says, refers to Elijah.

10 Manasseh is the only other tribe-name said to have been borne by an individual in pre-exilic times.

Other readings in 𐤂 are: γᾶδ [L; except 2 K. 1514, 1 Ch. 526, γᾶδδ; and 2 S. 2336, ἀγγρεῖ], γαλαᾶδδδδ [B, 2 S. 2336; A, 2 K. 1033], γᾶδδδδ [B, 1 Ch. 128, γαλλεῖ [Avid. 2 K. 1517], γᾶδδδδδ [1 Ch. 1237], A, 2 K. 154]. Peshiṭta has 𐤂𐤏𐤋 like 𐤂𐤏𐤋, or (twice)¹ 𐤂𐤏𐤋.

In the inscription of Mesha (l. 10) the expression used is 𐤂𐤏𐤋, 'men of Gad' (see above).

The evidence, lacking in the case of DAN² [g. v. 1], that the tribe-name was a divine title is conclusive (see FORTUNE). In Gilead, indeed, beyond the tribe-name the worship of the god Gad seems to have left no trace; but he was honoured in the farthest N. (BAAL-GAD) and in the S. (MIGDAL-GAD) of West Palestine (see also AZGAD), and, at a later date, in the central highlands (cp FORTUNE).

As Gad is known to us best as an Aramæan deity (cp Baethgen, Beitr. 76*ff.*; but see also We. Ar. Heid.⁽³⁾), 2. Connected with Aram? it is natural to inquire whether there is anything to suggest that the Gadites were Aramæan.

The name of a prominent figure in the East Palestinian episode in the reign of David suggests that its bearer was Aramæan (see BARZILLA),³ and later there were others in Gilead who bore the same name; Gaddiel, also, occurs as an Ar.-Ass. name (גַּדְדִּי); and, as we shall see (§ 9), East Jordan came more and more under Aramæan influence. Did the imperious Aramæan, then, impose his deity on the people of Gilead? It is a fact that our earliest reference to East Palestine has nothing to say of Gad: it was 'Gilead'⁴ that abode beyond Jordan (Judg. 517), and the same peculiarity is to be noticed in the story (or stories) of Jephthah. Further, the genealogical system followed by J and E made Gad a son of Zilpah, which has been supposed to be Aramæan (see, however, ZILPAH).

That Gad was of a stock somewhat different from Joseph is likely enough; this seems to be true of its 'brother' tribe in the highlands of Galilee (see ASHER i., § 1).

Whatever may have been the affinities of Asher, however, it can hardly have been Aramæan. The linking together of the two tribes may have to be explained otherwise. Asher and Gad are deities of Good Fortune. It may be that the grouping of the tribes under a common name is a memorial of the worship of those related deities (see ZILPAH). The tribal name Manasseh is perhaps a parallel to this; Siegfried has ingeniously explained Manasseh as a memorial of the worship of Meni (Is. 6511), a deity akin to Gad (see MANASSEH). If the Song of Deborah as we have it has been changed (as some have argued) to suit later views about Yahwē, may the objectionable tribe-names Gad and Manasseh have been suppressed (in Judg. 514 'Machir' apparently takes the place of Manasseh)?⁵ Asher might escape the censure for some reason unknown to us. It is at least a plausible conjecture, however, that the explanation of the variety of nomenclature is to be found in the exceedingly mixed character of the population of Gilead.

When the Gileadites began to ask themselves whence they came, they would not unnaturally think of the Aramæan districts towards the north. The northern Aramaic, we know, was much nearer to Hebrew than it became later (cp ARAMAIC, § 2, begin.). There were constant dealings with the Aramæans; and there was no physical barrier to be an obstacle. In fact, one of the most important features of the history of Syria in general, during the centuries that elapsed from the time when Israel began to become a nation to the time when it finally lost its independence, is the advance southwards of the Aramæans.

Accordingly we find traditions of the kind just suggested. At the important sanctuary (and fortress) of MAHANAIM⁶ it seems to have been told that the divine host, from the alighting of which the place had received its name, met the immigrating Jacobites after they had severed themselves from the Aramæans (Gen. 321*f*, E). Elsewhere also there were places that did honour to the immigrant Jacob (see SUCCOTH, PENUEL, and especially RAMOTH-GILEAD).

1 1 Ch. 526 and 128. 2 Cp Kuenen, Th. T. 5291.

3 On his son's name see CHIMHAM.

4 Unless we should read 'Gad' for Gilead; cp 2 S. 2336 [B], 2 K. 1033 [A]. The whole clause is commonplace and not beyond suspicion (cp C. Niebuhr, Gesch. 254).

5 In the Chronicler's list of David's tribe rulers (1 Ch. 2716*ff.*) Gad and Asher are selected for omission to make way for two half-Manassehs and Levi; so, in Ezek. 48, Gad to make room for Levi. Cp also ISSACHAR, § 3.

6 Perhaps 'Ajlūn; but it has been suggested that there may have been more than one trans-Jordanic Mahanaim. See MAHANAIM.

It must be remembered, however, that the relations of Israel as a political power with Aram were unfriendly (below, § 9), and the Jacob-story is evidently influenced by later events. We have no more reason to expect to find a genuine tradition of the settlement of the various tribes and clans in Gilead than of settlements elsewhere. Indeed, everything in Gilead was so unstable that memory would more probably go back an exceptionally short distance.

It was well known that the people living in Gilead were of diverse origin. Whether any considerable element in the population was recognised

3. Mixed Population. as being Amorite (see below, § 11) or Rephaite¹ we cannot tell. It is clear, however, that people were distinctly conscious of a Reubenite strand (Judg. 5 15/). How far the Reubenites were settled in any one portion, or were represented by families here and there (so, perhaps, the writer of Nu. 32 34-38),² or were nomadic shepherd clans, is uncertain (see REUBEN): naturally the conditions changed.³

We must turn now to extra-biblical sources. Unfortunately we cannot hope for much light. The

4. Egyptian evidence. Egyptian expeditions aimed at Lebanon and the N., which did not naturally take them into Gilead. It would seem, indeed, that as early as the time of Thotmes III. they were not unacquainted with the country N. of the Yarmük, if no. 28 ('A-si-ti-ra-ty) in the Rtnu list is Tell 'Ashtera (ASHTAROTH), and no. 91 ('O-ta-ra-'a) is EDREI;⁴ Flinders Petrie has even conjectured that the same list names two places farther S., in 'Ajlun,⁵ where also W. M. Müller places no. 16, Hamät. Of the inhabitants, however, this (were it certain) would tell nothing. On the other hand, three or four generations later, if letter r61 of the Amarna collection tells us nothing more than that Artamanya ruler of Zir-Başan (Zi-ri-ha-ša-ni: a trans-Jordanic place?) professed readiness to be loyal to the Egyptian arms, another letter (KB 5 145) in the same collection tells the Pharaoh of that time that one of his caravans (?) has been led by the writer to Buşruna (BOZRAH?), whose king, along with the king of Hälunni,⁶ is accused by the writer of letter 142 of being in league with Biridaşya, a ruler who had handed over Aštarti⁷ (ASHTAROTH) to the SA.GAS. Habiri, therefore, if we may identify SA.GAS and Habiri, were already getting a hold in the district where a late Hebrew story told of the fate of Og, seizing his very city. Farther S., in Gilead proper, of which we hear nothing, they may have been already present in force.⁸

We should have evidence that the condition of things implied in letter 145 was still present in the time of Amenhotep IV. if we could accept the conjecture of Flinders Petrie about the letter (no. 11) in which that Pharaoh is requested by a Babylonian king (Burnaburiaš) to make reparation for the plundering of a caravan, on the ground that the Pharaoh is suzerain. Petrie proposes to identify Hinnatuni in Kinaḥḥi (cp HANNATHON), where the attack was made, with Kanawät (KENATH) in Haurān. However that may be, letter 196 (l. 32) suggests that Egyptian authority at Hinnatuni was weak.

² The cities assigned to Reuben seem to form a group surrounded by cities assigned to Gad (see REUBEN).

⁴ Flinders Petrie conjectures, further, that no. 29 ('A-no-r-po) is the modern Rafah and no. 30 (Ma-ka-ta) the modern Tell Mikdād, farther N.

⁵ Esh-Shuni (no. 24: 'A-ma-ša-na), and Faḥil (PELLA; no. 33: Pa-ḥu-ṣa).

⁶ A name connected conjecturally by Petrie with Golan and the river Allān.

⁷ Mentioned also in 237 21. Is '(alw) Ya-bi-ši' in line 28 JABESH?

⁸ Cp Ernst Trampe, Syrien vor dem Eindringen der Israeliten, 16 [98].

By Seti I., however, of dyn. 19, Egyptian authority was reasserted in Palestine; and in the time of Ram(eses) II. it was so far effective over East Palestine that civilians could erect monuments with hieroglyphic inscriptions (the 'stone of Job' at esh-Sheikh Sa'd: the ref. are given in col. 1241, n. 1). There is no evidence, however, that his son Me[r]neptah made his power felt E. of the Jordan, and Egypt disappeared below the horizon for more than two centuries (see below, § 6).

Of the state of things just described we could not have guessed from what has survived of the East Palestinian traditions. Their confused and fragmentary character is an inevitable consequence, as we have already hinted (§ 2, end), of the physical conditions of life in the uplands E. of Jordan.

No doubt it was a goodly land to live in. Writers have vied with one another in praising its well-wooded hills and valleys green with corn (cp GILEAD). Its streams, too, call forth general admiration, the Yarmük especially, which is as large as the Jordan which it joins, and which may (see JABBOK) once have played an important part in Hebrew legend. There was one blessing, however, that it lacked—security. Its

5. Character of land. uplands were in direct contact with the eastern desert. From year to year, from century to century, from millennium to millennium, the desert of North Arabia has driven its waves of hungry nomads westwards as a devastating flood. So it has been, and so it must be till some strong hand intervenes to bid the flood hold back. It is probably only because the centre of observation lay W. in Ephraim that we do not hear more about the endless conflicts with nomadic tribes; what we read in Judg. 6 ff. (incursions of Midianites)¹ owes its preservation to its connection with an Ephraimite tale.²

According to MT there was a place called Kamon that boasted of containing the remains of one of the ancient heroes (JAIR; see, however, CAMON). The Chronicler (1 Ch. 5 10) at any rate preserves the names of desert tribes that must have contributed, at one time or another, to the general unrest (see HAGAR, § 2, ISHMAEL, § 4 17).

There was not wanting, however, another source of unrest—the danger of invasion by other tribes settled in the east. It is true, invasion might come even from the west. In proof of this see JEPHTHAH, § 5, and note Shishak's claim to have included in the sweep of his incursion trans-Jordanic cities such as Mahanaim (no. 22: Ma-ḥa-n-ma) and Penuel³ (no. 53: Pe-nu-'a-ru); see SHISHAK. These, however, were isolated events. Gad usually looked to the west for fruits of peace.

What people is referred to in the stories of Jephthah and Jair is not clear (see JEPHTHAH, where it is suggested that the people lived in Haurān); but we know of three enemies that gave little rest.

(i.) Whether the inroads of the Ammonites began with the time of Saul we do not know certainly. The

7. From Ammon. legend about the relationship of Ammon (Moah) and Israel may be late (see LOT). The measures taken by DAVID (§ 8, a) must have given Gad some relief; but there is no evidence that the relations with Ammon established by him continued long; and it is not clear what they were.

Winckler thinks (CI 1 214) that Shobi (2 S. 17 27) was a king of Ammon appointed by David. Its king Ba'sa, however, is mentioned by Shalmaneser II. (COT 1 127) as a vassal of Bir'idri of Damascus. Indeed, he seems to have been an Aramaean from Beth-rebob (Wi. 1 214). Ammon probably remained dependent on Aram for long. Ultimately the place of Aram was taken by Assyria. Winckler therefore suggests that the attacks on Gilead, also subject to Aram, complained of by Amos (1 13-15) were instigated, or at least countenanced, by Assyria, just as ¹ Elsewhere it is suggested that Jerubbaal was a Gadite, and the city of Succoth, which he took, the frontier-fortress towards the desert better known as Sallhad (see GIDEON).

² The literary history, and therefore the meaning, of the references to unfriendly relations with Midian in Nu. 22 25 is obscure.

³ On Jeroboam's fortification of Penuel see PENUEL.

Nebuchadrezzar may have been responsible for the raids that are said to have occurred in the reign of Jehoiakim (2 K. 24.2).

(ii.) We have no means of determining with certainty whether Moab or Gad arrived from the desert earlier.

8. Conflict with Moab. In later times there prevailed in Israel a belief that it was Moab; but it has been maintained¹ that Moab thought it was Gad (MI l. 10; but see below, § 8).

A priori, perhaps, the probability is in favour of Gad's being the earlier (cf. the disaster at Gilboa, the royal seat was in Gilead (MAHANAIM = 'Ajlūn?); could not be indifferent to Moab. When we come down to the time of David we seem to reach an actual tradition of a subjugation of Moab (DAVID, § 8), which must have relieved Gad of one source of anxiety. The subjugation cannot have been as thorough as that of Edom (WI, GI 1206); but Gadites and other Israelites may at this time have settled north of the Arnon (MI l. 10; גלעד). At what times this quiet prevailed, through Israel's being able to make its suzerainty effective, we do not know. Omri and Ahab were able to maintain the upper hand, by the confession of Mesha himself.² On the story of a punitive expedition by Ahab's younger son see JEHORAM (1); Moab continued to be a thorn in the flesh to Gad. Whether Moab was ever again subject to Israel is not clear (see JEROBOAM, 2). That during the reign of the house of Jehu, Moab assumed the rôle played in the days of Gideon by Midian, could not be stated on the authority of 2 K. 10.20; it is not for such things that Amos threatens Moab (Am. 2.1-3). On the other hand, Winckler argues somewhat plausibly for an intervention on the part of Moab in the time of turmoil that preceded the fall of Samaria (GI 1208f.) See, further, MOAB.

Whichever of the tribes arrived first, Winckler's argument that a considerable interval must have intervened between their arrivals seems to be valid. The tribes had become too dissimilar to unite. The conflict of interests must therefore have led to struggles.

What relations prevailed in the time of Saul we cannot say definitely (1 S. 14.47 is not authoritative; see SAUL); but the fact that, after the disaster at Gilboa, the royal seat was in Gilead (MAHANAIM = 'Ajlūn?), could not be indifferent to Moab. When we come down to the time of David we seem to reach an actual tradition of a subjugation of Moab (DAVID, § 8), which must have relieved Gad of one source of anxiety. The subjugation cannot have been as thorough as that of Edom (WI, GI 1206); but Gadites and other Israelites may at this time have settled north of the Arnon (MI l. 10; גלעד). At what times this quiet prevailed, through Israel's being able to make its suzerainty effective, we do not know. Omri and Ahab were able to maintain the upper hand, by the confession of Mesha himself.³ On the story of a punitive expedition by Ahab's younger son see JEHORAM (1); Moab continued to be a thorn in the flesh to Gad. Whether Moab was ever again subject to Israel is not clear (see JEROBOAM, 2). That during the reign of the house of Jehu, Moab assumed the rôle played in the days of Gideon by Midian, could not be stated on the authority of 2 K. 10.20; it is not for such things that Amos threatens Moab (Am. 2.1-3). On the other hand, Winckler argues somewhat plausibly for an intervention on the part of Moab in the time of turmoil that preceded the fall of Samaria (GI 1208f.) See, further, MOAB.

(iii.) On the other side were the Aramæans. The struggle with them involved all North Israel (indeed, at times, South Israel also) and is one

9. With Syria. aspect of its history; but the details are obscure. On the history of the relations with nearer tribes, such as Maacah, Geshur, etc., see MACHIR. The great historic struggle was with Damascus, which was in the main successful in Gilead. The writers who brought the Book of Kings into the shape in which we read it⁴ knew nothing of the horrors experienced across the Jordan in the bitter struggle, and did not care to preserve a connected account of the contest.⁵ Omri may have been, Baasha probably was, Ahab certainly was, a vassal of Damascus. This in no way interfered with Israel's relations towards Moab. The spirit that inspired the struggle with Benhadad was a desire to assert independence. Accordingly we need not suppose that Gilead was detached from Ephraim. Both were attached to Damascus (see OMRI, AHAB). If it was the accession of Hazael that tempted JEHORAM (g.v., 1) to revolt, he paid the penalty with his life.⁶ Whether or not 2 K. 10.32 warrants the statement that from the time of Jehu East Palestine belonged to Damascus (so Winckler), it is noteworthy that in Shallum, Menahem (PEKAHIAH?) and Pekah, Gilead apparently set revolutionary kings on the throne of North Israel, Pekah receiving the active support of Rezin (because Menahem [or his son?]) remained loyal to Assyria?).¹

Inhabiting a tract of country ever exposed to the ravages of peoples of the desert (§ 5), Gad could provide a refuge for fugitives from the W. 10. Character and history of people. (ISHBAAL, DAVID) and rear a race of daring spirits (MENAHEM, PEKAH, SHALLUM) such as those whose warlike skill is praised in the poetical fragment preserved by the Chronicler (1 Ch. 128); occupying a land fitted by nature for the rearing of cattle (§ 4) it could offer a home for the accumulation of wealth (BARZILLAI); but, if the primitive society which we may suppose to have lived on in such a retreat was able to produce a religious enthusiast and send him forth to champion the old against the innovations of an Ahab (on the question of the origin of ELIJAH see col. 1270, n. 1), there is at least no evidence of its ever having made any contribution to the literature of Israel.² It is not so certain, however, that it may not have had a contribution to make to the development of its civilisation. The very insecurity of life may have produced a greater willingness to submit to the limitations of monarchy than is characteristic of Ephraim (Jephthah, Saul, David; see WI, GI 151 n.). If Winckler's solution³ of the mystery of Jabesh-Gilead should be accepted (for a different view see SAUL) the true foundation of monarchy in N. Israel, and consequently in all Israel, was really laid east of Jordan.

Communication between the trans-Jordanic lands and the highlands of Ephraim being easy (see EPHRAIM, § 3f., JORDAN, § 7),⁴ the eastern tribes, although they took no part in the fight celebrated in Judg. 5, became closely linked with northern Israel.⁵ When at last Ephraim succumbed before the advance of Assyria, Gad shared or rather anticipated its fortunes (see TIGLATH-PILESER). The change thus produced was radical (see AMMON, § 5f., MOAB, ISRAEL, § 32).

Henceforth we hear of Gilead as a land where Israel used to dwell (Mic. 7.14) and whither it might return (Zech. 10.10), where later there were Jews (1 Macc. 5) —but not of Gad: Gad was a tradition of the past,⁶ or a dream of the future (Ezek. 48 Rev. 7.5).

An unfortunate consequence of the failure of the Eastern Israelites to leave any literary remains is that

11. Sanctuaries and theories about settlement. we are almost entirely confined, for our knowledge of them and their traditions, to such hints as western writers have chosen to give. From what has been said (§ 5, begin.) it is obvious how little we can hope to learn of the actual condition of things east of Jordan from any of the contributors to the Hexateuch.

Most of the legends about the early settlements of Israel in western Palestine seem to be connected with some sanctuary or other. In the E. too there were of course sanctuaries: Penuel, Succoth, Ramah of Gilead (its very name shows its character: see RAMOTH-GILEAD), Mahanaim (probably); see further, SHITTIM, PISGAH, NEBO, BETH-PEOR (on Goren Ha-Atad see ABEL-MIZRAIM), ZEPHON, MIZPAH. We have perhaps contemporary testimony to such local sanctuaries in Hosea (68 12.11 [12]; but the text is doubtful: see GILEAD, 2). There are seldom, however, the clear local traditions that we find in the W.

² On the question of the position of Seirath see SEIRATH. Winckler thinks that in one version of the story Eglon was slain somewhere on the eastern side. See further, EGLON.

³ Mesha claims to have recovered 'the land of Medeba' (MI l. 8), Ataroth (10), Nebo (14), Jahaz (19), and Horonen (31). For the twelve towns that he rebuilt see lines 9f. 13f. 21f. 26f. 30.

⁴ Israelitish writers might have had more to tell us about Gad.

⁵ Hence the conflicting theories as to the identification of the city which was repeatedly the object of contention (see RAMOTH-GILEAD).

⁶ The indignation against the Aramæan policy felt in Israel appears in Am. 13.

¹ Guthe, however, argues conversely that the Gileadite kings represented the anti-Aramæan party (GI 188).

² See, however, EZEKIEL i., § 1.

³ In the forthcoming second vol. of his GI.

⁴ On the strange genealogical linking of the Zilpites Gad with the Leah tribes see ZILPAH, REUBEN.

⁶ We can understand how one of the writers called P said (Josh. 18.25) that Gad inhabited half the land of the sons of Ammon (see, however, AMMON, § 3).

Probably the reason is one we have referred to already: our literature was all produced in the W. If any old tradition underlies the story of the altar in Josh. 22, it has been quite obscured. It is even a question on which side of the river the altar is represented to have been. JABESH [g. v.], which may have been a sanctuary, and must have been a place of considerable influence, is linked strangely with Benjamin (see above, § 10).

It would appear that the writers of the Hexateuch, who regarded the eastern population as a part of Israel just as truly as the western, were much perplexed to account for their not being in 'the land of Israel':¹ Ezek. 47:18 (Co. Ezechiel) seems to regard Jordan as separating 'the land of Israel' from Gilead. Such a problem had its attractions. It is all the more necessary to be circumspect in dealing with the solutions that were offered.

Where the writers formally give a reason they agree in suggesting that the East-Jordan tribes were (in some unexplained way) distinguished from the other tribes by being pastoral, and that they asked for, and received permission to settle in, the pre-eminently pastoral eastern plateau. We need not wonder at this inversion of cause and effect: it is inevitable in such naive philosophy of history. A question that seems to have awakened considerable interest was whether there was in this settlement beyond Jordan any blame. The answer given was that it would have been blameworthy had the tribes simply remained behind, but that as a matter of fact they crossed over with their brethren and then returned. According to one version, however, they did this after censure by Moses at their own suggestion (Nu. 32:6-16), whereas according to another it was at the direction of Moses (Dt. 3:18-20).

A favourable view of the conduct of the eastern tribes finds hearty expression in the saying incorporated in the 'Blessing of Moses' (Dt. 33:20 f.).

The text is uncertain in places. It may have read somewhat as follows:—

Blessed is he that gives room for Gad.
[Gad] has let himself down² [but] like a lion(ess);
He rends arm and crown.
He looked him out the first-fruits of the land,
For a portion [fit] for a leader was there;
But he came [hither] at the people's-head:
Yahwè's righteous acts he wrought
And his ordinances with Israel.

It might be asked: Are we to connect these stories with other bits of a movement eastwards (see MACHIR, REUBEN), and infer from them that there was a theory that the Israelites E. of the Jordan reached Gilead from the Ephraimite side? It is not very likely;³ and if there was it was no doubt a pure guess. On the other hand, the degree of probability of the story that the settlement of Gad was earlier than the entrance of Joseph into W. Palestine will be estimated variously by different minds. It may be asked, Must not the tribes farthest E. be those that arrived last?⁴ It is not impossible, on the other hand, that Gad came no later than Joseph, but was content, or was forced, to remain in Gilead while Joseph pressed over.

The view prevailing among the various writers who have contributed to the Hexateuch is that Gad obtained possession of its home E. of the Jordan by conquest. Every one of the peoples whom Israel knew on the E. of the Jordan is represented in some story or other as unfavourable to the settlement; see AMMON, MOAB, MIDIAN. The most popular story, however, seems to have been that most of the territory was found in the possession of Amorites.

According to J.⁵ Moses, after sending to spy out Jaazer, drove the Amorites out of its towns (Nu. 21:32) and took them and settled in all the Amorites' cities: in Heshbon and all its towns (v. 25; on v. 26 see below). According to E., Israel asked Sihon to allow them to traverse his territory (Nu. 21:21 f.), and when be refused defeated him at Jahaz and occupied his territory from Arnon to Jabbok (21:23-24).

There were historical difficulties, however: the most prominent trans-Jordanic element was Moab; moreover Israel obtained possession of lands far N. of the Heshbon district.

A later writer, therefore, explains that the district of Heshbon as far S. as the Arnon had been won for the Amorites from Moab (v. 26); and in later documents it is represented that the northern portion was ruled by a certain Og whose chief cities were Edrei and Ashtaroth (see Oo).

That at Jahaz and about Edrei tradition told of great battles once having been fought near by is not unlikely. On the other hand, the story that the fights were with Amorites¹ has been variously estimated.² What we have learned of the Amurri from the Amarna letters makes it more plausible than it was (cp Wi. GZ 1:51-54); see SIHON.

In contrast with the prevailing story that 'Heshbon and all the towns thereof' (Nu. 21:25, J), or 'Jaazer and the towns thereof' (v. 32, J), were taken from the Amorites by all Israel, we find the statement that [all] Gilead was taken from the Amorites by Machir³ (Nu. 32:39-41; ultimate source uncertain). On Josh. 18:25 see above, col. 1584, n. 5.

The later historiographers had lost the thread of events in the trans-Jordanic territory, and until (or unless) some further sources of information become available, all we can regard as certain is that the population among which Gad and the other clans and tribes ultimately reckoned to Israel were settled, was very heterogeneous.

As has been hinted (§ 8), Winckler thinks that the earliest story represented Gad and Reuben as settled in territory that had been Midianitish (cp GZ 1:48), not Moabitish.

Some addition to our stock of local traditions would be obtained if we could regard the mention of certain places in the stories of the arrival of Israel E. of the Jordan as owing their origin to traditions actually current at those places. To do so, however, seems somewhat precarious. We cannot be sure, for example, that there was really any place that boasted of being the burial-place of Moses; Gad may have been content to assign the figure of that hero to the twilight period preceding the arrival of their fathers in the home known to history (see MOSES). On the question of the date of the arrival of Gad, see above (§§ 11, 8).

To attempt to assign to Gad a definite territory is useless. The conflicting statements found in the Hexateuch and the references to the same subject in the historical books are, in their present form at least, the work of men who had no real knowledge of the early conditions E. of Jordan.

According to Nu. 32 Reuben and Gad were impressed with the desirableness of 'the land of JAZER and the land of GILEAD' (v. 2), 'the land which Yahwè smote before the congregation of Israel' (v. 4) as 'a place (land) for cattle,' and Gad and Reuben asked Moses and Eleazar the priest and the princes of the congregation that it should be given to them; v. 3 identifies the land with nine towns: 'Ataroth, Dibon, Jazer, Nimrah, Heshbon, Elealeh, Sebam, Nebo, Beon.' According to v. 33 (minus the interpolation) Moses actually gave them 'the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan'; an interpolator adds that they were given to Gad, Reuben, and half Manasseh. In vv. 34-38 we read that the nine towns asked for in v. 3 were rebuilt, the last five by REUBEN, the first four (which appear elsewhere, Is. 15:1, Jer. 48, as Moabitish) by Gad, who also built four others: AROER, ATROTH-SHOPHAN (unknown), JOGBEHAN (cp Judg.

² Favourably by Wellhausen, Winckler and others, unfavourably by Meyer, Stade and others.

³ [It may be asked whether the story of Machir who took Gilead and dispossessed the Amorites is not due to a misunderstanding of an old tradition that Manassites possessed themselves of the strong city of Salhad, both Machir and Gilead being very possibly corruptions of Salhad. The process of corruption of names seems to have begun very early, and different corrupt fragments of the same name were actually taken to represent different persons, not only in the genealogies of Chronicles, but even in earlier writings. The occurrence of 'Machir' in Judg. 5:14 is a problem which requires fuller consideration.—T. K. C.]

811), and BETH-HARAN (cp Josh. 13 27), of which the first is Moabite elsewhere (Jer. 48 19). The first of each group is claimed by Mesha as Moabite (Daibon, MI II. 1 28; Aroer, L. 26), and Atoath as a conquest, whilst Josh. 13 16 f. assigns Aroer, Daibon, and Heshbon to Reuben.

Finally, an attempt is made in the Hexateuch to delimit the territory given by Moses to Gad.

Apparently it is made to include the whole of the E. side of the Jordan valley, and the uplands between Heshbon and RAMATH-MIZPEH reaching as far E. as the upper course of the Jabbok (Josh. 13 24-28). See further REUBEN, MANASSEH, MACHIR. According to one of the writers called P, Ramoth-Gilead, Mahanaim, Heshbon, and Jaazer were Gadite levitical cities (Josh. 21 38 f.).

For a list of Moabite cities referred to in the prophetic writings, see MOAB.

The genealogy of Gad in Gen. 46 16 = Nu. 26 15 contains seven names.¹

Zephon suggests the place-name ZAPHON [q.v.]; Haggi might be the clan from which came the mother of Adonijah (see, however, HAGGITH); David was well received E. of the Jordan when the son of Maacah rebelled against him; Shuni (שׁוּנִי) may be a corruption of Sharonite (שָׁרוֹן); cp 1 Ch. 5 16; MI I. 13; see SHARON); Ozni (Nu.) and Ezbon (Gen.) may be merely variants; 'Eri' (עֵרִי) may be half of 'Aroerite' (אֲרוֹרִיתִי); Josh. 18 25; ² Arel may be really Uriel (cp JERUBBAAL, who was perhaps a Gadite).

13. Genealogies. The passage in which the genealogy in 1 Ch. 5 occurs is plainly corrupt. Possibly Gad's genealogy really begins at v. 13 (see REUBEN) with a group of seven names (one of which is שְׁכָנִי). v. 14 appears to say that these seven are sons of a certain Abihail, whose genealogy is then traced. Among the links we find Gilead and Michael (both, it is maintained elsewhere [ZELOPHEHAD], corruptions of the same name—Salhad),³ Jeshishai (corrupted from Manasseh), Jahdo, Buz-Ahi (בְּזָא אֲחִיבֻז⁴; see KEMUEL, Uz, and cp AHI), Abdiel, Guni. All these 'dwelt in Gilead in Bashan, and in her towns,' etc.; whether 'Gilead' is the original word is disputed (see ZELOPHEHAD).

Not many personal names are definitely assigned to Gad.

The list of eleven attached by the Chronicler to the poetical fragment referred to above (§ 10) does not seem to be of value. In P's list of 'spies' we have Geuel, son of Machi. The omission of a prince (אֲדָמִי) of Gad (and Reuben) from P's list of dividers of western Palestine in Nu. 34 17-28, needs no explanation. H. W. H.

GAD (גָּד), § 57; גַּד [BAL], a seer (cp PROPHECY) especially devoted to the interests of king David, to whom he gave warning of the divine displeasure at the famous census, and whom he afterwards directed to raise an altar on a certain threshing-floor (2 S. 24 11 ff. = 1 Ch. 21 9 ff.). In the description of him as 'the prophet Gad, David's seer,' the title 'the prophet' seems to be a later insertion (H. P. Smith, following ⁵ and Ch.), derived from 1 S. 22 5 where 'the prophet' Gad is represented as warning David to seek a refuge in Judah (see MIZPEH, 3). The latter passage is, according to Budde, a late addition. In 2 Ch. 29 25 Gad appears as concerned in the regulation of the musical service in the temple, and in 1 Ch. 29 29 as a historian (see Driver, Introd. 528 f., and cp CHRONICLES, § 6 [1], HISTORICAL LITERATURE, § 14). famous city of the Decapolis called Gadara (now Māḥēs), which, moreover, plays a certain part in Jewish history. Gadara lies 1194 feet above sea-level, near the western edge of the Bashan plateau, 4½ miles from the Jordan, about midway between the Yarmūk (Hieromax) and the Wādy el-'Arab. It was captured by Antiochus the Great in his first invasion of Palestine in 218 B.C. (Polyh. 5 71), and again, after a ten months' siege, by Alexander Jannæus (Jos. Ant. xiii. 3 3, B/i. 4 2). Under Jewish rule it does not seem to have flourished; Pompey restored it, after his Syrian campaign in 64-63 B.C. (Jos. Ant. xiv. 4 4, B/i. 1 7 7), and Augustus gave it to Herod in 30 B.C. (Ant. xv. 7 3, B/i. 20 3). After the death of Herod it came under the immediate suzerainty of Rome (Ant. xvii. 11 4, B/i. 6 3). At the beginning of the Jewish war it was laid waste by one of the Jewish generals (Jos. B/i. ii. 18 1); but at a later stage the Gadarenes asked and received from Vespasian a Roman garrison (B/i. iv. 7 3). Josephus speaks of it as πόλις Ἑλληνίς (Ant. xvii. 11 4, B/i. ii. 6 3), and μητρόπολις τῆς περσείας (B/i. iv. 7 3). That its territory extended as far as to the sea of Galilee seems to be shown by the frequent occurrence of the figure of a ship on its coins, and perhaps also by the mention of a ναυμαχία upon one coin.

Gadara was for several centuries the seat of a hishopric (Geogr. Sac. S. Paul. 307; Rel. Pal. 776). It fell to ruins soon after the Mohammedan conquest, and has now been deserted for centuries, save for a few families of shepherds, who occasionally find a home in its rock-hewn tombs. The ruins occupy a narrow and high ridge, which projects from the mountains of Gilead. On its northern side is the deep valley of the Hieromax, now called Sheri'at el-Manādīreh; on the west is the Jordan valley; and on the south is a glen called Wādy el-'Arab, running parallel to the Hieromax. The ruins crown the ridge, and as it declines in elevation towards the east, the site is strong and commanding. The space occupied by the city is about two miles in circuit; and there are traces of the ancient wall all round.

GADDIS (גַּדָּדִיע [VA], גַּדָּדֵיע [N]), surname of John the Maccabee. See MACCABEES i., § 3, n.

GADFLY is the plausible rendering of RV^{MG} for גָּדִי־עֵל, kérés, Jer. 46 20 (EV DESTRUCTION), following Hitzig, Graf, Keil; cp Chrysostom, Field's Hex. 2 708. Mic. 2 13, however, suggests that kérés was originally גָּדִי, 'an invader.'

The versions have: ἀπόσπασμα [BNAQ], ἐγκεντρῖζων [Aq., Symm.], stimulator [Vg.], ⁵ [Pesh.—i.e., 'a host.' Schultens compares Ar. kāris, a species of Cimex. See Ges. Thes. add. 111. T. K. C.

The analogy of 'ben Jaresh' (see SALLUM, 1) in v. 13 suggests that 'Gadi' expresses the local or tribal name of Menahem. Render 'a Gadite' (Klo.); but cp NAMES, § 57. T. K. C.

GADITE (גָּדִיתִי), Deut. 3 12. See GAD, § 1.

GAHAM (גַּחַם; גַּחַם [AD], גַּחַם [L], גַּחַם [OS.]), a Nahorite clan (Gen. 22 24). From its position between Tebah (Tubihî) and Tahash (Tehîs), Gaham should be a disguise of Hamath. The loss of the final n is intelligible, but the prefix 2 remains a riddle. T. K. C.

GAHAR (גַּחַר; גַּחַר [A]), family of NETHINIM in the great post-exilic list (see EZRA, ii. § 9), Ezra 2 47 (γὰρ [B], γὰρ [L]) = Neh. 7 49 (om. BN, γὰρ [L]) = 1 Esd. 5 30 (γὰρ [L]), EV possibly CATHUA (q.v.) or CEDDUR (but cp GIDDEL, 1).

GAI (גַּי), without the article, therefore representing a place-name; גַּי [A], but גַּי [BL]—i.e., גַּי, the spot to which the men of Israel pursued the Philistines after the death of Goliath (1 S. 17 52). Wellhausen, Driver, Budde, Klostermann, and others agree in reading 'Gath' for 'Gai.' Whether the verse is even then restored to its original form is doubtful (see We. ad loc.). Cp GATH, SHAARAIM, 1.

GAIUS (ΓΑΙΟΥΣ [Ti. WH]).

1. A Corinthian, baptized by Paul (1 Cor. 1 14). In grateful acknowledgment of his hospitality to Christians Paul calls him 'my host, and of the whole church' (Rom. 16 23). According to Origen (ad loc.) this Gaius afterwards became bishop of Thessalonica; the grounds of this statement are unknown. The list of the seventy disciples by pseudo-Dorotheus contains a Gaius, who is said to have succeeded Timothy as bishop of Ephesus. It is not worth while to support this by the theory that Rom. 16, where Gaius is referred to, was addressed to the Ephesian Church.

2. A Gentle Christian, who went with Paul to Miletus (Acts 20 4). As the Gk. text stands, he was of Derbe; but this seems inconsistent with 19 29, where Gaius and Aristarchus are represented as both Macedonians (the reading Μακεδόνα—'Aristarchus a Macedonian'—being very ill-supported). Many scholars (e.g., Salmon, in Hastings' DE 2 80a) suppose two different persons to be referred to; but the two passages stand so close together that this is improbable. It is necessary to read either Δερβαιοῦ δὲ Τιμόθεου (Blass, after Valckenar) or καὶ Δερβ. Τιμ. (Lachmann).

That Timothy was of Lystra, is no doubt a common opinion; but it is not certain that καὶ εἰς Λύστραν is not an interpretation (see Blass, and cp TIMOTHY).

3. Gaius 'the beloved' (ὁ ἀγαπητός), to whom 3 Jn. is addressed; cp EPISTOLARY LITERATURE, § 7. Of his personality nothing is known. T. K. C.

GALAAD (Γαλααδ [ANV]), 1 Macc. 5 9 etc., RV GILEAD [g. v., 1].

GALAL (Γαλαλ [B], Γαλαλή [A]).

1. A Levite, apparently in the line of Asaph, in the list of inhabitants of Jerusalem (see EZRA ii., § 5 [b], § 15 [1] a), 1 Ch. 9 15 (γαδερ [L]). The name is, however, corrupt, see HERESH and cp MATTANIAH, 2.

2. A Levite in the line of Jeduthun in list of inhabitants of Jerusalem (EZRA ii., § 5 [b], § 15 [1] a), 1 Ch. 9 16 (γαλαλ [L]) = Neh. 11 17 (γαλαλ [g. a. mg. sup.], γαλεκ [L], BA om.).

Asia Minor, with the political divisions about 50 A.D. (after col. 1592)

A. HISTORY OF GALATIA.

The migration which left a settlement of Celts islanded in Asia Minor was the last phase of a movement of which the inroads into Italy (390 B.C.) and Greece (279 B.C.) were episodes; but its history is known only in outline.

In 480 B.C. the Celtic bands overran Macedonia, killing the brave Ptolemy Ceraunus who rashly opposed them with inferior force. The main horde under Brennus and Acichorius penetrated Greece proper; but, being repulsed in Ætolia and before Delphi, retired northwards again, and uniting with their brethren in the neighbourhood of Byzantium determined to cross into Asia Minor. In this design they succeeded, being assisted by Nicomedes I. of Bithynia, who concluded a treaty with the seventeen Celtic chiefs, securing their aid against his brothers.

The invaders must have seized immediately at least some part of the country known afterwards as Galatia. Our authorities represent its seizure as coming somewhat later; but the survival of the Celts as a nation implies the possession of some place of deposit for their wives and children during those early years.

With their settlement on the uplands of the interior the Celts entered upon the second stage of their history, forming a true robber-state, from which bands of marauders issued systematically to fall upon the rich city-territories of western Asia. According to Livy (38 16), the three tribes cast lots for the region in which each plundered: this may not be true; but certainly all Asia Minor within the Taurus was at their mercy for the next fifty years, and the kings were fain to purchase partial immunity from their raids by the hazardous device of employing them as mercenaries in their armies (Polyb. 5 53 65; Justin, 25 2).

A change came with the victories of the Pergamene kings (especially those of Attalus I. gained between 240 and 230 B.C. The inscriptions reveal several victories: cp Livy, 38 17, Attalus eos rex sepe sedit fugavitque. They are closely connected with an important chapter of Greek Art). The main result was to confine the Celts within definite limits (Paus. i. 8 1; Strabo 567): henceforth they were restricted to Galatia proper, and their historical influence was exerted mainly indirectly.

The Celts occupied the NW. part of the great plateau constituting the interior of Asia Minor (cp Holm, Gr. Hist., ET, 4 96 f.). The range having no distinctive name, of which the last member to the W. is the Mysian Olympus, separated them from Bithynia and Pontus. On the E. the Halys (Kizil Irmak), the greatest river of Asia Minor, on the W. the Sangarius (Sakaria), ran through deep gorges to the Black Sea, dividing the land of the Celts into three nearly equal portions.

The Trocmi settled E. of the Halys, round Tavium (Nefez Keui); the Tectosages between the two rivers, around Ancyra (Angöria); the Tolistobogii W. of the Sangarius round Pessinus (Bala Hissar). The territory of the three tribes formed a rough rectangle, extending about 200 m. from E. to W. On the S. lay the Axylon, or treeless steppes of Lycaonia, and the plateau of Iconium (Konia), in the E. part of which is the salt lake Tatta.

The importance of the Celts was due entirely to their geographical situation. The three tribes held in their hands the old Royal Road from Ephesus, by way of Pessinus, Ancyra and Pteria (Boghar Keui, near Tavium), to the Euphrates (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM 27 f.).

The alternative and more direct route following 'the one easy path that nature has made between the Ægean coast and the high grounds of the plateau' (ib., and 49), through S. Phrygia and Lycaonia, was only in the infancy of its development; consequently the Greek cities of western Asia Minor, and those of Syria and Cilicia, were partially severed from one another, so that the former escaped the blighting shadow of Seleucid autocracy (Holm, op. cit. 498 f.).

Strabo (567) gives a sketch of the Galatian political organisation.

Each tribe was divided into four clans (cp the Helvetii, Cæs. BGI 12), ruled by a tetrarch under whom were a judge and a general, the latter with two subordinates. The general council of the twelve tetrarchies consisted of 300 men, who met at a place called Drynemetum (= Dryu-neimheidh), 'the temple of the oaks' according to Perrot, Expl. arch. de la Galatie, 182, who locates it near Assarli-Kaya, 7 hrs. SW. of Ancyra. Holder, however (Althist. Sprachschatz), regards Dry- as merely an intensive prefix, and nemeton as=sanctuary. Cp Rams. in Bull. de Corr. Hell. 1898, p. 234 f.). This assembly was principally a high court of justice; in other respects the clans were independent. By Roman times this old system had quite disappeared. (See especially on this subject Ramsay, Hist. Comm. on Gal. 72 ff.).

The commanding position of the Galatians upon the old route, and on the flank of the new

2. Roman intervention. one, explains the necessity for the punitive expedition of the Roman consul Cn. Manlius Vulso (189 B.C., Livy, 38 12 f.).

¹ The form Tolistobogii is usual in inscriptions and coins of the Roman period, and is found in early authorities. In early inscriptions the form Tolistoagii is given.

This broke their power, and apparently they partially succumbed to Ariarathes of Cappadocia and the rulers of Pontus (Van Gelder, Galat. res. 257 f., Polyb. 3113). Their losses on this side were balanced, however, according to Rams. Stud. Bibl. 449 f., by the conquest of the Lycaonian tetrarchy, containing Iconium and thirteen other cities (cp Pliny, HN 595 and Ptol. v. 410 who calls it προσέλημμένη, 'the added territory'). This was probably about 160 B.C.

During the latter part of the second century B.C. the Galatians seem to have been under the ascendancy of Pontus—that is to say, the Pontic party among the Galatians themselves was triumphant. Then came a national reaction. At any rate the Romans in their struggle with the Pontic sultan found no allies more faithful than the Galatians, and 'by the side of the command of Mithridates to murder the Italians went the massacre of the whole Galatian nobility' (Momms. Prov. of R. Emp. [E.T.] 1339). Only three tetrarchs escaped.

In 64 B.C., when the contest with Mithridates was ended, Pompeius established over the Celts three tetrarchs (a misuse of the title, see above). Of these, the most successful and prominent was Deiotarus of the Tolistobogii, who gradually made himself supreme over the other two tribes, and after temporary eclipse during Cæsar's lifetime was finally recognised by the Romans as king of Galatia (died in 41 B.C.).

In 39 B.C., Amyntas, formerly a secretary of King Deiotarus, was made king of Pisidia (including Antioch) by Antonius, who between 39 and 36 B.C. disposed of kingdoms with a high hand in Asia Minor (App. BC 575). In 36 B.C. Amyntas was given in addition Galatia proper, with Isauria, part of Pamphylia, and W. Cilicia, as well as the Lycaonian plain intervening between his Pisidian and his Galatian domains, so that Iconium and Lystra were both under his sway (Dio Cass. 4932).

The manifest ability of Amyntas as an instrument of Roman policy caused Augustus to confirm the Celtic prince in his kingdom, notwithstanding that he had fought for Antonius at Actium. He was also given a free hand on the non-Roman part of his frontiers. Soon therefore he made himself master of Derbe, which had been seized by Antipater (once Cicero's friend; Ep. ad Fam. 1873).

In 25 B.C. the whole question of Roman policy in central Asia Minor had to be faced anew, for Amyntas met his death unexpectedly in an expedition against the Homonades, an independent tribe in Mt. Taurus.

The death of Amyntas threw the burden of governing his vast territories upon the Romans themselves

3. Galatia a Province. (Dio Cass. 5326). Marcus Lollius was the first governor of the new province; but its organisation was not completed before 20 B.C. Pamphylia was separated from Galatia and put under a governor of its own (Dio Cass. 5326). Various dynasts were recognised as rulers of the parts adjacent on the NE. and SE. frontiers: Polemon ruled over Pontus, whilst Cilicia Tracheiotis, with eastern Lycaonia, including Kastabala and Kybistra, the old eleventh Strategia,¹ was attached to the kingdom of Archelaus of Cappadocia (Strabo, 535 537; App. B. Mithr. 105). In course of time, however, these parts were absorbed one after another and attached to Galatia Provincia.

Additions to Province.

- 5 B.C. Paphlagonia (the district round Mt. Olgassys [Ulgaz Daglı] with the cities Gangra and Andrapa) after the death of Deiotarus brother of Castor (cp Rams. in Rev. des Et. Gr., 1894, p. 251; Reinach, Rev. Numism. '91, p. 395).
2. B.C. Amasia and Gazelonitis, together with the domain of Ateporix (cp Rams. Hist. Comm. 121 f.).
- 34/35 A.D. Komana Pontica. This region together with that of Amasia is called as a whole Pontus Galaticus (Ptol. v. 63) as distinguished from Pontus Polemoniaccus—i.e., the part of Pontus governed by King Polemon.
- 41 A.D. Derbe and the Lycaonian part of the eleventh Strategia of Cappadocia transferred to Galatia by Claudius on the restoration of Antiochus IV. (see DERBE).
- 63 A.D. Pontus Polemoniaccus, the kingdom of Polemon II., which retained its title even after incorporation (Ptol. v. 64).

¹ The eleventh Strategia dated probably from 129 B.C. (cp Justin, 371); it originally included also Derbe and Laranda. See Ramsay, Hist. Comm. 64 f. 106 f.

The core of the province was constituted by the old kingdom of Amyntas,—i.e., the territory of the three Celtic tribes with eastern Phrygia, Pisidia, Isauria, and Lycaonia,—so that all the towns mentioned in Acts 13 f. as visited by Paul (except those of Pamphylia) belonged at that time to the Province Galatia.

There is no literary evidence as to the constitution imposed upon the Province, and inscriptions other than epitaphs are rare in Galatia (see Anderson in J. Hell. Stud. 1952 f.).

The governor was a legatus Augusti pro prætorè—i.e., the province was imperial, but there were no legions within its borders. Ancyra, as being the old home of the Galatian kings, far exceeding, then as now (cp Murray, Handb. to AM 18), the other towns of the province in wealth, was the official capital. It had been an important city even before the Celts entered the country (JHS 1948).

In S. Galatia, Antioch (Colonia Casarea Antiocheia) was a sort of secondary capital, for it was in this region that the work of Romanisation was specially active from 10 B.C. to 50 A.D., as is clear from the number of Roman colonies founded by Augustus about 6 B.C. (besides Antioch, Lystra and Parlais in Lycaonia, Crema in Pisidia, Comama and Olbasa further W. Cp CIL 3, Suppl. no. 6974). 'These were connected by a system of roads which radiated from Antioch as the military centre of the whole of southern Galatia' (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AM 398 f.). Under succeeding Emperors, especially Claudius, this policy was continued, and several cities (e.g., Derbe and Iconium) were remodelled and renamed in Roman fashion.

In a special way the southern part of the province was important in Paul's time.

The two main roads from Ephesus to inner Asia traversed it, dividing at Apameia in Phrygia, the one to go N. of the 4. Settlement of Jews.

Sultan Daglı through Laodicea Combusta and Casarea in Cappadocia to the Euphrates, the other to go S. of the range through Antioch and Iconium and the Cilician Gates. To this fact we must mainly attribute the presence of large numbers of Jews in the cities of this region (see DELUGE, § 20, end). The Jewish colonies, indeed, dated from the time of the Seleucid kings, who established them with special privileges and citizen rights in their garrison towns in Asia Minor (Jos. Ant. xii. 31 and 34. Cp ῥόμος τῶν Ἰουδαίων in an inscription of Apameia, Rams. Cities and Bish. of Phrygia, 538, 668. See also Schürer, Hist. of Jews, E.T. ii. 2252 f.). Hence Paul's experiences in Acts 1314 141 Gal. 17 417. Ramsay has pointed out that the analogy between Jewish ceremonial and the entire native Phrygian and Lycaonian religious system would tend to increase the influence of the Jews (St. Paul, 141).

B. GALATIANS OF THE EPISTLE AND ACTS.

What remains of this article is devoted to the question, Where were the churches to which the epistle to the Galatians was sent?¹ The accepted opinion has been that they were in northern cities not mentioned in Acts. This opinion may conveniently be called the 'North Galatian theory.' The arguments in favour of it are discussed below (§§ 8-31). In recent years (see § 33) it has been proposed by many scholars to find the churches in the southern cities mentioned in Acts—Antioch, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra. This opinion may conveniently be called the 'South Galatian theory.' As Ramsay has said (Expos. '95b, p. 34), 'The central question as to the two Galatian theories . . . is so fundamental, that it affects almost every general enquiry whether in regard to Acts as a history and as a literary composition, or in regard to Paul's policy and character.'² The question should not be taken in too narrow a sense (Ramsay, Hist. Comm. 9).

I. Case for South Galatian Theory.

The official title of the vast province we have described, extending almost from sea to sea, was 'Galatia.'

This is proved by Ptolemy's enumeration of Talaria side by side with the other official titles of the provinces of Asia Minor, and by Pliny's definition of Galatia as extending S. to Pamphylia (HN 8146 f., attingit Galatia Pamphylia Carballiam et Milyas). It is also clear from Tacitus (Hist. 29, Galatiam et Pamphyliam provincias Calpurnio Asprenati regendas Galba permiserat [=68/69 A.D.]. Cp Rams. in Stud. Bibl. 421 f.).

Ramsay, however, contends that the Greek-speaking natives did not habitually call the province 'Galatia'; they called it the 'Galatic Province' (cp CIG 3991, an inscription of Iconium which speaks of an ἐπιτροπὸς ἡλατικῆς ἐπαρχίας), or else enumerated its parts. The use of the single term 'Galatia' implied the adoption of the Roman point of view, in which national distinctions counted as nothing before the imperial organisation. To this antithesis between the Roman and the native standpoint is traced the difference in phrase between the Epistles and Acts.

On the other hand, whilst it is now admitted that 'Galatia' was the official name of the province,¹ it is still maintained by those who favour the North Galatian theory that the derivative name 'Galatians' could not be used in addressing Pisidians and Lycaonians as it is used of the readers of Galatians in Gal. 3:1 (see below, § 29). This contention, however, is not convincing.

By the Romans the ethnic derived from the name of the province was regularly used to denote the inhabitants of that province, irrespective of internal national distinctions. This is conclusively proved by the exhaustive discussion of Ramsay (Stud. Bibl. 425 f.). On the other hand, the national appellations, such as Phryx or Lycao, were extra-Roman and servile (cp Momms, in Hermes, '84, p. 33 f.), and in their nature negative of that unity which was the imperial ideal. No general term for the whole population of the province Galatia other than 'Galatians' was possible for the Roman governor or for the Roman historian (Tac. Ann. 15:6, Pontica et Galatarrum Cappadocumque auxilia). The same is true, also, of the Roman Paul. Indeed no other address was possible in the case of men belonging to Roman colonies like Colonia Casareia Antiocheia (Antioch) and Colonia Julia Felix Gemina Lystra (Lystra), and of semi-Roman towns like Claud-Iconium (Iconium) and Claudian-Debe (Derbe). So long as we refuse to think of the four cities under these, their Roman names in Paul's time, we obscure for ourselves their true position within the province, and fail to grasp Paul's own Roman character and attitude towards the imperial system (Rams. St. Paul, 135, id. Was Christ born at Bethlehem? 52).

This argument can be met only by adherence to the old form of the North Galatian theory, that the 'Churches of Galatia' were the northern cities Ancyra, Pessinus, and Tavium (Lightf. Gal. 20; he doubtfully adds Juliopolis, which, however, belonged to Bithynia); but this view runs counter to the fact that the development of the northern part of the plateau resulted later, from the transference of the seat of government first to Nicomedia and afterwards to Constantinople (Rams. Hist. Geogr. of AN. 74, 107, 242). It further demands an erroneous interpretation of Acts 16:6, 18:23 (on these verses, see, however, § 9 f. 12-14), otherwise no record can be found in Acts of the foundation of churches in N. Galatia.

It is a significant fact, however, that the history of the North Galatian theory shows a steady tendency to place the scene of the apostle's activity ever farther southwards. Zöckler maintains the impossibility of Ancyra or Tavium, and restricts the churches of Galatia to Pessinus and the villages of the Axyion (St. Kr. 95, pp. 59, 79). Others hold that whilst the S. Galatian churches mentioned in Acts are addressed in the Ep., it includes also foundations, otherwise unknown, in N. Galatia. The South Galatian theory is that we have in Acts a complete list and a complete account of the foundation of the Galatian churches, and that Paul never travelled in any part of Galatia proper.

The attempt to restrict the application of the name 'Galatians' (Γαλάται) to those of Celtic blood is futile, as the majority of the inhabitants of Galatia proper must have been descended from the old conquered races, —the Phrygians or the Cappadocians together with, in Paul's time, Greeks, Romans, and Jews (cp, however, below, § 29, end). Especially in the towns must this have been the case (Van Gelder, Gal. revs).

It is true that even in the first century A.D. the Celtic element retained its distinctive characteristics (as late as the 4th cent. A.D., according to Jerome, the Celtic tongue, a dialect resembling that of the Gallic Treveri, was used side by side with Greek); yet no sound argument can be based upon the supposed correspondence between the characteristics of the Galatian converts (Gal. 5:19 f. 16) and those charged against the Gauls, though no doubt many passages may be quoted in support of such correspondence (cp Meyer-Sieffert, Brief an Gal. (9) 5). On this 'pedantic analysis' of Galatian character see Ramsay, Hist. Comm. 162.

The Roman provincial title 'Galatia' is not used in Acts; but in 166 we find the phrase τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν (EV 'region of Galatia'), and in ¹ The untenable position that it was not, first assumed by Schürer in JPT, '92, p. 471, was abandoned in TLZ, 30th Sept. '93, p. 506.

Acts 18:23, the phrase τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν καὶ Φρυγίαν (AV 'country of Galatia, RV 'region of Galatia'). The phrases are ambiguous, and various explanations have been proposed (see § 9 f. 12-14).

The question as to the precise significance of these phrases must be distinguished from that as to the locality of the Galatian churches. The latter question must be fought out on the field of geography and history; and the example of Zahn (Eint. 1:134) shows that essential acceptance of the S. Galatian theory is compatible with a desire to interpret the doubtful phrases as referring to N. Galatia. It is for the North Galatian theorists that the interpretation of the two expressions is of vital importance, if they wish to secure coincidence between Acts and the Epistles; otherwise they must fall back upon a theory of lacunæ which turns the edge of all criticism (Rams. Stud. Bibl. 4:16).

The holders of the accepted North Galatian view take the term 'Galatic country' (Γαλατικὴ χώρα) to be simply a synonym for 'Galatia' (Γαλατία) — i.e., Galatia proper.

6. Difficulty of accepted view. The argument against this is decisive: Why, if Paul and the writer of Acts both refer to Galatia proper, should they differ so remarkably as to the name, the writer of Acts employing a circumlocution which stands alone among all the references collected from ancient authors?¹ On the other hand, the adjective 'Galatic' (Γαλατικός) is used by Ptolemy and in the inscriptions² always in a definite special sense, to indicate the extensions of the original Galatia. Paul, writing as a Roman citizen, and from the Roman imperial standpoint, never uses any but Roman provincial titles³ (coinciding, of course, in some cases with pre-Roman national designations), whilst the Greek writer of Acts adopts the popular and colloquial usage of the more educated classes (Rams. in Expos., '98b, p. 125 f. = Hist. Comm. § 23, p. 314 f.).

The North Galatian view demands also that 'Phrygia' (Φρυγίαν) be a noun in both passages; but this only makes more pressing the question why the simple term 'Galatia' was not written.

Lightfoot (Gal. 22) correctly argued that the phrase of Acts 16:6 (see § 5, end) must denote a single territory to which the two epithets Phrygian and Galatian are applied — it was, in fact, the land originally inhabited by Phrygians, but subsequently occupied by Gauls. For the proof of this point as a matter of grammar, consult Ramsay (Church in R. Emp. 486, St. Paul, 210). The historical justification of the phrase, however, given by Lightfoot, though true, is inadmissible here, being quite out of harmony with the style of Acts, and failing to explain why the writer should have been at the pains to use a cumbersome expression that serves no purpose.

Accepting the unity of the expression in Acts 16:6, we may take it to be a 'general and comprehensive

7. South Galatian theory. description rather than as the exclusive denomination of any one particular district' (so Gifford in Expos. July '94, p. 12). It denotes then the borderlands of Galatia and Phrygia.⁴ This certainly gives a perfectly intelligible route to the apostle, from Antioch northwards as far perhaps as Nakoleia, where, being forbidden to cross into Bithynia, he turned westwards (Acts 16:7).

The route from Antioch to Nakoleia, however, lay well within the borders of Asian Phrygia (since the boundaries of Asia fell E. of Troknades, Orkistos, and Amorion, according to Ramsay [Hist. Geogr. 172] and Wadd. [Astes, 25]). The only road to which the description 'Phrygian and Galatian' is really applicable is the direct road from Iconium to Dorylaion (Eskei Sheher), the modern araba route from Konia to Constantinople, lying many miles E. of that suggested by Gifford (cp Rams.

² 'Pontus Galaticus', CIL 3, Suppl. 6818; 'Phrygia Galatica' in Acta Sanct. 20th Sept., p. 563, as emended by Rams. (in urbe Antiocheia Pisidia ex regione Phrygia Galatica, where the MS has Galacia. See Stud. Bibl. 4:26). In CIG 3991, Γαλατικὴ ἐπαρχία is the enlarged province (date of this inscr. = 54 A.D.).

⁴ Lightfoot seems to approximate to this view in his Coloss. (9) 24.

op. cit. 198). From the supposition that Paul diverged N. from Iconium, the natural inference is that the prohibition to speak in Asia was given at Iconium, or at Lystra, and that Paul did not go on to Antioch (though his intention had been to visit all the churches, Acts 15:36: κατὰ πόλιν πᾶσαν).

In the second place, Lightfoot is certainly right in his remark (Coloss. 26 n.) that the boundaries of the province Galatia were drawn with precision.

We must not take our own ignorance of the details of the frontier line as indicating any uncertainty as to the actual limits of jurisdiction of the various governors. Even though such uncertainty might obtain in particular districts, the question still remains unanswered, why here alone the writer of Acts has been careful to insist upon the ambiguity, if such there was.

Ramsay follows Lightfoot in the translation of Acts 16:6, rendering 'the Phrygo-Galatic territory' (so RV 'the region of Phrygia and Galatia,' as against AV 'Phrygia and the region of Galatia'). He differs from him, however, in the explanation, holding that the various parts of the province were to some unknown extent distinct, and were termed χώραι, Regiones.¹ Two of these Regiones were traversed by Paul in Acts 16:1-6 18:23—viz., Galatic Phrygia and Galatic Lycaonia.

The 'Phrygia[n] region' (Φρυγία χ.; more fully 'the Phrygia[n] and Galatic region, ἡ Φρυγία καὶ Γαλατικὴ χώρα, as in Acts 16:6=Phrygia Galatica) was that part of Phrygia which belonged to the province Galatia, containing the cities Antioch and Iconium (cp Acts 14:6, where the E. boundary of the Phrygian part of the province is put between Iconium and Lystra).

Just as SE. Phrygia lay in Galatia Provincia, whilst NW. Phrygia lay in the province of Asia (hence called Ἀσιαὴ Φρυγία by Galen, 4:312), so E. Lycaonia formed part of the kingdom of Antiochus (hence called Lycaonia Antiochiana, CIL 10 8660), whilst W. Lycaonia lay in the province Galatia (and was probably called Lycaonia Galatica: cp Lycius Galaticus). It is obvious that these two sections of Lycaonia might also be spoken of respectively as the 'region of Antiochus' (Ἀντιοχειαὴ χώρα; so Ptol. v. 6:17) and the 'Galatic region' (Γαλατικὴ χώρα: Acts 18:23).

In Acts 16:6 the Phrygo-Galatic district is given the full name; but in Acts 18:23 it is simply called ἡ Φρυγία (χώρα);² in the latter passage the Lycaono-Galatic region, of the cities Derbe and Lystra (Acts 14:6), is also mentioned, under the title Γαλατικὴ χώρα.

Ramsay further holds that Paul was 'actually in Asia' when the prohibition to preach reached him (Church in R. Emp. (6) 75).

Ramsay refuses therefore to understand the participle 'having been forbidden' (κωλυθέντες) as giving the reason for the step described in the words 'they went through the region of Phrygia and Galatia' (διήλθον . . . χώραν), arguing that the order of verbs is also the order in time (ib. 89); in short, that AV 'and were forbidden' is correct (as though the Greek ran διήλθον . . . καὶ ἐκωλύθησαν). This is not impossible, though harsh. It is noteworthy, however, that in his St. Paul, Ramsay follows Lightfoot (Bibl. Ess. 237) in retaining the reading (διελθόντες) of the inferior MSS, upon purely subjective grounds³ that can have no weight against the authority of the great MSS. The aorist, 'they went through' (διήλθον) must be read, and the participle 'having been prevented' (κωλυθέντες) gives the reason, not so much for the action 'they went through . . . region' (διήλθον . . . χώραν), as for the suppressed verb implied in the emphasis put upon the expression 'the Phrygia[n] and Galatic region' as opposed to 'in Asia'—'they made a tour of the Phrygo-Galatic region (only, and confined themselves to that), having been forbidden,' etc.⁴

The point at which the prohibition was received is immaterial, and is in no wise indicated, but is most naturally assumed to have been Antioch.

In opposition to Ramsay, who, on grounds never fully explained, regards Acts 16:6-10 as 'the most remarkable, the most emotional, and the most instructive paragraph

² So Ramsay, taking Φρυγία as an adjective. It may be a noun and yet bear the same significance, for in inscriptions of Antioch the noun is often used = Galatic Phrygia, CIL 3, Suppl. 6818 and 6819.

³ Ramsay, St. Paul, 195, 'The succession of participles suits so perfectly the strange and unique character, the hurry, and the deep-lying emotion of the passage . . . the unusual emotion demanded the unusual expression.'

in Acts' (Church in R. Emp. 484), we must call attention to the hiatus between διήλθον and ἐλθόντες.

All mention of entry upon Asian Phrygia is omitted, together with the reasons which led to such entry; for it is only by anticipation from the subsequent 'they assayed to go into Bithynia' that such reason (i.e., the desire to evangelize Bithynia) can be adduced. Seeing that at the outset no intention of opening up new ground was expressed by Paul (Acts 16:36; the implication seen in the face of the words τοὺς ὄντας ἐν τοῖς τόποις ἐκείνοις), we require some explanation of his going N. instead of retracing his steps, or descending to Attalia, as on the first journey (Acts 14:25).¹ (Cp, however, below, § 10 n.)

Further, we must not demand a too rigid parallelism in meaning between the phrases of Acts 16:6 and 18:23. The North Galatian view makes them mean precisely the same thing, accounting for the difference in form by saying that the route was reversed on the third journey; and Ramsay, but for different reasons, regards 'Phrygia' (Φρυγίαν) of Acts 18:23 as equivalent to the whole expression 'the Phrygia[n] and Galatic region' (τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν) of Acts 16:6. Acts 18:23, however, should rather be brought into closer connection than is usually the case with the resumption of the narrative in Acts 19:1 after the digression about Apollos. The word 'Phrygia' (Φρυγίαν) must be taken in Acts 18:23 in the sense natural and obvious in this passage, as a noun (cp Acts 2:10). It here indicates the non-Galatian part of Phrygia, the special region thereof being particularised as 'the upper country' (τὰ ἀνωτερικὰ μέρη of Acts 19:1) which, following Ramsay (Church in R. Emp. 94), we explain as the district traversed by the shorter hill-road by way of Seiblia and the Cayster Valley. In his most recent utterances Ramsay connects the introduction of Christianity into Eumeneia and this region with this passage (Cities and Bish. of Phrygia, 2:502 715; cp Expos. '95a, p. 389).

That 'Phrygia' in Acts 18:23 is to be taken as including, or even solely signifying, Asian Phrygia is supported by the paraphrase given by Asterius, bishop of Amaseia, in Pontus, about 400 A.D.—μετῆλθεν οὖν ἐκ Κορίνθου πρὸς τὴν τῶν Πισιδιῶν χώραν εἰτα τὴν Λυκαονίαν καὶ τὰς τῆς Φρυγίας πόλεις καταλαβὼν, κακέσθεν τὴν Ἀσίαν ἐπισκεψάμενος, εἰτα τὴν Μακεδονίαν, κωιδὸς ἦν τῆς οἰκουμένης διδάσκαλος (Patr. Gr., ed. Migne, xl, Hom. 8). The traditional confusion of the Syrian with the Pisidian Antioch does not justify Zahn (Eintl. 1:136) in setting this evidence aside as a mere false inference. The passage proves that Asterius interpreted 'the Galatic region' (τὴν Γαλατικὴν χώραν) of Acts 18:23 as Lycaonia (against the N. Galatian hypothesis); but it also proves that he took Φρυγίαν to signify the country between the Galatic region and Asia (using the latter term in the narrower Byzantine sense). A possible rejoinder might be based upon the words 'confirming all the disciples,' in Acts 18:23—that, on the hypothesis expressed above, there could not have been any 'disciples' in Asian Phrygia at the time of Paul's passage through that region. Yet we must grant the probability of the expansion of the teaching from the Christian centres in Galatian Phrygia and Lycaonia even as from Ephesus in Asia at a later date. Paul's work would be wrongly conceived as that of a pioneer simply. W* J. W.

II. Case for North Galatian Theory.

The following paragraphs are devoted to a statement of the reasons which in the view of the writer compel adoption of the North Galatian theory.

1. General case for North Galatian theory.—It may perhaps conduce to a dispassionate consideration of these if it is pointed out at once that the question is, after all, not one of first-rate moment. How comparatively subordinate in importance it is is illustrated even in the strange way in which it has severed allies and united opponents.²

It would be a great mistake to imagine that the establishment of the South Galatian theory would mean the vindication of the thorough credibility of the whole

¹ So also Zahn (Eintl. 1:135) rightly protests against the invariable but unjustifiable assumption that Bithynia was Paul's goal from the moment that Asia was closed against him. 'De Absicht aber, nach B. vorzudringen, wird erst in dem Moment gedacht, wo P. nahe an der Grenze B. und zugleich an einen Punkt stand, wo eine andere Strasse nach Mysien abging.'

² Thus we find conservative theologians like Zahn and Zöckler ranged on opposite sides, and similarly critical writer like Hausrath and Lipsius—Zahn and Hausrath supporting the South, and Zöckler and Lipsius the North Galatian theory of Acts, or that to prove the North Galatian theory would be to discredit the book entirely. Only a few sections of Acts are involved. The rest of the book has to be tried by other tests (ACTS, §§ 2 4-7 12-14; cp also such articles as APOLLOS, BARNESUS, CORNELIUS, CHRISTIAN, COMMUNITY, COUNCIL, SIMON MAGUS, THEUDAS). Nor can acceptance of the North Galatian theory be said to cast a reflection on the author of Acts that is excessively grave. He has not stated what is untrue; he has simply omitted to mention a subject at its proper place and touched upon it very slightly when he mentions it later—the subject, namely, of the founding of the Galatian churches. Much more serious (to confine ourselves to Galatia) is a shortcoming of a different kind—his total failure, namely, to mention another matter of which we learn from the epistle to the Galatians. The appearance of the Judaizers, their baleful influence, and Paul's polemic against them constitute one of the most important chapters in the history of early Christianity, and yet Acts does not mention them at all. Still this charge does not depend on the acceptance of the North Galatian theory; it is quite as serious from the point of view of the other. It is unnecessary, however, to anticipate here what will have to be said later (see § 19); we proceed accordingly to lay down a general basis for the discussion of the question which ought to be treated as purely historical.

It is established beyond dispute that in Paul's time the districts in which are situated Derbe, Lystra, Iconium, and Antiochia Pisidia—i.e., the cities visited by him on what is usually called his first missionary journey (Acts 13 f.)—belonged to Galatia Provincia (see above, § 3), and that in official usage the word Galatia also included them.¹

Derbe and Lystra lay in that part of Lycaonia which had been added to the province of Galatia; Iconium and Antioch in the portion of Phrygia² which then belonged to the same province.

Thus it becomes in a general way not impossible that the epistle to the Galatians may have been addressed to the churches of South or New Galatia.

ii. Any churches in North Galatia?—The possibility would be changed into certitude if Paul had founded no churches at all in North Galatia. In that case Acts 166 1823, the only places in Acts where mention is made of Galatia, would have to be understood of South Galatia, for churches in Galatia are presupposed in 1823 at least.

Ramsay, the most recent and most cautious advocate of this theory in Great Britain, at the outset, and even down to p. 77 f. of the 3rd ed. of his 1823 Church, identified the 'cities' traversed by Paul and Silas according to Acts 164 f. with the four we have mentioned—Derbe and Lystra (already visited in 161), Iconium (incidentally mentioned in 162), and Antioch (last named in 1421). On this view he explained the 'And they went through' (διήλθον δέ) of 166 as 'geographical recapitulation of the journey' through the ¹ See especially Pliny, HN v. 42 146 f.; Ptol. v. 4 11 f.; also Pliny, HN v. 27 95; Tac. Ann. 13 35 156, cp Hist. 2 9; cp Ramsay in St. bibl. et eccles. 4 21-39, and Exp., '986, p. 129 f. = Historical Commentary on Galatians, 318-320 (chap. 24).

² At that time Iconium belonged, more strictly, to Lycaonia. Acts 146, however, seems to represent Lycaonia as being first entered on the way from Iconium to Lystra. Ramsay, therefore (Church, chap. 2 5), assumes that the author is here following the ancient popular usage in accordance with which Iconium belonged to Phrygia; so in Xenophon (Anab. i. 2 19) and even down to the second century A.D. According to Ramsay (chap. 2 3), Antioch in Paul's time belonged to Phrygia, and ought to have been called 'on the side of Pisidia' (ἡ πρὸς Πισιδίᾳ), to distinguish it from a city of the same name on the Mæander, on the border of Phrygia and Caria. From this, he considers, came the abbreviation (Acts 13 14) 'Pisidian Antioch' (Ἀντιόχεια ἡ Πισιδία), whilst at a later date the conception Pisidia was so far extended that it included Antioch, and the reading of D, 'Antioch of Pisidia' (Ἀντιόχεια τῆς Πισιδίας), came to be appropriate. The non-Galatian portion of Lycaonia constituted the kingdom of king Antiochus; the non-Galatian portion of Phrygia belonged to the province of Asia.

second pair of these four cities, Iconium and Antioch—that is to say, through Galatian Phrygia.

On the other hand, in an appendix to the same book, p. xiii, he finds in 164 f. only the Lycaonian-Galatian churches, Derbe and Lystra, named in 161, together with the Syrian and Cilician, mentioned in 1541, and no longer says of 166 that it recapitulates the journey, but that the journey 'is resumed from Lystra'—as from the last point which, according to the narrative, Paul and Silas had reached. In agreement with this, in St. Paul, chap. 8 1 (180 f.), he expressly controverts the interpretation of 162 according to which Paul had already reached Iconium by way of Lystra.

In both views of the matter, however, Ramsay takes 'the Phrygia(n) and Galatic region' (τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χ.) to mean the regio—i.e., the portion of the province which by its ancient popular name is Phrygian, but by its new official designation is Galatian. Thus he takes 'and' (καὶ) as = sive, and 'Phrygia' as adjectival, just as 'Galatic' is. In 1823, according to Church⁽³⁾, chap. 5, n. 1 (p. 90), 'the same territory' is intended as in 166; all that we have is a 'variation in form' (or 'in order')—'the Galatic region and Phrygia' (τ. Γαλατικὴν χ. καὶ Φρυγίαν)—and this is 'correct and excellent, if "Phrygia" here is a noun.'

For further elucidation Ramsay refers to p. 93. There, however, we find him expressing another view, namely, that in 1823 are included not only Iconium and Antioch but also Derbe and Lystra. 'If the writer wished to carry out this complicated phraseology he would have had to say: Lycaono-Galatic and Phrygo-Galatic. He avoids the difficulty by using the simple phrase: the Galatic country.' 'The Galatic region' thus, according to Ramsay, here includes the Lycaonian and the Phrygian portion of the province of Galatia. This is implied, also, in the expression immediately following the words quoted above: 'after traversing which, Paul would reach Asian Phrygia.' On this view, accordingly, 'Phrygia' in 1823 denotes, not (as in 166) the portion of Phrygia belonging to the province of Galatia, but that which belonged to the province of Asia.

In the appendix (p. xiii) Ramsay expresses a third view—that in 1823 'Galatic region' is only 'Lycaonia Galatica, whilst "Phrygia" is Phrygia Galatica.'¹

Further, as regards the prohibition to preach in Asia—i.e., according to Ramsay, in the province of Asia—Ramsay's former view (Church⁽³⁾, 75; also app. p. xiii) was that Paul had already received it in Antiochia Pisidia. In the Expos., '95a, p. 392, and in Church⁽⁴⁾, 75, however, he maintains that it came to him only after he had already entered the province of Asia. In either view, however, this 'being prevented' (κωλυθέντες) comes in point of time after 'they went through' (διήλθον)—what Ramsay holds to be linguistically possible (διήλθον κωλυθέντες = διήλθον καὶ ἐκωλύθησαν = διελθόντες ἐκωλύθησαν; Church, chap. 4 ad fn., p. 89 in 3rd and 4th editions, in 4th ed. also 485 f.; St. Paul, chap. 9 4, u. 2). At the same time, he declares (Expos. '95a, p. 393, n. 1; Church⁽⁴⁾, 486) his South Galatian theory to be 'perfectly consistent with taking κωλυθέντες ["being prevented"] as giving the reason for διήλθον ["went through"].' It is hard to perceive how this can be; but, in any case, as has been noted above (§ 7), Ramsay has changed his position, inasmuch as now (St. Paul, ch. 9 1 [p. 195 f.]), along with Lightfoot (Bibl. Ess. 237 f.), he follows the 'inferior manuscripts' (reading 'And having traversed . . . having been forbidden . . . having come over against Mysia, they attempted, etc.'): similarly AV; διελθόντες δέ . . . κωλυθέντες . . . ἐλθόντες κατὰ τὴν Μυσίαν ἐπέτραζον, etc.). This reading of TR suits the South Galatian theory admirably; but the reason he gives for preferring it is purely subjective (see above, col.

¹ Similarly St. Paul, chap. 5 46 (pp. 104, 111 f.); Stud. bibl. et eccles. 4 56; Church⁽⁴⁾, 482 f. and 90*, whilst p. 93, word for word agreeing with Church⁽³⁾, follows the second view. And in St. Paul, chap. 9 4, n. 1 (p. 210 f.); Stud. bibl. et eccles. l.c.; Church⁽⁴⁾, 90* 483; Gal. introd., § 19, p. 209, he holds 'Phrygia' (Φρυγίαν) in 1823 to be an adjective. See below, § 13. He has not changed his view of 166.

1595, n. 3). Considerations of this kind do not admit of argument; but it may be said that the MSS HLP which support the reading have no weight.

With regard to the correct reading 'they went through, being prevented' (διήλθον . . . κωλυθέντες), it has to be maintained that the participle 10. No; to must contain, if not something antecedent to 'they went' (διήλθον), at least something synchronous with it, in no case a thing subsequent to it, if all the rules of grammar and all sure understanding of language are not to be given up.

Synchronism is what is denoted by the aorist participle (for example) in 124, where it precedes the verb, and in 1726, where it follows it;¹ 2335 and even 2513 must be similarly taken if the text is to be accepted (WH conjecture some primitive error, and prefer with cursives, Vg., etc., the fut. ἀσπασόμενοι). In 166, however, 'being prevented' (κωλυθέντες) could be conceived to refer to something synchronous with 'they went' (διήλθον) only if Asia ('Asia') could be taken to denote the same country as 'the Phrygia(n) and Galatic region' (ἡ Φρυγία καὶ Γαλατικὴ χώρα). In point of fact, however, only Phrygia can be taken to mean a portion of Asia, and that only in one case—viz., when 'Asia' is understood as meaning the entire province of that name; yet Galatia, whether taken as designating a district of country or as the name of a province, is in any case distinct from Asia.

Thus 'being prevented' (κωλυθέντες) must be held to have been antecedent to 'they went' (διήλθον). Again, as Ramsay himself assumes, the prohibition to preach in Asia cannot naturally be supposed to have been made until Paul had entered Asia, or (at least) was on the point of doing so. From Lystra, where we left him (162[-5]), it is impossible to pass directly into Asia (the nearest portion of which would be Asian Phrygia); Asia could be entered only after traversing Galatian Phrygia (Iconium and Antioch). This region, accordingly, must have been passed through before the occurrence of the 'preventing' (κωλυθῆναι). Now, if a journey through this same Galatian Phrygia (as Ramsay understands the geographical name) is indicated in the text as having followed the 'preventing', the journey in question can only have consisted in a renewed visit to the churches which had just been left. If this were what the author really meant, he would expose himself to a charge of very great carelessness for not having been more explicit; but if he did not know that a return was involved, an accusation of geographical confusion would become inevitable. Moreover, it would be contrary to the whole practice of Paul (see e.g., 167 f.), because he had been prohibited from preaching in a given district, to give up all search for a new field for his activities, and consent to have his mission brought to a stand in a country which he had just left as being already sufficiently provided for.²

Thus, we must take 'the Phrygia(n) and Galatic region' (τὴν Φρυγιαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν) to mean something

² This improbable supposition seems to be the inevitable result even of the attempt made above in § 7. If the prohibition to preach in Asia (Acts 166) constitutes the reason, not for the journey of Paul and Silas through the Galatian portion of Phrygia (and thus through Iconium and Antiochia Pisidia), but for a fact which the reader is left to infer from the explanation given, viz., that 'they confined themselves to this region', then they must either have remained in Antioch, which according to § 7 they had already reached, or they must have retraced their steps. Moreover, we fail to find that any such additional fact is suggested by the simple statement 'And they went through', etc. (διήλθον δὲ, κ.τ.λ.), or that when supplied it harmonises with the subsequent context. According to v. 7 Paul and Silas did not confine themselves to the Phrygo-Galatian territory, but advanced farther to the N. Thus in very deed we have a 'hiatus';—not, however, between 'they went through' (διήλθον, v. 6) and '[Then] they went' (ἔλθόντες, v. 7), two expressions which, on the view we are about to develop, hang excellently well together, but between the (supplied) notion that Paul and Silas were restricted to Phrygo-Galatia, and the actual continued journey to the N. (ἔλθόντες, etc.). The 'hiatus' is obviated as soon as the supplement is taken away.

else than Galatian Phrygia (or otherwise Galatian Lycaonia). In that case, however, the only remaining alternative is to take 'Galatic region' as meaning Old Galatia. 'Phrygia' can then be that portion of Galatian Phrygia which—if we assume the prohibition to preach in Asia to have been received in Galatian Phrygia—Paul and Silas had not yet traversed, but had to traverse in order to reach North Galatia: or it can be Asian Phrygia, if they thought they could reach North Galatia by this route more easily, or if they had already entered Asian Phrygia before the prohibition came. That this last is what had actually occurred is now assumed, as already mentioned, by Ramsay himself; and that it was only the preaching in Asia that was interdicted, not the travelling through it, is excellently argued by himself from the fact that in 167, at Bithynia, mention of the prohibition to travel through it is expressly added.

It is objected that North Galatia is very difficult of access to travellers. Broadly, however, this cannot be granted if we look at the roads which are shown in Ramsay's own map.¹ That Judaizers in particular were able to find their way thither easily enough is shown by the fact that Jewish names occur in as many as five inscriptions of Old [North] Galatia (CIG 34045 4074 4088 4092; add 4087 with Ramsay, Gal., introd., § 15, p. 169, and REJ 1077 [185]). The only point for consideration is as to whether Paul and Silas could have found a tolerable route into North Galatia from their last halting-place before 166. If, as Ramsay will have it, this halting-place was Antiochia Pisidia, the direct route northwards lay over the Sultân Dagh. If this range could not be crossed, it was possible to go round it, either eastward through Galatian Phrygia or westward through Asian Phrygia. The only remaining geographical difficulty is as to how they could subsequently get out of North Galatia κατὰ τὴν Μυσίαν (167). Whether we take this to mean 'over against Mysia' (cp 277), or 'in the neighbourhood of Mysia,' is immaterial; in either case, a point is intended from which it would be possible to go to Bithynia also. Such a point is best found in Asian Phrygia.

Although North Galatia is the last region mentioned as traversed before 167, we are not precluded from supposing that, after passing through some part of Phrygia into North Galatia, Paul and Silas actually made their way from North Galatia into the northern part of Asian Phrygia. Ramsay assumes that the journey from 166 to 167 must have been due N. through Asian Phrygia. Thus, North Galatia would be excluded because not named. This assumption, however, is not compelled by the text. Even on Ramsay's interpretation of 166 as referring to Galatian Phrygia, the journey through one district is omitted in Acts—that, namely, through Asian Phrygia—unless 'being prevented' (κωλυθέντες) is to be taken as subsequent to 'they went' (διήλθον). At this point, in fact, the narrative is curt; and assuredly it admits of being filled up in the sense indicated above quite as readily as in that advocated by Ramsay.

In 1823 the text is explicit in favour of the assumption that Paul's route was directed to North Galatia and lay through Cappadocia, in other words, somewhat as follows:—via Arabissos, Kokussos, Arasaxa, Matiane, Archelais, Parnassos, and then Ancrya, Germa, Pessinus.

Had Paul gone through Cilicia to South Galatia, he would certainly have strengthened the Cilician churches also; and this would have been mentioned, as in 1541, all the more because in 1823 stress is laid upon 'in order' (καθ' ἑξῆς). That is further a reason why we should not think of this third journey (if North

Galatia is regarded as its goal) as having, nevertheless, been taken (as the second had been) through Cilicia and South Galatia (cp § 17). In that case, moreover, the idea conveyed by 'Galatic region' (Γαλατική χώρα) would become unclear.

According to what has just been said, the Phrygia of 18₂₃ will be not the Galatian but the Asian Phrygia, as the route from N. Galatia to Ephesus (19₁) lay through the latter, not through the former (see above, § 11, note, and § 7, end). In 166 also we must understand the Asian Phrygia, not the Galatian, a question which up to this point of the enquiry has been left open (cp, further, § 15, end). The successive journeys, then, are to be figured thus: according to 166, Paul had already come from South Galatia westwards as far as to Asia (for what we are to understand, more exactly, by this, see below, §§ 14 f.), or at least to the neighbourhood of Asia; then, in consequence of the prohibition to preach there, he directed his steps in a north-easterly direction, and reached North [Old] Galatia through Asian Phrygia.

If it be felt, with Ramsay, that North Galatia had too unimportant a place in the movement of the world to deserve to be chosen by Paul as a mission field, it always remains open to us to suppose his objective to have been East Bithynia, that he tarried in North Galatia on the way only on account of illness, and that as soon as he had recovered sufficiently he made for West Bithynia.

According to 18₂₃, on the other hand, if we do not neglect the changed order of the words, he travelled from the E. through Cappadocia into North Galatia in the first instance, and afterwards into Asian Phrygia and thence to Ephesus.

Linguistically also the North Galatian theory thus offers three great advantages. First, it enables us to interpret 'Galatic region' (Γαλατική χώρα) in both passages consistently; so also 'Phrygia' (Φρυγία); whilst, according to Ramsay's second view (referred to above; see § 9), both expressions and, according to his third view, 'Galatic region,' have to be taken in 18₂₃ in a sense different from that which they bear in 166. Secondly, it does justice to the changed order in which the words occur, which Ramsay certainly does not. Lastly, on this view the association of the two geographical names becomes correct, whilst in 18₂₃ alike according to the second and according to the third view of Ramsay, we have the anomaly that the first member of the pair is designated by the name of the province of which it forms a part, whilst the second is designated by its own special name without any indication of the province to which it belongs.

On Ramsay's second interpretation, according to which the two districts belong to separate provinces, uniformity would have demanded that both provinces should be named—the Galatic and the Asian region (though, indeed, this would not tell which region of each of the provinces is intended). The confusion of the text of Acts 18₂₃ would be the more incredible because the second member would denote the Phrygian region without more precise designation, whilst the first member ἡ χώρα contains, as Ramsay holds, a Phrygian region—namely, that belonging to the province of Galatia.

According to Ramsay's third view both members belong to the same province—Galatia. On that hypothesis it becomes all the more inconceivable that the first member (Galatian Lycaonia) should be called simply 'the Galatian region,' as if the second (Galatian Phrygia) were not equally a Galatian region. As on Ramsay's second view we should have expected to read 'the Galatian and the Asian region,' so, on his third, uniformity would demand 'the Lycaonian and the Phrygian region' (supply, 'of the province of Galatia').

Ramsay now says (St. Paul, chap. 5 4 6) that in Lycaonia 'Galatic region (Γαλατική χώρα) without qualification was a current expression used to distinguish the Galatian Lycaonia from that region of Lycaonia which belonged to king Antiochus. If this be so, we have in this member of the phrase not an official but a quite local expression. How, then, could any writer have coupled with this as a second member, by the use of a common article, another expression which has no local usage to justify it?

Who could be expected to understand even this second expression correctly? According to Ramsay—St. Paul represents his third view—only (Galatian Phrygia is intended; but the author says 'Phrygia' without qualification. Moreover, who could be expected to understand the first expression? In Phrygia also one could equally well use the phrase 'Galatic region' (Γαλατική χώρα), without qualification, to distinguish Galatian Phrygia from Asian Phrygia. In fact, Ramsay himself (*Church*⁴, 482 f.) adds: 'When persons at a distance distinguished the two parts [viz., of Lycaonia], they of course substituted ['Lycaonia'] Λυκαονία for ['region'] χώρα, designating them as Lycaonia Antiochiana and Lycaonia Galatica.' This is exactly what the author of Acts does not do.

In a word, we have here three pieces of carelessness which Ramsay ought not to have attributed to an author whom he ranks as a historian with Thucydides (St. Paul, p. 3 f.). On the North Galatian theory the meaning of 'Galatic region' (Γαλατική χώρα) is clear without any knowledge of local phraseology.

Ramsay (Church, 79-81, 90f., Exp., '98b, pp. 126-128 = Gal. 314-316 [chap. 23]) maintains that for North

13. In spite Galatia the form 'Galatia' (Γαλατία) is always used, and urges the adjectival form 'Galatic' as proving that a region of 'Γαλατική χώρα.' added to Galatia only at a later date is intended. As an analogy he cites Pontus Galaticus. In this case, however, the indication that the district did not originally belong to Galatia lies not in the adjective but in the substantive (Pontus); and the case will not be changed even if, for the sake of brevity, the substantive is dropped, for the reader would still have supplied the word Pontus. The substantive 'region' (χώρα), also, Ramsay considers to be against the interpretation 'Old Galatian,' and to point to a new district recently added; and the position is supported (*Church*⁴, 483) by the newly-adopted rendering of 'Phrygia' (Φρυγία) in 18₂₃ as an adjective, inasmuch as hereby, besides the Lycaonian, the Phrygian district which had been newly added to Galatia is designated as 'region' (χώρα). But in Mk. 15 'the Judæa region' (ἡ Ἰουδαία χώρα) is quite the same as 'Judæa' (ἡ Ἰουδαία) in the parallel Mt. 35. In truth, it is quite arbitrary to assume, as Ramsay does, that region (χώρα) must necessarily be the Greek equivalent for regio in the sense of an officially delimited division of a province. If 'region' (χώρα) in a non-official sense means simply 'district,' then 'Galatic region' (Γαλατική χώρα) will naturally mean the district inhabited by Galatians properly so-called—i.e., 'Old' [North] Galatia. Nor would this meaning be excluded even if 'region' (χώρα) were to be taken in the official sense.

There is, however, absolutely nothing remarkable in the author's employment of the non-official language. He does it, for example, also in Lk. 28 8 26 15₁₃₋₁₅ 19₁₂ Acts 10₃₉ 26₂₀ (cp Jn. 11 54). In so doing he follows the usage of the LXX (ἡ χώρα τῶν Χαλδαίων, Gen. 11 28 31 Neh. 9 7; τῶν Ἀσσυρίων, Is. 27 13; τῶν Ἰουδαίων, Is. 19 17; ἐν χώρα Ἀιγυπτίων, Is. 19 19; Ἀιγύπτου, Is. 19 20; εἰς γῆν Σηεῖρ εἰς χώραν Ἐδώμ, Gen. 32 3 [4] [χώρα thus = γῆ: just as in 11 28 31 γῆ and χώρα are parallel]). This use of language deprives of all force Ramsay's question (Exp., '98b, p. 126 = Gal. 314 [ch. 23]): 'Why should Luke alone employ everywhere a different name for the country, diverging from the universal usage of Greek and Latin writers, and also from his master Paul?' Lk.'s use of 'region' (χώρα) shows that he is employing not (in a strict sense) a name but a periphrasis as in Acts 10₃₉ 26₂₀ (χώρα τῆς Ἰουδαίας). Perhaps the purpose of the periphrasis is to suggest the participation of the inhabitants in the events recorded (cp col. 1604, n. 3). It may even be conjectured that Lk. uses 'region' (χώρα) in the non-official sense in all the other passages also (Acts 13 49 [as in Lk. 15 14], Acts 12 20 Lk. 31), perhaps also in Acts 8 1, although the plural (χώραι) can also mean the country districts as contrasted with the town, as in Lk. 21 21. As for the divergence from the practice of Paul in particular, since that apostle would certainly have found such a periphrasis inappropriate in passages so formal as Gal. 12:1, 1 Cor. 16:1 (2 Tim. 4:10), we are unable to find in these few passages any proof that he never expressed himself otherwise. On the other hand, we cannot share Ramsay's presupposition that the author of Acts was a companion of Paul and painfully followed his manner of expressing himself except in cases where he could follow a usage that had a Greek rather than a Roman flavour (see next col., note 2, end).

Ramsay insists that, on account of the common article, the words 'the Phrygia(n) and Galatic region'

(τὴν Φρυγίαν καὶ Γαλατικὴν χώραν) in 166 must denote a single territory, which must thus have lain in South Galatia. This cannot be conceded, if only because 'and' (καὶ) in the sense of 'or' (ἢ) can never be the rule, but only at most a rare exception.¹

Ramsay himself has withdrawn this contention by his further elaboration of his argument in the Expos., '956, pp. 26-40. There he says rightly, that the writer of Acts regards two substantives, when he takes them together under one article, as a unity only in a certain sense—namely, as a pair. He denies the applicability of this rule to 166, not because in this passage we are dealing with adjectives, not substantives, but only because the two, if regarded as different countries, would belong to different provinces ('Phrygia' [Φρυγία]), he says rightly, on this view—that is, on the North Galatian theory—must be the part pertaining to the province of Asia), and because, accordingly, preaching had been prohibited in Phrygia but not in Galatia.

Even if this distinction had to be made, there was nothing in it to prevent the writer, in so summary a narrative, from including both districts under one article.² To do so became still easier as he employed the common substantive 'region,' χώρα (it is best, with Ramsay, to take 'Phrygia' [Φρυγία] in 166, as well as in 1823, as an adjective).³

Apart from this, there is another answer to Ramsay's objection. If by Phrygia (following one of the two possibilities mentioned above, § 10, end) we are to understand the remaining portion of Galatian Phrygia which Paul and Silas had still to traverse before entering North Galatia, the prohibition to preach applies to this just as little as to the 'Galatic region' (Γαλατικὴ χώρα). Or, if Asian Phrygia is intended—the conclusion come to under § 11—and by Asia not the entire province of Asia but only 'in the popular sense' 'the Ægean coast lands' without Phrygia (§ 15; cp Ramsay, Church, chap. 82), the prohibition to preach applies to Phrygia as little as to the 'Galatic region' and the two quite accurately constitute a pair.

It would not, it is true, be permissible to take 'Asia' in this popular sense if the view held by Ramsay—formerly at least (Church, 82)—were correct: the view, namely, that the narrative of Paul's travels—all of them, not merely the 'we' portions—under Paul's influence invariably uses the geographical expressions that were capable of more than one meaning in the official Roman sense, and that Luke, the author of the narrative, is distinguished by this from the usage of Acts elsewhere, which in 29 f. (where Phrygia is mentioned along with

² Ramsay (Expos., '956, pp. 29-33) does not venture to allege that in Acts two districts can be grouped under a common article only when they are politically connected; he is constrained to add that this may happen also if they constitute a unity for the purpose of the mission. Even this, however, hardly holds good in 15:3, and certainly not in 19:21 or in—what he himself recognises as an exception—27:5.

³ Ramsay is mistaken in supposing that the adjectival character of 'Phrygia' (Φρυγία) is an argument against the North Galatian theory.

Asia), and perhaps also in 6:9, follows the popular use. Even at this earlier date, however, Ramsay found himself forced to concede that, in the case of Iconium, Lk. follows the popular usage (see above, col. 1597, n. 2). As Ramsay now completely identifies the author of the entire book of Acts with the author of the journey-narrative (St. Paul, ch. 171), he is all the less justified in attributing to the latter in 166 a conception of 'Asia' different from that in 29.¹ Moreover, the critical view of Acts regards both passages as due to the author of the complete work, the 'we' source not beginning till 169. Thus that 'Asia' is used in the popular sense in 166 becomes probable, because it is so used undoubtedly in 29 and the remaining passages in Acts admit of either interpretation.²

Here, then, we can now say still more precisely than in § 11 that Paul, proceeding from South Galatia (Lystra, etc. 16:1-5) westwards, had already reached Asia (in the narrower sense) or at least its neighbourhood (16:6); that, on account of the prohibition to preach there, he directed his steps (16:6a) towards the N.E., and founded, first, in Asian Phrygia, those churches which we find him visiting anew in 18:23, and afterwards those in North Galatia.³ As for the word Phrygia, it must unquestionably be used in the popular sense, for the word has no different official sense whatever. The word thus includes in point of language the whole of the former territory of Phrygia, and it is only as a matter of fact that the meaning is limited to the Asian portion (see above, § 11).

Apart, however, from the question whether Lk. adhered exactly to the usage of Paul, it is quite unpermissible to say of Paul that he invariably confined himself to the official usage.⁴

² See the enumeration of them given elsewhere (ASIA, col. 339 end, col. 340 end). In Stud. bibl. et eccles. (443-46) Ramsay withdraws his concession of a popular use of the word Asia in a sense less extended than as denoting the province, because other writers of the same period use 'Asia' only of the entire quarter of the globe if not of the province. But an author who, as in Acts 29 f., names Phrygia alongside of Asia unquestionably does employ 'Asia' in a narrower sense than as denoting the province of this name; and the fact remains, even if this usage is not followed by other writers. Against the restriction of the meaning to Mysia, Lydia, Caria, and smaller districts—in short, the Ægean coast lands—Ramsay, Stud. Bibl. 430 f., urges that it did not come in till after the division of the province in 295 A.D. The point, however, is not whether exactly these districts are what is meant, but merely that Phrygia is not included along with them. On Ramsay's own showing (Church, chap. 82) this was so also when the province of Asia was constituted in 133 B.C.; and the narrower use of 'Asia' (without Phrygia), which unquestionably occurs in Acts 29, may be a survival from that time. As for the name Galatia, the fact of its not occurring in Acts 13 f. might seem to make against its being used in Acts in the official sense. The objection would apply with double force on Ramsay's assumption that when Luke mentions a certain district in which Paul proposes to make a missionary tour, he always names it by its comprehensive and official name before particularising (Exp., '956, 35-40). The assumption, however, cannot be maintained. Ramsay himself in one place (St. Paul, ch. 51, p. 97) limits the assumption by the insertion of the word 'usually,' but he afterwards (ib. ch. 91, p. 196) leaves it unqualified ('wherever'). Apart from the notices of entrances upon new missionary fields, Ramsay attributes the employment of the official phraseology to Luke in other places also (ch. 61, no. 3, p. 135 f. and ch. 114, p. 253 f.). On the other hand, in Exp., '986, p. 126=Gal. chap. 23, p. 375, he accentuates the opposite view: 'it has been shown in page after page of my St. Paul that Luke follows the Greek popular and colloquial usage, as it was current among the more educated half of society in the cities of the Ægean land' (cp § 13, end).

⁴ So Ramsay, Church, chap. 82, St. Paul, chap. 61, no. 3, p. 135 f.; Exp., '986, pp. 29-32 125 f.=Gal. chap. 14, pp. 275-

The assertion may possibly hold good for 2 Cor. 11, 9, if, as Ramsay (Exp., '95b, p. 38) tells us, Philippi did not belong to Macedonia in popular parlance, for 2 Cor. 11.8 f. certainly relates to the same events as Phil. 4.15 f. Besides this instance, there is yet one other—curiously enough, unnoticed by Ramsay—which favours his view. Galilee and Samaria became incorporated with Judaea as a single territory under Roman rule—according to Josephus, Ant. xix. 92 B f. ii. 11 a, after the death of Herod Agrippa I. (Acts 12.23) in 44 A.D., but according to Tacitus (Ann. 12.54) after the deposition of Ventidius Cumanus in 52 A.D. (Schür., GV 1.476 f., ET 2.172 ff.). That the official name of this territory was Judaea we have evidence going as far back as 69 A.D. (Tac. Hist. 2.5). It can hardly be doubted, therefore, that the name had been already given to it in 44 A.D. (or 52 A.D.). If, now, we are at liberty to assume the existence of Christian churches in Galilee we may be sure that Paul did not intend to exclude them when he wrote 1 Thess. 2.14 Gal. 1.22. As, nevertheless, he mentions only Judaea, he appears to be following the official phraseology.¹

All the other passages adduced by Ramsay, on the other hand, prove nothing.

Judaea is named by Paul in 2 Cor. 1.10, Rom. 15.31 also; but here only the narrower meaning need be understood.

Where, apart from 2 Cor. 11.9, he names Macedonia (1 Thess. 1.7 f. 4.10, 1 Cor. 16.5, 2 Cor. 1.16 2.13 7.58 i., Rom. 15.26, and also Phil. 4.15) the apostle may be using the word quite as well in its popular as in its official sense.

So also with the Syria and Cilicia of Gal. 1.21. The order in which they are named here is not in accordance with that in Acts 9.30 11.25 f., which brings Paul from Jerusalem first to Cilicia, and then to Syria. Ramsay seeks to remove the discrepancy by showing that at that time Syria and Cilicia were united as a single province but had not received a common name. But should Paul ever have found it necessary to enumerate them in an order which was not that of his actual route, this necessity could only have arisen from the existence of a fixed and unvarying usus loquendi such as we have for example in the case of provincia Bithynia et Pontus. Ramsay himself, however, has to confess that in the present instance he has not been able to find any proof of such a fixed usage. All that he can adduce is a collocation of three names (Exp., '98b, p. 31 f. = Gal. ch. 14, p. 277 f.; Stud. bibl. et eccl. 4.24) in accordance with which he designates the province on his own map in St. Paul's provincia Syria et Cilicia et Phœnice; but this he takes so little seriously that in the same work (St. Paul ch. 8 i., p. 181) he says 'Cilicia was part of Syria.' But that Paul is thinking of Syria and Cilicia as a geographical unity is rendered positively improbable by his repetition of the article (τῆς Συρίας καὶ τῆς Κιλικίας).²

Where Paul then mentions Asia (1 Cor. 16.19 2 Cor. 10) and Achaia (1 Thess. 1.7 f. 2 Cor. 1.1 9.2 11.10 Rom. 15.26), the popular sense is quite as possible as the official. Indeed, if it is accepted as a fact (so, for example, by Ramsay) that Paul made some converts to Christianity in Athens (Acts 17.33 f.), whilst yet we find him calling the Corinthian Stephanas (1 Cor. 1.16 16.15) his first convert in Achaia, he here uses Achaia in its popular sense, which, as Ramsay tells us (Exp., '95b, p. 38), did not include Athens (see ACHAIA). If Rom. 15.19 is assumed to be genuine and Tit. 3.12 to have reference to it, Paul here uses Illyricum in a wider sense, which includes the whole coast of Epirus as far as to Actium, where the Epirotic Nicopolis lay. Epirus never was part of Illyria. From 40 B.C. onwards they did not even touch each other; the southern border of Illyria was much farther N., passing through Scodra and Lissus on the Drilon. There are many other cities named Nicopolis, but not one of them in any district visited, so far as we know, by Paul. Ramsay does not express himself upon 1 Cor. 16.15 and Tit. 3.12; but on the other hand he notes that in Rom. 15.19 Paul uses the Roman form 'Illyricum' whilst the Greeks used Illyrikos only as an adjective, the substantive being Illyris (Exp., '98b, p. 30 = Gal. chap. 14, p. 276 f.). This, however, tells us nothing as to the geographical denotation of the expression.³ Further (Exp. and 278, chap. 23, p. 314; also Zahn (Einkl. in das NT, § 11, n. 4), who, however, although a supporter of the South Galatian theory, traverses every other contention of Ramsay's dealt with above in §§ 9-15 (so far as they are to be found in Church; St. Paul he had not yet seen).

² The omission of the second article, though adopted by Ramsay as the right reading, is supported only by κ* among the uncials.

³ To a like category belongs Ramsay's assertion (Exp., '98b, p. 135 = Gal. chap. 25, p. 321) that Paul of set purpose calls the Philippians Philippenses (Phil. 4.15), which 'is the Greek representative of the Latin Philippensis, according to a rule familiar to archaeologists . . . he avoids the Greek ethnic, which was Φιλιππῆνσις or Φιλιππῆνσις. He would not address the inhabitants of a Roman colony by a Greek name, but only by the Latin name written in Greek form.' Elsewhere (J. of Theol. Stud. 1.116 [1899]) he says still more definitely: 'the suffix -ήσιος was only used in Greek to reproduce Latin names.' But—does not Homer call the Italcans Ἰτακῆσιοι (Od. 2.25 and often)? Bühler Gal., as above) he lays emphasis on the point that in 2 Tim. 4.10 Paul designates as Dalmatia the province which in Rom. 15.19 he had called Illyrikon in agreement, he thinks, with the change in the name of Illyria which had actually happened in the closing years of the apostle's life, Dalmatia having previously denoted only the southern portion of that province. It is, however, a mere begging of the question to assume that the Dalmatia of 2 Tim. 4.10 covers the same area as the Illyria of Rom. 15.19. Dalmatia in Timothy could quite as easily mean that part of Illyria which in popular speech had retained its old name.

Further, it is not legitimate to argue for Paul's adoption of the official phraseology from the fact that he nowhere employs geographical expressions which have only a popular but no official meaning; before doing so, it would be necessary to produce passages in which Paul had occasion to use such expressions, and yet avoided doing so. Lastly, that Paul must have followed the official usage on account of the manner in which his missionary activity connected itself with the official capitals (Exp., '95b, p. 35 f., and often) is a mere theory that proves nothing.

Moreover, even if Paul did invariably follow the official practice, the conclusion so often based upon this—viz., that Paul must by Galatia have meant South Galatia—would still be quite illegitimate. As if North Galatia did not equally belong to the province of Galatia! Thus, if we assume the word Galatia to be used in its official sense, it becomes only a possibility, not a necessity, that our epistle was addressed to South Galatians.

In 18.23 Paul 'establishes all the disciples.' As there were disciples in South Galatia, it has been thought by some that we must interpret only in this sense 'the Galatic region (τὴν διακίτην ἡμετέραν) traversed by him along with Phrygia, and that North Galatia, Galatia must be excluded. To escape the second necessity, some have assumed the course of the journey to have been as in 166—first through South Galatia and afterwards through North Galatia (against this see, further, § 11 above). Neither assumption is at all compelled by the text. 'All' (πάντας) must be meant to be limited by the route stated to have been taken. One who travels through Galatia (and Phrygia) can establish only the disciples whom he finds there—in other words, if South Galatia is meant, only the South Galatians—if North Galatia, only those of the N. The possibility of the existence of the latter is not excluded by the fact that there were disciples in South Galatia. 'In order' (καθεξῆς) in like manner means only that Paul visited successively each church which lay on his route, not that he visited every place in Asia Minor where there were disciples.

It may be the case that in wide districts of North Galatia nothing but Celtic was spoken, and that travelling in the interior—especially for an invalid (Gal. 4.13)—was very arduous. Lightfoot's assumption, however, that Paul carried his mission throughout the whole of North Galatia is as gratuitous as it is embarrassing. Ramsay's disinclination towards the North Galatian theory is in large measure due to the fact that he looks at it only in the form presented by Lightfoot. In reality, it is sufficient to suppose that during his illness, or during his convalescence, Paul founded a few churches, none of them very far apart, (Das griech. Secundärsuffix -της 40 [Gött., '58]), besides a large number of other adjectives in this termination, has collected fifteen which are derived from proper names—among them names of various Greek places—in which a derivation from the Latin -ensis is quite improbable. Ἰθακήσιος occurs in documents in Demosthenes, Ἀκακῆσιος in Callimachus (circa 260 B.C.). Nor are they all derivatives from words ending in -η or -α, such as Ἰθάκη or Ἰθακῆ. Not to mention any but words that are unquestionably early, from pre-Roman times: Ἀκακῆσιος comes from Ἀκακός (like Βροτῆσιος, therefore, in Hesiod, and Ἀποτῆσιος in Aratus, circa 270 B.C.), and Τιταρῆσιος is, in Iliad, 2.751, a river descending from Mount Τιτάριον, in Hesiod, Shield, 181, and in Apollonius of Rhodes (circa 250 B.C.) a man from the same district. Cp also Kühner, Ausf. Gramm. d. griech. Sprache, § 334, n. 2.

and all situated in the W. of North Galatia, where acquaintance with Greek, as far as Pessinus and Germa are concerned, is conceded even by Ramsay (Church, chap. 61, no. 6). Nor, in this case, need the Galatian mission have taken up such an excessive amount of time as to embarrass the chronology of the journeys of Paul, as Ramsay supposes (Church, 84-86).¹

Even granting that our first notice of a bishop (and so of a Christian church) in these regions is as late as 325 A.D., whilst for Ancyra, more to the eastward, on the other hand, it is as much as some thirty years earlier, we have in this no sufficient justification for saying, as Ramsay does (St. bibl. et eccl. 419), that 'the only form of the North Galatian theory that is not a historical absurdity is Lightfoot's, who held that Paul's Galatian churches were in the great cities, especially Ancyra.'

The limitation of the old Galatian missionary field indicated above deprives of much of its weight the objection that the founding of the North

19. Nor the Galatian Churches is not recorded in silence of Acts. Ramsay repeatedly declares their existence to be for him incredible for the reason that, had they existed, he could no longer hold Acts to be a work produced within the first century by a companion of Paul (Church, chap. 8, and pp. 59-83, 86*f.*, etc.). On the claim for Acts thus presupposed by Ramsay, see ACTS, §§ 2, 4-7, 12-14. As far as the silence of Acts as to the founding of the North Galatian churches is concerned, it may be pointed out that the same book says practically nothing about the founding of the churches in Cilicia, and absolutely nothing about those of Colossæ and Rome, or about Paul's journey to Corinth, which we infer from 2 Cor. 2:1-14, 12:21-13:2. Still more noteworthy is its absolute suppression of the very name of Titus on account of the bitter controversy that had been waged over him (Gal. 2:3). The same consideration must have determined the author to recall as little as possible the memory of the Galatian churches within which there had been such violent disputes. Not till 18:23, and even then only incidentally, does he allude to their existence.

iii. NT references suit North Galatia best.—If it is to be held as proven that Paul did found churches in North Galatia, the point which we have now to determine is whether the references in the NT, and especially in Galatians, suit North or South Galatia better. That both portions of the province are meant equally is inadmissible. According to Gal. 4:13-15, the occasion of their founding must have been the same for all the Galatian churches.

Nothing decisive is made out when it is proved that passages in Galatians which would be appropriate to

20. Indecisive arguments. North Galatia are suitable also to the South. (a) Had Paul actually circumcised Timothy and delivered the decree of the apostles (Acts 16:3*f.*; but see ACTS, § 7, and COUNCIL, § 10), enabling the Judaizers to cite a case of self-contradiction in view of his preaching of freedom from the law (Ramsay, St. Paul, chap. 82, Exp., '98*b*, pp. 17-20, 193*f.* = Gal. [chap. 8] pp. 256-260, [chap. 27] pp. 324-326; but on Gal. 5:11-13, see next article, §§ 10 and 13, n.), the fact could have been proclaimed quite as easily in North as in South Galatia. (b) Star gods, which are meant by the στροχία in 4:39 (EV, ELEMENTS, g. v., § 2), were worshipped not only in Antiochia Pisidia (where moon-worship is proved to have existed); and castration and stigmatisation (if 5:12-17 do really refer to the practice of these in pagan worships) also were widely spread. (c) Gal. 3:28 is regarded by Ramsay (Church, 43) as an 'allusion' to the readers 'as Greeks . . . for purpose of courtesy.' This also would be equally appropriate for North Galatia. Besides, the statement can be intended quite generally, without any 'allusion' at all.

¹ This divergence from Lightfoot's view is therefore not, as might perhaps at first appear, a half retraction of the North Galatian theory and an approximation to the South Galatian. It is simply a better formulating of the North Galatian, which avoids the difficulties needlessly introduced by Lightfoot.

(d) Paul can conceivably have been received as an 'angel of God' (ἄγγελος θεοῦ) (4:14) on other occasions besides that of his deification at Lystra (Acts 14:11-18), to which Ramsay (Church, chap. 61, no. 9; St. Paul, chap. 58) refers the passage. (e) Ramsay argues (Church, chap. 62) that if in the Pauline Epistles the South Galatians are alluded to only in 2 Tim. 3:11, and not in Galatians and 1 Cor. 16:1, Acts must be regarded as unhistorical when it speaks of his conspicuous love for them; yet that an erroneous representation of the kind could not have arisen in the second century, in which those churches had no importance whatever. Very possibly, however, Paul may have written epistles to the South Galatians which we no longer possess. An epistle to the Laodiceans has perhaps been lost (Col. 4:16); certainly one to Corinth has (1 Cor. 5:9-11). The apostle may in any case be supposed to have loved the North Galatians also, as far, at least, as to write an epistle to them if it was they who stood in danger of drifting away from the true Gospel.

Another argument for the South Galatian address of the Epistle is found by Ramsay in the 21. Inheritance, etc. language used by Paul regarding inheritance and other matters.

1. The laws of inheritance according to Ramsay.—

(a) When the Gentiles who follow Abraham in his faith are called his sons (Gal. 3:7), this, Ramsay holds, has its explanation in the conception that they are heirs of his faith. This conception, he goes on to say, rests upon a law of inheritance according to which only sons (real or adoptive), not daughters or strangers, can inherit, so that, conversely also, all heirs can be called sons. Such was indeed the ancient Roman law of inheritance. In Paul's time, however, it was by Roman law open to a man to make any one his heir without adopting him as a son. On the other hand, the ancient Roman idea held good in the Greek law, and this according to Ramsay's conjecture had 'certainly' been introduced into South Galatia under Alexander the Great and the Seleucidæ (334-189 B.C.) long before it came under the Roman rule, and had continued to be the law under that rule while in North Galatia the Romans had introduced their contemporary law at once in place of that of the Celts (Exp., '98*b*, pp. 203-6, 290-94 = Gal. [chaps. 31-35] pp. 337-344, 370-375).

(b) Further, according to the contemporary law of Rome, a will remained secret during the lifetime of the testator, came into force only at his death, and until his death could always be changed by the testator. In Ramsay's view, the opposite is the case with the will (διαθήκη) of Gal. 3:15-17, and therefore, he thinks, it is a will in the Greek sense that Paul has in his mind. Such a will was from the first 'open and public, immediately effective, and irrevocable,' it must be deposited either in original or in a properly certified copy in the Record Office of the city, 'and the officials there were bound to satisfy themselves that it was a properly valid document before they accepted it; if there was an earlier will, the later must not be accepted unless it was found not to interfere with the preceding one'; and so it continued to be in South Galatia down to the apostle's time, whatever the changes, greater or smaller, it may have passed through elsewhere (Exp., '98*b*, pp. 299-303, 326-9, 435 = Gal. [chaps. 33-34, 39] pp. 349-355, 364-368, 384).

(c) Lastly, in Roman law, a son under age remains till his fourteenth year under a tutor, and till his twenty-fifth under a curator. The tutors, Ramsay takes it, answer to the 'guardians' (ἐπίτροποι), the curators to the 'stewards' (οἰκονόμοι) of Gal. 4:2. He discovers, however, this difference—that according to Roman law the father can nominate by will only the tutor, not also the curator, of his son. Greek law here presents no analogy; it seems to know only 'guardians' (ἐπίτροποι), not 'stewards' (οἰκονόμοι). On the other hand, Ramsay finds a full analogy to what we meet with in Galatians in the 'Syro-Roman,' or as he prefers to call it 'Græco-Syrian,' 'law-book' of the fifth century A.D., edited by Bruns and Sachau in 1880. Here the father nominates by will not only the future 'guardian' (ἐπίτροπος) but also the future curator of his son. Ramsay holds that this law dates from the time of the Seleucidæ, and had force in South Galatia before that of Rome. When in Syria the Roman law likewise became influential, 'the name curator was substituted,' in the Syrian law-book referred to, 'for οἰκονόμος,' while the word ἐπίτροπος, written, however, in Syriac letters, was retained (Exp., '98*b*, pp. 439-441 = Gal. [chap. 41] pp. 391-393).

2. Are the facts established?—The present writer is not in a position to bring to a test these various statements in all their details. It has to be observed, however, not only that many of them are pure conjectures, but also that what they allege regarding Greek law is in the most essential points at variance with what we know as Attic law, or indeed as Greek law generally.

(a) Schulin,¹ Beauchet,² as also Thalheim,³ find in an author as early as Iseus (circa 370 B.C.) that in Athens a man was at liberty to make any one his heir without adopting him; and Lipsius (in Meier-Schoemann, Attischer Process, 259*f.*) and Mitteis (Rechtsrecht u. Volksrecht, 341) accept this as holding good everywhere for the third century B.C., since the testaments of the philosophers as preserved to us by Diogenes Laertius certainly are not restricted to the Attic field alone. The wills of Greek settlers recently discovered in the Faiyûm in like manner reveal a similar state of the law (Mahaffy, 'On the Flinders Petrie papyri' in Cunningham Mem. Roy. Ir. Acad. no. 8, '91, Introd. p. 41). This last is the only instance noted by Ramsay; but he does not regard it as having any bearing on South Galatia; he holds it to be a 'rapid development' extending to Greek wills only in the case of the soldiers in question who in Egypt were separated from their families. But it is not only unproven, it is quite improbable, that Paul and the South Galatians should have remained entirely unaffected by this development which had been going on in Athens and elsewhere for three or four centuries, and that they should have gone on taking it for granted as a matter of course that no one could inherit except an actual or an adopted son. The Syrian law-book also does not show any continuance of what Ramsay calls the Greek law, for it allows the testator to name as his heirs his wife or his illegitimate children alongside of his legitimate children (London Text, §§ 36, 63, pp. 12, 19).

(b) In Attic law, not only written wills in most cases were sealed and deposited without disclosure of their contents, and opened only after the death of the testator (Diog. Laert. v. 214, § 57; Aristoph. Wasps, 583-90; Iseus, 627 71; Bekker, Char. I. sc. 9) but they could also be demanded back by the testator in order to be destroyed or declared in the presence of witnesses to be no longer valid (Iseus, 630-32; Meier-Schoemann, 259*f.*; Thalheim, § 10; Schulin, pp. 7-9; Beauchet, 368-672). The passages referred to also supply the proof that a will did not of necessity require to be deposited with a magistrate, that it could equally well be entrusted to a private person, or, for greater security, to several private persons.⁴ This effectually disposes of the theory that there was an official inspection of the contents of a will. In fact, even in the Faiyûm, where a public Record Office has recently been brought to light, Mahaffy (op. cit. Introd. p. 41) assures us that 'the entry of these private documents on the records of some public office is not accompanied by any supervision, any official countersigning of each as inspected and approved by the State.'

For Ramsay, however, the most important thing is the irrevocability of a will. None of the scholars we have cited know anything of this. Schulin (ut supra), who deals, not with Attic wills only, but with all Greek wills accessible to him, never mentions it; indeed the opposite is taken to be self-evident, and both Schulin (21*f.* 49) and Beauchet (222) affirm that, so far as Athens is concerned, even a will containing an adoption could at any time be recalled though an adoption completed during the lifetime of the adoptive father was irrevocable. Nor can Ramsay call the Syrian law-book to his aid; on this point it follows the Roman view, according to which an earlier will is annulled by a later (London Text, 45, p. 15). Here Ramsay in fact relies exclusively on the wills found in the Faiyûm. These, however, by no means prove what he requires. He adduces only this, that on them 'is often contained the provision that the testator is free to alter or invalidate' (Exp., '98b, p. 329 = Gal. chap. 34, p. 366*f.*), from which he infers 'the customary presumption that the diatheke is irrevocable.' But the customary presumption has no legally binding force, otherwise it would not be possible for wills to be revoked; and Ramsay himself says (Gal. 366): 'I confess that several high English authorities on Greek wills in Egypt, when consulted privately, expressed the opinion that these wills were revocable at the testator's desire'; though he adds 'but they have not satisfied me that the evidence justifies that opinion earlier than the Roman time and Roman influence.' In the interests of Ramsay's argument, to have been able to adduce a single instance in which Greek differed from Roman law in this respect would have been much more valuable than any number of conjectures; in point of fact, so far as we have been able to discover, it is not possible, in the Greek sphere, to point to any area, however limited, within which prevailed that irrevocability which Ramsay (Gal. 351) without qualification speaks of as 'a characteristic feature of Greek law.' His assumption might be explicable if we could venture to suppose that in bringing into such intimate connection the ideas of will-making and adoption (e.g., Exp., '98b, p. 301, 'the appointment of an heir was the adoption of a son', and, conversely, Gal. 351, 'the adoption was the will-making') he held all wills to be irrevocable because adoption by a person while still alive was irrevocable; but this would be a daring supposition. ⁴ Daresté, Bull. de Corresp. Hellen., 1882, pp. 241-245, on whom Ramsay, Cities and Bishops, i. 236*f.* and Gal. 355, relies, produces inscriptional evidence for the existence of a public archive in more than thirty cities, chiefly in Asia Minor, but of the depositing of a deed of adoption in only one, of the depositing of a will in none.

we know that at Gortyna in Crete (see Gortyna inscr. 11 to ff.) even an adoption inter vivos, such as we have been speaking of, could be revoked, and the Arabic and Armenian versions of the Syrian law-book already referred to are in remarkable agreement with this (102 [101], p. 109, 140; Mitteis, 214*f.*). The Egyptian wills have been cited by Ramsay so vaguely that it is impossible to verify them in detail, and moreover many of them still remain unpublished. The present writer is unable to say where it was that the customary presumption, against which the testators guard themselves, held good. Perhaps their saving clause has no reference to any actual law. According to Mahaffy (Introd. p. 39), in them often 'a son is mentioned as sole heir.' When the revocability of the testament is spoken of it is conceivable that we have another instance, similar to that just cited, in which it is the obvious that is said.

(c) If οικονόμος in Paul's time, and even as far back as the time of the Seleucidæ (so Ramsay, Exp., '98b, p. 441 = Gal. chap. 41, p. 393), corresponded to the Latin curator, why is it that in the Syrian law-book the Latin is substituted for οικονόμος only, and not for ἐπίτροπος also? Why does the Roman jurist Modestinus in his Greek treatise de Excusationibus (3rd cent. A.D.) also write ἐπίτροπος, but in Greek letters κουράτωρ (Lex 1, Dig. de confirmando tutore vel curatore 29 3, in Corp. Jur. Civ., edd. Krüger and Mommsen, 1336b, also 340a 352a, and often)? Ramsay has not observed that Mitteis (p. 217*f.*) adopts the view of Bruns, the co-editor of the Syrian law-book and himself a lawyer, and confirms it by additional examples, that 'the formal distinction drawn by the Romans between tutela and cura was not rightly understood by the Orientals.' Bruns says (p. 184*f.*), and certainly with justice: 'the ancient Greeks had only one kind of tutelage and therefore had only one word—ἐπίτροπος—to express it. This word the later Greeks restricted to the meaning of tutor, and they introduced alongside of it the word κουράτωρ.' Indeed, when weight is laid upon the Egyptian papyri, it ought to be observed that alongside of ἐπίτροπος they employ as a second word to designate male tutors, not οικονόμος but φροντιστής (Aegypt. Urkunden aus . . . Berlin: griech. Urkunden, no. 3829 4205 427 9 27*f.*, cp 447 18*f.* 21 [2nd cent. A.D.], and often). Mitteis (pp. 156, 217) in speaking of a Peloponnesian inscription of the second century A.D. (cp Lebas et Waddington, Voyage Archéologique, 2, no. 243a [p. 515] l. 60) in which the representative of a woman describes herself as her φροντιστής and κύριος, remarks without further note: 'φροντιστής is the translation of the Latin curator.' In the Egyptian documents cited above, φροντιστής, and, still more, κύριος, are the usual designations for the guardian of a woman.
